III. The opinion of the standers-by concerning this voice, v. 29. Some of them said that it thundered; others said that certainly an angel spoke to him. Now this shows, 1. That it was a real thing. 2. That they were loth to admit so plain a proof of Christ's divine mission. They would rather say that it was this, or that, or any thing, than that God spoke to him in answer to his prayer.

IV. The account which our Saviour himself gives of this voice.

1. Why it was sent (v. 30): "It came not because of me, but for your sakes, that all you who heard it may believe that the Father hath sent me." What is said from heaven concerning our Lord Jesus, is said for our sakes, that we may be brought to rest upon him. "That you my disciples, who are to follow me in sufferings, may therein be comforted with the same comforts that carry me on."

2. What was the meaning of it. Two things God intended when he said that he would glorify his own name:—

(1) That by the death of Christ Satan should be conquered (v. 31): Now is the judgment. He speaks with a divine exultation and triumph. "Now the year of my redeemed is come: now, now, that great work is to be done which has been so long thought of in the divine counsels." The matter of the triumph is, [1] That now is the judgment of the world; take it as a medical term: "Now is the crisis of this world." The sick and diseased world is now upon the turning point; this is the critical day upon which the trembling scale will turn for life or death, to all mankind. Or, rather, it is a law term, "Now, judgment is entered." The death of Christ was the judgment of this world. First, It is a judgment of discovery and distinction. Now is the trial of this world, for men shall have their character according as the cross of Christ is to them. By this men are judged, what they think of the death of Christ. Secondly, It is a judgment of favour and absolution. Christ upon the cross interposed between a righteous God and a guilty world. It was as it were the judgment of this world, for an everlasting righteousness was thereby brought in, not for Jews only, but the whole world. Thirdly, It is a judgment of condemnation given against the powers of darkness; see ch. xvi. 11. Satan's dominion is declared to be a usurpation. The judgment of this world is, that it belongs to Christ, and not to Satan. That now is the prince of this world cast out. It is the devil that is here called the prince of this world, because he rules over the men of the world by the things of the world. He is said to be cast out, to be now cast out. Christ reconciling the world to God by the merit of his death, broke the power of death, and cast out Satan as a destroyer; Christ, reducing the world to God by the doctrine of his cross, broke the power of sin, and cast out Satan as a deceiver. With what assurance Christ here speaks of the victory over Satan; it is as good as done, and even when he yields to death he triumphs over it.

(2) That by the death of Christ souls should be converted, and this would be the casting out of Satan (v. 32): If I be lifted up from the earth, I will draw all men unto me. Here observe two things:—

[1] The great design of our Lord Jesus, which was to draw all men to him, not the Jews only, but the Gentiles also. Observe here how Christ himself is all in all in the conversion of a soul. It is Christ that draws. He does not drive by force, but draws as the loadstone; the soul is made willing. It is to Christ perfectly He knows that He is there for the very purpose of enduring it. Only by letting these mysterious words speak their full meaning do they become intelligible and consistent. As for those who see no bitter elements in the death of Christ—nothing beyond mere dying—what can they make of such a scene? and when they place it over against the feelings with which thousands of His adoring followers have welcomed death for His sake, how can they hold Him up to the admiration of men?

28. Father, glorify thy name—by a present testimony. I have both glorified it—referring specially to the voice from heaven at His baptism, and again at His transfiguration. and will glorify it again—i.e., in the yet future scenes of His still deeper necessity; although this promise was a present and sublime testimony, which would irradiate the clouded spirit of the Son of man.

29-33. The people therefore that stood by, said, It thundered; others, An angel spake to him—some hearing only a sound, others an articulate, but to them unintelligible voice.

30. Jesus . . . said, This voice came not because of me, but for your sakes—i.e., probably, to correct the unfavorable impressions which His momentary agitation and mysterious prayer for deliverance may have produced on the bystanders.

31. Now is the judgment of this world—the world that "crucified the Lord of glory" (I Cor. 2:8), considered as a vast and complicated kingdom of Satan, breathing his spirit, doing his work, and involved in his doom, which Christ's death by its hands irrevocably sealed.

now shall the prince of this world be cast out—How differently is that fast-approaching "hour" regarded in the kingdoms of darkness and of light! "The hour of relief; from the dread Troubler of our peace—how near it is! Yet a little moment, and the day is ours!" So it was calculated and felt in the one region. "Now shall the prince of this world be cast out," is a somewhat different view of the same event. We know who was right. Though yet under a veil, He sees the triumphs of the Cross in unclouded and transporting light.

32. And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me—The "I" here is emphatic—I, taking the place of the world's ejected prince. "If lifted up," means not only after that I have been lifted up, but, through the virtue of that uplifting. And truly, the death of the Cross, in all its significance, revealed in the light, and borne in upon the heart, by the power of the Holy Ghost, possesses an at-

28. Father, glorify thy name. By the name of God is to be understood himself, in all His attributes: His wisdom, truth, mercy, justice, holiness, which were all more abundantly glorified by Christ's death and resurrection (i.e., shown forth in their own excellence) than they had ever been before. Christ teaches here a lesson of submission to the divine will.

29. The people . . . said that it thundered: others said, An angel spake to him. Bishop Pearce says, Probably there was thunder as well as a voice, as in Exod. xix. 16-17, and some persons, who were at a small distance, might hear the thunder without hearing the voice, while others heard the voice too; and these last said, "An angel hath spoken to Him."

30. This voice came not because of me, but for your sakes. Probably meaning those Greeks who had been brought to Him by Philip and Andrew. The Jews had frequent opportunities of seeing His miracles and of being convinced that He was the Messiah; but these Greeks, who were to be a firstfruits of the Gentiles, had never any such opportunity. For their sakes, therefore, to confirm them in the faith, this miraculous voice appears to have come from heaven.

31. Now is the judgment of this world. The judgment spoken of in this place is applied by some to the punishment which was about to fall on the Jewish people for rejecting Christ.

And the ruler or prince of this world is understood to be Satan, who had blinded the eyes of the Jews and hardened their hearts, that they might not believe on the Son of God. But his kingdom, not only among the Jews, but in all the world, was about to be destroyed by the abolition of idolatry and the vocation of the Gentiles.

32. I . . . will draw all men unto me. After I shall have died and risen again, by the preaching of My Word and the influence of My Spirit, I shall attract and illuminate both Jews and Gentiles. It was one of the peculiar characteristics of the Messiah that unto Him should the "gathering of the people be," Gen. xlix. 10. And probably our Lord refers to the prophecy, Isa.

that we are drawn. He that was shy and distrustful of him is brought to love him and trust in him—drawn up to his terms, into his arms.

[2] The strange method he took to accomplish his design by being lifted up from the earth. This he spoke signifying by what death he should die, the death of the cross. He that was crucified was first nailed to the cross, and then lifted up upon it. The word here used signifies an honourable advancement: If I be exalted; he reckoned his sufferings his honour. Now Christ's drawing all men to him followed his being lifted up from the earth. It followed after it in time. The great increase of the church was after the death of Christ. It followed upon it as a blessed consequence of it. The cross of Christ, though to some a stumbling-stone, is to others a loadstone. Some make it an allusion to the lifting up of the brazen serpent in the wilderness, which drew all those to it who were stung with fiery serpents. O what flocking was there to it! So there was to Christ, when salvation through him was preached to all nations; see ch. iii. 14, 15. Perhaps it has some reference to the posture in which Christ was crucified, with his arms stretched out, to invite all to him, and embrace all that come.

V. The people's exception against what he said, v. 34. Though they had heard the voice from heaven, they object, and pick quarrels with him. Christ had called himself the Son of man (v. 23), which they knew to be one of the titles of the Messiah. He had also said that the Son of man must be lifted up, which they understood of his dying.

1. They alleged those scriptures of the Old Testament which speak of the perpetuity of the Messiah, from all which they inferred that the Messiah should not die. Their perverseness in opposing this to what Jesus had said will appear if we consider: That, when they vouched the scripture to prove that the Messiah abideth for ever, they took no notice of those texts which speak of the Messiah's death and sufferings. Had they never heard out of the law that he should pour out his soul unto death (Isa. liii. 12), and particularly that his hands and feet should be pierced? Why then do they make so strange of the lifting up of the Son of man? That, when they opposed what Christ said concerning the sufferings of the Son of man, they took no notice of what he had said concerning his glory and exaltation. In the doctrine of Christ there are paradoxes, which to men of corrupt minds are stones of stumbling.

2. They asked hereupon, Who is this Son of man? "Thou sayest, The Son of man must die; we have proved the Messiah must not, and where is then thy Messiahship?" They would rather have no Christ than a suffering one.

VI. What Christ said to this exception. They might, if they pleased, answer it themselves: man dies, and yet is immortal, and abideth for ever, so the Son of man. He gives them a serious caution to take heed of trifling away the day of their opportunities (v. 35, 36): "Yet a little while is the light with you; therefore walk while you have the light."

1. In general, we may observe here: The concern Christ has for the souls of men, and his desire of their welfare. With what tenderness does he here admonish those to look well to themselves who were contriving ill against him! The method he takes with these objectors, with meekness instructing those that opposed themselves, 2 Tim. ii. 25.

2. Particularly we have here,

(1) The advantage they enjoyed in having Christ and his gospel among them, with the shortness and uncertainty of their enjoyment of it: Yet a little while is the light with you. Christ is this light. His dying upon the cross was as consistent with his abiding for ever as the setting of the sun every night is with his perpetuity. The Jews at this time had the light with them; they had Christ's bodily presence. It was to be but a little while with them; Christ would shortly leave them. It is good for us all to consider what a little while we are to have the light with us. Time is short, and perhaps opportunity not so long.

(2) The warning given them to make the best of this privilege while they enjoyed it: Walk while you have the light; as travellers who make the best of their way forward, that they may not be benighted in their journey. It is our business to walk, to press forward towards heaven. The best time of walking is while we have the light. The day is the proper season for work, as the night is for rest. We are highly concerned thus to improve our opportunities, for fear lest our day be finished before we have finished our day's work and our day's journey: "Lest darkness come upon you."

(3) The sad condition of those who have sinned away the gospel. They walk in darkness, and know neither where they go, nor whither they go. Set aside the instructions of the Christian doctrine, and we traction over the wide world—to civilized and savage, learned and illiterate, alike—which breaks down all opposition, assimilates all to itself, and forms out of the most heterogeneous and discordant materials a kingdom of surpassing glory, whose uniting principle is adoring subjection "to Him that loved them." "Will draw all men 'UNTO ME,'" says He. What lips could venture to utter such a word but His, which "dropt as an honeycomb," whose manner of speaking was evermore in the same spirit of conscious equality with the Father?

33. This he said, signifying what death he should die—i.e., "by being lifted up from the earth" on "the accursed tree" (ch. 3:14; 8:28).

34. We have heard out of the law—the scriptures of the Old Testament (referring to such places as Ps. 89:28, 29; 110:4; Dan. 2:44; 7:13, 14).

that Christ—the Christ "endureth for ever." and how sayest thou, The Son of Man must be lifted up . . .—How can that consist with this "uplifting?" They saw very well both that He was holding Himself up as the Christ and a Christ to die a violent death; and as that ran counter to all their ideas of the Messianic prophecies, they were glad to get this seeming advantage to justify their unyielding attitude.

35, 36. Yet a little while is the light with you. Walk while ye have the light, . . .—Instead of answering their question, He warns them, with mingled majesty and tenderness, against trifling with their last brief opportunity, and entreats them to let in the Light while they have it in the midst of them, that they themselves might be "light in the Lord." In this case, all the clouds which hung around His Person and Mission would speedily be dispelled, while if they continued to hate the light, bootless were all His answers to their merely speculative or captious questions. (See on Luke 13:23.)

xi. 10, which peculiarly belonged to the Gentiles: "There shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek: and his rest shall be glorious." There is an allusion here to the ensigns or colors of commanders of regiments, elevated on high places on long poles, that the people might see where the pavilion of their general was and so flock to his standard.

34. We have heard out of the law. That is, out of the sacred writings. The words here are quoted from Ps. cx. 4; but the Jews called every part of the sacred writings by the name The Law, in opposition to the words or sayings of the scribes. That Christ abideth for ever. There was no part of the law nor of the Scripture that said the Messiah should not die; but there are several passages that say as expressly as they can that Christ must die, and die for the sin of the world, too. See especially Isa. liii. 1, etc.; Dan. ix. 24, 27. But as there were several passages that spoke of the perpetuity of His reign, as Isa. ix. 7; Ezek. xxxvii. 25; Dan. vii. 14, they probably confounded the one with the other, and thus drew the conclusion, The Messiah cannot die; for the Scripture hath said, His throne, kingdom, and reign shall be eternal. The prophets, as well as the Evangelists and apostles, speak sometimes of the divine, sometimes of the human nature of Christ. When they speak of the former, they show forth its glory, excellence, omnipotence, omniscience, and eternity; when they speak of the latter, they show forth its humiliations, afflictions, sufferings, and death. And those who do not make the proper distinction between the two natures of Christ, the human and the divine, will ever make blunders as well as the Jews.

35. Yet a little while is the light with you. In answer to their objection, our Lord compares himself to a light which was about to disappear for a short time and afterwards to shine forth with more abundant luster; but not to their comfort, if they continued to reject its present beamings. He exhorts them to follow this light while it is among them. The Christ shall abide forever, it is true; but He will not always be visible. When He shall depart from you, you shall be left in the thickest darkness, in impenitence and hardness of heart. Then shall you wish to see one of the days of the Son of Man, and shall not see it, Luke xvii. 22. Then shall ye seek Me, but shall not find Me, John know little of the difference between good and evil. He is going to destruction, and knows not his danger, for he is either sleeping or dancing at the pit's brink.

(4) The great duty and interest of every one of us inferred from all this (v. 36): While you have light, believe in the light. This is an admonition to them not to out-stand their market, but to accept the offer when it was made to them: the same Christ saith to all who enjoy the gospel. It is the duty of every one of us to believe in the gospel light, to subscribe to the truths it discovers, for it is a light to our eyes, and to follow its guidance, for it is a light to our feet. We are concerned to do this while we have the light. Those that have God for their Father are children of light, for God is light.

VII. Christ's retiring from them, hereupon: These things spoke Jesus and departed, and did hide himself from them. 1. For their conviction and awakening. If they will not regard what he hath said, he will have nothing more to say to them. Christ justly removes the means of grace from those that quarrel with him. 2. For his own preservation. He hid himself from their rage and fury. What he said irritated and exasperated them, and they were made worse by that which should have made them better.

We have here the honour done to our Lord Jesus by the Old Testament prophets, who foretold and lamented the infidelity of the many that believed not on him. Two things are here said concerning this untractable people, and both were forefold by the evangelical prophet Isaiah, that they did not believe, and that they could not believe.

I. They did not believe (v. 37): Though he had done so many miracles before them.

1. The abundance of the means of conviction. He did miracles, so many miracles; both so many and so great. Two things concerning them he here insists upon:—The number of them; they were many, and every new miracle confirmed the reality of all that went before. Being all miracles of mercy, the more there were the more good was done. The notoriety of them. He wrought these miracles before them, not in a corner, but before many witnesses.

2. The inefficacy of these means: Yet they believed not on him. These saw, and yet believed not.

3. The fulfilling of the scripture in this (v. 38): That the saying of Esaias might be fulfilled. The more improbable any event is, the more does a divine foresight appear in the prediction of it. One could not have imagined that the kingdom of the Messiah, supported with such pregnant proofs, should have met with so much opposition among the Jews, and therefore their unbelief is called a marvellous work, and a wonder, Isa. xxix. 14. Christ himself marvelled at it, but it was what Isaiah foretold (Isa. liii. 1). The gospel is here called their report: Who has believed our hearing, which we have heard from God, and which you have heard from us. Many hear it, but few heed it and embrace it: Who hath believed it? Here and there one, but none to speak of. It is spoken of as a thing to be greatly lamented that so few believe the report of the gospel. The reason why men believe not the report of the gospel is because the arm of the Lord is not revealed to them. They saw Christ's miracles, but did not see the arm of the Lord revealed in them.

II. They could not believe, because Esaias said, He hath blinded their eyes. This is a hard saying, who can explain it? God damns none by mere sovereignty; yet it is said, They could not believe.

1. They could not believe, that is, they would not; they were obstinately resolved in their infidelity. This is a moral impotency, like that of one that is accustomed to do evil, Jer. xiii. 23.

2. They could not because Esaias had said, He hath blinded their eyes. It is certain that God is not the author of sin, and yet,

(1) There is a righteous hand of God sometimes to be acknowledged in the blindness of those who persist in impenitency and unbelief, by which they are justly punished for their former resistance of the divine light. If God withhold abused grace, and give men over to indulged lusts, then he blinds their eyes, and hardens their hearts, and these are spiritual judgments. Observe the method of conversion implied here. Sinners are brought to see with their eyes, to discern the reality of divine things. To understand with their heart, not only to assent and approve, but to consent and accept. To be converted, and effectually turned from sin to Christ. Then God will heal them; will pardon their sins, and mortify their corruptions, which are as lurking diseases.

(2) Judicial blindness and hardness are in the word of God threatened against those who wilfully persist in wickedness. Known unto God are all his works, and all ours too. Christ knew before who would

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

36. These things spake Jesus, and departed, and did hide himself from them—He who spake as never man spake, and immediately after words fraught with unspeakable dignity and love, had to "hide Himself" from His auditors! What then must they have been? He retired, probably to Bethany. (The parallels are: Matt. 21:17; Luke 21:37.)

37-41. It is the manner of this Evangelist alone to record his own reflections on the scenes he describes; but here, having arrived at what was virtually the close of our Lord's public ministry, he casts an affecting glance over the fruitlessness of His whole ministry on the bulk of the now doomed people. 37. though he had done so many miracles—The word used suggests their nature as well as number.

38. That the saying of Esaias . . . might be fulfilled. This unbelief did not at all set aside the purposes of God, but, on the contrary, fulfilled them.

39-40. Therefore they could not believe, because Esaias said again, He hath blinded their eyes, that they should not see . . . That this expresses a positive divine act, by which those who wilfully close their eyes and harden their hearts against the truth are judicially shut up in their unbelief and impenitence, is admitted by all candid critics [as OLSHAUSEN], though many of them think it necessary to contend that this is in no way inconsistent with the liberty of the human will, which of course it is not.

ADAM CLARKE

vii. 34. For the kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to the Gentiles, Matt. xxi. 43. If you do not believe in Me now, you shall then wish you had done it, when wishing shall be forever fruitless. Instead of with you, "among you" is the reading of some MSS.

36. Children of light. Let the light, the truth of Christ, so dwell in and work by you that you may be all light in the Lord; that as truly as a child is the produce of his own parent and partakes of his nature, so you may be children of the light, having nothing in you but truth and righteousness. Did hide himself from them. Either by rendering himself invisible or by suddenly mingling with the crowd, so that they could not perceive Him. See chap. viii. 59. Probably it means no more than that He withdrew from them and went to Bethany, as was His custom, a little before His crucifixion; and concealed himself there during the night, and taught publicly every day in the Temple. It was in the night season that they endeavored to seize upon Him, in the absence of the multitude.

37. Yet they believed not on him. Though the miracles were wrought for this very purpose, that they might believe in Christ, and escape the coming wrath, and every evidence was given that Jesus was the Messiah, yet they did not believe; but they were blinded by their passions, and obstinately hardened their hearts against the truth.

38. That the saying of Esaias. Or, "Thus the word of Isaiah was fulfilled." Our report. The testimony of the prophets concerning the person, office, sufferings, death, and sacrifice of the Messiah. See Isa. liii. 1, etc. The arm of the Lord. The power, strength, and miracles of Christ.

39. Therefore they could not believe. Why? Because they did not believe the report of the prophets concerning Christ; therefore they credited not the miracles which He wrought as a proof that He was the Person foretold by the prophets, and promised to their fathers. The prophecy of Isaiah was neither the cause nor the motive of their unbelief; it was a simple prediction, which imposed no necessity on them to resist the offers of mercy. Thus then saith Augustine: "If I be asked why they could not believe? I immediately answer, Because they would not. And God, having foreseen their bad will, foretold it by the prophet."

40. And I should heal them. This verse is taken from Isa. vi. 9, and perhaps refers more to the judgments that should fall upon them as a nation, which God was determined should not be averted, than it does to their eternal state. To suppose that the text meant that God was unwilling that they should turn unto Him, lest He should be obliged to save them, is an insupportable blasphemy.

betray him.

(3) What God has foretold will certainly come to pass, and so it might be said that therefore they could not believe. Such is the knowledge of God that he cannot be deceived in what he foresees, and such his truth that he cannot deceive in what he foretells. Yet be it observed that the prophecy did not name particular persons. It pointed at the body of the Jewish nation; yet still reserving a remnant, which reserve was sufficient to keep a door of hope open to particular persons; for each one might say, Why may not I be of that remnant?

Lastly, The evangelist, having quoted the prophecy, shows (v. 41) that its principal reference was to the days of the Messiah: These things said Esaias when he saw his glory, and spoke of him. We read in the prophecy that this was said to Esaias, Isa. vi. 8, 9. But here we are told that it was said by him to the purpose. For nothing was said by him as a prophet which was not first said to him; nor was anything said to him which was not afterwards said by him to those to whom he was sent. The vision which the prophet there had of the glory of God is here said to be his seeing the glory of Jesus Christ; He saw his glory. It is said that the prophet there spoke of him. It might be objected against his doctrine, If it was from heaven, why did not the Jews believe it? It was not for want of evidence, but because their ears were heavy. It was spoken of Christ, that he should be glorified in the ruin of an unbelieving multitude, as well as in the salvation of a distinguished remnant.

Some honour was done to Christ by these rulers: for they believed on him; but they did not do him honour enough, for they had not courage to own their faith in him. Many professed more kindness for Christ than really they had; these had more kindness for him than they were willing to profess.

I. See the power of the word in the convictions that many of them were under. They believed on him as Nicodemus, received him as a teacher come from God. Many cannot but approve of that in their hearts which yet outwardly they are shy of. It may be, there are more good people than we think there are. Some are really better than they seem to be. Their faults are known, but their repentance is not; a man's goodness may be concealed by a culpable yet pardonable weakness, which he himself truly repents of. Nor have all who are good the same faculty of appearing to be so.

II. See the power of the world in the smothering of these convictions. They believed in Christ, but because of the Pharisees they durst not confess him. Wherein they failed and were defective: They did not confess Christ. There is cause to question the sincerity of that faith which is either afraid or ashamed to show itself. What they feared: being put out of the synagogue, which they thought would be a disgrace and damage to them. What was at the bottom of this fear: They loved the praise of men, chose it as a more valuable good than the praise of God. They set these two in the scale one against the other. 1. They set the praise of men in one scale, and considered how good it was to give praise to men and receive praise from men. They would not confess Christ, lest they should thereby derogate from the reputation of the Pharisees, and forfeit their own. Besides, the followers of Christ were put into an ill name, and were looked upon with contempt, which those who had been used to honour could not bear. Each one thought that if he should declare himself in favour of Christ he should stand alone, whereas, if anyone had had resolution to break the ice, he would have had more seconds than he thought of. 2. They put the praise of God in the other scale. They were sensible that by confessing Christ they should both give praise to God, and have praise from God; but, 3. They gave the preference to the praise of men, and this turned the scale. Many come short of the glory of God by having a regard to the applause of men. Love of the praise of men, as a by-end in that which is good, will make a man a hypocrite when religion is in fashion. Love of the praise of men, as a base principle in that which is evil, will make a man an apostate when religion is in disgrace.

We have here the honour Christ not assumed, but asserted, to himself, in the account he gave of his mission. As this evangelist records it, it was his last public discourse; all that follows was private with his disciples. He cried and said. The raising of his voice and crying intimate, 1. His boldness in speaking. Though they had not courage openly to profess faith in his doctrine, he had courage openly to publish it; if they were ashamed of it, he was not. 2. His earnestness in speaking. He cried as one that was importu-

41. These things said Esaias, when he saw his glory, and spake of him—a key of immense importance to the opening of Isaiah's vision (Isa. 6), and all similar Old Testament representations. "THE SON is the King Jehovah who rules in the Old Testament and appears to the elect, as in the New Testament. THE SPIRIT, the invisible Minister of the Son, is the Director of the Church and the Revealer in the sanctuary of the heart" [OLSHAUSEN].

And one cried unto another, and said, Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory."

42. Among the chief rulers also many believed on him. We know the names of only two of them, Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathaea.

But . . . they did not confess him. Or "it." They were as yet weak in the faith, and could not bear the reproach of the cross of Christ. Besides, the principal rulers had determined to excommunicate every person who acknowledged Christ for the Messiah; see chap. ix. 22.

43. They loved the praise of men. The "glory" or honor that cometh from men.

44. Jesus cried and said. This is our Lord's concluding discourse to this wicked people. Probably this and the following verses should be understood as a part of the discourse which was left off at the thirty-sixth verse. Jesus cried—He spoke these words aloud, and showed His earnest desire for their salvation.

MATTHEW HENRY

nate, and in good earnest in what he said. 3. It denotes his desire that all might take notice of it. This being the last time of the publication of his gospel by himself in person, he makes proclamation. Now what is this closing summary of all Christ's discourses? It is much like that of Moses (Deut. xxx. 15): See, I have set before you life and death. So Christ here takes leave of the temple, with a solemn declaration of three things:—

I. The privileges and dignities of those that believe.

1. By believing in Christ we are brought into an honourable acquaintance with God (v. 44, 45): He that believes on me, believes on him that sent me. He does not believe in a mere man, but he believes in one that is the Son of God. His faith does not terminate in Christ, but through him it is carried out to the Father, to whom we come by Christ as our way. This is illustrated, v. 45. He that sees me sees him that sent me; in getting an acquaintance with Christ, we come to the knowledge of God. God makes himself known in the face of Christ (2 Cor. iv. 6). All that have a believing sight of Christ are led by him to the knowledge of God. God is pleased to deal with fallen man by proxy.

2. We are hereby brought into a comfortable enjoyment of ourselves (v. 46): I am come a light into the world, that whoever believes in me should not abide in darkness. (1) The character of Christ: I am come a light into the world, to be a light to it. (2) The comfort of Christians: They do not abide in darkness. They do not continue in that dark condition in which they were by nature; they are light in the Lord. Light is sown for them. They are delivered from that darkness which abideth for ever.

II. The peril and danger of those that believe not, (v. 47, 48): "If any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not; though I judge him not, there is one that judgeth him."

1. Who they are whose unbelief is here condemned: those who hear Christ's words and yet believe them not. Those shall not be condemned for their infidelity that never had, nor could have, the gospel; every man shall be judged according to the dispensation of light he was under.

2. What is their unbelief: not receiving Christ's word; it is interpreted (v. 48) a rejecting of Christ. Where the banner of the gospel is displayed, no neutrality is admitted.

3. The wonderful patience and forbearance of our Lord Jesus: I judge him not. He had work of another nature to do first, and that was to save the world. To offer salvation to all the world, and thus far to save them that it is their own fault if they be not saved.

4. The certain and unavoidable judgment of unbelievers at the great day, the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God. There is one that judgeth them. Nothing is more dreadful than abused patience, and grace trampled on. Their final judgment is reserved to the last day. The word of Christ will judge them then: The words that I have spoken, the same shall judge the unbeliever in the last day. Christ's words will judge unbelievers. As the evidence of their crime, they will convict them. As the rule of their doom, they will condemn them.

III. A solemn declaration of the authority Christ had to demand our faith, v. 49, 50.

1. The commission which our Lord Jesus received from the Father (v. 49): I have not spoken of myself; but the Father gave me a commandment what I should say. This is the same with what he said ch. vii. 16. My doctrine is, Not mine, for I have not spoken of myself. It was his that sent him. God the Father gave him his commission. His instructions are called a commandment. Our Lord Jesus learned obedience himself, before he taught it to us, though he was a Son. The Lord God commanded the first Adam, and he by his disobedience ruined us; he commanded the second Adam, and he by his obedience saved us.

2. The scope of this commission: I know that his commandment is life everlasting, v. 50. The commission given to Christ had a reference to the everlasting state of the children of men, and was in order to their everlasting life and happiness in that state. The command given him was life everlasting. This Christ says he knew: "I know it is so." Those who disobey Christ despise everlasting life, and renounce it.

3. Christ's exact observance of the commission and instructions given him: Whatsoever I speak, it is as the Father said unto me. As the faithful witness delivers souls, so did he, and spoke the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. This is a great encouragement to faith; the sayings of Christ, rightly understood, are what we may venture our souls upon. It is a great example of obedience. Christ said as he was bidden. This is the honour he values himself upon, that what the Father had said to him that he spoke. By an unfeigned belief of every word of Christ, and said, He that believeth . . .—This seems to be a supplementary record of some weighty proclamations, for which there had been found no natural place before, and introduced here as a sort of summary and winding up of His whole testimony.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

"I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me may not abide in the darkness. And if any man hear my sayings, and keep them not, I judge him not; for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world. He that rejecteth me and receiveth not my sayings, hath one that judgeth him; the word that I spake, the same shall judge him in the last day." We must not disassociate this from what He had already said. Nevertheless this is personal: I am come a light into the world. I have brought into the world that which it had lost, the light of life that comes when God is there, and is recognized. That is the light. I am come a light into the world; and if any man hear My sayings, rhemata, not the word, but the sayings, the individual sayings; and keep them not, I do not judge; I did not come to judge. I came to save. But that man is judged. And how is he judged? By the very words that having heard, he refuses to obey. They are the words that judge him in the last day.

The last movement was a return to the first. He goes back to emphasize His relationship with God. "I spake not from myself; but the Father which sent me, he hath given me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak. And I know that his commandment is life eternal; the things therefore which I speak, even as the Father hath said unto me, so I speak."

What self-emptying all through. And yet what daring. He had been speaking. Men had heard His sayings. They were not His. They are the sayings of God. They are the words of God. Who else ever made that claim. For nineteen hundred years the sacramental host has grown and multiplied of those who have found it to be true that in the words of Jesus, they have heard the voice of God.

Thus the account of the public ministry of Jesus ends. Fourteen signs have been grouped, eight in the realm of works, six in the realm of words; and as John distinctly says, "many other signs." We have no complete list either of His words or His works; but we have illustrations of them in this grouping of John. So many signs, yet they believed not. If we take this Gospel of John, and also Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and end there, with their account of the saying and doing of Jesus in beneficence and in revelation, then we are face to face with failure. Yet we know the story is not that of failure. The Christian Church, using the word in its fine, universal sense, all down the ages proves that it has not been failure. And why not? Because He did not end there. His teaching, wondrous teaching; His beneficent doing in the realm of miraculous exercise of power, wondrous and amazing—left the mass unbelieving. They were all unbelieving in a measure. You get little glimpses of it after the resurrection. In Matthew, in the last chapter when they went up to meet Him in Galilee, it is said that some disbelieved. Ultimate saving faith broke in waves of possibility and power only after the death and the resurrection and the ascension, when the Holy Spirit was poured out upon men.

—The Gospel According to John

ADAM CLARKE

Believeth not on me (only), but on him that sent me. Here He asserts again His indivisible unity with the Father. He who believes on the Son believes on the Father; he who hath seen the Son hath seen the Father; he who honors the Son honors the Father. Though it was for asserting this (His oneness with God) that they were going to crucify Him, yet He retracts nothing of what He had spoken, but strongly reasserts it in the very jaws of death!

46. I am come a light into the world. Probably referring to what His forerunner had said, chap. i. 5. Before the coming of this Saviour, this Sun of Righteousness, into the world, all was darkness. At His rising the darkness is dispersed; but it profits only those whose eyes are open to receive the rays of this Sun of Righteousness.

47. And believe not. "And keep them not," is the reading of some MSS. A man must hear the words of Christ in order to believe them; and he must believe in order to keep them; and he must keep them in order to his salvation. I judge him not. I need not to do it; the words of Moses and the prophets judge and condemn him.

48. The word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him. You shall be judged according to My doctrine. The maxims which you have heard from My mouth shall be those on which you shall be tried in the great day; and you shall be condemned or acquitted according as you have believed or obeyed them, or according as you have despised and violated them. See this proved, Matt. xxv. 35, etc.

49. Gave me a commandment. Or "commission." Christ, as the Messiah, received His "commission" from God: what He should command—everything that related to the foundation and establishment of the Christian institution; and what He should speak—all His private conversations with His disciples or others, He, as man, commanded and spoke through the constant inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

50. I know that his commandment is life everlasting. These words of our Lord are similar to that saying in John's First Epistle, chap. v. 11-12. "This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life." God's commandment or "commission" is, Preach salvation to a lost world, and give thyself a Ransom for all; and whoever believes on Thee shall not perish, but have everlasting life. The public work of our Lord was now done; and the remnant of His time, previously to His crucifixion, He spent in teaching His disciples—instructing them in the nature of His kingdom, His intercession, and the mission of the Holy Spirit; and in that heavenly life which all true believers live with the Father, through faith in the Son, by the operation of the Holy Ghost.

and an entire subjection of soul to it, we must give him the glory due to his name.

It has generally been taken for granted by commentators that Christ's washing his disciples' feet, and the discourse that followed it, were the same night in which he was betrayed, and at the same sitting wherein he ate the passover and instituted the Lord's supper. This evangelist, making it his business to gather up those passages which the others had omitted, industriously omits those which the others had recorded, which occasions some difficulty in putting them together. It is here said (v. 1) to be before the feast of the passover.

In these verses we have the story of Christ's washing his disciples' feet. But why would Christ do this? A wise man will not do a thing that looks odd and unusual, but for very good causes and considerations. The transaction was very solemn, and four reasons are here intimated why Christ did this: 1. That he might testify his love to his disciples, v. 1, 2. 2. That he might give an instance of his own voluntary humility, v. 3–5. 3. That he might signify to them spiritual washing, which is referred to in his discourse with Peter, v. 6–11. 4. That he might set them an example, v. 12–17.

I. Christ washed his disciples' feet that he might give a proof of that great love wherewith he loved them, v. 1, 2.

1. Our Lord Jesus, having loved his own that were in the world, loved them to the end, v. 1.

(1) This is true of the disciples that were his immediate followers, in particular the twelve. These were his own in the world, his bosom-friends. These he loved, he called them into fellowship with himself, was always tender of them. He allowed them to be very free with him, and bore with their infirmities. He loved them to the end; he never took away his loving kindness. Though there were some persons of quality that espoused his cause, he did not lay aside his old friends, but still stuck to his poor fishermen. Though he reproved them often, he never ceased to love them and take care of them.

(2) It is true of all believers. Our Lord Jesus has a people in the world that are his own. His own; where his own were spoken of that received him not, as a man's cattle are his own, which yet he may, when he pleases, dispose of. But here it is, his own persons, as a man's wife and children are his own. Christ has a cordial love for his own that are in the world. He was now going to his own in heaven; but he seems most concerned for his own on earth, because they most needed his care: the sickly child is most indulged. Those whom Christ loves he loves to the end. Nothing can separate a believer from the love of Christ; he loves his own unto perfection.

2. Christ manifested his love to them by washing their feet. Thus he would show that as his love to them was constant so it was condescending, would put honour upon them as great and surprising as for a lord to serve his servants. The disciples had just now betrayed the weakness of their love to him, in grudging the ointment that was poured upon his head (Matt. xxvi. 8), yet he presently gives this proof of his love to them. Our infirmities are foils to Christ's kindnesses, and set them off.

3. He chose this time to do it, for two reasons:

(1) Because now he knew that his hour was come when he should depart out of this world to the Father. The change that was to pass over our Lord Jesus; he must depart. As Christ himself, so all believers, when they depart out of the world, go to the Father. It is a departure out of the world, and it is a going to the Father and the fruition of him as ours. The time of this change: His hour was come. It is sometimes called his enemies' hour (Luke xxii. 53), the hour of their triumph; sometimes his hour, the hour of his triumph. His foresight of it: He knew that his hour was come; he knew from the beginning that it would come, but now he knew that it was come.

(2) Because the devil had now put it into the heart of Judas to betray him, v. 2. These words in a parenthesis may be considered, [1] As tracing Judas's treason to its origin. What way of access the devil has to men's hearts we cannot tell. But there are some sins in their own nature so exceedingly sinful, that it is plain Satan lays the egg of them in a heart disposed to be the nest to hatch them in. [2] As intimating a reason why Christ now washed his disciples' feet. Judas being now resolved to betray him, the time of his departure could not be far off. The more malicious we perceive our enemies to be against us,

Vss. 1-20. AT THE LAST SUPPER JESUS WASHES THE DISCIPLES' FEET—THE DISCOURSE ARISING THEREUPON. 1. when Jesus knew that his hour was come that he should depart out of this world unto the Father—On these beautiful euphemisms, see on Luke 9:31, 51.

having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end—The meaning is, that on the very edge of His last sufferings, when it might have been supposed that He would be absorbed in His own awful prospects, He was so far from forgetting "His own," who were to be left struggling "in the world" after He had "departed out of it to the Father" (ch. 17:11), that in His care for them He seemed scarce to think of Himself save in connection with them: "Herein is love," not only "enduring to the end," but most affectingly manifested when, judging by a human standard, least to be expected.

2. supper being ended—rather, being prepared, being served, or, going on; for that it was not "ended" is plain from vs. 26.

the devil having now—or, "already"—put into the heart of Judas . . . to betray him—referring to the agreement he had already made with the chief priests (Luke 22:3-6).

1. Now before the feast of the passover, when Jesus knew. Or, as some translate, "Now Jesus having known, before the feast of the passover, that his hour was come." The supper mentioned in v. 2 is supposed to have been that on the Thursday evening, when the Feast of the Passover began; and though, in our common translation, this passage seems to place the supper before that feast, yet, according to the amended translation, what is here said is consistent with what we read in the other Evangelists.

Having loved his own. His disciples. Which were in the world. Who were to continue longer in its troubles and difficulties. He loved them unto the end. Continued His fervent affection towards them to His latest breath, and gave them that convincing proof of it which is mentioned in v. 5. That the disciples alone are meant here every man must see.

2. And supper being ended. Rather, "while supper was preparing." To support this new translation of the words, it may be remarked that, from vv. 26 and 30, it appears that the supper was not then ended. Nay, it is probable that it was not then begun; because the washing of feet (v. 5) was usually practiced by the Jews before they entered upon their meals, as may be gathered from Luke vii. 44, and from the reason of the custom. I think that John wrote, not genomenou, but ginomenou, as in some MSS., which latter reading is approved by several eminent critics, and should be translated as above. By the supper I suppose to be meant, not only the eating of it, but the preparing and dressing of it, and doing all things necessary previously to the eating of it. The devil had, before this time of the supper, put it into Judas' heart to betray his Master. See Matt. xxvi. 14, etc.; Mark xiv. 10-11; and Luke xxii. 3, etc. Calmet observes that John, designing only to supply what was omitted by the other Evangelists, passes over all the transactions of the Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday before the Passion, and at once goes from Monday evening to Thursday evening. It is remarkable that John says nothing about the institution of the Holy Sacrament, which Matthew (xxvi. 26, etc.), Mark (xiv. 22, etc.), and Luke (xxii. 19, etc.) describe so particularly. No other reason can be assigned for this than that he found it completely done by the others, and that he designed only to supply their defects. The devil having now put into the heart. Judas formed his plot six days before this, on occasion of what happened at the house of Simon the leper.

the more industrious we should be to prepare for the worst that may come. Judas being now got into the snare, and the devil aiming at Peter and the rest of them (Luke xxii. 31), Christ would fortify his own against him. If the wolf has seized one of the flock, it is time for the shepherd to look well to the rest. Antidotes must be stirring, when the infection is begun. Judas, who was now plotting to betray him, was one of the twelve. Now Christ would hereby show that he did not design to cast them all off for the faults of one. Though one had a devil, and was a traitor, yet they should fare never the worse for that. Christ had still a kindness for his disciples though there was a Judas among them and he knew it.

II. Christ washed his disciples' feet that he might let all the world know how low he could stoop in love to his own. This is intimated, v. 3–5. Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hand, rises from supper, and, to the great surprise of the company, washed his disciples' feet.

1. Here is the rightful advancement of the Lord Jesus. The Father had given all things into his hands; had given him a power over all. See Matt. xi. 27. He is heir of all things. He came from God. This implies that he was in the beginning with God. He came from God as the Son of God, and the sent of God. He went to God. That which comes from God shall go to God; those that are born from heaven are bound for heaven. He knew all this; was not like a prince in the cradle, that knows nothing of the honour he is born to. He had a full view of all the honours of his exalted state, and yet stooped thus low. But how does this come in here? It may come in as that which supported him under his sufferings. Judas was now betraying him, and he knew it, yet, knowing also that he came from God and went to God, he did not draw back. It seems to come in as a foil to his condescension. That is given as an inducement to Christ to stoop which should rather have been a reason for his taking state; for God's thoughts are not as ours.

2. Here is the voluntary abasement of our Lord Jesus. A well-grounded assurance of heaven and happiness, instead of puffing a man up with pride, will make and keep him very humble. Now that which Christ humbled himself to was to wash his disciples' feet. The action itself was mean and servile, and that which servants of the lowest rank were employed in. If he had washed their hands or faces, it had been great condescension; but for Christ to stoop to such a piece of drudgery as this may well excite our admiration. He did this for his own disciples, who in themselves were of a low and despicable condition, not curious about their bodies; their feet, it is likely, were seldom washed, and therefore very dirty. They were his servants, and such as should have washed his feet. Many of great spirits otherwise will do a mean thing to curry favour with their superiors; they rise by stooping, and climb by cringing; but for Christ to do this to his disciples could be no act of policy, but pure humility. He rose from supper to do it. Though we translate it (v. 2) supper being ended, it might be better read, there being a supper made, for he sat down again (v. 12), and we find him dipping a sop (v. 26), so that he did it in the midst of his meal, and thereby taught us, (1) Not to reckon it a disturbance to be called from our meal to do God or our brother any real service. Christ would not leave his preaching to oblige his nearest relations (Mark iii. 33), but would leave his supper to show his love to his disciples. (2) Not to be over nice about our meat. It would have turned many a squeamish stomach to wash dirty feet at supper-time; but Christ did it, not that we might learn to be rude and slovenly (cleanliness and godliness will do well together), not to indulge, but mortify, the delicacy of the appetite, giving good manners their due place, and no more. He put himself into the garb of a servant, to do it: he laid aside his garments. We must address ourselves to duty as those that in earnest buckle to business. He did it with all the humble ceremony that could be. He girded himself with the towel; he poured water into the basin, and then washed their feet and wiped them. Nothing appears to the contrary but that he washed the feet of Judas, for he was present, v. 26. Jesus here washed the feet of a sinner, the worst of sinners, who was at this time contriving to betray him.

III. Christ washed his disciples' feet that he might signify to them the cleansing of the soul from the pollutions of sin. This is plainly intimated in his discourse with Peter upon it, v. 6–11.

1. The surprise Peter was in (v. 6): Then cometh he to Simon Peter, and bids him put out his feet to be washed. It is most probable that when he went about this service (which is all that is meant by his beginning to wash, v. 5) he took Peter first, and that the rest would not have suffered it, if they had not first heard it explained in what passed between Christ and Peter.

ALBERT BARNES:

"The devil." The leader or prince of evil spirits. "Having now put it into the heart." Literally, having "cast it" into the heart. Eph. 6:16: "The fiery darts of the wicked" (see Acts 5:3; Luke 12:3). The meaning of this passage is that Satan inclined the mind of Judas to do this, or he tempted him to betray his Master. We know not precisely how this was done, but we know that it was by means of his avarice. Satan could tempt no one unless there was some inclination of the mind, some natural or depraved propensity that he could make use of. He presents objects in alluring forms fitted to that propensity, and under the influence of a strong or a corrupt inclination the soul yields to sin. In the case of Judas it was the love of money; and it was necessary to present to him only the possibility of obtaining money, and it found him ready for any crime.—Popular Commentary

3. Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands . . .—This verse is very sublime, and as a preface to what follows, were we not familiar with it, would fill us with inexpressible surprise. An unclouded perception of His relation to the Father, the commission He held from Him, and His approaching return to Him, possessed His soul.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

He knew that it was the hour when "he should depart out of this world unto the Father." Not a word is said here and now about the way of His going, but only the fact that His going would bring Him to the Father. When the Greeks came, He said, "The hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified." So here the reference was not to the method of His going, but to the fact, and to the issue of it. "Knowing that his hour was come that he should depart out of this world unto the Father." It is of supreme importance that we should understand the Scripture's teaching about the mind of Jesus as He approached His cross. Too often the death of Jesus is spoken of as a martyrdom, the heroic surrender to the inevitable in circumstances. There is no scintilla of truth in that view of the cross. The New Testament accounts all reveal Him as moving with the mien and attitude of One carrying out a divine program: His soul troubled, but always seeing through the gloom to the glory. "Knowing that his hour was come that he should depart out of this world unto the Father."

But again, "Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands." That statement is significantly placed: "The devil having already put into the heart of Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, to betray him, Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands." Judas had willed, and the devil had willed; but Jesus knew that He was already by the Father's appointment in supreme authority. Presently He will say to this self-same group, "All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth." He knew it now.—The Gospel According to John

4, 5. He riseth from supper, and laid aside his—outer—garments—which would have impeded the operation of washing. and took a towel and girded himself—assuming a servant's dress. 5. began to wash—proceeded to wash. Beyond all doubt the feet of Judas were washed, as of all the rest.

ADAM CLARKE

3. Knowing that the Father had given. Our Lord, seeing himself almost at the end of His race, and being about to leave His apostles, thought it necessary to leave them a lesson of humility exemplified by himself, to deliver them from the bad influence of those false ideas which they formed concerning the nature of His kingdom.

4. He riseth from supper. Not from eating, as Bishop Pearce has well observed, but from His place at table; probably the dishes were not as yet laid down, though the guests were seated. According to the custom of the Jews and other Asiatics, this washing must have taken place before the supper. Laid aside his garments. That is, His gown or upper coat, with the girdle wherewith it was girded close to his tunic or undercoat; and, instead of this girdle, He tied a towel about Him: (1) that He might appear in the character of a servant; and (2) that He might have it in readiness to dry their feet after He had washed them.

5. Poureth water into a bason. This was the office of the meanest slaves. When David sent to Abigail, to inform her that he had chosen her for wife, she arose and said: "Behold, let thine handmaid be a servant to wash the feet of the servants of my lord," 1 Sam. xxv. 41. Some of the ancients have supposed that our Lord began with washing the feet of Judas, to inspire him with sentiments of compunction and remorse, to melt him down with kindness, and to show all His disciples how they should act towards their enemies.

MATTHEW HENRY

Peter was startled at the proposal: Lord (saith he) dost thou wash my feet? What thou, our Lord and Master, whom we know and believe to be the Son of God, do this for me, a worthless worm of the earth, a sinful man, O Lord? Shall those hands wash my feet which with a touch have cleansed lepers, given sight to the blind, and raised the dead? Very willingly would Peter have taken the basin and towel, and washed his Master's feet, and been proud of the honour. For my Master to wash my feet is such a paradox as I cannot understand.

2. The immediate satisfaction Christ gave. This was at least sufficient to silence his objections (v. 7): What I do, thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter. Here are two reasons why Peter must submit:

(1) Because he was at present in the dark concerning it, and ought not to oppose what he did not understand. Christ would teach Peter an implicit obedience: "What I do thou knowest not now, and therefore art no competent judge of it."

(2) Because there was something considerable in it, of which he should hereafter know the meaning: "Thou shalt know hereafter. Our Lord Jesus does many things the meaning of which even his own disciples do not for the present know, but they shall know afterwards. Subsequent providences explain preceding ones; and we see afterwards the kind tendency of events that seemed most cross; and the way which we thought was about proved the right way. We must let Christ take his own way, and we shall find in the issue it was the best way.

3. Peter's peremptory refusal to let Christ wash his feet (v. 8): Thou shalt by no means wash my feet; no, never. It is the language of a fixed resolution. Here was a show of humility and modesty. Peter herein seemed to have, and no doubt he really had, a great respect for his Master. Under this show of humility there was a real contradiction to the will of the Lord Jesus. It is not humility, but infidelity, to put away the offers of the gospel, as if too rich to be made to us or too good news to be true.

4. Christ's insisting upon his offer: If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me. A severe caution against disobedience: "If I wash thee not, if thou continue refractory, thou shalt not be owned as one of my disciples." If Peter will dispute the commands he ought to obey, he docs in effect renounce his allegiance. A declaration of the necessity of spiritual washing: "If I wash not thy soul from the pollution of sin, thou hast no part with me." All those, and those only, that are spiritually washed by Christ, have a part in Christ. It is that good part the having of which is the one thing needful. It is necessary to our having a part in Christ that he wash us.

5. Peter's more than submission, his earnest request, to be washed by Christ, v. 9: Lord, wash not my feet only, but also my hands and my head. How soon is Peter's mind changed! Let us therefore not be peremptory in any resolve, because we may soon see cause to retract it, but cautious in taking up a purpose we will be tenacious of.

(1) How ready Peter is to recede from what he had said: "Lord, what a fool was I to speak such a hasty word!" Now that the washing of him appeared to be an act of Christ's grace he admits it; but disliked it when it seemed only an act of humiliation. Good men, when they see their error, will not be loth to recant it.

(2) How importunate he is for the purifying grace of the Lord Jesus, and the universal influence of it, even upon his hands and head. An exclusion from having a part in him, is the most formidable evil in the eyes of all that are enlightened. And for fear of this we should be earnest with God in prayer, that he will wash us. "Lord, wash not my feet only from the gross pollutions that cleave to them, but also my hands and my head from the spots which they have contracted, and the undiscerned filth which proceeds by perspiration from the body itself."

6. Christ's further explication of this sign.

(1) With reference to his disciples that were faithful to him (v. 10): He that is washed all over in the bath, needeth not save to wash his feet, his hands and head having been washed, and he having only dirtied his feet in walking home. Peter had gone from one extreme to the other. At first he would not let Christ wash his feet; and now he overlooks what Christ had done for him in his baptism, and what was signified thereby. See here what is the privilege and comfort of such as are in a justified state; they are washed by Christ, and are clean every whit. The heart may be swept and garnished, and yet still remain the devil's palace; but, if it be washed, it belongs to Christ, and he will not lose it. See what ought to be the daily care of those who through grace are in a justified state, and that is to wash their feet; to cleanse themselves from the guilt they contract daily through infirmity and inadver-

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

6-11. Peter saith . . . Lord, dost thou wash my feet?—Our language cannot bring out the intensely vivid contrast between the "Thou" and the "my," which, by bringing them together, the original expresses, for it is not good English to say, "Lord, Thou my feet dost wash?" But every word of this question is emphatic. Thus far, and in the question itself, there was nothing but the most profound and beautiful astonishment at a condescension to him quite incomprehensible. Accordingly, though there can be no doubt that already Peter's heart rebelled against it as a thing not to be tolerated, Jesus ministers no rebuke as yet, but only bids him wait a little, and he should understand it all. 7. Jesus answered and said . . ., What I do thou knowest not now—i.e., Such condescension does need explanation; it is fitted to astonish.

but thou shalt know hereafter—afterwards, meaning presently; though viewed as a general maxim, applicable to all dark sayings in God's Word, and dark doings in God's providence, these words are full of consolation.

8. Peter saith unto him, Thou shalt never wash . . .—more emphatically, 'Never shalt Thou wash my feet': i.e., 'That is an incongruity to which I can never submit.' How like the man! If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me—What Peter could not submit to was, that the Master should serve His servant. But the whole saving work of Christ was one continued series of such services, ending with and consummated by the most self-sacrificing and transcendent of all services: THE SON OF MAN CAME not to be ministered unto, but TO MINISTER, AND TO GIVE HIS LIFE A RANSOM FOR MANY. (See on Mark 10:45.) If Peter then could not submit to let his Master go down so low as to wash his feet, how should he suffer himself to be served by Him at all? This is couched under the one pregnant word "wash," which though applicable to the lower operation which Peter resisted, is the familiar scriptural symbol of that higher cleansing, which Peter little thought he was at the same time virtually putting from him. It is not humility to refuse what the Lord deigns to do for us, or to deny what He has done, but it is self-willed presumption—not rare, however, in those inner circles of lofty religious profession and traditional spirituality, which are found wherever Christian truth has enjoyed long and undisturbed possession. The truest humility is to receive reverentially, and thankfully to own, the gifts of grace. 9. Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head—i.e., 'To be severed from Thee, Lord, is death to me: If that be the meaning of my speech, I tread upon it; and if to be washed of Thee have such significance, then not my feet only, but hands, head, and all, be washed!' This artless expression of clinging, life-and-death attachment to Jesus, and felt dependence upon Him for his whole spiritual wellbeing, compared with the similar saying in ch. 6:68, 69 (on which see Notes), furnishes such evidence of historic verity such as no thoroughly honest mind can resist.

10. He that is washed—in this thorough sense, to express which the word is carefully changed to one meaning to wash as in a bath. needeth not—to be so washed any more. save to wash his feet—needeth to do no more than wash his feet (and here the former word is resumed, meaning to wash the hands or feet). but is clean every whit—as a whole. This sentence is singularly instructive. Of the two cleansings, the one points to that which takes place at the commencement of the Christian life, embracing complete absolution from sin as a guilty state, and entire deliverance from it as a polluted life (Rev. 1:5; I Cor. 6:11)—or, in the language of theology, Justification and Regeneration. This cleansing is effected once for all, and is never repeated. The other cleansing, described as that of

6. Lord, dost thou wash my feet? Every word here is exceedingly emphatic. Peter had often seen the great humility of his Lord, but never saw His condescension so particularly marked as in this instance.

7. What I do thou knowest not now. As if our Lord had said, Permit Me to do it now, and I will shortly explain to you the nature of this action, and My motives for doing it. Thou shalt know hereafter. After this business is finished. And so we find He explained the whole to them as soon as He had finished the washing; see vv. 12-17.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

Let us come at once to the teaching of the Savior, and let it be surrounded with an unusual interest, because it is His dying teaching. Let us see Him as He girds himself with the towel, remembering that He was soon to be girt with the bands of death; let us see Him, I say, with a more profound interest, because He is just upon the verge of these terrible depths where all the waves and billows of Jehovah's justice dashed over Him. His sermon beginning, "Let not your heart be troubled," is His swan song; these are the last drops of His life that He is now spending; at the supper table you have the wine, which He keeps until now. As we see Him washing His disciples' feet, we shall discover choice love worthy of the last solemn hour of departure.

—The Treasury of the New Testament

10. He that is washed. That is, he who has been in the bath, as probably all the apostles had lately been, in order to prepare themselves the better for the paschal solemnity; for on that occasion it was the custom of the Jews to bathe twice. Needeth not save to wash his feet. To cleanse them from any dirt or dust that might have adhered to them, in consequence of walking from the bath to the place of supper. The washing, therefore, of the feet of such persons was all that was necessary, previously to their sitting down to table.

tence, by the renewed exercise of repentance. We must also wash our feet by constant watchfulness against everything that is defiling. The provision made for our cleansing should not make us presumptuous, but the more cautious. From yesterday's pardon we should fetch an argument against this day's temptation.

(2) With reflection upon Judas: And you are clean, but not all, v. 10, 11. He washed them himself, and then said, You are clean; but he excepts Judas: not all. Many have the sign that have not the thing signified. Christ sees it necessary to let his disciples know that they are not all clean; that we may all be jealous over ourselves (Is it I? Lord, is it I that am among the clean, yet not clean?)

IV. Christ washed his disciples' feet to set before us an example. This explication he gave of what he had done, when he had done it, v. 12–17.

1. With what solemnity he gave an account of the meaning of what he had done (v. 12): After he had washed their feet, he said, Know you what I have done?

(1) He adjourned the explication until he had finished the transaction: To try their submission and implicit obedience, that they might learn to acquiesce in his will when they could not give a reason for it. Because it was proper to finish the riddle before he unriddled it.

(2) Before he explained it, he asked them if they could construe it: Know you what I have done to you? He puts this question to them, not only to make them sensible of their ignorance, but to raise their desires and expectations of instruction.

2. Upon what he grounds that which he had to say (v. 13): "You call me Master and Lord, and you say well, for so I am." He that is our Redeemer and Saviour is, in order to that, our Lord and Master. He is our Master—our teacher and instructor. He is our Lord—our ruler and owner. It becomes the disciples of Christ to call him Master and Lord, not in compliment, but in reality; not by constraint, but with delight. Our calling Christ Master and Lord is an obligation upon us to receive and observe the instructions he gives us. We are bound in honour and honesty to be observant of him.

3. The lesson which he hereby taught: You also ought to wash one another's feet, v. 14.

(1) Some have understood this literally, that Christians should, in a solemn religious manner, wash one another's feet, in token of their condescending love to one another. St. Ambrose took it so, and practised it in the church of Milan. St. Austin saith that those Christians who did not do it with their hands, yet (he hoped) did it with their hearts in humility; but he saith, It is much better to do it with the hands also. What Christ has done Christians should not disdain to do.

(2) But doubtless it is to be understood figuratively. Three things our Master hereby designed to teach us: [1] A humble condescension. We must learn of our Master to be lowly in heart (Matt. xi. 29). Christ had often taught his disciples humility, and they had forgotten the lesson; but now he teaches them in such a way as surely they could never forget. [2] A condescension to be serviceable. To wash one another's feet is to stoop to the meanest offices of love, for the real good and benefit one of another. We must not grudge to take care and pains, and to spend time, for the good of those to whom we are not under any particular obligations, even of our inferiors. The duty is mutual; we must both accept help from our brethren and afford help to our brethren. [3] A serviceableness to the sanctification one of another: You ought to wash one another's feet, from the pollutions of sin. We cannot satisfy for one another's sins, but we may help to purify one another from sin. We must in the first place wash ourselves; this charity must begin at home, but it must not end there; we must sorrow for the failings and follies of our brethren, must wash our brethren's polluted feet in tears.

4. Here is the enforcing of this command from the example of what Christ had now done: If I your Lord and Master have done it to you, you ought to do it to one another. I am your Master, and therefore you ought to learn of me (v. 15); for in this, I have given you an example, that you should do to others, as I have done to you. What a good teacher Christ is. He teaches by example as well as doctrine, and for this end came into this world, that he might set us a copy; and it is a copy without one false stroke. What good scholars we must be. We must do as he hath done; he gave us a copy, that we should write after it. Christ's example herein is to be followed by ministers in particular, in whom the graces of humility and holy love should especially appear. When Christ sent his apostles abroad, it was with this charge: become all things to all men, 1 Cor. ix. 22. What I have done to your dirty feet that do you to the polluted souls of

"the feet," is such as one walking from a bath quite cleansed still needs, in consequence of his contact with the earth. (Cf. Exod. 30:18, 19.) It is the daily cleansing which we are taught to seek, when in the spirit of adoption we say, "Our Father which art in heaven—forgive us our debts"; and, when burdened with the sense of manifold shortcomings—as what tender spirit of a Christian is not?—is it not a relief to be permitted thus to wash our feet after a day's contact with the earth? This is not to call in question the completeness of our past justification. Our Lord, while graciously insisting on washing Peter's feet, refuses to extend the cleansing farther, that the symbolical instruction intended to be conveyed might not be marred. and ye are clean—in the first and whole sense. but not all—important, as showing that Judas, instead of being as true-hearted a disciple as the rest at first, and merely falling away afterwards—as many represent it—never experienced that cleansing at all which made the others what they were. 12-15. Know ye what I have done?—i.e., its intent. The question, however, was put merely to summon their attention to His own answer.

13. Ye call me Master—Teacher—and Lord—learning of Him in the one capacity, obeying Him in the other. and ye say well, for so I am—The conscious dignity with which this claim is made is remarkable, following immediately on His laying aside the towel of service. Yet what is this whole history but a succession of such astonishing contrast from first to last?

14. If I then—the Lord—have washed your feet—the servants'—ye—but fellow servants—ought to wash one another's feet—not in the narrow sense of a literal washing, profanely caricatured by popes and emperors, but by the very humblest real services one to another.

ADAM CLARKE

Ye are clean, but not all. Eleven of you are upright and sincere; the twelfth is a traitor. So it appears He had washed the feet of all the twelve; but as no external ablutions can purify a hypocrite or a traitor, therefore Judas still remained unclean.

12. Know ye what I have done? Our Lord had told Peter, in the presence of the rest, v. 7, that he should afterwards know what was the intent and meaning of this washing; and now He begins to fulfill His promise. Therefore I think it more likely that He gives a command, here, than asks a question, as He knew himself that they did not comprehend His design. On this account ginoskete might be translated in the imperative mood, "Consider what I have done."

13. Ye call me Master and Lord. Similar to Rabbi, and Mar, titles very common among the Jewish doctors. This double title was not given except to the most accredited teachers.

A. B. SIMPSON:

The first lesson taught by this picture is that of Christ's humility. Like Him, we cannot truly stoop until we have learned our high calling and know that we are indeed the sons of God. Then we shall not fear the most menial service or think that the lowliest place can degrade our true dignity, but shall prove that we are the chief by becoming the servant of all. The next lesson is love, that, instead of exposing the stains of one another, seeks to wash them away. But the deepest spiritual teaching of these words is the unfolding of Christ's own constant cleansing as our ever living Advocate and High Priest. Still He is girded with the towel, and still He stoops to cleanse the saints of defilement from our feet day by day.—Christ in the Bible

14. Ye also ought to wash one another's feet. That is, you should be ready, after My example, to condescend to all the weakness of your brethren, to be willing to do the meanest offices for them, and to prefer the least of them in honor to yourselves.

sinners; wash them. Christians likewise are here taught to condescend to each other in love, unasked, unpaid; we must not be mercenary in the services of love. I am your Master, and you are my disciples (v. 16), the servant is not greater than his Lord, neither he that is sent greater than he that sent him. Christ had urged this (Matt. x. 24, 25) as a reason why they should not think it strange if they suffered as he did; here he urges it as a reason why they should not think it much to humble themselves as he did. What he did not think a disparagement to him, they must not think a disparagement to them. Christ reminds them of their place as his servants; they were not better men than their Master. We need to be put in mind of this, that we are not greater than our Lord. Christ, by humbling himself, has dignified humility. We commonly say to those who disdain to do such or such a thing, As good as you have done it; and true indeed it is, if our Master has done it. When we see our Master serving, we cannot see but how ill it becomes us to be domineering.

5. Our Saviour closes this part of his discourse: If you know these things, happy are you if you do them. Most people think, Happy are those that rise and rule. Washing one another's feet will never get estates and preferments; but Christ saith, notwithstanding this, Happy are those that stoop and obey. Since they had such excellent precepts given them, recommended by such an excellent pattern, it will be necessary to the completing of their happiness that they practise accordingly. This is applicable to the commands of Christ in general. Though it is a great advantage to know our duty, yet we shall come short of happiness if we do not do our duty. Knowing is in order to doing, James iv. 17. It is knowing and doing that will demonstrate us of Christ's kingdom, and wise builders. It is to be applied especially to this command of humility. Nothing is better known than this, that we should be humble. Few will own themselves to be proud, for it is as inexcusable a sin, and as hateful, as any other; and yet how little is to be seen of true humility. Most know these things so well as to expect that others should do accordingly to them, but not so well as to do so themselves.

Verses 18–30

We have here the discovery of Judas's plot to betray his Master. Christ knew it from the beginning; but now first he discovered it to his disciples.

I. Christ gives them a general intimation of it (v. 18): I speak not of you all, for I know whom I have chosen, but the scripture will be fulfilled (Ps. xli. 9), He that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me.

1. He intimates to them that they were not all right. He had said (v. 10), You are clean, but not all. So here, I speak not of you all. What is said of the excellencies of Christ's disciples cannot be said of all that are called so. There is a mixture of bad with good in the best societies, a Judas among the apostles.

2. He himself knew who were right, and who were not: I know whom I have chosen. Those that are chosen, Christ himself had the choosing of them. Those that are chosen are known to Christ, for he never forgets any whom he has once had in his thoughts of love, 2 Tim. ii. 19.

3. In the treachery of him that proved false to him the scripture was fulfilled. Christ took one into his family whom he foresaw to be a traitor, that the scripture might be fulfilled. This our Saviour applies to Judas. Judas, as an apostle, was admitted to the highest privilege: he did eat bread with Christ. He was favoured by him, one of those with whom he was intimately conversant. He saith, He did eat bread with me; such as he had, his disciples had their share of, Judas among the rest. Wherever he went, Judas was welcome with him, sat at table with his Master, and in all respects fared as he fared. He ate miraculous bread with him, when the loaves were multiplied, ate the passover with him. All that eat bread with Christ are not his disciples indeed. Judas was guilty of the basest treachery; he lifted up the heel against Christ. He forsook him, v. 30. He despised him. He became an enemy to him. It is no new thing for those that were Christ's seeming friends to prove his real enemies.

II. He gives them a reason why he told them beforehand of the treachery of Judas (v. 19): "Now I tell you before it come, that when it is come to pass you may be confirmed in your belief that I am he." By his clear and certain foresight of things to come, of which he gave incontestable proof, he proved himself to be the true God. By this application of the types and prophecies of the Old Testament to himself, he proved himself to be the true Messiah.

III. He gives a word of encouragement to his apostles, and all his ministers whom he employs in 16, 17. The servant is not greater than his lord . . .—an oft-repeated saying (Matt. 10: 24, etc.).

If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them—a hint that even among real Christians the doing of such things would come lamentably short of the knowing.

18, 19. I speak not of you all—the "happy are ye," of vs. 17, being on no supposition applicable to Judas.

I know whom I have chosen—in the higher sense. But that the scripture may be fulfilled—i.e., one has been added to your number, by no accident or mistake, who is none of Mine, but just that he might fulfil his predicted destiny. He that eateth bread with me—"did eat of my bread" (Ps. 41:9), as one of My family; admitted to the nearest familiarity of discipleship and of social life. hath lifted up his heel against me—turned upon Me, adding insult to injury. (Cf. Heb. 10:29.) In the Psalm the immediate reference is to Ahithophel's treachery against David (II Sam. 17), one of those scenes in which the parallel of his story with that of His great Antitype is exceedingly striking. "The eating bread derives a fearful meaning from the participation in the sacramental supper, a meaning which must be applied for ever to all unworthy communicants, as well as to all betrayers of Christ who eat the bread of His Church" [STIER, with whom, and others, we agree in thinking that Judas partook of the Lord's Supper.] 19. I tell you before . . . that when it comes to pass, ye may believe—and it came to pass when they deeply needed such confirmation.

ADAM CLARKE

16. The servant is not greater than his lord. Christ has ennobled the acts of humility by practicing them himself. The true glory of a Christian consists in being, in his measure, as humble as his Lord. Neither he that is sent. "Nor an apostle." As I think these words were intended for the suppression of all worldly ambition and lordly conduct in the apostles and their successors in the ministry, therefore I think the original word apostolos should be translated "apostle," rather than he that is sent, because the former rendering ascertains and determines the meaning better.

17. If ye know these things, happy. True happiness consists in the knowledge of God, and in obedience to Him. A man is not happy because he knows much; but because he receives much of the divine nature and is, in all his conduct, conformed to the divine will.

18. I speak not of you all. This is a continuation of that discourse which was left off at the tenth verse. The preceding verses may be read in a parenthesis.

I know whom I have chosen. I am not deceived in My choice; I perfectly foresaw everything that has happened, or can happen. I have chosen Judas, not as a wicked man, nor that he should become such; but I plainly foresaw that he would abuse My bounty, give way to iniquity, deliver Me into the hands of My enemies, and bring ruin upon himself. That the scripture may be fulfilled. Or, "Thus the scripture is fulfilled." Christ applies to Judas what David had said of his rebellious son Absalom, Ps. xli. 9, who was one of the most express emblems of this traitor. He that eateth bread with me. That is, he who was in habits of the utmost intimacy with Me. Hath lifted up his heel. An illusion to a restive, ill-natured horse, that sometimes kicks even the person who feeds and takes care of him.

19. That . . . ye may believe. These frequent predictions of His death, so circumstantial in themselves, had the most direct tendency to confirm the disciples, not only in the belief of His being the Messiah, but also in that of His omniscience.

his service (v. 20): He that receiveth whomsoever I send receiveth me. Christ had told his disciples that they must humble and abase themselves. "Now," saith he, "though there may be those that will despise you for your condescension, yet there will be those that will do you honour, and shall be honoured for so doing." Those who know themselves dignified by Christ's commission may be content to be vilified in the world's opinion. As Christ will think never the worse of them for Judas's crime, so he will own them, and will raise up such as shall receive them. Those that had received Judas when he was a preacher were never the worse, though he afterwards proved a traitor; for he was one whom Christ sent. Those who appear to be sent of Christ we must receive, till the contrary appear. Though some, by entertaining strangers, have entertained robbers unawares, thereby some have entertained angels. The abuses put upon our charity, will neither justify our uncharitableness, nor lose us the reward of our charity. We are here encouraged to receive ministers as sent of Christ: "He that receiveth whomsoever I send, though weak and poor, yet if he deliver my message, he that entertains him shall be owned as a friend of mine." It is receiving Christ Jesus the Lord himself. We are here encouraged to receive Christ as sent of God: He that thus receiveth me, receiveth the Father also. He that receiveth me as his prince and Saviour receiveth him that sent me as his portion and felicity.

IV. Christ more particularly notifies to them the plot (v. 21): When Jesus had thus said, he was troubled in spirit, and he testified, he solemnly declared it: "One of you shall betray me." This did not determine Judas to the sin by any fatal necessity; for, though the event did follow according to the prediction, yet not from the prediction. Christ is not the author of sin. As to this heinous sin of Judas, 1. Christ foresaw it. He knows what is in men better than they do themselves, and therefore sees what will be done by them. 2. He foretold it, not only for the sake of the rest of the disciples, but for the sake of Judas himself, that he might take warning. Traitors proceed not in their plots when they find they are discovered; surely Judas, when he finds that his Master knows his design, will retreat in time. 3. He spoke of it with a manifest concern; he was troubled in spirit when he mentioned it. The falls of the disciples of Christ are a great trouble of spirit to their Master; the sins of Christians are the grief of Christ. "What! One of you betray me!" This went to his heart, as the undutifulness of children grieves those who have nourished and brought them up.

V. The disciples quickly take the alarm; and therefore looked one upon another, with a manifest concern, doubting of whom he spoke. It struck such a horror upon them that they knew not well which way to look, nor what to say. They saw their Master troubled, and therefore they were troubled. That which grieves Christ is, and should be, a grief to all that are his. Hereby they endeavoured to discover the traitor. Christ thus perplexed his disciples for a time, that he might humble them, and prove them, might excite in them a jealousy of themselves. It is good for us sometimes to be put to a gaze, to be put to a pause.

VI. The disciples were solicitous to get their Master to explain himself.

1. Of all the disciples John was most fit to ask, because he was the favourite, and sat next his Master (v. 23): There was leaning on Jesus's bosom one of the disciples whom Jesus loved. It appears that this was John, by comparing ch. xxi. 20, 24. The particular kindness which Jesus had for him; he was the disciple whom Jesus loved. He loved them all (v. 1), but John was particularly dear to him. His name signifies gracious. Among the disciples of Christ some are dearer to him than others. His place at this time: He was leaning on Jesus's bosom. It seems to be an extraordinary expression of endearment. Those who lay themselves at Christ's feet, he will lay in his bosom. Yet he conceals his name. He puts this instead of his name, to show that he was pleased with it; it is his title of honour, that he was the disciple whom Jesus loved.

2. Of all the disciples Peter was most forward to know, v. 24. Peter, sitting at some distance, beckoned to John to ask. Peter was generally the leading man. Where men's natural tempers lead them to be thus bold in answering and asking, if kept under the laws of humility and wisdom, they make men very serviceable. God gives his gifts variously; but it must be noted that it was not Peter, but John, that was the beloved disciple. The reason why Peter did not himself ask was because John had a much fairer opportunity to whisper the question into the ear of Christ, and to receive a like private answer. It is good to improve our interest in those that are near to Christ. Do we know any that we have reason to think lie in 20. He that receiveth whomsoever I send, receiveth me . . .—(See on Matt. 10: 40). The connection here seems to be that despite the dishonor done to Him by Judas, and similar treatment awaiting themselves, they were to be cheered by the assurance that their office, even as His own, was divine.

21-30. THE TRAITOR INDICATED—HE LEAVES THE SUPPER ROOM. 21. When Jesus had thus said, he was troubled in spirit, and testified, and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, One of you shall betray me—The announcement of vs. 18 seems not to have been plain enough to be quite apprehended, save by the traitor himself. He will therefore speak it out in terms not to be misunderstood. But how much it cost Him to do this, appears from the "trouble" that came over His "spirit"—visible emotion, no doubt—before He got it uttered. What wounded susceptibility does this disclose, and what exquisite delicacy in His social intercourse with the Twelve, to whom He cannot, without an effort, break the subject! 22. the disciples looked one on another, doubting of whom he spake—Further intensely interesting particulars are given in the other Gospels: (1) "They were exceeding sorrowful" (Matt. 26:22). (2) "They began to inquire among themselves which of them it was that should do this thing" (Luke 22:23). (3) "They began to say unto Him one by one, Is it I, and another, Is it I?" (Mark 14:19). Generous, simple hearts! They abhorred the thought, but, instead of putting it on others, each was only anxious to purge himself, and know if he could be the wretch. Their putting it at once to Jesus Himself, as knowing doubtless who was to do it, was the best, as it certainly was the most spontaneous and artless evidence of their innocence. (4) Jesus, apparently while this questioning was going on, added, "The Son of man goeth as it is written of Him, but woe unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! It had been good for that man if he had not been born" (Matt. 26:24). (5) "Judas," last of all, "answered and said, Lord, is it I?" evidently feeling that when all were saying this, if he held his peace, that of itself would draw suspicion upon him. To prevent this the question is wrung out of him, but perhaps, amidst the stir and excitement at the table, in a half-suppressed tone as we are inclined to think the answer also was—"Thou hast said" (Matt. 26:25), or possibly by little more than a sign; for from vs. 28 it is evident that till the moment when he went out, he was not openly discovered. 23-26. there was leaning on Jesus' bosom one of his disciples, whom Jesus loved—Thus modestly does our Evangelist denote himself, as reclining next to Jesus at the table.

Peter . . . beckoned to him to ask who it should be of whom he spake—reclining probably at the corresponding place on the other side of Jesus.

ADAM CLARKE

20. He that receiveth whomsoever I send. See similar words, Matt. x. 40. Our Lord spoke this to comfort His disciples. He showed them that, although they should be rejected by many, they would be received by several; and that whoever received them should reap the utmost benefit by it.

21. Was troubled in spirit. See the note on chap. xi. 33. And testified. Spoke with great earnestness. Shall betray me. "Will deliver Me up." Judas had already betrayed our blessed Lord, and he was now on the point of delivering Him up into the hands of the chief priests. By all these warnings, did not our Lord intend that Judas should be benefited—that he should repent of his iniquity, and turn and find mercy?

22. Looked one on another, doubting of whom he spake. See the notes on Matt. xxvi. 20-25. Everyone but Judas, conscious of his own innocence, looked about upon all the rest, wondering who in that company could be such a traitor. Even Judas himself is not suspected. Is not this a proof that his general conduct had been such as to subject him to no suspicion?

23. Now there was leaning on Jesus' bosom. The Jews of those days at their suppers reclined, supported by their left arms, on couches placed round the table, as the Greeks and Romans did. On each couch there were two or three persons; and the head of one of them came near to the bosom of him who reclined above him on the same couch. The person here mentioned was John, the writer of this history, who, being more tenderly loved by Christ than the rest, had always that place at table which was nearest to his Lord.

Christ's bosom? Let us beg of them to speak a good word for us.

3. The question was asked accordingly (v. 25): He then, lying at the breast of Jesus, saith unto him, Lord, who is it? Now here John shows: A regard to his fellow-disciple. Those who lie in Christ's bosom may often learn from those who lie at his feet and be reminded of that which they did not of themselves think of. A reverence of his Master. Though he whispered this in Christ's ear, yet he called him Lord; the familiarity he was admitted to did not at all lessen his respect for his Master. The more intimate communion gracious souls have with Christ, the more sensible they are of his worthiness and their own unworthiness.

4. Christ gave a speedy answer to this question, but whispered it in John's ear; for it appears (v. 29) that the rest were still ignorant of the matter. He it is to whom I shall give a sop, when I have dipped it. And when he had dipped the sop, he gave it to Judas. Christ notified the traitor by a sign. He could have told John by name who he was. The false brethren we are to stand upon our guard against are not made known to us by words, but by signs; they are to be known to us by their fruits. That sign was a sop. Christ sometimes gives sops to traitors; worldly riches, honours, and pleasures are sops (if I may so speak), which Providence sometimes gives into the hands of wicked men. We must not be outrageous against those whom we know to be very malicious against us. Christ carved to Judas as kindly as to any at the table, though he knew he was then plotting his death.

VII. Judas himself, instead of being convinced hereby of his wickedness, was the more confirmed in it.

1. The devil hereupon took possession of him (v. 27): After the sop, Satan entered into him. Satan entered into him to possess him with a prevailing prejudice against Christ, and a contempt of him, to excite in him a covetous desire of the wages of unrighteousness and a resolution to stick at nothing for the obtaining of them. Was not Satan in him before? How then is it said that now Satan entered into him? Judas was all along a devil (ch. vi. 70), but now Satan gained a more full possession of him. Though the devil is in every wicked man that does his works, yet sometimes he enters more manifestly and more powerfully than at other times. How came Satan to enter into him after the sop? Perhaps he was aware that it was the discovery of him, and it made him desperate in his resolutions. Many are made worse by the gifts of Christ's bounty, and are confirmed in their impenitency by that which should have led them to repentance.

2. Christ hereupon dismissed him: Then said Jesus unto him, What thou doest, do quickly. Abandoning him to the conduct and power of Satan. Christ knew that Satan had entered into him, and had peaceable possession; and now he gives him up as hopeless. The various methods Christ had used for his conviction were ineffectual. When the evil spirit is willingly admitted, the good Spirit justly withdraws. Challenging him to do his worst: "I do not fear thee, I am ready for thee."

3. Those that were at table understood not what he meant (v. 28, 29): No man at table knew for what intent he spoke this to him. They did not suspect that Christ said it to Judas as a traitor, because it did not enter into their heads that Judas was such a one, or would prove so. Christ's disciples were so well taught to love one another that they could not easily learn to suspect one another. They therefore took it for granted that he said it to him as treasurer of the household, giving him orders for the laying out of some money. In works of piety: Buy those things that we have need of against the feast. Or in works of charity: That he should give something to the poor. Our Lord Jesus, though he lived upon alms himself (Luke viii. 3), yet gave alms to the poor, a little out of a little. Though he might very well be excused, not only because he was poor himself, but because he did so much good in other ways, curing so many gratis; yet, to set us an example, he gave for the relief of the poor. The time of a religious feast was thought a proper time for works of charity. When he celebrated the passover he ordered something for the poor. When we experience God's bounty to us, this should make us bountiful to the poor.

4. Judas hereupon sets himself vigorously to pursue his design against him: He went away.

(1) His speedy departure: He went out presently. For fear of being more plainly discovered to the company. He went out as one weary of Christ's company and the society of his apostles. Christ needed not to expel him, he expelled himself. He went out to prosecute his design. Now that Satan had got into him he hurried him on.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

25. He then lying—rather leaning over on Jesus' bosom—saith—in a whisper, "Lord, who is it?"

26. Jesus answered—also inaudibly, the answer being communicated to Peter perhaps from behind—He . . . to whom I shall give a sop when I have dipped it—a piece of the bread soaked in the wine or the sauce of the dish; one of the ancient ways of testifying peculiar regard; cf. vs. 18, "he that eateth bread with Me." And when he had dipped . . . he gave it to Judas . . .—Thus the sign of Judas' treachery was an affecting expression, and the last, of the Saviour's wounded love!

27-30. after the sop Satan entered into him—Very solemn are these brief hints of the successive steps by which Judas reached the climax of his guilt. "The devil had already put it into his heart to betray his Lord." Yet who can tell what struggles he went through ere he brought himself to carry that suggestion into effect? Even after this, however, his compunctions were not at an end. With the thirty pieces of silver already in his possession, he seems still to have quailed—and can we wonder? When Jesus stooped to wash his feet, it may be the last struggle was reaching its crisis. But that word of the Psalm, about "one that ate of his bread who would lift up his heel against Him," probably all but turned the dread scale, and the still more explicit announcement, that one of those sitting with Him at the table should betray Him, would beget the thought, "I am detected; it is now too late to draw back." At that moment the sop is given; offer of friendship is once more made—and how affectingly! But already "Satan has entered into him," and though the Saviour's act might seem enough to recall him even yet, hell is now in his bosom, and he says within himself, "The die is cast; now let me go through with it; fear, begone!" (See on Matt. 12:43-45.) Then said Jesus unto him, That thou doest, do quickly—i.e., Why linger here? Thy presence is a restraint, and thy work stands still; thou hast the wages of iniquity, go work for it! 28-29. no man . . . knew for what intent he spake this unto him . . . some thought . . . Jesus . . . said . . . , But what we need . . . or, . . . give . . . to the poor—a very important statement, as showing how carefully Jesus had kept the secret, and Judas his hypocrisy, to the last.

30. He then, having received the sop, went immediately out—severing himself for ever from that holy society with which he never had any spiritual sympathy.

ADAM CLARKE

25. He then lying on Jesus' breast. Laying his head against the breast of Christ, in a loving, respectful manner. As the expressions in the text are different here from those in the preceding verse, it shows that John altered his position at table, in order to ask the question which Peter suggested, which he probably did by whispering to our Lord. For from v. 28 we may learn that the other disciples had not heard what John said; and it is likely that the following words—"It is he to whom I shall give the morsel when I have dipped it," were whispered back by Christ to John.

26. And when he had dipped the sop. Dr. Lightfoot observes that it was no unusual thing to dip a sop and give it to any person; and it is probable that the rest of the disciples considered it as given to Judas that he might hurry to do some work on which He wished to employ him, and not wait to finish his supper in a regular manner.

27. Satan entered into him. He had entered into him before, and now he enters again, to strengthen him in his purpose of delivering up his Master. But the morsel was not the cause of this entering in; the giving of it only marks the time in which the devil confirmed Judas in his traitorous purpose. Some have thought that this morsel was the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, but this is an utter mistake.

That thou doest, do quickly. As if He had said: "You are past all counsel; you have filled up the measure of your iniquity, and have wholly abandoned yourself to Satan. What you are determined to do, and I to permit, do directly; delay not. I am ready."

29. Give something to the poor. It is well-known that our Lord and His disciples lived on public charity, and yet they gave alms out of what they had thus received. From this we learn that even those who live on charity themselves are expected to divide a little with those who are in deeper distress and want.

MATTHEW HENRY

(2) The time of his departure: It was night. [1] Though it was night, he made no difficulty of the coldness and darkness of the night. This should shame us out of our slothfulness and cowardice in the service of Christ, that the devil's servants are so earnest and venturous in his service. [2] Because it was night, and this gave him advantage of privacy and concealment. Those whose deeds are evil love darkness rather than light.

Verses 31–35

This and what follows, to the end of ch. xiv., was Christ's table-talk with his disciples. When supper was done, Judas went out. Christ begins this discourse. Those especially that by their place, reputation, and gifts, command the company, to whom men give ear, ought to use the opportunity of doing them good.

I. Concerning the great mystery of his own death and sufferings, about which they were as yet so much in the dark, much less did they understand the meaning of it. Christ did not begin this discourse until Judas was gone out. The presence of wicked people is often a hindrance to good discourse. When Judas was gone out, Christ said, Now is the Son of man glorified. Christ is glorified by the purifying of Christian societies: corruptions in his church are a reproach to him. Now Judas was gone to set the wheels a-going, in order to his being put to death: Now is the Son of man glorified, meaning, Now he is crucified.

1. Here is something which Christ instructs them in, concerning his sufferings, that was very comforting.

(1) That he should himself be glorified in them. Now the Son of man is to be exposed to the greatest ignominy, and dishonoured both by the cowardice of his friends and the insolence of his enemies; yet now he is glorified. Now he is to obtain a glorious victory over Satan and all the powers of darkness. Now he is to work out a glorious deliverance for his people, by his death to reconcile them to God, and bring in an everlasting righteousness and happiness for them. Now he is to give a glorious example of self-denial and patience under the cross, and love to the souls of men, such as will make him to be for ever admired. Christ had been glorified in many miracles he had wrought, and yet he speaks of his being glorified now in his sufferings, as if that were more than all his other glories.

(2) That God the Father should be glorified in them. The sufferings of Christ were: The satisfaction of God's justice, and so God was glorified in them. They were the manifestation of his holiness and mercy. God is love, and herein he hath commended his love.

(3) That he should himself be greatly glorified after them, in consideration of God's being greatly glorified by them, v. 32. [1] He is sure that God will glorify him. Hell and earth set themselves to vilify Christ, but God resolved to glorify him. He glorified him in his sufferings by the amazing signs and wonders which attended them, and extorted even from his crucifiers an acknowledgment that he was the Son of God. [2] That he will glorify him in himself. In Christ himself. He will glorify him in his own person. This supposes his speedy resurrection. [3] That he will glorify him straightway. He looked upon the joy and glory set before him, not only as great, but as near. Good services done to earthly princes often remain long unrewarded; but Christ had his preferments presently. [4] All this in consideration of God's being glorified in and by his sufferings: Seeing God is glorified in him, God shall in like manner glorify him in himself. Those who mind the business of glorifying God no doubt shall have the happiness of being glorified with him.

2. Here is something which was awakening, for as yet they were slow of heart to understand it (v. 33). Two serious words:

(1) That his stay in this world they would find to be very short. Little children. This compellation does not bespeak so much their weakness as his tenderness. Know this, then, that yet a little while I am with you. Let them improve the advantage they now had. We must make the best of the helps we have for our souls while we have them. Let them not dote upon his bodily presence. They must think of living without it; not be always little children, but go alone, without their nurses.

(2) That their following him to the other world they would find to be very difficult. What he had said to the Jews (ch. vii. 34) he saith to his disciples. Christ tells them here, [1] That when he was gone they would feel the want of him: You shall seek me. We are often taught the worth of mercies by the want of them. The presence of the Comforter was not such a sensible satisfaction as his bodily presence would have been. But observe, Christ said to the Jews, You shall seek me and not find me; but to the disciples he only saith, You shall seek me. They should find that which was tantamount, and should not seek in vain. [2] That and it was night—but far blacker night in the soul of Judas than in the sky over his head.

31-38. DISCOURSE AFTER THE TRAITOR'S DEPARTURE—PETER'S SELF-CONFIDENCE—HIS FALL PREDICTED. 31. when he was gone out, Jesus said, Now is the Son of man glorified—These remarkable words plainly imply that up to this moment our Lord had spoken under a painful restraint, the presence of a traitor within the little circle of His holiest fellowship on earth preventing the free and full outpouring of His heart; as is evident, indeed, from those oft-recurring clauses, "Ye are not all clean," "I speak not of you all," etc. "Now" the restraint is removed, and the embankment which kept in the mighty volume of living waters having broken down, they burst forth in a torrent which only ceases on His leaving the supper room and entering on the next stage of His great work—the scene in the Garden. But with what words is the silence first broken on the departure of Judas? By no reflections on the traitor, and, what is still more wonderful, by no reference to the dread character of His own approaching sufferings. He does not even name them, save by announcing, as with a burst of triumph, that the hour of His glory has arrived! And what is very remarkable, in five brief clauses He repeats this word "glorify" five times, as if to His view a coruscation of glories played at that moment about the Cross. (See on ch. 12:23.) God is glorified in him—the glory of Each reaching its zenith in the Death of the Cross!

32. If God be glorified in him, God shall also—in return and reward of this highest of all services ever rendered to Him, or capable of being rendered—glorify him in himself, and . . . straightway glorify him—referring now to the Resurrection and Exaltation of Christ after this service was over, including all the honor and glory then put upon Him, and that will for ever encircle Him as Head of the new creation.

33-35. Little children—From the height of His own glory He now descends, with sweet pity, to His "little children," all now His own. This term of endearment, nowhere else used in the Gospels, and once only employed by Paul (Gal. 4: 19), is appropriated by the beloved disciple himself, who no fewer than seven times employs it in his first Epistle.

Ye shall seek me—feel the want of Me. as I said to the Jews—ch. 7:34; 8:21. But oh in what a different sense!

ADAM CLARKE

31. Now is the Son of man glorified. "Hath been glorified." Now it fully appears that I am the Person appointed to redeem a lost world by My blood. I have already been glorified by this appointment, and am about to be further glorified by My death, resurrection, and ascension.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

"Now is the Son of man glorified." There blend, in that last act of our Lord's—for His death was His act—in strange fashion, the two contradictory ideas of glory and shame; like some sky, all full of dark thunderclouds, and yet between them the brightest blue and the blazing sunshine. In the cross, Death crowns Him the Prince of Life, and His cross is His throne. All His life long He was the Light of the World, but the very noontide hour of His glory was that hour when the shadow of eclipse lay over all the land, and He hung on the cross dying in the dark. At His "eventide it was light." "He endured the cross, despising the shame"; and lo! the shame flashed up into the very brightness of glory, and the ignominy and the suffering became the jewels of His crown. "Now is the Son of man glorified."

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

32. And shall straightway glorify him. Or "glorify Him immediately"; as He did, not only in the miracles wrought at His death, but also in that remarkable case mentioned, chap. xviii. 6, when the whole crowd that came to seize Him were driven back with a word of His mouth, and fell to the ground.

33. Little children. Or, rather, "beloved children"—a word frequently used by this apostle in his Epistles. It is an expression which implies great tenderness and affection, and such as a fond mother uses to her most beloved babes. Now that Judas was gone out, He could use this epithet without any restriction of meaning. Yet a little while. The end of My life is at hand; Judas is gone to consummate his treason; I have but a few hours to be with you, and by and by you shall be scattered.

Ye shall seek me. For a few days you shall feel great distress because of My absence. Whither I go, ye cannot come. Your time is not up.

whither he went they could not come. Christ tells them that they could not follow him only to quicken them to so much the more diligence and care. They could not follow him to his cross, for they had not courage and resolution. Nor could they follow him to his crown.

II. He discourses with them concerning the great duty of brotherly love (v. 34, 35): You shall love one another. Now that they must expect such treatment as their Master had, it concerned them by brotherly love to strengthen one another's hands. Three arguments for mutual love are here urged:

1. The command of their Master (v. 34): A new commandment I give unto you. He not only commends it, not only counsels but commands it, and makes it one of the fundamental laws of his kingdom. It is a new commandment. It is a renewed commandment. It is like an old book in a new edition corrected and enlarged. This commandment has been so corrupted that when Christ revised it, it might well be called a new commandment. The law of brotherly love was forgotten as obsolete and out of date; so that as it came from Christ new, it was new to the people. It is an everlasting command; so strangely new as to be always so. It shall be new to eternity, when faith and hope are antiquated. As Christ gives it, it is new. Before it was, Thou shalt love thy neighbour; now it is, You shall love one another; it is pressed in a more winning way when it is thus pressed as mutual duty owing to one another.

2. The example of their Saviour is another argument for brotherly love: As I have loved you. It is this that makes it a new commandment. Understand this of all the instances of Christ's love to his disciples. Thus he had loved them, and thus they must love one another, and love to the end. It may be understood of the special instance of love which he was now about to give, in laying down his life for them. Greater love hath no man than this, ch. xv. 13. We must love one another in some respects after the same manner; we must set this before us as our copy. It must be love to the souls one of another. We must also love one another from this motive, and upon this consideration —because Christ has loved us.

3. The reputation of their profession (v. 35): By this shall all men know that you are my disciples, if you have love one to another. We must have love, not only show love, but have it in the root and habit of it; have it ready. Brotherly love is the badge of Christ's disciples. This is the livery of his family; this he would have them noted for, as that wherein they excelled all others —their loving one another. This was what their Master was famous for; and therefore, if you see any people more affectionate one to another than what is common, say, "Certainly these are the followers of Christ, they have been with Jesus." The heart of Christ was very much upon it. In this they must be singular; whereas the way of the world is to be every-one for himself, they should be hearty for one another. He does not say, By this shall men know that you are my disciples—if you work miracles, for a worker of miracles is but a cipher without charity (1 Cor. xiii. 1, 2). It is the true honour of Christ's disciples to excel in brotherly love. Christians were known by their affection to one another. Their adversaries took notice of it, and said, See how these Christians love one another. If the followers of Christ do not love one another, they give just cause to suspect their own sincerity. When our brethren stand in need of help from us, when they are any ways rivals with or provoking to us, and so we have an occasion to forgive, in such cases as this it will be known whether we have this badge of Christ's disciples.

In these verses we have,

I. Peter's curiosity.

1. Peter's question was bold and blunt (v. 36): Lord, whither goest thou? referring to what Christ had said (v. 33), Whither I go, you cannot come. It is a common fault among us to be more desirous to have our curiosity gratified than our consciences directed. It is easy to observe it in the converse of Christians, how soon a discourse of that which is plain and edifying is dropped, and no more said to it; which in a matter of doubtful disputation runs into an endless strife of words.

2. Christ's answer. He did not gratify him, but said what he had said before (v. 36): Let this suffice, thou canst not follow me now, but thou shalt follow me hereafter. We may understand it of his following him to the cross. When Christ was seized, he provided for the safety of his disciples. Let these go their way, because they could not follow him now. Christ considers the frame of his disciples. The day shall be as the strength is. Peter, though designed for martyrdom, cannot follow Christ now, but he shall follow him here-

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

34. a new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another—This was the new feature of it. Christ's love to His people in giving His life a ransom for them was altogether new, and consequently as a Model and Standard for theirs to one another. It is not, however, something transcending the great moral law, which is "the old commandment" (I John 2:7, and see on Mark 12:28-33), but that law in a new and peculiar form. Hence it is said to be both new and old (I John 2:7, 8).

35. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples—the disciples of Him who laid down His life for those He loved. if ye have love one to another—for My sake, and as one in Me; for to such love men outside the circle of believers know right well they are entire strangers. Alas, how little of it there is even within this circle!

36-38. Peter said—seeing plainly in these directions how to behave themselves, that He was indeed going from them. Lord, whither goest thou?—having hardly a glimmer of the real truth.

Jesus answered, . . . thou canst not follow me now, but thou shalt follow me afterwards—How different from what He said to the Jews: "Whither I go ye cannot come" (ch. 8:21).

ADAM CLARKE

34. A new commandment I give unto you. In what sense are we to understand that this was a new commandment? "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," was a positive precept of the law, Lev. xix. 18, and it is the very same that Christ repeats here; how then was it new?

Our Lord answers this question, Even as I have loved you. Now Christ more than fulfilled the Mosaic precept; He not only loved His neighbor as himself, but He loved him more than himself, for He laid down His life for men. In this He calls upon the disciples to imitate Him, to be ready on all occasions to lay down their lives for each other.

35. By this shall all men know. From this time forward, this mutual and disinterested love shall become the essential and distinctive mark of all My disciples. When they love one another with pure hearts, fervently, even unto death, then shall it fully appear that they are disciples of that Person who laid down His life for His sheep, and who became, by dying, a Ransom for all. The disciples of different teachers were known by their habits, or some particular creed or rite, or point of austerity, which they had adopted; but the disciples of Christ were known by this love which they bore to each other. The primitive Christians were particularly known by this among the Gentiles. Tertullian, in his Apology, gives us their very words: "See, said they, how they love one another, and are ready to lay down their lives for each other."

36. Thou canst not follow me now. You have not faith strong enough to die for Me, nor is your work yet done; but hereafter you shall suffer for My sake, and die in defense of My truth. See chap. xxi. 18.

after; he shall be crucified at last, like his Master. Let him not think that because he escapes suffering now he shall never suffer. We may be reserved for greater trials than we have yet known. We may understand it of his following him to the crown: "No," saith Christ, "thou canst not follow me now. Thou shalt follow me afterwards, after thou hast fought the good fight." There is a wilderness between the Red Sea and Canaan.

II. Peter's confidence.

1. Peter makes a daring protestation of his constancy. "Lord, why cannot I follow thee now? I will lay down my life for thy sake." Having heard his Master so often speak of his own sufferings, surely he could not understand him any otherwise than of his going away by death; and he resolves as Thomas did that he will go and die with him; and better die with him than live without him. What an affectionate love Peter had to our Lord Jesus: "I will lay down my life for thy sake." Peter spoke as he thought, and though he was inconsiderate he was not insincere. How ill he took it to have it questioned: "Lord, why cannot I follow thee now? Dost thou suspect my fidelity to thee?" It is with regret that true love hears its own sincerity arraigned. We are apt to think that we can do anything, and take it amiss to be told that this and the other we cannot do, whereas without Christ we can do nothing.

2. Christ gives him a surprising prediction of his inconstancy, v. 38. He upbraids Peter with his confidence: Wilt thou lay down thy life for my sake? Christ hereby puts Peter upon second thoughts, that he might insert into it that necessary proviso, "Lord, thy grace enabling me, I will lay down my life for thy sake." "Wilt thou undertake to die for me? What! thou that trembledst to walk upon the water to me? It was an easy thing to leave thy boats and nets to follow me, but not so easy to lay down thy life." It is good for us to shame ourselves out of our presumptuous confidence in ourselves. What a fool am I to talk so big. He plainly foretells his cowardice in the critical hour. Christ solemnly asserts it with, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, the cock shall not crow till thou hast denied me thrice: the cock shall not crow, shall not have crowed his crowing out, till thou hast again and again denied me. The crowing of the cock was to be the occasion of his repentance. Christ not only foresaw that Judas would betray him, but he foresaw that Peter would deny him though he did not design it, but the contrary. He knows not only the wickedness of sinners but the weakness of saints. Christ told Peter that he would deny him. That he would do this not once only by a hasty slip of the tongue, but would repeat it a second and a third time. We may well imagine what a mortification it was to Peter's confidence of his own courage to be told this. The most secure are commonly the least safe; and those most shamefully betray their own weakness that most confidently presume upon their own strength, 1 Cor. x. 12.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

37. why not... now? I will lay down my life for thy sake—He seems now to see that it was death Christ referred to as what would sever Him from them, but is not staggered at following Him thither.

Jesus answered, 38. Wilt thou lay down thy life for my sake?—In this repetition of Peter's words there is deep though affectionate irony, and this Peter himself would feel for many a day after his recovery, as he retraced the painful particulars. Verily... The cock...—See on Luke 22:31-34.

ADAM CLARKE

37. Why cannot I follow thee now? Peter probably thought that our Lord intended to go on some long journey, which would necessarily subject Him to many inconveniences and fatigue; and he felt quite disposed to follow Him in this supposed journey, at all hazards. He saw no reason, because he did not see our Lord's meaning, why he could not follow Him now. I will lay down my life for thy sake. Poor Peter! You were sincere, but you did not know your own strength. You were at this time willing to die, but when the time came were not able. Christ must first die for Peter, before Peter can die for Him. Let no man think he can do anything good without the immediate assistance of God. Peter's denial should be an eternal warning to all self-confident persons; though there be sincerity and goodwill at the bottom, yet in the trial these cannot perform that office which belongs to the power of God. We should will, and then look to God for power to execute; without Him we can do nothing.

F. B. MEYER:

Heaven delayed. "Thou canst not follow me now." The emphasis is not on the cannot. It is as though the Master said, "The hindrance is not in some arbitrary edict of divine power, but in the infinite knowledge and wisdom that cannot err." Peter was not fit to go. There were lessons of the utmost importance waiting for him to acquire in the near future. He must learn to know himself, and Christ, and the grace of the Holy Spirit. When he proudly vaunted that he would lay down his life for Jesus, he gave incontestable evidence that he did not know himself; and there was every reason to think that he was similarly deceived when he supposed that he was fit to quit earth's discipline, and enter on heaven's blessed enjoyment. He must exchange his own strivings and resolvings for the gracious indwelling of the Spirit of Pentecost; he must learn the glorious energy of the indwelling Savior; he must be girded by another and carried whither he would not; and only then would the time of his putting off of the tabernacle of the body arrive.—Great Verses Through the Bible

CHAPTER 14

I. A general caution which Christ gives to his disciples against trouble of heart (v. 1): Let not your heart be troubled.

1. How Christ took notice of it. Perhaps it was apparent in their looks; at least it was intelligible to the Lord Jesus, who is acquainted with all our secret undiscovered sorrows, with the wound that bleeds inwardly. He takes cognizance of all the trouble which his people are at any time in danger of being overwhelmed with. Many things concurred to trouble the disciples now.

(1) Christ had just told them of the unkindness he should receive from some of them, and this troubled them all. Christ comforts them; though a godly jealousy over ourselves is of great use to keep us humble and watchful, yet it must not prevail to the disquieting of our spirits and the damping of our holy joy.

(2) He had just told them of his own departure from them, that he should not only go away, but go away in a cloud of sufferings. When we now look upon Christ pierced, we cannot but mourn and be in bitterness, though we see the glorious issue and fruit of it; much more grievous must be the sight to them, who could then look no further. If Christ depart from them, [1] They will think themselves shamefully disappointed; for they looked that this had been he that should have delivered Israel. [2] They will think themselves sadly deserted and exposed. Now, in reference to all these, Let not your hearts be troubled. Here are three words, upon any of which the emphasis may significantly be laid. Upon the word troubled.

Vss. 1-31. DISCOURSE AT THE TABLE, AFTER SUPPER. We now come to that portion of the evangelical history which we may with propriety call its Holy of Holies. Our Evangelist, like a consecrated priest, alone opens up to us the view into this sanctuary. It is the record of the last moments spent by the Lord in the midst of His disciples before His passion, when words full of heavenly thought flowed from His sacred lips. All that His heart, glowing with love, had still to say to His friends, was compressed into this short season. At first (from ch. 13:31) the intercourse took the form of conversation; sitting at table, they talked familiarly together. But when (14:31) the repast was finished, the language of Christ assumed a loftier strain; the disciples, assembled around their Master, listened to the words of life, and seldom spoke a word (only ch. 16:17, 29). At length, in the Redeemer's sublime intercessory prayer, His full soul was poured forth in express petitions to His heavenly Father on behalf of those who were His own. It is a peculiarity of these last chapters, that they treat almost exclusively of the most profound relations—as that of the Son to the Father, and of both to the Spirit, that of Christ to the Church, of the Church to the world, and so forth. Moreover, a considerable portion of these sublime communications surpassed the point of view to which the disciples had at that time attained; hence the Redeemer frequently repeats the same sentiments in order to impress them more deeply upon their minds, and, because of what they still did not un-

CHAPTER 14

1. Let not your heart be troubled. After having answered Peter's question, He addresses himself again to His disciples, and tells them not to be afflicted at His leaving them, nor to lose courage because of what He said concerning Peter's denying Him; that if they reposed their confidence in God, He would protect them; and that, howsoever they might see Him treated, they should believe in Him more firmly, as His sufferings, death, and resurrection should be to them the most positive proof of His being the Messiah, the Saviour of the world.

MATTHEW HENRY

Be not like the troubled sea when it cannot rest. He does not say, "Let not your hearts be sensible of the griefs, or sad because of them," but, "Be not ruffled and discomposed." Upon the word heart: "Let not your heart be troubled." Keep possession of your own souls when you can keep possession of nothing else. The heart is the main fort; whatever you do, keep trouble from this. Upon the word your: "You that are my disciples and followers, be not you so, for you know better." Herein Christ's disciples should do more than others, should keep their minds quiet, when everything else is unquiet.

2. The remedy he prescribes; in general, believe. (1) Some read it in both parts imperatively, "Believe in God, and his perfections and providence, believe also in me, and my mediation." (2) We read the former as an acknowledgment that they did believe in God. "But, if you would effectually provide against a stormy day, believe also in me." By believing in Christ as the Mediator between God and man, our belief in God becomes comfortable. Those that rightly believe in God will believe in Jesus Christ, and believing in God through Jesus Christ is an excellent means of keeping trouble from the heart. The joy of faith is the best remedy against the griefs of sense.

II. Here is a particular direction to act faith upon the promise of eternal life, v. 2, 3. But what must they trust God and Christ for? Trust them for a happiness to come, for a happiness to last as long as the immortal soul and the eternal world shall last. The saints have encouraged themselves with this in their greatest extremities. That heaven would make amends for all. Let us see how this is suggested here.

1. Believe and consider that really there is such a happiness: In my Father's house there are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you, v. 2.

(1) See under what notion the happiness of heaven is here represented: as mansions. Heaven is a house, not a tent or tabernacle. It is a Father's house: my Father's house; and his Father is our Father. All true believers shall be welcome to that happiness as to their home. There are mansions there. Distinct dwellings, an apartment for each. Our individuality shall not be lost there. Durable dwellings. The house itself is lasting; our estate in it is not for a term of years, but a perpetuity. Here we are as in an inn; in heaven we shall gain a settlement. There are many mansions, for there are many sons to be brought to glory.

(2) See what assurance we have of the reality of the happiness itself: "If it were not so, I would have told you." The assurance is built: Upon the veracity of his word. Upon the sincerity of his affection to them. As he is true, and would not impose upon them himself, so he is kind, and would not suffer them to be imposed upon. He loves us too well, and means us too well, to disappoint the expectations of his own raising.

2. Believe and consider that the design of Christ's going away was to prepare a place in heaven for his disciples. He went to prepare a place for us; to take possession for us, as our advocate or attorney, and so to secure our title as indefeasible; to make provision. The happiness of heaven yet must be further fitted up for man. It consisting much in the presence of Christ there, it was therefore necessary that he should go before. Heaven would be an unready place for a Christian if Christ were not there.

3. Believe and consider that therefore he would certainly come again (v. 3): "If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you to myself, that where I am there you may be also." Now these are comfortable words indeed. (1) That Jesus Christ will come again; intimating the certainty of it. We say, We are coming, when we are busy in preparing for our coming, and so he is. (2) That he will come again to receive all his faithful followers to himself. The coming of Christ is in order to our gathering together unto him. (3) That where he is there they shall be also. This intimates that the quintessence of heaven's happiness is being with Christ there. That where I am; where I am to be shortly, where I am to be eternally; there you shall be shortly, there you shall be eternally: not only spectators of his glory, but sharers in it. (4) That this may be inferred from his going to prepare a place for us, for his preparations shall not be in vain. He will not build and furnish lodgings, and let them stand empty. If he has prepared the place for us, he will prepare us for it, and in due time put us in possession of it.

Christ, having set the happiness of heaven before them as the end, here shows them himself as the way to it. You know, 1. "You may know; it is none of the secret things which belong not to you, but one of the things revealed." 2. "You do know; you know that which is the home and which is the way, though perderstand, points them to the Holy Spirit, who would remind them of all His sayings, and lead them into all truth (14:26)" [OLSHAUSEN]. 1. Let not your heart be troubled . . .—What myriads of souls have not these opening words cheered, in deepest gloom, since first they were uttered!

ye believe in God—absolutely. believe also in me—i.e., Have the same trust in Me. What less, and what else, can these words mean? And if so, what a demand to make by one sitting familiarly with them at the supper table! Cf. the saying in ch. 5:17, for which the Jews took up stones to stone Him, as "making himself equal with God" (vs. 18). But it is no transfer of our trust from its proper Object; it is but the concentration of our trust in the Unseen and Impalpable One upon His Own Incarnate Son, by which that trust, instead of the distant, unsteady, and too often cold and scarce real thing it otherwise is, acquires a conscious reality, warmth, and power, which makes all things new. This is Christianity in brief.

2. In my Father's house are many mansions—and so room for all, and a place for each.

if not, I would have told you—i.e., I would tell you so at once; I would not deceive you.

I go to prepare a place for you—to obtain for you a right to be there, and to possess your "place." 3. I will come again and receive you unto myself—strictly, at His Personal appearing; but in a secondary and comforting sense, to each individually. Mark again the claim made:—to come again to receive His people to Himself, that where He is there they may be also. He thinks it ought to be enough to be assured that they shall be where He is and in His keeping.

ADAM CLARKE

Ye believe in God, believe also in me. It is best to read both the verbs in the imperative mood—Place your confidence in God, and in Me as the Mediator between God and man, vv. 12-14; expect the utmost support from God, but expect it all through Me. The disciples began to lose all hope of a secular kingdom, and were discouraged in consequence. Christ promises them a spiritual and heavenly inheritance, and thus lifts up their drooping hearts.

2. In my Father's house. The Kingdom of glory. Many mansions. Though I have said before that where I am going you cannot come now, yet do not think that we shall be forever separated. I am going to that state of glory where there is not only a place of supreme eminence for myself, but also places for all My disciples—various degrees of glory suited to the various capacities and attainments of My followers. Our Lord alludes here to the Temple, which was called the "house of God," in the precincts of which there were a great number of chambers, 1 Kings vi. 5; Ezra viii. 29; Jer. xxxv. 2, 4; xxxvi. 10. If it were not so, I would have told you. If your places were not prepared in the kingdom of God, I would not have permitted you to have indulged a vain hope concerning future blessedness.

3. And if I go. And when I shall have gone and prepared a place for you—opened the Kingdom of an eternal glory for your reception, and for the reception of all that shall die in the faith—I will come again, after My resurrection, and give you the fullest assurances of this state of blessedness; and confirm you in the faith, by My grace and the effusion of My Spirit.

4. And whither I go ye know. I have told you this so often and so plainly that you must certainly have comprehended what I have said.

MATTHEW HENRY

haps not as the home and as the way. You have been told it, and cannot but know."

I. Thomas enquired concerning the way (v. 5).

He said, "Lord, we know not whither thou goest, and how can we know the way?" Christ's testimony concerning their knowledge made them more sensible of their ignorance, and more inquisitive after further light. Thomas here shows more modesty than Peter. Peter was the more solicitous to know whither Christ went. Thomas here seems more solicitous to know the way. His confession of his ignorance was commendable enough. If good men be in the dark, and know it but in part, yet they are willing to own their defects. The cause of his ignorance was culpable. They knew not whither Christ went, because they dreamed of a temporal kingdom. Their fancy ran upon his going to some remarkable city or other, there to be anointed king. Where these castles in the air were to be built, east, west, north, or south, they could not tell, and therefore knew not the way. Had Thomas understood, that Christ was going to the invisible world, he would not have said, Lord, we do not know the way.

II. Now to this complaint of their ignorance Christ gives a full answer, v. 6, 7. Thomas had enquired both whither he went and what was the way, and Christ answers both these enquiries. They knew him, and he was the way; they knew the Father, and he was the end; and therefore, whither I go you know, and the way you know. Believe in God as the end, and in me as the way (v. 1).

(1) He speaks of himself as the way, v. 6. I am the way; no man comes to the Father but by me.

[1] The nature of his mediation: He is the way, the truth, and the life. Let us consider these first distinctly. Christ is the way. In him God and man meet, and are brought together. We could not get to the tree of life in the way of innocency; but Christ is another way to it. The disciples followed him, and Christ tells them that while they continued following him, they would never be out of their way. He is the truth; as truth is opposed to falsehood and error. When we enquire for truth, we need learn no more than the truth as it is in Jesus; as truth is opposed to fallacy and deceit; as true as truth itself. He is the life; for we are alive unto God only in and through Jesus Christ. Let us consider these jointly. Christ is the way, the truth, and the life. He is the beginning, the middle, and the end. He is the true and living way; there are truth and life in the way, as well as at the end of it. He is the true way to life. Other ways may seem right, but the end of them is the way of death.

[2] The necessity of his mediation: No man cometh to the Father but by me. Fallen man cannot come to him as a Father, otherwise than by Christ as Mediator.

(2) He speaks of his Father as the end (v. 7): "If you had known me, you would have known my Father also; and henceforth you know him and have seen him." A tacit rebuke to them for their dullness and carelessness in not acquainting themselves with Jesus Christ: If you had known me——. They knew him, and yet did not know him so well as they might and should have known him. Christ had said to the Jews (ch. viii. 19): If you had known me, you would have known my Father also; and here the same to his disciples; for it is hard to say which is the more strange, the wilful ignorance of those that are enemies to the light, or the defects and mistakes of the children of light. He was well satisfied concerning their sincerity, notwithstanding the weakness of their understanding: "And henceforth you know him, and have seen him," for in the face of Christ we see the glory of God. Many of the disciples of Christ have more knowledge and more grace than they think they have. Those that know God do not all at once know that they know him.

III. Philip enquired concerning the Father (v. 8), and Christ answered him, v. 9–11.

1. Philip's request for some extraordinary discovery of the Father. From an earnest desire of further light, he cries out, Show us the Father. "That is what we want, that is what we would have: Show us the Father and it sufficeth us." This supposes an earnest desire of acquaintance with God as a Father. The petition is, "Show us the Father." The plea is, It sufficeth us. Grant us but one sight of the Father, and we have enough. In the knowledge of God as our Father the soul is satisfied; a sight of the Father is a heaven upon earth. "Let us see the Father with our bodily eyes, as we see thee, and it sufficeth us." It manifests not only the weakness of his faith, but his ignorance of the gospel way of manifesting the Father. Christ's institutions have provided better for the confirmation of our faith than our own inventions would.

2. Christ's reply, v. 9–11.

(1) He refers him to what he had seen, v. 9. "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? Now, he that hath seen me hath seen

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

4-7. whither I go ye know . . . Thomas saith, Lord, we know not whither thou goest . ., Jesus saith, I am the way . . .—By saying this, He meant rather to draw out their inquiries and reply to them. Christ is "THE WAY" to the Father—"no man cometh unto the Father but by Me"; He is "THE TRUTH" of all we find in the Father when we get to Him, "For in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" (Col. 2:9), and He is all "THE LIFE" that shall ever flow to us and bless us from the Godhead thus approached and thus manifested in Him—"this is the true God and eternal life" (I John 5:20).

7. from henceforth—now, or from this time, understand.

8-12. The substance of this passage is that the Son is the ordained and perfect manifestation of the Father, that His own word for this ought to His disciples to be enough; that if any doubts remained His works ought to remove them (see on ch. 10:37, 38); but yet that these works of His were designed merely to aid weak faith, and would be repeated, nay exceeded, by His disciples, in virtue of the power He would confer on them after His departure. His miracles the apostles wrought, though wholly in His name and by His power, and the "greater" works—not in degree but in kind—were the conversion of thousands in a day, by His Spirit accompanying them.

ADAM CLARKE

5. Lord, we know not. Thomas, perhaps, thought that our Lord only spoke of His going some distance from the place where He then was.

6. I am the way that leads to the Father; the truth that teaches the knowledge of God, and directs in the way; the life that animates all those who seek and serve Him, and which is to be enjoyed eternally at the end of the way.

7. If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father. Because I and the Father are one, chap. x. 30. Or, If you had properly examined the intention and design of the law, you would have been convinced that it referred to Me; and that all that I have done and instituted was according to the design and intention of the Father, as expressed in that law.

8. Shew us the Father. As if he had said, We have seen and adored Thee, and our happiness will be complete if Thou show us the Father. The demand of Philip was similar to that made by Moses, Exod. xxxiii. 18. He wished to see the glory of God. In Peter, James, or John, this would have been inexcusable; but Philip had not seen the Transfiguration on the mount.

the Father; and how sayest thou then, Show us the Father?" He reproves him for two things: [1] For not improving his acquaintance with Christ to a clear and distinct knowledge of him: "Hast thou not known me, Philip?" Philip, the first day he came to him, declared that he knew him to be the Messiah (ch. i. 45), and yet to this day did not know the Father in him. Many know Christ, who yet do not know what they might know of him, nor see what they should see in him. I have been so long time with thee. Christ expects that our proficiency should be in some measure according to our standing, that we should not be always babes. [2] For his infirmity in the prayer made, Show us the Father. Herein appears much of the weakness of Christ's disciples that they know not what to pray for as they ought (Rom. viii. 26), but often ask amiss (Jas. iv. 3). He instructs him, and gives him a maxim which justifies what he had said (v. 7): You know the Father, and have seen him; and answered what Philip had asked, Show us the Father. He that hath seen me hath seen the Father. All that saw Christ in the flesh might have seen the Father in him. All that saw Christ by faith did see the Father in him, though they were not suddenly aware that they did so. The holiness of God shone in the spotless purity of Christ's life, and his grace in all the acts of grace he did.

(2) He refers him to what he had reason to believe (v. 10, 11): "Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me, and therefore that in seeing me thou hast seen the Father?" What it is which we are to believe: That I am in the Father, and the Father in me; that is, as he had said (ch. x. 30), I and my Father are one. In knowing Christ we know the Father; and in seeing him we see the Father. What inducements we have to believe this. We must believe it: For his word's sake: The words that I speak to you, I speak not of myself. He spoke not of himself only, but the mind of God according to the eternal counsels. For his works' sake: The Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth them; and therefore believe me for their sake. The Father is said to dwell in him. The Father so dwells in Christ that in him he may be found, as a man where he dwells. Seek ye the Lord, seek him in Christ, and he will be found, for in him he dwells. He doeth the works. Many works of power, and works of mercy, Christ did, and the Father did them in him. We are bound to believe this, for the very works' sake. Christ's miracles are proofs of his divine mission, not only for the conviction of infidels, but for the confirmation of the faith of his own disciples.

The disciples, as they were full of grief to think of parting with their Master, so they were full of care what would become of themselves when he was gone. If he leave them, they will be as sheep having no shepherd. Christ here assures them that they should be clothed with powers sufficient to bear them out.

I. Great power on earth (v. 12): He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also. This magnifies his power more than anything, that he not only wrought miracles himself, but gave power to others to do so too.

1. Two things he assures them of:

(1) That they should be enabled to do such works as he had done. Did Christ heal the sick, cleanse the leper, raise the dead? So should they. Did he convince and convert sinners, and draw multitudes to him? So should they. Though he should depart, the work should not cease, nor fall to the ground; and it is still in the doing.

(2) That they should do greater works than these. In the kingdom of nature they should work greater miracles. No miracle is little, but some to our apprehension seem greater than others. Christ wrought miracles for two or three years in one country, but his followers wrought miracles in his name for many ages in divers countries. In the kingdom of grace, they should obtain greater victories by the gospel than had been obtained while Christ was upon earth. The truth is, the captivating of so great a part of the world to Christ, was the miracle of all.

2. The reason Christ gives for this is, Because I go unto my Father. "Because I go, it will be requisite that you should have such a power. Because I go to the Father, I shall be in a capacity to furnish you with such a power."

II. Great power in heaven: "Whatsoever you shall ask, that will I do" (v. 13, 14).

1. In what way they were to derive power from him, when he was gone to the Father—by prayer. When dear friends are to be removed to a distance from each other, they provide for the settling of a correspondence; thus, when Christ was going to his Father, he tells his disciples how they might write to him upon every occasion, and send their epistles by a safe

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The vehement burst with which Philip interrupts the calm flow of our Lord's discourse is not the product of mere frivolity or curiosity. One hears the ring of earnestness in it, and the yearnings of many years find voice. Philip had felt out of his depth, no doubt, in the profound teachings which our Lord had been giving, but His last words about seeing God set a familiar chord vibrating. As an Old Testament believer he knew that Moses had once led the elders of Israel up to the mount where "they saw the God of Israel," and that to many others had been granted sensible manifestations of the divine presence. As a disciple he longed for some similar sign to confirm his faith. As a man he was conscious of the deep need which all of us have, whether we are conscious of it or not, for something more real and tangible than an unseeable and unknowable God. The peculiarities of Philip's temperament strengthened the desire. The first appearance that he makes in the Gospels is characteristically like this his last. To all Nathanael's objections he had only the reply, "Come and see." And here he says: "Oh! if we could see the Father it would be enough." He was one of the men to whom seeing is believing, and so he speaks.

His petition is childlike in its simplicity, beautiful in its trust, noble and true in its estimate of what men need. He longs to see God. He believes that Christ can show God; he is sure that the sight of God will satisfy the heart. These are errors, or truths, according to what is meant by "seeing." Philip meant a palpable manifestation, and so far he was wrong. Give the word its highest and its truest meaning, and Philip's error becomes grand truth. Our Lord gently, lovingly, and with only a hint of rebuke, answers the request and seeks to disengage the error from the truth.

There is a word of sadness and tenderness, of suppressed pain and of grieved affection, in the first words of our Lord's reply. "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip?" He seldom names His disciples. When He does, there is a deep cadence of affection in the designation. This man was one of the first disciples, the little original band called by Christ himself, and thus had been with Him all the time of His ministry, and the Master wonders with a gentle wonder that, before eyes that loved Him as much as Philip's did, His continual self-revelation had been made to so little purpose. In the answer, in its first portion, there lies the reiteration of the thoughts that the sight of Christ is the sight of God—"He that hath seen me hath seen the Father"—and that not to know Christ as thus showing God is not to know Him at all—"Thou hast not known me, Philip." Further, there is the thought that the sight of God in Christ is sufficient, "How sayest thou, Shew us the Father?"

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

13, 14. whatsoever ye... ask in my name—as Mediator—that will I do—as Head and Lord of the kingdom of God. This comprehensive promise is emphatically repeated in vs. 14.

ADAM CLARKE

9. He that hath seen me hath seen the Father. Could any creature say these words? Do they not evidently imply that Christ declared himself to His disciples to be the everlasting God?

10. I am in the Father, and the Father in me. We are essentially one, and those who have seen Me have seen Him who sent me. He doeth the works. We are not only one in nature, but one also in operation. The works which I have done bear witness of the infinite perfection of My nature. Such miracles as I have wrought could be performed only by unlimited power.

12. And greater works than these. The miracles which I have wrought could not have been wrought but by the omnipotence of God, but that omnipotence can work greater. And those who believe on My name shall, through My almighty power, be enabled to work greater miracles than those which I have ordinarily wrought. Perhaps the greater works refer to the immense multitudes that were brought to God by the ministry of the apostles. Because I go unto my Father. Where I shall be an Intercessor for you, that—

13. Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name. To enable you to perform these miracles, and to convert souls, may be granted you. Besides, by going unto the Father, I shall receive the Holy Spirit, and send down His abundant influences into the hearts of those who believe.

and ready way of conveyance. "Let me hear from you by prayer, and you shall hear from me by the Spirit." And it is still open to us. Humility prescribed: You shall ask. They could demand nothing of him as a debt, but must be humble supplicants, beg or starve, beg or perish. Liberty allowed: "Ask anything, anything that is good and proper for you; anything, provided you know what you ask." Occasions vary, but they shall be welcome to the throne of grace upon every occasion.

2. In what name they were to present their petitions: Ask in my name. They were to plead his merit and intercession, and to depend upon it. If we ask in our own name, we cannot expect to speed, for, being strangers, we have no name in heaven; being sinners, we have an ill name there; but Christ's is a good name, well known in heaven.

3. What success they should have in their prayers: "What you ask, that will I do," v. 13. And again (v. 14), "I will do it. You may be sure I will: not only it shall be done, but I will do it." By faith in his name we may have what we will for the asking.

4. For what reason their prayers should speed so well: That the Father may be glorified in the Son. Hallowed be thy name is an answered prayer, and is put first, because, if the heart be sincere in this, it does in a manner consecrate all the other petitions. This Christ will aim at in granting, and for the sake of this will do what they ask. The wisdom, power, and goodness of God were magnified in the Redeemer when his apostles and ministers were enabled to do such great things, both in the proofs of their doctrine and in the successes of it.

Christ here promises to send the Spirit, whose office it should be to be their Comforter, to impress these things upon them.

I. He premises to this a memento of duty (v. 15): If you love me, keep my commandments. We must not expect comfort but in the way of duty. When they were in care what would become of them now, he bids them keep his commandments. In difficult times our care concerning the events of the day should be swallowed up in a care concerning the duty of the day. When they were showing their love to Christ by their grieving to think of his departure, and the sorrow which filled their hearts, he bids them, if they would show their love to him, do it, not by these weak and feminine passions, but by a universal obedience to his commands; this is better than sacrifice, better than tears. When Christ has given them precious promises he lays down this as a limitation of the promises, "Provided you keep my commandments, from a principle of love to me."

II. He promises this great and unspeakable blessing to them, v. 16, 17.

1. It is promised that they shall have another comforter. This is the great New Testament promise; a promise adapted to the present distress of the disciples, who were in sorrow, and needed a comforter.

(1) The blessing promised. The word is used only here in these discourses of Christ's, and 1 John ii. 1, where he translates it an advocate. You shall have another advocate. The office of the Spirit was to be Christ's advocate with them and others, to plead his cause, and take care of his concerns, on earth. When Christ was with them he spoke for them; but now that he is leaving them, the Spirit of the Father shall speak in them, Matt. x. 19, 20. And the cause cannot miscarry that is pleaded by such an advocate. You shall have another master or teacher, another exhorter. While they had Christ with them he excited and exhorted them to their duty; but now he leaves one with them that shall do this as effectually. Another comforter. Christ comforted his disciples when he was with them, and now that he was leaving them in their greatest need he promises them another.

(2) The giver of this blessing: The Father shall give him. The same that gave the Son to be our Saviour will give his Spirit to be our comforter.

(3) How this blessing is procured—by the intercession of the Lord Jesus: I will pray the Father. When Christ saith, I will pray the Father, it does not suppose that the Father is unwilling, but only that the gift of the Spirit is a fruit of Christ's mediation.

(4) The continuance of this blessing: That he may abide with you for ever. "With you, as long as you live. You shall never know the want of a comforter." There are everlasting consolations provided for us. They must disperse, and therefore a comforter that would be with them all, in all places alike, was alone fit to be with them for ever: "With your successors, when you are gone, to the end of time."

2. This comforter is the Spirit of truth, whom you know, v. 16, 17.

(1) The comforter promised is the Spirit, one who

he shall give you another Comforter—a word used only by John; in his Gospel with reference to the Holy Spirit, in his First Epistle (2:1), with reference to Christ Himself. Its proper sense is an "advocate," "patron," "helper." In this sense it is plainly meant of Christ (I John 2:1), and in this sense it comprehends all the comfort as well as aid of the Spirit's work. The Spirit is here promised as One who would supply Christ's own place in His absence.

15-17. If ye love me, keep my commandments. And I will pray the Father . . .—This connection seems designed to teach that the proper temple for the indwelling Spirit of Jesus is a heart filled with that love to Him which lives actively for Him, and so this was the fitting preparation for the promised gift.

that he may abide with you for ever—never go away, as Jesus was going to do in the body.

ADAM CLARKE

15. If ye love me, keep my commandments. Do not be afflicted at the thought of My being separated from you; the most solid proof you can give of your attachment to and affection for Me is to keep My commandments. This I shall receive as a greater proof of your affection than your tears.

Another Comforter. The word paracletos signifies not only a comforter, but also an "advocate," a "defender" of a cause, a "counsellor, patron, mediator." Christ is thus termed, 1 John ii. 1, where the common translation renders the word "advocate." Christ is thus called because He is represented as transacting the concerns of our souls with God; and for this cause, He tells us, He goes unto the Father, v. 12. The Holy Spirit is thus called because He transacts the cause of God and Christ with us, explains to us the nature and importance of the great atonement, shows the necessity of it, counsels us to receive it, instructs us how to lay hold on it, vindicates our claim to it, and makes intercessions in us with unutterable groanings. As Christ acted with His disciples while He sojourned with them, so the Holy Ghost acts with those who believe in His name.

16. I will pray the Father. After having made an atonement for the sin of the world, I will become the Mediator between God and man; and through My mediation and intercession shall all the blessings of grace and glory be acquired.

For ever. As the death and atonement of Christ will be necessary to man till the conclusion of the world, so the office of the Holy Spirit must be continued among men till the end of time. Therefore says Christ, "He shall continue with you forever," teaching, comforting, advising, defending, and interceding for you and for all My followers to the end of time.

17. The Spirit of truth. The Spirit, or Holy Ghost, whose essential office is to manifest,

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

Observe how our Savior puts this if concerning love, in such a way as to teach us that love must be prior to obedience. The text is not, "Keep My commandments, and then love Me." No, we do not expect pure streams till the fountain is cleansed. Nor does He say, "Keep My commandments, and love Me at the same time," as two separate things, although that might in a measure correspond with truth. But love is put first, because it is first in importance and first in experience. "If ye love me"—we must begin with love: then "keep my commandments." Obedience must have love for its mother, nurse, and food. The essence of obedience lies in the hearty love which prompts the deed rather than in the deed itself. I can conceive it possible that a man might, in his outward life, keep Christ's commandments, and yet might never keep them at all so as to be accepted before God. If he became obedient by compulsion, but would have disobeyed if he dared, then his heart was not right before God, and his actions were of little worth. The commandments are to be kept out of love to Him who gave them. In obedience, to love is to live: if we love Christ we live Christ. Love to the person of our Lord is the very salt of our sacrifices. To put it most practically, I often say to myself, "Today I have performed all the duties of my office; but have I been careful to abide in my Lord's love? I have not failed as to doing all that was possible to me; I have gone from early morning till late at night, packing as much work as possible into every hour, and trying to do it with all my heart. But have I, after all, done this as unto the Lord and for His sake?" I tremble lest I should serve God merely because I happen to be a minister and am called to preach His word; or because the natural routine of the day carries me through it. I am concerned that I may be impelled by no force but the love of Jesus. This fear often humbles me in the dust, and prevents all glorying in what I have done.

should do his work in a spiritual way and manner.

(2) He is the Spirit of truth. He will be true to you, and to his undertaking for you. He will teach you the truth. The Spirit of truth shall not only lead you into all truth, but others by your ministry. Christ is the truth, and he is the Spirit of Christ.

(3) He is one whom the world cannot receive; but you know him. Therefore he abideth with you. The disciples of Christ are here distinguished from the world; they are the children and heirs of another world, not of this. It is the misery of those that are invincibly devoted to the world that they cannot receive the Spirit of truth. Where the spirit of the world has the ascendant, the Spirit of God is excluded. Therefore men cannot receive the Spirit of truth because they see him not, neither know him. The comforts of the Spirit are foolishness to them, as much as ever the cross of Christ was. Speak to the children of this world of the operations of the Spirit, and you are as a barbarian to them. The best knowledge of the Spirit of truth is that which is got by experience: You know him, for he dwelleth with you. Christ had dwelt with them, and by their acquaintance with him they could not but know the Spirit of truth. The experiences of the saints are the explications of the promises. He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you, for the blessed Spirit doth not use to shift his lodging. Those that know him know how to invite him and bid him welcome; and therefore he shall be in them, as the light in the air, as the sap in the tree, and their union with him inseparable. The gift of the Holy Ghost is a peculiar gift, bestowed upon the disciples of Christ in a distinguishing way—upon them, and not the world. No comforts are comparable to those which make no show, make no noise.

When friends are parting, it is a common request they make to each other, "Pray let us hear from you as often as you can": this Christ engaged to his disciples, that out of sight they should not be out of mind.

I. He promises that he would continue his care of them (v. 18): "I will not leave you orphans, or fatherless; I will come to you." His departure from them was neither total nor final. Not total. "Though I leave you without my bodily presence, yet I do not leave you without comfort." The case of true believers, though sometimes it may be sorrowful, is never comfortless, because they are never orphans: for God is their Father. Not final: I will come to you. "I will come speedily to you at my resurrection." He had often said, The third day I will rise again. "I will be coming daily to you in my Spirit"; in the tokens of his love, and visits of his grace, he is still coming. The consideration of Christ's coming to us saves us from being comfortless in his removals from us.

II. He promises that they should continue their acquaintance with him (v. 19, 20): Yet a little while, and the world sees me no more. The malignant world thought they had seen enough of him, and cried, Away with him, crucify him; and so shall their doom be; they shall see him no more. But his disciples have communion with him in his absence.

1. You see me. They saw him with their bodily eyes after his resurrection. And then were the disciples glad when they saw the Lord. They saw him with an eye of faith after his ascension; saw that in him which the world saw not.

2. Because I live, you shall live also. That which grieved them was, that their Master was dying, and they counted upon nothing else but to die with him. No, saith Christ, I live. Not only, I shall live, as he saith of them, but, I do live. We are not comfortless, while we know that our Redeemer lives. Therefore you shall live also. The life of Christians is bound up in the life of Christ; as sure and as long as he lives, those that by faith are united to him shall live also. This life is hid with Christ; if the head and root live, the members and branches live also.

3. You shall have the assurance of this (v. 20): At that day you shall know that I am in my Father, and you in me, and I in you. These glorious mysteries will be fully known in heaven. Now it appears not what we shall be, but then it will appear what we were. They were more fully known after the pouring out of the Spirit upon the apostles; at that day divine light should shine, and their eyes should see more clearly, like the blind man's at the second touch of Christ's hand, who at first only saw men as trees walking. They are known by all that receive the Spirit of truth. They know that Christ is in the Father, is one with the Father, by their experience of what he has wrought for them and in them. That Christ is in them. That they are in Christ, for the relation is mutual. Christ in them and they in Christ, which

17. whom the world cannot receive . . .—(See I Cor. 2:14). he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you—Though the proper fulness of both these was yet future, our Lord, by using both the present and the future, seems plainly to say that they already had the germ of this great blessing.

18-20. I will not leave you comfortless—in a bereaved and desolate condition; or (as Margin) "orphans." I will come to you—"I come" or "am coming" to you; i.e., plainly by the Spirit, since it was to make His departure to be no bereavement.

19. world seeth—beholdeth—me no more, but ye see—behold—me—His bodily presence, being all the sight of Him which "the world" ever had, or was capable of, it "beheld Him no more" after His departure to the Father; but by the coming of the Spirit, the presence of Christ was not only continued to His spiritually enlightened disciples, but rendered far more efficacious and blissful than His bodily presence had been before the Spirit's coming. because I live—not 'shall live,' only when raised from the dead; for it is His unextinguishable, divine life of which He speaks, in view of which His death and resurrection were but as shadows passing over the sun's glorious disk. (Cf. Luke 24: 5; Rev. 1:18, "the Living One"). And this grand saying Jesus uttered with death immediately in view. What a brightness does this throw over the next clause, "ye shall live also!" "Knowest thou not," said LUTHER to the King of Terrors, "that thou didst devour the Lord Christ, but wert obliged to give Him back, and wert devoured of Him? So thou must leave me undevoured because I abide in Him, and live and suffer for His name's sake. Men may hunt me out of the world—that I care not for—but I shall not on that account abide in death. I shall live with my Lord Christ, since I know and believe that He liveth!" [quoted in STIER]. 20. At that day—of the Spirit's coming. ye shall know that I am in my Father, ye in me, I in you—(See on ch. 17: 22, 23).

vindicate, and apply the truth. The world cannot receive. By the world, John means those who are influenced only by the desire of the flesh, the desire of the eye, and the pride of life, 1 John ii. 16. Now these cannot receive the Spirit of truth, because they see him not, have no spiritual discernment, attend to nothing but the dictates of their corrupt passions and affections, and will admit of no influence but what can be an object of their senses. But ye know him. You have already received a measure of the truth, and you believe in this Spirit. Probably our Lord refers to the knowledge which they should afterwards attain; in this sense the passage has been understood by the Vulgate—"Ye shall know him." For he dwelleth with you. Or, "He shall dwell with you"; and this, it is very evident, is the meaning of the Evangelist, who not unfrequently uses the present for the future tense.

18. I will not leave you comfortless. Literally, "orphans." The disciples of a particular teacher among the Hebrews called him "father"; his scholars were called his children, and, on his death, were considered as orphans. Christ calls His disciples "children, beloved children," chap. xiii. 33; and now that He is about to be removed from them by death, He assures them that they shall not be left fatherless, or without a teacher; for in a little time He should come again (rise from the dead), and after His ascension they should be made partakers of that Spirit which would be their Comforter, Advocate, Teacher, and Guide forever.

19. Because I live. As surely as I shall rise from the dead, so shall you. My resurrection shall be the proof and pledge of yours. And because I live a life of intercession for you at the right hand of God, you shall live a life of grace and peace here, and a life of glory hereafter.

20. That I am in my Father. After My resurrection, you shall be more fully convinced of this important truth, that I and the Father are one; for I will live in you by the energy of My Spirit, and you shall live in Me by faith, love, and obedience.

speaks an intimate and inseparable union. Union with Christ is the life of believers. The knowledge of this union is their unspeakable joy and satisfaction.

III. He promises that he would love them, and manifest himself to them, v. 21–24.

1. Who they are whom Christ will accept as lovers of him; those that have his commandments, and keep them. The kind things he here said to his disciples were intended not for those only that were now his followers, but for all that should believe in him through their word. The duty of those who claim the dignity of being disciples. Having Christ's commandments, we must keep them. Having them in our heads, we must keep them in our hearts and lives. The dignity of those that do the duty of disciples. Not those that have the greatest wit and know how to talk for him, or the greatest estate to lay out for him, but those that keep his commandments. The surest evidence of our love to Christ is obedience to the laws of Christ.

2. What returns he will make to them for their love. (1) They shall have the Father's love: He that loveth me shall be loved of my Father. We could not love God if he did not first give us his grace to love him. He loves them, and lets them know that he loves them. God so loves the Son as to love all those that love him. (2) They shall have Christ's love: And I will love him. God will love him as a Father, and I will love him as a brother, an elder brother. In the nature of God, nothing shines more brightly than this, that God is love. And in the undertaking of Christ nothing appears more glorious than this, that he loved us. Christ was now leaving his disciples, but promises to continue his love to them. He bears them on his heart, and ever lives interceding for them. (3) They shall have the comfort of that love: I will manifest myself to him. Being promised to all that love him and keep his commandments, it must be construed so as to extend to them.

3. What occurred upon Christ's making this promise.

(1) One of the disciples expresses his wonder and surprise at it, v. 22. [1] Who it was that said this—Judas, not Iscariot. Two of Christ's disciples were of that name: one of them was the traitor, the other was the brother of James (Luke vi. 16). There was a very good man, and a very bad man, called by the same name; for names commend us not to God, nor do they make men worse. Judas the apostle was never the worse, nor Judas the apostate ever the better, for being namesakes. The evangelist carefully distinguishes between them. Take heed of mistaking; let us not confound the precious and the vile. [2] What he said—Lord how is it? First, The weakness of his understanding. He expected the temporal kingdom of the Messiah, that it should appear in external pomp and power. "What is the matter now, that thou wilt not show thyself openly as is expected." Secondly, The strength of his affections. Lord, how is it? He is amazed at the condescensions of divine grace. What is there in us to deserve so great a favour? It is justly marvellous in our eyes; for it is unaccountable, and must be resolved into free and sovereign grace.

(2) Christ explains and confirms what he had said, v. 23, 24.

[1] He further explains the condition of the promise, which was loving him, and keeping his commandments. Love is the root, obedience is the fruit. Where a sincere love to Christ is in the heart, there will be obedience: "If a man love me indeed, he will keep my words." Where love is, duty follows of course, is easy and natural, and flows from a principle of gratitude. Where there is no true love to Christ there will be no care to obey him: He that loveth me not keepeth not my sayings, v. 24. Certainly those do not love him that believe not his truths, and obey not his laws, to whom Christ's sayings are but as idle tales, which he heeds not, or hard sayings, which he likes not. Why should Christ be familiar with those that will be strange to him?

[2] He further explains the promise (v. 23): If a man thus love me, I will manifest myself to him. My Father will love him; this he had said before (v. 21), and here repeats it for the confirming of our faith. Jude wondered that Christ should manifest himself to them. We will come unto him, and make our abode with him. Not only, I will, but We will, I and the Father. Wherever Christ is formed the image of God is stamped. Not only, "I will show myself to him at a distance," but, "We will come to him, to be near him, to be with him." Not only, "I will give him a transient view of me, or make him a short and running visit," but, We will take up our abode with him. God will not only love obedient believers, but he will rest in love to them. He will be with them as at his home.

[3] He gives a good reason both to bind us to observe the condition and encourage us to depend

21. He that hath my commandments and keepeth them . . .—(See on vss. 15, 16). my Father and I will love him—Mark the sharp line of distinction here, not only between the Divine Persons but the actings of love in Each respectively, towards true disciples.

22. Judas saith . . . , not Iscariot—Beautiful parenthesis this! The traitor being no longer present, we needed not to be told that this question came not from him. But it is as if the Evangelist had said, "A very different Judas from the traitor, and a very different question from any that he would have put. Indeed [as one in STIER says], we never read of Iscariot that he entered in any way into his Master's words, or ever put a question even of rash curiosity (though it may be he did, but that nothing from him was deemed fit for immortality in the Gospels but his name and treason). "how . . . manifest thyself to us, and not to the world—a most natural and proper question, founded on vs. 19, though interpreters speak against it as Jewish.

23. we will come and make our abode with him—Astonishing statement! In the Father's "coming" He "refers to the revelation of Him as a Father to the soul, which does not take place till the Spirit comes into the heart, teaching it to cry, Abba, Father" [OLSHAUSEN]. The "abode" means a permanent, eternal stay! (Cf. Lev. 26:11, 12: Ezek. 37:26, 27; II Cor. 6:16; and contrast Jer. 14: 8).

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

In like manner, our Lord says, the practical obedience to His commandments is the sure sign and test of love. I need not dwell upon that. There are two motives for keeping commandments—one because they are commandments, and one because we love Him that commands. The one is slavery, the other is liberty. The one is like the Arctic regions, cold and barren; the other is like tropical lands, full of warmth and sunshine, glorious and glad fertility.

The form of the sentence suggests how easy it is for people to delude themselves about their love to Jesus Christ. That emphatic "he" and the putting first of the character before its root is pointed out are directed against false pretensions to love. The love that Christ stamps with His hallmark, and passes as genuine, is no mere emotion, however passionate, however sweet; no mere sentiment, however pure, however deep. The tiniest little rivulet that drives a mill is better than a Niagara that rushes and foams and tumbles idly. And there is much so-called love to Jesus Christ that goes masquerading up and down the world, from which the paint is stripped by the sharp application of the words of my text. Character and conduct are the true demonstrations of Christian love, and it is only love so attested that He accepts.—Expositions of Holy Scripture

21. He it is that loveth me. See on v. 15. And will manifest myself to him. All My faithful disciples shall see Me after My resurrection; and I will manifest My power and goodness to all those who believe in and obey Me, even to the end of the world.

22. Judas. The same as Thaddeus and Lebbeus, the brother of James, and author of what is called the Epistle of Jude. How is it? Or, "How can it be?"—"What is to happen?"—On what account is it? Judas, who was probably thinking that the kingdom of Christ should extend over all the earth, wonders how this can be, and yet Christ manifest himself only to His disciples and not to the world, v. 19. To this our Lord, in a more express manner than He had done before, answers:

23. If a man. Not only My present disciples, but all those who shall believe on Me through their word, or that of their successors. Love me. Receive me as his Saviour, and get the love of God shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost. He will keep my words. Observe all My sayings, and have his affections and conduct regulated by My Spirit and doctrine. My Father will love him. Call him His child; support, defend, and preserve him as such.

And we will come unto him. God the Father, through His Son, will continue to pour out His choicest blessings upon his head and upon his heart. And make our abode with him. Will make his heart our temple, where God, the Father, Son, and Spirit, shall rest, receive homage, and dwell to eternity.

MATTHEW HENRY

upon the promise. The word which you hear is not mine, but his that sent me, v. 24. To this purport he had often spoken (ch. vii. 16). The stress of duty is laid upon the precept of Christ as our rule. The stress of our comfort is laid upon the promise of Christ. It concerns us to enquire whether the security be sufficient for us to venture our all upon; and this satisfies us that it is, that the promise is not Christ's bare word, but the Father's which sent him.

Two things Christ here comforts his disciples with:

I. That they should be under the tuition of his Spirit, v. 25, 26. Christ would have them reflect upon the instructions he had given them: These things have I spoken unto you being yet present with you. What he had said he did not retract. What he had spoken he had spoken, and would abide by it. Christ would find out a way of speaking to them after his departure from them, v. 26.

(1) On whose account he should be sent: "The Father will send him in my name; that is, for my sake." He came in his Father's name: the Spirit comes in his name to carry on his undertaking.

(2) On what errand he should be sent: He shall teach you all things. He shall teach them all things necessary for them either to learn themselves, or to teach others; for those that would teach the things of God must first themselves be taught of God. He shall bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you. Many a good lesson Christ had taught them, which they had forgotten. The Spirit shall not teach them a new gospel, but bring to their minds that which they had been taught, by leading them into the understanding of it. To all the saints the Spirit of grace is given to be a remembrancer.

II. That they should be under the influence of his peace (v. 27): Peace I leave with you. When Christ was about to leave the world he made his will. His soul he committed to his Father; his body he bequeathed to Joseph, to be decently interred; his clothes fell to the soldiers; his mother he left to the care of John: but what should he leave to his poor disciples, that had left all for him? Silver and gold he had none; but he left them that which was infinitely better, his peace. "I leave you, but I leave my peace with you." He did not part in anger, but in love; for this was his farewell, Peace I leave with you.

1. The legacy that is here bequeathed: Peace, my peace. Peace is put for all good. Peace is put for reconciliation and love; the peace bequeathed is peace with God. Peace in our own bosoms seems to be especially meant. It is the peace on which the angels congratulated men at his birth, Luke ii. 14.

2. To whom this legacy is bequeathed: "To you, my disciples and followers." This legacy was left to them and their successors, to them and all true Christians in all ages.

3. In what manner it is left: Not as the world giveth, give I unto you. "I do not compliment you with Peace be unto you; no, it is not a mere formality, but a real blessing. The gifts I give to you are not such as this world gives." The world's gifts concern only the body and time; Christ's gifts enrich the soul for eternity. The peace which Christ gives is infinitely more valuable than that which the world gives. As is the difference between a killing lethargy and a reviving refreshing sleep, such is the difference between Christ's peace and the world's.

4. What use they should make of it: Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid. This comes in here as the conclusion of the whole matter; he had said (v. 1), Let not your heart be troubled, and here he repeats it as that for which he had now given sufficient reason.

Christ here gives his disciples another reason why their hearts should not be troubled for his going away; and that is, because his heart was not. He comforted himself,

I. That, though he went away, he should come again: "You have heard how I have said, I go away, and come again." Christ encouraged himself with this, in his sufferings and death, that he should come again, and the same should comfort us in our departure at death; we go away to come again; the leave we take of our friends at that parting is only a good night, not a final farewell.

II. That he went to his Father: "If you loved me, you would rejoice because, though I leave you, I go unto the Father; for my Father is greater than I." It is matter of joy. His departure had a bright side as well as a dark side. The reason of this is, because the Father is greater than he. His state with his Father would be much more excellent and glorious 25, 26. he shall teach you all things, and bring all to . . . remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you—(See on vss. 16, 17). As the Son came in the Father's name, so the Father shall send the Spirit "in My name," says Jesus, i.e., with like divine power and authority to reproduce in their souls what Christ taught them, "bringing to living consciousness what lay like slumbering germs in their minds" [OLSHAUSEN]. On this rests the credibility and ultimate divine authority of THE GOSPEL HISTORY. The whole of what is here said of THE SPIRIT is decisive of His divine personality. "He who can regard all the personal expressions, applied to the Spirit in these three chapters ("teaching," "reminding," "testifying," "coming," "convincing," "guiding," "speaking," "hearing," "prophesying," "taking") as being no other than a long drawnout figure, deserves not to be recognized even as an interpreter of intelligible words, much less an expositor of Holy Scripture" [STIER]. 27. Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you—If the two preceding verses sounded like a note of preparation for drawing the discourse to a close, this would sound like a farewell. But oh, how different from ordinary adieus! It is a parting word, but of richest import, the customary "peace" of a parting friend sublimed and transfigured. As "the Prince of Peace" (Isa. 9:6) He brought it into flesh, carried it about in His Own Person ("My peace") died to make it ours, left it as the heritage of His disciples upon earth, implants and maintains it by His Spirit in their hearts. Many a legacy is "left" that is never "given" to the legatee, many a gift destined that never reaches its proper object. But Christ is the Executor of His own Testament; the peace He "leaves" He "gives"; Thus all is secure. not as the world giveth—in contrast with the world, He gives sincerely, substantially, eternally.

28. If ye loved me, ye would rejoice, because I said, I go unto the Father, for my Father is greater than I—These words, which Arians and Socinians perpetually quote as triumphant evidence against the proper Divinity of Christ, really yield no intelligible sense on their principles. Were a holy man on his deathbed, beholding his friends in 24. He that loveth me not. Hence we learn that the man who is not obedient to the testimonies of Christ does not love Him.

26. He shall teach you all things. If in the things which I have already spoken to you there appear to you any obscurity, the Holy Spirit, the Advocate, Counsellor, and Instructor, will take away all your doubts, free you from all embarrassment, and give you a perfect understanding in all things; and this Spirit ye shall shortly receive. And bring all things to your remembrance. Here Christ promises them that inspiration of the Holy Spirit which enabled them not only to give a true history of His life and death, but also gave them the most perfect recollection of all the words which He had spoken to them, so that they have been able to transmit to posterity the identical words which Jesus uttered in His sermons, and in His different discourses with them, the Jews, and others.

27. Peace I leave with you. The Jewish form of salutation and benediction. A wish of peace among them is thus to be understood. "May you prosper in body and soul, and enjoy every earthly and heavenly good!" My peace I give unto you. Such tranquillity of soul, such uninterrupted happiness of mind, such everlasting friendship with God as I enjoy, may ye all enjoy! And such blessedness I bequeath unto you; it is My last, My best, My dying legacy. Not as the world giveth. Not as the Jews, in empty wishes; not as the people of the world, in empty compliments. Their salutations and benedictions are generally matters of custom and polite ceremony, given without desire or design; but I mean what I say. What I wish you, that I will give you. To His followers Jesus gives peace, procures it, preserves it, and establishes it. He is the Author, Prince, Promoter, and Keeper of peace. Neither let it be afraid. Let not your heart "shrink back" through fear of any approaching evil. This is the proper meaning of the word. In a few hours you will be most powerfully assaulted, but stand firm. The evil will fall only upon Me; and this evil will result in your comfort and salvation, and in the redemption of a lost world.

28. I go away. To the Father by My death. And come again unto you. By My resurrection. Ye would rejoice. Because, as the Messiah, I am going to receive a Kingdom, and power, and glory, forever. Therefore as My friends you should rejoice in My elevation, though for a while it may put you to the pain of being separated from Me. Besides, I am going that I may send you the Holy Spirit, who shall fill you with the fullness of God. On your own account, therefore, you should have rejoiced and not mourned. My Father is greater than I.

than his present state. Christ raises the thoughts and expectations of his disciples to something greater than that in which now they thought all their happiness bound up. The kingdom of the Father will be greater than the mediatorial kingdom. The disciples of Christ should show that they love him by their rejoicing in the glories of his exaltation. Many that love Christ, let their love run out in a wrong channel; they think if they love him they must be continually in pain because of him; whereas those that love him should rejoice in Christ Jesus.

III. That his going away would be a means of confirming the faith of his disciples (v. 29): I have told you before it come to pass, that, when it is come to pass, you might believe. See this reason, ch. xiii. 19; xvi. 4. Christ told his disciples of his death because it would afterwards redound to the confirmation of their faith. He who foretold these things had a divine prescience. The things foretold were according to the divine purpose. Let them therefore not be troubled at that which would be for the confirmation of their faith.

IV. That he was sure of a victory over Satan (v. 30): "Henceforth I will not talk much with you." He had a great deal of good talk with them after this (ch. xv. and xvi.), but, in comparison with what he had said, it was not much. One reason why he would not talk much with them was because he had now other work to apply himself to: The prince of this world comes. He called the devil the prince of this world, ch. xii. 31. Christ tells them that the prince of this world was his enemy. But he has nothing in me. 1. The prospect Christ had of an approaching conflict, not only with men, but with the powers of darkness. The devil had set upon him with his temptations (Matt. iv), had offered him the kingdoms of this world. Then the devil departed from him for a season. "But now," says Christ, "I see him rallying again." The foresight of a temptation gives us great advantage in our resistance of it; for, being forewarned, we should be forearmed. 2. The assurance he had of good success in the conflict: He hath nothing in me. There was no guilt in Christ. Christ having done no evil, Satan, though he prevailed to crucify him, could not prevail to terrify him; though he hurried him to death, yet not to despair. When Satan comes to disquiet us, he has something in us to perplex us with, for we have all sinned; but, when he would disturb Christ, he found no occasion against him. There was no corruption in Christ. Such was the spotless purity of his nature that he was above the possibility of sinning.

V. That his departure was in obedience to his Father. That the world may know that I love the Father, v. 31.

1. Confirming what he had often said, that his undertaking, as Mediator, was a demonstration to the world, of his compliance with the Father. As it was an evidence of his love to man that he died for his salvation, so it was of his love to God that he died for his glory. It demonstrates also his obedience to his Father: "As the Father gave me commandment, even so I do." The best evidence of our love to the Father is our doing as he hath given us commandment. The command of God is sufficient to bear us out in that which is most disputed by others, and therefore should be sufficient to bear us up in that which is most difficult to ourselves.

2. Concluding what he had now said; that the world may know that I love the Father. You shall see how cheerfully I can meet the appointed cross: "Arise, let us go hence." When we talk of troubles at a distance, it is easy to say, Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. When an unavoidable cross lies in the way of duty, then to say, "Arise, let us go to meet it," instead of going out of our way to miss it, this lets the world know that we love the Father. In these words he gives his disciples an encouragement to follow him. He does not say, I must go; but, Let us go. He calls them out to no hardships but what he himself goes before them in as their leader. He gives them an example, teaching them at all times to sit loose to all things here below, and often to think and speak of leaving them. When we sit down under Christ's shadow with delight, and say, It is good to be here; yet we must think of rising and going hence; going down from the mount.

tears at the prospect of losing him, to say, "Ye ought rather to joy than weep for me, and would if ye really loved me, "the speech would be quite natural. But if they should ask him, why joy at his departure was more suitable than sorrow, would they not start back with astonishment, if not horror, were he to reply, "Because my Father is greater than I?" Does not this strange speech from Christ's lips, then, presuppose such teaching on His part as would make it extremely difficult for them to think He could gain anything by departing to the Father, and make it necessary for Him to say expressly that there was a sense in which He could do so? Thus, this startling explanation seems plainly intended to correct such misapprehensions as might arise from the emphatic and reiterated teaching of His proper equality with the Father—as if so Exalted a Person were incapable of any accession by transition from this dismal scene to a cloudless heaven and the very bosom of the Father—and by assuring them that this was not the case, to make them forget their own sorrow in His approaching joy. 30, 31. Hereafter I will not talk much with you—'I have a little more to say, but My work hastens apace, and the approach of the adversary will cut it short.'

for the prince of this world—See on ch. 12:31. cometh—with hostile intent, for a last grand attack, having failed in His first formidable assault (Luke 4) from which he "departed [only] for a season" (vs. 13). and hath nothing in me—nothing of His own—nothing to fasten on. Glorious saying! The truth of it is, that which makes the Person and Work of Christ the life of the world (Heb. 9:14; I John 3:5; II Cor. 5:21.

31. But that the world may know that I love the Father . . .—The sense must be completed thus: 'But to the Prince of the world, though he has nothing in Me, I shall yield Myself up even unto death, that the world may know that I love and obey the Father, whose commandment it is that I give My life a ransom for many.' Arise, let us go hence—Did they then, at this stage of the discourse, leave the supper room, as some able interpreters conclude? If so, we think our Evangelist would have mentioned it: see ch. 18:1, which seems clearly to intimate that they then only left the upper room. But what do the words mean if not this? We think it was the dictate of that saying of earlier date, "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished!"—a spontaneous and irrepressible expression of the deep eagerness of His spirit to get into the conflict, and that if, as is likely, it was responded to somewhat too literally by the guests who hung on His lips, in the way of a movement to depart, a wave of His hand, would be enough to show that He had yet more to say ere they broke up; and that disciple, whose pen was dipped in a love to his Master which made their movements of small consequence save when essential to the illustration of His words, would record this little outburst of the Lamb hastening to the slaughter, in the very midst of His lofty discourse; while the effect of it, if any, upon His hearers, as of no consequence, would naturally enough be passed over.

ADAM CLARKE

In v. 24, Christ tells His disciples that the Father had sent Him; i.e., in His quality of Messiah, He was sent by the Father to instruct and to save mankind. Now, as the sender is greater than the sent, chap. xiii. 16, so in this sense is the Father greater than the Son; and in this sense was the passage understood by Origen, Jerome, Novatian, and Vigilius, who read the text thus: "The Father, who sent me, is greater than I."

29. I have told you before it come to pass. Lest My death should be a stumbling block to you, I have spoken of it beforehand, and showed you the necessity of it, that when it happens you may believe that, as I could predict it so clearly and so circumstantially, so all the good which I have promised shall be the result may be confidently expected by you; and that your sorrow, if not entirely removed, may at least be much mitigated.

30. The prince of this world. Of this is omitted by many MSS. I rather think the omission of the pronoun makes the sense more general; for had He said this world, the words might have been restrained to the Jewish state or to the Roman government. But who is the person called here the prince of the world? Mr. Wakefield thinks that Christ speaks here of himself, as He does in chap. xii. 31, and translates this verse and the following thus: "For the ruler of this world is coming; and I have nothing now to do, but to convince the world that I love the Father, and do as he commanded me." Others think that our Lord refers to the Roman government, the ruler of the world, who, by its deputy, Pilate, was going to judge Him, but who should "find nothing" (which is the reading found in some excellent MSS. and versions, and is followed by almost all the primitive fathers) as a just cause of death in Him; and this indeed Pilate witnessed in the most solemn manner. See chap. xviii. 38; xix. 4, 12; see also Luke xxiii. 4, etc., and Matt. xxvii. 24. But the most general opinion is that Satan is meant, who is called the "prince of the power of the air," Eph. ii. 2; and who is supposed to be the same that is called "the god of this world," 2 Cor. iv. 4; and who at his last and most desperate trial, the agony in the garden, should be convinced that there was nothing of his nature in Christ, nothing that would coincide with his solicitations, and that he should find himself completely foiled in all his attacks, and plainly foresee the impending ruin of his kingdom. It is very difficult to ascertain the real meaning here; of the different opinions proposed above, the reader must take that which he deems the most likely.

31. Arise, let us go hence. Calmet supposes that Christ, having rendered thanks to God, and sung the usual hymn, Matt. xxvi. 30; Mark xiv. 26, rose from the table, left the city, and went towards the Garden of Olives, or Garden of Gethsemane, on the road to which a part of the following discourse was delivered. It was now about midnight, and the moon was almost full, it being the fourteenth day of her age, about the time in which the Jewish Passover was to be slain.

Here Christ discourses concerning the fruit, the fruits of the Spirit, under the similitude of a vine.

I. The doctrine of this similitude.

1. Jesus Christ is the vine, the true vine. He is pleased to speak of himself under low and humble comparisons. He is the vine, planted in the vineyard, and not a spontaneous product; planted in the earth, for he is the Word made flesh. The vine is a spreading plant, and Christ will be known as salvation to the ends of the earth. The fruit of the vine honours God and cheers man, so does the fruit of Christ's mediation. He is the true vine, as truth is opposed to pretence and counterfeit. Unfruitful trees are said to lie, but Christ is a vine that will not deceive.

2. Believers are branches of this vine, which supposes that Christ is the root of the vine. The root bears the tree (Rom. xi. 18), diffuses sap to it, and is all in all to its flourishing and fruitfulness; and in Christ are all supports and supplies. The branches of the vine are many, yet, meeting in the root, are all but one vine; thus all good Christians, though in place and opinion distant from each other, yet meet in Christ, the centre of their unity.

3. The Father is the husbandman, the land-worker. Though the earth is the Lord's, it yields him no fruit unless he work it. God has not only a propriety in, but a care of, the vine and all the branches. Never was any husbandman so wise, so watchful, about his vineyard, as God is about his church, which therefore must needs prosper.

II. The duty taught us by this similitude.

1. We must be fruitful. From a vine we look for grapes, and from a Christian we look for Christianity; this is the fruit, a Christian temper and disposition, a Christian life and conversation. We must honour God, and do good, and this is bearing fruit. The disciples here must be fruitful, as Christians, in all the fruits of righteousness, and as apostles, in diffusing the savour of the knowledge of Christ.

(1) The doom of the unfruitful (v. 2): They are taken away. It is here intimated that there are many who pass for branches in Christ who yet do not bear fruit. Being only tied to him by the thread of an outward profession, though they seem to be branches, they will soon be seen to be dry ones. Unfruitful professors are unfaithful professors; professors, and no more. It is here threatened that they shall be taken away.

(2) The promise made to the fruitful: He purgeth them, that they may bring forth more fruit. Further fruitfulness is the blessed reward of forward fruitfulness. Even fruitful branches, in order to their further fruitfulness, have need of purging or pruning. The best have that in them which is peccant; some notions, passions, or humours, that want to be purged away. These shall be taken off by degrees in the proper season. The purging of fruitful branches is the care and work of the great husbandman.

(3) The benefits which believers have. Now you are clean, v. 3. Their society was clean, now that Judas was expelled. Till they were got clear of him they were not all clean. They were each of them clean, that is, sanctified, by the truth of Christ (ch. xvii. 17). Apply it to all believers. The word of Christ is spoken to them; there is a cleansing virtue in that word. It cleanses as fire cleanses the gold from its dross, and as physic cleanses the body from its disease.

(4) The glory that will redound to God by our fruitfulness, v. 8. If we bear much fruit, herein our Father will be glorified. The fruitfulness of all Christians is to the glory of God. By the eminent good works of Christians many are brought to glorify our Father who is in heaven. So shall we be Christ's disciples indeed. So shall we both evidence our discipleship and adorn it, and be to our Master for a name and a praise. And the more fruit we bring forth, the more we abound in that which is good, the more he is glorified.

2. In order to our fruitfulness, we must abide in Christ.

(1) The duty enjoined (v. 4): Abide in me, and I in you. Those that are come to Christ must abide in him: "Abide in me, and I in you. Abide in me, and then fear not but I will abide in you"; for the communion between Christ and believers never fails on his side. The knot of the branch abides in the vine, and the sap of the vine abides in the branch, and so there is a constant communication between them.

(2) The necessity of our abiding in Christ, in order to our fruitfulness (v. 4, 5): "You cannot bring forth fruit, except you abide in me; but, if you do, you bring forth much fruit; for without me you can do nothing." So necessary is it to our happiness that we be fruitful, that the best argument to engage us to abide in Christ is, that otherwise we cannot be fruitful.

Vss. 1-27. Discourse at the Supper table Continued. 1-8. The spiritual oneness of Christ and His people, and His relation to them as the Source of all their spiritual life and fruitfulness, are here beautifully set forth by a figure familiar to Jewish ears (Isa. 5:1, etc.). I am the true vine—of whom the vine of nature is but a shadow.

my Father is the husbandman—the great Proprietor of the vineyard, the Lord of the spiritual kingdom. (It is surely unnecessary to point out the claim to supreme divinity involved in this.)

2. Every branch in me that beareth not fruit . . . every branch that beareth fruit—As in a fruit tree, some branches may be fruitful, others quite barren, according as there is a vital connection between the branch and the stock, or no vital connection; so the disciples of Christ may be spiritually fruitful or the reverse, according as they are vitally and spiritually connected with Christ, or but externally and mechanically attached to Him. The fruitless He "taketh away" (see on vs. 6); the fruitful He "purgeth" (cleanseth, pruneth)—stripping it, as the husbandman does, of what is rank (Mark 4:19), "that it may bring forth more fruit"; a process often painful, but no less needful and beneficial than in the natural husbandry.

3. Now—rather, 'Already.' ye are clean through—by reason of—the word I have spoken to you—already in a purified, fruitful condition, in consequence of the long action upon them of that searching "word" which was "as a refiner's fire" (Mal. 3:2, 3).

8. glorified that ye bear much fruit—not only from His delight in it for its own sake, but as from 'the juices of the Living Vine.' so shall ye be my disciples—evidence your discipleship.

4. Abide in me, and I in you; as the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine . . .—As all spiritual fruitfulness had been ascribed to the mutual inhabitation, and living, active interpenetration (so to speak) of Christ and His disciples, so here the keeping up of this vital connection is made essential to continued fruitfulness. 5. without me—apart, or vitally disconnected from Me. ye can do nothing—spiritually, acceptably.

F. B. MEYER:

The condition of fruitfulness. The vine is not able to do its work in the world without its branches; they stretch far from the root, to bear its strength and sweetness to those who stand outside the wall (Gen. 49:22). We need the Lord Jesus, but he also needs us. Without us he cannot bless men as he would. What a sublime thought is here—that Jesus needs something which I can yield him! Service to God and man is possible only through abiding union in him. Let us yield ourselves to be pruned by the Word that we may not need the pruning of awful sorrows. It is said that three out of five of the vineberries are cut off that the remainder may attain their full size. How many of our own promptings have to be excised in order that our best fruit may be yielded!—Bible Commentary

2. Every branch in me. I stand in the same relation to My followers, and they to Me, as the vine to the branches, and the branches to the vine. He taketh away. As the vinedresser will remove every unfruitful branch from the vine, so will My Father remove every unfruitful member from My mystical body—such as Judas, the unbelieving Jews, the apostatizing disciples, and all false and merely nominal Christians, who are attached to the vine by faith in the word and divine mission of Christ, while they live not in His life and Spirit and bring forth no fruit to the glory of God. He purgeth it. "He pruneth." The branch which bears not fruit, the husbandman "taketh it away." But the branch that beareth fruit, "He taketh away from it"; i.e., He prunes away excrescences, and removes everything that might hinder its increasing fruitfulness. The verb "I take away" signifies ordinarily to "cleanse, purge, purify," but is certainly to be taken in the sense of "pruning," or "cutting off," in this text.

3. Now ye are clean. "Ye are pruned." As our Lord has not changed the metaphor, it would be wrong to change the expression. Through the word. "Through that word"—that doctrine of holiness which I have incessantly preached unto you, and which you have received. Perhaps our Lord more immediately refers here to the words which He had spoken concerning Judas, chap. xiii. 21-30, in consequence of which Judas went out and finished his bargain with the chief priests. He being gone off, the body of the apostles was purified; and thus he might say, Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you.

8. Herein is my Father glorified. Or "honored." It is the honor of the husbandman to have good, strong, vigorous vines, plentifully laden with fruit. So it is the honor of God to have strong, vigorous, holy children, entirely freed from sin, and perfectly filled with His love.

4. Abide in me. Hold fast faith and a good conscience; and let no trials turn you aside from the truth. And I will abide in you—you shall receive every help and influence from Me that your souls can require in order to preserve and save them to eternal life.

5. Without me ye can do nothing. "Separated from Me, ye can do nothing at all." God can do without man, but man cannot do without God. Following the metaphor of our Lord, it would be just as possible to do any good without Him as for a branch to live, thrive, and bring forth fruit while cut off from that tree from which it not only derives its juices but its very existence also.

Abiding in Christ is necessary in order to our doing much good. He that is constant in the exercise of faith in Christ and love to him, bringeth forth much fruit. A life of faith in the Son of God is incomparably the most excellent life a man can live in this world. It is necessary to our doing any good. It is the root and spring of all good: "Without me you can do nothing: not only no great thing, but nothing." Without Christ we can do nothing aright, nothing that will be fruit pleasing to God or profitable to ourselves. We depend upon Christ, not only as the vine upon the wall, for support; but, as the branch on the root, for sap.

(3) The fatal consequences of forsaking Christ (v. 6): If any man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch. This is a description of the fearful state of hypocrites that are not in Christ. They are cast forth as dry and withered branches, which are plucked off because they cumber the tree. It is just that those who reject him should be rejected by him. Those that abide not in Christ shall be abandoned by him. They are withered, as a branch broken off from the tree. Those that abide not in Christ in a little time wither and come to nothing. Those that bear no fruit after a while will bear no leaves. Men gather them. Satan's agents and emissaries pick them up, and make an easy prey of them. They are burned; this follows, of course, but it is here added very emphatically, and makes the threatening very terrible.

(4) The blessed privilege which those have that abide in Christ (v. 7): If my words abide in you, you shall ask what you will and it shall be done. How our union with Christ is maintained: If you abide in me; he had said before, and I in you; here he explains himself, and my words abide in you. It is in the word that we receive and embrace him; and so where the word of Christ dwells richly there Christ dwells. If the word be in us as at home, then we abide in Christ, and he in us. How our communion with Christ is maintained: You shall ask what you will, and it shall be done to you. And what can we desire more than to have what we will for the asking? Those that abide in Christ as their heart's delight shall have, through Christ, their heart's desire. If we abide in Christ, and his word in us, we shall not ask anything but what is proper to be done for us. The promises abiding in us lie ready to be turned into prayers; and the prayers so regulated cannot but speed.

Christ, who is love itself, is here discoursing concerning love, a fourfold love.

I. Concerning the Father's love to him. 1. The Father did love him (v. 9): As the Father hath loved me. He was the Son of his love. And yet God so loved the world as to deliver him up for us all. Those whom God loves as a Father may despise the hatred of all the world. 2. He abode in his Father's love, v. 10. Because he continued to love his Father, he went cheerfully through his sufferings, and therefore his Father continued to love him. 3. Therefore he abode in his Father's love because he kept his Father's law: I have kept my Father's commandments, and so abide in his love. Christ satisfied for us by obeying the law of redemption, and so he abode in his love, and restored us to it.

II. Concerning his own love to his disciples. Though he leaves them, he loves them.

1. The pattern of this love: As the Father has loved me, so have I loved you. As the Father loved him, who was most worthy, he loved them, who were most unworthy. The Father loved him as his Son, and he loves them as his children. The Father was well pleased with him, that he might be well pleased with us in him; and loved him, that in him, as beloved, he might make us accepted.

2. The proofs and products of this love.

(1) Christ loved his disciples, for he laid down his life for them (v. 13): Greater love hath no man than this, to lay down his life for his friend. And this is the love wherewith Christ hath loved us. See the extent of the love of the children of men to one another. The highest proof of it is laying down one's life for a friend, to save his life. It is love in the highest degree, which is strong as death. See the excellency of the love of Christ. He has not only equalled, but exceeded, the most illustrious lovers. Others have thus laid down their lives for their friends, but Christ laid down his for us when we were enemies, Rom. v. 8, 10. Those hearts must be harder than iron or stone which are not softened by such incomparable sweetness of divine love.—Calvin.

(2) Christ loved his disciples, for he took them into a covenant of friendship with himself, v. 14, 15. The followers of Christ are the friends of Christ. Those that do the duty of his servants are admitted

6. If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch . . . withered . . . cast into the fire . . . burned—The one proper use of the vine is to bear fruit; failing this, it is good for one other thing—fuel. (See Ezek. 15:1-5.) How awfully striking the figure, in this view of it!

7. If ye abide in me, and my words . . . in you—Mark the change from the inhabitation of Himself to that of His words, paving the way for the subsequent exhortations (vss. 9, 10). ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you—because this indwelling of His words in them would secure the harmony of their askings with the divine will.

Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends—The emphasis lies not on "friends," but on "laying down his life" for them; i.e., 'One can show no greater regard for those dear to him than to give his life for them, and this is the love ye shall find in Me.'

14. Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you—hold yourselves in absolute subjection to Me.

ADAM CLARKE

6. If a man abide not in me. Our Lord in the plainest manner intimates that a person may as truly be united to Him as the branch is to the tree that produces it, and yet be afterwards cut off and cast into the fire, because he has not brought forth fruit to the glory of his God. No man can cut off a branch from a tree to which that branch was never united; it is absurd, and contrary to the letter and spirit of the metaphor, to talk of being "seemingly" in Christ—because this means nothing. If there was only a seeming union, there could be only a seeming excision. So the matter is just where it began; nothing is done on either side, and nothing said to any purpose. He is cast forth. Observe that person who abides not in Christ, in a believing, loving, obedient spirit, (1) Is cut off from Jesus, having no longer any right or title to Him or to His salvation. (2) He is withered—deprived of all the influences of God's grace and Spirit. (3) He is gathered—becomes (through the judgment of God) again united with backsliders like himself and other workers of iniquity. And, being abandoned to his own heart and Satan, he (4) is cast into the fire—separated from God's people, from God himself, and from the glory of His power. And (5) he is burned—is eternally tormented with the devil and his angels, and with all those who have lived and died in their iniquity.

7. If ye abide in me. Observe, (1) That in order to have influence with God, we must be united to Christ—if ye abide in me. (2) That in order to be preserved in this union, we must have our lives regulated by the doctrine of Christ—and my words abide in you. (3) That to profit by this union and doctrine, we must pray—ye shall ask. (4) That every heavenly blessing shall be given to those who continue in this union with a loving, obedient, praying spirit—ye shall ask what ye will.

13. That a man lay down his life for his friends. No man can carry his love for his friend farther than this; for when he gives up his life, he gives up all that he has. This proof of My love for you I shall give in a few hours, and the doctrine which I recommend to you I am just going to exemplify myself.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

What shall we say about these mysterious and profound first words of this verse? They carry us into the very depths of divinity, and suggest for us that wonderful analogy between the relation of the Father to the Son, and that of the Son to His disciples, which appears over and over again in the solemnities of these last hours and words of Jesus. Christ here claims to be, in a unique and solitary fashion, the object of the Father's love, and He claims to be able to love like God. "As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you"; as deeply, as purely, as fully, as eternally, and with all the unnameable perfectnesses which must belong to the divine affection, does Christ declare that He loves us.

I know not whether the majesty and uniqueness of His nature stand out more clearly in the one or in the other of these assertions. As beloved of God, and as loving like God, He equally claims for himself a place which none other can fill, and declares that the love which falls on us from His pierced and bleeding heart is really the love of God.

In this mysterious, awful, tender, perfect affection, He exhorts us to abide. That comes yet closer to our hearts than the other phrase of which it is the modification, and in some sense the explanation. The command to abide in Him suggests much that is blessed, but to have all that mysterious abiding in Him resolved into abiding in His love is infinitely tenderer, and draws us still closer to himself.—Expositions of Holy Scripture and advanced to the dignity of his friends. This honour have all Christ's servants. Christ takes believers to be his friends. Though they often show themselves unfriendly, he is a friend that loves at all times. He will not call them servants. He will call them his friends; he will not only love them, but will let them know it. Though Christ called them his friends, they called themselves his servants: Peter, a servant of Christ (1 Pet. i. 1), and so James, ch. i. 1. The more honour Christ puts upon us, the more honour we should study to do him; the higher in his eyes, the lower in our own.

(3) Christ loved his disciples, for he was very free in communicating his mind to them (v. 15). "All things that I have heard of my Father I have declared unto you." Jesus Christ has faithfully handed to us what he received of the Father, Matt. xi. 27. The great things relating to man's redemption Christ declared to his disciples, that they might declare them to others.

(4) Christ loved his disciples, for he chose and ordained them (v. 16): I have chosen you, and ordained you. His love to them appeared,

[1] In their election to their apostleship: I have chosen you twelve. It did not begin on their side: You have not chosen me, but I first chose you. It is fit that Christ should have the choosing of his own ministers; still he does it. Though ministers make that holy calling their own choice, Christ's choice is prior to theirs and directs and determines it.

[2] In their ordination: I have ordained you; "I have put you into commission." It was a mighty confidence he reposed in them. The treasure of the gospel was committed to them that it might be propagated; that you may go from place to place all the world over, and bring forth fruit. They were ordained, not to sit still, but to go about. They were ordained, not to beat the air, but to be instrumental for the bringing of nations into obedience to Christ. Those whom Christ ordains shall not labour in vain. The church of Christ was not to be a short-lived thing. It did not come up in a night, nor should it perish in a night. As one generation of ministers and Christians has passed away, still another has come. Thus their fruit remains to this day, and shall do while the earth remains.

[3] His love to them appeared in the interest they had at the throne of grace: Whatsoever you shall ask of my Father, in my name, he will give it you. Probably this refers in the first place to the power of working miracles, which was to be drawn out by prayer. "Whatever help from heaven you have occasion for at any time, it is but ask and have." We have a God to go to who is a Father. We come in a good name. Whatever errand we come upon to the throne of grace, we may with a humble boldness mention Christ's name in it. An answer of peace is promised us. What you come for shall be given you.

III. Concerning the disciples' love to Christ. Three things he exhorts them to:

1. To continue in his love, v. 9. "Continue in your love to me, and in mine to you." All that love Christ should continue in their love to him. Continue in my love. Keep up your love to me, and then all the troubles you meet with will be easy. Let not the troubles you meet with for Christ's sake quench your love to Christ, but rather quicken it.

2. To let his joy remain in them, and fill them, v. 11.

(1) That his joy might remain in them. That my joy in you may remain. If they bring forth much fruit, and continue in his love, he will continue to rejoice in them as he had done. Fruitful and faithful disciples are the joy of the Lord Jesus. That my joy, that is, your joy in me, may remain. It is the will of Christ that his disciples should constantly and continually rejoice in him, Phil. iv. 4. The joy of those who abide in Christ's love is a continual feast.

(2) That your joy might be full; not only that you might be full of joy, but that your joy in me and in my love may rise higher and higher, till it come to perfection. Those and those only that have Christ's joy remaining in them have their joy full; worldly joys soon surfeit but never satisfy. The design of Christ in his word is to fill the joy of his people.

3. To evidence their love to him by keeping his commandments: If you keep my commandments, you shall abide in my love, v. 10. The promise: You shall abide in my love as in a dwelling place, at home in Christ's love; as in a resting-place, at ease in Christ's love; as in a stronghold, safe in it. "You shall abide in my love, you shall have grace and strength to persevere in loving me." The condition of the promise: If you keep my commandments. The disciples were to keep Christ's commandments, not only by a constant conformity to them themselves, but by a faithful delivery of them to others; they

15. Henceforth I call you not servants—i.e., in the sense explained in the next words; for servants He still calls them (vs. 20), and they delight to call themselves so, in the sense of being "under law to Christ" (I Cor. 9:20). the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth—knows nothing of his master's plans and reasons, but simply receives and executes his orders. but . . . friends, for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you—admitted you to free, unrestrained fellowship, keeping back nothing from you which I have received to communicate. (Cf. Gen. 18:17; Ps. 25: 14; Isa. 50:4.)

16. Ye have not chosen me, but I . . . you—a wholesale memento after the lofty things He had just said about their mutual indwelling, and the unreservedness of the friendship they had been admitted to.

ordained—appointed—you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit—i.e., give yourselves to it. and that your fruit should remain—showing itself to be an imperishable and ever growing principle. (Cf. Prov. 4:18; II John 8.)

that whatsoever ye shall ask . . .—(See on vs. 7).

9-11. continue ye in my love—not, 'Continue to love Me,' but, 'Continue in the possession and enjoyment of My love to you'; as is evident from the next words.

10. If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love—the obedient spirit of true discipleship cherishing and attracting the continuance and increase of Christ's love; and this, He adds, was the secret even of His own abiding in His Father's love!

ADAM CLARKE

15. Henceforth I call you not servants. Which He at least indirectly had done, chap. xiii. 16; Matt. x. 24-25; Luke xvii. 10. I have called you friends. I have admitted you into a state of the most intimate fellowship with myself, and have made known unto you whatsoever I have heard from the Father which, in your present circumstances, it was necessary for you to be instructed in.

16. Ye have not chosen me. You have not elected Me as your Teacher; I have called you to be My disciples, witnesses and depositories of the truth. It was customary among the Jews for every person to choose his own teacher.

And ordained you. Rather, "I have appointed you." The word is etheka, "I have put or placed you," i.e., in the vine.

11. That my joy may remain in you. That the joy which I now feel, on account of your steady, affectionate attachment to Me, may be lasting, I give you both warnings and directions, that you may abide in the faith. That your joy might be full. Or "complete"—"filled up"; a metaphor taken from a vessel into which water or any other thing is poured till it is full to the brim.

10. If ye keep my commandments. Hence we learn that it is impossible to retain a sense of God's pardoning love without continuing in the obedience of faith.

were to keep them as trustees.

To induce them to keep his commandments, he urges his own example: As I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love. The necessity of it to their interest in him (v. 14): "You are my friends if you do whatsoever I command you." Those only will be accounted Christ's faithful friends that approve themselves his obedient servants. It is universal obedience to Christ that is the only acceptable obedience.

IV. Concerning the disciples' love one to another. We must keep his commandments, and this is his commandment, that we love one another, v. 12, and again, v. 17. No one duty of religion is more frequently inculcated, nor more pathetically urged upon us, by our Lord Jesus, than that of mutual love. It is here recommended by Christ's pattern (v. 12): as I have loved you. We should love one another, as, and because, Christ has loved us. Go you and do likewise. It is required by his precept. Observe how differently it is expressed in these two verses, and both very emphatic. 1. This is my commandment (v. 12), as if this were the most necessary of all the commandments. Christ, foreseeing the addictedness of the Christian church to uncharitableness, has laid most stress upon this precept. 2. These things I command you, v. 17. He speaks as if he were about to give them many things in charge, and yet names this only, that you love one another.

Here Christ discourses concerning hatred, which is the character and genius of the devil's kingdom, as love is of the kingdom of Christ.

I. Who they are in whom this hatred is found—the world, the children of this world, as distinguished from the children of God. The calling of these the world intimates, 1. Their number; there were a world of people that opposed Christ and Christianity. I fear, if we should put it to the vote between Christ and Satan, Satan would out-poll us quite. 2. Their confederacy. Jews and Gentiles, that could agree in nothing else, agreed to persecute Christ's ministers. 3. Their spirit and disposition; they are men of the world. The people of God are taught to hate the sins of sinners, yet not their persons, but to love and do good to all men. A malicious, spiteful, envious spirit, is not the spirit of Christ, but of the world.

II. Who they are against whom this hatred is levelled—against the disciples of Christ, against Christ himself, and against the Father.

1. The world hates the disciples of Christ: The world hateth you (v. 19).

(1) Observe how this comes in here. Christ had expressed the great kindness he had for them as friends; but there was given them a thorn in the flesh, reproaches and persecutions for Christ's sake. He had appointed them their work, but tells them what hardships they should meet with in it. He had charged them to love one another, and need enough they had to love one another, for the world would hate them. Those that are in the midst of enemies are concerned to hold together.

(2) Observe what is here included. The world's enmity against the followers of Christ: it hateth them. Whom Christ blesseth the world curseth. The favourites and heirs of heaven have never been the darlings of this world. The fruits of that enmity, v. 20. They will persecute you. It is the common lot of those who will live godly in Christ Jesus to suffer persecution. He sent them forth as sheep in the midst of wolves. Another fruit of their enmity is implied, that they would reject their doctrine. When Christ says, If they have kept my sayings, they will keep yours, he means, They will keep yours, and regard yours, no more than they have regarded and kept mine. The causes of that enmity. The world will hate them,

First, Because they do not belong to it (v. 19): "If you were of the world, of its spirit, the world would love you as its own." We are not to wonder if those that are devoted to the world are caressed by it as its friends. Nor are we to wonder if those that are delivered from the world are maligned by it as its enemies. The reason why Christ's disciples are not of the world is because Christ hath chosen them out of it. This is the reason why the world hates them. The glory which they are designed for sets them above the world, and so makes them the objects of its envy. The grace which they are endued with sets them against the world. They witness against it, and are not conformed to it. This would support them under all the calamities which the world's hatred would bring upon them, that they were hated because they were the chosen ones of the Lord Jesus. This was no just cause for the world's hatred of them.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

12-16. That ye love one another . . .—(See on ch. 13:34, 35).

17-21. The substance of these important verses has occurred more than once before. (See on Matt. 10: 34-36; Luke 12:49-53 etc.).

F. B. MEYER:

Suffering for Jesus' sake. We have been appointed for the one purpose of bearing imperishable fruit, but our holy service to the world will never be appreciated. The world has its own god and religion. It hates without cause. The more Christlike we are, the closer we shall be identified with his sufferings. There is no limit to the hatred and persecution which the world will vent on those who have ceased to belong to it because of their identification with the Crucified. But through the pitiless storm, we must be glad; there must be no slackening of our love, which will as certainly conquer hate as tomorrow's sun the darkness (vv. 26, 27). In each Christian century there has been this double witness of the Spirit in the Church. The voice of the Church has testified to the living Christ, not arguing but attesting; and to each word of testimony the Holy Spirit had borne assenting witness. Christian apologetics are of less importance than the witness of obscure but Spirit-led lives.—Bible Commentary

ADAM CLARKE

12. That ye love one another. See on chap. xiii. 34. So deeply was this commandment engraven on the heart of this Evangelist that Jerome says that in his extreme old age, when he used to be carried to the public assemblies of the believers, his constant saying was, "Little children, love one another." His disciples, wearied at last with the constant repetition of the same words, asked him why he constantly said the same thing. "Because [said he] it is the commandment of the Lord, and the observation of it alone is sufficient."

18. If the world hate you. As the followers of Christ were to be exposed to the hatred of the world, it was no small consolation to them to know that that hatred would be only in proportion to their faith and holiness; and that, consequently, instead of being troubled at the prospect of persecution, they should rejoice because that should always be a proof to them that they were in the very path in which Jesus himself had trod.

20. If they have kept my saying. Or "doctrine." Whosoever acknowledges Me for the Christ will acknowledge you for My ministers. Some translate the passage thus: "If they have watched My sayings," i.e., with an intent to accuse Me for something which I have said, "they will watch yours also"; therefore be on your guard. Paraterein has this sense, as we have had occasion to observe before; and perhaps terein has the same sense here, as it is much more agreeable to the context.

19. Ye are not of the world . . . therefore. On this very account, because you do not join in fellowship with those who know not God, therefore they hate you.

MATTHEW HENRY

If men hate us for that for which they should love and value us, we have reason to pity them. This was just cause for their own joy. Those hug themselves whom the world hates, but whom Christ loves.

Secondly, Another cause will be because you do belong to Christ (v. 21): For my name's sake. Whatever is pretended, this is the ground of the quarrel, they hate Christ's disciples because they bear his name, and bear up his name in the world. It is the character of Christ's disciples that they stand up for his name. It has commonly been the lot of those that appear for Christ's name to suffer for so doing, to suffer all these things. If you be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are you (1 Pet. iv. 14). If we suffer with Christ, and for Christ, we shall reign with him.

Thirdly. It is the world's ignorance that is the true cause of its enmity to the disciples of Christ (v. 21): Because they know not him that sent me. They know not God. They know not God as him that sent our Lord Jesus. We do not rightly know God if we do not know him in Christ.

2. The world hates Christ himself. And this is spoken of here for two ends:

(1) To mitigate the trouble of his followers, arising from the world's hatred (v. 18): You know that it hated me before you. We read it as signifying priority of time. But it may be read as expressing his superiority over them: "You know that it hated me, your first, your chief and captain." If Christ was hated, can we expect that any virtue or merit of ours should screen us from malice. If our Master, the founder of our religion, met with so much opposition in the planting of it, his servants and followers can look for no other in propagating and professing it. For this he refers them (v. 20) to his own word: Remember the word that I said unto you. A plain truth: The servant is not greater than his Lord. The servant is inferior to his lord. The plainest truths are sometimes the strongest arguments for the hardest duties. A proper inference drawn from it: "If they have persecuted me they will also persecute you; you may expect it, for," [1] "You will do the same that I have done to provoke them; you will reprove them for their sins, and give them strict rules of holy living, which they will not bear." [2] "You cannot do more than I have done to oblige them. Let none wonder if they suffer ill for doing well. If they have kept my sayings, they will keep yours also; as there have been a few that have been wrought upon by my preaching, so there will be by yours a few."

(2) To aggravate the wickedness of this unbelieving world, and to discover its exceeding sinfulness. The world is generally in an ill name in scripture, and nothing can put it into a worse name than this, that it hated Jesus Christ. Two things he insists upon to aggravate the wickedness of those that hated him:

[1] That there was the greatest reason imaginable why they should love him.

First, His words were such as merited their love (v. 22): "If I had not spoken unto them they had not had sin. But now they have no pretence, no excuse for their sin." The advantage which those have that enjoy the gospel; Christ in it comes and speaks to them; he spoke in person to the men of that generation, and is still speaking to us. Every word of his carries with it a condescending tenderness, able, one would think, to charm the deafest adder. The excuse which those have that enjoy not the gospel: "If I had not spoken to them they had not had sin." Not this kind of sin. They had not been chargeable with a contempt of Christ. As sin is not imputed where there is no law, so unbelief is not imputed where there is no gospel. Not such a degree of sin. If they had not had the gospel among them, their other sins had not been so bad. The aggravated guilt which those lie under to whom Christ has come and spoken in vain. They have no cloak for their sin; they are altogether inexcusable. The word of Christ strips sin of its cloak, that it may appear sin.

Secondly, His works were such as merited their love (v. 24): "If I had not done among them such works as no other man ever did, they had not had sin; their unbelief and enmity had been excusable." But he produced satisfactory proofs of his divine mission, works which no other man did. His miracles, his mercies, works of wonder and works of grace, prove him sent of God, and sent on a kind errand. Christ's works were such as no man ever did. No common person that had not a commission from heaven, and God with him, could work miracles, ch. iii. 2. They were all good works, works of mercy. One that was so universally useful should have been universally beloved, and yet even he is hated. The works of Christ enhance the guilt of sinners' enmity to him. If they had only heard his words, and not seen his

22-25. (See on ch. 9: 39-41.) If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin—comparatively none; all other sins being light compared with the rejection of the Son of God. now they have no cloak for their sin —rather, 'pretext.'

24. If I had not done . . . the works which none other . . . did—(See on ch. 12:37).

ADAM CLARKE

21. Because they know not him that sent me. This is the foundation of all religious persecution; those who are guilty of it, whether in church or state, know nothing about God.

