The apostle then quoted Isaiah 40:13, which shows that God is the sole Designer of His wise plan. No one knows His mind or gives Him advice. This is followed by a free quotation from Job

41:11, which testifies to God's sole responsibility for His acts. God is indeed the Sovereign of all things, the One to whom all creatures are accountable and whom all should glorify. He is under no obligation to repay anyone, for no one has ever given Him anything. Paul concluded, For from Him and through Him and to Him are all things. God is the first Cause, the effective Cause, and the final Cause of everything. His deep ways are beyond man's discovering (Rom. 11:33); beyond man's knowing (v. 34a), beyond man's counseling (v. 34b), and beyond man's giving (v. 35). "All things" come from Him and by means of Him (John 1:3; Col. 1:16a; Rev. 4:11) and are for Him and His glory (Col. 1:16b). Therefore, To Him be the glory forever! Amen (cf. Rom. 15:6; 16:27; 1 Peter 4:11; Rev. 5:12-13). God is the only proper One to magnify (1 Cor. 1:31). The all-sovereign God deserves the praise of all His creatures.

VI. God's Righteousness Revealed in Transformed Living (12:1–15:13)

Paul divided several of his letters into two major sections, a doctrinal portion and a practical one. He followed that pattern in this epistle too, though the doctrinal part is more than twice as long as the practical. (In both Eph. and Col. the doctrinal and the practical sections are about equal in length.)

A. The basic consecration (12:1-2)

12:1-2. The start of this practical section is indicated by Paul's exhortation I urge (the first word of v. 1 in the Gr. text). Therefore also shows a transition (cf. "therefore" in 3:20; 5:1; 8:1). The basis of Paul's exhortation is God's mercy (oiktirmōn, rendered "compassion" in 2 Cor. 1:3; Phil. 2:1; Col. 3:12, and "mercy" in Heb. 10:28). God's compassion has been described in detail in the first 11 chapters of Romans. The content of Paul's urging is to offer your bodies (cf. Rom. 6:13) as living sacrifices. A Christian's body is the temple of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 6:19-20). In the KJV "offer" is translated "present" (Rom. 12:1) and "yield" (6:13, 16, 19). The word "bodies," mindful of the Old Testament sacrifices, represents the totality of one's life and activities, of which his body is the vehicle of expression. In contrast with Old Testament sacrifices this is a "living" sacrifice. Such an offering is holy (set apart) and pleasing (cf. "pleasing" in 12:2) to God. Furthermore, it is spiritual (logikēn; cf. 1 Peter 2:2) worship (latreian). Latreian refers to any ministry performed for God, such as that of the priests and the Levites. Christians are believer-priests, identified with the great High Priest, the Lord Jesus Christ (cf. Heb. 7:23-28; 1 Peter 2:5, 9; Rev. 1:6). A believer's offering of his total life as a sacrifice to God is therefore sacred service. In the light of Paul's closely reasoned and finely argued exposition of the mercies of God (Rom. 1–11), such an offering is obviously a desirable response for believers.

Paul then stated general implications of a believer's offering his life to God as a sacrifice. Such an offering represents a complete change in lifestyle, involving both a negative and a positive aspect. First, Paul commanded, Do not conform (lit., "Do not be conformed"; this Gr. word occurs elsewhere in the NT only in 1 Peter 1:14) any longer to the pattern of this world (aiōni, "Age"). Living according to the lifestyle of "the present evil Age" (Gal. 1:4; cf. Eph. 1:21) must now be put aside. Then Paul commanded, But be transformed (pres. passive imper., "keep on being transformed") by the renewing of your mind. The Greek verb translated "transformed" (metamorphousthe) is seen in the English word "metamorphosis," a total change from inside out (cf. 2 Cor. 3:18). The key to this change is the "mind" (noos), the control center of one's attitudes, thoughts, feelings, and actions (cf. Eph. 4:22-23). As one's mind keeps on being made new by the spiritual input of God's Word, prayer, and Christian fellowship, his lifestyle keeps on being transformed.

Paul added, Then you will be able to test and approve (dokimazein, "prove by testing" [1 Peter 1:7, "proved genuine"], i.e., ascertain) what God's will is—His good, pleasing (cf. Rom. 12:1), and perfect will. These three qualities are not attributes of God's will as the NIV and some other translations imply. Rather, Paul said that God's will itself is what is good, well-pleasing (to Him), and perfect. "Good," for example, is not an adjective (God's "good" will) but a noun (God's will is what is good—good, i.e., for each believer).

As a Christian is transformed in his mind and is made more like Christ, he comes to approve and desire God's will, not his own will for his life. Then he discovers that God's will is what is good for him, and that it pleases God, and is complete in every way. It is all he needs. But only by being renewed spiritually can a believer ascertain, do, and enjoy the will of God.

B. In Christian ministry (12:3-8)

12:3-5. A believer's consecration to God and his transformed lifestyle is demonstrated in his exercising his spiritual gifts in the body of Christ. As an apostle of Christ (by the grace given me; cf. 1:5; 15:15-16) he warned his readers individually (every one of you), Do not think of yourself more highly (hyperphronein, "think higher") than you ought. An inflated view of oneself is out of place in the Christian life. Then Paul encouraged them, But rather think (phronein) of yourself with sober judgment (sōphronein, "sound thinking"), in accordance with the measure of faith God has given you. God has given each believer some faith by which to serve Him. By his involved word play on various forms of the verb phroneō, "to think," Paul emphasized that human pride is wrong (cf. 3:27; 11:18, 20) partly because all natural abilities and spiritual gifts are from God. As a result every Christian should have a proper sense of humility and an awareness of his need to be involved with other members of Christ's body. As Paul explained, a parallelism exists between a believer's physical body which has parts with differing functions and the community of believers in Christ as a spiritual body (cf. 1 Cor. 12:12-27; Eph. 4:11-12, 15-16). The point is that each member functions to serve the body, not the body to serve the members. The diversity of the many accompanies the unity of the body. Therefore it is important to think soundly about oneself and to evaluate properly God's gifts and their uses.

12:6-8. Paul then applied what he had just said (vv. 3-5) to the exercise of God-given abilities for spiritual service (vv. 6-8). He built on the principle, We have different gifts (cf. v. 4, "not all have the same function"; cf. 1 Cor. 12:4). The grace-gifts (charismata) are according to God's grace (charis). He listed seven gifts, none of which—with the possible exception of prophesying—is a sign gift. The Greek text is much more abrupt than any English translation; let him is supplied for smoother English. One's "prophesying" is to be done in proportion to his faith; a better translation would be "in agreement to the (not 'his') faith." That is, prophesying—communicating God's message, to strengthen, encourage, and comfort (1 Cor. 14:3)—is to be in right relationship to the body of truth already revealed (cf. "faith" as doctrine in Gal. 1:23; Jude 3, 20). The other six gifts mentioned here are serving . . . teaching . . . encouraging . . . contributing . . . leadership, and showing mercy. Contributing to people's needs is to be done with generosity (en haplotēti), not skimpily (cf. 2 Cor. 8:2; 9:11, 13). Managing, leading, or administering (proistamenos, lit., "standing before"; cf. proistamenous, "who are over," 1 Thes. 5:12) is to be done diligently (en spoudē, "in eagerness, earnestness"), not lazily or halfheartedly. And bestowing mercy is to be done cheerfully (en hilarotēti, "in gladness"), not with sadness. Three of these seven gifts are mentioned in 1 Corinthians 12:28 (prophets, teachers, administration); two (prophets and pastor-teachers) are included in Ephesians 4:11; and two (administering and serving) are listed in 1 Peter 4:10-11. Whatever one's gift, he should exercise it faithfully as a stewardship from God.

C. In social relationships (12:9-21)

This section consists of a lengthy series of short exhortations or commands. The statements relate to a Christian's relationships to other people, both saved and unsaved.

12:9-10. Paul began these specific exhortations with the key ingredient for success: Love must be sincere. This is God's love, which has been ministered to believers by the Holy Spirit (5:5) and must be ministered by them to others in the Holy Spirit's power. "Sincere" translates anypokritos (lit., "without hypocrisy"), also used of love (2 Cor. 6:6; 1 Peter 1:22), of faith (1 Tim. 1:5; 2 Tim. 1:5), and of wisdom (James 3:17).

This first command is followed by a pair of related basic commands—Hate what is evil; cling to what is good. Many Bible students consider these two clauses as explanatory of the sincerity of love, translating the verse, "Let love be unfeigned, abhorring the evil and cleaving to the good." Hating various forms of sin is frequently mentioned in Scripture (Pss. 97:10; 119:104, 128, 163; Prov. 8:13; 13:5; 28:16; Heb. 1:9; Rev. 2:6). Turning from evil is to accompany adhering to the good (cf. 1 Peter 3:11).

Divine love is to be exercised with other believers. The Greek adjective philostorgoi, translated devoted, suggests family affection. As in Romans 12:9, the second clause in verse 10 can be understood as explaining the first command. Verse 10 may be translated, "With brotherly love have family affection for one another, in honor giving place to one another" (cf. Phil. 2:3, "consider others better than yourselves").

12:11-12. Paul then provided a series of exhortations concerning a believer's personal attitudes, attitudes that will make him more attractive to others. In verse 11 the key thought is the last clause—serving (douleuontes; diakonian in v. 7 is trans. "serving") the Lord—and the first two clauses explain how a believer is to serve as the Lord's "slave" (doulos; cf. 1:1): never . . . lacking ("not shrinking, not hesitating, not being lazy") in zeal (en spoudē, "diligence," rendered "diligently" in 12:8), and being fervent in spirit. Keep your spiritual fervor is literally, "being fervent, or boiling (zeontes, used only here and in Acts 18:25 of Apollos) in the spirit" (either the Holy Spirit or one's inner life). These two commands also balance each other as negative and positive commands (cf. Rom. 12:9). As believers serve God as His slaves they should be enthusiastic and diligent.

The three exhortations in verse 12 can be understood either as independent items or as additional descriptions of how believers should serve the Lord. They are to be joyful in hope, because their hope in Christ is the basis of their rejoicing (5:2-5; 1 Peter 1:6-9). In affliction (thlipsei, "distress, trouble, pressure"; cf. Rom. 8:35) believers are to be patient (hypomenontes, "being steadfast, having endurance"; cf. 5:3). Also Christians should continue in prayer to God for wisdom, guidance, and strength (cf. 1 Thes. 5:17). Being faithful, NIV's translation of proskarterountes, should be rendered "persisting in" or "devoted to" (cf. Acts 1:14; 2:42; Col. 4:2).

12:13. Returning to Christians' responsibilities to other believers, Paul exhorted them, Share with God's people who are in need (lit.,"sharing [koinōnountes, 'having in common'] the needs of the saints"). This characterized the Jerusalem church (Acts 2:44-45; 4:32, 34-37). This concern also motivated the church in Antioch (Acts 11:27-30) and the Apostle Paul (1 Cor. 16:1-4; 2 Cor. 8–9; Rom. 15:25-27) to give to the church in Jerusalem. In the same vein the apostle commanded, Practice hospitality (lit., "pursuing friendliness to strangers"). Both ministries, meeting needs and being hospitable, involve helping others.

12:14-16. Paul's exhortations in this section relate to a believer's reactions to the actions and emotions of others, whether Christians or not. The hatred displayed in persecution usually evokes response in kind, but Paul commanded, Bless those who persecute you; bless and do not curse (cf. Matt. 5:44). Perhaps Paul thought of Stephen (Acts 7:59-60) and of Jesus Christ (Luke 23:34). They both modeled these words and responded to persecution even to death by praying for God's forgiveness of their persecutors.

Christians should be able to empathize with others, both believers and unbelievers. Paul commanded, Rejoice with those who rejoice; mourn with those who mourn. Related to this is the next command, Live in harmony with one another (lit., "having the same attitude toward one another"; cf. Rom. 15:5; Phil. 2:2; 1 Peter 3:8). Being in harmony with other Christians is basic to being able to empathize with them. This idea is then presented in negative and positive details: Do not be proud (lit., "not thinking highly" of yourself; cf. Rom. 11:20; 12:3) and be willing to associate with people of low position (cf. James 2:1-9). These orders are summarized in the command, Do not be conceited (lit., "Do not become wise concerning themselves"; cf. Prov. 3:7; Rom. 11:25), an attitude that makes empathy impossible.

relationships with unbelievers, speaking as they do of those who do evil toward believers (v. 17) and are the "enemy" of believers (v. 20). The Old Testament principle of justice was "eye for eye" (Ex. 21:24), but Paul commanded, Do not repay anyone evil for evil (cf. 1 Peter 3:9). On the positive side Christians are to do what is right (kala, "beautiful," used here in the ethical sense of good, noble, and honorable). Paul then commanded believers, Live at peace with everyone (cf. "live in harmony with one another," Rom. 12:16). But recognizing that limits exist, Paul included the words, If it is possible, as far as it depends on you. Harmony with others may not always be achievable, but believers should not be responsible for that lack of peace (cf. Matt. 5:9).

12:19-21. Referring again to the negative (cf. v. 17a) Paul then exhorted his readers not to take revenge after they are misused. Instead they should leave room for God's wrath (lit., "for the wrath"), because God has promised to avenge His people: It is Mine to avenge, I will repay (Deut. 32:35; cf. Heb. 10:30). David's refusal to kill Saul on two occasions when it seemed that God had delivered Saul into David's hands is a classic biblical example of this principle. In light of God's promise to execute vengeance, a Christian should therefore feed his enemy and quench his thirst—in short, respond to his evil with Christian love. Heaping burning coals on his head, along with the first part of Romans 12:20, is a quotation from Proverbs 25:21-22. The coals on the head may refer to a ritual in Egypt in which a person showed his repentance by carrying a pan of burning charcoal on his head. Helping rather than cursing an enemy may cause him to be ashamed and penitent. As Paul summarized, Do not be overcome by evil, giving in to the temptation to retaliate, but overcome evil with good (cf. Matt. 5:44, "love your enemies"). Again positive and negative commands are put together (cf. Rom. 12:9, 11, 16-20).

D. In relation to authority (13:1-7)

13:1-3. Rome was the imperial capital, the seat of the empire's civil government. As residents in Rome, Paul's initial readers were aware of both the glory and the shame of that city in the days of Nero, who reigned from A.D. 54 to 68. But they were also citizens of Christ's kingdom (Phil. 3:20; Col. 1:13). Appropriately, therefore, Paul discussed a Christian's relationship to his government and civil rulers. Both in its length and specific details this discussion is the key New Testament passage on the subject (cf. 1 Tim. 2:1-4; Titus 3:1; 1 Peter 2:13-17).

The apostle's basic exhortation is, Everyone must submit himself to the governing authorities (lit., "higher authorities"). The basic reason for such submission is that those authorities are established by God (cf. Dan. 4:17, 25, 34-35). An individual who rebels against the authority, therefore, is rebelling against (lit., "has taken a stand against") what God has instituted (lit., "the ordinance of God"). Such persons are thus actually rebelling against God, and bring civil and/or divine judgment on themselves. Those who obey and do right need have no fear of authorities; in fact, civil leaders commend those who do good.

13:4-5. Furthermore, a civil leader is God's servant, a concept often forgotten today. By commending those who do right (v. 3), a civil leader himself does good (v. 4). But on the other hand he bears arms (the sword) as God's servant (the second time in this verse Paul referred to the ruler this way; cf. v. 6), as an agent of wrath. Governmental force, properly used, helps prevent tyranny and executes justice; it brings punishment on the wrongdoer. A Christian has two reasons to be submissive to civil authorities—to avoid possible punishment (lit., "the wrath") and to heed his conscience, which prods him to obey God's ordinances.

13:6-7. A Christian's responsibility to civil authorities involves more than obedience (vv. 1, 5). It also includes support by paying taxes (cf. Matt. 22:21). This is because the leaders, as God's servants (cf. Rom. 13:4), are supposed to give their full time to governing and need support through taxes from citizens, Christians included. So a Christian ought to give everyone what he owes him (lit., "repay everyone his dues"), whether substance (taxes and revenue) or respect and honor.

E. In light of the future (13:8-14)

13:8-10. Discussion of believers' obligations to civil authorities evidently triggered Paul's thinking concerning believers' debts to others. He commanded, Let no debt remain outstanding (lit., "Do not keep on owing anyone anything") except the continuing debt to love one another (lit., "except loving one another"). This is not a prohibition against a proper use of credit; it is an underscoring of a Christian's obligation to express divine love in all interpersonal relationships. A Christian should never fall short, and so be "in debt," in loving others (John 13:34-35; 1 Cor. 16:14; Eph. 5:2; Col. 3:14; 1 John 3:14, 23; 4:7, 11, 21).

The importance of continually showing love is seen in the explanation, For he who loves his fellow man (lit., "the other one") has fulfilled the Law (cf. Matt. 22:39; Mark 12:31). Love, not mere external conformity to rules, is the essence of the Law (cf. Gal. 5:14).

Paul then quoted various specific commands from the social section of the Ten Commandments. These prohibitions—not to commit adultery . . . murder . . . steal and covet—are the 7th, 6th, 8th, and 10th commandments, in that order (Ex. 20:13-15, 17). Paul summed up that entire section of the Law by quoting Leviticus 19:18. The Jewish Rabbis and the Lord Jesus summarized the social section of the Law in the same words (cf. Matt. 22:39). Paul then expressed this principle in other words, Love does no harm (lit., "Love does not keep on working evil") to its neighbor, and then he repeated (cf. Rom. 13:8) his basic assertion that love fulfills the Mosaic Law. Only in Christ can a person meet this or any of the other requirements of the Law (8:4).

13:11. Expressing divine love is a Christian's constant responsibility, but it is especially crucial in understanding the present time (lit., "knowing the season"). Paul was not referring to time in general but to the end-time and to the imminent return of the Lord Jesus. It is a time, therefore, for spiritual vigilance and industriousness: wake up from your (some mss. have "our," which conforms to the context) slumber (cf. Eph. 5:14; 1 Peter 5:8). This need for alertness is because our salvation (ultimate or final salvation realized at the return of the Savior; cf. Rom. 8:23; Heb. 9:28; 1 Peter 1:5) is nearer now than when we first believed (cf. James 5:8). Each passing day in the faith brings final salvation and deliverance closer.

13:12. Paul considered the time of Christ's return and the consummation of salvation for believers (v. 11) as the start of a new day. The present time, while Christ is absent (John 14:2-3; Acts 1:11) and Satan is at work (2 Cor. 4:4; Eph. 2:2), is described as the night (cf. 2 Peter 1:19). Since "the day" is almost here, Paul urged his readers to put aside the deeds of darkness and put on the armor of light. Christians are soldiers in a conflict who need to be alert and equipped for battle (Eph. 6:10-17; 1 Thes. 5:8). Upright, Christ-honoring living is often referred to as being in the light (John 12:36; Eph. 5:8, 14; Col. 1:12; 1 Thes. 5:5; 1 John 1:7; 2:10).

13:13-14. In verse 13 Paul repeated his exhortation of verse 12, changing the figure from warfare to lifestyle. He charged, Let us behave decently, as in the daytime (lit., "day"). Crime, violence, and wickedness are associated with darkness and the night (John 1:5; 3:19-20; 8:12; 12:35, 46; Eph. 5:8, 11; 6:12; 1 Thes. 5:7; 1 Peter 2:9; 1 John 1:5-6; 2:9, 11). Perhaps this contrast was suggested to Paul by his phrase "deeds of darkness" (Rom. 13:12). At any rate the activities and attitudes he listed—orgies and drunkenness . . . sexual immorality and debauchery . . . dissension and jealousy (cf. Gal. 5:19-21)—are certainly "deeds of darkness." It is interesting that Paul linked jealousy with immorality. Such actions and attitudes have no place in a Christian's life. He belongs to "the light"; these deeds and thoughts belong to the darkness.

A Christian's lifestyle must be pure and holy, especially in view of Christ's approaching return (cf. Rom. 13:11-12; 1 John 3:3). The secret to living chaste lives is for Christians to clothe themselves with the Lord Jesus Christ (cf. "put on," Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10). At salvation they were "clothed with Christ" (Gal. 3:27), so they should conduct themselves accordingly. Also the secret includes not thinking about how to gratify the desires of the sinful nature (lit., "and do not make forethought [pronoian] for the flesh [sarkos; cf. Rom.

8:3-5, 8-9, 12-13] for lusts"). For a Christian to plan out specific ways to gratify his sinful nature is wrong and out of bounds.

F. In dealing with other Christians (14:1–15:13)

Paul had discussed various aspects of a Christian's responsibilities in interpersonal relationships (12:9-21; 13:8-10), but relationships with other believers loom large and involve special problems that require discussion. Harmonious relationships within the family of God are important.

1. WITHOUT JUDGING (14:1-12)

Christians are at different levels of spiritual maturity. They also have diverse backgrounds that color their attitudes and practices. The first lesson to learn in living harmoniously with other Christians, therefore, is to stop judging others.

14:1-4. The focus in these verses is on him whose faith is weak (lit., "the one being weak in faith"), which appears in the emphatic first position in the sentence. Paul commanded believers to accept (pres. middle imper., "keep on taking to yourselves"; cf. 15:7) such a person, without passing judgment on disputable matters (lit., "but not unto quarrels about opinions"). A believer with certain scruples is not to be welcomed into the fellowship with the intent of changing his views or opinions by quarreling with him about them.

One area of differing scruples pertains to food, in particular the eating of meat. One man's faith allows him to eat everything, but another man, whose faith is weak, eats only vegetables (lit., "but the one being weak eats vegetables"). The reason some Christians then were vegetarians is not stated. Since the issue is related to their Christian faith, it could be to insure against eating meat offered to idols (cf. 1 Cor. 8; 10:23-30). The reason for a believer's scruple is not the point, however; its existence alongside a differing opinion was Paul's concern.

In such a situation neither believer should judge the other. Look down on (exoutheneitō; also used in Rom. 14:10) should be translated "despise" or "reject with contempt" (cf. "treat . . . with contempt," Gal. 4:14; 1 Thes. 5:20). The reason a "strong" Christian (cf. Rom. 15:1) should not despise a "weak" one, and the reason that a weak Christian should not condemn (krinetō) the strong one is that God has accepted (same verb as in 14:1) both of them. (Another reason for not downgrading others is given later in v. 10.) As a believer, he is a servant of God and he is accountable to God, his Judge. Any Christian tempted to judge another believer must face Paul's question, Who are you to judge (lit., "the one judging") someone else's servant? (Oiketēn, "domestic servant," is not the usual word doulos, "slave.") The present participle, "the one judging," suggests that Paul sensed some judging of others was occurring among the Christians at Rome. But such criticizing is wrong because a domestic servant should be evaluated by his . . . master, not by fellow believers. Therefore, Paul concluded, And he will stand (lit., "he shall be made to stand"), for the Lord is able to make him stand. Even if a believer despises the scruples of another Christian, God can defend the second person.

14:5-8. A second area of differing opinions was the significance of special days. One man considers one day more sacred than another; another man considers every day alike (cf. Col. 2:16). Which position a person held meant nothing to the apostle. His concern was that each one should be fully convinced in his own mind (cf. Rom. 14:14, 22), examining his heart to be sure he is doing what he feels the Lord would have him do. And he should hold his opinion to the Lord. This is true for any issue where an honest difference of opinion among Christians exists, whether in keeping or not keeping special days or eating or abstaining from meat, or in other matters not prohibited by Scripture. All belongs to the Lord and is sanctioned by Him (1 Cor. 10:25-27; 1 Tim. 4:3-5). A believer's individual accountability to the Lord in every area and experience of life is paramount. Each Christian in both life and death is seen by the Lord, and is accountable to Him, not to other Christians. So whether we live or die, we belong to the Lord.

14:9-12. In these verses Paul stated the theological basis for his exhortation for Christians to desist from and to resist judging one another. One of the reasons for the Lord Jesus' redemptive death and resurrection is to be the Lord of both the dead and the living. Since Jesus is the Lord, Christians should not judge (krineis) or . . . look down on (exoutheneis, "despise" or "reject with contempt"; cf. v. 3) one another, their brothers, in such matters. One Christian is not above another as his judge; all are equally under Christ, the Judge.

As Lord, Jesus will one day review and evaluate the ministry of His servants at His judgment seat (bēma; see comments on 2 Cor. 5:10). Paul affirmed the certainty of this event by quoting Isaiah 49:18 and 45:23, pertaining to everyone standing before Christ and confessing Him as Lord (cf. Phil. 2:10-11). At that event each believer will give an account (lit., "a word") of himself to God. Since Paul was writing to the Christians in Rome (Rom. 1:7) and included himself with them in the first personal plural pronoun and verb ("we will all stand," 14:10), "God's judgment seat" is only for believers in the Lord. What is here called God's judgment seat is the judgment seat of Christ in 2 Corinthians 5:10. Because God judges through His Son (John 5:22, 27), this judgment seat can be said to belong to both the Father and the Son. The issue of the believer's eternal destiny will not be at stake; that was settled by his faith in Christ (cf. Rom. 8:1). Each believer's life of service will be under review in which some loss will be experienced (cf. 1 Cor. 3:12-15), but he will be rewarded for what endures (cf. 1 Cor. 4:4-5). This judgment of believers climactically demonstrates God's lordship.

Paul's warning against judging relates to Christians' attitudes and actions toward the convictions of other believers (vv. 1-12). The other side of the coin is evaluating the impact of one's own convictions and actions on other Christians. In this section Paul warned against causing other Christians to stumble (hindering their spiritual growth) by asserting that one is free to live in accord with convictions not shared by other believers.

14:13-14. Paul's opening sentence is both the final charge on the previous subject and the introduction to the new one: Therefore, let us stop passing judgment on (krinōmen, "condemning") one another (pres. tense subjunctive, "no longer let us keep on judging or condemning one another"). Instead a Christian should judge himself and his actions so that he does not place a stumbling block (proskomma, lit., "something a person trips over"; cf. 1 Cor. 8:9 and comments on Rom. 14:20-21) or obstacle (skandalon, lit., "trap, snare," and hence "anything that leads another to sin"; cf. 16:17) in his brother's way (lit., "to the brother").

Returning to the subject of food (14:2-3, 6), Paul expressed his own conviction (cf. v. 5) as a Christian that no food (lit., "nothing") is unclean (koinon, "common") in itself (cf. Acts 10:15; Rom. 14:20; 1 Cor. 8:8). The problem, however, is that not all Christians—especially some from a Jewish heritage—shared Paul's conviction. Therefore Paul properly concluded, But if anyone regards (lit., "but to the one reckoning") something as unclean ("common"), then for him it is unclean (cf. Titus 1:15). But if someone persisted in holding that conviction, he could bring harm to others. That is the point Paul made next (Rom. 14:15-18).

14:15-18. How should a Christian whose convictions allow him to eat everything respond to one with scruples against certain foods? In Christian love he ought to forgo his liberty in Christ to avoid being a spiritual hindrance to his spiritual brother. If he persists in exercising his liberty so that his brother is distressed (lypeitai, "grieved, hurt"), Paul concluded, then the Christian exercising his liberty is no longer acting (lit., "walking") in love. Such persistence could cause the spiritual destruction of a brother for whom Christ died. Destroy renders the word apollye, which often means eternal ruin. Here it may mean temporal ruin; a Christian forced to act contrary to his scruples, even though more strict than necessary, may find himself ruined by his wounded conscience (cf. 1 Cor. 8:10-12). Persisting in one's freedom could also result in his Christian liberty (what you consider good) being blasphemed (spoken of as evil, blasphēmeisthō).

Such things should not happen. After all, food is not that important an issue (1 Cor. 8:8); it is not the sum and substance of the kingdom of God. But . . . righteousness (upright living), peace (cf. Rom. 12:16, 18; 14:19) and joy in (the sphere of) the Holy Spirit (cf. 15:13) are essentials of Christian fellowship and harmony. A concerned believer insists on right conduct, harmony, and joy rather than forcing his own lifestyle on others. As a result the Christian who serves (pres. participle, douleuōn, "who keeps on serving as a slave") Christ in this way—in Christian love, pursuing righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit—is pleasing (cf. 12:1; 15:1; Heb. 13:21) to God and approved by men (in contrast with being evil spoken of, Rom. 14:16).

14:19-21. Continuing his emphasis on not hindering another Christian's spiritual life, Paul urged his readers, Let us therefore make every effort (lit., "Let us keep on pursuing") to do what leads to peace (lit., "the things of peace"; cf. v. 17) and to mutual edification (lit., "and the things of building up one another"; cf. 15:2; 1 Thes. 5:11). To Paul food and one's personal convictions about it were not so important as the spiritual health of a fellow Christian and the work of God. Therefore it is wrong to insist on one's personal freedom in Christ concerning food (all food is clean; cf. Rom. 14:14, "no food is unclean") and drink if it causes someone else to stumble (proskommatos, "a stumbling block"; cf. vv. 13, 21). Meat or drink or anything else should be put aside if it causes a brother to fall (proskoptei, "stumble"; cf. proskomma, in vv. 13, 20). At times one's Christian liberty must be relinquished for the sake of others. As Paul wrote to the Corinthians, "Everything is permissible—but not everything is constructive" (1 Cor. 10:23). And "be careful . . . that the exercise of your freedom does not become a stumbling block to the weak" (1 Cor. 8:9).

14:22-23. Concerning personal convictions in areas where different views exist, Paul concluded, So whatever you believe about these things (lit., "The faith that you have," or "Do you have faith?") keep between yourself and God. A Christian must not insist on influencing a believer with tighter scruples to change his ways. It should be something "in his own mind" (v. 5), for he lives "to the Lord" (v. 8). Paul considered a Christian like himself who had a clear conscience on such matters blessed (lit., "happy"). On the other hand, a Christian who has doubts is condemned (perf. pass. verb, "stands condemned") if he eats. If a Christian eats food or does anything when he has doubts in his own mind as to whether it is right or wrong before God (one who is "weak" in faith, vv. 1-2), his action does not spring from (ek, "out of") his faith or trust in God and is therefore wrong. As Paul generalized, Everything that does not come from (ek, "out of") faith is sin. The principle is, "When in doubt, don't." The "strong" Christian (15:1) is wrong if he causes a weak brother to sin (by doing something while doubting, 14:20), and a weak brother (vv. 1-2) who goes against what he doubts also sins (v. 23).

3. AS IMITATORS OF CHRIST (15:1-13)

Paul had written that Christians should not despise or condemn others (14:1-12) nor should they hinder the conduct of other Christians (14:13-23). Now he gave a third principle to observe when a believer is dealing with fellow Christians: he is to follow the example of the Lord Jesus Christ. Jesus was supremely the Person who ministered on behalf of others, not for Himself. It is fitting, therefore, that those who take His name should imitate Him.

15:1-4. Paul summarized the previous discussion (chap. 14) by saying, We who are strong (obviously in convictions and conscience) ought (pres. tense, emphasizing continuing obligation; its first position in the sentence underscores its importance) to bear with the failings (lit., "infirmities, weaknesses") of the weak (lit., "nonstrong"). The strong ought not despise the weak; they ought to bear with them. Also the strong should not seek to please themselves. This last clause is the key; a Christian should not be self-centered, but should be concerned about the spiritual welfare of others. Pleasing others, however, is not the end in itself, but is for their good, to build them up (lit., "unto edification"; cf. "edification" in 14:19). This is the example the Lord Jesus Christ left. Even He did not please Himself. He came "to do the will" of the Father who sent Him (John 4:34) and to please Him (John 5:30; 8:29). To support this statement Paul quoted a part of a verse from a messianic psalm (Ps. 69:9).

Christ was insulted by others because of His associations with God the Father.

Then Paul stated a significant principle concerning the purpose and ministry of the Scriptures: For everything that was written in the past was written to teach us (lit., "for our instruction"). The Scriptures serve to give believers endurance (hypomonēs, "steadfastness in the face of adversities") and encouragement so that they might have hope (pres. tense, "keep on having hope"; cf. Rom. 5:3-5). As Christians learn from the past (what is written in the OT about others who did not please themselves) they are motivated to endure and be comforted in the present, looking ahead in hope (confidence) to the future.

15:5-6. The steadfast endurance and encouragement a Christian receives from the Scriptures (v. 4) come ultimately from God (v. 5), the Author of the Scriptures. Paul prayed that God would give his readers a spirit of unity (lit., "to think the same"; 12:16, "live in harmony," has the same Gr. construction) as they follow Christ Jesus (lit., "according to Christ Jesus"). The ultimate purpose of this unity was that with one heart and mouth (a unity of inward feeling and outward expression) they would glorify (pres. tense, "keep on glorifying") the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (2 Cor. 1:3; Eph. 1:3; 1 Peter 1:3 have the same wording about God). This is the final purpose of Christians individually and of the church corporately (cf. Rom. 15:7; 1 Cor. 6:20; 2 Thes. 1:12).

15:7. Since the goal of interpersonal relationships among Christians is a unified glorying of God, Paul concluded his commands with Accept one another (pres. imper., "keep on accepting or receiving one another"). Significantly this is the same command Paul gave the strong Christians when he opened this entire discussion (14:1). The Model of acceptance for Christians, however, is the Lord Jesus, who accepted us. The Lord received believers when they were not only "powerless" (5:6, lit., "weak") but also "ungodly" (5:6), "sinners" (5:8), and "enemies" (5:10). Certainly Christians can receive others who differ with them on nonessential matters. Jesus Christ received them so that they can bring praise to God (lit., "unto glory of God"), which is the purpose of Christian unity (15:6).

15:8-12. Having pointed to the Lord Jesus as the Model for Christians, Paul proceeded to discuss Jesus' ministry and its objectives: Christ became a servant (the word "deacon" comes from this Gr. noun diakonon) of the Jews (lit., "to the circumcision"). Jesus was born a Jew as God's Messiah for Israel. God had two objectives to accomplish through Jesus' ministry. The first was to confirm the promises made to the patriarchs (cf. 9:4-5). God's second objective in Christ's ministry was so that (lit., "and that," because the following clause is coordinate with the preceding one) the Gentiles may glorify God (cf. 15:6) for His mercy. God had made covenants only with Israel (9:4), not with the Gentiles (cf. Eph. 2:12), so God had no covenantal promises to confirm with the Gentiles. Any spiritual blessings that come to the Gentiles spring solely from the mercy of God. Nevertheless God eternally purposed to bless the Gentiles spiritually through the Lord Jesus as their Messiah and through His covenants with Israel (e.g., Gen. 12:3; cf. John 4:22).

God's two purposes in the ministry of Christ are being achieved now while Israel nationally has been set aside (cf. Rom. 11:1-31) and the church is being formed of both Jews and Gentiles (Eph. 2:14-22). And it will be achieved in the future when Israel is restored to her place as head of the nations and becomes a means of blessing to everyone (cf. Deut. 30:1-10).

To demonstrate the validity of his statement concerning the ministry of Christ and its purposes, particularly the one relating to Gentiles, the Apostle Paul quoted four Old Testament passages, introducing the series with the formula, As it is written (perf. tense, "it stands written"). Significantly these quotations are taken from all three divisions of the Old Testament—"the Law of Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms" (Luke 24:44)—and from three great Jewish heroes: Moses, David, and Isaiah. The first quotation (Rom. 15:9) is from David's song of deliverance (2 Sam. 22:50; Ps. 18:49); the second (Rom. 15:10), from Moses' valedictory song to the people of Israel (Deut. 32:43); the third (Rom. 15:11), from both the shortest and the middle chapter of the Bible (Ps. 117:1); and the fourth (Rom. 15:12), from Isaiah's messianic prophecy (Isa. 11:10).

A progression of thought can be traced through the four quotations. In the first, David praised God among the Gentiles (Rom. 15:9); in the second, Moses exhorted the Gentiles, Rejoice . . . with His people (v. 10); in the third the psalmist commanded the Gentiles to praise the Lord (v. 11; cf. v. 7); and in the fourth, Isaiah predicted that the Gentiles will live under the rule of the Root of Jesse (the Messiah) and they will hope in Him (v. 12). The Old Testament never presented the Gentiles as "heirs together with Israel, members together . . . in the promise in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 3:6), but it certainly did see them as receiving blessing from God's fulfilling His covenantal promises to His people Israel.

15:13. Several times Paul's words sound as if he were ending this epistle (vv. 13, 33; 16:20, 25-27). This verse (15:13) is in effect a benedictory prayer. The description of God as the God of hope relates to hope mentioned in the preceding verses and to the promises of God recorded in the Scripture which give hope (v. 4). Paul desired God to fill his readers with all joy and peace (cf. 14:17). Joy relates to the delight of anticipation in seeing one's hopes fulfilled. Peace results from the assurance that God will fulfill those hopes (cf. 5:1; Phil. 4:7). These are experienced as believers trust in Him (cf. Heb. 11:1). As a result believers overflow with hope by the power of the Holy Spirit (cf. Rom. 15:19). The achievement of all God's purposes for the spiritual welfare of His children comes from the power given by the Spirit of God. What a fitting closing reminder to the apostle's discussion of Christian living.

VII. Concluding Remarks (15:14–16:27)

Though all Paul's letters have closing remarks, he devoted more space to them in Romans than in any other epistle. This was due at least in part to the fact that he had never visited the city and its churches and to his desire to establish personal relationships with his readers. Another factor undoubtedly was his plan to visit Rome in the future.

A. Personal plans (15:14-33)

In writing to a group of people whom he had never met as a group, Paul showed admirable restraint in avoiding personal references to himself. Only once did he use himself as an example (7:7-25), and his other personal remarks are few (1:8-16; 9:1-3; 10:1-2; 11:1). Now as he closed his letter he felt led to discuss his philosophy of ministry and his plans in light of it.

15:14-16. Paul had demonstrated in this letter and elsewhere his ability to be straightforward, even almost blunt, and forceful. Yet he also had a deep concern for the feelings of others and an ability to use effective principles of interpersonal relations. This is seen in his statement, I myself am convinced (perf. tense, "I stand convinced"; cf. 8:38), my brothers, that you yourselves are full of goodness, complete in knowledge (perf. tense, "having been filled with all knowledge," not in the absolute sense, but in the sense that they had an understanding of the full scope of Christian truth), and competent (lit., "being able") to instruct (nouthetein, "to counsel, admonish"; cf. Col. 1:28; 3:16) one another. Paul did not have a low opinion of the Roman Christians; on the contrary he considered them spiritually informed and spiritually mature. Why then did he write on such basic Christian themes? Paul explained, I have written (past tense, "I wrote") you quite boldly on some points (lit., "in some measure") as if to remind you of them again. This was what Peter did as well (2 Peter 1:12; 3:1-2).

Paul was qualified to remind his readers of those points because he had his special position as a result of God's grace (cf. Rom. 1:5). He was a minister (leitourgon, a "public servant") to the Gentiles. This ministry was carried out as a priestly duty (the Gr. verb hierourgounta means "to work in sacred things") and involved his proclaiming the gospel of God (cf. 1:2-4). Because of his sharing the good news with Gentiles (11:13; Gal. 1:16; 2:2, 7-9; Eph. 3:8; Col. 1:27; 2 Tim. 4:17) they became an offering acceptable (the words to God are not in the text but are obviously understood), sanctified (perf. tense, "having been sanctified" or "having been set apart") by the Holy Spirit (cf. 1 Peter 1:2). Like a priest, Paul introduced Gentiles to God, and then presented them like an offering to the Lord. God's willingness to accept Gentiles, set apart by the work of the Holy Spirit, shows His plan in the Church Age is to unite Jews and Gentiles in one body (Eph. 3:6).

15:17-19. As a result of his special ministry by God's grace to the Gentiles, Paul affirmed, Therefore I glory (lit., "I have boasting") in Christ Jesus in my service to God (lit., "in the things relating to God"). This was no boasting in mere human achievements, as Paul explained: I will not venture to speak of anything except what Christ has accomplished through me in leading the Gentiles to obey God (lit., "unto the obedience of the Gentiles"). "Obedience" is a synonym for coming to Christ (cf. 1:5; 1 Peter 1:2; cf. "obey" in Rom. 16:26) for God "commands all men everywhere to repent" (Acts 17:30).

Paul recognized that all credit goes to Christ. And yet Paul was involved; God worked by what he had said and done. The apostle had been used by God to perform signs (sēmeiōn, miracles that signify theological truths) and miracles (teratōn, miracles that produce wonder). Luke referred to a miracle God performed through Paul at Cyprus (Acts 13:11, making Elymas blind), "signs and wonders" at Iconium (Acts 14:3; cf. Acts 15:12) and miracles at Lystra (Acts 14:8-10, 19-20), Ephesus (Acts 19:11-12), Troas (Acts 20:9-12), and Malta (Acts 28:1-8). Signs, wonders, and miracles authenticated the work of the apostles (2 Cor. 12:12; Heb. 2:3-4). And all this, Paul said, was through the power of the Spirit (cf. Rom. 15:13). Anything Paul achieved that was worthy of praise had God's grace as its source, Jesus Christ as its motivation and goal, and the Holy Spirit as its energy.

The result was that Paul preached the gospel from Jerusalem all the way around to Illyricum. Literally, this reads, "from Jerusalem and in a circle (i.e., Jerusalem and its environs) even to Illyricum." "The gospel of God" (v. 16) is here called the gospel of Christ. The New Testament records several of Paul's visits to Jerusalem after his conversion (Acts 9:26-28 [cf. Gal. 1:17-19]; Acts 11:27-30; 15:2 [cf. Gal. 2:1]; Acts 18:22). In the last reference Jerusalem is not named, but the words "he went up and greeted the church" obviously refers to the church at Jerusalem. Paul's visit to Illyricum is not mentioned elsewhere in the New Testament. This area, also known as Dalmatia, corresponds approximately to modern-day Yugoslavia. It is west and north of Greece (see the location on the map between Acts and Rom.). At one time Titus went to Dalmatia (2 Tim. 4:10). A logical suggestion is that Paul went into Illyricum from Macedonia while waiting for a response to 2 Corinthians before going on to Corinth (Acts 20:1-3; 2 Cor. 13:1-2, 10). This visit was fresh in his mind since Corinth was the city where he wrote Romans (see the Introduction to Rom.).

15:20-22. Reference to the geographical extent of his ministry (v. 19) led Paul to declare something of his philosophy of outreach: It has always been my ambition to preach the gospel where Christ was not known (lit., "named"). Paul purposed to be a true pioneer evangelist, opening virgin territory to the good news of God's grace in Jesus Christ. This was so that he would not be building on someone else's foundation (cf. 1 Cor. 3:10). Paul then expressed his ministry goal in a quotation of the second half of Isaiah 52:15 and explained, This is why I have often been hindered (imperf. tense, "I was being hindered many times") from coming to you. Up to this time Paul had always found new areas for ministry in Asia Minor and the Grecian Peninsula so that he had not yet felt free to look beyond to Rome and Spain.

15:23-24. Perhaps his visit to Illyricum convinced Paul that no more virgin territory for the gospel lay in Asia Minor and the Grecian Peninsula. This does not mean that he had visited every center, but the gospel had been introduced and local churches had been established that could complete the work (cf. Acts 19:8-10). At any rate Paul concluded, There is no more place for me to work in these regions (lit., "having no more place in these regions"). Coupled with this was his longing for many years to see the Roman Christians. At the beginning of this epistle he had expressed this desire to visit them (Rom. 1:10-11, 13). Paul continued, I plan to do so (this clause does not occur in the Gr. text, but the idea is implied) when (the indefiniteness of the Gr. clause requires "whenever") I go to Spain (cf. 15:28). Spain was then a Roman colony where many Jews lived; it was the western limit of the empire. He hoped to visit them while passing through. Apparently he did not plan a long stay in Rome. They could then assist him on his journey there (lit., "and by you to be sent forward there"); that is, they would encourage him on to Spain. Paul would proceed to Spain only after he had enjoyed (lit., "I am filled full with," "I am satisfied with") their company for a while. Paul paid the Roman believers the sincere compliment that their fellowship would refresh and satisfy him spiritually (cf. 1:13). He also wanted to impart a spiritual gift to them, thereby strengthening them (1:11) and to have some spiritual harvest among them (1:13), that is, to be able to help them grow in Christ.

15:25-27. Paul balanced his tentative plans for the future with the business immediately at hand. I am on my way to Jerusalem in the service of the saints there (lit., "ministering [diakonōn] to the saints"). Paul's visit to Jerusalem was to deliver the voluntary offering from churches for the poor among the saints in Jerusalem (cf. Acts 24:17; 1 Cor. 16:1-4; 2 Cor. 8:13-14; 9:12-13; Gal. 2:10). The churches of Asia Minor contributed to the offering also, but Paul mentioned only Macedonia and Achaia, the areas closest to Rome and those on his mind for obvious reasons. (See the location of these two portions of Greece on the map between Acts and Rom.)

The voluntary nature of the contribution (koinōnian, "fellowship") is stressed by the repetition of the verb, were pleased (cf. Rom. 15:26-27; 2 Cor. 8:10-12). At the same time Paul recognized the churches had an obligation: Indeed they owe it to them (lit., "and they are debtors to them"). This sense of moral obligation had undoubtedly prompted Paul to suggest the offering. Since the Gentiles have shared in the Jews' spiritual blessings (lit., "in their spiritual things"; cf. Rom. 11:11-12, 17-18; 15:12; Gal. 3:14; Eph. 3:6), Gentile Christians certainly ought to share with (leitourgēsai, "to minister to, serve"; cf. leitourgon in Rom. 15:16) the Jews their material blessings (lit., "in fleshly things"; cf. Gal. 6:6).

15:28-29. Again Paul said that after going to Jerusalem he would go to Spain and visit the Romans on the way (cf. v. 24). Paul got to Rome, but not when or in the manner he anticipated! (Acts 27-28) Whether he ever got to Spain no one knows for sure. Christians should plan ahead, but they should also be flexible. Paul, not boastfully but simply confident of God's provision, promised that his visit would be a spiritual blessing to the Roman Christians: I will come in the full measure of the blessing of Christ, that is, with Christ's blessing to share with them (cf. Rom. 1:11-13).

15:30-33. The Apostle Paul recognized his need for intercessory prayer support from his readers and asked for it again and again (Eph. 6:19-20; Col. 4:3-4; 1 Thes. 5:25; 2 Thes. 3:1-2; Phile. 22). Here he entreated the Romans by our Lord Jesus Christ and by the love of the Spirit to join him in his struggle through prayer. "The love of the Spirit" is probably the love given by the Spirit (cf. Rom. 5:5), not love for the Spirit. Recognizing that divine love, they would be motivated to pray. A Christian's intercession is a means of sharing in the ministry of others.

Paul's specific request was that he would be rescued from the unbelievers (lit., "the disobedient") in Judea and that his service (diakonia) in Jerusalem would be acceptable to the saints. Paul was aware of the problems that lay before him in Jerusalem (Acts 20:23), and he was deeply concerned that the offering from the Gentile Christians be delivered and distributed properly. If these objectives were accomplished, according to Paul, he could then by God's will go to them with joy and . . . be refreshed with them. The word rendered "refreshed" suggests that Paul would be able to rest or relax with them in the knowledge of a job well done. Paul closed this section with a brief benediction: The God of peace (cf. Rom. 16:20; also cf. "the God of hope," 15:13) be with you all. Amen. This is the third benediction in this chapter (cf. vv. 5, 13).

B. Personal greetings (16:1-16)

The capital city of Rome was a magnet that drew people from all over the empire. In addition Paul's travels to many of the major population centers—Jerusalem, Syrian Antioch, Philippi, Athens, Corinth, Ephesus—brought him into contact with the mobile segment of Roman society. These factors help explain the presence of Paul's many friends in Rome, but his knowledge of their whereabouts remains a tribute to his deep concern for people.

16:1-2. Phoebe (which means "bright, radiant") was Paul's emissary to deliver this letter, so he wrote officially, I commend to you our sister Phoebe. The relationship mentioned is spiritual, not familial. Phoebe was a servant of the church in Cenchrea, a seaport a few miles east of Corinth (cf. Acts 18:18; and see the map between Acts and Rom.). The word diakonon, "servant," is used for the office of deacon (Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:8, 10, 12) as well as used generally (Rom. 15:8; 1 Cor. 3:5). Use of the word with the phrase "of the church" strongly suggests some recognized position, a fact appropriate for a person serving as Paul's emissary. Paul not only officially commended her (cf. 2 Cor. 3:1), but also asked the Roman Christians to receive her in the Lord in a way worthy of the saints and to give her any help (lit., "and to stand by her in whatsoever matter") she may need from you. Paul explained, for she has been a great help (prostatis, "a protectress, succorer") to many people, including me. So they should help her since she had helped others.

16:3-5. This list of greetings (vv. 3-16) that Paul wanted conveyed to friends in Rome is the longest in any of his epistles. He mentioned 26 people by name, and referred to many others (vv. 5, 10-11, 13-15). Several women are included in the list: Priscilla (v. 3), Mary (v. 6), Tryphena and Tryphosa (v. 12), Persis (v. 12), Rufus' mother (v. 13), and Nereus' sister (v. 15). Two others are possibly women—Junias (v. 7) and Julia (v. 15).

Paul first met Priscilla and Aquila when he arrived in Corinth on his second missionary journey (Acts 18:2) and worked with them at their trade of tentmaking. They had come to Corinth from Rome because of Claudius' decree that all Jews must leave Rome. They accompanied Paul when he left Corinth (Acts 18:18), but stayed in Ephesus when the party stopped briefly (Acts 18:19). There they ministered to Apollos (Acts 18:26) and undoubtedly to Paul during his stay in Ephesus on his third journey, because they sent greetings to the Corinthian Christians (1 Cor. 16:19). Shortly after that, they must have moved back to Rome and still later returned to Ephesus (2 Tim. 4:19).

Paul paid them great praise, calling them my fellow workers in Christ Jesus and revealing that they risked their lives for me (lit., "they lay down their own neck for my soul"). In what way they risked their lives is not known. All the Gentile churches, Paul added, were grateful to them. Paul also sent greetings to the church that met at their house. The Christians in Rome apparently worshiped in numerous homes such as Priscilla and Aquila's. This couple had had a house church in Ephesus (1 Cor. 16:19) and probably wherever they lived. Other churches in homes are mentioned in Colossians 4:15 and Philemon 2.

Epenetus, to whom greetings were sent, is mentioned only here, but is called by Paul my dear friend (lit., "the one loved by me"; cf. Stachys, v. 9). He was the first convert (lit., "the firstfruits") to Christ in the province of Asia. Paul reached Asia, the western portion of modern-day Turkey, on his third missionary journey (Acts 19:10), after having been prevented from going there on his second journey (Acts 16:6).

16:6-7. Mary is identified simply as one who worked very hard ("toiled much"; cf. v. 12). Some Greek manuscripts read Mariam, the Hebrew form, which probably identifies this woman as a Jew.

Andronicus and Junias, greeted together, may have been husband and wife; Junias can be either masculine or feminine. Paul called them my relatives, which probably refers to a tribal, not a family kinship (cf. 9:3). He also mentioned four other "relatives" (16:11, 21). He said Andronicus and Junias had been in prison with him (lit., "my fellow prisoners"); when or where this occurred is not mentioned (cf. 2 Cor. 11:23). Paul commended them as outstanding (episēmoi, lit., "having a mark [sēma] on them," therefore "illustrious, notable, outstanding") among the apostles. The word "apostles" is probably used here in the broader, general sense in which Barnabas, Silas, and others were called apostles (Acts 14:14; 1 Thes. 2:7). Or it could mean the apostles in the limited sense, referring to the reputation this pair had among the Twelve. Paul added, They were (perf. tense, "they came to be and still are") in Christ before I was. So they had been believers for about 25 years.

16:8-11. Ampliatus was one Paul loved in the Lord. This was high praise from the apostle. Urbanus was called our fellow worker in Christ, and Stachys was addressed as my dear friend (lit., "the one loved by me"; cf. Epenetus, v. 5). Paul said Apelles was tested and approved (ton dokimon, "the one approved through testing"; cf. the same word trans. "approved," 14:18; the related infinitive dokimazein is trans. "to test and approve," 12:2). Without naming other individuals Paul sent greetings to those who belong to the household of Aristobulus, perhaps a grandson of Herod the Great. (See the chart on the Herods at Luke 1:5.) A household may have included family members and servants. (However, the Gr. simply has "those out of, belonging to Aristobulus"; cf. Rom. 16:11).

Herodion was greeted as my relative, but once again the relationship was probably tribal and not familial (cf. vv. 7, 21). The name may identify this person as belonging to Herod's family. Once again without naming individuals Paul sent greetings to those in the household of Narcissus (lit., "those out of, belonging to Narcissus"; cf. v. 10). But Paul restricted his greetings to the ones who are in the Lord, which probably indicated Narcissus' family was divided spiritually.

16:12-13. Paul sent greetings jointly to Tryphena and Tryphosa, identifying them as those women who work hard ("toil") in the Lord. Some believe they were sisters, possibly even twins. Then Persis, addressed as my dear friend (lit., "the one loved"), was another woman who has worked very hard ("toiled much") in the Lord. Interestingly four women were said to have "worked hard" (cf. Mary, v. 6).

Whether Rufus is the same person mentioned in Mark 15:21 or not is uncertain. If so, then he, as a son of Simon of Cyrene, was a North African.

Paul said Rufus was chosen in the Lord, a statement true of every believer (cf. Eph. 1:4). Consequently the word translated "chosen" may mean "eminent," since it was given to Rufus as a statement of distinction. The greeting included Rufus' mother who, Paul said, had also been a mother to him. Paul obviously did not say she was his actual mother, but he had been the recipient of her motherly care.

16:14-16. The next five names mentioned together (v. 14) evidently had something in common, perhaps as leaders of another house church. This may be indicated by the reference to the brothers with them. They are all common names, particularly among slaves.

Julia may have been the wife of Philologus. Two other husband-wife teams were Priscilla and Aquila (v. 3) and (possibly) Andronicus and Junias (v. 7). Nereus and his sister were then greeted, though the sister's name is not given. And finally, greetings were sent to Olympas and all the saints with him. This group may have been the leaders of another house church (cf. v. 14).

Of all these individuals only Priscilla and Aquila are mentioned elsewhere in the New Testament for certain; yet Paul knew them all individually and sent personal greetings to them and their associates. Paul cannot properly be charged with not being "a people person." He closed this section with the command, Greet one another with a holy kiss, the mode of salutation similar to the handshake today (cf. comments on 1 Cor. 16:20; also cf. 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thes. 5:26; 1 Peter 5:14) and with a general word of salutation, All the churches of Christ send greetings (lit., "greet you").

C. Final words (16:17-27)

16:17-20. Paul could not resist giving a final word of warning that they watch out for spiritual enemies: those who are divisive and seek to hinder the Lord's work (who put obstacles [skandala, "traps, snares"; cf. 14:13] in your way that are contrary to the teaching you have learned). Believers are to keep away (pres. imper., "keep on turning away") from such false teachers, who were not serving (douleuousin, "serving as slaves"; cf. 14:18) Christ, but were slaves to their own appetites (lit., "bellies"; cf. Phil. 3:19). They were selfish gluttons. The problem, however, was that by smooth talk and flattery they deceived the minds (lit., "hearts") of naive people (akakōn, "innocent, unsuspecting").

Paul hastened to assure the Romans that he did not consider them naive. Their obedience (to Christ; cf. Rom. 1:5; 15:18; 1 Peter 1:2) was well known and Paul was glad for them. But he was concerned that they be wise about what is good, and innocent about what is evil (kakon). The word for "innocent" is akeraious, "unmixed, simple, pure." In Greek it was used of wine that was not diluted and of metal that was not weakened in any way. The word is used in the New Testament in only two other places: Matthew 10:16 ("innocent") and Philippians 2:15 ("pure"). Christians should be innocent about evil, not following the ways of the world (Rom. 12:2).

To conclude this warning Paul added the promise, The God of peace (cf. 15:33; Heb. 13:20) will soon crush Satan under your feet (cf. Gen. 3:15). The false teachers (Rom. 16:17-18) were under Satan's influence, but he will be destroyed and God will establish peace (Rev. 20:1-6). Then Paul gave another benediction (cf. Rom. 15:13, 33) about God's grace. (See the chart, "Paul's Concluding Benedictions in His Epistles.")

16:21-24. These few verses contain personal greetings from some of Paul's associates: first, Timothy, my fellow worker, and then Lucius, Jason, and Sosipater, my relatives. Once again these men were not members of Paul's family, but fellow countrymen (cf. vv. 7, 10). These may be the men of the same names mentioned elsewhere (Acts 13:1; 17:5-9; 20:4; cf. 2 Cor. 9:4).

Then Tertius, who was Paul's stenographer for this epistle, sent his greetings. So did Gaius, Paul's host in Corinth, who apparently had a church meeting in his home. This Gaius was probably not the same Gaius who was from Macedonia and traveled with Paul (Acts 19:29) nor the Gaius who was from Derbe (Acts 20:4). The Gaius mentioned here in Romans was probably Paul's convert whom he baptized (1 Cor. 1:14). Erastus sent greetings. He was the city's director of public works (lit., "the city's steward," a high position in Corinth). Paul called Quartus our brother, undoubtedly meaning a spiritual brother, not a physical one. Romans 16:24 (NIV marg.), which repeats the benediction in verse 20b, is not found in a number of the major Greek manuscripts and is not considered genuine.

16:25-27. The apostle finally came to his closing benediction. This letter to the Romans is Paul's longest and most complete statement of the message he proclaimed, what he here called my gospel (cf. 2:16; 2 Tim. 2:8) and the proclamation of (i.e., concerning) Jesus Christ. The truth of this message is the means of spiritual life and stability, as Paul expressed his praise to God who is able to establish you (cf. 1 Peter 5:10).

Paul said that aspects of this message (e.g., Rom. 11:25; 1 Cor. 15:51; Eph. 5:32) and in a sense the total message (cf. Eph. 3:3-9; Col. 1:26-27) are the mystery hidden for long ages past, but now revealed and made known. The message of the gospel of Christ was "hidden" in the Old Testament, but is revealed in the New. In the prophetic writings (of the OT; cf. Rom. 1:2), given by the command of the eternal God (1 Tim. 1:17), Christ was referred to (Luke 24:44-45), but even the prophets themselves were not fully aware of all they wrote (1 Peter 1:10-12). But now in the Church Age their writings are understood.

The goal of this "revelation of the mystery" (Rom. 16:25) is that people of all nations might believe and obey Christ (cf. 1:5; 15:18; 1 Peter 1:2). Paul's concern for the geographical spread of the gospel is evident here (cf. Matt. 28:19), appropriate in view of his writing to the believers at the empire's capital city.

Paul then identified specifically the object of his benediction: To the only wise God. In the Greek this phrase is followed immediately by the words through Jesus Christ. This indicates that the wisdom of God is displayed supremely through Christ (cf. Col. 2:3). According to the Greek text the benediction then ends, to whom be glory forever! Amen (cf. Rom. 11:36). God the Father ultimately is the One to be praised and to whom glory belongs (cf. 1 Cor. 15:24-28).

1 CORINTHIANS

David K. Lowery

INTRODUCTION

According to Greek legend, Sisyphus was a king of Corinth. For defying the gods with his insolent wit he was sentenced to the eternal drudgery of pushing a huge stone up a hill. When he would reach the summit, the stone would roll back to the bottom and force resumption of the task. Camus, a 20th-century philosopher, found in this legend of the Corinthian king a picture of modern man's condition, the purposeless absurdity of life.

If Camus had read the two biblical letters sent to the Corinthians, he would have gotten a different picture, one with a message of purpose and hope for misdirected people. The attitude of these Corinthians, like their legendary king, smacked of proud self-centeredness. But instead of dealing with a capricious Zeus, these first-century Corinthians interacted with the gracious and loving God and His messenger, the Apostle Paul.

Author and Readers. That Paul is this letter's author there is little doubt. Even the most imaginative critics find no objection on this point. The apostle came to Corinth (Acts 18:1-18) on his second missionary journey (probably in the spring of A.D. 51 as the proconsulship of Gallio likely began later that year, in July). There Paul met Aquila and Priscilla who had left Rome in A.D. 49, when Claudius issued an edict ordering the expulsion of Jews from that city. The couple ran a tent-making business, a trade also practiced by Paul. Since no mention is made of their conversions, they were probably Christians when Paul met them. With a kinship along spiritual, ethnic, and vocational lines, Paul was naturally attracted to them.

According to his custom Paul attended the synagogue and took part in its services, seeking to persuade his hearers that Jesus is the Messiah. When the synagogue was closed to Paul, he went next door to the house of a synagogue listener who heard and believed, a Gentile named Titius Justus (Acts 18:7). He was one of many people in Corinth who belonged to the Lord.

From a human point of view Paul probably had reason to wonder if many saints would be found in Corinth. The ancient city had a reputation for vulgar materialism. In the earliest Greek literature it was linked with wealth (Homer Iliad 2. 569-70) and immorality. When Plato referred to a prostitute, he used the expression "Corinthian girl" (Republic 404d). The playwright Philetaerus (Athenaeus 13. 559a) titled a burlesque play Ho Korinthiastēs, which may be translated "The Lecher." And Aristophanes coined the verb korinthiazomai to refer to fornication (Fragment 354). According to Strabo (Geography 8. 6-20) much of the wealth and vice in Corinth centered around the temple of Aphrodite and its thousand temple prostitutes. For this reason a proverb warned, "Not for every man is the voyage to Corinth."

For a hundred years after 146 B.C. no one cared to make the voyage to Corinth. The city was destroyed because of its revolt against Rome. Only a few columns in the temple of Apollo survived the razing. All its citizenry was killed or sold into slavery.

But this favorable location did not go unused for long, as Julius Caesar refounded the city as a Roman colony in 46 B.C. In 27 B.C. it became the governmental seat for Achaia, from which seat Gallio as proconsul would allow Paul's proclamation of the gospel. It was onto this new stage, which nonetheless preserved the vices of the old, that Paul stepped in A.D. 51.

Contacts and Correspondence. The nature and number of Paul's contacts and correspondence with the Corinthians after his first visit in A.D. 51 is subject to considerable debate. A defense for the scheme of events to be presented may be found in several of the works cited in the Bibliography.

1. The length of Paul's stay on this first tour of ministry was one and one-half years, after which he sailed in the fall of A.D. 52 to Ephesus enroute to Jerusalem. Priscilla and Aquila accompanied Paul to Ephesus where they remained to meet and instruct the gifted Alexandrian Apollos whom they subsequently sent on to Corinth for ministry there (Acts 18:18-28).

2. While Apollos was ministering in Corinth (Acts 19:1), Paul returned to Ephesus on his third missionary journey in the fall of A.D. 53 for a period of about two and one-half years (Acts 19). It was probably during the early part of Paul's ministry in Ephesus that he wrote the letter mentioned in 1 Corinthians 5:9, a letter misunderstood by the Corinthians (5:10-11) and later lost.

3. Paul learned of this misunderstanding and of further problems in the church at Corinth from the household of Chloe (1:11). Then an official delegation—Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (16:17)—brought Paul specific questions on issues dividing the church. First Corinthians was written, probably in A.D. 54 or 55, to address these matters.

4. But apparently this did not resolve the problems in the church. It is possible that Timothy was the bearer of this news (4:17; 16:10). Paul then decided to revisit the church which he called in 2 Corinthians 1:15 and 2:1 the "painful" visit (cf. 2 Cor. 13:1, which speaks of a third visit, the last leg of Paul's third missionary journey), because of the action of the man referred to in 2 Corinthians 2:5 and 7:2.

5. After his second visit and return to Ephesus, Paul sent a letter borne by Titus, which it grieved him deeply to write (2 Cor. 2:4) apparently because of its disciplinary nature (2 Cor. 7:8-9).

6. After the silversmiths' riot Paul left Ephesus bound for Troas to meet Titus. Because Paul could not find him there, he anxiously pushed on to Macedonia, apparently with grave concern about Titus' safety (2 Cor. 2:12-13; 7:5). There he met Titus who brought good news about the general well-being of the Corinthian church but bad news about a group opposed to Paul.

7. From Macedonia Paul wrote 2 Corinthians and followed it up with his third visit during the winter of A.D. 56–57 (Acts 20:1-4).

Purpose and Nature of the Letter. If Ephesians is a letter concerned with the universal church, 1 Corinthians is pointedly concerned with the local church. If anyone thinks his church has more than its share of riffraff and woe, he need only turn to this letter (and its companion, 2 Cor.) to put his problems in perspective. First Corinthians provides a glimpse of life inside one first-century church, and far from saintly it was. Yet that is the reason Paul wrote this letter—to make positional sanctification practical. The spirit of the world seemed more influential in the Corinthian church than the Spirit of God, despite the splendidly evident gifts given by the Spirit. Paul wanted to change that. He directed his message along three lines:

1. The first six chapters were an attempt to correct the contentions in the church brought to his attention by Chloe's servants (1:11) and to bring about unity in perspective and practice.

2. Beginning in chapter 7, Paul addressed himself to certain questions (introduced by the phrase peri de, "now concerning") about marital issues (7:1, 25), liberty and responsibility (8:1), spiritual gifts and church order (12:1), money for impoverished saints in Jerusalem (16:1), and the availability of Apollos (16:12).

3. In chapter 15 he reaffirmed and defended the doctrine of the Resurrection, which some denied. It is possible that Paul saw this as a fundamental ill affecting all the preceding discussion, so he placed it at the climax of his letter.

Standing above all the issues with which this letter deals is the very existence of a church in Corinth, a testimony to the power of God and the gospel.

COMMENTARY

I. Introduction (1:1-9)

The introductions to Paul's letters are frequently seedbeds for issues expanded on later; his prefatory words in 1 Corinthians are no exception. He touched on his calling to be an apostle, the Corinthians' calling to be saints, and the unity which is theirs in Christ.

A. Salutation and description of the writer and readers (1:1-3)

1:1. The legitimacy of Paul's apostleship and its denial by some is hinted at in this letter (chap. 9), but receives explicit defense in 2 Corinthians. In the first words in 1 Corinthians Paul affirmed his appointment to this position by the will of God to represent not his own interests but those of Christ.

Sosthenes was probably Paul's amenuensis and may have been the synagogue ruler publicly thrashed by the Jews (Acts 18:17). If so, he illustrates how God can turn the worst circumstances to a believer's ultimate advantage.

1:2. The church belongs to God, not man. Had the Corinthians recognized this, their problem of division might not have existed. Those who compose the church have been sanctified, set apart by God as His possession. The burden of Paul's letter was that the Corinthians' practice might more nearly approximate their position. Christ Jesus as Lord was to be obeyed. Herein was unity for Christians not only in Corinth but everywhere.

1:3. Grace was what brought them together and what they needed to display mutually so that relational peace would be maintained. These qualities, especially needed in the Corinthian church, were produced by God in those dependent on Him.

B. Thanksgiving for the effects of God's grace (1:4-9)

Thanksgiving for a church so rife with problems may seem a bit strange. If Paul's only resources had been his own, the prospects of reforming a group like the Corinthians would have been dim indeed. But God was at work and that, for Paul, was a matter of thanksgiving.

1:4. However prone the Corinthians may have been to self-exaltation, it was because of God's grace alone that they were members of the body which existed in Christ Jesus.

1:5. It was only because they were a part of His body that they had been so enriched with the speaking and knowledge gifts such as tongues, prophecy, discernment of spirits, and/or interpretation (12:4-11). These gifts were not given to be abused as the Corinthians had done, but to be used for the good of all the church.

1:6. The presence of these gifts also bore testimony to the effectiveness of Paul's message about Christ. Though it might have been feebly delivered (2:1-5), God securely implanted His Word.

1:7-8. Because it was God's work, Paul had no question about the outcome. Because the Corinthian believers were justified by God's grace, they would stand before Him blameless (anenklētous, "free from accusation"; cf. Col. 1:22) when Christ returns. Thus they could eagerly wait (apekdechomenous; used seven times in the NT of the return of Christ: Rom. 8:19, 23, 25; 1 Cor. 1:7; Gal. 5:5; Phil. 3:20; Heb. 9:28) for Him.

1:9. This was so because God . . . is faithful and He had called the Corinthians into fellowship with His Son Jesus Christ. But one cannot enjoy fellowship with Christ while being at odds with other members of His body (Matt. 5:23-24). So it is on this note that Paul made his transition from what God had done in the past and will do in the future to what the Corinthians needed to do in the present, namely, mend their divisions.

II. Divisions in the Church (1:10–4:21)

Dissension in their church was the first problem openly addressed by Paul.

A. The reality of division (1:10-17)

1:10. Paul appealed to brothers, not to adversaries, in the most authoritative fashion, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. This is the 10th reference to Christ in the first 10 verses, leaving no doubt as to the One Paul believed should be the source and focus of Corinthian unity. His appeal was for harmony, not the elimination of diversity. He desired a unity of all the parts, like a quilt of various colors and patterns blended together in a harmonious whole.

1:11-12. Instead of this unity, however, the fabric was coming apart at the seams, or so Chloe's servants said. While the divisions were certainly real, it is possible, on the basis of Paul's remark in 4:6, that he made adaptations with regard to party heads so that the names cited—Paul, Apollos, Cephas—were illustrative, in order to avoid worsening an already deplorable situation.

1:13. The three questions in this verse were rhetorical and expected a definite no. The universal body of Christ is not divided, and neither should its local expression be. No man won salvation for the Corinthians, nor did any of them owe their allegiance to anybody except Christ.

1:14-17. Paul's imitation of Christ apparently touched every aspect of his ministry. According to John 4:2, Jesus did not baptize, but left it to His disciples. This was usually Paul's practice too. Could Paul then have believed baptism was necessary for salvation? Such is impossible (cf. 1 Cor. 4:15; 9:1, 22; 15:1-2). Not that baptism is pointless. It was commanded by Christ (Matt. 28:19) and practiced by the early church (Acts 2:41), which makes it, with the Lord's Supper, an ordinance of the church. But it is what an ordinance gives testimony to, not what it effects, that is more important.

Paul's primary charge was to preach the gospel (9:16) not with words of human wisdom. Brilliantly persuasive eloquence may win a person's mind but not his heart, whereas the unadorned words of the gospel, though seemingly foolish by human standards, are made effective by the Spirit of God (2:4-5).

B. The causes of division (1:18–4:5)

From a human point of view, the message of the gospel, at the heart of which was the suffering and dying Savior, seemed foolishly contradictory. No less so was the principle that he who would be greatest must be the servant of all (Matt. 23:11-12). But this was precisely what Paul meant to affirm in his analysis of the causes of division in Corinth.

1. A MISUNDERSTANDING OF THE MESSAGE (1:18–3:4)

Fundamentally the Corinthians needed a renewal of their minds (Rom. 12:2). They were trying to live their Christian lives on the basis of unsanctified common sense which has self-preservation as its ultimate goal. This kind of life is self-seeking, self-serving, and ultimately self-destructive (Luke 9:24-25).

1:18. It was that very point which Paul wanted to drive home to the Corinthians. The message of the Cross cuts to the heart of self-centeredness. Paul saw it as central to salvation which he understood to be a process begun by justification, advanced by sanctification, and climaxed in glorification. Paul spoke most pointedly in this verse and in the letter as a whole to the second of these phases, progressive sanctification. "The message of the Cross" is the message of self-renunciation, of obedience to God which may lead as it did in Jesus' case to humiliation and death, but which ultimately leads not to self-destruction but to preservation (Mark 8:34-35) and exaltation (2 Tim. 2:12; Rev. 22:5). That was the recurring theme in these verses (1 Cor. 1:17-18, 23-24; 2:2, 8), an idea those who are perishing consider foolishness (cf. Luke 9:23-25).

1:19. As he often did, Paul illustrated his point by an example of Israel who, following humanly wise counsel, formed an alliance with Egypt as a defense against Assyria, when in fact only the miraculous intervention of God was able to save them (cf. Isa. 29:14; 2 Kings 18:17–19:37).

1:20-21. It was the same with all human wisdom, whether of the esteemed Jewish scholar or Greek philosopher. The brilliance of man cannot appreciate the plan of God (Isa. 55:8-9). It is not self-confident erudition but self-effacing faith that allows one to enter the narrow way.

1:22-25. It was not on man's terms and initiative but on God's that man found what he needed, the power of God and the wisdom of God. In the preaching of Christ crucified God called people by opening their eyes of faith to believe the gospel.

1:26-31. Were not the situation so grievous, one could almost imagine a smile of incredulity on Paul's face as he wrote these words and urged the Corinthians to survey their own congregation. From a human viewpoint wisdom, influence, and high breeding were apparently in short supply. If God had chosen on the basis of such criteria, He would have passed them by. But when God called, he turned the world's standards upside down and usually chose the ordinary rather than the outstanding in order that no one may boast before Him (v. 29) but only in the Lord. For Christ alone personified the wisdom from God (v. 30) and in Him the Corinthians experienced righteousness, that is, justification (Rom. 4:24-25), holiness, that is, sanctification (2 Thes. 2:13-15), and redemption, that is, glorification (Rom. 8:23; Eph. 4:30). In the wisdom of God the plan of salvation was accomplished by a crucified Christ hidden from the wise and learned but revealed to simple believers (cf. Matt. 11:25-26).

2:1-5. On this note, Paul made his transition to a third point in his illustration of the futility of human wisdom, compared with the power and wisdom of God. That was seen also in the manner of his ministry which he described as characterized by weakness and fear and with much trembling (v. 3). Some see in this a Paul chastened by his encounter with the Athenian philosophers and therefore temporarily shaken and unsure. But that was probably not so. The phrases simply describe a spirit of dependence and subjection to God's authority (cf. Eph. 6:5; Phil. 2:12), which marked his ministry. It was also true that his manner of preaching was unimpressive from a human point of view (2 Cor. 10:10). Paul readily admitted this and even used it as a point in his argument. His preaching was not marked by eloquence or persuasive words such as characterized the sophists, the traveling teachers of that day, but was instead the unembellished message of a crucified Christ as the only means of salvation. Faith, then, was induced by a demonstration of the Spirit's power and was not a product of human ingenuity or rhetorical flourish. Paul wanted to be sure their faith would not rest on men's wisdom, but on God's power.

2:6. In Paul's disclaimer about his own brilliance he did not mean that God puts a premium on ignorance and rejects wisdom of any sort. There was a wisdom taught by the Spirit which Paul wanted his readers to grasp firmly. Some of his readers had done so (no doubt Paul hoped that someday all would do so). He referred to them as the mature, probably including the individuals mentioned in 16:15-18. They are the same people he described as spiritual people (2:13, 15). The reason the rulers of this age (cf. 1:20) did not understand this wisdom was because they lacked the Spirit (2:14), and thus were coming to nothing.

2:7. The message which Paul proclaimed was God's secret wisdom, known only by God's revelation (Matt. 11:25). At the heart of this wisdom is the plan of salvation intended for our glory, determined before time began (Eph. 1:4).

2:8. As did John in his Gospel (John 17:1), Paul linked glory with the crucified Lord, an utter paradox to both Jews and Gentiles (1 Cor. 1:23) who nonetheless unwittingly (Luke 23:34) took part in that central act of God's plan of salvation.

2:9-10. The blessings of salvation were prepared by the Father, carried out by the Son, and applied by the Spirit (Eph. 1:3-14) to all believers who as a result love God (1 John 4:19). The only way the Corinthians could know this was by the Spirit, who knows and reveals these deep things of God about salvation.

2:11. Paul illustrated this by pointing out that nobody can fully fathom the thoughts of anyone else. How much more necessary, then, is the work of the Spirit if the thoughts of God are to be known.

2:12. It was for that purpose, in part, that the Spirit who is from God came (John 16:13), not just to some Christians but to all (1 Cor. 12:13).

2:13. It was this message of salvation which Paul proclaimed and now expounded further. It did not originate in man but in God and was taught by the Spirit. Paul then expressed these spiritual truths which were a message of wisdom (cf. v. 6). The Greek word pneumatikois may be neuter gender and so translated spiritual words as in the NIV ("expressing spiritual truths in spiritual words"). Or it may be masculine gender and translated "spiritual men" ("interpreting spiritual truths to spiritual men," as in the NIV margin). Both senses are possible, but Paul's primary point in this passage was not how the message of wisdom was received but who received it, as suggested by the context: Paul spoke the message of wisdom to "the mature" (v. 6). Thus verse 13 parallels verse 6 and forms a kind of bracket, in keeping with well-written Greek style.

2:14. Since only spiritual people are able to receive spiritual truths, it follows that the man without the Spirit, an unregenerate person, would not and could not receive the message of wisdom regardless of his intellectual abilities or accomplishments (1:20). Like a deaf critic of Bach or a blind critic of Raphael is the unregenerate critic of God's Word.

2:15-16. On the other hand a person possessing the Spirit and guided by Him is able to evaluate and apply all things the Spirit reveals (v. 10).

The spiritual man can be judged only by God (4:3-5), not by unregenerate people (2:15) or by worldly Christians (3:1-3). To have the mind of Christ is to be obedient to God's revelation (Phil. 2:5-8), as were the spiritual people in the Corinthian church.

3:1-4. However, this was not true of all at Corinth. When Paul came and preached Christ to them, they believed. By faith they were justified and granted peace with God (Rom. 5:1-2). No doubt Paul taught them all the blessings that came to them as Christians, what Paul called milk. At that time their way of thinking and living was only beginning to be transformed (Rom. 12:2). They were still greatly influenced by worldly thinking and behavior—they were infants in Christ.

But "the message of the Cross" (1 Cor. 1:18) concerned more than justification. It also concerned sanctification. It called for a renewal of attitude and action in response to God's revelation. It called for righteousness in thought and deed (Heb. 5:11-14). And this part of the message of "Christ . . . crucified" (1 Cor. 2:2), this solid food (3:2), the Corinthians had spurned. As a result they were still worldly (v. 3). Instead of mature behavior characterized by humility and concern for others—obedience to God—the Corinthians were infantile, self-centered, and therefore divisive (v. 4; cf. 1:12). They wanted lives of exaltation (4:8) without lives of humiliation (4:9-13) because they did not understand that "Christ . . . crucified" was a message concerned not only with justification but also with sanctification (cf. Phil. 2:1-8). This misunderstanding was at the root of their disunity (cf. 1 Cor. 1:10; 3:4), which error Paul wanted to correct.

2. A MISUNDERSTANDING OF THE MINISTRY (3:5–4:5)

A second and related cause of division in their church concerned the ministry. The Corinthians had focused on men when in fact God alone was the source of blessing (3:5-9) and ministers were only servants accountable to Him (3:10-17). Since that was so, a minister needed to beware of cultivating the praise of men—as certain leaders in the Corinthian church apparently were doing (3:18-23), and needed instead to seek by faithful service to gain the praise of God (4:1-5).

3:5-9. Apollos and Paul were given their ministries by Christ (Eph. 4:11). They were the means, not the cause, whereby the Corinthians believed (cf. 1 Cor. 2:4-5). God alone produced results. God made the seed grow (3:6). Therefore God alone should get the credit (v. 7). As servants, Paul and Apollos were not competing against each other but were complementing each other's ministries (v. 8). Their purpose was to bring the church to maturity, to Christlikeness (Eph. 4:12-13). In accord with their faithfulness to that task would come their reward (cf. 1 Cor. 4:2-5). For though a minister served the church he was basically responsible to God. Paul and Apollos were fellow workers who belonged to God and worked for Him in His field, the church (3:9).

3:10-17. Paul then shifted metaphors for the church from a field to a building. Paul used in various ways the metaphor of Christians individually and collectively as a building in which God dwells, a temple. Jesus had referred to His physical body as a temple (John 2:19-22). In another letter Paul applied the same imagery to Christ's spiritual body, the universal church (Eph. 2:21). Paul also called the body of each individual Christian a temple (1 Cor. 6:19). In this passage, however, it was the local church which he described as a building of God, a temple in which God's Spirit lives (3:16).

Paul now further developed the theme of a minister's accountability for his labor (v. 8). Though it was true that every Christian in the Corinthian church was given at least one gift, or ability to minister in some way to other church members (12:11), it was primarily the leading ministers Paul was concerned about, who functioned in a capacity like that of Apollos and himself (cf. 3:5, 21-22).

3:10. Not every minister, however, labored to the same effect in this building process. Paul had laid a foundation in Corinth with the message of the Cross. Apollos too had labored beneficially in Corinth (Acts 18:27-28). Apparently so also had Peter, whom Paul here called "Cephas" (1 Cor. 1:12; 3:22). But as Paul wrote, someone else was ministering in Corinth, and Paul's words to him and others like him were a warning.

3:11. Jesus Christ alone was the foundation, the basis of salvation (Acts 4:12). But others had come to Corinth and preached a different gospel (2 Cor. 11:4). Perhaps such a one was present in Corinth when Paul wrote this letter.

3:12. In verses 12-17 Paul described three kinds of builders or ministers: the expert (v. 14; cf. v. 10), the unwise (v. 15), and the destructive (v. 17).

The materials used in the building may be interpreted in at least four ways: (a) The gold, silver, costly stones refer to the enduring quality of the builder's work; and the wood, hay, or straw suggest work that is temporary and valueless. This view is supported by "work" (v. 13) and "what he has built" (v. 14). (b) The three expensive materials suggest sound doctrine which the builder "builds" into people's lives, and the three valueless materials are false doctrines. (c) The first three materials refer to the worker's worthy motives, and the other three point to his unworthy motives (cf. 4:5). (d) The "gold, silver, costly stones" refer to believers who constitute the church (this is supported by similar uses of the metaphor in Eph. 2:22; 2 Tim. 2:20; and 1 Peter 2:5), and the "wood, hay, or straw" represent unregenerate people present in the church (chorton, rendered "hay" in 1 Cor. 3:12, is used of unbelievers in James 1:10, where the NIV renders it "wild flower").

3:13. The day of judgment is when Christ will judge the quality of His servants' work (2 Cor. 5:10). It is not a question of salvation which is a gift (Rom. 6:23), or a matter of individual deeds (Eph. 2:8-9), but of service which is judged on the basis of quality not quantity. Considerable apparent success can be had by dint of human effort and wisdom (cf. 1 Cor. 2:4), but unless it is empowered by God in accordance with His plan it cannot last (Ps. 127:1).

3:14-15. The image of fire associated with the coming of Christ is used elsewhere in the New Testament (2 Thes. 1:7; Rev. 18:8). What the reward for the expert builder consists of was not detailed, though praise (1 Cor. 4:5) is certainly a part. The inept builder will see the loss of his labor, but he himself will be saved, like a burning stick snatched from a fire (Amos 4:11; Jude 23). Before such judgment the various materials may coexist and appear indistinguishable (cf. Matt. 13:30).

3:16-17. However, a local church (you here is pl.) might come to the point where its structure is so weak that it collapses entirely or exists in name only, that is, it is destroyed. Paul did not want this to happen in Corinth (2 Cor. 11:3, 13). If it did, the false minister would be paid back in kind by God Himself (an application of the OT lex talionis [Gen. 9:6; cf. 2 Cor. 11:15]). The destroyer would be destroyed (Matt. 13:41-42). The words Don't you know (1 Cor. 3:16) are the first of 10 occurrences of the clause in this letter (cf. 5:6; 6:2-3, 9, 15-16, 19; 9:13, 24; each time it introduces an indisputable statement).

3:18-23. Since this was so, Paul gave a pointed warning to ministers (vv. 18-20) and to the congregation in Corinth (vv. 21-23). Ministers could avoid self-deception by evaluating their ministries and realizing that the wisdom of this world reflects the mind of Satan (Eph. 2:2) and is foolishness in God's sight (1 Cor. 3:19). Paul supported this fact by quoting from Job 5:13 and Psalm 94:11. The members needed to see that the practice of boasting (1 Cor. 3:21) about ministers was similarly a self-centered spirit. Instead, they should boast in God (cf. 1:31) to whom they belonged (3:23; cf. 1:2, 15:28) and who was the source of their every blessing (cf. 1:30).

4:1. It follows then that all who minister for Christ are responsible to Him. The word translated servants (hypēretas) differs from that used in 3:5 (diakonoi) and stresses subordination and responsibility to a superior. The secret things of God refers to God's wisdom, the message of the Cross known only by the Spirit's revelation (2:7-10).

4:2. Paul was concerned that he and ministers like him proclaim this message faithfully in the interests of their Master.

4:3-4. He was not deflected from this ministry because the worldly wise rejected it. From a human point of view he was not competent to judge even his own motives, much less the quality of his service. How then could others decide these matters?

4:5. Therefore premature judgment, whether it led to the exaltation of some ministers (3:21) or to the humiliation of others (4:10), was wrong. Only at the divine bar would all the facts be known and even there grace will be displayed—each faithful minister will receive . . . praise.

C. The cure of division (4:6-21)

Paul concluded his address to the problem of division in the church by putting his finger unambiguously on their problem: pride (v. 6). He then suggested a practical cure—imitation of him (v. 16).

4:6. Throughout this discussion Paul avoided singling out guilty persons by name. Instead he applied the problem cases to Apollos and himself (and Peter and Christ; cf. 1:12; 3:4-6, 22-33). Now Paul and Apollos would serve as curative examples of men under authority who did not go beyond what was written. They obeyed the Word of God, not their own inclinations or worldly opinions. From the example of their lives Paul hoped the Corinthians would learn the lesson of humility. (The verb "learn" is mathēte, and the related noun mathētēs is translated "disciple," or "one who practices what he is taught.") This was a difficult lesson, for the Greeks believed humility was a despicable trait of a slave, a sign of weakness, not a characteristic of great men (Plato Laws 6. 774c).

4:7. But humility is the only acceptable posture of a person in relation to the God who gives a wide variety of gifts (v. 7a) on the basis of grace (v. 7b) and therefore alone is deserving of praise (v. 7c; cf. 1:4-9). Paul underscored these truths in this series of rhetorical questions.

4:8. The posture of humility should be taken by all Christians. Paul set forth the pattern of Christ's life to the Philippians (Phil. 2:5-11). It was marked first by humiliation and then crowned by exaltation. The Corinthians had apparently dispensed with the first half. They wanted their exaltation immediately—no more sickness, no more suffering, no more pain. This is no more possible today than it was when Paul wrote to these self-deluded Corinthians, but nonetheless many follow in their train.

The Corinthians thought they had all they wanted (1 Cor. 4:8a), but they should have been hungering and thirsting for the practical righteousness they so desperately needed (Matt. 5:6). They thought of themselves as kings in need of nothing when in fact they were as needy as the foolish king in the children's tale of the emperor's new clothes, who blithely paraded nakedly before his subjects (cf. Rev. 3:17-18).

4:9-13. Paul was no fool. He did not like suffering. He wished they were right. But they weren't. The apostles followed the path of Christ's humiliation. As He marched a parade route to His death, so did they (cf. 2 Cor. 2:14). As Christ had suffered deprivation and defamation, so did His servants, and in His Spirit they endured and responded with grace (Luke 23:34). The apostles lived out the message of the Cross. But the Corinthians were complacent and secure with their "theology of the palace" (cf. Amos 6:1-7).

4:14-17. Prompted by love, Paul issued a warning. His purpose in writing the biting irony of the preceding verses was not simply to shame the Corinthians. But if it did not shame them, they were calloused indeed. His goal was to bring about a change of heart and manner of life in them. His motivation was love like that of a father for his children. Many ministers might address, advise, and instruct the Corinthians, but only one had planted the seed that brought them life. More than any guardian (Gal. 3:24) Paul had their interests at heart. For that reason he urged them to imitate him (1 Cor. 4:16; cf. vv. 9-13). He had one spiritual child who did just that, namely, Timothy (Phil. 2:20). Timothy could remind them by precept and example of Paul's way of life in Christ Jesus, which was in turn an imitation of their Lord.

4:18-21. Paul anticipated that not all would be moved by his appeal. Some, probably the unnamed party leaders (v. 5) or guardians (v. 15), were arrogant, which was the cause of the Corinthians' division problem. They might not be swayed by exhortation. They required action. And that, Paul knew, he was capable of meting out in the power of the Spirit (Acts 13:9-11). When he had preached to the Corinthians, he had not depended on his own ability but on the power of the Spirit (1 Cor. 2:4-5). He would rely on this same power for discipline (2 Cor. 10:4-6). This was the authority of God's rule (cf. Acts 5:3-11). Though Paul loved the Corinthians he knew that a loving father did not shy away from discipline (cf. Heb. 12:7). If it were needed, he would wield a whip (rabdos, a "rod"). From the Greco-Roman point of view this "rod" was a symbol of discipline executed by one in authority. Paul himself had been punished by rods more than once (Acts 16:22-23; 2 Cor. 11:25). But he preferred a visit characterized by love and . . . a gentle spirit.

III. Disorders in the Church (chaps. 5–6)

In the spirit of love but with the need for their discipline in mind, Paul turned in his letter to deal with certain disorders in the church, including their failures to discipline an immoral brother (chap. 5), to resolve personal disputes in a godly manner (6:1-11), and to maintain sexual purity (6:12-20).

A. Failure to discipline a sinner (chap. 5)

responds to the needs of others. Corinthian pride had produced not only disunity but also indifference and an unwillingness to exercise discipline within the church.

5:1. The issue concerned a Corinthian Christian who was carrying on an incestuous affair with his stepmother, a relationship prohibited both in the Old Testament (Lev. 18:8; Deut. 22:22) and in Roman law (Cicero Cluentes 6. 15 and Gaius Institutis 1. 63). The fact that Paul said nothing about disciplining the woman suggests that she was not a Christian.

5:2. The shameful situation did not seem to faze the Corinthians in the least. If anything, the affair may have even bloated their arrogant spirits. The godly response would have been grief for this brother (cf. 12:26; Gal. 6:1-2), leading to discipline which would exclude him from intimacy with the congregation until he would repent (cf. Matt. 18:15-17).

5:3-5. In view of the Corinthian indifference to the matter, Paul was compelled to act. By the authority vested in him as an apostle, he passed judgment on the offender which he asked the church to enact at their next meeting. Here was an example of the power he had earlier referred to (4:20-21). What the exercise of this power accomplished is not certain. The translation of the Greek word sarkos by the sinful nature suggests the idea that the man's fleshly appetites were to be annulled. However, several factors suggest a different discipline, namely corporeal affliction—with sarkos understood as "body" (as in the NIV margin). (The result, of course, is the same—the man's purification.) First, the latter is the usual meaning of the term when it is juxtaposed with spirit, which signifies the whole man in his inner and external being. Second, the word translated destroyed (olethron) is a strong term, the noun form of which (olethreutou) occurs elsewhere in this letter (10:10) where it is translated "the destroying angel" who killed men. Third, Paul also spoke in this letter about a discipline which leads to death (11:30) with the same end in view—the ultimate preservation of the person (11:32; cf. 1 Tim. 1:20; 1 John 5:16).

So it seems probable that Paul intended this man should be excluded from the fellowship of the congregation, thus physically expressing his exclusion from God's protection which he formerly enjoyed (cf. Job 1:12) and thrusting him out into the arena of the world (1 John 5:19) where Satan would bring about his death. It thus became a painful example of the price of self-centered indifference and a powerful reminder of the demand for holiness in God's temple (1 Cor. 3:17; 6:19).

5:6. There was, of course, no excuse for the Corinthians' pathetic behavior. Paul reminded them of a truth they already knew but were failing to practice—a little yeast soon permeates the whole batch of dough. A small sickness can eventually kill a body. The need for church discipline is based on the same principle.

5:7-8. As the literal yeast was removed from the house during the Festival of Unleavened Bread (Ex. 12:15-20; 13:1-10), so that which it illustrated, sin, was to be removed from the house of God, the local church, during its "Festival of Unleavened Bread," a continual observance for a Christian who has found in Christ's death on the cross the once-for-all sacrifice of the Passover Lamb (cf. John 1:29; Heb. 10:10, 14). This was nowhere more true than in the celebration which commemorated that sacrificial act, the Lord's Supper, the quintessential act of fellowship for Christians. Probably Paul meant to exclude the unrepentant Christian from this meal in particular.

5:9-10. In an earlier letter Paul had given direction on this subject but the Corinthians had applied it only to those outside the church. Paul showed the absurdity of such a view by noting that such compliance would necessitate leaving this world. Paul was certainly no advocate of monasticism (or its separatistic kind in Protestantism).

5:11. What he called for was disciplinary action for anyone associated with the church, whether a brother or one in name only, who took part in the church while continuing a life of sin. The discipline demanded for such a one was exclusion from fellowship with other members. Certainly the prohibition extended to an exclusion from eating the communal meal, the Lord's Supper. Other social contact might also have been excluded. It was unlikely, however, that the sanctioned individual was barred from all congregational meetings, for the church's ministry might lead to his conviction and repentance (14:24-25).

5:12-13. It was not Paul's business to judge those outside the church (cf., e.g., his silence about the woman in 5:1); still less was it the business of the Corinthians. But discipline within the church was their responsibility.

Those in the world God will judge (cf. Acts 17:31). But those within the Christian community who continue in sin with an unrepentant spirit, the church should discipline by expulsion.

B. Failure to resolve personal disputes (6:1-11)

The topic of judgment continued as Paul shifted to another disorder afflicting the Corinthian church. The same laxity in dealing with the immoral brother was found in cases of personal disputes between members which the church refused to adjudicate. It was yet another manifestation of the divisive spirit which racked the congregation.

With the introductory phrase "Do you not know," Paul pointed toward certain truths which should have prevented the problem in the first place. The phrase recurs six times in this chapter alone. (Outside this letter this construction appears only three other times in the NT.) Paul had used it before (3:16; 5:6) and would subsequently use it again (9:13, 24) to the same effect. The implication that they should have known these things must have painfully hit home to a church enamored with its own wisdom and knowledge.

6:1. Paul's chagrin about this issue was great, not only because it further divided the church, but also because it hindered the work of God among the non-Christians in Corinth (cf. 10:32). Those related by faith needed to settle their disputes like brothers, not adversaries (cf. Gen. 13:7-9).

6:2. The first of six do you not know phrases in this chapter (cf. vv. 3, 9, 15-16, 19) concerned the role of saints in judging (cf. John 5:22; Rev. 3:21). Paul had probably taught this doctrine in Corinth in the course of his founding the church there, since he cited it as an indisputable proposition.

6:3. Since they were going to judge supernatural beings (the fallen angels, 2 Peter 2:4; Jude 6), surely they should handle mundane matters satisfactorily.

6:4. The form of the Greek word (kâthizete, appoint) may be a statement (indicative) or a command (imper.). The NIV has taken it as a command, making the difficult phrase men of little account refer to those in the church not too highly esteemed for their "wisdom"; but Paul considered them more than adequate for the task.

"Appoint" may be indicative (and therefore a question; see alternate trans. in marg.) which seems more likely in view of verse 5. If so, the participle translated "men of little account" would be better rendered "men who have no standing" in the church, that is, non-Christians. The sad refrain of verse 1 to which Paul would refer yet a third time in verse 6 was thus heard again.

6:5-6. No doubt the statement in verse 5 reddened some of the wise Corinthians' faces. Certainly a part of Paul's concern in this issue was the harmful effect such legal wrangling would have on the cause of the gospel in Corinth (9:23). Such lawsuits certainly did not glorify God (10:31-33).

6:7-8. Because their greed dishonored God, Paul concluded that the important issue was lost before the case had begun. He therefore said that mundane loss was preferable to the spiritual loss which the lawsuits produced. As it was, the Corinthian lawsuits seemed not to have been so much a matter of redressing wrong or seeing justice served as a means for personal gratification at the expense of fellow believers. This was "body life" at its worst!

6:9-10. Paul's third reminder (Do you not know . . . cf. vv. 2-3) was probably meant to complement the thought of verse 4, but it also illustrated the gap which existed between the Corinthians' future position and their present practice. The wicked would have no share in God's future kingdom because they were not related to Christ, the Heir (cf. Mark 12:7). The wicked would one day be judged by the saints (1 Cor. 6:2) on the basis of their works (Rev. 20:13) which would condemn them. Yet the saints were acting no differently.

The word adikoi ("the wicked") in 1 Corinthians 6:9 was used in verse 1, there translated "the ungodly." The verb form adikeite ("do wrong") however, was used in verse 8 to describe the Corinthians' behavior. Their future role should have radically affected their practice in the present (cf. 1 John 3:3). If they thought otherwise, Paul warned, they were deceived (cf. 1 Cor. 5:11; Rev. 21:7-8; 22:14-15).

The list of offenders was similar to that noted earlier (1 Cor. 5:10-11), which no doubt corresponded to problems in Corinth and in other large cities of the day (cf. Eph. 5:3-6). Homosexuality and male prostitution, for example, were especially characteristic of Greco-Roman society. Plato lauded homosexual love in The Symposium (181B). Nero, emperor at the time Paul wrote this letter, was about to marry the boy Sporus (Suetonius Lives of the Caesars 6. 28), an incident bizarre only in its formality, since 14 of the first 15 Roman emperors were homosexual or bisexual.

6:11. Some (but not all) the Corinthian Christians had been guilty of the sins listed in verses 9-10, but God had intervened. They were washed . . . by the Spirit (cf. Titus 3:5), sanctified in the Son (cf. 1 Cor. 1:2), and justified before God (cf. Rom. 8:33). This fact of justification was an appropriate thought for those judicially carping Corinthians.

C. Failure to practice sexual purity (6:12-20)

The theme of legality continued as Paul turned to another problem troubling the Corinthian assembly. This problem was the issue of freedom from the Old Testament Law in the area of sexual relationships. Paul addressed this issue in the manner of a dialogue, the diatribe style, familiar to his readers. This also enabled him to prepare them for both his subject matter and his approach in the rest of the letter, which concerned answers to questions and objections they had raised.

The issue of the limits of liberty (v. 12) was developed later by Paul in chapters 8–10. To a degree this subject also colored the discussion on public worship in chapters 11–14. The question of a Christian's relationship to food (6:13) was taken up in chapter 8. The resurrection of Christ (6:14) was expounded in chapter 15. The church as the body of Christ (6:15) was enlarged on in chapter 12. The sanctity of sex (6:16), about which Paul quoted Genesis 2:24 on the divine establishment of marriage, occupied his attention in chapter 7.

6:12. The words, Everything is permissible for me, had apparently become a slogan to cloak the immorality of some in Corinth. The statement was true but it required qualification. Paul qualified liberty with the principle of love applied to both neighbor and self (cf. Mark 12:31). Liberty which was not beneficial but detrimental to someone else was not loving (1 Cor. 8:1; 10:23) and was to be avoided. So too, liberty which became slavery (I will not be mastered by anything) was not love but hatred of self.

6:13-14. Food for the stomach and the stomach for food was another slogan by which some Corinthians sought to justify their immorality. They reasoned that "food" was both pleasurable and necessary. When their stomachs signaled hunger, food was taken to satisfy them. So too, they argued, sex was pleasurable and necessary. When their bodies signaled sexual desire, they needed to be satisfied. But Paul drew a sharp line between the stomach and the body. The body (sōma) in this context (cf. 2 Cor. 12:3) meant more than the physical frame; it referred to the whole person, composed of flesh (the material) and spirit (the immaterial; cf. 2 Cor. 2:13 with 7:5). The "body," therefore, was not perishable but eternal (1 Cor. 6:14), and it was not meant for sexual immorality (porneia) but for union with the Lord (vv. 15-17), which is reciprocal (cf. Eph. 1:23). The eternality of the body, the future destiny of the individual, was made certain by Christ's resurrection (1 Cor. 6:14; cf. 15:20).

6:15-17. So too the work of the Spirit (cf. 12:13) has affected Christians' present destiny and joined them to Christ (6:15). Could a Christian practice immorality without grieving Christ? (cf. 12:26) Never!

The union of two people involves more than physical contact. It is also a union of personalities which, however transient, alters both of them (6:16). Paul quoted Genesis 2:24 (The two will become one flesh) not to affirm that a man and a prostitute are married but to indicate the gravity of the sin (cf. Eph. 5:31-32).

A Christian's union with Christ likewise affects both him and the Savior, and one cannot act without affecting the other.

6:18. Corinthian Christians, when faced with immorality, should respond as did Joseph (Gen. 39:12)—they should run. Flee from sexual immorality. Immorality was a unique sin but not the most serious (cf. Matt. 12:32). It was, however, an offense against the sinner and those with whom he was related.

It is possible that the statement All other sins a man commits are outside his body (the word "other" is a translator's addition and is not represented by any word in the Gr. text) should be taken as a third slogan (cf. 1 Cor. 6:12-13) bandied about by some in Corinth. If so, then Paul's rejoinder (he who sins sexually sins against his own body) is a straightforward denial. The Greek construction is similar to that in verse 13.

6:19-20. Among those grieved was the Holy Spirit who indwells every Christian (who is in you; cf. 12:13; 1 John 3:24). Also God the Father is grieved, for He seeks honor (Matt. 5:16), not shame, from those who are bought at a price (cf. 1 Cor. 7:23), that price being "the precious blood of Christ" (1 Peter 1:19).

IV. Difficulties in the Church (chaps. 7:1-16:12)

The note on which Paul concluded chapter 6, "honor God with your body," could well serve as the guiding principle for this fourth section in which he answered questions put to him by the Corinthians on the topics of marriage (chap. 7), personal liberty (8:1–11:1), church order (11:2–14:40) and doctrine (chap. 15).

A. Counsel concerning marriage (chap. 7)

1. MARRIAGE AND CELIBACY (7:1-9)

Paul had spoken in chapter 6 on the dangers of sexuality outside of marriage. Then he turned to the duty of sexuality within marriage. Probably abandonment of marital duties on the part of some in Corinth had contributed to the immorality he had just described.

7:1. The phrase not to marry may be an overtranslation of the Greek phrase "not to touch a woman." Paul probably intended it as a euphemism for sexual intercourse (cf. Gen. 20:6; Prov. 6:29). This too may have been a slogan for some in Corinth (cf. 1 Cor. 6:12-13) who argued that even those who were married should abstain from sexual intercourse. All that Paul said, however, was that celibacy was a good state and not to be depreciated.

7:2. However, marriage with sexual intercourse was much more common. For an individual to try to maintain a celibate state apart from the enablement of God (cf. v. 7) would lead to immorality. For that reason Paul encouraged people to marry.

7:3-4. Paul stressed the equality and reciprocity of the husband and wife's sexual relationship by emphasizing the responsibilities of each to satisfy the other.

7:5. Some in Corinth were trying to practice celibacy within marriage. Apparently this refraining from sex within marriage was a unilateral decision of one partner, not a mutually agreed-on decision (vv. 3-4). Such a practice sometimes led to immorality on the part of the other mate (v. 5b; cf. v. 2). Paul commanded that they stop this sort of thing unless three conditions were met: (a) The abstention from sexual intercourse was to be a matter of mutual consent on the part of both husband and wife. (b) They were to agree beforehand on a time period at the end of which normal intercourse would be resumed. (c) This refraining was to enable them to devote themselves to prayer in a concentrated way.

7:6. Paul presented this possibility for temporary abstention from sexual intercourse in marriage as a concession if the preceding stipulations were met. He did not want his advice construed as a command. The suggestion that Paul was referring to marriage itself as a "concession" is unlikely in view of Genesis 1:28, the first command to mankind in the Bible, and in view of Paul's Jewish background where marriage was obligatory for all men except the sexually impotent (Mishnah Niddah 5. 9).

7:7. Paul, however, did not want any stigma to be attached to the single state, so he affirmed, as he had done earlier

(v. 1), that celibacy was good. Paul, in fact, thought it to be an excellent state, and wished that everyone could see the benefits of celibacy from his point of view. He realized, however, that marriage or remaining single was more than a matter of weighing alternative benefits; each was a gift from God. It is God who enables each Christian to be married or single (cf. Matt. 19:12).

7:8-9. What Paul wrote in verses 1-2 he now pointedly applied to those in Corinth who were unmarried but were sexually experienced (cf. "virgins," v. 25). The unmarried included divorced persons of both sexes as well as widowers, with widows mentioned separately (cf. vv. 39-40). For these Paul affirmed the suitability of remaining single, if they had the appropriate enablement from God (v. 7). Paul, no armchair theologian, anticipated the practical question of how a person can know whether he or she is able to remain celibate. Paul gave his judgment; if one lacks sexual control, he does not have the gift of celibacy, and should marry.

2. MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE (7:10-24)

Paul's advice to married Christians is summed up in verse 24 after he addressed, in turn, individual Christians married to one another (vv. 10-11), Christians married to non-Christians (vv. 12-16), and other external physical and vocational states for Christians (vv. 17-23).

7:10-11. Paul's direction to Christians married to one another was like that of Jesus Himself (Mark 10:2-12): as a rule, no divorce (cf. Matt. 5:32). The difference in language between separate (chōristhēnai) on the part of the wife (1 Cor. 7:10) and divorce (aphienai) on the part of the husband (v. 11) was probably due to stylistic variation as the word translated "separate" (chōrizō) was commonly used in the vernacular as a term for divorce (William F. Arndt and F. Wilbur Gingrich, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament, 4th ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957, p. 899). When problems occurred in a Christian marriage, the resolution was to be sought in reconciliation (cf. Eph. 4:32), not in divorce.

7:12-13. The rest referred to Christians who were married to non-Christians. Jesus, in the course of His ministry, never had addressed this issue (cf. vv. 10, 25). But Paul, with no less authority (cf. v. 25) did. Some divorces may have been initiated because of the command of Ezra to the Israelites in Jerusalem after the Exile (Ezra 10:11) to divorce themselves from pagan spouses. Paul affirmed that the same principle should operate in a believer-unbeliever marriage as in a marriage of two Christians: as a rule, no divorce. A Christian husband must not divorce (aphietō) an unbelieving wife, and a Christian wife must not divorce (aphietō) a non-Christian husband.

7:14. Divorce was to be avoided because the Christian spouse was a channel of God's grace in the marriage. Within the "one flesh" relationship the blessing of God which came to the Christian affected the family as a whole (cf. Jacob in Laban's household [Gen. 30:27] and Joseph in Potiphar's [Gen. 39:5]; also cf. Rom. 11:16). It is in this sense that the unbelieving spouse was sanctified and the children were holy.

7:15. However, there were exceptions to the rule of no divorce. If the unbeliever insisted on a divorce, he was not to be denied (the word trans. leaves is chōrizetai, the verb used in v. 10). Should this occur, the Christian was not bound to maintain the marriage but was free to marry again (cf. v. 39). Paul did not say, as he did in verse 11, that the Christian in this case should "remain unmarried." (However, some Bible students say that not being "bound" means the Christian is not obligated to prevent the divorce, but that it does not give freedom for remarriage.)

The second part of this verse in which Paul affirmed that God had called Christians to live in peace could be understood as a separate sentence. The same conjunction (de, but) which introduced the exception at the beginning of this verse was repeated by Paul, probably to indicate another shift in thought and a return to the main point in this section, namely, the importance for the Christian spouse of preserving the marriage union and living "in peace" with the non-Christian. (For a similar digression in a discourse on the general rule of no divorce, see Matt. 19:9.) Paul's point was that a Christian should strive to preserve the union and to keep the peace, but with the understanding that marriage is a mutual not a unilateral relationship.

7:16. Paul then stated a second (cf. v. 14) and crucial reason why a Christian should stay married to a non-Christian. God might use the Christian mate as a channel of blessing (cf. v. 14), leading ultimately to the point where the unbelieving spouse would believe the message of the Cross and experience salvation (cf. 1 Peter 3:1-2).

7:17. The general principle which Paul affirmed in dealing with decisions affecting a Christian's marital status was again stated three times (vv. 17, 20, 24; cf. also v. 26): in brief, "stay put." The call to conversion radically altered an individual's spiritual relationship but need effect no changes at all in physical relationships that were not immoral.

7:18-19. The external operation of circumcision or the obliteration of the same (cf. [apocryphal] 1 Maccabees 1:15-16) was a matter of little importance compared with keeping God's commands, which for Paul meant being controlled by the Spirit (cf. Rom. 2:25-29).

7:20-23. Likewise, a Christian's vocational situation is a matter of little consequence (if status can be changed, well and good; if not, it is not a matter for worry). What matters is that every Christian should realize he is Christ's slave and needs to render obedience to Him. Every vocation then becomes Christian service performed for the Master (cf. Eph. 6:5-8).

7:24. The fact that God had called each one to a vocation and sought from each one faithful service in that calling elevated and sanctified both the work and the worker. A Christian could then "live in peace" (v. 15) in his calling and carry it out as one responsible to God.

3. MARRIAGE AND MINISTRY (7:25-38)

The basic principle Paul had been setting forth (viz., to continue in one's present position) was then applied to those who had never married. Apparently this was in response to a question put to him. Paul urged them to remain single, for three reasons: (a) an impending time of distress for Christians (vv. 26-28), (b) the imminent return of Christ (vv. 29-31), and (c) the opportunity for undistracted service for Christ (vv. 32-35).

7:25. Virgins here were sexually inexperienced people who had never married. Jesus had never specifically addressed the propriety of marriage per se (cf. Matt. 19:10-12, 29) but Paul gave his judgment on the issue which they could take as trustworthy counsel. (He of course was writing under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit and hence his "judgment" was as authoritative as Christ's words; cf. 1 Cor. 7:40.)

7:26-28. The present crisis may have referred to persecution then being suffered by the Corinthians (cf. John 16:33; 2 Tim. 3:12; 1 Peter 4:12) or to an experience of suffering which Paul anticipated would shortly befall them (in which case the words could be trans. "impending crisis"). In view of his silence in the letter about any present suffering on their part the latter point of view (and trans.) is preferred. (Cf. 1 Cor. 4:8 which intimates a perceived state of well-being or even positive euphoria.) Still, when persecution came, as Paul felt it surely would, its onslaught could be handled more ably by single than by married persons. However fearsome the thought of martyrdom (cf. 13:3) might be to a single person, it was doubly so to a married person responsible for a spouse and children. With these conditions in view marriage would not be wrong (if you do marry, you have not sinned), but it would be inexpedient.

7:29-31. The second reason Paul felt the single state was advantageous was the potential it offered for detachment from temporal situations. The phrase the time is short referred to the Lord's return (cf. Rom. 13:11), but it was also a summary philosophy of life for Paul who lived not for the temporary but for the eternal (cf. 2 Cor. 4:18). This detachment from temporal matters should characterize all Christians but it was more complex for the married (cf. Mark 13:12) for whom, nonetheless, devotion to their Lord should occupy first place in life (Luke 14:26). Paul certainly was not recommending abandoning marital duties (cf. 1 Cor. 7:3-5).

Instead he was calling for a commitment to eternal matters and a corresponding detachment from the institutions, values, and substance of this world which was passing away (v. 31). Such a commitment was more easily made and enacted by a single person.

7:32-35. Paul's third reason was a development of the second. The single state has potentially fewer encumbrances and distractions than the married state, so it more easily facilitates a spirit of undivided devotion to the Lord. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus warned His followers against letting concern for the material aspects of this life distract them from devotion to God (Matt. 6:25-34). The poor widow (Mark 12:44) gave all her material sustenance to God as an act of singular devotion. A married man or woman with a needful concern for the well-being of his family would have been less likely to do that. The situation illustrates Paul's point that the single life with its greater simplicity in obligations allows a potentially greater commitment of time, resources, and self to the Lord than would be possible for a married person dutifully carrying out the marital and familial obligations attached to that state.

7:36-38. The interpretation and translation of this passage is difficult, as the alternate marginal translation indicates. The issue revolves around whether the indefinite pronoun anyone (v. 36) refers to a father or to a prospective bridegroom. The NIV translators, following most modern commentators, have adopted the latter point of view but have included the traditional interpretation in the margin. The strength of the bridegroom view lies in the fact that it permits a consistent subject for the verbs used throughout the passage, a strength which the NIV translators forfeited by making the virgin the subject of the phrase getting along in years. This decision was possibly prompted by the need to explain why the bridegroom might be thought to act improperly (i.e., his delay in consummating the marriage may, with her advancing age, adversely affect her chance of ever getting married). The bridegroom view, however, faces a lexical difficulty in the meaning of two verbs (gameō and gamizō) for marriage. In order to sustain the bridegroom view it is necessary to understand the terms as virtual synonyms, meaning "to marry." But gamizō usually means "give in marriage," and gameō means simply "marry," as these words do in the other New Testament passages where they occur together (Matt. 24:38; Mark 12:25). This distinction in meaning continued to be recognized even in the second century (Apollonius Dyscolus Syntax 3. 153). So it seems that the marginal reading is to be preferred.

Paul, then, gave advice to a father who in the first-century culture exercised great decision-making authority in matters affecting his family. A father may have decided that his daughter should not marry, possibly due to reasons similar to those Paul had mentioned in 1 Corinthians 7:25-34. But in coming to this decision, the father had not reckoned with the fact that his daughter might not be able to remain single. She might not possess the gift of celibacy (v. 7). If so, Paul recommended that the father should not feel obligated to hold to his previous commitment but instead let his daughter marry. However, the father should feel free to follow through on his conviction to keep his daughter single (v. 37) if three conditions were met: (a) He had a settled and firm conviction about the propriety of her celibacy. (b) He was in a position where he was free to exercise his authority, that is, he was not a slave in which case the master could determine the daughter's destiny. (c) He was under no compulsion from evidence which suggested that his daughter was not able to remain single but required marriage instead. If these conditions were met, then the father did well not to give her in marriage.

4. REMARRIAGE AND WIDOWS (7:39-40)

7:39-40. Paul's earlier counsel to widows (vv. 8-9) was to remain single. In that previous context, however, he acknowledged the fact that not all were equipped to do so. The only constraint Paul placed on a widow who sought remarriage was the obligation to marry another Christian (he must belong to the Lord)—an obligation which though previously unstated, he no doubt meant to apply to all who sought marriage partners. That point alone, however, affected a widow's options. Within that condition she might choose whom she wanted and find with that husband great happiness, though Paul added that in his judgment she would be happier if she remained single. This advice was not only from Paul's heart but also guided by the Spirit of God, who equipped both single and married Christians (v. 7) for their respective roles.

B. Counsel concerning Christian liberty (chaps. 8–14)

Paul's reply to the Corinthians' question concerning the propriety of eating the meat of an animal offered in a pagan sacrifice touched off an extensive response, probably because he sensed that this particular issue was another manifestation of the Corinthians' self-centeredness, which produced other similar problems in the church.

Two words which seemed to epitomize the Corinthians' point of view were "freedom" (eleutheros, 9:1, 19; eleutheria, 10:29) and "rights" (exousia, 8:9; 9:4-6, 12, 18). Paul used and qualified these words in these chapters by stressing the importance of a love for others which sought their "good" (sympherō, -os, 10:24, 33; 12:7; cf. 6:12) by "strengthening" or "building" them up (oikodomeō, -ia, 8:1, 10; 10:23; 14:3-5, 12, 17, 26). These two themes, "me first" or "you first," and Paul's development of them as they affected believers in relation to pagan worship and Christian worship, unified these chapters. Secondarily Paul showed that the former attitude ultimately brought God's disapproval (adokimos, 9:27) and His discipline (10:5-10; 11:30-32).

1. CHRISTIAN LIBERTY IN RELATION TO PAGAN WORSHIP (8:1–11:1)

Ordinarily the Greeks and Romans burned the less desirable portions of an animal in the course of their sacrifices and retained the choicer parts for personal consumption at banquets celebrating the sacrifices. If a sacrifice were made in connection with a state function, the meat which remained was frequently sold in the marketplace. The Corinthians' questions apparently concerned (a) the acceptability of buying and eating meat from one of these sacrificial animals; (b) the acceptability of eating this meat as an invited guest in a friend's home; (c) the acceptability of attending one of these pagan sacrifices and enjoying the meal of celebration which followed in the temple precincts. Paul spoke to each of these issues.

a. The principle of brotherly love (chap. 8)

Paul struck right to the heart of the matter in these preliminary verses by stating a basic principle: love is superior to knowledge (cf. chap. 13).

8:1. Much as he had begun his reply on marital questions, Paul may have quoted a Corinthian sentiment (we all possess knowledge) with which he basically agreed but which required qualification. Knowledge was essential in correctly responding to their questions but those who thought they had it did not, as Paul would show.

8:2-3. In the first place, knowledge about God was always partial (13:12). In the second place, true knowledge led to God and a love for Him which Paul knew must issue in love for others (cf. 1 John 4:20-21).

8:4. With the principle stated it now remained to be applied to the particular instance in question. The statements which follow the two thats (an idol is nothing at all and there is no God but One) may well have been Corinthian affirmations with which Paul could wholeheartedly agree. An "idol" indeed was "nothing" (Ps. 115:4-8), for there is only one God (Deut. 4:35, 39). Hence eating food sacrificed to idols was, in itself, inconsequential.

8:5-6. The pantheon of the Greeks and Romans, not to mention the gods and lords of the mystery religions, were indeed numerous, but one God alone is real (Deut. 10:17). The Father is the source of all (Gen. 1:1) and the One for whom the Corinthians should live (1 Cor. 10:31). The Lord Jesus Christ was the agent of Creation (Col. 1:16) and the One through whom the Corinthians lived (1 Cor. 12:27; Eph. 1:23).

8:7-8. If all Corinthian Christians could have agreed that an idol was nothing and that there was only one God (v. 4), then they might have eaten the idol meat with impunity. However, such was not the case. All, in fact, did not possess knowledge. The conscience of some Christians was not strengthened on this point by the truth. They were still ignorant and had not come to the point where they could accept eating this kind of meat as a matter of indifference. For them it was wrong, and so to eat it was sin (cf. Rom. 14:23). Paul denied the validity of their scruples, but in the advice which followed he suggested that the solution would be found in love, not in knowledge.

8:9. When knowledge uninformed by love dictated one's behavior, Paul warned that spiritual harm would result. The exercise of . . . freedom by the knowledgeable could in certain circumstances become an obstacle, a stumbling block in the weak Christian's walk with God (cf. v. 13).

8:10. As an illustration Paul posed a situation in which a weak Christian saw a knowledgeable brother enjoying a meal in an idol's temple and was by this example encouraged to join in, even though he could not do so with the clear conscience before God that the knowledgeable Christian enjoyed.

8:11. As a consequence the conscience of this weak believer was seared (cf. 1 Tim. 4:2), and his capacity to distinguish right from wrong was lost (cf. Titus 1:15) leading to his spiritual ruin and physical death (cf. 1 Cor. 10:9-10; Rom. 14:15). Apollytai, rendered is destroyed, often refers to physical death (e.g., Matt. 2:13; Acts 5:37). The selflessness of Christ was an example for the knowledgeable. If Christ loved this brother so that he was willing to give up His exalted rights and even His life (Phil. 2:6, 8), surely the strong could give up his right to eat such meat.

8:12. To be arrogantly indifferent to the need of weaker Christians results in sin not only against them (for you . . . wound their weak conscience; cf. v. 7) but also against Christ of whose body they are members (12:26-27; cf. 1:30; Matt. 25:40, 45). Paul experienced this point acutely on the Damascus Road (Acts 9:4-5).

8:13. In summary Paul stressed the priority of brotherly love. He did not demand that the knowledgeable relinquish their right, but he illustrated how he would apply the principle to himself. Paul did not want any brother to fall (cf. v. 9) but to be "built up" (cf. v. 1), and knowledge governed by love accomplished that.

As a final note to this chapter it should be understood that Paul did not say that a knowledgeable Christian must abandon his freedom to the ignorant prejudice of a "spiritual" bigot. The "weak brother" (v. 11) was one who followed the example of another Christian, not one who carped and coerced that knowledgeable Christian into a particular behavioral pattern. Also it was unlikely that Paul saw this weak brother as permanently shackling the freedom of the knowledgeable Christian. The "weak brother" was no omnipresent phantom but an individual who was to be taught so that he too could enjoy his freedom (Gal. 5:1).

b. The regulation of privilege (9:1–10:13)

(1) The positive example of Paul (chap. 9). Paul ended his warning about exercising freedom if it had detrimental effects on a brother with a statement expressing his willingness to be a vegetarian if it would keep a brother from faltering in his faith (8:13). He then illustrated how he practiced what he preached in this matter of rights when applied to food and drink. It seemed that the rumblings of doubt about his apostleship, which would later call forth an extended defense (esp. 2 Cor. 10–13), had already started. Paul neatly illustrated the principle expressed in 1 Corinthians 8 by relating it to the issue which seems to have been a bone of contention concerning his apostleship. That issue was his steadfast refusal to derive material support from those to whom he was ministering, so no one could say he was motivated by money (cf. 2 Cor. 2:17).

9:1-2. Paul affirmed that his position as an apostle was like that of the knowledgeable Christian in this matter of freedom and rights. The four questions in these verses were rhetorical and expected an affirmative reply, though some among the Corinthians may have denied one or all of them. The third and fourth questions seem directly related to apostolic authority, but apparently Paul believed that the fourth one was more significant than the third. In the course of an extended defense of his apostleship in 2 Corinthians he never mentioned seeing the Lord (cf. Acts 1:21) but he returned repeatedly to the theme of this verse (1 Cor. 9:2) that the Corinthians themselves were his vindication (2 Cor. 3:1-3; 5:12; 7:14-16; 8:24).

9:3. Paul's defense looked forward (to vv. 4-23) and not back (to vv. 1-2, which guaranteed a right he had willingly forfeited). Paul's defense, then, was an explanation of why he refused to be maintained at the church's expense even though he had a right to such support (vv. 1-2). This served also as a positive example of his counsel to the knowledgeable brother who was concerned about his rights (chap. 8).

9:4-6. The word right in these verses is the same word (exousia) translated "freedom" in 8:9. It links the chapters, though Paul's subject here was not sacrificial meat but ordinary food. To bring out the meaning of these rhetorical questions the phrase "at the expense of the church" could be added to verses 4-5 (cf. Matt. 10:10-11). Paul was not alone in refusing this right but had an ally in Barnabas. Commitment to this practice may have marked their first missionary journey together (Acts 13:1–14:28) and apparently continued to characterize their separate ministries.

9:7. Paul saw the right of maintenance as a principle which extended beyond the apostles to others in the church; he illustrated the point along six different lines. The first was custom. The soldier, farmer, and shepherd are all supported by their work.

9:8-10. Second, the Old Testament itself substantiated the principle of just remuneration. Paul's illustration and interpretation has perplexed many commentators. Why did Paul, after referring to the practice of not muzzling a grain-treading ox, then ask, Is it about oxen that God is concerned? Was he changing the sense of the Old Testament passage? Not among the perplexed was Luther who tried to cut this Gordian knot by observing that since oxen cannot read, Paul's point in the passage was transparent. Problems nonetheless remain for less exuberant interpreters. The solution is probably found in the context of Deuteronomy 25:4 which Paul quoted. That chapter contains instructions not about animal husbandry but human relationships. Not muzzling an ox, therefore, was probably a proverbial expression concerning just remuneration, properly understood and interpreted as such by Paul. A modern parallel would be the adage, "You can't teach an old dog new tricks," which is commonly applied in contexts other than canine obedience.

9:11. Paul's third illustration grew out of verse 10 and his discussion of Deuteronomy 25:4, but it concerned a basic principle of community reciprocity: beneficial service should be rewarded. If Paul had been used to bring spiritual riches to the Corinthians (1 Cor. 1:5), material recompense was surely not too much to expect.

9:12. A fourth line of appeal was made to the precedent of other Christian leaders. Paul had earlier alluded to the ministry of Peter (Cephas) (v. 5). Though unattested, it is probable that Peter ministered in Corinth (cf. 1:12; 3:22; 15:5) and was supported during that time by the church. The same was probably also true of Apollos (1:12; 3:4-6, 22; 4:6; 16:12). If the church supported them, their founding father Paul was surely no less deserving.

Yet Paul did not exercise this right (cf. 8:9) because he did not want to hinder the response of anyone to the gospel. Had he been materially recompensed for his ministry, some might have presumed he was simply another itinerant educator motivated by profits (cf. 2 Cor. 2:17) and would have refused him a hearing. To avoid being a "stumbling block" (1 Cor. 8:9) to any, Paul relinquished his right to receive support from those to whom he ministered.

9:13. Paul had temporarily interrupted his catalog of illustrations on the right of recompense to underscore the rationale behind his own refusal to exercise that right, despite its general practice by other worthy servants of Christ (v. 5). He then offered a fifth example in support of the right of remuneration by citing the practice of the priesthood. Old Testament priests were remunerated for their service (Num. 18:8-32), and so were the pagan priests with whom the Corinthians were probably more familiar (cf. 1 Cor. 8:10).

9:14. In the sixth place Paul appealed to the weightiest point of all, the instruction of Jesus that those who give out the gospel should derive support from it (Luke 10:7).

9:15. With this catalog of arguments completed Paul had convincingly established his rights in relation to the Corinthian church. However, he underscored once again (cf. v. 12) his refusal to exercise those rights. He expressed one reason in verse 12, a desire to avoid any hint of mercenary motivation in his ministry. A second and related reason was now stated: the opportunity to affirm the integrity of his commitment to the ministry (cf. 2 Cor. 11:9-12). This was Paul's boast: he ministered willingly and freely from his heart (cf. 2 Cor. 2:17).

9:16. Of course Paul's "call" to the ministry was unique. Others have responded voluntarily to the call to follow Christ (Mark 3:13; John 1:37-39), but Paul was flattened by it (Acts 22:6-10). Like Jonah, Paul was compelled to preach (cf. 1 Cor. 1:17), and like that prophet, woe to him if he shirked his task.

9:17. The condition, if I preach voluntarily, was not true of Paul as he had just said, so he had no claim to any special recompense since he was simply discharging the trust committed to him (cf. Luke 17:10).

9:18. Did he then not have any reward? Yes; two, in fact. First, he had his boast (v. 15) that he offered the gospel free of charge, and no one could deny that (cf. 2 Cor. 11:9-10). Second, he had the opportunity to see the gospel at work among those to whom he preached (1 Cor. 9:19, 23), and these results, the believers themselves, were his reward (cf. 2 Cor. 7:3-4). The word translated "reward" (misthos) may also refer to a wage. Paul had shunned material recompense, but he was not without a reward or return for his labor. He had the joy of reaping. To widen that harvest he would gladly give up certain rights, among them the right to material support, in order to enjoy both the integrity of his boast about his ministry and the results of his ministry (cf. John 4:36).

9:19. Paul had not shackled the exercise of his rights in the area of food and drink alone (as he had intimated the knowledgeable Christians should do, 8:9-13), but he had applied it to numerous facets of his ministry so that though he was free (eleutheros; cf. 8:9; 9:1) he voluntarily became a slave (cf. Phil. 2:6-7) for the good of others (1 Cor. 10:33) whom he wanted to win (9:22).

9:20. Though Paul was primarily an apostle to the Gentiles (Gal. 2:8), he never lost his concern for the salvation of his own people (Rom. 9:3). He made it his custom to seek out the synagogue in each town he entered (Acts 17:2) in order to win the Jews (Rom. 1:16). No verse points out more starkly Paul's own consciousness of what he was, both before and after meeting Christ. Before, he was the Jew's Jew, faultless with regard to legalistic righteousness (Phil. 3:6). Afterward, he was a new man (2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 2:20), who had found in Christ the righteousness he had sought (Rom. 10:4; 1 Cor. 1:30). He was still a Hebrew (2 Cor. 11:22; Phil 3:5), but he was no longer a Jew living according to the Law (I . . . am not under the law). Still, he was willing to subject himself to the scruples of the Jews (e.g., Acts 21:23-36) in order to gain a hearing for the gospel and to win them to Christ. Yet he never compromised the essence of the gospel at the heart of which was salvation by faith, not works (Gal. 2:16; Eph. 2:8-9) and freedom from legalism (Gal. 2:4-5).

9:21. In contrast to the Jews, "those under the Law" (v. 20), those not having the Law were the Gentiles. Among Gentiles, Paul was willing to abandon past scruples of a morally indifferent sort, such as eating meat offered sacrificially to a pagan god (10:27; cf. Acts 15:29), in order to win Gentiles to Christ. But though Paul was a forceful advocate of liberty (Gal. 5:1), he did not suggest he was an advocate of libertinism (cf. 1 Cor. 6:12-20). He was still under authority, but not to the Old Testament Law. He was responsible to God (cf. 3:9) and Christ (cf. 4:1) and was enabled by the Spirit to fulfill the law of love (Rom. 13:8-10; Gal. 5:13-25), the opposite of lawlessness (cf. Matt. 24:12 where lawlessness drives out love). Christ's law (Gal. 6:2) was to love God and man (Mark 12:30-31), which law Paul obeyed (1 Cor. 10:31-33).

9:22. In his references to Jews and Gentiles in the preceding verses, Paul explained his voluntary restraint of freedom in order to reach unbelievers with the gospel. Some suggest that the weak in this verse refers to Jews and Gentiles together in a state of unbelief and so was intended to summarize Paul's previously stated convictions (cf. Rom. 5:6 where "the weak" are also called "the ungodly"). It is more likely, however, that Paul was referring explicitly to the weak Corinthians described in 1 Corinthians

8:9-11 (cf. Jew, Greeks, and the church of God in 10:32). His concern to win them was not in the preliminary sense of justification as in the case of unbelieving Jews and Gentiles (9:20-21) but to win the Corinthians in terms of sanctification and maturity in Christ (cf. Matt. 18:15)—and so to save them for God's ongoing work in their lives (cf. 1 Cor. 5:5; 8:11). Paul's condescension to the scruples and customs of all men (cf. "everyone" in 9:19) found application on a momentary case-by-case basis since it would be impossible to satisfy simultaneously the penchants of both Jews and Gentiles alike.

9:23. Paul voluntarily did this in order to gain the widest possible hearing for the gospel and so to share in its blessings as God's fellow worker (3:9), reaping the joyful harvest of many won to Christ (cf. John 4:36).

9:24-25. Paul's commitment to this course of ministry did not come easily. It required personal discipline (strict training) like that of an athlete who strove for supremacy in his field (cf. 15:10). To that end Paul willingly gave up certain privileges which might otherwise be his to enjoy so that he could win the prize. The prize for Paul was not the temporary crown (stephanon) bestowed by men (in the biennial games near Corinth the "crown" was a pine wreath) but the eternal crown bestowed by Christ (3:13-14; 2 Cor. 5:10). Paul's crown would be the consummation of the reward (1 Cor. 9:18) he partially enjoyed, the opportunity to glory before Christ in those he had been able to win (2 Cor. 1:14; Phil. 2:16; 1 Thes. 2:19).

9:26-27. Paul's dictum of becoming "all things to all men" (v. 22) could have been construed as the aimless capitulation of an unprincipled man. But it was just the opposite! Every move made in the course of his race was calculated to further his pursuit of the prize (cf. Phil. 3:13-14). Every blow struck was meant to land squarely on his opponent and send him reeling from the contest (cf. Eph. 6:12; James 4:7). To achieve this, Paul would not let his body master him (cf. 1 Cor. 6:12); sometimes he denied even its demand for rightful privileges and pleasures (8:9) for a greater good (10:33).

Paul was competing well himself and had called many to join him (the word preached is kēryxas, the noun form of which signified a herald who summoned contestants to a race), but that did not guarantee him a victorious finish. He held out the possibility that even he could be disqualified for the prize. The single Greek word translated by that phrase (adokimos) literally means "unapproved." In other contexts it was applied to the unsaved (e.g., Rom. 1:28; Titus 1:16). Here Paul was not addressing the issue of salvation, nor for that matter was even the prize specifically in mind. Rather, he seemed concerned with continuance in the race. Like the brother who had indulged in immorality (1 Cor. 5:1-5), Paul's life could be cut short by the disciplinary disapproval of God. God had disciplined in the past (10:6-10), was disciplining in the present (11:30-32), and would discipline in the immediate future (5:5). Paul was concerned that some might not be able to say with him one day, "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race" (2 Tim. 4:7), but would find themselves cut off in the midst of the contest by the disciplinary action of God.

(2) The negative example of Israel (10:1-13). 10:1. So that the Corinthians might not think God's discipline would be an unlikely eventuality for a people so blessed as they (1:5), Paul cited the illustration of another group of people who were greatly blessed by God but yet experienced His severe discipline. Israel of old was reckless and unrestrained after her physical and spiritual freedom from tyranny in Egypt. As a result God meted out severe discipline by cutting short the lives of many Israelites. They were all in the "race" (9:24), but almost all were disqualified (9:27) in spite of their advantages.

Five advantages were enjoyed by Israel. First, all the liberated Israelites enjoyed the supernatural guidance (Ex. 13:21) and protection (Ex. 14:19-20) of the pillar of cloud in their Exodus from Egypt. The Corinthians had similarly experienced God's guidance (cf. Luke 1:79) and protection (cf. 1 Peter 1:5). Second, all Israelites passed through the sea and experienced a miraculous deliverance from those who sought to take their lives (Ex. 14:21-28). So too had the Corinthians experienced a miraculous deliverance—salvation (cf. Heb. 2:14-15; Gal. 1:4).

10:2. Third, the Israelites were all baptized into Moses, that is, united with their spiritual head, God's servant, who became the object of their trust (Ex. 14:31; cf. John 5:45). The Corinthians had been baptized into the body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:13) of which He is the Head (Eph. 1:22) and in whom they trusted (Matt. 12:21; Eph. 1:12).

10:3. As a fourth privilege, the Israelites all enjoyed spiritual food, the supernatural bread from heaven (Ex. 16:4, 15). The Corinthians too had eaten bread from heaven (cf. John 6:31-34).

10:4. As a fifth advantage, Paul listed the spiritual drink enjoyed by Israel in the desert (Ex. 17:6). According to Paul, Christ was the source of this supernatural water. Since the incident of the rock which produced water marked the beginning of Israel's wilderness wanderings (Ex. 17:1-7) and happened again near the ending of their wanderings (Num. 20:1-13), Paul concluded that Christ accompanied them. Christ too was the source of supernatural water for the Corinthians (cf. John 4:10-14).

It is possible that these five blessings were intended by Paul to reflect the two ordinances of baptism (1 Cor. 10:1-2) and the Lord's Supper (vv. 3-4) which the Corinthians may have thought communicated a magical protection like similar rites in some of the mystery religions. The Corinthians did seem to have a distorted view and practice of both of these ordinances (cf. 11:17-34; 15:29) which required correction.

10:5. The presence of supernatural privileges in the lives of Old Testament Israelites did not produce automatic success. On the contrary, in spite of their special advantages, most of them (in fact, all but two members of one generation, Joshua and Caleb) experienced God's discipline, were disqualified, and died in the desert (Num. 14:29). In light of this, Paul's avowed need for personal self-discipline (1 Cor. 9:27) was genuine since even Moses was disqualified for the prize (Num. 20:12).

10:6. Since this was so, the Corinthians' complacency in matters of self-discipline and their corresponding penchant for self-indulgence required immediate remedial action. Christian freedom was not meant to lead to self-indulgence but to selfless service (cf. Gal. 5:13), as the behavior of past Israelites illustrated.

Paralleling the fivefold blessings enjoyed by Israel in their newfound freedom from Egypt, Paul proceeded to recount a fivefold failure experienced by Israel during this time. He began with the Israelites' craving for the pleasures of Egypt, summarized in their plaintive cry, "Give us meat to eat!" (Num. 11:4-34, esp. v. 13) God gave them what they wanted but while the meat was still between their teeth, He struck them with a plague. The Israelites named the cemetery for those who were killed "Kibroth Hattaavah" ("graves of craving"; Num. 11:34). The application to the Corinthian situation was obvious (cf. 1 Cor. 8:13).

10:7. Second, many in Israel failed by participating in idolatry (Ex. 32:1-6) and paid for it with their lives (Ex. 32:28, 35). Apparently some Corinthians were interested in more than meat in the pagan temples (1 Cor. 8:10; 10:14). For those who thought they as Christians could take part in idolatry with impunity, Paul intended, with illustrations like this, to knock out the false props which supported their behavior (v. 12) before God intervened and took their lives.

10:8. A third failure among the privileged Israelites was in the area of sexual immorality. In the Israelites' case the immorality was associated with idolatry (Num. 25:1-2), which also characterized much pagan worship in the first century. But the Corinthians indulged in immorality in contexts other than idolatry, as the instances of rebuke in 1 Corinthians 5:1 and 6:18 illustrate. As God had brought death to the immoral among the Israelites (Num. 25:4-9), He could do in Corinth (e.g., 1 Cor. 5:5), a sobering thought for the libertines who said, "Everything is permissible" (6:12; 10:23).

A possible solution to the apparent discrepancy in the death count found in Numbers 25:9 (24,000) and Paul's figure of 23,000 may reside in the phrase one day. Moses and most of Israel were mourning the death of those who had been executed by the judges (Num. 25:5) or killed by an ongoing plague. Meanwhile Phineas was dispatching an Israelite man and Moabite woman in their last act of immorality (Num. 25:6-8), which brought to completion God's discipline of the immoral Israelites and ended the death toll by plague at 24,000, a number probably intended as a summary figure.

Another explanation of the 24,000 in Numbers (contra. Paul's 23,000) is that the former included the leaders (cf. Num. 25:4), whereas the latter did not.

10:9. The Israelites' fourth failure was the presuming of some to question the plan and purpose of God on their trek to Canaan. As a result they were killed by snakes (Num. 21:4-6). Did the Corinthians think that they knew better than God the path that would bring them to heaven? (cf. 1 Cor. 1:18–3:20)

10:10. Israel's fifth failure, which God disciplined with death, occurred when they spoke rebelliously against God's appointed leaders, Moses and Aaron (Num. 16:41-49). Was Paul facing a similar situation as an outgrowth of the Corinthians' party spirit? (cf. 1 Cor. 1:11; 4:18-19) It is possible that each of these failures found expression in the Corinthian issue of eating food sacrificed to idols.

10:11. God's dealings with Israel were more than a matter of historical curiosity for Paul. They were examples (cf. v. 6) and warnings for the Corinthians that the God with whom they had to deal, who was bringing His interaction with people to a close in this fulfillment of the ages, was the same God who disciplined the Israelites with death and would do so again (cf. 11:30).

10:12. If the Corinthians believed their standing in Christ and corresponding freedom could be exercised in sin with impunity, they were wrong, possibly dead wrong.

10:13. After kicking out the props of false security, Paul pointed toward the One on whom the Corinthians could rely. The temptations that seized the Corinthians were like those people had always faced. They could be met and endured by depending on God, who is faithful. Part of the Corinthian problem, of course, was that some in the face of temptation were not looking for a way out by endurance, but a way in for indulgence.

c. The application to idolatry (10:14-11:1)

10:14-15. The therefore (dioper) introduced Paul's application of Christian freedom to eating food sacrificed to idols. He gave advice in three areas: (a) meat in the pagan temple (vv. 14-22; cf. 8:10); (b) meat in the marketplace (10:25-26); (c) meat in the home (vv. 27-30). His advice on the first count was uncomplicated—flee from idolatry (cf. 6:18, "flee from sexual immorality"). He believed that the rhetorical questions which followed would lead sensible people like the Corinthians (cf. 4:10) to agree.

10:16-17. Paul's point in these verses about the Lord's Supper was like that made earlier (5:6-8). The collective worship of Christians at the Lord's Supper expressed the unity among the members and their participation (koinōnia, "fellowship") in the blood of Christ and in the body of Christ. The one loaf of bread, of which all partake, pictured their unity as members of the one body of Christ.

10:18. Likewise in the worship of Israel, the participants identified with what was sacrificed and with each other.

10:19-21. The same was true of pagan worship. It was true that an idol was nothing (8:4; cf. Ps. 115:4-7), but the ultimate reality behind pagan religion was demonic. Pagan sacrifices were offered to demons, not to God. Through his minions "the god of this age" blinded unbelievers and kept them from the truth (2 Cor. 4:4). There could be no union for good between Christ and Belial (2 Cor. 6:15). So those who were the temple of God (1 Cor. 3:16; 6:19) should shun the temple of idols (cf. 2 Cor. 6:14-18). No magical contamination was conveyed, but the corrupt character of the participants would be harmful for believers (1 Cor. 15:33). Being participants with demons was unthinkable for those who are participants with Christ (10:21; cf. v. 16).

10:22. Most importantly such behavior displeased God (cf. Deut. 32:21). Did the "strong" Corinthians (1 Cor. 8:7-10) require the same discipline as Israel? (10:7; Ex. 32:28, 35)

10:23-24. The principle of freedom (everything is permissible; cf. 6:12) was to be regulated by love for others. Activities that are not beneficial or constructive or that do not promote the good of others (cf. 10:33) should be avoided.

10:25-26. For a Christian who bought meat at a market with the intent of eating it at home, Paul recommended that selections be made without reservation. No one could contaminate what God had made clean (cf. Acts 10:15) since everything belongs to Him (Ps. 24:1).

10:27-30. For a Christian who accepted an invitation to another's home Paul recommended eating from all the fare without scrupulous reservation. But if another Christian guest piped up (cf. 8:7-13) that the food had been part of a pagan sacrifice, the knowledgeable Christian should defer to the uninformed scruples of the weaker brother. To exercise his rightful freedom to eat might cause the brother with the scrupulous conscience to follow that example and cause him to sin (cf. Rom. 14:14-23).

A knowledgeable Christian did not need to alter his convictions to accord with the conscience of a weaker brother (1 Cor. 10:29b), but he did need to alter his behavior when in the weaker brother's presence. Otherwise the weak brother might act against his conscience and harm himself (cf. 8:11), which would bring denunciation on the strong brother. What the knowledgeable Christian could enjoy privately with thankfulness became in the presence of the weaker brother a contemptible act eliciting condemnation (why am I denounced [blasphēmoumai] because of something I thank God for? cf. 8:12; Rom. 14:16, 22). An echo of 1 Corinthians 8:13 concluded the matter.

10:31–11:1. The principle which summarized Paul's response to the question of eating food offered as a pagan sacrifice was an application of the command to love God and neighbors. Christian behavior should be for the glory of God. Also it should build up the church of God by leading some to new birth (v. 33b) and others to maturity in the process of salvation (justification, sanctification, glorification; cf. 1:30). Christians should avoid behavior that would cause others—whether Jews (cf. 9:20), Greeks (cf. 9:21), or the church of God . . . to stumble (lit., "fall"; cf. 10:12). (Interestingly this reference to Jews separate from the church shows that the NT church did not replace the Jewish nation. This argues strongly for premillennialism.)

The One who perfectly exemplified love for God and others was Christ (cf. Rom. 15:3; Phil. 2:5-8). Displaying the same spirit in his ministry, Paul urged the Corinthians to follow his example in this matter of food from a pagan sacrifice. They should allow their freedom to be regulated by love.

2. CHRISTIAN LIBERTY IN RELATION TO CHRISTIAN WORSHIP (11:2–14:40)

The theme of personal freedom exercised without regard for the needs of others or the glory of God (which characterized the issue about eating food sacrificed to idols [8:1–11:1]) seems no less a part of this section which deals with practices affecting the assembly of the church. Here too Paul responded to the Corinthians' spirit of self-indulgence by stressing the principle of glorifying God and building up each other in the church.

a. The state of women in worship (11:2-16)

Paul began (11:2-16) and ended (14:34-35) his discussion of Christian freedom as it pertained to worship with remarks directed primarily at the behavior of women in the Corinthian church. Some have questioned whether his comments in this section refer to the actual meeting of the church or to extrachurch occasions in which a woman might pray or prophesy. The fact that Paul appealed to church practice elsewhere as a feature of his argument in this section (11:16) suggests that he was discussing church meetings. Modern distinctions between meetings of the church for worship and other meetings of Christians seem based more on expediency than biblical evidence.

11:2. The Corinthians had expressed to Paul, either in their letter or via their spokesmen (cf. 1:11; 16:17), that they remained devoted to Paul and to the teachings, the central doctrines of the faith, which he had communicated to them (cf. 11:23; 15:1, 3). For this Paul commended them: I praise you.

11:3. Paul no doubt appreciated the Corinthians' goodwill toward him. But more importantly, he wanted to see behavior in keeping with a Christian's calling. As a prelude to his exhortation, Paul characteristically laid down a theological basis. In this instance it concerned headship. The word head (kephalē) seems to express two things:

subordination and origination. The former reflects the more usual Old Testament usage (e.g., Jud. 10:18), the latter that of Greek vernacular (e.g., Herodotus History 4. 91). The former is primary in this passage, but the latter may also be found (1 Cor. 11:8). The subordination of Christ to God is noted elsewhere in the letter (3:23; 15:28). His subordination to the Father is also true in His work as the "agent" of Creation (8:6; cf. Col. 1:15-20).

11:4. When a man prayed aloud publicly or exercised the gift of prophecy by declaring a revelation from God (cf. 12:10), he was to have his physical head uncovered so that he would not dishonor himself and his spiritual head, Christ (v. 3).

The alternate translation in the NIV margin, which interprets the man's covering as long hair, is largely based on the view that verse 15 equated the covering with long hair. It is unlikely, however, that this was the point of verse 4 (cf. comments on v. 15).

11:5-6. It cannot be unequivocally asserted but the preponderance of evidence points toward the public head covering of women as a universal custom in the first century in both Jewish culture ([apocryphal] 3 Maccabees 4:6; Mishnah, Ketuboth 7. 6; Babylonian Talmud, Ketuboth 72a-b) and Greco-Roman culture (Plutarch Moralia 3. 232c; 4. 267b; Apuleius The Golden Ass 11. 10). The nature of the covering varied considerably (Ovid The Art of Love 3:135-65), but it was commonly a portion of the outer garment drawn up over the head like a hood.

It seems that the Corinthian slogan, "everything is permissible," had been applied to meetings of the church as well, and the Corinthian women had expressed that principle by throwing off their distinguishing dress. More importantly they seem to have rejected the concept of subordination within the church (and perhaps in society) and with it any cultural symbol (e.g., a head-covering) which might have been attached to it. According to Paul, for a woman to throw off the covering was an act not of liberation but of degradation. She might as well shave her head, a sign of disgrace (Aristophanes Thesmophoriazysae 837). In doing so, she dishonors herself and her spiritual head, the man.

11:7-9. The man, on the other hand, was not to have his head covered because he was the image and glory of God. Paul based this conclusion on Genesis 1:26-27. A woman's (a wife's) glory and image was derived from (1 Cor. 11:8) and complementary to (v. 9) that of the man (her husband). Man, then, was God's authoritative representative who found in woman a divinely made ally in fulfilling this role (Gen. 2:18-24). In this sense she as a wife is the glory of man, her husband. If a married woman abandoned this complementary role, she also abandoned her glory, and for Paul an uncovered woman's head gave symbolic expression to that spirit.

11:10. Paul offered a third reason (the first reason was the divine order—God, Christ, man, woman, vv. 3-6; the second reason was Creation, vv. 7-9) why womanly insubordination in the church should not exist. Angels were spectators of the church (4:9; Eph. 3:10; 1 Tim. 5:21; cf. Ps. 103:20-21). For a woman to exercise her freedom to participate in the church without the head covering, the sign of her authority (exousia, a liberating term; cf. 1 Cor. 7:37; 8:9; 9:4-6, 12, 18), would be to bring the wisdom of God (Eph. 3:10) into disrepute.

Other (but less acceptable) explanations have been suggested for the words because of the "angels": (a) evil angels lusted after the women in the Corinthian congregation; (b) angels are messengers, that is, pastors; (c) good angels learn from women; (d) good angels are an example of subordination; (e) good angels would be tempted by a woman's insubordination.

11:11-12. Men and women together in mutual interdependence, complementing each other, bring glory to God (cf. 10:31). Neither should be independent or think themselves superior to the other. Woman's subordination does not mean inferiority. Man is not superior in being to woman. Eve came from Adam, and each man born in the world comes from a woman's womb (11:12). God created them both for each other (Gen. 1:27; 2:18).

covering as a woman's expression of her subordination on arguments rooted in special revelation. Now he turned to natural revelation (cf. Rom. 1:20) for a fourth argument in support of his recommendation. Mankind instinctively distinguished between the sexes in various ways, one of which was length of hair. Exceptions to this general practice were due either to necessity (e.g., Apuleius The Golden Ass 7. 6, "to escape in disguise") or perversity (Diogenes Laertius, Lives 6. 65). No abstract length of hair was in mind so much as male and female differentiation. The Spartans, for example, favored shoulder-length hair for men (cf. Lucian The Runaways 27) which they tied up for battle (Herodotus History 7. 208-9), and no one thought them effeminate.

Long hair was a woman's glory because it gave visible expression to the differentiation of the sexes. This was Paul's point in noting that long hair was given to her as a covering. Natural revelation confirmed the propriety of women wearing the physical covering (cf. Cicero On Duties 1. 28. 100). She has a natural covering, and should follow the custom of wearing a physical covering in a public meeting.

Some Bible students, however, say that the Greek anti, rendered "as" (i.e., "for" or "in anticipation of") should be translated in its more normal sense of "instead of." According to that view, a woman's hair was given instead of a physical covering, for it in itself is a covering. In this view women should pray with long hair, not short hair. This view, however, does not explain the woman's act of covering or uncovering her head, mentioned in 1 Corinthians 11:5-6.

11:16. Paul's fifth argument for maintaining the status quo on head-coverings came from universal church practice. Paul was not trying to foist a new behavioral pattern on the Corinthians but simply to hold the line against self-indulgent individual excess in the name of freedom. As in the case of food offered to idols (8:1–11:1), Paul dealt with the immediate issue but also put his finger on the root of the problem, the Corinthian pursuit of self-interest which was unwilling to subordinate itself to the needs of others (cf. 10:24) or the glory of God (10:31). Throwing off the head covering was an act of insubordination which discredited God.

Whether women today in church services should wear hats depends on whether the custom of head coverings in the first century is to be understood as a practice also intended for the present day. Many Bible students see that for today the principle of subordination (not the command to wear hats) is the key point in this passage. The intent of the custom of women wearing hats today, for fashion, seems far different from the purpose of the custom in the first century.

b. The state of Christians at the Lord's Supper (11:17-34)

At Jesus' institution of the Lord's Supper with His disciples (Matt. 26:26-29; Mark 14:22-25; Luke 22:15-20) the bread and cup were part of a meal, with the bread probably broken near the beginning (cf. "when He had given thanks," 1 Cor. 11:24) and the cup taken at the end (cf. "after supper," v. 25). By the time Paul wrote, the Lord's Supper was celebrated in two stages which consolidated the partaking of the bread and cup at the end of a communal meal. The worship with the bread and cup came to be called the "Eucharist" (Didache 9:1; Ignatius Letter to the Philadelphians 4), from the Greek word for "thanksgiving" (eucharisteō). The communal meal was called the Agapē (Jude 12; Pliny Letters 10. 96. 7), a Greek word for "love."

What bothered Paul about the Corinthian celebration was that the Agapē meal had become an occasion not marked by love for fellow Christians but one of self-centered indulgence. In the subsequent development of the church the celebrations came to be divided (Ignatius Letter to the Smyrneans 8; 1-2; and [apocryphal] Acts of John 84), possibly on the mistaken assumption that Paul had advised the Corinthians to do that (cf. 1 Cor. 11:22, 34).

11:17. As in the preceding discussion on womanly excesses in worship, Paul had no commendation (but cf. v. 2) for the Corinthians when it came to their practice of the Lord's Supper. In fact an experience meant to build up the church was actually having the opposite effect: your meetings do more harm than good.

11:18-19. The church was divided at a celebration which was meant to express unity (cf. 10:17). If these divisions (schismata; 1:10; 12:25) were related to those noted earlier (1:10–4:21), then one factor contributing to those divisions is evident here, namely, economic differences in the church (11:21).

Paul did not want to believe the report about their divisions (v. 18b), but he knew that sin was inevitable (cf. Luke 17:1) and would not pass unnoticed by God. God's approval (dokimoi) resumed a point Paul had discussed earlier (1 Cor. 9:27–10:10), where he used in 9:27 the contrasting word "disqualified" (adokimos).

In the whole nation of Israel, freed from bondage in Egypt and bound for the Promised Land of Canaan, only two of that vast company gained God's approval and entered the land (cf. 10:5). Many in the Corinthian assembly did not have this approval, which His discipline on them demonstrated (cf. 11:30-32). If the Corinthians thought the ordinances of the Lord's Supper and baptism somehow communicated magical protection to the participants (cf. 10:12; 15:24), Paul's excoriation must have been doubly painful since their behavior at this rite was directly linked to their chastisement (11:30-32)—the very thing they sought to avoid.

11:20-21. The Lord's Supper should have been the remembrance of a preeminently selfless act, Christ's death on behalf of others. Instead the Corinthians had turned the memorial of selflessness into an experience of selfishness and had made a rite of unity a riotous disunity. While one brother went hungry because he lacked the means to eat well, another brother drank to excess.

11:22. If the Corinthians wanted private parties they could have them in their homes. The meeting of the church was no place for a sectarian spirit of any sort, especially since the Lord's Supper was intended to commemorate just the opposite spirit. To act in a spirit of selfish disregard for the needs of a brother was to despise the church of God, composed not of lifeless stones but of living people who could be grievously hurt. Did the Corinthians somehow think their libertarian acts were a matter for praise? (cf. 5:1-2) Just the opposite!

11:23-24. Paul proceeded to remind the Corinthians of what they knew but had denied by their actions. Whether this teaching came to Paul directly (by a vision; cf. Gal. 1:12) or indirectly (by men; 1 Cor. 15:1), it came with the Lord's authority. The bread represented the incarnate body of Christ unselfishly assumed (Phil. 2:6-7) and unselfishly given on the cross for the benefit of others (2 Cor. 8:9; Phil. 2:8), that kept needing to be remembered (cf. 1 Cor. 4:8-13).

11:25. The wine was a poignant reminder of Christ's blood, without the shedding of which there could be no forgiveness from sin (Heb. 9:22) and through which cleansing and a new relationship (covenant) with God was made (Heb. 9:14-15). The word "covenant" referred to a relationship in which one party established terms which the other party accepted or rejected. The focus of the Old Covenant was the written Word (Ex. 24:1-8). The focus of the New Covenant is the Living Word (John 1:14-18). Christ intended the cup to be a representational (cf. John 10:9; 1 Cor. 10:4) reminder of Him: do this . . . in remembrance of Me.

11:26. The Lord's Supper was a visible sermon that proclaimed "the message of the Cross" (1:18, 23; 2:2, 8), that is, the reality of the Lord's death, and also the certainty of His return (until He comes) (cf. John 14:1-4). Though there apparently was no prescribed schedule for the observance of the Lord's Supper (cf. Ignatius Letter to the Ephesians 13:1), whenever it was celebrated its message of humiliation and subsequent exaltation (Phil. 2:6-11) went forth. This was a needed reminder to all saints, especially those in Corinth (cf. 1 Cor. 4:8-13).

11:27-29. The Corinthians' despicable behavior at the communal meal was not without result, which Paul proceeded to point out. Nowadays when this passage is read before participation in the Lord's Supper, it is usually intended to produce soul-searching introspection and silent confession to Christ so that no one will sin against the spiritual presence of the Lord by irreverent observance. Paul's application was probably more concrete. No doubt his experience on the Damascus Road (Acts 9:4-5) contributed to this, for the body of Christ is the church, which consists of individual believers (cf.

1 Cor. 12:12, 27). His body, the church, is also pictured by the bread of Communion (5:7; 10:16-17). Thus to sin against another believer is to sin against Christ (8:12). Those guilty of sinning against the body and blood of the Lord were those who despised a poorer member by utter disregard for his need (11:21-22). These came to the remembrance of Christ's work of unity and reconciliation (cf. Eph. 2:15-16) with a trail of deeds that had produced disunity and alienation! If these would examine (dokimazetō, "test to approve," 1 Cor. 11:28) themselves, they would see that they lacked God's approval (dokimoi, v. 19) in this behavior. They should seek out the wronged brother and ask his forgiveness. Only then could a true spirit of worship flourish (cf. Matt. 5:23-24 and Didache 14. 1-3). Coming to the Lord's Supper without that sin confessed brought judgment on the guilty participants. Only by recognizing (diakrinōn, "properly judging") the unity of the body of the Lord—and acting accordingly—could they avoid bringing "judgment" (krima) on themselves.

11:30-32. What that judgment entailed was then explained by Paul. In brief, it was sickness and death (cf. 10:1-11). The solution was self-examination (diekrinomen, 11:31; cf. vv. 28-29; 5:1-5; 10:12), self-discipline (9:27), and promoting of unity. The alternative was God's judging (krinomenoi, 11:32), which was a discipline that they were then experiencing. This was not a loss of salvation, but of life (cf. 5:5).

11:33-34. If the believers were self-disciplined, they should wait in the Agapē meal till all arrived. This also may have implied sharing the meal with others (cf. v. 22). If the demands of hunger were too great for some, they should satisfy those pangs at home before coming to the assembly. The Lord's Supper was a time not for self-indulgence but for mutual edification (v. 26). If the former prevailed, God would continue to discipline severely. Other matters—apparently less serious aberrations related to the Lord's Supper—Paul would attend to when he returned to Corinth (16:5-9).

c. The state of spiritual gifts (chaps. 12–14)

Related to the subject of irregularities in the worship of the Corinthian church, was a question on the nature of spiritual gifts and their exercise in the public assembly. This subject should also be considered under the broader rubric of Christian freedom which Paul had been qualifying and regulating by the principle of love (starting with 8:1). The need for such regulation was certainly evident. A self-indulgent spirit, which debauched the principle of freedom in other areas, found similar expression in the area of spiritual gifts, and produced selfishness and disunity (12:7, 25; 14:4) and apparent chaos in the assembly (14:23, 33, 40).

Paul dealt with the problem by describing the nature and purpose of gifts (12:1-30), the superiority of love (12:31–13:13), and the regulating of the exercise of gifts by love (chap. 14). As in other areas, so in using gifts in the church, believers should promote the glory of God and the good of others instead of self-satisfaction.

(1) Unity and diversity of gifts (12:1-31a). 12:1-3. Before Paul began his discussion of spiritual gifts he thought it necessary to confront, at the outset, any in the Corinthian assembly who might contradict his message (cf. 14:37). It is probably in this regard that 12:3 is to be understood. Many explanations of the verse have been offered (though most commentators "handle" the problem by ignoring it).

Paul apparently believed that some of the Corinthians' problems were due not entirely to their worldly attitudes (3:3) but also to the presence of false teachers who preyed on their spiritual immaturity and exacerbated the problems. The pagan background out of which many had come (and some were still coming; cf. 8:10; 10:14, 20-21) did not help them ascertain the presence of false prophets. When they were pagans, they had been influenced and led astray to dumb idols (12:2). Certainly lifeless idols are totally helpless in such matters! (In the Corinthians' vaunted wisdom they showed themselves to be unusually gullible [cf. 2 Cor. 11:1-21, esp. 19-20].)

Paul therefore laid down a simple test related to the person of Christ. The false teachers obviously claimed that their visions, revelations, and messages (cf. 2 Cor. 12:1) were from God, but they apparently denied the humanity of Christ, as expressed by the words Jesus be cursed. This may have been a factor in the Corinthians' aversion to Paul's "message of the Cross" (1 Cor. 1:10–4:13). It may be surprising today to realize that the earliest Christological heresy (Docetism) denied Jesus' humanity, not His deity. John had to deal with the same problem years later (1 John 4:1-3).

Also Jesus who had suffered was now the Jesus who reigns as Lord, whom Paul represented (1 Cor. 1:1) and who was to be obeyed. Only believers, speaking by the Holy Spirit, acknowledge that Jesus is Lord. Nonbelievers—including false teachers—deny His sovereign lordship. Thus anyone who tries to controvert Jesus' authority and His Word will suffer the consequences (14:38; 16:22).

12:4-6. Paul had referred to God, Jesus, and the Holy Spirit in verse 3. Now in reverse order he stressed the unity of the Godhead in relation to the different spiritual gifts. The Holy Spirit gives a diversity of gifts (cf. "Spirit" in vv. 7-9, 11) so that individuals can serve the Lord and His body, the church, in various ways (cf. vv. 7, 27), all empowered by God and exercised under His aegis (cf. vv. 18, 24). Though there are different kinds (diaireseis) of gifts . . . service, and working, the same Spirit . . . the same Lord (Christ), and the same God are involved in all of them.

12:7-10. The gifts had a unity in source (vv. 4-6), and they also had a unity in purpose. They were given, not for personal enrichment (cf. 14:4; 1 Peter 4:10), but for the common good of the body of Christ, the building up of others (1 Cor. 10:24; 14:12). Paul listed some of the gifts here. Others, along with some of these, are given in Romans 12:6-8; 1 Corinthians 12:28-31; Ephesians 4:11; 1 Peter 4:10-11.

The list here includes nine gifts. (1) Wisdom refers to insight into doctrinal truth. Paul exercised and expressed this gift in this letter (e.g., 2:6). (2) Knowledge refers to the ability to apply doctrinal truth to life. Paul also exercised and expressed this gift in this letter (e.g., 12:1-3; 11:3). (Cf. the recurrence of the phrase "Do you not know" in 3:16; 5:6; 6:2-3, 9, 15-16, 19; 9:13, 24; also cf. 8:1-3, 10-11). (3) Faith as a spiritual gift is probably an unusual measure of trust in God beyond that exercised by most Christians (e.g., 13:2). (4) Healing is the ability to restore health (e.g., Acts 3:7; 19:12) and also to hold off death itself temporarily (Acts 9:40; 20:9-10). (5) Miraculous powers may refer to exorcising demons (Acts 19:12) or inducing physical disability (Acts 13:11) or even death (Acts 5:5, 9). (6) Prophecy is the ability, like that of the Old Testament prophets, to declare a message of God for His people (1 Cor. 14:3). (7) Ability to distinguish between spirits is the gift to differentiate the Word of God proclaimed by a true prophet from that of a satanic deceiver (cf. 2 Cor. 11:14-15; 1 John 4:1). If the Corinthians possessed this gift (cf. 1 Cor. 1:7), it was not being put to good use (cf. 12:1-3). (8) Tongues refers to the ability to speak an unlearned, living language (e.g., Acts 2:11). (9) Interpretation was the ability to translate an unlearned, known language expressed in the assembly (1 Cor. 14:27).

With the possible exception of faith, all these gifts seem to have been confirmatory and foundational gifts for the establishment of the church (cf. Heb. 2:4; Eph. 2:20) and were therefore temporary.

12:11. The gifts were not meant to be selected by individuals or personally solicited by them, but were instead given by the . . . Spirit . . . as He determined. "The Spirit" is referred to six times in verses 7-11.

12:12. This verse forms an excellent three-part summary of the rest of the chapter. (a) The human body is a unit (cf. v. 13 on the unity of the body of Christ). (b) The human body has many parts, with a necessary diversity in its members (cf. vv. 14-20). (c) The parts of the human body work together as one, with a dependent mutuality as each part fulfills an important function (cf. vv. 21-26). Likewise the body of Christ has a diversity of parts functioning together (vv. 27-30).

12:13. The One who gave the diverse gifts, the Spirit, was also the medium in which, by which, and with which (possible translations of the Gr. preposition en; cf. Matt. 3:11) that unity exists. The baptism of the Spirit is experienced by all who believe, at the moment of salvation (cf. Rom. 8:9). In that baptism, believers, regardless of nationality (whether Jews or Greeks) or station of life (slave or free), are identified with Christ (baptized . . . into one body) and are indwelt by the Spirit (given the one Spirit to drink; cf. John 4:14; 7:38-39).

12:14-20. Different parts are needed if a body is to exist (v. 19). So too, no believer should think of himself or his gift as inferior and so desire another member's gift. The gifts were not haphazardly distributed (cf. v. 11) but carefully arranged according to the perfect will of God (v. 18).

12:21-26. In the diversity of the bodily parts there was a corresponding mutual dependence. A person with a seemingly greater gift should not imagine that he could function alone since a bodily member cut off from the natural body would cease to exist. More importantly, one thought to possess a lesser gift should in fact be accorded greater attention by the other members of the body (cf. 14:1-5) just as in the natural body special deference in attention to dress is paid to those parts of the body deemed less presentable (12:22-24). Possibly Paul was reaching back in thought beyond the immediate discussion of gifts when he referred to weaker members (v. 22; cf. 8:7-13) and less honorable ones (12:23; cf. 11:22) who also required special care and consideration. This too was part of God's plan (God . . . combined the members), that members of the spiritual body would demonstrate a mutual concern for the well-being of others (12:25b-26; 10:24, 33) so that rivalry would cease (so that there should be no division in the body; 1:10; 11:18) and genuine unity would exist (12:26).

12:27-31a. The unifying member in the spiritual body is Christ. As the Head (Eph. 1:22; cf. 1 Cor. 11:3) He possesses the body and sovereignly expresses His will. His command is that love should prevail among the members (John 15:12). This was the force which would maintain unity within the diversity and to this subject Paul would shortly move (1 Cor. 12:31b–13:13).

For a third time (cf. 12:18, 24, 28), however, Paul stressed the fact that God, not man, assigned the gifts. As he discussed another sample of gifts (some repeated from vv. 7-10 and some new), it was the members, the people so gifted, to whom he referred. Since the gifts included in the two lists in this chapter contain novelty and redundancy (which is the case elsewhere in passages detailing gifts, e.g., Rom. 12:6-8; Eph. 4:11; 1 Peter 4:10-11—the gift of teaching being the only gift which appears in each list), probably no complete catalog existed.

The fact that Paul assigned ordinal numbers (first . . . second . . . third) to the first three gifts suggests that these may have been relegated to a lesser role by the Corinthians (cf. 1 Cor. 12:21-24). Those three kinds of gifted members—apostles . . . prophets . . . teachers—probably were rated lower than those who had the more spectacular gift of tongues. But the first three gifts may have been greater (v. 31) because of their extensive value to the whole body of Christ. This may be why he listed them first and then said that the church should eagerly desire (v. 31) the exercise of those gifts in the assembly (cf. 14:1-5). Gifted apostles, prophets, and teachers characteristically ministered to a whole church, and so would engender unity and mutual edification. The gift of tongues, on the other hand, suited the Corinthian penchant for self-expression and the pursuit of personal freedom. This self-centeredness also afflicted the church in other areas (e.g., eating sacrificial foods, women in worship, celebration of the Lord's Supper). Love for others was an essential need in the Corinthian church, and to that fundamental attribute Paul then turned to pay eloquent tribute.

(2) Superiority of love to all gifts (12:31b–13:13). 12:31b. Though Paul greatly valued spiritual gifts, he valued even more a quality of life which the Spirit produced. Spiritual gifts were variously apportioned to individuals in the church so that no single gift was possessed by every member (cf. vv. 19-30). On the other hand the Holy Spirit sought to produce the fruit of the Spirit in every Christian (Gal. 5:22-23), chief among which was love. This was more important than the gifts, and when displayed it would help correct the Corinthian aberrations which surrounded their possession and use of God's gifts (cf. 1 Cor. 14:1).

The way Paul referred to was a manner of life preeminently characterized by love (cf. John 15:9-17). Jesus and John the Baptist followed this way of righteousness (Matt. 3:15; 21:32) by obediently practicing the will of God and exhorting their followers to do the same (Matt. 5:6, 10, 20; 6:33). This same manner of life and consequent conduct Paul called the way of love (1 Cor. 14:1; cf. Rom. 13:8-10), which he followed and exhorted the Corinthians to do the same (1 Cor. 14:1; cf. 11:1).

13:1. Some have suggested that this "hymn to love" (chap. 13) was composed by Paul on a previous occasion (under the Spirit's inspiration, of course) and inserted in the letter at this point (under the Spirit's direction) because of its telling appropriateness. This may be so, for the balance in form and substance reflects Paul at his best (but cf. 1:25-29, a passage which exhibits superb parallelism). Still, these verses so directly touch the many issues raised in this letter that if they were previously composed, the Corinthians and their problems were never far removed from Paul's mind as he wrote.

Eloquence was greatly admired in the first century and the Corinthians were no exception, though they found little of it in Paul (cf. 2:1, 4; 2 Cor. 10:10). This may explain in part their fascination with tongues. Paul's application of this and the following conditional clauses (1 Cor. 13:2-3) to himself was forceful since he could claim exceptional experiences, particularly in regard to the languages of men (14:18) and of angels (cf. 2 Cor. 12:4). But the statement was probably meant to include every imaginable mode of speech. It was a statement of hyperbole concerning exalted eloquence, which if void of love might be momentarily electrifying like a clash of gong or cymbal but then vanished just as quickly. Love on the other hand produces eternal effects (cf. v. 13).

13:2. Even the gift of prophecy (cf. 12:10) which Paul championed as a great gift for the Corinthian church (14:1) or the gifts of wisdom, knowledge, and faith (cf. 12:8-9) were nothing compared with love. Paul was not depreciating those gifts but was appreciating love by showing it to be incomparable.

13:3. Even self-sacrifice can be self-centered (cf. Matt. 6:2), and the ultimate sacrifice, here depicted as self-immolation (cf. Dan. 3:17-18; [apocryphal] 2 Maccabees 7:5; Strabo Geography 15. 1. 73) is ultimately futile without love.

13:4. Paul shifted from the first person to the third person and replaced himself with a personification of love. Some have seen in verses 4-6 the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22-23); others have seen here a description of Christ Himself. As different sides of the same coin, both are applicable and provided a solution to the many Corinthian problems. Love, defined by 14 predications (half of them negative, half positive) constituted the "way." Love, Paul wrote, is patient . . . kind . . . does not envy or boast, and is not proud.

Patience (makrothymia) is the capacity to be wronged and not retaliate. The Corinthian church had many members who had been wronged (e.g., in lawsuits [1 Cor. 6:8] and the poor at communal meals [11:21-22]). The response of love to these wrongs would be a display of kindness and goodness. Envy and boasting seemed to abound as two poles of the same problem (e.g., divisions [1:10; 3:3, 21]; gifts [12:14-25]). The Corinthians had no monopoly on pride though they seemed to. The verb physioō occurs only seven times in the New Testament, six of which are found in this letter (cf. 4:6, 18-19; 5:2; 8:1).

13:5. Paul then gave four negative descriptions of love: It is not rude nor self-seeking nor easily angered, and it keeps no record of wrongs. Rudeness found expression in the problem of women in worship (11:2-16), the disorders at the Lord's Supper (11:17-22), and the general organization of worship (14:26-33). Self-satisfaction was a pervasive disorder particularly manifested in the eating of food sacrificed to idols (8:9; 10:23-24). People who are not easily angered usually do not start lawsuits (as in 6:1-11). Love does not record wrongs, though there was ample opportunity for doing so in Corinth (e.g., 6:8; 7:5; 8:11).

13:6. Love does not delight in evil (e.g., incest [5:1-2, 8]), but rejoices in truth (5:8).

13:7. Love always protects (cf. 8:13), trusts (cf. 15:11), hopes (cf. 9:10, 23), and perseveres (hypomenei, "remains steadfast in the face of unpleasant circumstances"; cf. 9:19-22).

(vv. 4-7) of love, Paul concluded with a discussion of its permanence (vv. 8-13). Love never fails, in the sense it will never come to an end. Positively stated, it is eternal. This is not true of the spiritual gifts. Some of the gifts were foundational (e.g., prophecies and knowledge; cf. Eph. 2:20) and confirmatory (e.g., tongues; cf. 2 Cor. 12:12; Heb. 2:4). Every gift is linked in some way to building up the church to maturity—some (prophecy, knowledge, tongues) functioning in the early years of the Church Age and others continuing on till the church is perfected. When that perfection is achieved, the gifts will have served their purposes and will be rendered obsolete. But this will not happen to love.

13:9-10. As Paul explained it, the gift of knowledge (v. 8), essential as it was, was not exhaustive. The ability to prophesy, however crucial for the church's life, was of limited scope. The gifts were temporary blessings in an imperfect age. One day they would give way to perfection, toward which all the gifts pointed.

What Paul meant when he referred to the coming of perfection is the subject of considerable debate. One suggestion is that perfection described the completion of the New Testament. But verse 12 makes that interpretation unlikely. A few have suggested that this state of perfection will not be reached until the new heavens and new earth are established. Another point of view understands perfection to describe the state of the church when God's program for it is consummated at the coming of Christ. There is much to commend this view, including the natural accord it enjoys with the illustration of growth and maturity which Paul used in the following verses.

13:11. Paul elsewhere described the purpose of gifts by an illustration employing the imagery of growth and maturity. According to Ephesians 4:11-16, the gifts were to be used to bring the church from a state of infancy to adulthood. The word translated "mature" in that passage (Eph. 4:13) is the word translated "perfection" (teleion) in 1 Corinthians 13:10. In the Ephesians passage, maturity is defined as "attaining to the whole measure of the fullness of Christ." Such a state will obviously not exist until Christ's second coming.

It would appear that the same perspective was developed in this passage to the Corinthians. Paul applied the illustration to himself (cf. vv. 1-3). The threefold talking, thinking, and reasoning were probably meant to balance the thrice-mentioned gifts (v. 8). With the coming of adulthood, such gifts become passé. Paul's use of the word became (gegona, a perf. tense verb, probably proleptic; cf. Rom. 13:8; 1 Cor. 14:23) was of course to be understood in the context of the illustration. It does not indicate that he personally or the church collectively had yet arrived at that point (cf. Phil. 3:12). It would not, on the other hand, necessarily rule out a gradual obsolescence of certain gifts as the church progressed toward maturity.

13:12. A city like Corinth, famous for its bronze mirrors, would have particularly appreciated Paul's final illustration. The perfection and imperfection mentioned in verse 10 were deftly likened to the contrasting images obtained by the indirect reflection of one's face viewed in a bronze mirror and the same face when viewed directly. Such, Paul said, was the contrast between the imperfect time in which he then wrote and the perfect time which awaited him and the church when the partial reflection of the present would give way to the splendor of perfect vision. Then Paul would see God (cf. 15:28; 1 John 3:2) as God now saw Paul. Then partial knowledge (cf. 1 Cor. 8:1-3) would be displaced by the perfect knowledge of God.

13:13. Paul completed his three-paneled portrait of love (vv. 1-3, 4-7, 8-13) with a final triad: faith, hope, and love. Much discussion has focused on whether faith and hope were portrayed by Paul as being (with love) eternal. The solution is probably found in verse 7. Faith is an expression of love (the word "trusts," pisteuei, v. 7, is the verb form of the noun "faith," pistis), as is hope (cf. Gal. 5:5-6). Faith and hope, as manifestations of love, will endure eternally. So too everyone who follows the way of love (1 Cor. 14:1) finds "the most excellent way" (12:31b), because every individual characterized by love carries that mark eternally. The spiritual gifts will one day cease to exist, but love will endure forever.

(3) Priority of prophecy to tongues (14:1-25). Chapter 13 is one of the most sublime digressions in any letter in any language. But it was nonetheless a deviation from the central theme of gifts and their use by the church which Paul began in chapter 12 and then concluded in chapter 14. Paul had intimated in chapter 12 that the Corinthians were perverting the purpose of gifts from a unifying influence on the church to one fostering fragmentation and discord (esp. 12:21-25). A contributing factor to their factious spirit was the Corinthian pursuit of individual freedom and personal enhancement at the expense of other members of the body whose needs may have been trampled or ignored along the way. Manifestations of this self-centeredness affected each of the problem issues taken up since chapter 8.

The focal problem in the matter of the use and abuse of gifts seemed to be the Corinthian fascination with tongues, a gift which apparently lent itself most readily to perversion from something intended "for the common good" (12:7) to something employed for personal enhancement (14:4). Paul's corrective was not to stifle the use of gifts (14:39; cf. 1 Thes. 5:19-20) but to urge that their use be regulated by love. The gifts of the Spirit should be controlled by the fruit of the Spirit, chief among which was love (Gal. 5:22). This would lead to exercising the gifts so they would benefit the church body as a whole (14:5) and also honor God (14:25, 33, 40). By way of illustration and correction, Paul compared and contrasted the Corinthians' preoccupation with tongues with their apparent disinterest in prophecy.

14:1. That chapter 13 was something of a digression, however sublime, may be seen by the way Paul wove together the two strands which concluded chapter 12 (v. 31) and which began chapter 14 (v. 1). He did this in a chiasmus, a common literary style that connected a series of related words, phrases, or ideas by reversing their order of discussion in the second instance, for example, a^1, b^1, b^2, a^2. As a final note to his discussion on the unity and diversity of the gifts, Paul had exhorted the Corinthians to desire (a^1) exercising the gifts which were of greatest benefit to the church as a whole (cf. 12:31). He then affirmed (b^1) that, however splendid and profitable the gifts were, there was a greater way of life (chap. 13). Chapter 14 picked up on this note as Paul urged (b^2) his readers to make this way of love (14:1) the definitive characteristic of their own course of life (cf. John 13:34-35). This in turn would lead them to "desire (a^2) the greater gifts," among which was prophecy (cf. 1 Cor. 12:31).

14:2. What Paul meant by speaking in a tongue is a matter of considerable debate. One common view is to see Paul's use of the word "tongue" (glōssa) against the background of first-century pagan religions and thus define it as ecstatic speech similar to that expressed by the sibylla, or female prophetesses. The Cumaen sibyl (cf. Virgil Aeneid 6. 77-102) was the most famous of the 10 female prophetesses claimed by various regions. Others see the tongues-speaking in 1 Corinthians as ecstatic speech similar to that of Pythia, the female oracle at Delphi (Plutarch Moralia 5. 409e) or similar to the maenads of Dionysus in their ecstatic frenzy (Ovid Metamorphoses 3. 534, 710-30; cf. Euripides Bacchae). That the Corinthians may have thought of this gift as analogous to the pagan ecstatics is certainly possible, but to suggest that Paul used the term with reference to this pagan background is hardly enlightened scholarship. In fact the seedbed for most of Paul's theological concepts and the usual source of his terms was the Old Testament. This is evident by Paul's use of glōssa outside of these three Corinthian chapters. He used the word 21 times in 1 Corinthians 12–14 but only 3 other times in his other letters. Each of Paul's other uses was either in a quotation from the Old Testament (Ps. 5:9 in Rom. 3:13; Isa. 45:23 in Rom. 14:11) or in an allusion to it (Isa. 45:23 in Phil. 2:11). In all three instances he used the word "tongue" as a figure of speech for the statement or confession made. Whether good (Rom. 14:11; Phil. 2:11) or bad (Rom. 3:13) the statement was clearly intelligible.

The same may be said of the meaning of the word glōssa elsewhere in the New Testament. Whether it was used literally of the physical organ (e.g., Mark 7:33; James 3:5; Rev. 16:10) or figuratively of human languages (e.g., Acts 2:11; Rev.

5:9; 7:9; 10:11; 11:9; 13:7; 14:6; 17:15), it nowhere referred to ecstatic speech. If it is reasonable to interpret the unknown with the help of the known, the obscure by the clear, then the burden of proof rests with those who find in this term a meaning other than human language.

The context of this verse is the assembled congregation in Corinth (1 Cor. 11:2–14:40, esp. 14:4-5) in which utterance in a tongue was given without the benefit of interpretation (cf. vv. 13, 19). Apparently no native speaker of the tongue was present in the assembly (cf. vv. 10-11), and no one was given supernatural enablement to interpret it. The utterances therefore were mysteries, truths requiring a supernatural disclosure which God had not provided the Corinthians in this particular instance. As a result, the expression of tongues became an exercise in futility for the assembly as a whole, with only the speaker deriving some benefit (v. 4) in his spirit (cf. v. 14), the sentient aspect of his being (pneuma; cf. Matt. 5:3; Acts 17:16; 2 Cor. 2:13).

14:3. One with the gift of prophecy (cf. 12:10), on the other hand, spoke in the tongue of his listeners, in this case Greek, and edified them by proclaiming God's Word in such a way that it gave them strengthening, (oikodomēn, "edification"), encouragement, (paraklēsin), and comfort (paramythian, "consolation," used only here in the NT).

14:4. A person with the gift of tongues (cf. 12:10) who spoke without the benefit of the gift of interpretation (cf. 12:10) could edify himself but not others in the church. The edification resulted from the fact that the user of a gift experienced the confirmation that he was the individual object of God's grace (cf. 12:18, 28) and able to offer praise to God (14:16). Though he himself would not comprehend the content of that praise, his feelings and emotions would be enlivened, leading to a general exhilaration and euphoria. This was not a bad thing. Paul certainly was no advocate of cold, dispassionate worship. The gifts were not given for personal enrichment, however, but for the benefit of others (12:7; cf. 10:24; 1 Peter 4:10). Personal edification and exhilaration were often natural by-products of the legitimate exercise of one's gift, but they were not the main reasons for its exercise.

14:5. Paul had no intention of depreciating the gift of tongues; he was simply interested in appreciating the gift of prophecy. There was nothing wrong with the gift of tongues; in fact Paul thought it would be good if everyone had the gift. Of course he had said the same thing about celibacy (7:7), but in neither instance did he expect universal compliance with his statement. Since both were gifts from God, neither should be despised. In a church gathering, however, the gift of prophecy and its exercise was greatly to be preferred to uninterpreted tongues simply because the former built up others. As already stated, the tongues gift was confirmatory and thus temporary (see comments on 13:8). Thus those instructions, specifically directed to the Corinthians' misuse of tongues, are not directives for the use of tongues today (cf. comments on 14:21-22).

14:6. Two illustrations (in v. 6 and vv. 7-9) made this plain. In the first, Paul used himself with a possible glance back to his initial ministry in Corinth. He could have come proclaiming his message in the tongue of a language which they did not know (cf. v. 18), but it would have produced only disinterest at best (v. 11) or at worst, derision (v. 23). As it was, he brought them a revelation from God (cf. 2:10) by his ministry of prophecy (12:29), or he brought them a word of knowledge (cf. 2:12) by his ministry of instruction (12:29; cf. 14:26) which they would understand and to which they could respond (cf. vv. 24-25).

14:7-9. The same was true in a musical tune or a call to battle. To be profitable for others the notes of a flute or harp or trumpet needed to be clear and intelligible; otherwise they amounted to no more than the venting of air with consequences which, besides being annoying (v. 7), might be devastating (v. 8).

14:10-12. Human communication operated on the same principles as instrumental communication. The word languages in verse 10 is phōnōn, the plural of the same word phōnēn, rendered "sounds" of the harp (v. 7) and "call" of the trumpet (v. 8). Human sounds, apart from a shared understanding of their meanings, were worthless. So was the Corinthian preoccupation with uninterpreted tongues. That was why Paul did not discourage their interest in spiritual gifts but did encourage them to pursue those gifts that benefited all in the church (v. 12; cf. 12:31; 14:1).

14:13. Interpreted tongues, like prophecy, could benefit the assembly (cf. Acts 19:6). Therefore the gift of interpretation should be requested of God. If no one was present who was able to interpret, the tongues-speaker was to keep silent (1 Cor. 14:28).

14:14-15. It was also true that however beneficial the gift of tongues might be to its recipient (cf. v. 4), when coupled with the gift of interpretation it had much more value because it involved not only the feeling aspects of a person, but his mental faculties as well.

14:16-17. If it were true that one who possessed the gift of tongues would find his worship enhanced by the possession and use of the gift of interpretation (v. 15), it was certainly true that anyone listening to him who did not have the same gift could not empathize with the tongues-speaker. At least another person with the gift of tongues could identify with the exhilaration experienced in the exercise of the gift. However, a Christian with a different gift required intelligible communication if he were to gain any benefit from what was said and so have a basis for affirming his agreement by saying an Amen. But such comprehension did not exist if the tongue were not interpreted and so the brother was not edified.

14:18-19. Paul's concern to harness the enthusiasm for the gift of tongues in Corinth was not motivated by sour grapes. When it came to the gift of tongues, he could outtalk them all. But Paul was not primarily interested in self-fulfillment. Instead he was concerned with ministering to others and thereby glorifying God (cf. 10:31-33). For that reason he did not use his gift of tongues with the assembled church but he did exercise his gift of prophecy (14:6). That, in fact, was in accord with God's purpose. Where then did tongues fit into God's purpose? Paul discussed that next.

14:20. The Corinthian infatuation with tongues was for Paul another manifestation of their immaturity and worldliness (cf. 3:1-3). This he hoped would change, especially in regard to an enhanced appraisal of prophecy and a recognition of the importance of this gift for the assembled church. His final words, contrasting prophecy and tongues (14:21-25), were intended to conclude the exhortation begun in verse 1.

14:21-22. This summary argument in verses 21-25 began with the citation of a portion of Isaiah's prophecy against Israel (Isa. 28:11-12). Because Israel refused to listen to God's message proclaimed by His prophets, Isaiah predicted that another message would come. This one would be delivered in a foreign tongue unintelligible to the Israelites, yet unambiguous (cf. 2 Kings 17:23). The foreign tongue symbolized God's rejection (cf. Deut. 28:49; Isa. 33:19), His disciplinary response to Israel's stiff-necked rebellion against Him (cf. 2 Kings 17:14; Acts 7:51). Foreigners instead of Israel became the temporary servants of God (cf. Isa. 5:26; Hab. 1:6; Matt. 21:43; Rom. 10:19-21), and their foreign tongue was a punitive sign to Israel of what had taken place.

That seems to be the significance which Paul attached to tongues. As such, the primary arena for its exercise was not the company of believers but . . . unbelievers (cf. Matt. 13:10-15, on parables). Uninterpreted tongues had their place but not in the church where prophecy benefited believers (1 Cor. 14:3).

14:23-25. Tongues were of benefit in an assembly of believers only if they were interpreted. But this seems not to have been the Corinthians' practice. Instead they apparently poured forth their gift of tongues in unrestrained fashion. As a result believers with some other gifts were nonplussed by the behavior of the tongues-speakers (v. 16). Furthermore, newcomers (idiōtai, those who attended but were not believers) and other unbelievers (apistoi) who were aware of but as yet unconvinced by the gospel message (unlike those of vv. 21-22 who had forthrightly rejected it) would find their behavior positively ridiculous. Will they not say that you are out of your mind? This, Paul suggested, would certainly not advance the cause of Christ in Corinth. But prophecy was desirable because it would not only benefit believers (v. 3) but would also expose unbelievers not to a scene of chaos but to one of conviction (cf. John 16:8) and judgment (1 Cor. 2:15)—which would lead to personal disclosure (the secrets of his heart will be laid bare) and the worship of God.

(4) Propriety in the use of gifts (14:26-40). In this section Paul drew to a conclusion his discussion of gifts (chaps. 12–14). He also concluded the whole section dealing with Christian liberty in relation to worship (11:2–14:40). What is most striking to a modern reader is the apparent lack of any fixed order of service and the absence of any reference to particular individuals being responsible for specific ministries. The whole church seemed to exercise their gifts by spontaneously ministering to one another.

14:26. As he had done throughout the letter, Paul addressed the Christian community in Corinth as brothers, a general term including both sexes (e.g., 1:10; cf. 1 Peter 5:9). When the church met, anyone was free to participate by contributing a hymn, or a word of instruction (cf. 1 Cor. 14:6; probably a lesson based on the OT), a revelation from one gifted in prophecy (cf. vv. 6, 29-32), or a word from one gifted in a tongue followed by an interpretation of what was said. The controlling principle in this free participation was the rule of love. All that was said and done was to have as its goal the need of strengthening (pros oikodomēn, "edifying") others (cf. vv. 4-5).

14:27-28. Though there was no established order for a service, it was to be conducted in an orderly way (v. 40). The services were to have balanced participation on the parts of gifted members. Those gifted with a tongue who wanted to contribute to a service could do so but only two or three at any one service and then only if individuals gifted in interpretation were present who could translate the language. If no interpreter were present, the tongues-speaker was to keep quiet. Though his gift was without benefit to the church if uninterpreted, it did have some other benefits (cf. vv. 4, 14-15, 22).

14:29. The directions for those exercising the gift of prophecy did not differ from those for tongues. Two or three prophets could speak at each service and what they said was to be carefully considered. Since they would speak in Greek the others in the congregation would understand and evaluate their messages. (Or perhaps "the others" referred to those with the gift to distinguish between spirits.) The words weigh carefully translate the verb diakrinetōsan, related to the noun diakriseis in 12:10, which speaks of distinguishing "between spirits." It was their responsibility to ascertain if the message delivered was indeed from God (cf. 1 John 4:1).

14:30. A prophet might have received a revelation, probably in a vision or dream, sometime prior to the meeting of the church at which he subsequently related it. However, a prophet might also experience a revelation during the service. If such occurred, a prophet in the midst of speaking should draw his message to a close to let the other gifted member speak. Whatever the Corinthian services were, they were not dull.

14:31. The principle which regulated the exercise of tongues applied similarly to prophets. What was said was to benefit everyone by way of instruction or encouragement in the Christian life (cf. v. 3).

14:32-33a. Paul apparently did not believe the prophets were any more restrained than their fellow members gifted in tongues. So he gave the prophets an instruction that was similar to what he gave the tongues-speakers (v. 28). The spirits referred to a prophet's spiritual gift, which did not control the gifted member, but he controlled it (cf. v. 30). If two or three prophets spoke in a particular service, others gifted and with something to say could do so on another occasion. The church was not a forum for personal pontification or self-glorification; it was a place where people were to be built up and God was to be honored (cf. 10:31-33). The service and those who took part in it should reflect the character of God. He is a God . . . of peace, not disorder, and His Spirit worked to produce the same fruit (Gal. 5:22) in believers' lives.

14:33b-36. Some of the verses in this section (vv. 34-35) were felt by some early copyists to be out of place at this point in the letter and so were transposed to the end of the chapter. A more drastic approach taken by some recent commentators is to regard these verses as spurious and unworthy of comment. Though the exact meaning of these verses is difficult to determine, neither expedient has much to commend it. In fact it seems that the guiding thread which prompted these comments by Paul about women was the same theme developed in the preceding verses addressed to those gifted in tongues and prophecy. The church members needed to exercise self-control on occasion, a self-control expressed by silence (vv. 28, 30, 34) in order that the assembly might be characterized by peace.

Apparently certain women in the Corinthian assembly needed to hear this refrain. More than uncovered heads were amiss in regard to their participation in worship services (11:2-16), and Paul was not about to dodge the problem.

Whether the admonition for silence was directed to all women (cf. 11:2-16) or only to those who were married may be debated. The word translated women (gynaikes) was used to refer to women generally (as in all 11 occurrences in 11:3-15), or to unmarried women (e.g., 7:34), or to married women (e.g., 5:1; 9:5; and all 14 occurrences in chap. 7 except once in 7:34). The context alone aided the readers in distinguishing between the alternative meanings.

Two indications strongly suggest that married women were in view in this passage. The first is the word submission (hypotassesthōsan, v. 34). When it occurs elsewhere in the New Testament with specific reference to a woman, it always refers to a married woman who was to be subject to her husband (Eph. 5:22; Col. 3:18; Titus 2:5; 1 Peter 3:1, 5).

The second indication is the phrase their own husbands (1 Cor. 14:35), whom the inquisitive women were to consult if they had questions. This would obviously be a difficult assignment for single women (e.g., 7:34) or those with unbelieving husbands (e.g., 7:13).

First Timothy 2:11-15, which enjoins women to be quiet in worship, is frequently cited as a parallel to this passage. But there too, married women were probably in view, as verse 15 would not apply to an unmarried woman. Also, when Eve is named in the Old Testament, it is as Adam's wife (Gen. 3:20; cf. 2 Cor. 11:2-3, the only other NT passage besides 1 Tim. 2:13-14 that names Eve), and her submission is rooted in that relationship (Gen. 3:16, the text Paul probably referred to in 1 Cor. 14:34). In addition, the noun hēsychia in 1 Timothy 2:11-12 means "quietness, absence of disorder," whereas the verb sigaō in 1 Corinthians 14:28, 34 means "remain silent." (See comments on 1 Tim. 2:11-14 and 2 Thes. 3:12).

Paul then wanted silence on the parts of married women whose husbands were present in the assembly, but he permitted the participation of other women when properly adorned (1 Cor. 11:2-16). Such silence would express their subordinate (but not inferior) relationship to their husbands. This contrasts with a disturbance caused by their talking to their husbands during the service.

The Corinthian believers were not to think of themselves as exclusive, independent interpreters or recipients of the Word of God (14:36). They, like those in all the congregations (v. 33b), were to submit to God's truth by conforming to this standard of conduct.

14:37-40. These verses were Paul's conclusion not only to the immediately preceding directives (vv. 33b-36) but also to all his discussion about Corinthian irregularities in worship and the needed correctives (11:2–14:36). He expected some opposition (cf. 11:16; 14:36), but warned that those who opposed him did so at their own peril (cf. 4:18-21). Anyone who ignores the Lord's commands would find himself . . . ignored by Him at the last day (cf. 3:17; Gen. 9:6; Matt. 10:32-33), because his actions would show that he never knew the Lord (cf. 1 Cor. 8:3; Matt. 7:22-23; 1 John 4:6).

The conclusion was that the Corinthians should give special attention to the gifts which were most beneficial to the church as a whole (12:31; 14:1) without denigrating the other gifts. They should see that their services were conducted in a fitting (cf. 11:2-16; 14:34-36) and orderly (cf. 11:17-34; 14:26-33) way.

C. Counsel concerning the Resurrection (chap. 15)

Some have suggested that Paul reserved this chapter on the Resurrection till last because he thought that a firm belief in it would help solve many of the Corinthians' problems. Certainly if the message of Christ crucified were foolishness to the Greek mind (1:23), the corollary doctrine of the Resurrection was no less so (cf. Acts 17:31-32). The implicit denial of the Resurrection on the part of some may be seen in the Corinthian conviction that the present era represented the consummation of God's material blessings (1 Cor. 4:8; cf. 6:2) and sexual immorality was a matter of no lasting consequence (5:1; cf. 6:9, 13-14).

Like the problems previously discussed (1:10–6:20), the denial of the Resurrection by some in the church was a matter apparently reported to Paul (15:12) and not something the Corinthians themselves had included among their questions in their letter to him (cf. 7:25; 8:1; 12:1; 16:1, 12). As in his response to the Thessalonian confusion on the Resurrection (1 Thes. 4:13-18), Paul began with a fundamental affirmation of the faith (cf. 1 Cor. 15:3-4; 1 Thes. 4:14) and expanded on it.

1. THE CERTAINTY OF BODILY RESURRECTION (15:1-34)

a. Historical argument (15:1-11)

15:1-2. The gospel Paul had preached in Corinth (2:1-2) had not changed; but he feared that just as there had been declension in the church concerning the message of Christ crucified and its implication for believers, the same was happening with regard to the message of Christ resurrected. As the former message was an essential element in the Corinthians' experience of ongoing salvation (the pres. tense of the verb saved focuses on sanctification), so was the latter. To reject bodily resurrection eviscerated "the gospel" and made faith vain (eikē, "without cause" or "without success"; cf. vv. 14, 17) because it had an unworthy object (cf. 15:13, 17). Believing the gospel includes holding firmly to belief in Christ's resurrection. Unless one holds firmly, his belief is "in vain"; cf. Matt. 13:18-22).

15:3-5. Paul included himself in the company of all believers when he spoke of receiving the truth of Christ's death and His resurrection on behalf of sinful people. These verses, the heart of the gospel, were an early Christian confession which Paul described as of first importance. It was really a twofold confession: Christ died for our sins and He was raised. The reality of this was verified by the Scriptures (e.g., Ps. 16:10; Isa. 53:8-10) and by historical evidence verified by time in the grave and out of it, in the presence of the living. The fact that He was buried verified His death, and the fact that He appeared to others verified His resurrection. Peter, the first male witness, was soon joined by the remaining disciples who composed the Lord's immediate circle.

15:6. Later a much larger company of believers witnessed His resurrection. The 500 . . . brothers may have formed the audience who received the commission recorded in Matthew 28:18-20 (cf. Acts 1:3-8). Since most of those were still living when Paul wrote 1 Corinthians, they could be consulted.

15:7-8. Some have debunked this Resurrection appearance as simply the pious vision of believers seeing with the eyes of faith. But Paul could have cited the testimony of two for whom that was not true, James, the half brother of Jesus, and himself. Like Paul, James probably came to faith (cf. John 7:5 with Acts 1:14) because of an appearance of the resurrected Christ (Acts 9:3-6; 22:6-11). Paul considered himself abnormally born because he lacked the "gestation" period of having been with Christ during His earthly ministry (cf. Acts 1:21-22). It seems that the apostles were a body wider than the previously mentioned Twelve (cf. comments on Eph. 4:11), but were all distinguished by having seen the resurrected Christ (1 Cor. 9:1) which made Paul the last of their company.

15:9. Because he was the last, like a runt, untimely born, Paul could call himself the least of the apostles. He felt less deserving of the office because he had been an opponent of the church (cf. Acts 22:4; 1 Tim. 1:15-16) which he now served (2 Cor. 4:5).

15:10. He realized, however, that his past was simply a backdrop on which to display the grace of God (cf. 1:3), the grace to which Paul had been so responsive. Indeed Paul was without peer in his devotion (cf. 9:19-29). The history of the church confirms that his devotion was not without effect (kenē, "empty"; cf. 15:14). He had worked harder than any of the other apostles, as he traveled more, suffered more opposition, wrote more New Testament epistles, and founded more churches. Yet Paul knew and ministered with the recognition that it was not his power but God's (2:4-5) which produced results (3:6).

15:11. In the final analysis it was not the messenger but the message which was important (cf. 1:18–4:5), and in that regard the apostolic message was that the crucified Christ became the resurrected Christ, which message Paul did preach and the Corinthians believed.

b. Logical argument (15:12-19)

15:12. Paul then turned to consider the claim of some that no one dead could experience bodily resurrection. He pressed that tenet to its logical consequences within the framework of the Christian faith.

15:13. To deny a bodily resurrection in principle was to deny the resurrection of Christ. Presumably some in Corinth had done this, and Paul wanted to warn them and others of the serious consequences which would result from such disbelief.

15:14. Not the least of those consequences was the fact that a denial of the Resurrection tore the heart out of the gospel message and left it lifeless. If that were so, the Corinthians' faith, however vital, would be useless (kenē, "empty"; cf. vv. 2, 10, 17) since its object would be a dead man.

15:15-16. Second, the apostles of the church would turn out to be crass charlatans since their message uniformly affirmed the truth of Christ's resurrection (cf. v. 11).

15:17. Third, the Corinthians' salvation would be only a state of mind with no correspondence to reality. Their faith would be futile (mataia, "without results"; cf. kenē, "empty," in vv. 10, 14, eikē, "without cause" or "without success," v. 2). The Resurrection was God's validation that the redemption paid by Christ on the cross was accepted (Rom. 4:25). Without the Resurrection there could be no certainty of atonement and the Corinthians would remain in a state of alienation and sin.

15:18. Fourth, if Christ were not raised, the loved ones among the Corinthian believers who had died entered not bliss but perdition. The pagan concept of a liberated spirit was a lie. Without the Resurrection the sting of death would remain, with lasting painfulness (cf. vv. 54-56).

15:19. Fifth, if there were no Resurrection, the pagans would be right. The "foolishness of the Cross" (1:18) would be just that, and men such as Paul and the apostles who had suffered for the gospel (4:9-13) could only be pitied. Those who lived for the pleasure of the moment would be right and the sacrifices of Christians would only be cruel, self-inflicted jokes (cf. 15:32).

c. Theological argument (15:20-28)

15:20. Paul had explored the logical negations which followed from a denial of the bodily resurrection of Christ (vv. 12-19). He then considered the theological tenet that the destiny of Christians was bound up in the destiny of Christ, and he set forth the positive consequences of this union. Speculation had given way to affirmation: Christ has indeed been raised from the dead. And He is the firstfruits, an Old Testament word (e.g., Ex. 23:16, 19) here used in the sense of a preliminary installment of what will be both an example and a guarantee of more to come (cf. Rom. 8:23).

15:21-22. Death came to all those related to Adam by natural birth because of the disobedience of one man. As the father of mankind Adam in his sin brought death to everybody (cf. Gen. 3:17-19; Rom. 5:12). But because of the obedience (Phil. 2:8) of another Man (1 Tim. 2:5) resurrection will come to all those related to Him by spiritual birth. Paul would later expand this grand truth in his letter to the Romans (Rom. 5:12-19). Those who are a part of the body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:27) will one day follow the lead of their Head (Col. 1:18), but will not do so immediately.

15:23. There will be a sequence in the unfolding of the final events. Paul was not concerned to detail all future resurrections since he was addressing the church and was primarily interested here in fixing their place in the scheme of things. As he had earlier affirmed (v. 20), Christ was their sample and surety.

As He promised (John 14:2-3) Christ will return for those who compose the church and the dead in Christ will be raised (1 Thes. 4:16). No time frame was indicated in this sequence but a period of almost 2,000 years has now elapsed.

15:24. Following the resurrection of the church, another period intervenes until the end when Christ will deliver His kingdom to God the Father (cf. Matt. 13:41-43). Some interpreters dispute that an interval of any sort was hinted at by Paul and find instead the coming of Christ and the consummation of all things as virtually simultaneous events. As in the preceding verse, no time frame was specified and the chronological sequences set forth may indeed be almost momentary (1 Cor. 15:5) but then again they may be prolonged (cf. v. 23). If about 2,000 years can elapse between the first and second phases in this selected presentation of events, a lapse of half that time, that is, a millennium, between the second and third phases should cause no consternation.

15:25-26. Death as a personification of Christ's ultimate opponent (cf. v. 55; Heb. 2:14) will be nullified. It is not human bodies which will be destroyed, as some in Corinth were saying, but the destroyer of bodies, death itself.

15:27-28. The reprise of these verses is found in verse 57. It is by the power of God that the incarnate Christ victoriously mediates His authority (cf. Phil. 3:21). This work of the Son will find ultimate completion in the glory of the Father (cf. John 17:4-5). That too is the ultimate goal of the church (cf. 1 Cor. 10:31; Eph. 1:6, 12, 14). When God is all in all (cf. Rom. 11:36), the new creation will be consummated and the resurrected Christ and His church will share in that experience (cf. Rev. 22:1).

d. Experiential argument (15:29-34)

In this fourth collection of arguments against those who deny the Resurrection, Paul drew on Corinthian practice (v. 29) and also on his own way of life (vv. 30-32).

15:29. Up to 200 explanations have been given of this verse! Most of these interpretations are inane, prompted by a desire to conform this verse to an orthodox doctrine of baptism. It is clear from the context, however, that Paul distinguished his own practice and teaching from that described here. He merely held up the teaching of being baptized for the dead as a practice of some who denied the Resurrection.

How the false teachers came to this view may never be known, but just across the Saronic Gulf, north of Corinth, lay Eleusis, the center of an ancient mystery religion lauded by Homer (Hymn to Demeter 478-79) and widely popular (cf. Cicero, himself an initiate, in De Legibus 2. 14. 36). Part of the rites of initiation into this pagan religion were washings of purification in the sea without which no one could hope to experience bliss in the life hereafter (cf. Pindar Fragment 212; Sophocles Fragment 753). A vicarious participation in the mysteries was not unknown either (cf. Orphica Fragment 245). Given the Corinthian propensity for distortion in matters of church practice (11:2–14:40), it was likely that some in Corinth (possibly influenced by the Eleusinian mystery) were propounding a false view of baptism which Paul took up and used as an argument against those who denied the Resurrection. No interpretation of this text is entirely satisfactory, but this view has as its chief strength the natural reading of the Greek verse, an asset singularly lacking in other explanations. Also it is noteworthy that Paul referred to those (not "we") who are "baptized for the dead."

15:30-32. In contrast to the practice of those cited in verse 29, Paul now mentioned his own lifestyle as a forceful statement of his conviction about the certainty of the Resurrection. Some of the Corinthians may have accused Paul of duplicity (cf. 2 Cor. 1:12-14; 2:17; 6:8), but no one thought him a fool even though he affirmed that he would be one if he ministered without certainty of the Resurrection. Many times his life was imperiled (I die every day; cf. 2 Cor. 6:4-5; 11:23-28). At least once he thought he would die (2 Cor. 1:8-9), probably referred to here as his fight with wild beasts at Ephesus. Though this was probably not an arena experience, it was like it in that Paul saw no hope of deliverance. Why face that if this life were all there is? The Epicureans (and less philosophical men before them; cf. Isa. 22:13) would be right—pursue pleasure and avoid pain (cf. Epicurus Letter to Menoeceus 128). But Paul knew there was more, and his life testified to that fact (cf. 1 Cor. 9:24-27; 2 Cor. 4:16-18).

15:33-34. Paul's concluding advice with reference to those who continued to deny the Resurrection was like his former counsel concerning immoral people in the church (chap. 5)—don't associate with them. Previously he had compared immorality in the church to yeast in bread (5:6). Here he quoted the pagan writer Menander (Thais 218) to the same effect: Bad company corrupts good character. False teachers should be avoided (cf. 2 Cor. 6:14–7:1) because though they claimed great knowledge they were in fact ignorant of God (cf. 1 Cor. 8:2). Were the wise Corinthians this easily deceived? (cf. 2 Cor. 11:3)

2. ANSWERS TO CERTAIN QUESTIONS (15:35-58)

In the preceding section (vv. 1-34) Paul had taken up the question implicit in verse 12, why believe in the Resurrection? He answered it with arguments rooted in history, logic, theology, and experience. He then addressed two other questions: How is the resurrection achieved? What is the nature of a resurrected body?

a. Answers about the resurrection of the dead (15:35-49)

15:35-37. One objection to belief in anyone's resurrection might be its incomprehensibility. This was the point of the questions How are the dead raised? With what kind of body will they come? Paul did not consider these sorts of questions a wise person would ask, as is obvious from his response, How foolish! (lit., "how senseless or thoughtless") to his imaginary interlocutor. Belief in the Resurrection was like belief in seedtime and harvest. Neither could be completely understood but both were real. As a plant which sprouted from a seed was directly linked to it but remarkably different from it, so too was the relationship of a natural and a resurrected body.

15:38-41. The variety in Creation reflects the will of the Maker (Gen. 1:1-26). The differences in the animate creation (men . . . animals . . . birds . . . fish) and inanimate creation (sun . . . moon . . . stars) give expression to the splendor of God and bring Him praise (cf. Ps. 148:13). The differences in splendor between the earthly bodies and the heavenly bodies suggested to Paul the differences between a natural and a spiritual body (cf. Dan. 12:3 where resurrected saints were compared to stars; also Matt. 13:43).

15:42-44a. An earthly natural body is fallen and so is temporal, imperfect, and weak. A heavenly spiritual body will be eternal, perfect, and powerful (cf. 2 Cor. 5:1-4). Like a seed sown in the earth and the plant which proceeds from it, there is continuity but a gloriously evident difference.

15:44b-49. Discussion of the contrast between Adam and Christ (mentioned earlier in v. 22) is resumed here. Adam exemplified the earthly (v. 40) natural body (the word trans. being, v. 45, psychē, is related to psychikos, which is trans. natural in v. 44). Adam gave his nature to all who followed him (the man without the Spirit is the natural [psychikos] man; cf. 2:14). The last Adam, Christ, exemplifies the heavenly spiritual body (15:22) which those who belong to Him (v. 23; cf. 2:15) will likewise assume at His coming from heaven (cf. Phil. 3:20-21). The full harvest will be like the firstfruits (1 Cor. 15:23; cf. Col. 1:18). First the seed must die; then the spiritual body will emerge.

b. Answers about the Rapture of the living (15:50-58)

15:50. What about those who are not dead at Christ's coming? Paul now turned to answer that unexpressed question. With all that had preceded about the need for the natural body to give way to the spiritual, it followed that flesh and blood, the natural body, could not enter the eternal state (cf. vv. 24-28).

15:51-52. Paul had revealed the same truth to the Thessalonians (1 Thes. 4:15-17). The Rapture of the church was a mystery (mystērion) in that it had not been known in the Old Testament but now was revealed. (Cf. other "mysteries"—now revealed truths—in Matt. 13:11; Luke 8:10; Rom. 11:25; 16:25; 1 Cor. 4:1; Eph. 1:9; 3:3-4, 9; 5:32; Col. 1:26-27; 2:2; 4:3; 2 Thes. 2:7; 1 Tim. 3:9, 16; Rev. 1:20; 10:7; 17:5.) The dead in Christ will first be raised, and then the living will be instantaneously transformed. The trumpet, as in the Old Testament, signaled the appearance of God (cf. Ex. 19:16). It is the last blast for the church because this appearance shall never end (cf. 1 Cor. 13:12). (There is no basis for posttribulationists equating this trumpet with the seventh trumpet in Rev. 11:15-19. The trumpets in Rev. pertain to judgments during the Tribulation, whereas the trumpet in 1 Cor. 15:52 is related to the church.)

15:53-54. Like the dead (vv. 42-43), the living will exchange the temporal and imperfect for the eternal and perfect (cf. 13:10). For those who belong to Christ, death's power will be removed.

15:55. As in the allusion to Isaiah 25:8 (1 Cor. 15:54), Paul again recalled an Old Testament passage which prophesied the cessation of death (Hosea 13:14). (The recollections were adapted by Paul and do not correspond exactly to any of the extant Gr. or Heb. texts.) The apparent victories of Satan, in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3:13) and on Golgotha (Mark 15:22-24) were reversed on the cross (Col. 2:15; Heb. 2:14-15) and vindicated in the resurrection of Christ. From the vantage point of the certain resurrection of the saints, Paul voiced his taunt against death and Satan.

15:56-57. As the word victory which ended verse 54 led Paul into the exaltation in verse 55, so the word sting which ended verse 55 led him into this brief digression in verses 56-57. Like other theological nuggets in this chapter (vv. 21-22), these verses were later given expanded discussion in Paul's letter to the Romans (Rom. 7:7-13). Death came as a result of man's rebellion and disobedience against the command of God (Gen. 3:17-19). The Law, which epitomized the command of God, was thus the mirror against which human rebellion and disobedience was starkly portrayed. Like the first Adam, all who followed him rebelled (cf. 1 Cor. 2:14). But through the obedience of the last Adam, our Lord Jesus Christ (15:45; cf. Rom. 5:19; Phil. 2:8-11), came "victory" and life (1 Cor. 15:22; cf. 2:15-16).

15:58. Paul's doctrinal declarations led to practical directives and this chapter's conclusion was no exception. The Corinthians were urged to stand firm in the apostles' teaching (v. 2), unmoved by the denials of false teachers (cf. Eph. 4:14). This certainty, especially concerning the Resurrection, provided an impetus to faithful service (cf. 1 Cor. 3:8; Gal. 6:9) since labor in the resurrected Lord is not futile (kenos, "empty"; cf. 1 Cor. 15:10, 14, 17, 30-32).

D. Counsel concerning the collection for the poor (16:1-4)

The flow of the previous chapter, from a prolonged discourse on doctrinal matters to a concluding exhortation on practical diligence, moved smoothly to a discussion of a practical expression of that faith—care for the needs of others and in particular, the needy in Jerusalem.

16:1. At this appropriate juncture, Paul took up the Corinthian inquiry (cf. 7:1) concerning a proposed collection for God's people (cf. 1:2) in Jerusalem (15:3). The Corinthians had apparently heard about the collection through members of the Galatian churches, the oldest of all the Pauline-planted churches (Acts 13:14–14:23) in Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Pisidian Antioch. Paul's instruction to them was repeated to the Corinthians.

16:2. Paul never used the word "tithe" when he discussed giving, even though he gave more attention to giving than any other New Testament writer. Giving should be a systematic, weekly practice on Sunday when the church meets together. Giving was also to be proportionate—in keeping with one's income (cf. Acts 11:29). The income of some would permit them to give a greater proportion, while others, due to their few resources and other constraints on them, would be limited to lesser contributions. What was important was that giving be a unified ministry with each one participating, regardless of his income. Then when it came time to deliver the contributions to the saints in Jerusalem, no last-minute collections would need to be made, and the gift could be sent off gladly, not grudgingly (2 Cor. 9:5)—as would be true if it were wrung out by emotional appeals or personal pressure.

16:3-4. Paul's practice in money matters was scrupulously aboveboard. Not only did he avoid solicitation for himself (cf. 9:12, 15), but also when he acted to meet the needs of others he avoided direct involvement in handling the gift. He preferred instead that individuals from the various contributing congregations elect representatives to bear their gift (cf. 2 Cor. 8:19-21) whom he might then accompany to the presentation.

E. Counsel concerning future visits (16:5-12)

The mention of his planned arrival in connection with the collection sparked another brief digression on the subject of future visits.

16:5. It was Paul's plan to leave Ephesus, his place of ministry at that time (v. 8), and journey through Macedonia, the region north of Corinth where the churches of Philippi, Thessalonica, and presumably Berea (cf. Acts 20:4, a delegate from Berea accompanied Paul) flourished. They too were planning to make a contribution to the needy in Jerusalem (cf. 2 Cor. 8:1-4).

16:6-7. On that journey (cf. Acts 19:21) Paul hoped to be able to spend some time with the Corinthians, possibly as long as the winter since travel by sea in that season was ill-advised (cf. Acts 27:9-44). This, in fact, he eventually did (see the Introduction) but not on the schedule here set forth. This change of plans became a source of trouble for him with the Corinthians later (cf. 2 Cor. 1:15–2:1). What Paul meant by the words you can help me on my journey is clarified later (1 Cor. 16:11). He desired that his departure be marked by "peace," which would be in keeping with the Lord's will (cf. James 4:15).

16:8-9. For the time being, Paul intended to stay on at Ephesus in ministry, where the opportunities and the opposition were both great. One or the other of these situations may have arisen while he was writing this letter (cf. 4:19). It says something about Paul's perception of his ministry that the presence of opposition was a sign to him of the viability of his labor and reason for pressing on, not running away (cf. Acts 19:30-31). Those who opposed him in Corinth (1 Cor. 4:18-21) probably took note of this.

16:10-11. In the meantime Paul intended to send his beloved assistant Timothy to Corinth. The younger man sometimes traveled in Paul's place (cf. Phil. 2:19-24). That Timothy might have cause to fear while ministering in Corinth confirms, as this letter indicates, that working with the Corinthian church was no picnic. However, it probably says more about the character of Timothy, a man devoted to Christ (Phil. 2:19-21) but lacking Paul's robust boldness (cf. 1 Tim. 4:12; 2 Tim. 1:7-8; 2:1).

The identity of the brothers accompanying Timothy is not clear. It appears that Timothy went out from Ephesus with Erastus (Acts 19:22). They may have been joined by some of the men who later composed Paul's traveling party for delivering the collection (Acts 20:4).

16:12. The last of the Corinthian questions (cf. 7:10) concerned Apollos. They apparently inquired about the possibility of a return visit from him. Paul said he had strongly urged Apollos to do this but that the gifted Alexandrian had decided to stay on in Ephesus with Paul, and not join Timothy and Erastus in their trip (Acts 19:22). Earlier in the letter, Paul had described himself and Apollos as fellow workers under God (1 Cor. 3:9). This verse bears eloquent tribute to the fact that Paul conducted himself not as a master but as a partner with others who labored in ministry.

V. Conclusion (16:13-24)

A. Exhortation on appropriate conduct and commendation (16:13-18)

16:13-14. Paul began the conclusion with a pointed exhortation along a fivefold line. The command, Be on your guard (grēgoreite) might be rendered "be diligent" in carrying out the will of God (cf. 15:58, "give yourselves fully to the work of the Lord"). In view of the Corinthians' susceptibility to false teachers (cf. 2 Cor. 11:3) the exhortation to stand firm in the faith was a timely reminder (cf. 1 Cor. 15:1, 58). So too were the closing exhortations (similar to the Gr. text of several Pss., e.g., 27:14; 31:24) to be men of courage and be strong, that is, marked by maturity (cf. 1 Cor. 14:20) and not infants easily swept aside (cf. Eph. 4:14). That sort of diligence and commitment is required if everything is to be done in love (cf. 1 Cor. 12:31b–14:1).

16:15-16. Achaia was the Roman province extending over central and southern Greece of which Corinth was the capital. Those in the household of Stephanas were among the first converts in the region (cf. Acts 17:34, for some in Athens believed), and they were among those who assumed responsibility for the general welfare of the church. Sometimes Paul appointed elders (Acts 14:23) but in this instance members of Stephanas' household voluntarily took on the responsibility (cf. 1 Tim. 3:1). Paul recognized their position as ordained by God and urged others to submit to them. As an aside, it may be said that this text argues strongly against the view that infants were in view when a household was referred to. It is difficult to see how infants could be of service to the saints. One primary qualification for church leadership was a willingness to serve (cf. Matt. 23:11; Luke 22:26). To those who labored with this spirit, submission on the part of others in the church was due.

16:17-18. By their very presence, three men from the Corinthian church—Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus—were able to refresh and encourage Paul despite the fact that they probably also brought confirmation of the bad news earlier reported by Chloe's people (1:11). These men were the probable bearers of the letter to which Paul had responded (7:1 et al.).

B. Salutation, imprecation, and benediction (16:19-24)

16:19. The churches . . . of Asia, perhaps those indicated in Revelation 2–3, joined with Paul in sending greetings to their sister church in Corinth (cf. 1 Cor. 1:2). Aquila and Priscilla were tentmakers whom Paul met in Corinth and with whom he lived. They had followed Paul to Ephesus and remained there in ministry, making their house available as a meeting place (cf. Rom. 16:3-5). They would, of course, know and be known by many in the Corinthian church.

16:20. All the brothers may refer to those from the Corinthian church in Ephesus at the time of writing (1:11; 16:17), or to believers in Ephesus who met in a house(s) other than that of Aquila and Priscilla, or simply to the collective community of Christians in the province of Asia.

The holy kiss (cf. 2 Cor. 13:12; Rom. 16:16; 1 Thes. 5:25; 1 Peter 5:14) was primarily a symbolic expression of the love, forgiveness, and unity which should exist among Christians. As such, it became associated with the celebration of the Lord's Supper as a prelude to its observance (cf. Justin Apology 1. 65. 2). It was a mark of the familial bond which united believers. There is no indication that it was restricted to one's own sex in the New Testament era (cf. Luke 7:37, 45). The suggestion to separate the sexes for the exchange of the kiss arose in the late second century due to concern about criticism from non-Christians and the danger of erotic abuse (cf. Athenagorus Supplication 32; Clement of Alexandria Pedagogue 3. 81. 2-4). By the third century it seems that the sexes were separated (Apostolic Constitutions 2. 57. 17), and by the fourth century the clergy and laity were also kept apart (Apostolic Constitutions 8. 11. 9). Such, however, was apparently not the case in the New Testament church where love for one another was openly expressed.

16:21. At this point Paul stopped dictating the letter (cf. Rom. 16:22; Gal. 6:11) and wrote the final words himself.

16:22. Paul's personal note began with a passionate warning probably aimed at false teachers (cf. 12:3) whom he believed to be already present in the congregation (cf. 2 Cor. 11:3-4). The verb love (philei) is related to the noun philēmati for "kiss" (1 Cor. 16:20). It expresses adoration and devotion, qualities absent in false brethren. Paul invoked God's wrath on these false teachers (cf. Gal. 1:8-9) and in the same breath appealed to Christ to return (cf. Matt. 7:21-23; Rev. 22:20). Come, O Lord! renders the Greek words marana tha ("Maranatha"), which transliterate the Aramaic "Lord, come."

16:23-24. To the congregation of Christians in Corinth, Paul invoked what they sorely needed, the continued grace of the Lord Jesus (cf. 1:4). He assured them of what they hardly deserved, his fervent though unrequited (cf. 2 Cor. 6:11-13; 12:15) love (agapē). He embraced the disunited lot of them (cf. 1 Cor. 1:10) as their spiritual father in Christ Jesus (4:15).

2 CORINTHIANS

INTRODUCTION

Few portions of the New Testament pose as many problems for translators and interpreters as does 2 Corinthians. Few, therefore, are the preachers who undertake a systematic exposition of its contents. For those undaunted by its demands, however, an intimate picture of a pastor's heart may be found as the Apostle Paul shepherded the wayward Corinthians and revealed a love which comes only from God.

Author and Readers. Apart from certain portions of the letter which are sometimes mentioned as non-Pauline interpolations (e.g., 6:14–7:1) most agree that 2 Corinthians came not from the hand of a pseudonymous writer but from the heart of the Apostle Paul. It was sent to a church which he had founded (Acts 18:1-17) on his second missionary journey. He worked there for one and one-half years. Like its winter seas, Corinth was a tempestuous city. (See its location on the map between Acts and Rom.) But what apprehension Paul may have felt was at least partially allayed by a vision in the night (Acts 18:9-10) in which the Lord assured him not only of his personal safety but also revealed that many in this city were appointed to faith. There was ample reason to doubt both affirmations. Not many months before, Paul had been beaten and jailed in Philippi and subsequently had been hounded out of Thessalonica and Berea by irate Jews. A sizable community of Jews resided in Corinth. Nor would Corinth have seemed a likely field in which the seed of the gospel could find fertile soil. True, new Corinth was not the same city once pilloried by Athenian playwrights and philosophers as the home of lechers, harlots, and fornicators (see Introduction to 1 Cor.) but its refounding by Rome in 46 B.C. did little to upgrade its moral climate. When Paul wrote the Romans and described the degraded course of rebellious mankind (Rom. 1:21-32), he did so from Corinth where he likely saw the sad portrayal that he wrote about.

Unhappily, the church in Corinth was not immune to this debauchery and came in for correction in Paul's first letter to them (e.g., 1 Cor. 5–6). But it was not only in sexual matters that the Corinthians were still children of their age. They were also easily impressed by external qualities such as eloquence and superior human wisdom (1 Cor. 2) and spectacular gifts such as tongues (1 Cor. 12–14). They walked by sight rather than by faith (cf. 2 Cor. 5:7), a fact Paul sought to amend by his correspondence and visits.

Contacts and Correspondence. The nature and number of Paul's contacts and correspondence with the Corinthians is a matter not easily agreed on. The controversy concerns how many letters Paul dispatched to Corinth (opinions range from three to five), and how many times (two or three) and when he visited them. A discussion of the alternative reconstructions may be found in the more extensive commentaries noted in the Bibliography (e.g., Barrett, Hughes). While not affecting the understanding of 1 Corinthians, the accepted scheme of Paul's visits and letters to Corinth does shape the interpretation of 2 Corinthians. In the following comments on the text, the view is taken that four letters were sent and three visits made.

1. Paul first came to Corinth in the spring of A.D. 51 and ministered there for one and one-half years. He sailed in the fall of A.D. 52 with Priscilla and Aquila to Ephesus where they remained while Paul continued on to Jerusalem. At Ephesus, Priscilla and Aquila met Apollos whom they instructed and subsequently sent to Corinth for a period of ministry (Acts 18:18-28).

2. While Apollos ministered in Corinth (Acts 19:1) in the fall of A.D. 53 Paul returned to Ephesus on his third missionary journey. Paul remained there for two and one-half years, establishing it as a center for evangelizing the surrounding provinces as well (Acts 19). The letter mentioned in 1 Corinthians 5:9 (a letter misunderstood by the Corinthians [1 Cor. 5:9-11] and now lost) was probably written during the early stages of this Ephesian ministry.

3. Paul learned of the misunderstanding and of additional problems in the Corinthian church from members of the household of Chloe (1 Cor. 1:11). He then received an official delegation in the form of Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (1 Cor. 16:17), who brought corroborating news and specific questions on issues dividing the church. First Corinthians, Paul's second letter to the church, was written to address these matters.

4. But apparently the problems in the church were still not resolved. It is possible that Timothy (cf. 1 Cor. 4:17; 16:10) was the bearer of this news. Paul then decided to pay the church a second visit, sailing directly from Ephesus to Corinth. This, it seems, was the "painful visit" referred to in 2 Corinthians 2:1, apparently because of the action of the man mentioned in 2:5 and 7:12 and the failure of the Corinthians to support Paul.

5. After this visit and Paul's return to Ephesus he sent a third letter to the Corinthians (now lost, like the first) borne by Titus. It grieved Paul deeply to write this (2 Cor. 2:3-4) because of its stark disciplinary nature (7:8-9). After a riot provoked by silversmiths (Acts 19:23-41) Paul left Ephesus in the spring of A.D. 56, bound for Macedonia (Acts 20:1) with a preliminary stop in Troas where he hoped to rendezvous with Titus (2 Cor. 2:13) and receive news from him about the situation in Corinth. Because he could not find Titus there, he anxiously pushed on to Macedonia, apparently with grave concern about Titus' safety (7:5-6). There he met Titus, who brought good news about the general well-being of the Corinthian church but bad news about a group opposed to Paul.

6. From Macedonia Paul wrote a fourth letter, 2 Corinthians.

7. Paul then made his third visit to Corinth during the winter of A.D. 56–57 (Acts 20:2-3).

These steps, in summary, are: (1) First visit to Corinth. (2) First letter to Corinth (now lost). (3) Second letter to Corinth (1 Cor.). (4) Second visit to Corinth (a "painful visit," 2 Cor. 2:1). (5) Third letter to Corinth (now lost). (6) Fourth letter to Corinth (2 Cor.). (7) Third visit to Corinth.

The two lost letters were obviously not intended by God to be part of the biblical canon.

Purpose and Nature of the Letter. No letter of Paul's is more personal and intimate in nature than 2 Corinthians. In it he bared his soul and professed his abiding love for the Corinthians despite the apparent fickleness of their affection for him.

What concerned Paul preeminently was the presence of false teachers, claiming to be apostles, who had entered the church. They promoted their own ideas and at the same time sought to discredit both the person and message of the apostle. Second Corinthians was written to defend the authenticity of both his apostleship and his message. This was not carried out in a self-protecting spirit but because Paul knew that acceptance of his ministry and message were intimately bound with the Corinthian church's own spiritual well-being.

Who were these opponents of Paul? This is a widely debated issue. One view sees these men as Hellenistic Jews (i.e., Jews whose first language was Gr. either from Palestine, like Stephen, or from the diaspora, like Timothy). Though they claimed to be followers of Christ, they promoted themselves as men in the line of Moses.

A second view is that those claiming to be apostles of Christ were Jews of a Gnostic or Docetic stripe who rejected the earthly sufferings of Jesus in His humiliation and promoted the glory of Jesus in His exaltation as the norm of life in this world. These false teachers were already present when Paul wrote 1 Corinthians (cf. 4:8-21; 12:3), but later they became more vocal in their opposition to Paul and his theology.

A third view is that these opponents were Palestinian Jews claiming to be apostles of Christ. Some who hold this position also feel these opponents were ostensibly concerned to bolster the position of the Jerusalem apostles, James, Peter, and John. They elevated the Law and promoted allegiance to themselves as interpreters of it.

Probably an unequivocal portrait of these opponents will never exist, but there is no disputing the havoc they wreaked in the Corinthian church and the heartaches they brought Paul. Though it is only in the final chapters of 2 Corinthians that Paul challenged them frontally, their influence pervades the entire letter in its threefold development.

1. The first seven chapters are largely a discussion of Paul's ministry as it specifically affected his relationship with the Corinthians and then generally as it reflected the paradoxes that mark the ministry of a servant of Christ. The accusation, no doubt broached by Paul's opponents, that his ministry and message were as suspect as his travel plans, he pointedly rebutted.

2. Chapters 8 and 9 concern the collection for the poor in Jerusalem. The Corinthians had initially welcomed the opportunity to participate but were failing to carry through on their commitment, possibly because Paul's opponents had intimated that he was profiting from their contributions.

3. The final four chapters include (a) a defense of his apostleship and (b) a denunciation of those who opposed him and Christ. Above all else, Paul's identification with Christ marks this letter. His affirmation to the Galatians, "I no longer live, but Christ lives in me" (Gal. 2:20), is graphically portrayed in 2 Corinthians 10–13.

Unity. All of Paul's letters have sections which digress or are discontinuous, but in no letter is this tendency so evident as in 2 Corinthians. The circumstances under which it was composed likely contributed to this but that has not satisfied the numerous advocates who find interpolations rife in 2 Corinthians. Five proposed interpolations may be noted.

1. Second Corinthians 2:14–7:4 is considered by some a separate letter that disrupts the otherwise smooth connection between 2:13 and 7:5.

2. Within the larger unit just noted, 6:14–7:1 is frequently held to be an extraneous section breaking the former bond of 6:13–7:2. According to some, this passage is the previous "letter" mentioned in 1 Corinthians 5:9.

3. Second Corinthians 8 is held by some to be an interpolated portion of a different letter because 9:1 begins as if no comment on the collection preceded it while the transition into that subject in chapter 8 is felt to be unduly abrupt.

4. Some believe chapters 10–13 are a separate letter either preceding 1–9 and forming the "severe letter" or following it by some lapse in time and so forming a fifth and final letter in the Corinthian correspondence.

5. Second Corinthians 11:32-33 seem to be an awkward intrusion in the flow of thought from 11:31–12:1 and is thought to be interpolated by a subsequent reviser of the letter.

While the sections noted are problematic, the proposed resolutions and the resulting truncated letter are even more so. No explanation of how the fragmented lot emerged to form canonical 2 Corinthians has found even minimal acceptance. That, coupled with the fact that not a shred of manuscript evidence exists to support any interpolation, produces a burden no theory can reasonably bear. Thus 2 Corinthians has a cohesive (though digressive) unity.

I. Introduction (1:1-11)

Poised in Macedonia, about to travel to Corinth for a third visit, Paul prepared for his coming by sending this letter. The name of the writer and its recipients followed by a greeting conforms to the usual style of letter writing in the first century (cf. Acts 23:26).

A. Salutation and description of writer and readers (1:1-2)

1:1. Though Paul's description of himself as an apostle was not unusual, in no letter was it more controversial than this one. A defense of the fact that he was an apostle of Christ Jesus occupied the heart of this letter. Unlike the false apostles who opposed him in Corinth, Paul was sent by Christ Jesus (Acts 9:15). Not a station of his own choosing, apostleship was pressed on him by God (Acts 22:14).

One of Paul's much-loved associates in the ministry was Timothy. He is also mentioned in the opening verses of other epistles: Philippians, Colossians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, Philemon. Timothy joined him near the beginning of the second journey (Acts 16:1-3) and proved to be an invaluable colleague (cf. Phil. 2:19-22). Timothy also had experience ministering at Corinth (Acts 18:5; cf. 1 Cor. 16:10-11; 2 Cor. 1:19), so his association with Paul in the greeting was more than a formality. Though Timothy was a protégé of Paul, the apostle considered him a brother (as also in Col. and Phile.).

While there was room for concern about the immediate destiny of the church of God in Corinth (cf. 2 Cor. 11:3), Paul was confident that those who composed it belonged to God (cf. Acts 18:10) and no power could wrest them from Him (Rom. 8:38-39). This was true not only of the Corinthians, of course, but also of all Christians living in the region surrounding the capital of Achaia. They too were saints, set apart by God for service to Him, but they were not immune to the controversy in Corinth or its consequences.

1:2. Grace refers to the love of God in action with peace its result. Both aspects were displayed in Jesus' ministry (John 1:14; 14:27). Paul hoped that this salutation would find expression in the Corinthians' lives as he shepherded them. (See the chart, "Paul's Introductions to His Epistles" at Rom. 1:1-7.)

B. Thanksgiving for God's comfort (1:3-11)

One of the many paradoxes of the Christian life is that the grace of God is most keenly experienced not in the best but in what seem to be the worst of times. However much a Christian longs for exaltation (cf. 1 Cor. 4:8), it is often in humiliation that he finds grace (cf. 2 Cor. 12:9). That theme pervades this letter and finds poignant expression in Paul's thanksgiving.

1:3-4. Troubles (thlipsei, "pressures, distresses") are mentioned nine times by Paul in this letter (vv. 4 [twice], 8; 2:4; 4:17; 6:4; 7:4; 8:2, 13; sometimes the word is trans. "troubles," other times "hardships"). Paul also used the corresponding verb thlibō three times in this epistle ("distressed," 1:6; "hard-pressed," 4:8; "harassed," 7:5). Troubles are experienced by all Christians. And the Apostle Paul probably endured more pressures than nearly all his readers. Troubles, Paul said, help Christians shift their perspective from the external and temporal to the internal and eternal (cf. 1:9; 4:17-18).

The source of all comfort in the midst of troubles is God Himself, to whom Paul gave three titles: the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (cf. identical wording in Eph. 1:3; 1 Peter 1:3), the Father (i.e., the Originator) of compassion, and the God of all comfort. This same God had sustained Paul through his suffering (2 Cor. 1:8-9) and delivered him from it (v. 10). "Compassion" translates the Greek oiktirmōn, used only four other times in the New Testament (rendered "mercy" in Rom. 12:1 and Heb. 10:28, and "compassion" in Phil. 2:1 and Col. 3:12). Just as spiritual gifts are not intended solely for the recipients' benefit but are to be used in turn for the service of others (cf. 1 Peter 4:10), so comfort received from God enables believers to comfort others. The comfort of God is channeled through people (cf. Acts 9:10-19; 2 Cor. 7:6) and by means of prayer (1:11). (Paul used a form of "comfort" five times in the Gr. [four are trans. in the NIV] in vv. 3-4, and five more times in vv. 5-7!)

In referring to the sufferings of Christ (1:5), sufferings we suffer (v. 6), and our sufferings (v. 7), the apostle probably had in mind either the suffering he experienced in Asia which he referred to next (v. 8) or the pain brought to him by the problems of the Corinthian church (cf. 11:28-29). Both kinds may be in mind, but if it was primarily the latter to which he referred (cf. 7:5) then the Corinthians' own suffering was similar. Paul's severe letter (7:8) produced in them a profound sorrow as they understood how their reprehensible behavior had grieved Paul (7:9). It had certainly distressed him to write it (2:4) but he did it out of love for them, for their comfort and salvation (cf. 7:10). The aspect of salvation suggested here is their advance in sanctification, which in fact this letter produced (cf. 7:11). The Corinthians' response brought comfort to both themselves and Paul (7:13) and reaffirmed Paul's hope (1:7) that God indeed had His hand on their lives (cf. Heb. 12:7-8). In addition, the Corinthians' comfort produced in them patient endurance (hypomonē, steadfastness in the face of unpleasant circumstances; cf. 2 Cor. 6:4; Rom. 5:3; Col. 1:11; James 1:3).

1:8-11. The hope in God which sustained Paul in his relationship with the Corinthians was also effective in his own life. An experience in Asia (see map between Acts and Rom.) had brought him to the end of himself. Apparently the Corinthians had some knowledge of this hardship, possibly communicated to them by Titus, but they did not appreciate its severity. Rather than gloss over his feeling of despair and helplessness in this situation Paul underscored it forcefully to illustrate how powerless both he and the Corinthians were apart from God and to stress how important is prayer as a means of effecting God's gracious intervention and aid.

Just what the hardships were is debated. Commentators in the 19th century and earlier held that the phrase in the province of Asia referred to Ephesus. Paul's experience was linked with that mentioned in 1 Corinthians 15:32, in which he mentioned fighting with wild beasts, a possible allusion to the contention instigated by Demetrius and his fellow silversmiths (Acts 19:23-41). However, no mention is made in that account of any harm coming to Paul. Twentieth-century opinion seems more disposed to locating this experience somewhere in the outlying region of the province of Asia (in the western end of what is today Turkey). One such suggested area is the Lycus Valley, where Paul may have experienced a beating by the Jews (cf. 2 Cor. 11:24), which nearly killed him. Or perhaps he contracted a drastic illness with similar devastating results. All such views are merely conjectures. Being unable to be specific in identifying this experience permits believers today to apply this to themselves, especially when they find themselves in desperate circumstances where deliverance seems impossible.

Paul believed he would die. He was under such great pressure (thlipseōs; cf. 1:4) far beyond his human ability to endure, so that he despaired even of life and felt the sentence of death (cf. 4:10-12, 16; 11:23-25). Certainly the Christian life was for him no bed of roses! Some suggest that this experience irrevocably altered Paul's perspective on his own destiny. Before this he expressed the hope that he might be numbered among those who would be alive at the coming of Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 15:51-52; 1 Thes.

4:15-17). Now his focus was on the resurrection (cf. Phil. 3:10-11).

What was sure was Paul's trust that God would deliver him from the peril of death (cf. 2 Cor. 4:8-14) until his course was run (2 Tim. 4:7), and his task completed. Then later God, he knew, would deliver him from the dead (cf. 1 Cor. 15:55; 2 Cor. 4:14). Paul had a firm hope in the Corinthians (1:7) and also in the Lord (v. 10). The prayers (v. 11) of the Corinthians were part of this deliverance, a means ordained by God to fulfill His will among people.

II. Apostolic Ministry (1:12–7:16)

One reason Paul wrote this letter was to answer insinuations raised in Corinth about the authenticity of his apostleship, the propriety of his conduct, and the sincerity of his commitment to those Christians. Later (in chaps. 10–13) Paul gave a defense of the genuineness of his apostleship. Questions about the propriety of his conduct, especially as it concerned "the collection," are addressed in chapters 8 and 9. The burden of these preceding chapters (1:12–7:16) is an emotional affirmation by Paul of his sincere commitment to the ministry in general and to the Corinthians in particular.

A. Changed plans defended (1:12–2:11)

Who raised the questions in the Corinthians' minds about Paul's supposed lack of commitment to the church in Corinth or his alleged insincerity? No one knows for sure. But a reasonable conclusion is that they were broached by false apostles (11:4, 13) who hoped to discredit their chief rival. Though Paul reserved his open confrontation with these opponents for the conclusion of his letter, a polemic pervades even these early chapters.

1:12. Paul met questions concerning his motives head-on. He could affirm with confidence—this is our boast—that the moral sensibilities of his conscience (cf. 4:2; 5:11), intensified by his knowledge of God's Word, were without censure regarding his conduct, especially in his relations with the Corinthians (cf. 1 Cor. 4:3-4). He said three things about his conduct. (1) It was with a singleness of heart. Instead of holiness (hagiotēti) Paul probably wrote "simplicity in the sense of singlemindedness" (haplotēti; cf. 2 Cor. 11:3). These two Greek words could easily have been confused by a manuscript copyist. (2) His conduct was in sincerity (cf. 1 Cor. 5:8; 2 Cor. 2:17) of purpose that could stand the closest scrutiny. (3) His conduct was not in keeping with worldly (sarkikē, lit., "fleshly," i.e., human) wisdom, for that is ultimately self-serving. Instead it was according to God's grace, that is, he was guided by a love for others and sought what was in their best interests.

1:13-14. Paul's letters were like his conduct: simple, sincere, not in man-made wisdom but in God's grace. Paul had no hidden meanings or ulterior motives in his correspondence with the Corinthians. He was aboveboard and straightforward in person; and he was the same way in his letters. He felt the Corinthians must acknowledge this to a degree (in part). And he hoped that this provisional assent would one day grow into their wholehearted acceptance and endorsement (understand fully). That in fact was how Paul viewed them. He was confident of the genuineness of their conversions (cf. 1 Cor. 9:1-2). And he felt they would eventually come to vindicate him and even boast of (kauchēma, "exult over") him in the day of the Lord Jesus (cf. Phil. 2:16), that is, at the judgment seat of Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 5:10-11).

1:15-16. In this spirit of confidence in his relationship with the Corinthians, Paul had proposed a journey from Ephesus that would have permitted him to visit them twice. This was apparently a change in the plans he had stated earlier (1 Cor. 16:5-7). At that time he hoped to go to Corinth by way of Macedonia and spend the winter with them, a course of action he eventually followed (cf. Acts 20:1-3). The change included the opportunity for two visits: first from Ephesus to Corinth and then on to Macedonia; then a second stop as he retraced his route. The two visits were meant to express Paul's affection for them. He wanted to see them as often as possible.

1:17. But Paul changed his mind about this itinerary (cf. 2:1), and his opponents said his vacillating was a sign of a fundamental unreliability, affecting not only where he went but what he said. Paul fervently denied this. He did not make plans in a worldly (i.e., self-serving; cf. "worldly" in 1:12) manner altering them for reasons of self-interest. Nor did he talk out of both sides of his mouth to further his own ends. He would explain the reason for his change in plans (1:23–2:2), but for the moment he was more concerned with the accusation that his message was equivocal or unreliable.

1:18-20. The source of stability for Paul in his ministry was God Himself, who is faithful, and the message Paul preached was no less certain than God. Since Paul did not vacillate in his message (Yes and No, v. 18), he did not vacillate in his plans either (Yes, yes and No, no, v. 17). At the heart of that message was the person of Jesus Christ who completely affirms all God's promises to people. The only proper response to God's message is Amen (lit., "let it be so"). It was this response of obedience to God that brought Paul and Silas and Timothy to Corinth in the first place and caused them to exalt Christ among the Corinthians in the synagogue (Acts 18:5). In Christ the promises to Abraham and David are fulfilled (Rom. 1:3; 11:5; Gal. 3:16) and the Law was brought to an end (Rom. 10:4), a truth apparently contested by Paul's opponents (cf. 2 Cor. 3). Nevertheless this message proclaimed by Paul and his associates resulted in the Corinthians' salvation and in turn brought glory to God.

1:21-22. Those who speak the "Amen" in response to the gospel message experience firmness and security in Christ. At the moment of belief God anoints each believer with the Holy Spirit so that like Christ (Christos means "the Anointed One"), he may glorify God by his life (cf. Matt. 5:16). John wrote that believers receive this anointing from God (1 John 2:20, 27). It is a pouring out of the Holy Spirit on the believer, reminiscent of the anointing of priests with oil.

A further consequence of the Spirit's presence is the seal of ownership (cf. Eph. 1:13-14) which also is accomplished at the moment of faith. A seal on a document in New Testament times identified it and indicated its owner, who would "protect" it. So too, in salvation, the Holy Spirit, like a seal, confirms that Christians are identified with Christ and are God's property, protected by Him (cf. 1 Cor. 6:19-20). It was probably this thought that caused Paul to describe himself as a slave of Christ (Rom. 1:1; Phil. 1:1).

A third work of the Spirit at salvation is His confirmation that what God has begun He will complete. Present redemption is only a foretaste of what eternity holds (cf. Rom. 8:23), and the presence of His Spirit in our hearts (cf. Rom. 5:5; 2 Cor. 5:5) is like a deposit, guaranteeing what is to come. These last seven words are a translation of one Greek word arrabōna, a down payment which obligates the payer to make further payments. The same Greek word is used again in 5:5 and Ephesians 1:14 (cf. "the firstfruits of the Spirit," Rom. 8:23).

1:23-24. Paul had earlier begun to explain his change of plans (v. 15). There he had mentioned his "message" (v. 18) in connection with his own integrity, which led to his digression in verses 19-22. He now returned to explain his altered plans.

He understood that his changed plans had caused a problem in Corinth. This is evident from the strength of his declaration, I call God as my witness (cf. Rom. 1:9; Phil. 1:8; 1 Thes. 2:5, 10). With a solemn oath (with God as the Judge) Paul staked his life on the truthfulness of his explanation which followed. It was out of consideration for the Corinthians, a desire to avoid disciplinary action (to spare you) that Paul had deferred his visit. Even though he had great authority as an apostle (2 Cor. 10:2-8; cf. 1 Cor. 5:4-5; 1 Tim. 1:20) Paul was reluctant to wield it. He did not lord it over their faith, that is, domineeringly take advantage of the fact that they came to faith in Christ through him. Dictatorial means can produce compliance but not the obedience that comes from faith which he sought. Authoritarian domination is often the manner of false apostles and the kingdom they serve (cf. 2 Cor. 11:13-15), but it was not the way of Christ (Luke 22:25-27) nor of those who stand in His stead (1 Peter 5:3). Paul assured the Corinthians, We work with you (lit., "we are fellow workers"; cf. 1 Cor. 3:9); he did not work against them or over them.

2:1-2. A servant of Christ is no stranger to pain and suffering (Matt. 5:10-12; John 15:18-20; 1 Peter 2:21). Paul had his share (cf. 2 Cor. 1:4-10; 11:16-32) which he did not shirk. But he was no fool. If he could avoid it and still accomplish his work he would do so. This belief led to his change of plans with the Corinthians.

When his first painful visit occurred is an unsettled issue. It could have taken place after his founding visit but before the writing of 1 Corinthians, as many suggest. It is odd, however, if that was so, that no mention or intimation of such a visit is found in that letter. More likely, he went to Corinth from Ephesus after writing 1 Corinthians. His "painful visit" may be linked to the projected double visit previously mentioned (2 Cor. 1:15-16) and may thus refer to the first part of those unconsummated plans. During that visit some painful event transpired which grieved the Corinthians and Paul (see comments on 2:5). To spare further grief for both of them Paul deferred his visit.

2:3-4. He decided instead to write a letter, a daring venture in view of the Corinthians' propensity for misunderstanding (cf. 1 Cor. 5:9-10). If his "painful visit" (2 Cor. 2:1) had occurred before he wrote 1 Corinthians, the letter here referred to (I wrote as I did) would be that letter. But if, as seems more likely, the "painful visit" occurred after he wrote 1 Corinthians, the letter Paul referred to followed 1 Corinthians and is now lost (not having been intended by God as a part of the inspired Scriptures). (See point 5 under "Contacts and Correspondence" in the Introduction.)

What that letter contained can only be conjectured from the comments which follow in 2 Corinthians 2:5-11 and 7:5-12. What is clear was Paul's depth of feelings for the Corinthians and the level of his own discomfort experienced in writing the letter (great distress [thlipseōs; "troubles or pressures"; cf. 1:4] and anguish of heart and with many tears) and in his waiting for news from Titus concerning its reception (cf. 7:5-8).

2:5. The event that made his visit painful (v. 1) and prompted the severe letter seems to have centered around the action of a certain man at Corinth. Whether he was a member of the Corinthian church or someone visiting them is not clear. Paul did, however, regard him as a Christian.

What this individual did to cause grief is uncertain. In the past many writers identified him with the incestuous man whom Paul had judged (1 Cor. 5). Relatively few now hold this view because of the severity of that judgment (cf. 1 Cor. 5:5) when compared with this situation, and the unlikelihood that 1 Corinthians is the letter referred to in 2 Corinthians 2:3-4.

Paul's diffidence in this verse suggests the more likely alternative that his authority as an apostle was affronted or challenged at some point in the course of his painful visit (v. 1). The Corinthians apparently failed to make the connection between a challenge to Paul's authority and their own spiritual well-being. They had regarded this as a personal problem requiring no action on their parts, a view which Paul had dispelled in his letter and which they now realized.

2:6. Their response had been to discipline the offender. Punishment may be too strong a translation of the Greek word epitimia. Perhaps "censure" is better. This discipline, whatever it was, was made by the church "as a whole" (hē hypo tōn pleionōn) rather than the majority (cf. 7:11).

2:7-8. Paul had reason to believe that their pendulum might swing too far (cf. 7:11). They were no longer dispassionate spectators of the wrongdoer, and might become impassioned prosecutors. In that case he would be overwhelmed by excessive sorrow (lit., "grief"). The offender was apparently penitent so Paul urged the church to forgive and comfort him (for in fact it was they who had been wronged, 2:10) and extend "comfort" to him. As a church they were to affirm their love for this fellow Christian and admit him to their fellowship (cf. 1 Cor. 5:11). (Reaffirm may be too strong for the word kyrōsai; it occurs elsewhere in the NT only in Gal. 3:15 where it is trans. "has been duly established.")

2:9-11. Paul's concern in this matter was not simply personal vindication or primarily that an erring brother be brought in line but that the Corinthian congregation could demonstrate the strength of their commitment to Paul (cf. 7:2). Their love and devotion to him would be affirmed by their being obedient to his directives (cf. John 15:14).

The expression of their solidarity with him was mutual. As one with him, they could forgive this offender who had wronged them by wronging Paul. Like their own sorrow for this wrong (2 Cor. 7:8) repentance resulted (cf. 7:9) so that Paul could offer forgiveness. Otherwise, Satan might use a bitterness of spirit to vitiate Paul's or the Corinthians' ministry. It was important that fellowship between Paul, the Corinthians, and the repentant offender be restored so that the incident not become an occasion for Satan to drive a wedge between the church and Paul. This was one of Satan's schemes (cf. 11:13-14) which Paul had worked so strenuously to thwart.

In sum, his plans had changed. But that was out of concern for the well-being of the Corinthian church. In place of a personal visit Paul had sent Titus with a letter and accomplished his purpose. But he did not know that until he met Titus in Macedonia. The interim was not an easy time for Paul as 2:12-16 indicate.

B. Glorious ministry described (2:12–7:16)

The interim period between Paul's dispatch of Titus with the letter (2:4; 7:6-7) and his return to report on the state of affairs in the Corinthian church was a turbulent time for Paul. He apparently sensed in an acute way his own helplessness and weakness and came to appreciate afresh how utterly dependent he was on God to accomplish anything of lasting value in his ministry. That theme pervades this section. A ministry is glorious because God is in it.

1. TRIUMPHANT IN CHRIST (2:12–3:6)

2:12-13. Paul had planned to rendezvous with Titus at Troas (see map between Acts and Rom.) and be apprised of the Corinthian situation. Before proceeding to Greece Paul had hoped to minister in Troas, a favored Roman colony. The Lord had opened a door (cf. 1 Cor. 16:9; Col. 4:3) for him, that is, had given him a favorable opportunity to preach the gospel of Christ.

But those hopes were dashed when Titus failed to appear. In addition to his apprehension about the church in Corinth, Paul was now also concerned about Titus' safety. For all Paul knew Titus might have been carrying with him a portion of the proposed Corinthian collection (cf. 2 Cor. 8:6) and fallen prey to bandits. Why else had he failed to meet Paul in Troas? Thus Paul had no peace of mind (anesin tō pneumati, lit., "relief in spirit"; anesin is also used in 7:5 and 8:13).

Despairing at his own inability to concentrate on the great potential for ministry in Troas (cf. 7:5-6) Paul said good-by to the church there and pushed on to Macedonia. The door would remain open for him and on his return (cf. Acts 20:5-11) God used him mightily in their midst, but for the moment Paul departed, unable to rise to the occasion, no doubt feeling like a beaten man (cf. 2 Cor. 4:9).

2:14. At this juncture Paul broke off his narrative to the Corinthians, not to resume it until 7:5. (Cf. "Macedonia" in 2:13 and 7:5.) But this transition is fitting. The defeated Paul drew attention from himself to the triumphant Christ in whose train, by the grace of God, he found himself.

Paul's words in 2:14 are based on a Roman triumphal procession, the victory parade awarded a conquering general in which enemy prisoners were forced to march. Through Christ, God the Victor had vanquished His enemies (cf. Rom. 5:10; Col. 2:15) and Paul, Christ's captive, was now marching in His parade! Paul, who had been "taken captive" by Christ (in Phile. 23 "fellow prisoner" is lit. "fellow captive"; cf. 1 Cor. 4:9), was now led in triumph. This "triumph in defeat," by a slave who was free, was the paradox of the ministry which Paul subsequently amplified (e.g., in 2 Cor. 4:7-12; 6:9-10).

In a Roman triumph processional incense was burned. Paul compared this to the knowledge of Christ, which like a fragrance was diffused everywhere throughout the world via the preaching of the gospel.

2:15-16. The gospel produces paradoxical results. As a bearer of this message Paul was identified with it so that he could refer to himself as the aroma of Christ. In the Septuagint the term "aroma" (euōdia) was used of Old Testament sacrifices (Gen. 8:21; Ex. 29:18; Lev. 1:9; Num. 15:3). Paul's life was a sacrificial offering (Rom. 12:1), well-pleasing to God. The course of his life in proclaiming God's message while at the same time suffering rejection and attack by many was an extension of Jesus' life as the Servant of God (cf. Col. 1:24).

The heart of the gospel is that through Jesus' death people may receive life and resurrection (1 Cor. 15). To those who rejected the gospel and disbelieved the message of Christ crucified and raised Paul was like the stench of death in their nostrils (Acts 17:32). They continued on the path to destruction. But to those who believe, their salvation leads on to glorification (cf. 2 Cor. 4:17; Rom. 8:18, 30). For them the gospel is like the fragrance of life.

This twofold consequence of Paul's ministry staggered him. Who is equal to such a task? He answered this question later (2 Cor. 3:5-6). For the moment, however, he recalled the work of the false apostles. They thought themselves more than adequate but it was because their message and motivation differed so radically from Paul's. To that point he needed to respond.

2:17. In Paul's day there was apparently no lack of false apostles (cf. 2 Peter 2:1). According to Paul, the ministry of the many false apostles was a matter of self-interest. Unlike them, he had ministered in Corinth without charge (cf. 2 Cor. 11:7-12; 12:14), though in principle he had no problem accepting material remuneration for spiritual labor (1 Cor. 9). What characterized the false apostles were their messages and their motives. Like dishonest merchants they selfishly hawked their wares. Paul said they peddle God's Word. This word kapēleuontes, "to hawk, peddle," is used only here. Paul may have had in mind Isaiah's description of Jerusalem's unscrupulous Israelites who "diluted" their wine with water to increase their profits (Isa. 1:22; cf. Lucian's description [Hermotimus 59] of similarly unscrupulous philosophers). So too these false apostles adulterated the Word of God for profit. They served themselves, not God whom Paul represented. They were "greedy for money" (1 Peter 5:2), an evidence of their falsehood. But Paul ministered with sincerity (cf. 2 Cor. 1:12).

3:1-3. Aware of the tactics of his opponents, Paul realized that his swipe at the false apostles and defense of his own ministry might be turned against him. His first question in verse 1 (Are we beginning to commend ourselves again?) suggests that this had happened before (cf. 1 Cor. 9).

Related to this, some might suppose Paul had to commend himself because he could find no one else to do so. His opponents obviously carried letters of recommendation, a common practice in the first century (cf. Oxyrhynchus papyri 1. 32). Paul himself followed this practice at various times on behalf of those who served with him (Rom. 16:1-2; 2 Cor. 8:22-24). Paul, however, had reason to doubt the authenticity of their letters (4:2). Unlike those false letters, apparently unavailable to public scrutiny, Paul's letter of commendation could be examined by everybody. His "letter" was the Corinthians themselves! And they were a letter . . . written by the Spirit of the living God dispatched by Christ Himself. The false apostles' commendation was human; Paul's was divine (cf. 1 Cor. 2:1-5).

When Paul spoke of that letter written on our hearts, "hearts" probably included Timothy and Titus. On tablets of human hearts alluded to the nature of the New Covenant (Jer. 31:33). In contrast with the Old Covenant inscribed in stone (Ex. 24:12), the New Covenant is inscribed on human hearts (Ezek. 11:19; 36:26). As the New is far superior to the Old, so was Paul's commendation compared with that of the false apostles.

3:4-6. Paul's confidence was founded not on human resources but on divine ones. He was confident in the Corinthians because the Holy Spirit had worked in them. Their faith rested on God's power (1 Cor. 2:1-5). Likewise his own sufficiency and competence in the ministry was derived wholly from God (cf. 1 Tim. 1:12).

Paul's emphasis on the New Covenant implies that his opponents were ministers of the Old Covenant. The Mosaic Covenant was a written revelation of the righteousness God asked of Israel (e.g., Ex. 19–23). It was accepted with an oath of obedience and a blood sacrifice (Ex. 24). When Israel proved unable and unwilling to remain faithful to that covenant, God graciously intervened and promised a New Covenant (Jer. 31:31-34; 32:40), new (kainēs) both in time and in quality. It was inaugurated by Christ in His sacrifice on the cross (Luke 22:20), and is entered into by faith (Phil. 3:9) and lived out in dependence on the Spirit (Rom. 7:6; 8:4). (However, the physical and national aspects of the New Covenant which pertain to Israel have not been appropriated to the church. Those are yet to be fulfilled in the Millennium. The church today shares in the soteriological aspects of that covenant, established by Christ's blood for all believers [cf. Heb. 8:7-13].)

Reliance on human rather than divine authority in letters of commendation was shortsighted and dangerous (2 Cor. 3:1-3). Even more so was the attempt to fulfill God's righteousness apart from divine enablement. Those who did so found that the letter kills (cf. Rom. 7:10-11). But those who trust in Christ find that the Spirit gives life (cf. Rom. 8:2).

2. GLORY FROM THE SPIRIT (3:7-18)

In the preceding portion of this letter (2:12–3:6) Paul had begun an explanation and a defense of his ministry. Prompted by the inference that his credentials were inadequate Paul cited the internal attestation of the Spirit as superior to any external human commendation. In so doing he intimated that those challenging him proclaimed an adulterated message based on the Old Covenant, acceptance of which could only lead to death.

To underscore the superiority of the New Covenant to that of the Old, particularly as it was proclaimed by his opponents, Paul discussed Exodus 34:29-35. His point was to show that the Old Covenant, because it came from God, was glorious. But because its fulfillment was based on human initiative, it ultimately was transitory and "fading" (katargeō, 2 Cor. 3:7, 11, 13), needing to be replaced by the New Covenant and the Spirit's ministry which is eternal (Heb. 9:14). To illustrate this, Paul contrasted the fading radiance of God's glory on the face of Moses (2 Cor. 3:7) with the ever-increasing radiance of Christians (v. 18).

3:7. The Old Covenant ministry of Moses brought death to people. It was not the fault of Moses or the Law, which was "holy, righteous, and good" (Rom. 7:12; cf. 1 Tim. 1:8). It was the fault of human sin (Rom. 7:10-11). Still even this ministry of death had a glory, though transitory and fading (cf. 2 Cor. 3:11, 13), which was visually illustrated by the Old Covenant's intended obsolescence.

When Moses came down from Mount Sinai with the tablets of the Ten Commandments, his face was so radiant that the people were afraid to approach him (Ex. 34:29-30). The Old Testament, however, does not mention the fading of this radiance. On the contrary, a part of Jewish tradition maintained that Moses carried the glory of that encounter to his grave (Targum Onkelos; Deut. 34:7). It seems unlikely, however, that Paul would have put forth a novel interpretation which might be easily rejected, especially a view central to his argument, when he had exercised such care thus far in developing this letter.

3:8-11. On this point, the fading of Moses' glory, Paul proceeded to argue for the superiority of the New Covenant. The ministry of the Old Covenant, by means of the commandments, condemned men (cf. Rom. 7:11). The ministry of the New, by means of the Spirit, leads men to faith in Christ and the imputation of His righteousness (Rom. 3:21-22; 4:24). Like a candle before the sun the Old Covenant paled and passed away (Gal. 3:19-25) before the grandeur of the New, which is eternal (Heb. 13:20). If the Old is glorious, how much more glorious is the New!

3:12. Because the New Covenant is eternal its recipients had the certain hope of acceptance by God. This permitted Paul to be bold and candid in speech and action.

3:13. In contrast was the ministry of Moses who veiled his face as he addressed Israel so that they could not see the radiance (produced by those meetings with God) fading away. Why did he do this? Did Moses believe that the rebellious Israelites would be less inclined to obey God if they witnessed a diminishing of this awesome radiance? Or did Moses consider them unworthy recipients of this display of God's glory and so veiled his face as a commentary on the hardness of their hearts? Perhaps it was the latter.

3:14-16. Whatever was Moses' reason for using the veil, his action proved to be prophetic. Not only was ancient Israel unwilling or unable to comprehend (their minds were made dull) the transitory and preparatory nature of the Old Covenant, but the dullness remained with subsequent generations. The Jews of Paul's day (to this day) failed to perceive that the Old Covenant was a preliminary message, not the final word of God's revelation. Though the cloth that veiled Moses' glory and the Old Covenant was gone, Paul said a perceptible spiritual veil remains and has not been removed (cf. 4:3-4; Rom. 11:7-8, 25).

The veil of unbelief that covers their hearts can be taken away only in Christ (2 Cor. 3:14), that is, whenever anyone turns to the Lord. Moses removed his physical veil in the presence of the Lord. So for any Jew—or anyone—who turns in faith to Christ the Lord his spiritual veil is removed. The Lord who mediated the Old Covenant is the same Lord who established the New.

3:17. In the Old Covenant when Moses entered the Lord's presence he removed his veil (Ex. 34:34). In the New Covenant it is the Spirit who removes the veil. The Holy Spirit is the personal "Agent" of Christ; He is the Spirit of the Lord (cf. Rom. 8:9). The Two are One in purpose (John 15:26; 16:6-15) and in result (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 5:1). Paul's words the Lord is the Spirit (2 Cor. 3:17; cf. v. 18) do not confuse these two Persons of the Godhead. Instead, they affirm the Holy Spirit's deity.

A major result of the New Covenant is freedom. Elsewhere Paul compared those under the Old Covenant to children of slavery and those under the New to children of freedom (Gal. 4:24-31). This freedom is possible because Christ has redeemed from the penalty of the Law those who believe so that they become children of God (Gal. 4:5-7). This freedom as children is confirmed by the Spirit, who enables Christians to call God Father (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6).

3:18. The glory evident in Moses' face was a diminishing radiance (vv. 7, 13). By contrast, in the faces of Christians is God's ever-increasing glory (cf. 4:6). ("Ever-increasing glory" is the NIV's rendering of the Gr. phrase, "from glory into glory," i.e., from one stage of glory to another.) Christians' glory, like that of Moses, is a reflection of the Lord's glory. But unlike Moses' transitory glory a believer's glory is eternal. This is because of God's abiding presence through the Holy Spirit (4:17). This glory is the experience of salvation available in the New Covenant and mediated by the Spirit who leads Christians from justification through sanctification to glorification. As believers manifest the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22-23), they are progressively being transformed (the same word Paul used in Rom. 12:2) into His likeness. Christlikeness is the goal of the Christian walk (Eph. 4:23-24; Col. 3:10). No wonder Paul said the New is far superior to the Old!

3. POWER FROM GOD (4:1-15)

The New Covenant ministry is glorious because of the certain triumph of Christ (2:14) and the transforming work of the Spirit (3:18), but it is not without its hardships. Physically, the demands of Paul's ministry sometimes seemed too much for him to bear (cf. 1:8; 11:23-27). No less excruciating were the spiritual demands (cf. 7:5; 11:28-29) brought on by those he served (e.g., 2:4) and those he opposed (e.g., 2:5). He reflected on these experiences in this passage and pointed to what sustained him, namely, the power of God (4:7).

4:1. The ministry (diakonia, "service"; also used in 5:18; 6:3; 8:4; 9:1, 12-13; 11:8) of the New Covenant was given to Paul in spite of his past (cf. 1 Cor. 15:9-10; 1 Tim. 1:13) because of God's grace and compassion on him. That same mercy sustained Paul through the many painful episodes that marked his ministry (cf. 2 Cor. 1:3-11) and enabled him to overcome feelings of despair (cf. 7:6). Thus he could write, we do not lose heart (4:1, 16). "Give up" in Luke 18:1 is the same verb translated "lose heart." Though discouraged at times, the great apostle never quit.

4:2. One source of discouragement was the disquieting state of affairs in Corinth. This was caused by the activity of false apostles in the church and the passivity of the Christians. In the face of sharp accusations Paul found it necessary to defend himself before people who should have trusted him implicitly. Already he had adroitly parried the attacks of his accusers several times in the letter (e.g., 1:17; 2:17; 3:1), but he felt forced to do so again (e.g., 6:3; 7:3; 10–13). Some accused him of using the gospel deceitfully to serve his own ends (deception translates the Gr. panourgia, "trickery, cunning"; in 11:3 this word is used of Satan). Perhaps Paul had the collection in mind (12:16-18; cf. 2:17). In response he pointed to the openness (we have renounced secret and shameful ways . . . setting forth the truth plainly) and boldness (cf. 3:12) which characterized his proclamation of the gospel. Unlike his opponents, he did not distort ("falsify") the Word of God. Thus he could commend himself (cf. 6:4) before others and God (cf. conscience in 1:12; 5:11).

4:3-4. Of course many people, particularly Jews (3:14-15), did not accept the gospel. To them it was veiled. But Paul would not change it to make it more palatable, as his opponents had done (11:4). The gospel was rejected by people who were unable and unwilling to accept it (cf. 1 Cor. 1:18; 2:14). They disbelieved and were abetted in their unbelief by Satan, the god of this Age (cf. Eph. 2:2) who, though defeated by Christ (Heb. 2:14), continues his hold over the present world (1 Peter 5:8; 1 John 5:19). His blinding of peoples' minds makes it impossible for them to see the light of the gospel.

The gospel, then, is not obscure. In fact, it points to Christ who, as the image of God (cf. Col. 1:15), revealed God the Father by His words and actions (cf. John 1:18; 14:9).

4:5. Christ was the Focus of Paul's message and the Object of his concern. Contrary to what Paul's accusers suggested (v. 2), he labored to advance the cause of Christ (for Jesus' sake) and not his own interests. Jesus was the crucified Christ and the resurrected Lord. Since Paul served Christ, he also served the church, Christ's body (Eph. 1:22-23). While serving the Corinthians, however unworthy they were, Paul was serving his Lord (cf. Matt. 25:40).

4:6. The reason Paul served the church and openly proclaimed the gospel was because of God's work in his life. Much as in creating the world God acted to bring light . . . out of darkness (Gen. 1:2-4), so in spiritual creation He brings light to the hearts of those in darkness (cf. Luke 1:78-79; Acts 26:18). This had been Paul's experience on the Damascus Road, when "a light from heaven flashed around him" (Acts 9:3). Confronted with the risen Lord, he became a new creation (cf. 2 Cor. 5:17). The light in believers' lives is the knowledge of God's salvation, a glory issuing from and seen in the face of Christ and reflected by Paul (cf. 3:18). When people were in the darkness of sin, they had no knowledge of God, no experience of His life and salvation (Eph. 4:18).

4:7. The message of salvation and the results it produces are glorious and divine. By contrast the bearer of the message is a mere mortal person. The contrast is like a great treasure contained in common jars of clay. A deepening sense of his own unworthiness, compared with the grandeur of his message, characterized Paul's life (cf. Eph. 3:7-9). God intended this sharp contrast so that no one would question the source of the gospel and its all-surpassing power. Salvation is the work of God not men (cf. 1 Cor. 2:5; 3:7).

4:8-9. In his earlier letter Paul had compared himself and his fellow apostles to "men condemned to die in the arena" (1 Cor. 4:9). The metaphors employed here evoked the same imagery to describe the demands of the ministry, contrasting human helplessness on one hand with divine enablement on the other. The contrasts include physical (cf. 2 Cor. 1:8-9; 6:5, 9) as well as psychological affliction (cf. 6:4, 8; 7:5-6). Hard-pressed is the participle thlibomenoi, related to thlipsis ("trouble, pressure, hardship"; cf. 1:4). Interestingly the words perplexed and in despair render two similar Greek words: aporoumenoi ("despairing") and exaporoumenoi ("totally despairing"). Without God's intervention these troubles would have broken Paul (cf. 1:8-10).

4:10-11. The paradoxes in verses 8-9 dramatically contrast the weakness which marked the humiliation of Jesus' earthly life and the power associated with His heavenly exaltation (13:4). In 1 Corinthians Paul had said the content of his message is "Christ crucified" (1 Cor. 1:23). In this letter he referred to his own life as a demonstration of this humiliation, a constant reminder that through human weakness the power of God is seen to greatest effect (2 Cor. 12:9-10). In his own body he carried around . . . the death of Jesus, that is, he suffered intensely for Jesus and bore physical scars resulting from wounds inflicted by beatings and a stoning because of his testimony for Jesus' sake (cf. 1 Cor. 4:11; 2 Cor. 6:5, 9; 11:23-25; Gal. 6:17). He was always being given over to death, that is, he constantly faced death (cf. 2 Cor. 1:9). Paul noticed that God usually chose weak people to serve Him (cf. 1 Cor. 1:26-29).

He subsequently argued for the genuineness of his apostleship on the basis of his sufferings (2 Cor. 11:23-24) and his weakness (11:30; 12:5).

However, the life of Jesus was also revealed in Paul's body, that is, it was evident that he was alive spiritually (cf. 4:16). By means of these experiences his transformation into Christlikeness advanced (3:18).

4:12. But though Paul saw suffering as paradoxically beneficial for himself (Phil. 3:10), he was ultimately motivated by the example of his Lord who gave His life on behalf of others (Mark 10:45; cf. Phil. 2:5-8). Paul believed his own sufferings were a means through which God could minister to the Corinthians (2 Cor. 1:5-6; cf. Eph. 3:10; 2 Tim. 2:10). As Christ had brought life to others through His suffering and death, so Paul's suffering (with death . . . at work in him [cf. 2 Cor. 4:10-11]) was a means of causing spiritual life to be at work in others (Col. 1:24).

4:13-14. What enabled Paul to endure in the face of this suffering? His quotation of Psalm 116:10 gives the answer. The psalmist referred to "the anguish of the grave" (116:3), but he affirmed his confidence that God would deliver him "from death" (116:8). That same confidence was Paul's, so with the psalmist he could declare I believed. The second part of the quotation, Therefore I have spoken, is from the psalmist's words about his own suffering: "Therefore I said, 'I am greatly afflicted.' " Paul did not quote these last words from Psalm 116:10. But he probably expected his readers to understand that he had in mind his own disclosure of suffering in the preceding verses (2 Cor. 4:8-12) and throughout this letter.

Paul could speak of his suffering and death because he was confident that God would deliver him (cf. 1:9-10). This confidence was founded on the resurrection of Christ, the Firstfruit and Guarantee of resurrection for all who place their faith for salvation in Him (1 Cor. 15:12-19; 1 Thes. 4:14).

4:15. All this suffering that Paul experienced was for the benefit of Christians like the Corinthians (cf. v. 12). And yet Paul had said he suffered "for Jesus' sake " (v. 11). This illustrates how he identified the church with Christ. Paul's ministry to the church, Christ's body (Eph. 1:22-23), was also a ministry to Christ (cf. Matt. 25:40).

The grace of God, His unmerited goodness and kindness, was extended to more and more people through the gospel Paul preached. Those who heard and responded in belief received salvation and gave thanks to God (cf. Eph. 1:6, 12, 14). As more came to the Savior, it caused thanksgiving to overflow (or increase). This verse underscores the selflessness of Paul's ministry. It was for the benefit of others and to the glory of God (cf. Mark 12:33), not for himself (cf. 2 Cor. 2:5).

4. ETERNAL PERSPECTIVE (4:16–5:10)

Paul well knew what it was to suffer in ministering for Christ. His distress at not finding Titus in Troas had been a part of that suffering. Remembrance of that painful experience (2:12-13) and God's provision of comfort (7:5-6) touched off this intervening meditation (in 2:12–7:4) on the greatness of the New Covenant ministry. The ministry triumphed in Christ (2:12–3:6), was glorious because of the ministry of the Spirit (3:7-18), and received its power from God (4:1-15). Now Paul turned to another aspect of this ministry, its eternal perspective.

4:16. Paul was not immune to discouragement in his ministry (1:8). In fact, Titus' failure to meet him in Troas disturbed him deeply (2:13; 7:5-6). It was just one of many experiences (e.g., 4:8-9; 11:23-29) which wore him down and reminded him of his mortality (4:11). But God had given him "this ministry" (v. 1) and God—the triumphant Son (2:14), the glorious Spirit (3:18), and the powerful Father (4:7)—was at work in it. God was also the assurance of his resurrection (4:14). Because of all this Paul did not lose heart (i.e., "give up"; cf. v. 1; Luke 18:1).

True, his earthly mortality was increasingly evident; outwardly he was wasting away (cf. 2 Cor. 1:8-9; 4:8-12). But his heavenly destiny was also increasingly evident (vv. 17-18). While physically he grew weaker, spiritually he experienced the renewing (cf. Rom. 12:2; Col. 3:10) work of the Holy Spirit day by day. He was becoming increasingly like Christ (2 Cor. 3:18), a prelude to what will be (cf. Rom. 8:23; 1 John 3:2).

4:17-18. Part of the means used by God in this transforming, renewing process is suffering (cf. 1 Peter 4:1, 13-14). Paul compared the sufferings he had experienced, severe as they were (2 Cor. 11:23-29), to light and momentary troubles (thlipseōs, "pressures, hardships"; cf. 1:4). They were nothing in view of the eternal glory that would be his when he would be in Jesus' "presence" (4:14) and would be like Him (1 Cor. 15:49; Phil 3:21; 1 John 3:2). This is amazing: all of his heavy, continuous burdens were, he said, "light" (the Gr. elaphron means "light in weight, easy to bear"; used in the NT only twice: here and in Matt. 11:30) and "momentary" (the Gr. parautika means "brief, for the slight moment, on the spot"). Though, as he wrote in 2 Corinthians 1:8, his hardships were "far beyond" (hyperbolēn) his ability to endure, he said his coming glory . . . far outweighs them all (hyperbolēn eis hyperbolēn is lit., "extraordinary unto the extraordinary").

This eternal perspective and hope in things to come sustained Paul in the midst of the temporary sufferings that marked his ministry. As he elsewhere reminded the Corinthians, the world and its present sufferings are passing away (1 Cor. 7:31). What is seen (the material) is temporary, but what is unseen (the spiritual) is eternal. The temporal will be replaced by a "glory that will never fade away" (1 Peter 5:4), an "eternal glory in Christ" (1 Peter 5:10). Therefore, Paul said, believers should look not on what is seen but, ironically, on what cannot be seen. What the inner man "sees" surpasses what physical eyes see.

5:1. Few chapter divisions are more unfortunate than this one since what follows (5:1-10) details the thought expressed in 4:16-18. Failure to appreciate this fact unduly complicates these already difficult verses by removing their contextual constraints.

Paul had referred to his mortal "body" (4:10-11) as "wasting away" (4:16). Now he compared his body to a worn-out earthly (epigeios, "on the earth") tent (skēnous) soon to be destroyed. In Christ's incarnate body He "lived (eskēnōsen, lit., 'tabernacled or tented') among us" (John 1:14). This is why the eternal perspective (2 Cor. 4:17) should be maintained (the second Gr. word in 5:1 is gar ["for"; trans. now in the NIV], introducing the reason for what preceded). An earthly body is temporary; a heavenly body is eternal.

The reference to the heavenly body as a building from God, an eternal house in heaven, not built by human hands is reminiscent of Jesus' description of His own resurrection body as a temple "not made by man" (lit., "not made by hand"; Mark 14:58). Second Corinthians 5:1 briefly summarizes what Paul had earlier written to the Corinthians about the nature of the resurrection body (1 Cor. 15:34-54). The confident assertion, we know, was based on the argument set forth in 1 Corinthians 15.

5:2-4. Paul had written about fixing his eyes "not on what is seen but on what is unseen" (4:18). These verses express the same sentiment. Paul's present life was "wasting away" (4:16) and he faced "death" (4:11-12). Using a figure of speech (metonymy of the effect [groaning] substituted for the cause [suffering]), Paul twice said we groan (5:2, 4; cf. Rom. 8:22-23). But someday, when our heavenly dwelling (2 Cor. 5:2, 4) is received, all such groaning and being burdened will give place to laughter and exultation (cf. Luke 6:21; 1 Cor. 15:51-55). What is mortal will be swallowed up by life in immortal, imperishable spiritual bodies in heaven (Phil. 3:21). For Paul his present mortal life was like nakedness, marked by humiliation and privation. Who would want to focus on this abject state in view of the eternal glory that awaited him? (2 Cor. 4:17-18)

A number of commentators and theologians have seen in these verses reference to an "intermediate state," a period between death and resurrection. This view takes one of two forms: (a) Dead (though conscious) believers are without a body while awaiting their resurrection bodies, or (b) dead (though conscious) believers receive an "intermediate body" that somehow differs from their forthcoming resurrected bodies. (According to either of these intermediate-state views, Paul was suggesting that he hoped to live till the return of Christ so that he would not experience an "intermediate state.") These views, however, seem unwarranted. Paul had only two conditions in view since 4:16, the temporal and the eternal. The introduction of a third is therefore unlikely. It seems clear from 5:4 that being in this tent (cf. 2 Peter 1:13), and unclothed describe mortality while being clothed and possessing a heavenly dwelling depict immortality, without specifying any intervening stages.

5:5. This present condition of fading mortality, however disquieting it may be, is not without design. As Paul had just written, ordinary mortals, like common jars of clay, are the means through which God displays, by contrast, His own all-surpassing power (4:7).

Equally encouraging is the realization that in the life of each Christian God has begun the transforming process that will one day culminate in possessing a heavenly body and perfect Christlikeness. The surety of that consummation is the Holy Spirit, whose presence and transforming work (3:18) forms the beginning and is guaranteeing the completion of God's gracious salvation (Rom. 8:23; Eph. 4:30). (On the words as a deposit, guaranteeing what is to come, see comments on the word arrabōna in 2 Cor. 1:22.)

5:6-8. With this perspective Paul could be confident (5:6, 8; cf. 7:16) and encouraged (cf. 4:1, 16), even in his period of mortality. These verses (5:6-8) recapitulate the theme first discussed in 4:16-18. To be at home in the body means to dwell in "the earthly tent" (5:1), to be outwardly "wasting away" (4:16), to be in a state of mortality away from the immediate presence of the Lord (cf. 1 Cor. 13:12).

What sustained Paul was the realization that this was a temporary and transitory state (2 Cor. 4:18). He focused not on present but on future conditions, not on the seen but the unseen. To live this way is to live by faith, not by sight. It is to live in light of ultimate rather than immediate realities (cf. Rom. 8:24-25), to be obedient to God's commands despite the hardships that obedience produces (e.g., 2 Cor. 11:23-29). Such was Paul's life. If the choice were his, he would have seized the opportunity to depart this pilgrimage life and take up residence (be at home) with the Lord (Phil. 1:21-23). But the constraints of his commission caused him to press on (cf. Phil. 1:24; Eph. 3:1-13).

5:9-10. Motivating Paul in this perseverance was his goal to please his Lord (cf. Gal. 1:10; Col. 1:10), a desire in effect during his earthly sojourn (at home in the body), which would be undiminished in heaven (away from it) (cf. 2 Cor. 5:6).

Contributing to this goal was Paul's knowledge that he would one day be evaluated by his Master. He wanted to please Him and to hear from Him, "Well done, My good servant!" (Luke 19:17) In his previous letter Paul had mentioned this judgment (1 Cor. 3:12-15) with particular reference to Christian teachers (1 Cor. 4:1-5). Now he affirmed that all Christians will be evaluated at the judgment seat of Christ (cf. Rom. 14:12), which will follow the Rapture of the church. Believers will be recompensed for the things they have done in their earthly lives (while in the body). Their good deeds will evoke one response (cf. 1 Cor. 4:5; Eph. 6:8) and the bad (phaulon, "worthless") will evoke another (1 Cor. 3:15; Col. 3:25). Salvation is not the issue here. One's eternal destiny will not be determined at the judgment seat of Christ. Salvation is by faith (Eph. 2:8-9), but deeds issuing from that faith (1 Thes. 1:3) will be evaluated.

This perspective on a day of judgment and the prospect of eternity had a salutary effect on Paul. It enabled him to persevere in the face of hardship (2 Cor. 4:7-12). And it motivated him to be faithful in discharging his ministry (5:11; cf. 1 Cor. 4:2-4).

5. MESSAGE OF RECONCILIATION (5:11–6:2)

The description of the ministry sustained by Paul touched on the work of Christ (2:12–3:6), the work of the Spirit (3:7-18), and the work of the Father (4:1-15). He also spoke of the eternal viewpoint required for the ministry to be carried out effectively (4:16–5:10). He now turned to the heart of that ministry, the message.

5:11-12. Though Paul knew that his salvation and eternal destiny were obtained by faith in Christ (Eph. 2:8-9), the thought of one day standing before his Savior (2 Cor. 5:10) awed him. It was the contemplation of that moment that moved Paul to fear the Lord and impelled him on in His service (cf. Matt. 10:28). The purpose of his ministry was to persuade men to "be reconciled to God" (2 Cor. 5:20).

The personal defense which follows (vv. 11-12) indicates that Paul met opposition in carrying out that commission. Understandably, a Christian's message is intimately bound up with his life and ministry (1 Thes. 1:5); the two are hardly separable. Since this is so, Paul had to justify and defend his conduct in order to win a hearing for his message. He followed the tactic used earlier in the letter, affirming before God the sincerity of his motives (cf. 2 Cor. 1:12, 23) and calling on the Corinthians to confirm this by their own experiences with him (cf. 1:14; 4:2).

The apostle, unlike his opponents, put no stock in external credentials or associations (3:1-2; cf. 5:16a). It was not the externality of the Law but the internality of the Spirit that authenticated his ministry (3:3; cf. Rom. 2:28-29). Nor was he concerned simply about his own reputation among the Corinthians (cf. 1 Cor. 3:21; Gal. 1:10; 1 Thes. 2:6). What did concern him was the reception of his message. He needed to be regarded as a servant of Christ so that his message would be regarded as the message of God (cf. 1 Cor. 4:1). If they took pride ("exulted") in him, the messenger, then they could answer his and their opponents, who looked on the outward appearance (what is seen) rather than what one is like inwardly (in the heart; cf. 1 Sam. 16:7).

5:13. To affirm his sincerity, Paul was willing to be thought a fool (cf. 11:16-17, 21). Who but one out of his mind ("insane"; cf. 11:23; Mark 3:21) would show such disregard for himself? (cf. 1 Cor. 4:9-13) Would a sane person willingly face a riotous mob intent on destroying him? (Acts 19:30; 21:35-40) Who would be crazy enough to walk back into a city in which he had just been stoned and dragged out? (Acts 14:19-20) Only a person who was utterly devoted to God would show so little regard for himself. Such a man was Paul.

Yet the Corinthians also knew well the prosaic, "sane" side of Paul the teacher (Acts 18:11) and loving father (1 Cor. 4:14-16). Whether they considered him insane or not, his ministry was selfless: It is for you. In his own way Paul had expressed the summation of the Law, loving God with all his heart, soul, and mind, and loving his neighbor as himself (Mark 12:26-31).

5:14-15. Why would Paul live that way? (v. 13) Because Christ had lived that way (cf. Mark 3:21). Though possessing divine prerogatives, He willingly became incarnate and followed the path of obedience to the cross (Phil. 2:6-8), dying for all (not just the elect, as some suggest; cf. 1 Tim. 2:6; Heb. 2:9; 1 John 2:2). By faith Paul was identified with Jesus in His death and resurrection (Rom. 6:3-4; Gal. 2:20). And Paul lived with the same selfless abandon the Lord had. Christ's love, which had converted him, now compelled him (cf. 1 John 3:16).

Later in discussing "the ministry of reconciliation" (2 Cor. 5:18-19), Paul developed the historical and objective implications of Christ's atonement. His concern in those verses was the subjective application of the Savior's objective work. All those who by faith entered into the benefits of Christ's sacrifice (and now live spiritually) should respond by living selflessly and being involved in that ministry of reconciliation. They should no longer live for themselves but for Him. Paul was certainly doing this; therefore the Corinthians should exult in him (v. 12).

5:16. As a result of his conversion Paul no longer evaluated people on the basis of externals. He implied that his opponents, and to a certain extent those influenced by them, did (v. 12).

At one time this had been true of Paul also. He had opposed Christ and His followers (Acts 22:4-5; 1 Cor. 15:9) because he had regarded Christ (lit., "knew Christ") from a worldly (lit., "according to flesh"; cf. 2 Cor. 1:12) point of view. He had information about Jesus, but this was not the same as believing in Him. Mere information about Jesus cannot transform a person from self-centeredness to selflessness (5:15). Only conversion could effect that, as it had done for Paul (Acts 9:1-20).

5:17. No one was more able to reflect on that transformation than Paul who switched from a persecutor of Christ to a proclaimer of Christ (Acts 9:5, 20-22). He was in Christ (a phrase Paul used repeatedly in his epistles to speak of a believer's spiritual relationship to Christ) because he believed the message of the gospel and was identified by faith with Christ (2 Cor. 5:14-15; cf. Rom. 6:3-4; Gal. 2:20; 6:14). To be in Christ is to be a new creation (cf. Gal. 6:15). This new creation is brought about by the Holy Spirit, the Agent of regeneration (Titus 3:5) and the Giver of divine birth (John 3:3, 6-8). God's new creative work, begun in each one who believes in Christ, will one day be consummated on a universal scale (Rev. 21:4-5). The old life of slavery to self and sin has gone (2 Cor. 5:16; cf. Rom. 6:6-14; Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:9). The new life of devotion to Christ means that one has new attitudes and actions (cf. 2 Cor. 5:14-15; Rom. 6:4; Eph. 4:23–5:2).

5:18-19. Like the first Creation (of the universe), the new creation is initiated by God: All this is from God (cf. 4:6; 1 John 4:10). Also, like the first Creation, the new creation becomes a reality through the work of Christ (cf. Col. 1:16). Christ's death on the cross makes possible human reconciliation to God (Rom. 5:10-11). Reconciliation involves removing rebellious and sinful man's enmity toward God (Rom. 5:10). This is one of the many marvelous accomplishments of the Godhead on behalf of a person the moment he believes in Christ for salvation from sin. Because Christ bore mankind's sin on the cross (1 Peter 2:24), He made peace possible (Eph. 2:11-19). No longer need people be the objects of God's wrath (Rom. 5:9). By trusting themselves to the reconciling work of Christ alone, people pass from God's wrath to God's blessing (Acts 16:30-31; Rom. 8:1) and from spiritual death to spiritual life (John 5:24; Eph. 2:1, 5). Then men's sins are no longer counted, that is, imputed or reckoned, against them, for Christ has taken them on Himself (2 Cor. 5:21; 1 Peter 2:24; 3:18). This is the treasure of the gospel which Paul proclaimed (2 Cor. 4:7), the message of reconciliation (5:19) delivered in the ministry (cf. 4:1) of reconciliation (5:18).

5:20. Few verses more precisely summarize Paul's ministry and message (cf. Acts 26:16-18). As Christ had preached peace to all men (Eph. 2:17) on the basis of what He would accomplish (Eph. 2:16), Paul continued that proclamation in His stead. The immediate representative of God's message of reconciliation was Paul, whose ministry is shared by all who are "in Christ" (2 Cor. 5:17, 19). All believers should serve Christ as His ambassadors. Paul's appeal was not a perfunctory pronouncement but an impassioned plea ("we try to persuade men" [v. 11]) addressed to the world on Christ's behalf: Be reconciled to God (cf. 1 Tim. 2:3-4).

5:21. Paul now summarized the basis of this message. The Cross epitomized the love of God (John 3:16) and of Christ (John 15:13; Rom. 5:8). The Savior was sinless: He had no sin. He was "without sin" (Heb. 4:15), and "in Him is no sin" (1 John 3:5). He took on Himself the sin of the world (John 1:29; 1 Peter 2:24; 1 John 2:2). God made Him . . . to be sin for us (cf. Isa. 53:4-6, 10). The sins of the world were placed on Him so that, in turn, His righteousness could be given those who trust Him (Rom. 5:17) and are thus in Him. That gift of righteousness is obtainable only by faith (Rom. 3:22; 6:23; Eph. 2:8-9; Phil. 3:9).

6:1. How could the Corinthians possibly receive God's grace in vain? One sure way was to disbelieve the message Paul had expressed in 5:21. False apostles in Corinth preached a message different from Paul's gospel (11:4). If they were Judaizers (cf. 3:7-11; 11:22), they probably denied Paul's message that the righteousness of God was obtained only by faith. To believe a truncated gospel meant to believe "in vain" (cf. 1 Cor. 15:2). Paul had reason to believe that some in Corinth had done just that (2 Cor. 11:2-3). "Vain" translates kenon ("empty, without content, without result, useless"; cf. 1 Cor. 15:14, 58; Gal. 2:2; Phil. 2:16; 1 Thes. 3:5).

6:2. Paul's quotation from Isaiah 49:8 was a rebuttal to Judaizers who wanted to impose the Mosaic Law as a means of obtaining righteousness. In Isaiah God announced that salvation would be universally offered not only to stubborn Israel but also to the Gentiles (Isa. 49:6). The quotation underscored the fact that salvation is God's initiative: in . . . My favor I heard you, and . . . I helped you. Jesus inaugurated this message of God's grace in His ministry (Luke 4:18-21) and Paul communicated it. The day of salvation is the present Age of Grace. Paul urged the Corinthians not to spurn that grace by turning to Judaistic legalism (cf. 2 Cor. 3:12-16; Gal. 3:1-6).

To do so would be "to receive God's grace in vain" (2 Cor. 6:1).

6. MARKS OF THE MINISTRY (6:3-10)

In 5:11-14 Paul began a defense of his ministry which led in turn to an explanation of his message (5:15-21). Now he returned to the topic of his ministry and its problems (6:3-10).

Paul had stressed that the commendation (5:12) the Corinthians should have been looking for in their ministers was not external letters (3:1), self-recommendations (10:18), or religious credentials (11:22) but the internal testimony of the Spirit (cf. Rom. 2:28-29). Now he suggested that there are some external credentials that mark a minister of God but they are hardly the sort the Corinthians would think of or his opponents would like to match. Paul's authenticating marks of the ministry were his sufferings as a servant and the sustaining enablement of God to carry on (cf. 2 Cor. 4:8-10). These were valid credentials for "the servants of God" (6:4; cf. 11:16–12:10; 1 Cor. 4:9-13; Gal. 6:17).

6:3. Paul was concerned more about defending his ministry (diakonia, "service"; cf. 4:1) than defending himself. To that end he scrupulously avoided behavior that would vitiate his ministry as Christ's ambassador (5:20) and God's fellow worker (6:1). Of course Paul knew that the message of the Cross would offend many (2:16; 1 Cor. 1:18). And he knew that many considered him a fool (cf. 2 Cor. 11:16). But he did not want to offend by self-serving conduct that would bring disrepute to God or spiritual ruin to a fellow Christian. (Stumbling block is from the Gr. proskopēn; in 1 Cor. 8:9 "stumbling block" translates proskomma, a synonym of the word in 2 Cor. 6:3).

6:4-5. As servants (diakonoi; cf. "service" [diakonia] in v. 3) of God Paul and his associates faced various trials without regard for themselves. But with God's help they had great endurance (hypomonē, "steadfastness," also used in 1:6; cf. 4:7-9). This was the sort of commendation the Corinthians should have required for authenticating their ministers (cf. 3:1; 5:12). Paul listed nine trials, in three sets of three each (6:4-5). Then he mentioned nine inner qualities (vv. 6-7), followed by nine pairs of paradoxes (vv. 8-10). In 11:22-27 his groupings are mostly fours. First he mentioned general difficulties: troubles (thlipsesin; cf. 1:4), hardships, and distresses (lit., "narrow spaces," i.e., circumstances that hem in; in Rom. 8:35 this word is rendered "hardship"). Then the apostle listed three specific kinds of persecution he endured in his ministry: beatings (cf. 1 Cor. 4:11; 2 Cor. 6:9; 11:23-24; Gal. 6:17), imprisonments, and riots. He experienced all three of these in Philippi (Acts 16:19-23). The third group describes impositions he accepted as part of the demands of ministry. He was not averse to hard work (1 Cor. 4:12; Acts 18:3-4) nor a stranger to sleepless nights (2 Cor. 11:27) or to hunger (1 Cor. 4:11; 2 Cor. 11:27).

6:6. Paul balanced his nine kinds of trials (in three triads) with nine internal qualities. The first eight are given in four couplets. Purity referred to practical righteousness, and understanding was a practical knowledge which displayed sensitivity in dealing with others. Patience (makrothymia, lit., "long temper") is the ability to bear up under the oversights and wrongs afflicted by others without retaliating (cf. Gal. 5:22; Eph. 4:2; Col. 1:11; 3:12; 2 Tim. 4:2; James 5:10). And kindness (chrēstotēti; cf. Gal. 5:22; Col. 3:12) is love in action.

In the Holy Spirit may be a metonymy, a figure of speech in which the cause stands for the effects. If so, then the Holy Spirit represents that which He causes, namely, spiritual fruit (Gal. 5:22-23) or control by the Spirit (Eph. 5:18). Or possibly the phrase (en pneumati hagiō) should be translated "in a spirit of holiness" to describe Paul's dedicated attitude. He hoped his sincere (anypokritō, lit., "without hypocrisy"; cf. "sincere [anypokritou] faith" in 1 Tim. 1:5) love (cf. Rom. 12:9) would be evident to his readers and would evoke in them a similar response (2 Cor. 6:12-13).

6:7. The apostle's ministry advanced because of his spiritual resources. In truthful speech he proclaimed the gospel (4:2) and relied on the power of God in the person of the Spirit to produce results (10:4; cf. 1 Cor. 2:4-5). Relying on God, Paul was completely equipped with weapons of righteousness to cope with the attacks of the adversary from any quarter (right or left) and to send him fleeing (cf. 2 Cor. 10:3-6; Eph. 6:11-18; James 4:7).

6:8. In nine pairs of paradoxes (vv. 8-10) Paul spoke of conflicting responses to his ministry (vv. 8-9a), of his own responses to opposition (vv. 9b-10a), and of the results of his labors (v. 10b, c). Some who believed welcomed Paul like Christ Himself (Gal. 4:14) but more often he faced insults and dishonor (1 Cor. 4:10; 1 Thes 2:2). He was maligned by outsiders (1 Cor. 4:13) and also by some within the church (Rom. 3:8), who gave him a bad report. He and his associates were genuine apostles, yet some regarded them as impostors. So he found it necessary to defend his ministry against the calumnies of opponents (1 Cor. 9:1-2; 2 Cor. 10:7).

6:9. Paul said he was unknown perhaps in the sense of people not acknowledging him or his ministry. But he was known by God (2 Tim. 2:19). Though he was dying (cf. 2 Cor. 1:8-9; 4:10-11; 11:23), yet he lived (cf. 1:10; 4:16), and though beaten (6:5; 11:23-25) he was not killed. He endured (6:4) these agonies because God sustained him (cf. 4:7-9).

6:10. Such a life would seem to lead naturally to sorrow. Yet because of his trust in God Paul was always rejoicing (cf. Acts 16:23-25; Phil. 4:4). Being poor and bereft of even basic material necessities (cf. 1 Cor. 4:11), Paul could nonetheless dispense spiritual values, making many rich (cf. Eph. 3:8). Though materially he had nothing, yet he was possessing everything by way of spiritual blessings (1 Cor. 3:21-23; Eph. 1:3).

7. ANTICIPATED RESPONSE (6:11–7:16)

In this section Paul pulled together the strands of the discussion about his ministry to the Corinthian church. He had defended his changed plans out of deference and love for them (1:12–2:11). He then turned to a description of his apostolic ministry in which he contrasted his own impotence with the omnipotence of God (2:12–6:10). Not an exercise in self-indulgence, Paul's point was to produce some changes in the Corinthian church: he sought not only an acceptance of his ministry and message but also a rejection of the influence of his opponents, the false apostles. This was not Paul's final word on this subject (cf. chaps. 10–13) but it was a forceful beginning.

6:11-13. Whatever failings Paul may have had, dissimulation was not one of them. Candor in speech and an unrestrained affirmation of affection (splanchnois; cf. 7:15; Phil. 1:8; 2:1; Col. 3:12; Phile. 7, 12, 20; 1 John 3:17) had marked his letter to this point (e.g., 2 Cor. 2:3-4). And he wanted the Corinthians to reciprocate. The depth of his feelings is noted by his calling them Corinthians. Only rarely did he name his readers in the midst of a letter. When, for example, he was greatly exercised about the declension in the Galatian churches, he sharply rebuked them by name (Gal. 3:1). On the other hand when he recalled the Philippian church's faithful support of him in the early days of his ministry and in his prison experience, he called them by name (Phil. 4:15). Blending frustration and affection, Paul similarly hailed the Corinthians and called for them to respond with unrestrained love (my children—open wide your hearts; cf. 2 Cor. 7:2-3).

6:14-15. What hampered the Corinthians' open, loving response, which Paul called for? (v. 13) Answer: rival suitors vied for their affections and allegiance. Though verses 14-15 are often applied to various sorts of alliances (e.g., mixed marriages, improper business associations), Paul's primary association was probably ecclesiastical. The rival suitors were possibly pagan idolaters (cf. 1 Cor. 10:14) or more likely false apostles (cf. 2 Cor. 11:2-4). In censure or affection Paul was equally candid (cf. 6:11).

The solution to the dilemma was for the Corinthians to separate from the false apostles. Whatever may have been their own and others' estimation of their spiritual status, Paul considered the false apostles to be unbelievers (cf. 11:13-15) from whom the Corinthians needed to separate. But Paul did not say that Christians should have no contacts whatever with unbelievers. Earlier he argued the absurdity of such a position (1 Cor. 5:9-10). But religious unbelievers might lead believers astray from "sincere and pure devotion to Christ" (2 Cor. 11:3), and the fact concerned Paul greatly. A believer can be rightly yoked only with Christ (Matt. 11:29-30).

To illustrate, Paul asked five rhetorical questions (2 Cor. 6:14-16), posing antitheses that reflect the wide chasm between the kingdom of Christ and the kingdom of Satan (cf. Col. 1:13). Belial (the Gr. Beliar is a spelling variation) transliterates an Old Testament word that means "worthless person." In Greek it came to mean "a lawless person." It was then used of Satan, the most worthless and lawless of all.

6:16. Paul's fifth rhetorical question provided a transition to his citing several Old Testament verses. Their cumulative effect bolstered Paul's exhortation (v. 14a). The church is the temple of God (cf. 1 Cor. 3:16) where the Spirit of God and Christ dwells (cf. Matt. 28:19-20; Eph. 2:22). The promise of God to live among His people was ultimately fulfilled in Christ (Matt. 1:23).

6:17. Enjoying God's presence requires personal holiness. Paul cited a portion of Isaiah 52:11 and Ezekiel 20:41, passages that speak of Israel's redemption. God's people are redeemed from pagan bondage (come out from them and be separate) in order to be clean before God (touch no unclean thing) and thus enjoy fellowship with Him (I will receive you). In Galatians Paul spoke of the bondage of those who are under the obligation of the Law (Gal. 3:13-14; 4:5; cf. 2 Cor. 3:7-9). Paul wrote to Titus that redemption implied two things: (a) deliverance "from all wickedness" and (b) a purified people who are "His very own, eager to do what is good" (Titus 2:14). Personal purity makes it possible to serve God and be received by Him.

6:18. A redeemed people are brought into a special relationship with God the Father as His sons and daughters (cf. Isa. 43:6). Those who identify with Christ by faith in Him may call God "Father" (Eph. 2:18; Gal. 4:5-6). From these sons and daughters God wants obedience (Deut. 32:19-21) as He did from David, His people's chief representative, and from David's lineage (2 Sam. 7:14; cf. Ps. 89:30-34).

7:1. These promises refer to God's assurances of His presence (6:16) and fellowship (6:17b-18) to those who obey Him. This obedience requires purification (let us purify ourselves), which here implies separation (katharisōmen; cf. Matt. 8:3; Deut. 19:13) from everything that contaminates body and spirit and from every person who pollutes the truth (cf. 2 Cor. 2:17; 4:2). "Body and spirit" refers to the whole person in his external and internal aspects (cf. 7:5). In an attitude of reverence for God (cf. 5:11) which produces obedience, sanctification (holiness) can be perfected, that is, completed or matured. This is a maturing, growing holiness, an increased Christlikeness (3:18), a progressive sanctification (not sinless perfection).

7:2. Having given a warning about the rival suitors for the Corinthians' affections (6:14–7:1), Paul resumed his appeal for mutual love, mentioned in 6:11-13. The accusations made about him were unfounded. He could offer disclaimers (e.g., 2:17; 4:2; 6:3), but the Corinthians' conviction of his integrity was his best rejoinder. Unhappily, however, this was yet lacking.

7:3-4. Paul did not blame the Corinthians for their vacillation. His rivals were impressive (11:3-5), much more so than he (10:7-12), at least in externals. The Corinthians' vacillation had not produced disaffection in Paul. On the contrary his love was unabated (cf. 6:13; 7:1) and his confidence in them was unimpaired. He had pride ("exulting") and joy (cf. v. 7) in them in all his troubles (thlipsei, lit., "trouble" [sing.]; cf. 1:4). No doubt this was primarily due to his confidence that God was at work in them (1 Cor. 1:4-9) but also partially due to the news Titus had brought him when the two finally met in Macedonia (2 Cor. 7:5-7).

7:5-7. Paul's frame of mind and body before Titus' arrival was far from placid (cf. 2:13). He had no rest (anesin, "relief"; also used in 2:13; 8:13). The great apostle did not always ride a spiritual crest, which he was not hesitant to admit (cf. 2:4; 6:10). He candidly admitted that his conflicts . . . fears and depression (downcast) were brought on by apparent opposition or persecution in Macedonia, by anxiety about Titus' well-being, by his reception by the Corinthians, and by their response to his letter.

However, the ample comfort of God (cf. 1:3-7) more than met his needs through the coming of Titus and the good news he brought. Titus had been well received by the Corinthians. They did love Paul and longed for him and were concerned for him. And they were remorseful (they had deep sorrow) at their failure to support him during his "painful visit" (2:1). They had responded positively to his severe letter (2:4).

7:8-9. Paul's harsh letter (see point 5 under "Contacts and Correspondence" in the Introduction) had hurt them. It had hurt Paul too. He had not relished his role as a disciplinarian, and in fact he apparently had wished he had not sent it with Titus. Yet because of the results his regret was mollified. In sorrow the Corinthians acknowledged their failure and redressed the wrong (cf. 2:6).

7:10-11. They had exemplified repentance, a change of mind involving action in accord with God's will. As such it was a godly sorrow (like Peter's remorse after his denial of Christ). This was not a worldly sorrow which brings death (like Judas' "sorrow" after he betrayed the Lord; Matt. 27:3-5). The Corinthians' genuine sorrow . . . produced several things: (a) an earnestness or concerted effort to make amends, (b) an eagerness to vindicate themselves, (c) indignation against Paul's opponent (2 Cor. 2:5-11), (d) alarm at their own passivity and its injurious effects (2:1-4), (e) longing and concern for Paul (cf. 7:7), and (f) readiness to see justice done (2:6).

In all this they proved they were innocent by virtue of their repentance. They had sinned not so much by doing wrong but by failing to do right (cf. James 4:17) and of this they had repented (2 Cor. 7:10).

7:12. Paul's primary motive in writing the letter (2:3-4) was to benefit the Corinthians. Uppermost in his mind was their well-being which Paul realized was bound up with their acceptance of his message and of him as an apostle. Paul wrote that he was not concerned about disciplining the offending brother and ameliorating the situation of the injured party. But this was apparently a Semitic way of saying that they were not his primary concern (Luke 14:26 gives another example of exclusivism as a way of stating priorities). It is doubtful that "the injured party" refers to the incident in 1 Corinthians 5:1 because no offended party was mentioned there. (In fact, the injured party in the incest incident may have been deceased.) Possibly Paul was the injured party (cf. 2 Cor. 2:5), but if so it was a curiously oblique self-designation (cf. Mark 14:51; John 13:23).

7:13-16. The Corinthians' positive response to Paul and his letter had been a great encouragement to him (cf. v. 4). Added to this was Titus' elation at the reception he received. Despite Paul's affirmed confidence in the Corinthians, Titus might have been understandably hesitant to undertake this mission (cf. 1 Cor. 16:10-11). But any trepidation Titus may have felt proved groundless. Actually the Corinthians responded to him with deference, receiving him with fear and trembling. They zealously sought to carry out Paul's directives (2 Cor. 7:7, 11). As a result Titus had great affection (splanchna, "inner emotion"; cf. 6:12; Phil. 1:8; 2:1; Col. 3:12; Phile. 7, 12, 20; 1 John 3:17) for the Corinthians. Paul knew this was God's doing (2 Cor. 7:6), but like a good pastor he commended the Corinthians and expressed his confidence (5:6, 8) in them after their positive response. He could only hope that the subjects he was about to discuss (in chaps. 8–9 and 10–13) would meet with the same spirit.

III. Gracious Giving (chaps. 8–9)

Having explained his changed plans (1:12–2:11) and having described the nature and orientation of his ministry (2:12–7:16), Paul now turned to the subject of gracious giving. This was no abstract topic; it concerned the collection for the poor in Jerusalem which Paul had been organizing for several years (cf. Gal. 2:10; Rom. 15:25-28). The Corinthians, hearing about "the collection," asked Paul what part they might have in it (cf. 1 Cor. 16:1). Paul instructed them concerning these arrangements (1 Cor. 16:2-3). Good intentions had not been translated into fruition, however, so Paul asked Titus to look into the matter (2 Cor. 8:6).

What factors interrupted the Corinthians' good intentions? No one knows. But one likely possibility was the presence of the false apostles who received support from the church and may have diverted to themselves some of the monies intended for that collection (cf. 2:17; 11:20). As a result, Paul's refusal to accept support was a sore point with the Corinthians (cf. 11:7-12; 12:13-18).

Titus had found the Corinthians in need of an encouraging word which Paul delivered in chapters 8–9 of this letter. This—in conjunction with Titus' work and that of unnamed assistants (8:23; cf. Acts 20:1-4), climaxed by Paul's visit (Acts 20:3)—brought the collection in Corinth to a successful conclusion (cf. Rom. 15:26; Acts 24:17).

A. Examples of liberality (8:1-9)

Whenever possible, Paul preferred to motivate and instruct by deed as well as by words. He did not hesitate to urge the Corinthians and others to imitate his manner of life (cf. 1 Cor. 4:16; 11:1a; 1 Thes. 1:6; 2 Thes. 3:7-9). But he was also quick to point to other worthy examples, including Timothy (1 Cor. 4:17; Phil. 2:19-20), Epaphroditus (Phil. 2:18), and of course, Christ (Phil. 2:5; 1 Cor. 11:1b; 1 Thes. 1:6) and God the Father (Eph. 5:1). Paul gave the Corinthians two examples of liberality: the Macedonian churches and Christ.

8:1-2. The Macedonian churches—those in Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea—had initially experienced the grace of God in the person of Paul and his proclamation of the gospel (Eph. 3:2-12) during his second missionary journey. In Philippi (Acts 16:12-40), Thessalonica (Acts 17:1-9), and Berea (Acts 17:10-15), the apostle preached the gospel and founded churches. The believers in these places suffered because of their faith (Phil. 1:29-30; 1 Thes. 1:6), but they remained steadfast (Phil. 1:5; 1 Thes. 1:7). They even contributed at that early juncture to Paul's material support (Phil. 4:15).

While their material welfare apparently deteriorated (cf. Phil. 4:10), their spiritual well-being increased commensurately. Paul attributed this to the grace of God, His unmerited favor. They had ample reason to be sorrowful (severe trial is lit., "in much testing of troubles" [thilpseōs; cf. 2 Cor. 1:4]), but they rejoiced. Though in extreme poverty, they could make others rich. Though they had nothing, they possessed everything that really matters (6:10). Like Paul, the Macedonian churches had learned that God's grace is sufficient to take their weaknesses and through them to display God's power (4:7-12; 12:9; Phil. 4:13).

8:3-5. The Macedonians were eager channels of God's blessing because they lived in accordance with His will (v. 5). Their actions revealed their love and devotion to God and others (cf. Mark 12:28-31; Phil. 2:3-8, 20-21; 1 Thes. 4:9-10). Entirely on their own initiative the Macedonians became involved in the collection. Paul, perhaps thinking they too were suitable candidates for aid, hesitated to approach them about the need in Jerusalem. However, like the poor widow Jesus commended (Mark 12:41-44), they were undeterred by their own penury and gave selflessly, trusting God to meet their needs (Phil. 4:19). One could wish that today more churches were like the Macedonians who pleaded . . . for the privilege of sharing.

8:6-7. In the light of this effusion of God's grace on the Macedonians (vv. 1-5), could the Corinthians, who had benefited so richly from God's grace (excelling in faith, in speech, in knowledge, in complete earnestness, and . . . love; cf. 1 Cor. 1:4-7), do any less? Paul thought not, so he dispatched Titus to administer the Corinthians' portion of the collection, to give them opportunity to excel in this grace of giving. ("Grace of giving" [2 Cor. 8:7] and act of grace [v. 6] both translate the one Gr. word "grace." Giving is the essence of grace!) Titus had gained experience in the collection and distribution of charitable monies elsewhere (cf. Acts 11:29-30; Gal. 2:1). But it is unknown when he became involved with the Corinthian collection.

In writing to the Romans Paul had mentioned the gift (God-given spiritual ability) of "contributing to the needs of others" (Rom. 12:8). The right use of this divine gift was to give generously. Paul himself had certainly given unsparingly to the Corinthians, and they in turn had professed their affection for him (2 Cor. 8:11). Paul wanted them to excel in their "giving" because giving expresses love (1 John 3:11, 16-18).

8:8-9. Paul, ever sensitive to the charge that he dominated the churches he founded (cf. 1:24), preferred that their motivation not stem from external commands (e.g., 8:7b). He wanted them to be motivated by their internal devotion (the sincerity of your love) to him and more importantly to the Lord. Could the Corinthians face being compared with the Macedonians in this regard? Or could they face being compared with their Lord, who is supremely worthy of emulation?

Few statements surpass verse 9 as a pithy summary of the gospel (cf. 5:21).

From the splendor of heaven Christ came to the squalor of earth. The Incarnation was an incomprehensible renunciation of spiritual and material glory. The One who was rich, who had everything, became poor, making Himself nothing (Phil. 2:7). He assumed mankind's debt of sin and paid for it with His life (Phil. 2:8). The Corinthians had directly benefited from His generosity (your and you are emphatic). He became what they were (poor) so that they could become what He was and is (rich). Therefore was a material offering to Him (cf. Matt. 25:34-40) too much to ask? (1 Cor. 9:11)

B. Advice and arrangements for the collection (8:10–9:5)

Concluding that the Corinthians would not refuse his appeal, Paul offered a brief rationale for the collection and an explanation of how it should be handled.

8:10-12. Paul's advice (cf. v. 8) was, finish what you have begun (cf. v. 6). Best wishes—desire and eager willingness—are no substitute for good deeds (cf. James 2:15-16). An individual's giving should be commensurate with his means . . . according to what one has; cf. 1 Cor. 16:2). By that standard the Macedonian gift, like the poor widow's offering (Mark 12:41-44), might in one sense be easy to equal but in another sense be hard to exceed.

8:13-15. A guiding principle for material exchange among churches is equality. Paul was not wanting some church to have relief (anesis; cf. 2:13; 7:5) while the Corinthians were hard pressed (thlipsis; cf. 1:4). That would be like robbing Peter to pay Paul!

Paul no doubt approved of the Jerusalem church's early efforts in meeting each others' needs by having everything in common (Acts 2:44). This expressed their mutual concern for all members of the body of Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 12:25). This principle was modeled after a divine pattern. When God gave food to the Israelites in the wilderness He did so equally according to their needs (Ex. 16:16-18). The church should not do less.

8:16-17. Like Timothy (Phil. 2:19-20), Titus was genuinely concerned about the welfare of those he served. In a self-centered world, such a concern was a distinguishing feature valued by Paul in his associates. No dictator (cf. vv. 8, 23), Paul had asked Titus to lend his assistance to a project which it seems Titus had eagerly (with much enthusiasm) and independently (on his own initiative) determined to do.

8:18-21. To accompany Titus was an unnamed, highly respected (praised by all the churches) representative probably from the Macedonian churches. He would take their gift to its destination in Jerusalem. Paul's motivation in organizing this collection was to honor the Lord (cf. Matt. 25:40; Gal. 2:10). To that end he scrupulously worked to avoid bringing any disrepute on His name through charges of mismanagement or avarice (2 Cor. 8:20; cf. 12:17-18).

8:22-24. In addition to the previously mentioned brother (v. 18) and Titus, Paul's partner and fellow worker, a third member (anonymously called our brother) was appointed to join the collection party. He was apparently an appointee of the Macedonian churches. He was zealous, and he and the other unnamed brother (v. 18) were an honor to Christ. His presence served both to help buffer Paul from accusations of personally profiting from the collection and also to spur the Corinthians on toward completing their project. By their giving, the Corinthians could demonstrate (cf. 9:13) their love (cf. 8:8).

9:1-2. The Corinthians' need to complete what they had eagerly begun (8:6, 10) concerned Paul. He had not found it necessary to write about the need to give aid to Jerusalem Christians. The Corinthians had agreed enthusiastically (8:11) to be involved in this service (diakonias) to the saints (cf. 8:4; 9:12-13). They were eager to help (cf. 8:4), a fact that Paul had relayed to the Macedonians the year before, which in turn had spurred the Macedonians on (stirred . . . them to action). The difference between the Macedonians and the Corinthians, however, lay in their diligence in seeing the project through to completion. Slow starters, the Macedonians finished quickly. But the Corinthians, willing in spirit, needed help in disciplining the flesh (cf. Matt. 26:41; Rom. 6:19).

9:3-4. Therefore Paul was sending Titus and the two brothers mentioned in 8:18-24 to aid in arranging the details for the Corinthians' consummation of the collection. Paul had boasted (cf. 9:2) about the Corinthians' enthusiasm to contribute (8:10-11) and hoped that the promising clouds would indeed produce rain (cf. Hosea 6:3-4; Jude 12). If the Corinthian promise to give went unfulfilled, both Paul and the Corinthians themselves would be ashamed in the presence of the less able but more noble Macedonians who might accompany him on his third visit (2 Cor. 13:1).

9:5. To circumvent that possibility Paul had arranged for Titus and the brothers (8:23) to help the Corinthians get their financial house in order. The two "brothers" with Titus may possibly have been the Macedonians Jason of Thessalonica (Acts 17:5) and Sopater of Berea (Acts 20:4; cf. Rom. 16:21). Then when Paul arrived, no collections would have to be made (1 Cor. 16:2) under pressure which might resemble exploitation (cf. 2 Cor. 7:2; 9:7; 12:17-18). Such motivation is unworthy of Christ's servants. Instead, giving should be a willing response to God's grace, not something done grudgingly. Paul now turned to that subject.

C. Reward of generosity (9:6-15)

In the grace of God Christians are rewarded in three ways for their generosity: (1) the givers are enriched (vv. 6-10); (2) the receivers' needs are met (vv. 11-12); and (3) God, the Source of all blessing, is praised (vv. 13-15).

9:6-7. Why should the Corinthians give generously? (v. 5) Paul gave two reasons. (1) A principle holds true in both the natural and the spiritual spheres: the size of a harvest corresponds to the scope of the sowing (cf. Prov. 11:24-26). A man may enjoy all his grain by eating it, or he may "lose" some of it by sowing it and later reaping a bountiful harvest. A spiritual harvest, of course, may differ in kind from the seed sown. Material seed may reap a spiritual harvest (2 Cor. 9:9; cf. 1 Cor. 9:11). (2) Another reason for giving generously is that God loves generosity. God prizes not the size of the gift (cf. Acts 11:29; 1 Cor. 16:2), but the giver's sincerity (not reluctantly), spontaneity (not under compulsion), and joyful willingness (a cheerful giver).

9:8. Ultimately Christians can dispense only what they have received, whether material (Acts 14:17) or spiritual (Rom. 5:17). The good work is done through God's enabling (cf. Phil. 1:6). Regardless of how desperate one's circumstances, a person who wants to give can do so in dependence on God (cf. Phil. 4:11-13; e.g., the widow of Zarephath, 1 Kings 17:9-16; and the Macedonians, 2 Cor. 8:1-3). Once again Paul sounded the note that man's inability, by contrast, showcases God's work (4:7). This verse is full of words indicating inclusiveness in God's enabling: all grace . . . in all things at all times, having all that you need . . . in every good work. In the words "all things," "all times," and "all . . . you need," the Greek heaps three words one after the other: panti pantote pasan. God is indeed sufficient! His "every" grace abounds so that believers can abound "in every good work."

9:9-10. The abounding grace mentioned in verse 8 refers to more than provision for one's needs of the moment. Charity reaps an eternal reward (cf. Prov. 19:17; Matt. 25:40). A person who "fears the Lord" (Ps. 112:1) and gives gifts to the poor (from Ps. 112:9, which Paul quoted) will be vindicated on the last day (cf. Matt. 6:1). Practical righteousness endures forever not only through the deeds but in the doer as he is progressively transformed into Christlikeness (2 Cor. 3:18). Ultimately a believer's reward is the culmination of the process (Phil. 3:14, 21). The One who supplies what is needed is God alone (Phil. 2:13). God (who supplies seed . . . and bread) enlarges the harvest (rewards or blessings) that results from righteous, generous living. The riches of righteousness are inestimable (cf. 6:10).

9:11-13. The more one gives to others, the more he is enriched, and thus he can be generous on every occasion. Such a generous spirit toward others results in more and more people giving thanksgiving to God.

One expression of this generosity was the contribution to the Jerusalem saints, administered by Paul. Not only would this service (vv. 12-13; cf. 8:4; 9:1) meet the pressing needs of Jerusalem Christians but it would also overflow in many expressions of thanks to God and bring praise to God. The Corinthian participation in this charitable gesture would demonstrate the reality of their confession and the vitality of their spiritual lives.

9:14-15. Because the Corinthians sent material aid, they reaped the intercessory prayers of the Jerusalem Christians who in praising God invoked His blessings on their Corinthian brethren. This spirit of selflessness is a consequence of God's surpassing grace (cf. "grace" in 8:1, 9; 9:8) supremely expressed in the ministry of the Lord Jesus Christ (8:9). This section on giving concludes (9:15) where it began (8:1), with the grace of God. Thanks in 9:15 is the word charis ("grace, favor"). Believers are to bestow "favor" on God because of His favors bestowed on them. His greatest gift (dōrea) is eternal salvation, spiritual riches, through His rich Son who became poor (8:9). Such a gift is indescribable (anekdiēgētō, "unable to recount or tell fully," used only here in the NT). Those who have benefited from such a spiritual gift (stemming from God's grace) should not hesitate to benefit others with material gifts. The Corinthians finished this work and sent a gift to Jerusalem (Rom. 15:26).

IV. Affirmative Action (10:1–13:10)

Paul had no easy transition to the subject he reserved for last. Because of this, these final four chapters have sometimes been thought to be from a different letter, possibly written earlier (see "Unity" in the Introduction) or a fifth letter, dispatched after chapters 1–9 were written and delivered. But transitions to difficult subjects are notoriously awkward and are usually put off to the end of a conversation or letter. Though Paul had been indirectly polemical in the preceding portions (e.g., 2:17; 3:1, 7-18; 4:2-4; 5:12, 16; 6:14), he saved for now the direct confrontation which he could not avoid. The false apostles needed to be challenged openly and the Corinthians' affections needed to be won over to a singular devotion to Christ and His apostle.

A. Appeal for obedience (10:1-6)

The remarks about the collection (chaps. 8–9) amounted to a mild appeal and call to action. In chapter 10 Paul's subject matter and the intensity of his appeal were amplified. Paul believed that the danger of people defecting from him and his gospel were decidedly real. By appealing for obedience, he tested the confidence that Titus said the Corinthians had in him (7:16).

10:1-2. Paul was loath to take stern action, but the situation demanded it. His model for this was Christ. Christ's meekness (cf. Matt. 11:29) was a strength of spirit that enabled Him to accept calmly the wrongs done against Himself (e.g., Matt. 27:12-14), but to act with a powerful vengeance on behalf of others (e.g., John 2:15-16). Meekness epitomizes the strength that comes from loving others rather than self.

Gentleness (epieikeias, "graciousness," occurring in the NT only here and in Acts 24:4) is the active corollary to this meek disposition. This was the attitude in which Paul ministered, a spirit which could easily be construed as weakness and timidity by the world's standards. His opponents, the false apostles (2 Cor. 11:13), acknowledged his "bark." In a letter (cf. 1 Cor. 4:19) and through a delegate like Titus, Paul appeared bold. But his "bite," they said, lacked teeth, at least by worldly standards.

10:3-5. The weapons of the world are learning, personal influence, impressive credentials (1 Cor. 1:26), rhetorical polish (1 Cor. 2:1), and the like. These things Paul had discounted and discarded (Phil. 3:4-8). He did not wage war as the world does or use their weapons.

The weapons Paul used were the proclaimed Word of God and prayer (Eph. 6:17-18), weapons with divine power. In dependence on God (1 Cor. 2:4-5) these weapons, frail by worldly standards, are able to demolish the arguments and every pretension of the gospel's foes. Neither the god of this Age (2 Cor. 4:4) nor his henchmen (11:15) could oppose the knowledge (or power) of God on which Paul relied. No thought (noēma; cf. 2:11), including those of his opponents, is beyond the reach of the One who "catches the wise in their craftiness" and "knows that the thoughts of the wise are futile" (1 Cor. 3:19-20; cf. Job 5:13; Ps. 94:11).