22. But now they have no cloke for their sin. They are without "excuse." See the margin, and see the note on chap. ix. 41. Christ had done such works as demonstrated Him to be the Messiah—yet they rejected Him; here lay their sin. And this sin, and the punishment to which it exposed them, still remain; for they still continue to reject the Lord that bought them.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

These words strike a discord in the midst of the sweet music to which we have been listening. The keynote of all that has preceded has been love—the love of Christ's friends to one another, and of all to Him, as an answer to His love to all. That love, which is one, whether it rise to Him or is diffused on the level of earth, is the result of that unity of life between the Vine and the branches, of which our Lord has been speaking such great and wonderful things. But that unity of life between Christians and Christ has another consequence than the spread of love. Just because it binds them to Him in a sacred community, it separates them from those who do not share in His life, and hence the "hate" of our context is the shadow of "love"; and there result two communities—to use the much abused words that designate them—the Church and "the World"; and the antagonism between these is deep, fundamental, and perpetual.

Unquestionably, our Lord is here speaking with special reference to the Apostles, who, in a very tragic sense, were "sent forth as sheep in the midst of wolves." If we may trust tradition, every one of that little company, Speaker as well as hearers, died a martyr's death, with the exception of John himself, who was preserved from it by a miracle. But, be that as it may, our Lord is here laying down a universal statement of the permanent condition of things; and there is no more reason for restricting the force of these words to the original hearers of them than there is for restricting the force of any of the rest of this wonderful discourse. "The world" will be in antagonism to the Church until the world ceases to be a world, because it obeys the King; and then, and not till then, will it cease to be hostile to His subjects.—Expositions of Holy Scripture works, unbelief might have pleaded want of proof. They saw Christ to be studious to do them a kindness; yet they hated him. And we see in his word that great love wherewith he loved us, and yet are not wrought upon by it.

[2] That there was no reason at all why they should hate him (v. 25): "This comes to pass that the word might be fulfilled which is written in their law, They hated me without a cause." Those that hate Christ hate him without any just cause; enmity to Christ is unreasonable enmity. Christ was the greatest blessing imaginable to his country, and yet was hated. He testified indeed that their works were evil, with a design to make them good, but to hate him for this cause was to hate him without cause. Herein the scripture was fulfilled. Those that hated Christ did not design therein to fulfil the scripture; but God, in permitting it, confirms our faith in Christ as the Messiah that even this was foretold concerning him, and, being foretold, was accomplished in him. And we must not think it strange or hard if it have a further accomplishment in us.

3. In Christ the world hates God himself; this is twice said here (v. 23): He that hateth me hates my Father also. And again, v. 24, They have seen and hated both me and my Father. There are those that hate God. Those who cannot bring themselves to deny that there is a God, and yet wish there were none, they see and hate him. Hatred of Christ will be adjudged hatred of God. What entertainment the Son has, that the Father has. Let an unbelieving world know that their enmity to the gospel of Christ will be looked upon as an enmity to the blessed God himself; and let all that suffer for righteousness' sake take comfort from this; if God himself be hated in them, they need not be either ashamed of their cause or afraid of the issue.

Christ having spoken of the great opposition which his gospel was likely to meet with here intimates what effectual provision was made for supporting it, both by the principal testimony of the Spirit (v. 26), and the subordinate testimony of the apostles (v. 27).

I. It is here promised that the blessed Spirit shall maintain the cause of Christ in the world. "When the Comforter is come, who proceedeth from the Father, and whom I will send, he shall testify of me." We have more in this verse concerning the Holy Ghost than in any one verse besides in the Bible.

1. Here is an account of him. In his essence He is the Spirit of truth, who proceedeth from the Father. He is spoken of as a distinct person; as a divine person, that proceedeth from the Father. The spirit or breath of man, called the breath of life, proceeds from the man, and by it invigorated he sometimes exerts his strength to blow out what he would extinguish, and blow up what he would excite. Thus the blessed Spirit is the emanation of divine light, and the energy of divine power.

2. In his mission. He will come in a more plentiful effusion of his gifts, graces, and powers, than had ever yet been. I will send him to you from the Father. He had said (ch. xiv. 16), I will pray the Father, and he shall send you the Comforter. Here he says, I will send him. The Spirit was sent, (1) By Christ as Mediator, now ascended on high to give gifts unto men. (2) From the Father: "Not only from heaven, my Father's house, but according to my Father's will and appointment." (3) To the apostles to instruct them in their preaching.

3. In his office and operations, which are two: One implied in the title given to him; he is the Comforter, or Advocate. An advocate for Christ, to maintain his cause against the world's infidelity, a comforter to the saints against the world's hatred. Another expressed: He shall testify of me. He is not only an advocate, but a witness for Jesus Christ. The power of the ministry is derived from the Spirit, for he qualifies ministers; and the power of Christianity too, for he sanctifies Christians, and in both testifies of Christ.

II. It is here promised that the apostles also should have the honour of being Christ's witnesses (v. 27): And you also shall bear witness of me.

1. The apostles were appointed to be witnesses for Christ in the world. When he had said, The Spirit shall testify, he adds, And you also shall bear witness. The Spirit's working is not to supersede, but to engage and encourage ours. Though the Spirit testify, ministers also must bear their testimony. The work cut out for them; they were to attest the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, concerning Christ. Though Christ's disciples fled upon his trial before the high priest and Pilate, yet after the Spirit was poured out upon them they appeared courageous in vindication of the cause of Christ. The truth of

25. Written in their law. See on chap. x. 34. These words are taken from Ps. lxix. 4. This psalm is applied to Christ, chap. ii. 17; xix. 28; to the vengeance of God against Judea, Acts i. 20. The psalm seems entirely prophetic of Christ.

26. But when the Comforter is come. See on chap. xiv. 16.

26-27. He shall testify . . . and ye also shall bear witness. He shall bear His testimony in your souls, and you shall bear this testimony to the world. Our Lord appears to reason thus: In every respect the unbelief of the Jews is inexcusable. They believe not My doctrine, notwithstanding its purity and holiness. They believe not in the Father who sent Me, notwithstanding I have confirmed My mission by the most astonishing miracles. One thing only remains now to be done, i.e., to send them the Holy Spirit, to convince them of sin, righteousness, and judgment; and this He shall do, not only by His influence upon their hearts, but also by your words. And when they shall have resisted this Spirit, then the cup of their iniquity shall be filled, and wrath shall come upon them to the uttermost.

ALBERT BARNES:

25. "In their law" (Ps. 35:19). All the Old Testament was sometimes called "the law." The meaning here is that the same thing happened to him which did to the psalmist. The same words which David used respecting his enemies would express, also, the conduct of the Jews and their treatment of the Messiah. In both cases it was without cause. Jesus had broken no law, he had done no injury to his country or to any individual. It is still true that sinners hate him in the same way. He injures no one, but, amid all their hatred, he seeks their welfare; and, while they reject him in a manner for which they can give no reason in the day of judgment, he still follows them with mercies and entreats them to return to him. Who has ever had any reason to hate the Lord Jesus? What injury has he ever done to any one of the human race? What evil has he ever said or thought of any one of them? What cause or reason had the Jews for putting him to death? What reason has the sinner for hating him now? What reason for neglecting him? No one can give a reason for it that will satisfy his own conscience, none that has the least show of plausibility. Yet no being on earth has ever been more hated, despised, or neglected, and in every instance it has been "without a cause."
—Popular Commentary

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The Comforter whom Christ sends is no mere drier of men's tears and gentle Consoler of human sorrows, but He is a mightier Spirit than that, and the word by which He is described in our text, which means "one who is summoned to the side of another," conveys the idea of a helper who is brought to the man to be helped, in order to render whatever aid and succour that man's weakness and circumstances may require. The verses before our text suggest what sort of aid and succour the disciples will need. They are to be as sheep in the midst of wolves. Their defenseless purity will need a Protector, a strong Shepherd. They stand alone among enemies. There must be someone beside them to fight for them, to shield and to encourage them, to be their Safety and their Peace. And that Paraclete, who is called to our side, comes for the special help which these special circumstances require, and is a strong Spirit who will be our Champion and our Ally, whatever antagonism may storm against us, and however strong and well armed may be the assaulting legions of the world's hate.

Then, still further, the other designation here of this strong Succourer and Friend is "the Spirit of truth," by which is designated, not so much His characteristic attribute, as rather the weapon which He wields, or the material with which He works. The "truth" is His instrument; that is to say, the Spirit of God sent by Jesus Christ is the Strengthener, the Encourager, the Comforter, the Fighter for us and with us, because He wields that great body of truth, the perfect revelation of God, and man, and duty, and salvation, which is embodied in the incarnation and work of Jesus Christ our Lord. The truth is His weapon, and it is by it that He makes us strong.—Expositions of Holy Scripture the Christian religion was to be proved very much by the evidence of matter of fact, especially Christ's resurrection, of which the apostles were in a particular manner chosen witnesses (Acts x. 41). Christ's ministers are his witnesses. The honour put upon them hereby—that they should be workers together with God. "The Spirit shall testify of me, and you also shall bear witness." This might encourage them against the hatred and contempt of the world, that Christ had honoured them.

2. They were qualified to be so: You have been with me from the beginning. They not only heard his public sermons, but had constant private converse with him. Others saw the wonderful and merciful works that he did in their own town and country only, those that went about with him were witnesses of them all. Those are best able to bear witness for Christ that have themselves been with him, by faith, hope, and love. Ministers must first learn Christ, and then preach him. Those speak best of the things of God that speak experimentally. It is particularly a great advantage to have been acquainted with Christ from the beginning. To have been with him from the beginning of our days. An early acquaintance and constant converse with the gospel of Christ will make a man like a good householder.

A. B. SIMPSON:

The mission of the Comforter with respect to the disciples. Already, in the preceding discourse, He has been revealed as their indwelling Teacher and Monitor. Here He is represented still more fully in this respect, as the patient and gentle Guide, who will supplement the present instructions of the Master by such fuller unfoldings of the truth as they may be able to bear from time to time, and, especially, the truths respecting the future and the second coming of the Lord—the whole prophetic horizon, which was to be opened to their view a little later. "He will guide you unto all truth, and show you things to come" (v. 13). He was also to be to them the spirit of testimony. "He shall testify of me, and ye shall also bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning."
—Christ in the Bible

CHAPTER 16

Christ dealt faithfully with his disciples when he sent them forth. He told them the worst, that they might sit down and count the cost.

I. He gives them a reason why he alarmed them thus: These things have I spoken unto you, that you should not be offended, v. 1. The disciples of Christ are apt to be offended at the cross; and the offence of the cross is a dangerous temptation, even to good men, to turn back from the ways of God. Our Lord Jesus, by giving us notice of trouble, designed to take off the terror of it, that it might not be a surprise to us. We can easily welcome a guest we expect, and being forewarned are forearmed.

II. He foretells particularly what they should suffer (v. 2): "Those that have power to do it shall put you out of their synagogues; they shall kill you." Behold two swords drawn against the followers of the Lord Jesus.

1. The sword of ecclesiastical censure. They shall cast you out of their synagogues. At first, they scourged them in their synagogues as contemners of the law (Matt. x. 17), and at length cast them out as incorrigible. "They shall cast you out of the congregation of Israel, put you into the condition of an outlaw," to be knocked on the head, like another wolf. Many a good truth has been branded with an anathema.

2. The sword of civil power. When you are expelled as heretics, they will kill you, and think they do God service. You will find them really cruel: They will kill you. The twelve apostles (we are told) were all put to death, except John. You will find them seemingly conscientious; they will think they do God service. It is possible for those that are real enemies to God's service to pretend a mighty zeal for it. The devil's work has many a time been done in God's livery. It is common to patronise an enmity to religion with a colour of duty to God. God's people have suffered the greatest hardships from conscientious persecutors. This does not at all lessen the sin of the persecutors, but it does enhance the sufferings of the persecuted, to die under the character of being enemies to God.

III. He gives them the true reason of the world's enmity and rage against them (v. 3): "These things will they do unto you, because they have not known the Father, nor me." Many that pretend to know God are wretchedly ignorant of him. Those that are ignorant of Christ cannot have any right knowledge of God. Those are very ignorant indeed of God and Christ that think it an acceptable piece of service to persecute good people.

IV. He tells them why he gave them notice of this now, and why not sooner. Why he told them of it now (v. 4), not to discourage them, but that, "when the time shall come you may remember that I told you." When suffering times come it will be of use to us to remember what Christ has told us of sufferings. The trouble may be the less grievous, for we were told of it before. So that it ought not to be a surprise to us. Why he did not tell them of it sooner: "I spoke not this to you from the beginning because I was with you. While he was with them, he bore the shock of the world's malice, and stood in the front of the battle. But we do find that from the beginning

Vss. 1-33. DISCOURSE AT THE SUPPER TABLE CONCLUDED. 1-5. These things have I spoken unto you, that ye should not be offended—both the warnings and the encouragements just given.

2. They shall put you out of the synagogue—(ch. 9:22; 12:42). the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service—The words mean religious service—'that he is offering a service to God.' (So Saul of Tarsus, Gal. 1:13, 14; Phil. 3:6.)

4. these things I said not . . . at—from—the beginning—He had said it pretty early (Luke 6: 22), but not quite as in vs. 2. because I was with you.

1. These things have I spoken. Particularly what is mentioned in the two last chapters. Be offended. "That ye should not be stumbled." May not fall away from the faith, nor receive any injury to your souls, as that man does to his body who stumbles or falls over a stone or block in the way which he has not discovered.

2. They shall put you out of the synagogues. They will "excommunicate" you. In these excommunications they were spoiled of all their substance; see Ezra x. 8 and Heb. x. 34, and deprived of their character, their influence, and every necessary of life. That whosoever killeth you. This Paul found; for more than forty Jews bound themselves under a curse that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed him, Acts xxiii. 12-13; and agreeably to this, it is said, in that Tract of the Talmud which is entitled Bammidbar, R. xxi. ad. Num. xxv. 13: "He who sheds the blood of the ungodly, is equal to him who brings an offering to God."

3. Because they have not known the Father. Ignorance of the benevolence of God, and of the philanthropy of Christ, is the grand fountain whence all religious persecution and intolerance proceed.

4. At the beginning. I would not trouble you by speaking of these things pointedly at first, when I chose you to be My disciples, but have referred them to the present time, lest you should be discouraged, and now declare them only because it is absolutely necessary that you should be put upon your guard.

he bade them prepare for sufferings.

V. He expresses a very affectionate concern for the present sadness of his disciples (v. 5, 6): "Now I go my way to him that sent me; and none of you asketh me, Whither goest thou? But, instead of enquiring after that which would comfort you, you pore upon that which looks melancholy."

1. He had told them that he was about to leave them: Now I go my way. He was not driven away by force, but voluntarily departed. He went to him that sent him, to give an account of his negotiation.

2. He had told them what hard things they must suffer when he was gone. They would be tempted to think they had made a sorry bargain of it. Their Master sympathizes with them, yet blames them, (1) They were careless of the means of comfort: None of you asks me, Whither goest thou? Peter had started this question (ch. xiii. 36), and Thomas had seconded it (ch. xiv. 5), but they did not pursue it. See what a compassionate teacher Christ is. Many a teacher will not endure that the learner should ask the same question twice; if he cannot take a thing quickly, let him go without it; but our Lord Jesus knows how to deal with babes, that must be taught with precept upon precept. Enquiry into the design and tendency of the darkest dispensations of Providence would help to reconcile us to them. It will silence us to ask, Whence come they? but will abundantly satisfy us to ask, Whither go they? for we know they work for good, Rom. viii. 28.

(2) They were too intent upon the occasions of their grief: Sorrow has filled their hearts. By looking at that only which made against them, and overlooking that which made for them, they were so full of sorrow that there was no room left for joy. It is the common fault and folly of melancholy Christians to dwell only upon the dark side of the cloud. That which filled the disciples' hearts with sorrow was too great an affection to this present life. They were big with hopes of their Master's external kingdom and glory. Nothing is a greater prejudice to our joy in God than the love of the world; and the sorrow of the world, the consequence of it.

Three things we have here concerning the Comforter's coming:

I. Christ's departure was absolutely necessary to the Comforter's coming, v. 7. Christ saw cause to assert it with a more than ordinary solemnity: I tell you the truth.

1. It is expedient, not only for me, but for you also, that I go away. Our Lord Jesus is always for that which is most expedient for us, and gives us the physic we are loth to take, because he knows it is good for us.

2. It was therefore expedient because it was in order to the sending of the Spirit.

(1) Christ's going was in order to the Comforter's coming. If I go not away, the Comforter will not come. He that gives freely may recall one gift before he bestows another, while we would fondly hold all. The sending of the Spirit was to be the fruit of Christ's purchase, and that purchase was to be made by his death. It was to be an answer to his intercession within the veil. See ch. xiv. 16. Thus must this gift be both paid for, and prayed for, by our Lord Jesus. The disciples must be weaned from his bodily presence before they were duly prepared to receive the spiritual aids and comforts of a new dispensation. If I depart I will send him to you. Though he departs, he sends the Comforter; nay, he departs on purpose to send him.

(2) The presence of Christ's Spirit in his church is so much more desirable than his bodily presence, that it was really expedient for us that he should go away. His corporal presence could be but in one place at one time, but his Spirit is wherever two or three are gathered in his name. Christ's bodily presence draws men's eyes, his Spirit draws their hearts.

II. The coming of the Spirit was absolutely necessary to the carrying on of Christ's interests on earth (v. 8): And when he is come he will reprove, or, he will convince the world, concerning sin, righteousness, and judgment.

1. See here on what errand he is sent. To reprove. The Spirit, by the word and conscience, is a reprover. To convince. It is a law-term, and speaks the office of the judge in summing up the evidence. He shall convince, that is, "He shall put to silence the adversaries of Christ and his cause." Convincing work is the Spirit's work; man may open the cause, but it is the Spirit only that can open the heart. The Spirit is called the Comforter (v. 7), and here it is said, He shall convince. One could think this were cold comfort, but it is the method the Spirit takes, first to convince, and then to comfort; first to lay open the wound, and then to apply healing medicines.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

5. But now I go my way to him that sent me—While He was with them, the world's hatred was directed chiefly against Himself; but His departure would bring it down upon them as His representatives.

and none of you asketh me, Whither goest thou?—They had done so in a sort (ch. 13:36; 14:5); but He wished more intelligent and eager inquiry on the subject.

6, 7. But because I have said these things . . . , sorrow hath filled your heart—Sorrow had too much paralyzed them, and He would rouse their energies.

7. It is expedient for you that I go away—

My Saviour, can it ever be
That I should gain by losing thee?
KEBLE

Yes. for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you, but if I depart, I will send him unto you—(See on ch. 7:39; 14:16).

8. And when he is come, he will . . .—This is one of the passages most pregnant with thought in the profound discourses of Christ; with a few great strokes depicting all and every part of the ministry of the Holy Ghost in the world—His operation with reference to individuals as well as the mass, on believers and unbelievers alike [OLSHAUSEN]. he will reprove—This is too weak a word to express what is meant. Reproof is indeed implied in the term employed, and doubtless the word begins with it. But convict or convince is the thing intended; and as the one expresses the work of the Spirit on the unbelieving portion of mankind, and the other on the believing, it is better not to restrict it to either.

ADAM CLARKE

5. None of you asketh me, Whither goest thou? In chap. xiii. 36, Peter had asked, "Lord, whither goest thou?"—and Thomas much the same in chap. xiv. 5, both of whom had received an answer. But now, at the time when Jesus was speaking this, none of them asked this question, because their hearts were filled with sorrow, v. 6.

7. It is expedient for you that I go away. In other places He had shown them the absolute necessity of His death for the salvation of men; see Matt. xx. 19; xxvi. 2; Mark ix. 31; x. 33; Luke ix. 44; xviii. 32. This He does not repeat here, but shows them that, by the order of God, the Holy Spirit cannot come to them, nor to the world, unless He first die; and consequently men cannot be saved but in this way.

8. He will reprove. He will demonstrate these matters so clearly as to leave no doubt on the minds of those who are simple of heart, and so fully as to confound and shut the mouths of those who are gainsayers.

MATTHEW HENRY

2. See who they are whom he is to reprove and convince: The world. He shall give the world the most powerful means of conviction, the gospel, fully proved. He shall sufficiently provide for the silencing of the objections and prejudices of the world against the gospel. He shall savingly convince many in the world, some in every age, in every place. Even this malignant world the Spirit shall work upon; and the conviction of sinners is the comfort of faithful ministers.

3. See what the Spirit shall convince the world of.

(1) Of sin (v. 9), because they believe not on me. The Spirit is sent to convince sinners of sin, not barely to tell them of it; in conviction there is more than this; it is to prove it upon them, and force them to own it. The Spirit convinces of the fact of sin, of the fault of sin, of the folly of sin, of the filth of sin, and, lastly, of the fruit of sin, that the end thereof is death. The Spirit, in conviction, fastens especially upon the sin of unbelief, their not believing in Christ, First, As the great reigning sin. There was, and is, a world of people, that believe not in Jesus Christ, and they are not sensible that it is their sin. Those transgress who, when God speaketh to us by his Son, refuse him that speaketh. Secondly, As the great ruining sin. Every sin is so in its own nature. It is a sin against the remedy. Thirdly, As that which is at the bottom of all sin. The Spirit shall convince the world that the true reason why sin reigns among them is because they are not by faith united to Christ.

(2) Of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and you see me no more, v. 10. We may understand this, [1] Of Christ's personal righteousness. He shall convince the world that Jesus of Nazareth was Christ the righteous, as the centurion owned (Luke xxiii. 47), Certainly this was a righteous man. Now by what medium or argument will the Spirit convince men of the sincerity of the Lord Jesus? Their seeing him no more will contribute something towards the removal of their prejudices. His going to the Father would be a full conviction of it. The coming of the Spirit, according to the promise, was a proof of Christ's exaltation to God's right hand (Acts ii. 33), and this was a demonstration of his righteousness. [2] Of Christ's righteousness communicated to us for our justification and salvation. The Spirit shall convince men of this righteousness. Having shown them their need of a righteousness, lest this should drive them to despair he will show them where it is to be had. It was hard to convince those of this righteousness that went about to establish their own, but the Spirit will do it. Christ's ascension is the great argument proper to convince men of this righteousness: I go to the Father, and you shall see me no more. Now that we are sure he is at the right hand of God we are sure of being justified through him.

(3) Of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged, v. 11. The devil, the prince of this world, was judged, was discovered to be a great deceiver and destroyer. He was cast out of the souls of people by the grace of God working with the gospel of Christ. The Spirit convinces the world of judgment. By the judgment of the prince of this world, it appears that Christ is stronger than Satan. He shall show that Christ's errand into the world was to set things to right in it. All will be well when his power is broken who made all the mischief. If Satan be thus subdued by Christ, we may be sure no other power can stand before him.

III. The coming of the Spirit would be of unspeakable advantage to the disciples themselves. The Spirit has work to do, not only on the enemies of Christ, but upon his servants and agents, and therefore it was expedient for them that he should go away.

1. The tender sense he had of their present weakness (v. 12): I have yet many things to say unto you, but you cannot bear them now. See what a teacher Christ is. None like him for copiousness. Treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hid in him. None like him for compassion; he would have told them more of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, but they could not bear it, it would have confounded and stumbled them, rather than have given them any satisfaction.

2. He assures them of sufficient assistances. "But when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, all will be well." He shall undertake to guide the apostles, and glorify Christ.

(1) To guide the apostles. That they do not miss their way: He will guide you. The Spirit is given us to be our guide, to go along with us. That they do not come short of their end: He will guide them into all truth, as the skilful pilot guides the ship into the port it is bound for. To be led into a truth is more than barely to know it; it is to be intimately and experimentally acquainted with it. It denotes a gradual discovery of truth shining more and more.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

9. Of sin, because they believe not on me—As all sin has its root in unbelief, so the most aggravated form of unbelief is the rejection of Christ. The Spirit, however, in fastening this truth upon the conscience, does not extinguish, but, on the contrary, does consummate and intensify, the sense of all other sins.

10. Of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more—Beyond doubt, it is Christ's personal righteousness which the Spirit was to bring home to the sinner's heart. The evidence of this was to lie in the great historical fact, that He had "gone to His Father and was no more visible to men":—for if His claim to be the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, had been a lie, how should the Father, who is "a jealous God," have raised such a blasphemer from the dead and exalted him to His right hand? But if He was the "Faithful and True Witness," the Father's "Righteous Servant," "His Elect, in whom His soul delighted," then was His departure to the Father, and consequent disappearance from the view of men, but the fitting consummation, the august reward, of all that He did here below, the seal of His mission, the glorification of the testimony which He bore on earth, by the reception of its Bearer to the Father's bosom. This triumphant vindication of Christ's rectitude is to us divine evidence, bright as heaven, that He is indeed the Saviour of the world, God's Righteous Servant to justify many, because He bare their iniquities (Isa. 53:11). Thus the Spirit, in this clause, is seen convincing men that there is in Christ perfect relief under the sense of sin of which He had before convinced them; and so far from mourning over His absence from us, as an irreparable loss, we learn to glory in it, as the evidence of His perfect acceptance on our behalf, exclaiming with one who understood this point, "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth: Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died; yea, rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God . . ." (Rom. 8:33, 34). 11. Of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged—By supposing that the final judgment is here meant, the point of this clause is, even by good interpreters, quite missed. The statement, "The prince of this world is judged," means, beyond all reasonable doubt, the same as that in ch. 12:31, "Now shall the prince of this world be cast out"; and both mean that his dominion over men, or his power to enslave and so to ruin them, is destroyed. The death of Christ "judged" or judicially overthrew him, and he was thereupon "cast out" or expelled from his usurped dominion (Heb. 2:14: I John 3:8; Col. 2:15). Thus, then, the Spirit shall bring home to men's conscience: (1) the sense of sin, consummated in the rejection of Him who came to "take away the sin of the world"; (2) the sense of perfect relief in the righteousness of the Father's Servant, now fetched from the earth that spurned Him to that bosom where from everlasting He had dwelt; and (3) the sense of emancipation from the fetters of Satan, whose judgment brings to men liberty to be holy, and transformation out of servants of the devil into sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. To one class of men, however, all this will carry conviction only; they "will not come to Christ"—revealed though He be to them as the life-giving One—that they may have life. Such, abiding voluntarily under the dominion of the prince of this world, are judged in his judgment, the visible consummation of which will be at the great day. To another class, however, this blessed teaching will have another issue—translating them out of the kingdom of darkness into the kingdom of God's dear Son. 12-15. when he, the Spirit of truth, is come . . . he shall not speak of himself—i.e., from Himself, but, like Christ Himself, "what He hears," what is given Him to communicate.

ADAM CLARKE

The world. The Jewish nation first, and afterwards the Gentile world; for His influences shall not be confined to one people, place, or time.

9. Of sin. Of the sin of the Jews in not receiving Me as the Messiah, though My mission was accredited by the very miracles which the prophets foretold; see Isa. xxxv. 3-6. This was literally fulfilled on the Day of Pentecost, when the Spirit was given; for multitudes of Jews were then convinced of this sin, and converted to God. See Acts ii. 37.

10. Of righteousness. Of My innocence and holiness, because I go away to My Father, of which My resurrection from the dead and My ascension to heaven shall be complete proofs.

11. Of judgment. Of the false judgment of the Jews in condemning the Lord Jesus, who, as some think, is intended here by the ruler of this world. Others think that Satan is meant, whose usurped power over the world was now to be greatly restrained, and by and by totally destroyed; see chap. xii. 31; Col. ii. 15; Rev. xi. 15; xii. 10-11. Perhaps our Lord's meaning is that, as a most astonishing judgment or punishment was now about to fall upon the Jews in consequence of their obstinate infidelity, the Holy Ghost by the ministry of the apostles should demonstrate that this judgment, severe as it might seem, was amply merited by this worst of all people. One general exposition may be given of these three verses. The Holy Spirit will convince the world of sin committed, and guilt and condemnation thereby incurred; of righteousness—of the necessity of being pardoned, and made righteous through the blood of the Lamb, who, after being offered up for sin, went to the Father, ever to appear in His presence as our intercessor; and of judgment—of the great day thereof, when none shall be able to stand but those whose sins are pardoned and whose souls are made righteous. In all that our Lord says here, there seems to be an allusion to the office of an advocate in a cause, in a court of justice; who, by producing witnesses and pleading upon the proof, convicts the opposite party of sin, demonstrates the righteousness of his client, and shows the necessity of passing judgment upon the accuser.

13. He will guide you. He will consider your feeble infant state; and, as a father leads his child by the hand, so will the Holy Spirit lead and guide you.

MATTHEW HENRY

But how into all truth? Into the whole truth relating to their embassy; whatever was needful or useful for them to know; what truths they were to teach others the Spirit would teach them. Into nothing but the truth. All that he shall guide you into shall be truth. [1] "The Spirit shall teach nothing but the truth, for he shall not speak of himself, but whatsoever he shall hear, that, and that only, shall he speak." The testimony of the Spirit, in the word and by the apostles, is what we may rely upon. We may venture our souls upon the Spirit's word. The testimony of the Spirit always concurs with the word of Christ, for he does not speak of himself. Men's word and spirit often disagree, but the eternal Word and the eternal Spirit never do. [2] "He shall teach you all truth, for he will show you things to come." The Spirit was in the apostles a Spirit of prophecy. This was a great satisfaction to their own minds, and of use to them in their conduct. We should not grudge that the Spirit does not now show us things to come in this world, let it suffice that the Spirit in the word hath shown us things to come in the other world, which are our chief concern.

(2) The Spirit undertook to glorify Christ, v. 14, 15. Even the sending of the Spirit was the glorifying of Christ. It was the honour of the Redeemer that the Spirit was both sent in his name and sent on his errand, to carry on and perfect his undertaking. All the gifts and graces of the Spirit, all the preaching and all the writing of the apostles, the tongues, and miracles, were to glorify Christ. The Spirit glorified Christ by leading his followers into the truth as it is in Jesus. First, The Spirit should communicate the things of Christ to them: He shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you. All that the Spirit shows us, all that he gives us for our strength and quickening, did all belong to Christ, and was had from him. The Spirit came not to erect a new kingdom, but to advance and establish the same kingdom that Christ had erected. Secondly, Herein the things of God should be communicated to us. All things that the Father hath are mine. All that grace and truth which God designed to show to us he lodged in the hands of the Lord Jesus. Spiritual blessings in heavenly things are given by the Father to the Son for us, and the Son entrusts the Spirit to convey them to us.

I. Observe the intimation he gave them of the comfort he designed them, v. 16.

1. That they should now shortly lose the sight of him: A little while, and you shall not see me; and therefore, if they had any good question to ask him, they must ask quickly. It is good to consider how near to a period our seasons of grace are, that we may be quickened to improve them. They lost the sight of Christ at his death. The most that death does to our Christian friends is to take them out of our sight, only out of sight, and then not out of mind. At his ascension, when he withdrew from them, out of their sight; a cloud received him, and they saw him no more.

2. That yet they should speedily recover the sight of him: Again a little while, and you shall see me. His farewell was not a final farewell. (1) At his resurrection, soon after his death, when he showed himself alive, by many infallible proofs. (2) By the pouring out of the Spirit, soon after his ascension. The Spirit's coming was Christ's visit to his disciples, not a transient but a permanent one. (3) At his second coming.

3. He assigns the reason: "Because I go to the Father." This refers rather to his going away at death, and return at his resurrection, than his going away at his ascension, and his return at the end of time; for it was his death that was their grief, not his ascension. Thus we may say of our ministers and Christian friends, Yet a little while, and we shall not see them. It is certain that we must part shortly, and yet not part for ever. It is but a good night to those whom we hope to see with joy in the morning.

II. The perplexity of the disciples. They were at a loss what to make of it (v. 17, 18): Some of them said among themselves, What is this that he saith to us? Though Christ had often spoken to this purport before, yet still they were in the dark. 1. The disciples' weakness, in that they could not understand so plain a saying. Having told them so often in plain terms that he should be killed, and the third day rise again; yet, say they, We cannot tell what he saith. Sorrow had filled their heart, and made them unapt to receive the impressions of comfort. Mistakes cause griefs, and then griefs confirm mistakes. The notion of Christ's secular kingdom was so deeply rooted in them. When we think the scripture must be made to agree with the false ideas we have imbibed, no wonder that we complain of its

he will show you things to come—referring specially to those revelations which, in the Epistles partially, but most fully in the Apocalypse, open up a vista into the Future of the Kingdom of God, whose horizon is the everlasting hills. 14. He shall glorify me; for he shall receive of mine and show it unto you—Thus the whole design of the Spirit's office is to glorify Christ—not in His own Person, for this was done by the Father when He exalted Him to His own right hand—but in the view and estimation of men. For this purpose He was to "receive of Christ"—all the truth relating to Christ—"and show it unto them," or make them to discern it in its own light. The subjective nature of the Spirit's teaching—the discovery to the souls of men of what is Christ outwardly—is here very clearly expressed; and, at the same time, the vanity of looking for revelations of the Spirit which shall do anything beyond throwing light in the soul upon what Christ Himself is, and taught, and did upon earth. 15. All things that the Father hath are mine—a plainer expression than this of absolute community with the Father in all things cannot be conceived, though the "all things" here have reference to the things of the Kingdom of Grace, which the Spirit was to receive that He might show it to us. We have here a wonderful glimpse into the inner relations of the Godhead.

16-22. A little while, and ye shall not see me; and again a little while, and ye shall see me, because I go to the Father—The joy of the world at their not seeing Him seems to show that His removal from them by death was what He meant; and in that case, their joy at again seeing Him points to their transport at His reappearance amongst them on His Resurrection, when they could no longer doubt His identity. At the same time the sorrow of the widowed Church in the absence of her Lord in the heavens, and her transport at His personal return, are certainly here expressed.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

Ah, brothers! the Holy Ghost never comes to glorify us, or to glorify a denomination, or, I think, even to glorify a systematic arrangement of doctrines. He comes to glorify Christ. If we want to be in accord with Him, we must preach in order to glorify Christ. May we never have this thought, "I will put that bit in; it will tell well. The friends will feel that oratory is not quite extinct, that Demosthenes lives again in this village." No, no. I should say, brother, though it is a very delightful piece, strike that out ruthlessly; because if you have had a thought of that kind, you had better not put yourself in the way of temptation by using it. "Yes, that is a magnificent sentence! I do not know where I met with it, or whether it is my own, I am afraid that most of our friends will not understand it; but then it will give them an impression that they have a deep thinker in their pulpit." Well then, it may be very admirable, and, further, it might be a very right thing to give them that precious piece; but if you have that thought about it, strike it out. Strike it out ruthlessly. Say, "No, no, no! If it is not distinctly my aim to glorify Christ, I am not in accord with the aim of the Holy Ghost, and I cannot expect His help. We shall not be pulling the same way, and therefore, I will have nothing of which I cannot say that I am saying it simply, sincerely, and only that I may glorify Christ." —The Treasury of the New Testament

15. All things that the Father hath are mine. If Christ had not been equal to God, could He have said this without blasphemy? And shew it unto you. As Christ is represented as the Ambassador of the Father, so the Holy Spirit is represented as the Ambassador of the Son, coming vested with His authority, as the Interpreter and Executor of His will.

16. A little while. He had but a few hours to live. And ye shall not see me. I shall be hidden from your view in the grave.

Again, a little while. In three days after My death. Ye shall see me. I will rise again, and show myself to you. Or, As I am going by My ascension to the Father, in a short time, you shall see Me personally no more; but in a little while I shall pour out My Spirit upon you, and others through your ministry; and you shall see Me virtually in the great and wonderful work which shall then take place in the hearts and lives of men.

18. What is this that he saith? They knew from what He had said that He was to die, but knew not what He meant by their seeing Him again in a little time.

MATTHEW HENRY

difficulty; but, when our reasonings are captivated to revelation, the matter becomes easy. It should seem, that which puzzled them was the little while. They could not conceive how he should leave them quickly. Thus it is hard for us to represent to ourselves that change as near which yet we know will come certainly, and may come suddenly. 2. Their willingness to be instructed. When they were at a loss about the meaning of Christ's words, they conferred together upon it. By mutual converse about divine things we both borrow the light of others and improve our own. We must revolve what we cannot explain, and wait till God shall reveal even this unto us.

III. The further explication of what Christ had said.

1. See here why Christ explained it (v. 19); because he knew they were desirous to ask him. The knots we cannot untie we must bring to him. Christ knew they were desirous to ask him, but were bashful and ashamed to ask. Christ instructed those who he knew were desirous to ask him, though they did not ask. Who they are that Christ will teach. The humble, that confess their ignorance. The diligent, that use the means they have: "Do you enquire? You shall be taught."

2. See here how he explained it. He explains it by their sorrowing and rejoicing, because we commonly measure things according as they affect us (v. 20): You shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice and you shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow will be turned into joy. Believers have joy or sorrow according as they have or have not a sight of Christ.

(1) What Christ says here, and v. 21, 22, of their sorrow and joy, is primarily to be understood of the present state of the disciples. Their grief foretold: You shall weep and lament, and you shall be sorrowful. They wept for him because they loved him; the pain of our friend is a pain to ourselves. They wept for themselves, and their own loss. Christ has given notice to his disciples beforehand to expect sorrow, that they may treasure up comforts accordingly. The world's rejoicing: But the world shall rejoice. That which is the grief of saints is the joy of sinners. Those that are strangers to Christ will continue in their carnal mirth. Those that are enemies to Christ will rejoice because they hope they have conquered him. Let it be no surprise to us if we see others triumphing, when we are trembling for the ark. The return of joy. But your sorrow shall be turned into joy. The sorrow of the true Christian, is but for a moment. The disciples were glad when they saw the Lord. His resurrection was life from the dead to them, and their sorrow for Christ's sufferings was turned into joy. They were sorrowful, and yet always rejoicing (2 Cor. vi. 10), had sorrowful lives and yet joyful hearts.

(2) It is applicable to all the faithful followers of the Lamb.

[1] Their condition and disposition are both mournful. Those that are acquainted with Christ must, as he was, be acquainted with grief. They mourn with sufferers that mourn, and mourn for sinners that mourn not for themselves.

[2] The world, at the same time, goes away with all the mirth. Mirth and pleasures are surely none of the best things, for then the worst men would not have so large a share of them, and the favourites of heaven be such strangers to them.

[3] Spiritual mourning will shortly be turned into eternal rejoicing. Their sorrow will not only be followed with joy, but turned into it. It is the will of Christ that his people should be a comforted people.

First, Here is the parable itself (v. 21): A woman, when she is in travail, hath sorrow because her hour is come, but as soon as she is delivered of the child she remembers no more the anguish, for joy that a man is born into the world. The fruit of the curse according to the sentence (Gen. iii. 16), In sorrow shalt thou bring forth. See what this world is; all its roses are surrounded with thorns. This comes of sin. The fruit of the blessing, in the joy there is for a child born into the world. The fruit of a blessing is matter of joy; the birth of a living child is the parents' joy. Though children are certain cares, uncertain comforts, and often prove the greatest crosses, yet it is natural to us to rejoice at their birth. Now this is very proper to set forth, (a) The sorrows of Christ's disciples in this world; they are sure and sharp, but not to last long, and in order to a joyful product. (b) Their joys after these sorrows, which will wipe away all tears. When they reap the fruit of all their services and sorrows, the toil and anguish of this world will be no more remembered.

Secondly, The application of the similitude (v. 22): "You now have sorrow, but I will see you again."

a. Here again he tells them of their sorrow: "You now therefore have sorrow; therefore, because I am leaving you." Christ's withdrawings are just cause

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

"Jesus knew that they were desirous to ask him." He knows all our difficulties and perplexities. Perhaps it is His supernatural knowledge that is indicated in the words before us, or perhaps it is merely that He saw them whispering among themselves and so inferred their wish. Be that as it may, we may take the comfort that we have to do with a Teacher who accurately understands how much we understand and where we grope, and will shape His teaching according to our necessities.

He had not a word of rebuke for the slowness of their apprehension. He might well have said to them, "O fools and slow of heart to believe!" But that word was not addressed to them then, though two of them deserved it and got it, after events had thrown light on His teaching. He never rebukes us for either our stupidity or for our carelessness, but "has long patience" with us.

He does give them a kind of rebuke. "Do ye inquire among yourselves?" That is a hopeful source to go to for knowledge. Why did they not ask Him, instead of whispering and muttering behind Him, as if two people equally ignorant could help each other to knowledge? Inquiry "among yourselves" is folly; to ask Him is wisdom.—Expositions of Holy Scripture

20. Ye shall weep and lament. To see Me crucified and laid in the grave. But the world shall rejoice. The chief priests, scribes, Pharisees, and persecuting Jews in general will triumph, hoping that their bad cause is crowned with success. But your sorrow shall be turned into joy. When you see Me risen from the dead. It is very evident that our Lord uses the word world in several parts of this discourse of His to signify the unbelieving and rebellious Jews.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

"A little while" was the little while of darkness into which they then were passing. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, that ye shall weep and lament." He was looking at the cross, their weeping and lamenting, while the world would be rejoicing. "The world will think when they have put Me on the cross they have gotten rid of Me, and so will it seem to you. You will be weeping and sorrowful; and the world will be glad."

Then the high, wondrous, beauteous declaration: "Ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy." Not after your sorrow you will obtain joy. No, the very sorrow, the very thing causing your sorrow will be transmuted into joy. The joy will come out of the sorrow. "Your sorrow shall be turned into joy."

In that connection He employed that fine, tender, exquisite illustration of a woman in travail, to interpret the sorrow in the hour to which they were going, and in the hour to which He was going. In effect He said, "Your sorrows will be birthpangs, leading to life. A little while that you will not see Me, the little while of your darkness, and pain, and tears; but that is going to be turned into your joy." He was telling them beforehand. I do not think they understood Him at the time, but I am sure they came to understand Him by and by.—The Gospel According to John of grief to his disciples. When the sun sets, the sunflower will hang the head.

b. He, more largely than before, assures them of a return of joy. Three things recommend the joy: The cause of it: "I will see you again." Christ will graciously return to those that wait for him. Men, when they are exalted, will scarcely look upon their inferiors; but the exalted Jesus will visit his disciples. Christ's returns are returns of joy to all his disciples. The cordiality of it: Your heart shall rejoice. Joy in the heart is solid, and not flashy; it is secret, it is sweet, it is sure, and not easily broken in upon. The continuance of it: Your joy no man taketh from you. They would if they could; but they shall not prevail. Some understand it of the eternal joy of those that are glorified. Our joys on earth we are liable to be robbed of by a thousand accidents, but heavenly joys are everlasting. I rather understand it of the spiritual joys of those that are sanctified. They could not rob them of their joy, because they could not separate them from the love of Christ, could not rob them of their God, nor of their treasure in heaven.

An answer to their askings is here promised. Now there are two ways of asking: asking by way of enquiry, which is the asking of the ignorant; and asking by way of request, which is the asking of the indigent. Christ here speaks of both.

I. By way of enquiry, they should not need to ask (v. 23): "In that day you shall ask me nothing. You shall not need to enquire." In the story of the apostles' Acts we seldom find them asking questions, for they were constantly under a divine guidance. Asking questions supposes us at a loss, or at least at a stand, and the best of us have need to ask questions.

Now for this he gives a reason (v. 25): "These things have I spoken unto you in proverbs, but the time cometh when I shall show you plainly of the Father, so that you shall not need to ask questions."

1. The great thing Christ would lead them into was the knowledge of God: "I will show you the Father." When Christ would express the greatest favour intended for his disciples, he tells them that he would show them plainly of the Father; for what is the happiness of heaven, but immediately and everlastingly to see God?

2. Of this he had hitherto spoken to them in proverbs. Christ had expounded his parables privately to the disciples. (1) Considering their dullness, and unaptness to receive what he said to them, he might be said to speak in proverbs; what he said to them was as a book sealed. (2) Comparing the discoveries he had made to them with what he would make to them, all hitherto had been but proverbs. (3) Confining it to what he had said of the Father, what he had said was very dark, compared with what was shortly to be revealed.

3. He would speak to them plainly of the Father. When the Spirit was poured out, the apostles attained to a much greater knowledge of divine things than they had before. But this promise will have its full accomplishment in heaven, where we shall see the Father as he is. While we are here, we have many questions to ask, but in that day we shall see all things clearly, and ask no more questions.

II. He promises that by way of request they should ask nothing in vain. It is taken for granted that all Christ's disciples give themselves to prayer. Their instruction, direction, strength, and success, must be fetched in by prayer.

1. Here is an express promise of a grant, v. 23. The preface to this promise leaves no room to question it: "Verily, verily, I say unto you." The golden sceptre is here held out to us, with this word, What is thy petition, and it shall be granted? For he says, Whatsoever you shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it to you. What would we more? The promise is as express as we can desire. (1) We are here taught how to seek; we must ask the Father in Christ's name. Asking of the Father includes a sense of spiritual wants and a desire of spiritual blessings, with a conviction that they are to be had from God only. Asking in Christ's name includes an acknowledgment of our own unworthiness, and an entire dependence upon Christ. (2) We are here told how we shall speed: He will give it to you. What more can we wish for? Christ had promised them great illumination by the Spirit, but they must pray for it. They must continue praying. Perfect fruition is reserved for the land of our rest; asking and receiving are the comfort of the land of our pilgrimage.

2. Here is an invitation for them to petition. Great men permit addresses, but Christ calls upon us to petition, v. 24.

ALBERT BARNES:

"Your joy no man taketh from you." You shall be so firmly persuaded that I have risen and that I am the Messiah that neither the threats nor persecutions of men shall ever be able to shake your faith and produce doubt or unbelief, and thus take away your joy. This prediction was remarkably fulfilled. It is evident that after his ascension not one of the apostles ever doubted for a moment that he had risen from the dead. No persecution or trial was able to shake their faith; and thus, amid all their afflictions, they had an unshaken source of joy. —Popular Commentary

23-28. In that day—of the dispensation of the Spirit (as in ch. 14:20). ye shall ask—inquire of—me nothing—by reason of the fulness of the Spirit's teaching (ch. 14:26; 16:13; and cf. I John 2: 27).

25. in proverbs—in obscure language, opposed to "showing plainly"—i.e., by the Spirit's teaching.

A. B. SIMPSON:

The first word translated "ask" (v. 23) does not mean to pray, but to inquire about matters with respect to which they are in perplexity. He means that in the coming day, the light will be so plain and clear that they will not need to inquire, as they do now, "What is this that he saith? We cannot tell what he saith"; but they shall plainly understand His will and teachings, and His Father's love.

And, as to prayer, they shall have a higher place of access and confidence, for they shall ask in His name, even as He asks, which they have not yet been able to do, because His redemption work was not complete, and His heavenly priesthood, in their behalf, had not begun. But henceforth He shall be at the Father's side in their interests, and their petitions shall be received at the heavenly throne even as His own; nor will He need to plead for them as for strangers, or aliens, for the Father himself loves them, even as He loves His Son, and His intercession is not so much to propitiate an angry Father and constrain from His reluctant hands the answer to His people's prayers, as that He is to be the channel through whom the answer will come, and the Mediator who receives our petition as they ascend to heaven, in their imperfection and ignorance, purifying them with His holy intercession, and then presenting them with the added incense of His own merits as His very own prayers. —Christ in the Bible

22. Your joy no man taketh from you. Or "shall take away." Some excellent MSS. and versions read the verb in the future tense. Our Lord's meaning appears to have been this: that His resurrection should be so completely demonstrated to them that they should never have a doubt concerning it; and consequently that their joy should be great and permanent, knowing that the atonement was made, the victory gained, and the kingdom of Heaven opened to all believers.

23. Ye shall ask me nothing. Ye shall then be led, by that Spirit which guides into all truth, to consider Me in the character of Mediator in the kingdom of God, and to address your prayers to the Father in my name—in the name of Jesus, the Saviour, because I have died to redeem you—in the name of Christ, the Anointed, because I have ascended to send down the gift of the Holy Ghost.

25. In proverbs. That is, words which, besides their plain, literal meaning, have another, viz., a spiritual or figurative one. I have represented heavenly things to you through the medium of earthly. The time cometh. Viz., the interval from His resurrection to His ascension, which consisted of forty days, during which He instructed His disciples in the most sublime mysteries and truths of His kingdom, Acts. i. 3.

MATTHEW HENRY

(1) He looks back upon their practice hitherto: Hitherto have you asked nothing in my name. This refers either, [1] To the matter of their prayers: "You have asked nothing comparatively, nothing to what you might have asked." See what a generous benefactor our Lord Jesus is; he gives liberally, and is so far from upbraiding us with the frequency and largeness of his gifts that he rather upbraids us with the seldomness and straitness of our requests. Or, [2] To the name in which they prayed. They prayed many a prayer, but never so expressly in the name of Christ as now he was directing them to do; for he had not as yet offered up that great sacrifice in the virtue of which our prayers were to be accepted, the incense whereof was to perfume all our devotions.

(2) He looks forward to their practice for the future: Ask, and you shall receive, that your joy may be full. He directs them to ask for all that which they needed and he had promised. He assures them that they shall receive. What we ask from a principle of grace God will graciously give, that hereby their joy shall be full. This denotes, First, The blessed effect of the prayer of faith; it helps to fill up the joy of faith. When we are told to rejoice evermore, it follows immediately, Pray without ceasing. See how high we are to aim in prayer—not only at peace, but joy. Or, Secondly, The blessed effects of the answer of peace: "Ask, and you shall receive that which will fill your joy."

3. Here are the grounds upon which they might hope to speed (v. 26, 27), which are summed up in short by the apostle (1 John ii. 1): "We have an advocate with the Father."

(1) We have an advocate: "I say not unto you that I will pray the Father for you." He speaks as if they needed not any further favours, when he had prevailed for the gift of the Holy Ghost to make intercession within them; as if they had no further need of him to pray for them now; but we shall find that he does more for us than he says he will.

(2) We have to do with a Father: For the Father himself loveth you. The disciples of Christ are the beloved of God himself. Observe what an emphasis is laid upon this: "The Father himself loveth you." The Father himself, whose favour you have forfeited, and with whom you need an advocate, he himself now loves you. Why the Father loved the disciples of Christ: Because you have loved me, and have believed that I came out from God, that is, because you are my disciples indeed. The character of Christ's disciples; they love him, because they believe he came out from God. Faith in Christ works by love to him. If we believe him to be our Saviour, we cannot but love him as the most kind to us. Observe with what respect Christ is pleased to speak of his disciples' love to him; he speaks of it as that which recommended them to his Father's favour. What advantage Christ's faithful disciples have, the Father loves them, and that because they love Christ. What encouragement this gave them in prayer. They need not fear speeding when they came to one that loved them. This cautions us against hard thoughts of God. When we are taught in prayer to plead Christ's merit and intercession, it is not as if all the kindness were in Christ only. We owe Christ's merit to God's mercy in giving him for us. Let it cherish and confirm in us good thoughts of God. Believers, that love Christ, ought to know that God loves them.

Two things Christ here comforts his disciples with:

I. With an assurance that, though he was leaving the world, he was returning to his Father, v. 28–32.

1. A plain declaration of Christ's mission from the Father, and his return to him (v. 28): I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world. Again, I leave the world and go to the Father. This is the conclusion of the whole matter.

(1) These two great truths are here, [1] Contracted. Brief summaries of Christian doctrine are of great use to young beginners. The principles of the oracles of God brought into a little compass in creeds and catechisms have, like the beams of the sun contracted in a burning glass, conveyed divine light and heat with a wonderful power. [2] Compared. There is an admirable harmony in divine truths; they both corroborate and illustrate one another; Christ's coming and his going do so. Christ had commended his disciples for believing that he came forth from God (v. 27), and thence infers the necessity of his returning to God again. The due improvement of what we know and own would help us into the understanding of that which seems difficult and doubtful.

(2) If we ask concerning the Redeemer whence he came, and whither he went, we are told, [1] That he came from the Father, and he came into this world,

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

24. Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name—for "prayer in the name of Christ, and prayer to Christ, presuppose His glorification" [OLSHAUSEN]. ask—when I am gone, "in My name."

26. I say not . . ., I will pray the Father for you—as if He were not of Himself disposed to aid you: Christ does pray the Father for His people, but not for the purpose of inclining an unwilling ear.

27. For the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me—This love of theirs is that which is called forth by God's eternal love in the gift of His Son mirrored in the hearts of those who believe, and resting on His dear Son.

28. I came forth from the Father . . .—i.e., 'And ye are right, for I have indeed so come forth,and shall soon return whence I came.' This echo of the truth, alluded to in the preceding verse, seems like thinking aloud, as if it were grateful to His own spirit on such a subject and at such an hour.

ADAM CLARKE

24. Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name. You have not as yet considered Me the great Mediator between God and man; but this is one of the truths which shall be more fully revealed to you by the Holy Spirit.

Ask. In My name; and ye shall receive—all the salvation you thus request; the consequence of which shall be that your joy shall be full—you shall be thoroughly happy in being made completely holy.

26. I say not unto you, that I will pray the Father for you. I need not tell you that I will continue as your Intercessor; I have already given you so many proofs of My love that you cannot possibly doubt this. Besides, the Father himself needs no entreaty to do you good, for He loves you, and is graciously disposed to save you to the uttermost, because "you have loved Me and believed in Me as coming from God," for the salvation of the world.

28. I came forth from the Father. With whom I existed from eternity in glory. Am come into the world. By my incarnation. I leave the world. By My death. And go to the Father. By My ascension. These four words contain the whole economy of the gospel of man's salvation, and a consummate abridgment of the Christian faith. This gave the disciples a key to the whole of our Lord's discourse; and especially to that part, v. 16, that had so exceedingly embarrassed them, as appears by vv. 17-18.

this world of mankind. Here his business lay, and hither he came to attend it. He left his home for this strange country; his palace for this cottage. [2] That, when he had done his work on earth, he left the world, and went back to his Father. That still he is spiritually present with his church, and will be to the end.

2. The disciples' satisfaction in this declaration (v. 29, 30): Lo, now speakest thou plainly. It should seem, this one word of Christ did them more good than all the rest. Two things they improved in.

(1) In knowledge: Lo, now speakest thou plainly. Divine truths are most likely to do good when they are spoken plainly. When Christ is pleased to speak plainly to our souls we have reason to rejoice in it.

(2) In faith: Now are we sure.

[1] What was the matter of their faith: We believe that thou camest forth from God. He had said (v. 27) that they did believe this; "Lord" (say they) "we do believe it."

[2] What was the motive of their faith—his omniscience. This proved him a teacher come from God, and more than a prophet, that he knew all things. Those know Christ best that know him by experience, that can say of his power, It works in me; of his love, He loved me. This confirmed the faith of the disciples here. And needest not that any man should ask thee. Christ's aptness to teach. He prevents us with his instructions and needs not to be importuned. His ability to teach. The best of teachers can only answer what is spoken, but Christ can answer what is thought.

3. The gentle rebuke Christ gave the disciples, v. 31, 32. Observing how they triumphed in their attainments, he said, "Do you now believe? Alas! you know not your own weakness; you will very shortly be scattered every man to his own," &c.

(1) A question, designed to put them upon consideration: Do you now believe? "If now, why not sooner?" Those who are at last persuaded to believe have reason to be ashamed that they stood it out so long. "If now, why not ever? When an hour of temptation comes, where will your faith be then?"

(2) A prediction of their fall. In a little time they would all desert him, which was fulfilled that very night. They were scattered from one another; they shifted everyone for his own safety. Scattered from him: You shall leave me alone. They should have been witnesses for him upon his trial, but they were ashamed of his chain, and afraid of sharing with him in his sufferings, and left him alone. Many a good cause, when it is distressed by its enemies, is deserted by its friends. Those that are tried, do not always prove trusty. If we at any time find our friends unkind to us, let us remember that Christ's were so to him. When they left him alone, they were scattered every man to his own. Everyone went his own way, where he fancied he should be most safe. Christ knew before that his disciples would thus desert him in the critical moment, and yet he was still tender of them. We are ready to say of some, "If we could have foreseen their ingratitude, we would not have been so prodigal of our favours to them"; Christ did foresee theirs, and yet was kind to them. He told them of it: "Do you now believe? Be not high-minded, but fear." Even when we are taking the comfort of our graces, it is good to be reminded of our danger from our corruptions. When our faith is strong, our love flaming, and our evidences are clear, yet we cannot infer thence that tomorrow shall be as this day. Even when we have most reason to think we stand, yet we have reason enough to take heed lest we fall. He spoke of it as a thing very near. The hour was already come when they would be as shy of him as ever they had been fond of him.

(3) An assurance of his own comfort notwithstanding: Yet I am not alone. The Father is with me. We may consider this as a privilege peculiar to the Lord Jesus. The divine nature did not desert the human nature, but supported it. Even when he complained of his Father's forsaking him, yet he called him My God, and was so well assured of his favourable presence with him as to commit his Spirit into his hand. This he had comforted himself with all along (ch. viii. 29), He that sent me is with me, the Father hath not left me alone. As a privilege common to all believers. When they are alone, they are not alone, but the Father is with them. When solitude is their choice—Nathaniel under the fig-tree, Peter upon the house-top, meditating and praying—the Father is with them. Those that converse with God in solitude are never less alone than when alone. A good God and a good heart are good company at any time. When solitude is their affliction, they are not so much alone as they are thought to be, the Father is with them. While we have God's favourable

29, 30. His disciples said, ... now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no proverb—hardly more so than before; the time for perfect plainness was yet to come; but having caught a glimpse of His meaning (it was nothing more), they eagerly express their satisfaction, as if glad to make anything of His words. How touchingly does this show both the simplicity of their hearts and the infantile character of their faith!

31-33. Jesus answered ..., Do ye now believe?—i.e., 'It is well ye do, for it is soon to be tested, and in a way ye little expect.'

the hour cometh, yea, is now come, that ye shall be scattered, every man to his own, and shall leave me alone; and yet I am not alone—A deep and awful sense of wrong experienced is certainly expressed here, but how lovingly! That He was not to be utterly deserted, that there was One who would not forsake Him, was to Him matter of ineffable support and consolation; but that He should be without all human countenance and cheer, who as Man was exquisitely sensitive to the law of sympathy, would fill themselves with as much shame, when they afterwards recurred to it, as the Redeemer's heart in His hour of need with pungent sorrow. "I looked for some to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but I found none" (Ps. 69:20).

because the Father is with me—how near, and with what sustaining power, who can express?

ADAM CLARKE

29. Lo, now speakest thou plainly. The disciples received more light now on the nature of Christ's person and office than they had ever done before.

30. Now are we sure that thou knowest all things. Is not the following the meaning of the disciples? We believe that Thou art not only the Messiah who came out from God, but that Thou art that God who searchest the heart and triest the reins, and needest not to be asked in order to make Thee acquainted with the necessities of Thy creatures; for Thou perfectly knowest their wants, and art infinitely disposed to relieve them.

31. Do ye now believe? And will you continue to believe? You are now fully convinced; and will you in the hour of trial retain your conviction, and prove faithful and steady?

32. The hour cometh. You shall shortly have need of all the faith you profess. You now believe Me to be the Omniscient; but you will find difficulty to maintain this faith when you see Me seized, condemned, and crucified as a malefactor. Yes, your faith will be then so shaken that you shall run away, each striving to save himself at his "own home," or among his "kindred."

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

We have here the calm consciousness of unbroken communion. Jesus Christ's sense of union with the Father was deep, close, constant, in manner and measure altogether transcending any experience of ours. But still He sets before us a pattern of what we should aim at in these great words. They show the path of comfort for every lonely heart. "I am not alone, for the Father is with Me." If earth be dark, let us look to heaven. If the world with its millions seems to have no friend in it for us, let us turn to Him who never leaves us. If dear ones are torn from our grasp, let us grasp God. Solitude is bitter; but, like other bitters, it is a tonic. It is not all loss if the trees which with their leafy beauty shut out the sky from us are felled, and so we see the blue.

presence with us, we are happy, though all the world forsake us.

II. He comforts them with a promise of peace in him, by virtue of his victory over the world, whatever troubles they might meet with in it (v. 33): "These things have I spoken, that in me you might have peace; for in the world you shall have tribulation. I have overcome the world."

1. The end Christ aimed at: That in him they might have peace. His departure from them was really for the best. It is the will of Christ that his disciples should have peace within, whatever their troubles may be without. Peace in Christ is the only true peace. Through him we have peace with God, and so in him we have peace in our own minds. The word of Christ aims at this, that in him we may have peace.

2. The entertainment they were likely to meet with in the world. It has been the lot of Christ's disciples to have more or less tribulation in this world. Men persecute them because they are so good, and God corrects them because they are no better. So between both they shall have tribulation.

3. The encouragement Christ gives them: "But be of good cheer, have a good heart on it, all shall be well." In the midst of the tribulations of this world it is the duty and interest of Christ's disciples to be of good cheer; as sorrowful indeed, in compliance with the temper of the climate, and yet always rejoicing, always cheerful, even in tribulation, Rom. v. 3.

4. The ground of that encouragement: I have overcome the world. Christ's victory is a Christian triumph. When he sends his disciples to preach the gospel to all the world, "Be of good cheer," says he, "I have overcome the world." He overcame the evil things of the world by submitting to them; he endured the cross, despising it and the shame of it; and he overcame the good things of it by being wholly dead to them. Never was there such a conqueror of the world as Christ was, and we ought to be encouraged by it. Christ has overcome the world before us; so that we may look upon it as a conquered enemy. He has conquered it for us, as the captain of our salvation. By his cross the world is crucified to us, which bespeaks it completely conquered. Christ having overcome the world, believers have nothing to do but to pursue their victory, and this we do by faith. We are more than conquerors through him that loved us.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

33. These things I have spoken unto you—not the immediately preceding words, but this whole discourse, of which these were the very last words, and which He thus winds up. that in me ye might have peace—in the sublime sense before explained. (See on ch. 14:27.)

In the world ye shall have tribulation—specially arising from its deadly opposition to those who "are not of the world, but chosen out of the world." So that the "peace" promised was far from an unruffled one.

I have overcome the world—not only before you, but for you, that ye may be able to do the same (I John 5:4, 5).

ADAM CLARKE

33. That in me ye might have peace. I give you this warning as another proof that I know all things, and to the end that you may look to Me alone for peace and happiness. The peace of God is ever to be understood as including all possible blessedness—light, strength, comfort, support, a sense of the divine favor, unction of the Holy Spirit, purification of heart, and all these to be enjoyed in Christ.

In the world ye shall have tribulation. Or, as most of the very best MSS. read, "ye have"—the tribulation is at hand; you are just about to be plunged into it. But be of good cheer. Do not despond on account of what I have said. The world shall not be able to overcome you, how severely soever it may try you.

I have overcome the world. I am just now going by My death to put it and its god to the rout. My apparent weakness shall be My victory; My ignominy shall be My glory; and the victory which the world, the devil, and My adversaries in general shall appear to gain over Me shall be their own lasting defeat and My eternal triumph.

CHAPTER 17

I. The circumstances of this prayer, v. 1. None of his prayers are recorded so fully as this.

1. The time when he prayed this prayer; when he had spoken these words, had given the foregoing farewell to his disciples. (1) It was a prayer after sermon; when he had spoken from God to them, he turned to speak to God for them. Those we preach to we must pray for. The word preached should be prayed over, for God gives the increase. (2) It was a prayer after sacrament. He closed the solemnity with this prayer, that God would preserve the good impressions of the ordinance upon them. (3) It was a family prayer. Christ's disciples were his family, and, to set a good example before masters of families, he blessed his household, prayed for them and with them. (4) It was a parting prayer. When we and our friends are parting, it is good to part with prayer, Acts xx. 36. (5) It was a prayer that was a preface to his sacrifice, which he was now about to offer on earth. Christ prayed then as a priest now offering sacrifice, in the virtue of which all prayers were to be made. (6) It was a prayer that was a specimen of his intercession, which he ever lives to make for us within the veil.

2. The outward expression of fervent desire which he used in this prayer: He lifted up his eyes to heaven. He was pleased thus to sanctify this gesture to those that use it, and justify it against those that ridicule it. Sursum corda was anciently used as a call to prayer, Up with your hearts, up to heaven.

II. The first part of the prayer itself, in which Christ prays for himself.

1. He prays to God as a Father: He lifted up his eyes, and said, Father. If God be our Father, we have liberty of access to him, and great expectations from him. Christ calls him here holy Father (v. 11), and righteous Father, v. 25. For it will be of great use to us in prayer to call God as we hope to find him.

2. He prayed for himself first. Though Christ, as God, was prayed to, Christ, as man, prayed. What he had purchased he must ask for; and shall

Vss. 1-26. THE INTERCESSORY PRAYER. (See on ch. 14:1.) Had this prayer not been recorded, what reverential reader would not have exclaimed, Oh, to have been within hearing of such a prayer as that must have been, which wound up the whole of His past ministry and formed the point of transition to the dark scenes which immediately followed! But here it is, and with such signature of the Lips that uttered it that we seem rather to hear it from Himself than read it from the pen of His faithful reporter.

1-3. These words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes—"John very seldom depicts the gestures or looks of our Lord, as here. But this was an occasion of which the impression was indelible, and the upward look could not be passed over" [ALFORD].

I. OUR LORD'S PRAYER FOR HIMSELF, VV. 1-5

Father. Here our Lord addresses the whole divine nature, as He is now performing His last acts in His state of humiliation.

MATTHEW HENRY

we expect to have what we never merited, but have a thousand times forfeited, unless we pray for it? It gives great encouragement to praying people. Time was when he that is advocate for us had a cause of his own to solicit, and this he was to solicit in the same method that is prescribed to us, by prayers and supplications (Heb. v. 7). Christ began with prayer for himself, and afterwards prayed for his disciples; this charity must begin at home, though it must not end there. Christ was much shorter in his prayer for himself than in his prayer for his disciples. Our prayers for the church must not be crowded into a corner of our prayers. Now here are two petitions which Christ puts up for himself, and these two are one. This one petition, Glorify thou me, is twice put up, because it has a double reference. To the prosecution of his undertaking further: Glorify me, that I may glorify thee, v. 1–3. And to the performance of his undertaking hitherto: "Glorify me, for I have glorified thee. I have done my part, and now, Lord, do thine," v. 4, 5.

(1) Christ here prays to be glorified, in order to his glorifying God (v. 1): Glorify thy Son that thy Son may glorify thee.

[1] What he prays for—that he might be glorified in this world. The Father glorified the Son upon earth; even in his sufferings, by the signs and wonders which attended them. Then the Father not only justified, but glorified the Son; even by his sufferings; when he was crucified, he was magnified, he was glorified. It was in his cross that he conquered Satan and death; his thorns were a crown. Much more after his sufferings. The Father glorified the Son when he raised him from the dead.

[2] What he pleads to enforce this request.

First, He pleads relation: Glorify thy Son. Those that have received the adoption of sons may in faith pray for the inheritance of sons; if sanctified, then glorified.

Secondly, He pleads the time: The hour is come. He had often said his hour was not yet come; but now it was come, and he knew it. He calls it this hour (ch. xii. 27), and here the hour. The hour of the Redeemer's death, which was also the hour of the Redeemer's birth, was the most signal and remarkable hour, and, without doubt, the most critical, that ever was since the clock of time was first set going. 1. "The hour is come in the midst of which I need to be owned." The decisive battle between heaven and hell is now to be fought. "Now glorify thy Son, now give him victory, now let thy Son be so upheld as not to fail nor be discouraged." He glorified his Son when he made the cross his triumphant chariot. 2. The hour is come when I am to be glorified. Good Christians in a trying hour, particularly a dying hour, may thus plead: "Now the hour is come, stand by me, now or never: now the earthly tabernacle is to be dissolved, the hour is come that I should be glorified," 2 Cor. v. 1.

Thirdly, He pleads the Father's own interest and concern herein: That thy Son may also glorify thee; that he might glorify the Father two ways: By the death of the cross. Father, glorify thy name, expressed the great intention of his sufferings. "Father, own me in my sufferings, that I may honour thee by them." By the doctrine of the cross now shortly to be published to the world. If God had not glorified Christ crucified, by raising him from the dead, his whole undertaking had been crushed; therefore glorify me, that I may glorify thee. Now hereby he hath taught us what to eye and aim at in our prayers—that is, the honour of God. "Do this and the other for thy servant, that thy servant may glorify thee. Give me health, that I may glorify thee with my body; success, that I may glorify thee with my estate," &c. Hallowed be thy name must be our first petition, which must fix our end in all other petitions, 1 Pet. iv. 11. He hath taught us what to expect and hope for. If we sincerely set ourselves to glorify our Father, he will give us the grace he knows sufficient, and the opportunity he sees convenient. But, if we secretly honour ourselves more than him, instead of honouring ourselves, we shall shame ourselves.

Fourthly, He pleads his commission (v. 2, 3); he desires to glorify his Father, in conformity to the commission given him. Now see here the power of the Mediator.

a. The origin of his power: Thou hast given him power; he has it from God, to whom all power belongs. The church's king is no usurper, as the prince of this world is; Christ's right to rule is incontestable.

b. The extent of his power: He has power over all flesh. Over all mankind. Being now mediating between God and man, he here pleads his power over all flesh. They were men whom he was to subdue and save; out of that race he had a remnant given him, and therefore all that rank of beings was put under his feet. Over mankind considered as corrupt and

ALBERT BARNES:

1. "These words." The words addressed to them in the preceding chapters. They were proceeding to the garden of Gethsemane. It adds much to the interest of this prayer that it was offered in the stillness of the night, in the open air, and in the peculiarly tender circumstances in which Jesus and his apostles were. It is the longest prayer recorded in the New Testament. It was offered on the most tender and solemn occasion that has ever occurred in our world, and it is perhaps the most sublime composition to be found anywhere. Jesus was about to die. Having expressed his love to his disciples, and made known to them his last desires, he now commends them to the protection and blessing of the God of grace. This prayer is moreover a specimen of the manner of his intercession, and evinces the interest which he felt in behalf of all who should become his followers in all ages of the world.—Popular Commentary glorify thy Son—Put honor upon Thy Son, by countenancing, sustaining, and carrying Him through that "hour."

Father, the hour is come—See on ch. 13:31.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

Mark the arresting words with which He began: "Father, the hour is come." All through John we have found references to that hour. It began away back when talking to His mother at Cana He said, "Mine hour is not yet come." Now He said, "Father, the hour is come." To this hour He had been looking forward from the beginning; for it, He had been preparing in all His teaching and all His doing; it was this hour which had constituted the underlying passion, urge of His life. "Father, the hour is come." In the presence of that consciousness, He expressed two desires for himself. The first is contained in the early verses, "Glorify thy Son, that the Son may glorify thee; even as thou gavest him authority over all flesh, that whatsoever thou hast given him, to them he should give eternal life. And this is life eternal, that they should know thee the only true God, and him whom thou didst send, even Jesus Christ. I glorified thee on the earth, having accomplished the work which thou hast given me to do."

What is the desire? "Glorify thy Son, that the Son may glorify thee." He did not say, "Glorify Me that I may glorify Thee." Of course that is what is meant, but the very method of statement is significant. It was not personal, but relative. He was thinking of himself in His intimate relationship with His Father, "Thy Son . . . the Son." Whereas the prayer is personal, as we have said, the first expressed desire maintains His sense of relationship, and all which that meant at that hour. "The hour is come; glorify thy Son, that the Son may glorify thee." He was expressing His desire that the Son might be glorified. What for? That the Son may glorify the Father. The deepest passion of His heart was the glory of God. The deepest passion of the heart of Jesus was not the saving of men, but the glory of God; and then the saving of men, because that is for the glory of God.

2. given—gavest—him power over all flesh—(See on Matt. 11:27; 28:18-20).

ADAM CLARKE

Glorify thy Son. Cause Him to be acknowledged as the promised Messiah by the Jewish people, and as the universal Saviour by the Gentile world; and let such proofs of His Godhead be given as shall serve to convince and instruct mankind. That thy Son also may glorify thee. That by dying He may magnify Thy law and make it honorable, respected among men—show the strictness of Thy justice, and the immaculate purity of Thy nature.

2. As thou hast given him power. As the Messiah, Jesus Christ, received from the Father universal dominion. All flesh, i.e., all the "human race," was given unto Him, that by one sacrifice of himself He might reconcile them all to God, having by His grace tasted death for every man, Heb. ii. 9.

fallen. If man had not in this sense been flesh, he had not needed a Redeemer. Over this sinful race the Lord Jesus has all power; and all judgment is committed to him. Whom he does not rule, he over-rules.

c. The grand intention and design of this power: That he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him. Here is the Father making over the elect to the Redeemer, and giving them to him as the crown and recompence of his undertaking. Here is the Son undertaking to secure the happiness of those that were given him, that he would give eternal life to them. He has lives and crowns to give, eternal lives that never die, immortal crowns that never fade. Now consider how great the Lord Jesus is, and how gracious he is. He sanctifies them in this world, gives them the spiritual life which is eternal life in the bud and embryo. Grace in the soul is heaven in that soul. He will glorify them in the other world; their happiness shall be completed in the vision and fruition of God. We are called to his kingdom and glory, and begotten to the inheritance. What is last in execution was first in intention, and that is eternal life. Christ's dominion over the children of men is in order to the salvation of the children of God. The administration of the kingdoms of providence and grace are put into the same hand, that all things may be made to concur for good to the called.

d. Here is a further explication of this grand design (v. 3): "This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God." Here is,

(a) The great end which the Christian religion sets before us, and that is, eternal life. This he was to reveal to all, and secure to all that were given him. By the gospel life and immortality are brought to light, are brought to hand.

(b) The sure way of attaining this blessed end, which is, by the right knowledge of God and Jesus Christ: "This is life eternal, to know thee, which may be taken two ways: [a] Life eternal lies in the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ. Those that are brought into union with Christ, and live a life of communion with God in Christ, will say. "If this be heaven, heaven is sweet." [b] The knowledge of God and Christ leads to life eternal. The Christian religion shows us the way to heaven, First, By directing us to God, for Christ died to bring us to God. He is the true God, the only true God; the service of him is the only true religion. Secondly, By directing us to Jesus Christ: Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent. If man had continued innocent, the knowledge of the only true God would have been life eternal to him; but now that he is fallen there must be something more. We are therefore concerned to know Christ as our Redeemer. It is life eternal to believe in Christ; and this he has undertaken to give. Those that are acquainted with God and Christ are already in the suburbs of life eternal.

(2) Christ here prays to be glorified in consideration of his having glorified the Father hitherto, v. 4, 5. The meaning of the former petition was, Glorify me in this world; the meaning of the latter is, Glorify me in the other world.

[1] With what comfort Christ reflects on the life he had lived on earth: I have glorified thee, and finished my work. He pleases himself in reviewing the service he had done his Father. This is here recorded for the honour of Christ, that his life upon earth did in all respects fully answer the end of his coming into the world. 1. Our Lord Jesus had work given him to do. His Father gave him his work, both appointed him to it and assisted him in it. 2. The work that was given him to do he finished. It was as good as done, he was giving it its finishing stroke. 3. Herein he glorified his Father. It is the glory of God that his work is perfect, and the same is the glory of the Redeemer; what he is the author of he will be the finisher of. It is recorded for example to all, that we may follow his example. We must make it our business to do the work God has appointed us to do. We must aim at the glory of God in all. We must persevere herein to the end of our days; we must not sit down till we have finished our work. It is recorded for encouragement to all those that rest upon him. If he has finished the work that was given him to do, then he is a complete Saviour, and did not do his work by the halves.

[2] See with what confidence he expects the joy set before him (v. 5): Now, O Father, glorify thou me.

First, See here what he prayed for: Glorify thou me, as before, v. 1. What his Father had promised him yet he must pray for; promises are not designed to supersede prayers, but to be the guide of our desires and the ground of our hopes. 1. It is a glory with God; not only, Glorify my name on earth, but, Glorify me with thine own self. The prayers of the lower world draw out grace and peace from God our Father and our Lord Jesus Christ in conjunction; and thus the Father has glorified him with himself.

give eternal life to as many as . . .—lit., "to all that which thou hast given him." (See on ch. 6:37-40.)

3. this is—that—life eternal, that they might—may—know . . .—This life eternal, then, is not mere conscious and unending existence, but a life of acquaintance with God in Christ (Job 22:21). thee, the only true God—the sole personal living God; in glorious contrast equally with heathen polytheism, philosophic naturalism, and mystic pantheism. and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent—This is the only place where our Lord gives Himself this compound name, afterwards so current in apostolic preaching and writing. Here the terms are used in their strict signification—"JESUS," because He "saves His people from their sins"; "CHRIST," as anointed with the measureless fulness of the Holy Ghost for the exercise of His saving offices (see on Matt. 1:16); "WHOM THOU HAST SENT," in the plenitude of Divine Authority and Power, to save. "The very juxtaposition here of Jesus Christ with the Father is a proof, by implication, of our Lord's Godhead. The knowledge of God and a creature could not be eternal life, and such an association of the one with the other would be inconceivable" [ALFORD].

4, 5. I have glorified thee on the earth—rather, "I glorified" (for the thing is conceived as now past). I have finished—(I finished)—the work which thou gavest me to do—It is very important to preserve in the translation the past tense, used in the original, otherwise it might be thought that the work already "finished" was only what He had done before uttering that prayer; whereas it will be observed that our Lord speaks throughout as already beyond this present scene (vs. 12, etc.), and so must be supposed to include in His "finished work" the "decease which He was to accomplish at Jerusalem."

5. And now—in return. glorify thou me—The "I Thee" and "Thou Me" are so placed in the original, each beside its fellow, as to show that A PERFECT RECIPROCITY OF SERVICES of the Son to the Father first, and then of the Father to the Son in return, is what our Lord means here to express.

ADAM CLARKE

That he should give eternal life. As all were delivered into His power, and He poured out His blood to redeem all, then the design of God is that all should have eternal life, because all are given for this purpose to Christ.

3. This is life eternal. It is called eternal life to show that it reaches beyond the limits of time, and that it necessarily implies: (1) the immortality of the soul; (2) the resurrection of the body; and (3) that it is never to end, hence called "a life ever living." The only true God. The way to attain this eternal life is to acknowledge, worship, and obey, the one only true God, and to accept as Teacher, Sacrifice, and Saviour, the Lord Jesus, the one and only true Messiah.

4. I have glorified thee. Our Lord, considering himself as already sacrificed for the sin of the world, speaks of having completed the work which God had given Him to do; and He looks forward to that time when, through the preaching of His gospel, His sacrifice should be acknowledged, and the true God should be known and worshipped by the whole world.

MATTHEW HENRY

2. It is the glory he had with God before the world was. (1) Jesus Christ, as God, had a being before the world was. Our religion acquaints us with one that was before all things, and by whom all things consist. (2) His glory with the Father is from everlasting. Christ undertook the work of redemption, not because he needed glory, for he had a glory with the Father before the world, but because we needed glory. (3) Jesus Christ in his state of humiliation divested himself of this glory. He was God manifested in the flesh, not in his glory. (4) In his exalted state he resumed this glory. He does not pray to be glorified with the princes and great men of the earth: no; he that knew both worlds, chose it in the glory of the other world, as far exceeding all the glory of this. Let the same mind be in us. Father, glorify thou me with thine own self.

Secondly, See here what he pleaded: I have glorified thee; and now, glorify thou me. There was an equity in it, and an admirable becomingness, that, if God was glorified in him, he should glorify him in himself. If the Father was a gainer in his glory by the Son's humiliation, it was fit the Son should be no loser by it, at long run, in his glory. It was according to the covenant between them. It was for the joy set before him that he endured the cross. He still expects the completing of his exaltation, because he perfected his undertaking. By the glorifying of Christ we are satisfied that God was satisfied, and therein a real demonstration was given that his Father was well pleased in him as his beloved Son. Thus we must be taught that those, and only those who glorify God on earth shall be glorified with the Father, when they must be no more in this world.

Christ, having prayed for himself, comes next to pray for those that are his.

I. Whom he did not pray for (v. 9): I pray not for the world. It is not meant of the world of mankind in general (he prays for that here, v. 21, That the world may believe that thou hast sent me). Take the world for a heap of unwinnowed corn in the floor, and God loves it, Christ prays for it, and dies for it, for a blessing is in it. Then take the world for the remaining heap of rejected, worthless chaff. For these Christ does not pray; not but that there are some things which he intercedes with God for on their behalf, as the dresser for the reprieve of the barren tree; but he does not pray for them in this prayer. He does not say, I pray against the world, but, I pray not for them, I pass them by, and leave them to themselves. We that know not who are chosen, and who are passed by, must pray for all men, 1 Tim. ii. 1, 4. While there is life, there is hope, and room for prayer.

II. Whom he did pray for; the children of men. He prays for those that were given him, who receive and believe the words of Christ, v. 6, 8. He prays for all that should believe on him (v. 20). Not only the petitions that follow, but those also which went before, must be construed to extend to all believers, in every place and every age.

III. What are the general pleas with which he introduces his petitions for them. They are five:

1. The charge he had received concerning them: Thine they were, and thou gavest them me (v. 6), and again (v. 9), Those whom thou hast given me. This is meant primarily of the disciples that then were. They were given in order to their being the publishers of his gospel and the planters of his church. When they left all to follow him, this was the secret spring of that strange resolution: they were given to him, else they had not given themselves to him. The apostleship and ministry, which are Christ's gift to the church, were first the Father's gift to Jesus Christ. Christ received this gift for men, that he might give it to men. It lays a mighty obligation upon the ministers of the gospel to devote themselves entirely to Christ's service, as being given to him, but it is designed to extend to all the elect, for they are elsewhere said to be given to Christ (ch. vi. 37, 39).

(1) The Father had authority to give them: Thine they were, his own in three ways: First, They were creatures, and their lives and beings were derived from him. Secondly, They were criminals, and their lives and beings were forfeited to him. It was a remnant of fallen mankind that was given to Christ to be redeemed, that might have been made sacrifices to justice when they were pitched upon to be the monuments of mercy. Thirdly, They were chosen; they were set apart for God. This he insists upon again (v. 7): All things whatsoever thou hast given me are of thee; they are all of thee, and therefore, Father, I bring them all to thee, that they may be all for thee.

(2) He did accordingly give them to the Son: Thou gavest them to me, as sheep to the shepherd, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was—when "in the beginning the Word was with God" (ch. 1:1), "the only-begotten Son in the bosom of the Father" (ch. 1:18). With this pre-existent glory, which He veiled on earth, He asks to be reinvested, the design of the veiling being accomplished—not, however, simply as before, but now in our nature.

6-8. From praying for Himself He now comes to pray for His disciples.

not for the world—for they had been given Him "out of the world" (vs. 6), and had been already transformed into the very opposite of it. The things sought for them, indeed, are applicable only to such.

to the men thou gavest me out of the world (See on ch. 6:37-40).

ADAM CLARKE

5. Before the world was. That is, from eternity, before there was any creation—so the phrase, and others similar to it, are taken in the sacred writings; see v. 24; Ps. xc. 2; Eph. i. 4. See chap. i. 1.

ALBERT BARNES:

"Before the world was." There could not be a more distinct and clear declaration of the preexistence of Christ than this. It means before the creation of the world; before there was any world. Of course, the speaker here must have existed then, and this is equivalent to saying that he existed from eternity (see John 1:1, 2; 6:62; 3:13; 16:28). The glory which he had then was that which was proper to the Son of God, represented by the expression "being in the bosom of the Father" (John 1:18), denoting intimacy, friendship, united felicity. The Son of God, by becoming incarnate, is represented as "humbling himself" (Greek, he "emptied himself"), Phil. 2:8. He laid aside for a time the external aspect of honor, and consented to become despised, and to assume the form of a servant. He now prays that God would raise him up to the dignity and honor which he had before his incarnation. This is the state to which he is now exalted, with the additional honor of having made atonement for sin, and having opened the way to save a race of rebels from eternal death. The lowest condition on earth is frequently connected with the highest honors of heaven. Man looks on the outward appearance. God looks to him that is humble and of a contrite spirit.—Popular Commentary

II. Our Lord's Prayer for His Disciples, vv. 6-19

9. I pray not for the world. I am not yet come to that part of My intercession; see v. 20. I am now wholly employed for My disciples, that they may be properly qualified to preach My salvation to the ends of the earth. Jesus here imitates the high priest, the second part of whose prayer, on the day of expiation, was for the priests, the sons of Aaron. These words may also be understood as applying to the rebellious Jews. God's wrath was about to descend upon them, and Christ prays that His own followers might be kept from the evil, v. 15. But He does not thus pray for the world, the rebellious Jews, because the cup of their iniquity was full, and their judgment slumbered not.

The men which thou gavest me. That is, the apostles, who, having received this knowledge from Christ, were by their preaching and writings to spread it through the whole world. Out of the world. From among the Jewish people; for in this sense is the word kosmos to be understood in various parts of our Lord's last discourses. Thine they were. Objects of Thy choice; and thou gavest them me from among this very unbelieving people, that they might be My disciples and the heralds of My salvation.

to be kept; as patients to the physician, to be cured; children to a tutor, to be educated. They were delivered to Christ, that the election of grace might not be frustrated, that not one, no not of the little ones, might perish, that the undertaking of Christ might not be fruitless. He should see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied (Isa. liii. 10, 11).

2. The care he had taken of them to teach them (v. 6): I have manifested thy name to them. I have given to them the words which thou gavest to me, v. 8. Observe here, The great design of Christ's doctrine, which was to manifest God's name, to declare him that he might be better loved and worshipped. His faithful discharge of this undertaking: I have done it. His fidelity appears in the truth of his doctrine. It agreed exactly with the instructions he received from his Father. Ministers, in wording their message, must have an eye to the words which the Holy Ghost teaches. In the tendency of his doctrine, which was to manifest God's name, He did not seek himself, but aimed to magnify his Father. It is Christ's prerogative to manifest God's name to the souls of the children of men. He only has acquaintance with the Father, and so is able to open the truth; and he only has access to the spirits of men, and so is able to open the understanding. Ministers may publish the name of the Lord, but Christ only can manifest that name. Ministers may speak the words of God to us, but Christ can give us his words, can put them in us. Sooner or later, Christ will manifest God's name to all that were given him.

3. The good effect of the care he had taken of them (v. 6): They have kept thy word (v. 7), they have known that all things are of thee (v. 8); they have received thy words, and have known surely that I came out from thee, and have believed that thou didst send me.

(1) What success the doctrine of Christ had among those that were given to him. "They have received the words which I gave them, as the ground receives the seed, and the earth drinks in the rain." The word was to them an ingrafted word. "They have kept thy word; they have conformed to it." Christ's commandment is then only kept when it is obeyed. It was requisite that these should keep what was committed to them, for it was to be transmitted by them to every place for every age. "They have understood the word, They have been aware that all things whatsoever thou hast given me are of thee." All Christ's offices and powers, all the gifts of the Spirit, all his graces and comforts, were all from God, designed by his grace, for his own glory in man's salvation. We may therefore venture our souls upon Christ's mediation. If the righteousness be of God's appointing, we shall be justified; if the grace be of his dispensing, we shall be sanctified. They have set their seal to it: They have known surely that I came out from God, v. 8. What it is to believe; it is to know surely, to know that it is so of a truth. We may know surely that which we neither do nor can know fully. We walk by faith, which knows surely, not yet by sight, which knows clearly. What it is we are to believe: that Jesus Christ came out from God, and that God did send him. Therefore all the doctrines of Christ are to be received as divine truths, and all his promises depended upon as divine securities.

(2) How Jesus Christ here speaks of this: As pleased with it himself. Their constant adherence to him, their gradual improvements, and their great attainments at last, were his joy. Christ is a Master that delights in the proficiency of his scholars. He accepts the sincerity of their faith, and graciously passes by the infirmity of it. As pleading it with his Father. He is praying for those that were given to him; and he pleads that they had given themselves to him. Those that keep Christ's word, and believe on him, let Christ alone to commend them, and, which is more, to recommend them to his Father.

4. He pleads the Father's own interest in them (v. 9): I pray for them, for they are thine. All mine are thine, and thine are mine.

(1) The plea particularly urged for his disciples: They are thine. The consigning of the elect to Christ was so far from making them less the Father's that it was in order to making them the more so. Christ has redeemed us, not to himself only, but to God. This is a good plea in prayer, Christ here pleads it, They are thine; we may plead it for ourselves, I am thine, save me; and for others: "They are thy people. They are thine. Wilt thou not secure them, that they may not be run down by the devil and the world? They are thine, own them as thine."

(2) The foundation on which this plea is grounded: All mine are thine, and thine are mine. This bespeaks the Father and Son to be one in essence and one in interest. What the Father has as Creator is delivered over to the Son. All things are delivered to him (Matt. xi. 27); nothing is excepted but he that did put all

I have manifested—I manifested—thy name—His whole character towards mankind.

8. they . . . have known surely that I came out from thee—(See on ch. 16:30, 31).

9-14. I pray for them—not as individuals merely, but as representatives of all such in every succeeding age (see on vs. 20).

10. all mine are thine, and thine are mine—lit., "All My things are Thine and Thy things are Mine." (On this use of the neuter gender, see on ch. 6:37-40.) Absolute COMMUNITY OF PROPERTY between the Father and the Son is here expressed as nakedly as words can do it. (See on vs. 5.)

ADAM CLARKE

6. I have manifested thy name. I have brought it into light, and caused it to shine in itself, and to illuminate others. A little of the divine nature was known by the works of creation; a little more was known by the Mosaic revelation. But the full manifestation of God, His nature, and His attributes came only through the revelation of Christ.

And they have kept thy word. Though their countrymen have rejected it; and they have received Me as Thy well-beloved Son in whom Thou delightest.

8. I have given unto them the words. I have delivered Thy doctrine to them, so that they have had a pure teaching immediately from heaven. And have known surely. Are fully convinced and acknowledge that I am the promised Messiah, and that they are to look for none other, and that My mission and doctrine are all divine.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

In verse 9 Jesus assumes the great office of Intercessor. "I pray for them" is not so much prayer as His solemn presentation of himself before the Father as the High Priest of His people. It marks an epoch in His work. The task of bringing God to man is substantially complete. That of bringing men by supplication to God is now to begin. It is the revelation of the permanent office of the departed Lord. Moses on the Mount holds up the rod, and Israel prevails (Ex. 17:9). The limitation of this prayer to the disciples applies only to the special occasion, and has no bearing on the sweep of His redeeming purpose or the desires of His all-pitying heart. The reasons for His intercession follow in verses 9-11a. The disciples are the Father's, and continue so even when "given" to Christ, in accordance with the community of possession, which oneness of nature and perfectness of love establish between the Father and the Son. God cannot but care for those who are His. The Son cannot but pray for those who are His. Their having recognized Him for what He was binds Him to pray for them. He is glorified in His disciples, and if we show forth His character, He will be our Advocate.

MATTHEW HENRY

things under him. What the Son has as Redeemer is designed for the Father. All the benefits of redemption purchased by the Son are intended for the Father's praise: All mine are thine. The Son owns none for his that are not devoted to the service of the Father. In a limited sense, every true believer may say, All thine are mine. In an unlimited sense every true believer does say, Lord, all mine are thine; all laid at his feet, to be serviceable to him. "Lord, take care of what I have, for it is all thine."

5. He pleads his own concern in them: I am glorified in them. (1) I have been glorified in them. What little honour Christ had in this world was among his disciples, and therefore I pray for them. (2) "I am to be glorified in them; they are to bear up my name. I am glorified in them, therefore, I concern myself for them. Therefore I commit them to the Father, who has engaged to glorify the Son, and, upon this account, will have a gracious eye to those in whom he is glorified."

Verses 11–16

After the general pleas follow the particular petitions he puts up for them. They all relate to spiritual blessings in heavenly things. The prosperity of the soul is the best prosperity. They are such blessings as were suited to their present state and case. Christ's intercession is always pertinent. Our advocate with the father is acquainted with all the particulars of our wants. He is large and full in the petitions, to teach us fervency and importunity in prayer, wrestling as Jacob, I will not let thee go, except thou bless me.

Now the first thing Christ prays for is their preservation. Keeping supposes danger, and their danger arose from the world; the evil of this he begs they might be kept from.

I. The request itself: Keep them from the world. There were two ways of their being delivered from the world:

1. By taking them out of it; and he does not pray that they might be so delivered: I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world.

(1) "I pray not that they may be speedily removed by death." If the world will be vexatious to them, the readiest way to secure them would be to hasten them out of it. Send chariots and horses of fire for them, to fetch them to heaven. Christ would not pray so for his disciples. Because he came to conquer those intemperate passions which make men impatient of life, it is his will that we should take up our cross, and not outrun it. Because he had work for them to do in the world, the world could ill spare them. In pity therefore to this dark world, Christ would not have these lights removed out of it, especially for the sake of those in the world that were to believe in him through their word. They must each in his own order die a martyr, but not till they have finished their testimony. The taking of good people out of the world is a thing by no means to be desired. Though Christ loves his disciples, he does not presently send for them to heaven, but leaves them for some time in this world, that they may be ripened for heaven. Many good people are spared to live, because they can ill be spared to die.

(2) "I pray not that they may be exempted from the troubles of this world, and taken out of the toil and terror of it." Not that, being freed from all trouble, they may bask in luxurious ease, but that by the help of God they may be preserved in a scene of danger; so Calvin. Not that they may be kept from all conflict with the world, but that they may not be overcome by it. It is more the honour of a Christian soldier by faith to overcome the world than by a monastical vow to retreat from it; and more for the honour of Christ to serve him in a city than to serve him in a cell.

2. By keeping them from the corruption that is in the world, v. 11, 15. Here are three branches of this petition:

(1) Holy Father, keep those whom thou hast given me. Christ was now leaving them. He does here commit them to the custody of his Father. It is the unspeakable comfort of all believers that Christ himself has committed them to the care of God. Those cannot but be safe whom the almighty God keeps, and he cannot but keep those whom the Son of his love commits to him. He here puts them under the divine protection. To this prayer is owing the wonderful preservation of the gospel ministry and gospel church in the world unto this day. He puts them under the divine tuition. We need God's power not only to put us into a state of grace, but to keep us in it. The titles he gives to him he prays to, and them he prays for, enforce the petition. He speaks to God as a holy Father. If he be a holy God and hate sin, he will make those holy that are his, and

JOHN WESLEY:

10. "All things that are mine are thine, and that are thine are mine." These are very lofty and strong expressions, too grand for any mere creature to use; as implying that all things whatsoever, inclusive of the divine nature, perfections, and operations, are the common property of the Father and the Son. This is the original ground of that peculiar property which both have in the persons who were given to Christ as Mediator; according to what is said of his being glorified by them; namely, believing in him, and so acknowledging his glory.
—Expositions of Holy Scripture

15-19. I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world—for that, though it would secure their own safety, would leave the world unblessed by their testimony.

Holy Father—an expression He nowhere else uses. "Father" is His wonted appellation, but "Holy" is here prefixed, because His appeal was to that perfection of the Father's nature, to "keep" or preserve them from being tainted by the unholy atmosphere of "the world" they were still in.

ADAM CLARKE

10. I am glorified in them. Christ speaks of the things which were not, but which should be, as though they were. He anticipates the glorifying of His name by the successful preaching of the apostles.

15. That thou shouldest take them out of the world. They must not yet leave the land of Judea; they had not as yet borne their testimony here, concerning Christ crucified and risen again from the dead.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

In the petition itself (v. 11b), observe the invocation "Holy Father!" with special reference to the prayer for preservation from the corruption of the world. God's holiness is the pledge that He will make us holy, since He is "Father" as well. Observe the substance of the request, that the disciples should be kept, as in a fortress, within the enclosing circle of the name which God has given to Jesus. The name is the manifestation of the divine nature. It was given to Jesus, inasmuch as He, "the Word," had from the beginning the office of revealing God; and that which was spoken of the Angel of the Covenant is true in highest reality of Jesus: "My name is in Him." "The name of the Lord is a strong tower: the righteous runneth into it and is safe."—Expositions of Holy Scripture keep them from sin, which they also hate and dread as the greatest evil. If he be a Father, he will take care of his own children; who else should? He speaks of them as those whom the Father had given him. What we receive as our Father's gifts, we may comfortably remit to our Father's care.

(2) Keep them through thine own name: keep them for thy name's sake. Those may with comfort plead it that are indeed more concerned for the honour of God's name than for any interest of their own. Keep them in thy name. "Keep them in the knowledge and fear of thy name; keep them in the profession and service of thy name, whatever it cost them." Keep them by or through thy name. "Keep them by thine own power, in thine own hand. Let thy name be their strong tower."

(3) Keep them from the evil, or out of the evil. He had taught them to pray daily, Deliver us from evil, and this would encourage them to pray. "Keep them from the evil one. Keep them from Satan as a tempter, that their faith may not fail. Keep them from him as a destroyer. Keep them from the evil thing, that is, sin. Keep them, that they do no evil. Keep them from the evil of the world, and of their tribulation in it, so that it may have no sting in it." Not that they might be kept from affliction, but kept through it.

II. The reasons with which he enforces these requests, which are five:

1. He pleads that hitherto he had kept them (v. 12): "While I was with them in the world, I have kept them in thy name, they are all safe, and none of them missing, but the son of perdition; he is lost, that the scripture might be fulfilled."

(1) Christ's faithful discharge of his undertaking: While he was with them, he kept them, and his care concerning them was not in vain. Many that followed him awhile took offence at something or other, and went off; but he kept the twelve that they should not go away. While he was with them, he kept them in a visible manner. When he was gone from them, they must be kept in a more spiritual manner. Comforts and supports are sometimes given and sometimes withheld; but, when they are withdrawn, yet they are not left comfortless. What Christ here says is true of all the saints while they are here in this world; Christ keeps them in God's name. They are weak, and cannot keep themselves. They are, in God's account, valuable and worth the keeping; his treasure, his jewels. Their salvation is designed, for to this it is that they are kept, 1 Pet. i. 5. The righteous are preserved for the day of bliss. They are the charge of the Lord Jesus; he keeps them, and exposed himself like the good shepherd for the preservation of the sheep.

(2) The comfortable account he gives of his undertaking: None of them is lost. Jesus Christ will certainly keep all that were given to him; they may think themselves lost, and may be nearly lost (in imminent peril); but it is the Father's will that he should lose none, and none he will lose.

(3) A brand put upon Judas, as none of those whom he had undertaken to keep. He was among those that were given to Christ, but not of them. But the apostasy and ruin of Judas were no reproach at all to his Master, or his family. He was the son of perdition, and therefore not one of those that were given to Christ to be kept. It is an awful consideration that one of the apostles proved a son of perdition. No man's place or name in the church will secure him from ruin, if his heart be not right with God. The scripture was fulfilled; the sin of Judas was foreseen and foretold, and the event would certainly follow after the prediction as a consequent, though it cannot be said necessarily to follow from it as an effect.

2. He pleads that he was now under a necessity of leaving them (v. 11): "Keep them now. Keep them, that they may be one with us as we are with each other."

(1) With what pleasure he speaks of his own departure. He expresses himself concerning it with an air of triumph and exultation, with reference both to the world he left and the world he removed to. "Now I am no more in the world. Now farewell to this provoking troublesome world. Now the welcome hour is at hand when I shall be no more in it." It should be a pleasure to those that have their home in the other world to think of being no more in this world. What is there here that should court our stay? Now I come to thee. To get clear of the world is but the one half of the comfort of a dying Christ, of a dying Christian; the far better half is to think of going to the Father. Those who love God cannot but be pleased to think of coming to him, though it be through the valley of the shadow of death. It is to be present with the Lord, like children fetched keep through thine own name—rather, 'in thy name'; in the exercise of that gracious and holy character for which He was known.

but . . . keep them from the evil—all evil in and of the world.

12. I kept—guarded—them in thy name—acting as Thy Representative on earth.

none of them is lost, but the son of perdition—It is not implied here that the son of perdition was one of those whom the Father had given to the Son, but rather the contrary (ch. 13:18) [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. It is just as in Luke 4:26, 27, where we are not to suppose that the woman of Sarepta (in Sidon) was one of the widows of Israel, nor Naaman the Syrian one of the lepers in Israel, though the language—the same as here—might seem to express it. son of perdition—doomed to it (II Thess. 2:3; Mark 14:21).

that they may be one—See on vs. 21.

11. I am no more in the world—(see on vs. 4) but these are in the world—i.e., Though My struggles are at an end, theirs are not; though I have gotten beyond the scene of strife, I cannot sever Myself in spirit from them, left behind and only just entering on their great conflict.

ADAM CLARKE

Keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me. Instead of those whom thou hast given me, many MSS. read ho, which refers to thy name, immediately preceding. The whole passage should be read thus: "Holy Father, keep them through Thy own name which Thou hast given me, that they may be one." By the name, here, it is evident that the doctrine or knowledge of the true God is intended; as if our Lord had said, Keep them in that doctrine which Thou hast given Me, that they may be one. This reading is supported by the most ample evidence and indisputable authority.

12. I kept them in thy name. In Thy doctrine and truth.

But the son of perdition. So we find that Judas, whom all account to have been lost, and whose case at best is extremely dubious, was first given by God to Christ. But why was he lost? Because, says Augustine, he would not be saved; and he further adds, After the commission of his crime, he might have returned to God and have found mercy. Perdition or "destruction" is personified; and Judas is represented as being her son, i.e., one of the worst of men. That the scripture might be fulfilled. Or, "Thus the scripture is fulfilled"; see Ps. xli. 9; cix. 8, compared with Acts i. 20.

That they may be one. That they and all that believe through their word (the doctrine which I have given them) may be one body, united by one Spirit to Me, their living Head. The union which Christ recommends here and prays for is so complete and glorious as to be fitly represented by that union which subsists between the Father and the Son.

11. I am no more in the world. I am just going to leave the world, and therefore they shall stand in need of peculiar assistance and support. They have need of all the influence of My intercession, that they may be preserved in Thy truth.

home from school to their father's house.

(2) With what a tender concern he speaks of those whom he left behind: "But these are in the world Holy Father, keep them; they will want my presence let them have thine. They have now more need than ever to be kept, and will be lost if thou do not keep them." When our Lord Jesus was going to the Father, he carried with him a tender concern for his own that are in the world. When he is out of their sight they are not out of his, much less out of his mind. When Christ would express the utmost need his disciples had of divine preservation, he only says, They are in the world; this bespeaks danger enough to those who are bound for heaven.

3. He pleads what a satisfaction it would be to them to know themselves safe, and what a satisfaction it would be to him to see them easy: I speak this, that they may have my joy fulfilled in themselves, v. 13.

(1) Christ earnestly desired the fulness of the joy of his disciples, for it is his will that they should rejoice evermore. When they thought their joy in him was brought to an end, then was it advanced nearer to perfection than ever it had been, and they were fuller of it. We are here taught to found our joy in Christ. Christ is a Christian's joy, his chief joy. Joy in the world is withering with it; joy in Christ is everlasting, like him. To build up our joy with diligence. No part of the Christian life is pressed upon us more earnestly, Phil. iii. 1; iv. 4. To aim at the perfection of this joy.

(2) In order hereunto, he did thus solemnly commit them to his Father's care and keeping: These things I speak in the world. Saying this in the world would be a greater satisfaction and encouragement to them, and would enable them to rejoice in tribulation. Christ has not only treasured up comforts for his people, but has given out comforts to them. He here condescended to publish his last will and testament, and (which many a testator is shy of) lets them know what legacies he had left them, and how well they were secured. Christ's intercession for us is enough to fulfil our joy in him; nothing more effectual to silence all our fears and mistrusts than this, that he always appears in the presence of God for us. See Heb. vii. 25.

4. He pleads the ill usage they were likely to meet with in the world, for his sake (v. 14): "I have given them thy word, and they have received it, and therefore the world hath hated them, because they are not of the world, any more than I." The world's enmity to Christ's followers. While Christ was with them it hates them, much more would it do so when by their more extensive preaching of the gospel they would turn the world upside down. "Father, stand their friend," says Christ. "Let them have thy love, for the world's hatred is entailed upon them." It is God's honour to take part with the weaker side, and to help the helpless. The reasons of this enmity, which strengthen the plea. One reason is because they had received the word of God by the hand of Christ, when the greatest part of the world rejected it. Those that receive Christ's goodwill and good word must expect the world's ill will and ill word. Gospel ministers have been in a particular manner hated by the world, because they call men out of the world, and separate them from it, and so condemn the world. "Father, keep them, they are sufferers for thee." Those that keep the word of Christ's patience are entitled to special protection in the hour of temptation. That cause which makes a martyr may well make a joyful sufferer. Another reason is more express; the world hates them, because they are not of the world. Those to whom the word of Christ comes in power are not of the world, and therefore the world bears them a grudge.

5. He pleads their conformity to himself in a holy non-conformity to the world (v. 16): "Father, keep them, they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." Those may in faith commit themselves to God's custody, who are as Christ was in this world. God will love those that are like Christ. (1) Jesus Christ was not of this world; he never had been of it. This intimates, First, His state; he was none of the world's favourites nor darlings; worldly possessions he had none, not even where to lay his head; nor worldly power. Secondly, His Spirit; he was perfectly dead to the world, the prince of this world had nothing in him. (2) Therefore true Christians are not of this world. It is their lot to be despised by the world; they are not in favour with the world any more than their Master before them was. It is their privilege to be delivered from the world. It is their duty and character to be dead to the world. Christ's disciples were weak, and had many infirmities; yet this he could say for them, They were not of the world and therefore he recommends them to the care of Heaven.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

13. I speak in the world, that they might have my joy fulfilled in themselves—i.e., Such a strain befits rather the upper sanctuary than the scene of conflict; but I speak so "in the world," that My joy, the joy I experience in knowing that such intercessions are to be made for them by their absent Lord, may be tasted by those who now hear them, and by all who shall hereafter read the record of them,'

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

Going away so soon, He yearned to leave them sharers of His own emotions in the prospect of His departure to the Father, and therefore He had admitted them (and us) to hear this sacred outpouring of His desires. If we laid to heart the blessed revelations of this disclosure of Christ's heart, and followed Him with faithful gaze as He ascends to the Father, and realized our share in that triumph, our empty vessels would be filled by some of that same joy which was His. Earthly joy can never be full; Christian joy should never be anything less than full. —Expositions of Holy Scripture

16. They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world—(See on ch. 15:18, 19). This is reiterated here, to pave the way for the prayer which follows.

ADAM CLARKE

13. My joy fulfilled in themselves. See on chap. xv. 11.

14. I have given them thy word. Or "Thy doctrine." And the world hath hated them. The Jewish rulers have hated them.

F. B. MEYER:

In the world, but not of the world. What is "the world"? The inspired definition is given in 1 John 2:16. Enumerating her three offsprings, the apostle goes on the say, "All that is in the world . . . is not of the Father," that is, does not originate or proceed from him. We might reverse the proposition and say, "All that does not emanate from the Father, and which is inconsistent with perfect love and purity and truth, is of the world."

The spirit of the world permeates society. All its plans, aims, and activities belong to the present passing show. "Under the sun" is the suggestion of Ecclesiastes. The world has always been in collision with Christ, because his teaching reverses everything that the world prizes. In its beatitudes, its methods of pleasure and acquisition, its view and use of power, and its attitude toward God, the difference is wide as the poles. But its hatred is welcome to the followers of Christ, as proving that they are on the Master's track, and in his fellowship they are abundantly compensated.—Bible Commentary

Verses 17–19

The next thing he prayed for them was that they might be sanctified; not only kept from evil, but made good.

I. Here is the petition (v. 17): Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth. He desires they may be sanctified,

1. As Christians, 1 Thess. v. 23.

(1) The grace desired—sanctification. He prays, Father, sanctify them. "Confirm the work of sanctification in them, rivet their good resolutions. Carry on that good work in them; let the light shine more and more. Complete it, sanctify them throughout and to the end." He cannot for shame own them as his, either here or hereafter, or present them to his Father, if they be not sanctified. Those that through grace are sanctified have need to be sanctified more and more. Not to go forward is to go backward; he that is holy must be holy still, more holy still. It is God that sanctifies as well as God that justifies.

(2) The means of conferring this grace—through thy truth, thy word is truth. Divine revelation, as it now stands in the written word, is not only pure truth without mixture, but entire truth without deficiency. This word of truth should be the outward and ordinary means of our sanctification. It is the seed of the new birth, and the food of the new life.

2. As ministers. "Sanctify them, let their call to the apostleship be ratified in heaven. Qualify them for the office, with Christian graces and ministerial gifts. Separate them to the office. I have called them, they have consented; Father, say Amen to it. Own them in the office; let thy hand go along with them. Sanctify them to thy truth, to be the preachers of thy truth to the world." Jesus Christ intercedes for his ministers with a particular concern, and recommends to his Father's grace those stars he carries in his right hand. The great thing to be asked of God for gospel ministers is that they may be sanctified, entirely devoted to God, and experimentally acquainted with the influence of that word upon their own hearts which they preach to others.

II. We have here two pleas to enforce the petition,

1. The mission they had from him (v. 18): "As thou hast sent me into the world, so now have I sent them into the world."

(1) Christ speaks with great assurance of his own mission: Thou hast sent me into the world. He was sent of God to say what he said, and do what he did, and be what he is to those that believe on him.

(2) He speaks of the commission he had given his disciples: "So have I sent them on the same errand"; to preach the same doctrine that he preached. He gave them their commission (ch. xx. 21) with a reference to his own, and it magnifies their office that it comes from Christ, and that there is some affinity between the commission given to the ministers of reconciliation and that given to the Mediator. Only they are sent as servants, he as a Son. Christ was concerned so much for them, because he had himself put them into a difficult office, which required great abilities for the due discharge of it. Whom Christ sends he will stand by. What he calls us out to he will fit us out for, and bear us out in. He committed them to his Father, because he was concerned in their cause, their mission being in prosecution of his. The Father sanctified him when he sent him into the world, ch. x. 36. Now, they being sent as he was, let them also be sanctified.

2. The merit he had for them is another thing here pleaded (v. 19): For their sakes I sanctify myself. (1) Christ's designation of himself to the work and office of Mediator: I sanctified myself. He entirely devoted himself to the undertaking, and all the parts of it, especially that which he was now going about—the offering up of himself without spot unto God, by the eternal Spirit. This he pleads with his Father, for his intercession is made in the virtue of his satisfaction. (2) Christ's design of kindness to his disciples herein; it is for their sakes, that they may be sanctified, that they may be saints and ministers, duly qualified and accepted of God. The office of the ministry is the purchase of Christ's blood, and one of the blessed fruits of his satisfaction. The real holiness of all good Christians is the fruit of Christ's death. He gave himself for his church, to sanctify it. And he that designed the end designed also the means, that they might be sanctified by the truth. The word of truth receives its sanctifying virtue and power from the death of Christ. And this Christ has prayed for, for all that are his; for this is his will, even their sanctification, which encourages them to pray for it.

Next to their purity he prays for their unity.

I. Who are included in this prayer (v. 20): "Not these only, but for those also who shall believe on me

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

17. Sanctify them—As the former prayer, "Keep them," was negative, asking protection for them from the poisonous element which surrounded and pressed upon their renewed nature, so this prayer, "Sanctify them," is positive, asking the advancement and completion of their begun sanctification.

through—in—thy truth—God's revealed truth, as the medium or element of sanctification; a statement this of immense importance. thy word is truth—(Cf. ch. 15:3; Col. 1:5; Eph. 1:13).

18. As thou hast sent—sentest—me into the world, even so have I also sent—sent I also—them into the world—As their mission was to carry into effect the purposes of their Master's mission, so our Lord speaks of the authority in both cases as co-ordinate.

And for their sakes I sanctify—consecrate—myself, that they also might—may—be sanctified—consecrated. The only difference between the application of the same term to Christ and the disciples is, as applied to Christ, that it means only to "consecrate"; whereas, in application to the disciples, it means to consecrate with the additional idea of previous sanctification, since nothing but what is holy can be presented as an offering. The whole self-sacrificing work of the disciples appears here as a mere result of the offering of Christ [OLSHAUSEN]. through 'in—the truth—Though the article is wanting in the original here, we are not to translate, as in the margin, "truly sanctified"; for the reference seems plainly to be "the truth" mentioned in vs. 17. (See there.)

ADAM CLARKE

17. Sanctify them. Hagiason, from a, negative, and ge, "the earth." This word has two meanings: (1) It signifies to "consecrate," to "separate" from earth and common use, and to "devote" or "dedicate" to God and His service. (2) It signifies to "make holy" or "pure." The prayer of Christ may be understood in both these senses. He prayed (1) that they might be fully consecrated to the work of the ministry, and separated from all worldly concerns; (2) that they might be holy, and patterns of all holiness to those to whom they announced the salvation of God. Through thy truth. It is not only according to the truth of God that ministers are to be set apart to the sacred work; but it is from that truth, and according to it, that they must preach to others. That doctrine which is not drawn from the truth of God can never save souls.

18. As thou hast sent me . . . so have I also sent them. The apostles had the same commission which Christ had, considered as man—they were endued with the same Spirit, so that they could not err, and their word was accompanied with the same success.

19. I sanctify myself. I "consecrate" and "devote" myself to death—that I may thereby purchase eternal salvation for them. There seems to be here an allusion to the entering of the high priest into the holy of holies, when, having offered the sacrifice, he sprinkled the blood before the ark of the covenant. So Jesus entered into the holiest of all by His own blood, in order to obtain everlasting redemption for men; see Heb. ix. 11-13. The word hagiazo, to "consecrate" or "sanctify," is used in the sense of devoting to death, in Jer. xii. 3, both in the Hebrew and in the Septuagint; the Hebrew signifies also to "sacrifice."

through their word. I pray for them all." Those, and those only, are interested in the mediation of Christ, that believe in him. They that lived then, saw and believed, but they in after ages have not seen, and yet have believed. It is through the word that souls are brought to believe on Christ. He does not here pray at a venture. Christ knew very well whom he prayed for. Jesus Christ intercedes not only for great and eminent believers, but for the meanest and weakest. The Good Shepherd has an eye even to the poor of the flock. Jesus Christ in his mediation had an actual regard to those that were yet unborn, the other sheep which he must yet bring.

II. What is intended in this prayer (v. 21): That they all may be one. The same was said before (v. 11), that they may be one as we are, and again, v. 22. The heart of Christ was much upon this. Let them be not only of one heart, but of one mouth, speaking the same thing. The oneness prayed for in v. 21 respects all believers. It is the prayer of Christ for all that are his—that they all may be one, one in us (v. 21), one as we are one (v. 22), made perfect in one, v. 23.

1. That they might all be incorporated in one body. "Father, look upon them all as one. Though they live in distant places, and in several ages, yet let them be united in me their common head." As Christ died, so he prayed, to gather them all in one.

2. That they might all be animated by one Spirit. This is plainly implied in this—that they may be one in us. Let them all be stamped with the same image and superscription, and influenced by the same power.

3. That they might all be knit together in the bond of love and charity, all of one heart. That they all may be one. In judgment and sentiment; not in every little thing—this is neither possible nor needful, but in the great things of God, and in them, by the virtue of this prayer. In disposition and inclination. They have all a new heart, and it is one heart. In their designs and aims. In their desires and prayers; though they differ in words and the manner of expressions, yet they pray for the same things in effect. In love and affection. That which Christ here prays for is that communion of saints which we profess to believe. But this prayer of Christ will not have its complete answer till all the saints come to heaven, for then, and not till then, they shall be perfect in one.

III. What is intimated by way of plea to enforce this petition.

1. The oneness that is between the Father and the Son, which is mentioned again and again, v. 11, 21–23. It is taken for granted that the Father and Son are one, one in mutual endearments. The Father loveth the Son, and the Son always pleased the Father. They are one in design. The intimacy of this oneness is expressed in these words, thou in me, and I in thee. This is insisted on in Christ's prayer for his disciples' oneness, (1) As the pattern of that oneness. Believers are one in some measure as God and Christ are one; they are united by a divine nature, by the power of divine grace, in pursuance of the divine counsels. It is a holy union, for holy ends; not a body politic for any secular purpose. It is a complete union. (2) As the centre of that oneness; that they may be one in us. There is one God and one Mediator. That is a conspiracy, not a union, which doth not centre in God as the end, and Christ as the way. All who are truly united to God and Christ, who are one, will soon be united one to another. (3) As a plea for that oneness. The Creator and Redeemer are one in interest and design; but to what purpose are they so, if all believers be not one body with Christ, and do not jointly receive grace for grace from him, as he has received it for them? Those words, I in them, and thou in me, show what that union is which is so necessary, not only to the beauty, but to the very being, of his church. Union with Christ: I in them. Union with God through him: Thou in me, so as by me to be in them. Union with each other, resulting from these: that they hereby may be made perfect in one. We are complete in him.

2. The design of Christ in all his communications of light and grace to them (v. 22): "The glory which thou gavest me, I have accordingly given them, that they may be one, as we are one; so that those gifts will be in vain, if they be not one." Now these gifts are either, (1) Those that were conferred upon the apostles. The glory of being God's ambassadors to the world, and erecting the throne of God's kingdom among men—this glory was given to Christ, and some of the honour he put upon them when he sent them to disciple all nations. Or, (2) Those that are given in common to all believers. The glory of being in covenant with the Father was the glory which the Father gave to the Redeemer, and he has confirmed it to the redeemed. This honour he says he hath given them. He gave it to them, that they might

20-23. Neither pray I for these alone—This very important explanation, uttered in condescension to the hearers and readers of this prayer in all time, is meant not merely of what follows, but of the whole prayer. them also which shall believe—The majority of the best MSS. read "which believe," all future time being viewed as present, while the present is viewed as past and gone.

21. that they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they may be one in us—The indwelling Spirit of the Father and the Son is the one perfect bond of union, knitting up into a living unity, first all believers amongst themselves; next, this unity into one still higher, with the Father and the Son. (Observe, that Christ never mixes Himself up with His disciples as He associates Himself with the Father, but says I in THEM and THEY in US.) that the world may believe that thou hast sent—sentest—me—So the grand impression upon the world at large, that the mission of Christ is divine, is to be made by the unity of His disciples. Of course, then, it must be something that shall be visible or perceptible to the world. What is it, then? Not certainly a merely formal, mechanical unity of ecclesiastical machinery. For as that may, and to a large extent does, exist in both the Western and Eastern churches, with little of the Spirit of Christ, yea much, much with which the Spirit of Christ cannot dwell so instead of convincing the world beyond its own pale of the divinity of the Gospel, it generates infidelity to a large extent within its own bosom. But the Spirit of Christ, illuminating, transforming, and reigning in the hearts of the genuine disciples of Christ, drawing them to each other as members of one family, and prompting them to loving co-operation for the good of the world—this is what, when sufficiently glowing and extended, shall force conviction upon the world that Christianity is divine. Doubtless, the more that differences among Christians disappear—the more they can agree even in minor matters—the impression upon the world may be expected to be greater. But it is not dependent upon this; for living and loving oneness in Christ is sometimes more touchingly seen even amidst and in spite of minor differences, than where no such differences exist to try the strength of their deeper unity. Yet till this living brotherhood in Christ shall show itself strong enough to destroy the sectarianism, selfishness, carnality, and apathy that eat out the heart of Christianity in all the visible sections of it, in vain shall we expect the world to be overawed by it. It is when "the Spirit shall be poured upon us from on high," as a Spirit of truth and love, and upon all parts of the Christian territory alike, melting down differences and heart-burnings, kindling astonishment and shame at past unfruitfulness, drawing forth longings of catholic affection, and yearnings over a world lying in wickedness, embodying themselves in palpable forms and active measures—it is then that we may expect the effect here announced to be produced, and then it will be irresistible. Should not Christians ponder these things? Should not the same mind be in them which was also in Christ Jesus about this matter? Should not His prayer be theirs?

22. And the glory which thou gavest—hast given—me I have given them, that they may be one, even as we are one—The last clause shows the meaning of the first. It is not the future glory of the heavenly state, but the secret of that present unity just before spoken of; the glory, therefore, of the indwelling Spirit of Christ; the glory of an accepted state, of a holy character, of every grace. 23. I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one—(See on vs. 21).

ADAM CLARKE

III. OUR LORD'S PRAYER FOR HIS CHURCH, and for all who would believe on His name, through the preaching of the apostles and their successors

20. Neither pray I for these alone. This prayer extends itself through all ages, and takes in every soul that believes in the Lord Jesus. And what is it that Christ asks in behalf of His followers? The greatest of blessings: unity, peace, love, and eternal glory.

21. That they all may be one. This prayer was literally answered to the first believers, who were all of one heart and of one soul, Acts iv. 32. And why is it that believers are not in the same spirit now? Because they neither attend to the example nor to the truth of Christ.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

We hear much moaning over our divisions. There may be some that are to be deplored among ecclesiastical confederacies, but in the spiritual Church of the living God, I really am at a loss to discover the divisions which are so loudly proclaimed. It strikes me that the tokens of union are much more prominent than the tokens of division. But what are they? First there is a union in judgment upon all vital matters. I converse with a spiritual man, and no matter what he calls himself, when we talk of sin, pardon, Jesus, the Holy Spirit, and such like themes, we are agreed. We speak of our blessed Lord. My friend says that Jesus is fair and lovely; so say I. He says that he has nothing else to trust to but the precious blood; nor have I anything beside. I tell him that I find myself a poor, weak creature; he laments the same. I live in his house a little while. We pray together at the family altar. You could not tell which it was that prayed. Calvinist or Arminian, we pray so exactly alike, and when we open the hymn book, very likely if he happens to be a Wesleyan he chooses to sing, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul." I will sing it, and then next morning he will sing with me, "Rock of Ages, Cleft for Me." If the Spirit of God be in us, we are all agreed upon great points. Let me say that among true saints the points of union even in matters of judgment are ninety-nine, and the points of difference are only as one. In experimental points, as face answers to face, so does the heart of man to man. Only get upon experimental topics concerning soul dealings with God, leave the letter and get to the spirit, crack the shells and eat the kernel of spiritual truth, and you will find that the points of agreement between genuine Christians are something marvelous. But this union is to be seen most plainly in union of heart. I am told that Christians do not love each other. I am very sorry if that be true, but I rather doubt it, for I suspect that those who do not love each other are not Christians. Where the Spirit of God is there must be love, and if I have once known and recognized any man to be my brother in Christ Jesus, the love of Christ constrains me no more to think of him as a stranger or foreigner, but a fellow citizen with the saints.

—The Treasury of the New Testament

22. And the glory which thou gavest me I have given them. As Christ, according to His human nature, is termed the Son of God, He may be understood as saying: "I have communicated to all those who believe, or shall believe, in Me the glorious privilege of becoming sons of God; that, being all adopted children of the same Father, they may abide in peace, love, and unity."

MATTHEW HENRY

be one, to entitle them to the privilege of unity. The gift of the Spirit, that great glory which the Father gave to the Son, by him to be given to all believers, makes them one, to engage them to the duty of unity. That in consideration of what they have in one God and one Christ, and of what they hope for in one heaven, they may be of one mind and one mouth. Worldly glory sets men at variance; for if some be advanced others are eclipsed. The more Christians are taken up with the glory Christ has given them, the less desirous they will be of vain-glory, and, consequently, the less disposed to quarrel.

3. He pleads the happy influence their oneness would have upon others. This is twice urged (v. 21): That the world may believe that thou hast sent me. And again (v. 23): That the world may know it. Believers must know what they believe, and why and wherefore they believe it. Those who believe at a venture, venture too far. Now Christ here shows,

(1) His goodwill to the world of mankind in general. Herein he is of his Father's mind, that he would have all men to be saved. Therefore it is his will that no stone be left unturned, for the conviction and conversion of the world. We must in our places do our utmost to further men's salvation.

(2) The good fruit of the church's oneness; it will be an evidence of the truth of Christianity, and a means of bringing many to embrace it. In general, it will recommend Christianity to the world. The embodying of Christians in one society will greatly promote Christianity. When the world shall see so many of those that were its children changed from what they themselves sometimes were, they will be ready to say, We will go with you, for we see that God is with you. The uniting of Christians in love and charity is the beauty of their profession, and invites others to join with them. When Christianity, instead of causing quarrels about itself, makes all other strifes to cease,—when it disposes men to be kind and loving, studious to preserve and promote peace, this will recommend it to all that have anything either of natural religion or natural affection in them. In particular, it will beget in men good thoughts of Christ: They will know and believe that thou hast sent me. By this it will appear that Christ was sent of God, in that his religion prevails to join so many of different capacities, tempers, and interests in other things, in one body by faith, with one heart by love. Of Christians: They will know that thou hast loved them as thou hast loved me. 1. The privilege of believers: the Father himself loveth them with a love resembling his love to his Son, for they are loved in him with an everlasting love. 2. The evidence, that of their being one: it will appear that God loves us, if we love one another with a pure heart. See how much good it would do to the world to know better how dear to God all good Christians are. Those that have so much of God's love would have more of ours.

I. A petition for the glorifying of all those that were given to Christ (v. 24): Father, I will that they may be with me.

1. The connection of this request with those foregoing. He had prayed that God would sanctify them; and now he prays that he would crown all his gifts with their glorification. In this method we must pray, first for grace, and then for glory; for in this method God gives.

2. The manner of the request: Father, I will. Here, as before, he addresses himself to God as a Father, and therein we must do likewise; but when he says, I will, he speaks a language such as does not become ordinary petitioners. This intimates the authority of his intercession in general; his word was with power in heaven, as well as on earth. It intimates his particular authority in this matter; he had a power to give eternal life (v. 2), and, pursuant to that power, he says, Father, I will.

3. The request itself—that all the elect might come to be with him in heaven at last.

(1) Under what notion we are to hope for heaven? Wherein does that happiness consist? Three things make heaven: It is to be where Christ is: Where I am, am to be shortly, am to be eternally. In this world we are but on our passage; there we truly are where we are to be for ever. It is to be with him where he is. The happiness of the place will consist in his presence. The very heaven of heaven is to be with Christ. It is to behold his glory, which the Father has given him. The glory of the Redeemer is the brightness of heaven. The Lamb is the light of the new Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 23. God shows his glory there, as he does his grace here, through Christ. The felicity of the redeemed consists very much in the beholding of this glory. They will see into those springs of love from

That the world may believe. We have already seen that the word cosmos, world, is used in several parts of this last discourse of our Lord to signify the "Jewish people" only.

23. That the world may know. That the Jewish people first, and secondly the Gentiles, may acknowledge Me as the true Messiah, and be saved unto life eternal.

ALBERT BARNES:

23. "May be made perfect in one." That their union may be complete. That there may be no jars, discords, or contentions. A machine is perfect or complete when it has all its parts and is in good order—when there is no portion of it wanting. So the union of Christians, for which the Savior prayed, would be complete or perfect if there were no controversies, no envyings, no contentions, and no heartburnings and jealousies. It is worthy of remark here how entirely the union of his people occupied the mind of Jesus as he drew near to death. He saw the danger of strifes and contentions in the church. He knew the imperfections of even the best of men. He saw how prone they would be to passion and ambition; how ready to mistake love of sect or party for zeal for pure religion; how selfish and worldly men in the church might divide his followers, and produce unholy feeling and contention; and he saw, also, how much this would do to dishonor religion. Hence he took occasion, when he was about to die, to impress the importance of union on his disciples.

By solemn admonition, and by most tender and affecting appeals to God in supplication, he showed his sense of the value of this union. He used the most sublime and impressive illustration; he adverted to the eternal union between the Father and himself; he reminded them of his love, and of the effect that their union would have on the world, to fix it more deeply in their hearts. The effect has shown the infinite wisdom of the Savior. The contentions and strifes of Christians have shown his knowledge in foreseeing it. The effect of all this on religion has shown that he understood the value of union. Christians have contended long enough. It is time that they should hear the parting admonitions of their Redeemer, and go unitedly against their common foe. The world still lies in wickedness; and the friends of Jesus, bound by the cords of eternal love, should advance together against the common enemy, and spread the triumphs of the gospel around the globe. All that is needful now, under the blessing of God, to convince the world that God sent the Lord Jesus is that very union among all Christians for which he prayed; and when that union of feeling, and purpose, and action shall take place, the task of sending the gospel to all nations will be soon accomplished, and the morning of the millennial glory will dawn upon the world.—Popular Commentary be with me where I am—(See on ch. 14:3). that they may behold my glory which thou hast given me—(See on vs. 5.) Christ regards it as glory enough for us to be admitted to see and gaze for ever upon His glory! This is 'the beatific vision'; but it shall be no mere vision, for "we shall be like Him, because we shall see Him as He is" (I John 3:2).

24-26. Father, I will—The majesty of this style of speaking is quite transparent. No petty criticism will be allowed to fritter it away in any but superficial or perverted readers.

24. That they may behold my glory. That they may enjoy eternal felicity with Me in Thy kingdom. So the word is used, chap. iii. 3; Matt. v. 8.

which flow all the streams of grace. They shall be changed into the same image, from glory to glory.

(2) Upon what ground we are to hope for heaven; because he hath said, Father, I will. Our sanctification is our evidence, but it is the will of Christ that is our title. Christ speaks here as if he did not count his own happiness complete unless he had his elect to share with him in it.

4. The argument to back this request: for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world. This is a reason, (1) Why he expected this glory himself: Thou wilt give it to me, for thou lovedst me. The Father loves the Son, is infinitely well pleased in his undertaking, and therefore has given all things into his hands. He is said to love him as Mediator before the foundation of the world. Or, (2) Why he expected that those who were given to him should be with him to share in his glory: "Thou lovedst me, and them in me, and canst deny me nothing I ask for them."

II. The conclusion of the prayer.

1. The respect he had to his Father, v. 25.

(1) The title he gives to God: O righteous Father. When he prayed that they might be sanctified, he called him holy Father; when he prays that they may be glorified, he calls him righteous Father.

(2) The character he gives of the world: The world has not known thee. Ignorance of God overspreads the world of mankind; this is the darkness they sit in. These disciples needed the aids of special grace, both because of the necessity of their work, and also because of the difficulty of their work—therefore keep them. They were qualified for further peculiar favours, for they had that knowledge of God which the world had not.

(3) The plea he insists upon for himself: But I have known thee. Christ knew the Father as no one else ever did, and therefore, in this prayer, came to him with confidence, as we do to one we know. When he had said, The world has not known thee, one would expect it should follow, but they have known thee; no, their knowledge was not to be boasted of, but I have known thee. There is nothing in us to recommend us to God's favour, but all our interest in him, and intercourse with him, result from Christ's interest and intercourse. We are unworthy, but he is worthy.

(4) The plea he insists upon for his disciples: And they have known that thou hast sent me. Hereby they are distinguished from the unbelieving world. To know and believe in Jesus Christ, in the midst of a world that persists in ignorance and infidelity, shall certainly be crowned with distinguishing glory. Singular faith qualifies for singular favours. Hereby they partake of the benefit of his acquaintance with the Father: "I have known thee, and these have known that thou hast sent me." Knowing Christ as sent of God, they have, in him, known the Father. "Father, look after them for my sake."

2. The respect he had to his disciples (v. 26): "I have led them into the knowledge of thee, that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them."

(1) What Christ had done for them: I have declared unto them thy name. This he had done for those that were his immediate followers. This he has done for all that believe on him. We are indebted to Christ for all the knowledge we have of the Father's name. Those whom Christ recommends to the favour of God he first leads into an acquaintance with God.

(2) What he intended to do yet further for them: I will declare it. To the disciples he designed to give further instructions after his resurrection (Acts i. 3), by the pouring out of the Spirit after his ascension; and to all believers, into whose hearts he hath shined, he shines more and more.

(3) What he aimed at in all this; to secure and advance their real happiness in two things:

[1] Communion with God: "Therefore I have given them the knowledge of thy name, that thy love, wherewith thou hast loved me, may be in them. Let the Spirit of love, with which thou hast filled me, be in them." Christ declares his Father's name to believers, that with that divine light darted into their minds a divine love may be shed abroad in their hearts, that they may partake of a divine nature. When God's love to us comes to be in us, it is like the virtue which the loadstone gives the needle, inclining it to move towards the pole; it draws out the soul towards God. Let them not only be interested in the love of God, let them have the comfort of that interest; that they may not only know God, but know that they know him. It is the love of God thus shed abroad in the heart that fills it with joy, Rom. v. 3, 5. We may not only be satisfied with his loving kindness, but be satisfied of it. This we must press after; if we have it, we must thank Christ for it; if we want it, we may thank ourselves.

[2] Union with Christ in order hereunto: And I in

24. "I will" (thelo). Perfect identity of his will with that of the Father in "this moment of spiritual exaltation" (Bernard), though in Gethsemane Jesus distinguishes between his human will and that of the Father (Mark 14:36). "Where I am" (hopou eimi ego). That is heaven, to be with Jesus (12:26; 13:36; 14:3; Rom. 8:17; 2 Tim. 2:11). "That they may behold" (hina theorosin). Another purpose clause with hina and the present active subjunctive of theoreo, "that they may keep on beholding," the endless joy of seeing Jesus "as he is" (1 John 3:2) in heaven. "Before the foundation of the world" (pro kataboles kosmou). This same phrase in Eph. 1:4 and 1 Pet. 1:20 and six other times we have katabole kosmou (Matt. 25:34; Luke 11:50; Heb. 4:3; 9:26; Rev. 13:8; 17:8). Here we find the same preincarnate consciousness of Christ seen in 17:5.

—Word Pictures in the New Testament

O righteous Father, the world hath not known thee—knew thee not. but I have known—knew—thee, and these have known—knew—that thou hast sent—sentest—me—As before He said "Holy Father," when desiring the display of that perfection on His disciples (vs. 11), so here He styles Him "Righteous Father," because He is appealing to His righteousness or justice, to make a distinction between those two diametrically opposite classes—"the world," on the one hand, which would not "know the Father, though brought so nigh to it in the Son of His love, and, on the other, Himself, who recognized and owned Him, and even His disciples, who owned His mission from the Father.

26. And I have declared—I made known or communicated—thy name—in His past ministry. and will declare it—in yet larger measure, by the gift of the Holy Ghost at Pentecost and through all succeeding ages.

that the love wherewith thou hast loved—lovedst—me may be in them, and I in them—This eternal love of the Father, resting first on Christ, is by His Spirit imparted to and takes up its permanent abode in all that believe in Him; and "He abiding in them and they in Him" (ch. 15:5), they are "one Spirit." "With this lofty thought the Redeemer closes His prayer for His disciples, and in them for His Church through all ages. He has compressed into the last moments given Him for conversation with His own the most sublime and glorious sentiments ever uttered by mortal lips. But hardly has the sound of the last word died away, when He passes with the disciples over the brook Kedron to Gethsemane—and the bitter conflict draws on. The seed of the new world must be sown in Death, that thence Life may spring up" [OLSHAUSEN].

25. The world hath not known thee. Has not acknowledged Me. See on chap. i. 11-12.

And these have known. Here our Lord, returning to the disciples, speaks: (1) of their having received Him as the Messiah; (2) of His making the Father known unto them; (3) of His purpose to continue to influence them by the Spirit of truth, that they might be perfectly united to God by an indwelling Saviour forever.

26. I have declared unto them thy name. I have taught them the true doctrine. And will declare it. This He did: (1) by the conversations He had with His disciples after His resurrection, during the space of forty days; (2) by the Holy Spirit, who was poured out upon them on the Day of Pentecost.

them. There is no getting into the love of God but through Christ, nor can we keep ourselves in that love but by abiding in Christ. It is Christ in us that is the only hope of glory that will not make us ashamed, Col. i. 27. All our communion with God, the reception of his love to us with our return of love to him again, passes through the hands of the Lord Jesus. Christ had said but a little before, I in them (v. 23), and here it is repeated, and the prayer closed with it, to show how much the heart of Christ was set upon it. "I in them; let me have this, and I desire no more." Let us therefore make sure our union with Christ, and then take the comfort of his intercession. This prayer had an end, but that he ever lives to make.

The hour was now come that the captain of our salvation, who was to be made perfect by sufferings, should engage the enemy. Let us turn aside now, and see this great sight.

I. Our Lord Jesus, like a bold champion, takes the field first (v. 1, 2): When he had spoken these words, he would lose no time, but went forth with his disciples, and he went over the brook Cedron where was a garden.

1. Our Lord Jesus entered upon his sufferings when he had spoken these words. Christ had said all he had to say as a prophet, and now he addresses himself to the discharge of his office as a priest, to make his soul an offering for sin; and, when he had gone through this, he entered upon his kingly office. Having by his sermon prepared his disciples for this hour of trial, and by his prayer prepared himself for it, he then courageously went out to meet it. When he had put on his armour, he entered the lists, and not till then. Christ will not engage those that are his in any conflict, but he will first do that for them which is necessary to prepare them for it. We may, with an unshaken resolution, venture through the greatest hardships in the way of duty.

2. He went forth with his disciples. He would do as he was wont to do, and not alter his method, either to meet the cross or to miss it, when his hour was come. It was his custom when he was at Jerusalem to retire at night to the mount of Olives. This being his custom, he would not be put out of his method by the foresight of his sufferings. He was as unwilling that there should be an uproar among the people as his enemies were. If he had been seized in the city, and a tumult raised thereby, mischief might have been done, and a great deal of blood shed, and therefore he withdrew. When we find ourselves involved in trouble, we should be afraid of involving others with us. It is no disgrace to the followers of Christ to fall tamely. Those who aim at honour from men value themselves upon a resolution to sell their lives as dearly as they can; but those who know that their blood is precious to Christ need not stand upon such terms. He would set us an example of retirement from the world. We must lay aside, and leave behind, the crowds, and cares, and comforts, of cities, even holy cities, if we would cheerfully take up our cross.

3. He went over the brook Cedron. He must go over this to go to the mount of Olives, but the notice taken of it intimates that there was something in it significant. The brook Cedron, the black brook, so called either from the darkness of the valley it ran through or the colour of the water, tainted with the dirt of the city. The godly kings of Judah had burnt and destroyed the idols they found at the brook Cedron. Into that brook the abominable things were cast. Christ began his passion by the same brook.

4. He entered into a garden. This circumstance is taken notice of only by this evangelist, that Christ's sufferings began in a garden. In the garden of Eden sin began; there the Redeemer was promised. Christ was buried also in a garden. Let us, when we walk in our gardens, take occasion thence to meditate on Christ's sufferings in a garden, to which we owe all the pleasure we have in our gardens. When we are in the midst of our possessions and enjoyments, we must keep up an expectation of troubles, for our gardens of delight are in a vale of tears.

5. He had his disciples with him. They must be witnesses of his sufferings, and his patience under them, that they might with the more assurance and affection preach them to the world, and be themselves prepared to suffer. He would take them into the danger to show them their weakness. Christ sometimes brings his people into difficulties that he may magnify himself in their deliverance.

6. Judas the traitor knew the place. A solitary garden is a proper place for meditation and prayer, where was a garden—at the foot of the Mount of Olives, "called Gethsemane; i.e., olive press (Matt. 26:30, 36).

2. Judas . . . knew the place, for Jesus ofttimes—see ch. 8:1; Luke 21:37—resorted thither with his disciples—The baseness of this abuse of knowledge in Judas, derived from admission to the closest privacies of his Master, is most touchingly conveyed here, though nothing beyond bare narrative is expressed. Jesus, however, knowing that in this spot Judas would expect to find Him, instead of avoiding it, hies Him thither, as a Lamb to the slaughter. "No man taketh My life from Me, but I lay it down of Myself" (ch. 10:18). Besides, the scene which was to fill up the little breathing-time, the

Our Lord's sermon, which He concluded by the prayer recorded in this chapter, begins at v. 13 of chap. xiii and is one of the most excellent that can be conceived. His Sermon on the Mount shows men what they should do, so as to please God; this sermon shows them how they are to do the things prescribed in the other. In the former the reader sees a strict morality which he fears he shall never be able to perform. In this he sees all things are possible to him who believes; for that very God who made him shall dwell in his heart, and enable him to do all that He pleases to employ him in.

TODAY'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE:

Kidron=Kedron=Cedron—turbid—the winter torrent which flows through the Valley of Jehoshaphat, on the eastern side of Jerusalem, between the city and the Mount of Olives. This valley is known in Scripture only by the name "the brook Kidron." David crossed this brook barefoot and weeping, when fleeing from Absalom (2 Sam. 15:23, 30), and it was frequently crossed by our Lord in his journeyings back and forth (John 18:1). Here Asa burned the obscene idols of his mother (1 Kings 15:13), and here Athaliah was executed (2 Kings 11:16). It afterward became the receptacle for all manner of impurities (2 Chron. 29:16; 30:14); and in the time of Josiah this valley was the common cemetery of the city (2 Kings 23:6; comp. Jer. 26:23).

Through this mountain ravine no water runs, except after heavy rains in the mountains round about Jerusalem. Its length from its head to en-Rogel is 2¾ miles. Its precipitous, rocky banks are filled with ancient tombs, especially the left bank opposite the temple area. The greatest desire of the Jews is to be buried there, from the idea that the Kidron is the "valley of Jehoshaphat" mentioned in Joel 3:2.

Below en-Rogel the Kidron has no historical or sacred interest. It runs in a winding course through the wilderness of Judea to the northwestern shore of the Dead Sea. Its whole length, in a straight line, is only some 20 miles, but in this space its descent is about 3,912 feet.

Recent excavations have brought to light the fact that the old bed of the Kidron is about 40 feet lower than its present bed, and about 70 feet nearer the sanctuary wall.

1. Over the brook Cedron. Having finished the prayer related in the preceding chapter, our Lord went straight to the Garden of Gethsemane, Matt. xxvi. 36, which was in the Mount of Olives, eastward of Jerusalem. This mount was separated from the city by a very narrow valley, through the midst of which the brook Cedron ran. Cedron is a very small rivulet, about six or seven feet broad, nor is it constantly supplied with water, being dry all the year except during the rains. It is mentioned in the Old Testament: 2 Sam. xv. 23; 1 Kings xv. 13; 2 Kings xxiii. 4. And it appears the Evangelist mentions it here only to call to remembrance what happened to David when he was driven from Jerusalem by his son Absalom, and he and his followers obliged to pass the brook Cedron on foot; see 2 Sam. xv. 23. All this was a very expressive figure of what happened now to this Second David by the treachery of one of His own disciples. A garden. Gethsemane; see on Matt. xxvi. 36. John mentions nothing of the agony in the garden; probably because he found it so amply related by all the other Evangelists. As that account should come in here, the reader is desired to consult the notes on Matt. xxvi. 36-47. See also Mark xiv. 30-36 and Luke xxii. 40-44.

2. Judas . . . knew the place. As many had come from different quarters to celebrate the Passover at Jerusalem, it could not be an easy matter to find lodging in the city. Jesus therefore chose to pass the night in the garden with His disciples, which, from this verse and from Luke xxii. 39, we find was His frequent custom, though He often lodged in Bethany. But as He had supped in the city this evening, Judas took it for granted that He had not gone to Bethany, and therefore was to be met with in the garden; and having given this informathat we may pray over the impressions made and the vows renewed, and clench the nail. Mention is made of Judas's knowing the place, (1) To aggravate the sin of Judas, that he would betray his Master, and that he would make use of his familiarity with Christ, as giving him an opportunity of betraying him; a generous mind would have scorned to do so base a thing. (2) To magnify the love of Christ, that, though he knew where the traitor would seek him, thither he went to be found of him. Thus he showed himself willing to suffer and die for us. It was late in the night (we may suppose eight or nine o'clock) when Christ went out to the garden. When others were going to bed, he was going to prayer, going to suffer.

II. The captain of our salvation having taken the field, the enemy attacks him (v. 3): Judas with his men comes thither. This evangelist passes over Christ's agony, because the other three had fully related it.

1. The persons employed in this action—a band of men and officers from the chief priests, with Judas. (1) Here is a multitude engaged against Christ—a band of men. Christ's friends were few, his enemies many. (2) Here is a mixed multitude; the band of men were Gentiles, Roman soldiers, the officers of the chief priests. The officers of their courts were Jews; these had an enmity to each other, but were united against Christ. (3) It is a commissioned multitude who have received orders from the chief priests, and it is likely that they had a warrant to take him up, for they feared the people. See what enemies Christ and his gospel have had, and are likely to have, numerous and potent; ecclesiastical and civil powers combined against them. (4) All under the direction of Judas. He received this band of men. He thought himself wonderfully preferred from coming in the rear of the contemptible twelve to be placed at the head of these formidable hundreds.

2. The preparation they had made for an attack: They came with lanterns, and torches, and weapons. If Christ should abscond, though they had moonlight, they would have occasion for their lights. It was folly to light a candle to seek the Sun by. If he should resist, they would have occasion for their arms. The weapons of his warfare were spiritual, and at these weapons he had often beaten them, therefore they have now recourse to other weapons, swords and staves.

III. Our Lord Jesus gloriously repulsed the first onset of the enemy, v. 4–6.

1. How he received them.

(1) He met them with a very soft and mild question (v. 4): Knowing all things that should come upon him, undisturbed and undaunted, he went forth to meet them, and softly asked, "Whom seek you?" See here, Christ's foresight of his sufferings: he knew all those things that should come upon him. We should not covet to know what shall come upon us; it would but anticipate our pain; sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof: yet it will do us good to expect sufferings in general. "It is but the cost we sat down and counted upon." Christ's forwardness to his sufferings. When the people would have forced him to a crown, he withdrew, and hid himself (cf. vi. 15); but, when they came to force him to a cross, he offered himself; for he came to this world to suffer and went to the other world to reign. This will not warrant us needlessly to expose ourselves to trouble, but we are called to suffering when we have no way to avoid it but by sin.

(2) He met them with a very calm and mild answer when they told him whom they were in quest of, v. 5. They said, Jesus of Nazareth; and he said, I am he. It is highly probable that at least the officers of the temple had often seen him. Judas knew him well enough, and yet none of them could pretend to say, Thou art the man we seek. In their enquiries for him they called him Jesus of Nazareth. It was a name of reproach given him, to darken the evidence of his being the Messiah. By this it appears that they knew him not, whence he was. He fairly answers them: I am he. Though they called him Jesus of Nazareth, he answered to the name, for he despised the reproach; he might have said, I am not he, for he was Jesus of Bethlehem. He has hereby taught us to own him, whatever it cost us; not to be ashamed of him or his words. Particular notice is taken that Judas stood with them. He that used to stand with those that followed Christ now stood with those that fought against him. This is mentioned: To show the impudence of Judas. One would wonder where he got the confidence with which he now faced his Master, and was not ashamed. To show that Judas was particularly aimed at in the power which went along with that word, I am he, to foil the aggressors.

2. See how he terrified them, and obliged them to awful interval, between the Supper and the Apprehension—like the "silence in heaven for about the space of half an hour" between the breaking of the Apocalyptic Seals and the peal of the Trumpets of war (Rev. 8:1)—the AGONY—would have been too terrible for the upper room; nor would He cloud the delightful associations of the last Passover and the first Supper by pouring out the anguish of His soul there. The garden, however, with its amplitude, its shady olives, its endeared associations, would be congenial to His heart. Here He had room enough to retire—first, from eight of them, and then from the more favored three; and here, when that mysterious scene was over, the stillness would only be broken by the tread of the traitor.

3. Judas then—"He that was called Judas, one of the Twelve," says Luke, in language which brands him with peculiar infamy, as in the sacred circle while in no sense of it. a band of men—"the detachment of the Roman cohort on duty at the festival for the purpose of maintaining order" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. officers from the chief priests and Pharisees—captains of the temple and armed Levites. lanterns and torches—It was full moon, but in case He should have secreted Himself somewhere in the dark ravine, they bring the means of exploring its hiding-places—little knowing whom they had to do with. "Now he that betrayed Him had given them a sign, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is He, hold Him fast" (Matt. 26:48). The cold-bloodedness of this speech was only exceeded by the deed itself. "And Judas went before them [Luke 22:47], and forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, Hail, Master, and kissed Him" (Matt. 26:49; cf. Exod. 4:27; 18:7; Luke 7:45). The impudence of this atrocious deed shows how thoroughly he had by this time mastered all his scruples. If the dialogue between our Lord and His captors was before this, as some interpreters think it was, the kiss of Judas was purely gratuitous, and probably to make good his right to the money; our Lord having presented Himself unexpectedly before them, and rendered it unnecessary for any one to point Him out. But a comparison of the narratives seems to show that our Lord's "coming forth" to the band was subsequent to the interview of Judas. "And Jesus said unto him, Friend"—not the endearing term "friend" (in ch. 15:15), but "companion," a word used on occasions of remonstrance or rebuke (as in Matt. 20:13; 22:12)—"Wherefore art thou come?" (Matt. 26:50). "Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss"—imprinting upon the foulest act the mark of tenderest affection? What wounded feeling does this express! Of this Jesus showed Himself on various occasions keenly susceptible—as all generous and beautiful natures do. 4-9. Jesus . . . , knowing all things that should come—were coming—upon him, went forth—from the shade of the trees, probably, into open view, indicating His sublime preparedness to meet His captors. Whom seek ye?—partly to prevent a rush of the soldiery upon the disciples [BENGEL]; and see Mark 14:51, 52, as showing a tendency to this: but still more as part of that courage and majesty which so overawed them. He would not wait to be taken.

5. They answered . . . , Jesus of Nazareth—just the sort of blunt, straightforward reply one expects from military men, simply acting on their instructions. I am He—(See on ch. 6:20).

Judas . . . stood with them—No more is recorded here of his part of the scene, but we have found the gap painfully supplied by all the other Evangelists.

tion to the priests, they gave him some soldiers and others that he might be the better enabled to seize and bring Him away.

3. A band. "The band" or "troop." Some think that the spira was the same as the Roman cohort, and was the tenth part of a legion, which consisted sometimes of 4,200 and sometimes of 5,000 foot. But Raphelius, on Matt. xxvii. 27, has clearly proved, from Polybius, that the spira was no more than a tenth of the fourth part of a legion. And as the number of the legions was uncertain, and their divisions not at all equal, no person can tell how many the band or spira contained. This band was probably those Roman soldiers given by the governor for the defense of the Temple, and the officers were those who belonged to the Sanhedrin. With lanterns and torches. With these they had intended to search the corners and caverns, provided Christ had hidden himself; for they could not have needed them for any other purpose, it being now the fourteenth day of the moon's age, in the month Nisan, and consequently it appeared full and bright. The weapons mentioned here were probably no other than clubs, staves, and instruments of that kind, as we may gather from Matt. xxvi. 55; Mark xiv. 48; Luke xxii. 52. The swords mentioned by the other Evangelists were probably those of the Roman soldiers; the clubs and staves belonged to the chief priest's officers.

4. Jesus therefore, knowing all things. He had gone through all His preaching, working of miracles, and passion, and had nothing to do now but to offer up himself on the Cross; He therefore went forth to meet them, to deliver himself up to death.

5. Jesus of Nazareth. They did not say this till after Judas kissed Christ, which was the sign which he had agreed with the soldiers to give them that they might know whom they were to seize; see Matt. xxvi. 48.

retire (v. 6): They went backward, and fell to the ground. This word, I am he, had revived his disciples, and raised them up, but the same word strikes his enemies down. Hereby he showed plainly,

(1) What he could have done with them. When he struck them down, he could have struck them dead. But he would not do so. He would only show that his life was not forced from him, but he laid it down of himself, as he had said. He would give an instance of his patience and forbearance and his compassionate love to his very enemies. In striking them down, and no more, he gave them both a call to repent and space to repent.

(2) What he will do at last with all his implacable enemies, that will not repent to give him glory; they shall flee, they shall fall before him.

IV. Having given his enemies a repulse, he gives his friends a protection, v. 7–9.

1. He continued to expose himself to their rage, v. 7. When they were down, one would have thought Christ should have made his escape; when they were up again, one would have thought they should have let fall their pursuit. They are as eager as ever to seize him. They cannot imagine what ailed them, but will impute it to anything rather than Christ's power. There are hearts so very hard in sin that nothing will work upon them to reduce and reclaim them. He is as willing as ever to be seized. When they were fallen before him, he asked them the same question, Whom seek you? And they gave him the same answer, Jesus of Nazareth. In their repeating the same answer, they showed an obstinacy in their wicked way; they still call him Jesus of Nazareth, with as much disdain as ever, and Judas is as unrelenting as any of them.

2. He contrived to secure his disciples from their rage. When he shows his courage with reference to himself, I have told you that I am he, he shows his care for his disciples, Let these go their way. This aggravated the sin of the disciples in forsaking him, and particularly Peter's in denying him. When Christ said, Let these go their way, he intended,

(1) To manifest his affectionate concern for his disciples. When he exposed himself, he excused them, because they were not as yet fit to suffer. It would have been as much as their souls, and the lives of their souls, were worth, to bring them into sufferings now. And, besides, they had other work to do; they must go their way, for they are to go into all the world, to preach the gospel. Christ gives us a great encouragement to follow him. He considers our frame, will wisely time the cross, and proportion it to our strength. He gives us a good example of love to our brethren. We must not consult our own ease and safety only, but others' as well as our own, and in some cases more than our own.

(2) To give a specimen of his undertaking as Mediator. When he offered himself to suffer and die, it was that we might escape.

3. He confirmed the word which he had spoken a little before (ch. xvii. 12), Of those whom thou gavest me, I have lost none. Though Christ's keeping them was meant especially of the preservation of their souls from sin, yet it is here applied to the preservation of their natural lives. Christ will preserve the natural life for the service to which it is designed. It shall be held in life as long as any use is to be made of it. This preservation of the disciples was a spiritual preservation. They were now so weak in faith and resolution that in all probability, if they had been called out to suffer at this time, some of them, at least the weaker of them, would have been lost; and therefore, that he might lose none, he would not expose them.

V. He rebukes the rashness of one of them, and represses the violence of his followers, v. 10, 11.

1. Peter's rashness. He had a sword. They had two swords among them all (Luke xxii. 38), and Peter, being entrusted with one, drew it; and he smote one of the high priest's servants, and cut off his right ear. The servant's name, for the greater certainty of the narrative, is recorded; it was Malchus.

(1) We must here acknowledge Peter's goodwill; he had an honest zeal for his Master, though now misguided. He had lately promised to venture his life for him, and would now make his words good.

(2) Yet we must acknowledge Peter's ill conduct; and, though his good intention did excuse, yet it would not justify him. [1] He had no warrant from his Master for what he did. Christ's soldiers must wait the word of command, and not outrun it. [2] He resisted the powers that were, which Christ had never countenanced, but forbidden (Matt. v. 39). [3] He opposed his Master's sufferings. Thus, while he seemed to fight for Christ, he fought against him. [4] He broke the capitulation his Master had lately

6. As soon then as he said unto them, I am He, they went backward—recoiled. and fell to the ground—struck down by a power such as that which smote Saul of Tarsus and his companions to the earth (Acts 26:14). It was the glorious effulgence of the majesty of Christ which overpowered them. "This, occurring before His surrender, would show His power over His enemies, and so the freedom with which He gave Himself up" [MEYER].

7. Then asked he them again, Whom seek ye?—Giving them a door of escape from the guilt of a deed which now they were able in some measure to understand. Jesus of Nazareth—The stunning effect of His first answer wearing off, they think only of the necessity of executing their orders.

8. I have told you that I am He: if therefore ye seek me, let these go their way—Wonderful self-possession, and consideration for others, in such circumstances!

9. That the saying might be fulfilled which he spake, Of them which thou gavest me have I lost none—The reference is to such sayings as ch. 6:39; 17:12; showing how conscious the Evangelist was, that in reporting his Lord's former sayings, he was giving them not in substance merely, but in form also. Observe, also, how the preservation of the disciples on this occasion is viewed as part that deeper preservation undoubtedly intended in the saying quoted.

10, 11. Then Simon Peter, having a sword, drew it, and smote the high priest's servant, and cut off his right ear. The servant's name was Malchus—None of the other Evangelists mention the name either of the ardent disciple or of his victim. John being "known to the high priest" (vs. 15), the mention of the servant's name by him is quite natural, and an interesting mark of truth in a small matter. As to the right ear, specified both here and in Luke, the man was "likely foremost of those who advanced to seize Jesus, and presented himself in the attitude of a combatant; hence his right side would be exposed to attack. The blow of Peter was evidently aimed vertically at his head" [WESTER and WILKINSON].

6. They went backward, and fell to the ground. None of the other Evangelists mentions this very important circumstance. Our Lord chose to give them this proof of His infinite power that they might know that their power could not prevail against Him if He chose to exert His might, seeing that the very breath of His mouth confounded, drove back, and struck them down to the earth. Thus by the blast of God they might have perished, and by the breath of His nostrils they might have been consumed, Job. iv. 9.

8. Let these go their way. These words are rather words of authority than words of entreaty. I voluntarily give myself up to you, but you must not molest one of these My disciples.

10. Having a sword. See the note on Luke xxii. 36. Cut off his right ear. He probably designed to have cut his skull in two, but God turned it aside, and only permitted the ear to be taken off; and this He would not have suffered, but only that He might have the opportunity of giving them a most striking proof of His divinity in working an astonishing miracle on the occasion. See the notes on Matt. xxvi. 51-56. The other three Evangelists mention this transaction; but neither gives the name of Peter nor of Malchus, probably because both persons were alive when they wrote; but it is likely both had been long dead before John published his history.

MATTHEW HENRY

made with the enemy. When he said, Let these go their way, he in effect passed his word for their good behaviour; this Peter heard, and yet would not be bound by it. [5] He foolishly exposed himself and his fellow disciples to the fury of this enraged multitude. Many have been guilty of self-destruction, in their zeal for self-preservation. [6] Peter played the coward so soon after this (denying his Master) that we have reason to think his courage failed him; whereas the true Christian hero will appear in the cause of Christ, not only when it is prevailing, but when it seems to be declining; will be on the right side, though it be not the rising side.

(3) We must acknowledge God's overruling providence in giving Christ an opportunity to manifest his power and goodness in healing the hurt, Luke xxii. 51.

2. The rebuke his Master gave him (v. 11): Put up thy sword into the sheath. It is a gentle reproof, because it was his zeal that carried him beyond the bounds of discretion. Many think their being in grief and distress will excuse them if they be hot and hasty with those about them; but Christ has here set us an example of meekness in sufferings.

3. The reason for this rebuke: The cup which my Father has given me, shall I not drink it? Christ gives us, (1) A full proof of his own submission to his Father's will. Of all that was amiss in what Peter did, he seems to resent nothing so much as that he would have hindered his sufferings now that his hour was come. He was willing to drink of this cup, though it was a bitter cup. He drank it, that he might put into our hands the cup of salvation. He is willing to drink it, because his Father put it into his hand. (2) A fair pattern to us of submission to God's will. We must pledge Christ in the cup that he drank of (Matt. xx. 23). It is but a cup; a small matter comparatively. It is a cup that is given us; sufferings are gifts. It is given us by a Father, who has a Father's affection, and means us no hurt.

VI. He calmly surrendered, and yielded himself a prisoner, not because he could not have made his escape, but because he would not.

1. How they seized him: They took Jesus. Only some few of them could lay hands on him, but it is charged upon them all, for they were all aiding and abetting. In treason there are no accessories; all are principals. They had so often been frustrated in their attempts to seize him that now we may suppose they flew upon him with so much the more violence.

2. How they secured him: They bound him. This particular of his sufferings is taken notice of only by this evangelist, that, as soon as ever he was taken, he was bound, pinioned, handcuffed.

(1) This shows the spite of his persecutors. They bound him, that they might torment him, and put him in pain; that they might disgrace him, and put him to shame; that they might prevent his escape. They bound him as one already condemned, for they were resolved to prosecute him to the death. Christ had bound the consciences of his persecutors with the power of his word, which galled them; and, to be revenged on him, they laid these bonds on him.

(2) Christ's being bound was very significant. Before they bound him, he had bound himself to the work and office of a Mediator. He was already bound to the horns of the altar with the cords of his own love to man, and duty to his Father. Guilt is a bond on the soul, by which we are bound over to the judgment of God; corruption is a bond on the soul, by which we are bound under the power of Satan. Christ, to free us from those bonds, himself submitted to be bound for us. To his bonds we owe our liberty. Thus the Son maketh us free. Christ was bound, that he might bind us to duty and obedience. His bonds for us are bonds upon us, by which we are for ever obliged to love him and serve him. Christ's bonds for us were designed to make our bonds for him easy to us, to sanctify and sweeten them; these enabled Paul and Silas to sing in the stocks.

Verses 13–27

We have here an account of Christ's arraignment before the high priest, and some circumstances that occurred therein which were omitted by the other evangelists. Peter's denying him, of which the other evangelists had given the entire story by itself, is interwoven with the other passages. The crime laid to his charge having relation to religion, the judges of the spiritual court took it to fall directly under their cognizance. Both Jews and Gentiles seized him, and so both Jews and Gentiles tried and condemned him, for he died for the sins of both.

I. Having seized him, they led him away to Annas first, v. 13. 1. They led him away, led him in triumph, as a trophy of their victory. They hurried him away

11. Then said Jesus—"Suffer ye thus far" (Luke 22:51). Put up thy sword into the sheath: the cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?—This expresses both the feelings which struggled in the Lord's breast during the Agony in the garden—aversion to the cup viewed in itself, but, in the light of the Father's will, perfect preparedness to drink it. (See on Luke 22:39-46.) Matthew adds to the address to Peter the following:—"For all they that take the sword shall perish by the sword" (Matt. 26:52)—i.e., 'Those who take the sword must run all the risks of human warfare; but Mine is a warfare whose weapons, as they are not carnal, are attended with no such hazards, but carry certain victory.' "Thinkest thou that I cannot now"—even after things have proceeded so far—"pray to My Father, and He shall presently give Me"—rather, 'place at My disposal'—"more than twelve legions of angels"; with allusion, possibly, to the one angel who had, in His agony, "appeared to Him from heaven strengthening Him" (Luke 22:43); and in the precise number, alluding to the twelve who needed the help, Himself and His eleven disciples. (The full complement of a legion of Roman soldiers was six thousand.) "But how then shall the scripture be fulfilled that thus it must be?" (Matt. 26:53, 54.) He could not suffer, according to the Scripture, if He allowed Himself to be delivered from the predicted death. "And He touched his ear and healed him" (Luke 22:51); for "the Son of man came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them" (Luke 9. 56), and, even while they were destroying His, to save theirs. 12. Then the band . . . took Jesus—but not till He had made them feel that "no man took His life from Him, but that He laid it down of Himself."

13. And led him away—"In that hour," says Matthew (26:55, 56), and probably now, on the way to judgment. when the crowds were press-

11. The cup which my Father hath given me. The cup sometimes signifies the lot of life, whether prosperous or adverse: here it signifies the final sufferings of Christ.

12. The captain. The chiliarch, or "chief over one thousand men." He was probably the prefect, or captain, of the Temple guard.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

"Then they bound him." I never read it without laughing. Yes they bound Him, and see how many it took to do it: the band, and the council, and the chief captain (he is specially named), and all the police. They rushed at Him, and they bound Him. They bound Him? They thought they bound Him. What did bind Him? Love for me! Love for you! That was what bound Him; not the hempen cords of those foolish men, but the eternal cords of the Divine Love.

Still they bound Him, and they took Him to Annas. John only gives an account of the arraignment of Jesus before Annas, which was quite a preliminary matter. He tells us in the twenty-fourth verse that Annas bound Him again, and sent Him to Caiaphas. John omits entirely the account of our Lord's examination before Caiaphas and the Sanhedrin, recorded by Matthew and Mark. At verse twenty-eight we read, "They led Jesus therefore from Caiaphas into the palace." Thus omitting the appearing before Caiaphas, and the Sanhedrin, John gives the story of the preliminary arraignment of Jesus.— The Gospel According to John with violence, as if he had been the worst and vilest of malefactors. We had been led away of our own impetuous lusts, and led captive by Satan at his will, and, that we might be rescued, Christ was led away, led captive by Satan's agents and instruments. 2. They led him away to their masters that sent them. It was now about midnight, and one would think they should have put him in ward till it was a proper time to call a court; but he is hurried away immediately, not to the justices of peace, to be committed, but to the judges to be condemned; so extremely violent was the prosecution. 3. They led him to Annas first. Probably his house lay in the way. To gratify him therefore with the assurance of their success, they produce their prisoner before him. Christ, the great sacrifice, was presented to him, and sent away bound, as approved and ready for the altar. This Annas was father-in-law to Caiaphas the high priest. Acquaintance and alliance with wicked people are a great confirmation to many in their wicked ways.

II. Annas being as willing as any of them to have the prosecution pushed on, sent him bound to Caiaphas.

1. The power of Caiaphas intimated (v. 13). He was high priest that same year. The high priest's commission was during life; but there were now such frequent changes that it was become almost an annual office. While they were undermining one another, God was overturning them all. Caiaphas was high priest that same year when Messiah was to be cut off. When a bad thing was to be done by a high priest, Providence so ordered it that a bad man should be in the chair to do it. It was the ruin of Caiaphas that he was high priest that year, and so became a ringleader in the putting of Christ to death. Many a man's advancement has lost him his reputation, and he had not been dishonoured if he had not been preferred.

2. The malice of Caiaphas, which is intimated (v. 14) by the repeating of what he had said some time before, that it was expedient that one man should die for the people. This was that Caiaphas that governed himself and the church by rules of policy, in defiance of the rules of equity. His case was adjudged before it was heard, and they were already resolved what to do with him; he must die; so that his trial was a jest. It is a testimony to the innocence of our Lord Jesus, from the mouth of one of his worst enemies, who owned that he fell a sacrifice to the public good, and that it was not just he should die, but expedient only.

3. The concurrence of Annas in the prosecution of Christ. He made himself a partaker in guilt, (1) With the captain and officers, by continuing him bound when he should have loosed him. It was more excusable in the rude soldiers to bind him than in Annas, who should have known better, to continue him bound. (2) With the chief priest and council. This Annas was not present with them, yet thus he became a partaker of their evil deeds.

III. In the house of Caiaphas, Simon Peter began to deny his Master, v. 15–18.

1. It was with much ado that Peter got into the hall where the court was sitting, an account of which we have, v. 15, 16.

(1) Peter's kindness to Christ, which (though it proved no kindness) appeared in two things: [1] That he followed Jesus when he was led away; though at first he fled with the rest, yet afterwards he took heart a little, and followed at some distance, calling to mind the promises he had made to adhere to him, whatever it should cost him. Those that truly love and value Christ will follow him all weathers and all ways. [2] When he could not get in where Jesus was in the midst of his enemies, he stood at the door without, willing to be as near him as he could, and waiting for an opportunity to get nearer. As it proved, he did but run himself into a snare. Christ, who knew him better than he knew himself, had expressly told him (ch. xiii. 36), Whither I go thou canst not follow me now, and had told him again and again that he would deny him; and he had lately had experience of his own weakness in forsaking him.

(2) The other disciple's kindness to Peter, which yet, as it proved, was no kindness either. St. John several times in this gospel speaking of himself as another disciple, many interpreters have been led by this to fancy that this other disciple here was John. But I see no reason to think that this other disciple was John, or one of the twelve; other sheep Christ had, which were not of the fold. As there are many who seem disciples and are not so, so there are many who are disciples and seem not so. There are good people hid in courts, even in Nero's, as well as hid in crowds. This other disciple showed a respect to Peter, in introducing him, not only to gratify ing upon Him, "said Jesus to the multitudes, Are ye come out as against a thief, with swords and staves, for to take Me"—expressive of the indignity which He felt to be thus done to Him—"I sat daily with you in the temple, and ye laid no hold on Me. But this" (adds Luke 22:53) "is your hour and the power of darkness." Matthew continues—"But all this was done that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. Then all the disciples forsook Him and fled" (Matt. 26:56)—thus fulfilling His prediction (Mark 14:27; ch. 16:32).

13-27. JESUS BEFORE ANNAS AND CAIAPHAS—FALL OF PETER. 13, 14. And led him away to Annas first—(See on Luke 3:2, and on Matt. 26:57).

Jesus Is Brought Privately before Annas, the Father-in-Law of Caiaphas (John 18:13, 14). 13. "And they led Him away to Annas first; for he was father-in-law to Caiaphas, which was the high priest that same year." This successful Annas, as ELLICOT remarks, was appointed high priest by Quirinus, A.D. 12, and after holding the office for several years, was deposed by Valerius Gratius, Pilate's predecessor in the procuratorship of Judea [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, xviii. 2. 1, etc.]. He appears, however, to have possessed vast influence, having obtained the high priesthood, not only for his son Eleazar, and his son-in-law Caiaphas, but subsequently for four other sons, under the last of whom James, the brother of our Lord, was put to death (ibid xx. 9. 1). It is thus highly probable that, besides having the title of "high priest" merely as one who had filled the office, he to a great degree retained the powers he had formerly exercised, and came to be regarded practically as a kind of rightful high priest. 14. "Now Caiaphas was he which gave counsel to the Jews, that it was expedient that one man should die for the people." See on John 11:50. What passed between Annas and our Lord during this interval the beloved disciple reserves till he has related the beginning of Peter's fall. To this, then, as recorded by our own Evangelist, let us meanwhile listen.

15-18. Simon Peter followed Jesus—Natural though this was, and safe enough, had he only "watched and prayed that he enter not into temptation," as his Master bade him (Matt. 26:41), it was, in his case, a fatal step.

and . . . another disciple—Rather, the other disciple"—our Evangelist himself, no doubt. known unto the high priest—(See on vs. 10). went in with Jesus into the palace of the high priest. 16. But Peter stood at the door without—by preconcerted arrangement with his friend till he should get access for him. Then went out that other . . . and spake to her that kept the door, and brought in Peter—The naturalness of these small details is not unworthy of notice. This other disciple first made good his own entrance on the score of acquaintance with the high priest; this secured, he goes forth again, now as a privi-

13. To Annas. This man must have had great authority in his nation: (1) Because he had been a long time high priest; (2) Because he had no less than five sons who successively enjoyed the dignity of the high priesthood; and (3) Because his son-in-law Caiaphas was at this time in possession of that office. It is likely that Annas was chief of the Sanhedrin and that it was to him in that office that Christ was first brought. That same year. The office was now no longer during life as formerly. See the note on chap. xi. 49. What is related in the twenty-fourth verse, "Now Annas had sent him bound unto Caiaphas," comes properly in after the thirteenth verse. See the margin.

14. Caiaphas was he, which gave counsel. Therefore he was an improper person to sit in judgment on Christ, whom He had prejudged and precondemned; see on chap. xi. 50-52. But Christ must not be treated according to the rules of justice; if He had, He could not have been put to death.

15. And . . . another disciple. There are many conjectures who this disciple was. Jerome, Chrysostom, Theophylact, Nonnus, Lyra, Erasmus, Piscator, and others say it was John. It is true John frequently mentions himself in the third person; but then he has always "whom Jesus loved," as in chap. xiii. 23; xix. 26; xxi. 7, 20, except in chap. xix. 35, where he has plainly pointed out himself as writer of this Gospel. But in the place before us he has mentioned no circumstance by which that disciple may be known to be John. To this may be added that John being not only a Galilean, but a fisherman affection, but to give him an opportunity of being serviceable to his Master upon his trial. But this kindness proved no kindness, nay a great diskindness; by letting him into the high priest's hall, he let him into temptation, and the consequence was bad.

2. Peter, having got in, was immediately assaulted with the temptation, v. 17.

(1) How slight the attack was. It was but a silly maid, of so small account that she was set to keep the door, that challenged him, and she only asked him carelessly, Art not thou one of this man's disciples? Peter would have had some reason to take the alarm if Malchus had set upon him, and had said, "This is he that cut off my ear, and I will have his head for it."

(2) How speedy the surrender was. Without taking time to recollect himself, he suddenly answered, I am not. All his care being for his own safety, he thought he could not secure this but by a peremptory denial.

(3) Yet he goes further into the temptation: And the servants and officers stood there, and Peter with them, v. 18.

[1] See how the servants made much of themselves; the night being cold, they made a fire in the hall. They cared not what became of Christ; all their care was to sit and warm themselves.

[2] See how Peter herded himself with them. He sat and warmed himself. It was a fault bad enough that he did not attend his Master, and appear for him at the upper end of the hall. He might have been a witness for him, at least, he might have been a witness to him. He might have learned by his Master's example how to carry himself when it should come to his turn to suffer thus; yet neither his conscience nor his curiosity could bring him into the court. It was much worse that he joined himself with those that were his Master's enemies: He stood with them and warmed himself. A little thing will draw those into bad company that will be drawn to it by the love of a good fire. If Peter's zeal for his Master had not frozen, but had continued in the heat it seemed to be of but a few hours before, he had not had occasion to warm himself now. Peter was much to be blamed, 1. Because he associated with these wicked men. Doubtless they were diverting themselves with this night's expedition, scoffing at Christ; and what sort of entertainment would this give to Peter? If Peter had not so much courage as to appear publicly for his Master, yet he might have had so much devotion as to retire into a corner, and weep in secret for his Master's sufferings, and his own sin in forsaking him. 2. Because he desired to be thought one of them. Is this Peter? It is ill warming ourselves with those with whom we are in danger of burning ourselves.

IV. Peter, Christ's friend, having begun to deny him, the high priest, his enemy, begins to accuse him, v. 19–21. It should seem, the first attempt was to prove him a teacher of false doctrine, which this evangelist relates; and, when they failed in the proof of this, then they charged him with blasphemy, which is related by the other evangelists.

1. The articles or heads upon which Christ was examined (v. 19): concerning his disciples and his doctrine.

(1) The irregularity of the process; it was against all law and equity. Now that he is their prisoner they have nothing to lay to his charge. Against all reason and justice, he is put on to be his own accuser.

(2) The intention. The high priest then examined him upon those interrogatories which would touch his life. [1] Concerning his disciples, that he might charge him with sedition. Some think his question concerning his disciples was, "What is now become of them all? Why do they not appear?" upbraiding him with their cowardice in deserting him, and thus adding to the affliction of it. [2] Concerning his doctrine, that they might charge him with heresy. This was a matter properly cognizable in that court, therefore a prophet could not perish but at Jerusalem, where that court sat. They said nothing to him concerning his miracles, by which he had done so much good, because of these they were sure they could take no hold.

2. The appeal Christ made, in answer to these interrogatories. As to his disciples, he said nothing, because it was an impertinent question. His having disciples was no more than what was practised and allowed by their own doctors. If Caiaphas designed to ensnare them, it was in kindness to them that Christ said nothing of them, for he had said, Let these go their way. If he meant to upbraid him with their cowardice, no wonder that he said nothing. He would say nothing to condemn them, and could say nothing to justify them. As to his doctrine, he said nothing in particular, but in general referred himself to those that heard him, v. 20, 21.

leged person, to make interest for Peter's admission. But thus our poor disciple is in the coils of the serpent.

17. Then saith the damsel that kept the door—"one of the maids of the high priest," says Mark (14:66). "When she saw Peter warming himself, she looked upon him and said" (Mark 14:67). Luke is more graphic (22:56)—She "beheld him as he sat by the fire (lit., 'the light'), and earnestly looked on him (fixed her gaze upon him), and said." "His demeanor and timidity, which must have vividly showed themselves, as it so generally happens, leading to the recognition of him" [OLSHAUSEN]. Art thou not also one of this man's disciples?—i.e., thou as well as "that other disciple," whom she knew to be one, but did not challenge, perceiving that he was a privileged person. He saith, I am not—"He denied before them all, saying, I know not what thou sayest" (Matt. 26:70)—a common form of point-blank denial; "I know [supply 'Him'] not, neither understand I what thou sayest" (Mark 14:68); "Woman, I know Him not" (Luke 22:57). This was THE FIRST DENIAL. "And he went out into the porch [thinking, perhaps, to steal away], and the cock crew," (Mark 14:68).

18. And the servants and officers—the menials and some of the "band" that "took Jesus." stood there, who had made—'having made'—a fire of coals, for it was cold, and they warmed themselves—"John alone notices the material (charcoal) of which the fire was made, and the reason for a fire—the coldness of the night" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. "Peter went in and sat with the servants to see the end (Matt. 26:58), and warmed himself at the fire" (Mark 14:54). These two statements are extremely interesting. His wishing to "see the end," or issue of these proceedings, was what led him into the palace, for he evidently feared the worst. But once in, the serpent coil is drawn closer; it is a cold night, and why should not he take advantage of the fire as well as others? Besides, in the talk of the crowd about the all-engrossing topic, he may pick up something which he would like to hear. "And as Peter was beneath in the palace" (Mark 14:66). Matthew (26:69) says, "sat without in the palace." According to Oriental architecture, and especially in large buildings, as here, the street door—or heavy folding gate through which single persons entered by a wicket kept by a porter—opened by a passage or "porch" (Mark 14:68) into a quadrangular court, here called the "palace" or hall, which was open above, and is frequently paved with flagstones. In the center of this court the "fire" would be kindled (in a brazier). At the upper end of it, probably, was the chamber in which the trial was held, open to the court and not far from the fire (Luke 22:61), but on a higher level; for Mark says the court was "beneath" it. The ascent was, perhaps, by a short flight of steps. This explanation will make the intensely interesting details more intelligible.

19-21. The high priest . . . asked Jesus of his disciples, and of his doctrine—probably to entrap Him into some statements which might be used against Him at the trial. From our Lord's answer it would seem that "His disciples" were understood to be some secret party.

by trade, it is not likely that he should have been known to the high priest, as it is here said of that disciple who followed Jesus with Peter. The conjecture of Grotius is the most likely, viz., that it was the person at whose house Jesus had supped. Augustine, Tract 113, speaks like a man of sound sense: We should not decide hastily, says he, on a subject concerning which the Scripture is silent.

18. Servants and officers. These belonged to the chief priests; the Roman soldiers had probably been dismissed after having conducted Christ to Annas.

F. B. MEYER:

Fear undermines loyalty. Apparently a preliminary and private examination was held while the Sanhedrin was being hastily summoned. The other disciple was evidently John. It was a mistake for Peter to throw himself into such a vortex of trial. His foolhardiness and curiosity led him thither. While the Master was before one bar, Peter stood at another, but how egregiously he failed! In spite of his brave talk, he was swept off his feet—as we shall be unless we have learned to avail ourselves of that power which is made perfect only in weakness. Peter's fall was due to his self-confidence and lack of prayer. Those who are weak should beware of exposing themselves in places and company where they are liable to fail. Do not warm yourself at the world's fires.

Three lessons emerge from Peter's failure: (1) Let us not sleep through the precious moments which heaven affords before each hour of trial, but use them for putting on the whole armor of God that we may be able to stand in the evil day. (2) Let us not vaunt our own strength. We need more than resolution to sustain us in the hour of conflict. (3) Let us not cast ourselves down from the mountainside unless absolutely sure that God bids us to do so. He will not otherwise give his angels charge to keep us.—Bible Commentary

19. Asked Jesus of his disciples, and of his doctrine. He probably asked Him by what authority, or in virtue of what right, He collected disciples, formed a different sect, preached a new doctrine, and set himself up for a public Reformer? As religion was interested in these things, the high priest was considered as being the proper judge. But all this, with what follows, was transacted by night, and this was contrary to established laws. For the Talmud states that "criminal processes can neither commence nor terminate, but during the course of the day. If the person be acquitted, the sentence ceedings. He appeals to the settled rules of their own court, whether they dealt fairly by him. Why ask you me? Which implies two absurdities in judgment: First, "Why ask you me now concerning my doctrine, when you have already condemned it?" They had made an order of court for excommunicating all that owned him (ch. ix. 22), and now they come to ask what his doctrine is! Secondly, "Why ask you me? Must I accuse myself?"

[2] He insists upon his fair and open dealing with them in the publication of his doctrine. Christ clears himself very fully. First, As to the manner of his preaching. He spoke openly with freedom and plainness of speech. Christ explained himself fully, with, Verily, verily, I say unto you. Secondly, As to the persons he preached to: He spoke to the world, to all that had ears to hear, and were willing to hear him, high or low, learned or unlearned, Jew or Gentile, friend or foe. Thirdly, As to the places he preached in. When he was in the country, he preached ordinarily in the synagogues; when he came up to Jerusalem, he preached the same doctrine in the temple. Though he often preached in private houses, and on mountains, and by the seaside, yet what he preached in private was the very same with what he delivered publicly. The doctrine of Christ needs not be ashamed to appear in the most numerous assembly, for it carries its own strength and beauty along with it. Fourthly, As to the doctrine itself. In secret have I said nothing. He sought no corners, for he feared no colours, nor said anything that he needed to be ashamed of; what he did speak in private to his disciples he ordered them to proclaim on the house-tops, Matt. x. 27.

[3] He appeals to those that had heard him, and desires that they might be examined: "Ask those that heard me what I said unto them." He means not his friends and followers, who might be presumed to speak in his favour, but, Ask any impartial hearer. The doctrine of Christ may safely appeal to all that know it. Those who will judge impartially cannot but witness to it.

V. While the judges were examining him, the servants that stood by were abusing him, v. 22, 23.

1. It was a base affront which one of the officers gave him; this insolent fellow struck him with the palm of his hand, saying, Answerest thou the high priest so?

(1) He struck him—he gave him a blow. It was unjust to strike one that neither said nor did amiss; it was cowardly to strike one that had his hands tied; and barbarous to strike a prisoner at the bar. Here was a breach of the peace in the face of the court, and yet the judges countenanced it.

(2) He checked him in a haughty imperious manner: Answerest thou the high priest so? As if the blessed Jesus were not good enough to speak to his master, but, like a rude and ignorant prisoner, must be controlled by the jailer, and taught how to behave. It was done to please the high priest, and to curry favour with him; for what he said implied a jealousy for the dignity of the high priest. Wicked rulers will not want wicked servants, who will help forward the affliction of those whom their masters persecute.

2. Christ bore this affront with wonderful meekness and patience (v. 23): "If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil. But if well, why smitest thou me?" Christ did not here turn the other cheek, by which it appears that that rule, Matt. v. 39, is not to be understood literally. Comparing Christ's precept with his pattern, we learn that in such cases we must not be our own avengers, nor judges in our own cause. Our resentment of injuries done us must always be rational, and never passionate; such Christ's here was.

VI. While the servants were thus abusing him, Peter was proceeding to deny him, v. 25–27.

1. He repeated the sin the second time, v. 25. While he was warming himself with the servants, they asked him, Art not thou one of his disciples? He, perhaps, fearing he should be seized, if he should own it, flatly denied it, and said, I am not.

(1) It was his great folly to thrust himself into the temptation, by continuing in the company. He stayed to warm himself; but those that warm themselves with evil doers grow cold towards good people and good things, and those that are fond of the devil's fire-side are in danger of the devil's fire.

(2) It was his great unhappiness that he was again assaulted by the temptation. [1] The subtlety of the tempter in running down one whom he saw falling; not a maid now, but all the servants. Yielding to one temptation invites another, and perhaps a stronger. Satan redoubles his attacks when we give ground. [2] The danger of bad company. We commonly study to approve ourselves to those with whom we choose to associate. As we choose our people we choose our praise; we are therefore concerned to make the first choice well.

20. I spake—have spoken—openly to the world—See ch. 7:4. I ever taught in the synagogues and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort—courting publicity, though with sublime noiselessness.

in secret have I said—spake I—nothing—i.e., nothing of any different nature; all His private communications with the Twelve being but explanations and developments of His public teaching. (Cf. Isa. 45: 19; 48:16). 21. Why askest thou me? ask them which heard me . . . they know what I . . . said—This seems to imply that He saw the attempt to draw Him into selfcrimination, and resented it by falling back upon the right of every accused party to have some charge laid against Him by competent witnesses.

22. struck Jesus with the palm . . . Answerest Thou the high priest so—(See Isa. 50:6; and cf. Acts 23:2).

23. If I have spoken . . .—'if I spoke' evil, in reply to the high priest. if well—He does not say "If not" evil, as if His reply were merely unobjectionable: "well" seems to challenge more than this as due to His remonstrance [BENGEL]. This shows that Matthew 5:39 is not to be taken to the letter. 24-27. Now Annas had sent him bound unto Caiaphas—Our translators so render the words, understanding that the foregoing interview took place before Caiaphas; Annas, declining to meddle with the case, having sent Him to Caiaphas at once. But the words here literally are, "Annas sent Him [not 'had sent Him] to Caiaphas"—and the "now" being of doubtful authority. Thus read, the verse affords no evidence that He was sent to Caiaphas before the interview just recorded, but implies rather the contrary. We take this interview, then, with some of the ablest interpreters, to be a preliminary and non-official one with Annas, at an hour of the night when Caiaphas' Council could not convene; and one that ought not to be confounded with that solemn one recorded by the other Evangelists, when all were assembled and witnesses called. But the building in which both met with Jesus appears to have been the same, the room only being different, and the court, of course, in that case, one. 25. And Simon Peter was standing and warming himself. They said therefore . . . , Art thou not also one of his disciples?—In Matthew 26:71 the second charge was made by "another maid, when he was gone out into the porch," who "saw him, and said unto them that were there, This [fellow] was also with Jesus of may be pronounced during that day; but, if he be condemned, the sentence cannot be pronounced till the next day. But no kind of judgment is to be executed, either on the eve of the Sabbath, or the eve of any festival." Nevertheless, to the lasting infamy of this people, Christ was judicially interrogated and condemned during the night; and on the night, too, of the Passover, or, according to others, on the eve of that feast. Thus all the forms of justice were insulted and outraged in the case of our Lord. In this "his humiliation his judgment was taken away," Acts viii. 33.

20. I spake openly to the world. To every person in the land indiscriminately—to the people at large. This is another proof that John uses the term world to mean the Jewish people only, for it is certain our Lord did not preach to the Gentiles. The answer of our Lord, mentioned in this and the following verse, is such as became a Person conscious of His own innocence and confident in the righteousness of His cause. I have taught in the Temple, in the synagogues, in all the principal cities, towns, and villages, and through all the country. I have had no secret school. You and your emissaries have watched Me everywhere. No doctrine has ever proceeded from My lips but what was agreeable to the righteousness of the law and the purity of God. Ask those who have attended our public ministrations and hear whether they can prove that I or My disciples have preached any false doctrines, have ever troubled society, or disturbed the state. Attend to the ordinary course of justice, call witnesses, let them make their depositions, and then proceed to judge according to the evidence brought before you.

22. One of the officers . . . struck Jesus. This was an outrage to all justice. For a prisoner, before he is condemned, is ever considered to be under the especial protection of justice; nor has anyone a right to touch him but according to the direction of the law. But it has been observed before that if justice had been done to Christ He could have neither suffered nor died.

24. Now Annas had sent him. It has been observed before that the proper place of this verse is immediately after the thirteenth; and if it be allowed to stand here it should be read in a parenthesis and considered as a recapitulation of what had been done before.

MATTHEW HENRY

(3) It was his great weakness to yield to the temptation, and to say, I am not one of his disciples, as one ashamed of that which was his honour. When Christ was admired and treated with respect, Peter prided himself, in this, that he was a disciple of Christ. Thus many who seem fond of the reputation of religion when it is in fashion are ashamed of the reproach of it.

2. He repeated the sin the third time, v. 26, 27. Here he was attacked by one of the servants, who was kinsman to Malchus, who gave him the lie with great assurance: "Did not I see thee in the garden with him?" Peter then denied again.

(1) Before his relation to Christ was only suspected, here it is proved upon him by one that saw him with Jesus. Those who by sin think to help themselves out of trouble do but entangle and embarrass themselves the more. Dare to be brave, for truth will out. Notice is taken of this servant's being akin to Malchus, because this circumstance would make it the more a terror to Peter. We should not make any man in particular our enemy if we can help it. He that may need a friend should not make a foe. Though here was sufficient evidence against Peter to have prosecuted him, yet he escapes, has no harm done him. We are often drawn into sin by groundless causeless fears, which a small degree of wisdom and resolution would make nothing of.

(2) His yielding to it was no less base than the former: He denied again. The nature of sin in general: the heart is hardened by the deceitfulness of it, Heb. iii. 13. The beginning of sin is as the letting forth of water, when once the fence is broken men easily go from bad to worse. Of the sin of lying in particular; it is a fruitful sin; one lie needs another to support it, and that another.

(3) Immediately the cock crew; and this is all that is here said of his repentance, it being recorded by the other evangelists. The crowing of the cock to others was an accidental thing, and had no significancy, but to Peter it was the voice of God.

Verses 28–40

We have here an account of Christ's arraignment before Pilate, the Roman governor, in the praetor's house, or hall of judgment; thither they hurried him, to get him condemned in the Roman court, and executed by the Roman power. They took this course, 1. That he might be put to death the more legally and regularly; not stoned in a popular tumult, as Stephen, but put to death with the present formalities of justice. 2. That he might be put to death the more safely. If they could engage the Roman government in the matter, there would be little danger of an uproar. 3. That he might be put to death with more reproach to himself. The death of the cross, being of all deaths the most ignominious, they were desirous by it to put an indelible mark of infamy upon him. This therefore they harped upon, Crucify him. 4. That he might be put to death with less reproach to them. It was an invidious thing to put one to death that had done so much good, and therefore they were willing to throw the odium upon the Roman government. Thus many are more afraid of the scandal of a bad action than of the sin of it. (1) Their industry in the prosecution: It was early, when most people were in their beds. Now that they had him in their hands, they would lose no time till they had him upon the cross. (2) Their superstition and vile hypocrisy: The chief priests and elders went not into the judgment-hall lest they should be defiled, but kept out of doors, that they might eat the passover, and therefore would not go into the court, for fear of touching a Gentile, and thereby contracting, not a legal, but only a traditional pollution. This they scrupled, but made no scruple of breaking through all the laws of equity to persecute Christ to the death.

I. Pilate's conference with the prosecutors. They were called first, and stated what they had to say against the prisoner, v. 29–32.

1. The judge calls for the indictment. Because they would not come into the hall, he went out to them. Here are three things commendable in him: (1) His diligent and close application to business. Men in public trusts must not love their ease. (2) His condescending to the humour of the people. He might have said, "If they be so nice as not to come in to me, let them go home as they came"; but Pilate insists not upon it, and goes out to them. (3) His adherence to the rule of justice, in demanding the accusation: "What accusation bring you against this man? What is the crime you charge him with, and what proof have you of it?"