The object of Paul's warfare was to make people obedient. Paul was not interested in making them subject to himself or any other man after the manner of the world (cf. 2 Cor. 1:24; 11:20; Luke 22:25).

10:6. His approach to this particular confrontation in Corinth was twofold.

First, it was necessary that the Corinthian church express their subjection to Christ by demonstrating loyalty to His representative Paul (5:20; cf. 7:15). In this way their obedience would be complete. Second, when Paul was sure they had repudiated his opponents (cf. 6:14-18), he could then deal directly with the false apostles, knowing that the church supported him. He was ready to punish their acts of disobedience to Christ. The word "punish" (ekdikēsai) could more forcefully be translated "avenge" (cf. 1 Cor. 3:17). In other contexts it describes the wrath of God directed against the enemies of His people (Num. 31:2; Deut. 32:43; Rev. 19:2).

B. False apostles confronted (10:7–11:15)

Though Paul had parried the accusations of his opponents at previous points in the letter (3:1, 7-18; 4:2-4; 5:12, 16; 6:14), they had not been the direct focal point of his address. Now they were. Who these opponents were can only be answered tentatively. Apparently they were Jews (11:22) but where they came from is not known. They believed themselves apostles of Christ (10:7; 11:23), a claim Paul rejected (11:13). They brought letters of recommendation (3:1), indulged in self-commendation (10:18), and identified themselves with certain so-called "super-apostles" (cf. 11:5).

These false apostles may have been sent out by those who at the Jerusalem Council had urged the circumcision of Gentiles and obedience to the Law of Moses (Acts 15:5). Of course this appeal was largely unheeded by the apostles and elders (Acts 15:23-29). The false apostles claimed to bear a message of righteousness (2 Cor. 11:14) which Paul called a false gospel (11:4). They may have proclaimed a legalistic righteousness based on external conformity to Mosaic legislation (3:7-15). Ultimately they were self-serving, seeking monetary gains from the Corinthians (2:17) and possibly also indulging in sensuality (12:21). Legalism and self-centeredness are two sides of the same coin (Matt. 6:2, 15-16; 23:5-7) with self-indulgence the ultimate result (Matt. 23:25; cf. Phil. 3:2).

10:7-8. A major factor contributing to the Corinthians' dilemma concerning apostolic authority was their superficiality and shallowness. They looked only on the surface of things. They were oriented to externalities and worldly wisdom (cf. 1 Cor. 3:1). As a result the false apostles found them fair game. In order to retrieve this indiscriminate church Paul would have to engage in what he found personally repugnant—self-commendation. His goal was not self-enhancement but restoration of the Corinthians. To that end he wielded his authority as an apostle of Christ. And he did so freely and without being ashamed of it. He tore down the "strongholds," "arguments," and every "pretension" of his opponents (2 Cor. 10:4-5) but he built up believers.

10:9-11. Paul anticipated that his previously written words about his apostolic authority (v. 8) or his letters might frighten the Corinthians. He also anticipated that his words (vv. 4-6) might raise smirks on the lips of the false apostles and a depreciatory remark about his bite not equaling his bark. He did not deny that his public presence was superficially unimpressive (cf. v. 1). He was not a polished speaker (11:6) by design as much as by default (cf. 1 Cor. 2:1-5). If the false apostles equated his rhetorical skills with the power granted him by God as an apostle, they would do so at their peril. True, his letters contained awesome commands about handing men over to Satan for the destruction of their flesh (1 Cor. 5:5; cf. Acts 13:11; 1 Tim. 1:20). But his subsequent action would show that he did what he said.

10:12. Paul's opponents (and any who sided with them) could be censured on several counts. The first was the inadequate standard by which they evaluated themselves. The false apostles compared themselves not with the divine standard exemplified by Christ but with other men, using human standards. In doing so, Paul said, no matter how much they vaunted their human wisdom they showed themselves to be not wise, but fools (cf. 1 Cor. 1:20).

10:13-14. The false apostles were censured on a second count. Even if Paul granted for the moment the legitimacy of their apostleship it was he, not they, who had been designated the apostle to the Gentiles (cf. Gal. 2:8). God had authenticated Paul's commission by producing fruit in Corinth—we did get as far as you with the gospel of Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 3:6).

The false apostles had grossly overstepped their bounds. They had gone beyond proper limits (cf. 2 Cor. 10:15) but Paul had not.

10:15-16. Paul's third censure concerned the claims of the false apostles. They had overstepped their bounds but they had also exaggerated their accomplishments. The church in Corinth was a result of Paul's ministry not theirs. Unlike his opponents he did not boast about work already done . . . by others. The Corinthians may have had many so-called guardians but they had only one "father," Paul (1 Cor. 4:15). He was the one they should imitate (1 Cor. 4:16). As their faith grew and they matured, he could then expand his area of activity by evangelizing other Gentiles in the regions beyond them, even as far away as Spain (Rom. 15:23-24). They could take part in this work by prayer (Eph. 6:19-20) and financial support (cf. 1 Cor. 16:6; Phil. 4:15-17). But first they needed to get their own house in order (2 Cor. 10:6).

10:17–11:1. To boast in men is ultimately self-impoverishing (cf. 1 Cor. 3:21). However legitimate and necessary the censuring of his opponents was, along with validating his own work, Paul ultimately believed that both were exercises in foolishness. Paul had reminded the Corinthians of this in an earlier letter (1 Cor. 1:31) quoting from Jeremiah 9:24, as he did here. Why did the Corinthians continue to be enamored of men, simply a form of self-adulation, when in fact their spiritual vitality was entirely due to the grace of God? (1 Cor. 1:30; 3:7) Paul certainly had not sought the commendation of the Corinthians nor was he seeking to commend himself. He knew he would one day stand before the judgment seat of Christ (2 Cor. 5:10). There only the Master's approval (Luke 19:17) will matter. Self-commendation and the praise of men (cf. Matt. 6:2, 6, 16) will count for nothing (Rom. 2:29; 1 Cor. 4:5). Let the Corinthians make no mistake about it: Paul's rebutting his opponents and reviewing his own labor was not for his own benefit. He subjected himself to this "folly" because he loved them and they needed it (2 Cor. 12:11). Such was his love for them that he would willingly be made a fool if by so doing he could rescue them.

11:2-4. While they may have thought otherwise, they were in peril. The tragedy of Eden was ominously close to reenactment. As Christ was elsewhere compared with Adam (Rom. 5:14; 1 Cor. 15:21-22, 45), Paul here compared the church in Corinth to Eve. Instead of resisting (cf. James 4:7; 1 Peter 5:9) the devil's inducement to disobedience Eve listened and succumbed (Gen. 3:1-6). The serpent enticed her by his cunning (panourgia, "trickery"; cf. 2 Cor. 4:2). The devil's representatives in Corinth (11:13-15) were also seductive. They should have been spurned (cf. 6:14-15) but instead were tolerated (11:4). Worse still, if the church like Eve obeyed the lie they would be guilty of disobedience to God and disloyalty to Christ, whom they were singlemindedly to love and obey. (Sincere renders the Gr. noun haplotēs, "simplicity in the sense of singlemindedness"; cf. 1:12).

In Paul's metaphor the church was a virgin betrothed to Christ at conversion. As the servant of God's grace he acted as their spiritual father (1 Cor. 4:15). Until the marriage was consummated at Christ's coming, exclusive devotion to Christ should prevail (cf. Eph. 5:25-27). The Corinthians, however, were perilously close to forsaking that devotion and the spirit of liberty in which it flourished. They were dangerously open to a different gospel and a different spirit (i.e., bondage to Law; 2 Cor. 3:7-18; cf. Gal. 4:17–5:1).

11:5-6. The Corinthians vacillated in their devotion to the Lord because of the threefold appeal of the false apostles. First, these false teachers apparently associated themselves and their mission with the original apostles. The designation "super-apostles" was used by the false apostles of themselves, or was Paul's ironical portrayal of their adulation of the Twelve (or of Peter, James, and John; Gal. 2:9). The false apostles hoped to derive authority by claiming to be associated with the Twelve. Without demeaning the Twelve, Paul affirmed his own status as an apostle of similar rank: I am not in the least inferior (cf. 2 Cor. 12:11). His basis for this claim would follow shortly (11:22–12:10).

Second, the false apostles appealed to the Corinthians' desires for superiority in rhetorical excellence. Paul admitted he was not an accomplished rhetorician, a trained speaker (cf. 10:10). (However, if he were, he was choosing not to use his rhetorical abilities; cf. 1 Cor. 2:1-5). His apostleship was not a matter of show but of substance. What Paul said was more important than how he said it. The Corinthians could not deny the content of his message and its transforming consequences (cf. 1 Cor. 4:15; 9:1-2).

11:7-9. A third way the false apostles appealed to the Corinthians was in their method of supporting themselves. When Jesus sent out disciples on missionary tours, He directed them to derive shelter and sustenance from those to whom they ministered (Luke 9:3-4; 10:4-7). This apparently became the usual practice for Christian missionaries (1 Cor. 9:4-6; cf. Didache 11:4-6), and it was followed by the false apostles in Corinth. However, Paul and those associated with him (e.g., Barnabas, 1 Cor. 9:6) differed by supporting themselves as best they could without ministerial remuneration (cf. 1 Cor. 4:12; 1 Thes. 2:9; 2 Thes. 3:8). Occasionally Paul accepted unsolicited support from churches to whom he had ministered (e.g., the Philippian church in Macedonia; Phil. 4:15-16). But he did so uneasily (cf. Phil. 4:10-13), calling it "robbery" (2 Cor. 11:8) to take from poor people. He did not want to be a burden to them.

11:10-12. Paul had various reasons for adhering to this general practice (e.g., 1 Cor. 9:17-18; 2 Thes. 3:9-10). His main reason may have been his desire to emulate Christ who became poor even as He enriched others (2 Cor. 8:9). An immediate reason in Corinth for maintaining this practice was that it barred the false apostles from any claim of equality to Paul in apostolic ministry (11:12), and so was anathema to them. However, it was not too well received even by the beneficiaries, the Corinthians. They thought that Paul's hesitation to accept remuneration from them showed that he did not love them. Paul, nonetheless, stood his ground.

11:13-15. Though Paul had been mild in his remarks about the "super-apostles" (v. 5), here he gave the false apostles a withering denunciation. They were only shams, claiming to be ambassadors of Christ when in fact they were emissaries (servants, diakonoi) of Satan. Like Satan's masquerade as an angel of light, they were masquerading (metaschēmatizomenoi, "changing the outward form") as apostles and servants of righteousness. Like whitewashed tombs they may have looked righteous but inside there was only death and decay (cf. Matt. 23:27-28), prefiguring their doom (end; cf. 1 Cor. 3:17).

Who were these false apostles? Numerous suggestions have been made, ranging from Hellenistic charismatics to Palestinian Gnostics (see J.J. Gunther, St. Paul's Opponents and Their Background. Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1973). Several factors suggest, however, that they were Palestinian Jews, members of the Jerusalem church who were false brothers (cf. Gal. 2:4) in Paul's estimation. They carried commendatory letters from the church (2 Cor. 3:1), possibly under the auspices of the Jerusalem Council, to survey compliance with the Jerusalem decree (Acts 15:20-21). That there were self-appointed delegations to enforce Mosaic ordinances before this is certain (Acts 15:24), and it is possible that the false apostles in Corinth were mavericks of this sort. Paul did not contest their appeal to the authority of the "super-apostles." But he did refute the value of such an appeal and the notion that apostolic authority was a matter of human association rather than divine accreditation.

C. Apostolic credentials (11:16–12:10)

Like most people, the Corinthians were slow to absorb the truth that divine standards differ radically from those of the world. Paul had tried to make this clear in his former letter concerning the message of the Cross: the wisdom of God is foolishness to the world (1 Cor. 1:18-25). If, however, the Corinthians persisted in looking at things from the world's point of view, he would accomodate himself to their perspective. But he would still try to lead them to realize that divine accreditation should be seen not against the backdrop of human greatness but human weakness. The marks of an apostle were the marks of Christ, including weakness and suffering (2 Cor. 13:4; cf. Isa. 53:3-4; Mark 9:12). In this passage (2 Cor. 11:16–12:10) Paul recounted his frailties and with poignant irony said, in essence, "These are the credentials of an apostle" (cf. 1 Cor. 4:9-13).

11:16-18. Following the advice of Proverbs 26:5, Paul again answered the foolish Corinthians according to their folly. He had previously asked them to "put up with" a bit of foolishness (2 Cor. 11:1); he now resumed this approach. He did so not by choice but by necessity because they had tolerated and welcomed the false apostles. The Corinthians received those false teachers because of the latter's external qualifications and self-aggrandizement. This is like valuing a gem on the basis of its size rather than its quality. Paul's challenge to the believers was a "contest of folly," entered into in order to win the Corinthians. The word fool (vv. 16-17, 19, 21; 12:6, 11) is from the adjective aphrōn, meaning "ignorant," not mōros, which means "stupid." In 2 Corinthians Paul frequently spoke of boasting, not in a haughty way but in an effort to affirm his claim as an apostle. In his boasting he was not talking as the Lord would, as the Lord never defended Himself in this way, but Paul chose to, though reluctantly.

11:19-21a. The irony in these verses borders on sarcasm. Its sting is tempered only by Paul's motive which was to correct this wayward church. The Corinthians, thinking themselves wise . . . put up with fools—a naive, foolish thing to do! Though Paul may have been accused of "lording it over" the Corinthians (1:24), the false apostles were the ones they should fear. In the name of Christ they would exploit and enslave the Corinthians to gratify themselves. (Here the Gr. word for exploits means "devour," like a parasite. This differs from the word rendered "exploit" in 7:2 and 12:17-18.) Jesus accused the legalistic Pharisees of the same rapacious practice (Mark 12:40). Paul said he had been too weak for that. He had presented himself to the Corinthians as their servant and Christ as their only Lord (2 Cor. 4:5).

11:21b-22. Paul was now ready to begin comparing the external qualifications apparently believed by the Corinthians and the false apostles to be matters of great importance. It is usually believed that the questions asked and answered by Paul describe himself and the false apostles. It is possible, however, that Paul is comparing himself with the so-called "super-apostles" (v. 5), the Twelve, to whom the false apostles appealed as their source of authority and with whom they identified. If so, this would strengthen the comparison (noted in v. 5 and 12:11), would accord well with what Paul had previously written about himself and the Twelve (1 Cor. 15:10), and would eliminate the awkwardness of 2 Corinthians 11:23 as applied to the false apostles immediately after what Paul had written in verse 13. So, while these questions may describe the false apostles who claimed to be the proxy of the Twelve, they may also be understood as Paul's comparison of himself with the Twelve and his superiority, from a human point of view, to them.

The designation Hebrews may be an ancestral description but in this context (with Israelites) it may also be a linguistic distinction. The term is used elsewhere in the New Testament only twice (Acts 6:1; Phil. 3:5). In Acts 6:1 it clearly distinguished the Semitic-speaking Jews from those whose primary or exclusive language was Greek. Though Paul was born in Tarsus, he was apparently reared in a Semitic-speaking home of Jewish parentage whose orientation was to the homeland of Palestine.

As one of the Israelites Paul traced his lineage through the tribe of Benjamin (Phil. 3:5). As one of Abraham's descendants he was circumcised on the eighth day (Phil. 3:5; cf. Gen. 17:9-14); more importantly, Paul was Abraham's descendant by faith (cf. Rom. 4:16). From a human viewpoint Paul's credentials were impeccable (cf. Phil. 3:4-6).

11:23. If Paul were comparing himself with the false apostles rather than the Twelve in these verses (cf. comments on vv. 21b-22) then the phrase servants of Christ describes their designation of themselves, previously repudiated by Paul (v. 13) but here adopted for the sake of argument. The thrust of his argument was on quantifiable "service," an absurd measurement in itself (in 1 Cor. 3:13 Paul stressed quality in God's evaluation of Christian service). Paul noted the absurdity of this comparison himself (I am out of my mind; cf. 2 Cor. 5:13), but the Corinthian preoccupation with comparisons had forced him to it.

In intensity and scope of ministry no apostle or even group of apostles (cf. 1 Cor. 15:10) could match Paul's record of service. What is remarkable about Paul's catalog of achievements is his focus not on what might be called the triumphs of his ministerial experience but on its defeats. He left unmentioned the times when he seemed to be riding a surge of divine power such as at Ephesus (e.g., Acts 19:11) and chronicled instead the experiences in which he seemed to be dashed helpless to the ground. Like his Lord, who displayed the glory of God in His passion and death (John 13:31), Paul boasted in his sufferings and weaknesses (cf. Gal. 6:14).

The details concerning his ministry which Paul disclosed in this verse reveal how fragmentary is his biographical information in the Book of Acts. The writing of this letter coincided with the events mentioned by Luke in Acts 20:2. At this point in Luke's narrative he mentioned only one imprisonment (in Philippi), one beating (also in Philippi; Acts 16:22), and one brush with death (the stoning in Lystra; Acts 14:19). Yet in 2 Corinthians Paul referred to numerous incidents of this kind. Perhaps they occurred before his formal missionary journeys (Acts 13–20), or maybe Luke did not find it necessary to record them.

11:24. This verse makes it clear that Paul's statement in Romans 9:3—wishing himself cursed if by so doing Israel could be saved—was no empty declaration. Five times Paul received the synagogue's punishment (of 39 lashes each) in the course of ministering to fellow Jews. Death could occur under the 39 lashes because according to the Mishnah the person delivering the scourging was not liable for a victim's death (Makkoth 3.14).

11:25-26. The apostle to the Gentiles was beaten by fellow Jews. Also the Romans inflicted their punishment on Paul by beating him with rods, though they did so illegally since he was a Roman citizen (Acts 16:37). The acclaimed Roman peace was not much protection for Paul either. Roman law and order in Lystra did little to stop the mob that stoned Paul and left him for dead (Acts 14:19). Nor were the Roman highways and seaways placid avenues of travel. In addition to shipwreck (cf. Acts 27:27-44, though future to Paul's writing 2 Cor.) and river crossings with the consequential threat of death from drowning or exposure, Paul's itinerant ministry (he was constantly on the move) exposed him to countless dangers. He needed to be wary of professional bandits (cf. Luke 10:30), and attacks by Jews (his own countrymen) and Gentiles alike (e.g., Acts 14:19; 16:19). He faced dangers everywhere—in the city . . . in the country . . . at sea (cf. open sea, v. 25). Even within the churches, such as Corinth, he faced the danger of attack instigated by or at the hands of false brothers.

11:27. In addition to living with dangers Paul willingly endured numerous privations in discharging his apostolic ministry. His decision to refuse remuneration for his ministry (cf. vv. 7-9) was not made lightly. Working night and day (cf. 1 Thes. 2:9) so as not to burden anyone for the necessities of life (2 Thes. 3:8), Paul still often found himself with insufficient food, drink, and clothing to meet even his minimal needs. He experienced sleepless nights, hunger . . . thirst, and cold.

Earlier in 2 Corinthians Paul had referred to being persecuted (2 Cor. 4:9), at the point of death (4:10-12), facing "beatings, imprisonments, and riots," and experiencing "hard work, sleepless nights, and hunger" (6:5). Here (11:23-27) his list of sufferings is far more complete.

11:28-29. It is difficult to comprehend the pain Paul must have felt from these physical afflictions and deprivations. But the spiritual struggles of his ministry were an even greater burden.

These verses climax the catalog of his ministerial suffering. Concern for others, not for himself, weighed heavily on him. In 1 Corinthians (12:25) Paul had written at length about the church as a body composed of various members knit together by a mutual concern for each other. Here he revealed the daily burden of the concern he experienced not just for the well-being of the Corinthian church, which would have taxed the noblest spirit, but concern for the well-being of all the churches established through his ministry.

In 1 Corinthians 12 he noted that in a spiritual body "if one part suffers every part suffers with it" (1 Cor. 12:26). Here he revealed how that sentiment found expression in his own life. He identified with the weak whether physically (cf. Phil. 2:26) or, more likely, spiritually (1 Cor. 9:22), in their pitiable state (cf. 1 Cor. 8:12; Rom. 14:15). Who is weak, and I do not feel weak? If anyone was led into sin, Paul so identified with the sinner that he too felt the consequences of the act. Who is led into sin, and I do not inwardly burn? David compared his state of sin under God's hand to "the heat of summer" (Ps. 32:4), a likely inspiration for the equally vivid inner "burning" Paul felt at the knowledge of a brother led astray.

11:30. Paul had taken the standards of the Corinthians and false apostles and turned them upside down. His catalog of sufferings could hardly have been what they expected to read. He boasted not in his power but in his weakness. (In chaps. 11–13, Paul spoke frequently of being "weak" [11:21, 29; 12:10; 13:4, 9] and of having "weakness[es]" [11:30; 12:5, 9-10; 13:4].) Yet to Paul this was "boasting," not a contrived or ironical account. Paul's boast was that his life was like that of Christ. As Jesus had been "a Man of sorrows and familiar with suffering" (Isa. 53:3), so had Paul (2 Cor. 11:23-27). As Jesus "took up our infirmities and carried our sorrows" (Isa. 53:4) so, in a different sense, had Paul (2 Cor. 11:28-29). Paul's boast was that he was like the suffering Servant. It was certainly a grand claim though hardly perceived as such by false apostles and worldly Corinthian believers (1 Cor. 3:3).

11:31. Any one of the severe sufferings Paul had described in the preceding verses might kill an average person. But Paul—one man—endured them all.

Paul was aware that his reliability was suspect among the Corinthians (cf. 1:12-18). For that reason he asserted his veracity: I am not lying (cf. 1:18; 11:11). His vow of truthfulness applied not only to the preceding sufferings but also to the following description of his incident in Damascus (11:32-33) and the account of his visionary experience (12:1-6).

11:32-33. Paul mentioned this escape from Damascus, an event which occurred early in his life as a Christian (cf. Acts 9:19-25), as a typical or quintessential experience in his work as an apostle. It epitomized the transformation that had taken place in his relationship with God, and sharply contrasted his state with that of the false apostles. Like them, he carried commendatory letters from Jerusalem to Damascus (Acts 9:2), but when he was en route God struck him down and he encountered the risen Christ. He had left for Damascus with great human authority and zeal (Acts 9:1); he departed abjectly conscious of his own weakness. He was hunted by Jew and Gentile alike (Acts 14:5), but delivered by God through the agency of fellow Christians. His exit (by being lowered in, of all things, a basket), not his entrance, typified the apostolic life (cf. 1 Cor. 4:9-12). How different were the false apostles, who were like the unconverted Saul!

12:1. A second line of comparison the Corinthians insisted on (cf. v. 11) concerned visions and revelations. Like Paul's external credentials (11:22-23) he believed this parading of credentials was an exercise in futility (there is nothing to be gained) for building up the church (10:8). He did it, however, in the hope that it would silence his critics and enable him to minister freely. He also neatly turned his readers' attention from these irrelevant credentials to those that were an apostle's authentic marks. What distinguished "servants of Christ" (11:23) was their likeness to the suffering Servant (Isa. 53). If one had exalted "visions and revelations" (2 Cor. 12:1), he should have a corresponding appreciation of his own weakness and humility (vv. 9-10).

12:2-4. Paul's indirect reference to himself as a man in Christ showed that he regarded this great experience not as a consequence of inherent worthiness or spiritual excellence but because he was "in Christ." As such it anticipated what everyone in Christ will one day experience, the presence of Christ in heaven.

This event occurred 14 years earlier, sometime in the years A.D. 42–44 before Paul's missionary journeys reported in Acts. Paul was raptured (caught up is from the same verb harpazō used in 1 Thes. 4:17 of saints at the Rapture) to the third heaven, the dwelling place of Christ and the saints, which Jesus called paradise (Luke 23:43; cf. Rev. 2:7). Temporal and spatial sensations were absent (whether he was in the body or apart from the body he did not know). What he heard he was forbidden to communicate, possibly because it applied to him alone (cf. Acts 9:16). The experience, however, no doubt contributed to Paul's conviction that "our light and momentary troubles are achieving for us an eternal glory that far outweighs them all" (2 Cor. 4:17).

12:5-6. Paul boasted about a man (cf. "a man in Christ," v. 2, and "this man," v. 3) because his accent was on Christ, not himself. The Corinthian preoccupation with the external and the spectacular was regrettable to Paul (cf. 1 Cor. 14:20). He could boast of these things truthfully (2 Cor. 12:6; cf. 1 Cor. 14:18; Phil. 3:4), by which he implied that the claims of other men in Corinth were suspect. But what mattered to Paul was not his achievements but God's work through him and the gospel that he preached.

12:7-9. So that Paul would not forget this, God gave him a constant reminder of his weakness. Countless explanations concerning the nature of his thorn in the flesh have been offered. They range from incessant temptation, dogged opponents, chronic maladies (such as ophthalmia, malaria, migraine headaches, and epilepsy), to a disability in speech. No one can say for sure what his was, but it probably was a physical affliction (for the work of Satan in this, cf. 1 Cor. 5:5; 10:10). It is understandable that Paul would consider this thorn a hindrance to wider or more effective ministry (cf. Gal. 4:14-16) and that he would repeatedly petition God for its removal (2 Cor. 12:8). But he learned from this experience the lesson that pervades this letter: divine power (My power, v. 8; Christ's power, v. 9) is best displayed against the backdrop of human weaknesses (cf. 4:7) so that God alone is praised (10:17). Rather than removing the problem God gave him grace in it. This grace is sufficient (arkei, i.e., adequate in the sense of providing contentment). (The Gr. words trans. to keep me from becoming conceited occur in 12:7 twice, at the beginning and end of the verse. The NIV translates only the first one.)

12:10. God's grace transformed Paul's perspective. Experiences in his ministry he would naturally abhor, he could welcome supernaturally because the evidence of Christ's power in the midst of them brought glory to Him, not Paul. When Paul came to the end of himself, Christ alone was seen. When he was weak, then Christ, by His strength, could make Paul spiritually strong. ("Power," dynamis, in v. 9, is the word "strength," thus matching "strong," dynatos, in v. 10).

D. Recommended response (12:11–13:10)

Paul hoped, when he visited the Corinthians, to see two responses to his letter: (1) repentance (involving obedience to God) for wrong, and (2) an affirmation of loyalty to himself and his associates as authentic servants of Christ.

12:11. The boasting was over. Paul had played the part demanded of him by the Corinthians—the fool. Instead of coming to his defense against the innuendos and calumnies of the false apostles, the Corinthians remained passive spectators, forcing Paul to offer his own defense. Paul knew that he was more than equal to stand comparison with even the greatest of the Twelve (cf. 11:5), as shown by the catalog of credentials he had just given. But it was a foolish endeavor because these credentials were ultimately not his but God's. He was nothing. As he had written the Corinthians before, "I worked harder than all of them—yet not I, but the grace of God that was with me" (1 Cor. 15:10).

12:12. The supernatural acts accomplished through God's grace should have sufficed to quiet all suspicion about Paul's apostleship. Signs (sēmeiois, miracles with emphasis on their significance; e.g., Jesus' seven "signs" in John); wonders (terasin, unusual events that engender awe); miracles (dynamesin, wonderworks resulting from supernatural power)—all these are the evidences that mark an apostle (cf. Acts 2:22, 43; Heb. 2:4). Though no miraculous signs or wonders done in Corinth were recorded in the Acts account of Paul's ministry in that city, such miracles certainly occurred (they were done among you). Paul also performed miracles before and after the Corinthian ministry. A demon was cast out of the servant girl in Philippi (Acts 16:18), and Paul's ministry in Ephesus was marked by numerous miracles (Acts 19:11). Of course the greatest miracle was a church in Corinth planted by Paul but given life by God (1 Cor. 3:6). Remarkable too was his great perseverance, again a result of the empowerment of God (Acts 18:9-11). All these evidences pointed to Paul as a true apostle and to his opponents as "false apostles" (2 Cor. 11:13).

12:13-15. In only one sense was Paul different from other true apostles: he was self-supporting and took no remuneration from the Corinthians. And he would not change his way, for he refused to be a burden to them (vv. 13-14, 16). His imminent third visit would be no different (cf. 13:1; and see points 7 and 8 under "Contacts and Correspondence" in the Introduction). Like a father with his spiritual children Paul wanted to care for the church without cost to them. While he refused remuneration for different reasons (cf. 11:10; 1 Cor. 9:17) not the least among them was his love for the Corinthians. And he would gladly have received the same "coinage" from them (cf. 2 Cor. 6:11-13).

12:16-18. Paul could live with the fact that the Corinthians' recompense of love would be less than his investment of love in them. But he found it intolerable that they charged him and his associates with underhanded self-gratification (when just the opposite was true). Apparently the false apostles suggested that Paul's unwillingness to accept support from the church was simply a cloak to disguise his love of money and the designs he had on the collection. Titus was obviously implicated in this, as was one of the two brothers who accompanied him at Paul's recommendation (cf. 8:22). Paul asked the obvious question: What evidence could be mustered to lend the slightest credence to this allegation? Was there any hint of misconduct in the behavior of Titus or our brother? Were not Paul's actions equally impeccable? Had either of them ever exploited (cf. 2:11; 7:2) the Corinthians? Paul hoped that the absence of evidence would silence his critics (though the history of his relationship with the Corinthian church hardly boded well for such a result).

12:19-21. The motive behind the apologetic which Paul wove through this letter was not self-preservation. Paul's Judge was God, not any human court (1 Cor. 4:3-4; 2 Cor. 5:10). On the contrary, he had undertaken this difficult letter out of concern for the Corinthians (for your strengthening) in the hope of rectifying the disorders in the church before punishment became necessary (13:2). Like a father with his children, any punishment which he was compelled to administer would grieve him as well (12:21). It was for just this reason he had canceled his previously projected third visit (1:23–2:4). They had responded well to his earlier letter (7:8-13) but the entrance of the false apostles threatened to revive their former divisiveness.

The eight sins Paul mentioned (12:20) are all explainable in the context of church division, as are the three sins of verse 21 in the climate of lax morality which disunity produces. (See comments on these three in Gal. 5:19.) While the legalistic bent of the false apostles might be thought to quash the sins of the flesh listed in 2 Corinthians 12:21, the sad truth is that legalism and immorality are frequent bedfellows (cf. Phil. 3:3, 19; John 8:3-7).

13:1-3. Paul's second visit to Corinth (2:1) had been a humbling experience (12:21), not only because of the offense against him (cf. 2:5-11) but because many in the church were living contrary to the will of God (12:21). Paul had warned them about the consequences of sin then and he did so again in this letter. Following Jesus' application of Deuteronomy 19:15 to errant brethren (Matt. 18:16), Paul promised discipline for the unrepentant. The proof of his apostolic authority which they wanted would be given but in terms they would be wise to avoid (cf. 1 Cor. 5:5). Though Paul was weak, Christ whom he served was not (cf. 2 Cor. 10:4).

13:4. The paradox of Christ was the paradox of Paul. With God's power at His disposal (Matt. 26:53) Christ nonetheless followed the course of weakness to the cross. In the Resurrection the magnitude of that untapped power was displayed (Eph. 1:19-21). This side of the grave Paul like Jesus followed the path of "weakness" but as in Jesus' life, a glimmer of God's power showed through (e.g., Matt. 4:23; 2 Cor. 12:12). Paul wanted this power to be used for constructive rather than punitive purposes (cf. 13:10; 10:2-6), power that would enable him to serve them.

13:5-7. Throughout the letter Paul subjected himself and his ministry to scrutiny. Now he handed the lens to the Corinthians, with the challenge that they consider their own conduct (yourselves is in the emphatic position in Gr.). Paul's question is usually construed with regard to positional justification: were they Christians or not? But it more likely concerned practical sanctification: did they demonstrate that they were in the faith (cf. 1 Cor. 16:13) and that Christ was in them by their obeying His will? To stand the test was to do what was right. To fail was to be disobedient and therefore subject to God's discipline. The words fail(ed) the test (2 Cor. 13:5-6) and failed (v. 7) render the Greek word adokimoi ("disapproved"; cf. adokimos in 1 Cor. 9:27).

Whatever doubts the Corinthians may have had about Paul's conduct (e.g., 2 Cor. 1:17, 2:17; 7:2) he believed that a sober evaluation would lead them to vindicate him. He hoped they would not be disapproved by God; and he hoped they would see that he was not disapproved by God. Still it was their reputation or standing, not his, that concerned him.

13:8-10. For himself, Paul knew he was powerless against the truth, the will of God. His experience on the Damascus Road had taught him that (Acts 9:1-6). Like Jesus his Lord, he was willing to spend and be spent on behalf of others (cf. 2 Cor. 8:9; 12:15). In his weakness he was made strong (12:8, 10) and so were they (13:9). He was concerned about the Corinthians' welfare (cf. Phil. 2:20-21). Perfection (katartisin) may be translated "restoration." This noun occurs only here in the New Testament but is kin to the verb katartizesthe translated "aim for perfection" in 2 Corinthians 13:11 and elsewhere used for repairing nets (Matt. 4:21).

As a conclusion to this warning (2 Cor. 12:20-21; 13:5-7), this prayer for restoration of their ways was certainly fitting. Then Paul could be spared the pain of disciplining those he loved (cf. 2:2) and instead he could work with them for their joy (1:24) and for building them up (13:10).

V. Conclusion (13:11-14)

Did the Corinthians respond positively to Paul's warning? Yes. Paul had conditioned the expansion of his ministry in other areas on the problems in Corinth being resolved (10:15-16). He followed the writing of this letter with a visit of three months during which time he wrote the letter to the Romans. In that letter he wrote "Now . . . there is no more place for me to work in these regions" (Rom. 15:23). His appeal had been heeded. The Corinthians were now obedient.

A. Appropriate conduct (13:11-12)

13:11-12. Paul's final appeal was a call for unity: Aim for perfection (i.e., "be restored or complete"; see comments on "perfection" in v. 9), listen to my appeal, be of one mind (cf. Phil. 2:2), live in peace. This unity could be realized only as they depended on God who supplies love (cf. 2 Cor. 13:14) and peace. Such unity was expressed by a holy kiss (cf. Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20 [see comments there]; 1 Thes. 5:26; 1 Peter 5:14).

B. Salutations and benediction (13:13-14)

13:13-14. The saints of Macedonia, with whom Paul was staying at the time he wrote 2 Corinthians (see the Introduction), sent their unified greetings. In closing, Paul invoked the blessing of the Triune God so that the grace manifested by Christ, the love expressed by God the Father (cf. "the God of love," v. 11), and the fellowship created by the Holy Spirit might be experienced in Corinth.

GALATIANS

Donald K. Campbell

INTRODUCTION

Importance of the Epistle. Galatians, though one of Paul's shorter epistles, is highly esteemed as one of his greatest and most influential. Since both Romans and Galatians teach the doctrine of justification by faith, the former has been considered by some to be an expansion of Galatians and the latter has been called "a short Romans."

Like 2 Corinthians the Epistle of Galatians eloquently defends Paul's apostolic authority and contains in summary form what the apostle taught. In particular it contains a clear statement of justification by faith and builds on that foundation a defense of Christian liberty against any form of legalism.

In the early church, as the separation between Judaism and Christianity was taking place, the letter to the Galatians no doubt helped clarify that cleavage. Centuries later it played such a key role in the Reformation that it was called "the cornerstone of the Protestant Reformation." This was because its emphasis on salvation by grace through faith alone was the major theme of the preaching of the Reformers. Luther was especially attached to Galatians and referred to it as his wife. He lectured on the book extensively and his Commentary on Galatians was widely read by the common people.

The profound influence of this small epistle continues. It is indeed the "Magna Charta of Christian Liberty," proclaiming to modern generations that salvation from the penalty and power of sin comes not by works but by grace through faith in God's provision.

Authorship. The Pauline authorship of Galatians has, except for a few radical critics, been generally acknowledged. Even when the higher critics of 19th-century Germany were denying apostolic authorship of book after book, the Tübingen school regarded Galatians as Pauline. The reasons for this are based on the clear testimony of both internal and external evidence. Importantly, the author of the letter calls himself Paul both in the salutation (1:1) and later in the body of the letter (5:2). Most of chapters 1 and 2 are autobiographical and harmonize consistently with the events of Paul's life recorded in Acts. The theology of Galatians is the theology of Paul as taught in his other writings such as Romans.

The external evidence for Pauline authorship of Galatians is also convincing. In the second and third centuries Galatians was attributed to Paul and quoted by Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen. Even the heretics of that time, including Marcion, assumed it was written by Paul.

It must be concluded that no real doubt existed in the early church nor should any exist today as to the Pauline authorship of Galatians.

Original Readers. The Epistle of Galatians was addressed "to the churches in Galatia" (1:2). Where was "Galatia," and who were the "Galatians"? (cf. 3:1) This question is complicated by the fact that Galatia had two meanings when this epistle was written. First, it referred to the area in Asia Minor where the Gauls had settled after migrating from western Europe through Italy and Greece. The territory was limited to the north central and east central areas of Asia Minor and its principal cities were Ancyra, Pessinus, and Tavium. But in 25 B.C. this kingdom was converted to a Roman province, and territory was added to the south, including the cities of Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe.

A debate has raged for centuries over whether Paul wrote his Galatian letter to Christians living in northern or southern Galatia. The North Galatian theory held that Paul visited the geographical district of Galatia in the north and established churches there. This church-planting ministry would have taken place on Paul's second missionary journey after he left the southern Galatian region and before he came to Troas (cf. Acts 16:6-8). A second visit to the northern territory is apparently described in Acts 18:23.

The South Galatian theory was advanced by Sir William Ramsay. In this view the churches addressed in the epistle were those of Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and (Pisidian) Antioch, cities Paul visited initially on his first missionary journey (cf. Acts 13–14). Thus while there is no account in Scripture of churches having been established in North Galatia, even on the second missionary journey, churches were established in South Galatia, according to Acts.

Other arguments which tend to favor the South Galatia theory are that the main roads from Paul's hometown of Tarsus pass directly through the cities of South, not North Galatia; the Judaizers were not likely to bypass the southern cities for the northern cities; a large Jewish element which could be addressed by the Judaizers lived in the southern cities; representatives of South Galatia accompanied the offering for the poor in Jerusalem but none were from North Galatia (cf. Acts 20:4); Barnabas who is mentioned but not introduced (cf. Gal. 2:1, 9, 13) would not have been known by the believers in the northern cities since he traveled with Paul only on the first journey. For these and other reasons many New Testament scholars now favor the view that Paul wrote the Galatian letter to Christians in the cities of South Galatia.

Time and Place of Writing. Those who identify the recipients of Galatians as the believers in the southern cities of Galatia generally consider that the epistle was written from Antioch of Syria in about A.D. 48 just before the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15). While some chronological problems remain with this view, it is perhaps the best of the available options. After the first missionary journey Paul and Barnabas returned to Antioch. Peter came down from Jerusalem to visit them, fellowshiped with them, and then withdrew from the Gentile Christians only to be publicly rebuked by Paul for his inconsistent behavior. Meanwhile, Judaizing false teachers had infiltrated the churches in Galatia, denying Paul's authority as an apostle and teaching that circumcision was necessary for salvation. Reacting quickly and vigorously to Peter's actions and the threatened lapse of the Galatians into legalism, Paul wrote this strong letter prior to attending the Jerusalem Council.

Purpose of the Epistle. The Judaizers in Galatia both discredited Paul and proclaimed a false gospel. It was necessary that Paul vindicate his apostleship and message, a task he undertook in the first two chapters. In this autobiographical section Paul demonstrated convincingly that his apostleship and his message came by revelation from the risen Christ. In chapters 3 and 4 Paul contended for the true doctrine of grace, that is, for justification by faith alone. Finally, to show that Christian liberty does not mean license the apostle, in chapters 5 and 6, taught that a Christian should live by the power of the Holy Spirit and that when he does he manifests in his life not the works of the flesh but the fruit of the Spirit.

Galatians was written to remedy a desperate situation, to call early Christians back from the Mosaic Law to grace, from legalism to faith. It is an emphatic statement of salvation by faith apart from works and is as relevant today as when it was originally penned.

COMMENTARY

I. Introduction (1:1-10)

A. The salutation (1:1-5)

1:1. The opening of the Galatian epistle is both typical and atypical. Though the salutation includes the usual identification of author and recipient together with a customary greeting, the usual expression of thanksgiving and praise for believers is totally absent. Further, there is an abruptness about the opening words which plunges the reader immediately into one of Paul's major concerns, namely, that his apostolic credentials had been challenged. Though not one of the original Twelve, Paul claimed equality with them as an apostle. The word apostolos connotes authority and refers to a person who has a right to speak for God as His representative or delegate.

Paul's apostleship did not originate with men (it was not from men), that is, he was not appointed an apostle by any official body such as the leaders in Jerusalem or Antioch. Neither did his apostleship originate with any one man, however important (nor by man) not even Ananias, who assisted Paul in Damascus (cf. Acts 9:10-17), nor Barnabas, who played a strategic role in opening doors of ministry for Paul in both Jerusalem and Antioch (cf. Acts 9:27; 11:25-26). Rather, Paul made the bold claim that his call was of heavenly origin, from God the Father and the risen Lord Jesus Christ. This is the only direct mention of the resurrection of Christ in the epistle. It emphasizes the importance of that event to Paul's apostleship, for he was not called during the earthly ministry of the Lord but by the resurrected Christ.

1:2. Joining with Paul in the sending, though not the writing, of this letter were all the brothers with him. These were the apostle's fellow workers, perhaps Barnabas as well as the prophets and teachers with whom Paul ministered in Antioch (cf. Acts 13:1). Mentioning these colaborers emphasized the fact that the teachings of this epistle were not peculiar to Paul but were held in common with others.

The recipients of the letter were the churches in Galatia. (See map before Rom.) This was then a circular letter probably directed to the churches founded during the first missionary journey of Paul and located in Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and (Pisidian) Antioch.

1:3. The traditional Greek and Hebrew forms of greeting, grace and peace, were always used by Paul in his salutations to express the hope that the believing readers might be sustained by daily portions of these blessings. "Grace and peace" find their source in God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. (See the chart, "Paul's Introductions to His Epistles" at Rom. 1:1-7.)

1:4-5. Paul concluded his salutation with a magnificent statement regarding the work of Christ on the cross and its delivering power, another major emphasis of this epistle. Christ gave Himself for our sins (cf. 1 Tim. 2:6; Titus 2:14; 1 Peter 3:18). His death was voluntary and final. It satisfied God's righteous demands against sinners, reconciled people to God, and provided for human redemption. One purpose of Christ's death is to rescue us from the present evil age. The gospel is an emancipating message. It delivers believing sinners from the power of the present world system through the power of the indwelling Christ just as certainly as it delivers them from eternal judgment to come. Was Paul hinting that the Old Testament Law, so strongly promoted by the Galatian legalizers, would be impotent to accomplish such great things?

In His redemptive work Christ accomplished the will of . . . God (Gal. 1:4c; cf. Heb. 10:7-10). Further, in that obedience the Savior brought glory to God (Gal. 1:5; cf. John 17:1). Redeemed saints will in addition give glory to God forever because of the redeeming work of Jesus Christ.

Thus Paul had already drawn the lines of battle by touching on two vital concerns. He had affirmed his own apostleship and had declared that the basis of man's salvation lies solely in the work of Christ and not in any human works.

B. The denunciation (1:6-10)

Conspicuous by its absence is Paul's usual expression of thanksgiving to God for his readers. Instead he vented his astonishment and anger over the Galatians' defection. When compared with the opening of 1 Corinthians this is even more striking, for despite the Corinthians' deep moral defection Paul nonetheless expressed commendation. But here in the face of theological departure he did not express thanks, thus emphasizing the more serious nature of doctrinal apostasy.

1:6-7. Paul's astonishment was over an almost inconceivable turn of events—the Galatian believers were in the process of turning away (deserting, metatithesthe, as in a military desertion) from the truth. Part of the apostle's amazement was because it was happening so quickly after his last visit to them, or so soon after the false teachers began their insidious work. The departure was not simply from a system of theology but from God Himself, the One who had called them by the grace of Christ (the dominant theme of the epistle). In exchange they were embracing a different gospel, one that was false. Paul insisted that a gospel of legalism which adds work to faith is not the same kind of gospel that he preached and by which they were saved. It was actually an attempt to pervert the gospel of Christ. And Paul was aware of the fact that at the very time he was writing this epistle the false teachers were at work troubling or throwing the Galatians into confusion (cf. Acts 15:24; 20:29-30).

1:8. To emphasize the fact that the true gospel of the grace of God cannot be changed, Paul first stated a hypothetical case. If he (a divinely called apostle) or an angel (a heavenly messenger) were to alter the gospel message—a highly improbable situation—then let him be accursed or eternally condemned (anathema).

1:9. In this verse Paul seemed to repeat himself, but he actually advanced his thought. Paul and Barnabas had given a warning of judgment when they had preached to the Galatians. Now Paul repeated it. A zealous champion of the purity of the gospel of grace, Paul said it again: If anybody were preaching a different gospel (which the false teachers were), he would come under God's eternal judgment. It is not difficult to understand why Paul reacted so strongly, because the Judaizers were impugning the Cross; for if works were necessary for salvation, then the work of Christ was not sufficient (cf. 2:21). Furthermore a great deal is at stake for lost people. When the gospel message is corrupted, the way of salvation is confused and people are in danger of being eternally lost.

1:10. Apparently the Judaizers had charged Paul with teaching freedom from the Law in order to curry the Gentiles' favor. But the tone of this letter, specifically the harsh language Paul had just used, was hardly calculated to win the approval of men. Men-pleasers simply do not hurl anathemas against those who proclaim false gospels. Indeed, if the apostle had wanted to please men, he would have remained a zealous Pharisee and promoter of the Law rather than becoming a servant of Christ. Elsewhere Paul affirmed his purpose to please God, not men (cf. 6:12; 1 Thes. 2:4).

II. Personal: A Defense of Paul's Authority (1:11–2:21)

Paul then took up in more detail the challenge to his authority as an apostle. Was he a self-appointed impostor? Arguing autobiographically, Paul declared that (a) he was an apostle before he met the other apostles; (b) when he did meet them he was received as an equal; (c) and he even found it necessary to rebuke Peter, the reputed chief apostle.

A. He was independent of the apostles (1:11-24)

1. THESIS: PAUL'S GOSPEL WAS A REVELATION (1:11-12)

1:11-12. First, Paul certified that the gospel did not originate with man. Man-made religions emphasize human merit and the necessity of human works for salvation. Paul's message did not. Second, the apostle declared that he did not receive the gospel from any human source. Though he heard Stephen preach and had personal contacts with Ananias and Barnabas, he was not indebted to them for his knowledge of spiritual truth. Third, Paul affirmed he did not receive the gospel he preached by means of some course of instruction. Even though that was the way the Galatians received the gospel (as Paul had instructed them), the apostle on the other hand received it by revelation from Jesus Christ. This was the highest authority. How then could the Galatians question his authority and message? And how did they dare deviate from this divinely revealed truth?

2. EVENTS BEFORE PAUL'S CONVERSION (1:13-14)

1:13-14. By appealing to his personal history Paul established beyond any doubt that he did not learn his gospel from men. Beginning with his preconversion life, he showed that his only relationship to the church was that of a fanatic persecutor of it. Standing before Herod Agrippa II, Paul summarized his frenzied oppression of Christians (cf. Acts 26:9-11). Coupled with this was the fact that he was also zealous to advance as a Pharisee in Judaism. He felt driven to excel over other Jews his own age. He loved the Law and was zealous for the traditions of his fathers. He no doubt spent much time studying the Law of Moses and the accompanying Rabbinical traditions. Thus who could accuse Paul of not being acquainted with the teachings of Judaism when he knew them better than the Judaizers?

3. EVENTS AT PAUL'S CONVERSION (1:15-16A)

1:15-16a. The contrast with the preceding (vv. 13-14) is striking and is occasioned by God's intervention in the life of Saul of Tarsus: But . . . God. Nowhere is this intervention more graphically described than in Acts 9. Here Paul simply enumerated three things God did for him. First, God set him apart from birth. Paul knew that God had providentially set him apart from birth and that all his life to this point was a preparation for his ministry as a proclaimer of the gospel of God's grace. Second, God called Paul by His grace. This is a reference to the time of Paul's salvation. He responded to God's efficacious call and received Jesus Christ as Savior. In Romans (8:30) Paul gave the sequence of God's work in salvation: "Those He predestined, He also called; those He called, He also justified; those He justified, He also glorified." Third, God was pleased to reveal His Son in Paul. Blinded as he had been to the deity of Jesus Christ and thinking that the Nazarene was a fraud, God gave Paul an outward vision of Christ on the Damascus Road and later an inner revelation concerning the full significance of the person and work of the Savior. The purpose of this revelation was that Paul might preach Him among the Gentiles. The Book of Acts gives full account of Paul's ministry to the non-Jewish world on his missionary journeys. He became known as the apostle to the Gentiles (cf. Acts 9:15; 13:46-47; 26:20; Rom. 11:13; 15:16; Eph. 3:8; 1 Tim. 2:7). Thus Paul emphasized that both his conversion and his commission owed nothing to man but were of God. How else could such a transformation—from persecutor to preacher—be explained?

4. EVENTS AFTER PAUL'S CONVERSION (1:16B-24)

1:16b-17. Paul had emphasized that he did not receive his message from men before or at the time of his conversion. Now he affirmed that he was free from human influences afterward as well. Though Paul met other Christians after his conversion he did not consult them on doctrine. If he had been uncertain about the gospel, he could readily have gone to Jerusalem for a seminar with the apostles, but he did not. Rather he went immediately into Arabia. It is doubtful that he went there to evangelize but rather to be away from men and alone with the Lord for personal study, meditation, and to receive further revelation. This zealous student of the Law now pondered the meaning of his conversion and looked for the things concerning Christ in the Old Testament (cf. Luke 24:27). The product of these days in Arabia was the Christian theology that Paul explained in his epistle to the Romans.

The point of Paul's declaration is clear. He formed his theology not by consulting with others, but independently as he sought God's guidance.

1:18-20. Paul then reinforced his previous argument by asserting that he waited three years after his conversion to go to Jerusalem, time that was spent in Arabia and Damascus (v. 17). Would he have waited that long if he had needed theological instruction from the disciples? When he did go, it was to get acquainted with Peter, that is, it was a personal visit lasting only 15 days. Paul then left because of a plot against his life (cf. Acts 9:29). Meanwhile Paul had had a meaningful time coming to know the noted apostle, but there is no suggestion that Peter gave him theological instruction or apostolic endorsement for his ministry. Of the rest of the apostles Paul met only James, the Lord's brother, a leader in the church in Jerusalem (cf. Acts 12:17). To stress the truth of what he had just said—no doubt in the face of a Judaizer's charge that he had misrepresented his relationship to the apostles—Paul put himself on oath, calling God to be his witness that he was telling the truth.

1:21-22. After his abbreviated visit in Jerusalem Paul worked for an extended time in Syria and Cilicia, which is why he was personally unknown to the churches of Judea (cf. Acts 9:30; 11:25). He was not commissioned for this ministry by the apostles, and because of the distance between him and Jerusalem he could not have been under their authority or subject to their oversight.

1:23-24. The churches in Judea by this time had almost forgotten Paul. The only report they had recently heard was that this one who had once persecuted the church was now preaching the faith he once tried to destroy. This would of course include the doctrine of justification by faith apart from circumcision or works. And in the face of this report the Judean believers praised God because of Paul. This was a telling blow to the false teachers. The Jewish Christians in Judea rejoiced in the same gospel the Judaizers sought to undermine.

B. He was recognized by the apostles (2:1-10)

While chapter 2 continues Paul's defense of his apostolic authority and the gospel he preached, he focused not on the source of his message but on its content. Further, whereas in chapter 1 he emphasized his independence from the other apostles, he now demonstrated that there was a basic unity between himself and them.

2:1. Much debate has centered on the question of the identification of this trip which Paul took to Jerusalem with Barnabas, a Jewish believer, and Titus, a Gentile believer. The Book of Acts mentions five Jerusalem visits made by Paul after his conversion: (1) the visit after he left Damascus (Acts 9:26-30; Gal. 1:18-20); (2) the famine visit (Acts 11:27-30); (3) the visit to attend the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15:1-30); (4) the visit at the end of the second missionary journey (Acts 18:22); (5) the final visit which resulted in Paul's Caesarean imprisonment (Acts 21:15–23:35). Scholars are divided primarily over whether Galatians 2:1 refers to the famine visit or to the Jerusalem Council visit. But in the context in which he is listing all contacts with human authorities, why would Paul omit reference to his second trip to Jerusalem? And if the reference is to the Council of Acts 15, why did not the apostle allude to its decrees? It seems this passage has the famine visit in view.

2:2. Paul went to Jerusalem on his second visit in response to a revelation. That is, he went because God directed him to, not because the Jerusalem leaders had summoned him or called him "on the carpet" for preaching to the Gentiles. The reference may well be to Agabus' prophecy of a famine which prompted Paul and Barnabas to go to Jerusalem on a relief mission (cf. Acts 11:27-30). Paul seized this opportunity to consult with the other apostles privately concerning the message he was preaching to the Gentiles. This does not mean Paul sought their approval of its truth and accuracy, for he had received the gospel from God by revelation. Rather, he wanted them to consider its relationship to the gospel they were proclaiming. But if the Jerusalem leaders insisted on circumcision and other requirements of the Law for Gentile converts, Paul's labor (running) among the Gentiles was in vain. It was not that the apostle had any doubts or misgivings about the gospel he had preached for 14 years (Gal. 2:1), but that he feared that his past and present ministry might be hindered or rendered of no effect by the Judaizers.

2:3-5. It now becomes apparent why Paul brought Titus along on this Jerusalem trip. He was a test case. Would the Jerusalem apostles force the rite of circumcision on a Gentile believer? Paul knew that both Jews and Gentiles are accepted by God through faith in Jesus Christ without any distinction and that the church should do the same. The apostle declared that this truth was affirmed in Jerusalem because Titus was not . . . compelled to be circumcised, even though he was a Greek. But this victory did not come easily. Pressure to have Titus circumcised was brought to bear by certain false brothers (cf. 2 Peter 2:1). No doubt these were Judaizers, whose chief slogan is found in Acts 15:1: "Unless you are circumsised according to the custom taught by Moses, you cannot be saved." These "false brothers" ("sham Christians," NEB) were like spies or fifth-column agents who penetrated to search out weak areas of enemy positions. In this case they infiltrated (pareisēlthon; lit., "sneaked in alongside," used only here and in Rom. 5:20) the ranks, that is, they intruded without invitation into the apostles' private conference. Their goals were twofold: first, to spy on (kataskopēsai, used only here in the NT) the freedom we have in Christ. With hostile intent they purposed to observe the apostles' freedom from the Mosaic Law and from the legalism it engenders. Second, they intended to make Christians slaves. They wanted to bring believers back into bondage, to enslave them to the Law's rules and ceremonies. Specifically they strongly insisted that Titus be circumcised. But Paul stood absolutely firm because the truth of the gospel was at stake for the Galatians, and the entire Christian church. To impose circumcision on Titus would be to deny that salvation was by faith alone and to affirm that in addition to faith there must be obedience to the Law for acceptance before God. Thus the basic issue of the gospel was involved and Paul would not deviate or yield for a moment.

2:6. Having completed his discussion of Titus, Paul resumed the narrative relating to his conference with the apostles in Jerusalem and declared that they added nothing to his message. They did not correct or modify Paul's message but recognized its divine source and affirmed its truth and completeness. But why did the apostle speak in what appears to be a derogatory manner about some of the Jerusalem leaders? In verse 2 he referred to them as "those who seemed to be leaders"; in verse 6 he described them as those who seemed to be important; and in verse 9 he finally named "James, Peter, and John" as "those reputed to be pillars." In view of the fact that Paul's purpose in this passage was to emphasize his unity with the apostles, it seems best to explain these allusions as stemming from the fact that the Judaizers, in order to disparage Paul, had made much of the Jerusalem leaders. While there may be irony in Paul's expressions, he declared that he was not awed by the past or present stations of James, Peter, and John. Indeed they endorsed Paul's message and received him as an equal.

2:7-9. Further, James, Peter, and John recognized that Paul had been divinely commissioned to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, just as Peter had to the Jews. Thus Paul jolted the Judaists by declaring that the leaders in Jerusalem approved of his mission to the Gentiles.

It should be noted that Peter and Paul did not preach two gospels, as might be inferred from the KJV rendering, "the gospel of the uncircumcision" and "the gospel of the circumcision." There was one gospel though it was preached by different apostles to two distinct groups of people. The reason the apostles concluded that Paul's commission was equal to Peter's was the fact that God gave success to both as they preached. This was sealed by James, Peter, and John in their extending to Paul and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship. This was a sign of agreement and trust and an indication to all present that they endorsed the division of labor whereby the Jerusalem apostles were appointed to evangelize the Jews and Paul was entrusted to carry the gospel to the Gentiles.

2:10. The only request from the leaders in Jerusalem was that Paul remember the poor which he affirmed he was eager to do. It had been concern for the poor which brought Paul to Jerusalem in order to bring them financial relief (cf. Acts 11:29-30). It was the same concern which motivated him on his third missionary journey to raise large welfare offerings for needy Christians in Jerusalem (cf. 1 Cor. 16:1-3). Such offerings would alleviate human suffering, but they would also demonstrate genuine concern on the part of Gentile Christians for Jewish Christians. This in turn would help promote unity and love among believers and help prevent the kinds of misunderstandings which were undermining the Galatian churches.

C. He rebuked the reputed chief of the apostles (2:11-21)

In this final historical incident Paul related how he found it necessary to oppose even Peter, the reputed chief of the apostles, for conduct which threatened to compromise the gospel. The contrast with the previous section is dramatic.

2:11. When Paul visited Jerusalem, Peter (and others) gave him "the right hand of fellowship"; but when Peter visited Antioch, Paul opposed him to his face. The time of Peter's trip to Antioch is not known. There is no reference to it in the Book of Acts, but perhaps the visit occurred soon after Paul, Barnabas, and Titus returned to Antioch from Jerusalem. At any rate Peter's conduct in Antioch produced a tense face-to-face confrontation between two Christian leaders. Paul felt compelled to rebuke and condemn Peter for his actions, thus defending the gospel and demonstrating again his own independence and equality as an apostle.

2:12. On arrival at Antioch, Peter found Jewish and Gentile Christians fellowshiping together at mealtimes without regard to Jewish dietary laws. Because of the vision Peter had received at the house of Simon the tanner (Acts 10:9-15, 28), he felt free to eat with the Gentiles, and did so on a regular basis. While it lasted, this was a beautiful demonstration of the unity of Jew and Gentile in Christ. But a breach occurred when some arrived from Jerusalem who were shocked at Peter's conduct. These emissaries came from James and belonged to the circumcision party, but it is doubtful that they had James' endorsement. Nonetheless Peter was influenced by their presence and slowly but surely began to draw back and separate himself from the Gentiles. The verb tenses (imperf.) indicate a gradual withdrawal, perhaps from one joint meal a day, and then two; or it may be that he began a meal with Gentiles but finished it with only Jewish Christians. By such actions Peter in effect was teaching that there were two bodies of Christ, Jewish and Gentile. And that was heresy. But why did Peter create this breach? Not because of any change in theology, but simply out of fear. Once, after preaching to Gentile Cornelius, Peter courageously defended himself before the Jerusalem leaders (cf. Acts 11:18); but this time he capitulated to some Jewish friends.

2:13. Like falling dominoes the defection of Peter brought the defection of the other Jews and finally even Barnabas. The pressure must have been great for Barnabas to succumb because he was from Cyprus, a Gentile center, and was involved in a missionary program with Paul to reach Gentiles with the gospel. All of them—Peter, the other Jewish Christians, and Barnabas—were guilty of hypocrisy because while confessing and teaching that they were one in Christ with Gentiles, they were denying this truth by their conduct.

2:14. The response of Paul was electric. What Peter had initiated created a public scandal and therefore deserved a public rebuke. Further, the defectors were not acting according to the truth of the gospel, that is, they were denying by their actions the truth that on the basis of Jesus Christ's death and resurrection Jews and Gentiles who believe are accepted equally by God. Paul therefore asked Peter before them all, "If you, who are a Jew, do not live like a Jew but like a Gentile, why on earth do you try to make Gentiles live like Jews?" (PH) It was a stinging rebuke. Peter's response is not recorded. He stood condemned. He was acting contrary to his own convictions, was betraying Christian liberty, and was casting a slur on fellow believers. Such behavior needed this severe reprimand.

2:15. But how far did the rebuke extend? Considerable discussion has centered on the question as to whether Paul's direct remarks to Peter were limited to verse 14 or whether, as in the NIV, they continued to the end of the chapter. While it is impossible to determine, it would seem that Paul uttered more than one sentence in reproving Peter. The remaining verses of the chapter develop, then, the inconsistency between Peter's behavior and his beliefs. At the same time they form a superb transition and introduction to chapters 3 and 4 in which Paul defended the key doctrine of justification by faith.

Paul's argument was addressed to those who were Jews by birth, including Peter and himself, who in spite of their superior advantages were saved by faith. Why then bind the Law on Gentile sinners (said in irony because of Peter's actions), who likewise were saved by faith in Christ?

2:16. In this verse, one of the most important in the epistle, the word justified occurs for the first time. It is a legal term, borrowed from the law courts and means "to declare righteous." Its opposite is "to condemn." But since people are condemned sinners and God is holy, how can people be justified? In answer, the apostle made a general declaration that negatively man is not justified by observing the Law, but positively, justification is by faith in Jesus Christ. This is a strong affirmation of Paul, Peter, and the rest—introduced by We . . . know. It is followed by a statement in which Paul explained that he had put this doctrine to the test and validated it in his own experience (v. 16b). Finally, in verse 16c the apostle reaffirmed that justification is by faith and not by works (cf. Gen. 15:6).

2:17-18. Paul's opponents argued, however, that since justification by faith eliminated the Law, it encouraged sinful living. A person could believe in Christ for salvation and then do as he pleased, having no need to do good works. Paul hotly denied the charge, especially noting that this made Christ the promoter of sin. On the contrary, if a believer would return to the Law after trusting Christ alone for salvation, that Law would only demonstrate that he was a sinner, a lawbreaker. Though Paul used the first person here, he clearly had in mind Peter, who by his act of withdrawing from Gentile fellowship was returning to the Law.

2:19-20. Paul then distinguished himself from Peter, contrasting what he did with the Law with what Peter did with the Law. Paul described the transformation in a person who has come to God by faith in Christ in terms of a death and a resurrection. The concept is repeated in both verses and the reference in both cases is to a believer's union with Christ in His death and resurrection. First, Paul stated that through the Law he died to the Law. The Law demanded death for those who broke it, but Christ paid that death penalty for all sinners. Thus the Law killed Him and those joined to Him by faith, freeing them to be joined to another, to live for God (cf. Rom. 7:4).

In Galatians 2:20 Paul enlarged on the meaning of verse 19. He "died to the Law" because he was crucified with Christ; he was able "to live for God" because Christ lived in him. Basic to an understanding of this verse is the meaning of union with Christ. This doctrine is based on such passages as Romans 6:1-6 and 1 Corinthians 12:13, which explain that believers have been baptized by the Holy Spirit into Christ and into the church, the body of all true believers. Having been thus united to Christ, believers share in His death, burial, and resurrection. Paul could therefore write, I have been "crucified with Christ" (lit., "I have been and am now crucified with Christ"). This brought death to the Law. It also brought a change in regard to one's self: and I no longer live. The self-righteous, self-centered Saul died. Further, death with Christ ended Paul's enthronement of self; he yielded the throne of his life to Another, to Christ. But it was not in his own strength that Paul was able to live the Christian life; the living Christ Himself took up His abode in Paul's heart: Christ lives in me. Yet Christ does not operate automatically in a believer's life; it is a matter of living the new life by faith in the Son of God. It is then faith and not works or legal obedience that releases divine power to live a Christian life. This faith, stated Paul, builds on the sacrifice of Christ who loved us and gave Himself for us. In essence Paul affirmed, "If He loved me enough to give Himself for me, then He loves me enough to live out His life in me."

2:21. Summing up his case against Peter, Paul declared, I do not set aside the grace of God. The clear implication is that Peter and the others who followed him were setting aside God's grace. The essence of grace is for God to give people what they have not worked for (cf. Rom. 4:4). To insist on justification or sanctification by works is to nullify the grace of God. Further, such insistence on legal obedience also means Christ died for nothing. If righteousness comes by keeping the Law, the Cross was a futile gesture, the biggest mistake in the universe.

III. Doctrinal: A Defense of Justification by Faith (chaps. 3–4)

In the first two chapters of the epistle Paul established the divine origin of his apostleship and his message. Then he turned to the Galatians who were being urged to add works to faith, to keep the Mosaic Law in addition to placing faith in Christ as the grounds of acceptance before God. The Galatian Christians would receive, the Judaizers thought, a more complete salvation and a greater sanctification if they would obey the Law. But, Paul argued, to supplement the work of Christ is to supplant it. There can only be one way of salvation, and that is by faith in Christ alone.

A. Vindication of the doctrine (chap. 3)

1. BY THE EXPERIENCE OF THE GALATIANS (3:1-5)

3:1. Paul's tone was direct and severe as he remonstrated, You foolish Galatians! To embrace a doctrine which declared the death of Christ unnecessary was irrational (cf. 2:21). It would almost appear they had been bewitched, cast under some evil spell by a malign influence. For this they were, however, without excuse because the Savior had been clearly portrayed (proegraphē; lit., "to write for public reading" as with the posting of a public announcement) as crucified before them. Paul had vividly and graphically proclaimed the crucified Christ to the Galatians; yet their eyes had been diverted from the Cross to the Law. They were without excuse.

In order to demonstrate convincingly that faith alone is God's method of dealing, the apostle asked four questions.

3:2. (1) How did you receive the Holy Spirit? This rhetorical question pointed to the time of their conversions, when they received the Holy Spirit (cf. 4:6). Thus Paul did not question their salvation but challenged them to consider whether they were saved and received the Spirit by faith or on the basis of works. It was of course by faith, when they heard Paul preach the gospel. As an essentially Gentile church they did not possess the Mosaic Law anyway.

3:3. (2) How will you be sanctified? Presupposing the answer that the Galatians became Christians by faith, Paul asked if they were so foolish as to think they could begin the Christian life in one way (by faith) and move on to spiritual maturity in another (by works). This was what the Judaizers promoted (cf. 4:10; 5:2; 6:13), but the means of justification and sanctification were (and are) the same. There was no provision under the Law for the Holy Spirit to do a work of sanctification. The Galatian believers probably thought that keeping the old Law would aid them in their spiritual lives, but it would not.

3:4. (3) Did you suffer in vain? The third question looked back on the persecution the apostles and new believers experienced in the region of Galatia. As Paul and Barnabas retraced their steps at the end of the first missionary journey, they warned the Galatian converts that they would suffer as Christians (Acts 14:21-22). Persecution evidently soon followed, and Paul reminded them that if they turned from grace to Law they would brand their former position in error and would then have suffered so much for nothing. But the apostle was unwilling to believe that this was so.

3:5. (4) On what basis did God perform miracles? That miracles were performed among the Galatians by divine power was recorded in the Book of Acts (14:3, 8-11). It was clear, furthermore, that these supernatural works were not the result of the works of the Law but from the hearing that leads to faith. The Galatians did not know the Law, and Paul's message was that of justification by faith.

2. BY THE EXAMPLE OF ABRAHAM (3:6-9)

3:6. The Judaizers claimed to have the Old Testament on their side, especially looking to Moses as their teacher. But Paul went centuries farther back and said, Consider Abraham. How was he, the father of Jewish people, justified? The answer was simple and direct. Noting Genesis 15:6, Paul declared, He believed God, and it was credited to him as righteousness. Abraham's faith in God's ability to perform what He promised was accepted by God as righteousness and so the patriarch was justified—before he was circumcised (cf. Gen. 17:24). How then could the Judaizers insist that circumcision was essential to being accepted by God?

3:7-8. Striking a tremendous blow at the Judaizers, Paul linked the past with the present and declared that just as Abraham was saved by faith so were those who now claimed to be his children (huioi; lit., "sons"). Abraham and his spiritual descendants, both Jews and Gentiles, have all been declared righteous by faith. Moreover, this conclusion is in harmony with the Scripture which states that all nations will be blessed through Abraham (cf. Gen. 12:3). Thus the justification of uncircumcised Gentiles was anticipated in the universal aspect of the Abrahamic Covenant when God announced the gospel (lit., "the good news") . . . to Abraham. It should not be overlooked that Paul referred to Scripture speaking as though God were speaking, so it can rightly be affirmed that what the Bible says, God says. This and similar verses (e.g., John 10:35b; 2 Tim. 3:16; 2 Peter 1:20-21) provide important support for believing in the absolute and total inspiration and authority of Scripture.

3:9. The apostle concluded this phase of his argument by stating that though provision was made for "all nations" (v. 8), only those who have faith receive the blessing of justification. Thus Paul drew a distinction between God's provision and human appropriation.

3. BY THE EFFECT OF THE LAW (3:10-12)

Having established the fact that justification is by faith from the experiences of the Galatians and of Abraham, Paul then showed the illogic of reliance on the Law.

3:10-11. Contrary to what the Judaizers taught, the Law could not justify; it could only condemn. Paul quoted Deuteronomy 27:26 to show that the Law demanded perfection and that a curse was attached to failure to keep any part of it. The breaking of only one command even once brings a person under the curse; and since everybody fails at some point, all are under the curse. The proposition that a person can gain divine acceptance by human effort is therefore totally destroyed. Quoting the Old Testament again, Paul showed that even during the dispensation of Law legal obedience was not the basis for a justified standing before God . . . because, as the Prophet Habakkuk wrote, The righteous will live by faith (Hab. 2:4).

3:12. But perhaps faith and the Law could be combined; perhaps both are needed. Quoting again from the Old Testament Paul proved this to be scripturally impossible. Law and faith are mutually exclusive. The basic principle of the Law is found in Leviticus 18:5: The man who does these things will live by them. Only perfect performance could win divine approval under the Law, but since that was not achievable the Law could only condemn a person (cf. James 2:10) and cause him to cast himself on God in faith.

4. BY THE WORK OF CHRIST (3:13-14)

3:13. The positive side of Paul's argument emphasized that there is hope for all who have broken the Law and are therefore under its curse. That hope is not in man but in Christ who redeemed us from the curse of the Law. But how did Christ redeem (exēgorasen, lit., "buy out of slavery"; cf. 4:5; see chart "New Testament Words for Redemption" at Mark 10:45) man? The answer is by becoming a curse for us. This is a strong declaration of substitutionary redemption whereby Christ took the penalty of all guilty lawbreakers on Himself. Thus the "curse of the Law" was transferred from sinners to Christ, the sinless One (cf. 1 Peter 3:18), and He delivered people from it. The confirming quotation from Deuteronomy 21:23 refers to the fact that in Old Testament times criminals were executed (normally by stoning) and then displayed on a stake or post to show God's divine rejection. When Christ was crucified, it was evidence He had come under the curse of God. The manner of His death was a great obstacle to faith for Jews until they realized the curse He bore was for them (cf. Isa. 53).

3:14. Two purposes for Christ's redemptive work are given, each introduced by the Greek conjunction hina, "in order that" (cf. 4:5): (1) Gentiles might receive the blessing given to Abraham; as already stated (3:8) this is a reference not to personal or national blessings but to the promised blessing of justification apart from works of the Law, available to all who believe; (2) all who thus believe might receive the promise of the Spirit, that is, the Holy Spirit, who was promised (cf. v. 2). Again the apostle emphasized that salvation and sanctification come by faith, not by works.

5. BY THE PERMANENCE OF FAITH (3:15-18)

3:15-16. Even if Paul's opponents admitted that Abraham was justified by faith, those Judaizers might have argued that the Law, coming at a later time, entirely changed the basis for achieving salvation. To refute this, Paul declared that just as a properly executed Roman covenant (or will) cannot arbitrarily be set aside or changed (probably reference to ancient Gr. law), so the promises of God are immutable. Further, the promises . . . spoken to Abraham and to his seed were not fulfilled before the giving of the Law. Rather, they found fulfillment in Christ and are in effect forever. The blessing of justification by faith is therefore permanent and could not be changed by the Law. The stress on seed (cf. Gen. 12:7; 13:15; 24:7), not seeds, was made simply to remind the readers that the faithful in Israel had always recognized that blessing would ultimately come through a single individual, the Messiah (cf. Gal. 3:19). And Matthew declared Christ to be the Son of Abraham and the true Heir to the First Covenant's promises (Matt. 1:1).

3:17-18. Finally, Paul applied the principle of the permanence of faith by affirming that a covenant made so long before could not possibly be altered by a later giving of the Law. The Law was given 430 years after the promise. When did that lengthy period of time begin? Some have suggested it began with Abraham, in which case the 430 years included the Israelites' time of about 200 years in Canaan and about 200 years in Egypt. The Septuagint supports this view, but this conflicts with the clear statement in Exodus 12:40 that the Egyptian sojourn was 430 years. Another suggestion is that the period began with the confirming of the Abrahamic Covenant with Jacob (Gen. 35:9-12).

A third and perhaps best view is that the period began with the final confirmation of the covenant to Jacob (given in Gen. 46:1-4). Accordingly the 430 years went from the end of one era (the Age of Promise) to the beginning of another (the Age of Law). This seems to fit best with Exodus 12:40. (Gen. 15:13 and Acts 7:6, in referring to the sojourn in Egypt as 400 years, may be using rounded figures.)

During that long interval God blessed the patriarchs on the basis of faith alone, and the coming of the Law could not change this in any way. Additionally the Law could not alter God's dealing with Abraham on the basis of a promise because the two are fundamentally different in nature. They do not comingle; they cannot be combined. Instead, the inheritance (i.e., justification by faith) was given by God as an unconditional gift to those who believe. Contrary to the claim of the Judaizers, obedience to the Law was not necessary to gain the inheritance. God's way of salvation has always been by grace through faith.

6. BY THE PURPOSE OF THE LAW (3:19-25)

3:19. An indignant Judaizer was sure to respond with objections to Paul's insistence that the Law could not give the Holy Spirit (vv. 1-5); could not bring justification (vv. 6-9); could not alter the permanence of faith (vv. 15-18); but does bring a curse (vv. 10-12). What, then, was the purpose of the Law? Why was a change made at Sinai? Paul answered by declaring the purpose and character of the Law. First, it was given because of transgressions, that is, the Law was given to be a means for checking sins. It served as a restrainer of sins by showing them to be transgressions of God's Law which would incur His wrath (cf. 1 Tim. 1:8-11). Second, the Law was temporary and served until the Seed (the Messiah; cf. Gal. 3:16) came, after which it was no longer needed. Third, the Law was inferior because of the manner of its bestowal. While God made promises to Abraham directly, the Law was established by a mediator. There were in fact two mediators, the angels representing God, and Moses representing the people.

3:20. This verse appears to be closely related to the last part of verse 19. A mediator implies a covenant between two parties both of whom have responsibilities, facts true of the Mosaic Covenant. On the other hand God is One, that is, the "promise" (v. 19) was unilateral and was given to man directly without a mediator, God alone having responsibility for fulfilling it.

3:21-22. Another question was raised: Is there conflict between the Law and the promises of God? "Perish the thought" (mē genoito), declared the apostle. God gave both the Law and promises, but for different purposes. And it was not the purpose of the Law to give life. Theoretically salvation could have come by the Law if people had been capable of keeping it perfectly, but they could not (Rom. 8:3-4). The life promised to those who sought to obey the Law refers to temporal blessing on earth (Deut. 8:1).

But if the Law is not opposed to the promises, if there is no conflict between them, how can their harmony be demonstrated? By recognizing that while the Law could not justify or give life, it did prepare the way for the gospel. What part then did Law play in this respect? It declared the whole world . . . a prisoner of sin. Referring perhaps to Psalm 143:1-2 or Deuteronomy 27:26, Paul declared that the whole world is trapped and under the dominion of sin (cf. Rom. 3:9, 23). When people recognize this and give up attempts to please God by their own works, the way is prepared for them to receive the promise of salvation through faith in Jesus Christ.

3:23-25. Continuing to comment on the purpose of the Law, Paul used two figures of speech, likening the Law to a prison and to a child-custodian relationship. Before this faith came means before the advent of faith in Jesus Christ (see v. 22). Justifying faith was operative in the Old Testament but faith in the person and work of Christ did not come until He was revealed. Before that, Israel was under the protective custody of the Law,

God thus shielding His people from the evil heathen rites surrounding them. Further, the Law served as a "tutor" (NASB). The word paidagōgos is difficult to render into English since there is no exact parallel to this position in modern society. Phillips suggests "a strict governess." The pedagogue here was not a "schoolmaster" (KJV) but a slave to whom a son was committed from age six or seven to puberty. These slaves were severe disciplinarians and were charged with guarding the children from the evils of society and giving them moral training. This was like the Law's function until Christ came and people could be justified by faith in Him. It is better then to understand that the Law did not lead us to Christ but that it was the disciplinarian until Christ came. Thus the reign of Law has ended for faith in Christ has delivered believers from the protective custody of the prison and the harsh discipline of the pedagogue.

7. BY THE BELIEVER'S PRESENT POSITION (3:26-29)

Paul's vindication of the doctrine of justification by faith reached a climax in this section as he contrasted the position of a justified sinner with what he had been under the Law. Three changes are noted.

3:26-27. First, all who believe in Christ become sons of God. The change in person from the first to the second (you) indicates that Paul turned from looking at Israel as a nation to address the Galatian believers. Under the dispensation of Law, as seen in verse 24, the Law was a discipling pedagogue, and those under its supervision were regarded as children. However, now that Christ had come, the Galatian believers were adult sons through faith and were no longer under a Jewish slave-guardian. Why should they seek to revert to their inferior status? The exalted position of "sons of God" is explained in verse 27 to involve a living union with Christ brought about by being baptized into Christ. This is the baptism of (or in) the Holy Spirit, which according to Paul (1 Cor. 12:12-13) joins all believers to Christ and unites them within the church, Christ's body. This union with Him means being clothed with Christ. In the Roman society when a youth came of age he was given a special toga which admitted him to the full rights of the family and state and indicated he was a grown-up son. So the Galatian believers had laid aside the old garments of the Law and had put on Christ's robe of righteousness which grants full acceptance before God. Who would want to don again the old clothing?

3:28. Second, believers are all one in Christ Jesus. Since all believers became one with each other, human distinctions lose their significance. None is spiritually superior over another, that is, a believing Jew is not more privileged before God than a believing Gentile (Greek, in contrast to Jew, suggests all Gentiles; cf. Col. 3:11); a believing slave does not rank higher than a believing free person; a believing man is not superior to a believing woman. Some Jewish men prayed, "I thank God that Thou hast not made me a Gentile, a slave, or a woman." Paul cut across these distinctions and stated that they do not exist in the body of Christ so far as spiritual privilege and position are concerned. Elsewhere, while affirming the coequality of man and woman in Christ, Paul did nonetheless make it clear that there is a headship of the man over the woman (cf. 1 Cor. 11:3) and that there are distinctions in the area of spiritual service (cf. 1 Tim. 2:12).

3:29. Third, believers in Christ are Abraham's seed. As Paul previously stated, Christ is the Seed of Abraham (vv. 16, 19); therefore being in Christ makes a believer a part of that seed and an heir of the promise to Abraham. Any discussion of the seed of Abraham must first take into account his natural seed, the descendants of Jacob in the 12 tribes. Within this natural seed there is a believing remnant of Jews who will one day inherit the Abrahamic promises directed specifically to them (cf. Rom. 9:6, 8). But there is also the spiritual seed of Abraham who are not Jews. These are the Gentiles who believe and become Abraham's spiritual seed. They inherit the promise of justification by faith as Paul explained earlier (cf. Gal. 3:6-9). To suggest, as amillenarians do, that Gentile believers inherit the national promises given to the believing Jewish remnant—that the church thus supplants Israel or is the "new Israel"—is to read into these verses what is not there.

B. Illustration of the doctrine (chap. 4)

1. A LEGAL ILLUSTRATION (4:1-7)

4:1-2. To illustrate the spiritual immaturity of those who lived under the Mosaic Law, Paul reminded the Galatian believers of certain characteristics of an heir as a minor child (nēpios, "infant, young child"; in contrast with huios, "son," in 3:7, 26). Though by birthright he owned the whole estate, nevertheless he was kept in subservience like a slave in that he enjoyed no freedom and could make no decisions. In fact the heir as a child was under guardians (epitropous, different from the paidagōgos in 3:24-25) who watched over his person, and trustees who protected his estate. This was true until he came of age as a son, an age that varied in the Jewish, Grecian, and Roman societies. Under Roman law the age of maturity for a child was set by his father and involved a ceremonial donning of the toga virilis and his formal acknowledgement as son and heir.

4:3. Paul applied the illustration in order to show the contrast between the believers' former position and what they now enjoyed. Formerly, in their state of spiritual immaturity (when we were children, nēpioi), they were like slaves. The scope of that slavery was described as being under the basic principles (stoicheia, "elements") of the world. Though often interpreted as a reference to the Mosaic Law, this view does not fit the Galatians, most of whom were Gentile pagans before conversion and were never under the Law. It seems better to understand the "basic principles" to refer to the elementary stages of religious experience, whether of Jews under the Law or Gentiles in bondage to heathen religions (cf. "weak and miserable principles" in v. 9, and "basic principles of this world" in Col. 2:20) Thus all were enslaved until Christ emancipated them.

4:4. But . . . God marks the fact that divine intervention brought hope and freedom to mankind. As a human father chose the time for his child to become an adult son, so the heavenly Father chose the time for the coming of Christ to make provision for people's transition from bondage under Law to spiritual sonship. This "time" was when the Roman civilization had brought peace and a road system which facilitated travel; when the Grecian civilization provided a language which was adopted as the lingua franca of the empire; when the Jews had proclaimed monotheism and the messianic hope in the synagogues of the Mediterranean world. It was then that God sent His Son, the preexistent One, out of heaven and to earth on a mission. The "Son" was not only Deity; He was also humanity as the expression born of a woman indicates. The exclusive reference to His mother harmonizes with the doctrine of the virgin birth as taught in the Gospels (cf. Matt. 1:18). Further, Christ was born under Law as a Jew. He kept the Law perfectly, fulfilled it (cf. Matt. 5:17), and finally paid its curse (cf. Gal. 3:13).

4:5. The reasons "God sent His Son" are twofold (again both reasons are introduced by hina, "in order that"; cf. 3:14). First, He came to redeem (exagorasē) those under Law. This is not a redemption from the curse of the Law (as in 3:13), but from a slavery to the entire Mosaic system. The emphasis is not on the penalty of the Law as in 3:13, but on its bondage. Since Christ redeemed and set free those who were under the Law, why should Gentile converts now wish to be placed under it? Second, Christ's Incarnation and death secured for believers the full rights of sons ("the adoption of sons," KJV). All the enjoyments and privileges of a mature son in a family belong to those who have entered into the benefits of Christ's redemptive work.

4:6. God the Father not only "sent His Son"; He also sent the Spirit. Thus the full Trinity is involved in the work of salvation. The Holy Spirit is a gift of God to every believer because of sonship. No sons or daughters lack the Spirit. Further, He is present within each believer's heart to give evidence of that one's position in God's family. The Spirit moves the believer to pray to God, addressing Him as Abba, Father (cf. Rom. 8:15). The word "Abba" is the Aramaic word for "Father." It is the diminutive form used by small children in addressing their fathers. It is appropriate to see its similarity to the English word "Daddy." Used by Christ (cf. Mark 14:36), this familiar form indicates intimacy and trust as opposed to the formalism of legalism.

4:7. To conclude, Paul declared that the Galatians were no longer slaves, but were sons and heirs. The plural forms in verse 6 were replaced by the singular forms in verse 7 thus making the application to the reader direct and personal. In God's family, sonship carries with it heirship (cf. Rom. 8:17).

2. A PERSONAL PLEA (4:8-20)

The apostle turned from a formal argument to a personal appeal for the Galatians not to return to a slavery similar to their former bondage in paganism.

a. An appeal not to turn to legalism (4:8-11)

4:8-9. Prior to conversion the Galatians, in their ignorance of the one true God, were in bondage to false gods such as Zeus and Hermes (cf. Acts 14:11-13). But a great change took place and they came to know God (salvation from the perspective of man), or to be known by God (salvation from God's perspective). Yet having come to know (gnontes, from ginōskō, lit., "to know intimately and on a personal level") the true God, the Galatians were turning back. Paul was amazed and dismayed. Did they understand that they would be going back to a state of religious slavery? Was this their desire? If so, why would they be attracted to a system that was weak (it could not justify or energize for godly living) and miserable (it could not provide an inheritance). The principles (stoicheia) of that system are "of the world," as Paul had already said in verse 3.

4:10. Under the influence of the Judaizers the Galatians had at least begun to observe the Mosaic calendar. They kept special days (weekly sabbaths), and months (new moons), and seasons (seasonal festivals such as Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles), and years (sabbatical and jubilee years). (Cf. Col. 2:16.) They observed these special times, thinking that they would thereby gain additional merit before God. But Paul had already made it clear that works could not be added to faith as grounds for either justification or sanctification.

4:11. Reflecting concern for the Galatians, Paul expressed the fear that his efforts (kekopiaka, lit., "I have labored to the point of exhaustion") would be wasted (eikē, "in vain"; cf. the same word rendered "for nothing" in 3:4, "Have you suffered so much for nothing?") if their attachment to legalistic practices continued. The apostle's words disclosed his strong antipathy toward legalistic religion.

b. An appeal to remember their relationship (4:12-16)

4:12. Intensifying his appeal, Paul challenged the Galatians, Become like me, for I became like you, that is, "Become free from the Law as I am, for after my conversion I became like the Gentiles, no longer living under the Law." The irony, however, was that the Galatian Gentiles were putting themselves under the Law after their conversions.

4:13-14. The last clause of verse 12 belongs with these and the following verses in which Paul related how he was received by the Galatians on his first visit to them (cf. Acts 13–14). At that time he labored under the handicap of an illness but remained until he had preached the gospel to them. Whatever his infirmity, the Galatians did not treat Paul with contempt or scorn as a weak messenger but rather received him as one would receive an angel or even Christ Jesus Himself.

4:15-16. They had received Paul with joy, congratulating themselves that the apostle had preached in their midst. Their appreciation knew no limits; they would even have made the sacrifice of their eyes for Paul. While some think this is an indication that Paul had a disease of the eyes (his "thorn" in his "flesh," 2 Cor. 12:7), the evidence is not conclusive. This may simply be a bold figure of speech to convey the high esteem the Galatians had had for the apostle—they would have given him their most precious possession.

But that had all changed. They no longer contemplated his presence among them with "joy." Rather, they now acted as though he had become their enemy, for the simple reason that he had been telling them the truth. How fickle were these Galatians! They were turning against the Lord, the gospel of grace, and the messenger who brought them the news of justification by faith.

c. An appeal to consider Paul's attitude toward them (4:17-20)

4:17-18. While Paul's attitude toward the Galatians was guileless, the legalists had improper motives. The apostle spoke the truth (cf. v. 16); the Judaizers used flattery. They wanted to alienate (ekkleisai, lit., "to lock out") the Galatians from Paul and his teaching so that they would be shut up instead to the false teachers and their influence. In an interesting double use of the verb "be zealous" Paul said that the Judaizers were zealous to win . . . over the Galatians so that the latter would be zealous for the Judaizers! Acknowledging that it was good for anyone to be sought after, Paul nonetheless insisted that the intention must be honorable, but in the case of the Judaizers it was not.

4:19-20. The apostle, on the other hand, had always had good motives regarding the Galatians. Addressing them tenderly as my dear children (tekna mou, an expression found only here in Paul's epistles), Paul compared himself to a mother in the throes of birth pangs. He had experienced this once for their salvation; he was in travail again for their deliverance from false teachers.

But a sudden change in metaphors occurred with the expression until Christ is formed in you. Paul longed for these believers to be transformed into (morphōthē, lit., "take on the form of"; cf. morphē in Phil. 2:6-7) the image of Christ. This expression describes the Christian life as a kind of reincarnation of Christ in a believer's life. This is in fact God's ideal and purpose—for Christ to live His life in and then through each believer (cf. Gal. 2:20). Yet the apostle was perplexed about the Galatians because he felt their spiritual development was being arrested. He had a deep desire to be with them so that he could speak gently, though firmly, concerning his grave concerns.

3. A BIBLICAL ILLUSTRATION (4:21-31)

In a masterful stroke the apostle turned to a scriptural illustration to conclude his theological defense of justification by faith. An Old Testament story from the life of Abraham enabled Paul to review what he had already declared about contrasts between the Mosaic Law and grace, between works and faith. It also provided an opportunity for him to verbalize the pointed charge to the Galatians that they should cast out the legalizers (cf. v. 30).

a. The historical facts (4:21-23)

4:21. The Galatians had not yet submitted to the bondage of the Law but they desired to. Paul desperately wanted to stop them and turn them back to a life under grace. As a transition to what would immediately follow, he challenged the Galatians to be aware of or to understand what the Law really said.

4:22. By turning again to Abraham (Gen., as one of the Books of Moses, was considered a part of the Law) Paul was appealing to the founder of the Jewish nation from whose physical descent the Jews traced their blessings. John the Baptist and Jesus declared that physical descent from Abraham was not enough, however, to guarantee spiritual blessing (cf. Matt. 3:9; John 8:37-44). Paul reminded his readers that Abraham had two sons (those born later are not important to his illustration), and that they should consider which of the two they were most like. One son, Isaac, was born of Sarah, the free woman; the other, Ishmael, was born of Hagar, the slave woman. According to ancient law and custom the status of a mother affected the status of her son.

4:23. A second contrast concerned the manner in which the sons were conceived. Ishmael was born in the ordinary way, that is, in the course of nature and requiring no miracle and no promise of God. Isaac, on the other hand, was born as the result of a promise. Abraham and Sarah were beyond the age of childbearing, but God miraculously fulfilled His promise in bringing life out of the deadness of Sarah's womb (cf. Rom. 4:18-21).

b. The allegorical interpretation (4:24-27)

In order to emphasize the contrast between Law and grace Paul next used the historical events above as an allegory, that is, he treated those two mothers figuratively (allēgoroumena). He did not in any sense deny the literal meaning of the story of Abraham, but he declared that that story, especially the matters relating to the conception of the two sons, had an additional meaning. Thus he compared the narrative to the conflict between Judaism and Christianity.

tion"—followed by Origen, Augustine, and many others down through the ages and into the present day—in which the historical facts are relegated to a lower, less significant level and fanciful, hidden meanings unrelated to the text, are considered vastly more important.)

4:24. First, the apostle pointed to two covenants. One, the Mosaic, had its origin at Mount Sinai. Those under this legal covenant were slaves. As Hagar brought forth a slave, so does the Law. At this point the reader is expected to understand and supply the implicit reference to the Abrahamic Covenant, a gracious system represented by Sarah which through its messianic promise brought forth children who are free.

4:25-26. Next, Paul pointed to two Jerusalems. Hagar also stood for the first-century city of Jerusalem, a city enslaved to Rome and in slavery to the Law. Sarah, on the other hand, corresponded to the Jerusalem . . . above, the mother of all the children of grace. This heavenly city, which one day will come to earth (cf. Rev. 21:2), is now the "city of the living God" (cf. Heb. 12:22), the home of departed believers of all ages.

4:27. The quotation from Isaiah 54:1 prophesied the changing fortunes of Israel, which Paul applied to Sarah's history. Israel before her Babylonian Captivity was likened to a woman with a husband. The barren woman was Israel in Captivity. The woman bearing more . . . children may have pictured Israel restored to the land after the Exile, but more particularly it portrays her millennial blessings. Paul applied this passage (he did not claim it was fulfilled) in this context to Sarah, who though previously barren, was later blessed with a child, and who would ultimately enjoy a greater progeny than Hagar.

c. The personal application (4:28-31)

In applying the truth from the biblical illustration, Paul made three comparisons.

4:28. First, Paul compared the birth of Isaac to that of Christians. As "Isaac" experienced a supernatural birth and was a child by means of a promise, so each believer experiences a supernatural birth (John 3:3, 5) and is a recipient of the promise of salvation (Gal. 3:9, 22, 29). As children of promise Christians are in a distinct category and should not live as children of bondage.

4:29. Second, the apostle compared Ishmael's persecution of Isaac to the false teachers' opposition to believers. Abraham celebrated the weaning of Isaac with a banquet. On that occasion Ishmael mocked Isaac, laughing derisively at the younger boy, since Ishmael was the elder son and assumed he would be heir to his father's estate (cf. Gen. 21:8-9). That early animosity has been perpetuated in the two peoples which descended from the two sons of Abraham and is seen in the current Arab-Israel tensions. Paul likened the Judaizers to Ishmael as those who were born out of legalistic self-effort; he charged that they continued to persecute the true believers who were born by the power of the Spirit. With few exceptions Paul's persecution came from the Jews, the people in bondage to the Law.

4:30. Third, Paul compared the action of Abraham to the obligation of the Galatians. When Sarah observed Ishmael mocking Isaac, she asked Abraham to expel the slave woman and her son lest Ishmael become a joint heir with Isaac. And God granted Sarah's request (cf. Gen. 21:10, 12). This reminded the readers that Law observance brought no inheritance in the family of God, and it also charged them to excommunicate the Judaizers and those who accepted their false doctrines. A fundamental incompatibility remains between Law and grace, between a religion based on works and a religion based on faith.

4:31. In conclusion, Paul affirmed that he and the Galatian believers were not children of the slave woman who was driven away and was denied a share in the inheritance. Rather all believers are children of the free woman, "heirs of God and co-heirs with Christ" (Rom. 8:17).

IV. Practical: A Defense of Christian Liberty (5:1–6:10)

Having defended both his authority as an apostle and the doctrine of justification by faith, Paul turned to defend the life of Christian freedom. Would the apostle's teaching lead the Galatians into lawlessness or into godliness? The Christian life is described as a life apart from Law, a life apart from license, a life according to the Spirit, and a life of service.

A. A life apart from Law (5:1-12)

5:1. This verse summarizes chapter 4, where the theme is bondage and freedom. It also serves to introduce chapter 5. Paul declared that Christ was the great Liberator who set believers free from bondage. The apostle then appealed to the Galatians to stand firm (cf. 1 Cor. 16:13; Phil. 1:27; 4:1; 1 Thes. 3:8; 2 Thes. 2:15) in that liberty, for having been delivered from slavery to heathenism, they were in danger of becoming entangled in slavery to the Mosaic Law.

5:2. Taking up a prime example of such entanglement, namely circumcision, Paul issued a strong warning to the Galatians who were considering submitting to that rite. If they did, and were thereby seeking righteousness by works, Paul declared that Christ will be of no value to you at all. It is not that the apostle condemned circumcision in itself, for he had Timothy circumcised (in Galatia) so that the young man would have a wider ministry (Acts 16:1-3). But Paul was strongly opposed to the Judaistic theology which insisted that circumcision was necessary for salvation. Anyone who was circumcised for that reason added works to faith and demonstrated that he had not exercised saving faith in Christ.

2. TURNING TO LAW MAKES MAN A DEBTOR (5:3)

5:3. In addition to the fact that turning to the Law ruins grace, it also creates an entirely new obligation: a person is obligated to obey the whole Law. The Law is a unit, and if a person puts himself under any part of it for justification, he is a "debtor" (KJV) to the entire code with its requirements and its curse (cf. 3:10; James 2:10).

3. TURNING TO LAW IS TO FALL AWAY FROM GRACE (5:4-6)

5:4. Turning to the Law and accepting circumcision as a meritorious work has further dire implications which the Galatians were called on to consider. Anyone seeking justification by Law has been alienated (katērgēthēte) from Christ, that is, such a person would not be living in a sphere where Christ was operative. The KJV has a helpful rendering, "Christ is become of no effect unto you." In addition, said Paul, they would have fallen away from grace. The issue here is not the possible loss of salvation, for "grace" is referred to not as salvation itself but as a method of salvation (cf. 2:21 where "a Law" route is mentioned as an unworkable way to come to Christ). If the Galatians accepted circumcision as necessary for salvation, they would be leaving the grace system for the Mosaic Law system. The same error is repeated today when a believer leaves a church that emphasizes salvation by grace through faith and joins one which teaches that salvation depends on repentance, confession, faith, baptism, and church membership.

5:5. In contrast with legalists, true believers by faith (not works) eagerly await (apekdechometha; used seven times in the NT of the return of Christ: Rom. 8:19, 23, 25; 1 Cor. 1:7; Gal. 5:5; Phil. 3:20; Heb. 9:28) the consummation of their salvation (cf. Rom. 8:18-25). Then the righteousness for which we hope will be fully realized (cf. 1 Peter 1:3-4, 13). At the coming of Christ believers will be completely conformed to all the requirements of God's will. The inward and forensic righteousness which began at justification will be transformed into an outward righteousness at glorification. God will then publicly acknowledge all believers' full acceptability with Him.

5:6. For those in Christ Jesus, the true sphere of salvation, neither circumcision nor the lack of it is of any significance (cf. 3:28; 6:15). What matters is faith expressing itself through love (cf. 5:13). Though salvation is by faith apart from works, faith that is genuine does work itself out "through love" (cf. Eph. 2:10; James 2:14-18).

4. TURNING TO LAW HINDERS THE PROGRESS OF BELIEVERS (5:7-10)

5:7. Employing a metaphor he was fond of, Paul described the Galatians' Christian experience as a race (cf. 1 Cor. 9:24-26; 2 Tim. 4:7). They had begun their race well, but someone had cut in on them, causing them to break stride and stumble. Though many false teachers were disturbing the Galatians, the singular pronoun (who) indicates the leader of the Judaizers was in view here. The result was that the believers were no longer obeying the truth, but were attempting to complete the race by legalistic self-effort rather than by faith.

5:8-10. Such false teaching as the Galatians were beginning to embrace did not originate in the God who called them (cf. 1:6). He called them by and into grace. They were now being seduced by other voices into following a false gospel. And lest someone would feel that the apostle was making too much of the problem, he quoted a proverb (5:9) to the effect that false teaching, like yeast, spreads and permeates. Its converts may have been few but the believers must be on guard lest the error affect the entire church. Paul's point may also have been that one apparently small deviation from the truth could destroy the entire system. If circumcision, for example, were made necessary for salvation, the whole grace system would fall. But Paul was optimistic about the outcome. He was confident the Galatians would share his views and that the leading false teacher, whose identity was unknown to Paul, would suffer his due judgment.

5. TURNING TO LAW REMOVES THE OFFENSE OF THE CROSS (5:11-12)

5:11. Apparently Paul was charged with still preaching circumcision. Certainly before his conversion he zealously proclaimed circumcision and the Law, and it is easy to see how the apostle's attitude could be interpreted as being in favor of circumcision. Paul countered with a simple question: How is it that he was still being persecuted by Judaizers if he preached the same message they did? If Paul were preaching circumcision, the offense (skandalon, "stumbling block"; cf. 1 Cor. 1:23) of the Cross would have ceased to exist in his ministry. But it had not because people still found the gospel message, which proclaims man's total inability to contribute anything to his salvation, offensive. Thus the Cross marked the end of the Law system and rendered circumcision and obedience to the Mosaic Law unnecessary.

5:12. Speaking out of deep concern for the gospel of the grace of God, Paul uttered a strong expression. He wished that the Judaizers, who were so enthusiastic about circumcision, would go the whole way and castrate themselves, as did the pagan priests of the cult of Cybele in Asia Minor. Perhaps the resulting physical impotence pictured Paul's desire that they also be unable to produce new converts. While circumcision had once been the sign of the covenant in Israel, it now had no more religious meaning than any other ritual of cutting and marking practiced by ancient pagans.

B. A life apart from license (5:13-15)

5:13-14. In verse 1 Paul spoke of the Christian's freedom and warned against the danger of lapsing into slavery. Here the apostle again reminded believers of their freedom in Christ and warned against its being converted into license. Specifically he charged the Galatians not to use their liberty as "a base of operation" for sin to gain a foothold. Rather than liberty being used for lust, the real goal should be love. Rather than being in bondage to the Law or to the sinful nature, the Galatians were to be in bondage to one another. ("Sinful nature" is an appropriate trans. of the Gr. sarx, used by Paul in that sense seven times in Gal. 5:13, 16-17 [thrice], 19, 24; 6:8.)

Having discouraged two forms of slavery as burdensome and terrible, he commended another form that was beneficial—a slavery of mutual love. In support, Paul quoted Leviticus 19:18 and stated that the entire Law was summarized in this single command to love their neighbors. Jesus affirmed the same truth (Matt. 22:39; Luke 10:25-28). But Paul also wanted to show that Christian love is the "fulfillment" or "the carrying out" of the Law. The apostle developed this point in Romans 13:8-10.

5:15. That such love needed to be mutually expressed in the Galatian churches is made clear here. As a result of the inroads of the false teachers the church was divided and engaged in bitter strife. The followers of the legalists and those who remained steadfast were biting and devouring each other. This was far from the biblical ideal of believers dwelling together in a loving unity, and threatened the churches with destruction, that is, the loss of their individual and corporate testimonies.

C. A life according to the Spirit (5:16-26)

1. THE PROMISE OF VICTORY OVER SIN (5:16-18)

5:16. The answer to the abuses described in the previous verse is to live by the Spirit. The verb peripateite is a present imperative and is literally translated, "keep on walking." As a believer walks through life he should depend on the indwelling Holy Spirit for guidance and power. But the Spirit does not operate automatically in a believer's heart. He waits to be depended on. When a Christian does yield to the Spirit's control, the promise is that he will not in anywise (the double negative ou mē is emphatic) gratify (telesēte, "complete, fulfill" in outward action) the desires of the sinful nature. Thus, while no believer will ever be entirely free in this life from the evil desires that stem from his fallen human nature, he need not capitulate to them, but may experience victory by the Spirit's help.

5:17. Paul next explained the need for a life that is controlled and energized by the Spirit. The explanation is found in the fact that each Christian has two natures, a sinful nature received at birth, inherited from fallen Adam, and a new nature received at regeneration when said Christian became a participant in the divine nature (cf. 2 Peter 1:4). Both natures have desires, the one for evil and the other for holiness. Thus they are in conflict with each other, and the result can be that they keep a believer from doing what he otherwise would. In other words the Holy Spirit blocks, when He is allowed to do so, the evil cravings of the flesh. (Some hold the view that each believer is a new person, still possessing the fallen human nature, but not having a new nature. Others prefer to define "nature" as capacity, the old nature being that capacity to serve sin and self and the new nature the capacity to serve God and righteousness.)

5:18. In summary, Paul emphasized that a godly life is not lived under the rules of the Law but is a life led by the Spirit. It was important for the Galatians to know that just as justification is not possible by works so sanctification cannot be achieved by human effort. This of course does not mean that a Christian is totally passive in either case for the response of faith is necessary—faith in Christ to save and in the Holy Spirit to sanctify.

2. THE PERIL TO VICTORY OVER SIN (5:19-21)

Since a Christian has the same sinful nature he possessed before salvation, he may fall prey to the sins that nature produces if he does not live by means of the Spirit.

5:19. The apostle declared that the sins of the flesh are obvious, meaning either, as some suggest, that they are public and cannot be hidden, or better, since some are private sins, that they originate with the sinful nature and not with the new nature indwelt by the Holy Spirit. The listed sins are commonly seen to fall into four categories. First, three sexual sins are mentioned. Sexual immorality (porneia) is often translated "fornication." From this word comes the term "pornography." Porneia refers to any and all forms of illicit sexual relationships. Impurity (akatharsia) is a broad term referring to moral uncleanness in thought, word, and deed (cf. Eph. 5:3-4). Debauchery (aselgeia) connotes an open, shameless, brazen display of these evils (cf. 2 Cor. 12:21 where the same words occur; aselgeia is included in Rom. 13:13).

5:20. Following the sexual sins, Paul cited two religious sins. Idolatry involved the worship of pagan gods by bowing to idols, and because of its mention just after the listing of sexual sins it probably includes the male and female prostitution so often a part of heathen religion. Witchcraft is the translation of the Greek word pharmakeia from which the term "pharmacy" comes. In ancient times the worship of evil powers was accompanied by the use of drugs to create trances. This vice will also be prominent in the Tribulation period (cf. Rev. 9:21; 18:23).

Eight societal evils are then listed (the last one in Gal. 5:21). Hatred (echthrai) is in the plural form, denoting primarily a feeling of enmity between groups. Discord (eris) is the natural result of "hatred" and no doubt a problem in the Galatian church. Jealousy (zēlos) refers not to the godly form but to the sinful and self-centered type. (These two words, eris and zelos, are also listed in Rom. 13:13.) Fits of rage (thymoi) or outbursts of temper, often come as a final eruption of smoldering jealousy. Selfish ambition (eritheiai) is a self-aggrandizing attitude which shows itself in working to get ahead at other's expense (cf. Phil. 2:3). Dissensions (dichostasiai) and factions (haireseis) describe what happens when people quarrel over issues or personalities, causing hurtful divisions.

5:21. Envy (phthonoi) is an evil feeling, a wrongful desire to possess what belongs to someone else. Thus the sinful nature is seen to be responsible for the breakdown of interpersonal relationships in homes, churches, and in public society.

Two sins associated with alcohol fall in a fourth category of evils. Drunkenness (methai) refers to excessive use of strong drink by individuals, and orgies (kōmoi) probably refers to the drunken carousings commonly associated with such things as the worship of Bacchus, the god of wine. Finally, to show that this long list was only representative and not exhaustive, Paul added the words and the like.

The apostle then solemnly warned the Galatians, as he had done when he was in their midst, that those who live like this, who habitually indulge in these fleshly sins will not inherit the future kingdom of God. This does not say that a Christian loses his salvation if he lapses into a sin of the flesh, but that a person who lives continually on such a level of moral corruption gives evidence of not being a child of God.

5:22-23. There is a pointed contrast here. As verse 16 indicated, there is no need for a believer to display the works of the flesh. Rather, by the Spirit's power he can manifest the nine graces that are now listed. It is important to observe that the fruit here described is not produced by a believer, but by the Holy Spirit working through a Christian who is in vital union with Christ (cf. John 15:1-8). The word "fruit" is singular, indicating that these qualities constitute a unity, all of which should be found in a believer who lives under the control of the Spirit. In an ultimate sense this "fruit" is simply the life of Christ lived out in a Christian. It also points to the method whereby Christ is formed in a believer (cf. 2 Cor. 3:18; Phil. 1:21).

The first three virtues are habits of mind which find their source in God. Love (agapē) is listed first because it is the foundation of the other graces. God is love and loves the world (cf. 1 John 4:8; John 3:16). Such self-sacrificing love that sent Christ to die for sinners is the kind of love that believers who are Spirit-controlled manifest. Joy (chara) is a deep and abiding inner rejoicing which was promised to those who abide in Christ (cf. John 15:11). It does not depend on circumstances because it rests in God's sovereign control of all things (cf. Rom. 8:28). Peace (eirēnē) is again a gift of Christ (cf. John 14:27). It is an inner repose and quietness, even in the face of adverse circumstances; it defies human understanding (cf. Phil. 4:7).

The second triad reaches out to others, fortified by love, joy, and peace. Patience (makrothymia) is the quality of forbearance under provocation (cf. 2 Cor. 6:6; Col. 1:11; 3:12). It entertains no thoughts of retaliation even when wrongfully treated. Kindness (chrēstotēs) is benevolence in action such as God demonstrated toward men. Since God is kind toward sinners (cf. Rom. 2:4; Eph. 2:7) a Christian should display the same virtue (cf. 2 Cor. 6:6; Col. 3:12). Goodness (agathōsynē) may be thought of both as an uprightness of soul and as an action reaching out to others to do good even when it is not deserved.

The final three graces guide the general conduct of a believer who is led by the Spirit. Faithfulness (pistis) is the quality which renders a person trustworthy or reliable, like the faithful servant in Luke 16:10-12. Gentleness (prautēs) marks a person who is submissive to God's Word (cf. James 1:21) and who is considerate of others when discipline is needed (cf. "gently" in Gal. 6:1; 2 Tim. 2:25; "gentle" in 1 Cor. 4:21; Eph. 4:2; "gentleness" in Col. 3:12; 1 Peter 3:16). Self-control (enkrateia; this noun is used in the NT only here and in Acts 24:25; 2 Peter 1:6) denotes self-mastery and no doubt primarily relates to curbing the fleshly impulses just described. Such a quality is impossible to attain apart from the power of God's Spirit (cf. Gal. 5:16). As a final summary statement Paul affirmed that there are no prohibitions (lit., there is not a law) against such virtues. In a litotes (understatement) he asserted that obviously no one would make laws against people who practice such things.

5:24. Paul next explained that believers (lit., "those who are of Christ Jesus") need not be responsive to the sinful nature because they have crucified it. This does not refer to self-crucifixion or self-mortification. Rather, it refers to the fact that by means of the baptism of the Holy Spirit, Christians were identified with Christ in His death and resurrection. Paul declared that this had been his experience (cf. 2:20) and that of all believers (cf. Rom. 6:1-6; Col. 2:11; 3:9). While co-crucifixion took place potentially at the cross, it becomes effective for believers when they are converted. This does not mean that their sin nature is then eradicated or even rendered inactive but that it has been judged, a fact believers should reckon to be true (cf. Rom. 6:11-12). So victory over the sinful nature's passions and desires has been provided by Christ in His death. Faith must continually lay hold of this truth or a believer will be tempted to try to secure victory by self-effort.

5:25-26. Again Paul reminded the Galatians that in addition to a divine judgment of the sinful nature there is a divine enablement in the person of the Holy Spirit. He made the believer alive by regeneration (cf. John 3:5-6), so each believer is exhorted to keep in step (stoichōmen, trans. "follow" in Gal. 6:16) with the Spirit. Step by step one's Christian walk should conform to the Spirit's direction and enablement, lest believers become conceited, provoking and envying each other. The latter traits would be true of a walk in the flesh (cf. 5:19-21) and may point to divisions in the Galatian churches occasioned by the Judaizing error (cf. v. 15).

D. A life of service (6:1-10)

A believer is free from the Law of Moses and possesses liberty in the Spirit, but he must fulfill the law of Christ, and this can be done in the power of the Spirit. Such a life involves sacrificial service directed toward sinning Christians, burdened Christians, the pastor-teachers, and all people.

1. TOWARD THE CHRISTIAN WHO HAS SINNED (6:1)

6:1. Paul deals with a hypothetical case of a Christian who is caught (prolēmphthē) in a sin, or better, is "caught by a sin." The thought is that of someone running from sin but sin, being faster, overtakes and catches him. Two passages show how the legalists responded to such (cf. John 8:3-5; Acts 21:27-29). But a Christian should restore (katartizete, a word used in secular Gr. for setting broken bones and in the NT for mending fishing nets) him. The task of restoration is not to be undertaken by fledglings in the faith but by those who are spiritual, that is, believers who walk by the Spirit (cf. Gal. 5:16), and who are mature in the faith (cf. 1 Cor. 2:15; Heb. 5:13-14). Furthermore this delicate work must be done gently (prautētos; cf. Gal. 5:22) and with the consciousness that no one is immune from falling into sin (cf. 1 Cor. 10:12).

2. TOWARD THE CHRISTIAN WHO IS BURDENED (6:2-5)

6:2. A serving Christian lends a helping hand with heavy loads (barē; cf. comments on v. 5). Though the principle would apply to all burdens the context has special reference to the heavy and oppressive weight of temptation and spiritual failure. While the "spiritual" do the work of restoring, all believers are to become involved by prayer and encouragement. This, wrote Paul, will fulfill (anaplērōsete) the law of Christ, that is, the principle of love (cf. 5:14; John 13:34).

6:3-4. Something must be laid aside if a believer is to be a burden-bearer and that is conceit, an attitude that breeds intolerance of error in others and causes one to think he is above failure. The remedy for self-conceit is found in verse 4—everyone is told to test (dokimazetō; cf. 1 Peter 1:7) his own actions. This means that rather than comparing himself with others he should step back and take an objective look at himself and his accomplishments. Then he can take pride in himself over what God has done in and through his life (cf. Rom. 12:3). The Greek word kauchēma, rendered "pride," means personal exultation, not sinful pride.

6:5. The Christian does in fact test himself by carrying his own load. This does not contradict verse 2 because the reference there is to heavy, crushing, loads (barē)—more than a man could carry without help. In this verse a different Greek word (phortion) is used to designate the pack usually carried by a marching soldier. It is the "burden" Jesus assigns to His followers (cf. Matt. 11:30). There are certain Christian responsibilities or burdens each believer must bear which cannot be shared with others. Jesus assured His disciples that such burdens were light.

3. TOWARD THE PASTOR-TEACHER (6:6-9)

6:6. One responsibility of each believer is to shoulder the financial support of the pastor-teachers in the church. Perhaps the Judaizers had influenced some of the believers to slack off in their support of the teachers, a special group who were giving their full time to this ministry and who were reimbursed for their labors (cf. 1 Cor. 9:7-14). This concept of voluntary giving to provide for the Lord's servants was revolutionary since Jews were taxed for the support of their priests and Gentiles paid fees, made vows, etc., to sustain their religions. The admonition is clear that as a teacher shares the good things of the Word of God, a believer is to reciprocate by sharing all good things with his instructor.

6:7-8. These verses elaborate on the previous exhortation. First, a solemn warning is sounded that God cannot be mocked. No man can snub (myktērizetai, lit., "turn up the nose at") God whose rule, a man reaps what he sows, is immutable. Each sower decides what his harvest will be. If a person sows to please his sinful nature, that is, if he spends his money to indulge the flesh, he will reap a harvest that will fade into oblivion. On the other hand if he uses his funds to support the Lord's work, or sows to please the Spirit, and promotes his own spiritual growth, he will reap a harvest that will last forever. Though a broader application of the principle is legitimate it seems clear that Paul was dealing primarily with the question of financial support of Christian workers in the Galatian churches.

6:9. But Christians may become discouraged with spiritual sowing because the harvest is often long in coming. In the face of this reality the apostle charged the Galatians not to become weary or give up because the harvest is sure. (Paul included himself as he no doubt contemplated his sometimes frustrating labors on behalf of the Galatian Christians.) The reaping will come at God's proper time, which may be only in part in this life and in full in the life to come at the judgment seat of Christ.

4. TOWARD ALL MEN (6:10)

6:10. Christians have a measure of responsibility to all people to do good, when the occasions arise. When Jesus fed the 5,000, both saved and unsaved participated. So the benevolence of Christians should not be restricted, except that believers are to have the priority. As in a home, family needs are met first, then those of the neighbors.

This passage then speaks clearly about Christian social responsibility, but it should be noted that it is addressed to individual believers. The church is not an agency for social work, though individual Christians are charged to minister in this way as they are able and have opportunity (cf. Rom. 12:17-21).

V. Conclusion (6:11-18)

As Paul brought the Galatian letter to a close, he again emphasized some of the great issues discussed throughout the epistle. The conclusion contains both a summary and final statement of the issues the apostle felt so strongly about.

A. Paul's autograph (6:11)

6:11. At this point Paul took the pen from his scribe and wrote the rest of the letter himself, a practice he often followed (cf. 1 Cor. 16:21; Col. 4:18; 2 Thes. 3:17). The large letters he used probably did not refer to the length of the epistle as some have suggested but to the size of the letters he inscribed. It may be that Paul wrote the conclusion in capital letters after the rest of the epistle was penned mostly in lowercase letters. While it has often been suggested that he did so because he was afflicted with weak eyesight, it is more likely, given the tone of the letter, that the apostle sought in this way to give a final emphatic thrust to his message.

B. Paul's adversaries (6:12-13)

6:12-13. The Judaizers who insisted that circumcision was necessary for salvation (cf. Acts 15:1), in summary, (1) were only men-pleasers (cf. Gal. 1:10) seeking to make a good impression outwardly; (2) were afraid of persecution (6:12b); (3) wanted to boast about the number of Galatians they hoped to win over to circumcision as a religious and merit-earning rite (v. 13). The legalists knew the offense of the Cross would be softened if they openly proclaimed justification by faith and works (i.e., circumcision) and if they could claim conversions to that position in Galatia.

C. Paul's boast (6:14-16)

6:14. The contrast is vivid as Paul declared his boasting to be in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. For the Judaizers the Cross was an object of shame; for Paul it was the object of glorying. They gloried in the flesh; he gloried in the Savior. The "Cross" speaks of the atonement of Christ with which Paul was identified (cf. 2:20) and by which the world was crucified to Paul and he to the world. The world system with all its allurements, fleshly displays, and religions of human effort was cast aside by Paul. He looked at the world as if it were on a cross—and the world looked at Paul as though he were on a cross.

6:15. In view of the Cross of Christ and a believer's new position with respect to the world, no outward religious symbol or lack of it means anything as a way of salvation (cf. 5:6). The only thing that matters is to be a part of the new creation by the new birth (cf. 2 Cor. 5:17).

6:16. Peace and mercy from God are available to those who walk according to this rule, that is, according to the message of salvation by grace through faith alone. This blessing is pronounced on believing Galatians and on believing Jews. (The NIV errs in trans. even to the Israel of God rather than "and upon the Israel of God" as in the NASB.) While some believe that "Israel of God" is the church, the evidence does not support such a conclusion. First, the repetition of the preposition ("upon" or "to") indicates two groups are in view. Second, all the 65 other occurrences of the term "Israel" in the New Testament refer to Jews. It would thus be strange for Paul to use "Israel" here to mean Gentile Christians. Third, Paul elsewhere referred to two kinds of Israelites—believing Jews and unbelieving Jews (cf. Rom. 9:6). Lest it be thought that Paul is anti-Semitic, he demonstrated by means of this benediction his deep love and concern for true Israel, that is, Jews who had come to Christ.

D. Paul's benediction (6:17-18)

6:17. Paul's calling as an apostle and the message he preached had been challenged by the Judaizers. He asked for an end to such trouble, and he offered as a final proof to his critics the marks of Jesus on his body. These "marks" (stigmata) meant signs of ownership such as were branded on slaves and cattle. Paul referred to the scars on his body, which were caused by persecution for Christ's sake (cf. 1 Cor. 4:11; 2 Cor. 4:10-11; 6:5, 9; 11:24-25), because they demonstrated he was a slave of Christ and not just a people-pleaser.

6:18. Paul's final word of benediction is noteworthy. While no greetings or personal salutations dim the solemnity of the epistle, the apostle ended as he began, expressing his heartfelt desire that the grace of God would be their abiding portion (cf. 1:3). And uniquely among all of Paul's epistles he ends with a reminder of his love for them, calling them brothers. How could the Galatians fail to respond in obedience to the persuasive and ultimately tender appeal found in this letter?

EPHESIANS

Harold W. Hoehner

INTRODUCTION

Authorship. Twice in this epistle Paul referred to himself by name as the author of the book (1:1; 3:1). Yet the Pauline authorship of Ephesians has been greatly disputed in recent years. Some critics think that the book reflects aspects of vocabulary, style, and doctrine that differ from Paul's writings. Though the book has a close affinity with Colossians, critics claim that Ephesians is uncharacteristic of Paul. They suggest that the book was pseudonymous, that is, it was written by someone who did not use his own name but who instead claimed to be Paul.

However, pseudonymity was not practiced by the early Christians. Also this book is regarded by many as the crown of all Paul's writings. Thus it seems strange that a disciple of Paul would be greater than Paul in theological and spiritual perception. Furthermore, Ephesians was extensively and undisputably accepted in the early church as Paul's letter. There is no strong reason for rejecting the Pauline authorship of Ephesians.

Destination. Some scholars view this epistle as encyclical, a circular letter to be distributed to several undesignated local churches in the province of Asia or some other area. This is supported by two observations: (1) the words "in Ephesus" (1:1) do not appear in three early Alexandrian Greek manuscripts, and (2) it is strange for Paul not to mention by name any of the individuals in a church where he had lived and worked for three years (Acts 20:31). However, it seems better to accept "in Ephesus" as genuine because of the wide geographical distribution of the Greek manuscripts that do include those words. Also no manuscripts of this epistle mention any other city, and none have only the word "in" followed by a space to insert a city's name. The prescript or title "To the Ephesians" appears in all manuscripts of this epistle. Furthermore, all the letters Paul wrote to churches mention their destinations.

With regard to the absence of names of individuals in Ephesus, it may be that Paul did not want to single out certain persons in this short epistle since he knew so many people there.

Even so, the epistle may still be considered a circular letter, with Ephesus being the primary church addressed since Paul had stayed there so long and since it was the capital city of the province of Asia. This helps explain the absence of personal names of Ephesian believers. If this epistle were routed to other churches after the Ephesians read it, it may have gone to Laodicea and Colosse, for Paul in writing Colossians urged the believers there to "read the letter from Laodicea" (Col. 4:16), possibly a reference to the Ephesian epistle. (For the locations of Ephesus, Asia, Laodicea, and Colosse see the map between Acts and Rom.)

Ephesians was probably delivered by Tychicus (Eph. 6:21-22), who also took Paul's letter to the Colossians (Col. 4:7-9).

Ephesus was a leading center in the Roman Empire. Paul had spent a short time in Ephesus on his way back to Antioch from his second missionary journey (Acts 18:19-22). On his third missionary journey he stayed in Ephesus three years (Acts 20:31). Several remarkable things happened in Ephesus. Paul baptized a dozen of John the Baptist's followers (Acts 19:1-7). He had discussions in the hall of Tyrannus (19:8-10). Unusual miracles occurred (19:11-12), strange events took place (19:13-16), sorcerers were converted (19:17-20), and the city rioted over silversmith Demetrius' loss of business because of people who turned to Christ from worshiping the great Ephesian goddess Artemis (19:23-41). On Paul's return to Jerusalem from his third missionary journey he gave a moving farewell address to the Ephesian elders at the coastal town of Miletus (20:13-35). That was his last time to see them (20:36-38), unless Paul visited Ephesus after he was in Rome (cf. 1 Tim. 1:3 with 3:14).

Place and Date. Paul was a prisoner at the time he wrote this letter (Eph. 3:1; 4:1; 6:20). Scholars differ on whether Paul wrote this letter while he was imprisoned in Caesarea (Acts 24:27) in A.D. 57–59, or in Rome (28:30) in A.D. 60–62. All things considered, the Roman imprisonment seems more likely. Along with Ephesians, the Books of Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon are thought to have been written during the same time period and hence are called the "Prison Epistles" (cf. Phil. 1:7; Col. 4:10; Phile. 9). Since Ephesians gives no hint of his release from prison, as do Philippians (1:19-26) and Philemon (v. 22), it is reasonable to think that he wrote it in the early part of his stay, or about A.D. 60. This would have been when Paul was kept under guard in rental quarters (Acts 28:30). Following his release he traveled, wrote 1 Timothy and Titus, was arrested again, wrote 2 Timothy, and was martyred in Rome.

Purpose. Though no particular problem is raised in the book, the reason for writing this epistle becomes clear when one considers the contacts the apostle had with the Ephesians. On the return from his third missionary journey Paul told the Ephesian elders at Miletus (A.D. 57) to beware of evil teachers from without and of professing believers within who would teach perverse things (Acts 20:29-30). From Revelation one can see that the Ephesian church had succeeded in keeping out the false teachers (Rev. 2:2) but had failed to maintain the vibrancy of their first love for Christ (Rev. 2:4). This is substantiated in 1 Timothy 1:5, when Paul wrote from Macedonia to Timothy at Ephesus (ca A.D. 62) that the goal of his instruction was "love which comes from a pure heart and a good conscience and a sincere faith." Thus the theme of love needed to be stressed for the saints at Ephesus.

This is in harmony with the contents of Ephesians, for the verb form of "love" (agapaō) is used 9 times in Ephesians, whereas Paul used it only 23 times in all his other letters. Paul used the noun (agapē, "love") 10 times in Ephesians compared with 65 times in his other epistles. Therefore, of the 107 times Paul used the verb or noun "love," 19 are in Ephesians. Thus more than one-sixth of his references to "love" appear in this small epistle to the Ephesians. This letter begins with love (Eph. 1:4, 6) and ends with love (6:23-24).

Also Ephesians teaches that Jewish and Gentile believers are one in Christ, which is demonstrated by their love for one another. This love can come only from God. Possibly Paul, realizing they were starting to forsake their first love, wrote this epistle to encourage them to love both God and their fellow saints.

COMMENTARY

I. The Calling of the Church (chaps. 1–3)

All knowledge may be divided into two categories: pure or theoretical knowledge and applied or practical knowledge. In most of his letters Paul begins with pure or doctrinal knowledge and ends with applied or practical knowledge. In this epistle the first three chapters deal with doctrine (the calling of the church) and the last three chapters with application (the conduct of the church).

A. Prologue (1:1-2)

1:1. Paul was made an apostle of Christ Jesus through God's will or decision. It was not his own choosing or plan. Thus he had God's authority behind him. As an apostle Paul was commissioned and sent by God with the gospel message.

The letter is addressed to the saints who resided in Ephesus. "Saints" (hagiois, "holy ones") are those set apart for God's use. They are a part of the universal church by virtue of their salvation in Christ. The words "in Ephesus" are omitted by some early manuscripts (see "Destination" under Introduction), but strong external and internal evidence support their inclusion. If this epistle were a circular letter, it seems that Ephesus, such a strategic city in Asia Minor, would have certainly received it first. The faithful in Christ Jesus further defines the "saints" and could be rendered "that is, the believers in Christ Jesus." These saints were in Christ Jesus, not in Adam or the goddess Artemis of Ephesus. While believers have geographical locations (e.g., "Ephesus"), spiritually they are positioned "in Christ" (cf. "in Christ at Colosse" in Col. 1:2). Paul used "in Christ Jesus," "in Christ," or "in Him" quite frequently. In Ephesians 1:1-14 the phrase occurs nine times! Christians have their very life in Christ.

1:2. Paul's extension of grace (charis) and peace is different from the normal Greek letters which had only "greetings" or "greeting" (chairein; e.g., the apocryphal 1 Maccabees 10:18, 25; thousands of ancient papyri letters; and Acts 15:23; 23:26; James 1:1). "Grace" expresses God's steadfast love toward man and "peace" shows the relational state as a result of that grace. Paul opened his letter to the church at Ephesus with greetings to the believers there, expressing his wish that God's grace and peace be with them. (See the chart "Paul's Introductions to His Epistles" at Rom. 1:1-7.)

B. Praise for God's planned spiritual blessings (1:3-14)

Paul now moved from his general greeting to the saints at Ephesus to an expanded discussion of the reason God is to be praised—because of the spiritual blessings He has planned for believers in Christ.

In the Greek text, 1:3-14 is one sentence, which is considered by some scholars to be the most cumbersome sentence in the Greek language! In fact, Ephesians has eight lengthy sentences (1:3-14, 15-23; 2:1-7; 3:1-13, 14-19; 4:1-7, 11-16; 6:14-20). However, it is common even today for prayers and doxologies to be lengthy.

1. THE PROVISION OF SPIRITUAL BLESSINGS (1:3)

1:3. Paul stated that God is to be blessed or praised. The word for praise is eulogētos, from a verb that means "to speak well of." In the New Testament it is applied only to God (Mark 14:61; Luke 1:68; Rom. 1:25; 9:5; 2 Cor. 1:3; 11:31; 1 Peter 1:3), whereas in the Septuagint it is sometimes applied to man (Gen. 26:29; Deut. 7:14; Ruth 2:20). The praise should be given to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. In Ephesians 1:2 God is the Father of believers; here in verse 3 God is the Father of Christ (cf. v. 17; cf. similar wording in Rom. 15:6; 2 Cor. 1:3; 1 Peter 1:3). In Ephesians 1:2 the first Person of the Trinity belongs to believers, suggested by the word "our." Here in verse 3 the pronoun "our" shows that believers belong to Christ, the second Person of the Godhead. Since He is the Son of God and believers are connected with Him, they are also related to the Father.

This God who is to be praised is the One who has blessed us. This is a verbal form (ho eulogēsas) of the adjective "praise" (eulogētos), at the beginning of the verse. The verb means "to speak well of, eulogize, extol"; here it means "to benefit, prosper." This word is not used in classical Greek literature. For example, Zeus is not said to have bestowed any specific act of blessing on anyone. Rather he is said to have caused good luck or good fortune. However, the verb eulogeō is used over 400 times in the Old Testament, indicating that God bestows benefits to His children in every Age. Mary was said to be "blessed" among women and to be bearing the "blessed" Child (Luke 1:42).

Paul's use of the past tense participle "has blessed" points to this blessing or prospering of believers as having occurred in eternity past. With what are believers blessed? With every spiritual blessing (in the Gr., this phrase precedes the words "in the heavenly realms"). "Every spiritual blessing" (eulogia) refers to every spiritual enrichment needed for the spiritual life. Since these benefits have already been bestowed on believers, they should not ask for them but rather appropriate them by faith. Similarly Joshua was not to ask for land since God had already promised it to him (Josh. 1:3-4). But he was to enter into the enjoyment of that provision.

The manner or sphere of this enrichment is in Christ. The place of these "blessings" is in the heavenly realms, as opposed to the earthly realm of the Ephesian goddess Artemis. Thus these blessings are spiritual not material, heavenly not earthly, eternal not temporal (2 Cor. 4:18; Col. 3:1-4). Five times Paul used the phrase "in the heavenly realms": in Ephesians 1:3, 20; 2:6; 3:10; 6:12.

Ephesians 1:3 tells much about God's blessings on believers: (a) when: eternity past; (b) with what: every spiritual blessing; (c) where: in the heavenly realms; (d) how: in Christ.

2. THE BASIS OF SPIRITUAL BLESSINGS (1:4-14)

Paul continued his discussion of believers' spiritual blessings by showing that they are based on the work of the three Persons of the Trinity: the selection of the Father (vv. 4-6), the sacrifice of the Son (vv. 7-12), and the seal of the Spirit (vv. 13-14).

a. God's election for Himself (1:4-6)

1:4. The apostle first told when God's work of election took place: before the Creation of the world. The word for at the beginning of this verse is not as literal a translation of the Greek adverb kathōs as "even as" (ASV, RSV) or "just as" (NASB). "As" suggests that the way God blesses believers (v. 3) is through the threefold work of the Trinity. But the adverb can also have a causal sense, and may be rendered "since," "because," or "insofar as" (cf. 4:32). The idea is that spiritual blessings (1:3) for believers are because of or on the basis of the work of the Trinity: God blesses believers because of the Father's electing, the Son's dying, and the Spirit's sealing. Both concepts seem to be included: spiritual blessings are the work of the three Persons of the Trinity, and the work of the Trinity is the basis of all a believer's spiritual blessings.

Spiritual blessings begin with and are based on election (He chose us), of which God is the subject and believers are the object. Election is God's sovereign work of choosing some to believe (cf. Rom. 8:30; Eph. 1:11; 1 Thes. 1:4; 2 Thes. 2:13; Titus 1:1). Salvation is God's doing, not man's (Eph. 2:8-9). Though it is an act of grace (Rom. 11:5-6; 2 Tim. 1:9), based on His will (Eph. 1:5, 9, 11), a person is responsible to believe (v. 13). "God chose you to be saved . . . through belief in the truth" (2 Thes. 2:13).

In Him indicates the sphere (cf. "in Christ" in Eph. 1:3) of election, as He is the Head and Representative of spiritual humanity (vv. 10, 22; Col. 1:18). The time of election is in eternity past, and the purpose of election is that believers will be holy and blameless in His sight for eternity. What God has begun in the past will be accomplished and completed in the future. Christians are "holy" (hagious; cf. hagiois, "saints," Eph. 1:1), that is, set apart to God, which is the purpose of His electing grace. In addition, the purpose of His election is to make Christians "blameless." This word amōmous, "without blemish," is used eight times in the New Testament (v. 4; 5:27; Phil. 2:15; Col. 1:22; Heb. 9:14; 1 Peter 1:19; 2 Peter 3:14; Rev. 14:5). In the Septuagint it is used of sacrificial animals; only those without blemish could be offered to God.

What does the phrase in love modify? Some agree with the NIV that it modifies the word "predestined" (Eph. 1:5). If so, then God's love is seen in predestination. More likely, it modifies the words "to be holy and blameless in His sight" for these reasons: (1) In this context the modifying phrases always follow the action words (vv. 3-4, 6, 8-10). (2) The other five occurrences of "in love" in Ephesians (3:17; 4:2, 15-16; 5:2 ["of love"]) refer to human love rather than divine love. (3) Love fits well with holiness and blamelessness, for this would denote a balance between holiness and love. God is love and believers, because of God's electing love, should manifest love with holiness.

1:5. The cause of election is God's predestination of believers unto sonship (cf. "predestined" in v. 11). Predestined is from proorisas, "marked out beforehand." Thus the emphasis of predestination is more on the what than the who in that the believers' predetermined destiny is their being adopted as full-fledged sons of God through Jesus Christ, the Agent of the adoption. The concept of adoption is also found in Romans 8:15 (NIV marg.), 23; Galatians 4:4-7. In adoption a son is brought into a family and is given the same rights as a child who is born into that family.

In this context it seems that predestination logically precedes election: after God looked forward to the glorious destiny of adopting believers into His family, He looked down on sinful humanity and chose believers (cf. Rom. 8:30 where "predestined" precedes "called," which refers to His efficacious saving). All this was done in accordance with His pleasure (cf. Eph. 1:9) and will (cf. vv. 1, 9, 11), that is, He delighted to impart His spiritual benefits to His children.

1:6. The ultimate goal of God's election is that believers will be to the praise of His glorious grace. A similar expression of praise is also given after the description of the work of the Son (v. 12) and of the Spirit (v. 14). "His glorious grace" (undeserved favor; cf. v. 7) had been freely given us. The words "freely given" translate the verb echaritōsen, from the noun "grace" (charis). The verb form is used only one other time in the New Testament (Luke 1:28, where Mary is said to be "highly favored"). Literally, Ephesians 1:6a might be rendered "to the praise of His glorious grace which He 'graced' to us." Since salvation is all of God's grace, Christians certainly ought to praise Him for it! And that is why they were chosen: to give Him praise (cf. "Praise be to . . . God," v. 3). In the One He loves stresses the manifestation of God's love to His Son (cf. "the Son He loves," Col. 1:13). This reference to Christ also furnishes the transition to the second Person of the Trinity discussed in Ephesians 1:7-12.

God the Father loves His Son; and believers, being in the Son, are also the object of God's love.

b. God's redemption in Christ (1:7-12)

1:7. Redemption (apolytrōsin) denotes release or deliverance from a state of slavery (cf. Col. 1:14). The idea of release is seen in some of the other verses where this Greek word appears (Luke 21:28; Rom. 3:24; 8:23; 1 Cor. 1:30; Eph. 1:7, 14; 4:30; Col. 1:14; Heb. 9:15; 11:35). (See the chart "New Testament Words for Redemption" at Mark 10:45.) This redemption is from sin (Heb. 9:15), and thus this work of Christ delivers believers from slavery to sin. This is further defined by the forgiveness of sins (cf. Eph. 4:32; Col. 1:14), which is the immediate result of a believer's release from sin's hold. (The word for "sins" is paraptōma, lit., "false steps or transgressions," also used in Rom. 4:25; 5:16-17, 20; Eph. 2:1, 5, and elsewhere.) God could not treat sin lightly for it required the sacrifice of blood (cf. Heb. 9:22).

The means of redemption is the sacrificial substitutionary death of Christ (through His blood; cf. Eph. 2:13; 1 Peter 1:19), which completely satisfied God's justice (Rom. 3:24-25). This was accomplished in accordance with the riches of God's grace (cf. Eph. 1:6; 2:7). The cost of Christ's blood is the measure of the wealth of God's unmerited favor to every believer. It was accomplished not "out of" but "according to" (kata) the wealth of His grace (cf. Phil. 4:19). Six times in Ephesians Paul referred to God's riches (1:7, 18; 2:4, 7; 3:8, 16).

1:8-10. God's grace is given to enable believers to understand His will. God gives them wisdom (sophia; cf. v. 17; 3:10; Col. 1:9, 28; 2:3, 23; 3:16; 4:5), objective insight into the true nature of God's revelation, and understanding (phronēsei), the subjective apprehension of it. So believers are able to grasp something of the divine purpose of the ages and to see its relevance in the present time. This is accomplished because God made known to us the mystery of His will (cf. "will" in Eph.1:1, 5, 11). "Mystery" is a previously hidden truth unveiled by God's revelation (cf. Rom. 16:25; see Matt. 13:11 for a list of "mysteries" in the NT). This mystery (unveiled truth) is God's good pleasure (cf. Eph. 1:5) to purpose in Christ to bring all things in heaven and on earth under His headship in the consummation of time. The words to be put into effect when the times will have reached their fulfillment are literally, "unto the dispensation of the fullness of the times." The "dispensation" (oikonomia) is an arrangement or administration. This dispensation is the millennial kingdom when "the times" in God's purposes will be completed (fulfilled), and all things both spiritual and material will be under Christ and His rule (cf. 1 Cor. 15:27; Col. 1:20).

The words "bring all things . . . together under one Head" translate one Greek word (which occurs elsewhere in the NT only in Rom. 13:9), to speak of summing up all the commandments under love. In the Millennium everything will be restored and brought together under Christ, the one Head. This does not suggest that everyone will be saved; instead, sin's disorder will be removed and universal peace will be established (Isa. 2:2-4; 11:1-10).

1:11-12. As a result of the spiritual blessing of insight into the mystery of God's will (vv. 8-10) Paul discussed the Jewish believers' inclusion in Christ. The we in verse 11 seems to be a distinct group from the anonymous "we/us" in verses 3-10. This is supported by two facts: (1) verse 11 includes the word also and (2) verse 13 changes to "you also," which refers to Gentile believers. Though both Jews and Gentiles participate in God's blessings, the Jews were called first (cf. Acts 3:26; Rom. 1:16).

In Ephesians 1:11 chosen (eklērōthēmen) is not the same word used in verse 4 (exelexato). The word in verse 11 (used only here in the NT) means "to cast a lot" or "to appoint or obtain by lot." In this context it is best rendered "to be chosen, appointed, or destined." Jewish believers were chosen because they were predestined. But this predestination is not a matter of whim or caprice on God's part; it is according to the plan (prothesin, "purpose"; cf. Rom. 8:28; 9:11; Eph. 3:11) of God, who works out everything in conformity with the purpose (boulēn, "counsel or deliberation") of His will (thelēmatos; cf. 1:5, 9). The combination of these words—prothesin, boulēn, thelēmatos—gives a forceful emphasis of God's sovereignty for including the Jewish believers in the church, which is headed up by Christ. The purpose of God's choice of the Jewish believers is that they might be for the praise of His glory, which parallels verse 6. The words "for the praise of His glory" serve as a refrain used after a description of the work of each Person of the Trinity (cf. vv. 6, 14). The relative clause, who were the first to hope in Christ, further substantiates that verses 11-12 refer to Jewish believers as opposed to Gentile believers because the Jews did precede the Gentiles chronologically in the faith (Acts 1:8; 13:46; 28:25-28; Rom. 1:16 [see comments there]; 2:9-10).

Christ has set the sinner free from his sin and has revealed His will that all things will be headed up in Christ at the end of the ages, including the Jewish believers who first trusted in Him.

c. God's seal with the Spirit (1:13-14)

God's spiritual blessings for believers are based not only on the sovereign election of the Father (vv. 3-6) and the redemptive work of the Son (vv. 7-12), but also on the seal of the Holy Spirit.

1:13-14a. And you also refers to the Gentiles in contrast with the Jews (cf. comments on vv. 11-12). When they heard the Word of truth (cf. Col. 1:5; 2 Tim. 2:15; James 1:18) which is further described as the gospel of your salvation, and believed, they were sealed with the promised Holy Spirit. The KJV says that the sealing occurs "after" the hearing and believing, thus connoting a second work of grace. This is wrong, for believers are sealed at the moment they hear and believe.

The last part of verse 13 is literally, "They were sealed in Him [Christ] with the Holy Spirit of promise." The word "seal" indicates security (Matt. 27:66; Eph. 4:30), authentication and approval (John 6:27), certification of genuineness (John 3:33), and identification of ownership (2 Cor. 1:22; Rev. 7:2; 9:4). God is the One who seals, Christ is the sphere in which the seal is done, and the Holy Spirit is the instrument of the seal. "The promised Holy Spirit" refers to Christ's promise to His disciples that He would send the Spirit (Luke 24:49; John 14:16; 15:26; 16:13; Acts 1:5).

The Holy Spirit who seals is a deposit guaranteeing our inheritance. The "deposit" is more than a pledge which could be returned; it is a down payment with a guarantee of more to come (cf. "the firstfruits of the Spirit," Rom. 8:23). "A deposit guaranteeing" translates the Greek arrabōn (used elsewhere in the NT only in 2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5). It guarantees believers' "inheritance" of salvation and heaven (cf. 1 Peter 1:4). (See comments on "inheritance" in Eph. 1:18.) In essence, the "deposit" of the Holy Spirit is a little bit of heaven in believers' lives with a guarantee of much more yet to come.

1:14b. The believer is sealed with the Holy Spirit until the redemption (apolytrōsin; see the chart "New Testament Words for Redemption" at Mark 10:45) of those who are God's possession. This redemption is not release from the guilt of sin; that was spoken of in Ephesians 1:7 and the believer is already "God's possession." Instead, this is the believer's ultimate, final release from the presence of sin (cf. Rom. 8:23b; Phil. 3:20-21). The Greek word for "possession" (peripoiēsis) is also used in 1 Thessalonians 5:9; 2 Thessalonians 2:14; Hebrews 10:39 (see comments there); and 1 Peter 2:9. Again the doxological refrain, to the praise of His glory, is repeated here as it was after the description of the work of the Father (Eph. 1:6) and of the Son (v. 12).

C. Prayer for wisdom and revelation (1:15-23)

1. COMMENDATION (1:15)

1:15. Because of (For this reason) the believers' acquisition of every spiritual blessing—including election, predestination, adoption, grace, redemption, forgiveness, wisdom, understanding, knowledge of the mystery of His will, the sealing of the Holy Spirit, and inheritance—Paul now prayed that his readers might know God personally and intimately. Verses 15-23 are one sentence in the Greek, as are verses 3-14.

Paul heard of the Ephesians' faith in Christ, their vertical relationship, and their love for all the saints, their horizontal relationship (cf. Col. 1:4; 2 Thes. 1:3). A proper relationship with God should lead to a proper relationship with other Christians. Interestingly Paul wrote about "love with faith" in Ephesians 6:23.

2. SUPPLICATION (1:16-23)

a. The request for wisdom and revelation (1:16-18a)

1:16. Because of the Ephesians' faith and love, Paul continued to give thanks for them (cf. Rom. 1:8; 1 Cor. 1:4; Phil. 1:3; Col. 1:3; 1 Thes. 1:2; 2 Thes. 1:3) and to make requests for them (cf. Phil. 1:4; Col. 1:9; 1 Thes. 1:3).

1:17. The NIV begins a new sentence here, but this verse is actually a continuation of verse 16. Paul addressed his request to the God of our Lord Jesus Christ (cf. v. 3), the glorious Father, that is, the Father to whom all glory belongs (cf. "the God of glory" in Acts 7:2 and "the Lord of glory" in 1 Cor. 2:8). The content of Paul's request is that God may give you the Spirit of wisdom and revelation. Though the NIV translators interpret "Spirit" (pneuma) as referring to the Holy Spirit, it is better to see it as disposition or attitude because of the two genitives following it ("of wisdom and [of] revelation"; cf. "a gentle spirit" in 1 Cor. 4:21). On the other hand one cannot obtain a spirit or attitude of wisdom and revelation apart from the Holy Spirit. As Isaiah wrote, "The Spirit of the Lord will rest on Him [Messiah]—the Spirit of wisdom and of understanding, the Spirit of counsel and of power, the Spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord" (Isa. 11:2). "Wisdom" (sophia; cf. Eph. 1:8; 3:10) gives insight into the true nature of things, and "revelation" is the unveiling of the object discussed, namely, God Himself. The purpose in having this wisdom and revelation is that you may know Him, God, better. The Greek is the phrase, "in knowing of Him." This knowing (epignōsei) refers not to abstract knowledge of God or objective facts about Him, but knowing Him personally and intimately (cf. "knowledge," epignōseōs, in 4:13). It includes an intimate awareness of God's character and will. Philosophy says, "Know thyself," whereas Christianity says, "Know God through Jesus Christ."

1:18a. The NEB, NASB, and NIV state another request: I pray also that the eyes of your heart may be enlightened. However, this is not a new sentence in Greek. It seems to be parenthetical, as in the KJV, ASV, and RSV. In other words, Paul had prayed (v. 17) that they might have true spiritual insight into God, and then he included the phrase, "having the eyes of your heart enlightened" (RSV). Paul's request for them to know God was within proper bounds because their hearts had been enlightened (the Gr. perf. tense indicates past action with continuing results), as discussed in verses 3-14, especially 7-9. In the Bible the "heart" is the center of one's personality.

b. The reason for wisdom and revelation (1:18b-23)

Having prayed (vv. 16-17) that they might know God personally, Paul now gave the reason: "that you may know" three facts, which are spelled out in verses 18b-23 (the first is in v. 18b, the second in v. 18c, and the third in vv. 19-23). The word "know" (eidenai, v. 18) is factual knowledge—much as a general needs to know the facts about his equipment and men before he goes to battle.

1:18b. The first fact to be ascertained pertains to the past. A believer's present hope has its source in the past when he was called (cf. Rom. 1:6; 8:30; Eph. 4:1, 4; 2 Tim. 1:9) to salvation. "Hope" in Scripture is the absolute certainty of a believer's victory in God (cf. Rom. 8:23-24; Eph. 4:4; Col. 1:5; 1 Thes. 1:3; 1 Peter 3:15).

1:18c. The second fact Paul wanted his readers to know refers to the future: the riches of His glorious inheritance in the saints. At the time of the resurrection of believers ("saints" are those set apart by God to God; cf. v. 1) God will inherit those whom He has purchased at a great price according to the riches of His grace (v. 7). This is the second of six times in Ephesians in which Paul referred to "riches" (1:7, 18; 2:4, 7; 3:8, 16). In 1:14 Paul wrote that the Christians' "inheritance" is their final redemption from the presence of sin. Here in verse 18 he wrote about God's inheritance, the saints themselves! Because of the "glorious grace" (v. 6) of "the glorious Father" (v. 17), He will receive "His glorious inheritance" (v. 18).

1:19-23. The third fact Paul wanted believers to know pertains to the present time: His incomparably great power for us who believe. The word "power" (dynamis; cf. 3:20) means a spiritually dynamic and living force. This power of God is directed toward believers. Paul then used three additional words to describe God's power. It is according to the working (energeian, "energetic power," from which comes the Eng.

"energy") of the might (kratous, "power that overcomes resistance," as in Christ's miracles; this word is used only of God, never of believers) of God's inherent strength (ischyos) which He provides (cf. 6:10; 1 Peter 4:11). This magnificent accumulation of words for power underscores the magnitude of God's "great power" available to Christians.

Then Paul mentioned three manifestations of God's power which are seen in Christ (Eph. 1:20-23). First, this energetic power was exerted (enērgēken) in Christ when God raised Him from the dead and seated Him at His right hand in the heavenly realms. God's energetic power which resurrected and exalted Christ in the past (cf. Rom. 8:34; Eph. 2:6; Col. 3:1; Heb. 1:3; 8:1; 12:2; 1 Peter 3:22) is the same power available to believers in the present (cf. Phil. 3:10). What an amazing source of spiritual vitality, power, and strength for living the Christian life! (cf. Col. 1:11) Christ's Ascension to the right hand of God involves His being exalted above every order of authority (cf. Col. 1:16), human and superhuman (cf. Phil. 2:8-11), whether present (in the present Age) or future (the Age to come; cf. 1 Cor. 15:23-28). The words rule and authority, power and dominion may refer primarily to angelic beings (cf. Rom. 8:38; Eph. 3:10; 6:12; Col. 1:16; 2:15; Titus 3:1).

A second manifestation of God's power in Christ is seen in His placing all things under Christ's feet. Whereas Adam lost his headship over Creation when he sinned, Christ was made Head over all Creation (cf. Eph. 1:10). This will be fully realized in the future (Ps. 8:6; 1 Cor. 15:27; Heb. 2:6-8).

The third manifestation of God's power in Christ is His appointment of Christ as Head over . . . the church. Though the final manifestation of Christ's headship over all Creation will be in the future, He is now Head over the fellowship of believers. He is also called the church's "Head" in Ephesians 4:15; 5:23; and Colossians 1:18. Though the church is implied in Ephesians 1:10, it is specifically mentioned for the first time in Ephesians in verse 22b. The church is His body (v. 23; cf. 4:4, 15-16; Col. 1:18). His body, the universal church consisting of all believers, is the fullness of Him who fills everything in every way. The meaning of this description of His body is difficult to determine. The verb "fills" can be taken passively, meaning that Christ, the Head of the body, is filled by the church. That is, as the church grows it completes Christ. However, it is better to understand the word "fills" as in the Greek middle voice: Christ, the Head of the body, fills (for Himself) the church with blessings. The verse could then be rendered, "which is His body, which is being filled by the One who fills all things with all things (blessings)." This interpretation is preferred for these reasons: (1) Nowhere else does the New Testament state that Christ finds fullness from the church. (2) This view fits the context well because the Persons of the Godhead are completing the actions (cf. Eph. 1:10). (3) This view correlates well with 4:10-11 which speaks of Christ giving all things ("the whole universe" is lit., "all things"), namely, gifted people to the church.

This ends Paul's prayer. After demonstrating that believers have all spiritual blessings (1:3-14), Paul prayed that believers would come to know God intimately (v. 17) in order that they might know three facts: (1) the past call of salvation that produced hope (v. 18), (2) the future inheritance that God has in His saints (v. 18), and (3) the present power of God that is available to believers, which (a) was manifested in the past in Christ's resurrection and Ascension, (b) will be manifested in the future in Christ's headship over Creation, and (c) is presently manifested in Christ's headship over the church.

D. New position individually (2:1-10)

In chapter 1 Paul discussed God's eternal plan in choosing those who are predestined to sonship and the fact that all believers on earth and in heaven will be brought together under Christ the Head of the church. Chapters 2–3 explain the execution of this eternal plan by showing how God makes sinners saints and then places them into the church, Christ's body. In 2:1-10 Paul discussed how sinners who deserve nothing but God's wrath can become trophies of His grace.

1. THE OLD CONDITION: DEAD TO GOD (2:1-3)

At the outset it should be noted that the grammatical subject of this long sentence (vv. 1-7) in Greek is "God" (v. 4) and the three main verbs are "made . . . alive with" (v. 5), "raised . . . up with" (v. 6), and "seated . . . with" (v. 6). The object of each of these verbs is "us," that is, believers (vv. 5-6). Thus the main assertion in verses 1-7 is that God has made believers alive, raised them up, and seated them with Christ. All the other clauses in these verses are subordinate to this main assertion. This is not really clear in the NIV which has included three additional verbs (one in v. 1 and two in v. 3) as well as the three, already mentioned, in verses 5-6.

Verses 1-3 depict the condition of unbelievers before God transformed them.

a. The condition described (2:1)

2:1. Unregenerate persons are dead in . . . transgressions (cf. v. 5) and sins (Col. 2:13). This death is spiritual, not physical, for unsaved people are very much alive physically. Death signifies absence of communication with the living. One who is dead spiritually has no communication with God; he is separated from God. The phrase "in your transgressions and sins" shows the sphere of the death, suggesting that sin has killed people (Rom. 5:12; 7:10; Col. 2:13) and they remain in that spiritually dead state. "Transgressions" (paraptōmasin, "false steps"; cf. Eph. 1:7; 2:5) and "sins" (hamartiais, "acts of missing the mark"), though slightly different in their root meanings, are basically synonymous. Both suggest deliberate acts against God and His righteousness and thus failure to live as one should. The plural of these two nouns signifies people's repetitious involvement in sin and hence their state of unregeneration.

b. The condition delineated (2:2-3)

2:2-3. Mankind's unregenerate condition is further delineated in three ways: (1) The unregenerate follow the ways of this world. Unbelievers follow the lifestyles of other unbelievers; they experience the world's peer pressure. "This world" (kosmos) is the satanically organized system that hates and opposes all that is godly (cf. John 15:18, 23).

(2) The unsaved follow the ruler of the kingdom of the air, that is, Satan. "The whole world is under the control of the evil one" (1 John 5:19), also called "the god of this Age" (2 Cor. 4:4). In the middle of the Tribulation he will be cast down to the earth, no longer to rule the world or have access to God's presence (Rev. 12:9). The unsaved are now in the clutches of this "ruler" and follow in his opposition to God.

(3) The additional description, the spirit who is now at work in those who are disobedient, may be a further elaboration of the distant antecedent, "ways of this world," but this seems too remote. Some (e.g., NIV) suggest that it refers to "the ruler," meaning that Satan personally works in sons of disobedience. However, it seems that "the spirit" is the same as "the kingdom (exousias, lit. 'authority') of the air." This is the nearest antecedent and makes sense grammatically. This "spirit" then refers to the impersonal force or atmosphere, which is controlled and directed by Satan (1 John 5:19). This spirit is presently "at work" (energountos) in unbelievers. "In those who are disobedient" is literally, "in the sons of disobedience." The word for sons (huiois) has the idea of a distinctive characteristic. "A son of disobedience" is one who is a distinctly disobedient person. The Greek word translated "disobedience" and "disobedient" is used several times in the New Testament (Rom. 11:30, 32; Eph. 2:2; 5:6; Heb. 4:6, 11). It suggests conscious and active rebellion and opposition against God.

However, the unconverted not only are under the pressure of the world system and Satan's control but they also enjoy it. All of us also lived among them at one time is Paul's reminder to his Gentile readers that the Jews ("all of us") also joined in this disobedience. The word "lived" (anestraphēmen; "conducted themselves") differs from "used to live" (periepatēsate) in Ephesians 2:2. The conduct of the unsaved is in the sphere of the cravings of their sinful nature, in which they follow the desires and the thoughts of the flesh. "Sinful nature" translates "the flesh" (sarkos), which is unregenerated nature. This nature can manifest itself in a respectable form as well as in disreputable pursuits. The "thoughts" (dianoiōn, here pl., but usually sing.) suggest that even unbelievers' reasoning processes (or calculations formed by a thinking mind) are perverted. Such false reasoning directs their wills and acts (cf. Rom. 1:21).

Like the rest, we (i.e., both Jews and Gentiles) are by nature (naturally and innately) the objects (lit. "children") of wrath. Tekna, the word for "children," suggests a close relationship to one's parents (in contrast with huioi, "sons," which speaks of distinctive characteristics). Unbelievers have a close relationship, not with God, but with His wrath! Disobedience and unbelief lead to the wrath of God (Rom. 1:18–2:29; John 3:36).

Ephesians 2:1-3 presents a hopeless picture of an unregenerate person who deserves nothing but God's wrath.

2. THE NEW POSITION: ALIVE IN GOD (2:4-10)

The wrath of God, however, is not the entire story. Its dark background contrasts with the glorious exhibition of God's grace toward the unregenerate. Verses 4-10 set forth the grace of God which works on some unbelievers and gives them life (vv. 4-5), raises them (v. 6a), and seats them in heavenly realms with Christ (vv. 6b-10).

a. God made them alive (2:4-5)

2:4-5. The conjunction but introduces God's actions toward sinners, in contrast with their plight in verses 1-3. In the Greek text God immediately follows "but," thus placing it in an emphatic position. "God" is the subject of the whole passage. Great differences are suggested by the words "But God"! He is described as rich in mercy. (Cf. the "riches" of God's grace [1:7; 2:7], of God's glorious inheritance [1:18], of Christ [3:8], and of His glory [3:16].) In the Septuagint "mercy" (eleos) translates the Hebrew ḥesēd ("loyal love"). In the New Testament eleos means "undeserved kindness" toward sinners. Thus God, who is rich in exhibiting this undeserved kindness, acts on behalf of sinners because of His great love for us. The noun for "love" (agapē) comes from the verb agapaō that means "to seek the highest good in the one loved." Since sinners are spiritually dead toward God, they have nothing to commend them to God. This is why Paul described this love as being "great."

God's love has done three things: (a) made us alive with Christ, (b) "raised us up with Christ" (2:6), and (c) "seated us with Him in the heavenly realms in Christ Jesus" (v. 6). An unbeliever, spiritually dead, is "made . . . alive" by God "with (in association with) Christ" (cf. Col. 2:13). The "us" includes both Jews and Gentiles (cf. "us" in Eph. 2:3-4). The only way a spiritually dead person can communicate with God is to be made alive, and that must be done by the One who is Himself alive. He is the living God, "who gives life to the dead" (Rom. 4:17).

God is fully aware of the unbelievers' state. It was clearly described in Ephesians 2:1-3 and is repeated here: even when we were dead in transgressions (cf. v. 1). This act of God in making the unregenerate alive is an act of grace: it is by grace you have been saved. Paul elaborated on this last statement, which is actually parenthetical, in verse 8. The verb "have been saved" is in the perfect tense which expresses the present permanent state as a result of a past action. Because believers have been "made alive" spiritually with Christ, they have been and are saved.

b. God raised them (2:6a)

2:6a. Besides being made alive, former unbelievers also have been raised . . . up with Christ. This speaks of their being positionally resurrected. Christ's post-resurrection state was new, powerful, and unique. So too Christians, in whom Christ dwells, have a new, powerful, and unique life and position. This new life, power, and position demand that believers have a new set of values, as Paul stated in his companion letter to the Colossian believers: "Since, then, you have been raised with Christ, set your heart on things above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God. Set your minds on things above, not on earthly things" (Col. 3:1-2).

c. God seated them (2:6b-10)

2:6b. Not only has God made alive and raised with Christ many who had been unbelievers, but He has also seated them with Christ in the heavenly realms (cf. 1:3, 20; 2:6; 3:10; 6:12) in Christ Jesus. Believers are positioned spiritually in heaven, where Christ is. They are no longer mere earthlings; their citizenship is in heaven (Phil. 3:20). He is the exalted Son of God, and they are exalted sons and daughters of God. These actions of God toward unbelievers are similar to what God did for Christ: "He raised Him from the dead and seated Him at His right hand in the heavenly realms" (Eph. 1:20). Whereas Christ had died physically (1:20), unbelievers were dead spiritually (2:1-3). While Christ was raised physically (1:20), unbelievers are made alive and raised with Christ spiritually (2:5-6). Christ is seated in the heavenly realms physically (in His resurrected, ascended body; 1:20), but believers are seated with Christ in the heavenly realms spiritually (2:6). This divine power that can make an unbeliever have life, be raised, and exalted with Christ is the same power that presently operates in believers.

2:7. In the future eternal state, God will show all His Creation the incomparable riches of His grace. "Show" is endeixētai, which means "display or demonstrate" (cf. Rom. 2:15; 9:17, 22; 2 Cor. 8:24; Titus 2:10; 3:2). This display will be seen in His redeemed ones. The "riches of His grace" has been mentioned in connection with believers' redemption which brought them forgiveness of sins (Eph. 1:7). These "riches of His grace" are expressed in His kindness to us in Christ Jesus. This refers to salvation. The word "kindness" (chrēstotēti) basically means what is "appropriate or suitable." (The word is also used in Rom. 2:4; 3:12 ["good"]; 11:22; 2 Cor. 6:6; Gal. 5:22; Col. 3:2; Titus 3:4.) The appropriate expression of God's love to those who are spiritually dead is to give them life—this is "the incomparable riches of His grace, expressed in His kindness."

2:8-9. These verses explain "the incomparable riches of His grace" (v. 7), expanding the parenthetical statement in verse 5, It is by grace you have been saved, and adding that the means of this salvation is through faith. Hence the basis is grace and the means is faith alone (cf. Rom. 3:22, 25; Gal. 2:16; 1 Peter 1:5). Faith is not a "work." It does not merit salvation; it is only the means by which one accepts God's free salvation.