2. The prosecutors demand judgment against him upon a general surmise that he was a criminal (v. 30): If he were not a malefactor we would not have de-

Nazareth." So also Mark 14:69. But in Luke 22:58 it is said, "After a little while" (from the time of the first denial), "another [man] saw him, and said, Thou art also of them." Possibly it was thrown at him by more than one; but these circumstantial variations only confirm the truth of the narrative. He denied it, and said, I am not—in Matthew 26:72, "He denied with an oath, I do not know the man." This was THE SECOND DENIAL. 26. One of the servants of the high priest, being his kinsman, whose ear Peter cut off, saith, Did not I see thee in the garden with him—No doubt his relationship to Malchus drew attention to the man who smote him, and this enabled him to identify Peter. "Sad reprisals!" [BENGEL]. The other Evangelists make his detection to turn upon his dialect. "After a while ['about the space of one hour after,' Luke 22:59] came unto him they that stood by and said to Peter, Surely thou also art one of them, for thy speech betrayeth thee" (Matt. 26: 73). "Thou art a Galilean, and thy speech agreeth thereto" (Mark 14:70; and so Luke 22:59). The Galilean dialect had a more Syrian cast than that of Judea. If Peter had held his peace, this peculiarity had not been observed; but hoping, probably, to put them off the scent by joining in the fireside talk, he only thus revealed himself. 27. Peter then denied again—But, if the challenge of Malchus' kinsman was made simultaneously with this on account of his Galilean dialect, it was no simple denial; for Matthew 26:74 says, "Then began he to curse and to swear, saying, I know not the man." So Mark 14:71. This was THE THIRD DENIAL. and immediately—"while he yet spake" (Luke 22:60). the cock crew—As Mark is the only Evangelist who tells us that our Lord predicted that the cock should crow twice (ch. 14:30), so he only mentions that it did crow twice (vs. 72). The other Evangelists, who tell us merely that our Lord predicted that "before the cock should crow he would deny Him thrice" (Matt. 26:34; Luke 22:34; John 13:38), mention only one actual crowing, which was Mark's last. This is something affecting in this Evangelist—who, according to the earliest tradition (confirmed by internal evidence), derived his materials so largely from Peter as to have been styled his "interpreter," being the only one who gives both the sad prediction and its still sadder fulfilment in full. It seems to show that Peter himself not only retained through all his after-life the most vivid recollection of the circumstances of his fall, but that he was willing that others should know them too. The immediately subsequent acts are given in full only in Luke (22:61, 62): "And the Lord turned and looked upon Peter," from the hall of judgment to the court, in the way already explained. But who can tell what lightning flashes of wounded love and piercing reproach shot from that "look" through the eye of Peter into his heart! "And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how He had said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny Me thrice. And Peter went out and wept bitterly."

28. Then led they Jesus from Caiaphas to the hall of judgment—but not till "in the morning the chief priests held a consultation with the elders and scribes and the whole council against Him to put Him to death, and bound Him" (Matt. 27:1; and see on Mark 15:1). The word here rendered "hall of judgment" is from the Latin, and denotes 'the palace of the governor of a Roman province.' they themselves went not into the judgment hall lest they should be defiled—by contact with ceremonially unclean Gentiles. but that they might eat the passover—If this refer to the principal part of the festival, the eating of the lamb, the question is, how our Lord and His disciples came to eat it the night before; and, as it was an evening meal, how ceremonial defilement contracted in the morning would unfit them for partaking of it, as after 6 o'clock it was reckoned a new day. These are questions which have occasioned immense research and learned treatises. But as the usages of the Jews appear to have somewhat varied at different times, and our present knowledge of them is not sufficient to clear up all difficulties, they are among the not very important questions which probably will never be entirely solved.

29-32. Pilate went out to them, and said, What accusation bring ye against this man?—State your charge. 30. If he were not a malefactor, we would not

ADAM CLARKE

27. And immediately the cock crew. Peter denied our Lord three times. His first denial took place when he was without, or beneath, in the hall of Caiaphas' house. He was not in the higher part where Christ stood before the high priest, but without that division of the hall and in the lower part with the servants and officers, at the fire kindled in the midst of the hall, vv. 16, 18; and the girl who kept the door had entered into the hall, where she charged Peter. His second denial was a short time after the first, Luke xxii. 58. Having once denied his Master, he naturally retired from the place where his accuser was to the vestibule of the hall, Matt. xxvi. 71, and it was the time of the first cock-crowing, or soon after midnight. After his remaining here a short time, perhaps an hour, another girl saw him and said to them who were standing by in the vestibule that he was one of them. Peter, to avoid this charge, withdrew into the hall and warmed himself. The girl, and those to whom she had spoken, followed him, the communication between the two places being immediate. Here a man enforced the charge of the girl, according to Luke; and others urged it, according to John; and Peter denied Jesus vehemently. His third denial was in the hall within sight of Jesus, though at such a distance from Him that Jesus could not know what passed but in a supernatural way. And about an hour after his second denial those who stood by founded a third charge against him, on his being a Galilean, which Luke says, chap. xxii. 59, one in particular strongly affirmed; and which, according to John, v. 26, was supported by one of Malchus' relations. This occasioned a more vehement denial than before, and immediately the cock crew the second time. The first denial may have been between our twelve and one, and the second between our two and three. The time of Peter's denials happened during the space of the third Roman watch, or that division of the night between twelve and three, which is called "cock-crowing," Mark xiii. 35.

28. The hall of judgment. To the praetorium. This was the house where Pilate lodged; hence called in our margin Pilate's house. The praetorium is so called from being the dwelling place of the praetor, or chief of the province. It was also the place where he held his court and tried causes. John has omitted all that passed in the house of Caiaphas—the accusations brought against Christ, the false witnesses, the insults which He received in the house of the high priest, and the assembling of the grand council, or Sanhedrin. These he found amply detailed by the other three Evangelists, and for this reason it appears that he omitted them. John's is properly a supplementary Gospel. Lest they should be defiled. The Jews considered even the touch of a Gentile as a legal defilement, and therefore would not venture into the praetorium for fear of contracting some impurity, which would have obliged them to separate themselves from all religious ordinances till the evening, Lev. xv. 10-11, 19-20. That they might eat the passover. Some maintain that to pascha here does not mean the paschal lamb but the other sacrifices which were offered during the paschal solemnity—for this had been eaten the evening before; and that our Lord was crucified the day after the Passover. Others have maintained that the paschal lamb is here meant, that this was the proper day for sacrificing it, that it was on the very hour in which it was offered that Christ expired on the Cross, and that therefore our Lord did not eat the paschal lamb this year, or that He ate it some hours before the common time. That Jesus ate a Passover this last year of His life is sufficiently evident from Matt. xxvi. 17-19; Mark xiv. 12-18; Luke xxii. 8-15; and that He ate this Passover some hours before the ordinary time and was himself slain at that hour in which the paschal lamb was ordered by the law to be sacrificed is highly probable, if not absolutely certain.

29. Pilate then went out. This was an act of condescension; but, as the Romans had confirmed to the Jews the free use of all their rites and ceremonies, the governor could not do less then comply with them in this matter. He went out to them, that they might not be livered him to thee. This bespeaks them, (1) Very rude and uncivil to Pilate. He put the most reasonable question to them that could be; but, if it had been the most absurd, they could not have answered him with more disdain. (2) Very spiteful and malicious towards our Lord Jesus. They will presume him guilty who could prove himself innocent. They say, "He is an evil-doer." He an evil-doer who went about doing good! It is no new thing for the best of benefactors to be branded and run down as the worst of malefactors. (3) Very proud and conceited of themselves, and their own judgment and justice.

3. The judge remands him to their own court (v. 31): "Take you him, and judge him according to your own law." Some think Pilate herein complimented them, acknowledging the remains of their power, and allowing them to exert it. Saith Pilate, "Go as far as your law will allow you, and, if you go further, it shall be connived at." This he said, willing to do the Jews a pleasure, but unwilling to do them the service they required. (2) Others think he upbraided them with their present state of weakness and subjection. Saith Pilate, "You have found him guilty by your own law, condemn him, if you dare, by your own law." Some think Pilate here reflects upon the law of Moses, as if it allowed them what the Roman law would by no means allow—the judging of a man unheard.

4. They disown any authority as judges: "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death." Some think they had lost their power to give judgment in matters of life and death only by their own carelessness. Others think their power was taken from them by the Romans. Their acknowledgment of this they designed for a compliment to Pilate, and to atone for their rudeness (v. 30). However, there was a providence in it, That the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled, which he spoke, signifying what death he should die, v. 32. Even those who designed the defeating of Christ's sayings were made serviceable to the fulfilling of them by an overruling hand of God. Those sayings of Christ in particular were fulfilled which he had spoken concerning his own death. Two sayings of Christ concerning his death were fulfilled, by the Jews declining to judge him according to their law. First, He had said that he should be delivered to the Gentiles, and that they should put him to death (Matt. xx. 19; Mark x. 33; Luke xviii. 32, 33). Secondly, He had said that he should be crucified (Matt. xx. 19; xxvi. 2), lifted up, ch. iii. 14; xii. 32. Now if they had judged him by their law, he had been stoned. It was therefore necessary that Christ should be put to death by the Romans. As the Roman power had brought him to be born at Bethlehem, so now to die upon a cross, and both according to the scriptures.

II. Here is Pilate's conference with the prisoner, v. 33, &c.

1. The prisoner set to the bar. Pilate, after he had conferred with the chief priests at his door, entered into the hall, and called for Jesus to be brought in. Pilate entered into judgment with him, that God might not enter into judgment with us.

2. His examination. The other evangelists tell us that his accusers had laid it to his charge that he perverted the nation, forbidding to give tribute to Caesar.

(1) Here is a question put to him, with a design to find out something upon which to ground an accusation: "Art thou the king of the Jews?" Some think Pilate asked this with an air of scorn and contempt: "What! art thou a king? Art thou the king of the Jews, by whom thou art thus hated and persecuted?" Since it could not be proved he ever said it, he would constrain him to say it now, that he might proceed upon his own confession.

(2) Christ answers this question with another as an intimation to Pilate to consider upon what grounds he went (v. 34): "Sayest thou this thing of thyself or did others tell it thee of me? It is plain that thou hast no reason to say this of thyself." Pilate was bound by his office to take care of the interests of the Roman government, but he could not say that this was in any danger, or suffered any damage, from anything our Lord Jesus had ever said or done. [2] "If others tell it of me thou oughtest to consider whether those who represent me as an enemy to Caesar are not really such themselves." If Pilate had been as inquisitive as he ought to have been in this matter, he would have found that the true reason why the chief priests were outrageous against Jesus was because he did not set up a temporal kingdom in opposition to the Roman power. Not answering this expectation of theirs, they charged that upon him of which they were themselves most notoriously guilty—disaffection to and design against the present government.

have delivered him up unto thee—They were conscious they had no case of which Pilate could take cognizance, and therefore insinuate that they had already found Him worthy of death by their own law; but not having the power, under the Roman government, to carry their sentence into execution, they had come merely for his sanction.

32. That the saying . . . might be fulfilled which he spake, signifying what death he should die—i.e., by crucifixion (ch. 12:32, 33; Matt. 20:19); which being a Roman mode of execution, could only be carried into effect by order of the governor. (The Jewish mode in such cases as this was by stoning.)

33-38. Pilate . . . called Jesus, and said . . . , Art thou the King of the Jews?—In Luke 23:2 they charge our Lord before Pilate with "perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that He Himself is Christ a king." Perhaps this was what occasioned Pilate's question.

34. Jesus answered . . . , Sayest thou this of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me?—an important question for our Lord's case, to bring out whether the word "King" were meant in a political sense, with which Pilate had a right to deal, or whether he were merely put up to it by His accusers, who had no claims to charge Him but such as were of a purely religious nature, with which Pilate had nothing to do.

obliged to come into the hall and thus run the risk of being defiled.

30. If he were not a malefactor. So they did not wish to make Pilate the judge, but the executor of the sentence which they had already illegally passed.

31. It is not lawful for us to put any man to death. They might have judged Jesus according to their law, as Pilate bade them do, but they could only excommunicate or scourge Him. They might have voted Him worthy of death, but they could not put Him to death, if anything of a secular nature were charged against Him. The power of life and death was in all probability taken from the Jews when Archelaus, king of Judea, was banished to Vienna, and Judea was made a Roman province; and this happened more than fifty years before the destruction of Jerusalem. But the Romans suffered Herod, mentioned in Acts xii, to exercise the power of life and death during his reign. After all, I think it probable that, though the power of life and death was taken away from the Jews as far as it concerned affairs of state, yet it was continued to them in matters which were wholly of an ecclesiastical nature; and that they only applied thus to Pilate to persuade him that they were proceeding against Christ as an enemy of the state, and not as a transgressor of their own peculiar laws and customs. Hence, though they assert that He should die according to their law, because He made himself the Son of God, chap. xix. 7, yet they lay peculiar stress on His being an enemy to the Roman government; and when they found Pilate disposed to let Him go, they asserted that if he did he was not Caesar's friend, v. 12. It was this that intimidated Pilate and induced him to give Him up, that they might crucify Him.

32. That the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled. Or, "Thus the word was fulfilled." God permitted the Jews to lose the power of life and death, in the sense before stated, that according to the Roman laws, which punished sedition with the cross, Christ might be crucified, according to His own prediction, chap. xii. 32 and iii. 14.

33. Art thou the King of the Jews? Luke says expressly, xxiii. 2, that when the Jews brought Him to Pilate they began to accuse Him as a rebel, who said He was King of the Jews, and forbade the people to pay tribute to Caesar. It was in consequence of this accusation that Pilate asked the question mentioned in the text.

34. Sayest thou this thing of thyself? That is, Is it because My enemies thus accuse Me or because you have any suspicion of Me that you ask this question?

MATTHEW HENRY

(3) Pilate resents Christ's answer, and takes it very ill, v. 35. This is a direct answer to Christ's question, v. 34. Christ had asked him whether he spoke of himself. "No," says he; "am I a Jew?" Observe with what disdain Pilate asks, Am I a Jew? A man of sense and honour reckoned it a scandal to be counted a Jew. Christ had asked him whether others told him. "Yes," says he, "and those thine own people, and the priests; and therefore I have nothing to do but to proceed upon their information." Christ had declined answering that question, Art thou the king of the Jews? And therefore Pilate puts another question: "What hast thou done? Surely there cannot be all this smoke without some fire, what is it?"

(4) Christ, in his next reply, gives a more full answer to Pilate's former question, Art thou a king? explaining in what sense he was a king, v. 36.

[1] An account of the nature and constitution of Christ's kingdom: It is not of this world. Christ is a king, and has a kingdom, but not of this world. Its rise is not from this world. Its nature is not worldly; it is a kingdom within men, set up in their hearts and consciences. Its guards and supports are not worldly; its weapons are spiritual. Its tendency and design are not worldly. Its subjects, though they are in the world, yet are not of the world. They are neither the world's pupils nor its darlings, neither governed by its wisdom nor enriched with its wealth.

[2] An evidence of the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom produced. If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews. His followers did not offer to fight; there was no uproar, no attempt to rescue him. He did not order them to fight; nay, he forbade them, knowing that what would have been the destruction of any worldly kingdom would be the advancement and establishment of his. Now you may see my kingdom is not from hence; in the world, but not of it.

(5) In answer to Pilate's further query, he replies yet more directly, v. 37. Pilate's plain question: "Art thou a king then? Thou speakest of a kingdom thou hast; art thou then, in any sense, a king? Explain thyself." The good confession which our Lord Jesus witnessed before Pontius Pilate: Thou sayest that I am a king, that is, It is as thou sayest, I am a king. He grants himself to be a king, though not in the sense that Pilate meant. Though Christ took upon him the form of a servant, yet even then he justly claimed the honour and authority of a king. He explains himself, and shows how he is a king, as he came to bear witness of the truth; he rules in the minds of men by the power of truth. He came to be a witness, a witness for the God that made the world, and against sin that ruins the world, and by this word of his testimony he sets up and keeps up, his kingdom. Christ's errand into the world, and his business in the world, were to bear witness to the truth. To reveal it, to discover to the world that which otherwise could not have been known concerning God and his goodwill to men, ch. xvii. 26. To confirm it. By his miracles he bore witness to the truth of religion, that all men through him might believe. Now by doing this he is a king, and sets up a kingdom. The spirit and genius, of Christ's kingdom, is truth, divine truth. When he said, I am the truth, he said, in effect, I am a king. He conquers by the convincing evidence of truth; he rules by the commanding power of truth. He came a light into the world, and rules as the sun by day. The subjects of this kingdom are those that are of the truth. All that are in love with truth will hear the voice of Christ, for greater, better, surer, sweeter truths can nowhere be found than are found in Christ, by whom grace and truth came.

(6) Pilate, hereupon, puts a good question to him, but does not stay for an answer, v. 38. He said, What is truth? and immediately went out again. It is certain that this was a good question. Truth is that pearl of great price which the human understanding is in quest of; for it cannot rest but in that which is, or at least is apprehended to be, truth. But many put this question that have not patience enough to persevere in their search after truth, or not humility and sincerity enough to receive it when they have found it. It is uncertain with what design Pilate asked this question. Perhaps he spoke it as a learner, as one that began to think well of Christ. Some think he spoke it as a judge, enquiring further into the cause: "Tell me what the truth of it is, the true state of this matter." Others think he spoke it as a scoffer: "Thou talkest of truth; canst thou tell what truth is, or give me a definition of it?" Like men of no religion, who take a pleasure in bantering all religions, he ridicules both sides; and therefore Christ made him no reply. But, though Christ would not tell Pilate what is truth, he has told his disciples, and by them

35. Pilate answered, Am I a Jew? Thine own nation and the chief priests delivered thee to me: What hast thou done?--i.e., Jewish questions I neither understand nor meddle with; but Thou art here on a charge which, though it seems only Jewish, may yet involve treasonable matter: As they state it, I cannot decide the point; tell me, then, what procedure of Thine has brought Thee into this position.' In modern phrase, Pilate's object in this question was merely to determine the relevancy of the charge. 36. Jesus answered, My kingdom is not of this world--He does not say 'not over,' but 'not of this world'--i.e., in its origin and nature; therefore 'no such kingdom as need give thee or thy master the least alarm.' if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews--"A very convincing argument; for if His servants did not fight to prevent their King from being delivered up to His enemies, much less would they use force for the establishment of His kingdom" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. but now--but the fact is. is my kingdom not from hence--Our Lord only says whence His kingdom is not--first simply affirming it, next giving proof of it, then reaffirming it. This was all that Pilate had to do with. The positive nature of His kingdom He would not obtrude upon one who was as little able to comprehend it, as entitled officially to information about it. (It is worthy of notice that the "MY," which occurs four times in this one verse--thrice of His kingdom, and once of His servants--is put in the emphatic form.) 37. Art thou a king then?--There was no sarcasm or disdain in this question [as THOLUCK, ALFORD, and others, allege], else our Lord's answer would have been different. Putting emphasis upon "thou," his question betrays a mixture of surprise and uneasiness, partly at the possibility of there being, after all, something dangerous under the claim, and partly from a certain awe which our Lord's demeanor probably struck into him. Thou sayest that I am a king--It is even so. To this end was I ('have I been') born, and for this cause came I--am I come--into the world, that I may bear witness to the truth--His birth expresses His manhood; His coming into the world, His existence before assuming humanity: The truth, then, here affirmed, though Pilate would catch little of it, was that His Incarnation was expressly in order to the assumption of Royalty in our nature. Yet, instead of saying, He came to be a King, which is His meaning, He says He came to testify to the truth. Why this? Because, in such circumstances it required a noble courage not to flinch from His royal claims; and our Lord, conscious that He was putting forth that courage, gives a turn to His confession expressive of it. It is to this that Paul alludes, in those remarkable words to Timothy: "I charge thee before God, who quickeneth all things, and before Christ Jesus, who, in the presence of Pontius Pilate, witnessed the good confession" (I Tim. 6:13). This one act of our Lord's life, His courageous witness-bearing before the governor, was selected as an encouraging example of the fidelity which Timothy ought to display. As the Lord [says OLSHAUSEN beautifully] owned Himself the Son of God before the most exalted theocratic council, so He confessed His regal dignity in presence of the representative of the highest political authority on earth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice--Our Lord here not only affirms that His word had in it a self-evidencing, self-recommending power, but gently insinuated the true secret of the growth and grandeur of His kingdom--as A KINGDOM OF TRUTH, in its highest sense, into which all souls who have learned to live and count all things but loss for the truth are, by a most heavenly attraction, drawn as into their proper element; THE KING of whom Jesus is, fetching them in and ruling them by His captivating power over their hearts. 38. Pilate saith unto him, What is truth?--i.e., 'Thou stirrest the question of questions, which the thoughtful of every age have asked, but never man yet answered.' And when he had said this--as if, by putting such a question, he was getting into interminable and unseasonable inquiries, when this business demanded rather prompt action--he went out again unto the Jews--thus missing a noble opportunity for himself, and giving utterance to that consciousness of the want of all intellectual and moral certainty, which was the feeling of every thoughtful mind at that time. "The only certainty," says the elder PLINY, "is that nothing is certain, nor more miserable than man, nor more proud. The fearful laxity of morals at that time must doubtless be traced in a great degree to this skepticism. The revelation of the eternal

ADAM CLARKE

35. Am I a Jew? That is, I am not a Jew, and cannot judge whether Thou art what is called the Christ, the King of the Jews. It is Thine own countrymen, and their spiritual rulers, who delivered Thee up to me with the above accusation. What hast thou done? If Thou dost not profess thyself King over this people, and an enemy to Caesar, what is it that Thou hast done for which they desire Thy condemnation?

36. My kingdom is not of this world. It is purely spiritual and divine. If it had been of a secular nature, then My servants would have contended—they would have opposed force with force, as the kingdoms of this world do in their wars; but as my kingdom is not of this world, therefore no resistance has been made.

37. Thou sayest. A common form of expression for "Yes, it is so." I was born into the world that I might set up and maintain a spiritual government, but this government is established in and by truth. All that love truth hear My voice and attend to the spiritual doctrines I preach. It is by truth alone that I influence the minds and govern the manners of My subjects.

38. What is truth? Among the sages of that time there were many opinions concerning truth, and some had even supposed that it was a thing utterly out of the reach of men. Pilate perhaps might have asked the question in a mocking way; and his not staying to get an answer indicated that he either despaired of getting a satisfactory one or that he was indifferent about it.

has told us, ch. xiv. 6.

III. The result of both these conferences with the prosecutors and the prisoner (v. 38–40).

1. The judge appeared his friend.

(1) He publicly declared him innocent, v. 38. I find in him no fault at all. Nothing criminal appears against him. This solemn declaration of Christ's innocency was, [1] For the justification and honour of the Lord Jesus. Though he was treated as the worst of malefactors he had never merited such treatment. [2] For explaining the design and intention of his death, that he did not die for any sin of his own, and therefore he died as a sacrifice for our sins, and that, one man should die for the people, ch. xi. 50. [3] For aggravating the sin of the Jews that prosecuted him with so much violence. Our Lord Jesus, though brought in not guilty, is still run down as a malefactor, and his blood thirsted for.

(2) He proposed an expedient for his discharge (v. 39): You have a custom, that I should release to you a prisoner at the passover; shall it be this king of the Jews. It was an appeal to the people, as appears, Matt. xxvii. 15. Probably he had heard how this Jesus had been attended but the other day with the hosannas of the common people, and therefore he made no doubt but they would demand the release of Jesus. He allows their custom, in honour of the passover, which was a memorial of their release. He offers to release Jesus to them, according to the custom. If he found no fault in him, he was bound in conscience to discharge him. But he was willing to trim the matter, and please all sides, being governed more by worldly wisdom than by the rules of equity.

2. The people appeared his enemies (v. 40): They cried all again, Not this man, but Barabbas. Observe how fierce and outrageous they were. Pilate proposed the thing to them calmly, but they resolved in it a heat, and gave in their resolution with clamour and noise. There is cause to suspect a deficiency of reason and justice on that side which calls in the assistance of popular tumult. How foolish and absurd they were, as is intimated in the short account here given of the other candidate: Now Barabbas was a robber, and therefore, [1] A breaker of the law of God; and yet he shall be spared. [2] An enemy to the public safety and personal property. The clamour of the town is wont to be against robbers, yet here it is for one. Thus those do who prefer their sins before Christ. Sin is a robber, and yet foolishly chosen rather than Christ, who would truly enrich us.

truth alone was able to breathe new life into ruined human nature, and that in the apprehension of complete redemption" [OLSHAUSEN]. and saith unto them—in the hearing of our Lord, who had been brought forth—I find in him no fault—no crime. This so exasperated "the chief priests and elders" that, afraid of losing their prey, they poured forth a volley of charges against Him, as appears from Luke 23:4, 5: on Pilate's affirming His innocence, "they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place." They see no hope of getting Pilate's sanction to His death unless they can fasten upon Him a charge of conspiracy against the government; and as Galilee was noted for its turbulence (Luke 13:1; Acts 5:37), and our Lord's ministry lay chiefly there, they artfully introduce it to give color to their charge. "And the chief priests accused Him of many things, but He answered nothing (Mark 15.3). Then said Pilate unto Him, Hearest Thou not how many things they witness against Thee? And He answered him to never a word, insomuch that the governor marvelled greatly" (Matt. 27:13, 14). See on Mark 15:3-5. In his perplexity, Pilate, hearing of Galilee, bethinks himself of the expedient of sending Him to Herod, in the hope of thereby further shaking off responsibility in the case. See on Mark 15:6, and on Luke 23:6-12. The return of the prisoner only deepened the perplexity of Pilate, who, "calling together the chief priests, rulers, and people," tells them plainly that not one of their charges against "this man" had been made good, while even Herod, to whose jurisdiction he more naturally belonged, had done nothing to Him: He "will therefore chastise and release him" (Luke 23:13-16). 39. But ye have a custom that I should release one unto you at the passover . . .—See on Mark 15:7-11. "On the typical import of the choice of Christ to suffer, by which Barabbas was set free, see Leviticus 16, particularly vss. 5-10, where the subject is the sin offering on the great day of atonement" [KRAFFT in LUTHARDT].

ADAM CLARKE

I find in him no fault. Having asked the above question, and being convinced of our Lord's innocence, he went out to the Jews to testify his conviction, and to deliver Him, if possible, out of their hands.

39. But ye have a custom. Nothing relative to the origin or reason of this custom is known. Commentators have swum in an ocean of conjecture on this point.

40. Barabbas was a robber. See Matt. xxvii. 16.

CHAPTER 19

Verses 1–15

Here is a further account of the unfair trial which they gave to our Lord Jesus. The prosecutors carried it on with great confusion among the people, and the judge with great confusion in his own breast.

I. The judge abuses the prisoner, though he declares him innocent, and hopes therewith to pacify the prosecutors.

1. He ordered him to be whipped as a criminal, v. 1. Pilate, being disappointed in his project of releasing him upon the people's choice, took Jesus, and scourged him. Matthew and Mark mention his scourging after his condemnation, but here it appears to have been before. Luke speaks of Pilate's offering to chastise him, and let him go, which must be before sentence. This scourging of him was designed only to pacify the Jews. The Roman scourgings were ordinarily very severe, not limited, as among the Jews, to forty stripes; yet this pain and shame Christ submitted to for our sakes. (1) That the scripture might be fulfilled, which spoke of the chastisement of our peace being upon him (Isa. liii 5). He himself likewise had foretold it, Matt. xx. 19; Mark x. 34; Luke xviii. 33. (2) That by his stripes we might be healed. The physician scourged, and so the patient healed. (3) That stripes, for his sake, might be sanctified and made easy to his followers. Christ's stripes take out the sting of theirs.

2. He turned him over to his soldiers, to be ridiculed and made sport with as a fool (v. 2, 3): The soldiers put a crown of thorns upon his head; they put on him a purple robe; and they complimented him with, Hail, king of the Jews, and then smote him with their hands.

(1) See here the baseness and injustice of Pilate. Pilate did this: To oblige his soldiers' merry humour, and perhaps his own too. Herod, as well as his men of war, had just before done the same, Luke xxiii. 11. It was as good as a stage-play to them, now that it was a festival time. To oblige the Jews' malicious humour.

Vss. 1-16. JESUS BEFORE PILATE—SCOURGED—TREATED WITH OTHER SEVERITIES AND INSULTS—DELIVERED UP, AND LED AWAY TO BE CRUCIFIED. 1-3. Pilate took Jesus and scourged him—in hope of appeasing them. (See on Mark 15:15.) "And the soldiers led Him away into the palace, and they call the whole band" (Mark 15:16)—the body of the military cohort stationed there—to take part in the mock coronation now to be enacted.

2. the soldiers platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head—in mockery of a regal crown.

CHAPTER 19

1. Pilate therefore took Jesus, and scourged him. That is, caused Him to be scourged. As our Lord was scourged by order of Pilate, it is probable He was scourged in the Roman manner, which was much more severe than that of the Jews. The latter never gave more than thirty-nine blows; for the law had absolutely forbidden a man to be abused, or his flesh cut in this chastisement, Deut. xxv. 3. Though it was customary to scourge the person who was to be crucified, yet it appears that Pilate had another end in view by scourging our Lord. He hoped that this would satisfy the Jews, and that he might then dismiss Jesus. This appears from Luke xxiii. 16.

2. Platted a crown of thorns. See on Matt. xxvii. 29.

(2) See here the rudeness and insolence of the soldiers. Thus hath Christ's holy religion been basely misrepresented, dressed up by bad men at their pleasure, and so exposed to contempt and ridicule. They clothe him with a mock-robe. And as Christ is here represented as a king in conceit only, so is his religion as a concern in conceit only, and God and the soul, sin and duty, heaven and hell, are with many all chimeras. They crown him with thorns, as if to submit to the control of God and conscience were to thrust one's head into a thicket of thorns; but this is an unjust imputation; thorns and snares are in the way of the froward, but roses and laurels in religion's ways.

(3) See here the wonderful condescension of our Lord Jesus. Great and generous minds can bear anything better than ignominy, yet this the great and holy Jesus submitted to for us. See and admire, the invincible patience of a sufferer, the invincible love and kindness of a Saviour. Herein he commended his love, that he would not only die for us, but die as a fool dies. He endureth the pain; not the pangs of death only, but, as if these were too little, he submitted to those previous pains. Shall we complain of a thorn in the flesh, and of being buffeted by affliction. Christ humbled himself to bear those thorns in the head, and those buffetings, to save and teach us. He despised the shame, the shame of a fool's coat, and the mock-respect paid him, with, Hail, king of the Jews. He that bore these sham honours was recompensed with real honours, and so shall we, if we patiently suffer shame for him.

II. Pilate presents him to the prosecutors in hope that they would now be satisfied, v. 4, 5. Here he proposes two things to their consideration:

1. That he had not found anything in him which made him obnoxious to the Roman government (v. 4): I find no fault in him. If he found no fault in him, why did he bring him out to his prosecutors, and not immediately release him, as he ought to have done? Thinking to trim the matter, to please the people by scourging Christ, and save his conscience by not crucifying him, behold he does both. It is common for those who think to keep themselves from greater sins by venturing upon less sins to run into both.

2. That he had done that to him which would make him the less dangerous to them and to their government, v. 5. He brought him out to them, wearing the crown of thorns, his head and face all bloody, and said, Behold the man, treating him as a slave, and exposing him to contempt, after which he supposed the people would never look upon him with any respect. Little did Pilate think with what veneration even these sufferings of Christ would in after ages be commemorated by the best and greatest of men. Our Lord Jesus shows himself dressed up in all the marks of ignominy. He came forth, willing to be made a spectacle. Did he go forth thus bearing our reproach? Let us go forth to him bearing his reproach. Pilate saith unto them, with a design to appease them, Behold the man; not so much to move their pity, Behold a man worthy your compassion, as to silence their jealousies, Behold a man not worthy your suspicion. The word however is very affecting: Behold the man. It is good for everyone of us to behold the man Christ Jesus in his sufferings. "Behold him, and mourn because of him. Behold him, and love him; be still looking unto Jesus."

III. The prosecutors were but the more exasperated, v. 6, 7.

1. Their clamour and outrage. The chief priests cried out, and their officers joined with them in crying, Crucify him, crucify him. The common people perhaps would have acquiesced in Pilate's declaration of his innocency. Their malice against Christ was unreasonable and most absurd, in that they offer not to make good their charge against him; but, though he be innocent, he must be crucified. It was insatiable and very cruel. Neither the extremity of his scourging, nor his patience under it, could mollify them in the least. It was violent and exceedingly resolute; they will have it their own way. Were they so violent in running down our Lord Jesus, and in crying, Crucify him, crucify him? and shall not we be vigorous and zealous in crying, Crown him, Crown him? Shall not our love to him quicken our endeavours for him and his kingdom?

2. The check Pilate gave to their fury: "Take you him and crucify him." He knew they could not, they durst not, crucify him; but it is as if he should say, "You shall not make me a drudge to your malice." A good resolve, if he would but have stuck to it. He found no fault in him, and therefore should not have continued to parley with the prosecutors. Those that would be safe from sin should be deaf to temptation. Nay, he should have secured the prisoner from and they put on him a purple robe—in mockery of the imperial purple; first "stripping him" (Matt. 27:28) of His own outer garment. The robe may have been the "gorgeous" one in which Herod arrayed and sent Him back to Pilate (Luke 23:11). "And they put a reed into His right hand" (Matt. 27:29)—in mockery of the regal scepter. "And they bowed the knee before Him" (Matt. 27:29).

3. And said, Hail, King of the Jews!—doing Him derisive homage, in the form used on approaching the emperors. "And they spit upon Him, and took the reed and smote Him on the head" (Matt. 27:30). The best comment on these affecting details is to cover the face. 4, 5. Pilate . . . went forth again, and saith . . . , Behold, I bring—am bringing, i.e., going to bring—him forth to you, that ye may know I find no fault in him—and, by scourging Him and allowing the soldiers to make sport of Him, have gone as far to meet your exasperation as can be expected from a judge.

5. Then Jesus came forth, wearing the crown of thorns, and the purple robe. And Pilate saith unto them, Behold the man!—There is no reason to think that contempt dictated this speech. There was clearly a struggle in the breast of this wretched man. Not only was he reluctant to surrender to mere clamor an innocent man, but a feeling of anxiety about His mysterious claims, as is plain from what follows, was beginning to rack his breast, and the object of his exclamation seems to have been to move their pity. But, be his meaning what it may, those three words have been eagerly appropriated by all Christendom, and enshrined for ever in its heart as a sublime expression of its calm, rapt admiration of its suffering Lord.

6, 7. When the chief priests . . . saw him, they cried out—their fiendish rage kindling afresh at the sight of Him—Crucify him, crucify him—(See on Mark 15:14).

Pilate saith unto them, Take ye him, and crucify him; for I find no fault in him—as if this would relieve him of the responsibility of the deed, who, by surrendering Him, incurred it all!

ADAM CLARKE

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The cruel scourging, which, in Roman hands, was a much more severe punishment than the Jewish "beating with rods," and often ended in death, was inflicted on the silent, unresisting Christ, not because His judge thought that it was deserved, but to please accusers whose charge he knew to be absurd. The underlings naturally followed their betters' example, and after they had executed Pilate's orders to scourge, they covered the bleeding wounds with some robe, perhaps ragged, but of the royal color, and crushed the twisted wreath of thornbranch down on the brows to make fresh wounds there. The jest of crowning such a poor, helpless creature as Jesus seemed to them was exactly on the level of such rude natures, and would be the more exquisite to them because it was double-barrelled, and insulted the nation as well as the "King." They came in a string, as the tense of the original word suggests, and offered their mock reverence. But that sport became tame after a little, and mockery passed into violence, as it always does in such natures. These rough legionaries were cruel and brutal, and they were unconscious witnesses to His kingship as founded on suffering; but they were innocent as compared with the polished gentleman on the judgment seat who prostituted justice, and the learned Pharisees outside who were howling for blood.

In verses 4-8 the scene changes again to without the palace and shows us Pilate trying another expedient, equally in vain. The hesitating governor has no chance with the resolute, rooted hate of the rulers. Jesus silently and unresistingly follows Pilate from the hall, still wearing the mockery of royal pomp. Pilate had calculated that the sight of Him in such guise, and bleeding from the lash, might turn hate into contempt, and perhaps give a touch of pity. "Behold the man!" as he meant it, was as if he had said, "Is this poor, bruised, spiritless sufferer worth hate or fear? Does He look like a king or a dangerous enemy?" Pilate for once drops the scoff of calling Him their King, and seeks to conciliate and move to pity. The profound meanings which later ages have delighted to find in his words, however warrantable, are no part of their design as spoken, and we gain a better lesson from the scene by keeping close to the thoughts of the actors. What a contrast between the vacillation of the governor, on the one hand, afraid to do right and reluctant to do wrong, and the dogged malignity of the rulers and their tools on the other, and the calm, meek endurance of the silent Christ, knowing all their thoughts, pitying all, and fixed in loving resolve, even firmer than the rulers' hate, to bear the utmost that He might save a world!

Some pity may have stirred in the crowd, but the priests and their immediate dependants silenced it by their yell of fresh hate at the sight of the prisoner. Note how John gives the very impression of the fierce, brief roar, like that of wild beasts for their prey, by his "Crucify, crucify!" without addition of the person. Pilate lost patience at last, and angrily and half seriously gives permission to them to take the law into their own hands. He really means, "I will not be your tool, and if my conviction of this Man's innocence is to be of no account, you must punish Him; for I will not." How far he meant to abdicate authority, and how far he was launching sarcasms, it is difficult to say. Throughout he is sarcastic, and thereby indicates his weakness, indemnifying himself for being thwarted by sneers which sit so ill on authority.

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

their insults. But Pilate had not courage enough to act according to his conscience.

3. The further colour which the prosecutors gave to their demand (v. 7): We have a law, and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God. They made their boast of the law. They had indeed an excellent law, but in vain did they boast of their law, when they abused it to such bad purposes. They discover a restless and inveterate malice against our Lord Jesus. They urged this, that he pretended himself a God. Thus they turn every stone to take him off. They pervert the law, and make that the instrument of their malice. It was true that blasphemers were to be put to death. Whoever falsely pretended to be the Son of God was guilty of blasphemy. It was false that Christ pretended to be the Son of God, for he really was so. That which was his honour, and might have been their happiness, they impute to him as a crime, for which he ought to die; yet he ought not to be crucified, for this was no death inflicted by their law.

IV. The judge brings the prisoner again to his trial, upon this new suggestion.

1. The concern Pilate was in, when he heard this alleged (v. 8): When he heard that his prisoner pretended not to royalty only, but to deity, he was the more afraid. There was the more danger of offending the people if he should acquit him. Though he might hope to pacify their rage against a pretended king, he could never reconcile them to a pretended God. There was the more danger of offending his own conscience if he should condemn him. "Is he one" (thinks Pilate) "that makes himself the Son of God? and what if it should prove that he is so? What will become of me then?"

2. His further examination of our Lord Jesus thereupon, v. 9. He resumed the debate, went into the judgment-hall, and asked Christ, Whence art thou?

(1) The place he chose for this examination: He went into the judgment-hall for privacy, that he might be out of the noise and clamour of the crowd. Those that would find out the truth as it is in Jesus must get out of the noise of prejudice, and retire as it were into the judgment-hall, to converse with Christ alone.

(2) The question he put to him: Whence art thou? Art thou from men or from heaven? From beneath or from above?

(3) The silence of our Lord Jesus; but Jesus gave him no answer. This was not a sullen silence, in contempt of the court, nor was it because he knew not what to say. It was a patient silence. This silence loudly bespoke his submission to his Father's will in his present sufferings. He was silent, because he would say nothing to hinder his sufferings. It was a prudent silence. When the chief priests asked him, Art thou the Son of the Blessed? he answered, I am; but when Pilate asked him he knew he did not understand his own question, having no notion of the Messiah, and of his being the Son of God, and therefore to what purpose should he reply to him whose head was filled with the pagan theology?

(4) The haughty check which Pilate gave him for his silence (v. 10): "Speakest thou not unto me? Knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee?" Observe here how Pilate magnifies himself, and boasts of his own authority. Men in power are apt to be puffed up with their power, and the more absolute and arbitrary it is the more it gratifies and humours their pride. How he tramples upon our blessed Saviour: Speakest thou not unto me? He reflects upon him as if he were undutiful and disrespectful to those in authority or as if he were ungrateful to one that had been tender of him, as if he were unwise for himself. If Christ had indeed sought to save his life, now had been his time to have spoken.

(5) Christ's pertinent answer to this check, v. 11.

[1] He boldly rebukes his arrogance: "Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above." Though Christ did not think fit to answer him when he was impertinent, yet he did think fit to answer him when he was imperious. When Pilate used his power, Christ silently submitted to it; but, when he grew proud of it, he made him know himself: "All the power thou hast is given thee from above." His power in general, as a magistrate, was a limited power, and he could do no more than God would suffer him to do. Let the proud oppressors know that there is a higher than they. And let this silence the murmurings of the oppressed, let it comfort them that their persecutors can do no more than God will let them. Pilate never fancied himself to look so great as now, when he sat in judgment upon such a prisoner as this, who was looked upon by many as the Son of God and king of Israel. But Christ lets him know that he was herein but an instrument in

7. The Jews answered him, We have a law, and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God—Their criminal charges having come to nothing, they give up that point, and as Pilate was throwing the whole responsibility upon them, they retreat into their own Jewish law, by which, as claiming equality with God (see on ch. 5:18 and 8:59), He ought to die; insinuating that it was Pilate's duty, even as civil governor, to protect their law from such insult.

8-11. When Pilate . . . heard this saying, he was the more afraid—the name "SON OF GOD," the lofty sense evidently attached to it by His Jewish accusers, the dialogue he had already held with Him, and the dream of his wife (Matt. 27:19), all working together in the breast of the wretched man.

9. and went again into the judgment hall, and saith to Jesus, Whence art thou?—beyond all doubt a question relating not to His mission but to His personal origin.

Jesus gave him no answer—He had said enough; the time for answering such a question was past; the weak and wavering governor is already on the point of giving way.

10. Then saith Pilate unto him, Speakest thou not to me?—The "me" is the emphatic word in the question. He falls back upon the pride of office, which doubtless tended to blunt the workings of his conscience. knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee?—said to work upon Him at once by fear and by hope.

11. Thou couldest—rather 'shouldst'—have no power at all against me—neither to crucify nor to release, nor to do anything whatever against Me [BENGEL]. except it were—'unless it had been'—given thee from above—i.e., 'Thou thinkest too much of thy power, Pilate: against Me that power is none, save what is meted out to thee by special divine appointment, for a special end.'

7. We have a law. In Lev. xxiv. 14-16 we find that blasphemers of God were to be put to death; and the chief priests having charged Jesus with blasphemy, they therefore voted that He deserved to die. They might refer also to the law against false prophets, Deut. xviii. 20. The Son of God. It is certain that the Jews understood this in a very peculiar sense. When Christ called himself the Son of God, they understood it to imply positive equality to the Supreme Being; and, if they were wrong, our Lord never attempted to correct them.

8. He was the more afraid. While Jesus was accused only as a disturber of the peace of the nation, which accusation Pilate knew to be false, he knew he could deliver Him, because the judgment in that case belonged to himself. But when the Jews brought a charge against Him of the most capital nature, from their own laws, he then saw that he had everything to fear if he did not deliver Jesus to their will. The Sanhedrin must not be offended—the populace must not be irritated. From the former a complaint might be sent against him to Caesar; the latter might revolt, or proceed to some acts of violence, the end of which could not be foreseen. Pilate was certainly to be pitied. He saw what was right and he wished to do it, but he had not sufficient firmness of mind. Some suppose that Pilate's fear arose from hearing that Jesus had said He was the Son of God; because Pilate, who was a polytheist, believed that it was possible for the offspring of the gods to visit mortals; and he was afraid to condemn Jesus, for fear of offending some of the supreme deities. Perhaps the question in the succeeding verse refers to this.

9. Whence art thou? This certainly does not mean, From what country art Thou? for Pilate knew this well enough; but it appears he made this inquiry to know who were the parents of Christ; what were His pretensions, and whether He really were a demigod, such as the heathens believed in. To this question we find our Lord gave no answer. He had already told him that His kingdom was not of this world; and that He came to erect a spiritual Kingdom, not a temporal one, chap. xviii. 36-37. This answer He deemed sufficient; and He did not choose to satisfy a criminal curiosity, nor to enter into any debate concerning the absurdity of the heathen worship.

God's hand.

[2] He mildly excuses his sin, in comparison with the sin of the ringleaders: "Therefore he that delivered me unto thee lies under greater guilt." It is plainly intimated that what Pilate did was sin, a great sin, and that the forces which the Jews put upon him would not justify him. The guilt of others will not acquit us, nor will it avail in the great day to say that others were worse than we. Yet theirs that delivered him to Pilate was the greater sin. By this it appears that all sins are not equal, but some more heinous than others. He that delivered Christ to Pilate was either, 1. The people of the Jews, who cried out, Crucify him, crucify him. They had seen Christ's miracles, which Pilate had not, and therefore it was much worse in them to appear against him than in Pilate. 2. Or Caiaphas in particular, who first advised his death, ch. xi. 49, 50. The sin of Caiaphas was abundantly greater than the sin of Pilate. Caiaphas prosecuted Christ from pure enmity and of malice prepense. Pilate condemned him purely for fear of the people, and it was a hasty resolution which he had not time to cool upon. 3. Some think Christ means Judas. The sin of Judas was, upon many accounts, greater than the sin of Pilate. The sin of Judas was a leading sin, and let in all that followed. He was a guide to them that took Jesus.

V. Pilate struggles with the Jews to deliver Jesus out of their hands, but in vain.

1. Pilate seems more zealous than before to get Jesus discharged (v. 12): Thenceforth, though Christ found fault with him, he still continued to find no fault in Christ, but sought to release him. If Pilate's policy had not prevailed above his justice, he would not have been long seeking to release him, but would have done it.

2. The Jews were more violent to get Jesus crucified. Still they carry on their design with noise and clamour as before. They laboured to get him cried down by a multitude, and it is no hard matter to pack a mob. A few madmen may out-shout many wise men, and then fancy themselves to speak the sense (when it is but the nonsense) of a nation, but it is not so easy a thing to change the sense of the people as it is to misrepresent it. In this outcry they sought: To blacken the prisoner as an enemy to Caesar. They will have it that he speaks against Caesar. It has always been the artifice of the enemies of religion to represent it as hurtful to kings and provinces, when it would be highly beneficial to both. To frighten the judge, as no friend to Caesar: "If thou let this man go thou art not Caesar's friend." They intimate a threatening that they would inform against him, and here they touched him in a sensible and very tender part. A pretended zeal for that which is good often serves to cover a real malice against that which is better.

3. Pilate slightly endeavoured to banter them out of their fury, and yet, in doing this, yielded to the rapid stream, v. 13–15. After he had seemed now as if he would have made a vigorous resistance upon this attack (v. 12), he basely surrendered.

(1) What it was that shocked Pilate (v. 13): "When he heard that saying, that he could not be sure of Caesar's favour, if he did not put Jesus to death, then he thought it was time to look about him." Those that bind up their happiness in the favour of men make themselves an easy prey to the temptations of Satan.

(2) What preparation was made for a definitive sentence upon this matter: Pilate brought Jesus forth, and then sat down in the judgment-seat. Christ was condemned with all the ceremony that could be. Notice is here taken of the place and time. The place where Christ was condemned: in a place called the Pavement, but in Hebrew, Gabbatha, probably the place where he used to sit to try causes or criminals. The time, v. 14. It was the preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour. 1. The day: It was the preparation of the passover, that is, for the passover-sabbath. It was when they should have been purging out the old leaven, to get ready for the passover; but the better the day the worse the deed. 2. The hour: It was about the sixth hour. Some ancient Greek and Latin manuscripts read it about the third hour, which agrees with Mark xv. 25. And it appears by Matt. xxvii. 45 that he was upon the cross before the sixth hour. From the third to the sixth hour (which was, as we call it, church-time) on that day, they were employed in this wickedness; so that for this day, though they were priests, they dropped the temple-service.

(3) The rencounter Pilate had with the Jews, endeavouring in vain to stem the tide of their rage. He saith unto the Jews: "Behold your king, that is, him whom you accuse as a pretender to the crown. Is this a man likely to be dangerous to the government?" Pilate, though he was far from meaning so, seems as if he were the voice of God to them. Christ, therefore he that delivered me unto thee—Caiaphas, too wit—but he only as representing the Jewish authorities as a body. hath the greater sin—as having better opportunities and more knowledge of such matters.

And from thenceforth—particularly this speech, which seems to have filled him with awe, and redoubled his anxiety. Pilate sought to release him—i.e., to gain their consent to it, for he could have done it at once on his authority.

but the Jews cried—seeing their advantage, and not slow to profit by it. If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend . . .—"This was equivalent to a threat of impeachment, which we know was much dreaded by such officers as the procurators, especially of the character of Pilate or Felix. It also consummates the treachery and disgrace of the Jewish rulers, who were willing, for the purpose of destroying Jesus, to affect a zeal for the supremacy of a foreign prince" (See vs. 15.) [WEBSTER and WILKINSON].

When Pilate . . . heard that, . . . he brought Jesus forth, and sat down in—['upon']—the judgment seat—that he might pronounce sentence against the Prisoner, on this charge, the more solemnly—in a place called the Pavement—a tesselated pavement, much used by the Romans—in the Hebrew, Gabbatha—from its being raised. 14. It was the preparation—i.e., the day before the Jewish sabbath. and about the sixth hour—The true reading here is probably, "the third hour"—or 9 A.M.—which agrees best with the whole series of events, as well as with the other Evangelists.

he saith to the Jews, Behold your King!—Having now made up his mind to yield to them, he takes a sort of quiet revenge on them by this irony, which he knew would sting them. This only reawakens their cry to despatch Him.

ADAM CLARKE

11. Hath the greater sin. It is a sin in you to condemn Me, while you are convinced in your conscience that I am innocent; but the Jews who delivered Me to you, and Judas, who delivered Me to the Jews, have the greater crime to answer for.

12. Pilate sought to release him. Pilate made five several attempts to release our Lord, as we may learn from Luke xxiii. 4, 15, 20, 22; John xix. 4, 12-13.

Thou art not Caesar's friend. You do not act like a person who has the interest of the emperor at heart. This insinuation determined Pilate to make no longer resistance; he was afraid of being accused, and he knew Tiberius was one of the most jealous and distrustful princes in the world. During his reign accusations of conspiracies were much in fashion; they were founded on the silliest pretenses, and punished with excessive rigor.

13. The Pavement. Literally, "a stone pavement." Probably it was that place in the open court where the chair of justice was set, for the prefects of provinces always held their courts of justice in the open air, and which was paved with stones of various colors, like that of Ahasuerus, Esther i. 6, of red, blue, white, and black marble; what we still term Mosaic work, or something in imitation of it. Gabbatha. That is, "an elevated place"; from gabah, "high, raised up." It is very likely that the judgment seat was considerably elevated in the court, and that the governor went up to it by steps; and perhaps these very steps were what was called the Pavement. The place was probably called Lithostroton, or the Pavement; the seat of judgment, Gabbatha, the "raised or elevated" place.

14. It was the preparation of the passover. That is, the time in which they were just preparing to kill the paschal lamb. Critics differ widely concerning the time of our Lord's crucifixion, and this verse is variously understood. Some think it signifies merely the preparation of the Sabbath, and that it is called the preparation of the passover because the preparation of the Sabbath happened that year on the eve of the Passover. Others think that the preparation of the Sabbath is distinctly spoken of in v. 31, and was different from what is here mentioned. Contending nations may be more easily reconciled than contending critics. Behold your King! This was probably intended as an irony; and by thus turning their pretended serious apprehensions into ridicule, he hopes still to release Him.

now crowned with thorns, is, as a king at his coronation, offered to the people: "Behold your king." They cried out with the greatest indignation, Away with him, away with him. "Take him, he is none of ours; we disown him; away with him out of our sight." Had not Christ been thus rejected of men, we had been for ever rejected of God. It shows how we ought to treat our sins. We are often in scripture said to crucify sin, in conformity to Christ's death. With a pious indignation we should run down sin in us, as they with an impious indignation ran him down who was made sin for us. Pilate, willing to have Jesus released, asks them, Shall I crucify your king? To stop their mouths, by showing them how absurd it was for them to reject one who offered himself to them to be their king. Though he saw no cause to fear him, they might see cause to hope for something from him. To stop the mouth of his own conscience. "If this Jesus be a king" (thinks Pilate), "he is only king of the Jews. If they refuse him, and will have their king crucified, what is that to me?" The chief priests cried out, We have no king but Caesar. This they knew would please Pilate, and so they hoped to carry their point, though at the same time they hated Caesar and his government. What a righteous thing it was with God to bring upon them that ruin by the Romans which followed not long after. They adhere to Caesar, and to Caesar they shall go. God soon gave them enough of their Caesars. Henceforward they were rebels to the Caesars, and the Caesars tyrants to them, and their disaffection ended in the overthrow of their place and nation. It is just with God to make that a scourge and plague to us which we prefer before Christ.

Verses 16–18

We have here sentence of death passed upon our Lord Jesus, and execution done soon after. A mighty struggle Pilate had had within him; but at length his convictions yielded, and his corruptions prevailed, the fear of man having a greater power over him than the fear of God.

I. Pilate gave judgment against Christ and signed the warrant for his execution, v. 16. Pilate sinned against his conscience; he had again and again pronounced him innocent, and yet at last condemned him as guilty. He was a man of a haughty and implacable spirit. Fearing therefore that he should be complained of, he was willing to gratify the Jews. Now this makes the matter much worse. For a man that was so wilful in other things, and of so fierce a resolution, to be overcome in a thing of this nature, shows him to be a bad man indeed, that could better bear the wronging of his conscience than the crossing of his humour. He endeavoured to transfer the guilt upon the Jews. He delivered him to the prosecutors, the chief priests and elders; so excusing the wrong to his own conscience with this, that it was but a permissive condemnation, and that he did not put Christ to death, but only connived at those that did it.

II. Judgment was no sooner given than the prosecutors, having gained their point, resolved to lose no time lest Pilate should change his mind. And also lest there should be an uproar among the people. It were well if we would be thus expeditious in that which is good, and not stay for more difficulties.

1. They immediately hurried away the prisoner. The chief priests greedily flew upon the prey which they had been long waiting for. Or they, that is, the soldiers, took him and led him away. Both the priests and the soldiers joined in leading him away. By the law of Moses the prosecutors were to be the executioners. And the priests here were proud of the office. He was led forth for us, that we might escape.

2. To add to his misery, they obliged him to carry his cross (v. 17), according to the custom among the Romans. Their crosses did not stand up constantly. Everyone that was crucified had a cross of his own. Christ's carrying his cross may be considered as a part of his sufferings; he endured the cross literally. The blessed body of the Lord Jesus was tender; it had now lately been harassed and tired out; his shoulders were sore with the stripes they had given him; every jog of the cross would renew his smart, and be apt to strike the thorns he was crowned with into his head; yet all this he patiently underwent. He was made a curse for us, and therefore on him was the cross. Our Master hereby taught all his disciples to take up their cross, and follow him. Whatever cross he calls us out to bear at any time, we must remember that he bore the cross first. He bore that end of the cross that had the curse upon it; this was the heavy end; and hence all that are his are enabled to call their afflictions for him light.

3. They brought him to the place of execution: He went forth, not dragged against his will, but voluntary in his sufferings. He went forth out of the

This potion was stupefying, and given to criminals just before execution, to deaden the sense of pain.

15. Away with him. Probably this means, "Kill Him."

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

"Upon this Pilate sought to release him. The Jews cried out, saying, If thou release this man, thou art not Ceasar's friend; every one that maketh himself a king speaketh against Caesar." In that sentence the Jewish nation expressed, through its rulers, their final subjugation by Gentile power, and their rejection of their birthright inheritance. They bowed the neck to Caesar in order to murder Jesus. "When Pilate therefore heard these words, he brought Jesus out, and sat down in the judgment seat at a place called The Pavement, but in Hebrew, Gabbatha. Now it was the preparation of the Passover; it was about the sixth hour." He made one more effort to release Jesus as he said, "Behold, your King! They therefore cried out, Away with him, away with him, crucify him." And again he said, now perhaps in defeat and disappointed mockery, "Shall I crucify your King?" Then the final word of the priests, "We have no king but Caesar." "Then therefore he delivered him unto them to be crucified."
—The Gospel According to John

16. Then delivered he him. This was not till after he had washed his hands, Matt. xxvii. 24, to show by that symbolical action that he was innocent of the death of Christ. John omits this circumstance, together with the insults which Christ received from the soldiers. See Matt. xxvii. 26, etc.; Mark xv. 16, etc.

17. Bearing his cross. He bore it all alone first. When He could no longer carry the whole through weakness, occasioned by the ill usage He had received, Simon, a Cyrenian, helped Him to carry it; see the note on Matt. xxvii. 32. Golgotha. See on Matt. xxvii. 33.

city, for he was crucified without the gate, Heb. xii. 12. And, to put the greater infamy upon his sufferings, he was brought to the common place of execution, a place called Golgotha, the place of a skull. There Christ suffered, because he was made sin for us.

4. There they crucified him, and the other malefactors with him (v. 18): There they crucified him. (1) What death Christ died; the death of the cross, a bloody, painful, shameful death, a cursed death. He was lifted up as the brazen serpent. His hands were stretched out to invite and embrace us. (2) In what company he died: Two others with him. This exposed him much to the people's contempt and hatred, who are apt to judge of persons by the lump, and are not curious in distinguishing, and would conclude him not only a malefactor because he was yoked with malefactors, but the worst of the three because put in the midst. But thus the scripture was fulfilled, He was numbered among the transgressors. He died among the criminals, and mingled his blood with theirs who were sacrificed to public justice.

And now let us pause awhile, and with an eye of faith look upon Jesus. Was ever sorrow like unto his sorrow? See him bleeding, see him struggling, see him dying, see him and love him, love him and live to him, and study what we shall render.

Verses 19–30

Here are some remarkable circumstances of Christ's dying more fully related than before.

I. The title set up over his head.

1. The inscription itself which Pilate wrote, and ordered to be fixed to the top of the cross, declaring the cause for which he was crucified, v. 19. It was this, Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews. Pilate intended this for his reproach, that he, being Jesus of Nazareth, should pretend to be king of the Jews, and set up in competition with Caesar. But God overruled this matter: That it might be a further testimony to the innocence of our Lord Jesus; for here was an accusation which, as it was worded, contained no crime. That it might show forth his dignity and honour. This is Jesus a Saviour, dying for the good of his people, as Caiaphas had foretold.

2. The notice taken of this inscription (v. 20): Many of the Jews read it, not only those of Jerusalem, but those from other countries, that came up to worship at the feast. Multitudes read it, and it occasioned a great variety of reflections and speculations. Christ himself was set for a sign, a title. The title was so much read: Because the place where Jesus was crucified, though without the gate, was yet nigh the city. It is an advantage to have the means of knowing Christ brought to our doors. Because it was written in Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin; they all understood one or other of these languages. Everyone would be curious to enquire what it was which was so industriously published in the three most-known languages. In each of these Christ is proclaimed king. It was intimated thereby that Jesus Christ should be a Saviour to all nations, and not to the Jews only; and also that every nation should hear in their own tongue the wonderful works of the Redeemer. It teaches us that the knowledge of Christ ought to be diffused throughout every nation in their own tongue, that people may converse as freely with the scriptures as they do with their neighbours.

3. The offence which the prosecutors took at it, v. 21. They would not have it written, the king of the Jews; but that he said I am the king of the Jews. Here they show themselves: Very spiteful and malicious against Christ. To justify themselves they thought themselves concerned to represent him as a usurper of honours and powers that he was not entitled to. Foolishly jealous of the honour of their nation. They scorned to have it said that this was their king. Very impertinent and troublesome to Pilate. They could not but be sensible that they had forced him, against his mind, to condemn Christ. Though they had charged him with pretending to be the king of the Jews, yet they had not proved it

4. The judge's resolution to adhere to it: "What I have written I have written."

1. Hereby an affront was put upon the chief priests. By this inscription he insinuates: That, notwithstanding their pretences, they were not sincere in their affections to Caesar and his government. That such a king as this, so mean and despicable, was good enough to be the king of the Jews. That they had been very unjust in prosecuting this Jesus, when there was no fault to be found in him.

2. Hereby honour was done to the Lord Jesus. Pilate stuck to it with resolution, that he was the king of the Jews. When the Jews reject Christ Pilate, a Gentile, sticks to it that he is a king, which was an earnest of what came to pass soon after, when the Gentiles submitted to the kingdom of the Messiah.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

18. they crucified him, and two others with him—"malefactors" (Luke 23:33), "thieves" (rather "robbers," Matt. 27:38; Mark 15:27). on either side one and Jesus in the midst—a hellish expedient, to hold Him up as the worst of the three. But in this, as in many other of their doings, "the scripture was fulfilled, which saith (Isa. 53:12), And he was numbered with the transgressors"—(Mark 15:28)—though the prediction reaches deeper. "Then said Jesus"—['probably while being nailed to the CROSS'] [OLSHAUSEN], "FATHER, FORGIVE THEM, FOR THEY KNOW NOT WHAT THEY DO" (Luke 23:34)—and again the Scripture was fulfilled which said, "And He made intercession for the transgressors" (Isa. 53:12), though this also reaches deeper. (See Acts 3:17; 13:27; and cf. I Tim. 1:13). Often have we occasion to observe how our Lord is the first to fulfil His own precepts—thus furnishing the right interpretation and the perfect Model of them. (See on Matt. 5:44.) How quickly was it seen in "His martyr Stephen," that though He had left the earth in Person, His Spirit remained behind, and Himself could, in some of His brightest lineaments, be reproduced in His disciples! (Acts 7:60.) And what does the world in every age owe to these few words, spoken where and as they were spoken!

19-22. Pilate wrote a title, and put it on the cross ... Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews ... and it was written in Hebrew—or Syro-Chaldaic, the language of the country—and Greek—the current language—and Latin—the official language. These were the chief languages of the earth, and this secured that all spectators should be able to read it. Stung by this, the Jewish ecclesiastics entreat that it may be so altered as to express, not His real dignity, but His false claim to it. But Pilate thought he had yielded quite enough to them; and having intended expressly to spite and insult them by this title, for having got him to act against his own sense of justice, he peremptorily refused them. And thus, amidst the conflicting passions of men, was proclaimed, in the chief tongues of mankind, from the Cross itself and in circumstances which threw upon it a lurid yet grand light, the truth which drew the Magi to His manger, and will yet be owned by all the world!

ADAM CLARKE

18. Two other. Matthew and Mark in the parallel places calls them robbers or murderers; they probably belonged to the gang of Barabbas.

19. Pilate wrote a title. See on Matt. xxvii. 37.

20. Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin. See on Luke xxiii. 38.

22. What I have written I have written. That is, I will not alter what I have written. The Roman laws forbad the sentence to be altered when once pronounced; and as this inscription was considered as the sentence pronounced against our Lord, therefore it could not be changed. But this form of speech is common in the Jewish writings, and means simply, What is done shall continue. Pilate seems to speak prophetically. This is the King of the Jews; they shall have no other Messiah forever.

MATTHEW HENRY

II. The dividing of his garments among the executioners, v. 23, 24. Four soldiers were employed, who, when they had crucified Jesus, had nailed him to the cross, and lifted it up, and him upon it, and nothing more was to be done than to wait his expiring, went to make a dividend of his clothes. And so they made four parts, as nearly of the same value as they could, to every soldier a part; but his coat, without seam, woven from the top throughout, they cast lots for it. 1. The shame they put upon our Lord Jesus. The shame of nakedness came in with sin. He therefore who was made sin for us bore that shame. 2. The wages with which these soldiers paid themselves for crucifying Christ. They were willing to do it for his old clothes. Nothing is to be done so bad, but there will be found men bad enough to do it for a trifle. 3. The sport they made about his seamless coat. We read not of anything about him valuable or remarkable but this. Tradition says, his mother wove it for him, and adds this further, that it was made for him when he was a child. But this is a groundless fancy. The soldiers thought it a pity to rend it for then it would unravel; they would therefore cast lots for it. While Christ was in his dying agonies, they were merrily dividing his spoils. The preserving of Christ's seamless coat is commonly alluded to to show the care all Christians ought to take that they rend not the church of Christ with strifes and divisions. 4. The fulfilling of the scripture in this. David, in spirit, foretold this very circumstance of Christ's sufferings, in that passage, Ps. xxii. 18. These things therefore the soldiers did.

III. The care that he took of his poor mother.

1. His mother attends him to his death (v. 25): There stood by the cross his mother, and some of his relations and friends with her. At first, they stood near, as it is said here; but afterwards, it is probable, the soldiers forced them to stand afar off, as it is said in Matthew and Mark. See here the tender affection of these pious women. When all his disciples, except John, had forsaken him, they continued their attendance on him. They were not deterred by the fury of the enemy nor the horror of the sight; they could not rescue him nor relieve him, yet they attended him. We may easily suppose what an affliction it was to these poor women to see him thus abused, especially to the blessed virgin. Now was fulfilled Simeon's word, A sword shall pierce through thy own soul, Luke ii. 35. His torments were her tortures, and her heart bled with his wounds. We may justly admire the power of divine grace in supporting these women, especially the virgin Mary. We do not find his mother wringing her hands or making an outcry; but standing by the cross, and her friends with her. Surely she and they were strengthened by a divine power to this degree of patience. We know not what we can bear till we are tried, and then we know who has said, My grace is sufficient for thee.

2. He tenderly provides for his mother. It is probable that Joseph was long since dead, and that her son Jesus had supported her, and now that he was dying what would become of her? He saw her standing by, and he saw John standing not far off, and so he settled a new relation between his beloved mother and his beloved disciple: "Woman, behold thy son," and to him, "Behold thy mother." And so from that hour that disciple took her to his own home.

(1) The care Christ took of his dear mother. He was not so much taken up with a sense of his sufferings as to forget his friends. He had no other way to provide for his mother than by his interest in a friend, which he does here. He calls her woman, not mother, because mother would have been a cutting word to her that was already wounded to the heart with grief. He directs her to look upon John as her son. An instance of divine goodness. Sometimes, when God removes one comfort from us, he raises up another for us, perhaps where we looked not for it. Let none therefore reckon all gone with one cistern dried up, for from the same fountain another may be filled. An instance of filial duty. Christ has here taught children to provide for the comfort of their aged parents. Children at their death, according to their ability, should provide for their parents, if they survive them, and need their kindness.

(2) The confidence he reposed in the beloved disciple. It is to him he says, Behold thy mother. This was an honour put upon John, and a testimony both to his prudence and to his fidelity. It is a great honour to be employed for Christ, and to be entrusted with any of his interest in the world. It would be a care and some charge to John; but he cheerfully accepted it, and took her to his own home. Those that truly love Christ, and are beloved of him, will be glad of an opportunity to do any service to him or his.

23, 24. Then the soldiers, when they had crucified Jesus, took his garments, and made four parts; to every soldier—the four who nailed Him to the cross, and whose perquisite they were. a part, and also his coat—the Roman tunic, or close-fitting vest. without seam, woven from the top throughout—"perhaps denoting considerable skill and labor as necessary to produce such a garment, the work probably of one or more of the women who ministered in such things unto Him, Luke 8:3" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. 24. Let us not rend it, but cast lots . . ., whose it shall be, that the scripture might be fulfilled which saith, They parted my raiment among them; and for my vesture they did cast lots . . . (Psalm 22:18). That a prediction so exceedingly specific—distinguishing one piece of dress from others, and announcing that while those should be parted amongst several, that should be given by lot to one person—that such a prediction should not only be fulfilled to the letter, but by a party of heathen military, without interference from either the friends of the enemies of the Crucified One, is surely worthy to be ranked among the wonders of this all-wonderful scene.

25-27. Now there stood by the cross of Jesus his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary, wife of Cleophas—This should be read, as in margin, "Clopas," the same as "Alpheus" (Matt. 10:3). The "Cleopas" of Luke 24:18 was a different person. 26. When Jesus . . . saw his mother, and the disciple whom he loved, standing by, he saith to his mother, WOMAN, BEHOLD THY SON! 27. Then saith he to the disciple, BEHOLD THY MOTHER! —What forgetfulness of self, what filial love, and to the "mother" and "son" what parting words! from that hour . . . took her to his own home—or, home with him; for his father Zebedee and his mother Salome were both alive, and the latter here present (Mark 15:40). See on Matthew 13:55. Now occurred the supernatural darkness, recorded by all the other Evangelists, but not here. "Now from the sixth hour (12, noon) there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour" (Matt. 27: 45). No ordinary eclipse of the sun could have occurred at this time, it being then full moon, and this obscuration lasted about twelve times the length of any ordinary eclipse. (Cf. Exod. 10:21, 23). Beyond doubt, the divine intention of the portent was to invest this darkest of all tragedies with a gloom expressive of its real character. "And about the ninth hour Jesus cried, ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACTHANI . . . My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" (Matt. 27:46). As the darkness commenced at the sixth hour, the second of the Jewish hours of prayer, so it continued till the ninth hour, the hour of the evening sacrifice, increasing probably in depth, and reaching its deepest gloom at the moment of this mysterious cry, when the flame of the one great "Evening Sacrifice" was burning fiercest. The words were made to His hand. They are the opening words of a Psalm (the 22d) full of the last "sufferings of Christ and the following glories" (I Pet. 1:11). "FATHER," was the cry in the first prayer which He uttered on the cross, for matters had not then come to the worst. "Father" was the cry of His last prayer, for matters had then passed their worst. But at this crisis of His sufferings, "Father" does not issue from His lips, for the light of a Father's countenance was then mysteriously eclipsed. He falls back, however, on a title expressive of His official relation, which, though lower and more distant in itself, yet when grasped in pure and naked faith was mighty in its claims, and rich in psalmodic associations. And what deep earnestness is conveyed by the redoubling of this title! But as for the cry itself, it will never be fully comprehended. An absolute desertion is not indeed to be thought of; but a total eclipse of the felt sense of God's presence it certainly expresses. It expresses surprise, as under the experience of something not only never before known, but inexplicable on the footing which had till then subsisted between Him and God. It is a question which the lost cannot utter. They are forsaken, but they know why. Jesus is forsaken, but does not know and demands to know why. It is thus the cry of conscious innocence, but of innocence unavailing to draw down, at that moment, the least token of approval from the unseen Judge—innocence whose only recognition at that moment lay in the thick surrounding gloom which but reflected the horror of great darkness that invested His own spirit. There was indeed a cause for it, and He knew it too—the "why" must not be pressed so far as to exclude this. He must taste this bitterest of the wages of sin "who did no sin."

ADAM CLARKE

23. To every soldier a part. So it appears there were four soldiers employed in nailing Him to and rearing up the Cross. Our Lord was now in the grand office of High Priest, and was about to offer the expiatory Victim for the sin of the world. And it is worthy of remark that the very dress He was in was similar to that of the Jewish high priest. The following is the description given of his dress by Josephus: "Now this coat (chiton) was not composed of two pieces, nor was it sewed together upon the shoulders and sides, but it was one long vestment, so woven as to have an opening for the neck; not an oblique one, but parted all along the back and breast: it was also parted where the hands were to come out."

24. That the scripture might be fulfilled. The words are taken from Ps. xxii. 18, where it appears they were spoken prophetically of this treatment which Jesus received, upwards of a thousand years before it took place! But it should be remarked that this form of speech, which frequently occurs, often means no more than that the thing so fell out that such a portion of Scripture may be exactly applied to it.

25. Mary the wife of Cleophas. She is said, in Matt. xxvii. 56 and Mark xv. 40, to have been the mother of James the Less and of Joses; and this James, her son, is said, in Matt. x. 3, to have been the son of Alphaeus; hence it seems that Alphaeus and Cleophas were the same person. To which may be added that Hegesippus is quoted by Eusebius as saying that Cleophas was the brother of Joseph, the husband of the Virgin. In many cases it is very difficult to distinguish the different Marys mentioned by the Evangelists.

26. The disciple . . . whom he loved. John, the writer of this Gospel. Woman, behold thy son! This is a remarkable expression, and has been much misunderstood. It conveys no idea of disrespect, nor of unconcern, as has been commonly supposed. "Man" and "woman" were titles of as much respect among the Hebrews as "sir" and "madam" are among us. But why did not Jesus call her "Mother"? Probably because He wished to spare her feelings; He would not mention a name the very sound of which must have wrung her heart with additional sorrow. On this account He said, Behold thy son! This was the language of pure natural affection. It is probable that it was because the keeping of the blessed Virgin was entrusted to him that he was the only disciple of our Lord who died a natural death, God having preserved him for the sake of the person whom He gave him in charge. It is very likely that Joseph was dead previously to this, and that this was the reason why the desolate Virgin is committed to the care of the beloved disciple.

MATTHEW HENRY

IV. The fulfilling of the scripture, in the giving of him vinegar to drink, v. 28, 29.

1. How much respect Christ showed to the scripture (v. 28): Knowing that all things were accomplished, that the scripture might be fulfilled, he saith, I thirst.

(1) It was not at all strange that he was thirsty. Well might he thirst after all the toil and hurry which he had undergone, and being now in the agonies of death, ready to expire purely by the loss of blood and extremity of pain.

(2) But the reason of his complaining of it is somewhat surprising; it is the only word he spoke that looked like complaint of his outward sufferings. He cried, I thirst. He would thus express the travail of his soul. He thirsted after the accomplishment of the work of our redemption. He would thus take care to see the scripture fulfilled. Hitherto, all had been accomplished, and he knew it. The scripture had foretold his thirst, and therefore he himself related it, because it could not otherwise be known, saying, I thirst. The scripture had foretold that in his thirst he should have vinegar given him to drink, Ps. lxix. 21.

2. See how little respect his persecutors showed to him (v. 29): There was set a vessel full of vinegar, probably according to the custom at all executions of this nature; with this they filled a sponge, and they put it upon hyssop, a hyssop-stalk, and with this heaved it to his mouth. A drop of water would have cooled his tongue better than a draught of vinegar. When heaven denied him a beam of light earth denied him a drop of water, and put vinegar in the room of it.

V. The dying word wherewith he breathed out his soul (v. 30): When he had received the vinegar he said, It is finished; and, with that, bowed his head, and gave up the ghost.

1. What he said, and we may suppose him to say it with triumph and exultation—It is finished. (1) It is finished, that is, the malice and enmity of his persecutors had now done their worst. (2) It is finished, that is, the counsel and commandment of his Father concerning his sufferings were now fulfilled. He had said, when he entered upon his sufferings, Father, thy will be done; and now he saith with pleasure, It is done. (3) It is finished, that is, all the types and prophecies of the Old Testament, which pointed at the sufferings of the Messiah, were accomplished and answered. (4) It is finished, that is, the ceremonial law is abolished. The substance is now come, and all the shadows are done away. (5) It is finished, that is, sin is finished, and an end made of transgression. The Lamb of God was sacrificed to take away the sin of the world, and it is done. (6) It is finished, that is, his sufferings were now finished. The storm is over, the worst is past, and he is just entering upon the joy set before him. Let all that suffer for Christ, and with Christ, comfort themselves with this, that yet a little while and they also shall say, It is finished. (7) It is finished, that is, his life was now finished, he was just ready to breathe his last. This we must all come to shortly. (8) It is finished, that is, the work of man's redemption and salvation is now completed, a fatal blow given to the power of Satan, a fountain of grace opened that shall ever flow. He that has begun a good work will perform it; the mystery of God shall be finished.

2. What he did: He bowed his head, and gave up the ghost. He gave up the ghost. His life was not forcibly extorted from him, but freely resigned. He had said, Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit, and, accordingly, he did give up his spirit, paid down the price of pardon and life at his Father's hands. He bowed his head. Those that were crucified, in dying stretched up their heads to gasp for breath, and did not drop their heads till they had breathed their last; but Christ bowed his head first, composing himself, as it were, to fall asleep.

This passage concerning the piercing of Christ's side after his death is recorded only by this evangelist.

I. Observe the superstition of the Jews, which occasioned it (v. 31): Because it was the preparation for the sabbath, and that sabbath day was a high day, they would not have the dead bodies to remain on the crosses on the sabbath-day, but besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that then they might be buried out of sight. 1. The esteem they would be thought to have for the approaching sabbath. Every sabbath day is a holy day, and a good day, but this was a high day, a great day. Sacrament-days, supper-days, communion-days are high days, and there ought to be more than ordinary preparation for them. 2. The reproach which they reckoned it would be to that day if the dead bodies should be left hanging on the crosses. Dead bodies were not to be left at any time. Many strangers from all parts

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

28-30. After this, Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished—i.e., the moment for the fulfilment of the last of them; for there was one other small particular, and the time was come for that too, in consequence of the burning thirst which the fevered state of His frame occasioned (Ps. 22:15). that the scripture—Ps. 69:21—might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst.

Now there was set a vessel full of vinegar—see on the offer of the soldiers vinegar, above—and they—"one of them," (Matt. 27:48). 29. filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon—a stalk of—hyssop, and put it to his mouth—Though a stalk of this plant does not exceed eigtheen inches in length, it would suffice, as the feet of crucified persons were not raised high. "The rest said, Let be"—[i.e., as would seem, 'Stop that officious service'] "let us see whether Elias will come to save Him" (Matt. 27:49). This was the last cruelty He was to suffer, but it was one of the most unfeeling. "And when Jesus had cried with a loud voice" (Luke 23:46). This "loud voice," noticed by three of the Evangelists, does not imply, as some able interpreters contend, that our Lord's strength was so far from being exhausted that He needed not to die then, and surrendered up His life sooner than Nature required, merely because it was the appointed time. It was indeed the appointed time, but time that He should be "crucified through weakness" (I Cor. 13:4), and Nature was now reaching its utmost exhaustion. But just as even His own dying saints, particularly the martyrs of Jesus, have sometimes had such gleams of coming glory immediately before breathing their last, as to impart to them a strength to utter their feelings which has amazed the bystanders, so this mighty voice of the expiring Redeemer was nothing else but the exultant spirit of the Dying Victor, receiving the fruit of His travail just about to be embraced, and nerving the organs of utterance to an ecstatic expression of its sublime feelings (not so much in the immediately following words of tranquil surrender, in Luke, as in the final shout, recorded only by John): "FATHER, INTO THY HANDS I COMMEND MY SPIRIT!" (Luke 23:46). Yes, the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth. His soul has emerged from its mysterious horrors; "My God" is heard no more, but in unclouded light He yields sublime into His Father's hands the infinitely precious spirit—using here also the words of those matchless Psalms (31:5) which were ever on His lips. "As the Father receives the spirit of Jesus, so Jesus receives those of the faithful" (Acts 7:59) [BENGEL]. And now comes the expiring mighty shout—30. It is finished! and he bowed his head and gave up the ghost. What is finished? The Law is fulfilled as never before, nor since, in His "obedience unto death, even the death of the cross"; Messianic prophecy is accomplished; Redemption is completed; "He hath finished the transgression, and made reconciliation for iniquity, and brought in everlasting righteousness, and sealed up the vision and prophecy, and anointed a holy of holies"; He has inaugurated the kingdom of God and given birth to a new world.

31-42. BURIAL OF CHRIST. 31-37. the preparation—sabbath eve. that the bodies should not remain—over night, against the Mosaic law (Deut. 21:22, 23). on the sabbath day, for that sabbath day was an high—or 'great'—day—the first day of unleavened bread, and, as concurring with an ordinary sabbath, the most solemn season of the ecclesiastical year. Hence their peculiar jealousy lest the law should be infringed.

ADAM CLARKE

28. I thirst. The scripture that referred to His drinking the vinegar is Ps. lxix. 21. The fatigue which He had undergone, the grief He had felt, the heat of the day, and the loss of blood were the natural causes of this thirst.

29. A vessel full of vinegar. This was probably that tart small wine which we are assured was the common drink of the Roman soldiers. Our word vinegar comes from the French vin aigre, sour or "tart wine." This vinegar must not be confounded with the "vinegar and gall" mentioned in Matt. xxvii. 34 and Mark xv. 23. That, being a stupefying potion, intended to alleviate His pain, He refused to drink; but of this He took a little, and then expired, v. 30. And put it upon hyssop. Or, according to others, "putting hyssop about it."

30. It is finished. As if He had said: "I have executed the great designs of the Almighty—I have satisfied the demands of His justice—I have accomplished all that was written in the prophets, and suffered the utmost malice of My enemies; and now the way to the holy of holies is made manifest through My blood." An awful, yet a glorious finish!

31. It was the preparation. Every Sabbath had a preparation which began at the ninth hour (that is, three o'clock) the preceding evening. Josephus, Ant., b. xvi, c. 6, s. 2, recites an edict of the Emperor Augustus in favor of the Jews, which orders "that no one shall be obliged to give bail or surety on the Sabbath day, nor on the preparation before it, after the ninth hour." The time fixed here was undoubtedly in conformity to the Jewish custom, as they began their preparation at three o'clock on the Friday evening. That the bodies should not remain. For the law, Deut. xxi. 22-23, ordered that the bodies of criminals should not hang all night; and they did not wish to have the Sabbath profaned by either taking them down on that day or letting them hang to disturb the joy of that holy time. For that sabbath day was an high day. (1) Because it was the Sabbath. (2) Because it was the day on which all the people presented themselves in the Temple according to the command, Exod. xxiii. 17. (3) Because that was the day on which the sheaf of the firstfruits was offered, according to the command, Lev. xxiii. 10-11. So that upon this day there happened to be three solemnities in one. It might be properly called a high day because the Passover fell on that Sabbath.

being then at Jerusalem, it would have been an offence to them; nor could they well bear the sight of Christ's crucified body. 3. Their petition to Pilate, that their bodies, now as good as dead, might be despatched by the breaking of their legs, which would carry them off in the most exquisite pain. The pretended sanctity of hypocrites is abominable. They made no conscience of bringing an innocent and excellent person to the cross, and yet scrupled letting a dead body hang upon the cross.

II. The despatching of the two thieves that were crucified with him, v. 32. Pilate gave orders as they desired; and the soldiers came and broke the legs of the two thieves. One of these thieves was a penitent, and had received from Christ an assurance that he should shortly be with him in paradise, and yet died in the same pain and misery that the other thief did. The extremity of dying agonies is no obstruction to the living comforts that wait for holy souls on the other side death.

III. The trial that was made whether Christ was dead or no.

1. They supposed him to be dead, and therefore did not break his legs, v. 33. Jesus died in less time than persons crucified ordinarily did. It was to show that he laid down his life of himself. He yielded to death, yet he was not conquered. His enemies were satisfied he was really dead.

2. Because they would be sure he was dead they would put it past dispute. One of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side and forthwith came thereout blood and water, v. 34.

(1) The soldier hereby designed to decide the question whether he was dead or no, and by this honourable wound in his side to supersede the ignominious method of despatch they took with the other two. Tradition says that this soldier's name was Longinus.

(2) But God had a further design herein. To give an evidence of the truth of his death, in order to the proof of his resurrection. He was certainly dead, for this spear broke up the very fountains of life. To give an illustration of the design of his death. There was much of mystery in it, and its being so solemnly attested (v. 35) intimates there was something miraculous in it. It was very significant; this same apostle refers to it as a very considerable thing, 1 John v. 6, 8. The opening of his side was significant. When we would protest our sincerity, we wish there were a window in our hearts, that the thoughts and intents of them might be visible to all. Through this window, opened in Christ's side, you may look into his heart, and see love flaming there, love strong as death. The blood and water that flowed out of it were significant. They signified the two great benefits which all believers partake of through Christ —blood for atonement, water for purification. Guilt contracted must be expiated by blood; stains contracted must be done away by the water of purification. These two must always go together. Christ has joined them together, and we must not think to put them asunder. They both flowed from the pierced side of our Redeemer. They signified the two great ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper. It is not the water in the font that will be to us the washing of regeneration, but the water out of the side of Christ; not the blood of the grape that will refresh the soul, but the blood out of the side of Christ.

IV. The attestation of the truth of this by an eye-witness (v. 35), the evangelist himself.

1. What a competent witness he was of the matters of fact. What he bore record of he saw; he was an eye-witness of it. What he saw he faithfully bore record of; he told not only the truth, but the whole truth. His record is undoubtedly true, for he wrote from the dictates of the Spirit of truth. He had himself a full assurance of the truth of what he wrote: He knows that he saith true. He therefore witnessed these things, that we might believe; to draw men to believe the gospel in order to their eternal welfare.

2. What care he showed in this particular instance. Let this silence the fears of weak Christians, and encourage their hopes. There came both water and blood out of Christ's pierced side, both to justify and sanctify them; and if you ask, How can we be sure of this? you may be sure, for he that saw it bore record.

V. The accomplishment of the scripture in all this (v. 36): That the scripture might be fulfilled.

1. The scripture was fulfilled in the preserving of his legs from being broken; therein that word was fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken. There was a promise of this made indeed to all the righteous, but principally pointing at Jesus Christ the righteous (Ps. xxxiv. 20). There was a type of this in the paschal lamb (Num. ix. 12): You shall not break besought Pilate that their legs might be broken—to hasten their death, which was done in such cases with clubs.

33. But when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already—there being in His case elements of suffering, unknown to the malefactors, which might naturally hasten His death, lingering though it always was in such cases, not to speak of His previous sufferings. they brake not his legs—a fact of vast importance, as showing that the reality of His death was visible to those whose business it was to see to it. The other divine purpose served by it will appear presently. 34. But one of the soldiers—to make assurance of the fact doubly sure—with a spear pierced his side—making a wound deep and wide, as indeed is plain from ch. 20:27, 29. Had life still remained, it must have fled now—and forthwith came thereout blood and water—"It is now well known that the effect of long-continued and intense agony is frequently to produce a secretion of a colorless lymph within the pericardium (the membrane enveloping the heart), amounting in many cases to a very considerable quantity" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON].

35. And he that saw it bare record—hath borne witness—and his witness is true, and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye might believe—This solemn way of referring to his own testimony in this matter has no reference to what he says in his Epistle about Christ's "coming by water and blood" (see on I John 5:6), but is intended to call attention both to the fulfilment of Scripture in these particulars, and to the undeniable evidence he was thus furnishing of the reality of Christ's death, and consequently of His resurrection; perhaps also to meet the growing tendency, in the Asiatic churches, to deny the reality of our Lord's body, or that "Jesus Christ is come in the flesh" (I John 4:1-3). 36. that the scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken—The reference is to the paschal lamb, as to which this ordinance was stringent (Exod. 12:46; Num. 9: 12. Cf. I Cor. 5:7). But though we are to see here the fulfilment of a very definite typical ordinance, we shall, on searching deeper, see in it a remarkable divine interposition to protect the sacred body of Christ from the last indignity after He had finished the work given Him to do. Every imaginable indignity had been permitted before that, up to the moment of His death. But no sooner is that over than an Unseen hand is found to have provided against the clubs of the rude soldiers coming in contact with that temple of the Godhead. Very different from such violence was that spear-thrust, for which not only doubting Thomas would thank the soldier, but intelligent believers in every age, to whom the certainty of their Lord's death and resurrection is the life of their whole Christianity.

ADAM CLARKE

Their legs might be broken. Lactantius says that it was a common custom to break the legs or other bones of criminals upon the cross; and this appears to have been a kind of coup de grace, the sooner to put them out of pain.

34. With a spear pierced his side. The soldier who pierced our Lord's side has been called by the Roman Catholic writers Longinus, which seems to be a corruption of lonche, a spear or "dart." They moreover tell us that this man was converted—that it was he who said, "Truly this was the Son of God"—that he travelled into Cappadocia, and there preached the gospel of Christ, and received the crown of martyrdom. But this deserves the same credit as the other legends of the Popish church.

Blood and water. It may be naturally supposed that the spear went through the pericardium and pierced the heart; that the water proceeded from the former, and the blood from the latter. Ambrose, Augustine, and Chrysostom make the blood an emblem of the Eucharist, and the water an emblem of baptism. Others represent them as the emblem of the old and new covenants. Protestants have thought them the emblems of justification, which is through the blood of the Lamb, and sanctification, which is through the washing of regeneration; and it is in reference to the first notion that they mingle the wine with water in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. The issuing of the blood and water appears to be only a natural effect of the above cause, and probably nothing mystical or spiritual was intended by it. However it affords the fullest proof that Jesus died for our sins.

35. He that saw it. Most probably John himself, who must have been pretty near the Cross to have been able to distinguish between the blood and the water as they issued from the side of our blessed Lord. And he knoweth. This appears to be an appeal to the Lord Jesus for the truth of the testimony which he had now delivered. But why such a solemn appeal unless there was something miraculous in this matter? It might appear to him necessary: (1) because the other Evangelists had not noticed it; (2) because it contained the most decisive proof of the death of Christ, as a wound such as this was could not have been inflicted (though other causes had been wanting) without occasioning the death of the person, and on His dying for men depended the salvation of the world; and (3) because two important prophecies were fulfilled by this very circumstance, both of which designated more particularly the person of the Messiah. "A bone of him shall not be broken," Exod. xii. 46; Num. ix. 12; Ps. xxxiv. 20. "They shall look upon me whom they have pierced," Zech. xii. 10; Ps. xxii. 16.

any bone of it. He is the Lamb of God (ch. i. 29), and, as the true passover, his bones were kept unbroken. There was a significancy in it; the strength of the body is in the bones. The Hebrew word for the bones signifies the strength. Though he be crucified in weakness his strength to save is not at all broken. Sin breaks our bones but it did not break Christ's bones; he stood firm under the burden, mighty to save.

2. The scripture was fulfilled in the piercing of his side (v. 27): They shall look on me whom they had pierced; so it is written, Zech. xii. 10. It is here implied that the Messiah shall be pierced; and here it had a more full accomplishment than in the piercing of his hands and feet. It is promised that when the Spirit is poured out they shall look on him and mourn. This was in part fulfilled when many of those that were his betrayers and murderers were pricked to the heart, and brought to believe in him. We have all been guilty of piercing the Lord Jesus, and are all concerned with suitable affections to look on him.

We have here an account of the burial of the blessed body of our Lord Jesus. Come and see a burial that conquered the grave, and buried it, a burial that beautified the grave and softened it for all believers.

I. The body begged, v. 38. This was done by Joseph of Arimathea, of whom no mention is made in all the New Testament story, but only in the narrative which each of the evangelists gives us of Christ's burial. 1. The character of this Joseph. He was a disciple of Christ in secret, a better friend to Christ than he would willingly be known to be. It was his honour that he was a disciple of Christ; and some such there are, that are themselves great men, and unavoidably linked with bad men. But it was his weakness that he was so secretly. Christ may have many that are his disciples sincerely, though secretly; better secretly than not at all, especially, if like Joseph, here, they grow stronger and stronger. Some who in less trials have been timorous, yet in greater have been very courageous; so Joseph here. To Pilate the governor he went boldly, and yet feared the Jews. The impotent malice of those that can but censure, and revile, is sometimes more formidable even to wise and good men than one would think. 2. The part he bore in this affair. He, having access to Pilate, desired leave of him to dispose of the body. His disciples were gone; if nobody appeared, the Jews or soldiers would bury him with the thieves. When God has work to do he can find out such as are proper to do it, and embolden them for it. Observe it as an instance of the humiliation of Christ, that his dead body lay at the mercy of a heathen judge, and must be begged before it could be buried.

II. The embalming prepared, v. 39. This was done by Nicodemus, another person of quality, and in a public post. He brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes. 1. The character of Nicodemus, which is much the same with that of Joseph; he was a secret friend to Christ. He at first came to Jesus by night, but now owned him publicly, as before, ch. vii. 50, 51. That grace which at first is like a bruised reed may afterwards become like a strong cedar. It is a wonder that Joseph and Nicodemus, men of such interest, did not appear sooner, and solicit Pilate not to condemn Christ. Begging his life would have been a nobler piece of service than begging his body. 2. The kindness of Nicodemus. Joseph served Christ with his interest, Nicodemus with his purse. Probably they agreed it between them, because they were straightened in time. But why did they make this ado about Christ's dead body? Some think we may see in it the weakness of their faith. What need of such furniture of the grave for one that, like a way-faring man, did but turn aside into it, to tarry for a night or two? However, we may plainly see in it the strength of their love. Hereby they showed the value they had for his person and doctrine, and that it was not lessened by the reproach of the cross. They showed not only the charitable respect of committing his body to the earth, but the honourable respect shown to great men. This they might do, and yet believe and look for his resurrection. Since God designed honour for this body, they would put honour upon it.

III. The body got ready, v. 40. They took it, and, having washed it from blood and dust, wound it in linen clothes, with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury. Here was care taken of Christ's body: It was wound in linen clothes. Among clothing that belongs to us, Christ put on even the grave-clothes, to make them easy to us, and to enable us to call them our wedding-clothes. Dead bodies

37. And again another scripture saith, They shall look on him whom they pierced—The quotation is from Zechariah 12:10; not taken as usual from the Septuagint (the current Greek version), which here is all wrong, but direct from the Hebrew. And there is a remarkable nicety in the choice of the words employed both by the prophet and the Evangelist for "piercing." The word in Zechariah means to thrust through with spear, javelin, sword, or any such weapon. In that sense it is used in all the ten places, besides this, where it is found. How suitable this was to express the action of the Roman soldier, is manifest; and our Evangelist uses the exactly corresponding word, which the Septuagint certainly does not. Very different is the other word for "pierce" in Psalm 22:16, "They pierced my hands and my feet." The word there used is one signifying to bore as with an awl or hammer. How striking are these small niceties! 38-40. Joseph of Arimathea—"a rich man" (Matt. 27:57), thus fulfilling Isaiah 53:9; "an honorable counsellor," a member of the Sanhedrim, and of good condition, "which also waited for the kingdom of God" (Mark 15:43), a devout expectant of Messiah's kingdom; "a good man and a just, the same had not consented to the counsel and deed of them" (Luke 23:50, 51—he had gone the length, perhaps, of dissenting and protesting in open council against the condemnation of our Lord); "who also himself was Jesus' disciple" (Matt. 27:57). being a disciple of Jesus, but secretly, for fear of the Jews—"He went in boldly unto Pilate" (Mark 15:43)—lit., "having taken courage went in," or "had the boldness to go in." Mark alone, as his manner is, notices the boldness which this required. The act would without doubt identify him for the first time with the disciples of Christ. Marvellous it certainly is, that one who while Jesus was yet alive merely refrained from condemning Him, not having the courage to espouse His cause by one positive act, should, now that He was dead, and His cause apparently dead with Him, summon up courage to go in personally to the Roman governor and ask permission to take down and inter the body. But if this be the first instance, it is not the last, that a seemingly dead Christ has wakened a sympathy which a living one had failed to evoke. The heroism of faith is usually kindled by desperate circumstances, and is not seldom displayed by those who before were the most timid, and scarce known as disciples at all. "And Pilate marvelled if he were"—rather "wondered that he was" "already dead." "And calling the centurion, he asked him whether He had been any while dead"—Pilate could hardly credit what Joseph had told him, that He had been dead "some time," and, before giving up the body to His friends, would learn how the fact stood from the centurion, whose business it was to oversee the execution. "And when he knew it of the centurion," that it was as Joseph had said, "he gave"—rather 'made a gift of'—"the body to Joseph"; struck, possibly, with the rank of the petitioner and the dignified boldness of the petition, in contrast with the spirit of the other party and the low rank to which he had been led to believe all the followers of Christ belonged. Nor would he be unwilling to show that he was not going to carry this black affair any farther. But, whatever were Pilate's motives, two most blessed objects were thus secured: (1) The reality of our Lord's death was attested by the party of all others most competent to decide on it, and certainly free from all bias—the officer in attendance—in full reliance on whose testimony Pilate surrendered the body: (2) The dead Redeemer, thus delivered out of the hands of His enemies, and committed by the supreme political authority to the care of His friends, was thereby protected from all further indignities; a thing most befitting indeed, now that His work was done, but impossible, so far as we can see, if His enemies had been at liberty to do with Him as they pleased. How wonderful are even the minutest features of this matchless History! 39. also Nicodemus, which at the first came to Jesus by night—"This remark corresponds to the secrecy of Joseph's discipleship, just noticed, and calls attention to the similarity of their previous character and conduct, and the remarkable change which had now taken place" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. brought . . . myrrh and aloes, about an hundred pounds weight—an immense quantity, betokening the greatness of their love, but part of it probably intended as a layer for the spot on which the body was to lie. (See II Chron. 16:14) [MEYER]. 40. Then took they the

TODAY'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE:

Joseph, a native of Arimathea, probably the Ramah of the Old Testament (1 Sam. 1:19), a man of wealth, and a member of the Sanhedrin (Matt. 27:57; Luke 23:50, 51), an "honorable counselor, who waited for the kingdom of God." As soon as he heard the tidings of Christ's death, he "went in boldly [lit. having summoned courage, he went] unto Pilate, and craved the body of Jesus." Pilate, having ascertained from the centurion that the death had really taken place, granted Joseph's request, who immediately, having purchased fine linen (Mark 15:46), proceeded to Golgotha to take the body down from the cross. There, assisted by Nicodemus, he took down the body and wrapped it in the fine linen, sprinkling it with the myrrh and aloes which Nicodemus had brought (John 19:39), and then conveyed the body to the new tomb hewn by Joseph himself out of a rock in his garden nearby. There they laid it, in the presence of Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of Joses, and other women, and rolled a great stone to the entrance, and departed (Luke 23:53, 55). This was done in haste, "for the Sabbath was drawing on" (comp. Isa. 53:9).

and graves are noisome and offensive. No ointment or perfume can rejoice the heart so as the grave of our Redeemer does, where there is faith to perceive the fragrant odours of it. In conformity to this example, we ought to have regard to the dead bodies of Christians; not to enshrine and adore their relics, but carefully to deposit them, the dust in the dust, as those who believe that the dead bodies of the saints are still united to Christ. The resurrection of the saints will be in virtue of Christ's resurrection, and therefore in burying them we should have an eye to Christ's burial.

IV. The grave pitched upon, in a garden which belonged to Joseph of Arimathea, very near the place where he was crucified. There was a sepulchre not yet used.

1. Christ was buried without the city, for thus the manner of the Jews was to bury. There was then a peculiar reason for it, because the touching of a grave contracted a ceremonial pollution: but now that the resurrection of Christ has altered the property of the grave, we need not keep at such a distance from it. Those that would not superstitiously, but by faith, visit the holy sepulchre, must go forth out of the noise of this world.

2. Christ was buried in a garden. Joseph had his sepulchre in his garden that it might be a memento: To himself while living. The garden is a proper place for meditation, and a sepulchre there may furnish us with a proper subject for meditation. To his heirs and successors when he was gone. It is good to acquaint ourselves with the place of our fathers' sepulchres; and perhaps we might make our own less formidable if we made theirs more familiar. In a sepulchre in a garden Christ's body was laid. In the garden of Eden death and the grave first received their power, and now in a garden they are conquered.

3. He was buried in a new sepulchre. This was so ordered, (1) For the honour of Christ. He that was born from a virgin-womb must rise from a virgin-tomb. (2) For the confirming of the truth of his resurrection, that it might not be suggested that it was not he, but some other that rose. He that has made all things new has new-made the grave for us.

V. The funeral solemnized (v. 42): There laid they Jesus. There they laid him because it was the preparation day.

1. The deference which the Jews paid to the sabbath, and to the day of preparation. This day had been ill kept by the chief priests, who called themselves the church, but was well kept by the disciples of Christ, who were branded as dangerous to the church; and it is often so. They would not put off the funeral till the sabbath day, because the sabbath is to be a day of holy rest and joy. They would not drive it too late on the day of preparation for the sabbath.

2. The convenience they took of an adjoining sepulchre; the sepulchre they made use of was nigh at hand. It was so ordered that he should be laid in a sepulchre nigh at hand: Because he was to lie there but awhile, as in an inn, and therefore he took the first that offered itself. Because this was a new sepulchre. Those that prepared it little thought who should handsel it. We are hereby taught not to be over-curious in the place of our burial. Where the tree falls, why should it not lie? For Christ was buried in the sepulchre that was next at hand.

Thus without pomp or solemnity is the body of Jesus laid in the cold and silent grave. Here lies death itself slain, and the grave conquered. Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory.

body of Jesus, and wound it in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury—the mixed and pulverized myrrh and aloes shaken into the folds, and the entire body, thus swathed, wrapt in an outer covering of "clean linen cloth" (Matt. 27:59). Had the Lord's own friends had the least reason to think that the spark of life was still in Him, would they have done this? But even if one could conceive them mistaken, could anyone have lain thus enveloped for the period during which He was in the grave, and life still remained? Impossible. When, therefore, He walked forth from the tomb, we can say with the most absolute certainty, "Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept" (I Cor. 15:20). No wonder that the learned and the barbarians alike were prepared to die for the name of the Lord Jesus; for such evidence was to the unsophisticated resistless. (No mention is made of anointing in this operation. No doubt it was a hurried proceeding, for fear of interruption, and because it was close on the sabbath, the women seem to have set this as their proper task "as soon as the sabbath should be past" (Mark 16:1). But as the Lord graciously held it as undesignedly anticipated by Mary at Bethany (Mark 14:8), so this was probably all the anointing, in the strict sense of it, which He received. 41, 42. Now in the place where he was crucified there was a garden, and in the garden a new sepulchre—The choice of this tomb was, on their part, dictated by the double circumstance that it was so near at hand, and by its belonging to a friend of the Lord; and as there was need of haste, even they would be struck with the providence which thus supplied it. "There laid they Jesus therefore, because of the Jew's preparation-day, for the sepulchre was nigh at hand." But there was one recommendation of it which probably would not strike them; but God had it in view. Not its being "hewn out of a rock" (Mark 15:46), accessible only at the entrance, which doubtless would impress them with its security and suitableness. But it was "a new sepulchre" (vs. 41), "wherein never man before was laid" (Luke 23: 53): and Matthew (27:60) says that Joseph laid Him "in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock"—doubtless for his own use, though the Lord had higher use for it. Thus as He rode into Jerusalem on an ass "whereon never man before had sat," so now He shall lie in a tomb wherein never man before had lain, that from these specimens it may be seen that in all things He was "SEPARATE FROM SINNERS."

ADAM CLARKE

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

Always in those rock-hewn tombs, there was a porch; into that they carried the dead body. There they brought the body of Jesus, and there we see these two men wrapping it round, with a hundred pounds of spices intermixed with the wrappings. John is careful to say they buried Him "as the custom of the Jews is to bury." That is to say not after the Egyptian manner, or the manner of other nations, which meant embalming, and the mutilation of the body. The Jews never mutilated a dead body, but wrapped it in spices in the cloths, and last of all a final winding sheet. The wrapping of those dead bodies was a work of singular complexity.—The Gospel According to John

41. There was a garden. It was an ancient custom for particular families to have burying places in their gardens. See 2 Kings xxi. 18, 26. New sepulchre. See on Matt. xxvii. 60.

42. Because of the Jews' preparation. From this it may be conjectured that they had designed to put Him in a more magnificent tomb, or that they intended to make one expressly for himself after the Passover, or that they had designed to put Him somewhere else, but could not do it for want of time; and that they put Him here because the tomb was nigh. It appears plainly, from embalming, that none of these persons had any hope of the resurrection of Christ. They considered Him as a great and eminent prophet, and treated Him as such.

There was no one thing of which the apostles were more concerned to produce substantial proof than the resurrection of their Master, 1. Because it was that which he himself appealed to as the last and most cogent proof of his being the Messiah. And therefore enemies were most solicitous to stifle the notice of this. 2. Because it was upon this the performance of his undertaking for our redemption and salvation did depend. 3. Because he never showed himself alive after his resurrection to all the people, Acts x. 40, 41. But the demonstrations of his resurrection should be reserved as a favour for his particular friends, and by them be published to the world, that those might be blessed who have not seen, and yet have believed.

In these verses we have the first step towards the proof of Christ's resurrection, which is, that the sepulchre was found empty.

I. Mary Magdalene, coming to the sepulchre, finds the stone taken away. This evangelist does not men-

CHAPTER 20

1. The first day of the week. On what we call Sunday morning, the morning after the Jewish Sabbath. As Christ had been buried in haste, these holy women had bought aromatics, Mark xvi. 1; Luke xxiv. 1, to embalm Him afresh, and in a more complete manner than it could have been done by Joseph and Nicodemus.

John mentions only Mary of Magdala, because he appears to wish to give a more detailed history of her conduct than of any of the rest.

tion the other women that went with Mary Magdalene, but her only. Much was forgiven her, therefore she loved much. She had shown her affection to him while he lived, attended his doctrine, ministered to him of her substance, Luke viii. 2, 3. The continued instances of her respect to him at and after his death prove the sincerity of her love. Love to Christ, if it be cordial, will be constant. Her love to Christ was strong as death, the death of the cross, for it stood by that.

1. She came to the sepulchre, to wash the dead body with her tears, for she went to the grave, to weep there, and to anoint it with the ointment she had prepared. It must be an extraordinary affection to the person which will endear his grave to us. It is especially frightful to the weak and timorous sex. Love to Christ will take off the terror of death and the grave. If we cannot come to Christ but through that darksome valley, even in that, if we love him, we shall fear no evil.

2. She came as soon as she could. Upon the first day of the week, as soon as ever the sabbath was gone. This was the first Christian sabbath, and she begins it accordingly with enquiries after Christ. She came early, while it was yet dark. Those who would seek Christ so as to find him must seek him early. Seek him solicitously; be up early for fear of missing him. Seek him industriously. Seek him betimes. That day is in a fair way to be well ended that is thus begun. Those that diligently enquire after Christ while it is yet dark shall have such light given them concerning him as shall shine more and more.

3. She found the stone taken away, which she had seen rolled to the door of the sepulchre. Now this was, (1) A surprise to her. Christ crucified is the fountain of life. His grave is one of the wells of salvation; if we come to it in faith, we shall find the stone rolled away and free access to the comforts of it. Surprising comforts are the frequent encouragements of early seekers. (2) The beginning of a glorious discovery; the Lord was risen, though she did not at first apprehend it so. Those that are most constant in their adherence to Christ have commonly the first and sweetest notices of the divine grace. Mary Magdalene, who followed Christ to the last in his humiliation, met him with the first in his exaltation.

II. Finding the stone taken away, she hastens back to Peter and John: "They have taken the Lord out of the sepulchre, and we know not where they have laid him." She found the stone gone, looked into the grave, and saw it empty. Now one would expect that the first thought that offered itself would have been, Surely the Lord is risen; for whenever he had told them that he should be crucified, he still subjoined in the same breath that the third day he should rise again. Could she now see the grave empty, and yet have no thought of the resurrection enter into her mind? When we come to reflect upon our own conduct in a cloudy and dark day, we shall stand amazed at our dulness and forgetfulness, that we could miss of such thoughts as afterwards appear obvious. She suggested, They have taken away the Lord. Whatever was her suspicion, it seems it was a great vexation and disturbance to her that the body was gone; whereas, if she had understood it rightly, nothing could be more happy. Weak believers often make that the matter of their complaint which is really just ground of hope, and matter of joy. She did not stand poring upon the grief herself, but acquaints her friends with it. The communication of sorrows is one good improvement of the communion of saints. Peter, though he had denied his Master, had not deserted his Master's friends; by this appears the sincerity of his repentance. And the disciples' keeping up their intimacy with him as formerly, teaches us to restore those that have been faulty. If God has received them upon their repentance, why should not we?

III. Peter and John go with all speed to the sepulchre, v. 3, 4. Some think that the other disciples were with Peter and John when the news came, for they told these things to the eleven, Luke xxiv. 9. Yet none of them went to the sepulchre but Peter and John, who were often distinguished from the rest by special favours. It is well when those that are more honoured than others with the privileges of disciples are more active than others in the duty of disciples, more willing to take pains and run hazards. See here what use we should make of the experience of others. When Mary told them what she had seen, they would go and see with their own eyes. Do others tell us of the comfort and benefit of ordinances? Let us be engaged thereby to make trial of them. See how ready we should be to share with our friends in their cares and fears. Peter and John hastened to the sepulchre. See what haste we should make in a good work. Peter and John consulted neither their

But the other Evangelists speak of three persons who went together to the tomb, viz., Mary of Magdala, Mary the mother of James, and Salome, Matt. xxviii. 1; Mark xvi. 1.

2. Then she runneth. This was after the women had seen the angels, who said He was risen from the dead, Luke xxiv. 4. She told not only Peter and John but the other apostles also, Matt. xxviii. 8; but only the two disciples above mentioned went to the tomb to see whether what she had said was true. They have taken away the Lord. She mentions nothing of what the angels had said, in her hurry and confusion; she speaks things only by halves; and probably the vision of angels might have appeared to her only as an illusion of her own fancy, and not to be any further regarded.

A. B. SIMPSON:

Mary at the sepulchre, or the new revelation of the risen Lord (John 20:1-18). This woman was singularly honored by the love of her risen Lord, as the first witness of His resurrection. She had been saved from more than perhaps any of His disciples. His strong arm of love had rescued her from the sevenfold possession of demoniacal power. There is no reason to suppose that her womanhood had been degraded by the sin which has been associated with her name, but something more terrific, and on her part involuntary and irresistible, had bound perhaps all the powers of her body and soul. Set free by His almighty love, her heart was now bound to Him by cords of everlasting love. No sadder or truer heart lingered at the cross through the dark hours of His dying agony, and no more fearless or devoted feet hastened on the Easter morning to anoint His body in Joseph's sepulchre. Finding the stone rolled away and the door open, she hastens to tell His brethren, Peter and John. When they have come and gone, she lingers still in the garden, believing that the body has been removed by the gardener's hands, perhaps, because of its being inconvenient to keep it longer. It is then that Jesus appears to her, disguised at first in a form that she mistakes for the gardener; but the disguise only brings out more beautifully her tender love. Her willing hands are ready to bear away the precious body, but His living voice dispels the illusion, and her hands clasp with rapture the feet of her Lord.—Christ in the Bible

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

Peter and John at the tomb, the dawning of faith, and the continuance of bewildered wonder. In the account, we may observe, first, the characteristic conduct of each of the two. Peter is first to set out, and John follows, both men doing according to their kind. The younger runs faster than his companion. He looked into the tomb, and saw the wrappings lying; but the reverent awe which holds back finer natures kept him from venturing in. Peter is not said to have looked before entering. He loved with all his heart, but his love was impetuous and practical, and he went straight in, and felt no reason why he should pause. His boldness encouraged his friend, as the example of strong natures does.—Expositions of Holy Scripture ease nor their gravity, but ran to the sepulchre. See what a good thing it is to have good company in a good work. See what a laudable emulation it is among disciples to strive which shall excel in that which is good. It was no breach of ill manners for John to outrun Peter. We must do our best, and neither envy those that can do better, nor despise those that do as they can, though they come behind. He that got foremost in this race was the disciple whom Jesus loved. Sense of Christ's love to us, kindling love in us to him again, will make us to excel in virtue. He that was cast behind was Peter, who had denied his Master, and was in sorrow and shame for it. When conscience is offended we lose ground.

IV. Peter and John, having come to the sepulchre, prosecute the enquiry.

1. John went no further than Mary Magdalene had done. He had the curiosity to look into the sepulchre, and saw it was empty. He stooped down, and looked in. Those that would find the knowledge of Christ must stoop down, and look in. Yet he had not courage to go into the sepulchre. The warmest affections are not always accompanied with the boldest resolutions.

2. Peter went in first and made a more exact discovery than John had done, v. 6, 7. While John was with much caution looking in, he came, and with great courage went into the sepulchre. The boldness of Peter, and how God dispenses his gifts variously. John could out-run Peter, but Peter could out-dare John. Some disciples are quick, and they are useful to quicken those that are slow; others are bold, and they are useful to embolden those that are timorous. Those who in good earnest seek after Christ must not frighten themselves with bugbears and foolish fancies. Good Christians need not be afraid of the grave, since Christ has lain in it. Let us therefore not indulge, but conquer, the fear we are apt to conceive upon the sight of a dead body, or being alone among the graves. We must be willing to go through the grave to Christ; that way he went to his glory, and so must we. If we cannot see God's face and live, better die than never see it. The posture in which he found things in the sepulchre. Christ had left his grave-clothes behind him there. He laid them aside because he arose to die no more. Lazarus came out with his grave-clothes on, for he was to use them again. When we arise from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, we must leave our grave-clothes behind us, must put off all our corruptions. Christ left those in the grave, as it were, for our use; if the grave be a bed to the saints, thus he hath sheeted that bed, and made it ready for them. The grave-clothes were found in very good order, which serves for an evidence that his body was not stolen away while men slept. Peter's boldness encouraged John; now he took heart and ventured in (v. 8), and he saw and believed. He began to believe that Jesus was risen to life again.

(1) John followed Peter in venturing. He durst not have gone into the sepulchre if Peter had not gone in first. It is good to be emboldened in a good work by the boldness of others. The dread of difficulty and danger will be taken off by observing the resolution and courage of others. Perhaps John's quickness had made Peter run faster, and now Peter's boldness makes John venture further. John not only associated with Peter, but thought it no disparagement to follow him.

(2) John got the start of Peter in believing. Peter saw and wondered (Luke xxiv. 12), but John saw and believed. A mind disposed to contemplation may perhaps sooner receive the evidence of divine truth than a mind disposed to action. But what was the reason that they were so slow of heart to believe? The evangelist tells us (v. 9), as yet they knew not the scripture that he must rise again from the dead. First, How unapt the disciples themselves were, at first, to believe the resurrection of Christ, which confirms the testimony they afterwards gave with so much assurance concerning it; for, by their backwardness to believe it, it appears that they were not credulous concerning it, nor of those simple ones that believe every word. It was to them as a strange thing, and one of the furthest things from their thoughts. Peter and John were so shy of believing it at first that nothing less than the most convincing proof could bring them to testify it afterwards with so much assurance. Hereby it appears that they were not only honest men, who would not deceive others, but cautious men, who would not themselves be imposed upon. Secondly, The reason of their slowness to believe; because as yet they knew not the scripture. This seems to be the evangelist's acknowledgment of his own fault among the rest.

3. Peter and John pursued their enquiry no further, hovering between faith and unbelief (v. 10): The 3-10. Peter therefore went forth, and that other disciple, and came first to the sepulchre.—These particulars have a singular air of artless truth about them. Mary, in her grief, runs to the two apostles who were soon to be so closely associated in proclaiming the Saviour's resurrection, and they, followed by Mary, hasten to see with their own eyes. The younger disciple outruns the older; love haply supplying swifter wings. He stoops, he gazes in, but enters not the open sepulchre, held back probably by a reverential fear. The bolder Peter, coming up, goes in at once, and is rewarded with bright evidence of what had happened.

6-7. seeth the linen clothes lie—lying—And the napkin, that was about his head, not lying with the linen clothes—not loosely, as if hastily thrown down, and indicative of a hurried and disorderly removal—but wrapped—folded—together in a place by itself—showing with what grand tranquillity "the Living One" had walked forth from "the dead" (Luke 24: 5). "Doubtless the two attendant angels (vs. 12) did this service for the Rising One, the one disposing of the linen clothes, the other of the napkin" [BENGEL]. 8. Then went in . . . that other disciple which came first to the sepulchre—The repetition of this, in connection with his not having gone in till after Peter, seems to show that at the moment of penning these words the advantage which each of these loving disciples had of the other was present to his mind. and he saw and believed—Probably he means, though he does not say, that he believed in his Lord's resurrection more immediately and certainly than Peter.

9. For as yet they knew—i.e., understood—not the scripture that he must rise again from the dead.—In other words, they believed in His resurrection at first, not because they were prepared by Scripture to expect it; but facts carried resistless conviction of it in the first instance to their minds, and furnished a key to the Scripture predictions of it.

ADAM CLARKE

4. Outrun Peter. Not because he had a greater desire to see into the truth of these things, but because he was younger and lighter of foot.

6. Seeth the linen clothes lie. To "look steadily" at anything, so as to discover what it is and to be satisfied with viewing it.

7. Wrapped together in a place by itself. The providence of God ordered these very little matters, so that they became the fullest proofs against the lie of the chief priests that the body had been stolden away by the disciples. If the body had been stolen away, those who took it would not have stopped to strip the clothes from it and to wrap them up and lay them by in separate places.

8. That other disciple. John. Saw. That the body was not there. And believed. That it had been taken away, as Mary had said; but he did not believe that He was risen from the dead. See what follows.

9. They knew not the scripture. Viz., Ps. xvi. 9-10: "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell"—For Thou wilt not abandon My life to the grave, nor "suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." It was certainly a reproach to the disciples that they had not understood this prophecy, when our Lord had often given them the most direct information concerning it. However, this ingenuous confession of John in a matter so dishonorable to himself is a full proof of his sincerity and of the truth of his narration.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

In these few verses John shows that these disciples, Mary, John, and Peter, used their eyes, but he uses different words to describe how they did so. It is said that Mary "seeth" the stone rolled away. It is said when John arrived, that "he seeth the linen cloths lying." It is said Peter "beholdeth the linen cloths lying, and the napkin" in separation. Then it is said that John "saw."

Mary "seeth," and the Greek verb is blepo, which means just to see, quite the ordinary word. When John came, and stooping, looked in, he also saw in that way, the linen cloths lying. When Peter came, he beheld. The word for Peter's use of his eyes is theoreo. This word suggests far more than mere seeing. It means that he looked critically and carefully. We are not told of any effect produced upon him. I am sure an effect was produced. Then John, encouraged, went in. Now we have an entirely different word. It is the word eido. This word, while describing the use of the eyes, always conveys the ideal of apprehension and understanding of the thing seen. When John went in, he saw, that is, he understood, and therefore believed. Intelligent apprehension produced absolute conviction.—The Gospel According to John disciples went away to their own home. For fear of being taken up upon suspicion of a design to steal away the body, or of being charged with it now that it was gone. In difficult dangerous times it is hard even for good men to go on in their work with the resolution that becomes them. Because they were at a loss, and knew not what to do next, nor what to make of what they had seen; which is an instance of their weakness as yet. It is probable that the rest of the disciples were together; to them they return, to make report of what they had discovered. It is observable that before Peter and John came to the sepulchre an angel had appeared there, rolled away the stone, frightened the guard, and comforted the women; as soon as they were gone from the sepulchre, Mary Magdalene here sees two angels in the sepulchre (v. 12), and yet Peter and John come to the sepulchre, and go into it, and see none. Angels appear and disappear at pleasure, according to the orders and instructions given them. They may be, and are really, where they are not visibly. This favour was shown to those who were early and constant in their enquiries after Christ, and was the reward of those that came first and stayed last, but denied to those that made a transient visit.

Verses 11–18

I. The constancy and fervency of Mary Magdalene's affection to the Lord Jesus, v. 11.

1. She stayed at the sepulchre, when Peter and John were gone, because there her Master had lain. This good woman, though she has lost him, will abide by his grave for his sake, and continue in his love even when she wants the comfort of it.

2. She stayed there weeping, and these tears loudly bespoke her affection to her Master. Those that have lost Christ have cause to weep. Those that seek Christ must weep, not for him, but for themselves.

3. As she wept, she looked into the sepulchre. When we are in search of something that we have lost we look again and again in the place where we last left it, and expected to have found it. Weeping must not hinder seeking. Though she wept, she stooped down and looked in.

II. The vision she had of two angels in the sepulchre, v. 12.

1. The description of the persons she saw. They were two angels in white, sitting one at the head, and the other at the feet, of the grave. Their nature. They were angels, messengers from heaven, sent on purpose: To honour the Son. Now that the Son of God was again to be brought into the world, the angels have a charge to attend him, as they did at his birth. To comfort the saints, and, by giving them notice that the Lord was risen, to prepare them for the sight of him. Their number: two, not a multitude of the heavenly host, to sing praise, only two, to bear witness. Their array: They were in white, denoting their purity and holiness. Glorified saints, when they come to be as the angels, shall walk with Christ in white. Their posture and place: They sat in Christ's grave. These angels went into the grave, to teach us not to be afraid of it. Matters are so ordered that the grave is not much out of our way to heaven. These angelic guards, keeping possession of the sepulchre, when they had frightened away the guards, represents Christ's victory over the powers of darkness. Their sitting to face one another, one at his bed's head, the other at his bed's feet, may also remind us of the two cherubim, placed one at either end of the mercy-seat, looking one at another. Christ crucified was the great propitiary, at the head and feet of which were these two cherubim, not with flaming swords, to keep us from, but welcome messengers, to direct us to, the way of life.

2. Their compassionate enquiry into the cause of Mary Magdalene's grief (v. 13): Woman, why weepest thou? A rebuke to her weeping: "Why weepest thou, when thou hast cause to rejoice?" Many of the floods of our tears would dry away before such a search as this into the fountain of them. It was designed to show how much angels are concerned at the griefs of the saints. Christians should thus sympathize with one another. It was only to make an occasion of informing her of that which would turn her mourning into rejoicing.

3. The melancholy account of her present distress: Because they have taken away the blessed body I came to embalm, and I know not where they have laid it. (1) The weakness of her faith. We often perplex ourselves needlessly with imaginary difficulties, which faith would discover to us as real advantages. (2) The strength of her love. Mary Magdalene is not diverted from her enquiries by the surprise of the vision, nor satisfied with the honour of it; but still she harps upon the same string: They have taken away my Lord. A sight of angels and their smiles

11-15. But Mary stood without at the sepulchre weeping . . .—Brief was the stay of those two men. But Mary, arriving perhaps by another direction after they left, lingers at the spot, weeping for her missing Lord. As she gazes through her tears on the open tomb, she also ventures to stoop down and look into it, when lo! "two angels in white" (as from the world of light, and see on Matt. 28:3) appear to her in a "sitting" posture, "as having finished some business, and awaiting some one to impart tidings to" [BENGEL].

12. one at the head, and the other at the feet where the body of Jesus had lain—not merely proclaiming silently the entire charge they had had of the body of Christ [quoted in LUTHARDT], but rather, possibly, calling mute attention to the narrow space within which the Lord of glory had contracted Himself; as if they would say, Come, see within what limits, marked off by the interval here between us two, the Lord lay! But she is in tears, and these suit not the scene of so glorious an Exit. They are going to point out to her the incongruity.

13. Woman, why weepest thou?—You would think the vision too much for a lone woman. But absorbed in the one Object of her affection and pursuit, she speaks out her grief without fear.

Because . . .—i.e., Can I choose but weep, when "they have taken away . . ." repeating her very words to Peter and John. On this she turned herself and saw Jesus Himself standing beside her, but took Him for the gardener. Clad therefore in some such style He must have been. But if any ask, as too curious interpreters do, whence He got those habiliments, we answer [with OLSHAUSEN and LUTHARDT] where the two angels got theirs. Nor did the voice of

10. Unto their own home. Either to their own houses, if they still had any, or to those of their friends, or to those where they had a hired lodging, and where they met together for religious purposes.

11. But Mary stood without. She remained some time after Peter and John had returned to their own homes.

12. Seeth two angels. She knew these to be angels by their white and glistering robes. Matthew and Mark mention but one angel—probably that one only that spoke, v. 13. One at the head, and the other at the feet. So were the cherubim placed at each end of the mercy seat, Exod. xxv. 18-19.

13. They have taken away my Lord. It was conjectured, on chap. xix. 42, that the body of our Lord was put here only for the time being, that, after the Sabbath, they might carry it to a more proper place. Mary seems to refer to this: They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him. This removal she probably attributed to some of our Lord's disciples or to some of His friends.

will not suffice without a sight of Christ and God's smiles in him. Nay, the sight of angels is but an opportunity of pursuing her enquiries after Christ. The angels asked her, Why weepest thou? I have cause enough to weep, says she, for they have taken away my Lord. None know, but those who have experienced it, the sorrow of a deserted soul, that has had comfortable evidences of the love of God in Christ, but has now lost them, and walks in darkness.

III. Christ's appearing to her while she was talking with the angels. Christ himself steps in. Mary would fain know where her Lord is, and behold he is at her right hand. Those that will be content with nothing short of a sight of Christ shall be put off with nothing less. Christ, in manifesting himself to those that seek him, often outdoes their expectations. Mary longs to see the dead body of Christ, and behold she sees him alive. Thus he does for his praying people more than they are able to ask or think.

(1) He did at first conceal himself from her.

[1] He stood as a common person, and she looked upon him accordingly, v. 14. She turned herself back from talking with the angels, and sees Jesus himself standing, and yet she knew not that it was Jesus. The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart (Ps. xxxiv. 18), nearer than they are aware. Those that seek Christ, though they do not see him, may yet be sure he is not far from them. Those that diligently seek the Lord will turn every way in their enquiry after him. Mary turned herself back, in hopes of some discoveries. It was her earnest desire in seeking that made her turn every way. Christ is often near his people, and they are not aware of him. She knew not that it was Jesus.

[2] He asked her a common question, and she answered him accordingly, v. 15.

First, The question he asked her was what anyone would have asked her: "Woman, why weepest thou? Whom seekest thou?" It should seem, this was the first word Christ spoke after his resurrection: "Why weepest thou?" Christ takes cognizance: Of his people's griefs, and enquires, Why weep you? Of his people's cares, and enquires, Whom seek you, and what would you have? When he knows they are seeking him, yet he will know it from them.

Secondly, The reply she made him is natural enough. Supposing him to be the gardener, Sir, if thou hast carried him hence, pray tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away. 1. The error of her understanding. She supposed our Lord Jesus to be the gardener. Troubled spirits, in a cloudy and dark day, are apt to misrepresent Christ to themselves. 2. The truth of her affection. See how her heart was set upon finding Christ. She puts the question to everyone she meets. When she speaks of Christ, she does not name him; but, If thou have borne him hence, taking it for granted that this gardener was full of thoughts concerning this Jesus as well as she. Another evidence of the strength of her affection was that, wherever he was laid, she would undertake to remove him. Such a body was much more than she could pretend to carry; but true love thinks it can do no more than it can, and makes nothing of difficulties. Christ needs not to stay where he is thought a burden.

(2) How Christ at length made himself known to her, and gave her infallible assurances of his resurrection.

[1] How Christ discovered himself to this good woman (v. 16): Jesus saith unto her, Mary. It was said with that air of kindness with which he was wont to speak to her. Now he changed his voice, and spoke like himself, not like the gardener. Christ's sheep know his voice, ch. x. 4. This one word, Mary, was like that to the disciples in the storm, It is I.

[2] How readily she received this discovery. She turned herself and said, Rabboni, My Master. The title of respect she gives him: My Master. Rabbon was with them a more honourable title than Rabbi; and therefore Mary chooses that, and adds a note of appropriation, My great Master. Notwithstanding the freedom of communion which Christ is pleased to admit us to, he is our Master. With what liveliness of affection she gives this title to Christ. She turned from the angels to look unto Jesus. We must take off our regards from all creatures, even the brightest and best, to fix them upon Christ. When she thought it had been the gardener, she looked another way while speaking to him; but now that she knew the voice of Christ she turned herself.

[3] The further instructions that Christ gave her (v. 17): "Touch me not, but go and carry the news to the disciples."

First, He diverts her from the expectation of familiar society and conversation with him at this time: Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended. Mary was

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

His first words disclose Him to Mary—"Woman, why weepest thou? whom seekest thou?" He will try her ere he tell her. She answers not the stranger's question, but comes straight to her point with him.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The presence of angels was a trifle to Mary, who had only one thought—the absence of her Lord. Surely that touch in her unmoved answer, as if speaking to men, is beyond the reach of art. She says "My Lord" now, and "I know not," but otherwise repeats her former words, unmoved by any hope caught from John. Her clinging love needed more than an empty grave and folded clothes and waiting angels to stay its tears, and she turned indifferently and wearily away from the interruption of the question to plunge again into her sorrow. Chrysostom suggests that she "turned herself," because she saw in the angels' looks that they saw Christ suddenly appearing behind her; but the preceding explanation seems better. Her not knowing Jesus might be accounted for by her absorbing grief. One who looked at white-robed angels, and saw nothing extraordinary, would give but a careless glance at the approaching figure, and might well fail to recognize Him.—Expositions of Holy Scripture

15. Sir, if thou have borne him hence—borne whom? She says not. She can think only of One, and thinks others must understand her. It reminds one of the question of the Spouse, "Saw ye him whom my soul loveth?" (Song of Sol. 3:3.) tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away—Wilt thou, dear fragile woman? But it is the language of sublime affection, that thinks itself fit for anything if once in possession of its Object. It is enough. Like Joseph, He can no longer restrain Himself (Gen. 45:1).

16, 17. Jesus saith unto her, Mary—It is not now the distant, though respectful, "Woman." It is the oft-repeated name, uttered, no doubt, with all the wonted manner, and bringing a rush of unutterable and overpowering associations with it.

She turned herself, and saith to him, Rabboni!—But that single word of transported recognition was not enough for woman's full heart. Not knowing the change which had passed upon Him, she hastens to express by her action what words failed to clothe; but she is checked.

14. She turned herself back. Or "she was turned back," i.e., to go again with the other women to Jerusalem, who had already departed; but she had not as yet gone so far as to be out of the garden. Knew not that it was Jesus. John has here omitted what the angels said to the women about Christ's being risen, probably because it was so particularly related by the other Evangelists: Matt. xxviii. 5-7; Mark xvi. 6-7; Luke xxiv. 5-7. Mary was so absorbed in grief that she paid but little attention to the person of our Lord, and therefore did not at first discern it to be He; nor could she imagine such an appearance possible, as she had no conception of His resurrection from the dead. She was therefore in every way unprepared to recognize the person of our Lord.

15. Supposing him to be the gardener. The inspector or overseer of the garden, the person who had the charge of the workmen, and the care of the produce of the garden, and who rendered account to the owner. And I will take him away. How true is the proverb, "Love feels no load"! Jesus was in the prime of life when He was crucified, and had a hundred pounds' weight of spices added to His body; and yet Mary thinks of nothing less than carrying Him away with her if she can but find where He is laid!

16. Mary. This word was no doubt spoken with uncommon emphasis; and the usual sound of Christ's voice accompanied it, so as immediately to prove that it must be Jesus. What transports of joy must have filled this woman's heart! Let it be remarked that Mary Magdalene sought Jesus more fervently and continued more affectionately attached to Him than any of the rest; therefore to her first Jesus is pleased to show himself, and she is made the first herald of the gospel of a risen Saviour.

ready to express her joy by affectionate embraces of him, which Christ here forbids at this time. Touch me not for I am to ascend to heaven. He bade the disciples touch him, for the confirmation of their faith. She must believe him, and adore him, but must not expect to be familiar with him as formerly. He forbids her to dote upon his bodily presence, and leads her to the spiritual communion which she should have with him after he was ascended to his Father. Though I am not yet ascended, go to my brethren, and tell them, I am to ascend. As before his death, so now after his resurrection, he still harps upon this. They must look higher than his bodily presence, and look further than the present state of things. "Touch me not, stay not now to make any further enquiries, or give any further expressions of joy, for I am not yet ascended. The best service thou canst do now is to carry the tidings to the disciples; lose no time therefore, but go away with all speed." Mary must not stay to talk with her Master, but must carry his message; for it is a day of good tidings.

Secondly, He directs her what message to carry to his disciples: But go to my brethren, and tell them that I ascend. To whom this message is sent: Go to my brethren with it. He was now entering upon his glory, yet he owns his disciples as his brethren. He had called them friends, but never brethren till now. Though Christ be high, yet he is not haughty. Notwithstanding his elevation, he disdains not to own his poor relations. He had never seen them together since they all forsook him and fled. He forgives, he forgets, and does not upbraid. By whom it is sent: by Mary Magdalene, out of whom had been cast seven devils. This was her reward for her constancy in adhering to Christ; she becomes an apostle to the apostles. What the message itself is: I ascend to my Father.

a. Our joint-relation to God, resulting from our union with Christ, is an unspeakable comfort. He says, He is my Father, and your Father; my God, and your God. It is the great dignity of believers that the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is, in him, their Father. He is ours by a gracious adoption; yet even this warrants us to call him, as Christ did, Abba, Father. It is the great condescension of Christ that he is pleased to own the believer's God for his God: My God, your God; the God of the Redeemer, to support him, that he might be the God of the redeemed, to save them.

b. Christ's ascension into heaven is likewise an unspeakable comfort: "Tell them I must shortly ascend." (a) A word of caution to these disciples, not to expect the continuance of his bodily presence on earth. "I am risen, not to stay with them, but to go on their errand to heaven." Thus those who are raised to a spiritual life must reckon that they rise to ascend. Let them not think that this earth is to be their home and rest; no, being born from heaven, they are bound for heaven. I ascend, therefore must I seek things above. (b) A word of comfort to them, and to all that shall believe in him through their word; he was then ascending, he is now ascended to his Father, and our Father. He says it with triumph, that those who love him may rejoice. He ascended as our forerunner, to prepare a place for us, and to be ready to receive us.

Some make these words, I ascend to my God and your God, to include a promise of our resurrection. Because I live, you shall live also.

IV. Here is Mary Magdalene's faithful report to the disciples (v. 18): She came and told the disciples that she had seen the Lord. Peter and John had left her seeking him carefully with tears, and would not stay to seek him with her. Now she found it was a living body and a glorified one; so that she found what she sought, and, what was infinitely better, she had joy in her sight of the Master herself. When God comforts us, it is with this design, that we may comfort others. And as she told them what she had seen, so also what she had heard; that he had spoken these things unto her as a message to be delivered to them.

Verses 19–25

The infallible proof of Christ's resurrection was his showing himself alive, Acts i. 3. In these verses, we have an account of his first appearance to the college of the disciples, on the day on which he rose. He had sent them the tidings of his resurrection, but to confirm their faith in him, he came himself, that they might not have it by hearsay only, but might themselves be eye-witnesses of his being alive.

I. When and where this appearance was, v. 19. It was the same day, being the first day of the week.

There are three secondary ordinances (as I may call them) instituted by our Lord Jesus, to continue in his church; these are, the Lord's day, solemn

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

17. Jesus saith unto her, Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father—Old familiarities must now give place to new and more awful yet sweeter approaches; but for these the time has not come yet. This seems the spirit, at least, of these mysterious words, on which much difference of opinion has obtained, and not much that is satisfactory said.

but go to my brethren—(Cf. Matt. 28:10; Heb. 2:11, 17). That He had still our Humanity, and therefore "is not ashamed to call us brethren," is indeed grandly evidenced by these words. But it is worthy of most reverential notice, that we nowhere read of anyone who presumed to call Him Brother. "My brethren: Blessed Jesus, who are these? Were they not Thy followers? yea, Thy forsakers? How dost Thou raise these titles with Thyself! At first they were Thy servants; then disciples; a little before Thy death, they were Thy friends; now, after Thy resurrection, they were Thy brethren. But oh, mercy without measure! how wilt Thou, how canst Thou call them brethren whom, in Thy last parting, Thou foundest fugitives? Did they not run from Thee? Did not one of them rather leave his inmost coat behind him than not be quit of Thee? And yet Thou sayest, 'Go, tell My brethren! It is not in the power of the sins of our infirmity to unbrother us' " [BISHOP HALL]. I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and to my God and your God—words of incomparable glory! Jesus had called God habitually His Father, and on one occasion, in His darkest moment, His God. But both are here united, expressing that full-orbed relationship which embraces in its vast sweep at once Himself and His redeemed. Yet, note well, He says not, Our Father and our God. All the deepest of the Church fathers were wont to call attention to this, as expressly designed to distinguish between what God is to Him and to us—His Father essentially, ours not so: our God essentially, His not so: His God only in connection with us: our God only in connection with Him.

18. Mary Magdalene came and told the disciples that she had seen the Lord, and that he had spoken these things unto her—To a woman was this honor given to be the first that saw the risen Redeemer, and that woman was not His mother. (See on Mark 16:9.)

19-23. JESUS APPEARS TO THE ASSEMBLED DISCIPLES.

ADAM CLARKE

17. Touch me not. "Cling not to Me." Aptomai has this sense in Job xxxi. 7, where the Septuagint use it for the Hebrew dabak, which signifies to "cleave, cling, stick, or be glued to." From Matt. xxviii. 9, it appears that some of the women "held him by the feet, and worshipped him." This probably Mary did; and our Lord seems to have spoken to her to this effect: "Spend no longer time with Me now. I am not going immediately to heaven—you will have several opportunities of seeing Me again. But go and tell My disciples that I am, by and by, to ascend to My Father and God, who is your Father and God also. Therefore, let them take courage."

ALBERT BARNES:

17. "Touch me not." This passage has given rise to a variety of interpretations. Jesus required Thomas to touch him (v. 27), and it has been difficult to ascertain why he forbade this now to Mary. The reason why he directed Thomas to do this was that he doubted whether he had been restored to life. Mary did not doubt that. The reason why he forbade her to touch him now is to be sought in the circumstances of the case. Mary, filled with joy and gratitude, was about to prostrate herself at his feet, disposed to remain with him, and offer him there her homage as her risen Lord. This is probably included in the word "touch" in this place; and the language of Jesus may mean this: "Do not approach me now for this purpose. Do not delay here. Other opportunities will yet be afforded to see me. I have not yet ascended—that is, I am not about to ascend immediately, but shall remain yet on earth to afford opportunity to my disciples to enjoy my presence." From Matt. 23:9, it appears that the women, when they met Jesus, "held him by the feet and worshipped him." This species of adoration it was probably the intention of Mary to offer, and this, at that time, Jesus forbade, and directed her to go at once and give his disciples notice that he had risen. "My brethren" (see 15:15). "My Father and your Father." Nothing was better fitted to afford them consolation than this assurance that his God was theirs, and that, though he had been slain, they were still indissolubly united in attachment to the same Father and God.
—Popular Commentary

assemblies, and a standing ministry. The mind of Christ concerning each of these is plainly intimated to us in these verses: of the first two, here, in the circumstances of this appearance, the other v. 21.

1. Here is a Christian sabbath observed by the disciples, and owned by our Lord Jesus. The visit Christ made to his disciples was on the first day of the week. And the first day of the week is (I think) the only day of the week, or month, or year, that is ever mentioned by number in all the New Testament; and this is several times spoken of as a day religiously observed. Thus, in effect, he blessed and sanctified that day.

2. Here is a Christian assembly solemnized by the disciples, and also owned by the Lord Jesus. Probably the disciples met here for some religious exercise, to pray together. They met to know one another's minds, strengthen one another's hands, and concert proper measures to be taken in the present critical juncture. This meeting was private, because they durst not appear publicly. They met in a house, but they kept the door shut, that they might not be seen together, and that none might come among them but such as they knew; for they feared the Jews. Those sheep of the flock were scattered in the storm; but sheep are sociable, and will come together again. It is no new thing for the assemblies of Christ's disciples to be driven into corners, and forced into the wilderness. God's people have been often obliged to enter into their chambers, and shut their doors, as here, for fear of the Jews.

II. What was said and done in this visit Christ made to his disciples. When they were assembled, Jesus came among them. Where two or three are gathered together in his name, he will be in the midst of them. He came, though the doors were shut. It is a comfort to Christ's disciples, when their solemn assemblies are reduced to privacy, that no doors can shut out Christ's presence from them. We have five things in this appearance of Christ:

1. His kind and familiar salutation of his disciples: He said, Peace be unto you. The phrase was common, but the sense was now peculiar. Peace be unto you is as much as, All good be to you, all peace always by all means. Christ had left them his peace for their legacy, ch. xiv. 27. He here makes prompt payment of the legacy: Peace be unto you. Peace with God, peace in your own consciences, peace with one another; all this peace be with you; not peace with the world, but peace in Christ. His sudden appearing in the midst of them, could not but put them into some disorder and consternation, the noise of which waves he stills with this word, Peace be unto you.

2. His clear and undeniable manifestation of himself to them, v. 20. And here observe: The method he took to convince them of the truth of his resurrection. None could desire a further proof than the scars or marks of the wounds in the body. The marks of the wounds remained in the body of the Lord Jesus even after his resurrection, that they might be demonstrations of the truth of it. Conquerors glory in the marks of their wounds. Christ's wounds were to speak on earth that it was he himself, and therefore he arose with them; they were to speak in heaven, in the intercession he must ever live to make, and therefore he ascended with them. These marks he showed to his disciples, for their conviction. They had not only the satisfaction of seeing him look with the same countenance, and hearing him speak with the same voice, but they had the further evidence of these peculiar marks: he opened his hands to them, that they might see the marks of the wounds on them; he opened his breast, to show them the wound there. The exalted Redeemer will ever show himself open-handed and open-hearted to all his faithful friends and followers. The impression it made upon them. They were convinced that they saw the Lord; so was their faith confirmed. Thus many true believers, who, while they were weak, feared their comforts were but imaginary, afterwards find them, through grace, real and substantial. Then they were glad. The evangelist seems to write it with somewhat of transport and triumph. Then! then! were the disciples glad, when they saw the Lord. How would it revive the heart of these disciples to hear that Jesus is again alive! It is life from the dead to them. Now that word of Christ was fulfilled (ch. xvi. 22), I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice. This wiped away all tears from their eyes.

3. The commission he gave them to be his agents in the planting of his church, v. 21.

(1) The preface to their commission, which was the solemn repetition of the salutation before: Peace be unto you. The former salutation was to still the tumult of their fear, that they might calmly attend to the proofs of his resurrection; this was to reduce and saith unto them Peace be unto you—not the mere wish that even His own exalted peace might be theirs (ch. 14:27), but conveying it into their hearts, even as He "opened their understandings to understand the scriptures" (Luke 24:45).

when he had so said, he showed them his hands and his side—not only as ocular and tangible evidence of the reality of His resurrection (see on Luke 24:37-43), but as through "the power of that resurrection" dispensing all His peace to men. Then were the disciples glad when they saw the Lord.

21. Then said Jesus—prepared now to listen to Him in a new character. Peace be unto you.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

But they were gathered together. What brought them back? They had been scattered every one to his own. They had fled when the thunderstorm burst upon His head. But now they were together again. The only thing that brought them together again was the stories that they had heard in the early morning that He was alive, that He was risen from the dead. They had not understood the fact of His resurrection. John tells us that in this very chapter at an earlier point. But there were those who said they had seen Him. Through the intervening hours, as recorded by other of the evangelists, others had seen Him. They were afraid. The doors were shut. And yet inside they were surely talking of their Lord, and of these strange things. I think I am warranted in saying that by the story of the two walking to Emmaus. They were walking disconsolately away from Jerusalem when our Lord joined them. He asked them what they were talking about, and why they looked so sad. They said, "Are you only a lodger in Jerusalem, are you only tarrying for a night? Don't you know the things that are happening?" And He said to them, "What things?" Then they told Him, "Jesus of Nazareth . . . a Prophet mighty in deed and word. . . . We hoped that it was he which should redeem Israel." I am always convinced that the two going to Emmaus were men, because they said, "Certain women of our company" say that they have seen Him, as though it were possibly a delusion. They were all talking about Him. Thus they were gathered, with the conflicting emotions of wonder, of hope, of fear.
—The Gospel According to John

19. The doors were shut . . . for fear of the Jews. We do not find that the Jews designed to molest the disciples; but, as they had proceeded so far as to put Christ to death, the faith of the disciples not being very strong, they were led to think that they should be the next victims if found. Some think, therefore, that they had the doors not only shut but barricaded. Nevertheless Jesus came in, the doors being shut, i.e., while they continued shut. But how? By His almighty power; and further we know not. Yet it is quite possible that no miraculous influence is here intended. The doors might be shut for fear of the Jews; and Jesus might open them, and enter in the ordinary way. Where there is no need for a miracle, a miracle is never wrought. The Evangelist has omitted the appearing of our Lord to the other women who came from the tomb, Matt. xxviii. 9, and that to the two disciples who were going to Emmaus, Luke xxiv. 13, etc., which all happened in the course of this same day. Peace be unto you. His usual salutation and benediction. May every blessing of heaven and earth which you need be granted unto you!

20. He shewed unto them his hands and his side. So it appears that His body bore the marks of the nails and the spear; and these marks were preserved that the disciples might be the more fully convinced of the reality of His resurrection.

F. B. MEYER:

The risen Christ brings peace. Evidently our Lord was clothed in the spiritual body of which the apostle speaks, not subject to the laws governing physical life. Twice he uttered the salutation, "Peace be unto you." The first time he accompanied his words with the indication of his wounds: "He shewed unto them his hands and his side." This was the peace of forgiveness, falling on conscience-stricken hearts as the dew distills on parched herbage. "Look at the wounds of Jesus!" cried Staupitz to Luther, and there is, indeed, no other sign which can give rest to the penitent. This is the peace of the evening hour, when we come back from the soil and fret of the world and need to have our feet washed and our heart quieted.

The second time the message of peace was accompanied by an injunction to go forth into the world, as he was sent from the Father, on the great errand of world evangelization. Then he breathed on them and said, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost," which shortly after was to descend as a rushing, mighty wind. There is no way of remitting sin but by preaching the gospel of reconciliation, with the Holy Spirit accompanying our message. This is the peace of the morning, when we go forth to our post of duty or danger.—Bible Commentary the transport of their joy, that they might sedately hear what he had further to say to them. To encourage them to accept of the commission he was giving them. In the issue, it would be peace to them. Christ was now sending the disciples to publish peace to the world, and he here not only confers it upon them but commits it to them as a trust to be by them transmitted.

(2) The commission itself: As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. It is easy to understand how Christ sent them; he appointed them to go on with his work upon earth. He sent them authorized with a divine warrant, armed with a divine power. Hence they were called apostles—men sent. But how Christ sent them as the Father sent him is not so easily understood; certainly their commissions and powers were infinitely inferior to his. [1] Their work was of the same kind with his, and they were to go on where he left off. As he was sent to bear witness to the truth, so were they; not to be mediators of the reconciliation, but only preachers and publishers of it. As the Father sent him to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, so he sent them into all the world. [2] He had a power to send them equal to that which the Father had to send him. By the same authority that the Father sent me do I send you. Had he an incontestable authority, and an irresistible ability, for his work? so had they for theirs. As the Father hath sent me: by virtue of the authority given him as a Mediator, he gave authority to them, to act for him, and in his name, so that those who received them, or rejected them, received or rejected him, and him that sent him, ch. xiii. 20.

4. The qualifying of them (v. 22): He breathed on them, and said, Receive ye the Holy Ghost.

(1) The sign he used: He breathed on them; not only to show them, by this breath of life, that he himself was really alive, but to signify to them the spiritual life and power which they should receive from him. As the breath of the Almighty gave life to man and began the old world, so the breath of the mighty Saviour gave life to his ministers, and began a new world. The Spirit is the breath of Christ, proceeding from the Son. The breath of God is put for the power of his wrath, but the breath of Christ signifies the power of his grace; the breathing of threatenings is changed into the breathings of love by the mediation of Christ. The Spirit is the gift of Christ. The apostles communicated the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands, for they could only carry it as messengers; but Christ conferred the Holy Ghost by breathing, for he is the author of the gift.

(2) The solemn grant he made: "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." First, Christ hereby gives them assurance of the Spirit's aid in their future work: "I send you, and you shall have the Spirit to go along with you." Whom Christ employs he will clothe with his Spirit, and furnish with all needful powers. Secondly He hereby gives them experience of the Spirit's influences in their present case. He had shown them his hands and his side, to convince them of the truth of his resurrection. "Therefore receive ye the Holy Ghost, to work faith in you." They were now in danger of the Jews: "Therefore receive ye the Holy Ghost, to work courage in you." What Christ said to them he says to all true believers, Receive ye the Holy Ghost.

5. One particular branch of the power given them particularized (v. 23): "Whosesoever sins you remit, they are remitted to them; and whosesoever sins you retain, they are retained." How this follows upon their receiving the Holy Ghost; for, if they had not had an extraordinary spirit of discerning, they had not been fit to be entrusted with such an authority. Yet it must be understood as a general charter to the church and her ministers, encouraging the faithful stewards of the mysteries of God to stand to the gospel they were sent to preach, for that God himself will stand to it. Christ, being risen for our justification, sends his gospel heralds to proclaim the act of indemnity now passed. Those whom the gospel acquits shall be acquitted, and those whom the gospel condemns shall be condemned, which puts immense honour upon the ministry, and should put immense courage into ministers. Two ways, and both as having authority: (1) By sound doctrine. They are commissioned to tell the world that salvation is to be had upon gospel terms, and no other. (2) By a strict discipline, applying the general rule of the gospel to particular persons.

III. The incredulity of Thomas, which introduced Christ's second appearance.

1. Here is Thomas's absence, v. 24. He is said to be one of the twelve, though now eleven. They were but eleven, and one of them was missing: Christ's disciples will never be all together till the general assembly at the great day. By his absence he missed and saith, Receive ye the Holy Ghost—an earnest and first fruits of the more copious Pentecostal effusion.

22. he breathed on them—a symbolical conveyance to them of the Spirit.

Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them . . .—In any literal and authoritative sense this power was never exercised by one of the apostles, and plainly was never understood by themselves as possessed by them or conveyed to them. (See on Matthew 16:19.) The power to intrude upon the relation between men and God cannot have been given by Christ to His ministers in any but a ministerial or declarative sense—as the authorized interpreters of His word, while in the actings of His ministers, the real nature of the power committed to them is seen in the exercise of church discipline.

24-29. JESUS AGAIN APPEARS TO THE ASSEMBLED DISCIPLES. 24, 25. But Thomas (see on ch. 14: 16) . . . was not with them when Jesus came—why, we know not, though we are loath to think [with STIER, ALFORD and LUTHARDT] it was intentional,

ADAM CLARKE

21. Even so send I you. As I was sent to proclaim the truth of the Most High, and to convert sinners to God, I send you for the very same purpose, clothed with the very same authority, and influenced by the very same Spirit.

22. He breathed on them. Intimating, by this, that they were to be made new men, in order to be properly qualified for the work to which He had called them. For in this breathing He evidently alluded to the first creation of man, when God breathed into him the breath of lives, and he became a living soul, the breath or Spirit of God (ruach Elohim) being the grand principle and cause of his spiritual and divine life.

Receive ye the Holy Ghost. From this act of our Lord, the influences of the Holy Spirit on the souls of men have been termed His "inspiration"; from in, "into," and spiro, "I breathe." Every word of Christ which is received in the heart by faith comes accompanied by this divine breathing; and without this there is neither light nor life.

23. Whose soever sins ye remit. See the note on Matt. xvi. 19 and xviii. 18. It is certain God alone can forgive sins; and it would be not only blasphemous but grossly absurd to say that any creature could remit the guilt of a transgression which had been committed against the Creator. The apostles received from the Lord the doctrine of reconciliation and the doctrine of condemnation. They who believed on the Son of God, in consequence of their preaching, had their sins remitted; and they who would not believe were declared to lie under condemnation.

24. Thomas . . . called Didymus. See this name explained, chap. xi. 16. Was not with them. And by absenting himself from the company of the disciples he lost this precious opportunity of seeing and hearing Christ, and the satisfaction of seeing his Master risen, and of sharing with the disciples in their joy upon that occasion.

2. The account which the other disciples gave him, v. 25. They said unto him, We have seen the Lord. It seems, though Thomas was then from them, he was not long from them; absentees for a time must not be condemned as apostates for ever: Thomas is not Judas. With what exultation they speak it. "We have seen the Lord, and we wish thou hadst been here, to see him too." The disciples of Christ should endeavour to build up one another in their most holy faith, both by repeating what they have heard to those that were absent, and also by communicating what they have experienced. Those that by faith have seen the Lord, and tasted that he is gracious, should tell others what God has done for their souls; only let boasting be excluded.

3. The objections Thomas raised against the evidence. "Except I shall not only see in his hands the print of the nails, but put my finger into it, and thrust my hand into the wound in his side, I will not believe." Some conjecture him to have been a man of a rough, morose temper, apt to speak peevishly; for all good people are not alike happy in their temper. There was certainly much amiss in his conduct. He had either not heeded, or not duly regarded, what Christ had so often said, that he would rise again the third day. He did not pay a just deference to the testimony of his fellow-disciples. They all ten of them concurred in the testimony with great assurance; and yet he could not persuade himself to say that their record was true. It was not, however, their veracity that he questioned, but their prudence; he feared they were too credulous. He tempted Christ when he would be convinced by his own method, or not at all. Thomas ties up his faith to this evidence. Either he will be humoured, and have his fancy gratified, or he will not believe. The open avowal of this in the presence of the disciples was an offence and discouragement to them. As one coward makes many, so does one unbeliever, one sceptic. His proclaiming his infidelity, and that so peremptorily, might be of ill consequence to the rest.

Verses 26–31

We have here an account of another appearance of Christ, when Thomas was now with them.

I. When it was: After eight days, which must therefore be, as that was, the first day of the week.

1. He deferred his next appearance for some time, to show his disciples that he was as one that belonged to another world, and visited this only now and then, when there was occasion. In the beginning of his ministry he had been forty days unseen, tempted by the evil Spirit. In the beginning of his glory he was forty days, for the most part unseen, attended by good spirits.

2. He deferred it so long as seven days. That he might put a rebuke upon Thomas for his incredulity. He cannot have such another opportunity for several days. He that slips one tide must stay a good while for another. A very melancholy week Thomas had of it, while the other disciples were full of joy. That he might try the faith and patience of the rest. They had gained a great point when they were satisfied that they had seen the Lord. He would try whether they could keep the ground they had got. He would gradually wean them from his bodily presence, which they had depended too much upon. That he might put an honour upon the first day of the week, and give a plain intimation of his will, that it should be observed in his church as the Christian sabbath. The religious observance of that day has been thence transmitted down to us through every age of the church.

II. Where, and how, Christ made them this visit. It was at Jerusalem, for the doors were shut now, as before, for fear of the Jews. Thomas was with them; though he had withdrawn himself once, yet not a second time. When we have lost one opportunity, we should give the more earnest heed to lay hold on the next. It is a good sign if such a loss whet our desires, and a bad sign if it cool them. The disciples admitted him among them. They did not receive him to doubtful disputation, but bade him welcome to come and see. Christ did not appear to Thomas till he found him in society with the rest of his disciples. He would have all the disciples witnesses of the rebuke he gave to Thomas, and yet withal of the tender care he had of him. Christ came in among them, and stood in the midst. See the condescension of our Lord Jesus. For the benefit of his church, he lingered on earth, and visited the little private meetings of his poor disciples, and is in the midst of them. He saluted them all as he had done before; he said, Peace be unto you. This was no vain repetition, but from sullen despondency. The fact merely is here stated, as a loving apology for his slowness of belief. 25. We have seen the Lord—This way of speaking of Jesus (as vs. 20 and 21:7), so suited to His resurrection-state, was soon to become the prevailing style.

Except I see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe—The very form of this speech betokens the strength of the unbelief. "It is not, If I shall see I shall believe, but, Unless I shall see I will not believe; nor does he expect to see, although the others tell him they had" [BENGEL]. How Christ Himself viewed this state of mind, we know from Mark 16: 14, "He upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart because they believed not them which had seen Him after He was risen." But whence sprang this pertinacity of resistance in such minds? Not certainly from reluctance to believe, but as in Nathanael (see on ch. 1:46) from mere dread of mistake in so vital a matter.

26-29. And after eight days—i.e., on the eighth, or first day of the preceding week. They probably met every day during the preceding week, but their Lord designedly reserved His second appearance among them till the recurrence of His resurrection day, that He might thus inaugurate the delightful sanctities of THE LORD'S DAY (Rev. 1:10).

disciples were within, and Thomas with them . . . Jesus . . . stood in the midst, and said, Peace be unto you.

of receiving (at this time) the inestimable blessing of the Holy Ghost. Where two or three are assembled in the name of Christ, He is in the midst of them. Christ had said this before; Thomas should have remembered it, and not have forsaken the company of the disciples. What is the consequence? His unbelief becomes (1) Utterly unreasonable. Ten of his brethren witnessed that they had seen Christ, v. 15; but he rejected their testimony. (2) His unbelief became obstinate. He was determined not to believe on any evidence that it might please God to give him; he would believe according to his own prejudices, or not at all. (3) His unbelief became presumptuous. A view of the person of Christ will not suffice; he will not believe that it is He unless he can put his finger into the holes made by the nails in his Lord's hand, and thrust his hand into the wound made by the spear in His side. Thomas had lost much good, and gained much evil, and yet was insensible of his state. Behold the consequences of forsaking the assemblies of God's people! Jesus comes to the meeting—a disciple is found out of his place, who might have been there; and he is not only not blessed, but his heart becomes hardened and darkened through the deceitfulness of sin. It was through God's mere mercy that Thomas ever had another opportunity of being convinced of his error.

26. After eight days. It seems likely that this was precisely on that day on which Christ had appeared to them before, and from this we may learn that this was the weekly meeting of the apostles; and though Thomas was not found at the former meeting, he was determined not to be absent from this. According to His custom, Jesus came again; for He cannot forget His promise—two or three are assembled in His name, and He was engaged to be among them.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

On the second occasion Thomas is present, and he is the only one out of the eleven who is vexed with doubts. He cannot think it possible that the Lord Jesus, who was nailed to the cross, and whose side was pierced, could have really risen from the dead. Observe joyfully the Lord's patience with him. All the others had been doubtful too, and the Lord had gently upbraided them for their unbelief and the hardness of their hearts; but Thomas is not convinced by the tenfold testimony of his brethren, who each one well deserved his implicit confidence. After the plain way in which the Lord had told His disciples that He should be crucified and would rise again from the dead, they ought to have expected the resurrection; and inasmuch as they did not they were to be blamed: what shall we say of him who in addition to all this had heard the witness of his ten comrades who had actually seen the Lord? Yet there he is, the one doubter, the one sturdy questioner who has laid down most stringent requirements as to the only way in which he will be brought to believe. Will not his Lord be provoked by his obstinacy? See how patient Jesus is!

—The Treasury of the New Testament

significant of the abundant peace which Christ gives, and of the continuance of his blessings.

III. What passed between Christ and Thomas at this meeting; and that only is recorded.

1. Christ's gracious condescension to Thomas, v. 27. He singled him out from the rest: "Reach hither, thy finger, and behold my hands, the print of the nails; reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side." (1) An implicit rebuke of Thomas's incredulity, in the plain reference to what Thomas had said, answering it word for word. There is not an unbelieving word on our tongues, no, nor thought in our minds, but it is known to the Lord Jesus. (2) An express condescension to his weakness. He suffers his wisdom to be prescribed to. Christ is pleased here to accommodate himself even to Thomas's fancy in a needless thing, rather than leave him in his unbelief. He suffers his wounds to be raked into, allows Thomas even to thrust his hand into his side, if then at last he would believe. Thus, for the confirmation of our faith, he has instituted an ordinance on purpose to keep his death in remembrance. And in that ordinance wherein we show the Lord's death we are called, as it were, to put our finger into the print of the nails. Reach hither thy hand to him, who reacheth forth his helping, inviting, giving hand to thee.

It is an affecting word with which Christ closes up what he had to say to Thomas: Be not faithless but believing. This warning is given to us all: Be not faithless; for, if we are faithless, we are Christless and graceless, hopeless and joyless.

2. Thomas's believing consent to Jesus Christ. He is now ashamed of his incredulity, and cries out, My Lord and my God, v. 28. We are not told whether he did put his finger into the print of the nails. Christ says (v. 29), Thou hast seen, and believed; seeing sufficed. And now faith comes off a conqueror.

(1) Thomas is now fully satisfied of the truth of Christ's resurrection. His slowness and backwardness to believe may help to strengthen our faith.

(2) He therefore believed him to be Lord and God, and we are to believe him so. [1] We must believe his deity—that he is God; not a man made God, but God made man. [2] His mediation—that he is Lord, the one Lord, to settle the great concerns that lie between God and man, and to establish the correspondence that was necessary to our happiness.

(3) He consented to him as his Lord and his God. We must accept of Christ to be that to us which the Father hath appointed him. This is the vital act of faith, He is mine.

(4) He made an open profession of this. He says it to Christ, Thou art my Lord and my God; or, speaking to his brethren, This is my Lord and my God. Do we accept of Christ as our Lord God? We must go to him, and tell him so, tell others so, as those that triumph in our relation to Christ. Thomas speaks with an ardency of affection as one that took hold of Christ with all his might, My Lord and my God.

3. The judgment of Christ upon the whole (v. 29): "Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed; but blessed are those that have not seen, and yet have believed." Christ owns Thomas a believer. Sound and sincere believers, though they be slow and weak, shall be graciously accepted of the Lord Jesus. No sooner did Thomas consent to Christ than Christ gives him the comfort of it, and lets him know that he believes. He upbraids him with his former incredulity. He had been so backward to believe, and came so slowly to his own comforts. Those that in sincerity have closed with Christ see a great deal of reason to lament that they did not do it sooner. It was not without much ado that he was brought to believe at last. If no evidence must be admitted but that of our own senses, and we must believe nothing but what we ourselves are eye-witnesses of, how must the world be converted to the faith of Christ? He is therefore justly blamed for laying so much stress upon this.

He commends the faith of those who believe upon easier terms. Thomas, as a believer, was truly blessed; but rather blessed are those that have not seen Christ's miracles, and especially his resurrection; blessed are those that see not these, and yet believe in Christ. This may look forward upon those who should afterwards believe, the Gentiles, who had never seen Christ in the flesh. This faith is more praiseworthy than theirs who saw and believed. It evidences a better temper of mind in those that do believe. He that believes upon that sight has his resistance conquered by a sort of violence; but he that believes without it is more noble. It is a greater instance of the power of divine grace. Flesh and blood contribute more to their faith that see and believe, than to theirs who see not and yet believe.

IV. The remark which the evangelist makes like an historian drawing towards a conclusion, v. 30, 31.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

27. Then saith he to Thomas, Reach hither . . . behold . . . put it into my side, and be not faithless, but believing—"There is something rhythmical in these words, and they are purposely couched in the words of Thomas himself, to put him to shame" [LUTHARDT]. But with what condescension and gentleness is this done!

28. Thomas answered and said unto him, My Lord and my God—That Thomas did not do what Jesus invited him to do, and what he had made the condition of his believing, seems plain from vs. 29 ("Because thou hast seen Me, thou hast believed"). He is overpowered, and the glory of Christ now breaks upon him in a flood. His exclamation surpasses all that had been yet uttered, nor can it be surpassed by anything that ever will be uttered in earth or heaven. On the striking parallel in Nathanael, see on ch. 1:49. The Socinian invasion of the supreme divinity of Christ here manifestly taught—as if it were a mere call upon God in a fit of astonishment—is beneath notice, save for the profanity it charges upon this disciple, and the straits to which it shows themselves reduced.

29. because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed—words of measured commendation, but of indirect and doubtless painfully-felt rebuke: i.e., 'Thou hast indeed believed; it is well: it is only on the evidence of thy senses, and after peremptorily refusing all evidence short of that.'

blessed they that have not seen, and yet have believed—"Wonderful indeed and rich in blessing for us who have not seen Him, is this closing word of the Gospel" [ALFORD].

ADAM CLARKE

27. Then saith he to Thomas. Through His infinite compassion He addressed him in a particular manner, condescending in this case to accommodate himself to the prejudices of an obstinate, though sincere, disciple. Reach hither thy finger. And it is very probable that Thomas did so, for his unbelief was too deeply rooted to be easily cured.

28. Thomas answered. Those who deny the Godhead of Christ would have us to believe that these words are an exclamation of Thomas, made through surprise, and that they were addressed to the Father and not to Christ. However, a man must do violence to every rule of construction who can apply the address here to any but Christ. The text is plain: Jesus comes in—sees Thomas, and addresses him, desiring him to come to Him and put his finger into the print of the nails. Thomas, perfectly satisfied of the reality of our Lord's resurrection, said unto him, My Lord and my God. Thomas was the first who gave the title of God to Jesus; and by this glorious confession made some amends for his former obstinate incredulity.

29. Thomas. This word is omitted by almost every MS., version, and ancient commentator of importance.

Blessed are they. You have seen, and therefore you have believed, and now you are blessed; you are now happy—fully convinced of My resurrection. Yet no less blessed shall all those be who believe in My resurrection without the evidence you have had.

MATTHEW HENRY

1. He assures us that many other things occurred, which are not written in the book; many signs. There were other signs, many others, for the confirmation of our faith. Those that recorded the resurrection of Christ were not put to fish for evidence, to take up such short and scanty proofs as they could find, and make up the rest with conjecture. No, they had evidence enough and to spare. The disciples, in whose presence these other signs were done, were to be preachers of Christ's resurrection to others, and therefore it was requisite they should have proofs of it in abundance. We need not ask why they were not all written, or why not more than these, or others than these. Had this history been a mere human composition, it had been swelled with a multitude of depositions and affidavits, to prove the contested truth of Christ's resurrection; but, being a divine history, the penmen write with a noble security, sufficient to convince those that were willing to be taught and to condemn those that were obstinate in their unbelief; and, if this satisfy not, more would not. Men produce all they have to say, that they may gain credit; but God does not, for he can give faith. Had this history been written for the entertainment of the curious, it would have been more copious, but it was written to bring men to believe, and enough is said to answer that intention.

2. He instructs us in the design of recording what we do find here (v. 31): "That you might believe upon these evidences; that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God."

(1) The design of those that wrote the gospel. The evangelists wrote without any view of temporal benefit to themselves or others, but to bring men to Christ and heaven, and to persuade men to believe.

(2) The duty of those that read and hear the gospel. It is their duty to believe, to embrace, the doctrine of Christ. [1] What the great gospel truth is which we are to believe—that Jesus is that Christ, that Son of God. He is the Christ, anointed of God to be a prince and a Saviour. He is the Son of God, endued with the power of God and entitled to the glory of God. [2] What the great gospel blessedness is which we are to hope for—That believing we shall have life through his name. This is: To direct our faith. Life through Christ's name is what we must propose to ourselves as the fulness of our joy. To encourage our faith. Upon the prospect of some great advantage, men will venture far; and greater advantage there cannot be than that which is offered by the words of this life. It includes both spiritual life and eternal life. Both are through Christ's name and both indefeasibly sure to all true believers.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

30, 31. FIRST CLOSE OF THIS GOSPEL. The connection of these verses with the last words of vs. 29 is beautiful: i.e., And indeed, as the Lord pronounced them blessed who not having seen Him have yet believed, so for that one end have the whole contents of this Gospel been recorded, that all who read it may believe on Him, and believing, have life in that blessed name. 30. many other signs—miracles.

31. But these are written—as sufficient specimens. the Christ, the Son of God—the one His official, the other His personal, title. believing . . . may have life—(See on ch. 6:51-54).

ADAM CLARKE

30. Many other signs truly did Jesus. That is, besides the two mentioned here, vv. 19 and 26, viz., Christ's entering into the house in a miraculous manner twice, notwithstanding the doors were fast shut; see on v. 19. The other miracles which our Lord did, and which are not related here, were such as were necessary to the disciples only, and therefore not revealed to mankind at large.

31. That ye might believe. What is here recorded is to give a full proof of the divinity of Christ; that He is the promised Messiah; that He really suffered and rose again from the dead; and that through Him every believer might have eternal life.

We have here an account of Christ's appearance to his disciples at the sea of Tiberias. 1. Let us compare this appearance with those that went before. In those Christ showed himself to his disciples when they were met upon a Lord's day, and when they were all together; but in this he showed himself to some of them upon a week-day, when they were fishing. Christ has many ways of making himself known to his people; sometimes by his Spirit he visits them when they are employed in common business. 2. Let us compare it with that which followed at the mountain in Galilee, where Christ had appointed them to meet him, Matt. xxviii. 16. Now this appearance was while they were waiting for that, that they might not be weary of waiting.

I. Who they were to whom Christ now showed himself (v. 2): not to all the twelve, but to seven of them only. Nathanael is mentioned as one of them, whom we have not met with since ch. i. But some think he was the same with Bartholomew. It is good for the disciples of Christ to be much together; in common conversation, and about common business. Christ chose to manifest himself to them when they were together, that they might be joint witnesses of the same matter of fact. Thomas was one of them, and is named next to Peter, as if he now kept closer to the meetings of the apostles than ever.

II. How they were employed, v. 3.

1. Their agreement to go a-fishing. For my part, says Peter, I will go a-fishing; We will go with thee then, say they. Though commonly two of a trade cannot agree, yet they could. They did it, (1) To redeem time, and not be idle. The hour for entering upon action was not come. Now, in the meantime, rather than do nothing, they would go a-fishing; not for recreation, but for business. It is an instance likewise of their industry, and bespeaks them good husbands of their time. While they were waiting,

CHAPTER 21

Vss. 1-23. SUPPLEMENTARY PARTICULARS. (That this chapter was added by another hand has been asserted, against clear evidence to the contrary, by some late critics, chiefly because the Evangelist had concluded his part of the work with ch. 20:30, 31. But neither in the Epistles of the New Testament, nor in other good authors, is it unusual to insert supplementary matter, and so have more than one conclusion). 1, 2. Jesus showed—manifested—himself again . . . and on this wise he manifested himself—This way of speaking shows that after His resurrection He appeared to them but occasionally, unexpectedly, and in a way quite unearthly, though yet really and corporeally. 2. Nathanael—(See on Matt. 10:3).

3-6. Peter saith unto them, I go a fishing—(See on Luke 5:11).

1. Jesus shewed himself again. After that our Lord had appeared several times to the women, and to the apostles at Jerusalem, and at the tomb, He bade them go into Galilee, giving them the promise of meeting them there, Matt. xxviii. 7; Mark xvi. 7. This promise we find He fulfilled in the way John relates here. This was the seventh appearance of our Lord after the Resurrection. Matthew, chap. xxviii. 16, has but just mentioned it; of it the rest of the Evangelists say nothing, and this is the reason why John gives it so particularly.

3. Peter saith . . . I go a fishing. Previously to the crucifixion of our Lord, the temporal necessities of himself and His disciples appear to have been supplied by the charity of individuals, Luke viii. 3. As it is probable that the scandal of the Cross had now shut up this source of support, the disciples, not fully knowing how they were to be employed, purposed to return to their former occupation of fishing in order to gain a livelihood; and therefore they would not be idling. Those who would give an account of their time with joy should contrive to fill up the vacancies of it. (2) That they might help to maintain themselves and not be burdensome to any.

2. Their disappointment in their fishing. That night they caught nothing. The hand of the diligent often returns empty. Even good men may come short of desired success in their honest undertakings. Providence so ordered it that all that night they should catch nothing, that the miraculous draught of fishes in the morning might be the more acceptable. In those disappointments which to us are very grievous God has often designs that are very gracious.

III. After what manner Christ made himself known to them. It is said (v. 1), He showed himself. Four things are observable in the appearance of Christ to them:

1. He showed himself to them seasonably (v. 4): When the morning was now come, Jesus stood on the shore. Christ's time of making himself known to his people is when they are most at a loss. When they think they have lost themselves, he will let them know that they have not lost him. Christ appeared to them, not walking upon the water, but standing upon the shore, because now they were to make towards him. It is a comfort to us, when our passage is rough and stormy, that our Master is at shore, and we are hastening to him.

2. He showed himself to them gradually. The disciples knew not, all at once, that it was Jesus. Christ is often nearer to us than we think he is.

3. He showed himself to them by an instance of his pity, v. 5. He called to them, Children, "Lads have you any meat?" (1) The compellation is very familiar; he speaks unto them with the care and tenderness of a father: Children. They were not children in age, but they were his children, the children which God had given him. (2) The question is very kind: Have you any meat? The Lord is for the body, 1 Cor. vi. 13. Christ takes cognizance of the temporal wants of his people, and has promised them not only grace sufficient, but food convenient. Christ looks into the cottages of the poor, and asks, Children, have you any meat? Christ takes care of them, takes care for them. Christ has herein set us an example of compassionate concern for our brethren. There are many poor householders disabled for labour, or disappointed in it, that are reduced to straits, whom the rich should enquire after thus, Have you any meat? For the most necessitous are commonly the least clamorous. The disciples gave a short answer. They said, No. Christ put the question to them, not because he did not know their wants, but because he would know them from them. Those that would have supplies from Christ must own themselves empty and needy.

4. He showed himself to them by an instance of his power (v. 6): he ordered them to cast the net on the right side of the ship. And then they, who were going home empty-handed, were enriched with a great draught of fishes. (1) The orders Christ gave them, and the promise annexed to those orders: Cast the net there in such a place, and you shall find. Divine providence extends itself to things most minute, and they are happy that know how to take hints thence in the conduct of their affairs. (2) Their obedience of these orders, and the good success of it. As yet they knew not that it was Jesus; however, they were willing to be advised by anybody. In being thus observant of strangers, they were obedient to their Master unawares. And it sped wonderfully well; now they had a draught that paid them for all their pains. There is nothing lost by observing Christ's orders. Now the draught of fishes may be considered, [1] As a miracle in itself. Christ manifests himself to his people by doing that for them which none else can do. [2] As a mercy to them. When their ingenuity and industry failed them, the power of Christ came in opportunely for their relief. [3] As the memorial of a former mercy, with which Christ had formerly recompensed Peter for the loan of his boat, Luke v. 4, &c. Both that and this affected him much, as meeting him in his own element, in his own employment. Latter favours are designed to bring to mind former favours, that eaten bread may not be forgotten. [4] As a mystery, and very significant of that work to which Christ was now sending them forth. When, soon after this, three thousand were converted in one day, then the net was cast on the right side of the ship. It is an encouragement to Christ's ministers to continue their diligence in their work. One happy draught, at length, may be sufficient to repay many years of toil at the gospel net.

IV. How the disciples received this discovery, v. 7, 8.

1. John was the most intelligent and quick-sighted that night . . . caught nothing—as at the first miraculous draught (see on Luke 5:5); no doubt so ordered that the miracle might strike them the more by contrast. The same principle is seen in operation throughout much of Christ's ministry, and is indeed a great law of God's spiritual procedure with His people.

4. Jesus stood—(Cf. ch. 20:19, 26). but the disciples knew not it was Jesus—Perhaps there had been some considerable interval since the last manifestation, and having agreed to betake themselves to their secular employment, they would be unprepared to expect Him.

5. Children—This term would not necessarily identify Him, being not unusual from any superior; but when they did recognize Him, they would feel it sweetly like Himself. have ye any meat?—provisions, supplies, meaning fish.

They answered . . ., No—This was in His wonted style, making them tell their case, and so the better prepare them for what was coming.

6. he said unto them, Cast the net on the right side of the ship—no doubt, by this very specific direction, intending to reveal to them His knowledge of the deep and power over it.

ADAM CLARKE

the seven, mentioned in v. 2, embarked on the Sea of Tiberias, otherwise called the Sea of Galilee.

That night they caught nothing. God had so ordered it that they might be the more struck with the miracle which He afterwards wrought.

4. Knew not that it was Jesus. Probably because it was either not light enough, or He was at too great a distance, or He had assumed another form, as in Mark xvi. 12.

5. Children. A term of familiarity and affectionate kindness; it literally signifies "little children" or "beloved children." Any meat. Anything that is eaten with bread, or suchlike solid substances, to make the deglutition the more easy. Here it evidently means any kind of fish; and our Lord seems to have appeared at first in the character of a person who wished to purchase a part of what they had caught.

A. B. SIMPSON:

The command of Christ to cast the net on the other side and the immediate results in the miraculous draught of fishes reveal the Master. John is the first to recognize Him, because his spirit was the least clouded by unbelief, and Peter is the first to plunge for the shore. The other disciples followed in a little fishing boat, dragging the loaded net and landing it, with Peter's help, with its enormous store of great fishes, every one of which is safely landed and the net unbroken. All this is so different from the former miracle, where the net broke and the ship began to sink, and Peter in guilty awe begged the Master to depart from him because he felt unworthy of His presence, that it must itself have suggested to their minds the higher lessons it has taught the church of service for Christ and the church.

The chief of these lessons is the higher service upon which they were now to enter into fellowship with their risen Lord, and of which Peter, who had just dragged the net to land, was to be the first illustrious example, through his harvest of souls on the day of Pentecost. They were to learn the vanity and unselfishness of all their wisdom and strength in the Master's work, and the necessity of His presence and guidance as they cast the Gospel net into the sea of sinful men. Only as He stood upon the shore were they able to cast it upon the right side, and only as they spake and acted in fellowship with Him would they be able to bring to land the souls they sought to save. But henceforth that presence and power was to be their resource.—Christ in the Bible disciple. He whom Jesus loved was the first that said, It is the Lord. His secret is with his favourites. When John was himself aware that it was the Lord, he communicated his knowledge to those with him. Those that know Christ themselves should endeavour to bring others acquainted with him; we need not engross him, there is enough in him for us all. John tells Peter particularly, knowing he would be glad to see him above any of them.

2. Peter was the most zealous and warmhearted disciple; for as soon as he heard it was the Lord the ship could not hold him, but into the sea he throws himself that he might come first to Christ. He showed his respect to Christ by girding his fisher's coat about him, that he might appear before his Master in the best clothes he had, and he girt it to him that he might make the best of his way through the water to Christ. He showed the strength of his affection to Christ by casting himself into the sea; and either wading or swimming to shore, to come to him. He cast himself into the sea with precipitation; sink or swim, he would show his goodwill and aim to be with Jesus. Peter had had much forgiven, and made it appear he loved much by his willingness to run hazards, to come to him. Those that have been with Jesus will be willing to swim through a stormy sea to come to him.

3. The rest of the disciples were careful and honest hearted. They hastened in the boat to the shore, and made the best of their way (v. 8). (1) How variously God dispenses his gifts. Some excel, as Peter and John; are very eminent in gifts and graces; others are but ordinary disciples, that mind their duty, and are faithful to him, and yet both the one and the other, the eminent and the obscure, shall sit down together with Christ in glory; nay, and perhaps the last shall be first. Some, like John, are eminently contemplative, have great gifts of knowledge, and serve the church with them; others, like Peter, are eminently active and courageous, and are thus very serviceable to their generation. Some are useful as the church's eyes, others as the church's hands, and all for the good of the body. (2) What a great deal of difference there may be between some good people and others in the way of their honouring Christ, and yet both accepted of him. Peter ought not to be censured for casting himself into the sea, but commended for his zeal and the strength of his affection; and so must those be who, in love to Christ, quit the world, with Mary, to sit at his feet. But others serve Christ more in the affairs of the world. They continue in that ship, drag the net, and bring the fish to shore, as the other disciples here; and such ought not to be censured as worldly, for they, in their place, are as truly serving Christ as the other, even in serving tables. Christ was well placed with both, and so must we be.

V. What entertainment the Lord Jesus gave them.

1. He had provision ready for them. When they came to land, wet and cold, weary and hungry, they found a good fire there to warm them and dry them, and fish and bread. We need not be curious in enquiring whence this fire, and fish, and bread. Here was nothing stately or delicate. We should be content with mean things, for Christ was. We may be comforted in this instance of Christ's care of his disciples. He kindly provided for those fishermen, when they came weary from their work. It is encouraging to Christ's ministers that they may depend upon him who employs them to provide for them. Let them content themselves with what they have here; they have better things in reserve.

2. He called for some of that which they had caught, v. 10, 11.

(1) The command Christ gave them to bring their draught of fish to shore: "Bring of the fish hither, which you have now caught." He would have them eat the labour of their hands. What is got by God's blessing on our own industry and honest labour hath a peculiar sweetness in it. Christ would hereby teach us to use what we have. He would have them taste the gifts of his miraculous bounty. The benefits Christ bestows upon us are not to be buried and laid up, but to be used and laid out. He would give a specimen of the spiritual entertainment he has for all believers—that he sups with them, and they with him. Ministers, who are fishers of men, must bring all they catch to their Master.

(2) Their obedience to this command, v. 11. It was said (v. 6), They were not able to draw the net to shore, for the multitude of fishes. Thus the fishers of men, when they have enclosed souls in the gospel net, cannot bring them to shore, and complete the good work begun, without the continued influence of the divine grace. Who it was that was most active in landing the fishes: it was Peter, who, as in the former instance (v. 7), had shown a more

7-11. that disciple whom Jesus loved, said, It is the Lord—again having the advantage of his brother in quickness of recognition (see on ch. 20:8), to be followed by an alacrity in Peter all his own.

he was naked—his vest only on, worn next the body. cast himself into the sea—the shallow part, not more than a hundred yards from the water's edge (vs. 8), not meaning therefore to swim, but to get sooner to Jesus than in the full boat which they could hardly draw to shore.

8. the other disciples came in a little ship—by ship.

9. they saw—'see'—a fire of coals, and fish laid thereon, and bread—By comparing this with I Kings 19:6, and similar passages, the unseen agency by which Jesus made this provision will appear evident.

10. Jesus saith unto them, Bring of the fish ye have now caught—Observe the double supply thus provided—His and theirs. The meaning of this will perhaps appear presently.

ADAM CLARKE

7. His fisher's coat. Or "his upper coat." He was naked. He was only in his "vest." Naked is often used to signify the absence of this upper garment only. In 1 Sam. xix. 24, when Saul had put off his upper garments, he is said to have been "naked"; and David, when girded only with a linen ephod, is said to have been "uncovered," in 2 Sam. vi. 14, 20. Cast himself into the sea. It is likely that they were in very shallow water; and, as they were only 200 cubits from the land, it is possible that Peter only stepped into the water that he might assist them to draw the boat to land, which was now heavily laden.

8. Dragging the net. It is probable that this was that species of fishing in which the net was stretched from the shore out into the sea. The persons who were in the boat, and who shot the net, fetched a compass, and bringing in a hawser, which was attached to the other end of the net, those who were on shore helped them to drag it in. As the net was sunk with weights to the bottom, and the top floated on the water by corks, or pieces of light wood, all the fish that happened to come within the compass of the net were of course dragged to shore. The sovereign power of Christ had in this case miraculously collected the fish to that part where He ordered the disciples to cast the net.

9. They saw a fire. This appears to have been a new miracle. It could not have been a fire which the disciples had there, for it is remarked as something new. Besides, they had caught no fish, v. 5, and here was a small fish upon the coals, and a loaf of bread provided to eat with it. The whole appears to have been miraculously prepared by Christ.

6. For the multitude of fishes. This was intended as an emblem of the immense number of souls which should be converted to God by their ministry, according to the promise of Christ, Matt. iv. 19.

MATTHEW HENRY

zealous affection to his Master's person than any of them, so in this he showed a more ready obedience to his Master's command; but all that are faithful are not alike forward. The number of the fishes that were caught. They were in all a hundred and fifty and three, and all great fishes. A further instance of Christ's care of them: For all there were so many and great fishes too, yet was not the net broken; so that they lost none of their fish, nor damaged their net. The net of the gospel has enclosed multitudes, three thousand in one day, and yet is not broken; it is still as mighty as ever to bring souls to God.

3. He invited them to dinner. Observing that they were afraid to ask him, Who art thou? because they knew it was their Lord, he called to them very familiarly, Come and dine.

(1) See here how free Christ was with his disciples; he treated them as friends. Come, and dine with me. The call Christ gives his disciples into communion with him in grace here. Christ is a friend; come, dine with him, he will bid you welcome. The call he will give them into the fruition of him in glory hereafter. Christ has wherewithal to dine all his friends and followers; there is room and provision enough for them all.

(2) See how reverent the disciples were before Christ. They were somewhat shy of using the freedom he invited them to. None of them durst ask him, Who art thou? Either, because they would not be so bold with him. They had very good reason to think it was he, and could be no other. Or, because they would not so far betray their own folly. They must be stupid indeed if they questioned whether it was he or no. We should be ashamed of our distrusts. Groundless doubts must be stifled, and not started.

4. He carved for them, as the master of the feast, v. 13. He comes, and takes bread himself, and gives them, and fish likewise. The entertainment here was but ordinary; it was only a fish-dinner, plain and homely. Hunger is the best sauce. Christ showed himself alive by eating, not showed himself a prince by feasting. Christ himself began. He would show that he had a true body, which was capable of eating. The apostles produced this as one proof of his resurrection, that they had eaten and drank with him, Acts x. 41. He gave the meat about to all his guests. He not only provided it for them, but he himself divided it among them, and put it into their hands. Thus to him we owe the application, as well as the purchase, of the benefits of redemption.

The evangelist leave them at dinner, and makes this remark (v. 14): This is now the third time that Jesus showed himself alive to his disciples. Though he had appeared to Mary, to the women, to the two disciples, and to Cephas, yet he had but twice before this appeared to any company of them together. This is taken notice of, (1) For confirming the truth of his resurrection; the vision was doubled, was trebled, for the thing was certain. (2) As an instance of Christ's continued kindness to his disciples; once, and again, and a third time, he visited them. It is good to keep account of Christ's gracious visits. This is now the third; have we made a due improvement of the first and second? This is the third, perhaps it may be the last.

We have here Christ's discourse with Peter after dinner.

I. He examines his love to him, and gives him a charge concerning his flock, v. 15–17.

1. When Christ entered into this discourse with Peter.—It was after they had dined. Christ foresaw that what he had to say to Peter would give him some uneasiness. Peter was conscious to himself that he had incurred his Master's displeasure, and could expect no other than to be upbraided with his ingratitude. Twice, if not thrice, he had seen his Master since his resurrection, and he said not a word to him of it. We may suppose Peter full of doubts upon what terms he stood with his Master; sometimes hoping the best, yet not without some fears. But now, at length, his Master put him out of his pain. When they had dined together, in token of reconciliation, then discoursed he with him about it as with a friend. Peter had reproached himself for it, and therefore Christ did not reproach him for it. Being satisfied in his sincerity, the offence was not only forgiven, but forgotten; and Christ let him know that he was as dear to him as ever. Herein he has given us an encouraging instance of his tenderness towards penitents.

2. What was the discourse itself. Here was the same question three times asked, the same answer three times returned, and the same reply three times

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

11. Peter went up—into the boat; went aboard. and drew the net to land full of great fishes, an hundred and fifty and three; and for all there were so many, yet was not the net broken—The manifest reference here to the former miraculous draught (Luke 5:1-11) furnishes the key to this scene. There the draught was symbolical of the success of their future ministry: While "Peter and all that were with him were astonished at the draught of the fishes which they had taken, Jesus said unto him, Fear not, from henceforth thou shalt catch men." Nay, when first called, in the act of "casting their net into the sea, for they were fishers," the same symbolic reference was made to their secular occupation: "Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men" (Matt. 4:18, 19). Here, then, if but the same symbolic reference be kept in view, the design of the whole scene will, we think, be clear. The multitude and the size of the fishes they caught symbolically foreshadowed the vast success of their now fast approaching ministry, and this only as a beginning of successive draughts, through the agency of a Christian ministry, till, "as the waters cover the sea, the earth should be full of the knowledge of the Lord." And whereas, at the first miraculous draught, the net "was breaking" through the weight of what it contained—expressive of the difficulty with which, after they had "caught men," they would be able to retain, or keep them from escaping back into the world—while here, "for all they were so many, yet was not the net broken," are we not reminded of such sayings as these (chap. 10:28): "I give unto My sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of My hand" [LUTHARDT]? But it is not through the agency of a Christian ministry that all true disciples are gathered. Jesus Himself, by unseen methods, gathers some, who afterwards are recognized by the constituted fishers of men, and mingle with the fruit of their labors. And are not these symbolized by that portion of our Galilean repast which the fishers found, in some unseen way, made ready to their hand? 12-14. none ... durst ask him, Who art thou, knowing it was the Lord—implying that they would have liked Him just to say, "It is I"; but having such convincing evidence they were afraid of being "upbraided for their unbelief and hardness of heart" if they ventured to put the question. 13. Jesus ... taketh [the] bread, and giveth them, and [the] fish likewise—See on Luke 24:30.

14. This is the third time that Jesus showed himself—was manifested—to his disciples—His assembled disciples; for if we reckon His appearances to individual disciples, they were more.

when they had dined, Jesus saith—Silence appears to have reigned during the meal; unbroken on His part, that by their mute observation of Him they might have their assurance of His identity the more confirmed; and on theirs, from reverential shrinking to speak till He did.

ADAM CLARKE

12. Come and dine. Though this is the literal translation of the word, yet it must be observed that it was not dinner time, being as yet early in the morning, v. 4; but Kypke has largely shown that the original word is used by Homer, Xenophon, and Plutarch to signify "breakfast," or any early meal, as well as what we term "dinner." It might perhaps appear singular; otherwise it would be as agreeable to the use of the Greek word to have translated it, "Come and breakfast."

Durst ask him. Ever since the confession of Thomas, a proper awe of the deity of Christ had possessed their minds.

13. And giveth them. Eating likewise with them, as Luke expressly says, chap. xxiv. 43.

14. This is now the third time. That is, this was the third time He appeared unto the apostles when all or most of them were together. He appeared to ten of them, chap. xx. 19; again to eleven of them, v. 26; and at this time to seven of them, v. 2 of this chapter. But when the other Evangelists are collated we shall find that this was the seventh time in which He had manifested himself after He arose from the dead. (1) He appeared to Mary of Magdala, Mark xvi. 9; John xx. 15-16. (2) To the holy women who came from the tomb, Matt. xxviii. 9. (3) To the two disciples who went to Emmaus, Luke xxiv. 13, etc. (4) To Peter alone, Luke xxiv. 34. (5) To the ten, in the absence of Thomas, chap. xx. 19. (6) Eight days after to the eleven, Thomas being present, v. 26. (7) To the seven, mentioned in v. 2 of this chapter, which was between the eighth and fortieth day after His resurrection. Besides these seven appearances, He showed himself (8) to the disciples on a certain mountain in Galilee, Matt. xxviii. 16. If the appearance mentioned by Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 6, to upwards of 500 brethren at once—if this be not the same with His appearance on a mountain in Galilee, it must be considered the ninth. According to the same apostle, He was seen of James, 1 Cor. xv. 7, which may have been the tenth appearance. And after this to all the apostles when, at Bethany, He ascended to heaven in their presence. See Mark xvi. 19-20; Luke xxiv. 50-53; Acts i. 3-12; 1 Cor. xv. 7. This appears to have been the eleventh time in which He distinctly manifested himself after His resurrection. But there might have been many other manifestations which the Evangelists have not thought proper to enumerate, as not being connected with anything of singular weight or importance.

MATTHEW HENRY

given. The same thing was repeated by our Saviour, the more to affect Peter. It is repeated by the evangelist, the more to affect us, and all that read it.

(1) Three times Christ asks Peter whether he loves him or no. The first time the question is, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these? Now he calls him: Simon, son of Jonas. He speaks to him by name, the more to affect him, as Luke xxii. 31. Simon, Simon. He does not call him Cephas, nor Peter, the name he had given him, but his original name, Simon. Yet he gives him no hard language, but as he had called him when he pronounced him blessed, Simon Bar-jona, Matt. xvi. 17. How he catechises him: Lovest thou me more than these?

First, Lovest thou me? If we would try whether we are Christ's disciples indeed, this must be the enquiry, Do we love him? 1. His fall had given occasion to doubt of his love: "Peter, I have cause to suspect thy love; for if thou hadst loved me thou wouldst not have been ashamed and afraid to own me in my sufferings." We must not reckon it an affront to have our sincerity questioned, when we ourselves have done that which makes it questionable. The question is affecting: "Dost thou love me? Give but proof of this, and the affront shall be passed by, and no more said of it." Peter had professed himself a penitent, witness his tears; he was now upon his probation as a penitent; but the question is not, "Simon, how much hast thou wept?" but, "Dost thou love me?" It is this that will make the other expressions of repentance acceptable. Much is forgiven her, not because she wept much, but because she loved much. 2. His function would give occasion for the exercise of his love. Before Christ would commit his sheep to his care, he asked him, Lovest thou me? Christ has such a tender regard to his flock that he will not trust it with any but those that love him. Those that do not truly love Christ will never truly love the souls of men; nor will that minister love his work that does not love his Master. Nothing but the love of Christ will constrain ministers to go cheerfully through the difficulties and discouragements they meet with in their work. But this love will make their work easy, and them in good earnest in it.

Secondly, Lovest thou me more than these? 1. "Lovest thou me more than thou lovest these?" Dost thou love me more than thou dost James or John, or Andrew? Those do not love Christ aright that do not love him better than the best friend they have in the world. 2. "Lovest thou me more than these love me," more than any of the rest of the disciples love me? And then the question is intended to upbraid him with his vain-glorious boast, Though all men should deny thee, yet will not I. Or, to intimate to him that he had now more reason to love him than any of them had, for more had been forgiven to him than to any of them. It is no breach of the peace to strive which shall love Christ best.

Thirdly, The second and third time that Christ put this question, 1. He left out the comparison more than these, because Peter modestly left it out, not willing to compare himself with his brethren, much less to prefer himself before them. Though we cannot say, We love Christ more than others do, yet we shall be accepted if we can say, We love him indeed. 2. In the last he altered the word. In the first two enquiries, the original word is: Dost thou retain a kindness for me? In answer to which Peter uses another word, more emphatic, I love thee dearly. In putting the question the last time, Christ uses that word.

(2) Three times Peter returns the same answer to Christ: Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee. [1] Peter does not pretend to love Christ more than the rest of the disciples did. Though we must aim to be better than others, yet we must, in lowliness of mind, esteem others better than ourselves; for we know more evil of ourselves than we do of any of our brethren. [2] Yet he professes again and again that he loves Christ: Yea, Lord, surely I love thee. He had a grateful sense of his kindness, his desire was towards him, and his delight in him, as one he should be unspeakably happy in. This amounts to a profession of repentance for his sin, for it grieves us to have affronted one we love; and to a promise of adherence to him for the future: Lord, I love thee, and will never leave thee. Christ prayed that his faith might not fail (Luke xxii. 32), and, because his faith did not fail, his love did not; for faith will work by love. Christ puts his trial upon this issue: Dost thou love me? And Peter joins issue upon it: Lord, I love thee. [3] He appeals to Christ himself for the proof of it: Thou knowest that I love thee; and the third time yet more emphatically: Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee. He calls Christ himself to witness. Peter was sure that Christ knew all things, and particularly that he knew the heart.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

15. Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these?—referring lovingly to those sad words of Peter, shortly before denying his Lord, "Though all men shall be offended because of Thee, yet will I never be offended" (Matt. 26:33), and intending by this allusion to bring the whole scene vividly before his mind and put him to shame.

16. He saith to him . . . the second time . . . lovest thou me . . .—In this repetition of the question, though the wound was meant to be reopened, the words "more than these" are not repeated; for Christ is a tender as well as skilful Physician, and Peter's silence on that point was confession enough of his sin and folly. On Peter's repeating his protestation in the same words, our Lord rises higher in the manifestation of His restoring grace.

17. He saith unto him the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?

Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee—He adds not, "more than these," but prefixes a touching appeal to the Saviour's own omniscience for the truth of his protestation, which makes it a totally different kind of speech from his former.

ADAM CLARKE

15. Simon . . . lovest thou me? Peter had thrice denied his Lord, and now Christ gives him an opportunity in some measure to repair his fault by a triple confession. More than these? This was a kind of reproach to Peter. He had professed a more affectionate attachment to Christ than the rest; he had been more forward in making professions of friendship and love than any of the others; and no one (Judas excepted) had treated his Lord so basely. As he had before intimated that his attachment to his Master was more than that of the rest, our Lord now puts the question to him, "Dost thou love Me more than these?"

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

The qualifications for the doing of the work are then revealed. He said, "Simon, are you devoted to Me?" The word our Lord used is far more than emotional. It describes complete devotion. Simon dared not climb to the height of the word used by his Lord. He honestly replied that he loved Him, using the purely emotional word. He asked him again, "Are you devoted to Me?" and again he dared not climb. He said, "I love You." Then with infinite grace, the Lord came down to Simon's word, "Do you love Me?" Simon did not like that. He did not like Jesus coming down to the lower word. But still he used it, "Lord, Thou knowest all things, Thou knowest that I love Thee."

The qualifications, then, for feeding lambs and shepherding sheep is that of love of the Lord. But do not let us forget that the love He seeks is the love of absolute devotion.

—The Gospel According to John

To which Peter made the most modest reply—Thou knowest that I love thee, but no longer dwells on the strength of his love, nor compares himself with even the meanest of his brethren. He had before cast the very unkind reflection on his brethren, "Though all . . . be offended because of thee, yet will I never be offended," Matt. xxvi. 33. But he had now learned, by dreadful experience, that he who trusts his own heart is a fool; and that a man's sufficiency for good is of the Lord alone. The words more than these, Bishop Pearce thinks refer to the provisions they were eating, or to their secular employments. But it appears to me that our Lord refers to the profession made by Peter, which I have quoted above. It is remarkable that in these three questions our Lord uses the verb agapao, which signifies to "love affectionately, ardently, supremely, perfectly"; and that Peter always replies using the verb phileo, which signifies to "love," to "like," to "regard," to "feel friendship" for another. As if our Lord had said, "Peter, do you love Me ardently and supremely?" To which he answers, "Lord, I feel an affection for Thee—I do esteem Thee—but dare, at present, say no more."

MATTHEW HENRY

Peter was satisfied of this, that Christ, who knew all things, knew the sincerity of his love to him. It is a terror to a hypocrite to think that Christ knows all things. But it is a comfort to a sincere Christian. Christ knows us better than we know ourselves. Though we know not our own uprightness, he knows it. [4] He was grieved when Christ asked him the third time, Lovest thou me? v. 17. It put him in mind of his threefold denial of Christ. Every remembrance of past sins, even pardoned sins, renews the sorrow of a true penitent. It put him in fear lest his Master foresaw some further miscarriage of his. "Surely," thinks Peter, "my Master would not thus put me upon the rack if he did not see some cause for it. What would become of me if I should be again tempted?"

(3) Three times Christ committed the care of his flock to Peter: Feed my lambs; feed my sheep; feed my sheep. Those whom Christ committed to Peter's care were his lambs and his sheep. In this flock some are lambs, others are sheep. The Shepherd here takes care of both, and of the lambs first, for upon all occasions he showed a particular tenderness for them. The charge he gives him concerning them is to feed them. The word used in v. 15, 17, strictly signifies to give them food; but the word used in v. 16 signifies more largely to do all the offices of a shepherd to them. It is the duty of all Christ's ministers to feed his lambs and sheep. Feed them, that is, teach them. Feed them, that is, "Lead them to the green pastures, ministering all the ordinances to them. Feed them by personal application to their respective state and case; not only lay meat before them, but feed those with it that are wilful and will not, or weak and cannot feed themselves." But why did he give this charge particularly to Peter? The particular application to Peter here was designed to restore him to his apostleship, now that he repented. This commission given to Peter was an evidence that Christ was reconciled to him, else he would never have reposed such a confidence in him. Christ, when he forgave Peter, trusted him with the most valuable treasure he had on earth. It was designed to quicken him to a diligent discharge of his office as an apostle. Peter was always forward to speak and act, and, lest he should be tempted to take upon him the directing of the shepherds, he is charged to feed the sheep. If he will be doing, let him do this, and pretend no further. What Christ said to him he said to all his disciples; he charged them all, not only to be fishers of men by the conversion of sinners, but feeders of the flock, by the edification of saints.

II. Having confirmed to him the honour of an apostle, he now tells him of further preferment designed him—the honour of a martyr.

1. How his martyrdom is foretold (v. 18): Thou shalt stretch forth thy hands and another shall gird thee (as a prisoner that is pinioned) and carry thee whither thou wouldest not.

(1) He prefaces the notice he gives to Peter of his sufferings with a solemn asseveration, Verily, verily, I say unto thee. It was not spoken of as a thing probable, but as a thing certain, I say it to thee. As Christ foresaw all his own sufferings, so he foresaw the sufferings of all his followers. Having charged him to feed his sheep, he bids him not to expect ease and honour in it, but trouble and persecution.

(2) He foretells particularly that he should die by the hands of an executioner. The tradition of the ancients informs us that Peter was crucified at Rome under Nero. The pomp and solemnity of an execution add much to the terror of death. Death, in these horried shapes, has often been the lot of Christ's faithful ones. It was a violent death that he should be carried to, such a death as even innocent nature could not think of without dread. He that puts on the Christian does not put off the man. Christ himself prayed against the bitter cup. A natural aversion to pain and death is well reconcilable with a holy submission to the will of God in both.

(3) He compares this with his former liberty. "Time was when thou girdedst thyself and walkedst whither thou wouldest." Where trouble comes we are apt to fret the more at the grievances of restraint sickness, and poverty, because we have known the sweets of liberty, health, and plenty. But we may turn it the other way: "How many years of prosperity have I enjoyed more than I deserved and improved? And, having received good, shall I not receive evil also?" What a change may possibly be made with us, as to our condition in this world! What a change is presently made with those that leave all to follow Christ! They must no longer walk whither they will, but whither he will.

(4) Christ tells Peter he should suffer thus in his old age. His enemies would hasten him out of the

Peter was grieved because he said the third time . . . —This was the Physician's deepest incision into the wound, while yet smarting under the two former probings. Not till now would Peter discern the object of this succession of thrusts. The third time reveals it all, bringing up such a rush of dreadful recollections before his view, of his "thrice denying that he knew Him," that he feels it to the quick. It was fitting that he should; it was meant that he should. But this accomplished, the painful dialogue concludes with a delightful "Feed My sheep"; as if He should say, 'Now, Simon, the last speck of the cloud which overhung thee since that night of nights is dispelled: Henceforth thou art to Me and to My work as if no such scene had ever happened'

Feed—keep—my sheep—It has been observed that the word here is studiously changed, from one signifying simply to feed, to one signifying to tend as a shepherd, denoting the abiding exercise of that vocation, and in its highest functions.

He saith unto him, Feed my lambs—It is surely wrong to view this term as a mere diminutive of affection, and as meaning the same thing as "the sheep" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. It is much more according to usage to understand by the "lambs" young and tender disciples, whether in age or Christian standing (Isa. 40:11; I John 2:12, 13), and by the "sheep" the more mature. Shall we say (with many) that Peter was here reinstated in office? Not exactly, since he was not actually excluded from it. But after such conduct as his, the deep wound which the honor of Christ had received, the stain brought on his office, the damage done to his high standing among his brethren, and even his own comfort, in prospect of the great work before him, required some such renewal of his call and re-establishment of his position as this.

when . . . old thou shalt stretch forth thine hands—to be bound for execution, though not necessarily meaning on a cross. There is no reason, however, to doubt the very early tradition that Peter's death was by crucifixion.

18, 19. When thou wast young—embracing the whole period of life to the verge of old age. thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldest—wast thine own master.

ADAM CLARKE

There is another remarkable change of terms in this place. In vv. 15 and 17 our Lord uses the verb bosko, "to feed"; and in v. 16 He uses the word poimaino, which signifies to "tend a flock"—not only to "feed," but to "take care of, guide, govern, defend"—by which He seems to intimate that it is not sufficient merely to offer the Bread of Life to the congregation of the Lord, but he must take care that the sheep be properly collected, attended to, regulated, guided. Every spiritual shepherd of Christ has a flock, composed of lambs—"young converts"—and sheep—"experienced Christians"—to feed, guide, regulate, and govern. To be properly qualified for this, his wisdom and holiness should always exceed those of his flock.

18. Thou shalt stretch forth thy hands. Wetstein observes that it was a custom at Rome to put the necks of those who were to be crucified into a yoke, and to stretch out their hands and fasten them to the end of it; and having thus led them through the city they were carried out to be crucified. Thus then Peter was girded, chained, and carried whither he would not—not that he was unwilling to die for Christ, but he was a man—he did not love death, but he loved his life less than he loved his God.

world violently when he was about to retire out of it peaceably. God would shelter him from the rage of his enemies till he should come to be old, that he might be made the fitter for sufferings, and the church might the longer enjoy his services.

2. The explication of this prediction (v. 19), This spoke he to Peter, signifying by what death he should glorify God. It is not only appointed to all once to die, but it is appointed to each what death he shall die. There is one way into the world, but many ways out, and God has determined which way we should go. It is the great concern of every good man, whatever death he dies, to glorify God in it. When we die patiently, die cheerfully, and die usefully, we glorify God in dying. The death of the martyrs was in a special manner for the glorifying of God. The blood of the martyrs has been the seed of the church. Those who thereby at such an expense honour him he will honour.

3. The word of command he gives him hereupon: When he had spoken thus, he saith unto him, Follow me. This word, Follow me, was a further confirmation of his restoration to his Master's favour, for Follow me was the first call. It was an explication of the prediction of his sufferings. Follow me: "Expect to be treated as I have been, for the disciple is not greater than his Lord." It was to encourage him in faithfulness and diligence in his work as an apostle. He had told him to feed his sheep, and let him set his Master before him as an example. Herein they did follow him, and it was their present honour; who would be ashamed to follow such a leader? Hereafter they should follow him, and that would be their future happiness. Those that faithfully follow Christ in grace shall certainly follow him to glory.

I. The conference Christ had with Peter concerning John.

1. The eye Peter cast upon him (v. 20): Peter followed him, and turning about he sees the disciple whom Jesus loved following likewise. (1) How John is described. He does not name himself, but gives such a description of himself as sufficiently informs us whom he meant. He was the disciple whom Jesus loved. It is probable that mention is here made of John's having leaned on Jesus's breast and his enquiring concerning the traitor, which he did at the instigation of Peter (ch. xiii. 24), as a reason why Peter made the following enquiry concerning him. Then John was in the favourite's place, and he improved the opportunity to oblige Peter. And now that Peter was in the favourite's place, called to take a walk with Christ, he thought himself bound in gratitude to put such a question for John as he thought would oblige him, we all being desirous to know things to come. As we have interest at the throne of grace, we should improve it for the benefit of one another. This is the communion of saints. (2) What he did: He also followed Jesus; where he was there also would this servant of his be. What Christ said to Peter he took as said to himself; for that word of command, Follow me, was given to all the disciples. (3) The notice Peter took of it: He, turning about, seeth him. [1] A culpable diversion from following his Master. The best men find it hard to attend upon the Lord without distraction. A needless and unseasonable regard to our brethren often diverts us from communion with God. Or, [2] A laudable concern for his fellow-disciples. He was not so elevated with the honour his Master did him as to deny a kind look to one that followed.

2. The enquiry Peter made concerning him (v. 21): "Lord, and what shall this man do? What shall be his work, and his lot?" Now this may be taken as the language, (1) Of concern for John, and kindness to him. Here comes thy beloved disciple, hast thou nothing to say to him? Wilt thou not tell how he must be employed, and how he must be honoured? (2) Or of uneasiness at what Christ had said to him concerning his sufferings: "Lord, must I alone be carried whither I would not? Must this man have no share of the cross?" (3) Or of curiosity, and a fond desire of knowing things to come. It seems, by Christ's answer, there was something amiss in the question. He seems more concerned for another than for himself. So apt are we to be busy in other men's matters, but negligent in the concerns of our own souls—quick-sighted abroad, but dim-sighted at home. He seems more concerned about events than about duty. We need not ask, "What shall be the lot of those that shall come after us?" Scripture-predictions must be eyed for the directing of our consciences, not the satisfiying or our curiosity.

3. Christ's reply to this enquiry (v. 22), "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee. Follow

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

19. This spake he, signifying by what death he should glorify God—not, therefore, a mere prediction of the manner of his death, but of the honor to be conferred upon him by dying for his Master. And, indeed, beyond doubt, this prediction was intended to follow up his triple restoration:—'Yes, Simon, thou shalt not only feed My lambs, and feed My sheep, but after a long career of such service, shalt be counted worthy to die for the name of the Lord Jesus.'

And when he had spoken this, he saith unto him, Follow me—By thus connecting the utterance of this prediction with the invitation to follow Him, the Evangelist would indicate the deeper sense in which the call was understood, not merely to go along with Him at that moment, but to come after Him, "taking up his cross."

20, 21. Peter, turning about—showing that he followed immediately as directed. seeth the disciple whom Jesus loved following; which also leaned on Jesus' breast at supper, and said, Lord, which is he that betrayeth thee?—The Evangelist makes these allusions to the peculiar familiarity to which he had been admitted on the most memorable of all occasions, perhaps lovingly to account for Peter's somewhat forward question about him to Jesus; which is the rather probable, as it was at Peter's suggestion that he put the question about the traitor which he here recalls (ch. 13:24, 25).

21. Peter . . . saith to Jesus, Lord, and what shall this man do?—What of this man? or, How shall it fare with him?

ADAM CLARKE

19. Should glorify God. Ancient writers state that, about thirty-four years after this, Peter was crucified; and that he deemed it so glorious a thing to die for Christ that he begged to be crucified with his head downwards, not considering himself worthy to die in the same posture in which his Lord did.

Follow me. Whether our Lord meant by these words that Peter was to walk with Him a little way for a private interview, or whether He meant that he was to imitate His example, or be conformed to Him in the manner of His death, is very uncertain.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

The name before us is a name in which John felt himself most at home. No other title would so well describe him. His own name, "John," means the "gift of God," and he was a precious gift from God the Father to His suffering Son, and a great comfort to the Savior during the years of His abode among men. Jesus doubtless counted him to be His Jonathan, His John, His God gift, and He treasured him as such; but John does not so much think of his being of any service to his Lord as of that which his Lord had been to him. He calls himself "that disciple whom Jesus loved" because he recognized the delightful obligation which springs out of great love, and wished ever to be under its royal influence. He looked on Jesus' love as the source and root of everything about himself which was gracious and commendable. If he had any courage, if he had any faithfulness, if he had any depth of knowledge, it was because Jesus had loved these things into him. All the sweet flowers which bloomed in the garden of his heart were planted there by the hand of Christ's love, so when he called himself "that disciple whom Jesus loved," he felt that he had gone to the root and bottom of the matter, and explained the main reason of his being what he was.

This endearing name was very precious to him, because it evoked the sunniest memories of all his life. Those short years in which he had been with Jesus must have been looked upon by him in his old age with great transport, as the crown and glory of his earthly existence. I do not wonder that he saw Christ again in Patmos, after having seen Him once in Palestine as he did see Him; for such sights are very apt to repeat themselves. Such sights, I say; for John's view of his Lord was no ordinary one. There is at times an echo to sights as well as to sounds; and he who saw the Lord with John's eagle eye, with his deep-seated inner eye, was the likeliest man in all the world to see Him over again in vision as he did see Him amidst the rocks of the Aegean Sea. All the memories of the best part of his life were awakened by the name which he bore, and by its power he oft renewed that intimate communion with the living Christ which had lived on during the horrors of the crucifixion, and lasted to the end of his days. That charming name set all the bells of his soul a-ringing: does it not sound right musically?—"The disciple whom Jesus loved."

—The Treasury of the New Testament

thou me."

(1) There seems to be here an intimation of Christ's purpose concerning John. That he should not die a violent death, like Peter, but should tarry till Christ himself came by a natural death to fetch him to himself. The most credible of the ancient historians tell us that John was the only one of all the twelve that did not actually die a martyr. He at length died in his bed in a good old age. Though the crown of martyrdom is bright and glorious, yet the beloved disciple comes short of it.

(2) Others think that it is only a rebuke to Peter's curiosity. "Suppose I should design that John should never die, what does that concern thee? I have told thee how thou must die; it is enough for thee to know that, Follow thou me." It is the will of Christ that his disciples should mind their own present duty, and not be curious about future events concerning either themselves or others. There are many things we are apt to be solicitous about that are nothing to us. Other people's characters are nothing to us; it is out of our line to judge them. Other people's affairs are nothing to us to intermeddle in. What do you think will become of such and such? is a common question, which may easily be answered with another: What is that to me? To his own Master he stands or falls. Secret things belong not to us. The great thing that is all in all to us is duty, and not event; for duty is ours, events are God's. Now all our duty is summed up in this one of following Christ. And, if we will closely attend to the duty of following Christ, we shall find neither heart nor time to meddle with that which does not belong to us.

4. The mistake which arose from this saying of Christ, that that disciple should not die.

(1) The easy rise of a mistake in the church by misconstruing the sayings of Christ. Because John must not die a martyr, they conclude he must not die at all. They were inclined to expect it because they could not choose but desire it. We are apt to dote too much on men and means, instruments and external helps; whereas God will change his workmen, and yet carry on his work. There is no need of immortal ministers to be the guides of the church, while it is under the conduct of an eternal Spirit. Perhaps they were confirmed in their expectations when they now found that John survived all the rest of the apostles. However, it took rise from a saying of Christ's, misunderstood, and then made a saying of the church. Hence learn the uncertainly of human tradition, and the folly of building our faith upon it. Here was a tradition, an apostolical tradition, a saying that went abroad among the brethren. It was early; it was common; it was public; and yet it was false. Let the scripture be its own interpreter and explain itself. The aptness of men to misinterpret the sayings of Christ. The scriptures themselves have been wrested by the unlearned and unstable.

(2) The easy rectifying of such mistakes by adhering to the word of Christ. So the evangelist here corrects that saying among the brethren, by repeating the very words of Christ. He said, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? He said so, and no more. Let the words of Christ speak for themselves. The best end of men's controversies would be to keep to the express words of scripture. Scripture language is the safest and most proper vehicle of scripture truth. As the scripture itself is the best weapon wherewith to wound all dangerous errors, so the scripture itself is the best weapon-salve to heal the wounds that are made by different modes of expression concerning the same truths. Those that cannot agree in the same logic and metaphysics, may yet agree in the same scripture terms, and then may agree to love one another.

II. We have here the conclusion of this gospel, v. 24, 25.

1. This gospel concludes with an account of the penman of it (v. 24): This is the disciple which testifies of these things to the present age, and wrote these things for the benefit of posterity. Those who wrote the history of Christ were not ashamed to put their names to it. John here does in effect subscribe his name. The record of Christ's life and death was drawn up by men of known integrity, who were ready to seal it with their blood. Those who wrote the history of Christ wrote upon their own knowledge. The penman of this history was a disciple, one that had leaned on Christ's breast, that had himself heard his sermons, had seen his miracles, and the proofs of his resurrection. This is he who testifies what he was well assured of. Those who wrote the history of Christ, as they testified what they had seen, so they wrote what they had first testified. It was published by word of mouth, with the greatest assurance, before it was committed to writing. What they wrote they wrote as an affidavit, which they would abide by.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

22, 23. Jesus saith to him, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? follow thou me—From the fact that John alone of the Twelve survived the destruction of Jerusalem, and so witnessed the commencement of that series of events which belongs to "the last days," many good interpreters think that this is a virtual prediction of fact, and not a mere supposition. But this is very doubtful, and it seems more natural to consider our Lord as intending to give no positive indication of John's fate at all, but to signify that this was a matter which belonged to the Master of both, who would disclose or conceal it as He thought proper, and that Peter's part was to mind his own affairs. Accordingly, in "follow thou Me," the word "thou" is emphatic. Observe the absolute disposal of human life which Christ claims: "If I will that he tarry till I come . . . ."

23. Then went this saying abroad among the brethren, that that disciple should not die—into which they the more easily fell from the prevalent expectation that Christ's second coming was then near at hand. yet Jesus said not unto him, He shall not die—The Evangelist is jealous for His Master's honor, which his death might be thought to compromise if such a misunderstanding should not be corrected.

24, 25. FINAL CLOSE OF THIS GOSPEL. 24. This is the disciple which testifieth of these things, and wrote these things—thus identifying the author of this book with all that it says of this disciple.

ADAM CLARKE

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

We have in that majestic "If I will!" the revelation of the risen Christ as the Lord of life and death.

In His charge to Peter, Christ had asserted His right absolutely to control His servant's conduct and fix his place in the world, and His power to foresee and forecast his destiny and his end. But in these words He goes a step further. "I will that he tarry"; to communicate life and to sustain life is a divine prerogative; to act by the bare utterance of His will upon physical nature is a divine prerogative. Jesus Christ here claims that His will goes out with sovereign power among the perplexities of human history and into the depths of that mystery of life; and that He, the Son of Man, "quickens whom he will," and has power "to kill and to make alive." The words would be absurd, if not something worse, upon any but divine lips, that opened with conscious authority, and whose Utterer knew that His hand was laid upon the innermost springs of being.

So, in this entirely incidental fashion, you have one of the strongest and plainest instances of the quiet, unostentatious and habitual manner in which Jesus Christ claimed for himself properly divine prerogatives.

Remember that He who thus spoke was standing before these seven men there, in the morning light, on the beach, fresh from the grave. His resurrection had proved Him to be the Lord of death. He had bound it to His chariot wheels as a Conqueror. He had risen and He stood there before them with no more mark of the corruption of the grave upon Him than there are traces of the foul water in which a seabird may have floated, on its white wing that flashes in the sunshine as it soars. And surely as these men looked to Christ, "declared to be the Son of God with power, by his resurrection from the dead," they may have begun, however "foolish and slow of heart" they were "to believe," to understand that "to this end Christ both died and rose and revived, that he might be the Lord both of the dead and of the living," both of death and of life.

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

22. If I will that he tarry till I come. Augustine, Bede, and others understood the passage thus: If I will that he remain till I come and take him away by a natural death, what is that to you? Follow Me to your crucifixion. On this it may be observed that all antiquity agrees that John, if he did die, was the only disciple who was taken away by a natural death. Others imagine that our Lord was only now taking Peter aside to speak something to him in private, and that Peter, seeing John following, wished to know whether he should come along with them; and that our Lord's answer stated that John should remain in that place till Christ and Peter returned to him—and to this meaning of the passage many eminent critics incline. I rather lean to this opinion.

24. This is the disciple. It is, I think, very likely that these two verses were added by some of the believers at that time, as a testimony to the truth of the preceding narration; and I allow, with Bishop Pearce and others, that it is possible that John may mean himself when he says we know; yet I think that it is very unlikely.

It was graciously appointed that the history of Christ should be put into writing, that it might spread to every place, and last through every age.

2. It concludes with an attestation of the truth of what had been here related: We know that his testimony is true. The testimony of one who is an eye-witness, is of unspotted reputation, and puts it into writing for the greater certainty, is an unexceptionable evidence. We know, that is, All the world knows, that the testimony of such a one is valid. The truth of the gospel comes confirmed by all the evidence we can rationally desire or expect. Then let the doctrine recommend itself, and let the miracles prove it to be of God. It expresses the satisfaction of the churches at that time concerning the truth of what is here related. Not as if an inspired writing needed any attestation from men, but hereby they recommended it to the notice of the churches. Or, it expresses the evangelist's own assurance of the truth of what he wrote. The evangelists themselves were entirely satisfied of the truth of what they have testified and transmitted to us. They ventured both this life and the other upon it; threw away this life, and depended upon another.

3. It concludes with an et cetera, with a reference to many other things said and done by our Lord Jesus, v. 25. If they should be written at large, even the world itself could not contain the books that might be written. If it be asked why the gospels are not larger, it may be answered,

(1) It was not because they had exhausted their subject, and had nothing more to write that was worth writing. Everything that Christ said and did was worth our notice. His miracles were many, very many, of many kinds, and the same often repeated. The repetition of the miracles before a great variety of witnesses, helped very much to prove them true miracles. Every new miracle rendered the report of the former the more credible; and the multitude of them renders the whole report incontestable. When we speak of Christ, we have a copious subject before us; the reality exceeds the report, and, after all, the one half is not told us. St. Paul quotes one of Christ's sayings, which is not recorded by any of the evangelists (Acts xx. 35), and doubtless there were many more.

(2) But it was for these three reasons: Because it was not needful to write more. What is written is a sufficient revelation of the doctrine of Christ and the proof of it. If we do not believe and improve what is written, neither should we if there had been much more. It was not possible to write all. It would be such a large and overgrown history as never was; such as would jostle out all other writings, and leave us no room for them. It would have been an endless thing. It was not advisable to write much; for the world, in a moral sense, could not contain the books that should be written. The world could not contain. It is the word that is used, ch. viii. 37, "My word has no place in you." They would have been so many that they would have found no room. All people's time would have been spent in reading, and other duties would thereby have been crowded out. Much is overlooked of what is written, much forgotten, and much made the matter of doubtful disputation; this would have been the case much more if there had been such a world of books. Especially since it was requisite that what was written should be meditated upon and expounded, which God wisely thought fit to leave room for. Let us be thankful for the books that are written, and not prize them the less for their plainness and brevity, and long to be above, where our capacities shall be so elevated and enlarged that there will be no danger of their being over-loaded.

The evangelist, concluding with Amen, thereby sets to his seal, and let us set to ours, an Amen of faith, that it is true, all true; and an Amen of satisfaction in what is written, as able to make us wise to salvation. Amen; so be it.

we know that his testimony is true—(Cf. ch. 19:35).

25. And there are many other things which Jesus did—(Cf. ch. 20:30, 31).

if . . . written every one, I suppose—an expression used to show that what follows is not to be pressed too far. even the world itself would not hold the books . . .—not a mere hyperbolical expression, unlike the sublime simplicity of this writer, but intended to let his reader know that, even now that he had done, he felt his materials so far from being exhausted, that he was still running over, and could multiply "Gospels" to almost any extent within the strict limits of what "Jesus did." But in the limitation of these matchless histories, in point of number, there is as much of that divine wisdom which has presided over and pervades the living oracles, as in their variety and fulness.

ADAM CLARKE

ALBERT BARNES:

25. "Many other things." Many miracles (20:30). Many discourses delivered. "I suppose." This is evidently the figure of speech called a hyperbole. It is a mode of speech where the words express more or less than is literally true. It is common among all writers; and as the sacred writers, in recording a revelation to men, used human language, it was proper that they should express themselves as men ordinarily do if they wished to be understood. This figure of speech is commonly the effect of surprise, or having the mind full of some object, and not having words to express the ideas: at the same time, the words convey no falsehood. The statement is to be taken as it would be understood among the persons to whom it is addressed; and as no one supposes that the author means to be understood literally, so there is no deception in the case, and consequently no impeachment of his veracity or inspiration. Thus, when Longinus said of a man that "he was the owner of a piece of ground not larger than a Lacedaemonian letter," no one understood him literally. He meant, evidently, a very small piece of land, and no one would be deceived. So Virgil says of a man, "he was so tall as to reach the stars," and means only that he was very tall. So when John says that the world could not contain the books that would be written if all the deeds and sayings of Jesus were recorded, he clearly intends nothing more than that a great many books would be required, or that it would be extremely difficult to record them all; intimating that his life was active, that his discourses were numerous, and that he had not pretended to give them all, but only such as would go to establish the main point for which he wrote—that he was the Messiah (20:30, 31).—Popular Commentary

25. Could not contain. Origen's signification of the word is to "admit of" or "receive favorably." As if he had said, The miracles of Christ are so many, and so astonishing, that if the whole were to be detailed the world would not receive the account with proper faith; but enough is recorded that men may believe that Jesus is the Son of God, and that in believing they may have life through His name, chap. xx. 31. We have already seen that this apostle often uses the term world to designate the Jewish people only; and if it have this sense here, which is possible, it will at once vindicate the above exposition. As if he had said, Were I to detail all the signs and miracles which Jesus did among His disciples, and in the private families where He sojourned, the Jewish people themselves would not receive nor credit these accounts; but enough is written to prove that this Christ was the promised Messiah.

We have with an abundant satisfaction seen the foundation of our holy religion laid in the history of our blessed Savior. Upon this rock the Christian church is built. How it began to be built is recorded in the Acts.

The history of this book may be considered—

I. As looking back to the preceding gospels. The promises made in the gospels, we find made good in the Acts, particularly the great promises of the descent of the Holy Ghost. The powers lodged in them, we here find exerted in miracles wrought on the bodies of people—miracles of mercy, miracles of judgment, and much greater miracles wrought on the minds of people. The proofs of Christ's resurrection with which the gospels closed are here abundantly corroborated according to the word of Christ, that his resurrection should be the most convincing proof of his divine mission. Christ had told his disciples that they should be his witnesses, and this book brings them in witnessing for him. That dayspring from on high the first appearing of which we there discerned, we here find shining more and more. The kingdom of heaven, which was then at hand, is here set up. Christ's predictions of the virulent persecutions which the preachers of the gospel should be afflicted with we here find abundantly fulfilled, and also the assurances he gave them of extraordinary supports and comforts under their sufferings. This latter part of the history of the New Testament exactly answers to the word of Christ in the former part of it: and thus they mutually confirm and illustrate each other.

II. As looking forward to the following epistles. This book introduces them and is a key to them. We are members of the Christian church, that "tabernacle of God among men." Now this book gives us an account of the framing and rearing of that tabernacle. The four gospels showed us how the foundation of that house was laid; this shows us how the superstructure began to be raised among the Jews, the Samaritans, and the Gentiles.

Two things more are to be observed concerning this book: (1) The penman of it. It was written by Luke, who wrote the third of the four gospels, which bears his name. This Luke was very much a companion of Paul in his services and sufferings. "Only Luke is with me" (2 Tim. 4:11). We may know by his style in the latter part of this book when and where he was with him, for then he writes, We did so and so (16:10; 20:6). (2) The title of it: The Acts of the Apostles. (a) It is the history of the apostles; yet there is in it the history of Stephen, Barnabas, and some other apostolic men. It is the history of Peter and Paul only that is here recorded; Peter the apostle of the circumcision, and Paul the apostle of the Gentiles (Gal. 2:7). (b) It is called their acts, or doings. The apostles were active men; and though the wonders they did were by the word, yet they are fitly called their acts; they spoke and it was done.

CHAPTER 1

Verses 1–5

I. Theophilus is put in mind, and we in him, of St. Luke's gospel, which it will be of use for us to cast an eye upon.

1. His patron, to whom he dedicates this book, is Theophilus, v. 1. The directing some of the books of the scripture so is an intimation to each of us to receive them as if directed to us in particular, to us by name.

2. His gospel is here called the former treatise which he had made. He made the former treatise, and now is divinely inspired to make this, for Christ's scholars must go on towards perfection, and not think that their former labours will excuse them from further labours. St. Luke, because he had laid the foundation in a former treatise, will build upon it in this. Let not new sermons and new books make us forget old ones, but put us in mind of them, and help us to improve them.

3. The contents of his gospel were that, all that, which Jesus began both to do and teach. (1) Christ both did and taught. Those are the best ministers began to do and teach—a very important statement, dividing the work of Christ into two great branches: the one embracing His work on earth, the other His subsequent work from heaven;

CHAPTER 1

1. The former treatise. The Gospel according to Luke, which is here most evidently intended. O Theophilus. See the note on Luke i. 3. To do and teach. These two words comprise His miracles and sermons.

MATTHEW HENRY

that both do and teach, whose lives are a constant sermon. (2) He began both to do and teach; he laid the foundation. His apostles were to carry on and continue what he began. Christ set them in, and then left them to go on, but sent his Spirit to empower them. It is a comfort to those who are endeavouring to carry on the work of the gospel that Christ himself began it. (3) The four evangelists, and Luke particularly, have handed down to us all that Jesus began both to do and to teach; not all the particulars; but all the heads, that by them we may judge of the rest.

4. The period of the evangelical story is fixed to the day in which he was taken up, v. 2. Then it was that he left this world, and his bodily presence was no more in it.

II. The truth of Christ's resurrection is maintained and evidenced, v. 3. The great evidence of his resurrection was that he showed himself alive to his apostles; and he was seen of them. 1. The proofs were infallible, both that he was alive (he walked and talked with them, he ate and drank with them) and that it was he himself, and not another; for he showed them again and again the marks of the wounds in his hands, and feet, and side. 2. They were many, and often repeated: He was seen by them forty days, not constantly residing with them, but frequently appearing to them.

III. A general hint given of the instructions he furnished his disciples with. He instructed them concerning the work they were to do: He gave commandments to the apostles whom he had chosen. Those whom he elected into the apostleship expected he should give them preferments, instead of which he gave them commandments. He gave them commandments through the Holy Ghost. In giving them the Holy Ghost, he gave them his commandments; for the Comforter will be a commander. He instructed them concerning the doctrine they were to preach: He spoke to them of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God. He had given them a general idea of that kingdom, but here he instructed them more in the nature of it, as a kingdom of grace in this world and of glory in the other, to prepare them to receive the Holy Ghost, and to go through that which they were designed for. It was one of the proofs of Christ's resurrection; the disciples, to whom he showed himself alive, knew that it was he, not only by what he showed them, but by what he said to them. None but he could speak thus clearly, thus fully, of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God.

IV. A particular assurance given them that they should now shortly receive the Holy Ghost (v. 4, 5).

1. The command he gives them to wait. This was to raise their expectations. They must wait till the time appointed, which is now not many days hence. Those that by faith hope promised mercies will come must with patience wait till they do come. They must wait in the place appointed, in Jerusalem. There Christ was put to shame, there he will have this honour done him, and this favour is done to Jerusalem to teach us to forgive our enemies and persecutors. The apostles were now to put on a public character. Jerusalem was the fittest candlestick for those lights to be set up in.

2. The assurance he gives them that they shall not wait in vain.

(1) The blessing designed them shall come: You shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost. They had already been breathed upon with the Holy Ghost (John xx. 22), and they had found the benefit of it; but now they shall have larger measures of his gifts, graces, and comforts. "You shall be cleansed and purified by the Holy Ghost," as the priests were baptized and washed with water, when they were consecrated to the sacred function: "They had the sign; you shall have the thing signified. You shall hereby be more effectually than ever engaged to your Master. You shall be tied so fast to Christ that you shall never forsake him again."

(2) Now this gift of the Holy Ghost he speaks of,

[1] As the promise of the Father, which they had heard of him, and might therefore depend upon. First, The Spirit was given by promise. The Spirit of God is not given as the spirit of men is given us, but by the word of God. That the gift may be the more valuable. That it may be the more sure. That it may be of grace, and may be received by faith. As Christ, so the Spirit, is received by faith. Secondly, It was the promise of the Father,—of Christ's Father; of our Father. He will give the Spirit as the Father of mercies; it is the promise of the Father. Thirdly, This promise of the Father they had heard from Christ many a time. He assured them, again and again, that the Comforter should come. This confirms the promise of God that we have heard it from Jesus Christ.

[2] As the prediction of John Baptist (v. 5): "You

the one in His own Person, the other by His Spirit; the one the "beginning," the other the continuance of the same work; the one complete when He sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high, the other to continue till His second appearing; the one recorded in "The Gospels," the beginnings only of the other related in this book of "The Acts." "Hence the grand history of what Jesus did and taught does not conclude with His departure to the Father; but Luke now begins it in a higher strain; for all the subsequent labors of the apostles are just an exhibition of the ministry of the glorified Redeemer Himself, because they were acting under His authority, and He was the principle that operated in them all" [OLSHAUSEN].

3-5. showed himself alive—As the author is about to tell us that "the resurrection of the Lord Jesus" was the great burden of apostolic preaching, so the subject is here fitly introduced by an allusion to the primary evidence on which that great fact rests, the repeated and undeniable manifestations of Himself in the body to the assembled disciples, who, instead of being predisposed to believe it, had to be overpowered by the resistless evidence of their own senses, and were slow of yielding even to this (Mark 16:14). after his passion—or, suffering. This primary sense of the word "passion" has fallen into disuse; but it is nobly consecrated in the phraseology of the Church to express the Redeemer's final endurances. seen of them forty days—This important specification of time occurs here only.

after he, through the Holy Ghost, had given commandments . . .—referring to the charge recorded in Matthew 28:18-20; Mark 16:15-18; Luke 24:44-49. It is worthy of notice that nowhere else are such communications of the risen Redeemer said to have been given "through the Holy Ghost." In general, this might have been said of all He uttered and all He did in His official character; for it was for this very end that God "gave not the Spirit by measure unto Him" (John 3:34). But after His resurrection, as if to signify the new relation in which He now stood to the Church, He signalized His first meeting with the assembled disciples by breathing on them (immediately after dispensing to them His peace) and saying, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost," thus anticipating the donation of the Spirit from His hands (see on John 20:21, 22); and on the same principle His parting charges are here said to have been given "through the Holy Ghost," as if to mark that He was now all redolent with the Spirit; that what had been husbanded, during His suffering work, for His own necessary uses, had now been set free, was already overflowing from Himself to His disciples, and needed but His ascension and glorification to flow all forth. (See on John 7:39.) speaking of—rather 'speaking'—the things pertaining to the kingdom of God—till now only in germ, but soon to take visible form; the earliest and the latest burden of His teaching on earth. 4. should not depart from Jerusalem—because the Spirit was to glorify the existing economy, by descending on the disciples at its metropolitan seat, and at the next of its great festivals after the ascension of the Church's Head; in order that "out of Zion might go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem" (Isa. 2: 3; and cf. Luke 24:49). 5. ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence—ten days hence, as appears from Leviticus 23:15, 16; but it was expressed thus indefinitely to exercise their faith.

ADAM CLARKE

3. To whom . . . he shewed himself alive . . . by many infallible proofs. By many proofs of such a nature, and connected with such circumstances, as to render them indubitable; for this is the import of the Greek word.

4. And, being assembled together. Instead of "being assembled together," several good MSS. and versions read "living or eating together," which refers the conversation reported here to some particular time when He sat at meat with His disciples.

Pertaining to the kingdom of God. Whatever concerned the doctrine, discipline, and establishment of the Christian Church.

5. Ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence. John baptized with water, which was a sign of penitence, in reference to the remission of sin; but Christ baptizes with the Holy Ghost, for the destruction of sin, the illumination of the mind, and the consolation of the heart.

The promise of the Father. The Holy Spirit, which indeed was the grand promise of the New Testament, as Jesus Christ was of the Old. How properly do we still pray, and how necessary is the prayer, "Cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of thy Holy Spirit, that we may perfectly love thee, and worthily magnify thy name, through Jesus Christ our Lord! Amen."—Communion Service. Ye have heard of me. In His particular conversations with His disciples, such as those related in John xiv. 16-26; xv. 26; xvi. 7-15.

MATTHEW HENRY

have not only heard it from me, but you had it from John; he said (Matt. iii. 11), I indeed baptize you with water, but he that comes after me shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost." It is a great honour that Christ now does to John. Thus he confirmeth the word of his servants, his messengers. But Christ can do more than any of his ministers. It is an honour to them to be employed in dispensing the means of grace, but it is his prerogative to give the Spirit of grace.

(3) Now this gift of the Holy Ghost thus promised is that which we find the apostles received in the next chapter, for in that this promise had its full accomplishment. Other scriptures speak of the gift of the Holy Ghost to ordinary believers; this speaks of that particular power which the first preachers of the gospel were endued with. By virtue of this promise we receive the New Testament as of divine inspiration.

Verses 6–11

They came together to be the witnesses of his ascension.

I. The question they asked him at this interview. Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel? Two ways this may be taken:

1. "Surely thou wilt not at all restore it to the present rulers of Israel. What! Shall those that hate and persecute thee and us be trusted with power?" Or rather,

2. "Surely thou wilt now restore it to the Jewish nation, as far as it will submit to thee." Now two things were amiss in this question:

(1) Their expectation of the thing itself. They thought Christ would restore the kingdom to Israel, whereas Christ came to set up his own kingdom, and that a kingdom of heaven, not to restore the kingdom to Israel, an earthly kingdom. See here, [1] How apt even good men are to place the happiness of the church too much in external pomp and power. We are told to expect the cross in this world, and to wait for the kingdom in the other world. [2] How apt we are to retain what we have imbibed, and how hard it is to get over the prejudices of education. The disciples were long before they could be brought to have any idea of his kingdom as spiritual. [3] How naturally we are biased in favour of our own people. The kingdoms of this world were to become his whether Israel should sink or swim. [4] How apt we are to misunderstand scripture and to expound scripture by our schemes, whereas we ought to form our schemes by the scriptures.

(2) Their enquiry concerning the time of it: "Lord, wilt thou do it at this time?" They were inquisitive into that which their Master had never encouraged them to enquire into. They were impatient for the setting up of that kingdom in which they promised themselves so great a share. Christ had told them that they should sit on thrones (Luke xxii. 30), and now nothing will serve them but they must be in the throne immediately.

II. The check which Christ gave to this question, v. 7: It is not for you to know the times and seasons. That mistake would soon be rectified by the pouring out of the Spirit, after which they never had any more thoughts of the temporal kingdom. There is a sense of the expectation which is true, the setting up of the gospel kingdom in the world. But he checks their enquiry after the time.

1. The knowledge of this is not allowed to them: It is not for you to know. (1) Christ is now parting from them, and yet he gives them this rebuke; a caution to his church to take heed of splitting upon the rock which was fatal to our first parents—an inordinate desire of forbidden knowledge. (2) Christ had given his disciples a great deal of knowledge above others. He here lets them understand that there were some things which it was not for them to know. We shall see how little reason we have to be proud of our knowledge when we consider how many things we are ignorant of. (3) Christ had given his disciples instructions sufficient for the discharge of their duty, and in this knowledge he will have them to be satisfied. (4) Christ had himself told his disciples the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, and had promised that the Spirit should show them things to come. He had likewise given them signs of the times. But they must not expect nor desire to know either all the particulars of future events or the exact times of them. As to the times and seasons of the year, we know, in general, there will be summer and winter counterchanged, but we know not particularly which day will be fair or which foul, either in summer or in winter. What this or that particular day will bring forth we cannot tell, but must accommodate ourselves to it, whatever it is, and make the best of it.

2. The knowledge of it is reserved to God; it is

A. B. SIMPSON:

He was to be a Person as real as Christ himself. It is not something that we receive from God in this deeper life, but somebody who comes to make himself known to us, to make himself real to us, and to be in us the source of all our strength and happiness.

He was to come as the Spirit of power. Man is the weakest of beings, weaker than the elements around him, weaker even than the brutes over whom he was sent to exercise dominion. But the Holy Ghost comes to give him power, to make his life effectual, and when the Holy Spirit comes into our life He does something. He accomplishes something. He is more than a sentiment, a feeling, a fancy. He is an infinite force that makes our life powerful, and enables us to accomplish all for which we are called as the disciples of Christ. It is power over sin, power over self, power over the world, power over sickness, power over Satan, power to be, to do, to suffer, and to overcome.
—Christ in the Bible

6-8. wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?—Doubtless their carnal views of Messiah's kingdom had by this time been modified, though how far it is impossible to say. But, as they plainly looked for some restoration of the kingdom to Israel, so they are neither rebuked nor contradicted on this point.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The promise of this great gift, the nature of which they but dimly knew, set the Apostles' expectations on tiptoe, and they seem to have thought that their reception of it was in some way the herald of the establishment of the messianic kingdom. So it was, but in a very different fashion from their dream. They had not learned so much from the forty days' instructions concerning the kingdom as to be free from their old Jewish notions, which color their question, "Wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" They believed that Jesus could establish His kingdom when He would. They were right, and also wrong—right, for He is King; wrong, for its establishment is not to be effected by a single act of power, but by the slow process of preaching the gospel.

Our Lord does not deal with their misconceptions which could only be cured by time and events; but He lays down great principles, which we need as much as the Eleven did. The "times and seasons," the long stretches of days, and the critical epoch-making moments, are known to God only; our business is not to speculate curiously about these, but to do the plain duty which is incumbent on the Church at all times. The perpetual office of Christ's people to be His witnesses, their equipment for that function (the power of the Holy Spirit), and the sphere of their work (namely, in ever-widening circles, Jerusalem, Samaria, and the whole world) are laid down, not for the first hearers only, but for all ages and for each individual, in these last words of the Lord as He stood on Olivet, ready to depart.—Expositions of Holy Scripture

7. It is not for you to know the times . . .—implying not only that this was not the time, but that the question was irrelevant to their present business and future work.

ADAM CLARKE

6. At this time restore again the kingdom. That the disciples, in common with the Jews, expected the Messiah's kingdom to be at least in part secular, I have often had occasion to note. In this opinion they continued less or more till the Day of Pentecost, when the mighty outpouring of the Holy Spirit taught them the spiritual nature of the kingdom of Christ. The Kingdom had now for a considerable time been taken away from Israel; the Romans, not the Israelites, had the government. The object of the disciples' question seems to have been this: to gain information, from their all-knowing Master, whether the time was now fully come in which the Romans should be thrust out and Israel made, as formerly, an independent kingdom.

7. The times or the seasons. Times here may signify any large portion of a period, era, or century; and seasons, the particular part, season, or opportunity in that period in which it might be proper to do any particular work.

what the Father hath put in his own power. None besides can reveal the times and seasons to come. He has not thought fit to let you know the times and seasons. He hath not said that he will not give you to know something more than you do of the times and seasons, but he has put it in his own power to do it or not, as he thinks fit.

III. He appoints them their work, and with authority assures them of success in it. "Know this (v. 8) that you shall receive a spiritual power, by the descent of the Holy Ghost upon you, you shall be witnesses unto me; and your testimony shall be received here in Jerusalem, in the country about, and all the world over," v. 8. If Christ make us serviceable to his honour in our own day and generation, let this be enough for us. Christ here tells them,

1. That their work should be honourable and glorious: You shall be witnesses unto me. They shall proclaim him king. They must openly and solemnly preach his gospel to the world. They shall confirm their testimony, not as witnesses do, with an oath, but with the divine seal of miracles and supernatural gifts: You shall be martyrs to me; for they attested the truth of the gospel with their sufferings, even unto death.

2. That their power for this work should be sufficient. They had not strength of their own for it, nor wisdom nor courage enough. "But you shall receive the power of the Holy Ghost coming upon you. You shall have power to preach the gospel, and to confirm it both by miracles and by sufferings." Those whom he employs in his service he will qualify for it.

3. That their influence should be great and very extensive: "You shall be witnesses: In Jerusalem; there you must begin. Your light shall thence shine throughout all Judæa. Thence you shall proceed to Samaria. Your usefulness shall reach to the uttermost part of the earth."

IV. Having left these instructions with them, he leaves them (v. 9): When he had spoken these things he blessed them (so we were told, Luke xxiv. 50); and while they beheld him, he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight. He began his ascension in the sight of his disciples, even while they beheld. They saw him go up towards heaven, and had actually their eye upon him with so much care and earnestness of mind that they could not be deceived. He vanished out of their sight, in a cloud. It was a bright cloud that overshadowed him in his transfiguration, and most probably this was so, Matt. xvii. 5. By the clouds there is a sort of communication kept up between the upper and lower world; in them the vapours are sent up from the earth, and the dews sent down from heaven. Fitly therefore does he ascend in a cloud who is the Mediator between God and man, by whom God's mercies come down upon us and our prayers come up to him. This was the last that was seen of him.

V. The disciples, when he had gone out of their sight, yet still continued looking up steadfastly to heaven (v. 10). 1. Perhaps they hoped that Christ would come back to them again, so much did they still dote upon his bodily presence, though he had told them that it was expedient for them that he should go away. 2. Perhaps they expected to see some change in the visible heavens now upon Christ's ascension. Christ had told them that hereafter they should see heaven opened (John i. 51), and why should not they expect it now?

VI. Two angels appeared to them. To show how much Christ had at heart the concerns of his church on earth, he sent back to his disciples two of those that came to meet him, who appear as two men in white apparel. Now we are told what the angels said to them, 1. To check their curiosity: You men of Galilee, why stand you gazing up into heaven? What would you see? You have seen all that you were called together to see, and why do you look any further? Why stand you gazing? Christ's disciples should never stand at a gaze, because they have a sure rule to go by. 2. To confirm their faith concerning Christ's second coming. Their Master had often told them of this: "This same Jesus, who is taken up from you into heaven will come in like manner thence, as you have seen him go thither." (1) "This same Jesus, who came once in disgrace to be judged, will come again in glory to judge." (2) "He shall come in like manner. He is gone away in a cloud. You have now lost the sight of him in the clouds; and whither he is gone you cannot follow him now, but shall then." When we stand gazing and trifling, the consideration of our Master's second coming should quicken and awaken us; and, when we stand gazing and trembling, the consideration of it should comfort and encourage us.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

8. receive power—See Luke 24:49. and ye shall be witnesses unto me . . . in Jerusalem . . . in all Judea . . . and unto the uttermost part of the earth—This order of apostolic preaching and success supplies the proper key to the plan of the Acts, which relates first the progress of the Gospel "in Jerusalem, and all Judea and Samaria" (ch. 1 to ch. 9), and then "unto the uttermost part of the earth" (ch. 10 to ch. 28).

9-11. while they beheld, he was taken up—See on Luke 24:50-53. Lest it should be thought He had disappeared when they were looking in some other direction, and so was only concluded to have gone up to heaven, it is here expressly said that "while they were looking He was taken up, and a cloud received Him out of their sight." So Elijah, "If thou see me when I am taken from thee" (II Kings 2:10); "And Elisha saw it" (vs. 12). (See on Luke 9:32.)

10. while they looked steadfastly toward heaven—following Him with their eager eyes, in rapt amazement. Not, however, as a mere fact is this recorded, but as a part of that resistless evidence of their senses on which their whole subsequent testimony was to be borne.

two men in white apparel—angels in human form, as in Luke 24:4. 11. Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven . . .—'as if your now glorified Head were gone from you never to return: He is coming again; not another, but "this same Jesus"; and "as ye have seen Him go, in the like manner shall He come"—as personally, as visibly, as gloriously; and let the joyful expectation of this coming swallow up the sorrow of that departure.'

ADAM CLARKE

8. But ye shall receive power. Translating different terms of the original by the same English word is a source of misapprehension and error. We must not understand dynamis, which we translate power in this verse, as we do exousia, translated by the same word in the preceding verse. In the latter, God's infinite "authority" over all times and seasons, and His uncompellable liberty of acting or not acting in any given case, are particularly pointed out. In the other, the "energy" communicated by Him to His disciples through which they were enabled to work miracles is particularly intended; and dynamis, in general, signifies such power. The disciples were to be made instruments in the establishment of the kingdom of Christ, but this must be by the energy of the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven. Ye shall be witnesses. Though the word earth is often used to denote Judea alone, yet here it is probable it is to be taken in its largest extent. All the inhabitants of the globe might at that period be considered divisible into three classes: (1) The Jews, who adhered to the law of Moses and the prophetic writings, worshipping the true God only and keeping up the Temple service as prescribed in their law; (2) The Samaritans, a mongrel people who worshipped the God of Israel in connection with other gods, 2 Kings xvii. 5, etc., and who had no kind of religious connection with the Jews; and (3) the Gentiles, the heathens through all other parts of the world, who were addicted to idolatry alone and had no knowledge of the true God. By the terms in the text we may see the extent to which this commission of instruction and salvation was designed to reach: to the Jews, to the Samaritans, and to the uttermost part of the earth, i.e., to the Gentile nations. Thus, to the whole human race the gospel of the Kingdom was to be proclaimed.

9. He was taken up. He was speaking face-to-face with them, and while they beheld, he was taken up. He began to ascend to heaven, and they continued to look after Him till a cloud received him out of their sight—till He had ascended above the region of the clouds, by the density of which all further distinct vision was prevented.

10. Looked stedfastly. Keeping their eyes intensely fixed on their ascending Lord, continuing to look even after He had ascended above the region of the inferior clouds.

Two men stood by them. Doubtless angels in human shape. In white apparel. As emblematical of their purity, happiness, and glory.

MATTHEW HENRY

Verses 12–14

I. When Christ ascended—from the mount of Olives (v. 12). There he began his sufferings, and therefore there he rolled away the reproach of them by his glorious ascension. Thus would he enter upon his kingdom in the sight of Jerusalem. This mount is here said to be near Jerusalem, a sabbath day's journey from it; no further than devout people used to walk out on a sabbath evening, after the public worship was over, for meditation. Some reckon it a thousand paces; some seven furlongs. Thus far it is a rule to us, not to journey on the sabbath any more than in order to the sabbath work; and as far as is necessary to this we are not only allowed, but enjoined.

II. Whither the disciples returned: They came to Jerusalem, according to their Master's appointment. It should seem that though immediately after Christ's resurrection they were watched, yet after it was known that they were gone into Galilee no notice was taken of their return to Jerusalem. God can find out hiding-places for his people in the midst of their enemies. At Jerusalem they went up into an upper room, and there abode. There they assembled every day, in expectation of the descent of the Spirit. They were continually in the temple (Luke xxiv. 53), but that was in the courts of the temple, at the hours of prayer, where they could not be hindered from attending; but, it should seem, this upper room was in a private house.

III. Who the disciples were, that kept together. The eleven apostles are here named (v. 13), so is Mary the mother of our Lord (v. 14), and it is the last time that ever any mention is made of her. There were others, the brethren of our Lord, and, to make up the hundred and twenty spoken of (v. 15), we may suppose that all or most of the seventy disciples were with them.

IV. How they spent their time: They all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication. They prayed, and made supplication. All God's people are praying people. It was now a time of trouble and danger, and, Is any afflicted? Let him pray. They had new work before them, and, before they entered upon it, they were instant in prayer to God. Before they were first sent forth Christ spent time in prayer for them, and now they spent time in prayer for themselves. Those are in the best frame to receive spiritual blessings that are in a praying frame. God will be enquired of for promised mercies, and the nearer the performance seems to be the more earnest we should be in prayer for it. They continued in prayer. It is said (Luke xxiv. 53), They were praising and blessing God; here, They continued in prayer and supplication. Praise for the promise is a decent way of begging for the performance, and praise for former mercy of begging further mercy. They did this with one accord. Those who so keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace are best prepared to receive the comforts of the Holy Ghost.

The sin of Judas made a vacancy in the college of the apostles. If they were but eleven, it would occasion everyone to enquire what had become of the twelfth; therefore care was taken, to fill up the vacancy.

I. The persons concerned in this affair. The house consisted of about a hundred and twenty. This was the number of the names, that is, the persons. Here was the beginning of the Christian church: this hundred and twenty was the grain of mustard-seed that grew into a tree, the leaven that leavened the whole lump. The speaker was Peter, who had been, and still was, the most forward man. Peter, being designed to be the apostle of the circumcision, while the sacred story stays among the Jews, he is still brought in, as afterwards, when it comes to speak of the Gentiles, it keeps to the story of Paul.

II. The proposal which Peter made for the choice of another apostle. He stood up in the midst of the disciples, v. 15.

1. The account he gives of the vacancy made by the death of Judas, in which he is very particular, and takes notice of the fulfilling of the scriptures in it.

(1) The power to which Judas had been advanced (v. 17): He was numbered with us, and had obtained part of this ministry. What will it avail us to be added to the number of Christians, if we partake not of the spirit and nature of Christians?

(2) The sin of Judas. He was guide to those that took Jesus. He had the impudence to appear openly at the head of the party that seized him. He went before them to the place, and gave the word of command: That same is he, hold him fast. Ringleaders in sin are the worst of sinners.

(3) The ruin of Judas by this sin. Perceiving the went up into an upper room—perhaps the same "large upper room" where with their Lord they had celebrated the last Passover and the first Supper (Luke 22:12). where abode—not lodged, but had for their place of rendezvous. Peter . . .—See on Matthew 10:2-4.

14. continued with one accord—knit by a bond stronger than death. in prayer and supplication—for the promised baptism, the need of which in their orphan state would be increasingly felt. and Mary the mother of Jesus—distinguished from the other "women," but "so as to exclude the idea of her having any pre-eminence over the disciples. We find her with the rest in prayer to her glorified Son" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. This is the last mention of her in the New Testament. The fable of the Assumption of the Virgin has no foundation even in tradition [ALFORD]. with his brethren—See on John 7:3-5.

15-26. in those days—of expectant prayer, and probably towards the close of them, when the nature of their future work began more clearly to dawn upon them, and the Holy Ghost, already "breathed" on the Eleven (John 20:22), was stirring in Peter, who was to be the leading spirit of the infant community (Matt. 16:19). the number . . . about an hundred and twenty—Many, therefore, of the "500 brethren" who saw their risen Lord "at once" (I Cor. 15:6), must have remained in Galilee.

ADAM CLARKE

13. They went up into an upper room. This was either a room in the Temple or in the house of one of the disciples, where this holy company was accustomed to meet. In Luke xxiv. 53, it is said that, after their return from Mount Olivet, "they were continually in the temple, praising and blessing God." It is probable, therefore, that the upper room mentioned in this verse is that apartment of the Temple mentioned above. But still it is not certain that this place should be so understood, as we have the fullest proofs that the upper rooms in private houses were used for the purpose of reading the law and conferring together on religious matters. Add to this that the room here mentioned seems to have been the place where all the apostles lodged, and therefore most probably a private house.

14. These . . . continued . . . in prayer and supplication. Waiting for the promise of the Father, according to the direction of our Lord, Luke xxiv. 49. The words and supplication are omitted by some MSS. With the women. Probably those who had been witnesses of His resurrection, with the immediate relatives of the apostles. Peter we know was married, Matt. viii. 14, and so might others of the disciples; and therefore the wives of the apostles, as well as of other pious men, may be here intended.

15. In the midst of the disciples. But instead of this, brethren is the reading of some MSS. This seems the best reading because of what immediately follows; for it was not among the disciples merely that He stood, but among the whole company, which amounted to 120. It is remarkable that this was the number which the Jews required to form a council in any city; and it is likely that in reference to this the disciples had gathered together, with themselves, the number of 120, chosen out of the many who already had been converted by the ministry of our Lord, the 12 disciples, and the 70 whom He had sent forth to preach, Luke x. 1, etc. Thus they formed a complete council in presence of which the important business of electing a person in the place of Judas was to be transacted.

17. Obtained part of this ministry. "He obtained the lot of this ministry"—not that he or any of the twelve apostles were chosen to this ministry by lot; but as "lot" signifies the portion a man has in life, what comes to him in the course of the divine providence, or as an especial gift of God's goodness, it is used here, as in many other parts of the sacred writings, to signify office or station.

chief priests to seek the life of Christ and his disciples, he thought to save his by going over to them, and not only so, but to get an estate under them. [1] He lost his money shamefully enough (v. 18): He purchased a field with the thirty pieces of silver, which were the reward of his iniquity. He thought to have purchased a field for himself, but it proved the purchase of a field to bury strangers in; and what was he or any of his the better for this?

[2] He lost his life more shamefully. We were told (Matt. xxvii. 5) that he went away in despair; here it is added, he fell headlong. He burst asunder in the midst, so that all his bowels tumbled out. Bowelling is part of the punishment of traitors.

(4) The public notice that was taken of this: It was known to all the dwellers in Jerusalem. It was, as it were, put into the newspapers, and was all the talk of the town, as a remarkable judgment of God upon him that betrayed his Master, v. 19. It was in everybody's mouth, and nobody disputed the truth of the fact. It was known, that is, it was known to be true. Here is one proof of the notoriety of the thing mentioned, that the field was called Aceldama —the field of blood, because it was bought with the price of blood.

(5) The fulfilling of the scriptures in this, that it must needs be fulfilled, v. 16. Let none be surprised nor stumble at it, for David had not only foretold his sin, but had also foretold his punishment: Let his habitation be desolate. The substitution of another in his room. His bishopric, or his office shall another take. We are not to think the worse of any office that God has instituted either for the wickedness of any that are in that office or for the ignominious punishment of that wickedness; nor will God suffer any purpose of his to be frustrated, or any work of his to be undone, for the miscarriages of those that are entrusted therewith. Judas is hanged, but his bishopric is not lost. Christ's cause shall never be lost for want of witnesses.

2. The motion he makes for the choice of another apostle, v. 21, 22. (1) How the person must be qualified that must fill up the vacancy. It must be one of these men that have companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John, unto that same day that he was taken up from us. Those that have been diligent in the discharge of their duty in a lower station, are fittest to be preferred to a higher; those that have been faithful in a little shall be entrusted with more. None shall be an apostle but one that has companied with the apostles, and that continually. (2) To what work he is called. He must be a witness with us of his resurrection. By this it appears that others of the disciples were with the eleven when Christ appeared to them. The great thing which the apostles were to attest to the world was Christ's resurrection. See what the apostles were ordained to, not to a secular dignity and dominion, but to preach Christ, and the power of his resurrection.

TODAY'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE:

Judas, son of Simon (John 6:71; 13:2, 26), surnamed Iscariot—i.e., a man of Kerioth (Josh. 15:25). His name is uniformly the last in the list of the apostles, as given in the synoptic (i.e., the first three) Gospels. The evil of his nature probably gradually unfolded itself till "Satan entered into him" (John 13:27), and he betrayed our Lord (18:3, 5). Afterward he owned his sin with "an exceeding bitter cry," and cast the money he had received as the wages of his iniquity down on the floor of the sanctuary, and "departed and went and hanged himself" (Matt. 27:5). He perished in his guilt, and went "to his own place" (Acts 1:25). The statement in Acts 1:18 that he "falling headlong, burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out" is in no way contrary to that in Matt. 27:5. The suicide first hanged himself, perhaps over the valley of Hinnom, "and the rope giving way, or the branch to which he hung breaking, he fell down headlong on his face, and was crushed and mangled on the rocky pavement below."

Why such a man was chosen to be an apostle we do not know, but it is written that "Jesus knew from the beginning who should betray him" (John 6:64). Nor can any answer be satisfactorily given to the question as to the motives that led Judas to betray his Master. Of the motives that have been assigned we need not care to fix on any one as that which simply led him on. Crime is, for the most part, the result of a hundred motives rushing with bewildering fury through the mind of the criminal.

18. falling headlong . . .—This information supplements, but by no means contradicts, what is said in Matthew 27:5.

20. his bishopric—or 'charge.' The words are a combination of Psalms 69:25 and 109:8; in which the apostle discerns a greater than David, and a worse than Ahithophel and his fellow conspirators against David.

21. all the time the Lord Jesus went in and out among us—in the close intimacies of a three years' public life.

22. Beginning from the baptism of John—by whom our Lord was not only Himself baptized, but first officially announced and introduced to his own disciples. unto that same day when he was taken up from us, must one be ordained to be a witness with us of his resurrection—How clearly is the primary office of the apostles here expressed: (1) to testify, from personal observation, to the one great fact of "the resurrection of the Lord Jesus"; (2) to show how this glorified His whole previous life, of which they were constant observers, and established His divine claims.

ADAM CLARKE

18. Purchased a field with the reward of iniquity. Probably Judas did not purchase the field himself, but the money for which he sold his Lord was thus applied; see Matt. xxvii. 6-8. It is possible, however, that he might have designed to purchase a field or piece of ground with this reward of his iniquity, and might have been in treaty for it, though he did not close the bargain, as his bringing the money to the treasury proves. The priests, knowing his intentions, might have completed the purchase, and, as Judas was now dead, applied the field thus bought for the burial of strangers, i.e., Jews from foreign parts, or others who, visiting Jerusalem, had died there. Though this case is possible, yet the passage will bear a very consistent interpretation without the assistance of this conjecture; for in ordinary conversation we often attribute to a man what is the consequence of his own actions, though such consequence was never designed nor wished for by himself. Thus we say of a man embarking in a hazardous enterprise, "He is gone to seek his death"; of one whose conduct has been ruinous to his reputation, "He has disgraced himself"; of another who has suffered much in consequence of his crimes, "He has purchased repentance at a high price." All these, though undesigned, were consequences of certain acts, as the buying of the field was the consequence of Judas' treason. And falling headlong, he burst asunder. It is very likely that the eighteenth and nineteenth verses are not the words of Peter, but of the historian Luke, and should be read in a parenthesis; then the seventeenth and twentieth verses will make a connected sense.

19. It was known unto all the dwellers at Jerusalem. The repentance of Judas, his dying testimony in behalf of our Lord's innocence, and his tragic death were publicly known, as was also the transaction about the purchase of the field; and hence arose the name by which it was publicly known. That field is called in their proper tongue, Aceldama. This proper tongue was not the Hebrew; that had long ceased to be the proper tongue in Palestine. It was a sort of Chaldaio-Syriac which was commonly spoken.

16. The Holy Ghost by the mouth of David. This is a strong attestation to the divine inspiration of the Book of Psalms. They were dictated by the Holy Spirit and spoken by the mouth of David.

20. For it is written in the book of Psalms. The places usually referred to are Ps. lxix. 25: "Let their habitation be desolate; and let none dwell in their tents"; and Ps. cix. 8: "Let his days be few; and let another take his office," pekudato, "his overseership, his charge of visitation or superintendence"—translated by the Septuagint, ten episcopen, and Vulgate, episcopatum; and we, following both, bishopric, but not with sufficient propriety. For surely the office or charge of Judas was widely different from what we call bishopric, the diocese, estate, and emoluments of a bishop. Episcopos, which was corrupted by our Saxon ancestors into biscop, and by us into "bishop," signifies literally an "overseer or superintendent."

21. Which have companied with us. They judged it necessary to fill up this blank in the apostolate by a person who had been an eyewitness of the acts of our Lord. Went in and out. A phrase which includes all the actions of life.

22. Beginning from the baptism of John. From the time that Christ was baptized by John in Jordan, for it was at that time that His public ministry properly began. Must one be ordained. This translation misleads every reader who cannot examine the original text. There is no term for ordained in the Greek; "to be" is the only word in the verse to which this interpretation can be applied. The New Testament printed at London, by Robert Barker, the king's printer, in 1615, renders this and the preceding verse more faithfully and more clearly than our common version: "Wherefore of these men who have companied with us, all the time that the Lord Jesus was conversant among us, beginning from the baptism of John unto the day he was taken up from us, must one of them be made a witness with us of his resurrection." The word ordained would naturally lead most readers to suppose that some ecclesiastical rite was used

III. The nomination of the person that was to succeed Judas.

1. Two, who were known to have been Christ's constant attendants, were set up as candidates for the place (v. 23): They appointed two. The two they nominated were Joseph and Matthias, of neither of whom do we read elsewhere. These two were both of them so well qualified for the office, that they could not tell which of them was the fitter, but all agreed it must be one of these two.

2. They applied to God by prayer for direction, which of these two? v. 24, 25. (1) They appeal to God as the searcher of hearts: "Thou, Lord, who knowest the hearts of all men." When an apostle was to be chosen he must be chosen by his heart and the temper and disposition of that. It is comfortable to us, in our prayers for the welfare of the church and its ministers, that the God to whom we pray knows the hearts of all men, can make them fit for his purpose by giving them another spirit. (2) They desire to know which of these God had chosen: Lord, show us this. It is fit that God should choose his own servants. (3) They are ready to receive him as a brother whom God hath chosen, to take part of this ministry and apostleship from which Judas by transgression fell, that he might go to his own place, the place of a traitor, the fittest place for him. Those that betray Christ, as they fall from the dignity of relation to him, so they fall into all misery. Our Saviour had said that Judas's own place should be such that it had been better for him that he had never been born (Matt. xxvi. 24).

(4) The doubt was determined by lot (v. 26), which is an appeal to God, and lawful to be used for determining matters not otherwise determinable, provided it be done in a solemn religious manner, and with prayer, the prayer of faith. Thus the number of the apostles was made up.

23. they appointed—'put up' in nomination; meaning not the Eleven but the whole company, of whom Peter was the spokesman. two—The choice would lie between a very few.

24. prayed and said, Thou, Lord . . .—"The word 'Lord,' placed absolutely, denotes in the New Testament almost universally THE SON; and the words, 'Show whom Thou hast chosen,' are decisive. The apostles are just Christ's messengers: It is He that sends them, and of Him they bear witness. Here, therefore, we have the first example of a prayer offered to the exalted Redeemer; furnishing indirectly the strongest proof of His divinity" [OLSHAUSEN]. which knowest the hearts of all men—See John 2:24, 25; 21:15-17; Revelation 2:23. 25. that he might go to his own place—A euphemistic or softened expression of the awful future of the traitor, implying not only destined habitation but congenial element.

on the occasion, such as imposition of hands, although nothing of the kind appears to have been employed.

23. They appointed two. These two were probably of the number of the seventy disciples, and in this respect well fitted to fill up the place. It is likely that the disciples themselves were divided in opinion which of these two was the most proper person, and therefore laid the matter before God, that He might decide it by the lot. No more than two candidates were presented, probably because the attention of the brethren had been drawn to those two alone, as having been most intimately acquainted with our Lord, or in being better qualified for the work than any of the rest.

24. Thou, Lord, which knowest the hearts. "Searcher of hearts" seems to be used here as an attribute of God; He knows the hearts, the most secret purposes, intentions, and dispositions of all men. And because He is the Knower of hearts, He knew which of these men He had qualified the best, by natural and gracious dispositions and powers, for the important work to which one of them was now to be appointed.

25. That he may take part of this ministry. Instead of "the lot," which we translate part, "the place" is the reading of some MSS. and from them the verse may be read thus, "That he may take the place of this ministry and apostleship (from which Judas fell), and go to his own place." Some of the best critics assert that the words belong to Matthias—his own place being the office to which he was about to be elected. Should any object that this could not be called his own place because he was not yet appointed to it, but hell might be properly called Judas' own place because by treason and covetousness he was fully prepared for that place of torment, it may be answered that the own or proper place of a man is that for which he is eligible from being qualified for it, though he may not yet possess such a place.

26. They gave forth their lots. In what manner this or any other question was decided by lot, we cannot precisely say. The most simple form was to put two stones, pieces of board, metal, or slips of parchment, with the names of the persons inscribed on them, into an urn; and after prayer, sacrifice, etc., to put in the hand and draw out one of the lots, and then the case was decided. He was numbered with the eleven apostles. The word comes from "together with," "according to," and a "pebble or small stone," used for lots, and as a means of enumeration among the Greeks, Romans, and Egyptians; hence the words "calculate, calculation," from calculus, a small stone or pebble. From this use of the word, though it signifies in general to sum up, associate, we may conjecture that the calculus or pebble was used on this occasion.

We have here an account of the descent of the Holy Ghost.

I. When, and where, this was done.

1. It was when the day of pentecost was fully come. (1) The Holy Ghost came down at the time of a solemn feast, because there was then a great concourse of people to Jerusalem from all parts, which would make the fame of it to be spread the sooner and further. Thus now, as before at the passover, the Jewish feasts served to toll the bell for gospel services. (2) This feast of pentecost was kept in remembrance of the giving of the law upon Mount Sinai. Fitly, therefore, is the Holy Ghost given at that feast, in fire and in tongues, for the promulgation of the evangelical law, not as that to one nation, but to every creature. (3) This feast of pentecost happened on the first day of the week, which was a confirmation of it to be the Christian sabbath, to be a standing memorial in his church of those two great blessings—the resurrection of Christ, and the pouring out of the Spirit. Every Lord's day in the year, I think, there should be a full and particular notice taken in our prayers and praises of these.

CHAPTER 2

Vss. 1-13. DESCENT OF THE SPIRIT—THE DISCIPLES SPEAK WITH TONGUES—AMAZEMENT OF THE MULTITUDE. 1-4. when the day of Pentecost was fully come—The fiftieth from the morrow after the first Passover sabbath (Lev. 23:15, 16).

CHAPTER 2

1. When the day of Pentecost was fully come. The Feast of Pentecost was celebrated fifty days after the Passover, and has its name from penteconta, "fifty." It commenced on the fiftieth day, reckoned from the first day of unleavened bread, i.e., on the morrow after the paschal lamb was offered. The law relative to this feast is found in Lev. xxiii. 15-16, in these words: "And ye shall count unto you from the morrow after the sabbath, from the day that ye brought the sheaf of the wave offering; seven sabbaths shall be complete: even unto the morrow after the seventh sabbath shall ye number fifty days." This feast was instituted in commemoration of the giving the law on Mount Sinai, and is therefore sometimes called by the Jews "the joy of the law," and frequently the Feast of Weeks. There is a correspondence between the giving of the law, which is celebrated by this Feast of Pentecost, together with the crucifixion of our Lord, which took place at the Passover, and this descent of the Holy Spirit, which happened at this Pentecost. At the Passover, the Israelites were delivered from Egyptian bondage; this was a type of the thraldom in which the human race were to Satan and sin. At the Passover, Jesus Christ, who was typified by the paschal lamb, was sacrificed for the sin

MATTHEW HENRY

2. It was when they were all with one accord in one place. What place it was we are not told particularly. But it was at Jerusalem, because this had been the place which God chose, and the prophecy was that thence the word of the Lord should go forth. Here God had promised to meet them and bless them; here therefore he meets them with this blessing of blessings. He did this honour to Jerusalem, to teach us not to fall out with places, for God has his remnant in all places; he had this in Jerusalem. Here the disciples were in one place. And here they were with one accord. They had prayed more together of late than usual (ch. i. 14), and this made them love one another better. By his grace he thus prepared them for the gift of the Holy Ghost; for that blessed dove comes not where there is noise and clamour, but moves upon the face of the still waters, not the rugged ones. Would we have the Spirit poured out upon us from on high? Let us all be of one accord; let us agree to love one another.

II. How, and in what manner, the Holy Ghost came upon them. We often read in the Old Testament of God's coming down in a cloud. And Christ went up to heaven in a cloud. But the Holy Ghost did not descend in a cloud; for he was to dispel and scatter the clouds that overspread men's minds.

1. Here is an audible summons given them to awaken their expectations, v. 2. It came suddenly, but was at the height immediately. It came sooner than they expected, and startled even those that were now together waiting. It was a sound from heaven. It was the sound of a wind, for the way of the Spirit is like that of the wind (John iii. 8), thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it comes nor whither it goes. It was a rushing mighty wind; it was strong and violent, and came with great force, as if it would bear down all before it. This was to signify the powerful influences and operations of the Spirit of God. It filled not only the room, but all the house where they were sitting. This wind filling the house would strike an awe upon the disciples, and help to put them into a very serious frame, for the receiving of the Holy Ghost. Thus the convictions of the Spirit make way for his comforts; and the rough blasts of that blessed wind prepare the soul for its soft and gentle gales.

2. Here is a visible sign of the gift. They saw cloven tongues, like as of fire (v. 3), and it sat, rested upon each of them. There is a meteor which naturalists call ignis lambens—a gentle flame, not a devouring fire; such was this.

(1) There was an outward sensible sign, for the confirming of the faith of the disciples themselves.

(2) The sign given was fire, that John Baptist's saying concerning Christ might be fulfilled, He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire. They were now celebrating the memorial of the giving of the law upon mount Sinai; and as that was given in fire, so is the gospel. The Spirit, like fire, melts the heart, burns up the dross, and kindles pious and devout affections in the soul. This is that fire which Christ came to send upon the earth.

(3) This fire appeared in cloven tongues. The operations of the Spirit were many; that of speaking with divers tongues was one, and to that this sign had a reference. They were tongues. By him Christ would speak to the world, and he gave the Spirit to the disciples to endue them with a power to publish and proclaim to the world what they knew. These tongues were cloven. The tongues were divided, and yet they still continued all of one accord; for there may be a sincere unity of affections where yet there is a diversity of expression.

(4) This fire sat upon them to denote the constant residence of the Holy Ghost with them. The disciples of Christ had the gifts of the Spirit always with them, though the sign, we may suppose, soon disappeared.

III. What was the immediate effect of this? 1. They were all filled with the Holy Ghost. They were filled with the graces of the Spirit, and were more than ever under his sanctifying influences. They were more filled with the comforts of the Spirit, rejoiced more than ever in the love of Christ and the hope of heaven. They were also filled with the gifts of the Holy Ghost. They were endued with miraculous powers for the furtherance of the gospel. It seems evident that not only the twelve apostles, but all the hundred and twenty disciples were filled with the Holy Ghost alike at this time. The all here must refer to the all that were together, v. 1. 2. They began to speak with other tongues, besides their native language. They spoke not matters of common conversation, but the word of God, and the praises of his name, as the Spirit gave them utterance. We may suppose that they understood not only themselves but one another too. They spoke not from any previous thought or meditation, but as the

with one accord—the solemnity of the day, perhaps, unconsciously raising their expectations.

2. And suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind . . .—"The whole description is so picturesque and striking that it could only come from an eyewitness" [OLSHAUSEN]. The suddenness, strength, and diffusiveness of the sound strike with deepest awe the whole company, and thus complete their preparation for the heavenly gift. Wind was a familiar emblem of the Spirit (Ezek. 37:9; John 3:8; 20:22). But this was not a rush of actual wind. It was only a sound "as of" it.

3. cloven tongues, like as of fire . . .—'disparted tonques,' i.e., tongue-shaped, flamelike appearances, rising from a common center or root, and resting upon each of that large company:—beautiful visible symbol of the burning energy of the Spirit now descending in all His plenitude upon the Church, and about to pour itself through every tongue, and over every tribe of men under heaven!

of the world, and by this sacrifice redemption from sin and Satan is now procured and proclaimed. On Pentecost, God gave His law on Mount Sinai, accompanied with thunderings and lightnings. On Pentecost, God sent down His Holy Spirit, like a rushing mighty wind; and tongues of fire sat upon each disciple, in order that, by His influence, that new law of light and life might be promulgated and established. They were all with one accord in one place. It is probable that the all here mentioned means the 120 spoken of in chap. i. 15, who were all together at the election of Matthias. In one place. Where this place was we cannot tell. It was probably in the Temple, as seems to be intimated in v. 46, where it is said they were "daily with one accord in the temple"; and as this was the third hour of the day, v. 15, which was the Jewish hour of morning prayer, it is most probable that the Temple was the place in which they were assembled.

2. A sound from heaven. Probably thunder is meant, which is the harbinger of the Divine Presence. Rushing mighty wind. There is a good deal of similarity between this account and that of the appearance of God to Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 11-12, where the strong wind, the earthquake, and the fire were harbingers of the Almighty's presence, and prepared the heart of Elijah to hear the small still voice. So this sound and the mighty rushing wind prepared the apostles to receive the influences and gifts of the Holy Spirit. In both cases the sound, strong wind, and fire, although natural agents, were supernaturally employed.

3. Cloven tongues like as of fire. The tongues were the emblem of the languages they were to speak. The cloven tongues pointed out the diversity of those languages; and the fire seemed to intimate that the whole would be a spiritual gift, and be the means of bringing light and life to the souls who should hear them preach the everlasting gospel in those languages. Sat upon each of them. That unusual appearances of fire were considered emblems of the presence and influence of God both the Scriptures and the Jewish writings amply prove. Thus God manifested himself to Moses when He appointed him to deliver Israel, Exod. iii. 2-3; and thus He manifested himself when He delivered the law on Mount Sinai, Exod. xix. 16-20. It sat upon each. That is, one of those tongues, like flames, sat upon the head of each disciple; and the continuance of the appearance, which is indicated by the word sat, shows that there could be no illusion in the case. I still think that in all this case the agent was natural, but supernaturally employed.

MATTHEW HENRY

Spirit gave them utterance; he furnished them with the matter as well as the language. Now this was, (1) A very great miracle; it was a miracle upon the mind, for in the mind words are framed. They had not only never learned these languages, for aught that appears, they had never so much as heard these languages spoken. They were neither scholars nor travellers. Peter indeed was forward enough to speak in his own tongue, but the rest of them were no spokesmen. He that made man's mouth new-made theirs. (2) A very proper, needful, and serviceable miracle. The language the disciples spoke was Syriac, a dialect of the Hebrew. They were commissioned to preach the gospel to every creature, to disciple all nations. But here is an insuperable difficulty at the threshold. And therefore, to prove that Christ could give authority to preach to the nations, he gives ability to preach to them in their own language. This may well be reckoned, all things considered, a greater work than the miraculous cures Christ wrought. It was the first effect of the pouring out of the Spirit upon them.

We have here an account of the public notice that was taken of this extraordinary gift.

I. The great concourse of people that there was now at Jerusalem. There were dwelling at Jerusalem Jews that were devout men, out of every nation under heaven, denoting that there were some from most of the then known parts of the world. Jerusalem at that time was a rendezvous of religious people. 1. We may here see what were some of those countries whence those strangers came (v. 9–11), some from the eastern countries, as the Parthians, Medes, Elamites, and dwellers in Mesopotamia; thence we come in order to Judæa. Next come the inhabitants of Cappadocia, Pontus, and that country which was particularly called Asia. Next come the dwellers in Phrygia and Pamphylia, which lay westward, also the strangers of Rome; there were some also that dwelt in the southern parts of Egypt, in the parts of Libya about Cyrene; there were also some from the island of Crete, and some from the deserts of Arabia; but they were all either Jews originally, or proselytes to the Jewish religion. The Jewish writers about this time speak of the Jews as dwelling everywhere through the whole earth; and that there is not a people upon earth among whom some Jews do not inhabit. 2. We may enquire what brought all those Jews and proselytes together to Jerusalem at this time? for they are said to dwell there. There was at this time a general expectation of the appearing of the Messiah. This brought those who were most zealous and devout to Jerusalem, to sojourn there.

II. The amazement with which these strangers were seized when they heard the disciples speak in their own tongues.

1. They observe that the speakers are all Galileans, that know no other than their mother tongue (v. 7). God chose the weak and foolish things of the world to confound the wise and mighty.

2. They acknowledge that they spoke intelligibly and readily their own language; We hear every man in our own tongue wherein we were born (v. 8). We do hear them speak in our tongues the wonderful works of God, v. 11. It was not only a surprise, but a pleasing surprise, to them to hear the language of their own country spoken. (1) The things they heard the apostles discourse of were the wonderful works of God, the great things of God. It is probable that the apostles spoke of Christ, and redemption by him, and the grace of the gospel; and these are indeed the great things of God. (2) They heard them both praise God for these great things and instruct the people concerning these things, in their own tongue. Now

4. they . . . began to speak with . . . tongues . . .—real, living languages, as is plain from what follows. The thing uttered, probably the same by all, was "the wonderful works of God," perhaps in the inspired words of the Old Testament evangelical hymns; though it is next to certain that the speakers themselves understood nothing of what they uttered (see on I Cor. 14).

5-11. there were dwelling at Jerusalem Jews, devout men out of every nation—not, it would seem, permanently settled there (see vs. 9), though the language seems to imply more than a temporary visit to keep this one feast. 9. Parthians . . .—Beginning with the farthest east, the Parthians, the enumeration proceeds farther and farther westward till it comes to Judea; next come the western countries, from Cappadocia to Pamphylia; then the southern, from Egypt to Cyrene; finally, apart from all geographical consideration, Cretes and Arabians are placed together. This enumeration is evidently designed to convey an impression of universality [BAUMGARTEN].

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

All the references in Acts, Corinthians, and Ephesians show that the exercise of tongues consisted of ecstatic utterance. These people were not preaching, they were praising; they were not indulging in set discourse, they were pouring out the rapture that filled their souls. In the filling of the Spirit there had come to them a new vision of their Lord, and a new consciousness of His life throbbing through their lives. They realized that all the hopes and aspirations of the past were being fulfilled. They knew that the river of God had come by the way of the altar, and that they were in the full flood tide of its healing and life-giving waters. They were praising God for His mighty works.

Did they know they were speaking in other tongues? One cannot be at all sure that they did. Were they familiar with the tongues in which they were speaking? Probably not. They praised with a new inspiration; they poured out their songs, and lo, Parthians, Medes, and Elamites, sojourners from Rome, people from Mesopotamia, men of all dialects, listened; and they heard the songs in their own language, with perfect accuracy and distinctness. The Resurrection was the first note in their singing, as it came to be the first note in apostolic preaching. One could almost wish that one could have listened to that first chanting of the Church, in which the singers set forth the mighty works of God.

We may now consider the impressions made upon Jerusalem. "They were all amazed, and were perplexed, saying one to another, What meaneth this? But others mocking said, They are filled with new wine." In that one statement we have a record of the first impression made by the Church in Jerusalem. It was a threefold impression. First, amazement; second, perplexity; third, criticism.

ADAM CLARKE

4. To speak with other tongues. At the building of Babel the language of the people was confounded, and in consequence of this they became scattered over the face of the earth. At this foundation of the Christian Church, the gift of various languages was given to the apostles that the scattered nations might be gathered, and united under one Shepherd and Superintendent of all souls. As the Spirit gave them utterance. The word seems to imply such utterance as proceeded from immediate inspiration and included oracular communications.

5. Devout men, out of every nation. Either by these we are simply to understand Jews who were born in different countries and had now come up to Jerusalem to be present at the Passover, and for purposes of traffic, or proselytes to Judaism who had come up for the same purpose; for I cannot suppose that the term devout men can be applied to any other.

9. Parthians. Parthia anciently included the northern part of modern Persia; it was situated between the Caspian Sea and Persian Gulf, rather to the eastward of both. Medes. Media was a country lying in the vicinity of the Caspian Sea, having Parthia on the east, Assyria on the south, and Mesopotamia on the west. Elamites. Probably inhabitants of that country now called Persia; both the Medes and Elamites were a neighboring people, dwelling beyond the Tigris. Mesopotamia. Situated between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. Judaea. This word has exceedingly puzzled commentators and critics, and most suspect that it is not the true reading. Cappadocia was an ancient kingdom of Asia, comprehending all that country that lies between Mount Taurus and the Euxine Sea. Pontus was anciently a very powerful kingdom of Asia, originally a part of Cappadocia. Asia. Meaning probably Asia Minor.

10. Phrygia. A country in Asia Minor, southward of Pontus. Pamphylia. The ancient name of the country between Lycia and Cilicia, near the Mediterranean Sea. Egypt. A very extensive country of Africa. Libya. In a general way, among the Greeks, signified Africa; but the northern part, in the vicinity of Cyrene, is here meant. Cyrene. A country in Africa on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, southward of the most western point of the Island of Crete. Strangers of Rome. Persons dwelling at Rome and speaking the Latin language, partly consisting of regularly descended Jews and proselytes to the Jewish religion.

11. Cretes. Natives of Crete, a large and noted island in the eastern part of the Mediterranean Sea. Arabians. Natives of Arabia, a well-known country of Asia, having the Red Sea on the west, the Persian Gulf on the east, Judea on the north, and the Indian Ocean on the south. The wonderful works of God. Such as the incarnation of Christ; His various miracles, preaching, death, resurrection, and ascension; and the design of God to save the world through Him. From this one circumstance we may learn that all the people enumerated above were either Jews or proselytes; and that there were probably none that could be, strictly speaking, called heathens among them.

6. When this was noised abroad. If we suppose that there was a considerable peal of thunder, which produced the mighty rushing wind already noticed in v. 2, then the whole city must have been alarmed; and as various circumstances might direct their attention to the Temple, having flocked thither they were further astonished and confounded to hear the disciples of Christ addressing the mixed multitude in the languages of the different countries from which these people had come. Every man heard them speak in his own language. We may naturally suppose that, as soon as any person presented himself to one of these disciples, he, the disciple, was immediately enabled to address him in his own language, however various this had been from the Jewish or Galilean dialects.

7. Are not all these . . . Galilaeans? Persons who know no other dialect, save that of their own country. Persons wholly uneducated, and consequently naturally ignorant of those languages which they now speak so fluently.

8. How hear we every man in our own tongue? Some have supposed from this that the though, perhaps they were got to be so much masters of the Jewish language that they could have understood the meaning of the disciples if they had spoken that language, yet this was more strange, and helped to convince their judgment, that this doctrine was of God. It was more kind, and helped to engage their affections. And this is to us a plain intimation of the mind and will of God. that the scriptures should be read. and public worship performed, in the vulgar languages of the nations.

3. They wonder at it (v. 12): They were all amazed; they were in doubt what the meaning of it was. They asked themselves and one another—What is the tendency of this? They will turn aside, and see this great sight.

III. The scorn which some made of it, probably the scribes and Pharisees, and chief priests; they said, These men are full of new wine, they have drunk too much this festival-time, v. 13. These, being native Jews, knew not, as the others did, that what was spoken was really the languages of other nations, and therefore took it to be gibberish and nonsense, such as drunkards sometimes talk. And, if they called the Master of the house a wine-bibber, no marvel if they so called those of his household.

We have here the first-fruits of the Spirit, in the sermon which Peter preached immediately, directed to the Jews, even to those that mocked; for he begins with the notice of that (v. 15), and addresses his discourse (v. 14) to the men of Judæa and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. It was not by Peter's preaching only, but that of all, that three thousand souls were that day converted, but Peter's sermon only is recorded. He that had sneakingly denied Christ now as courageously confesses him.

I. His introduction: Peter stood up (v. 14) with the eleven. Those that were of greatest authority stood up to speak to the scoffing Jews. Thus among Christ's ministers, some of greater gifts are called out to instruct those that oppose themselves, to take hold of sword and spear. Peter lifted up his voice, as one that was both well assured of what he said, and was neither afraid nor ashamed to own it. He applied himself to the men of Judæa, "and you especially that dwell at Jerusalem, be this known unto you, and hearken to my words."

II. His answer to their blasphemous calumny (v. 15): "These men are not drunken, as you suppose. These disciples of Christ, that now speak with other tongues, speak good sense, and know what they say. You cannot think they are drunk, for it is but the third hour of the day," nine of the clock in the morning; and before this time, on the sabbaths and solemn feasts, the Jews did not eat nor drink.

III. His account of the miraculous effusion of the Spirit. Two things he resolves it into: that it was the fulfilling of the scripture, and the fruit of Christ's resurrection and ascension.

1. That it was the accomplishment of the prophecies of the Old Testament. He specifies one, that of the prophet Joel, ch. ii. 28. It is observable that though Peter was filled with the Holy Ghost, yet he did not set aside the scriptures, nor think himself above them. Christ's scholars never learn above their Bible.

(1) The text itself that Peter quotes, v. 17–21. It refers to the last days, the times of the gospel, which are called the last days because the dispensation of God's kingdom among men, which the gospel sets up, is the last dispensation of divine grace. "It was prophesied of and promised, and therefore you ought to expect it, and not to be surprised at it; to desire it, and bid it welcome." The apostle quotes the whole paragraph, for it is good to take scripture entire; now it was foretold,

[1] That there should be a more plentiful and extensive effusion of the Spirit of grace from on high than had ever yet been. Now the Spirit shall be poured out, not only upon the Jews, but upon all flesh, Gentiles as well as Jews. The Jewish doctors taught that the Spirit came only upon wise and rich men, and such as were of the seed of Israel; but God will not tie himself to their rules.

[2] That the Spirit should be in them a Spirit of prophecy. This power shall be given without distinction of sex—not only your sons, but your daughters shall prophesy; without distinction of age—both your young men and your old men shall see visions, and dream dreams, the servants and handmaids shall receive of the Spirit, and shall prophesy (v. 18); men and women, whom God calls his servants and his handmaids. The mention of the daughters (v. 17) and the handmaidens (v. 18) would make one think that the women (ch. i. 14) received the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost, as well as the men.

[3] That one great thing which they should prophesy

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

What was this amazement? It was mental arrest; not yet illumination. They did not know the meaning of what they heard and saw; but they wondered. Out of wonder worship is born. Where wonder ceases worship ceases. Wonder is not worship, but it is the first movement toward worship. For the moment, Jerusalem was compelled to turn from other interests to attend to this matter. It was only a beginning, but it was a beginning. For a brief hour or two at least, men left the schools, and the disputations, and the quarrelings, forgot their differences, and united in common amazement in the presence of something in their midst for which they could not account. The amazement was mental arrest, a compulsion laid upon the men of a city to turn from all other matters in wonder.

As they observed, and as they listened, they were not only amazed; they were perplexed. If amazement is mental arrest, perplexity is mental defeat; not yet illumination. The amazement meant that they did not know. The perplexity meant that they knew they did not know. There is no moment more hopeful to an intellectual soul than that in which it comes to the point of known ignorance. That is the opportunity for discovery.—The Acts of the Apostles pour out of my Spirit—in contrast with the mere drops of all preceding time. upon all flesh—hitherto confined to the seed of Abraham.

17. in the last days—meaning, the days of the Messiah (Isa. 2:2); as closing all preparatory arrangements, and constituting the final dispensation of God's kingdom on earth.

sons . . . daughters . . . young men . . . old men . . . servants . . . handmaidens—without distinction of sex, age, or rank. see visions . . . dream dreams—This is a mere accommodation to the ways in which the Spirit operated under the ancient economy, when the prediction was delivered; for in the New Testament, visions and dreams are rather the exception than the rule.

miracle was not so much wrought on the disciples as on their hearers; imagining that, although the disciples spoke their own tongue, yet every man so understood what was spoken as if it had been spoken in the language in which he was born. Though this is by no means so likely as the opinion which states that the disciples themselves spoke all these different languages, yet the miracle is the same howsoever it be taken.

13. These men are full of new wine. Rather "sweet wine"; cannot mean the mustum, or new wine, as there could be none in Judea so early as Pentecost.

14. Peter, standing up with the eleven. They probably spoke by turns, not all together; but Peter began the discourse. All ye that dwell at Jerusalem. Would be better translated by the word "sojourn," because they were not inhabitants of Judea, but the strangers mentioned in vv. 9-11, who had come up to the feast.

15. But the third hour of the day. That is, about nine o'clock in the morning, previously to which the Jews scarcely ever ate or drank, for that hour was the hour of prayer. This custom appears to have been so common that even the most intemperate among the Jews were not known to transgress it.

17. In the last days. The time of the Messiah; and so the phrase was understood among the Jews.

Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy. The word prophesy is not to be understood here as implying the knowledge and discovery of future events, but signifies to teach and proclaim the great truths of God, especially those which concerned redemption by Jesus Christ. Your young men shall see visions. These were two of the various ways in which God revealed himself under the Old Testament. Sometimes He revealed himself by a symbol, which was a sufficient proof of the Divine Presence; fire was the most ordinary, as it was the most expressive, symbol. Thus He appeared to Moses on Mount Horeb, and afterwards at Sinai; to Abraham, Genesis xv; to Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 11-12. At other times He revealed himself by angelic ministry; this was frequent, especially in the days of the patriarchs, of which we find many instances in the Book of Genesis. By dreams He discovered His will in numerous instances. See the remarkable case of Joseph, Gen. xxxvii. 5, 9; of Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 1 ff.; xlvi. 2 ff.; of Pharaoh, Gen. xli. 1-7; of Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. iv. 10-17.

18. On my servants and on my handmaidens.

MATTHEW HENRY

of should be the judgment that was coming upon the Jewish nation. Those that would not submit to the power of God's grace should fall and lie under the pourings out of the vials of his wrath. Those shall break that will not bend. First, The destruction of Jerusalem, which was about forty years after Christ's death, is here called that great and notable day of the Lord. The desolation itself was such as was never brought upon any place or nation, either before or since. It was the day of the Lord, for it was the day of his vengeance upon that people for crucifying Christ. It was a little day of judgment; it was a notable day. The destruction of the Jews was the deliverance of the Christians. Secondly, The terrible presages of that destruction are here foretold: There shall be wonders in heaven above, the sun turned into darkness and the moon into blood; and signs too in the earth beneath, blood and fire. Josephus, in his preface to his history of the wars of the Jews, speaks of the signs and prodigies that preceded them, terrible thunders, lightnings, and earthquakes; there was a fiery comet that hung over the city for a year, and a flaming sword was seen pointing down upon it. The fire and vapour of smoke literally came to pass in the burning of their cities, and towns, and synagogues, and temple at last. Thirdly, The signal preservation of the Lord's people is here promised (v. 21): Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord Jesus shall be saved. In the destruction by the Romans not one Christian perished. The saved remnant are a praying people: they call on the name of the Lord. It is the name of the Lord which they call upon that is their strong tower.

(2) The application of this prophecy to the present event (v. 16): This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel. This is that effusion of the Spirit upon all flesh which should come, and we are to look for no other. This Spirit of grace, the Advocate, or Comforter, that was given now, according to the promise, will, according to the same promise, continue with the church on earth to the end.

2. That it was the gift of Christ. From this gift of the Holy Ghost, he takes occasion to preach unto them Jesus (v. 22): "You men of Israel, hear these words.'

(1) An abstract of the history of the life of Christ, v. 22. He calls him Jesus of Nazareth. He was a man approved of God among you, censured and condemned by men, but approved of God: a man marked out by God. "You yourselves are witnesses how he became famous by miracles, wonders, and signs, which God did by him; for no man could do such works unless God were with him." See what a stress Peter lays upon Christ's miracles. The matter of fact was not to be denied: "They were done in the midst of you, as you yourselves also know. You have been eyewitnesses of his miracles." The inference from them cannot be disputed; certainly God approved him, declared him to be the Son of God and the Saviour of the world.

(2) An account of his death and sufferings. This was the greatest miracle of all, that a man approved of God should thus seem to be abandoned of him; and a man thus approved among the people, should be thus abandoned by them too. But both these mysteries are here explained (v. 23). As God's act; and in him it was an act of wonderful grace and wisdom. He delivered him to death. And yet there was nothing in this that signified the disapproving of him; for it was done by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God. This reconciled him to the cross: Father, thy will be done; and Father, glorify thy name. As the people's act; and in them it was an act of prodigious sin and folly. It was their voluntary act and deed, from a principle morally evil, and therefore "they were wicked hands with which you have crucified and slain him." It is probable that some of those were here present who had cried, Crucify him, crucify him. He charges it particularly on them the more effectually to bring them to faith and repentance.

(3) An attestation of his resurrection (v. 24): Whom God raised up; the same that delivered him to death delivers him from death.

[1] He describes his resurrection: God loosed the pains of death, because it was impossible that he should be holden of it. From these pains and sorrows of soul the Father loosed him, when at his death he said, It is finished. Most refer this to the resurrection of Christ's body. Christ was imprisoned for our debt, was thrown into the bands of death; but it was not possible he should be detained there, for he had life in himself and had conquered the prince of death.

[2] He attests the truth of his resurrection (v. 32): God hath raised him up, whereof we all are witnesses. They received power, by the descent of the Holy Ghost upon them, on purpose that they might be skilful,

19. I will show wonders . . .—referring to the signs which were to precede the destruction of Jerusalem (see on Luke 21: 25-28).

21. whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved—This points to the permanent establishment of the economy of salvation, which followed on the breaking up of the Jewish state.

22-28. a man approved of God—rather, 'authenticated,' 'proved,' or 'demonstrated to be from God.' by miracles . . . which God did by him—This is not a low view of our Lord's miracles, as has been alleged, nor inconsistent with John 2: 11, but is in strict accordance with His progress from humiliation to glory, and with His own words in John 5:19. This view of Christ is here dwelt on to exhibit to the Jews the whole course of Jesus of Nazareth as the ordinance and doing of the God of Israel [ALFORD].

23. determinate counsel and foreknowledge—God's fixed plan and perfect foresight of all the steps involved in it. ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain—How strikingly is the criminality of Christ's murderers here presented in harmony with the eternal purpose to surrender Him into their hands!

24. was not possible he should be holden of it—Glorious saying! It was indeed impossible that "the Living One" should remain "among the dead" (Luke 24:5); but here, the impossibility seems to refer to the prophetic assurance that He should not see corruption.

ADAM CLARKE

This properly means persons of the lowest condition, such as male and female slaves. As the Jews asserted that the spirit of prophecy never rested upon a poor man, these words are quoted to show that, under the gospel dispensation, neither bond nor free, male nor female, is excluded from sharing in the gifts and graces of the Divine Spirit.

19. I will shew wonders. It is likely that both the prophet and the apostle refer to the calamities that fell upon the Jews at the destruction of Jerusalem, and the fearful signs and portents that preceded those calamities. Blood, and fire, and vapour of smoke. Skirmishes and assassinations over the land, and wasting the country with fire and sword.

20. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood. These are figurative representations of eclipses, intended most probably to point but the fall of the civil and ecclesiastical state in Judea.

21. Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved. The predicted ruin is now impending, and only such as receive the gospel of the Son of God shall be saved. And that none but the Christians did escape, when God poured out these judgments, is well-known; and that all the Christians did escape, not one of them perishing in these devastations, stands attested by the most respectable authority. See the note on Matt. xxiv. 13.

16. Spoken by the prophet Joel. The prophecy which he delivered so long ago is just now fulfilled; and this is another proof that Jesus, whom you have crucified, is the Messiah.

22. A man approved of God. "Celebrated, famous." The sense of the verse seems to be this: "Jesus of Nazareth, a Man sent of God, and celebrated among you by miracles, wonders, and signs," and all these done in such profusion as had never been done by the best of your most accredited prophets. And these signs were such as demonstrated His Divine mission.

23. By the determinate counsel; that counsel of God which "defined the time, place, and circumstance," according to His foreknowledge. By wicked hands have crucified and slain. I think this refers to the Romans, and not to the Jews, the former being the agents to execute the evil purposes of the latter. It is well-known that the punishment of the cross was not a Jewish, but a Roman, punishment. Hence we may infer that by the hands of the wicked, the Romans are meant, being called anomoi, "without law," because they had no revelation from God.

24. Whom God hath raised up. For as God alone gave Him up to death, so God alone raised Him up from death. Having loosed the pains of death. "Removed the pains or sufferings of death." Instead of death, several MSS. have "hell," or the "place of separate spirits"; and perhaps it was on no better authority than this various reading, supported but by slender evidence, that "He descended into hell" became an article in what is called the Apostles' Creed. And on this article many a popish legend has been builded, to the discredit of sober sense and true religion.

faithful, and courageous witnesses.

[3] He showed it to be the fulfilling of the scripture, it was impossible that he should be holden by death and the grave; for David speaks of his being raised.

First, The text quoted at large (v. 25–28). 1. The constant regard that our Lord Jesus had to his Father: I foresaw the Lord before me continually. He set before him his Father's glory as his end in all—for he saw that his sufferings would redound abundantly to the honour of God. 2. The assurance he had of his Father's presence and power: "He is on my right hand, that I should not be moved." If God be at our right hand we shall not be moved. 3. The cheerfulness with which our Lord Jesus went on in his work. "I shall not be moved, therefore doth my heart rejoice, and my tongue is glad." It was a constant pleasure to our Lord Jesus to look to the end of his work, it does his heart good to think how the issue would answer the design. 4. The happy issue of his death and sufferings. My flesh shall rest; it shall rest in hope, that thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; what follows is the matter of his hope. (1) The soul shall not continue in a state of separation from the body: "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell" (in hades, in the invisible state, so hades properly signifies). (2) The body shall lie but a little while in the grave: Thou wilt not suffer thy Holy One to see corruption. He must die, but he must not see corruption. (3) His death and sufferings should be an inlet to a blessed immortality: "Thou hast made known to me the ways of life, and by me made them known to the world, and laid them open." (4) That all his sorrows and sufferings should end in perfect felicity: Thou shalt make me full of joy with thy countenance. The reward set before him was joy, a fulness of joy, and that in God's countenance. That is the joy of our Lord, into which all his shall enter, and in which they shall be for ever happy.

Secondly, The comment upon this text. He addresses himself to them with a title of respect, Men and brethren, v. 29. "Give me leave freely to speak to you concerning the patriarch David. David cannot be understood here as speaking of himself, but of the Christ to come." He could not say that of himself, for he died, and was buried, and his sepulchre remained in Jerusalem till now. He could never say of himself that he should not see corruption; for it was plain he did see corruption. Therefore certainly he spoke it as a prophet, with an eye to the Messiah. David knew that the Messiah should descend from his loins (v. 30), that God had sworn to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne. When our Lord Jesus was born, it was promised that the Lord God would give him the throne of his Father David, Luke i. 32. According to the spirit, and by his divine nature, he was to be David's Lord, not his son. When he says that his soul should not be left in its separate state, nor his flesh see corruption, without doubt he must be understood to speak of the resurrection of Christ, v. 31. And as Christ died, so he rose again, according to the scriptures; and that he did so we are witnesses. Here is a glance at his ascension too. As David did not rise from the dead, so neither did he ascend into the heavens, v. 34. And further, in another psalm, he plainly shows that he spoke of another person, and such another as was his Lord (Ps. cx. 1): "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand until I make thy foes thy footstool," v. 35.

(4) The application of this discourse.

[1] This explains the meaning of the present wonderful effusion of the Spirit. Some of the people had asked (v. 12), What meaneth this? I will tell you the meaning of it, says Peter. This Jesus being exalted by the right hand of God, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, hath shed forth this which you now see and hear. The gift of the Holy Ghost was a performance of divine promises already made; this is the promise that includes all the rest. It was a pledge of all divine favours further intended; what you now see and hear is but an earnest of greater things.

[2] This proves that Christ Jesus is the true Messiah and Saviour of the world; this he closes his sermon with (v. 36): Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God has made that same Jesus whom you have crucified both Lord and Christ. They were charged to tell no man that he was Jesus the Christ till after his resurrection (Matt. xvii. 9); but now it must be proclaimed. It is not proposed as probable, but deposed as certain: Let them know it assuredly. First, That God has glorified him whom they have crucified. God had glorified him, and the indignities they had done him served as a foil to his lustre. Secondly, That he has glorified him to such a degree as to make him both Lord and Christ. This is the great truth of the gospel that that same Jesus that was crucified at Jerusalem is Lord and Christ.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

27. wilt not leave my soul in hell—in its disembodied state (see on Luke 16:23). neither . . . suffer thine Holy One to see corruption—in the grave.

28. Thou hast made known to me the ways of life—i.e., resurrection-life. thou shalt make me full of joy with thy countenance—i.e., in glory; as is plain from the whole connection and the actual words of the 16th Psalm.

29-36. David . . . is . . . dead and buried . . .—Peter, full of the Holy Ghost, sees in this 16th Psalm, one Holy Man, whose life of high devotedness and lofty spirituality is crowned with the assurance, that though He taste of death, He shall rise again without seeing corruption, and be admitted to the bliss of God's immediate presence. Now as this was palpably untrue of David, it could be meant only of One other, even of Him whom David was taught to expect as the final Occupant of the throne of Israel. (Those, therefore, and they are many, who take David himself to be the subject of this Psalm, and the words quoted to refer to Christ only in a more eminent sense, nullify the whole argument of the apostle.) The Psalm is then affirmed to have had its only proper fulfilment in JESUS, of whose resurrection and ascension they were witnesses, while the glorious effusion of the Spirit by the hand of the ascended One, setting an infallible seal upon all, was even then witnessed by the thousands who stood listening to Him. A further illustration of Messiah's ascension and session at God's right hand is drawn from Psalm 110:1, in which David cannot be thought to speak of himself, seeing he is still in his grave.

36. Therefore—i.e., to sum up all. let all the house of Israel—for in this first discourse the appeal is formally made to the whole house of Israel, as the then existing Kingdom of God. know assuredly—by indisputable facts, fulfilled predictions, and the seal of the Holy Ghost set upon all. that God hath made—for Peter's object was to show them that, instead of interfering with the arrangements of the God of Israel, these events were His own high movements. this same Jesus, whom ye have crucified—"The sting is at the close" [BENGEL]. To prove to them merely that Jesus was the Messiah might have left them all unchanged in heart. But to convince them that He whom they had crucified had been by the right hand of God exalted, and constituted the "LORD" whom David in spirit adored, to whom every knee shall bow, and the CHRIST of God, was to bring them to "look on Him whom they had pierced and mourn for Him."

ADAM CLARKE

25. For David speaketh concerning him. The quotation here is made from Psalm xvi, which contains a most remarkable prophecy concerning Christ, every word of which applies to Him, and to Him exclusively.

26. And my tongue was glad. In the Hebrew it is, "And my glory was glad"; but the Evangelist follows the Septuagint. And what is to be understood by "glory" here? Why, the "soul," certainly, and not the tongue.

27. Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell. "In hades," that is, the state of separate spirits, or the state of the dead. To see corruption. "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return," was a sentence pronounced on man after the Fall; therefore this sentence could be executed on none but those who were fallen. But Jesus, being conceived without sin, neither partook of human corruption nor was involved in the condemnation of fallen human nature; consequently it was impossible for His body to see corruption; and it could not have undergone the temporary death, to which it was not naturally liable, had it not been for the purpose of making an atonement.

28. Thou hast made known to me the ways of life. That is, the way from the region of death, or state of the dead and separate spirits; so that I shall resume the same body, and live the same kind of life, as I had before I gave up My life for the sin of the world.

29. Let me freely speak . . . of the patriarch David. Dr. Lightfoot: "That this passage, Thou shalt not leave my soul in hell, is not to be applied to David himself appears in that I may confidently aver concerning him, that he was dead and buried, and never rose again; but his soul was left in the state of the dead, and he saw corruption, for his sepulchre is with us to this day."

30. According to the flesh, he would raise up Christ. This whole clause is wanting in some MSS.

31. That his soul was not left in hell. The words his soul are omitted by some MSS.

32. Whereof we all are witnesses. That is, the whole 120 saw Him after He rose from the dead, and were all ready, in the face of persecution and death, to attest this great truth.

34. David is not ascended. Consequently he has not sent forth this extraordinary gift; but it comes from his Lord, of whom he said, The Lord said unto my Lord.

35. Until I make thy foes thy footstool. It was usual with conquerors to put their feet on the necks of vanquished leaders, as emblematical of the state of subjection to which they were reduced, and the total extinction of their power.

36. Both Lord and Christ. Not only the Messiah, but the supreme Governor of all things and all persons, Jews and Gentiles, angels and men. In the preceding discourse, Peter assumes a fact which none would attempt to deny, viz., that Jesus had been lately crucified by them. He then proves (1) His resurrection, (2) His ascension, (3) His exaltation to the right hand of God, (4) the effusion of the Holy Spirit, which was the fruit of His glorification, and which had not only been promised by himself but foretold by their own prophets; in consequence of which it was indisputably proved (5) that this same Jesus whom they had crucified was the promised Messiah; and if so, (6) the Governor of the universe, from whose power and justice they had everything to dread, as they refused to receive His proffered mercy and kindness.

We have seen the wonderful effect of the pouring out of the Spirit, in its influence upon the preachers of the gospel. We are now to see another blessed fruit of the pouring out of the Spirit in its influence upon the hearers of the gospel. From the first delivery of that divine message, it appeared that there was a divine power going along with it. We have here the first-fruits of that vast harvest of souls which by it were gathered in to Jesus Christ. Let us see the method of it.

I. They were put upon a serious enquiry, v. 37. When they heard they were pricked to the heart, and, under a deep concern applied themselves to the preachers with this question, What shall we do? It was very strange that such impressions should be made upon such hard hearts all of a sudden. Peter had charged them with having a hand, a wicked hand, in his death, which was likely to have exasperated them against him; yet, when they heard this plain scriptural sermon, they were much affected with it.

1. It put them in pain: They were pricked in their hearts. Peter awakened their consciences, touched them to the quick. Sinners, when their eyes are opened, cannot but be pricked to the heart for sin.

2. It put them upon enquiry.

(1) To whom they thus addressed themselves: To Peter and to the rest of the apostles. By them they had been convinced, and therefore by them they expect to be counselled and comforted. They call them men and brethren, as Peter had called them (v. 29): it is a style of friendship and love. Ministers are spiritual physicians, and it is good for people to be free and familiar with those ministers, as men and their brethren, who deal for their souls as for their own.

(2) What the address is: What shall we do? [1] They speak as men at a stand, that did not know what to do: "Is that Jesus whom we have crucified both Lord and Christ? Then what will become of us who crucified him?" No way of being happy but by seeing ourselves miserable. When we find ourselves in danger of being lost for ever, there is hope of our being made for ever. [2] They speak as men at a point, that were resolved to do anything they should be directed to immediately. Those that are convinced of sin would gladly know the way to peace and pardon.

II. Peter and the other apostles direct them in short what they must do, v. 38, 39. Sinners convinced must be encouraged; though their case is sad it is not desperate, there is hope for them.

1. He here shows them the course they must take. Repent; this is a plank after shipwreck. This was the same duty that John the Baptist and Christ had preached, and it is still insisted on: "Repent, repent; change your mind, change your way." Be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ; that is, "firmly believe the doctrine of Christ, and make an open solemn profession of this, and renounce your infidelity." They must be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ. Believe in the name of Jesus, that he is the Christ, the Messias promised to the fathers. They must be baptized in his name for the remission of sins. This is pressed upon each particular person: Every one of you. "Even those of you that have been the greatest sinners, if they repent and believe, are welcome to be baptized. There is grace enough in Christ for everyone of you, be you ever so many, and grace suited to the case of everyone."

2. He gives them encouragement to take this course: (1) "It shall be for the remission of sins." Repent of your sin, and it shall not be your ruin; be baptized into the faith of Christ, and in truth you shall be justified. Aim at this, and depend upon Christ for it, and this you shall have. (2) "You shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost as well as we." All that receive the remission of sins receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. (3) "Your children shall still have an interest in the covenant, for the promise of the remission of sins, and the gift of the Holy Ghost, is to you and to your children," v. 39. Now it is proper for an Israelite to ask, "What must be done with my children? Must they be thrown out, or taken in with me?" "Taken in" (says Peter) "by all means; for the promise is as much to you and to your children now as ever it was." (4) "Though the promise is still extended to your children, yet it is not confined to you and them, but the benefit of it is designed for all that are afar off." To this general the following limitation must refer, even as many of them, as many particular persons in each nation, as the Lord our God shall call. God can make his call to reach those that are ever so far off.

III. These directions are followed with a needful caution (v. 40): With many other words did he testify. He had said much in a little (v. 38, 39), yet he had more to say. When we have heard those words which have done our souls good, we cannot but wish to hear what shall we do?—This is that beautiful spirit of genuine compunction and childlike docility, which, discovering its whole past career to have been one frightful mistake, seeks only to be set right for the future, be the change involved and the sacrifices required what they may. So Saul of Tarsus (ch. 9:6).

37-40. pricked in their hearts—the begun fulfilment of Zechariah 12:10, whose full accomplishment is reserved for the day when "all Israel shall be saved" (see on Rom. 11).

38. Repent—The word denotes change of mind, and here includes the reception of the Gospel as the proper issue of that revolution of mind which they were then undergoing. baptized . . . for the remission of sins—as the visible seal of that remission. 39. ADAM CLARKE

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

Peter's discourse was not distinguished by any special rhetorical display: he used not the words of man's wisdom or eloquence. It was not an oration, but it was a heart-moving argument, entreaty, and exhortation. He gave his hearers a simple, well-reasoned, scriptural discourse, sustained by the facts of experience; and every passage of it pointed to the Lord Jesus. It was in these respects a model of what a sermon ought to be as to its contents. His plea was personally addressed to the people who stood before him, and it had a practical and pressing relation to them and to their conduct. It was aimed, not at the head, but at the heart. Every word of it was directed to the conscience and the affections. It was plain, practical, personal, and persuasive; and in this it was a model of what a sermon ought to be as to its aim and style.

Yet Peter could not have spoken otherwise under the impression of the divine Spirit: his speech was as the oracles of God, a true product of a divine inspiration. Under the circumstances, any other kind of address would have been sadly out of place. A flashy, dazzling oration would have been a piece of horrible irreverance to the Holy Ghost; and Peter would have been guilty of the blood of souls if he had attempted it. In sober earnestness he kept to the plain facts of the case, setting them in the light of God's Word; and then with all his might he pressed home the truth upon those for whose salvation he was laboring. May it ever be the preacher's one desire to win men to repentance toward God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. May no minister wish to be admired, but may he long that his Lord and Master may be sought after! May none bewilder their people with the clouds of theoretic philosophy, but refresh them with the rain of revealed truth! Oh, that we could so preach that our hearers should be at once pricked in their hearts, and so be led at once to believe in our Lord Jesus, and immediately to come forward and confess their faith in His name!

—The Treasury of the New Testament

38. Peter said unto them, Repent. Humble yourselves before God, and deeply deplore the sins you have committed; pray earnestly for mercy, and deprecate the displeasure of incensed justice. For a definition of repentance, see on Matt. iii. 2. And be baptized every one of you. Take on you the public profession of the religion of Christ, by being baptized in His name, and thus acknowledge yourselves to be His disciples and servants. For the remission of sins. "In reference to the remission or removal of sins," baptism pointing out the purifying influences of the Holy Spirit. Ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. Receive the baptism, in reference to the removal of sins, and you shall receive the Holy Ghost, by whose agency alone the efficacy of the blood of the covenant is applied, and by whose refining power the heart is purified.

39. For the promise is unto you. Jews of the land of Judea. Not only the fulfillment of the promise which he had lately recited from the prophecy of Joel was made to them, but in this promise was also included the purification from sin, with every gift and grace of the Holy Spirit. To all that are afar off. To the Jews wherever dispersed, and to all the Gentile nations. Even as many as the Lord our God shall call, i.e., all to whom, in the course of His providence and grace, He shall send the preaching of Christ crucified.

more. Among other things he said, Save yourselves from this untoward generation. "Give diligence to save yourselves from their ruin. Repent, and be baptized; and then you shall not be sharers in destruction with those with whom you have been sharers in sin. In order to this continue not with them in their sin. Save yourselves from this untoward generation. Partake not with them in their sins, that you share not with them in their plagues." To separate ourselves from wicked people is the only way to save ourselves from them. If we consider whither they are hastening, we shall see it is better to have the trouble of swimming against their stream than the danger of being carried down their stream. Those that repent of their sins, and give up themselves to Jesus Christ, must evidence their sincerity by breaking off all intimate society with wicked people.

IV. Here is the happy success and issue of this, v. 41. The Spirit wrought with the word, and wrought wonders by it. These same persons that had many of them been eye-witnesses of the death of Christ, were yet wrought upon by the preaching of the word. They received the word; and then only the word does us good, when we do receive it, and bid it welcome. They gladly received it. Herod heard the word gladly, but these gladly received it. They were baptized and enrolled themselves among the disciples of Christ by that sacred rite and ceremony which he had instituted. Those that receive the Christian covenant ought to receive the Christian baptism. Hereby there were added to the disciples to the number of about three thousand souls that same day. All those that had received the Holy Ghost had their tongues at work to preach, and their hands at work to baptize; for it was time to be busy, when such a harvest was to be gathered in. The conversion of these three thousand with these words was a greater work than the feeding of four or five thousand with a few loaves. These were added to them. When we take God for our God, we must take his people to be our people.

Verses 42–47

In these verses we have the history of the truly primitive church, its state of infancy indeed, but, like that, the state of its greatest innocence.

I. They kept close to holy ordinances. Christianity will dispose the soul to communion with God in all those ways wherein he has appointed us to meet him and promised to meet us.

1. They were diligent and constant in their attendance upon the preaching of the word. They continued in the apostles' doctrine. Those who have given up their names to Christ must make conscience of hearing his word.

2. They kept up the communion of saints. They continued in fellowship (v. 42), and continued daily with one accord in the temple, v. 46. They were much together. Wherever you saw one disciple, you would see more, like birds of a feather. See how these Christians love one another. They had fellowship with one another in religious worship. They met in the temple: there was their rendezvous; for joint-fellowship with God is the best fellowship we can have with one another. They were daily in the temple. Worshipping God is to be our daily work. They were with one accord; not only no discord nor strife, but a great deal of holy love among them.

3. They frequently joined in the ordinance of the Lord's supper. They continued in the breaking of bread. They broke bread from house to house; they administered that ordinance in private houses; and they went from one to another of these little synagogues or domestic chapels, and there celebrated the eucharist with those that usually met there to worship God.

4. They continued in prayers. After the Spirit was poured out, as well as before, they continued instant in prayer; for prayer will never be superseded till it comes to be swallowed up in everlasting praise.

5. They abounded in thanksgiving; were continually praising God, v. 47. This should have a part in every prayer, and not be crowded into a corner.

II. They were loving one to another and their joining together in holy ordinances very much endeared them to one another.

1. They had frequent meetings for Christian converse (v. 44): All that believed were together. They associated together, and so both expressed and increased their mutual love.

2. They had all things common. There was such a readiness to help one another that it might be said, They had all things common, according to the law of friendship.

appeals, are omitted. Save yourselves from this untoward generation—as if Peter already foresaw the hopeless impenitence of the nation at large, and would have his hearers hasten in for themselves and secure their own salvation.

41-47. BEAUTIFUL BEGINNINGS OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. 41-47. they that gladly received his word were baptized—"It is difficult to say how 3000 could be baptized in one day, according to the old practice of a complete submersion; and the more as in Jerusalem there was no water at hand except Kidron and a few pools. The difficulty can only be removed by supposing that they already employed sprinkling, or baptized in houses in large vessels. Formal submersion in rivers, or larger quantities of water, probably took place only where the locality conveniently allowed it" [OLSHAUSEN]. the same day there were added to them about 3000 souls—fitting inauguration of the new kingdom, as an economy of the Spirit!

42. continued steadfastly in—'attended constantly upon.' the apostles' doctrine—'teaching'; giving themselves up to the instructions which, in their raw state, would be indispensable to the consolidation of the immense multitude suddenly admitted to visible discipleship. fellowship—in its largest sense.

breaking of bread—not certainly in the Lord's Supper alone, but rather in frugal repasts taken together, with which the Lord's Supper was probably conjoined until abuses and persecution led to the discontinuance of the common meal. prayers—probably, stated seasons of it.

47. Praising God—"Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart, for God now accepteth thy works" (Eccles. 9:7, see also on ch. 8:39).

40. Save yourselves from this untoward generation. Separate yourselves from them. "Be saved." The power is present with you; make a proper use of it, and you shall be delivered from their obstinate unbelief, and the punishment that awaits it in the destruction of them and their city by the Romans.

41. They that gladly received his word. The word which signifies "joyfully, readily, willingly" implies that they approved of the doctrine delivered, that they were glad to hear of this way of salvation, and that they began immediately to act according to its dictates. The word is however omitted by some MSS. Were baptized. That is, in the name of Jesus, v. 38, for this was the criterion of a Jew's conversion. This baptism was a very powerful means to prevent their apostasy; they had, by receiving baptism in the name of Jesus, renounced Judaism and all the political advantages connected with it. Dr. Lightfoot has well remarked that the Gentiles who received the Christian doctrine were baptized in the "name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost"; whereas the Jewish converts, for the reasons already given, were baptized in the "name of the Lord Jesus." Were added . . . three thousand souls. They went over from one party to another. The Greek writers make use of this verb to signify that act by which cities, towns, or provinces changed their masters, and put themselves under another government. So these 3,000 persons left the scribes and Pharisees, and put themselves under the teaching of the apostles, professing the Christian doctrine, and acknowledging that Christ was come, and that He who was lately crucified by the Jews was the promised and only Messiah; and in this faith they were baptized. These 3,000 were not converted under one discourse, nor in one place, nor by one person. All the apostles preached, some in one language, and some in another; and not in one house—for where was there one at that time that could hold such a multitude of people? For, out of the multitudes that heard, 3,000 were converted. The truth seems to be this: All the apostles preached in different parts of the city during the course of that day; and "in that day" 3,000 converts were the fruits of the conjoint exertions of these holy men.

42. They continued stedfastly in the apostles' doctrine. They received it, retained it, and acted on its principles. And fellowship. Koinonia, "community," meaning association for religious and spiritual purposes.

46. They, continuing daily with one accord in the temple. They were present at all the times of public worship, and joined together in prayers and praises to God; for it is not to be supposed that they continued to offer any of the sacrifices prescribed by the law.

And in breaking of bread. Whether this means the holy Eucharist or their common meals, it is difficult to say. Breaking of bread was that act which preceded a feast or meal, and which was performed by the master of the house when he pronounced the blessing—what we would call "grace" before meat.

44. And all that believed. "The believers," i.e., those who conscientiously credited the doctrine concerning the incarnation, crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ, and had, in consequence, received redemption in His blood. Were together. "These words signify either, in one time, chap. iii. 1; or in one place, chap. ii. 1; or in one thing. The last of these three senses seems to be the most proper here; for it is not probable that the believers, who were then 3,000 in number, v. 41, besides the 120 spoken of in chap. i. 15, were used all to meet at one time, or in one place, in Jerusalem." And had all things common. Perhaps this has not been understood. At all the public religious feasts in Jerusalem there was a sort of community of goods. No man at such times hired houses or beds in Jerusalem; all were lent gratis by the owners. Also, provisions of water were made for them at the public expense.

MATTHEW HENRY

3. They were very cheerful; they did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart. They brought the comforts of God's table along with them to their own. It made them very pleasant, and enlarged their hearts with holy joy. None have such cause to be cheerful as good Christians have; it is a pity but that they should always have hearts to be so. It made them very liberal to their poor brethren. They did eat their meat with singleness of heart—with liberality of heart; so some: they did not eat their morsels alone, but bade the poor welcome to their table. It becomes Christians to be open-hearted and open-handed.

4. They raised a fund for charity (v. 45): They sold their possessions and goods, and parted the money to their brethren, as every man had need. This was to destroy not property, but selfishness. Here in, probably, they had an eye to the command which Christ gave to the rich man, as a test of his sincerity, Sell that thou hast, and give to the poor. Not that this was intended for an example to be a constant binding rule. But here the case was extraordinary. They were under no obligation of a divine command to do this, as appears by what Peter said to Ananias (ch. v. 4): Was it not in thine own power? But it was a very commendable instance of their love to their brethren, their compassion to the poor, and their great zeal for the encouraging of Christianity, and the nursing of it in its infancy. Our rule is, to give according as God has blessed us.

III. God owned them, and gave them signal tokens of his presence with them (v. 43): Many wonders and signs were done by the apostles.

But the Lord's giving them power to work miracles was not all he did for them; he added to the church daily. The word in their mouths did wonders, and God blessed their endeavours.

IV. The people were influenced by it. They feared them (v. 43): Fear came upon every soul. They had abundance of spiritual gifts that were truly honourable, which possessed men with an inward reverence for them. The souls of people were strangely influenced by their awful preaching and living. They favoured them. Though we have reason to think there were those that despised them, yet far the greater part of the common people had a kindness for them—they had favour with all the people. Here we find them in favour with them all, by which it appears that their prosecuting Christ was a sort of force put upon them by the artifices of the priests; now they returned to their wits, to their right mind. Undissembled piety and charity will command respect; and cheerfulness in serving God will recommend religion to those that are without. They fell over to them. Some or other were daily coming in, and they were such as should be saved.

-and breaking bread from house to house—Rather, 'at home' (margin), i.e., in private, as contrasted with their temple-worship, but in some stated place or places of meeting. eat their meat with gladness—'exultation'—and singleness of heart.

43. fear came upon every soul—A deep awe rested upon the whole community.

having favour with all the people—commending themselves by their lovely demeanor to the admiration of all who observed them. And the Lord—i.e., JESUS, as the glorified Head and Ruler of the Church. added—kept adding; i.e., to the visible community of believers, though the words "to the Church" are wanting in the most ancient MSS. such as should be saved—Rather, 'the saved,' or 'those who were being saved.' "The young Church had but few peculiarities in its outward form, or even in its doctrine: the single discriminating principle of its few members was that they all recognized the crucified Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah. This confession would have been a thing of no importance, if it had only presented itself as a naked declaration, and would never in such a case have been able to form a community that would spread itself over the whole Roman empire. It acquired its value only through the power of the Holy Ghost, passing from the apostles as they preached to the hearers; for He brought the confession from the very hearts of men (I Cor. 12:3), and like a burning flame made their souls glow with love. By the power of this Spirit, therefore, we behold the first Christians not only in a state of active fellowship, but also internally changed: the narrow views of the natural man are broken through; they have their possessions in common, and they regard themselves as one family" [OLSHAUSEN].

ADAM CLARKE

Therefore a sort of community of goods was no strange thing at Jerusalem at such times as these. It appears, however, that this community of goods was carried further; for we are informed, v. 45, that they sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need. But this probably means that, as in consequence of this remarkable outpouring of the Spirit of God and their conversion they were detained longer at Jerusalem than they had originally intended, they formed a kind of community for the time being, that none might suffer want on the present occasion; as no doubt the unbelieving Jews, who were mockers, v. 13, would treat these new converts with the most marked disapprobation.

Breaking bread from house to house. This may signify that select companies, who were contiguous to each other, frequently ate together at their respective lodgings on their return from public worship. But kat'oikon, which we translate from house to house, is repeatedly used by the Greek writers for "at home" (see margin); for though they had all things in common, each person lived at his own table. Breaking bread is used to express the act of taking their meals. The bread of the Jews was thin, hard, and dry, and was never cut with the knife as ours is, but was simply broken by the hand. With gladness and singleness of heart. A true picture of genuine Christian fellowship. They ate their bread; they had no severe fasts. The Holy Spirit had done in their souls, by His refining influence, what others vainly expect from bodily austerities. It may also be said that, if they had no severe fasts, they had no splendid feasts; all was moderation, and all was contentment. They were full of gladness, spiritual joy and happiness; and singleness of heart, every man worthy of the confidence of his neighbor.

47. And the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved. Though many approved of the life and manners of these primitive Christians, yet they did not become members of this holy Church, God permitting none to be added to it but those who were "saved" from their sins and prejudices. Our translation such as should be saved is improper and insupportable. The original means simply and solely those who were then saved; those who were redeemed from their sins, and baptized into the faith of Jesus Christ.

We were told in general (ch. ii. 43) that many signs and wonders were done by the apostles. Here we have one given us for an instance.

I. The persons by whose ministry this miracle was wrought were Peter and John.

Peter and John had each of them a brother among the twelve, yet now they seem to be knit together more closely than either of them to his brother, for the bond of friendship is sometimes stronger than that of relation. Peter and John seem to have had a peculiar intimacy after Christ's resurrection more than before. It was good evidence of Peter's acceptance with God, upon his repentance, that Christ's favourite was made his bosom friend.

II. The time and place are here set down. It was in the temple, whither Peter and John went up together. There were the shoals of fish among which the net of the gospel was to be cast. It is good to go up to the temple, to attend on public ordinances; and it is comfortable to go up together to the temple. The best society is society in worshipping God. It was at the hour of prayer. There must be a house of prayer and an hour of prayer. It is of use for private Christians so far to have their hours of prayer as may serve, though not to bind, yet to remind, conscience.

III. The patient on whom this miraculous cure was wrought, v. 2. He was a poor lame beggar at the temple gate. 1. He was a cripple, not by accident, but born so. He was lame from his mother's womb. Such piteous cases show us what we all are by nature spiritually: without strength, lame from our birth, unable to work or walk in God's service. 2. He was a beggar. Being unable to work for his living, he must live upon alms; such are God's poor. He was laid daily at one of the gates of the temple to ask alms of those that entered into the temple. Those that need,

VSS. 1-26. PETER HEALS A LAME MAN AT THE TEMPLE GATE—HIS ADDRESS TO THE WONDERING MULTITUDE. 1-11. Peter and John—already associated by their Master, first with James (Mark 1: 29; 5:37; 9:2), then by themselves (Luke 22:8; and see John 13:23, 24). Now we find them constantly together, but John (yet young) only as a silent actor. went up—were going up, were on their way.

2. a certain man lame from his mother's womb—and now "above 40 years old" (ch. 4:22)—was carried—was wont to be carried.

CHAPTER 3

1. Peter and John went up together. The words which we translate together, and which are the first words in this chapter in the Greek text, are added by several MSS. and versions to the last verse of the preceding chapter. But they do not make as good a sense there as they do here; and should be translated, not together, which really makes no sense here, but "at that time"; intimating that this transaction occurred about the same time as those which are mentioned at the close of the former chapter. At the hour of prayer. This, as is immediately added, was the ninth hour, which answers, in a general way, to our three o'clock in the afternoon. It appears that there were three hours of the day destined by the Jews to public prayer; perhaps they are referred to by David, Ps. lv. 17: "Evening, and morning, and at noon, will I pray, and cry aloud." There are three distinct times marked in the Book of the Acts. The third hour, chap. ii. 15, answering, as we have already seen, to nearly our nine o'clock in the morning; the sixth hour, chap. x. 9, answering to about twelve with us; and the ninth hour, mentioned in this verse, and answering to our three in the afternoon. I should be glad to know that every Christian in the universe observed the same rule. It is the most natural division of the day; and he who conscientiously observes these three stated times of prayer will infallibly grow in grace and in the knowledge of Jesus Christ our Lord.

2. A . . . man lame from his mother's womb. The case of this man must have been well-known: (1) from the long standing of his inand cannot work, must not be ashamed to beg. Our prayers and our alms should go together. Objects of charity should be in a particular manner welcome to us when we go up to the temple to pray; it is a pity that common beggars at church doors should any of them be of such a character as to discourage charity; but they ought not always to be overlooked: some there are surely that merit regard, and better feed ten drones, yea, and some wasps, than let one bee starve. The gate of the temple at which he was laid is here named: it was called Beautiful. It was no diminution to the beauty of this gate that a poor man lay there begging. 3. He begged of Peter and John (v. 3), begged an alms; this was the utmost he expected from them. He asked an alms, and had a cure.

IV. We have here the method of the cure.

1. His expectations were raised. Peter, instead of turning his eyes from him, fastened his eyes upon him, v. 4. John did so too, they said, Look on us. This gave him cause to expect that he should receive something from them, and therefore he gave heed to them, v. 5. We must come to God with hearts fixed and expectations raised. We must look up to heaven and expect to receive.

2. His expectation of an alms was disappointed. Peter said, "Silver and gold have I none." It is not often that Christ's friends and favourites have abundance of the wealth of this world. Peter and John had abundance of money laid at their feet, but this was appropriated to the maintenance of the poor of the church. Public trusts ought to be strictly and faithfully observed. Many who are well inclined to works of charity are yet not in a capacity of doing anything considerable, while others, who have wherewithal to do much, have not a heart to do anything.

3. His expectations were quite outdone. Peter had no money to give him. He had that which was better, such a power from heaven, as to be able to cure his disease. Those who are poor in the world may yet be rich, very rich, in spiritual gifts. He gave him that which was better—the cure of his disease. This would enable him to work for his living, so that he would not need to beg any more; nay, he would have to give to those that needed. When Peter had no silver and gold to give, yet (says he) such as I have I give thee. Those who have not silver and gold have their limbs and senses, and with these may be serviceable to the blind, and lame, and sick, and if they be not, neither would they give to them if they had silver and gold. How the cure was wrought. Peter bids a lame man rise up and walk, which would have been a banter upon him if he had not premised in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth. He bids the cripple rise up and walk. If he attempt to rise and walk, and depend upon a divine power to enable him to do it, he shall be enabled; and by rising and walking he must evidence that that power has wrought upon him; and then let him take the comfort, and let God have the praise. Peter lent his hand, and helped him (v. 7): He took him by the right hand and lifted him up. When God by his word commands us to rise, and walk in the way of his commandments, he will give his Spirit to take us by the hand, and lift us up. If we set ourselves to do what we can, God has promised his grace to enable us to do what we cannot. His feet and ankle-bones received strength; he does his part, and Peter does his, and yet it is Christ that does all: it is he that puts strength into him.

V. Here is the impression which this cure made upon the patient himself. He leaped up, in obedience to the command, Arise. He started up, as one refreshed with sleep, that questioned not his own strength. The incomes of strength were sudden, and he was no less sudden in showing them. He stood, and walked. He trod strongly, and moved steadily; and this was to manifest the cure. Those who have had experience of the working of divine grace upon them should evidence what they have experienced. Has God put strength into us? Let us stand up resolutely for him, and walk cheerfully with him. He held Peter and John, v. 11. We need not ask why he held them. I believe he scarcely knew himself: but it was in a transport of joy that he embraced them. Thus he testified his affection to them; he held them, and would not let them go. Those whom God hath healed love those whom he made instruments of their healing, and see the need of their further help. He entered with them into the temple. His strong affection to them held them; but it could not hold them so fast as to keep them out of the temple. He is resolved to go with them, and the rather because they are going into the temple. Like the impotent man whom Christ cured, he was presently found in the temple, John v. 14. He was there walking, and leaping, and praising God. The strength God has given us, both in mind and body, should be made use of to his praise. This

4. Peter fastening his eyes on him with John, said, Look on us. 5. And he gave heed—that, through the eye, faith might be aided in its birth.

6. Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I thee.—What a lofty superiority breathes in these words!

In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth rise up and walk.—These words, uttered with supernatural power, doubtless begat in this poor man the faith that sent healing virtue through his diseased members.

7. And he took . . . and lifted him up—precisely what his Lord had done to his own mother-in-law (Mark 1:31). his feet—'soles'—and ankle bones . . .—the technical language of a physician (Col. 4:14).

firmity; (2) from his being daily exposed in a place so public. It appears that he had no power to walk, and was what we term a "cripple," for he was carried to the gate of the Temple, and laid there in order to excite compassion. These circumstances are all marked by Luke, the more fully to show the greatness and incontestable nature of the miracle. The gate . . . which is called Beautiful. There are different opinions concerning this gate. Josephus observes (Bell, Jud., l. v, c. 5, s. 3) that the Temple had nine gates, which were on every side covered with gold and silver; but there was one gate which was without the holy house, and was of Corinthian brass, and greatly excelled those which were only covered with gold and silver. The magnitudes of the other gates were equal one to another; but that of the Corinthian gate, which opened on the east, over against the gate of the holy house itself, was much larger. "For its height was fifty cubits, and its doors were forty cubits, and it was adorned after a most costly manner, as having much richer and thicker plates of silver and gold upon them than upon the other." This last was probably the gate which is here called Beautiful; because it was on the outside of the Temple, to which there was an easy access, and because it was evidently the most costly, according to the account in Josephus.

4. Look on us. He wished to excite and engage his attention that he might see what was done to produce his miraculous cure, and, it is likely, took this occasion to direct his faith to Jesus Christ. Peter and John probably felt themselves suddenly drawn by the Holy Spirit to pronounce the healing name in behalf of this poor man.

5. Expecting to receive something of them. Because it was a constant custom for all who entered the Temple to carry money with them to give to the treasury, or to the poor, or to both. It was on this ground that the friends of the lame man laid him at the gate of the Temple, as this was the most likely place to receive alms.

6. Silver and gold have I none. Though it was customary for all those who entered the Temple to carry some money with them, for the purposes mentioned above, yet so poor were the apostles that they had nothing to give, either to the sacred treasury or to the distressed. The popish writers are very dexterous at forming analogies between Peter and the pope, but it is worthy of note that they have not attempted any here. Thomas Aquinas, surnamed the angelical doctor, who was highly esteemed by Pope Innocent IV, going one day into the pope's chamber, where they were reckoning large sums of money, the pope, addressing himself to Aquinas, said: "You see that the Church is no longer in an age in which she can say, Silver and gold have I none?" "It is true, holy father," replied the angelical doctor, "nor can she now say to the lame man, Rise up and walk!"..

7. Immediately his feet and ancle bones received strength. The suddenness of the cure was the proof of the miracle; his walking and leaping were the evidences of it.

11. Held Peter and John. He felt the strongest affection for them, as the instruments by which the divine influence was conveyed to his diseased body. In the porch that is called Solomon's. On this portico see Bishop Pearce's note, inserted in this work, John x. 23.

8. Walking, and leaping, and praising God. These actions are very naturally described. He walked in obedience to the command of the apostle to rise up and walk; he leaped, to try the strength of his limbs, and to be convinced man, as soon as he could leap, leaped for joy in God, and praised him. All true converts walk and praise God; but perhaps young converts leap more in his praises.

VI. How the people that were eye-witnesses of this miracle were influenced by it. 1. They were entirely satisfied in the truth of the miracle. They knew it was he that sat begging at the beautiful gate of the temple, v. 10. He had sat there so long that they all knew him. They now saw him walking and praising God (v. 9). He was now as loud in praising God as he had before been in begging relief. Mercies are then perfected, when they are sanctified. 2. They were astonished at it: They were filled with wonder and amazement (v. 10); greatly wondering, v. 11. There seems to have been this effect of the pouring out of the Spirit, that the people were much more affected with the miracles the apostles wrought than they had been with those that had been wrought by Christ himself. 3. They gathered about Peter and John: All the people ran together unto them in Solomon's porch. Here the people met, to see this great sight.

Verses 12–26

We have here the sermon which Peter preached. When Peter saw it. When he saw the people got together in a crowd, he took that opportunity to preach Christ to them. When he saw the people affected with the miracle, he sowed the gospel seed in the ground which was thus prepared to receive it. When he saw the people ready to adore him and John, he diverted their respect from them, that it might be directed to Christ only.

I. He humbly disclaims the honour of the miracle. He addresses himself to them as men of Israel, men to whom pertained, not only the law and the promises, but the gospel and the performances. Two things he asks them: 1. Why they were so surprised at the miracle itself: Why marvel you at this? It was indeed marvellous, but it was no more than what Christ had done many a time. It was but a little before that Christ had raised Lazarus from the dead; and why should this then seem so strange? Stupid people think that strange now which might have been familiar to them if it had not been their own fault. Christ had lately risen from the dead himself; why did they not marvel at this? 2. Why they gave so much of the praise of it to them, who were only the instruments of it: Why look you so earnestly on us? It was certain that they had made this man to walk, by which it appeared that the apostles not only were sent of God, but were sent to be blessings to the world. Yet they did not do it by any power or holiness of their own. The power they did it by was wholly derived from Christ. The power which Christ gave them to do it they had not deserved: it was not by their own holiness. Peter was a sinful man. Yet he wrought miracles in Christ's name. It was the people's fault that they attributed it to their power and holiness. The instruments of God's favour to us, must not be idolized. It was the praise of Peter and John that they would not take the honour of this miracle to themselves, but carefully transmitted it to Christ. Useful men must see to it that they be very humble.

II. He preaches Christ to them.

1. He preaches Christ, as the true Messiah promised to the fathers (v. 13). He is Jesus the Son of God. He is his Son Jesus; to him dear as a Son; to us, Jesus, a Saviour. God hath glorified him, in raising him up. He hath glorified him as the God of our fathers, the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob. God sent him into the world, pursuant to the promises made to those patriarchs. The gospel they preached was the revelation of the mind and will of the God of Abraham.

2. He charges them flatly and plainly with the murder of this Jesus: "You delivered him up, and you of the common people were influenced to clamour against him, as if he had been a public grievance." You denied him, and you disowned him, could not look upon him as the Messiah, because he came not in external pomp and power; you denied him in the presence of Pilate. "You were worse than Pilate, for he would have released him, if you had let him follow his own judgment. You denied the holy One and the Just." The holiness and justice of the Lord Jesus, which are something more than his innocency, were a great aggravation of the sin of those that put him to death. "You desired a murderer to be released, and Christ crucified." You killed the prince of life. "You preserved a murderer, a destroyer of life; and destroyed the Saviour, the author of life. You killed the prince of life, and so not only forsook, but rebelled against your own mercies."

3. He attests his resurrection as before, ch. ii. 32. "You thought the prince of life might be deprived of his life. But of his resurrection we are all

9. all the people saw him . . .—as they assembled at the hour of public prayer, in the temple courts; so that the miracle had the utmost publicity. 10. they knew that it was he which sat for alms . . .—(Cf. John 9:8).

all the people ran together unto them in the porch . . .—How vividly do these graphic details bring the whole scene before us! Thus was Peter again furnished with a vast audience, whose wonder at the spectacle of the healed beggar clinging to his benefactors prepared them to listen with reverence to his words.

12-16. why marvel at this?—For miracles are marvels only in relation to the limited powers of man.

as though by our own power or holiness we had made this man to walk.—Neither the might nor the merit of the cure are due to us, mere agents of Him whom we preach.

13. The God of Abraham . . .—See on ch. 2:22, 36. hath glorified his Son Jesus—rather, 'his Servant Jesus,' as the same word is rendered in Matthew 12:18, but in that high sense in which Isaiah applies it always to Messiah (Isa. 42:1; 49:6; 52:13; 53:11). When 'Son' is intended a different word is used.

whom ye delivered up . . .—With what heroic courage does Peter here charge his auditors with the heaviest of all conceivable crimes, and with what terrific strength of language are these charges clothed!

15. killed the Prince of life—Glorious paradox, but how piercing to the conscience of the auditors.

of the reality of the cure; he praised God, as a testimony of the gratitude he felt for the cure he had received. Now was fulfilled, in the most literal manner, the words of the Prophet Isaiah, chap. xxxv. 6: "Then shall the lame man leap as an hart."

9. And all the people saw him. The miracle was wrought in the most public manner, and in the most public place, and in a place where the best judgment could be formed of it. For, as it was a divine operation, the priests were the most proper persons to judge of it; and under their notice it was now wrought.

ALBERT BARNES:

"Why marvel ye at this?" The particular thing which he intended to reprove here was not that they wondered, for that was proper; but that they looked on himself and John as if they had been the authors of this healing. They ought to have understood it. The Jews were sufficiently acquainted with miracles to interpret them and to know whence they proceeded; and they ought not, therefore, to ascribe them to man, but to inquire why they had been wrought by God. "Why look ye?" Why do ye fix the eyes with amazement on us, as though we could do this? Why not look at once to God? "By our own power." By any art of healing or by any medicine we had done this. "Or holiness." Piety. As if God had bestowed this on us on account of our personal and eminent piety. It may be remarked that here was ample opportunity for them to establish a reputation of their own. The people were disposed to pay them honor; they might at once have laid claim to vast authority over them; but they refused all such personal honor and ascribed all to the Lord Jesus. Whatever success may attend the ministers of the gospel, or however much the world may be disposed to do them honor, they should disclaim all power in themselves, and ascribe it to the Lord Jesus Christ. It is not by the talents or personal holiness of ministers, valuable as these are, that men are saved; it is only by the power of God, designed to honor his Son (see 2 Cor. 3:5, 6). —Popular Commentary

12. As though by our own power. "Miraculous energy." Or holiness. Meaning "religious attachment to the worship of God." Do not think that we have wrought this miracle by any power of our own; or that any supereminent piety in us should have induced God thus to honor us, by enabling us to work it.

13. The God of Abraham. This was wisely introduced, to show them that He whom they called their God had acknowledged Jesus Christ for His Son, and wrought this miracle in His name; and by thus honoring Jesus, whom they slew, He had charged home the guilt of that murder upon them. Denied him in the presence of Pilate. You have renounced Him as your King, and denounced Him to death as a malefactor, when Pilate, convinced of His perfect innocense, was determined, "judged" it proper and just, to let Him go. Pilate wished to act according to justice; you acted contrary to justice and equity in all their forms.

14. Ye denied the Holy One. A manifest reference to Ps. xvi. 10: "Thou wilt not . . . suffer thine Holy One to see corruption." And desired a murderer. Barabbas. The case must have been fresh in their own remembrance. Like cleaves to like, and begets its like; they were murderers themselves, and so Christ calls them, Matt. xxii. 7, and they preferred a murderer to the holy and righteous One of God.

15. And killed the Prince of life. "The author of this life," not only implying that all life proceeds from Jesus Christ as its Source, but that the life-giving influence of that religion which they were now proclaiming came all through Him. Archegos signifies a "prime leader or author, a captain." In Heb. ii. 10, Christ is witnesses."

4. He ascribes the cure of this impotent man to the power of Christ (v. 16): His name, through faith in his name, has made this man strong. He repeats it again, The faith which is by him hath given him this soundness. (1) He appeals to themselves concerning the truth of the miracle; the man on whom it was wrought is one whom you see, and know. The miracle was wrought publicly, in the presence of you all, in the gate of the temple. The cure is complete; it is a perfect soundness; you see the man walks and leaps. (2) He acquaints them with the power by which it was wrought. It is done by the name of Christ. That name which Christ has above every name; his authority, his command has done it; as writs run in the king's name, though it is an inferior officer that executes them. The power of Christ is fetched in through faith in his name, and it is for his sake, that he may have the glory of it. Those that wrought this miracle by faith derived power from Christ to work it, and therefore returned all the glory to him. Peter both confirmed the great gospel truth they were to preach to the world—that Jesus Christ is the fountain of all power and grace, and the great healer and Saviour—and recommended the great gospel duty of faith in him as the only way of receiving benefit by him. Thus does Peter preach unto them Jesus, and him crucified.

III. He encourages them to hope that they might find mercy; he does all he can to convince them, yet is careful not to drive them to despair. 1. He mollifies their crime by a candid imputation of it to their ignorance. He saw it needful to mitigate the rigour of the charge by calling them brethren; and well might he call them so, for he had been himself a brother with them in this iniquity: he had denied the Holy One and the Just, and sworn that he did not know him. I know that through ignorance you did it, as did also your rulers, v. 17. This was the language of Peter's charity, and teaches us to make the best of those whom we desire to make better. He has the example of his Master's praying for his crucifiers, and pleading in their behalf that they knew not what they did. Perhaps some of the rulers, and of the people did it through malice; but the generality went down the stream, and did it through ignorance. 2. He mollifies the effects of their crime, it was according to the scriptures (v. 18). So he himself saith: Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer. "You fulfilled the scripture, and did not know it; God, by your hands, hath fulfilled what he showed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer; this was his design but you had views of your own, and were altogether ignorant of this design. God was fulfilling the scripture when you were gratifying your own passions." This is no extenuation at all of their sin in hating and persecuting Christ to the death, yet it was an encouragment to them to repent, and hope for mercy. The death and sufferings of Christ were for the remission of sins, and the ground of that display of mercy for which he now encouraged them to hope.

IV. He exhorts them all to turn Christians.

1. He tells them what they must believe. They must believe that Jesus Christ is the promised seed, v. 25. Jesus, who was of the seed of Abraham, according to the flesh, and in him all the families of the earth are blessed, and not the families of Israel only. They must believe that Jesus Christ is a prophet, that prophet like unto Moses whom God had promised to raise up to them from among their brethren, v. 22. Christ is a prophet, for by him God speaks unto us. He is a prophet like unto Moses. He was a deliverer of his people out of bondage, like Moses. Moses was faithful as a servant, Christ as a Son. Moses was a pattern of meekness and patience, so is Christ. There was no prophet like unto Moses, but a greater than Moses is here where Christ is. He is a prophet of God's raising up. He was raised up unto Israel in the first place. They had the first offer of divine grace made to them; and therefore he was raised up from among them. If he come to his own, one would think, they should receive him. The Old Testament church was blessed with many prophets from Samuel, and those that follow after, v. 24; but, these servants being abused, last of all God sent them his Son. They must believe that times of refreshing will come from the presence of the Lord (v. 19), and that they will be the times of the restitution of all things, v. 21. The absence of the Lord occasions many of the securities of sinners and the distrusts of saints; but his presence is hastening on, which will for ever silence both. The presence of the Lord will introduce, (1) The restitution of all things (v. 21); the renovation of the whole creation; that end of all things which God hath spoken of by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. This is more clearly

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

16. his name, through faith in his name, hath made this man strong . . .—With what skill does the apostle use the miracle both to glorify his ascended Lord and bring the guilt of His blood more resistlessly home to his audience!

17-21. And now, brethren.—Our preacher, like his Master, "will not break the bruised reed." His heaviest charges are prompted by love, which now hastens to assuage the wounds it was necessary to inflict. I wot—'know.' through ignorance ye did it—(See marginal reference).

18. that Christ—The best MSS. read, 'that His Christ'—should suffer—The doctrine of a SUFFERING MESSIAH was totally at variance with the current views of the Jewish Church, and hard to digest even by the Twelve, up to the day of their Lord's resurrection. Our preacher himself revolted at it, and protested against it, when first nakedly announced, for which he received a terrible rebuke. Here he affirms it to be the fundamental truth of ancient prophecy realized unwittingly by the Jews themselves, yet by a glorious divine ordination. How great a change had the Pentecostal illumination wrought upon his views!

22-26. a prophet . . . like unto me—particularly in intimacy of communication with God (Num. 12:6-8), and as the mediatorial Head of a new order of things (Heb. 3:2-6). Peter takes it for granted that, in the light of all he had just said, it would be seen at once that One only had any claim to be that Prophet.

24. foretold of these days—of Messiah; all pointing to "the time of reformation" (Heb. 9:10), though with more or less distinctness.

21. until the times—embracing the whole period between the ascension and the second advent of Christ. restitution of all things—comprehending, probably, the rectification of all the disorders of the fall.

ADAM CLARKE

called the "captain of . . . salvation." He teaches the doctrine of life and salvation, leads the way in which men should walk, and has purchased the eternal life and glory which are to be enjoyed at the end of the way. So the Jews preferred a son of death, a destroyer of life, to the Author and Procurer of life and immortality!

16. And his name. Jesus, the Saviour; through faith in his name, as the Saviour, and Author of life, and all its concomitant blessings, such as health.

17. I wot. "I know." Wot is from Anglo-Saxon; and hence "wit," science or understanding. Through ignorance ye did it. This is a very tender excuse for them; and one which seems to be necessary in order to show them that their state was not utterly desperate. For if all that they did to Christ had been through absolute malice (they well knowing who He was), if any sin could be supposed to be unpardonable, it must have been theirs. Peter, foreseeing that they might be tempted thus to think, and consequently to despair of salvation, tells them that their offense was extenuated by their ignorance of the Person they had tormented and crucified.

18. But those things . . . he hath so fulfilled. Your ignorance and malice have been overruled by the sovereign wisdom and power of God, and have become the instruments of fulfilling the divine purpose, that Christ must suffer in order to make an atonement for the sin of the world. All his prophets had declared this; some of them in express terms, others indirectly and by symbols.

22. Moses truly said unto the fathers. From this appeal to Moses it is evident that Peter wished them to understand that Jesus Christ was come, not as an ordinary prophet, to exhort to repentance and amendment, but as a Legislator, who was to give them a new law, and whose commands and precepts they were to obey, on pain of endless destruction.

The times of restitution of all things. The word apokatastasis from apo, which signifies "from," and kathistanein, to "establish or settle" anything, viz., in a good state; and, when apo is added to it, then this preposition implies that this good state in which it is settled was preceded by a bad one, from which the change is made to a good one. So in chap. i. 6, when the disciples said to Christ, "Wilt thou at this time and plainly revealed in the New Testament than it had been before. (2) With this will come the times of refreshing (v. 19), like a cool shade to those that have borne the burden and heat of the day. All Christians look for a rest that remains for the people of God, after the travails and toils of their present state. The refreshing that then comes from the presence of the Lord will continue eternally in the presence of the Lord.

2. He tells them what they must do. They must repent; they must begin anew. Peter, who had himself denied Christ, repented, and he would have them to do so too. They must be converted, must face about; they must return to the Lord their God. It is not enough to repent of sin, but we must be converted from it, and not return to it again. They must hear Christ, the great prophet: "Him shall you hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you. Hear him with a divine faith, as prophets should be heard. Hear him in all things; let his laws govern all your actions. Whatever he saith to you, bid it welcome." It is at our peril if we turn a deaf ear to his call (v. 23): Every soul that will not hear that prophet shall be destroyed from among the people. Those that will not be advised by the Saviour can expect no other than to fall into the hands of the destroyer.

3. He tells them what they might expect.

(1) That they should have the pardon of their sins (v. 19): Repent, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out. The remission of sin is the blotting of it out. When God forgives sin he remembers it no more against the sinner; it is forgotten, as that which is blotted out. We cannot expect our sins should be pardoned unless we repent of them, and turn from them to God. If no repentance, no remission. Hopes of the pardon of sin upon repentance should be a powerful inducement to us to repent. This was the first and great argument, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. The most comfortable fruit of the forgiveness of our sins will be when the times of refreshing shall come. During these times of toil and conflict (doubts and fears within, troubles and dangers without) we cannot have that full satisfaction of our pardon, and in it, that we shall have when the refreshing times come, which shall wipe away all tears.

(2) That they should have the comfort of Christ's coming (v. 20, 21): "He shall send Jesus Christ, that before was preached unto you. If you repent and be converted, you shall find no want of him; some way or other he shall be seen of you." We must not expect Christ's personal presence with us in this world; for the heavens, which received him out of the sight of the disciples, must retain him till the end of time. We must live by that faith in him which is the evidence of things not seen. Yet it is promised that he shall be sent to all that repent and are converted (v. 20): "He shall send Jesus Christ, who was preached to you. You shall have his spiritual presence. He that is sent into the world shall be sent to you; you shall have the comfort of his being sent. The sending of Christ to judge the world, at the end of time, will be a blessing to you." It seems to refer to this, for till then the heavens must receive him, v. 21.

4. He tells them what ground they had to expect these things, if they were converted to Christ.

(1) As Israelites they were, above any other, God's favourite nation. You are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant. A double privilege. [1] They were the children of the prophets. You are of that people from among whom prophets were raised up, and to whom prophets were sent. Those of the latter ages of the church, when prophecy had ceased, might yet be fitly called the children of the prophets, because they heard the voices of the prophets, which were read in their synagogues every sabbath day, ch. xiii. 27. Now this should quicken them to embrace Christ. Those that are blessed with prophets and prophecy (as all are that have the scriptures) are concerned not to receive the grace of God therein in vain. [2] They were the children, that is, the heirs, of the covenant which God made with our Fathers. "The promise of the Messiah was made to you, and therefore you may hope it shall be made good to you." If all the kindreds of the earth were to be blessed in Christ, much more that kindred, his kinsmen according to the flesh.

(2) As Israelites, they had the first offer of the grace of the New Testament. To them the Redeemer was first sent, which was an encouragement to them to hope that if they did repent, and were converted, he should be yet further sent for their comfort (v. 20). He shall send Jesus Christ, for to you first he hath sent him, v. 26. Unto you first, God, having raised up his Son Jesus from the dead, sent him to bless you, especially that great blessing of turning every one of you from his iniquities. [1] We are here told whence

19. when the times of refreshing shall come—rather, 'in order that the times of refreshing may come'; that long period of repose, prosperity and joy, which all the prophets hold forth to the distracted Church and this miserable world, as eventually to come, and which is here, as in all the prophets, made to turn upon the national conversion of Israel.

him shall ye hear in all things . . .—This part of the prediction is emphatically added, in order to shut up the audience to the obedience of faith, on pain of being finally "cut off" from the congregation of the righteous (Ps. 1:1).

20. he shall send Jesus Christ—The true reading is, 'He shall send your predestinated [or foreordained] Messiah, Jesus.'

25. Ye are the children . . . of the covenant—and so the natural heirs of its promises. in thy seed . . .—(See on Gal. 3:8, etc.).

26. God, having raised up—not from the dead, but having provided, prepared, and given. his Son Jesus—'His Servant Jesus' (see on vs. 13). sent him to bless you—lit., 'sent Him blessing you,' as if laden with blessing.

restore again the kingdom to Israel?" they meant, as the Greek word implies, Wilt Thou take the kingdom from the Romans, and give it back to the Jews? Now as the word is here connected with which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets, it must mean the accomplishment of all the prophecies and promises contained in the Old Testament relative to the kingdom of Christ upon earth, the whole reign of grace, from the ascension of our Lord till His coming again, for of all these things have the holy prophets spoken; and as the grace of the gospel was intended to destroy the reign of sin, its energetic influence is represented as restoring all things, destroying the bad state, and establishing the good—taking the kingdom out of the hands of sin and Satan, and putting it into those of righteousness and truth. This is done in every believing soul; all things are restored to their primitive order. Therefore the words are to be applied to this, and no other meaning. All his holy prophets. All is omitted by some MSS. Since the world began. Ap'aionos; as aion signifies complete and ever-during existence or eternity, it is sometimes applied, by way of accommodation, to denote the whole course of any one period, such as the Mosaic dispensation. See the note on Gen. xxi. 33. It may therefore here refer to that state of things from the giving of the law; and as Moses is mentioned in the next verse, and none before him, it is probable that the phrase should be so understood here. But if we apply it to the commencement of time, the sense is still good.

19. Repent ye therefore. Now that you are convinced that this was the Messiah, let your minds be changed and your hearts become contrite for the sins you have committed. And be converted. Turn to God through this Christ, deeply deploring your transgressions and believing on His name; that your sins may be blotted out, which are not only recorded against you, but for which you are condemned by the justice of God; and the punishment due to them must be executed upon you, unless prevented by your repentance, and turning to Him whom you have pierced. The blotting out of sins may refer to the ceremony of the waters of jealousy, where the curse that was written in the book was to be blotted out with the bitter water. See the note on Num. v. 23. When the times of refreshing shall come. "That the times of refreshing may come." Anapsyxis signifies a "breathing time, or respite," and may be here applied to the space that elapsed from this time till the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. This was a time of respite, which God gave them to repent of their sins, and be converted to himself. Taking the word in the sense of refreshment in general, it may mean the whole reign of the Kingdom of grace, and the blessings which God gives here below to all genuine believers, peace, love, joy, and communion with himself. See on v. 21.

20. Which before was preached unto you. Instead of before . . . preached, some MSS. have, who was "before designed, or appointed"; and this is without doubt the true reading. Christ crucified was the Person whom God had from the beginning "appointed" or "designed" for the Jewish people.

21. Whom the heaven must receive. He has already appeared upon earth, and accomplished the end of His appearing; He has ascended unto heaven to administer the concerns of His kingdom, and there He shall continue till He comes again to judge the quick and the dead.

25. Ye are the children of the prophets. As you are the children or disciples of the prophets, you are bound to believe their predictions, and obey their precepts; and not only so, but you are entitled to their promises. Your duty and your interest go hand in hand; and there is not a blessing contained in the covenant which was made with your fathers but belongs to you. Now as this covenant respected the blessings of the gospel, you must believe in Jesus Christ, in order to be put in possession of all those blessings.

26. Unto you first God, having raised up. As you are the children of the prophets and of the covenant, the first offers of salvation belong to you, and God thus makes them to you. God designs to bless you;

MATTHEW HENRY

Christ had his mission: God raised up his Son Jesus, and sent him. God raised him up when he constituted him a prophet. He sent him to bear witness of the truth, sent him to seek and save lost souls. Some refer the raising of him up to the resurrection. Though having raised him up, he seemed presently to take him from us, yet he did really send him afresh to us in his gospel and Spirit. [2] To whom he was sent: "Unto you first, you that are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant." The personal ministry of Christ, as that of the prophets, was confined to the Jews; to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and he forbade the disciples he then sent forth to go any further. After his resurrection, he was to be preached indeed to all nations, but they must begin at Jerusalem, Luke xxiv. 47. And, when they went to other nations, they first preached to the Jews they found therein. So far were they from being excluded for their putting Christ to death, that, when he is risen, he is first sent to them. [3] On what errand he was sent: "He is sent to you first, to bless you; not to condemn you, as you deserve, but to justify you." Christ's errand into the world was to bless us, and, when he left the world, he left a blessing behind him, for he was parted from the disciples as he blessed them, Luke xxiv. 51. It is by Christ that God sends blessings to us, and through him only we can expect to receive them. The great blessing was the turning of us away from our iniquities, that we may be qualified to receive all other blessings. Sin is that to which naturally we cleave; the design of divine grace is to turn us from it, nay, to turn us against it, that we may not only forsake it, but hate it. "Therefore, do your part: repent, and be converted, because Christ is ready to do his, in turning you from your iniquities, and so blessing you."

in turning away every one of you from his iniquities—i.e., 'Hitherto we have all been looking too much for a Messiah who should shed outward blessings upon the nation generally, and through it upon the world. But we have learned other things, and now announce to you that the great blessing with which Messiah has come laden is the turning away of every one of you from his iniquities.' With what divine skill does the apostle, founding on resistless facts, here drive home to the conscience of his auditors their guilt in crucifying the Lord of Glory; then soothe their awakened minds by assurances of forgiveness on turning to the Lord, and a glorious future as soon as this shall come to pass, to terminate with the Personal Return of Christ from the heavens whither He has ascended; ending all with warnings, from their own Scriptures, to submit to Him if they would not perish, and calls to receive from Him the blessings of salvation.

ADAM CLARKE

but it is by turning away every one of you from his iniquities. The salvation promised in the covenant is a salvation from sin, not from the Romans; and no man can have his sin blotted out who does not turn away from it.

CHAPTER 4

MATTHEW HENRY

Verses 1–4

We have here the powers of darkness appearing against them to put a stop to them. Let Christ's servants be ever so resolute, Satan's agents will be spiteful; and therefore, let Satan's agents be ever so spiteful, Christ's servants ought to be resolute.

I. The apostles, Peter and John, went on in their work, and did not labour in vain.

1. The preachers faithfully deliver the doctrine of Christ: They spoke unto the people, v. 1. They taught the people; taught those that as yet did not believe, for their conviction and conversion; and taught those that did believe, for their comfort and establishment. They preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead. The doctrine of the resurrection of the dead was verified in Jesus. They preached the resurrection of Christ as their warrant for what they did. It is secured by him to all believers. This they preached through Jesus Christ, attainable through him, and through him only. They meddled not with matters of state, but kept to their business, and preached to the people heaven as their end and Christ as their way.

2. The hearers cheerfully receive it (v. 4): Many of those who heard the word believed, to the number of about five thousand. Though the preachers were persecuted, the word prevailed; for sometimes the church's suffering days have been her growing days: the days of her infancy were so.

II. The chief priests and their party did what they could to crush them; their hands were tied awhile, but their hearts were not in the least changed. 1. Who they were that appeared against the apostles. They were the priests. With them was joined the captain of the temple, who, it is supposed, was a Roman officer. Still here were both Jews and Gentiles confederate against Christ. The Sadducees also, who denied the being of spirits and the future state, were zealous against them. 2. How they stood affected to the apostles' preaching: They were grieved that they taught the people, v. 2. It grieved them, both that the gospel doctrine was preached, and that the people were so ready to hear it. It vexed them to see that his gospel got ground, instead of losing it. Miserable is their case to whom the glory of Christ's kingdom is a grief. It grieved them that the apostles preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead. The Sadducees were grieved that the resurrection from the dead was preached; for they opposed that doctrine. The chief priests were grieved that they preached the resurrection of the dead through Jesus; they would rather give up that important article than have it preached and proved to be through Jesus. 3. How far they proceeded against the apostles (v. 3): They laid hands on them, and put them in hold until the next day. See how God trains up his servants for sufferings

Vss. 1-13. PETER AND JOHN BEFORE THE SANHEDRIM. 4. the number of the men—or males, exclusive of women; though the word sometimes includes both. about five thousand—and this in Jerusalem, where the means of detecting the imposture or crushing the fanaticism, if such it had been, were within everyone's reach, and where there was every inducement to sift it to the bottom.

1-12. the captain—of the Levitical guard—of the temple—annoyed at the disturbance created around it. and the Sadducees—who "say that there is no resurrection" (ch. 23:8), irritated at the apostles "preaching through [rather, 'in'] Jesus the resurrection from the dead"; for the resurrection of Christ, if a fact, effectually overthrew the Sadducean doctrine.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

"The captain of the temple" (ho strategos tou hierou). Twenty-four bands of Levites guarded the temple, one guard at a time. They watched the gates. The commander of each band was called captain (strategos). Josephus names this captain of the temple police next to the high priest (War. VI. 5, 3). "The Sadducees" (hoi Saddoukaioi). Most of the priests were Sadducees now and all the chief priests since John Hyrcanus I deserted the Pharisees (Josephus, Ant. XVII. 10, 6; XVIII. 1, 4; XX. 9, 1). The Sadducees were slow to line up with the Pharisees against Jesus, but they now take the lead against Peter and John. "Came upon them" (epestesan autois). Second aorist active indicative (intransitive). Burst upon them suddenly or stood by them in a hostile attitude here (Luke 20:1; 24:4; Acts 6:12; 17:5; 22:20; 23:11).—Word Pictures in the New Testament

4. The number . . . was about five thousand. That is, as I understand the passage, the 120 which were converted before Pentecost, the 3,000 converted at Pentecost, and 1,880 converted since the conversion of the 3,000, making in the whole 5,000, or about that number.

1. The priests. These persons had evidenced the most implacable enmity against Christ from the beginning. The Sadducees. Whose whole system was now in danger by the preaching of the resurrection of Christ; for they believed not in the immortality of the soul nor in any future world.

2. Being grieved. They were "thoroughly fatigued" with the continuance of this preaching; their minds suffered more labor, through vexation at the success of the apostles, than the bodies of the apostles did in their fatiguing exercise of preaching during the whole day.

by degrees; now they resist unto bonds only, but afterwards to blood.

We have here the trial of Peter and John before the judges of the ecclesiastical court.

I. Here is the court set. An extraordinary court, it should seem, was called on purpose upon this occasion. 1. The time when the court sat (v. 5)—on the morrow. They adjourned it to the morrow, and no longer; for they were impatient to get them silenced. 2. The place where—in Jerusalem (v. 6), where there were so many that looked for redemption before it came, yet there were more that would not look upon it when it did come. 3. The judges of the court. (1) Their general character: they were rulers, elders, and scribes, v. 5. The scribes were men of learning. The rulers and elders were men in power. The gospel of Christ had both the learning and power of the world against it. (2) The names of some of them, who were most considerable. Here were Annas and Caiaphas, ringleaders in this persecution; Annas the president of the sanhedrim, and Caiaphas the high priest (though Annas is here called so). However they were both equally malignant against Christ and his gospel. There were others likewise that were of the kindred of the high priest, who having dependence on him, would be sure to say as he said. Great relations, and not good, have been a snare to many.

II. The prisoners are arraigned, v. 7. They are brought to the bar; they set them in the midst, for the sanhedrim sat in a circle. The question they asked them was, "By what power, or by what name, have you done this? Who commissioned you to preach such a doctrine as this, and empowered you to work such a miracle as this?" They knew very well that they preached Jesus (v. 2), yet they asked them, to tease them, and try if they could get anything out of them that looked criminal.

III. The plea they put in, not so much to clear and secure themselves as to advance the name and honour of their Master.

1. By whom this plea was drawn up: it was dictated by the Holy Ghost. The apostles set themselves to preach Christ and then Christ made good to them his promise, that the Holy Ghost should give them in that same hour what they should speak. Christ's faithful advocates shall never want instructions, Mark xiii. 11.

2. To whom it was given in: Peter addresses himself to the judges of the court, as the rulers of the people, and elders of Israel; for the wickedness of those in power does not divest them of their power, but the consideration of the power they are entrusted with should prevail to divest them of their wickedness.

3. What the plea is.

(1) What they did was in the name of Jesus Christ, which was a direct answer to the question the court asked them (v. 9, 10): "If we this day be examined for a good deed done to the impotent man, by what means, or by whom, he is made whole, we have an answer ready. Be it known to you all, and not to you only, but to all the people of Israel that by the name of Jesus Christ, whom you crucified, and whom God hath raised from the dead, even by him doth this man stand here before you whole, a monument of the power of the Lord Jesus." He justifies what he and his colleague had done in curing the lame man. It was a good deed. "Now, if we be reckoned with for this good deed, we have no reason to be ashamed. Let those be ashamed who bring us into trouble for it." It is no new thing for good men to suffer ill for doing well. He transfers all the praise and glory of this good deed to Jesus Christ. "It is by him, and not by any power of ours, that this man is cured. Let the Lord alone be exalted, no matter what becomes of us." He charges it upon the judges themselves, that they had been the murderers of this Jesus. "It is he whom you crucified." He endeavours to convince them of sin, of that sin which was most likely to startle conscience—their putting Christ to death. Peter will miss no occasion to tell them of it. He attests the resurrection of Christ as the strongest testimony for him, and against his persecutors. "God raised him from the dead; they took away his life, but God gave it to him again." He preaches this to all the bystanders: "Be it known to you all, to all the people of Israel, that wonders are wrought in the name of Jesus, not by repeating it as a charm, but believing in it as a divine revelation of grace and goodwill to men.

(2) The name of this Jesus is that name alone by which we can be saved. It is not an indifferent thing, but of absolute necessity, that people believe in this name, and call upon it. We are obliged to it in duty to God, and in compliance with his designs (v. 11): "This is the stone which was set at nought of

5. their rulers . . .—This was a regular meeting of the Sanhedrim (see on Matt. 2:4).

6. Annas . . . and Caiaphas—(See on Luke 3:2). John and Alexander—of whom nothing is known.

7. By what power or . . . name have ye done this—thus admitting the reality of the miracle, which afterwards they confess themselves unable to deny (vs. 16).

8. Then, filled with the Holy Ghost, said—(See Mark 13:11; Luke 21:15).

10. Be it known unto you . . . and to all the people of Israel—as if emitting a formal judicial testimony to the entire nation through its rulers now convened. by the name of Jesus . . .—(See on ch. 3:13, etc). even by him doth this man stand before you whole—for from vs. 14 it appears that the healed man was at that moment before their eyes.

ADAM CLARKE

5. Their rulers, and elders, and scribes. Those with the high priest, Annas, formed the Sanhedrin, or grand council of the Jews.

6. Annas. Though this man was not now actually in the office of high priest, yet he had possessed it for eleven years, bore the title all his life, and had the honor of seeing five of his sons fill that eminent place after him—an honor that never happened to any other person from the commencement of the Mosaic institution. And Caiaphas. He was son-in-law to Annas, John xviii. 13; was now high priest, and the same who, a short time before, condemned Christ to be crucified. And John. Dr. Lightfoot conjectures, with great probability, that this was Jochanan ben Zaccai, who was very famous at that time in the Jewish nation. And Alexander. This was probably Alexander Lysimachus, one of the richest Jews of his time, who made great presents to the Temple and was highly esteemed by King Agrippa. Of the kindred of the high priest. Or rather, "of the race of the high priests," i.e., of the family out of which the high priests were chosen. It may, however, comprehend those who belonged to the families of Annas and Caiaphas, and all who were connected with the sacerdotal family. Luke distinctly mentions all these to show how formidable the enemies were against whom the infant Church of Christ had to contend.

7. By what power, or by what name, have ye done this? It seems that this council were convinced that the lame man was miraculously healed, but it is very likely that they believed the whole to be the effect of magic; and as all intercourse with familiar spirits, and all spells, charms, etc., were unlawful, they probably hoped that on examination this business would come out, and that then these disturbers of their peace would be put to death. Hence they inquired by what power, by what supernatural energy; or in what name, by what mode of incantation; and who is the spirit you invoke, in order to do these things?

8. Then Peter, filled with the Holy Ghost. Who guided him into all truth, and raised him far above the fear of man, placing him in a widely different state of mind to that in which he was found when, in the hall of Caiaphas, he denied his Master through fear of a servant girl. But now was fulfilled the promise of Christ, Matt. x. 18-20: "And ye shall be brought before governors and kings for my sake . . . but . . . take no thought how or what ye shall speak . . . For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you."

10. By the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth. This was a very bold declaration in the presence of such an assembly, but he felt he stood on good ground. The cure of the lame man the day before was notorious. His long infirmity was well-known; his person could be easily identified; and he was now standing before them whole and sound. They themselves therefore could judge whether the miracle was true or false. But the reality of it was not questioned, nor was there any difficulty about the instruments that were employed; the only question was, How have you done this? and in whose name? Peter immediately answers, We have done it in the name of Jesus of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, and whom God hath raised from the dead.

MATTHEW HENRY

you builders, you that are the rulers of the people, and the elders of Israel, that should be the builders of the church. Here was a stone offered you, to be put in the chief place of the building; but you rejected it, threw it by as good for nothing. But this stone is now become the head of the corner." Probably St. Peter here chose to make use of this quotation because Christ had himself made use of it not long before this, Matt. xxi. 42. Scripture is a tried weapon in our spiritual conflicts: let us therefore stick to it. We are obliged to it for our own interest. We cannot be saved but by Jesus Christ (v. 12): Neither is there salvation in any other. As there is no other name by which diseased bodies can be cured, so there is no other by which sinful souls can be saved. Our salvation is our chief concern. Our salvation is not in ourselves; we can destroy ourselves, but we cannot save ourselves. This is the honour of Christ's name, that it is the only name whereby we must be saved. This name is given. God has appointed it. It is given under heaven. He has all power both in the upper and in the lower world. It is given among men, who need salvation. We may be saved by his name, and we cannot be saved by any other. How far those may find favour with God who have not the knowledge of Christ, yet live up to the light they have, it is not our business to determine. Whatever saving favour such may receive it is upon the account of Christ, and for his sake only; so that still there is no salvation in any other.

IV. The stand that the court was put to, v. 13, 14.

1. They could not deny the cure of the lame man to be both a good deed and a miracle. They had nothing to say against it (v. 14).

2. They could not face down Peter and John. This was a miracle not inferior to the cure of the lame man. They see the boldness of Peter and John, v. 13. They appeared not only undaunted by the rulers, but daring and daunting to them. The courage of Christ's faithful confessors has often been the confusion of their cruel persecutors. (1) What increased their wonder: They perceived that they were unlearned and ignorant men. They enquired and found that they were born in Galilee, that they were bred fishermen, and had no learned education. And yet speak to them of the Messiah and his kingdom, and they speak so pertinently and so fluently, and are so ready in the scriptures that the most learned judge upon the bench is not able to answer them. They were ignorant men—men that had not any public character or employment, which made them wonder to see what freedom they took. (2) What made their wonder in a great measure to cease: they took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus. When they understood that they had been with Jesus they knew what to impute their boldness to. Those that have been with Jesus should conduct themselves, in everything, so that those who converse with them may take knowledge of them that they have been with Jesus. One may know that they have been in the mount by the shining of their faces.

Verses 15–22

We have here the issue of the trial. They came off now with flying colours.

I. Here is the consultation of the court and their proceeding thereupon.

1. The prisoners were ordered to withdraw (v. 15): They commanded them to go aside out of the council, willing enough to get clear of them (they spoke so home to their consciences). The designs of Christ's enemies are carried on in close cabals, as if they would hide their counsels from the Lord.

2. A debate arose upon this matter: They conferred among themselves. The question proposed was, What shall we do to these men? v. 16. If they would have yielded to the convincing commanding power of truth, it had been easy to say what they should do to these men. But, when men will not be persuaded to do what they should do, it is no marvel that they are ever and anon at a loss what to do.

3. They came at last to a resolution, in two things:

(1) That it was not safe to punish the apostles. Now they could not find how they might punish Peter and John, because of the people. They knew it would be an unrighteous thing to punish them, and therefore should have been restrained from it by the fear of God; but they considered it only as a dangerous thing, and therefore were held in from it only by the fear of the people. [1] The people were convinced of the truth of the mirac'e; it was a notable miracle—a known miracle. This was a known instance of the power of Christ, and a proof of his doctrine. That it was wrought for the confirmation of the doctrine they preached, was manifest to all that dwelt in Jerusalem: it was an opinion universally received.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

11. This is the stone which was set at naught of you builders . . .—This application of Psalm 118:22, already made by our Lord Himself before some of the same "builders" (Matt. 21:42), is here repeated with peculiar propriety after the deed of rejection had been consummated, and the rejected One had, by His exaltation to the right hand of the Majesty on high, become "the head of the corner." 12. Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved—How sublimely does the apostle, in these closing words, shut up these rulers of Israel to Jesus for salvation, and in what universal and emphatic terms does he hold up his Lord as the one Hope of men!

13-17. perceived that they were unlearned and ignorant men—i.e., uninstructed in the learning of the Jewish schools, and of the common sort; men in private life, untrained to teaching. took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus—recognized them as having been in His company; remembering possibly, that they had seen them with Him [MEYER, BLOOMFIELD, ALFORD]; but, more probably, perceiving in their whole bearing what identified them with Jesus: i.e., 'We thought we had got rid of Him; but lo! He reappears in these men, and all that troubled us in the Nazarene Himself has yet to be put down in these His disciples.' What a testimony to these primitive witnesses! Would that the same could be said of their successors!

ADAM CLARKE

11. This is the stone which was set at nought of you builders. By your rejection and crucifixion of Jesus Christ you have fulfilled one of your own prophecies, Ps. cxviii. 22; and as one part of this prophecy is now so literally fulfilled, you may rest assured, so shall the other; and this rejected stone shall speedily become the head stone of the corner.

12. For there is none other name. Not only no other person, but no name except that divinely appointed one, Matt. i. 21, by which salvation from sin can be expected—none given under heaven—no other means ever devised by God himself for the salvation of a lost world.

14. They could say nothing against it. They could not gainsay the apostolic doctrine, for that was supported by the miraculous fact before them. If the doctrine be false, the man cannot have been miraculously healed; if the man be miraculously healed, then the doctrine must be true that it is by the name of Jesus of Nazareth that he has been healed.

13. The boldness of Peter and John. The "freedom and fluency" with which they spoke; for they spoke now from the immediate influence of the Holy Ghost, and their word was with power. That they were unlearned and ignorant men. Agrammatoi, persons without literature, not brought up in nor given to literary pursuits—and ignorant, idiotai, persons in private life, brought up in its occupations alone. It does not mean ignorance in the common acceptation of the term, and our translation is very improper. In no sense of the word could any of the apostles be called ignorant men; for though their spiritual knowledge came all from heaven, yet in all other matters they seem to have been men of good, sound, strong common sense. They took knowledge of them may imply that they got information that they had been disciples of Christ, and probably they might have seen them in our Lord's company. That they had been with Jesus. Had they not had His teaching, the present company would soon have confounded them; but they spoke with so much power and authority that the whole Sanhedrin was confounded.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

What impression did they make upon the council? The impression they made was "that they had been with Jesus." Men filled with the Spirit always make that impression. That is the impression which the filling of the Spirit creates. If a man shall tell me he has received specific gifts at some specific hour which he describes, and the impression he makes upon me is antagonistic to the mind of Jesus, I know that he is not filled with the Spirit. The word "ignorant" used to describe these men is a little unfortunate; "plebeian" would better convey the idea. They were unlearned and plebeian men, that is, men of the common class. But they had boldness of speech, and boldness does not merely mean braveness, but clarity, clearness of statement.

On another occasion when Jesus was talking in the metropolitan center of the learning of His time, they said: "How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?" This puzzle was repeated in the case of Peter and John. Notice the mistake they made. This was the result of their own philosophy. They spoke of the men as having been with Jesus, in a past tense. What was the truth? Chirst was in the men, and speaking through the men; and the similarity which they detected was not that lingering from contact with a lost teacher, but that created by the presence of the living Christ.

Then followed the conference. The prisoners were excluded; and we see the measure of the intelligence of the Sanhedrin. First we note their discovery of the relation of Peter and John to Jesus, and the certainty of the miracle, and their decision not to attempt to deny it. We see also the measure of their ignorance in their decision to threaten these men. Imagine any court threatening a man who is filled with the Holy Spirit. But, of course, there was no Holy Spirit according to their philosophy, and therefore that was the proper thing to do. If one man be threatened by a Tribunal, composed of the forces of culture, there is little hope of him; but if that man be filled with the Holy Spirit, he will challenge the whole company, and the victory will be with him.

—The Acts of the Apostles

16. a notable miracle . . . done by them is manifest to all . . . in Jerusalem; and we cannot deny it—And why should ye wish to deny it, O ye rulers, but that ye hate the light, and will not come to the light lest your deeds should be reproved?

16. A notable miracle hath been done. A miracle has been wrought, and this miracle is "known," and acknowledged to be such. All Jerusalem knew that he was lame—lame from his birth, and that he had long begged at the Beautiful Gate of the Temple; and now all

They themselves, with all the craftiness and all the effrontery they had, could not deny it to be a true miracle; everybody would have hooted at them if they had. They could easily deny it to their own consciences, but not to the world. [2] All men glorified God for that which was done. Even those that were not persuaded by it to believe in Christ could not but give praise to God for it.

(2) That it was nevertheless necessary to silence them for the future, v. 17, 18. All their care is that the doctrine of Christ spread no further among the people; as if that healing institution were a plague begun, the contagion of which must be stopped. To prevent the further spreading of this doctrine, [1] They charge the apostles never to preach it any more, that no man speak at all nor teach in the name of Jesus, v. 18. "Not only that you do not preach this doctrine publicly, but that you speak henceforth to no man, not to any particular person privately, in this name," v. 17. There is not a greater service done to the devil's kingdom than the silencing of faithful ministers, and putting those under a bushel that are the lights of the world. [2] They threaten them if they do: it is at their peril. Christ had not only charged them to preach the gospel to every creature, but had promised to bear them out in it. Those who know how to put a just value upon Christ's promises know how to put a just contempt upon the world's threatenings.

II. Here is the courageous resolution of the prisoners to go on in their work, and their declaration of this resolution, v. 19, 20. Peter and John jointly put in the answer: "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge you; for we cannot forbear speaking the things which we have seen and heard." The prudence of the serpent would have directed them to be silent. But the boldness of the lion directed them thus to set their persecutors at defiance. They justify themselves in it with two things: 1. The command of God: "You charge us not to preach the gospel; he has charged us to preach it; now whom must we obey, God or you?" Nothing can be more absurd than to hearken unto weak and fallible men more than unto a God that is infinitely wise and holy. The case is so plain and self-evident, that we will venture to leave it to yourselves to judge of it. Can you think it right in the sight of God to break a divine command in obedience to a human injunction? 2. The convictions of their consciences. They could not but speak those things which they had seen and heard. (1) They felt the influence of it upon themselves, what a blessed change it had wrought upon them. Those speak the doctrine of Christ best that have felt the power of it. (2) They knew the importance of it to others. They look with concern upon perishing souls, and know that they cannot escape eternal ruin but by Jesus Christ, and therefore will be faithful to them in giving them warning. They are things which we have seen and heard, and therefore are fully assured of ourselves: and things which we only have seen and heard, and therefore, if we do not publish them, who will? Who can?