Paul elaborated, And this is not from yourselves, it is the gift of God. Much debate has centered around the demonstrative pronoun "this" (touto). Though some think it refers back to "grace" and others to "faith," neither of these suggestions is really valid because the demonstrative pronoun is neuter whereas "grace" and "faith" are feminine. Also, to refer back to either of these words specifically seems to be redundant. Rather the neuter touto, as is common, refers to the preceding phrase or clause. (In Eph. 1:15 and 3:1 touto, "this," refers back to the preceding section.) Thus it refers back to the concept of salvation (2:4-8a), whose basis is grace and means is faith. This salvation does not have its source in man (it is "not from yourselves"), but rather, its source is God's grace for "it is the gift of God."

Verse 9 reinforces this by showing that the means is not by works since its basis is grace (Rom. 3:20, 28; 4:1-5; 11:6; Gal. 2:16; 2 Tim. 1:9; Titus 3:5), and its means is faith (Rom. 4:5). Therefore since no person can bring salvation to himself by his own efforts, no one can boast (cf. Rom. 3:27; 1 Cor. 1:29). Their boasting can only be in the Lord (1 Cor. 1:31).

2:10. This verse, beginning with For, tells why this salvation is not from man or by his works. The reason is that salvation is God's workmanship. The word "workmanship" (poiēma), used only here and in Romans 1:20 (where the NIV renders it "what has been made") denotes a work of art or a masterpiece. It differs from human "works" (ergōn) in Ephesians 2:9. Believers are God's workmanship because they have been created (a work only God can do) in Christ Jesus (cf. "in Christ Jesus" in vv. 6-7). The purpose of this creation is that believers will do good works. God's workmanship is not achieved by good works, but it is to result in good works (cf. Titus 2:14; 3:8).

In the clause, which God prepared in advance for us to do, the word "which" refers back to the "works" in the previous clause. "For us to do" is literally "in order that we might walk in them." The purpose of these prepared-in-advance works is not "to work in them" but "to walk in them." In other words, God has prepared a path of good works for believers which He will perform in and through them as they walk by faith. This does not mean doing a work for God; instead, it is God's performing His work in and through believers (cf. Phil. 2:13). This path of good works is discussed by Paul in Ephesians 4–6.

In conclusion, 2:1-10 demonstrates that though people were spiritually dead and deserving only God's wrath, God, in His marvelous grace, has provided salvation through faith. Believers are God's workmanship in whom and through whom He performs good works.

E. New position corporately (2:11-22)

Individuals who have received God's gracious salvation are not left alone but are brought into union with other believers. In 2:11-22 Paul developed this concept of the corporate unity of saved Jews and Gentiles in the church, Christ's body (cf. 1:22-23).

1. STATEMENT OF THE UNION (2:11-13)

a. Past disunion (2:11-12)

2:11. Having completed his discussion of believers as God's workmanship (vv. 1-10), Paul began this section with the strongest inferential particle (dio, therefore) to alert the Ephesians to the unenviable position of having no relationship with God. Paul commanded them to remember that formerly, before their conversions, they were Gentiles by birth and called "uncircumcised" by Jews. Jews, being circumcised physically (in the body) disparaged all non-Jews by calling them the "uncircumcised." This physical difference between Jews and Gentiles affected every area of their lives. A great social and spiritual boundary existed between them.

2:12. The Gentiles' lack of the external sign of circumcision also meant that they lacked five privileges that God had given the nation Israel. First, they were separate from (lit., "without") Christ not only personally (true also of many Jews) but also in that they had no national hope of the Messiah.

Second, they were excluded from citizenship in Israel. They did not belong to the theocratic state of Israel (cf. Rom. 9:4). The word "excluded" is apēllotriōmenoi, "alienated" or "estranged." It is used only two other times (Eph. 4:18; Col. 1:21). Though some Gentiles were admitted into Judaism as proselytes, Gentiles as a whole were excluded; they were thus alienated.

Third, they were foreigners to the covenants of the promise (cf. Eph. 3:6). They were deprived of direct participation in God's covenants and thus had no hope of future glory and blessing as Israel did. Israel's "covenants" include the Abrahamic (Gen. 12:1-3; 15:18-21; 17:1-8), the Palestinian (Deut. 28–30), the Davidic (2 Sam. 7:16; Ps. 89:1-4), and the New (Jer. 31:31-34; Ezek. 36:24-30). These covenants—all pointing to "the promise" of the Messiah and of blessings through Him—assured Israel of a national existence, a land, a King, and spiritual blessings.

Fourth, the Gentiles were without hope. Unlike Israel they had no expectation of a personal Messiah-Deliverer and the Messianic Age.

Fifth, they were without God (atheoi, "apart from God") in the world. The Gentiles were in a desperate situation. They had no meaning, hope, purpose, or direction in life.

b. Present union (2:13)

2:13. But now in Christ Jesus marks the contrast both temporally ("formerly" [v. 11] as opposed to "now") and positionally ("separate from Christ" [v. 12] as opposed to "in Christ Jesus"). The Gentiles who once were far away (cf. v. 17) from both God and the Jews (v. 12) have been brought near through the blood of Christ (cf. 1:7). They have come near to God and to the Jews by means of Christ's sacrificial death. Sin separates people from God and only Christ's atonement can remove that sin barrier.

2. EXPLANATION OF THE UNION (2:14-18)

Having stated the fact of the union of Gentiles and Jews (v. 13), Paul then explained what this involves. He discussed two things in this section: the establishment of peace between Gentile and Jewish believers, and the peace between God and the people who believe in Him.

a. Assertion of peace (2:14-16)

2:14. Christ Himself is the peace between Jewish and Gentile believers, having made the two groups one and having destroyed the barrier, the dividing wall of hostility. "Peace" is mentioned four times in three verses (vv. 14-15, 17 [twice]). Various interpretations have been given regarding this "dividing wall," which is mentioned only here in the New Testament. Some have thought it refers to the wall in the Jerusalem temple precincts that separated the Court of the Gentiles from the Court of the Jews. But this view is invalid because Paul makes no reference to the temple in Jerusalem and because this wall was still standing when Paul wrote this epistle. Some think it referred to the curtain in the Jerusalem temple between the holy place and the holy of holies. But that was a curtain, not a wall. Others have suggested it meant the "fence" around the Law mentioned by some Rabbis. But that referred more to the protection of the Law than to the hostility mentioned in this context. The structure of the Greek words suggests that the dividing wall describes not a physical barrier, but the spiritual enmity between Jews and Gentiles, which separated them. Since Christ destroyed this enmity (cf. v. 16), Jewish and Gentile believers should have no hostility.

2:15-16. Paul now described how and why this enmity came to an end. The animosity between believing Jews and Gentiles ceased because by Christ's death (in His flesh suggests His actual physical death; cf. Col. 1:22) He rendered the Law "inoperative" (katargēsas) in believers' lives. Jews and Gentiles were enemies because the former sought to keep the Law with its commandments and regulations (cf. Col. 2:14, 21-23), whereas Gentiles were unconcerned about them. This difference was like a barrier between them. But now that the Law is inoperative ("Christ is the end of the Law" [Rom. 10:4]), Jewish-Gentile hostility is gone. Some translations (e.g., KJV, NASB) give the idea that the Law was the enmity, but that is wrong; the Law was the cause of the enmity. Christ "destroyed" the barrier (hostility) by making the Law inoperative.

Christ had two purposes in ending the hostility. The first purpose was to create in Himself one new man out of the two, thus making peace. The word "new" (kainon) means new or fresh in character or quality rather than new in the sense of recent in time (neos). This "new man" (Eph. 2:15), or "new humanity," is also called "this one body" (v. 16), the church. In the church, Gentiles do not become Jews, nor do Jews become Gentiles. Instead believing Jews and Gentiles become Christians, a whole new single entity.

Christ's second purpose in destroying the enmity was to reconcile both Jewish and Gentile believers to Himself in . . . one body (cf. 3:6). This reconciliation was accomplished through the cross, by which Christ killed (put to death) the enmity between people and God. Though He was put to death, He in turn put to death the Jewish-Gentile hostility. In 2:14 the reconciliation is between Jewish and Gentile believers, and in verse 16 the reconciliation is between people and God. Reconciliation (removal of enmity) between man and God is mentioned elsewhere by Paul (Rom. 5:10; 2 Cor. 5:18-20; Col. 1:20).

b. Announcement of peace (2:17-18)

2:17-18. Verse 17 begins in Greek with "and" (untranslated in the NIV). This links verse 17 with verse 14. Not only is Christ "our peace" (v. 14), but He also preached peace. When did Christ do this? Certainly this refers to the preaching of peace by the apostles rather than Christ Himself because Christ preached almost entirely to Jews (Matt. 10:5-6; 15:24-27). Also the peace that was preached was on the basis of Christ's death rather than during His life on earth. Peace is supplied both to those who were far away (cf. Eph. 2:13), that is, Gentiles (who were without Christ and alienated from Israel and her covenants, v. 12) and to those who were near, namely, Jews (who have "the covenants of the promise," v. 12).

As a result of this message of peace both Jewish and Gentile believers have access to God the Father by one Spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 12:13). Access can mean "introduction" in the sense that Christ is a believer's "introduction" to the Father. But it seems better to understand that Christ gives believers access. The Greek word for access (prosagōgēn, "approach") is used elsewhere in the New Testament only in Romans 5:2 and Ephesians 3:12. As so often in this book the work of the Trinity is seen. Here believers have access to God the Father through the Holy Spirit because of Christ's death on the cross.

In four ways in 2:14-18 Paul emphasized that the two (Jew and Gentile) have been united: (1) "the two" (ta amphotera) are made "one" (v. 14), (2) "one new man" is created "out of the two" (v. 15), (3) "in this one body . . . both" (tous amphoterous) are reconciled (v. 16), and (4) "both" (hoi amphoteroi) "have access . . . by one Spirit" (v. 18). Nothing could be clearer than the fact that this new union replaces enmity.

3. CONSEQUENCE OF THE UNION (2:19-22)

Having stated and explained the union of Jewish and Gentile believers Paul then described the consequence of that union.

a. The fact: a new relationship (2:19)

2:19. Consequently (ara oun) you, that is, Gentile believers, are no longer foreigners (xenoi; cf. v. 12) and aliens. Believing Gentiles become fellow citizens with God's people and members of God's household. They become a part of the company of the redeemed of all ages beginning with Adam. However, this does not mean that the church inherits the blessings promised to Israel. There are three reasons for this: (1) In the context Paul was discussing the "one new man" (v. 15), the "one body" (v. 16). This does not mean that Gentiles are incorporated into Israel but that believing Jews and Gentiles are incorporated into one new "humanity." (2) Paul specifically stated that Gentiles are incorporated "with God's people" and are in "God's household" (v. 19); he did not use the word "Israel." If Paul meant that the church became "Israel," he would have named both groups, as he did in verse 11. (3) Paul explained that this new relationship is "built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets with Christ Jesus Himself as the chief Cornerstone" (v. 20). This began on the day of Pentecost, not in the Old Testament. True, Gentile believers become a part of the redeemed of all ages (v. 19). But their being incorporated with Jewish believers into the "one new man" distinctly began when the church came into being at Pentecost.

b. The cause: a new establishment (2:20-22)

Paul described the church as a great building, a holy temple in which God dwells. This figure of God dwelling in a temple comes from the Old Testament. Paul wrote of the building's foundation (v. 20), formation (v. 21), and function (v. 22).

2:20. Paul first described the foundation of the building. The reason Gentile believers are "fellow citizens" (v. 19) is that they are built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets. The "prophets" are of the New Testament era, not the Old Testament. "Prophets" follows the word "apostles" here and in 3:5 and 4:11. These men received the revelation of the mystery of the church in the present Age, which had been hidden in days past, that is, in Old Testament times (3:5).

The words "apostles and prophets" could modify "the foundation." This could mean (a) that the foundation was built by them, or (b) that the foundation came from them, or (c) that they own a foundation or, as seems best, (d) that they are the foundation. The words could be translated, "the foundation which consists of the apostles and prophets." This makes the best sense when one sees in 4:11 that the apostles and prophets were gifted men given to the church as its "foundation." Furthermore, this fits well in the present context, which states that Christ Jesus Himself is the chief Cornerstone, that is, He is part of the foundation. In ancient building practices "the chief cornerstone" was carefully placed. It was crucial because the entire building was lined up with it. The church's foundation, that is, the apostles and prophets, needed to be correctly aligned with Christ. All other believers are built on that foundation, measuring their lives with Christ.

2:21. Paul then discussed the formation of the building. In Christ the whole building is joined together. The ASV has "each several building" (rather than "the whole building"). But it is preferable to understand the Greek to refer to one whole superstructure, perhaps in several parts. The participle translated "is joined together" is synarmologoumenē, used only here and in 4:16. It denotes that the various parts of the building are skillfully fitted to each other, not haphazardly thrown together. This structure rises to become (lit., "continually grows [pres. tense] into") a holy temple in the Lord. This indicates that the church is a living and growing organism, as new believers are included in this temple's superstructure (cf. 4:15-16; 1 Peter 2:5). Both Jewish and Gentile believers are being "joined together" into this one organism labeled "a holy temple" (cf. "one new man" [Eph. 2:15] and "one body" [v. 16]). The word for temple (naos) always refers to the sanctuary within the physical structure in Jerusalem, not to the entire temple area with its open courts (hieron).

2:22. Paul now discussed the function of the temple. God places individual believers into the structure; thus it is being built together. The goal of this temple is to become a dwelling in which God lives by His Spirit. In the Old Testament God's glory was in the temple, which represented His presence with the people. In this Age God dwells in His new temple which is constructed not from inanimate materials but of living believers. The Holy Spirit indwells each individual believer (cf. John 14:17; Rom. 5:5; 8:9, 11; 1 Cor. 2:12; Gal. 3:2; 4:6; 1 John 3:24; 4:13), who is thus a "temple" (1 Cor. 6:19). But the temple in Ephesians 2:21-22 refers to the Holy Spirit's corporate "dwelling" (cf. 1 Cor. 3:16; 2 Cor. 6:16), His "temple" composed of all Jewish and Gentile believers.

"By His Spirit" is literally, "by the Spirit," as it is translated in Ephesians 3:5.

In conclusion, Paul has shown that though the Gentiles were formerly outside God's household, they are now one "new man" with Jewish believers. This new entity is like a temple that is structured on the apostles and prophets, with Christ being the chief Cornerstone; it is indwelt by God through the agency of the Holy Spirit.

F. Parenthetical expansion of the mystery (3:1-13)

Having discussed the union of Jewish and Gentile believers in the church (2:11-22), Paul was about to offer a prayer on behalf of these believers. But he stopped right in the middle of a sentence (at the end of 3:1) and digressed on the subject of the mystery of Christ. He explained this mystery and his responsibility to dispense it. Then he resumed his prayer, starting with verse 14.

1. THE INTRODUCTION (3:1)

3:1. The words for this reason (also used in v. 14) specifically point back to 2:11-22, which dealt with the Jewish and Gentile believers being raised to a new plane. But they also more generally refer back to all the first part of the epistle in which Paul discussed God's grace to the Gentiles. The words I, Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus for the sake of you Gentiles, refer to Paul's imprisonment in Rome because of his service for Christ (cf. 4:1; 2 Tim. 1:8; Phile. 1, 9), and more particularly because of his ministry as the apostle to the Gentiles (2 Tim. 1:11-12). Because of his faithfulness to the stewardship God had given him among the Gentiles (Eph. 3:2) bitter Jewish opposition arose against him. This resulted in his being attacked in Jerusalem and put on trial in Caesarea and Rome.

2. THE MYSTERY (3:2-6)

a. The dispensation of God's grace (3:2)

3:2. Having broken off in the middle of a sentence in verse 1, Paul began one new long sentence that ended with verse 13 (one of eight lengthy sentences in Eph.; see comments on 1:3-14). It is a conditional sentence with 3:2 serving as its introduction (Surely in v. 2 is lit., "If indeed") and verse 13 as its conclusion. Paul wrote of the administration of God's grace that was given to him (v. 2) and concluded by asking them not to be discouraged over his imprisonment in Rome (v. 13). The details of his message and ministry are in verses 3-12. Probably the NIV used "surely" because the wording implies certainty that the Ephesians had heard of his responsibility. Now he spoke of it in greater detail. The word "administration" (oikonomia; cf. v. 9) has the sense of stewardship or a trust to be dispensed (in 1 Cor. 9:17 oikonomia is trans. "trust" and in Col. 1:25 it is rendered "commission"). Paul was to administer "God's grace" (cf. Eph. 3:7), which was given to him. He elaborated on this in verses 3-6. This grace was given to him to dispense to the Gentiles (v. 1) at Ephesus (for you), because he was an apostle to the Gentiles (Gal. 2:7; Eph. 3:8).

b. The revelation of the mystery (3:3-5)

3:3. That is further explains that the mystery is the "grace" mentioned in verse 2. That mystery (a truth hitherto unknown) is not defined till verse 6. The mystery's disclosure was given to Paul by revelation, which in fact he had already written briefly about, not in another epistle, but in this one (in 2:11-22).

3:4. The Ephesian Christians would be able to understand his insight (synesin; cf. Col. 1:9; 2:2) into the mystery of Christ (cf. Col. 1:27; 2:2) by reading what he had "already written." Paul's next words (Eph. 3:5-6) would further enhance their understanding of it. His "insight" was not his own discovery; it was revealed by God.

3:5. Paul then revealed the time when the mystery was disclosed. The mystery was not made known to men in other generations as it has . . . been revealed. This statement has caused some debate among Bible students. The problem hinges on the comparative adverb "as" (hōs). Some take this as restrictive (a comparison of degree), which would mean that the mystery was partially revealed in the Old Testament but is now fully revealed in the Church Age. The thought of the verse should be, God has not revealed this mystery in the past to the extent He has now. Others see the adverb "as" to be descriptive (a comparison of kind), which means that no revelation of this mystery was given in the Old Testament but that this mystery was revealed for the first time in the New Testament.

The second view is a better interpretation for five reasons: (1) Though the restrictive sense for "as" is more common, the descriptive sense is used sometimes (e.g., Peter said that the disciples were not drunk "as" the Jews thought [Acts 2:15]). (In fact, sometimes "as" could be trans. "because," e.g., the second "as" in 2 Tim. 1:3.)

(2) The context supports this view for Paul wrote that this mystery was hidden in the past (Eph. 3:9).

(3) Colossians 1:26, parallel to Ephesians 3:5, does not use the comparative adverb "as," but clearly states that the mystery was "kept hidden for ages . . . but is now" (nun de) made manifest to the saints.

(4) The position of the temporal adverb "now" (nun) agrees with Colossians 1:26 in marking the contrast between the two Ages. In the past the mystery was not known but "now" it is. This is substantiated by the same temporal adverb (nun) in Ephesians 3:10: "The manifold wisdom of God" (which is the mystery) is "now" to be made known to the heavenly hosts. If the heavenly hosts did not know of the mystery in the Old Testament, how would people have found out about it? Since the heavenly hosts learned of the mystery through the church (which did not exist before Pentecost) certainly people in the Old Testament did not know.

(5) "Revealed" means "to uncover or unveil" something that has previously been completely covered or hidden. Therefore it would be wrong to say the mystery was partially uncovered in the Old Testament.

Those who hold the first view ("as" is a comparison of degree) argue that passages such as Isaiah 2:1-4 and 61:5-6 indicate that Gentiles received God's blessings along with Israel. However, these passages speak of the Millennium, not of the concept of Gentiles and Jews being in one body, the church.

This mystery was revealed by the Spirit (cf. Eph. 2:22), and its recipients were God's holy apostles and prophets (cf. 2:20; 4:11). Some have promoted the idea that this revelation was given to Paul, but 3:5 explicitly states that it was given to the apostles and prophets and that Paul was one who was to disseminate it.

c. The constitution of the mystery (3:6)

3:6. Paul now defined the mystery. In three compound nouns he stated that the Gentile believers with the Jewish believers are (a) heirs together (i.e., "fellow heirs," 2:19, KJV) of God's riches (1:3-14), (b) are of the same body (cf. 2:16; syssōma occurs only in 3:6 in the NT), and (c) are sharers together in the promise (the messianic promise; cf. 2:12; Gal. 3:29) in Christ Jesus. (See comments on Eph. 2:19 and 3:5 regarding the relationship of the church and Israel.)

Thus the mystery is not something mysterious, but is a sacred secret hidden in Ages past but now revealed. This is made possible through the gospel: believing Jews and Gentiles are in one body. The mystery is not that Gentiles would be saved, for the Old Testament gave evidence of that, but rather that believing Jews and Gentiles are joined together. That was a revolutionary concept for Jews and Gentiles alike!

3. THE MINISTRY (3:7-12)

Having described the mystery (vv. 2-6), Paul now discussed his ministry of dispensing this mystery to the Gentiles.

a. The placement into the ministry (3:7-8a)

3:7-8a. I became a servant of this gospel (cf. "gospel" in v. 6) denotes Paul's rendering of service (cf. Col. 1:23). The word "servant" (diakonos) stresses not the idea of subjection (as does doulos, "slave") but the idea of service or serving, as one who is a waiter (John 2:5, 9). This service has its basis in the gift of God's grace (cf. Eph. 3:2) given to Paul through the working of His power (cf. 1:19; Col. 1:29). The Greek more clearly implies that Paul's service was initiated by "the gift of God's grace" and continues by "the working (energeian) of His power" (dynameōs). Ministering this grace—by God's strength, not his own—was Paul's responsibility though he considered himself less than the least of all God's people. ("God's people" renders hagiōn, "saints"; cf. Eph. 1:1, 15). This denotes Paul's deep humility in view of God's incomparably generous grace.

b. The performance of the ministry (3:8b-9)

3:8b-9. Two infinitives state Paul's functioning in this ministry. First, he was to preach to the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ. Second, he was to make plain to everyone the administration of this mystery. Though Paul ministered to both Jews and Gentiles (cf. comments on Acts 9:15), he was especially designated as the apostle "to the Gentiles" (Rom. 11:13; Gal. 1:16; 2:7-8).

The Gentiles can know something of the riches of Christ's blessings (cf. "the riches of God's grace" in Eph. 1:7 and 2:7 and the richness of His mercy in 2:4). Yet Christ's fathomless spiritual wealth can never be fully comprehended (anexichniaston, lit., "not capable of being traced by footprints"; used only here and in Rom. 11:33). Paul was to disclose publicly to everyone, not just the Ephesians (cf. Eph. 3:2) this stewardship of God's sacred secret (vv. 3-4, 6). This secret had been hidden in God (cf. v. 5), the Creator of the universe. Even before creating all things God had in mind this wonderful truth as part of His eternal plan (cf. 1:4, 11).

c. The purpose of the ministry (3:10-12)

3:10-12. The purpose (hina) of Paul's ministry was that . . . the manifold wisdom (sophia) of God might be made known to the rulers and authorities in the heavenly realms. In classical Greek the adjective "manifold" (polypoikilos) referred to the beauty of an embroidered pattern or the variety of colors in flowers (cf. poikilēs, "in its various forms," in 1 Peter 4:10). The "manifold wisdom of God" does not refer to redemption as such but rather to the new relationship between believing Jews and Gentiles in one body. The medium by which this wisdom is communicated is the church; the recipients are the angelic hosts "in the heavenly realms" (cf. Eph. 1:3). These "rulers and authorities" refer to both good and evil angels as seen in 6:12 (cf. 1:21). As the angelic hosts witness the church, they must admit that having Jews and Gentiles in one body is evidence of God's wisdom.

This mystery—that both believing Jews and Gentiles are in one body (3:6)—was revealed to the apostles and prophets (v. 5) and was disseminated by Paul (vv. 7-9). Its purpose was that angelic beings might see God's variegated wisdom. This whole plan was in accord with God's eternal intent which He accomplished in Christ Jesus our Lord (v. 11). This means either that God is now carrying out His eternal purpose, or that He carried it out (accomplished it) in Christ about 2,000 years ago. The latter view is preferable because (a) "accomplished" is in the past tense not the present or perfect tense, and (b) the inclusion of believing Jews and Gentiles in one body was in fact accomplished by Christ's death.

Through faith in Christ Christians have the right of address (freedom, parrēsian, lit., "courage, boldness"; cf. Heb. 3:6; 4:16; 10:19, 35) and the right of access (approach, prosagōgēn; cf. Eph. 2:18; Rom. 5:2) to God with . . . confidence. Though God's eternal plan was accomplished in Christ nearly two millennia ago, believers can still address God and go to Him freely and confidently.

4. THE INJUNCTION (3:13)

3:13. This verse marks the conclusion of the sentence begun in verse 2. If the Ephesians truly understood "the administration of God's grace that was given to" Paul (v. 2), they should not . . . be discouraged because of his sufferings for them. His sufferings were for their gain and glory. If Paul had not dispensed to the Gentiles the stewardship of God's grace, then Jews would not have been hostile to him and he would not have been imprisoned. His preaching brought salvation to the Gentiles, but it incurred the wrath of many Jews on him. However, many others became members of the church, Christ's body, and this was their glory.

G. Prayer for strengthened love (3:14-21)

Having stated that positionally the Gentile and Jewish believers are "one new man" (2:15), which is the body of Christ, Paul now prayed that they may be united experientially. He desired that they might genuinely know and experience Christ's love and thus exhibit it toward each other.

1. THE APPROACH TO PRAYER (3:14-15)

3:14-15. Verses 14-19 in the Greek are another of Paul's eight long sentences in Ephesians (see comments on 1:3-14). For this reason is an expression that is repeated from verse 1 when Paul was about to pray. He then broke off before finishing the sentence in order to elaborate on the mystery, the body of Christ, and on his ministry of dispensing the mystery. Paul's kneeling in prayer is one of several postures for praying (standing, kneeling, lying prostrate) seen in the Scriptures. The shorter reading, the Father, is preferred over the longer one found in the KJV, "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." The expression from whom His whole family means that all Creation including angels and humans are one family under the fatherhood of God. But this is problematic grammatically for the Greek has no pronoun ("His") before the word "whole." This also has problems theologically. A better translation both grammatically and theologically is "from whom every family" (cf. ASV, NASB, RSV). Paul was not saying that God is the Father of all but rather that He is the Prototype of all fatherhood. "Father" is derived from God, not man. He is the first Father, the only One with "underived" fatherhood. Thus every human family derives its name, that is, exists as a family with a father, because of Him. It is to this Father that Paul prayed.

2. THE APPEAL IN PRAYER (3:16-19)

Though the sentence begins in verse 14 and ends in verse 19, Paul's request begins in verse 16. In this prayer he asked for only one thing.

a. Petition stated: to be strengthened in the inner man (3:16-17a)

3:16-17a. The first part of Paul's request is that God, out of (kata, lit., "according to the standard of") His glorious riches (cf. 1:7, 18; 2:4, 7; 3:8) might strengthen (krataiōthēnai, "be strong to overcome resistance," cf. kratous in 1:19 and kratei in 6:10) believers with power (dynamis, dynamic living power; cf. 3:20) through the Holy Spirit in their inner being[s] (lit., "in the inner man," i.e., believers' innermost beings). The result of this is that through faith Christ may dwell in believers' hearts, that is, their whole personalities. "Dwell" (katoikēsai) refers not to the beginning of Christ's indwelling at the moment of salvation. Instead it denotes the desire that Christ may, literally, "be at home in," that is, at the very center of or deeply rooted in, believers' lives. They are to let Christ become the dominating factor in their attitudes and conduct.

b. Purpose stated: to comprehend Christ's love and to be filled unto God's fullness (3:17b-19)

3:17b-19. Paul continued his prayer by repeating his request that Christ be the center of believers' lives. He stated this in a mixed metaphor of biological and architectural terminology: being rooted (like a plant) and established (like a building) in love. The participles "being rooted and established" are in the perfect tense, indicating a past action with continuing results. They could be translated "having been rooted and established." The purpose of the request is that they may have power (exischysēte, "have inherent strength"), together with all the saints, to grasp how wide and long and high and deep is the love of Christ. These measurements most likely describe not the thoroughness of comprehension but the immensity of the thing to be comprehended.

Interestingly once again—as in (a) 1:13-14; (b) 1:17; (c) 2:18; (d) 2:22; and (e) 3:4-5—Paul spoke of the Trinity: the Father (v. 14), the Spirit (v. 16), and the Son (v. 17).

The content of this comprehension is to know experientially the love of Christ that supersedes all knowledge (cf. Phil. 4:7). The more a Christian knows about Christ, the more amazed he is at Christ's love for him.

The final purpose is that you may be filled to the measure of all the fullness of God. The KJV and RSV translations, "that you may be filled with all the fullness of God," wrongly imply that the whole fullness of God can be contained in a believer's life. But this ignores the Greek preposition eis which denotes a goal; this is translated accurately in the NIV: "to the measure." The fullness of the Godhead is only in Christ, and only through Him is a believer made complete (Col. 2:9-10). Though in Christ this divine fullness is ideally a believer's already, Paul prayed that it might be experientially realized in each one (cf. Eph. 4:13). Experiencing God's moral excellence and perfection causes Jewish and Gentile believers to love each other. Positionally they are one in Christ; experientially they are to love each other as one in Him.

3. THE ASCRIPTION OF PRAISE (3:20-21)

3:20-21. Paul closed this prayer with a doxology. He praised God who is able to do far more than one could ask or imagine, according to the standard of His power (dynamin; cf. v. 16; 1:19) that is at work (energoumenēn; cf. 1:19) within us. No human or angel (cf. 3:10) would ever think that Jews and Gentiles could function together in one body. But with God's power of love in each believer's life, Paul was confident that Jewish and Gentile believers can function and love one another. This is astounding and though it is not naturally possible, God is able to accomplish it. Paul therefore ascribed to God glory which is to be manifest in the church, where the miracle of love will occur, and in Christ Jesus, who made the union of Jewish and Gentile believers possible.

Praise to Him for this accomplishment is to continue throughout eternity (cf. Rom. 11:36; 2 Tim. 4:18). This doxology serves as a fitting conclusion not only to this prayer but also to this book's first three chapters.

II. The Conduct of the Church (chaps. 4–6)

After presenting doctrinal content in the first three chapters, Paul then gave in chapters 4–6 some practical applications of those doctrines. His repeated emphasis on a believer's "walk" (peripateō) is the hallmark of this section. The NIV translates "walk" as "live."

A. Walking in unity (4:1-16)

Having explained the unity of Jewish and Gentile believers, and having prayed for that unity through mutually experiencing Christ's love, Paul now showed how they were to walk in the unity of that body. This is accomplished by gifted people given to the church by Christ so that the body of Christ might grow up in all areas.

1. THE BASIS OF UNITY (4:1-6)

a. Exhortation to unity (4:1-3)

4:1. Paul exhorted them to walk (live a life) worthy of their calling. The NIV gives the impression that this walk should be on the basis that Paul was a prisoner for the Lord. However, the Greek does not connote this. Rather it is, "Therefore (rather than then) I, the prisoner of the Lord (as already stated in 3:1), beseech you to walk worthy of your calling." Thus on the basis of what Paul wrote in chapters 1–3 he implored them to walk worthily. The word "worthy" (axiōs) means "equal weight"; one's calling and conduct should be in balance. "The calling" refers not only to believers' salvation (cf. Rom. 1:5-6; 1 Cor. 1:9) but also to their union in one body. Therefore a Christian's conduct concerns both his personal life and his responsibility to other believers in the church.

4:2-3. Believers' attitudes are also important. Paul listed three virtues that are to enhance a believer's walk. The first of these is humility. In Greek culture, humility was thought of as a vice, to be practiced only by slaves. But Paul stated that saints should be completely humble in their daily walks. This is the opposite of pride. On the other hand Christians should not promote false humility, but should recognize who they are in God's program (cf. John 3:30; Rom. 12:3). This virtue is listed first because of Paul's emphasis on unity (pride promotes disunity; humility promotes unity) and to counteract their past pride, so as to facilitate obedience to and dependence on God. Christ was the supreme example of humility (Phil. 2:6-8).

Second, a believer is to be gentle or "meek" (prautētos; cf. the adverb of this word in Gal. 6:1; 2 Tim. 2:25 and the noun in Gal. 5:23; Col. 3:12; 1 Peter 3:16). This is the opposite of self-assertion, rudeness, and harshness. It suggests having one's emotions under control. But it does not suggest weakness. It is the mean between one who is angry all the time and one who is never angry. One who is controlled by God is angry at the right time but never angry at the wrong time. Moses was known as the meekest of all men (Num. 12:3, KJV). Yet he got angry when Israel sinned against God (Ex. 32). Christ was meek and humble in heart (Matt. 11:29). Yet He became angry because some Jews were using the temple as a place for thieves (Matt. 21:12-13).

Third, believers should exhibit patience (makrothymias). Patience is the spirit which never gives up for it endures to the end even in times of adversity (James 5:10). It is the self-restraint which does not hastily retaliate a wrong (cf. Gal. 5:22; Col. 1:11; 3:12; 2 Tim. 4:2).

Attitudes of humility, gentleness, and patience foster unity among Christians. Having stated these three virtues, Paul then stated the manner in which they are to be carried out in one's conduct: bearing with one another in love and making every effort (the Gr. has a participle, "making every diligent effort") to keep the unity of the Spirit through the bond of peace. Christians are not to make unity but to keep or guard what God made in creating the "one new man" (Eph. 2:15-16). They are to keep this unity "through the bond" which consists of "peace." Concern for peace will mean that Christians will lovingly tolerate each other, even when they have differences.

b. Elements of unity (4:4-6)

4:4. Without a conjunction Paul listed the seven elements of unity centered on the three Persons of the Trinity. These provide the basis for the spirit of unity that should exist in the body of believers. One body refers to the universal church, all believers (1:23; 2:16; 3:6). One Spirit is the Holy Spirit who indwells the church (2:22). The words, just as you were called to one hope when you were called, indicate that all believers have a common hope regarding their future with God (cf. 1 Peter 1:3; 3:15), a confidence that began at the time they were "called" to salvation (Eph. 1:4, 18; 2:7; 4:1).

4:5. One Lord (cf. Rom. 10:12) refers to Christ, the Head of the church (Eph. 1:22-23; Col. 1:18). One faith speaks, most likely, not of objective faith, that is, the body of truth believed by Christians (as in Acts 6:7; 1 Tim. 3:9; 4:1, 6; Jude 3) but subjective faith which is exercised by all Christians in Christ their Lord (cf. Col. 2:7). One baptism may refer to water baptism, the outward symbol of the inward reality, or it may refer to a believer's identification with Christ and His death (Rom. 6:1-11; Gal. 3:27). It seems unlikely that this refers to the latter, Spirit baptism, because it is in the triad of elements that pertain to Christ, the second Person of the Trinity. Also nothing in the broader context (Eph. 4:1-16) suggests that this is the Spirit's baptism. If it refers to water baptism, then the idea is that by this single act believers demonstrate their spiritual unity.

4:6. One God and Father of all who is over all and through all and in all refers to God the Father and His relationship to all believers. The fourfold use of "all" refers to "all believers," not "all mankind." Certainly these characteristics are not common to all people. God is the Father "of" all who believe; they are His children (John 1:12; Gal. 3:26). And He is "over" all them as their Sovereign. He lives "through" them and manifests Himself "in" them.

Two observations should be noted about this list of seven unifying elements (Eph. 4:4-6). First, the Trinity is an integral part of the list. The one body of believers is vitalized by one Spirit, so all believers have one hope. That body is united to its one Lord (Christ) by each member's one act of faith, and its identity with Him is depicted by one baptism. One God, the Father, is supreme over all, operative through all, and resides in all. All seven components are united in the Trinity.

Second, the order in the listing of the three Persons of the Trinity is interesting. Paul began with the Holy Spirit rather than with the Father. The reason for this is that in the preceding verses he was discussing "the unity of the Spirit" (v. 3) and in verses 7-13 he discussed the gifts of the Spirit. The same order of Trinity Members is given in 1 Corinthians 12:4-6, where Paul also discussed the gifts of the Spirit.

2. THE PRESERVATION OF UNITY (4:7-16)

After discussing the basis of unity (vv. 1-6), Paul now analyzed the means of preserving that unity (cf. "keep the unity," v. 3) of the body by means of the various gifts.

a. The distribution of the gifts (4:7-11)

4:7-8. Previously Paul discussed the unity of the entire church (vv. 1-6). Now he discussed the diversity within the church (cf. unity in 1 Cor. 12:12-13, and diversity in 1 Cor. 12:4-11, 14-20). From God each believer receives grace or enablement (cf. Eph. 3:2, 7-8) as Christ apportioned it (lit., "according to the measure [metron, also used in 4:13, 16]; of the gift of Christ," i.e., the gift He is pleased to give). Each believer is to function in Christ's body by God's enablement, proportionate to the gift (spiritual ability) bestowed on him, no more and no less. This means that a variety of gifts will be exercised, as seen in verse 11; Romans 12:4-6; and 1 Corinthians 12:4-6. Furthermore, since each believer receives "grace," clergy and laity—to use a common present-day distinction—are on the same level in exercising their gifts.

Ephesians 4:8 includes a quotation from the Old Testament, which confirms God's giving of gifts. Most think it quotes Psalm 68:18 with five minor and two major changes. The two major variations are the change from the second to the third person, and the change of direction from having received gifts from men to the giving of gifts to men. However, it is better to think that Paul was not quoting one particular verse of the psalm but rather that he was summarizing all of Psalm 68, which has many words similar to those in Psalm 68:18. The essence of the psalm is that a military victor has the right to give gifts to those who are identified with him. Christ, having captivated sinful people by redeeming them, is Victor and gives them as gifts to the church. Whereas Romans 12 and 1 Corinthians 12 speak of gifts given to believers, Ephesians 4:7 speaks more of gifted believers given to the church (cf. v. 11).

4:9-10. Verses 9-11 serve as a commentary on two words of the quotation in verse 8, namely, ascended (vv. 9-10) and "gave" (v. 11). In verses 9-10 Paul commented on the words He ascended. These two verses are parenthetical in thought because the issue of the passage is the giving of gifts. Before Christ could ascend He had to descend. What is meant by to the lower, earthly regions, literally, "into the lower parts of earth"? The genitive "of" can be taken in three ways: (1) "Into the lower parts, namely, the earth" (a genitive of apposition). This would refer to Christ's incarnation, His "descent" to the earth. (2) "Into the parts lower than the earth" (a genitive of comparison). This would mean that Christ descended into hades between His death and resurrection. (3) "Into the lower parts which belong to the earth" (a genitive of possession). This would refer to Christ's death and His burial in the grave. The third view best fits the context because in His death Christ had victory over sin and redeemed those who would be given as "gifts" to the church.

Christ's ascent above the heavens, in order to fill the whole universe probably refers to His regal relationship with the whole world, from which position He bestows gifts as He wills because of His work on the Cross. This fits well with 1:23, which speaks of Christ imparting all the fullness of His blessings to the church and to the universe. Christ, who embodies the fullness of the Godhead (Col. 2:9), fills the universe and is Head over it (cf. Col. 1:18).

4:11. This verse is a commentary on the second part of the quotation in verse 8, namely, Christ's giving gifts to Christians. The gifts to the church are gifted people. The subject He is emphatic in the Greek to denote that Christ Himself gives the gifted people. Five kinds of gifted people are listed in the predicate accusative, so the NIV correctly translates, gave some to be. The first two, apostles and prophets, were already mentioned in 2:20 and 3:5 as the foundational gifts to the church. The apostles include the Twelve, who had the office of apostleship by virtue of being with Christ (Acts 1:21-22) and having been appointed by Him (which would also include Paul; 1 Cor. 15:8-9; Gal. 1:1; 2:6-9). But "apostles" also included others who were recognized as apostles, such as James (1 Cor. 15:7; Gal.

1:19), Barnabas (Acts 14:4, 14; 1 Cor. 9:6), Andronicus and Junias (Rom. 16:7), possibly Silas and Timothy (1 Thes. 1:1; 2:7), and Apollos (1 Cor. 4:6, 9). This latter group had the gift of apostleship but not the apostolic "office" as did the Twelve and Paul. Apostles, then, were those who carried the gospel message with God's authority. "Apostle" means "one sent as an authoritative delegate."

New Testament prophets were gifts to the church to provide edification, exhortation, and comfort (1 Cor. 14:3). They probably revealed God's will to the church when the biblical canon was incomplete. Since the apostles and prophets were foundational, they did not exist after the first generation of believers.

Evangelists were those engaged in spreading the gospel, similar to present-day missionaries. Pastors and teachers are listed together because they are governed by one article ("the" occurs before "pastors" but not before "teachers") and because the word "and" (kai) differs from the other "and's" (de) in the verse. This may imply that these are two kinds of gifted people whose ministries are among settled congregations (rather than itinerant ministries like those of the apostles and evangelists). More likely, they refer to two characteristics of the same person who is pastoring believers (by comforting and guiding) while at the same time instructing them in God's ways (overseers or elders are to be able to teach; 1 Tim. 3:2; Titus 1:9).

b. The intention of the gifts (4:12-16)

The purpose of the gifted believers (vv. 7-11) is to equip other believers for the ministry so as to give them stability doctrinally and practically and thus lead them to mutual edification. Like several other passages in Ephesians (1:3-14, 15-23; 2:1-7; 3:1-13, 14-19; 4:1-7; 6:14-20), 4:11-16 is one long sentence in Greek.

4:12. The purpose of the gifted men is to prepare God's people for works of service. More literally, this purpose is "for the perfecting or equipping (katartismon; cf. the verb katartizō in Matt. 4:21, 'mending' or 'preparing' nets; in Gal. 6:1, 'restore' for proper use; cf. 2 Cor. 13:11; Heb. 13:21) of the saints unto the work of the ministry" (diakonias). Gifted people (Eph. 4:11) are to minister the Word to others so that they in turn are readied to get involved in ministering to others (cf. 2 Tim. 2:2). The goal of all this is the building up or edifying of the body of Christ (cf. Eph. 4:16). This shows that all saints and not just a few leaders should be involved in the "ministry." All saints are gifted (v. 7) to serve others spiritually.

4:13. Gifted people are to minister till all the church attains (reach translates katantēsōmen, used in Acts of travelers arriving at their destinations) the three goals, each introduced by the Greek preposition (eis, "unto"): literally, (1) "unto the unity of the faith (cf. Eph. 4:5) and full knowledge (epignōseōs; cf. 1:17) of the Son of God," (2) "unto a mature man," and (3) "unto the measure (metron; cf. 4:7, 16) of the stature of the fullness of Christ." As each believer functions in accord with the gift(s) Christ has given him (v. 7) the body as a whole enjoys unity (cf. vv. 3-6) and becomes more spiritually mature (cf. v. 15), more like Jesus Christ in all His fullness (cf. 1:23; 3:19).

4:14-16. Here Paul expressed the ultimate purpose, or perhaps better, the result (hina) of gifted people equipping saints to serve the Lord and others. Negatively, believers should not be like immature infants who are easily swayed and confused, like waves being tossed back and forth (cf. Luke 8:24; James 1:6) and blown here and there (lit., "whirled around," a violent swinging that makes one dizzy) by every gust of wind of teaching . . . by the cunning, better, "trickery" (kybeia, lit., "dice-playing") of men in their deceitful scheming (panourgia, also used in Luke 20:23; 1 Cor. 3:19; 2 Cor. 4:2; 11:3), moving toward (pros indicates goal) a system of error. False teachers cause this kind of confusion regarding the truth in order to try to bring believers into their erroneous schemes. In contrast (de, Eph. 4:15) Paul stated positively that by speaking the truth in love (lit., "truthing in love," which has the idea of maintaining truth in love in both speech and life) believers may grow up into Him with reference to all things. Christ, then, is the Source of a believer's growth and also the Aim and Goal of his growth (cf. v. 13). From the Head (cf. 1:22; 5:23; Col. 1:18) the body derives its whole capacity for growth and activity (Eph. 4:16). Each member of the body is joined (2:21) by being carefully fitted together, and each member is held or brought together by means of every supporting ligament (cf. Col. 2:19) according to the standard (kata, with the accusative) of the measured working (metrō, from metron) of each individual. This causes the body of Christ to grow (cf. Eph. 4:15) and build itself up (cf. v. 12) in love. The phrase "in love" occurs three times (vv. 2, 15-16), thus pointing to the way unity is maintained. Significantly the word "measure" (metron) is also used three times in this context (vv. 7, 13, 16). Each believer is to function in Christ's body by God's enabling grace in accord with the measure of the gift Christ bestowed on him (v. 7). When each believer accomplishes that measure, then the church grows properly (v. 16), coming ultimately to the measure of Christlikeness (v. 13). Stunted growth comes when one does not allow his or others' gifts to function.

The preservation of unity is the responsibility of God's gifted people in the church (vv. 7-16). In this unity of structure is variety of function. Paul emphasized body growth, not self-growth. Each individual contributes to this unified growth as he allows his particular gift(s) to function.

B. Walking in holiness (4:17-32)

Believers are to walk in holiness as well as unity. Paul first showed negatively how a believer should not walk; then he gave the positive aspects of Christian conduct.

1. PRESENTATION OF THE OLD MAN (4:17-19)

a. His nature (4:17-18)

4:17-18. The Ephesian believers who were Gentiles (2:1-2, 11-12) were not to walk as the Gentiles do, or as implied, as they had once walked. Gentiles walked in the futility of their thinking. The word for "futility" (mataiotēti; cf. Rom. 1:21) suggests being void of useful aim or goal. (This noun is used only here and in Rom. 8:20 [of Creation] and 2 Peter 2:18 [of words]. The verb mataioō is used in Rom. 1:21, "their thinking became futile.") Unbelieving Gentiles failed to attain the true purpose of the mind, namely, to receive God's revelation which would guide them in their conduct. Since their minds could not receive God's revelation, their understanding was darkened (Rom. 1:21; 2 Cor. 4:4), being separated (lit., "alienated"; cf. Eph. 2:12) from the life of (that comes from) God. Their alienation is because of their ignorance of God (cf. 1 Peter 1:14); and this is because of the hardening of their hearts, their being insensitive to God and His ways.

b. His practice (4:19)

4:19. Because of their lack of sensitivity these Gentiles gave themselves over ("abandoned themselves"; cf. Rom. 1:24, 26, 28) to sensuality (aselgeia, "licentiousness"; cf. Mark 7:22; Rom. 13:13; 2 Cor. 12:21; Gal. 5:19; 1 Peter 4:3; 2 Peter 2:2, 7, 18; Jude 4), a life without concern for personal standards or social sanctions. Their purpose (eis) was to practice every kind of impurity, with a continual lust for more (lit., "in greed"), indulging in self-gratification without regard for others. This is a horrible picture of sinful people's selfish and perverted ways.

2. PRESENTATION OF THE NEW MAN (4:20-32)

a. His position (4:20-24)

4:20-24. In contrast (de) with the "old man" (vv. 17-19) believers did not come to know (lit., "learn") Christ that way. Their minds are no longer darkened; their lives are no longer alienated from God; their hearts are no longer hardened and impure. Christ is the Subject (you heard of Him) and the Sphere (you were taught in Him) of a believer's learning. This teaching and learning is in accordance with the truth, because He is the Truth (John 14:6). The content of this learning is twofold: (1) A believer has put off the old self which is being corrupted by its deceitful desires (cf. Eph. 4:17-19). Self-centered lusts are deceitful because they promise joy but fail to provide it. (2) He has put on the new self which has been created to be like God in true righteousness and holiness, which is based on truth (v. 24). This truth contrasts with the deceitfulness of lustful living (cf. vv. 14-15). Believers have been made new in the attitude of their minds; they are no longer futile in their thinking, darkened in their understanding, and ignorant (vv. 18-19). These are not commands, for the construction here (and in the parallel passage in Col. 3:9-10) is not imperative. They are facts that believers have learned, as is also seen in Romans 6:2-10 and 2 Corinthians 5:17. Believers are new people in Christ, and hence they can no longer live as Gentiles live, as the next exhortations state.

b. His practice (4:25-32)

Each of the following five exhortations about a believer's conduct has three parts: (1) a negative command, (2) a positive command, and (3) the reason for the positive command.

4:25. Having put away falsehood, believers are to tell the truth (cf. v. 15). Truth is conforming one's words to reality. The reason for this exhortation is that believers are all members of one another in Christ's body, the church (cf. vv. 4, 16).

4:26-27. While believers may at times be legitimately angry (with righteous anger against sin; cf. John 2:13-16), they are not to sin. The way to prevent such sin is to "keep short accounts," dealing with the anger before the sun goes down. The reason is that the devil would like to intensify a Christian's righteous anger against sin, causing it to become sin itself. This then gives the devil a foothold (lit., "a place"), an opportunity for leading that Christian into further sin. Then anger begins to control the believer rather than the believer controlling his anger.

4:28. Christians are not to steal, but are to work in order to give to the needy. A thief takes from others for his own benefit, whereas a believer is to work, doing something useful (agathon, "beneficial"; cf. v. 29) with his own hands for the purpose of sharing with those in need. This is true Christian charity. Work has many benefits: it provides for a person's material needs, it gives him something useful to do (something that is beneficial to himself and others), and it enables him to help others materially.

4:29-30. Believers are not to speak unwholesome (sapros, "rotten") words (cf. 5:4), but helpful (agathos, "good, beneficial"; cf. 4:28) words for the purpose of edification. Good words benefit (lit., "give grace" or enablement to) the hearers. One's words are to be true and pure and also are to contribute to benefiting others. Besides one's conscience, the Holy Spirit also helps guard a believer's speech. The fact that the Holy Spirit may be grieved points to His personality. His seal of a believer remains until the day of redemption, the time that a believer receives his new body (cf. 1:14; Phil. 3:20-21).

4:31-32. Believers are to get rid of the six vices of bitterness, rage (thymos, "outbursts of anger"), anger (orgē, "settled feeling of anger"), brawling (kraugē, "shouting or clamor"), slander (blasphēmia), and malice (kakia, "ill will, wickedness"). Several of these vices are also listed in Colossians 3:8. The positive commands are three: (1) be kind (chrēstoi, lit., "what is suitable or fitting to a need"); (2) be compassionate (eusplanchnoi; used elsewhere in the NT only in 1 Peter 3:8; cf. splanchnoi, "inner emotions of affection," in 2 Cor. 6:12; 7:15; Phil. 1:8; 2:1; Col. 3:12; Phile. 7, 12, 20; 1 John 3:17); (3) be forgiving (lit., "being gracious," charizomenoi, the participle from the verb charizomai, "to give freely" or "to give graciously as a favor"). The reason for these positive commands is that in Christ God is kind (Eph. 2:7), compassionate (Mark 1:41), and gracious (Rom. 8:32) to believers.

C. Walking in love (5:1-6)

In applying his doctrines, Paul now for the third time used the term for "walk" (peripateō, trans. "live" in the NIV; 4:1, 17; 5:2). This is thus the third section in his discussion on the conduct of believers. God's children are to walk (live) in unity, in holiness, and in love.

1. THE POSITIVE: TO LOVE OTHERS (5:1-2)

5:1-2. Each Christian should be an imitator of God because he is God's child. As a child imitates his parents, so ought a believer to imitate God (cf. Matt. 5:48; Luke 6:36).

The and should be translated "that is" in order to convey the idea that Ephesians 5:2 explains how a believer is to imitate God: by walking in love. The supreme example of this love is Christ's love for His own—He loved us; seen graphically in His sacrificing His life on behalf of those who would believe. He willingly gave Himself up (cf. v. 25; John 10:11, 15, 17-18; Gal. 1:4; Heb. 9:14). This offering was a fragrance pleasing (and thus acceptable) to God (cf. Lev. 1:17; 3:16; Isa. 53:10). (The idea of fragrant offerings is also spoken of in 2 Cor. 2:15-16; Phil. 4:18.) Christians can imitate

God by loving others, even to the point of death if necessary (1 John 3:16).

2. THE NEGATIVE: TO ABSTAIN FROM EVIL (5:3-6)

a. Responsibility: to abstain from evil practices (5:3-4)

5:3. The self-centered vices in conduct and speech (vv. 3-4) are the opposite of the self-sacrificing love spoken of in verses 1-2. Since these vices portray selfishness and unconcern for others, a believer should not have even a hint of these sins in his life. Sexual immorality (porneia), any kind of impurity, and greed are improper for (lit., "should not be named among") believers. God's holy people is literally, "saints" (hagiois; cf. 1:1, 15).

5:4. Improprieties in speech—obscenity (aischrotēs, "shameless talk and conduct"), foolish talk (mōrologia, lit., "stupid words"), and coarse jesting (eutrapelia, "vulgar, frivolous wit")—are out of place for Jesus' followers, because such vices often harm (cf. 4:29), whereas thanksgiving is appreciation for others and is helpful. Paul was not intimating that humor itself is sin, but that it is wrong when it is used to destroy or tear down others.

b. Reason: no inheritance for evildoers (5:5-6)

5:5-6. Paul sternly warned believers that the reason they are to abstain from evil deeds (specifically, immorality, impurity, and greed; cf. vv. 3 and 5) is that those who practice them are not a part of God's kingdom. Those who have no inheritance in the kingdom have not been "washed," "sanctified," and "justified" as 1 Corinthians 6:9-11 so clearly demonstrates. A greedy person . . . is an idolater (cf. Col. 3:5) in the sense that greed, like idols, puts things before God.

Christians should not be deceived into thinking that this warning is merely empty words (kenois, trans. "empty" means void of content), for the disobedient, that is, the unregenerate (cf. Eph. 2:2) are the objects of God's wrath (cf. Col. 3:6). God's view of sin should be taken seriously. Believers should be imitators of God, not evildoers.

D. Walking in light (5:7-14)

The reason for dividing the outline here rather than between verses 5 and 6 (or between vv. 7 and 8) is because of the resumptive inferential particle (oun, "therefore") that marks the beginning of each new section: 4:1, 17; 5:1, 7, 15.

1. NOT BECOMING INVOLVED WITH EVILDOERS (5:7-10)

a. Command: do not get involved (5:7)

5:7. Christians, as objects of God's love (vv. 1-2), are inconsistent if they become partners with those who are the objects of God's wrath, those who are not "in the kingdom" (v. 5).

b. Reason: Christians are changed persons (5:8a)

5:8a. The reason (gar, for) believers should not be partners with the unregenerate is that Christians are no longer part of the darkness, in which they used to live (cf. 4:18; John 1:5; 3:19-20) but . . . are light in the Lord (Matt. 5:14-16; John 3:21; 8:12; Rom. 13:12; 1 Thes. 5:4-5). They have been rescued out of darkness (Col. 1:13). Now, being "in the Lord," who is the Light (John 8:12), they too are lights.

c. Command: walk as children of light (5:8b-10)

5:8b-10. The behavior of saints should correspond with their positions. Since they are children of light, that is, since their very nature is spiritual light, they are to live accordingly (Rom. 13:12). Ephesians 5:9 parenthetically explains that the fruit of the light—which is goodness, righteousness (cf. Phil. 1:11), and truth—reflects God's character in a believer's life. (The KJV rendering, "fruit of the Spirit," lacks good textual support.) Sinners, those in darkness, are characterized by the opposite of this fruit: evil, wickedness, and falsehood. The thought in verse 10 expands on verse 8b in that to live as children of light one must discern what pleases the Lord (cf. 2 Cor. 5:9; Col. 1:10). The words find out translate dokimazontes, which is literally, "putting to the test," "approving," or "discerning" (cf. Rom. 12:2).

2. NOT BECOMING INVOLVED WITH EVILDOERS' WORKS (5:11-13)

Those who profess Christ are to walk in light by not being partners with unbelievers (vv. 7-10). Now Paul mentioned that Christians are not to be involved with unbelievers' deeds (vv. 11-13).

a. Command: do not get involved but expose (5:11)

5:11. Christians are forbidden to be "sharers together" (symmetochoi, v. 7; cf. metochoi in Heb. 1:9 ["companions"]; 3:1, 14 ["share"]; 6:4 ["shared"]) with the sons of disobedience; now they are told not to take part (synkoinōneite) with unbelievers' actions. Their ways are fruitless deeds of darkness in contrast with "the fruit of the light" (Eph. 5:9). Sins bear no "fruit"; they give no benefits to oneself or others.

Christians, by conducting themselves as "children of light," expose the "deeds of darkness." These deeds, however, refer here to the deeds of other believers who are not walking in the light. This is because only God can expose and convict unbelievers' deeds (1 Cor. 5:12-13). Believers, on the other hand, can expose evil deeds among other Christians within the church. This the Corinthians failed to do (1 Cor. 5).

b. Reason: their works are shameful (5:12)

5:12. The things done in secret are too shameful even to talk about. The term the disobedient in the NIV wrongly suggests that this refers to unbelievers. However, the Greek has "what is done by them," thus indicating that Paul may be referring to believers who commit "deeds of darkness."

c. Explanation: light shows the true character of works (5:13)

5:13. When light exposes evil deeds, they become visible, manifest for what they really are. Seeing them as evil, a believer then cleanses himself of them (1 John 1:5-7), realizing they are detrimental not only to him but also to other believers.

3. CONCLUSION: ENLIGHTENMENT OF CHRIST (5:14)

5:14. The introductory formula, This is why it is said, seems to indicate a quotation from the Old Testament, but it is difficult to identify unless it is a combination of passages (e.g., Isa. 26:19; 51:17; 52:1; 60:1). Possibly it is a quotation from an early Christian hymn. A believer who has committed "deeds of darkness," is to wake up and rise from the dead since he was involved with the deeds of evildoers. Christ's shining on him speaks of His approval, an indication that he is discerning and following what is pleasing to the Lord (Eph. 5:10).

Therefore verses 7-14 deal with church discipline. Believers are to walk in the light, and in so doing to expose other believers of any works that are unfruitful so that they too may walk in the light and please their Lord.

E. Walking in wisdom (5:15–6:9)

For a fifth time Paul used the word "walk" (peripateō), translated "live" in the NIV (4:1, 17; 5:2, 8, 15). Here Paul instructed believers to be wise in their walk or conduct by being filled by the Holy Spirit.

1. ADMONITION (5:15-21)

a. Proper action: to walk wisely (5:15-16)

5:15-16. The NIV's Be very careful, then, how you live is literally, "Look therefore carefully how you walk." Does the adverb "carefully" (akribōs, lit. "accurately") modify "look"? If so the first clause in verse 15 could be translated, "Therefore look carefully how you walk." (This is behind the rendering in the ASV, NASB, and NIV.) Or does "careful" modify "walk"? If so, the idea is, "Therefore look that you walk carefully" (cf. KJV). This second alternative is preferred because better Greek manuscripts place akribōs closer to the Greek word "walk" and because in the New Testament the Greek imperative "look" (blepete) is never modified by an adverb. Believers then, are to walk (live) carefully, so as to be wise or skillful and thus please the Lord. The manner for this careful, precise walk is making the right use of every opportunity (cf. Col. 4:5), and the reason for this careful walk is that the days are evil. Many are walking in sin, and since the time is short believers must make full use of their time to help turn them from darkness to light. This necessitates wise conduct.

b. Proper state: to become wise (5:17-21)

5:17. Rather than being foolish (aphrones, "senseless") or "unwise" (asophoi, v. 15), Christians are to under- stand (syniete, "comprehend intellectually") what the Lord's will is. Only after one understands what pleases God (v. 1) can he carry it out in his life.

5:18. Going from the general to the specific, Paul explained how wisdom, as an intellectual and spiritual capacity, works out in one's conduct. Verse 18 includes a negative command and a positive one. The negative is to abstain from getting drunk on wine with which there is incorrigibility. The word asōtia is translated debauchery (NIV, RSV), "excess" (KJV), "riot" (ASV), and "dissipation" (NASB). All these give the idea of profligate or licentious living that is wasteful. In this verse the literal sense of incorrigibility seems best, for a drunken man acts abnormally. Rather than controlling himself, the wine controls him. Conversely, the positive command is, Be filled with the Spirit. Thus a believer, rather than controlling himself, is controlled by the Holy Spirit. It may be more accurate to say that the Holy Spirit is the "Agent" of the filling (cf. Gal. 5:16) and Christ is the Content of the filling (Col. 3:15). Thus in this relationship, as a believer is yielded to the Lord and controlled by Him, he increasingly manifests the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22-23). The Spirit's indwelling (John 7:37-39; 14:17; Rom. 5:5; 8:9; 1 Cor. 2:12; 6:19-20; 1 John 3:24; 4:13), sealing (2 Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:13; 4:30), and baptism (1 Cor. 12:13; Gal. 3:27) occur at the time of regeneration and thus are not commanded. However, believers are commanded to be filled constantly with the Holy Spirit. Each Christian has all the Spirit, but the command here is that the Spirit have all of him. The wise walk, then, is one that is characterized by the Holy Spirit's control.

5:19-21. Paul then gave four results of being filled with the Spirit. First is communication with one another with psalms (psalmois, OT psalms sung with stringed instruments such as harps), hymns (hymnois, praises composed by Christians), and spiritual songs (a general term). Second is communication with the Lord by singing and making melody (psallontes, singing with a stringed instrument) in the heart. Church music, then, should be a means of believers' ministering to each other, and singing should be a means of worshiping the Lord. Third is thanking God the Father (cf. 1:2-3, 17; 3:14) continually for all things (cf. Col. 3:17; 1 Thes. 5:18). Fourth, Spirit-controlled believers are to submit to one another, willingly serving others and being under them rather than dominating them and exalting themselves. But basic to Christians' attitudes toward others is their reverence for Christ. Paul next elaborated on this subject of submission (Eph. 5:22–6:9).

2. APPLICATION (5:22–6:9)

Having admonished believers to be wise by being controlled by the Holy Spirit, Paul now applied this to specific life-relationships. It is relatively easy to exhibit a Spirit-filled life for one or two hours a week in church but it takes the work of the Holy Spirit to exhibit godliness not only on Sundays but also in everyday relationships between wives and husbands, children and parents, and slaves and masters. In each of these three relationships the first partner is commanded to be submissive or obedient (5:22; 6:1, 5). But the second partner is also to show submissiveness by his care and concern for the first partner. Both partners are to act toward one another as a service rendered to the Lord.

a. Wives and husbands (5:22-33)

5:22-24. Wives are to submit to their husbands. (The verb "submit," absent in Gr. in v. 22, is borrowed from v. 21.) As to the Lord does not mean that a wife is to submit to her husband in the same way she submits to the Lord, but rather that her submission to her husband is her service rendered "to the Lord" (cf. Col. 3:18). The reason for this submission is that the husband is the head of the wife (cf. 1 Cor. 11:3), and this is compared to Christ's headship over the church (Eph. 5:23; cf. 4:15; Col. 1:18). As Christ is the Savior of the church, His body, so a husband should be the protector of his wife, who is "one flesh" with him (Gen. 2:24). As the church is in submission to Christ, so also a wife should be to her husband. It would be foolish to think of the church being head over Christ. But submission does not mean inferiority. It means that she recognizes that her husband is the head of the home and responds to him accordingly without usurping his authority to herself.

5:26-27. The purpose of Christ's death was to make the church holy (hagiasē, "to set apart" for Himself as His own forever; cf. Heb. 2:11; 10:10, 14; 13:12) which He did by cleansing her by the washing with water through the Word. This is not baptismal regeneration for that would be contrary to Paul's teaching in this book as well as all his other writings and the entire New Testament. Metaphorically, being regenerated is pictured as being cleansed by water (cf. "the washing of rebirth" in Titus 3:5). The "Word" (rhēmati) refers to the "preached Word" that unbelievers hear (cf. rhēma in Eph. 6:17; Rom. 10:8, 17; 1 Peter 1:25). The ultimate purpose of Christ's death is to present . . . to Himself the church as radiant or "in splendor" (RSV). This adjective, "glorious," in NEB, is not attributive (as in NIV's "a radiant church"). It is in the predicate position because there is an article before church (to "present the church . . . glorious," NEB).

This purpose is then described negatively (without stain or wrinkle—no taint of sin or spiritual decay—or any other blemish) and positively (holy and blameless). These last two adjectives (hagia, "set apart," and amōmos, "without blemish," like a spotless lamb) are stated in Ephesians 1:4 as the purpose of God's election: that Christ may present His church to Himself in all its perfection (cf. "make holy" in 5:26; also cf. hagious and amōmous in Col. 1:22). Whereas human brides prepare themselves for their husbands, Christ prepares His own bride for Himself.

5:28-30. In verses 28-32 Paul applied the truths given in verses 25-27. As the church is the extension of Christ, so is the wife an "extension" of her husband. No one hates his own body but takes care of it. Feeds (ektrephei; cf. "bring them up" in 6:4) and cares for (thalpei; cf. 1 Thes. 2:7) is literally, "nourishes and cherishes." Thus as Christ loves the church, His body (of which all believers are members; cf. Eph. 4:25), so should husbands . . . love their wives as their own bodies (5:28; cf. v. 33). Men care for their bodies even though they are imperfect and so they should care for their wives though they are imperfect.

5:31-32. Verse 31 is a free rendering of Genesis 2:24, indicating that the bond between husband and wife is greater than that between parent and child. The greatness of the mystery refers to the two becoming one flesh. But then Paul returned to mention the wonderful bond between Christ and the church, which illustrates the love of a husband for his wife.

5:33. This is a restatement of the responsibilities of the husband and wife toward each other: love by the husband (cf. v. 25) and respect by the wife.

b. Children and parents (6:1-4)

The Spirit-controlled life (5:18) is necessary for having a good parent-child relationship.

6:1-3. Children are to obey their parents. The phrase in the Lord does not mean that children are to obey parents only if their parents are believers. As Colossians 3:20 clearly denotes, a child's obedience to his parents is pleasing in the Lord's sight. The reason for this is that it is right (dikaion); it is a proper course to follow in society. Paul then quoted the fifth commandment (Ex. 20:12; Deut. 5:16) to support the need for children to obey parents (Eph. 6:2a, 3). The parenthetical clause states that this is the first commandment with a promise. But this is actually the second command with a promise (cf. Ex. 20:6). Some say Paul meant that this is the first command that children need to learn. But the first, not the fifth, of the Ten Commandments should really be learned first. More likely, Paul meant that this is "first" in the sense of being "a primary commandment," that is, of primary importance for children and it also has a promise. The promise for those who obey their parents is that they enjoy a prosperous and long life on the earth. This states a general principle that obedience fosters self-discipline, which in turn brings stability and longevity in one's life. (Stated conversely, it is improbable that an undisciplined person will live a long life. An Israelite who persistently disobeyed his parents was not privileged to enjoy a long, stable life in the land of Israel. A clear example of this was Eli's sons Hophni and Phinehas [1 Sam. 4:11].) Though that promise was given to Israel in the Old Testament, the principle still holds true today.

6:4. Fathers are addressed because they represent the governmental head of the family on whom rests the responsibility of child discipline. Fathers are not to exasperate (parorgizete, "provoke to anger"; used only here and in Rom. 10:19; cf. Col. 3:21) their children by unreasonable demands, petty rules, or favoritism. Such actions cause children to become discouraged (Col. 3:21). Instead, fathers are to bring them up, that is, rear or nourish (ektrephete, "provide for physical and spiritual needs"; also used in Eph. 5:29) them in the training (paideia, "child discipline," including directing and correcting; cf. "training" in righteousness [2 Tim. 3:16] and God's "discipline" of believers [Heb. 12:8]) and instruction (nouthesia; cf. 1 Cor. 10:11; Titus 3:10) of the Lord. Children are to obey "in the Lord" (Eph. 6:1) and parents are to train and instruct "in the Lord." He is to be the center of their relationships and of their teaching and learning.

c. Slaves and masters (6:5-9)

Paul then discussed a third group. Whereas the first two groups were directly involved in family relationships (wives and husbands, children and parents), this group was outside the immediate family. Slavery existed in Paul's day and he did not try to overthrow it (1 Cor. 7:17-24). Apparently these were Christian slaves under Christian masters.

6:5-8. Slaves' responsibilities to their masters are outlined here. Slaves were to obey (cf. v. 1) their masters with (1) respect (cf. 5:33), (2) fear (lit., "trembling"), (3) sincerity (haplotēti, from haplous, "simple, without folds"), (4) as a service rendered to Christ (just as you would obey Christ . . . like slaves of Christ, doing the will of God . . . as if you were serving the Lord), (5) consistently (not only . . . when their eye is on you, but all the time), (6) with inner motivation (of heart [6:5], and from your heart [v. 6], the latter phrase being lit., "from the soul"), and (7) wholeheartedly (met' eunoias, "with good will or a peaceable spirit"). The reason for such service is that the Lord will reward them. He is the One who can accurately and impartially judge their performance and motivation (cf. 1 Peter 1:17).

6:9. Masters were to treat their slaves in the same way, that is, to please the Lord in their dealings with them. Slaves owners were not to keep threatening them but to treat them justly and fairly (cf. Col. 4:1; James 5:4) because they themselves were servants, with a Master who is an example to them. This, of course, is the Lord and He is the Master over both earthly masters and slaves. He shows no partiality, regardless of one's rank (cf. Eph. 6:8).

In conclusion, only a Spirit-controlled believer (5:18) is able to fulfill the obligations given in this section (5:15–6:9). Many of these verses emphasize selflessness, which results in harmony, one evidence of the Spirit's work.

F. Standing in warfare (6:10-20)

Whereas every division of 4:1–6:9 was introduced by the Greek inferential particle oun (4:1, 17; 5:1, 7, 15) and the verb "walk" (peripateō; 4:1, 17; 5:1, 8, 15), this final division is signaled by "finally" (tou loipou, "the rest"). This section discusses a believer's use of God's resources to help him stand against evil powers.

1. PUTTING ON THE ARMOR (6:10-13)

a. What: to be strong in the Lord (6:10)

6:10. Paul exhorted believers to be strong in the Lord and in the might (kratei, "power that overcomes resistance" as used in Christ's miracles) of God's inherent strength (ischyos; cf. "the power [kratous] of His inherent strength" [ischyos] in 1:19). Hence believers can be strengthened not only by the person of the Lord but also by His resources (cf. Phil. 4:13).

b. How: to put on God's armor (6:11a)

6:11a. The form of the Greek imperative put on indicates that believers are responsible for putting on God's (not their) full armor (panoplian, also in v. 13; all the armor and weapons together were called the hapla; cf. 2 Cor. 6:7) with all urgency. The detailed description of the armor (given in Eph. 6:14-17) may stem from Paul's being tied to a Roman soldier while in prison awaiting trial (cf. Acts 28:16, 20).

c. Why: to stand against the devil's strategy (6:11b-13)

6:11b-12. The purpose of putting on God's armor is to be able to stand against the schemes or stratagems (methodeias, used in the NT only here and in 4:14) of the devil or adversary (cf. 4:27). Christians are not to attack Satan, or advance against him; they are only to "stand" or hold the territory Christ and His body, the church, have conquered. Without God's armor believers will be defeated by the "schemes" of the devil which have been effective for thousands of years.

The struggle is not physical (against flesh and blood); it is a spiritual conflict against the spiritual "Mafia." Though the ranks of satanic forces cannot be fully categorized, the first two (rulers and authorities) have already been mentioned in 1:21 and 3:10. Paul added the powers of this dark world (cf. 2:2; 4:18; 5:8) and the spiritual forces of evil. Their sphere of activity is in the heavenly realms, the fifth occurrence of this phrase, which is mentioned in the New Testament only in 1:3, 20; 2:6; 3:10; 6:12. Satan, who is in the heavens (2:2) until he will be cast out in the middle of the Tribulation (Rev. 12:9-10), is trying to rob believers of the spiritual blessings God has given them (Eph. 1:3).

6:13. Some think this verse implies that a believer, having subdued all, is able to stand in victory. It is preferable to think that this is summarizing what has been stated: that having made all the necessary preparations (with the full armor of God; cf. v. 11), one is then ready and able to stand in defense. This view fits better with the context because immediately after this verse Paul described the armor to be put on. This would be unnatural if he were speaking (in v. 13) of standing in victory. Also, to say that verse 13 refers to standing in victory but that verses 11 and 14 refer to standing in defense is inconsistent. Too, the word stand in verse 13 is antistēnai, "to withstand or stand against" (cf. James 4:7; 1 Peter 5:9).

2. STANDING WITH THE ARMOR (6:14-16)

a. The mandate: to stand (6:14a)

6:14a. Verses 14-20 make up the eighth long sentence in this epistle. Others are 1:3-14, 15-23; 2:1-7; 3:1-13, 14-19; 4:1-7, 11-16.

The imperative stand denotes urgency. This is followed by four Greek participles that denote either the cause or means of standing. The participles are rendered as follows in the NIV: "buckled," "in place," "fitted," "take up" (6:14-16).

b. The method: to arm (6:14b-16)

6:14b. Before a Roman soldier put on his armor, he put a belt around his waist. This held his garments together and served as a place on which to hang his armor. The belt of truth refers not to the facts of the gospel but to subjective truth, a believer's integrity and faithfulness. As a soldier's belt or sash gave ease and freedom of movement, so truth gives freedom with self, others, and God.

6:14c. The breastplate of righteousness refers not to justification, obtained at conversion (Rom. 3:24; 4:5), but to the sanctifying righteousness of Christ (1 Cor. 1:30) practiced in a believer's life. As a soldier's breastplate protected his chest from an enemy's attacks, so sanctifying, righteous living (Rom. 6:13; 14:17) guards a believer's heart against the assaults of the devil (cf. Isa. 59:17; James 4:7).

6:15. This verse does not speak of the spreading of the gospel, for Christians are pictured in vv. 10-16 as standing, not advancing. Instead this refers to a believer's stability or surefootedness from the gospel which gives him peace so he can stand in the battle.

6:16. The shield in a Roman soldier's attire, made of wood, was about 2 1/2' wide and 4' long. It was overlaid with linen and leather, to absorb fiery arrows. Thus it also protected the other pieces of the armor; hence Paul used the phrase, in addition to all this. Of faith is a genitive of content; the shield consists of faith. The idea, then, is that a Christian's resolute faith in the Lord can stop and extinguish all the flaming arrows of the evil one aimed at him. (Cf. "evil one" [Satan] in John 17:15; 1 John 5:19.)

3. RECEIVING THE FINAL PIECES OF ARMOR (6:17-20)

a. The mandate: to receive (6:17)

6:17. The outline is divided here because the Greek word take is an imperative, rather than another participle. This parallels the imperative "stand" in verse 14. The helmet and sword are the last two pieces a soldier takes up. A helmet, being hot and uncomfortable, would be put on by a soldier only when he faced impending danger. Having one's head guarded by a helmet gives a sense of safety, so the helmet of salvation refers either to present safety from the devil's attacks or to a future deliverance, "the hope of salvation as a helmet" (1 Thes. 5:8).

Finally, a Roman soldier would take in hand his sword, his only offensive weapon. Of the Spirit refers to the source or origin of the sword; hence it is "the sword given by the Spirit." "The sword of the Spirit" is specified as the Word of God. "Word" (rhēma; cf. Eph. 5:26; Rom. 10:8, 17; 1 Peter 1:25) refers to the preached Word or an utterance of God occasioned by the Holy Spirit in the heart. Believers need this "sword" to combat the enemy's assault, much as Christ did three times when tempted by the devil (Matt. 4:1-11).

b. The method: to care (6:18-20)

6:18. The manner in which a soldier takes up these last two pieces of armor is suggested by two Greek participles: "praying" and "being alert." When the enemy attacks—and on all occasions—Christians are to pray continually in the Spirit (i.e., in the power and sphere of the Spirit; cf. Jude 20). With all kinds of prayers and requests suggests the thoroughness and intensity of their praying. And like reliable soldiers, they are to be keeping alert, literally, "in all persistence" (en pasē proskarterēsei; the noun is used only here in the NT). Their requests are to be for all the saints because of Satan's spiritual warfare against Christ and the church. In the Greek "all" occurs four times in this verse; three are translated in the NIV and the fourth is rendered as always (lit., "in all times" or "every time").

6:19-20. Paul asked his readers not only to pray in general for all saints but also specifically to pray for him that he might make known the mystery of the gospel. Here Paul probably did not refer to witnessing or preaching the gospel of Christ. Instead he may have referred to his need to be bold (twice he said fearlessly) and clear regarding the "mystery of the gospel" when he would be on trial before Caesar in Rome (when and if the Jewish accusers would make charges against him). The Romans looked on the Christians as a sect of the Jews, and the Jews considered them as a heretical group. In his trial Paul needed to make clear that Christians are neither a Jewish sect nor a heretical group but a new entity, the church, the body of Christ, composed of Jewish and Gentile believers. This recalls Paul's lengthy discussion of this "mystery of the gospel" in 2:11–3:11. For this reason Paul was an ambassador in chains (cf. Acts 28:16, 20; Eph. 3:1; 4:1; Phil. 1:7, 13-14, 16; Col. 4:3, 18; Phile. 1, 9-10, 13).

G. Conclusion (6:21-24)

1. INFORMATION (6:21-22)

6:21-22. Apparently Tychicus was the bearer of this epistle. Paul considered him a dear brother and faithful servant in the Lord. In Colossians 4:7 Paul called him by these same titles and added that he was a "fellow servant" (syndoulos, "fellow slave"). Tychicus is also mentioned in Acts 20:4; 2 Timothy 4:12; and Titus 3:12. Tychicus was to inform the Ephesians of Paul's welfare—how he was and what he was doing—in order to encourage them (cf. Eph. 3:13).

2. SALUTATION (6:23)

6:23. Three spiritual qualities frequently mentioned by Paul—peace, love, and faith—are referred to in this verse. The phrase peace to the brothers is found nowhere else in the New Testament. This and love with faith (cf. 1:15) have their sources in God. Paul wanted them to continue their love for other Christians, their spiritual brothers (since they are all "members of one body," 4:25) and to combine that love with their faith in God, for which they were well known. God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ is similar to Paul's wording in 1:2-3, 17; 5:20.

3. BENEDICTION (6:24)

6:24. Grace concludes the letter, just as it had introduced it (1:2). The words with an undying love are literally, "in incorruption, incorruptibility, immortality" (en aphtharsia; cf. Rom. 2:7; 1 Cor. 15:42, 50, 53-54; 2 Tim. 1:10). It has the idea that believers' love for the Lord Jesus Christ is to be pure, not corrupted with wrong motives or secret disloyalties. Unfortunately some Ephesian believers later did lose the fervency of their love for Christ (Rev. 2:4). Paul's benediction, though unusual (cf. the chart "Paul's Concluding Benedictions in His Epistles," at Rom. 16:17-20), was certainly fitting.

PHILIPPIANS

Robert P. Lightner

INTRODUCTION

On his second missionary journey Paul visited Philippi. Through his ministry there several people trusted Christ as their Savior. Some of these were Lydia and her family and the Philippian jailer and his family (Acts 16:14-34).

Soon after Paul's visit a local church was established in Philippi. The church helped the apostle in different ways so this epistle was written to acknowledge their help, as well as to help them.

Philippians is personal and practical in its tone and teaching. Paul emphasized the need for believers to rejoice in Christ. "Joy" (chara) is used four times (Phil. 1:4, 25; 2:2; 4:1); "rejoice" (chairō) occurs eight times (1:18 [twice]; 2:17-18; 3:1, 4:4 [twice], 10); and "glad" occurs thrice (2:17-18, 28). (In 1:26 the word "joy" is a different Gr. word; there it is the word "glad," "boast," or "glory," [kauchēma], which also occurs in 2:16 and 3:3.) Paul wrote frequently in this epistle about the mind of a child of God. One's manner of life is truly a reflection of what occupies his mind.

The Theme of the Epistle. Though many exhortations and challenges are given, one major theme or emphasis pervades the book. All the teachings are expressions or ramifications of this one central truth. This theme is "living the Christian life."

The Human Author. Most scholars agree that the Apostle Paul wrote the Book of Philippians. Clearly the work purports to come from him (1:1). Reference to Timothy is also significant since he was with the apostle when Philippi was evangelized (cf. Acts 16). Also the information the writer gave about himself (Phil. 3:4-6) harmonizes perfectly with Paul's life. In addition, the writings of the early church fathers attest to Pauline authorship.

The Date of the Epistle. Paul was in bondage when he wrote Philippians. But all do not agree which imprisonment he was experiencing when he wrote the book. Most believe he was in Rome at the time; some suggest he was in Caesarea; and a few argue for Ephesus.

The Scriptures give no clear indication of any imprisonment in Ephesus. As for Caesarea, Paul was confined there for two years, but imminent martyrdom is not suggested in the account which describes this confinement (Acts 23–24). His reference to the palace guard (Phil. 1:13) as well as his concern about facing possible death (vv. 20-26) argue for his writing from Rome. The date of the writing would then be A.D. 61 or 62.

The Historic Occasion. When the Philippian believers heard about Paul's imprisonment at Rome, they sent Epaphroditus, who may have been their pastor, to minister to him. Epaphroditus personally comforted Paul, expressing to him the affection of the saints in Philippi. And he brought Paul a financial contribution from them so that his confinement would be more comfortable (4:18). Three times before—twice when Paul was at Thessalonica, and once when he was at Corinth (Phil. 4:15-16; cf. 2 Cor. 11:9)—the saints ministered to his needs. The Book of Philippians might be called a thank-you note to saints in Philippi for their generous gifts.

While Epaphroditus was in Rome, he became so ill he almost died (Phil. 2:27). After he recovered, he took Paul's letter to the Philippian Christians.

Philippi was a Roman colony (Acts 16:12). After the Battle of Philippi in 42 B.C. some Roman soldiers were ordered by Anthony to live there. Then in 30 B.C. Octavian forced some people in Italy to give up their homes and settle in Philippi and elsewhere. These Philippian residents were given special privileges including the "Italic right." This meant that the colonists, in return for their displacement, were treated as if their land were part of Italian soil. So the residents were citizens of Rome, their "mother city," and enjoyed the full rights of Roman citizenship, including exemption from taxes. So Paul's words (Phil. 1:27) "conduct yourselves" (lit., "live as citizens") and "our citizenship is in heaven" (3:20) had special meaning to the Christians at Philippi.

The Purposes for the Epistle. The initial reason for writing, as indicated, seems to have been to thank the Philippians for their love gift. But Paul also took advantage of this opportunity to address some of the problems in their church. Apparently rivalry and personal ambition were present among some of the saints (2:3-4; 4:2). The Judaizers were also gaining a hearing (3:1-3). In addition, an antinomian tendency was creeping in (3:18-19).

COMMENTARY

I. Encouragement for Living the Christian Life (1:1-30)

A. Paul's praise of the saints at Philippi (1:1-8)

The Apostle Paul frequently began his epistles with words of greeting, praise, and commendation. Philippians was no exception. The tender tone of the entire letter is apparent at the outset.

1:1. Paul was the author's Gentile name and Saul his Hebrew name. As the apostle to the Gentiles (Gal. 2:7-8) he used his Gentile name. Instead of referring to his apostleship, as he frequently did in the beginning of a book, here Paul called himself a servant of the Lord. Timothy had a special interest in the Philippian saints (Phil. 2:20) and was associated with Paul's imprisonment (2:19, 23). Timothy was not a coauthor of this epistle, since he is spoken of in the third person (2:19-24). Both of these men of God, who had been Roman captives, were servants (lit., "slaves") of Christ Jesus. By calling the Philippian believers saints, Paul was not saying his readers were sinless. The Greek word he used, hagioi, means "those set apart." The saints at Philippi were set apart for God. They were in Christ Jesus so far as their relationship to God was concerned, though they lived at Philippi.

The apostle made special mention of the overseers and deacons, who were included among all the saints. The "overseers" or bishops, were also called "elders" (Titus 1:5, 7); and they were responsible for shepherding or pastoring the flock (cf. Acts 20:17, 28). The "deacons" were those church leaders who had special service responsibilities in the assembly (cf. Acts 6).

1:2. In his greeting to the Philippians, Paul used two words descriptive of Christian graces: grace and peace. The order in which he used them is significant. Before there can be any genuine peace there must be a personal response to God's grace, His unmerited favor manifested climactically at Calvary. Both grace and peace find their source in God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

2. PRAISE FOR THEIR CONSTANT WITNESS (1:3-6)

1:3. It must have brought great joy to the Philippians' hearts as they read how the apostle often thanked God for them. Here was a letter of commendation from one who was in Roman chains some 800 miles away. About 10 years had passed since Paul had first worked among them. But the passing of time had not diminished his love or his interest in them. Every time Paul thought of them he thanked God for them.

1:4-6. None of the believers was excluded from Paul's prayers. Coming from a prisoner, this is especially significant. It was with joy that the apostle also besought God on their behalf. Paul's hardships made him better, not bitter. They always do one or the other to a child of God.

The Philippian saints and Paul were partners in the things of Christ. This was true because they shared with him in his need. They gave of themselves to Paul and in turn to the cause of Christ for which he labored. But not only did they share with him in his need as a prisoner. They had also fellowshiped with him from the first day they trusted Christ. This brought great joy to the apostle's heart.

Great confidence gripped the apostle as he thought and prayed for the Philippians. The perfect tense of the Greek word translated being confident indicates that Paul had come to a settled conviction earlier and that he still was confident it was true. What was he so confident and sure of? It was that God would most certainly continue on to completion the good work He had begun in them. That good work was their salvation. It may also have included their fellowship and sharing of their bounties with Paul.

Paul had no doubt that God would continue in the Philippians what He had begun to do in them. God would work in them until the day of Christ Jesus. In 2:16 Paul called this "the day of Christ." Though Paul did not know when that day would occur—when all believers would be caught up to meet the Lord in the air—he did know that God would continue the work He had begun in His own children.

3. PRAISE FOR THEIR CONCERN FOR THE GOSPEL (1:7)

1:7. The first part of this verse is a sort of apology or defense for the way Paul felt about the Philippians, as expressed in verses 3-6.

The Greek allows for the phrase since I have you in my heart to read "since you have me in your heart." Certainly both Paul and the Philippians were in each others' hearts. However, in view of the specific reference to himself (v. 7) it seems better to accept the NIV rendering. His affection for the saints is also stated in 1:8 and 4:16.

It did not matter whether Paul was under arrest (in chains; cf. "chains" in 1:13-14, 17) or free; his friends at Philippi shared with him in what God was doing through him. That work concerned primarily the spread of the gospel. It was because of their partnership with him that he could propagate God's grace. Paul praised them for their concern that this good news be spread abroad.

4. PRAISE SHOWN BY HIS LOVE FOR THEM (1:8)

1:8. Paul called on God to witness to his feelings toward the Philippians. Paul was aware—as were his readers—that they could not know his heart. But God knew it perfectly. The affection Paul had for his readers was no mere human interest or attraction. It originated with the Lord Jesus Christ Himself. Christ's love had so overwhelmed Paul that His affection was Paul's very own. The fact that Paul told this to the Philippians demonstrates the reality and intensity of his praise for them.

B. Paul's prayer for the saints at Philippi (1:9-11)

1. PRAYER FOR LOVE (1:9-10)

The apostle assured the saints that he prayed regularly for them (v. 3). Now here (v. 9) he reported what it was he prayed for.

1:9. It was Paul's prayer that the Philippians' love for other believers would abound, run over as a cup or a river overflows. But that love should be more than sentimental; it should be knowledgeable and discerning. Having genuine spiritual knowledge (epignōsis) of God and depth of insight into His ways enables Christians to love God and others more. (This Gr. word for "insight" [aisthēsis] occurs only here in the NT.)

1:10. Paul stated two purposes for his prayer. The first is a near purpose: to discern what is best; and the second is a remote one: to be pure and blameless until the day of Christ. The idea of testing is clearly in view in the Greek word dokimazō, translated "discern." The testing is with a view to approving. The word was used in testing metals and coins, to determine whether they met the specified standards.

"Pure" is the translation of a Greek word used only here and in 2 Peter 3:1. It is eilikrineis, which comes from the words for "sun" and "to judge," thus indicating purity that is tested by the light of the sun. Paul wanted his readers to be rightly related to God and in fellowship with Him. Paul also was concerned that their relationships with others be what God would have them to be. The word aproskopoi, translated "blameless," also appears in 1 Corinthians 10:32 where the same writer urged, "Do not cause anyone to stumble." Paul's desire for his friends at Philippi ought to be the concern of all believers—to be morally pure, not causing others to stumble.

2. PRAYER FOR THE FRUIT OF RIGHTEOUSNESS (1:11)

1:11. Paul also prayed that the believers in the church at Philippi would be filled with the fruit of righteousness. A righteous stand before God, resulting from being clothed in Christ's righteousness, ought to produce fruit for God. Such inner qualities, partially described in Galatians 5:22-23, will be evident to others. The fruit of the Spirit comes through Jesus Christ, for it is really His life lived out through believers. Such fruit magnifies God, not self. So a life that exhibits such traits is to the glory and praise of God.

C. Paul's presentation of himself to the saints (1:12-30)

The apostle faced opposition from those outside the church and misrepresentation from some within. But this did not dissuade or distract him from fulfilling God's call. Through it all, Christ was being preached, which brought him great delight. So his bonds, instead of hindering his outreach, resulted in a greater spreading of the gospel of Christ. Paul's friends back in Philippi were apparently quite concerned about him, thinking he was discouraged and that God's plan had gone awry. Not so, the apostle responded.

1. STALWART TESTIMONY (1:12-18)

1:12-14. From his own experiences Paul wanted the believers at Philippi to learn an important truth: there are no accidents with God. Instead of Paul's ministry being curtailed because of his bondage, it was being advanced.

The advance came partly because the whole palace guard, as well as others, were hearing about Christ (vv. 12-13). The "palace guard" (praitōriō) likely refers to the praetorian guard, made up of Roman soldiers. Though Paul resided in his own rented facility (Acts 28:30), he was guarded by these soldiers all the time. The custom was for a prisoner to be chained at the wrist to a soldier.

All in Rome who came in contact with Paul heard about Christ. It was well known that he was not under guard for being a lawbreaker. Instead he was in chains for Christ (Phil. 1:13). In an effort to silence the truth, the authorities had incarcerated the one who spoke it, but their plan did not work.

Paul's incarceration had another effect: it encouraged those who had been reluctant about speaking for Christ (v. 14). Large numbers of believers became bold for Christ when they saw how God was spreading the gospel through Paul. The positive response Paul received in the face of opposition caused others to speak more courageously and fearlessly for Christ. Paul's confinement was doing what his circumstances outside of prison could never do.

1:15-18. The people who were emboldened to speak God's Word were of two kinds. Some preached Christ out of envy and rivalry, but others preached Him out of good will (v. 15). Those who preached out of good will did so in love (v. 16), knowing that Paul was in chains because of his defense of the gospel. The word "defense" is the Greek apologia, also used in verse 7.

The group that preached Christ out of envy and rivalry (v. 15) had selfish ambition (v. 17) as their motive. They purposely wanted to stir up trouble for Paul while he was in bondage. They were probably not Judaizers, as some suppose, because Paul said they were preaching Christ, though insincerely. The Judaizers believed that keeping the Old Testament Law was a means of salvation. Paul had sternly rebuked them as preachers of "a different gospel" (Gal. 1:6). However, since he did not accuse these in Philippi of presenting "another gospel," it seems that they were believers who for some unknown reason did not love the apostle or appreciate his work. Though they were doctrinally sound, they promoted themselves.

What rejoiced Paul's heart was that Christ was being preached, even though it was from wrong motives by some (Phil. 1:18). Since the content of the preaching was the same for both groups, the apostle could rejoice. He did not rejoice because there was a faction among members of Christ's body, for this brought him grief. Instead, it was the preaching of Christ that brought him joy.

2. SETTLED CONVICTIONS (1:19-26)

1:19. As a man of convictions, Paul shared his assurance that his fetters would eventually result in his deliverance. The Greek word translated "deliverance" here was used in different ways in the New Testament. It often meant spiritual deliverance—salvation, being born again. Here (v. 19) Paul used the word to refer to either the final stage of his salvation (cf. Rom. 5:9) or future vindication in a Roman court. It seems unlikely that he had his release in mind since in the next two sentences he wrote of the real possibility of his near death.

The bases on which the apostle's assurance rested were the prayers of the saints and the help given by the Spirit of Jesus Christ (Phil. 1:19). He knew he could count on the Philippians' prayers, and also on the Holy Spirit's ministry (cf. Rom. 8:26-27). "Help" (epichorēgias) carries the meaning of "support," much as a ligament provides support in a physical body. (This Gr. word is used in the NT only here and in Eph. 4:16.)

1:20. Paul was not sure whether he would experience release or martyrdom for his faith. He was certain of one thing though, that he wanted Christ to be exalted in his body either way (cf. "in the body," vv. 22, 24). This was Paul's expectation and hope. The apostle also knew full well that it would take courage to face death with the proper attitude. Eagerly expect is the translation of a unique word. It describes straining one's neck to catch a glimpse of something that is ahead. (Apokaradokia, a noun, is used only here and in Rom. 8:19.) Paul's concern was not what would happen to him but what testimony would be left for his Lord. Release would allow him to continue preaching Christ. But martyrdom would also advance the cause of Christ.

1:21. Paul's main purpose in living was to glorify Christ. Christ was the essence of his life. Yet Paul knew that if he were martyred, Christ would be glorified through the promotion of the gospel which would result from his testimony in death. And Paul himself would benefit, for death would result in his being with Christ (v. 23). The words to die suggest the act of dying, not the state of death.

1:22-24. The apostle's seeming frustration of mind is apparent in these verses. He knew if he could go on living there would certainly be fruit from his labor (v. 22). God would bless his work and continue to use him as He had in the past. Yet if Paul had a choice between going on living or dying for Christ, he was at a loss as to how to decide. He simply did not know which to choose. Of course the choice was really not up to him anyway.

Paul was distressed. He was hard-pressed to know which would bring the most glory to God and therefore be to everyone's advantage in the long run. His personal desire was to depart and be with Christ (v. 23). This he knew would be better by far for him since it would mean his release from the persecutions and other hardships that he suffered. But he also knew that the Philippians needed him. For them it was more necessary that he remain in the body, or stay alive (v. 24). Paul's selfless attitude is revealed here by his placing his friends' needs above his own desires.

1:25-26. New confidence of his release appears to have come to Paul. (The word convinced is the same word rendered "being confident" in v. 6.) By his release and return to them they would progress . . . in the faith and would experience great joy (v. 25).

The rejoicing of the Philippians would overflow (v. 26; the same word is rendered "abound" in v. 9), and that exulting would be in Christ Jesus, the source of true joy for all believers. ("Joy" in v. 26 is the word "exulting" [kauchēma] which differs from the more common word for "joy" used more often in Phil., including v. 25.) They would exult because the one who had taught them about Christ would be with them again.

3. SOLEMN EXHORTATIONS (1:27-30)

1:27. The apostle had the believers in Philippi on his heart. Regardless of what would happen to him—release from bonds or martyrdom—he wanted them to honor and glorify Christ. The words conduct yourselves translate a political word which would mean much to the Philippian believers. Literally it means "live as citizens." Because Philippi was a Roman colony, the Christian inhabitants of the city would appreciate Paul's use of that verb. To live in a way that is worthy of the gospel of Christ (cf. Eph. 4:1) is indeed the responsibility of every child of God. This Paul exhorted the Philippians to do.

The saints embraced a common cause, for they each shared in the same body of Christ. Therefore Paul was burdened that they stand firm (cf. Phil. 4:1) in one spirit and contend as one man (lit., "in one soul") for the faith of the gospel, the body of truth (cf. "faith," Jude 3). Their contending (synalthountes) for the faith suggests a joint effort, like that of an athletic team.

1:28. Paul wanted his readers to live courageously for Christ in the midst of opposition and persecution. True, they would be opposed but this should not frighten them in any way. Instead they were to be reminded at such times that their own victorious Christian response would be a sign that their opposers would eventually be destroyed. At the same time it would be a sign that the saints of God would be delivered by God Himself. This assurance would doubtless be the Holy Spirit working in their hearts.

1:29-30. So that being opposed would not come as a surprise, he gave them a reminder. Both believing on Christ and suffering for Him had been granted to them (v. 29). Suffering for Christ was not to be considered accidental or a divine punishment. Paul referred to a kind of suffering that was really a sign of God's favor. The Greek word echaristhē, translated "granted," is derived from a word which means "grace" or "favor." Believing on Christ and suffering for Him are both associated with God's grace.

Paul and his readers shared a similar struggle (v. 30). So Paul encouraged them as they had him. They wanted to know how he fared in Rome. He told them, so they could also be encouraged as they faced hardships.

II. Examples for Living the Christian Life (2:1-30)

A. The Son of God whose attitude the believer is to share (2:1-18)

This passage is a continuation of the exhortation begun in 1:27-30. The entire section (1:27–2:18) states what Paul called the saints at Philippi to do. It includes the famous kenōsis or self-emptying passage (2:5-11), in which the Son of God Himself is set forth as the One whose attitude the believer should share.

1. THE DECLARATION (2:1)

2:1. In 1:27 Paul had written about living the Christian life in harmony with the message on which it is based. He followed that message with a call to show forth spiritual unity. This unity is possible because of the reality of the four qualities mentioned in 2:1. The "if" clauses, being translations of first-class conditions in Greek, speak of certainties. So in this passage "if" may be translated "since." Paul wrote here about realities, not questionable things. Paul appealed on the basis of (a) encouragement from being united with Christ . . . (b) comfort from His love . . . (c) fellowship with the Spirit . . . (d) tenderness and compassion.

"Encouragement" is from a Greek word related to the one Christ used in referring to the Holy Spirit as "the Counselor" (John 14:16; "Comforter," KJV). It may also be translated "exhortation" in the sense of either rebuke or comfort. Since each believer had received this work of the Spirit, Paul used it as a basis to appeal for their spiritual unity.

Also they each had "comfort from His [God's] love." God's love in people's hearts produces spiritual unity in their lives.

"Fellowship with the Spirit" is a result of the Spirit's permanent indwelling ministry (cf. 1 Cor. 6:19). This may refer, however, to fellowship that comes from the Holy Spirit, just as encouragement comes from Christ and comfort comes from love.

Paul also spoke of "tenderness (splanchna; cf. Phile. 7, 20) and compassion." One of the Spirit's ministries is to produce within each believer a concern and love for other members of God's family. This may be received or rejected by a believer, but the Spirit's work is a reality and is a basis for spiritual unity.

2. THE EXHORTATIONS (2:2-4)

2:2. On the basis of what was presented in verse 1, Paul exhorted his readers to show in practical ways the unity which was theirs in Christ. Their expression of that spiritual unity would make his joy complete. Corresponding to the four realities in verse 1 are four specific ways in which their spiritual unity would be realized. They would be like-minded, have the same love, be one in spirit (sympsychoi), and be one in purpose.

2:3-4. Paul gave further exhortations, also based on the declaration of the fourfold reality expressed in verse 1. The terms the apostle used reveal an underlying problem in the church at Philippi. The situation Paul addressed evidently was prompted by self-centeredness among certain Christians.

Nothing was to be done out of selfish ambition (v. 3). The same word (eritheian) appears in 1:17 to describe the attitude of those who opposed Paul. Without question such behavior is of the flesh and not the Spirit (cf. Gal. 5:20, which uses the same word). Vain conceit, meaning "empty glory," was probably the root cause of their selfish ambition.

The two negatives are followed by a positive exhortation: in humility consider others better than yourselves. But, a word of contrast, introduces these words. Humility before God and man is a virtue every child of God needs to strive for. A spirit of pride in human relations indicates a lack of humility before God. Paul exhorted the Philippians to consider others before themselves (cf. 1 Peter 5:5-6). "This will go far toward removing disharmony" (Homer A. Kent, Jr., "Philippians," in The Expositor's Bible Commentary, 11:122).

Paul explained how humility can be expressed (Phil. 2:4). Instead of concentrating on self, each believer should be concerned for the interests of others in the household of faith (cf. Rom. 12:10). Preoccupation with oneself is sin.

3. THE HUMILIATION OF CHRIST (2:5-8)

Christ is the supreme example of humility and selfless concern for others (vv. 5-8). These verses, along with verses 9-11, constitute a grand statement on Christology.

2:5. Believers are exhorted to have the same attitude—selfless humility—Christ exhibited in His humiliation and condescension. The word here translated attitude is translated "like-minded" in verse 2.

2:6-8. The word translated nature

(morphē) in verses 6 and 7 is a crucial term in this passage. This word (trans. "form" in the KJV and NASB) stresses the inner essence or reality of that with which it is associated (cf. Mark 16:12). Christ Jesus, Paul said, is of the very essence (morphē) of God, and in His incarnation He embraced perfect humanity. His complete and absolute deity is here carefully stressed by the apostle. The Savior's claim to deity infuriated the Jewish leaders (John 5:18) and caused them to accuse Him of blasphemy (John 10:33).

Though possessing full deity (John 1:14; Col. 2:9), Christ did not consider His equality with God (Phil. 2:6) as something to be grasped or held onto. In other words Christ did not hesitate to set aside His self-willed use of deity when He became a man. As God He had all the rights of deity, and yet during His incarnate state He surrendered His right to manifest Himself visibly as the God of all splendor and glory.

Christ's humiliation included His making Himself nothing, taking the very nature (morphē) of a servant, and being made in human likeness (v. 7). These statements indicate that Christ became a man, a true human being. The words "made Himself nothing" are, literally, "He emptied Himself." "Emptied," from the Greek kenoō, points to the divesting of His self-interests, but not of His deity. "The very nature of a servant" certainly points to His lowly and humble position, His willingness to obey the Father, and serve others. He became a man, a true human being. "Likeness" suggests similarity but difference. Though His humanity was genuine, He was different from all other humans in that He was sinless (Heb. 4:15).

Thus it is seen that Christ, while retaining the essence of God, was also human. In His incarnation He was fully God and fully man at the same time. He was God manifest in human flesh (John 1:14).

Some have wrongly taught that the phrase, being found in appearance as a man (Phil. 2:8), means that He only looked human. But this contradicts verse 7. "Appearance" is the Greek schēmati, meaning an outer appearance which may be temporary. This contrasts with morphē ("very nature") in verses 6 and 7, which speaks of an outer appearance that reveals permanent inner quality.

The condescension of Christ included not only His birth—the Incarnation in which He became the God-Man—but also His death. And it was the most cruel and despicable form of death—even death on a cross! (v. 8) This form of capital punishment was limited to non-Romans and the worst criminals.

No better example of humiliation and a selfless attitude for believers to follow could possibly be given than that of Christ. With this example before them, the saints at Philippi should be "like-minded" (v. 2) and live humbly before their God and each other.

4. THE EXALTATION OF CHRIST (2:9-11)

God the Father is the subject in these verses, whereas in verses 6-8 God the Son was the subject. Christ's obedience was followed by the Father's exaltation of Him to the place of highest honor. God exalted and honored the One men despised and rejected.

2:9. Christ's exaltation and His receiving a name that is above every name was the answer to His high-priestly prayer (John 17:5). The exaltation refers to His resurrection, ascension, and glorification at the Father's right hand (Acts 2:33; Heb. 1:3). His "name" is not merely a title; it refers to His person and to His position of dignity and honor.

2:10. In keeping with Christ's exaltation and high name . . . every knee will one day bow and acknowledge Him for who He really is. Paul stressed the same truth in his letter to the Romans (Rom. 14:11). Both instances reflect Isaiah's prophecy (Isa. 45:23) of the singular greatness of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The extent of Christ's sovereign authority is delineated in the threefold phrase, in heaven and on earth and under the earth. No intelligent being—whether angels and saints in heaven; people living on the earth; or Satan, demons, and the unsaved in hell—in all of God's universe will escape. All will bow either willingly or they will be made to do so.

2:11. What all will confess is that Jesus Christ is Lord. This, the earliest Christian creed, meant that Jesus Christ is Yahweh-God. One day all will be made to acknowledge that Jesus Christ is all He claimed to be—very God of very God. Unfortunately, for many it will be too late for the salvation of their souls. The exalted place the Savior now occupies and the universal bowing in the future in acknowledgement of His lordship is all to the glory of God the Father.

5. THE EXHORTATIONS CONTINUED (2:12-18)

In these verses Paul returned to the exhortations which he began earlier in verses 2-4.

2:12-13. Therefore connects these verses with what immediately precedes them. Christ obeyed the Father and carried out His plan even to death on the cross (v. 8). The Philippian Christians needed to obey, to follow Paul's instruction which was drawn from Christ's example.

The exhortation was direct and pointed, but tempered with love, for he called the believers my dear friends. This tender expression doubtless reminded them of the experiences they shared with the apostle and Silas when they first came to Christ and established their church (Acts 16:19-40). When Paul was with them, they followed his instructions willingly and quickly. He reminded them of this before he asked them to do the same at the present time, even though he was far from them. He had earlier spoken of his absence (Phil. 1:27).

The special request he had for them, in view of their needs and in view of the example of Christ, is stated forcefully—continue to work out your salvation with fear and trembling.

It is commonly understood that this exhortation relates to the personal salvation of the saints at Philippi. They were told to "work out," to put into practice in their daily living, what God had worked in them by His Spirit. They were not told to work for their salvation but to work out the salvation God had already given them. In view of the apparent problems of disunity and pride among those believers this interpretation seems correct. Some were not doing their work selflessly and with the interests of others ahead of their own (cf. 2:3-4).

Some writers understand Paul's challenge to refer to the corporate life of the whole assembly in Philippi. Those who hold this view find support in the immediate context where Paul argued against their looking exclusively to their own needs (cf. v. 4). In this view "salvation" refers to the whole assembly's deliverance from disunity, pride, and selfishness.

Perhaps it is best to see both the outworking of personal salvation and the corporate salvation or deliverance of the whole assembly from whatever held them back from experiencing God's best.

This outworking was to be done "with fear and trembling," with a complete trust in God and not in themselves.

The only way this could be realized was through God who would enable them to do it (v. 13). Paul told the Philippian saints that God worked in them so that they could do His good pleasure and accomplish His good purpose. Both divine enablement and human responsibility are involved in getting God's work done. Believers are partners with God, laboring together with Him. The verb works (v. 13) means "energizes" or "provides enablement." God makes His own both willing and desirous to do His work.

2:14-16. These verses give specific instructions on how to work out God's "good purpose" (v. 13) in relation to daily Christian living.

Everything was to be done without complaining or arguing (v. 14). The order of the Greek words here places emphasis on everything a believer does. The present tense of the verb do suggests that this was to be done continually. "Complaining" is the translation of a word which reflects a bad attitude expressed in grumbling. The apostle may have had in mind the behavior of the Israelites who often complained to Moses and in turn to God (cf. 1 Cor. 10:10). "Arguing" reflects a legal connotation of disputing and may refer, at least in part, to the practice of going to civil courts to settle their differences (cf. 1 Cor. 6:1-11).

The importance of the kind of behavior called for is set forth in Philippians 2:15-16. Before their testimony for Christ could ever be effective in the community where they lived, the Philippians needed to set some things straight in their own assembly.

Evidently the believers were complaining (to God and each other) and arguing (with each other). As a result they were not without fault among the unregenerate; they were not shining like stars in their world (2:15). The Philippian assembly needed to show themselves as united and as one in Christ. Non-Christians were not being attracted to Him by the saints' strifes and contentions.

Blameless (amemptoi, v. 15) means "above reproach." This does not mean sinless perfection. The corporate testimony of the church is in view. All believers are called on to live out the salvation God has worked in them—to progress in their spiritual maturity. The people were to live so that those outside of Christ could not rightfully point an accusing finger at them. Pure translates akeraioi, a word that was used of wine which had not been diluted and of metal which had not been weakened in any way. Jesus also used the word when He told the Twelve to be "innocent" as doves (Matt. 10:16). The Greek words for "blameless" and "pure" here (Phil. 2:15) differ from those translated "blameless" and "pure" in 1:10 (see comments on 1:10).

The Philippians lived in a crooked and depraved generation (2:15). Again it seems that Paul had the unbelieving Israelites in mind. Moses had used similar words to describe Israel who had gone astray (cf. Deut. 32:5). Peter used the same terminology ("corrupt generation," Acts 2:40) that Christ did ("perverse generation," Matt. 17:17).

The world today, like theirs, is unscrupulous and perverted. Most people have turned their backs on God and truth. In this kind of world God's people are to "shine like stars" (Phil. 2:15; cf. Matt. 5:14-16). They are to be children of God without fault.

A child of God is in God's family, but the unregenerate are alienated from Him. They are His enemies. God's sovereign plan is to use His Word, administered by God's people, to transform His enemies into His friends by the regenerating work of God's Spirit.

The Greek word epechontes, hold out (v. 16) means either "hold forth" or "hold firmly." The former fits better here. It was used in secular Greek of offering wine to a guest at a banquet. As the Philippian saints held out (or offered) the word of life to others, Paul would then be able to boast (glory) on the day of Christ that he had not labored in vain with them. The "day of Christ" refers to the Rapture when the Savior returns and meets His own in the air (1 Thes. 4:13-18). This boasting was not a selfish ambition of Paul's; he was concerned with God's honor.

2:17-18. Paul's stated desire to be able to rejoice when he would see Christ and to be sure he had not labored in vain for the Philippians is followed by a statement about his joy in the midst of suffering. The apostle knew that death as a martyr was a real possibility for him.

Paul viewed himself as being poured out like a drink offering on behalf of the Philippians (v. 17). But instead of sorrowing he rejoiced. "Poured out" is from the Greek word spendomai, used of a drink offering given as a sacrifice to God. The possibility of release from prison was not uppermost in Paul's mind as it had been before (cf. 1:24-26). He now viewed his death as imminent. Later, near the actual time of his death, he used this same language (2 Tim. 4:6).

The sacrifice and service (perhaps this could be understood as "sacrificial service") stemmed from their faith. Paul used the same word for sacrifice (thysia) in Romans 12:1. There the sacrifice the believer-priest offers is his body. "Service" (leitourgia) is the same word translated "ceremonies" in Hebrews 9:21 (cf. Phil. 2:25, 30). This means that the work the Philippians did for God was considered an act of worship. All of this brought rejoicing to the apostle's heart even though it resulted in his facing imminent death.

Paul wanted his friends at Philippi to experience the same joy he had (2:18) and to be glad and rejoice with him.

B. The servants of God whose manner of life the believer is to follow (2:19-30)

In chapter 2 Paul first discussed the fact that the attitude of Christ, who humbled Himself and became obedient to death, should be shared by believers (vv. 1-18). Then Paul pointed out (vv. 19-30) that choice servants of God also provide examples for others to follow.

1. TIMOTHY AND PAUL (2:19-24)

Paul's incarceration had made it impossible for him to visit the saints at Philippi. He had referred to this fact earlier (v. 12). His deep and abiding concern for his friends' spiritual welfare prompted him to send Timothy to visit and to minister in his place. Timothy was at the time Paul's companion (1:1), though evidently not a prisoner. The letter would be delivered by Epaphroditus and Timothy's visit would follow.

2:19. The concern Paul demonstrated in sending Timothy was an example for the Philippians and all believers to follow. Not only did Paul give them the gospel and lead them to Christ, but he also wanted to be sure they were growing spiritually. His genuine interest in them continued.

Not certain of his own future, the apostle prefaced his desire with the words I hope in the Lord Jesus. This was an unusual way to speak of Timothy's proposed journey. Paul was especially aware that his release or death could come at any time.

The intent of Timothy's visit was clearly stated—that I also may be cheered. Both Paul's letter and Timothy's visit would certainly encourage the believers at Philippi. But the apostle also wanted to be encouraged as Timothy returned with good news from them.

Another lesson to be learned from Paul's sending Timothy is the need for selflessness. Timothy was close to Paul and dear to his heart. If Paul ever needed Timothy, it was while he was there in Rome under house arrest. Yet he was willing to sacrifice Timothy's companionship so that others could be helped.

2:20. Paul's young son in the faith had a deep interest and concern for the Philippians. In fact, Paul had no one else in Rome who was like him. Timothy's interest in their welfare was unexcelled. He was an excellent example of one who was selfless, more concerned about others than himself (cf. 2:3-4). The believers in the Philippian assembly needed to share Timothy's sincere interest in the welfare of others. The words "no one else like him" are literally "no one of equal soul" (isopsychon; cf. "one in spirit," sympsychoi, in 2:2).

2:21. This verse appears to make a rather broad claim. Did Paul mean to include everybody he ever knew? Or did he mean that of all who were near him in Rome, none compared to Timothy? Did Paul mean all others whom he might have contacted to run the errand were more interested in their own interests than in those of Christ's? The second suggestion seems correct. Timothy stood out as a rare gem in a world of self-seekers (cf. 1:15, 17).

2:22. The Philippians knew Timothy, so they knew that what the apostle said about him was true. From the start, when he worked with Paul in Philippi, Timothy was faithful (cf. Acts 16). He had been closely associated with Paul since Paul's second missionary journey. The man had often been tested and proved. Paul was Timothy's spiritual father, and Timothy worked with him as his son. Together they both served the Lord as slaves in the work of the gospel.

Timothy's qualities were unexcelled. His whole life stands as an example for every child of God. Those in the Philippian assembly who were deficient in any of these qualities must have been pricked in conscience as they read Paul's letter, even as believers are today.

2:23-24. After his grand commendation of Timothy, Paul reaffirmed his intention to send him to them (v. 23). Just as soon as Paul knew how things were going, he would send him. Apparently Paul was waiting for some decision in his legal case.

In view of verse 24, Paul must have expected release from his chains. Significantly Paul's confidence was now in the Lord (cf. "in the Lord Jesus," v. 19). This phrase may be rendered "if the Lord wills."

Though the Scriptures include no specific statement about Paul's release, it must have occurred since he was imprisoned again in Rome during which time he wrote his last letter, 2 Timothy. Though there is no record of Paul's revisiting Philippi, he may have returned there after his release.

2. EPAPHRODITUS AND PAUL (2:25-30)

It is uncertain whether Epaphroditus was still with Paul at Rome when Paul wrote Philippians or whether Epaphroditus had already left to return to Philippi. Traditionally Epaphroditus has been viewed as the bearer of this letter to the Philippians. He is mentioned only here and in 4:18.

2:25. Since the church had sent Epaphroditus to bring Paul "the gifts" (of money, 4:18) and to discover how things were going with him, they probably intended for him to stay and assist Paul indefinitely. However, the apostle chose to send him back to them. But Paul wanted to be doubly sure the believers knew how highly he thought of Epaphroditus. He called him my brother, fellow worker . . . fellow soldier, and messenger. He shared Paul's spiritual life, labors, and dangers. He willingly took the role of a servant to assist Paul. What an exemplary lifestyle for every believer to follow. This man, whose name means "charming," served the Lord while he served others. The words take care translate the noun leitourgon ("serve as a priest"), which is related to the word "service" (leitourgia) in verse 17 (cf. v. 30). Epaphroditus' ministry to Paul was a priestly kind of service (cf. 4:18).

2:26-27. Epaphroditus had a deep concern for his friends in Philippi. He longed for all of them. He was distressed because he knew they had heard he was ill. His longing for the Philippians was exactly like Paul's (1:8). And the distress Epaphroditus experienced was similar to the agony Christ experienced in Gethsemane (Matt. 26:37; Mark 14:33).

Whatever illness Epaphroditus suffered was serious because he almost died (Phil. 2:27, 30). There is no indication that Paul had the ability to heal him or that he tried to do so. Neither is there any hint that Epaphroditus was sick because of being out of God's will.

Paul praised God for His mercy shown to Epaphroditus in restoring him to health and in sparing Paul sorrow upon sorrow. Thankfulness filled the apostle's heart. Paul already had sorrow associated with his imprisonment. He loved and needed Epaphroditus, so Epaphroditus' death would have brought Paul additional heaviness.

2:28-30. Paul was indeed selfless. He had the best interests of the Philippian believers and Epaphroditus at heart. They were sorry because their messenger to Paul had been ill and could not do for the apostle what they had hoped. Anticipating what they might think, Paul took full responsibility for sending Epaphroditus home. With haste he arranged for his trip back to Philippi. He did so for two reasons: He wanted them to be glad, and he wanted to be relieved of all anxiety himself.

The believers in Philippi were not to think wrongly of Epaphroditus for coming home. They were not to think that he had failed when Paul needed him most. He was to be welcomed in the Lord and in fact to be honored.

Paul's desire here illustrates how believers ought to relate toward those who may be misunderstood by others. Genuine Christian love, a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22), is always desirable, for it defends others and overlooks their faults (1 Cor. 13:7).

Paul explained (Phil. 2:30) why the saints should receive Epaphroditus. This messenger from Philippi was so sick he almost died. It was while he was serving Christ that he became sick, and if he had died it would also have been for Christ.

The believers from Philippi could not be in Rome helping Paul. Epaphroditus was risking his life to do what they could not do. He was serving Christ while he served them and Paul. (The word help is leitourgias, "priestly service," also used in v. 17; cf. v. 25.) As Christians serve Christ, they also serve others. The apostle reminded his readers of this so that they would receive Epaphroditus as they should.

III. Exhortations for Living the Christian Life (3:1-21)

In chapter 1 Paul encouraged the saints at Philippi to go on living the Christian life. In chapter 2 Paul set forth Timothy, Epaphroditus, and himself as examples of how to please God. Exhortations necessary for those who would lead such a life followed in chapter 3.

A. Believers are to have no confidence in the flesh (3:1-14)

1. THE EXHORTATION INTRODUCED (3:1)

3:1. Before stressing the serious danger of placing confidence in the flesh, the apostle called for a spirit of rejoicing in the Lord. His word finally was used to introduce a new subject as well as a clue that he had begun to conclude the letter. He used the same phrase again in 4:8. So some feel that chapter 3 is a digression from the author's main theme.

Paul called on believers to rejoice in the Lord. The word "rejoice" appears several times in the epistle (1:18 [twice];

2:17-18 [twice]; 3:1; 4:4 [twice], 10). It seems from this repeated emphasis that the Philippian Christians needed this word. Most of God's people need this challenge often. It is easy for believers to let circumstances discourage them. The cure for discouragement is to rivet one's attention on the Lord and rejoice in Him.

It is significant too that a Roman prisoner would beseech people who were free to be joyful in their Savior. It seems that it should be the other way around. Paul learned what every child of God needs to learn—there can be rejoicing in the Lord even when outward circumstances are contrary to a spirit of rejoicing.

Repetition is a vital part of learning. Either orally or in writing (perhaps in 1:27-30) the apostle had given the same truth to the Philippians before. He made no apology for repeating the instruction by writing the same things to you again. It was no trouble for him to review the essentials again. He felt constrained to do so for their benefit. The instruction was a safeguard for them.

2. THE EXAMPLE TO BE AVOIDED (3:2-3)

One particular group in Paul's day was especially guilty of putting confidence in the flesh. These were the Judaizers. They plagued Paul and his converts constantly. Confused about the gospel, they added works of the law to faith in Christ, both for salvation and for Christian living. The Old Testament rite of circumcision was of special concern to them. They insisted that it was necessary for salvation. They did not omit faith in Christ but added works of the flesh. Paul called such men "deceitful workmen" (2 Cor. 11:13).

3:2. Paul also called the Judaizers dogs, those men who do evil, those mutilators of the flesh. He considered their work dangerous and not of God. The saints were not to follow these people, but to beware of them, to watch out for them.

It was common for some Jews to refer to Gentiles as dogs, which were considered unclean animals. Paul used the term to describe those Jews who mutilated the gospel by insisting on the need to mutilate the flesh in order to be rightly related to God. What they did was actually evil, even though they may have had good intentions.

3:3. The Old Testament rite of physical circumcision was not only a sign of covenant relationship, but it was also intended to be related to spiritual circumcision of the heart (cf. Deut. 30:6). Writing to Gentiles, Paul made it clear that he and they were the true circumcision. This was because they had no confidence in the flesh and instead worshiped by the Spirit of God and gloried in Christ Jesus alone.

Instead of boasting in human accomplishments, as the Judaizers and Jews did, a child of God should glory in Christ Jesus alone. The word glory (kauchōmenoi) used here means "boast" or "exult" (cf. 1:26; 2:16; 2 Cor. 10:17).

3. THE EXAMPLE TO BE FOLLOWED (3:4-14)

Paul gave some interesting autobiographical facts in these verses. On the surface it appears he was boasting. However, closer examination reveals that this was precisely what he tried to avoid and warn against. To be sure, there was a time when the apostle had confidence in the flesh. But this was no longer true. To stress that he used to have great boldness and pride in his own achievements, Paul reviewed his past for the Philippians. After this he told about his crisis conversion experience on the road to Damascus.

3:4-6. It cannot be emphasized too strongly that Paul did not place any confidence in the flesh. He had gained victory over that temptation of the devil. His presentation in these verses was intended to review for the Philippians the things in which he could have placed confidence if he had wanted to. In fact the list included things in which he did place great value and trust before he met Christ. His intention was to show that in the flesh he had more in which he could have boasted than did any of the Judaizers.

The anyone else (v. 4) referred to all who place confidence in the flesh. Paul wrote as though he were challenging the Judaizers to a showdown. His preliminary conclusion before he even got specific was that no matter what advantage was brought forth by his opponents, his advantages exceeded theirs (cf. Gal. 1:14).

Seven advantages listed in Philippians 3:5-6 demonstrate what Paul used to have in the flesh but what he later counted as loss for Christ. Two kinds of advantages are enumerated. First are those things which the apostle had by birth, apart from his choice. Four of these are listed—circumcision, of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, and a Hebrew son of Hebrew parents. Next he named those privileges which he voluntarily chose—being a Pharisee, being a persecutor of the church, and having a flawless external record of legalistic righteousness.

Circumcision was named first probably because it was a big issue with the Judaizers. Paul's specific time, the eighth day, stressed that he was not a proselyte or an Ishmaelite but a pure-blooded Jew. Proselytes were circumcised later in life and Ishmaelites after age 13 (cf. Gen. 17:25-26).

Paul was of the people of Israel, which describes his heritage. His parents were both true Jews, unlike some of the Judaizers. He could trace his family lineage all the way back to Abraham. He was a true member of the covenant people (cf. 2 Cor. 11:22).

He was also a Benjamite, from which tribe came Israel's first king (1 Sam. 9:1-2). This tribe had a special place of honor and was viewed with great esteem. Even after the kingdom was disrupted the tribe of Benjamin remained loyal to the house of David.

Hebrew was Paul's native tongue. Unlike some of the Israelites, he did not adopt Greek customs. He knew thoroughly both the language and customs of the people of God. He was a Hebrew son of Hebrew parents.

In regard to the Law, Paul was a Pharisee, a member of the strictest sect among his people. In addition to the Law of Moses the Pharisees added their own regulations which in time were interpreted as equal to the Law.

What greater zeal for the Jewish religion could anyone boast of than that he persecuted the church? Paul did this relentlessly before his conversion to Christ (Acts 9:1-2). No Judaizer could match such zeal.

In "legalistic righteousness" Paul also excelled. In fact in his own eyes he was faultless (amemptos; the same word is used in Phil. 2:15 where it is rendered "blameless").

3:7-9. Any of those who troubled the saints at Philippi would have loved to have been able to list to his credit those things Paul did. On the human side these were reasons to have religious self-confidence. But all those things enumerated in verses 5-6 the apostle considered loss for the sake of Christ (v. 7).

Consider means to "think through or reflect on." After reflection he considered them loss. This he did at a point in time in the past and that decision was still in effect when he wrote, as connoted by the use of the Greek perfect tense. Doubtless Paul considered his life-transforming conversion on the Damascus Road as the time when he switched from confidence in the flesh to confidence in Christ alone.

It would be hard to find a more forceful refutation of human effort to please God than what Paul presented here (v. 8). Four Greek particles (alla menoun ge kai) are translated what is more and introduce the strong statements of verse 8. Paul considered as loss not only the things already listed (vv. 5-6), but everything (v. 8). In exchange for confidence in the flesh Paul gained the surpassing greatness of knowing Christ Jesus personally. Christ was now his Lord.

His former "gains" (kerdē, v. 7) he considered "rubbish" (which can mean food scraps or dung) so that he might gain (kerdēsō) Christ. Nothing else really mattered to him any longer. Having Christ as his Savior and Lord so far surpassed anything he had in Judaism.

Those who "gain Christ" (v. 8) are those found in Him (v. 9). Christ is in the believer and the believer is in Christ. Paul wanted his life to demonstrate these truths. Being in Christ, he was not clinging to any righteousness of his own doing associated with Law-keeping. Such a righteousness is viewed by God as no righteousness at all but rather as "filthy rags" (Isa. 64:6). The righteousness which saves and in which Paul rested is through (dia) faith in Christ. This is the only kind which comes from God and is by (epi) faith. When a believing sinner responds in faith to the Spirit's work in his heart, he is clothed in the righteousness of Christ (Rom. 3:24-26). In this position he is "accepted in the Beloved" (Eph. 1:6, KJV). Thus robed, the believing sinner stands complete in Christ.

3:10-11. These verses contain an open and honest confession to the Philippians. Paul already knew Christ as his Savior. But he wanted to know Him more intimately as his Lord. To know (v. 10) means "to know by experience" (gnōnai). The noun (gnōseōs) is used in verse 8. The "surpassing greatness of knowing Christ" is now elaborated in verses 10-11. This is how Paul wanted to know Him. More of what he desired in his Christian life follows.

To experience the power of His resurrection was also the apostle's goal. The power which brought Christ forth from the dead now operates in believers' lives since they have been "raised with Christ" (Col. 3:1). "Power" (dynamis, also used in Acts 1:8; Rom. 1:16) means ability to overcome resistance. By setting forth his own goals and ambitions Paul gave the Philippians an example to follow. His example was, of course, in stark contrast to the Judaizers whose example they were not to follow.

Paul also longed to share in the fellowship of Christ's sufferings and in so doing to become like Him in His death (Phil. 3:10). These sufferings were not Christ's substitutionary sufferings on the cross. Paul knew that those could not be shared. But he did desire to participate with Christ, since he was one of His, in suffering for the sake of righteousness (cf. 1:29). God had used Ananias to tell Paul that this is precisely what he would do as a servant of Christ (Acts 9:16). The apostle did indeed suffer for Christ because he represented Him so openly and truly (cf. Rom. 8:36; 2 Cor. 4:10).

The words "becoming like Him" translate symmorphizomenos, which means "being conformed inwardly in one's experience to something" (cf. Phil. 3:21), in this case, to Christ's death. As Christ died for sin, so a believer has died to sin (Rom. 6:2, 6-7; Col. 3:3). He should exhibit that cutting off from his former sinful way by daily being set apart from sin (Rom. 6:1-4, 11-14) and living a new life by means of Christ's resurrection power (Rom. 6:4).

"Resurrection" (Phil. 3:11) is the translation of exanastasin, a Greek word used nowhere else in the New Testament. It means a partial resurrection out from among other corpses, literally an "out-resurrection." But why did Paul say he wanted somehow, to attain to the (out-) resurrection from the dead? Did he doubt he would be raised from the dead? Hardly. Perhaps he was using this word to refer to the Rapture, thus expressing the hope that the Lord would return during his lifetime.

3:12-14. Though Paul was a spiritual giant in the eyes of the Philippian saints, he wanted them to know that he had not yet attained the goals stated in verse 10. He was still actively pressing on toward them. He had by no means reached the final stage of his sanctification.

Paul's salvation experience had taken place about 30 years before he wrote to the Philippians. He had won many spiritual battles in that time. He had grown much in those years, but he candidly confessed he had not obtained all this, nor was he yet made perfect (v. 12). He still had more spiritual heights to climb. This testimony of the apostle reminded the saints at Philippi—and it serves to remind believers today—that there must never be a stalemate in their spiritual growth or a plateau beyond which they cannot climb.

Paul pursued Christlikeness with the enthusiasm and persistence of a runner in the Greek games. Unlike the Judaizers, whose influence was prevalent among the Philippians, the apostle did not claim to have attained spiritual maturity. He was still pressing on, pursuing that for which Christ Jesus took hold of him. Nor had he yet taken hold of it, that is, he had not yet attained perfection or ultimate conformity to Christ. But he was determined that he would forget the past and, like a runner, press on toward the goal. Paul refused to be controlled or absorbed by his past heritage (vv. 5-7) or his attainments (v. 8).

Vigorously and with concentration Paul sought to win the prize to which God had called him heavenward (v. 14). Again the Greek games must have been on his mind as he wrote of the prize. The winner in those games was called to the place where the judge sat in order to receive his prize. Paul may have referred to ultimate salvation in God's presence, or to receiving rewards at "the judgment seat of Christ" (2 Cor. 5:10).

B. Believers are to have a walk that pleases God (3:15-21)

1. A WALK OF MATURITY (3:15-16)

The second great exhortation in chapter 3 has a positive ring to it—Paul urged Christians to walk, or live lives, pleasing to God (3:15-21). This should first be a mature walk (vv. 15-16).

3:15-16. The apostle called his readers to share with him the pursuit of Christlikeness. What he wanted for himself he also wanted for them. All of us who are mature should take such a view of things (v. 15). What view of things? The one he had expressed regarding persistently pressing on toward the goal. One mark of spiritual maturity is a desire to go on with Christ. Paul's appeal here was to maturing believers who shared his ambitions. He trusted God to make things clear to those who disagreed with him.

No doubt the greatest need among God's people is to live up to what they already have in Christ. Most live far below their exalted position in Christ. Paul's plea to the Philippians was that they live up to what they had already attained, namely a righteous position in Christ.

2. A WALK OF WATCHFULNESS (3:17-19)

Paul again called on his readers to follow his own example and not that of the Judaizers.

3:17. Having set forth his life ambition to be more Christlike, Paul did not hesitate to tell the Philippians to follow his example. He wanted them to imitate him. Surely he did not mean that they should imitate every single area of his life, for he had just stated that he was not sinlessly perfect. But in the matter of relentlessly pursuing after Christlikeness, he did set himself up as an example. Those Philippians who followed him would join with others who were already doing so.

3:18-19. These verses give the reasons for the exhortations in verse 17: many live as enemies of the cross of Christ. Believers should be able to determine truth from error (cf. 1 John 4:6). Paul was so concerned about the Philippians' spiritual welfare that he warned them often and wept as he did so.

As enemies of God these false teachers were destined for destruction. Those Paul warned against were perhaps profligates in incipient Gnosticism who trusted in their own attainments and not in the sufficiency of Christ alone. All who do so are not children of God, so they await destruction. This word (apōleia) does not mean annihilation but rather ruination by separation from the presence of God in eternal judgment.

Three further descriptions of these false teachers follow. First, their god is their stomach. They had in mind only their own physical desires and unrestrained gluttony (cf. Rom. 16:18).

Second, their glory is in their shame. Instead of giving glory to God these teachers heaped praise on themselves. Ironically they prided themselves in the things they should have been ashamed of.

Third, their mind is on earthly things. It is certainly not wrong for God's people to care about their earthly affairs. But those Paul warned against here were depending on earthly things to gain merit with God. The apostle frequently alerted the people of God against such a lifestyle (cf. Gal. 4:3, 9-11; Col. 2:21-22).

3. A WALK COMPLETED (3:20-21)

3:20-21. The people of Philippi were living there as colonists while their citizenship was in Rome. Similarly Christians, while living on earth, have their citizenship elsewhere—in heaven. This contrasts with those in verse 19 whose minds are exclusively on earthly things.

The believer looks with keen anticipation for his Savior's return from heaven. Eagerly await translates a word (apekdechometha) that suggests a tiptoe anticipation and longing. This word is also used in Romans 8:19, 23, 25; 1 Corinthians 1:7; Galatians 5:5; Hebrews 9:28.

At the Rapture of the church, Christ will transform (metaschēmatisei, "change the outward form of") our lowly bodies so that they will be like (symmorphon, "identical in essential character"; cf. the participle symmorphizomenos in Phil. 3:10) His glorious body. Then every child of God will be made like the Son of God (1 John 3:2), that is, all Christians will receive glorified bodies like His. No more will they have the limitations they now experience in their "lowly" bodies, which are humbled by disease and sin. Their resurrected bodies will be like Christ's, and their sanctification will be completed.

IV. Enablement for Living the Christian Life (4:1-23)

A. Christ at the center (4:1-7)

Paul's love for the Philippians, which is evident throughout this letter, is especially apparent in the opening verses of chapter 4. One of his chief concerns was that these people would be characterized by the fruit of the Spirit. Love, joy, and peace were uppermost in his heart and mind for them. In order to experience these Christian graces Christ must be at the center of a believer's life. Paul made this plain as he wrote to the saints at Philippi.

1. STANDING FAST IN HIM (4:1-3)

In these verses the apostle first gave a general plea for unity and steadfastness and then a specific plea to two women.

4:1. Therefore introduces this exhortation and applies what he wrote in chapter 3 about sanctification and glorification. The apostle's affection for this congregation is revealed by his love and longing for them and his calling them his brothers (cf. "brothers" in 1:12; 3:1, 13, 17; 4:8), his joy and crown (stephanos, the runner's wreath or victor's crown; cf. 1 Thes. 2:19-20), and his dear friends (cf. Phil. 2:12). These saints were to their spiritual father what victory wreaths were to runners in the Greek races. The believers were exhorted to stand firm in the Lord (cf. 1:27, where Paul urged the same steadfastness).

4:2. Two women, Euodia and Syntyche, did not live up to the meanings of their names. "Euodia" means a "prosperous journey." "Syntyche" means a "pleasant acquaintance." Since Paul pleaded with these two to agree with each other in the Lord, it seems that they were causing dissension in the assembly. This helps explain Paul's earlier plea for unity (2:1-4).

4:3. At one time Euodia and Syntyche contended at Paul's side in the cause of the gospel. But as he wrote they were not in harmony with each other. They were contentious, rather than content.

The exact identity of Paul's loyal yokefellow is not known. Some say "yokefellow" (syzyge) is a proper name. Paul knew he could count on him to work with the women and bring them back to fellowship with each other and with the Lord. Clement and other fellow workers had also contended for the gospel with these women. (This is more likely than supposing the words "along with Clement and the rest of my fellow workers" go with "help," as though Paul were enlisting Clement and others to help Syzygus unite the women.)

2. REJOICING IN HIM (4:4)

4:4. Sometimes the trials and pressures of life make it almost impossible to be happy. But Paul did not tell his readers to be happy. He encouraged them to rejoice in the Lord. In fact, he said it twice in verse 4 (cf. 3:1; 1 Thes. 5:16). Christ is the One in whom the sphere of rejoicing was to take place. Surely there are many circumstances in which Christians cannot be happy. But they can always rejoice in the Lord and delight in Him. Paul himself was an excellent example of one who had inner joy when external circumstances—such as persecution, imprisonment, the threat of death—were against him.

3. LIVING IN THE LIGHT OF HIS PRESENCE (4:5-7)

4:5. In addition to joy, believers are to have gentleness, which is to be evident to all. Epieikes ("gentleness") suggests a forebearing, nonretaliatory spirit. Joy, an inner quality in relation to circumstances, may not always be seen; but the way one reacts to others—whether in gentleness or harshness—will be noticed. Why be gentle? Because the Lord is near. This probably refers to the Rapture, not to His presence with His own at all times.

4:6-7. Joy and gentleness (vv. 4-5), accompanied with an awareness of Christ's imminent return, should dispel anxiety. Paul's appeal to the Philippians is do not be anxious about anything. But this was not a call to a carefree life. To care and be genuinely concerned is one thing. To worry is another. Paul and Timothy cared for the people they ministered to (2 Cor. 11:28; Phil. 2:20), yet they retained trust in God. Jesus warned against worry which obviously eliminates trust in God (Matt. 6:25-33).

Paul exhorted the Philippians to prayer instead of anxiety. Praying with thanksgiving involves trusting God. Four words are used here to describe a believer's communion with God. Prayer (proseuchē) describes a believer's approach to God. Petition (deēsei) emphasizes requesting an answer to a specific need. Thanksgiving (eucharistias) is an attitude of heart which should always accompany one's prayers. Requests (aitēmata) speak of definite and specific things asked for.

When the exhortations of verses 4-6 are heeded, the peace of God (v. 7) will flood one's troubled soul. The Lord Jesus Christ is a believer's peace (Eph. 2:14), and every child of God has peace with God through justification by faith (Rom. 5:1). But the peace of (or from) God relates to the inner tranquility of a believer's close walk with God.

This peace of God transcends all understanding, that is, it is beyond man's ability to comprehend. This peace guards the believers. Guard (phrourēsei, also used in 1 Peter 1:5) translates a military term which means "to protect or garrison by guarding." Like soldiers assigned to watch over a certain area, God's peace garrisons the hearts and . . . minds, that is, the emotions and thoughts, of God's children.

B. God's presence with believers (4:8-9)

1. THINKING WORTHY THOUGHTS (4:8)

4:8. By the word finally Paul indicated he was about to conclude the section. Six items are mentioned as objects of a wholesome thought life, and each one is introduced with whatever. In the Greek "whatever" is plural, which suggests that several things could be included under each heading.

True (alēthē) things are of course the opposite of dishonest and unreliable things (cf. Eph. 4:15, 25). Noble refers to what is dignified and worthy of respect (this word semna is used in the NT only here and in 1 Tim. 3:8, 11; Titus 2:2). Right refers to conformity to God's standards. Pure (hagna) refers to what is wholesome, not mixed with moral impurity. Lovely (prosphilē, occurring only here in the NT) speaks of what promotes peace rather than conflict. Admirable (euphēma, also used only here) relates to what is positive and constructive rather than negative and destructive.

These six objects of thought are then described as excellent (aretē) and praiseworthy (epainos).

2. DOING WORTHY DEEDS (4:9)

4:9. The Christian life involves proper thinking (v. 8), but it also includes doing righteous deeds.

Since the Philippians knew Paul well, he could ask them to follow his example. They had learned . . . received and heard from him, and they had even seen the apostle's conduct. As they put these things (from Paul's teaching and living) into practice, they would enjoy the presence of the God of peace (cf. "the peace of God," v. 7).

C. God's supply of human needs (4:10-20)

Epaphroditus was the messenger the Philippians sent to bring their gift to Paul (4:18). It appears that Paul wrote this letter as both a thank-you note and as a word of greeting and exhortation. The apostle could certainly testify that God does supply His people's needs.

1. THE LESSON OF CONTENTMENT (4:10-13)

4:10-13. Paul's heart was made glad (I rejoice greatly in the Lord) because of the continued interest the Philippian Christians showed in him. They had not forgotten him; through them God had met his needs. Even before they sent Epaphroditus they were concerned but had no opportunity to show it.

Paul did not beg God's people to help him in his work. He just placed the need before them and trusted God to meet it. Too, he had learned the lesson of contentment. Changing circumstances did not affect the inner contentment he enjoyed. The word content (autarkēs) means "self-sufficient." The Stoics used this word (which occurs only here in the NT) to mean human self-reliance and fortitude, a calm acceptance of life's pressures. But Paul used it to refer to a divinely bestowed sufficiency, whatever the circumstances.

At times Paul experienced definite financial and material needs, and at other times he had an abundance (v. 12). He learned how to cope with both need and plenty. The words I have learned the secret translate memyēmai (from myeō), which occurs only here in the New Testament. In the mystery religions it was a technical term meaning "to initiate (into the mysteries)." Paul used it here to suggest a kind of "initiation" (by his experiences) into being content when either well fed or hungry, and either in plenty or in want.

Paul said he could do everything—including handling poverty and living in abundance—through Him who gave him strength. This was not an expression of pride in his own abilities but a declaration of the strength provided by Christ.

2. THE BLESSING OF GIVING AND RECEIVING (4:14-20)

4:14-16. Though Paul was content no matter what the circumstances, he was nevertheless grateful for the help the Philippians sent with Epaphroditus.

Because they gave of their means they shared with the apostle in his troubles; they did something about his problem.

In the very beginning of their Christian experience (Acts 16) when Paul left Macedonia they alone shared with him in the matter of giving and receiving. And again when Paul was in Thessalonica on his second missionary journey (Acts 17:1) and experienced definite need, the Philippians sent him aid twice.

4:17-20. Others were always uppermost in Paul's mind. He was not looking for a gift simply to satisfy his own needs. He wanted credit to come to the account of the Philippians.

Since these people had already helped him so much, Paul did not want them to think he was still looking for more from them. He had received from the Philippians full payment, all the money they had sent, so he was then abounding and was amply supplied. What they had sent with Epaphroditus (2:25-30) had an effect on both him and God, for the gifts were a fragrant offering, an acceptable sacrifice, pleasing to God. The term "fragrant offering" was used in Leviticus (in the LXX) for an offering that pleased God. It also was used in Ephesians 5:2 of Christ's offering of Himself.

God would reciprocate to the Philippians. They had met Paul's needs and now God would meet theirs. God would not only bless them out of or from His bounty but also in accordance with (kata) it: according to His glorious riches in Christ Jesus.

To our God—his heavenly Father and theirs—the apostle gave thanks and praise.

D. Conclusion (4:21-23)

4:21-23. Final greetings came to the Philippians from Paul, from his fellow workers, and from other believers.

The apostle sent his greetings from all the saints (v. 21). He addressed "all the saints" (1:1) in writing the epistle. The brothers who were with Paul also sent greetings. Timothy was certainly included in this group. The saints (v. 22) who sent greetings were those in the church in Rome (Rom. 16:1-15).

Those who belong to Caesar's household (Phil. 4:22) were probably those who had come to Christ as a result of Paul's house arrest. They probably included soldiers and relatives of Caesar's household. No wonder Paul could say that what had happened to him had advanced the gospel (1:12).

As was his usual practice Paul gave great prominence to Christ's marvelous grace as he concluded his letter (cf. Phile. 25).

COLOSSIANS

Norman L. Geisler

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Colossians was written by the Apostle Paul about A.D. 60–62, while he was imprisoned in Rome. One purpose was to correct the heresy that had sprung up in the Asian city of Colosse.

Author. The Pauline authorship of Colossians is supported by abundant evidence both in and out of the book. Colossians has three personal references to Paul in the first person (1:1; 1:23; 4:18) and numerous references to Paul's associates, such as Tychicus (4:7), Onesimus (4:9), Aristarchus (4:10), Mark (4:10), Justus (4:11), Epaphras (4:12), Luke (4:14), Demas (4:14), and Archippus (4:17). The style and content of Colossians is similar to Ephesians, written about the same time and probably alluded to as "the letter from Laodicea" (4:16).

While 34 Greek words are unique to Colossians, they are characteristic of the theme of the book and fit the thoughts of Paul. Words in this category include "visible" (1:16), "supremacy" (1:18), "fill up" (1:24), "philosophy" (2:8), and "Deity" (2:9).

The conclusion of Ephesians confirms that Tychicus was the carrier of both it and Colossians (Eph. 6:21; cf. Col. 4:7). This helps confirm Paul as the author of the Colossian epistle.

The external evidence for Paul's authorship is strong, despite the claim of some that the heresy combated in the book is second-century Gnosticism. But there is good reason to believe that the heresy addressed in Colossians (at least in its incipient form) had appeared already in Paul's lifetime. And in view of Paul's other encounters with heresies, in books which are unquestionably his, it seems clear that he authored Colossians (cf. 1 Cor. 15; Gal. 1–2; 2 Thes. 2).

Colossians includes some stylistic differences such as unusual genitival combinations: "the hope of glory" (Col. 1:27), "body of . . . flesh" (2:11, NASB), "growth . . . from God" (2:19, NASB), "reward of . . . inheritance" (3:24, NASB). However, as Donald Guthrie correctly observed, "stylistic differences are generally attributable to changing circumstances or subject matter" (New Testament Introduction. Downers Grove, Ill.: Inter-Varsity Press, 1973, p. 553).

One of the strongest lines of evidence that Colossians is a first-century work of the Apostle Paul is its close link to the Book of Philemon, the authenticity of which is virtually impeccable. (1) Both books include Timothy's name with Paul's in the opening greeting (Col. 1:1; Phile. 1). (2) Greetings are sent in both books from Aristarchus, Mark, Epaphras, Luke, and Demas (Col. 4:10-14; Phile. 23-24). (3) Archippus' ministry is referred to in both books (Col. 4:17; Phile. 2). (4) Onesimus the slave is mentioned in both books (Col. 4:9; Phile. 10).

Date and Place of Writing. Colossians was written from Rome during Paul's (first) imprisonment there, as recorded in Acts 28:30. At the same time Paul wrote Ephesians and Philemon (ca. A.D. 60–62). In Philemon 1, 9 Paul referred to himself as "a prisoner of Christ Jesus." Ephesians also contains references to Paul being a "prisoner" (Eph. 3:1; 4:1). And Ephesians refers to Tychicus carrying the epistles from Paul to their destinations (Eph. 6:21; cf. Col. 4:7). Since the record of Acts ends around A.D. 60–62, Colossians was probably written during this two-year imprisonment. And since neither Colossians, Ephesians, nor Philemon mention the outcome of Paul's trial, anticipated in Philippians 1:19-21, it can be assumed that Colossians was written before Philippians.

Colosse was in the Lycus Valley, about 100 miles east of Ephesus in Asia Minor. Its name is possibly derived from Colossus, a large statue, which in turn may have been named for the unusual shape of stony deposits there. Colosse is about 12 miles from Hierapolis and Laodicea, the other two cities of that valley (see the location of these three on the map between Acts and Rom.). The area was rich in mineral deposits and was also subject to frequent earthquakes. Rich pasturelands were nearby. Several references in Colossians indicate that Paul had not visited the city (Col. 1:7; 2:1; 4:12).

Occasion. The circumstance which prompted the writing of Colossians seemed to be the special heresy that arose there. This false teaching seemed to be the beginning of what later (in the second century) developed into Gnosticism. It contained several characteristics. (1) It was Jewish, stressing the need for observing Old Testament laws and ceremonies. (2) It was philosophical, laying emphasis on some special or deeper knowledge (gnōsis). (3) It involved the worship of angels as mediators to God (2:18). (4) It was exclusivistic, stressing the special privilege and "perfection" of those select few who belonged to this philosophical elite. (5) It was also Christological. But this seminal Gnosticism denied the deity of Christ, thus calling forth one of the greatest declarations of Christ's deity found anywhere in Scripture (1:15-16; 2:9).

Purposes. Three purposes seem to have been in Paul's mind as he wrote Colossians. First, he sought to show the deity and supremacy of Christ in the face of the Colossian heresy (1:18; 2:9). Second, he wanted to lead believers into spiritual maturity (1:28; 2:6-7). Third, he wanted to inform them about his state of affairs and elicited their prayers on his behalf (4:2-8).

Contents. The epistle may be summarized as follows: "Greetings, brothers (1:1-2). We thank God for your faith and love (1:3-8). And we ask God to fill you with the knowledge of His will. We pray this so that you will be fruitful for Christ who has redeemed you (1:9-14). For Christ, our Creator and Head, is supreme in all things (1:15-20). And through Christ's death God has reconciled you who were aliens and enemies (1:21-23). So I rejoice that I can suffer for the church so that God's fullness can be known by the Gentiles (1:24-27). To this end we labor that everyone may be perfect in Christ (1:28-29). For all true wisdom and knowledge is found in Christ (2:1-5). Therefore, brothers, just as you began with Christ, continue in Him (2:6-7).

"Now don't be deceived: God's fullness is in Christ alone and not in vain human philosophy (2:8-10). And since you have been identified with Christ in your baptism, you have no need to live under Jewish laws (2:11-17). And don't let anyone rob you of your prize by forsaking Christ your Head (2:18-19). For you died with Christ, so you need not submit to worldly (legalistic) rules (2:20-23). And since you were raised with Christ, you should set your hearts on heavenly things above (3:1-4). So put to death your sinful worldly practices (3:5-11). And clothe yourself with Christ's virtues (3:15-17).

"In view of your new exalted identity with Christ, I exhort wives to submit to their husbands; husbands to love their wives; children to obey their parents; fathers not to embitter their children; slaves to obey their masters; and masters to be fair with their slaves (3:18–4:1).

"Brothers, pray for me that I may preach this message effectively and clearly, and you live wisely toward outsiders (4:2-6). My coworkers in the gospel send greetings to you (4:7-15). Exchange letters with the Laodiceans and exhort Archippus to complete his ministry (4:16-18)."

COMMENTARY

I. Doctrinal: Deeper Life in Christ (1:1–2:7)

A. Greetings (1:1-2)

1:1-2. In all but his two earliest epistles (1 and 2 Thes.) and his personal letter to the Philippians, Paul began by designating himself as an apostle (see the chart, "Paul's Introductions to His Epistles," near Rom. 1:1-7). He was not one of the 12 Apostles (Acts 1:21-26) who were with Christ from the beginning of His earthly ministry (Acts 1:22; Luke 1:2; John 15:27). Nevertheless he did see the risen Christ (1 Cor. 9:1; 15:8-9), and he did possess special miraculous powers given to authenticate apostles (2 Cor. 12:12; cf. Heb. 2:3-4).

Timothy was with Paul here as he often was (cf. 2 Cor. 1:1; Phil. 1:1; 2 Thes. 1:1). Timothy had a Gentile father (Acts 16:1) but his mother and grandmother were godly Jewesses (2 Tim. 1:5) from whom he had learned the Old Testament Scriptures from childhood (2 Tim. 3:15). Paul picked up Timothy on his second missionary journey at Lystra where the "brothers . . . spoke well of him" (Acts 16:2). Paul spent much time discipling Timothy and wrote two of his last letters to him.

Paul addressed the Colossian believers as the holy and faithful brothers in Christ. This phrase marks them as holy people, chosen and set apart for God. It parallels the Ephesian introduction to "the saints . . . the faithful in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 1:1). Paul's characteristic greeting, grace and peace includes charis ("grace"), a variation of the normal Greek salutation, chaire ("Greetings"; cf. Luke 1:28). Chaire probably suggested the similar-sounding but richer charis. His greeting also includes the normal Jewish salutation, "peace." So Paul wished for them God's favor (grace) and a healthy condition of life (peace).

B. Thanksgiving (1:3-8)

1:3-4. Giving continual thanks to God was characteristic of Paul's prayers (Rom. 1:8; 1 Cor. 1:14; Eph. 1:6; etc.), though he omitted this praise in Galatians and 2 Corinthians. Here God is recognized as the cause of goodness in His people. This thanks, Paul said, is rendered when we pray. And thanksgiving was given because Paul had heard (from Epaphras, Col. 1:7; cf. 4:12) about their growing faith in Christ Jesus and their love . . . for all the saints. Prayer here is the broader, more inclusive act of worship including thanksgiving and intercession (cf. Matt. 6:7; Acts 16:25).

1:5. Paul thanked God for their faith and love that spring from . . . hope.

This trilogy of virtue—faith, love, and hope—is a favorite of Paul's (cf. 1 Cor. 13:13; 1 Thes. 1:3) and Peter's (1 Peter 1:3, 5, 22). Faith is the soul looking upward to God; love looks outward to others; hope looks forward to the future. Faith rests on the past work of Christ; love works in the present; and hope anticipates the future. Even though "without faith it is impossible to please God" (Heb. 11:6), and "hope does not disappoint us" (Rom. 5:5), nevertheless "the greatest of these is love" (1 Cor. 13:13). The Colossians' love extended to "all the saints" (Col. 1:4), or all believers, probably not only at Colosse but everywhere (cf. 1 Thes. 1:7-8 for a similar commendation).

Faith and love "spring from" (dia, lit., are "on account of") "hope," confidence in what God will do in the future. This confidence led to a greater trust in God and a deeper love for others. This confident expectation of Christ's return, called "the blessed hope" (Titus 2:13), influences believers' conduct (cf. 1 Thes. 4:13-18; 1 John 3:3).

This hope is stored up . . . in heaven because Christ, the essence of this hope, is there. Without Christ's Ascension to heaven (Acts 1:10-11) and His present intercession there on behalf of believers (Heb. 7:25; 1 John 2:1), they would have no hope (cf. 1 Cor. 15:16-19). This message is the Word of truth (cf. Eph. 1:13; 2 Tim. 2:15; James 1:18), the gospel as Paul defines it here and elsewhere (cf. 1 Cor. 15:1-3; Rom. 10:9-10).

1:6. Paul thanked God because the gospel was spreading all over the world. In fact, in an obvious hyperbole, Paul wrote in verse 23 that the gospel was being "proclaimed to every creature under heaven" (cf. Rom. 1:8). But Paul stressed not only the universality of the gospel but also its practicality, for it was producing fruit and growing. As a tree bears fruit and grows in size, so the gospel produces spiritual "fruit" in believers' lives (cf. "the fruit of the Spirit," Gal. 5:22-23; "the fruit of righteousness," Phil. 1:11) and spreads to and influences others (cf. the same words "bearing fruit" and "growing" in Col. 1:10). Heresies (such as the one at Colosse) are local and harmful; but truth is universal and helpful. One of the unmistakable characteristics of the true gospel is God's grace in all its truth. Some preach a "different gospel—which is really no gospel at all" (Gal. 1:6-7). This is because it is a gospel of grace plus works, or faith plus works. But the true gospel is one of grace alone (Rom. 11:6; Eph. 2:8-9; Titus 3:5-7).

1:7. The Colossians learned it, the gospel, from Epaphras who apparently founded the church at Colosse (cf. 4:12). Paul called him a dear fellow servant, a humble description from a great apostle, and a faithful minister of Christ, as opposed, no doubt, to those unfaithful ones who here and elsewhere were disturbing the faith of God's flock (cf. 2 Cor. 11:15; 2 Peter 2:1-3, 12-19). Paul also called Tychicus "a faithful minister and fellow servant in the Lord" (Col. 4:7). Epaphras was in Rome with Paul, for Paul called him "my fellow prisoner" (Phile. 23). "Epaphras" is a shortening of "Epaphroditus," referred to in Philippians 2:25 and 4:18. These could be the same person or different persons since both names were common.

Epaphras, said Paul, ministered on our behalf, probably as Paul's representative (cf. Phil. 2:25; 4:18 for a similar situation). This implies, of course, that Paul had not visited Colosse himself (cf. Col. 2:1). But even though Epaphras was sent by Paul, he was primarily a "minister of Christ."

1:8. Not only did Epaphras carry the good news of Christ to Colosse, but he also brought back to prisoner Paul the good news about their love in the Spirit for Christ. Believers are in the Spirit and the Spirit is in them (Rom. 8:9). Thus their "love . . . for all the saints" (Col. 1:4; cf. v. 5) stemmed from the indwelling Holy Spirit. Elsewhere Paul urged that by "the love of the Spirit" (Rom. 15:30) believers manifest the "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. 5:22).

C. Petition (1:9-14)

1:9. For this reason, because Paul had heard this good report of them from Epaphras, he continued to pray for them. Paul's ceaseless prayer (we have not stopped praying for you; cf. 1 Thes. 5:17) does not mean that he prayed without ever stopping but that he never forgot to pray for them when he daily and regularly prayed (cf. Acts 20:31; Eph. 1:16). "Praying" (Col. 1:9) is the general word for prayer (proseuchomenoi), also used in v. 3; and asking is the word for petitioning or requesting (aitoumenoi).

Paul's primary petition was that God would fill them with the knowledge of His will. Paul used two key words, "fill" (plēroō) and "knowledge" (epignōsis, also used in v. 10 and 3:10). The first suggests a filling out to completeness, and the latter suggests a full, deep understanding. Such knowledge of God's will does not come from a fleshly mind (which "puffs up," 1 Cor. 8:1), but from the Holy Spirit who enlightens a believer's inner person (1 Cor. 2:5-6, 13), and from the Word of God. God's will, revealed in the Bible, is made known to believers by the Holy Spirit's teaching ministry. To this Paul added, through all spiritual wisdom

(sophia; used six times in Col. 1:9, 28; 2:3, 23; 3:16; 4:5), that is, practical know-how which comes from God (James 1:5; 3:15), and understanding (synesei; also used in Col. 2:2), which speaks of clear analysis and decision-making in applying this knowledge to various problems. By contrast, the false teachers offered only "an appearance of wisdom" (sophia; 2:23), which captivated their minds and lives in legalistic regulations. But true spiritual wisdom is both stabilizing and liberating (Eph. 4:14). Knowledge (or understanding or intelligence) and wisdom are often connected in Scripture (cf. Ex. 31:3 ["skill" in the NIV is the Heb. word for wisdom]; Deut. 4:6; Isa. 11:2; 1 Cor. 1:19). And the fear of the Lord is the beginning of both (cf. Prov. 1:7; 9:10).

1:10. Paul's aim in this petition was practical: in order that you may live a life worthy of the Lord. A genuine knowledge of Christ reveals itself in transformed character (cf. Eph. 4:1; 1 Thes. 2:12), in Christlikeness. Axiōs, "worthy," means "of equal weight." Believers are to equal the Lord's standards, to be holy as He is holy (cf. 1 Peter 1:15). The aim of believers in all their worthy conduct should be to please Him in every way, to anticipate and do His wishes in every aspect of life (cf. Eph. 5:10). Merely pleasing people is incompatible with being a servant of Christ (Gal. 1:10; Eph. 6:6; Col. 3:22; 1 Thes. 2:4). Indeed, Paul made it the ambition of his life to please God (2 Cor. 5:9). Four things, given in participles, result from such a God-pleasing life: "bearing fruit" and "growing" (Col. 1:10), "being strengthened" (v. 11), and "giving thanks" (v. 12). The first two are related: bearing fruit and growing in the knowledge (epignōsei) of God (Paul used these same words "bearing fruit" and "growing," trans. "producing," in v. 6). As one manifests the fruit of faith (cf. Matt. 7:16; Gal. 5:22-23), he grows in faith himself (cf. Eph. 4:13). He comes to a deeper "knowledge" (epignōsis; cf. Col. 1:9) of God. As Augustine put it, "Faith is understanding's step, and understanding is faith's reward."

1:11. Spiritual strength is a third factor that results from knowing God's will and pleasing Him. Being strengthened with all power according to His glorious might includes three words for strength: "being strengthened" is dynamoumenoi; "power" is dynamei, spiritual vitality; and "might" is kratos ("power that overcomes resistance"; used only of God in the NT). This God-given strength produces great endurance and patience. This endurance (trans. "perseverance" in James 1:3) was exemplified by Job (James 5:11). To this endurance Paul added "patience," a word generally connected with gentleness and calm sweetness (as in 1 Cor. 13:4). Endurance and patience are often associated (cf. 2 Cor. 6:4, 6; 2 Tim. 3:10; James 5:10-11). Endurance (hypomonē, lit., a "remaining under") implies not easily succumbing under suffering; and patience (makrothymia, lit., "long temper"; cf. Col. 3:12) means self-restraint which does not hastily retaliate. A lack of endurance often results in despondency or losing heart, whereas a lack of patience often leads to wrath or revenge (cf. Prov. 15:18; 16:32).

All this is according to God's "glorious might" (lit., "might of His glory"). Glory means manifest excellence. It is an outward manifestation of God's inner character. In Ephesians 1:19-20 Paul wrote of God's "great power" (dynamis) and "the working (energeian) of His mighty (kratous) strength (ischyos)," which raised Christ from the dead.

1:12-13. Such patient-producing power should be accompanied by "joyfully," not begrudgingly, giving thanks to the Father from whom comes every good and perfect gift (James 1:17).

Thankfulness, a fourth result of following God's will and pleasing Him, is a keynote in the spiritual life. Believers are urged elsewhere by Paul, "Give thanks in all circumstances" (1 Thes. 5:18) and to come before God "in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving" (Phil. 4:6). Four other times in Colossians (3:15-17; 4:2) Paul enjoined believers to be grateful. Joyfulness too is part of the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22), made possible by the gospel (cf. Isa. 29:19; John 16:20; Acts 13:52). Here Paul centered thanksgiving on the fact that God has qualified you (lit., "made you competent"; cf. 2 Cor. 3:6) to share in the inheritance of the saints (i.e., the kingdom treasures that belong to believers; cf. Eph. 1:7). In short, though believers are unfit in themselves, God has fitted them to share in the inheritance of His holy people. This "inheritance" (tēn merida tou klērou, lit., "the parcel of the lot") is reminiscent of the way the inheritance of the land of promise was given to the Israelites under Joshua (Josh. 14:2). This inheritance is in the . . . light (cf. 2 Cor. 4:6; 1 Peter 2:9). (The NIV, supplying the words "kingdom of," which are not in the Gr., reads "in the kingdom of light.") This light is the spiritual sphere to which believers have been transferred from the dominion of darkness (Luke 22:53; Acts 26:18; Eph. 6:12). From this dominion (exousias, "power, authority") of darkness (cf. John 3:19-20) believers have been rescued, delivered. Through Christ they were brought from a rebel kingdom and placed under the sovereignty of their rightful King. The sovereign Christ is here called the Son He loves (lit., "the Son of His love"; cf. 1 John 4:8, 16). J. B. Lightfoot says this means the Son who embodies and manifests God's love (St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, p. 142). But H.C.G. Moule says it signifies the Son who is "the blessed Object of the Father's love . . . the supremely Beloved One" (The Epistles of Paul the Apostle to the Colossians and to Philemon, p. 75). This seems preferable (cf. Eph. 1:6).

1:14. Through Christ, God's "Loved One," Christians have redemption, the forgiveness of sins. The parallel passage (Eph. 1:7) adds "through His blood" (as do some mss.) here. "Redemption" (apolytrōsin) means "to rescue by ransom" (see the chart, "New Testament Words for Redemption," at Mark 10:45), and "forgiveness" (aphesin) means "remission" by the Redeemer. This emancipation is enjoyed only because of the tremendous cost Christ paid on the cross (cf. Rom. 3:24-26).

D. Exaltation of Christ (1:15-20)

From Paul's petition that the Colossians be enlightened about God's redemptive working in their lives, he moved naturally into his epistle's main emphasis—the exaltation and preeminence of Christ. In this paragraph (vv. 15-20) Paul mentioned seven unique characteristics of Christ, which fittingly qualify Him to have "the supremacy" (v. 18). Christ is: (1) the image of God, (2) the Firstborn over Creation, (3) Creator of the universe, (4) Head of the church, (5) Firstborn from the dead, (6) the fullness of God, and (7) the Reconciler of all things. No comparable listing of so many characteristics of Christ and His deity are found in any other Scripture passage. Christ is the supreme Sovereign of the universe!

1:15. First, Christ is the image of the invisible God. Besides the obvious meaning of likeness (cf. 2 Cor. 4:4), "image" implies representation and manifestation. Like the head of a sovereign imprinted on a coin, so Christ is "the exact representation of [the Father's] being" (Heb. 1:3). As Jesus said, "Anyone who has seen Me has seen the Father" (John 14:9). Anyone who saw Christ, the visible manifestation of the invisible God, has thereby "seen" God indirectly. For "no one has ever seen God, but God the only Son . . . has made Him known" (John 1:18). Paul wrote of the "invisible" God (1 Tim. 1:17), but Christ is the perfect visible representation and manifestation of that God. Though the word "image" (eikōn) does not always denote a perfect image (cf. 1 Cor. 11:7), the context here demands that understanding. Indeed, like the word "form" (morphē; trans. "nature" in Phil. 2:6-7), eikōn means the very substance or essential embodiment of something or someone. In Hebrews 10:1 "shadow" and "the very image" (eikōn), which is Christ, are contrasted (cf. Col. 2:17). So Christ's supremacy is first shown in His relationship with God the Father. Christ is the perfect resemblance and representation of God.

Second, Christ's supremacy is shown in His relationship to Creation. He is the Firstborn over all Creation. Though it is grammatically possible to translate this as "Firstborn in Creation," the context makes this impossible for five reasons: (1) The whole point of the passage (and the book) is to show Christ's superiority over all things. (2) Other statements about Christ in this passage (such as Creator of all [1:16], upholder of Creation [v. 17], etc.) clearly indicate His priority and superiority over Creation. (3) The "Firstborn" cannot be part of Creation if He created "all things." One cannot create himself. (Jehovah's Witnesses wrongly add the word "other" six times in this passage in their New World Translation. Thus they suggest that Christ created all other things after He was created! But the word "other" is not in the Gr.) (4) The "Firstborn" received worship of all the angels (Heb. 1:6), but creatures should not be worshiped (Ex. 20:4-5). (5) The Greek word for "Firstborn" is prōtotokos. If Christ were the "first-created," the Greek word would have been prōtoktisis.

"Firstborn" denotes two things of Christ: He preceded the whole Creation, and He is Sovereign over all Creation. In the Old Testament a firstborn child had not only priority of birth but also the dignity and superiority that went with it (cf. Ex. 13:2-15; Deut. 21:17). When Jesus declared Himself "the First" (ho prōtos; Rev. 1:17), He used a word that means "absolutely first." "Firstborn" also implies sovereignty. The description "firstborn" was not a fairly common Old Testament designation of the Messiah-God. "I will also appoint Him My Firstborn, the most exalted of the kings of the earth" (Ps. 89:27). While this regal psalm refers to David, it also designates the Messiah, as seen in Revelation 1:5, where Christ is called "the Firstborn from the dead (cf. Col. 1:18) and the Ruler of the kings of the earth." So "Firstborn" implies both Christ's priority to all Creation (in time) and His sovereignty over all Creation (in rank).

1:16-17. The third characteristic of Christ is that by Him all things were created. In fact all things were created by Him (di' autou, instrumental Cause) and for Him (eis auton, final Cause), and in Him (en autō) they hold together (He is the constituting or conserving Cause). Christ is not only the One through whom all things came to be, but also the One by whom they continue to exist. Two other New Testament verses parallel this description of Christ: "Through Him all things were made" (John 1:3), and Christ the Son is the One "through whom [the Father] made the universe" (Heb. 1:2). The Father, then, is the ultimate Source (efficient Cause), and the Son is the mediating Cause of the world. The Son was the "master Workman" of Creation, "the beginning (archē) of the Creation of God" (Rev. 3:14, NASB).

The Son's Creation includes "all" things in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible. These indicate the entire universe, both material and immaterial. The hierarchy of angelic beings—thrones (thronoi) or powers (kyriotētes) or rulers (archai) or authorities (exousiai)—indicate a highly organized dominion in the spirit world, a sphere in which the Colossians were engaged in the worship of angels (Col. 2:18) and over which Christ reigns supreme (cf. Eph. 1:21; 3:10; 6:12; Phil. 2:9-10; Col. 2:10, 15).

1:18. Fourth, Christ is the Head of the body, the church. Besides being the Lord of the universe He is also the church's Head (cf. Eph. 1:22-23; 5:23). The reference here is to the invisible or universal church into which all believers are baptized by the Holy Spirit the moment they believe in Christ (1 Cor. 12:13). This work of the Spirit began on the day of Pentecost (Acts 1:5; 2:1-2; 11:15-16). It is a special body in which there is "neither Jew nor Gentile" (Gal. 3:28) but a whole new creation of God (Eph. 2:15). The church is a "mystery . . . which was not made known to men in other generations" (Eph. 3:4-5; cf. Rom. 16:25-26; Col. 1:26).

Fifth, Christ is the Beginning (archē) and the Firstborn from among the dead (cf. Rev. 1:5). Christ was the first to rise in an immortal body (1 Cor. 15:20), and as such He heads a whole new order as its Sovereign (cf. "Firstborn" in Col. 1:15). Also Christ's resurrection marked His triumph over death (Heb. 2:14; 1 John 3:8). He was the "Firstfruits" of those who die (1 Cor. 15:20) since, unlike others, He rose never to die again. He "was declared with power to be the Son of God by His resurrection from the dead" (Rom. 1:4). So He continues to live "on the basis of the power of an indestructible life" (Heb. 7:16). All this is so that in everything He might have the supremacy. Christ is given first place over all Creation. He is preeminent. The same eternal Logos (John 1:1) who "became flesh" (John 1:14) and "humbled Himself" (Phil. 2:8) is now "exalted" by God the Father "to the highest place" and has been given "the name that is above every name" (Phil. 2:9).

1:19. The sixth description of the exalted Christ is that all God's fullness dwell[s] in Him. Later Paul wrote, "In Christ all the fullness of the Deity lives in bodily form" (2:9). Colossians 1:19 is one of the most powerful descriptions of Christ's deity in the New Testament (cf. Heb. 1:8). "Fullness" (plērōma), a key word in Colossians, is used in 1:19 and 2:9. (The verb plēroō is used in 1:9, 25; 2:10; and 4:17.) The noun means "completeness" and is used of a wide range of things including God's being (Eph. 3:19), time (Gal. 4:4), and grace in Christ (John 1:16). This full and complete Deity is said to "dwell" (katoikēsai, "abide lastingly or permanently") in Christ.

1:20. The seventh feature of Christ is that He is the Reconciler. Through Christ God will reconcile to Himself all things. The phrase "all things" is limited to good angels and redeemed people since only things on earth and things in heaven are mentioned. Things "under the earth" (Phil. 2:10) are not reconciled. On God's restoring of nature, see comments on Romans 8:19-21; and on the reconciling of sinners, see comments on Romans 5:10-11 and 2 Corinthians 5:17-20. It is important to note that people are reconciled to God ("to Himself") not that God is reconciled to people. For mankind has left God and needs to be brought back to Him. In 2 Corinthians 5:19 "reconciliation" was used by Paul in a judicial (vs. an actual) sense in which the whole "world" is made savable through Christ's death. Paul spoke of "the many" (i.e., "those who receive God's abundant provision of grace") being "made righteous" through the Cross (Rom. 5:19). To make peace through His blood means to cause God's enemies (Rom. 5:10; Col. 1:21) to become, by faith, His friends and His children (cf. Eph. 2:11-19).

E. Reconciliation by Christ (1:21-23)

1:21. Having struck the note of reconciliation as the seventh characteristic of the exalted Christ, Paul then developed that theme. Reconciliation is necessary because people are alienated ("cut off, estranged") from life and God (Eph. 2:12; 4:18). Before conversion the Colossian believers also were enemies or hostile to God in their minds as well as in their behavior, internally and externally. Sin begins in the heart (Matt. 5:27-28) and manifests itself in overt deeds (Gal. 5:19). ("In the sphere of your evil deeds" is better than NIV's because of your evil behavior. People are not inwardly hostile vs. God because of their outward acts of sins; they commit sins because they are inwardly hostile.)

1:22. Reconciliation of sinners to God is by Christ's physical body through death. The Gnostic tendency of the Colossian heresy, with its Platonic orientation, denied both Christ's true humanity and His true deity. As John explained, it is necessary to confess "that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh" (1 John 4:2). Spirits cannot die, and "without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness" (Heb. 9:22). In order to redeem humans, Christ Himself must be truly human (cf. 1 Tim. 2:5; Heb. 2:17). Thus Christ's real physical body and death were necessary for man's salvation (cf. Rom. 7:4; Heb. 10:10).

The result of Christ's death is redemptive—to present you holy in His sight. This may mean judicially perfect as to a believer's position, or spiritually perfect as to his condition. Ultimately God envisions both for believers, and Christ's death is the basis for judicial justification (Rom. 3:21-26), progressive sanctification (Rom. 6–7), and even ultimate glorification (Rom. 8). As Paul wrote the Ephesians, "He chose us in Him before the Creation of the world to be holy and blameless in His sight" (Eph. 1:4). Christians are without blemish (amōmous; correctly translated "blameless" in Eph. 1:4 and Phil. 2:15; cf. "without . . . blemish" in Eph. 5:27 and "without fault" in Jude 24) in Christ, and also are free from accusation (anenklētous). This latter Greek word is used five times in the New Testament and only by Paul (here and in 1 Cor. 1:8; 1 Tim. 3:10; Titus 1:6-7). It connotes one who is unaccused, free from all charges. Satan is "the accuser of the brethren" (Rev. 12:10, KJV), but Christ is their "Advocate" (1 John 2:1, KJV) or "Defense" (1 John 2:1, NIV) before the Father. Therefore by the merits of Christ believers are free from every charge (cf. Rom. 8:33). In Christ the accused are unaccused and the condemned are freed.

1:23. This reconciliation in Christ comes only by an abiding faith—if you continue in your faith. The Colossians had a settled faith—established (i.e., "grounded" like a building on a strong foundation) and firm (hedraioi, "seated or settled"; cf. 1 Cor. 7:37; 15:58), so Paul did not doubt that they would continue. In fact he spoke of the hope (confident expectation) which this gospel of reconciliation provides not only to them but also to the whole world—to every creature under heaven. This is obviously a figure of speech indicating the universality of the gospel and its proclamation, not that every person on the globe heard Paul preach. In Acts 2:5 this phrase describes a wide range of people from various countries without including, for example, anyone from North or South America (cf. also Gen. 41:57; 1 Kings 10:24; Rom. 1:8).

F. Revelation of the mystery of Christ (1:24-27)

1:24. This reconciliation by Christ of Jews and Gentiles to God in one body is a mystery revealed only in Christ. Paul rejoiced that he was able to suffer for them what was still lacking in regard to Christ's afflictions. By this he did not mean that Christ's suffering on the cross was insufficient (cf. Rom. 3:21-26; Heb. 10:10-14). He was speaking not of salvation but of service. Christ's suffering alone procures salvation (1 Peter 1:11; 5:1; Heb. 2:9). But it is a believer's privilege to suffer for Christ (2 Tim. 3:11; 1 Peter 3:13-14; 5:9; Heb. 10:32). The word "affliction" (thlipsis)—never used in the New Testament of Christ's death—means "distress," "pressure," or "trouble" (which Paul had plenty of; 2 Cor. 11:23-29). Ordinarily it refers to trials in life, not the pains of death. Christ does indeed continue to suffer when Christians suffer for Him. He asked Saul (later called Paul) on the Damascus Road, "Why do you persecute Me?" (Acts 9:4) Since the church is Christ's body, He is affected when it is affected. For the sake of Christ's body Paul willingly suffered (Phil. 1:29).

1:25-26. He was a God-ordained servant of the precious truth of the Word of God in its fullness (cf. 1:9; 2:9). The Colossian heresy boasted of a "fullness" of knowledge possible only through their mystical experience. But Paul declared that the fullness of the mystery is found only in Christ. By "mystery" he meant something once concealed but then revealed. This contrasted with the Colossian heretics' notion that a mystery was a secret teaching known only to an exclusive group and unknown to the masses. The church was unknown in the Old Testament because it had been kept hidden for ages and generations. In fact, said Paul, it is only now disclosed to the saints. Since the church is Christ's body, resulting from His death on the cross, it could not possibly have been in existence in the Old Testament. Indeed, Jesus, when on earth, said it was yet future (Matt. 16:16-18). Since the church is Christ's body, welded together by the baptism of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 12:13), the church's birthday occurred when this baptism took place (Acts 1:5; 2). Soon Saul recognized that this mysterious body of Christ, the church, was in existence and that he was persecuting it (Acts 9:4; cf. Gal. 1:13).

The "mystery" of the church, however, does not mean that Gentile salvation and blessing was unforeseen before Christ (cf. Luke 2:29-32; Amos 9:11-12). The mystery was not that Gentiles would be saved but how they could be "fellow-heirs" (Eph. 3:6, KJV), on the same level with Jews, with no middle wall of partition between them (Eph. 2:12-14). In the Old Testament Gentiles who believed and became a part of Judaism were still considered lower than Jews. This special union in which there "is neither Jew nor Greek" (i.e., Gentile, Gal. 3:28) was nonexistent before Christ died and the Spirit descended to baptize all believers into this new body. (For a list of other NT "mysteries" see the chart near Matt. 13:10-16.)

1:27. God has chosen to make known this mystery to New Testament saints. He willed in His sovereign mercy to reveal His eternal purpose with all its glorious riches (i.e., divine effulgence or blazing splendor). The amazing thing is that this is now revealed among the Gentiles, whereas previously God's special revelation was to the Jews (Rom. 2:17; 3:1-2; 9:4). Now those "who once were far away have been brought near through the blood of Christ" (Eph. 2:13). Those "without hope and without God" (Eph. 2:12) have been given a glorious hope which is Christ in you (i.e., in you Gentiles; Col. 1:27). Because of "the glorious riches" (lit., "the riches of the glory"), believers are indwelt by Christ, the hope of glory. They are thus "in Christ" (2 Cor. 5:17; Eph. 1:4), and Christ is in them (cf. Rom. 8:10; 2 Cor. 13:5). Because of Christ, believers look forward to sharing His glory (Col. 3:4; Rom. 5:2;

8:18, 30; 2 Cor. 4:17; Gal. 5:5; 1 Peter 5:10; also cf. Rom. 8:24).

G. Perfection in Christ (1:28-29)

1:28-29. Paul, in proclaiming this Christ who now also dwells in Gentile believers was admonishing (nouthetountes, "counseling") and teaching (didaskontes, "instructing") everyone (cf. 3:16). No doubt he did this "admonishing" and instructing because of the false teaching about Christ in Colosse. He did so wisely (cf. 4:5-6) since his purpose was not to drive them into the hands of the heretics but to present everyone perfect (teleion, "mature"; cf. James 1:4) in Christ. Paul was interested in believers not remaining spiritual babies (cf. 1 Cor. 3:1-2) but in becoming spiritually mature (cf. Heb. 5:11-14). Elsewhere Paul prayed for complete sanctification of believers (1 Thes. 5:23). Paul preached the "fullness" of the gospel so that believers could have the fullness of life Jesus promised (John 10:10). To this end Paul expended all his God-given strength. Developing maturity in believers took great labor (kopiō) or wearisome toil (cf. 1 Cor. 15:10, 58; Gal. 4:11; 1 Thes. 1:3) and even struggling (agōnizomenos; cf. Col. 2:1; 4:12) or agonizing like an athlete in an arena (cf. 1 Cor. 9:25; 1 Tim. 6:12). The power for this struggle came from Christ (cf. Phil. 4:13).

H. Education (wisdom) in Christ (2:1-5)

2:1. Paul's labor (agōna, struggling; cf. 1:29; 4:12) of love was not limited to those he personally knew; it extended to all who had not met him personally. This is a clear indication that Paul had not started this or other churches in the Lycus Valley. The mention of Laodicea (cf. 4:16) indicates that the heresy had spread there too, though it was probably centered in Colosse.

2:2-3. Paul's stated purpose was that they might be encouraged in heart and united in love. Confidence and strength of conviction as well as cohesive unity yield a full understanding of the truth. There is no full knowledge apart from moral commitment. Complete understanding (syneseōs, "insight") results from complete yielding. And this understanding is Christocentric. This insight into God's ways enables believers to know (epignōsin) Christ fully. Christ, as the true mystery of God, reveals God to man (cf. John 1:18; Heb. 1:2-3). For in Him are hidden (cf. Col. 1:26) all the treasures of wisdom (sophia, cf. 1:9) and knowledge. Knowledge is the apprehension of truth; wisdom is its application to life. Knowledge is prudent judgment and wisdom is prudent action. Both are found in Christ (cf. Rom. 11:33; 1 Cor. 12:8) whose wisdom is foolishness to the world (1 Cor. 1:21-25), but who is the power of God by which a believer receives "righteousness, holiness, and redemption" (1 Cor. 1:30).

2:4-5. Only this full knowledge and wisdom of Christ can keep a believer from being deceived by fine-sounding arguments (pithanologia, occurring only here in the NT, is lit., "persuasive speech" that uses plausible but false arguments). Truth and persuasion do not always correlate. Error can persuade, and truth can be compelling at times. It all depends on whether one has the full truth and a complete commitment to it. Hence even though Paul was absent from the Colossians, he delighted in how orderly (cf. 1 Cor. 14:40) and how firm (steadfast, solid) their faith in Christ was.

I. Exhortation to live in Christ (2:6-7)

2:6-7. These two verses conclude the argument begun in 1:15. Paul's point may be summarized thus: Divine exaltation belongs to Christ (1:15-20); in Him are found (a) reconciliation to God (1:21-23), (b) the revelation of the mystery of Christ (1:24-27), (c) believers' perfection (1:28-29), and (d) education (wisdom) (2:1-5). Therefore believers should continue to live in Him (vv. 6-7).

The Christian life continues as it commenced: just as you received Christ Jesus as Lord, continue to live in Him. Paul gave the same kind of exhortation to others (cf. 2 Cor. 11:4; Gal. 1:6). Since their faith initially laid hold decisively on the apostolic gospel, Paul exhorted them not to forsake its divine authority for any human sophistry. For with these divine roots (rooted . . . in Him) that began in the past they can be continually built up (edified) and strengthened in the faith. If they did so they would not be blown to and fro with every wind of doctrine (Eph. 4:14). As believers are "built up" in Christ, they become more grateful and are overflowing with thankfulness (cf. Col. 1:12).

II. Polemical: Higher Life in Christ (2:8-23)

After exhorting believers to continue in Christ (2:6-7)—in whom is the fullness of God and who brought complete redemption—Paul then condemned the Colossian heresy that was diverting them from Christ.

A. "Gnosticism" is wrong: deity is in Christ (2:8-10)

2:8. Paul was concerned that no false teacher take the Colossian believers captive through hollow and deceptive philosophy (cf. v. 4). He wrote here not against all philosophy but against false philosophy, as the Bible also speaks against false religion (James 1:26). The particular false philosophy at Colosse was "hollow" (kenēs, "empty"), "deceptive," and based on human tradition . . . rather than on Christ. True Christian philosophy "take[s] captive every thought to make it obedient to Christ" (2 Cor. 10:5). Philosophy is the love of wisdom, but if one loves wisdom that is not Christ (the Sum of all wisdom, Col. 2:3), he loves an empty idol. Such a one will be "always learning but never able to acknowledge the truth" (2 Tim. 3:7). This kind of philosophy is based on the world's basic principles (stoicheia, "elementary principles" or "elemental spirits" [RSV]; cf. Col. 2:20; Gal. 4:3, 9). This may refer to the evil spirits who inspire such heresy and over whom Christ triumphed (cf. 2 Cor. 4:3-4; Eph. 6:11-12). Such a philosophy is demonic and worldly, not godly or Christlike. Unless believers are careful, such philosophy may ensnare them, taking them "captive."

2:9. There is no "fullness" (plērōma) in philosophy based on vain human reasoning. For in Christ all the fullness of the Deity lives. Hence only in Christ can one have fullness. Apart from Him is emptiness. As philosopher Jean Paul Sartre put it, "Life is an empty bubble on the sea of nothingness" (cf. Ecc. 1:14-18). The word for "Deity" is theotētos, a strong word (used only here in the NT) for Christ's essence as God. The full deity of Christ is nonetheless in bodily form—a full humanity (cf. Col. 1:22). Both Christ's deity and humanity were challenged by this early Gnostic-like heresy. Those heretics diminished Christ to an angel whose "body" was only apparent, not real. Paul affirmed here that Christ is both fully God and truly man (cf. 1 John 4:1-6).

2:10. Not only is all the "fullness" (plērōma) of God in Christ (v. 9), but also believers have been given fullness in Christ. Their fullness of life comes from Christ's fullness. They partake of the divine nature through Christ (2 Peter 1:4), for "from the fullness of his grace we have all received" (John 1:16). This, of course, does not mean believers become God but simply share in Him. They have or share in the goodness of the nature which He is. They share in the body of Him who is the Head (cf. Col. 1:18) over every power (archēs, "ruler") and authority (exousias, "ruling power") (cf. 1:16; 2:15), including those who would talk the Colossians into living according to the world instead of according to Christ.

B. Legalism is wrong: reality is in Christ (2:11-17)

2:11-12. Paul turned from the theological errors of the false teachers to their practical errors—from "Gnosticism" to legalism. The Gentile Christians in Colosse had no need to conform to Jewish rules and regulations, such as circumcision. For in Christ they had been circumcised. This spiritual "circumcision" was done by Christ, not by man. It was in fact a crucifixion or putting off of the body, a circumcision of the heart (cf. Rom. 2:29; Eph. 2:11). Their sinful nature (lit., "the body of the flesh"; cf., lit., "the mind of the flesh," Col. 2:18) was decisively put off by Christ's death and resurrection. What people were in Adam—sinful, fallen, and corrupt—was destroyed by Christ. Now "in Christ" a believer is a new creation (2 Cor. 5:17). And having a new Head a believer has a new authority for his life—not the Law of Moses but the life of Christ.

The words putting off are from the noun apekdysei ("total breaking away from"), which occurs only here in the New Testament. This putting off of the old life occurs at the moment of salvation, when a believer is buried with Christ in baptism by the Spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 12:13) and is raised with Him to new life. This co-burial and co-resurrection is pictured in baptism. In water baptism, immersion portrays burial with Christ, and coming out of the water depicts the resurrection by the power of God to "live a new life" (Rom. 6:4).

2:13-14. Before a person is liberated to this new life in Christ, he is dead in his sins and in his sinful nature (cf. comments on the "earthly nature" in 3:5 and the "old self" in 3:9). Death means separation, not annihilation. Even the unsaved still bear the image of God (Gen. 9:6; James 3:9), but they are separated from God. Cut off from spiritual life, they still have human life. But now God made you alive with Christ (cf. Eph. 2:1-6). The same "power" (energeias; cf. "energy" in Col. 1:29) that raised Christ from the dead (2:12) resurrects believing sinners to spiritual life (v. 13).

This new life came when God forgave us all our sins for He canceled the written code. Before God's written Law, His "written code," people stood condemned (cf. Rom. 3:19), so it worked against them and opposed them. But in Christ the Law is fulfilled (Rom. 8:2) and done away with (Gal. 3:25; Heb. 7:12). Legalism is wrong because believers are dead to the Law in Christ. He fulfilled its demands in His life and by His death, and Christians are in Him.

This written code, the Law, was like a handwritten "certificate of debt" (NASB). Since people cannot keep the Law, it is like a bill of indebtedness. So people, unable to pay the debt, are criminals. But Jesus took . . . away this criminal charge, this certificate of indebtedness, by His death. It is as if He were nailing it to the cross with Him, showing He paid the debt. He wiped the slate clean. As Krishna Ral put it: "Jesus for thee a body takes, thy guilt assumes, thy fetter breaks, discharging all thy dreadful debt; and canst thou then such love forget?"

2:15-17. By fulfilling the demands of the Law, Christ disarmed the demonic powers and authorities (cf. 1:16; 2:10), triumphing over them (cf. 2 Cor. 2:14). As a result believers are delivered from these evil powers which inspire legalistic rules about foods and festivals. No one should judge you by what you eat or drink because Christians are free from the Law's legalistic requirements (such as those in Lev. 11; 17; Deut. 14). God does not condemn those who eat everything (Rom. 14:1-4). In fact, God says that all foods may be eaten since they were "created to be received with thanksgiving by those who believe and who know the truth" (1 Tim. 4:3). The teaching that forbids this, Paul wrote, is "taught by demons" (1 Tim. 4:1) whom Christ has disarmed (Col. 2:15). This liberation of believers pertains also to festivals such as a New Moon celebration or a Sabbath Day (cf. Gal. 4:10). Those who would bring Christians under the bondage of the Law make artificial distinctions between the "ceremonial" and "moral" law, and so they say the Sabbath has not passed away. That this is false can be seen from the following: (1) The Sabbath command is the only one of the Ten Commandments not repeated in the New Testament. (2) The early believers, following Christ's resurrection and appearance on Sunday (Mark 16:1; John 20:1), met on Sundays (Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:2). (3) The Bible nowhere distinguishes between the so-called "moral" and "ceremonial" laws (this distinction was not made before the 13th century A.D.) (4) This Colossian passage explicitly condemns those who command Sabbath obedience. (5) As Paul put it, the Old Testament Law (including the Sabbath) was only a shadow of the things that were to come. The reality or "substance" (sōma, lit., "body"), however, is to be found in Christ (cf. Heb. 8:5; 10:1). What the Old Testament foreshadowed, Christ fulfilled (cf. Matt. 5:17; Rom. 8:3-4). A "shadow" (skia) is only an image cast by an object which represents its form. Once one finds Christ, he no longer needs to follow the old shadow.

C. Mysticism is wrong: headship is in Christ (2:18-19)

2:18. Those who turn believers from the reality in Christ to the shadow of the Law disqualify them for the prize. That is, they rob (katabrabeuetō, "to decide against"; cf. brabeuetō in 3:15) believers of their spiritual rewards. As a judge disqualifies those who turn the wrong way in a race, so believers who turn from faithfully following Christ will be "robbed" of their rewards from Him (cf. 1 Cor. 3:10-15). Some heretics who turn believers away from faithful service have a false humility, which is only "a form of godliness but denying its power" (2 Tim. 3:5) that is in Christ (Rom. 8:3-4). This artificial godliness of legalists was connected with the worship of angels which Scripture forbids (Ex. 20:3-4; cf. Rev. 22:8-9). In fact, legalism is a teaching inspired by fallen angels (1 Tim. 4:1) who as "elemental spirits" (Gal. 4:3, RSV) would bring men into slavery by their mystical meditations. These legalistic mystics dwell on what they have seen (in visions), which Paul called idle notions (eikē, "vain, to no avail"; cf. Gal. 3:4). This phrase may have occasioned the variant (but less preferable) translation "which he hath not seen" (KJV). Far from being humble, such a person's unspiritual mind (lit., "the mind of the flesh"; cf., lit., "the body of the flesh," v. 19) is puffed with pride in his visions.

2:19. While believing that his mysticism brings him in touch with some "higher" reality, a legal mystic has actually lost connection with the Head (Christ) who alone supplies life for it to grow as God causes it to grow (cf. John 15:1-5). True spirituality does not come by compliance with laws (which are only a shadow) but by connection with the Life (who is the reality). Without a vital connection to its Head, the body of Christ cannot grow. Using a parallel image, Jesus said, "I am the Vine; you are the branches. If a man remains in Me and I in Him, he will bear much fruit; apart from Me you can do nothing" (John 15:5).

D. Asceticism is wrong: immunity is in Christ (2:20-23)

2:20-21. A concomitant of legalism and mysticism is asceticism. It is the pseudo-spiritual position that revels in rules of physical self-denial. Do not handle! Do not taste! Do not touch! These prohibitions increase from not handling to not even touching. This same legalism was manifest in Eve's carnal exaggeration, "You must not touch it, or you will die" (Gen. 3:3; cf. Gen. 2:16-17). Asceticism arises out of guilt. But Christ has taken away all human guilt by His death (Col. 2:13-14). So since believers died with Christ to the basic principles (stoicheia; cf. comments on v. 8) of this world, they are no longer obligated (by fleshly inclinations) to obey them. Only those alive to sin (Rom. 6:2-7) need obey it as master. Worldliness is living by the world's rules, including those that have a show of humility and some alleged "angelic" source. Spirituality is living by the power of the Spirit in union with Christ by whom the believer has died to sin. "For we know that our old self was crucified with Him so that the body of sin might be rendered powerless" (Rom. 6:6).

2:22-23. Asceticism is a man-made system of rules (often taken out of context from God's Law) based on human commands and teachings. The persistent example of legalism in the New Testament was the Old Testament command of circumcision which God intended for the Jews as a sign of faith (Rom. 4:11) but which the legalists wanted to make a condition of grace (Gal. 2:21). Living by such regulations or self-made religion has a certain appearance of wisdom (sophias; cf. Col. 1:9; 2:3, 4:5), but it has absolutely no value in restraining sensual indulgence. "Sensual indulgence" is literally "the flesh" (sarkos; cf. 2:11, 18). For denying the body its desires merely arouses them, as is well known by many who have tried to lose weight by sticking to rigid diets. Neglecting the body, Paul argued, does not nourish the spirit.

III. Spiritual: Inner Life in Christ (3:1-17)

Knowing that all wisdom is in Christ (2:1-5), Paul urged the Colossian Christians to continue in Him (2:6-7), not being deceived by vain philosophies (2:8-10). Since believers are identified with Christ, they are not to live under Jewish laws (2:11-17), for that would only rob them of their rewards (2:18-19). They have died with Christ and hence need not submit to legalistic rules (2:20-23).

Furthermore, they have also been raised with Christ. So they should set their hearts on heavenly things (3:1-4), put to death sinful worldly practices (3:5-11), and clothe themselves with Christ's virtues (3:12-17). Stated in another way, believers are to seek spiritual values (3:1-4), put off the sins of the old life (3:5-11), and put on the virtues of the new life (3:12-17). This in turn should affect their relationships with other members of their families and society (3:18–4:1).

A. Seeking spiritual values (3:1-4)

3:1. Since believers have not only died with Christ but have also been raised with Christ (cf. Rom. 6:8-10; Col. 2:12-13), they should set their hearts on things above. That is, believers' lives should be dominated by the pattern of heaven, bringing heavenly direction to their earthly duties. "Set" (zēteite) means "to seek or strive for earnestly" (cf. Rev. 9:6; 1 Cor. 7:27). Fixing their attention decisively toward "things above" involves centering their lives on the ascended (Eph. 4:10), glorified (John 17:5; Phil. 2:9) Christ, who is seated at the right hand of God (Ps. 110:1; Luke 22:69; Acts 2:33; 5:31; Rom. 8:34; Eph. 1:20; Heb. 1:3, 13; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2; 1 Peter 3:22). This is His seat of divine authority because He has defeated the forces of evil and death (Heb. 2:14-15).

3:2. Also Paul wrote, Set your minds on things above, not on earthly things. That is, concentrate your concern on the eternal, not the temporal. "Fix [your] eyes not on what is seen, but on what is unseen. For what is seen is temporary, but what is unseen is eternal" (2 Cor. 4:18). The similarity of the two commands in Colossians 3:1-2 reinforces their impact. "Set your hearts on things above" is ta anō zēteite, and "Set your minds on things above" is ta anō phroneite. The first suggests striving; the second suggests concentrating.

Paul was not enjoining an otherworld asceticism; he had just condemned that (2:20-23). He was saying that life in this world will be better if it is lived by a power beyond this world, the power of the resurrected, ascended, glorified Christ. The "earthly things" (ta epi tēs gēs, lit., "things upon the earth," 3:2; the same Gr. words are used in v. 5) to be avoided are moral, not physical (cf. immorality, impurity, lust, etc., in v. 5). Paul was not encouraging a kind of Gnostic disdain for material things. Every physical thing God created, including the body and sex, is good (cf. Gen. 1:27-30; 1 Tim. 4:1-4). However, since having a physical body does give occasion for the works of the (moral) flesh (cf. Rom. 7:4-6), Paul warned against setting one's affections in this area and perverting God's purpose for them.

3:3-4. At the moment of his salvation, a Christian died to the evil of the "flesh," the sin nature (Rom. 6:3-8; Col. 2:11), and his life is now hidden with Christ in God. "Hidden" implies both concealment and safety; both invisibility and security. He is not yet glorified, but he is secure and safe in Christ. In fact, Christ is his very life. Christ said He was going where "the world will not see Me anymore" (John 14:19).

But when He will appear at the Rapture (1 Thes. 4:16-18), believers will appear with Him and will be glorified. As John put it, "We know that when He appears, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is" (i.e., believers will be glorified as He is glorified; 1 John 3:2; cf. 1 Cor. 13:12; Col. 1:27). So Paul added a new direction to the believers' focus of attention: they should look upward to Christ's reign over them in heaven and also forward to His return for them in the clouds.

B. Putting off the sins of the old life (3:5-11)

3:5-6. Paul's imagery moved from death and life to putting clothes on and off. Put to death . . . whatever belongs to your earthly nature. The Greek tense in this command suggests a decisive action, as if Paul said, "Mortify it! Do it now! Do it resolutely!" Of course, God has already done it, but Christians are to know this, count it to be true, and act accordingly (Rom. 6:5-14). In other words, they are not to go on living as though they are still alive to sin when in actuality they are not. They are to put away that old life, which springs from their earthly natures. "Whatever belongs to your earthly nature" is literally "the members that are upon the earth" (ta melē ta epi tēs gēs). These contrast with the "things above" (Col. 3:1; ta epi tēs gēs is also used in v. 2). This "earthly nature" is the "old self" (or "sinful nature" [2:13], or "old man" [KJV]; Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:9). Some take this to mean the persons Christians were before conversion, whereas others take it (more likely) to refer to the evil tendencies in believers today (i.e., their "old natures"). Even if it means the former, the net effect is the same: they should not live as they did before, because they are new creations in Christ (2 Cor. 5:17).

The list of evil activities flowing from man's earthly nature includes immorality (porneia, "fornication"), impurity (a wider perversion), lust (pathos, "uncontrollable passion"), evil desires ("illicit craving"), and greed (or coveting), which is idolatry (because it seeks satisfaction in things below and not above). Similar lists of sins appear often in Paul's writings (Rom. 1:29-31; 1 Cor. 5:11; 6:9; Gal. 5:19-21; Eph. 5:3-5). Paul added that because of these evils the wrath of God is coming. The words "is coming" render the present tense erchetai (lit., "comes"). This suggests that God's wrath has already begun (cf. John 3:36). It will, of course, culminate in His future climactic visitation on evil (Rom. 2:5; 2 Thes. 1:7-9).

3:7-9. Though the Colossian Christians used to walk [live] in these evil ways, before they came to know Christ, Paul commanded that they do so no more. Now you must rid yourselves of all such things. The word "rid" (apothesthe) means "to put off" like a suit of clothes. In its ethical use here it means "throw it off like a dirty shirt" (cf. Rom. 13:12; Eph. 4:22, 25; Heb. 12:1; James 1:21; 1 Peter 2:1). In the Bible, behavior is often likened to a garment (e.g., Job 29:14; Ps. 35:26; Isa. 11:5; Rom. 13:12; 1 Thes. 5:8).

Repulsive habits—anger, rage, malice, slander, and filthy language—do not fit or suit Christians. They are unbecoming to believers (cf. Eph. 4:17, 31). "Anger" (orgēn) is a chronic attitude of smoldering hatred, whereas "rage" (thymon) is an acute outburst. Thymos elsewhere is rendered "outbursts of anger" (2 Cor. 12:20), "fits of rage" (Gal. 5:20), and "rage" (Eph. 4:31). "Malice" (kakian, the vice that lies below anger and rage as their root) is forbidden, as is "slander" (blasphēmian, "railing or evil speaking"). "Filthy language" (aischrologian) is shameful or abrasive speech. Neither should Christians lie (cf. Eph. 4:25) for truthfulness is essential in followers of the One who is "the Truth" (John 14:6).

Lying and all other vices are inappropriate for a Christian for at salvation he discarded his old self (lit., "the old man," i.e., the former sinful way of living, characteristic of the unregenerate; Col. 2:11, 13a) with its practices (cf. "died" in 2:20; 3:3).

3:10. A Christian is to put on (cf. v. 12) the new self (new way of life or disposition). Hence his conduct should be in accord with his new position. This "new self" needs constant renewal or refreshing—it is being renewed (pres. tense), in order to keep it victorious over sin. Paul also expressed this idea of continual renewal in 2 Corinthians 4:16 ("Though outwardly we are wasting away, yet inwardly we are being renewed day by day"); in Romans 12:2 (being "transformed by the renewing of your mind"); and in Ephesians 4:23 ("to be made new in the attitude of your minds").

This renewal of the new self is in knowledge (eis epignōsin; cf. Col. 1:9; 2:2). It takes place as a believer comes to a personal, deep knowledge of and fellowship with Christ. And the renewal is in (kat', "according to") the image of its Creator; its goal is to make believers like Him, for the "new self [was] created to be like God" (Eph. 4:24). Adam was created in the image of God (Gen. 1:27), which included a moral and intellectual likeness to God. Though this image was not erased (but only effaced) by the Fall (Gen. 9:6; James 3:9), yet it was corrupted and needs to be repaired and renewed. Christians become increasingly like the Lord as they refresh their new natures, yielding to the Holy Spirit's sanctifying work. And in the resurrection believers "shall bear the likeness of the Man [Christ] from heaven" (1 Cor. 15:49). Then the task of restoring God's image will be complete, for "we shall be like Him" (1 John 3:2).

3:11. In Christ distinctions are removed. These include national distinctions (Greek or Jew; Jews called all those outside their nation Greeks; cf. Gal. 3:28); religious distinctions (circumcised or uncircumcised); cultural distinctions (anyone foreign to Greek culture was a barbarian, and a Scythian was a wild, savage nomad); and economic or social distinctions (slave or free). If a Greek, an uncircumcised person, a barbarian, a Scythian, or a slave became a believer, he was a "new creation" (2 Cor. 5:17), a "new self" (Col. 3:10), just like a Jew or free person who became a Christian. For Christ is all, and is in all. That is, normal human distinctions are overruled and transfigured by one's union in Christ.

All barriers are destroyed in Christ, and all believers are truly "created equal." So it is to be expected that each believer—regardless of his nationality, former religion, culture, or economic standing—should do away with his former sinful practices and should live in accord with his "new self."

C. Putting on the virtues of the new life (3:12-17)

Because of their new lives in Christ all believers are called on to clothe themselves in virtue, letting Christ's peace rule their hearts. His Word should dwell in them richly, and they should do everything in the name of the Lord Jesus.

3:12. Again Paul called on believers to take a decisive action: Clothe yourselves (endysasthe). Because they have "put on (endysamenoi) the new self" (v. 10), they should live accordingly, with appropriate attributes and attitudes. In verses 8-9 Paul listed six vices (anger, rage, malice, slander, filthy language, and lying). Now in contrast to them, Christians—as God's chosen people (cf. Rom. 8:33; Titus 1:1), holy ("separated to God"; cf. Col. 1:2) and dearly loved (cf. Rom. 5:8; 1 John 4:9-11, 19)—are to have several virtues. These include compassion (splanchna oiktirmou, lit., "tender sympathy of heartfelt compassion"—an unusually touching expression; in Phil. 2:1 Paul joined these two nouns with "and"), kindness (benevolence in action; cf. 2 Cor. 6:6), humility (a lowly attitude toward God; cf. Phil. 2:3; 1 Peter 5:5), gentleness (prautēta), meekness, a lowly attitude toward others, and patience (makrothymian, self-restraint, a steady response in the face of provocation; cf. Col. 1:11). The last three of these are mentioned in the Greek in the same order in Ephesians 4:2; and Galatians 5:22-23 in the Greek includes three of them: patience and gentleness, as well as kindness.

3:13. Furthermore, believers are to bear with each other (i.e., "put up with each other") with the attitudes just mentioned in v. 12. Also they are to forgive whatever grievances (complaints) they may have against others. How? By forgiving as the Lord forgave them, graciously and freely (Eph. 4:32). Grudges have no place in a Christian's life for they may lead to the sins mentioned in Colossians 3:8-9.

3:14. But over all these virtues Christians are to put on love. As Paul wrote elsewhere, "The greatest of these is love" (1 Cor. 13:13). In one's catalog of virtues love should be the cover, because it is of supreme importance and is the perfect bond, holding them all together in perfect unity.

3:15. Believers are also to let the peace of Christ rule in their hearts because they are called to peace as members of one body. The closer believers are to Christ (and His likeness), the closer they are to each other. In interpersonal relationships "peace" (transcendent, God-given tranquility) should rule (brabeuetō, "arbitrate, decide every debate"; a word used only here in the NT; cf. katabrabeuetō, "decide against," 2:18). Christ's followers who have put on the virtues Paul listed (3:12-14), are concerned about being arbitrated in every trying circumstance by His peace, not by their wrangling. Also Christians are to be thankful (cf. Phil. 4:6; Col. 1:12; 3:16-17; 4:2; 1 Thes. 5:18). An attitude of gratitude contributes to an enjoyment of spiritual tranquility, whereas grumbling makes for inner agitation.

3:16. The new life Christians must "put on" is one in which the Word of Christ dwells richly. Christ's words were recorded by Spirit-guided apostles (cf. John 14:26; 16:13; 20:31). The words of the Bible, God's written Word, are to dwell in believers. That is, by study, meditation, and application of the Word, it becomes a permanent abiding part of one's life. When the words of Christ become part of a believer's nature, they spring forth naturally and daily in psalms (songs from the Book of Psalms), hymns (other songs of praise), and spiritual songs (as opposed to secular odes) with gratitude (en tē chariti; lit., "in grace"). This can mean either (a) God's grace, (b) graciousness in Christian singing, or (c) Christian thanks. As suggested by the NIV it probably has the third meaning. Such joyful singing is not only to please oneself or others but is to be praise to God. Through this Spirit-filled kind of life (cf. Eph. 5:18-19), Christians can teach (instruct) and admonish ("counsel") one another (Col. 3:16; cf. "admonishing and teaching" in 1:28) if it is done with all wisdom (sophia; cf. 1:9; 2:3; 4:5) and not tactlessly (cf. Gal. 6:1).

3:17. Whatever one does (cf. v. 23)—for there is no sacred-secular split in God's eyes; He is Sovereign over all—whether in word or deed (by lip or life) should all be done in the name of the Lord Jesus (i.e., for His glory; cf. 1 Cor. 10:31) and with a thankful spirit (cf. Phil. 4:6; 1 Thes. 5:18). Three times in three verses Paul mentioned thankfulness: "be thankful" (Col. 3:15) "sing . . . with gratitude" (v. 16), and give thanks to God the Father (v. 17).

IV. Practical: Outer Life in Christ (3:18–4:18)

In this last section Paul turned to practical interpersonal relations that should flow from a believer's position in Christ. First, he exhorted each member in human families to perfect (mature in) his private life (wives, husbands, children, fathers, slaves, masters; 3:18–4:1). He then reminded believers to perfect their prayer lives (4:2-4) and their public lives (4:5-6). Then he shared his concern for perfecting the personal lives of all the Colossian believers (4:7-18).

A. Perfecting one's private life (3:18–4:1)

In accordance with the theme of Colossians—maturity in Christ (1:28)—Paul exhorted believers to become mature in their private home relationships.

3:18. Wives are to submit to their husbands as their heads. This command was not limited to Paul's day, as is obvious from two reasons he gave elsewhere: (1) the order of Creation (man was created first, then woman; 1 Tim. 2:13); (2) the order within the Godhead (Christ submits to the Father; 1 Cor. 11:3). Submission or subordination does not mean inferiority; it simply means that the husband, not the wife, is head of the home. If he may be thought of as the "president," she is the "vice-president."

Of course there are moral limits to this submission; it is only as is fitting in the Lord. Just as obedience to government is commanded (Rom. 13:1; Titus 3:1; 1 Peter 2:13) but only insofar as government takes its place under God (Ex. 1; Dan. 3; 6), even so a wife's submission to her husband is only "in the Lord." That is, she is not obligated to follow her husband's leadership if it conflicts with specific scriptural commands.

3:19. Husbands are responsible to love their wives (as Christ loved the church; Eph. 5:28-29). So they are to exercise loving leadership, not dictatorial dominion. Perhaps husbands need this reminder to be tender and loving as much or more than wives need the reminder not to usurp authority over their husbands. Assuming absolute authority will only embitter one's wife, not endear her. The words be harsh translate pikrainesthe, which is more literally, "make bitter." (A different word is used in Col. 3:21; see comments there.) Wives, like tender and sensitive flowers (cf. 1 Peter 3:7), may wilt under authoritarian dominance but blossom with tender loving care. So in a maturing marriage the husband exercises compassionate care and his wife responds in willing submission to this loving leadership.

3:20. Children are to obey their parents in everything. Disobedience to parents is designated in the Old Testament as rebellion against God and was severely punished (Ex. 21:17; Lev. 20:9). Jesus set an example for children by obeying Joseph and His mother Mary (Luke 2:51). Obedience to parents pleases the Lord. This does not suggest that obeying one's parents merits salvation for a child. Rather, obedience reflects God's design for order in the home. As Paul wrote elsewhere, "It is right" (dikaion, "just" or "proper") for children to obey their parents (Eph. 6:1).

3:21. Fathers (and mothers; cf. Prov. 1:8; 6:20) should not presume on this obedience and embitter (erethizete, "provoke or irritate") their children by continual agitation and unreasonable demands. Paul wrote, "Fathers, do not exasperate (parorgizete) your children" (Eph. 6:4). This will only make them become discouraged. Praise for well-doing rather than constant criticism will, along with loving discipline (cf. Heb. 12:7), help rear children in "the training and instruction of the Lord" (Eph. 6:4).

3:22-25. Slaves are exhorted to obey (the same word is directed to children in v. 20) their earthly masters. "Earthly" is literally "according to the flesh"; only Christ is master of the spirits of believing slaves. This obedience is to be with sincerity of heart, not simply when their masters are watching them or to win their favor. Also slaves are to work with reverence for the Lord. Working with an awareness of God's character and presence enhances the dignity of the labor of even slaves. In fact, whatever (cf. v. 17) slaves do should be with all their heart[s] (lit., "out of the soul," i.e., genuine and from within, not merely by outward pretense) and for the Lord, not for men.

While slavery was certainly undesirable, Paul's goals did not include restructuring social institutions (cf. 1 Cor. 7:17-24). Principles in Colossians 3:22-25 for Christian slaves may be applied today to Christian employees. If more Christian employees today served their employers with genuine concern and as though they were serving God, quality and productivity would increase dramatically! It is the Lord Christ whom all Christians are serving. (This is the only place in the NT where the term "the Lord Christ" is used.) After all, the final "payday" (an inheritance . . . as a reward) is coming from the Lord (cf. 2 Cor. 5:10). He will judge without favoritism (cf. Rom. 2:9; Eph. 6:9), that is, in full justice, repaying wrongdoers and rewarding those who serve Him.

In these verses (Col. 3:22-25) Paul made numerous points about the motives, attitudes, and conduct of Christian slaves. Such instruction was remarkable in a master-slave society.

4:1. On the other hand masters were to provide ("give deliberate care") for their slaves with what is right (dikaion) and fair (isotēta, "equitable"). After all, masters themselves are responsible to the Lord, their Master in heaven, who treats them fairly. If employers of nonslaves today manifested this kind of compassionate and impartial care for their employees, certainly their employees' motivation to work would radically improve.

B. Perfecting one's prayer life (4:2-4)

4:2. Paul not only practiced a mature prayer life (cf. 1:3-12) but he also prescribed it for all believers. They should devote themselves to (lit., "persist, continue in"; cf. Rom. 12:12) prayer. Prayer is not a spiritual luxury; it is essential for growth. Prayer—as vital to one's spiritual health as breathing is to one's physical health—should be continual (1 Thes. 5:17), not casual. In his praying, a Christian should be watchful ("alert, aware") against spiritual drowsiness caused by attention to the world (Matt. 24:42; Acts 20:31; 1 Cor. 16:13; 1 Thes. 5:6) and/or by the wiles of the devil (Eph. 6:16; 1 Peter 5:8). Being thankful should always accompany prayer (Phil. 4:6; Col. 1:12; 3:16-17; 1 Thes. 5:18), for it places a believer in the proper attitude before God (cf. Rom. 1:21).

4:3-4. Pray for us was a request Paul often made of his readers (Rom. 15:30; Eph. 6:19; 1 Thes. 5:25; 2 Thes. 3:1). His request was not selfish; it was for an open . . . door (cf. 1 Cor. 16:9; 2 Cor. 2:12) through which he could clearly minister the gospel message . . . the mystery of Christ (cf. Eph. 3:4; 6:19; Col. 1:26-27; 2:2), for which he was in chains (cf. Phil. 1:7, 13-14, 16; Col. 4:18; Phile. 1, 9-10, 13). He desired not only an opportunity to preach but also clarity in preaching: that I may proclaim it clearly, as I should (i.e., "as I am obligated to"; cf. Rom. 1:14-15).

C. Perfecting one's public life (4:5-6)

4:5-6. Completion or perfection in Christ includes not only one's private (and prayer) life but also one's public life. To perfect this dimension of one's life in Christ, Paul told believers to be wise in the way they act. This wisdom (sophia; cf. 1:9; 28; 3:16), which is God's, not man's (cf. James 3:13, 17), should be evident to outsiders, that is, those outside the "household of faith" (cf. 1 Cor. 5:12; 1 Thes. 4:12; 1 Tim. 3:7). Also Paul's readers should make the most of every opportunity (lit., "buy up [exagorazomenoi] the time"). They should be ready "in season and out of season" (2 Tim. 4:2) to proclaim Christ. In addition, their conversation (logos, "word, discourse, talking") should be always full of (lit., "in") grace ("gracious, pleasing"; cf. Col. 3:8-9) and yet seasoned with salt (i.e., pure and penetrating; 4:6). In this way they could answer everyone who asked "the reason for the hope" (1 Peter 3:15) they had.

D. Perfecting one's personal life (4:7-17)

Paul set an example for mature interpersonal relations. Besides remembering his friends and companions, he expressed genuine concern for them.

4:7-8. Tychicus (a leader in the church and bearer of this letter) was a dear brother, a faithful minister (cf. Eph. 6:21), and a fellow servant with Paul in the ministry. He was from the province of Asia (Acts 20:4) and was mentioned by Paul also in 2 Timothy 4:12 and Titus

3:12. Paul sent him to Colosse for the express purpose of informing them about his state of affairs to encourage them.

4:9. Onesimus (a converted runaway slave of Philemon) was also a faithful and dear brother (cf. Phile. 16) to Paul and a fellow Colossian: one of you (cf. Col. 4:12). He would accompany Tychicus and also report on Paul's circumstances.

4:10. Aristarchus was a Thessalonian who accompanied Paul on his third missionary journey (Acts 19:29; 20:4; 27:2). Being Paul's fellow prisoner meant either that Aristarchus attended Paul, or more likely, that he was incarcerated with Paul (probably also for preaching the gospel). Paul also called him a fellow worker (Phile. 24).

Mark, the cousin of Barnabas, was a companion on Paul's first missionary journey (Acts 12:25). He was later Peter's associate ("my son," 1 Peter 5:13; cf. Acts 12:12-13). Though Mark deserted Paul on the first missionary journey (Acts 15:37-39), Paul here commended him (cf. Phile. 24), as he did later (2 Tim 4:11).

4:11. Jesus was a common Jewish name. This companion of Paul's was also called Justus ("righteous"), also a common name (Acts 1:23; 18:7). These three—Aristarchus, Mark, and Justus—were Jews (lit., "of the circumcision") by either birth or conversion (proselytism). These three fellow workers for the kingdom of God comforted or consoled Paul by their loving loyalty to him. Comfort is the unusual word parēgoria ("relief, consolation"), found only here in the New Testament.

4:12-13. Epaphras, like Onesimus (v. 9), was a Colossian (one of you) whom Paul depicted as a servant of Christ Jesus who was always wrestling (agōnizomenos; cf. 1:29) in prayer (as Jacob did with the angel; Gen. 32) for the Colossians. His concern was that the Colossians would stand firm in God's will . . . mature (teleioi, "perfected") and fully assured (Rom. 4:21; 14:5) or fulfilled. This fits the overall theme of Colossians: that believers be mature, perfected in Christ. Epaphras' prayerful concern went to the point of working hard (lit., "has much pain"; ponon, "pain or distress," is used only here and in Rev. 16:10-11). His painful labor was for all the believers in the Lycus Valley—those in Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierapolis (see the location of these three on the map between Acts and Rom.).

4:14. Luke, Paul's dear friend and doctor, stood firm not only in this earlier imprisonment but also in Paul's latter imprisonment, by which time Demas (here with Paul) had forsaken him (2 Tim. 4:10). Luke is the author of the Third Gospel and of Acts (cf. Acts 1:1). By tradition he was one of the 72 (Luke 10:1). Some also suggest he was the anonymous disciple on the Emmaus Road (Luke 24:13). Since the only men with Paul who were "of the circumcision" were Aristarchus, Mark, and Jesus (Justus), Luke may have been a Gentile.

4:15. Paul asked that his greetings be given to the brothers at Laodicea and to Nympha in whose house the church met. Churches meeting in homes was a common practice then before there were church buildings (Rom. 16:5; 1 Cor. 16:19; Phile. 2).

4:16. Paul urged an exchange of epistles; once they had read Colossians they should send it to Laodicea and read the letter (coming) from Laodicea. This "Laodicean letter" may be the letter to the Ephesians, which was written about that time, and sent to the same general vicinity.

4:17. Archippus, probably the son of Philemon (cf. Phile. 2), was ministering in Colosse, possibly in Epaphras' absence. Paul exhorted his readers to tell Archippus to see to (blepe, "look out" for dangers in) it that he complete the work (lit., "the ministry") God had given him. Whatever his problem, he was not fulfilling (completing) his work. This was another example of Paul's concern that the Colossians be complete in Christ.

E. Salutation (4:18)

4:18. As was Paul's custom and sign of authenticity, he signed a greeting with his own hand (cf. 1 Cor. 16:21; Gal. 6:11; 2 Thes. 3:17; Phile. 19). He then asked that his readers remember (in prayerful support) his imprisonment (chains; cf. Col. 4:3). As with so many of his epistles, his closing was a benediction, a prayer that God's grace (cf. 1:2) be with them (see the chart, "Paul's Concluding Benedictions in His Epistles" near Rom. 16:20).

INTRODUCTION

The City of Thessalonica. The city of Thessalonica flourished for hundreds of years, partly because of its ideal location. It was situated on the banks of a hospitable harbor in the Thermaic Gulf near the northwest corner of the Aegean Sea. In the Apostle Paul's day it was the chief seaport of the Roman province of Macedonia. Thessalonica ranked with Corinth and Ephesus, the main ports of the provinces of Achaia and Asia, as a great shipping center.

Thessalonica also enjoyed another advantage. The Egnatian Way, the main Roman road from Rome to the Orient via Byzantium (modern Istanbul), passed through the city. This put Thessalonica in direct contact with many other important cities by land as well as by sea. It was one of the most important centers of population in Paul's day, occupying a strategic location both governmentally and militarily.

Estimates of the population of Thessalonica in New Testament times place it at near 200,000 (Everett F. Harrison, Introduction to the New Testament, Grand Rapids: Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Co., 1964, p. 245). Most of the inhabitants were native Greeks, but many Romans also lived there. Orientals and Jews likewise populated the city. Wherever commerce flourished in the ancient world one would find Jewish businessmen. The Jewish synagogue in Thessalonica was influential; many Greek proselytes were present when Paul preached there (Acts 17:4).

First Thessalonians reflects the moral climate of the city. The pagan Greek religion of the largest segment of the population produced many forms of immorality but whetted the appetites of some for spiritual reality. Evidently the higher standards of Judaism attracted disillusioned Greeks, Romans, and Orientals to the synagogue.

Thessalonica was built by Cassander in 315 B.C. near the site of an ancient city called Therma, named for the hot springs in the area. He chose this place for its excellent location and named it after his wife, Thessalonica, who was a half sister of Alexander the Great. Cassander was a Greek general under Alexander.

Many years later, when the Romans conquered the area (168 B.C.), they divided Macedonia into four districts and named Thessalonica the capital of one of these. In 146 B.C. the Romans reorganized Macedonia and made Thessalonica the capital of the new province which encompassed all four of the older districts. In 42 B.C. Thessalonica received the status of a free city from Anthony and Octavian (later called Caesar Augustus) because the Thessalonians had helped these men defeat their adversaries, Brutus and Cassius. The Romans ruled Thessalonica with a loose hand; though the Roman proconsul (or governor) lived there, no Roman troops were garrisoned in the city. The citizens were allowed to govern themselves, as in a Greek city-state, which they did through a group of five or six politarchs, a senate, and a public assembly.

In World War I the Allies based soldiers in Thessalonica, and during the Second World War the Nazis extracted 60,000 Jews from the city and executed them. Thessalonica still exists today with a population near 300,000. It is called Salonica (or Thessaloniki).

The Evangelization of the City. The Apostle Paul first preached the gospel in Thessalonica during his second missionary journey. Having revisited the churches in the province of Asia where Paul and Barnabas had preached on their first journey, Paul, Silas, Timothy, Luke, and perhaps others made their way to Troas, after unsuccessfully attempting to travel in other directions. In Troas Paul received his vision of a man of Macedonia calling for help. Responding to this call the party crossed into Europe and preached at Philippi, a major city of Macedonia. Through a series of circumstances the missionaries were led to leave Philippi and press on about 100 miles westward along the Egnatian Way to the next major population center, Thessalonica (Acts 17:1-9).

As was his custom, Paul visited the Jewish synagogue in Thessalonica where he knew he would find people who held much in common with him: respect for the Old Testament, theological concepts, and cultural practices. Since Paul was a well-trained teacher, he was allowed to speak in the synagogue. His message, as Luke summarized it, consisted of two points: the Old Testament taught a suffering, dying, resurrected Messiah; and these predictions were fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth. Though Luke did not say so, Paul also may have taught that Jesus Christ would return to fulfill the remaining messianic prophecies (Acts 17:7). In the Thessalonian Epistles Paul sought to answer questions that had arisen from his teaching. As a result of Paul's preaching several people were converted including (a) some Jews, (b) several Gentile Greeks who had come to the synagogue because they had placed faith in or were interested in more information about the Jews' God, and (c) the wives of some prominent Thessalonian citizens (17:4).

The length of Paul's stay on this occasion is a matter of minor disagreement among students of the Thessalonian Epistles. Some believe that the reference to Paul's presence in the synagogue on three Sabbath Days (17:2) means that he was in Thessalonica for only about 21 days (e.g., James E. Frame, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians, p. 7). Others feel that Paul was probably there for a longer period of time, perhaps as long as six months (e.g., Richard B. Rackham, The Acts of the Apostles, London: Metheun & Co., 1901, p. 296). Those who hold the latter opinion base it on the implications of other passages that may hint at Paul's experiences in Thessalonica during this visit. For example, Paul apparently worked at his craft of tentmaking while in Thessalonica (1 Thes. 2:9; 2 Thes. 3:8). These references may imply a prolonged stay, but they do not require it. Some interpreters contend that Philippians 4:16 suggests that the Philippians sent two gifts to Paul while he was in Thessalonica and that would be unlikely, they say, if he were there just three weeks. Other commentators insist that this verse only says that the Philippians sent two gifts; they claim it does not explicitly say that Paul was in Thessalonica when he received both of them.

The length of Paul's stay is significant because of the doctrinal background of his readers which the Thessalonian Epistles reveal. Of course knowledge of what went on in the Thessalonian church after Paul left as well as while he was there is sketchy at best. But it seems that Paul fed these new believers a rich diet of doctrinal instruction in a fairly brief period of time. Also, Paul wrote as though he left Thessalonica before he really wanted to. Perhaps a stay of a few months in Thessalonica is fairly accurate.

Quite possibly Paul continued his teaching and evangelizing out of Jason's house after the Jews opposed him (Acts 17:5-10). His adversaries regarded Paul's message as a threat to Judaism, as Jews have done since the gospel was first preached in Jerusalem. The non-Christian Jews in Thessalonica resorted to a strategy to get rid of Paul that was similar to that employed by Jesus' enemies and Stephen's accusers. They hired troublemakers and put false accusations in their mouths. Storming Jason's house, but failing to find the missionaries, the mob dragged Jason before the politarchs. The Jews charged Jason with harboring revolutionaries who were promoting treason by teaching the people to disobey Roman law and to follow a king other than Caesar. Though this was a serious charge, especially in a city whose free status could be withdrawn by Rome if it were true, the city rulers saw through the motives of these jealous Jewish zealots. The rulers only required Jason to guarantee that Paul and his friends would not disturb the city's peace any longer. This made it necessary for the missionaries to leave Thessalonica. The Christians who remained continued to feel the heat of Jewish persecution, however, not only from the Jews themselves, but also from the Gentiles whom the unbelieving Jews influenced (1 Thes. 2:14; 2 Thes. 1:4).

The Occasion of the Letter. When Paul and Silas left Thessalonica, they proceeded about 40 miles west along the Egnatian Way to Berea. There they ministered for a short time until the hostile Thessalonian Jews, hearing of Paul's preaching in Berea, tracked down the missionaries and incited the Berean Jews to expel Paul from their city. Paul made his way south to Athens while Silas and Timothy remained in Berea. Paul sent a message to these two companions as soon as he reached Athens, asking them to join him, which they did (Acts 17:10-15; 1 Thes. 2:1-5). The plight of the new Thessalonian converts so concerned Paul that he sent Timothy back to Thessalonica to check on the church's welfare. Timothy rejoined Paul at the next stop, Corinth, with encouraging news (Acts 18:1, 5; 1 Thes. 3:6-7). This led Paul to write 1 Thessalonians.

Some students of this epistle believe that Paul wrote not only to commend the Thessalonian believers for their steadfastness in persecution, but also to answer questions they sent to him through Timothy. Though there is no external evidence for the existence of a document containing these questions, it is obvious from the text that Paul wrote answers to some of their questions (cf. 1 Thes. 4:9; 5:1). These questions may have been relayed orally by Timothy. Another reason for Paul's writing was to correct misinformation and false accusations that circulated after Paul left Thessalonica. Paul also wrote to exhort them to go forward in their faith.

The Purpose of the Letter. Specifically, the Holy Spirit led Paul to pen this inspired epistle in order to meet several needs. He encouraged his children in the faith to persevere despite their persecution. He refuted false charges made by the local enemies of the gospel: that the missionaries had preached in order to fatten their wallets and gain other personal benefits; that Paul had left Thessalonica hurriedly and had not returned because he was a coward and a hypocrite. Paul also wrote to correct some errors that had cropped up in the church: an inclination to moral laxity and laziness, and a tendency not to respect the church's spiritual leaders. Paul gave instruction too on the subject of what would happen to Christians who would die before the Lord's return.

The Place and Date of Writing. References in Acts 17 and 18 as well as in 1 Thessalonians make it clear that Paul wrote this epistle from Corinth.

Evidently the letter was written shortly after Paul arrived in Corinth (Acts 17:1-10; 18:1). The references to Gallio's proconsulate in Corinth (cf. 18:12) on ancient secular inscriptions make it possible to date Paul's stay in Corinth fairly accurately—in the early 50s (Jack Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past, Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1969, p. 282). Conservative scholars date 1 Thessalonians between A.D. 50 and 54. This would make the epistle one of Paul's earliest inspired writings, probably his second (after Galatians).

The Authenticity of the Epistle. The Pauline authorship for 1 Thessalonians is not questioned by scholars who take the statements of the book at face value. During the last century objections to Paul's authorship were raised by critics, but these have now been answered satisfactorily (see, e.g., A. Robert and A. Feuillet, eds., Introduction to the New Testament, New York: Desclée Co., 1965, p. 390).

COMMENTARY

I. Salutation and Greeting (1:1)

1:1. Letters written in first-century Greco-Roman culture began with three statements which are found in the opening verse of 1 Thessalonians: the name(s) of the writer(s), the name(s) of the addressee(s), and a word of formal greeting.

The Apostle Paul was the writer of this epistle. His name appears first and he spoke of himself in the singular elsewhere in the letter (e.g., 3:5). He was Saul of Tarsus whose Hebrew name means "asked for." His Roman name, Paul, by which he was known more commonly, means "little." Silas and Timothy joined Paul in sending 1 Thessalonians; that is, Paul wrote for them as well as for himself. Perhaps Silas served as Paul's amanuensis, or secretary. Frequently in 1 Thessalonians Paul wrote "we" so he was either including these brethren in his thoughts (e.g., 1:2; 2:1; etc.) or using an editorial "we." Silvanus is the Roman form of Silas which Paul used consistently in his writings, as did Peter (1 Peter 5:12). Luke called the same person Silas (Acts 15:22; etc.). Silas was Paul's primary associate on the second missionary journey (Acts 15:40). Timothy, of course, was a young man Paul led to faith in Jesus Christ (1 Tim. 1:2), probably during Paul's visit to Asia Minor on his first missionary journey (Acts 13–14). Timothy's name (which means "honored by God" or "God-honorer") was doubtless given in faith by his God-fearing mother Eunice (2 Tim. 1:5). His father may have been a pagan Greek when Timothy was born (Acts 16:1). This young man had recently returned to Paul from a trip to Thessalonica with news of conditions in that church (1 Thes. 3:1-2, 6). These three men were undoubtedly the best-known and most highly respected Christian missionaries by the believers in Thessalonica.

The addressees are grouped together in the salutation as the church of the Thessalonians. A local church is a group of people called out by God from the mass of humanity to a life of separation to Him. The definite article before "Thessalonians" is not found in some ancient copies of 1 Thessalonians. If this is the correct wording, the text further emphasizes the distinction between those in the church and others in the city.

The church is described as being in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. To Paul, the Lord Jesus Christ was as much God as the Father. He preached this in Thessalonica (Acts 17:3) and affirmed it again in this epistle. The description of God as Father connotes security, love, and strength. Paul balanced this picture with a reminder that God the Son is also Lord; He is the Sovereign who is to be obeyed. "Jesus" is the Lord's human name, the Greek form of Joshua, "Savior." "Christ" is the Greek translation of the "Messiah" of the Old Testament and means "Anointed One."

The shortened greeting customary in the Pauline Epistles appears here. Grace was the common Greek salutation meaning "greetings" or "rejoice." In Greek peace is equivalent to the Hebrew šālôm meaning "favor," "prosperity," and "well-being." It is interesting that those two words of salutation always occur in this order in the New Testament. Theologically God's grace is the basis for and leads to man's peace.

II. Personal Commendations and Explanations (1:2–3:13)

In general the first three chapters of 1 Thessalonians are personal in nature, and the last two are practical.

A. Thanksgiving for the Thessalonians (1:2-10)

This first chapter deals primarily with the subject of salvation. Several aspects of the Thessalonians' salvation elicited Paul's thanksgiving to God in these verses.

1. SUMMARY STATEMENT (1:2-3)

In these two verses Paul expressed his gratitude to God and set forth in a brief statement why he was thankful for the Thessalonians.

1:2. Paul, Silas, and Timothy rejoiced together in what God had done in their converts' lives. They continually and frequently gave thanks; the Thessalonians were a constant source of joy to them. Whenever these missionaries prayed for the Thessalonians, they gave thanks to God for them. Rather than being a source of grief these Christians evoked gratitude. In this they served as models for all Christians.

1:3. Three characteristics of these believers stood out in Paul's mind. First, they had performed an important work produced by (lit., "of") faith in Christ. Verse 9 mentions that they had turned to the true God from idols. Faith in Christ had produced true repentance. Second, they performed labor (kopou, "toil") prompted by (lit., "of") love for Christ. This consisted in their serving the living and true God (v. 9) in the midst of persecution (v. 6). Third, they had endurance (hypomonēs, lit., "a bearing up patiently under a heavy load"; cf. 2 Thes. 1:4) inspired by (lit., "of") hope in Christ. Specifically they were waiting for God's Son from heaven (1 Thes. 1:10). These three cardinal virtues that should mark every Christian—faith, love, and hope—stood out in the Thessalonian believers' lives (cf. 1 Cor. 13:13). Each of these virtues found its object in Jesus Christ, and each produced praiseworthy behavior. The Thessalonians had exercised saving faith in Christ in the past when they had believed the gospel, they were loving Christ in the present, and they were hoping for His return in the future. Their lives were certainly focused on Jesus Christ. No wonder Paul and his companions gave thanks for them.

2. SPECIFIC REASONS (1:4-10)

1:4. The Thessalonians' response to the preaching of the gospel in their midst constituted indisputable proof of their salvation. Paul rehearsed their response in this verse as he expanded on the idea he had just introduced.

Characteristically Paul addressed his fellow Christians as brothers. He used this term (adelphoi) 15 times in this one brief epistle (1:4; 2:1, 9, 17; 3:7; 4:1, 10, 13; 5:1, 4, 12, 14, 25-27), and 7 times in 2 Thessalonians (1:3; 2:1, 13, 15; 3:1, 6, 13). He did not claim superiority over them but recognized the equality of all the redeemed in the sight of their heavenly Father, as he taught elsewhere (e.g., 1 Cor. 12:14-27) and as the Lord taught (Matt. 23:9; etc.). Paul had come a long way from being a proud Pharisee to the place where he could consider Gentiles his equals before God. He reminded his readers that they were beloved by God. Even Paul's incidental statements throb with the warm realization of God's presence (1 Thes. 1:3) and love.

The proof of God's love for the Thessalonians was His choice of them unto salvation. From the word translated chosen (eklogēn) comes the English "election." That God has chosen to bless some individuals with eternal life is clearly taught in many places in both the Old and New Testaments (e.g., Deut. 4:37; 7:6-7; Isa. 44:1-2; Rom. 9; Eph. 1:4-6, 11; Col. 3:12; 2 Thes. 2:13). Equally clear is the fact that God holds each individual personally responsible for his decision to trust or not to trust in Jesus Christ (cf. John 3; Rom. 5). The difficulty in putting divine election and human responsibility together is understanding how both can be true. That both are true is taught in the Bible. How both can be true is apparently incomprehensible to finite human minds; no one has ever been able to explain this antinomy satisfactorily. This task transcends human mental powers, much as seeing angels transcends human visual powers and hearing very high-pitched sounds transcends human auditory powers. The Thessalonians' response to the gospel message proved that God had chosen them for salvation.

1:5. The response of his converts was a supernatural work of God, not a natural response to a clearly delivered sermon. When Paul preached to them, he did not just share human opinion and philosophy (cf. 1 Cor. 2:1-5). Rather, his message was marked by the power of God (cf. Rom. 1:16). The Holy Spirit brought it home to their hearts with deep conviction (John 16:8). Paul's message was marked by his own certainty that this message would change their lives as it had radically changed his.

Not only did Paul and his traveling companions preach a convincing message, but they also lived lives consistent with that message when they were in Thessalonica. The Thessalonians were fully aware of their teachers' manner of life and that their motive was to benefit the Thessalonians. The message Paul preached—the gospel of the grace of God—had entered into the minds and hearts of these Macedonians and they had been saved. From their belief beautiful lives had blossomed.

1:6. The outstanding fruit of faith in the gospel was the Thessalonians' change of behavior. They became imitators of their spiritual parents, the missionaries. This is normal Christian experience. But they also went on to imitate the Lord. This too is natural, and the order is true to life as well. A new Christian first looks to other believers as his pattern, but then as he matures he realizes that Jesus Christ is his best "model" (cf. 1 Peter 2:21).

Despite severe suffering the Thessalonians welcomed the message. The Jews among them must have felt the hatred of their unbelieving brothers in the flesh who, as has been pointed out, were especially antagonistic to the gospel in that city. The Gentile converts must have had to swim against the swift current of paganism that flowed like a torrent through the conduit of commercial Thessalonica. And the city's chief men's wives, who had become Christians, had to go home to unbelieving husbands who would not have appreciated their newly sensitized consciences. Yet in spite of trials without, the Thessalonian believers possessed joy within, the joy of sins forgiven. It is interesting that Christians who have tribulations in their daily walks often seem to have greater joy in the Lord than those who live in more comfortable spiritual climates. A Christian's joy should be determined not by his circumstances but by his relationship with Christ. This was true of the Thessalonians. The source of their joy was the indwelling Holy Spirit.

1:7. The testimony of these Christians did not burn brightly merely at home; it also shone abroad to other people in other parts of Macedonia, reaching even to Achaia, the neighboring province to the south. Having become imitators of the missionaries and their Lord (v. 6) they in turn became the object of imitation by other believers. When Paul wrote to the Corinthians he pointed to these Macedonians as a model (typon; cf. 2 Thes. 3:9) of sacrificial giving (2 Cor. 8:1-8). He wrote that they had given money to help other believers even though they themselves were poor. One of the most revealing evidences of a Christian's true spirituality is the way he manages his money. In this revealing test the Thessalonians emerged as gold tried in the fire.

1:8. This verse explains how the Thessalonians became examples to other Christians. Having received the gospel (v. 5) they passed it on to others. The word exēchētai, translated rang out, could be rendered "reverberated." Paul saw the Thessalonians as amplifiers or relay stations that not only received the gospel message but sent it farther on its way with increased power and scope. Paul's preaching in Thessalonica had the effect of speaking into a public address microphone; his words were received and repeated by many different "speakers" in many remote places where his unaided voice could not have reached.

Apparently it was not through an organized evangelistic campaign that their witness went forth, though Paul's preaching in Thessalonica and elsewhere illustrates this approach. But it was through the personal lives and testimonies of these transformed individuals that neighbors heard about their faith in God. As they went the gospel was heard everywhere, so an apostolic missionary campaign was not needed.

1:9. Other people were telling Paul what had happened after he had preached the gospel in Thessalonica. The events of his visit had become well known in that part of the world, not because Paul had spread the word, but because of the outspoken Thessalonian believers' witness. Their boldness should challenge every true child of God.

These believers had turned to God, the only true God, from idols. This strongly suggests that many of those believers had been pagan Gentiles. The Jews, of course, abhorred idolatry. Someone has observed that humans have the freedom to choose who their master will be, but they do not have the freedom to choose no master. The Thessalonians had chosen to serve the living and true God rather than God's creatures or satanic powers (cf. Rom. 1:18-23). The fact that God is a living Person was precious to the Jews and to Paul; this is the characteristic by which God is most often distinguished from so-called gods in the Old Testament. He is the only living God; all other gods are not alive and therefore not worthy objects of worship.

1:10. Not only had the Thessalonians turned to God in repentance and begun to serve Him, but they were also awaiting the return of His Son from heaven. Paul may have had in mind the "heavens" (pl.) through which Jesus Christ passed when He ascended from the earth (Acts 1:9-11), rather than the seat of His heavenly rule at the right hand of the Father in "heaven" (sing., Rev. 4:2-11). If so, he said that the Thessalonians were looking for Jesus' coming through the clouds, literally, "out of the heavens."

But it was not the clouds, or the signs of His coming, or His deliverance which interested these believers; it was the person of Jesus, the Son of the living God. He was the object of their hope, the focus of their attention. May Jesus Himself, rather than anything that will accompany Him or characterize His return, always fill the hopes of His saints!

This reference to "Jesus," His human name, is a strong claim to Jesus of Nazareth's deity. He is further described as the Son of God, the One risen from the dead by the living God. The fact of the Resurrection is indisputable proof (cf. 1 Cor. 15:14-19) of the deity of Jesus.

The return of Jesus is a source of hope for Christians for several reasons, but the reason which Paul mentioned here was Jesus' deliverance of the saints from the coming wrath of God. The wrath of God will be poured out on unrighteous people because of their failure to trust in Christ (John 3:36; Rom. 1:18). This happens at many times and in many ways, the great white throne judgment being the most awful occasion (Rev. 20:11-15). But the "time of trouble for Jacob" (Jer. 30:4-7), also called "the Great Tribulation" (Rev. 7:14), will be a period in history during which God's wrath will be poured out on the earth as never before (cf. Rev. 6–19).

Was Paul thinking of a specific time in which God's wrath would be poured out (1 Thes. 1:10), or was he referring to the outpouring of God's wrath on unbelievers in a more general sense? Paul, the Thessalonian believers, and Christians today will escape all aspects of God's wrath, general and specific, including the Tribulation period. The clear implication of this verse is that Paul hoped in the Lord's imminent return. Otherwise Paul would have told his readers to prepare for the Tribulation.

In the phrase "from the coming wrath" the word translated "from" means that Christians are kept from it, not taken out of it. The same verb (rescues) and preposition (from) are used in 2 Corinthians 1:10 where Paul said he was delivered from a deadly peril. Obviously this does not mean Paul died and was resurrected. Christians will be kept away from God's wrath, not just kept safe through it (cf. comments on Rev. 3:10).

This chapter, like every chapter in this epistle, closes with a reference to the return of Jesus Christ (1 Thes. 1:10; 2:19; 3:13; 4:13-18, 5:23).

B. Reminders for the Thessalonians (2:1-16)

Paul's thoughts, led by the Holy Spirit, turned from the Thessalonians' response to his preaching to other events of his recent visit.

1. HOW THE GOSPEL WAS DELIVERED (2:1-12)

The first part of this chapter records Paul's comments about his visit to Thessalonica. His words suggest that people outside the church were charging him with unworthy motives and improper conduct.

2:1. In verses 1-6 Paul reminded his readers of his actions among them and clarified his motives. All of chapter 2 constitutes an expansion of 1:9. You is emphatic in the Greek; Paul called on his readers to remember carefully the facts of his visit to them. Thinking back, they would recall that Paul's visit was not in vain. It was not a failure. Paul had not come merely to give speeches. Changes in the Thessalonian believers' lives testified to the value and success of his visit.

2:2. Paul and his companions were not on a vacation trip. They had come to Thessalonica after having suffered, been insulted, beaten, and imprisoned for preaching the gospel in Philippi (Acts 16:22-24). This mission had cost them dearly, but God gave them uncommon boldness to stand up in the synagogue at Thessalonica and preach the same message that had brought them persecution in Philippi. And when opposition broke out in Thessalonica the missionaries kept on preaching. This is not the reaction of people who are trying to make money or build personal reputations at the expense of their hearers. Paul called on his readers to remember these actions and to recognize the sincerity behind them. The missionaries' boldness amid strong opposition was the sign of God at work in His servants and was proof of their genuineness.

2:3. Paul's actions (which the Thessalonians personally observed) demonstrated both his sincerity and his motives (which they could not observe but which Paul explained here). Paul denied three allegations: (a) his message was not deceptive; it was truth, not error; (b) his motivation was not impure, but was clean; (c) his method was not to trick, mislead, or deceive them, but was straightforward.

2:4. In strong contrast to these improprieties, Paul said he spoke out of the best motives, realizing that God had put his heart to the test. He and his companions spoke not . . . to please men, but God. Having been approved (dedokimasmetha, "shown by testing to be genuine") by God, He entrusted them with the gospel. Paul used the word "gospel" five times in 1 Thessalonians (1:5; 2:2, 4, 8; 3:2). Paul and his fellow missionaries were veterans; they had been tried and tested for years. God would not have blessed their work if their motivation had not been right. Paul saw himself as a steward entrusted by God to carry His message of salvation to lost men and women (cf. 1 Cor. 9:17). Paul did not choose his work; God selected him for the high calling of proclaiming the gospel. This responsibility was most significant to Paul, who viewed himself as under God's constant scrutiny. So he would not dare serve with the wrong motives.

2:5. Paul's preaching to the Thessalonians was not aimed at making a favorable impression on them. He asked them to remember how he spoke. He never wore a false face, preaching to gain something for himself. Because they could not know this, Paul appealed to God as the witness of his motives.

2:6. The missionaries were not seeking the praise of any man but the praise of God. Traveling philosophers and orators were common in the Roman Empire. They itinerated from place to place, entertaining and seeking a personal following for fame and fortune. Paul and his companions had nothing in common with such men! Rather than seeking something for themselves they delighted in giving to others freely.

2:7. In verses 7-9 Paul shifted the emphasis somewhat from the preachers' activities to the hearers' responses. Paul, Silas, and Timothy rightfully could have expected their converts to support them financially and could have called on them to do so (cf. 1 Tim. 5:18). Certainly they had a right to expect esteem. But they chose to minister rather than to be ministered to for the sake of the Thessalonian converts. Paul and his companions cared for their converts as a nursing mother gently cares for her little children. This instructive illustration provides a good example for all who are responsible for the care of new believers. If a nursing mother does not feed herself, she cannot feed her baby. If she eats certain foods, her baby will get sick. Similarly the spiritual diet of a parent Christian is vitally important to the health of a newer Christian. The gentleness and unselfishness of Paul as a spiritual parent shines through in this illustration.

2:8. Rather than being greedy (v. 5) the missionaries were delighted to share with the Thessalonians. They not only gave the message of eternal life, the gospel of God, but also imparted their own innermost beings (lit., "our own souls") as well. They gave whatever they had in order to help the beloved Thessalonians. The love of Paul and his companions is evident, for genuine love finds expression in giving to people—not only to their spiritual needs, which are primary, but also to their physical needs.

2:9. Paul ministered to his converts by toil (kopon; cf. the same word for "toil" in 1:3) and suffering hardship (mochthon) on their behalf. He worked night and day so that he would not burden them with his needs (cf. 2 Thes. 3:8). Perhaps he made tents, rising early and staying up late, as he did in other cities (Acts 18:3). Probably he preached the gospel and taught as much as he could, both in the daytime and at night.

2:10. Verses 10-12 summarize the appeal to the Thessalonians. The apostles called on their readers and God to bear witness to their behavior in both action and motive. Their inner convictions led to devout (holy, hosiōs) conduct. With reference to God's objective standard their behavior was righteous, measuring up to what God expects and requires. Their conduct was unreproachable (blameless, amemptōs; cf. 5:23), able to stand their critics' scrutiny because it was right. Both they and God were witnesses (cf. 2:5) of the truthfulness of Paul's claims.

2:11. Having likened the conduct of the missionaries to the loving, unselfish care of a nursing mother (v. 7), Paul also compared their behavior to that of a father. Here the implication is that they trained and instructed the Thessalonians as a responsible father disciplines his children. The word tekna, translated children, emphasizes the believers' immaturity as well as the apostles' affection. This verse is the fifth time Paul wrote you know (cf. 1:5; 2:2, 5).

2:12. The training provided included strong positive appeals (encouraging, parakalountes), soothing encouragement (comforting, paramythoumenoi), designed to cheer up and to inspire correct behavior, and solemn, earnest entreaty (urging, martyromenoi). Such a combination of appeals proved effective in moving the Thessalonians to action by the Holy Spirit's convicting power.

The appeal to lead lives worthy of God is the highest of all for those who have tasted God's grace in salvation. Paul heightened his exhortation by reminding his readers that they had been specially called by God, called to enter and be partakers in His kingdom and called to glorify and share in God's glory.

2. HOW THE GOSPEL WAS RECEIVED (2:13-16)

Paul's attitude of rejoicing continues in this section as indicated by the opening and, though now his attention turned from how the gospel came to the Thessalonians to how they welcomed it.

2:13. A second reason for Paul's continual rejoicing is identified in this verse. Not only were the fruits of righteousness manifest in the Thessalonian converts' lives (1:3), but also the way they received the preached Word of God warmed the apostles' hearts. The "Word of God" here clearly refers to the message spoken by the missionaries. When the Thessalonians heard it they realized that it was not simply the words of man's wisdom, but a message that had its source in God (cf. 1:5). Someone has said that the gospel is not the kind of message that man would invent if he could, nor is it a message that he could invent if he would. The Thessalonian Christians sensed the supernatural truthfulness of the gospel Paul preached as the Holy Spirit brought this conviction home to their hearts. When Christians share their faith, they do not merely give their particular viewpoint on life as one among the endless variety of human theories. They announce the divinely revealed truth of God, a word from God.

The spoken Word of God has an inherent power to change. For this reason the Word of God through the Old Testament prophets was recognized as being powerful and not falling to the ground (i.e., lacking sufficient power to hit its mark and accomplish its purpose; cf. 1 Sam. 3:19). The Word of God has the creative power of God behind it and in it (Gen. 1:3). Paul credited the changes in the Thessalonians to this spoken Word of God. Not only had it effected changes in them in the past, but also it was continuing to change them since they continued to believe it. (The word believe is in the Gr. pres. tense, indicating continuing action.) The truth of God, like a good medicine, will continue to heal sin-sick souls so long as people receive it by faith.

2:14. Paul encouraged his readers to recognize this evidence of God's working as being true of all believers by directing their attention to another experience common to all saints. He included himself again, by addressing them as brothers

(cf. 1:4; 2:1). Those whose lives are being changed by God often find themselves the objects of criticism and attack by people in whom there is no divine life. Frequently when Christians suffer persecution they are tempted to think God's blessing has departed. Paul countered this lie of Satan by reminding his readers that their experience duplicated that of their elder brothers and sisters in the faith who had become Christians in Judea. They also suffered opposition from their neighbors; and their neighbors were Jews too.

2:15. The Thessalonians were not alone in their suffering; they had abundant and worthy company. Their persecutors had killed the Lord Jesus Himself and the Old Testament prophets. They drove . . . out their father in the faith, the Apostle Paul, and his fellow missionaries. Though Paul laid guilt for the death of Christ at the feet of the Jews he did not charge them alone with this crime. The Romans who were involved in Jesus' trial and execution were also guilty (1 Cor. 2:8) as was every human being for whose sins Christ tasted death (Heb. 2:9). Most likely Paul mentioned the murder of Jesus first and his own persecutions last because in his mind the first example was much more serious.

Those who persecute believers in Christ antagonize both God and other men. Paul knew whereof he spoke, having been a persecutor of the church himself and one to whom God had revealed that he was fighting against the Lord he sought to serve (Acts 26:14-15). Those who set themselves against God's people also set themselves against God. And they also hurt other non-Christians. The worst thing about unbelief is not that it damns the unbeliever, but that it hinders the salvation of others. Such people seek to extinguish the lamp of truth and in doing so cause others to stumble.

2:16. An unbeliever who is willing to live and let live with respect to personal convictions regarding God is less dangerous than one who not only disbelieves himself but also tries to keep others from hearing the gospel. The unbelieving Jews in Thessalonica were of the latter variety.

Such people's actions hurt themselves as well as others because they heap up additional sins for which God will judge them. God will only allow an individual or a group of individuals to accumulate so much sin, and then He will judge. He does not judge before this limit, which He alone knows, has been reached (cf. Gen. 15:16). The Thessalonians' persecutors were hastening God's judgment on themselves by their actions.

The manifestation of God's wrath that Paul had in mind in this verse is debatable. Perhaps he was referring to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70, just a few years in the future, which Paul may have known was as certain to take place as if it had already happened. Or he may have had in mind God's turning from the Jews to create for Himself a unique body of believers made up of both Jews and Gentiles who now stand on equal footing before God (Eph. 2:13-16). Or possibly Paul was thinking of the wrath of God that is on every individual who fails to believe in Christ (John 3:36). Or the wrath may refer to the Tribulation which will assuredly come upon them because of their rejection of Jesus Christ. This was probably his thought since in other contexts in this epistle where he speaks of the wrath to come he has the Tribulation in mind. Though it is not known for sure which of these thoughts was in Paul's mind—all of them could have been—it is known that the wrath of God has indeed come on unbelievers who hinder gospel preaching in every one of the ways just mentioned. Perhaps Paul chose a general statement rather than a specific one because he had several things in mind. God's wrath had reached its full limit in regard to those individuals.

Why did Paul get so excited about the fate of the Thessalonians' persecutors? It was not out of personal hatred for them (Rom. 9:1-5). Rather it was to emphasize the seriousness of hindering the preaching of the gospel. This message was transforming the Thessalonian believers, and they were heralding it to others far and wide. These verses illustrate how important it is that the gospel reach everybody (Matt. 28:19-20).

C. Concerns for the Thessalonians (2:17–3:13)

At this point the Holy Spirit directed Paul's thoughts from his visit to Thessalonica to more recent developments in his relationship with that church.

1. PAUL'S PLANS (2:17-20)

Quite obviously, from the extent to which he went in explaining his failure to return to Thessalonica, Paul wanted to give a clear and persuasive explanation of his activities. Evidently some people in Thessalonica were questioning or criticizing his conduct.

2:17. But contrasts Paul's experiences, which he was about to relate (3:1-10), with those of the Thessalonian brethren, which he had just narrated.

This verse is most revealing of Paul's feelings for those believers. He used the term of endearment in addressing them again: brothers. He described his departure from them as a turning away forced on him by circumstances beyond his control. The verb (aporphanisthentes) means literally "to be orphaned" and is used only here in the New Testament. To Paul it was as though his family were being torn apart when he left them. He hoped the separation would be brief, but it broke his heart to leave them as infant babes in Christ. Though he had left them physically, they were still prominent in his thoughts; they were not "out of sight, out of mind."

Paul and his companions had tried to return to Thessalonica on several occasions because of the intense longing they felt for their brethren. The care and feeding of new Christians was not just an obligation those missionaries felt toward God; it was something they longed with all their hearts to be able to do, because of the love of Christ, in spite of the personal danger that faced them in Thessalonica.

2:18. Paul blamed Satan for his failure to be able to return. Was Satan responsible, or was God, or were other people? Paul's reason for deciding to return was to provide additional spiritual help for the new converts. This by itself is clearly the will of God in any situation. Seen as such, any hindrance becomes opposition to the will of God. Regardless of who was involved on the human level, the ultimate leader of this kind of opposition is Satan. As John Calvin wrote, "Whenever the ungodly cause us trouble, they are fighting under the banner of Satan, and are his instruments for harassing us" (The Epistles of Paul the Apostle to the Romans and to the Thessalonians, p. 351). God permitted this to happen, but He is no more responsible for it than He is for any sin which His creatures commit and which He permits.

It is unusual that Paul inserted his name in the letter at this point; he rarely did so in his inspired writings. The reason here may be that he wished to emphasize again in a different way that it was he himself who truly felt this way. He did not try to return just once, but again and again he sought ways to get back to Thessalonica.

2:19-20. Paul's affection rose to its climax in this almost lyrical passage. The Philippian believers were the only others who received such warm words of personal love from Paul.

He voiced a rhetorical question to heighten the intensity of his fervor. In effect he asked what would be the greatest blessing he could possibly receive at the judgment seat of Christ. They were! They were everything that was worth anything to Paul. They were his hope; their development was what he lived for as a parent lives to see his children grow up to maturity, to produce and reproduce. They were his joy, they filled his life with sunshine as he thought of what they used to be, what they had become, and what they would be by the grace of God. They were his crown; they themselves were the symbol of God's blessing on his life and ministry. They were his glory and joy, and not only his but also the glory and joy of his companions in labor. Paul said in essence, "When life is over and we stand in the presence of our Lord Jesus at His coming, you Thessalonians will be our source of glory and joy; you mean that much to us."

This profession of affection should have removed any thoughts from the Thessalonian Christians' minds that Paul had not returned because he was unconcerned or selfish.

2. TIMOTHY'S VISIT (3:1-5)

The thought begun in 2:17 continues in this section. Paul again stated his sincere concern for the Thessalonians.

3:1. Circumstances prohibited Paul from returning to Thessalonica personally, so he and Silas decided to send Timothy back to encourage the saints. Evidently Paul traveled from Berea to Athens without the companionship of Timothy and Silas. When he reached Athens he sent word back to Berea (by the Berean Christians who had accompanied him) for Timothy and Silas to join him in Athens as soon as possible (Acts 17:15). Apparently Timothy and Silas did so. Their mutual concern for the Thessalonian church led Paul and Silas to dispatch Timothy to Thessalonica (1 Thes. 3:1-2). Silas also returned to Macedonia shortly after Timothy's departure, probably to check on the Philippian church. Silas and Timothy both returned to Macedonia to rejoin Paul in Corinth, Paul's next port of call after Athens (Acts 18:1, 5).

3:2. Paul's description of Timothy seems to imply that the young man needed more than Paul's normal endorsement. Perhaps because of his youth Timothy was not as readily recognized and respected as his older fellow missionaries. Paul called Timothy our brother, suggesting equality in the Lord's work with Paul and Silas. In relation to the Lord, Timothy was a hardworking servant, suggestive of his zeal and humility. He was a brother-servant in spreading the gospel of Christ.

Timothy's mission was to have been a positive blessing and help to the Thessalonian Christians. He was to strengthen (stērizai; cf. v. 13) them, to make them firm and solid in the faith. He was also sent to encourage (parakalesai; cf. 2:12) them by providing what they needed to fight the good fight of faith, individually and collectively. Much of the ministry of the apostles was devoted to grounding new converts in the faith, a ministry as necessary today as it was in the first century.

3:3. Another purpose of Timothy's visit was that the Christians would not lose their spiritual balance and stability as a result of the trials they were experiencing (cf. 2:14). The word sainesthai, translated unsettled, is used of a dog wagging its tail and paints a picture of the Thessalonians going back and forth because of their persecutions.

Paul added his own stabilizing reminder that trials are not necessarily a sign of God's disfavor, but are part of every Christian's legacy. When trouble comes, Christians often react by doubting that they are where God wants them to be; they often think that they have done something wrong and that God must be displeased with them. Even some mature Christians react this way, as evidenced by Paul's words of reassurance to Timothy many years later. "Everyone who wants to live a godly life in Christ Jesus will be persecuted" (2 Tim. 3:12). Yet storms often come to believers to make them able to stand firm, rather than to blow them away (cf. 2 Cor. 4:15-16).

3:4. Paul reminded his readers that when he was with them he kept telling them to expect persecution. And circumstances had turned out just as he had predicted. This reminder would have helped calm them down.

3:5. Returning to his original thought (cf. v. 2) Paul explained that he had sent Timothy back to Thessalonica because he was genuinely concerned for their spiritual welfare. The condition of the believers' faith burdened Paul's heart. Were they still trusting in God or had they abandoned Him and returned to paganism? Paul was not concerned that they had lost their salvation; this they could never do (1:4). They could, however, have ceased to walk by faith, not trusting God in all circumstances of life. Paul's concern was that his labor might have been in vain, not that their faith had been in vain. Paul's reference to the tempter is mindful of Satan's activity in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3) and in the Judean wilderness (Matt. 4). Paul saw Satan as using the persecution the Thessalonians were undergoing in order to lure them away from what they knew to be God's will, namely, perseverance in the midst of trials. He was concerned that Satan might snatch away the seed Paul had sown before it had a chance to put down stabilizing, fructifying roots.

3. TIMOTHY'S REPORT (3:6-10)

From 2:1 through 3:5 Paul related what had happened in the last few months. Starting with 3:6 he moved to the present.

3:6. But contrasts Paul's previous anxiety with his present relief at the report of Timothy who returned to Paul in Corinth. Rather than bringing bad news that the Thessalonians' faith had wavered, Timothy had brought good news that their faith was bearing fruit in love. This good news was as thrilling to Paul as the gospel; he used the same Greek word for both messages.

The Thessalonians were strong in faith toward God and love toward His apostles (cf. 1:3). Though Paul did not mention their hope explicitly here, he did so implicitly by referring to their desire to see the apostles again; they were looking forward to this. The fact that the Thessalonians looked back on the visit of the missionaries with pleasant memories and looked forward to seeing them again evidenced their genuine love for the apostles. Paul loved them too, and reminded them by restating his longing to see them again.

3:7. Timothy's report came as sweet relief to the anxious missionaries. They were indeed brethren, bound not only by the bonds of life in Christ, but also by the bonds of love for one another. As Paul and more recently Timothy had been sources of encouragement to the Thessalonians in their persecution, so now the babes in Christ had provided encouragement to their elder brethren who had been persecuted by fears about that church's condition.

3:8. Nothing filled the apostles with joy like news that their converts were standing firm in the Lord. This was the desired result in all their ministry; in this they found their greatest fulfillment. "Standing firm" (stēkete; cf. 2 Thes. 2:15) in the faith is really "standing firm in the Lord." Such a relationship strengthens one to withstand the storms of life.

3:9. The force of Paul's rhetorical question is, "We cannot thank God enough for you because of all the joy you have brought to our hearts by your endurance in these trials." It is noteworthy that Paul thanked God for the Thessalonians' behavior; he did not take credit for this. Paul acknowledged that their endurance was really a tribute to the work of God in them (cf. Phil. 2:13). He commended the Thessalonians, but also recognized and acknowledged the hand of God at work in their lives.

3:10. News of the Thessalonians' perseverance did not relieve Paul of his desire to return to them. Though they were enduring a trial of their faith they still needed more instruction and more growth. Paul wanted to supply what was lacking in their faith. (The word for "supply" is katartisai; cf. Eph. 4:12 where pros ton katartismon is rendered "to prepare" [NIV] and "for the equipping" [NASB].) The Thessalonians were like tender young plants; their tender roots held them firm against the present storm, but they still needed to grow and mature. This is the first explicit reference to deficiencies in their spiritual condition—deficiencies due more to immaturity than to waywardness. Up till now Paul described them as having the characteristics of new Christians. Now he said they were deficient in certain respects, as a child is deficient in comparison with an adult. In chapters 4 and 5 Paul ministered to some of these deficiencies.

This verse gives another glimpse into the Apostle Paul's private life. He prayed night and day . . . most earnestly that God would let him see them again. That is, he prayed by night and by day, not all night and all day. This and other similar references (cf. 1:2; 2:13) demonstrate the truth of the statement, "It is evident from St. Paul's Epistles that a very large part of his private life was occupied in prayer and thanksgiving to God" (G. W. Garrod, The First Epistle to the Thessalonians, London: Macmillan & Co., 1899, p. 89).

4. PAUL'S PRAYER (3:11-13)

The first major section of the epistle, largely personal, closes with a statement in the form of a wish, something for which Paul prayed to God. Verses 11-13 amplify verse 10.

3:11. Paul was praying that he could return to Thessalonica (v. 10); here he expressed the same desire more strongly in a wish before God. God was the object of his prayer. He is called the Father of Paul and his missionary brethren and the Thessalonian believers. The Lord Jesus is addressed equally in prayer with the Father. The fact that Jesus is God is further highlighted by Paul's use of a singular verb (trans. "clear") with a plural subject: "may He clear the way, even the Father and Jesus," not "may They clear the way." "One can hardly conceive of a stronger way for Paul to indicate his unquestioning acceptance of the lordship of Jesus and His oneness with the Father" (D. Edmond Hiebert, The Thessalonian Epistles, p. 154).

3:12. The Thessalonians were already noted for their love, but Paul prayed that it might abound—increase (pleonasai) and overflow (perisseusai)—even more. "Genuine Christian love . . . is the one thing in the Christian life which cannot be carried to excess" (Hiebert, The Thessalonian Epistles, p. 155). The image of love overflowing its container suggests that Christian love is something that wells up from within a person naturally. Paul was concerned that it overflow to everyone, not just to Christians in the church. His love was their model.

3:13. The Thessalonians needed strengthening by God in their inner beings. The word strengthen (stērizai), used by Paul in verse 2, describes Timothy's strengthening of the Thessalonians in their faith. Paul did not pray that they would be sinless; that was impossible. He prayed that they would be blameless (cf. 2:10), that is, that after they sinned they would deal with it as God requires and so be free from any reasonable charge by their fellowmen. Before God they should be holy, separated to God in their hearts and habits. Paul longed that when Jesus Christ would return He would find them blameless before men and holy before God. The holy ones accompanying Christ at His coming are probably the souls of the saints who have departed this life and gone to be with Christ, whose bodies will be resurrected when He comes (4:16). That is, they are Christians rather than angels.

III. Practical Instructions and Exhortations (4:1–5:24)

Chapters 4 and 5 constitute the second major division of 1 Thessalonians. Whereas chapters 1–3 contain personal messages of commendation for the Thessalonians and explanations of the missionaries' activities and motives, chapters 4–5 record practical instruction in matters of the Thessalonians' deficiencies, plus practical exhortations to proper behavior in view of the truth.

A. Christian living (4:1-12)

This section concerns three aspects of proper Christian living: one general, on conduct; and two specific, about sexual purity and brotherly love.

1. GENERAL CONDUCT (4:1-2)

4:1. The word with which Paul began chapter 4, Finally, was not intended to announce the conclusion of the epistle, as is obvious from all that follows (cf. "Finally" in Phil. 3:1, which is followed by two chapters, as it is here in 1 Thes.). It introduces the final major section of the letter. These chapters deal with "what is lacking in your faith" (3:10). Again Paul reminded his readers of his words to them while in Thessalonica. He moved from their present condition to their next stage of spiritual development. They had responded to Paul's teaching on Christian living. Someone has said that everyone lives to please someone: himself, his spouse, his parents, his child, his God, or someone else. Paul focused motivation for correct living on love for God. Many people regard the Christian life as a set of rules to be obeyed, or a list of prohibitions to avoid; but Paul regarded it as the outworking of a loving desire to please God who had chosen him (1:4). His attitude helped prepare his readers to respond positively to his following exhortations.

These instructions were not intended to move the readers to behave differently, but to do more of the same. This conduct was so important that Paul not only asked but urged them to press on (urge is parakaloumen, also used in v. 10; in 2:12 the participle from the same verb is rendered "encouraging" and in 3:2 and 4:18 the verb is translated "encourage"). Paul added even more power to his exhortation by urging them in the Lord Jesus (cf. 2 Thes. 3:12); he wrote in the Spirit and with the authority of Jesus Christ. Paul claimed to speak for Christ in this matter. And he asked them to do so more and more (cf. 1 Thes. 4:10).

4:2. So they might not miss this rather subtle emphasis, Paul restated it more clearly here. He said they knew the instructions (parangelias) he had given them in Jesus' authority (cf. v. 1). What he and his fellow missionaries had preached to the Thessalonians they had announced as the gospel of Christ (3:2). The present message came to them with the same authority. Sometimes Christians want to hear new truth when what they need is exhortation to excel still more, to press on to greater experiencing of old truths which they are already practicing to a limited degree.

2. SEXUAL PURITY (4:3-8)

The general exhortation of verses 1-2 is followed by two specific exhortations. The first has to do with sexual purity.

4:3. The will of God is clearly set forth in many places in Scripture, even though Christians often seem to have a great deal of difficulty applying it in everyday decision-making (cf. 5:16-18; 1 Peter 2:15). It is God's clear will that His people be holy (hagiasmos; cf. 1 Thes. 3:13). This word can mean a state of being set apart from sin to God, or the process of becoming more dedicated to God. Probably the latter meaning was intended by Paul here. He was not referring to the final state of all Christians when they will be separated from the presence of sin as well as its penalty and power. Rather he probably had in mind the progressive sanctification of his readers by which they were conformed to the image of Christ in daily experiences by proper responses to the Word and the Spirit of God. This is evident by the three statements in verses 3b-6a, each beginning with the word that.

The first instruction designed to produce greater holiness is abstinence from sexual immorality. Paul called his readers to avoid it, implying the need for exercising self-discipline, enabled by God's Spirit. Christians are to avoid and abstain from any and every form of sexual practice that lies outside the circle of God's revealed will, namely adultery, premarital and extramarital intercourse, homosexuality, and other perversions. The word porneia, translated "sexual immorality," is a broad one and includes all these practices. The Thessalonians lived in a pagan environment in which sexual looseness was not only practiced openly but was also encouraged. In Greek religion, prostitution was considered a priestly prerogative, and extramarital sex was sometimes an act of worship. To a Christian the will of God is clear: holiness and sexual immorality are mutually exclusive. No appeal to Christian liberty can justify fornication.

4:4. Paul emphasized the same truth in a positive way by expanding on this prohibition. One avoids sexual immorality by learning how to control his own body with its passions. Self-control in response to one's sexual desires, Paul taught, could and must be learned. Christians are not the victims of circumstances or their fleshly passions. Sexual desire can be controlled by the Christian through God's power. Paul did not specify how to control one's passions. He implied that there may be several ways. But the Christian should choose a method that is both holy (hagiasmō) and honorable (timē). That is, the action taken as an alternative to sexual immorality must be behavior that is set apart to the Lord in its motivation and recognized by others as intrinsically worthy of respect (cf. 1 Cor. 6:13-20). Each Christian is responsible for his own body and behavior, not his neighbor's (cf. 1 Cor. 10:13). Every young Christian, like the Thessalonians, should learn how to deal appropriately with sexual temptations.

4:5. They were not to deal with it as the heathen did, by indulging in passionate lust (en pathei epithymias). Such behavior is a mark of heathenism. A heathen is one who does not know God. Here Paul put his finger on the key to overcoming sexual temptations. A Christian can overcome because he knows God; this makes all the difference! Paul did not say that the heathen do not know about God. The reason they behave as they do is because they do not know God personally, even though they may know about Him. When a person comes to know God by faith in Jesus Christ, not only do his attitudes toward sex change, but he also discovers that God gives him the ability to act toward sexual temptation as he could not before. Knowing God is basic to living a holy life. This is why maintaining a vital relationship with God is essential to maintaining a clean walk before God.

4:6. In the previous two verses Paul's appeal was based on the importance of sexual purity for the sake of the Christian himself. In this verse Paul appealed on the basis of the other person involved in the immoral act. The brother here is most likely another human, not necessarily another Christian male. This seems clear from the fact that this person is a victim of illicit sex. Sexual immorality wrongs the partner in the forbidden act by involving him or her in behavior contrary to God's will and therefore under His judgment. Two or more people practicing sex out of God's will are calling God's wrath down on themselves (Heb. 13:4). The initiator of the act takes advantage of his partner in sin by fanning the fire of passion till self-control is lost.

Paul then cited two reasons (1 Thes. 4:6b-7) why sexual immorality should be avoided. First, sexual immorality is sin, and God will judge all sin (Rom. 6:23a). All such sins refers most likely to the various forms of sexual uncleanness not specifically mentioned in the context but covered by the general term "sexual immorality." Everyone who fears the wrath of God should abstain from immorality because judgment follows such sin as surely as day follows night. That God always judges sin is a basic Christian truth which Paul had taught them and warned them about when he was in Thessalonica.

4:7. A second reason to avoid sexual immorality is that it goes against God's calling for a Christian. Paul's first reason (v. 6b) looks forward to the prospect of future punishment, but his second reason looks back to the purpose for which God called each Christian to Himself. God's plan for a Christian includes purifying his life. Sexual immorality frustrates the purpose of God's call. Certain pagan cults promoted unclean ceremonies, but Christ's plans for a Christian are to clean him up. A holy life demonstrates God's supernatural power at work overcoming what is natural, and it glorifies God. The Greek noun hagiasmos ("holiness") occurs here for the fourth time in eight verses (3:13; 4:3-4). (The verb hagiazō ["sanctify"] is used in 5:23.)

4:8. In this verse Paul drew a conclusion based on his preceding arguments. Sexual purity is grounded in the revelations of God concerning His judgment of sin and His calling to holiness. Sexual purity is simply a practical application of basic doctrine. Paul's attitudes toward sexual uncleanness did not arise from his background or personal preferences. They were the logical consequences of divine revelation. The Thessalonians and later readers of this epistle should realize that to reject these instructions is to reject the Person from whom they came originally, that is, God.

Lest anyone feel that God is asking more than is reasonable of weak mortals, Paul concluded this exhortation with a reminder that God has also given believers His indwelling Spirit. This Person of the Trinity is so characterized by holiness that He is called the Holy Spirit. The indwelling Holy Spirit has power enough to enable any Christian to learn how to control his own body, even in a pagan, immoral climate. The exhortation is to avoid sexual immorality; the enablement comes from the Holy Spirit.

3. BROTHERLY LOVE (4:9-12)

The second specific exhortation regarding Christian living accentuates the positive. Though sexual impurity is a danger to be avoided (vv. 3-8), loving other Christians is a practice to be cultivated. Both deal with the general subject of loving one's neighbor as himself, the basic horizontal aspect of Christian living.

4:9. Some instructions for Christians come through their brethren in Christ. But other lessons are taught by God to His children directly, things that almost intuitively seem right for a Christian to do. Loving other Christians is such a lesson. Christians quickly learn that there is a real kinship between believers, and they relate to other Christians in a way they do not relate to those outside God's family. The Thessalonians had already learned to love each other even though they were new Christians. Paul pointed out that God Himself had taught them this.

4:10. Paul did not need to write and tell them to love one another, but he did need to write and urge them to do this more and more (cf. v. 1). The evidence that they had learned the lesson of brotherly love was their deep, selfless, giving affection for Christians in others parts of their province of Macedonia. These were their neighbors in Philippi, Berea, and perhaps other towns where Christians lived. Paul commended believers for their love when he wrote the churches (cf. 2 Cor. 8:1-5). Yet there was still room for improvement, perhaps in the persistence and consistency of their love.

4:11. Everyday habits of living manifest love of the brethren as do more special demonstrations of affection. It is these habits that Paul suggested the Thessalonians ponder in the light of brotherly love. He suggested these goals as worthy objectives for their maturing love. His words may reflect less than ideal conditions in their church.

First, his readers should lead a restful life. The word translated quiet (hēsychazein) means quiet in the sense of restfulness (cf. Acts 22:2; 2 Thes. 3:12; 1 Tim. 2:2, 11), rather than quiet as opposed to talkativeness (sigaō; cf. Acts 21:40; 1 Cor. 14:34). The former means "undisturbed, settled, not noisy," while the latter means "silent." Paul was telling the Thessalonians to be less frantic, not less exuberant. A person who is constantly on the move is frequently a bother to other people as well as somewhat distracted from his own walk with God. The latter can lead to the former. But a Christian who strives to be at peace with himself and God will be a source of peace to his brethren. Such quietude constitutes a practical demonstration of love for others.

Second, Paul recommended minding one's own business. The connection with love for the brethren is obvious (cf. Prov. 25:17).

Third, working with one's own hands demonstrates love for the brethren because a self-supporting person is not a burden to others. Paul himself set the example by working with his hands when he was in Thessalonica (1 Thes. 2:9). Too restful a life can be a problem also, and Paul guarded against that with this instruction. This verse dignifies manual labor. The reference also suggests that many, perhaps most, in the church came out of the working class. The Greeks deplored manual labor and relegated it to slaves as much as possible. But the Jews held it in esteem; every Jewish boy was taught a trade regardless of his family's wealth. Work itself is a blessing, and working with one's hands should never be despised by Christians. A man who is willing to work with his hands demonstrates his love for his brethren by being willing to humble himself to provide for his own needs so that he does not depend on others but provides for himself.

4:12. There are good reasons for these exhortations. Such behavior does win the respect of non-Christians and so glorifies the Christian's God. Love of this kind is appreciated by everyone. Paul placed importance on the testimony of Christians before outsiders, unbelievers. This kind of behavior also wins the respect of Christians; people appreciate those who do not take advantage of them. Paul discouraged the Thessalonians from expecting financial favors from the brethren simply because they were fellow Christians. Nor was he promoting a fierce spirit of independence; he was not saying that every Christian must become completely self-sufficient. He was advocating personal responsibility, as is clear from the context. This is a manifestation of mature Christian love for the brethren.

B. The Rapture (4:13-18)

The Apostle Paul turned his attention to another area of deficiency in the Thessalonians' understanding, which had probably come to his attention through Timothy. Though Paul had already mentioned the future in this letter (1:10; 2:12, 19; 3:13), he turned to it again and devoted considerable space to instruction and exhortations dealing with Christ's return (4:13–5:11). The subject of the rest of chapter 4 is the relationship of the Lord's return to believers who had died. This is the classic passage in the Bible on the Rapture of the church.

4:13. Paul introduced these instructions in such a way as to lay no guilt on the Thessalonians for their lack of knowledge. After all, they were new believers. He again called them brothers, emphasizing their equality of standing before God despite their knowledge deficiency.

Those who fall asleep are Christians who die. The figure of sleep for death is common in the New Testament (cf. Mark 5:39; John 11:11). This is not sleep of the soul, however, because Paul wrote elsewhere that a Christian who is absent from his body is present with the Lord (2 Cor. 5:8; cf. Phil. 1:23; 1 Thes. 5:10). It is rather the "sleep" of the body in the earth until it is resurrected, changed into a glorious body, and reunited with the soul (1 Cor. 15:35-57; 2 Cor. 5:1-9).

Paul wanted the Thessalonians to be neither ignorant nor grieving like the rest of men, that is, like unbelievers, over the death of fellow believers. Christians do grieve over the loss of loved ones; this is a normal human experience which even Jesus shared (John 11:35). But the grief of Christians differs from that of unbelievers, for the latter have no hope of bodily resurrection to glory with Christ (1 Thes. 4:16).

4:14. Two reasons why Christians should not grieve like unbelievers are that Christians have a revelation from God that gives them hope and they have a glorious future with Christ. Just as certainly as Jesus died and was resurrected by the Father, so God will unite the resurrected dead in Christ with their Savior at His coming.

The death and resurrection of Jesus Christ are among the best-attested facts of history. Since Christians know these events took place, they can be equally certain, Paul said, that the souls of believers who have died will return with Christ when He comes for His living saints. The prophecy of the Rapture is as sure to be fulfilled as the prophecies of Christ's death and resurrection.

4:15. The revelation of this resurrection came from Jesus Christ Himself. How it came to Paul is not known, but perhaps it was a direct revelation. Not only will the souls of the dead in Christ return with Him (v. 14), but their bodies will also be resurrected at His coming. The bodies of dead Christians will be resurrected immediately before living Christians are conveyed upward.

Clearly Paul believed that he and his Thessalonian readers might well be alive when the Lord returned. He believed that the Rapture was imminent, that it could take place at any moment (cf. 1:10; 1 Cor. 7:29, "the time is short"; Phil. 4:5, "The Lord is near"). And this truth of imminency brought comfort (1 Thes. 4:18).

4:16. Jesus Christ now sits at the right hand of God in heaven (Rom. 8:34; Eph. 1:20; Col. 3:1; Heb. 1:3). He will leave this position and descend to the earth. By the words the Lord Himself Paul emphasized that it would be the same Jesus who had ascended through the clouds (cf. Acts 1:11).

The sounds mentioned in this verse—a loud command, with the voice of the archangel and with the trumpet call of God—are difficult to interpret. Who will voice the loud shout? Will it be Jesus Himself (cf. John 11:43), or the archangel Michael (Dan. 10:13; Jude 9), or another angel? Is this a literal trumpet call, or was Paul speaking figuratively in describing the call of God by which He will announce the Advent of His Son? (cf. 1 Cor. 15:52) These three phenomena may all refer to the same thing, but probably they are three separate almost simultaneous announcements heralding Christ's return. Though one's curiosity about these aspects of the Rapture is not fully satisfied in this passage, one thing is clear: Christ's return for His saints will be announced from heaven forcefully and dramatically.

Then the dead in Christ will be resurrected, that is, believers of this dispensation will be raised. Old Testament saints will evidently be raised at the end of the Great Tribulation (Dan. 12:2), for the phrase "in Christ" refers exclusively to Church-Age saints. The bodies of the dead in Christ will rise before the living Christians are caught up to meet the Lord in the air (1 Thes. 4:17).

How will God raise the bodies of people who were buried hundreds of years ago? What about the bodies of those Christians who were burned to death and those whose ashes were thrown to the wind, and Christians who perished at sea? The resurrection of the dead poses a great problem to the faith of many. Perhaps that is why Paul stressed that this revelation came from Jesus Christ Himself and that it is as certain of future fulfillment as Jesus' resurrection is a fact of past history. The God who created the universe out of nothing with a word is fully able to reassemble the decayed bodies of all His saints in a moment of time (cf. 1 Cor. 15:35-58).

4:17. Whereas the previous verse explains the future of dead saints at Christ's return, this one deals with what will happen to living believers (cf. 1 Cor. 15:51-52). After the bodies of dead Christians have been raised, those who are still alive and have been left behind momentarily will be caught up with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air. Again Paul, by using the word we ("we who are still alive and are left"; cf. 1 Thes. 4:15), put himself in the living group; he thought that Christ would probably return in his lifetime, or at least he allowed for its possibility. Only a moment will separate the resurrection of the dead and the translation of the living (1 Cor. 15:51-52). In Latin the word for "caught up" is rapturo, from which comes the term "Rapture." This is the Rapture of the church, when Christians are caught up to meet Christ in the clouds (cf. Acts 1:9). The events described here and in the parallel passage, 1 Corinthians 15, differ considerably from those that will accompany Christ's return to the earth to set up His earthly kingdom (Rev. 19:11-21). This difference substantiates the distinction between the Rapture and the Second Coming.

The resurrected or translated bodies of all Christians will be united with Christ and with each other at the Rapture. From that time on and forever thereafter they will be with the Lord. The Lord will take living believers to the place He is presently preparing for them (John 14:2-3). But the place where Christians will be was not so important to Paul as the Person with whom they will be. "The entire content and worth of heaven, the entire blessedness of life eternal, is for Paul embraced in the one thought of being united with Jesus, his Savior and Lord" (Borhemann, quoted by George G. Findlay, The Epistles of Paul the Apostle to the Thessalonians, Cambridge: University Press, 1904, p. 103).

4:18. The logical and practical outcome of this revelation is comfort and encouragement. Paul applied his eschatology to life and called on his readers to encourage (parakaleite; cf. 2:12; 3:2) each other with these words. The facts that Christians who have died will be resurrected to join the living saints with the Lord Jesus when He comes, that they will actually precede those who are alive in that day, that those who are alive will be united with them, and that they will all be with the Lord forever, give abundant reasons for rejoicing. Not only do Christians not grieve like unbelievers, but followers of Christ can actually look forward eagerly to that great day. This is the great hope of the church, to see the Lord and be united with Him forever. It is that which every believer in this Age should anticipate. It is a blessed hope (Titus 2:13) with respect to the dead in Christ as well as for the living!

C. Personal watchfulness (5:1-11)

The preceding section (4:13-18) presented a joyful hope; this one gives a solemn warning. The Thessalonians had not heard the first exhortation before (4:18); they had heard this one.

1. THE DAY OF THE LORD (5:1-3)

Paul introduced a new aspect of the subject of the Lord's appearing. His scope of attention broadened from the Rapture to the longer period of history after the Rapture, namely, the day of the Lord. In these verses the emphasis is on the unpredictability of the time of the Lord's return.

5:1. Paul's affectionate tone continues with the word brothers again. Times and dates refers to the ages (chronōn) and events (kairōn) preceding the day of the Lord. Paul did not need to expound fully on this subject as he had done with the Rapture, since he had already instructed them about the day of the Lord.

5:2. The day of the Lord is a future period of time in which God will be at work in world affairs more directly and dramatically than He has been since the earthly ministry of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is a time referred to by many Old Testament prophets (e.g., Isa. 13:9-11; Joel 2:28-32; Zeph. 1:14-18; 3:14-15). As these and other Old Testament verses indicate, the day of the Lord will include both judgment and blessing. That day begins immediately after the Rapture of the church and ends with the conclusion of the Millennium. This day is a major theme of prophecy with its fullest exposition in Revelation 6–19.

This period of history will come as a surprise to those on the earth at the time, like the visit of a thief to a sleeping homeowner (cf. Matt. 24:43-44; Luke 12:39-40). But the thief in the night illustration should not be pressed too far. The point is that this day will come unexpectedly, not necessarily that it will take place at night. Obviously it will be night in some parts of the world and daytime in other parts.

5:3. This day will begin when world conditions appear calm rather than calamitous. This peace will come with the signing of the seven-year covenant, predicted in Daniel 9:27. Note that Paul did not include himself and his readers with the group who would see the day of the Lord, as he did when describing the Rapture (1 Thes. 4:15, 17). Evidently them refers to those left behind at the Rapture, that is, non-Christians. They will be ignorantly expecting peace and safety, but instead destruction will come on them. This "destruction" (olethros; cf. 2 Thes. 1:9) is not annihilation, but the breaking up of their peace and security through the outpouring of God's wrath on earth in the Great Tribulation. Destruction will come suddenly. The illustration of the commencement of labor pains suggests both unpredictable suddenness and great personal discomfort (cf. Matt. 24:8; Mark 13:8). The wrath of God that will have been building up over some time will suddenly break forth. The signs of its coming are discernible, even though the moment of its arrival is unpredictable. No more can the world escape the coming wrath of God, when it breaks out on the day of the Lord, than a pregnant woman can escape labor pains. A strong expression is used in the Greek (a double negative: ou mē) to stress that fleeing (ekphygōsin) will be futile.

2. CONSEQUENT PREPAREDNESS (5:4-11)

5:4. His readers were not "in the dark" with regard to these things; they had been taught about them before. But Paul meant more than this. His readers were not in the same group who would be surprised by this day. Their sphere of life was not in the darkness, but in the light (cf. Col. 1:13). Instructed Christians should not be surprised by the dawning of this day of the Lord; they have been told it is coming. It will not take believers by surprise because they will by then be with the Lord (1 Thes. 4:13-18).

5:5. Christians live in a different sphere of life from non-Christians; it is the difference between day and night (cf. Eph. 5:8). Christians are sons of the light; they are also sons of the day. That is, they have illumination, and they also live in a realm characterized by light, warmth, and growth. Paul brought himself into the picture (we) to prepare for his following exhortation which would be more true to life and readily received if he included himself, than if he directed it only toward the Thessalonians.

5:6. Paul's exhortation was for his readers to behave in keeping with their enlightened condition and to be prepared in view of the day of the Lord. He presented this exhortation as a logical conclusion from what preceded. Besides being logical to behave this way, it is also a necessary duty. Christians should not be indifferent to the reality of the Lord's return; they should not be asleep on the job. The word for "asleep" (katheudōmen; cf. v. 10) differs from the one used thrice in 4:13-15 where it means death (koimaō). Here it means spiritual lethargy and insensitivity. This is the condition of the unsaved, the others. Christians, on the other hand, should be watchful and soberly waiting for the Lord's return (1 Cor. 1:7; Titus 2:13; Heb. 9:28; 2 Peter 3:12), and self-controlled (1 Thes. 5:6), maintaining self-discipline in view of the great events to come.

5:7. Unbelievers are neither awake nor alert to these spiritual realities. Rather they are asleep and controlled by forces outside themselves—like those who are drunk—which render them unable to respond as they should. These are the normal characteristics of those who live in the sphere of night.

5:8. In keeping with the sober attitude just described, Paul used the metaphor of a soldier, one of his favorite illustrations of the Christian (Rom. 13:12b; Eph. 6:10-18; 1 Tim. 6:12; 2 Tim. 2:3-4; 4:7a). He based his exhortation on the Christians' position: because they belong to the day, they should live accordingly. Standing on the threshold of an event that will mean sudden translation for some and sudden destruction for others, Christians should arm themselves for action with self-control. A Roman breastplate covered a soldier from his neck to his waist and protected most of his vital organs (cf. Eph. 6:14). That is what Christians' faith and love do. Faith in God protects inwardly and love for people protects outwardly. These two graces cannot be separated; if one believes in God he will also love other people (cf. 1 Thes. 1:3; 3:5). These attitudes equip Christians to stand ready for the Rapture. In addition, the hope of salvation guards their heads from attacks on their thinking. The salvation they look forward to is deliverance from the wrath to come when the Lord returns, as is clear from the context. It is not a wishful longing that someday they might be saved eternally. Such a thought is entirely foreign to the New Testament. Followers of Christ have a sure hope; they are not as others who have no hope.

5:9. For (hoti, "because") introduces another reason why believers should prepare themselves. God's intention for them is not the wrath that will come on the earth in the day of the Lord, but the full salvation that will be theirs when the Lord returns for them in the clouds. The wrath of God referred to here clearly refers to the Tribulation; the context makes this apparent. Deliverance from that wrath is God's appointment for believers. This temporal salvation comes through the Lord Jesus Christ just as does eternal salvation.

5:10. What did Paul mean by whether we are awake or asleep? Did he mean "whether we are alive or dead," or "whether we are spiritually alert or lethargic"? It seems that he meant the latter because he used the same words for "awake" (grēgorōmen) and "asleep" (katheudōmen) as he used in verse 6, where they clearly mean spiritually alert and spiritually lethargic. If so, then Paul's point is that Christians are assured of life together with Him, whether they are spiritually watchful or not. That they might live with Christ was His purpose in dying for them. They will escape God's wrath whether they are watchful or not (cf. 1:10). This is a powerful argument for a pretribulational Rapture.

Paul wrote that Christ died, not that He was killed. Jesus Christ laid down His life; no man took it from Him (John 10:18). And He died for us (cf. 2 Cor. 5:21). This simple statement of the substitutionary nature of the death of Christ required no elaboration for the Thessalonians. Doubtless Paul had emphasized this central doctrine when he first taught them in person; it is foundational.

5:11. The practical exhortation with which Paul concluded this section arose naturally from what he had explained. His readers were to encourage and build up (edify) one another. His own encouragement and edification in this letter were not enough. This new instruction needed constant repetition and reemphasis. It was to be added to the body of truth they already had received, and as they were encouraging each other in their meetings and in private conversations about other revealed truth they were to include this great truth as well. Believers do not need to be hearing something new all the time, but they often do need to remind themselves of what they already know so that they do not forget it. This verse gives some insight into the meetings of the early church. They included opportunity for mutual edification among the believers. Mutual encouragement and edification are still needed in every local church. And encouragement and edification with reference to their hope in Christ's return is especially needed.

D. Church life (5:12-15)

In this passage Paul reminded his readers of their present responsibilities as believers in Christ. He turned from instructions regarding the future to exhortations for the present. His cryptic, almost abrupt style in this section may have been intended to bring them back from considerations of the future to the realities of their immediate responsibilities. First he gave them instructions concerning their relationships with their spiritual leaders.

1. ATTITUDE TOWARD LEADERS (5:12-13)

The following directions are addressed to the group as a whole, that is, to all Christians in the church.

5:12. The church leaders are probably the elders of the church in view of how they were described by Paul. These were men who worked hard to provide pastoral care for the flock, probably in their spare time since in the early church local church leaders often carried full-time jobs outside the church. These leaders are further described as being over you in the Lord. They had positions of spiritual leadership in the church and were responsible to God for those under their care (cf. Heb. 13:17). This responsibility included providing admonition as needed. Since Paul used the plural those to describe their leaders, there was more than one such person in the Thessalonian church, as in other churches to whom Paul wrote (cf. Phil. 1:1).

Paul gave three exhortations to the church regarding their proper attitude toward their leaders. First, they were to respect them. This term (eidenai) normally means "to know," but here it includes appreciating and respecting them and their work.

5:13. The need to regard leaders highly is further stressed in the second exhortation. Church members are to esteem, value, and respect their leaders for their works' sake. The Greek is strong: hold them in the highest regard (hēgeisthai autous hyperekperissōs). This should be a continuing attitude. Some church leaders do not command as much personal respect as others, but Paul taught that all should be held in esteem because of the nature of their responsibilities before God. Not just some respect, but the highest respect is due these leaders, and it is to come from an attitude of affection (in love) for them, again, because of their work, if for no personal reason. Two reasons for this exhortation are the nature of their work and the fact that church leaders do a good service to others.

The third exhortation is to live in peace with each other. This results from obeying the former instructions. The idea here is to maintain rather than to initiate peace. Peaceful conditions existed in the Thessalonian church, but they had to continue. The command is imperative. Much dissension in modern churches is traceable to church members disobeying these commands.

2. RELATIONSHIPS AMONG THEMSELVES (5:14-15)

All church members, as well as church leaders, are responsible to minister to each other.

5:14. All Christians have four ongoing and continuous responsibilities to one another: (a) The idle need to be warned. Those who neglect their daily duties need to be stirred up to action. (b) The timid (oligopsychous, lit., "short of soul") need encouragement. These fainthearted people tend to become discouraged and despondent more easily than most. They need cheering up, stimulation to press on, and extra help to live the Christian life. (Interestingly the verbs in these two commands [parakaloumen and paramytheisthe] are in the same order as the first two participles in 2:12.) (c) The weak need help. These have not yet learned to lean on the Lord as much as they should for their spiritual needs. Until they do, they need strong support from other believers. Of course all Christians are weak and need the strength that comes from Christian fellowship, but the spiritually weak need it more than most. The fourth responsibility summarizes the preceding three: (d) Be patient with everyone. While other Christians are the primary focus of patience in this context, this charge is general enough to include all people. This ability to help others who are in some respect not as strong as oneself requires nothing short of the love of God produced by the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 13:4; Gal. 5:22).

5:15. The opposite of patience is retaliation in some form. Retaliation is not an option for a Christian. Even if the wrong done to him is an imposition by a needy brother, or an action springing from evil intent, the offended one never has the right to repay wrong with wrong (cf. Matt. 5:38-48; Rom. 12:17-21; 1 Peter 3:9). One's response should be to show kindness in such instances. Nor is it enough to abstain from evil; one is also to do positive good—to be kind to each other. Christians are to do this not in the sense that they will if they can, but in the sense that they earnestly work at it. This kind of response takes effort and must be continued.

E. Holy living (5:16-24)

This final group of instructions contains general exhortations for holy living.

1. PERSONAL LIVING (5:16-18)

These exhortations—dealing with attitudes—are addressed to believers as individuals concerning their personal lives before God.

5:16. God wants His people to be joyful and He gives them every reason to be. But Paul knew human nature well enough to sense the need for a reminder to rejoice at all times (cf. Phil. 3:1; 4:4). This is a command. A Christian's joy does not spring from his circumstances, but from the blessings that are his because he is in Christ. "The Christian who remains in sadness and depression really breaks a commandment: in some direction or other he mistrusts God—His power, providence, forgiveness" (A.J. Mason, "The Epistles of Paul the Apostle to the Thessalonians," in Ellicott's Commentary on the Whole Bible, vol. 8, p. 145). These two words (pantote chairete) constitute the shortest verse in the Greek New Testament.

5:17. Continual prayer is not prayer that prevails without any interruption, but prayer that continues whenever possible. The adverb for continually (adialeiptōs, also in 1:3) was used in Greek of a hacking cough. Paul was speaking of maintaining continuous fellowship with God as much as possible in the midst of daily living in which concentration is frequently broken.

5:18. The two previous commands deal with one's time ("always" and "continually"); this one deals with his circumstances. Christians are to give thanks to God in every circumstance of life. The fact that God works everything together for good for those who love Him (Rom. 8:28) is the basis for this entreaty.

These three exhortations in verses 16-18 are not just good advice; they are God's will for every Christian. They are not the totality of God's will, but they are a clear and important segment of it. God's will means joy, prayer, and thanksgiving for those who are in Christ Jesus.

2. CORPORATE LIVING (5:19-22)

Whereas the preceding verses stress individual responsibility in personal behavior, these deal with life in the assembly of believers. Five commands follow in staccato fashion. Two are negative (vv. 19-20) and three are positive (vv. 21-22).

5:19. The Bible frequently likens the Holy Spirit to a flame (Isa. 4:4; Matt. 3:11; Acts 2:3-4). He warms the heart, enlightens the mind, and empowers people's spirits. It is the effective working of the Holy Spirit that Paul warned against hindering. His fire can be diminished or even snuffed out if He is resisted. The Holy Spirit's working can be opposed by believers. It is this that Paul warned against. The next verse may give a clue as to how the Spirit was in danger of being quenched by the Thessalonians.

5:20. There may have been a tendency in the early church, and perhaps in the Thessalonian church in particular, to underrate the value of prophetic utterances. The gift of prophecy was the ability to receive and communicate direct revelations from God before the New Testament was completed (1 Cor. 13:8). Sometimes these revelations concerned future events (Acts 11:28), but often they dealt with the present (Acts 13:2). Perhaps people who had not received prophetic revelations were teaching their own views of such things as the Second Advent, with the result that prophetic revelations tended to be evaluated on superficial terms (e.g., the eloquence of the speaker) instead of on the basis of their intrinsic authority.

By way of application, Christians should not disparage any revelation that has come to the church and has been recognized as authoritative and preserved by the Holy Spirit in Scripture. The temptation to put the ideas of men on an equal footing with the Word of God is still present.

5:21. In view of this danger Christians need to test what they hear and read, by comparing it with the Word of God, to determine if it is divine in its origin. This is difficult, but it is possible for a spiritual believer (1 Cor. 2:14). Each Christian has the responsibility and ability to do this, though some have more discernment than others (cf. Acts 17:11; 1 John 4:1). What is discovered to be good (i.e., in harmony with what has been given by the Holy Spirit in the Word) should be retained.

5:22. On the other hand counterfeit teaching and living should be rejected and avoided. Not only should pseudo-prophecies be discarded but also, as Paul broadened his warning, every kind and form of evil should be avoided. What may only appear to be bad also falls under this warning. However, "while believers should abstain from actions which will knowingly offend others, it is not always possible to abstain from everything which may appear evil to a narrow and foolish judgment" (Hiebert, The Thessalonian Epistles, p. 249).

3. DIVINE ENABLEMENT (5:23-24)

Since these are high requirements, Paul expressed his pious wish that God would enable his readers to attain them.

5:23. To encourage his readers, Paul highlighted God's ability to produce peace. The church at Thessalonica had come to experience peace through the preaching of the gospel. And when Paul wrote this letter, the Thessalonians were enjoying peace with each other. The God who had given them peace would be their adequate resource for the future as He had been in the past. Paul prayed that God would sanctify (set apart) them to Himself in every area of their lives. Paul did not mean they could attain complete sanctification this side of heaven; that is impossible. He also prayed that his readers would be preserved blameless (amemptōs, i.e., with no legitimate ground for accusation; cf. 2:10) in view of and until the appearing (parousia) of the Lord Jesus Christ for His saints.

Though Paul spoke of the Christian as spirit, soul, and body, man is described elsewhere as having two parts—body and spirit (James 2:26; 2 Cor. 7:1), or body and soul (Matt. 10:28). And man is also said to have a heart, mind, conscience, and other parts. Rather than teaching man as having only three parts, Paul was probably using the three terms here to identify the different aspects of personhood he wished to emphasize. The spirit is the highest and most unique part of man that enables him to communicate with God. The soul is the part of man that makes him conscious of himself; it is the seat of his personality. The body, of course, is the physical part through which the inner person expresses himself and by which he is immediately recognized. Paul was saying then that he desired that the Thessalonians would be kept blameless by God in their relationships with Him in their inner personal lives, and in their social contacts with other people.

5:24. The same God who calls a Christian will perform this by the Holy Spirit who indwells him. God is faithful to bring to completion the work He has begun in believers (Phil. 1:6). God does not save a person by grace and then leave him alone to work out his Christian growth by works (Gal. 3:3). As God calls and justifies by grace, He sanctifies by grace too.

IV. Conclusion (5:25-28)

This conclusion is like a postscript to the letter. It contains three more exhortations and a benediction.

A. Personal appeals (5:25-27)

Unlike most of Paul's other epistles, this closing section does not state that it was written by him or by an amenuensis.

5:25. This is the first time in the letter that the greeting brothers (used 15 times in 1 Thes.; see comments on 1:4) occurs at the beginning of a sentence in the original. It is emphatic in this position. The force of the present tense here is a strong "keep on praying." Paul's appeal for prayer was to those he regarded as his brothers. Doubtless much of the success of his missionary work could be attributed to the prayers of the Thessalonians and other believers. Paul understood both his personal insufficiency and God's sufficiency (cf. 2 Cor. 3:5). He requested prayer for his fellow workers as well as for himself.

5:26. It was common in Paul's culture as in many cultures today, to greet friends with a kiss on the cheek. The men greeted other men this way, and the women did the same with other women. Such a kiss communicated personal affection, not romantic love. By urging this practice Paul was encouraging an outward physical expression of true Christian love in a form that was culturally acceptable in his day. The kiss was to be holy, not passionate or fleshly. An acceptable alternative in Western culture today might be an embrace, a pat on the back, or a handshake. J.B. Phillips paraphrased this verse for 20th-century English readers: "Give a handshake all around among the brotherhood."

5:27. The final exhortation strongly urges that this letter be read to all the brothers, probably the whole Thessalonian church. The normal usage of the Greek word for "read" (anagnōsthēnai) implies that it should be read aloud. Paul's words are surprisingly strong. He put his readers under oath (enorkizō hymas, I charge you) to do this, suggesting that God would discipline them if they disobeyed. Were there some problems in the church that Paul wanted to get at by having everyone hear his words? Or did he realize that this epistle was written under divine inspiration and was therefore spiritually valuable? Perhaps he had both motives.

B. Benediction (5:28)

5:28. Paul referred to God's grace in each of his epistolary benedictions. The grace of God was Paul's great delight (cf. 1:1). He identified it as the grace that comes through our Lord Jesus Christ. In Him Christians have all. Obviously the grace of God is always with His children, but Paul's concern was that his readers experience and enjoy this grace. All that one has in Christ is due to His grace.

2 THESSALONIANS

Thomas L. Constable

INTRODUCTION

The Writer of the Epistle. This letter claims to have been written by Paul, who wrote 1 Thessalonians under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit (cf. 1 Thes. 1:1). There are no indications among the writings of the early church fathers who lived during and after Paul's lifetime that anyone questioned the authenticity of this letter's claim. In fact several fathers mentioned the Pauline authorship of this epistle in their writings. Not until early in the 19th century were various questions raised about authorship. They came from rationalistic critics who refused to accept the Bible's claim to divine inspiration. But critical questions have not proven devastating because the authenticity of this and other New Testament books has been demonstrable through the ages.

The Place of Writing. Almost all conservative scholars believe that 2 Thessalonians was written from Corinth. The basis for this conclusion is that Paul, Silas, and Timothy were present together in Corinth (Acts 18:5). They are not referred to in the Bible as being together thereafter, though they might have been. Since 1 Thessalonians was written from Corinth (see Introduction to 1 Thes.), and since the topics treated in the second epistle seem to grow out of situations alluded to in the first epistle and reflect a very similar situation in the Thessalonian church, Corinth seems the logical site of composition.

The Date of Writing. For the reasons mentioned above, it appears that 2 Thessalonians was written quite soon after 1 Thessalonians, perhaps within 12 months. This would place the date of composition in the early A.D. 50s and would make this epistle the third of Paul's canonical writings (assuming Galatians was his first).

The Occasion and Purpose for Writing. The epistle gives evidence that Paul had recently heard news about conditions in the church. Probably this information came to him from the messenger who delivered 1 Thessalonians and returned to Corinth. Perhaps other people who had news of the church informed the three missionaries (Paul, Silas, and Timothy) also. Some of the news was good: the Thessalonians were continuing to grow and to remain faithful to Christ in spite of persecution. But some was bad: false teaching concerning the day of the Lord had entered the church and was causing confusion and leading some of the Christians to quit their jobs in expectation of the Lord's return.

In view of these reports Paul felt constrained to write this epistle. He commended his children in the faith for their growth, corrected their doctrinal error about the day of the Lord, and warned of its consequences.

COMMENTARY

I. Salutation (1:1-2)

1:1. This epistle begins by naming the same three men mentioned in 1 Thessalonians 1:1. As in 1 Thessalonians, Paul was the author (directed by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit) for he spoke of himself in the singular (2 Thes. 2:5; 3:17). But Silas and Timothy joined him in sending the epistle (Paul frequently used "we": 1:3-4, 11-12, etc.). For more on these three men see the comments on 1 Thessalonians 1:1.

The same assembly of Christians received both letters. The church is described as being in God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. As in so many places in the New Testament Epistles, Jesus Christ is placed on an equal level with God the Father. God is the Father of Christians individually, a revelation given first by Jesus Christ (Matt. 6:9). A church is an assembly of individuals who are in Christ by faith in His atoning death and are therefore the children of God.

1:2. This verse is a word of greeting; the verb "be" must be implied. Paul reminded his readers that they were the recipients of God's grace and peace, and he wished that they would experience these blessings in fullest measure. "Grace" is "God's riches at Christ's expense"; it is God's unmerited favor which He freely bestows on all who accept Jesus Christ's substitutionary work for them on the cross by faith. God gives man the opposite of what he deserves: blessing instead of judgment. This is the grace of God. "Peace" is the cessation of hostility which has resulted from Christ's death; God and people can be reconciled because the debt of human sin has been paid by Christ. Christians have peace with God through the death of Christ. They also experience the peace of God as a result of Christ's work.

Christians can be at peace even in the midst of trials and persecution. This was Paul's desire for the Thessalonians. Both grace and peace are gifts of God that come to believers through the Lord Jesus Christ.

In both Thessalonian letters Paul gave the greeting "Grace and peace to you," but here (in 2 Thes.) he added from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

II. Commendation for Past Progress (1:3-12)

This section flows smoothly from one subject to the next in a natural, conversational manner. Paul began by thanking God for the spiritual growth the Thessalonian believers had experienced. This led him to encourage them to persevere in their steadfastness. He explained that he and his fellow writers were praying for their spiritual success.

A. Thanksgiving for growth (1:3-4)

The character of, reasons for, and consequences of the apostle's thanksgiving are explained in these verses.

1:3. Paul and his fellow missionaries to Thessalonica had ample reason to thank God on behalf of this church, and their thanksgiving was continuous (cf. 1 Thes. 1:2). It was right for them to give thanks because these believers were a cause for thanksgiving. In fact Paul felt obligated to give thanks as though he owed a debt which he paid enthusiastically. Their faith had continued to grow (hyperauxanei, "to grow exceedingly"; auxanō is used in the Gospels of the growth of plants and babies, and in the epistles of spiritual growth [e.g., Eph. 4:15; Col. 1:6, 10], but in the NT hyperauxanei is only used here). The faith of Christians should keep growing all their lives; they should trust God more consistently and more extensively as they grow older in Christ. Faith in God is not a static thing. Since it is trust in a Person, it is always increasing or decreasing. A growing faith indicates a growing Christian.

Not only were the Thessalonians' relationships with God developing, but so were their relationships with other people. Genuine faith in God is always accompanied by love for others (James 2:14-17). Faith is the root; love is the fruit. The Thessalonians' love . . . for each other kept increasing (pleonaxei). In 1 Thessalonians 3:12 Paul had expressed concern that their love "increase" (pleonasai), and now, happily, he said it was increasing. Both faith and love were growing like well-fertilized plants, beyond what would have been normally expected. This was an exceptional church.

1:4. Because of such good growth the apostles frequently spoke with justifiable pride to other churches about the Thessalonians, using the Thessalonian church as a model to be emulated. In particular, their perseverance (hypomonēs; cf. 1 Thes. 1:3; 2 Thes. 3:5) in the midst of persecutions was outstanding. The Thessalonians did not react to discomfort the way many Christians do, by running away from their uncomfortable situations. Instead they viewed their circumstances as God's will and determined to brace up under the pressure. Their attitude was not to endure by force of their own strength, however. They had faith in God; they looked to Him for grace sufficient to bear up and accepted their circumstances as conditions which He was allowing for His glory. They were patiently enduring . . . persecutions (diōgmois) from enemies of the gospel who were hostile toward them (cf. 1 Thes. 3:3-4). The trials (thlipsesin, "pressures, troubles"; cf. 2 Thes. 1:6-7) they were undergoing were painful circumstances that came from both Jewish and Gentile acquaintances (cf. 1 Thes. 1:6; 2:14; Acts 17:5-9). Their persecutions and trials were numerous. Yet, in spite of them all, the Thessalonians kept on standing strong and stable in their faith.

B. Encouragement to persevere (1:5-10)

Paul proceeded to nourish the souls of these beleaguered saints so that they would be able to continue to bear up under the pressures of temptation.

1:5. The present experiences of the Thessalonians, Paul pointed out to them by way of encouragement, illustrated the righteous judgment of God, that is, that God is just.

When God would judge the Thessalonians they would be declared worthy of God's kingdom. Endurance in trials does not make one worthy of heaven; one does not earn heaven by suffering. But endurance in trials does demonstrate one's worthiness. A Christian is made worthy by God's grace, which he receives as a free gift by faith in Jesus Christ. His trials simply expose what is there already and since the character that emerges through the fire of testing is God-given, God receives all the glory. The grace of God that makes it possible for a Christian to withstand the fires of human experience, which destroy non-Christians, is a Christian's only claim to being worthy of God's kingdom. The kingdom of God refers to God's rule over all, which Christians share as His children.

The purpose of the Thessalonians' sufferings was to bring glory to God by manifesting His grace in the way they bore up under their trials. Their suffering demonstrated that they were considered worthy of God's kingdom. In another sense they were suffering as soldiers of Christ.

1:6. Paul explained how the Thessalonians' suffering demonstrated the justice of God. He first stated the great truth taught from Genesis through Revelation: God is just. God will balance the scales of justice. He will mete out trouble (thlipsin; cf. v. 4) to those who troubled (thlibousin) the Thessalonians (cf. Gal. 6:7).

1:7. On the other hand God will give relief from the tensions of trials to those who are unjustly persecuted (lit., "troubled, pressured," thlibomenois; cf. vv. 4, 6) by their enemies. The Thessalonians, the apostles, and all other Christians who share in these pressures can look forward to this. Relief (anesin, "relaxation, rest"; used only five times in the NT: here and in Acts 24:23; 2 Cor. 2:13, 7:5; 8:13) will come at the revelation of Jesus Christ. Paul painted the picture of a veil being removed from in front of Jesus Christ; He will be revealed in blazing fire (cf. Ex. 3:2; 19:18; 24:17; Ps. 18:12; Isa. 30:27-30; 66:15; Dan. 7:9-10). This is the Lord Jesus, the Man in heaven. He will exercise the power then; the Christians' persecutors do so now. Christ's coming will be with His powerful angels; His heavenly servants will be with Him to carry out His bidding. If the Rapture had occurred in Paul's lifetime, the enemies of the Thessalonian believers would have been judged shortly (seven years) thereafter, at Christ's second coming.

1:8. At that time the Lord Jesus Christ will punish two classes of people: those who are ignorant of God (Rom. 1:18-32), and those who . . . do not obey the gospel (cf. John 3:36). The guilt of those in the latter group is the greater because their privilege is greater. God's judgment is perfectly just. Willful rejection of God's revelation spurns God.

1:9. The destruction to befall both groups is stated in this verse. They will be punished is literally "they will pay a penalty" (dikēn tisousin). For their rejection of God's grace they will experience endless or everlasting ruin (olethron aiōnion). This is "the most express statement in St. Paul's Epistles of the eternity of future punishment" (Edward Headland and Henry B. Swete, The Epistle to the Thessalonians, London: Hatchard, 1863, p. 137). The punishment of the wicked will be neither temporary nor will it be annihilation, but it will continue throughout eternity and those being punished will be conscious. It is eternal death as opposed to eternal life (Matt. 25:46). The nature of the destruction follows in the next phrase.

Separation from the Lord's presence (lit., "face") is the essence of eternal punishment. On the other hand being in the Lord's presence will make heaven heaven. A Christian's hope is to see and be with the Lord; the judgment of unbelievers is to be eternally inaccessible to His presence (cf. Rom. 1:18; 2:5-9; 6:21; Phil. 3:19; 1 Thes. 1:10; 4:17).

The majesty of His power is the visible splendor of the Lord's presence. The Lord's power will be manifest in a majestic display (cf. Rev. 19:11-16). Unbelievers will be forever shut out from the Lord's presence and His power.

1:10. This judgment will take place when the Lord comes back to earth and is glorified through the lives of believers whom He has transformed by making saints out of sinners. This is not the Rapture (1 Thes. 4:13-18; John 14:2-3), for no judgment accompanies the Rapture. Instead, it is the revelation of Jesus Christ in power and great glory (Ps. 2:1-9; Matt. 25:31), when He will set up His earthly kingdom (Rev. 19:11–20:4). At His return He will destroy the Armageddon armies gathered against Him (Rev. 16:12-16; 19:19-21) and will then judge living Jews (Ezek. 20:33-38) and living Gentiles (Matt. 24:31-46). These judgments are the ones just described (2 Thes. 1:9).

The exact date of His return is not given, of course, but it will be a day of judgment for the lost and a day of glory and marveling for believers. Christ will be "glorified in" (not by) His saints, that is, His glory will be mirrored in them. Christians will marvel in that they will admire their Lord for what He has done in them. All believers will marvel—not just those living on the earth and those resurrected when Christ returns, but also those who return to earth with Him, those who had been caught up to be with the Lord at the Rapture.

This group, Paul pointed out, would include the Thessalonian believers to whom he wrote this epistle. Because they believed Paul's testimony they would share in this great day. Such a hope should strengthen any believer who might be buckling under the pressure of persecution by unbelievers (v. 4). This glimpse into the future undoubtedly encouraged Paul's readers and it should encourage believers in their trials today.

C. Prayer for success (1:11-12)

The preceding revelation moved Paul to pray for his Thessalonian brothers and sisters, that they might live lifestyles that were consistent with their calling and destiny.

1:11. Paul and his colleagues habitually prayed for the Thessalonians. Their spiritual welfare was always on the apostles' hearts.

They prayed that their God (the apostles' and the Thessalonains') would reckon or declare the readers worthy of the calling they had received, to come to God through faith in Jesus Christ (cf. Rom. 8:30; Eph. 4:1; 1 Thes. 4:7). Paul consistently made what God has done for believers the basis of his appeals for them to lead lives in keeping with their destiny. Christians do not live worthily in order to obtain salvation but because they have been granted salvation.

A second request was that God would bring to full expression every good purpose of theirs to glorify God, and every act motivated by their faith in God. Both motives and actions have their source in God (Phil. 2:13); thus they are accomplished by His power.

1:12. The ultimate purpose of this prayer is the glory of God. Specifically it was that God's glory might be manifested in and through the Thessalonians, both immediately (v. 12) and at the revelation of Jesus Christ (v. 10). When this happens, the vessels that manifest the glory of God are themselves glorified by association with Him. In the Bible the name stands for the person named, his character, conduct, reputation, and everything else about him. In praying thus, Paul was asking that God would fully glorify Jesus Christ in these saints. This is in keeping with and springs from the grace of God, personalized again by Paul as our God, and linked with the Lord Jesus Christ as an equal (cf. v. 1; 1 Thes. 1:1). Answers to prayers depend on and are traceable to God's grace. Such lofty requests as these can be fulfilled only by God's grace.

III. Correction of Present Error (2:1-12)

This section of verses contains truths found nowhere else in the Bible. It is key to understanding future events and it is central to this epistle. Paul dealt with a doctrinal error concerning eschatology (the last things) that had crept into the Thessalonian church. In chapter 2 he spoke to the theological error, and in chapter 3 to practical problems in the church that grew out of that error.

A. The beginning of the day of the Lord (2:1-5)

Paul had instructed the Thessalonians from the Old Testament concerning the day of the Lord when he preached to them in person. The day of the Lord is the period of history mentioned repeatedly in the Old Testament during which God will bring judgment and blessing on the people of the earth in a more direct, dramatic, and drastic way than ever before (cf. Isa. 13:6, 9; Zeph. 1:14-16). From other New Testament revelation concerning this period of time it is believed that this will begin after the Rapture of the church, and will include the Tribulation and the Millennium.

In his first letter to the Thessalonians Paul had taught them that the day of the Lord would come as a thief in the night (1 Thes. 5:2). This instruction raised a question in his readers' minds. It must have seemed to some of them that the day of the Lord had already come. After all, the persecutions they were experiencing seemed to be what the prophets had predicted when they wrote about the great calamities coming on God's people and the world in the day of the Lord. The Thessalonians apparently had received instruction from other teachers to the effect that they were indeed experiencing the judgments of the day of the Lord, that is, the Great Tribulation. But if this were so, how could Paul's previous instruction that they would be caught up and escape the wrath of God coming on the earth be true? Paul wrote this section (2 Thes. 2:1-5) to straighten out the matter.

2:1. The preceding comments concerning the coming of Christ (1:5-10) stimulated the readers' thinking about this subject, but now Paul launched into it more particularly. The coming (parousias, "presence") of our Lord Jesus Christ and our being gathered to Him refers to the Rapture. "Beseech," though archaic, is perhaps a more effective word than ask (erōtōmen) in conveying Paul's attitude of warm personal affection. He lightened their spirits with a reminder that his readers were his brothers and sisters in the faith. Paul probably used the full title for God the Son—"our Lord Jesus Christ"—in order to add solemnity to the subject.

2:2. Paul warned his readers against believing the false teaching that was shaking their spiritual equilibrium and triggering their fears. Apparently the theory that they were in the day of the Lord was coming to them from several sources (prophecy, report, or letter), making the Thessalonians more inclined to accept it as authoritative. Some were saying this teaching had been revealed to them by the Lord. And some were reporting teaching they had heard from others. And the Thessalonians received a letter, which was allegedly from Paul, that taught the same error (cf. 3:17). No wonder the new converts were shaken.

The erroneous message which all these voices echoed was that the day of the Lord had arrived; the Thessalonians were in it. But if this were so, the believers were wondering, how could Paul speak of the Lord's return as preceding the day of the Lord? (1 Thes. 1:10) And what about those promises that they would not see God's wrath? (1 Thes. 1:10; 5:9) It is clear that Paul had taught them a pretribulational Rapture. Their confusion arose because they could not distinguish their present troubles from those of the day of the Lord.

2:3. Having stated the issue and identified the sources of the false teaching, Paul proceeded to warn his readers against being deceived. The Thessalonians must not be deceived by any person, no matter how credible he might appear to be, or by the way anyone might present his teaching, claiming the authority of God or godly men. New Christians tend to be gullible because they are not yet grounded in the truth of God's Word (cf. Eph. 4:14). But all Christians can be misled by impressive personalities and spectacular appeals. The antidote to poisonous heresy is a good strong dose of the truth which Paul proceeded to administer.

He referred to three events which must occur before the judgments of the day of the Lord took place. They are the apostasy (2 Thes. 2:3), the revealing of the man of lawlessness (vv. 3-4, 8), and the removal of restraint against lawlessness (vv. 6-7). (These are not necessarily given in strict chronological order. See the following comments on vv. 3 and 7.)

One major event is the rebellion (lit., "the falling away," hē apostasia, from whence comes the English word "apostasy"). This is a revolt, a departure, an abandoning of a position once held. This rebellion, which will take place within the professing church, will be a departure from the truth that God has revealed in His Word. True, apostasy has characterized the church almost from its inception, but Paul referred to a specific distinguishable apostasy that will come in the future (cf. 1 Tim. 4:1-3; 2 Tim. 3:1-5; 4:3-4; James 5:1-8; 2 Peter 2; 3:3-6; Jude). He had already told his readers about it (2 Thes. 2:5).

Some interpreters have taken this "departure" as a reference to the Rapture of the church (e.g., E. Schuyler English, Rethinking the Rapture, New York: Loizeaux Brothers, 1954, pp. 67-71), but this is not too probable. D. Edmond Hiebert refutes this view that apostasia here refers to the Rapture (The Thessalonian Epistles, p. 306). Some scholars believe that this apostasy (called by Paul "the" apostasy) will consist of people turning from God's truth to worship the Antichrist, who will set himself up in God's temple and claim to be God (v. 4). If this is so, then the judgments of the day of the Lord will occur in the second half of the seven-year period preceding Christ's second coming.

Another event that must take place before the judgments of the day of the Lord occur is the revelation of "the man of lawlessness" (ho anthrōpos tēs anomias). Paul used a tense for the verb is revealed which indicates that this revelation will be a decisive act that will take place at a definite moment in history (cf. vv. 6, 8). He will be fully associated with and characterized by "lawlessness" (or "sin," as some mss. and the KJV have it). He is also described as the man doomed to destruction (lit., "the son of perdition," KJV). The destruction to which he is destined is the opposition of salvation; it is everlasting torment. It seems probable that the man of sin will be identified by some people living then when he makes a covenant with Israel at the beginning of the 70th week of Daniel (Dan. 9:27a); but when he breaks the covenant three and a half years later (Dan. 9:27b), he will be widely recognized for who he really is (Charles C. Ryrie, First and Second Thessalonians, p. 104). This latter event may be the time Paul had in mind for the "revealing" of the man of lawlessness.

2:4. This man is further described as the adversary of God. He will seek to replace the worship of the true God and all false gods with the worship of himself, and will proclaim himself to be God. The beast will tolerate the worship of no one or nothing but himself (cf. Rev. 13:5-8). He will set himself up on God's throne in the inner sanctuary of God's temple. This probably refers to a literal temple, but some suggest that it is a figurative reference to his occupying the most holy place in human worship, which rightfully belongs only to God. The early church fathers and several good modern-day commentators accept the literal view. This man is also called the "beast coming out of the sea" (Rev. 13:1-10), "a scarlet beast" (17:3), and simply "the beast" (17:8, 16; 19:19-20; 20:10). He is the Antichrist (1 John 2:18), a pseudo-Christ hostile to the Savior. He will be a real human being, not a principle or a system or a succession of individuals. Such a person has not yet been spotlighted on the stage of human history.

2:5. This teaching was nothing new to the Thessalonians; Paul had taught them about the day of the Lord when he was with them in Thessalonica. He called on them to recall those lessons. For the first time in this epistle Paul wrote that he personally (sing.) had taught them. He said this in order to emphasize the truth of his message, as he was the chief spokesman in Thessalonica. Paul did not regard prophetic truth as too deep or unimportant or controversial for new Christians. He believed it was a vital part of the whole counsel of God, so he taught it without hesitation or apology.

B. The mystery of lawlessness (2:6-12)

The Apostle Paul continued his correction by giving more information about the man of lawlessness in relation to the removal of the One who now partially restrains lawlessness. This removal constitutes a third event referred to by Paul that must take place before the day of the Lord will begin. The theme of lawlessness pervades this whole section of the epistle.

2:6. And (kai) connects what precedes with what follows; the same subject continues, but the emphasis shifts to what is presently restraining the revelation of the man of sin. Paul said the Thessalonians knew what it was, but he did not identify it here. Perhaps he had told them in person. Something or Someone is holding back the culmination of lawlessness. Part of the purpose of this restraint is to keep the man of sin from being revealed prematurely.

2:7. This verse explains and expands on verse 6. Paul reminded his readers that the secret power of lawlessness was already at work. The "secret power" (mystērion, whence "mystery") is one of the mysteries of the New Testament (Rom. 16:26; 1 Cor. 2:6-12; Eph. 1:9; 3:3-5; Col. 1:25-27). A mystery in the New Testament is a new truth previously unknown before its revelation in the present dispensation. In this case the mystery is the revelation of a future climax of lawlessness in the world. Then and now a movement against divine law directed by Satan was and is operative. But it is being restrained somewhat, and this restraining will continue until the time appointed for revealing the man of sin and the climax of lawlessness.