III. Here is the discharge of the prisoners (v. 21): They further threatened them, and then let them go. 1. Because they durst not contradict the people, who glorified God for that which was done. As rulers by the ordinance of God are made a terror and restraint to wicked people, so people are sometimes by the providence of God made a terror and restraint to wicked rulers. 2. Because they could not contradict the miracle: For (v. 22) the man was above forty years old on whom this miracle of healing was shown. The miracle was so much the greater, he having been lame from his mother's womb, ch. iii. 2. If those that have been long accustomed to evil, are cured of their spiritual impotency to good, the power of divine grace is therein so much the more magnified. The truth of it was so much the better attested; for the man being above forty years old, he was able when he was asked, to speak for himself.

We hear no more at present of the chief priests, but are to attend those two witnesses.

I. Their return to their brethren (v. 23): Being let go, they went to their own company. As soon as ever they were at liberty, they went to their old friends. 1. Though God had highly honoured them, in calling them out to be his witnesses, yet they were not puffed up with the honour done them, but went to their own company. No advancement in gifts or usefulness should make us think ourselves above either the duties or the privileges of the communion of saints. 2. Though their enemies had severely threatened them, yet they went to their own company. Christ's followers do best in company, provided it be in their own com-

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

17. But that it spread no further . . . let us straitly—strictly—threaten . . . that they speak henceforth to no man in this name—Impotent device! Little knew they the fire that was burning in the bones of those heroic disciples.

18-22. Whether it be right . . . to hearken to you more than . . . God, judge ye. 20. For we cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard—There is here a wonderful union of sober, respectful appeal to the better reason of their judges, and calm, deep determination to abide the consequences of a constrained testimony, which betokens a power above their own resting upon them, according to promise.

21. finding nothing how they might punish them, because of the people—not at a loss for a pretext, but at a loss how to do it so as not to rouse the opposition of the people.

23-37. PETER AND JOHN, DISMISSED FROM THE SANHEDRIM, REPORT THE PROCEEDINGS TO THE ASSEMBLED DISCIPLES—THEY ENGAGE IN PRAYER—THE ASTONISHING ANSWER AND RESULTS. 23-30. being let go, they went to their own company—Observe the two opposite classes, representing the two interests which were about to come into deadly conflict.

ADAM CLARKE

Jerusalem knew that he was healed, and there was no means by which such a self-evident fact could be disproved.

17. But that it spread no further. Not the news of the miraculous healing of the lame man, but the doctrine and influence which these men preached and exerted. More than a thousand people had already professed faith in Christ in consequence of this miracle (see v. 4); and if this teaching should be permitted to go on, probably accompanied with similar miracles, they had reason to believe that all Jerusalem (themselves excepted, who had steeled their hearts against all good) should be converted to the religion of Him whom they had lately crucified. Let us straitly threaten them. "Let us threaten them with threatening," a Hebraism, and a proof that Luke has translated the words of the council into Greek, just as they were spoken. That they speak . . . to no man in this name. Nothing so ominous to them as the name of Christ crucified, because they themselves had been His crucifiers. On this account they could not bear to hear salvation preached to mankind through Him of whom they had been the betrayers and murderers, and who was soon likely to have no enemies but themselves.

21. When they had further threatened them. When they had added to their former threatenings, repeating the former menaces and adding new penalties. Because of the people. The people saw the miracle, confessed the finger of God, believed on the Lord Jesus, and thus became converts to the Christian faith; and the converts were now so numerous that the Sanhedrin was afraid to proceed to any extremities, lest an insurrection should be the consequence.

22. The man was above forty years old. The disease was of long standing, and consequently the more inveterate; but all difficulties, small or great, yield equally to the sovereign power of God.

23. They went to their own company. This was properly the first persecution that had been raised up against the Church since the resurrection of Christ; and as the rest of the disciples must have known that Peter and John had been cast into prison, and that they were to be examined before the Sanhedrin, and knowing the evil disposition of the rulers toward their brethren, they doubtless made joint supplication to God for their safety. In this employment it is likely Peter and John found them on their return from the council, and repeated to them all their treatment, with the threats of the chief priests and elders.

pany.

II. The account they gave them of what had passed: They reported all that the chief priests and elders had said to them. They related it to them, 1. That they might know what to expect both from men and from God. From men they might expect everything that was terrifying, but from God everything that was encouraging. 2. That they might have it recorded for the confirmation of our faith touching the resurrection of Christ. These apostles told the chief priests to their faces that God had raised up Jesus from the dead. They had not the confidence to deny it, but, in the silliest and most sneaking manner imaginable, bade the apostles not to tell anybody of it. 3. That they might now join with them in prayers and praises.

III. Their address to God upon this occasion: When they heard they lifted up their voice to God with one accord, v. 24. One in the name of the rest lifted up his voice to God and the rest joined with him, with one mind (so the word signifies); their hearts went along with him, and so, though but one spoke, they all prayed.

1. Their adoration of God as the Creator of the world (v. 24). They said, "O Lord, thou art God our Master and sovereign Ruler" (so the word signifies), "thou art the God who hast made heaven and earth, and the sea." The heathen worship gods which they have made, we are worshipping the God that made us and all the world. And it is very proper to begin our prayers, as well as our creed, with the acknowledgment of this, that God is the Father almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible. The Christian religion was intended to confirm and improve, not to eclipse nor jostle out, the truths and dictates of natural religion. It is a great encouragement to God's servants that they serve the God that made all things, and is able to strengthen them under all their difficulties.

2. Their reconciling themselves to the present dispensations of Providence, by reflecting upon the Old Testament, v. 25, 26. Thus he spoke by the mouth of his servant David. Let it not therefore be a surprise to them, for the scripture must be fulfilled. It was foretold, Ps. ii. 1, 2. (1) That the heathen would rage at Christ and his kingdom. (2) That the people would imagine all the things that could be against it. (3) That the kings of the earth, particularly, would stand up in opposition to the kingdom of Christ. (4) That the rulers would gather together against God and Christ. Where the power is in many rulers, councils, and senates, they gather together against the Lord and against his Christ. What is done against Christ, God takes as done against himself. Christianity was opposed and fought against by them, and yet it made its way.

3. Their representation of the present accomplishment of those predictions. What was foretold we see fulfilled, v. 27, 28. It is of a truth that Herod and Pilate, the two Roman governors with the people of Israel, were gathered together against thy holy child Jesus whom thou hast anointed. (1) The wise and holy designs God had concerning Christ. He is here called the child Jesus. The word signifies both a son and a servant. He was the Son of God; and yet in the work of redemption he acted as his Father's servant. It was he whom God anointed, and thence he was called the Lord's Christ, v. 26. God that anointed Christ determined what should be done to him. He was anointed to be a Saviour, and therefore it was determined he should be a sacrifice to make atonement for sin. He must die. God wisely determined before by what hands it should be done. He must therefore be delivered into the hands of sinners. God's hand and his counsel determined it. His hand and his counsel always agree: for whatsoever the Lord pleased that did he. (2) The wicked and unholy instruments that were employed in the executing of this design. Herod and Pilate, Gentiles and Jews, who had been at variance with each other, united against Christ. Sin is not the less evil for God's bringing good out of it, but he is by this the more glorified.

4. Their petition with reference to the case at this time.

(1) That God would take cognizance of the malice of their enemies: Now, Lord, behold their threatenings, v. 29. And now, Lord; there is an emphasis upon the now. Then is God's time to appear for his people, when the power of their enemies is most daring and threatening. They do not dictate to God what he shall do, but refer themselves to him. To thee we appeal, behold their threatenings, and either tie their hands or turn their hearts. It is a comfort to us that if we be unjustly threatened we may make ourselves easy to spreading the case before the Lord, and leaving it with him.

(2) That God, by his grace, would keep up their

24. they lifted up their voice—the assembled disciples, on hearing Peter's report. with one accord—the breasts of all present echoing every word of this sublime prayer.

Lord—See on Luke 2:29. Applied to God, the term expresses absolute authority. God which hast made heaven and earth—against whom, therefore, all creatures are powerless.

25. by the mouth of . . . David—to whom the Jews ascribed the 2d Psalm, though anonymous; and internal evidence confirms it. David's spirit sees with astonishment "the heathen, the people, the kings and princes of the earth," in deadly combination against the sway of Jehovah and His Anointed (his Messiah, or Christ), and asks "why" it is. This fierce confederacy our praying disciples see in full operation, in the "gathering together of Herod and Pilate, the Gentiles (the Roman authority), and the people of Israel, against God's holy Child ('Servant') Jesus." (See on ch. 3:13). The best ancient copies read, after "were gathered together," 'in this city,' which probably answers to "upon my holy hill of Zion," in the Psalm.

thy hand and thy counsel determined . . . to be done—i.e., "Thy counsel" determined to be done by "Thy hand."

29. now, Lord, behold their threatenings—Recognizing in the threatenings of the Sanhedrim a declaration of war by the combined powers of the world against their infant cause, they seek not enthusiastically to hide from themselves its critical position, but calmly ask the Lord of heaven and earth to "look upon their threatenings."

ADAM CLARKE

24. Lord, thou art God. "Thou, God, art the sovereign Lord." Thy rule is universal, and Thy power unlimited.

26. Against the Lord, and against his Christ should be translated "against His Anointed," because it particularly agrees with "whom thou hast anointed," in the succeeding verse.

27. There is a parenthesis in this verse that is not sufficiently noticed. It should be read in connection with v. 28, thus: "For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed (for to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done), both Herod, and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together." It is evident that what God's hand and . . . counsel determined before to be done was not that which Herod, Pontius Pilate, the Gentiles (Romans) and the people of Israel had done and were doing; for then their rage and vain counsel would be such as God himself had determined should take place, which is both impious and absurd. But these gathered together to hinder what God had before determined that His Christ or Anointed should perform; and thus the passage is undoubtedly to be understood. Were gathered together. "In this very city" is added by some MSS. This makes the words much more emphatic; in this Thy own city, these different and in all other cases dissentient powers are leagued together against Thine Anointed, and are determined to prevent the accomplishment of Thy purpose.

29. And now, Lord, behold their threatenings. It is not against us, but against Thee, that they conspire; it is not to prevent the success of our preaching, but to bring to nought Thy counsel. The whole of their enmity is against Thee. Now, Lord, look upon it; consider this. And grant unto thy servants. While we are endeavoring to fulfill Thy counsels, and can do nothing without Thee, sustain our courage, that we may proclaim Thy truth with boldness and irresistible power.

F. B. MEYER:

Help from on high. Like draws like; Judas went to his own place, and the apostles to their own company. The best answer to threats is prayer. The apostles' one petition just then was for boldness. They scorned to ask for their own safety; it was enough if Jesus was glorified.

What a note of jubilant triumph was in that glorious prayer, offered by this threatened little band! They realized that they were under the special protection of God, who had made the world, had spoken by the prophets, and was the Father of Jesus. They thought that more miracles of healing would promote their cause; but though they did not realize it at the time, their unity, love, hope, willingness to share their goods, coupled with their intrepid bearing, were their most potent arguments. Notice that in their consciousness, it was God's hand that was being stretched out to heal, though their hands were the immediate channel of its beneficent operations. They had been filled before, but they were filled again. It is our privilege to claim repeated infillings to make good our leakage and evaporation.—Bible Commentary spirits: Grant unto thy servants that with all boldness they may speak thy word. Their prayer is not, "Lord, behold their threatenings, and frighten them," but, "Behold their threatenings, and animate us." They do not pray, "Lord, give us a fair opportunity to retire from our work, now that it is become dangerous"; but, "Lord, give us grace to go on in our work, and not to be afraid." Those that are sent on God's errands ought to deliver their message with boldness, not doubting of what they say, nor of being borne out in saying it. God is to be sought unto for an ability to speak his word with boldness. The threatenings of our enemies should rather stir us up to so much the more courage. Are they daring that fight against Christ? For shame, let not us be sneaking that are for him.

(3) That God would still give them power to work miracles for the confirmation of the doctrine they preached: Lord, grant us boldness, by stretching forth thy hand to heal. Nothing emboldens faithful ministers more in their work than the tokens of God's presence with them. They pray: That signs and wonders might be done by the name of the holy child Jesus, which would be convincing to the people, and confounding to the enemies. It is the honour of Christ that they aim at that the wonders might be done by the name of Jesus.

IV. The gracious answer God gave. God gave them a sign of the acceptance of their prayers (v. 31): When they had prayed, the place was shaken where they were assembled together. This shaking of the place was designed to awaken and raise their expectations, and to give them a sensible token that God was with them of a truth. This was to show them what reason they had to fear God more, and then they would fear man less. The place was shaken, that their faith might be established and unshaken. God gave them greater degrees of his Spirit. Their prayer, without doubt, was accepted, for it was answered: They were all filled with the Holy Ghost, by which they were not only encouraged, but enabled to speak the word of God with boldness. The Holy Ghost taught them not only what to speak, but how to speak. They were filled with the Holy Ghost at the bar (v. 8), and now filled with the Holy Ghost in the pulpit. We have here an instance of the performance of that promise, that God will give the Holy Spirit to those that ask him (Luke xi. 13), for it was in answer to prayer that they were filled with the Holy Ghost: we have also an example of the improvement of that gift; have it and use it, use it and have more of it. They spoke the word with all boldness. Talents must be traded with, not buried.

I. The disciples loved one another dearly. The multitude of those that believed were of one heart, and of one soul (v. 32). 1. There were multitudes that believed; even in Jerusalem there were three thousand converted on one day, and five thousand on another, and, besides these, there were added to the church daily. The increase of the church is the glory of it. 2. They were all of one heart, and of one soul. Though there were many, very many, of different ages, tempers, and conditions, in the world, they were unanimous in the faith of Christ, and, being all joined to the Lord, they were joined to one another in holy love. This was the blessed fruit of Christ's dying precept to his disciples, to love one another, and his dying prayer for them, that they all might be one. They were all of one heart, and one soul. Thus it was then, and we may not despair of seeing it so again.

II. The ministers went on in their work with great vigour and success (v. 33). With great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus. The resurrection of Christ, rightly understood, will let us into the great mysteries of religion. By the great power wherewith the apostles attested the resurrection may be meant the great vigour, spirit, and courage, with which they published this doctrine; they did it not softly and diffidently, but with liveliness and resolution. Or it may mean the miracles which they wrought to confirm their doctrine. God himself, in them, bearing witness too.

III. The beauty of the Lord our God shone upon them: Great grace was upon them all, grace that had something great in it (magnificent and very extraordinary) was upon them all. Christ poured out abundance of grace upon them. There were evident fruits of this grace in all they said and did. Some think it includes the favour they were in with the people. Everyone saw a beauty and excellency in them, and respected them.

IV. They were very liberal to the poor.

1. They insisted not upon property, which even children seem to have a sense of and a jealousy for, that with all boldness they may speak thy word—Rising above self, they ask only fearless courage to testify for their Master, and divine attestation to their testimony by miracles of healing, etc., in His name.

31-37. place was shaken—glorious token of the commotion which the Gospel was to make (ch. 17:6; cf. 16:26), and the overthrow of all opposing powers in which this was to issue.

they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and spake . . .—The Spirit rested upon the entire community, first, in the very way they had asked, so that they "spake the word with boldness" (vss. 29, 31); next, in melting down all selfishness, and absorbing even the feeling of individuality in an intense and glowing realization of Christian unity. The community of goods was but an outward expression of this, and natural in such circumstances.

33. with great power—effect on men's minds. great grace was upon them all—The grace of God copiously rested on the whole community.

ADAM CLARKE

30. By stretching forth thine hand to heal. Show that it is Thy truth which we proclaim, and confirm it with miracles, and show how highly Thou hast magnified Thy Son, Jesus, whom they have despised and crucified, by causing signs and wonders to be wrought in His name. Thy holy child Jesus should be translated "Thy holy Servant," as in v. 25, "thy servant David," not "Thy child David." The word is the same in both places.

31. The place was shaken. This earthquake was an evidence of the presence of God, and a most direct answer to their prayer, as far as that prayer concerned themselves. The earthquake proclaimed the stretched-out arm of God, and showed them that resistance against His counsels and determinations must come to nought.

And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost. And in consequence of this, they spake the word of God with boldness—a pointed answer to a second part of their request, v. 29. Though these disciples had received the Holy Spirit on the Day of Pentecost, yet they were capable of larger communications; and what they had then received did not preclude the necessity of frequent supplies on emergent occasions. Neither apostle nor private Christian can subsist in the divine life without frequent influences from on high.

32. The multitude of them that believed. The whole 5,000, mentioned in v. 4, and probably many others who had been converted by the ministry of the other apostles since that time. Were of one heart and of one soul. Were in a state of the most perfect friendship and affection. They had all things common. See the notes on chap. ii. 44. See below, v. 34.

33. With great power gave the apostles witness. This power they received from the Holy Spirit, who enabled them, "with striking miracles," to give proof of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus; for this is the point that was particularly to be proved. That He was slain and buried, all knew; that He rose again from the dead, many knew; but it was necessary to give such proofs as should convince and confound all. Great grace was upon them all. They all received much of the favor or grace of God, and they had much favor with all who feared God. In both these ways this clause may be understood.

and which worldly people triumph in. No man said that aught of the things which he possessed was his own, v. 32. They did not take away property, but they were indifferent to it. They did not call it their own, because they had, in affection, forsaken all for Christ. We can call nothing our own but sin. No man said that what he had was his own; for he was ready to distribute, willing to communicate. Those that had estates were not solicitous to lay up, but very willing to lay out, and would straiten themselves to help their brethren. Meum—mine, and tuum—thine, are the great makebates. Men's holding their own, and grasping at more than their own, are the rise of wars and fightings.

2. They abounded in charity, they had all things common; for (v. 34) there was not any among them that lacked. As there were many poor that received the gospel, so there were some rich that were able to maintain them, and the grace of God made them willing. The gospel hath laid all things common, not so that the poor are allowed to rob the rich, but so that the rich are appointed to relieve the poor.

3. They did many of them sell their estates: As many as had possession of lands or houses sold them, v. 34. We are here told what they did with the money that was so raised: They laid it at the apostles' feet—they left it to them to be disposed of as they thought fit. Distribution was made unto every man according as he had need. Great care ought to be taken in the distribution of public charity. That it be given to such as have need. Those who have real need, above all, those that are reduced to want for well doing ought to be taken care of, and provided for. That it be given to every man according as he has need, without partiality or respect of persons.

Here is one particular person mentioned: Barnabas, afterwards Paul's colleague. [1] The account here given concerning him, v. 36. His name was Joses; he was of the tribe of Levi. He was born in Cyprus, a great way off from Jerusalem. Notice is taken of the apostles' changing his name after he associated with them. He was respected by the apostles, who, in token of their value for him, gave him a name, Barnabas. A son of consolation (so we read it)—a cheerful Christian, and this enlarged his heart in charity to the poor; eminent for comforting the Lord's people; he had an admirable facility that way. There were two among the apostles that were called Boanerges—sons of thunder (Mark iii. 17); but here was a son of consolation with them. Each had his several gift. Let the one search the wound, and then let the other heal it and bind it up. [2] Here is an account of his great generosity. This is particularly taken notice of, because of the eminency of his services afterwards in the church of God. Or perhaps this is mentioned because it was a leading card, and an example to others: He having land, he sold it, brought the money, and laid it at the apostles' feet. And he lost nothing upon the balance of the account, when he himself was, in effect, numbered among the apostles, by that word of the Holy Ghost, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them, ch. xiii. 2. Thus, for the respect he showed to the apostles as apostles, he had an apostle's reward.

35. laid . . . at the apostles' feet—sitting, it may be, above the rest. But the expression may be merely derived from that practice, and here meant figuratively.

36. Joses . . .—This is specified merely as an eminent example of that spirit of generous sacrifice which pervaded all. son of consolation—no doubt so surnamed from the character of his ministry. a Levite—who, though as a tribe having no inheritance, might and did acquire property as individuals (Deut. 18:8). Cyprus—a well-known island in the Mediterranean.

ADAM CLARKE

34. Neither was there any among them that lacked. It was customary with the Jews to call the poor together to eat of the sacrifices; but as the priests were incensed against Christ and Christianity, consequently the Christian poor could have no advantage of this kind. Therefore by making a common stock for the present necessity the poor were supplied; so there was none among them that lacked. This provision therefore of the community of goods, which could be but temporary, was made both suitably and seasonably.

36. The son of consolation. As paraclesis signifies "exhortation," as well as consolation, and is indeed distinguished from the latter, 1 Cor. xiv. 3, the original name was probably Bar naba, or Bar nebia, which signifies the "son of prophecy or exhortation." This is certainly one sense which prophecy has in the New Testament; and in this way Barnabas distinguished himself among the apostles. See chap. xi. 23. Barnabas "exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord." A Levite, and of the country of Cyprus. Cyprus is an island in the Mediterranean Sea, off Cilicia, and not very distant from the Jewish coast. The Jews were very numerous in that island. Though he was a Levite, he might have had land of his own by private purchase. The Levites, as a tribe, had no land in Israel; but the individuals certainly might make purchases anywhere.

It is worthy of remark that the two apostles of the Gentiles, though of Jewish extraction, were both born in Gentile countries; Paul in Cilicia, Barnabas in Cyprus. This gave them many advantages: served to remove prejudices from the heathens; and gave them no doubt much facility in the Greek tongue, without which they could have done but little in Asia Minor, nor in most parts of the Roman Empire where they travelled. How admirably does God determine even the place of our birth and the bounds of our habitation! The man whom He calls to His work He will take care to endue with every necessary qualification. And is it too much to say that God never did call a man to preach the gospel whom He did not qualify in such a manner that both the workman and the work should appear to be of God? Some have said that "ignorance is the mother of devotion." Devotion and religion are both scandalized by the saying. Every genuine minister of Christ has an enlightened heart; and to this it is his duty to add a well-cultivated mind. A blockhead never did, and never can, make a minister.

The chapter begins with a melancholy but. As every man, so every church, in its best state has its but. The disciples seemed to be all exceedingly good; but there were hypocrites among them. There is a mixture of bad with good in the best societies of this side heaven; tares will grow among the wheat until the harvest. They came up to that perfection which Christ recommended to the rich young man—they sold what they had, and gave to the poor; but even that proved a cloak and cover of hypocrisy. The signs and wonders which the apostles wrought were hitherto miracles of mercy; but now comes in a miracle of judgment that God may be both loved and feared.

I. The sin of Ananias and Sapphira his wife. 1. They were ambitious of being thought eminent disciples when really they were not true disciples. They sold a possession, and brought the money to the apostles' feet, that they might not seem to be behind the very chief of believers. It is possible that hypocrites may deny themselves in one thing, but then it is to serve themselves in another. Ananias and Sapphira would take upon them a profession of Christianity, and make a fair show in the flesh with it, when they knew they could not go through with the Christian profession. It is often of fatal consequence for people to go a greater length in profession than their

Vss. 1-11. ANANIAS AND SAPPHIRA. "The first trace of a shade upon the bright form of the young Church. Probably among the new Christians a kind of holy rivalry had sprung up, every one eager to place his means at the disposal of the apostles" [OLSHAUSEN]. Thus might the newborn zeal of some outrun their abiding principle, while others might be tempted to seek credit for a liberality which was not in their character.

1. But a certain man named Ananias. The import of his name, chananiyah, the "grace or mercy of the Lord," agrees very ill with his conduct.

inward principle will admit of. 2. They were covetous of the wealth of the world, and distrustful of God and his providence: They sold their land, and in a pang of zeal, designed to dedicate the whole of the purchase-money to pious uses; but, when the money was received, their heart failed them, and they kept back part of the price (v. 2), because they loved the money. They could not take God's word that they should be provided for, but thought they would play a wiser part than the rest had done, and lay up for a rainy day. As if there were not an all-sufficiency in God to make up the whole to them. If they had been thorough-paced worldlings, they would not have sold their possession; and, if they had been thorough-paced Christians, they would not have detained part of the price. 3. They thought to deceive the apostles, and make them believe they brought the whole purchase-money. They came and laid the money at the apostles' feet, as if it were their all.

II. The indictment of Ananias, which proved both his condemnation and execution for this sin. When he brought the money Peter took him to task about it. He charges him peremptorily with the crime, showing it to him in its own colour, v. 3, 4. The Spirit of God in Peter not only discovered the fact but likewise discerned the principle of reigning infidelity in the heart of Ananias, which was at the bottom of it. Had it been a sin of infirmity, through the surprise of a temptation, Peter would have bidden him go home, and repent of his folly. He here showed him,

1. The origin of his sin: Satan filled his heart; he not only suggested it to him, and put it into his head, but hurried him on with resolution to do it.

2. The sin itself: He lied to the Holy Ghost; a sin of such a heinous nature that he could not have been guilty of it if Satan had not filled his heart. We read it, to lie unto the Holy Ghost, which reading is countenanced by v. 4, Thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God. Ananias told a lie; he told Peter that he had sold a possession and this was the purchase-money. He did as the rest did who brought the whole price, and would be thought to do so, and expected the praise those had that did so. Many are brought to gross lying by reigning pride, and affectation of the applause of men, particularly in works of charity to the poor. Those that boast of good works they never did, or promise good works they never do, or make the good works they do more or better than really they are, come under the guilt of Ananias's lie. He told this lie to the Holy Ghost. It was not so much to the apostles as to the Holy Ghost in them that the money was brought, and that was said which was said, v. 4, Thou hast not lied unto men but thou hast lied unto God.

3. The aggravations of the sin (v. 4): While it remained, was it not thine own? And, after it was sold, was it not in thine own power? (1) "Thou wast under no temptation to keep back part of the price; before it was sold it was thy own, and when it was sold it was in thy own power to dispose of the money at thy pleasure." Or, (2) "Thou wast under no necessity of selling thy land at all, nor bringing any of the money to the apostles' feet. Thou mightest have kept the money, if thou hadst pleased, and the land too." It is better not to vow than to vow and not to pay, so better had it been for him not to have pretended to do the good work than thus to do it by the halves. "When it was sold, it was in thine own power; but it was not so when it was vowed." Thus, in giving our hearts to God, we are not admitted to divide them. Satan, like the mother whose own the child was not, would take up with a half; but God will have all or none.

4. All this guilt is charged upon him: Why hast thou conceived this thing in thine heart? He is said to have conceived it in his own heart, which shows that we cannot extenuate our sins by laying the fault of them upon the devil; he tempts, but he cannot force. The close of the charge is very high, but very just: Thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God. If we think to put a cheat upon God, we shall prove in the end to have put a fatal cheat upon our own souls.

III. The death and burial of Ananias, v. 5, 6.

1. He died upon the spot: Ananias, hearing these words, was speechless: he had nothing to say for himself; but this was not all. He fell down, and gave up the ghost. See the power of the word of God in the mouth of the apostles. As there are those whom the gospel justifies, so there are those whom it condemns. This punishment of Ananias may seem severe, but we are sure it was just. It was a great affront which Ananias put upon the Holy Ghost, as if he could be imposed upon. It was designed to deter others from the like presumptions. The doing of this by the ministry of Peter, who himself with a lie denied his Master, intimates that it

2. kept back part of the price, his wife also being privy to it—The coolness with which they planned the deception aggravated the guilt of this couple. brought a certain part—pretending it to be the whole proceeds of the sale.

3-6. why hath Satan filled—'why . . . fill—'why hast thou suffered him to fill'—thine heart . . .—so criminally entertaining his suggestion? Cf. vs. 4, "why hast thou conceived this thing in thine heart?" And see John 13:2, 27. to lie to the Holy Ghost—to men under His supernatural illumination.

4. While it remained, was it not thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thine own power?—from which we see how purely voluntary were all these sacrifices for the support of the infant community.

not lied to men but God—to men so entirely the instruments of the directing Spirit that the lie was rather told to Him: language clearly implying both the distinct personality and the proper divinity of the Holy Ghost. 5 Ananias . . . gave up the ghost . . . great fear came on all that heard these things—on those without the Christian circle; who, instead of disparaging the followers of the Lord Jesus, as they might otherwise have done on the discovery of such hypocrisy, were awed at the manifest presence of Divinity among them, and the mysterious power of throwing off such corrupt matter which rested upon the young Church.

ADAM CLARKE

2. Kept back part of the price. Ananias and Sapphira evidently were persons who professed faith in Christ with the rest of the disciples. While all were making sacrifices for the present necessity, they came forward among the rest, pretending to bring all the money they had received for a possession (of what kind we know not) which they had sold. A part of this price, however, they kept back, not being willing to trust entirely to the bounty of Providence, as the others did.

3. Why hath Satan filled thine heart? The verb which we translate to fill, Kypke has showed by many examples to signify to "instigate, excite, impel," and it was a common belief, as well among the heathens as among the Jews and Christians, that when a man did evil he was excited to it by the influence and malice of an evil spirit. To lie to the Holy Ghost. "To deceive the Holy Spirit." Every lie is told with the intention to deceive; and they wished to deceive the apostles, and, in effect, that Holy Spirit under whose influence they professed to act. Lying against the Holy Ghost is in the next verse said to be lying against God; therefore the Holy Ghost is God. To keep back part of the price. The verb is used by the Greek writers to signify "purloining part of the public money." The word is used here with great propriety, as the money for which the estate was sold was public property, as it was for this purpose alone that the sale was made.

5. Fell down, and gave up the ghost. "Falling down, he expired, breathed his last." "Gave up the ghost" is a very improper translation here.

was not the resentment of a wrong done to himself; for then he would have forgiven this affront, and endeavoured to bring this offender to repentance; but it was the act of the Spirit of God in Peter: to him the indignity was done, and by him the punishment was inflicted.

2. He was buried immediately, for this was the manner of the Jews (v. 6): The young men wound up the dead body in grave-clothes, carried it out and buried it.

IV. The reckoning with Sapphira, the wife of Ananias. She came in about three hours after, for she knew not what had been done.

1. She was found guilty of sharing with her husband in his sin, by a question that Peter asked her (v. 8): Tell me whether you sold the land for so much? Saith she, "We had no more, but that was every farthing we received." Ananias and his wife agreed to tell the same story; they thought they might safely stand in the lie, and should gain credit to it. It is sad to see those relations who should quicken one another to that which is good harden one another in that which is evil.

2. Sentence was passed upon her, that she should partake in her husband's doom, v. 9.

(1) Her sin is opened: How is it that you have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord? Before he passes sentence he shows her the evil of her sin. They tempted the Spirit of the Lord. They saw that the apostles had the gift of tongues; but had they the gift of discerning spirits? Those that presume upon security and impunity in sin tempt the Spirit of God. They agreed together to do it. It is hard to say which is worse between yoke-fellows and other relations—a discord in good or concord in evil.

(2) Her doom is read: Behold, the feet of those who have buried thy husband are at the door, and they shall carry thee out.

3. The sentence executed itself. Then she fell down straightway at his feet. Some sinners God makes quick work with, while others he bears long with; for which difference, doubtless, there are good reasons; but he is not accountable to us for them. And many instances there are of sudden deaths which are not to be looked upon as the punishment of some gross sin, like this. We must not think that all who die suddenly are sinners above others; perhaps it is in favour to them, that they have a quick passage: however, it is forewarning to all to be always ready. But here it is plain that it was in judgment. Some put the question concerning the eternal state of Ananias and Sapphira, and incline to think that the destruction of the flesh was that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. But secret things belong not to us. It is said, She fell down at Peter's feet. The young men coming in found her dead. They carried her out and buried her by her husband. Some ask whether the apostles kept the money which they did bring. What they brought was not polluted to those to whom they brought it; but what they kept back was polluted to those that kept it back.

V. The impression that this made upon the people. Notice is taken of this in the midst of the story (v. 5): Great fear came upon all that heard these things. And again (v. 11), Great fear came upon all the church, and upon as many as heard these things. Those that had joined themselves to the church were thereby struck with an awe of God and of his judgments. It was not a damp or check to their holy joy, but it taught them to be serious in it, and to rejoice with trembling.

Verses 12–16

I. Here is a general account of the miracles which the apostles wrought (v. 12): By the hands of the apostles were many signs and wonders wrought among the people. God had come out of his place to punish, but now returns to his place, to his mercy-seat again. The miracles they wrought proved their divine mission. They were signs and wonders, such wonders as were confessedly signs of a divine presence and power.

II. We are here told what were the effects of these miracles.

1. The church was hereby kept together: They were all with one accord in Solomon's porch. They met in the temple, Solomon's porch. Those who permitted buyers and sellers could not for shame prohibit such preachers and healers there. They all met in public worship. They were there with one accord. The separation of hypocrites should make the sincere cleave so much the closer to each other.

2. It gained the apostles very great respect. Of the rest of their company durst no man join himself to them, as their equal or an associate with them. All the people magnified them. Though the chief priests did all they could to make them contemptible, this did not hinder the people from magnifying them.

the young men—some of the younger and more active members of the church, not as office-bearers, nor coming forward now for the first time, but who probably had already volunteered their services in making subordinate arrangements. In every thriving Christian community such volunteers may be expected, and will be found eminently useful. 7-11. Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much—naming the sum.

9. How is it that ye have agreed together—See on vs. 2. to tempt the Spirit try whether they could escape detection by that omniscient Spirit of whose supernatural presence with the apostles they had had such full evidence.

feet of them that buried thy husband are at the door—How awfully graphic!

10. buried her by her husband—The later Jews buried before sunset of the day of death.

11. great fear on all the church . . .—This effect on the Christian community itself was the chief design of so startling a judgment; which had its counterpart, as the sin itself had, in Achan (Josh. 7), while the time—at the commencement of a new career—was similar.

12-26. THE PROGRESS OF THE NEW CAUSE LEADS TO THE ARREST OF THE APOSTLES—THEY ARE MIRACULOUSLY DELIVERED FROM PRISON, RESUME THEIR TEACHING, BUT ALLOW THEMSELVES TO BE CONDUCTED BEFORE THE SANHEDRIM. 12. Solomon's Porch—See on John 10:23.

13-16. of the rest durst no man join himself . . .—Of the unconverted none ventured, after what had taken place, to profess discipleship; but yet their number continually increased.

ADAM CLARKE

6. The young men arose. Some of the stout young men belonging to the disciples then present, who were the fittest to undertake a work of this kind, which required considerable bodily exertion. Buried him. This was on the same day in which he died. It was a clear case that he was dead, and dead by a judgment of God that would not be revoked.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

This was the true nature of the new conditions. The discerning Spirit was at work, and the atmosphere was such that it was impossible for a man with a lie in his heart to come in without the lie being known and detected. The thing that astonishes and fills us with awe is not the death of Ananias and Sapphira. It is rather that of the purity of the Church that compelled that death; compelled it, not by law and control, but by the atmosphere of the Spirit in which the Church was purified, and in which the Church was wholly and absolutely at the disposal of the Spirit. There was once a flaming sword that guarded the way to the tree of life. How flaming, in the power of holiness, was this atmosphere into which if a man passed with the profession of generosity on his lips and a lie in his heart, he was immediately arrested and smitten. I look back upon the great scene, and it is not the death of a man that fills me with awe, but that of the Church's condition. That little company of believing souls, a growing company all the time, but still comparatively a small company, was the Body of Christ, His instrument for the revealing of His will, and the carrying out of His will. It was dominated by the Spirit, and so was mastered by His love, walked in His light, and was energized by His life. There came into that assembly a man with a lie upon his lips; and in a moment one spokesman of the fellowship addressed him with a faithfulness that could only be the outcome of the Spirit's indwelling, inspiration, and interpretation. Peter had no mixed motive in his heart, he had no desire to retain the patronage of Ananias because he was a wealthy man; but being a man wholly at the disposal of the Spirit for the doing of the work of Christ, his word was that of terrific directness.
—The Acts of the Apostles

10. Yielded up the ghost. It was not by Peter's words, nor through Peter's prayers, nor through shame, nor through remorse, that this guilty pair died, but by an immediate judgment of God. It was right in this infant state of the Church to show God's displeasure against deceit, fraud, and hypocrisy. Had this guilty pair been permitted to live after they had done this evil, this long-suffering would have been infallibly abused by others; and instead of leading them who had sinned to repentance might have led them to hardness of heart by causing them to presume on the mercy of God. That hypocrisy may be afraid to show her face, God makes these two an example of His justice.

11. Great fear came upon all the church. This judgment answered the end for which it was inflicted; a deeply religious fear occupied every mind, and hypocrisy and deception were banished from this holy assembly.

12. Solomon's porch. See the note on John x. 23.

13. And of the rest durst no man join himself to them. Who were these called the rest? Calmet observes that the Jewish nation was then divided into many different sects, who entertained widely different opinions on various articles. The apostles adopted none of these jarring sentiments, and none of the different sects dared to join themselves to them; neither Pharisees, Sadducees, nor Herodians, as such, were found in this simple, holy Church.

MATTHEW HENRY

The apostles were far from magnifying themselves, and yet the people magnified them; for those that humble themselves shall be exalted, and those honoured that honour God only.

3. The church increased in number (v. 14): Believers were the more added to the Lord, even multitudes both of men and women. They were so far from being deterred by the example that was made of Ananias and Sapphira that they were rather invited by it into a society that kept such a strict discipline. Many have been brought to the Lord, and yet there is room for others to be added to him, added to the number of those that are united to him. Notice is taken of the conversion of women as well as men. As among those that followed Christ while he was upon earth, so among those that believed on him after he went to heaven, great notice was taken of the good women.

4. The apostles had abundance of patients, and gained abundance of reputation by the cure of them all, v. 15, 16. So many signs and wonders were wrought by the apostles that all manner of people put in for the benefit of them, both in city and country, and had it. In the city: They brought forth their sick into the streets. And they laid them on beds and couches that at least the shadow of Peter, passing by, might overshadow some of them, though it could not reach them all; and it had the desired effect, as the woman's touch of the hem of Christ's garment had; and in this that word of Christ was fulfilled, Greater works than these shall you do. And, if such miracles were wrought by Peter's shadow, we have reason to think they were so by the other apostles, as by the handkerchiefs from Paul's body (ch. xix. 12). In the country towns: Multitudes came to Jerusalem from the cities round about, bringing sick folks and those that were vexed with unclean spirits, and they were healed every one; distempered bodies and distempered minds were set to rights. Thus opportunity was given to the apostles, both to convince people's judgments of the heavenly origin of the doctrine they preached, and also to engage people's affections both to them and it.

Never did any good work go on with any hope of success, but it met with opposition. It would have been strange if the apostles had gone on thus teaching and healing and had had no check. In these verses we have the malice of hell and the grace of heaven struggling about them, the one to drive them off from this good work, the other to animate them in it.

I. The priests were enraged at them, and shut them up in prison, v. 17, 18. 1. Who their enemies and persecutors were. The high priest was the ringleader, Annas or Caiaphas. Those that were most forward to join with the high priest herein were the sect of the Sadducees, who had a particular enmity to the gospel of Christ, because it confirmed the resurrection of the dead, and the future state, which they denied. 2. How they were affected towards them, ill affected, and exasperated to the last degree. They rose up in a passion, being filled with indignation at the apostles for preaching the doctrine of Christ, and curing the sick,—at the people for hearing them, and bringing the sick to them to be cured. 3. How they proceeded against them (v. 18): They laid their hands on them, and put them in the common prison, among the worst of malefactors. (1) To put a restraint upon them. While they had them in prison they kept them from going on in their work, and this they reckoned a good point gained. (2) To put a terror upon them, and so to drive them off from their work. The last time they had them before them, they only threatened them (ch. iv. 21); but, now they imprisoned them, to make them afraid of them. (3) To put a disgrace upon them, and therefore they chose to clap them up in the common prison.

II. God sent his angel to release them out of prison. The powers of darkness fight against them, but the Father of lights fights for them. The Lord will never desert his witnesses, his advocates, but will certainly stand by them.

1. The apostles are discharged from their imprisonment (v. 19): The angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors, and, in spite of the keepers that stood without before the doors, brought forth the prisoners (see v. 23). There is no prison so dark, so strong, but God can both visit his people in it, and fetch them out of it.

2. They are charged to go on with their work. The angel bade them, Go, stand, and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life, v. 20. When they were miraculously set at liberty it was that they might go on with their work with so much the more boldness. Recoveries from sickness, releases out of trouble, are granted us, not that we may enjoy the comforts of our life, but that God may be honoured with the services of our life. Where

15. That . . . the shadow of Peter passing by. I cannot see all the miraculous influence here that others profess to see. The people who had seen the miracles wrought by the apostles pressed with their sick to share the healing benefit. As there must have been many diseased people, it is not likely that the apostles, who generally addressed such persons, prayed, and used imposition of hands, could reach all those that were brought to them as fast as the solicitude of their friends could wish. As therefore they could not get Peter or the other apostles personally to all their sick, they thought if they placed them on that side of the way where the shadow was projected (the sun probably now declining, and consequently the shadow lengthening) they should be healed by the shadow of the man passing over them, in whose person such miraculous powers were lodged. But it does not appear that the persons who thus thought and acted were of the number of those converts already made to the faith of Christ, nor does it appear that any person was healed in this way.

16. Sick folks, and them which were vexed with unclean spirits. Here it is evident that sick people are distinguished from those who were vexed with unclean spirits; and therefore they were not one and the same thing. The same distinction is made in Matt. iv. 24; x. 1; Mark i. 32, 34; xvi. 17-18; and Luke iv. 40-41 and vii. 21.

17. The high priest . . . and . . . the sect of the Sadducees. "The heresy of the Sadducees." In this place, as well as in several others, the word hairesis, "heresy," has no evil meaning in itself. It signifies a "sect" or "party," whether good or bad, distinguished from any other sect. Hairesis, heresy, comes from haireo, "I choose," and was anciently applied to the different "sects" of the heathen philosophers, the members of each sect having chosen their own in preference to all the others. Were filled with indignation. With "zeal." Zelos signifies a vehement affection or disposition of the mind, which, according to its object, is either good or bad, laudable or blamable. Its meaning in this place is easily discerned, and not improperly translated indignation in our version.

19. But the angel of the Lord . . . opened the prison doors. This was done: (1) To increase the confidence of the apostles, by showing them that they were under the continual care of God; and (2) To show the Jewish rulers that they were fighting against God while persecuting His followers and attempting to prevent them from preaching the gospel.

20. All the words of this life. This is another periphrasis for "gospel." Go to the temple—the most public place, and speak . . . to the people—who come there to worship according to the law, the words of this life—the whole doctrine of salvation from sin and death; and show that the law is fulfilled in the sacrifice of Jesus, and that by His resurrection He has brought life and immortality to light.

they must preach: Speak in the temple. One would think it had been prudent to go on with it in a more private place. No; "Speak in the temple, for this is the place of concourse, this is your Father's house." It is not for the preachers of Christ's gospel to retire into corners, as long as they can have any opportunity of preaching in the great congregation. To whom they must preach: "Speak to the people, who are willing and desirous to be taught, and whose souls are as precious to Christ as the souls of the greatest." How they must preach: Go, stand, and speak, which intimates, not only that they must speak publicly, but that they must speak boldly and resolutely. What they must speak: All the words of this life. "Go, and preach the same to the world, that others may be comforted with the same comforts with which you yourselves are comforted of God. Of this life emphatically; this heavenly, divine life, in comparison with which the present earthly life does not deserve the name." The gospel is concerning matters of life and death, and ministers must preach it and people hear it accordingly. They must speak all the words of this life, and not conceal any. Christ's witnesses are sworn to speak the whole truth.

III. They went on with their work (v. 21): When they heard this they returned to Solomon's porch, v. 12. It was a great satisfaction to them to have these fresh orders. Now that the angel ordered them to go preach in the temple, their way was plain, and they ventured without any difficulty, entered into the temple, and feared not the face of man. If we may but be satisfied concerning our duty, our business is to keep close to this, and then we may cheerfully trust God with our safety. They set themselves immediately to execute them. They entered into the temple early in the morning, and taught them the gospel of the kingdom: and did not at all fear what man could do unto them. The whole treasure of the gospel is lodged in their hands; if they be silent now the springs are shut up, and the whole work falls to the ground and is made to cease. When God gives opportunity of doing good, though we be under the restraint and terror of human powers, we should venture far rather than let go such an opportunity.

IV. The high priest and his party went on with their prosecution, v. 21. They called the council together, a great and extraordinary council, for they summoned all the senate of the children of Israel.

1. How they were prepared to crush the gospel of Christ and the preachers of it, for they raised the whole posse. The last time they had the apostles in custody they convened them only before a committee of those that were of the kindred of the high priest, but now they called together all the eldership. Thus God ordered it, that the confusion of the enemies, and the apostles' testimony against them, might be more public, and that those might hear the gospel who would not hear it otherwise than from the bar.

2. How they were disappointed, and had their faces filled with shame. An officer is despatched immediately to fetch the prisoners to the bar. (1) The officers come and tell them that they are not to be found in the prison, v. 22, 23. They were gone, and the report which the officers make is, "The prison-door truly found we shut with all safety, the keepers standing without before the doors, but when we went in we found no man therein." Which way the angel fetched them we are not told; however it was, they were gone. The Lord knows, though we do not, how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and how to loose those that are in bonds for his name's sake, and he will do it, as here, when he has occasion for them (v. 24): When the high priest, and the captain of the temple, and the chief priests, heard these things, they were all at a plunge, and looked one upon another, doubting what this thing should be. They were at their wits' end, having never been so disappointed in all their lives of anything they were so sure of. Those often distress and embarrass themselves that think to distress and embarrass the cause of Christ. (2) Their doubt is, in part, determined; and yet their vexation is increased by another messenger, who brings them word that their prisoners are preaching in the temple (v. 25): "Behold, the men whom you put in prison are now standing in the temple, under your nose and in defiance of you, teaching the people." Now this confounded them more than anything. Common malefactors may have art enough to break prison; but those are uncommon ones that have courage enough to avow it when they have so done.

Verses 26–42

We are not told what it was that the apostles preached to the people; but what passed between them and the council we have here an account of; for in their sufferings there appeared more of a divine power and energy than even in their preaching.

CHARLES H. SPURGEON:

It is clear from the text that they were to take a conspicuous place and speak boldly: "Go, stand in the temple." Go where the Sanhedrin holds its sittings, where the high priest and his Sadducean comrades are on the watch. Let not the danger hinder you. Go where all can see you; stand up and stand out. Wherever the people are, there let your voices be heard. Be there perseveringly, taking your stand, and keeping it till removed by force. The object was to make the gospel known; therefore, let them go to headquarters, let them stand in the chief place of concourse, let them be in the resort of the devout, let them challenge the observation of pilgrims from every corner of the land. Brethren, it is not ours to hide in holes and in corners; our gospel is like the sun, whose line has gone out through all the earth. Let us not speak timidly, for we have not received the spirit of fear, neither will we hide our candle under a bushel. We are to publish the tidings of that life from the dead which has brought life for the dead.

"Speak unto the people." "Unto the people"—that does not mean the poor to the exclusion of the rich, nor the many to the exclusion of the few. The expression is most comprehensive, and embraces both the masses and the classes. If the men of the council would hear them, let them speak to them. They did so, alas! with small result. This is a truly gospel word of command; for the gospel is glad tidings to all people, and it is to be preached to every creature under heaven. A restricted audience is an unevangelic idea. Go and speak unto the people, then—to all sorts of people, to everybody. Let not a soul escape if you can help it, for your mission is to all mankind. Oh, gospel fishermen, spread the great seine net, which will encompass a great multitude of fishes, and with diligence draw it to shore.—The Treasury of the New Testament called . . . all the senate . . .—an unusually general convention, though hastily summoned.

23. the prison . . . shut . . . keepers . . . before the doors, but . . . no man within—the reverse of the miracle in ch. 16:26; a similar contrast to that of the nets at the miraculous draughts of fishes (Luke 5:6; and John 21:11). 24-26. they doubted—'were in perplexity.'

ADAM CLARKE

21. Called the council together. The "Sanhedrin."

23. The prison truly found we shut. All the doors were properly bolted and the keepers at their post; but when we had opened, for it appears they were alone in possession of the keys. How much this must have increased their astonishment when they found that the doors were not broken open, the guards properly posted, and everything as they left it!

24. They doubted of them whereunto this would grow. They did not know what to think of the apostles, whether they had saved themselves by magic or whether they were delivered by a real miracle; and they were at a loss to tell what the issue of these things would be.

MATTHEW HENRY

I. The seizing of the apostles a second time. They brought them without violence. One would think they had reason to do so, in reverence to the temple, and for fear of the apostles, lest they should strike them, as they did Ananias. But all that restrained their violence was their fear of the people, who had such a veneration for the apostles that they would have stoned the officers if they had offered them any abuse. 2. Yet they brought them to those who were resolved to take violent courses with them (v. 27): They brought them, to set them before the council. Thus the powers that should have been a terror to evil works and workers became so to the good.

II. Their examination. The high priest told them what it was they had to lay to their charge, v. 28. 1. They had disobeyed the commands of authority (v. 28): "Did not we strictly charge and command you that you should not teach in this name? But you have disobeyed our commands." Did not we command you? Yes, they did; but did not Peter at the same time tell them that God's authority was superior to theirs, and his commands must take place of theirs? And they had forgotten this. 2. They had spread false doctrine among the people. "You have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, and thereby have disturbed the public peace." 3. They had a malicious design against the government, as having made itself justly odious both to God and man: "You intend to bring this man's blood, the guilt of it before God, the shame of it before men, upon us." See here how those who with a great deal of presumption will do an evil thing yet cannot bear to hear of it afterwards. When they were in the heat of the persecution they could cry daringly enough, "His blood be upon us and upon our children." But now they take it as a great affront to have his blood laid at their door.

III. Their answer to the charge exhibited against them: Peter and the other apostles all spoke to the same purport; they spoke as one and the same Spirit gave them utterance.

1. They justified themselves in their disobedience (v. 29): We ought to obey God rather than men. God had commanded them to teach in the name of Christ, and therefore they ought to do it, though the chief priests forbade them. Those rulers have a great deal to answer for, who punish men for disobedience to them in that which is their duty to God.

2. They justified themselves in doing what they could to fill Jerusalem with the doctrine of Christ, and if they thereby bring his blood upon them they may thank themselves.

(1) The chief priests are told to their faces the indignities they did to this Jesus: "You slew him and hanged him on a tree." People's being unwilling to hear of their faults is no good reason why they should not be faithfully told of them. It is a common excuse made for not reproving sin that the times will not bear it. But those whose office it is to reprove must not be awed by this; the times must bear it, and shall bear it.

(2) They are told also what honours God put upon this Jesus, and then let them judge who was in the right, the persecutors of his doctrine or the preachers of it. He calls God the God of our fathers. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; see what honour he did him. [1] He raised him up. "You put him to death, but God has restored him to life, so that God and you are manifestly contesting about this Jesus; and which must we side with?" [2] He exalted him with his right hand. "You loaded him with disgrace, but God has crowned him with honour; and ought we not to honour him whom God honours? God has given him a name above every name." [3] "He has appointed him to be a prince and a saviour." There is no having Christ to be our Saviour, unless we be willing to take him for our prince. We cannot expect to be redeemed and healed by him, unless we give up ourselves to be ruled by him. Faith takes an entire Christ, that came, not to save us in our sins, but to save us from our sins. [4] He is appointed to give repentance to Israel and remission of sins. Therefore they must preach in his name to the people of Israel, for his favours were designed primarily and principally for them. Why should the rulers and elders of Israel oppose one who came with no less a blessing to Israel than repentance and pardon? But repentance and remission of sins are blessings they neither value nor see their need of. Repentance and remission go together; wherever repentance is wrought remission is without fail granted. On the other hand, no remission without repentance. It is Jesus Christ that gives both repentance and remission. Are we appointed to repent? Christ is appointed to give repentance. The new heart is his work, and the broken spirit a sacrifice of his providing; and, when he has given repentance, if he should not give re-

27-42. SECOND APPEARANCE AND TESTIMONY BEFORE THE SANHEDRIM—ITS RAGE CALMED BY GAMALIEL—BEING DISMISSED, THEY DEPART REJOICING, AND CONTINUE THEIR PREACHING. 27, 28. ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine—noble testimony to the success of their preaching, and (for the reason mentioned on ch. 4:4) to the truth of their testimony, from reluctant lips! intend to bring this man's blood upon us—They avoid naming Him whom Peter gloried in holding up [BENGEL]. In speaking thus, they seem to betray a disagreeable recollection of their own recent imprecation, "His blood be upon us . . ." (Matt. 27:25), and of the traitor's words as he threw down the money, "I have sinned in that I have betrayed innocent blood" (Matt. 27:4). 29, 30. Then Peter . . .—See on ch. 2:22, and on ch. 3:13, etc.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

Peter's brave answer is the type of answer that thousands of trembling women and meek men have given. His tone is severer now than on his former appearance. Now he has no courteous recognition of the court's authority. Now he brushes aside all Annas's attempts to impose on him the sanctity of its decrees, and flatly denies that the Council has any more right to command than any other "men." They claimed to be depositaries of God's judgments. This revolutionary fisherman sees nothing in them but "men," whose commands point one way, while God's point the other. The angel bade them "speak"; the Council had bid them be dumb. To state the opposition was to determine their duty. Formerly Peter had said "judge ye," which command it is right to obey. Now, he wraps his refusal in no folds of courtesy, but thrusts the naked "We must obey God" in the Council's face. That was a great moment in the history of the world and the Church. How much lay in it, as in a seed—Luther's "Here I stand, I can do none other. God help me! Amen"; Plymouth Rock, and many a glorious and blood-stained page in the records of martyrdom.

31. Prince and a Saviour—the first word expressing that Royalty which all Israel looked for in Messiah, the second the Saving character of it which they had utterly lost sight of. Each of these features in our Lord's work enters into the other, and both make one glorious whole (cf. ch. 3:15; Heb. 2:10). to give—dispensing as a "Prince." repentance and remission of sins—as a "Saviour"; "repentance" embracing all that change which issues in the faith which secures "forgiveness" (cf. ch. 2:38; 20:21). How gloriously is Christ here exhibited; not, as in other places, as the Medium, but as the Dispenser of all spiritual blessings!

ADAM CLARKE

26. Brought them without violence. On receiving the information mentioned above, proper officers were sent to seize and bring them before the council. The officers, on reaching the Temple, found the multitude gladly receiving the doctrine of the apostles and so intent on hearing all the words of this life that they were afraid to show any hostility to the apostles, lest the people should stone them. We may therefore conclude that the officers entreated them to accompany them to the council; and that they felt it their duty to obey every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake and so cheerfully went with them, trusting in the Lord their God.

28. Did not we straitly command you? "With commanding did we not command you?"; a Hebraism—another proof of the accuracy and fidelity of Luke, who seems always to give every man's speech as he delivered it—not the substance, but the very words. See chap. iv. 17. Not teach in this name. That is, of Jesus as the Christ or Messiah. Intend to bring this man's blood upon us. You speak in such a way of Him to the people as to persuade them that we have crucified an innocent Man.

29. We ought to obey God rather than men. The same answer they gave before, chap. iv. 19, founded on the same reason, which still stood good. We have received our commission from God; we dare not lay it down at the desire or command of men.

30. The God of our fathers raised up Jesus. It was well to introduce this, that the council might at once see that they preached no strange God; and that He who so highly honored the patriarchs, Moses, and the prophets had yet more highly honored Jesus Christ in raising Him from the dead and seating Him at His right hand, and proclaiming Him as the only Giver of salvation and the repentance which leads to it. Whom ye slew. They charge them again with the murder of Christ, as they had done before, chap. iv. 10-12.

31. Him hath God exalted with his right hand. By a supereminent display of His "almighty power," for so the right hand of God often means. A Prince. The Leader or Director in the way. See the notes on chap. iii. 15 and 19. And a Saviour. "A Deliverer or Preserver." The word soter comes from sozo, to "save, deliver, preserve, escape from death or danger, bring into a state of security or safety." Jesus and Saviour are nearly of the same import. He alone delivers from sin, death, and hell; by Him alone we escape from the snares and dangers to which we are exposed: and it is by and in Him, and in connection with Him, that we are preserved blameless and harmless. He alone can save the soul from sin and preserve it in that state of salvation. Forgiveness of sins. The "taking away of sins." This is not to be restrained to the mere act of justification; it implies the removal of sin, whether its power, guilt, or impurity be considered. Through Jesus we have the destruction of the power, the pardon of the guilt, and the cleansing from the pollution, of sin. The two words in italics in this text, to be, are impertinently introduced; it reads much better without them.

mission he would forsake the work of his own hands. [5] All this is well attested, First, by the apostles themselves. "We are his witnesses, and if we should be silent, as you would have us, we should betray a trust." When a cause is trying, witnesses ought not to be silenced, for the issue of the cause depends on their testimony. Secondly, By the Spirit of God. The Holy Ghost is witness, a witness from heaven. For this end the Holy Ghost is given us, whose operations we cannot stifle. The giving of the Holy Ghost to obedient believers, not only to bring them to the obedience of faith, but to make them eminently useful therein, is a very strong proof of the truth of Christianity. Lastly, The giving of the Holy Ghost to those that obey Christ is a plain evidence that it is the will of God that Christ should be obeyed; "judge then whether we ought to obey you in opposition to him."

IV. The impression which the apostles' defence of themselves made upon the court. Surely such fair reasoning could not but clear the prisoners, and convert the judges. They raged against it, and were filled, 1. With indignation: They were cut to the heart, angry to see their own sin set in order before them; stark mad to find that the gospel of Christ had so much to say for itself. When a sermon was preached to the people to this purport, they were pricked to the heart, in remorse and godly sorrow, ch. ii. 37. These here were cut to the heart with rage and indignation. 2. With malice against the apostles themselves. Since they see they cannot stop their mouths any other way than by stopping their breath, they take counsel to slay them. While the apostles went on in the service of Christ, with a holy security and serenity of mind, their persecutors went on in their opposition to Christ, with a constant perplexity and perturbation of mind, and vexation to themselves.

V. The grave advice which Gamaliel gave upon this occasion. This Gamaliel is here said to be a Pharisee by his profession and sect, and by office a doctor of the law. Paul was brought up at his feet (ch. xxii. 3). He is here said to be in reputation among all the people. He was a moderate man, and not apt to go in with furious measures. Men of temper and charity are justly had in reputation, for checking the incendiaries that otherwise would set the world on fire.

1. The necessary caution he gives to the council: He commanded to put the apostles forth a little while. You men of Israel, saith he, take heed to yourselves, consider what you do, or intend to do, as touching these men, v. 25. He calls them men of Israel, to enforce this caution: "You are men, that should be governed by reason; you are men of Israel, that should be governed by revelation. Take heed to yourselves." The persecutors of God's people had best look to themselves, lest they fall into the pit which they dig.

2. The cases he cites. Two instances he gives of factious seditious men, whose attempts came to nothing of themselves; whence he infers that if these men were indeed such as they represented them their cause would sink with its own weight.

(1) There was one Theudas, boasting himself to be somebody. He observes here (v. 26) concerning him, how far he prevailed: "A number of men, about four hundred in all, joined themselves to him." How soon his pretensions were all dashed: "When he was slain, all, as many as obeyed him, were scattered. Now compare that case with this. You have slain Jesus, the ringleader of this faction. Now if he was an impostor and pretender, his death will be the death of his cause."

(2) The case was the same with Judas of Galilee, v. 37. [1] The attempt he made. It is said to be after this, which some read, besides this. It is not easy to determine particularly when these events happened. It is probable that they were cases which lately happened, and were fresh in memory. This Judas drew away much people after him. [2] Here is the defeat of his attempt, he also perished, and all, even as many as obeyed him, were dispersed.

3. His opinion upon the whole matter.

(1) That they should not persecute the apostles (v. 38): Now I say unto you, "Refrain from these men; let not our hand be upon them." It is uncertain whether he spoke this out of policy. The apostles did not attempt anything by outward force. Why should any outward force be used against them? Or, whether it was only the language of a mild quiet spirit. Or, whether God put this word into his mouth beyond his own intention. We are sure there was an overruling Providence in it, that the servants of Christ might not only come off, but come off honourably.

(2) That they should refer this matter to Providence: "Wait the issue. If it be of men, it will come to nought of itself; if of God, it will stand, in spite of all your powers and policies." That which is apparently wicked and immoral must be suppressed, but that

32, 33. we are his witnesses . . . and the Holy Ghost—They as competent human witnesses to facts, and the Holy Ghost as attesting them by undeniable miracles.

33. cut to the heart and took—'were taking'—counsel to slay them—How different this feeling and the effect of it from that "pricking of the heart" which drew from the first converts on the day of Pentecost the cry, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" (ch. 2:37). The words used in the two places are strikingly different.

34. Then stood up . . . Gamaliel—in all probability one of that name celebrated in the Jewish writings for his wisdom, the son of Simeon (possibly the same who took the infant Saviour in his arms, Luke 2:25-35), and grandson of Hillel, another celebrated rabbi. He died eighteen years before the destruction of Jerusalem [LIGHTFOOT].

35-39. Theudas—not the same with a deceiver of that name whom Josephus mentions as heading an insurrection some twelve years after this [Antiquities, 20. 5. 1], but some other of whom he makes no mention. Such insurrections were frequent.

37. Judas of Galilee—See on Luke 2:2, and 13:1-3 [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 13. 1. 1].

ADAM CLARKE

32. We are his witnesses. The word his is omitted by several MSS. It does not seem to be necessary. Of these things. "Of these transactions"; i.e., of Christ's life and miracles, and of your murderous proceedings against Him. To them that obey him. We obey God, not you; and therefore God gives us this Spirit, which is in us a Fountain of light, life, love, and power.

33. They were cut to the heart. Literally, "they were sawn through." They were stung to the heart, not with compunction nor remorse, but with spite, malice, and revenge. For, having the murder of Christ thus brought home to their consciences, in the first feelings of their malice and revenge they thought of destroying the persons who had witnessed their nefarious conduct.

34. A Pharisee, named Gamaliel, a doctor of the law. "This," says Dr. Lightfoot, "was Rabban Gamaliel the first; commonly, by way of distinction, called Rabban Gamaliel the elder. He was president of the council after the death of his own father, Rabban Simeon, who was the son of Hillel. He was Paul's master, and the thirty-fifth receiver of the traditions, and on this account might not be improperly termed a doctor of the law, because he was one that kept and handed down the Cabala received from Mount Sinai. He died eighteen years before the destruction of Jerusalem, his son Simeon succeeding him in the chair, who perished in the ruins of the city." Though probably no favorer of Christianity, yet for a Pharisee he seems to have possessed a more liberal mind than most of his brethren; the following advice was at once humane, sensible, candid, and enlightened.

35. What ye intend to do. "What you are about to do." They had already intended to destroy them; and they were now about to do it.

36. Rose up Theudas. Josephus, Ant., l. xx, c. 4, s. 1, mentions one named Theudas who was the author of an insurrection, about whom there has been much controversy whether he were the person spoken of here by Gamaliel. Every circumstance, as related by Josephus, agrees well enough with what is referred to here except the chronology; for the Theudas mentioned by Josephus made his insurrection when Fadus was governor of Judea, which was at least ten years after the time in which the apostles were brought before this council. Much labor has been thrown away in unsuccessful attempts to reconcile the historian and the Evangelist, when it is very probable they speak of different transactions. Dr. Lightfoot thinks that "Josephus has made a slip in his chronology." I confess the matter does not appear to me of so much consequence. Boasting himself to be somebody. "Saying that he was a great personage," i.e., according to the supposition of Bishop Pearce, setting himself up to be king of the Jews.

37. Judas of Galilee. Josephus mentions the insurrection made by Judas of Galilee, Ant., l. xviii, c. 1, and says it was when Cyrenius was governor of Syria. Pearce supposes that there were two "taxations" or "enrollments"; and that the one mentioned here took place ten years after that mentioned in Luke ii.

38. Refrain from these men. Do not molest them; leave them to God. For if this counsel and work be of man it will come to nought, like the rebellion of Theudas, and that of Judas of Galilee.

which has a show of good, and it is doubtful whether it be of God or men, it is best to let it alone, and let it take its fate. Christ rules by the power of truth, not of the sword. [1] "If this counsel, and this work, be of men, it will come to nothing. If it be the counsel and work of foolish crack-brained men, they will run themselves out of breath. They will make themselves ridiculous. If it be the counsel and work of politic and designing men, let them alone awhile, and their knavery will be manifest to all men. Providence will never countenance it. It will come to nothing in a little time; there is no occasion to kill that which, if you give it a little time, will die of itself. The unnecessary use of power is an abuse of it." [2] "If it should prove that this counsel and this work is of God, then what do you think of persecuting them, of this attempt of yours (v. 33) to slay them? You must conclude it to be a fruitless attempt against them: If it be of God, you cannot overthrow it." It may be the comfort of all who are sincerely on God's side, that whatsoever is of God cannot be overthrown totally and finally, though it may be very vigorously opposed; it may be run upon, but cannot be run down. "A dangerous attempt to yourselves. Pray let it alone, lest haply you be found even to fight against God." Those that hate and abuse God's faithful people, that restrain and silence his faithful ministers, fight against God. Well, this was the advice of Gamaliel: we wish it were duly considered by those that persecute for conscience' sake.

VI. The determination of the council upon the whole matter, v. 40. Thus far they agreed with Gamaliel that they let fall the design of putting the apostles to death. Yet they could not forbear giving some vent to their rage. They beat them, scourged them as malefactors, and notice is taken (v. 41) of the ignominy of it. Thus they thought to make them ashamed of preaching, and the people ashamed of hearing them. They commanded them that they should not speak any more in the name of Jesus.

VII. The wonderful courage and constancy of the apostles. They departed from the council, and we do not find one word they said by way of reflection upon the court, but committed their cause to him to whom Gamaliel had referred it.

1. They bore their sufferings with an invincible cheerfulness (v. 41): When they went out, instead of being ashamed of Christ, they rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name. They were men that had never done anything to make themselves vile, and therefore could not but have a sense of the shame they suffered, which was more grievous to them than the smart, as it usually is to ingenuous minds; but they considered that it was for the name of Christ that they were thus abused, and their sufferings should be made to contribute to the further advancement of his name. They reckoned it an honour that they were counted worthy to suffer shame, that they were honoured to be dishonoured for Christ. Reproach for Christ is true preferment. They rejoiced in it, remembering what their Master had said to them at their first setting out (Matt. v. 11, 12): When men shall revile you, and persecute you, rejoice and be exceedingly glad. They rejoiced that they suffered shame. If we suffer ill for doing well, provided we suffer it well, we ought to rejoice in that grace which enables us so to do.

2. They went on in their work with indefatigable diligence (v. 42): They were commanded not to preach, and yet they ceased not to teach and preach. When they preached—daily; every day, as duly as the day came. Where they preached—both publicly in the temple, and privately in every house. Though in the temple they were under the eye of their enemies, yet they did not confine themselves to their own houses, but ventured into the post of danger; and though they had the liberty of the temple, yet they made no difficulty of preaching in houses, in every house, even the poorest cottage. What was the subject matter of their preaching: They preached Jesus Christ. They did not preach themselves, but Christ. This was the preaching that gave most offence to the priests, but they would not alter their subject to please them. It ought to be the constant business of gospel ministers to preach Christ; Christ, and him crucified; Christ, and him glorified.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

38. if . . . of men, it will come to naught—This neutral policy was true wisdom, in the then temper of the council. But individual neutrality is hostility to Christ, as He Himself teaches (Luke 11:23).

ALBERT BARNES:

"This counsel or this work be of men." This plan or purpose. If the apostles had originated it for the purposes of imposture. "It will come to nought." Gamaliel inferred that from the two instances which he specified. They had been suppresed without the interference of the Sanhedrin; and he inferred that this would also die away if it was a human device. It will be remembered that this is the mere advice of Gamaliel, who was not inspired, and that this opinion should not be adduced to guide us, except as it was an instance of great shrewdness and prudence. It is doubtless right to oppose error in the proper way and with the proper temper, not with arms, or vituperation, or with the civil power, but with argument and kind entreaty.

But the sentiment of Gamaliel is full of wisdom in regard to error. For, (1) The very way to exalt error into notice, and to confirm men in it, is to oppose it in a harsh, authoritative, and unkind manner. (2) Error, if left alone, will often die away itself. The interest of men in it will often cease as soon as it ceases to be opposed; and, having nothing to fan the flame, it will expire. It is not so with truth. (3) In this respect the remark may be applied to the Christian religion. It has stood too long, and in too many circumstances of prosperity and adversity, to be of men. It has been subjected to all trials from its pretended friends and real foes; and it still lives as vigorous and flourishing as ever. Kingdoms have changed; empires have risen and fallen since Gamaliel spoke this; systems of opinion and belief have had their day, and expired; but the preservation of the Christian religion, unchanged through so many revolutions, and in so many fiery trials, shows that it is not of men, but of God. The argument for the divine origin of the Christian religion from its perpetuity is one that can be applied to no other system that has been, or that now exists.—Popular Commentary departed . . . rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name—'thought worthy by God to be dishonored by man' (Matt. 5: 12; I Pet. 4:14, 16) [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. This was their first taste of persecution, and it felt sweet for His sake whose disciples they were.

42. in every house—in private. (See on ch. 2:46.) ceased not to preach Jesus Christ—i.e., Jesus (to be the) Christ.

ADAM CLARKE

40. To him they agreed. That is, not to stay the apostles nor to attempt any further to imprison them. But their malevolence could not be thus easily satisfied, and therefore they beat them—probably gave each of them thirty-nine stripes; and having commanded them not to speak in the name of Jesus, they let them go.

41. Rejoicing that they were counted worthy. The whole verse may be read thus: "But they departed rejoicing from the presence of the Sanhedrin, because they were deemed worthy to be dishonored on account of the name." The word his is omitted by some MSS. The name probably by this time distinguished both the Author of salvation and the sacred system of doctrine which the apostles preached.

42. Daily in the temple. That is, at the hours of morning and evening prayer; for they felt it their duty to worship God in public, and to help others to make a profitable use of the practice. Every man that professes Christianity should in this respect also copy their conduct; nor can any man be considered to have any religion who does not attend on the public worship of his Maker. They ceased not to teach and preach Jesus. Far from desisting, they became more zealous, yea, incessant, in their work. They took advantage of the public assemblies in the Temple, as well as of all private opportunities, to teach all the truths of their holy religion; and to preach, proclaim Jesus as the only Messiah, that He who was crucified rose from the dead and was exalted a Prince and a Saviour at the right hand of God.

MATTHEW HENRY

CHAPTER 6

I. An unhappy disagreement among some of the church members was prudently taken up in time (v. 1): When the number of the disciples was multiplied there arose a murmuring.

1. It does our hearts good to find that the number of the disciples is multiplied, as, no doubt, it vexed the priests and Sadducees to see it. The opposition that the preaching of the gospel met with contributed to the success of it. The preachers were beaten, threatened, and abused, and yet the people received their doctrine, invited thereto by their wonderful patience and cheerfulness under their trials.

2. Yet it casts a damp upon us to find that the multiplying of the disciples proves an occasion of discord. Now that they were multiplied they began to murmur. There arose a murmuring, not an open falling out, but a secret heart-burning.

(1) The complainants were the Grecians against the Hebrews—the Jews that were scattered in Greece, and other parts, many of whom being at Jerusalem at the feast embraced the faith of Christ. These complained against the Hebrews, the native Jews. Some of each of these became Christians, and their joint-embracing of the faith of Christ did not prevail to extinguish the little jealousies they had one of another before their conversion. But all are alike welcome to Christ, and should be, for his sake, dear to one another.

(2) The complaint of these Grecians was that their widows were neglected in the daily administration. The first contention in the Christian church was about a money-matter. A great deal of money was gathered for the relief of the poor, but, as often happens in such cases, it was impossible to please everybody in the laying of it out. The apostles no doubt designed to do it with the utmost impartiality, and yet here they are complained to, and tacitly complained of, that the Grecian widows were neglected. Perhaps this complaint was groundless and unjust. Those who, upon any account, lie under disadvantages (as the Grecian Jews did, in comparison with those that were Hebrews of the Hebrews) are apt to be jealous that they are slighted when really they are not so; and it is the common fault of poor people that they are querulous and clamorous, and apt to find fault that more is not given them. There are envy and covetousness to be found among the poor as well as among the rich. We will suppose there might be some occasion for their complaint. As those that have the administration of public justice ought in a particular manner to protect widows from injury, so those that have the administration of public charity ought in a particular manner to provide for widows what is necessary. In the best-ordered church in the world there will be something amiss, some grievances, or at least some complaints; those are the best that have the least and the fewest.

II. The happy accommodating of this matter. The apostles had hitherto the directing of the matter. Some persons must be chosen to manage this matter who have more leisure to attend to it than the apostles had.

1. How the method was proposed by the apostles: They called the multitude of the disciples unto them. The twelve themselves would not determine anything without them. Those might be best able to advise who were more conversant in the affairs of this life than the apostles were.

(1) The apostles could by no means admit so great a diversion from their great work (v. 2): It is not reasonable that we should leave the word of God and serve tables. This was foreign to the business which the apostles were called to. They were to preach the word of God. They thought that was work enough for a whole man. If they serve tables, they must, in some measure, leave the word of God. They will no more be drawn from their preaching by the money laid at their feet than they will be driven from it by the stripes laid on their backs. Preaching the gospel is the best work that a minister can be employed in. He must not entangle himself in the affairs of this life, no, not in the outward business of the house of God.

(2) They therefore desire that seven men might be chosen whose business it should be to serve tables, v. 2. The business must be minded, must be better minded than it had been, and than the apostles could mind it; and therefore proper persons must be chosen, that everything might be done decently and in order, and no person nor thing neglected. The persons must be duly qualified. The people are to choose, and the apostles to ordain. Look out seven men. These must be of honest report, men free from were neglected—'overlooked' by those whom the apostles employed, and who were probably of the Hebrew class, as being the most numerous. The complaint was in all likelihood well founded, though we cannot suspect the distributors of intentional partiality. "It was really just an emulation of love, each party wishing to have their own poor taken care of in the best manner" [OLSHAUSEN]. the daily ministration—the daily distribution of alms or of food, probably the latter.

2-4. the multitude—the general body of the disciples. It is not reason—The word expresses dislike; i.e. 'We cannot submit.' to leave the word of God—to have our time and attention withdrawn from preaching; which, it thus appears, they regarded as their primary duty. to serve tables—oversee the distribution of provisions.

ADAM CLARKE

1. A murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews. Those who are here termed Grecians, or Hellenists, were Jews who sojourned now at Jerusalem but lived in countries where the Greek language was spoken, and probably in general knew no other. They are distinguished here from those called Hebrews, by which we are to understand native Jews, who spoke what was then termed the Hebrew language, a sort of Chaldaio-Syriac. The foreign or Hellenistic Jews began to be jealous that their widows were neglected in the daily ministration, that they either had not the proportion or were not duly served, the Palestine Jews being partial to those of their own country. This shows that the community of goods could never have been designed to become general. Indeed, it was no ordinance of God; and, in any state of society, must in general be impracticable.

2. It is not reason. "It is not pleasing, proper, or fitting," that we should leave the word of God, that we should give up ourselves or confide to others the doctrine of salvation which God has commanded us to preach unto the people. And serve tables. Become providers of daily bread for your widows and poor. Others can do this, to whom our important office is not intrusted.

3. Wherefore . . . look ye out among you seven men. Choose persons in whom you can all confide, who will distribute the provisions impartially and in due time; and let these persons be the objects of the choice of both the Hebrews and the Hellenists, that all cause of murmuring and discontent may be done away. Probably the seven men were to take each his day of service, and then there would be a superintendent for these widows for each day of the week. Of honest report. Persons to whose character there is authentic "testimony," well-known and accredited.

ALBERT BARNES:

"Of the Grecians." There has been much diversity of opinion in regard to these persons, whether they were Jews who had lived among the Gentiles, and who spoke the Greek language, or whether they were proselytes from the Gentiles. The former is probably the correct opinion. The word here used is not that which is commonly employed to designate the inhabitants of Greece, but it properly denotes those who imitate the customs and habits of the Greeks, who use the Greek language, etc. In the time when the gospel was first preached, there were two classes of Jews: those who remained in Palestine, who used the Hebrew language, and who were appropriately called Hebrews; and those who were scattered among the Gentiles, who spoke the Greek language, and who used in their synagogues the Greek translation of the Old Testament, the Septuagint, who were called Hellenists, or, as it is in our translation, Grecians. These were doubtless the persons mentioned here—not those who were proselyted from Gentiles, but those of Jewish origin who were not natives of Judea, who had come up to Jerusalem to attend the great festivals.

Dissensions would very likely arise between these two classes of persons. The Jews of Palestine would pride themselves much on the fact that they dwelt in the land of the patriarchs and the land of promise; that they used the language which their fathers spoke, and in which the oracles of God were given; and that they were constantly near the temple, and regularly engaged in its solemnities. On the other hand, the Jews from other parts of the world would be suspicious, jealous, and envious of their brethren, and would be likely to charge them with partiality, or of taking advantage in their association with them. These occasions of strife would not be destroyed by their conversion to Christianity, and one of them is furnished on this occasion.—Popular Commentary scandal, that were looked upon by their neighbours as men of integrity, that might be trusted, well spoken of for everything that is virtuous. They must be full of the Holy Ghost. They must not only be honest men, but they must be men of ability and men of courage, hereby appearing to be full of the Holy Ghost. They must be full of wisdom. It was not enough that they were honest, good men, but they must be discreet, judicious men, that could not be imposed upon: full of the Holy Ghost, and wisdom, that is, of the Holy Ghost as a Spirit of wisdom. Those must be full of wisdom who are entrusted with public money, that it may be disposed of, not only with fidelity, but with frugality. The people must nominate the persons: "Look you out among yourselves seven men." They might be presumed to know better, or at least were fitter to enquire, what character men had, than the apostles. The apostles will ordain them to the service, will give them their charge, and give them their authority. Whom we may appoint over this business, to take care of it, and to see that there be neither waste nor want.

(3) The apostles engage to addict themselves wholly to their work as ministers, if they can but get fairly quit of this troublesome office (v. 4): We will give ourselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word. See here, [1] What are the two great gospel ordinances—the word, and prayer. By these two the kingdom of Christ must be advanced, and additions made to it. [2] What is the great business of gospel ministers—to give themselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word. They must be God's mouth to the people in the ministry of the word, and the people's mouth to God in prayer. In order to the conviction and conversion of sinners, and the edification and consolation of saints, we must not only offer up our prayers for them, but we must minister the word to them. Nor must we only minister the word to them, but we must pray for them. God's grace can do all without our preaching, but our preaching can do nothing without God's grace. Those ministers, without doubt, are the successors of the apostles, who give themselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word.

2. How this proposal was agreed to by the disciples. It was not imposed, but proposed. The saying pleased the whole multitude, v. 5.

(1) They pitched upon the persons. The majority of votes fell upon the persons here named; and the rest both of the candidates and the electors acquiesced. The overseers of the poor were chosen by the suffrage of the people, in which yet a regard is to be had to the providence of God. We have a list of the persons chosen. We may conjecture, concerning these seven, [1] That they were such as had sold their estates, and brought the money into the common stock; those were fittest to be entrusted with the distribution of it who had been most generous in the contribution to it. [2] That these seven were all of the Grecian or Hellenist Jews, for they have all Greek names, and this would be most likely to silence the murmurings of the Grecians. Nicolas, it is plain, was one of them, for he was a proselyte of Antioch. The first named is Stephen, a man full of faith and of the Holy Ghost, full of fidelity, full of courage (so some), for he was full of the Holy Ghost, of his gifts and graces. He was an extraordinary man, and excelled in everything that was good: his name signifies a crown. Philip is put next, afterwards ordained to the office of an evangelist, a companion and assistant to the apostles, for so he is expressly called, ch. xxi. 8. And his preaching and baptizing (which we read of ch. viii. 12) were certainly not as a deacon, but as an evangelist. The last named is Nicolas, who, some say, afterwards degenerated (as the Judas among these seven) and was the founder of the sect of the Nicolaitans which we read of (Rev. ii. 6, 15), and which Christ there says, once and again, was a thing he hated. But some of the ancients clear him from this charge, and tell us that, though that vile impure sect denominated themselves from him, yet it was unjustly, and because he only insisted much upon it that those that had wives should be as though they had none, thence they wickedly inferred that those that had wives should have them in common, which therefore Tertullian, when he speaks of the community of goods, particularly excepts: Omnia indiscreta apud nos, præter uxores—All things are common among us, except our wives—Apol. cap. 39.

(2) The apostles appointed them to this work of serving tables for the present, v. 6. They prayed with them, and for them. All that are employed in the service of the church ought to be committed to the conduct of the divine grace by the prayers of the church. They laid their hands on them. Having by prayer implored a blessing upon them, they did by the laying on of hands assure them that the blessing was conferred in answer to the prayer; and this was full of the Holy Ghost—not full of miraculous gifts, which would have been no qualification for the duties required, but spiritually gifted (although on two of them miraculous power did rest). and wisdom—discretion, aptitude for practical business. whom we may appoint—for while the election was vested in the Christian people, the appointment lay with the apostles, as spiritual rulers.

4. we will give ourselves to prayer—public prayer, as along with preaching their great work.

5. Stephen . . .—As this and the following names are all Greek, it is likely they were all of the "Grecian" class, which would effectually restore mutual confidence.

when they had prayed, they laid their hands on them—the one proclaiming that all official gifts flowed from the Church's glorified Head, the other symbolizing the communication of these to the chosen office-bearers through the recognized channels.

Full of the Holy Ghost. Saved into the spirit of the gospel dispensation, and made partakers of that Holy Ghost by which the soul is sanctified, and endued with those graces which constitute the mind that was in Christ. And wisdom. Prudence, discretion, and economy; for mere piety and uprightness could not be sufficient where so many must be pleased, and where frugality, impartiality, and liberality, must ever walk hand in hand. Whom we may appoint. Instead of we may appoint, "we shall appoint" is the reading of several MSS. It makes, however, very little difference in the sense.

4. We will give ourselves continually to prayer. "We will steadfastly and invariably attend," we will carefully keep our hearts to this work. The word is very emphatic.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

The first thing in this organism was the setting free of the apostles for their own work, setting them free from high work which nevertheless hindered them from doing their own. It was high and holy work, this work of caring for the distress existing among the members of the Church. It is always high and holy work, every part of the business of the Church—the swinging open of the door, the reception of the man who comes across the threshold, and placing him in relation to service and work. It is great in every detail, but the doing of it hinders the men who are called to the preaching of the Word. The apostles said: "It is not fit that we should forsake the word of God"—not to do a low thing, a mean thing, a vulgar thing; but to do a high and holy thing, if the high and holy thing prevents our fulfillment of that which is our specific work. The first organization was designed to set the preacher of the Word free from everything except prayer and the preaching of the Word. "We will continue steadfastly in prayer and in the ministry of the word."

Notice the process, the method, under the apostolic guidance. They instructed the people as to how they should act, and ratified their choice, but the appointment of the seven was a Church appointment. The whole multitude of disciples were gathered together; and they—the whole multitude, not the apostles—chose these men. The details of election are not given. This is in keeping with the utter absence of ecclesiastical detail which characterizes the apostolic records. The perpetual presence of the Holy Spirit was to be the safeguard of method and of choice. That which is final and necessary is the presence of the Spirit, His safeguarding of the organization, His selection of the proper men for the proper work, His making known the will of the Lord for the whole company of disciples, under the direction of the apostolic teaching and apostolic authority. These are things that are very simple, and yet they are of supreme importance.—The Acts of the Apostles

5. Stephen, a man full of faith and of the Holy Ghost. A person every way properly fitted for his work, and thus qualified to be the first martyr of the Christian Church. Nicolas a proselyte of Antioch. A heathen Greek, who had not only believed in the God of Israel but had also received circumcision, and consequently was a "proselyte of the covenant." As this is the only proselyte mentioned here, we may presume that all the rest were native Jews.

6. And when they had prayed. The apostles prayed for these persons, that they might in every respect be qualified for their office and be made successful in it. And when they had done this they laid their hands upon them, and by this rite appointed them to their office.

giving them authority to execute that office.

III. The advancement of the church hereupon. When things were thus put into good order in the church then religion got ground, v. 7. The word of God increased. Now that the apostles resolved to stick more closely than ever to their preaching, it spread the gospel further. Ministers disentangling themselves from secular employments, and addicting themselves entirely to their work, will contribute very much, as a means, to the success of the gospel. Christians became numerous: The number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly. When Christ was upon earth, his ministry had least success in Jerusalem; yet now that city affords most converts. God has his remnant even in the worst of places. A great company of the priests were obedient to the faith. Then is the word and grace of God greatly magnified when those are wrought upon by it that were least likely. It should seem, they came in a body; many of them agreed together, for the keeping up of one another's credit, and the strengthening of one another's hands, to join at once in giving up their names to Christ: a great crowd of priests were by the grace of God helped over their prejudices, and were obedient to the faith. They embraced the doctrine of the gospel; their understandings were captivated to the power of the truths of Christ. They evinced the sincerity of their believing the gospel of Christ by a cheerful compliance with all the rules and precepts of the gospel.

Verses 8–15

Stephen, no doubt, was diligent and faithful in the discharge of his office. Being called to that office, he did not think it below him to do the duty of it. And, being faithful in a little, he was entrusted with more. We find him here called out to very honourable services, and owned in them.

I. He proved the truth of the gospel, by working miracles in Christ's name, v. 8. He was full of faith and power. Those that are full of faith are full of power, because by faith the power of God is engaged for us. By faith we are emptied of self, and so are filled with Christ. Being so he did great wonders and miracles among the people, openly, and in the sight of all; for Christ's miracles feared not the strictest scrutiny.

II. He pleaded the cause of Christianity against those that opposed it (v. 9, 10); he served the interests of religion as a disputant, in the high places of the field, while others were serving them as vinedressers and husbandmen.

1. We are here told who were his opponents, v. 9. They were Jews, but Hellenist Jews. It was with difficulty that they retained the practice of it in the country where they lived, and not without great expense and toil that they kept up their attendance at Jerusalem, and this made them more active sticklers for Judaism than those were whose profession of their religion was cheap and easy. They were of the synagogue which is called the synagogue of the Libertines; the Romans called those Liberti, or Libertini, who, slaves by birth, were manumitted, or made freemen. Some think that these Libertines were such of the Jews as had obtained the Roman freedom, as Paul had (ch. 27, 28). There were others that belonged to the synagogue of the Cyrenians and Alexandrians, and others who were of Cilicia and Asia. The Jews that were born in other countries, and had concerns in them, had frequent occasion to reside in Jerusalem. Each nation had its synagogue, as in London there are French, and Dutch, and Danish churches. Now those that were in these synagogues, being confident of the goodness of their cause, and their own sufficiency to manage it, would undertake to run down Christianity by force of argument. It was a fair and rational way of dealing with it, and what religion is always ready to admit. But why did they dispute with Stephen? And why not with the apostles themselves? Some think because they despised the apostles as unlearned and ignorant men; but Stephen was bred a scholar, and they thought it their honour to meddle with their match. Others think it was because they stood in awe of the apostles. Perhaps, they having given a public challenge, Stephen was chosen by the disciples to be their champion. Stephen, who was only a deacon in the church, and a very sharp young man, of bright parts, was appointed to this service. It is probable that they disputed with Stephen because he was zealous to argue with them and convince them, and this was the service to which God had called them.

2. We are here told how he carried the point in this dispute (v. 10): They were not able to resist the wisdom and the Spirit by which he spoke. They could neither support their own arguments nor answer his. Though they were not convinced, yet they were confounded.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

7. word of God increased . . . disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly—prosperity crowning the beautiful spirit which reigned in this mother community. a great company of the priests were obedient . . .—This was the crowning triumph of the Gospel, whose peaceful prosperity was now at its greatest height. After Stephen's teaching and trial made it clear that sacerdotal interests could not stand with the Gospel, such priestly accessions became rare indeed. Note (1) how easily misunderstandings may arise among the most loving and devoted followers of the Lord Jesus: but (2) How quickly and effectually such misunderstandings may be healed, where honest intentions, love, and wisdom reign: (3) What a beautiful model for imitation is furnished by the class here complained of, who, though themselves the majority, chose the new office-bearers from amongst the complaining minority! (4) How superior to the lust of power do the apostles here show themselves to be, in not only divesting themselves of the immediate superintendence of temporal affairs in the Christian community, but giving the choice of those who were to be entrusted with it to the disciples at large! (5) How little of formal organization did the apostles give to the Church at first, and when an emergency arose which demanded something more, how entirely was the remedy suggested by the reason of the thing! (6) Though the new office-bearers are not expressly called Deacons here, it is universally admitted that this was the first institution of that order in the Church; the success of the expedient securing its permanency, and the qualifications for "the office of a Deacon" being laid down in one of the apostolical Epistles immediately after those of "a Bishop" (I Tim. 3:8-13).

8-15. STEPHEN ARRAIGNED BEFORE THE SANHEDRIM. 8. And Stephen . . .—The foregoing narrative seems to be only an introduction to what follows. full of faith—rather, 'of grace,' as the best MSS.read.

9, 10. synagogue of the Libertines—Jewish freedmen; manumitted Roman captives, or the children of such, expelled from Rome (as appears from JOSEPHUS and TACITUS), and now residing at Jerusalem. Cyrenians—Jews of Cyrene, in Libya, on the coast of Africa. them of Cilicia—amongst whom may have been Saul of Tarsus (ch. 7:58; 21:39). and of Asia—See on ch. 16:6.

10. not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake—What he said, and the power with which he spake it, were alike resistless.

ADAM CLARKE

7. The word of God increased. By such preachers as the apostles and these deacons, no wonder the doctrine of God increased—became widely diffused and generally known; in consequence of which the number of the disciples must be greatly multiplied—for God will ever bless His own Word when ministered by those whom He has qualified to proclaim it. A great company of the priests were obedient to the faith. This was one of the greatest miracles wrought by the grace of Christ; that persons so intent on the destruction of Christ, His apostles, and His doctrine should at last espouse that doctrine is astonishing, and that they who had withstood the evidence of the miracles of Christ should have yielded to the doctrine of His death and resurrection is worthy of note. And from this we may learn that it is not by miracles that sinners are to be converted unto God, but by the preaching of Christ dying for their offenses and rising again for their justification.

8. Stephen, full of faith and power. Instead of faith, "grace" is the reading of some MSS.

9. The synagogue . . . of the Libertines. That Jews and proselytes from various countries had now come up to Jerusalem to bring offerings and to attend the Feast of Pentecost we have already seen, chap. ii. The persons mentioned here were foreign Jews, who appear to have had a synagogue peculiar to themselves at Jerusalem, in which they were accustomed to worship when they came to the public festivals.

10. They were not able to resist the wisdom. He was wise, well-exercised, and experienced in divine things; and, as appears by his defense in the following chapter, well-versed in the

It is not said, They were not able to resist him, but, They were not able to resist the wisdom and the Spirit by which he spoke. They thought they had only disputed with Stephen; but they were disputing with the Spirit of God in him, for whom they were an unequal match.

III. At length, he sealed it with his blood. When they could not answer his arguments as a disputant, they prosecuted him as a criminal, and suborned witnesses against him, to swear blasphemy upon him. They suborned men, that is, instructed them what to say, and then hired them to swear it.

1. How they incensed both the government and the mob against him (v. 12): They stirred up the people against him, that, if the sanhedrim should still think fit to let him alone, yet they might run him down by a popular tumult; they also found means to stir up the elders and scribes against him, that, if the people should countenance him, they might prevail by authority. Thus they doubted not but to gain their point, when they had two strings to their bow.

2. How they got him to the bar: They came upon him and caught him and brought him to the council. They came upon him in a body, and flew upon him as a lion upon his prey; so the word signifies.

3. How they were prepared with evidence ready to produce against him. They had heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses and against God (v. 11)—against this holy place and the law (v. 13); for they heard him say what Jesus would do to their place and their customs, v. 14. Those who swore it against him are called false witnesses, because though there was something of truth in their testimony, yet they put a wrong and malicious construction upon what he had said, and perverted it. The general charge exhibited against him—that he spoke blasphemous words; and, to aggravate the matter, "He ceases not to speak blasphemous words." It intimates likewise something of contumacy and contempt of admonition. "He has been warned against it, and yet ceases not to talk at this rate." Stephen's persecutors would be thought to have a deep concern upon them for the honour of God's name, and to do this in a jealousy for that. He is said to have spoken blasphemous words against Moses and against God. But did Stephen blaspheme Moses? By no means. Christ, and the preachers of his gospel, never said anything that looked like blaspheming Moses. Very unjustly therefore is Stephen indicted for blaspheming Moses. How this charge is supported and made out. All they can charge him with is that that he hath spoken blasphemous words against this holy place and the law. Thus does the charge dwindle when it comes to the evidence. He is charged with blaspheming this holy place. Christ was condemned as a blasphemer for words which were thought to reflect upon the temple, even when they by their wickedness had profaned it. He is charged with blaspheming the law. The charge dwindles again; for all they can accuse him of is that they had heard him say that this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and change the customs which Moses delivered to us. He could not be charged with having said anything to the disparagement either of the temple or of the law. He had said, Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, destroy the temple, destroy Jerusalem. It is probable that he might say so; and what blasphemy was it against the holy place to say that it should not be perpetual. And is he a blasphemer, then, who tells them that Jesus of Nazareth will bring a just destruction upon their place and nation, and they may thank themselves? He had said, This Jesus shall change the customs which Moses delivered to us. Christ came, not to destroy, but to fulfil, the law; and, if he changed some customs it was to introduce and establish those that were much better.

IV. We are here told how God owned him (v. 15): All that sat in the council, looking steadfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel. It is usual for judges to observe the countenance of the prisoner, which sometimes is an indication either of guilt or innocence. He looked as if he had never been better pleased in his life than he was now when he stood fair for the crown of martyrdom. Such an undisturbed serenity, such an undaunted courage, and such an unaccountable mixture of mildness and majesty, there was in his countenance, that everyone said he looked like an angel. There was a miraculous splendour and brightness upon his countenance, God designing thereby to put honour upon his faithful witness and confusion upon his persecutors and judges. All that sat in the council saw it, and an arrant shame it was that they could not but see by it that he was owned of God. Wisdom and holiness make a man's face to shine, and yet these will not secure men from the greatest indignities.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

11-14. blasphemous words against Moses—doubtless referring to the impending disappearance of the whole Mosaic system. and against God—This must refer to the supreme dignity and authority which he claimed for Christ, as the head of that new economy which was so speedily to supersede the old (cf. ch. 7:56, 59, 60).

ALBERT BARNES:

"Looking stedfastly on him." Fixing the eyes intently on him. Probably they were attracted by the unusual appearance of the man, his meekness, his calm and collected fearlessness, and the proofs of conscious innocence and sincerity. "The face of an angel." This expression is one evidently denoting that he manifested evidence of sincerity, gravity, fearlessness, confidence in God. It is used in the Old Testament to denote peculiar wisdom (2 Sam. 14:17; 19:27). In Gen. 23:10, it is used to denote peculiar majesty and glory, as if it were the face of God. When Moses came down from Mount Sinai, it is said that the skin of his face shone so that the children of Israel were afraid to come nigh to him (Ex. 34:29, 30; 2 Cor. 3:7, 13). The expression is used to denote the impression produced on the countenance by communion with God; the calm serenity and composure which follow a confident committing of all into his hands. It is not meant that there was anything miraculous in the case of Stephen, but it is language that denotes calmness, dignity, and confidence in God, all of which were so marked on his countenance that it impressed them with clear proofs of his innocence and piety. The language is very common in the Jewish writings. It is not unusual for deep feeling, sincerity, and confidence in God, to impress themselves on the countenance. Any deep emotion will do this; and it is to be expected that religious feeling, the most tender and solemn of all feeling, will diffuse seriousness, serenity, calmness, and peace, not affected sanctimoniousness, over the countenance.—Popular Commentary

15. as... the face of an angel—a play of supernatural radiance attesting to all who beheld his countenance the divine calm of the spirit within.

ADAM CLARKE

Jewish history. The spirit by which he spake was the Holy Spirit, and its power was irresistible.

11. Then they suborned men. They made "underhand" work; got associated to themselves profligate persons, who for money would swear anything.

12. And they—the Libertines, etc., mentioned before, stirred up the people—raised a mob against him, and to assist and countenance the mob got the elders and scribes to conduct it, who thus made themselves one with the basest of the people whom they collected; and then altogether, without law or form of justice, rushed on the good man, seized him, and brought him to a council who, though they sat in the seat of judgment, were ready for every evil work.

Blasphemous words against Moses, and against God. This was the most deadly charge they could bring against him. We have already seen, Matt. ix. 4, that blasphemy, when against God, signifies speaking impiously of His nature, attributes, or works; and when against men, it signifies speaking injuriously of their character, blasting their reputation. These false witnesses came to prove that he had blasphemed Moses by representing him as an impostor, or the like; and God, by either denying His being, His providence, or the justice of His government.

13. Against this holy place. The Temple, that it shall be destroyed. And the law. That it cannot give life, nor save from death. It is very likely that they had heard him speak words to this amount, which were all as true as the spirit from which they proceeded; but they gave them a very false coloring, as we see in the succeeding verse.

15. Saw his face as it had been the face of an angel. It appears that the light and power of God which dwelt in his soul shone through his face, and God gave them this proof of the falsity of the testimony which was now before them; for as the face of Stephen now shone as the face of Moses did when he came down from the mount, it was the fullest proof that he had not spoken blasphemous words either against Moses or God, else this splendor of heaven had not rested upon him.

MATTHEW HENRY

CHAPTER 7

Verses 1–16

I. The high priest calls upon him to answer for himself, v. 1. You hear what is sworn against you: Are these things so? Guilty or not guilty?

II. He begins his defence, and it is long.

1. In this discourse he appears to be a man ready and mighty in the scriptures. He was filled with the Holy Ghost, not so much to reveal to him new things, but to bring to his remembrance the scriptures of the Old Testament, and to teach him how to make use of them. Those that are full of the Holy Ghost will be full of the scripture, as Stephen was.

2. He quotes the scriptures according to the Septuagint translation, by which it appears he was one of the Hellenist Jews. His preface: Men, brethren, and fathers, hearken. He gives them, though not flattering titles, yet civil and respectful ones. They are ready to look upon him as an apostate from the Jewish church, and an enemy to them. He addresses himself to them as men, brethren, and fathers, resolving to look on himself as one of them, though they would not so look on him. He craves their attention: Hearken. His entrance upon the discourse. It is all to the purpose, to show them that God, as he had a church in the world many ages before that holy place was founded and the ceremonial law given, so he would have when they should both have had their period.

[1] He begins with the call of Abraham, the father of the Old Testament church. His native country was an idolatrous country, it was Mesopotamia (v. 2), the land of the Chaldeans (v. 4); thence God brought him. He first brought him out of the land of the Chaldeans to Charran, or Haran, and thence five years after, when his father was dead, he removed him into the land of Canaan, wherein you now dwell. From this call of Abraham we may observe, 1. That in all our ways we must acknowledge God, and attend the directions of his providence. God removed him into this land wherein you now dwell, and he did but follow his Leader. 2. Those whom God takes into covenant with himself must sit loose to the world, and live above it and everything in it, even that in it which is most dear to them. God's chosen must follow him with an implicit faith and obedience But let us see what this is to Stephen's case. They had charged him as a blasphemer of God, therefore he shows that he is a son of Abraham, and values himself upon his being able to say, Our father Abraham, and that he is a faithful worshipper of the God of Abraham, whom therefore he here calls the God of glory. They were proud of their being circumcised; and therefore he shows that Abraham was taken under God's guidance, and into communion with him, before he was circumcised. They had a mighty jealousy for this holy place, which may be meant of the whole land of Canaan. "Now," says Stephen, "you need not be so proud of it; for," (1) "You came originally out of Ur of the Chaldees, and you were not the first planters of this country. Think of the meanness of your beginnings, and how you are entirely indebted to divine grace, and then you will see boasting to be for ever excluded." (2) "God appeared in his glory to Abraham a great way off in Mesopotamia, before he came near Canaan, so that you must not think God's visits are confined to this land."

[2] The unsettled state of Abraham and his seed for many ages after he was called out of Ur of the Chaldees. God did indeed promise that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, v. 5. But, First, As yet he had no child, nor any by Sarah for many years after. Secondly, He himself was but a stranger and a sojourner in that land, and God gave him no inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on; but there he was as in a strange country. Thirdly, His posterity did not come to the possession of it for a long time: After four hundred years they shall come and serve me in this place, and not till then, v. 7. Fourthly, They must undergo a great deal of hardship before they shall be put into the possession of that land: they shall be brought into bondage, and ill treated in a strange land. And at the end of four hundred years that nation to whom they shall be in bondage will I judge, saith God. When Abraham had neither inheritance nor heir, yet he was told he should have both. God's promises, though they are slow, are sure. They will be fulfilled though perhaps not so soon as we expect. Though the people of God may be in distress and trouble for a time, yet God will at length both rescue them and reckon with those that do oppress them.

But let us see how this serves Stephen's purpose. 1. The Jewish nation was very inconsiderable in its

Vss. 1-60. DEFENSE AND MARTYRDOM OF STEPHEN. In this long defense Stephen takes a much wider range, and goes less directly into the point raised by his accusers, than we should have expected. His object seems to have been to show (1) that so far from disparaging, he deeply reverenced, and was intimately conversant with, the whole history of the ancient economy; and (2) that in resisting the erection of the Gospel kingdom they were but treading in their fathers' footsteps, the whole history of their nation being little else than one continued misapprehension of God's high designs towards fallen man and rebellion against them.

1-5. The God of glory—A magnificent appellation, fitted at the very outset to rivet the devout attention of his audience; denoting not that visible glory which attended many of the divine manifestations, but the glory of those manifestations themselves, of which this was regarded by every Jew as the fundamental one. It is the glory of absolutely free grace. appeared unto our father Abraham before he dwelt in Charran, and said . . .—Though this first call is not expressly recorded in Genesis, it is clearly implied in Genesis 15:7 and Nehemiah 9:7; and the Jewish writers speak the same language. 4. when his father was dead, he removed into this land—Though Abraham was in Canaan before Terah's death, his settlement in it as the land of promise is here said to be after it, as being in no way dependent on the family movement, but a transaction purely between Jehovah and Abraham himself.

6-8. four hundred years—using round numbers, as in Genesis 15:13, 16 (see on Gal. 3:17). after that shall they come forth, and serve me in this place—Here the promise to Abraham (Gen. 15:16), and that to Moses (Exod. 3:12), are combined; Stephen's object being merely to give a rapid summary of the leading facts.

ADAM CLARKE

1. Are these things so? Have you predicted the destruction of the Temple? And have you said that Jesus of Nazareth shall change our customs, abolish our religious rites and Temple service? Have you spoken these blasphemous things against Moses and against God? Here was some color of justice, for Stephen was permitted to defend himself. And in order to do this he thought it best to enter into a detail of their history from the commencement of their nation, and thus show how kindly God had dealt with them, and how ungraciously they and their fathers had requited Him. And all this naturally led him to the conclusion that God could no longer bear with a people the cup of whose iniquity had been long overflowing, and therefore they might expect to find wrath, without mixture of mercy. But how could Luke get all this circumstantial account? He might have been present and heard the whole; or, more probably, he had the account from Paul, whose companion he was, and who was certainly present when Stephen was judged and stoned, for he was consenting to his death and kept the clothes of them who stoned him. See chap. vii. 58; viii. 1; and xxii. 20.

2. Men, brethren, and fathers. Rather, "brethren and fathers." Literally it is "men-brethren," a very usual form in Greek. The God of glory appeared. As Stephen is now vindicating himself from the false charges brought against him, he shows that he had uttered no blasphemy against either God, Moses, or the Temple; but states that his accusers, and the Jews in general, were guilty of the faults with which they charged him, that they had from the beginning rejected and despised Moses and had always violated his laws. He proceeds to state that there is no blasphemy in saying that the Temple shall be destroyed—they had been without a temple till the days of David, nor does God ever confine himself to temples built by hands, seeing He fills both heaven and earth; that Jesus is the Prophet of whom Moses spoke, and whom they had persecuted, condemned, and at last put to death; that they were wicked and uncircumcised in heart and in ears, and always resisted the Holy Ghost, as their fathers did. This is the substance of Stephen's defense as far as he was permitted to make it, a defense which they could not confute, containing charges which they most glaringly illustrated and confirmed by adding the murder of this faithful disciple to that of his all-glorious Master. Was in Mesopotamia. In that part of it where Ur of the Chaldees was situated, near to Babel, and among the rivers (Tigris and Euphrates) which gave the name of Mesopotamia to the country. Before he dwelt in Charran. This is called Haran in our translation of Gen. xi. 31; this place also belonged to Mesopotamia, as well as Ur, but is placed west of it on the maps. It seems most probable that Abraham had two calls, one in Ur and the other in Haran. He left Ur at the first call and came to Haran; he left Haran at the second call and came into the Promised Land.

5. Gave him none inheritance. Both Abraham and Jacob had small parcels of land in Canaan; but they had them by purchase, not by God's gifts; for as Abraham was obliged to buy a burying place in Canaan, Genesis xxiii, it is obvious he had no inheritance there.

6. That his seed should sojourn in a strange land. See Gen. xv. 13-14. Four hundred years. Moses says, Exod. xii. 40, that the sojourning of the children of Israel in Egypt was 430 years. Paul has the same number, Gal. iii. 17; and so has Josephus. Stephen uses the round number of 400.

7. Will I judge. "I will punish," for in this sense the Greek word is frequently taken.

beginnings; as their common father Abraham was fetched out of obscurity in Ur of the Chaldees, so their tribes were fetched out of servitude in Egypt. He that brought them out of Egypt can bring them into it again, and yet be no loser, while he can of stones raise up children unto Abraham. 2. The slow steps by which the promise made to Abraham advanced towards the performance plainly show that it had a spiritual meaning, and that the land principally intended to be conveyed by it was the better country, that is, the heavenly. It was therefore no blasphemy to say, Jesus shall destroy this place, when at the same time we say, "He shall lead us to the heavenly Canaan."

[3] The building up of the family of Abraham.

First, God engaged to be a God to Abraham and his seed; and, in token of this, appointed that he and his male seed should be circumcised. He gave him the covenant of circumcision, and accordingly, when Abraham had a son born, he circumcised him the eighth day (v. 8). And then they began to multiply: Isaac begat Jacob, and Jacob the twelve patriarchs.

Secondly, Joseph, the darling and blessing of his father's house, was abused by his brethren; they envied him because of his dreams, and sold him into Egypt.

Thirdly, God owned Joseph in his troubles, and was with him by the influence of his Spirit, both on his mind, giving him comfort, and on the minds of those he was concerned with, giving him favour in their eyes. And thus at length he delivered him out of his afflictions.

Fourthly, Jacob was compelled to go down into Egypt by a dearth (which was a great affliction), to that degree that our fathers found no sustenance in Canaan, v. 11. But, hearing that there was corn in Egypt (treasured up by the wisdom of his own son), he sent out our fathers first to fetch corn, v. 12. And the second time that they went, Joseph made himself known to them, and it was notified to Pharaoh that they were Joseph's kindred (v. 13), whereupon Joseph sent for his father Jacob to him into Egypt, with all his kindred and family, to the number of seventy-five souls, v. 14.

Fifthly, Jacob and his sons died in Egypt (v. 15), but were carried over to be buried in Canaan, v. 16.

Let us now see what this is to Stephen's purpose. 1. He still reminds them of the mean beginning of the Jewish nation. It was by a miracle of mercy that they were raised up out of nothing to what they were. If they answer not the intention of their being so raised, they can expect no other than to be destroyed. Here it is urged upon them as an aggravation of their contempt of the gospel of Christ. 2. He reminds them likewise of the wickedness of those that were the patriarchs in envying their brother Joseph, and selling him into Egypt; and the same spirit was still working in them towards Christ. 3. Their holy land, which they doted so much upon, their fathers were long kept out of the possession of, and therefore let them not think it strange if, after it has been so long polluted with sin, it be at length destroyed.

Verses 17-29

I. The wonderful increase of the people of Israel in Egypt; it was by a wonder of providence that in a little time they advanced from a family into a nation. It was when the time of the promise drew nigh—the time when they were to be formed into a people. The notion of providence is sometimes quickest when it comes nearest the centre. God knows how to redeem the time that seems to have been lost, and, when the year of the redeemed is at hand, can do a double work in a single day. It was in Egypt, where they were oppressed. Suffering times have often been growing times with the church.

II. The extreme hardships which they underwent there, v. 18, 19. Stephen observes three things: 1. Their base ingratitude: They were oppressed by another king that knew not Joseph. Those that injure good people are very ungrateful, for they are the blessings of the age and place they live in. 2. Their hellish craft and policy: They dealt subtly with our kindred. Come on, said they, let us deal wisely, thinking thereby to secure themselves. Those are in a great mistake who think they deal wisely for themselves when they deal deceitfully or unmercifully with their brethren. 3. Their barbarous and inhuman cruelty. They cast out their young children, to the end they might not live. What they were now doing against the Christian church in its infancy was as impious and would be as fruitless as that was which the Egyptians did against the Jewish church in its infancy. In spite of your malice Christ's disciples will increase and multiply.

III. The raising up of Moses to be their deliverer. Moses was born when the persecution of Israel was the covenant of circumcision—i.e., the covenant of which circumcision was the token. and so—i.e., according to the terms of this covenant, on which Paul reasons (Gal. 3). the twelve patriarchs—so called as the founders of the twelve tribes of Israel.

14. threescore and fifteen souls—according to the Septuagint version of Genesis 46:27, which Stephen follows, including the five children and grandchildren of Joseph's two sons.

17. But when—rather, 'as'—the time of the promise—i.e., for its fulfilment. the people grew and multiplied in Egypt—For more than 200 years they amounted to no more than seventy-five souls; how prodigious, then, must have been their multiplication during the latter two centuries, when 600,000 men, fit for war, besides women and children, left Egypt!

ADAM CLARKE

8. He gave him the covenant of circumcision. That is, he instituted the rite of circumcision as a sign of that covenant which He had made with him and his posterity. See Gen. xvii. 10. And so Abraham begat Isaac. "And thus," in this covenant, he begat Isaac; and as a proof that he was born under this covenant, was a true son of Abraham and inheritor of the promises, he circumcised him the eighth day.

9. And the patriarchs. The twelve sons of Jacob, thus called because each was chief or head of his respective family or tribe. Moved with envy. We translate zelos variously: "zeal" or "fervent affection." whether its object be good or bad, is its general meaning; and zeloo signifies to be "indignant, envious." See the note on chap. v. 17. The brethren of Joseph, hearing of his dreams, and understanding them to portend his future advancement, filled with envy, sold Joseph into the land of Egypt, hoping by this means to prevent his future grandeur; but God, from whom the portents came, was with him, and made their envy the direct means of accomplishing the great design.

10. Gave him favour and wisdom in the sight of Pharaoh. God gave him much wisdom, in consequence of which he had favour with the king of Egypt. See the whole of this remarkable history explained at large, Genesis xli—xlv.

14. Threescore and fifteen souls. There are several difficulties here, which it is hoped the reader will find satisfactorily removed in the note on Gen. xlvi. 20. It is well-known that in Genesis xlvi and Deut. x. 22 their number is said to be "threescore and ten"; but Stephen quotes from the Septuagint, which adds five persons to the account which are not in the Hebrew text.

16. And were carried over to Sychem. "It is said, Gen. l. 13, that Jacob was buried in the cave of the field of Machpelah before Mamre. And in Josh. xxiv. 32 and Exod. xiii. 19, it is said that the bones of Joseph were carried out of Egypt by the Israelites, and buried in Shechem, which Jacob bought from the sons of Hamor, the father of Shechem. As for the eleven brethren of Joseph, we are told by Josephus, Ant., l. ii, c. 8, s. 2, that they were buried in Hebron, where their father had been buried. But, since the books of the Old Testament say nothing about this, the authority of Stephen (or of Luke here) for their being buried in Sychem is at least as good as that of Josephus for their being buried in Hebron."—Bishop Pearce. We have the uniform consent of the Jewish writers that all the patriarchs were brought out of Egypt and buried in Canaan, but none, except Stephen, mentions their being buried in Sychem. As Sychem belonged to the Samaritans, probably the Jews thought it too great an honor for that people to possess the bones of the patriarchs, and therefore have carefully avoided making any mention of it. That Abraham bought for a sum of money. Two accounts seem here to be confounded: (1) The purchase made by Abraham of the cave and field of Ephron, which was in the field of Machpelah; this purchase was made from the children of Heth, Gen. xxiii. 3, 10, 17. (2) The purchase made by Jacob, from the sons of Hamor or Emmor, of a sepulchre in which the bones of Joseph were laid; this was in Sychem or Shechem, Gen. xxxiii. 19; Josh. xxiv. 32. The word Abraham, therefore, in this place is certainly a mistake; and the word Jacob, which some have supplied, is doubtless more proper. Bishop Pearce supposes that Luke originally wrote, "which he bought for a sum of money"; i.e., which Jacob bought, who is the last person of the singular number spoken of in the preceding verse. Those who saw that the word bought had no nominative case joined to it, and did not know where to find the proper one, seem to have inserted Abraham in the text for that purpose, without sufficiently attending to the different circumstances of his purchase from that of Jacob's.

19. The same dealt subtilly. A word borrowed from the Septuagint, who thus translate the Hebrew, "Let us deal wisely with it"; i.e., with cunning and deceit, as the Greek word implies, and which is evidently intended by the Hebrew. See Gen. xxvii. 35, "Thy brother came with at the hottest: At that time, Moses was born (v. 20), and was himself in danger of falling a sacrifice to that bloody edict. God is preparing for his people's deliverance, when their way is darkest, and their distress deepest. He was exceedingly fair. He was sanctified from the womb, and this made him beautiful in God's eyes. He was wonderfully preserved in his infancy, first, by the care of his tender parents, who nourished him three months in their own house; and then by a favourable providence that threw him into the arms of Pharaoh's daughter, who took him up, and nourished him as her own son (v. 21); for those whom God designs to make special use of he will take special care of. He became a great scholar (v. 22): He was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. He became a prime minister of state in Egypt, being mighty in words and deeds. Though he had not a ready way of expressing himself, but stammered, yet he spoke admirably good sense, and everything he said commanded assent. Now, by all this, Stephen will make it appear that he had as high and honourable thoughts of Moses as they had.

IV. The attempts which Moses made to deliver Israel, which they spurned. This Stephen insists much upon, and it serves for a key to this story, a designed entrance upon the public service he was to be called out to (v. 23): When he was full forty years old it came into his heart (for God put it there) to visit his brethren the children of Israel, and to see which way he might do them any service. 1. As Israel's saviour. This he gave a specimen of in avenging an oppressed Israelite, and killing the Egyptian that abused him (v. 24). Seeing one of his brethren suffer wrong, he avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian. He supposed that his brethren would have understood that God by his hand would deliver them. If they had but understood the signs of the times, they might have taken this for the dawning of the day of their deliverance; but they understood not. 2. As Israel's judge. This he gave a specimen of, the very next day, in offering to accommodate matters between two contending Hebrews (v. 26): He showed himself to them as they strove, and he would have set them at one again, saying, Sirs, you are brethren, why do you wrong one to another? For he observed that (as in most strifes) there was a fault on both sides; and therefore there must be a mutual remission and condescension. But the contending Israelite that was most in the wrong thrust him away (v. 27), would not bear the reproof, but was ready to fly in his face, with, Who made thee a ruler and a judge over us? Proud and litigious spirits are impatient of check and control. The wrong-doer was so enraged at the reproof given him that he upbraided Moses with the service he had done to their nation in killing the Egyptian: Wilt thou kill me as thou didst the Egyptian yesterday? (v. 28), charging that upon him as his crime, which was the hanging out of the flag of defiance to the Egyptians, and the banner of love and deliverance to Israel. Hereupon Moses fled into the land of Midian. He settled as a stranger in Midian, married, and had two sons, by Jethro's daughter, v. 29. How this serves Stephen's purpose. 1. They charged him with blaspheming Moses, in answer to which he retorts upon them the indignities which their fathers did to Moses, which they ought to be ashamed of, instead of picking quarrels with one that had as great a veneration for him as any of them had. 2. They persecuted him for disputing in defence of Christ and his gospel. They set up Moses and his law: "But," saith he, "you had best take heed," (1) "Lest you refuse and reject one whom God has raised up to be to you a prince and a Saviour. God will, by this Jesus, deliver you out of a worse slavery than that in Egypt; take heed then of thrusting him away." (2) "Lest you hereby fare as your fathers fared. You put away the gospel from you, and it will be sent to the Gentiles; you will not have Christ, and you shall not have him."

Stephen here proceeds in his story of Moses.

I. The vision which he saw of the glory of God at the bush (v. 30): When forty years had expired, now, at eighty years old, he enters upon that post of honour to which he was born. Where God appeared to him: In the wilderness of Mount Sinai, v. 30. And, when he appeared to him there, that was holy ground (v. 33), which Stephen takes notice of, as a check to those who prided themselves in the temple, as if there were no communion to be had with God but there. They deceive themselves if they think God is confined to places; he can bring his people into a wilderness, and there speak comfortably to them. How he appeared to him: In a flame of fire, and yet the bush was not consumed. How Moses was affected with this: (1) He wondered at the sight, v. 31. He had the curiosity at first to pry into it: I will turn aside now,

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

20-22. In which time—of deepest depression. Moses was born—the destined deliverer. exceeding fair—lit., 'fair to God' (Margin), or, perhaps, divinely 'fair' (see on Heb. 11:23).

22. mighty in words—Though defective in utterance (Exod. 4:10); his recorded speeches fully bear out what is here said. and deeds—referring probably to unrecorded circumstances in his early life. If we are to believe JOSEPHUS, his ability was acknowledged ere he left Egypt.

23-27. In verses 23, 30, and 36, the life of Moses is represented as embracing three periods, of forty years each; the Jewish writers say the same; and though this is not expressly stated in the Old Testament, his age at death, 120 years (Deut. 34:7), agrees with it. 23. it came into his heart to visit his brethren—his heart yearning with love to them as God's chosen people, and heaving with the consciousness of a divine vocation to set them free. 24. avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian—going farther in the heat of his indignation than he probably intended. 25. For he supposed his brethren would have understood . . .—and perhaps imagined this a suitable occasion for rousing and rallying them under him as their leader; thus anticipating his work, and so running unsent. but they understood not—Reckoning on a spirit in them congenial with his own, he had the mortification to find it far otherwise. This furnishes to Stephen another example of Israel's slowness to apprehend and fall in with the divine purposes of love. 26. next day he showed himself unto them as they strove—Here, not an Israelite and an Egyptian, but two parties in Israel itself, are in collision with each other; Moses, grieved at the spectacle, interposes as a mediator; but his interference, as unauthorized, is resented by the party in the wrong, whom Stephen identifies with the mass of the nation (vs. 35), just as Messiah's own interposition had been spurned.

28, 29. Wilt thou kill me, as thou didst the Egyptian yesterday?—Moses had thought the deed unseen (Exod. 2:12), but it now appeared he was mistaken. Then fled Moses . . .—for "when Pharaoh heard this thing, he sought to slay Moses" (Exod. 2:15).

subtilty." For this the Egyptians were so remarkable that "to Egyptize" signified "to act cunningly" and "to use wicked devices." To the end they might not live. Might not grow up and propagate, and thus build up the Hebrew nation.

20. Moses . . . was exceeding fair. "Was fair to God"; i.e., was divinely beautiful. See the note on Exod. ii. 2.

22. In all the wisdom of the Egyptians. Who were, at that time, the most intelligent and best instructed people in the universe. Philo says Moses was taught arithmetic, geometry, poetry, music, medicine, and the knowledge of hieroglyphics. In Sohar Cadash, fol. 46, it is said "that, of the ten portions of wisdom which came into the world, the Egyptians had nine, and that all the inhabitants of the earth had only the remaining portion." Was mighty in words and in deeds. This may refer to the glorious doctrines he taught and the miracles he wrought in Egypt.

23. When he was full forty years old. This was a general tradition among the Jews: "Moses was forty years in Pharaoh's court, forty years in Midian, and forty years he served Israel." To visit his brethren. Probably on the ground of trying to deliver them from their oppressive bondage. This desire seems to have been early infused into his mind by the Spirit of God; and the effect of this desire to deliver his oppressed countrymen was his refusing to be called the son of Pharoah's daughter—(see Heb. xi. 24) and thus renouncing all right to the Egyptian crown, "choosing rather to endure affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season."

24. Smote the Egyptian. See this explained, Exod. ii. 11-12.

25. He supposed his brethren would have understood. He probably imagined that, as he felt from the divine influence he was appointed to be their deliverer, they would have his divine appointment signified to them in a similar way; and the act of justice which he now did in behalf of his oppressed countryman would be sufficient to show them that he was now ready to enter upon his office, if they were willing to concur.

26. Unto them as they strove. Two Hebrews. See on Exod. ii. 13, etc.

F. B. MEYER:

Moses, we are here told, was "mighty in words"; that is, in eloquence as well as "in deeds." This confirms the statement of the Jewish historian, Josephus, that in the earlier part of his career, now lost in the oblivion of history, Moses led a very successful Egyptian expedition against Ethiopia. He complains to the Lord (Ex. 4:10) of being slow of speech, but that probably refers to the habit of long disuse amid the silence and loneliness of the desert.

It is clear that stung by the sense of wrong, Moses at first interfered to deliver his people. He smote the Egyptian and tried to judge between his brethren. God had to bring him into the dust by repeated failure and rejection, that he might become an emptied and a broken vessel. God will not give glory to man. The treasure must be held in an earthen vessel (2 Cor. 4:7). It is when we come to the end of ourselves that we arrive at the beginning of God. The world has ever to learn what God can do by those who are wholly emptied of self-confidence, but yielded to his hand.

and see this great sight; but the nearer he drew the more he was struck with amazement. (2) He trembled, and durst not behold, for he was soon aware that it was the angel of the Lord. This set him a trembling.

II. The declaration which he heard of the covenant of God (v. 32): The voice of the Lord came to him; I am the God of thy fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; and therefore, 1. "I am the same that I was." The covenant God made with Abraham was, I will be to thee a God. "Now," saith God, "that covenant is still in full force; I am, as I was, the God of Abraham." All the favours, all the honours God put upon Israel, were founded upon this covenant with Abraham. 2. "I will be the same that I am." He will be a God, (1) To their souls, which are now separated from their bodies. Our Saviour by this proves the future state, Matt. xxii. 31, 32. Abraham is dead, and yet God is still his God, therefore Abraham is still alive. Now this is that life and immortality which are brought to light by the gospel. Those therefore who stood up in defence of the gospel were so far from blaspheming Moses that they did the greatest honour imaginable to Moses. (2) To their seed, God, in declaring himself thus the God of their fathers, intimated his kindness to their seed, that they should be beloved for the fathers' sakes. Now the preachers of the gospel preached up this covenant, the promise made of God unto the fathers, ch. xxvi. 6, 7. And shall they, under colour of supporting the holy place and the law, oppose the covenant which was made with Abraham, before the law was given, and long before the holy place was built? God will have our salvation to be by promise, and not by the law; the Jews therefore who persecuted the Christians, under pretence that they blasphemed the law, did themselves blaspheme the promise.

III. The commission which God gave him to deliver Israel out of Egypt. When God had declared himself the God of Abraham he proceeded, 1. To order Moses into a reverent posture: "Put off thy shoes from thy feet. Be not hasty and rash in thy approaches to God; tread softly." 2. To order Moses into a very eminent service. He is commissioned to demand leave from Pharaoh for Israel to go out of his land, v. 34. Observe, (1) The notice God took both of their sufferings and of their sense of their sufferings: I have seen, I have seen their affliction, and have heard their groaning. Their deliverance takes rise from his pity. (2) The determination he fixed to redeem them by the hand of Moses: I am come down to deliver them. Moses is the man that must be employed: Come, and I will send thee into Egypt: and, if God send him, he will give him success.

IV. His acting in pursuance of this commission. 1. God put honour upon him whom they put contempt upon (v. 35): This Moses whom they refused saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge? did God send to be a ruler, and a deliverer, by the hand of the angel which appeared to him in the bush. Now, by this example, Stephen would intimate to the council that this Jesus whom they now refused saying, Who gave thee this authority? has God advanced to be a prince and a Saviour, as the apostles had told them awhile ago (ch. v. 30, 31), that the stone which the builders refused was become the headstone in the corner, ch. iv. 11. 2. God showed favour to them by him. God might justly have refused them his service, but it is all forgotten, v. 36. He brought them out after he had shown wonders and signs in the land of Egypt, in the Red Sea, and in the wilderness forty years. So far is he from blaspheming Moses that he admires him as a glorious instrument in the hand of God. But it does not at all derogate from his just honour to say that he was but an instrument, and that he is outshone by this Jesus, whom he encourages these Jews yet to close with. The people of Israel were delivered by Moses, though they had once refused him.

V. His prophecy of Christ and his grace, v. 37. Moses spoke of him (v. 37): This is that Moses who said unto the children of Israel, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren. This is spoken of as one of the greatest honours God put upon him, that by him he gave notice to the children of Israel of the great prophet that should come into the world. In asserting that Jesus should change the customs of the ceremonial law, he was so far from blaspheming Moses that really he did him the greatest honour imaginable. Christ told them himself, If they had believed Moses, they would have believed him, John v. 46. Moses told them that they should have a prophet raised up among them, one of their own nation, who should therefore have authority to change the customs that he had delivered, and to bring in a better hope, as the Mediator of a better

30-34. an angel of the Lord—rather, 'the Angel of the Covenant,' who immediately calls Himself JEHOVAH (cf. vs. 38).

A. T. ROBERTSON:

30. Sentence begins with genitive absolute again. "In a flame of fire in a bush" (en phlogi puros batou). Horeb in Ex. 3:1; but Sinai and Horeb were "probably peaks of one mountain range" (Page), Horeb "the mountain of the dried-up ground," Sinai "the mountain of the thorns." Literally, "in the flame of fire of a bush" (two genitives, puros and batou dependent on phlogi, flame). Descriptive genitives as in 9:15; 2 Thess. 1:8. Batos (bush) is the wild acacia (mimosa nilotica). In Ex. 3:20 it is Jehovah who speaks. Hence "angel" here with Stephen is understood to be the Angel of the Presence, the Eternal Logos of the Father, the Angel of Jehovah.

31. "The sight" (to horama). Used of visions in the N.T. as in Matt. 17:9. "As he drew near" (proserchomenou autou). Genitive absolute with present middle participle of proserchomai. "A voice of the Lord" (phone kuriou). Here the angel of Jehovah of verse 30 is termed Jehovah himself. Jesus makes powerful use of these words in his reply to the Sadducees in defense of the doctrine of the resurrection and the future life (Mark 12:26; Matt. 22:32; Luke 20:37) that God here describes himself as the God of the living. "Trembled" (entromos genomenos). Literally, becoming tremulous or terrified. The adjective entromos (en, tromos from tremo, to tremble, to quake) occurs in Plutarch and the LXX. In the N.T. only here and Acts 16:29. "Durst not" (ouk etolma). Imperfect active, was not daring, negative conative imperfect.

33. "Holy ground" (ge hagia). The priests were barefooted when they ministered in the temple. Moslems enter their mosques barefooted today (cf. Josh. 5:15). "Sandal" (hupodema, bound under) is here "a distributive singular" (Hackett). Even the ground near the bush was "holy," a fine example for Stephen's argument.

34. "I have surely seen" (idon eidon). Imitation of the Hebrew infinitive absolute (Ex. 3:7). "Seeing I saw" (Heb. 6:14). "The affliction" (ten kakosin). From kakoo, to treat evilly (from kakos, evil). Old word, here only in the N.T. and from Ex. 3:7. "Groaning" (stenagmou). Old word from stenazo, to sigh, to groan. In the N.T. only here and Rom. 8:26. Root sten in our word stentorian. "I am come down" (kateben). Second aorist active indicative of katabaino, I came down. "To deliver" (exelesthai). Second aorist middle infinitive of exaireo, to take out for myself. "I will send" (aposteilo). First aorist active subjunctive (hortatory of apostello, "Let me send").

37. This is that Moses which said . . ., A prophet . . . him shall ye hear—This is quoted to remind his Moses-worshipping audience of the grand testimony of their faithful lawgiver, that he himself was not the last and proper object of the Church's faith, but only a humble precursor and small model of Him to whom their absolute submission was due.

36. He brought them out, after that he had shewed wonders. Thus the very person whom they had rejected, and in effect delivered up into the hands of Pharaoh that he might be slain, was the person alone by whom they were redeemed from their Egyptian bondage. And does not Stephen plainly say by this that the very Person, Jesus Christ, whom they had rejected and delivered up into the hands of Pilate to be crucified was the Person alone by whom they could be delivered out of their spiritual bondage and made partakers of the inheritance among the saints in light?

testament. He charged them to hear that prophet. This will be the greatest honour you can do to Moses and to his law, who said, Hear you him.

VI. The eminent services which Moses continued to do to the people of Israel, after he had been instrumental to bring them out of Egypt, v. 38. It was the honour of Moses, 1. That he was in the church in the wilderness; he presided in all the affairs of it for forty years. Many a time it had been destroyed if Moses had not been in it to intercede for it. But Christ is the president and guide of a more excellent and glorious church, and is more in it, as the life and soul of it, than Moses could be in that. 2. That he was with the angel that spoke to him in the mount Sinai, and with our fathers. Moses was in the church in the wilderness, but it was with the angel that spoke to him in mount Sinai. That angel was guide to him, else he could not have been a guide to Israel Christ is himself that angel and therefore has an authority above Moses. 3. That he received the lively oracles to give unto them; not only the ten commandments, but the other instructions which the Lord spoke unto Moses. The words of God are oracles, certain and infallible, by them all controversies must be determined. They are lively oracles. The word that God speaks is spirit and life; not that the law of Moses could give life, but it showed the way to life. Moses received them from God, and delivered nothing but what he had first received from God. The lively oracles which he received from God he faithfully gave to the people. He that gave them those customs by his servant Moses might change the customs by his Son Jesus, who received more lively oracles to give unto us than Moses did.

VII. The contempt that was put upon him by the people. Those that charged Stephen with speaking against Moses tread in their ancestors' steps. They would not obey him, but thrust him from them, v. 39. In their hearts they turned back again into Egypt, and preferred their garlic and onions there before the manna they had under the guidance of Moses, or the milk and honey they hoped for in Canaan. Many that pretend to be going forward towards Canaan are, at the same time, in their hearts turning back to Egypt. Now, if the customs that Moses delivered to them could not prevail to change them, wonder not that Christ comes to change the customs. They made a golden calf, a great indignity to Moses: for it was upon this consideration that they made the calf, because "as for this Moses, who brought us out of the land of Egypt, we know not what is become of him." As if a calf were sufficient to supply the want of Moses, and as capable of going before them into the promised land. So they made a calf in those days, and offered sacrifices unto the idol, and rejoiced in the work of their own hands. By all this it appears that there was a great deal which the law could not do. It was therefore necessary that this law should be perfected by a better hand, and he was no blasphemer against Moses who said that Christ had done it.

I. Stephen upbraids them with the idolatry of their fathers, which God gave them up to. This was the saddest punishment of all for that sin, that God gave them up to a reprobate mind (v. 42): Then God turned, and gave them up to worship the host of heaven. For this he quotes a passage out of Amos v. 25. For it would be less invidious to tell them their own character and doom from an Old Testament prophet, who upbraids them,

1. For not sacrificing to their own God in the wilderness (v. 42): Have you offered to me slain beasts, and sacrifices, by the space of forty years in the wilderness? No: during all that time sacrifices to God were intermitted; they did not so much as keep the passover after the second year. This is also a check to their zeal for the customs that Moses delivered to them, and their fear of having them changed by this Jesus, that immediately after they were delivered these customs were for forty years together disused.

2. For sacrificing to other gods after they came to Canaan (v. 43): You took up the tabernacle of Moloch Moloch was the idol of the children of Ammon, to which they barbarously offered their own children in sacrifice; yet this unnatural idolatry they arrived at, when God gave them up to worship the host of heaven. Yea, you took up the tabernacle of Moloch, you submitted even to that, and to the worship of the star of your god Remphan. Some think Saturn, for that planet is called Remphan in the Syriac. The Septuagint puts it for Chiun. They had images representing the star, like the silver shrines for Diana, here called the figures which they made to worship. A poor thing to make an idol of, and yet better than a golden calf! Now for this it is threatened, I will carry you away beyond Babylon. Let it not therefore seem strange

38. in the church—the collective body of God's chosen people; hence used to denote the whole body of the faithful under the Gospel, or particular sections of them.

This is he that was in the church in the wilderness, with the angel . . . and with our fathers—alike near to the Angel of the Covenant, from whom he received all the institutions of the ancient economy, and to the people, to whom he faithfully reported the living oracles and among whom he set up the prescribed institutions. By this high testimony to Moses, Stephen rebuts the main charge for which he was on trial.

39. To whom our fathers would not obey . . .—Here he shows that the deepest dishonor done to Moses came from the nation that now professed the greatest jealousy for his honor. in their hearts turned back . . . into Egypt—In this Stephen would have his hearers read the downward career on which they were themselves entering.

42-50. gave them up—judicially. as . . . written in the book of the prophets—the twelve minor prophets, reckoned as one: the passage is from Amos 5:25.

42. have ye offered to me . . . sacrifices?—The answer is, Yes, but as if ye did it not; for "neither did ye offer to Me only, nor always, nor with a perfect and willing heart" [BENGEL].

43. Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Molech . . .—Two kinds of idolatry are charged upon the Israelites: that of the golden calf and that of the heavenly bodies; Molech and Remphan being deities, representing apparently the divine powers ascribed to nature, under different aspects. carry you beyond Babylon—the well-known region of the captivity of Judah; while "Damascus" is used by the prophet (Amos 5:27), whither the ten tribes were carried.

ADAM CLARKE

38. With the angel which spake to him. Stephen shows that Moses received the law by the ministry of angels, and that he was only a mediator between the angel of God and them. The lively oracles. The "living oracles." The doctrines of life, those doctrines obedience to which entitled them, by the promise of God, to a long life upon earth, which spoke to them of that spiritual life which every true believer has in union with his God, and promised that eternal life which those who are faithful unto death shall enjoy with Him in the realms of glory. The Greek word which we translate oracle signifies a "divine revelation, a communication from God himself," and is here applied to the Mosaic law; to the Old Testament in general, Rom. iii. 2; Heb. v. 12; and to divine revelation in general, 1 Pet. iv. 11.

42. Then God turned, and gave them up. He left them to themselves, and then they deified and worshipped the sun, moon, planets, and principal stars. In the book of the prophets. As this quotation is found in Amos, chap. v. 25, by the book of the prophets is meant the twelve minor prophets, which in the ancient Jewish division of the sacred writings formed only one book. Have ye offered to me slain beasts. It is certain that the Israelites did offer various sacrifices to God while in the wilderness, and it is as certain that they scarcely ever did it with an upright heart.

43. Ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them. This is a literal translation of the place, as it stands in the Septuagint; but in the Hebrew text it stands thus: "But ye have borne the tabernacle of your Molech, and Chiun, your images, the star of your god which ye made to yourselves." This is the simple version of the place, unless we should translate "ye took Sikuth your king" (instead of "ye took up the tabernacle of your Molek"), as some have done. The place is indeed very obscure, and the two texts do not tend to cast light on each other. The rabbins say siccuth, which we translate "tabernacle," is the name of an idol. Molech is generally understood to mean the sun; and several persons of good judgment think that by Remphan or "Raiphan" is meant the planet Saturn. It will be seen above that instead of Remphan, or, as some of the best MSS. have it, Rephan, the Hebrew text has Chiun, which might possibly be a corruption of Reiphan. This emendation would bring the Hebrew, Septuagint, and the text of Luke, nearer together; but there is no authority either from MSS. or versions for this correction. However, as Chiun is mentioned in no other place, though Molech often occurs, it is the more likely that there might have been some very early mistake in the text, and that the Septuagint has preserved the true reading. It was customary for the idolaters of all nations to carry images of their gods about them in their journeys, military expeditions; and these, being very small, were enclosed in little boxes, perhaps some of them in the shape of temples, called "tabernacles"; or, as we have it, chap. xix. 24, "shrines." Such images as these I suppose the idolatrous Israelites, in imitation of their neighbors, the Moabites, Ammonites, etc., to have carried about with them; and to such the prophet appears to me unquestionably to allude. I will carry you away beyond Babylon. You have carried your idolatrous images about; and I will carry you into captivity, and see if the gods in whom you have trusted can deliver you from My hands. Instead of beyond Babylon, Amos. from whom the quotation is made, says, "I will carry you beyond Damascus." Where they were carried was into Assyria and Media, not Damascus, but beyond Babylon itself; and as Stephen knew this to be the fact, he states it here, and thus more precisely fixes the place of their captivity. The Holy Spirit, in His further revelations, has undoubted right to extend or illustrate those which He had given before. This case frequently occurs when a former prophecy is quoted in later times.

to them to hear of the destruction of this place, for they had heard of it many a time from the prophets of the Old Testament.

II. He gives an answer particularly to the charge relating to the temple, that he spoke blasphemous words against that holy place, v. 44–50. He was accused for saying that Jesus would destroy this holy place: "And what if I did say so?" (saith Stephen) "the glory of the holy God may be preserved untouched, though this be laid in the dust"; for, 1. "It was not till our fathers came into the wilderness, that they had any fixed place of worship. He that was worshipped without a holy place in the first, and best, and purest ages of the Old Testament church, may and will be so when this holy place is destroyed." 2. The holy place was at first but a tabernacle, mean and movable, not designed to continue always. Why might not this holy place, be decently brought to its end, as well as that? 3. That tabernacle was a tabernacle of witness, or of testimony. This was the glory both of the tabernacle and temple, that they were erected for a testimony. 4. That tabernacle was framed accoraing to the fashion which Moses saw in the mount. It had reference to good things to come. Therefore it was no diminution at all to its glory to say that this temple made with hands should be destroyed, in order to the building of another made without hands. 5. That tabernacle was pitched first in the wilderness; it was not a native of this land of yours, but was brought in by our fathers, into the possession of the Gentiles, whom God drove out before the face of our fathers. And why may not God set up his spiritual temple in those countries that were now the possession of the Gentiles? That tabernacle was brought in by those who came with Jesus, that is, Joshua. So the New-Testament Joshua should bring in the true tabernacle into the possession of the Gentiles. 6. That tabernacle continued even to the days of David, before there was any thought of building a temple, v. 45. David, having found favour before God, did indeed desire this further favour, to have leave to build God a constant settled tabernacle, or dwelling-place. Those who have found favour with God should show themselves forward to advance the interests of his kingdom among men. 7. God had his heart so little upon a temple that, when David desired to build one, he was forbidden to do it; God was in no haste for one. It was not he, but his son Solomon, some years after, that built him a house. 8. God often declared that temples made with hands were not his delight. Solomon acknowledged that God dwelleth not in temples made with hands. The whole world is his temple, in which he is everywhere present, and fills it with his glory; and what occasion has he for a temple? The one only true and living God needs no temple, for the heaven is his throne, in which he rests, and the earth is his footstool, over which he rules (v. 49, 50), and therefore, What house will you build me, what is the place of my rest? What need have I of a house, either to repose myself in or to show myself? Hath not my hand made all these things? And as the world is thus God's temple, wherein he is manifested, so it is God's temple in which he will be worshipped. As the earth is full of his glory, so the earth is, or shall be, full of his praise, and upon this account it is his temple. It was therefore no reflection at all upon this holy place, to say that Jesus should destroy this temple, and set up another, into which all nations should be admitted, ch. xv. 16, 17.

Stephen was going on in his discourse (as it should seem by the thread of it) to show that, as the temple, so the temple-service must come to an end. But he perceived they could not bear it. They will not so much as give him the hearing. He breaks off abruptly and by that spirit of wisdom, courage, and power, wherewith he was filled, he sharply rebuked his persecutors. If they will not admit the testimony of the gospel to them, it shall become a testimony against them.

I. They, like their fathers, were stubborn and wilful, and would not be brought upon by the various methods God took to reclaim and reform them. 1. They were stiff-necked (v. 51), and would not submit their necks to the sweet and easy yoke of God's government. They would not bow their heads, no, not to God himself, would not humble themselves before him. 2. They were uncircumcised in heart and ears. "In name and show you are circumcised Jews, but in heart and ears you are still uncircumcised heathens, and pay no more deference to the authority of your God than they do."

II. They were not only not influenced by the methods God took to reform them, but they were enraged and incensed against them: You do always resist

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

44. Our fathers had the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness—which aggravated the guilt of that idolatry in which they indulged, with the tokens of the divine presence constantly in the midst of them.

45. which ... our fathers that came after—rather (Margin) "having received it by succession," i.e., the custody of the tabernacle from their ancestors. brought in with Jesus—or Joshua. into the possession—rather, 'at the taking possession of [the territory of] the Gentiles.' unto the days of David—for till then Jerusalem continued in the hands of the Jebusites. But Stephen's object in mentioning David is to hasten from the tabernacle which he set up, to the temple which his son built, in Jerusalem; and this only to show, from their own Scripture (Isa. 66:1, 2), that even that temple, magnificent though it was, was not the proper resting-place of Jehovah upon earth; as his audience and the nations had all along been prone to imagine. (What that resting-place was, even "the contrite heart, that trembleth at God's word," he leaves to be gathered from the prophet referred to.)

51-53. Ye stiffnecked ... ye do always resist the Holy Ghost ...—It has been thought that symptoms of impatience and irritation in the audience induced Stephen to cut short his historical sketch. But as little farther light could have been thrown upon Israel's obstinacy from subsequent periods of the national history on the testimony of their own Scriptures, we should view this as the summing up, the brief import of the whole Israelitish history—grossness of heart, spiritual deafness, continuous resistance of the Holy Ghost, down to the very council before whom Stephen was pleading.

ADAM CLARKE

44. Our fathers had the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness. That is, the Tabernacle in which the two tables of stone written by the finger of God were laid up, as a testimony that He had delivered these laws to the people, and that they had promised to obey them. As one great design of Stephen was to show the Jews that they placed too much dependence on outward privileges, and had not used the law, the Tabernacle, the Temple, nor the Temple service for the purpose of their institution, he labors to bring them to a due sense of this, that conviction might lead to repentance and conversion. And he further shows that God did not confine His worship to one place or form. He was worshipped without any shrine in the times of the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob. He was worshipped with a Tabernacle, or portable temple, in the wilderness. He was worshipped also in the fixed Temple projected by David but built by Solomon. He asserts farther that His infinite majesty cannot be confined to temples made by human hands; and where there is neither Tabernacle nor Temple (in any part of His vast dominions), He may be worshipped acceptably by the upright in heart. Thus he proves that neither Tabernacle nor Temple is essentially requisite for the true worship of the true God. Speaking unto Moses. "Who spake," as in the margin; signifying the angel of God who spake to Moses, or God himself. See Exod. xxv. 40.

45. Brought in with Jesus. That is, with Joshua, whom the Greek version, quoted by Stephen, always writes Iesous, Jesus, but which should constantly be written "Joshua" in such cases as the present, in order to avoid ambiguity and confusion. Possession of the Gentiles. "Of the heathens," whom Joshua conquered, and gave their land to the children of Israel.

46. Desired to find a tabernacle. This was in David's heart, and it met with the divine approbation; see 2 Sam. vii. 2, etc., and see the purpose, Ps. cxxxii. 2-5. But as David had been a man of war, and had shed much blood, God would not permit him to build the Temple; but he laid the plan and made provision for it, and Solomon executed the design.

48. The most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands. Here Stephen evidently refers to Solomon's speech, 1 Kings viii. 27. "But will God indeed dwell on the earth? behold, the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain thee; how much less this house that I have builded?" Both Solomon and Stephen mean that the majesty of God could not be contained, not even in the whole vortex of nature, much less in any temple which human hands could erect. As saith the prophet. The place referred to is Isa. lxvi. 1-2: "Thus saith the Lord, The heaven is my throne, and the earth my footstool: where is the house that ye build unto me? and where is the place of my rest?" with which the quotation by Stephen agrees.

50. Hath not my hand made all these things? Stephen certainly had not finished his discourse nor drawn his inferences from the facts already stated; but it is likely that, as they perceived he was about to draw conclusions unfavorable to the Temple and its ritual, they immediately raised up a clamor against him, which was the cause of the following very cutting address.

51. Ye stiffnecked. A metaphor taken from untoward oxen who cannot be broken into the yoke, and whose strong necks cannot be bent to the right or the left. Uncircumcised in heart and ears. This was a Jewish mode of speech, often used by the prophets. Circumcision was instituted, not only as a sign and seal of the covenant into which the Israelites entered with their Maker, but also as a type of that purity and holiness which the law of God requires; and by this cutting off, the propensity to that crime which ruins the body, debases the mind, and was generally the forerunner of idolatry was happily lessened. Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost. Because they were uncircumcised in heart, they always resisted the influences of the Holy Spirit, bringing light and conviction to their minds; in consequence of which they became hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, and neither repented at the preaching of John nor credited the glad tidings told them by Christ and the apostles. Because they were the Holy Ghost. 1. They resisted the Holy Ghost speaking to them by the prophets. Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? Their fathers resisted the Holy Ghost in the prophets, and so did they in Christ's apostles and ministers. 2. They resisted the Holy Ghost striving with them by their own consciences. There is that in our sinful hearts that always resists the Holy Ghost, but in the hearts of God's elect, this resistance is overcome, and after a struggle the throne of Christ is set up in the soul. That grace therefore which effects this change might more fitly be called victorious grace than irresistible.

III. They, like their fathers, persecuted and slew those whom God sent unto them. 1. Their fathers had been the cruel and constant persecutors of the Old Testament prophets (v. 52): Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? More or less, one time or other, they had a blow at them all. That which aggravated the sin of persecuting the prophets was to show before the coming of the just One, to give notice of God's kind intentions to send the Messiah among them. Those that were the messengers of such glad tidings should have been courted and caressed, but, instead of this, they had the treatment of the worst of malefactors. 2. They had been the betrayers and murderers of the just One himself, as Peter had told them, ch. iii. 14, 15; v. 30. They had hired Judas to betray him, and had forced Pilate to condemn him; and therefore it is charged upon them that they were his betrayers and murderers. By slaying him, they showed they would have done if they had lived then; and thus brought upon themselves the guilt of the blood of all the prophets. To which of the prophets would those have shown any respect who had no regard to the Son of God himself?

IV. They, like their fathers, put contempt upon divine revelation. God had given, as to their fathers his law, so to them his gospel, in vain. 1. Their fathers received the law, and did not observe it, v. 53. God wrote to them the great things of his law, and yet they were counted by them as a strange or foreign thing. The law is said to be received by the disposition of angels, because angels were employed in the solemnity of giving the law, in the thunderings, lightnings, and the sound of the trumpet. But those that thus received the law yet kept it not, but by making the golden calf broke it immediately in a capital instance. 2. They received the gospel now, by the disposition not of angels, but of the Holy Ghost, and yet they did not embrace it. They were resolved not to comply with God either in his law or in his gospel.

We have here the death of the first martyr of the Christian church. Here is hell in its fire and darkness, and heaven in its light and brightness; and these serve as foils to set off each other. It is not here said that the votes of the council were taken upon his case, and that by the majority he was found guilty, and then condemned; but, it is likely, that it was not by the violence of the people, that he was put to death; for here is the usual ceremony of regular executions—he was cast out of the city, and the hands of the witnesses were first upon him.

I. See the strength of corruption in the persecutors of Stephen.

1. When they heard these things they were cut to the heart (v. 54), διεπρίοντο, the same word that is used in Heb. xi. 37, and translated they were sawn asunder. They were put to as much torture in their minds as ever the martyrs were put to in their bodies. They were not pricked to the heart with sorrow, as those were in ch. ii. 37, but cut to the heart with rage and fury, as they themselves were, ch. v. 33. Enmity to God is a heart-cutting thing; faith and love are heart-healing. They heard how he that looked like an angel before he began his discourse talked like an angel before he concluded it, and despairing to run down a cause so bravely pleaded, they yet resolved not to yield to it.

2. They gnashed upon him with their teeth. Great malice and rage against him. They grinned at him as dogs at those they are enraged at. Enmity at the saints turns men into brute beasts. Great vexation within themselves; they fretted to see in him such manifest tokens of a divine power. Gnashing with the teeth is often used to express the horror and torments of the damned. Those that have the malice of hell cannot but have with it some of the pains of hell.

3. They cried out with a loud voice (v. 57). When he said, I see heaven opened, they cried with a loud voice, that he might not be heard to speak. It is very common for a righteous cause to be attempted to be run down by noise and clamour; what is wanting in reason is made up in tumult.

4. They stopped their ears under pretence that they

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

52. Which of . . .—Deadly hostility to the messengers of God, whose high office it was to tell of "the Righteous One," that well-known prophetic title of Messiah (Isa. 53:11; Jer. 23:6, etc), and this consummated by the betrayal and murder of Messiah Himself, on the part of those now sitting in judgment on the speaker, are the still darker features of the national character depicted in these withering words.

53. Who have received the law by the disposition—'at the appointment' or 'ordination,' i.e., by the ministry—of angels, and have not kept it—This closing word is designed to shut up those idolizers of the law under the guilt of high disobedience to it, aggravated by the august manner in which they had received it.

54-56. When they heard these things they were cut to the heart . . .—If they could have answered him, how different would have been their temper of mind!

57, 58. Then they cried out . . . and ran upon him with one accord—To men of their mould and in their temper, Stephen's last seraphic words could but bring matters to extremities, though that only revealed the diabolical spirit which they breathed.

uncircumcised in ears, they would neither hear nor obey Moses, the prophets, Christ, nor the apostles. As your fathers did, so do ye. They were disobedient children, of disobedient parents; in all their generations they had been disobedient and perverse. This whole people, as well as this text, are fearful proofs that the Holy Spirit, the almighty energy of the living God, may be resisted and rendered of none effect.

52. Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? You have not only resisted the Holy Ghost, but you have persecuted all those who have spoken to you in His name and by His influence: thus you prove your opposition to the Spirit himself, by your opposition to everything that proceeds from Him. They have slain them. Isaiah, who shewed before of the coming of Christ, the Jews report, was sawn asunder at the command of Manasseh. The coming of the Just One. Meaning Jesus Christ; emphatically called the just or "righteous" Person, not only because of the unspotted integrity of His heart and life, but because of His plenary acquittal when tried at the tribunal of Pilate: I find in him no fault at all. The mention of this circumstance served greatly to aggravate their guilt. The character of Just One is applied to our Lord in three other places of Scripture: chap. iii. 14; xxii. 14; and Jas. v. 6. The betrayers and murderers. You first delivered Him up into the hands of the Romans, hoping they would have put Him to death; but when they acquitted Him, then, in opposition to the declaration of His innocence and in outrage to every form of justice, you took and murdered Him. This was a most terrible charge, and one against which they could set up no sort of defense. No wonder, then, that they were instigated by the spirit of the old destroyer, which they never resisted, to add another murder to that of which they had been so recently guilty.

53. By the disposition of angels. After all that has been said on this difficult passage, perhaps the simple meaning is that there were "ranks" of angels attending on the Divine Majesty when He gave the law, a circumstance which must have added greatly to the grandeur and solemnity of the occasion; and to this Ps. lxviii. 17 (marg.) seems to me most evidently to allude: "The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even many thousands of angels: the Lord is among them, as in Sinai, in the holy place." It was not then by the mouths nor by the hands of angels as prime agents that Moses, and through him the people, received the law; but God himself gave it, accompanied with many thousands of those glorious beings. As it is probable they might be assisting in this most glorious solemnity, therefore Paul might say, Gal. iii. 19, that it was "ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator." And as they were the only persons that could appear, for no man hath seen God at any time, therefore the apostle might say further (if indeed he refers to the same transaction; see the note there), "The word spoken by angels was stedfast," Heb. ii. 2.

54. They were cut to the heart. They were "sawn through." See the note on chap. v. 33.

They gnashed on him with their teeth. They were determined to hear him no longer; were filled with rage against him, and evidently thirsted for his blood.

MATTHEW HENRY

could not bear to hear his blasphemies. These stopped their ears when Stephen said, I now see the Son of man standing in glory. Their stopping their ears was a manifest specimen of their wilful obstinacy; they were resolved they would not hear. It was a fatal omen of that judicial hardness to which God would give them up. They stopped their ears, and then God, in a way of righteous judgment, stopped them.

5. They ran upon him with one accord, they all flew upon him, as beasts upon their prey. They ran upon him, one and all, hoping thereby to put him into confusion, envying him his composure and comfort in soul. They did all they could to ruffle him.

6. They cast him out of the city, and stoned him, to execute the law of Moses (Lev. xxiv. 16), He that blasphemeth the name of the Lord shall surely be put to death, all the congregation shall certainly stone him. They cast him out of the city; they treated him as the offscouring of all things. The witnesses against him were the leaders in the execution, according to the law. Thus they were to confirm their testimony. The witnesses took off their upper garments and they laid them down at a young man's feet, whose name was Saul. It is the first time we find mention of his name; we shall know it and love it better when we find it changed to Paul. This little instance of his agency in Stephen's death he afterwards reflected upon with regret (ch. xxii. 20): I kept the raiment of those that slew him.

II. See the strength of grace in Stephen. As his persecutors were full of Satan, so was he full of the Holy Ghost. When he was chosen to public service, he was described to be a man full of the Holy Ghost (ch. vi. 5), and now he is called out to martyrdom he has still the same character. Those that are full of the Holy Ghost are fit for anything, either to act for Christ or to suffer for him. When the followers of Christ are for his sake killed all the day long, and accounted as sheep for the slaughter, does this separate them from the love of Christ? Do they love him the less? No, by no means; and so it appears by this narrative.

1. Christ's gracious manifestation of himself to Stephen. When they were cut to the heart, and gnashed upon him with their teeth, then he had a view of the glory of Christ.

(1) He, being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up steadfastly into heaven, v. 55. Thus he looked above the power and fury of his persecutors, and did as it were despise them. They had their eyes fixed upon him, full of malice and cruelty; but he looked up to heaven, and never minded them. He looks up to heaven; thence only comes his help, and thitherward his way is still open. They cannot interrupt his intercourse with heaven. Thus he directed his sufferings to the glory of God, and did as it were appeal to heaven concerning them. Now that he was ready to be offered he looks up steadfastly to heaven, as one willing to offer himself. Thus he lifted up his soul with his eyes to God calling upon God for wisdom and grace to carry him through this trial. God has promised that he will be with his servants whom he calls out to suffer for him; but he will for this be sought unto. Thus he breathed after the heavenly country, to which he saw the fury of his persecutors would presently send him. It is good for dying saints to look up steadfastly to heaven: "And then, O death! where is thy sting?" Thus he made it to appear that he was full of the Holy Ghost. Those that are full of the Holy Ghost will look up steadfastly to heaven, for there their heart is. If we expect to hear from heaven, we must look up steadfastly to heaven.

(2) He saw the glory of God (v. 55); for he saw the heavens opened, v. 56. The heavens were opened to give him a view of the happiness he was going to, that he might go cheerfully through death, so great a death. Would we by faith look up steadfastly, we might see the heavens opened by the mediation of Christ. We may also see the glory of God and the sight of this will carry us through all the terrors of sufferings and death.

(3) He saw Jesus standing on the right hand of God (v. 55), the Son of man, so it is, v. 56. When the Old Testament prophets saw the glory of God it was attended with angels. But here no mention is made of the angels. The glory of God shines brightest in the face of Jesus Christ. Here is a proof of the exaltation of Christ. He saw Jesus at the right hand of God. Whatever God's right hand gives to us, or receives from us, or does concerning us, it is by him; for he is his right hand. Stephen sees him standing there. He stands ready to receive him and crown him, and in the meantime to give him a prospect of the joy set before him. He sees Christ is for him, and then no matter who is against him. When our Lord Jesus

58. cast him out of the city (according to Lev. 24:14; Num. 15:35; I Kings 21:13; and see Heb. 13:12. and stoned—'proceeded to stone' him. The actual stoning is recorded in next verse. and the witnesses—whose hands were to be first upon the criminal (Deut. 17:7). laid down their clothes—their loose outer garments, to have them taken charge of. at a young man's feet whose name was Saul—How thrilling is this our first introduction to one to whom Christianity—whether as developed in the New Testament or as established in the world—owes more perhaps than to all the other apostles together! Here he is, having perhaps already a seat in the Sanhedrim, some 30 years of age, in the thick of this tumultuous murder of a distinguished witness for Christ, not only "consenting unto his death" (ch. 8:1), but doing his own part of the dark deed.

55. But he, being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up steadfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God—You who can transfer to canvas such scenes as these, in which the rage of hell grins horribly from men, as they sit condemned by a frail prisoner of their own, and see heaven beaming from his countenance and opening full upon his view—I envy you, for I find no words to paint what, in the majesty of the divine text, is here so simply told. "But how could Stephen, in the council-chamber, see heaven at all? I suppose this question never occurred but to critics of narrow soul, one of whom [MEYER] conjectures that he saw it through the window! and another, of better mould, that the scene lay in one of the courts of the temple" [ALFORD]. As the sight was witnessed by Stephen alone, the opened heavens are to be viewed as revealed to his bright beaming spirit.

and Jesus standing on the right hand of God—Why "standing," and not sitting, the posture in which the glorified Saviour is elsewhere represented? Clearly, to express the eager interest with which He watched from the skies the scene in that council chamber, and the full tide of His Spirit which He was at that moment engaged in pouring into the heart of His heroical witness, till it beamed in radiance from his very countenance. 56. I see ... the Son of man standing ...—This is the only time that our Lord is by human lips called THE SON OF MAN after His ascension (Rev. 1:13; 14:14 are not instances). And why here? Stephen, full of the Holy Ghost, speaking now not of himself at all (vs. 55), but entirely by the Spirit, is led to repeat

57. They ... stopped their ears. As a proof that he had uttered blasphemy, because he said he saw Jesus standing at the right hand of God. This was a fearful proof against them; for if Jesus was at the right hand of God, then they had murdered an innocent Person, and they must infer that God's justice must speedily avenge His death. They were determined not to suffer a man to live any longer who could say he saw the heavens opened and Jesus Christ standing at the right hand of God.

58. Cast him out of the city, and stoned him. They did not however wait for any sentence to be pronounced upon him; it seems they were determined to stone him first, and then prove, after it had been done, that it was done justly. For the manner of stoning among the Jews, see the note on Lev. xxiv. 23.

55. Saw the glory of God. The Shekinah, the splendor or manifestation of the Divine Majesty.

was in his agony an angel appeared to him, but Stephen had Christ himself appearing to him. Nothing so comfortable nor so animating as to see Jesus at the right hand of God; by faith we may see him there.

(4) He told those about him what he saw (v. 56): Behold, I see the heavens opened. What he saw he declared, let them make what use they pleased of it. If some were exasperated by it, others perhaps might be wrought upon to consider this Jesus, and to believe in him.

2. Stephen's pious addresses to Jesus Christ. They stoned Stephen, calling upon God, v. 59. Though he called upon God yet they proceeded to stone him. Though they stoned him, yet he called upon God. It is the comfort of those who are unjustly hated and persecuted by men that they have a God to go to. Men stop their ears, as they did here (v. 57), but God does not. Stephen was now cast out of the city, but he was not cast out from his God. He was now taking his leave of the world, and therefore calls upon God. It is good to die praying. Two short prayers Stephen offered up to God in his dying moments.

(1) Here is a prayer for himself: Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. Thus Christ had himself resigned his spirit immediately into the hands of the Father. We are here taught to resign ours into the hands of Christ as Mediator. The soul is the man, and our great concern, living and dying, must be about our souls. "Lord," saith he, "let my spirit be safe; let it go well with my poor soul." Our Lord Jesus is God, to whom we are to seek, and in whom we comfort ourselves living and dying. Stephen here prays to Christ, and so must we. There is no venturing into another world but under his conduct, no living comforts in dying moments but what are fetched from him. Christ's receiving our spirits at death is the great thing we are to comfort ourselves with. And, if this has been our care while we live, it may be our comfort when we come to die.

(2) Here is a prayer for his persecutors, v. 60. The circumstances of this prayer are observable. He knelt down, which was an expression of his humility in prayer. He cried with a loud voice, which was an expression of his importunity. In his prayer for his enemies, because that is so much against the grain of corrupt nature, it was requisite he should give proofs of his being in earnest. The prayer itself: Lord, lay not this sin to their charge. Herein he followed the example of his dying Master, and set an example to all following sufferers in the cause of Christ. Prayer may preach. This did so to those who stoned Stephen. First, What they did was a sin, a great sin. Secondly, Notwithstanding their malice and fury against him, he was in charity with them. Let them take notice of this, and, when their thoughts were cool, surely they would not easily forgive themselves for putting him to death who could so easily forgive them. Thirdly, Though the sin was very heinous, yet they must not despair of the pardon of it upon their repentance. If they would lay it to their hearts, God would not lay it to their charge.

3. His expiring with this: When he had said this, he fell asleep. Death is but a sleep to good people. Stephen died as much in a hurry as ever any man did, and yet, when he died, he fell asleep. He fell asleep when he was praying for his persecutors; it is expressed as if he thought he could not die in peace till he had done this. If he thus sleep, he shall do well; he shall awake again in the morning of the resurrection.

the very words in which Jesus Himself, before this same council, had foretold His glorification (Matt. 26:64), assuring them that that exaltation of the SON OF MAN which they should hereafter witness to their dismay, was already begun and actual [ALFORD].

59, 60. calling upon God and saying, Lord Jesus . . .—An unhappy supplement of our translators is the word "God" here; as if, while addressing the Son, he was really calling upon the Father. The sense is perfectly clear without any supplement at all—"calling upon [invoking] and saying, Lord Jesus"; Christ being the Person directly invoked and addressed by name (cf. 9:14). Even GROTIUS, DE WETTE, MEYER, etc. admit this, adding several other examples of direct prayer to Christ; and PLINY, in his well-known letter to the Emperor Trajan (A.D. 110 or 111), says it was part of the regular Christian service to sing, in alternate strains, a hymn to Christ as God. Lord Jesus, receive my spirit—In presenting to Jesus the identical prayer which He Himself had on the cross offered to His Father, Stephen renders to his glorified Lord absolute divine worship, in the most sublime form, and at the most solemn moment of his life. In this commitment of his spirit to Jesus, Paul afterwards followed his footsteps with a calm, exultant confidence that with Him it was safe for eternity (II Tim. 1:12).

60. cried with a loud voice—with something of the gathered energy of his dying Lord (see on John 19:16-30). Lord—i.e., JESUS, beyond doubt, whom he had just before addressed as Lord. lay not this sin to their charge—Comparing this with nearly the same prayer of his dying Lord, it will be seen how very richly this martyr of Jesus had drunk into his Master's spirit, in its divinest form.

he fell asleep—never said of the death of Christ. (See on I Thess. 4:14.) How bright the record of this first martyrdom for Christ, amidst all the darkness of its perpetrators; and how many have been cheered by it to like faithfulness even unto death!

ADAM CLARKE

59. And they stoned Stephen, calling upon God. The word God is not found in any MS. or version, nor in any of the primitive fathers except Chrysostom. It is not genuine, and should not be inserted here.

The whole sentence literally reads thus: "And they stoned Stephen, invoking and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!" Here is a most manifest proof that prayer is offered to Jesus Christ, and that in the most solemn circumstances in which it could be offered, viz., when a man was breathing his last. This is, properly speaking, one of the highest acts of worship which can be offered to God; and if Stephen had not conceived Jesus Christ to be God, could he have committed his soul into His hands?

60. He kneeled down. That he might die as the subject of his heavenly Master—acting and suffering in the deepest submission to His divine will and permissive providence; and at the same time showing the genuine nature of the religion of his Lord, in pouring out his prayers with his blood in behalf of his murderers! Lay not this sin to their charge. That is, do not impute it to them so as to exact punishment. How much did the servant resemble his Lord, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do"! This was the cry of our Lord in behalf of His murderers; and the disciple, closely copying his Master, in the same spirit and with the same meaning, varies the expression, crying with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge! Christ had given what some have supposed to be an impossible command, "Love your enemies . . . pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you." And Stephen shows here, in his own person, how practicable the grace of his Master had made this sublime precept. He fell asleep. This was a common expression among the Jews to signify death, and especially the death of good men. But this sleep is, properly speaking, not attributable to the soul, but to the body; for he had commended his spirit to the Lord Jesus, while his body was overwhelmed with the shower of stones cast on him by the mob. The first clause of the next chapter should come in here, And Saul was consenting unto his death. Never was there a worse division than that which separated it from the end of this chapter. This should be immediately altered, and the amputated member restored to the body to which it belongs.

I. Something more concerning Stephen and his death; how people stood affected to it. 1. Stephen's death rejoiced in by one in particular, and that was Saul, who was afterwards called Paul; he was consenting to his death. We have reason to think that Paul ordered Luke to insert this, for shame to himself, and glory to free grace. 2. Stephen's death bewailed by others (v. 2)—devout men. Some of the church gathered up the poor crushed and broken remains, to which they gave a decent interment. They buried him solemnly, and made great lamentation over him. It is a bad symptom if, when such men are taken away, it is not laid to heart. Those devout men paid these their last respects to Stephen, to show that they were not ashamed of the cause for which he suffered, nor afraid of the wrath of those that were enemies to it. To show the great value and esteem they had for this faithful servant of Jesus Christ. They study to do honour to him upon whom God put honour.

II. An account of this persecution of the church,

CHAPTER 8

Vss. 1-4. PERSECUTION CONTINUED, IN WHICH SAUL TAKES A PROMINENT PART—HOW OVERRULED FOR GOOD—1. Saul was consenting unto his death—The word expresses hearty approval.

2. and devout men—pious Jews, probably, impressed with admiration for Stephen and secretly inclined to Christianity, but not yet openly declared.

CHAPTER 8

1. Saul was consenting unto his death. The word signifies "gladly consenting," being pleased with his murderous work! It has already been remarked that this clause belongs to the conclusion of the preceding chapter; so it stands in the Vulgate, and so it should stand in every version.

2. Devout men carried Stephen to his burial. The Greek word signifies not only to "carry," or rather to "gather up," but also to do everything necessary for the interment of the dead. Among the Jews, and indeed among most nations of the earth, it was esteemed a work of piety, charity, and mercy to bury the dead.

which begins upon the martyrdom of Stephen. One would have thought Stephen's dying prayers and dying comforts should have overcome them, and melted them into a better opinion, but it seems they did not. As if they hoped to be too hard for God himself, they resolve to follow their blow.

1. Against whom this persecution was raised: It was against the church in Jerusalem. Christ had particularly foretold that Jerusalem would soon be made too hot for his followers, for that city had been famous for killing the prophets and stoning those that were sent to it.

2. Who was an active man in it: none so zealous, so busy, as Saul, a young Pharisee, v. 3. As for Saul he made havoc of the church; he did all he could to lay it waste and ruin it. He aimed at no less than the cutting off of the gospel Israel. Saul was bred a scholar, a gentleman, and yet did not think it below him to be employed in the vilest work of that kind. He entered into every house. No man could be secure in his own house, though it was his castle. He haled both men and women, without any regard to the tenderness of the weaker sex. He committed them to prison, in order to their being tried and put to death.

3. What was the effect of this persecution: They were all scattered abroad (v. 1). They, remembering our Master's rule (when they persecute you in one city, flee to another), dispersed themselves throughout the regions of Judæa and of Samaria. Their work was pretty well done in Jerusalem, and now it was time to think of the necessities of other places. Though persecution may not drive us off from our work, yet it may send us to work elsewhere. The preachers were all scattered except the apostles. They tarried at Jerusalem, that they might be ready to go where their assistance was most needed by the other preachers that were sent to break the ice.

Christ had said, I am come to send fire on the earth; and they thought, by scattering those who were kindled with that fire, to have put it out, but instead of this they did but help to spread it.

I. Here is a general account of what was done by them all (v. 4): They went everywhere, preaching the word. They went everywhere, into the way of the Gentiles, and the cities of the Samaritans, which before they were forbidden to go into. They scattered into all parts, not to take their ease, but to find out work. They were now in a country where they were no strangers, for Christ and his disciples had conversed much in the regions of Judæa; so that they had a foundation laid there for them to build upon.

II. A particular account of what was done by Philip, not Philip the apostle, but Philip the deacon. Stephen was advanced to the degree of a martyr, Philip to the degree of an evangelist.

1. What wonderful success Philip had in his preaching.

(1) The place he chose was the city of Samaria, the metropolis of that country. Some think it was the same with Sychem or Sychar, that city of Samaria where Christ was, John iv. 5. The Jews would have no dealings with the Samaritans; but Christ sent his gospel to slay all enmities.

(2) The doctrine he preached was Christ: he preached Christ to them. The Samaritans had an expectation of the Messiah's coming, as appears by John iv. 25. Now Philip tells them that he is come, and that the Samaritans are welcome to him.

(3) The proofs he produced were miracles, v. 6. The miracles were undeniable; they heard and saw the miracles which he did. He was sent to break the power of Satan; and, in token of this, unclean spirits, being charged in the name of the Lord Jesus to remove, came out of many that were possessed with them, v. 7. Wherever the gospel gains the admission and submission it ought to have, evil spirits are dislodged. This was signified by the casting of these unclean spirits out of the bodies of people, who came out crying with a loud voice. They came out with great reluctancy, but were forced to acknowledge themselves overcome by a superior power. He was sent to heal, to cure a distempered world; in token of this, many that were taken with palsies, and that were lame, were healed. The grace of God in the gospel is designed for the healing of those that are spiritually lame and paralytic, and cannot help themselves.

(4) The acceptance which Philip's doctrine met with in Samaria (v. 6): The people with one accord gave heed to those things which Philip spoke, induced thereto by the miracles which served at first to gain attention, and so by degrees to gain assent. The common people gave heed to Philip, a multitude of them, not here and there one, but with one accord;

3. Saul ... entering into every house—like as inquisitor [BENGEL]. haling men and women ...—See his own affecting confessions afterwards (ch. 22:4; 26:9, 10; I Cor. 15:9; Gal. 1:13; Phil. 3:6; I Tim. 1:13).

they were all scattered abroad—all the leading Christians, particularly the preachers, agreeably to their Lord's injunctions (Matt. 10:23), though many doubtless remained, and others (as appears by ch. 9:26-30) soon returned. except the apostles—who remained, not certainly as being less exposed to danger, but, at whatever risk, to watch over the infant cause where it was most needful to cherish it.

they that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching—Though solemnly enjoined to do this (Luke 24: 47; ch. 1:8), they would probably have lingered at Jerusalem, but for this besom of persecution which swept them out. How often has the rage of Christ's enemies thus "turned out rather unto the furtherance of the Gospel" (see Phil. 1:12, 13).

5-25. SUCCESS OF PHILIP'S PREACHING IN SAMARIA—CASE OF SIMON MAGUS. 5. Then Philip—not the apostle of that name, as was by some of the Fathers supposed; for besides that the apostles remained at Jerusalem, they would in that case have had no occasion to send a deputation of their own number to lay their hands on the baptized disciples [GROTIUS]. It was the deacon of that name, who comes next after Stephen in the catalogue of the seven, probably as being the next most prominent. The persecution may have been directed especially against Stephen's colleagues [MEYER]. the city of Samaria—or 'a city of Samaria'; but the former seems more likely. "It furnished the bridge between Jerusalem and the world" [BAUMGARTEN].

6-8. the people with one accord gave heed to ... Philip—the way being prepared perhaps by the fruits of our Lord's sojourn, as He Himself seems to intimate (see on John 4:31-38). But "we may mark the providence of God in sending a Grecian, or a Hellenistic Jew, to a people who from national

3. Saul ... made havock of the church. The word signifies the act of ferocious animals, such as bears, wolves, and the like, in seeking and devouring their prey. This shows with what persevering rancor this man pursued the harmless Christians, and thus we see in him what bigotry and false zeal are capable of performing. Haling men and women. The word signifies "dragging" them before the magistrates or dragging them to justice. Committed them to prison. For, as the Romans alone had the power of life and death, the Sanhedrin, by whom Saul was employed, chap. xxvi. 10, could do no more than arrest and imprison, in order to inflict any punishment short of death. It is true Paul himself says that some of them were put to death (see chap. xxvi. 10); but this was done either by Roman authority or by what was called the "judgment of zeal," i.e., when the mob took the execution of the laws into their own hands, and massacred those whom they pretended to be blasphemers of God. For these sanctified their murderous outrage under the specious name of zeal for God's glory, and quoted the example of Phineas as a precedent. Such persons as these formed a sect among the Jews, and are known in ecclesiastical history by the appellation of Zealots or Sicarii.

There was a great persecution. The Jews could not bear the doctrine of Christ's resurrection, for this point being proved demonstrated His innocence and their enormous guilt in His crucifixion. As therefore the apostles continued to insist strongly on the resurrection of Christ, the persecution against them became hot and general. They were all scattered abroad ... except the apostles. Their Lord had commanded them, when persecuted in one city, to flee to another. This they did, but wherever they went they proclaimed the same doctrines, though at the risk and hazard of their lives. It is evident, therefore, that they did not flee from persecution, or the death it threatened, but merely in obedience to their Lord's command. That the apostles were not also exiled is a very remarkable fact. They continued in Jerusalem, to found and organize the infant Church, and it is marvellous that the hand of persecution was not permitted to touch them. Why this should be we cannot tell, but so it pleased the great Head of the Church.

4. They that were scattered ... went every where preaching. Thus the very means devised by Satan to destroy the Church became the very instruments of its diffusion and establishment.

5. Then Philip. One of the seven deacons, chap. vi. 5, called afterwards "Philip the evangelist," chap. xxi. 8. The city of Samaria. At this time there was no city of Samaria existing; according to Josephus, Ant., l. xiii, c. 10, s. 3, Hyrcanus had so utterly demolished it as to leave no vestige of it remaining. Herod the Great did afterwards build a city on the same spot of ground, but he called it Sebaste, i.e., Augusta, in compliment to the Emperor Augustus, as Josephus tells us, Ant., l. xv, c. 8, s. 5; War, l. i, c. 2, s. 7; and by this name of Sebaste, or Augusta, that city, if meant here, would in all probability have been called. As Sychem was the very heart and seat of the Samaritan religion, and Mount Gerizim the cathedral church of that sect, it is more likely that it should be intended than any other. As the Samaritans received the same law with the Jews, as they also expected the Messiah, as Christ had preached to and converted many of that people, John iv, it was very reasonable that the earliest offers of salvation should be made to them, before any attempt was made to evangelize the Gentiles. The Samaritans, indeed, formed the connecting link between the Jews and the Gentiles; for they were a mongrel people, made up of both sorts, and holding both Jewish and pagan rites. See the account of them on Matt. x. 5.

6. The people with one accord gave heed. He had fixed their attention, not only with the gravity and importance of the matter of his preaching, but also by the miracles which he did.

they were all of a mind.

(5) The satisfaction they had in attending on Philip's preaching, and the success it had with many of them (v. 8): There was great joy in that city; for (v. 12) they believed Philip, and were baptized, both men and women. [1] Philip preached the things concerning the kingdom of God, and he preached the name of Jesus Christ, as king of that kingdom. [2] The people not only gave heed to what he said, but at length believed it, were fully convinced that it was of God and not of men. [3] When they believed they were baptized. Men only were capable of being admitted into the Jewish church, but, to show that in Jesus Christ there is neither male nor female, the initiating ordinance is such as women are capable of, for they are numbered with God's spiritual Israel. [4] This occasioned great joy. The bringing of the gospel to any place is just matter of joy, of great joy, to that place. The gospel of Christ does not make men melancholy, but fills them with joy; for it is glad tidings of great joy to all people, Luke ii. 10.

2. What there was at this city of Samaria that made the success of the gospel there more than ordinarily wonderful.

(1) Simon Magus had been busy there, and had gained a great interest among the people. To unlearn that which is bad proves many times a harder task than to learn that which is good. These Samaritans had of late been drawn to follow Simon, a conjurer (for so Magus signifies), who had strangely bewitched them.

[1] How strong the delusion of Satan. He had been for a long time, in this city, using sorceries. Simon assumed to himself that which was considerable: He gave out that he himself was some great one. He had no design to reform their lives, only to make them believe that he was some divine person. Pride, ambition, and an affectation of grandeur, have always been the cause of abundance of mischief both to the world and to the church. The people ascribed to him what he pleased. They all gave heed to him, from the least to the greatest. To him they had regard (v. 10, 11). They said of him, This man is the great power of God. See how ignorant inconsiderate people mistake that which is done by the power of Satan, as if it were done by the power of God. They were brought to it by his sorceries: He bewitched the people of Samaria (v. 9), bewitched them with sorceries (v. 11). By his magic arts he bewitched the minds of the people. Satan, by God's permission, filled their hearts to follow Simon. When they knew no better, they were influenced by his sorceries; but, when they were acquainted with Philip's real miracles, they saw plainly that the one was real and the other a sham. When they saw the difference between Simon and Philip, they quitted Simon.

[2] How strong the power of Divine grace is. By that grace working with the word those that had been led captive by Satan were brought into obedience to Christ. Let us not despair of the worst, when even those whom Simon Magus had bewitched were brought to believe.

(2) Here is another thing yet more wonderful (v. 13): Simon himself believed also. He was convinced that Philip preached a true doctrine, because he saw it confirmed by real miracles, of which he was the better able to judge because he was conscious to himself of the trick of his own pretended ones. The present conviction went so far that he was baptized. We have no reason to think that Philip did amiss in baptizing him. Prodigals, when they return, must be joyfully welcomed home, though we cannot be sure but that they will play the prodigal again. It is God's prerogative to know the heart. The church and its ministers must go by a judgment of charity. We must hope the best as long as we can. The present conviction lasted so long that he continued with Philip. He that had given out himself to be some great one is content to sit at the feet of a preacher of the gospel. Even bad men, very bad, may sometimes be in a good frame, very good. The present conviction was wrought and kept up by the miracles. Many wonder at the proofs of divine truths who never experience the power of them.

The twelve kept together at Jerusalem (v. 1), and thither these good tidings were brought them that Samaria had received the word of God (v. 14). The word of God was not only preached to them, but received by them. When they heard it, they sent unto them Peter and John. Two apostles were sent, the two most eminent, to Samaria, to encourage Philip and strengthen his hands. To carry on the good work that was begun.

9-13. used sorcery—magical arts. some great one . . . the great power of God—a sort of incarnation of divinity. To whom all gave heed . . . because of long time he had bewitched them—This, coupled with the rapidity with which they deserted him and attached themselves to Philip, shows the ripeness of Samaria for some religious change.

12. were baptized, both men and women—the detection of Simon's frauds helping to extend and deepen the effects of Philip's preaching. 13. 14-17. the apostles . . . sent Peter and John—showing that they regarded Peter as no more than their own equal.

7. For unclean spirits, crying with a loud voice, came out of many that were possessed. Hence it is evident that these unclean spirits were not a species of diseases, as they are here distinguished from the paralytic and the lame. There is nothing more certain than that the New Testament writers mean real diabolic possessions by the terms "unclean spirits," "devils," etc., which they use.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

This man Philip, then, was the center of the wonderful movement in the city of Samaria. Jews have no dealings with Samaritans, but Christians have, and Philip came to Samaria. There he proclaimed the Messiah. In the course of this passage two great words for preaching are used in describing the work of Philip. He proclaimed the Christ—and that is the Greek word kerusso, which means to proclaim as a herald. We find later that Philip preached the Gospel, and that is the Greek word euaggelizo, which indicates the proclamation of good news. The message concerning Christ, delivered through the deacon-evangelist Philip, arrested Samaria. In Samaria the Christian preacher found a new atmosphere and a new outlook. Moreover, Samaria was at the time under the spell of Simon the sorcerer. To Samaria, driven by persecution, there came, not an apostle, but a man set apart to serve tables, in order that the apostles might be set apart to preach the Word. He proclaimed Christ, and his preaching was accompanied by mental and physical signs. Unclean spirits were cast out and men were healed. The city was full of joy, resulting from these things; and in that attitude of amazement, of surprise, and of joy, they listened. This story of Philip is but an illustration of a much wider movement. The whole Church, driven by persecution, was proceeding in power.
—The Acts of the Apostles

9. And bewitched the people of Samaria, "Astonishing, amazing, or confounding" the judgment of the people, from existemi, to "remove out of a place or state, to be transported beyond oneself, to be out of one's wits."

10. This man is the great power of God. That is, he is invested with it and can command and use it. They certainly did not believe him to be God, but they thought him to be endued with a great supernatural power. There is a remarkable reading here in several MSS. which should not pass unnoticed. The passage reads thus, "This person is that power of God which is called the Great." This appears to be the true reading; but what the Samaritans meant by that power of God which they termed "the Great," we know not.

12. But when they believed Philip. So it is evident that Philip's word came with greater power than that of Simon, and that his miracles stood the test in such a way as the feats of Simon could not.

13. Simon himself believed also. He was struck with the doctrine and miracles of Philip—he saw that these were real; he knew his own to be fictitious. He believed therefore that Jesus was the Messiah, and was in consequence baptized. Continued with Philip, and wondered. He was as much "astonished" and "confounded" at the miracles of Philip as the people of Samaria were at his legerdemain.

14. The word of God. The doctrine of the Lord Jesus Christ. They sent unto them Peter and John. There was no individual ruler among the apostles—there was not even a president of the council; and Peter, far from being chief of the apostles, is one of those sent, with the same commission and authority as John, to confirm the Samaritans in the faith.

was as yet fallen upon none of them, in those extraordinary powers which were conveyed by the descent of the Spirit, only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, and in this they had joy and satisfaction (v. 8). Those that are indeed given up to Christ, and have experienced the sanctifying influences of the Spirit of grace, have great reason to be thankful, and no reason to complain, though they have not those gifts that are for ornament, and would make them bright. But it is intended that they should go on to the perfection of the present dispensation. The apostles prayed for them, v. 15. The Spirit is given, not to ourselves only (Luke xi. 13), but to others also, in answer to prayer. We may take encouragement from this example in praying to God to give the renewing graces of the Holy Ghost to those whose spiritual welfare we are concerned for—for our children, for our friends, for our ministers. They laid their hands on them. Upon the use of this sign they received the Holy Ghost. The laying on of hands was anciently used in blessing. Thus the apostles blessed these new converts.

II. How they discovered and discarded Simon Magus.

1. The wicked proposal that Simon made, by which his hypocrisy was discovered (v. 18, 19): When he saw that through laying on of the apostles' hands the Holy Ghost was given, it gave him a notion of Christianity as no other than an exalted piece of sorcery. He was ambitious to have the honour of an apostle, but not at all solicitous to have the spirit of a Christian. He was more desirous to gain honour to himself than to do good to others. He put a great affront upon the apostles, as if they were mercenary men, would do anything for money. He put a great affront upon Christianity, as if the miracles were done by magic arts. He showed that he aimed at the rewards of divination. He showed that he had a very high conceit of himself. No less a place will serve him than to be entrusted with a power which Philip himself had not, but the apostles only.

2. The just rejection of his proposal, v. 20–23.

(1) Peter shows him his crime (v. 20): Thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money. He had overvalued the wealth of this world, as if it would purchase the pardon of sin, the gift of the Holy Ghost, and eternal life. He had undervalued the gift of the Holy Ghost. He thought the power of an apostle might as well be had for a good fee as the advice of a physician or a lawyer.

(2) He shows him his character, which is inferred from his crime. Peter tells him plainly, [1] That his heart was not right in the sight of God, v. 21. We are as our hearts are; if they be not right, we are wrong; and they are open in the sight of God, who knows them, judges them, and judges of us by them. Our great concern is to approve ourselves to him in our integrity, for otherwise we cheat ourselves into our own ruin. He does not aim at the glory of God nor the honour of Christ in it, but to make a hand of it for himself. [2] That he is in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity: I perceive that thou art so, v. 23. This is plain dealing, and plain dealing is best when we are dealing about souls and eternity. I perceive it, saith Peter. The disguises of hypocrites many times are soon seen through; the nature of the wolf shows itself notwithstanding the cover of the sheep's clothing. Now the character here given of Simon is really the character of all wicked people. They are in the gall of bitterness. They are in the bond of iniquity—bound over to the judgment of God by the guilt of sin, and bound under the dominion of Satan by the power of sin.

(3) He reads him his doom in two things:

[1] He shall sink with his worldly wealth: Thy money perish with thee. Peter rejects his offer with the utmost disdain and indignation. "Away with thee and thy money too; we will have nothing to do with either." When we are tempted with money to do an evil thing, we should see what a perishing thing money is. He warns him of his danger of utter destruction if he continued in this mind: "Thy money will perish and thou wilt lose it. But this is not the worst of it: thou wilt perish with it, and it with thee."

[2] He shall come short of the spiritual blessings which he undervalued (v. 21): "Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter; thou hast nothing to do with the gifts of the Holy Ghost, for thy heart is not right in the sight of God, if thou thinkest that Christianity is a trade to live by in this world."

(4) He gives him good counsel, notwithstanding, v. 22. Though he was angry with him, yet he did not abandon him.

[1] What it is that he advises him to. He must repent—must see his error and retract it. His repentance must be particular: "Repent of this, own thyself guilty in this." He must not extenuate it

15, 16. prayed... they might receive the Holy Ghost. (For only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.)—As the baptism of adults presupposed "the renewing of the Holy Ghost" (Titus 3:5-7; I Cor. 12:13), of which the profession of faith had to be taken for evidence, this communication of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of the apostles' hands was clearly a superadded thing; and as it was only occasional, so it was invariably attended with miraculous manifestations (see ch. 10:44, where it followed Peter's preaching; and ch. 19:1-7, where, as here, it followed the laying on of hands). In the present case an important object was served by it—"the sudden appearance of a body of baptized disciples in Samaria, by the agency of one who was not an apostle, requiring the presence and power of apostles to perform their special part as the divinely appointed founders of the Church" [ALFORD]. Beautiful, too, was the spectacle exhibited of Jew and Samaritan, one in Christ. 18-24. offered them money—Hence the term simony, to denote trafficking in sacred things, but chiefly the purchase of ecclesiastical offices. 19. that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost—Spiritual ambition here shows itself the key to this wretched man's character.

23. in the gall of bitterness and... bond of iniquity—expressing both the awfulness of his condition and the captivity to it in which he was held.

20. Thy money perish with thee—i.e., 'Accursed be thou and thy money with thee.' It is the language of mingled horror and indignation, not unlike our Lord's rebuke of Peter himself (Matt. 16:23).

21. Thou hast neither part nor lot... thy heart is not right...—This is the fidelity of a minister of Christ to one deceiving himself in a very awful manner.

ADAM CLARKE

15. When they were come down. The very same mode of speaking, in reference to Jerusalem formerly, obtains now in reference to London. The metropolis in both cases is considered as the center; and all parts, in every direction, no matter how distant, or how situated, are represented as below the metropolis. Prayed for them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost. It seems evident, from this case, that even the most holy deacons, though full of the Holy Ghost themselves, could not confer this heavenly Gift on others. This was the prerogative of the apostles, and they were only instruments; but they were those alone by which the Lord chose to work. They prayed and laid their hands on the disciples, and God sent down the Gift; so the blessing came from God by the apostles, and not from the apostles to the people. But for what purpose was the Holy Spirit thus given? Certainly not for the sanctification of the souls of the people; this they had on believing in Christ Jesus, and this the apostles never dispensed. It was the miraculous gifts of the Spirit which were thus communicated.

17. Then laid they their hands on them. Probably only on some select persons, who were thought proper for public use in the church. They did not lay hands on all, for certainly no hands in this way were laid on Simon.

18. When Simon saw. By hearing these speak with different tongues and work miracles. He offered them money. Supposing that the dispensing of this Spirit belonged to them—that they could give it to whomsoever they pleased; and imagining that, as he saw them to be poor men, they would not object to taking money for their gift; and it is probable that he had gained considerably by his juggling, and therefore could afford to spare some, as he hoped to make it all up by the profit which he expected to derive from this new influence.

That the gift of God may be purchased. Peter takes care to inform not only Simon, but all to whom these presents may come, that the Spirit of God is the Gift of God alone, and consequently cannot be purchased with money.

23. The gall of bitterness. A Hebraism for "excessive bitterness." Gall, wormwood, and suchlike were used to express the dreadful effects of sin in the soul: the bitter repentance, bitter regret, bitter sufferings, bitter death which it produces. In Deut. xxix. 18, idolatry and its consequences are expressed by having among them "a root that beareth gall and wormwood." And in Heb. xii. 15, some grievous sin is intended when the apostle warns them, "lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you, and thereby many be defiled." Bond of iniquity. An allusion to the mode in which the Romans secured their prisoners, chaining the right hand of the prisoner to the left hand of the soldier who guarded him; as if the apostle had said, You are tied and bound by the chain of your sin; justice has laid hold upon you, and you have only a short respite before your execution, to see if you will repent.

20. Thy money perish with thee. This is an awful declaration, and imports thus much, that if he did not repent, he and his ill-gotten goods would perish together; his money should be dissipated and his soul go into perdition.

21. Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter. You have no part among the faithful and no lot in this ministry. That the word which we translate lot is to be understood as implying a "spiritual portion, office," see proved in the note on Num. xxvi. 55. Thy heart is not right. It is not through motives of purity, benevolence, or love to the souls of men that you desired to be enabled to confer the Holy Ghost; it is through pride, vainglory, and love of money. You would now give a little money that you might, by your new gift, gain much.

22. Repent therefore of this thy wickedness.

by calling it a mistake, or misguided zeal, but must aggravate it by calling it wickedness. Those that have said and done amiss must, as far as they can, unsay it and undo it again by repentance. He must pray that God would give him repentance, and pardon upon repentance. Penitents must pray, which implies a desire towards God, and a confidence in Christ. Simon Magus shall not be courted into the apostles' communion upon any other terms than those upon which other sinners are admitted—repentance and prayer.