Who or what is restraining the satanically empowered movement against God's law and is postponing the revelation of the man of sin? Some say it is the Roman Empire. But the empire has long vanished and "the holder back" is not yet revealed. Another suggestion is that this is Satan, but it is difficult to see why he would hold back sin. Others suggest that human governments are holding back sin and the revealing of the Antichrist. But human governments will not end prior to the Antichrist's unveiling. Nor do all governments restrain sin; many encourage it!

The Holy Spirit of God is the only Person with sufficient (supernatural) power to do this restraining. Some object to this being the Holy Spirit on the grounds that to katechon in 2 Thessalonians 2:6 is neuter ("what is holding back"). But this is no problem for two reasons: (a) The neuter is sometimes used of the Holy Spirit (John 14:26; 15:26; 16:13-14). (b) In 2 Thessalonians 2:7 the words are masculine: ho katechōn, the one who . . . holds it back. How does He do it? Through Christians, whom He indwells and through whom He works in society to hold back the swelling tide of lawless living. How will He be taken out of the way? When the church leaves the earth in the Rapture, the Holy Spirit will be taken out of the way in the sense that His unique lawlessness-restraining ministry through God's people will be removed (cf. Gen. 6:3). The removal of the Restrainer at the time of the Rapture must obviously precede the day of the Lord. Paul's reasoning is thus a strong argument for the pretribulational Rapture: the Thessalonians were not in the Great Tribulation because the Rapture had not yet occurred.

2:8. After the removal of restraint the world will plunge headlong into lawlessness and the man of sin will be revealed (see comments on v. 3). This man's name is never given in the Bible, but he will be known by his actions. He is the same person referred to in verse 3. He is also spoken of in Daniel 9:26-27 and 11:36–12:1. Paul was conscious of the spiritual forces behind this individual, and for this reason described his revelation as something that will take place by the power of another, not himself.

This powerful person will be destroyed by the mere breath of the Lord Jesus. Antichrist may control mankind, but he will be no match for Messiah. Jesus is Lord indeed. "The very breathing of the glorified Jesus will slay the lawless one like the blast of a fiery furnace" (Hiebert, The Thessalonian Epistles, p.

315). He will be killed and his work will be destroyed, brought to nothing. The shining forth of Christ's presence when He comes to earth will immobilize the Antichrist's program as certainly as the revelation of the glorified Christ on the Damascus Road stopped Saul in his tracks and terminated his program of fighting against God.

This verse (2 Thes. 2:8), spans the seven-year career of the Antichrist from the time he makes a covenant with Israel soon after the Rapture, till his overthrow by Christ at His second coming at the end of the Tribulation.

2:9. The career of this lawless leader is described in more detail in verses 9-12. His career will be empowered by Satan (cf. Rev. 13:2b) and characterized by Satan's method: counterfeiting. Satan's desire to counterfeit God's miracles in the world can be traced from Genesis through Revelation. Paul employed three terms to describe the supernatural power this man will demonstrate. Miracles (dynamei) emphasizes the inherent power behind the works he will perform. Signs (sēmeiois) refers to the fact that they will have significance. Wonders (terasin) indicates the attitude of awe that they will evoke when people behold them. He will, in short, perform such powerful miracles that it will be evident to all that he has supernatural power, and people will stand in awe of him. One such miracle and the people's awe are mentioned in Revelation 13:2b-4 and 17:8.

2:10. His miracles are not the only thing that will deceive people into thinking he has divine power. Everything he does will mislead people, especially those whose minds are blinded to the truth of who he is and what he is doing because they do not believe God's Word. The meaning of this verse is not that everything he does will be perceived as evil by people, but that it will be evil in its essence because it misrepresents the truth and leads people away from worshiping God. The same three words used to describe his miracles in verse 9 (miracles, signs, wonders) were used of the miracles of Jesus Christ (Acts 2:22) and the apostles (Heb. 2:4). It will appear to unbelievers living on the earth at that time that he is indeed God. He will be able to pass himself off as God and receive worship as God.

Those who are being deceived by the man of sin are perishing (apollymenois, pres. part.; the noun "destruction" [apōleias] in 2 Thes. 2:3 is related to this part.) as the result of their refusal to love the truth of God and accept His gift of salvation. Their own choice brings about their condemnation. In spite of the inherent attractiveness of the saving truth of the gospel, these unbelievers refuse it. To love the truth of the gospel indicates true acceptance of it and adherence to it; it does not imply a higher requirement than simply believing it. The truth contrasts with the lies of the man of sin. The consequence of believing and loving the truth is salvation. One's responses to the gospel must be a matter of the heart (love), rather than simply of the head.

2:11. God desires that all be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth (1 Tim. 2:4-6). But when people refuse to entertain the truth, He lets them pursue and experience the consequences of falsehood (cf. Rom. 1:18-25). In fact God, as the Judge of men, begins this judgment at the moment of their rebellion and subjects them to the powerful delusion (energeian planēs) which comes from choosing error over truth. They choose to believe the lie and God sends them the delusion that is inherent in their choice. This powerful judgment from God is justified by the unbelievers' decision to refuse the truth. "The lie" is the claim that the man of lawlessness is God.

2:12. The purpose of God in acting thus is to execute justice (cf. 1:6). Eternal condemnation will be the fate of all who on the one hand choose to disbelieve the truth and on the other hand delight in wickedness. The opposite of believing the truth is delighting in wickedness; a spiritual decision leads to its moral manifestation. This consequence befalls everyone who disbelieves the gospel. Paul's primary concern here is of course unbelievers who will be living when the man of sin will be revealed. But these principles of God's judgment apply in all ages and can be seen in the 20th century.

Is this passage saying that those who do not believe the gospel before the man of sin is revealed—and who are therefore not caught up to meet the Lord at the Rapture but still live on the earth—cannot be saved after the man of lawlessness has been revealed? Or can people who recognize but knowingly reject the truth of the gospel before the Rapture be saved after the Rapture takes place? The "powerful delusion" (v. 11) that God will bring on these individuals in particular suggests that few if any then living on the earth will be saved after the Rapture. This seems to be a special judgment from God that will occur at this one time in history. The many saints which the Book of Revelation indicates will be living on the earth during the Tribulation may thus be people who did not hear and reject the gospel before the Rapture (cf. Rev. 7:4).

In summing up this section, Paul reminded his readers that the trials and persecutions they were experiencing (1:4) did not indicate that they were suffering the judgments of the day of the Lord. They had not missed the Rapture. Before the judgments of the day of the Lord would come, certain identifiable events must occur. These are the apostasy (extensive turning away from the truth of God), the removal of the Restrainer (the Holy Spirit restraining evil in the world as He works through the church He indwells) at the Rapture, and the unveiling of the Antichrist, the man of lawlessness. Since these events had not (and still have not) occurred, the Thessalonians were not experiencing the judgments accompanying the day of the Lord.

IV. Thanksgiving and Prayer (2:13-17)

This section forms a transition between Paul's teaching on the day of the Lord (2:1-12) and his exhortations for present living in view of that day (3:1-15).

A. Thanksgiving for calling (2:13-15)

The character, grounds, and implications of Paul's thanksgiving are included in these verses.

2:13. In contrast to the unbelievers just mentioned, the Thessalonians were a source of joy to the apostles. Paul felt a strong obligation to thank God on their behalf continually. They were his brothers (cf. vv. 1, 15) and sisters in the faith, loved by the Lord though hated and persecuted by their godless neighbors.

The reason for the apostle's joy and gratitude to God was His choice of the Thessalonian believers for eternal salvation. From the beginning (cf. "before the Creation of the world," Eph. 1:4) God chose (heilato, past tense of aireō, "to take or pick," used only here and in Phil. 1:22) them, not on the basis of their love for Him or any merit on their part, but because of His love for them (cf. 1 Thes. 1:4). Paul consistently taught that the initiative in salvation comes from God, not man. The means God uses to effect salvation is the work of His Holy Spirit who sets aside chosen individuals for lives of holiness and separation from sin (cf. John 16:7-11). The Holy Spirit regenerates, indwells, and baptizes Christians into the body of Christ. The human aspect of salvation is belief in the truth of the gospel. The Holy Spirit then uses the Word of God to purify the believer's life (John 17:17).

That God chooses to save some though He loves all men should lead believers to thank God for His grace on behalf of the elect.

2:14. God called the readers to salvation by using the gospel as it was proclaimed by the apostolic missionaries in Thessalonica. God's purpose in doing so was that the believers might one day share the splendor and honor that Jesus Christ now enjoys, seated at the right hand of the Father (cf. 1:10-12).

2:15. In view of their calling, the Thessalonian believers were to maintain their present position of faith in God, care for the brethren, and hope in the imminent return of Jesus Christ (cf. 1 Thes. 1:3). They were to stand firm (stēkete; cf. 1 Cor. 16:13; 1 Thes. 3:8). Christians are in constant danger of being swept downstream by the currents of ungodly culture. They are also prone to let the truths they know and the relationship they enjoy with God grow cold. They need to vigorously hold to what they have been taught by God's servants. The Thessalonians were in danger of loosening their grip on the apostles' teachings which they had received (cf. 2 Thes. 3:6) in person from the missionaries and from their letters. They were in danger of slipping backward in their Christian experience because of the pressures of their trials and the daily negative influences of the world, the flesh, and the devil.

B. Prayer for strength (2:16-17)

In the face of the Thessalonians' need for steadfastness Paul prayed that God would give them encouragement and strength (cf. 1 Thes. 3:2, 13; 2 Thes. 3:3).

2:16. Though the Son and Father are both mentioned, They are regarded as One. God's love and grace is the foundation for eternal (i.e., unending) encouragement (paraklēsin aiōnian) in the face of any temporary present distress. Also God gives hope for the future. And that hope is good (agathēn, "beneficial") for it assures believers of the return of their victorious Savior.

2:17. Paul had two desires for the Thessalonians: (a) The Thessalonians needed comfort and encouragement (the verb encourage [parakalesai] suggests both "comfort" and "encourage"; sometimes it means "urge" as in 1 Thes. 4:1, 10; 2 Thes. 3:12) in view of their recent anxiety created by false information concerning the day of the Lord. (b) They needed God's grace to make them firm and stable (strengthen is stērizai, also used in 1 Thes. 3:2, 13) in every good deed ("good" in the sense of being done as unto the Lord) and in every . . . word they spoke in defense and confirmation of the gospel.

V. Exhortations for Future Growth (3:1-15)

This last major section of the epistle called on its readers to live in the light of the truth previously revealed and by the grace of God just invoked.

A. Prayer for the apostles (3:1-2)

Paul and his companions requested the prayer support of their Thessalonian brethren for whom they prayed.

3:1. Finally introduces the last major part of the letter. The Thessalonians needed prayer in their temptations, but they also needed to pray for others. Assuming a burden of prayer for others lightens one's own load. The apostles were needy too. Prayer was requested for two matters. The apostles acknowledged that the success of their missionary labors was due to God's blessing His Word as they proclaimed it. In particular, the spreading of the gospel was God's work and its reception among those who heard it was due to His preparing hearts. The Thessalonians knew from their experiences how God works in people's hearts to prepare them to receive the gospel; so they could pray with conviction that God would honor His Word by causing others who heard it to believe it.

3:2. The second request was for deliverance from enemies of the gospel. As the missionaries itinerated from city to city, opponents of Christianity tried to frustrate their efforts. The Thessalonians knew all about this (Acts 17:5-9). The enemies of the gospel were doing something irrational, namely, resisting the free gift of God. They were also being destructive of the spiritual welfare of others. The hostility of these enemies was due to their lack of faith in the message of salvation. They were wicked (atopōn, "perverse") and evil (ponērōn, "actively harmful"). Verses 1 and 2 show the positive and negative reactions which the preaching of the gospel produce.

B. Confidence of the apostles (3:3-5)

Rather than feeling distraught over the present situation in the Thessalonian church, the apostles were confident.

3:3. The reason for their confidence was the faithfulness of God rather than anything about the Thessalonians. The character of God should be the basis for a Christian's confidence. Because God has promised to supply believers' needs, Paul could rest in the assurance that He would provide strength (cf. 1 Thes. 3:2, 13; 2 Thes. 2:17) to withstand temptation and trials, and protection from the adversary and his emissaries (cf. Phil. 1:6; 1 Thes. 5:24). (Cf. "evil men" in 2 Thes. 3:2 with the evil one in v. 3).

3:4. An additional reason for confidence was the conviction that the Thessalonians would continue to obey the instructions of Paul and his cohorts in this letter. The missionaries were not relying on their readers' inherent power to do what was right; their confidence was that since the believers were in Christ, the Lord would work in them to react favorably to this epistle.

3:5. This prayer-wish expressed the apostles' petition that Jesus Christ would open up the way for the readers to obey out of a growing appreciation of God's love for them and a consequently greater love for God, as well as increasing endurance in the midst of trials which the Lord's example of perseverance (hypomonēn; cf. 1 Thes. 1:3; 2 Thes. 1:4; Heb. 12:1-2) stimulates within the hearts of believers. Meditation on the love of God and the patient endurance of Christ motivates Christians to obey His Word and to endure trials patiently. The word direct (kateuthynai) means "clear away the obstacles." It is also used in 1 Thessalonians 3:11.

C. Treatment of the disorderly (3:6-10)

Doctrinal error concerning the day of the Lord had led to disorderly conduct in the church. Paul dealt with the latter problem forcefully in this section. This cause-effect relationship is not stated explicitly in the epistle, but it is a safe deduction.

3:6. That a minority of the church members were misbehaving seems clear in that Paul admonished his readers generally to discipline the erring brethren. The seriousness of the charge is seen in Paul's appeal to the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. On behalf of everything that Jesus Christ is, they should do as Paul said. This is a command, not a suggestion. When Paul wrote the church earlier, he told them to "warn those who are idle" (1 Thes. 5:14).

Apparently this warning had not been heeded. Now Paul prescribed harsher discipline. Second-degree discipline involved the orderly separating of themselves from the lazy and the disorderly. This may have included excluding them from the life and meetings of the church (cf. 1 Cor. 5:11). This lack of contact would illustrate in a graphic way the spiritual gap that the behavior of the unruly had created. The offense was idleness, deliberate loafing which led some to interfere in the work of others (2 Thes. 3:11) and to expect others to provide for their needs (v. 12). This behavior was in direct disobedience to the apostles' teaching.

3:7. Paul justified this command with the example the missionaries had given them while teaching in Thessalonica (vv. 7-10). Paul had commended the church for following his example (1 Thes. 1:6), but when it came to working some were not following it. Quite clearly, Paul regarded the apostles' example as an authoritative model for their converts. They were to imitate behavior as well as to believe teaching. Paul and his associates were never lazy loafers.

3:8. They did not leech off others. Paul was not saying that they never accepted a gift or a meal from others, but that they were self-supporting. They earned the bread they ate (cf. v. 12). In fact, they worked long and hard so as not to be a financial burden to any of the Thessalonians (cf. 1 Thes. 2:9).

3:9. The apostles lived this way to give their converts an example (typon; cf. 1 Thes. 1:7) of what it means to sacrifice for the good of others. The apostles had every right to receive physical help for spiritual ministry (cf. 1 Cor. 9:3-14; 1 Tim. 5:18). But they chose to forego this right in order to teach the importance of self-sacrificing love and industry. Paul did not imply that this right should always be sacrificed; he taught elsewhere that it is legitimate, that those who are taught should support their teachers (Gal. 6:6). His point here was that Christians generally should not expect other people to take care of them but should support themselves as much as possible.

3:10. The missionaries had taught the Thessalonians to be industrious as well as giving them a good example. Paul wanted no one to forget exactly what the apostles had said. It was a firm rule of Christian conduct. He either quoted it verbatim here or summarized his previous teaching into a single pithy precept. The individuals in view were not those who could not work but those who would not work. They were not to be supported by other Christians out of a sense of charity. The loving thing to do for those drones was to let them go hungry so that they would be forced to do right and go to work. No Christian who is able but unwilling to work should be maintained by others who labor on his behalf.

D. Commands for the idle (3:11-13)

Moving from the apostles' example of industry and a general principle to be followed, Paul focused on a specific problem in the church.

3:11. The apostles had heard more than once (this is the force of the pres. tense of hear, akouomen) that some in the church were not working to support themselves. They were busybodies instead of being busy. Instead of tending to their own business of earning a living they were meddling in the business of others (cf. 1 Tim. 5:13).

3:12. Paul and his companions both commanded (parangellomen) those in this category and exhorted (parakaloumen) them on behalf of their union with Christ. With calm and sober minds, in view of what had been written concerning the day of the Lord, they should settle down (lit., "be working with quietude" [not noisily or in disorderliness], hēsychia; cf. Acts 22:2; 1 Tim. 2:2, 11; and cf. comments on 1 Thes. 4:11) and engage in regular employment to earn a living. Then they would earn their own bread and not sponge off others. Paul had previously told them to do this (1 Thes. 4:11), but because some disobeyed he gave this sterner command.

3:13. Turning to the faithful majority, Paul urged continuation in doing what they knew to be right regardless of the leeching of the disobedient. When other Christians take easy paths of irresponsibility and seem to prosper in them, it is easy to get discouraged and be tempted to join them. Though one may tire in doing what is right, he should never tire of doing what is right. In addressing the diligent as brothers and the idle as such people (v. 12), Paul implied that those who disobeyed this word from God were separating themselves by their behavior.

E. Discipline of the disobedient (3:14-15)

These verses contain even stronger words regarding the idle. This was how the rest of the church should relate to them if they would not repent.

3:14. Having been warned twice (1 Thes. 4:11; 5:14) a disobedient person must be given special treatment if he failed to repent. Paul regarded his writings as authoritative for the church; they were to be obeyed because he was an apostle and his inspired words were the Word of God. The idle one was to be identified as such by the members of the church and placed in a distinct category as disobedient. This seems to be what each faithful brother should do individually; no mention is made of public identification and discipline in the church (2 Thes. 3:14-15).

The faithful were not to have social contact with an idle person till he repented. The purpose of this social ostracism was to make the offender feel ashamed of himself so that he would repent. The design of divine discipline is always to produce repentance, not division. Social pressure can be effective in helping an erring person come to his or her senses. This is exactly what Paul advocated in this case. Ostracism from the body of believers should help such a person be ashamed and feel his separation from fellowship with the Head of the body, Jesus Christ.

3:15. Concerned that the Thessalonians might overdo the discipline, Paul quickly urged them to treat the offender as a brother, not as an enemy. An occasion for discipline should not become an occasion for disobedience by those exercising the discipline. They were not to think of the offender as personally antagonistic toward them, nor were they to feel hostile toward him. His objective relationship to them as a brother in Christ should govern their feelings and actions, rather than subjective feelings that might be aroused by his idleness. They were to warn (noutheteite) him, not denounce him. Whereas they were to have no social contact with him they were not to break off all contact. They were patiently to admonish him to forsake the error of his ways.

VI. Conclusion (3:16-18)

The epistle closes with a prayer, a final greeting, and a benediction.

3:16. This is Paul's fourth prayer for the Thessalonians in this epistle (cf. 1:11-12; 2:16-17; 3:5). From correction Paul turned to intercession. Without the Lord's working all exhortations would be ineffective. Paul's concern was for peace within the church through the unity of all members obeying the truth. The Lord is the source of peace (cf. 1 Thes. 5:23) and Paul prayed that He would bestow this on the Christians in Thessalonica. A Christian and a church enjoy peace when they are rightly related to the will of God. Paul prayed that this would be the Thessalonians' condition at all times regardless of their circumstances, even in persecution.

In praying that the Lord would be with them all, Paul was not implying that God is with Christians only some of the time (cf. Matt. 28:20). Rather, he was praying that fellowship with Christ (that Christians can enjoy only as they obey His Word) might be the portion of each believer—not just of the obedient but also of those who were presently disobedient through idle living.

3:17. There is good evidence that Paul dictated his epistles to an amanuensis who actually wrote them down for him (cf. Rom. 16:22; 1 Cor. 16:21; Col. 4:18). But here Paul wrote a greeting with his own hand. Probably he wrote something by hand in most of his letters, to guarantee their authenticity to the recipients. In the case of this epistle such a personal salutation was especially needed (cf. 2 Thes. 2:2). His handwriting was undoubtedly distinguishable from his secretary's and was probably recognized by his readers as Paul's own.

3:18. The same benediction is used here as in 1 Thessalonians 5:28 except that all is added here. "All" sounds a final appeal for unity in the church through the obedience of each individual to Paul's instruction and admonitions. Such unity can come about only through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.

INTRODUCTION

The Pastoral Epistles. "The Pastoral Epistles" is a term used to designate Paul's two letters to Timothy and one letter to Titus. Two things distinguish these three epistles from Paul's other letters: (1) They are among the last things Paul wrote, reflecting the sort of concerns which burdened the apostle near the end of his ministry. (2) They are ostensibly addressed not to a congregation but to two young men who were functioning in pastoral roles. This does not mean, of course, that the letters were not read before congregations. The epistles show clear signs that their author intended them to be used widely. Nor does this mean that the epistles are mere handbooks on pastoral duties. There is much of general interest in the letters. Yet 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus are distinctive among Paul's letters. They are highly personal, practical, and unsystematic in nature; and they deal with matters of church order which Paul had not hitherto addressed except in passing. The evolving need for structure in the churches, combined with Paul's awareness that his own steadying influence would soon be passing from the scene, prompted him to treat certain ecclesiastical and pastoral subjects which have profited the church immensely ever since.

Authorship. Each of the Pastoral Epistles begins with an explicit identification of the Apostle Paul as its author. Until modern times no significant voices questioned their Pauline authorship. However, early in the 19th century liberal scholars attacked the authenticity of the Pastorals, and that concerted attack has gained momentum. Today the majority of liberal scholars hold that the Pastorals were written not by Paul, but by a "Paulinist," that is, a follower of Paul one or two generations removed from the apostle. According to this view the Pastorals actually reflect a perspective characteristic of the early second century rather than the mid-first century and, more importantly, of Paul's later followers rather than the apostle himself.

The attack on the authenticity of the Pastorals is four-pronged: historical, stylistic, ecclesiastical, and theological.

1. Historical arguments. The historical arguments stem from the fact that chronological references in the Pastoral Epistles do not fit comfortably within the historical framework of the Book of Acts. This is in some ways a strange argument since liberal scholars also commonly attack the chronological and historical reliability of Acts. How then can Acts be used as history to undermine the authenticity of the Pastorals? Yet despite this inconsistency in the liberal position, for those who take seriously both the historicity of Acts and the Pauline authorship of the Pastorals, this is a real problem.

Some have attempted to force the Pastorals into the Acts chronology, but the historical obstacles to doing so seem insurmountable. Many liberal scholars have therefore solved the seeming problems by assuming that the letters were written much later with fictitious references designed to make the epistles appear Pauline. A variation of this is the theory that the Pastorals represent fragments of truly Pauline material interspersed with material written by a later editor. In either case, the chronological distance from the events mentioned is assumed to account for the lack of historical "fit" with Acts.

A more satisfactory solution is to assume that the Pastorals do not fit within the Book of Acts at all, but rather describe a period after the end of Acts. The Book of Acts ends with Paul in jail in Rome (A.D. 61–62). Surely if Paul was executed at the end of his imprisonment, Luke would have mentioned it. On the other hand, it is entirely credible that Paul could have been released (A.D. 62), perhaps for lack of evidence, and left free for another period of ministry. According to this supposition (which is all it can ever be), Paul traveled widely from A.D. 62 to 67 and was eventually recaptured, tried, and executed in Rome in 67. During this period of travel he would have written 1 Timothy and Titus, and during his final imprisonment, 2 Timothy. If this scenario is correct then one ought not expect the Pastorals to fit into the chronology of Acts, which ends with his first Roman imprisonment, and the historical arguments against the Pastorals' authenticity lose their force.

2. Stylistic arguments. Another line of argument against the authenticity of the Pastorals grows out of detailed examinations of their vocabulary. The occurrence of unusually high numbers of words used only once in the New Testament (but more regularly by second-century writers), words used by other New Testament writers but never elsewhere by Paul, and the absence or different use of characteristic Pauline words all combine, so the argument goes, to suggest a writing style of someone other than Paul.

But such word-counting cannot support the weight of the critics' conclusions. To begin with, the entire process is scientifically unsound since the available samples of literature are far too small for any such findings to be statistically valid. Furthermore such studies completely overlook the fact that different subject matter, different experiences, advancing age, changes in environment and companions, different recipients and purposes—all these and more affect a writer's vocabulary. When the same word-counting techniques are applied to uncontested Pauline Epistles, much the same results occur. Thus authenticity cannot be determined by merely counting word usage.

3. Ecclesiastical arguments. The ecclesiastical arguments against the Pauline authorship of the Pastorals all claim, in one form or another, that the church structure and order evidenced in those epistles did not emerge until well after the Apostolic Age and into the second century. In fact, it is claimed, Paul's other writings show that he had no interest in church polity at all, so that it would be out of character for him to have written some of the instructions found in the Pastorals.

But once again the critics' arguments are questionable. The polity of the Pastorals can actually be contrasted with that of the second century, when Ignatian-type "bishops" (episkopoi) came to be distinguished from and set in hierarchical authority over elders (presbyteroi). The Pastorals describe no such differentiation. The two terms are used interchangeably in the Pastorals (cf. Titus 1:5-7) in a typically Pauline fashion (cf. Acts 20:17, 28). Clearly the emergence of the offices of elder-bishop and deacon had already occurred within Paul's lifetime (cf. Phil. 1:1), no doubt at his own instigation. Nothing about those offices in the Pastoral Epistles requires a second-century date.

The same may be said for the so-called "order of widows." While the second-century church did develop almost an "office" in the church for widows, the list of widows mentioned in 1 Timothy represents no such formalized position. From the beginning there had been an awareness of the church's responsibility to needy widows (cf. Acts 6:1-6), and the instructions in the Pastorals represent nothing one would not expect to find in an apostolic letter dated two or three decades after the church began.

4. Theological arguments. The theological objections to Pauline authorship are two. First, critics argue that the heresy combated in the Pastorals is the well-developed Gnosticism of the second century; and, second, the theological perspective of the author, while admittedly basically Pauline, is in some significant ways unlike the great apostle and much like what one would expect of a second-century follower.

As to the first of these objections, it is widely acknowledged that what became a full-fledged heretical movement called Gnosticism in the second century was already "incipient" during the years of Paul's ministry. He often met and dealt with Gnostic tendencies, preeminently in Colosse. Therefore the fact that the Pastorals contain denunciations of false teaching that shows hints of a Gnostic dualism and asceticism does not require a second-century date. Moreover, on closer inspection, the error addressed in the Pastorals looks less and less like a well-formed Gnosticism. The false teachers described in the Pastorals actually show certain eclectic tendencies, drawing on Jewish influences as well (cf. 1 Tim. 1:7; Titus 1:10, 14; 3:9). Furthermore the essential danger of the error described seemed to lie in its irrelevance and worthlessness, a claim that would not be true of the fully formed second-century Gnosticism. Hence, the objections to Pauline authorship based on presumed references to a full Gnosticism in the Pastorals do not stand up under scrutiny.

As to the theological objection—that the theology of the author is in some ways un-Pauline—the same may be said. This does not stand up under close inspection.

According to this critical view the Pastorals supposedly show a lesser mind at work. They say the material is not anti-Pauline, or even non-Pauline, but merely un-Pauline, or perhaps sub-Pauline. Instead of refuting error, the author simply denounced it. Instead of developing the truth, the author was intent merely on conserving and guarding it. He was concerned with mere religion rather than theology, mere orthodoxy rather than creative thought. Right belief is given too much prominence, goes the argument. So they say Paul would never have written such things. Thus when combined with the fact that some of Paul's favorite ideas are missing, slighted, or reshaped (e.g., the ministry of the Holy Spirit, grace, the believers' mystical position "in Christ"), the conclusion is inevitable, according to the critics: Paul did not write the Pastorals.

Yet such a drastic conclusion is unwarranted. All of Paul's favorite themes do occur in the Pastorals, and any differences in their treatment can be fairly explained by the unique characteristics of the Pastorals. These epistles were written under unique circumstances, to unique audiences (first and foremost Timothy and Titus), for unique purposes. One should not expect them to sound exactly like Paul's other epistles. Arguments built on such subtle and in the end flimsy evidence cannot prove a second-century date.

The Pastorals do reflect, of course, a profound concern on the part of the apostle for the conservation of the truth. Paul was in the best sense of the word a "conservative." Having faithfully done all he could to develop and teach the truths of the gospel throughout his ministry, he was concerned near the end of his life that his faithful disciples not change them, but rather entrust them in turn to other faithful Christians, who would in turn entrust them to still others. He viewed this body of truth as a special stewardship from God, to be managed with great care. Since this truth led to godliness by pointing believers to Jesus Christ, it was the most valuable of treasures. It was to be taught faithfully in the congregation, and all attempts to undermine, pollute, or attack it were to be met with stern resistance.

Such a view of objective propositional truth is in serious conflict with modern existential views of truth. Hence it is not surprising that critics seek to dissociate it from Paul and attribute it to second-century followers. Yet to do so requires an unwarranted a priori assumption about the apostle's view of truth. A more objective assessment is that there is nothing in the theology of the Pastorals which requires a late date or which cannot be explained by the fact that these epistles represent Paul's last instructions to his two faithful representatives, Timothy and Titus.

Date. Paul's missionary journeys occupied approximately the years A.D. 48–56. From 56–60 Paul was slowly making his way through the Roman courts, arriving ultimately at Rome. For two years, 61–62, Paul was held under house arrest in Rome, at the end of which time, it can be surmised, he was released. From 62–67 Paul traveled more or less freely, leaving Timothy in Ephesus and Titus in Crete, and then subsequently writing each of them a letter. Thus the approximate dates for 1 Timothy and Titus are perhaps 63–66. After being recaptured and once again imprisoned, Paul wrote Timothy a second letter, 2 Timothy. Thus 2 Timothy, dated approximately A.D. 67, represents the last Pauline Epistle.

The Recipients. 1. Timothy. Timothy was the son of a Greek father and Jewish mother (Acts 16:1). No mention is made of his father being a Christian, but his mother Eunice and grandmother Lois were both known for their sincere faith (2 Tim. 1:5). Timothy was no doubt living at Lystra when Paul visited that city on his first missionary journey (cf. Acts 14:6; 16:1). Whether or not Paul led Timothy to Christ cannot be known with certainty. At any rate Timothy already knew and believed the Old Testament Scriptures, thanks to his mother and grandmother (cf. 2 Tim. 3:15), and Paul took him on as a promising protégé. Paul thus became like a spiritual father to the young man, referring to him as "my true son in the faith" (1 Tim. 1:2) and "my dear son" (2 Tim. 1:2; cf. Phil. 2:22).

Timothy's promise for the ministry was recognized early (1 Tim. 1:18; 4:14; 2 Tim. 4:5). Thus Paul took him on as a companion and he became one of the apostle's most trustworthy fellow-laborers (cf. Rom. 16:21; 1 Cor. 16:10; Phil. 2:19-22; 1 Thes. 3:2). He also became Paul's faithful representative and messenger (Acts 19:22; 1 Cor. 4:17; 2 Cor. 1:19; Phil. 2:19; 1 Thes. 3:2, 6). Six of Paul's epistles include Timothy in the salutations (2 Cor. 1:1; Phil. 1:1; Col. 1:1; 1 Thes. 1:1; 2 Thes. 1:1; Phile. 1; see the chart, "Paul's Introduction to His Epistles" at Rom. 1:1). Timothy had become so dear to Paul that in the apostle's last message was a touching appeal for Timothy to join him in his final days of imprisonment (2 Tim. 1:4; 4:9, 21).

After being released from his first Roman imprisonment Paul, with Timothy by his side, evidently revisited some of the churches in Asia, including Ephesus. On his departure from Ephesus, Paul left Timothy behind to provide leadership to the congregation. Then after an interval Paul wrote Timothy a letter, 1 Timothy, urging him on in that ministry.

Timothy may have been by nature somewhat passive, timid, retiring, and easily intimidated (cf. 2 Tim. 1:7). Thus Paul repeatedly spurred him into action (1 Tim. 1:3; 4:11; 5:7; 6:2; 2 Tim. 3:14; 4:2, 5). He was to let nothing, including his relative youth (1 Tim. 4:12) stand in the way of his performance of duty (2 Tim. 2:1-7; 4:5). Like a good soldier he was to "fight the good fight" (1 Tim. 1:18; 6:12), aggressively protecting and propagating the gospel, using the full range of his gifts (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6).

2. Titus. Considerably less is known of Titus than of Timothy. Like Timothy he was one of Paul's converts, or at least a protégé (cf. Titus 1:4), but when or where he became a believer is unknown. Nor is anything known about his family or background, except that he was a Gentile (Gal. 2:3).

It is clear, however, that he was a trustworthy co-laborer with Paul. Titus was given one of Paul's most difficult and delicate assignments—to represent the apostle in troubled Corinth (2 Cor. 2:13; 7:6-7, 13-15; 8:6, 16-17). During the time between his two Roman imprisonments, Paul visited Crete with Titus, whom he left behind to further the work the two had begun (cf. Titus 1:5). Sometime later, during Paul's second imprisonment, Titus left Crete to travel to Dalmatia (2 Tim. 4:10), presumably for evangelistic purposes.

I. The Salutation (1:1-2)

1:1. Paul's typical salutation includes an identification of both author and recipient, combined with a more or less ritualized greeting. Here as in each of his other epistles except Philippians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, and Philemon, Paul identified himself as an apostle of Christ Jesus. He no doubt used the term "apostle" in its more restricted sense to refer to those who had been personally commissioned by the risen Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 8:23 ["representatives"]; Phil. 2:25 ["messenger"] for its broader usage). Paul's apostleship was not something he had sought; it had come to him through a heavenly command (Gal. 1:11–2:2; cf. 1 Tim. 2:7). In several of his other epistles Paul commonly made a similar point by stressing his apostolic "calling" according to "the will of God" (1 Cor. 1:1; 2 Cor. 1:1; Eph. 1:1; Col. 1:1; 2 Tim. 1:1). Paul was often in the position of having to defend his authority which came from both God the Father and God the Son. The identification of God our Savior has an Old Testament ring to it but is common in the Pastorals (cf. 1 Tim. 2:3; 4:10; Titus 1:3; 2:10; 3:4). Jesus is described as our hope, a term which directs the reader's attention to the certain fulfillment of God's saving plan in Christ (cf. Col. 1:27).

1:2. Though this letter was clearly intended to be read aloud to the congregations in Ephesus and beyond, Timothy was identified as its immediate recipient. As Paul's genuine or true son in the faith, none could mistake Timothy's special place in Paul's heart. (This is the first of 19 times Paul used the Gr. word pistis, "faith," in 1 Tim.) Paul had probably not led him to Christ (cf. 2 Tim. 1:5; 3:15), but he probably had ordained (2 Tim. 1:6) the young minister, and had great confidence in him. Timothy was issued Paul's fairly standard greeting of grace, mercy, and peace.

II. Instructions concerning False Teachers (1:3-20)

A. Warnings against false teachers (1:3-11)

1:3. The moves referred to in this verse cannot be followed clearly. Was Paul leaving Ephesus to enter Macedonia? Had he given Timothy instructions prior to leaving Ephesus? This is perhaps the best supposition. Timothy was urged, apparently for a second time, to stay on in Ephesus, indicating perhaps some inclination on Timothy's part to leave that ministry, perhaps to accompany Paul. Timothy's task in remaining was to stifle certain men in the congregation who were teaching false (lit., "different"; cf. 6:3) doctrines—that is, different from Paul's doctrine (cf. 1:11).

1:4. These false teachers were following after fables (mythois, cf. 4:7) and long, involved genealogies. Exactly what these fables and genealogies involved is not known. They may have had a Gnostic flavor, but were more likely of Jewish origin (cf. Titus 1:14). Whatever their nature, they were empty of any spiritual value and led only to further speculation, questions, and arguments. Such speculations were to be avoided because they did not further God's plan, which is grasped and implemented not by human imaginings, but by faith. By contrast, human speculations tend to lead off down endless blind tunnels which serve only to confuse and obscure God's truth.

1:5. Unlike such aimless speculations, the intended result of Paul's instruction to Timothy was love, and the purest kind of love at that. It is that love which pours naturally from a cleansed heart (cf. 2 Tim. 2:22), untainted conscience, and a sincere (anypokritou, "unhypocritical"; cf. 2 Tim. 1:5) faith. Each member of this beautiful trio speaks of a purity and integrity which produces the most exquisite kind of selfless love, seen in its ultimate form in God's love itself. Whereas the false teachers were motivated by worthless curiosity, Paul's instruction was designed to promote the most magnificent of virtues by maintaining the purity of the church's teaching.

God's truth always purifies the human spirit, while error putrifies it.

1:6. Paul no doubt believed that such love should be the goal of all Christian ministry (cf. 1 Cor. 13:1-3). Yet, sadly, though they should have known better, some teachers in the Ephesian congregation had lost sight of this lofty purpose and had wandered away (lit., "missed the aim"; cf. 1 Tim. 6:21; 2 Tim. 2:18) and turned aside to meaningless talk. Their teaching was mataiologian, that is, idle, useless, futile, empty verbiage.

1:7. More specifically, the problem with these false teachers, as is often the case, was a matter of the ego. They wanted to become respected teachers of the Law. Yet they were completely incapable of doing so. But instead of recognizing their inadequacies and remaining silent, they went on babbling as if with great authority, never understanding their subject (the Law), or even what they were saying about it.

1:8. Paul wanted to be sure that he was not misunderstood. He was not disparaging the Law. Paul viewed the Law as "holy, righteous, and good" (Rom. 7:12). Thus he clarified his point by emphasizing that the Law is good provided it is used properly. There is an inappropriate, legalistic use of the Law which Paul disavowed; but there is also a proper use of the Law that Paul embraced (cf. Gal. 3:19, 24).

1:9-10. The Law is designed to show people their sinfulness. Thus the Law is not for one who had already recognized his sin and turned to Christ. That person is no longer under the Law but should now walk in the Spirit (Gal. 5:13-26). The Law is intended for those who remain unconvinced of their sin.

Paul provided a striking list of examples which seem to be intentionally based on the Ten Commandments (cf. Ex. 20:3-17). The list begins with three pairs corresponding to the first table of the Decalogue dealing with offenses against God: (1) lawbreakers and rebels, (2) the ungodly and sinful, (3) the unholy (anosiois, "not devout"; cf. hosious in 1 Tim. 2:8) and irreligious (bebēlois, "profane"; cf. 4:7; 6:20; 2 Tim. 2:16). Paul then listed violators of the first five commandments of the second table of the Decalogue: those who kill their fathers or mothers represent the ultimate violation of the fifth commandment, and murderers the sixth. Adulterers and perverts pertain to the seventh commandment, which was generally broadly interpreted to include all forms of sexual sin. Slave traders may correspond to the eighth commandment since kidnapping was viewed as the ultimate act of stealing (Ex. 21:16; Deut. 24:7). Liars and perjurers clearly pertain to the ninth commandment. Only the 10th commandment ("You shall not covet") is not included (but cf. Rom. 7:7). Paul concluded this inventory of sinners with an all-inclusive reference to any behavior which is contrary to sound doctrine (lit., to "healthy teaching"; cf. 2 Tim. 1:13), including no doubt the very behavior of the false teachers themselves. "Doctrine" here is didaskalia, "teaching" or "the content taught," used seven times in this epistle: 1 Timothy 1:10; 4:1, 6, 13, 16; 5:17; 6:1.

1:11. Paul's yardstick for measuring what is and is not sound teaching, of course, was the message of God's great good news in Christ with which he had been entrusted (cf. 1 Thes. 2:4; Titus 1:3), and which he had faithfully preached in Ephesus (cf. Acts 20:17-27).

B. Paul's experience of grace (1:12-17)

1:12. At this point Paul's inventory of sinners, of which he knew he was the chief—combined with his remembrance of the gospel with which he had been entrusted—triggered within him a powerful surge of gratitude. Literally, the words "Thanks I have"—with "thanks" in the emphatic position—begins this section. Paul's gratitude stemmed from the fact that God in His grace had provided Paul all necessary enablement (cf. Phil. 4:13) and, considering him trustworthy, had pressed him into a privileged place of service.

1:13. The reason this was so striking to the apostle was that he knew so well the pit from which he had been dug. When he said he was a blasphemer and a persecutor and a violent man, he was not exaggerating for the sake of effect. (See Acts 22:4-5, 19-20; 26:9-11 for the vivid truth.) Yet Paul was shown mercy because his actions were the product of ignorance. Willful disobedience triggers God's wrath (cf., e.g., Num. 15:22-31; Heb. 10:26). But God deals gently with the ignorant and misguided (Heb. 5:2). The German philosopher Nietzsche said, "If you could prove God to me, I would believe Him all the less." No such willfulness characterized Paul's unbelief.

1:14. Therefore the apostle received God's mercy, not His wrath. God's grace far outpaced even Paul's grievous sin. Where there was once only unbelief, God poured out . . . faith . . . in Christ. Where there had been violent aggression against God and His people, now God poured out the love of Christ. (See comments on 2 Tim. 2:10.) Everything Paul lacked, God's grace had more than amply supplied. (The verb hyperepleonasen, used only here in the NT, means "to be present in great or superabundance.") Here may be seen the full measure of what Paul meant when he spoke of the empowering ministry of Christ (1 Tim. 1:12).

1:15. The central thrust of Paul's personal digression, begun in verse 12, now becomes clear. It is a testimony concerning the purpose of the Incarnation of Christ. Jesus came not merely to set an example or to show that He cared. He came to salvage sinners from their spiritual destitution—and Paul said he was the worst of that lot. There must be no misunderstanding of this most fundamental point. It is a truth that is completely trustworthy and deserving of full acceptance. (Four other passages include this "trustworthy" phrase: 3:1; 4:9; 2 Tim. 2:11; Titus 3:8.)

1:16. In fact it was just for this purpose—that is, to demonstrate God's plan to save sinners—that Paul himself was saved. As the worst of sinners (cf. Paul's other descriptions of himself in 1 Cor. 15:9; Eph. 3:8), Paul represents the extreme example. If God was patient and gracious enough to save Paul, He is patient and gracious enough to save anyone. All who follow can look back at Paul as a prototype or pattern ("example," hypotypōsin; cf. 2 Tim. 1:13). The ultimate sinner became the ultimate saint; God's greatest enemy became His finest servant. Somewhere between these extremes fall all the rest. In studying Paul's pattern, Christians can therefore learn about themselves.

1:17. This contemplation of God's grace as seen in Paul's case prompted him to one of his typical doxologies. It is filled with awe and adoration of the Lord. King eternal (lit., "King of the Ages") emphasizes God's sovereignty over all the ebb and flow of human history. Immortal and invisible speak of two of the central attributes of God: His eternality and His spiritual essence. The only God emphasizes His uniqueness in a typical Jewish monotheistic fashion. To this God alone must all honor and glory be ascribed, eternally. Amen (cf. 6:16).

C. Paul's charge to Timothy (1:18-20)

1:18. Returning from his brief personal digression (vv. 12-17), Paul got back to the specific matters before Timothy in Ephesus, resuming the charge begun in verse 3. This instruction (the same word parangelian is translated "command" in v. 5) refers to the teaching about the false teachers mentioned in verse 3. Such instructions were in accord with the prophecies . . . made earlier concerning Timothy's call and fitness for service in Ephesus. When and by whom these prophecies were made can only be guessed. It is known that the prophecies reinforced Paul's conviction that Timothy was a fit soldier to conduct the battle against error in the Ephesian church (cf. 6:12; 2 Tim. 4:7 for an athletic rather than military metaphor). Timothy was to remember these prophecies and be inspired by them in the struggle.

1:19. Whereas in Ephesians 6:10-17 Paul spelled out in detail to that church the Christian's equipment for spiritual warfare, here he listed only two items: faith and a good conscience. These two always seem to travel together (cf. 1 Tim. 1:5; 3:9). Strength in the one is always combined with strength in the other. So also is failure in the one correlated with failure in the other. Thus some who have rejected (apōtheō, "a strong, deliberate thrusting away"; used elsewhere in the NT only in Acts 7:27; Rom. 11:1-2) a good conscience have also found their faith destroyed (cf. 1 Tim. 4:1; 6:10). Theological error is often rooted in moral failure.

1:20. Two in Ephesus who illustrate this principle are Hymenaeus (cf. 2 Tim. 2:17) and Alexander. Whether this is the same Alexander mentioned in Acts 19:33 and 2 Timothy 4:14 is not clear. Probably it is not. Paul's prescription for these two blasphemers was that they be handed over to Satan, a phrase which perhaps refers to excommunication from the congregation (cf. 1 Cor. 5:1-5) and abandonment to realms controlled by Satan (2 Cor. 4:4). Paul viewed the congregation as a haven and protection for believers without which they would suffer painful disadvantage. Thus excommunication was designed to chasten the two apostates. Yet Paul's motive was remedial, not punitive (cf. 2 Cor. 2:5-8; 2 Thes. 3:14-15).

III. Instructions concerning Conduct in the Church (2:1–3:13)

A. Instructions concerning prayer (2:1-7)

2:1. From his concerns about false teachers Paul turned to matters relating to the conduct of the church broadly (cf. 3:14-15). Paul began with what he considered most important: prayer. What too often comes last in a church's priorities should actually come first. Not much weight should be placed on the presumed distinctions between requests, prayers, and intercession. The terms are more likely designed to build on one another for emphasis. It should be noted, however, that thanksgiving should have a prominent place in the church's prayer life.

2:2. The Ephesian church was to pray "for everyone" (v. 1, lit., "all men"), but especially for the leaders of civil government. Paul did not specify here the content of these prayers, but almost certainly he was instructing that requests be made for the salvation of the populace and its governors. This can be seen clearly from the following verses. With Nero's growing resentment toward Christians—which came to full bloom after the fire in Rome in July, A.D. 64—and the general disintegration of the Roman Empire due to Nero's profligacy, Christians began to suffer persecution from the Roman authorities. Having recently been released from his Roman imprisonment, Paul was greatly aware of the deteriorating political atmosphere. Thus he urged prayer for the salvation of all men, but especially rulers, so that the stable, noninterfering environment of previous days might be recovered. This is the minimum requirement if Christians are to live peaceful and quiet lives in all godliness and holiness. (This is the first of 10 times Paul used the word eusebia, "godliness." These 10 occurrences are all in the Pastoral Epistles: 2:2; 3:16; 4:7-8; 6:3, 5-6, 11; 2 Tim. 3:5; Titus 1:1. Its five other usages are in Acts 3:12; 2 Peter 1:3, 6-7; 3:11.) Times of political and social upheaval are excellent times in which to die for Christ, but hard times in which to live for Him.

2:3. As in modern times, some in the Ephesian church were prepared to question the validity of a prayer for the salvation of all men. Thus Paul defended his instructions by pointing out that such a prayer is good, and pleases God our Savior (cf. 1:1). Literally, the Greek says that such a prayer is "acceptable before" (in the presence of) God. Many prayers are unacceptable to God, but not this one.

2:4. The reason this prayer is acceptable to God is that it is a prayer "according to His will" (1 John 5:14). God, who is by nature a Savior, wants all men to be saved. Paul repeated the words "everyone" (1 Tim. 2:1) and "all men" (vv. 3, 6). The same Greek word (pas, "all") is used in each case, referring all three times to the same group (cf. 4:10). God desires that no one perish (2 Peter 3:9), that the entire human race come to know the truth through a personal relationship with Jesus Christ, who is the Truth (John 14:6). (Of course not all do come to salvation; Paul was not teaching universalism.)

2:5-6. To further buttress his argument Paul cited the commonly accepted teaching about God and His work in Christ. Verses 5-6 may represent a fragment of a familiar confession of the first century. In any case, Paul cited these unquestioned truths of the gospel: (1) There is only one God. (2) There is only one way for men to approach Him—through the Man who was God in the flesh, Christ Jesus. (3) This Jesus gave Himself up to die on the cross as a ransom (antilytron; cf. lytron, "ransom" for a slave or prisoner, in Matt. 20:28; Mark 10:45) for the human race. (Cf. the chart, "New Testament Words for Redemption," at Mark 10:45.) This act is a clear testimony, offered at just the right time (Gal. 4:4-5; Heb. 1:1-2), of God's desire to save all men (cf. Titus 1:3).

2:7. The exclusivists in the Ephesian church evidently felt that the gospel was only for Jews. This was a common problem, as seen preeminently in the case of Peter (cf. Acts 10:9-43; Gal. 2:11-13). Thus Paul cited his own commission as apostle . . . to the Gentiles as a clincher. Paul had been appointed a herald (kēryx, "messenger"; cf. 2 Tim. 1:11) to take the gospel to the majority of the human race that the Jews had considered beyond the pale. Thus, as Paul reminded the Ephesians, it can be seen that God desires everyone to be saved. Paul's assurances of his truthfulness were stylistic devices designed to stress the importance of his point (cf. Rom. 9:1; 2 Cor. 11:31; Gal. 1:20).

B. Instructions concerning men and women (2:8-15)

2:8. Undoubtedly Paul wanted all Christians to offer up prayers for a widespread spiritual awakening among the populace and its rulers. Yet in the public assembly Paul specified that men (andras, lit., "males") everywhere are to lead the congregation in prayer. Moreover, these prayers were to be offered with lifted hands. This was a common Old Testament practice (cf., e.g., 1 Kings 8:22; 2 Chron. 6:13; Ezra 9:5; Pss. 28:2; 141:2; Lam. 2:19). It was also common in the pagan mystery religions of the first century and in the early church. Paintings on the walls of the catacombs in Rome portray this posture. The hands were to be holy (hosious, "devout, undefiled"), signifying an internal cleanness on the part of these spiritual leaders. Further, such leaders must be men of sound relationships, not characterized by anger (orgēs, "outbursts of temper") or disputing (dialogismou). Broken human relationships affect one's ability to pray (cf. Matt. 5:22-24; 6:12; 1 Peter 3:7), which would include leading others in prayer.

2:9. Next Paul turned to the females in the congregation. For their adornment they should not emphasize the external, but the internal. They should dress modestly, with decency and propriety (cf. v. 15). These terms stress not so much the absence of sexual suggestiveness, though it is included, but rather an appearance that is simple, moderate, judicious, and free from ostentation. The specifics Paul mentioned (braided hair or gold or pearls or expensive clothes) are not wrong in themselves, but become inappropriate when they indicate misplaced values (cf. 1 Peter 3:3). In the Ephesian church these styles may have been associated with the local temple prostitutes. Christians must be careful about letting a pagan culture set their fashions.

2:10. Instead of stressing external beauty, according to the world's standards, Christian women should manifest a different set of values. They should adorn themselves with (lit., "by means of") good deeds. They should depend on their faithful service in the name of Christ to render them attractive to others. This was no plea for women to make themselves unattractive; it was simply an exhortation to reject the world's yardstick for measuring beauty and adopt heaven's standard (1 Sam. 16:7). One should expect nothing less from women who profess to worship God.

2:11-12. In emphasizing godly conduct for women, Paul stressed, with Peter, "the unfading beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit, which is of great worth in God's sight" (1 Peter 3:4). The females in the congregation should receive instruction from the male leadership with quietness and full submission. They should not attempt to turn the tables by clamoring for the office of congregational teacher or by grasping for authority over men. Rather they should, literally, "be in quietness." The word, hēsychia, translated "quietness" in 1 Timothy 2:11 and silent in verse 12, does not mean complete silence or no talking. It is clearly used elsewhere (Acts 22:2; 2 Thes. 3:12) to mean "settled down, undisturbed, not unruly." A different word (sigaō) means "to be silent, to say nothing" (cf. Luke 18:39; 1 Cor. 14:34).

2:13. Why is such a quiet and submissive spirit "of great worth in God's sight"? (1 Peter 3:4) Because it manifests an understanding and acceptance of His design for the human race. As elsewhere (cf. 1 Cor. 11:8-10), Paul here based his view of male/female relationships in the church on the account of Creation recorded in Genesis 2. He made no reference whatever to the so-called "curse" of Genesis 3:16. Rather, the roles Paul spelled out here are a product of God's fundamental design wherein Adam was formed first, then Eve (cf. Gen. 2:7-25). More is involved here than mere chronological priority. Paul saw the priority in time as indicative of the leadership given to the male, to which the woman, the "helper suitable for him" (Gen. 2:18), should respond.

2:14. Further, Paul contrasted the experiences of Adam and Eve. The woman . . . was deceived and became a sinner, but Adam was not the one deceived. Some chauvinists see Paul arguing here that women, as represented in their archetype Eve, are more gullible and thus more susceptible to error, than men. Thus, they say, females should not be in places of teaching or authority in the church. Others believe Paul was saying, in effect, "Look what happens when the Creation order is reversed and the man abdicates the leadership role to the woman." In any case, Paul was emphatically not excusing or absolving Adam of blame for the Fall. Elsewhere Paul put the responsibility squarely on Adam's shoulders (cf. Rom. 5:12-21).

2:15. This is one of the most difficult verses of the New Testament to intepret. The ambiguous words kept safe through childbirth have given rise to several diverse interpretations: (a) preserved (physically) through the difficult and dangerous process of childbirth; (b) preserved (from insignificance) by means of her role in the family; (c) saved through the ultimate childbirth of Jesus Christ the Savior (an indirect reference to Gen. 3:15); and (d) kept from the corruption of society by being at home raising children. The interpretation of the verse is further clouded by the conditional clause at the end: if they, that is, mothers, continue in faith, love, and holiness with propriety. Whatever one understands the first part of the verse to be affirming, it is contingent on a woman's willingness to abide in these four virtues. Hence the second of the preceding options seems most likely. A woman will find her greatest satisfaction and meaning in life, not in seeking the male role, but in fulfilling God's design for her as wife and mother with all "faith, love, and holiness with propriety" (i.e., self-restraint; cf. 1 Tim. 2:9).

C. Instructions concerning elders and deacons (3:1-13)

3:1. Continuing his instructions on how the church should conduct itself, Paul turned to the crucial matter of leadership qualifications. He wanted to encourage respect for the congregation's leaders, so he cited what was apparently a familiar maxim and commended it as a sound one. Two implications emerge: (1) It is valid to aspire to church leadership, and (2) church leadership is a noble task. The term overseer (episkopos), sometimes translated "bishop," is only one of several words used in the New Testament to describe church leaders. "Elders" (presbyteroi) is by far the most common. Other terms such as "rulers" (proistamenoi, Rom. 12:8; 1 Thes. 5:12), "leaders" (hēgoumenois, Heb. 13:17) and "pastors" (poimenas, Eph. 4:11; cf. also Acts 20:28; 1 Peter 5:2) are also used. Though each of these terms may describe a different facet of leadership, they all seem to be used interchangeably in the New Testament to designate the same office. This office is different from that of deacons (cf. comments on 1 Tim 3:8).

3:2. More is required of an overseer than mere willingness to serve. In verses 2-7 Paul listed 15 requirements for a church leader: (1) above reproach. He must be blameless in his behavior. This Greek word anepilēmpton, "above reproach," is used in the New Testament only in this epistle (v. 2; 5:7; 6:14). It means to have nothing in one's conduct on which someone could ground a charge or accusation. It differs slightly in meaning from its synonym anenklētos in 3:10 (see comments there). (2) Husband of but one wife, literally, a "one-woman man." This ambiguous but important phrase is subject to several interpretations. The question is, how stringent a standard was Paul erecting for overseers? Virtually all commentators agree that this phrase prohibits both polygamy and promiscuity, which are unthinkable for spiritual leaders in the church. Many Bible students say the words a "one-woman man" are saying that the affections of an elder must be centered exclusively on his wife. Many others hold, however, that the phrase further prohibits any who have been divorced and remarried from becoming overseers. The reasoning behind this view is usually that divorce represents a failure in the home, so that even though a man may be forgiven for any sin involved, he remains permanently disqualified for leadership in the congregation (cf. vv. 4-5; 1 Cor. 9:24-27). The most strict interpretation and the one common among the earliest commentators (second and third centuries) includes each of the above but extends the prohibition to any second marriage, even by widowers. Their argument is that in the first century second marriages were generally viewed as evidence of self-indulgence. Though Paul honored marriage, he also valued the spiritual benefits of celibacy (1 Cor. 7:37-38) even for those who had lost a mate (1 Tim. 5:3-14). Thus he considered celibacy a worthy goal for those who possessed the self-control to remain unmarried. According to this strict view Paul considered a widower's second marriage, though by no means improper, to be evidence of a lack of the kind of self-control required of an overseer, in much the same way that a similar lack disqualified a widow from eligibility for the list of widows (5:9). Church leaders must also be (3) temperate (nēphalion, "well-balanced"; used elsewhere only in 3:11; Titus 2:2), (4) self-controlled (sōphrona, also used in Titus 1:8; 2:5), (5) respectable, and (6) hospitable. Such characteristics are prerequisites for those who would lead others into these important Christian virtues. The phrase (7) able to teach speaks of a leader's ability to handle the Scriptures. He must be able both to understand and to communicate the truth to others, as well as to refute those who mishandle it (cf. Titus 1:9). Not all must necessarily do this publicly, of course; some may conduct this aspect of their ministries more informally in private settings. Yet all leaders must possess an aptitude for handling the Word with skill.

3:3. Four negative phrases follow: (8) not given to much wine (cf. Titus 1:7), and (9) not violent. His self-control (1 Tim. 3:2) is to extend to his appetites and his anger. By contrast, a church leader must be (10) gentle, or forbearing, making room for others. (This word epieikē is also used in Phil. 4:5; Titus 3:2; James 3:17; 1 Peter 2:18). Unlike false teachers, an effective church leader is (11) not quarrelsome (cf. 1 Tim. 6:4) and (12) not a lover of money (cf. 6:5; Titus 1:11). He neither relishes fighting with others nor pursues his ministry for personal gain (cf. 1 Peter 5:2).

3:4. An overseer must (13) manage his own family well. Paul's specific focus here was on the children. The most reliable (though not infallible) means of determining the quality of one's potential leadership is by examining the behavior of his children. Do they respect their father enough to submit to his leadership? With proper respect (lit., "with all gravity") may refer, however, not to the children's submission, but to the manner in which the father exercises his authority, that is, without due fuss or clamor.

3:5. A rhetorical question forms a parenthetical support for the validity of the preceding qualification. Paul made an analogy between leadership or management of a home and that in a church (Eph. 2:19; 1 Tim. 3:15). Many of the same skills and qualifications are needed for both. Success in a family may well indicate success in a church; likewise, failure in a home raises a red flag about one's ability to lead in a congregation.

3:6. An overseer must (14) not be a recent convert (neophyton, "neophyte"), lest his rapid advancement to leadership fill him with pride and conceit, and he experience the same kind of judgment that the devil incurred for his pride.

3:7. An overseer must also (15) have a good reputation with outsiders (cf. Col. 4:5; 1 Thes. 4:12). Paul's thought here seems to be that church leaders, as representatives of the congregation, are constantly susceptible to the snares of the devil (cf. 2 Tim. 2:26). Satan likes nothing better than to disgrace God's work and God's people by trapping church leaders in sin before a watching world. It is important therefore that overseers achieve and maintain a good reputation before unbelievers.

3:8. Like overseers, deacons (cf. Phil. 1:1) must also be men of quality, even though their function in the congregation is significantly different. The word translated "deacon" (diakonos) means literally a "humble servant." The role of the deacons is to carry out, under the elders' oversight, some of the more menial tasks of the church so that the elders can give their attention to more important things. (See Acts 6:1-6 for the prototype of what later became the "office" of deacon in the church.) The qualifications for the office of deacon are almost as stringent as for elder because of their public profile in the church and because the servant nature of their work requires strong qualities of maturity and piety. Deacons must therefore be men worthy of respect—that is, serious men of dignity, not clowns. (The same Gr. word is used of women in 1 Tim. 3:11.) They must be sincere (mē dilogous, lit., "not double-tongued") in the sense of being honest and unhypocritical. Like the overseers (v. 3), deacons must not be heavy wine drinkers or greedy chasers after dishonest gain.

3:9. Most important of all, deacons must be men of spiritual depth (cf. Acts 6:3). Specifically they should be men who understand and hold fast the deep truths of the faith. By the phrase with a clear conscience Paul (cf. "good conscience" in 1 Tim. 1:5) meant that there must be nothing in the conduct of these men that was glaringly inconsistent with their professed beliefs. In other words they must not profess one thing but practice another.

3:10. Moreover, like the overseers, who are to demonstrate their maturity before being placed in a position of responsibility (v. 6), deacons must also first be tested. Paul's intent here was not to require some formal testing procedure, but rather that these men "prove" their quality over time in the ordinary activities of life and ministry. After they showed themselves "irreproachable," then let them serve as deacons. The words if there is nothing against them translate two Greek words, anenklētoi ontes, "being free from accusation." The word anenklētos occurs in the New Testament only in Paul's writings (1 Cor. 1:8; Col. 1:22; 1 Tim. 3:10; Titus 1:6-7). It means one who is unaccused, free from any charge at all. Christlike conduct is required of deacons. (Cf. comments on a synonym, anepilēmpton, in 1 Tim. 3:2.)

3:11. Similarly the gynaikas ("women" or wives) are to be worthy of respect, that is, dignified (the same word, semnas, is used of deacons in v. 8), not slanderers (diabolous, from diaballō "to slander"; from this verb comes the noun "devil," the chief slanderer) of others, but temperate (nēphalious, "well-balanced; cf. v. 2; Titus 2:2), and trustworthy (lit., "faithful") in everything. Who are these gynaikas Paul addressed? They were almost certainly not the women of the congregation generally. They were most likely either the wives of the deacons or a group of female deacons (cf. Phoebe, Rom. 16:1). A case can be made for either of these two options, with a slim advantage falling to the first. But being dogmatic about either view is unwarranted by the exegetical data.

3:12. Like the elders, deacons must be "one-women men" (cf. v. 2) and capable managers of their own families. Paul's reasoning behind this latter qualification is spelled out in verses 4-5.

3:13. Though the position of deacon seems by worldly standards to be menial and unattractive, to close followers of Jesus Christ it looks quite different (cf. John 13:11-17; Mark 10:42-45). Those who fulfill their servant roles faithfully gain two things: first, an excellent standing before fellow Christians who understand and appreciate the beauty of humble, selfless, Christlike service; and second, great assurance (parrēsian, "confidence, boldness") in their faith in Christ Jesus. Humble service, which lacks all the rewards the world deems important, becomes a true test of one's motives. Here one discovers for himself whether or not his efforts are truly prompted by a Christlike spirit of selfless service. When a deacon has indeed "served well" his ministry builds confidence in the sincerity of his own faith in Christ and of his unhypocritical approach to God (cf. Eph. 3:12; Heb. 10:19).

IV. Instructions concerning Guarding the Truth in the Church (3:14–4:16)

A. The church and its truth (3:14-16)

3:14. If Paul had left Timothy at Ephesus to pastor the church (cf. 1:3), he also hoped to rejoin Timothy there soon. In the meantime, in case of delay Paul wanted the Ephesian pastor and congregation to have these instructions in hand. The "instructions" no doubt refer to what has come before as well as the exhortations to follow.

3:15. The clearly stated purpose of these instructions is to inform the Ephesian congregation how people ought to conduct themselves in God's household. Again Paul used the analogy of the "household" (oikos) to refer to the church (ekklēsia; cf. v. 5). This merges into an architectural image involving the church as pillar and foundation of the truth. The idea of the church as a "building" dedicated to the living God is a common one for Paul (cf. 1 Cor. 3:16-17; 2 Cor. 6:16; Eph. 2:20-22). Some people teach that the church as the "foundation of the truth" is the source of God's truth, that no one can know the truth unless he depends on the teaching of some organized church or church group. But Paul was simply affirming the crucial role of the universal church as the support and bulwark—not the source—of God's truth. His words should not be stretched beyond this.

3:16. Paul had been discussing proper godly conduct in the church, behavior which is in every way consistent with the truth, rather than "contrary to the sound doctrine" (1:10). In 3:16 he expressed a simple idea which becomes difficult due only to its compactness. This truth about godliness being a mystery means that it was hidden but now is revealed. Further, it is a great (mega, "large, important") "mystery" in that it is overwhelmingly large in scope and sublimely important in significance (cf. Eph. 5:32). Paul cited the content of this truth in the form of an excerpt from an early hymn about Christ, who is the essence of the "mystery" (Col. 1:27). Whether the fragment should be divided into two or three parts is disputed. Whichever one chooses, the six elements of the excerpt are as follows: (1) Appeared in a body refers to the Incarnation of Christ. (2) Was vindicated by the Spirit refers to God's demonstration through the Resurrection (cf. Acts 2:24-36), by the Holy Spirit (cf. Rom. 8:11), that the crucified Jesus is Lord and Messiah. (3) Was seen by angels refers to His exaltation before the heavenly realm (cf. Phil. 2:9-11; Col. 2:15; Heb. 1:6). (4) Was preached among the nations (cf. Col. 1:23) and (5) was believed on in the world refer to the progressive fulfillment of God's redemptive plan through His preordained means (cf. 1 Cor. 1:18–2:5). (6) Was taken up in glory refers to the Ascension (Eph. 4:10).

B. Predictions of apostasy (4:1-5)

4:1. As the repository and guardian of the truth, the church must be aware of the strategies of the truth's enemies. It is crucial then for the church to understand what God has revealed about these enemies (cf. 1 Peter 4:1-18; Jude 17-18). By the Spirit clearly says Paul was not necessarily referring to any particular revelation but to the repeated teaching of the Lord (e.g., Mark 13:22), the other apostles (e.g., 2 Peter 3:1-18), and Paul himself (e.g., Acts 20:29; 2 Thes. 2:1-12). According to this teaching the situation will degenerate as Christ's return approaches. In later times (cf. 2 Tim. 3:1 for a synonym), which Paul viewed as still future though casting their shadow already, some people will abandon the faith (cf. 1 Tim. 1:19) to follow after the false teaching of deceiving spirits and . . . demons. Spiritual error is seldom due to innocent mistakes. It is more often due to the conscious strategies of God's spiritual enemies (cf. Eph. 6:12). The teachings (didaskaliais) of demons are false doctrines taught by errorists whose views are instigated by demons.

4:2. But God's spiritual enemies do not directly confront their victims with error. Instead they work through hypocritical liars (lit., "men who speak lies in hypocrisy"). This is Satan's standard operating procedure (cf. 2 Cor. 11:13-15). He selects likely representatives and renders their consciences beyond feeling (cf. Eph. 4:19), seared (from kaustēriazō, "to brand, cauterize") as with a hot iron. In this condition they are ready to do Satan's bidding.

4:3. The false teachers plaguing the Ephesian church were the forerunners of the Gnostics of the second century. Even at this relatively incipient stage, the strong dualism of the Gnostics is clear: spirit is good; matter is evil. They believed all appetites relating to the body are therefore evil and should be rooted out, including normal desires for sex and food. Thus the false teachers forbid people to marry and order them to abstain from certain foods (cf. Col. 2:21). But Paul went to the heart of the dualistic error by stating that matter is not inherently evil; it is rather part of what God created (cf. 1 Tim. 6:17b). Hence those who believe and who know the truth can gratefully (cf. 4:4) receive and use the things God created, which were designed to be received (eis metalēmpsin, "for partaking").

4:4. Contrary to the teaching of the errorists, everything God created is good. Here Paul echoed God's own verdict (Gen. 1:31). Whereas the false teachers were intent on "forbidding" and "ab-staining" (1 Tim. 4:3), Paul said that nothing is to be rejected—nothing, that is, that God created. Man can abuse what God has created, as adultery is an abuse of the marital sexual relationship, and gluttony is an abuse of a normal appetite for food. Such abuses should certainly be rejected. But God's creations themselves are all good and should be received with thanksgiving, not with taboos.

4:5. All the seemingly "ordinary" things of life can then become extraordinary as they are consecrated by the Word of God and prayer. In the light of the Scriptures a Christian recognizes God's good hand behind the things provided, and offers thanksgiving to the Lord. In this way the ordinary things so easily taken for granted (some of which are forbidden by errorists) become sanctified as occasions for worship and praise.

C. Responsibilities of a good minister of Christ (4:6-16)

4:6. From his warning of the apostasy to come Paul turned to Timothy, and exhorted him to pass along these same warnings to others in the church. One of the works of a good minister of Christ Jesus is that he is a faithful conduit of the truth to other Christians (cf. 2 Tim. 2:2). To do this, however, Timothy first had to keep himself "nourished" (not brought up) by (a) the objective truths of the faith which, as Jude 3 puts it, were "once for all entrusted to the saints," and (b) the truths of the good teaching that you have followed. This latter phrase probably refers to Paul's own instructions to his young disciple, which Timothy had faithfully carried out (didaskalia, "teaching" is also used in 1 Tim. 1:10; 4:1, 13, 16; 5:17; 6:1).

4:7. But since Timothy was to channel God's truth to others, he was to have nothing to do with godless myths and old wives' tales. The godless (bebēlous, "profane") and the worthless go hand in hand (cf. 1:9; 6:20; 2 Tim. 2:16) and should be shunned. Instead, Timothy was to devote himself to much more manly pursuits. Paul introduced an athletic image with the words train yourself. The verb here is gymnaze, from which comes the English "gymnasium." But Timothy's training was to be for godliness (cf. 1 Tim. 2:2), not physical fitness. Paul often used athletic analogies to drive home the need for spiritual discipline (cf. esp. 1 Cor. 9:24-27).

4:8. As valuable as physical fitness (training is gymnasia, "exercise," used only here in the NT) may be (and Paul did not disparage it), spiritual fitness, or godliness, is much more valuable. Physical fitness is profitable only, literally, "for a little." But godliness is profitable for all things, not merely in this present transient life but in the life to come, that is, for eternity. Godliness colors all aspects of temporal and eternal life, bestowing its blessing on all it touches.

4:9. The trustworthy saying formula can point forward, as in 1:15, or backward, as in Titus 3:8. Here it is probably best to see it as reinforcing the proverbial impact of 1 Timothy 4:8 (in contrast with the NIV).

4:10. To this end, said Paul, we labor and strive—that is, to develop the godliness of verse 8. The word "strive" translates agōnizometha ("I agonize"), another athletic term. Paul practiced what he had just preached to Timothy (cf. Col. 1:29). We have put our hope renders ēlpikamen, a perfect tense denoting an action with the results continuing. The durative quality of Paul's confidence is stressed. Paul knew his struggle was worth it because his hope was set, not on himself, some philosophy of life, other men, or nonexistent gods—but in the living God, who is the Savior of all men, and especially of those who believe. The mention of the "living" God picks up the reference in 1 Timothy 3:15; the stress on God as "Savior" picks up 1:1 and 2:3. Again Paul stated that God is the Savior of "all men" (cf. 2:2, 4, 6) since He desires that all be saved and He provided Christ as the ransom (2:6) to make that salvation possible. Yet God is the Savior of those who believe in a special way since only in them has His desire for their salvation come to fruition.

4:11. Timothy, as a young man with perhaps a nonassertive personality, was evidently given to timidity and fear (cf. 1 Cor. 16:10-11). Thus Paul exhorted him to command (parangelle, "insist on") and teach these things. By "these things" Paul usually meant the contents of his instructions in the immediate context, but the term here seems almost intentionally ambiguous (cf. 1 Tim. 3:14; 4:6, 15; 5:7, 21; 6:2, 11). Paul was prodding Timothy to be firm and courageous in his ministry. Paul used the same Greek word parangelle in 5:7 and 6:13.

4:12. At first Paul's instruction that Timothy should not let anyone "despise" (KJV) his youth might seem impossible to fulfill since Timothy could not control the attitudes of others. Yet when combined with the latter part of the verse, the thrust of Paul's instruction becomes clear. Timothy must not be intimidated by his relative youthfulness or what others might think of it. Instead he was to demonstrate his maturity by living such a godly life that he would become a pattern for other Christians in every area of his life: speech . . . life (i.e., "behavior or conduct," anastrophē; cf. "conduct" in 3:15), love . . . faith, and . . . purity. The word for "purity" (hagneia, "moral cleanness") is used only here and in 5:2.

4:13. After referring again to his own movements (cf. 1:3; 3:14-15), Paul exhorted Timothy to attend to his public ministry as well as his private life. This public ministry was to consist of at least three elements: (1) Public reading of Scripture. It has always been the practice of God's people to read the Word of God aloud in the congregation (e.g., Ex. 24:7; Deut. 31:11; Josh. 8:35; 2 Kings 23:2; Neh. 8:7-8; Luke 4:16; Acts 15:21; Col. 4:16; 1 Thes. 5:27). (2) Preaching; better yet "exhortation" (paraklēsei). This term includes the exposition and application of the passages read. (3) Teaching. The distinction between this and the former term is by no means clear-cut. The two merge into each other. Yet "teaching" (didaskalia; cf. 1 Tim. 1:10; 4:1, 6, 16; 5:17; 6:1) may refer primarily to a more catechetical treatment of the truths of the Christian faith. The two terms occur in Romans 12:7-8 and are there related to spiritual gifts.

4:14. Timothy's image of himself as a minister was evidently deficient, so Paul reminded him of the fact that God had given him the requisite ability for service. Timothy must not ignore or neglect this basic factor (cf. 2 Tim. 1:6). If others were not to look down on Timothy, neither was he to look down on himself. His gift had come to him through a prophetic message which was delivered at the time of his ordination, and the remembrance of this prophecy was designed to strengthen Timothy's confidence. The laying on of hands is commonly associated in the Bible with a continuity of leadership (cf. Num. 27:18-23; Deut. 34:9; Acts 6:6; 8:18; 13:3; Heb. 6:2). The phrase body of elders renders the Greek presbyteriou, which speaks of a group or "board" of elders, or "presbytery." These men together constitute a biblically recognized group. The Bible never speaks of a corresponding group identity for deacons. The notion of deacons functioning as a "board" is never mentioned in the Bible.

4:15. Here is the positive side of Paul's negative ("do not neglect. . . .") exhortation of verse 14. The command be diligent (meleta, from meletaō, "give careful thought to") is the converse of the command in the previous verse (amelei, from ameleō, "give no thought to"). Timothy was to give his careful attention to Paul's instructions; indeed, he was, literally, "to be in them" (or, with the NIV, to give himself wholly to them). As he would do so his progress would be evident to all observers and his problem of low credibility, implied throughout this section, would be alleviated.

4:16. Watch your life (lit., "yourself") and doctrine (lit., "the teaching"; cf. 1:10; 4:1, 6, 13; 5:17; 6:1) closely summarizes 4:6-16. Throughout this epistle Paul had been advising Timothy concerning his private life and public ministry. He was to keep a sharp eye on both, persevering in the instructions Paul had offered in the two realms. In so doing, said Paul, you will save both yourself and your hearers. Ultimately only God can save, of course; yet in a secondary sense the New Testament speaks of a person "saving" himself (Phil. 2:12) and others (James 5:19-20; Jude 23). Paul's words are a pointed reminder of the awesome burden of responsibility that congregational leaders carry.

V. Instructions concerning Various Groups in the Church (5:1–6:10)

A. Concerning various age-groups (5:1-2)

From the above instructions about how Timothy was to conduct his personal life and ministry, Paul turned to advice on how to relate effectively to individuals who make up various groups in the church. Paul's overall advice about how to treat various age-groups was that Timothy handle different people as he would corresponding members of his own family.

5:1-2. Older man translates presbyteros, the plural of which is rendered "elders" in 4:14. Here, however, Paul was not referring to those who hold the office of overseer. The word denotes "elderly" men, in contrast with younger men (cf. Titus 2:2-3 where the same word is used to contrast "older men" and "older women"). Timothy was to appeal to the older men as he would his own father—not with rough rebukes but with gentle exhortations. Young men may be treated somewhat more directly, yet with fraternity as if they were Timothy's own brothers. Older women were to receive all the respect Timothy would accord his own mother Eunice (2 Tim. 1:5). Younger women were likewise to be treated respectfully, with the absolute purity (hagneia; cf. 1 Tim. 4:12) Timothy would grant his own sister. This would safeguard the young minister from reproach.

B. Concerning widows (5:3-16)

Next Paul offered instruction on how Timothy must deal with the widows in the congregation. Throughout the Old and New Testaments widows, along with aliens and orphans, are viewed as special objects of God's mercy. As such they are to be taken under the wing of the congregation (cf. Deut. 10:18; 14:29; 24:17-21; Acts 6:1-7; James 1:27). As early as Acts 6 the church had established a charitable outreach to widows. Now about 30 years later the ministry to widows, of whom there were no doubt many, showed signs of being a major burden to the congregation. Paul was therefore eager in this passage to identify those who did not truly need help in order to leave enough for those who did.

5:3-4. Timothy was instructed to give proper recognition to (lit., "honor") those who were truly widows—that is, widows who were really in need. These Paul contrasted with widows who had lost their husbands but who had children or grandchildren still living. Since in God's economy the first responsibility for caring for the needy falls on the family (not the church and surely not the state), these family members should learn first of all to put their religion into practice by caring for their own. In so doing, these family members would repay their "forebears" (progonois; cf. 2 Tim. 1:3) part of the debt owed them. Such reciprocity is pleasing to God. It is "welfare" as God intended it.

5:5. The widow who is really in need and left all alone has nowhere to look for help but to God and His people. Thus one of the marks of a needy widow is that she puts her hope in God and therefore continues in petition and prayer night and day. Such a godly person, dedicated after the death of her husband to the service of the Lord, was deeply respected (cf. the description of the widow-prophetess Anna, Luke 2:37), and was viewed as worthy of the church's support.

5:6. Not all women who became widows gave themselves to such godly service, of course. Some widows used their widowhood to seek after sensual pleasure (lives for pleasure); spatalō, (used elsewhere in the NT only in James 5:5). Some commentators suggest even the hint of prostitution here. In any case Paul stated that a life devoted to wanton pleasure, in stark contrast to the godly life described in 1 Timothy 5:5, produces a woman who is dead even while she lives (cf. Rom. 8:6; Rev. 3:1). One need only witness the spiritual emptiness produced within those who choose such a profligate lifestyle to understand Paul's point. Such women must not be placed on the widows' list.

5:7-8. In 4:11 Paul instructed Timothy to "command . . . these things" (parangelle tauta). Now, having added the intervening instructions, Paul repeated the exact words: "Command these things too." Paul wanted Timothy to pass along these instructions about the list of widows in order that no one may be open to blame. The reference is somewhat ambiguous, but probably refers to the widows in the church. If the wrong women are included on the list their sensual lifestyles (cf. 5:6) will bring reproach on the entire group. But it may also refer to the remaining families of the widows. Failure to provide (pronoei means "to think ahead, to provide by seeing needs in advance") for these family members gives the lie to any claim to know God (cf. Titus 1:16) and becomes de facto a denial of the faith. Indeed, such a failure renders the defaulting family member worse than an unbeliever, since even many non-Christians understand and fulfill their familial responsibilities.

5:9-10. The "proper recognition" of verse 3 is here made specific. Widows may be put on the list if they meet three primary qualifications. What exactly this list involved is not known. It may have been an official order for service in the congregation; more likely it was merely a roll of those widows who were to receive assistance from the congregation. In any case, to qualify a woman had to meet these qualifications: (1) She must be over 60. Though the age of 60 was more advanced in that day, Paul had his reasons for keeping the younger widows off the rolls (cf. vv. 11-15). (2) She must have been faithful to her husband. The Greek here is literally "a one-man woman," the mirror image of the stipulation for both the overseer-elder (cf. 3:2; Titus 1:6) and the deacon (1 Tim. 3:12), and for the same reason (cf. comments on 3:2). The NIV, to be consistent with its renderings of 3:2, 12 and Titus 1:6, should have adopted its footnote reading, "has had but one husband." The translation, "has been faithful to her husband," points to the view that the words merely prohibit promiscuity. (3) She must be well-known for her good deeds. As illustrations of the kinds of things he had in mind, Paul cited five examples, which characterize godly women (cf. 1 Tim. 2:10). The examples span the realms of home, church, and community, and include child-raising, hospitality, washing saints' feet (humble service; cf. comments on John 13:1-15) helping people in trouble, and various other kinds of good deeds. The women on the widows' roll must be those whose reputations for godly living are well known.

5:11-12. Younger widows, on the other hand, were not to be put on the list. Paul's reasoning for this was twofold: First, unlike the older women whose active sexual lives would presumably be behind them, the younger women might be faced with normal sexual desires which would overcome their dedication to Christ. As a result they would want to remarry, bringing judgment on themselves, because they had broken their first pledge. The pledge Paul referred to was probably a more or less formal commitment, taken on joining the list of widows, wherein the woman vowed to serve Christ entirely without thought of remarriage. In this way she could devote herself without distraction to the Lord (cf. 1 Cor. 7:34-35). Remarriage would involve breaking this vow and a broken vow would incur judgment (cf. Num. 30:2; Deut. 23:21; Ecc. 5:4-5).

5:13-15. Second, younger and more energetic widows would have a more difficult time resisting the temptations connected with idleness. With the congregation supporting them, their time normally given to maintaining a living would be free. Instead of giving this time to the service of Christ in visitation and counseling, younger widows would be more susceptible to going about from house to house and becoming idlers . . . gossips (phlyaroi, used only here in the NT; the verb phlyareō is used in 3 John 10) and busybodies, saying things they ought not to. Too much time with not enough to do is dangerous for anyone except those too old to get into trouble. Hence Paul's counsel was that younger widows should not take the vow and be added to the list; instead they should marry, raise a family, manage their homes, and by being thus occupied give the enemy no opportunity for slander.

The "enemy" here may refer to the church's adversaries who looked for every chance to tear others down (cf. 1 Cor. 16:9), or to the opposition of the devil himself (cf. 1 Tim. 5:15). Perhaps Paul did not see much difference between the two (cf. 4:1). The importance of Paul's counsel was buttressed by the fact that it came too late to preserve the congregation from some who had in fact already turned away to follow Satan. No doubt Paul was aware of specific cases in the churches where younger women had been placed on the list and then had broken their vows.

5:16. Paul wanted to be certain that the instructions of verse 8 were understood to include well-situated women as well as men. The men would be the obvious objects of Paul's directions in verse 8, but not necessarily the women. So, as a closing note to his discussion of widows, Paul specified that any believing woman who possessed the means bore the same responsibilities for widows in her family as would a man in similar circumstances. This would relieve the congregation of the responsibility so that the church could help those widows who were really in need.

C. Concerning elders (5:17-25)

5:17. The elders (presbyteroi) refer here, not merely to elderly men (cf. v. 1), but to those who occupy official positions of leadership in the church (cf. 3:1-7; Titus 1:5-9; Acts 20:17-38). The task of the elders is to direct the affairs of the church. Elders have the oversight of the affairs of the congregation, with the deacons providing their helpful support wherever appropriate. For their oversight all elders received a stipend; but those who excelled in this ministry of leadership were to be considered worthy of double honor, or twice the remuneration as the rest. Especially was this true of those who labored in preaching and teaching. While the leadership needs of a congregation extend far beyond the preaching and teaching of the truth, these are at the core of the ministry and are perhaps most important, which should be reflected by the double value given them by the congregation.

5:18. To support his point—that elders should be paid, and certain ones paid double—Paul quoted two Scripture passages: (1) Do not muzzle the ox while it is treading out the grain (Deut. 25:4; cf. also 1 Cor. 9:9). (2) The worker deserves his wages probably refers to passages such as Leviticus 19:13 and Deuteronomy 24:15, or perhaps to the teaching of the Lord Jesus Himself (cf. Matt. 10:10; Luke 10:7). Though Paul reserved the right not to receive support from a congregation (cf. 1 Cor. 9:15-23; 1 Thes. 2:9), he clearly believed and repeatedly taught that a congregation did not have the right not to offer it (cf. Gal. 6:6; 1 Cor. 9:14).

5:19-20. Paul was deeply aware of opposition to the ministry. He had already spoken of the need to guard the congregation from the reproach of slanderers (cf. 3:2, 7), and would do so again (6:1). Here he stipulated the procedure for separating valid accusations from false ones. It is the venerable approach of both the Old Testament (cf. Deut. 19:15) and the New (cf. Matt. 18:16; John 8:17; 2 Cor. 13:1), wherein an accusation should be considered only if two or three witnesses swear to it. When such accusations would then prove to be true, Timothy was to rebuke the offenders publicly, that is, before the entire congregation. In this way the remaining members could take warning (lit., "have fear"). Fear of the discipline of God, in this case administered through the congregation, is a healthy thing in a Christian, especially for those in places of leadership. Modern congregations that ignore church discipline do so at the peril of both the offender and themselves.

5:21. Why Paul punctuated his instructions with this strong charge can only be guessed. Had Timothy passively avoided unpleasant confrontations, or had he taken a strong stand in some cases but not others? For whatever reasons, Paul strongly adjured the young minister to follow through on (keep is lit., "guard") these instructions without partiality (lit., "prejudging," used only here in the NT) or favoritism (prosklisin, lit., "inclination toward someone," used only here in the NT). The strength of Paul's charge is underlined by his invocation of the authority of God and Christ Jesus (cf. 2 Tim. 4:1), and the elect angels, all of whom are associated with righteous judgment (cf. Matt. 25:31; Mark 8:38; Luke 9:26; Rev. 14:10).

5:22. One way to avoid painful situations involving the disciplining of an elder is to be careful about who is ordained in the first place. Thus Paul counseled Timothy to a judicious reluctance in the laying on of hands (cf. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6). The words do not share in the sins of others may be merely advice for Timothy to guard his own conduct generally (cf. 1 Tim. 4:16; Acts 20:28). But more likely, in light of the context, this is a warning about the implications of hasty ordinations. Those who take part in the premature ordination of an errant elder share some of the blame for the negative consequences to their church. Whichever is the case, Timothy was to keep himself free from sin. One cannot deal with sin in another if one's own life is not pure (hagnon).

5:23. This verse may be only a somewhat disjointed bit of personal advice to Timothy or it may flow more naturally from the reference to purity in verse 22. Perhaps Timothy was inclined to an asceticism which associated purity with total abstention (cf. 4:3-5), which in turn led in Timothy's case to stomach ailments and frequent illnesses, perhaps due to the poor quality of the water he drank. Paul thus qualified his exhortation to purity by encouraging Timothy to drink a little wine (oinō oligō) for his stomach's sake, because of his "frequent illnesses." This instruction applies only to using wine for medicinal purposes, of course, and therefore contributes little or nothing to either side of the debate over the use of wine as a beverage.

5:24-25. The meaning of these two verses, though at first glance obscure, proves on closer examination to be profound. Verse 23 is a parenthesis. Thus verse 24 picks up the advice of verse 22 and carries the thought forward. All people are heading toward judgment, carrying with them either their sins or their good works. For some, their sins or good works go before them and are obvious to all observers. For others their sins or good works trail behind, hidden from view, becoming known only after the individual has passed. Thus Paul emphasized the difficulties inherent in choosing qualified candidates for the ordination. Hasty, superficial assessments, whether positive or negative, are sometimes inaccurate, leading to the enlistment of unqualified men or the overlooking of those whose fine qualities are less obvious. With time, however, a man's true colors will emerge to an astute observer. Thus the perceptive observations of verses 24-25 are designed to underline the warning of verse 22: do not rush to ordain someone.

D. Concerning slaves and masters (6:1-2)

6:1. Under normal circumstances slaves and masters had no associations outside the institution of slavery. With the advent of the gospel, however, these two groups found themselves thrown together in the congregation in new ways, creating problems the apostles were forced to address repeatedly (cf. 1 Cor. 7:20-24; Gal. 3:28; Eph. 6:5-9; Col. 3:22-25; Phile.; 1 Peter 2:13-25). Paul's instructions here correspond entirely with what is taught elsewhere in the New Testament on the subject, with one major exception: in this passage he addresses only slaves. Usually his exhortations to submit to authority were immediately buttressed by warning masters against abusing their authority (cf. Eph. 6:5-9; Col. 3:22–4:1).

The matter of the uses and abuses of authority is first and foremost a problem of attitude. Thus Paul wrote repeatedly of how slaves and masters should see themselves and one another. Here he wrote that slaves are to view their masters as worthy of full respect (timēs, "honor"). The same word is used of God in 1 Timothy 1:17 and 6:16, and of elders in 5:17. Such honor or respect should be granted lest God's reputation and the Christian faith (hē didaskalia, "the teaching"; cf. 1:10; 4:1, 6, 13, 16; 5:17) be slandered (lit., "be blasphemed"). Social goals should always be subordinate to spiritual values.

6:2. Paul's thought here is totally foreign to the world, and can be fully appreciated only by those who view their lives through the eyes of Jesus Christ (cf. Mark 10:42-45). Christian slaves whose masters are also believers should redouble rather than reduce their service. This should stem purely from the realization that the one who is receiving the benefits is a beloved brother or sister in Christ. The attitude undergirding this instruction is complete nonsense to anyone who does not understand the Lord Jesus, but it is the genius of Christlikeness and the ultimate source of all meaning and joy in life to those who have eyes to see (cf. John 13:4-17; 15:9-14). Thus Timothy was commanded once again to teach and urge . . . these things on the congregation (cf. 1 Tim. 4:6, 11; 5:7).

E. Concerning the heretical and greedy (6:3-10)

6:3. The last group Paul discussed are those with whom he began (cf. 1:3-11): false teachers. Here, like a physician diagnosing a sick patient, Paul described the characteristics of their disease. The objects of Paul's attention show three overlapping symptoms: (1) those who teach false doctrines (lit., "anyone who teaches differently"; 1:3 has the same word); (2) those who do not agree to the sound instruction of our Lord Jesus Christ; with the word "sound" Paul reintroduced a medical analogy (cf. also 2 Tim. 2:17); he spoke of, literally, the "healthy words or sayings" (hygiainousin logois) of Christ; (3) those who do not consent to godly teaching (lit., "the teaching which corresponds to godliness," tē kat' eusebian didaskalia). The correspondence between truth and godliness, and error and moral deficiency, is one of the recurrent themes in the Pastoral Epistles.

6:4-5. Doctrinal error is seldom merely a case of being innocently mistaken. There is almost always some degree of culpability. The false teachers in Ephesus were conceited (lit., "puffed up"), with inflated egos (cf. 1:7). Such a one understands nothing. Picking up the medical analogy again, Paul described them as "diseased with" (nosōn peri) controversies (zētēseis, "debates," perhaps on theological problems; cf. 2 Tim. 2:23; Titus 3:9) and arguments (logomachias, "battles of words"), out of which come only envy, quarreling, malicious talk, evil suspicions, and constant friction. This contrasts strikingly with the telos or "end" of Paul's instruction (1 Tim 1:5; cf. also the similar contrast in Gal. 5:16-24). Such evil fruits seem the inevitable external products of false teachers once one understands their true inner motives (Matt. 7:13-23). They are men: (1) whose minds have been corrupted (cf. 2 Tim. 3:8); (2) who have been robbed of the truth by Satan (cf. Luke 8:5, 12, and the culpability of being "hard ground" rather than "good ground"); (3) who think that godliness is a means to financial gain. Greed was their core motivation (cf. Titus 1:11; Jude 12). In that day the stipends associated with ministry were attractive, so that even the best men had to be warned against letting personal gain creep into their motivation (cf. 1 Peter 5:2). Congregational leaders were to be chosen from those known for their "freedom from the love of money" (cf. 1 Tim. 3:3, 8; Titus 1:7). By contrast the moral corruption so often associated with false teaching (cf. Jude 4-16 for the most graphic description in the NT) produced just the opposite.

6:6. Picking up on the words "godliness" and "gain," Paul shifted their meaning in a characteristically Pauline fashion (cf. 1 Cor. 2:5-6 for a similar shift) from the erroneous to the truthful. Godliness does not give financial gain (1 Tim. 6:5); it itself is gain when accompanied with contentment. Autarkeias literally means "self-sufficiency." Yet the sufficiency of oneself is due to the sufficiency of God (cf. 2 Cor. 9:8; Phil. 4:11, 13 for other uses of the same word). Godliness combined with that inner God-given sufficiency which does not depend on material circumstances (the opposite of the false teachers' greed) is indeed of great gain.

6:7-8. Paul supported his point with a common Jewish and Christian idea (cf. Job 1:21; Ecc. 5:15; Luke 12:16-21) about the complete transiency of material things. They should freely be used and enjoyed to the glory of God if one has them (cf. 1 Tim. 4:3-4; 6:17), but in no way do they contribute to godliness. Christians do have basic material needs for food and clothing, of course, like everyone else; but when these are met a godly Christian can be satisified (cf. Heb. 13:5-6). Paul knew whereof he spoke (Phil. 4:10-13).

6:9-10. Paul contrasted the proper attitude of contentment with its opposites: The craving to get rich and the love of money, two sides of the same coin. The history of the human race, and perhaps especially that of modern Western societies, cries out in support of Paul's point. The grasping after riches leads to: (1) temptation, (2) a trap, and (3) many foolish and harmful desires that plunge men into ruin and destruction. Though not an end in itself, greed is actually a root of all kinds of evil. It is a crucial chink through which other vices gain access. To illustrate his point Paul referred indirectly to some people, undoubtedly known to Timothy, who had fallen into the trap Paul was discussing. Eager for money, they wandered from the faith. This may mean that they had fallen into heretical teaching (cf. 2 Tim. 2:17-18) or simply that their spiritual fruitfulness had been choked off (cf. Luke 8:14) by their concern for riches. In either case, they had suffered for it, causing themselves to be pierced . . . with many griefs (lit., "pains").

VI. Final Charge to Timothy (6:11-21)

A. Exhortation to godliness (6:11-16)

6:11. Paul began this concluding section of the epistle by turning directly to Timothy. The words but you are an emphatic contrast with "some people" of verse 10, who chase after riches. Timothy, as a man of God, was to do the opposite—to flee from all this, but chase instead after personal virtues that are of eternal value: righteousness, godliness (eusebeian; cf. 2:2; 3:16; 4:7-8; 6:3, 5-6; 2 Tim. 3:5; Titus 1:1), faith, love, endurance (hypomonēn, "steadfastness under adversity"), and gentleness. This list may be compared to both the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22-23) and the qualifications of elders (1 Tim. 3:1-3).

6:12. Fight the good fight is the language of athletic contests. In 1:18 the same English words translate Greek words that refer to a military conflict. Timothy was to give his best effort to this most worthwhile of struggles, the struggle to further the faith. This would involve the complete appropriation (cf. "take hold" in v. 19) at all times of the fact that he possessed eternal life. (Paul's words, Take hold of . . . eternal life in no way suggest that Timothy could gain eternal life by his own efforts.) To Paul, Christ's life is the possession of each Christian, not only throughout eternity, but now (cf. 2 Cor. 4:10-12). It is this new life in Christ (2 Cor. 5:17) to which every Christian is called and which Christians confess by baptism (Rom. 6:4) and by word (Rom. 10:9-10). Timothy's good confession in the presence of many witnesses could refer to his ordination but more likely speaks of his baptism.

6:13. Repeatedly in this letter Paul directly addressed Timothy with personal charges, the second strongest of which is found in 5:21. But here is Paul's strongest, most solemn charge of all (I charge you, parangellō; cf. 1:3; 4:11; 5:7; 6:14) conjuring up images of perhaps a familiar baptismal formula triggered by the reference in verse 12. While testifying before Pontius Pilate is translated by some, "who testified in the time of Pontius Pilate." If translated this way, the qualifying clause is designed to fix the Crucifixion in time, as in the Apostles' Creed. Both translations are possible.

6:14. The content of Paul's charge is that Timothy keep this commandment without spot or blame. The "commandment" is probably broader than any single law. It refers to the entire body of sound teaching Paul had been describing throughout the letter. Timothy, by his own godly life and by his faithful ministry, was to preserve this body of truth from stain or reproach until the appearing (cf. 2 Tim. 1:10; 4:1, 8; Titus 2:13) of our Lord Jesus Christ. Then and only then will the struggle (1 Tim. 6:12) be over.

6:15-16. Early in his ministry Paul was convinced that Christ would return soon. Now near the end of his ministry he showed both an awareness that Christ might not return before he died and a desire to encourage Timothy to leave the timing of this great event up to the Lord. Hence Paul stressed that God will bring about Christ's appearing in His (or "its") own time. The section ends with an inspiring doxology to the God who is the cause and object of it all: the ultimate Ruler of the universe, the King of kings and Lord of lords (cf. Rev. 17:14; 19:16), the only eternal One, who dwells where no man can survive or approach or even see (cf. John 1:18). Such a Lord deserves an awesome reverence combined with complete humility (cf. Job 42:1-6). To Him be honor and might forever. Amen (cf. 1 Tim. 1:17).

B. Instructions for the rich (6:17-19)

6:17. Paul had dealt with those who did not possess wealth, but who deeply desired it (vv. 3-10). Now he addressed those who had it, and instructed them as to what their attitude should be toward it. They are not to be arrogant as if their wealth is deserved (1 Cor. 4:7-8; 1 Sam. 2:7). Nor must they put their hope in wealth, which is so uncertain and transient. This is perhaps the greatest temptation to wealthy Christians, into which category most modern Western believers fit. Christians should put their hope in God, who is the Source of material things. Again material possessions are among those things God has given for our enjoyment.

6:18-19. Yet Christians must not merely consume material possessions selfishly. Possessions are to be shared with those who have less. Thus Timothy was to charge the well-off to do good, to be rich, not ultimately in money, but in good deeds. The wealthy should make every effort to be generous and willing to share what they have. If they do this they will lay up treasure for themselves in heaven. This undoubtedly refers to the sayings of Jesus (cf. Matt. 6:19-21; Luke 12:33-34; 18:22) wherein the transient is exchanged for the eternal. Such eternal treasure becomes a firm foundation for the future, recalling in a mixed metaphor perhaps another of the Lord's teachings (cf. Matt. 7:24-27; Luke 6:47-49). Wealthy Christians should invest their riches for eternity. "He is no fool who gives what he cannot keep to gain what he cannot lose" (Jim Elliot). Paradoxically it is in this giving away of the possessions which the world considers the key to the good life that a Christian may take hold of (cf. 1 Tim. 6:12) the life that is truly life. The alluring but vain and plastic substitutes for life, supplied by an unhealthy attachment to material things, pale into worthlessness when compared with that life which is found in Jesus Christ (cf. Matt. 16:24-26), who is Himself the Life (John 14:6) and whom to know is life everlasting (John 17:3).

C. Exhortations to remain faithful (6:20-21)

6:20-21. One final time Paul exhorted Timothy to guard (cf. phylaxon, "keep," in 5:21) the "deposit" or "trust" Paul had passed on to him (parathēkēn, used elsewhere only in 2 Tim. 1:12, 14), a reference to the body of Christian truth which in some way was under attack in Ephesus. Paul was concerned that Timothy give himself wholly to the truth and reject even the subtle inroads of error. Thus Timothy must turn away from godless chatter (lit., "profane empty utterances"; cf. 2 Tim. 2:16), and from opposing ideas (antitheseis, "counter-assertions") of what is falsely called knowledge. Such knowledge was the supposed key to the mystery religions which were already aborning and which would mature into a full-fledged Gnosticism during the next century. Their influence was already being felt in Ephesus, so much so that Paul could say that some had gotten so caught up in professing their esoteric gnōsis that they wandered from the faith (lit., "concerning the faith missed the aim"; cf. 1 Tim. 1:6; 2 Tim. 2:18). This does not suggest that true believers lose their salvation but that some believers turn to false doctrines, from the content of their faith. With these exhortations Paul seemed to have come full circle, back to his concerns in 1 Timothy 1:3-6.

Paul closed his letter with the simple benediction, Grace be with you. "You" is in the plural, however, no doubt indicating Paul's awareness that this letter would be read widely in the churches (cf. Col. 4:18; 2 Tim. 4:22; Titus 3:15).

2 TIMOTHY

A. Duane Litfin

INTRODUCTION

Paul was a prisoner in a Roman dungeon when he wrote this, the last of his epistles, to Timothy (cf. 2 Tim. 1:8, 16; 4:6-13). The date, as best it can be established, was approximately A.D. 67. Not long afterward, according to tradition, the apostle was beheaded. (For a more detailed discussion of the authorship and dating of the Pastoral Epistles see the Introduction to 1 Tim.)

The purpose of 2 Timothy was to encourage Timothy in his ministry at Ephesus. The primary theme of the letter is the need for faithfulness in the face of hardship.

COMMENTARY

I. Salutation (1:1-2)

1:1-2. In his typical fashion Paul began this letter identifying himself as an apostle of Christ Jesus, a reminder Timothy hardly needed. No doubt this is another indication that Paul knew he was writing first to Timothy but ultimately to a much wider audience. In his first letter to the young pastor Paul said his apostleship was "by the command of God" (1 Tim. 1:1). Here Paul said it was by the will of God. The two are essentially synonymous. The words according to the promise of life that is in Christ Jesus are intentionally vague. They relate to Paul's apostleship (not the will of God), but did they refer to a promise of life Paul personally received, or to a promise he was to proclaim to others? In other words was his apostleship "because of" the promise or "in conformity to" the promise? The Greek word kata (here ambiguously trans. "according to") allows the two to merge. The promise of life in Christ, the gospel, was the reason for and the yardstick of Paul's apostleship (cf. Titus 1:2-3). To Timothy, my dear son (lit., "child") once again (cf. "my true son" in 1 Tim. 1:2) emphasizes the close fatherly relationship Paul maintained with his protégé, if not his convert. The remainder of the greeting duplicates 1 Timothy exactly (cf. 1 Tim. 1:2). (See the chart, "Paul's Introductions to His Epistles" at Rom. 1:1-7.)

II. Call to Faithfulness (1:3-18)

A. Thanksgiving for Timothy (1:3-7)

1:3. In 1 Timothy Paul expressed thanks for his own salvation and ministry (1 Tim 1:12); here he began by expressing thanks for Timothy's salvation and ministry. In passing, Paul referred to his own upbringing, just before he turned to Timothy's (2 Tim. 1:5). The apostle viewed his own faith in Christ, not as a break with his Jewish forefathers, but in continuity with their faith. (Cf. a clear conscience with 1 Tim. 1:5, "a good conscience.") As Paul prayed for Timothy night and day, his gratitude for Timothy kept welling up anew. Sitting chained in a Roman prison there was little else Paul could do but pray; and Timothy, perhaps Paul's closest companion, ministering to the church that Paul probably knew best, was no doubt the single most common object of his petitions.

1:4. Paul remembered Timothy's tears on their last parting, possibly at Paul's second Roman arrest. In this letter he would ask Timothy to join him in Rome (cf. 4:9, 21). Paul had longed for Timothy's companionship which was such a joy to him. Even the great apostle at times became lonely, discouraged, and in need of support from fellow Christians.

1:5. So many, it seems, had opposed or deserted Paul (cf. 1:15; 2:17; 3:1-9, 13; 4:3-4, 10-21) that Timothy's sincere (anypokritou, "unhypocritical"; cf. 1 Tim. 1:5) faith stood out in bold relief. Paul attributed Timothy's faith to the influence of his Jewish mother Eunice and grandmother Lois, both of whom were believers (cf. Acts 16:1). Timothy's father was a Gentile and probably an unbeliever; hence no mention of him is made here. According to this verse, Paul seems to attribute Timothy's conversion to his mother and grandmother (cf. 2 Tim. 3:15). References to Timothy as Paul's son in the faith (cf. 1:2; 2:1; 1 Tim. 1:2) could therefore probably be understood to mean a mentor-protégé relationship.

1:6. Because Paul was persuaded that Timothy possessed true faith (v. 5), something he often refused to take for granted in others (e.g., 1 Thes. 3:5), he urged the young minister to fan into flame (or perhaps, "keep at full flame") his God-given ability for ministry. God's gifts must be used if they are to reach and maintain their full potential. In Timothy's case, Paul wrote (1 Tim. 4:14) that his gift (charisma) had come "through" (dia) a prophetic message, "with" (meta) the laying on of the elder board's hands. Here Paul stated that the gift came "through" (dia) the laying on of his own hands. The language is highly imprecise and may reflect nothing more in the apostle's thinking than a general association between Timothy's ordination (which involved both a prophetic message and the laying on of hands by Paul and the elders) and the young man's awareness of his own abilities. Surely the language does not bear the weight of any detailed conclusions about how spiritual gifts are bestowed, much less full-blown theories of apostolic succession or of ordination as a means of grace.

1:7. Why Timothy needed this reminder of his ordination, and the confidence in his own gifts he developed as a result of it, is not clear. In 1 Timothy the reference to Timothy's ordination is associated with problems stemming from his youthfulness (cf. 1 Tim. 4:12). Perhaps he had become somewhat intimidated by the opposition to both Paul and the gospel, even in some ways threatened, defensive, and ashamed (cf. 2 Tim. 1:8) at having to defend a prisoner (cf. 2:9) and the "foolishness" which they both preached about a despised and crucified Jesus (cf. 1 Cor. 1:18–2:5). But such timidity (deilias, lit., "cowardice," used only here in the NT) has no place in God's service. Instead God gives a spirit of power (cf. 1 Cor. 2:4), of love (cf. 1 Tim. 1:5), and of self-discipline (cf. 1 Tim. 4:7). These three virtues, each supplied by the Holy Spirit, should characterize Timothy.

B. Call to courage (1:8-12)

1:8. If Timothy's ministry were marked by power, love, and self-discipline, he would be able to stand tall against his opponents, and would not be ashamed to testify about our Lord (cf. 1 Cor. 1:6), or ashamed of Paul His prisoner. Though Paul was held in a Roman prison (cf. 2 Tim. 1:16; 2:9), yet he called himself Christ's prisoner—that is, a prisoner for Christ's sake and purpose (cf. Eph. 3:1; Phil. 1:12-14; Phile. 1, 9). With this reminder of his own condition, which was far graver than Timothy's, Paul exhorted Timothy to join courageously with him in suffering for the gospel (cf. 2 Tim. 2:3), for it is just in such circumstances that the power of God is made manifest (cf. 2 Cor. 12:9-10).

1:9-10. Having mentioned the gospel, Paul spelled out some of its most important details. God saved us and called us to a holy life. This is an accomplished fact, not something yet to come. Timothy could therefore count on God's power in his daily ministry. Moreover, this salvation had nothing to do with a believer's merits but was purely because of His own purpose (prothesin; cf. Rom. 8:28; 9:11; Eph. 1:11; 3:11) and grace (cf. 1 Tim. 1:14). This is the very core of the gospel (cf. Eph. 2:8-10). Before the beginning of time Christians were granted this unmerited favor, but were only made aware of it through the appearing (epiphaneias; 2 Thes. 2:8; 1 Tim. 6:14; 2 Tim. 4:1, 8; Titus 2:13) of our Savior, Christ Jesus. Here and in Titus 1:4; 2:13; and 3:6 Christ is called Savior; in 1 Timothy 1:1; 2:3; 4:10; Titus 2:10; and 3:4 God is titled Savior (cf. 2 Peter 1:1 with 3:18). Clearly both are in different senses true. Christ the Son embodied God the Father's saving purpose and plan, by which death, the product of sin (cf. Gen. 2:17; Rom. 5:12; 6:23), would be destroyed (1 Cor. 15:26), and life and immortality (lit., "incorruptibility"; cf. 1 Peter 1:4) would be brought into view.

1:11-12. Little wonder that Paul called this gospel "glorious" (1 Tim. 1:11). It is the most important message ever told. Paul had been appointed to serve as a herald and an apostle and a teacher of this message (cf. 1 Tim. 2:7), three roles which merely reflect different facets of the stewardship entrusted to him (1 Tim. 1:11). Carrying out his stewardship had brought Paul much suffering, including his present imprisonment. In the eyes of the world he was a common criminal (cf. 2 Tim. 2:9). Yet he was able to say, I am not ashamed. He was trusting his own destiny to the same One who had entrusted him with the stewardship of the gospel. Thus, even though he was suffering abuse and humiliation, he was confident of God's complete vindication in the end (cf. 1:18; 4:8). Throughout, of course, Paul was using his own example to bolster Timothy's perhaps flagging courage.

C. Call to guard the truth (1:13-14)

1:13. From the example of his life, Paul turned to the example or pattern (hypotypōsin; cf. 1 Tim. 1:16) of his teaching. Timothy was to view what he had heard from Paul as the essential outline or sketch of sound teaching (lit., "healthy doctrine"; cf. 1 Tim. 1:10) and was to keep or maintain it. Timothy was to hold the truth with faith and love in Christ Jesus. To be balanced, a commitment to the truth always requires faith and love, virtues which ultimately come only from being "in Christ" (1 Tim. 1:14).

1:14. Paul used the notion of a "trust" (parathēkēn; cf. 1 Tim. 5:21; 6:20) in two ways in the Pastorals. First, he had been given a trust or stewardship from God (cf. 1 Tim. 1:11); second, he had in turn entrusted himself and his destiny to God (2 Tim. 1:12). Here Paul spoke of the first of these two. The stewardship of the truth he had received had now been passed along into the hands of Timothy, who was to pass it on yet again to other faithful Christians, who were to pass it on to still others (2:2). While it was in Timothy's possession, however, he was to guard (phylaxon; cf. 1 Tim. 5:21; 6:20) it with the help of the Holy Spirit who lives in us. It was Timothy's responsibility to preserve sound teaching from becoming corrupted through distortion, dilution, deletion, and addition. Heretical teaching was not only a possibility to Paul; it was a constant threat to be guarded against. Moreover, Timothy could count on the assistance of the indwelling Spirit of God (cf. 1 John 3:24; 4:13) who desires to promote the truth about Christ (John 16:13).

D. Examples of unfaithfulness and faithfulness (1:15-18)

1:15. Nothing is known of Phygelus and Hermogenes beyond this single reference. It is fair to conjecture that theirs may have been the most unexpected defections among the group represented by everyone in the province of Asia, of which Ephesus was the leading city. (See the location of Asia and of Ephesus on the map between Acts and Rom.) Perhaps they were leaders of some sort. Timothy certainly knew their situation well, in any case, and Paul singled them out. It is unnecessary to assume either (a) that "everyone" means literally every Christian, or (b) that their failure consisted of a total defection from the faith. Verses 16-18 suggest rather that there was a general failure to support the apostle in his personal time of need.

1:16-18. From these sad examples of unfaithfulness, Paul turned to the sparkling instance of Onesiphorus (mentioned elsewhere only in 4:19), who had supported Paul not only in Ephesus but also in Rome. Repeatedly he had gone out of his way to help Paul, even to the point of following him to Rome and painstakingly seeking out his whereabouts. There, despite Paul's imprisonment and the stigma attached to it, Onesiphorus remained unfazed, continuing his faithful ministry without hesitation. For all of this Paul commended him, twice invoking God's mercy (1:16, 18) on both the faithful servant and his household.

The contrast between the faithful and the unfaithful, the strong and the weak, the trustworthy and the unreliable, is striking. The many in Asia (v. 15) portray the very things Paul had been warning Timothy against—cowardice, shame, self-indulgence, infidelity. Onesiphorus, on the other hand, demonstrated the characteristics Paul had been recommending to Timothy—courage, love, self-discipline, boldness, and faithfulness. Clearly the negative and the positive examples were designed to strengthen Timothy's resolve to be counted among those who were willing to stand shoulder to shoulder with the apostle.

III. Challenge to Endurance (2:1-13)

A. Enduring hardship for Christ (2:1-7)

2:1. After the reminders of Timothy's ordination, his own example, and that of others, Paul addressed Timothy with a direct application: You then, my son (teknon, "child," an endearing term), be strong (lit. "be empowered"; cf. Eph. 6:10). Yet Timothy's strength was not his own; it was a divine "gift" (grace, charis) found only in Christ (Phil. 4:13).

2:2. Traveling with Paul, Timothy had heard the apostle address scores of diverse audiences. Among all those groups the essence of Paul's message had not changed. It was the same body of truth Paul had taught Timothy personally. Now, with the apostle nearing the end of his own ministry, what Timothy had heard from Paul he was in turn to entrust (cf. 1:14) to reliable men who will also be qualified to teach others (cf. 1 Tim. 3:2; Titus 1:9). This has come to be called "the ministry of multiplication," and it is God's method for propagating the good news of Jesus Christ.

2:3-4. Such faithfulness to God's truth would inevitably involve Timothy in suffering, even as it had Paul. Thus without varnishing Timothy's prospects the mentor once again called his protégé to share in hardship or suffering (cf. 1:8 for the same word used only in these two places: synkakopathēson, "to suffer hardship with someone"; also cf. 4:5) for the sake of Christ (cf. John 15:18-20). Paul introduced three common illustrations to emphasize his point (cf. 1 Cor. 9:7, 24 for the same three): a . . . soldier, an athlete, and a farmer (2 Tim. 2:3-6). Military images were common in Paul's thought (cf. 1 Tim. 1:18), no doubt because the word pictures were familiar to his readers (cf. Rom. 6:13 ["instruments" can be trans. "weapons"]; Rom. 7:23; 1 Cor. 9:7; 2 Cor. 6:7; Eph. 6:11-18; Phil. 2:25; Phile. 2). A Roman soldier's single-minded purpose, rigorous discipline, and unquestioning obedience to his commanding officer combine to make the figure of a soldier an apt one for a servant of the gospel.

2:5. With a quick change of metaphor Paul switched to an athlete. The thought here is similar to 1 Corinthians 9:24-27 (and Heb. 12:1-2). According to the rules translates nomimōs (lit., "lawfully"). The metaphor clearly draws on athletic games such as the Olympics, but do "the rules" refer to the regulations governing each event or to those governing the training of those qualified to take part? Competitors in the Olympic games, for example, were required to swear that they had trained diligently for at least 10 months. Though the second is in some ways easier to explain, the first is required by Paul's grammar, which suggests that the issue is not whether one is qualified to compete but, among those competing, who will win the crown. Every athletic event has its boundaries, its rules; moreover, all who fail to discipline themselves to observe these rules are disqualified. Paul wanted Timothy to run so as to win the crown (cf. 2 Tim. 4:7-8) and not be disqualified. This requires a Christian to have strong qualities of discipline, self-control, endurance, and a certain toughness.

2:6. The final image is that of a farmer. The language puts an emphasis on the word hardworking, in contrast with idle, lazy workers. The diligence Paul has just described in each case has its reward (cf. vv. 11-12): A diligent soldier gains the approval of his commanding officer; a diligent athlete wins the victory; a diligent farmer wins the first . . . share of the crops. The three illustrations have in common the point that success is achieved through discipline (cf. 1:7), hard work, and single-mindedness.

2:7. Paul appealed to Timothy to reflect on what I am saying, confident that with meditation and contemplation the Lord would grant the young man the insight (synesin, lit., "understanding") into the wisdom of Paul's instructions (cf. James 1:5).

B. Christ's example of endurance (2:8-10)

2:8. Paul rather abruptly introduced the ultimate example of endurance leading to success: Jesus Christ (cf. Heb. 12:2-3). The words raised from the dead, descended from David may represent a fragment of some familiar creed or catechetical formula (cf. Rom. 1:3-4). The purpose of the fleeting reference is not to expound, but simply to suggest to Timothy a rich subject for his meditation (2 Tim. 2:7), the place of suffering in the life of God's servant (cf. 1 Peter 2:19-24). The quick reference to Jesus' identity (via His ancestral line) and resurrection represents only a portion of Paul's gospel, of course, but a central one. The Gospel writers and the messages of the apostles in Acts address both Christ's lineage and His resurrection in great detail.

2:9-10. Preaching the good news about the crucified but resurrected Son of David was what had landed Paul in a Roman jail. Much of the Book of Acts catalogs Paul's suffering for the cause of Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 11:23-33 for a summary). With every move as he wrote or dictated this letter, the clinking iron reminded him that he was chained like a criminal (kakourgos, lit., "evildoer"). But though he was chained, God's Word is not chained (Paul equated "my gospel" with "God's Word"; cf. 1 Thes. 2:13; 2 Thes. 3:1). God would continue to use it through Timothy, and those to whom Timothy entrusted it. Paul's apparent shame and impotence should be no cause for alarm, discouragement, or faintheartedness. God's Word accomplishes its purpose of calling out God's people, the elect, that they too may obtain the salvation that is in Christ Jesus, with eternal glory. If this process required suffering from Paul, so be it. He was willing to endure (hypomenō, "be steadfast under"; cf. 2 Tim. 2:12) everything for the sake of "the chosen ones" (tous eklektous; cf. Col. 3:12; Titus 1:1). The contrast with Paul's original, natural sentiments could not be more stark (cf. Acts 22:4; 26:9-11; 1 Tim. 1:13), giving full meaning to the apostle's words in 1 Timothy 1:14. The greatest enemy of the saints became their greatest friend, all as a result of the gracious outpouring of Christ's love into his heart.

C. A faithful saying (2:11-13)

2:11-13. Once more Paul used the trustworthy-saying formula, so common in the Pastorals (cf. 1 Tim. 1:15; 3:1; 4:9; Titus 3:8), to introduce a quotation. The formula serves to place Paul's stamp of approval on the content of the quotation, which may have been part of a baptismal ceremony. The quotation sets forth four couplets, the first two of which are positive: (1) If we died with Him, we will also live with Him expresses the idea so powerfully portrayed in the rite of baptism and explained in Romans 6:2-23. The reference is not to martyrdom for Christ, but rather to a believer's mystical identification with the death and life of Christ (cf. Col. 3:3). (2) If we endure (hypomenomen; cf. 2 Tim. 2:10), we will also reign with Him furthers the believer's identification with Christ. In the previous couplet the focus is on the contrast between death and life; here the parallel contrast is between suffering and glorification (Rom. 8:17). Christ endured and will one day reign (1 Cor. 15:25), and those saints who endure will one day reign with Him (Rev. 3:21). The last two couplets are negative: (3) If we disown Him, He will also disown us speaks of the possibility of apostasy (cf. 1 Tim. 4:1; Heb. 10:38-39; 2 John 9) and the Lord's ultimate rejection of those who professed Christ only temporarily (cf. Matt. 10:33). Instead of identifying with Christ, the apostate finally dissociates himself with Christ. (4) If we are faithless, He will remain faithful speaks not of the apostate, but of a true child of God who nevertheless proves unfaithful (cf. 2 Tim. 1:15). Christ cannot disown Himself; therefore He will not deny even unprofitable members of His own body. True children of God cannot become something other than children, even when disobedient and weak. Christ's faithfulness to Christians is not contingent on their faithfulness to Him. The significance of these couplets could hardly have been lost on Timothy.

IV. Marks of a Good Workman (2:14-26)

A. Faithfulness in ministry (2:14-19)

2:14. The instruction of the previous verses was not for Timothy only. Timothy was to keep reminding others of these things. The verb is a present imperative, which means that this was to be Timothy's regular practice. The bulk of preaching to a knowledgeable audience frequently consists of reminding them of what they already know. In the case of the Christians at Ephesus, they were to be solemnly charged in the presence of God (cf. 1 Tim. 5:21) to avoid quarreling about words (cf. 1 Tim. 1:3-4; 4:7; 6:4; 2 Tim. 2:23; Titus 3:9), a tendency in the early church (cf. Acts 18:15). Such wrangling is of no value, but worse, actually ruins those who listen (cf. 2 Tim. 2:16, 18; 3:6), The destructiveness, but especially the worthlessness, of false teaching is a recurrent note in the Pastorals.

2:15. As for Timothy, he was to do his best (lit., "be zealous") to be sure he would meet with God's approval, a "laborer" (ergatēn; cf. Matt. 20:1, 8) who does not need to be ashamed. Paul had spoken of shame before men (2 Tim. 1:8, 12, 16); far worse is shame before God. Timothy need not fear such shame if he would correctly handle the Word of truth (cf. Eph. 1:13; Col. 1:5; James 1:18), which for him included both Old Testament Scripture and what he had heard orally from Paul. The Greek orthotomounta, "correctly handling," found only here and in the Septuagint in Proverbs 3:6 and 11:5, means literally "to cut straight," but just what image Paul had in mind here is uncertain. Stone masons, plowers, road builders, tentmakers, and (least likely of all) surgeons have all been suggested, but a firm conclusion remains elusive. What is clear is that the shame of God's disapproval awaits those who mishandle His Word.

2:16-18. Timothy was to avoid godless chatter (lit., "shun profane empty utterances"; cf. 1 Tim. 6:20) which only advances ungodliness like gangrene (gangraina). (Such godless chatter contrasts with "the Word of truth" [2 Tim. 2:15] and "the truth" [v. 18].) The medical image is striking. Participating with those who engage in such profane speculations will only, literally, "give their words a feeding place like gangrene." They must be amputated instead. Two who deserved such treatment were Philetus about whom nothing is known, and Hymenaeus, whom Paul had already "delivered over to Satan" for chastisement (1 Tim. 1:20). These two had wandered away from the truth (lit., "concerning the truth missed the mark"; cf. 1 Tim. 1:6; 6:21) regarding the crucial doctrine of the resurrection. Greek philosophers typically viewed the soul as immortal and the body as its temporal prison. The idea of the physical resurrection of the body, both Christ's and the Christians', was therefore foreign and difficult for them to grasp. Hence there was a natural tendency toward heresies which rejected bodily resurrection (1 Cor. 15; Acts 17:32). The heresy of Philetus and Hymenaeus probably involved the idea that resurrection was a purely spiritual affair which occurred at conversion or baptism. But bodily resurrection is the keystone of Christian doctrine, as Paul showed (1 Cor. 15). Without it, the entire edifice of the gospel collapses. Little wonder then that Paul said that these two false teachers destroy the faith of some (cf. 1 Tim. 1:19).

2:19. Yet the defection of these two, and their followers, must not shake Timothy's confidence. God's solid foundation (i.e., the church; cf. 1 Cor. 3:10-15; Eph. 2:19-22; 1 Tim. 3:15) stands firm, with two inscriptions as a "seal" to indicate the structure's authenticity and integrity (cf. Rom. 4:11; 1 Cor. 9:2). The first is a reference to the rebellion of Korah in which the Lord differentiated between the true and the false (Num. 16:5; cf. Jude 11). The second inscription is possibly a loose reference to Numbers 16:26 or more likely some other Old Testament passage such as Isaiah 52:11. The two inscriptions emphasize respectively both God's sovereign control over the church and every Christian's responsibility to turn away from evil. Thus Timothy did not need to fear for the destiny of God's work, but he was to make every effort to keep himself free from the contamination of the false teachers.

B. A clean instrument (2:20-21)

2:20-21. Paul furthered his point about noncontamination by introducing a new but similar metaphor. The image changes from a building to a household (cf. 1 Tim. 3:5, 15). In a large and varied household are all sorts of containers. Some are made of gold and silver and others of wood and clay. More importantly, some are for noble purposes and some for ignoble. Clearly the reference so far is to the faithful and the unfaithful within the church. But Paul then shifted the metaphor slightly to show how one can be an instrument for noble purposes, by cleansing himself from the ignoble vessels. The metaphor is somewhat mixed (one would usually think of cleansing from corruption, not cleansing from the corrupted vessels), but the apostle's point is clear: Timothy was to have nothing to do with the false teachers. In this way he would be a vessel: (1) "for noble purposes" ("unto honor," timēn), (2) made holy ("set apart"), (3) useful ("serviceable") to the Master, and (4) prepared to do any good work (cf. 2 Tim. 3:16). What is clean and set apart for special use can easily get contaminated and be rendered unusable through contact with the corrupt. Paul was concerned that Timothy, his choicest disciple, keep himself in a usable condition for the Lord.

C. Faithfulness in conduct (2:22-26)

2:22-23. Timothy was still a young man (cf. 1 Tim. 4:12), and even though he was probably mature beyond his years, he might have still displayed some of the characteristics and passions of the young: impatience, intolerance, love of argument, self-assertion, partiality. Timothy was to flee the evil desires of youth (probably Paul did not have sexual passions in mind here, at least not primarily), and pursue the opposite virtues: righteousness, faith, love (cf. 1 Tim. 6:11 for the same trio), and peace. The NIV wrongly places a comma after "peace"—the phrase should read straight through: "peace" along with those who call on the Lord out of a pure heart (cf. "pure heart" in 1 Tim. 1:5). While Timothy must oppose the false teachers, he was to be at peace with his brethren who were honest before God. The clear implication is that the false teachers were dishonest before God (cf. 1 Tim. 1:5; 4:2; 6:3-5). Timothy must refuse to get caught up in foolish and stupid arguments (zētēseis, "debates"; cf. 1 Tim. 6:4; Titus 3:9) which only produce quarrels.

2:24-26. False teaching will always be divisive, but the Lord's servant should not be a fighter but a promoter of unity, by being kind ("gentle") to everyone (cf. 1 Thes. 2:7), able or ready to teach (cf. 1 Tim. 3:2) those who are willing to learn, and forbearing in the face of differences (anexikakon, lit., "ready to bear evil treatment without resentment"; used only here in the NT). He must treat even his opponents with gentle instruction characterized by "meekness," in the hope that God will grant them repentance ("a change of heart and conduct") leading them to a knowledge (epignōsin, "full knowledge"; cf. Col. 1:9; 2 Tim. 3:7) of the truth. The goal is always remedial, never punitive, when dealing with brethren (cf. 2 Thes. 3:6, 15). The purpose must always be to edify Christ's body, not tear it down (cf. 1 Cor. 14:26). Thus when brethren fall into false teaching they must be treated with gentleness and Christian love in the hope that they will come to their senses and escape from the trap of the devil (cf. Gal. 5:1; 1 Tim. 3:7; 6:9) who has taken them captive to do his will. False teaching and all its negative consequences in the church are always the handiwork of Satan, but God in His grace often salvages the situation through the Christlike ministry of His servants.

V. Predictions of Faithlessness (3:1-9)

3:1-5. As in his previous letter, Paul warned Timothy about the collapse predicted for the last days (cf. 1 Tim. 4:1-3), a term which includes the entire period between the first century and Christ's return. During this interim, according to the prediction, the world will see terrible times of societal degeneration. Paul gave an extraordinary list (cf. Rom. 1:28-32) of 19 general characteristics believers should expect. People will be: (1) lovers of themselves (philautoi, "self-centered, narcissistic"); (2) lovers of money (philargyroi; cf. 1 Tim. 6:9-10); (3) boastful—the outward manifestation of the fact that inwardly they are (4) proud ("arrogant"); (5) abusive toward others, which translates blasphēmoi ("blasphemers"). Several of the words which follow begin in the Greek with the prefix a–, meaning "without" (as in moral-amoral, theist-atheist), signifying absence of the designated virtue. Thus people will be (6) disobedient (apeitheis) to their parents; (7) ungrateful (acharistoi); (8) unholy (anosioi); (9) without love (astorgoi, trans. "heartless" in Rom. 1:31, the only other place it is used in the NT); (10) unforgiving (aspondoi). Diaboloi, a word usually translated "devil" (cf. 1 Tim. 3:6-7; 2 Tim. 2:26), is used here with the root meaning (11) slanderous; (12) without self-control (akrateis); (13) brutal (anēmeroi, lit., "untamed," the opposite of civilized); (14) not lovers of the good (aphilagathoi; cf. Titus 1:8; Pss. 15:4; 19:8). The next two characteristics begin in the Greek with the prefix pro–, indicating an aggressive inclination toward vice: (15) treacherous (prodotai, "disposed toward betrayal"); (16) rash (propeteis, "disposed toward recklessness"). The final three characteristics are (17) conceited (lit., "puffed up"; cf. 1 Tim. 3:6; 6:4); (18) lovers of pleasure (philēdonoi) rather than lovers of God (philotheoi; the Gr. prefix phil– here and in characteristics 1, 2, and 14 above signifies "lovers of . . ."); (19) having a form (morphōsin, "outward shape," used only here and in Rom. 2:20) of godliness but denying its power (cf. Titus 1:16). Though these characteristics are cataloged under the auspices of a prediction about "the last days," it is clear that Paul considered them to be already present in Ephesus. Though they would intensify with time, Timothy had to beware of such people and have nothing to do with them. No doubt Paul had in mind here Timothy's official associations, since he had already instructed Timothy to be kind to everyone (cf. 2 Tim. 2:24).

3:6-7. Paul focused on the specific situation in Ephesus. It was from the increasingly large group in society who displayed the preceding characteristics that the false teachers had emerged to plague the church. Their methods were insidious. They would worm their way into homes and gain control over those they knew were vulnerable and gullible. In the case of Ephesus the false teachers had crept in via a group of weak-willed women who were, literally, "heaped with sin and fed by various lusts." Once more Paul connected false teaching with moral deficiency. Their carnality and immaturity rendered them easy targets for the false teachers (cf. Eph. 4:14). Out of a so-called "openness to learn" they evidently embraced as a fad whatever new heresy came along. Their problem was that they could not recognize the truth when they saw it. (To acknowledge the truth is, lit., "to come to a full knowledge of the truth"; cf. 2 Tim. 2:25.)

3:8-9. The reference to Jannes and Jambres and their opposition to Moses draws not on the Old Testament but on a widespread Jewish legend about two of Pharaoh's magicians who competed against Moses and lost (cf. Ex. 7:11; 9:11). The comparison between the false teachers and the Egyptians, and implicitly therefore Timothy and Moses, must have encouraged the young minister. The opponents were men of depraved (lit., "corrupt"; cf. 1 Tim. 6:5) minds who oppose the truth and were therefore rejected (adokimoi, "disapproved") by God in regard to any claim to be teaching the faith (cf. 1 Tim. 3:9). Consequently, while their influence was temporarily a serious matter in the church, in the long run they would not get very far. Like Jannes and Jambres, eventually their folly would be clear to everyone (cf. 1 Tim. 4:15; 5:24-25).

VI. Challenge to Faithful Preaching (3:10–4:8)

A. Faithfulness in the face of opposition (3:10-13)

3:10-11. Paul returned (cf. 1:8, 12; 2:10) to his own example of endurance and faithfulness in another of his direct exhortations to Timothy (cf. 2:1). The contrast with the false teachers is a strong one: You, however. . . . Timothy knew intimately of Paul's teaching (didaskalia, "content") way of life . . . purpose, faith, patience, love, endurance (cf. 2:10; 12), persecutions, sufferings (cf. 1 Tim. 6:11), along with his various missionary experiences and deliverances, and the elderly apostle was not ashamed to lift them up before his young disciple as exemplary. The references to Antioch (of Pisidia), Iconium, and Lystra must have stirred Timothy's earliest memories of Paul (cf. Acts 13:14, 51; 14:6, 21; 16:1).

3:12-13. It was important for Timothy, as for all Christians, to realize that persecution awaits everyone who wants to live a godly life in Christ (cf. John 15:18-21)—hence Paul's reminder of his own past experience. Yet with the last days again in mind Paul wrote that Timothy could actually expect the situation to get worse and the pressure to intensify. False teaching would increase as evil men and impostors (lit., "magicians," but here with the connotation of "charlatans") go from bad to worse (lit., "advance further"), deceiving and being deceived. Error feeds on itself.

B. Faithfulness to God's Word (3:14–4:5)

3:14-15. Again the strong direct address, But as for you. . . . begins this section (cf. 2:1; 3:10; 4:5). The exhortation is to continue in the things Timothy had learned and become convinced of (cf. 1 Cor. 15:1-2). These things had come from two sources, which Paul set side by side as of equal importance: his own testimony, and the Holy Scriptures, which at that time of course consisted of the Old Testament. Timothy's complete confidence in both sources would be enough to prevent any slippage in his commitment to the truth. Again these verses seem to imply that Timothy's salvation occurred prior to his acquaintance with Paul (cf. 1 Tim. 1:2; 2 Tim. 1:2, 5; Acts 16:1). The Scriptures bring salvation only when one places his faith in Christ Jesus.

3:16-17. Paul had just noted that the Scriptures are able to make one wise with regard to salvation, a lesson Timothy had learned long before. But now Paul wanted to reemphasize to Timothy the crucial role of God's inscripturated revelation in his present ministry. Thus Paul reminded Timothy that all Scripture is God-breathed (theopneustos, "inspired"), that is, God's words were given through men superintended by the Holy Spirit so that their writings are without error. This fact was virtually taken for granted by the Jews. Then Paul asserted the "usefulness" of the Word. For each aspect of Timothy's ministry, whatever it might be—teaching (instructing believers in God's truths), rebuking those in sin (cf. 1 Tim. 5:20; 2 Tim. 4:2), correcting those in error (cf. 2 Tim. 2:25; 4:2), and training (paideian, lit., "child-training") in righteousness (guiding new believers in God's ways)—for all of these and more the written Word of God is profitable. With it the man of God (one who must provide spiritual leadership to others) is artios—"complete, capable, proficient in the sense of being able to meet all demands." To drive home his point still more emphatically Paul added equipped (exērtismenos, "furnished") for every good work (cf. 2:21). Paul placed heavy burdens of ministry on his young disciple in this letter, but he did not do so irresponsibly. He was confident of Timothy's commitment to and dependence on the Scriptures, and he was even more confident of God's ability to supply all Timothy's needs through the Word.

4:1. It would be difficult to see how Paul could have made his charge to Timothy any more weighty (cf. 1 Tim. 5:21; 6:13). He adjured Timothy, not only in the name of God and of Christ, but in the light of the coming judgment, Christ's return (epiphaneian, appearing; cf. 1 Tim. 6:14; 2 Tim. 4:8; Titus 2:13), and the establishment of His millennial kingdom.

4:2. The content of Paul's charge represents the central thrust of every minister's task: Timothy was to preach the Word. All the weight of verse 1 bears on this entreaty. Paul could hardly have emphasized the matter more strongly.

Because the Word is inspired and profitable for all aspects of the ministry, proclaiming that Word was to be Timothy's business in season and out of season, that is, he was to stand by this duty whether the opportunity seemed ripe or not. Those in error he was to correct (cf. 2:25); those who were sinning he was to rebuke (1 Tim. 5:20; 2 Tim. 3:16; Titus 1:13; 2:15); those who were doing well he was to encourage. These are the facets of public ministry: proclamation, correction, rebuke, and encouragement—all of which must be done with great patience and careful instruction.

4:3-4. The reason Paul's charge to Timothy is so solemn is that the time will come—and no doubt was already partially present, in the apostle's opinion—when men will not put up with sound (lit., "healthy"; cf. 1 Tim. 1:10; 6:3; 2 Tim. 1:13; Titus 1:9, 13; 2:8) doctrine. Instead . . . they would seek out (lit. "heap up") teachers, of whom many are always available, who would tell them what they wanted to hear rather than face them with the truth (cf. Rom. 1:18-32). Such teachers merely "tickle the ear" so that they turn people away from the truth on the one hand and toward myths (mythous; cf. 1 Tim. 1:4) on the other. Paul's main focus in this passage was on the inclinations of the audience rather than, as was more his custom (but cf. 2 Tim. 3:6-7), the evil intent of the false teachers. For error to flourish both sides of the transaction must cooperate. This is the sixth time Paul used "truth" in this epistle (cf. 2:15, 18, 25; 3:7-8). (He referred to truth five times in 1 Tim. [2:4, 7; 3:15; 4:3; 6:5] and twice in Titus [1:1, 14].) Obviously he was concerned about the dangers of heresies diverting people from God's truth.

4:5. Again Paul used the strong contrast But you . . . (cf. 3:10, 14). Timothy must remain cool-headed in the face of difficulties. He must be ready to endure hardship (cf. 2:3) as the pressure mounted. He must do the work of an evangelist, proclaiming the gospel at every opportunity. (There is no reason to assume, as some suggest, that Timothy was without the gift of evangelism). In every way, Paul wrote, fulfill your ministry (diakonian, the word for voluntary "service" from which comes "deacon").

C. Faithfulness of Paul (4:6-8)

4:6. What had overshadowed the entire epistle is now stated explicitly: Paul was about to die. The apostle's strong charge in the previous verses takes on added weight with this reminder. The "But you" of verse 5 must therefore be seen in contrast not only with the false teachers of verses 3-4 but also with the For I of verse 6. Paul viewed his death now as certain; he was already being poured out like a drink offering (cf. Phil. 2:17). This refers to the libation connected with the daily offerings of the lambs (cf. Num. 28:4-7). Paul knew, sitting in a Roman jail, that there would be no release. The time had come for his departure (analyseōs, a traveler's term commonly used as a euphemism for death).

4:7. Looking back over his life, the apostle offered a remarkable description few could honestly echo. He had fought the good fight (cf. 1 Tim. 6:12) finished the race (cf. Acts 20:24), and kept the faith (cf. 1 Tim. 6:20). The first two are common Pauline athletic images (cf. 1 Cor. 9:24-27), while the third draws again on the image of faithfulness in one's stewardship of Christian truth (cf. 2 Tim. 1:14).

4:8. As a result of his faithfulness to duty Paul had no fear of facing the Lord, the righteous Judge, but only anticipation of reward in the form of a crown (stephanos, the laurel wreath of the athletic games) of righteousness which was already waiting in store for him. "Crown of righteousness" can mean either that righteousness itself is the crown or reward, or that this crown is the reward for righteousness (cf. 2 Tim. 3:16). In favor of the first view is the fact that James 1:12 and Revelation 2:10 seem to say that the "crown of life" means that life is the crown, not that a crown is given because one has life. In either case Paul expected to receive his reward on that day (a reference to Christ's return, not Paul's death), side by side with the rest of the faithful who have longed for His appearing (cf. Phil. 3:20-21; Titus 2:13).

VII. Reminder of God's Faithfulness in Paul's Adversity (4:9-18)

A. Paul's enemies and friends (4:9-16)

4:9. In this last section of the epistle

Paul twice urged Timothy to join him in Rome (vv. 9, 21). The emphasis is on speed since Paul did not know how much longer he would be allowed to live. The delivery of the epistle, followed by Timothy's travel, would occupy some months as it was; any delay on Timothy's part could make his arrival too late. Paul evidently had reason to believe that his execution was imminent (cf. v. 6).

4:10. Paul's need for Timothy was intensified by the defection of Demas who, instead of loving the Lord's appearing (v. 8), loved this world. Previously mentioned among Paul's fellow workers (though, perhaps significantly, not commended) in Colossians 4:14 and Philemon 24, Demas deserted the apostle to embrace the safety, freedom, or comfort of Thessalonica. It should not be surprising that Paul would long for his most faithful disciple Timothy at such a time (cf. Phil. 2:20-22; 2 Tim. 1:4). Of Crescens nothing is known. He and Titus had evidently been dispatched to the Lord's work elsewhere, Crescens to Galatia and Titus to Dalmatia, now Yugoslavia. Unlike Demas, there is no hint of any defection on their part.

4:11. Of all Paul's close associates, only the "beloved physician" Luke (cf. Col. 4:14) was with Paul. He had accompanied Paul on many of his travels and had shared the first Roman imprisonment with him (cf. Col. 4:14; Phile. 24). In joining the two of them, Timothy was to pick up Mark along the way. It is not known where Mark might have been located. But this one whom Paul had once considered untrustworthy (Acts 15:36-40) was now considered helpful to Paul in his ministry. Barnabas' concern (in opposition to Paul's wishes) to salvage the young John Mark was now paying dividends to Paul himself (cf. Col. 4:10).

4:12. Tychicus, another of Paul's faithful traveling companions (cf. Acts 20:4) and messengers (Eph. 6:21-22; Col. 4:7-9) had been sent . . . to Ephesus. The reference is cryptic and evidently self-explanatory to Timothy. Perhaps Tychicus delivered the letter; perhaps he was even, by prior arrangement, to relieve Timothy temporarily (cf. Titus 3:12). In any case Tychicus was another of Paul's absent companions.

4:13. Again little is known of Carpus or the cloak . . . scrolls, or parchments mentioned here. Such glimpses into the daily life of the apostle are intriguing, but any attempts to suggest what the documents might have contained, for example, are purely speculative. Paul may have needed the cloak because winter was coming on and his prison was cold, but even this is uncertain.

4:14-15. Alexander the metalworker may be the same man named in Acts 19:33-34, or more likely, the person in 1 Timothy 1:20. But since the name Alexander was common, one cannot be certain. The Alexander referred to here was well known to Timothy and had done a great deal of harm to Paul by opposing his message. The apostle had no desire for personal revenge, as may be seen by his reference to Psalm 62:12: The Lord will repay him for what he has done (cf. Rom. 12:19). Yet Paul was concerned lest Timothy run afoul of Alexander's attacks. Hence his warning to be on your guard against him.

4:16. Paul's first defense evidently refers, not to his first Roman imprisonment, about which Timothy would have already known, but to a preliminary hearing leading up to his present trial. At such trials it was common to hear advocates for the accused, but in Paul's case no one came to his support, but everyone deserted him. The widespread desertion of the apostle may be explained by the fact that, unlike the period of his first imprisonment, it had now become dangerous to be a Christian in Rome. As early as A.D. 59–60 Roman Jews had informed Paul "that people everywhere are talking against this sect" (Acts 28:22). But the situation had gotten far worse after the fire of Rome in July of A.D. 64. Nero made the Christians scapegoats and many were tortured and died. The intensity of the anti-Christian pressure must have eased somewhat by A.D. 67, but the thought of identifying themselves with the fearless and outspoken apostle must have been more than the Roman Christians and even Paul's companions could face. In fact Paul was understanding toward their unfaithfulness, and he expressed the hope that it not be held against them (cf. Christ's words on the cross, Luke 23:34).

B. Paul's deliverance by the Lord (4:17-18)

4:17. Paul's courage in proclaiming the gospel was not dampened by the weakness of those around him. The secret to his ministry was his dependence on the strength of God (Phil. 4:13; 1 Tim. 1:12). Though nobody remained with him Paul said, The Lord stood at my side and gave me strength. The apostle to the Gentiles had long before discounted his own life for the sake of preaching the gospel (cf. Acts 20:24). This was simply the latest episode of many wherein Paul put his own life on the line so that through him the message might be fully proclaimed and all the Gentiles might hear it. And once again, at least for the time being, he had been delivered from the lion's mouth. Some have seen in this last phrase a metaphorical reference to Nero or a literal reference to the wild animals in the Roman Coliseum. More likely Paul is drawing on a biblical image (cf. Ps. 22:21; Dan. 6:22).

4:18. Paul knew that his fate in the Roman courts was sealed (cf. vv. 6-8), and he was ready to die. Yet he saw his death not as a victory for Rome but as a rescue of the Lord. Despite every evil attack, he had complete confidence that God would bring him safely to His heavenly kingdom (cf. v. 1). For this Paul, even in the face of his own death, could do nothing but praise God: To Him be glory forever and ever. Amen (cf. Eph. 3:21; 2 Peter 3:18).

VIII. Final Greetings (4:19-22)

4:19-20. Prisca (NIV marg.; elsewhere called Priscilla) and Aquila, the well-known couple who taught Apollos in Ephesus (cf. Acts 18:2, 18, 26; Rom. 16:3; 1 Cor. 16:19), and the faithful household of Onesiphorus (cf. 2 Tim. 1:16) were singled out by the apostle for greeting. Erastus was an old associate of Timothy (Acts 19:22) and his whereabouts would presumably be of interest; the same would be true of the information about Trophimus (cf. Acts 20:4; 21:29), an Ephesian.

4:21. The appeal in verse 9 is repeated with the addition of the words before winter. Paul may have desired his cloak before the weather turned cold (v. 13), but he was more likely concerned about the sailing conditions on the Adriatic Sea. Of the four individuals listed, Eubulus . . . Pudens, Linus, and Claudia, nothing is known. Though "everyone" had deserted Paul at his first defense, still, in the spirit of forgiveness expressed in verse 16, Paul had not cut the Roman Christians off. The greeting is from all the brothers.

4:22. Paul's closing benediction is first directed to Timothy (your spirit, sing.) and then to his other readers (you, pl.), once again demonstrating that the epistle was designed to be read widely (cf. 1 Tim. 6:21; Titus 3:15). If 2 Timothy were penned during Paul's second Roman imprisonment, these are the last words of the apostle to have survived.

TITUS

INTRODUCTION

Titus was a Gentile convert (Gal. 2:3) who had served and traveled with the Apostle Paul (Gal. 2:1-3). Titus had also functioned as a faithful emissary to the troubled church in Corinth (2 Cor. 7:6-7; 8:6, 16).

In approximately A.D. 63–64, sometime after they left Timothy behind in Ephesus, Paul and Titus traveled on to Crete. After a brief visit Paul then left Titus behind to help provide leadership for the Cretan churches (Titus 1:5). Subsequently the apostle wrote this epistle and had it delivered to Titus. The exact time and place of writing is unknown. (See the Introduction to 1 Timothy for a more detailed discussion of the authorship and dating of the Pastoral Epistles.)

The purpose of the epistle to Titus was to instruct him about what he should do and teach in the Cretan churches. A special theme of the letter is the role of grace in promoting good works among God's people (Titus 2:11–3:8).

Paul hoped to join Titus again in Nicopolis for the winter (3:12), but there is no way of knowing whether that meeting ever took place. Titus was last mentioned by Paul (2 Tim. 4:10) as having gone to Dalmatia (Yugoslavia). Tradition has it that Titus later returned to Crete and there served out the rest of his life.

I. Salutation (1:1-4)

1:1. Paul began by identifying himself as a servant of God. Usually, no doubt as a result of his Damascus Road experience (Acts 9:1-9), Paul called himself a "servant of Christ Jesus." Only here did he use the term "servant of God." On the other hand apostle of Jesus Christ is standard. Both of these titles ("servant" and "apostle") focus on Paul's two main concerns: the faith of God's elect (cf. Rom. 8:33; Col. 3:12) and the knowledge of the truth that leads to godliness (cf. 1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Tim. 2:25; 3:7). God was using Paul to call out a people for Himself (e.g., 1 Thes. 1:2-10) and to teach them the truth which is conducive to godly living (cf. 1 Tim. 6:3). In other words Paul's ministry was aimed at both the salvation and sanctification of God's people.

1:2-3. In the NIV the faith and knowledge (already mentioned in v. 1) are said to be resting on the hope of eternal life. "Resting on" is from the single Greek word epi. But it is better to understand this word as "with a view to," as in Ephesians 2:10. Thus Paul's thought is that all of his ministry is "with a view to" eternal life. This hope was promised to the elect from eternity past (2 Tim. 1:9) by God, who cannot default on His word. Only in the latter days, however, has the full understanding of that word come to light in the message God gave Paul to preach. As is common in the Pastorals, the apostle referred to God as Savior (cf. 1 Tim. 1:1; 2:3; 4:10; Titus 2:10; 3:4). God's eternal plan to salvage a people for Himself, rather than any this-worldly agenda to liberate social structures or institutions, formed the primary focus of Paul's ministry.

1:4. Titus was the ostensible recipient of the letter even though this epistle, like 1 and 2 Timothy, was designed to be read widely. Titus was called my true son, indicating possibly that Paul was responsible for Titus' conversion. The same phrase was also used of Timothy (1 Tim. 1:2). Or the term may denote a mentor-protégé relationship, or both concepts. The greeting grace and peace from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Savior is typical (cf. 1 Tim. 1:2; 2 Tim. 1:2) except for the last term which was applied earlier (Titus 1:3) to God the Father. Paul used the term Savior in Titus' letter interchangeably for the first two Members of the Godhead (cf. 2:10 and 13; 3:4 and 6).

II. Qualifications of the Elders (1:5-9)

1:5. As with Timothy in Ephesus (1 Tim. 1:3), Paul had left Titus behind to provide leadership to the fledgling church in Crete. Now the apostle reiterated his previous instructions, both for Titus' sake and for the congregation's. The organization of the Cretan church was unfinished due to the brevity of Paul's visit. Thus Titus was to straighten out (lit., "set in order") the situation by appointing elders in every town. Titus was now acting as an apostolic agent (cf. Acts 14:23) in Paul's absence. His authority in the Cretan church was an extension of Paul's own. Such authority ended with the close of the Apostolic Age.

1:6. As in 1 Timothy 3:2-7 Paul listed the qualifications for elders (cf. comments on 1 Tim. 3:1). There the list numbered 15; here 17. Yet both lists cover essentially the same qualities: (1) the elder must be blameless (anenklētos, "unreprovable"). In 1 Timothy 3:10 Paul used this same word of deacons, while in 1 Timothy 3:2 he used anepilēmpton to express the same thought of the elders. (2) Husband of but one wife probably means that the elder should have been married only once (see comments on 1 Tim. 3:2). (3) The elder must have his own household under control. This involves not only the matter of discipline (1 Tim. 3:4-5), but also positive spiritual influence as well. His children must be believers who are not open to the charge of being wild and disobedient. The apostle had explained why this requirement is important (1 Tim. 3:5).

1:7. Here Paul switched from the term "elder" (presbyteros) to overseer (episkopos, commonly trans. "bishop"). The two words are plainly interchangeable in the apostle's thinking, referring to the same church office. The term "overseer" is singular here, but this certainly does not mean that there must be only one episkopos per congregation. Rather the word is used here in a generic sense. Paul was simply affirming that these qualifications are required of all overseers. The need for blamelessness is repeated from verse 6. The reason this quality is so important is that an overseer serves as a steward of God. Damage to a church leader's reputation is damage to God's reputation. Then Paul resumed his list with five vices which must not characterize an overseer: (4) not overbearing, not arrogant and self-willed; (5) not quick-tempered (cf. James 1:19-20); (6) not given to much wine; (7) not violent (cf. 1 Tim. 3:3 for this and the previous vice); (8) not pursuing dishonest gain (cf. comments on 1 Tim. 6:5).

1:8. Whereas verse 7 lists negative characteristics to avoid, verse 8 lists positive qualities to be sought. The elder must be (9) hospitable (cf. 1 Tim. 3:2); (10) one who loves what is good (cf. Ps. 15); (11) self-controlled, or temperate and sensible (sōphrona; cf. Gal. 5:23; 1 Tim. 3:2; Titus 2:2, 4); (12) upright (dikaion, "just"); (13) holy (these last two are, with blamelessness, two of the characteristics Paul himself had modeled [cf. 1 Thes. 2:10], but neither is mentioned in 1 Tim. 3); and (14) disciplined (in contrast to the vices of Titus 1:7; cf. 1 Tim. 4:7-8).

1:9. Not only must an overseer meet moral and spiritual standards in his personal life, but he must also be a reliable man of the Word. (15) He must hold firmly to the trustworthy message as it has been taught. This last clause, "as it has been taught," actually comes first in the Greek, for emphasis. According to Paul, an elder is a conservator of the truth, one who must understand it, hold it fast; (16) encourage others by teaching it; and (17) refute those who oppose it. To be qualified as an elder a man must be a capable handler of the truth (cf. comments on 1 Tim. 3:2).

III. Characteristics of the False Teachers (1:10-16)

1:10. Having mentioned those who oppose the truth, Paul then described them for Titus and offered advice on how to handle them. He noted their three most prominent characteristics: they are rebellious (cf. Jude 8), mere talkers, and deceivers. All three characteristics were also present in Timothy's opponents in Ephesus (cf. 1 Tim. 1:3-11; 6:3-10; 2 Tim. 2:14-18); but in Crete, Titus faced a Jewish element (the circumcision group, cf. Acts 11:2; Gal. 2:12) in whom these characteristics stood out prominently.

1:11. These false teachers must be silenced because of the damage they were doing to the families of the congregation (cf. 2 Tim. 3:6). No doubt Titus' method of silencing was to be the same as Timothy's: the false teachers were to be instructed not to teach certain things lest they be excommunicated (cf. 1 Tim. 1:3-4; 2 Tim. 3:5). Again Paul condemned the motives of the false teachers—they were interested in dishonest gain (cf. comments on 1 Tim. 6:5).

1:12. To emphasize his point Paul quoted from Epimenides, a Cretan poet and philosopher from the sixth century B.C. who was widely believed to be a religious prophet. Though the quotation may originally have referred to a particular lie (viz., that Zeus was buried in Crete, which was especially offensive to those who believed Zeus was still alive), by Paul's day the saying had become a proverb which merely emphasized the low reputations of Cretans generally. So little did others think of the Cretans that the verb krētizō was invented to mean "to lie." Of course many noble Christians were in the congregations in Crete, but Paul was frontal in his assertion that the false teachers possessed these baser Cretan tendencies.

1:13-14. How the congregations reacted to Paul's forthright use of this quotation is not known, but they certainly could not have missed his point: This testimony is true. The false teachers fit the Cretan stereotype. Thus their negative influence must be remedied, if at all possible, by salvaging the false teachers themselves. Titus was to rebuke them sharply, so that they will be sound ("healthy"; cf. 1 Tim. 1:10; 6:3-4) in the faith. The ultimate goal of discipline should be to recover the one who is in error (Gal. 6:1; 2 Thes. 3:14-15). In the present case Paul hoped that Titus' severe rebuke would be enough to bring the errorists around so that they would cease paying attention to Jewish myths and to the commands of those who reject the truth.

1:15-16. The "commands" of verse 14, especially in light of the Jewish and possibly Gnostic influences, undoubtedly included ascetic rules about eating, drinking, and purification (cf. Col. 2:20-23; 1 Tim. 4:1-5). Paul set the matter straight by reminding his readers of the Lord's teaching that purification is largely a matter of the internal rather than the external (cf. Mark 7:15; Luke 11:39-41). Nothing outside can corrupt one who is internally pure; but someone who is internally impure corrupts all he touches. The problem with the false teachers was that on the inside, in their minds and consciences, they were impure. As a result, even though they claimed to know and follow God, their corrupt actions belied their true natures (cf. 1 John 2:4). Their impure interiors thus rendered them externally detestable (lit., "abominable") to God, disobedient (cf. Titus 1:10), and unfit (adokimoi, "disapproved"; cf. 1 Cor. 9:27) for doing anything good (cf. 2 Tim. 3:17). Once again Paul connected theological error with moral deficiency.

IV. Godly Behavior for Different Groups (2:1-10)

A. Older men (2:1-2)

2:1. Returning to his instructions to Titus, Paul established a strong contrast with the false teachers he had just discussed. You translates sy de, which should probably be rendered more strongly: "But as for you. . . ." Titus was to teach in the congregation what is in accord with sound doctrine, or more literally, "healthy teaching." The notion of healthy teaching is common in the Pastorals (cf. 1 Tim. 1:10; 6:3; 2 Tim. 1:13; 4:3; Titus 1:9, 13; 2:2). So also is the idea that certain behavior befits sound doctrine, and other behavior does not (cf. 1 Tim. 1:10; 6:3). The victims of false teachers (cf. Titus 1:16) were out of harmony with sound doctrine; but now Paul would describe the right sorts of behavior.

2:2. Paul addressed several groups, the first being the older men. Titus was to teach them to manifest the characteristics of maturity. Older men are to be temperate (nēphalious; cf. 1 Tim. 3:2), worthy of respect (semnous, "serious-minded," i.e., not clowns), and self-controlled (sōphronas, cf. 1 Tim. 3:2; Titus 1:8; 2:4). These marks of maturity should be complemented by marks of godliness, the three central Christian virtues of faith . . . love, and endurance (hypomonē). This last one may seem to have replaced the familiar virtue "hope" in the trio, but the two are closely aligned (cf. Rom. 5:4; 15:4, 1 Thes. 1:3), especially for those who have lived long lives.

B. Older women (2:3)

2:3. Titus was likewise to teach the older women to behave reverently, in a way suitable to sound doctrine. They were not to be slanderers (cf. 1 Tim. 3:11) or addicted to much wine (cf. 1 Tim. 3:8). Both were real possibilities for women whose families were grown and who may have had too much idle time on their hands (cf. 1 Tim. 5:13-14). Titus was to encourage these older women to develop a ministry of teaching younger women what is good. Younger women with children were to keep their primary focus at home (see Titus 2:4-5), but the older women would do well to reach outside their homes and share what they had learned with those who would profit from it most.

C. Younger women (2:4-5)

2:4-5. Paul specified here what he meant by his general reference to "what is good" in verse 3. Older women could help the younger women in at least seven areas, a list that no doubt represents the apostle's understanding of a young wife and mother's proper priorities. This list emphasizes, in the original, first what young wives and mothers are to be, and then only secondarily what they are to do. They are to be (1) lovers of their husbands; (2) lovers of their children; (3) self-controlled; (4) pure; (5) busy at home, that is (cf. 1:8; 2:2) "domestic" (oikourgous, lit., "working at home"); (6) kind; and (7) subject to their husbands. By (agathas, "good") manifesting these qualities, Paul wrote, young Christian wives and mothers would earn the respect of outsiders and thereby prevent God's Word from being maligned. Today, though the opposite is often true, Christian wives and mothers can still be sure that the Lord will honor those who value what He values, and that He will ultimately vindicate both His Word and those who are faithful to it.

D. Younger men (2:6-8)

2:6. Titus was to similarly encourage the young men to exercise self-control, a virtue in which many young men are deficient. Paul used some form of the word here translated "self-control" with each of the four groups of people (vv. 2, 4, 5, 6). Various forms of the word are prominent in the Pastorals, indicating for all Christians the importance of moderation, sensibleness, and self-restraint.

2:7-8. Titus qualified as a young man too, and so received some direct advice from the apostle. He must strive to "show himself" an example (typos, "pattern") to all (but esp. to the other young men) in every good work (cf. 1 Tim. 4:15-16). In his public ministry of teaching Titus must show an integrity, seriousness, and soundness of speech that cannot be condemned. Paul was always concerned lest those who oppose be provided ammunition for their attacks. Far better, said the apostle, that they be ashamed because they have nothing bad to say about us. They would not cease their attacks, of course, but they might at least be embarrassed by having to make up their own false accusations.

E. Slaves (2:9-10)

2:9-10. Slaves too, who made up a significant portion of first-century congregations, were responsible to honor God with their lives (see comments on 1 Tim.

6:1). Paul listed five qualities which were to characterize Christians who found themselves serving others. Titus was to teach them (1) to be subject to their masters in everything; (2) to try to please them; (3) not to talk back to them; (4) not to steal from them; (5) to show that they can be fully trusted. From the world's perspective a slave should not owe any of these things to his master, but from a Christian's perspective the situation looks different. A Christian slave is in fact serving, not his earthly master, but the Lord Christ who will vindicate him in the end (Col. 3:23-24). In the meantime he must avoid giving offense, and must concentrate on following Christ's example in every way (cf. 1 Peter 2:18-25). In this way his life will prove to be an adornment to the teaching about God our Savior. Thus Paul drove home again what had been the theme of this entire section (Titus 2:1-10): a believer's behavior is to be in accord with or befitting sound doctrine.

V. Role of Grace in Promoting Godly Behavior (2:11–3:11)

A. The educating power of grace (2:11-14)

2:11-12. Paul had been exploring the affirmation that godly living is demanded by God's truth. Now he changed his focus to explore that central aspect of God's truth which demands godly living: grace. The word for (gar) suggests that here is the theological foundation for what the apostle had just written.

When fully understood, it is the gospel of the grace of God which teaches Christians how to live. This grace has brought salvation to all men, i.e., it is universally available. The NIV, however, states that God's grace that brings salvation has appeared to all men, thus suggesting a universal appearance. The question is whether "to all men" goes with "appeared" (as in the NIV) or with the adjective sōtērios ("that brings salvation"). Grammatically "to all men" can be taken either way, but the latter makes better sense and correlates with the clear teaching of 1 Timothy 2:4, 6; 4:10. In each case the reference to God as Savior (cf. 1 Tim. 2:3; 4:10; Titus 2:10) prompted Paul to affirm the universal availability of salvation through Christ. To side with the NIV, on the other hand, introduces an idea foreign to the New Testament and to common sense, since the gospel itself has patently not "appeared" to all men (unless "all men" means all kinds of people and not every single person). The message of God's grace, when its full implications are seen, leads Christians, negatively, to say "No" to ungodliness and worldly passions (cf. Heb. 11:24-26), and positively, to live self-controlled, upright, and godly lives in this present Age. All the specific instructions of Titus 2:1-10 can fit into these two negative and positive categories.