[2] What encouragement he gives him to do this: If perhaps the thought of thy heart may be forgiven thee. There may be a great deal of wickedness in the thought of the heart, which must be repented of, or we are undone. The thought of the heart, though ever so wicked, shall be forgiven, upon our repentance. When Peter here puts a perhaps upon it, the doubt is of the sincerity of his repentance, not of his pardon if his repentance be sincere.

[3] Simon's request to them to pray for him, v. 24. Pray you to the Lord for me, that none of the things which you have spoken come upon me. First, Something well that he was affected with the reproof given him. This being so, he begged the prayers of the apostles for him. Secondly, Something wanting. He begged of them to pray for him, but did not pray for himself. His concern is more that the judgments he had made himself liable to might be prevented than that his heart, by divine grace, be made right in the sight of God.

Lastly, Here is the return of the apostles to Jerusalem, when they had finished the business they came about. There, in the city of Samaria, they were preachers: They testified the word of the Lord, confirmed what the other ministers preached. In their road home they were itinerant preachers; as they passed through many villages of the Samaritans they preached the gospel. God has a regard to the inhabitants of his villages in Israel, and so should we.

We have here the story of the conversion of an Ethiopian eunuch to the faith of Christ.

I. Philip the evangelist is directed into the road where he would meet with this Ethiopian, v. 26. 1. Direction given him by an angel what course to steer: Arise, and go towards the south. Doubtless there is a special providence of God conversant about the removes and settlements of ministers. He will direct those who sincerely desire to follow him into that way in which he will own them. Philip must go southward, to the way that leads from Jerusalem to Gaza, through the desert of Judah. He would never have thought of going thither, into a desert; small probability of finding work there! Yet thither he is sent. Sometimes God opens a door of opportunity to his ministers in places very unlikely. 2. His obedience to this direction (v. 27): He arose and went, without objecting.

II. An account is given of this eunuch (v. 27). He was a foreigner, a man of Ethiopia. The Ethiopians were looked upon as the meanest of the nations, blackamoors, as if nature had stigmatized them; yet the gospel is sent to them, and divine grace looks upon them. He was a person of quality, a great man in his own country, a eunuch—lord chamberlain or steward of the household. He was of great authority, and bore a mighty sway under Candace queen of the Ethiopians. He had charge of all her treasure; so great a trust did she repose in him. Not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but some are. He was a proselyte for he came to Jerusalem to worship. Some think that there were remains of the knowledge of the true God in this country, ever since the queen of Sheba's time.

III. Philip and the eunuch are brought together, and now Philip shall know the meaning of his being sent into a desert.

1. Philip is ordered to fall into company with this traveller. He had been at Jerusalem, where the apostles were preaching the Christian faith. The grace of God pursues him, overtakes him in the desert, and there overcomes him. Philip has this order by the Spirit whispering it in his ear (v. 29): "Go near, and join thyself to this chariot." We should study to do good to those we light in company with upon the road. We should not be so shy of all strangers as some effect to be. Of those of whom we know nothing else we know this, that they have souls.

2. He finds him reading in his Bible, as he sat in his chariot (v. 28): He ran to him, and heard him read, v. 30. He not only relieved the tediousness of the journey, but redeemed time by reading the scriptures, the book of Esaias. It is the duty of every one of us to converse much with the holy scriptures. Persons of quality should abound more than others in the 22. Repent . . . pray . . . if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven—this expression of doubt being designed to impress upon him the greatness of his sin, and the need of alarm on his part.

24. Pray ye to the Lord for me—Peter had urged him to pray for himself: he asks those wonder-working men to do it for him; having no confidence in the prayer of faith, but thinking that those men possessed some peculiar interest with heaven. that none of these things come upon me—not that the thought of his wicked heart might be forgiven him, but only that the evils threatened might be averted from him. While this throws great light on Peter's view of his melancholy case, it shows that Christianity, as something divine, still retained its hold of him. (Tradition represents him as turning out a great heresiarch, mingling Oriental or Grecian philosophy with some elements of Christianity.) 25. and they—Peter and John—when they had . . . preached—in the city where Philip's labors had been so richly blessed—returned . . . and preached . . . in many villages of the Samaritans—embracing the opportunity of their journey back to Jerusalem to fulfil their Lord's commission to the whole region of Samaria (ch. 1:8).

26-40. THE ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH. "With this narrative of the progress of the Gospel among the Samaritans is connected another which points to the diffusion of the doctrine of the Cross among the remotest nations. The simplicity of the chamberlain of Meroe forms a remarkable contrast with the craft of the magician just described" [OLSHAUSEN]. 26-28. the angel of the Lord—rather, 'an angel.' go . . . south, the way that goeth down from Jerusalem to Gaza—There was such a road, across Mount Hebron, which Philip might take without going to Jerusalem (as VON RAUMER'S Palæstina shows) which is desert—i.e., the way; not Gaza itself, which was the southernmost city of Palestine, in the territory of the ancient Philistines. To go from a city, where his hands had been full of work, so far away on a desert road, could not but be staggering to the faith of Philip, especially as he was kept in ignorance of the object of the journey. But like Paul, he "was not disobedient to the heavenly vision"; and like Abram, "he went out not knowing whither he went" (ch. 26:19; Heb. 11:8). 27. a man of Ethiopia—Upper Egypt, Meroe. an eunuch of great authority—Eunuchs were generally employed for confidential offices in the East, and to some extent are still. Candace—the family name of the queens of Upper Egypt, like Pharaoh, Cæsar, etc. (as appears from classic authors). had come to Jerusalem to worship—i.e., to keep the recent feast of Pentecost, as a Gentile proselyte to the Jewish faith. (See Isa. 56:3-8, and John 12:20). 28. Was returning—Having come so far, he not only stayed out the days of the festival, but prolonged his stay till now. It says much for his fidelity and value to his royal mistress that he had such liberty. But the faith in Jehovah and love of His worship and word, with which he was imbued, sufficiently explain this. and sitting in his chariot, read Esaias—Not contented with the statutory services in which he had joined, he beguiles the tedium of the journey homeward by reading the Scriptures. But this is not all; for as Philip "heard him read the prophet Esaias," he must have been reading aloud and not (as is customary still in the East) so as merely to be audible, but in a louder voice than he would naturally have used if intent on his own benefit only: evidently therefore he was reading to his charioteer. 29-31. the Spirit said—by an unmistakable voice within, as in ch. 10:19; 16:6, 7. go near and join this chariot—This would reveal to Philip the hitherto unknown object of his journey, and encourage him to expect something.

ADAM CLARKE

Peter did not suppose his case to be utterly hopeless, though his sin, considered in its motives and objects, was of the most heinous kind.

If perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee. His sin as yet existed only in thought and purpose; and therefore it is said, if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven.

24. Pray ye to the Lord for me. The words of Peter certainly made a deep impression on Simon's mind, and he must have had a high opinion of the apostle's sanctity and influence with God when he thus commended himself to their prayers.

26. Gaza, which is desert. "This is the desert" or "this is in the desert." Gaza was a town about two miles and a half from the seaside; it was the last town which a traveller passed through when he went from Phoenicia to Egypt, and was at the entrance into a wilderness. Schoettgen thinks that desert should be referred, not to Gaza, but to the way, and that it signifies a road that was less frequented. If there were two roads to Gaza from Jerusalem, as some have imagined, the eunuch might have chosen that which was desert, or less frequented, for the sake of privacy in his journeying religious exercises.

27. An eunuch. The term eunuch was given to persons in authority at court, to whom its literal meaning did not apply. Potiphar was probably a eunuch only as to his office, for he was a married man. See Gen. xxxvii. 36; xxxix. 1. And it is likely that this Ethiopian was of the same sort. Of great authority. Her treasurer, for it is here said, he had the charge of all her treasure. It does not appear, as some have imagined, that the Abyssinians were converted to the Christian faith by this eunuch, nor by any of the apostles, as there is strong historic evidence that they continued Jews and pagans for more than three hundred years after the Christian era. Their conversion is with great probability attributed to Frumentius, sent to Abyssinia for that purpose by Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, about A.D 330.

28. Sitting in his chariot, read Esaias the prophet. He had gone to Jerusalem to worship; he had profited by his religious exercises; and even in traveling he is improving his time. God sees his simplicity and earnestness and provides him an instructor who should lead him into the great truths of the gospel, which without such a one he could not have understood. Many, after having done their duty, as they call it, in attending a place of worship, forget the errand that brought them thither, and spend their time, on their return, rather in idle conversation than in reading or conversing about the Word of God. It is no wonder that such should be always learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.

29. Then the Spirit said unto Philip. This holy man having obeyed the first direction he received from God, and gone southward without knowing the reason why, it was requisite that he should now be informed of the object of his mission. The Spirit said unto him, Go near, and join thyself. The angel who had given him the first direction had departed, and the influence of the Holy Spirit now completed the information. It is likely that what the Spirit did in this case was by a strong impression on his mind, which left him no doubt of its being from God.

30. Heard him read the prophet Esias. The exercises of piety, because their example will influence many. It is wisdom for men of business to redeem time for holy duties; to fill up every minute with something that will turn to a good account. Those that are diligent in searching the scriptures are in a fair way to improve in knowledge.

3. He puts a fair question to him: Understandest thou what thou readest? What we read and hear of the word of God we should often ask ourselves whether we understand it or no. We cannot profit by the scriptures unless we do in some measure understand them.

4. The eunuch in a sense of his need of assistance, desires Philip's company (v. 31): "How can I understand, says he, except someone guide me?" He speaks as one that had very low thoughts of his own capacity. He takes the question kindly, How can I? Those that would learn must see their need to be taught. He speaks as one very desirous to be taught, to have someone to guide him. Though there are many things in the scriptures which are dark and hard to be understood, yet we must not therefore throw them by, but study them for the sake of those things that are easy. Knowledge and grace grow gradually. He invited Philip to come up and sit with him. In order to our right understanding of the scripture, it is requisite we should have someone to guide us; some good books, and some good men, but, above all, the Spirit of grace, to lead us into all truth.

IV. The portion of scripture which the eunuch recited, with some hints of Philip's discourse upon it.

1. The chapter he was reading was the fifty-third of Isaiah, two verses of which are here quoted (v. 32, 33). They are set down according to the Septuagint version, which in some things differs from the original Hebrew. The greatest variation from the Hebrew is that what in the original is, He was taken from prison and from judgment, is here read, In his humiliation his judgment was taken away. He appeared so mean and despicable in their eyes that they denied him common justice. They declared him innocent, and yet condemned him to die. He is down, and down with him. Thus in his humiliation his judgment was taken away. So that these verses foretold concerning the Messiah, (1) That he should die, should be led to the slaughter, as sheep that were offered in sacrifice. (2) That he should die wrongfully, should be hurried out of his life, and his judgment shall be taken away. (3) That he should die patiently. Like a lamb dumb before the shearer, nay, and before the butcher too, so he opened not his mouth. Never was there such an example of patience as our Lord Jesus. When he was accused, when he was abused, he was silent. (4) That yet he should live for ever, to ages which cannot be numbered; for so I understand those words, Who shall declare his generation? His life is taken only from the earth; in heaven he shall live to endless and innumerable ages.

2. The eunuch's question upon this is, Of whom speaketh the prophet this? v. 34. It is a material question he asks, and a very sensible one: "Does the prophet speak this of himself, in expectation of being used, being misused, as the other prophets were, or does he speak it of some other man?" He proposed this question, to draw on discourse with Philip. The way to receive good instructions is to ask good questions.

3. Philip takes this fair occasion given him to open to him the great mystery of the gospel concerning Jesus Christ, and him crucified. He began at this scripture, and preached unto him Jesus, v. 35. This is all the account given us of Philip's sermon. And here we have an instance of speaking of the things of God, and speaking of them to good purpose, not only as we sit in the house, but as we walk by the way.

V. The eunuch is baptized in the name of Christ, v. 36–38.

1. The modest proposal which the eunuch made of himself for baptism (v. 36): As they went on their way they came unto a certain water, the sight of which made the eunuch think of being baptized. Thus God, by hints of providence which seem casual, sometimes puts his people in mind of their duty, of which otherwise perhaps they would not have thought. The eunuch knew not how little a while Philip might be with him, and therefore, if Philip think fit, he will take the present convenience which offers itself of being baptized: "See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptized?" He does not demand baptism, does not say, "Here is water and here I am resolved I will be baptized." But he does desire it, and, unless Philip can show cause why not, he desires it now. In the solemn dedicating and devoting of ourselves to God, it is good to make haste, and not to delay; for the present time is the best time. The eunuch feared lest the good affections now working in him should cool and abate, and therefore was willing

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

30. Understandest thou what thou readest?—To one so engaged this would be deemed no rude question, while the eager appearance of the speaker, and the question itself, would indicate a readiness to supply any want of insight that might be felt.

31. How can I, except some man guide me?—Beautiful expression at once of humility and docility; the invitation to Philip which immediately followed, to "come up and sit with him," being but the natural expression of this.

32, 33. The place . . . was this, He was led as a sheep . . .—One cannot but wonder that this, of all predictions of Messiah's sufferings in the Old Testament the most striking, should have been that which the eunuch was reading before Philip joined him. He could hardly miss to have heard at Jerusalem of the sufferings and death of Jesus, and of the existence of a continually increasing party who acknowledged Him to be the Messiah. But his question to Philip, whether the prophet in this passage meant himself or some other man, clearly shows that he had not the least idea of any connection between this prediction and those facts. 34-38. And the eunuch answered, I pray thee . . .—The respect with which he here addresses Philip was prompted by his reverence for one whom he perceived to be his superior in divine things; his own worldly position sinking before this.

35. Then Philip opened his mouth—(See on Matt. 5:2). began at the same scripture—founding on it as his text. preached unto him Jesus—showing Him to be the glorious Burden of this wonderful prediction, and interpreting it in the light of the facts of His history.

See, here is water—more simply, 'Behold water!' as if already his mind filled with light and his soul set free, he was eagerly looking out for the first water in which he might seal his reception of the truth and be enrolled among the visible disciples of the Lord Jesus. what doth hinder me to be baptized?—Philip had probably told him that this was the ordained sign and seal of discipleship, but the eunuch's question was likely the first proposal of its application in this case. (Verse 37 is wanting in the principal MSS.

eunuch, it seems, was reading aloud, and apparently in Greek, for that was the common language in Egypt; and, indeed, almost in every place it was understood. And it appears that it was the Greek version or the Septuagint that he was reading, as the quotation below is from that version.

32. The place of the scripture. The "section" or "paragraph."

33. In his humiliation his judgment was taken away. He who was the Fountain of judgment and justice had no justice shown Him in his humiliation, viz., that time in which He emptied himself and appeared in the form of a servant. Who shall declare his generation? Answering to the Hebrew doro, which Bishop Lowth understands as implying his "manner of life." It was the custom among the Jews, when they were taking away any criminal from judgment to execution, to call out and inquire whether there was any person who could appear in behalf of the character of the criminal—whether there was any who, from intimate acquaintance with his manner of life, could say anything in his favor? In our Lord's case, this benevolent inquiry does not appear to have been made; and perhaps to this breach of justice, as well as of custom, the prophet refers.

35. Began at the same scripture. He did not confine himself to this one scripture, but made this his text and showed, from the general tenor of the sacred writings, that Jesus was the Christ, or Messiah; and that in His person, birth, life, doctrine, miracles, passion, death, and resurrection the scriptures of the Old Testament were fulfilled. This preaching had the desired effect, for the eunuch was convinced of the truth of Philip's doctrine and desired to be baptized in the name of Jesus.

36. See, here is water. He was not willing to omit the first opportunity that presented itself of his taking upon himself the profession of the gospel. By this we may see that Philip had explained the whole of the Christian faith to him, and the way by which believers were brought into the Christian Church.

immediately to bind his soul unto the Lord.

2. The fair declaration which Philip made him (v. 37): "If thou believest with all thy heart, thou mayest." He must believe with all his heart, for with the heart man believeth, not with the head only, by an assent to gospel truth in the understanding; but with the heart, by a consent of the will to gospel terms. "If thou do indeed believe with all thy heart, thou art by that united to Christ, and thou mayest by baptism be joined to the church."

3. The confession of faith which the eunuch made. It is very short, but it is comprehensive and much to the purpose: I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God. He was before a worshipper of the true God, so that all he had to do now was to receive Christ Jesus the Lord. He believes that Jesus is the Christ, the true Messiah promised. That Christ is Jesus—a Saviour, the only Saviour of his people from their sins. That this Jesus Christ is the Son of God, that he has a divine nature, as the Son is of the same nature with the Father.

4. The baptizing of him hereupon. The eunuch commanded the chariot to stand still. It was the best waiting place he ever met with in any of his journeys. They went down both into the water. Going barefoot according to the custom, they went perhaps up to the ankles or mid-leg into the water, and Philip sprinkled water upon him. Though Philip had very lately been deceived in Simon Magus, yet he did not therefore scruple to baptize the eunuch upon his profession of faith immediately. If some hypocrites crowd into the church, who afterwards prove a grief and scandal to us, yet we must not therefore make the door of admission any straiter than Christ has made it; they shall answer for their apostasy, and not we.

VI. Philip and the eunuch are separated presently; and this is as surprising as the other parts of the story. As soon as they had come up out of the water the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip (v. 39). The working of this miracle upon Philip was a confirmation of his doctrine, as much as the working of a miracle by him would have been. He was caught away, and the eunuch saw him no more, but, having lost his minister, returned to the use of his Bible again.

1. How the eunuch was disposed: He went on his way rejoicing. Business called him home, and he must hasten to it; for it was no way inconsistent with his Christianity, which is a religion which men may and ought to carry about with them into the affairs of this life. But he went on rejoicing. He was never better pleased in all his life. He rejoiced, (1) That he himself was joined to Christ. (2) That he had these good things to bring to his countrymen, and a prospect of bringing them also into fellowship with Christ.

2. How Philip was disposed of (v. 40): He was found at Azotus or Ashdod. But Philip, wherever he was, would not be idle. Passing through, he preached in all the cities, till he came to Cæsarea, and there he settled. At Cæsarea we find him in a house of his own, ch. xxi. 8. He that had been faithful in working for Christ as an itinerant at length gains a settlement.

and most venerable versions of the New Testament. It seems to have been added from the formularies for baptism which came into current use).

they went down both into the water, and he baptized him . . .—probably laving the water upon him, though the precise mode is neither certain nor of any consequence. 39, 40. the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip—To deny [as MEYER, OLSHAUSEN, BLOOMFIELD] the miraculous nature of Philip's disappearance, is vain. It stands out on the face of the words, as just a repetition of what we read of the ancient prophets, in I Kings 18:12; II Kings 2:16. And the same word (as BENGEL remarks) is employed to express a similar idea in II Corinthians 12:2, 4; I Thessalonians 4:17. the eunuch saw him no more—nor, perhaps, for very joy, cared to see him [BENGEL]. and he went on his way rejoicing—He had found Christ, and the key to the Scriptures; his soul was set free, and his discipleship sealed; he had lost his teacher, but gained what was infinitely better: He felt himself a new man, and "his joy was full." Tradition says he was the first preacher of the Gospel in Ethiopia; and how, indeed, could he choose but "tell what the Lord had done for his soul"? Yet there is no certainty as to any historical connection between his labors and the introduction of Christianity into that country. 40. Philip was found—i.e., 'found himself,' 'made his appearance:' an expression confirming the miraculous manner of his transportation. at Azotus—the ancient Ashdod. preached in all the cities—along the coast, proceeding northward. till he came to Cæsarea—fifty-five miles northwest of Jerusalem, on the Mediterranean, just south of Mount Carmel; and so named by Herod, who rebuilt it, in honor of Cæsar Augustus. Henceforth we lose sight of zealous and honored Philip, as by and by we shall lose sight even of Peter. As the chariot of the Gospel rolls on, other agents are raised up, each suited to his work. But "he that soweth and he that reapeth shall rejoice together." (See on John 4:31-38).

ADAM CLARKE

37. I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God. This whole verse is omitted by several MSS.; almost all the critics declare against it as spurious.

38. And they went down. They "alighted from the chariot into the water." While Philip was instructing him and he professed his faith in Christ, he probably plunged himself under the water, as this was the plan which appears to have been generally followed among the Jews in their baptisms; but the person who had received his confession of faith was he to whom the baptism was attributed, as it was administered by his authority.

39. The Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip. Perhaps this means no more than that the Holy Spirit suggested to the mind of Philip that he should withdraw abruptly from the eunuch and thus leave him to pursue his journey, reflecting on the important incidents which had taken place.

40. Philip was found at Azotus. From the time he left the eunuch he was not heard of till he got to Azotus, which, according to Dr. Lightfoot, was about thirty-four miles from Gaza, and probably it was near Gaza that Philip met the eunuch. The Azotus of the New Testament is the Ashdod of the Old. It was given by Joshua to the tribe of Judah, Josh. xv. 47. It was one of the five lordships which belonged to the Philistines, and is a seaport town on the Mediterranean Sea, between Gaza on the south, and Joppa or Jaffa on the north. Preached in all the cities, till he came to Caesarea. This was Caesarea in Palestine, formerly called Strato's Tower, built by Herod the Great in honor of Augustus. There was an excellent harbor here made by Herod; and after the destruction of Jerusalem, it became the capital of the whole land of Judea. It must be always distinguished from Caesarea Philippi, which was an inland town not far from the springs of Jordan. Whenever the word Caesarea occurs without Philippi, the former is intended. As Philip preached in all the cities of Palestine till he came to Caesarea, he must have preached in the different cities of the Philistine country, Ashdod, Akkaron, and Jamnia. It appears, from chap. xxi. 8, that Philip settled at Caesarea, where he had a house and family, four of his unmarried daughters being prophetesses.

We found mention made of Saul twice or thrice in the story of Stephen. His name in Hebrew was Saul—desired; his Roman name was Paul—little. He was born in Tarsus, a city of Cilicia, a free city of the Romans, and himself a freeman of that city. His father and mother were both native Jews, therefore he calls himself a Hebrew of the Hebrews; he was of the tribe of Benjamin. His education was in the schools of Tarsus first, which was a little Athens for learning. Thence he was sent to Jerusalem, to study divinity and the Jewish law. His tutor was Gamaliel. He had extraordinary natural parts. He had likewise a handicraft trade (being bred to tent-making), which was common with those among the Jews who were bred scholars.

I. How bad he was, how very bad, before his conversion; just before he was an inveterate enemy to Christianity. In other respects he was well enough, as touching the righteousness which is of the law, blameless, a man of no ill morals, but a persecutor of Christians. And so ill informed was his conscience that he thought that he did God service in it.

1. His general enmity and rage against the Christian religion (v. 1): He yet breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord. The persons persecuted were the disciples of the Lord; under that character he hated and persecuted them. The matter

Vss. 1-25. CONVERSION OF SAUL, AND BEGINNINGS OF HIS MINISTRY. 1. Saul, yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord . . .—The emphatic "yet" is intended to note the remarkable fact, that up to this moment his blind persecuting rage against the disciples of the Lord burned as fiercely as ever. (In the teeth of this, NEANDER and OLSHAUSEN picture him deeply impressed with Stephen's joyful faith, remembering passages of the Old Testament confirmatory of the Messiahship of Jesus, and experiencing such a violent struggle as would inwardly prepare the way for the designs of God towards him. Is not dislike, if not unconscious disbelief, of sudden conversion at the bottom of this?) The word "slaughter" here points to cruelties not yet recorded, but the particulars of which are supplied by himself nearly thirty years afterwards: "And I persecuted this way unto the death" (ch. 22:4); "and when they were put to death, I gave my voice [vote] against them. And I punished them oft in every synagogue, and compelled them to [did my utmost to make them] blaspheme; and being exceedingly mad against them, I persecuted them even unto strange [foreign] cities" (ch. 26:10, 11). All this was before his present journey.

CHAPTER 9

1. Saul, yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter. The original text is very emphatic and points out how determinate Saul was to pursue and accomplish his fell purpose of totally destroying the infant Church of Christ. The mode of speech introduced above is very frequent in the Greek writers, who often express any vehement and hostile affection of the mind by the verb pneein, to "breathe," to "pant"; so Theocritus, Idyll. xxii, v. 82: "They came into the assembly, breathing mutual slaughter." Euripides has the same form, breathing out fire, and slaughter (Iphig. in Taur.).

MATTHEW HENRY

of the persecution was threatenings and slaughter. There is persecution in threatenings, they terrify and break the spirit. His breathing out threatenings and slaughter intimates that it was natural to him. His very breath, like that of some venomous creatures, was pestilential. He breathed death to the Christians, wherever he came.

2. His particular design upon the Christians at Damascus. Saul cannot be easy if he knows a Christian is quiet; and therefore, hearing that the Christians in Damascus were so, he resolves to give them disturbance. He applies to the high priest for a commission (v. 1) to go to Damascus, v. 2. The high priest needed not to be stirred up to persecute the Christians, but it seems the young persecutor drove more furiously than the old one. The proselytes which the scribes and Pharisees make often prove seven times more the children of hell than themselves. Now the commission was to empower him to enquire among the synagogues at Damascus, whether there were any that inclined to favour this heresy, that believed in Christ; and if he found any such, whether men or women, to bring them up prisoners to Jerusalem. The Christians are here said to be those of this way. Perhaps the Christians sometimes called themselves so, from Christ the Way. The high priest and sanhedrim had a deference paid to their authority in matters of religion, by all their synagogues. Even the weaker sex, who might deserve excuse, or at least compassion, shall find neither with Saul. He was ordered to bring them all bound to Jerusalem as criminals. Thus was Saul employed when the grace of God wrought that great change in him. Let not us then despair of renewing grace for the conversion of the greatest sinners, nor let such despair of the pardoning mercy of God for the greatest sin; for Paul himself obtained mercy.

II. How suddenly and strangely a blessed change was wrought in him.

1. The place and time of it: As he journeyed, he came near to Damascus; and there Christ met with him.

(1) He was in the way, travelling upon his journey. The work of conversion is not tied to the church. Some are reclaimed in travelling upon the road alone. There the Spirit may set in with us, for that wind blows where it listeth.

(2) He was near Damascus, almost at his journey's end. He who was to be the apostle of the Gentiles was converted to the faith of Christ in a Gentile country.

(3) He was in a wicked way, pursuing his design against the Christians at Damascus. Sometimes the grace of God works upon sinners when they are at the worst, which is much for the glory both of God's pity and of his power.

(4) The cruel edict and decree drew near to be put in execution; and now it was happily prevented. [1] A great kindness to the poor saints at Damascus, who had notice of his coming, as appears by what Ananias said (v. 13, 14). Christ has many ways of delivering the godly out of temptation, and sometimes does it by a change wrought in their persecutors. [2] It was also a very great mercy to Saul himself. It is to be valued as a signal token of the divine favour if God prevent us from prosecuting and executing a sinful purpose.

2. The appearance of Christ to him in his glory. Here it is only said that there shone round about him a light from heaven; but it appears from what follows (v. 17) that the Lord Jesus was in this light. This light shone upon him suddenly. Christ's manifestations of himself to poor souls are many times sudden and very surprising, and he anticipates them with the blessings of his goodness. It was a light from heaven. It was a light above the brightness of the sun (ch. xxvi. 13), for it was visible at midday. It shone round about him, not in his face only, but on every side of him. The devil comes to the soul in darkness; by this he gets and keeps possession of it. But Christ comes to the soul in light, for he is himself the light of the world. The first thing in this new creation, is in that of the world, is light.

3. The arresting of Saul: He fell to the earth, v. 4. It appears (ch. xxvi. 14) that all that were with him fell to the earth as well as he, but the design was upon him. The effect of Christ's appearing to him, and of the light which shone round about him. Christ's manifestations of himself to poor souls are humbling; they lay them very low. A step towards this intended advancement. Those whom Christ designs for the greatest honours are commonly first laid low. Those whom God will employ are first struck with a sense of their unworthiness to be employed.

4. The arraigning of Saul. He heard a voice saying to him (and it was distinguishing, to him only, for though those that were with him heard a sound (v. 7)

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

2. desired . . . letters—of authorization. to Damascus—the capital of Syria and the great highway between eastern and western Asia, about 130 miles northeast of Jerusalem; the most ancient city perhaps in the world, and lying in the center of a verdant and inexhaustible paradise. It abounded (as appears from JOSEPHUS, Wars, II. 20, 2) with Jews, and with Gentile proselytes to the Jewish faith. Thither the Gospel had penetrated; and Saul, flushed with past successes, undertakes to crush it out. that if he found any of this way, whether men or women—Thrice are women specified as objects of his cruelty, as an aggravated feature of it (ch. 8:3; 22:4; and here).

3. he came near Damascus—so ch. 22:6. Tradition points to a bridge near the city as the spot referred to. Events which are the turning points in one's history so imprint themselves upon the memory that circumstances the most trifling in themselves acquire by connection with them something of their importance, and are recalled with inexpressible interest.

suddenly—At what time of day, it is not said; for artless simplicity reigns here. But he himself emphatically states, in one of his narratives, that it was "about noon" (ch. 22:6), and in the other, "at midday" (ch. 26:13), when there could be no deception. there shined round about him a light from heaven—"a great light" (he himself says) "above the brightness of the sun," then shining in its full strength.

4-6. he fell to the earth—and his companions with him (ch. 26:14), who "saw the light" (ch. 22:9).

ADAM CLARKE

Luke, who was master of the Greek tongue, chose such terms as best expressed a heart desperately and incessantly bent on accomplishing the destruction of the objects of its resentment. Such at this time was the heart of Saul of Tarsus; and it had already given full proof of its malignity, not only in the martyrdom of Stephen, but also in making havoc of the Church, and in forcibly entering every house, and dragging men and women whom he suspected of Christianity, and committing them to prison. See chap. viii. 3. Went unto the high priest. As the high priest was chief in all matters of an ecclesiastical nature, and the present business was pretendedly religious, he was the proper person to apply to for letters by which this virulent persecutor might be accredited. The letters must necessarily be granted in the name of the whole Sanhedrin, but the high priest was the proper organ through whom this business might be negotiated.

2. Letters to Damascus to the synagogues. Damascus, anciently called Damask, was once the metropolis of all Syria. It was situated at fifty miles' distance from the sea, from which it is separated by lofty mountains. It is washed by two rivers, Amara or Abara, which ran through it, and Pharpar, called by the Greeks the golden stream, which ran on the outside of its walls. It is one of the most ancient cities in the world, for it existed in the time of Abraham, Gen. xiv. 15, and how long before is not known. The city of Damascus is at present a place of considerable trade, owing to its being the rendezvous for all the pilgrims from the north of Asia on their road to and from the temple of Mecca. It is surrounded with pretty strong walls, which have nine gates, and is between four and five miles in circumference. In the time of Paul it was governed by Aretas, whose father, Obodas, had been governor of it under Augustus. Damascus is 112 miles south of Antioch, 130 N.N.E. of Jerusalem. The silks and linens, known by the name of "damasks," were probably first manufactured by the inhabitants of this ancient city. Any of this way. That is, this "religion," for so derec in Hebrew and hodos in Hellenistic Greek are often to be understood. Derec Yehovah, the way of the Lord, implies the whole of the worship due to Him and prescibed by himself; the way or path in which He wills men to walk, that they may get safely through life and finally attain everlasting felicity. Whether they were men or women. Provided they were Jews, for no converts had as yet been made among the Gentiles, nor did the power of the high priest and Sanhedrin extend to any but those who belonged to the synagogues. In every country where there were Jews and synagogues, the power and authority of the Sanhedrin and high priest were acknowledged, just as papists in all countries acknowledge the authority of the pope.

4. And he fell to the earth. Being struck down with the lightning. Many persons suppose he was on horseback, and painters thus represent him; but this is utterly without foundation. Painters are in almost every case wretched commentators.

yet they knew not the words, ch. xxii. 9), Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?

(1) Saul not only saw a light from heaven, but heard a voice from heaven. God's manifestations of himself were never dumb shows, for he magnifies his word above all his name, and what was seen was always designed to make way for what was said. Saul heard a voice. Faith comes by hearing. The voice he heard was the voice of Christ. The word we hear is likely to profit us when we hear it as the voice of Christ; no voice but his can reach the heart.

(2) What he heard was very awakening.

[1] He was called by his name, and that doubled: Saul, Saul. His calling him by name brought the conviction home to his conscience, and put it past dispute to whom the voice spoke this. What God speaks in general is then likely to do us good when we insert our own names into the precepts and promises, as if God spoke to us by name. The doubling of it, Saul, Saul, intimates the tender concern that the blessed Jesus had for him, and for his recovery. He speaks as one in earnest. He speaks to him as to one in imminent danger, at the pit's brink, and just ready to drop in.

[2] The charge exhibited against him is, Why persecutest thou me? Before Saul was made a saint, he was made to see himself a sinner. Now he was made to see that evil in himself which he never saw before. A humbling conviction of sin is the first step towards a saving conversion from sin. He is convinced of one particular sin, which he had justified himself in. The sin he is convinced of is persecution: Why persecutest thou me? It is a very affectionate expostulation. 1. The person sinning: "It is thou; thou that hast good parts and accomplishments, hast the knowledge of the scriptures, which, if duly considered, would show thee the folly of it. It is worse in thee than in another." 2. The person sinned against: "It is I, who was not long since crucified for thee; must I afresh be crucified by thee?" 3. The kind and continuance of the sin. It was persecution, and he was at this time engaged in it. Those that are designing mischief are, in God's account, doing mischief. 4. The question put to him upon it: "Why dost thou do it?" (1) It is complaining language. Christ never complained so much of those who persecuted him in his own person as he did here of those who persecuted him in his followers. The sins of sinners are a very grievous burden to the Lord Jesus. (2) It is convincing language: "Why dost thou thus?" It is good for us often to ask ourselves why we do so and so, that we may discern what an unreasonable thing sin is. Why persecutest thou me? He thought he was persecuting only a company of poor, weak, silly people, little imagining that it was one in heaven that he was all this while insulting. Those who persecute the saints persecute Christ himself, and he takes what is done against them as done against himself.

5. Saul's question upon his indictment, and the reply to it, v. 5.

(1) He makes enquiry concerning Christ: Who art thou, Lord? He gives no direct answer to the charge preferred against him, being convicted by his own conscience. If God contend with us for our sins, we are not able to answer for one of a thousand. Convictions of sin, when they are set home with power upon the conscience, will silence all excuses and self-justifications. But he desires to know who is his judge. He who had been a blasphemer of Christ's name now speaks to him as his Lord. The question is proper: Who art thou? This implies his present unacquaintedness with Christ. He desired to be acquainted with him and therefore, Lord, who art thou? There is some hope of people when they begin to enquire after Jesus Christ.

(2) He has an answer immediately. Christ's gracious revelation of himself to him. I am Jesus whom thou persecutest. The name of Jesus was not unknown to him, and gladly would he bury it in oblivion. Little did he think to hear it from heaven. He said, I am Jesus, a Saviour; I am Jesus of Nazareth, so it is, ch. xxii. 8. Saul used to call him so when he blasphemed him. "I am that Jesus whom thou persecutest." There is nothing more effectual to awaken and humble the soul than to see sin to be against Christ. His gentle reproof of him: It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks, or goads. Those kick at the goad that stifle and smother the convictions of conscience. Those that revolt more and more when they are stricken by the word or rod of God, kick against the pricks.

6. His surrender of himself to the Lord Jesus at length, v. 6.

(1) The frame and temper he was in when Christ had been dealing with him. He trembled. Strong convictions, set home by the blessed Spirit, will make and heard a voice saying unto him—"in the Hebrew tongue" (ch. 26:14)—Saul, Saul—a reduplication full of tenderness [DE WETTE]. Though his name was soon changed into "Paul," we find him, in both his own narratives of the scene, after the lapse of so many years, retaining the original form, as not daring to alter, in the smallest detail, the overpowering words addressed to him.

why persecutest thou me?—No language can express the affecting character of this question, addressed from the right hand of the Majesty on high to an infuriated, persecuting mortal. (See Matthew 25:45, and that whole judgment scene.)

5. Who art thou, Lord?—"Jesus knew Saul ere Saul knew Jesus" [BENGEL]. The term "Lord" here is an indefinite term of respect for some unknown but august speaker. That Saul saw as well as heard this glorious Speaker, is expressly said by Ananias (vs. 17; 22:14), by Barnabas (ch. 9:27), and by himself (ch. 26:16); and in claiming apostleship, he explicitly states that he had "seen the Lord" (I Cor. 9:1; 15:8), which can refer only to this scene.

I am Jesus whom thou persecutest—The "I" and "thou" here are touchingly emphatic in the original; while the term "JESUS" is purposely chosen, to convey to him the thrilling information that the hated name which he sought to hunt down—"the Nazarene," as it is in ch. 22:8—was now speaking to him from the skies, "crowned with glory and honor" (see ch. 26:9). It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks.

ADAM CLARKE

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

The first phase in the apprehension of Saul was that of a great light shining round about him out of heaven, above the brightness of the sun. It was a moment fraught with tremendous issues in the whole program of Christ in the world. Then came the inquiry. A voice spoke, not in the Greek, but in the Hebrew tongue: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" It was a voice out of heaven, out of the light, asking him, a man on the earth, why he persecuted the One who spoke. What a strange thing, what a startling thing! "Who art thou, Lord?" cried the astonished Saul. Oh, the revolution, the convulsion, the upheaval in the soul of Saul. Then came the most arresting thing. The voice replied: "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest." Then there broke upon his consciousness, dimly and indistinctly, more perfectly apprehended in after days, the great truth that Christ and the Church were one. How Paul wrought out this truth in those great letters afterward, as he insisted upon this unity of the living Lord with His people. It is as though Christ had said to him, "Those men and women whom you have haled to prison have suffered; but it is I who have suffered in their suffering, Saul. The brutal stones that you saw hurled upon Stephen, cutting into his flesh, and giving him physical pain, reached Me, hurt Me. I felt every throb of Stephen's pain."

But there was another meaning in the words. "Why persecutest thou me?" "I am above thee in the heavens; thou canst not undo My work; that against which thou art fighting is not the fanaticism of a mistaken fanatic; it is the march of God through human history." "Why persecutest thou me?" In that moment, nebulously as yet, not perfectly apprehended, the truth was breaking upon the mind of this man, and by implication, ere he knew it, he had yielded himself to the One who had spoken out of the eternal light, and who had addressed him by name. "Who art thou, Lord?" That use of the word Lord revealed a fine recognition of a trained mind, in the presence of such a manifestation of supremacy.—The Acts of the Apostles

5. Who art thou, Lord? "Who art thou, Sir?" He had no knowledge who it was that addressed him, and would only use the term Kyries, as any Roman or Greek would, merely as a term of civil respect. I am Jesus whom thou persecutest. "Your enmity is against Me and My religion; and the injuries which you do to My followers I consider as done to myself." The following words, making twenty in the original, and thirty in our version, are found in no Greek MS. The words are, "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks. And he trembling and astonished said, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? And the Lord said unto him." It is not very easy to account for such a large addition, which is not only not found in any Greek MS. yet discovered, but is wanting in the Itala, Erpen's Arabic, the Syriac, Coptic, Sahidic, and most of the Slavonian. It is found in the Vulgate; and was probably borrowed from chap. xxvi. 14, and some marginal notes. It is hard for thee. This is a proverbial expression, which exists, not only in substance, but even in so many words, both in the Greek and Latin writers. Kentron signifies an ox goad, a piece of pointed iron stuck in the end of a stick, with which the ox is urged on when drawing the plough. The origin of the proverb seems to have been this: Sometimes it happens that a restive stubborn ox kicks back against the goad and thus wounds himself more deeply; hence it has become a proverb to signify the fruitlessness and absurdity of rebelling against lawful authority, and the getting into greater difficulties by endeavoring to avoid trifling sufferings.

an awakened soul to tremble. He was astonished, as one brought into a new world, that knew not where he was.

(2) His address to Jesus Christ: Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? This may be taken, [1] As a serious request for Christ's teachings. "Thou hast discovered sin to me, discover to me the way to pardon and peace." A serious desire to be instructed by Christ in the way of salvation is an evidence of a good work begun in the soul. Or, [2] As a sincere resignation of himself to the direction and government of the Lord Jesus. This was the first word that grace spoke in Paul, and with this began a spiritual life. What wilt thou have me to do? The great change in conversion is wrought upon the will, and consists in the resignation of that to the will of Christ.

(3) The general direction Christ gave him: Arise, go into the city of Damascus, and it shall be told thee what thou must do. It is encouragement enough to have further instruction promised him, but, [1] He must not have it yet. Let him consider awhile what he had done in persecuting Christ, and be deeply humbled for that, and then he shall be told what he has further to do. [2] He must not have it in this way, by a voice from heaven, for it is plain that he cannot bear it. He shall be told therefore what he must do by a man like himself. Christ manifests himself to his people by degrees.

7. How far his fellow travellers were affected with this. They stood speechless, as men in confusion, and that was all, v. 7. We do not find that any of them were converted, though they saw the light, and were struck dumb by it. No external means will of themselves work a change in the soul, without the Spirit and grace of God. None of them said, Who art thou, Lord? or, What wilt thou have me to do? as Paul did. They heard a voice, but saw no man; they heard Paul speak, but saw not him to whom he spoke, nor heard distinctly what was said to him. Thus those who came hither to be the instruments of Paul's rage against the church serve for witnesses of the power of God over him.

8. What condition Saul was in after this, v. 8, 9. He arose from the earth, when Christ commanded him. When his eyes were opened he saw no man. It was not so much this glaring light, but it was a sight of Christ, that had this effect upon him. Thus a believing sight of the glory of God in the face of Christ dazzles the eyes to all things here below. They led him by the hand into Damascus. Thus he who thought to have led the disciples of Christ prisoners and captives to Jerusalem was himself led a prisoner and a captive to Christ into Damascus. He lay without sight, neither did eat nor drink for three days, v. 9. He was in the dark concerning his own spiritual state, and was so wounded in spirit for sin that he could relish neither meat nor drink.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

6. And he, trembling and astonished, said, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? And the Lord said–(The most ancient MSS. and versions of the New Testament lack all these words here; but they occur in ch. 26:14 and ch. 22: 10, from which they appear to have been inserted here.) The metaphor of an ox, only driving the goad deeper by kicking against it, is a classic one, and here forcibly expresses, not only the vanity of all his measures for crushing the Gospel, but the deeper wound which every such effort inflicted upon himself. The question, What shall I do, Lord?" or, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" indicates a state of mind singularly interesting (see on ch. 2: 37). Its elements seem to be these: (1) Resistless conviction that "Jesus whom he persecuted," now speaking to him, was "Christ the Lord." (See on Gal. 1:15, 16). (2) As a consequence of this, that not only all his religious views, but his whole religious character, had been an entire mistake; that he was up to that moment fundamentally and wholly wrong. (3) That though his whole future was now a blank, he had absolute confidence in Him who had so tenderly arrested him in his blind career, and was ready both to take in all His teaching and to carry out all His directions. (See more on vs. 9). Arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told thee, . .–See on ch. 8:26-28. 7. the men . . . stood speechless–This may mean merely that they remained so; but if the standing posture be intended, we have only to suppose that though at first they "all fell to the earth" (ch. 26:14), they arose of their own accord while Saul yet lay prostrate. hearing a–rather 'the'–voice–Paul himself says, "they heard not the voice of Him that spake to me" (ch. 22:9). But just as "the people that stood by heard" the voice that saluted our Lord with recorded words of consolation and assurance, and yet heard not the articulate words, but thought "it thundered" or that some "angel spake to Him" (John 12:28, 29)–so these men heard the voice that spake to Saul, but heard not the articulate words. Apparent discrepancies like these, in the different narratives of the same scene in one and the same book of Acts, furnish the strongest confirmation both of the facts themselves and of the book which records them. 8. Saul arose . . . and when his eyes were opened, he saw no man–after beholding the Lord, since he "could not see for the glory of that light" (ch. 22:11), he had involuntarily closed his eyes to protect them from the glare; and on opening them again he found his vision gone. "It is not said, however, that he was blind, for it was no punishment" [BENGEL]. 9. And he was three days without sight, and neither did eat nor drink–i.e., according to the Hebrew mode of computation: he took no food during the remainder of that day, the entire day following, and so much of the subsequent day as elapsed before the visit of Ananias. Such a period of entire abstinence from food, in that state of mental absorption and revolution into which he had been so suddenly thrown, is in perfect harmony with known laws and numerous facts. But what three days those must have been! "Only one other space of three days' duration can be mentioned of equal importance in the history of the world" [HOWS]. Since Jesus had been revealed not only to his eyes but to his soul (see on Gal. 1:15, 16), the double conviction must have immediately flashed upon him, that his whole reading of the Old Testament hitherto had been wrong, and that the system of legal righteousness in which he had, up to that moment, rested and prided himself was false and fatal. What materials these for spiritual exercise during those three days of total darkness, fasting, and solitude! On the one hand, what self-condemnation, what anguish, what death of legal hope, what difficulty in believing that in such a case there could be hope at all; on the other hand, what heart-breaking admiration of the grace that had "pulled him out of the fire," what resistless conviction that there must be a purpose of love in it, and what tender expectation of being yet honored, as a chosen vessel, to declare what the Lord had done for his soul, and to spread abroad the savor of that Name which he had so wickedly, though ignorantly, sought to destroy–must have struggled in his breast during those memorable days! Is it too much to say that all that profound insight into the Old Testament, that comprehensive grasp of the principles of the divine economy, that penetrating spirituality, that vivid apprehension of man's lost state, and those glowing views of the perfection and glory of the divine remedy, that beautiful ideal of the loftiness and the lowliness of the Christian character, that large philanthropy and burning zeal to spend and be spent through all his future life for Christ,

6. Trembling. Under a strong apprehension of meeting the judgment he deserved. And astonished. At the light, the thunder, and the voice. Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? The word Kyrie, Lord, is here to be understood in its proper sense, as expressing authority and dominion; in the fifth verse it appears to be equivalent to our word "sir." Go into the city, and it shall be told thee. Jesus could have informed him at once what was His will concerning him; but He chose to make one of those very disciples whom he was going to bring in bonds to Jerusalem the means of his salvation.

7. Stood speechless, hearing a voice, but seeing no man. The men were "stupefied," hearing the voice or thunder, but not distinguishing the words, which were addressed to Saul alone; and which were spoken out of the thunder, or in a small, still voice, after the peal had ceased. The remarkable case, 1 Kings xix. 11-13, may serve to illustrate that before us. The thunder must have been heard by all; the small, still voice by Saul alone. This consideration amply reconciles the passage in the text with that in chap. xxii. 9, where Paul says, "They that were with me saw indeed the light, and were afraid; but they heard not the voice of him that spake to me." They had heard the thunder which followed the escape of the lightning, but they heard not the voice of Him that spake to Saul; they did not hear the words, "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest"; but they saw and heard enough to convince them that the whole was supernatural, for they were all struck down to the earth with the splendor of the light and the sound of the thunder, which I suppose took place on this occasion. It has been a question among divines whether Jesus Christ did really appear to Saul on this occasion. Ananias, it seems, was informed that there had been a real appearance, for in addressing Saul, v. 17, he says, "The Lord . . . Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest." And Barnabas intimated as much when he brought him before the apostles at Jerusalem, for he "declared unto them how he had seen the Lord in the way, and that he had spoken to him." But Paul's own words, 1 Cor. ix. 1, put the subject out of dispute: "Am I not an apostle? am I not free? have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord?" To which may be added, 1 Cor. xv. 8, "And last of all he was seen of me also, as of one born out of due time."

9. Neither did eat nor drink. The anxiety of his mind and the anguish of his heart were so great that he had no appetite for food; and he continued in total darkness and without food for three days, till Ananias proclaimed salvation to him in the name of the Lord Jesus.

MATTHEW HENRY

Verses 10–22

A good work was begun in Saul, when he was brought to Christ's feet, in that word, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? And never did Christ leave any that were brought to that. He that hath convinced will comfort.

I. Ananias is here ordered to go and look after him.

1. The person employed is Ananias, a certain disciple at Damascus, not lately driven thither from Jerusalem, but a native of Damascus; for it is said (ch. xxii. 12) that he had a good report of all the Jews who dwelt there, as a devout man according to the law.

2. The direction given him is to go and enquire at such a house for one Saul of Tarsus. Christ, in a vision, called to Ananias by name, v. 10. Without terror or confusion, he readily answers, "Behold I am here, Lord." Go then, saith Christ, into the street which is called Straight, and enquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul of Tarsus. Christ very well knows where to find out those that are his, in their distresses. They have a friend in heaven, that knows in what street, in what house, nay, and which is more, in what frame they are.

3. Two reasons are given him why he must go.

(1) Because he prays, and his coming to him must answer his prayer. This is a reason, [1] Why Ananias needed not to be afraid of him, as we find he was, v. 13, 14. There is no question, saith Christ, but he is a true convert, for behold he prayeth. Behold denotes the certainty of it. It denotes also the strangeness of it: "Behold, and wonder." But was it such a strange thing for Saul to pray? Was he not a Pharisee? Yes; but now he began to pray after another manner than he had done; then he said his prayers, now he prayed them. You may as soon find a living man without breath as a living Christian without prayer; if breathless, lifeless; and so, if prayerless, graceless. [2] Why Ananias must go to him with all speed. It is no time to linger, for behold he prayeth. He was under conviction of sin. Conviction should drive us to prayer. He was under a bodily affliction, blind and sick. Christ had promised him that it should be further told him what he should do (v. 6), and he prays that one may be sent to him to instruct him. What God has promised we must pray for.

(2) Because he hath seen in a vision such a man coming to him; and Ananias's coming to him must answer his dream, for it was of God (v. 12): He hath seen in a vision a man named Ananias coming in and putting his hand on him that he might receive his sight. Now this vision which Paul had may be considered: As an immediate answer to his prayer, and the keeping up of that communion with God which he had entered into by prayer. As designed to raise his expectations, and to make Ananias's coming more welcome to him. See what a great thing it is to bring a spiritual physician and his patient together: here were two visions in order to it.

II. Ananias objects against going to him.

1. Ananias pleads that this Saul was a notorious persecutor of the disciples of Christ, v. 13, 14: "Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy saints in Jerusalem. There was no man they were more afraid of. His errand to Damascus at this time is to persecute us Christians: Here he has authority from the chief priests to bind all that call on thy name." Now, why does Ananias object to this? Not, "Therefore I do not owe him so much service." No, Christ has taught us another lesson, to render good for evil, and pray for our persecutors. Will it be safe for Ananias to go to him? If he thus bring himself into trouble, he will be blamed for his indiscretion. Will it be to any purpose to go to him? Can such a hard heart ever be softened?

2. Christ overrules the objection (v. 15, 16). "Go thy way with all speed for he is a chosen vessel unto me; thou needest not fear him." He was a vessel in which the gospel-treasure should be lodged, an earthen vessel (2. Cor. iv. 7), but a chosen vessel. He is designed, (1) for eminent services: He is to bear my name before the Gentiles. Saul must be a standard-bearer. He must bear Christ's name before kings, king Agrippa and Cæsar himself; nay, he must bear it before the children of Israel. (2) For eminent sufferings (v. 16): I will show him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake. He that has been a persecutor shall be himself persecuted. Those that bear Christ's name must expect to bear the cross for his name; and those that do most for Christ are often called out to suffer most for him. It is only like telling a soldier of a bold and brave spirit, that he shall take the field, and enter upon action, shortly. It is no discouragement to him to be told how great things he must suffer for Christ's name's sake.

which distinguish the writings of this chiefest of the apostles and greatest of men, were all quickened into life during those three successive days?

10-16.

a certain disciple . . . named Ananias—See on ch. 22: 12. to him said the Lord—i.e., JESUS. (See vss. 13, 14, 17.) 11. go into the street . . . called Straight—There is still a street of this name in Damascus, about half a mile in length, running from east to west through the city [MAUNDRELL]. and inquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul of Tarsus—There is something touching in the minuteness of these directions. Tarsus was the capital of the province of Cilicia, lying along the northeast coast of the Mediterranean. It was situated on the river Cydnus, was a "large and populous city" (says XENOPHON, and see ch. 21:39), and under the Romans had the privilege of self-government.

behold, he prayeth—"breathing out" no longer "threatenings and slaughter," but struggling desires after light and life in the Persecuted One. Beautiful note of encouragement as to the frame in which Ananias would find the persecutor!

12. And hath seen in a vision a man named Ananias . . .—Thus, as in the case of Cornelius and Peter afterwards, there was a mutual preparation of each for each. But we have no account of the vision which Saul had of Ananias coming unto him and putting his hands upon him for the restoration of his sight, save this interesting allusion to it in the vision which Ananias himself had.

13. Ananias answered, Lord, I have heard by many of this man . . .—"The objections of Ananias, and the removal of them by the Lord, display in a very touching manner the childlike relation of the believing soul to its Redeemer. The Saviour speaks with Ananias as a man does with his friend" [OLSHAUSEN]. how much evil he hath done to thy saints—"Thy saints," says Ananias to Christ; therefore Christ is God [BENGEL]. So, in the very next verse, Ananias describes the disciples as "those that called on Christ's name." See on ch. 7:59, 60; and cf. I Corinthians 1:2. 14. here he hath authority . . .—so that the terror not only of the great persecutor's name, but of this commission to Damascus, had travelled before him from the capital to the doomed spot. 15. Go thy way—Do as thou art bidden, without gainsaying. he is a chosen vessel—a word often used by Paul in illustrating God's sovereignty in election (Rom. 9:21-23; II Cor. 4:7; II Tim. 2:20, 21 [ALFORD]. Cf. Zech. 3:2). 16. I will show him—(see ch. 20:23, 24; 21:11). how great things he must suffer for my name—i.e., Much he has done against that Name; but now, when I show him what great things he must suffer for that Name, he shall count it his honor and privilege.

ADAM CLARKE

11. Arise, and go into the street which is called Straight. How very particular is this direction! And it was necessary that it should be so, that he might see the whole to be a divine communication; the house was probably one in which Saul was accustomed to reside when at Damascus, and where he was known as a native of Tarsus. Tarsus was a city of Cilicia, seated on the Cydnus, and now called Tarasso. It was, at one period, the capital of all Cilicia, and became a rival to Alexandria and Athens in the arts and sciences. The inhabitants, in the time of Julius Caesar, having shown themselves friendly to the Romans, were endowed with all the privileges of Roman citizens; and it was on this account that Paul claimed the rights of a Roman citizen—a circumstance which on different occasions was to him, and the cause in which he was engaged, of considerable service. Behold, he prayeth. He is earnestly seeking to know My will, and to find the salvation of his soul; therefore go speedily and direct him.

12. Hath seen in a vision. While God prepares Ananias by a vision to go and minister to Saul, He at the same time prepares Saul by another vision to profit by this ministry.

13. Lord, I have heard by many of this man. This was all done in a dream, else this sort of reasoning with his Maker would have been intolerable in Ananias. Thy saints. That is, the Christians, or followers of Christ. Hagioi signifies not only holy persons but also consecrated persons; from a, negative, and ge, the "earth"; persons who are separated from all earthly uses, and consecrated to the service of God alone.

14. And here he hath authority. Ananias had undoubtedly heard of Saul's coming, and the commission he had received from the chief priests; and he was about to urge this as a reason why he should have no connection with so dangerous a man.

15. Go thy way. He was thus prevented from going further in his reasoning on this subject. Chosen vessel. Properly a Hebraism for an "excellent or well-adapted instrument." Every reader of the Bible must have noticed how often the word chosen is used there to signify excelling or eminent. So we use the word choice—"choice men," eminent persons; "choice things," excellent articles. So in Jer. xxii. 7; "They shall cut down thy choice cedars." Whoever considers the character of Paul, his education, attainments in natural knowledge, the distinguished part he took—first against Christianity, and afterwards, on the fullest conviction, the part he took in its favor—will at once perceive how well he was every way qualified for the great work to which God had called him. To bear my name before the Gentiles. To carry the ensign of the Cross among the Greeks and Romans. Hence he was emphatically called "the apostle of the Gentiles," 1 Tim. ii. 7; 2 Tim. i. 11. See also Gal. ii. 7-8 and Eph. iii. 8.

16. How great things he must suffer. Instead of proceeding as a persecutor and inflicting sufferings on others, I will show him how many things he himself must suffer for preaching that very doctrine which he has been hitherto employed in persecuting. Strange change indeed! And with great show of reason, as with incontrovertible strength of argument, has a noble writer, Lord Lyttleton, adduced the conversion of Saul of Tarsus and his subsequent conduct as an irrefragable proof of the truth of Christianity.

MATTHEW HENRY

III. Ananias goes on Christ's errand to Saul. He had started an objection against going to him, but he dropped it, and did not insist upon it. When difficulties are removed, what have we to do but to go on with our work, and not hang upon an objection?

1. Ananias delivered his message to Saul, v. 17. (1) He put his hands on him. Saul came to lay violent hands upon the disciples at Damascus, but here a disciple lays a helping healing hand upon him. (2) He called him brother. His readiness to own him as a brother intimated to him God's readiness to own him as a son, though he had been a blasphemer of God and a persecutor of his children. (3) He produces his commission. "That same Jesus that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, has now sent me to thee." The hand that wounded heals. His light struck thee blind, but he hath sent me to thee that thou mightest receive thy sight. Corrosives shall be no more applied, but lenitives. (4) He assures him that he shall not only have his sight restored, but be filled with the Holy Ghost.

2. Ananias saw the good issue of his mission. (1) In Christ's favour to Saul. At the word of Ananias, Saul was discharged from his confinement by the restoring of his sight. Saul is delivered from the spirit of bondage by his receiving sight (v. 18), which was signified by the falling of scales from his eyes; the cure was sudden, to show that it was miraculous. This signified the recovering of him, [1] From the darkness of his unconverted state. Christ often told the Pharisees that they were blind, and could not make them sensible of it. Saul is saved from his Pharisaical blindness, by being made sensible of it. Converting grace opens the eyes of the soul. This was what Saul was sent among the Gentiles to do, and therefore must first experience it in himself. [2] From the darkness of his present terrors. Now the scales fell from his eyes, the cloud was scattered, and the Sun of righteousness rose upon his soul, with healing under his wings. (2) In Saul's subjection to Christ: He was baptized, and thereby submitted to the government of Christ, and cast himself upon the grace of Christ. Saul is now a disciple of Christ, not only ceases to oppose him, but devotes himself entirely to his service.

IV. The good work that was begun in Saul is carried on wonderfully.

1. He received his bodily strength, v. 19. He had continued three days fasting, which had made him very weak; but, when he had received meat, he was strengthened, v. 19. The Lord is for the body, and therefore care must be taken of it that it may be fit to serve the soul in God's service.

2. He associated with the disciples that were at Damascus. He had lately breathed out threatenings and slaughter against them, but now breathes love and affection to them. Those that take God for their God take his people for their people. Thus he made profession of his Christian faith, and openly declared himself a disciple of Christ.

3. He preached Christ in the synagogues, v. 20. He was so full of Christ himself, that the Spirit within him constrained him to preach him to others. Where he preached—in the synagogues of the Jews. There they used to preach against Christ and to punish his disciples. There he would face the enemies of Christ where they were most daring, and openly profess Christianity. What he preached: He preached Christ. When he began to be a preacher, he fixed this for his principle, which he stuck to ever after: nothing but Christ, and him crucified. He preached concerning Christ, that he is the Son of God, in whom he is well pleased, and with us in him. How people were affected with it (v. 21): All that heard him were amazed, and said, "Is not this he that destroyed those who called on this name in Jerusalem?" Did he not come hither to seize all the Christians he could find, and bring them bound to the chief priests? Who would have thought then that he would ever preach Christ as he does? This miracle upon the mind of such a man outshone the miracles upon men's bodies; and giving a man such another heart was more than giving men to speak with other tongues.

4. He confuted and confounded those that opposed the doctrine of Christ, v. 22. He increased in strength. He became more intimately acquainted with the gospel of Christ, and his pious affections grew more strong. He grew more daring and resolute in defence of the gospel: He increased the more for the reflections that were cast upon him (v. 21), in which his new friends upbraided him as having been a persecutor, and his old friends upbraided him as being now a turncoat. He ran down his antagonists, and confounded the Jews who dwelt in Damascus; he silenced them, and shamed them. He was instrumental in converting many to the faith of Christ, and building up the church

17-19. Ananias went his way, and putting his hands on him, said, Brother Saul—How beautifully childlike is the obedience of Ananias to "the heavenly vision!" the Lord, even Jesus—This clearly shows in what sense the term "Lord" is used in this book. It is JESUS that is meant, as almost invariably in the Epistles also. who appeared unto thee in the way—This knowledge by an inhabitant of Damascus of what had happened to Saul before entering it, would show him at once that this was the man whom Jesus had already prepared him to expect. and be filled with the Holy Ghost—which Ananias probably, without any express instructions on that subject, took it for granted would descend upon him; and not necessarily after his baptism [BAUMGARTEN, WEBSTER and WILKINSON]—for Cornelius and his company received it before theirs (ch. 10:44-48)—but perhaps immediately after the recovery of his sight by the laying on of Ananias' hands 18. there fell from his eyes as it were scales—"This shows that the blindness as well as the cure was supernatural. Substances like scales would not form naturally in so short a time" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. And the medical precision of Luke's language here is to be noted. was baptized—as directed by Ananias (ch. 22:16).

19. when he had received meat, he was strengthened—for the exhaustion occasioned by his three days' fast would not be the less real, though unfelt during his struggles. (See on Matt. 4:2). Then was Saul certain days with the disciples at Damascus—making their acquaintance, in another way than either he or they had anticipated, and regaining his tone by the fellowship of the saints; but not certainly in order to learn from them what he was to teach, which he expressly disavows (Gal. 1:12, 16).

20-22. preached Christ ... that he is the Son of God—rather, "preached Jesus," according to all the most ancient MSS. and versions of the New Testament (so vs. 21, "all that call on this name," i.e., Jesus; and vs. 22, "proving that this" Jesus "is very Christ").

ADAM CLARKE

17. Brother Saul. As he found that the Head of the Church had adopted Saul into the heavenly family, he made no scruple to give him the right hand of fellowship, and therefore said, Brother Saul. The Lord, even Jesus. Of what use is this intrusive word even here? It injures the sense. Luke never wrote it; and our translators should not have inserted it. The Lord . . . Jesus, the sovereign Jesus who appeared unto thee in the way . . . hath sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost. Christ could have cured him as miraculously by His own power, without human means, as He had enlightened his heart without them; but He will honor man by making him His agent, even in working miracles. And be filled with the Holy Ghost. So appears that the Holy Spirit was given to him at this time, and probably by the imposition of the hands of Ananias.

18. And arose, and was baptized. That he was baptized by Ananias there is every reason to believe, as he appears to have been the chief Christian at Damascus.

19. When he had received meat, he was strengthened. His mind must have been greatly worn down under his three days' conviction of sin and the awful uncertainty he was in concerning his state, but when he was baptized and had received the Holy Ghost, his soul was divinely invigorated; and now by taking food his bodily strength, greatly exhausted by three days' fasting, was renewed also. Then was Saul certain days with the disciples. Doubtless under instructions relative to the doctrines of Christianity, which he must learn particularly in order to preach them successfully.

20. Preached Christ in the synagogues. Instead of Christ, "Jesus" is the reading of some MSS. The great question to be determined for the conviction of the Jews was that Jesus was the Son of God. Saul was now convinced that Jesus, whom they had crucified, and who had appeared to him on the way, was the Son of God, or Messiah; and therefore as such he proclaimed Him. The word Christ should be changed for "Jesus," as the latter is, without doubt, the genuine reading.

21. Is not this he that destroyed them? The verb has three acceptations in the Greek writers: (1) "To treat one as an enemy, to spoil him of his goods"; (2) "To lead away captive, to imprison"; (3) "To slay." Paul was properly "a destroyer" in all these senses. (1) He acted as the most determined enemy of the Christians: "Being exceedingly mad against them," he "persecuted them even unto strange cities," chap. xxvi. 11. (2) He shut up many of the saints in prison, chap. viii. 3; ix. 14; xxvi. 10. (3) He persecuted them unto death—gave his voice against them, that they might be destroyed, and was a principal instrument in the martyrdom of Stephen. He breathed "threatenings and slaughter." See chap. vii. 58; viii. 1; ix. 1; xxvi. 10-11. Therefore these three meanings of the original word are all exemplified in the conduct of Saul.

22. Confounded the Jews. Overwhelmed them so with his arguments that they were obliged to "blush" for the weakness of their own cause. Proving that this. This Person, viz., Jesus, is very Christ; "Is the Christ, or Messiah." See on v. 20.

MATTHEW HENRY

at Damascus, which he went thither to make havoc of.

Verses 23–31

Luke here makes no mention of Paul's journey into Arabia, which he tells us himself was immediately after his conversion, Gal. i. 16, 17. As soon as God had revealed his Son in him, that he might preach him, he went not up to Jerusalem, but he went to Arabia. Thence he returned to Damascus, and there, three years after his conversion, this happened, which is here recorded.

I. He met with difficulties at Damascus, and had a narrow escape of being killed there. What his danger was (v. 23): The Jews took counsel to kill him. He had been such a remarkable deserter, and his being a Christian was a testimony against them.

It is said (v. 24), The Jews watched the gates day and night to kill him. Now Christ showed Paul what great things he must suffer for his name (v. 16). Saul was no sooner a Christian than a preacher, no sooner a preacher than a sufferer. Where God gives great grace he commonly exercises it with great trials. How he was delivered. The design against him was discovered: Their lying in wait was known of Saul. The disciples contrived to help him away in the night; they let him down by the wall, in a basket, as he himself relates it (2 Cor. xi. 33).

II. He met with difficulties at Jerusalem the first time he went thither, v. 26. This is thought to be that journey to Jerusalem of which he himself speaks (Gal. i. 18): After three years I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days. But I rather incline to think that this was a journey before that, because his coming in and going out, his preaching and disputing (v. 28, 29), seem to be more than would consist with his fifteen days' stay. However, it might possibly be the same.

1. How shy his friends were of him (v. 26): When he came to Jerusalem he assayed to join himself to the disciples. Wherever he came, he owned himself one of that despised persecuted people. But they looked strange upon him, shut the door against him. They were afraid of him. The Jews had abandoned and persecuted him, and the Christians would not receive and entertain him. (1) See what was the cause of their jealousy of him: They believed not that he was a disciple, but that he only pretended to be so, and came among them as a spy or an informer. The disciples of Christ had need to be cautious whom they admit into communion with them. There is need of the wisdom of the serpent, to keep the mean between the extremes of suspicion on the one hand and credulity on the other; yet methinks it is safer to err on the charitable side. (2) See how it was removed (v. 27): Barnabas took him to the apostles themselves, and he declared to them, what Christ had done for him: He had shown himself to him in the way and spoken to him. What he had since done for Christ: He had preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus. How Barnabas came to know this we are not told. Being satisfied himself, he gave satisfaction to the apostles concerning him.

2. How sharp his enemies were upon him. (1) He was admitted into the communion of the disciples. It vexed the unbelieving Jews to see Saul a trophy of Christ's victory, to see him coming in, and going out, with the apostles (v. 28). (2) He appeared vigorous in the cause of Christ, and this was yet more provoking to them (v. 29): He spoke boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus. The Grecians, or Hellenist Jews, were most offended at him, because he had been one of them; and they drew him into a dispute, in which, no doubt, he was too hard for them. That same natural quickness and fervour of spirit which made him a furious bigoted persecutor of the faith, made him a most zealous courageous defender of the faith. (3) This brought him into peril of his life: The Grecians went about to slay him. But notice was given of this conspiracy too, and effectual care taken to secure this young champion (v. 30): When the brethren knew they brought him down to Cæsarea. He that flies may fight again. He that fled from Jerusalem might do service at Tarsus, the place of his nativity; and thither they desired him by all means to go. Yet it was also by direction from heaven that he left Jerusalem at this time, as he tells us himself (ch. xxii. 17, 18), that Christ now appeared to him, and ordered him to go quickly out of Jerusalem, for he must be sent to the Gentiles, v. 15.

23. And after many days were fulfilled, the Jews took counsel to kill him—Had we no other record than this, we should have supposed that what is here related took place while Saul continued at Damascus after his baptism. But in Galatians 1:17, 18 we learn from Paul himself that he "went into Arabia, and returned again unto Damascus," and that from the time of his first visit to the close of his second, both of which appear to have been short, a period of three years elapsed; either three full years, or one full year and part of two others. (See on Gal. 1: 16-18.) That such a blank should occur in the Acts, and be filled up in Galatians, is not more remarkable than that the flight of the Holy Family into Egypt, their stay there, and their return thence, recorded only by Matthew, should be so entirely passed over by Luke, that if we had only his Gospel, we should have supposed that they returned to Nazareth immediately after the presentation in the temple. (Indeed in one of his narratives, ch. 22: 16, 17, Paul himself takes no notice of this period.) But wherefore this journey? Perhaps (1) because he felt a period of repose and partial seclusion to be needful to his spirit, after the violence of the change and the excitement of his new occupation. (2) To prevent the rising storm which was gathering against him from coming too soon to a head. (3) To exercise his ministry in the Jewish synagogues, as opportunity afforded. On his return, refreshed and strengthened in spirit, he immediately resumed his ministry, but soon to the imminent hazard of his life. 24, 25. they watched the gates night and day to kill him—The full extent of his danger appears only from his own account (II Cor. 11:32): "In Damascus, the governor under Aretas the king kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me"; the exasperated Jews having obtained from the governor a military force, the more surely to compass his destruction. 25. Then the disciples . . . by night let him down "through a window" (II Cor. 11:33) by the wall—Such overhanging windows in the walls of Eastern cities were common, and are to be seen in Damascus to this day.

26-31. SAUL'S FIRST VISIT TO JERUSALEM AFTER HIS CONVERSION. 26. And when Saul was come to Jerusalem—"three years after" his conversion, and particularly "to see Peter" (Gal. 1:18); no doubt because he was the leading apostle, and to communicate to him the prescribed sphere of his labors, specially to "the Gentiles." he assayed to join himself to the disciples—simply as one of them, leaving his apostolic commission to manifest itself. they were all afraid of him . . .—knowing him only as a persecutor of the faith; the rumor of his conversion, if it ever was cordially believed, passing away during his long absence in Arabia, and the news of his subsequent labors in Damascus perhaps not having reached them. 27. But Barnabas . . . brought him to the apostles—i.e., to Peter and James; for "other of the apostles saw I none," says he fourteen years after (Gal. 1:18, 19). Probably none of the other apostles were there at the time (ch. 4:36). Barnabas being of Cyprus, which was within a few hours' sail of Cilicia, and annexed to it as a Roman province, and Saul and he being Hellenistic Jews and eminent in their respective localities, they may very well have been acquainted with each other before this [Hows]. What is here said of Barnabas is in fine consistency with the "goodness" ascribed to him (ch. 11:24), and with the name "son of consolation," given him by the apostles (ch. 4:36); and after Peter and James were satisfied, the disciples generally would at once receive him. how he had seen the Lord . . . and he—the Lord—had spoken to him—i.e., how he had received his commission direct from the Lord Himself. 28, 29. And he was with them, coming in and going out at Jerusalem—for fifteen days, lodging with Peter (Gal. 1:18). 29. disputed against the Grecians—See on ch. 6:1; addressing himself specially to them, perhaps, as being of his own class, and that against which he had in the days of his ignorance been the fiercest. they went about to slay him—Thus was he made to feel, throughout his whole course, what he himself had made others so cruelly to feel, the cost of discipleship. 30. they brought him down to Cæsarea—on the coast (see on ch. 8:40); accompanying him thus far. But Paul had another reason than his own apprehension for quitting Jerusalem so soon. "While he was praying in the temple, he was in a trance," and received express injunctions to this effect. (See on ch. 22:17-21.) and sent him forth to Tarsus—In Galatians 1:21 he himself says of this journey, that he "came into the regions of Syria and Cilicia";

23. And after that many days were fulfilled. What follows relates to transactions which took place about three years after his conversion, when he had come a second time to Damascus, after having been in Arabia. See Gal. i. 17-18.

24. They watched the gates day and night to kill him. At this time Damascus was under the government of Aretas, king of Arabia, who was now at war with Herod, his son-in-law, who had put away his daughter in order to marry Herodias, his brother Philip's wife. As Herod was supported by the Romans, Saul's enemies might intimate that he was in league with them or Herod; and as the gates of the city were constantly watched and shut, that no spy might enter and no fugitive get away, they thought it would be easy to apprehend him, and doubtless got orders for the different officers at the gates to be on the lookout that he might not be permitted to escape.

25. Let him down by the wall. Favored probably by a house built against or upon the wall, through the window of which they could lower him in a basket, and by this means he made his escape. His escape was something similar to that of the spies at Jericho, Josh. ii. 15.

26. He assayed to join himself to the disciples. "He endeavored to get closely united to them," to be in religious fellowship with them. Believed not that he was a disciple. They did not suppose it possible that such a person could be converted to the faith of Christ. The full power of divine grace in the conversion of the soul was not yet completely known.

27. Barnabas . . . brought him to the apostles. That is, to Peter and James; for others of the apostles he saw none, Gal. i. 19. It appears that he went up at this time to Jerusalem merely to see Peter, with whom he abode fifteen days, Gal. i. 18.

28. He was with them coming in and going out. Freely conversing and associating with them; but this seems to have continued only fifteen days. See Gal. i. 18.

29. Disputed against the Grecians. That is, the Hellenistic Jews, viz., those who lived in Grecian cities, spoke the Greek language, and used the Septuagint version for their Scriptures.

30. Sent him forth to Tarsus. This was his own city, and it was right that he should proclaim to his own countrymen and relatives that gospel through which he was become wise to salvation.

MATTHEW HENRY

III. The churches had now a comfortable gleam of liberty and peace (v. 31): Then had the churches rest. Then, when Saul was converted, those were quiet whom he used to molest. The churches had rest. After a storm comes a calm. This was a breathing-time allowed them, to prepare them for the next encounter. They made a good use of this lucid interval.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

"Being edified" sounds very theological and far away from daily life. Would it not sound more real if we read "being built up"? That is the emblem of the process that ought to go on, not only in the Christian community as a whole, but in every individual member of it. Each Christian is bound to build himself up and to help to build up other Christians; and God builds them all up by His Spirit. We have before us the picture of the rising of some stately fabric upon a firm foundation, course by course, stone by stone, each laid by a separate act of the builder's hand, and carefully bedded in its place until the whole is complete.

That is one emblem of the growth of the Christian community and of the Christian individual, and the other clause that is coupled with it in the text seems to me to give the same idea under a slightly different figure. The rising of a stately building and the advance on a given path suggest substantially the same notion of progress.—Expositions of Holy Scripture

They were edified, were built up in their most holy faith. They walked in the fear of the Lord. They so lived that all might say, Surely the fear of God reigns in those people. They walked in the comfort of the Holy Ghost—were not only faithful, but cheerful, in religion; they stuck to the ways of the Lord, and sang in those ways. They had recourse to the comfort of the Holy Ghost, and lived upon that, not only in days of trouble and affliction, but in days of rest and prosperity. When they walked in the fear of the Lord, then they walked in the comfort of the Holy Ghost. Those are most likely to walk cheerfully that walk circumspectly. God blessed it to them for their increase in number: They were multiplied. Sometimes the church multiplies the more for its being afflicted, yet if it were always so, the saints of the Most High would be worn out. At other times its rest contributes to its growth.

Verses 32–35

I. The visit Peter made to the churches that were newly planted, v. 32. 1. He passed through all quarters. As an apostle, he was not to be the resident pastor of any one church. He was, like his Master, always upon the remove, and went about doing good; but still his headquarters were at Jerusalem, for there we shall find him imprisoned, ch. xii. 4. He came to the saints at Lydda. The Christians are called saints, every sincere professor of the faith of Christ. These are the saints on the earth.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

from which it is natural to infer that instead of sailing direct for Tarsus, he landed at Seleucia, travelled thence to Antioch, and penetrated from this northward into Cilicia, ending his journey at Tarsus. As this was his first visit to his native city since his conversion, so it is not certain that he ever was there again. (See on ch. 11:25, 26.) It probably was now that he became the instrument of gathering into the fold of Christ those "kinsmen," that "sister," and perhaps her "son," of whom mention is made in ch. 23:16, etc.; Rom. 16:7, 11, 21 [Hows].

31. FLOURISHING STATE OF THE CHURCH IN PALESTINE AT THIS TIME. 31. Then had all the churches rest—rather, 'the Church,' according to the best MSS. and versions. But this rest was owing not so much to the conversion of Saul, as probably to the Jews being engrossed with the emperor Caligula's attempt to have his own image set up in the temple of Jerusalem (JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 18:8; 1, etc.).

throughout all Judea, and Galilee, and Samaria—This incidental notice of distinct churches already dotting all the regions which were the chief scenes of our Lord's ministry, and that were best able to test the facts on which the whole preaching of the apostles was based, is extremely interesting. "The fear of the Lord" expresses their holy walk; "the comfort of the Holy Ghost," their "peace and joy in believing," under the silent operation of the blessed Comforter.

32-43. PETER HEALS ENEAS AT LYDDA, AND RAISES TABITHA TO LIFE AT JOPPA. The historian now returns to Peter, in order to introduce the all-important narrative of Cornelius (ch. 10). The occurrences here related probably took place during Saul's sojourn in Arabia. 32-35. as Peter passed throughout all quarters—not now fleeing from persecution, but peacefully visiting the churches. to the saints which dwelt at Lydda—about five miles east of Joppa.

ADAM CLARKE

31. Then had the churches rest. Instead of the churches, some MSS. have "the Church." Every assembly of God's people was "a church"; the aggregate of these assemblies was "the Church." The word which we translate rest, and which literally signifies "peace," evidently means, in this place, "prosperity"; and in this sense both it and the Hebrew shalom are repeatedly used. But what was the cause of this rest or success? Some say, the conversion of Saul, who before made havoc of the Church; but this is not likely, as he could not be a universal cause of persecution and distress, however active and virulent he might have been during the time of his enmity to the Christian Church. Besides his own persecution, related above, shows that the opposition to the gospel continued with considerable virulence three years after his conversion; therefore it was not Saul's ceasing to be a persecutor that gave this rest to the churches. Dr. Lardner, with a greater show of probability, maintains that this rest was owing to the following circumstance: In the third year of Caligula, A.D. 39, Petronius, who was made president of Syria in the place of Vitellius, was sent by the emperor to set up his statue in the Temple at Jerusalem. This was a thunderstroke to the Jews and so occupied them that they had no time to think of anything else, apprehending that their Temple must be defiled and the national religion destroyed or themselves run the risk of being exterminated if they rebelled against the imperial decree. It appears therefore that, as these transactions took place about the time mentioned in the text, their persecution from the Romans diverted them from persecuting the Christians; and then had the churches rest throughout all Judaea and Galilee and Samaria, the terror occasioned by the imperial decree having spread itself through all those places.

Were edified. A metaphor taken from a building. All this is beautifully pointed out by Peter, 1 Pet. chap. ii. 4-5: "To whom [Jesus Christ] coming, as unto a living stone . . . chosen of God, and precious, ye also, as lively [living] stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices . . . to God by Jesus Christ." And Paul goes through the whole figure at large, in the following inimitable words: "Ye are . . . the household of God; and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone; in whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord: in whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit," Eph. ii. 19-22. Walking in the fear of the Lord. Keeping a continually tender conscience, abhorring all sin, having respect to every divine precept, dreading to offend Him from whom the soul has derived its being and its blessings. Without this salutary fear of God there never can be any circumspect walking. In the comfort of the Holy Ghost. In a consciousness of their acceptance and union with God, through His Spirit, by which solid peace and happiness are brought into the soul, the truly religious man knowing and feeling that he is of God by the Spirit which is given him. Nothing less can be implied in the comfort of the Holy Ghost. Were multiplied. No wonder that the Church of God increased when such lights as these shone among men. This is a short but full and forcible description of the righteousness, purity, and happiness of the primitive Church.

32. As Peter passed throughout all quarters. The churches having rest, the apostles made use of this interval of quiet to visit the different congregations, in order to build them up on their most holy faith. Of Saul we hear no more till chap. xi. 30, which is supposed to be about five years after this time—eight in all from his conversion. Peter, it seems, had continued in Jerusalem all the time that the churches were in a state of persecution throughout the whole land. Great as he was, he never evidenced that steady, determinate courage by which Paul was so eminently distinguished; nor did he ever suffer half so much for God and His truth. To the saints. The Jews who had been converted to Christianity. Which dwelt at Lydda. A town in the tribe of Ephraim, almost on the border of Judea, and nigh unto Joppa.

MATTHEW HENRY

II. The cure Peter wrought on Æneas, v. 33. His case was very deplorable: He was sick of the palsy. The disease was extreme, for he kept his bed; it was inveterate, for he kept his bed eight years; and we may suppose that both he himself and all about him despaired of relief for him. Christ chose such patients as this, whose disease was incurable in a course of nature. When we were without strength, as this poor man, he sent his word to heal us. His cure was very admirable, v. 34. Peter interested Christ in his case: Æneas, Jesus Christ maketh thee whole. Peter declares it to be Christ's act and deed, and assures him of an immediate cure—not, "He will make thee," but, "He does make thee whole"; and a perfect cure —not, "He makes thee easy," but "He makes thee whole." He ordered him to bestir himself: "Arise and make thy bed." Let none say that because it is Christ that works all our works in us therefore we have no work, no duty, to do; for, though Jesus Christ makes thee whole, yet thou must arise and make use of the power he gives thee: "Arise, and make thy bed, to be to thee no longer a bed of sickness, but a bed of rest." Power went along with this word: he arose immediately.

III. The good influence this had upon many (v. 35): All that dwelt at Lydda and Saron saw him, and turned to the Lord. They all made enquiry into the truth of the miracle, and saw that it was a miraculous cure that was wrought upon him by the power of Christ. They all turned to the Lord, to the Lord Jesus. They turned themselves over to him to be ruled and taught and saved by him.

Here we have another miracle wrought by Peter—the raising of Tabitha to life.

I. The life, and death, and character of Tabitha, v. 36, 37. She lived at Joppa. Her name was Tabitha, a Hebrew name, the Greek for which is Dorcas, both signifying a doe. She was a disciple, eminent above many for works of charity. She showed her faith by her works, her good works. She was full of good works, as a tree that is full of fruit. Many are full of good words, who are empty and barren in good works; but Tabitha was a great doer, no great talker. She was remarkable for her alms-deeds which she did, not only her works of piety, but works of charity and beneficence, flowing from love to her neighbour. She is commended not only for the alms which she gave, but for the alms-deeds which she did. Those that have not estates wherewith to give in charity may yet be able to do in charity, working with their hands, or walking with their feet, for the benefit of the poor. And those who will not do a charitable deed, whatever they may pretend, if they were rich would not bestow a charitable gift. There is an emphasis upon her doing them, because what her hand found to do of this kind she did with all her might, and persevered in. This is the life and character of a certain disciple, and should be of all the disciples of Christ. She was removed in the midst of her usefulness (v. 37): In those days she fell sick, and died. Her friends and those about her washed the dead body, according to the custom. They laid her out in her grave-clothes in an upper chamber.

II. The request which her Christian friends sent to Peter to come to them with all speed, v. 38. The disciples at Joppa had heard that Peter was there, and that he had raised Æneas from a bed of languishing; and therefore they sent him two men, desiring him that he would not delay to come to them. Their friend was dead, and it was too late to send for a physician, but not too late to send for Peter.

III. The posture in which he found the survivors (v. 39): Peter arose and went with them. Let not faithful ministers grudge to be at everybody's beck, when the great apostle made himself the servant of all. He found the corpse laid in the upper chamber, and attended by widows.

1. Commending the deceased—a good work when it is done modestly and soberly, and without flattery. The commendation of Tabitha was like her own virtues, not in word, but in deed. The widows showed the coats and garments which she made while she was with them. It is much more honourable to clothe a company of decrepit widows with needful clothing, than to clothe a company of lazy footmen with rich liveries, who perhaps behind their backs will curse those that clothe them, for goodness is true greatness, and will pass better in the account shortly. Into what channel Tabitha turned much of her charity. She did, as it should seem with her own hands, make coats and garments for poor widows. And this is an excellent piece of charity, If thou seest the naked, that thou cover him (Isa. lviii. 7), and not think it enough to say, Be ye warmed, James ii. 15, 16. What a

35. all that dwelt at Lydda and Saron—(or "Sharon," a rich vale between Joppa and Cæsarea). saw him, and turned to the Lord—i.e., there was a general conversion in consequence.

35-39. at Joppa—the modern Jaffa, on the Mediterranean, a very ancient city of the Philistines, afterwards and still the seaport of Jerusalem, from which it lies distant forty-five miles to the northwest. Tabitha . . . Dorcas—the Syro-Chaldaic and Greek names for an antelope or gazelle, which, from its loveliness, was frequently employed as a proper name for women [MEYER, OLSHAUSEN]. Doubtless the interpretation, as here given, is but an echo of the remarks made by the Christians regarding her—how well her character answered to her name. full of good works and alms-deeds—eminent for the activities and generosities of the Christian character.

37. when they had washed—according to the custom of civilized nations towards the dead. in an—rather, 'the'—upper chamber—(cf. I Kings 17:19). 38. the disciples sent unto Peter—showing that the disciples generally did not possess miraculous gifts [BENGEL].

39. all the widows—whom she had clad or fed. stood by him weeping, and showing the coats and garments which Dorcas had made—i.e., (as the tense implies), showing these as specimens only of what she was in the habit of making.

ADAM CLARKE

33. A certain man named Aeneas. This name has been celebrated in the annals of heathen poetry in that beautiful work of the poet Virgil, called the "Aeneid," which gives an account of the misfortunes, travels, wars, of a Trojan prince of this name, after the destruction of his native city, Troy. Had kept his bed eight years. This was occasioned by a palsy, and now inveterate and hopeless through its long standing.

34. Jesus Christ maketh thee whole. Not Peter, for he had no power but what was given him from above. And, as an instrument, any man could heal with this power as well as Peter; but God chose to put honor upon those primitive preachers of His Word, that men might see that they were commissioned from heaven. Arise, and make thy bed. Give now full proof that Jesus Christ has made you whole by arising and by making your bed. He was at home, and therefore was not commanded, as the paralytic person, to take up his bed; but he was ordered to make it—strew it afresh, that all might see that the cure was perfect.

35. All that dwelt in Lydda and Saron saw him. Saron was that country that lay between Joppa and Lydda. The long affliction of this man had been well-known; and his cure, consequently, became a subject of general examination. It was found to be real. It was known to have been performed by the grace and mercy of Christ, and the consequence of all this conviction was that all these people became Christians.

36. Now there was at Joppa. This was a seaport town on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, about a day's journey from Jerusalem. It is at present called Jaffa, and is still a place of considerable note. A certain disciple named Tabitha. This word is more properly Syriac than Hebrew. The word tabio and the feminine tabitho have the same meaning as the Greek Dorcas, and signify the "gazel" or "antelope"; and it is still customary in the East to give the names of beautiful animals to young women. The comparison of fine eyes to those of the antelope is continually occurring in the writings of the Arabic and Persian poets. The person in the text probably had her name in the same way. She was very beautiful, and was therefore called Tabitha and Dorcas. This woman was full of good works. She spent her life in acts of kindness and charity, Her soul was full of love to God and man, and her whole time was filled up with works of piety and mercy.

37. She was sick, and died. Even her holiness and usefulness could not prevent her from sickness and death. "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," is a decree that must be fulfilled, even on the saints; for "the body is dead," sentenced to death, "because of sin," though "the Spirit is life because of righteousness." Whom when they had washed. Having the fullest proof that she was dead, they prepared for her interment. In most nations of the world it was customary to wash their dead before they buried them and before they laid them out to lie in state.

38. Sent unto him . . . desiring . . . that he would not delay to come. Tabitha died at Joppa, and Peter was at Lydda. But why did they send for Peter? We cannot tell. It is not likely that they had any expectation that he should raise her from the dead, for none of the apostles had as yet raised any; and if God did not choose to restore Stephen to life, this favor could not be reasonably expected in behalf of inferior persons. However they might hope that he who cured Aeneas at Lydda might cure Dorcas, for it is probable that they had sent for Peter before she died.

39. Shewing the coats and garments. These, it appears, she had made for the poor, and more particularly for poor widows, in whose behalf she had incessantly labored.

grateful sense the poor had of her kindness: They showed the coats. Those are horribly ungrateful indeed who have kindness shown them and will not make at least an acknowledgement of it, by showing the kindness that is done them. Those who receive alms are not obliged so industriously to conceal it, as those are who give alms. Their showing the coats and garments which Dorcas made tended to the praise not only of her charity, but of her industry.

2. They were here lamenting the loss of her: The widows stood by Peter, weeping. They need not weep for her; she rests from her labours and her works follow her, but they weep for themselves and for their children, who will soon find the want of such a good woman. They take notice of what good Dorcas did while she was with them; but now she is gone from them, and this is their grief. The widows wept before Peter, as an inducement to him to have compassion on them, and restore one to them that used to have compassion on them. When charitable people are sick, this piece of gratitude is owing them, to pray for their recovery, that those may be spared to live who can ill be spared to die.

IV. The manner in which she was raised to life. 1. Privately: but Peter put them all forth. Thus Peter declined everything that looked like vainglory and ostentation; they came to see, but he did not come to be seen. 2. By prayer. In his healing Æneas there was an implied prayer, but in this greater work he addressed himself to God by solemn prayer, with the submission of a servant, and therefore he knelt down and prayed. 3. By the word, a quickening word. When he had prayed, he turned to the body, and spoke in his Master's name: "Tabitha, arise." Power went along with this word, and she came to life, opened her eyes which death had closed. When she saw Peter, she sat up (v. 14), he gave her his hand and lifted her up. Thus he would as it were welcome her to life again, and give her the right hand of fellowship among the living, from whom she had been cut off. And, lastly, he called the saints and widows, and presented her alive to them (v. 41).

V. The good effect of this miracle. 1. Many were by it convinced of the truth of the gospel, and believed in the Lord, v. 42. The thing was known throughout all Joppa, and though some never minded it many were wrought upon by it. This was the design of miracles, to confirm a divine revelation. 2. Peter was hereby induced to continue some time in this city, v. 43. Finding that a door of opportunity was opened for him there, he tarried there many days, till he was sent for thence upon business to another place. He took up his lodgings with one Simon a tanner. Though Peter might seem to be buried in obscurity here in the house of a poor tanner by the seaside, yet hence God fetched him to a noble piece of service.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

When Jesus Christ went into the house of Jairus, there was the usual hubbub, the noise of the loud Eastern mourning, and He put them all forth, taking with Him only the father and mother of the damsel and Peter with James and John. When Peter goes into the upper room, where Tabitha is lying, there is the usual noise of lamentation and the clacks of many tongues, extolling the virtues of the dead woman. He remembers how Christ had gone about His miracle, and he, in his turn, "put them all forth." Mark, who was Peter's mouthpiece in his Gospel, gives us the very Aramaic words which our Lord employed when He raised the little girl, Talitha, the Aramaic word for "a damsel," or young girl; cumi, which means in that language "arise." Is it not singular and beautiful that Peter's word by the bedside of the dead Dorcas is, with the exception of one letter, absolutely identical? Christ says, Talitha cumi. Peter remembered the formula by which the blessing was conveyed, and he copied it. Tabitha cumi! Is it not clear that he is posing after his Master's attitude; that he is, consciously or unconsciously, doing what he remembered so well had been done in that other upper room, and that the miracles are both of them shaped after the pattern of the miraculous working of Jesus Christ?—Expositions of Holy Scripture opened her eyes, and when she saw Peter, she sat up—The graphic minuteness of detail here imparts to the narrative an air of charming reality. 41. he gave her his hand, and lifted her up—as his Lord had done to his own mother-in-law (Mark 1:31).

40-43. Peter put them all forth, and kneeled down—the one in imitation of his Master's way (Luke 8:54; and cf. II Kings 4:33); the other, in striking contrast with it. The kneeling became the lowly servant, but not the Lord Himself, of whom it is never once recorded that he knelt in the performance of a miracle.

43. with one Simon a tanner—a trade regarded by the Jews as half unclean, and consequently disreputable, from the contact with dead animals and blood which was connected with it. For this reason, even by other nations, it is usually carried on at some distance from towns; accordingly, Simon's house was "by the seaside" (ch. 10:6). Peter's lodging there shows him already to some extent above Jewish prejudice.

40. Peter put them all forth, and kneeled down, and prayed. It was not even known to Peter that God would work this miracle: therefore he put all the people out, that he might seek the will of God by fervent prayer and during his supplications be liable to neither distraction nor interruption, which he must have experienced had he permitted this company of weeping widows to remain in the chamber. Said, Tabitha, arise. During his wrestling with God he had, undoubtedly, received confidence that she would be raised at his word.

41. Saints and widows. In primitive times the widows formed a distinct part of the Christian Church.

42. Many believed in the Lord. That is, in Christ Jesus, in whose name and through whose power they understood this miracle to be wrought.

43. He tarried many days in Joppa. Taking advantage of the good impression made on the people's minds by the miracle, he preached to them the great truths of Christianity and thus established them in the faith. Simon a tanner. Whether the original word signifies a tanner or a "currier" is of little consequence. The person who dealt in the hides, whether of clean or unclean animals, could not be in high repute among the Jews. Even in Joppa the trade appears to have been reputed unclean; and therefore this Simon had his house by the sea side. See chap. x. 6.

CHAPTER 10

It concerns us carefully to observe all the circumstances of the beginning of this great work, this part of the mystery of godliness—Christ preached to the Gentiles, and believed on in the world. The gospel was never yet designedly preached to the Gentiles, nor any of them baptized—Cornelius was the first.

I. An account given us of this Cornelius, who was the first-born of the Gentiles to Christ. We are here told that he was a great man and a good man—two characters that seldom meet. Where they do meet they put a lustre upon each other: goodness makes greatness truly valuable, and greatness makes goodness much more serviceable. 1. Cornelius was an officer of the army, v. 1. Here there was a band, or cohort, of the Roman army, which is here called the Italian band, because they were all native Romans, or Italians. Cornelius had a command in this part of the army. He was an officer of considerable rank and figure, a centurion. We read of one of that rank in our Saviour's time, of whom he gave a great commendation, Matt. viii. 10. When a Gentile must be pitched upon to receive the gospel first, it is a Gentile soldier, who is a man of more free thought; and he that truly is so, when the Christian doctrine is fairly set before him, cannot but receive it and bid it welcome. Let not soldiers and officers of the army plead that their employment may excuse them if they be not religious. It was a mortification to the Jews that not only the Gentiles were taken into the church, but that the first who was taken in was an officer of the Roman army. 2. He was a religious man. It is a very good character that is given of him, v. 2. He was possessed with a principle of regard to the true and living God. He was a devout man and one

Vss. 1-48. ACCESSION AND BAPTISM OF CORNELIUS AND HIS PARTY; OR, THE FIRST FRUITS OF THE GENTILES. We here enter on an entirely new phase of the Christian Church, the "opening of the door of faith to the Gentiles"; in other words, the recognition of Gentile, on terms of perfect equality with Jewish, discipleship without the necessity of circumcision. Some beginnings appear to have been already made in this direction (see on ch. 11: 20, 21); and Saul probably acted on this principle from the first, both in Arabia and in Syria and Cilicia. But had he been the prime mover in the admission of uncircumcised Gentiles into the Church, the Jewish party, who were never friendly to him, would have acquired such strength as to bring the Church to the verge of a disastrous schism. But on Peter, "the apostle" specially "of the circumcision," was conferred the honor of initiating this great movement, as before of the first admission of Jewish believers. (See on Matt. 16: 19.) After this, however, one who had already come upon the stage was to eclipse this "chiefest of the apostles." 1, 2. Cæsarea—See on ch. 8:40. the Italian band—a cohort of Italians, as distinguished from native soldiers, quartered at Cæsarea, probably as a bodyguard to the Roman procurator who resided there. An ancient coin makes express mention of such a cohort in Syria. (AKERMAN'S Numismatic Illustrations of the New Testament.) 2. A devout man . . .—an uncircumcised Gentile proselyte to the Jewish faith, of whom there were a very great number at this time; a distinguished proselyte, who had brought his whole household establishment under the hallowing influence of the

CHAPTER 10

1. There was a certain man in Caesarea. This was Caesarea of Palestine, called also Strato's Tower, as has been already noted, and the residence of the Roman procurator. A centurion. The chief or captain of 100 men, as both the Greek and Latin words imply. The band called the Italian band. The word which we translate band signifies the same as "cohort" or "regiment," which sometimes consisted of 555 infantry and 66 cavalry. A Roman legion consisted of 10 cohorts. When in former times the Roman legion contained 6,000, each cohort consisted of 600.

2. A devout man. A person who worships the true God and is no idolater. One that feared God. One who was acquainted with the true God, by means of His Word and laws; who respected these laws, and would not dare to that feared God. Though he was a soldier, it was no diminution of the credit of his valour to tremble before God. He kept up religion in his family. He feared God with all his house. He took care that not himself only, but all his, should serve the Lord. Every good man will do what he can that those about him may be good too. He was a very charitable man: He gave much alms to the people. He was much in prayer: He prayed to God always. Wherever the fear of God rules in the heart, it will appear both in works of charity and of piety.

II. The orders given him from heaven to send for Peter.

1. How, and in what way, these orders were given him. He had a vision, in which an angel delivered them to him. It was about the ninth hour of the day. Because it was in the temple the time of offering the evening sacrifice, it was made by devout people an hour of prayer. Cornelius was now at prayer: so he tells us himself, v. 30. An angel of God came in to him. He saw him evidently with his bodily eyes, not in a dream presented to his imagination, but in a vision presented to his sight. He called him by his name, Cornelius, to intimate the particular notice God took of him. This put Cornelius for the present into some confusion (v. 4): When he looked on him he was afraid. Cornelius cries, "What is it, Lord? What is the matter?" This he speaks as one desirous to know the mind of God, and ready to comply with it.

2. What the message was.

(1) He is assured that God accepts him (v. 4): Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God. Prayers and alms must go together. We must follow our prayers with alms. We must give alms of such things as we have; and then, behold, all things are clean to us, Luke xi. 41. And we must follow our alms with our prayers that God would graciously accept them. Cornelius prayed, and gave alms, in sincerity, as unto God; and he is here told that they were come up for a memorial before God. Prayers and alms are our spiritual offerings, which God is pleased to have regard to.

(2) He is appointed to enquire after a further discovery of divine grace, v. 5, 6. He must send forthwith to Joppa, and enquire for one Simon Peter; he lodgeth at the house of one Simon a tanner; his house is by the sea side, when he comes he shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do. Now here are two things very surprising: [1] Cornelius prays and gives alms in the fear of God, is religious himself and keeps up religion in his family, yet there is something further that he ought to do—he ought to embrace the Christian religion. Not, He may do it if he pleases. But, He must do it. He that believed the promise of the Messiah must now believe the performance of that promise. Neither our prayers nor our alms can come up for a memorial before God unless we believe in Jesus Christ. [2] Cornelius has now an angel from heaven talking to him, and yet he must not receive the gospel of Christ from this angel, but all that the angel has to say is, "Send for Peter, and he shall tell thee." And as it was an honour to the apostle that he must preach that which an angel might not, so it was a further honour that an angel was despatched to order him to be sent for. To bring a faithful minister and a willing people together is a work worthy of an angel.

III. His immediate obedience to these orders, v. 7, 8. He sent with all speed to Joppa, to fetch Peter to him. When he sent: As soon as ever the angel which spoke unto him had departed. He made haste, and delayed not, to do this commandment. In any affair wherein our souls are concerned it is good for us not to lose time. Whom he sent: Two of his household servants, and a devout soldier, that waited on him continually. A devout centurion had devout soldiers. A little devotion commonly goes a great way with soldiers, but there would be more of it in the soldiers if there were but more of it in the commanders. When this centurion had to choose some of his soldiers to attend his person, and to be always about him, he pitched upon such of them as were devout. What instructions he gave them (v. 8): He declared all these things unto them. He does not only tell them where to find Peter, but he tells them on what errand he was to come, that they might importune him.

Verses 9–18

Cornelius had received positive orders from heaven to send for Peter, but here is another difficulty that lies in the way of bringing them together—the question is whether Peter will come to Cornelius. It sticks at a point of conscience. He is a Gentile, he is not circumcised. Peter had not got over this stingy bigoted notion of his countrymen, and therefore will be shy of coming to Cornelius. Now, to remove this

Jewish faith and the regular observance of its principal seasons of worship. gave much alms to the people—i.e., the Jewish people, on the same principle as another centurion before him (Luke 7:5); thinking it no "great thing," if they had "sown unto him spiritual things, that they should reap his carnal things" (I Cor. 9:11). prayed to God alway—at the stated daily seasons. (See on vs. 3.)

3-6. saw . . . evidently—'distinctly.' the ninth hour of the day—three o'clock, the hour of the evening sacrifice. But he had been "fasting until that hour" (vs. 30), perhaps from the sixth hour (vs. 9).

4. What is it, Lord?—language which, tremulously though it was uttered, betokened childlike reverence and humility.

Thy prayers and thine alms—The way in which both are specified is emphatic. The one denotes the spiritual outgoing of his soul to God, the other its practical outgoing to men. are come up for a memorial before God—i.e., as a sacrifice well-pleasing unto God, as an odor of a sweet smell (Rev. 8:4). 5. send to Joppa . . . for one Simon . . .—(See on ch. 9:11).

7, 8. when the angel . . . was departed, he called—immediately doing as directed, and thereby showing the simplicity of his faith. a devout soldier of them that waited on him continually—of the "soldiers under him," such as the centurion at Capernaum had (Matt. 8: 9). Who this "devout soldier" was, can only be matter of conjecture. DA COSTA (Four Witnesses) gives a number of ingenious reasons for thinking that, having attached himself henceforth to Peter—whose influence in the composition of the second Gospel is attested by the earliest tradition, and is stamped on that Gospel itself—he is no other than the Evangelist Mark.

ADAM CLARKE

offend his Maker and his Judge. With all his house. He took care to instruct his family in the knowledge which he himself had received, and to establish the worship of God in his house. Gave much alms. His love to God led him to love men, and this love proved its sincerity by acts of beneficence and charity. Prayed to God alway. Was ever in the spirit of prayer and frequently in the act. What an excellent character is this! And yet the man was a Gentile! He was what a Jew would repute common and unclean; see v. 28.

3. He saw in a vision evidently. The text is as plain as it can be that an angel of God did appear to Cornelius. This was in a vision, i.e., "a supernatural representation"; and it was "manifestly, evidently" made, and at such a time too as precluded the possibility of his being asleep; for it was about the ninth hour of the day, answering to our three o'clock in the afternoon, the time of public prayer, according to the custom of the Jews, and while Peter was engaged in that sacred duty.

4. Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial. Being all performed in simplicity and godly sincerity, they were acceptable to the Most High. Come up for a memorial. This form of speech is evidently borrowed from the sacrificial system of the Jews. Pious and sincere prayers are high in God's estimation; and therefore are said to ascend to Him, as the smoke and flame of the burnt offering appeared to ascend to heaven. These prayers and alms came up for a memorial before God. This is a manifest allusion to the meat offering, which, in Lev. ii. 16, is said to be a memorial (speaking after the manner of men) to put God in remembrance that such a person was His worshipper and needed His protection and help.

6. Simon a tanner. See the note on chap. ix. 43. He shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do. This clause, so explanatory, is wanting in almost every MS. and version of note.

7. And a devout soldier. It has already been remarked that Cornelius had taken care to instruct his family in divine things, and it appears also that he had been attentive to the spiritual interests of his regiment. We do not find that it was then, even among the Romans, considered a disgrace for a military officer to teach his men lessons of morality and piety towards God, whatever it may be in some Christian countries in the present time.

8. He sent them to Joppa. It has been properly remarked that, from Joppa, Jonah was sent to preach to the Gentiles of Nineveh; and from the same place Peter was sent to preach the gospel to the Gentiles at Caesarea.

MATTHEW HENRY

difficulty, he has a vision here, to prepare him to receive the message sent him by Cornelius. Christ ordered them to teach all nations; and yet even Peter himself could not understand it, till it was here revealed by vision.

I. The circumstances of this vision.

1. It was when the messengers were now nigh the city, v. 9. Peter knew nothing of their approach, and they knew nothing of his praying; but he that knew both him and them was preparing things for the interview. He is pleased often to bring things to the minds of his ministers, which they had not thought of, just then when they have occasion to use them.

2. It was when Peter went up upon the house-top to pray. Peter was much in prayer. He prayed about the sixth hour, not only morning and evening, but at noon. From morning to night we should think to be too long to be without meat; yet who thinks it is too long to be without prayer? He prayed upon the house-top. He had this vision immediately after he had prayed. The ascent of the heart to God in prayer is an excellent preparative to receive the discoveries of the divine grace.

3. It was when he became very hungry (v. 10); and now he would have eaten. Now this hunger was a proper inlet to the vision about meats, as Christ's hunger in the wilderness was to Satan's temptation to turn stones into bread.

II. The vision itself. He fell into a trance. He quite lost himself to this world, and so had his mind entirely free for converse with divine things. The more clear we get of the world, the more near we get to heaven. He saw heaven opened, that he might be sure that his authority to go to Cornelius was indeed from heaven. He saw a great sheet full of all manner of living creatures, which descended from heaven, and was let down to him to the earth. Here were not only beasts of the earth, but fowls of the air, laid at his feet. Here were no fishes of the sea, because there were none of them in particular unclean. Some make this sheet, thus filled, to represent the church of Christ. In this we find some of all countries, without any distinction of Greek or Jew. The net of the gospel encloses all, both bad and good, those that before were clean and unclean. Or it may be applied to the bounty of the divine Providence. How should it double our comfort in the creatures, and our obligations to serve God in the use of them, to see them thus let down to us out of heaven! He was ordered by a voice from heaven to make use of this plenty and variety which God had sent him (v. 13): "Rise, Peter, kill and eat." It might be difficult for Jews to dine and sup with a Gentile, because they would have that set before them which they were not allowed to eat. Now they might fare as they feared, and therefore might eat with them. He stuck to his principles, and would by no means hearken to the motion (v. 14): Not so, Lord. Though hunger will break through stone walls, God's laws should be to us a stronger fence than stone walls. Temptations to eat forbidden fruit must not be parleyed with, but peremptorily rejected. The reason he gives is, "For I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean; hitherto I have kept my integrity in this matter, and will still keep it." His conscience could witness for him that he had never gratified his appetite with any forbidden food. God, by a second voice from heaven, proclaimed the repeal of the law in this case (v. 15): What God hath cleansed, that call thou not common. He that made the law might alter it when he pleased. He has now taken off that restraint, has cleansed that which was before polluted to us. We ought to welcome it as a great mercy; not so much because hereby we gain the use of swine's flesh, hares, rabbits, and other pleasant and wholesome food for our bodies, but chiefly because conscience is hereby freed from a yoke in things of this nature. This was done thrice, v. 16, with the same call to him, and the same reason. The instructions given us in the things of God need to be often repeated. But at last the vessel was received up into heaven. Those who make this vessel to represent the church, including both Jews and Gentiles, make this very aptly to signify the admission of the believing Gentiles into the church, and into heaven too. They are such as God has cleansed.

III. The providence which explained this vision, v. 17, 18. He doubted within himself what this vision which he had seen should mean. He had no reason to doubt the truth of it, all his doubt was concerning the meaning of it. Christ reveals himself to his people by degrees, and leaves them to doubt awhile, to ruminate upon a thing, and debate it to and fro in their own minds, before he clears it up to them. Yet he was made to know presently, for the men who were sent from Cornelius were at the gate enquiring whether Peter lodged there; and by their errand it will

12. all manner of four-footed beasts . . .—i.e., the clean and the unclean (ceremonially) all mixed together.

I have never eaten anything that is common—i.e., not sanctified by divine permission to eat of it, and so "unclean." "The distinction of meats was a sacrament of national distinction, separation, and consecration" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. 15. What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common—The ceremonial distinctions are at an end, and Gentiles, ceremonially separated from the chosen people (vs. 28), and debarred from that access to God in the visible ordinances of His Church which they enjoyed, are now on a perfect equality with them. 16. done thrice—See Genesis 41:32.

9. On the morrow, as they went on their journey. The messengers could not have left the house of Cornelius till about two hours before sunset; therefore they must have travelled a part of the night in order to arrive at Joppa the next day, towards noon. Cornelius sent two of his household servants, by way of respect to Peter; probably the soldier was intended for their defense, as the roads in Judea were by no means safe. Peter went up upon the house top to pray. It has often been remarked that the houses in Judea were built with flat roofs, on which people walked, conversed, meditated, prayed. The housetop was the place of retirement, and thither Peter went for the purpose of praying to God.

10. He became very hungry. It seems that this happened about dinnertime, for it appears that they were making ready, "dressing the victuals" for the family. The dinner among the ancients was a very slight meal, and they had no breakfast; their supper was their principal meal. He fell into a trance. "An ecstasy fell upon him." A person may be said to be in an ecstasy when transported with joy or admiration, so that he is insensible to every object but that on which he is engaged.

11. And saw heaven opened. His mind now entirely spiritualized and absorbed in heavenly contemplation, was capable of discoveries of the spiritual world. A great sheet knit at the four corners. Perhaps intended to be an emblem of the universe and its various nations, to the four corners of which the gospel was to extend and to offer its blessings to all the inhabitants, without distinction of nation.

12. All manner of fourfooted beasts. Every species of quadrupeds, whether wild or domestic; all reptiles, and all fowls. Consequently both clean and unclean were present in this visionary representation, those that the Jewish law allowed to be sacrificed to God, or proper for food, as well as those which that law had prohibited in both cases.

13. Rise, Peter; kill, and eat. "Sacrifice and eat." Though this verb is sometimes used to signify the slaying of animals for food, yet as the proper notion is to slay for the purpose of sacrifice it appears to me to be better to preserve that meaning here.

14. Common or unclean. By common whatever was in general use among the Gentiles is to be understood; by unclean, everything that was forbidden by the Mosaic law. However the one word may be considered as explanatory of the other. The rabbins themselves, and many of the primitive fathers, believed that by the unclean animals forbidden by the law the Gentiles were meant.

15. What God hath cleansed. God, who made at first the distinction between Jews and Gentiles, has a right to remove it whenever and by whatever means He pleases. He, therefore, who made the distinction, for wise purposes, between the clean and the unclean now pronounces all to be clean.

16. This was done thrice. For the greater certainty, and to make the deeper impression on the apostle's mind. And the vessel was received up again into heaven. Both Jews and Gentiles came equally from God; and to Him, both, by the preaching of the gospel, shall again return.

17. While Peter doubted . . . the men . . . stood before the gate. In all this we find an admirable display of the economy of providence. Cornelius prays and has a vision which prepares appear what was the meaning of this vision. God knows what services are before us, and therefore how to prepare us; and we then better know the meaning of what he has taught us when we find what occasion we have to make use of it.

Verses 19–33

We have here the meeting between Peter and Cornelius. Though Paul was designed to be the apostle of the Gentiles, and Peter to be the apostle of the circumcision, yet it is ordered that Peter shall break the ice, and reap the first fruits of the Gentiles, that the believing Jews might be the better reconciled to their admission into the church, when they were first brought in by their own apostle.

I. Peter is directed by the Spirit to go along with Cornelius's messengers (v. 19, 20). Now the riddle is unriddled: While Peter thought on the vision; he was musing upon it, and then it was opened to him. Those that would be taught the things of God must think on those things. 1. Whence he had the direction. The Spirit said to him what he should do. It was not spoken to him by an angel, but spoken in him by the Spirit. 2. What the direction was. He is told that three men below want to speak with him (v. 19), and he must arise from his musings and go down to them, v. 20. Those that are searching into the meaning of the words of God, and the visions of the Almighty, should not be always poring, no, nor always praying, but should sometimes look about them. He is ordered to go along with the messengers to Cornelius, doubting nothing, not doubting whether he might go, no, nor whether he ought to go; for it was his duty. "Go with them, for I have sent them." When we see our call clear to any service, we should not suffer ourselves to be perplexed with doubts and scruples, or a fear of men's censure.

II. He receives both them and their message: He went down to them, v. 21. 1. He favourably receives their message. He asks what their business is: What is the cause wherefore you are come? and they tell him their errand (v. 22): "Cornelius, an officer of the Roman army, who fears God above many of good report among all the people of the Jews, was warned from God by an angel to send for thee to his house, and to hear words of thee." These words, Peter tells us more fully, are words whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved, ch. xi. 14. 2. He kindly entertained the messengers (v. 23): He called them in, and lodged them. What was getting ready for him (v. 10) they should be welcome to share in; he little thought what company he should have when he bespoke his dinner, but God foresaw it. Peter lodged them, though they were Gentiles, to show how readily he complied with the design of the vision in eating with Gentiles. Though they were two of them servants, and the other a common soldier, yet Peter thought it not below him to take them into his house.

III. He went with them to Cornelius. Peter was accompanied by certain brethren from Joppa, v. 23. Six of them went along with him, as we find, ch. xi. 12. This was one way in which the primitive Christians very much showed their respect to their ministers: they accompanied them in their journeys. It is a pity that those who have skill and will to do good to others by their discourse should want an opportunity for it by travelling alone. Cornelius had got some friends together of Cæsarea. Now when they came into the house of Cornelius Peter found, (1) That he was expected, and this was an encouragement to him. Cornelius waited for them, and such a guest was worth waiting for; nor can I blame him if he waited with some impatience. (2) That he was expected by many and this was a further encouragement to him. As Peter brought some with him to partake of the spiritual gift he had now to dispense, so Cornelius had called together, not only his own family, but kinsmen and near friends. We should not covet to eat our spiritual morsels alone. It ought to be both given and taken as a piece of kindness and respect to our kindred and friends to invite them to join with us in religious exercises, to go with us to hear a sermon.

IV. Here is the first interview between Peter and Cornelius. The profound respect and honour which Cornelius paid to Peter (v. 25): He met him as he was coming in, and he fell down at his feet and worshipped him. His worshipping a man was indeed culpable; but, considering his present ignorance, it was excusable. No wonder if, till he was better informed, he worshipped him, whom he was ordered to send for by an angel from heaven. Peter's modest refusal of this honour that was done him (v. 25): He took him up saying, "Stand up, I myself also am a man." The good angels of the churches cannot bear to have the least of that honour shown to them which is due to preparations here made—of Peter for his Gentile visitors, as of Cornelius for him—are devoutly to be noted. But besides this, at the same moment, "the Spirit" expressly informs him that three men were inquiring for him, and bids him unhesitatingly go with them, as sent by Him.

21. I am he whom ye seek—This seems to have been said without any communication being made to Peter regarding the men or their errand. 22. they said, Cornelius . . . a just man . . .—fine testimony this from his own servants. of good report among all the nation of the Jews—specified, no doubt, to conciliate the favorable regard of the Jewish apostle. to hear words of thee—See on ch. 11:14. 23. called them in and lodged them—thus partially anticipating this fellowship with Gentiles.

Peter went . . . with them, and certain brethren—six in number (ch. 11: 12). from Joppa—as witnesses of a transaction which Peter was prepared to believe pregnant with great consequences. 24. Cornelius . . . called together his kinsmen and near friends—implying that he had been long enough at Cæsarea to form relationships there and that he had intimate friends there whose presence he was not ashamed to invite to a religious meeting of the most solemn nature.

25-29. as Peter was coming in, Cornelius met him—a mark of the highest respect. fell down at his feet, and worshipped him—In the East this way of showing respect was customary not only to kings, but to others occupying a superior station; but among the Greeks and Romans it was reserved for the gods. Peter, therefore, declines it as due to no mortal [GROTIUS]. "Those who claim to have succeeded Peter, have not imitated this part of his conduct" [ALFORD] (therein only verifying II Thess. 2:4, and cf. Rev. 19:10; 22:9).

him to receive instruction from Peter; Peter prays and has a vision which prepares and disposes him to give instruction to Cornelius. While he is in doubts and perplexity what the full meaning of the vision might be, the messengers, who had been dispatched under the guidance of an especial providence, came to the door; and the Holy Spirit gives him information that his doubts should be all cleared up by accompanying the men who were now inquiring for him.

F. B. MEYER:

Jew and Gentile meet. It should be carefully noted that the mental impression which was produced by Peter's vision was corroborated by the fact of the knocking and inquiring group at Peter's door. This is God's invariable method. For us all, as we contemplate taking a new and important step in life, there is the urging of the Spirit, the impression or vision of duty, and the knock or appeal of outward circumstances.

Evidently Cornelius had gathered to his quarters in the barracks his kinsmen and a number of intimate friends, who were as eager as he to discover the will of God. They remained quietly waiting until the party from Joppa had completed their thirty-mile journey. Peter had taken the precaution of bringing with him six brethren, evidently with the expectation that the events of that day would not only create a new era, but would also be called into serious question.

The welcome that Cornelius gave was very significant. That a high-born Roman should prostrate himself before a Jewish evangelist was unprecedented, though it revealed the true reverence and humility of Cornelius's soul. But the noble simplicity of Peter's reply was also a revelation of the true greatness of the apostle, and ought to have more obviously influenced his would-be successors.—Bible Commentary

21. Which were sent unto him from Cornelius. This clause is wanting in almost every MS. of worth and in almost all the versions. What is the cause wherefore ye are come? He still did not know the full import of the vision; but being informed by the Holy Spirit that three men were seeking him and that he should go with them, without scruple, he instantly obeyed.

22. Cornelius the centurion. They gave him the simple relation which they had received from their master. To hear words of thee. But of what kind they could not as yet tell.

23. Then called he them in. They had already walked a long journey in a short time and needed refreshment; and it was thought expedient they should rest that night with Simon the tanner.

Certain brethren from Joppa. They were six in number, as we learn from chap. xi. 12. It was necessary that there should be several witnesses of the important transactions which were about to take place, as on no slight evidence would even the converted Jews believe that repentance unto life and the Holy Spirit should be granted to the Gentiles.

24. His kinsmen and near friends. His "relatives," and his "necessary friends." It appears that he had collected the whole circle of his intimate acquaintance, that they also might profit by a revelation which he expected to come immediately from heaven, and these amounted to many persons; see v. 27.

25. Fell down at his feet, and worshipped him. As Peter's coming was announced by an angel, Cornelius might have supposed that Peter himself was an angel, and of a superior order, seeing he came to announce what the first angel was not employed to declare. It was probably in consequence of this thought that he prostrated himself before Peter, offering him the highest act of civil respect; for there was nothing in the act, as performed by Cornelius, which belonged to the worship of the true God.

MATTHEW HENRY

God only. Christ's faithful servants could better bear to be vilified than to be deified. Let him know that Peter is a man, that the treasure is in earthen vessels, that he may value the treasure for its own sake.

V. The account which Peter and Cornelius give to each other, and to the company, of the hand of Heaven in bringing them together: As he talked with him he went in, v. 27. When he came in, he found many that were come together, which added solemnity, as well as opportunity of doing good, to this service.

1. Peter declares the direction God gave to him to come to those Gentiles, v. 28, 29. They knew it had never been allowed by the Jews, but always looked upon as an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company or come unto one of another nation, an uncircumcised Gentile. It was not made so by the law of God, but by the decree of their wise men. They did not forbid them to converse or traffic with Gentiles in the street or shop, or upon the exchange, but to eat with them. They might not come into the house of a Gentile. Thus scornfully did the Jews look upon the Gentiles, who were not behindhand with them in contempt. "But now," saith Peter, "God hath shown me that I should not call any man common or unclean." Peter, who had taught his new converts to save themselves from the untoward generation of wicked men (ch. ii. 40), is now himself taught to join himself with the towardly generation of devout Gentiles. He assures them of his readiness to do them all the good offices he could. Having now received permission, he was at their service: "Therefore came I unto you without gainsaying, as soon as I was sent for." He enquires wherein he might be serviceable to them: "I ask, therefore, for what intent you have sent for me?"

2. Cornelius declares the directions God gave to him to send for Peter.

(1) Cornelius gives an account of the angel's appearing to him, and ordering him to send for Peter. He tells how this vision found him employed (v. 30): Four days ago I was fasting until this hour. He was at the ninth hour praying in his house, not in the synagogue, but at home. At the ninth hour of the day, three of the clock in the afternoon, most people were travelling or trading, working in the fields, visiting their friends, taking their pleasure, or taking a nap after dinner; yet then Cornelius was at his devotions, which shows how much he made religion his business. He describes the messenger: There stood a man before me in bright clothing. He repeats the message that was sent to him (v. 31, 32), just as we had it, v. 4–6. Only here it is said, Thy prayer is heard. We are not told what his prayer was; but if this message was an answer to it, he prayed that God would make some further discoveries of himself, and of the way of salvation to him.

(2) He declares his own and his friends' readiness to receive the message Peter had to deliver (v. 33): Immediately therefore I sent to thee, and thou hast well done that thou hast come. Faithful ministers do well to come to people that are desirous to receive instruction from them; to come when they are sent for. "We are all here present before God. Therefore, because thou art come to us by such a warrant, on such an errand, we are present, and are ready to come at a call. We are all present." The whole of the man must be present; not the body here, and the heart, with the fool's eyes, in the ends of the earth. "We are present to hear all things that are commanded thee of God." Peter was there to preach all things that were commanded him of God. They were ready to hear, not whatever he pleased to say, but what he was commanded of God to say. "We are ready to hear all that thou art commissioned to preach, though it be ever so displeasing and ever so contrary to our former notions or present secular interests. We are ready to hear all, and therefore let nothing be kept back that is profitable for us."

We have here Peter's sermon. It is intimated that he expressed himself with a great deal of solemnity and gravity, but with freedom and copiousness, in that phrase, he opened his mouth, and spoke, v. 34. It was a new sermon.

I. Because they were Gentiles to whom he preached. He shows that they were interested in the gospel of Christ, and entitled to the benefit of it, upon an equal footing with the Jews. He therefore lays down this as an undoubted principle, that God is no respecter of persons. He doth not give judgment in favour of a man for the sake of any external advantage foreign to the merits of the cause. But in every nation he that fears God and works righteousness is accepted of him, v. 35. God never did, nor ever will, justify and save a wicked Jew that lived and died impenitent,

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

28. Ye know it is . . . unlawful . . . for . . . a Jew to keep company, or come unto one of another nation . . .—There was no express prohibition to this effect, and to a certain extent intercourse was certainly kept up. (See the Gospel history, towards the end.) But intimate social fellowship was not practiced, as being adverse to the spirit of the law.

29. I ask therefore . . .—The whole speech is full of dignity, the apostle seeing in the company before him a new brotherhood, into whose devout and inquiring minds he was divinely directed to pour the light of new truth.

30-33. Four days ago—the messengers being despatched on the first; on the second reaching Joppa (vs. 9); starting for Cæsarea on the third; and on the fourth arriving.

33. we are all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God—Beautiful expression of entire preparedness to receive the expected divine teaching through the lips of this heaven-commissioned teacher, and delightful encouragement to Peter to give free utterance to what was doubtless already on his lips!

34, 35. Peter opened his mouth—See on Matthew 5:2. Of a truth I perceive—i.e., 'I have it now demonstrated before mine eyes.' that God is no respecter of persons—Not, 'I see there is no capricious favoritism with God,' for Peter would never imagine such a thing; but (as the next clause shows), 'I see that God has respect only to personal character and state in the acceptance of men, national and ecclesiastical distinctions being of no account.'

ADAM CLARKE

28. Ye know how that it is an unlawful thing. He addressed the whole company, among whom, it appears, there were persons well acquainted with Jewish customs. But God hath shewed me. He now began to understand the import of the vision which he saw at Joppa. A Gentile is not to be avoided because he is a Gentile; God is now taking down the partition wall which separated them from the Jews.

29. I ask . . . for what intent ye have sent for me? Peter had been informed of this by the servants of Cornelius, v. 22; but as all the company might not have been informed of the circumstances, he, as it were, invites him to tell his story afresh, that his friends might be the better prepared to receive the truth which he was about to dispense in obedience to his divine commission.

30. Four days ago I was fasting until this hour. The word fasting is wanting in some MSS.

31. Thy prayer is heard. See the note on v. 4. Cornelius prayed, fasted, and gave alms. It was in this way he looked for salvation, not to purchase it; a thought of this kind does not appear to have entered into his mind. But these were the means he used to get his soul brought to the knowledge of the truth.

33. Are we all here present before God. The people were all waiting for the preacher, and every heart was filled with expectation; they waited as before God, from whose messenger they were about to hear the words of life.

34. God is no respecter of persons. He does not esteem a Jew because he is a Jew; nor does he detest a Gentile because he is a Gentile. It was a long and deeply rooted opinion among the Jews that God never would extend His favor to the Gentiles, and that the descendants of Jacob only should enjoy His peculiar favor whose privileges and professions, instead of screening him from the judgment of God, will but aggravate his guilt and condemnation. He never did, nor ever will, reject or refuse an honest Gentile, who like Cornelius, fears God, and worships him, and works righteousness, who lives up to the light he has. Whatever nation he is of, that shall be no prejudice to him. God judges of men by their hearts, not by their country or parentage; and, wherever he finds an upright man, he will be found an upright God. Fearing God, and working righteousness, must go together. But, where these are predominant, no doubt is to be made of acceptance with God. Those that have not the knowledge of him, and therefore cannot have an explicit regard to him, may yet receive grace from God for his sake, to fear God and to work righteousness; and wherever God gives grace to do so, as he did to Cornelius, he will, through Christ, accept the work of his own hands. This was always a truth, before Peter perceived it, that God respecteth no man's person. God will not ask in the great day what country men were of, but what they were. Yet now it was made more clear than it had been. Peter is here made to perceive it, by comparing the vision which he had with that which Cornelius had.

II. Because they were Gentiles inhabiting a place within the confines of the land of Israel, he refers them to what they themselves could not but know of our Lord Jesus: for these were things the report of which spread into every corner of the nation, v. 37.

1. They knew, in general, the word which God sent to the children of Israel: That word, I say, you know, v. 37. Though the Gentiles were not admitted to hear it, yet they could not but hear of it. We are often told in the gospels how the fame of Christ went into all parts of Canaan. That word of power and grace, you know. What the purport of this word was. God by it published the glad tidings of peace by Jesus Christ, so it should be read. It is God himself that proclaims peace, who justly might have proclaimed war. To whom it was sent—to the children of Israel, in the first place.

2. They knew the several matters of fact relating to this word of the gospel sent to Israel. They knew the baptism of repentance which John preached by way of introduction to it. They knew what an extraordinary man John was, and what a direct tendency his preaching had to prepare the way of the Lord. They knew that immediately after John's baptism the gospel of Christ, that word of peace, was published throughout all Judæa, and that it took its rise from Galilee. They knew that Jesus of Nazareth went about doing good. They knew what a benefactor he was to that nation; how he made it his business to do good to all. He was not idle, but still doing; went about from place to place, and wherever he came he was doing good. Hereby he showed that he was sent of God. They knew more particularly that he healed all that were oppressed of the devil. He was sent to destroy the works of the devil; for thus he obtained many a victory over him. They knew that the Jews put him to death; they slew him by hanging him on a tree. Whom they slew; they, to whom he had done and designed so much good. All this they knew; but lest they should think it was only a report, Peter, for himself and the rest of the apostles, attested it (v. 39): We are witnesses of all things which he did, both in the land of the Jews and in Jerusalem.

3. They might know, by all this, that he had a commission from heaven to preach and act as he did. This Jesus is Lord of all; not only as God over all blessed for evermore, but as Mediator, all power both in heaven and on earth is put into his hand, and all judgment committed to him. God anointed him with the Holy Ghost and with power, whence he was called Christ—the Messiah, the anointed One. He was full of power both in preaching and working miracles, which was the seal of a divine mission. God was with him, v. 38. God not only sent him, but was present with him all along. Those whom God anoints he will accompany; he will himself be with those to whom he has given his Spirit.

III. Because they had had no more certain information concerning this Jesus, Peter declares to them his resurrection from the dead, and the proofs of it. Probably they had heard at Cæsarea some talk of his having risen from the dead, soon silenced by that vile suggestion of the Jews, that his disciples came by night and stole him away. 1. The power by which he arose is incontestably divine (v. 40): Him God raised up the third day. He did not break prison, but had a legal discharge. God raised him up. 2. The proofs of his resurrection were incontestably clear; for God showed him openly. It was such a showing of him as amounted to a demonstration of the truth

But in every nation—not (observe), in every religion; according to a common distortion of these words. he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness—This being the well-known phraseology of the Old Testament in describing the truly godly man, within the pale of revealed religion, it cannot be alleged that Peter meant it to denote a merely virtuous character, in the heathen sense; and as Peter had learned enough, from the messengers of Cornelius and from his own lips, to convince him that the whole religious character of this Roman officer had been moulded in the Jewish faith, there can be no doubt that the apostle intended to describe exactly such saintship—in its internal spirituality and external fruitfulness—as God had already pronounced to be genuine and approved. And since to such "He giveth more grace," according to the law of His Kingdom (Jas. 4:6; Matt. 25: 29), He sends Peter, not to be the instrument of his conversion, as this is very frequently called, but simply to "show him the way of God more perfectly," as before to the devout Ethiopian eunuch. 36-38. the word . . . sent unto the children of Israel—for to them (he would have them distinctly know) the Gospel was first preached, even as the facts of it took place on the special theater of the ancient economy. preaching peace by Jesus Christ—the glorious sum of all Gospel truth (I Cor. 1:20-22). he is Lord of all—exalted to embrace under the canopy of His peace, Jew and Gentile alike, whom the blood of His Cross had cemented into one reconciled and accepted family of God (Eph. 2:13-18).

37. That word . . . ye know—The facts, it seems, were too notorious and extraordinary to be unknown to those who mixed so much with Jews, and took so tender an interest in all Jewish matters as they did; though, like the eunuch, they knew not the significance of them. which was published throughout all Judea, and began from Galilee—See Luke 4:14, 37, 44; 7:17; 9:6; 23:5. after the baptism which John preached—See on ch. 1:22. 38. Now God anointed Jesus of Nazareth—rather, 'Jesus of Nazareth (as the burden of that "published word"), how God anointed Him.' with the Holy Ghost and with power—i.e., at His baptism, thus visibly proclaiming Him MESSIAH, "the Lord's Christ." See Luke 4:18-21. For it is not His unction for personal holiness at His incarnation that is referred to—as many of the Fathers and some moderns take it—but His investiture with the insignia of the Messianic office, in which He presented Himself after His baptism to the acceptance of the people. went about doing good—holding up the beneficent character of all His miracles, which was their predicted character (Isa. 35:5, 6, etc.). healing all that were oppressed of the devil—whether in the form of demoniacal possessions, or more indirectly, as in her "whom Satan had bound with a spirit of infirmity eighteen years" (Luke 13:16); thereby showing Himself the Redeemer from all evil. for God was with him—Thus gently does the apostle rise to the supreme dignity of Christ with which he closes, accommodating himself to his hearers. 39-43. we are witnesses of all . . . he did—not objects of superstitious reverence, but simply witnesses to the great historical facts on which the Gospel is founded. slew and hanged—i.e., slew by hanging—on a tree—So ch. 5:30 (and see on Gal. 3:13). 40-41. showed him openly; and benediction. Of this opinion was Peter previously to the heavenly vision mentioned in this chapter. He was now convinced that God is no respecter of persons, that as all must stand before His judgment seat to be judged according to the deeds done in the body, so no one nation or people or individual could expect to find a more favorable decision than another who was precisely in the same moral state; for the phrase "respect of persons" is used in reference to unjust decisions in a court of justice, where through favor or interest or bribe a culprit is acquitted and a righteous or innocent person condemned. See Lev. xix. 15; Deut. i. 16-17; and xvi. 19.

35. But in every nation he that feareth him. In every nation he who, according to his light and privileges, fears God, worships Him alone (for this is the true meaning of the word), and worketh righteousness, abstains from all evil, gives to all their due, injures neither the body, soul, nor reputation of his neighbor, is accepted with him.

36. The word which God sent. Few verses in the New Testament have perplexed critics and divines more than this. The ancient copyists seem also to have been puzzled with it, as the great variety in the different MSS. sufficiently proves. A foreign critic makes a good sense by connecting this with the preceding verse, thus: "In every nation he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is accepted with him, according to that doctrine which God sent unto the children of Israel, by which he published peace (i.e., reconciliation between Jews and Gentiles) by Jesus Christ, who is Lord of all"; and because "Lord of all," both of Jews and Gentiles, therefore He must be impartial; and because impartial, or "no respecter of persons," therefore, "in every nation," whether Judea, Greece, or Italy, "he that feareth him [God], and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him." I believe the word should be translated, "that doctrine." The whole may be literally read thus: "As to the doctrine sent to the children of Israel, preaching the glad tidings of peace by Jesus Christ, He is Lord of all, ye know what was done through all Judea, beginning after the baptism which John preached. Jesus, who was from Nazareth, whom God anointed with the Holy Ghost, and with mighty power went about doing good, and healing all that were tyrannically oppressed by the devil, for God was with him."

37. That word . . . ye know. This account of Jesus of Nazareth you cannot be unacquainted with, because it has been proclaimed throughout all Judea and Galilee from the time that John began to preach. You have heard how He was anointed with the Holy Ghost, and of the miracles which He performed; how He went about doing good and healing all kinds of demoniacs and by these mighty and beneficent acts giving the fullest proof that God was with Him. This was the exordium of Peter's discourse, and thus he begins from what they knew to teach them what they did not know.

38. God anointed Jesus of Nazareth. Here the apostle refers to Christ as the promised Messiah; for as Messiah signifies "the Anointed One," and "Christ" has the same signification in Greek, and the Messiah, according to the prophets and the expectation of the Jews, was to work miracles, Peter proclaims Jesus as the Messiah, and refers to the miracles which He wrought as the proof of it. This delicate but forcible allusion is lost by most readers.

39. We are witnesses of all. In this speech Peter may refer not only to the twelve apostles but to the six brethren whom he had brought with him. Whom they slew. As the truth of the resurrection must depend on the reality of the death of Christ, it was necessary that this should be stated and shown to rest on the most indubitable evidence.

40. Him God raised up the third day. He lay long enough under the power of death to prove that He was dead; and not too long, lest it should be supposed that His disciples had time sufficient to practice some deceit or imposture; and to prevent this the Jews took care to have the tomb well-guarded during the whole time which He lay there.

of his resurrection. He showed him not publicly indeed, but evidently; not to all the people. By resisting all the evidences he had given them of his divine mission, they had forfeited the favour of being eye-witnesses of this great proof of it. Those who immediately forged and promoted that lie of his being stolen away were justly given up to strong delusions to believe it. A sufficient number saw him to attest the truth of his resurrection. The resurrection of Christ was proved before sufficient witnesses. They were not so by chance, but they were chosen before of God to be witnesses of it. They had not a sudden and transient view of him, but a great deal of free conversation with him: They did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead. This was not all; they saw him without any terror or consternation, he conversed with them so familiarly, that they did eat and drink with him.

IV. He concludes with an inference from all this, that therefore that which they all ought to do was to believe in this Jesus: he was sent to tell Cornelius what he must do, and it is this. One thing he lacked, he must believe in Christ.

1. Why he must believe in him. The Christian faith is built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, it is built upon the testimony given by them. By the apostles. Peter as foreman speaks for the rest, that God commanded them to preach to the people, and to testify concerning Christ. Their testimony is God's testimony; and they are his witnesses to the world. By the prophets of the Old Testament (v. 43): To him give all the prophets witness. Out of the mouth of these two clouds of witnesses, this word is established.

2. What they must believe concerning him. That we are all accountable to Christ as our Judge. This Jesus is ordained of God to be the Judge of the quick and dead, v. 42. He is empowered to prescribe the terms of salvation, that rule by which we must be judged. He hath assured us of this, in that he hath raised him from the dead (ch. xvii. 31), so that it is the great concern of everyone of us to make him our friend. That if we believe in him we shall all be justified by him as our righteousness, v. 43. The prophets did witness this, that through his name, whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins. This is the great thing we need, without which we are undone. And the remission of sins lays a foundation for all other favours and blessings. If sin be pardoned, all is well, and shall end everlastingly well.

We have here the issue and effect of Peter's sermon. They were all brought home to Christ.

I. God's owning Peter's word, by conferring the Holy Ghost upon the hearers of it (v. 44): While Peter was yet speaking these words the Holy Ghost fell on all those who heard the word, even as he did on the apostles at first; so Peter saith, ch. xi. 15. When the Holy Ghost fell upon them—while Peter was preaching. Thus God bore witness to what he said, and accompanied it with a divine power. The Holy Ghost fell upon others after they were baptized, for their confirmation; but upon these Gentiles before they were baptized: to show that God is not tied to a method, nor confines himself to external signs. How it appeared that the Holy Ghost had fallen upon them (v. 46): They spoke with tongues. When they spoke with tongues, they magnified God, they spoke of Christ and the benefits of redemption, which Peter had been preaching. Whatever gift we are endued with, we ought to honour God with it, and particularly the gift of speaking, and all the improvements of it. What impression it made upon the believing Jews that were present (v. 45): Those of the circumcision who believed were astonished, because upon the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost. Had they understood the scriptures of the Old Testament it would not have been such an astonishment to them.

II. Peter's owning God's work in baptizing those on whom the Holy Ghost fell. Though they had received the Holy Ghost, yet it was requisite they should be baptized; though God is not tied to instituted ordinances, we are. Though they were Gentiles, yet, having received the Holy Ghost, they might be admitted to baptism (v. 47): Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we? The argument is conclusive; can we deny the sign to those who have received the thing signified? It becomes us to follow God's indications, and to take those into communion with us whom he hath taken into communion with himself. Now it appears why the Spirit was given them before they were baptized—because otherwise Peter could not have persuaded

Not to all the people—for it was not fitting that He should subject Himself, in His risen condition, to a second rejection in Person.

but unto witnesses chosen before of God, . . . to us, who did eat and drink with him after he rose . . .—Not the less certain, therefore, was the fact of His resurrection, though withholding Himself from general gaze in His risen body.

he which was ordained of God to be the Judge of quick and dead—He had before proclaimed Him "Lord of all," for the dispensing of "peace" to all alike; now he announces Him in the same supreme lordship, for the exercise of judgment upon all alike. On this divine ordination, see John 5:22, 23, 27; ch. 17:31. Thus we have here all Gospel truth in brief. But, forgiveness through this exalted One is the closing note of Peter's beautifully simple discourse. 43. To him give all the prophets witness—i.e., This is the burden, generally of the prophetic testimony. It was fitter thus to give the spirit of their testimony, than to quote them in detail on such an occasion. But let this apostolic statement of the evangelical import of the Old Testament writings be devoutly weighed by those who are disposed to rationalize away this element in the Old Testament. whosoever believeth in him—This was evidently said with special reference to the Gentile audience then before him, and formed a noble practical conclusion to the whole discourse. 44, 45. While Peter yet spake . . . , the Holy Ghost fell—by visible and audible manifestation (vs. 46).

45. they of the circumcision . . . were astonished, . . . because that on the Gentiles also was poured out . . .—without circumcision. 46. heard them speak with tongues and magnify God—As on the day of Pentecost it was no empty miracle, no mere speaking of foreign languages, but utterance of "the wonderful works of God" in tongues to them unknown (ch. 2:11), so here; but more remarkable in this case, as the speakers were perhaps less familiar with the Old Testament songs of praise. 46-48. Then answered Peter, Can any man forbid water . . . which have received the Holy Ghost . . .—Mark, he does not say, They have received the Spirit, what need have they for water? but, Having the living discipleship imparted to them and visibly stamped upon them, what objection can there be to admitting them, by the seal of baptism, into the full fellowship of the Church? who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we—and are thus, in all that is essential to salvation, on a level with ourselves.

ADAM CLARKE

41. Not to all the people. In the order of divine providence the public were no longer to be instructed by Jesus Christ personally, but it was necessary those who were to preach redemption in His name should be thoroughly furnished to this good and great work; therefore the time He spent on earth after His resurrection was devoted to the instruction of His disciples. Witnesses chosen before of God. That is, God chose such men to attest this fact as were in every way best qualified to give evidence on the subject. The first preachers of the gospel must be the witnesses of its facts.

42. And he commanded us to preach. By thus assuring them that Jesus Christ was appointed to judge the world he at once showed them the necessity of subjection to Him, that they might stand in the day of His appearing. The Judge of quick and dead. The word quick we retain from our ancient mother tongue, the Saxon, "to live." By quick and dead we are to understand: (1) all that had lived from the foundation of the world till that time, and all that were then alive; (2) all that should be found alive at the day of judgment, as well as all that had died previously.

43. To him give all the prophets witness. See Isa. ix. 6; lii. 7; liii, 5-6; lix. 20; Jer. xxxi, 34; Dan. ix. 24; Mic. vii. 18, etc.; and Zech. xiii. 1. As Jesus Christ was the sum and substance of the law and the Mosaic dispensation, so all the prophets bore testimony, either directly or indirectly, to Him; and indeed without Him and the salvation He has promised there is scarcely any meaning in the Mosaic economy nor in most of the allusions of the prophets. Remission of sins. The phrase means simply the "taking away of sins"; and this does not refer to the guilt of sin merely, but also to its power, nature, and consequences. All that is implied in pardon of sin, destruction of its tyranny, and purification from its pollution is here intended; and it is wrong to restrict such operations of mercy to pardon alone.

44. While Peter yet spake. It is not very likely that the words recorded by Luke are all that the apostle spoke on this occasion; but while he continued to discourse with them on this subject, the Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the word, and His descent was known by their being enabled to speak with different kinds of tongues. In what manner this gift was bestowed we cannot tell; probably it was in the same way in which it had been given on the Day of Pentecost. For as they spake with tongues, which was the effect of the descent of the Spirit as flaming tongues on the heads of the disciples on the Day of Pentecost, it is very likely that the same appearance now took place.

45. They of the circumcision . . . were astonished. Because it was a maxim with them that the Shekinah or divine influence could not be revealed to any person who dwelt beyond the precincts of the Promised Land. Nor did any of them believe that the Divine Spirit could be communicated to any Gentile. It is no wonder, therefore, that they were amazed when they saw the Spirit of God so liberally given as He was on this occasion.

46. And magnify God. They had got new hearts as well as new tongues, and having believed with the heart unto righteousness, their tongues made confession unto salvation; and God was magnified for the mercy which He had imparted.

47. Can any man forbid water? These had evidently received the Holy Ghost and consequently were become members of the mystical body of Christ; and yet Peter requires that they shall receive baptism by water, that they might become members of the Christian Church. In other cases they received baptism first and the Spirit afterwards by the imposition of hands; see chap. xix. 4-6, where the disciples who had received only the baptism of John were baptized again with water in the name of the Lord Jesus; and after even this the apostles prayed and laid their hands on them before they were made partakers of the Holy Ghost. So we find that Jesus Christ had His water baptism as well as John, and that even He who gave the bap-himself to baptize them. Thus is there one unusual step of divine grace taken after another to bring the Gentiles into the church. How well is it for us that the grace of a good God is so much more extensive than the charity of some good men! Peter did not baptize them himself, but commanded them to be baptized, v. 48. The apostles received the commission to go and disciple all nations by baptism. But it was to prayer and the ministry of the word that they were to give themselves. The business of baptizing was therefore ordinarily devolved upon the inferior ministers; these acted by the orders of the apostles.

III. Their desire for further advantage by Peter's ministry: They prayed him to tarry certain days. They were not willing he should go away immediately, but earnestly begged he should stay for some time among them, that they might be further instructed by him. Those who have some acquaintance with Christ cannot but covet more. Even those that have received the Holy Ghost must see their need of the ministry of the word.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

48. he commanded them to be baptized—not doing it with his own hands, as neither did Paul, save on rare occasions (I Cor. 1:14-17; cf. ch. 2:38, and John 4:2).

prayed . . . him to tarry certain days—"golden days" [BENGEL], spent, doubtless, in refreshing Christian fellowship, and in imparting and receiving fuller teaching on the several topics of the apostle's discourse.

ADAM CLARKE

tism of the Holy Ghost required the administration of water baptism also.

48. To be baptized in the name of the Lord. That is, in the name of Jesus Christ, which implied their taking upon them the public profession of Christianity, and believing on Christ Jesus as their Saviour and Sovereign; for as they were baptized in His name, they professed thereby to be His disciples and followers. Then prayed they him to tarry certain days. They felt the necessity of further instruction, and prayed him to continue his ministry a little longer among them; and to this he no doubt consented. This was, properly speaking, the commencement of the Christian Church, as composed of Jews and Gentiles, partaking of the same baptism, united under the same Head, made partakers of the same Spirit, and associated in the same aggregate body. Now was the middle wall of partition broken down, and the Gentiles admitted to the same privileges with the Jews.

CHAPTER 11

It being so great a surprise to the believing as well as the unbelieving Jews, it is worth while to enquire how it was received.

I. Intelligence was presently brought of it to the church in Jerusalem, and thereabouts. Before he himself had returned to Jerusalem the apostles and the brethren there and in Judæa heard that the Gentiles also had received the word of God, that the Gentiles also themselves, with whom it had hitherto been thought unlawful to hold common conversation, had received the word of God. The word of God was preached to them, which was a greater honour put upon them than they expected. Thus often are the prejudices of pride and bigotry held fast against the clearest discoveries of divine truth. It was entertained and submitted to by them, which was a better work wrought upon them than they expected. They looked upon them as not inclined to religion, and therefore were surprised to hear that they had received the word of the Lord. We are too apt to despair of doing good to those who yet, when they are tried, prove very tractable.

II. Offence was taken at it by the believing Jews (v. 2, 3): When Peter had himself come up to Jerusalem, those that were of the circumcision contended with him. He went in to men uncircumcised, and did eat with them; and thereby they think he has stained, if not forfeited, the honour of his apostleship. It is the bane and damage of the church, to monopolize it, and to exclude those from it that are not in everything as we are. Christ's ministers must not think it strange if they be censured, not only by their professed enemies, but by their professing friends. But, if we have proved our own work, we may have rejoicing in ourselves, as Peter had, whatever reflections we may have from our brethren. Those that are zealous and courageous in the service of Christ must expect to be censured by those who, under pretence of being cautious, are cold and indifferent. Those who are of catholic, generous, charitable principles, must expect to be censured by such as are conceited and strait-laced.

III. Peter gave such a full and fair account of the matter of fact as was sufficient both to justify him, and to satisfy them (v. 4): He rehearsed the matter from the beginning.

1. He takes it for granted that if they had rightly understood how the matter was they would not have contended with him. We should be moderate in our censures, because if we rightly understood that which we are so forward to run down perhaps we should see cause to run in with it.

2. He is very willing to stand right in their opinion. He is ready to give a reason of the hope that is in him concerning the Gentiles, and why he had receded from his former sentiments, which were the same with theirs.

(1) He was instructed by a vision no longer to keep up the distinctions which were made by the ceremonial law; he relates the vision (v. 5, 6), as we had it before, ch. x. 9, &c. The sheet which was there said to be let down to the earth he here says came even to him. We should thus see all God's discoveries of himself, coming even to us, applying them by faith to ourselves. When the sheet came to him he fastened his eyes upon it, and considered it, v. 6. If we would be led into the knowledge of divine things, we must fix our minds upon them, and consider them. He tells them what orders he had to eat of all sorts of meat

Vss. 1-18. PETER VINDICATES HIMSELF BEFORE THE CHURCH IN JERUSALEM FOR HIS PROCEDURE TOWARDS THE GENTILES. 1-11. the apostles and brethren . . . in Judea—rather, 'throughout Judea.'

2. they . . . of the circumcision—not the Jewish Christians generally, for here there were no other, but such as, from their jealousy for "the middle wall of partition" which circumcision raised between Jew and Gentile, were afterwards known as "they of the circumcision." They doubtless embraced apostles as well as others.

3-4. Thou wentest in . . . . But Peter rehearsed the matter . . .—These objectors scruple not to demand from Peter, though the first among the apostles, an explanation of his conduct; nor is there any insinuation on Peter's part of disrespect towards his authority in that demand—a manifest proof that such authority was unknown both to the complainers and to himself.

CHAPTER 11

1. And the apostles and brethren that were in Judaea. According to Calmet, Judea is here put in opposition to Caesarea, which, though situated in Palestine, passed for a Greek city, being principally inhabited by pagans, Greeks, or Syrians.

2. Contended with him. A manifest proof this that the primitive church at Jerusalem had no conception of Peter's supremacy or of his being prince of the apostles. He is now called to account for his conduct, which they judged to be reprehensible.

3. Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised. In a Jew, this was no small offense; and as they did not know the reason of Peter's conduct, it is no wonder they should call him to account for it, as they considered it to be a positive transgression of the law and custom of the Jews.

4. But Peter rehearsed the matter from the beginning, and expounded it by order. To remove their prejudice and to give them the fullest reasons for his conduct, he thought it best to give them a simple relation of the whole affair; which he did, as we have seen in the preceding chapter, with a few additional circumstances here.

without distinction, asking no questions for conscience' sake, v. 7. He pleads that he was averse to the thoughts of conversing with Gentiles, as they could be, and therefore refused the liberty given him: Not so, Lord; for nothing common or unclean has at any time entered into my mouth, v. 8. But he was told that God had cleansed those persons and things which were before polluted; and therefore that he must no longer call them common (v. 9); so that he was not to be blamed for changing his thoughts, when God had changed the thing. And, that they might be sure he was not deceived in it, he tells them it was done three times (v. 10). And, further to confirm him that it was a divine vision, the things he saw did not vanish away into the air, but were drawn up again into heaven.

(2) He was particularly directed by the Spirit to go along with the messengers that Cornelius sent. He observes to them the time when the messengers came—immediately after he had that vision; yet, lest this should not be sufficient to clear his way, the Spirit bade him go with the men, nothing doubting (v. 11, 12). He must make no scruple of going along with them.

(3) He took some of his brethren along with him, who were of the circumcision, that they might be satisfied as well as he. He did not act separately, but with advice; not rashly, but upon due deliberation.

(4) Cornelius had a vision too (v. 13): He showed us how he had seen an angel in his house, that bade him send to Joppa for one Simon, whose surname is Peter. Peter is the more confirmed in the truth of his vision by Cornelius's, and Cornelius by Peter's. Here is something added in what the angel said to Cornelius; before it was, Send for Peter, and he shall speak to thee, he shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do (ch. x. 6, 32); but here it is, "He shall tell thee words whereby thou and thy house shall be saved" (v. 14). The words of the gospel are words whereby we may be eternally saved; not merely by hearing them, but by believing and obeying them. They open the way of salvation to us. Those that embrace the gospel of Christ will have salvation brought by it to their families: "Thou and all thy house shall be saved. Thy house shall be as welcome to the benefit of the salvation as thou thyself, even the meanest servant thou hast." Now salvation is brought to the Gentiles.

(5) That which put the matter past all dispute was the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the Gentile hearers. The fact was plain and undeniable (v. 15): "As I began to speak the Holy Ghost fell on them as on us at the beginning." Thus God attested what was done, and declared his approbation of it. Peter was hereby put in mind of a saying of his Master's: John baptized with water; but you shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost, v. 16. The Holy Ghost was the gift of Christ, and the product and performance of that great promise which he left with them when he went to heaven. It was therefore without doubt from him that this gift came. As it was promised by his mouth, so it was performed by his hand. The gift of the Holy Ghost was a kind of baptism. Comparing that promise, so worded, with this gift just now conferred, he concluded that the question was determined by Christ himself (v. 17): "Forasmuch then as God gave them the like gift as he did to us—gave it to us as believing in the Lord Jesus Christ, and to them upon their believing in him—What was I, that I could withstand God? Could I refuse to baptize them with water, whom God had baptized with the Holy Ghost?" Those take too much upon them who contrive how to exclude from their communion those whom God has taken into communion with himself.

IV. This account which Peter gave of the matter satisfied them. Some people, when they have fastened a censure upon a person, will stick to it, though afterwards it appear ever so plainly to be unjust and groundless. It was not so here. When they heard this they held their peace and said no more against what Peter had done. They not only held their peace from quarrelling with Peter, but opened their mouths to glorify God. They were thankful that God had shown more mercy to the poor Gentiles than they were inclined to show them, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life! He hath granted them the grace of repentance, in having given them his Holy Spirit, who gives a sight of sin and sorrow for it, and then a sight of Christ and joy in him. Repentance, if it be true, is unto life. Those that by repentance die unto sin thenceforward live unto God; and then, and not till then, we begin to live indeed, and it shall be to eternal life. Repentance is God's gift; it is not only his free grace that accepts it, but his mighty grace that works it in us. Wherever God designs to give life he gives repentance. God has exalted his Son Jesus not only to give re-

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

In the previous chapter (v. 29), these words occur: "Arise, and get thee down, and go with them, nothing doubting: for I have sent them." Such was the word of the Spirit to Peter on the housetop in Joppa. Again, in this eleventh chapter (v. 12), Peter says: "And the Spirit bade me go with them, making no distinction." The verb "contended with them" is exactly the same as that translated in those two passages: "nothing doubting" and "making no distinction." The word doubting is an insufficient word. The Spirit of God commanded Peter to go with these men, without wavering, without discrimination, without making distinction. When he came to Jerusalem, the brethren there did this very thing. They discriminated with him, debated with him, contended with him; and he told them that the Spirit had charged him to go with these men doing nothing of the kind. It is quite evident that these men in Jerusalem were passing through the mental experience through which Peter had passed. It was perfectly natural that he should waver, that he should discriminate between Gentiles and Hebrews; but the Spirit had charged him to make no such distinction, to go without wavering or contention.—The Acts of the Apostles

12-18. we entered the man's house—No mention of Cornelius' name, much less of his high position, as if that affected the question. To the charge, "Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised," he simply speaks of the uncircumcised "man" to whom he had been divinely sent. 13. seen an angel—lit., 'the angel,' for the rumor took that definite shape.

14. Who shall tell thee words whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved—The historian makes the angel express this much more generally (ch. 10:6). So also the subsequent report of it by the deputies and by Cornelius himself to Peter (ch. 10:22, 32). But as Peter tarried with Cornelius certain days, and they doubtless talked over the wonderful scene together, perhaps this fuller and richer form of what the angel said was given to Peter; or the apostle himself may have expressed what the angel certainly designed by directing them to send for him. Observe, "salvation" is here made to hang upon "words," i.e., the Gospel message concerning Christ. But on the "salvation" of Cornelius, see on ch. 10:34, 35. On that of his "house," see on Luke 19:10.

16-17. Then remembered I the word . . . John . . . baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost. Forasmuch then . . .—i.e., 'Since God Himself has put them on a level with ourselves, by bestowing on them what the Lord Jesus pronounced the higher baptism of the Holy Ghost, would it not have been to withstand God if I had withheld from them the lower baptism of water, and kept aloof from them as still "unclean?" '

18. held their peace and glorified God—Well had it been if, when Paul afterwards adduced equally resistless evidence in justification of the same line of procedure, this Jewish party had shown the same reverential and glad submission! Then hath God also granted to the Gentiles . . .—rather, 'granted to the Gentiles also.' (See a similar misplacement of "also" in Heb. 12:1.) To "grant repentance unto life"—i.e., 'such as issues in life' (cf. II Cor. 7:10, "repentance unto salvation")—is more than to be willing to pardon upon repentance [GROTIUS]. The case of Cornelius is so manifestly one of grace reigning in every stage of his religious history, that we can hardly doubt that this was just the feature of it which they meant here to express. And this is the grace that reigns in every conversion.

ADAM CLARKE

12. These six brethren. Probably pointing to them, being present, as proper persons to confirm the truth of what he was delivering.

14. Thou and all thy house shall be saved. This is an additional circumstance. Before, it was said, chap. x. 6, Peter "shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do"; and, in v. 32, "who, when he cometh, shall speak unto thee." But in Peter's relation the matter is more explicitly declared: He shall tell thee words, whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved. He shall announce to you all the doctrine of salvation.

16. Ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost. These words are very remarkable. The words of our Lord, as quoted in chap. i. 5, to which Peter refers here, have been supposed by many to be referred to the apostles alone; but here it is evident that Peter believed they were a promise made to all Christians, i.e., to all, whether Jews or Gentiles, who should believe on Jesus Christ. Therefore when he saw that the Holy Ghost fell upon those Gentiles, he considered it a fulfillment of our Lord's promise.

17. God gave them the like gift. Viz., the Holy Spirit, and His various gifts and graces, in the same way and in the same measure in which He gave them to us Jews. What was I, that I could withstand God? It was not I who called them to salvation; it was God; and the thing is proved to be from God alone, for none other could dispense the Holy Spirit.

18. They held their peace. Their prejudices were confounded; they considered the subject, and saw that it was from God. Then they glorified Him, because they saw that He had granted unto the Gentiles repentance unto life. As the word which we translate repentance signifies literally "a change of mind," it may be here referred to a change of religious views. And as repentance signifies a change of life and conduct, from evil to good, so the word may be used here to signify a change from a false religion to the true one, from idolatry to the worship of the true God. The Christians who were present were all satisfied with Peter's account and apology; but it does not appear that all were ultimately satisfied, as we know there were serious disputes in the Church afterwards on this very subject. See chap. xv. 5, where Christian believers from among the Pharisees insisted that it was necessary to circumcise the converted Gentiles and cause them to keep the law of Moses. This opinion was carried much further in the church at Jerusalem afterwards, as may be seen at large in chap. xxi.

pentance to Israel, and the remission of sins (ch. v. 31), but to the Gentiles also.

Verses 19–26

We have here an account of the planting and watering of a church at Antioch, the chief city of Syria, reckoned afterwards the third most considerable city of the empire. It is suggested that Luke, the penman of this history, as well as Theophilus, to whom he dedicates it, was of Antioch, which may be the reason why he takes more particular notice of the success of the gospel at Antioch.

I. The first preachers of the gospel there were such as were dispersed from Jerusalem by persecution, that persecution which arose at the time of Stephen's death (v. 19): They travelled as far as Phenice preaching the word. Thus what was intended for the hurt of the church was made to work for its good. The enemies designed to scatter and lose them, Christ designed to scatter and use them.

1. Those that fled from persecution did not flee from their work. Those that persecuted the preachers of the gospel hoped thereby to prevent their carrying it to the Gentile world; but it proved that they did but hasten it the sooner. Those that were persecuted in one city fled to another; but they carried their religion along with them.

2. They pressed forward in their work. When they had preached successfully in Judæa, Samaria, and Galilee, they travelled into Phoenicia, into the island of Cyprus, and into Syria. Though the further they travelled the more they exposed themselves, yet they travelled on; further still, was their motto.

3. They preached the word to none but to the Jews only who were dispersed in all those parts. They did not yet understand that the Gentiles were to be fellow-heirs, but left the Gentiles either to turn Jews, or else remain as they were.

4. They particularly applied themselves to the Hellenist Jews, here called the Grecians. Many of the preachers were natives of Judæa and Jerusalem; but some of them were by birth of Cyprus and Cyrene, as Barnabas himself (ch. iv. 36), and Simon (Mark xv. 21). These, being themselves Grecian Jews, had a particular concern for those of their own denomination, and applied themselves closely to them at Antioch. To them they preached the Lord Jesus. This was the constant subject of their preaching; what else should the ministers of Christ preach, but Christ?

5. They had wonderful success in their preaching, v. 21. Their preaching was accompanied with a divine power. The hand of the Lord was with them, to bring that home to the hearts and consciences of men which they could but speak to the outward ear. These were not apostles, but ordinary ministers, yet they had the hand of the Lord with them, and did wonders. Abundance of good was done: A great number believed, and turned unto the Lord. They believed; they were convinced of the truth of the gospel. The effect of this was that they turned unto the Lord. They turned from a confidence in the righteousness of the law, to rely only upon the righteousness of Christ, the righteousness which is by faith. They turned to the Lord Jesus, and he became all in all with them. Whatever we profess or pretend, we do not really believe the gospel if we do not cordially embrace Christ offered to us in the gospel.

II. The good work thus begun at Antioch was carried on to great perfection; by the ministry of Barnabas and Saul.

1. The church at Jerusalem sent Barnabas thither.

(1) They heard the good news, that the gospel was received at Antioch, v. 22. Tidings of these things came to the ears of the church that was in Jerusalem.

(2) They despatched Barnabas to them. They sent him forth as an envoy from them. He must go as far as Antioch. It is probable that Barnabas had a particular genius for work of this kind, and, his talent lying this way, he was fittest to be employed in this work. God gives various gifts for various services.

(3) Barnabas was wonderfully pleased to find that the gospel got ground, and that some of his countrymen, men of Cyprus, were instrumental in it (v. 23): When he came, and had seen the grace of God, he was glad. He saw the grace of God among them. What we see which is good in any we must call God's grace in them. We must be glad to see the grace of God in others, and the more when we see it where we did not expect it.

(4) He did what he could to confirm those in the faith who were converted to the faith. He exhorted them. It is the same word with that by which the name of Barnabas is interpreted (ch. iv. 36)—a son of exhortation; his talent lay that way. Or, being a son of consolation (for so we render the word), he comforted or encouraged them with purpose of heart

19-24. THE GOSPEL BEING PREACHED TO GENTILES AT ANTIOCH ALSO, BARNABAS IS SENT THITHER FROM JERUSALEM, WHO HAILS THEIR ACCESSION AND LABORS AMONG THEM. 19-24. they which were scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen—and who "went everywhere preaching the word" (ch. 8:4). travelled as far as Phenice—that part of the Mediterranean coast which, commencing a little north of Cæsarea, stretches northwards for upwards of 100 miles, halfway to Antioch. and Cyprus—See on ch. 4:36. An active commercial intercourse subsisted between Phenice and Cyprus. and Antioch—near the head of the northeast coast of the Mediterranean, on the river Orontes, and containing a large colony of Jews, to whose religion there were there numerous proselytes. "It was almost an Oriental Rome, in which all the forms of the civilized life of the empire found some representative; and through the two first centuries of the Christian era it was what Constantinople became afterwards, 'the Gate of the East' " [Hows].

20. some of them were men of Cyprus and Cyrene—(see on Luke 23:26); as Lucius, mentioned in ch. 13:1. spake unto the Grecians—rather, "the Greeks," i.e., uncircumcised Gentiles (as the true reading beyond doubt is). The Gospel had, from the first, been preached to "the Grecians" or Greek-speaking Jews, and these "men of Cyprus and Cyrene" were themselves "Grecians." How, then, can we suppose that the historian would note, as something new and singular (vs. 22), that some of the dispersed Christians preached to them?

21. a great number believed—Thus the accession of Cornelius and his party was not the first admission of uncircumcised Gentiles into the Church. (See on ch. 10:1.) Nay, we read of no influence which the accession of Cornelius and his house had on the further progress of the Gospel among the Gentiles; whereas there here open upon us operations upon the Gentiles from quite a different quarter, and attended with ever growing success. The only great object served by the case of Cornelius was the formal recognition of the principles which that case afterwards secured. (See on ch. 15.)

22. sent . . . Barnabas . . . as far as Antioch—implying that even on the way to Antioch he found churches to visit [OLSHAUSEN]. It was in the first instance, no doubt, a mission of inquiry; and no one could be more suitable to inquire into the proceedings of those Cyprians and Cyrenians than one who was himself a "Grecian" of Cyprus (ch. 4:36), and "a son of consolation."

23. when he . . . had seen the grace of God—in the new converts. was glad—owned and rejoiced in it at once as divine, though they were uncircumcised.

ADAM CLARKE

19. The persecution that arose about Stephen. That is, those who were obliged to flee from Jerusalem at the time of that persecution in which Stephen lost his life. See chap. viii. 1. Phenice. Phoenicia, a country between Galilee and Syria, along the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, including Tyre, Sidon, etc. It is often mentioned as a part of Syria. Cyprus. An island of the Mediterranean Sea, over against Syria. Antioch. A city of Syria, built by Antiochus Seleucus, near the Orontes River, at that time one of the most celebrated cities of the East.

Unto the Jews only. For they knew nothing of the vision of Peter, and did not believe that God would open the door of faith to the Gentiles. The next verse informs us that there were others who were better instructed.

20. Men of . . . Cyrene. The metropolis of the Cyrenaica, a country of Africa, bounded on the north by the Mediterranean and on the south by the Sahara. Spake unto the Grecians. "The Hellenists." Who these were, we have already seen, chap. vi and ix. 29, viz., Jews living in Greek cities and speaking the Greek language. But instead of Grecians, "Greeks" is the reading of several MSS. On this evidence Griesbach has admitted it into the text, and few critics entertain any doubt of the genuineness of the reading. This intimates that, besides preaching the gospel to the Hellenistic Jews, some of them preached it to heathen Greeks.

21. The hand of the Lord was with them. By the hand, arm, and finger of God, in the Scripture, different displays or exertions of His power are intended. Here it means that the energy of God accompanied them and applied their preaching to the souls of all attentive hearers. A great number believed. That Jesus was the Christ, and that He had died for their offenses and risen again for their justification. Because the apostles preached the truth, and the hand of God was with them, therefore a great number believed, and turned unto the Lord, becoming His disciples.

22. The church which was in Jerusalem. This was the original, the mother church of Christianity, not the church of Rome. A Christian church means a company of believers in Christ Jesus, united for the purposes of Christian fellowship and edification in righteousness. They sent forth Barnabas. It seems, then, that the church collectively had power to commission and send forth any of its own members whom it saw God had qualified for a particular work. There must have been, even at that time, an acknowledged superiority of some members of the church beyond others. The apostles held the first rank; the deacons (probably the same as those called prophets, as being next chosen), the second; and perhaps those called evangelists, simply preachers of the truth, the third rank.

23. Had seen the grace of God. That is, had seen the effects produced by the grace of God. Was glad. Not envious because God had blessed the labors of others of his Master's servants, but rejoiced to find that the work of salvation was carried on by such instruments as God chose and condescended to use. They who cannot rejoice in the conversion of sinners because they have not been the means of it, or because such converts or their ministers have not precisely the same views of certain doctrines which they have themselves, show that they have in them little, if anything, of the mind that was in Christ. With purpose of heart they would to cleave to the Lord. Barnabas was glad for what he saw of the grace of God among them, and therefore was the more earnest with them to persevere. To cleave to the Lord. Not to fall off from following him, not to flag and tire in following him. Not only to hold him fast, but to hold fast by him. To cleave to him with purpose of heart, with an intelligent, firm, and deliberate resolution.

(5) Herein he gave a proof of his good character (v. 24): He was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost, and of faith. He was not only a righteous man, but a good man, a good-tempered man. Ministers that are so recommend themselves and their doctrine very much to the good opinion of those that are without. He was a good man, that is, a charitable man; so he had approved himself, when he sold an estate, and gave the money to the poor, ch. iv. 37. He was richly endued with the gifts and graces of the Spirit. The goodness of his natural disposition would not have qualified him for this service if he had not been full of the Holy Ghost. He was full of faith, full of the grace of faith, and full of the fruits of that faith that works by love.

(6) He was instrumental to do good, by bringing in those that were without, as well as by building up those that were within: Much people were added to the Lord.

2. Barnabas went to fetch Saul. Barnabas takes a journey to Tarsus to tell him what a door of opportunity was opened at Antioch, and to desire him to come and spend some time with him there, v. 25, 26. And here also it appears that Barnabas was a good sort of a man in two things: (1) That he would take so much pains to bring an active useful man out of obscurity. It was he that brought him out of the corner into which he was driven, into a more public station. It is a very good work to fetch a candle from under a bushel, and to set it in a candlestick. (2) That he would bring in Saul at Antioch, who, being a chief speaker (ch. xiv. 12), would be likely to eclipse him there, by outshining him. Barnabas brought Saul to Antioch, though it might be the lessening of himself.

3. We are here further told,

(1) What service was now done to the church at Antioch. Paul and Barnabas continued there a whole year, presiding in their religious assemblies, and preaching the gospel, v. 26. Teaching the people is one part of the work of ministers. They are not only to be the people's mouth to God in prayer and praise, but God's mouth to the people in opening the scriptures, and teaching the good knowledge of the Lord. It is a great encouragement to ministers when they have opportunity of teaching much people, of casting the net of the gospel where there is a large shoal of fish. Preaching is not only for the conversion of those that are without, but for the instruction and edification of those that are within.

(2) What honour was now put upon the church at Antioch: There the disciples were first called Christians. Two such great men as Paul and Barnabas continuing there so long, being exceedingly followed, Christian assemblies made a greater figure there than anywhere, which was the reason of their being called Christians first there. Hitherto those who gave up their names to Christ were called disciples, learners, scholars; but henceforward they were called Christians. [1] Thus the reproachful names which their enemies had hitherto branded them with would, perhaps, be superseded. They called them Nazarenes (ch. xxiv. 5), the men of that way, that by-way, which had no name; and thus they prejudiced people against them. To remove the prejudice, they gave themselves a name which their enemies could not but say was proper. [2] Thus those who before their conversion had been distinguished by the names of Jews and Gentiles might after their conversion be called by one and the same name. Let not one say, "I was a Jew"; nor the other, "I was a Gentile"; when both the one and the other must now say, "I am a Christian." [3] Thus they studied to do honour to their Master, and showed that they were not ashamed to own their relation to him. They took their denomination not from the name of his person, Jesus, but of his office, Christ—anointed, so putting their creed into their names, that Jesus is the Christ. Their enemies will turn this name to their reproach, and impute it to them as their crime, but they will glory in it. [4] Thus they now owned their dependence upon Christ. [5] Thus they laid upon themselves, and all that should ever profess that name, a strong and lasting obligation to follow the example of Christ, and to devote themselves entirely to the honour of Christ. Are we Christians? Then we ought to do nothing to the reproach of that worthy name by which we are called. And as we must look upon ourselves as Christians, and carry ourselves accordingly, so we must look upon others as exhorted them all that with purpose of heart—as opposed to a hasty and fickle discipleship—they would cleave unto the Lord—the Lord Jesus.

24. For he was a good man—The sense of "good" here is plainly "large-hearted," "liberal-minded," rising above narrow Jewish sectarianism, and that because, as the historian adds, he was "full of the Holy Ghost and of faith."

and much people were added unto the Lord—This proceeding of Barnabas, so full of wisdom, love, and zeal, was blessed to the great increase of the Christian community in that important city.

25, 26. BARNABAS, FINDING THE WORK IN ANTIOCH TOO MUCH FOR HIM, GOES TO TARSUS FOR SAUL—THEY LABOR THERE TOGETHER FOR A WHOLE YEAR WITH MUCH SUCCESS, AND ANTIOCH BECOMES THE HONORED BIRTHPLACE OF THE TERM CHRISTIAN. 25. Then departed Barnabas to Tarsus for to seek Saul—Of course, this was after the hasty despatch of Saul to Tarsus, no doubt by Barnabas himself among others, to escape the fury of the Jews at Jerusalem. And as Barnabas was the first to take the converted persecutor by the hand and procure his recognition as a disciple by the brethren at Jerusalem (ch. 9:27), so he alone seems at that early period to have discerned in him those peculiar endowments by virtue of which he was afterwards to eclipse all others. Accordingly, instead of returning to Jerusalem, to which, no doubt, he sent accounts of his proceedings from time to time, finding that the mine in Antioch was rich in promise and required an additional and powerful hand to work, he leaves it for a time, takes a journey to Tarsus, "finds Saul" (seemingly implying—not that he lay hid [BENGEL], but that he was engaged at the time in some preaching circuit—see on ch. 15:23), and returns with him to Antioch. Nor were his hopes disappointed. As co-pastors, for the time being, of the Church there, they so labored that the Gospel, even in that great and many-sided community, achieved for itself a name which will live and be gloried in as long as this world lasts, as the symbol of all that is most precious to the fallen family of man:—"The disciples were called CHRISTIANS first in Antioch." This name originated not within, but without, the Church; not with their Jewish enemies, by whom they were styled "Nazarenes" (ch. 24:5), but with the heathen in Antioch, and (as the form of the word shows) with the Romans, not the Greeks there [OLSHAUSEN]. It was not at first used in a good sense (as ch. 26:28, and I Pet. 4:16 show), though hardly framed out of contempt [as DE WETTE, BAUMGARTEN, etc.]; but as it was a noble testimony to the light in which the Church regarded Christ—honoring Him as their only Lord and Saviour, dwelling continually on His name, and glorying in it—so it was felt to be too apposite and beautiful to be allowed to die.

ADAM CLARKE

cleave unto the Lord. These converts had begun well; they must continue and persevere. God gave them the grace, the principle of life and action; it was their business to use this. Barnabas therefore exhorted them with "determination" of heart, with "set, fixed purpose and resolution," that they would cleave unto the Lord: "to remain with the Lord"; to continue in union and fellowship with Him; to be faithful in keeping His truth, and obedient in the practice of it. It is absurd to talk of being children of God and of absolute, final perseverance when the soul has lost its spiritual union. There is no perseverance but in cleaving to the Lord; he who in his works denies Him does not cleave to Him.

24. For he was a good man. Here is a proper character of a minister of the gospel. (1) He is a good man. His bad heart is changed, his evil dispositions rooted out; and the mind that was in Christ implanted in him. (2) He is full of the Holy Ghost. He is holy, because the Spirit of holiness dwells in him. (3) He is full of faith. He implicitly credits his Lord; he knows that He could not lie—that His word could not fail.

25. To Tarsus, for to seek Saul. The persecution raised against him obliged him to take refuge in his own city, where, as a Roman citizen, his person was in safety. See chap. ix. 29-30.

26. He brought him unto Antioch. As this city was the metropolis of Syria and the third city for importance in the whole Roman Empire, Rome and Alexandria alone being more eminent, Barnabas might think it expedient to have for his assistance a person of such eminent talents as Saul, and who was especially appointed by Christ to proclaim the gospel to the Gentiles. Saul appears also to have been a thorough master of the Greek tongue, and consequently the better qualified to explain the gospel to the Greek philosophers, and to defend it against their cavils. Barnabas, also being a native of Cyprus, chap. iv. 36, where the Greek language was spoken, was judged to be proper for this mission, perhaps on this account, as well as on account of his disinterestedness, holiness, and zeal.

And the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch. It is evident they had the name Christians from Christ, their Master, as the Platonists and Pythagoreans had their name from their masters, Plato and Pythagoras. Now as these had their name from those great masters because they attended their teaching and credited their doctrines, so the disciples were called Christians because they took Christ for their Teacher, crediting His doctrines and following the rule of life laid down by Him. It has been a question, By whom was this name given to the disciples? Some think they assumed it; others, that the inhabitants of Antioch gave it to them; and others, that it was given by Saul and Barnabas. The word in our common text which we translate were called signifies, in the New Testament, to "appoint, warn, or nominate," by divine direction. In this sense the word is used in Matt. ii. 12; Luke ii. 26; and in the preceding chapter of this book, v. 22. If, therefore, the name was given by divine appointment, it is most likely that Saul and Barnabas were directed to give it; and that therefore the name Christian is from God, as well as that grace and holiness which are so essentially required and implied in the character. Before this time the Jewish converts were simply called, among themselves, disciples, i.e., scholars; believers, saints, the church, or assembly; and, by their enemies, Nazarenes, Galileans, the men of this way or sect; and perhaps by other names which are not come down to us. They considered themselves as one family, and hence the appellation of brethren was frequent among them. A Christian, therefore, is the highest character which any human being can bear upon earth; and to receive it from God, as those appear to have done—how glorious the title! It is however worthy of remark that this name occurs in only three places in the New Testament: here, and in chap. xxvi. 28, and in 1 Pet. iv. 16.

MATTHEW HENRY

Christians, and carry ourselves towards them accordingly. A Christian should be loved and respected for his sake whose name he bears, because he belongs to Christ.

Verses 27–30

When our Lord Jesus ascended on high he gave gifts unto men, not only apostles and evangelists, but prophets.

I. A visit which some of these prophets made to Antioch (v. 27): In these days came prophets from Jerusalem to Antioch. They came from Jerusalem. Jerusalem had been infamous for killing the prophets and abusing them, and therefore is now justly deprived of these prophets. They came to Antioch. Barnabas came to exhort them, and they, having received the exhortation well, now have prophets sent them to show them things to come.

II. A particular prediction of a famine approaching, delivered by one of these prophets, his name Agabus; we read of him again prophesying Paul's imprisonment, ch. xxi. 10, 11. Here he stood up and prophesied, v. 28. Whence he had his prophecy. He signified it by the Spirit, that there should be a famine. What the prophecy was: There should be great dearth throughout all the world, so that many of the poor should perish for want of bread. This should be not in one particular country, but through all the world, that is, all the Roman empire. Christ had foretold in general that there should be famines; but Agabus foretells one very remarkable famine now at hand. The accomplishment of it: It came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar; it began in the second year of his reign, and continued to the fourth, if not longer. Several of the Roman historians make mention of it, as does also Josephus.

III. The good use they made of this prediction. When they were told of a famine at hand, they did not hoard up corn for themselves; but, as became Christians, laid by for charity to relieve others.

1. What they determined—that every man, according to his ability, should send relief to the brethren that dwelt in Judæa, v. 29. The persons that were recommended to them as objects of charity were the brethren that dwelt in Judæa. Though we must, as we have opportunity, do good to all men, yet we must have a special regard to the household of faith. No poor must be neglected, but God's poor most particularly regarded. But the communion of saints is here extended further, and provision is made by the church at Antioch for the relief of the poor in Judæa, whom they call their brethren. Now we may suppose that the greatest part of those who turned Christians in that country were the poor. If there came a famine it would go very hard with them; and, if any of them should perish for want, it would be a great reproach to the Christian profession; and therefore this early care was taken, to send them a stock beforehand, lest, if it should be deferred till the famine came, it should be too late. The agreement there was among the disciples about it, that every man should contribute, according to his ability, to this good work. Merchants find their account in sending effects to countries that lie very remote; and so should we in giving alms to those afar off that need them, which therefore we should be forward to do when we are called to it. What may be said to be according to our ability we must judge for ourselves, but must be careful that we judge righteous judgment.

2. They did as they determined (v. 30). Which also they did. They not only talked of it, but they did it. Many a good motion of that kind is made and commended, but it is not prosecuted, and so comes to nothing. The collection was made, and was so considerable that they thought it worth while to send Barnabas and Saul to Jerusalem. They sent it to the elders of the churches in Judæa, to be by them distributed according to the necessity of the receivers, as it had been contributed according to the ability of the givers. It was sent by Barnabas and Saul. It is no disparagement, in an extraordinary case, for ministers of the gospel to be messengers of the church's charity.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

27-30. BY OCCASION OF A FAMINE, BARNABAS AND SAUL RETURN TO JERUSALEM WITH A CONTRIBUTION FOR THE RELIEF OF THEIR SUFFERING BRETHREN. 27. came prophets from Jerusalem—inspired teachers, a class we shall afterwards frequently meet with, who sometimes, but not necessarily, foretold future events. They are classed next to apostles (I Cor. 12:28, 29; Eph. 4:11).

28. that there should be great dearth throughout all the world—the whole Roman empire. which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar—Four famines occurred during his reign. This one in Judea and the adjacent countries took place, A.D. 41 [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 20:2, 5]. An important date for tracing out the chronology of the Acts. (But this subject is too difficult and extensive to admit of being handled here.)

29. Then the disciples, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief....—This was the pure prompting of Christian love, which shone so bright in those earliest days of the Gospel.

30. sent it to the elders—an office well known to be borrowed from the synagogue; after the model of which, and not at all of the temple, the Christian Churches were constituted by the apostles. by the hands of Barnabas and Saul—This was Saul's SECOND VISIT TO JERUSALEM after his conversion.

ADAM CLARKE

27. Came prophets from Jerusalem. Though the term prophet is used in the New Testament simply to signify a "teacher," yet here it evidently means also such as were under divine inspiration, and foretold future events. This was certainly the case with Agabus, v. 28, though perhaps his ordinary character was that of a "teacher" or "preacher." It seems from various scriptures, Romans xii; 1 Corinthians xiii and xiv, that the prophets of the New Testament were: (1) teachers or preachers in general; (2) persons who on special occasions were under the influence of the Divine Spirit, and then foretold certain future events; (3) persons who recited hymns to the honor of God in the public assemblies of the Christians; (4) persons who prayed in those assemblies, having sometimes the gift of tongues, at other times not. From Ephes. ii. 20 and iii. 5, we learn that the prophets of the Christian Church were inferior to the apostles; but, from v. 11 of Eph. iv, we see that they were superior to all other teachers, even to evangelists and pastors.

28. Agabus. This prophet, of whom we know nothing, is once more mentioned, chap. xxi. 10. He was probably a Jew, but whether converted now to Christianity we cannot tell. Great dearth throughout all the world. The words probably here mean the land of Judea, though sometimes by this phrase the whole Roman Empire is intended. In the former sense the disciples appear to have understood it, as the next verse informs us; for they determined to send relief to their brethren in Judea, which they could not have done had the famine been general. It does not appear that they expected it to extend even to Antioch in Syria, where they then were, else they would have thought of making provision for themselves.

It is well-known from history that there were several famines in the reign of Claudius. Dion Cassius, lib. lx, mentions a severe famine in the first and second year of the reign of Claudius, which was sorely felt in Rome itself. A second famine happened about the fourth year of this reign, which continued for several years, and greatly afflicted the land of Judea. Several authors notice this, but particularly Josephus, Ant., l. xx, c. 5, s. 2, where, having mentioned Tiberius Alexander as succeeding to the procuratorship in the place of Cuspius Fadus, he says that, "during the government of these procurators, a great famine afflicted Judea." A third famine is mentioned by Eusebius, in An. Abrahami, which commences with the calends of October, A.D. 48, which was so powerful "in Greece that a modius [about half a bushel of grain] was sold for six drachmas." A fourth famine, which took place in the eleventh year of Claudius, is mentioned by Tacitus, Annal., l. xii, s. 43, in which there was so great a dearth of provisions, and famine in consequence, that it was esteemed a divine judgment.

It may now be inquired, To which of these famines in the reign of Claudius does the prophecy of Agabus refer? Most learned men are of opinion that the famine of which Agabus prophesied was that mentioned above which took place in the fourth year of this emperor, A.D. 47. This famine is particularly mentioned by Josephus, Ant., l. xx, c. 2, s. 5, who describes it as "a very great famine, in which many died for want of food."

29. Then the disciples . . . determined to send relief. These were probably Gentile converts; and as they considered themselves receiving the spiritual blessings, which they now so happily enjoyed, through the means of the Christians in Judea, they resolved to communicate to them a portion of their temporal goods; and every man did this according to his ability, i.e., he gave a certain proportion of the property with which the providence of God had entrusted him.

MATTHEW HENRY

CHAPTER 12

Verses 1–4

Ever since the conversion of Paul, we have heard no more of the agency of the priests in persecuting the saints at Jerusalem. Here the storm arises from another point. The civil power acts by itself in the persecution. But Herod, though originally of an Edomite family, yet seems to have been a proselyte to the Jewish religion; for Josephus says he was zealous for the Mosaic rites, a bigot for the ceremonies. He was not only (as Herod Antipas was) tetrarch of Galilee, but had also the government of Judæa committed to him by Claudius the emperor, and resided most at Jerusalem, where he was at this time. Three things we are here told he did:

I. He stretched forth his hands to vex certain of the church, v. 1. Herod laid hands upon some of the church to afflict them, so some read it. See how he advances gradually. He began with some of the members of the church; played first at small game, but afterwards flew at the apostles themselves. He began with vexing them only, or afflicting them. Afterwards he proceeded to greater instances of cruelty.

II. He killed James the brother of John with the sword, v. 2. We are here to consider, 1. Who the martyr was: it was James the brother of John; so called to distinguish him from the other James the brother of Joses. This who was here crowned with martyrdom was one of the first three of Christ's disciples. He was one of those whom Christ called Boanerges—Sons of thunder; and perhaps by his powerful awakening preaching he had provoked Herod, as John Baptist did the other Herod. He was one of those sons of Zebedee whom Christ told that they should drink of the cup that he was to drink of, and be baptized with the baptism that he was to be baptized with, Matt. xx. 23. And now those words of Christ were made good in him. The apostle died a martyr, to show the rest of them what they must expect. 2. What kind of death he suffered: his head was cut off with a sword, a more disgraceful way of being beheaded than with an axe. It is strange that we have not a more full account of the martyrdom of this great apostle, as we had of Stephen. But even this short mention is sufficient to let us know that the first preachers of the gospel were so well assured of the truth of it that they sealed it with their blood.

III. He imprisoned Peter. When he had beheaded James, he proceeded further to take Peter also. Blood to the bloodthirsty does but make them more so, and the way of persecution, as of other sins, is downhill; when they are in they find they must on. Those that take one bold step in a sinful way give Satan advantage against them to tempt them to take another. It is therefore our wisdom to take heed of the beginnings of sin. He did this because he saw it pleased the Jews. The Jews made themselves guilty of the blood of James by showing themselves well pleased with it afterwards. Those will be reckoned with as persecutors who take pleasure in others' persecuting. Though he had no reason to fear displeasing them if he did not, yet he hoped to please them by doing it, and so make amends for displeasing them in something else. Those make themselves an easy prey to Satan who make it their business to please men. Then were the days of unleavened bread. It was at the feast of the passover. At the passover, when the Jews came from all parts to Jerusalem to keep the feast, they irritated one another against the Christians, and were then more violent than at other times. Here is an account of Peter's imprisonment (v. 4): When he had laid hands on him, he put him in prison. He was delivered to four quaternions of soldiers, that is, to sixteen, who were to be a guard upon him, four at a time. Thus they thought they had him fast. Herod's design was, after Easter, to bring him forth unto the people. He would make a spectacle of him. Herod will gratify them with the sight of Peter in bonds, of Peter upon the block, that they may feed their eyes with such a pleasing spectacle. And very ambitious surely he was to please the people who was willing thus to please them! He would do this after Easter—after the passover, certainly so it ought to be read, for it is the same word that is always so rendered. After the hurry of the feast was over, and the town was empty, he would entertain them with Peter's public trial and execution. And both Herod and the people long to have the feast over, that they may gratify themselves with this barbarous entertainment.

Verses 5–19

We have here an account of Peter's deliverance out of prison.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

CHAPTER 12

Vss. 1-19. PERSECUTION OF THE CHURCH BY HEROD AGRIPPA I—MARTYRDOM OF JAMES AND MIRACULOUS DELIVERANCE OF PETER. 1-3. Herod the king—grandson of Herod the Great, and son of Aristobulus. He at this time ruled over all his father's dominions. PALEY has remarked the accuracy of the historian here. For thirty years before this there was no king at Jerusalem exercising supreme authority over Judea, nor was there ever afterwards, save during the three last years of Herod's life, within which the transactions occurred.

2. killed James . . . with the sword—beheaded him; a most ignominious mode of punishment, according to the Jews. Blessed martyr! Thou hast indeed "drunk of thy Lord's cup, and hast been baptized with his baptism." (See on Mark 10:38-40.) A grievous loss this would be to the Church; for though nothing is known of him beyond what we read in the Gospels, the place which he had as one of the three whom the Lord admitted to His closest intimacy would lead the Church to look up to him with a reverence and affection which even their enemies would come to hear of. They could spring only upon one more prized victim; and flushed with their first success, they prevail upon Herod to seize him also.

3. because he saw it pleased the Jews—Popularity was the ruling passion of this Herod, not naturally so cruel as some of the family [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 19:7, 3]. to take Peter also—whose loss, at this stage of the Church, would have been, so far as we can see, irreparable.

Then were the days of unleavened bread—seven in number, during which, after killing and eating the Passover, no leaven was allowed in Jewish houses (Exod. 12). 4. delivered him to four quaternions of soldiers—i.e., to four parties of four each, corresponding to the four Roman watches; two watching in prison and two at the gates, and each party being on duty for the space of one watch. intending after Easter—rather, after the Passover; i.e., after the whole festival was over. (The word in our King James Version is an ecclesiastical term of later date, and ought not to have been employed here.) to bring him forth to the people—for execution; for during "the days of unleavened bread," or the currency of any religious festival, the Jews had a prejudice against trying or putting anyone to death.

ADAM CLARKE

1. Herod the king. This was Herod Agrippa, the son of Aristobulus, and grandson of Herod the Great; he was nephew to Herod Antipas, who beheaded John the Baptist, and brother to Herodias. He was made king by the Emperor Caligula, and was put in possession of all the territories formerly held by his uncle Philip and by Lysanias; viz., Iturea, Trachonitis, Abilene, with Gaulonitis, Batanaea, and Penias. To these the Emperor Claudius afterwards added Judea and Samaria; which were nearly all the dominions possessed by his grandfather, Herod the Great.

2. He killed James the brother of John with the sword. This was James the Greater, son of Zebedee, and must be distinguished from James the Less, son of Alphaeus. This latter was put to death by Ananias, the high priest, during the reign of Nero. This James with his brother John were those who requested to sit on the right and left hand of our Lord, see Matt. xx. 23; and our Lord's prediction was now fulfilled in one of them, who by his martyrdom drank of our Lord's cup and was baptized with His baptism. By the death of James, the number of the apostles was reduced to eleven; and we do not find that ever it was filled. The apostles never had any successors; God has continued their doctrine, but not their order. By killing with the sword we are to understand beheading. Among the Jews there were four kinds of deaths: (1) stoning; (2) burning; (3) killing with the sword, or beheading; and (4) strangling. The third was a Roman as well as a Jewish mode of punishment. Killing with the sword was the punishment which, according to the Talmud, was inflicted on those who drew away the people to any strange worship, Sanhedr., fol. iii. James was probably accused of this, and hence the punishment mentioned in the text.

3. He proceeded . . . to take Peter also. He supposed that these two were pillars on which the infant cause rested; and that, if these were removed, the building must necessarily come down. The days of unleavened bread. About the latter end of March or beginning of April.