2:13-14. The gospel of grace affects one's present behavior, on the one hand, by focusing on God's unmerited favor in the past (see the Lord's parable in Matt. 18:23-35 for the dynamics of how this should work). But the Gospel also promotes godly living by focusing on the future. Christians look forward to the blessed hope—the glorious appearing of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ (cf. 2 Tim. 4:8). It is crucial, moreover, to see that this One whom Christians look forward to meeting is the same One who gave Himself for us to redeem (lytrōsētai, "set free by payment of a price"; cf. Luke 24:21; 1 Peter 1:18) us from all wickedness and to purify for Himself a people that are His very own, eager to do what is good. A holy people was His purpose in paying such a fearful price. Therefore, knowing what all He has done and why He has done it, a Christian who truly loves Christ and looks forward to His return will pay any price to bring his life into conformity with his beloved Lord's will, lest he disappoint Him at His return. This was the Apostle John's thought when he wrote about the hope of Christ's appearing: "Everyone who has this hope in him purifies himself, just as He is pure" (1 John 3:3). A full understanding of these things leads inexorably to godly living. Conversely, ungodly living in a Christian is a clear sign that either he does not fully understand these things or he does not actually believe them.

B. The gracious behavior that results from grace (2:15–3:2)

2:15. Turning again to Titus, Paul told him to teach these . . . things, i.e., the specific aspects of godly behavior listed in verses 1-10 and referred to more cryptically in the last phrase of verse 14, "what is good." Like Timothy (e.g., 1 Tim. 4:12; 2 Tim. 4:2), Titus was told to step out aggressively in his public ministry, encouraging those who were doing well, rebuking those who needed to be corrected, being intimidated by no one.

3:1-2. A large part of any pastor's public ministry is reminding people of what they already know. Titus was to remind the Christians on Crete to be good citizens within their communities, a virtue in which Cretans were notoriously deficient. Though Paul did not repeat it here, his thought was no doubt that this behavior, like that of a Christian slave, will adorn the gospel and make it attractive to others (cf. 2:10). Paul listed seven qualities expected of Christian citizens: (1) to be subject to rulers and authorities; (2) to be obedient (cf. Rom. 13:1-7); (3) to be ready to do whatever is good (cf. Eph. 2:10; 2 Tim. 3:17); (4) to slander no one; (5) to be peaceable and (6) considerate; and (7) to show true humility toward all men. A Christian citizen should be an influence for good in the community in every way, demonstrating the loveliness of Christ to all through courteous and gracious behavior. This is precisely the lifestyle that results from understanding God's grace. In other words the instructions in Titus 2:15–3:2 must be seen as concrete examples of the behavior required of one who understands God's grace (2:11-14).

C. Grace as a motivation for godly living (3:3-8)

3:3. Paul never forgot the sinful condition from which he and his converts had been salvaged (cf. 1 Cor. 6:9-11; Eph. 4:17-24; Col. 3:6-7), and he reminded them of it once more. Instead of the gracious, Christlike people he was encouraging them to be, they once were just the opposite, being foolish instead of sensible, disobedient instead of submissive, deceived and enslaved by all kinds of passions and pleasures instead of self-disciplined and ready for every good work. Far from being peaceable, considerate, and humble, they were characterized by malice and envy, being hated and hating one another. Such is the brutish existence of people apart from God. While a veneer of civilization often obscures the bleak truth, the slightest crack in the surface of society reveals the reality behind the facade. The painful truth is that apart from God people degenerate into little more than animals wrangling over bones.

3:4. But all of that changed when the kindness and love (philanthrōpia, lit., "love for man") of God our Savior appeared. The contrast is startling. In verse 3 man is the actor, but in verses 4-7 man is merely the recipient, and God becomes the actor. What man could in no wise do for himself, God initiated for him. (On the reference to God as Savior, see comments on 1 Tim. 1:1.)

3:5. God in His grace saves those who believe, not because of any righteousness in them (cf. Rom. 3:21-24; Eph. 2:8-9; 2 Tim. 1:9), but because of His mercy. The three words, "kindness," "love," and "mercy" (Titus 3:4-5) all represent aspects of God's grace. The dual means of grace through which He accomplished this salvation are (1) the rebirth spoken of as a washing from the filth of sin, and (2) the renewal by the Holy Spirit (cf. 2 Cor. 5:17). No mention is made here of the role of faith in the process because Paul's entire focus was on what God has done, not on human response.

3:6-7. God poured out the Holy Spirit on the world generously through Jesus Christ our Savior. Jesus was the Mediator of the Spirit (cf. Acts 2:33). The language intentionally conjures up images of the day of Pentecost (Acts 2:17). God's purpose in pouring out the Holy Spirit was so that, having been justified by His grace, believers might become heirs having the hope of eternal life. The ministry of the Holy Spirit is intimately involved, the New Testament explains, with bringing to fruition God's gracious purposes to save (cf. Rom. 8:15-17; Gal. 4:6-7; Eph. 1:13-14). What God in His grace began, God in His grace will see to the end, through His Spirit.

3:8. The trustworthy saying formula so common in the Pastorals (cf. 1 Tim. 1:15; 3:1; 4:9; 2 Tim. 2:11) introduces Paul's return to direct address. Because what he had just been saying is trustworthy, Titus should stress these things in order to promote godly behavior in his listeners. Twice before Paul had instructed Titus to teach these things in accordance with sound doctrine (Titus

2:1, 15), and this exhortation is his final reiteration of what is probably the central thrust of the entire epistle. Paul was deeply concerned that God's people devote themselves to doing what is good because these things are excellent and profitable for everyone. Titus was to promote good works, for they go hand in hand with sound doctrine.

D. Behavior inconsistent with grace (3:9-11)

3:9. If sound teaching is profitable for everyone, foolish controversies and genealogies and arguments and quarrels about the Law . . . are unprofitable and useless. This is a repeated theme in the Pastorals (cf. 1 Tim. 1:4; 6:4; 2 Tim. 2:23; Titus 1:14). Titus was to avoid (lit., "turn away from") such things.

3:10-11. As to the people who are advocating these useless things and thereby exerting a divisive and otherwise destructive influence in the church (cf. 1:11), Paul's instructions to Titus were direct and specific. He was to give such a person two warnings. If that did not work, he was to have nothing to do with him. The assumption is that a failure to respond to two warnings is a clear sign that the offender is warped and sinful, and self-condemned. Paul's thought here is similar to the Lord's instructions (Matt. 18:15-17), when He taught that after giving an offender three chances to repent, he is then to be cut off (but cf. 2 Thes. 3:14-15).

VI. Final Instructions and Greetings (3:12-15)

3:12. As usual, Paul ended his letter with some personal allusions. Though it is not known where Paul was when he wrote this epistle, he was planning to winter at Nicopolis on the Adriatic coast of Greece. Paul exhorted Titus to do his best to join him there as soon as Artemas or Tychicus arrived. Evidently Paul intended to send one of the two to relieve Titus in Crete. Of Artemas nothing is known. (On Tychicus, see comments on 2 Tim. 4:12.)

3:13. Zenas the lawyer is mentioned nowhere else in the New Testament, and nothing is known about him, not even whether he was Jewish or Roman. But Apollos was a familiar fellow worker. The apostle's instructions seem to suggest that both Zenas and Apollos were in Crete and that Titus was in a position to see that they have everything they need. Servants of Christ who are called to travel from place to place have always received support from the churches (cf. 3 John 6-8).

3:14. Some have suggested that the Cretan Christians may have manifested some of their countrymen's traits (cf. 1:12) and were therefore unable to provide for daily necessities, much less be of use to anyone else. This is probably behind Paul's reference to unproductive lives. In any case Paul had been stressing the need for good works, not to earn salvation but to serve others, and he pointedly reiterated it here. He expressed the same thought to the Ephesian congregation (Eph. 4:28).

3:15. It is not known who was included in the phrase everyone with me. Those who love us in the faith obviously excluded the false teachers who opposed Paul. The closing greeting, grace be with you all, is similar to that in both 1 and 2 Timothy. The plural word you indicates an awareness on Paul's part that he was addressing a broader audience than just Titus.

PHILEMON

Edwin C. Deibler

INTRODUCTION

Concerning the authenticity of this most personal of Paul's epistles, there has been no question. John Knox wrote, "The genuineness of the letter is so well established as to require little discussion" (Philemon among the Letters of Paul, p. 32).

Authorship. Among the church fathers, Ignatius, Tertullian, Origen, and Eusebius give evidence of the canonicity of this brief book. It was also included in the canon of Marcion and in the Muratorian fragment.

Three times in the epistle the author refers to himself as Paul (vv. 1, 9, 19). The style and language remind one of Paul (cf. v. 4 with Phil. 1:3-4). Paul in the introductions of his epistles commonly used the terms "love" and "faith." And these are used here also, in Philemon 5. Too, there is a close association with Colossians, for both epistles mention Archippus, Epaphras, Aristarchus, Demas, and Luke (cf. Col. 4:10, 12, 14, 17).

Date and Place of Writing. Paul was a prisoner when he wrote Philemon (vv. 1, 9). This epistle is therefore included among the so-called "prison epistles," and was written during his first Roman imprisonment, A.D. 61-63. Because Onesimus accompanied Tychicus, who carried the letter to Colosse, it is evident the two epistles were written at about the same time, probably in the summer of A.D. 62.

Destination. Philemon was the recipient. Judging by his ownership of slaves and the size of his home (large enough to house the local church referred to in v. 2), Philemon was a wealthy resident of Colosse. Though it is not known when Philemon first heard Paul, evidently Philemon was a convert of the apostle (v. 19b). It is likely that the two became friends during Paul's three-year ministry in Ephesus (Acts 19). It is commonly believed that Apphia (Phile. 2) was Philemon's wife, and Archippus his son, though this cannot be asserted dogmatically.

Included among the first readers were the members of "the church that meets in [Philemon's] home" (Phile. 2). Possibly Archippus was an official in this church, and Philemon served as a lay worker (vv. 1-2; contrast the terms "fellow worker" and "fellow soldier"). Lightfoot suggests that Archippus was an elder or was on a missionary charge, either of which was an important responsibility in the church. Some suggest that Archippus may have been the pastor. It is possible that Archippus had some official capacity at Colosse (Col. 4:17).

Occasion and Purpose. The occasion for writing is almost identical with the story of the epistle itself. Onesimus, a slave of Philemon, had run away, having evidently robbed his master (Phile. 18). His travels somehow brought him to Rome where, in the providence of God, he came in contact with Paul. Through this contact Paul led Onesimus to know the Savior. Then Onesimus in some way became useful to Paul (vv. 12-13).

But Paul realized that Onesimus had a responsibility to Philemon and should make restitution for his thievery. Thus Paul deemed it right to return Onesimus to Philemon. Tychicus was given the responsibility of carrying Paul's letter from Rome to the Colossians, and Onesimus evidently traveled back with him (Col. 4:7-9).

In this letter to Philemon Paul explained his situation and asked Philemon to treat Onesimus not as a runaway, thieving slave, but now as a beloved brother in Christ (Phile. 15-16; cf. Col. 4:9). In so doing, the apostle gave not only some insight into the institution of slavery in the Apostolic Age but also his Christian response to it. The reality of Galatians 3:28 becomes evident here in Philemon: "There is neither . . . slave nor free . . . in Christ Jesus." Paul also gave a brilliant cameo of gospel truth in the words, "Charge that to my account" (Phile. 18, NASB).

COMMENTARY

I. The Salutation of the Letter (vv. 1-7)

A. The writer (v. 1a)

V. 1a. This is the only one of Paul's epistles in which he referred to himself in the salutation as a prisoner of Christ Jesus. In seven of his epistles he called himself "an apostle"; in two of them (1 and 2 Thes.) he used no appellation, and in three he referred to himself as Christ's "servant."

Probably Paul refrained from calling himself an apostle here because this epistle is one of entreaty and request, not one of commands that would necessitate its readers' awareness of his apostolic authority. Paul was a prisoner of the Roman Empire, but actually his imprisonment was because of his witness for the Savior. Paul called himself "a prisoner of Christ Jesus" (Phile. 9). Epaphras was his "fellow prisoner" (v. 23).

Adding the words and Timothy our brother strengthened the weight of Paul's sympathy and love. Timothy's name was also joined with Paul's in the salutations to five of Paul's other epistles (2 Cor., Phil., Col., 1 and 2 Thes.).

B. The readers (v. 1b-2)

V. 1b. About all that is known of Philemon in the New Testament is disclosed in the words, To Philemon our dear friend and fellow worker. He was loved by Paul ("dear friend" is the rendering of agapētō, lit., "loved" or "beloved"; cf. v. 16); and Paul considered Philemon on his level as a "fellow worker" (cf. the pl. "fellow workers," v. 24). Philemon was a well-to-do Christian of the Apostolic Age, in whose home at Colosse the church met. "Fellow worker" does not necessarily suggest that Paul and Philemon labored together; more likely, Philemon worked to build up the church in Colosse while Paul served in nearby Ephesus (see "Destination" under the Book of Philemon's Introduction). Paul also addressed Philemon as "brother" in verses 7 and 20.

V. 2. Apphia our sister was most likely the wife of Philemon. She may have possibly served in a semi-official position in the church in their home. "She is as much a part of the decision as her husband, because according to the custom of the time, she had day-to-day responsibility for the slaves" (Arthur A. Rupprecht, "Philemon," in The Expositor's Bible Commentary, 11:458).

Some have surmised that Archippus our fellow soldier was Philemon's son. He may likely have been a mission-pastor in Colosse, for Paul gave a brief instruction for the Colossians to pass on to Archippus (Col. 4:17). Perhaps Archippus, because of his position, could have exerted additional influence on Philemon.

The church that meets in your home could also put pressure on Philemon to heed Paul's request. If Paul had not included this church in his salutation, they might have gossiped when they saw Onesimus had returned. The practice of churches meeting in private homes for worship was common up to A.D. 200. Not until the third century did churches meet in separate buildings. Home churches were also mentioned by Paul in Romans 16:5 and Colossians 4:15. The words "your home" may refer, some say, to Archippus' home ("your" is the sing. sou), but it is better to take it as referring to Philemon's home since he is addressed first in the salutation. The singular "you" in Philemon 4, 6-8, 10-12, 16, 18-21, 23 obviously refers to Philemon. "You" and "your" is plural only in verses 22 and 25.

C. The salutation (v. 3)

V. 3. This salutation—Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ—is the usual Pauline greeting. It is almost identical in wording to the greeting in six of his other epistles (Rom., 1 and 2 Cor., Gal., Eph., Phil.); the salutation in Paul's six other epistles have only slight variations (Col., 1 and 2 Thes., 1 and 2 Tim., Titus). (See chart, "Paul's Introductions to His Epistles" at Rom. 1:1.)

It is important to note the word order. The word "peace" expresses a spiritual state denoting a proper relationship between God and man; it is the effect of only one cause: the "grace" of God. There can be no peace apart from grace. Peace with God, a judicial matter, comes by means of faith (Rom. 5:1). The peace of God, an experiential condition, results from the infilling ministry of the Holy Spirit (Eph. 5:18; Gal. 5:22-23). Paul concluded the letter with a similar prayer regarding the "grace of the Lord Jesus Christ" (Phile. 25).

D. The commendation (vv. 4-7)

1. THANKSGIVING (VV. 4-5)

V. 4. Every letter of Paul's except Galatians includes an expression of thanksgiving in the opening. This follows the custom, in both pagan and Christian first-century correspondence, of including a word of thanks in the salutation. The words I always thank my God as I remember you in my prayers are almost the same ones Paul used in his other prison epistles (see Eph. 1:15-16; Phil. 1:3-4; Col. 1:3-4). Paul told when he gave thanks ("always"), and to whom ("God"), and for whom ("you," i.e., Philemon).

V. 5. Paul also told why (because I hear about your faith in the Lord Jesus and your love for all the saints). The coupling of faith in Christ and love for the saints was also true of the Ephesians (Eph. 1:15), the Colossians (Col. 1:4), the Thessalonians (1 Thes. 1:3; 2 Thes. 1:3).

Paul may have heard about Philemon's faith in Christ and love for the saints from Onesimus and Epaphras. Philemon's faith in Christ produced love for all the saints. Since Philemon loved "all" the saints, he surely should include Onesimus, now a saint, in his love!

2. PRAYER (V. 6)

V. 6. Having commended Philemon's faith and love (v. 5) Paul expanded on Philemon's faith (v. 6) and his love (v. 7). Paul's prayer was that Philemon (you is sing.) would be active in sharing his faith (lit., "active in the sharing," hē koinōnia). The relationship of the second clause to the first is difficult to translate. The NIV suggests that the second is a result of the first: so that you will have a full understanding of every good thing we have in Christ. Philemon's sharing of his faith would then lead to a full understanding of his spiritual blessings. However, the NIV words "so that you will have" are simply the one Greek word en ("in"). This hints that the first clause results from the second. As Philemon would gain a fuller understanding of his blessings in Christ he would become more active in sharing Him. He would share Christ in (i.e., in the sphere of) his full understanding of his blessings. The more a believer comes to comprehend all he has in Christ the more eager he is to share Him with others. The "full understanding" is epignōsei, mentioned in Paul's prayers in each of the other prison epistles (Eph. 1:18; Phil. 1:9; Col. 1:9).

3. TESTIMONY (V. 7)

V. 7. Philemon's love (cf. vv. 5, 9) resulted in joy and encouragement for

Paul, for Philemon had refreshed the hearts of the saints. "Refreshed" (anapepautai, cf. v. 20) is the word the Lord used in Matthew 11:28, "Come to Me, all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest" (anapausō, "I will refresh you"). Philemon, having been spiritually "refreshed" by Christ, could refresh others. "Hearts" is not the normal Greek word kardia for heart, but is splanchna (lit., "inner parts of the body"). The emotions stemmed from the inner parts, according to some Greeks. Thus this is a deep emotional term. Paul used it again in Philemon 12 and 20 (cf. Phil. 2:1, KJV).

II. The Body of the Letter (vv. 8-21)

A. The plea (vv. 8-12, 17)

Paul then gave his recommendations regarding the runaway slave Onesimus. Throughout this plea the apostle's words were courteous, and yet they bore a note of authority and earnestness. He revealed a double truth. Onesimus was now a son in the faith to Paul (v. 10), and Onesimus was now a brother to Philemon (v. 16). The latter forms a Christian reply to the horrible institution of slavery. Onesimus, in the lowest social status in the Roman world—a slave with no rights—was on a spiritual plane equal with his owner Philemon and with the leading apostle!

1. A PLEA, NOT A COMMAND (V. 8)

V. 8. Therefore introduces the application of Paul's prior words (vv. 4-7). Philemon's love, demonstrated to all the saints, should now include Onesimus. As an apostle Paul said he could be bold and order you to do what you ought to do, but he refrained. The word "bold" is parrēsian, rendered "courage" and "confidence" in Hebrews (3:6; 10:19, 35).

2. A PLEA FOR LOVE'S SAKE (V. 9)

V. 9. Paul's appeal was on the basis of love, probably Philemon's love (cf. vv. 5, 7). To receive back and forgive Onesimus would be a laudable expression of Philemon's love to both Onesimus and Paul. Further motivation for heeding Paul's plea was that Paul was both an old man and now also a prisoner of Christ Jesus (cf. v. 1). Being an "old man" (presbytēs) meant that Paul had authority (since older men in those days were considered wise and thus authoritative) and also that Paul's position as an imprisoned old man greatly restricted what he himself could do for Onesimus. Also, the reminder that Paul was imprisoned might appeal to Philemon's sympathy. Thus Onesimus' restitution depended on Philemon. Paul's calling himself an old man undoubtedly was in contrast to Onesimus rather than to Philemon.

3. A PLEA FOR A SPIRITUAL SON (VV. 10-11)

V. 10. The verb I appeal (parakalō) was repeated from verse 9, thus giving it special force. This plea was for Paul's son (tou emou teknou, lit., "my own child"), a term of endearment, which Paul used elsewhere only of Timothy and Titus (1 Tim. 1:2; 2 Tim. 1:2; Titus 1:4). Onesimus, having escaped from his owner, somehow met Paul in Rome. Led to the Savior by Paul, Onesimus became Paul's son while he was in chains. Since the slave was converted while Paul was in prison, their relationship was probably stronger. What an encounter it must have been between that slave and that prisoner! But the slave-prisoner relationship became spiritually a son-father relationship. Paul thought of himself as a father to those he won to the Lord (1 Cor. 4:15; cf. 1 Tim. 1:2; 2 Tim. 1:2). A special bond of Christian affection exists between a believer and the person God used to bring him to Christ.

In Greek, the word Onesimus is last in Philemon 10, evidently withheld deliberately in order to render Philemon's heart more tender.

V. 11. Onesimus, a common name for slaves, means "useful." But this slave, by running away, had become the opposite of his name. He was then of no use to his owner. The words but now suggest a change resulting from his new birth. He who was useless (achrēston) had become useful (euchrēston) both to you and to me. "St. Paul seems to say, 'He belied his name in days past; he will more than deserve it now' " (Alfred Barry, "The Epistle to Philemon," in Ellicott's Commentary on the Whole Bible, 4:273). Onesimus was then doubly useful, to Paul as well as Philemon. This clever play on words on the slave's name no doubt strengthened the force of the apostle's request.

4. A PLEA FROM THE HEART (V. 12)

V. 12. Paul passed the problem on to Philemon: I am sending him . . . back to you. Philemon would not have opportunity to think over Paul's request before seeing Onesimus. Instead, facing Onesimus, the slave owner would need to decide right then. Since this converted slave was, as Paul wrote, my very heart (splanchna, "emotions"; cf. vv. 7, 20), how could Philemon refuse his friend Paul? The apostle certainly knew the art of friendly persuasion! This verse suggests that Onesimus himself was the bearer of the letter.

5. A PLEA FROM A PARTNER (V. 17)

V. 17. Earlier Paul wrote that his appeal was "for" Onesimus (v. 10), and that Philemon could "have him back for good" (v. 15). But not until verse 17 did Paul explicitly state his request: welcome him.

Since Philemon considered Paul a partner, he certainly should welcome Onesimus as if he were welcoming Paul himself. The bond between the apostle and the slave owner was that kind of unity which draws fellow workers in the gospel to each other. "Partner" is koinōnon. This is from koinōnia ("fellowship or partnership"), which Paul used in verse 6. If Philemon rejected Onesimus, it would be like rejecting the apostle, his friend (v. 1), fellow worker (v. 1), brother (vv. 7, 20), and even partner (v. 17). Such would of course be unthinkable.

B. The relationship (vv. 13-16)

1. THE PRESENT BROTHERHOOD BETWEEN PAUL AND ONESIMUS (V. 13)

V. 13. Paul's estimate of this Christian slave placed the latter on equal footing with Philemon. If Onesimus were kept by Paul—which Paul would have liked — Onesimus would have served in place of (hyper) Philemon. Both were equally capable of helping Paul. And being in chains for the gospel, incarcerated because of his testimony for Christ (cf. "prisoner" in vv. 1, 9), Paul could have used some assistance. But duty erased his wish. Knowing that a slave was his master's property, Paul had no choice but to send him back.

2. THE PAST BROTHERHOOD BETWEEN PAUL AND PHILEMON (V. 14)

V. 14. Retaining a slave could be done only with the owner's consent. Though Paul probably could have talked Philemon into letting him keep Onesimus in Rome, he did not want to take undue advantage of their relationship. Paul preferred that such permission would be spontaneous (hekousion, "voluntary," used only here in the NT). No one knows whether Philemon freed Onesimus and sent him back to minister to Paul in Rome, but it is an interesting thought.

3. THE FUTURE BROTHERHOOD BETWEEN ONESIMUS AND PHILEMON (VV. 15-16)

V. 15. Philemon's temporary loss (for a little while is lit., "to an hour") of his slave resulted in his having him returned permanently. Some slaves were able to stay undetected in large cities or isolated areas, never to be returned to their owners. The words for good, which translate aiōnion (normally rendered "forever"), may mean either permanently in this life or forever in heaven.

V. 16. Paul also contrasted Onesimus' status as a slave with his new relationship to Philemon as a dear brother, thus placing all three men on the same level. Paul also called Onesimus "dear brother" in Colossians 4:9. The slave was dear to Paul but should be even more so to Philemon (cf. Phile. 11, "useful both to you and me"). For Philemon to take Onesimus back no longer as a slave but better than a slave may suggest emancipation (cf. v. 21). On the other hand some say that Philemon's receiving him as a man (lit., "in flesh") may point to a retaining of the master-slave relationship along with their new spiritual relationship in the Lord. Or these phrases may indicate just the opposite, with "as a man" referring to a person-to-person relationship, not a master-slave relationship.

(The commentary for v. 17 appears after that for v. 12.)

C. The pledge (vv. 18-21)

1. PHILEMON TO CHARGE ONESIMUS' DEBT TO PAUL (VV. 18-19A)

V. 18. Though Paul did not name Onesimus' offense, it probably involved a monetary loss for Philemon. Onesimus may have stolen some money or goods when he escaped from his owner, or the absence of Onesimus' services may have involved Philemon in financial loss. Paul did not castigate Onesimus for some crime; he simply wrote if he has wronged you or owes you anything.

Paul asked Philemon to charge (elloga, an accounting term) Onesimus' financial obligation to Paul. This generous act compares in a small way with Christ's substitutionary work on the cross. As Onesimus was in debt to Philemon, so sinners are in debt; they must pay for their sins against God. As Paul was not involved in any way with Onesimus' guilt, so Christ was sinless, separate from sinners (Heb. 4:15; 7:25). And as Paul assumed Onesimus' debt, so Christ took on Himself the sins of the world (Isa. 53:6; John 1:29; Heb. 7:27; 9:26, 28).

V. 19a. Paul stated that he was writing these words with [his] own hand (cf. Gal. 6:11), thus placing himself under legal obligation to carry out his commitment. His ability to pay it back may have come from the gifts sent to him from Philippi (cf. Phil. 4:14-19).

2. PHILEMON TO CONSIDER HIS OWN DEBT TO PAUL (V. 19B)

V. 19b. You owe me your very self hints that Philemon may have been won to the Lord by Paul, and was thus obligated to him spiritually. If so, this was further evidence that Onesimus and Philemon were on the same spiritual plane; they had both been led to the Savior by the apostle. Such a debt could in one sense cover Onesimus' obligations. And yet Paul chose not to dwell on that fact.

3. PHILEMON TO REFRESH PAUL (V. 20)

V. 20. Receiving and restoring Onesimus would give some benefit to Paul in the Lord (cf. "in the Lord," v. 16) and would refresh his heart in Christ. The words "some benefit" translate the Greek onaimēn, which is obviously related to the word "Onesimus." Paul was saying in effect, "Let me find in you, as I have found in him, a true Onesimus." "Refresh" (anapauson) and "heart" (splanchna) recall the words of verse 7. Philemon, who refreshed the hearts of other saints, could hardly refrain from doing the same for Paul.

4. PHILEMON TO GO BEYOND PAUL'S REQUEST (V. 21)

V. 21. Paul was sure that Philemon would heed his request. Obedience is stronger than Paul's other more tactful and less direct appeals. Paul was also confident that Philemon would do even more than he asked. What Paul had asked was that Onesimus be welcomed and forgiven. What could be "more than" that? Onesimus' freedom seems to be in mind (cf. v. 16, "no longer as a slave"). Or it may refer to Philemon's returning Onesimus to Paul; but had he not asked already for that, though subtly? (v. 13) If Onesimus were released, this shows an effect of Christianity on slavery through a recognition of true brotherhood in Christ.

III. The Conclusion of the Letter (vv. 22-25)

A. The comfort (v. 22)

V. 22. Paul then requested something for himself: Prepare a guest room for me, likely in Philemon's home. The prospect of a visit from the apostle would comfort Philemon but would also spur him to respond quickly to Paul's plea for Onesimus. The "guest room" points to Philemon's financial status. Like Paul, many Christian workers have been encouraged and assisted in their ministries by such provisions.

Paul knew that many were praying for his release (cf. Phil. 1:25-26). (How could Philemon pray for Paul's release and yet refuse to release Onesimus?) By using the plural you and your, Paul referred back to those mentioned in Philemon 1-2: Philemon, Apphia, Archippus, and all the believers with them.

B. The fraternal greetings (vv. 23-24)

Vv. 23-24. Those who sent greetings to Philemon (you in v. 23 is sing.) are five of the six people also mentioned in Colossians 4:10-14, though in a different order: Epaphras . . . Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, and Luke. In Colossians Paul also added "Jesus, who is called Justus." In Colossians 4:12-13 Paul highly commended Epaphras, who in Philemon 23 is called my fellow prisoner for Christ Jesus.

C. The benediction (v. 25)

V. 25. Paul concluded all 13 of his epistles with a one-sentence benediction similar to the one here: The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. "Your" is plural, pointing back to those addressed in verses 1-2. These believers were already enjoying the grace that brought them salvation, but here and in verse 3 Paul was concerned that they be encompassed with God's enabling grace for their daily walk before others. "Spirit" (cf. "your spirit" in the Gal. 6:18 and 2 Tim. 4:22 benedictions) refers to one's inner spiritual self. What a gracious way for Paul to conclude this touching intimate epistle.

HEBREWS

Zane C. Hodges

INTRODUCTION

The Epistle to the Hebrews is a rich part of the New Testament canon. In a unique fashion it exalts the person and work of the Lord Jesus Christ. In doing so, it makes immensely valuable contributions to the doctrines of His Incarnation, His substitutionary death, and His priesthood. Among the other truths to which the epistle effectively contributes are those involving the relationship between the New Covenant and the Old, the interpretation of the Old Testament, and the life of faith. The church would indeed be incalculably poorer without the teaching of this inspired book.

But despite its unquestioned value, little is known with certainty about its occasion, background, and authorship. Ignorance in these matters, however, does not seriously affect the understanding of the epistle's message. That remains timeless and relevant whatever the circumstances out of which it arose.

Date. In considering the background of Hebrews, it is reasonable to begin with the question of its date. This can be fixed within fairly good limits. The epistle can hardly be later than about A.D. 95 since it was known to Clement of Rome and quoted by him in 1 Clement. In addition it can scarcely be dated after A.D. 70, since there is no reference to the destruction of the Jewish temple in Jerusalem. Had this event already occurred, it would have given the author a definitive argument for the cessation of the Old Testament sacrificial system. Instead he seems to regard this system as still in operation (cf. 8:4, 13; 9:6-9; 10:1-3).

There is no need to regard 2:3 as a reference to second-generation Christians, and the epistle was obviously written during the lifetime of Timothy, whom the author knew (13:23). If the author is not Paul (and on the whole it seems likely he is not; see the following discussion on Authorship), then 13:23 may suggest he had already died. Otherwise, Timothy might have been expected to join Paul on his release from prison. On balance, a date somewhere around A.D. 68 or 69 seems most likely.

Authorship. Many names have been conjectured for the authorship of Hebrews, but the question remains unsolved. The tradition of Pauline authorship is very old and has never been decisively disproved. From the time of Pantaenus (died ca. A.D. 190) it was held in Alexandria that the epistle was in some sense Pauline. Clement of Alexandria thought Paul had written it originally in the Hebrew language and that Luke had translated it into Greek.

On the basis of style, Origen doubted the Pauline authorship but was not willing to set the tradition aside. In a famous statement he admitted that only God knew who had written the book.

The belief in the Pauline authorship of Hebrews belonged chiefly to the East until a later time. Jerome and Augustine seem to have been responsible for popularizing it in the West. In modern times it has usually been felt that the style and internal characteristics of Hebrews rule out Paul as the author. But arguments built on such considerations are notoriously subjective and have also been used to prove highly untenable propositions. Still it must be admitted that when Hebrews is read in Greek and compared with the known letters of Paul, the total impression is that here one meets a spiritual mind clearly attuned to Paul but in subtle ways quite different. This subjective impression, however, would not have prevailed if the early church's tradition had only mentioned Paul.

In fact the other name with early support is that of Paul's former missionary partner, Barnabas. This tradition appeared first in the West in Tertullian (ca. 160/170–215/220). In a polemical passage he quoted from Hebrews and assigned the quotation to an Epistle by Barnabas. Moreover, he did not talk as if this were his own opinion but simply a fact which his readers would know. The view that Barnabas wrote Hebrews was referred to at a later time by Jerome and reappeared in Gregory of Elvira and Filaster, both writers of the fourth century. There is reason to think that in the ancient catalog of canonical books found in the Western manuscript called Codex Claremontanus, the Book of Hebrews went under the name of the Epistle of Barnabas.

The evidence is not extensive, but the fact that it came from the West is perhaps significant. The only geographical reference in Hebrews is to Italy (13:24), and if the tradition about Barnabas is true it is not surprising that it comes from that part of the world. In other respects, Barnabas fits the requirements for authorship of this epistle. Since he was a Levite (Acts 4:36), an interest in the Levitical system, such as the author of Hebrews displayed, would be natural for him. Since he had close ties with Paul, resemblances in Hebrews to Paul's thought would be naturally explained. Moreover, Timothy had been converted in the area of Paul's first missionary journey (Acts 16:1-3) and was therefore most probably known to Barnabas. If Paul were dead at the time of the writing of Hebrews, it would not be surprising if Timothy were to join Paul's former companion (Heb. 13:23). The rift between Paul and Barnabas (Acts 15:37-39) had long since healed and Paul had later spoken warmly of Barnabas' cousin Mark (cf. Col. 4:10; 2 Tim. 4:11).

Of course authorship by Barnabas cannot be proved, any more than authorship by Paul can be disproved. But it has more to commend it than the other alternative suggestions. Among these it may be mentioned that at one time or another the names of Clement of Rome, Luke, Silvanus, Philip the Evangelist, Priscilla, and Apollos have been offered as possible authors. In particular the name of Apollos has found favor with some modern writers. The suggestion is often traced to Martin Luther. But the evidence is tenuous and does not include the early traditional support that the proposal Hebrews was written by Barnabas does. On balance this seems like the best conjecture. If Hebrews were actually authored by Barnabas, then it can claim apostolic origin since Barnabas was called an apostle (Acts 14:4, 14). In any case its divine authority is manifest.

Background and Setting. The identity of the first readers of Hebrews, like the author, is unknown. Nevertheless they were evidently part of a particular community. This appears from several considerations. The readers had a definite history and the writer referred to their "earlier days" (Heb. 10:32-34); he knew about their past and present generosity to other Christians (6:10); and he was able to be specific about their current spiritual condition (5:11-14). Moreover, the author had definite links with them and expressed his intention to visit them, perhaps with Timothy (13:19, 23). He also requested their prayers (13:18).

In all probability the readers were chiefly of Jewish background. Though this has sometimes been questioned, the contents of the epistle argue for it. Of course the ancient title "To the Hebrews" might be only a conjecture, but it is a natural one. When everything is said for a Gentile audience that can be said, the fact remains that the author's heavy stress on Jewish prototypes and his earnest polemic against the permanence of the Levitical system are best explained if the audience was largely Jewish and inclined to be swayed back to their old faith. The heavy and extensive appeal to the authority of the Old Testament Scriptures also was most suitable to readers who had been brought up on them.

As to the locale of which the readers were a part, nothing can be said definitely. The view that Apollos wrote the letter to the churches of the Lycus valley (where Colosse was situated), or to Corinth, is not independent of this view about authorship. The thesis that the readers were an enclave of Jewish Christians within the church at Rome has also found adherents. But apart from the reference to "those from Italy" (13:24), there is not much to suggest a Roman destination. On the view that Barnabas was the author, Cyprus has been proposed as a destination, since Barnabas was a Cypriot. But none of these proposals carries conviction.

The opinion that the epistle had a Palestinian destination has recently been strengthened by the observation that the polemic of the author may be best explained as directed against a sectarian form of Judaism such as that found at Qumran. Many of the alleged parallels are both interesting and impressive and will be mentioned in the following commentary. In particular the author's concern to show that the wilderness experience of ancient Israel was a time of unbelief and failure can be seen as especially pointed if directed at sectarians such as those at Qumran, who idealized the wilderness sojourn. Though not everyone is equally impressed by the data purporting to link Hebrews with sectarian thought, as far as it goes it adds support to a Palestinian location for the epistle's readership.

But there are problems with this view as well. For one thing, the reference to the readers receiving their knowledge of the Lord from those who originally heard Him (2:3) sounds a bit more natural for readers on a mission field. In Palestine, and especially Jerusalem, many of the readers might have heard Christ in person. In addition the reference to the readers' generosity to the poor (6:10) does not sound like Jerusalem at any rate, since poverty was prevalent there at a later time (cf. Acts 11:27-29; Gal. 2:10). If the statement of Hebrews 12:4 means that no martyrdoms had occurred in the community the writer is addressing, then a Palestinian or at least a Jerusalem locale is excluded. But the writer may only have meant that the people in his audience had not yet made such a sacrifice.

If Barnabas is the author of the epistle, one locale which might fit all the requirements is the ancient Libyan city of Cyrene in North Africa. Cyrene had been founded as a Greek colony around 630 B.C., but in the Roman period had a sizable and influential Jewish community. The origins of Christianity there seem to have been quite early, for the church at Antioch in Syria was founded by missionaries from Cyprus and Cyrene (Acts 11:20). The connection between Cyprus and Cyrene in that account is of interest because of Barnabas' Cypriot background. Two of the men with whom Barnabas later ministered in the Antioch church were "Simeon called Niger" and "Lucius of Cyrene" (Acts 13:1). Since Simeon's other name, Niger, means "black," he may have been from North Africa, as was his companion Lucius. Whether this Simeon was also the man called Simon who bore Jesus' cross (Luke 23:26) is unknown, but he too was from Cyrene. This latter Simon had two sons, Alexander and Rufus (Mark 15:21), who may have been known in the Roman church if that is where that Gospel was first published. In any case, contacts between Christians of the Libyan city of Cyrene and those at Rome and in Italy is most probable. This would explain the reference to Italians in Hebrews 13:24.

If the parallels with some kind of Jewish desert sectarianism are given weight, then the fact that Cyrene stood on the fringes of a wilderness where nomadism was a way of life may also be important. The author's references to the Greek word oikoumenē (trans. "world" in 1:6 and 2:5) would have special point in Cyrene. The word was commonly used to denote the Roman Empire and the limits of the Roman oikoumenē to the south were not far from Cyrene. Since it is unlikely that the impulse to withdraw from urban life and corrupted Jewish society existed only in Palestine, it would not be surprising if desert enclaves of sectarians existed also in the wilderness of Cyrenaica. That an ascetic Jewish sect had taken up residence on the shores of a lake near Alexandria in Egypt is known from Philo.

On the whole, the most plausible backdrop for the Epistle to the Hebrews might be a Christian church, largely Jewish in membership, in a city such as Cyrene. Under repeated pressures from their unbelieving fellow Jews they were tempted to give up their Christian profession and to return to their ancestral faith. If the form of this faith that allured them particularly was a sectarianism similar to that known at Qumran, then many of the author's appeals would have been especially pertinent, as the commentary will seek to show. The temptation to withdraw from civilized life into a kind of wilderness experience is precisely the kind of temptation the Epistle to the Hebrews would counter so well.

The destiny of the Lord Jesus is precisely to rule the oikoumenē (2:5) and those who adhere faithfully to Him will share in that rule (cf. 12:28). They must therefore hold fast to their Christian profession.

In the final analysis, however, the exact destination of the epistle is of as little importance as the identity of its author. Regardless of who wrote it, or where it was first sent, the Christian church has rightly regarded it down through the ages as a powerfully relevant message from God, who has definitively spoken in His Son.

V. Epilogue (chap. 13)

COMMENTARY

I. Prologue (1:1-4)

In a majestically constructed opening paragraph, the writer introduced his readers at once to the surpassing greatness of the Lord Jesus Christ. The Son, he declared, is the par excellence vehicle for divine revelation. In asserting this, he implicitly contrasted Him with the prophets of old and explicitly contrasted Him with the angels.

1:1-2a. The central assertion of the Prologue is made here. Though God has variously (polymerōs kai polytropōs, lit., "by various means and in various ways") revealed Himself in the past, Old Testament prophetic revelation has now received its end-times climax through God's Son. However highly the readership regarded that former revelation, the writer implied they must now listen most closely to the Son.

1:2b-4. In a series of subordinate constructions which are part of a single sentence in the Greek, the author set forth the Son's greatness. The unified structure of the writer's sentence is hidden by the NIV which breaks it down into several sentences. To begin with (v. 2b), the Son is the designated Heir of all things. This is obviously as it should be since He is also their Maker—the One through whom He made the universe (tous aiōnas, lit., "the ages," also rendered "the universe" in 11:3). The reference to the Son's heirship anticipates the thought of His future reign, of which the writer will say much.

But the One who is both Creator and Heir is also a perfect reflection of the God who has spoken in Him. Moreover His Word is so powerful that all He has made is sustained by that Word. And it is this Person who has provided purification for sins and taken His seat at the right hand of the Majesty in heaven (cf. 8:1; 10:12; 12:2). In doing so it is obvious He has attained an eminence far beyond anything the angels can claim.

As might easily be expected in the Prologue, the writer struck notes which will be crucial to the unfolding of his argument in the body of the epistle. He implied that God's revelation in the Son has a definitive quality which previous revelation lacked. Moreover the sacrifice for sins which such a One makes must necessarily be greater than other kinds of sacrifices. Finally the Son's greatness makes preoccupation with angelic dignities entirely unnecessary. Though the Prologue contains no warning—the writer reserved those for later—it carries with it an implicit admonition: This is God's supremely great Son; hear Him! (cf. 12:25-27)

II. Part I: God's King-Son (1:5–4:16)

The first major unit of the body of the epistle begins at this point and extends through the dramatic appeal of 4:14-16 for the readers to avail themselves of the resources available to them at "the throne of grace" (4:16). The emphasis of the whole unit is on the sonship of Jesus Christ which the writer viewed as a kingly sonship in accord with the Davidic Covenant.

A. The King-Son exalted (1:5-14)

Drawing heavily on the witness of Old Testament revelation, the writer demonstrated the uniqueness of the Son. The title of Son, and the prerogatives it entails, elevate Him above all comparison with the angels. Those who see in Hebrews ties with sectarian Judaism point to the highly developed angelology of the Dead Sea sect. These verses offer an effective rebuttal against any tendency to give excessive prominence to angels.

1:5. The two questions in this verse show that the name Son belongs to Messiah in a sense in which it never belonged to the angels. Obviously "Son" is the superior name which Jesus "has inherited" (v. 4). But it is clear that the special sense of this name, in its kingly ramifications, is what basically concerns the writer.

The quotation in verse 5a is drawn from Psalm 2:7, while the quotation in Hebrews 1:5b comes from either 2 Samuel 7:14 or 1 Chronicles 17:13. Psalm 2 is an enthronement psalm in which God "adopts" the Davidic King as His "Son." That this is what the writer to the Hebrews understood is confirmed in Hebrews 1:5a by the quotation from the Davidic Covenant. No doubt the "today" in the expression today I have become Your Father was understood by the author of Hebrews to refer to Messiah's sitting at the right hand of God (cf. v. 3).

Of course the Lord Jesus Christ has always been the eternal Son of God. In a collective sense, the angels are called "sons of God" in the Old Testament (Job 38:7, marg.), but the writer was thinking of the title Son in the sense of the Davidic Heir who is entitled to ask God for dominion over the whole earth (cf. Ps. 2:8). In this sense the title belongs uniquely to Jesus and not to the angels.

1:6. The prerogatives of the One who bears this superlative title are set forth beginning with this verse. Instead of the NIV's And again, when God brings

His Firstborn into the world, it would be preferable to translate, "and when He again brings the Firstborn into the world." The reference is to the Second Advent when the kingly prerogatives of the Son will be recognized with open angelic worship (cf. Ps. 97:7 where the LXX rendering "angels" correctly renders the text).

1:7-9. In a pair of contrasting quotations, the author juxtaposed the servanthood of the angels (v. 7) and the eternal dominion of the Son (vv. 8-9). It is possible that, in line with one strand of Jewish thought about angels (cf. 2 Esdras 8:21-22), the writer understood the statement of Psalm 104:4 (quoted in Heb. 1:7) as suggesting that angels often blended their mutable natures with winds or fire as they performed the tasks God gave them. But in contrast with this mutability, the Son's throne is eternal and immutable (v. 8).

The quotation found in verses 8-9 is derived from Psalm 45:6-7 which describes the final triumph of God's messianic King. The writer extended this citation further than the previous ones, no doubt because the statements of the psalmist served well to highlight truths on which the author of Hebrews desired to elaborate. The King the psalmist described had loved righteousness and hated wickedness. This points to the holiness and obedience of Christ while He was on earth, to which reference will be repeatedly made later (cf. Heb. 3:1-2; 5:7-8; 7:26; 9:14). And though this King thus deservedly enjoys a superlative joy, still He has companions in that joy. The reference to "companions" is likewise a significant theme for the writer. The same word metochoi ("companions or sharers") is employed in 3:1, 14 of Christians (it is also used in 12:8). Since the King has attained His joy and dominion through a life of steadfast righteousness, it might be concluded that His companions will share His experience by that same means. This inference will later become quite clear (cf. 12:28).

1:10-12. The immutability of the King-Son is further stressed by the statements now quoted from Psalm 102:25-27. A simple "and" (kai, disguised a bit by NIV's He also says) links the quotation in these verses with that in Hebrews 1:8-9. That the author construed the words of Psalm 102 as likewise addressed to the Son cannot be reasonably doubted. The Son, then, is Lord and has created both earth and the heavens (cf. Heb. 1:2). But even when the present creation wears out like an old garment and is exchanged for a new one, the Son will remain unchanged. The reference here of course is to the transformation of the heavens and earth which will occur after the Millennium and will introduce the eternal state (2 Peter 3:10-13). Yet even after those cataclysmic events the Son's years will never end. This certainly points to His personal eternality, but it is also likely that the word "years" stands for all that they contain for the Son, including an eternal throne and scepter as well as unending joy with His companions. The writer definitely taught that Messiah's kingdom would survive the final "shaking" of the creation (cf. Heb. 12:26-28).

1:13-14. The writer drew this section to a climax with a final Old Testament quotation, one which is crucial to the entire thought of the epistle. It is taken from Psalm 110 which the author later employed in his elaboration of the Melchizedek priesthood of the Lord Jesus. Here he cited verse 1 of the psalm to highlight the final victory of the Son over His enemies. If the Son is to have an eternal throne (Heb. 1:8), such a victory obviously awaits Him. But the victory is His and not the angels'. Their role, by contrast, is to serve those who will inherit salvation.

It should not be automatically assumed that "salvation" here refers to a believer's past experience of regeneration. On the contrary it is something future as both the context and the words "will inherit" suggest. As always, the writer of Hebrews must be understood to reflect the ethos of Old Testament thought, especially so here where a chain of references to it form the core of his argument. And it is particularly in the Psalms, from which he chiefly quoted in this chapter, that the term "salvation" has a well-defined sense. In the Psalms this term occurs repeatedly to describe the deliverance of God's people from the oppression of their enemies and their consequent enjoyment of God's blessings. In the Septuagint, the Greek Bible so familiar to the writer, the word "salvation" (sōtēria) was used in this sense in Psalms 3:2, 8; 18:2, 35, 46, 50; 35:3; 37:39; 71:15; 118:14-15, 21; 132:16; and elsewhere. This meaning is uniquely suitable here where the Son's own triumph over enemies has just been mentioned.

That the readers were under external pressure there is little reason to doubt. They had endured persecution in the past and were exhorted not to give up now (Heb. 10:32-36). Here the writer reminded them that the final victory over all enemies belongs to God's King and that the angels presently serve those who are destined to share in that victory, that is, to "inherit salvation."

B. The first warning (2:1-4)

The writer now paused in his exposition to address the readers with the first in a series of five urgent warnings. (The others are in chaps. 3–4; 5:11–6:20; 10:19-39; 12.) This one is the briefest and most restrained of all of them, but is nonetheless solemn.

2:1. The truth he had just enunciated has important implications. The therefore shows that this admonition arose directly from the preceding material. Since the Son is so supremely great and is destined for final triumph over His enemies, the readers would do well to pay more careful attention to these realities. The danger is that, if they would not, they might drift away (pararyōmen, a word that occurs only here in the NT). The writer's audience was marked by immaturity and spiritual sluggishness (cf. 5:11-12), and if this trait were not eliminated there was danger of their slipping away from what they had heard. The author may have had the Septuagint rendering of Proverbs 3:21 in mind, where the Greek translators used the word for "drift away" that is found here: "My son, do not slip away, but keep my counsel and intent."

2:2-4. Inasmuch as under the Old Covenant, which was instituted through angelic ministration (Gal. 3:19), there were severe penalties for infractions of its demands, the readers could not suppose there would be no penalties for infractions against the New Covenant. On the contrary, with tantalizing vagueness, the author asked, How shall we escape (cf. Heb. 12:25) if we ignore such a great salvation? If the readers lost sight of the ultimate victory and deliverance that was promised to them in connection with the Son's own final victory, they could expect retribution. What its nature might be the writer did not spell out, but it would be unwarranted to think he was talking about hell. The "we" which pervades the passage shows that the author included himself among those who needed to pay close attention to these truths.

The "salvation," of course, is the same as that just mentioned in 1:14 (see comments there) and alludes to the readers' potential share in the Son's triumphant dominion, in which He has "companions" (cf. 1:9). The Lord Jesus Himself, while on earth, spoke much of His future kingdom and the participation of His faithful followers in that reign (cf., e.g., Luke 12:31-32; 22:29-30). But this salvation experience, which was first announced by the Lord had also received confirmation through the various miracles and manifestations of the Spirit which His original auditors, those who heard Him, were empowered to exhibit. In speaking like this, the writer of Hebrews regarded these miracles as the powers of the coming Age (cf. Heb. 6:5) and, in harmony with the early Christians in the Book of Acts, saw them as expressions of the sovereignty of the One who had gone to sit at God's right hand (cf. "signs," "wonders," and/or "miracles" in Acts 2:43; 4:30; 5:12; 6:8; 8:6, 13; 14:3; 15:12; also cf. 2 Cor. 12:12). That the author was indeed thinking throughout of "the world to come" is made clear in Hebrews 2:5.

C. The King-Son as the perfected Captain (2:5-18)

The author here returned to his main train of thought, the destiny of Jesus in the world to come. But now Jesus' intimate involvement through His Incarnation with those who will share that destiny was brought to the fore.

1. THE DESTINY OF THE CAPTAIN (2:5-9)

2:5. It has been claimed that the Dead Sea Scrolls show that the sectarians of Qumran believed that the coming Age would be marked by the dominion of Michael and his angelic subordinates. The statement here by the writer of Hebrews forcefully refutes this view. Not . . . angels, but people, will be awarded this dominion in the world to come. That the author was not just now introducing this subject is made plain by the expression about which we are speaking. It is obvious that the first chapter, with its manifest stress on the kingship and future reign of the Son, was about this very subject.

2:6-8a. A portion of Psalm 8 was now quoted. While the psalm as a whole is often read as a general statement about the role of man in God's Creation, it is clear in the light of Hebrews 2:5 and the application that follows in verses 8b-9 that the author of Hebrews read it primarily as messianic and eschatological. In doing so he stood well within the New Testament perspective on the Old Testament, a perspective directly traceable to Jesus Himself (cf. Luke 24:25-27, 44-45).

2:8b-9. Whatever might have been the general appropriateness of Psalm 8 to man's current standing in the world, in the view of the writer those words do not now describe the actual state of affairs. Instead, he affirmed, at present we do not see everything subject to Him. He was thinking here primarily of Jesus (Heb. 2:9). No doubt the familiar messianic designation "Son of Man" (v. 6) contributed to this understanding. Thus, he asserted, while total dominion over the created order is not yet His, Jesus is at last seen as crowned with glory and honor because He suffered death. The One so crowned was made a little lower than the angels for the very purpose of dying, that is, that by the grace of God He might taste death for everyone. This last statement is best understood as the purpose of the Lord's being made lower than the angels in His Incarnation. The words beginning with "now crowned" and ending with "suffered death" are a parenthesis more easily read as such in the Greek text. The focus of the statement, despite its reference to Jesus' present glory, is on the fact that He became a man in order to die.

2. THE CAPTAIN'S LINK WITH HIS FOLLOWERS (2:10-18)

In this section the writer of Hebrews used, for the first time, the Greek word archēgos of Jesus (his other use of the word is in 12:2). The word suggests such concepts as "Leader," "Originator," and "Founder" and is almost equivalent in some respects to the English word "Pioneer." The familiar rendering "Captain" (KJV) seems a bit superior to "Author" (2:10). The Lord Jesus, the writer will try to show, is the Captain of that loyal band of people whom God is preparing for glory.

2:10. The author here continued to think of Psalm 8, as his reference to everything reveals (cf. Heb. 2:8). Thus the glory he mentioned here is also the glory referred to in the psalm, that is, the glory of dominion over the created order (cf. Heb. 2:7-8). Even the expression many sons is inspired by the psalmist's mention of "the Son of Man" and suggests that for the writer of Hebrews the messianic title Son of Man probably had a corporate aspect. Jesus is the Son of Man, and His brothers and sisters are the many people who are linked with Him in both suffering and future glory. They will be the King's "companions" who share His joy in the world to come (cf. 1:9).

In 2:9 the writer had mentioned Jesus' death for the first time. Now he affirmed that such suffering was appropriate for the One who was to serve as the Captain of the many sons. Before He could fittingly lead them to the salvation experience God had in mind for them (i.e., "to glory"), He must be made perfect for this role "through suffering." Since His brethren must suffer, so must He if He is to be the kind of Captain they need. By having done so, He can give them the help they require (cf. v. 18).

2:11-13. Accordingly there is a deep unity between the Son and the many sons. By His death He makes them holy, and those who are thus made holy are of the same family. That the writer thought of the sacrifice of Christ as making the many sons holy in a definitive and final way is clear from 10:10, 14 (see comments there). Thus as Psalm 22:22 (quoted in Heb. 2:12) predicts, Jesus can call them brothers. He can also speak to them of His own trust in God (v. 13a, quoting Isa. 8:17) and can regard them as the children God has given Me (Heb. 2:13b, quoting Isa. 8:18). Like an elder brother in the midst of a circle of younger children, the Captain of their salvation can teach them the lessons of faith along the pathway of suffering.

2:14-15. These children, however, were once held in servitude by their enemy, Satan. Since they were human, their Captain had to become human and die for them, in order to rescue them. But by doing so He was able to destroy . . . the devil. The author did not mean that Satan ceased to exist or to be active. Rather the word he used for "destroy" (katargēsē) indicates the annulment of his power over those whom Christ redeems. In speaking of the devil as wielding the power of death, the writer meant that Satan uses people's fear of death to enslave them to his will. Often people make wrong moral choices out of their intense desire for self-preservation. The readers were reminded that they were no longer subject to such slavery and that they could face death with the same confidence in God their Captain had.

2:16-18. Whatever their needs or trials, their Captain is adequate to help them since He ministers to Abraham's descendants, not angels. The expression "Abraham's descendants" (lit., "Abraham's seed") may point to the Jewishness of the writer's audience, but even Gentile Christians could claim to be the "seed of Abraham" in a spiritual sense (Gal. 3:29). The help which the Captain gives to these His followers is again predicated on the fact that He was made like His brothers in every way (Heb. 2:17), that is, both in terms of becoming incarnate and by virtue of suffering. Here for the first time the writer introduced the thought of His priesthood, which he elaborated on later. For now he was content to affirm that this identification with "His brothers" had made possible a priesthood characterized both by mercy and fidelity in service to God. This involved, as its basis, atonement for the sins of the people. Of this too the author said more later, but he chose to conclude the section on the profoundly hopeful thought that the Captain, in His role as Priest, is able to aid his readers who are being tempted (v. 18) out of the experience of temptation which His own sufferings entailed. Though the discussion of these themes is far from over, the author has already suggested that the Captain has indeed been made perfect for His role in leading them into participation in His future glory.

D. The second warning (chaps. 3–4)

The writer paused again in the course of his exposition to introduce the second warning section. This one is far more extensive and detailed than the brief one in 2:1-4. The real nature of his anxiety for his readers becomes clearer here, as well as the incalculable loss which they faced if they did not attend to his exhortation. The basic text for this section is Psalm 95:7-11 which he quoted (Heb. 3:7-11) and expounded in the remainder of chapter 3 and in 4:1-11. The section closes with a reminder of the judgmental power of God's Word (4:12-13) and with a call to seek the help available through the great High Priest (4:14-16).

1. THE CALL FOR FAITHFULNESS (3:1-6)

3:1. The readers were now addressed as holy brothers, who share in the heavenly calling. This form of address gathered up the strands of truth which the author dealt with in chapter 2. They were indeed "brothers" (cf. 3:12; 10:19), not only with one another but with their Captain (2:11-12), and they were "holy" because He had made them so (2:11). They did "share in the heavenly calling" because God was "bringing" them "to glory" (2:10). The words "who share" are rendered "companions" in 1:9 (metochoi; this Greek word is also used in this epistle in 3:14; 6:4; 12:8). The author was thinking especially of their high privilege of being invited to participate in the future dominion and joy of God's King-Son.

It was as such people that they were to focus their thinking on the One who is both the Apostle and High Priest of their Christian profession. The first of these titles probably points to the Lord Jesus as the One sent forth by God as the supreme Revealer of the Father (cf. 1:1-2), while the second picks up the role just mentioned in 2:17-18.

3:2. The NIV disjoins this verse from the previous one by making it a separate sentence. But connecting it as in the original with verse 1, the statement may read: "Contemplate Jesus . . . being faithful to the One who appointed Him." Taken in this way, the readers are urged to fix their gaze on the person of Christ who is even now faithful to God. Thus they would find a model for their own fidelity. The faithfulness of Christ, moreover, has an Old Testament prototype in Moses.

The reference to Moses being faithful in all God's house was drawn from Numbers 12:7 in which the tabernacle furnished the backdrop. Hence God's "house" in the Old Testament situation would be the tabernacle itself which Moses had constructed in strict obedience to the divine directions. It was a prophetic testimony "to what would be said in the future" (Heb. 3:5).

3:3-6a. But Jesus as a Builder excels Moses in honor since Moses was simply a servant carrying out instructions. But what Jesus has built is, in fact, everything, for God is the Builder of "everything." Implicit here is the Son's role in Creation (cf. 1:2, 10) and indeed His identification as God (cf. 1:8). But beyond this is the thought that God's house in which Moses was faithful was a kind of miniature representation of "everything," that is, of the greater house over which the Son presides at God's right hand in heaven (cf. 1:3 with 4:14). The "holy of holies" in His earthly house was but a shadow of heaven itself where Christ has now gone "to appear for us in God's presence" (9:24). Moses' fidelity consisted in erecting that shadow house, the tabernacle, so that it could properly prefigure the future order of priestly activity which now has the universe itself as its proper sphere. This is the sphere where the exalted Christ sits faithful in all His current ministrations as well as past ones, functioning as a Son over God's house (3:6a).

3:6b. By a natural semantic shift to which the Greek word for house naturally lends itself, the writer moved from the thought of the house as the sphere where priestly activities transpired to the thought of the "house" as consisting of the people who engaged in these activities. His readers, he affirmed, comprise His (the Son's) "house" contingent, however, on one important consideration: if they hold on to their courage (parrēsian, used four times in Heb., here and in 4:16; 10:19, 35) and the hope of which they boast. As in the earlier warning passage (2:1-4), the writer used "we" and thus included himself within the scope of his admonition. As he will shortly state (3:12), he was concerned that there might be in some of his Christian "brothers" an "unbelieving heart that turns away from the living God." Should any of his readers do this, they would forfeit their roles in the Son's priestly house, which is only maintained by holding firmly to their Christian profession (cf. also v. 14 and 10:23-25, 35-36). The author did not mean, of course, that his readers could forfeit their eternal salvation; it is an error to identify the word "house" with the body of Christ, the true universal church. As the context and the Old Testament background show, the author was thinking in priestly terms. He was also thinking functionally. The exalted Son presides over a priestly apparatus which is an operative reality. As long as the readership held firmly to their Christian commitment, they also functioned within this priestly arrangement. But just as one who was a true Levite by birth could withdraw from participation in the tabernacle of Moses' day, so too one who is truly a Christian by new birth may withdraw from his priestly role within the functioning household. It was precisely this danger which concerned the writer, in the present warning passage as well as in later ones.

2. THE ADMONISHMENT FROM ISRAEL'S FAILURE (3:7–4:11)

3:7-11. To drive home his call to fidelity and to warn of the consequences of unbelieving infidelity, the author referred to the classic failure of Israel at Kadesh Barnea which led to their 40-year detour in the wilderness. Far from being an ideal period of Israel's history, as some sectarians seem to have held, it was an era marked by tragic loss and defeat. The readers were not to repeat such an experience in their own lives.

The text chosen by the writer to enforce the lesson he had in mind was taken from Psalm 95. Verses 7-11 of that psalm are quoted here. The choice of this psalm is highly appropriate in a context that is concerned with worship and priestly activity. For Psalm 95 is, in fact, essentially a call to worship (cf. Ps. 95:1-7). The psalmists' invitation, "Come, let us bow down in worship, let us kneel before the Lord our Maker, for He is our God and we are the people of His pasture, the flock under His care" (Ps.

95:6-7), ideally reflects the author's perspective with regard to his readers. The material quoted in Hebrews immediately follows these words and, most naturally, must be understood against this background.

3:12-13. See to it, brothers introduces the author's application of his text to his Christian readership. Neither here nor anywhere else in his letter did the writer betray the slightest suspicion that his audience might contain people who were not real Christians. Instead, they were regarded as "brothers" (as here) or as "holy brothers, who share in the heavenly calling" (v. 1). The widespread view that he was concerned about mere professors of the faith as over against genuine believers is not found in the text.

Each Christian brother, therefore, should be most careful to guard against a sinful, unbelieving heart which God's flock in the wilderness displayed, the kind of heart that turns away from the living God. One preventative against such a tendency would be a spirit of mutual concern and admonition among the Christian brotherhood. Accordingly they were to encourage one another daily . . . so that none would be hardened by sin's deceitfulness (v. 13). This exhortation is still completely pertinent to any local congregation at the present time, where the hardening tendencies of sin can often be counteracted by truly concerned fellow Christians. The expression as long as it is called Today alludes to the "Today" in Psalm 95:7 and means something like "while you still have opportunity."

3:14. The statement, we have come to share in Christ might be more literally rendered, "we are partners with the Christ." The word "the" found in the original probably gives to "Christ" the sense of "the Messiah." In the word "partners" the reader meets again the Greek metochoi, used in 1:9 and 3:1 of the "companions" of the messianic King. Once again, the writer reverted to the supreme privilege of being among the "many sons" whom God is bringing to the glory of shared dominion over the created order which Christ is destined to rule. But again too, like the privilege of serving in the priestly house (v. 6), this role is contingent on continuing fidelity: if we hold firmly to the end the confidence we had at first. In this connection, Revelation 2:26-27 comes readily to mind: "To him who overcomes and does My will to the end, I will give authority over the nations—he will rule them with an iron scepter."

3:15. The renewed quotation of part of the writer's text in Psalm 95 connects with the caution just uttered in Hebrews 3:6. The readers must hold their confidence firmly to the end and not, like the Israelites of old, harden their hearts as . . . in the rebellion.

3:16-19. Having alluded again to the passage he wished to expound, the author then began doing so. The questions in verse 16 seem more naturally read as statements: "For some, when they had heard, did provoke; howbeit not all that came out of Egypt by Moses." The writer is aware of the notable exceptions of Joshua and Caleb, who did not take part in the general failure. But then he asked, With whom was God angry for 40 years? The answer is that He was angry with those in the wilderness congregation who sinned and who died in that wilderness. Their disobedience in refusing to enter the Promised Land caused God to swear that they would never enter His rest. This meant of course that the sinful generation in the desert was permanently excluded from taking possession of their inheritance in Canaan. Naturally it had nothing to do with the question of their going to hell, so it would be wrong to allege that the entire Exodus generation was unregenerate. But exclusion from Canaan was a consequence of their lack of faith in the power of God to bring them into it in victory over their enemies, a failure that in principle might be repeated by the readers of Hebrews if they forgot Messiah's ultimate triumph over His enemies and theirs (cf. 1:13-14). The writer wished his readers to take it to heart that unbelief, lack of confidence in God, was the reason God's people did not enter the land.

4:1. It follows from the tragic example of Israel that Christians should also take warning. This is true because the promise of entering His rest still stands. The NIV rendering of the last half of the verse is, let us be careful that none of you be found to have fallen short of it.

This is possible, but the word "found" cloaks a difficulty in the underlying text, involving a word which usually means "to seem" or "to suppose." Some modern writers (Montefiore, Héring) prefer the meaning, "let us be careful that none of you suppose that he has missed it." Since the following context seems dedicated to demonstrating that God's rest is still open, this understanding is probably preferable.

The writer's concept of "rest" must not be separated from its Old Testament roots. The Septuagint includes notable passages where the word for rest (katapausis), in connection with Israel's possession of the land, is clearly paralleled with the word for inheritance (klēronomia). Moses showed clearly (Deut. 3:18-20; 12:9-11) that for Israel their rest was their inheritance. In the same way it is natural to suppose that the term "rest" for the writer of Hebrews was a functional equivalent for a Christian's inheritance. That Christians are "heirs" he has already affirmed (Heb. 1:14) and will shortly do so again (6:12, 17; cf. 9:15). How exactly he understood their relationship to this inheritance will unfold as his argument proceeds. But the inheritance itself can hardly be divorced from his presentation of Messiah's kingdom and His "partners' " share in that. If this needed explicit confirmation, it could be found in 12:28.

If, as just suggested, the writer was concerned that none of his readers would think they had missed their "inheritance-rest," it is quite conceivable that he was confronting the problem of the delay in the Second Advent, which Paul himself had also already encountered at Thessalonica. The writer of Hebrews' later call to patience that the readers may "receive what He has promised" is followed by the assurance that "in just a very little while, 'He who is coming will come and will not delay' " (10:36-37). If this was God's concern, it was urgent to show that this promised "rest" is still available.

4:2. Here the writer said that the gospel was preached to us (lit., "we were evangelized" or "we were given good news"). But this good news does not always refer to the plan of salvation from sin. In some circles the word "gospel" has acquired a sense too technical and narrow to do justice to the writer's ideas here. What was preached to the Israelites of old was, quite clearly, God's offer of rest. This, of course, was "good news" for them just as it is for people now, but it is not exactly what is meant today by "gospel." The Greek verb used, euangelizomai, was fully capable of having a nontechnical sense in the New Testament (cf. its use in Luke 1:19; 1 Thes. 3:6), but naturally the writer here did not sharply distinguish the "good news" about rest, which his readers had heard, from the "good news" to which the term "gospel" is more usually applied (cf. 1 Cor. 15:1-4). But as the whole context shows, his concern was with the good news about a future rest for God's people (cf. Heb. 4:10), not with the fundamental facts Paul spoke of in 1 Corinthians 15.

As was already pointed out in reference to the Israelites, the message they heard (about rest) was of no value to them, because of their lack of faith (cf. Heb. 3:19). That is to say, through unbelief they failed to take advantage of God's offer of rest. So it follows that for the readers to profit from this invitation to rest, they had to exercise faith.

4:3. This is precisely what he then affirmed. The words hoi pisteusantes should be rendered "we who believe" rather than we who have believed. The writer's concern was not about their original faith in the past, but their perseverance in it (cf. 3:6, 14). Faith remains the prerequisite for entrance into rest, since it was to those who failed to exercise faith that God declared by oath they would not enter into His rest. This exclusion was definitive despite the fact that this rest had been established as far back as Creation itself.

4:4-5. With considerable enrichment of thought, the author then linked God's Sabbath-rest at the time of Creation with the rest that the Israelites missed in the desert. God rested when He finished His creative activity and this kind of experience has, ever since, lain open to people who also finish the work that is set before them (cf. v. 10). When, as with the nation in the wilderness, a task is left unfinished, of such it must be said, They shall never enter My rest.

4:6-7. But the failure of the Israelites did not nullify the truth that some will enter that rest, and accordingly God renewed the offer (in Ps. 95) as late as the time of David. At that time God again set a certain day, calling it Today, thus presenting this opportunity to all readers of the psalm for whom the "Today" becomes their own "Today." Already the writer had applied that "Today" to his readers (cf. Heb. 3:14-15).

4:8-10. But the readers were not to suppose that the promise of rest was realized in Joshua's day. Here the author showed himself perfectly aware that the Old Testament might have been quoted to show that the rest had already been entered via the conquest of the land in Joshua's time (cf. Josh. 22:4; 23:1). Probably it had been so quoted to his audience. But the writer's rebuttal was simple and sufficient: if this had been so, God would not have spoken later about another day. The psalm which forms his text disproves the notion that the rest had already been entered and was no longer open.

Behind this argument lies the undeniable fact that the conquest in Joshua's day did not lead to a permanent possession of the land. Such permanent possession of their promised inheritance had become for Judaism an expectation which would only be realized in Messiah's kingdom. This at least was true in normative Judaism, whatever might have been true in some sectarian thought. It may be suspected that here the author confronted some form of "realized eschatology" which denied the futurity of such a hope. (Cf. the similar view of believers' resurrection which Paul resisted, 2 Tim. 2:17-18.) If so, the Hebrews author regarded Psalm 95 as silencing such a distorted perspective. The rest—the messianic partnership—did indeed lie ahead: There remains, then, a Sabbath-rest for the people of God.

But it must now be said clearly that entering into God's rest means resting from one's own work just as God did from His. The statement is both a reassurance and an admonition. On the one hand it follows up the writer's conclusion (Heb. 4:9) that there is such a rest to be entered. But on the other, it reminds the readers that this is only done by their getting to the end of their task just as did God in His creative activity. In the phrase "rests from His own work," the author employed a kind of word play since the verb for "rest" also signifies "cease" which, against the backdrop of God's own work, clearly suggests successful completion. This thrust is what the writer has had in mind from the beginning of the section. The readers need to model their lives after Jesus Christ who "was faithful to the One who appointed Him" (3:2) and must be careful to "hold firmly till the end the confidence we had at first" (3:14; cf. 3:6). Only thus would they be able to rest from their works in the joyful possession of their inheritance in the messianic kingdom.

4:11. It follows logically from this that the readers should, along with the author (note, Let us), make every effort to enter that rest. Unlike the assurance which all Christians have that they possess eternal life and will be raised up to enjoy it in the presence of God (cf. John 6:39-40), the share of the companions of Messiah in His dominion over creation is attained by doing His will to the end (Rev. 2:26-27). The readers must therefore be warned by Israel's failure in the desert and take care that they not follow Israel's example of disobedience.

3. GOD'S WORD AND THE THRONE OF GRACE (4:12-16)

Having completed his exposition of Psalm 95 and Israel's failure to enter rest, the writer brought this section of warning to a conclusion that is both sobering and comforting. God's Word is a solemn instrument of divine judgment, but His throne is both gracious and merciful.

4:12. The lesson he had just taught from the Old Testament Scriptures was not a mere historical tale. Instead, as had already been made clear by much he had said, it was powerfully relevant to his audience. For the Word of God is living (zōn) and active (energēs). Not only that, its penetrating power is greater than any double-edged sword and reaches the innermost being of a person so that it judges the thoughts and attitudes of the heart. In doing this, it is able to discriminate successfully between what is spiritual in man and what is merely "soulish" or natural (it penetrates even to dividing soul and spirit), and does so even when these often-contradictory inner elements are interwoven as closely as joints and marrow. The inner life of a Christian is often a strange mixture of motivations both genuinely spiritual and completely human. It takes a supernaturally discerning agent such as the Word of God to sort these out and to expose what is of the flesh. The readers might think that they were contemplating certain steps out of purely spiritual motivations when, as God's Word could show them, they were acting unfaithfully as did Israel of old.

4:13. Let them not suppose, therefore, that their motives would go undetected for nothing is hidden from God's sight. Instead, everything is uncovered and laid bare before . . . Him. In saying this, the readers were reminded that, like all Christians, they would someday stand before the judgment seat of Christ where they must give account to God for their lives (cf. Rom. 14:10-12; 2 Cor. 5:10). If at that time their lives are seen to be marked by the kind of failure they have been warned against, the writer implied they will suffer loss of reward (cf. 1 Cor. 3:11-15). In this context the loss they suffer will be that of their inheritance-rest.

4:14. But this need not be so. On the contrary there is every reason to hold firmly to the faith we profess in view of the fact that the believers' great High Priest . . . has gone through the heavens. Only once previously (2:1–3:6) had the writer referred explicitly to the priesthood of Jesus, though it was implicit in 1:3, but now he was preparing to undertake an extensive consideration of that truth. But before doing so, he wished to suggest its practical relevance to his readers whom he exhorted to "hold firmly to the faith." They had to know that the priesthood of their Lord offered them all the resources they needed.

4:15. The One who served as High Priest on their behalf had been where they were and had been tempted in every way, just as they were. Though unlike them He was without sin (cf. 7:26; 2 Cor. 5:21; 1 John 3:5), never responding wrongly to any of His temptations (nor could He, being God), yet as a man He could feel their reality (much as an immovable boulder can bear the brunt of a raging sea) and thus He is able to sympathize (sympathēsai, lit., "to feel or suffer with") with their and our weaknesses. It may indeed be argued, and has been, that only One who fully resists temptation can know the extent of its force. Thus the sinless One has a greater capacity for compassion than any sinner could have for a fellow sinner.

4:16. With such a High Priest, it follows that believers should approach the throne of grace with confidence (parrēsias; cf. 3:6; 10:19, 35). In a book filled with lovely and captivating turns of expression, few excel the memorable phrase "throne of grace." Such a conception of the presence of God into which beleaguered Christians may come at any time, suggests both the sovereignty of the One they approach (since they come to a "throne") and His benevolence. At a point of contact with God like this Christians can fully expect to receive mercy and find grace to help . . . in . . . time of need.

III. Part II: God's Priest-Son (chaps. 5–10)

In the first major movement of the epistle (1:5–4:16), the author set forth two major truths: (1) the exalted position and destiny of Him who is uniquely God's King-Son and (2) the salvation-inheritance of those who cleave to Him by faith. Included in the consideration of these themes have been solemn warnings not to neglect or forfeit the inheritance that His exalted station makes so attainable. The Son's future kingship has been at the center of all this discussion.

At the same time, it has been made clear that the King-Son is also a High Priest. The importance of this reality has already been briefly pointed out. Now, however, the Son's priestly role would be considered in detail. In doing so the writer as usual interspersed sections of exposition with passages of exhortation and warning.

A. Introduction: the qualified Priest (5:1-10)

Before enlarging on the ramifications of the priesthood of Christ, the writer took the logical step of showing Christ's qualifications for that role. Though His priesthood has already been assumed, its validity must now be asserted if the admonitions based on it are to carry full weight.

1. THE GENERAL REQUIREMENTS FOR A HIGH PRIEST (5:1-4)

5:1. If it be asked what a high priest really is, the answer is easily drawn from the Old Testament institution with which the readers were familiar. Such a person is one of mankind's own number: he is selected from among men and he is also their representative in matters related to God. These "matters" include the offering of both gifts (dōra) and sacrifices (thysias) for sins (cf. 8:3; 9:9).

5:2-3. The high priest must also be a man of compassion as the word metriopathein, which underlies the phrase deal gently, implies. This is the capacity to moderate one's feelings to avoid the extremes of cold indifference and uncontrolled sadness. For an ordinary high priest of the Old Testament, this sympathy grew out of an awareness that he himself was subject to weakness, prone to failures of his own. Hence in his sacrificial activities he must make the necessary offerings for his own and the peoples' sins. In this respect alone, as the author will show later (cf. 7:27), Christ did not exactly correspond to the characteristics described here, since He "was without sin" (4:15). But it is also possible that the writer thought of the compassion of the Son-Priest as being far richer than the moderate gentleness he ascribed to other high priests.

5:4. But one thing is certain. The high-priestly office was a divine appointment and could not simply be entered because one aspired to that honor. Just as Aaron was, this High Priest must also be called by God.

2. THE SON'S CALL TO PRIESTHOOD (5:5-10)

5:5-6. No one is to suppose, the author insisted, that Christ began His priestly functions without the appropriate call from God. On the contrary, the same One who declared Christ to be the King-Son, declared Him also to be a Priest forever, in the order of Melchizedek. In uniting as the author did here the text of Psalm 2:7, which he had quoted before (Heb. 1:5), and the text of Psalm 110:4, he skillfully joined the two great truths about the Messiah which lie at the heart of this epistle. The declaration of Psalm 2 had proclaimed Him the Davidic Heir whose destiny was to rule the nations (cf. Ps. 2:8). But Psalm 110 had also been earlier quoted to much the same effect (cf. Heb. 1:13). Now, however, a further statement of this latter psalm was cited to show that the future Conqueror is also a Priest of a special order. In this way the author united in the person of Christ the dual offices of Priest and King. In doing so the author was perhaps conscious of countering a sectarian position like that evidently current at Qumran, where both a lay, or kingly, Messiah and a priestly Messiah seem to have been anticipated. In any case the two quotations given here from Psalms 2:7 and 110:4 furnish the concentrated essence of the author's thought about the Lord Jesus Christ. It is likely enough that the writer assigned the proclamations of both psalms to the moment when the Son "sat down at the right hand of the Majesty in heaven" (Heb. 1:3).

5:7. But also in other respects Jesus is qualified for His priesthood. If it is a question of offerings (cf. v. 1), it can be pointed out that when Jesus was on earth He offered up prayers and petitions. In the expression "offered up" the writer employed the same verb (prospherō) he had used in verse 1. The added description, with loud cries and tears to the One who could save Him from death, has often been thought to refer to the experience of Gethsemane. But the Greek here seems to reflect the Septuagint rendering of Psalm 22:24. Since that psalm is messianic for this author (cf. Heb. 2:12), it is probable that he actually has the sufferings of the Cross in mind, as does the psalm. This would be appropriate since the cries of the Savior would then be linked directly with His sacrificial work.

That these "cries and tears" were accepted by God is evidenced by the observation, He was heard because of His reverent submission (eulabeias). To this also Psalm 22 bears reference in that its latter half are the words of One who has emerged from suffering in triumph and praises God for that (cf. Ps. 22:22-31). In fact the psalm's first note of triumph has already been quoted (i.e., Ps. 22:22 in Heb. 2:12). Thus the "reverent" Sufferer was indeed saved from death, and this by means of rising from the dead. Hence too the Resurrection furnishes the decisive proof of God's acceptance of Jesus' sacrificial activity.

5:8-10. The whole experience just referred to was a form of education for Jesus before He served His suffering people. His unique relation to God notwithstanding (He was a Son), He had to experience the true meaning of obedience in terms of the suffering it entailed. Having done so, He was thereby made perfect for the role He would play as His people's Captain and High Priest. That there is an element of mystery in all this need not be denied, but it is no greater than that found in Luke's words: "Jesus grew in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and men" (Luke 2:52). In a real sense not fully comprehensible, the Incarnation gave the already infinitely wise and perfect Son of God the experiential acquisition of knowledge about the human condition. Suffering thus became a reality that He tasted and from it He can sympathize deeply with His followers. (The Gr. has an interesting play on words in the verbs He learned [emathen] and He suffered [epathen].)

This is what the writer had in mind when he affirmed that He became the Source (aitios) of eternal salvation for all who obey Him. The salvation here referred to cannot be distinguished from that which is termed an inheritance (Heb. 1:14). It is also to be identified with the "eternal inheritance" mentioned in 9:15. It should not be confused with the acquisition of eternal life which is conditioned not on obedience but on faith (cf. John 3:16, etc.). Once again the writer had in mind final deliverance from and victory over all enemies and the consequent enjoyment of the "glory" of the many sons and daughters. This kind of salvation is explicitly contingent on obedience and indeed on an obedience modeled after that of Jesus who also suffered. It is thus closely related to the saying of the Lord in which He declared, "If anyone would come after Me, he must deny himself and take up his cross and follow Me. For whoever wants to save his life will lose it, but whoever loses his life for Me and for the gospel will save it" (Mark 8:34-35).

The High Priest has become the "Source" of this kind of salvation experience for those who are willing to live obediently. In describing Him this way, the author was chiefly thinking of all the resources that flow from Christ's priestly activities that make a Christian's life of obedience possible. Whatever one's suffering, the High Priest understands it, sympathizes, and makes available the "mercy" and "grace" which are needed to endure it successfully. As the writer will later say, "He is able to save completely those who come to God through Him, because He always lives to intercede for them" (Heb. 7:25). With precisely this end in view Christ was designated by God to be High Priest in the order of Melchizedek.

B. The third warning (5:11–6:20)

The author had barely begun his consideration of the topic of the Melchizedek priesthood of Christ. But he felt constrained to pause for another warning section before proceeding further. This was due to the immaturity and sluggishness of his audience which made him wonder how much exposition they could digest. No doubt he hoped to arouse them to greater attentiveness to the truth he wished to unfold. But at the same time he wanted them to face squarely the danger of remaining where they were, since this could lead to tragic retrogression.

1. THE PROBLEM OF IMMATURITY (5:11-14)

5:11-12. We have much to say about this, he began, referring to the subject of Jesus' Melchizedek priesthood. As it turned out, his subsequent discussion was indeed lengthy (7:1–10:18) as well as deep. Accordingly he anticipated that it would be hard to explain because his readers were slow to learn. They had been Christians a long time, he reminded them, so that by this time they ought to be teachers. Others who had been in the faith less time than they should be profiting from their instruction. Instead they needed someone to instruct them again in the basics.

In alluding to the elementary truths the writer employed an expression which could refer to the letters of the alphabet as they might be learned by a school child. "You seem to need your ABCs reviewed," his rebuke suggested, but at the same time he had no intention of going over them (6:1). What he apparently had mainly in view was their wavering state of mind in regard to the error that sought to lure them away from the faith. If they were being urged, whether by sectarians or others, to abandon their Christian profession, then clearly this called into question the fundamental truths they should have been firm in. The result was, to all appearances, you need milk, not solid food! But what he would shortly offer them would be solid food indeed, by which he evidently hoped to pull them dramatically forward in their Christian experience.

5:13-14. It is unsatisfactory to remain a baby in spiritual matters. This is true because a spiritual infant, living on milk . . . is not acquainted with the teaching about righteousness. The words "not acquainted" (apeiros) might be better rendered "inexperienced." It is not so much that a spiritual "infant" lacks information—though at first he obviously does—but rather that he has not yet learned to put "the teaching about righteousness" to effective use. He lacks the skill which goes with maturity and which results in the ability to make appropriate moral choices. Such ability is exactly what is possessed by those who . . . have trained themselves to distinguish good from evil. That kind of person can handle solid food.

Once more the writer betrayed his concern about his readers' ability to reject the false ideas which confronted them. Had they been sufficiently mature they would be able to "distinguish" those ideas as "evil" over against the truths they should have known were "good." But he feared that this capability was not yet really theirs, though he would make every effort to instill it in them.

2. THE SOLUTION TO THE PROBLEM (6:1-3)

6:1-2. Somewhat surprisingly, despite his estimate of their spiritual state, the author declined to go over old ground. Instead he urged them to go beyond the elementary teachings about Christ and go on to maturity. To have reviewed the fundamentals would only have left them where they were. The author preferred "radical surgery" and decided to pull them forward as rapidly as he could. Indeed this was the solution to their problem. If they progressed properly, they would avoid the danger of laying again the foundation of repentance. If, as verses 4-6 went on to warn, they were to "fall away," then a foundation would have been laid for a new repentance, but such a repentance is "impossible" (cf. vv. 4, 6). So advance was their only real remedy.

Acts that lead to death literally means "dead works," which expression occurs again in a context where it seems to refer to the Levitical ritual (9:14). Here it would be appropriate in the same sense since many of the readers had been converted to Christianity from Judaism. The rituals they had left behind were lifeless ones, incapable of imparting the experiences of life they had found in Christ. The author implied that they should not return to these dead works in any form since to do so would be to lay again a basis for repenting from them—though such repentance would not be easily reached, however appropriate it might be.

But the foundation they would lay in the unhappy event that they fell away would involve other fundamental truths. These are enumerated in the words, and of faith in God, instruction about baptisms, the laying on of hands, the resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment. The author clearly implied that all these matters belong to the "elementary truths" (5:12) on which the readers gave every indication of wavering. It is likely that each of them was a point at issue in one way or another in the readers' confrontation with those of other persuasions. The return to ordinances, whether in normative or sectarian Judaism, would only be a return to "dead works." One who took that backward step would need to be taught all over again that acceptance was obtained by "faith in God," not by rituals.

Moreover the significance of the various "baptisms" which Christianity knew (John's baptism, Christian baptism proper, or even Spirit baptism) would have to be relearned as well as the basic facts about "laying on of hands." In alluding to matters like these, the writer may have been consciously countering sectarian teachings which may well have offered initiations of their own involving "baptisms" and "laying on of hands." If the sectarians or others, in addition to offering their own initiatory rites, likewise denied the normal Christian eschatological expectations (cf. comments on 4:1, 8-10), then the fundamental doctrines of "the resurrection of the dead and eternal judgment" would also have been at issue. To abandon their Christian profession and "fall away" (6:6) would be to abandon all these doctrines. Whatever the readers had previously learned, they would be giving up. In this sense the foundation would have been laid for relearning them all over again, though the writer held out little hope in his subsequent statements for such a process to take place.

6:3. What he wanted them to do was to press forward. But he was perfectly aware that this required more than his effort to challenge his readers to make progress. God must help and He alone could help them achieve these goals. The writer had said, "Let us . . . go on to maturity" (v. 1), but in a spirit of dependence on divine aid he then added, and God permitting, we will do so.

3. THE ALTERNATIVE TO PROGRESS (6:4-8)

In an extremely solemn pronouncement, the author then set forth the tragic alternative to the progress he desired his readers to make. If they did not advance, they would retreat. Should anyone so retreat, his situation would be grim indeed.

6:4-6. This passage has been interpreted in four ways: (1) that the danger of a Christian losing his salvation is described, a view rejected because of biblical assurances that salvation is a work of God which cannot be reversed; (2) that the warning is against mere profession of faith short of salvation, or tasting but not really partaking of salvation (The New Scofield Reference Bible, p. 1315); (3) that hypothetically if a Christian could lose his salvation, there is no provision for repentance (The Ryrie Study Bible, p. 1843); (4) that a warning is given of the danger of a Christian moving from a position of true faith and life to the extent of becoming disqualified for further service (1 Cor. 9:27) and for inheriting millennial glory. The latter is the interpretation adopted here. The entirety of these verses constitutes a single sentence in Greek as well as in the English of the NIV. The central assertion is: It is impossible for those who have . . . to be brought back to repentance. Following the words "those who" is a description of the persons whom the writer affirmed cannot possibly be brought back to a state of repentance. The description he gave shows that he had Christians in mind.

To begin with, he described them as individuals who have once been enlightened. This is a natural way to refer to the conversion experience (cf. 2 Cor. 4:3-6). The writer's only other use of the verb "enlightened," is Hebrews 10:32, where the reference to true Christian experience can hardly be doubted. In also calling them people who have tasted the heavenly gift, he again employed familiar concepts related to initial conversion (cf. John 4:10; Rom. 6:23; James 1:17-18). The effort to evade this conclusion by seeing in the word "tasted" something less than full participation fails—in view of the writer's own use of this word (Heb. 2:9)—to describe Jesus' experience of death. One might also compare 1 Peter 2:3, which quotes Psalm 34:8.

The description is continued with the words who have shared in the Holy Spirit. The underlying Greek employs again the word metochoi, used in Hebrews 1:9 of the "companions" of the messianic King, and in 3:1, 14 of the Christian readers (and is also used in 12:8). The preceding expression evidently led the author to think about those who had received the gift of the Spirit as a result of their conversions. Finally, there are also those who have tasted the goodness of the Word of God and the powers of the coming Age. Here the thought naturally applies to converts whose instruction in "the Word of God" had given them a genuine experience of its "goodness" and who likewise had known the reality of miracles. The word rendered "powers" (dynameis) in NIV is the usual one in the New Testament for "miracles" and is an apparent allusion back to the experience mentioned in 2:4. In every way the language fits true Christians with remarkable ease. The effort to see here mere professors of the faith as over against true converts is somewhat forced.

There follows, however, the grim expression if they fall away. But the translation does not do full justice to the original language, where there is no hint of a conditional element. The Greek word parapesontas is in fact a part of the construction to which the preceding descriptive phrases belong. Thus a more accurate translation would be: "It is impossible for those who have once been enlightened, who have tasted . . . who have shared . . . who have tasted . . . and who have fallen away, to be brought back to repentance." Far from treating the question in any hypothetical way, the writer's language sounds as if he knew of such cases.

Naturally the words "fall away" cannot refer to the loss of eternal life which, as the Gospel of John makes perfectly clear, is the inalienable possession of those who trust Christ for it. But the writer evidently has in mind defection from the faith, that is, apostasy, withdrawal from their Christian profession (cf. Heb. 3:6, 14; 10:23-25, 35-39). The assertion that such a failure is not possible for a regenerate person is a theological proposition which is not supported by the New Testament. Paul knew the dangers of false doctrine to a Christian's faith and spoke of a certain Hymenaeus and Philetus who said "that the resurrection has already taken place, and they destroy the faith of some" (2 Tim. 2:17-18). The author of Hebrews was a solid realist who took assaults against the faith of his readers with great seriousness. And he warned that those who succumb, that is, "fall away," after all of the great spiritual privileges they had experienced, could not be brought back to repentance.

The reason is expressed in the words because to their loss they are crucifying the Son of God all over again and subjecting Him to public disgrace. The words "to their loss" might be better rendered "with respect to themselves." Those who renounce their Christian faith are, with respect to their own conduct and attitude, taking a step that amounts to a fresh public rejection of Christ. When they first trusted Him, they thereby acknowledged that His crucifixion had been unjust and the result of man's sinful rejection of the Savior. But by renouncing this opinion, they reaffirmed the view of Jesus' enemies that He deserved to die on a cross. In this sense, "they [were] crucifying the Son of God all over again." Since the original Crucifixion was especially the work of the Jewish nation, if the readers were Jews being lured back into some form of their ancestral religion, the writer's words made a particular point. Their apostasy would be like stepping back over the line again and once more expressing solidarity with their compatriots who wanted Jesus put on the cross. That this was most serious was precisely the writer's point. Such persons could not be won back to the state of repentance which marked their original conversion to Christianity. In affirming this, the author's words suggested a deep hardening of their hearts against all efforts to win them back, not to Christian conversion, but to Christian commitment.

6:7-8. An illustration from nature now drives home the writer's point. Whenever rain-soaked ground is properly productive, it receives the blessing of God. Here the writer compared the spiritual privileges he had just enumerated (vv. 4-5) to a heavenly rain descending on the life of a Christian. Their effect should be a crop useful to those for whom it is farmed—a reference perhaps to the way other Christians benefit from the lives of fruitful believers (cf. v. 10). Such productivity brings divine blessings on fruitful believers' lives.

But suppose the land that has received this "rain" is unproductive? Though the NIV introduces the word land for a second time in verse 8, the original text seems to relate the statement directly to the "land" mentioned in verse 7. A clearer rendering would be: "But when (or, if) it produces thorns and thistles. . . ." The point is that when a plot of ground that has been rained on is productive, God blesses it. But if it only produces thorns and thistles, it is worthless (adokimos, "disapproved"; cf. 1 Cor. 9:27) and is in danger of being cursed. In the end it will be burned. The metaphor recalls God's original curse on the ground (Gen. 3:17-19) and suggests that an unproductive Christian life ultimately ("in the end") falls under the severe condemnation of God and is subject to His blazing wrath and judgment (cf. Heb. 10:27).

Naturally the reference to "burned" has caused many to think of hell, but there is nothing in the text to suggest this. God's anger against His failing people in the Old Testament is often likened to the burning of fire (cf., e.g., Isa. 9:18-19; 10:17). Even this writer could say, with intense metaphorical effect, "Our God is a consuming fire" (Heb. 12:29). In fact, to think of hell here is to betray inattention to the imagery employed by the author. The burning of a field to destroy the rank growth it had produced was a practice known in ancient times. Its aim was not the destruction of the field itself (which, of course, the fire could not effect), but the destruction of the unwanted produce of the field. Thereafter the field might be serviceable for cultivation.

By choosing this kind of metaphor, the author showed that he did not totally despair of those who took the backward step he was warning against. To be sure, at least prior to severe divine judgment, all efforts to recall such people to Christian faith are futile (6:4-6), but it cannot be said that the impossibility applies in an absolute sense to God Himself. What the author probably meant is that nothing can deter apostates from the fiery retribution toward which they are headed, but once their "land" has been burned it is another matter. Paul believed that those who "have shipwrecked their faith" could profit by the retributive experiences to which they were exposed as a result (1 Tim. 1:19-20). But of course the writer of Hebrews was reticent about the issue of subsequent restoration. That some might not respond to the chastisement was perhaps in mind, but he was mainly concerned about warning against the course of action which leads to such calamitous divine judgment. Nevertheless his deft choice of this agricultural image serves to disclose that the "burning" is both temporary and essentially hopeful.

4. THE CONCLUDING ENCOURAGEMENT (6:9-20)

The author knew that his words were both heavy and solemn, though not to the same degree that subsequent exposition has often made them. He felt that a word of encouragement was then in order. This pattern—stern warning followed by warm encouragement—has already appeared in the previous warning section (3:1–4:16) which concluded in a distinctly positive manner (4:14-16). Similarly the writer drew his warning section here to a conclusion that is alive with hope.

6:9. The author did not want his readers to believe that he had despaired of them. Instead he was convinced of better things in your case. The words are like those of a pastor who, after warning his congregation of a dangerous course of action, might say: "But I am sure you people would never do that!" The words are not a theological proposition, as they are sometimes wrongly taken, but an expression of hope. The "better things" about which he had confidence were the things that accompany salvation. The "salvation" referred to should be understood in congruity with its meaning in 1:14. It is that experience of victory and glory which the persevering companions of the King inherit. It is also the inheritance-rest which the persevering are allowed to enter. The writer insisted here that he had every expectation that the readers would persevere to the end and acquire these blessings, even though he felt constrained to warn them against a contrary course.

6:10. The author knew that God is not unjust. His readers would not be forsaken. God would remember their work and the love they had shown Him in their helping other believers. The author's words were a skilled touch on the hearts of his fellow Christians. In speaking of them, he reminded his readers of what they had done for their fellow Christians and were still doing. He thus encouraged them to keep it up while assuring them that God was conscious of all their aid and available to help them in any needed way.

6:11-12. If they would only diligently hold onto the good course they already were pursuing—and of which God was fully mindful—they would thus guarantee the hope which is duly awarded to those who so persevere. He added, We do not want you to become lazy. The word "lazy" (nōthroi) is the same word rendered "slow" in 5:11 in the phrase "slow to learn." The sluggishness which marked their immaturity was to be shrugged off. (The Gr. of this verse can mean, "We do not want you to be lazy" rather than "become lazy.") Their real goal should be the inheritance that is set before them. They were to be imitators of those who through faith and patience inherit God's promises.

6:13-15. If the readers were searching for models to "imitate," there was the case of Abraham who received an oath from God, the promise that assured the multiplication of his seed. In due time his patience was rewarded in that he (lit.) "received the promise." Since the reference is to the promise given in Genesis 22:17 after the offering of Isaac, the author may have been thinking of the reception of the promise itself as the reward. In that case the idea is that after Abraham had patiently endured (the test involving Isaac), he obtained the promise. Waiting patiently translates the participle makrothymēsas, related to the noun "patience," makrothymias in Hebrews 6:12. This word, common in the New Testament, refers to the ability to hold one's feelings in restraint without retaliation against others (cf., e.g., Col. 1:11; 3:12; James 5:7-8, 10). A synonym, hypomonē, "endurance, perseverance," means the ability to remain steadfast in the face of undesirable circumstances; cf. Col. 1:11; Heb. 12:1-3, 7; James 5:11).

6:16-18. At this point Abraham is left behind as a model and the oath made to him is treated as for the benefit of Christians generally. That the promise of Genesis 22:18 had messianic aspects is clear from these words: "Through your offspring all nations on earth will be blessed." Then the author of Hebrews affirmed that the messianic hope which the promise entailed was sure, not only to Abraham, but also to the Christian heirs of what was promised. As in human affairs an oath puts an end to all arguments, so too there can be no argument about this expectation since God confirmed it with an oath. If anyone, such as a sectarian, denied this eschatological anticipation, he was flying in the face of the strongest possible divine guarantee. Not only was it impossible for God to lie, but His ever truthful Word was supported in this case by His oath. These are the two unchangeable things, which encourage those who take hold of the hope.

6:19-20. The image suggested in verse 18 by the words "fled to take hold" of hope was that of a fortified refuge. By a swift change in his figure, the writer then suggested the thought of a harbor where the soul may securely drop anchor. That anchor has been carried to the safest point of all—the inner sanctuary behind the curtain—by Jesus, who went before us. The Greek prodromos ("who went before us") suggests a "forerunner," and if the harbor imagery is still in mind it recalls the role of sailors who leave their ship in a smaller craft in order to carry the anchor forward to a place where it can be firmly lodged. So too the Lord Jesus, by His entrance into the heavenly sanctuary where He functions as a High Priest forever, has given to a Christian's hope an anchorage from which it cannot be shaken loose. Since, therefore, the readers' hope was sure, they could cling to it tenaciously right to the very end.

C. The greater Priest and His greater ministry (7:1–10:18)

Here begins the longest single expository passage in the epistle. Its very length suggests its importance. Its theme is the core theme of Hebrews. The real resource of the readership, in the midst of their pressures, is the high priesthood of Christ. They must realize the greatness of that priesthood, its superiority to the Levitical institutions, and the perfect access they have to it on the basis of Christ's death.

1. THE SUPERIOR PRIEST (CHAP. 7)

The writer returned to the theme he had introduced in 5:1-10, but which he doubted his readers would comprehend (cf. 5:11). In the conclusion of his most recent warning (5:11–6:20) he had renewed the subject of the Melchizedek priesthood (6:19-20). The exposition of that theme is now given.

a. The greatness of Melchizedek (7:1-10)

7:1-3. To begin with, the writer set forth the personal greatness of the Old Testament figure Melchizedek. As a fit prototype for Christ Himself, Melchizedek was both a king and a priest. He both blessed . . . Abraham and received his tithes. Melchizedek's name and title suggest the messianic attributes of righteousness and peace. So far as the Old Testament record is concerned, he was without father or mother, without genealogy, without beginning of days or end of life. In saying this, the author is often taken to mean that the silence of the inspired record presents Melchizedek as typologically like the Son of God. But though this is possibly true, the statements do not sound like it, particularly the assertion that Melchizedek remains a priest forever. The word "forever" translates a phrase (eis to diēnekes) that occurs only in Hebrews (here and in 10:12, 14) and means "continuously" or "uninterruptedly."

It seems more natural that the author meant that Melchizedek belonged to an order in which there was no end to the priesthood of those engaged in it. (He later said in 7:8 that Melchizedek "is declared to be living.") If this is correct, Melchizedek may have been an angelic being who reigned for a time at Salem (i.e., Jerusalem). If so, the statement that he was "without beginning of days" would not mean that he was eternal, but simply that he had a pretemporal origin. Nor would this concept of Melchizedek as an angel elevate him to the same level as God's Son, since the author painstakingly asserted the Son's superiority to the angels (1:5-14). There is indeed evidence that, at Qumran, Melchizedek was regarded as an angelic personage. If this is the case in Hebrews, then the Son of God is the High Priest in an order in which Melchizedek is simply a priest.

7:4-10. The personal superiority of Melchizedek over the patriarch Abraham is guaranteed by the fact that Abraham gave him a 10th of the plunder. And though Melchizedek had no connections with the Levitical order, still he both received this tithe from Abraham and blessed him. This act of blessing reinforced his superiority to the patriarch. Moreover, he was evidently superior to the Levites as well, who collected tithes but were nonetheless subject to death. By contrast the tithe collected from Abraham was collected by him who is declared to be living. Furthermore, in a sense Levi paid the tithe through Abraham because . . . Levi was still in the body of his ancestor. The original expression, rendered one might even say, probably means something like "so to speak." The writer knew that Levi did not literally pay tithes to Melchizedek, but on the principle that an ancestor is greater than his descendants, Abraham's act affirmed Melchizedek's superiority even to the Levitical priests themselves. Melchizedek thus has a greatness which the Old Testament record clearly attests.

b. The new priesthood supersedes the old (7:11-19)

Having established Melchizedek's greatness both personally and in comparison with Abraham and Levi, the writer was ready for a new point. This superiority was needed, since the Law was superseded. The inadequacy of the legal and Levitical systems had to be replaced by something better.

7:11-12. In the simplest manner, the author argued for the imperfection of the Levitical priesthood on the basis of God's promise (recorded in Ps. 110:4) that a new Priest would arise belonging to an order other than Aaron's. Since there was a change of the priesthood, it follows that the whole legal system on which the Levitical institutions were predicated also had to be changed. Here the writer virtually affirmed the Pauline truth that "you are not under Law" (Rom. 6:14), though he approached it from a different angle.

7:13-14. Levitical priesthood was superseded by the fact that our Lord descended from Judah. That tribe had no role in the Levitical institutions, and the things God had said about the new Priest applied to One from Judah, which is proof that a change was made.

7:15-19. A further proof (and what we have said is even more clear) is found in the consideration that the new Priest has an indestructible (akatalytou) life. Psalm 110:4 was here quoted again to show that such an unending life is an inherent part of the order of Melchizedek. (The author probably had this text in mind when he made the statement about Melchizedek in Heb. 7:8.) Thus the new Priest does not hold His office on the basis of a regulation as to His ancestry. This rendering freely translates the original which is more nearly represented by the words "not after the Law of a carnal commandment." The writer seems to mean that the Law which regulated the priestly institution and succession was "carnal" or "fleshly," not in the sense of being evil, but in the sense that it pertained to people of flesh who died. But this former regulation has been replaced because of its inherent weakness and uselessness. What has replaced it is the new priesthood which constitutes a better hope . . . by which we draw near to God. Thus the writer established the point that the Law which made nothing perfect was replaced by a priestly institution which can accomplish its objectives in those who approach God through it.

c. The superiority of the new Priest (7:20-28)

If, as the author has shown, Melchizedek was greater than Levi (vv. 4-10) and the new priesthood necessarily abrogates the old (vv. 11-19), then the new Priest has to be greater than the Levitical priests.

7:20-22. The priesthood of Christ differs dramatically from the Levitical priesthood in that it was instituted with an oath. By contrast, the descendants of Aaron assumed their jobs without any oath. The writer then quoted again the divine oath of Psalm 110:4 whose very solemnity argues for the superiority of the new Priest, who was majestically inducted into His role. Moreover, because of this oath, Jesus became the guarantee (engyos, used only here in the NT) of a better covenant. In His own person, Jesus assured the superiority of the new order over the old because His oath secured His permanent installation in the priestly office.

7:23-25. No Old Testament priest ever functioned in this permanent way, since all were subject to death. But the permanent priesthood of Jesus gives Him the capacity to carry His saving work to completion. When the writer asserted that He is able to save completely, he continued to have in mind the salvation-inheritance first referred to in 1:14. The readers were to hold fast to their professions of faith and to continue numbering themselves among those who come to God through Him, knowing that He can see them through every trial and difficulty right to the end of the road because He always lives to intercede for them. In saying this, the author reverted again to a truth he had already enunciated (4:14-16) where he had invited the readers to avail themselves boldly of the mercy and grace accessible to them through Jesus' priesthood. As they did so, they would find that their Captain and High Priest could get the job done! He could lead them victoriously into the glory of the many sons. In this way He saves "completely."

7:26-28. After all, He is the kind of High Priest who meets our need. His character is utterly without blemish and He has been exalted above the heavens. Consequently too, He had no need like the Levitical priests to offer sacrifices day after day, first for His own sins, and then for the sins of the people. At first sight verses 27-28 seem to refer to the ritual of the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16), but that was yearly, not "day after day." Probably these verses telescope that ritual with the regular sacrificial routine. There seems to be some evidence from Jewish tradition that a high priest was thought to offer daily sacrifice, and the stipulations of Leviticus 6:12-13 may refer to him.

In any case the new Priest had no need either for sacrifices for Himself or for repeated sacrifices for others. His one act of self-offering was definitive and sufficient. Of this more will be said in Hebrews 9 and 10. Here the author was content to conclude that, in contrast with the Levitical priests, the Son is a perfected High Priest. The reference to the fact that He has been made perfect forever recalls 5:8-10. The sufferings of the Son, here referred to as His sacrificial offering of Himself once for all (ephapax, cf. 9:12; 10:10; also cf. hapax, "once" in 9:26, 28), are what have constituted Him "perfect" for His role in God's presence where He intercedes for His followers. Thus the Law appointed as high priests those who were weak, but the oath, which came after the Law, appointed this kind of Priest. Accordingly the readers could go to Him at all times, fully confident of His capacity to serve their every need.

2. THE SUPERIOR SERVICE (8:1–10:18)

In chapter 7, the writer had considered the superiority of the new priesthood. It follows that such a priesthood must have a superior priestly ministry. That it does is unfolded in this section of the epistle. In the process, the letter reveals that the New Covenant underlies this newer priestly service.

a. Introduction to the superior service (8:1-6)

8:1-2. The author of Hebrews opened this passage with a clear transitional statement: the point of what we are saying is this. He wished to summarize what he had been teaching and go on to new ideas. By referring to the Lord Jesus as a High Priest who sat down at the right hand . . . of the Majesty in heaven, he picked up the wording of 1:3 (cf. 10:12; 12:2). What he meant by this truth is reasonably clear but will be elaborated further in what follows. In the expression who serves in the sanctuary, the true tabernacle, he touched on ideas already implicit in his foregoing instruction, yet used new terms to describe them. The idea of service (leitourgos, a "minister" in the priestly sense) is in reality the new theme. The "true tabernacle" is the heavenly sphere where that service takes place.

8:3-6. Here is an initial, preliminary elaboration of the new theme. Since the role of a priest involved gifts (dōra) and sacrifices (thysias; cf. 5:1; 9:9), it follows that this new High Priest should have something to offer. Nevertheless His service cannot be an earthly one since the Levitical ritual of sacrifice continued. (These words imply that the Jewish temple was still standing.) But the sanctuary used for that is a mere copy (hypodeigmati; cf. 9:23-24) and shadow (skia; cf. 10:1) of the heavenly one in which the new Priest ministers. Its status as a "shadow sanctuary" was secured when Moses erected the tabernacle (prototype of the temple) under strict divine direction (8:5). But Jesus' ministry surpasses that of the Levitical priests just as the covenant He mediates supersedes theirs. (The word Mediator is used of Jesus by the author three times—8:6; 9:15; 12:24.) The word ministry (leitourgia, cf. "serves," 8:2) again strikes the pivotal note, but it is now added that the superiority of the new priestly service is related to a superior covenant, which in turn is founded on better promises. Both the covenant and its promises will now be considered.

b. The superior covenant (8:7–9:15)

8:7. That there is a promise of a New Covenant the writer will shortly prove by quoting Jeremiah 31:31-34. By doing so, he argued that such a promise demonstrates the inadequacy of the old one.

8:8-12. The promise of a New Covenant was made, the writer pointed out, in a passage where God found fault with the people. The Old Covenant failed because of the sinfulness of the nation, for which it had no remedy. The New Covenant, however, has such a remedy.

In the passage quoted, there is first the prediction that a New Covenant will be made (v. 8) followed by a strong declaration that it will differ from the previous one (v. 9). Then follows (vv. 10-12) a description of the superior accomplishments, or enablements, of the promised covenant. These are: (1) an inner inclination to obey (God will put His laws in their minds and write them on their hearts), (2) a firm relationship with God (I will be their God, and they will be My people), (3) the knowledge of God (they will all know Me), and (4) the forgiveness of sins (I will forgive their wickedness and will remember their sins no more). These are the "better promises" alluded to in verse 6.

It is clear that all these benefits belong, in fact, to all the regenerate of every age since the Cross. Though the New Covenant is specifically focused on Israel (cf. house of Israel and "house of Judah" in Jer. 31:31), it is clear that Christians of the present time also stand under its blessings (cf. Luke 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25; 2 Cor. 3:6). This perception does not lead to an inappropriate confusion between Israel and the church. The New Covenant is God's appointed vehicle for fulfilling the Abrahamic blessings to Israel. But the Abrahamic Covenant also promised universal blessing, so the New Covenant becomes as well God's vehicle of salvation for believers since the Cross. To say this is not to say anything more than Jesus did when He declared that "salvation is from the Jews" (John 4:22). In no way should this impede the perception of the Christian church as a unique, interadvent body, closely united to Christ as His bride and significantly distinct from the nation of Israel. But inasmuch as all salvation is through the Cross of Christ, it is also through the blood of the New Covenant.

8:13. From the Old Testament prophecy he had just quoted, the writer then drew the justifiable conclusion that the Old Covenant was obsolete (palaioumenon) and aging and would soon disappear. The ceremonies still being conducted under it (cf. vv. 4-5) were spiritually anachronistic and the author's words suggest that he recalled the prophecy of Jesus that the temple in Jerusalem would be destroyed (Matt. 24:1-2). Probably this prophecy was fulfilled soon after Hebrews was written. If so, it was a dramatic confirmation of the writer's thesis about the Old Covenant.

9:1-5. With regard to the "aging" First Covenant, the writer wished to discuss that covenant's regulations for worship and its earthly sanctuary. These he highlighted in order to contrast them with the superior features of the New-Covenant ministry. How "earthly" (kosmikon, v. 1), or mundane, that first sanctuary was, he emphasized by reviewing the material objects associated with it. All these had typological value, but the author could not discuss these things in detail at the time (v. 5). He confined himself to the chief features of the comparison he wished to make.

9:6-10. The "regulations for worship" mentioned in verse 1 were now dealt with so that they underlined the insufficiency of the Old-Covenant service. Whereas the outer room of the tabernacle could be entered regularly by the officiating priests, it was only on the Day of Atonement (cf. Lev. 16) that the high priest entered the inner room (i.e., the "holy of holies") and then only with sacrificial blood, which he offered for himself and for the sins the people had committed in ignorance. This restricted access clearly demonstrated that a true entrance into God's presence (symbolized by the most holy place) had not yet been disclosed. That at least was the message the Holy Spirit intended to communicate by this arrangement. The Levitical arrangements were designed to convey the idea that the true way to God did not lie in them. What this indicates for the present time is that the Old-Covenant sacrificial system did not meet human need at its deepest level. It could not clear the conscience of the worshiper. Hence the regulations which formed part of the observant worshiper's adherence to this system were chiefly concerned with externals which were only meant to apply until the time of the new order.

The words of Hebrews 9:10 probably refer to sectarians for whom food laws and ceremonial washings retained great importance. The readers must remember the transitory nature of these things under the "aging" covenant and should not return to them.

9:11-12. The author then brought the discussion which began in 8:7 to a fitting conclusion. He had shown that the Old Testament anticipated a better New Covenant (8:7-13) and that the ritual of the Old Covenant, carried on in an "earthly sanctuary," pointed to its own inadequacy (9:1-10). Now he set forth the superiority of Christ's service as Mediator of the New Covenant (vv. 11-15).

The NIV rendering of verse 11 is questionable. It is not likely the writer meant to say that Christ . . . went through the greater and more perfect tabernacle, since this cannot be distinguished from "the most holy place" which He entered according to verse 12. It is probably better to take the original word translated "through" (dia) and connect it with came as High Priest of the good things that are already here (or, per most Gr. mss., "the good things which were to come"). In that case, instead of "through" the word can be translated "in connection with" and the total statement expresses the idea that Christ's high-priesthood is linked with "the greater and more perfect tabernacle" rather than the "earthly" one previously described (vv. 1-5).

When Christ entered the most holy place once for all by His own blood (v. 12; cf. Christ's blood in v. 14; 10:19, 29; 13:20) rather than by animal blood, He likewise demonstrated the superiority of His service because His blood had obtained eternal redemption. Thus the value of His sacrifice is immeasurably greater than the animal offerings of the Levitical arrangements. A perfect ransom price had been paid for human "redemption," and because it need not be paid again (this sacrificial act was "once for all," ephapax; cf. 7:27; 10:10) that redemption is an "eternal" one.

9:13-14. This "eternal redemption" through which the blessings of the New Covenant (cf. 8:10-12) have reached all believers, should affect the way believers serve God. Old-Covenant rituals served for the ceremonially unclean and only made them outwardly clean. But the blood of Christ can do much more. His was a sacrifice of infinite value because through the eternal Spirit He offered Himself unblemished to God. With this lovely assertion, the writer of Hebrews involved all three Persons of the Godhead in the sacrifice of Christ, which magnifies the greatness of His redemptive offering. "Unblemished" (amōmon) fittingly describes Christ's perfection (cf. 4:15; 7:26) for it is also used of spotless animals brought for sacrifice.

Such a great accomplishment ought to cleanse our consciences from acts that lead to death, but the expression "acts that lead to death" is literally "dead works" which in this context seems to refer to the Levitical rituals that, in contrast with the work of Christ, can never impart spiritual life. As also in 6:1, where such "acts that lead to death" are referred to, the writer wished his readers would give up all thoughts of returning to Old-Covenant rituals. Their consciences ought to be perfectly free from any need to engage in such things and, retaining their confidence in the perfect efficacy of the Cross, they should hold fast their profession and serve the living God within the New-Covenant arrangements.

9:15. To do so is to retain the hope of an eternal inheritance (cf. "eternal redemption" in v. 12 and "the eternal Spirit" in v. 14) which has been promised to recipients of New-Covenant life. Christ is the Mediator (cf. 8:6; 12:24) of that covenant, and the "inheritance" is available to those who are called since the death of the Mediator has freed them from all guilt derived from the sins committed under the First Covenant.

The author was here perhaps countering the appeal of the sectarians, or others, to the "guilt feelings" of those Jewish Christians who must often have been charged with deserting their ancestral faith. But the blood of Christ ought to quiet their consciences permanently and lead them to pursue the "eternal inheritance" which the New-Covenant relationship brought them. Of course the writer meant here as elsewhere that it is only "through faith and patience" that his readers could "inherit what has been promised" (6:12); but if they would rest their consciences at the Cross, they could pursue this heirship undistractedly.

c. The superior sacrifice (9:16-28)

The author has made it clear that Christ's death has instituted a better covenant (vv. 11-15) which is superior to animal offerings (vv. 12-14). But the need for such a sacrifice has yet to be explored. So a key word in this subunit is "necessary" (anankē, vv. 16, 23). In the process of exploring this point, the author clearly underscored the measureless superiority of the sacrificial death of Christ.

9:16-17. In opening the new unit of thought, the writer employed a swift semantic shift in which he treated the Greek word for "covenant" (diathēkē) in the sense of a will. While "covenants" and "wills" are not in all respects identical, the author meant that in the last analysis the New Covenant is really a testamentary disposition. Like human wills, all the arrangements are secured by the testator and its beneficiaries need only accept its terms.

Treating the New Covenant in this way, the author argued that its force—like that of all human wills—depends on the death of the one who made it. That is when it takes effect.

9:18-21. The Old Covenant was also put into effect with blood. Drawing on material that may have partly been derived from traditions known to the writer but not specified in the Old Testament, he described the inauguration of the Old Covenant through ceremonies involving the sprinkling of sacrificial blood.

9:22. This verse applies to the Old-Covenant institutions, and the words nearly everything leave room for the flour offering which a poor Israelite might bring for his sin (Lev. 5:11-13). But the writer was thinking of the system as a whole and the ritual of the Day of Atonement that pertained to the totality of the nation's sins, which showed that without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness. These words also constitute a principle that is true in the New Covenant.

9:23. In connection with the New Covenant, the writer then enunciated his basic principle: the death of Christ was necessary. Mere copies (hypodeigmata; cf. 8:5; 9:24) of the heavenly things might be adequately hallowed by animal sacrifices, but the heavenly things themselves required more than that. The expression "heavenly things" referred quite generally to the new priestly arrangements, which have heaven as their focal point. These arrangements involve dealing with people's sin and must thus be inaugurated with a sacrifice adequate to "do away" with that sin (cf. v. 26). The death of Christ meets this requirement.

9:24-26. Christ was appointed as High Priest of the New Covenant to represent sinful people in heaven itself, that is, in the presence of God. So His sacrifice had to be greater than that which allowed entrance into a mere man-made sanctuary that was only a copy (antitypa) of the true one. Nor could Christ offer repeated sacrifices as in the Levitical institution, for that would have required Him to die many times since the Creation of the world. Instead, as is obvious, the heavenly ministry of Christ called for a thoroughly sufficient, one-time sacrifice. This is precisely why He appeared once for all (hapax, cf. v. 28; also cf. ephapax in 7:27; 9:12; 10:10) at the end of the ages to do away with sin, which the priests in the old arrangement could not do. By the phrase "end of the ages" the writer evidently meant the climax of the Old Testament eras as well as the imminency of the climax of all things. He will shortly refer to Christ's second advent.

9:27-28. With this observation, eschatological realities come into focus. Humans are sinful creatures destined to die once, and after that to face judgment. But this danger is turned aside by the fact that Christ was sacrificed once (hapax, cf. v. 26) to take away the sins of many people. The recurrence of "once" (9:26, 28) and of "once for all" (7:27; 9:12; 10:10) stresses the finality and the singleness of Christ's sacrificial work in contrast with the repeated Levite ministrations. In addition, the "once"-sacrifice of Christ (vv. 26, 28) compares with the "once"-death of each person (v. 27). Now those who are waiting (apekdechomenois; used seven times in the NT of the return of Christ: Rom. 8:19, 23, 25; 1 Cor. 1:7; Gal. 5:5; Phil. 3:20; Heb. 9:28) for Him can look forward to His coming, not with a fearful expectation of judgment, but with the anticipation of salvation.

His first advent was to bear sins away—but His second will be not to bear sin (lit., "without [reference to] sins").

Deftly the author implied that "those who are waiting for Him" constitute a smaller circle than those whom His death has benefited. They are, as all his previous exhortations reveal, the ones who "hold firmly till the end the confidence we had at first" (3:14). The "salvation" He will bring them at His second coming will be the "eternal inheritance" of which they are heirs (cf. 9:15; 1:14).

d. The superior effect of the new priesthood (10:1-18)

This is the final subsection of the expository unit that began at 7:1. In chapter 7 the author argued for the superiority of Christ, as a Priest after the order of Melchizedek, over the Levitical priests. In 8:1–10:18 he argued the superiority of Christ's priestly ministry which is based on a superior covenant (8:7–9:15) and entailed a superior sacrifice (9:16-28). Now he argued that the superior sacrifice perfects the New-Covenant worshiper.

10:1. By virtue of its anticipatory character, the Law could never . . . make perfect those who draw near to worship. By "make perfect" the writer did not mean sinless perfection. As the following discussion shows, he was concerned with that definitive removal of guilt which makes free access to God possible for worshipers who trust in the sufficiency of the Cross.

10:2-4. The continous sacrifices of the old order which are "repeated endlessly year after year" (v. 1) testify to the Law's incapacity to "perfect" its worshipers. Far from enabling them to achieve a standing before God in which they would no longer have felt guilty for their sins, the yearly rituals (of the Day of Atonement) served as a kind of annual reminder of sins, since animal blood has no power to take away sins.

10:5-7. It was precisely for this reason that an Old Testament prophecy (Ps. 40:6-8) recorded the words of the One who would do what God really wanted. This psalm prophetically anticipated some of Christ's words at his First Advent. The phrase a body You prepared for Me is one Septuagint rendering of the Hebrew expression "You have dug ears for Me." The Greek translator whose version the author of Hebrews used (obviously translating with the help of the Holy Spirit), construed the Hebrew text as a kind of figure of speech (technically called synecdoche) in which a part is put for the whole. If God is to "dig out ears" He must "prepare a body." This interpretation is both valid and correct as its quotation in Hebrews proves. In the "body" which He assumed in Incarnation, Christ could say that He had come to achieve what the Old-Covenant sacrifices never achieved, the perfecting of New-Covenant worshipers. In this sense He did God's will.

10:8-10. The writer then expounded the text he had just quoted. In the words He sets aside the first to establish the second (v. 9), the author referred to the setting aside of the Old-Covenant sacrifices which did not ultimately satisfy God. What was established was God's will, and it was by that will that we have been made holy through the sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ once for all (ephapax; cf. 7:27; 9:12).

The words rendered "made holy" involve a single Greek word (hēgiasmenoi) often rendered "sanctify" (cf. 10:14, 29). Here it occurs in a tense that makes it plain, along with the rest of the statement, that the sanctification is an accomplished fact. Nowhere in Hebrews does the writer refer to the "progressive sanctification" of a believer's life. Instead sanctification is for him a functional equivalent of the Pauline concept of justification. By the sanctification which is accomplished through the death of Christ, New-Covenant worshipers are perfected for guilt-free service to God (cf. 2:11).

10:11-14. The truth just stated is reinforced by a contrast with the Levitical priesthood. Levite priests could never sit down on the job since their sacrificial services were never completed. But Christ's sitting at the right hand of God (cf. 1:3; 8:1; 12:2) is both a signal that His sacrifice was offered for all time and also that He can now confidently await final victory over His enemies. The words "for all time" (eis to diēnekes) are translated "forever" in verse 14 (see comments on 7:3). Thus by a single sacrifice (one sacrifice, 10:12, 14)—in contrast with the many sacrifices offered by the priests day after day and again and again . . . He has made perfect forever those who are being made holy. The translation "are being made holy" sounds like a continuing process. But this ignores the force of the expression "made holy" in verse 10. A better rendering is, "them who are sanctified" (tous hagiazomenous; cf. v. 29). "The sanctified" have a status in God's presence that is "perfect" (cf. 11:40; 12:23) in the sense that they approach Him with the full acceptance gained through the death of Christ (cf. 10:19-22).

10:15-18. Reverting to his basic text on the benefits of the New Covenant (cf. 8:8-12), the author requoted a portion of it (in 10:16 he quoted Jer. 31:33; and in Heb. 10:17, Jer. 31:34) to drive home his point. The text is a testimony given by God's Holy Spirit, and shows that final forgiveness, such as the New Covenant promised, meant that there was no further need for any sacrifice for sin. As the writer will shortly show, a person who turns from the one sufficient sacrifice of Christ has no real sacrifice to which he can turn (cf. Heb. 10:26).

D. The fourth warning (10:19-39)

In some ways this warning section is the most pointed and stern of all. It is also climactic. It follows the completion of the epistle's exposition of the high priestly role and service of Jesus Christ, so it gathers up the implications of these truths and drives them home with full force. But as usual, the writer mingled a solemn warning with his words of consolation and encouragement.

1. THE BASIC ADMONITION (10:19-25)

10:19-22. The central assertion of these verses is in the words, Therefore, brothers (cf. 3:1, 12) . . . let us draw near to God. The intervening material, beginning with the word since, gives the basis for the author's call to approach God. The readers are New-Covenant people ("brothers") who should have confidence (parrēsian; cf. 3:6; 4:16; 10:35) to come into the very presence of God. This idea is enriched by the use of Old-Covenant imagery. God's presence in the most holy place and the curtain that once was a barrier to man is now no longer so. It symbolized Christ's body, so the writer may have had in mind the rending of the temple curtain at the time of Christ's death (Matt. 27:51). At any rate His death gave believers the needed access and route to God, aptly described as new (prosphaton, "recent," occurring only here in the NT) and living, that is, partaking of the fresh and vitalizing realities of the New Covenant.

But in addition, the call to draw near is appropriate since we have a great Priest over the house of God with all that this entails in the light of the writer's previous discussion. So the approach of believers should be with a sincere (alēthinēs, "true, dependable," from aletheia, "truth") heart in full assurance of faith. There ought to be no wavering in regard to these superlative realities. Rather each New-Covenant worshiper should approach God in the conscious enjoyment of freedom from guilt (having our hearts sprinkled to cleanse us from a guilty conscience) and with a sense of the personal holiness that Christ's sacrifice makes possible (having our bodies washed with pure water). The writer's words are probably an exhortation to lay hold consciously of the cleansing benefits of Christ's Cross and to draw near to God in enjoying them, putting away inward guilt and outward impurity. These verses approximate 1 John 1:9.

10:23-25. This kind of confident access to God necessarily entails that believers hold unswervingly to the hope we profess with full confidence in the reliability of God's promises. The writer revealed in these verses that his concern for fidelity to the faith is not an abstraction, but a confrontation with real danger. There was an urgent need for mutual concern and exhortation (toward love and good deeds) within the church he wrote to. His readers were not to abandon meeting together, as some were doing. Already there seemed to have been defections from their ranks, though his words might have applied to other churches where such desertions had occurred. In any case their mutual efforts to spur one another on should increase as they see the Day approaching (cf. v. 37; a well-known NT triology is included in these vv.: faith, v. 22; hope, v. 23; love, v. 24).

In referring again to the Second Advent, the writer left the impression he was concerned that genuine believers might cease to hope for the Lord's coming and be tempted to defect from their professions of faith in Christ (cf. comments on 1:13–2:4; 6:9). They must treat their future expectations as certainties (since He who promised is faithful). If they would only lift up their eyes, they could "see the Day approaching."

2. THE RENEWED WARNING (10:26-31)

10:26-27. The KJV translation here, "if we sin willfully," is superior to NIV's if we deliberately keep on sinning, as the words "keep on" overplay the Greek tense. As the context shows (cf. v. 23), the author was concerned here, as throughout the epistle, with the danger of defection from the faith. Most sin is "deliberate," but the writer was here influenced by the Old Testament's teaching about sins of presumption (cf. Num. 15:29-31) which lay outside the sacrificial provisions of the Law. Apostasy from the faith would be such a "willful" act and for those who commit it no sacrifice for sins is left (cf. Heb. 10:18). If the efficacious sacrifice of Christ should be renounced, there remained no other available sacrifice which could shield an apostate from God's judgment by raging fire. A Christian who abandons "the confidence [he] had at first" (3:14) puts himself on the side of God's enemies and, as the writer had already said, is in effect "crucifying the Son of God all over again and subjecting Him to public disgrace" (6:6). Such reprehensible conduct can scarcely be worthy of anything but God's flaming indignation and retribution. This, however, as stated earlier (cf. comments on 6:8), is not a reference to hell (cf. comments on 10:29).

10:28-29. Under the Old Covenant, if an Israelite spurned the Mosaic Law and at least two or three witnesses verified his actions, he was put to death. This being true, the author then argued from the lesser to the greater. If defiance of an inferior covenant could bring such retribution, what about defiance of the New Covenant which, as he had made clear, is far superior? The answer can only be that the punishment would be substantially greater in such a case.

In order to show that this is so, the writer then placed defection from the faith in the harshest possible light. An apostate from the New Covenant has trampled the Son of God underfoot and has treated as an unholy thing the blood of the covenant (cf. "blood of the eternal covenant," 13:20) that sanctified him. The words "sanctified him" refer to true Christians. Already the writer to the Hebrews has described them as "made holy (Gr. 'sanctified') through the sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (10:10) and as "made perfect forever" through this sanctifying work (v. 14).

Some seek to evade this conclusion by suggesting that Christ is the One referred to here as "sanctified" or that the person only claims to be sanctified. But these efforts are foreign to the writer's thought and are so forced that they carry their own refutation. The author's whole point lies in the seriousness of the act. To treat "the blood of the covenant" (which actually sanctifies believers) as though it were an "unholy" (koinon, "common") thing and to renounce its efficacy, is to commit a sin so heinous as to dwarf the fatal infractions of the Old Covenant. To this, an apostate adds the offense of insulting the Spirit of grace who originally wooed him to faith in Christ. This kind of spiritual rebellion clearly calls for a much worse punishment than the capital penalty that was inflicted under the Mosaic setup.

But again the writer was not thinking of hell. Many forms of divine retribution can fall on a human life which are worse than immediate death. In fact, Jeremiah made just such a complaint about the punishment inflicted on Jerusalem (Lam. 4:6, 9). One might think also of King Saul, whose last days were burdened with such mental and emotional turmoil that death itself was a kind of release.

10:30-31. No one should regard such a warning as an idle threat. God Himself has claimed the right to take vengeance and to judge His people. In saying this, the author quoted twice from Deuteronomy (32:35-36), a chapter which most vividly evokes the picture of God's people suffering His retributive judgments (cf. esp. Deut. 32:19-27). Those familiar with this text, as well as other descriptions of God's wrath against "His people," agree: it is a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

3. THE RENEWED ENCOURAGEMENT (10:32-39)

But as was his custom after the most severe admonitions, the writer chose to conclude his warning with a distinct note of encouragement.

10:32-34. An effective way to fortify people against future trials is to remind them of the courage they displayed in past ones. This is precisely what the writer did. His readers knew what it was to stand their ground in a great contest in the face of suffering. (The words "stood your ground" [hypemeinate] render the verb usually translated "persevered," as in, e.g., v. 36). They knew what it was to be publicly shamed and persecuted, and also to support others who had such experiences (v. 33). They had shown sympathy for brethren who had been imprisoned, and they had suffered property loss with joy because they had an assurance of possessing heavenly wealth (v. 34). They would do well to recall now their steadfastness in the past. Whatever they might now be facing—and the writer suggested it might be something similar—they would be helped if they would remember those earlier days after they had received the light (cf. "received the knowledge" in v. 26 and "enlightened" in 6:4).

10:35-36. This was no time for them, then, to throw away their confidence (parrēsia, cf. 3:6; 4:16; 10:19). As the author's exposition of the eternal inheritance—the glory of the many sons—had sought to show, that confidence, if retained, will be richly rewarded. What the readers needed, therefore, was just what the writer had often said and implied: to persevere (lit., "you had need of perseverance," hypomonēs echete chreian) so that by thus doing God's will (cf. v. 9) they would receive what God had promised. As much as anything, these words express the central exhortation of the Book of Hebrews.

10:37-38. If their concern was about the delay of the Second Advent, they should rest assured that in just a very little while, He who is coming will come and will not delay. These words and those that follow were adapted by the author from the Septuagint of Isaiah 26:21 and Habakkuk 2:3-4. But they were used freely and were not intended as a precise quotation, since no words such as "He says" introduced them. In the phrase My (or "the") righteous one (only a handful of Gr. mss. read "My"), the author employed Paul's description of a person who is justified by faith. It is likely that the writer of Hebrews understood it similarly. A justified person ought to live by faith, which is what the writer had been urging his readers to do. But, if he shrinks back, that is, if the "righteous one" commits apostasy, denouncing his Christian profession, God's favor cannot rest on his life. By understating the serious consequences, the writer softened his words so that he would not distract from his predominant note of encouragement.

10:39. Then he affirmed, But we are not of those who shrink back and are destroyed. Here the original text has an emphatic "we," which the writer might have intended as an "editorial we," of which he was quite fond (cf. 2:5; 5:11; 8:1; etc.). Then he would mean: "As far as I am concerned, I am determined not to shrink back and experience the ruin which divine retribution would bring." The words "are destroyed" reflect the Greek apōleia, which can refer either to temporal or eternal ruin. In this context the former is correct. Instead of the ruin which an apostate invites, the writer intended to be among those who believe and are saved. The NIV rendering should not be misread as a reference to conversion. Though the author's own normal word for salvation does not occur here, the expression "and are saved" somewhat freely translates eis peripoiēsin psychēs. A viable rendering of the last half of verse 39 would be: "but [we are] of faith leading to the preservation of the soul" (cf. comments on 1 Peter 2:9). But "soul" here should be understood in the Hebraic sense of the person himself, or his life, and refers in this context to the way in which persistence in the faith preserves an individual from the calamities that overtake those who "shrink back." Even if the writer was speaking primarily of his own purpose of heart, he clearly intended that to be shared by his readers. Thus the concluding statement of his warning passage (10:19-39) amounts to a call for determination and perseverance.

IV. Part III: The Response of Faith (chaps. 11–12)

This section—the final major portion of the epistle—constitutes a call to respond in the only appropriate way, namely, by faith, to the realities the writer has discussed. Though the importance of faith has already been made apparent, the thought of the writer is not complete till its value and worth are more fully considered. As before, there is exposition (chap. 11) followed by warning and exhortation (chap. 12).

A. The life of faith (chap. 11)

In concluding the previous warning section, the writer touched on the theme of living by faith (cf. 10:37-39). What this really means he then expounded in terms his readers could fully appreciate, because it is faith that underlies the experience of the heroes of Old Testament history. Since these people experienced faith, so could his readers.

1. PROLOGUE (11:1-3)

11:1-3. In a brief Prologue the author set forth three fundamental considerations about faith: its basic nature, the honor associated with it, and its way of seeing things. In its essence faith is being sure (hypostasis, rendered "being" in reference to God in 1:3) . . . and certain (elenchos, from the verb elenchō, "to prove or convince") about unseen hopes and realities. That this is honorable is seen in the fact that Old Testament worthies, the ancients, were commended for it. Faith is also a way of viewing all experience since it is the way in which believers see the universe (tous aiōnas, lit., "the ages," also rendered "the universe" in 1:2) for what it is—a creation by God.

2. THE DIVINE ACCEPTANCE OF FAITH (11:4-16)

In the first major movement of his exposition, the author stressed the theme suggested in verse 2. Faith wins acceptance and reward from God.

11:4. Abel represents the righteous man referred to in 10:38, whose acceptance before God was based on a superior sacrifice. Like Abel, the readers found acceptance before God on the basis of the better sacrifice of the New Covenant. Their unbelieving brethren, like Cain, found no such divine approbation. Even death does not extinguish the testimony of a man like Abel.

11:5-6. Enoch, on the other hand, reflected the kind of life that pleases God since he walked with God by faith (as the readers also should). If Christ had come in their lifetimes (cf. 10:37), the readers also would not have experienced death. In any case they could only please God by continued confidence that He exists and . . . rewards those who earnestly seek Him.

11:7. That God does reward those who seek Him is suggested by the career of Noah, who became an heir of righteousness by faith. What he inherited was, in fact, the new world after the Flood as the readers might inherit "the world to come" (cf. 2:5). The reference here to Noah saving his household recalls the writer's stress on a Christian's salvation-inheritance. It further suggests that a man's personal faith can be fruitful in his family, as they share it together.

11:8-10. That the readers should look forward to "the world to come" and treat their present experience as a pilgrimage is a lesson enforced by the life of Abraham. This great patriarch lived like a stranger in a land he would later receive as his inheritance. So also would the readers inherit if they, like this forefather, kept looking forward to the city with foundations, a reference to the heavenly and eternal Jerusalem (cf. Rev. 21:2, 9-27).

11:11-12. The NIV introduces the word Abraham into these verses. But its marginal reading is preferable: "By faith even Sarah, who was past age, was enabled to bear children because she. . . ." The NIV interpretation is influenced by the opinion that the phrase to become a father (eis katabolēn spermatos) can refer only to the male parent, but this need not be so. The writer here chose to introduce his first heroine of faith, one who was able to overlook the physical limitation of her own barrenness to become a fruitful mother. Since "she considered Him faithful who had promised" (NASB) so also should the readers (cf. 10:23). Her faith in fact, contributed to the startling multiplication of her husband's seed, when old Abraham was as good as dead.

11:13-16. In an impressive summary of his discussion thus far, the writer pointed out that people can be still living by faith when they die, even if by that time they do not receive the things promised. By faith the old saints saw the promised realities from a distance and persisted in their pilgrim character, looking for a country of their own and refusing to return to the land they had left. So too the readers should renounce the opportunity to go back to any form of their ancestral religion and should persist in longing for a better country—a heavenly one. If they did so they, like the patriarchs, would be people with whom God would not be ashamed to be associated.

3. THE VARIEGATED EXPERIENCES OF FAITH (11:17-40)

A new movement, the author's exposition of the life of faith, begins here. In a multiplicity of varied experiences faith remains the constant factor by which these experiences are met and understood. Faith constitutes a Christian's true "world view" (cf. v. 3).

11:17-19. The theme of testing emerges here as the writer returned to Abraham. The readers can learn from that supreme test in which the patriarch was called on to sacrifice his . . . son. Though this seemed to contradict the divine promise, Abraham was able to rise above the trial and trust in the resurrecting power of God. So also Christian readers must sometimes look beyond the experiences of life, in which God's promises do not seem to be fulfilled, and realize that their resurrections will bring those promises to fruition.

11:20-22. The patriarchs mentioned here likewise looked to the future in faith. Isaac, trusting God to fulfill His promises to Abraham and his descendants, pronounced blessings on his own two sons Jacob and Esau regarding their future. So did Jacob in regard to Joseph's sons, which was for him an act of faith in his old age. The readers too were to maintain their worship right to the end of life, persevering in faith in the future that God had foretold. Joseph too, nearing death, expressed confidence that God would in the future deliver the Israelites from Egypt. In similar fashion all believers should, in genuine faith, have confidence in the future of God's people.

11:23. With this transition to the life of Moses, the writer began to focus on the way faith confronts opposition and hostility, a subject familiar to his readers. It was by faith that Moses was hidden by his parents and his life was thus preserved. The phrase because they saw he was no ordinary child might be better read, "because they saw he was a beautiful child." ("Beautiful" is the Gr. asteion, which occurs in the NT only here and in Acts 7:20, which also refers to Moses.) Delighted by the precious gift of a son which God had given them, they evidently believed God had something better for this lovely baby than death. Not fearing Pharaoh's edict, they kept him alive, and God rewarded their faith by their son's illustrious career.

11:24-26. In a classic presentation of the way faith chooses between the attractive but temporary pleasures of sin and the prospect of disgrace for the sake of Christ, the writer showed Moses to be a real hero of faith who had an intelligent regard for the eschatological hopes of the nation of Israel. The readers also were to accept "disgrace" and reject "the pleasures of sin," and they would do so if they, like Moses, anticipated their reward.

11:27-28. Moreover, at the time of the Exodus, Moses was undeterred by fear of the king's anger. By keeping the Passover, which included the sprinkling of blood, the nation avoided God's judgment. In the same way, the readers should not be afraid of human wrath and should maintain their separateness from the surrounding world. They should persist in the worship experience made possible by the blood of the New Covenant. If they would do so, they would not fall under divine retribution (cf. 10:19-31).

11:29-31. The readers could also look forward to victory over their enemies (cf. 1:13-14). They could learn from the destruction of the Egyptians and the collapse of the walls of Jericho what triumphs faith can win over its adversaries. If, as seems probable, there were a few Gentiles in the church that received this letter, they could take comfort from the experience of the prostitute Rahab, a Gentile who was spared when Jericho was conquered.

11:32-35a. There were far too many heroes of faith for the writer to deal with them all in detail. Swiftly he mentioned the variegated accomplishments of some of them. At the climax of this list stand women who received back their dead, raised to life again—a truly superlative victory of faith which does not allow death to defeat it (cf. 1 Kings 17:17-24; 2 Kings 4:17-37).

11:35b-38. In a swift transition of thought, the writer moved from faith's obvious triumphs to what seemed to be its defeats. But these defeats were only apparent, not real. Those who were tortured and refused to be released did so because they knew their sufferings would lead to a richer and better resurrection experience. So the readers might also endure suffering staunchly and expect reward in the future world. Indeed, all manner of physical suffering (vv. 36-37, 38b cite about a dozen kinds of persecution) has been endured by people of faith, as well as ostracism from their homes and countries, treatment that the readers might also have to endure. But in a lovely touch, the writer commented that the world was not worthy of those whom it banished.

11:39-40. In a concluding summary the writer pointed out that the great heroes of faith he had spoken of had not yet realized their eschatological hopes. This fact shows that God had planned something better for them and us. It is indeed "better for us" that the future hopes they strove toward be delayed, since only thus could believers enjoy the present experience of becoming companions of the Messiah who leads them to glory. As a result, the perfecting (cf. 10:14; 12:23) of the Old Testament worthies—that is, the realization of their hopes—awaits that of all believers.

B. The final warning (chap. 12)

The author concluded the basic argument of the epistle with a final admonition and warning. As usual his hortatory section grew directly out of the expository one which preceded it. His discussion of the life of faith now led to another call for perseverance.

1. THE INTRODUCTORY ADMONITION (12:1-2)

12:1-2. The life of faith has been amply attested by this great cloud of Old Testament witnesses. (This does not mean that they watch believers today.) Hence believers ought to run with perseverance (hypomonēs; cf. 10:32, 36; 12:2-3,7) the race marked out in their Christian lives, setting aside whatever hinders and the sin that so easily entangles (euperistaton, "ambushes or encircles"). Their supreme Model for this continued to be Jesus, however admirable any Old Testament figure might be. He is both the Author and Perfecter of our faith. The word "author" (archēgon) was used in 2:10 (see comments there) and suggests that Jesus "pioneered" the path of faith Christians should follow. He also "perfected" the way of faith since He reached its end successfully. He kept His eye on the joy set before Him, the "joy" alluded to in 1:9 wherein He obtained an eternal throne. The believers' share in that joy must also be kept in view. After enduring (hypemeinen, the verb related to the noun hypomonē in 12:1; cf. vv. 3, 7) the cross and scorning its shame, Jesus assumed that triumphant position at the right hand of the throne of God (cf. 1:3; 8:1; 10:12) which presages His and the believers' final victory (cf. 1:13-14).

2. THE REMINDER THAT THINGS ARE NOT AS BAD AS THEY SEEM (12:3-11)

Nothing is more natural for a person than to overestimate the severity of his trials. The writer did not want his audience to do that.

12:3-4. If they would consider the opposition from sinful men which Jesus confronted and endured (hypomemenēkota; cf. vv. 1-2, 7), they would be encouraged. After all, unlike Him, they had not yet resisted . . . sin . . . to the point of bloodshed. By "sin" the author probably primarily meant that of "sinful men" who opposed them, but doubtless also had their own sin in mind, which they had to resist in order to maintain a steadfast Christian profession.

12:5-8. The readers also seemed to have forgotten the encouragement found in Proverbs 3:11-12, which presents divine discipline as an evidence of divine love. Thus they should not lose heart (cf. Heb. 12:3) but should endure hardship (hypomenete, lit., "persevere"; cf. vv. 1-3) as discipline and regard it as an evidence of sonship, that is, that they are being trained for the glory of the many sons (cf. 2:10 and comments there). All God's children are subject to His discipline, and in the phrase everyone undergoes discipline the writer for the last time used the Greek metochoi ("companions, sharers"), also used in 1:9; 3:1, 14; 6:4. (Lit., the Gr. reads, ". . . discipline, of which all have become sharers.") In speaking of those who are not disciplined and are thus illegitimate children, he was probably thinking of Christians whose disloyalty to the faith resulted in their loss of inheritance (i.e., reward) which is acquired by the many sons and daughters. (In the Roman world, an "illegitimate child" had no inheritance rights.) What such Christians undergo, the author had shown, is severe judgment. On the other hand believers who undergo God's "discipline" are being prepared by this educational process (paideia, "discipline," lit., "child-training"; cf. Eph. 6:4) for millennial reward.

12:9-11. Drawing on the analogy of the discipline of earthly fathers, the author encouraged a submissive spirit to the discipline of the Father of our spirits which is life-preserving (and live) as well as productive of an experience of His holiness, which involves a rich harvest of righteousness and peace. But Christians must let this discipline have its full effect and be trained by it.

3. THE CALL TO RENEWED SPIRITUAL VITALITY (12:12-17)

12:12-13. The author sensed the tendency to spiritual weakness in his readers, and in the light of the truths he had expounded he encouraged them to renew their strength. If they would do this and would pursue the level paths which real righteousness entails, the weakest among them (the lame) would not be further disabled, but rather healed. Their own strength would benefit weaker Christians.

12:14. Peace with all men as well as personal holiness must be vigorously sought since without holiness (hagiasmos) no one will see the Lord. Since no sin can stand in God's presence, Christians must—and will be—sinless when they see the Lord (cf. 1 John 3:2). That realization offers motivation for pursuing holiness here and now. But the author may also have had in mind the thought that one's perception of God even now is conditioned by his real measure of holiness (cf. Matt. 5:8).

12:15-17. As a grim reminder of what can happen among believers, the writer warned that one who misses the grace of God may become like a bitter root whose infidelity to God affects others. Here the author had in mind Deuteronomy 29:18 where an Old-Covenant apostate was called a "root . . . that produces such bitter poison." Such a person would be godless (bebēlos, "profane, unhallowed, desecrated") like Esau,

Jacob's brother, whose loose and profane character led him to sell his inheritance rights as the oldest son for the temporary gratification of a single meal. He warned the readers not to yield to transitory pressures and forfeit their inheritances. If some did, they would ultimately regret the foolish step and might find their inheritance privileges irrevocably lost as were Esau's. This would of course be true of one who ended his Christian experience in a state of apostasy, which the writer had continually warned against.

4. THE FINAL WARNING ITSELF (12:18-29)

12:18-21. Vividly the writer pictured the situation at Mount Sinai where the Old Covenant was given and its awesomeness and fearful nature were described (cf. Ex. 19:9-23; Deut. 9:8-19).

12:22-24. The realities that pertain to New-Covenant people and to which they have come are even more impressive because they are heavenly. Not only is there the heavenly city, but there are also heaven-related beings, both angels and people, associated with it. The term church of the firstborn may mean the assembly of those whose inheritance rights are already won (since under the OT Law the "firstborn" was the primary heir; cf. v. 16). They have already gone on to the heavenly regions where the angels are. But above all, it is to God, the Judge of all men, that they have come—and there are some who indeed can stand His searching scrutiny of their lives (the spirits of righteous men made perfect; cf. 10:14; 11:40)—and to Jesus the Mediator (cf. 8:6; 9:15) of a New Covenant whose atoning blood does not cry for judgment as did Abel's but secures the acceptance of all New-Covenant persons.

If the readers would contemplate these things properly, they would be awed by them and more inclined to fulfill their call to the highest privileges that the New Covenant can provide.

12:25. The contrast between the two covenants is now focused as a contrast between a warning given on earth and one that issues from heaven itself. Since those who refused the Old Covenant did not escape, how could those of the New Covenant who turn away expect to do so? (cf. 2:3) Here no doubt the author thought of the Speaker as none other than the Originator of the New Covenant who now sits "at the right hand of the Majesty in heaven" (1:3).

12:26-27. This is the divine voice which once shook only the earth, but will ultimately shake not only the earth but also the heavens. The reference to Haggai 2:6 was understood by the author as speaking of the ultimate remaking of the heavens and earth which will follow the millennial kingdom (cf. Heb. 1:10-12). What remains after this cataclysmic event will be eternal.

12:28-29. And such is the character of the kingdom which we are receiving. The words let us be thankful may be rendered "let us have [or, 'obtain'] grace" (echōmen charin) and are likely a final reference to the resources of grace available from the great High Priest (cf. 4:14-16). This is confirmed by the words and so (lit., "through which," di' ēs) which remind the readers that this grace is required in order to worship (better, "serve," latreuōmen, also used in 8:5; 9:9; 10:2; 13:10) God acceptably within the New-Covenant community. Failure to do so should be deterred by the concluding solemn thought that our God is a consuming fire (cf. 10:26-27). A believer who departs from his magnificent privileges will invite God's retribution.

The Epilogue can be distinguished from the body of the epistle in that the latter contains only broad, general admonitions, while the Epilogue contains specific ones. In some ways these specific instructions suggest ways "to worship God acceptably" (cf. 12:28). The Epilogue also contains the writer's personal comments to his readers and his farewell to them.

13:1-6. The first section of the Epilogue contains moral directions for the readers. Obeying these would inculcate personal kindness to brothers (v. 1), strangers (v. 2), and prisoners (v. 3). The writer then called for sexual purity in which marriage is held in high regard (v. 4). The readers were also to avoid monetary greed and to be content with what they have (v. 5; cf. Luke 12:15; Phil. 4:11; 1 Tim. 6:6-10). Even if they had little on the material level, they had the Lord (Heb. 13:5) and His help (v. 6).

13:7-8. Religious directions follow the moral ones and this segment of the Epilogue extends through verse 17. The call, Remember your leaders, perhaps referred to former leaders who had passed away. The outcome of their way of life could be contemplated with good effect and the readers were to imitate their faith. Those leaders were gone, but Jesus Christ of whom they spoke remains continuously the same.

13:9. That is why new doctrines which conflict with the unchanging message about Jesus Christ should be rejected. The author's reference here to all kinds of strange teachings does not sound at all like a reference to normative Judaism but as if the readers were confronting a peculiar, sectarian variation of that religion (cf. comments under "Background and Setting" in the Heb. Introduction).

13:10-14. If those who hawked "strange teachings" tended to idealize the wilderness experience and the tabernacle, the writer's words now make a special point. A Christian has a special altar (probably a figure of speech for the sacrifice of Christ) from which he derives spiritual sustenance. Those who minister at the tabernacle were not entitled to partake of that kind of spiritual food. If some people preferred a desert way of life and considered themselves "servants" of the ancient tabernacle they were, the writer pointed out, debarred from Christian privileges. Under the old institution the blood from sacrifices made on the Day of Atonement was brought into the most holy place, but the bodies were burned outside the camp (v. 11), a location deemed unholy in the years of the wilderness sojourn. But Jesus also suffered outside the city gate (i.e., outside Jerusalem), but the effect of His sacrifice was to make the people holy. Far from association with Him being unholy, as some unbelieving Jews regarded it, the readers were in fact "holy" (or sanctified; cf. 2:11; 10:10, 14) and should not hesitate to share in the disgrace He bore (cf. 12:2) by abandoning the camp of Judaism and identifying with Him. If the readers actually were acquainted with sectarian encampments in their region this exhortation would have had special force. The readers' true home was no camp or city that then existed, but the city that is to come (cf. 11:10, 16; 12:22).

13:15-16. No blood sacrifices were needed in the light of Jesus' death, but to offer . . . praise and to do good and to share with others were indeed sacrifices that God desired (cf. 10:25).

13:17. If former leaders were to be remembered and their teachings retained (vv. 7-8), present ones were to be obeyed. Their responsibility before God was to be recognized and their shepherding tasks should not be complicated by disobedience. (So that their work will be a joy possibly should be, "so their accounting [to God for you] may be with joy.")

13:18-19. With that same sense of spiritual humility that led him to use "we" in most of his warning sections, the writer requested the prayers of his readers, and particularly that he might be restored to them soon. His interest in them was personal, and he was eager to see them.

13:20-21. In a lovely benediction which captures a number of the major themes of the epistle (e.g., peace, blood, covenant, Resurrection, Shepherd, equip), the writer expressed confidence in our Lord Jesus as the Great Shepherd of New-Covenant people, through whom God was able to effect His will (equip is katartisai, "to prepare, make ready for use"; cf. Eph. 4:12) in the readers and in himself. This indeed is what he prayed for his readers.

13:22-25. Urging once again that his readers bear with his word of exhortation, he expressed the hope that he and Timothy would soon see them. After giving them greetings, he committed them to God's grace.

JAMES

INTRODUCTION

Few books of the Bible have been more maligned than the little Book of James. Controversy has waged over its authorship, its date, its recipients, its canonicity, and its unity.

It is well known that Martin Luther had problems with this book. He called it a "right strawy epistle." But it is only "strawy" to the degree it is "sticky." There are enough needles in this haystack to prick the conscience of every dull, defeated, and degenerated Christian in the world. Here is a "right stirring epistle" designed to exhort and encourage, to challenge and convict, to rebuke and revive, to describe practical holiness and drive believers toward the goal of a faith that works. James is severely ethical and refreshingly practical.

Considered one of the General Epistles, James, like the epistles of Peter, John, and Jude, is an encyclical addressed not to individual churches or persons but to a larger sphere of believers. The teaching in these general letters complements the doctrine of Paul. Paul emphasized faith; James stressed conduct; Peter, hope; John, love; and Jude, purity.

Authorship. The human author of this epistle is not easily identified. The New Testament mentions at least four men named James: (1) the son of Zebedee and brother of John (Mark 1:19), (2) the son of Alphaeus (Mark 3:18), (3) the father of Judas (not Iscariot; Luke 6:16), and (4) the half brother of the Lord (Gal. 1:19). Which one wrote the epistle?

James, the son of Zebedee, could not be the author since he suffered martyrdom under Herod Agrippa I before this epistle was written (Acts 12:2).

It is unlikely that the little-known son of Alphaeus was the author though some, especially Roman Catholics, equate the son of Alphaeus with the Lord's brother. They claim that James was really Jesus' cousin through Mary of Cleopas (Alphaeus), the Virgin Mary's sister. This contention, however, violates a literal interpretation of "brother" and is clearly an attempt to support the invention of the perpetual virginity of Mary. It seems clear from Scripture that children were born to Joseph and Mary after the virgin birth of the Lord Jesus Christ. Jesus is called "her firstborn" (Luke 2:7), implying that others were born thereafter. The Scriptures state that Joseph had no union with Mary, that is, no normal physical relationship, "until" (heōs) after the birth of Jesus (Matt. 1:25). Repeated references are made to the Lord's half brothers and half sisters and four of His brothers are named: James, Joseph, Simon, and Judas (Matt. 13:55).

James, the father of Judas (not Iscariot) did not figure as an important person in the early church. He could hardly be the author of this epistle.

It seems clear therefore that the author is James, the half brother of the Lord, who became the recognized leader in the Jerusalem church. This conclusion is supported by the authoritative tone of the letter and by the marked similarities in Greek between this epistle and the speech by James recorded in Acts 15.

Though James was reared in the same home with the Lord Jesus, he apparently did not become a believer until after Christ's resurrection. John wrote, "For even His own brothers did not believe in Him" (John 7:5).

James' encounter with the risen Lord may have brought him to saving faith. Christ "appeared to James, then to all the apostles" (1 Cor. 15:7). Paul later listed James, Peter, and John as "those reputed to be pillars" of the church (Gal. 2:9).

The strongest evidence for the authorship of the Epistle of James clearly favors the half brother of Christ. Furthermore, Origen, Eusebius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Athanasius, Augustine, and many other early writers support this view.

Date. The date of the epistle is related to its authorship. Some deny that James wrote this letter because of its excellent Greek. They place the writing between A.D. 80 and 150. This is hardly justified. James was obviously a gifted Galilean, fluent in both Aramaic and Greek.

Flavius Josephus, first-century historian, records that James was martyred in A.D. 62, so the epistle must have been written prior to that date. Since no mention is made of the Jerusalem Council (A.D. 49) in which James took so active a role, it is likely that the letter was written between A.D. 45 and 48.

James is probably the earliest of the writings of the New Testament and therefore can hardly be seen as a polemic against Paul's letter to the Romans, which was written later. Romans, however, is not a refutation of James. It is apparent from Paul's relationship with James (Acts 15:13; 21:18) and his recognition of James (Gal. 1:19; 2:9, 12) that Paul held James in high respect. Together Paul and James give the full dimension of faith. Paul wrote about inner saving faith from God's perspective. James wrote about outward serving faith from man's perspective. The true seed of saving faith is verified by the tangible fruit of serving faith. James' point is that biblical faith works.

Recipients. Clearly addressed to "the 12 tribes scattered among the nations" (James 1:1), this letter has a marked Jewish flavor. The book has the substance and authority of the Prophets and the style and beauty of the Psalms. He refers to "firstfruits" (1:18; cf. Lev. 23:10), the synagogue or "meeting" (James 2:2), "our ancestor Abraham" (2:21), Gehenna or "hell" (3:6), "the Lord Almighty" (5:4; cf. Gen. 17:1), and to the early and latter or "fall and spring rains" (James 5:7; cf. Deut. 11:14). Though some suggest that the "12 tribes" may be taken metaphorically as the Gentile church scattered throughout the Roman Empire, it is far more logical to take the statement in its normal sense. The letter is definitely to a Jewish constituency. Though the letter demonstrates careful Greek diction, it is nonetheless filled with extensive Hebrew symbolism.

It is likely that Peter wrote to the Jewish Christians scattered to the West (cf. 1 Peter 1:1) and that James addressed the Jewish Christians scattered to the East, in Babylon and Mesopotamia.

Canonicity. It is interesting to note that James was omitted from some of the early versions and collections of sacred books. The earliest known collection, the Muratorian fragment of the second century, does not include Hebrews, James, and the epistles of Peter. It was not until the fourth and fifth centuries that James appears to be consistently included in the canon. It appears that while the churches of Rome and Carthage doubted the canonicity of James, it was nonetheless in use from an early date by the churches of Jerusalem and Alexandria and is included in the collections of scriptural books in Asia Minor. The reason is rather obvious. Written at Jerusalem and addressed to the Jews of the Eastern dispersion, those of the West were not so ready to accept the letter as Scripture. It is clear, however, that God not only superintended the writing of Scripture but its acceptance and authority as well.

Style. The Book of James is as much a lecture as it is a letter. Though it opens with the customary salutation of an epistle, it lacks personal references common in a letter and it has no concluding benediction.

This so-called "epistle" was obviously prepared for public reading as a sermon to the congregations addressed. The tone is clearly authoritative but not autocratic. James included 54 imperatives in his 108 verses—an average of one call for action in every other verse!

James' style is both energetic and vivid, conveying profound concepts with crisp, well-chosen words. The sentences are short, simple, and direct. He used many metaphors and similes with a touch of poetic imagination. In fact, the Book of James probably has more figures of speech, analogies, and imagery from nature (see the chart) than all Paul's epistles together. Exhortations, rhetorical questions, and illustrations from everyday life give spice to this little book.

A striking literary technique employed by James is the practice of linking together clauses and sentences by the repetition of a leading word or one of its cognates. For example, "perseverance" (1:3) and "perseverance" (v. 4); "not lacking anything" (v. 4) and "if any of you lacks" (v. 5); "he should ask" (v. 5) and "when he asks" (v. 6); "he must . . . not doubt" (v. 6) and "he who doubts" (v. 6). (For others see W. Graham Scroggie, Know Your Bible, 2 vols. London: Pickering & Inglis, n.d., 2:293.)

In addition to his unique and innovative style, James furnishes an unusual number of references or parallels to other writings. He makes reference to Abraham, Rahab, Job, Elijah, to the Law and the Ten Commandments, and includes allusions to passages in 21 Old Testament books: Genesis through Deuteronomy, Joshua, 1 Kings, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and 7 of the 12 Minor Prophets.

James' teaching strongly resembles that of John the Baptist (e.g., cf. James 1:22, 27 with Matt. 3:8; James 2:15-16 with Luke 3:11; James 2:19-20 with Matt. 3:9; James 5:1-6 with Matt. 3:10-12). Probably James, like Peter, John, and Andrew, had heard John the Baptist preach. Amazing parallelisms exist between James' letter and the Sermon on the Mount in Matthew 5–7 (see the chart on the next p.). James did not actually quote the Lord's words, but he obviously had internalized His teachings and reproduced them with spiritual depth.

In its expressive abruptness and eloquent austerity, James' epistle stands as a literary masterpiece. This book is both picturesque and passionate. It combines the rhythmic beauty of Greek with the stern intensity of Hebrew. This letter is beautiful in its expression and bombastic in its impression.

Unity. The alleged lack of unity in James has been a prevalent complaint. Some contend the book bears a loose format like that of Hebrew wisdom literature of the type found in Proverbs. One commentator contends that there is "no discernible plan in the epistle" (C. Leslie Mitton, The Epistle of James, p. 235). Another argues that what James wrote "is not so much a reasoned argument as a series of sententious sayings clustered round certain recurring themes" (Frank E. Gaebelein, The Practical Epistle of James, p. 14). "Lack of continuity of thought" (Martin Dibelius, A Commentary on the Epistle of James, Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1976, p. 1); "a series of loosely connected paragraphs" (Clayton K. Harrop, The Letter of James, p. 14); and "altogether informal and unsystematic" (E.H. Plumptre, The General Epistle of St. James, p. 43) are other expressions of commentators' frustrations. However, there is little need for confusion. The epistle demonstrates a marked unity and a clear goal.

The purpose of this potent letter is to exhort the early believers to Christian maturity and holiness of life. This letter deals more with the practice of the Christian faith than with its precepts. James told his readers how to achieve spiritual maturity through a confident stand, compassionate service, careful speech, contrite submission, and concerned sharing. He dealt with every area of a Christian's life: what he is, what he does, what he says, what he feels, and what he has.