4. Four quaternions of soldiers. That is, sixteen, or four companies of four men each, who had the care of the prison, each company taking in turn one of the four watches of the night. Intending after Easter to bring him forth. "After the Passover." Perhaps there never was a more unhappy, not to say absurd, translation than that in our text. But before I come to explain the word, it is necessary to observe that our term called Easter is not exactly the same with the Jewish Passover. This festival is always held on the fourteenth day of the first vernal full moon; but the Easter of the Christians, never till the next Sabbath after said full moon. The first vernal moon is that whose fourteenth day is either on the day of the vernal equinox or the next fourteenth day after it. The vernal equinox, according to a decree of the council of Nice, is fixed to the twenty-first day of March; and therefore the first vernal moon is that whose fourteenth day falls upon the twenty-first of March or the first fourteenth day after. The earliest Paschal term being the twenty-first of March, the twenty-second of March is the earliest Easter possible; and the eighteenth of April being the latest Paschal term, the seventh day after, that is, the twenty-fifth of April, is the latest Easter possible. The term Easter, inserted here by our translators, they borrowed from the ancient Anglo-Saxon service books, or from the version of the Gospels which always translates the to pascha of the Greek by this term. Wycliffe used the word paske, i.e., Passover; but Tyndale, Coverdale, following the old Saxon mode of translation, insert Easter; the Geneva Bible very properly renders it the Passover.

MATTHEW HENRY

I. It was a signal answer to prayer (v. 5): Peter was kept in prison. But prayer was made without ceasing of the church unto God for him, for prayers and tears are the church's arms; therewith she fights, not only against her enemies, but for her friends. The delay of Peter's trial gave them time for prayer. James must be offered upon the sacrifice and service of their faith; but Peter must be continued to them, and therefore prayer for him is stirred up, and time is given them for it, by Herod's putting off the prosecution. They were very particular in their prayers for him, that it would please God to defeat Herod's purpose. The death of James alarmed them to a greater fervency in their prayer for Peter. Though the death and sufferings of Christ's ministers may be made greatly to serve the interests of Christ's kingdom, yet it is the duty and concern of the church earnestly to pray for their life, liberty, and tranquillity. Prayer was made without ceasing. It was an extended prayer. Times of public distress and danger should be praying times with the church; we must pray always, but then especially.

II. Let us observe when his deliverance came. 1. It was the very night before Herod designed to bring him forth. Herod resolves he shall die, and now God opened a door of escape for him. God's time to help is when things are brought to the last extremity. 2. It was when he was fast bound with two chains, between two soldiers; and, besides this, to make sure work, the keepers before the door kept the prison, that no one might so much as attempt to rescue him. Never could the art of man do more to secure a prisoner. When men will think to be too hard for God, God will make it appear that he is too hard for them. 3. It was when he was sleeping between the soldiers. Not terrified with his danger. There was but a step between him and death, and yet he could lay himself down in peace, and sleep—sleep in the midst of his enemies. Even in prison, between two soldiers, God gives him sleep. Not expecting his deliverance. He did not keep awake, and was perfectly surprised with his deliverance.

III. An angel was sent from heaven on purpose to rescue him.

1. The angel of the Lord came upon him; stood over him. He seemed as one abandoned by men, yet not forgotten of his God. Gates and guards kept all his friends from him, but could not keep the angels of God from him. Wherever the people of God are they have a way open heavenward, nor can anything intercept their intercourse with God.

2. A light shone in the prison. Though it is a dark place, and in the night, Peter shall see his way clear.

3. The angel awoke Peter, by giving him a blow on his side, a gentle touch, enough to rouse him out of his sleep. When good people slumber in a time of danger, let them expect to be smitten on the side by some sharp affliction; better be raised up so than left asleep. The language of this stroke was, Arise up quickly.

4. His chains fell off from his hands. They had handcuffed him, to make him sure, but God loosed his hands.

5. He was ordered to dress himself immediately, and follow the angel; and he did so, v. 8, 9. When Peter was awake he knew not what to do but as the angel directed him. He must gird himself. He must bind on his sandals, that he might be fit to walk. He must cast his garments about him, and follow the angel; and he might go with a great deal of courage and cheerfulness who had a messenger from heaven for his guide and guard. He went out, and followed him. Those who are delivered out of a spiritual imprisonment must follow their deliverer, as Israel did; they went out, not knowing whither they went, but whom they followed. When Peter went out after the angel, he knew not that it was true which was done by the angel, but thought he saw a vision. He thought the news was too good to be true.

6. He was led safely by the angel out of danger, v. 10. Guards were kept at one pass and at another, which they were to make their way through, and they did so without any opposition; nay, for aught that appears, without any discovery. The angel and Peter safely passed the first and second ward. But still there is an iron gate, after all, that will stop them. Up to that gate they march, and it opened to them. They did not so much as put a hand to it, but it opened of its own accord, by an invisible power. When God will work salvation for his people, no difficulties in their way are insuperable; but even gates of iron are made to open of their own accord. This iron gate led him into the city out of the castle or tower, so that, when they were through this, they were got into the street. This deliverance of Peter represents to us our redemption by Christ, which is often spoken of as the setting of prisoners free, not

5, 6. prayer was made without ceasing—rather (Margin), 'instant,' 'earnest,' 'urgent'; as in Luke 22:44; ch. 26: 7; and I Peter 4:8 (see Greek). of the church unto God for him—not in public assembly, for it was evidently not safe to meet thus; but in little groups in private houses, one of which was Mary's (vs. 12). And this was kept up during all the days of unleavened bread.

6. And when Herod would have brought him forth—'was going to bring him forth.' the same night—but a few hours before the intended execution. Thus long were the disciples kept waiting; their prayers apparently unavailing, and their faith, as would seem from the sequel, waxing feeble. Such, however, is the law of God's procedure (Deut. 32:36, and see on John 21:3). Peter was sleeping between two soldiers, bound with two chains—Roman prisoners had a chain fastened at one end to the wrist of their right hand, and at the other to the wrist of a soldier's left hand, leaving the right arm of the keeper free in case of any attempt to escape. For greater security the prisoner was sometimes, as here, chained to two soldiers, one on each side. (See ch. 21:23.) Ye think your prey secure, bloodthirsty priests and thou obsequious tyrant who, to "please the Jews," hast shut in this most eminent of the servants of Christ within double gates, guarded by double sentinels, while double keepers and double chains seem to defy all rescue! So thought the chief priests, who "made the sepulchre of the Lord sure, sealing the stone and setting a watch." But "He that sitteth in heaven shall laugh at you." Meanwhile, "Peter is sleeping!" In a few hours he expects a stingless death; "neither counts he his life dear unto him, so that he may finish his course with joy and the ministry which he has received of the Lord Jesus." In this frame of spirit he has dropped asleep, and lies the picture of peace. 7-11. the angel of the Lord—rather, 'an angel'—came upon him—so in Luke 2:9, expressive of the unexpected nature of the visit. smote Peter on the side... Arise up quickly. And his chains fell off ... Gird thyself... And so he did... Cast thy garment—tunic, which he had thrown off for the night—about thee... follow me—In such graphic minuteness of detail we have a charming mark of reality: while the rapidity and curtness of the orders, and the promptitude with which they were obeyed, betoken the despatch which, in the circumstances, was necessary.

9. wist not that it was true; but thought he saw a vision—So little did the apostle look for deliverance! 10. first and the second ward ... the iron gate that leadeth unto the city—We can only conjecture the precise meaning of all this, not knowing the position of the prison.

ADAM CLARKE

5. Prayer was made without ceasing. The Greek word signifies both "fervor" and "earnestness," as well as "perseverance." These prayers of the church produced that miraculous interference mentioned below, and without which Peter could not have thus escaped from the hands of this ruthless king.

6. Sleeping between two soldiers, bound with two chains. Two soldiers guarded his person, his right hand being bound to the left hand of one, and his left hand bound to the right hand of the other. This was the Roman method of guarding their prisoners and appears to be what is intimated in the text.

7. Smote Peter on the side. He struck him in such a way as was just sufficient to awake him from his sleep.

8. Gird thyself. It seems Peter had put off the principal part of his clothes, that he might sleep with more comfort. His resuming all that he had thrown off was a proof that everything had been done leisurely. It appears that the two soldiers were overwhelmed by a deep sleep, which fell upon them from God.

9. He . . . wist not. He "knew" not. He supposed himself to be in a dream.

10. The first and the second ward. It is supposed that ancient Jerusalem was surrounded by three walls. If so, then passing through the gates of these three walls successively is possibly what is meant by the expression in the text. The prison in which he was confined might have been that which was at the outer wall. Iron gate. This was the innermost wall of the three, and was strongly plated over with iron, for the greater security. Perhaps this is all that is meant by the iron gate. One of the quaternions of soldiers was placed at each gate. Which opened . . . of his own accord. Influenced by the unseen power of the angel.

only the proclaiming of liberty to the captives, but the bringing of them out of the prison-house.

7. When this was done, the angel departed from him, and left him to himself. He was out of danger from his enemies, and needed no guard. He knew where he was, and how to find out his friends, and needed no guide. Miracles are not to be expected when ordinary means are to be used.

IV. Having seen how his deliverance was magnified, we are next to see how it was manifested.

1. How Peter came to himself, and so came himself to the knowledge of it, v. 11. So many strange and surprising things coming together upon a man just awoke out of sleep put him for the present into some confusion. At length Peter came to himself, and found that it was not a dream, but a real thing: "Now I know of a surety, now I know that it is truth, that the Lord Jesus hath sent his angel, and by him hath delivered me out of the hands of Herod, and so hath disappointed all the expectation of the people of the Jews." Peter, when he recollected himself, perceived of a truth what great things God had done for him, which at first he could not believe for joy. Thus souls who are delivered out of a spiritual bondage are not at first aware what God has wrought in them. Many have the truth of grace that want the evidence of it. But when the Comforter comes he will let them know of a surety what a blessed change is wrought in them.

2. How Peter came to his friends, and brought the knowledge of it to them.

(1) He considered the thing (v. 12), considered how imminent his danger was, how great his deliverance; and now what has he to do? God's providence leaves room for the use of our prudence; and, though he has undertaken to perform and perfect what he has begun, yet he expects we should consider the thing.

(2) He went directly to a friend's house; it was the house of Mary, a sister of Barnabas, and mother of John Mark. A church in the house makes it a little sanctuary.

(3) There he found many that were gathered together praying, at the dead time of the night, praying for Peter. [1] They continued in prayer, in token of their importunity. As long as we are kept waiting for a mercy we must continue praying for it. [2] It should seem that now when the affair came near to a crisis they were more fervent in prayer than before; and it was a good sign that God intended to deliver Peter when he thus stirred up a spirit of prayer for his deliverance. [3] They gathered together for prayer. They know what an encouragement Christ gave to joint-prayer. It was always the practice of God's praying people to unite their forces in prayer. [4] They were many that were got together for this work. No doubt but there were many private Christians that knew how to pray, and to pray pertinently, and to continue long in prayer. [5] Peter came to them when they were thus employed. It was as if God should say, "You are praying that Peter may be restored to you; now here he is."

(4) He knocked at the gate, and had much ado to get them to let him in (v. 13–16): Peter knocked at the door of the gate. [1] A damsel came to hearken; not to open the door till she knew who was there, and what their business was. It should seem, by her being named, that she was of note among the Christians, and more zealously affected to the better part than most of her age. [2] She knew Peter's voice. But, instead of letting him in immediately out of the cold, she opened not the gate for gladness. Thus sometimes, in a transport of affection to our friends, we do that which is unkind. [3] She ran in and told them that Peter was certainly at the gate. But, when she spoke of Peter's being there, they said, "Thou art mad; it is impossible, for he is in prison." Sometimes that which we most earnestly wish for we are most backward to believe, because we are afraid of imposing upon ourselves. However, she stood to it that it was he. Then said they, It is his angel, v. 15. "It is a messenger from him, that makes use of his name"; so some take it. When the damsel was confident it was Peter, because she knew his voice, they thought it was because he that stood at the door had called himself Peter. "It is one that comes with an errand from him, and thou didst mistake as if it had been he himself. It is his guardian angel." Some think that they supposed his angel to appear as a presage of his death approaching. If so, they concluded this an ill omen, and that the language of the apparition was, "Let it suffice you, Peter must die." Others think they took this to be an angel from heaven, sent to bring them a grant to their prayers.

(5) At length they let him in (v. 16): He continued knocking, and at last they admitted him. The iron gate opened of itself. The door of his friend's house passed on through one street; and forthwith the angel departed from him—when he had placed him beyond pursuit. Thus "He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their heads cannot perform their enterprise" (Job 5:12).

11. when Peter was come to himself—recovered from his bewilderment, and had time to look back upon all the steps that had followed each other in such rapid succession. Now I know of a surety, that the Lord hath sent his angel, and hath delivered me . . .—another evidence that Peter expected nothing but to seal his testimony with his blood on this occasion.

12-17. he came to the house of Mary . . .—who "must have had a house of some pretensions to receive a large number; and, accordingly, we read that her brother Barnabas (Col. 4:10) was a person of substance (ch. 4:37). She must also have been distinguished for faith and courage to allow such a meeting in the face of persecution" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. To such a house it was natural that Peter should come. mother of John . . . Mark—so called to distinguish him from the apostle of that name, and to distinguish her from the other Marys. where many were gathered together praying—doubtless for Peter's deliverance, and continuing, no doubt, on this the last of the days of unleavened bread, which was their last hope, all night in prayer to God.

came to hearken—not to open; for neither was it a time nor an hour of night for that, but to listen who was there.

opened not for gladness, but ran in and told . . .—How exquisite is this touch of nature!

Thou art mad—one of those exclamations which one can hardly resist on hearing what seems far 'too good to be true.' she constantly affirmed—kept steadfastly affirming'—that it was even so. Then said they, It is his angel—his disembodied spirit, his ghost; anything, in fact, rather than himself. Though this had been the burden of their fervent prayers during all the days of unleavened bread, they dispute themselves out of it as a thing incredible. Still, it is but the unbelief of the disciples who "believed not for joy and wondered" at the tidings of their Lord's resurrection. How often do we pray for what we can hardly credit the bestowment of, when it comes in answer to our prayers! This, however, argues not so much hard unbelief as that kind of it incident to the best in this land of shadows, which perceives not so clearly as it might how very near heaven and earth, the Lord and His praying people, are to each other. 16. Peter continued knocking—delay being dangerous.

ADAM CLARKE

The angel departed from him. Having brought him into a place in which he no longer needed his assistance. What is proper to God He always does; what is proper to man He requires him to perform.

11. When Peter was come to himself. Everything he saw astonished him; he could scarcely credit his eyes. He was in a sort of ecstasy; and it was only when the angel left him that he was fully convinced that all was real. And . . . all the expectation of the . . . Jews. It seems they had built much on the prospect of having him sacrificed, as they already had James.

12. And when he had considered. When he had weighed everything and was fully satisfied of the divine interposition, he went to the house of Mary, the mother of John Mark, the author of the Gospel, where it appears many were gathered together making prayer and supplication, probably for Peter's release.

13. As Peter knocked. The door was probably shut for fear of the Jews; and as most of the houses in the East have an area before the door, it might have been at this outer gate that Peter stood knocking. A damsel came to hearken, named Rhoda. She came to inquire who was there. Rhoda signifies a "rose"; and it appears to have been customary with the Jews to give the names of flowers and trees to their daughters.

15. It is his angel. It was a common opinion among the Jews that every man has a guardian angel, and in the popish church it is an article of faith. As angelos signifies in general "a messenger," whether divine or human, some have thought that the angel or messenger here means a servant or person which the disciples supposed was sent from Peter to announce something of importance to the brethren.

that was to welcome him does not open of its own accord, but must be knocked at, long knocked at. But, when they saw him, they were astonished, were filled with wonder and joy in him, as much as they were but just now with sorrow and fear concerning him.

(6) Peter gave them an account of his deliverance. When he came to the company they gathered about him to congratulate him on his deliverance; and herein they were so noisy that he could not make them hear him, but was forced to beckon to them with the hand to hold their peace, while he declared unto them how the Lord Jesus had brought him out of prison; and it is very likely he did not part with them till he and they had together solemnly given thanks to God for his enlargement. What is won by prayer must be worn with praise.

(7) Peter sent the account to others of his friends: Go, show these things to James, and to the brethren with him. He would have James and his company to know of his deliverance, not only that they might be delivered from their fears concerning Peter, but that they might return thanks to God with him and for him. Though Herod had slain one James with the sword, yet here was another James, and that in Jerusalem too, that stood up in his room to preside among the brethren there.

(8) Peter had nothing more to do for the present than to shift for his own safety. He departed, and went into another place. Even the Christian law of suffering for Christ has not repealed the natural law of self-preservation, as far as God gives an opportunity of providing for it.

V. Having seen the triumph of Peter's friends in his deliverance, let us next observe the confusion of his enemies thereupon. The guards were in the utmost consternation upon it (v. 18): As soon as it was day there was no small stir among the soldiers, what had become of Peter. They thought themselves as sure as could be of him but last night; yet now the bird is flown. Thus have the persecutors of the gospel of Christ been often filled with vexation to see its cause conquering. Houses were searched in vain for the rescued prisoner (v. 19): Herod sought for him, and found him not. Who can find whom God hath hidden? All believers have God for their hiding-place. The impotent world cannot reach them. The keepers were reckoned with; Herod examined the keepers, and he commanded that they should be put to death. Herod himself retired upon it: He went down from Judæa to Caesarea, and there abode. He was vexed to the heart, as a lion disappointed of his prey; and the more because he had so much raised the expectation of the people of the Jews concerning Peter. It made him ashamed to be robbed of this boasting, and to see himself disabled to make his words good. This is such a mortification to his proud spirit that he cannot bear to stay in Judæa, but away he goes to Cæsarea.

I. The death of Herod. God reckoned with him, not only for his putting James to death, but for his design to put Peter to death; for sinners will be called to an account for the mischief they have done and the mischief they would have done.

1. How the measure of his iniquity was filled up: it was pride that did it. The instance of it here is very remarkable, and shows how God resists the proud.

(1) The men of Tyre and Sidon had offended Herod. Some very small matter would serve such a man as Herod was for a provocation. He was highly displeased with this people.

(2) The offenders truckled. They submitted and were willing upon any terms to make peace with him. The reason why they were desirous to have the matter accommodated: Because their country was nourished by the king's country. Tyre and Sidon were trading cities, and were always supplied with corn from the land of Canaan. Now if Herod should make a law to prohibit the exportation of corn to Tyre and Sidon their country would be undone. And is it not then our wisdom to make our peace with God, and humble ourselves before him, who have a much more constant and necessary dependence upon him than one country can have upon another? The method they took to prevent a rupture: They made Blastus the king's chamberlain their friend. Blastus had Herod's ear, and has the art of mollifying his resentments; and a time is fixed for the ambassadors of Tyre and Sidon to come and make a public submission, to beg his majesty's pardon, and promise never again to offend. That which will thus feed his pride shall serve to cool his passion.

(3) Herod appeared in all the pomp and grandeur he had: He was arrayed in his royal apparel (v. 21), and sat upon his throne. Foolish people value men by their outward appearance; and no better are those

17. But he, beckoning . . . with his hand to hold their peace—a lively touch this. In the hubbub of joyful and wondering interrogatories there might mingle reflections, thrown out by one against another, for holding out so long against the testimony of Rhoda; while the emotion of the apostle's own spirit would be too deep and solemn to take part in such demonstrations or utter a word till, with his hand, he had signified his wish for perfect silence. Go show these things unto James and to the brethren—Whether James the son of Alpheus, one of the Twelve, usually known as "James the Less," and "James the Lord's brother" (Gal. 1:19), were the same person; and if not, whether the James here referred to was the former or the latter, critics are singularly divided, and the whole question is one of the most difficult. To us, it appears that there are strong reasons for thinking that they were not the same person, and that the one here meant, and throughout the Acts, is the apostle James. (But on this more hereafter.) James is singled out, because he had probably begun to take the oversight of the Church in Jerusalem, which we afterwards find him exercising (ch. 15). And he departed, and went into another place—according to his Lord's express command (Matt. 10:23). When told, on a former miraculous liberation from prison, to go and speak unto the people (ch. 5:20), he did it; but in this case to present himself in public would have been to tempt God by rushing upon certain destruction. 18, 19. as soon as it was day . . .—His deliverance must have been during the fourth watch (three to six A.M.); else he must have been missed by the keepers at the change of the watch [WIES]. examined the keepers—who, either like the keepers of our Lord's sepulchre, had "shaken and become as dead men" (Matt. 28:4), or had slept on their watch and been divinely kept from awaking. commanded that they should be put to death—Impotent vengeance!

20-25. HEROD'S MISERABLE END—GROWING SUCCESS OF THE GOSPEL—BARNABAS AND SAUL RETURN TO ANTIOCH. 20. Herod was . . . displeased with them of Tyre and Sidon—for some reason unknown; but the effect on their commercial relations made the latter glad to sue for peace.

their country was nourished by the king's country—See I Kings 5:11; Ezra 3:7; Ezekiel 27:17. Perhaps the famine (ch. 11:28) made them the more urgent for reconciliation.

ADAM CLARKE

17. Declared . . . how the Lord had brought him out of the prison. He still persisted in the belief that his deliverance was purely supernatural. It seems that some modern critics could have informed him of his mistake. Shew these things unto James, and to the brethren. That is, in one word, show them to the church, at the head of which James undoubtedly was, as we may clearly understand by the part he took in the famous council held at Jerusalem, relative to certain differences between the believing Jews and Gentiles. See chap. xv. 13-21. There is still no supremacy for Peter. He who was bishop or overseer of the church at Jerusalem was certainly at the head of the whole Church of God at this time; but James was then bishop or inspector of the church at Jerusalem, and, consequently, was the only visible head then upon earth. He departed . . . into another place. Where he went we know not, but it is probable that he withdrew for the present into a place of privacy, till the heat of the inquiry was over relative to his escape from the prison, for he saw that Herod was intent on his death.

19. Commanded that they should be put to death. He believed, or pretended to believe, that the escape of Peter was owing to the negligence of the keepers. Jailers, watchmen, etc., ordinarily suffered the same kind of punishment which should have been inflicted on the prisoner whose escape they were supposed to have favored. He went down from Judaea to Caesarea. How soon he went down and how long he stayed there we do not know.

20. Highly displeased with them of Tyre. On what account Herod was thus displeased is not related by any historian, as far as I have been able to ascertain. Josephus, who speaks of this journey of Herod to Caesarea, says nothing of it; and it is useless for us to conjecture. Having made Blastus . . . their friend. Blastus was probably a eunuch, and had considerable influence over his master, Herod; to reach the master, it is likely they bribed the chamberlain. Desired peace. The Tyrians and Sidonians being equally subjects of the Roman government with the inhabitants of Galilee, Herod could not go to war with them; but, being irritated against them, he might prevent their supplies. They therefore endeavored to be on peacable, i.e., friendly, terms with him. Their country was nourished by the king's country. That is, they had all their supplies from Galilee; for Tyre and Sidon, being places of trade and commerce, with little territory, were obliged to have all their provisions from the countries under Herod's jurisdiction. This had been the case even from the days of Solomon, as we learn from 1 Kings v. 11, where it is said that "Solomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures of wheat for food to his household, and twenty measures of pure oil: thus gave Solomon to Hiram year by year." See also Ezek. xxvii. 17.

who value themselves by the esteem of such as Herod did, who thought to make up the want of a royal heart with his royal apparel; and sat upon his throne.

(4) He made a speech to the men of Tyre and Sidon, a fine oration, and probably he kept them in suspense as to what their doom should be, till he made this oration to them, that the act of grace might come to them with the more pleasing surprise.

(5) The people applauded him. They gave a shout: It is the voice of a god, and not of a man, v. 22. It was not from any real impression made upon their minds, or any high or good thoughts they had indeed conceived of him; but they were resolved thus to curry favour with him, and strengthen the new-made peace between him and them. Thus great men are made an easy prey to flatterers if they lend an ear to them. This is a great injury to those who are thus flattered, as it makes them forget themselves, and so puffs them up with pride that they are in the utmost danger possible of falling into the condemnation of the devil.

(6) These undue praises he took to himself. This was his sin. His fault was that he said nothing, did not rebuke their flattery, nor give God the glory (v. 23); but was very willing that he should be thought a god and have divine honours paid him.

2. How his iniquity was punished: Immediately (v. 23) the angel of the Lord smote him because he gave not God the glory; and he was eaten of worms and gave up the ghost. Now he was reckoned with for vexing the church of Christ, killing James, imprisoning Peter, and all the other mischiefs he had done. It was no less than an angel that was the agent—the angel of the Lord—for those ministering spirits are the ministers either of divine justice or of divine mercy, as God is pleased to employ them. The angel smote him just at that instant when he was strutting at the applause of the people, and adoring his own shadow. The angel smote him, because he gave not the glory to God. It was no more than a worm that was the instrument of Herod's destruction: He was eaten of worms—he became worm-eaten, so it must be read; rotten he was, and he became like a piece of rotten wood. See here, What vile bodies those are which we carry about with us. We should not be proud of our bodies, we should not pamper our bodies, for this is but feeding the worms, and feeding them for the worms. See what weak and contemptible creatures God can make the instruments of his justice. See how God delights not only to bring down proud men, but to bring them down in such a way as is most mortifying. Herod is not only destroyed, but destroyed by worms, that the pride of his glory may be effectually stained.

II. The progress of the gospel after this. 1. The word of God grew and multiplied, v. 24. The courage and comfort of the martyrs, and God's owning them, did more to invite people to Christianity, than their sufferings did to deter them from it. After the death of Herod the word of God gained ground. 2. Barnabas and Saul returned to Antioch: When they had fulfilled their ministry they returned from Jerusalem. Though they had a great many friends there, yet at present their work lay at Antioch; and where our business is there we should be. Barnabas and Saul, when they went to Antioch, took with them John, whose surname was Mark, at whose mother's house they had that meeting for prayer which we read of, v. 12. She was sister to Barnabas. It is probable that Barnabas lodged there, and perhaps Paul with him, while they were at Jerusalem, and their intimacy in that family occasioned their taking a son of that family with them when they returned, to be trained up under them. Educating young men for the ministry, and entering them into it, is a very good work for elder ministers to take care of.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

21, 23. And upon a set day Herod . . . made an oration unto them—to the Tyrians and Sidonians especially. the people gave a shout . . .—JOSEPHUS' account of his death is remarkably similar to this (Antiquities, xix, 8. 2). Several cases of such deaths occur in history. Thus was this wretched man nearer his end than he of whom he had thought to make a public spectacle.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

23. "Smote him" (epataxen auton). Effective aorist active indicative of patasso, old verb, used already in verse 7 of gentle smiting of the angel of the Lord, here of a severe stroke of affliction. Like Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 4:30) pride went before a fall. He was struck down in the very zenith of his glory. "Because" (anth' hon). Anti with the genitive of the relative pronoun, "in return for which things." He accepted the impious flattery (Hackett) instead of giving God the glory. He was a nominal Jew. "He was eaten of worms" (genomenos skolekobrotos). Ingressive aorist middle participle, "becoming worm-eaten." The compound verbal adjective (skolex, worm, brotos, eaten, from bibrosko) is a late word (2 Macc. 9:9) of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, used also of a tree (Theophrastus), here only in the N.T. The word skolex was used of intestinal worms and Herodotus (IV. 205) describes Pheretima, Queen of Cyrene, as having swarms of worms which ate her flesh while still alive. Josephus (Ant. XIX. 8, 2) says that Herod Agrippa lingered for five days and says that the rotting of his flesh produced worms, an item in harmony with the narrative in Luke. Josephus gives further details, one a superstitious sight of an owl sitting on one of the ropes of the awning of the theater while the people flattered him, an omen of his death to him. Luke puts it simply that God smote him.—Word Pictures in the New Testament

24. But the word grew . . .—i.e., Not only was the royal representative ignominiously swept from the stage, while his intended victim was spared to the Church, but the cause which he and his Jewish instigators sought to crush was only furthered and glorified. How full of encouragement and consolation is all this to the Christian Church in every age! 25. Barnabas and Saul returned from Jerusalem—where, it thus appears, they had remained during all this persecution. when they had fulfilled their ministry—or service; that mentioned on ch. 11:29, 30. took with them John . . . Mark—(See on vs. 12), not to be confounded with the second Evangelist, as is often done. As his uncle was Barnabas, so his spiritual father was Peter (I Peter 5:13).

ADAM CLARKE

21. Upon a set day. A day on which games were exhibited in honor of the Roman emperor. What this refers to, we learn from Josephus. "Herod, having reigned three years over all Judea (he had reigned over the tetrarchy of his brother Philip four years before this), went down to Caesarea, and there exhibited shows and games in honour of Claudius, and made vows for his health. On the second day of these shows, he put on a garment made wholly of silver, and of a contexture most truly wonderful, and came into the theatre early in the morning; at which time the silver of his garment, being illuminated by the first reflection of the sun's rays, shone out after a surprising manner, and was so resplendent as to spread a horror over those who looked intently upon him; and presently his flatterers cried out, one from one place and another from another, 'He is a god:' and they added, 'Be thou merciful to us, for although we have hitherto reverenced thee only as a man, yet shall we henceforth own thee as superior to mortal nature.' Nor did the king rebuke them, nor reject their impious flattery. But, looking up, he saw an owl on a certain rope over his head, and immediately conceived that this bird was to him a messenger of ill tidings; and he fell into the deepest sorrow; a severe pain also arose in his bowels, and he died after five days' severe illness." This is the sum of the account given by Josephus, Ant., l. xix, c. 8, s. 2.

23. The angel of the Lord smote him. His death was most evidently a judgment from God. Because he gave not God the glory. He did not rebuke his flatterers, but permitted them to give him that honor that was due to God alone. And gave up the ghost. That is, he died of the disorder by which he was then seized, after having lingered in excruciating torments for five days, as Josephus has stated. Antiochus Epiphanes and Herod the Great died of the same kind of disease.

24. But the word of God. The Christian doctrine preached by the apostles grew and multiplied—became more evident, and had daily accessions; for the spirit of revelation rested on those men, and God was daily adding to that word as circumstances required, in order to complete that testimony of His which we now find contained in the New Testament. As there is in the original an allusion to the vegetation of grain (it grew, as corn grows, the stalk and the ear; it was multiplied, as the corn is in the full ear), there is probably a reference to the parable of the sower and his seed; for the seed is the Word of God and the doctrine of the Kingdom. It was liberally sown; it grew vigorously, and became greatly multiplied.

25. Returned from Jerusalem. That is, to Antioch, after the death of Herod. When they had fulfilled their ministry. When they had carried the alms of the Christians at Antioch to the poor saints at Jerusalem, according to what is mentioned, chap. xi. 29-30, to support them in the time of the coming famine. And took with them John, whose surname was Mark. This was the son of Mary, mentioned in v. 12. He accompanied the apostles to Cyprus and afterwards in several of their voyages, till they came to Perga in Pamphylia. Finding them about to take a more extensive voyage, he departed from them. See the case, chap. xiii. 13 and xv. 37-40.

We have here a divine commission to Barnabas and Saul to go and preach the gospel among the Gentiles.

I. Here is an account of the present state of the church at Antioch.

1. How well furnished it was with good ministers; there were there certain prophets and teachers (v. 1), men that were eminent for gifts, graces, and usefulness. Agabus seems to have been a prophet and not a teacher, and many were teachers who were not prophets. Antioch was a great city, and the Christians there were many; it was therefore requisite they should have many teachers.

CHAPTER 13

VSS. 1-3. BARNABAS AND SAUL, DIVINELY CALLED TO LABOR AMONG THE GENTILES, ARE SET APART AND SENT FORTH BY THE CHURCH AT ANTIOCH. The first seven chapters of this book might be entitled, The Church among the Jews; the next five (ch. 8-12), The Church in Transition from Jews to Gentiles; and the last sixteen (ch. 13-28), The Church among the Gentiles [BAUMGARTEN]. "Though Christianity had already spread beyond the limits of Palestine, still the Church continued a stranger to formal missionary effort. Casual occurrences, particularly the persecution at Jerusalem (ch. 8:2), had hitherto brought about the diffusion of the Gospel. It was from Antioch that teachers were first sent forth with the definite purpose of spreading Christianity, and organizing churches,

CHAPTER 13

1. Certain prophets and teachers. It is probable that these were not distinct offices, both might be vested in the same persons. By prophets we are to understand, when the word is taken simply, persons who were frequently inspired to predict future events; and by teachers, persons whose ordinary office was to instruct the people in the Christian doctrine. These also, to be properly qualified for the office, must have been endued with the influence of the Holy Spirit; for, as but a very small portion of the Scriptures of the New Testament could have as yet been given, it was necessary that the teachers should derive much of their own teaching by immediate revelation from God.

MATTHEW HENRY

Barnabas is first named and Saul last, but afterwards the last became first. Three others are mentioned. Simeon, or Simon, who for distinction-sake was called Niger, Simon the Black; Lucius of Cyrene; Manaen, a person of some quality, as it should seem, for he was brought up with Herod the tetrarch, was his comrade and intimate, which gave him a fair prospect of preferment at court, and yet for Christ's sake he quitted all the hopes of it. It is better to be fellow-sufferer with a saint than fellow-persecutor with a tetrarch.

2. How well employed they were (v. 2): They ministered to the Lord, and fasted. Diligent faithful teachers do truly minister unto the Lord. Those that instruct Christians serve Christ. Ministering to the Lord, in one way or other, ought to be the stated business of churches and their teachers. Religious fasting is of use in our ministering to the Lord. Though it was not so much practised by the disciples of Christ, while the bridegroom was with them, yet, after the bridegroom was taken away, they abounded in it.

II. The orders given by the Holy Ghost. The Holy Ghost said: Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. He does not specify the work, but refers to a former call of which they themselves knew the meaning. The matter was settled between them at Jerusalem before this, that as Peter, James, and John laid out themselves among those of the circumcision, so Paul and Barnabas should go to the heathen. The orders were, Separate me Barnabas and Saul. Christ by his Spirit has the nomination of his ministers. There are some whom the Holy Ghost has separated for the service of Christ, and concerning them directions are given to those who are competent judges: Separate them. Christ's ministers are separated to him and to the Holy Ghost: Separate them to me; they are to be employed in Christ's work and under the Spirit's guidance. All that are separated to Christ as his ministers are separated to work; Christ keeps no servants to be idle. They are separated to take pains, not to take state. The work of Christ's ministers is work which all Christ's ministers hitherto have been called to.

III. Their ordination, not to the ministry in general, but to a particular service in the ministry. Simeon, and Lucius, and Manaen, when they had fasted and prayed, laid their hands on Barnabas and Saul, and sent them away (v. 3). They prayed for them. When good men are going forth about good work, they ought to be solemnly and particularly prayed for. They joined fasting with their prayers, as they did in their other ministrations, v. 3. They laid their hands on them. They gave them their discharge from the present service, in the church of Antioch, acknowledging that they went off not only fairly and with consent, but honourably and with a good report. They implored a blessing upon them in their present undertaking, begged that God would be with them, and give them success. They did not envy Barnabas and Saul the honour to which they were preferred, but cheerfully committed it to them, and they sent them away with all expedition, out of a concern for those countries where they were to break up fallow ground.

I. A general account of the coming of Barnabas and Saul to the famous island of Cyprus. Barnabas was a native of that country (ch. iv. 36), and he was willing they should have the first fruits of his labours. Their being sent forth by the Holy Ghost was the great thing that encouraged them in this undertaking, v. 4. They came to Seleucia, thence crossed the sea to Cyprus, and the first city they came to was Salamis (v. 5); and, when they had sown good seed there, thence they went onward through the isle (v. 6) till they came to Paphos. They preached the word of God in the synagogues of the Jews; so far were they from excluding them that they gave them the preference. They did not act clandestinely, but laid their doctrine open to the censure of the rulers of their synagogues.

They had John for their minister; not their servant in common things, but their assistant in the things of God. Such a one might be many ways of use to them, especially in a strange country.

with regular institutions (ch. 14:23)" [OLSHAUSEN]. 1. there were . . . certain prophets—see on ch. 11: 27—and teachers; as Barnabas . . .—implying that there were others there, besides; but, according to what appears the true reading, the meaning is simply that those here mentioned were in the Church at Antioch as prophets and teachers. Simeon . . . Niger—of whom nothing is known. Lucius of Cyrene—(See on ch. 2:20. He is mentioned, in Romans 16:21, as one of Paul's kinsmen. Manaen—or Menahem, the name of one of the kings of Israel (II Kings 15:14). which had been brought up with—or, the foster brother of—Herod the tetrarch—i.e., Antipas, who was himself "brought up with a certain private person at Rome" [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 117, 1, 3]. How differently did these two foster brothers turn out—the one, abandoned to a licentious life and stained with the blood of the most distinguished of God's prophets, though not without his fits of reformation and seasons of remorse; the other, a devoted disciple of the Lord Jesus and prophet of the Church at Antioch! But this is only what may be seen in every age: "Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in Thy sight.' If the courtier, whose son, at the point of death, was healed by our Lord (John 4:46) was of Herod's establishment, while Susanna's husband was his steward (Luke 8:3), his foster brother's becoming a Christian and a prophet is something remarkable. and Saul—last of all, but soon to become first. Henceforward this book is almost exclusively occupied with him; and his impress on the New Testament, on Christendom, and on the world is paramount. 2. As they ministered to the Lord—The word denotes the performance of official duties of any kind, and was used to express the priestly functions under the Old Testament. Here it signifies the corresponding ministrations of the Christian Church. and fasted—As this was done in other cases on special occasions (vss. 3, 14, 23), it is not improbable that they had been led to expect some such prophetic announcement at this time. the Holy Ghost said—through some of the prophets mentioned in vs. 1. Separate me—So Romans 1:1. for the work whereunto I have called them—by some communication, perhaps, to themselves: in the case of Saul at least, such a designation was indicated from the first (ch. 22:21). N.B. While the personality of the Holy Ghost is manifest from this language, His supreme divinity will appear equally so by comparing it with Hebrews 5:4. 3. laid their hands on them—(See on ch. 6:6)—"recommending them to the grace of God for the work which they had to fulfil" (ch. 14:26). sent them away—with the double call—of the Spirit first, and next of the Church. So clothed, their mission is thus described: "They being sent forth by the Holy Ghost." Have we not here for all time the true principle of appointment to sacred offices?

4-12. ARRIVING IN CYPRUS, THEY PREACH IN THE SYNAGOGUES OF SALAMIS—AT PAPHOS, ELYMAS IS STRUCK BLIND, AND THE GOVERNOR OF THE ISLAND IS CONVERTED. 4, 5. departed unto Seleucia—the seaport of Antioch, from which it lay nearly due west fifteen miles, and five from the Mediterranean shore, on the river Orontes. thence sailed to Cyprus—whose high mountain summits are easily seen in clear weather from the coast [COLONEL CHESNEY in Hows]. "Four reasons may have induced them to turn in first to this island: (1) Its nearness to the mainland; (2) It was the native place of Barnabas, and since the time when Andrew found his brother Simon, and brought him to Jesus, and 'Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus,' family ties had not been without effect on the progress of the Gospel. (3) It could not be unnatural to suppose that the truth would be welcomed in Cyprus when brought by Barnabas and his kinsman Mark, to their own connections or friends. The Jews were numerous in Salamis. By sailing to that city, they were following the track of the synagogues; and though their mission was chiefly to the Gentiles, their surest course for reaching them was through the proselytes and Hellenizing Jews. (4) Some of the Cypriotes were already Christians. Indeed, no one place out of Palestine, except Antioch, had been so honorably associated with the work of successful evangelization" [Hows]. 5. and when they were at Salamis—the Grecian capital of the island, on the eastern side, and not many hours' sail from Seleucia. At this busy mercantile port immense numbers of Jews were settled, which accounts for what is here said, that they had more than one synagogue, in which Barnabas and Saul preached, while other cities had one only. they had . . . John [Mark] to their minister—'for their officer.' (See on Luke 4:20.) With what fruit they preached here

Barnabas. Of whom see before, chap. xi. 22-24. Simeon . . . Niger. Or "Simeon the Black," because of either his complexion or his hair. Lucius of Cyrene. See chap. xi. 20. Manaen, which had been brought up with Herod. Our margin has given the proper meaning of the original word "a foster-brother"; i.e., Manaen was the son of the woman who nursed Herod Antipas. Of a person whose name was Manaen or Menahem, and who was in the court of Herod, we read several things in the Jewish writers. They say that this man had the gift of prophecy, and that he told Herod, when he was but a child, that he would be king. When Herod became king he sent for him to his court, and held him in great estimation. It might have been the son of this Menahem of whom Luke here speaks.

2. As they ministered to the Lord, and fasted. On Mondays and Thursdays it was usual with the more pious Jews to attend the public service in their synagogues, and to fast; the former is what we are to understand by ministering to the Lord. On the Sabbaths they attended the service in the synagogue, but did not fast. The Greek word signifies "performing the office of praying, supplicating, rendering thanks." The Holy Ghost said. A revelation of the divine will was made to some person then present. Separate me Barnabas and Saul. Consecrate, or set them apart, for the particular work whereunto I have called them. How this was done we find in the next verse.

3. And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them. (1) They fasted; this was probably done by the whole church. (2) They prayed that God would bless and prosper them in their work. (3) They laid . . . hands upon them, thus solemnly appointing them to that particular work. But was it by this fasting, praying, and imposition of hands that these men were qualified for this work? No. God had already called them to it, v. 2, and He who called them had qualified them. Both their call and their qualification came from God, but He chose that they should have also the sanction of that church of which they had been members; and therefore He said, "Separate me." The ordination of elders among the Jews was by three persons; and here we find three, Simeon, Lucius, and Manaen, ordaining two others, Barnabas and Saul. But how did the Jews ordain? Not by imposition of hands. This is strictly forbidden; see Maimon. Sanh., chap. 4. "After what manner is the ordaining of elders for ever? Not that they should lay their hands on the head of an elder; but only that they should call him Rabbi, and say to him, Behold, thou art ordained, and hast power of judging." The church at Antioch, however, did depart from this custom: they put their hands on the heads of Barnabas and Saul, thus designating them to be the persons whom they, under the direction of the Holy Spirit, sent to preach the gospel of Christ to the heathen.

4. Being sent forth by the Holy Ghost. By His influence, authority, and under His continual direction. Without the first, they were not qualified to go; without the second, they had no authority to go; and without the third, they could not know where to go. Departed unto Seleucia. Near the place where the Orontes River pours itself into the sea. They sailed to Cyprus. A well-known island in the Mediterranean Sea.

5. Salamis. The capital of the island of Cyprus, situated on the eastern part of the island. They preached the word of God. The doctrine of God, the Christian religion, emphatically so called. They had also John to their minister. This was John Mark, of whom we heard, chap. xii. 25; for their minister, to assist them in minor offices, as deacon or servant, that they might give themselves wholly to the doctrine of the Lord.

MATTHEW HENRY

II. A particular account of their encounter with Elymas the sorcerer.

1. There the deputy, a Gentile, Sergius Paulus by name, encouraged the apostles. He was governor of the country, under the Roman emperor. He had the character of a prudent man, that was ruled by reason, not passion, nor prejudice, which appeared by this, that he sent for them, and desired to hear the word of God. Those are wise people, however they may be ranked among the foolish of this world, who are inquisitive after the mind and will of God. If they have a message from God, let him know what it is, he is ready to receive it.

2. There Elymas, a Jew, a sorcerer, opposed them. This Elymas was a pretender to the gift of prophecy, a sorcerer, a false prophet—one that would be taken for a divine. His name was Bar-jesus—the son of Joshua; it signifies the son of salvation; but the Syriac calls him, Bar-shoma—the son of pride; the son of inflation. He was hanging on at court, was with the deputy of the country. He made it his business to withstand Barnabas and Saul. He sought to turn away the deputy from the faith (v. 8), to keep him from receiving the gospel. Satan is in a special manner busy with great men and men of power, to keep them from being religious; because he knows that their example, whether good or bad, will have an influence upon many.

Saul (who is here for the first time called Paul) fell upon him for this with a holy indignation. Saul, who is also called Paul, v. 9. Saul was his name as he was a Hebrew; Paul was his name as he was a citizen of Rome. Hitherto we have had him mostly conversant among the Jews, and therefore called by his Jewish name; but now, when he is sent forth among the Gentiles, he is called by his Roman name.

He was filled with the Holy Ghost upon this occasion; filled with power to denounce the wrath of God against him. What Paul said did not come from any personal resentment, but from the strong impressions which the Holy Ghost made upon his spirit. He set his eyes upon him in opposition to his wicked impudence. He gave him his true character, v. 10. He describes him to be, First, An agent for hell. This Elymas, though called Bar-jesus—a son of Jesus—was really a child of the devil. In two things he resembled the devil. In craftiness. Elymas, though void of all wisdom, was full of all subtlety. In malice. He was full of all mischief—a spiteful ill-conditioned man. A fulness of subtlety and mischief together make a man indeed a child of the devil. Secondly, An adversary to heaven. If he be a child of the devil, it follows of course that he is an enemy to all righteousness. He charged upon him his present crime: "Wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord." The ways of the Lord are right; the only right ways to heaven and happiness. There are those who pervert these right ways, who not only wander out of these ways themselves, but mislead others, and suggest to them unjust prejudices against these ways, making them seem crooked ways. Those who pervert the right ways of the Lord are commonly so hardened in it that they will not cease to do it.

is not said. Probably their feeling was what Paul afterwards expressed at Antioch in Pisidia (vs. 46). 6. when they had gone through the isle unto Paphos—on the opposite or west side of the island, about 100 miles by land, along the south coast; the Roman capital, where the governor resided.

they found a . . . sorcerer—one of a numerous class of impostors who, at this time of general unbelief, were encouraged even by cultivated Romans. 7. Which was with the deputy—properly, 'the proconsul.' This name was reserved for the governors of settled provinces, which were placed under the Roman Senate, and is never given in the New Testament to Pilate, Felix, or Festus, who were but procurators, or subordinate administrators of unsettled, imperial, military provinces. Now as Augustus reserved Cyprus for himself, its governor would in that case have been not a proconsul, but simply a procurator, had not the emperor afterwards restored it to the Senate, as a Roman historian [DIO CASSIUS] expressly states. In most striking confirmation of this minute accuracy of the sacred historian, coins have actually been found in the island, stamped with the names of proconsuls, both in Greek and Latin [AKERMAN'S Numismatic Illustrations of the New Testament]. (GROTIUS and BENGEL, not aware of this, have missed the mark here.) Sergius Paulus, a prudent—intelligent—man—who thirsting for truth, sent for Barnabas and Saul, desiring ("earnestly desiring") to hear the Word of God. 8-12. But Elymas—or 'the wise—for so is his name by interpretation—the word is from the Arabic—withstood them—perceiving, probably, how eagerly the proconsul was drinking in the word, and fearing a dismissal. (Cf. II Tim. 3:8.) 9. Then Saul . . . also . . . called Paul—and henceforward Paul only; a softening of his former name, in accommodation to Roman ears, and (as the word signifies "little") probably with allusion as elsewhere to his insignificance of stature and appearance (II Cor. 10:1, 10) [WEBSTER and WILKINSON].

filled with the Holy Ghost—the Spirit coming mightily upon him. set his eyes on him and said—Henceforward Barnabas sinks into the background. The whole soul of his great colleague, now drawn out, as never before, shoots, by the lightning gaze of his eye, through the dark and tortuous spirit of the sorcerer. What a picture! 10. full of all subtlety—referring to his magic arts. and all malice—The word signifies 'readiness for anything,' knavish dexterity.

thou child of the devil . . . enemy of all righteousness—These were not words of passion, for immediately before uttering them, it is said he was "filled with the Holy Ghost" [CHRYSOSTOM]. wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord—referring to his having to that hour made a trade of leading his fellow creatures astray.

ADAM CLARKE

6. Gone through the isle. The "whole" isle is added here by some MSS. Unto Paphos. This town, next in importance to Salamis, was situated on the western part of the isle; and having gone from Salamis to this place is a proof that they had gone through the whole island from east to west, according to the reading noticed above. There was probably no town in the universe more dissolute than Paphos. Here Venus had a superb temple; here she was worshipped with all her rites; and from this place she was named the "Paphian Venus," the "queen of Paphos." This temple and whole city were destroyed by an earthquake, so that a vestige of either does not now remain. A certain sorcerer. "A magician," one who used magical arts and pretended to have commerce with supernatural agents. A false prophet. A deceiver, one who pretended to have a divine commission, a fortune-teller. Bar-Jesus. That is, "the son of Jesus."

7. The deputy of the country. The "proconsul." In those days the Romans sent two different kinds of governors into the provinces. Some of the provinces were imperial, and into those they sent propretors; others belonged to the senate and people of Rome, and into those they sent proconsuls. Cyprus had formerly been an imperial province; but Augustus, who made the distinction, had given it to the people, whence it was governed by a proconsul. A prudent man. A man of "good sense," of a sound understanding, and therefore wished to hear the doctrine taught by these apostles; he did not persecute the men for their preaching, but sent for them that he might hear for himself.

8. But Elymas the sorcerer (for so is his name by interpretation). That is, Elymas is the interpretation of the word magos, or sorcerer; not of the word Bar-Jesus, as some have imagined.

9. Saul, (who also is . . . Paul). This is the first time the name Paul occurs and the last time in which this apostle is called Saul as his common or general name. Saul, Shaül, was the name of the first Israelitish king, and signifies "asked, sought"; from shaal, "he asked, inquired." Paul, Paulus, if derived from the Latin, signifies "little, dwarfish." It is well-known that the Jews in the apostolic age had frequently two names: one Hebrew, the other Greek or Roman. Saul was born of Jewish parents, a Hebrew of the Hebrews; he had therefore his first name from that language, Shaül, "asked or begged," as it is possible he might have been a child for whom his parents had addressed their fervent petitions to God. The case of Samuel is one in point. See 1 Sam. i. 9-18. As he was born in Tarsus, in Cilicia, he was consequently born a free Roman citizen; and hence his parents would naturally give him, for cognomen, some name borrowed from the Latin tongue; and Paulus, which signifies "little," might indicate that he was at his birth a small child. It is very likely that he was low in stature all his days; and that it is to this he refers himself, 2 Cor. x. 10, "For . . . his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible." If he were small in stature, his voice would be naturally low and feeble; and the Greeks, who were fond of a thundering eloquence, would despise him on this very account. Filled with the Holy Ghost. Therefore the sentence he pronounced was not from himself, but from God. And indeed, had he not been under a divine influence, it is not likely he would have ventured thus to accost this sorcerer in the presence of the governor, who no doubt had greatly admired him.

10. O full of all subtilty. "Deceit," pretending to supernatural powers without possessing any, and having only cunning and deceit as their substitutes. And . . . mischief. From rhadios, "easy," and ergon, "a work"; one who is ready at his work; a word which excellently well defines a juggler, one who is expert at sleight of hand, though it is often employed to signify an abandoned and accomplished villain. Child of the devil. "Son of the devil," possessing his nature, filled with his cunning, and in consequence practicing deceit. Enemy of all righteousness. Opposed in your heart to all that is just, true, and good.

Wilt thou not cease to pervert? "Will you not cease perverting?" He had probably labored in this bad work from the beginning of Paul's

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

What was the reason for this attack upon Elymas? The very words of Paul startle the age in which we are living. We are not accustomed to such language; we never think now of addressing to any man outside or inside the Church such words as these: "O full of all guile and all villainy." Remember Paul did not say this about him but to him. He looked into his face, he fastened his eyes upon him. This is quite definite. This man Paul, contemptible of bodily presence according to his own estimate, looked into the eyes of another man, a Jew, keen, subtle, clever, occult; and looking straight into his face he said: "O full of all guile and all villainy, thou son of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?" Let us carefully bear in mind that this follows immediately upon the declaration that he was filled with the Spirit. There is no doubt that he was specially filled with the Spirit for the saying of this very thing. Why this anger? Why the fierceness of these words? The answer is that another man was involved, Sergius Paulus.
—The Acts of the Apostles

He denounced the judgment of God upon him, in a present blindness (v. 11): "And now, behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thee; thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season." He shut his eyes, the eyes of his mind, against the light of the gospel, and therefore justly were the eyes of his body shut against the light of the sun; he sought to blind the deputy, and therefore is himself struck blind. Yet it was a moderate punishment. It was only for a season; if he will repent, and give glory to God, his sight shall be restored; nay, it should seem, though he do not, yet his sight shall be restored.

This judgment was immediately executed: There fell on him a mist and a darkness. Let not him any more pretend to be a guide to the deputy's conscience who is himself struck blind. He went about seeking some to lead him by the hand; and where now is all his skill in sorcery.

3. Notwithstanding all the endeavours of Elymas to turn away the deputy from the faith, he was brought to believe, and this miracle contributed to it. The deputy was a very sensible man, and observes something which intimated its divine original. In Paul's preaching: he was astonished at the doctrine of the Lord. The doctrine of Christ has a great deal in it that is astonishing; and the more we know of it the more reason we shall see to wonder and stand amazed at it. In this miracle: When he saw what was done, he believed. It is not said that he was baptized, but it is probable that he was.

III. Their departure from the island of Cyprus. They quitted the country, and went to Perga. Those that went were Paul and his company. Then John Mark quitted them, and returned to Jerusalem, without the consent of Paul and Barnabas. It was his fault, and we shall hear of it again.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

11. the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be blind for a season—the judgment being mercifully designed to lead him to repentance. The tradition that it did is hardly to be depended on.

there fell on him a mist . . .—This is in Luke's medical style.

12. Then the deputy, when he saw what was done, believed, being astonished at the doctrine of the Lord—so marvellously attested; cf. Mark 1:27. What fruit, if any, followed this remarkable conversion, or how long after it the missionaries remained at Paphos, we know not.

13-52. AT PERGA JOHN MARK FORSAKES THEM—AT ANTIOCH, IN PISIDIA, PAUL PREACHES WITH GLORIOUS EFFECT—THE JEWS, ENRAGED, EXPEL THEM OUT OF THEIR COASTS.

13. they came to Perga in Pamphylia—The distance from Paphos to Attalia, on the Gulf of Pamphylia (see on ch. 14:25), sailing in a northwest direction, is not much greater than from Seleucia to Salamis on the east. Perga was the metropolis of Pamphylia, on the river Cestrus, and about seven miles inland from Attalia. and John departing from them returned to Jerusalem—As Paul afterwards peremptorily refused to take Mark with him on his second missionary journey, because he "had departed [or 'fallen off'] from them and had not gone with them to the work" (ch. 15:38), there can be no doubt that he had either wearied of it or been deterred by the prospect of the dangers which lay before him. (But see on ch. 15:37, etc.).

ADAM CLARKE

ministry in the place, and God in His mercy had borne with him; and no doubt the apostle had warned him, for thus much seems implied in the reproof. The right ways of the Lord. "The ways of the Lord, the straight ways." This saying is very emphatical. The ways of Elymas were crooked and perverse; the ways of the Lord, the doctrine taught by Him, plain and straight. What is here said of the conduct and teaching of Elymas, for he was a false prophet, is true of all false doctrine. It is complex, devious, and tortuous; while the doctrine of God is simple, plain, and straight, directing in the way, the sure way, that leads to present peace and everlasting happiness. From the phraseology which the apostle employs in this terrible address to Elymas we may learn, as well as from his name Bar-Jesus, that he was by birth and education a Jew. On this account he was the greater enemy to Christianity, and on this same account he was the less excusable.

11. The hand of the Lord is upon thee. The power of God is now about to deal with you in the way of justice. Thou shalt be blind. Every word here proves the immediate inspiration of Paul. He was full of the Holy Ghost when he began this address; by the light of that Spirit he discerned the state of Elymas and exposed his real character; and by the prophetic influence of that same Spirit he predicted the calamity that was about to fall upon him, while as yet there was no sign of his blindness. Not seeing the sun for a season. In the midst of judgment God remembers mercy. This blindness was not to be perpetual; it was intended to be the means of awakening and softening the hard heart of this poor sinner. There is an ancient tradition, and it is mentioned by both Origen and Chrysostom, that Elymas, in consequence of this, became a sincere convert to the religion of Christ. Origen says: "And Paul by a word striking him blind, who was with the proconsul, Sergius Paul, by anguish converted him to godliness." There fell on him a mist and darkness. Achlus is a disordered state of the eye in which the patient sees through a thick mist. This thick mist, or perturbed state of the eye, took place first; it increased, and thick, positive darkness was the issue. He went about. Not knowing how to take a right step, he groped about in great uncertainty; and not being able to find his way, he sought for some persons to lead him by the hand.

12. The deputy . . . believed. This was a proof that the doctrine was true; and that the power of God, from which nothing could be concealed and which nothing could resist, was with these preachers. Being astonished. Being struck with astonishment, as Elymas was struck with blindness.

13. Paul and his company loosed from Paphos. They sailed away from this island, leaving, it may be presumed, Elymas a sincere and deeply humbled penitent; and Sergius Paul, a thorough and happy believer in the doctrine of Christ. Previously to this time Luke always mentions Barnabas before Paul; but after this he mentions Paul always first, probably after seeing how God had distinguished him in the late proceedings at Cyprus, as much of the Holy Spirit now rested upon him. They came to Perga in Pamphylia. As Perga was not a maritime town, it is conjectured that the apostles sailed up the river Cestrus, in order to come to this place, which, according to Strabo, was situated about sixty leagues up this river, and near to which was a famous temple dedicated to Diana. And John departing from them. Why John Mark left his brethren at this place we are not informed; probably he went to visit his pious mother, Mary, at Jerusalem, and to see Peter, to whom he is supposed to have been much attached. It certainly was not with the approbation of Paul that he left them at this place as we learn from chap. xv. 38; yet his departure does not seem to have merited the displeasure of Barnabas. For John Mark having met these apostles at Antioch when Paul purposed to revisit the various places where they had planted the word of God, Barnabas was willing to take him with them; but Paul would not consent, because he had "departed from them from Pamphylia, and went not with them to the work," chap. xv. 35-39; and this occasioned a separation between Barnabas and Paul. It does not appear that John Mark was

Perga in Pamphylia was a noted place, yet nothing at all is related of what Paul and Barnabas did there, only that thither they came (v. 13), and thence they departed, v. 14. The next place we find them in is another Antioch, in Pisidia, to distinguish it from that Antioch in Syria from which they were sent out. Abundance of Jews lived there, and to them the gospel was to be first preached; and Paul's sermon to them is what we have in these verses.

I. The appearance which Paul and Barnabas made in a religious assembly of the Jews at Antioch, v. 14. When they came to Antioch they applied to the Jews, which is a further proof of their good affection to them. They observed their time of worship, on the sabbath day, the Jewish sabbath. The first day of the week they observed among themselves as a Christian sabbath; but, if they will meet the Jews, it must be on the seventh-day sabbath. They met them in their place of worship, in the synagogue. Paul and Barnabas were strangers; but, wherever we come, we must enquire out God's faithful worshippers, and join with them. Though they were strangers, yet they were admitted into the synagogue, and to sit down there. Care should be taken in places of public worship that strangers be accommodated, even the poorest.

II. The invitation given them to preach. 1. The usual service of the synagogue was performed (v. 15): The law and the prophets were read, a portion of each, the lessons for the day. 2. When that was done, they were asked by the rulers of the synagogue to give them a sermon (v. 15): They sent a messenger to them: Men and brethren, if you have any word of exhortation for the people, say on. If they had not an affection to the gospel, yet they had at least the curiosity to hear Paul preach; and therefore begged the favour of him that he would speak a word of exhortation to the people. The bare reading of the scriptures in the public assemblies is not sufficient, but they should be expounded, and the people exhorted out of them. Those that preside, and have power, in public assemblies, should provide for a word of exhortation to the people. Sometimes a word of exhortation from a strange minister may be of great use to the people. These were more noble, more generous, than the rulers of the synagogues generally were.

III. The sermon Paul preached. He gladly embraced the opportunity given him to preach Christ to his countrymen the Jews. He stood up and beckoned with his hand. He waved his hand as an orator endeavouring to move affection, and to show himself in earnest. "Men of Israel, and you that fear God, give audience." Everything is touched in this sermon that might convince the judgment of the Jews, to prevail with them to receive and embrace Christ as the promised Messiah.

1. He owns them to be God's favourite people, whom he had taken into special relation to himself, and for whom he had done great things.

(1) The God of the whole earth was, in a particular manner, the God of this people Israel, a God in covenant with them.

(2) He had chosen their fathers to be his friends: Abraham was called the friend of God. He puts them in mind of this, to let them know that the reason why God favoured them, was because he would adhere to the choice he had made of their fathers.

(3) He had exalted that people, had advanced them into a people, and raised them from nothing, when they dwelt as strangers in the land of Egypt. They ought to remember this, and to infer hence that God was no debtor to them. But they were debtors to him, and obliged to receive such further discoveries as he should make of his will.

(4) He had with a high hand brought them out of Egypt, had delivered them at the expense of a great many miracles, both of mercy to them and judgment on their oppressors.

(5) He had suffered their manners forty years in the wilderness, v. 18. God made a great deal of provision for them for forty years in the wilderness: miracles were their daily bread. He exercised a great deal of patience with them. He bore with them, suffered his anger many a time to be turned away by the prayer and intercession of Moses. So many years as we have each of us lived in this world, we must own that God has thus been as a tender father to us, has been indulgent to us, a God of pardons. We have tried his patience, and yet not tired it.

14. departed from Perga—apparently without making any stay or doing any work: cf. the different language of ch. 14:25, and see immediately below. came to Antioch in Pisidia—usually so called, to distinguish it from Antioch in Syria, from which they had started, though it actually lies in Phrygia, and almost due north from Perga. It was a long journey, and as it lay almost entirely through rugged mountain-passes, while "rivers burst out at the base of huge cliffs, or dash down wildly through narrow ravines," it must have been a perilous one. The whole region was, and to this day is, infested by robbers, as ancient history and modern travels abundantly attest; and there can be but little doubt that to this very journey Paul many years after alludes, when he speaks amidst his "journeyings often," of his "perils of rivers" (as the word is), and his "perils of robbers" (II Cor. 11:26). If this journey were taken in May--and earlier than that the passes would have been blocked up with snow—it would account for their not staying at Perga, whose hot streets are then deserted; "men, women, and children, flocks, herds, camels, and asses, all ascending at the beginning of the hot season from the plains to the cool basin-like hollows on the mountains, moving in the same direction with our missionaries" [Hows].

15-17. Then Paul stood up, and beckoning with his hand—as was his manner on such occasions (ch. 21:40; and see ch. 26:1). Men of Israel, and ye that fear God—by the latter expression meaning religious proselytes, who united with the Jews in all acts of ordinary worship. and exalted the people when they dwelt as strangers in Egypt—by marvellous interpositions for them in their deepest depression.

18-22. forty years suffered he their manners—rather, according to what appears the true reading, 'cherished he them' (as a nurse the infant in her bosom).

under any obligation to accompany them any longer or any farther than he pleased. He seems to have been little else than their servant, and certainly was not divinely appointed to this work, as they were; and consequently might leave them innocently, though not kindly, if they could not readily supply his place.

14. They came to Antioch in Pisidia. This place is mentioned thus to distinguish it from Antioch in Syria, with which it had nothing in common but the name. There were several cities and towns in various districts of these countries called Antioch; some have reckoned up not less than twelve. Into the synagogue on the sabbath day. Though Paul was now on a special mission to the Gentiles, yet he availed himself of every opportunity, in every place, of making the first offer of salvation to the Jews.

15. After the reading of the law and the prophets. A certain portion of the law and another of the prophets were read every Sabbath, and the law was so divided as to be read over once every year. It has been a question in what language were the law and prophets read in a synagogue of Pisidia, for in that district Strabo informs us that four languages were spoken, viz., the Pisidian, the Solyman, the Greek, and the Lydian. Dr. Lightfoot conjectures, with great probability, that the Scriptures were read in the original Hebrew, and that an interpreter rendered the reading to the people in their mother tongue. The rulers of the synagogue. These were the persons whose business it was to read the appointed sections, to take care of the synagogue and its concerns, and to see that all was done decently and in order. Sent unto them. Seeing them to be Jews, they wished them to give some suitable address to the people, i.e., to the Jews who were then engaged in divine worship; for the whole of the following discourse, which greatly resembles that of Stephen, chap. vii, is directed to the Jews alone; and this was probably spoken in either Hebrew or Greek. Ye men and brethren. "Men brethren," a Hebraism for, "You men who are our brethren," i.e., Jews, as we ourselves are. If ye have any word of exhortation. "If you have any subject of consolation," any word of comfort to us, who are sojourners in this strange land, speak it. The "Consolation of Israel" was an epithet of the Messiah among the Jews, and it is probable that it was in reference to Him that the rulers of the synagogue spoke.

16. Men of Israel, you that are Jews by birth; and ye that fear God—you that are proselytes to the Jewish religion. In this discourse Paul proves that Jesus Christ is the Messiah, sent from God, for the salvation not only of the Jews, but of the whole human race. And this he does, not with the rhetorician's arts, but in a plain, simple detail of the history of Christ and the most remarkable transactions of the people of God, which referred to His manifestation in the flesh.

17. The God of . . . our fathers. The apostle begins his discourse with the Egyptian bondage and their deliverance from it, as points the most remarkable and striking in their history, in which the providence and mighty power of God, exerted so frequently in their behalf, were peculiarly conspicuous. Exalted the people. Even when they were strangers in the land and greatly oppressed, God exalted them; made them a terror to their enemies, and multiplied them greatly. With an high arm. A literal translation of the Hebrew phrase, "with a lifted-up arm," to protect them and destroy their enemies. The meaning of the phrase is "a manifest display of the divine power."

18. About the time of forty years. The space of time between their coming out of Egypt and going into the Promised Land. Suffered he their manners. He dealt indulgently with them; howsoever they behaved toward Him, He mercifully bore with and kindly treated them. But instead of etropophoresen, some MSS. read etrophophoresen, which signifies, "He nourished and fed them, or bore them about in His arms as a tender nurse does her child." This reading agrees excellently with the scope of the place and is a reading of at least equal value with that in the commonly received text. Both, when rightly understood, speak nearly the same sense; but the latter is the most expressive, and agrees

(6) He had put them in possession of the land of Canaan (v. 19): When he had destroyed seven nations in the land of Canaan, he divided their land to them by lot.

(7) He had raised up men to deliver them out of the hands of those that oppressed them after their settlement in Canaan, v. 20, 21. He gave them judges. Though they were a provoking people, yet upon their petition a deliverer was raised up. He governed them by a prophet, Samuel. He afterwards at their request set a king over them (v. 21), Saul, the son of Cis. At last, he made David their king, v. 22. When God had removed Saul, he raised up unto them David to be their king, and made a covenant of royalty with him, and with his seed. He quotes the testimony God gave concerning him. That his choice was divine: I have found David. Finding implies seeking; as if God had ransacked all the families of Israel to find a man fit for his purpose, and this was he. That his character was divine: A man after my own heart, such a one as I would have, one on whom the image of God is stamped. That his conduct was under divine direction: He shall fulfil all my will. He shall desire and endeavour to do the will of God, and shall be enabled to do it. The changes of their government showed that it made nothing perfect, and therefore must give way to the spiritual kingdom of the Messiah, which was now in the setting up; and therefore they needed not conceive any jealousy at all of the preaching of the gospel.

2. He gives them a full account of our Lord Jesus, and shows that this Jesus is his promised Seed (v. 23): Of this man's seed, from that man after God's own heart, hath God, according to his promise, raised unto Israel a Saviour—Jesus, who carries salvation in his name.

(1) How welcome should the preaching of the gospel of Christ be to the Jews, and how should they embrace it, as well worthy of all acceptation, when it brought them the tidings of a Saviour, a Saviour to save them from their sins, their worst enemies. A Saviour of God's raising up. Raised up to be a Saviour unto Israel, to them in the first place; so far was the gospel from designing the rejection of Israel, that it designed the gathering of them. Raised up of the seed of David, that ancient royal family, which the people of Israel gloried so much in. Raised up according to his promise, the promise to David. Why then should they entertain it so coldly, now that it was brought to them?

(2) Concerning this Jesus, he tells them,

[1] That John the Baptist was his forerunner, that great man whom all acknowledged to be a prophet. Let them not say that the Messiah's coming was a surprise upon them, for they had sufficient warning by John, who preached before his coming, v. 24. He made way for his entrance, by preaching the baptism of repentance to all the people of Israel. He showed them their sins, called them to repentance, and to bring forth fruits meet for repentance. He gave notice of his approach (v. 25): As he fulfilled his course. "Now," saith he, "Whom think you that I am? You may be thinking that I am the Messiah, whom you expect; but you are mistaken, I am not he, but he is at the door; behold, there cometh one immediately after me, whose shoes of his feet I am not worthy to loose, and you may guess who that must be."

[2] That the rulers and people of the Jews, who should have welcomed him, were his persecutors and murderers. When the apostles preach Christ as the Saviour, they are so far from concealing his ignominious death, that they always preach Christ crucified, yea, and crucified by his own people, by those that dwelt in Jerusalem, and their rulers, v. 27. Their sin was that though they found no cause of death in him, yet they desired Pilate that he might be slain (v. 28). They compelled Pilate to crucify him, not only contrary to his inclination, but contrary to his conscience; they condemned him to so great a death, though they could not convict him of the least sin. Justly they might have been cut off from all benefit by the Messiah, who had thus abused him, and yet they were not; notwithstanding all this, the preaching of this gospel shall begin at Jerusalem. The reason of this was because they knew him not, v. 27. Christ owned this in extenuation of their crime: They know not what they do; and so did Peter: I wot that through ignorance you did this, ch. iii. 17. It was also because they knew not the voice of the prophets though they heard them read every sabbath day. They did not understand nor consider that it was foretold that the Messiah should suffer. Many that read the prophets do not know the voice of the prophets. They have the sound of the gospel in their ears, but not the sense of it in their heads. God overruled them, for the accomplishment of the prophecies of the Old

20. after that he gave . . . judges . . . about the space of four hundred and fifty years—As this appears to contradict I Kings 6:1, various solutions have been proposed. Taking the words as they stand in the Greek, thus, 'after that, by the space of 450 years, He gave judges,' the meaning may be, that about 450 years elapsed from the time of the covenant with Abraham until the period of the judges; which is historically correct, the word 'about' showing that chronological exactness was not aimed at. But taking the sense to be as in our version, that it was the period of the judges itself which lasted about 450 years, this statement also will appear historically correct, if we include in it the interval of subjection to foreign powers which occurred during the period of the judges, and understand it to describe the whole period from the settlement of the tribes in Canaan to the establishment of royalty. Thus, from the Exodus to the building of the temple were 592 years [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 8. 3. 1]; deduct forty years in the wilderness; twenty-five years of Joshua's rule [JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 5. 1. 29]; forty years of Saul's reign (vs. 2); forty of David's and the first four years of Solomon's reign (I Kings 6:1), and there remain, just 443 years; or, in round numbers, 'about 450 years.' 21. God gave . . . them Saul . . . of the tribe of Benjamin—That the speaker was himself of the same name and of the same tribe, has often been noticed as in all likelihood present to the apostle's mind while speaking. forty years—With this length of Saul's reign (not mentioned in the Old Testament), JOSEPHUS coincides (Antiquities 6. 14. 9). 22. I have found David . . .—This quotation is the substance of Psalm 89:20; I Samuel 13:14; and perhaps also of Psalm 78:70-72. 23-25. Of this man's seed hath God, according to . . . promise, raised unto Israel a Saviour, Jesus—The emphasis on this statement lies: (1) in the seed from which Christ sprang—David's—and the promise to that effect, which was thus fulfilled; (2) on the character in which this promised Christ was given of God—"a SAVIOUR." His personal name "JESUS" is emphatically added, as designed to express that very character. (See on Matt. 1:21.)

26-31. children . . . of Abraham, and whosoever among you feareth God—Gentile proselytes—to you is the word of this salvation sent—both being regarded as one class, as "the Jew first," to whom the Gospel was to be addressed in the first instance. 27. For they that dwell at Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they knew him not . . .—The apostle here speaks as if the more immediate guilt of Christ's death lay with the rulers and people of the metropolis, to which he fondly hoped that those residing at such a distance as Antioch would not set their seal. 28. found no cause of death—though they sought it (Matt. 26:59, 60).

best with Paul's discourse and the history to which he alludes. See the same form of expression, Num. xi. 12; Exod. xix. 4; Isa. xlvi. 3-4; and lxiii. 9.

19. Destroyed seven nations. The Canaanites, Hittites, Girgasites, Amorites, Hivites, Peresites, and Jebusites.

20. And after that he gave unto them judges about the space of four hundred and fifty years. This is a most difficult passage. The apostle seems here to contradict the account in 1 Kings vi. 1: "And it came to pass in the four hundred and eightieth year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign . . . he began to build the house of the Lord." Calmet has paraphrased these passages nearly to the same sense. The text may be thus connected; v. 19: "And having destroyed seven nations in the land of Canaan, He divided their land to them by lot, about one hundred and fifty years after. And afterwards He gave them judges, to the time of Samuel the prophet." The paraphrase of Calmet is the following: "The God of this people of Israel chose our fathers in the person of Abraham; he promised him the land of Canaan; and four hundred and fifty years after this promise, and the birth of Isaac, who was the son and heir of the promise, he put them in possession of that land which he had promised so long before." As this view of the subject removes all the principal difficulties, I shall not trouble my reader with other modes of interpretation.

21. Saul the son of Cis. In all proper names quoted from the Old Testament, we should undoubtedly follow, as nearly as possible, the same orthography: "Kish" was the name of this king's father, and so we spell it in the Old Testament. The space of forty years. Reckoning from the time of his anointing by Samuel to the time of his death.

22. David . . . a man after mine own heart. That is, a man who would rule the kingdom according to God's will.

23. Of this man's seed hath God . . . raised . . . a Saviour. That the Messiah was promised to come from the family of David, see Isa. xi. 1-2 and Jer. xxiii. 5-6.

25. As John fulfilled his course. "As John was fulfilling his race, he said." It has been supposed that the word "course," or "race," is used here to point out the short duration of the Baptist's ministry, and the fervent zeal with which he performed it. It signifies properly his ministry, or life.

26. Men and brethren. This should have been translated simply "brethren." See the note on chap. vii. 2. Children of the stock of Abraham. All you that are Jews. And whosoever among you feareth God. That is, all you who are Gentiles, and are now proselytes to the Jewish religion. The word of this salvation. The doctrine that contains the promise of deliverance from sin and the means by which it is brought about.

27. Because they knew him not. A gentle excuse for the persecuting high priests. They did not know that Jesus was the Christ, because they did not know the prophets; and only did they not know the prophets which were read every Sabbath day? Because they did not desire to know His will, and therefore they knew not the doctrine of God; nor did they know that, in condemning Christ, they fulfilled those very Scriptures which were read every Sabbath day in their synagogues.

MATTHEW HENRY

Testament: Because they knew not the voice of the prophets, they fulfilled them in condemning him. It is possible that men may be fulfilling scripture prophecies, even when they are breaking scripture precepts. All that was foretold concerning the sufferings of the Messiah was fulfilled in Christ (v. 29): When they had fulfilled all the rest that was written of him, they fulfilled what was foretold concerning his being buried. They took him down from the tree, and laid him in a sepulchre. This is taken notice of here as that which made his resurrection the more illustrious. They laid him in a sepulchre, and thought they had him fast.

[3] That he rose again from the dead. This was the great truth that was to be preached; for it is the main pillar, by which the whole fabric of the gospel is supported.

First, He rose by consent (v. 30): God raised him from the dead. His enemies laid him in a sepulchre, with design he should always lay there; but God said, No.

Secondly, There was sufficient proof of his having risen (v. 31): He was seen many days. They came up with him from Galilee to Jerusalem, and they are his witnesses unto the people. They have attested the thing many a time, and are ready to attest it, though they were to die for the same. Paul says nothing of his own seeing him, because it was in a vision, which was more convincing to himself than it could be to others.

Thirdly, The resurrection of Christ was the performance of the promise. It was not only true news, but good news: "In declaring this, we declare unto you glad tidings (v. 32, 33), which should be in a particular manner acceptable to you Jews. The doctrine we preach, if you receive it aright, brings you the greatest satisfaction imaginable; for it is in the resurrection of Christ that the promise which was made to your fathers is fulfilled to you." The great promise of the Old Testament was that of the Messiah, in whom all the families of the earth should be blessed, and not the family of Abraham only. It was to be the common benefit of all families that he should be raised up to them. God hath raised up Jesus; raised him again (so we read it), meaning from the dead. This is the fulfilling of the promises made to the fathers, the promise of sending the Messiah. "This is he that should come, and in him you have all that God promised in the Messiah, though not all that you promised yourselves." Paul puts himself into the number of the Jews, to whom the promise was fulfilled: To us their children. And the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles, which was the great thing that the Jews found themselves aggrieved at, was so far from infringing the promise made to them that the promise itself that all the families of the earth should be blessed in the Messiah, could not otherwise be accomplished.

Fourthly, The resurrection of Christ was the great proof of his being the Son of God, and confirms what was written in the second Psalm. Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. He was declared to be the Son of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead. When he was first raised up out of obscurity, God declared concerning him by a voice from heaven, This is my beloved Son (Matt. iii. 17), which has a plain reference to that in the second Psalm, Thou art my Son. Now all which was declared at Christ's baptism and again at his transfiguration, was undeniably proved by his resurrection. The decree which was so long before declared was then confirmed. "This day have I made it to appear that I have begotten thee."

Fifthly, His being raised the third day, so as not to see corruption, and to a heavenly life, so as no more to return to corruption, further confirms his being the Messiah promised. He rose to die no more. Lazarus came out of the grave with his grave-clothes on, because he was to use them again; but Christ, having no more occasion for them, left them behind. Now this makes them sure mercies indeed that he has risen to die no more. As, if Christ had died and had not risen again, so if he had risen to die again, we had come short of the sure mercies, or at least could not have been sure of them. He rose so soon after he was dead that his body did not see corruption. Now this was one of the sure mercies of David, for it was said to him, Neither wilt thou suffer thy Holy One to see corruption, v. 35. This promise could not have its accomplishment in David, but looked forward to Christ. It could not be accomplished in David himself (v. 36), for David, after he had served his own generation, by the will of God, fell asleep, and was laid to his fathers, and saw corruption. Here we have a short account of the life, death, and burial, of the patriarch David, and his continuance under the power of death. His life: He served his own generation, by the will of God. David was a useful good man; he did good in the world by the will of God. He

29. they took him down . . . and laid him in a sepulchre—Though the burial of Christ was an act of honor and love to Him by the disciples to whom the body was committed, yet since His enemies looked after it and obtained a guard of soldeirs to keep watch over it as the remains of their own victim, the apostle regards this as the last manifestation on their part of enmity to the Saviour, that they might see how God laughed all their precautions to scorn by "raising Him from the dead."

31. he was seen many days of them which came up with him from Galilee to Jerusalem, . . .—i.e., by those who, having gone out and in with Him in closest intimacy during all His public ministry, which lay chiefly in Galilee, and having accompanied Him on His last journey to Jerusalem, could not possibly be mistaken as to the identity of the risen One, and were therefore unexceptionable and sufficient witnesses.

32, 33. God hath fulfilled the same—hath completely fulfilled.' in that he hath raised up Jesus again—lit., 'raised up'; but the meaning is (notwithstanding the contrary opinion of many excellent interpreters) "from the dead"; as the context plainly shows.

as it is written in the second psalm—in many MSS. 'the first Psalm'; what we call the first being regarded by the ancient Jews as only an introduction to the Psalter, which was considered to begin with the second. this day have I begotten thee—As the apostle in Romans 1:4 regards the resurrection of Christ merely as the manifestation of a prior Sonship, which he afterwards (ch. 8:32) represents as essential, it is plain that this is his meaning here. (Such declarative meaning of the verb 'to be' is familiar to every reader of the Bible.) See i.e., John 15:8, "So shall ye be," i.e., be seen to be "My disciples." It is against the whole sense of the New Testament to ascribe the origin of Christ's Sonship to His resurrection. 34-37. now no more to return to corruption—i.e., to the grave where death reigns; and cf. Romans 6:9, "Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more, death hath no more dominion over him." I will give you the sure mercies of David—(Isa. 55:3). The word rendered "mercies" is peculiar, denoting the sanctity of them, as comprehending the whole riches of the new covenant; while the other word, "sure," points to the certainty with which they would, through David's Seed, be at length all substantiated. See on John 1:14. But how do these words prove the resurrection of Christ? "They presuppose it; for since an eternal kingdom was promised to David, the Ruler of this kingdom could not remain under the power of death. But to strengthen the indefinite prediction by one more definite, the apostle adduces Psalm 16:10, of which Peter had given the same explanation (see on ch. 2:27, 30, 31), both apostles denying the possibility of its proper reference to David" [OLSHAUSEN]. 36. For David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God—rather, 'served,' in his own generation, the will (or 'counsel') of God; yielding himself an instrument for the accomplishment of God's high designs, and in this respect being emphatically "the man after God's own heart."

ADAM CLARKE

30. But God raised him from the dead. And thus gave the fullest proof of His innocence.

31. He was seen many days. The thing was done but a very short time since; and many of the witnesses are still alive, and ready to attest the fact of this Resurrection in the most unequivocal manner.

32. We declare unto you glad tidings. We proclaim that gospel to you which is the fulfillment of the promise made unto the fathers.

33. Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. It has been disputed whether this text should be understood of the incarnation or of the resurrection of our Lord. If understood of His incarnation, it can mean no more than this, that the human nature of our blessed Lord was begotten by the energy of the Holy Spirit in the womb of the blessed Virgin; for as to His divine nature, which is allowed to be God, it could be neither created nor begotten. But the doctrine of the eternal sonship of Christ is absolutely irreconcilable to reason and contradictory to itself. Eternity is that which has had no beginning nor stands in any reference to time; Son supposes time, generation, and Father, and time also antecedent to such a generation. Therefore the rational conjunction of these two terms, "Son" and "eternity," is absolutely impossible, as they imply essentially different and opposite ideas. If the passage in question be understood of the resurrection of Christ, it points out that the human nature, which was produced by the power of God in the womb of the Virgin and which was the Son of God, could see no corruption; and therefore, though it died for sin, must be raised from the dead before it saw corruption. Thus God owned that human nature to be peculiarly His own; and therefore Jesus Christ was "declared to be the Son of God with power . . . by the resurrection from the dead," Rom. i. 4.

34. No more to return to corruption. To the grave, to death, the place and state of corruption. The sure mercies of David. These words are quoted literatim from the Septuagint version of Isa. lv. 3, and which Paul considers as being fulfilled in the resurrection of Christ. From this application of the words it is evident that the apostle considered the word David as signifying the Messiah; and then the sure or faithful mercies, being such as relate to the new covenant and the various blessings promised in it, are evidently those which are sealed and confirmed to mankind by the resurrection of Christ.

MATTHEW HENRY

served his own generation so as therein to serve God. He served the good of men, but did not serve the will of men. David was a great blessing to the age wherein he lived; he was the servant of his generation: many are the curse, and plague, and burden of their generation. Those that will do good in the world must make themselves servants of all. We were not born for ourselves, but are members of communities, to which we must study to be serviceable. Yet here is the difference between David and Christ, that David was to serve only his own generation, but Christ was to serve all generations, must ever live to reign for all ages, as long as the sun and moon endure. His death: He fell asleep. Death is a sleep, a quiet rest, to those who, while they lived, laboured in the service of God and their generation. He did not fall asleep till he had done the work for which God raised him up. God's witnesses never die till they have finished their testimony; and then the sleep of the labouring man will be sweet. His burial: He was laid to his fathers. His continuance in the grave: He saw corruption. We are sure he did not rise again. He saw corruption, and therefore that promise could not have its accomplishment in him. It was accomplished in the Lord Jesus (v. 37): He whom God raised again saw no corruption. Of him therefore the promise must be understood, and no other. Having given them this account of the Lord Jesus, he comes to make application of it. 1. In the midst of his discourse he had told his hearers that they were concerned in all this (v. 26): "To you is the word of this salvation sent. It is sent to you for a word of salvation; if it be not so, it is your own fault." He therefore speaks to them with tenderness and respect: You are men and brethren. Those to whom he does here bring the word of salvation are, (a) The native Jews, Hebrews of the Hebrews, as Paul himself was: Children of the stock of Abraham, to you is this word of salvation sent; nay, it is therefore sent to you, to save you from your sins. It is an advantage to be of a good stock; for, though salvation does not always follow the children of godly parents, yet the word of salvation does. (b) The proselytes: "Whosoever among you that feareth God, to you is the word of this salvation sent; you need the further discoveries and directions of revealed religion, and will bid them welcome, and therefore shall certainly be welcome to take the benefit of them." 2. In the close of his discourse he applies what he had said concerning Christ to his hearers. Now they would be ready to ask, What is all this to us? And he tells them plainly what it is to them. It will be their unspeakable advantage if they embrace Jesus Christ, and believe this word of salvation. "Be it known unto you therefore, men and brethren—we are warranted to proclaim it to you, and you are called to take notice of it." He did not stand up to preach before them, but to preach to them, and not without hopes of prevailing with them. They are brethren, spoken to, and dealt with, by men like themselves; of the same nation. It is proper for the preachers of the gospel to call their hearers brethren, with an affectionate concern for their welfare, and as being equally interested with them in the gospel they preach. Let all that hear the gospel of Christ know these two things: First, That it is an act of indemnity granted to the children of men. It is for and in consideration of the mediation of Christ that this act of grace is passed and proclaimed (v. 38): "Through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins. Your sins may be forgiven. The remission of sins is through this man. By his merit it was purchased, in his name it is offered. We preach to you the forgiveness of sins. That is the salvation we bring you." Secondly, That it does that for us which the law of Moses could not do. "Be it known to you that it is by Christ only that those who believe in him are justified from all things from which you could not be justified by the law of Moses" (v. 39); therefore they ought to entertain and embrace the gospel, and not to adhere to the law in opposition to it. The great concern of sinners is to be justified, and accepted as righteous in God's sight. Those who are truly justified are acquitted from all their guilt. It was impossible for a sinner to be justified by the law of Moses. By Jesus Christ we obtain a complete justification; for by him a complete atonement was made for sin. All that believe in Christ, and give up themselves to be ruled by him, are justified by him. It is at their utmost peril if they reject the gospel of Christ (v. 40, 41): "Beware therefore. Beware lest you not only come short of the blessings and benefits spoken of in the prophets, but fall under the doom spoken of in the prophets; lest that come upon you which is spoken of." The threatenings are warnings, designed to awaken us to beware lest it should come upon us. The apostle follows the Septuagint translation, which

This done, he 'fell asleep, and was gathered to his fathers, and saw corruption.' David, therefore (argues the apostle), could not be the subject of his own prediction, which had its proper fulfilment only in the resurrection of the uncorrupted body of the Son of God, emphatically God's "Holy One."

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

Paul's yearning for his brethren's salvation is not content with proclaiming the fact of Christ's resurrection, nor with pointing to it as fulfilling prophecy; he gathers all up into a loving, urgent offer of salvation for every believing soul, and solemn warning to despisers. Here the whole man flames out. Here the characteristic evangelical teaching, which is sometimes ticketed as "Pauline" by way of stigma, is heard. Already had he grasped the great antithesis between law and gospel. Already his great word "justified" has taken its place in his terminology. The essence of the Epistles to Romans and Galatians is here. Justification is the being pronounced and treated as not guilty. Law cannot justify. "In him" we are justified. Observe that this is an advance on the previous statement that "through him" we receive remission of sins.

"In him" points, though but incidentally and slightly, to the great truth of incorporation with Jesus, of which Paul had afterward so much to write. The justifying in Christ is complete and absolute. And the sole sufficient condition of receiving it is faith. But the greater the glory of the light the darker the shadow which it casts. The broad offer of complete salvation has ever to be accompanied with the plain warning of the dread issue of rejecting it. Just because it is so free and full, and to be had on such terms, the warning has to be rung into deaf ears, "Beware therefore!" Hope and fear are legitimately appealed to by the Christian evangelist. They are like the two wings which may lift the soul to soar to its safe shelter in the Rock of Ages.

38-41. the forgiveness of sins—the first necessity of the sinner, and so the first experienced blessing of the Gospel.

39. by him all that believe are justified from all things—The sense requires that a pause in the sentence be made here: 'By him the believer is absolved from all charges of the law.' What follows—from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses—is not an exceptional but an explanatory clause. The meaning is not, 'Though the law justifies from many things, it cannot justify from all things, but Christ makes up all deficiencies"; but the meaning is, 'By Christ the believer is justified from all things, whereas the law justifies from nothing.' (N.B. The deeper sense of justification, the positive side of it, is reserved for the Epistles, addressed to the justified themselves: and whereas it is the resurrection of Christ here, and throughout the Acts chiefly, which is dwelt on, because the first thing in order to bring peace to the guilty through Christ was to establish His Messiahship by His resurrection, in the Epistles to believers His death as the way of reconciliation is fully unfolded.) 40. Beware, therefore . . .—By this awful warning of the Old Testament the apostle would fain "shut them up unto the faith."

36. David . . . fell on sleep . . . and saw corruption. David died, was buried, and never rose again; therefore David cannot be the person spoken of here. These words can be applied to Jesus Christ only, and in Him they are most exactly fulfilled.

38. Be it known unto you therefore. This is the legitimate conclusion: Seeing the word of God is true, and He has promised an endless succession to the seed of David; seeing David and all his family have failed in reference to the political kingdom, a spiritual Kingdom and a spiritual succession must be intended, that the sure covenant and all its blessings may be continued. Again: Seeing the person by whom this is to be done is to see no corruption; seeing David has died, and has seen (fallen under the power of) corruption; seeing Jesus the Christ has wrought all the miracles which the prophets said He should work; seeing He has suffered all the indignities which your prophets said He must suffer; seeing after His death He has most incontestably risen again from the dead, and has not fallen under the power of corruption—then He must be the very Person in whom all the predictions are fulfilled, and the Person through whom all the blessings of the covenant must come. Through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins. See the notes on chap. v. 30-31. Remission of sins—the removal of the power, guilt, and pollution of sin—comes alone through this Man whom you crucified and who is risen from the dead.

39. And by him. On His account, and through Him, all that believe in His divine mission and the end for which He has been manifested, namely, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself, are justified from all things, from the guilt of all transgressions committed against God, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses; because it is impossible that "the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean," or any other rite or service of this kind, could take away sin from the soul, cancel its guilt in the conscience, or make an atonement to the divine justice.

40. Beware . . . lest that come upon you. If you reject these benefits, now freely offered to you in this preaching of Christ crucified, reads, Behold, you despisers (for, behold, you among the heathen). Beware lest it be said to you, Behold, you despisers. It is the ruin of many that they despise religion, they look upon it as a thing below them, and are not willing to stoop to it. "Take heed lest the judgment come upon you which was spoken of in the prophets: that you shall wonder and perish." Those that will not wonder and be saved shall wonder and perish. Those that enjoyed the privileges of the church will wonder when they find that their privileges do but make their condemnation the more intolerable. Let the unbelieving Jews expect that God will work a work in their days which you shall in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you. This may be understood as a prediction, either, (1) Of their sin, that they should be incredulous, that that great work of God, the redemption of the world by Christ, though it should be in the most solemn manner declared unto them, yet they would in no wise believe it. Those that had the honour and advantage to have this work wrought in their days had not the grace to believe it. Or, (2) Of their destruction a work which one would not have believed should have ever been done, considering how much they had been the favourites of Heaven. Thus is there a strange punishment to the workers of iniquity, especially to the despisers of Christ.

MATTHEW HENRY

Verses 42–52

The design of this story being to vindicate the apostles, especially Paul, it is here observed that he proceeded therein with all the caution imaginable.

I. There were some of the Jews that were so incensed against the preaching of the gospel that they would not bear to hear it, but went out of the synagogue (v. 42). Now this bespoke: An open infidelity. They thus publicly avowed their contempt of Christ and of his doctrine, and they thus endeavoured to beget prejudices in the minds of others. An obstinate infidelity. They went out of the synagogue to show that they did not believe the gospel, they were resolved they would not. Justly therefore was the gospel taken from them, when they first took themselves from it. For it is certainly true that God never leaves any till they first leave him.

II. The Gentiles were as willing to hear the gospel as those Jews were to get out of the hearing of it: They besought that these words might be preached to them the next sabbath. They begged that forgiveness of sins through Christ might be preached to them. The Jews' leavings, nay, loathings, were their longings. This justifies Paul in his preaching to them, that he was invited to it. Who could refuse to break the bread of life to those who begged so hard for it, and to give that to the poor at the door which the children at the table threw under their feet? They had heard the doctrine of Christ, but did not understand it at the first hearing, and therefore they begged it might be preached to them again. What we have heard we should desire to hear again, that it may take deep root in us, and the nail that is driven may be clenched. It aggravates the bad disposition of the Jews that the Gentiles desired to hear that often which they were not willing to hear once.

III. There were many, both of Jews and proselytes, that were wrought upon by the preaching of the gospel. Many of the Jews and religious proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas. They submitted to the grace of God, and were admitted to the benefit and comfort of it. They followed Paul and Barnabas; they became their disciples, or rather the disciples of Christ. Those that join themselves to Christ will join themselves to his ministers, and follow them. And Paul and Barnabas bade those of the Jews welcome that were willing to come under their instructions. They were exhorted and encouraged to persevere herein: Paul and Barnabas, speaking to them, persuaded them to continue in the grace of God. And the grace of God shall not be wanting to those who thus continue in it.

IV. The next sabbath day (v. 44): Almost the whole city came together to hear the word of God. This brought a vast concourse of people to the synagogue on the sabbath day. Some came out of curiosity, others longing to see what the Jews would do, and many who had heard something of the word of God came to hear more, and to hear it, not as the word of men but as the word of God. Now this justified Paul in preaching to the Gentiles, that he met with the most encouraging auditors among them.

V. The Jews were enraged at this; and not only would not receive the gospel themselves, but were filled with indignation at those that crowded after it (v. 45): When the Jews saw the multitudes, this filled them with envy. They grudged the interest the apostles had in the people. This was the same spirit that worked in the Pharisees towards Christ; they were cut to the

41. ye will not believe though a man declare it unto you—i.e., even on unexceptionable testimony. The words, from Habakkuk 1:5, were originally a merciful but fruitless warning against the approaching destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans and the Babylonish captivity. As such nothing could more fitly describe the more awful calamity impending over the generation which the apostle addressed.

42, 43. And when the Jews were gone out of the synagogue, the Gentiles besought that these words might be preached to them the next sabbath—rather (according to what is beyond doubt the true reading), 'Now, as they were going out [of the synagogue], they besought'—i.e., not the Gentiles, whose case comes in afterwards, but the mixed congregation of Jews and proselytes, to whom the discourse had been addressed, entreated to have another hearing of such truths; those of them, that is, who had been impressed. 'And after the breaking up of the synagogue, many of' both classes, Jews and religious proselytes, followed Paul and Barnabas (observe, from this time forward, the inverted order of these names; except ch. 14:14; 13:7; 12:25; on which see). These had evidently been won to the Gospel by what they had heard, and felt a clinging to their spiritual benefactors.

who, speaking to them—following up the discourse in the synagogue by some further words of encouragement. persuaded them to continue in the grace of God—which they had experienced through the Gospel. (Cf. ch. 11:23.) 44-48. the next sabbath came almost the whole city together to hear the word of God—the intervening days having been spent in further inquiry and instruction, and the excitement reaching the Gentiles, who now for the first time crowded, along with the usual worshippers, into the synagogue.

you may expect such judgments from the hand of God as your forefathers experienced, when, for their rebellion and their contempt of His benefits, their city was taken, their Temple destroyed, and themselves either slain by the sword or carried into captivity. It is evident that Paul refers to Hab. i. 5-10.

41. Behold, ye despisers. There is a remarkable difference here between the Hebrew text in Habakkuk and that in the Septuagint, which is a little abridged here by Paul. It may now be necessary to inquire how Luke and the Septuagint should substitute ye despisers, for "ye among the heathen," in the Hebrew text. Without troubling myself or my readers with laborious criticisms on these words, I will simply state my opinion, that the prophet, instead of bagoyim, "among the heathen," wrote bogadim, "despisers," or transgressors—a word which differs only in a single letter, daleth, for vau. It seems as evident as it can be that this was the word which the Septuagint found in the copy from which they translated. Their evidence, and that of the apostle, joined to the consideration that the interchange of the two letters mentioned above might have been easily made, is quite sufficient to legitimate the reading for which I contend. The word which we translate perish signifies more properly "disappear, or hide yourselves"; as people, astonished and alarmed at some coming evil, betake themselves to flight, and hide themselves in order to avoid it.

42. When the Jews were gone out. That part of them in whom the words of the prophet were fulfilled, viz., those who, though they had the clearest relation of so interesting a history, would not believe it; they shut their eyes against the light and hardened their hearts against the truth. There were other Jews in the assembly that did believe and were saved. The Gentiles besought. There is some doubt whether the original should be translated the Gentiles besought or "they besought the Gentiles"; for the words will bear either, but the latter sense more naturally. When the Jews retired, determining not to credit what was spoken, the apostle, seeing the Gentiles of a better mind, requested them to come and hear those words, or doctrines, the next Sabbath. On this verse there is a great number of various readings: instead of, "when the Jews were going out of the synagogue," some MSS. read, "As they were going out, they entreated that these words should be preached unto them the next Sabbath." The most eminent critics approve of this reading; indeed it stands on such authority as to render it almost indubitable. We are therefore to understand the words thus: that, "as they were going out on the breaking up of the assembly, some of them desired that they might have these doctrines preached to them on the ensuing week or Sabbath." And thus all the ambiguity of the verse vanishes.

43. Many of the Jews. Direct descendants from some of the twelve tribes, and religious proselytes, heathens who had been converted to Judaism, and, having submitted to circumcision, had become proselytes of the covenant; though some think that the expression means persons who believed in one God, like the Jews, but who had not received circumcision.

44. The next sabbath day. The good news had spread far and wide, by means of the converted Jews and proselytes. Almost the whole city. Jews, proselytes, and Gentiles came together to hear "this doctrine of God," this divine teaching, by which so many of their kindred and acquaintance had become so wise and happy.

45. The Jews . . . were filled with envy. See on chap. v. 17. These could not bear the Gentiles, who believed in Christ, to be equal with them; and yet, according to the gospel, it was heart when they saw the whole world go after him. They opposed the doctrine the apostles preached: They spoke against those things that were spoken by Paul, finding some fault or other with everything he said, contradicting and blaspheming. They contradicted for contradiction-sake, and when they could find no colour of objection, they broke out into ill language against Christ and his gospel, blaspheming him and it. Commonly those who begin with contradicting end with blaspheming.

VI. The apostles hereupon solemnly declare themselves discharged from their obligation to the Jews, and at liberty to bring the word of salvation to the Gentiles. The Jews had the tender of the gospel, and did refuse it, and therefore ought not to say anything against the Gentiles having it. In declaring this, it is said (v. 46), Paul and Barnabas waxed bold. There is a time for the preachers of the gospel to show as much of the boldness of the lion as of the harmlessness of the dove. When the adversaries of Christ's cause begin to be daring, it is not for its advocates to be timid. The impudence of the enemies of the gospel, instead of frightening, should rather embolden its friends. They know in whom they had trusted to bear them out. Now Paul and Barnabas, having made the Jews a fair offer of gospel grace, here give them fair notice of their bringing it to the Gentiles. 1. They own that the Jews were entitled to the first offer: "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you, to whom the promise was made, to whom Christ reckoned himself first sent." 2. They charge them with the refusal of it: You put it from you. If men put the gospel from them, God justly takes it from them. Herein they judge themselves unworthy of everlasting life. In one sense we must all judge ourselves unworthy of everlasting life, for there is nothing in us by which we can pretend to merit it, but here the meaning is, "You make it to appear, that you are not meet for eternal life. You do, in effect, pass this judgment upon yourselves, and out of your own mouth you shall be judged; you will not have it by Christ, by whom alone it is to be had, and so shall your doom be, you shall not have it at all." 3. Upon this they ground their preaching the gospel to the uncircumcised: "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles. If one will not, another will." 4. They justify themselves in this by a divine warrant (v. 47): "For so hath the Lord commanded us." This is according to what was foretold in the Old Testament. When the Messiah, in the prospect of the Jews' infidelity, was ready to say, I have laboured in vain, he was told, that though Israel were not gathered, yet he should be glorious. "For I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldst be for salvation unto the ends of the earth." He is set up to be a light; he enlightens the understanding, and so saves the soul. He is, and is to be, light and salvation to the Gentiles, to the end of the earth. All nations shall at length become his kingdom. This prophecy has had its accomplishment in part in the setting up of the kingdom of Christ in this island of ours.

VII. The Gentiles cheerfully embraced that which the Jews scornfully rejected, v. 48, 49. How the Gentiles welcomed this happy turn in their favour!

1. They took the comfort of it: When they heard this they were glad. It was good news to them. They were as welcome to the benefits of the Messiah's kingdom as the Jews themselves, and might share in their promise. When the Gentiles did but hear that the offers of grace should be made them they were glad. Many grieve under doubts whether they have an interest in Christ or no, when they should be rejoicing that they have an interest in him.

2. They gave God the praise of it: They glorified the word of the Lord, the gospel; the more they knew of it, the more they admired it. Oh! what a light, what a power, what a treasure, does this gospel bring along with it! Because now the knowledge of it was diffused, and not confined to the Jews only. It is the glory of the word of the Lord that the further it spreads the brighter it shines, which shows it to be not like the light of the candle, but like that of the sun when he goes forth in his strength. Because now the knowledge of it was brought to them. Those speak best of the honour of the word of the Lord that have themselves been subdued by its power, and comforted by its sweetness.

3. Many of them became sincerely obedient to the faith: As many as were ordained to eternal life believed. Those believed to whom God gave grace to believe. Those came to Christ whom the Father drew, and to whom the Spirit made the gospel call effectual. God gave this grace to believe to all those among them who were ordained to eternal life; or, as many as were disposed to eternal life, as many as had a concern about their eternal state, and aimed manner. contradicting and blaspheming—There is nothing more awful than Jewish fury and execration of the name of Jesus of Nazareth, when thoroughly roused.

46. Then Paul and Barnabas waxed bold, and said, . . .—This is in the highest style of a last and solemn protestation.

It was necessary that the word should first have been spoken to you—See the direction of Christ in Luke 24:47; also Romans 1:16. since ye judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life—pass sentence upon yourselves.

47. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying . . .—These and other predictions must have been long before this brought vividly home to Paul's mind in connection with his special vocation to the Gentiles. I have set thee—i.e., Messiah; from which Paul inferred that he was but following out this destination of his Lord, in transferring to the Gentiles those "unsearchable riches" which were now by the Jews rejected and despised.

really the case. Contradicting. The arguments and statements brought forward by the disciples; and blaspheming, speaking impiously and injuriously of Jesus Christ.

46. Waxed bold. Having great liberty of speech; a strong, persuasive, and overpowering eloquence. They had eternal truth for the basis of this discourse, a multitude of incontestable facts to support it, an all-persuading eloquence to illustrate and maintain what they had asserted. Ye put it from you. "Ye disdain" this doctrine, and consider it "contemptible"; so the word is frequently used.

47. For so . . . the Lord commanded us. The apostles could quote a pertinent scripture for everything they did, because the outlines of the whole gospel dispensation are founded in the law and the prophets, and they were now building the Church of God according to the pattern shown them in the mount. I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles. This quotation is from Isa. xlix. 6 and was most fully in point. For salvation unto the ends of the earth. The very name of the Messiah, viz., Jesus, announced the design and end of His mission. He is the "Saviour," and is to be proclaimed as such to the ends of the earth, to all mankind.

48. As many as were ordained to eternal life believed. This text has been most pitifully misunderstood. Many suppose that it simply means that those in that assembly who were foreordained, or predestinated by God's decree to eternal life, believed under the influence of that decree. Now we should be careful to to make sure of eternal life, and it was the grace of God that wrought it in them.

4. When they believed they did what they could to spread the knowledge of Christ (v. 49): And the word of the Lord was published throughout all the region. Those new converts were themselves ready to communicate to others that which they were so full of themselves. Those that have become acquainted with Christ themselves will do what they can to bring others acquainted with him. Those in great and rich cities that have received the gospel should not think to engross it, but should do what they can to get it published in the country among the ordinary sort of people, who have souls to be saved as well as they.

VIII. Paul and Barnabas, having sown the seeds of a Christian church there, quitted the place, and went to do the like elsewhere. We read not anything of their working miracles here, to confirm their doctrine. Though God then did ordinarily make use of that method of conviction. Begetting faith by the immediate influence of his Spirit was itself the greatest miracle to those in whom it was wrought.

1. How the unbelieving Jews expelled the apostles out of that country. They raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas. Satan and his agents are most exasperated against the preachers of the gospel when they see them go on successfully. Thus it has been the common lot of the best men in the world to suffer ill for doing well. (1) What method the Jews took to give them trouble: They stirred up the devout and honourable women against them. It is sad when, under colour of devotion to God, they conceive an enmity to Christ, as those here mentioned. What! women persecutors! Can they forget the tenderness and compassion of their sex? What! honourable women! Can they thus stain their honour. But, which is strangest of all, devout women! Will they kill Christ's servants, and think therein they do God service? By these devout and honourable women they stirred up likewise the chief men of the city, the magistrates and the rulers, and set them against the apostles. (2) How far they carried it, so far that they expelled them out of their coasts; they banished them. It was not by fear, but downright violence, that they were driven out. This was a method God took to make those that were well disposed the more warmly affected towards the apostles; for it is natural to us to pity those that are persecuted, and to be the more ready to help them. The expelling of the apostles out of their coasts perhaps raised them more friends than conniving at them in their coasts would have done.

2. How the apostles abandoned and rejected the unbelieving Jews (v. 51): They shook off the dust of their feet against them. They declared that they would have no more to do with them. They expressed their detestation of their infidelity. As Jews and Gentiles, if they believe, are equally acceptable to God and good men; so, if they do not, they are equally abominable. Thus they set them at defiance, and expressed their contempt of them and their malice. Thus they left a testimony behind them that they had had a fair offer made them of the grace of the gospel. Thus Christ had ordered them to do, and for this reason, Matt. x. 14; Luke ix. 5. When they left them, they came to Iconium, not so much for safety, as for work.

3. What frame they left the new converts in at Antioch (v. 52): The disciples went on with their work. They were very cheerful. One would have expected that when Paul and Barnabas were expelled out of their coasts, the disciples would have been full of grief and full of fear. But no; they were filled with joy in Christ. All their fears were swallowed up in their believing joys. They were courageous, wonderfully animated with a holy resolution to cleave to Christ. The more we relish the comforts and encouragements we meet with in the power of godliness the better prepared we are to face the difficulties we meet with in the profession of godliness.

the devout and honourable women—female proselytes of distinction, jaundiced against the new preachers by those Jewish ecclesiastics to whom they had learned to look up. The potent influence of the female character both for and against the truth is seen in every age of the Church's history.

expelled them—an easier thing than to refute them.

shook off the dust of their feet against them—as directed (Matt. 10:14). came unto Iconium—a populous city about forty-five miles southeast from Pisidian Antioch: at the foot of Mount Taurus; on the borders of Lycaonia, Phrygia, and Pisidia; and in later times largely contributing to the consolidation of the Turkish empire.

the disciples—who, though not themselves expelled, had to endure sufferings for the Gospel, as we learn from ch. 14:22—were filled with joy and with the Holy Ghost—who not only raised them above shame and fear, as professed disciples of the Lord Jesus, but filled them with holy and elevated emotions.

examine what a word means before we attempt to fix its meaning. Whatever tetagmenoi may mean, which is the word we translate ordained, it includes no idea of *pre*ordination or predestination of any kind. The verb tasso signifies to "place, set, order, appoint, dispose"; hence it has been considered here as implying the disposition or readiness of mind of several persons in the congregation, such as the religious proselytes mentioned in v. 43, who possessed the reverse of the disposition of those Jews who spake against those things, contradicting and blaspheming, v. 45. Though the word in this place has been variously translated, yet, of all the meanings ever put on it, none agrees worse with its nature and known signification than that which represents it as intending those who were predestinated to eternal life; this is no meaning of the term and should never be applied to it.

49. The word of the Lord was published. Those who had come from different parts and were converted carried the glad tidings to their respective neighborhoods.

50. Devout and honourable women. It is likely that these were heathen matrons who had become proselytes to the Jewish religion; and as they were persons of affluence and respectability, they had considerable influence with the civil magistracy of the place, and probably their husbands were of this order; and it is likely that they used that influence, at the instigation of the Jews, to get the apostles expelled from the place.

51. They shook off the dust of their feet against them. This was a very significant rite; by it they in effect said: "You are worse than the heathen; even your very land is accursed for your opposition to God, and we dare not permit even its dust to cleave to the soles of our feet; and we shake it off, in departing from your country, according to our Lord's command (Matt. x. 14), for a testimony against you, that we offered you salvation, but you rejected it and persecuted us." The Jews, when travelling in heathen countries, took care, when they came to the borders of their own, to shake off the dust of their feet, lest any of the unhallowed ground should defile the sacred land of Israel. Came unto Iconium. According to Strabo, Iconium was a small fortified town, the capital of Lycaonia.

52. The disciples were filled with joy, and with the Holy Ghost. Though in the world they had tribulation, yet in Christ they had peace. The happiness of a genuine Christian lies far beyond the reach of earthly disturbances, and is not affected by the changes and chances to which mortal things are exposed. The martyrs were more happy in the flames than their persecutors could be on their beds of down.

MATTHEW HENRY

CHAPTER 14

I. The preaching of the gospel in Iconium. As the blood of the martyrs has been the seed of the church, so the banishment of the confessors has helped to scatter that seed. They made the first offer of the gospel to the Jews in their synagogues. Though the Jews at Antioch had used them barbarously, yet they did not therefore decline preaching the gospel to the Jews at Iconium. Let not those of any denomination be condemned in the gross, nor some suffer for others' faults. The apostles concurred herein. They went both together into the synagogue to testify their unanimity and mutual affection.

II. The success of their preaching there: They so spoke that a great multitude, both of the Jews and also of the Greeks, that is the Gentiles, believed. The gospel was now preached to Jews and Gentiles together. In the close of the foregoing chapter it was preached first to the Jews, and then to the Gentiles, but here they are put together. The Jews have not so lost their preference as to be thrown behind, only the Gentiles are brought to stand upon even terms with them, and both together admitted into the church without distinction. There seems to have been something remarkable in the manner of the apostles' preaching there: They so spoke that a great multitude believed—so plainly, so convincingly, so warmly, so affectionately. What they spoke came from the heart and therefore was likely to reach to the heart. So boldly and courageously, that those who heard them could not but say that God was with them of a truth.

III. The opposition that their preaching met with there. Unbelieving Jews were the first spring of their trouble here, as elsewhere (v. 2): they stirred up the Gentiles. The influence which the gospel had upon many of the Gentiles, and their embracing it, as it provoked some of the Jews to a holy jealousy, so it provoked others of them to a wicked jealousy. Disaffected Gentiles, irritated by the unbelieving Jews, were the instruments of their trouble. The Jews, by false suggestions, made their minds evil affected against the brethren. They soured and embittered their spirits against both the converters and the converted. It is no wonder if those who are ill affected towards good people wish ill to them and contrive ill against them; it is all owing to ill will. They molested the minds of the Gentiles (so some of the critics take it); they were continually teasing them. The tools of persecutors have a dog's life, set on continually.

IV. Their continuance in their work there, and God's owning them in it, v. 3. We have here, 1. The apostles working for Christ. Because the minds of the Gentiles were evil affected against them, one would think that therefore they should have withdrawn. On the contrary, therefore they abode there a long time, speaking boldly in the Lord. The more they perceived the spite against the new converts, the more they were animated to go on in their work. They spoke boldly, and were not afraid of giving offence to the unbelieving Jews. But observe what animated them: They spoke boldly in the Lord, in his strength, not depending upon anything in themselves. 2. Christ working with the apostles, according to his promise, Lo, I am with you always. He failed not to give testimony to the word of his grace. The gospel is a word of grace, the assurance of God's goodwill to us. It is the word of Christ's grace, for it is in him alone that we find favour with God. Christ himself has attested this word of grace; he has assured us that it is the word of God. It is said particularly concerning the apostles here that the Lord confirmed their testimony, in granting signs and wonders to be done by their hands—in the miracles they wrought in the kingdom of nature—as well as in the greater miracles wrought on men's minds by the power of divine grace. The Lord was with them, while they were with him.

V. The division which this occasioned in the city (v. 4): The multitude of the city was divided. It seems, this business of the preaching of the gospel was so universally taken notice of that every person, even of the multitude of the city, was either for it or against it; none stood neuter. We may here see the meaning of Christ's prediction that he came not to send peace upon earth, but rather division, Luke xii. 51–53. If all would have given in unanimously into his measures, there would have been universal concord; but, disagreeing here, the breach was wide as the sea. It is better that part of the city go to heaven than all to hell. Let us not think it strange if the preaching of the gospel occasion division, it is better to be persecuted as dividers for swimming against the stream than yield ourselves to be carried down the stream

Vss. 1-7. MEETING WITH SIMILAR SUCCESS AND SIMILAR OPPOSITION AT ICONIUM, PAUL AND BARNABAS FLEE FOR THEIR LIVES TO LYSTRA AND DERBE, AND PREACH THERE. "After this detailed account of Paul's labors at Pisidian Antioch, Luke subjoins only brief notices of his further labors, partly because from the nature of the case his discourses must have embraced nearly the same topics, and partly because the consequences that resulted assumed quite a similar shape" [OLSHAUSEN]. 1. they went both together into the synagogue—Though Paul was now the prominent speaker and actor, yet in everything Barnabas went along with him. a... multitude...of the Greeks believed—meaning probably the religious proselytes, as opposed to "the Gentiles" mentioned vs. 2.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The usual results followed the preaching of the Gospel. The Jews were again the mischief-makers, and, with the astuteness of their race, pushed the Gentiles to the front, and this time tried a new piece of annoyance. "The brethren" bore the brunt of the attack—that is, the converts, not Paul and Barnabas. It was a cunning move to drop suspicions into the minds of influential townsmen, and so to harass, not the two strangers, but their adherents. The calculation was that that would stop the progress of the heresy by making its adherents uncomfortable, and would also wound the teachers through their disciples.

But one small element had been left out of the calculation—the sort of men these teachers were; and another factor which had not hitherto appeared came into play and upset the whole scheme. Paul and Barnabas knew when to retreat and when to stand their ground. This time they stood; and the opposition launched at their friends was the reason why they did so. "Long time therefore abode they." If their own safety had been in question, they might have fled; but they could not leave the men whose acceptance of their message had brought them into straits. But behind the two bold speakers stood "the Lord," Christ himself, the true worker. Men who live in Him are made bold by their communion with Him, and He witnesses for those who witness for Him.

who gave testimony to the word of his grace—a notable definition of the Gospel, whose whole burden is GRACE. and granted—granting,' i.e., who confirmed the Gospel by granting miraculous attestation to it. (The "and" is wanting in the best MSS.)

CHAPTER 14

1. So spake, with such power and demonstration of the Spirit, that a great multitude both of the Jews, genuine descendants of one or other of the twelve tribes, and also of the Greeks, probably such as were proselytes, believed, received the Christian religion as a revelation from God, and confided in its Author for salvation, according to the apostles' preaching.

2. Evil affected. "Irritated or exasperated their minds against the brethren," the disciples of Christ.

3. Long time therefore abode they. Because they had great success, therefore they continued a long time, gaining many converts, and building up in their most holy faith those who had believed, notwithstanding the opposition they met with from both the unbelieving Jews and the heathens. Speaking boldly. Having great liberty of speech, a copious and commanding eloquence, springing from a consciousness of the truth which they preached.

4. The multitude of the city was divided. The Jews treated the apostles as false teachers, and their miracles as impositions, and many of the people held with them; while the others, who had not hardened their hearts against the truth, felt the force of it and, being without prejudice, could easily discern the miracles to be the work of God, and therefore held with the apostles.

that leads to destruction.

VI. The attempt made upon the apostles by their enemies. Their evil affection against them broke out at length into violent outrages, v. 5. Who the plotters were: Both the Gentiles and the Jews, with their rulers. The Gentiles and Jews were at enmity with one another, and yet united against Christians. If the church's enemies can thus unite for its destruction, shall not its friends unite for its preservation? What the plot was. Their design was to use the apostles despitefully, to expose them to disgrace, and then to stone them.

VII. The deliverance of the apostles, v. 6, 7. They got away, upon notice given them of the design against them, and they made an honourable retreat (for it was not an inglorious flight) to Lystra and Derbe. They found safety. God has shelters for his people in a storm. They found work, and this was what they went for. To these cities they went, and there, and in the region that lieth round about, they preached the gospel. In times of persecution ministers may see cause to quit the spot, when yet they do not quit the work.

Verses 8–18

I. A miraculous cure wrought by Paul at Lystra upon a cripple that had been lame from his birth. The deplorable case of the poor cripple (v. 8): He was impotent in his feet, disabled (so the word is). It was well known that he had been so from his mother's womb, and that he never had walked, nor could stand up. The expectation that was raised in him of a cure (v. 9): He heard Paul preach, and, it is likely, was much affected with what he heard. This Paul was aware of, by the spirit of discerning, perhaps the aspect of his countenance did in part witness for him: Paul perceived that he had faith to be healed. The cure wrought: Paul, perceiving that he had faith to be healed, brought the word and healed him. Paul spoke to him with a loud voice, that the people about might take notice, and have their expectations raised of the effect. It is said (v. 8) that he sat, not that he sat begging. But we may imagine how welcome Paul's word was to him, "Stand upright on thy feet; help thyself, and God shall help thee." He leaped and walked, and not only stood upright, but he walked to and fro before them all. Those that by the grace of God are cured of their spiritual lameness must show it by leaping with a holy exultation and walking in a holy conversation.

II. The impression which this cure made upon the people: they were amazed at it. The working of this one miracle was enough to make them in the eyes of this people truly great and honourable, though the multitude of Christ's miracles could not screen him from the utmost contempt among the Jews. The people take them for gods (v. 11): They lifted up their voices in the speech of Lycaonia, The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. This notion of the thing agreed well enough with the fabulous account they had of the visits which their gods made to this lower world; and proud enough they were to think that they should have a visit made to them. They carried this notion so far here that they pretended to tell which of their gods they were (v. 12): They called Barnabas Jupiter; for, if they will have him to be a god, it is as easy to make him the prince of their gods as not. And Paul they called Mercury, who was the messenger of the gods, for Paul was the chief speaker. The priest thereupon prepares to do sacrifice to them, v. 13. The temple of Jupiter was before the gate of their city, as its protector and guardian; and the priest, hearing the people cry out thus, thought it was time for him to do his duty. If Jupiter be among them himself, it concerns him to do him the utmost honours imaginable. When Christ appeared in the likeness of men, and did many, very many miracles, yet they were so far from doing sacrifice to him that they made him a sacrifice. But Paul and Barnabas, upon the working of one miracle, are immediately deified. They brought oxen, to be sacrificed to them, and garlands, with which to crown the sacrifices.

III. Paul and Barnabas protest against this, and with much ado prevent it. Many of the heathen emperors called themselves gods, and took a pride in having divine honours paid them: but Christ's ministers refused those honours when they were tendered. The holy indignation which Paul and Barnabas conceived at this: When they heard this, they rent their clothes. We do not find that they rent their clothes when the people vilified them, they could bear this without disturbance: but when they deified them, and spoke of worshipping them, they could not bear it. The pains they took to prevent it. They did not connive at it. Christ had put honour enough upon them in making them apostles, they

5. an assault made . . . to stone them—rather here, 'an impetuous movement' with a view to stoning them: for in II Corinthians 11:25, Paul says, "Once I was stoned," and that was at Lystra, as expressly related in vs. 19. (PALEY'S remarks—Horæ Paulinæ—on this singular coincidence between the Epistle and the history are very striking.) fled—(See Matt. 10: 23). 6. unto Lystra and Derbe—the one some twenty miles to the south, the other some sixty miles to the east of Iconium, somewhere near the bases of what are called the Black Mountains and the roots of Mount Taurus; but their exact position has not yet been discovered.

8-21. AT LYSTRA, PAUL HEALING A CRIPPLE, THE PEOPLE ARE SCARCE RESTRAINED FROM SACRIFICING TO THEM AS GODS, BUT AFTERWARDS, THEIR MINDS BEING POISONED, THEY STONE PAUL, LEAVING HIM FOR DEAD—WITHDRAWING TO DERBE, THEY PREACH AND TEACH THERE. There being no mention of the synagogue at Lystra, it is probable there were too few Jews there to form one. 8-10. there sat there a certain man . . . a cripple from his mother's womb. . . . The same heard Paul speak—in the open air and (vs. 11) to a crowd of people. who steadfastly beholding him—as he did Elymas the sorcerer when about to work a miracle on him. and perceiving that he had faith to be healed—Paul may have been led by the sight of this cripple to dwell on the Saviour's miracles of healing, and His present power; and perceiving from the eagerness with which the patient drank in his words, that he was prepared to put his own case into the Redeemer's hands, the Spirit of the glorified Physician came all upon Paul, and "with a loud voice" he bade him "stand upright upon his feet." The effect was instantaneous—he sprang to his feet "and walked."

11-13. in the speech of Lycaonia—whether a corruption of the Greek tongue, which was well enough understood in this region, or the remains of some older tongue, is not known. The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men—the language of an unsophisticated people. But "that which was a superstition in Lycaonia, and for which the whole creation groaned, became a reality at Bethlehem" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. they called Barnabas, Jupiter—the father of the gods, from his commanding mien (CHRYSOSTOM thinks). and Paul, Mercurius—the god of eloquence and the messenger and attendant of Jupiter, in the heathen mythology. the priest of Jupiter, which was—i.e., whose temple stood—before their city, brought oxen and garlands—to crown the victims and decorate, as on festive occasions, the porches.

14-18. when . . . Barnabas and Paul heard—Barnabas is put first here, apparently as having been styled the "Jupiter" of the company—they rent their clothes and ran in—rather (according to the true reading), ran forth

ADAM CLARKE

5. An assault made. A "desperate attempt" was made by their ruler, i.e., by the heathen rulers of the people, and the synagogue.

9. That he had faith to be healed. How did this faith come to this poor heathen? Why, by hearing the Word of God preached; for it is said, The same heard Paul speak. And it appears that he credited the doctrine he heard, and believed that Jesus could, if He would, make him whole. Besides, he must have heard of the miracles which the apostles had wrought (see v. 3), and this would raise his expectation of receiving a cure.

10. He leaped and walked. Giving the fullest proof of his restoration; his leaping, however, might have been through joy of having received his cure.

12. They called Barnabas, Jupiter; and Paul, Mercurius. The heathens supposed that Jupiter and Mercury were the gods who most frequently assumed the human form, and Jupiter was accustomed to take Mercury with him on such expeditions. Jupiter was the supreme god of the heathens, and Mercury was by them considered the god of eloquence. As the ancients usually represented Jupiter as rather an aged man, large, noble, and majestic; and Mercury young, light, and active, the conjecture of Chrysostom is very probable, that Barnabas was a large, noble, well-made man, and probably in years; and Paul, young, active, and eloquent; on which account they termed the former Jupiter, and the latter Mercury. That Mercury was eloquent and powerful in his words is allowed by the heathens; and the very epithet that is applied here to Paul, "He was the chief or leader of the discourse," was applied to Mercury.

13. Then the priest of Jupiter, which was before their city. Many cities were put under the protection of a particular deity, and the image of that deity placed at the entrance, to signify that he was the guardian and protector. To this Luke, everywhere as accurate as he is circumstantial, refers. Lystra, it appears, was under the guardianship of Jupiter Propulaius, which Luke translates "the Jupiter that was before the city," which is another term for Jupiter Custos, or Jupiter the Guardian. All these deities, according to the attributes they sustained, had their peculiar priests, rites, and sacrifices. Hence we can see with what accuracy Luke wrote. The person who was going to offer them sacrifices was the priest of Jupiter Custos, under whose guardianship the city of Lystra was, and whom the priest supposed had visited the city in a human form. Oxen and garlands. That is, oxen adorned with flowers, their horns gilded, and necks bound about with fillets, as was the custom in sacrificial rites. They also crowned the gods themselves, the priests, and gates of the temples, with flowers.

needed not assume either the honour of princes or the honour of gods. Let us see how they prevented it. They ran in among the people as soon as they heard of it. They did not stand still, expecting honours to be done them, but plainly declined them by thrusting themselves into the crowd. They reasoned with them, crying out, "Sirs, why do you these things? Why do you go about to make gods of us?"

[1] "Our nature will not admit it: We also are men of like passions with you. You wrong God if you give that honour to us, or to any other man, which is to be given to God only. We are not only men, but sinful men and suffering men, and therefore will not be deified.

[2] "Our doctrine is directly against it. Must we be added to the number of your gods whose business it is to abolish the gods you have? We preach unto you that you should turn from these vanities unto the living God." When they preached to the Jews they had nothing to do but to preach the grace of God in Christ, and needed not to preach against idolatry; but, when they had to do with the Gentiles, they must rectify their mistakes in natural religion. See here what they preached to the Gentiles.

First, The gods which they and their fathers worshipped, and all the ceremonies of their worship of them, were vanities, idle things, unreasonable, unprofitable. Therefore turn from these vanities.

Secondly, The God to whom they would have them turn is the living God. They had hitherto worshipped dead images, that were utterly unable to help them, now they are persuaded to worship a living God, who has life in himself, and life for us, and lives for evermore.

Thirdly, This God is the creator of the world, the fountain of all being and power: "He made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things therein. We call you to worship the God that made you and all the world; worship the true God."

Fourthly, The world owed it to his patience that he had not destroyed them long ere this for their idolatry (v. 16): In times past he suffered all nations to walk in their own ways. Your serving them was a trial of God's patience. Now that he has sent his gospel into the world, if you still continue in your idolatry, he will not bear with you as he has done. Now that God has sent a revelation into the world which is to be published to all nations the case is altered. Now you will no longer be excused in these vanities, but must turn from them. God's patience with us hitherto should lead us to repentance, and not encourage us to presume. Our having done ill while we were in ignorance will not bear us out in doing ill when we are better taught.

Fifthly, Even when they were not under the direction and correction of the word of God, yet they should have known, to do better by the works of God, v. 17. He left not himself without witness; besides the witness for God within them (the dictates of natural conscience), they had witnesses for God round about them—the bounty of common providence. Their having no scriptures did in part excuse them. This however did not wholly excuse them. There were other witnesses for God. God, having not left himself without witness, has not left us without a guide, and so has left us without excuse. The bounties of common providence witness to us that there is a God. The rain and fruitful seasons could not come by chance. All the powers of nature witness to us a sovereign power in the God of nature. It is not the heaven that gives us rain, but God that gives us rain from heaven. The benefits we have by these bounties witness to us that we ought to make our acknowledgments to the Creator. He left not himself without witness in that he did good. God seems to reckon the instances of his goodness to be more pregnant, cogent proofs of his title to our homage than the evidences of his greatness; for his goodness is his glory. Because the most sensible instance of the goodness of Providence is that of the daily provision made by it of meat and drink for us, the apostle chooses to insist upon that, and shows how God does us good, (1) In preparing it for us. He does us good in giving us rain from heaven,—rain for us to drink,—rain for our land to drink, for our meat, as well as drink we have from the rain; in giving us this, he gives us fruitful seasons. Of all the common operations of providence, the heathen chose to form their notion of the supreme God by that which bespeaks terror, and this was the thunder. But the apostle sets before us his beneficence, that we may have good thoughts of him—may love him and delight in him, as one that does good, in giving rain from heaven and fruitful seasons. (2) In giving us the comforts of it. It is he that fills our hearts with food and gladness. God is not only a benefactor, but a bountiful one. He fills our hearts with food, not merely for necessity, —among the people, crying out, . . . Sirs, why do ye these things?—This was something more than that abhorrence of idolatry which took possession of the Jews as a nation from the time of the Babylonish captivity: it was that delicate sensibility to everything which affects the honor of God which Christianity, giving us in God a reconciled Father, alone can produce; making the Christian instinctively feel himself to be wounded in all dishonor done to God, and filling him with mingled horror and grief when such gross insults as this are offered to him. We . . . are men of like passions . . .—How unlike either imposture or enthusiasm is this, and how high above all self-seeking do these men of Christ show themselves to be!

unto the living God—This is the most glorious and distinctive of all the names of God. It is the familiar phraseology of the Old Testament, which, in such contrast with all that is to be found within the literature of heathenism, is shown to be, with its sequel, the New Testament, the one Book of the true religion. who made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all . . . therein—This idea of creation, utterly unknown alike to rude and to cultivated heathenism, would not only define what was meant by "the living God," but open up a new world to the more thoughtful part of the audience. Who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways—i.e., without extending to them the revelation vouchsafed to the seed of Abraham, and the grace attending it; cf. ch. 17:30; I Corinthians 1:21. Yet not without guilt on their part was this privation (Rom. 1:20, etc.).

17. Nevertheless he left not himself without witness—Though the heinousness of idolatry is represented as so much less in the heathen, by how much they were outside the pale of revealed religion, he takes care to add that the heathen have divine "witness" enough to leave them "without excuse." he did good—scattering His beneficence everywhere and in a thousand forms. rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons—on which human subsistence and all human enjoyment depend. In Lycaonia, where, as ancient writers attest, rain is peculiarly scarce, this allusion would have all the greater effect.

filling our hearts with food and gladness—a natural colloquialism, the heart being gladdened by the food supplied to the body.

ADAM CLARKE

15. We also are men of like passions with you. This saying of the apostles has been most strangely perverted. A pious commentator, taking the word passion in its vulgar and most improper sense (a bad temper, an evil propensity) and supposing that these holy men wished to confess that they also had many sinful infirmities and wrong tempers, endeavors to illustrate this sense of the word by appealing to the contention of Paul and Barnabas. But the expression means no more than, "We are truly human beings, with the same powers and appetites as your own; need food and raiment as you do; and are all mortal like yourselves." That ye should turn from these vanities. That is, from these idols and false gods. How often false gods and idolatry are termed vanity in the Scriptures, no careful reader of the Bible needs to be told. What a bold saying was this in the presence of a heathen mob, intent on performing an act of their superstitious worship, in which they no doubt thought the safety of the state was concerned! The ancient fable related by Ovid, Metam., l. i. vv. 211-239, will cast some light on the conduct of the Lystrians in this case. The following is its substance: "Jupiter, having been informed of the great degeneracy of mankind, was determined himself to survey the earth. Coming to this province [Lycaonia], disguised in human shape, he took up his residence at the palace of Lycaon, then kind of that country: giving a sign of his godhead, the people worship him: Lycaon sneers, doubts his divinity, and is determined to put it to the trial. Some ambassadors from the Molossian state having just arrived, he slew one of them, boiled part of his flesh, and roasted the rest, and set it before Jupiter: the god, indignant at the insult, burnt the palace, and turned the impious king into a wolf." From this time, or rather from this fable, the whole province was called Lycaonia. The simple people now seeing such proofs of supernatural power, in the miracles wrought by Barnabas and Paul, thought that Jupiter had again visited them; and fearing lest they should meet with his indignation, should they neglect duly to honor him, they brought oxen and garlands, and would have offered them sacrifice, had they not been prevented by the apostles themselves. This circumstance will account for their whole conduct, and shows the reason why Jupiter was the tutelar god of the place. The living God. Widely different from those stocks and stones which were objects of their worship. Which made heaven, and earth. And as all things were made by His power, so all subsist by His providence; and to Him alone all worship, honor, and glory are due.

16. Who in times past suffered all nations. The words all nations should be rendered "all the Gentiles," merely to distinguish them from the Jewish people, who, having a revelation, were not left to walk in their own ways.

17. He left not himself without witness. Though He gave the Gentiles no revelation of His will, yet He continued to govern them by His gracious providence, doing them good in general, giving them rain to fertilize their grounds, and fruitful seasons as the result.

MATTHEW HENRY

but plenty, dainty, and variety. The Gentiles that lived without God in the world, yet lived upon God. Those heathen had their hearts filled with food; but these things will not fill the soul, nor will those that know how to value their own souls be satisfied with them. We must all own that God fills our hearts with food and gladness; not only food, that we may live, but gladness, that we may live cheerfully. We must thank God, not only for our food, but for our gladness. And, if our hearts be filled with food and gladness, they ought to be filled with love and thankfulness.

Lastly, The success of this prohibition which the apostles gave to the people (v. 18): By these sayings, they restrained the people from doing sacrifice to them. They could scarcely restrain them from it. Paul and Barnabas had cured a cripple, and therefore the people deified them, which should make us very cautious that we do not give that honour to another, or take it to ourselves, which is due to God only.

Verses 19–28

I. How Paul was stoned and left for dead, v. 19, 20. They fell upon Paul rather than Barnabas, because Paul, being the chief speaker, galled and vexed them more than Barnabas did. How the people were incensed against Paul; there came certain Jews from Antioch, and they incensed the people against them. See how restless the rage of the Jews was against the gospel of Christ; they could not bear that it should have footing anywhere. To what degree they were incensed by these barbarous Jews: the mob rose and stoned Paul, and then drew him out of the city supposing he had been dead. As it is with great difficulty that men are restrained from evil on one side, so it is with great ease that they are persuaded to evil on the other side. See how fickle worldly people are. Those that but the other day would have treated the apostles as more than men now treat them as worse than brutes. Today Hosanna, tomorrow Crucify; today sacrificed to, tomorrow sacrificed. Popular breath turns like the wind. How he was delivered by the power of God: When he was drawn out of the city, the disciples stood round about him, v. 20. It seems there were some here at Lystra that became disciples, and even these new converts had courage to own Paul when he was thus run down. They stood round about him, as a guard to him, stood about him to see whether he were alive or dead; and all of a sudden he rose up. God's faithful servants, though they may be brought within a step of death, shall not die as long as he has work for them to do.

II. How they went on with their work. All the stones they threw at Paul could not beat him off from his work: They drew him out of the city (v. 19), but he came into the city again. However, their being persecuted here is a known indication to them to seek for opportunities of usefulness elsewhere, and therefore for the present they quit Lystra.

1. They went to break up and sow fresh ground at Derbe. Thither the next day Paul and Barnabas departed, there they preached the gospel, there they taught many, v. 21. Nothing is recorded that happened at Derbe.

2. They returned, and went over their work again; and, having stayed as long as they thought fit at Derbe, they came back to Lystra, to Iconium, and Antioch, v. 21.

(1) They confirmed the souls of the disciples, v. 22. Young converts are apt to waver, and a little thing shocks them. The apostles come and tell them that this is the true grace of God wherein they stand, that there is no danger like that of losing their part in Christ, no advantage like that of keeping their hold of him; that, whatever their trials may be, they shall have strength from Christ to pass through them; and, whatever their losses may be, they shall be abundantly recompensed. And this confirms the souls of the disciples. Those that are converted need to be confirmed; those that are planted need to be rooted. Ministers' work is to establish saints as well as to awaken sinners. True confirmation is confirmation of the soul. It is the grace of God and nothing less, that can effectually confirm the souls of the disciples.

(2) They exhorted them to continue in the faith; or, they encouraged them. They told them it was both their duty and interest to persevere. Those that are in the faith are concerned to continue in the faith. And it is requisite that they should often be exhorted to do so.

(3) That which they insisted most upon was that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God. But is this the way to confirm the souls of the disciples, and to engage them to continue in the faith? One would think it would rather shock with these sayings scarce restrained they the people that they had not done sacrifice to them—In spite of this, and Peter's repudiation of all such honor (ch. 10:26), how soon idolatrous tendencies began to show themselves in the Christian Church, at length to be systematized and enjoined in the Church of Rome!

came thither Jews from Antioch and Iconium—Furious zeal that would travel so far to counteract the missionaries of the Cross! persuaded the people—'the multitudes.' and having stoned Paul—See on vs. 5. Barnabas they seem to have let alone; Paul, as the prominent actor and speaker, being the object of all their rage. The words seem to imply that it was the Jews who did this; and no doubt they took the lead (vs. 19), but it was the act of the instigated and fickle multitudes along with them. drew him out of the city—By comparing this with ch. 7:58 it will be seen that the Jews were the chief actors in this scene. as the disciples stood round about him—sorrowing. So his labors here had not been in vain: "Disciples" had been gathered, who now rallied around the bleeding body. And one appears to have been gained on this occasion, of far more importance than all the rest—TIMOTHEUS. See on ch. 16:1-3. (It could scarcely have been at the subsequent visit, vs. 21, for the reason given in II Timothy 3:10, 11; while at the third visit, ch. 16:1-3, he was already a Christian.) he rose up—It is possible that this recovery was natural; the insensibility occasioned by such treatment as he had received sometimes passing away of itself, and leaving the patient less hurt than appeared. But certainly the impression naturally left on the mind by the words is that the restoration was miraculous; and so the best interpreters understand the words. This is confirmed by what follows—came into the city—Noble intrepidity! next day he departed with Barnabas to Derbe—a journey for which he could hardly be fit if his recovery had been natural. (See as to Derbe, on vs. 6.) and when they had preached . . . to that city and had taught many—rather, "had made many disciples" (margin); but probably without suffering any persecution, as Derbe is not mentioned along with Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra (II Tim. 3:11).

21-28. PAUL AND BARNABAS RETRACE THEIR STEPS, RETURN TO ANTIOCH IN SYRIA, AND THUS COMPLETE THEIR FIRST MISSIONARY JOURNEY. 21, 22. they returned . . . to Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch, confirming the souls . . .—At Derbe, Paul was not far from the well-known pass which leads down from the central tableland to Cilicia and Tarsus. But his thoughts did not center in an earthly home. He revisited the places where he had been reviled and persecuted, but where he had left as sheep in the desert the disciples whom his Master had enabled him to gather. They needed building up and strengthening in the faith, comforting in the midst of their inevitable suffering, and fencing round by permanent institutions. Undaunted therefore by the dangers that awaited them, our missionaries return to them, using words of encouragement which none but the founders of a true religion would have ventured to address to their earliest converts, that "we can only enter into the kingdom of God by passing through much tribulation" [Hows].

ADAM CLARKE

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

We note finally the perils threatening these men. There were the perils of opposition. Disobedience produced the spirit of opposition: hatred, plotting, stoning. But the gravest peril threatening these men was that which came to them in the hour when men suggested that they should worship them. That is the supreme peril to the Christian worker. It would have been so easy to gain power and notoriety, to take this worship and abandon the pathway of persecution and of the stones. That is the peril of the prophet. When men bring garlands to worship, when men suggest his deification, he is in extreme danger. If men would help the prophet, they should pray that he may never accept the garland or the worship of men. This was a most insidious hour. I would not suggest that there was any trembling on the part of Paul. He was not seduced, because he was living in such fellowship with his Lord that it was impossible.
—The Acts of the Apostles

19. There came thither certain Jews from Antioch. Those were, no doubt, the same who had raised up persecution against Paul and Barnabas at Iconium and Antioch before. They followed the apostles with implacable malice; and what they could not do themselves they endeavored to do by others, whose minds they first perverted, and then irritated to deeds of fell purpose. Supposing he had been dead. They did not leave stoning him till they had the fullest evidence that he was dead; and so, most probably, he was.

20. The disciples stood round about him. No doubt in earnest prayer, entreating the Author of life that his soul might again return to its battered tenement. He rose up. Miraculously restored, not only to life, but to perfect soundness; so that he was able to walk into the city, that his persecutors might see the mighty power of God in his restoration, and the faith of the young converts be confirmed in the truth and goodness of God.

21. Preached the gospel to that city. Derbe, a city in the same province.

They returned again to Lystra, and to Iconium. Behold the courage of these Christian men! They counted not their lives dear to them, and returned to do their Master's work in the very places in which they had been so grievously persecuted, and where one of them had been apparently stoned to death!

MATTHEW HENRY

them, and make them weary. No, as the matter is fairly stated it will help to confirm them. It is true they will meet with tribulation. It is so appointed. They must undergo it, there is no remedy, all that will live godly in Christ Jesus should suffer persecution. All that will be Christ's disciples must take up their cross. When we gave up our names to Jesus Christ it was what we agreed to; when we sat down and counted the cost, if we reckoned aright, it was what we counted upon. It is the lot of the leaders in Christ's army, as well as of the soldiers. It is not only you, but we, that are subject to it. As Christ did not put the apostles upon any harder service than what he underwent before them, so neither did the apostles put the ordinary christians. It is true we must count upon much tribulation, but this is encouraging, that we shall get through it. We shall not only get through it, but get through it into the kingdom of God. It is true we must go by the cross, but it is as true that we shall go to the crown.

(4) They ordained them elders in every church. Now at this second visit they settled them in some order, under the guidance of a settled ministry. Every church had its governors or presidents. It is requisite that every particular church should have one or more such to preside in it. Those governors were then elders, to see to the observance and execution of the laws Christ has made. These elders were ordained. They, having devoted themselves, were solemnly set apart to the work of the ministry. These elders were ordained to them, to their service, for their good. Those that are in the faith have need to be build up in it, and have need of the elders' help therein.

(5) By prayer joined with fasting they commended them to the Lord on whom they believed. Even when persons are brought to believe, ministers' care concerning them is not over. There is still that lacking in their faith which needs to be perfected. The ministers that take most care of those that believe must after all commend them to the Lord. To his custody they must commit themselves, and their ministers must commit them. It is by prayer that they must be commended to the Lord. It is a great encouragement to us that we can say, "It is he in whom they believed; we commit to him those who have committed themselves to him." It is good to join fasting with prayer, in token of our humiliation for sin, and in order to add vigour to our prayers. When we are parting with our friends, the bare farewell is to commend them to the Lord, and to leave them with him.

3. They went on preaching the gospel in other places where they had been. From Antioch they passed through Pisidia, thence they came into the province of Pamphylia, the head-city of which was Perga, where they had been before (ch. xiii. 13), and came thither again to preach the word (v. 25). Thence they went down to Attalia, a city of Pamphylia. They stayed not long at a place, but wherever they came endeavoured to lay a foundation which might afterwards be built upon, and to sow the seeds which would in time produce a great increase.

III. How they at length came back to Antioch in Syria, whence they had been sent forth. From Attalia they came by sea to Antioch, v. 26.

1. Why they came thither: because thence they had been recommended to the grace of God. The brethren having recommended them to the grace of God, for the work which they fulfilled, they thought they owed them an account of it, that they might help them by their praises, as they had been helped by their prayers.

2. What account they gave them of their negotiation (v. 27): They gathered the church together. They gave them an account of two things: (1) Of the tokens they had had of the divine presence with them in their labours: They rehearsed all that God had done with them. They did not tell what they had done, but what God had done. For it is he that not only worketh in us both to will and to do, but then worketh with us to make what we do successful. God's grace can do anything without ministers' preaching; but ministers' preaching can do nothing without God's grace. (2) Of the fruit of their labours among the heathen. They told how God had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles. There is no entering into the kingdom of Christ but by the door of faith. It is God that opens the door of faith. We have reason to be thankful that God has opened the door of faith to the Gentiles. Thus the gospel was spread, and it shone more and more, and none was able to shut this door which God had opened.

3. How they disposed of themselves for the present: There they abode a long time with the disciples (v. 28), not because they feared their enemies, but because they loved their friends.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

23, 24. when they had ordained them elders—lit., 'chosen by show of hands.' But as that would imply that this was done by the apostles' own hands, many render the word, as in our version, "ordained." Still, as there is no evidence in the New Testament that the word had then lost its proper meaning, as this is beyond doubt its meaning in II Corinthians 8:19, and as there is indisputable evidence that the concurrence of the people was required in all elections to sacred office in the earliest ages of the Church, it is perhaps better to understand the words to mean, 'when they had made a choice of elders,' i.e., superintended such choice on the part of the disciples. and had prayed with fasting—lit., 'fastings,' thus setting them solemnly apart. This last clause confirms our interpretation of the former. For if "ordination" was by prayer and fasting (see ch. 13:3), why should it be said they first "ordained elders," and after that "prayed with fasting"? Whereas if the first clause refer to the choice and the second to the ordination, all is natural. they commended—'committed'—them—i.e., all these churches. to the Lord—Jesus.

25. when they had preached the word in Perga—now doing what, for some reason, they had not done on their former visit, but probably with no visible fruit. they went down into Attalia—a seaport on the Gulf of Pamphylia, drawing to itself the commerce of Egypt and Syria. 26. sailed to Antioch, from whence they had been recommended—See on ch. 13:3.

27. when they had gathered the church together, they rehearsed all that God had done with them . . .—As their call and mission had been solemn and formal, in the presence of and by the Church as well as the Holy Ghost, they dutifully, and no doubt with eager joy, convened the church and gave their report of "all that God had done with them," i.e., by and for them. and how—in particular—he had opened the door of faith to the Gentiles—to such even as before had not been proselytes. (See on ch. 11:21; and on the language, see I Cor. 16:9; II Cor. 2:12; Col. 4:3.) The ascribing directly to God of such access to the Gentiles is to be noted. 28. there they abode long time—'no little time.' From the commencement of the mission till they left Antioch to go up to attend the council at Jerusalem, some four or five years elapsed; and as the missionary journey would probably occupy less than two years, the rest of the time would be the period of their stay at Antioch.

ADAM CLARKE

ALBERT BARNES:

"And when they had ordained." The word "ordain" we now use in an ecclesiastical sense, to denote a setting apart to an office by the imposition of hands. But it is evident that the word here is not employed in that sense. That imposition of hands might have occurred in setting apart afterward to this office is certainly possible, but it is not implied in the word employed here, and did not take place in the transaction to which this word refers. The word occurs but in one other place in the New Testament (2 Cor. 8:19), where it is applied to Luke and translated, "who was also chosen of the church [that is, appointed or elected by suffrage by the churches] to travel with us." The verb properly denotes to stretch out the hand; and as it was customary to elect to office, or to vote, by stretching out or elevating the hand, so the word simply means to elect, appoint, or designate to any office. The word here refers simply to an election or appointment of the elders. It is said, indeed, that Paul and Barnabas did this. But probably all that is meant by it is that they presided in the assembly when the choice was made. It does not mean that they appointed them without consulting the church; but it evidently means that they appointed them in the usual way of appointing officers, by the suffrages of the people.—Popular Commentary

23. When they had ordained them elders. Elder seems to be here the name of an office. These were all young or new converts, and yet among them the apostles constitute elders. They appointed persons the most experienced, and the most advanced in the divine life, to watch over and instruct the rest. But what is the meaning of the word cheirotonesantes, which we translate ordained? The word ordain we use in an ecclesiastical sense and signify by it the appointment of a person to an office in the church by the imposition of the hands of those who are rulers in that church. But cheirotonia signifies the "holding up" or "stretching out the hand," as approving of the choice of any person to a particular work, whereas cheirothesia signifies the "imposition of hands." I believe the simple truth to be this, that in ancient times the people chose by the cheirotonia (lifting up of hands) their spiritual pastor; and the rulers of the church, whether apostles or others, appointed that person to his office by the cheirothesia, or "imposition of hands"; and perhaps each of these was thought to be equally necessary, the church agreeing in the election of the person, and the rulers of the church appointing, by imposition of hands, the person thus elected. And had prayed with fasting. This was to implore God's special assistance, as they well knew that without His influence even their appointment could avail nothing. Commended them to the Lord. To His especial care and protection.

25. They went down into Attalia. This was a seaport town in Pamphylia.

26. And thence sailed to Antioch. This was Antioch in Syria, to reach which, by sea, they were obliged to coast a part of the Mediterranean Sea, steering between Cyprus and Cilicia.

Whence they had been recommended . . . for the work which they fulfilled. The reader will recollect that it was from this Antioch they had been sent to preach the gospel to the heathen in Asia Minor (see chap. xiii. 1-2), and that they fulfilled that work.

27. Had gathered the church together. The church by which they had been sent on this very important, successful mission. They rehearsed all that God had done with them. Not what they had done themselves, but what God made them the instruments of working. And how he had opened the door of faith. How God by His providence and grace had made a way for preaching Christ crucified among the heathen; and how the heathen had received that gospel, which, through faith in Christ Jesus, was able to save their souls.

CHAPTER 15

Verses 1–5

Even when things go on very smoothly and pleasantly it is folly to be secure; some uneasiness or other will arise, which is not foreseen. If ever there was a heaven upon earth, surely it was in the church at Antioch at this time. But here we have their peace disturbed, and differences arising.

I. A new doctrine started among them, obliging the Gentile converts to submit to circumcision and the ceremonial law, v. 1.

1. The persons that urged this were certain men who came down from Judæa. They came to Antioch, because that was the headquarters of those that preached to the Gentiles, and the rendezvous of the Gentile converts; and, if they could but make an interest there, this leaven would soon be diffused to all the churches of the Gentiles. Yet one thing they lack, they must be circumcised. Those that are ever so well taught have need to stand upon their guard that they be not untaught again, or ill taught.

2. The position they laid down was this, that except the Gentiles who turned Christians were circumcised after the manner of Moses, they could not be saved. Many of the Jews who embraced the faith of Christ, yet continued very zealous for the law, ch. xxi. 20). They knew it was from God and its authority was sacred, and had been bred up in the observance of it. Herein they were connived at, because the prejudices of education are not to be overcome all at once. But it did not suffice them that they were herein indulged themselves, they must have the Gentile converts brought under the same obligations. There is a strange proneness in us to make our own opinion and practice a rule and a law to everybody else, and to conclude that because we do well all do wrong that do not just as we do. Those Jews who believed that Christ was the Messiah could not get clear of the notions they had of the Messiah, that he should set up a temporal kingdom in favour of the Jewish nation; it was a disappointment to them that there was as yet nothing done towards this. But now that they hear the doctrine of Christ is received among the Gentiles, and his kingdom begins to be set up in the midst of them, they hope their point will be gained, the Jewish nation will be made as considerable as they can wish, though in another way. It is no wonder if those who have wrong notions of the kingdom of Christ take wrong measures for the advancement of it. It is observable what a mighty stress they laid upon it; they do not only say, "You ought to be circumcised after the manner of Moses. Except you be circumcised you cannot be saved. If you be not herein of our mind and way, you will never go to heaven, and therefore of course you must go to hell." Though otherwise good men and believers in Christ, yet they cannot be saved; salvation itself cannot save them. None are in Christ, but those that are within their pale.

II. The opposition which Paul and Barnabas gave to this schismatical notion (v. 2): They had no small dissension and disputation with them. They would by no means yield to this doctrine. As faithful servants of Christ, they would not see his truths betrayed. They knew that Christ came to free us from the yoke of the ceremonial law, and therefore could not bear to hear of circumcising the Gentile converts, when their instructions were only to baptize them. As spiritual fathers to the Gentile converts, they would not see their liberties encroached upon. They had told the Gentiles that if they believed in Jesus Christ they should be saved. And therefore the apostles set themselves against it.

III. The expedient pitched upon for preventing the mischief of this dangerous notion. They determined that Paul and Barnabas, and some others of their number, should go to Jerusalem to the apostles and elders. They sent the case to Jerusalem: Because those who taught this doctrine came from Jerusalem and pretended to have directions from the apostles there. It was therefore very proper to send to Jerusalem about it, to know if they had any such direction from the church there. And it was soon found to be all wrong. It was true that these went out from them (v. 24), but they never had any such orders from them. Because those who were taught this doctrine would be the better confirmed in their opposition to it, if they were sure that the apostles and elders at Jerusalem were against it. Because the apostles at Jerusalem were fittest to be consulted in a point not yet fully settled; their decision would be likely to end the controversy.

IV. Their journey to Jerusalem upon this errand, v. 3: They were brought on their way by the church. Thus the church showed their favour to those who stood up for them. They did good as they went

CHAPTER 15

Vss. 1-35. COUNCIL AT JERUSALEM TO DECIDE ON THE NECESSITY OF CIRCUMCISION FOR THE GENTILE CONVERTS. 1, 2. certain men—See the description of them in Galatians 2:4.

A. T. ROBERTSON:

1. "And certain men came down from Judea" (kai tines katelthontes apo tes loudaias). Evidently the party of the circumcision in the church in Jerusalem (11:2) had heard of the spread of the gospel among the Gentiles in Cyprus, Pamphylia, and South Galatia (Phrygia, Pisidia, Lycaonia). Possibly John Mark after his desertion at Perga (13:13) told of this as one of his reasons for coming home. At any rate echoes of the jubilation in Antioch in Syria would be certain to reach Jerusalem. The Judaizers in Jerusalem, who insisted that all the Gentile Christians must become Jews also, had acquiesced in the case of Cornelius and his group (11:1-18) after plain proof by Peter that it was the Lord's doing. But they had not agreed to a formal campaign to turn the exception into the rule and to make Christianity mainly Gentile with a few Jews instead of mainly Jewish with a few Gentiles. Since Paul and Barnabas did not come up to Jerusalem, the leaders among the Judaizers decided to go down to Antioch and attack Paul and Barnabas there. They had volunteered to go without church action in Jerusalem, for their activity is disclaimed by the conference (Acts 15:24). In Gal. 2:4 Paul with some heat describes these Judaizers as "false brethren, secretly introduced who sneaked in to spy out our liberty." It is reasonably certain that this visit to Jerusalem described in Gal. 2:1-10 is the same one as the Jerusalem Conference in Acts 15:5-29 in spite of the effort of Ramsay to identify it with that in 11:29.

—Word Pictures in the New Testament

Paul and Barnabas—now the recognized heads of the Church at Antioch—had no small dissension and disputation with them, they determined—i.e., the church did—that Paul and Barnabas, and certain others of them—Titus was one (Gal. 2:1); probably as an uncircumcised Gentile convert endowed with the gifts of the Spirit. He is not mentioned in the Acts, but only in II Corinthians, Galatians, II Timothy, and the Epistle addressed to him [ALFORD]. they determined that Paul and Barnabas should go up to Jerusalem . . . about this question—That such a deputation should be formally despatched by the Church of Antioch was natural, as it might be called the mother church of Gentile Christianity.

3-6. being brought on their way by the church—a kind of official escort.

1. Except ye be circumcised. The persons who taught this doctrine appear to have been converts to Christianity; but supposing that the Christian religion was intended to perfect the Mosaic, and not to supersede it, they insisted on the necessity of circumcision, because by that a man was made debtor to the whole law, to observe all its rites and ceremonies. This question produced great disturbance in the apostolic Church; and, notwithstanding the decree mentioned in this chapter, the apostles were frequently obliged to interpose their authority in order to settle it; and we find a whole church, that at Galatia, drawn aside from the simplicity of the Christian faith by the subtilty of Judaizing teachers among themselves, who insisted on the necessity of the converted Gentiles being circumcised.

Ye cannot be saved. Ye can enjoy neither God's blessing in time nor His glory in eternity. Such an assertion as this, from any reputable authority, must necessarily shake the confidence of young converts.

2. No small dissension and disputation. Paul and Barnabas were fully satisfied that God did not design to bring the converted Gentiles under the yoke of circumcision. They knew that Jesus Christ was "the end of the law for righteousness [justification] to every one that believeth," and therefore they opposed the Judaizing teachers.

And certain other of them. If this be the journey to which Paul alludes, Gal. ii. 1-5, then he had Titus with him; and how many others went from the church of Antioch we cannot tell. This journey was fourteen years after Paul's conversion, and was undertaken by express revelation, as he informs us in Gal. ii. 2, which revelation appears to have been given to certain persons in the church of Antioch, as we learn from this verse, and not to Paul and Barnabas themselves.

3. Being brought on their way by the church. That is, the members of the church provided them with all necessaries for their journey.

along. They visited the churches by the way; they passed through Phenice and Samaria, and as they went declared the conversion of the Gentiles, which caused great joy to all the brethren. The progress of the gospel is and ought to be a matter of great joy. All the brethren in Christ's family rejoice when more are born into the family; for the family will be never the poorer for the multitude of its children. In Christ and heaven there is portion enough, and inheritance enough for them all.

V. Their hearty welcome at Jerusalem, v. 4. The good entertainment their friends gave them: They were received of the church, and of the apostles and elders. They received them with all possible expressions of love and friendship. The good entertainment they gave their friends: They declared all things that God had done with them, gave them an account of the success of their ministry among the Gentiles. As they went they had planted, as they came back they had watered; but in both they were ready to own it was God that gave the increase.

VI. The opposition they met with from the same party at Jerusalem, v. 5. There rose up certain of the sect of the Pharisees. They believed in Christ but thought it was needful to circumcise them. Those who have been most prejudiced against the gospel yet have been captivated by it. When Christ was here upon earth, few or none of the rulers and of the Pharisees believed on him; but now there are those of the sect of the Pharisees who believed, and many of them, we hope, in sincerity. It is very hard for men suddenly to get clear of their prejudices: those that had been Pharisees, even after they became Christians, retained some of the old leaven. All did not so, witness Paul, but some did.

We have here a council called on this occasion (v. 6): The apostles and presbyters came together, to consider of this matter. They did not give their judgment rashly, but considered of this matter. Though they were clear concerning it in their own minds, yet they would take time to consider of it, and to hear what might be said by the adverse party. Here is a direction to the pastors of the churches, when difficulties arise, to come together in solemn meetings. They may know one another's mind, and strengthen one another's hands.

I. Peter's speech. He was a faithful member of this assembly, and offered that which was very much to the purpose, and which would come better from him than from another, because he had himself been the first that preached the gospel to the Gentiles. There had been much disputing, pro and con, upon this question, and liberty of speech allowed, as ought to be in such cases. When both sides had been heard, Peter rose up.

1. He put them in mind of the commission he had some time ago to preach the gospel to the Gentiles. You know that from the beginning of the days of the gospel God made choice of one to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, and I was the person chosen, that the Gentiles by my mouth should hear the word, and believe, v. 7. Everybody rejoiced that God had granted to the Gentiles repentance unto life, and nobody said a word of circumcising them. See ch. xi. 18. Why should the Gentiles who hear the word of the gospel by Paul's mouth be compelled to submit to circumcision, any more than those that heard it by my mouth?

2. He puts them in mind how remarkably God owned him in preaching to the Gentiles (v. 8): God, who knows the hearts, bore them witness by giving them the Holy Ghost, even as he did unto us apostles." See ch. xi. 15–17. Those to whom God gives the Holy Ghost, he thereby bears witness to that they are his; sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise—marked for God. "God has put no difference between us and them (v. 9); they, though Gentiles, are as welcome to the grace of Christ and the throne of grace as we Jews are." We ought not to make any conditions of our brethren's acceptance with us but such as God has made the conditions of their acceptance with him. Now the Gentiles were fitted for communion with God, in having their hearts purified by faith, and therefore why should we think them unfit for communion with us, unless they will submit to the ceremonial purifying enjoined by the law to us? By faith the heart is purified. The faith of all the saints is alike precious, and has like precious effects and those that by it are united to Christ are so to look upon themselves as joined to one another as that all distinctions even that between Jew and Gentile, are swallowed up in it.

3. He sharply reproves those teachers who went about to bring the Gentiles under the obligation of the law of Moses, v. 10: "Now therefore, why tempt they passed through Phenice—See on ch. 11:19. and Samaria, declaring the conversion of the Gentiles, and they caused great joy to the brethren—As the converts in those parts were Jewish (ch. 11:19), their spirit contrasts favorably with that of others of their nation.

And when they were come to Jerusalem—This was Paul's THIRD VISIT TO JERUSALEM after his conversion, and on this occasion took place what is related in Galatians 2:1-10. (See there.) were received of the church, and the apostles and elders—evidently at a meeting formally convened for this purpose: the deputation being one so influential, and from a church of such note. they declared all things that God had done with them. See on ch. 14:14-27.

6. the apostles and elders came together to consider of this—but in presence, as would seem, of the people (vss. 12, 22, 23).

7. Peter . . .—This is the last mention of him in the Acts, and one worthy of his standing, as formally pronouncing, from the divine decision of the matter already in his own case, in favor of the views which all of Paul's labors were devoted to establishing.

a good while ago—probably about fifteen years before this. made choice . . . that the Gentiles by my mouth—See on ch. 11:21.

8. God, which knoweth the hearts—implying that the real question for admission to full standing in the visible Church is the state of the heart. Hence, though that cannot be known by men, no principle of admission to church privileges which reverses this can be sound.

9. put no difference between us and them: purifying their hearts by faith—"Purification" here refers to "sprinkling (of the conscience by the blood of Jesus) from dead works to serve the living God." (See on I Cor. 6:11.) How rich is this brief description of the inward revolution wrought upon the genuine disciples of the Lord Jesus!

ADAM CLARKE

Declaring the conversion of the Gentiles. Much stress is laid on this. It was a miracle of God's mercy that the Gentiles should be received into the Church of God; and they had now the fullest proof that the thing was likely to become general, by the conversion of Cornelius, the conversion of the people of Antioch, of Cyprus, Pisidia, Pamphylia, Lycaonia.

4. They were received of the church. The whole body of Christian believers. The apostles. We read of none but John, Peter, and James. See Gal. ii. 9. And elders. Those who were officers in the church, under the apostles. They declared. To this council they gave a succinct account of the great work which God had wrought by them among the Gentiles. This was Paul's third journey to Jerusalem after his conversion. See an account of his first journey, chap. ix. 26, and of his second in chap. xi. 30.

5. But there rose up certain of the sect of the Pharisees. This verse appears to be part of the declaration made by Paul and Barnabas to this council; for, having stated how God blessed their ministry among the Gentiles, they proceed to declare how all the good work was likely to be destroyed by certain Pharisees who, having received the Christian faith, came down to Antioch and began to teach the necessity of circumcision.

6. The apostles and elders came together. This was the first council ever held in the Christian Church, and we find that it was composed simply of the apostles and elders.

7. When there had been much disputing. By those of the sect of the believing Pharisees, for they strongly contended for the circumcision. Though the apostles and elders were under the inspiration of the Almighty, and could by this inspiration have immediately determined the question, yet it was highly necessary that the objecting party should be permitted to come forward and allege their reasons for the doctrines they preached; and that these reasons should be fairly met by argument, and the thing proved to be useless in itself, inexpedient in the present case, and unsupported by any express authority from God. Peter rose up, and said. This was after the matters in dispute had been fully debated; and now the apostles, like judges, after hearing counsel on both sides, proceed to give judgment on the case. A good while ago. "From the days of old," a phrase which simply signifies "some years ago."

8. And God, which knoweth the hearts. We had this epithet of the Divine Being once before; see chap. i. 24, and the note there: "It occurs nowhere else in the New Testament." Bare them witness. Considered them as proper or fit to receive the gospel of Christ. It is properly remarked by learned men that "to bear witness to any person" signifies to "approve," to "testify in behalf of." Here it signifies that, as God evidently sent the gospel to the Gentiles and by the preaching of it conveyed the Holy Spirit to them who believed, and as He who knows all hearts and their secrets can make no improper judgment of any, therefore what He had done was right.

9. Put no difference between us and them. Giving them the Holy Spirit, though uncircumcised, just as He had given Him to us who were circumcised; an evident proof that, in the judgment of God, circumcision was no preparation to receive the gospel of Christ. And as the purification of the heart by the Holy Spirit was the grand object of the religion of God, and that alone by which the soul could be prepared for a blessed immortality, and the Gentiles had received that without circumcision, consequently the shadow could not be considered of any worth, now the substance was communicated.

you God to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, a yoke which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear?" Here he shows that, (1) They offered a very great affront to God. "By calling that in question which he has already settled by no less an indication than that of the gift of the Holy Ghost; you do, in effect ask, 'Did he know what he did? Or was he in earnest in it?' " Those tempt God who prescribe to him, and say that people cannot be saved but upon such and such terms, which God never appointed. (2) They offered a very great wrong to the disciples: Christ came to proclaim liberty to the captives, and they go about to enslave those whom he has made free. This yoke Christ came to ease us of. Now for these teachers to go about to lay that yoke upon the neck of the Gentiles from which he came to free even the Jews was the greatest injury imaginable to them.

4. Whereas the Jewish teachers had urged that circumcision was necessary to salvation, Peter shows that both Jews and Gentiles were to be saved purely through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in no other way (v. 11): We believe to be saved through that grace only. "We that are circumcised believe to salvation, and so do those that are uncircumcised. We must depend upon the grace of Christ for salvation as well as they. There is not one way of salvation for the Jews and another for the Gentiles. Why should we burden them with the law of Moses, as necessary to their salvation, when it is not that, but the gospel of Christ, that is necessary both to our salvation and theirs?"

II. An account of what Barnabas and Paul said. What miracles and wonders God had wrought among the Gentiles by them, v. 12. This they had given in to the church at Antioch (ch. xiv. 27), and now again to the synod; and it was very proper to be given in here. Paul and Barnabas undertake to show, by a plain relation of matters of fact, that God owned the preaching of the pure gospel to them without the law. 1. What account they gave; they declared what signs and wonders, God had wrought among the Gentiles by them, what confirmation he had given by miracles wrought in the kingdom of nature, and what success by miracles wrought in the kingdom of grace. What need had they of any other advocate when God himself pleaded their cause? 2. What attention was given to them: All the multitude kept silence, and gave audience to Paul and Barnabas; it should seem they took more notice of their narrative than they did of all the arguments that were offered. As in natural philosophy and medicine nothing is so satisfactory as experiments, so in the things of God the best explication of the word of grace is the accounts given of the operations of the Spirit of grace. Those that fear God will most readily hear those that can tell them what God has done for their souls, or by their means.

III. The speech which James made to the synod. After they had held their peace, then James stood up. The hearing of variety of ministers may be of use when one truth does not drive out, but clench, another.

1. He addresses himself respectfully to those present: "Men and brethren, hearken unto me. We are all brethren, and equally concerned that nothing be done to the dishonour of Christ and the uneasiness of Christians."

2. He refers to what Peter had said concerning the conversion of the Gentiles (v. 14): "Simeon hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, in Cornelius and his friends, who were the first fruits of the Gentiles." James observes here: That the grace of God was the origin of it; it was God that visited the Gentiles. The acquaintance began on his part; he not only visited and redeemed his people, but visited and redeemed those that were not a people. That the glory of God was the end of it: it was to take out of them a people for his name, who should glorify him, and in whom he would be glorified. As of old he took the Jews, so now the Gentiles.

3. He confirms this with a quotation out of the Old Testament. It was foretold in the Old Testament, and therefore it must be fulfilled, v. 15. To this agree the words of the prophets; most of the Old Testament prophets spoke more or less of the calling in of the Gentiles. It was the general expectation of the pious Jews that the Messiah should be a light to enlighten the Gentiles (Luke ii. 32): but James waives the more illustrious prophecies of this, and pitches upon one that seemed more obscure: It is written, Amos ix. 11, 12, where is foretold, (1) The setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah (v. 16): I will raise up the tabernacle of David, that is fallen. This tabernacle was ruined and fallen down; there had not been for many ages a king of the house of David. But God will return, and will build it again, raise it out of its ruins, a phœnix out of its ashes;

why tempt–'try,' 'provoke'–ye God–by standing in the way of His declared purpose. to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples... He that was circumcised became thereby bound to keep the whole law. (See Gal. 5:1-6.) It was not then the mere yoke of burdensome ceremonies, but of an obligation which the more earnest and spiritual men became, the more impossible they felt it to fulfil. (See Rom. 3:5; Gal. 2:4, etc.).

11. through the grace of the Lord Jesus–i.e., by that only. we shall be saved, even as they–circumcision in our case being no advantage, and in their case uncircumcision no loss; but grace doing all for both, and the same for each.

12. Then all... gave audience to Barnabas and Paul–On this order of the names here, see on vs. 25. declaring what miracles and signs God wrought among the Gentiles by them–This detail of facts, immediately following up those which Peter had recalled to mind, would lead all who waited only for divine teaching to see that God had Himself pronounced the Gentile converts to be disciples in as full standing as the Jews, without circumcision; and the attesting miracles to which Paul here refers would tend, in such an assembly to silence opposition.

13. James answered, saying....–Whoever this James was (see on Gal. 1:19), he was the acknowledged head of the church at Jerusalem, and here, as president of the assembly, speaks last, winding up the debate. His decision, though given as his own judgment only, could not be of great weight with the opposing party, from his conservative reverence for all Jewish usages within the circle of Israelitish Christianity. 14-17. Simeon–a Hebrew variation of Simon, as in II Peter 1:1; (Gr.) the Jewish and family name of Peter. hath declared how God at the first–answering to Peter's own expression "a good while ago" (vs. 7). did visit the Gentiles to take out of them–in the exercise of His adorable sovereignty. a people for–the honor of–his name–or for His glory.

15. to this agree the words of the prophets–generally; but those of Amos (ch. 9:11) are specified (nearly as in the Septuagint version). The point of the passage lies in the predicted purpose of God, under the new economy, that "the heathen" or "Gentiles" should be "called by His name," or have "His name called upon them." By the "building again of the fallen tabernacle of David," or restoring its decayed splendor, is meant that only and glorious recovery which it was to experience under David's "son and Lord."

ADAM CLARKE

10. Now therefore why tempt ye God? As God, by giving the Holy Spirit to the Gentiles, evidently shows He does not design them to be circumcised in order to become debtors to the law, to fulfill all its precepts, why will you provoke Him to displeasure by doing what He evidently designs shall not be done? A yoke . . . which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear. This does not refer to the moral law—that was of eternal obligation—but to the ritual law, which, through the multitude of its sacrifices and ordinances, was exceedingly burdensome to the Jewish people.

11. Through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved. This seems to be an answer to an objection, "Has not God designed to save us, the Jews, by an observance of the law; and them, the Gentiles, by the faith of the gospel?" No, for we Jews can be saved no other way than through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and this is the way in which the Gentiles in question have been saved.

12. Gave audience to Barnabas and Paul. These apostles came forward next to corroborate what Peter had said, by showing the miracles and wonders which God had by them wrought among the Gentiles. Peter stated facts; Paul and Barnabas confirmed the statement.

13. James answered. He was evidently president of the council, and is generally called bishop of Jerusalem. The rest either argued on the subject or gave their opinion; James alone pronounced the definitive sentence. Had Peter been prince and head of the apostles, and of the Church, he would have appeared here in the character of judge, not of mere counsellor or disputant.

14. Simeon hath declared. It is remarkable that James does not give him even the title which he received from our Lord at the time in which he is supposed to have been made head of the Church, and vicar of Christ upon earth; so that it is evident James did not understand our Lord as giving Peter any such preeminence, and therefore he does not even call him "Peter," but simply Simeon. To take out of them a people for his name. To form among the Gentiles, as he had among the Jews, a people called by His name and devoted to His honor.

15. And to this agree the words of the prophets. Peter had asserted the fact of the conversion of the Gentiles, and James shows that that fact was the fulfillment of declarations made by the prophets.

16. After this I will return, and will build again. These two verses, sixteenth and seven-and this was now lately fulfilled, when our Lord Jesus was raised out of that family. The church of Christ may be called the tabernacle of David. This may sometimes be brought very low, and may seem to be in ruins, but it shall be built again, its withering interests shall revive. (2) The bringing in of the Gentiles as the effect and consequence of this (v. 17): That the residue of men might seek after the Lord; not the Jews only, but the residue of men, such as had hitherto been left out of the pale of the visible church; they must now be brought to seek after the Lord. That the residue of men might seek (James here adds, after the Lord), and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called. His name shall be declared among them, and they shall be brought both to know his name and to call upon it: they shall call themselves the people of God, and he shall call them so; and thus, by consent of both parties, his name is called upon them. This promise now begins to be fulfilled, for it is added, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things. He saith it who doeth it. Though with us saying and doing are two things they are not so with God. The uniting of Jews and Gentiles in one body, and all those things that were done in order to it, were, [1] What God did: whatever instruments were employed in it. [2] What God was well pleased with; for he is the God of the Gentiles, as well as the Jews.

4. He resolves it into the purpose and counsel of God (v. 18): Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world. He not only foretold the calling of the Gentiles by the prophets, but he foreordained it in his eternal counsels. Whatever God does, he did before design and determine to do. He not only does whatever he determined, which is more than we can do (our purposes are frequently broken off, and our measures broken), but he determined whatever he does. What we shall do in such or such a case we cannot tell till it comes to the setting to; but known unto God are all his works. We are poor short-sighted creatures; the wisest men can see but a little way before them, and not at all with any certainty; but this is our comfort, that there is an infallible certainty in the divine prescience: known unto God are all his works.

5. He gives his advice with reference to the Gentiles (v. 19): My sentence is: I give it as my opinion; not as having authority over the rest, but as being an adviser with them.

(1) That circumcision and the observance of the ceremonial law be by no means imposed upon the Gentile converts. I am clearly for using them with all possible tenderness, and putting no manner of discouragement upon them—not to give them any molestation nor disturbance. Great care must be taken not to discourage nor disquiet young converts with matters of doubtful disputation. Let the essentials of religion be first impressed deeply upon them, and these will satisfy them and make them easy.

(2) That yet it would be well that in some things, which gave most offence to the Jews, the Gentiles should comply with them. It will please the Jews (and, if a little thing will oblige them, better do so than cross them) if the Gentile converts abstain, [1] From pollutions of idols, and from fornication, which are two bad things, and always to be abstained from. Not but that the apostles were careful to warn against pollutions of idols, that they should have no manner of fellowship with idolaters in their idolatrous worships, and particularly not in the feasts they held upon their sacrifices. Fornication, and all manner of uncleanness. How large, how pressing, is Paul in his cautions against this sin! But the Jews suggested that these were things in which the Gentiles, even after conversion, allowed themselves, and the apostle of Gentiles connived at it. Now, to obviate this suggestion, James advises that they should be publicly warned to abstain from pollutions of idols and from fornication. [2] From things strangled, and from blood, which had been forbidden before the giving of the law of Moses.

6. He gives a reason for his advice—that great respect ought to be shown to the Jews, for they have been so long accustomed to the solemn injunctions of the ceremonial law that they must be borne with, if they cannot presently come off from them (v. 21): For Moses hath of old those that preach him in every city, being read in the synagogues every sabbath day. "Moses is continually preached to them, and they are called upon to remember the law of Moses." Even that word of God which is written to us should also be preached. "His writings are read in their synagogues, and on the sabbath day; so that from their childhood they have been trained up in a regard to the law of Moses. This has been done of old time; they have received from their fathers an honour for Moses. This has been done in every city, so that none of them can be ignorant what stress that law laid upon these things. They cannot be

ALBERT BARNES:

17. "That the residue of men." This verse is quoted literally from the Septuagint, and differs in some respects from the Hebrew. The phrase "the residue of men" here is evidently understood, both by the LXX and by James, as referring to others than Jews, to the Gentiles—the rest of the world—implying that many of them would be admitted to the friendship and favor of God. The Hebrew is, "that they may possess the remnant of Edom." This change is made in the Septuagint by a slight difference in the reading of two Hebrew words. The LXX, instead of the Hebrew "shall inherit," reads "shall seek of thee"; and instead of "Edom," they read "man," or "mankind," that is, men. Why this variation occurred cannot be explained; but the sense is not materially different. In the Hebrew the word Edom has undoubted reference to another nation than the Jewish; and the expression means that, in the great prosperity of the Jews after their return, they would extend the influence of their religion to other nations; that is, as James applies it, the Gentiles might be brought to the privileges of the children of God.—Popular Commentary

18, 19. Known unto God are all his works from the beginning—He who announced these things so long before, and He who had now brought them to pass, were one and the same; so that they were no novelty.

Wherefore, my sentence—or 'judgment'—is, that we trouble not—with Jewish obligations—them which from among the Gentiles are turned to God—rather, 'are turning.' The work is regarded as in progress, and indeed was rapidly advancing.

20. But . . . that they abstain from pollutions of idols—i.e., things polluted by having been offered in sacrifice to idols. The heathen were accustomed to give away or sell portions of such animals. From such food James would enjoin the Gentile converts to abstain, lest it should seem to the Jews that they were not entirely weaned from idolatry. and from fornication—The characteristic sin of heathendom, unblushingly practiced by all ranks and classes, and the indulgence of which on the part of the Gentile converts would to Jews, whose Scriptures branded it as an abomination of the heathen, proclaim them to be yet joined to their old idols. and from things strangled—which had the blood in them. and from blood—in every form, as peremptorily forbidden to the Jews, and the eating of which, therefore, on the part of the Gentile converts, would shock their prejudices. See on vss. 28, 29.

21. For Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him . . . every sabbath day—thus keeping alive in every Jew those feelings which such practices would shock, and which, therefore, the Gentile converts must carefully respect if the oneness of both classes in Christ was to be practically preserved. The wisdom of these suggestions commended itself to all present.

teenth, are quoted from Amos ix. 11-12, nearly as they now stand in the best editions of the Septuagint, and evidently taken from that version, which differs considerably from the Hebrew text. As James quoted them as a prophecy of the calling of the Gentiles into the Church of God, it is evident the Jews must have understood them in that sense; otherwise they would have immediately disputed his application of them to the subject in question and have rejected his conclusion by denying the premises.

17. That the residue of men might seek. Instead of this the Hebrew has, "That they may possess the remnant of Edom." Now it is evident that in the copy from which the Seventy translated they found yidreshu, "they might seek," instead of yireshu, "they may possess," where the whole difference between the two words is the change of the yod for a daleth, which might be easily done; and Edom, the "Idumeans," which differs from the other letters. It shows that even in Jerusalem and in the early part of the apostolic age the Septuagint version was quoted in preference to the Hebrew text. But God was evidently preparing the way of the gospel by bringing this venerable version into general credit and use, which was to be the means of conveying the truths of Christianity to the whole Gentile world. How precious should this august and most important version be to every Chritsain, and especially to every Christian minister! A version without which no man ever did or ever can critically understand the New Testament!

18. Known unto God are all his works from the beginning. As if he had said, This is not a new counsel of God; He had purposed, from the time He called the Israelites, to make the Gentiles partakers of the same grace and mercy. The whole of this verse is very dubious; the principal part of it is omitted by the most ancient MSS.

19. Wherefore my sentence is. "Wherefore I judge." There is an authority here that does not appear in the speech of Peter; this authority was felt and bowed to by all the council, and the decree proposed by James adopted.

20. But that we write unto them. Four things are prohibited in this decree: (1) Pollutions of idols; (2) fornication; (3) things strangled; (4) blood. By the first, pollutions of idols, or as it is in v. 29, "meats offered to idols," not only all idolatry was forbidden, but eating things offered in sacrifice to idols, knowing that they were thus offered, and joining with idolaters in their sacred feasts. By the second, fornication, all uncleanness of every kind was prohibited; for porneia not only means fornication, but "adultery," and especially the prostitution which was so common at the idol temples. By the third, things strangled, we are to understand the flesh of those animals which were strangled for the purpose of keeping the blood in the body, as such animals were esteemed a greater delicacy. By the fourth, blood, we are to understand, not only the thing itself, but also all cruelty, manslaughter, and murder, as some of the ancient fathers have understood it.

21. Moses of old time hath in every city. The sense of this verse seems to be this: As it was necessary to write to the Gentiles what was strictly necessary to be observed by them, relative to these points, it was not so to the converted Jews; for they had Moses—that is, the law—preached to them, "in the city"—that is, Antioch; and by the reading of the law in the synagogues every Sabbath day they were kept in remembrance of those institutions which the Gentiles, who had not the law, could not know.

MATTHEW HENRY

blamed if they are loth to part with them, and cannot of a sudden be persuaded to look upon these things as needless and indifferent. We must therefore give them time, they must be borne with awhile, and brought on gradually." Thus does this apostle show a spirit of moderation, contriving, as much as may be, to please both sides and provoke neither.

Verses 22–35

We have here the result of the consultation. The advice which James gave was universally approved. Letters were accordingly sent by messengers of their own to the Gentile converts, which would be a great confirmation to them against the false teachers.

I. The choice of the delegates that were to be sent with Paul and Barnabas on this errand.

1. They thought fit to send men of their own company to Antioch, with Paul and Barnabas, v. 22. This was agreed to by the apostles and elders, with the whole church. To show their respect to the church at Antioch, as a sister-church, as also that they were desirous further to know their state. To encourage Paul and Barnabas, and to make their journey home the more pleasant. To put a reputation upon the letters they carried, that more regard might be paid to the message, which was likely to meet with opposition from some. To keep up the communion of saints, and to show that, though they were many, yet they were one.

2. Those they sent were not inferior persons, who might serve to carry the letters, but they were chosen men, and chief men among the brethren. They are here named: Judas, who was called Barsabas, and Silas.

II. The drawing up of the letters to notify the sense of the synod in this matter.

1. A very obliging preamble to this decree, v. 23. That which intimates the humility of the apostles, that they join the elders and brethren in commission with them, whom they had advised with in this case. Herein they remembered the instructions their Master gave them (Matt. xxiii. 8). That which bespeaks their respect: they send greeting, and call them brethren of the Gentiles, thereby giving them the right hand of fellowship: "You are our brethren, though Gentiles." Now that the Gentiles are fellow-heirs and of the same body, they are to be encouraged, and called brethren.

2. A just and severe rebuke to the judaizing teachers (v. 24): "We have heard that certain who went out from us have troubled you with words. They went out from us indeed, but, as for their urging the law of Moses upon you, we gave them no such commandment." They did a great deal of wrong to the Gentile converts, in saying, You must be circumcised, and you must keep the law. It perplexed them: "They have troubled you with words. You depended upon those who told you, If you believe in the Lord Jesus Christ you shall be saved; and now you are startled by those that tell you you must keep the law of Moses or you cannot be saved. They trouble you with words —mere words—sound, but no substance." How has the church been troubled with words, by the pride of men that loved to hear themselves talk! It endangered them; they subverted their souls, put them into disorder, and pulled down that which had been built up.

3. An honourable testimony given of the messengers.

(1) Of Paul and Barnabas, whom these judaizing teachers had censured as having done their work by the halves, because they had brought the Gentile converts to Christianity only, and not to Judaism. "They are men that are dear to us; they are our beloved Barnabas and Paul." Sometimes it is good for those that are of eminence to express their esteem. They are men that have hazarded their lives for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ (v. 26). They have ventured their all for Christ, have engaged in the most dangerous services, as good soldiers of Christ. It is not likely that such faithful confessors should be unfaithful preachers.

(2) Of Judas and Silas: They are chosen men (v. 25), and they are men that have heard our debates, and will tell you the same things by mouth, v. 27. What is of use to us it is good to have both in writing and by word of mouth, that we may have the advantage both of reading and of hearing it.

4. Here is the direction given what to require from the Gentile converts.

(1) The matter of the injunction, which is according to the advice given by James. They should never eat anything that they knew had been offered in sacrifice to an idol, but look upon it as thereby polluted to them. This to us is an antiquated case. That they should not eat blood. That they should not eat anything that was strangled, or had not the blood

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

22, 23. Judas surnamed Barsabas—therefore not the apostle "Judas the brother of James" (ch. 1:13), surnamed "Thaddeus" (Matt. 10:3); nor can it be shown that he was a brother of "Joseph called Barsabas" (ch. 1:23). But nothing is known of him beyond what is here said. and Silas—the same as "Silvanus" in the Epistles. He became Paul's companion on his second missionary journey (vs. 40). chief men among the brethren—selected purposely as such, to express the honor in which they held the church at Antioch, and the deputies they had sent to the council, and, as the matter affected all Gentile converts, to give weight to the written decision of this important assembly. They were "prophets," vs. 32 (and see on ch. 11:27), and as such doubtless their eminence in the church at Jerusalem had been obtained. And they wrote . . . by them—This is the first mention in the New Testament history of writing as an element in its development. And the combination here of written and oral transmission of an important decision reminds us of the first occasion of writing mentioned in the Old Testament, where a similar combination occurs (Exod. 17:14). But whereas there it is the deep difference between Israel and the Gentiles which is proclaimed, here it is the obliteration of that difference through faith in the Lord Jesus [BAUMGARTEN]. greeting—The only other place in the New Testament where this word occurs (except in the letter of Lysias, ch. 23: 26) is James 1:1, which seems to show that both letters were drawn up by the same hand [BENGEL]. the Gentiles in Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia—showing that churches then existed in Cilicia as well as Syria, which owed their existence, in all likelihood, to Paul's labors during the interval between his return to Tarsus (ch. 9:30) and his departure in company with Barnabas for Antioch (see on ch. 11:25, 26). 24-27. Forasmuch as we have heard that certain which went out from us have troubled you with words—without authority or even knowledge of the church at Jerusalem, though they belonged to it, and probably pretended to represent its views. subverting your souls—Such strong language is evidently designed to express indignation at this attempt, by an unauthorized party, to bring the whole Christian Church under judicial and legal bondage. our beloved Barnabas and Paul—Barnabas is put first here, and in vs. 12, on account of his former superior position in the church at Jerusalem (see ch. 9:27; 11:22)—an evidence this that we have the document precisely as written, as also of the credibility of this precious history. Men that have hazarded—lit., 'rendered up,' as in will they did—their lives for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ—Noble testimony to those beloved men! It was doubtless prompted more immediately by the narrative they had just listened to from their own lips (vs. 12), and judiciously inserted in this letter, to give them the highest weight as the bearers of it, along with their own deputies. Judas and Silas . . . shall tell you the same . . . by mouth—Mark here how considerate and tender it was to send men who would be able to say of Barnabas and Paul what could not be expected to come from themselves.

ADAM CLARKE

22. Then pleased it the apostles and elders, with the whole church. James determined what ought to be done; and the whole assembly resolved how that should be done.

Chosen men of their own company. Paul and Barnabas were to return. They could have witnessed to the church at Antioch what was done at the council at Jerusalem; but as it was possible that their testimony might be suspected, from the part they had already taken in this question at Antioch, it was necessary that a deputation from the council should accompany them. Accordingly, Judas and Silas are sent to corroborate by their oral testimony what was contained in the letters sent from the council.

23. Send greeting unto the brethren . . . of the Gentiles. There was no occasion to send such a letter to the brethren which were of the Jews, because that law which had been so long read in their synagogues taught them all those things, and therefore the epistle is sent exclusively to the Gentiles. The word greeting is in the original chairein, "to be well, to be safe"—a very usual form in Greek epistles.

24. Certain which went out from us. So the persons who produced these doubtful disputations at Antioch had gone out from the apostles at Jerusalem and were of that church; persons zealous for the law and yet, strange to tell, so conscientiously attached to the gospel that they risked their personal safety by professing it. To whom we gave no such commandment. As, therefore, they went out from that church, they should have taught nothing which was not owned and taught by it; much less should they have taught in opposition to it.

27. Judas and Silas . . . shall . . . tell you the same things. These were proofs that the testimony of Paul and Barnabas was true, and that the letter was not forged, as they could witness the same things which the letter contained.

let out. That they should be very strict in censuring those that were guilty of fornication. "These things are in a particular manner offensive to the Jews, and therefore do not disoblige them herein."

(2) The manner in which it is worded. They express themselves with something of authority: It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, that is, to us under the guidance of the Holy Ghost. They would not order anything because it seemed good to them, but that they knew it first seemed good to the Holy Ghost. They express themselves with abundance of tenderness and fatherly concern. First, They are afraid of burdening them: We will lay upon you no greater burden. They dreaded nothing so much as imposing too far upon them, so as to discourage them at their setting out. Secondly, They impose upon them no other than necessary things. Church-rulers should impose only necessary things, things which Christ has made our duty. They have not authority to make new laws, but only to see that the laws of Christ be duly executed. Thirdly, They enforce their order with a commendation of those that shall comply with it, rather than with the condemnation of those that shall transgress it. "From which if you keep yourselves you will do well." It is all sweetness and love and good humour. The difference of the style of the true apostles from that of the false is very observable. Those that were for imposing the ceremonial laws were positive and imperious: Except you keep it, you cannot be saved (v. 1). The apostles of Christ, who only recommend necessary things, are mild and gentle: "From which if you keep yourselves, you will do well. Fare ye well; we are hearty well-wishers to your honour and peace."

III. The delivering of the letters. When they were dismissed they then came to Antioch; they stayed no longer at Jerusalem than till their business was done, and then came back. As soon as they came to Antioch, they gathered the multitude together, and delivered the epistle to them (v. 30, 31), that they might all know what it was that was forbidden them. But this was not all; it was that they might know that no more than this was forbidden them. The people were wonderfully pleased (v. 31): They rejoiced for the consolation. That they were confirmed in their freedom from the yoke of the ceremonial law. That those who troubled their minds with an attempt to force circumcision upon them were hereby silenced. That the Gentiles were hereby encouraged to receive the gospel, and those that had received it to adhere to it. That the peace of the church was hereby restored. They got the strange ministers that came from Jerusalem to give them each a sermon, v. 32. Judas and Silas, being prophets also themselves, exhorted the brethren with many words, and confirmed them. Even those that had the constant preaching of Paul and Barnabas, yet were glad of the help of Judas and Silas; the diversity of the gifts of ministers is of use to the church. Observe what is the work of ministers with those that are in Christ. (1) To confirm them; to confirm their choice of Christ and their resolutions for Christ. (2) To exhort them to perseverance: to quicken them to that which is good, and direct them in it. They comforted the brethren (so it may be rendered), and this would contribute to the confirming of them; for the joy of the Lord will be our strength. One word would affect one, and another another; what they had to say might have been summed up in a few words, yet it was for the edification of the church that they used many words. The dismission of the Jerusalem ministers, v. 33. When they had spent some time among them they were let go in peace from the brethren at Antioch, to the apostles at Jerusalem. The continuance of Silas, together with Paul and Barnabas, at Antioch. Silas chose rather to abide still at Antioch, v. 34. We know not the reason that moved him to it. Paul and Barnabas, though their work lay chiefly among the Gentiles, yet continued for some time in Antioch. They continued there, not to take their pleasure, but teaching and preaching the word of God. It is probable there was a great resort of Gentiles thither from all parts, so that in preaching there they did in effect preach to many nations. And thus they were not only not idle at Antioch, but were serving their main intention. There were many others also there. The multitude of workmen in Christ's vineyard does not give us a writ of ease. There may be opportunity for us; the zeal and usefulness of others should excite us, not lay us asleep.

Here we have a private quarrel between two ministers, no less men than Paul and Barnabas, yet ending well.

I. Here is a good proposal Paul made to Barnabas to go and review their work among the Gentiles and 28, 29. For it seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us . . .—The One, inwardly guiding to and setting His seal on the decision come to; the other, the external ecclesiastical authority devoutly embracing, expressing, and conveying to the churches that decision:—a great principle this for the Church in all time. to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things . . . from which if ye keep yourselves, ye shall do well—The whole language of these prohibitions, and of vss. 20, 21, implies that they were designed as concessions to Jewish feelings on the part of the Gentile converts, and not as things which were all of unchanging obligation. The only cause for hesitation arises from "fornication" being mixed up with the other three things; which has led many to regard the whole as permanently prohibited. But the remarks on vs. 20 may clear this. The then state of heathen society in respect of all the four things seems the reason for so mixing them up.

30-33. they rejoiced for the consolation—As the same word is in the next verse properly rendered "exhorted," the meaning probably is 'rejoiced for the exhortation' (margin), or advice; so wise in itself and so contrary to the imposition attempted to be practiced upon them by the Judaizers.

Judas and Silas, being prophets themselves—i.e., inspired teachers—exhorted the brethren with many words—'much discourse'—and confirmed them—opening up, no doubt, the great principle involved in the controversy now settled, of gratuitous salvation, or the purification of the heart by faith alone (as expressed by Peter, vss. 9, 11), and dwelling on the necessity of harmony in principle and affection between the Gentile disciples and their Jewish brethren. were let go in peace—with peace, as the customary parting salutation.

34, 35. it pleased Silas—Silas determined—to abide there still—(The authorities against the insertion of this verse are strong. It may have been afterwards added to explain vs. 40). Doubtless the attraction to Antioch for Silas was Paul's presence there, to whom he seems to have now formed that permanent attachment which the sequel of this book and Paul's Epistles show to have existed. Paul . . . and Barnabas continued in Antioch, teaching—to the disciples—and preaching—to those without—the word of the Lord, with many others—other laborers—also—How rich must Antioch at this time have been in the ministrations of the Gospel! (For a painful scene on this occasion between Paul and Peter, see Gal. 2:11, etc.).

28. For it seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us. The whole council had met under His direction, had consulted under His influence; and gave forth their decree from His especial inspiration.

29. Fare . . . well. An old English form of expressing "good wishes" and "goodwill"—"Go well, go prosperously!" The Greek word errhosthe, here used, from "to strengthen, make strong," has nearly the same signification: "be strong, courageous, active, be in health, and be prosperous!"

31. They rejoiced for the consolation. It was not a matter of small moment to have a question on which such stress was laid decided by an apostolic council, over which the Spirit of God presided.

33. They were let go. That is, both had liberty to depart; but Silas chose to stay a little longer with the brethren.

34. Notwithstanding it pleased Silas. This whole verse is wanting in some MSS. It does not appear to have been originally in the text.

renew it. Antioch was now a safe and quiet harbour for them; but Paul remembered that they only put in there to refit and refresh themselves, and therefore begins now to think of putting to sea again. Paul remembered that the work appointed him was afar off among the Gentiles, and therefore he is here meditating a second expedition among them; and this some days after, for his active spirit could not bear to be long out of work; no, nor his bold and daring spirit to be long out of danger. 1. To whom he makes this proposal—to Barnabas, his old friend and fellow-labourer. We have need one of another, and may be in many ways serviceable one to another; and therefore should be forward both to borrow and lend assistance. Every soldier has his comrade. 2. For whom the visit is designed: "Let us not begin new work, but let us take a view of the fields we have sown. Let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord." He calls all the Christians brethren. He has a concern for them in every city. Wherever we have preached the word of the Lord, let us go and water the seed sown. Those that have preached the gospel should visit those to whom they have preached it. As we must look after our praying, and hear what answer God gives to that; so we must look after our preaching, and see what success that has. 3. What was intended in this visit: "Let us see how they do." He would visit them that he might acquaint himself with their case, as the physician visits his recovering patient, that he may prescribe what is proper for the perfecting of his cure, and the preventing of a relapse. Let us see how they do. (1) What spirit they are of, how they stand affected, and how they behave themselves. (2) What state they are in, that we may rejoice with them if they rejoice, and may weep with them if they weep, and may know the better how to pray for them.

II. The disagreement between Paul and Barnabas about an assistant. Barnabas would have his nephew John, whose surname was Mark, to go along with them, v. 37. He determined to take him, because he was his relation. We should suspect ourselves of partiality, and guard against it in preferring our relations. Paul opposed it (v. 38): He thought not good to take him with them who had departed from them, from Pamphylia (ch. xiii. 13), and went not with them to the work. He run his colours just as they were going to engage. It is probable that he promised very fair now that he would not do so again. But Paul thought it was not fit he should be thus honoured; at least, not till he had been longer tried. If a man deceive me once, it is his fault; but, if twice, it is my own, for trusting him.

III. The issue of this disagreement: they separated upon it. The contention was so sharp that they departed asunder one from the other. Neither would yield, and therefore there is no remedy but they must part. Now here is that which is just matter of lamentation, and yet very instructive. For we see, 1. That the best of men are but men, subject to like passions as we are, as these two good men had expressly owned concerning themselves (ch. xiv. 15), and now it appeared too true. I doubt there was (as usually there is in such contentions) a fault on both sides. They were certainly both in fault to be hot as to let the contention be sharp, as also each to stick resolutely to his opinion, and neither to yield. It is a pity that some friend did not interpose to prevent its coming to an open rupture. We must own it was their infirmity, not that we must make use of it to excuse our own intemperate heats and passions. No; but it must check our censures of others, and moderate them. Repentance teaches us to be severe in reflections upon ourselves; but charity teaches us to be candid in our reflections upon others. It is only Christ's example that is a copy without a blot. 2. That we are not to think it strange if there be differences among wise and good men. Even those that are united to one and the same Jesus, and sanctified by one and the same Spirit, have different opinions, different views. We shall never be all of a mind till we come to heaven. 3. That these differences often prevail so far as to occasion separations. Paul and Barnabas, who were not separated by the persecutions of the unbelieving Jews, nor the impositions of the believing Jews, were yet separated by an unhappy disagreement between themselves.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

36-46. DISSENSION BETWEEN PAUL AND BARNABAS—THEY PART COMPANY TO PROSECUTE SEPARATE MISSIONARY TOURS. And some days after—How long is a matter of conjecture. Paul said to Barnabas, Let us go again and visit our—the true reading is, the—brethren in every city where we have preached . . . and see how they do—whether they were advancing or declining, etc.: a pattern for churches and successful missionaries in every age. ("Reader, how stands it with thee?") [BENGEL]. "Paul felt that he was not called to spend a peaceful, though laborious life at Antioch, but that his true work was far off among the Gentiles." We notice here, for the first time, a trace of that tender solicitude for his converts, that earnest longing to see their faces, which appears in the letters which he wrote afterwards, as one of the most remarkable and attractive features of his character. He thought, doubtless, of the Pisidians and Lycaonians, as he thought afterwards at Athens and Corinth of the Thessalonians, from whom he had been lately "taken in presence, not in heart, night and day praying exceedingly that he might see their face and perfect that which was lacking in their faith" [HOWS]. Barnabas determined to take with them John . . . Mark—his nephew (Col. 4:10). But Paul thought not good to take him with them who departed from them—i.e., who had departed; but the word is stronger than this—'who stood aloof' or 'turned away' from them—from Pamphylia, and went not with them to the work—the work yet before them. The allusion is to what is recorded in ch. 13:13 (on which see). And the contention was so sharp between them—such was the 'irritation,' or 'exacerbation'—that they departed asunder one from the other—Said they not truly to the Lystrians that they were "men of like passions with them"; (Ch. 14:15.) But who was to blame? (1) That John Mark had either tired of the work or shrunk from the dangers and fatigues that yet lay before them, was undeniable; and Paul concluded that what he had done he might, and probably would, do again. Was he wrong in this? (See Prov. 25:19.) But (2) To this Barnabas might reply that no rule was without exception; that one failure, in a young Christian, was not enough to condemn him for life; that if near relationship might be thought to warp his judgment, it also gave him opportunities of knowing the man better than others; and that as he was himself anxious to be allowed another trial (and the result makes this next to certain), in order that he might wipe out the effect of his former failure and show what "hardness he could now endure as a good soldier of Jesus Christ," his petition ought not to be rejected. Now, since John Mark did retrieve his character in these respects, and a reconciliation took place between Paul and him, so cordial that the apostle expresses more than once the confidence he had in him and the value he set upon his services (Col. 4:10, 11; II Tim. 4:11), it may seem that events showed Barnabas to be in the right, and Paul too harsh and hasty in his judgment. But, in behalf of Paul, it may well be answered, that not being able to see into the future he had only the unfavorable past to judge by; that the gentleness of Barnabas (ch. 4:36; 11:24) had already laid him open to imposition (see on Gal. 2:13), to which near relationship would in this case make him more liable; and that in refusing to take John Mark on this missionary journey he was not judging his Christian character nor pronouncing on his fitness for future service, but merely providing in the meantime against being again put to serious inconvenience and having their hands weakened by a possible second desertion. On the whole, then, it seems clear that each of these great servants of Christ had something to say for himself, in defense of the position which they respectively took up; that while Barnabas was quite able to appreciate the grounds on which Paul proceeded, Paul was not so competent to judge of the considerations which Barnabas probably urged; that while Paul had but one object in view, to see that the companion of their arduous work was one of thoroughly congenial spirit and sufficient nerve, Barnabas, over and above the same desire, might not unreasonably be afraid for the soul of his nephew, lest the refusal to allow him to accompany them on their journey might injure his Christian character and deprive the Church of a true servant of Jesus Christ; and that while both sought only the glory of their common Master, each looked at the question at issue, to some extent, through the medium of his own temperament, which grace sanctifies and refines, but does not destroy—Paul, through the medium of absolute devotion to the cause and kingdom of Christ, which, warm and womanly as his affections were, gave a tinge of lofty

ADAM CLARKE

36. Let us go . . . and visit our brethren in every city. This heavenly man projected a journey to Cyprus, Perga, Iconium, Lystra, Derbe, Antioch in Pisidia; for in all these places he had preached and founded churches in the preceding year. He saw it was necessary to water the seed he had planted; for these were young converts, surrounded with impiety, opposition, and superstition, and had few advantages among themselves.

39. The contention was so sharp between them. For all this sentence there is only in the Greek text: "There was therefore a paroxysm," an incitement, a stirring up. But does this imply anger or ill will on either side? Certainly not. Here, these two apostles differed, and were strenuous, each in support of the part he had adopted. "Paul," as an ancient Greek commentator has it, "being influenced only with the love of righteousness; Barnabas being actuated by love to his relative." John Mark had been tried in trying circumstances, and he failed; Paul therefore would not trust him again. The affection of Barnabas led him to hope the best, and was therefore desirous to give him another trial. Barnabas would not give up; Paul would not agree. They therefore agreed to depart from each other, and take different parts of the work. Each had an attendant and companion at hand. So Barnabas took John Mark and sailed to Cyprus; Paul took Silas, and went into Syria. To all human appearance it was best that they separated, as the churches were more speedily visited, and the work of God more widely and more rapidly spread. And why is it that this is brought in as a proof of the sinful imperfection of these holy apostles? because those who thus treat the subject can never differ with another without feeling wrong tempers; and then, as destitute of good breeding as they are of humility, they attribute to others the angry, proud, and wrathful dispositions which they feel in themselves; and because they cannot be angry and sin not, they suppose that even apostles themselves cannot. Should any man say there was sin in this contention between Paul and Barnabas, I answer, there is no evidence of this in the text. Should he say the word paroxysm denotes this, I answer, "It does not." And the verb is often used in a good sense. So Isocrates ad Demosth. cap. xx: "But thou wilt be the more stirred up to the love of good works." And such persons forget that this is the very form used by the apostle himself, Heb. x. 24: which these objectors would be highly displeased with me were I to translate, "Let us consider one another to an angry contention of love and good works." From these examples it appears that the word is used to signify "incitement" of any kind; it is taken to express a strong excitement to the love of God and man, and to the fruits by which such love can be best proved; and, in the case before us, there was certainly nothing contrary to this pure principle in either of those heavenly men.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

Scripture narratives are remarkable for the frankness with which they tell the faults of the best men. It has nothing in common with the cynical spirit in historians, of which this age has seen eminent examples, which fastens upon the weak places in the noblest natures, like a wasp on bruises in the ripest fruit, and delights in showing how all goodness is imperfect, that it may suggest that none is genuine. Nor has it anything in common with that dreary melancholy which also has its representatives among us, that sees everywhere only failures and fragments of men, and has no hope of ever attaining anything beyond the common average of excellence. But Scripture frankly confesses that all its noblest characters have fallen short of unstained purity, and with boldness of hope as great as its frankness teaches the weakest to aspire, and the most sinful to expect perfect likeness to a perfect Lord. It is a plane mirror, giving back all images without distortion.
—Expositions of Holy Scripture

IV. The good that was brought out of this evil. It was strange that even the sufferings of the apostles (as Phil. i. 12), but much more strange that even the quarrels of the apostles, should tend to the furtherance of the gospel of Christ. God would not permit such things to be, if he knew not how to make them to serve his own purposes. 1. More places are hereby visited. Barnabas went one way; he sailed to Cyrpus (v. 39), where they began their work (ch. xiii. 4), and which was his own country, ch. iv. 36. Paul went another way into Cilicia, which was his own country, ch. xxi. 39. Each seems to be influenced by his affection to his native soil, as usual. Yet God served his own purposes by it. 2. More hands are hereby employed in the ministry of the gospel among the Gentiles. John Mark, who had been an unfaithful hand, is not rejected, and, for aught we know, proves a very useful and successful hand. Silas who was a new hand is brought in.

V. We may further observe, 1. That the church at Antioch seem to countenance Paul in what he did. Barnabas sailed with his nephew to Cyprus, and no notice was taken of him. But, when Paul departed, he was recommended by the brethren to the grace of God. They prayed publicly for Paul, and for the success of his ministry. They transferred the matter to the grace of God, leaving it to that grace both to work upon him and to work with him. Those are happy at all times who are enabled so to carry themselves as not to forfeit their interest in the love and prayers of good people. 2. That yet Paul afterwards seems to have had, upon further trial, a better opinion of John Mark than now he had; for he writes to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 11), Take Mark and bring him with thee, for he is profitable to me for the ministry. Even those whom we justly condemn we should condemn moderately, because we know not but afterwards we may see cause to think better of them, and we should so regulate our resentments that if it should prove so we may not afterwards be ashamed of them. Even those whom we have justly condemned, if afterwards they prove more faithful, we should cheerfully receive, forgive and forget, and, as there is occasion, give a good word to. 3. That Paul went on cheerfully in his work (v. 41): He went through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches. Ministers are well employed when they are made use of in confirming those that believe, as well as in converting those that believe not.

sternness to his resolves where that seemed to be affected; Barnabas, through the medium of the same singleness of heart in Christ's service, though probably not in equal strength (Gal. 2:13), but also of a certain natural gentleness which, where a Christian relative was concerned, led him to attach more weight to what seemed for his spiritual good than Paul could be supposed to do. In these circumstances, it seems quite possible that they might have amicably 'agreed to differ,' each taking his own companion, as they actually did. But the 'paroxysm' (as the word is), the 'exacerbation' which is expressly given as the cause of their parting, shows but too plainly, that human infirmity amidst the great labors of the Church at Antioch at length sundered those who had sweetly and lovingly borne together the heat and burden of the day during a protracted tour in the service of Christ. "Therefore let no man glory in men" (I Cor. 3:21). As for John Mark, although through his uncle's warm advocacy of his cause he was put in a condition to dissipate the cloud that hung over him, how bitter to him must have ever afterwards been the reflection that it was his culpable conduct which gave occasion to whatever was sinful in the strife between Paul and Barnabas, and to a separation in action, though no doubt with a mutual Christian regard, between those who had till then wrought nobly together! How watchful does all this teach Christians, and especially Christian ministers and missionaries, to be against giving way to rash judgment and hot temper towards each other, especially where on both sides the glory of Christ is the ground of difference! How possible is it that in such cases both parties may, on the question at issue, be more or less in the right! How difficult is it even for the most faithful and devoted servants of Christ, differing as they do in their natural temperament even under the commanding influence of grace, to see even important questions precisely in the same light! And if, with every disposition to yield what is unimportant, they still feel it a duty each to stand to his own point, how careful should they be to do it lovingly, each pursuing his own course without disparagement of his Christian brother! And how affectingly does the Lord overrule such difference of judgment and such manifestations of human infirmity, by making them "turn out rather unto the furtherance of the Gospel"; as in this case is eminently seen in the two missionary parties instead of one, not travelling over the same ground and carrying their dispute over all the regions of their former loving labors, but dividing the field between them! and so Barnabas took Mark, and sailed unto Cyprus; and Paul chose Silas (see on vs. 34)—going two and two, as the Twelve and the Seventy (Mark 6:7; Luke 10:1). and departed, being recommended . . . to the grace of God—(no doubt by some solemn service; see ch. 13:3), as in ch. 14:26. It does not follow from the historian's silence that Barnabas was not so recommended, too; for this is the last mention of Barnabas in the history, whose sole object now is to relate the proceedings of Paul. Nor does it seem quite fair [with DE WETTE, MEYER, HOWS, ALFORD, HACKET, WEBSTER and WILKINSON, etc.] to conclude from this that the Church at Antioch took that marked way of showing their sympathy with Paul in opposition to Barnabas. 41. and he went through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches—"It is very likely that Paul and Barnabas made a deliberate and amicable arrangement to divide the region of their first mission between them; Paul taking the continental, and Barnabas the insular, part of the proposed visitation. If Barnabas visited Salamis and Paphos, and if Paul (travelling westward), after passing through Derbe, Lystra, and Iconium, went as far as Antioch in Pisidia, the whole circuit of the proposed visitation was actually accomplished, for it does not appear that any converts had been made at Perga and Attalia" [HOWS]. "This second missionary tour appears to have proceeded at first solely from the desire of visiting the churches already planted. In the end, however, it took a much wider sweep, for it brought the apostle to Europe" [OLSHAUSEN].

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

The Greek word translated "contention" is the word from which we derive our word paroxysm. I am greatly comforted whenever I read this. I am thankful for the revelation of the humanity of these men. If I had never read that Paul withstood Peter to the face, and that Paul and Barnabas had a contention, I should have been afraid. These men were not angels; they were men. It is very interesting to study the differing opinions as to who was to blame. There are most eloquent defenses of Paul and of Barnabas as to who was right and who was wrong. Amid differing opinions a man may have one of his own. My own sympathy is entirely with Barnabas, notwithstanding the fact that the church at Antioch sent Paul and Silas out by the grace of God; and the account does not say that they gave a benediction to Barnabas and Mark. Perhaps they were both right. Paul was severe because Mark had failed them once, and he felt that no man could go to this work who, having put his hand to the plough, had looked back. Mark had gone away from them when their faces were set toward the difficulties of Perga and Pamphylia. He had not gone with them to the work. Barnabas felt that Mark should have another chance. Perhaps there is a sense in which Paul and Barnabas were both right. Mark profited by the actions of both. Mark sailed away to Cyprus with Barnabas, and they pass out of the story in the Acts of the Apostles. We do know something more of Mark. When he had been with Barnabas some time, he was restored to Paul's fellowship; for when Paul wrote to the Colossian Church, he spoke of him as his "fellow worker," commended him to the Church; and in his last hours besought that Timothy would bring him with him. The last thing we know about Mark, the "servant of Jesus," whom Paul for a time would not trust, but to whom Barnabas gave a second chance, is that it was he who wrote the Gospel of the perfect Servant. Perhaps his moral courage was stiffened by Paul's severity and confirmed by the tenderness of Barnabas.
—The Acts of the Apostles

40. Being recommended . . . unto the grace of God. Much stress has been laid upon this to show that Barnabas was in the wrong and Paul in the right, because "the brethren recommended Paul and Silas to the grace of God, but they did not recommend Barnabas and John Mark; this proves that the church condemned the conduct of Barnabas, but approved that of Paul." Now there is no proof that the church did not recommend Barnabas to the grace of God, as well as Paul; but as Luke had for the present dropped the story of Barnabas, and was now going on with that of Paul and Silas, he begins it at this point, viz., his being recommended by the brethren to the grace of God; and then goes on to tell of his progress in Syria, Derbe, and Lystra. See the next chapter. With this verse the following chapter should begin; and this is the division followed by the most correct copies of the Greek text.

41. Confirming the churches. This was the object of his journey. They were young converts, and had need of establishment; and there is no doubt that by showing them the decision made at the late council of Jerusalem their faith was greatly strengthened, their hope confirmed, and their love increased.

MATTHEW HENRY

CHAPTER 16

Verses 1–5

Paul was a spiritual father, and as such a one we have him here adopting Timothy: and in all he appears to have been a wise and tender father.

I. His taking Timothy into his acquaintance and under his tuition. And we are here accordingly told, 1. That he was a disciple, one that belonged to Christ. He took him to be brought up for Christ.

2. That his mother was a Jewess originally, but believed in Christ; her name was Eunice, his grandmother's name was Lois. Paul speaks of them both with great respect and commends them especially for their unfeigned faith (2 Tim. i. 5).

3. That his father was a Greek, a Gentile. Now because his father was a Greek he was not circumcised: his father being no Jew he was not obliged to circumcision, nor entitled to it, unless when he grew up he did himself desire it. Though his mother could not prevail to have him circumcised in his infancy, yet she educated him in the fear of God, that though he wanted the sign of the covenant he might not want the thing signified. 4. That he had gained a very good character among the Christians: he was well reported of by the brethren that were at Lystra and Iconium. He had a name for good things with good people. 5. That Paul would have him to go forth with him. Paul had a great love for him.

6. That Paul took him and circumcised him. This was strange. Had not Paul opposed those with all his might that were for imposing circumcision upon the Gentile converts? He had, and yet circumcised Timothy, not to oblige him to keep the ceremonial law, but only to render his ministry acceptable among the Jews that abounded in those quarters. Therefore, that they might not shun him as one unclean, because uncircumcised, he took him and circumcised him. He was against those who made circumcision necessary to salvation. Though he went not in this instance according to the letter of the decree, he went according to the spirit of it, which was a spirit of tenderness towards the Jews. Paul made no difficulty of taking Timothy to be his companion, though he was uncircumcised; but the Jews would not hear him if he were, and therefore Paul will humour them herein.

II. His confirming the churches which he had planted (v. 4, 5): He went through the cities where he had preached the word of the Lord. They delivered to them copies of the decrees of the Jerusalem synod. All the churches were concerned in that decree, and therefore it was requisite they should all have it well attested. This was of very good service to them. 1. The churches were hereby established in the faith, v. 5. They were confirmed particularly in their opinion against the imposing of the ceremonial law upon the Gentiles. When they saw the testimony, not only of the apostles and elders, but of the Holy Ghost, in them, against it, they were established. Testimonies to truth, though they may not prevail to convince those that oppose it, may be of very good use to establish those that are in doubt concerning it. And, besides, that spirit of tenderness which appeared in these letters plainly showed that the apostles and elders were herein under the guidance of him who is love itself. 2. They increased in number daily. The imposing of the yoke of the ceremonial law upon their converts was enough to frighten people from them. But, if they find there is no danger of being so enslaved, they are ready to embrace Christianity. And thus the church increased in numbers daily. And it is a joy to those who heartily wish well to the souls of men, to see such an increase.

VISITATION OF THE CHURCHES FORMERLY ESTABLISHED, TIMOTHEUS HERE JOINING THE MISSIONARY PARTY.

1-5. Then came he to Derbe and Lystra; and, behold, a certain disciple was there—i.e., at Lystra (not Derbe, as some conclude from ch. 20:4). named Timotheus—See on ch. 14:20. As Paul styles him "his own son in the faith" (I Tim. 1:2), he must have been gained to Christ at the apostle's first visit; and as Paul says he "had fully known his persecutions which came on him at Lystra" (II Tim. 3:10, 11), he may have been in that group of disciples that surrounded the apparently lifeless body of the apostle outside the walls of Lystra, and that at a time of life when the mind receives its deepest impressions from the spectacle of innocent suffering and undaunted courage [Hows]. His would be one of "the souls of the disciples confirmed" at the apostle's second visit, "exhorted to continue in the faith, and" warned "that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God" (ch. 14: 21, 22). the son of a certain . . . Jewess—"The unfeigned faith which dwelt first in his grandmother Lois" descended to "his mother Eunice," and thence it passed to this youth (II Tim. 1:5), who "from a child knew the Holy Scriptures" (II Tim. 3:15). His gifts and destination to the ministry of Christ had already been attested (I Tim. 1:18; 4:14); and though some ten years after this Paul speaks of him as still young (I Tim. 4:12), "he was already well reported of by the brethren that were at Lystra and Iconium" (vs. 2), and consequently must have been well known through all that quarter. but his father was a Greek—Such mixed marriages, though little practiced, and disliked by the stricter Jews in Palestine, must have been very frequent among the Jews of the dispersion, especially in remote districts, where but few of the scattered people were settled [Hows]. Him would Paul have to go forth with him—This is in harmony with all we read in the Acts and Epistles of Paul's affectionate and confiding disposition. He had no relative ties which were of service to him in his work; his companions were few and changing; and though Silas would supply the place of Barnabas, it was no weakness to yearn for the society of one who might become, what Mark once appeared to be, a son in the Gospel [Hows]. And such he indeed proved to be, the most attached and serviceable of his associates (Phil. 2:19-23; I Cor. 4:17; 16:10, 11; I Thess. 3:1-6). His double connection, with the Jews by the mother's side and the Gentiles by the father's, would strike the apostle as a peculiar qualification for his own sphere of labor. "So far as appears, Timothy is the first Gentile who after his conversion comes before us as a regular missionary; for what is said of Titus (Gal. 2:3) refers to a later period" [WIES]. But before his departure, Paul took and circumcised him—a rite which every Israelite might perform. because of the Jews . . . for they knew all that his father was a Greek—This seems to imply that the father was no proselyte. Against the wishes of a Gentile father no Jewish mother was, as the Jews themselves say, permitted to circumcise her son. We thus see why all the religion of Timothy is traced to the female side of the family (II Tim. 1:5). "Had Timothy not been circumcised, a storm would have gathered round the apostle in his farther progress. His fixed line of procedure was to act on the cities through the synagogues; and to preach the Gospel to the Jew first and then to the Gentile. But such a course would have been impossible had not Timothy been circumcised. He must necessarily have been repelled by that people who endeavored once to murder Paul because they imagined he had taken a Greek into the temple (ch. 21:29). The very intercourse of social life would have been almost impossible, for it was still 'an abomination' for the circumcised to eat with the uncircumcised" [Hows]. In refusing to compel Titus afterwards to be circumcised (Gal. 2:3) at the bidding of Judaizing Christians, as necessary to salvation, he only vindicated "the truth of the Gospel" (Gal. 2:5); in circumcising Timothy, "to the Jews he became as a Jew that he might gain the Jews." Probably Timothy's ordination took place now (I Tim. 4:14; II Tim. 1:6); and it was a service, apparently, of much solemnity—"before many witnesses" (I Tim. 6:12). And as they went through the cities, they delivered . . . the decrees . . . . And so were the churches established in the faith, and increased in number daily—not the churches, but the number of their members, by this visit and the written evi-

ADAM CLARKE

1. A certain disciple. This Timothy was the same person to whom Paul wrote those two noble Epistles which are still extant.

His mother's name was Eunice, as we learn from 2 Tim. i. 5. What his father's name was we know not.

2. Which was well reported of. These words are spoken of Timothy, and not of his father. At this time Timothy must have been very young; for, several years after, when appointed to superintend the church at Crete, he appears to have been then so young that there was a danger of its operating to the prejudice of his ministry: 1 Tim. iv. 12, "Let no man despise thy youth." He had a very early religious eudcation from his godly mother, Eunice, and his not less pious grandmother, Lois; and from his religious instructions was well-prepared for the work to which God now called him.

3. Took and circumcised him. For this simple reason that the Jews would neither have heard him preach and would have any connection with him had he been otherwise. Besides, Paul himself could have had no access to the Jews in any place had they known that he associated with a person who was uncircumcised; they would have considered both to be unclean.

5. And so were the churches established. The disputations at Antioch, relative to circumcision, had no doubt spread far and wide among other churches and unhinged many. The decrees of the apostles came in good time and prevented further mischief. The people, saved from uncertainty, became established in the faith; and the Church had a daily accession of converted souls.

MATTHEW HENRY

I. Paul's travels up and down to do good. 1. He and Silas his colleague went throughout Phrygia and the region of Galatia. 2. They were forbidden at this time to preach the gospel in Asia (the country properly so called). At this time Christ would employ Paul in a piece of new work, which was to preach the gospel to a Roman colony at Philippi, for hitherto the Gentiles to whom he had preached were Greeks. The Romans were more particularly hated by the Jews than other Gentiles. It was the Holy Ghost that forbade them. The removals of ministers are in a particular manner under a divine guidance and direction. But these New Testament ministers are only forbidden to preach in one place, while they are directed to another where there is more need.

3. They would have gone into Bithynia, but were not permitted: the Spirit suffered them not, v. 7. They came to Mysia. Though their judgment and inclination were to go into Bithynia, yet they were overruled. We must now follow providence, and, if this suffer us not to do what we assay to do, we ought to acquiesce, and believe it for the best. The Spirit of Jesus suffered them not; so many ancient copies read it. The servants of the Lord Jesus ought to be always under the check and conduct of the Spirit of the Lord Jesus. 4. They passed by Mysia, or passed through it (so some), sowing good seed, we may suppose, as they went along; and they came down to Troas, the city of Troy. Here a church was planted; for here we find one in being, ch. xx. 6, 7. At Troas Luke fell in with Paul, and joined himself to his company; for henceforward, when he speaks of Paul's journeys, he puts himself into the number of his retinue, we went, v. 10.

II. Paul's particular call to Macedonia, that is, to Philippi, inhabited mostly by Romans, as appears, v. 21.

1. The vision Paul had, v. 9. An angel appeared to him, to intimate to him that it was the will of Christ he should go to Macedonia. Though he shall not go where he has a mind to go, he shall go where God has work for him to do. (1) The person Paul saw. There stood by him a man of Macedonia. Christ would have Paul directed to Macedonia, not as the apostles were at other times, by a messenger from heaven, to send him thither, but by a messenger thence to call him thither. Paul shall be called to Macedonia by a man of Macedonia, and by him speaking in the name of the rest. A man of Macedonia, not a magistrate of the country, much less a priest, but an ordinary inhabitant of that country, a plain man, that did not come to trifle with him, but in good earnest to importune his assistance. (2) The invitation given him. This honest Macedonian prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us; that is, "Come and preach the gospel to us. Thou hast helped many. O come and help us. It is thy business, and it is thy delight, to help poor souls; O come and help us. We have need of thy help, as much as any people, and therefore, O come, come with all speed among us. Do not only help us with thy prayers here; thou must come over and help us." People have great need of help for their dence laid before them of the triumph of Christian liberty at Jerusalem, and the wise measures there taken to preserve the unity of the Jewish and Gentile converts.

6-12. THEY BREAK NEW GROUND IN PHRYGIA AND GALATIA—THEIR COURSE IN THAT DIRECTION BEING MYSTERIOUSLY HEDGED UP, THEY TRAVEL WESTWARD TO TROAS, WHERE THEY ARE DIVINELY DIRECTED TO MACEDONIA—THE HISTORIAN HIMSELF HERE JOINING THE MISSIONARY PARTY, THEY EMBARK FOR NEAPOLIS, AND REACH PHILIPPI. 6-8. Now when they had gone throughout Phrygia and the region of Galatia—proceeding in a northwesterly direction. At this time must have been formed "the churches of Galatia" (Gal. 1:2; I Cor. 16:1); founded, as we learn from the Epistle to the Galatians (particularly ch. 4:19), by the apostle Paul, and which were already in existence when he was on his third missionary journey, as we learn from ch. 18:23, where it appears that he was no less successful in Phrygia. Why these proceedings, so interesting as we should suppose, are not here detailed, it is not easy to say; for the various reasons suggested are not very satisfactory: e.g., that the historian had not joined the party [ALFORD]; that he was in haste to bring the apostle to Europe [OLSHAUSEN]; that the main stream of the Church's development was from Jerusalem to Rome, and the apostle's labors in Phrygia and Galatia lay quite out of the line of that direction [BAUMGARTEN]. and were forbidden of the Holy Ghost—speaking by some prophet, see on ch. 11:27. to preach the word in Asia—not the great Asiatic continent, nor even the rich peninsula now called Asia Minor, but only so much of its western coast as constituted the Roman province of Asia. After they were come to Mysia—where, as being part of Roman Asia, they were forbidden to labor (vs. 8)—they assayed—or attempted—to go into—or, towards—Bithynia—to the northeast. but the Spirit—speaking as before—suffered them not—probably because, (1) Europe was ripe for the labors of this missionary party; and (2) other instruments were to be honored to establish the Gospel in the eastern regions of Asia Minor, especially the apostle Peter (see I Pet. 1:1). By the end of the first century, as testified by Pliny the governor, Bithynia was filled with Christians. "This is the first time that the Holy Ghost is expressly spoken of as determining the course they were to follow in their efforts to evangelize the nations, and it was evidently designed to show that whereas hitherto the diffusion of the Gospel had been carried on in unbroken course, connected by natural points of junction, it was now to take a leap to which it could not be impelled but by an immediate and independent operation of the Spirit; and though primarily, this intimation of the Spirit was only negative, and referred but to the immediate neighborhood, we may certainly conclude that Paul took it for a sign that a new epoch was now to commence in his apostolic labors" [BAUMGARTEN]. came down to Troas—a city on the northeast coast of the Ægean Sea, the boundary of Asia Minor on the west; the region of which was the scene of the great Trojan war. 9, 10. a vision appeared to Paul in the night—while awake, for it is not called a dream. There stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us—Stretching his eye across the Ægean Sea, from Troas on the northeast, to the Macedonian hills, visible on the northwest, the apostle could hardly fail to think this the destined scene of his future labors; and, if he retired to rest with this thought, he would be thoroughly prepared for the remarkable intimation of the divine will now to be given him. This visional Macedonian discovered himself by what he said. But it was a cry not of conscious desire for the Gospel, but of deep need of it and unconscious preparedness to receive it, not only in that region, but, we may well say, throughout all that western empire which Macedonia might be said to represent. It was a virtual confession "that the highest splendor of heathendom, which we must recognize in the arts of Greece and in the polity and imperial power of Rome, had arrived at the end of all its resources. God had left the Gentile peoples to walk in their own ways (ch. 14:2). They had sought to gain salvation for themselves; but those who had carried it farthest along the paths of natural development were now pervaded by the feeling that all had indeed been vanity. This feeling is the simple, pure result of all the history of heathendom. And Israel, going along the way which God had marked out for him, had likewise arrived at his end. At last he is in a condition to realize his original vocation, by becoming the guide

ADAM CLARKE

F. B. MEYER:

Guided to new fields. Paul had a wonderful influence over young men. Timothy, Titus, and Mark bore his impress. When circumcision was insisted upon, as in the previous chapter, no one opposed it more stoutly than Paul; when it conciliated Jewish prejudice, he was quite willing to concede it, since in itself it was a matter of perfect indifference. As the stoning of Stephen was the first step toward winning Paul, so his own stoning at Lystra on the former occasion probably gave him Timothy.

Our path through life will often be indicated by the fact that the doors which lead off the straight track are barren and bolted, so that we have no option save to go on. Paul was blocked first on the left, that he should not go into the province of Asia; then on the right, that he should not go into Bithynia. Finally he reached Troas, and stood face to face with the ocean that lay between him and Europe.

Here he had a vision which made a deep impression upon him. He saw a man of Macedonia standing in an attitude of entreaty and saying, "Come over into Macedonia, and help us." Note that phrase, "assuredly gathering" (v. 10). God often leaves us to infer our course. He does not ignore his own great gift of reason.—Bible Commentary

6. Were forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia. The Asia mentioned here could not be Asia Minor in general, but it was what was called Proconsular Asia. The apostles were not suffered to visit these places at this time; but they afterwards went thither, and preached the gospel with success, for it was in this Proconsular Asia that the seven churches were situated.

7. After they were come to Mysia. They passed through Phrygia into Mysia, which lay between Bithynia on the north, Phrygia on the east, Aeolia on the south, and the Mediterranean on the west. But the Spirit suffered them not. God saw that that was not the most proper time to preach the Word at Bithynia, as He willed them to go immediately to Macedonia, the people there being ripe for the Word of Life. Instead of the Spirit, "the Spirit of Jesus," is the reading of some MSS. The reading is undoubtedly genuine, and should be immediately restored to the text.

8. Came down to Troas. The part of Phrygia Minor in which the celebrated city of Troy was formerly situated.

9. A vision appeared to Paul in the night. Whether this was in a dream or whether a representation made to the senses of the apostle, we cannot tell.

MATTHEW HENRY

souls, and it is their duty to look out for it and invite those among them that can help them.

2. The interpretation made of the vision (v. 10): They gathered assuredly from this that the Lord had called them to preach the gospel there. We may sometimes infer a call of God from a call of man. If a man of Macedonia says, Come and help us, Paul thence gathers assuredly that God says, Go and help them.

III. Paul's voyage to Macedonia hereupon: He was not disobedient to the heavenly vision, but followed this divine direction with more satisfaction than he would have followed any contrivance or inclination of his own. Thitherward he turned his thoughts. Immediately we endeavoured to go into Macedonia. Paul communicated it to his companions, and they all resolved for Macedonia. As Paul will follow Christ, so all his will follow him, or rather follow Christ with him. God's calls must be complied with immediately. Do it today, lest thy heart be hardened. They could not immediately go into Macedonia; but they immediately endeavoured to go. If we cannot be so quick as we would be in our performances, yet we may be in our endeavours. Thitherward he steered his course. They set sail from Troas. They came with a straight course, a prosperous voyage, to Samothracia; the next day they came to Neapolis; and at last they landed at Philippi. It is said (v. 12) to be The chief city of that part of Macedonia; or, as some read it, the first city. They began with the first city, because, if the gospel were received there, it would the more easily spread thence all the country over. It was a colony. The Romans not only had a garrison, but the inhabitants of the city were Romans.

IV. The cold entertainment which Paul and his companions met with at Philippi. One would have expected that having such a particular call from God thither they would have had a joyful welcome there. Where was the man of Macedonia that begged Paul to come thither with all speed? Why did not he stir up his countrymen, to go and meet him? It is a good while before any notice at all is taken of him: We were in that city abiding certain days. They had made all the haste they could thither, but, now that they are there, they are almost tempted to think they might as well have stayed where they were. Those eminent and useful men are not fit to live in this world that know not how to be slighted and overlooked. Let not ministers think it strange if they be first strongly invited to a place, and then looked shyly upon when they come. When they have an opportunity of preaching it is in an obscure place, v. 13. There was no synagogue of the Jews there. They found out a little meeting of good women. The place of this meeting is out of the city. It was a place where prayer was wont to be made. Those that worshipped the true God, and would not worship idols, met there to pray together. Each of them prayed apart every day, but, besides this, they came together on the sabbath day. Though they were but a few and discountenanced by the town, yet a solemn assembly the worshippers of God must have on the sabbath day. When we cannot do as we would we must do as we can; if we have not synagogues, we must be thankful for more private places, and resort to them. This place is said to be by a river side, which perhaps was chosen, as befriending contemplation. Thither Paul and Silas and Luke went, and sat down. They spoke unto the women who resorted thither, and led them on further to the knowledge of Christ.

V. The conversion of Lydia. In this story of the Acts, we have not only the conversion of places recorded, but of many particular persons; for such is the worth of souls that the reducing of one to God is a great matter. Nor have we only the conversions that were effected by miracle, as Paul's, but some that were brought about by the ordinary methods of grace, as Lydia's here.

1. Who this convert was. Four things are recorded of her:

(1) Her name, Lydia. It is an honour to her to have her name recorded here in the book of God. We cannot have our names recorded in the Bible, but, if God open our hearts, we shall find them written in the book of life.

(2) Her calling. She was a seller of purple. She had a calling, an honest calling, which the historian takes notice of to her praise. It was a mean calling. She was a seller of purple, not a wearer of purple, few such are called. Though she had a calling to mind, yet she was a worshipper of God. The business of our particular callings may be made to consist very well with the business of religion, and therefore it will not excuse us to say, We have shops to look after, and a trade to mind; for have we not also a who is to lead the Gentiles unto God, the only Author and Creator of man's redemption; and Paul is in truth the very person in whom this vocation of Israel is now a present divine reality, and to whom, by this nocturnal apparition of the Macedonian, the preparedness of the heathen world to receive the ministry of Israel towards the Gentiles is confirmed" [BAUMGARTEN]. This voice cries from heathendom still to the Christian Church, and never does the Church undertake the work of missions, nor any missionary go forth from it, in the right spirit, save in obedience to this cry. and after he had seen the vision, immediately we endeavoured to go into Macedonia—The "we," here first introduced, is a modest intimation that the historian himself had now joined the missionary party. (The modern objections to this are quite frivolous.) Whether Paul's broken health had anything to do with this arrangement for having "the beloved physician" with him [WIES], can never be known with certainty; but that he would deem himself honored in taking care of so precious a life, there can be no doubt. 11, 12. Therefore loosing from Troas, we came—lit., 'ran'—with a straight course—i.e., 'ran before the wind.' to Samothracia—a lofty island on the Thracian coast, north from Troas, with an inclination westward. The wind must have set in strong from the south or south-southeast to bring them there so soon, as the current is strong in the opposite direction, and they afterwards took five days to what they now did in two (ch. 20:6) [HOWS]. next day to Neapolis—on the Macedonian, or rather Thracian, coast, about sixty-five miles from Samothracia, and ten from Philippi, of which it is the harbor. Philippi . . . the chief—rather, perhaps, 'the first'—city of that part of Macedonia—The meaning appears to be—the first city one comes to, proceeding from Neapolis. The sense given in our version hardly consists with fact. a colony—i.e., possessing all the privileges of Roman citizenship, and, as such, both exempted from scourging and (in ordinary cases) from arrest, and entitled to appeal from the local magistrate to the emperor. Though the Pisidian Antioch and Troas were also "colonies," the fact is mentioned in this history of Philippi only on account of the frequent references to Roman privileges and duties in the sequel of the chapter.

12-34. AT PHILIPPI, LYDIA IS GAINED AND WITH HER HOUSEHOLD BAPTIZED—AN EVIL SPIRIT IS EXPELLED, PAUL AND SILAS ARE SCOURGED, IMPRISONED, AND MANACLED, BUT MIRACULOUSLY SET FREE, AND THE JAILER WITH ALL HIS HOUSEHOLD CONVERTED AND BAPTIZED. 12, 13. we were in that city abiding certain days—waiting till the sabbath came round: their whole stay must have extended to some weeks. As their rule was to begin with the Jews and proselytes, they did nothing till the time when they knew that they would convene for worship. on the sabbath day—the first after their arrival, as the words imply. we went out of the city—rather, as the true reading is, 'outside of the (city) gate.' by a river-side—one of the small streams which gave name to the place ere the city was founded by Philip of Macedon. where prayer was wont to be made—or a prayer meeting held. It is plain there was no synagogue at Philippi (contrast ch. 17:1), the number of the Jews being small. The meeting appears to have consisted wholly of women, and these not all Jewish. The neighborhood of streams was preferred, on account of the ceremonial washings used on such occasions. we sat down and spake unto the women . . .—a humble congregation, and simple manner of preaching. But here and thus were gathered the first fruits of Europe unto Christ, and they were of the female sex, of whose accession and services honorable mention will again and again be made.

14, 15. Lydia—a common name among the Greeks and Romans. a seller of purple, of the city of Thyatira—on the confines of Lydia and Phrygia. The Lydians, particularly the inhabitants of Thyatira, were celebrated for their dyeing, in which they inherited the reputation of the Tyrians. Inscriptions to this effect, yet remaining, confirm the accuracy of our historian. This woman appears to have been in good circumstances, having an establishment at Philippi large enough to accommodate the missionary party (vs. 15), and receiving her goods from her native town.

ADAM CLARKE

10. We endeavoured to go into Macedonia. This is the first place that the historian Luke refers to himself: we endeavoured. And from this it has been supposed that he joined the company of Paul, for the first time, at Troas. Assuredly gathering. Drawing an inference from the vision that had appeared. That the Lord had called us for to preach. That is, they inferred that they were called to preach the gospel in Macedonia, from what the vision had said, "Come over . . . and help us"; the help meaning, "Preach to us the gospel." Instead of the Lord, meaning Jesus, several MSS. have "God."

11. Loosing from Troas. Setting sail from this place. With a straight course to Samothracia. This was an island of the Aegean Sea, contiguous to Thrace, and hence called Samothracia, or the Thracian Samos. It is about twenty miles in circumference. And the next day to Neapolis. There were many cities of this name, but this was a seaport town of Macedonia, a few miles eastward of Philippi. Neapolis signifies the "new city."

12. And from thence to Philippi. This was a town of Macedonia, on the confines of Thrace, situated on the side of a steep eminence. It took its name from Philip II, king of Macedon. The chief city of that part of Macedonia. This passage has greatly puzzled both critics and commentators. It is well-known that when Paulus Aemilius had conquered Macedonia he divided it into four parts and that he called the country that lay between the rivers Strymon and Nessus the first part and made Amphipolis its chief city or metropolis; Philippi, therefore, was not its chief city. But Bishop Pearce has, with great show of reason, argued that though Amphipolis was made the chief city of it by Paulus Aemilius, yet Philippi might have been the chief city in the days of Paul, which was 220 years after the division by P. Aemilius. Besides, as it was at this place that Augustus gained that victory which put him in possession of the whole Roman Empire, might not he have given to it that dignity which was before enjoyed by Amphipolis? And a colony. That is, a colony of Rome; for it appears that a colony was planted here by Julius Caesar, and afterwards enlarged by Augustus. The people, therefore, were considered as freemen of Rome and from this called themselves Romans, v. 21. The Jewish definition of kolonia is "a free city, which does not pay tribute."

13. By a river side, where prayer was wont to be made. "Where it was said there was a proseucha." The proseucha was a "place of prayer," or a place used for worship, where there was no synagogue. It was a large building uncovered, with seats, as in an amphitheatre. Buildings of this sort the Jews had by the seaside and by the sides of rivers. Spake unto the women. Probably this was before the time of their public worship, and while they were waiting for the assembling of the people in general; and Paul improved the opportunity to speak concerning Christ and salvation to the women that resorted thither.

14. Lydia, a seller of purple. She probably had her name from the province of Lydia, in which the city of Thyatira was situated. The Lydian women have been celebrated for their beautiful purple manufactures.

MATTHEW HENRY

God to serve and a soul to look after?

(3) The place she was of—of the city of Thyatira, which was a great way from Philippi. Providence brings Lydia to Philippi, to be under Paul's ministry, and there, where she met with it, she made a good use of it.

(4) Her religion before the Lord opened her heart. She worshipped God according to the knowledge she had; she was one of the devout women. Sometimes the grace of God wrought upon those who, before their conversion, were very wicked and vile, sometimes it fastened upon those who were of a good character. It is not enough to be worshippers of God, but we must be believers in Jesus Christ. To them Christ would be welcome; for those that know what it is to worship God see their need of Christ. She heard the apostles. Here, where prayer was made the word was preached. Can we expect God should hear our prayers if we will not hearken to his word? Those that worshipped God according to the light they had looked out for further light.

2. What the work was that was wrought upon her: Whose heart the Lord opened. The author of this work: it was the Lord. Conversion-work is God's work; it is he that works in us both to will and to do; not as if we had nothing to do, but of ourselves, without God's grace, we can do nothing. The salvation of those that are saved must be wholly ascribed to him. The seat of this work; it is in the heart that the change is made. Conversion-work is heart-work; it is a renewing of the heart. The nature of the work; she had not only her heart touched, but her heart opened. An unconverted soul is shut up, and fortified against Christ. Christ, in dealing with the soul, knocked at the door that is shut against him (Rev. iii. 20); and, when a sinner is effectually persuaded to embrace Christ, then the heart is opened for the King of glory to come in.

3. What were the effects of this work on the heart. She took great notice of the word of God. Her heart was so opened that she attended to the things that were spoken by Paul. She applied to herself (so some read it) the things that were spoken by Paul; and then only the word does us good, when we apply it to ourselves. She gave up her name to Jesus Christ. She was baptized, and with her her household also was baptized. She was very kind to the ministers, and very desirous to be further instructed by them: She besought us saying, "If you have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come into my house, and abide there." Thus she desired an opportunity to testify her gratitude to those who had been the instruments of divine grace in this blessed change that was wrought upon her. When her heart was open to Christ, her house was open to his ministers for his sake. Nay, they are not only welcome to her house, but she is extremely pressing and importunate with them: She constrained us; which intimates that Paul was unwilling to go. But Lydia will have no nay. She desired an opportunity of receiving further instruction. In her own house she might not only hear them, but ask them questions; and she might have them to pray with her daily, and to bless her household.

Paul and his companions now begin to be taken notice of.

I. A damsel that had a spirit of divination caused them to be taken notice of.

1. The account that is given of this damsel: She was possessed with a spirit of divination as that damsel was by whom the oracles of Apollo at Delphos were delivered. In those times of ignorance and idolatry, the devil, thus led men captive at his will; and he could not have gained such adoration from them as he had, if he had not pretended to give oracles to them. This damsel brought her masters much gain by soothsaying; many came to consult this witch and none came but with the rewards of divination in their hands.

2. The testimony which this damsel gave to Paul and his companions: She met them in the street, as they were going to prayer, v. 16. They went thither publicly, everybody knew whither they were going. How subtle Satan is in taking the opportunity to give us diversion when we are going about any religious exercises, and to put us out of temper when we need to be most composed. When she met with them she followed them, crying, "These men are the servants of the most high God; they show unto us the way of salvation."

(1) This witness is true. [1] "They are the servants of the most high God; they attend on him, are employed by him as servants; they come to us on his errands, the message they bring is from him. The gods we Gentiles worship are inferior beings, therefore not gods, but these men belong to the most high which worshipped God—i.e., was a proselyte to the Jewish faith, and as such present at this meeting.

whose heart the Lord opened—i.e., the Lord Jesus (see vs. 15; and cf. Luke 24:45; Matt. 11:27).

that she attended to the things . . . spoken by Paul—"showing that the inclination of the heart towards the truth originates not in the will of man. The first disposition to turn to the Gospel is a work of grace" [OLSHAUSEN]. Observe here the place assigned to 'giving attention' or 'heed' to the truth—that species of attention which consists in having the whole mind engrossed with it, and in apprehending and drinking it in, in its vital and saving character. And when . . . baptized . . . and her household—probably without much delay. The mention of baptism here for the first time in connection with the labors of Paul, while it was doubtless performed on all his former converts, indicates a special importance in this first European baptism. Here also is the first mention of a Christian household. Whether it included children, also in that case baptized, is not explicitly stated; but the presumption, as in other cases of household baptism, is that it did. Yet the question of infant baptism must be determined on other grounds; and such incidental allusions form only part of the historical materials for ascertaining the practice of the Church. she besought us, saying, If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord—the Lord Jesus; i.e., 'By the faith on Him which ye have recognized in me by baptism.' There is a beautiful modesty in the expression. And she constrained us—The word seems to imply that they were reluctant, but were overborne.

16-18. as we went to prayer—The words imply that it was on their way to the usual place of public prayer, by the river side, that this took place; therefore not on the same day with what had just occurred. a . . . damsel—a female servant, and in this case a slave (vs. 19). possessed of a spirit of divination—or, of Python, i.e., a spirit supposed to be inspired by the Pythian Apollo, or of the same nature. The reality of this demoniacal possession is as undeniable as that of any in the Gospel history. These men are servants of the most high God . . .—Glorious testimony! But see on Luke 4:41.

ADAM CLARKE

Which worshipped God. That is, she was a proselyte to the Jewish religion, as were probably all the women that resorted hither.

Whose heart the Lord opened. As she was a sincere worshipper of God, she was prepared to receive the heavenly truths spoken by Paul and his companions; and as she was faithful to the grace she had received, so God gave her more grace, and gave her now a divine conviction that what was spoken by Paul was true.

Therefore she attended unto the things—she believed them and received them as the doctrines of God; and in this faith she was joined by her whole family, and in it they were all baptized.

16. As we went to prayer. "Into the proseucha"; see on v. 13. The article is added here by some MSS. This makes the place more emphatic, and seems to determine the above meaning to be right—not the act of prayer or praying to God, but the place in which these proselytes assembled for the purpose of praying, reading the law and the prophets, and suchlike exercises of devotion. Possessed with a spirit of divination. "Having a spirit of Python." Pytho was, according to fable, a huge serpent that had an oracle at Mount Parnassus, famous for predicting future events. Apollo slew this serpent, and hence he was called Pythius, and became celebrated as the foreteller of future events; and all those who either could or pretended to predict future events were influenced by the spirit of Apollo Pythius. Brought her masters much gain by soothsaying. "By divination," or what we call telling fortunes. Our term soothsaying coming from the Anglo-Saxon "truth"; and "to say," i.e., "truth saying." For as it was supposed among the heathen that such persons spoke by the inspiration of their god, consequently what they said must be true.

17. These men are the servants. It is astonishing how such a testimony could be given in such a case; every syllable of it true, and at the same time full, clear, and distinct. But mark the deep design and artifice of this evil spirit. He well knew that the Jewish law abhorred all magic, incantations, magical rites, and dealings

God, who is over all men, over all gods. They are his servants, and therefore it is our duty to hearken to them and it is at our peril if we affront them." [2] "They show unto us the way of salvation." Even the heathen had some notion of the miserable deplorable state of mankind, and their need of salvation. "Now," saith she, "these are the men that show us what we have in vain sought for."

(2) How came this testimony from the mouth of one that had a spirit of divination? Is Satan divided against himself? We may take it either, [1] As extorted from this spirit of divination for the honour of the gospel by the power of God; as the devil was forced to say of Christ (Mark i. 24): I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God. The truth is sometimes magnified by the confession of its adversaries, in which they are witnesses against themselves. Or, [2] As designed by the evil spirit to the dishonour of the gospel. Those that were most likely to receive the apostles' doctrine were such as were prejudiced against these spirits of divination, and therefore would, by this testimony, be prejudiced against the gospel; and, as for those who regarded these diviners, the devil thought himself sure of them.

II. She continued many days clamouring thus (v. 18); and, it should seem, Paul took no notice of her; but finding perhaps that it did them a prejudice, rather than any service, he soon silenced her, by casting the devil out of her. 1. He was grieved It was a disturbance to him to hear a sacred truth so profaned. Perhaps they were spoken in an ironical bantering way, and then justly might Paul be grieved, as any good man's heart would be, to hear any good truth of God bawled out in the streets in a canting, jeering way. 2. He commanded the evil spirit to come out of her. He turned and said, I command thee in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of her; and by this he will show that these men are the servants of the living God. Her silence shall demonstrate it more than her speaking could do. Power went along with the word of Christ, before which Satan could not stand, but was forced to quit his hold. He came out the same hour.

III. The masters of the damsel that was dispossessed caused them to be taken notice of, by bringing them before the magistrates for doing it.

1. That which provoked them was, that her masters saw that the hope of their gain was gone, v. 19. See here what evil the love of money is the root of! The power of Christ and the great kindness done to her in delivering her out of Satan's hand, made no impression upon them when they apprehended that they should hereby lose money.

2. The course they took with him was to incense the higher powers against them: They caught them and dragged them into the market-place, where public justice was administered. They brought them to the rulers, their justices of peace. From them they hurried them to the magistrates, the governors of the city

3. The charge they exhibited against them was that they were the troublers of the land, v. 20. They take it for granted that these men are Jews. The general charge against them is that they troubled the city, sowed discord, and disturbed the public peace. If they troubled the city, it was but like the angel's troubling the water of Bethesda's pool, in order to healing. The proof of this charge is their teaching customs not proper to be admitted by a Roman colony, v. 21. The Romans were always very jealous of innovations in religion. Right or wrong, they would adhere to that which they had received by tradition from their fathers. No foreign nor upstart deity must be allowed.

IV. The magistrates caused them to be taken notice of.

1. By countenancing the persecution they raised the mob upon them (v. 22): The multitude rose up together against them. It has been the artifice of Satan to make God's ministers and people odious, by representing them as dangerous men, who aimed at the destruction of the constitution and the changing of the customs.

2. They further represented them as the vilest malefactors: They rent off their clothes in order to their being scourged. This was one of those three times that Paul was beaten with rods, according to the Roman usage, which was not under the compassionate limitation of the number of stripes not to exceed forty, which was provided by the Jewish law. It is here said that they laid many stripes upon them (v. 23), without counting how many. One would think, this might have satiated their cruelty; if they must be whipped, surely they must be discharged. No, they are imprisoned. The judges made their commitment very strict: They charged the jailer to keep them safely, as if they were dangerous men, that either would venture to break prison this did she many days—i.e., on many successive occasions when on their way to their usual place of meeting, or when engaged in religious services. Paul being grieved—for the poor victim; grieved to see such power possessed by the enemy of man's salvation, and grieved to observe the malignant design with which this high testimony was borne to Christ.

19. when her masters saw that the hope of their gains was gone, they caught Paul and Silas—as the leading persons—and drew them into the market-place—or Forum, where the courts were—to the magistrates, saying . . .—We have here a full and independent confirmation of the reality of this supernatural cure, since on any other supposition such conduct would be senseless. 20. These men, being Jews—objects of dislike, contempt, and suspicion by the Romans, and at this time of more than usual prejudice. do exceedingly trouble our city—See similar charges, ch. 17:6; 24:5; 1 Kings 18:17. There is some color of truth in all such accusations, in so far as the Gospel, and generally the fear of God, as a reigning principle of human action, is in a godless world a thoroughly revolutionary principle. How far external commotion and change will in any case attend the triumph of this principle depends on the breadth and obstinacy of the resistance it meets with. 21. And teach customs, which are not lawful for us to receive, neither to observe, being Romans—Here also there was a measure of truth; as the introduction of new gods was forbidden by the laws, and this might be thought to apply to any change of religion. But the whole charge was pure hypocrisy; for as these men would have let the missionaries preach what religion they pleased if they had not dried up the source of their gains, so they conceal the real cause of their rage under color of a zeal for religion, and law, and good order: so ch. 17:6,7; and 19:25, 27. 22. the multitude rose up together against them—so ch. 19:28, 34; 21:30; Luke 23:18. the magistrates rent off their—Paul's and Silas'—clothes—i.e., ordered the lictors, or rod-bearers, to tear them off, so as to expose their naked bodies (see on vs. 37). The word expresses the roughness with which this was done to prisoners preparatory to whipping. and commanded to beat them—without any trial (vs. 37), to appease the popular rage. Thrice, it seems, Paul endured this indignity (II Cor. 11:25). 23, 24. when they had laid many stripes upon them—the bleeding wounds from which they were not washed till it was done by the converted jailer (vs. 33).

with familiar spirits. He therefore bore what was in itself a true testimony to the apostles, that by it he might destroy their credit and ruin their usefulness.

ALBERT BARNES:

18. "But Paul, being grieved." Being molested, troubled, offended. Paul was grieved, probably, (1) because her presence was troublesome to him; (2) because it might be said that he was in alliance with her, and that his pretensions were just like hers; (3) because what she did was for the sake of gain, and was a base imposition; (4) because her state was one of bondage and delusion, and it was proper to free her from this demonaical possession; and (5) because the system under which she was acting was a part of a scheme of delusion and imposture, which had spread over a large portion of the pagan world, and which was then holding it in bondage. Throughout the Roman empire the inspiration of the priestesses of Apollo was believed in, and temples were everywhere reared to perpetuate and celebrate the delusion. Against this extensive system of imposture and fraud, Christianity must oppose itself; and this was a favorable instance to expose the delusion, and to show the power of the Christian religion over all the arts and powers of imposture. The mere fact that in a very few instances—of which this was one—they spoke the truth did not make it improper for Paul to interpose. That fact would only tend to perpetuate the delusion, and to make his interposition more proper and necessary. The expulsion of the evil spirit would also afford a signal proof of the fact that the apostles were really from God—a far better proof than her noisy and troublesome proclamation of it would furnish.—Popular Commentary

18. I command thee in the name of Jesus. Jesus is the "Saviour"; Satan is Apollyon, the "destroyer." The sovereign Saviour says to the destroyer, Come out of her. And he came out in the same hour.

19. When her masters saw. It appears she was maintained by some men who received a certain pay from every person whose fortune she told. The hope of their gains was gone. "This hope"; viz., the spirit. So completely was this spirit cast out that the girl could divine no more, and yet she continued a heathen still, for we do not hear a word of her conversion. Drew them into the marketplace. This was the place of public resort, and by bringing them here they might hope to excite a general clamor against them; and probably those who are here called the rulers were civil magistrates, who kept offices in such public places for the preservation of the peace of the city.

20. Brought them to the magistrates. The "commanders of the army," who, very likely, as this city was a Roman colony, possessed the sovereign authority. The civil magistrates, therefore, having heard the case, as we shall soon find, in which it was pretended that the safety of the state was involved, would naturally refer the business to the decision of those who had the supreme command. Exceedingly trouble our city. They are destroying the public peace, and endangering the public safety.

21. And teach customs. Religious opinions and religious rites. Which are not lawful for us to receive. The Romans were very jealous of their national worship. Cicero, De Legibus, lib. ii, c. 8, says: "No person shall have any separate gods, nor new ones; nor shall he privately worship any strange gods, unless they be publicly allowed." It was on such laws as these that the people of Philippi pleaded against the apostles. These men bring new gods, new worship, new rites; we are Romans, and the laws forbid us to worship any new or strange god, unless publicly allowed.

22. The multitude rose up together. There was a general outcry against them; and the magistrates tore off their clothes, and delivered them to the mob, commanding the lictors to beat them with rods. This was the Roman custom of treating criminals.

23. Laid many stripes upon them. The Jews never gave more than thirty-nine stripes to any criminal, but the Romans had no law relative to this. They gave as many as they chose; and the apostles had, undoubtedly, the fullest measure. And perhaps Paul refers to this where he says, 2 Cor. xi. 23, "In stripes beyond measure."

MATTHEW HENRY

themselves or were in confederacy with those that would attempt to rescue them. The jailer made their confinement very severe (v. 24): Having received such a charge he thrust them into the inner prison. When magistrates are cruel, it is no wonder that the officers under them are so too. He put them into the inner prison, the dungeon, into which none were usually put but condemned malefactors. As if this were not enough, he made their feet fast in the stocks. And they were not the first of God's messengers that had their feet in the stocks. Oh what hard usage have God's servants met with, as in the former days, so in the latter times!

Verses 25–34

We have here the designs of the persecutors of Paul and Silas baffled and broken.

I. The persecutors designed to dishearten and discourage the preachers of the gospel; but here we find them both hearty and heartened.

1. They were themselves hearty, wonderfully hearty. Let us consider what their case was. The many stripes they had laid upon them were very sore, and one might have expected to hear them complaining of them. Yet this was not all; they had reason to fear the axes next. In the meantime they were in the inner prison, their feet in the stocks, which hurt them; and yet, at midnight they prayed and sang praises to God. They prayed together, prayed to God to support them and comfort them in their afflictions—prayed that even their bonds and stripes might turn to the furtherance of the gospel,—prayed for their persecutors, that God would forgive them and turn their hearts. This was not at an hour of prayer, but at midnight; it was not in a house of prayer, but in a dungeon; yet it was seasonable to pray, and the prayer was acceptable. As in the dark, so out of the depths, we may cry unto God. No trouble, how grievous soever, should indispose us for prayer. They sang praises to God. We never want matter for praise, if we do not want a heart. And what should put the heart of a child of God out of tune for this duty if a dungeon and a pair of stocks will not do it? Nay, they not only praised God, but they sang praises to him. As our rule is that the afflicted should pray, and therefore, being in affliction, they prayed; so our rule is that the merry should sing psalms, and therefore, being merry in their affliction, they sang psalms. Notice is here taken of the circumstance that the prisoners heard them. If the prisoners did not hear them pray, yet they heard them sing praises. They sang so loud, that though they were in the dungeon, they were heard all the prison over. We should sing psalms with all our heart. Though they knew the prisoners would hear them, yet they sang aloud, as those that were not ashamed of their Master. Shall those that would sing psalms in their families plead, in excuse for their omission of the duty, that they are afraid their neighbours should hear them, when those that sing profane songs roar them out, and care not who hears them? The prisoners were made to hear the prison-songs of Paul and Silas, that they might be prepared for the miraculous favour shown to them all for the sake of Paul and Silas, when the prison-doors were thrown open.

2. God heartened them wonderfully by his signal appearances for them, v. 26. There was immediately a great earthquake; the very foundations of the prison were shaken. The Lord was in these earthquakes, to show his resentment of the indignities done to his servants. The prison doors were thrown open, and the prisoners' fetters were knocked off: Every man's bands were loosed. As afterwards God gave to Paul all those that were in the ship with him (ch. xxvii. 24), so now he gave him all those that were in the prison with him.

II. The persecutors designed to stop the progress of the gospel, but here we find converts made in the prison, the trophies of the gospel's victories erected there, and the jailer, their own servant, become a servant of Christ.

1. He is afraid he shall lose his life, and Paul makes him easy as to this care, v. 27, 28. (1) He awoke out of his sleep. It is probable that the shock of the earthquake woke him, and the prisoners' expressions of joy and amazement, when in the dark they found their bands loosed. This was enough to awaken the jailer, whose place required that he should not be hard to wake. (2) He saw the prison doors open, and supposed that the prisoners had fled; and then what would become of him? He knew the Roman law in that case. (3) In his fright he drew his sword, and was going to kill himself, to prevent a more terrible death, which he knew he was liable to for letting his prisoners escape. The philosophers generally allowed self-murder. This jailer thought there was no harm in anticipating his own death; but Christianity proves charged the jailer . . . who . . . thrust them into the inner prison—"pestilential cells, damp and cold, from which the light was excluded, and where the chains rusted on the prisoners. One such place may be seen to this day on the slope of the Capitol at Rome" [Hows]. made their feet fast in the stocks—an instrument of torture as well as confinement, made of wood bound with iron, with holes for the feet, which were stretched more or less apart according to the severity intended. (ORIGEN at a later period, besides having his neck thrust into an iron collar, lay extended for many days with his feet apart in the rack.) Though jailers were proverbially unfeeling, the manner in which the order was given in this case would seem to warrant all that was done.

25. And at midnight Paul and Silas prayed and sang praises—lit., 'praying, were singing praises'; i.e., while engaged in pouring out their hearts in prayer, had broken forth into singing, and were hymning loud their joy. As the word here employed is that used to denote the Paschal hymn sung by our Lord and His disciples after their last Passover (Matt. 26:30), and which we know to have consisted of Psalms 113-118, which was chanted at that festival, it is probable that it was portions of the Psalms, so rich in such matter, which our joyous sufferers chanted forth; nor could any be more seasonable and inspiring to them than those very six Psalms, which every devout Jew would no doubt know by heart. "He giveth songs in the night" (Job 35:10). Though their bodies were still bleeding and tortured in the stocks, their spirits, under 'the expulsive power of a new affection,' rose above suffering, and made the prison walls resound with their song. "In these midnight hymns, by the imprisoned witnesses for Jesus Christ, the whole might of Roman injustice and violence against the Church is not only set at naught, but converted into a foil to set forth more completely the majesty and spiritual power of the Church, which as yet the world knew nothing of. And if the sufferings of these two witnesses of Christ are the beginning and the type of numberless martyrdoms which were to flow upon the Church from the same source, in like manner the unparalleled triumph of the Spirit over suffering was the beginning and the pledge of a spiritual power which we afterwards see shining forth so triumphantly and irresistibly in the many martyrs of Christ who were given up as a prey to the same imperial might of Rome" [NEANDER in BAUMGARTEN]. and the prisoners heard them—lit 'were listening to them,' i.e., when the astounding events immediately to be related took place; not asleep, but wide awake and rapt (no doubt) in wonder at what they heard. 26-28. And suddenly there was a great earthquake—in answer, doubtless, to the prayers and expectations of the sufferers that, for the truth's sake and the honor of their Lord, some interposition would take place. every one's bands—i.e., the bands of all the prisoners—were loosed—not by the earthquake, of course, but by a miraculous energy accompanying it. By this and the joyous strains which they had heard from the sufferers, not to speak of the change wrought on the jailer, these prisoners could hardly fail to have their hearts in some measure opened to the truth; and this part of the narrative seems the result of information afterwards communicated by one or more of these men.

the keeper . . . awaking . . . drew . . . his sword, and would have killed himself . . .—knowing that his life was forfeited in that case (ch. 12:19; and cf. 27:42).

ADAM CLARKE

24. The inner prison. Probably what we would call the dungeon; the darkest and most secure cell. Made their feet fast in the stocks. The stocks is supposed to mean two large pieces of wood, pierced with holes like our stocks, and fitted to each other, that when the legs were in they could not be drawn out. The holes being pierced at different distances, the legs might be separated to a great extent, which must produce extreme pain.

25. At midnight Paul and Silas . . . sang praises. Though these holy men felt much and had reason to fear more, yet they were undismayed and even happy in their sufferings; they were so fully satisfied that they were right and had done their duty that there was no room for regret or self-reproach. At the same time, they had such consolations from God as could render any circumstances not only tolerable but delightful. They prayed, first, for grace to support them, and for pardon and salvation for their persecutors; and then, secondly, sang praises unto God, who had called them to such a state of salvation, and had accounted them worthy to suffer shame for the testimony of Jesus. And although they were in the inner prison, they sang so loudly and so heartily that the prisoners heard them.

26. There was a great earthquake. Thus God bore a miraculous testimony of approbation to His servants, and by the earthquake and loosing the bonds of the prisoners showed, in a symbolical way, the nature of that religion which they preached. While it shakes and terrifies the guilty, it proclaims deliverance to the captives and the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound, and sets at liberty them that are bruised. Every one's bands were loosed. And yet so eminently did God's providence conduct everything that not one of the prisoners made his escape, though the doors were open and his bolts off!

27. The keeper of the prison . . . would have killed himself. Every jailer was made responsible for his prisoner, under the same penalty to which the prisoner himself was exposed. The jailer, awaking and finding the prison doors open, taking it for granted that all the prisoners had made their escape and that he must lose his life on the account, chose rather to die by his own hand than by that of others. For it was customary among the heathens when they found death inevitable to take away their own lives.

itself to be of God by this, that it keeps us to the law of our creation, obliges us to be just to our own lives, and teaches us cheerfully to resign them to our graces, but courageously to hold them out against our corruptions. (4) Paul stopped him (v. 28): He cried with a loud voice, saying, Do thyself no harm. All the cautions of the word of God against sin have this tendency, "Do thyself no harm. Hurt not thyself, and then none else can hurt thee; do not sin, for nothing else can hurt thee." The jailer needs not fear being called to an account for the escape of his prisoners, for they are all here. It was strange that some of them did not slip away, when the prison doors were opened, and they were loosed from their bands. God showed his power in binding their spirits, as much as in loosing their feet.

2. He is afraid he shall lose his soul, and Paul makes him easy as to this care too. One concern leads him to another, and a much greater. He begins to think whither death would have brought him, and what would have become of him on the other side death.

(1) Whatever was the cause, he was put into a great consternation. The Spirit of God, that was sent to convince, in order to his being a Comforter, struck a terror upon him. He called for a light, and sprang in and came trembling to Paul and Silas. This jailer, when he was thus made to tremble, could not apply to a more proper person than to Paul, for it had once been his own case; he had been once a persecutor of good men, had cast them into prison; and therefore he was able to speak the more feelingly to the jailer.

(2) In this consternation, he applied to Paul and Silas for relief. How reverent and respectful his address to them is: He called for a light; he fell down before them. It is probable that he had heard what the damsel said of them, that they were the servants of the living God, who showed to them the way of salvation. He fell down before them, to beg their pardon, for the indignities he had done them, and to beg their advice, what he should do. He gave them a title of respect, Sirs, lords, masters; just now it was, Rogues and villains, and he was their master; but now, Sirs, lords, and they are his masters. Converting grace changes people's language. How serious his enquiry is: What must I do to be saved? First, His salvation is now his great concern, and lies nearest his heart, which before was the furthest thing from his thoughts. Secondly, He does not enquire concerning others, what they must do; but concerning himself, "What must I do?" It is his own precious soul that he is in care about. Thirdly, He is convinced that something must be done, and done by him too, in order to his salvation; that it is not a thing that will do itself. He asks not, "What may be done for me?" but, "What shall I do?" Fourthly, He is willing to do anything: "Tell me what I must do, and I am here ready to do it. Sirs, put me into the right way, though narrow, and thorny, and uphill, yet I will walk in it." Those who are thoroughly convinced of sin, and truly concerned about their salvation will be glad to have Christ upon his own terms, Christ upon any terms. Fifthly, He is desirous to know what he should do, and asks those that were likely to tell him. Those that set their faces Zionward must ask the way thither. We cannot know it of ourselves, but God has made it known to us by his word, has appointed his ministers to assist us, and has promised to give his Holy Spirit to those that ask him, to be their guide in the way of salvation. Sixthly, He brought them out. He brings them out of the dungeon, in hopes they will bring him out of a much worse.

(3) They directed him what he must do, v. 31. Though they are cold, and sore, and sleepy, they do not adjourn this cause to a more convenient time and place. They strike while the iron is hot, take him now when he is in a good mind, lest the conviction should wear off. Now that God begins to work, it is time for them to set in as workers together with God They are as glad to show him the way to heaven as the best friend they have. They gave him the same directions they did to others, Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. Here is the sum of the whole gospel, the covenant of grace in a few words: Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house. The happiness promised: "Thou shalt be saved; not only rescued from eternal ruin, but brought to eternal life and blessedness. Though a persecutor, yet thy heinous transgressions shall be all forgiven; and thy hard embittered heart shall be softened and sweetened by the grace of Christ." The condition required: Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. We must approve the method God has taken of reconciling the world to himself by a Mediator; and accept of Christ as he is offered to us. This is the only way and a sure way

But Paul cried with a loud voice—the better to arrest the deed—Do thyself no harm, for we are all here—What divine calmness and self-possession! No elation at their miraculous liberation, or haste to take advantage of it; but one thought filled the apostle's mind at that moment—anxiety to save a fellow creature from sending himself into eternity, ignorant of the only way of life; and his presence of mind appears in the assurance which he so promptly gives to the desperate man, that his prisoners had none of them fled as he feared. But how, it has been asked by skeptical critics, could Paul in his inner prison know what the jailer was about to do? In many conceivable ways, without supposing any supernatural communication. Thus, if the jailer slept at the door of "the inner prison," which suddenly flew open when the earthquake shook the foundations of the building; if, too, as may easily be conceived, he uttered some cry of despair on seeing the doors open; and, if the clash of the steel, as the affrighted man drew it hastily from the scabbard, was audible but a few yards off, in the dead midnight stillness, increased by the awe inspired in the prisoners by the miracle—what difficulty is there in supposing that Paul, perceiving in a moment how matters stood, after crying out, stepped hastily to him, uttering the noble entreaty here recorded? Not less flat is the question, why the other liberated prisoners did not make their escape:—as if there were the smallest difficulty in understanding how, under the resistless conviction that there must be something supernatural in their instantaneous liberation without human hand, such wonder and awe should possess them as to take away for the time not only all desire of escape, but even all thought on the subject. 29, 30. Then he called for a light, and sprang in . . . and fell down before Paul and Silas, and brought them out and said—How graphic this rapid succession of minute details, evidently from the parties themselves, the prisoners and the jailer, who would talk over every feature of the scene once and again, in which the hand of the Lord had been so marvellously seen. Sirs, what must I do to be saved?—If this question should seem in advance of any light which the jailer could be supposed to possess, let it be considered (1) that the "trembling" which came over him could not have arisen from any fear for the safety of his prisoners, for they were all there; and if it had, he would rather have proceeded to secure them again than leave them, to fall down before Paul and Silas. For the same reason it is plain that his trembling had nothing to do with any account he would have to render to the magistrates. Only one explanation of it can be given—that he had become all at once alarmed about his spiritual state, and that though, a moment before, he was ready to plunge into eternity with the guilt of self-murder on his head, without a thought of the sin he was committing and its awful consequences, his unfitness to appear before God, and his need of salvation, now flashed full upon his soul and drew from the depths of his spirit the cry here recorded. If still it be asked how it could take such definite shape, let it be considered (2) that the jailer could hardly be ignorant of the nature of the charges on which these men had been imprisoned, seeing they had been publicly whipped by order of the magistrates, which would fill the whole town with the facts of the case, including that strange cry of the demoniac from day to day—"These men are the servants of the most high God, which show unto us the way of salvation"—words proclaiming not only the divine commission of the preachers, but the news of salvation they were sent to tell, the miraculous expulsion of the demon and the rage of her masters. All this, indeed, would go for nothing with such a man, until roused by the mighty earthquake which made the building to rock; then despair seizing him at the sight of the open doors, the sword of self-destruction was suddenly arrested by words from one of those prisoners such as he would never imagine could be spoken in their circumstances—words evidencing something divine about them. Then would flash across him the light of a new discovery; "That was a true cry which the Pythoness uttered, "These men are the servants of the most high God, which show unto us the way of salvation! That I now must know, and from them, as divinely sent to me, must I learn that 'way of salvation!'" Substantially, this is the cry of every awakened sinner, though the degree of light and the depths of anxiety it expresses will be different in each case. 31-34. Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved—The brevity, simplicity, and directness of this reply are, in the circumstances, singularly beautiful. Enough at

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The jailer behaves as such a man in his position would do. He apparently slept in a place that commanded a view of the doors; and he lay dressed, with his sword beside him, in case of riot or attempted escape. His first impulse on awaking is to look at the gates. They are open; some of his charge have broken them. His immediate thought of suicide not only shows the savage severity of punishment which he knew would fall on him, but tells a dreary tale of the desperate sense of the worthlessness of life and blank ignorance of anything beyond which then infected the Roman world. Suicide, the refuge of cowards or of pessimists, sometimes becomes epidemic. Faith must have died and hope vanished before a man can say, "I will take the leap into the dark."

—Expositions of Holy Scripture

29. He called for a light. That he might see how things stood and whether the words of Paul were true; for on this his personal safety depended. Came trembling. Terrified by the earthquake and feeling the danger to which his own life was exposed.

G. CAMPBELL MORGAN:

"Lords, what must I do to be delivered?" There was no evangelical faith in this. He did not mean, "What must I do to be eternally saved?" He had not got nearly as far as that. It was fear, panic; and his own solution of his difficulty was suicide; but the voice of the apostle said: "Do thyself no harm, for we are all here"; the prisoners have not escaped as you imagine. Then, filled with fear, he went into the presence of the men, one of whom could so speak to him, and bowing down he said: "Lords, what must I do to be delivered?" He was simply a man stricken with panic, and wondering what was the next thing. The evangelical values were coming, but they did not come out of that poor panic-stricken heart. They came in answer to its cry, from the great apostle: "Believe on the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved." All the evangelical values are in that. The infinite music of the Gospel is thrilling through it like an anthem. This man did not understand it, not even then; but it was an answer to be explained. "You have called us lords; believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, the only Lord of human life. You have asked what you shall do to be saved, and your feeling is one born of fear, and desire to be saved from this hour of difficulty. Believe on this Lord, and you shall be saved from this hour, and from all hours of difficulty."

—The Acts of the Apostles

31. Believe on the Lord Jesus. Receive the religion of Christ, which we preach, and let your household also receive it, and all of you shall be placed in the sure way to final salvation.

MATTHEW HENRY

to salvation. No other way of salvation than by Christ, and no danger of coming short if we take this way. It is the gospel that is to be preached to every creature, He that believes shall be saved. The extension of this to his family: Thou shalt be saved, and thy house. Be they ever so many, let them believe in Jesus Christ and they shall be saved.

(4) They proceeded to instruct him and his family in the doctrine of Christ (v. 32): They spoke unto him the word of the Lord. He was, for aught that appears, an utter stranger to Christ, and therefore it is requisite he should be told who this Jesus is, that he may believe in him. Christ's ministers should have the word of the Lord so ready to them, and so richly dwelling in them, as to be able to give instructions offhand to any that desire to hear and receive them. They spoke the word to all that were in his house. Masters of families should take care that all under their charge partake of the means of knowledge and grace, and that the word of the Lord be spoken to them; for the souls of the poorest servants are as precious as those of their masters, and are bought with the same price.

(5) The jailer and his family were immediately baptized. He was baptized, he and all his, straightway. The Spirit of grace worked such a strong faith in them, all on a sudden, as superseded further debate; and Paul and Silas knew by the Spirit that it was a work of God that was wrought in them.

(6) The jailer was hereupon very respectful to Paul and Silas. He took them the same hour of the night, would not let them lie a minute longer in the inner prison. He washed their stripes, to cool them, and abate the smart of them. He brought them into his house, bade them welcome. Now nothing was thought good enough for them, as before nothing bad enough. He set meat before them, and they were welcome to it. They had broken the bread of life to him and his family; and he, having reaped so plentifully of their spiritual things, thought it was but reasonable that they should reap of his carnal things. What have we houses and tables for but as we have opportunity to serve God and his people with them?

(7) The voice of rejoicing with that of salvation was heard in the jailer's house; never was such a truly merry night kept there before: He rejoiced, believing in God, with all his house. His believing in Christ is called believing in God, which intimates that Christ is God, and that the gospel has a direct tendency to bring us to God. His faith produced joy. Those that by faith have given up themselves to God in Christ as theirs have a great deal of reason to rejoice. Believing in Christ is rejoicing in Christ. He signified his joy to all about him. One cheerful Christian should make many.

Verses 35–40

I. Orders sent for the discharge of Paul and Silas, v. 35, 36. The magistrates that had so basely abused them the day before gave the orders as soon as it was day, more in haste to give them a discharge than they were to petition for one. The magistrates sent sergeants—those that had the rods, those that had been employed in beating them. The order was, Let those men go. The jailer brought them the news (v. 36): The magistrates have sent to let you go: Now therefore depart. Not that he was desirous to part with them as his guests, but as his prisoners; they shall still be welcome to his house, but he is glad they are at liberty from his stocks.

II. Paul's insisting upon the breach of privilege which the magistrates had been guilty of, v. 37. Paul said to the sergeants, "They have beaten us openly, uncondemned, being Romans, and have cast us into prison against all law and justice, and now do they thrust us out privily? Nay verily; but let them come themselves and fetch us out, and own that they have done us wrong."

1. Paul did not plead this before he was beaten lest he should seem to be afraid of suffering for the truth which he had preached. He had nobler things than this to comfort himself with in his affliction.

2. He did plead it afterwards, to put an honour upon the cause he suffered for, to let the world know that the preachers of the gospel merited better treatment. He did it likewise to mollify the magistrates towards the Christians at Philippi, and beget in the people a better opinion of the Christian religion.

(1) Paul lets them know how many ways they had run themselves into a premunire. They had beaten those that were Romans. Roman historians give instances of cities that had their charters taken from them for indignities done to Roman citizens. To tell them they had beaten those who were the messengers of Christ would have had no influence upon them; but to tell them they have abused Roman citizens will put them into a fright: so common is it for people to that moment to have his faith directed simply to the Saviour, with the assurance that this would bring to his soul the needed and sought salvation—the how being a matter for after teaching. thou shalt be saved, and thy house—See on Luke 19:10. And they spake unto him the word of the Lord—unfolding now, doubtless, more fully what "the Lord Jesus Christ" was to whom they had pointed his faith, and what the "salvation" was which this would bring him. and to all that were in his house—who from their own dwelling (under the same roof no doubt with the prison) had crowded round the apostles, aroused first by the earthquake. (From their addressing the Gospel message "to all that were in the house" it is not necessary to infer that it contained no children, but merely that as it contained adults besides the jailer himself, so to all of these, as alone of course fit to be addressed, they preached the word.) And he took them—the word implies change of place—the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes—in the well or fountain which was within or near the precincts of the prison [Hows]. The mention of "the same hour of the night" seems to imply that they had to go forth into the open air, which, unseasonable as the hour was, they did. These bleeding wounds had never been thought of by the indifferent jailer. But now, when his whole heart was opened to his spiritual benefactors, he cannot rest until he has done all in his power for their bodily relief. and was baptized, he and all his, straightway—probably at the same fountain, since it took place "straightway"; the one washing on his part being immediately succeeded by the other on theirs. And when he had brought them into his house, he set meat before them and rejoiced, believing—i.e., as the expression implies, 'rejoiced because he had believed'—in God—as a converted heathen, for the faith of a Jew would not be so expressed [ALFORD]. with all his house—the wondrous change on himself and the whole house filling his soul with joy. "This is the second house which, in the Roman city of Philippi, has been consecrated by faith in Jesus, and of which the inmates, by hospitable entertainment of the Gospel witnesses, have been sanctified to a new beginning of domestic life, pleasing and acceptable to God. The first result came to pass in consequence simply of the preaching of the Gospel; the second was the fruit of a testimony sealed and ennobled by suffering" [BAUMGARTEN].

35, 36. when it was day, the magistrates sent the sergeants, saying, Let those men go—The cause of this change can only be conjectured. When the commotion ceased, reflection would soon convince them of the injustice they had done, even supposing the prisoners had been entitled to no special privileges; and if rumor reached them that the prisoners were somehow under supernatural protection, they might be the more awed into a desire to get rid of them. the keeper—overjoyed to have such orders to execute—told this . . . to Paul . . . now therefore . . . go in peace—Very differently did Paul receive such orders. 37. Paul said unto them—to the sergeants who had entered the prison along with the jailer, that they might be able to report that the men had departed. They have beaten us openly—The publicity of the injury done them, exposing their naked and bleading bodies to the rude populace, was evidently the most stinging feature of it to the apostle's delicate feeling, and to this accordingly he alludes to the Thessalonians, probably a year after: "Even after we had suffered before, and were shamefully entreated (or 'insulted') as ye know at Philippi" (I Thess. 2:2).

ADAM CLARKE

32. And they spake unto him the word of the Lord. Thus, by teaching him and all that were in his house the doctrine of the Lord, they plainly pointed out to them the way of salvation. And it appears that he and his whole family who were capable of receiving instructions embraced this doctrine and showed the sincerity of their faith by immediately receiving baptism.

33. Washed their stripes. "He washed from the stripes"; i.e., he washed the blood from the wounds.

34. He set meat before them. They were sufficiently exhausted, and needed refreshment; nor had the apostles any such inherent miraculous power as could prevent them from suffering through hunger, or enable them to heal their own wounds. As they were the instruments of bringing health to his soul, he became the instrument of health to their bodies.

35. The magistrates sent the serjeants. The original word means the lictors, persons who carried before the consul the fasces, which was a hatchet, round the handle of which was a bundle of rods tied. Why the magistrates should have sent an order to dismiss the apostles, whom they had so barbarously used the preceding evening, we cannot tell, unless we receive the reading of the Codex Bezae as genuine, viz., "And when it was day, the magistrates came together into the court, and remembering the earthquake that had happened, they were afraid, and they sent the serjeants." The Itala version of this same MS. has the same reading; so has also the margin of the later Syriac. If this MS. be correct, the cause of the dismissal of the apostles is at once evident. The earthquake had alarmed the magistrates; and taking it for granted that this was a token of the divine displeasure against them for their unprincipled conduct towards those good men, they wished to get as quietly rid of the business as they could, and therefore sent to dismiss the apostles. Whether this reading be genuine or not, it is likely that it gives the true cause of the magistrates' conduct.

37. They have beaten us openly . . . being Romans. Paul well knew the Roman laws, and on their violation by the magistrates he pleads. The Valerian law forbade any Roman citizen to be bound. The Porcian law forbade any to be beaten with rods. And the illegality of the proceedings of these magistrates was further evident in their condemning and punishing them unheard. This was a gross violation of a common maxim in the Roman law. Cicero: "Many who are accused of evil may be absolved, when the cause is heard; but unheard, no man can be condemned."

be more afraid of Cæsar's wrath than of Christ's. They had beaten them uncondemned; had not calmly examined what was said against them, much less enquired what they had to say for themselves. Christ's servants would not have been abused as they have been if they and their cause might but have had an impartial trial. It was an aggravation of this that they had done it openly. They had cast them into prison, without showing any cause of their commitment. They now thrust them out privily; they had not indeed the impudence to stand by what they had done, but yet had not the honesty to own themselves in a fault.

(2) He insists upon it that they should make them an acknowledgment of their error, and give them a public discharge, as they had done them a public disgrace: "Let them come themselves, and fetch us out, and give a testimony that we have done nothing worthy of stripes or of bonds." It was not a point of honour that Paul stood thus stiffly upon, but a point of justice, and not to himself so much as to his cause.

III. The reversing of the judgment given against Paul and Silas, v. 38, 39. The magistrates were frightened when they were told that Paul was a Roman. The proceedings of persecutors have often been illegal, even by the law of nations, and often inhuman, against the law of nature, but always sinful, and against God's law. They came and besought them not to take advantage of the law against them; they brought them out of the prison, owning that they were wrongfully put into it, and desired them that they would peaceably and quietly depart out of the city. Yet, if the repentance of these magistrates had been sincere, they would not have desired them to depart out of their city, but would have begged of them to continue in their city, to show them the way of salvation. But many are convinced that Christianity is not to be persecuted who yet are not convinced that it ought to be embraced. They are compelled to do honour to Christ and his servants, and yet do not go so far as to have benefit by Christ.

IV. The departure of Paul and Silas from Philippi, v. 40. They went out of the prison when they were legally discharged. They took leave of their friends: they went to the house of Lydia, saw the brethren, and they comforted them. Young converts should have a great deal said to them to comfort them, for the joy of the Lord will be very much their strength. They departed. Paul and Silas had an extraordinary call to Philippi; and yet, when they have come thither, they see little of the fruit of their labours, and are soon driven thence. Yet they did not come in vain. They laid the foundation of a church at Philippi, which became very eminent, and had people that were more generous to Paul than any other church, as appears by his epistle to the Philippians, ch. i. 1; iv. 15. Let not ministers be discouraged, though they see not the fruit of their labours presently; the seed sown seems to be lost under the clods, but it shall come up again in a plentiful harvest.

uncondemned—unconvicted on trial—being Romans—see on ch. 22:28—and cast us into prison—both illegal. Of Silas' citizenship, if meant to be included, we know nothing. and now do they thrust—hurry—us out—see Mark 9:38, Greek—privily?—Mark the intended contrast between the public insult they had inflicted and the private way in which they ordered them to be off. nay verily—no, indeed—but let them come themselves and fetch us out—by open and formal act, equivalent to a public declaration of their innocence. 38. they feared when they heard they were Romans—their authority being thus imperilled; for they were liable to an action for what they had done. 39, 40. And they came—in person—and besought them—not to complain of them. What a contrast this suppliant attitude of the prætors of Philippi to the tyrannical air with which they had the day before treated the preachers! (See Isa. 60:14; Rev. 3:9.) brought them out—conducted them forth from the prison into the street, as insisted on—and desired—'requested'—them to depart out of the city—perhaps fearing again to excite the populace. And they went out of the prison—Having attained their object—to vindicate their civil rights, by the infraction of which in this case the Gospel in their persons had been illegally affronted—they had no mind to carry the matter farther. Their citizenship was valuable to them only as a shield against unnecessary injuries to their Master's cause. What a beautiful mixture of dignity and meekness is this! Nothing secular, which may be turned to the account of the Gospel, is morbidly disregarded; in any other view, nothing of this nature is set store by:—an example this for all ages. and entered into the house of Lydia—as if to show by this leisurely proceeding that they had not been made to leave, but were at full liberty to consult their own convenience. and when they had seen the brethren—not only her family and the jailer's, but probably others now gained to the Gospel. they comforted them—rather, perhaps, 'exhorted' them, which would include comfort. "This assembly of believers in the house of Lydia was the first church that had been founded in Europe" [BAUMGARTEN]. and departed—but not all; for two of the company remained behind (see on ch. 17:14): Timotheus, of whom the Philippians "learned the proof" that he honestly cared for their state, and was truly like-minded with Paul, "serving with him in the Gospel as a son with his father" (Phil. 2:19-23); and Luke, "whose praise is in the Gospel," though he never praises himself or relates his own labors, and though we only trace his movements in connection with Paul, by the change of a pronoun, or the unconscious variation of his style. In ch. 17 the narrative is again in the third person, and the pronoun is not changed to the second till we come to ch. 20:5. The modesty with which Luke leaves out all mention of his own labors need hardly be pointed out. We shall trace him again when he rejoins Paul in the same neighborhood. His vocation as a physician may have brought him into connection with these contiguous coasts of Asia and Europe, and he may (as Mr. SMITH suggests, "Shipwreck," etc.) have been in the habit of exercising his professional skill as a surgeon at sea [Hows].

ADAM CLARKE

Let them come themselves and fetch us out. The apostles were determined that the magistrates should be humbled for their illegal proceedings, and that the people at large might see that they had been unjustly condemned and that the majesty of the Roman people was insulted by the treatment they had received.

38. They feared, when they heard that they were Romans. They feared because the Roman law was so constituted that an insult offered to a citizen was deemed an insult to the whole Roman people. There is a remarkable addition here, in both the Greek and the Latin of the Codex Bezae. It is as follows: "And when they were come with many of their friends to the prison, they besought them to go out, saying: We were ignorant of your circumstances, that ye were righteous men. And, leading them out, they besought them, saying, Depart from this city, lest they again make an insurrection against you, and clamour against you."

40. Entered into the house of Lydia. This was the place of their residence while at Philippi; see v. 15. They comforted them, and departed. The magistrates were sufficiently humbled and the public at large, hearing of this circumstance, must be satisfied of the innocency of the apostles.

CHAPTER 17

Paul's two epistles to the Thessalonians give such a shining character of that church, that we cannot but be glad to meet with an account of the first founding of the church there.

I. Here is Paul's coming to Thessalonica. Paul went on with his work, notwithstanding the ill usage he had met with at Philippi. He takes notice of this in his first epistle to the church here (1 Thess. ii. 2). The opposition and persecution that he met with made him the more resolute. He could never have held out, and held on, as he did, if he had not been animated by a spirit of power from on high. 2. He did but pass through Amphipolis and Appollonia. We may suppose though he is said only to pass through these cities, yet that he stayed so long in them as to publish the gospel there, and to prepare the way for the entrance of other ministers among them.

II. His preaching to the Jews first, in their synagogue at Thessalonica. He found a synagogue of the Jews there (v. 1). By it he made his entry. It was always his manner to begin with the Jews, for if they received the gospel they would cheerfully embrace the new converts; if they refused it, they might thank them-

CHAPTER 17

VSS. 1-15. AT THESSALONICA THE SUCCESS OF PAUL'S PREACHING ENDANGERING HIS LIFE, HE IS DESPATCHED BY NIGHT TO BEREA, WHERE HIS MESSAGE MEETS WITH ENLIGHTENED ACCEPTANCE—A HOSTILE MOVEMENT FROM THESSALONICA OCCASIONS HIS SUDDEN DEPARTURE FROM BEREA—HE ARRIVES AT ATHENS. 1. when they had passed through Amphipolis—thirty-three miles southwest of Philippi, on the river Strymon, and at the head of the gulf of that name, on the northern coast of the Ægean Sea. and Apollonia—about thirty miles southwest of Amphipolis; but the exact site is not known. they came to Thessalonica—about thirty seven miles due west from Apollonia, at the head of the Thermaic (or Thessalonian) Gulf, at the northwestern extremity of the Ægean Sea; the principal and most populous city in Macedonia. "We see at once how appropriate a place it was for one of the starting-points of the Gospel in Europe, and can appreciate the force of what Paul said to the Thessalonians within a few months of his departure from them: 'From you, the word of the Lord sounded forth like a trumpet, not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but in every place,' " (I Thess. 1; 8) [Hows]. where was a synagogue of the Jews

CHAPTER 17

1. Passed through Amphipolis. This city was the metropolis of the first division of Macedonia, as made by Paulus Aemilius; see the note on chap. xvi. 10. It was built by Cimon, the Athenian general who sent 10,000 Athenians thither as a colony. It stood in an island in the river Strymon and had its name of Amphipolis because included between the two grand branches of that river where they empty themselves into the sea, the river being on "both sides of the city." Apollonia. This was another city of Macedonia, between Amphipolis and Thessalonica. It does not appear that Paul stopped at any of these cities, and they are only mentioned by the historian as places through which the apostles passed on their way to Thessalonica. It is very likely that in these cities there were no Jews, and that might have been the reason why the apostles did not preach the gospel there, for we find them almost constantly beginning with the Jews; and the Hellenist Jews living among the Gentiles became the medium through which the gospel of Christ was conveyed to the heathen world. Thessalonica. This was a celebrated city of Macedonia, situated on what was selves if the apostles carried it to those that would bid it welcome. He met them in their synagogue on the sabbath day, in their place and at their time of meeting. It is good being in the house of the Lord on his day. This was Christ's manner, and Paul's manner, and has been the manner of all the saints. He reasoned with them out of the scriptures. They agreed with him to receive the scriptures, so far they were of a mind. But they received the scripture, and therefore thought they had reason to reject Christ; Paul received the scripture, and therefore saw great reason to embrace Christ. It was therefore requisite that he should, by reasoning with them, convince them that his inferences from the scripture were right and theirs were wrong. The preaching of the gospel should be both scriptural preaching and rational; such Paul's was, for he reasoned out of the scriptures: we must reason out of them and upon them. Reason must not be set up in competition with the scripture, but it must be made use of in explaining and applying the scripture. He continued to do this three sabbath days successively. God waits for sinners' conversion; all the labourers come not into the vineyard at the first hour, nor are wrought upon so suddenly as the jailer. The drift and scope of his arguing was to prove that Jesus is the Christ; this was that which he opened and alleged, v. 3. He first explained his thesis, and opened the terms, and then alleged it, and laid it down. He opened it like one that knew it, and alleged it like one that believed it. It was necessary the Messiah should suffer, and die, and rise again, for the Old Testament prophecies concerning the Messiah made it necessary he should. Paul here alleges and makes it out undeniably, not only that it was possible he might be the Messiah, though he suffered, but that, being the Messiah, it was necessary he should suffer. He could not be made perfect but by sufferings; for, if he had not died, he could not have risen again from the dead. He must needs have suffered for us, because he could not otherwise purchase redemption for us; and he must needs have risen again because he could not otherwise apply the redemption to us. Jesus is the Messiah: "This Jesus whom I preach unto you is Christ, is the Christ, is he that should come. God has both by the scriptures and by miracles, borne witness to him." Gospel ministers should preach Jesus; he must be their principal subject. That which we are to preach concerning Jesus is that he is Christ.

III. The success of his preaching there, v. 4. Some of the Jews believed and they consorted with Paul and Silas. Those that believe in Jesus Christ come into communion with his faithful ministers, and associate with them. Many more of the devout Greeks, and of the chief women, embraced the gospel. These were the worshipping Gentiles; as in America they call those of the natives that are converted to the faith of Christ the praying Indians. Of these a great multitude believed. And not a few of the chief women of the city embraced Christianity. Particular notice is taken of this, for an example to the ladies, the chief women, to submit themselves to the commanding power of Christ's holy religion; for this intimates how acceptable it will be to God, and what great influence it may have upon many. No mention is here made of their preaching the gospel to the Gentile idolaters at Thessalonica, and yet it is certain that they did, for Paul writes to the Christians there as having turned to God from idols (1 Thess. i. 9), and that at the first entering in of the apostles among them.

IV. The trouble that was given to Paul and Silas at Thessalonica.

1. Who were the authors of their trouble: the Jews who believed not, who were moved with envy, v. 5. Some of the Jews believed the gospel and pitied and prayed for those that did not; while those that did not envied and hated those that did.

2. Who were the instruments of the trouble: the Jews made use of certain lewd persons of the baser sort. All wise and sober people looked upon them with respect, and none would appear against them but such as were the scum of the city. It is the honour of religion that those who hate it are generally the lewd fellows of the baser sort.

3. In what method they proceeded against them. (1) They set the city in an uproar. They began a riot, and then the mob was up presently. See how the devil carries on his designs; he sets cities in an uproar, sets souls in an uproar, and then fishes in troubled waters. (2) They assaulted the house of Jason, where the apostles lodged, to bring them out to the people, whom they had incensed against them. The proceedings here were altogether illegal. If men have offended, magistrates are appointed to enquire into the offence, and to judge of it; but to make the rabble judges and executioners too was to make truth implying that (as at Philippi) there was none at Amphipolis and Apollonia.

2-4. Paul, as his manner was—always to begin with the Jews. went in unto them—In writing to the converts but a few months after this, he reminds them of the courage and superiority to indignity, for the Gospel's sake, which this required after the shameful treatment he had so lately experienced at Philippi (I Thess. 2:2).

Opening and alleging that Christ must needs have suffered . . .—His preaching, it seems, was chiefly expository, and designed to establish from the Old Testament Scriptures (1) that the predicted Messiah was to be a suffering and dying, and therefore a rising, Messiah; (2) that this Messiah was none other than Jesus of Nazareth.

consorted—cast in their lot—with Paul and Silas—Cf. II Corinthians 8:5. of the chief women—female proselytes of distinction. From the First Epistle to the Thessalonians it appears that the converts were nearly all Gentiles; not only such as had before been proselytes, who would be gained in the synagogue, but such as up to that time had been idolaters (I Thess. 1:9, 10). During his stay, while Paul supported himself by his own labor (I Thess. 2:9; II Thess. 3:7-9), he received supplies once and again from the Philippians, of which he makes honorable acknowledgment (Phil. 4:15, 16).

5-9. the Jews . . . moved with envy—seeing their influence undermined by this stranger. lewd fellows of the baser sort—better, perhaps, 'worthless market-people,' i.e., idle loungers about the market place, of indifferent character.

gathered a company—rather, 'having raised a mob'—assaulted the house of Jason—with whom Paul and Silas abode (vs. 7), one of Paul's kinsmen, apparently (Rom. 16:21), and from his name, which was sometimes used as a Greek form of the word Joshua [GROTIUS], probably a Hellenistic Jew. sought to bring them—Jason's lodgers—out to the people.

called the Thermaic Gulf. According to Stephanus Byznatinus, it was embellished and enlarged by Philip, king of Macedon, who called it Thessalonica, "the victory of Thessalia," on account of the victory he obtained there over the Thessalians; but prior to this it was called Thermae. But Strabo, Tzetzes, and Zonaras say that it was called Thessalonica from Thessalonica, wife of Cassander and daughter of Philip.

2. As his manner was. He constantly offered salvation first to the Jews, and for this purpose attended their Sabbath days' meetings at their synagogues.

3. Opening and alleging. "Proving by citations." His method seems to have been this: (1) He collected the scriptures that spoke of the Messiah. (2) He applied these to Jesus Christ, showing that in Him all these scriptures were fulfilled, and that He was the Saviour of whom they were in expectation. He showed also that the Christ, or Messiah, must needs have suffered—that this was predicted, and was an essential mark of the true Messiah. By proving this point he corrected their false notion of a triumphant Messiah and thus removed the scandal of the Cross.

4. The devout Greeks. That is, Gentiles who were proselytes to the Jewish religion, so far as to renounce idolatry and live a moral life, but probably had not received circumcision.

5. Certain lewd fellows of the baser sort. This is not a very intelligible translation. These were probably a low kind of lawyers, or attorneys without principle, who gave advice for a trifle and fomented disputes and litigations among the people. They were such as always attended forensic litigations, waiting for a job and willing to defend any side of a question for money. They were wicked men of the forensic tribe. Gathered a company, and set all the city on an uproar. And after having made this sedition and disturbance, charged the whole on the peaceable and innocent apostles! This is precisely the same way that persecution against the truth and followers of Christ is still carried on. Assaulted the house of Jason. This was the place where the apostles lodged, and therefore his goods were clear spoil and his person fair game.

MATTHEW HENRY

fall in the street, to depose equity, and enthrone fury. (3) When they could not get the apostles into their hands they fall upon an honest citizen of their own, his name Jason, a converted Jew, and drew him out with some others of the brethren to the rulers of the city. (4) They accused them to the rulers, and represented them as dangerous persons. The crime charged upon Jason is receiving and harbouring the apostles (v. 7). Two very black characters are here given them: [1] That they were enemies to the public peace, and threw everything into disorder wherever they came: Those that have turned the world upside down are come hither also. In one sense it is true that wherever the gospel comes in its power to any place, to any soul, it works such a change there that it may be said to turn the world upside down. The love of the world is rooted out of the heart, and the way of the world contradicted in the life; so that the world is turned upside down there. They would have it thought that the preachers of the gospel were mischief makers wherever they came. Because they persuaded people to turn from idols to the living and true God, from malice and envy to love and peace, they are charged with turning the world upside down, when it was only the kingdom of the devil in the world that they thus overturned. Their enemies set the city in an uproar, and then laid the blame upon them. If Christ's faithful ministers be thus invidiously misrepresented, let them not think it strange; we are not better than Paul and Silas, who were thus abused. The accusers cry out, "They are come hither also; it is therefore time for us to bestir ourselves." [2] That they were enemies to the established government (v. 7): They all do contrary to the decrees of Cæsar, for they say: There is another king, one Jesus. It is true the Roman government was very jealous of any governor under their dominion taking upon him the title of king. His followers said indeed, Jesus is a king, but not an earthly king. There was nothing in the doctrine of Christ that tended to the dethroning of princes. The Jews knew this very well, and of all people it ill became the Jews to do it, who hated Cæsar and his government, and who expected a Messiah that should be a temporal prince, and overturn the thrones of kingdoms, and were therefore opposing our Lord Jesus because he did not appear under that character.

4. The great uneasiness which this gave to the city (v. 8): They troubled the people and the rulers of the city, when they heard these things. They had no ill opinion of the apostles or their doctrine, but if they be represented to them by the prosecutors as enemies to Cæsar, they will be obliged to suppress them. It troubled them to be brought under a necessity of disturbing good men.

5. The issue of this troublesome affair. The magistrates had no mind to prosecute the Christians. Care was taken to secure the apostles; they fled, and kept out of their hands; so that nothing was to be done but to discharge Jason and his friends upon bail, v. 9. So they took security of Jason and the other. Among the persecutors of Christianity, as there have been instances of the madness and rage of brutes, so there have been likewise of the prudence and temper of men; moderation has been a virtue.

Verses 10–15

I. Paul and Silas removing to Berea, and employed in preaching the gospel there, v. 10. They had proceeded so far at Thessalonica that the foundations of a church were laid, and therefore when the storm rose they withdrew. That command of Christ to his disciples, When they persecute you in one city flee to another, intends their flight to be not so much for their own safety ("flee to another, to hide there") as for the carrying on of their work ("flee to another, to preach there"). The devil was outshot in his own bow; he thought by persecuting the apostles to stop the progress of the gospel, but it was so overruled as to be made to further it. 1. The care that the brethren took of Paul and Silas. They immediately sent them away by night to Berea. They sent them away by night, under the covert of that, as if they had been evil doers. 2. The constancy of Paul and Silas in their work. Though they fled from Thessalonica, they did not flee from the service of Christ. When they came to Berea, they went into the synagogue of the Jews. They did not decline paying their respect to the Jews, either in revenge for the injuries they had received or for fear of what they might receive. If others will not do their duty to us, yet we ought to do ours to them.

II. The good character of the Jews in Berea (v. 11): These were more noble than those in Thessalonica. They were more noble, better bred.

1. They had a freer thought, were willing to hear reason, and admit the force of it, though it was contrary to their former sentiments. This was more

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

And when they found them not, they drew Jason and certain brethren unto the rulers—lit., 'the politarchs'; the very name given to the magistrates of Thessalonica in an inscription on a still remaining arch of the city—so minute is the accuracy of this history. crying, These that have turned the world upside down—See on ch. 16:20.

all do contrary to the decrees of Cæsar . . .—meaning, probably, nothing but what is specified in the next words. saying . . . there is another king, one Jesus—See on John 19:12.

having taken security of Jason and of the other—'the others'—probably making them deposit a money pledge that the preachers should not again endanger the public peace.

10-12. the brethren immediately sent away Paul and Silas by night—for it would have been as useless as rash to attempt any further preaching at that time, and the conviction of this probably made his friends the more willing to pledge themselves against any present continuance of missionary effort. to Berea—fifty or sixty miles southwest of Thessalonica; a town even still of considerable population and importance.

These were more noble than those in Thessalonica—The comparison is between the Jews of the two places; for the triumphs of the Gospel at Thessalonica were mostly among the Gentiles. See on vss. 2-4.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN:

The charges are a violent distortion of the truth. Possibly the Jewish ringleaders believed what they said, but more probably they consciously twisted Paul's teachings, because they knew that no other charges would excite so much hostility or be so damning as those which they made. The mere suggestion of treason was often fatal. The wild exaggeration that the Christians had "turned the whole civilized world upside down" betrays passionate hatred and alarm, if it was genuine, or crafty determination to rouse the mob, if it was consciously trumped up. But whether the charges were believed or not by those who made them, here were Jews disclaiming their nation's dearest hope, and, like the yelling crowd at the Crucifixion, declaring they had no king but Caesar. The degradation of Israel was completed by these fanatical upholders of its prerogatives.
—Expositions of Holy Scripture

7. These all do contrary to the decrees of Caesar. Persecutors always strive to affect the lives of the objects of their hatred by accusing them of sedition or plots against the state. That there is another king, one Jesus. How malevolent was this saying! The apostles proclaimed Jesus as King—that is true; but never once insinuated that His kingdom was of this world.

8. And they troubled the people and the rulers. It is evident that there was no disposition in either the people or the rulers to persecute the apostles. But these wicked Jews, by means of the unprincipled, wicked lawyers, those "lewd fellows of the baser sort," threw the subject into the form of law, making it a state question, in which form the rulers were obliged to notice it. But they showed their unwillingness to proceed in a matter which they saw proceeded from malice by letting Jason and his companions go off on bail.

9. Taken security. "Having taken what was sufficient." Sufficient for the present, to prove that the apostles were upright, peaceable, and loyal men; and that Jason and his friends were the like, and would be at any time forthcoming to answer for their conduct.

10. Sent away Paul and Silas by night. Fearing some farther machinations of the Jews and their associates. Berea. This was another city of Macedonia, on the same gulf with Thessalonica, and not far from Pella, the birthplace of Alexander the Great.

11. These were more noble than those in Thessalonica. "Were of a better race, extraction, or birth" than those at Thessalonica; but the word refers more to their conduct as a proof of their better disposition than to their birth noble.

2. They had a better temper. As they were ready to come into a unity with those that they were brought to concur with, so they continued in charity with those that they saw cause to differ from. This was more noble. They received the word with all readiness of mind; they were very willing to hear it, and did not shut their eyes against the light. They did not pick quarrels with the word, nor seek occasion against the preachers of it; but bade it welcome. This was true nobility. The Jews thought themselves well-born and that they could not be better born. But they are here told who among them were the most noble and the best-bred men—those that were most disposed to receive the gospel. These were the most noble, and, if I may so say, the most gentleman-like men. They searched the scriptures daily whether those things were so. Their readiness of mind to receive the word was not such as that they took things upon trust. Since Paul reasoned out of the scriptures, and referred them to the Old Testament for the proof of what he said, they had recourse to their Bibles, examined whether Paul's arguments were cogent, and determined accordingly. The doctrine of Christ does not fear a scrutiny. The New Testament is to be examined by the Old. The Jews received the Old Testament, and those that did so could not but see cause sufficient to receive the New, because in it they see all the prophecies and promises of the Old fully and exactly accomplished. Those that read and receive the scriptures must search them (John v. 39), must study them, that they may find out the whole truth contained in them, and may have an intimate acquaintance with the mind of God revealed in them. Searching the scriptures must be our daily work. Those are truly noble, and are in a fair way to be more and more so, that make the scriptures their oracle and touchstone. Those that rightly study the scriptures, and meditate therein day and night, have their minds filled with noble thoughts. These are more noble.

III. The good effect of the preaching of the gospel at Berea, v. 12. Of the Jews there were many that believed. At Thessalonica there were only some of them that believed (v. 4), but at Berea, where they heard with unprejudiced minds, many believed. God gives grace to those whom he first inclines to make a diligent use of the means of grace, and particularly to search the scriptures. Of the Greeks likewise, many believed, both of the honourable women and of men not a few, men of the first rank, as should seem by their being mentioned with the honourable women. The wives first embraced the gospel, and then they persuaded their husbands to embrace it.

IV. The persecution that was raised against Paul and Silas at Berea. The Jews at Thessalonica were the mischief-makers at Berea. They had notice that the word of God was preached at Berea. They came thither and they stirred up the people, and incensed them against the preachers of the gospel. See how restless Satan's agents are in their opposition to the gospel of Christ and the salvation of the souls of men. This occasioned Paul's removal to Athens. So long Paul stayed at Berea, and such success he had there, that there were brethren there, and sensible active men too, which appeared by the care they took of Paul, v. 14. They were aware of the coming of the persecuting Jews from Thessalonica, and, fearing what it would come to, they lost no time, but immediately sent Paul away, while they retained Silas and Timothy there still, who might be sufficient to carry on the work without exposing him. They sent Paul to go as it were to the sea. He went out from Berea in that road which went to the sea, but he went by land to Athens. Those that conducted Paul brought him to Athens. The Spirit of God directed him to that famous city—famous of old for its power and dominion—famous afterwards for learning. Those who wanted learning went thither to get it, because those that had learning went thither to show it. It was a great university. Paul is sent thither, and is not ashamed nor afraid to show his face among the philosophers there, and there to preach Christ crucified. He ordered Silas and Timothy to come to him to Athens, when he found there was a prospect of doing good there; or because, there being none there that he knew, he was solitary and melancholy without them.

Verses 16–21

A scholar that is in love with the learning of the ancients would think he should be very happy if he were where Paul now was, at Athens, but Paul, though bred a scholar, does not make this any of his business at Athens. He has other work to mind: his business is, in God's name, to turn them from the service of idols to the service of the true and living in that they received the word with all readiness of mind—heard it not only without prejudice, but with eager interest, "in an honest and good heart" (Luke 8:17), with sincere desire to be taught aright (see John 7:17). Mark the "nobility" ascribed to this state of mind.

searched the scriptures daily whether those things were so—whether the Christian interpretation which the apostle put upon the Old Testament Scriptures was the true one. Therefore many of them believed—convinced that Jesus of Nazareth whom Paul preached was indeed the great Promise and Burden of the Old Testament. From this it is undeniable, (1) that the people, no less than the ministers of the Church, are entitled and bound to search the Scriptures; (2) that they are entitled and bound to judge, on their own responsibility, whether the teaching they receive from the ministers of the Church is according to the word of God; (3) that no faith but such as results from personal conviction ought to be demanded, or is of any avail. of honourable women which were Greeks, and of men—which were Greeks—not a few—"The upper classes in these European-Greek and Romanized towns were probably better educated than those of Asia Minor" [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. the Jews of Thessalonica . . . came thither also—"like hunters upon their prey, as they had done before from Iconium to Lystra" [Hows]. 13, 14. immediately the brethren—the converts gathered at Berea. sent away Paul—as before from Jerusalem (ch. 9:30), and from Thessalonica (vs. 10). How long he stayed at Berea we know not; but as we know that he longed and expected soon to return to the Thessalonians (I Thess. 2:17), it is probable he remained some weeks at least, and only abandoned his intention of revisiting Thessalonica at that time when the virulence of his enemies there, stimulated by his success at Berea, brought them down thither to counterwork him. to go as it were to the sea—rather, perhaps, 'in the direction of the sea.' Probably he delayed fixing his next destination till he should reach the coast, and the providence of God should guide him to a vessel bound for the destined spot. Accordingly, it was only on arriving at Athens, that the convoy of Berean brethren, who had gone thus far with him, were sent back to bid Silas and Timothy follow him thither. Silas and Timotheus abode there still—"to build it up in its holy faith, to be a comfort and support in its trials and persecutions, and to give it such organization as might be necessary" [Hows]. Connecting this with the apostle's leaving Timothy and Luke at Philippi on his own departure (see on ch. 16:40), we may conclude that this was his fixed plan for cherishing the first beginnings of the Gospel in European localities, and organizing the converts. Timotheus must have soon followed the apostle to Thessalonica, the bearer, probably, of one of the Philippian "contributions to his necessity" (Phil. 4:15, 16), and from thence he would with Silas accompany him to Berea 15. Silas and Timotheus to come to him with all speed—He probably wished their company and aid in addressing himself to so new and great a sphere as Athens. Accordingly it is added that he "waited for them" there, as if unwilling to do anything till they came. That they did come, there is no good reason to doubt (as some excellent critics do). For though Paul himself says to the Thessalonians that he "thought it good to be left at Athens alone" (I Thess. 3:1), he immediately adds that he "sent Timotheus to establish and comfort them" (vs. 2); meaning, surely, that he despatched him from Athens back to Thessalonica. He had indeed sent for him to Athens; but, probably, when it appeared that little fruit was to be reaped there, while Thessalonica was in too interesting a state to be left uncherished, he seems to have thought it better to send him back again. (The other explanations which have been suggested seem less satisfactory.) Timotheus rejoined the apostle at Corinth (ch. 18: 5).

16-34. PAUL AT ATHENS. 16, 17. wholly given to idolatry—'covered with idols'; meaning the city, or any peculiar lineal nobility. It was a maxim among the Jews that "none was of a noble spirit who did not employ himself in the study of the law." It appears that the Bereans were a better educated and more polished people than those at Thessalonica.

12. Therefore many of them believed. From the manner in which they heard, received, and examined the Word preached to them, it was not likely they could be deceived. And as it was the truth that was proclaimed to them, it is no wonder that they apprehended, believed, and embraced it. Of honourable women which were Greeks. Probably mere heathens are meant; and these were some of the chief families in the place. Thus we find that the preaching of Paul at Berea was made the instrument of converting both Jews and Gentiles.

14. To go as it were to the sea. This passage is generally understood to mean that the disciples took Paul towards the sea, as if he had intended to embark and return to Troas, but with the real design to go to Athens. By taking a vessel at that part of the sea nearest to Berea they might have coasted it to Athens, which was quite a possible case; and as we do not hear of his stopping at any place on his journey to preach, it is very probable that he went by sea to this city. Silas and Timotheus abode there still. The persecution, it seems, was directed principally against Paul. Silas and Timotheus, holy men, were left behind to water the seed which Paul had planted.

15. Brought him unto Athens. This was one of the most celebrated cities in the world, whether we consider its antiquity, its learning, its political consequence, or the valor of its inhabitants. About thirteen or fourteen hundred years before Christ it was called Athens, from Athene, a name of Minerva, to whom it was dedicated and who was always considered the protectress of the city. The whole city at first was built upon a hill or rock, in the midst of a spacious plain; but in process of time the whole plain was covered with buildings, which were called the lower city, while the ancient was called Acropolis, or the upper city. In its most flourishing state this city was not less than twenty-two Roman miles in circumference. The buildings of Athens were the most superb and best executed in the world. The greatest men that ever lived, scholars, lawyers, statesmen, and warriors, were Athenians. Its institutions, laws, and literature were its own unrivalled boast and the envy of the world. The city still exists; the Acropolis in a state of comparative repair.

16. He saw the city wholly given to idolatry. "Full of idols." Bishop Pearce produces a most

MATTHEW HENRY

God in Christ.

I. Here is the impression which the superstition of the Athenians made upon Paul's spirit, v. 16. 1. The account here given of that city: it was wholly given to idolatry. This agrees with the account which the heathen writers give of it, that there were more idols in Athens than there were in all Greece besides. Whatever strange gods were recommended to them, they admitted them, and allowed them a temple and an altar. It is observable that there, where human learning most flourished, idolatry most abounded. The world by wisdom knew not God, 1 Cor. i. 21. The greatest pretenders to reason were the greatest slaves to idols: so necessary was it that there should be a divine revelation, and that centring in Christ. 2. The disturbance which the sight of this gave to Paul. His spirit was stirred within him. He was filled with concern for the glory of God, which he saw given to idols, and with compassion to the souls of men, which he saw thus enslaved to Satan.

II. The testimony that he bore against their idolatry, and his endeavours to bring them to the knowledge of the truth. He went to the synagogue of the Jews, who, though enemies to Christianity, were free from idolatry, and took the opportunity given him there of disputing for Christ, v. 17. He discoursed with the Jews, and put it to them what reason they could give why, since they expected the Messiah, they would not receive Jesus. There he met with the devout persons that had forsaken the idol temples, and he talked with these to lead them on to the Christian church, to which the Jews' synagogue was but as a porch. He entered into conversation with all that came in his way about matters of religion: In the market he disputed daily with those that met with him, that were heathen, and never came to the Jews' synagogue. The zealous advocates for the cause of Christ will be ready to plead it in all companies, as occasion offers.

III. The enquiries which some of the philosophers made.

1. Who they were that entered into discourse with him: He disputed with all that met him, in the places of concourse. Most took no notice of him, but there were some of the philosophers that thought him worth making remarks upon. (1) The Epicureans, who thought God altogether such a one as themselves. They would not own, either that God made the world or that he governs it. The Epicureans indulged themselves in all the pleasures of sense, and placed their happiness in them, in what Christ has taught us in the first place to deny ourselves. (2) The Stoics, who thought themselves altogether as good as God; they made their virtuous man to be no way inferior to God himself. To which Christianity is directly opposite, as it teaches us to come off from all confidence in ourselves, that Christ may be all in all.

2. What their different sentiments were of him (v. 18). (1) Some called him a babbler—this scatterer of words, that goes about, throwing here one idle word or story and there another; or, this picker up of seeds. The term is used for a little sort of bird, that is worth nothing at all, that picks up the seeds that lie uncovered, either in the field or by the wayside, and hops here and there for that purpose. Such a pitiful contemptible animal they took Paul to be, or supposed he went from place to place venting his notions to get money, a penny here and another there, as that bird picks up here and there a grain. They looked upon him as an idle fellow, and regarded him, as we say, no more than a ballad-singer. (2) Others called him a setter forth of strange gods. And, if he had strange gods to set forth, he could not bring them to a better market than to Athens. They thought he seemed to do so, because he preached unto them Jesus, and the resurrection. Though he did not call these gods, yet they thought he meant to make them so. "Jesus they took for a new god, and the resurrection, for a new goddess." As if believing in Jesus and looking for the resurrection, were the worshipping of new demons.

3. The proposal they made to give him a public hearing, v. 19, 20. They had heard some broken pieces of his doctrine, and are willing to have a more perfect knowledge of it. (1) They look upon it as strange and surprising. "It is a new doctrine. Thou bringest certain strange things to our ears which we never heard of before, and know not what to make of now." By this it should seem that, among all the learned books they had, they either had not, or heeded not, the books of Moses and the prophets. There was but one book in the world that was of divine inspiration, and that was the only book they were strangers to. (2) They desired to know more of it, only because it was new and strange: "May we know what this new doctrine is? We would gladly know what these things mean." It was fit they should know not the inhabitants. PETRONIUS, a contemporary writer at Nero's court, says satirically that it was easier to find a god at Athens than a man. This "stirred the spirit" of the apostle. "The first impression which the masterpieces of man's taste for art left on the mind of St. Paul was a revolting one, since all this majesty and beauty had placed itself between man and his Creator, and bound him the faster to his gods, who were not God. Upon the first contact, therefore, which the Spirit of Christ came into with the sublimest creations of human art, the judgment of the Holy Ghost—through which they have all to pass—is set up as 'the strait gate,' and this must remain the correct standard for ever" [BAUMGARTEN].

therefore disputed—or, discussed—he in the synagogue with the Jews. The sense is not, 'Therefore went he to the Jews,' because the Gentile Athenians were steeped in idolatry; but, 'Therefore set he himself to lift up his voice to the idol-city, but, as his manner was, he began with the Jews.' and with the devout persons—Gentile proselytes. After that, in the market—the Agora, or place of public concourse—daily with them that met with him—or 'came in his way.'

18-21. certain . . . of the Epicureans—a well-known school of atheistic materialists, who taught that pleasure was the chief end of human existence; a principle which the more rational interpreted in a refined sense, while the sensual explained it in its coarser meaning. and of the Stoics—a celebrated school of severe and lofty pantheists, whose principle was that the universe was under the law of an iron necessity, the spirit of which was what is called the Deity: and that a passionless conformity of the human will to this law, unmoved by all external circumstances and changes, is the perfection of virtue. While therefore the Stoical was in itself superior to the Epicurean system, both were alike hostile to the Gospel. "The two enemies it has ever had to contend with are the two ruling principles of the Epicureans and Stoics—Pleasure and Pride" [HOWS]. What will this babbler say? The word, which means 'a pickerup of seeds,' birdlike, is applied to a gatherer and retailer of scraps of knowledge, a prater; a general term of contempt for any pretended teacher.

a setter forth of strange gods—'demons,' but in the Greek (not Jewish) sense of 'objects of worship.' because he preached Jesus and the resurrection—Not as if they thought he made these to be two divinities: the strange gods were Jehovah and the Risen Saviour, ordained to judge the world.

apposite quotation from Pausanias, which confirms the observation: "There was no place where so many idols were to be seen." Petronius, who was contemporary with Paul, in his Satyr, chap. xvii, makes Quartilla say of Athens: "Our region is so full of deities that you may more frequently meet with a god than a man."

17. Disputed he in the synagogue with the Jews, proving that Jesus was the Messiah; and with the devout persons, probably heathens, proselyted to the Jewish religion. And in the market; I suppose the agora here means some such place as our exchange, where people of business usually met and where the philosophers conversed and reasoned.

18. Certain philosophers of the Epicureans. These were the followers of Epicurus, who acknowledged no gods except in name, and absolutely denied that they exercised any government over the world or its inhabitants; and that the chief good consisted in the gratification of the appetities of sense. And of the Stoicks. These did not deny the existence of the gods, but they held that all human affairs were governed by fate. They did not believe that any good was received from the hands of their gods; and considered, as Seneca asserts, that any good and wise man was equal to Jupiter himself. Both these sects agreed in denying the resurrection of the body, and the former did not believe in the immortality of the soul. Epicurus, the founder of the Epicurean sect, was born at Athens, 341 B.C. Zeno, the founder of the Stoic sect, was born in the isle of Cyprus about thirty years before Christ. His disciples were called Stoics from the Stoa, a famous portico at Athens where they studied. What will this babbler say? The word which we translate babbler signifies literally "a collector of seeds," and is the "name of a small bird that lives by picking up seeds on the road." The epithet became applied to persons who collected the sayings of others, without order or method, and detailed them among their companions in the same way. A setter forth of strange gods. "Of strange or foreign demons." That this was strictly forbidden, at both Rome and Athens, see on chap. xvi. 21. There was a difference in the heathen theology between god and demon. The theoi were such as were gods by nature; the daimonia were men who were deified. This distinction seems to be in the mind of these philosophers when they said that the apostles seemed to be setters forth of "strange demons" because they preached unto them Jesus, whom they showed to be a man, suffering and dying, but afterwards raised to the throne of God. This would appear to them tantamount with the deification of heroes who had been thus honored for their especial services to mankind.

20. Thou bringest . . . strange things to our ears. The doctrine of the apostles was different from any they had ever heard. It was wholly spiritual and divine; thus it was strange. It was contrary to their customs and manners, and thus it was strange also. As it spoke much of the exaltation and glory of Jesus Christ, they supposed Paul to be a "setter forth of strange gods"; and therefore, on the authority of the laws which forbade the introduction of any new deities or modes of worship, he was called before the Areopagus.

MATTHEW HENRY

what this doctrine was before they embraced it; and they were so fair as not to condemn it till they had had some account of it. (3) The place they brought him to. It was to Areopagus, the same word that is translated (v. 22) Mars' Hill; it was the town-house, or guildhall of their city, where the magistrates met upon public business, and where learned men met to communicate their notions. The court of justice which sat here was famous for its equity. Hither they brought Paul to be tried, not as a criminal but as a candidate.

4. The general character of the people of that city (v. 21): All the Athenians spent their time in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing. They were inquisitive concerning Paul's doctrine, not because it was good, but because it was new. (1) They were all for conversation. It is true that good company is of great use to a man, and will polish one that has laid a good foundation in study; but that knowledge will be very flashy and superficial which is got by conversation only. (2) They affected novelty; they were for telling and hearing some new thing. They were for new schemes and new notions. They were given to change. (3) They meddled in other people's business and never minded their own. Tattlers are always busy bodies. (4) They spent their time in nothing else. Time is precious and it is hastening apace into eternity, but abundance of it is wasted in unprofitable converse. To set up for newsmongers, and to spend our time in nothing else, is to lose that which is very precious for the gain of that which is worth little.

We have here St. Paul's sermon at Athens. Divers sermons we have had, which the apostles preached to the Jews, or such Gentiles as were worshippers of the true God; and all they had to do with them was to open and allege that Jesus is the Christ; but here we have a sermon to heathens, that worshipped false gods, and to them the scope of their discourse was quite different from what it was to the other. In the former case their business was to lead their hearers by prophecies and miracles to the knowledge of the Redeemer, and faith in him; in the latter it was to lead them by the common works of providence to the knowledge of the Creator, and the worship of him.

I. He lays down this that he aimed to bring them to the knowledge of the only living and true God. He is here obliged to instruct them in the first principle of all religion, that there is a God, and that God, is but one. When he preached against the gods they worshipped he had no design to draw them to atheism, but to the service of the true Deity, by declaring that he does not seek to introduce any new gods, but to reduce them to the knowledge of one God.

1. He shows them that they had lost the knowledge of the true God that made them, in the worship of false gods that they had made. I perceive that in all things you are too superstitious. The crime he charges upon them is that they feared and worshipped demons, spirits that they supposed inhabited the images. "It is time for you to be told that there is but one God. You easily admit everything that comes under a show of religion, but it is that which corrupts it more and more; I bring you that which will reform it." They charged Paul with setting forth new demons: "Nay," says he, "you have demons enough already; I will not add to the number of them."

2. He shows them that they themselves had given a fair occasion for the declaring of this one true God to them, by setting up an altar, To the unknown God. It is sad to think that at Athens, a place which was supposed to have the monopoly of wisdom, the true God was an unknown God, the only God that was unknown. There, where we are sensible we are defective and come short, and just there, the gospel takes us up, and carries us on.

(1) Various conjectures the learned have concerning this altar dedicated to the unknown God. Some think the meaning is, To the God whose honour it is to be unknown, and that they intended the God of the Jews, whose name is ineffable, and whose nature is unsearchable. The heathen called the Jews' God the God without name. This God, says Paul, I now declare unto you. Others think the meaning is, To the God whom it is our unhappiness not to know, that they would think it their happiness to know him.

(2) Observe, how modestly Paul mentions this. He tells them that he observed it as he passed by, and saw their devotions. It was public, and he could not forbear seeing it. Observe how he takes occasion from this to bring in his discourse of the true God. He tells them that the God he preached to them was one that they did already worship. He was one whom they ignorantly worshipped. "Now," says he, "I come to take away that reproach, that you may wor-they took him, and brought him to Areopagus—"the hill where the most awful court of judicature had sat from time immemorial to pass sentence on the greatest criminals, and to decide on the most solemn questions connected with religion. No place in Athens was so suitable for a discourse on the mysteries of religion" [Hows]. The apostle, however, was not here on his trial, but to expound more fully what he had thrown out in broken conversations in the Agora. all the Athenians . . . spent their time in nothing else but to tell or hear some new thing—lit., 'newer thing,' as if what was new becoming presently stale, they craved something still more new [BENGEL]. This lively description of the Athenian character is abundantly attested by their own writers.

22. Then Paul stood . . . and said—more graphically, 'standing in the midst of Mars' hill, said." This prefatory allusion to the position he occupied shows the writer's wish to bring the situation vividly before us [BAUMGARTEN].

I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious—rather (with most modern interpreters and the ancient Greek ones), 'in all respects extremely reverential' or 'much given to religious worship,' a conciliatory and commendatory introduction, founded on his own observation of the symbols of devotion with which their city was covered, and from which all Greek writers, as well as the apostle, inferred the exemplary religiousness of the Athenians. (The authorized translation would imply that only too much superstition was wrong, and represents the apostle as repelling his hearers in the very first sentence; whereas the whole discourse is studiously courteous.)

I found an altar . . . To the—or 'an'—unknown god—erected, probably, to commemorate some divine interposition, which they were unable to ascribe to any known deity. That there were such altars, Greek writers attest; and on this the apostle skilfully fastens at the outset, as the text of his discourse, taking it as evidence of that dimness of religious conception which, in virtue of his better light, he was prepared to dissipate.

23. as I passed by and beheld your devotions—rather, 'the objects of your devotion,' referring, as is plain from the next words, to their works of art consecrated to religion.

ADAM CLARKE

19. They took him, and brought him unto Areopagus. The Areopagus was a hill not far from the Acropolis, already described, where the supreme court of justice was held—one of the most sacred and reputable courts that had ever existed in the Gentile world. It had its name, Areopagus, or the "Hill of Mars," or "Ares," from the circumstance, according to poetic fiction, of Mars being tried there by a court of twelve gods for the murder of Halirrhothius, son of Neptune.

21. All the Athenians and strangers which were there. As Athens was renowned for its wisdom and learning, it became a place of public resort for philosophers and students from different parts of the then civilized world. The flux of students was in consequence great; these, having much leisure time, would necessarily be curious to know what was passing in the world and would frequently assemble together in places of public resort to meet with strangers just come to the city, and either, as Luke says, to tell or to hear some new thing.

22. Paul stood in the midst of Mars' hill. That is, in the midst of the judges who sat in the Areopagus.

Ye are too superstitious. I perceive that in all respects you are greatly addicted to religious practices; and as a religious people you will candidly hear what I have to say in behalf of that worship which I practice and recommend.

To the unknown God. That there was an altar at Athens thus inscribed we cannot doubt after such a testimony, though Jerome questions it in part; for he says Paul found the inscription in the plural number, but because he would not appear to acknowledge a plurality of gods, he quoted it in the singular. This is a most foolish saying. Had Paul done so, how much would such a begging of the question have prejudiced his defense in the minds of his intelligent judges! Pausanias says that at Athens there are "altars of gods which are called, The unknown ones." Now though in these last passages both gods and altars are spoken of in the plural number, yet it is reasonable to suppose that on each or upon some one of them the inscription "To the unknown god" was actually found.

23. Beheld your devotions. "The objects of your worship"; the different images of their gods which they held in religious veneration, sacrificial instruments, altars, etc.

ship him understandingly. And it cannot but be acceptable to have your blind devotion turned into a reasonable service, that you may not worship you know not what."

II. He confirms his doctrine of one living and true God, by his works of creation and providence: "The God whom I call you to the worship of, is the God that made the world." The Gentiles in general, and the Athenians particularly, in their devotions were governed, not by their philosophers, but by their poets, and their idle fictions. Now Paul here sets himself to give them right notions of the one only living and true God, and then to carry the matter further for the bringing them off from their idolatry. Observe what glorious things Paul here says of that God whom he served, and would have them to serve.

1. He is the God that made the world, and all things therein; the Father almighty, the Creator of heaven and earth. Paul here maintains that God by the operations of an infinite power, according to the contrivance of an infinite wisdom, made the world and all things therein, the origin of which was owing to an eternal mind.

2. He is therefore Lord of heaven and earth. If he created all, without doubt he has the disposing of all: and, where he gives being, he has an indisputable right to give law.

3. He is, in a particular manner, the Creator of men, of all men (v. 26): He made of one blood all nations of men. He made the first man, he makes every man. He has made the nations of men, not only all men in the nations, but as nations. He is their founder and disposed them into communities. He made them all of one blood, of one and the same nature, that hereby they might be engaged in mutual affection and assistance, as fellow-creatures and brethren. He hath made them to dwell on all the face of the earth. He made them not to live in one place, but to be dispersed over all the earth; one nation therefore ought not to look with contempt upon another, as the Greeks did, which proud conceit of themselves, the apostle here takes down.

4. He is the great benefactor of the whole creation (v. 25): He giveth to all life, and breath, and all things. He not only breathed into the first man the breath of life, but still breathes it into every man. He gave us these souls; he formed the spirit of man within him. He gives to all the children of men their life and breath; for as the meanest of the children of men live upon him, so the greatest, the wisest philosophers and mightiest potentates, cannot live without him. He gives to all, not only to all the children of men, but to the inferior creatures, to all animals; they have their life and breath from him, and where he gives life and breath he gives all things needful for the support of life.

5. He is the sovereign disposer of all the affairs of the children of men (v. 26): He hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation. (1) The sovereignty of God's disposal concerning us: he hath determined every event; the disposals of Providence are incontestable and must not be disputed. (2) The wisdom of his disposals; he hath determined what was before appointed. The determinations of the Eternal Mind are not sudden resolves, but an eternal counsel. (3) The things about which his providence is conversant; these are time and place. [1] He has determined the times that are concerning us. Our times are in his hand. Whether they be prosperous times or calamitous times, it is he that has determined them. [2] He has also determined and appointed the bounds of our habitation. He that appointed the earth to be a habitation for the children of men has appointed to the children of men a distinction of habitations upon the earth. The particular habitations in which our lot is cast are of God's appointing, which is a reason why we should accommodate ourselves to the habitations we are in, and make the best of that which is.

6. He is not far from everyone of us, v. 27. He is everywhere present. He is an infinite Spirit, that is not far from any of us. He is nigh unto us, both to receive the homage we render him and to give the mercies we ask of him, wherever we are, though near no altar, image, or temple. Be we in a palace or in a cottage, in a crowd or in a corner, in a city or in a desert, in the depths of the sea or afar off upon the sea, this is certain, God is not far from everyone of us.

7. In him we live, and move, and have our being, v. 28. We have a necessary and constant dependence upon his providence, as the streams have upon the spring, and the beams upon the sun. (1) In him we live. It is not only owing to his patience that our forfeited lives are not cut off, but it is owing to his fatherly care, that our frail lives are prolonged. If he suspend the positive acts of his goodness, we die of ourselves. (2) In him we move. It is likewise by him that our souls move our bodies, as he is the first

Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship—rather, 'Whom, therefore, knowing Him not, ye worship,' alluding to "The Unknown God." him declare—announce—I unto you—This is like none of his previous discourses, save that to the idolaters of Lycaonia (ch. 14:15-17). His subject is not, as in the synagogues, the Messiahship of Jesus, but THE LIVING GOD, in opposition to the materialistic and pantheistic polytheism of Greece, which subverted all true religion. Nor does he come with speculation on this profound subject—of which they had had enough from others—but an authoritative "announcement" of Him after whom they were groping; not giving Him any name, however, nor even naming the Saviour Himself, but unfolding the true character of both as they were able to receive it. 24, 25. God that made the world and all . . . therein—The most profound philosophers of Greece were unable to conceive any real distinction between God and the universe. Thick darkness, therefore, behooved to rest on all their religious conceptions. To dissipate this, the apostle sets out with a sharp statement of the fact of creation as the central principle of all true religion—not less needed now, against the transcendental idealism of our day. seeing he is Lord—or Sovereign—of heaven and earth—holding in free and absolute subjection all the works of His hands; presiding in august royalty over them, as well as pervading them all as the principle of their being. How different this from the blind Force or Fate to which all creatures were regarded as in bondage! dwelleth not in temples made with hands—This thought, so familiar to Jewish ears (I Kings 8:27; Isa. 66:1, 2; ch. 7:48), and so elementary to Christians, would serve only more sharply to define to his heathen audience the spirituality of that living, personal God, whom he "announced" to them. Neither is worshipped with—ministered unto, served by—men's hands, as though he needed anything—No less familiar as this thought also is to us, even from the earliest times of the Old Testament (Job 35:6, 8; Ps. 16:2, 3; 50: 12-14; Isa. 40:14-18), it would pour a flood of light upon any candid heathen mind that heard it. seeing he—He Himself—giveth to all life, and breath, and all things—The Giver of all cannot surely be dependent for aught upon the receivers of all (I Chron. 29:14). This is the culminating point of a pure Theism. 26, 27. and hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth—Holding with the Old Testament teaching, that in the blood is the life (Gen. 9:4; Lev. 17:11; Deut. 12:23), the apostle sees this lifestream of the whole human race to be one, flowing from one source [BAUMGARTEN]. and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation—The apostle here opposes both Stoical Fate and Epicurean Chance, ascribing the periods and localities in which men and nations flourish to the sovereign will and prearrangements of a living God.

—though he be not far from every one of us—The difficulty of finding God outside the pale of revealed religion lies not in His distance from us, but in our distance from Him through the blinding effect of sin.

28. For in him we live, and move, and have our being—or, more briefly, 'exist').—This means, not merely, "Without Him we have no life, nor that motion which every inanimate nature displays, nor even existence itself" [MEYER], but that God is the living, immanent Principle of all these in men.

ADAM CLARKE

Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship. There is here a fine paronomasia or play on the words. The apostle tells them that (on their system) they were a very religious people—that they had an altar inscribed, Agnosto theo, "To the unknown God." Him therefore, says he, whom agnoountes, "ye unknowingly" worship, I proclaim to you—assuming it as a truth that, as the true God was not known by them and there was an altar dedicated "to the unkown God," this God was that God whose nature and operations he now proceeded to declare. By this fine turn he eluded the force of that law which made it a capital offense to introduce any new god into the state, and of the breach of which he was charged, v. 18; and thus he showed that he was bringing neither new god nor new worship among them, but only explaining the worship of one already acknowledged by the state, though not as yet known.

24. God that made the world. Paul assumes that this God could not be confined within temples made with hands, as He was the Lord or Governor of heaven and earth. That by fair consequence the gods whom they worshipped, which were shut up in their temples, could not be this God; and they must be less than the places in which they were contained. This was a strong, decisive stroke against the whole system of the Grecian idolatry.

25. Neither is worshipped with men's hands. This is an indirect stroke against making of images and offering of sacrifices. He is not worshipped with human hands, as if He needed anything. Nor has He required victims for His support; for it is impossible that He should need anything who himself gives being, form, and life to all creatures. Giveth . . . life, and breath, and all things. These words are elegantly introduced by Paul. God gives life, because He is the Fountain of it. He gives breath, the faculty of breathing or respiration, by which this life is preserved. But as much more is necessary to keep the animal machine in a state of repair, God gives all the other things which are requisite for this great and important purpose, that the end for which life was given may be fully answered.

26. Hath made of one blood. In some MSS. the word blood is omitted. He hath made of one (meaning Adam) all nations of men . . . and hath determined the times before appointed. Instead of the times before appointed, several MSS. read "the appointed times"; that is, the times appointed by His providence, on which the several families should go to those countries where His wisdom designed they should dwell. And the bounds of their habitation. Every family being appointed to a particular place, that their posterity might possess it for the purposes for which infinite wisdom and goodness gave them their being and the place of their abode. Every nation had its lot thus appointed by God, as truly as the Israelites had the land of Canaan.

27. That they should seek the Lord. This is a conclusion drawn from the preceding statement. God, who is infinitely great and self-sufficient, has manifested himself as the Maker of the world, the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of men. He has assigned them their portion and dispensed to them their habitations and the various blessings of His providence, to the end that they should seek Him in all His works. Feel after him. That they might grope after Him, as a person does his way who is blind or blindfolded. The Gentiles, who had not a revelation, must grope after God as the principle of spiritual life, that they might find Him to be a Spirit and the Source of all intellectual happiness; and the apostle seems to state that none need despair of finding this fountain of goodness, because He is not far from every one of us.

28. For in him we live, and move, and have our being. He is the very Source of our existence. The principle of life comes from Him; the principle of motion also comes from Him—one of the most difficult things in nature to be properly apprehended, and a strong proof of the continual presence and energy of the Deity.

cause, so he is the first mover. (3) In him we have our being; not only from him we had it at first, but in him we have it still; we were and still are of such a noble rank of beings, capable of knowing and enjoying God; and are not thrust into the meanness of brutes, nor the misery of devils.

8. Upon the whole matter we are God's offspring. The apostle here quotes a saying of one of the Greek poets, Aratus, a native of Cilicia, Paul's countryman, who, speaking of the heathen Jupiter, that is, in the poetical dialect, the supreme God, says this of him, for we are also his offspring. By this it appears not only that Paul was himself a scholar, but that human learning is both ornamental and serviceable to a gospel minister, especially for the convincing of those that are without; for it enables him to beat them at their own weapons, and to cut off Goliath's head with his own sword. How can the adversaries of truth be beaten out of their strongholds by those that do not know them? Since in him we live, we ought to live to him; since in him we move, we ought to move towards him; and since in him we have our being, we ought to consecrate our being to him.

III. From all these great truths concerning God, he infers the absurdity of their idolatry. 1. God cannot be represented by an image. If we are the offspring of God, then certainly he who is the Father of our spirits is himself a Spirit, and we ought not to think the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device, v. 29. God honoured man in making his soul after his own likeness; but man dishonours God if he makes him after the likeness of his body. 2. He dwells not in temples made with hands, v. 24. A temple brings him never the nearer to us, nor keeps him ever the longer among us. A temple is convenient for us to come together in to worship God; but God needs not any place of rest or residence. 3. He is not worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed anything, v. 25. He that maintains all, cannot be benefited by any of our services, nor needs them. What need can God have of our services, or what benefit can he have by them, when he has all perfection in himself, and we have nothing that is good but what we have from him? 4. It concerns us all to enquire after God (v. 27): That they should seek the Lord. We have plain indications of God's presence among us, and his bounty to us, that we might be put upon enquiring, Where is God our Maker. Nothing, one would think, should be more powerful with us to convince us that there is a God, than the consideration of our own nature, especially the noble powers and faculties of our own souls. Yet so dark is this discovery, in comparison with that by divine revelation, that those who have no other could but haply feel after God and find him. It was very uncertain whether they could by this searching find out God; it is but a peradventure: if haply they might. If they did find out something of God, yet it was but some confused notions of him; they did but feel after him, as men in the dark, or blind men. It is true that by the knowledge of ourselves we may be led to the knowledge of God, but it is a very confused knowledge. We have therefore reason to be thankful that by the gospel of Christ we do not now feel after him, but with open face behold, as in a glass, the glory of God.

IV. He proceeds to call them all to repent of their idolatries, v. 30, 31. This is the practical part of Paul's sermon before the university; having declared God to them (v. 23), he properly presses upon them repentance towards God. Having shown them the absurdity of their worshipping other gods, he persuades them to return from it to the living and true God.

1. The conduct of God towards the Gentile world before the gospel came among them: The times of this ignorance God winked at. They were times of great ignorance. In the things of God they were grossly ignorant. Those are ignorant indeed who either know not God or worship him ignorantly; idolatry was owing to ignorance. These times of ignorance God winked at. Understand it as an act of divine patience and forbearance. He winked at these times, but gave them the gifts of his providence, ch. xiv. 16, 17. He was not quick and severe with them, but was long-suffering towards them, because they did it ignorantly.

2. The charge God gave to the Gentile world by the gospel: He now commandeth all men everywhere to repent—to change their mind and their way. It is to turn with sorrow and shame from every sin, and with cheerfulness and resolution to every duty. This is God's command. He interposes his own authority for our good, and has made that our duty which is our privilege. It is his command to all men, everywhere. All men have made work for repentance, and as certain also of your own poets have said, For we are also his offspring—the first half of the fifth line, word for word, of an astronomical poem of ARATUS, a Greek countryman of the apostle, and his predecessor by about three centuries. But, as he hints, the same sentiment is to be found in other Greek poets. They meant it doubtless in a pantheistic sense; but the truth which it expresses the apostle turns to his own purpose—to teach a pure, personal, spiritual Theism. (Probably during his quiet retreat at Tarsus, ch. 9:30, revolving his special vocation to the Gentiles, he gave himself to the study of so much Greek literature as might be turned to Christian account in his future work. Hence this and his other quotations from the Greek poets, I Cor. 15:33; Titus 1:12). 29. Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think—The courtesy of this language is worthy of notice—that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device—('graven by the art or device of man'). One can hardly doubt that the apostle would here point to those matchless monuments of the plastic art, in gold and silver and costliest stone, which lay so profusely beneath and around him. The more intelligent pagan Greeks no more pretended that these sculptured gods and goddesses were real deities, or even their actual likenesses. than Romanist Christians do their images; and Paul doubtless knew this; yet here we find him condemning all such efforts visibly to represent the invisible God. How shamefully inexcusable then are the Greek and Roman churches in paganizing the worship of the Christian Church by the encouragement of pictures and images in religious service! (In the eighth century, the second council of Nicea decreed that the image of God was as proper an object of worship as God Himself.)

That they should seek the Lord--That is the high end of all these arrangements of Divine Power, Wisdom, and Love.

if haply they might feel after him—as men groping their way in the dark—and find him—a lively picture of the murky atmosphere of Natural Religion-

30. the times of this ignorance God winked at--literally (and far better), 'overlooked,' i.e., bore with, without interposing to punish it, otherwise than suffering the debasing tendency of such worship to develop itself (cf. ch. 14:16, and see on Rom. 1:24, etc.).

but now—that a new light was risen upon the world. commandeth—'That duty—all along lying upon man estranged from his Creator, but hitherto only silently recommending itself and little felt—is now peremptory.' all men every where to repent—(cf. Col. 1:6, 23; Titus 1:11)—a tacit allusion to the narrow precincts of favored Judaism, within which immediate and entire repentance was ever urged.

And have our being. "And we are"; we live in Him, move in Him, and are in Him. Without Him we not only can do nothing, but without Him we are nothing. "We are," i.e., we continue to be, because of His continued, present, all-pervading, and supporting energy. As certain also of your own poets. Probably he means not only Aratus, in whose poem, entitled Phaenomena, the words quoted by Paul are to be found literatim, but also Cleanthus, in whose "Hymn to Jupiter" the same words occur. But the sentiment is found in several others, being very common among the more enlightened philosophers. By saying your own poets he does not mean poets born at Athens, but merely Grecian poets, Aratus and Cleanthus being chief. Aratus was a Cilician, one of Paul's own countrymen, and with his writings Paul was undoubtedly well-acquainted, though he had flourished about three hundred years before that time.

29. Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God. This inference of the apostle was very strong and conclusive, and his argument runs thus: "If we are the offspring of God, He cannot be like those images of gold, silver, and stone which are formed by the art and device of man, for the parent must resemble his offspring. Seeing therefore that we are living and intelligent beings, He from whom we have derived that being must be living and intelligent. It is necessary also that the object of religious worship should be much more excellent than the worshipper; but a man is, by innumerable degrees, more excellent than an image made out of gold, silver, or stone. And yet it would be impious to worship a man; how much more so to worship these images as gods!" Every man in the Areopagus must have felt the power of this conclusion; and, taking it for granted that they had felt it, he proceeds.

30. The times of this ignorance God winked at. He who has an indisputable right to demand the worship of all His creatures has mercifully overlooked those acts of idolatry which have disgraced the world and debased man.

But now, as He has condescended to give a revelation of himself, He commands, as the Sovereign, all men every where, over every part of His dominions, to repent, "to change their views"; have cause enough to repent, and all men are invited to repent, and shall have the benefit of it. Now the way of remission is more opened than it had been, and the promise more fully confirmed; and therefore now he expects we should all repent.

3. The great reason to enforce this command. God commands us to repent, because he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness (v. 31). (1) The God that made the world will judge it. The God that now governs the world will reward the faithful friends of his government and punish the rebels. (2) There is a day appointed for this general review of all that men have done in time, a day of decision, a day of recompence, a day that will put a final period to all the days of time. (3) The world will be judged in righteousness; for God is not unrighteous. (4) God will judge the world by that man whom he hath ordained, who can be no other than the Lord Jesus, to whom all judgment is committed. (5) God's raising Christ from the dead is the great proof of his being appointed and ordained the Judge of quick and dead. God hath given assurance unto all men, sufficient ground for their faith to build upon, both that there is a judgment to come and that Christ will be their Judge. Let all his enemies be assured of it, and tremble before him; let all his friends be assured of it, and triumph in him. (6) The consideration of the judgment to come, and of the great hand Christ will have in that judgment, should engage us all to repent of our sins and turn from them to God.

We have here a short account of the issue of Paul's preaching at Athens.

I. Few were the better: the gospel had as little success at Athens as anywhere. Some ridiculed Paul and his preaching. They heard him patiently till he came to speak of the resurrection of the dead (v. 32), and then they mocked. If he speak of a resurrection of the dead, though it be of the resurrection of Christ himself, it is altogether incredible to them. They had deified their heroes after their death, but never thought of their being raised from the dead. How can this be? This great doctrine, which is the saints' joy, is their jest. We are not to think it strange if sacred truths are made the scorn of profane wits. Others were willing to take time to consider of it; they said, We will hear thee again of this matter. They would not at present comply with what Paul said, nor oppose it. Thus many lose the benefit of the practical doctrine of Christianity, by wading beyond their depth into controversy. Those that would not yield to the present convictions of the word thought to get clear of them by putting them off to another opportunity. Thus the devil cozens them of all their time, by cozening them of the present time. Paul thereupon left them for the present to consider of it (v. 33): He departed from amongst them.

II. Yet there were some that were wrought upon, v. 34. There were certain men that adhered to him, and believed. When he departed from amongst them, they would not part with him so. Two are particularly named; one was an eminent man, Dionysius the Areopagite, one of that high court that sat in Aeropagus, one of those before whom Paul was summoned to appear; his judge becomes his convert. The woman named Damaris. Though there was not so great a harvest gathered in at Athens, yet these few being wrought upon there, Paul had no reason to say he had laboured in vain.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, BROWN

The word "repentance" is here used (as in Luke 13: 3, 5; 15:10) in its most comprehensive sense of "repentance unto life." 31. Because he hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world—Such language beyond doubt teaches that the judgment will, in its essence, be a solemn judicial assize held upon all mankind at once. "Aptly is this uttered on the Areopagus, the seat of judgment" [BENGEL].

by that man whom he hath ordained—cf. John 5:22, 23, 27; ch. 10:42. whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead—the most patent evidence to mankind at large of the judicial authority with which the Risen One is clothed. 32-34. when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked—As the Greek religion was but the glorification of the present life, by the worship of all its most beauteous forms, the Resurrection, which presupposes the vanity of the present life, and is nothing but life out of the death of all that sin has blighted, could have no charm for the true Greek. It gave the deathblow to his fundamental and most cherished ideas; nor until these were seen to be false and fatal could the Resurrection, and the Gospel of which it was a primary doctrine, seem otherwise than ridiculous. So Paul departed—Whether he would have opened, to any extent, the Gospel scheme in this address, if he had not been interrupted, or whether he reserved this for exposition afterwards to earnest inquirers, we cannot tell. Only the speech is not to be judged of as quite complete. others said, We will hear thee again of this—"an idle compliment to Paul and an opiate to their consciences, such as we often meet with in our own day. They probably, like Felix, feared to hear more, lest they should be constrained to believe unwelcome truths" (ch. 24:25; and cf. Matt. 13:15) [WEBSTER and WILKINSON]. Howbeit certain men clave unto him—Instead of mocking or politely waiving the subject, having listened eagerly, they joined themselves to the apostle for further instruction; and so they "believed." Dionysius the Areopagite—a member of that august tribunal. Ancient tradition says he was placed by the apostle over the little flock at Athens. "Certainly the number of converts there and of men fit for office in the Church was not so great that there could be much choice" [OLSHAUSEN]. a woman named Damaris—not certainly one of the apostle's audience on the Areopagus, but won to the faith either before or after. Nothing else is known of her. Of any further labors of the apostle at Athens, and how long he stayed, we are not informed. Certainly he was not driven away. But "it is a serious and instructive fact that the mercantile populations of Thessalonica and Corinth received the message of God with greater readiness than the highly educated and polished Athenians. Two letters to the Thessalonians, and two to the Corinthians, remain to attest the flourishing state of those churches. But we possess no letter written by Paul to the Athenians; and we do not read that he was ever in Athens again" [Hows].

because he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness. And as justice will then be done, no sinner, no persevering idolater, shall escape punishment. The word which we translate wink at signifies simply "to look over," and seems to be here used in the sense of passing by, not particularly noticing it. So God overlooked, or passed by, the times of heathenish ignorance.

31. He hath appointed a day. He has fixed the time in which He will judge the world, though He has not revealed this time to man. By that man whom he hath ordained. He has also appointed the Judge by whom the inhabitants of the earth are to be tried. Whereof he hath given assurance. "Having given to all this indubitable proof" that Jesus Christ shall judge the world, by raising Him from the dead. The sense of the argument is this: "Jesus Christ, whom we preach as the Saviour of men, has repeatedly told His followers that He would judge the world, and has described to us at large the whole of the proceedings of that awful time, Matt. xxv. 31, etc.; John v. 25. Though He was put to death by the Jews, and thus He became a Victim for sin, yet God raised Him from the dead. By raising Him from the dead, God has set His seal to the doctrines He has taught. One of these doctrines is that He shall judge the world. His resurrection, established by the most incontrovertible evidence, is therefore a proof, an incontestable proof, that He shall judge the world according to His own declaration."

32. When they heard of the resurrection. Paul undoubtedly had not finished his discourse; it is likely that he was about to proclaim salvation through Christ crucified. But on hearing of the resurrection of the body, the assembly instantly broke up—the Epicureans mocking, "began to laugh," and the Stoics saying they would take another opportunity to hear him on that subject.

33. So Paul departed from among them. He could not be convicted of having done anything contrary to the law, and when the assembly broke up he was permitted to go about his own business.

34. Certain men clave unto him. Became affectionately united to him and believed the doctrines he had preached. Dionysius the Areopagite. There can be no doubt that this man was one of the judges of this great court, but whether the president or otherwise we cannot tell. Humanly speaking his conversion must have been an acquisition of considerable importance to the Christian religion; for no person was a judge in the Areopagus who had not borne the office of archon, or chief governor of the city, and none bore the office of judge in this court who was not of the highest reputation among the people for his intelligence and exemplary conduct.

CHAPTER 18

We do not find that Paul was much persecuted at Athens, nor that he was driven thence by any ill usage, but his reception being cold, and little prospect of doing good there, he departed from Athens, and thence he came to Corinth.

I. Paul working for his living, v. 2, 3. 1. Though he was bred a scholar, yet he was master of a handicraft trade. He was a tentmaker. It was the custom of the Jews to bring up their children to some trade, yea, though they gave them learning or estates. An honest trade, by which a man may get his bread, is not to be looked upon by any with contempt. Paul, having in his youth learned to make tents, did not by disuse lose the art. 2. Though he was entitled to a maintenance from the churches he had planted, yet he worked at his calling to get bread, which is more to his praise who did not ask for supplies than to theirs who did not supply him unasked. See how humble Paul was. See how industrious he was. He that had so much to do with his mind did not think

VSS. 1-22. PAUL'S ARRIVAL AND LABORS AT CORINTH, WHERE HE IS REJOINED BY SILAS AND TIMOTHY, AND, UNDER DIVINE ENCOURAGEMENT, MAKES A LONG STAY—AT LENGTH, RETRACING HIS STEPS, BY EPHESUS, CÆSAREA, AND JERUSALEM, HE RETURNS FOR THE LAST TIME TO ANTIOCH, THUS COMPLETING HIS SECOND MISSIONARY JOURNEY. 1-4. came to Corinth—rebuilt by Julius Cæsar on the isthmus between the Ægean and Ionian Seas; the capital of the Roman province of Achaia, and the residence of the proconsul; a large and populous mercantile city, and the center of commerce alike for East and West; having a considerable Jewish population, larger, probably, at this time than usual, owing to the banishment of the Jews from Rome by Claudius Cæsar (vs. 2). Such a city was a noble field for the Gospel, which, once established there, would naturally diffuse itself far and wide.

CHAPTER 18

1. Paul departed from Athens. How long he stayed here we cannot tell; it is probable it could not be less than three months. But finding that the gospel made little progress among the Athenians, he resolved to go to Corinth. Corinth was situated on the isthmus that connects Peloponnesus to Attica, and was the capital of all Achaia. It was most advantageously situated for trade; for by its two ports, the Lecheum and Cenchreae, it commanded the commerce of both the Ionian and the Aegean Sea. It was destroyed by the Romans under Mummius about one hundred and forty-six years before Christ, in their wars with Attica; but was rebuilt by Julius Caesar, and became one of the most considerable cities of Greece. It is about forty-six miles west of Athens.

2. Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome. This edict of the Roman emit below him to work with his hands. See how careful Paul was to recommend his ministry. He therefore maintained himself with his own labour that he might not make the gospel of Christ burdensome, 2 Cor. xi. 7, &c. 3. Though we may suppose he was master of his trade, yet he did not disdain to work at journey-work: He wrought with Aquila and Priscilla, who were of that calling, so that he got no more than day-wages, a bare subsistence. 4. Though he was himself a great apostle, yet he chose to work with Aquila and Priscilla, because he found them to be very intelligent in the things of God (v. 26), and he owns that they had been his helpers in Christ Jesus, Rom. xvi. 3. Choose to work with those that are likely to be helpers in Christ Jesus. Concerning this Aquila he was a Jew, but born in Pontus, v. 2. He was lately come from Italy to Corinth. The reason of his leaving Italy was because by a late edict of the emperor Claudius Cæsar all Jews were banished from Rome. Aquila, though a Christian, was banished because he had been a Jew. If Jews persecute Christians, it is not strange if heathens persecute them both.

II. We have here Paul preaching to the Jews, both the native Jews and the Greeks.

1. He reasoned with them in the synagogue every sabbath. See in what way the apostles propagated the gospel, not by force and violence, but by fair arguing. Paul was a rational as well as a scriptural preacher.

2. He persuaded them. It denotes the urgency of his preaching. He followed his arguments with affectionate persuasions, not to refuse the offer of salvation made to them. The good effect of his preaching. He persuaded them, that is, he prevailed with them. Some of them were convinced by his reasonings, and yielded to Christ.

3. He was yet more earnest in this matter when his fellow-labourers came up with him (v. 5): When Silas and Timothy had come from Macedonia and were ready to assist him here, then Paul was more than before pressed in spirit, which made him more than ever pressing in his preaching. And being thus pressed, he testified to the Jews that Jesus is the Christ.

III. We have him here abandoning the unbelieving Jews, and turning from them to the Gentiles, v. 6.

1. Many of the Jews persisted in their contradiction to the gospel of Christ; they opposed themselves and blasphemed; they set themselves in battle array (so the word signifies) against the gospel. They could not argue against it, but what was wanting in reason they made up in ill language: they blasphemed.

2. Paul hereupon declared himself discharged from them, and left them to perish in their unbelief. He that was pressed in spirit to testify to them (v. 5), was pressed in spirit to testify against them (v. 6); he shook his raiment, shaking off the dust from it for a testimony against them. Thus he cleared himself from them, but threatened the judgments of God against them. He had done his part, and was clean from the blood of their souls; he had, like a faithful watchman, given them warning, so that if they perish in their unbelief their blood is not to be required at his hands. It is very comfortable to a minister to have the testimony of his conscience for him, that he has faithfully discharged his trust by warning sinners. They would certainly perish if they persisted in their unbelief, and the blame would lie wholly upon themselves: "Your blood be upon your own heads." If anything would frighten them at last into a compliance with the gospel, surely this would.

3. Having given them over, yet he does not give over his work. Henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles. The guests that were first invited will not come; guests must be had therefore from the highways and the hedges. Thus the fall of the Jews became the riches of the Gentiles.

Verses 7-11

I. Paul changed his quarters. He departed out of the synagogue, and he entered into a certain man's house, named Justus, v. 7. It should seem, he went to this man's house, not to lodge, for he continued with Aquila and Priscilla, but to preach. This honest man opened his doors to him. When Paul could not have liberty to preach in the synagogue, he preached in a house. The man was next door to a Jew; he was one that worshipped God; he was not an idolater, though he was a Gentile. 2. The house was next door to the synagogue, it joined close to it. I rather think it was done in charity, to show that he would come as near to them as he could, and was ready to return to them if they were but willing to receive his message.

II. Paul presently saw the good fruit of his labours, both among Jews and Gentiles. Crispus, a Jew, an eminent one, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord Jesus, with all his house, v. 8. This would a Jew . . . Aquila . . . with his wife Priscilla—From these Latin names one would conclude that they had resided so long in Rome as to lose their Jewish family names. born in Pontus—the most easterly province of Asia Minor, stretching along the southern shore of the Black Sea. From this province there were Jews at Jerusalem on the great Pentecost (ch. 2:9), and the Christians of it are included among "the strangers of the dispersion," to whom Peter addressed his first Epistle (I Pet. 1:1). Whether this couple were converted before Paul made their acquaintance, commentators are much divided. They may have brought their Christianity with them from Rome [OLSHAUSEN], or Paul may have been drawn to them merely by like occupation, and, lodging with them, have been the instrument of their conversion [MEYER]. They appear to have been in good circumstances, and after travelling much, to have eventually settled at Ephesus. The Christian friendship now first formed continued warm and unbroken, and the highest testimony is once and again borne to them by the apostle. Claudius . . .—This edict is almost certainly that mentioned by SUETONIUS, in his life of this emperor (ch. 25). tentmakers—manufacturers, probably, of those hair-cloth tents supplied by the goats of the apostle's native province, and hence, as sold in the markets of the Levant, called cilicium. Every Jewish youth, whatever the pecuniary circumstances of his parents, was taught some trade (see on Luke 2:42), and Paul made it a point of conscience to work at that which he had probably been bred to, partly that he might not be burdensome to the churches, and partly that his motives as a minister of Christ might not be liable to misconstruction. To both these he makes frequent reference in his Epistles. the Greeks—i.e., Gentile proselytes; for to the heathen, as usual, he only turned when rejected by the Jews (vs. 6). 5, 6. And when Silas and Timotheus were come from Macedonia—i.e., from Thessalonica, whither Silas had probably accompanied Timothy when sent back from Athens (see on ch. 17:15). Paul was pressed in the spirit—rather (according to what is certainiy the true reading) 'was pressed with the word'; expressing not only his zeal and assiduity in preaching it, but some inward pressure which at this time he experienced in the work (to convey which more clearly was probably the origin of the common reading). What that pressure was we happen to know, with singular minuteness and vividness of description, from the apostle himself, in his first Epistles to the Corinthians and Thessalonians (I Cor. 2:1-5; I Thess. 3:1-10). He had come away from Athens, as he remained there, in a depressed and anxious state of mind, having there met, for the first time, with unwilling Gentile ears. He continued, apparently for some time, laboring alone in the synagogue of Corinth, full of deep and anxious solicitude for his Thessalonian converts. His early ministry at Corinth was colored by these feelings. Himself deeply humbled, his power as a preacher was more than ever felt to lie in demonstration of the Spirit. At length Silas and Timotheus arrived with exhilarating tidings of the faith and love of his Thessalonian children, and of their earnest longing again to see their father in Christ; bringing with them also, in token of their love and duty, a pecuniary contribution for the supply of his wants. This seems to have so lifted him as to put new life and vigor into his ministry. He now wrote his FIRST EPISTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS, in which the "pressure" which resulted from all this strikingly appears. (See Introduction to First Thessalonians.) Such emotions are known only to the ministers of Christ, and, even of them, only to such as "travail in birth until Christ be formed in" their hearers. Your blood be upon your own heads . . .—See Ezekiel 33:4, 9. from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles—Cf. ch. 13: 46. 7, 8. he departed thence, and entered into a certain man's house, named Justus—not changing his lodging, as if Aquila and Priscilla up to this time were with the opponents of the apostle [ALFORD], but merely ceasing any more to testify in the synagogue, and henceforth carrying on his labors in this house of Justus, which "joining hard to the synagogue," would be easily accessible to such of its worshippers as were still open to light. Justus, too, being probably a proselyte, would more easily draw a mixed audience than the synagogue. From this time forth conversions rapidly increased. Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord with all his house—an event felt to be so important that the apostle deviated from his usual practice (I Cor. 1:14-16) and baptized him, as well peror is not mentioned by Josephus; but it is probably the same to which Suetonius refers in his life of Claudius, where he says, "He expelled the Jews from Rome, as they were making continual insurrections, under their leader Chrestus." Who this Chrestus was we cannot tell; probably Suetonius meant "Christ," but this I confess does not appear to me likely. There might have been a Jew of the name of Chrestus who had made some disturbances, and in consequence Claudius thought proper to banish all Jews from the city. But how could he intend Christ, who was never at Rome?

3. He abode with them, and wrought. It was a custom among the Jews, even of such as had a better education than ordinary, which was Paul's case, to learn a trade, that wherever they were they might provide for themselves in case of necessity. And though Paul in some cases lived on the bounty of his converts, yet he chose not to do so at Ephesus, chap. xx. 34; nor at Corinth or other places, 1 Cor. iv. 12; 2 Cor. ix. 8-9; 2 Thess. iii. 8; and this Paul did for a reason which he gives in 2 Cor. xi. 9-12.

4. He reasoned in the synagogue every sabbath. Discoursed at large concerning Jesus as the Messiah, proving this point from their own Scriptures, collated with the facts of our Lord's life. And persuaded the Jews and the Greeks. Many, both Jews and proselytes, were convinced of the truth of his doctrine. Among his converts was Epenetus, the firstfruit of his labor in Achaia, Rom. xvi. 5; and the family of Stephanas was the next; and then Crispus and Caius, or Gaius—all of whom the apostle himself baptized, 1 Cor. i. 14-16.

5. When Silas and Timotheus were come. We have seen, chap. xvii. 13, that when Paul was obliged to leave Berea because of the persecution raised up against him in that place, he left Silas and Timotheus behind, to whom he afterwards sent word to rejoin him at Athens with all speed. It appears, from 1 Thess. iii. 10, that on Timothy's coming to Athens, Paul immediately sent him, and probably Silas with him, to comfort and establish the church at Thessalonica. How long they labored here is uncertain, but they did not rejoin him till some time after he came to Corinth. It appears that he was greatly rejoiced at the account which Timothy brought of the church at Thessalonica; and it must have been immediately after this that he wrote his First Epistle to that church, which is probably the first, in order of time, of all his Epistles. Paul was pressed in the spirit. Or he was "constrained by the Spirit" of God, in an extraordinary manner, to testify to the Jews that Jesus was Christ. Instead of in the spirit, "in the word" is the reading of several MSS. Bishop Pearce thus paraphrases the verse: "And when Silas and Timotheus were come from Macedonia, Paul set himself, together with them, wholly to the word; i.e., he was fully employed, now that he had their assistance, in preaching the gospel, called the word in chap. iv. 6; xvi. 6, 32; and xvii. 11." This appears to be the true sense of the word, and that to logo is the genuine reading there can be no doubt. From this time we hear no more of Silas; probably he died in Macedonia.

6. When they opposed. Systematically opposing, putting themselves "in warlike order" against him; so the word implies. He shook his raiment. This was an action similar to that of shaking the dust off the feet; see on Matt. x. 14. Your blood be upon your own heads. That is, you alone are the cause of the destruction that is coming upon yourselves and upon your country. I am clean. "I am pure or innocent" of your death and ruin. I have proposed to you the gospel of Jesus Christ, the only means by which you can be saved, and you have utterly rejected it. I shall labor no more with you, and from henceforth shall confine my labors to the Gentiles. Paul must refer to the Jews and Gentiles of Corinth particularly, for he preached to the Jews occasionally in other places (see chap. xix. 8-9), and several were brought to the knowledge of the truth.

7. And he departed thence. From his former lodging, or that quarter of the city where he had dwelt before with Aquila and Priscilla; and went to lodge with Justus, apparently a proselyte. This person is called Titus, and Titus leave the Jews inexcusable, that the ruler of their synagogue believed the gospel, and yet they opposed and blasphemed it. Not only he but his house, believed. Many of the Corinthians, who were Gentiles, hearing, believed, and were baptized. Some perhaps came to hear Paul under some convictions of conscience, but it is probable that the most came only for curiosity. But, hearing, they believed, and, believing, they were baptized, and so fixed for Christ.

III. Paul was encouraged by a vision to go on with his work at Corinth (v. 9): The Lord Jesus spoke to Paul in the night by a vision. 1. He renewed his commission and charge to preach the gospel: "Be not afraid of the Jews. Be not afraid of the magistrates of the city. It is the cause of heaven thou art pleading, do it boldly. Do not speak shyly and with caution, but plainly and fully and with courage. Speak out." 2. He assured him of his presence with him, which was sufficient to put life and spirit into him: "Be not afraid, for I am with thee, to bear thee out, and to deliver thee from all thy fears, to work with thee, and to confirm the word by signs following." Those that have Christ with them need not to fear, and ought not to shrink. 3. He gave him a warrant of protection: "No man shall set on thee to hurt thee." He does not promise that no man should set on him (for the next news we hear is that he is set upon, and brought to the judgment-seat, v. 12), but "No man shall set on thee to hurt thee. Whatever trouble they may give thee, there is no real evil in it." 4. He gave him a prospect of success: "For I have much people in this city. Therefore do thou go on vigorously and cheerfully in it; for there are many in this city that are to be effectually called by thy ministry." The Lord knows those that are his. "I have them, though they yet know me not, for the Father has given them to me, and of all that were given me I will lose none." In this city, though it be a very profane wicked city, full of impurity, and the more so for a temple of Venus there, yet in this heap, that seems to be all chaff, there is wheat; in this ore, that seems to be all dross, there is gold. Let us not despair concerning any place, when even in Corinth Christ had much people.

IV. Upon this encouragement he made a long stay there (v. 11): He continued at Corinth a year and six months, teaching the word of God among them. He stayed so long, 1. For the bringing in of those that were without. God works variously. The people Christ has at Corinth must be called in by degrees. Let Christ's ministers go on in their duty, though their work be not done all at once. 2. For the building up of those that were within. Those that are converted have still need to be taught the word of God. No sooner was the good seed sown in that field than the enemy came and sowed tares, the false apostles, of whom Paul in his epistles to the Corinthians complains so much. Soon after Paul came to Corinth, it is supposed, he wrote the first epistle to the Thessalonians, and the second epistle to the same church was written not long after. Ministers may be serving Christ by writing good letters, as well as by preaching good sermons.

We have here an account of some disturbance at Corinth, but no great harm done.

I. Paul is accused by the Jews before the Roman governor, v. 12, 13. The governor was Gallio, deputy of Achaia. This Gallio was elder brother to the famous Seneca, a man of great ingenuousness and great probity, and a man of wonderful good temper; he was called Sweet Gallio, and is said to have been universally beloved. How rudely Paul is apprehended and brought before Gallio; The Jews made insurrection with one accord against Paul. They were the ringleaders. They were unanimous in it: they came upon him with one accord. They did it with violence and fury: They made an insurrection and hurried Paul away to the judgment-seat. How falsely Paul is accused before Gallio (v. 13): This fellow persuades men to worship God contrary to the law. They could not charge him with persuading men not to worship God at all, but only to worship God in a way contrary to the law. But the charge was unjust. The law relating to the temple-service those Jews at Corinth could not observe, and there was no part of their synagogue-worship which Paul contradicted. Thus when people are taught to worship God in Christ, and to worship him in the Spirit, they are ready to quarrel, as if they were taught to worship him contary to the law.

II. Gallio dismisses the cause, and will not take any cognizance of it, v. 14, 15. Paul was going about to make his defence, but the judge, being resolved not to pass any sentence upon this cause, would not give himself the trouble of examining it.

9-11. Then spake the Lord to Paul . . . by a vision, Be not afraid . . . no man shall set on thee to hurt thee . . .—From this it would seem that these signal successes were stirring up the wrath of the unbelieving Jews, and probably the apostle feared being driven by violence, as before, from this scene of such promising labor. He is reassured, however, from above. I have much people in this city—"whom in virtue of their election to eternal life He already designates as His" (cf. ch. 13:48) [BAUMGARTEN].

Justus, in several MSS. and versions.

8. Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue. This person held an office of considerable consequence, and therefore his conversion to Christianity must have been very galling to the Jews. It belonged to the chief or ruler of the synagogue to preside in all the assemblies, interpret the law, decide concerning things lawful and unlawful, punish the refractory, excommunicate the rebellious, solemnize marriages, and issue divorces. It is likely that, on the conversion of Crispus, Sosthenes was chosen to succeed him. Many of the Corinthians. Those to whom the sacred historian refers were probably Gentiles and were the fruits of the apostle's labors after he had ceased to preach among the Jews.

9. Then spake the Lord to Paul in the night by a vision. It is likely that Paul was at this time much discouraged by the violent opposition of the Jews, and probably was in danger of his life (see v. 10), and might have been entertaining serious thoughts of ceasing to preach, or leaving Corinth. To prevent this, and comfort him, God was pleased to give him this vision. Be not afraid. That this comfort and assurance were necessary himself shows us in his First Epistle to these Corinthians, chap. ii. 3: "I was with you in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling."

10. No man shall set on thee. No man shall be permitted to "lay violent hands" upon you. It is very likely that the Jews had conspired his death, and his preservation was an act of the especial interposition of Divine Providence. I have much people in this city. "In this very city." There are many here who have not resisted My Spirit, and consequently are now under its teachings and are ready to embrace My gospel as soon as you shall declare it unto them.

11. He continued there a year and six months. He was now confident that he was under the especial protection of God and therefore continued teaching the word, "the doctrine" of God. It is very likely that it was during his stay here that he wrote his First Epistle to the Thessalonians, and the Second not long after.

12. When Gallio was the deputy of Achaia. The Romans comprehended under the name of Achaia all that part of Greece which lay between Thessaly and the southernmost coasts of Peloponnesus. Pausanias, in Attic. vii. 16, says that the Romans were accustomed to send a governor into that country, and that they called him the "governor of Achaia," not of Greece; because the Achaeans, when they subdued Greece, were the leaders in all the Grecian affairs. Gallio. This proconsul was eldest brother to the celebrated Seneca, the stoic philosopher, preceptor of Nero, and who is so well-known among the learned by his works. Gallio and Annaeus Mela, his brother, shared in the disgrace of their brother Seneca; and by this tyrant, Nero, whose early years were so promising, the three brothers were put to death. It was to this Gallio that Seneca dedicates his book De Ira. Seneca describes him as a man of the most amiable mind and manners. And brought him to the judgment seat. They had no power to punish any person in the Roman provinces, and therefore were obliged to bring their complaint before the Roman governor. "The powers that be are ordained of God." Had the Jews possessed the power here, Paul had been put to death!

13. Persuadeth men to worship God contrary to the law. This accusation was very insidious. The Jews had permission by the Romans to worship their own God in their own way; this the laws allowed. The Roman worship was also established by the law. The Jews probably intended to accuse Paul of acting contrary to both laws. "He is not a Jew, for he does not admit of circumcision; he is not a Gentile, for he preaches against the worship of the gods. He is setting up a worship of his own, in opposition to all laws, and persuading many people to join with him. He is therefore a most dangerous man, and should be put to death."

MATTHEW HENRY

1. He shows himself very ready to do the part of a judge in any matter that it was proper for him to take cognizance of. He said to the Jews, "If it were a matter of wrong, or wicked lewdness, I should think myself bound to bear with you." It is the duty of magistrates to right the injured, and to animadvert upon the injurious; and if the complaint be not made with all the decorum that might be, yet they should hear it out.

2. He will by no means allow them to make a complaint to him of a thing that was not within his jurisdiction (v. 15): "If it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look you to it; I will be no judge of such matters." And therefore he drove them from the judgment-seat (v. 16). Here was something right in Gallio's conduct, and praiseworthy—that he would not pretend to judge of things he did not understand; that he left the Jews to themselves in matters relating to their own religion, would not himself be the tool of their malice. It was certainly wrong to speak so slightly of a law and religion which he might have known to be of God, and with which he ought to have acquainted himself. He speaks as if he boasted of his ignorance of the scriptures, as if it were below him to take notice of the law of God.

III. The abuse done to Sosthenes, and Gallio's unconcernedness in it, v. 17. The parties put a great contempt upon the court, when they took Sosthenes and beat him before the judgment-seat. Many conjectures there are concerning this matter, because it is uncertain who this Sosthenes was, and who the Greeks were that abused him. It seems most probable that Sosthenes was a Christian. It is certain that there was one Sosthenes that was a friend of Paul, and well known at Corinth; Paul calls him his brother, and joins him with himself in his first epistle to the church at Corinth (1 Cor. i. 1). He is said to be a ruler of the synagogue. As for the Greeks that abused him, it is very probable that they were those that joined with the Jews in opposing the gospel (v. 4, 6). They were so enraged against Paul that they beat Sosthenes; and so enraged against Gallio, that they beat him before the judgment-seat, whereby they tell him that they cared not for him, if he would not be their executioner, they would be their own judges. The court put no less a contempt upon the cause, and the persons too. But Gallio cared for none of these things. If by this he meant that he cared not for the affronts of bad men, it was commendable. But, if it be meant that he concerned not himself for the abuses done to good men, it carries his indifference too far. Gallio, as a judge, ought to have protected Sosthenes, and restrained and punished the Greeks that assaulted him. Those that see and hear of the sufferings of God's people, and have no sympathy with them, nor concern for them, it being all one to them whether the interests of religion sink or swim, are of the spirit of Gallio here, who, when a good man was abused before his face, cared for none of these things.

We have here Paul in motion, as we have had him at Corinth for sometime at rest, but in both busy, very busy.

I. Paul's departure from Corinth, v. 18. 1. He did not go away till sometime after the trouble he met with there; from other places he had departed when the storm arose, but not from Corinth, because there it had no sooner risen than it fell again. After this he tarried there yet a good while, v. 11. While he found he laboured not in vain, he continued labouring. 2. When he went, he took leave of the brethren, solemnly, and with much affection. 3. He took with him Priscilla and Aquila. They seemed disposed to remove, and not inclined to stay long at a place, a disposition which may arise from a good principle, and have good effects, and therefore ought not to be condemned in others, though it ought to be suspected in ourselves. 4. At Cenchrea, the port where those that went to sea from Corinth took ship, either Paul or Aquila (for the original does not determine which) had his head shaved, to discharge himself from the vow of a Nazarite: Having shorn his head at Cenchrea; for he had a vow. Those that lived in Judæa were, in such a case, bound to do it at the temple: but those who lived in other countries might do it in other places. I see no harm in admitting it concerning Paul, in compliance for a time with the Jews, to whom he became as a Jew (1 Cor. ix. 20), that he might win upon them.

II. Paul's calling at Ephesus, which was the metropolis of the Lesser Asia. 1. There he left Aquila and Priscilla. They might be serviceable to the interests of the gospel at Ephesus. Paul intended shortly to settle there for some time. Aquila and Priscilla if it be a question of words and names, and of your law . . . I will be no judge . . .—in this only laying down the proper limits of his office. drave them . . .—annoyed at such a case.

If it were a matter of wrong or wicked lewdness—any offense punishable by the magistrate.

all the Greeks—the Gentile spectators. took Sosthenes—perhaps the successor of Crispus, and certainly the head of the accusing party. It is very improbable that this was the same Sosthenes as the apostle afterwards calls "his brother" (I Cor. 1:1). and beat him before the judgment-seat—under the very eye of the judge.

And Gallio cared for none of those things—nothing loath, perhaps, to see these turbulent Jews, for whom probably he felt contempt, themselves getting what they hoped to inflict on another, and indifferent to whatever was beyond the range of his office and case. His brother eulogizes his loving and lovable manners. Religious indifference, under the influence of an easy and amiable temper, reappears from age to age.

18. Paul . . . tarried . . . yet a good while—During his long residence at Corinth, Paul planted other churches in Achaia (II Cor. 1:1). then took . . . leave of the brethren, and sailed . . . into—rather, 'for'—Syria—to Antioch, the starting point of all the missions to the Gentiles, which he feels to be for the present concluded. with him Priscilla and Aquila—In this order the names also occur in vs. 26 (according to the true reading); cf. Rom. 16: 3 and II Tim. 4:19, which seem to imply that the wife was the more prominent and helpful to the Church. Silas and Timotheus doubtless accompanied the apostle, as also Erastus, Gaius, and Aristarchus (ch. 19:22, 29). Of Silas, as Paul's associate, we read no more. His name occurs last in connection with Peter and the churches of Asia Minor [WEBTER and WILKINSON]. having shorn his head in Cenchrea—the eastern harbor of Corinth, about ten miles distant, where a church had been formed (Rom. 16:1). for he—Paul—had a vow—That it was the Nazarite vow (Num. 6) is not likely. It was probably one made in one of his seasons of difficulty or danger, in prosecution of which he cuts off his hair and hastens to Jerusalem to offer the requisite sacrifice within the prescribed thirty days (JOSEPHUS, Jewish War, 2. 15. 1). This explains the haste with which he leaves Ephesus (vs. 21), and the subsequent observance, on the recommendation of the brethren, of a similar vow (ch. 21:24). This one at Corinth was voluntary, and shows that even in heathen countries he systematically studied the prejudices of his Jewish brethren. 19. he came to Ephesus—the capital of the Roman province of Asia. (See Introduction to Epistle to Ephesians.) It was a sail, right across from the west to the east side of the Ægean Sea, of some eight or ten days, with a fair wind. left them—Aquila and Priscilla

14. Paul was now about to open his mouth. He was about to enter on his defense; but Gallio, perceiving that the prosecution was through envy and malice, would not put Paul to any further trouble, but determined the matter as follows. If it were a matter of wrong. Of "injustice"; anything contrary to the rights of the subject. Or wicked lewdness. "Destructive mischief." Reason would that I should bear with you. "According to reason, or the merit of the case, I should patiently hear you."

15. But if it be a question of words. Concerning "doctrine" and names—whether the person called Jesus be the Person you call the Messiah. And of your law—any particular nicety concerning that law which is peculiar to yourselves. Look ye to it—settle the business among yourselves; the Roman government does not meddle with such matters; and I will not take upon me to decide in a case that does not concern my office.

16. And he drave them from the judgment seat. He saw that their accusation was both frivolous and vexatious, and he ordered them to depart, and the assembly to disperse. The word which we translate he drave does not signify here any act of violence on the part of Gallio or the Roman officers, but simply an authoritative dismission.

17. Then all the Greeks took Sosthenes. As this man is termed the chief ruler of the synagogue, it is probable that he had lately succeeded Crispus in that office (see v. 8); and that he was known either to have embraced Christianity or to have favored the cause of Paul. He is supposed to be the same person whom Paul associates with himself in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, chap. i. 1. But why should the Greeks beat Sosthenes? I have in the above note proceeded on the supposition that this outrage was committed by the Jews; and my reason for it is this: The Greeks is omitted by several MSS., and it is much more likely that the Jews beat one of their own rulers through envy at his conversion than that the Greeks should do so. And Gallio cared for none of those things. "And Gallio did not concern himself," did not intermeddle with any of these things. It is not very likely, however, that Gallio saw this outrage; for, though it was before the judgment seat, it probably did not take place till Gallio had left the court; and though he might be told of it, he left the matter to the lictors and would not interfere. The conduct of Gallio has been, in this case, greatly censured, and I think with manifest injustice. In the business brought before his tribunal, no man could have followed a more prudent or equitable course. His whole conduct showed that it was his opinion that the civil magistrate had nothing to do with religious opinions or the concerns of conscience, in matters where the safety of the state was not implicated. He therefore refused to make the subject a matter of legal discussion.

18. And Paul . . . tarried there yet a good while. The persecuting Jews plainly saw from the manner in which the proconsul had conducted this business that they could have no hope of raising a state persecution against the apostles, and the laws provided so amply for the personal safety of every Roman citizen that they were afraid to proceed any further in their violence. It could not be unknown that Paul was possessed of the right of Roman citizenship, and therefore his person was sacred as long as he did nothing contrary to the laws. Having shorn his head in Cenchrea. But who was it that had shorn his head? Paul or Aquila? Some think the latter, who had bound himself by the Nazarite vow, probably before he became a Christian; and being under that vow, his conscience would not permit him to disregard it. There is nothing in the text that absolutely obliges us to understand this action as belonging to Paul. It seems to have been the act of Aquila alone; and therefore both Paul and Priscilla are mentioned before Aquila; and it is natural to refer the vow to the latter. Yet there are certainly some weighty reasons why the vow should be referred to Paul, and not to Aquila; I cannot help leaning to the latter opinion. Cenchrea. This was a port on the east side of the isthmus of Corinth, opposite to the Lecheum, which was the other port on the west. might dispose the minds of many to give Paul, when he should come among them, a favourable reception. 2. There he preached to the Jews in their synagogue. He entered into the synagogue, not as a hearer, but as a preacher, for there he reasoned with the Jews. Though he had abandoned the Jews at Corinth, he did not, for their sakes, decline the synagogues of the Jews in other places, but still made the first offer of the gospel to them. We must not condemn a whole body or denomination of men, for the sake of some that conduct themselves ill. 3. The Jews at Ephesus courted his stay with them (v. 20): They desired him to tarry longer with them. These were more noble, and better bred, than those Jews at Corinth, and it was a sign that God had not quite cast away his people, but had a remnant among them. 4. Paul would not stay with them now: He consented not; but bade them farewell. He must by all means keep this feast at Jerusalem. Which of the feasts it was we are not told. 5. He intimated his purpose, after this journey, to come and spend some time at Ephesus. It is good to have opportunities in reserve, when one good work is over to have another to apply ourselves to: I will return again to you, but he inserts that necessary proviso, if God will. Our times are in God's hand; we purpose, but he disposes; and therefore we must make all our promises with submission to the will of God.