With his somewhat stern teaching on practical holiness, James showed how Christian faith and Christian love should be expressed in a variety of actual situations. The seemingly unrelated parts of the book can be harmonized in light of this unified theme. The pearls are not rolling around in some box; they are carefully strung to produce a necklace of priceless beauty.

COMMENTARY

I. Stand with Confidence (chap. 1)

A. Salutation and greeting (1:1)

1:1. The letter begins with a conventional opening: the name of the writer, the people to whom the letter is addressed, and a word of greeting. James was content with a simple introduction.

The writer introduced himself modestly. He did not indicate his status in the church or that he was the Lord's brother. The lack of title suggests that he was well known and had the authority to send a letter of this kind.

James was actually Jacob (Iakōbos). It is not certain why the English translators chose "James" rather than "Jacob." "James," "Jake," and "Jacob" all come from the same root. Bible translations in other languages tend to utilize the transliterated name from the actual Hebrew "Jacob" (ya'ăqōb). Could it be that King James desired to see his name in the English translation he authorized?

James, or Jacob, described himself simply as a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ. James considered himself a bond-slave (doulos). He was the property of God and of the One he could have called his "Brother," the Lord Jesus Christ. Obviously James recognized the deity of Christ by placing Him coequal with God. Furthermore, James used His full name, "the Lord Jesus Christ." "Jesus" means "Savior" and "Christ" is the Greek for "Messiah," the "Anointed." The eternal "Lord" became the Savior, "Jesus," and rose again as everlasting Sovereign, "Christ." The Lord of lords is King of kings (1 Tim. 6:15; Rev. 17:14; 19:16).

The letter is addressed to the 12 tribes scattered among the nations. James was writing to the Jews dispersed from their homeland. The technical term "scattered" (diaspora) occurs in only two other places in the New Testament (John 7:35; 1 Peter 1:1). It refers to the Jews who were scattered among the Gentiles as their ancestors had been in the days of the Captivity. Though the 12 tribes of Israel are scattered, they are never lost. They are again listed at the close of biblical history in the Book of Revelation: Judah, Reuben, Gad, Asher, Naphtali, Manasseh, Simeon, Levi, Issachar, Zebulun, Joseph, and Benjamin (Rev. 7:5-8; cf. 21:12).

The idiom, Greetings, common in thousands of ancient papyri letters, does not stand alone in any other New Testament letter. This is the Greek salutation much like the English "Hello" or "Welcome." (See comments on 2 John 10-11.) It is interesting that James did not add the Jewish salutation "Peace" (šālôm). Paul usually included both the Greek and Hebrew greetings, which are translated "grace and peace." James undoubtedly sought to maintain a crisp style and the simple elegance of good Greek even though he wrote to fellow Jews. Furthermore, the play on words between "greetings" (chairein) in James 1:1 and "joy" (charan) in verse 2 is thus more evident.

In order to attain Christian maturity and holy conduct it is essential to have a firm foundation. The believer must be able to stand with confidence. He dare not be pushed down by trials. He must not be pulled over by temptation. "Push, pull—stick, stick" must be his motto. How can such stamina be achieved? A believer can stand by pursuing, perceiving, and practicing the Word of God. Trials from without and temptations from within are no match for a Christian who stands in the truth from above.

B. Rejoice in diverse trials (1:2-12)

All too often trials prompt groanings and complaints. This kind of response does not contribute to Christian maturity. It only makes matters worse. Trials are not to be seen as tribulations but testings. A test is given to see if a student can pass, not pass out. James gave sound advice on how to score high on every test. One who brings the right attitude to the trial, who understands the advantage of the trial, and who knows where to obtain assistance in the trial will certainly end up on God's honor roll.

1. ATTITUDE IN TRIALS (1:2)

1:2. To persecuted Jewish believers scattered among pagan peoples, James gave the surprising advice, Consider it pure joy, my brothers, whenever you face trials of many kinds. Trials should be faced with an attitude of joy. Trials should not be seen as a punishment, a curse, or a calamity but something that must prompt rejoicing. Furthermore they should produce "pure joy" (lit., "all joy"; i.e., joy that is full or unmixed), not just "some joy" coupled with much grief.

Though James' command was direct and forceful, he did not preach at his audience. He identified with them. He addressed them warmly as "my brothers." This mode of address is characteristic of the epistle. He used this familiar form no less than 15 times. James' direct commands are coupled with deep compassion.

It is important to note that James did not say that a believer should be joyous for the trials but in the trials. The verb translated "face" might more literally be expressed as "fall into," peripesēte, much as the poor man "fell among robbers" (Luke 10:30). The "trials of many kinds" (peirasmois . . . poikilois) were also referred to by Peter, who used the same Greek words, though in reverse order (1 Peter 1:6). When surrounded by these trials, one should respond with joy. Most people count it all joy when they escape trials. James said to count it all joy in the midst of trials (cf. 1 Peter 1:6, 8).

It is clear that the reference here is to external trials, or tests of stamina (peirasmois) whereas later in the same chapter (James 1:13) the verb form (peirazomai) of that noun is used to speak of inner temptations, or solicitations to sin.

Obviously the question arises: How can a person find joy in trials?

2. ADVANTAGE OF TRIALS (1:3-4)

1:3. Christians can face trials with joy because there are rich advantages from these testings. Trials, rightly taken, produce the sterling quality of endurance.

This is no new revelation. It is a simple reminder. James wrote, because you know, literally "knowing through experience" (ginōskontes). Everyone has experienced both the pain of problems and the ensuing profit of persistence. There is no gain in endurance without some investment in trials.

It is the true part or approved portion of faith that produces perseverance. The testing refers more to "approval" than to "proving." The word (dokimion) appears only here and in 1 Peter 1:7. Faith is like gold; it stands in the test of fire. Without this approved standard of faith, trials would not yield perseverance. There would only be ashes. True faith, like pure gold, endures, no matter how hot the fire. True faith therefore develops, or more literally "works" (katergazetai), perseverance or staying power. The noun "perseverance" (hypomonēn; cf. the verbal form in James 1:12) means steadfastness or endurance in the face of difficulties (cf. 5:11).

1:4. Perseverance is only the beginning of benefits. There are more advantages to trials. Perseverance must finish its work. Just as tested and true faith works to produce perseverance, so perseverance must be allowed to continue its perfect or finished work to produce the ultimate by-products of maturity and spiritual fulfillment. This, of course, is the lofty goal that serves as this epistle's unifying theme. James' main point was to show how to achieve spiritual maturity.

Two words describe the goal: mature and complete. "Mature" (teleioi), often translated "perfect" or "finished," is coupled with "complete" (holoklēroi, from holos, "whole," and klēros, "part") to give the idea of perfected all over or fully developed in every part.

Trials can be faced with joy because, infused with faith, perseverance results, and if perseverance goes full-term it will develop a thoroughly mature Christian who lacks nothing. He will indeed be all God wants him to be.

James' argument may seem logical, but it is still difficult to see how trials can be welcomed with an attitude of joy. Where does one turn for help to understand this paradox?

3. ASSISTANCE FOR TRIALS (1:5-12)

1:5. To those who feel confused and frustrated by the high goal of "not lacking anything," James wrote, If any of you lacks wisdom, he should ask God. Assistance is readily available from "the giving God" (tou didontos theou). To those who lack wisdom, this valuable resource is available for the asking. James assumed his readers would feel the need for wisdom (sophias), not just knowledge. God will not only provide wisdom, but will do so generously, not grudgingly.

1:6-8. However, God's provision has some prerequisites. To receive God's wisdom in trials, the believer must be wise in asking. First, he must ask in faith. He must believe and not doubt (diakrinomenos, the word for "doubt," suggests vacillating). He dare not come to God like a wave of the sea, blown [horizontally] and tossed [vertically] by the wind. God is not pleased with a double-minded (lit., "two-souled," dipsychos; cf. 4:8) man who is unstable in all he does, like an unsteady, staggering drunk. The answer from God depends on assurance in God.

1:9-11. Furthermore one who asks for wisdom needs to evidence hope. Whatever his social or economic position, the believer must see eternal advantages. The brother in humble circumstances can be glad in his high standing spiritually, and the one who is rich can be glad for his human frailty (knowing that he has "eternal glory" in Christ, 2 Cor. 4:17). Social prominence passes away, wealth withers away like a wild flower in the hot sun, and fame will fade. Hope in the eternal is evidence of believing faith.

1:12. Finally, the one who asks for wisdom must be steadfast and infused with love. God blesses someone who perseveres under trial. In this verse James returned to the theme with which he opened this passage in verses 2-3; both refer to "trials," "testing," and "perseverance." The Christian who steadfastly endures (hypomenei) trials (peirasmon) and has stood the test (dokimos genomenos; cf. dokimion in v. 3) . . . will receive the crown of life. This "crown" consists of life, that is, the crown is life (cf. Rev. 2:10). "The life which is promised is probably life here and now, life in its fullness, life in its completeness" (cf. James 1:4) (Curtis Vaughan, James: Bible Study Commentary, p. 28). (Other crowns are referred to in 1 Thes. 2:19; 2 Tim. 4:8; 1 Peter 5:4.) God promises such life to those who love Him. Love for God enables believers who undergo trials to rest confidently in Him. Their steadfastness reveals their love. (Some, however, say the crown refers not to full life now but to eternal life, for all true believers do in fact love God; 1 John 4:8.) Asking for wisdom with faith (James 1:6-8), hope (vv. 9-11), and love (v. 12) brings not only the blessing of wisdom but also the blessing of winning.

To have the right attitude in trials, one must see the advantage of trials, but if it is difficult to see the advantages, one can ask for aid and, if one asks correctly, God will give him the right attitude in trials. He can rejoice in trials (v. 2) and be blessed (v. 12) by enduring them.

C. Resist in deadly temptation (1:13-18)

Believers are in danger of falling before the attacks and pressures of trials. But they are also subject to falling before the attractions and pleasures of temptation. Just as a wrong reaction to testing will obstruct spiritual growth and maturity, so will a wrong response to temptation. James outlined the source of temptation, the steps in temptation, and the solution for temptation.

1. SOURCE OF TEMPTATION (1:13-14)

1:13. James offered a sharp rebuke to those who find an easy excuse for their sinning. To free themselves from responsibility they say, "I am tempted by God," or "from God" (apo theou), denoting the origin, not merely the agency. James made it abundantly clear God cannot be tempted. There is nothing in God to which evil can make an appeal. He is literally "untemptable" (apeirastos; cf. comments on Heb. 4:15). Furthermore, He tempts no one. God often tests, but He never tempts.

1:14. The source of temptation is from within a person; it is his own evil desire, lust, or inner craving. He is dragged away and enticed. This inner craving draws a person out (exelkomenos) like a fish drawn from its hiding place, and then entices him (deleazomenos, from the verb deleazō "to bait, to catch a fish with bait, or hunt with snares"). So a person both builds and baits his own trap.

2. STEPS IN TEMPTATION (1:15-16)

1:15-16. The biological imagery is vivid. The lust or desire conceives and from this conception sin is born. The unmentioned father is most certainly Satan. The grotesque child, sin, then matures and produces its own offspring, death. The steps are all too clear: unchecked lust yields sin, and unconfessed sin brings death. How strange that sin gives birth to death. It may seem strange, but James warned his dear brothers and sisters who were to read this "genealogy" not to be deceived or led astray. Just as a right response to trials can result in growth to full spiritual maturity, so a wrong response to lust will result in decline to abject spiritual poverty and ultimately to death itself.

3. SOLUTION FOR TEMPTATION (1:17-18)

1:17-18. In stark contrast with the morbid scene of death that descends from unbridled lust is the bright scene of new life that emanates from the Word of truth (v. 18; cf. Eph. 1:13; Col. 1:5). The father of darkness—Satan (Acts 26:18; Col. 1:13)—generates the offspring of sin and death. The Father of the heavenly lights (i.e., God, who created the starry universe) gives salvation and life and is unchanging. Shadows from the sun shift, but not the One who made the sun! The words, every good and perfect gift is from above, have a poetic cadence in Greek. They are literally, "every good act of giving (dosis) and every perfect gift (dōrēma) is from above."

The solution for temptation is to be found in a close relationship with the Father and a constant response to His Word. One must rest in the unchangeable Lord of light and rely on His life-giving "Word of truth" (cf. Eph. 1:13; Col. 1:5; 2 Tim. 2:15).

There is no reason why one of God's chosen firstfruits, or regenerated believers, has to yield to temptation. He must learn to resist its deadly force, or he can never grow into the spiritual maturity God desires of His children of light (Eph. 5:8; 1 Thes. 5:5).

D. Rest in divine truth (1:19-27)

Ultimately the key both to responding to trials and resisting temptation is to be found in one's reaction to God's Word. Receptivity to the Word, responsiveness to the Word, and resignation to the Word are essential to spiritual growth. One must accept God's Word, act on it, and abide by it.

1. RECEPTIVITY TO THE WORD (1:19-21)

1:19-20. Again James identified with his audience, My dear brothers, and then made it clear that what was to follow was of great importance: take note of this, or "know this" (iste). A threefold injunction follows: let everyone . . . be quick to listen, slow to speak, and slow to become angry. In an argument, of course, the one who is listening rather than lambasting is the one who is slow to anger (cf. 3:1-12). Anger fails to yield the righteous life that God desires, the goal to which this epistle is committed.

1:21. Consequently it is essential to put away, or remove, all moral filth (ryparian, used only here in the NT; cf. rypara, "shabby," in 2:2) and all the abundance of evil, and humbly (lit., "in meekness") receive the implanted Word. "Planted" (emphyton, used only here in the NT) contrasts with grafted. The Word is to be ingrown or inborn, rooted in the fertile soil of the soul. It is that Word of God which can save.

2. RESPONSIVENESS TO THE WORD (1:22-25)

1:22. It is not sufficient, however, to receive the Word; one must respond to it in active obedience. The command is clear, Do not merely listen to the Word. . . . Do what it says. One must "become," or "keep on becoming" (ginesthe), a doer of the Word and not just a hearer. The growing numbers of sermon-sippers who flit from one doctrinal dessert to another like helpless hummingbirds are deceiving themselves. "Deceiving" is from a verb used in the New Testament only here and in Colossians 2:4. Paralogizomai means "to cheat or deceive by false reasoning." The deception comes from thinking they have done all that is necessary when actually listening to the Word is only the beginning. A fitting illustration of the "sit, soak, and sour" crowd follows.

1:23-24. The one who listens and does nothing is like a man who glances at his face in a mirror and then forgets what he saw. It is interesting that James cited a man (andri) in this illustration. A woman would probably not give just a cursory glance, and if she saw a flaw she would probably do what she could to cover it or correct it. Not so this man who sees the "face of his birth" (prosōpon tēs geneseōs) and then forgets about it.

1:25. To look into the mirror of the Word of God involves an obligation. One must look intently into the perfect Law that gives freedom. The intent and sustained look with a ready response is the key to spiritual strength and continued maturity. The word for "looks intently into" (parakypsas) literally means "to stoop down" in order to have a good close look.

The "Law that gives freedom" seems like a paradox. Law seems to imply restraint and therefore a lack of freedom. Not so with God's Law. His perfect Law provides true freedom. "Hold to My teaching," Christ said, "then you will know the truth, and the truth will set you free" (John 8:31-32). One who does what God decrees will find full liberty and will be blessed in what he does.

3. RESIGNATION TO THE WORD (1:26-27)

Receptivity to the Word and responsiveness to its revelation must be coupled with a new approach to life. One must be resigned to continued obedience and perpetual practice.

1:26. One who is truly religious will demonstrate it by controlled speech. The word "religious" (thrēskos) refers to external observances. The outward ritualistic practices which a person may think are commendable are considered to be worthless (mataios, "futile, fruitless, useless") if there is no parallel control, or tight rein on the tongue, a theme elaborated more fully in 3:1-12. Such a person deceives himself (apatōn kardian heautou, lit., "misleads or seduces his own heart"; cf. a different word for deceive in 1:22).

1:27. A clean and undefiled religion is one in which one's conduct and character are disciplined in accordance with God's Word. The Greek word thrēskeia (religion) appears only four times in the New Testament and two of those occurrences are here (cf. Col. 2:18; Acts 26:5). It is apparent that God's emphasis is not on religious ritual but on right living.

James outlined what God the Father (cf. "Father" in James 1:17) stresses: look after orphans and widows—referring to one's conduct, and keep oneself from being polluted—referring to one's character. "From being polluted" translates one word aspilon, "spotless" (cf. 1 Tim. 6:14; 1 Peter 1:19; 2 Peter 3:14), in contrast with moral filth (James 1:21). A believer with God-pleasing "religion" helps others in need—and thus is faultless (lit., "pure, undefiled"), and keeps himself pure (lit., "clean"). This is not a definition of religion but rather a contrast to mere acts of worship and ritualistic observances that are commonly called "religion." Again, the goal is a mature Christian walk and practical holiness. What does it take to achieve that goal? The first step is to stand with confidence. Trials or temptations will not topple one who is anchored in God's truth and is applying that truth to his life.

II. Serve with Compassion (chap. 2)

One who is properly related to the Bible is also properly related to the body of Christ. He who stands with confidence serves with compassion. James just made it clear that true religion finds an outlet in service, a service which demands that a believer learn to accept others without prejudice and to assist others without presumption.

A. Accept others (2:1-13)

James became increasingly specific and direct in his admonitions and instructions. He was obviously displeased with the inconsistencies among the brethren. He attacked the attitudes these believers displayed toward others and then complained of their failures to act as they should. He first condemned the attitude of favoritism and gave suggestions on how to combat this obstacle to spiritual maturity. One must learn to accept others, whatever their status or class. He must show courtesy to all, compassion for all, and consistency to all. Equity, love, and fidelity are the vital ingredients.

1. COURTESY TO ALL (2:1-4)

2:1. A transition to a new consideration is evident by James' use of my brothers. By "brothers" he meant fellow believers in our glorious Lord Jesus Christ. The NIV has done well in showing that it is the faith in Christ, not the faith of Christ, that is here considered, and in taking the word "glorious" (doxēs) in apposition to, and therefore descriptive of, Christ. The key command is likewise clear: don't show favoritism. God shows no favoritism (Rom. 2:11; Eph. 6:9; Col. 3:25); therefore neither should Christians. James condemned prejudice and preferential treatment.

2:2-3. The issue addressed is then illustrated. The illustration's hypothetical nature, evident in the Greek "if clause," is shown with the word suppose. The specific situation is then presented. A gold-fingered and brilliantly clothed man comes into the meeting place, here designated as a synagogue which emphasizes the Jewish character of both the epistle and this scene. A poor man in dirty clothes also enters. The word shabby (rypara, "dirty" or "vile") is found only here and in Revelation 22:11. (Cf. the word ryparian, "moral filth," which James used in 1:21.) Special attention (lit., "to gaze upon") and preferential seating is given to the rich man, and standing room only or an inferior seat on the floor (lit., "under my footstool") is afforded the poor man.

2:4. The illustration is followed by a penetrating inquiry: Have you not discriminated among yourselves? The question in Greek assumes an affirmative answer. James' brethren must plead guilty not only to discriminatory divisions but also to assuming the role of judges with evil thoughts of partiality.

2. COMPASSION FOR ALL (2:5-9)

2:5-7. With the plea, Listen, my dear brothers, James went on to explain why their preferential judgment was wrong. He made his point through four questions, each of which anticipated an affirmative answer. First, Has not God chosen those who appear poor materially, but are rich spiritually, to inherit His promised kingdom? (cf. 1:9) Second, Are not the rich the ones who are consistently guilty of oppression, extortion, and slander (blasphēmousin, 2:7, lit., "blasphemy"). Third, Are they not the ones who are dragging you into court? Fourth, Are they not the ones who slander Jesus' noble name? Believers belong to Him, not to the rich exploiters. James' readers would have to agree with these contentions, and to recognize that insulting the poor and favoring the rich was wrong and totally unreasonable.

2:8-9. The alternatives are clear. Love is right. Favoritism is sin. James was optimistic; the "if-clause," if you really keep the royal law, was written in Greek in such a way that an obedient response was anticipated. The "royal law" was given in Leviticus 19:18 and affirmed by Christ (Matt. 22:39): Love your neighbor as yourself. The law is royal or regal (basilikon, from basileus, "king") because it is decreed by the King of kings, is fit for a king, and is considered the king of laws. The phrase reflects the Latin lex regia known throughout the Roman Empire. Obedience to this law, nonpreferential love, is the answer to the evident disobedience to God's Law, prejudicial favoritism.

3. CONSISTENCY IN ALL (2:10-13)

2:10-11. James was aware there would be some who would tend to dismiss their offense of prejudice as a trivial fault. They would hardly consider themselves as lawbreakers. James went on to make it clear that this was no small offense. Whoever keeps the whole Law and yet stumbles at just one point is guilty of breaking all of it. There are no special indulgences. Utilizing the extreme instances of adultery and murder, James showed the absurdity of inconsistent obedience.

2:12-13. Total obedience is the key. One must both habitually speak and act (Gr. pres. tense imper.) as those to be judged by the Law. God's Law, because of its wise constraints, brings true freedom (cf. 1:25). Disobedience to God's Law brings bondage; and to those who have not been merciful, God's judgment is without mercy. Just as love triumphs over prejudice, mercy triumphs over judgment. The verb "triumphs" or "exults over" (katakauchatai) appears only here, in 3:14, and in Romans 11:18.

God has ordained unalterable laws. Complete and consistent obedience is required if spiritual maturity is to be attained. The believer is commanded to accept his brother with courtesy, compassion, and consistency.

B. Assist others (2:14-26)

Just as the law of love gives no excuse for respect of persons, so the possession of faith gives no license to dispense with good works. A believer must not only demonstrate his love by ready acceptance of others, but he must also demonstrate his faith by responsible aid to others. James went on in his letter to emphasize the expression of true faith, to outline the evidence of true faith, and finally to cite examples of true faith.

1. EXPRESSION OF TRUE FAITH (2:14-17)

2:14. Another shift in the argument of the epistle can be seen by James' use of my brothers. He introduced this paragraph with a rhetorical question, What good is it . . . if a man claims to have faith but has no deeds? The emphasis is not on the true nature of faith but on the false claim of faith. It is the spurious boast of faith that James condemned. Such "faith" does no "good"; there is no "profit" (ophelos, used in the NT only here and in v. 16; 1 Cor. 15:32). It is worthless because it is all talk with no walk. It is only a habitual empty boast ("claims" is in the pres. tense). Can such faith save him? A negative answer is anticipated in the Greek. Merely claiming to have faith is not enough. Genuine faith is evidenced by works.

2:15-16. The rhetorical question is followed by a hypothetical but realistic illustration: Suppose a brother or sister is without clothes and daily food. (James frequently wrote about the poor: 1:9, 27; 2:2-6, 15.) For one in need of the basics of life, sentimental good wishes do little good, like the common Jewish farewell, Go, I wish you well (lit., "Go in peace," cf. Jud. 18:6; 1 Sam. 1:17; 2 Sam. 15:9; Mark 5:34; Luke 7:50). If nothing is done to fill the pressing need for warm clothes and satisfying food, what good is it? The same phrase that James used to introduce this paragraph (James 2:14) is repeated for emphasis.

2:17. The vain boast, faith by itself, or faith in and of itself with no evidence of action, is dead. Workless faith is worthless faith; it is unproductive, sterile, barren, dead! Great claims may be made about a corpse that is supposed to have come to life, but if it does not move, if there are no vital signs, no heartbeat, no perceptible pulse, it is still dead. The false claims are silenced by the evidence.

2. EVIDENCE OF TRUE FAITH (2:18-20)

2:18. This may be one of the most misunderstood sections of the entire epistle. But someone will say, You have faith; I have deeds. An imaginary respondent, "someone," was introduced.

He did not object to James' conclusion. He agreed that faith without works is dead. But he wrongly disparaged faith while stressing works (see comments on v. 19).

What follows, Show me your faith without deeds, and I will show you my faith by what I do, may be the continuation of the respondent's words. If so, they should be included within quotation marks. (If this were James' response to a contender's "I have deeds," James would have written, "Show me your deeds without faith.") Though recent translations do not include the second half of verse 18 in the quotation of the respondent (e.g., NEB, NIV, RSV), the NASB correctly considers this entire verse part of his remarks. The Greek, of course, does not include quotation marks, which accounts for the variations in English. It seems, however, that the respondent is throwing down the challenge, "Show me your faith apart from (chōris, 'without') works, and I will show you my faith by (ek, 'emerging from') my works" (author's trans.).

2:19. It may be well to include even verse 19 as part of the respondent's argument: You believe that there is one God. Good! Even the demons believe that—and shudder. If so, he may be a typical Gentile believer who attacked the creedal belief of monotheism accepted by all Jews. He was saying, to "believe" in one God may be good so far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. The demons do that. In fact not only do they believe (the same verb, pisteuō); they even "shudder," or "bristle up" (phrissousin, an onomatopoeic verb used only here in the NT). The "belief" in one God may not be "trust" in that God. Unless it is "trust," it is not true faith and will not be evidenced in good works.

In other words the respondent is saying, "Faith is not the key; what counts is works." Thus the respondent has gone too far. James did not say that works are essential to faith, or that faith is unimportant. His argument was that works are evidence of faith.

Other writers understand this passage to mean that James (v. 18b) challenged the "someone" to show his faith without deeds—the point being that it cannot be done! James, however, said that faith can be demonstrated (only) by what one does (v. 18c). The demons' "belief" in God is inadequate. Such a so-called but unreal faith is obviously unaccompanied by deeds on their parts.

2:20. James did not launch into a lengthy refutation of the respondent. The apostle simply addressed him forcefully, You foolish man, and returned to his original argument that faith without deeds is useless (argē, "lazy, idle, negligent"). The adjective "foolish" (kene) is usually translated "vain," "empty," or "hollow" (cf. mataios, "worthless, fruitless, useless," in 1:26). Flimsy faith is dead; so are empty, faithless works. James' argument is not pro-works/anti-faith or pro-faith/anti-works. He has simply said that genuine faith is accompanied by good works. Spiritual works are the evidence, not the energizer, of sincere faith.

3. EXAMPLES OF TRUE FAITH (2:21-26)

As a final proof of his thesis, James gave two biblical examples: Abraham, the revered patriarch, and Rahab, the redeemed prostitute. He presented each example in the form of a question, anticipating the reader's ready agreement.

2:21. Was not our ancestor Abraham considered righteous for what he did when he offered his son Isaac on the altar? This question is often held to be directly opposed to Paul's statement that Abraham's faith, not his works, caused God to declare him righteous (Rom. 4:1-5). Paul, however, was arguing for the priority of faith. James argued for the proof of faith. Paul declared that Abraham had faith, and was therefore justified, or declared righteous (Gen. 15:6), prior to circumcision (Gen. 17:11; cf. Rom. 4:9). James explained that Abraham's faith was evident in his practice of Isaac's sacrifice (Gen. 22:12), and he was therefore justified, or declared righteous. Works serve as the barometer of justification, while faith is the basis for justification.

2:22-24. James emphasized the joint role of faith and . . . actions . . . working together. Faith is the force behind the deed. The deed is the finality of the faith. The verb translated was made complete (eteleiōthē) means to "carry to the end." Faith finds fulfillment in action. So it was with Abraham. James and Paul quoted the same passage—Genesis 15:6—to prove their points (cf. Rom. 4:3). Paul said that Abraham was justified by faith, and James said that Abraham was justified by faith evidenced by what he did.

2:25. In the same way (lit., "and likewise also"; homoiōs de kai) was not even Rahab declared righteous for her actions in welcoming the spies (angelous, "messengers") and helping them escape? (Josh. 2; 6)

2:26. The conclusion is most clear. Faith and deeds are as essential to each other as the body and the spirit. Apart from (chōris) the spirit, or the "breath" (pneumatos) of life, the body is dead. Apart from (chōris) the evidence of works, faith may be deemed dead. It is not the real thing. True faith continually contributes to spiritual growth and development.

Not only is a believer to stand confidently on God's Word even in the midst of trials and temptations (chap. 1), but also he must serve his brothers and sisters in Christ (chap. 2). He is to accept all members of God's family without favoritism (vv. 1-13) and to aid the family with a working faith (vv. 14-26). To gain spiritual maturity a believer must be what God wants him to be and do what God wants him to do.

III. Speak with Care (chap. 3)

Another measure of spiritual maturity is a believer's speech. James devoted a good portion of his letter to attacking a careless and corrupt tongue. He appealed, however, not only for controlled tongues (3:1-12) but also for controlled thoughts (3:13-17). The mouth is, after all, connected to the mind. Winsome speech demands a wise source. Both controlled talk and cultivated thought are necessary.

A. Control talk (3:1-12)

From his discourse on idle faith, James proceeded to discuss idle speech. The failure to bridle the tongue, mentioned earlier (1:26), is now expanded. As disturbing as those who have faith with no works are those Christians who substitute words for works. One's tongue should be controlled. Small though it is, the tongue is powerful and all too prone to perversion and pollution.

1. THE TONGUE IS POWERFUL (3:1-5)

3:1. Again addressing my brothers, a sign that a new topic is being considered, James suggested moderation and restraint in the multiplication of teachers. Obviously too many of the new Jewish Christians aspired to teach and thereby carry some of the rank and admiration given to Rabbis. It is doubtful that the reference here is to official teachers of the apostolic or prophetic status. These are the unofficial teachers (didaskaloi) in the synagogue meetings of the church family where much latitude was given for even strangers to speak. Paul frequently used this courtesy given visitors. James' complaint was simply that too many believers were overly anxious to speak up and show off (cf. John 3:10; 9:40-41).

Teaching has to be done, but those who teach must understand their responsibility, as those who teach will be judged more strictly. A teacher's condemnation is greater because, having professed to have a clear knowledge of duty, he is all the more bound to obey it.

3:2. James did not point a finger at the offenders without including himself: We all stumble in many ways. Nothing seems to trip a believer more than a dangling tongue. If a believer is never at fault (lit., "stumbles not") in what he says (lit., "in word"), he is a perfect, fulfilled, mature, complete person (teleios anēr). He is able to "bridle" his whole body. Spiritual maturity requires a tamed tongue.

3:3-5. The tongue may be small but it is influential. Three illustrations make this point clear: the bit and the horse, the rudder and the ship, and the spark and the forest. James' use of imagery drawn from natural phenomena is similar to the Lord's. It is likewise characteristic of Jewish thought. The Greek used in this passage is both ancient and eloquent. James was both steeped in Jewish tradition and well-versed in Greek classics.

The argument is clear. Just as little bits . . . turn grown horses, small rudders guide large ships, and a small spark consumes an entire forest, so the tongue is a small part of the body, but it makes great boasts. The tongue is petite but powerful!

2. THE TONGUE IS PERVERSE (3:6-8)

3:6. The tongue is not only powerful; it is also perverse. It is small and influential but, worse by far, it can be satanic and infectious. The tongue . . . is a fire (cf. Prov. 16:27; 26:18-22), a world of evil. The tongue sets itself up (kathistatai) among the members, or parts of one's anatomy, corrupting, spotting, or staining (spilousa; cf. aspilon, "spotless," in James 1:27) the whole body and inflaming the whole course of . . . life (lit., "the wheel of existence" or "wheel of birth," ton trochon tēs geneseōs). It is as though the tongue is at the center or hub of the wheel of nature and, like a fireworks display, the wheel is set on fire at the center. The more it burns, the faster it revolves until the whole wheel spins in a blaze, spitting fire in all directions. But the tongue is only the fuse; the source of the deadly fire is hell itself (lit., "Gehenna," a place in the Valley of Hinnom south of Jerusalem where human sacrifice had been offered [Jer. 7:31] and where continuous burning of rubbish made it a fit illustration of the lake of fire).

3:7. The tongue is not only like an uncontrolled fire. It is also like an untamed beast. Every kind, or all nature (physis), of wild beasts—birds of the air, reptiles on land, and creatures of the sea—all are being tamed and have been tamed by man (lit., "human nature," physis; thus "beastly nature" is tamed by "human nature"). But no human is able to tame the tongue!

3:8. No one can tame the tongue because it is a restless evil, an unruly, unsteady, staggering, reeling evil (like the "unstable" man of 1:8). Worse yet, the tongue is full of deadly poison (cf. Ps. 140:3). Like the poison of a serpent, the tongue is loaded with the venom of hate and death-dealing gossip.

3. THE TONGUE IS POLLUTED (3:9-12)

3:9-10. Similar to the forked tongue of a snake, man's uncontrolled tongue both emits praise and spews out curses. "Praise," or "saying a good word" (eulogoumen) of our Lord and Father (this is the only place where the NT uses this title of God) is polluted by a "curse," or "wishing evil" (katarōmetha) on men . . . made in God's likeness (cf. Gen. 1:27; 9:6; Col. 1:10). That both praise and cursing should come from the same mouth is incongruous. My brothers, this should not be.

3:11-12. Again James turned to the natural elements to illustrate his point. Anticipating a negative response, James asked, Can both fresh (lit., "sweet," glyky) water and salt (lit., "bitter," pikron) water flow, or "bubble up," from the same spring? Can a fig tree bear olives, or a grapevine bear figs? Of course not. Neither does salt (halykon) make water sweet (glyky). The point is clear: a believer's tongue should not be an instrument of inconsistency.

Small and influential, the tongue must be controlled; satanic and infectious, the tongue must be corralled; salty and inconsistent, the tongue must be cleansed.

B. Cultivate thought (3:13-18)

A key to right talk is right thought. The tongue is contained in a cage of teeth and lips, but it still escapes. It is not intelligence that keeps the lock on that cage; it is wisdom—a wisdom that is characterized by humility, grace, and peace.

1. WISDOM IS HUMBLE (3:13)

3:13. James asked the rhetorical question, Who is wise and understanding among you? "Wise" (sophos; cf. sophias in 1:5) describes one with moral insight and skill in the practical issues of life. "Understanding" (epistēmōn) refers to intellectual perception and scientific acumen.

Let him show it. Here is an original "show and tell." Wisdom is not measured by degrees but by deeds. It is not a matter of acquiring truth in lectures but of applying truth to life. The good life and deeds are best portrayed in the humility of wisdom, or "wise meekness" (prautēti sophias). The truly wise man is humble.

2. WISDOM IS GRACIOUS (3:14-16)

3:14. True wisdom makes no room for bitter envy ("zealous jealousy") or for selfish ambition ("factious rivalry," erithian, from eritheuō, "to spin wool," thus working for personal gain). This is nothing to glory about. To boast (lit., "exult," katakauchasthe) in such attitudes is to deny, or "lie against," the truth.

3:15-16. Envy and strife are clear indicators that one's so-called wisdom is not from above (cf. 1:17), but is earthly, unspiritual ("natural, sensual," psychikē), and of the devil ("demonic," daimoniōdēs). Envy and selfish ambition, or rivalry, can only produce disorder, or confusion, and every evil practice. A truly wise person does not seek glory or gain; he is gracious and giving.

3. WISDOM IS PEACEABLE (3:17-18)

3:17. Wisdom that comes from heaven (lit., "wisdom from above"; cf. "from above" in 1:17) is first . . . pure or "holy" (hagnē), then peace-loving, considerate or "forbearing," submissive or "easy to be entreated" (eupeithēs, only used here in the NT), full of mercy and good fruit, impartial (lit., "without uncertainty"; cf. "not doubt" in 1:6), and sincere ("without hypocrisy").

3:18. Peace is the seed sown that yields a harvest (lit., "fruit") of righteousness. The truly wise man is a man of peace.

To achieve "righteousness," spiritual maturity, practical holiness—the theme of this book—a believer must learn to speak with care. Winsome speech comes from a wise spirit. A controlled tongue is possible only with cultured thought. A mouth filled with praise results from a mind filled with purity.

A believer should stand confidently (chap. 1), serve compassionately (chap. 2), and speak carefully (chap. 3). He should be what God wants him to be, do what God wants him to do, and speak as God wants him to speak.

IV. Submit with Contrition (chap. 4)

Fights, quarrels, lust, hate, envy, pride, and sin are words that stain this portion of James' letter like inkblots. In stark contrast with the closing words of chapter 3, "peacemakers who sow in peace raise a harvest of righteousness," chapter 4 opens with "fights and quarrels." James confronted this despicable behavior with valor. Furthermore he gave clear advice on how to quell the storms that are so detrimental to spiritual growth and maturity. A believer must turn hatred into humility, judgment into justice, and boasting into belief.

A. Turn hatred into humility (4:1-6)

The appearance of conflict among the followers of Jesus stirred James to intense indignation. The severity of his tone in this section is accented by the absence of the words "my brothers," which James used so frequently in other parts of the letter. He revealed the cause of conflict, outlined the consequences of conflict, and proposed a cure for conflict.

1. CAUSE OF CONFLICT (4:1-2)

4:1. Characteristically, James introduced this new section with a rhetorical question, What causes fights and quarrels among you? Where do "fights" (lit., "state of war," polemoi) and "quarrels" (lit., individual disputes or "battles," machai) come from? James answered his own question: from your desires that battle within you. Conflict comes out of (ek) inner sensual lusts or pleasures (hēdonōn; cf. v. 3). Hedonism, the playboy philosophy that makes pleasure mankind's chief end, still wages battles in people's hearts.

4:2. War is the fruit of illicit wants. Lust brings about murder. Covetousness results in the frustration of not obtaining the hotly pursued desires. It all leads to the "quarrels" and "fights," that "battle" against people, mentioned in verse 1. The last part of verse 2, You do not have, because you do not ask God, is best taken with what follows. James did not contend that the reason lust was not gratified was because people failed to ask God to fill those desires. He simply revealed the clear source of conflict deep in covetous human hearts.

2. CONSEQUENCE OF CONFLICT (4:3-4)

4:3. The correct way for Christians to have their legitimate needs met is by asking God. One reason a believer does not receive what he asks for is that he asks with wrong motives (lit., "evilly" or "amiss," kakōs). The verb ask is in the middle voice, meaning, "ask for yourself." The purpose clause that follows further clarifies, that you may spend what you get on your pleasures. "Spend" could be translated "squander." "Pleasures" is again the Greek word hēdonais (cf. v. 1). God will never provide for "hedonistic squandering"!

4:4. Instead of the customary "my brothers," James bristled with you adulterous people. Again he asked a pointed question: Don't you know that friendship (philia) with the world (cf. "world" in 1:27) is hatred toward God? Then he added, Anyone who chooses to be a friend of the world becomes (lit., "is constituted") an enemy of God. The consequence is worse than ending up empty-handed; a rebellious Christian who has an illegitimate relationship with the world is at enmity with God!

3. CURE FOR CONFLICT (4:5-6)

4:5. This is one of the most difficult verses to translate in the entire letter. A very literal translation would be, "Or think you that vainly the Scripture says to envy yearns the spirit which was made to dwell in you, but He gives great grace." Is the "spirit" the Holy Spirit or the human spirit? Is the spirit to be taken as the subject of the verb "yearns" or as its object? Is "envy" to be seen as "unrighteous desire" or as "righteous jealousy"? Numerous translations are possible: (a) "The Spirit who indwells you jealously yearns [for you] and He gives more grace." (b) "He [God] yearns jealously for the Holy Spirit which indwells you and He gives more grace." (c) "The [human] spirit which indwells you yearns to envy, but He [God] gives more grace." The NIV favors the latter idea: Or do you think . . . that the spirit He caused to live in us tends toward envy, but "He gives us more grace?" (v. 6)

Not only is the translation of the sentence a problem, but also the apparent indication that it is a part of Scripture poses difficulties. James' question, typically rhetorical, "or do you think Scripture says without reason" (kenōs, lit., "vainly"), introduces the section. The ambiguous sentence that follows is not a direct quotation of any passage in Scripture. Rather than assume that James quoted some other sacred book, or some unknown Greek translation of the Old Testament, or that he simply referred to the general sense of Scripture, it seems more reasonable to assume that he focused on the quotation in verse 6, a statement clearly taken from Proverbs 3:34: "God opposes the proud but gives grace to the humble" (also quoted in 1 Peter 5:5).

4:6. Whatever questions remain unresolved about verse 5, there is no question about the clear truth of verse 6. God opposes the proud. The word "opposes," or "resists," is antitassetai, a military term meaning "to battle against." To the humble, however, God gives grace. Whether a believer is called to resist his human spirit which tends toward envy or to rejoice in the Holy Spirit who jealously yearns for each believer's edification, the call is to shun pride and to submit humbly to God's authority. The cure for conflict is a humble spirit which is rewarded by God's unmerited favor. James continued by showing in verses 7-12 how humility is related to peaceful justice.

B. Turn judgment into justice (4:7-12)

Apparently the Jewish believers to whom James wrote tended not only to conflict and jealousy but also to condemnation and judgment. Justice, not judgment, is what God requires. Upright, righteous relationships are essential to spiritual growth. Pointed advice for justice is given, the clear advantage of justice is revealed, and the divine author of justice is named.

1. ADVICE FOR JUSTICE (4:7-9)

4:7. In verses 7-9 a whole series of commands (10 aorist imperatives) are given which, if followed, contribute to harmony and holiness. James called for commitment (v. 7), cleansing (v. 8), and contrition (v. 9).

Like a magnet, the call for commitment has both positive and negative poles: submit . . . to God and resist the devil. "Submit" is a military term "to be subordinated" or "to render obedience." "Resist" (antistēte) means "take a stand against." Take a stand against the devil, and he will flee.

4:8. On the other hand draw near to God and He will come near in response. To draw near to God, however, demands His cleansing. Wash your hands, you sinners, and purify your hearts, you double-minded. Both "wash" and "purify" are verbs that refer to ceremonial cleansing, a figure that spoke eloquently to Jewish converts. The need for cleansing is clear from the way James addressed his readers, "you sinners" and "you double-minded" (dipsychoi; cf. 1:8).

4:9. Recognition of the tremendous need for cleansing allows no room for merriment. Grieve (lit., "be afflicted"), mourn, and wail was James' candid advice. Exchange merriment for mourning and gaiety for gloom (lit., "a downcast look, lowered eyes"). A contrite spirit of confession is essential for God's cleansing.

2. ADVANTAGE OF JUSTICE (4:10-11)

4:10. The key is humility. Humble yourselves before the Lord, and He will lift you up. The way up is down. The lowly one becomes the lifted one. There is a marked advantage to humility—eventually it brings honor.

4:11. To slander and judge one another is totally incongruous to the humble spirit God desires. Furthermore, to judge another is actually a judgment of God's Law itself. His Law is a mandate over all people. No one dares assume a haughty position over the Law. The slanderer is sentenced by the Law; the self-styled judge is jeopardized by the Law; only the humble person is honored. True justice is rendered when a believer subjects himself to God in humility and obedience.

3. AUTHOR OF JUSTICE (4:12)

4:12. Only One is above the Law. He alone has the right to modify or overrule it. God is the one Lawgiver and Judge. "Lawgiver" is a compound noun used only here in the New Testament (nomothetēs, from nomos, "law," and tithēmi, "to set, place, constitute, or lay down"). God not only authored the Law; He also administrates the Law. He serves as both the executive and judicial branches of the divine government. God is King; He institutes and declares His Law. God is Judge; He upholds and enforces His Law. He is the One who is able to save and destroy. There is one Author of the Law, one Judge over the Law, and but one Savior from the Law's condemnation. This reminder of a truth well known by James' Jewish readers was also a rebuke to their haughty attitudes and judgmental actions. But you—who are you to judge your neighbor? is another of James' typical penetrating rhetorical questions. A humble attitude and just actions are essential for spiritual growth. James then went on to show how these qualities of life militate against empty boasting.

C. Turn boasting into belief (4:13-17)

In addition to conflict and a judgmental spirit among the brethren, bragging was also apparently prevalent. James gave an example of a boastful statement, struck a condemnatory sentence on such boasting, and offered a practical solution for boasting.

1. STATEMENT OF BOASTING (4:13)

4:13. James' attack was direct. Now listen is literally, "Go now." It is the same construction found in 5:1, a colloquial phrase used only by James in the New Testament. The interjection both goads the reader and gains his undivided attention. The offender attacked by James is a fairly typical businessman who makes his plans apart from God. He is self-assertive in his travel plans: we will go to this or that city; self-confident in his time schedule, spend a year there; and self-centered in his trade relationships, carry on business and make money. "Carry on business" is from a compound verb (emporeusometha, from en, "in," and poreuomai, "to go") from which the English word "emporium" has come. It is related to the noun (emporos) which could be translated "merchant," "trader," "drummer," or "one who goes in and gets the trade." A vivid picture of the Jewish merchant James tried to correct is a go-getter salesman out drumming up business for the bottom-line objective: "Make money!"

2. SENTENCE ON BOASTING (4:14)

4:14. To the selfish hustlers James simply stated, Why, you do not even know what will happen tomorrow. Man's plans are always tentative. His plans are not his own. Time is not his own. In fact, life is not his own. James then fired another of his famous questions: What is your life? The answer is a mist ("vapor, a puff of steam"). Believers need this godly perspective on their earthly sojourn. Among other things, it blasts boasting right out of the selfish, proud quagmire from which it emerged.

3. SOLUTION FOR BOASTING (4:15-17)

4:15. The key to avoiding boasting is to maintain a godly perspective. Instead of making big plans on the human plane, one must expand his view to include God in the picture. In place of vain boasting one should say, If it is the Lord's will, we will live and do this or that. These are not so much words to be used like some charm but a realistic attitude that affects all of one's being and behavior.

4:16. To make sure his readers understood, James reiterated that to boast and brag . . . is evil. Self-centered bragging must be replaced by God-honoring trust. The cure for boasting is belief.

4:17. It is likely that chapter 4's concluding sentence, Anyone, then, who knows the good he ought to do and doesn't do it, sins, is related not only to the matter of boasting but also to all the advice given thus far in the epistle. "Then" (lit., "therefore," oun) supports this contention. James' readers could not plead ignorance. The letter abounds with exhortations to do good. To fail to comply is clearly sin.

To attain spiritual maturity a believer must do the good he now knows. He must stand confidently on God's Word even in trials and temptations. He must compassionately serve his brethren without prejudicial favoritism but with practical faith. He must speak carefully with a controlled tongue and wise, cultivated thought. He must submit in contrition to his all-powerful Father, Lawgiver, and Judge with a humble spirit, just action, and a trusting heart. He must be what God wants him to be, do what God wants him to do, speak as God wants him to speak, and sense what God wants him to sense.

V. Share with Concern (chap. 5)

James continued his attack on self-centered merchants who seem to succeed in their business plans and not only turn a profit but are considered rich with their hoarded wealth. Such wealth James declared waste. Spiritual access is found in sharing, not hoarding, possessions. To those who may have been the victims of the heartless conduct of the rich, or who may have been tempted to turn to similar shortsighted goals, James recommended patience. Finally, to all believers, whether blessed, burdened, or backslidden, James appealed for praise, prayer, and persuasion.

James' concluding remarks center on sharing—sharing one's possessions, sharing with patience, and sharing in prayer.

A. Share in possessions (5:1-6)

The attack begun in the concluding section of chapter 4 is carried into chapter 5 but with greater concentration and condemnation. The rich are denounced. James appears to have included all rich people, both believers (cf. 1:10) and unbelievers (cf. 2:6). There is no plea for reform, only a grim warning that hoarded wealth brings consternation, ends up in corrosion, and results in condemnation.

1. CONSTERNATION FROM WEALTH (5:1)

5:1. The same exclamatory interjection used in 4:13 introduces this section: Now listen (lit., "Go now"). The rich people, so often the object of envy, were the object of James' scorn and condemnation. He put down those who placed their arrogant trust in things which were doomed to decay. Weep and wail, could be elaborated as "burst into tears" (klausate; also in 4:9) and "howl with grief" (ololyzontes, an onomatopoeic verb used only here in the NT). Money brings merriment only temporarily; wealth eventually results in misery (talaipōriais, from talaō, "to undergo, endure," and pōros, "a callus" or "hardened concretion").

2. CORROSION OF WEALTH (5:2-3)

5:2-3. Riches rot, and fine clothes may be chewed up by moths. The story is not from "rags to riches" but from "riches to rags." Gold and silver are the most sought-after metals and have long been considered the material standards for the world. Though they do not rust, they do become corroded. Gold can darken and silver tarnishes. Their corrosion (ios, or "poison," as in 3:8 and Rom. 3:13) is a testimony to the rich man's folly and will consume his flesh like fire. As metals lose their luster, the poison of greed eats up people. The corrosion of wealth is testimony to this sickness of the wealthy. Hoarding for the last days only gives more fuel for the fire that will consume the lost.

3. CONDEMNATION IN WEALTH (5:4-6)

5:4-5. It is not the wealth itself that is condemned, but the greedy attitude toward it and the grisly actions with which it was obtained. God is not deaf to the cries of injustice that rise both from wages withheld in fraud and from the laborers who have been oppressed by the rich. The Jewish converts were well aware of God's Law forbidding holding back on wages (Lev. 19:13; Deut. 24:15) and oppressing the poor (Prov. 3:27-28; Amos 8:4-6; Mal. 3:5). The life of luxury (etryphēsate, "to lead a soft life," used only here in the NT) and self-indulgence (espatalēsate, "to live voluptuously or wantonly," used only here and in 1 Tim. 5:6), is like so much fat for the slaughter. The sarcastic illustration was vivid for Jewish believers who had seen many fattened sheep and oxen meet their fates in sacrifice.

5:6. In the scramble for more wealth, the rich used their influence in courts of justice, and in the process were guilty of bringing condemnation and even death to innocent men who offered no resistance ("innocent men" is lit., "the righteous one" though it probably refers to a class of people rather than to one individual). What began as an interest in money ended as an insensitivity to murder.

A believer who seeks spiritual growth dare not become caught up in the accumulation of wealth for himself. He should share his possessions for God's glory and the good of others.

B. Share in patience (5:7-12)

From the rich, James turned to the restless. For these he again used the friendly address, "brothers." The tone turns from stark condemnation to sensitive consolation. James excoriated the rich but encouraged the receptive. He appealed to his brethren to be patient. He defined the essence of patience, gave some examples of patience, and indicated an evidence of patience.

1. ESSENCE OF PATIENCE (5:7-9)

5:7. Be patient, then (lit., "therefore"), said James as a direct corollary to the coming judgment on the wicked rich. "Be patient" (makrothymēsate) comes from a compound of "long" (makros) and "temper" (thymos). The idea is to set the timer of one's temper for a long run. Think long. Focus on the final lap in the race of life. Have a long fuse. Look ahead to the Lord's coming. The essence of patience is furthermore seen in the farmer who waits patiently (makrothymōn) for the needed rains and the ultimate valuable (lit., "precious") crop.

5:8. The application is clear. Just like the farmer, every believer should be patient and stand firm, because the Lord's coming is near. The Lord's return (parousia) should stimulate every believer to patience and persistence.

5:9. James called for the believers to stop groaning lest they be judged, because Jesus the Judge is standing at the door! In view of the hope of Christ's soon return, believers should cease the petty conflicts to which James alluded in chapter 4. As children in a school classroom look out for their teacher's soon return, God's children should be on guard for Christ's return. In so doing, good behavior and mutual harmony are essential.

2. EXAMPLES OF PATIENCE (5:10-11)

5:10. James reminded his Jewish brothers of the prophets who endured much suffering with patience (makrothymia, lit., "long-temperedness"; cf. v. 7) as they spoke out in the name of the Lord.

5:11. As you know (lit., "behold"), we consider blessed (lit. "happy or fortunate"; makarizomen) those who have persevered. James then presented another well-known and highly revered example of patience, Job. The Lord honored Job's perseverance with multiplied blessings (cf. Job 42:12). Interestingly, James did not say that Job had makrothymia, "patience," but that he had hypomonēn, "steadfastness, endurance, perseverance" (cf. James 1:3; Col. 1:11). Job endured and he was steadfast, though he was impatient with God!

James summed it up: The Lord is full of compassion and mercy. "Full of compassion" is a compound adjective (polysplanchnos, from polys, "much," and splanchna, "innermost parts" or "seat of affections"), used only here in the New Testament. "Mercy," also rare (oiktirmōn, from the verb oikteirō, "to pity") is found only here and in Luke 6:36.

3. EVIDENCE OF PATIENCE (5:12)

5:12. Above all, my brothers, concluded James, do not swear or take an empty oath. For those who truly demonstrate the persistence and patience prescribed for believers, there is no need to invoke an oath, whether by heaven or by earth, that their word is certain. ("Swear" does not refer to profanity but to taking an oath.) The testimony should be such that when one says yes, it means yes, and when he says no, that is just what he means (cf. Matt. 5:37). The soon return of the Lord, the Judge who stands at the door (James 5:9), is motivation enough for this kind of honesty and trustworthiness, lest one be condemned (lit., "fall under judgment").

C. Share in prayer (5:13-20)

A fitting climax to James' letter is his emphasis on prayer. The greatest assistance any believer can offer another is faithful prayer. Prayer is clear evidence of care. Prayer is the "hotline" to the One who can provide for any need no matter how complex or impossible it may seem. To share in prayer, a believer must have a sensitivity to someone's needs, engage in diligent supplication for those needs, and recognize the significance of those needs.

1. SENSITIVITY TO NEEDS (5:13)

5:13. Perhaps the two greatest weaknesses in the average church today are the areas of prayer and praise. The reason for these weaknesses may be traced to insensitivity. There is much need for prayer and much cause to praise. Suffering should elicit prayer. Sufficiency should elicit praise. James used several questions to stress these points. Is any one of you in trouble? "In trouble" (kakopathei, "suffering ill"; cf. v. 10) relates to suffering from any source. Is anyone happy? Let him sing songs of praise. "Praise" (psalletō) originally meant "to play on a stringed instrument." The verb is used only four times in the New Testament (cf. Rom. 15:9; 1 Cor. 14:15; Eph. 5:19).

2. SUPPLICATION FOR NEEDS (5:14-18)

5:14-15. James asked a third question and then answered it fully. Is any one of you sick? A great deal of misunderstanding has resulted from these verses. Some seem to teach from this passage that full physical health is always just a prayer away. Others have found in this passage justification for "extreme unction" (a practice begun in the eighth century). Still others have tried to relate the process outlined by James to the modern practice of invoking God ("pray over him") and using medicine ("anoint him with oil")—prayer plus a physician.

The heart of the problem lies in just what James meant when he referred to the "sick." Actually there is no reason to consider "sick" as referring exclusively to physical illness. The word asthenei literally means "to be weak." Though it is used in the Gospels for physical maladies, it is generally used in Acts and the Epistles to refer to a weak faith or a weak conscience (cf. Acts 20:35; Rom. 6:19; 14:1; 1 Cor. 8:9-12). That it should be considered "weak" in this verse is clear in that another Greek word (kamnonta) in James 5:15, translated sick person, literally means "to be weary." The only other use in the New Testament (Heb. 12:3) of that word clearly emphasizes this same meaning.

James was not referring to the bedfast, the diseased, or the ill. Instead he wrote to those who had grown weary, who had become weak both morally and spiritually in the midst of suffering. These are the ones who should call for the help of the elders of the church. The early church leaders were instructed (1 Thes. 5:14) to "encourage the timid" and "help the weak" (asthenōn).

James said that the elders should pray over him and anoint him with oil. It is significant that the word "anoint" is aleipsantes ("rub with oil") not chriō ("ceremonially anoint"). The former is the "mundane" word and the latter is "the sacred and religious word" (Richard Chenevix Trench, Synonyms of the New Testament, ninth ed. Reprint. Grand Rapids: Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Co., 1950, pp. 136-7). "Therefore James is not suggesting a ceremonial or ritual anointing as a means of divine healing; instead, he is referring to the common practice of using oil as a means of bestowing honor, refreshment, and grooming" (Daniel R. Hayden, "Calling the Elders to Pray," Bibliotheca Sacra 138. July–September 1981:264). The woman "poured" (aleiphō) perfume on Jesus' feet (Luke 7:38). A host "put oil" (aleiphō) on the head of his guest (Luke 7:46). A person who is fasting should not be sad and ungroomed, but should "put oil" (aleiphō) on his head, and wash his face (Matt. 6:17). Thus James' point is that the "weak" (asthenei) and "weary" (kamnonta) would be refreshed, encouraged, and uplifted by the elders who rubbed oil on the despondents' heads and prayed for them.

For the fallen, discouraged, distressed weary believer, restoration is assured and the elders' prayer offered in faith will make the sick person (lit., "weary one") well (i.e., will restore him from discouragement and spiritual defeat), and the Lord will raise him up.

That the restoration is spiritual, not physical, is further clarified by the assurance, if he has sinned, he will be forgiven. Many physically ill Christians have called on elders to pray for them and to anoint them with oil, but a sizable percentage of them have remained sick. This fact suggests that the passage may have been mistakenly understood as physical restoration rather than spiritual restoration.

5:16. The conclusion is clear: therefore confess your sins to each other and pray for each other. A mutual concern for one another is the way to combat discouragement and downfall. The cure is in personal confession and prayerful concern. The healing (that you may be healed) is not bodily healing but healing of the soul (iathēte; cf. Matt. 13:15; Heb. 12:13; 1 Peter 2:24). It is the powerful and effective . . . prayer of a righteous person that brings the needed cure from God. This of course relates to the closing two verses of James' letter. If James 5:14-16 refer to physical healing, then those verses seem disjointed with the verses before and after them.

5:17-18. James again gave an example well known to his Jewish audience. First, it was the prophets (v. 10), then Job (v. 11), and now Elijah. James identified Elijah as a fellow sufferer. A man just like us could be translated "a man of like feeling" or "of similar suffering" (homoiopathēs; cf. kakopathei in vv. 10, 13). Elijah knew all the frailties of human nature but "in prayer he prayed" (proseuchē prosēyxato), that is, he prayed earnestly, and rain was withheld and later restored (1 Kings 17:1; 18:41-46). Earnest and persistent prayer, of course, is essential, whereas halfhearted prayer is self-defeating (cf. James 1:6-8).

3. SIGNIFICANCE OF NEEDS (5:19-20)

5:19-20. James' last appeal to his readers has a touch of tenderness and a clear note of encouragement to those who have helped others who have grown weary and have fallen from the way. My brothers, he wrote, "if any one among you strays from the truth, and someone turns him around, let him know that the one who turns him back from his error will save his soul from death and will hide a multitude of sins" (author's trans.).

These who have lost their way are the "sick ones" of the church family. They have wandered away. The Greek word here (planēthē) suggests one who has missed his path and is hopelessly lost. "Planet" was taken from this Greek word to convey the idea that the luminaries were "wandering stars" (cf. Jude 13), not "fixed" like the rest.

Wandering ones need to be brought back to the fold. James referred here not to evangelism but to restoration. Revival, not redemption, is in view. The rescue action is of great significance. A lost sheep is saved from destruction and his sins (the sins of the restored one, not the restorer) are covered as if a veil were thrown over them (cf. 1 Peter 4:8). He can move ahead again on the path toward spiritual maturity.

James has given clear instructions about how to achieve practical holiness and spiritual maturity. His pointed exhortations were designed to stab the consciences and stir the souls of his beloved Jewish brothers. Stand with confidence, serve with compassion, speak with care, submit with contrition, and share with concern. A believer should be what God wants him to be, do what God wants him to do, say what God wants him to say, sense what God wants him to sense, and share what God wants him to share. Spiritual maturity involves every aspect of life.

1 PETER

Roger M. Raymer

INTRODUCTION

First Peter was written to Christians who were experiencing various forms of persecution, men and women whose stand for Jesus Christ made them aliens and strangers in the midst of a pagan society. Peter exhorted these Christians to steadfast endurance and exemplary behavior. The warmth of his expressions combined with his practical instructions make this epistle a unique source of encouragement for all believers who live in conflict with their culture.

Authorship. First Peter 1:1 clearly identifies the author as "Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ." His given name was Simon, but Jesus, on meeting him, said he would be called Cephas (John 1:42). The Greek translation of the Aramaic word Cephas is "petros," and the word in both languages means "stone" or "rock." Jesus' description of Simon's future strength of character became his personal name. Interestingly he is the only man in the New Testament called Peter.

Until relatively recent times the authenticity of the epistle's claim to apostolic authorship went unchallenged. Then some modern scholars noted that Peter was considered by Jewish religious leaders as "unschooled" and "ordinary" (Acts 4:13). The superb literary style and sophisticated use of vocabulary in 1 Peter seem to indicate that its author must have been a master of the Greek language. Those who deny Peter's authorship say that such an artistic piece of Greek literature could not possibly have flowed from the pen of a Galilean fisherman.

Though Peter could be called "unschooled" and though Greek was not his native tongue, he was by no means ordinary. The Jewish leaders saw Peter as unschooled simply because he had not been trained in rabbinical tradition, not because he was illiterate. Luke also recorded (Acts 4:13) that these same leaders were astonished by Peter's confidence and the power of his Spirit-controlled personality. Peter's public ministry spanned more than 30 years and took him from Jerusalem to Rome. He lived and preached in a multilingual world. It is reasonable to believe that after three decades Peter could have mastered the language of the majority of those to whom he ministered.

The rhetorical style and use of metaphor employed in 1 Peter could just as easily be credited to an accomplished public speaker as to a literary scholar. Certainly Peter had the time and talent to become an outstanding communicator of the gospel via the Greek language.

Any further doubts of Petrine authorship based on linguistic style may be answered by the fact that Peter apparently employed Silas as his secretary (1 Peter 5:12). Silas, though a Jerusalem Christian, was a Roman citizen (Acts 16:36-37) and may have had great facility in the Greek language. But whether or not Silas aided Peter with the grammatical Greek nuances, the epistle's content still remains Peter's personal message, stamped with his personal authority.

The parallels between this letter and Peter's sermons recorded in Acts are significant (cf. 1 Peter 1:20 with Acts 2:23 and 1 Peter 4:5 with Acts 10:42). One of the more striking examples is the similarity between 1 Peter 2:7-8 and Acts 4:10-11. In each passage Psalm 118:22 is quoted and applied to Christ. It is interesting that Peter was present when Christ Himself used Psalm 118:22 to refer to His rejection by the Jewish leaders (Matt. 21:42).

Another allusion to Jesus' ministry that strongly supports Peter's authorship is the command to elders in 1 Peter 5:2 to "be shepherds." The only other place in the New Testament where this word is used as a command is in John 21:16, where Jesus gave Peter the same charge. In several other passages the author referred to being an eyewitness of Christ's earthly ministry (1 Peter 1:8; 2:23; 5:1).

This epistle exerted a wide influence on early Christian writings. The letters of Polycarp, Clement, and Irenaeus (to name only a few) show that the early church unquestionably accepted the authenticity of 1 Peter. The letter's content and the witness of church history support beyond any reasonable doubt the simple affirmation made in verse 1. The letter indeed comes from "Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ."

Date. Peter wrote this epistle apparently just before or shortly after the beginning of Nero's persecution of the church in A.D. 64. Since Peter referred to the government as still functioning (an institution which commends those who do right and punishes those who do wrong; 2:13-14), some believe that the church was not yet facing an organized Roman persecution. Evidently repressive laws had not yet been enacted specifically against Christians. It was still possible for Peter's readers to "honor the king" (2:17). The persecution and suffering that Peter did refer to was primarily social and religious rather than legal. A hostile pagan society would slander, ridicule, discriminate against, and even inflict physical abuse on those whose lifestyles had radically changed because of their faith in Christ.

However, Peter seemed to indicate that greater persecution was imminent. He assured his readers (1:6) that they could rejoice though they "may have had to suffer grief in all kinds of trials." Peter exhorted them to prepare, to be self-controlled (1:13), possibly to suffer as Christians according to God's will (4:19). So perhaps Nero's severe persecution had already begun in Rome and was spreading to the provinces to which Peter was writing. This would place the date of the letter in late A.D. 64 or early 65.

The suggestion that the persecution had already begun in Rome also explains why Peter would refer cryptically to his location as "Babylon" (5:13). Peter was in Rome during the last decade of his life. His martyrdom is dated about A.D. 67. At the time of the writing of 1 Peter he was not in the custody of the Roman officials, and evidently wished to conceal his true location. (Other scholars, however, say that Peter was in the literal city of Babylon, where a Jewish community then flourished.)

Destination. First Peter is addressed to Christians scattered throughout five Roman provinces of the peninsula of Asia Minor. That area today is northern Turkey. The churches in those provinces were made up of both Jews and Gentiles. This epistle is rich in references to and quotations from the Old Testament. Jewish Christians would have found special significance in the term diasporas, translated "scattered," used in the salutation (1:1). Jews who lived outside of Jerusalem were referred to as living in the diaspora.

Gentile readers would have noted Peter's exhortation to holy living in light of their background of complete ignorance of God's Word (1:14). Gentile Christians also would have been greatly encouraged by the fact that though they were in ignorance, they were now considered "the people of God" (2:10). Clearly Peter carefully included both Jewish and Gentile Christians in his letter of encouragement to the churches of Asia Minor.

Purpose. This epistle could be understood as a handbook written for ambassadors to a hostile foreign land. The author, knowing persecution would arise, carefully prescribed conduct designed to bring honor to the One they represented. The purpose then of 1 Peter was to encourage Christians to face persecution so that the true grace of Jesus Christ would be evidenced in them (5:12).

This epistle gives a theology of practical exhortation and comfort for believers' daily needs. Peter concretely linked doctrine with practice. The new birth gives a living hope to those in the midst of persecution. New conduct is prescribed because Christ endured unjust suffering. New behavior is required to demonstrate the grace of God to an unbelieving and hostile world. And new responsibilities are placed on the leaders and members of the body of Christ since they should stand together as living stones against the onrushing tide of persecution.

Those who read 1 Peter are encouraged to lift their eyes from present problems and trials and behold the vistas provided by an eternal perspective. For though believers may for a while suffer grief in trials, they wait for an inheritance that can never perish, spoil, or fade.

OUTLINE

I. Customary Salutation (1:1-2)
  A. Identification of the author (1:1a)
  B. Identification of those addressed (1:1b-2)
II. Chosen for New Birth (1:3–2:10)
  A. The new birth's living hope (1:3-12)
    1. The future inheritance (1:3-5)

COMMENTARY

I. Customary Salutation (1:1-2)

The introductory greeting is the common form of salutation used in first-century correspondence. Paul's letters usually began in the same manner, identifying both the author and those to whom the letters were addressed.

A. Identification of the author (1:1a)

1:1a. Peter is the Greek translation of the Aramaic Cephas, the name Jesus gave Simon when he was called to be a disciple (John 1:42). Nobody else in the New Testament could be identified as Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ. This bold statement of apostolic authority is supported both by internal evidence in the text and by its early and universal acceptance as a part of the canon of Scripture.

B. Identification of those addressed (1:1b-2)

1:1b-2. Peter immediately, using a careful choice of words, began to comfort and encourage his readers. Christians are God's elect not by chance or human design but by God's sovereign, unconditional choice. Once only the nation of Israel could claim this title.

It is not surprising that those who have been chosen by God are seen as strangers in the world (from the one word parepidēmois, that emphasizes both foreign nationality and temporary residence; cf. 2:11). Christians, whose citizenship is in heaven (cf. Phil. 3:20), live in the midst of a pagan society as aliens and sojourners, displaced persons whose thoughts should often turn toward their true home.

The readers were scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, sprinkled like salt throughout five of Asia Minor's Roman provinces. The letter was evidently meant to circulate among the churches in this area. "Scattered" (diasporas) had special meaning to the Jewish Christians in these churches. The diaspora referred to Jews who were separated from their homeland. Peter adapted this word which previously described Israel to emphasize the condition of the early church.

Peter elaborated on the descriptive term "God's elect" (cf. 2:9) who have been chosen according to the foreknowledge of God. God's choice is part of His predetermined plan, and is not based on any merit in those who are elected, but solely on His grace and love for them before their creation.

As the Williams translation puts it, God's choosing is "in accordance with" (kata) or in keeping with His foreknowledge. This seems preferable to the view that election follows or is based on foreknowledge. Moreover the word for foreknowledge (prognōsin) means more than a passive foresight; it contains the idea of "having regard for" or "centering one's attention on" (cf. Kenneth S. Wuest, First Peter in the Greek New Testament for the English Reader, p. 15). The same word is used in 1:20 of Christ who was "chosen" by the Father before Creation. The Father did more than merely know about His Son ahead of time; He knew Him completely. Thus God chose all those on whom He focused His attention (by His grace, not because of their merit).

The sanctifying work of the Spirit has set these chosen ones apart for service, putting God's choice and purpose into effect. The result of the Spirit's work is obedience . . . and sprinkling by His blood. "Obedience" (hypakoēn, from hypakouō, "to hear under, to hearken") is man's responsibility to be submissive to God's Word (cf. Ex. 24:7; Rom. 1:5; 15:18; 16:26). One living in obedience is constantly being cleansed with Christ's blood and is thus "set apart" from the world (cf. 1 John 1:7, 9). The blood sprinkling is redolent of the Old Testament priestly work at the tabernacle (Lev. 7:14; 14:7, 16, 51; 16:14-15; cf. Heb. 9:13; 12:24), which required obedience on the part of the offerers. However, the only time people were sprinkled with blood was at the inauguration of the Mosaic Covenant (Ex. 24:8).

In these words (1 Peter 1:2) Peter laid the theological foundations for this letter of encouragement. "God" the Father in His grace had chosen them and God the "Spirit" had sanctified them through the atoning blood of God the Son, Jesus Christ. (All three Persons of the Trinity are mentioned in this verse.) Thus Peter greeted his readers with the prayerful wish that they might experience in abundance God's grace (charis) and peace (eirēnē, equivalent of the Heb. šālôm; cf. 5:14). The words (lit.) "Grace to you and peace be multiplied" are also used in 2 Peter 1:2. God's grace was dear to Peter, for he referred to it 10 times in this epistle (1 Peter 1:2, 10, 13; 2:19-20 [trans. "commendable" in these two verses]; 3:7; 4:10; 5:5, 10, 12).

II. Chosen for New Birth (1:3–2:10)

Peter continued to present the theological basis for encouragement in persecution. The stress throughout this section is on God's grace toward believers, evidenced by His sovereign call to salvation and its results in a believer's life. In the midst of trials one's new birth is the source of a living hope and a lifestyle of holiness.

A. The new birth's living hope (1:3-12)

In a doxology of praise to God, Peter encouraged his readers by reminding them that the new birth gave them a living hope in an imperishable future inheritance. The inheritance is sure because believers are shielded by the power of God till it is ready to be revealed. Consequently Christians may rejoice even when they face trials, since trials will prove their faith genuine and thus bring greater glory to Christ. Finally the new birth's hope is based not only on a future inheritance and present blessings but also on the written Word of God.

1. THE FUTURE INHERITANCE (1:3-5)

1:3. The contemplation of God's grace caused Peter to praise God, the Author of salvation and the Source of hope. The words Praise be to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ are identical in 2 Corinthians 1:3. The phrase in His great mercy refers to God's unmerited favor toward sinners in their hopeless condition. He has given us new birth; people can do nothing to merit such a gift. The words "has given . . . new birth" translate anagennēsas, from the verb "beget again" or "cause to be born again." It is used only twice in the New Testament, both times in this chapter (1 Peter 1:3, 23). Peter may have been recalling Jesus' interview with Nicodemus (John 3:1-21). The "new birth" results in a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. The "living hope" is based on the living resurrected Christ (cf. 1 Peter 1:21). The Christian's assurance in Christ is as certain and sure as the fact that Christ is alive! Peter used the word "living" six times (1:3, 23; 2:4-5; 4:5-6). Here "living" means that the believer's hope is sure, certain, and real, as opposed to the deceptive, empty, false hope the world offers.

1:4. The sure hope is of a future inheritance (klēronomian). This same word is used in the Septuagint to refer to Israel's promised possession of the land (cf. Num. 26:54, 56; 34:2; Josh. 11:23); it was her possession, granted to her as a gift from God. A Christian's inheritance cannot be destroyed by hostile forces, and it will not spoil like overripened fruit or fade in color. Peter used three words, each beginning with the same letter and ending with the same syllable, to describe in a cumulative fashion this inheritance's permanence: can never perish (aphtharton), spoil (amianton), or fade (amaranton). This inheritance is as indestructible as God's Word (cf. 1 Peter 1:23, where Peter again used aphtharton). Each Christian's inheritance of eternal life is kept in heaven or "kept watch on" by God so its ultimate possession is secure (cf. Gal. 5:5).

1:5. Not only is the inheritance guarded, but heirs who have been born into that inheritance are shielded by God's power. "Shielded" (phrouroumenous) is a military term, used to refer to a garrison within a city (Phil. 4:7 uses the same Gr. word). What greater hope could be given to those undergoing persecution than the knowledge that God's power guards them from within, to preserve them for an inheritance of salvation that will be completely revealed to them in God's presence. Believers possess salvation now (pres. tense) but will sense its full significance at the return of Christ in the last time. This final step, or ultimate completion of "the salvation of their souls" (1 Peter 1:9), will come "when Jesus Christ is revealed," a clause Peter used twice (vv. 7, 13).

2. THE PRESENT JOY (1:6-9)

1:6. A living hope results in a present joy. In this likely refers to the truths mentioned in verses 3-5. Peter encouraged his readers to put their knowledge into practice. Their response to the tremendous theological truths taught so far should be that they would greatly rejoice. Knowledge alone cannot produce the great joy of experiential security and freedom from fear in the face of persecution. God's omnipotent sovereignty needs to be coupled with human responsibility. Christians are responsible to respond in faith. Faith turns sound doctrine into sound practice. Faith acts on the content of theology and produces conduct that corresponds to that content. Faith makes theological security experiential. The Apostle John wrote, "This is the victory that has overcome the world, even our faith" (1 John 5:4). This kind of faith or living hope can enable believers to rejoice even when they are called on to suffer grief in all kinds of trials.

Peter stressed that a Christian's joy is independent of his circumstances. James used the same two Greek words (poikilois peirasmois, trans. here "all kinds of trials"). The trials themselves are seen as occasions for joy (James 1:2). Though trials may cause temporary grief, they cannot diminish that deep, abiding joy which is rooted in one's living hope in Christ Jesus.

1:7. These various trials—which seem to refer to persecution rather than life's normal problems—have two results: (a) they refine or purify one's faith—much as gold is refined by fire when its dross is removed, and (b) trials prove the reality of one's faith. Stress deepens and strengthens a Christian's faith and lets its reality be displayed. The word dokimazomenou, rendered proved genuine, means "to test for the purpose of approving" (cf. dokimion, "testing," in v. 7 ["the trial of your faith," KJV] and James 1:3, and dokimon, "test," in James 1:12).

In addition to comparing faith to gold, Peter contrasted purified faith with purified gold. Faith is more precious, of greater worth, than gold. Even refined gold, though it lasts a long time, eventually perishes (cf. 1 Peter 1:18; cf. James 5:3). It will be valueless in the marketplace of eternity. But faith "purchases" an inheritance that can never perish.

Genuine faith is not only of ultimate value to its possessor, but it will also bring praise, glory, and honor to the One whose name Christians bear, when He will return (is revealed; cf. 5:1) to claim them as His own. "Is revealed" translates apokalypsei, from which comes "apocalypse" (cf. 1:5, 12, and comments on v. 13).

1:8. Here is the climax of the experiential joy that results from faith. God accomplished salvation through the work of His Son Jesus Christ. So the focus of a believer's faith is not on abstract knowledge but on the person of Christ. The apostle's warm heart overflowed as he spoke of the love and belief in Christ of those who, unlike himself, did not see Jesus when He walked on earth. Peter may have had in mind Jesus' words: "Blessed are those who have not seen and yet have believed" (John 20:29). Yet, though Christians do not now see Him, like Peter they love and believe in Him, and are also filled with an inexpressible and glorious joy. The verb agalliasthe ("are filled with . . . joy") was used by Peter in 1 Peter 1:6, "you greatly rejoice," and agalliōmenoi is used in 4:13.

1:9. Believers can rejoice because they are (pres. tense) receiving (komizomenoi, "to receive as a reward") what was promised, namely salvation, the goal or culmination (telos, "end") of . . . faith. For those who love and believe in Jesus Christ, salvation is past ("He has given us new birth," v. 3), present ("through faith are shielded by God's power," v. 5), and future (it is their "inheritance," v. 4, which will "be revealed in the last time," v. 5, and is "the goal of your faith," v. 9). Since each day brings believers closer to that final day, they are now "receiving" it. All of this—in spite of persecution which deepens and demonstrates one's faith—is certainly cause for "inexpressible and glorious joy"! (v. 8)

3. THE PAST REVELATION (1:10-12)

1:10-12. The living hope of the new birth springs not only from believers' future inheritance and present experience but also from their faith in God's written Word (v. 11). Peter iterated that faith is not based on the mere writings of men but on the Word of God. Concerning this salvation (cf. "salvation" in vv. 5, 9) the prophets . . . searched intently and with the greatest care their own Spirit-guided writings. They longed to participate in this salvation and coming period of grace and tried to discover the appointed time and circumstances to which the Spirit of Christ in them was pointing. They pondered how the glorious Messiah could be involved in suffering. Again Peter echoed the teachings of Christ (cf. Matt. 13:17).

In 1 Peter 1:10-12 the apostle gave a practical illustration of the doctrine of the inspiration of Scripture he clearly stated in 2 Peter 1:20-21. The prophets did not fully understand all that the Holy Spirit had authored through them. It was the Spirit who predicted the sufferings of Christ (Isa. 53) and the glories that would follow (Isa. 11). Peter's readers would be encouraged by this reminder that Christ's suffering was followed by glory. They too would experience glory after their suffering (cf. 1 Peter 5:10).

Peter gave further encouragement (1:12), stating that the prophets understood they were not writing for themselves but for those who would live later, those who would hear the gospel proclaimed by the Holy Spirit (cf. "the Spirit of Christ," v. 11), and consequently follow Christ. In the ultimate stage of believers' salvation they will experience glory, not suffering. The writer of Hebrews also referred to this "ultimate" salvation (Heb. 1:14; 2:3).

The reality of the Christian's living hope was held in awe and wonder by the angelic hosts of heaven. Prophets and angels alike wondered about "this salvation" in the grace that was to come (v. 10).

B. The new birth's holiness (1:13–2:10)

The believers' living hope based on their new birth should lead to a lifestyle of holiness. Those chosen for new birth are also called to be holy. Peter exhorted his readers to prepare to meet the challenge of obedience by adopting a new mind-set. The price paid for a believer's redemption calls for reverence and obedience. Obedience involves purifying oneself and practicing holy living, while offering spiritual sacrifices as a royal priest.

1. THE PREPARATION (1:13-16)

1:13-16. Peter now gave five pointed exhortations: prepare your minds for action; be self-controlled; set your hope.

. . . do not conform to . . . evil desires. . . . be holy. Actually in the Greek the first, second, and fourth are participles, which are subordinate to two commands: "have hope" and "be holy." The participles either support the commands (i.e., have hope, with a prepared mind and self-control; and be holy, not conforming to evil desires) or they take the role of commands, as in the NIV.

(1) "Prepare your minds for action" (v. 13). Obedience is a conscious act of the will. Christians in conflict need a tough-minded holiness that is ready for action.

(2) "Be self-controlled" (v. 13; cf. 4:7; 5:8; 1 Thes. 5:6, 8). This word nēphontes, from the verb nēphō ("be sober") is used only figuratively in the New Testament. It means to be free from every form of mental and spiritual "drunkenness" or excess. Rather than being controlled by outside circumstances, believers should be directed from within.

(3) "Set your hope fully" (1 Peter 1:13). Holy living demands determination. A believer's hope is to be set perfectly (teleiōs, completely or unchangeably), and without reserve on the grace (cf. v. 10) to be bestowed when Jesus Christ is revealed (lit., "in the revelation [apokalypsei] of Jesus Christ"; cf. the same phrase in v. 7; also cf. the verb "be revealed" [apokalyphthēnai] in v. 5). Four times Peter has already spoken of the Savior's return and the accompanying ultimate stage of salvation (vv. 5, 7, 9, 13).

The strenuous mental preparation suggested by the three admonitions in verse 13 is needed so that Christians (4) do not conform to (syschēmatizomenoi, also used in Rom. 12:1) the evil desires (1 Peter 1:14) of their past sinful lives (cf. Eph. 2:3), when they were ignorant of God (cf. Eph. 4:18). Rather as obedient children (lit., "children of obedience") they were to mold their characters to (5) "be holy" in all they did (1 Peter 1:15). Their lifestyle was to reflect not their former ignorance (agnoia), but the holy (hagioi) nature of their heavenly Father who gave them new birth and called them (cf. "called" in 2 Peter 1:3) to be His own. First Peter 1:15-16 do not speak of legal requirements but are a reminder of a Christian's responsibility in his inner life and outer walk. Though absolute holiness can never be achieved in this life, all areas of life should be in the process of becoming completely conformed to God's perfect and holy will. The quotation in verse 16 was familiar to all who knew the Old Testament (Lev. 11:44-45; 19:2; 20:7).

2. THE PRICE (1:17-21)

The high cost of salvation—the beloved Son's precious blood—calls for believers to live in reverent fear before God. Holy living is motivated by a God-fearing faith which does not take lightly what was purchased at so great a cost.

1:17-19. Obedient children know the holy nature and just character of this One who judges . . . impartially. Their right to call God Father leads to their obeying Him in reverent fear. So they are to live according to His absolute standards, as strangers (cf. "aliens" in 2:11) to the world's shifting, situational ethics. "Reverent fear" is evidenced by a tender conscience, a watchfulness against temptation, and avoiding things that would displease God. Children of obedience should also be strangers to their former empty way of life (cf. v. 14) handed down from their forebears, since they have been redeemed (elytrōthēte, from lytroō, "to pay a ransom") with the precious (cf. 2:4, 6-7) blood of Christ (cf. 1:2). That redemption is a purchasing from the marketplace of sin, a ransom not paid by silver or gold, which perish (cf. v. 7), but with the priceless blood of a perfect Lamb. Similar to the sacrificial lambs which were to be without . . . defect, Christ was sinless, uniquely qualified as "the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (John 1:29; cf. Heb. 9:14).

1:20-21. This payment for sin was planned before the Creation of the world and revealed for people's sake through the Incarnation of Jesus Christ. (The pres. Age is these last times [v. 20] whereas the coming Age is "the last time" [v. 5].) It is through Christ, whom the Father resurrected (cf. v. 3) and glorified in His Ascension (John 17:5; Heb. 1:3) that people may come to know and trust in God. As a result of God's eternal plan and priceless payment for sin, faith and hope can be placed in Him. (Cf. "faith" in 1 Peter 1:5, 7, 9; and "hope" in vv. 3, 13.)

3. THE PURIFICATION (1:22–2:3)

The response of holy living that should result from the new birth is now applied to three areas. Obedience to the truth purifies and produces (a) a sincere love for the brethren (1: 22-25), (b) repentance from sin (2:1), and (c) a desire for spiritual growth (2:2).

1:22. Holy living demands purification. A positive result of obeying the truth is a purified life (cf. v. 2b). "How can a young man keep his way pure? By living according to Your Word" (Ps. 119:9). As trials refine faith, so obedience to God's Word refines character. One who has purified himself by living according to God's Word has discovered the joy of obedience.

A changed life should also be evidenced by a changed relationship with God's other children. A purified life allows one to love purely those who share the same faith. Sincere (anypokriton) could also be rendered "without hypocrisy." All evil thoughts and feelings regarding one's brothers and sisters in Christ must be removed, for His followers are to love . . . deeply, from the heart. This kind of loving (agapēsate, from agapē) can come only from a changed heart, from one whose motives are pure, and who seeks to give more than he takes. This love is to be expressed not shallowly but "deeply" (ektenōs, "at full stretch" or "in an all-out manner, with an intense strain"; cf. ektenē in 1 Peter 4:8).

1:23-25. Peter again reminded his readers that they had experienced the new birth (cf. v. 3): For you have been born again. This supernatural event made it possible for them to obey the truth, purify themselves, and love the brethren. This change in their lives would not die, because it took place through God's Word, which is imperishable (aphthartou, the word in v. 4 that described a believer's inheritance), living and enduring. Peter supported his exhortation (v. 22) by quoting Isaiah 40:6-8 (1 Peter 1:24-25). All that is born of perishable seed withers and falls, but God's Word stands forever. This imperishable Word was the content of Peter's preaching (cf. v. 12). His hearers must be affected by its life-changing power, as indicated in 2:1-3.

2:1. Repentance was called for: Therefore, rid yourselves. Peter then listed five sins of attitude and speech, which if harbored would drive wedges between believers. Malice (kakian) is wicked ill-will; deceit (dolon) is deliberate dishonesty; hypocrisy (hypokriseis), pretended piety and love; envy (phthonous), resentful discontent; and slander (katalalias), backbiting lies. None of these should have any place in those who are born again. Rather, in obedience to the Word, believers are to make decisive breaks with the past.

2:2. Peter wanted his readers to be as eager for the nourishment of the Word as babies are for milk. After believers cast out impure desires and motives (v. 1), they then need to feed on wholesome spiritual food that produces growth. (Pure [adolon] is deliberately contrasted with "deceit" [dolon] in v. 1. God's Word does not deceive; neither should God's children.) Christians should approach the Word with clean hearts and minds (v. 1) in eager anticipation, with a desire to grow spiritually. The words in your salvation (lit., "unto salvation") recall the ultimate fulfillment of salvation spoken of in 1:5, 7, 9, 13.

2:3. Quoting Psalm 34:8, Peter continued the milk analogy used in 1 Peter 2:2 and likened their present knowledge of Christ to tasting. They had taken a sample, having experienced God's grace in their new birth, and had found that indeed the Lord is good.

4. THE PRACTICE (2:4-10)

Peter then used a new metaphor in his exhortation to holy living. His readers, having purified themselves, were ready for the practice or ministry of holiness. No longer babies, they were to grow up together to offer spiritual sacrifices as a chosen "royal priesthood."

2:4. As you come to Him does not refer to the initial response of a sinner who comes to Christ for salvation. The participle's tense and voice indicate that this coming is a personal, habitual approach. It is an intimate association of communion and fellowship between believers and their Lord.

The first step in practicing holiness is fellowship with Jesus Christ, the living Stone. Here Peter used a unique figure of speech. In 1:3 he referred to a "living hope" and in 1:23 to the "living . . . Word"; then in 2:4 he referred to Christ as "the living Stone." Peter developed and explained the metaphor of the stone in the following verses. Here he said this Stone is living. It has life in itself and gives life to others. People may enter into personal, vital relationships with this "living Stone." Whereas Christ was rejected by men . . . God had chosen Him (cf. 1:20) and held Him precious (cf. 1:19; 2:4, 7). Christians rejected by the world may take heart in the knowledge that they are the elect (1:1), valued (1:18) by God.

2:5. Believers are identified with Christ, for He is the living Stone and they are like living stones. And as they become more like Him, further conformed to His image, they are being built into a spiritual house. Jesus told Peter, "On this rock I will build My church" (Matt. 16:18). Now Peter (1 Peter 2:4-5) clearly identified Christ as the Rock on which His church is built. Paul called the church a "temple" (1 Cor. 3:16; Eph. 2:21) and "a dwelling" (Eph. 2:22). Believers not only make up the church but serve in it, ministering as a holy priesthood, offering spiritual sacrifices. All believers are priests (cf. 1 Peter 2:9; Heb. 4:16; Rev. 1:6) and need no mediator other than Jesus Christ to approach God directly. Such priestly service requires holiness (cf. 1 Peter 1:16, 22). Praise to God and doing good to others are spiritual sacrifices that please Him (Heb. 13:15). However, "living stones" may also offer themselves as "living sacrifices" (Rom. 12:1), acceptable to God through Jesus Christ.

2:6. In verses 6-8 Peter marshaled Old Testament support about the stone from three passages. His first source is Isaiah 28:16, where Christ is the chosen and precious (cf. "precious" in 1 Peter 1:19; 2:4, 7) cornerstone. A cornerstone is the visible support on which the rest of the building relies for strength and stability. Believers trust in Christ much as a building rests on its cornerstone. Moreover, they will never be put to shame. The Greek double negative ou mē used here in the subjunctive mood indicates an emphatic negative assertion referring to the future: never indeed will they be shamed. So Peter encouraged his readers with a sure scriptural promise of ultimate victory for those who trust Christ.

2:7-8. These verses present a sharp contrast between those who believe and those who do not. Christ is "precious," of ultimate value, to those who believe. But those who have rejected Christ, the Stone (Peter's second quotation is from Ps. 118:22) stumble because of their disobedience. This happened to the chief priests and Pharisees Jesus referred to when He quoted Psalm 118:22 (Matt. 21:42; cf. 21:43-46).

Peter's third quotation is from Isaiah 8:14. Rejection of Jesus Christ is fatal and is connected with disobeying the message of God's Word (1 Peter 2:8b). To disobey the message (cf. 4:17) is to reject it; and to obey it is to believe (cf. obedience in 1:14, 22 and "obedient to the faith" in Acts 6:7). All who do not receive Christ as their Savior will one day face Him as their Judge. Because of sin, all disobedient unbelievers are destined for a "stumbling," which will lead to eternal condemnation.

2:9-10. Peter closed this portion of his letter of encouragement with a moving exhortation for his readers to practice holiness. He reminded them that, in contrast with the disobedient who are destined for destruction, they were a chosen (eklekton; cf. "elect," eklektois, 1:1) people. Peter again echoed the Old Testament, specifically Isaiah 43:20. "Chosen people," which used to apply only to Israel, was now used of both Jewish and Gentile believers. The responsibility once solely trusted to the nation of Israel has now, during this Age of Grace, been given to the church. At Sinai, God told Moses to tell the people, "You will be for Me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Ex. 19:6). Now believers in the Church Age are called a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people belonging to God. Peter called Christians "a holy priesthood" (1 Peter 2:5) and "a royal priesthood" (2:9; cf. Rev. 1:6). The words "belonging to God" loosely render the words eis peripoiēsin, which are literally "unto obtaining or preserving" (also used in Heb. 10:39, where the NIV has "are saved"). Christians are a special people because God has preserved them for Himself. While these descriptions of the church are similar to those used of Israel in the Old Testament, this in no way indicates that the church supplants Israel and assumes the national blessings promised to Israel (and to be fulfilled in the Millennium). Peter just used similar terms to point up similar truths. As Israel was "a chosen people, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people belonging to God," so too believers today are chosen, are priests, are holy, and belong to God. Similarity does not mean identity.

God's purpose in choosing believers for Himself is so that they may declare the praises of Him before others. "Praises" could also be translated "eminent qualities," "excellencies," or "virtues" (aretos, used only four times in the NT: Phil. 4:8; 1 Peter 2:9; 2 Peter 1:3, 5). Believer-priests should live so that their heavenly Father's qualities are evident in their lives. They are to serve as witnesses of the glory and grace of God, who called them out of darkness into His wonderful light. Peter (1 Peter 2:10) explained this figure with a quotation from Hosea 2:23. "Darkness" refers to the time when his readers were pagans, ignorant of God's provision of salvation (cf. Col. 1:13), when they were not a people, when they had not received mercy. His "wonderful light" now illumines the people of God because they have received mercy. The practice of holiness, in which God's people serve as a holy and royal priesthood offering spiritual sacrifices and extolling His excellencies, is the proper response to the mercy (cf. 1 Peter 1:3) they have received.

III. Challenged to New Behavior (2:11–3:7)

How can Christians, as a people belonging to God, declare His praises before others? In this section Peter answered this question by suggesting specific ways Christians can behave differently before the world, as citizens, as slaves, and as wives and husbands. Even in familiar situations, their conduct should be different.

A. New behavior before the world (2:11-25)

The world Peter had in view refers to the people his readers faced daily as witnesses, citizens, and slaves. Peter challenged Christians to take a stand against sin, to submit to lawful authority, and to endure harsh masters patiently. This kind of conduct would win others to belief, silence the tongues of foolish people, and bring commendation from God.

1. CHRISTIAN CONDUCT AS WITNESSES (2:11-12)

2:11. Peter warmly addressed his readers as dear friends or better, "beloved" (agapētoi). Those who are loved by God are exhorted to live as aliens (paroikous, "those who live in a place that is not their home," used figuratively of Christians, whose real home is in heaven) and strangers in the world (cf. comments on "strangers" in 1:1). Just as their Christian values and beliefs are rejected by the world, so they are to live apart from the immorality and sinful desires that surround them. Abstain (apechesthai) is literally "hold oneself constantly back from." Christians are to resist the sinward pull of those worldly desires which war against (cf. James 4:1) their spiritual lives. In this real spiritual battle a demonic strategy is to attack believers at their weakest points.

2:12. Christians are to abstain from sinful desires not only for their own spiritual well-being but also in order to maintain an effective testimony before unbelievers. The negative exhortation of verse 11 is now followed by positive instruction. A positive Christian lifestyle is a powerful means of convicting the world of its sin (cf. Matt. 5:16). Peter used the word good (kalos) twice in this verse to define both Christians' lives and their works. A "good" life is composed of good deeds (cf. Matt. 5:16; Eph. 2:10; Titus 3:8; James 2:18). Before the critical eyes of slanderous people and their false accusations, the "good deeds" of believers can glorify God (cf. Matt. 5:16; Rom. 15:6; 1 Cor. 6:20) and win others to belief. On the day He visits is literally "in the day of [His] visitation" (en hēmera episkopēs; cf. Luke 19:44). Some say this refers to God's "visiting" or looking on the wicked in judgment, but it probably refers to their salvation (i.e., when God looks in on them in His mercy and brings them to conversion; cf. epeskepsato, Acts 15:14).

2. CHRISTIAN CONDUCT AS CITIZENS (2:13-17)

2:13-15. Christians are responsible to obey the law (cf. Rom. 13:1-7; Titus 3:1-2). Peter exhorted his readers to abide by governmental laws, to submit . . . to every authority (ktisei, lit., "creation" or here "institution" or "law") instituted among men (anthrōpinē, "made by man, human"). The motivation for obedience is not avoiding punishment but is for the Lord's sake. To honor God who ordained human government, Christians are to observe man-made laws carefully as long as those laws do not conflict with the clear teaching of Scripture (cf. Acts 4:19). The general purpose of legal authority is to punish . . . wrong and to commend . . . right. Evidently Christians were being slandered and falsely accused of evil, for Peter stressed that it is God's will (thelēma, a term expressing the result of one's purpose or desire; cf. "God's will" in 1 Peter 3:17; 4:2, 19) that through excellent behavior they silence (phimoun, lit., "muzzle") the ignorant talk of foolish men. Each of the three Greek words rendered "ignorant talk of foolish men" begins with the letter alpha, as do the three Greek words in 1:4 rendered "never perish, spoil, or fade." Apparently Peter enjoyed alliteration!

This section of Peter's argument leads many to believe that the organized persecution through oppressive Roman laws either had not begun or had not yet reached the provinces of Asia Minor. Christians were then facing lies and verbal abuse, not torture and death. Christians were still enjoying the protection of a legal system which commended those who obeyed the law. So a believer's best defense against slanderous criticism was good behavior.

2:16. Submission to lawful authority does not negate Christian liberty (cf. Gal. 5:1, 18). Civil laws should be freely obeyed, not out of fear but because doing so is God's will. Christian freedom is always conditioned by Christian responsibility (cf. Gal. 5:13) and must never be used as a cover-up (epikalymma, lit., "veil") for evil. Christians enjoy true freedom when they obey God and live as servants (douloi, lit., "slaves"; cf. Rom. 6:22) of God. Though living as free men, they should also live as God's slaves.

2:17. This section concludes with a four-point summary of Christian citizenship. First, Christians are to respect (timēsate, "honor, value, esteem"; cf. timēn, "respect, honor," in 3:7) . . . everyone (cf. Rom. 12:10; 13:7). Believers should be conscious of the fact that each human has been uniquely created in God's image. Second, Christians are to love the brotherhood of believers, their brothers and sisters in Christ. God's family members should love each other. Third, Christians are to fear God. The verb "fear" (phobeisthe) here does not mean to be in terror, but awe and reverence that leads to obedience (cf. phobō in 1 Peter 1:17, phobou in 3:16, and phobon in 2 Cor. 7:11). One will never truly respect people until he reverences God. Fourth, believers are to honor the king. "Honor" is from timaō, the verb used at the beginning of this verse. The respect or "honor" due to all is especially to be given to those God has placed in authority (cf. "the king" in 1 Peter 2:13 and "governors" in v. 14; cf. Rom. 13:1).

3. CHRISTIAN CONDUCT AS SLAVES (2:18-25)

Peter's instruction to slaves included two reasons why they should patiently endure personal injustice. First, this found favor with God, and second, it faithfully followed Jesus Christ's example.

2:18. The Greek word for slaves here is not douloi, the common term for slaves (cf. v. 16), but oiketai, which refers to household or domestic servants (cf. Luke 16:13; Rom. 14:4). The word translated submit (hypotassomenoi) is a nominative participle that continues the idea of submission expressed in 1 Peter 2:13 through the aorist imperative hypotagēte. This word of exhortation was relevant to a large number of Peter's first readers. Servants and slaves made up a high percentage of the early church, and undeserved punishment and suffering was common for the underlings. To be sure, there were some good and considerate masters. Certainly Christian masters were to be numbered in that category. However, Peter challenged Christian slaves to a new behavior which required them to submit to and respect even those who are harsh. "Harsh" is from the Greek skolios (lit., "curved," "bent," or "not straight"). The medical term "scoliosis," referring to curvature of the spine, comes from this word.

2:19-20. Peter set forth a principle here that may be applied to any situation where unjust suffering occurs. The commendable (lit., "for this is grace") motivation for patiently bearing up under . . . unjust suffering is a believer's conscious awareness of God's presence. No credit accrues for enduring punishment for doing wrong. It is respectful submission to undeserved suffering that finds favor with God because such behavior demonstrates His grace.

2:21-22. Peter powerfully supported his exhortation to slaves by citing Christ's example of endurance in unjust suffering. The Williams translation renders the opening phrase of this verse, "For you have been called for this purpose," referring to suffering for doing good. Christians are called (eklēthēte; cf. 1:15; 2:9) to follow Christ, to emulate His character and conduct, because He suffered for them. The word rendered an example (hypogrammon, lit., "underwriting"), appearing only here in the New Testament, refers to a writing or drawing that a student reproduces. Peter delineated Christ's example in verse 22 by quoting from Isaiah 53:9. Jesus committed no sin, either before or during His suffering (cf. 2 Cor. 5:21; Heb. 4:15; 1 John 3:5). He was completely innocent in both deed and word: no deceit (dolos; cf. 1 Peter 2:1) was found in His mouth.

2:23-25. Christ was the perfect example of patient submission to unjust suffering. He did not retaliate . . . He made no threats (cf. Rom. 12:19-20). Humanly speaking, the provocation to retaliate during Christ's arrest, trial, and crucifixion was extreme. Yet He suffered in silence, committing Himself to God. Peter explained (1 Peter 2:24) why the One who could have destroyed His enemies with a word patiently endured the pain and humiliation of the Cross. God was justly judging our sins which His Son bore (cf. 2 Cor. 5:21). In the Greek the words "our sins" are near the beginning of the verse and thus stand out emphatically, while He Himself stresses Christ's personal involvement. His death makes it possible for believers to be free from both the penalty and the power of sin and to live for Him: so that we might die to sins and live for righteousness (cf. Rom. 6:2, 13). Christ suffered so it would be possible for Christians to follow His example, both in suffering and in righteous living. Peter made a general reference to salvation: by His wounds you have been healed (Isa. 53:5). This does not refer to physical healing for the verb's past tense indicates completed action, the "healing" is an accomplished fact. The reference is to salvation. Christ's suffering (lit., "wound"; mōlōpi, "stripe left by a lash," referred to Jesus' scourging) and death accomplished "healing," the salvation of every individual who trusts Him as his Savior.

Christ not only set the example and provides salvation, but He also gives guidance and protection to those who were headed away (like sheep going astray) from Him, but who then "turned about" (rather than returned) to the Shepherd and Overseer (episkopon) of their souls. "Shepherd" and "Overseer" stress Christ's matchless guidance and management of those who commit themselves to His care (cf. Ezek. 34:11-16).

B. New behavior in the family (3:1-7)

Peter extended the principles of respect and submission to authority, from Christian conduct in the world to Christian conduct in the family. He challenged his readers to new behavior as submissive wives and considerate husbands.

1. CHRISTIAN CONDUCT AS WIVES (3:1-6)

3:1-4. The participle translated be submissive (hypotassomenai, lit., "being under authority") carries the force of a command (cf. 2:18). This command is for wives to submit to their own husbands (cf. Eph. 5:22; Col. 3:18). The command does not require women to be subordinate to men in general but to their husbands as a function of order within the home. A wife is to accept her place in the family under the leadership of her husband whom God has placed as head in the home. Wives are to be submissive even if their husbands are unbelievers, so those men might be saved by the behavior of their wives. The powerful purity of a godly woman's life can soften even the stoniest male heart without a word (cf. Titus 2:5).

A woman who wins this kind of victory has a winsome loveliness that comes not from outward adornment but from her inner self, the unfading beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit (cf. 1 Tim. 2:9-11). This adornment of the spirit is of great worth in God's sight. While the world prizes costly clothing and gold jewelry, a woman with a gentle and quiet spirit is precious to God. Peter did not state that women should not wear jewelry and nice clothes, but that Christian wives should not think of outer attire as the source of genuine beauty.

3:5-6. Examples of holy women in the Old Testament support Peter's exhortation. Purity of life (v. 2) and a submissive spirit (v. 5) have always been a godly woman's lasting source of beauty and attractiveness. Sarah is chosen as a specific example of a woman who was submissive to her husband. She obeyed Abraham and called him her master. That is, she recognized him as the leader and head of their household (Gen. 18:12). Like other holy women of the past, Sarah put her hope in God. This kind of conduct gives women the spiritual heritage of Sarah: You are her daughters if you do what is right and do not give way to fear (ptoēsin, "terror"—used only here in the NT). Wives who are fearful (perhaps because of disobeying their husbands) are not putting all their trust in God.

2. CHRISTIAN CONDUCT AS HUSBANDS (3:7)

Peter exhorted Christian husbands to give their wives two gifts of love: understanding and respect.

3:7. The words (kata gnōsin) translated considerate (more lit., "according to knowledge" or "with understanding") point out that husbands should understand and be considerate of their wives' spiritual, emotional, and physical needs. Paul also elaborated on the husband's responsibility to protect and care for his wife, "just as Christ does the church" (Eph. 5:28-30).

Also husbands are to treat their wives with respect as the weaker partner. "Weaker" (asthenesterō) refers to physical or emotional weakness, not intellectual inferiority, for wives are their husbands' fellow heirs of God's gift of life. If Peter referred here to Christian husbands whose wives were Christians, then "the gracious gift of life" could refer to salvation (cf. Rom. 8:17; Eph. 3:6). If, however, the exhortation were directed to Christian husbands whose wives were unsaved (as 1 Peter 3:1-2 was written to wives with unsaved husbands), then "the gift of life" would refer to sharing the gift of physical life together. Peter added that husbands who do not treat their wives with consideration and respect (timēn, "honor"; cf. 2:17) cannot expect to have their prayers answered.

IV. Cautioned for New Persecution (3:8–4:19)

In the first two chapters Peter referred to "all kinds of trials" (1:6), accusations of "doing wrong" (2:12), "the ignorant talk of foolish men" (2:15), and "the pain of unjust suffering" (2:19). All these persecutions seem to have resulted from the natural reactions of a pagan society against Christians who faithfully obeyed Jesus Christ.

Peter then warned that a time of more severe persecution and suffering was close at hand. He cautioned Christians to keep clear consciences when facing injustice, to endure the inevitable suffering with Christlike courage.

A. Overcoming injustice (3:8-22)

Peter used both Christ and Noah to illustrate the principle that in times of rising persecution the right response to injustice results in blessing.

1. A COMPASSIONATE CONDUCT (3:8-12)

3:8-12. Finally introduces a new section rather than giving a summary of the previous exhortations to specific groups (cf. "finally" in Phil. 3:1; 1 Thes. 4:1). Peter now addressed all his readers (all of you) and gave practical principles for living peacefully in a hostile pagan culture. First Peter 3:8-9 is Peter's exposition of Psalm 34:12-16, which he then quoted (1 Peter 3:10-12). Peter constructed his thoughts around the three exhortations in the psalm.

Whoever would love life . . . must first keep his tongue from evil (3:10). Verse 8 is a listing of Christian characteristics that keep a tongue from evil. Harmony (homophrones) could be translated "like-minded." Christians are urged to be sympathetic (sympatheis), to love as brothers (philadelphoi), to be compassionate (eusplanchnoi; cf. splanchna in Phil. 2:2; Phile. 7, 20), and humble (tapeinophrones). Of these five characteristics listed in 1 Peter 3:8 only the word for "compassionate" is found more than once in the New Testament and it is only used twice (here and in Eph. 4:32). This unique vocabulary stresses the importance of these Christian virtues which keep one from deceitful (dolon; cf. 1 Peter 2:1, 22) speech.

The second exhortation, taken from Psalm 34:14, is foreshadowed by 1 Peter 3:9, do not repay evil with evil (cf. Rom. 12:17). Turning from evil (1 Peter 3:11) requires that there be no retaliation for ill treatment. Jesus taught this same law of love: "If someone strikes you on the right cheek, turn to him the other also" (Matt. 5:39).

Third, rather than returning evil, Christians are to seek peace (eirenēn; cf. 1 Peter 1:2; 5:14) and pursue it (Ps. 34:14). Peace is pursued by returning a blessing (1 Peter 3:9) when an insult is given. "Blessing" (eulogountes) here means to speak well of someone. This differs from the word "blessed" (makarioi, "fortunate or privileged" in verse 14; cf. 4:14; Matt. 5:3-11). Jesus said, "Pray for those who persecute you" (Matt. 5:44), and Paul wrote, "When we are cursed, we bless" (1 Cor. 4:12). This is the compassionate way that Christians should pursue peace. As a result, believers inherit a blessing (1 Peter 3:9; cf. 1:4; 3:7), for the eyes of the Lord (v. 12) watch over the righteous and His ears are attentive to their prayer. The "eyes" and "ears" of the Lord are figures of speech, anthropomorphisms which attribute human physical characteristics to God. Here the figures emphasize God's watchful oversight and careful attention to His people's needs (cf. 2:25).

2. A CLEAR CONSCIENCE (3:13-22)

Persecution occurred, however, in spite of believers' desires to live peacefully and their eagerness to do good. Peter encouraged his readers with the fact that the right response to undeserved suffering results in blessing. He presented the principle in verses 13-17 and provided examples in verses 18-22.

3:13-14. Who is going to harm you . . .? The context of Peter's question makes it almost rhetorical. Though the adversary, through physical suffering or material hardship, would distress those who were eager (zēlōtai, lit., "zealots") to do good, no real harm can come to those who belong to Christ. For even if suffering should occur, Christians are blessed and thus should not be frightened. The word here translated "blessed" (makarioi; cf. 4:14) was used by Jesus (Matt. 5:3-11). To be "blessed" in this context does not mean to "feel delighted" but to be "highly privileged." Christians are not to be afraid of what men can do to them (cf. Matt. 10:28). Consequently 1 Peter 3:14 concludes with a quotation from Isaiah 8:12 which, in context, is part of an exhortation to fear God rather than men.

3:15. In their hearts Christians are to set apart Christ as Lord. Alexander Maclaren wrote, "Only he who can say, 'The Lord is the strength of my life' can go on to say, 'Of whom shall I be afraid?' " (Expositions of Holy Scriptures, 16: 42) Christians should overcome fear by sanctifying (hagiasate, "make separate from others") Christ as their Lord (kyrion). As a result Christians should always be prepared (hetoimoi, "ready"; cf. 1:5) to give . . . the reason (apologian, the "defense" which a defendant makes before a judge; cf. Acts 22:1; 25:16) for their hope in Christ. Such an oral defense should be consistent with one's "set-apart" conduct.

3:16. A believer's testimony should not be given in an arrogant manner but with gentleness and respect. ("Respect" here is from phobos, "fear," whereas "respect" for one's wife [v. 7] is timē, "honor.") Christians who are not afraid in the face of persecution are able to witness respectfully to their faith in Christ. They then keep a clear (agathēn, "good") conscience (syneidēsin; cf. 2:19; 3:21). Peter may have been alluding to the occasion when he denied Christ out of fear, in words that were neither gentle nor respectful.

Christians who suffer unjustly and keep a clear conscience put to shame those who slander their good behavior in Christ. Once again Peter encouraged his readers with the fact that good behavior is their best defense against unjust punishment and persecution.

3:17. However, Peter pointed out that it may be God's will (thelēma; cf. 2:15; 4:2, 19) for them to suffer for doing good (cf. 1:6; 2:15; 4:16, 19). This, as he told them earlier, "is commendable before God" (2:20) and so is better than deserved suffering for doing evil (cf. 2:14). First Peter 3:17 is an effective summary of the content of 2:15, 19-20.

3:18. In verses 18-22 Peter illustrated the principles given in verses 13-17. Once again Christ provided the perfect example. He suffered for doing what was right

(2:14). His sinless life provoked the unjust hostilities of evil men. However, He did not fear men but trusted Himself to God. Christ clearly stated His purpose and committed Himself to a course of action. He died in mankind's place, keeping His conscience clear (cf. 2:23). As a result He received tremendous blessing and reward in His own resurrection and exultation.

J.M.E. Ross wrote that verse 18 is "one of the shortest and simplest, and yet one of the richest summaries given in the New Testament of the meaning of the Cross of Jesus" ("The First Epistle of Peter," in A Devotional Commentary. London: Religious Tract Society, n.d., pp. 151-52). Christ died for sins (cf. 2:21, 24). The phrase "for sins" (peri hamartiōn) is used in the Septuagint in regard to the sin offering for atonement. However, once for all (cf. Rom. 6:10; Heb. 9:26, 28; 10:10) is clearly a contrast with the Old Testament yearly sacrifice on the Day of Atonement and declares the complete sufficiency of Christ's death. The substitutionary nature of Christ's death is indicated by the phrase the righteous for the unrighteous (dikaios hyper adikōn). Christ, the "righteous One" (dikaios), uniquely qualified to die as the substitute for (hyper, "for," "in place of," or "instead of") the "unrighteous ones" (adikōn). The divine purpose for Christ's sacrificial death was man's reconciliation, to bring people to God.

Peter concluded his summary of Christ's redemptive work by referring to His resurrection. Though Christ was put to death in the body (sarki, "flesh"), He was made alive by the Spirit. "By the Spirit" translates one word, pneumati, which could refer to the third Person of the Trinity as the agent of Christ's resurrection. Or it may refer to Christ's human spirit in contrast with His human body (cf. 1 Peter 4:6).

3:19-20. Through whom . . . He . . . preached to the spirits in prison has been subject to many interpretations. Some believe Peter here referred to the descent of Christ's Spirit into hades between His death and resurrection to offer people who lived before the Flood a second chance for salvation. However, this interpretation has no scriptural support.

Others have said this passage refers to Christ's descent into hell after His crucifixion to proclaim His victory to the imprisoned fallen angels referred to in 2 Peter 2:4-5, equating them with "the sons of God" Moses wrote about (Gen. 6:1-2). Though much commends this view as a possible interpretation, the context seems more likely to be referring to humans rather than angels.

The "spirits" (pneumasin, a term usually applied to supernatural beings but also used at least once to refer to human "spirits"; cf. Heb. 12:23) are described in 1 Peter 3:20 as those who were disobedient when God waited patiently for Noah to finish building the ark. They had rebelled against the message of God during the 120 years the ark was being built. God declared He would not tolerate people's wickedness forever, but would extend His patience for only 120 more years (Gen. 6:3). Since the entire human race except Noah (Gen. 6:5-9) was evil, God determined to "wipe mankind . . . from the face of the earth." The "spirits" referred to in 1 Peter 3:20 are probably the souls of the evil human race that existed in the days of Noah. Those "spirits" are now "in prison" awaiting the final judgment of God at the end of the Age.

The problem remains as to when Christ preached to these "spirits." Peter's explanation of the resurrection of Christ (3:18) "by the Spirit" brought to mind that the preincarnate Christ was actually in Noah, ministering through him, by means of the Holy Spirit. Peter (1:11) referred to the "Spirit of Christ" in the Old Testament prophets. Later he described Noah as "a preacher of righteousness" (2 Peter 2:5). The Spirit of Christ preached through Noah to the ungodly humans who, at the time of Peter's writing, were "spirits in prison" awaiting final judgment.

This interpretation seems to fit the general theme of this section (1 Peter 3:13-22)—keeping a good conscience in unjust persecution. Noah is presented as an example of one who committed himself to a course of action for the sake of a clear conscience before God, though it meant enduring harsh ridicule. Noah did not fear men but obeyed God and proclaimed His message. Noah's reward for keeping a clear conscience in unjust suffering was the salvation of himself and his family, who were saved through water, being brought safely through the Flood.

3:21. And this (ho, relative pronoun—"water" is the understood antecedent) water symbolizes baptism (baptisma). Baptism represents a complete break with one's past life. As the Flood wiped away the old sinful world, so baptism pictures one's break from his old sinful life and his entrance into new life in Christ. Peter now applied to his readers the principle he set forth in verses 13-17 and illustrated in verses 18-20. He exhorted them to have the courage to commit themselves to a course of action by taking a public stand for Christ through baptism. The act of public baptism would "save" them from the temptation to sacrifice their good consciences in order to avoid persecution. For a first-century Christian, baptism meant he was following through on his commitment to Christ, regardless of the consequences.

Baptism does not save from sin, but from a bad conscience. Peter clearly taught that baptism was not merely a ceremonial act of physical purification, but (alla, making a strong contrast) the pledge (eperōtēma, also trans. "appeal"; cf. NASB) of a good conscience (syneidēseōs; cf. v. 16) toward God. Baptism is the symbol of what has already occurred in the heart and life of one who has trusted Christ as Savior (cf. Rom. 6:3-5; Gal. 3:27; Col. 2:12). To make the source of salvation perfectly clear Peter added, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ (cf. 1 Peter 1:3).

3:22. Mentioning Christ's resurrection returned Peter's thoughts to his original example, so he concluded his digression and completed his first illustration with a reference to Christ's reward and blessing. Having witnessed Christ's physical Ascension (cf. Mark 16:19; Luke 24:51; Acts 1:6-11), Peter wrote that Christ has gone into heaven. The reward for Christ's faithfulness is seen in His exaltation over all things. He is enthroned at God's right hand (cf. Ps. 110:1; Heb. 1:13; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2), the seat of supreme honor, to rule and reign over all creation (cf. Col. 1:15-16; 2:14-15).

B. Enduring suffering (chap. 4)

This chapter is the heart of Peter's encouragement for endurance. Here is practical instruction based on Christ's example in undergoing suffering. In order to endure suffering, Christians are to arm themselves with Christlike courage, minister to one another with Christlike service, and commit themselves to God with Christlike faith.

1. CHRISTLIKE ATTITUDE (4:1-6)

Maintaining proper conduct in suffering requires that Christians maintain a Christlike attitude, living for the present in God's will, knowing that they will live for eternity in His presence.

4:1. Therefore (oun, an inferential conjunction) Peter referred back to Christ's suffering in 3:18 and applied the principles of patient endurance in unjust suffering to his readers' immediate situation. He exhorted believers to arm themselves with the same courageous attitude or mind-set Christ had regarding suffering. The word translated "arm yourselves" (hoplisasthe, used only here in the NT) referred to a soldier putting on armor (cf. Eph. 6:13). With the same determination and care with which a soldier puts on his armor, Christians are to adopt Christ's "attitude" (ennoian, lit., "thought"; Heb. 4:12 has the only other biblical usage of this word) toward persecution, an unswerving resolve to do God's will.

Identification with Christ, arming oneself with His attitude, also means sharing in His suffering and death. Christ suffered in His body, and a believer suffers in his body also. One who has suffered in this way is done with sin, that is, his being identified with Christ demonstrates (as does baptism) his break with a sinful life. Because of Christ's death, "we should no longer be slaves to sin, because anyone who has died has been freed from sin" (Rom. 6:6-7).

4:2. As a result Christians who have adopted Christ's mind-set have counted themselves dead to sin. They live the rest of their lives not for evil human desires, but rather for the will of God (cf. 2:15; 3:17; 4:19).

4:3. Christians were exhorted to live for the present in God's will because old habits were a thing of the past. In blunt language Peter stressed that there must be a definite break from what pagans choose to do (boulēma tōn ethnōn, lit., "desire of the Gentiles"), the wasted years of debauchery, lust, drunkenness, orgies, carousing, and . . . idolatry (cf. Gal. 5:19-21). This exhortation probably had a strong impact on Gentile Christians who used to live in gross sin.

4:4. Christians are to live in the present for the will of God because old acquaintances are now persecutors. Godless men are genuinely surprised by the changed lives of those who once were like they are. They think it strange (xenizontai, from xenos, "stranger"; cf. v. 12). A changed life provokes hostility from those who reject the gospel. Consequently they heap abuse on (blasphēmountes, lit., "blaspheme") believers.

4:5. Those who have spent their lives in indulgence and idolatry will someday give account (apodōsousin logon, lit., "give back a word or an account"; cf. Matt. 12:36; Luke 16:2; Acts 19:40; Heb. 13:17). Peter warned that these people must one day face the One who is ready (i.e., willing) to judge. No one will escape this final judgment of the words and works of his earthly life, when Christ will judge both the living (zōntas) and the dead (nekrous) (cf. Acts 10:42; Rom. 14:9; 1 Thes. 4:15; 2 Tim. 4:1).

4:6. For this . . . reason, because everybody must give an account to God, the gospel was preached even to those . . . now dead. This has been interpreted as referring to (a) those who are spiritually "dead in sin," (b) those who heard and believed the gospel but have since died, (c) those who died without hearing or believing the gospel. Barclay preferred the third interpretation, assuming that 3:19 refers to Christ's preaching to the dead. Consequently he believed that here "was a breathtaking glimpse of a gospel of a second chance." This interpretation has no scriptural support and is contrary to orthodox Christian doctrine (cf. v. 5).

In verse 6 Peter, in contrast with verse 5, encouraged his readers with the fact that rather than facing judgment for their sins, those who had heard and believed the gospel of Jesus Christ faced an altogether different future. The penalty for their sin has been paid by Christ on the cross. The last earthly effect of sin is physical death. Believers still die physically; they are judged . . . in regard to the body (cf. suffering in this life "in his body," v. 1). But for Christians physical death does not lead to judgment but to eternal life. They live . . . in regard to the Spirit. Those armed with a Christlike attitude will live forever in God's presence.

2. CHRISTLIKE SERVICE (4:7-11)

Encouragement to endure suffering comes not only from a believer's future hope but also from the Christlike service of others within His body.

4:7. The end . . . is near (ēngiken, lit., "draws near"; the same form is used in James 5:8 to refer to the Second Coming). After mentioning Christians who had died (1 Peter 4:6), Peter then referred to the imminent return of Christ for His church. The shortness of the time remaining is motivation to live for and serve Jesus Christ (v. 2). As a result, Christians are to be clear-minded (sōphronēsate, lit., "be of sound mind"; cf. Mark 5:15) and self-controlled (nēpsate, lit., "be sober"; cf. 1 Peter 1:13; 5:8) so that they are able to pray (cf. Eph. 6:18). Prayer, of high priority in persecution, is to be clear, reasonable, sober communication with God.

4:8-9. Love (agapēn . . . echontes) each other deeply. "Deeply" (ektenē, "stretched" or "strained") was used to describe the taut muscles of an athlete who strains to win a race (cf. ektenōs in 1:22). A Christian's unselfish love and concern for others should be exercised to the point of sacrificially giving for others' welfare. Love covers over (kalyptei, lit., "hides") a multitude of sins. This kind of strenuously maintained love is not blind but sees and accepts the faults of others (cf. Prov. 10:12; 1 Cor. 13:4-7). Christian love may be displayed through extending free food and lodging, offering hospitality (philoxenoi, lit., "being friendly to strangers") without grumbling to those who are traveling. During times of persecution, hospitality was especially welcomed by Christians who were forced to journey to new areas.

4:10. Believers should be diligent in using their spiritual gifts. Each gift (charisma) is to be used to serve (diakonounte; cf. diakonos, "deacon") or "minister to" others. The phrase faithfully administering (hōs kaloi oikonomoi) could also be translated "as good stewards." A "steward" was one who served as a house manager; he had no wealth of his own, but distributed his master's wealth according to his master's will and direction. The "gift" (charisma) stems from God's grace (charitos). His grace is manifested to His church as believers exercise their spiritual gifts in service to each other. His grace is evident in its various forms, that is, it is "manifold" (NASB), variegated, rich in variety (poikilēs; cf. 1:6, where Peter said trials are poikilois, or varied).

4:11. Peter divided Christian service into two general categories: the one who speaks (lalei) and the one who serves (diakonei; cf. v. 10). This division relates to the distinction God's leaders made between ministry roles (Acts 6:2-4). These two general ministry functions often overlap. Both groups function through dependence on God's gracious provision. The reason for relying on God's words (cf. Acts 7:38; Rom. 3:2; Heb. 5:12) and strength (ischyos, "power") is that God will receive the praise through Jesus Christ. At the mention of Christ's name Peter offered an appropriate word of praise as a benediction: To Him be the glory and the power (kratos, "might") forever and ever. Amen. (Cf. the similar benediction in 1 Peter 5:11.) The praise and credit for Christian ministry should always be given to Christ.

3. CHRISTLIKE FAITH (4:12-19)

Anticipating hardships the believers in Asia Minor were about to undergo, Peter encouraged his readers to endure suffering with Christlike faith so that they might be further identified with Christ, receive a blessing, and trust God completely.

4:12. Peter warned his readers about the coming of a more intense period of persecution. He again stressed mental readiness (cf. 1:13; 4:7): Do not be surprised (xenizesthe, "amazed"; cf. v. 4) at the painful trial you are suffering. The NASB translates this last phrase "the fiery ordeal among you." Literally rendered it could read "the among you burning." The verb pyrōsei is from pyroō, "to burn." The meaning may be metaphorical as in 1:7 where the context is quite similar. However, the verse could also be aptly applied to the historical reality of the Neronian persecution. Christians were blamed for the burning of Rome. Some were covered with pitch and used as living torches to light the imperial gardens at night. Peter may have believed that the provincial officials were likely to follow their emperor's example and stake-burn Christians in Asia Minor. Such persecution should not take the Christians by surprise as though something strange (xenou) were befalling them.

4:13. But rejoice that you participate (koinōneite, from koinōneō, "to share"; related nouns are koinōnia, "communion, fellowship, close relationship," and koinōnos, "sharer"; cf. 5:1). Suffering for Christ's sake should cause rejoicing because through suffering Christians further identify with Christ. Sharing in the sufferings of Christ results in (a) joy with Christ (the word overjoyed is trans. "rejoice" in 1:6), (b) fellowship with Him (Phil. 3:10), (c) being glorified with Him (Rom. 8:17), and (d) reigning with Him (2 Tim. 2:12). The New Testament is clear that those who take part in the suffering of Christ also will take part in His glory, when it is revealed (apokalypsei; cf. 1 Peter 1:7; 5:1). Peter presented this truth as a cause for future hope and present rejoicing while enduring persecution.

4:14. Peter again referred to Jesus' teaching (Matt. 5:11). If a Christian was insulted (cf. 1 Peter 3:9) because of the name of Christ, he should be considered blessed (makarioi; cf. 3:14). Anything that we suffer for the sake of Christ is a privilege, not a penalty. The Spirit of glory and of God (cf. Isa. 11:2; Matt. 3:16) refers to the Holy Spirit's indwelling presence within all who are identified by "the name of Christ" and thus suffer persecution (cf. 1 Peter 4:16).

4:15. Peter stressed that persecution was no excuse for lawlessness. Christians were not to retaliate (3:9). Physical violence was not to be met by murder. Confiscation of property was not to be compensated for by theft. No matter what their trials, Christians were to do nothing that would justify punishing them as criminals (cf. 2:19; 3:17). They were not to suffer as a murderer or thief or any other kind of criminal, or even as a meddler. Even interfering in other people's affairs is out of place for Christians (cf. 1 Tim. 5:13).

4:16. There is no shame if one suffer(s) as a Christian rather than as a criminal. On the contrary, that name should be a source of praise to God for it identifies the bearer with the blessings of salvation (cf. v. 11). The term "Christian" (Christianos) occurs only three times in the Bible (here and Acts 11:26; 26:28). It may have been used derisively by unbelievers, as an insult.

4:17-18. Peter had referred to persecution and suffering as trials that refine and prove one's faith (1:6-7) if reacted to in the will of God (3:17). Now he added that God allows persecutions as disciplinary judgment to purify the lives of those in the family of God. If believers need disciplinary earthly judgments (if it begins with us, a first-class condition which assumes the reality of the premise), how much more will those who do not obey the gospel (cf. 2:7) the ungodly and the sinner, deserve everlasting judgment? Peter quoted the Septuagint rendering of Proverbs 11:31, If it is hard for the righteous to be saved, to emphasize God's disciplinary demands on His children. The vicissitudes of life are a part of God's constant care, yet from a human perspective discipline is always "hard." Peter is not teaching that salvation is earned through personal trials or works, but simply that those who are saved are not exempt from temporal disciplinary judgments which are the natural consequences of sin. The writer of Hebrews also supports Peter: "Endure hardship as discipline; God is treating you as sons" (Heb. 12:7).

4:19. Believers could be sure that they were being called on to suffer according to God's will (cf. 2:15; 3:17; 4:2) if, having committed no crimes, they were suffering solely because they bore Christ's name. Peter encouraged suffering saints to endure through the exercise of Christlike faith. Just as Christ trusted Himself to His Father who judges justly (2:23), so should believers commit (paratithesthōsan, an accounting term, "to deposit or entrust") themselves (psychas autōn, lit., "their souls") to their faithful Creator and continue to do good (cf. 2:15, 20).

V. Charged with New Responsibility (5:1-11)

In the final chapter Peter emphasized new responsibilities within the church in light of the troubled times. He exhorted the elders to shepherd the people, the young men to submit to the elders, and everyone to stand firm in the faith.

A. Elders are to shepherd (5:1-4)

Peter's charge to elders was given in three pairs of negative and positive exhortations. The exhortations reflect Ezekiel (34:1-16), where false shepherds were contrasted with the True Shepherd.

5:1. Peter, in addressing the elders (presbyterous; cf. Acts 11:30; 20:17), also used a word that identified himself as one who held the same office (sympresbyteros, "fellow-presbyter"). As an elder, Peter was speaking from experience. However, Peter's authority came from the fact that he was an apostle (1 Peter 1:1), and a witness (martys; cf. Acts 3:15; 10:39) of Christ's sufferings. Peter also referred to himself as one who . . . will share (koinōnos; cf. 1 Peter 4:13) in the glory to be revealed. Peter had just made the point that those who share in Christ's sufferings will also share in His glory (4:13). Peter further identified with his readers by referring to his own suffering for Christ's sake (Acts 5:40).

5:2. The command Be shepherds was also given by Jesus to Peter (John 21:16) The word poimanate means "to tend." Besides feeding, it includes caring, leading, guiding, and protecting—all duties and responsibilities a shepherd has for his flock. Related to the participle serving as overseers (episkopountes) is the noun "overseer" (episkopos, used five other times: Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:1-2; Titus 1:7; 1 Peter 2:25). "Overseer" seems to be interchangeable with "elder" and connotes both a spiritual and physical guardianship. ("Serving as overseers" is not in some Gr. mss.)

Peter, through contrasting exhortations, presented both the motive and the manner of one's ministry. An elder's motive must be from willingness, not from a sense of external compulsion: not because you must, but because you are willing. Social or financial pressures should not be substituted for the pure motivation to do God's will and to serve Him freely and eagerly: not greedy for money, but eager to serve (cf. 1 Tim. 3:8; Titus 1:7, 11). Shepherds who serve with false motives care only for themselves and devour the flock (Ezek. 34:2-3).

5:3. The word translated lording it over (katakyrieuontes) includes the idea of domineering as in the rule of a strong person over one who is weak (cf. Matt. 20:25; Mark 10:42; Acts 19:16). Ezekiel indicted false shepherds: "You have ruled them harshly and brutally. So they were scattered because there was no shepherd" (Ezek. 34:4-5). Peter exhorted the elders to be examples (typoi, "types or patterns"), to serve as models for the people to follow. They were not to drive God's people, but to lead them by their examples of mature Christian character.

5:4. Christ, the Chief Shepherd (archipoimenos), is "the True Shepherd" (Ezek. 34:11-16), "the Good Shepherd" (John 10:11, 14), and "the Great Shepherd" (Heb. 13:20). When Christ returns, His faithful undershepherds will share in His glory (1 Peter 5:1) and receive unfading crowns (cf. 1:4).

B. Young men are to submit (5:5-7)

Peter then turned his attention from the shepherds to the sheep. Good leaders deserve good followers. Those who are led are responsible to be in subjection to men and to God.

5:5. Young men . . . be submissive (hypotagēte; cf. 3:1) to those who are older. Church leaders were usually older members. The younger members were to place themselves willingly under the authority of those who had been given the responsibility of leadership. Peter exhorted both young and old alike to clothe (enkombōsasthe, "clothe or tie on oneself"; an enkombōma was the apron of a slave) yourselves with humility. True humility is attractive dress (cf. 3:8). Peter may have alluded to Christ's girding Himself with a towel and teaching the disciples that humility is the prerequisite for service and service is the practice of humility (John 13:4-15).

Peter quoted Proverbs 3:34 to emphasize God's different attitudes toward the proud and the humble. God opposes (lit., "sets Himself against") the arrogant but grants favor and acceptance to the humble.

5:6-7. Knowing God's attitude should cause Christians not only to be subject to others but also to subject themselves deliberately to God's sovereign rule. The command humble yourselves (tapeinōthēte) could be translated "allow yourselves to be humbled." Those who were suffering persecution for Christ's sake could be encouraged by the fact that the same mighty hand that let them suffer would one day lift (hypsōsē, "exalt") them up (cf. James 4:10).

Peter then referred to Christ's classic words of encouragement in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 6:25-32), while quoting Psalm 55:22: "Cast your cares on the Lord and He will sustain you." All a believer's anxieties can be cast . . . on Him. Christ sustains because He cares. A Christian's confidence rests in the fact that Christ is genuinely concerned for his welfare.

C. All are to stand firm (5:8-11)

Though believers should place their confidence in God, they should not be careless. Christians in conflict are to be on the alert, made strong and steadfast by Christ Himself.

5:8. Be self-controlled (nēpsate; cf. 1:13; 4:7) and alert (grēgorēsate; cf. 1 Thes. 5:6, 10). Christians should be constantly alert because the enemy (antidikos, "adversary"), the devil (diabolos, "slanderer"), is always actively seeking an opportunity for a vicious attack. This verse could also be a veiled allusion to the horrors of the Neronian persecution in the Roman Coliseum, in which lions mauled and devoured Christians. Satan desired to do the same thing spiritually, to defeat believers' testimonies.

5:9. The devil can be and should be resisted. Resist (antistēte) means "withstand," used also in James 4:7 (cf. antidikos, "enemy" in 1 Peter 5:8). It is a term of defense rather than attack. Christians may stand firm against Satan only if they depend wholly on Christ, standing firm in the faith (cf. v. 12; Col. 2:5). Peter also encouraged his readers by reminding them that they were not alone in their suffering. The knowledge that other Christians, your brothers throughout the world, were suffering, would strengthen their resolve to continue to stand firm.

5:10. Peter had encouraged his readers to endure suffering in such a way that the grace of God would be made manifest in their lives. Now in a closing word of benediction he committed them to the God of all grace (cf. 4:10). The benediction briefly summarizes Peter's message of encouragement. Christians' suffering will last only a little while, while their glory in Christ, to which they were called, will be eternal (cf. Rom. 8:17-18; 2 Cor. 4:16-18). (This is Peter's last of eight uses of "glory" in this epistle: 1 Peter 1:7,11, 21, 24; 2:20; 4:14; 5:1, 10.) God Himself would restore them and make them strong (stērixei; cf. 2 Thes. 2:17), firm (sthenōsei, used only here in the NT), and steadfast (themeliosei, "established"; cf. Eph. 3:17; Col. 1:23).

5:11. To Him be the power (kratos, "might") forever and ever. Amen. In this benediction, similar to the one in 4:11, Peter praised Christ who has all power for all time (cf. Rom. 11:36; 1 Tim. 6:16). Certainly He has the power to strengthen His own as they undergo persecution.

VI. Conclusion (5:12-14)

5:12. As Paul often did at the close of his epistles, Peter may have penned these last verses himself. Silas served as Peter's amanuensis (with the help of Silas . . . I have written to you), and probably personally delivered the letter to the churches of Asia Minor along the predetermined route specified in 1:1. This was probably the same Silas who accompanied Paul on his second missionary journey (Acts 15:40). In the words encouraging (parakalōn, "exhorting, appealing"; cf. 1 Peter 5:1) . . . and testifying (epimartyrōn, "bearing witness"), Peter summarized the purpose of his letter. He wrote to encourage Christians to endure persecution, to stand fast, so that the true grace of God (cf. 1:13; 4:10) would be evidenced to the unbelieving world. They were to "stand fast" in His grace (cf. 5:9).

5:13. Some scholars suggest that she who is in Babylon refers to Peter's wife (cf. 1 Cor. 9:5). However, since Peter was writing to churches and said she is chosen together with you, probably "she" refers to the church (which is a feminine noun ekklēsia). If so, Peter was sending greetings from the church in "Babylon" to the churches in Asia Minor. According to historical evidence, Peter was in Rome during the final years of his life. "Babylon" here might be a disguised reference to Rome, used in order to protect both the Roman church and Peter from the Neronian persecution. (Others suggest, however, that he wrote from the literal city of Babylon on the Euphrates River.) Greetings were also sent from Peter's son in the faith, Mark. Paul (Col. 4:10) placed John Mark in Rome on an earlier occasion. Consequently most would agree that John Mark, the cousin of Barnabas, was in Rome at the time 1 Peter was written. This strengthens the view that "Babylon" referred to Rome.

5:14. The number of New Testament references to a kiss indicate that it was a common sign of fellowship and Christian love (cf. Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thes. 5:26).

Peter closed as he began (1 Peter 1:2), encouraging Christians in the midst of persecution by praying for peace (eirēnē), which is abundantly available to all who are in Christ, the Prince of Peace.

2 PETER

Kenneth O. Gangel

INTRODUCTION

This epistle may be titled "The Believer's Conflict in the Latter Days." The apostle opened and closed 2 Peter with the theme of victory. But within the epistle he focused primarily on how to live when surrounded by the problems and perplexities of the end time. After painting a landscape (in 2:1–3:10) replete with false teachers, fallen angels, flagrant immorality, and flaccid scoffers, Peter charged his readers "to live holy and godly lives as you look forward to the day of God and speed its coming" (3:11-12). Faithful living in difficult times—that is the lesson Peter would have believers learn through this dynamic letter.

Authorship and Canonicity. For more than 17 centuries this brief but poignant epistle has withstood the blasts of skeptical scholars who have denied the authenticity of its claim to Petrine authorship. The first verse names Simon Peter who stood with James and John as one of the unique eyewitnesses to Christ's transfiguration (1:17-18; cf. Mark 9:2-7). This Peter who had written earlier (1 Peter 1:1), now addressed the same readers (2 Peter 3:1). He was numbered as one of the Twelve (1:1; 3:2), and he knew the Apostle Paul as a "dear brother" (3:15). Peter had heard the manner of his own death foretold by his Lord as they walked together along the shore of the Sea of Galilee (1:14; cf. John 21:18). Yet, despite this internal evidence, as early as the third century Origen (died ca. 253) noted that there was some doubt concerning the true identity of the author of 2 Peter.

During the fourth century, the great church historian Eusebius (260?–340?) listed 2 Peter, along with 2 and 3 John and James, as antilegomena, books whose canonicity was under dispute. Eusebius noted that no long line of church tradition seemed to support the acceptance of 2 Peter.

Jerome (346–420) included 2 Peter in his well-known translation of the Bible, the Latin Vulgate. Though Jerome accepted the authenticity of the book, he stated that many questioned its Petrine authorship because of the marked difference of style between 1 and 2 Peter.

Through the centuries scholars have added to these early arguments. Some have attempted to identify 2 Peter with the apocryphal or pseudonymous writings which claim apostolic authorship (i.e., the Apocalypse of Peter, the Gospel of Peter, and the Acts of Peter). The strong similarity between 2 Peter and Jude has caused some to doubt Petrine authorship.

Others have pointed out that the mention of Paul's writings (3:16) and the problems raised by the false teachers (specifically the delay of the Lord's return [3:4]), argue for a later author writing sometime during the second century, long after Peter's death. As a result of those and other related arguments, most nonconservative scholars reject the apostolic authorship of 2 Peter.

Yet, while modern opinion may run against the acceptance of the traditional position, none of these problems is insurmountable and none of the arguments is unanswerable.

External evidence. The church literature of the second century includes no direct references to 2 Peter. Consequently critics have stated that there is less external attestation for 2 Peter than for any other book in the New Testament. However, silence argues neither for nor against Petrine authorship. The epistle is short and was probably not widely circulated. Its acceptance may have come slowly because of the suspicion the early church had for letters bearing the names of apostles. The extent of early forgeries is emphasized by Paul's admonition to beware of certain false epistles (2 Thes. 2:2). Also since 2 Peter was written just shortly before the author's death, he could not have been around long to verify its authenticity. However, the silence of second-century authors does not indicate that the church did not accept 2 Peter.

During the third century three men referred directly to the Petrine authorship of 2 Peter. Methodius of Olympus, martyred in the Diocletian persecution, quoted 2 Peter 3:8 to support his argument in De Resurrectione. He definitely referred to the Apostle Peter as the author. Firmilian, a bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, referred to the Apostle Peter's denunciation of false teachers. First Peter does not refer to false teachers, but 2 Peter devotes an entire chapter to the subject. Thus Firmilian may have been ascribing Petrine authorship to 2 Peter. Finally, Origen, though pointing out a current trend of doubt, seems from the content and frequent references in his other writings to have accepted 2 Peter as authoritative. Though the first statement questioning Petrine authorship was made in the third century, both Methodius and Firmilian affirmed 2 Peter as genuine—and, most likely, Origen did as well.

In the fourth century the Petrine authorship of 2 Peter was strongly affirmed. Two of the great theologians of the early church, Athanasius and Augustine, considered 2 Peter as canonical. The Council of Laodicea (A.D. 372) included the epistle in the canon of Scripture. Jerome placed 2 Peter in the Latin Vulgate (ca. A.D. 404). Also the great third Council of Carthage (A.D. 397) recognized the intrinsic authority and worth of 2 Peter and formally affirmed that it was written by the Apostle Peter.

Though 2 Peter is the least attested book in the New Testament, its external support far surpasses that of many of the other Bible books. The absence of early church tradition supporting 2 Peter certainly could have been due to the letter's brevity and the lack of communication among Christians during times of heavy persecution. Consequently the silence of the second century and the caution of the third century posed no insurmountable problems for the careful scholarship of the canonical councils of the fourth century.

Internal evidence. The question of stylistic differences between 1 Peter and 2 Peter has been debated since Jerome first recorded the problem in the fourth century. Jerome himself explained that the difference in style could easily be attributed to the fact that Peter most likely used an amanuensis other than Silvanus who served Peter in writing his first letter (1 Peter 5:12). If Jerome is right, the differences in style are no greater than might have been expected, considering the different subject matter and different purposes for writing the two letters.

The similarities in style between the two books are just as striking as the differences. Both books are filled with hapax legomena, words that occur only once in the New Testament. Of the 686 hapax legomena in the New Testament, 1 Peter contains 62 and 2 Peter has 54—more, proportionately, than most New Testament books their size (Homer K. Ebright, The Petrine Epistles. Cincinnati: Methodist Book Concern, 1917, pp. 70-5, 121-3; cf. Charles Bigg, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistles of St. Peter and St. Jude, pp. 224-5). Ebright concludes that the noticeable differences are not between the two Petrine Epistles but between these Epistles and the rest of the New Testament. The prominence of hapax legomena in both books may point to a common author who had a rich vocabulary and a public speaker's flare for fresh creative expression.

It should not be considered remarkable, then, that a number of words and phrases are found only in these two epistles. Both books include the unusual salutation, "Grace and peace be yours in abundance" (1 Peter 1:2; 2 Peter 1:2). The term aretas ("praises") in 1 Peter 2:9, and aretē ("goodness") in 2 Peter 1:3 are forms of the same unique word and refer to the moral excellence and goodness of God. The word apothesis is used in the New Testament only in 1 Peter 3:21 and 2 Peter 1:14 and is translated "removal" and "put . . . aside," respectively. The graphic phrase amōmou kai aspilou, used in 1 Peter 1:19 to refer to the sinlessness of Christ as One without "blemish or defect," is artfully rephrased in 2 Peter 2:13 as spiloi kai mōmoi ("blots and blemishes") to refer to the character of the false teachers. The phrase is used again in 3:14, aspiloi kai amōmētoi

"spotless and blameless"), to challenge Christians to moral excellence in light of Christ's return. The use of these and other unique words and phrases in these two epistles provides strong evidence of their common authorship.

Second Peter also reflects the unique vocabulary of Peter's sermons recorded in the Book of Acts. One of the best examples is the verb kolasōntai ("punish"), found only in Acts 4:21, and kolazomenous ("punishment") in 2 Peter 2:9. Other similarities may be noted between 1:3 and Acts 3:12 ("power" and "godliness") and between 2 Peter 2:13, 15 (misthon adikias, lit., "wages of wickedness") and Acts 1:18 (misthou tēs adikias, lit., "reward of wickedness").

Though differences in style exist between 1 and 2 Peter, the frequent use of hapax legomena, the unique vocabulary shared by both books, and the strong resemblance between words in 2 Peter and words in Peter's sermons recorded in Acts, all argue strongly for Petrine authorship.

The problem of other apocryphal or pseudonymous literature bearing Peter's name has caused some scholars to reject the authenticity of 2 Peter. In fact, as already mentioned, the early church was slow in giving 2 Peter unqualified acceptance because of the circulation of spurious pseudonymous epistles. Some have tried to argue that pseudonymity was an accepted second-century literary device (e.g., James Moffatt, The General Epistles: James, Peter, and Judas, pp. 173-5, and Montague Rhodes James, The Second Epistle General of Peter and the General Epistle of Jude, pp. xxxii-iv). However, the fact that 2 Peter was eventually accepted and that the Apocalypse of Peter, the Gospel of Peter, and the Acts of Peter were rejected as pseudonymous books clearly indicates that pseudonymity was not tolerated. The early church recognized the distinctive character and authority of 2 Peter, as opposed to works of lesser quality that merely copied Petrine thought, mixed in later Jewish and Greek ideas, and added a distinctly Docetic view of the person of Christ (that He only seemed to have a human body).

The external and internal evidence, though subject to heavy critical attack, has withstood the test of time. No argument against Petrine authorship is conclusive and no new evidence has successfully refuted the epistle's claim to apostolic authorship.

Relationship to Jude. Even a cursory reading of 2 Peter 2 and Jude 4-18 confirms their striking similarity. However, the exact nature of their dependence on each other and the effect of that dependence on their canonicity and authenticity has been the subject of much debate. Scholars of the early church thought that 2 Peter was written first, and that Jude borrowed from it. The results of German higher criticism have swayed scholars in modern times to the opposite view. Some have even posited that the authors of 2 Peter and Jude used a common third source. All three positions face significant difficulties.

If Jude were written first, it is questioned whether an apostle of Peter's standing would have borrowed so extensively from a writer of lesser reputation. However, perhaps Peter viewed Jude's warning against false teachers as important enough to be reemphasized and reinforced by his own apostolic authority. The priority of Jude does not pose a problem to Petrine authorship as long as it is not dated later than A.D. 68, the traditional date of Peter's martyrdom. The Book of Jude does not provide enough evidence for conclusive dating.

If 2 Peter is given priority, the problem arises as to why Jude would merely repeat what was already available and include so little new material. However, Jude may have abbreviated and clarified Peter's letter or some unknown common source to meet the particular needs of churches that had not yet received the earlier epistle. (Cf. Charles Bigg, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistles of St. Peter and St. Jude, pp. 216-24.)

Donald Guthrie points out that the order of priority of 2 Peter and Jude need not have any particular bearing on their authenticity, authorship, or inspiration (New Testament Introduction. Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity Press, 1970, p. 926). The evidence is inconclusive and either position may be held consistently with a conservative view of the inspiration and authority of Scripture.

Date and Place of Writing. Since Peter mentions Pauline literature and deals with questions regarding the Lord's return, some feel the book demands a second-century date and thus could not have been written by the Apostle Peter.

The mention of Paul's letters in 2 Peter 3:16 has given rise to the assumption that the author was referring to an organized collection of epistles that were recognized by the church at large as authoritative. F. H. Chase has written, "It is impossible to suppose that a collection of St. Paul's epistles had been made and that they were treated as Scripture during the lifetime of St. Peter" (A Dictionary of the Bible, ed. James Hastings. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1902, s.v. "Peter," 3:810). However, Peter's statement (2 Peter 3:16) need not refer to the entire body of Pauline literature but merely to those letters with which Peter was familiar. Certainly Peter, living the last few years of his life in Rome itself, would have had occasion to read several of Paul's letters as they circulated among churches throughout the Roman world.

Two references in 2 Peter give some indication of the date of the epistle. In 2 Peter 1:13-15, Peter indicated that the time of his death was near. The traditional date for Peter's death is late A.D. 67 or early A.D. 68. The reference to Paul's epistles in 3:16 would seem to indicate a date some time after A.D. 60. Since 1 Peter is normally dated around A.D. 64, 2 Peter may be conservatively placed some time after the writing of 1 Peter and before Peter's death, between A.D. 64 and 68.

The text of 2 Peter suggests no specific place for its composition. However, since 1 Peter was written in Rome and Rome is traditionally held to be the place of Peter's crucifixion, it is reasonable to assume that 2 Peter was written in Rome as well.

Destination. Peter was writing to Christians (1:1) to whom he had written before (3:1). If 2 Peter 3:1 refers to 1 Peter, then he was writing to the mixed Jewish and Gentile churches of "Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia" (1 Peter 1:1). If, however, he referred to a letter no longer extant, then the destination of 2 Peter cannot be determined.

Occasion and Purpose. Peter was both a concerned pastor and a champion of theological orthodoxy. This final impassioned plea to grow in Christian maturity and guard against false teachers was precipitated by the fact that His time was short (1:13-15) and that these congregations faced immediate danger (2:1-3). He desired to refresh their memories (1:13) and stimulate their thinking (3:1-2) so that they would remember his teaching (1:15). He carefully described the characteristics of mature believers and challenged them to make every effort to grow in grace and knowledge (1:3-11). Credentials of true teachers were given to help the readers be discerning students of God's Word (1:12-21). Peter cautioned them against false teachers and exposed their evil characteristics (chap. 2). And he encouraged his readers with the certainty of Christ's return (3:1-16).

The purpose of 2 Peter is to call Christians to spiritual growth so that they can combat apostasy as they look forward to the Lord's return.

COMMENTARY

I. Introduction (1:1-2)

A. The salutation (1:1)

1. THE AUTHOR (1:1A)

1:1a. The author is identified as Simon Peter. It is ironic that this letter, whose authorship has been so disputed, begins with a textual problem concerning the spelling of its author's name. Some manuscripts have the common Greek spelling (Simōn), whereas others have the direct transliteration of the Hebrew (Symeōn). The best textual evidence supports the more unusual Hebrew spelling, used elsewhere only in Acts 15:14. This detail provides support for the authenticity of Petrine authorship, for an impostor probably would have used the more widely accepted spelling.

"Peter," the Greek translation of "Cephas" and the name given to Simon by Jesus, is discussed in the Introduction of 1 Peter (see also 1 Peter 1:1).

Peter's combining these distinctly Hebrew and Greek names may be an indication of the mixed audience (Hebrew and Greek Christians) he addressed.

Peter adds the term servant (doulos, lit., "slave"; cf. Matt. 23:11) to his title apostle of Jesus Christ (cf. Rom. 1:1; Titus 1:1). Near the close of his life, at the apex of his apostolic authority, he was Christ's servant first, and His apostle second.

2. THE AUDIENCE (1:1B)

1:1b. The recipients of the letter are described only in general terms (cf. 3:1). They are those who . . . have received a faith as precious as ours. "Received" is from the unusual verb lanchanō, "to obtain by lot" (cf. Luke 1:9; John 19:24). This implies God's sovereign choice rather than anything they might have done to deserve such a gift. The words "as precious" translate the compound word isotimon, used only here in the New Testament. It comes from isos ("equal") and timē ("honor, value"). The word isotimon was used for foreigners who had been granted the privileges of citizenship which were equal to those of the native born. The faith given them by God was of equal honor or privilege with that of the apostles' faith. Here Peter foreshadowed his purpose by stressing that the faith of the apostles was no different from the faith of any believer. This contrasted with the pre-Gnostic doctrines of the false teachers who spoke of an inner circle of special knowledge attainable by and available only to a privileged few.

The word "faith" (pistin) is used without the article; thus it could refer to the objective content of faith (cf. Jude 3) or, more likely, to the subjective ability to believe. This faith is given through (or, on the basis of) the righteousness (dikaiosynē, "justice" or "uprightness"; cf. Rom. 1:17; 3:22) of our God and Savior (Peter called Jesus Savior [Acts 5:31]) Jesus Christ. The grammar here clearly indicates that "God and Savior" are one Person, not two (i.e., there is one Gr.

article with two substantives). This passage ranks with the great Christological passages of the New Testament which plainly teach that Jesus Christ is coequal in nature with God the Father (cf. Matt. 16:16; John 1:1; 20:28; Titus 2:13). "Savior" is used of Christ five times in this short epistle (2 Peter 1:1, 11; 2:20; 3:2, 18).

B. The blessing (1:2)

1:2. The first half of this verse corresponds exactly with 1 Peter 1:2b: Grace and peace (charis . . . kai eirēnē; cf. Pauline usage in Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:3; 2 Cor. 1:2; etc.) were the characteristic Greek and Hebrew greetings (eirēnē being the Gr. trans. of the Heb. šālôm). The verb translated be . . . in abundance (plēthyntheiē; also used in 1 Peter 1:2; Jude 2) is in the optative mood, thus stressing a sincere, prayerful wish for his readers.

This blessing of grace and peace is more than a mere formula of greeting. These virtues come through the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord. In each of his first two verses Peter mentioned God and Jesus as equal. "Knowledge" (epignōsei, "full [epi, additional] knowledge") implies an intimate and personal relationship. It is the means by which God's grace and peace may be received and experienced. Peter used this term epignōsis again in 2 Peter 1:3, 8; and 2:20. The shorter form (gnōsis) is found in 1:5-6 and 3:18. Christians are urged to take advantage of the "full knowledge" available to them through Christ Jesus (each occurrence of epignōsis in 2 Peter is related to Christ). In this way they could combat false teachers who claimed to have special knowledge (gnōsis) but who openly practiced immorality (cf. Paul's usage of epignōsis to combat incipient Gnosticism: Col. 1:9-10; 2:2; 3:10).

II. The Christian's Nature: The Work of God (1:3-11)

Peter challenged believers to take full advantage of the divine power and promise of God which made it possible to participate in the divine nature and thus overcome the corruption caused by evil desires (vv. 3-4). Based on this promised power, Peter further challenged Christians to practice the characteristics of the divine nature so that they would experience the assurance of eternal rewards (vv. 5-11).

A. The fact of the divine nature (1:3-4)

1:3. Christ's divine power has provided everything believers need for life and godliness. "Divine" translates theias, which is from theos ("God") and is used only three times in the New Testament (here and in Acts 17:29; 2 Peter 1:4). "Power" (dynameōs) is one of Peter's favorite words (cf. 1 Peter 1:5; 3:22; 2 Peter 1:16; 2:11). All that believers need for spiritual vitality (life) and godly living (eusebeian, "godliness," "piety"; cf. comments on 1:6; 3:11) is attainable through our knowledge of Him (Christ). An intimate "full knowledge" (epignōseōs; cf. 1:2) of Christ is the source of spiritual power and growth (cf. Phil. 1:9; Col. 1:9-10; 2:2).

Christ called (cf. 1 Peter 1:15) us to this life of godliness by His own glory and goodness (aretē, "moral excellence"; trans. "praises" in 1 Peter 2:9 and "goodness" in 2 Peter 1:5). Christ attracts people enslaved by sin (cf. 2:19) by His own moral excellence and the total impact of His glorious Person.

2. DIVINE PROMISES (1:4A)

1:4a. Through these, that is, Christ's "glory and goodness" (v. 3), He has given believers His very great and precious promises. The Greek verb translated "has given" (dedōrētai) means "to bestow, to endow." Not the usual word for "give," it carries with it the idea of the worth of the gift. Peter used the same verb in verse 3. In Mark 15:45 the word is used to describe Pilate's "giving" of Jesus' body to Joseph of Arimathea.

The word for "promises" (epangelmata, from epangellō; used only in 2 Peter 1:4 and 3:13) implies an emphatic public announcement. The promises are appropriately described as "very great and precious" (timia, from timē, "value"). Peter used "precious" to describe a Christian's faith (1 Peter 2:7; 2 Peter 1:1), Christ's blood (1 Peter 1:19), and here, Christ's promises. The promises Peter had previously written about related to a believer's inheritance (1 Peter 1:3-5) and the return of Christ (1 Peter 1:9, 13).

3. DIVINE PARTICIPATION (1:4B)

1:4b. These promises enable Christians to participate in the divine nature. "Participate" is literally "become partners" (genēsthe . . . koinōnoi). "Participate" in 1 Peter 4:13 and "share" in 1 Peter 5:1 are from the same word koinōnoi ("partners" or "sharers"). "Divine" is theias, also used in 2 Peter 1:3. Believers take on God's very nature; each one is a "new creation" (2 Cor. 5:17).

Because they are "partakers" (KJV) of God's nature, Christians can share in His moral victory over sin in this life and share in His glorious victory over death in eternal life. Because of the promise of the new birth (1 Peter 1:3), the promise of God's protecting power (1 Peter 1:5), and the promise of God's enabling power (2 Peter 1:3), believers can "participate in the divine nature," that is, become more like Christ (cf. Rom. 8:9; Gal. 2:20). In addition they can escape the corruption (phthoras, "moral decay") in the world (cf. 2 Peter 2:20; 1 John 2:15-17) caused by evil desires (epithymia, lit., "lust").

In 2 Peter 1:3-4 Peter employed graphic vocabulary borrowed from the false teachers he warned against. His language must have arrested his readers' attention as he invested words from the pagan and philosophic worlds with new Christian meaning: "godliness" (eusebeia), "virtue" (aretē), "nature" (physis), and "corruption" (phthoras).

B. The function of the divine nature (1:5-9)

In this beautiful paragraph Peter orchestrates a symphony of grace. To the melody line of faith he leads believers to add harmony in a blend of seven Christian virtues which he lists without explanation or description. A carnal Christian has spiritual myopia (v. 9), but a spiritual Christian is both effective and productive (v. 8) in his understanding of the Lord Jesus and his application of biblical principles to daily life.

1. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE FUNCTION (1:5-7)

1:5-7. Peter referred back to the divine nature by beginning this new paragraph with the words for this very reason. The words make every effort translate a participle (pareisenenkantes, "applying, bringing to bear alongside of"; used only here in the NT) and spoudēn pasan ("all diligence" or "all zeal"; spoudē in Rom. 12:11 is rendered "zeal"). It takes every bit of diligence and effort a Christian can muster, along with the enabling power of the Holy Spirit, to "escape the corruption in the world caused by evil desires" (2 Peter 1:4) and to bring in alongside of his faith a complement of virtue. He should work hard at cultivating the seven qualities Peter listed in verses 5-7. As a Christian does so, he becomes more like Christ, participating more fully in God's divine nature.

The word add, in the imperative, translates epichorēgēsate, from which come the English words "chorus," "choreograph," and "choreography." In ancient Greece the state established a chorus but the director, the chorēgys, paid the expenses for training the chorus. Then the word came to be used of one who provides for or supports others or supplies something for them in abundance. A believer is to "furnish, supply, or support" his life with these virtues. (The same word is trans. "supplies" in 2 Cor. 9:10 and "supported" in Col. 2:19. Peter used it again in 2 Peter 1:11 where the NIV renders it "receive.")

Faith in Jesus Christ is what separates Christians from all other people. Pistis, trust in the Savior which brings one into the family of God, is the foundation of all other qualities in the Christian life.

1. To his faith each believer should add goodness (lit., "moral excellency," or "virtue"). In Greek the word is aretēn, which Peter also used at the end of verse 3 and in 1 Peter 2:9 ("praises" in the NIV).

2. Knowledge (gnōsin; cf. 2 Peter 1:2; 3:18) comes not from intellectual pursuits, but is spiritual knowledge which comes through the Holy Spirit and is focused on the person and Word of God.

3. Faith, goodness, and spiritual knowledge are not enough for a Christian's walk. He must also make every effort to practice self-control (enkrateian; used only two other times in the NT, in Acts 24:25; Gal. 5:23). This means to have one's passions under control. It contrasts sharply with the anarchy and lack of control on the part of the false teachers whom Peter exposed (chap. 2). In an increasingly anarchistic society Christians do well to let the music of self-control be played in their lives.

4. Believers living in the latter days, especially when surrounded by scoffers and false teachers, also need perseverance. This word hypomenēn means "staying under." It is frequently used in the New Testament to refer to constancy or steadfast endurance under adversity, without giving in or giving up (cf. Rom. 5:3-4; 15:4-5; 2 Cor. 1:6; 6:4; Col. 1:11; 1 Thes. 1:3; 2 Thes. 1:4; James 1:3).

5. Godliness (eusebian, also used in 2 Peter 1:3 and 3:11 and 10 times [in the Gr.] in the Pastoral Epistles) refers to piety, man's obligation of reverence toward God. The fourth-century church historian Eusebius was named for this lovely Greek word. How unfortunate that the words "piety" and "pious" have fallen on hard times in current usage.

6. The first five virtues pertain to one's inner life and his relationship to God. The last two relate to others. Brotherly kindness translates the Greek philadelphian, a fervent practical caring for others (1 John 4:20). Peter already urged this attitude on his readers in his first epistle (1 Peter 1:22; cf. Rom. 12:10; 1 Thes. 4:9; Heb. 13:1).

7. Whereas brotherly kindness is concern for others' needs, love (agapēn) is desiring the highest good for others. This is the kind of love God exhibits toward sinners (John 3:16; Rom. 5:8; 1 John 4:9-11).

Interestingly this "symphony" begins with faith and ends with love. Building on the foundation of faith in Christ, believers are to exhibit Christlikeness by supplying these seven qualities that climax in love toward others (cf. faith and love in Col. 1:4-5; 1 Thes. 1:3; 2 Thes. 1:3; Phile. 5).

2. CONSEQUENCES OF THE FUNCTION (1:8)

1:8. Christian growth (vv. 5-7) results in spiritual effectiveness and productivity. The word possess (hyparchōnta, lit. "possessing") emphasizes that these spiritual qualities "belong to" Christians. However, Christians are to do more than merely possess these virtues. Effective and productive spirituality comes as these qualities are held in increasing measure. There is to be a growth in grace. A believer who does not progress in these seven areas is ineffective (argous, "idle" or "useless") and unproductive (lit., "unfruitful") in his knowledge (epignōsin, "full personal knowledge"; cf. vv. 2-3; 2:20) of our Lord Jesus Christ. Unfortunately many Christians know the Lord in salvation but lack the "fruit" of the Spirit and are not advancing spiritually. They remain "infants in Christ" (1 Cor. 3:1), still in need of spiritual "milk" (Heb. 5:12-13). But as Peter urged, believers should "grow in the grace and knowledge (gnōsei) of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" (2 Peter 3:18).

3. CONTRASTS OF THE FUNCTION (1:9)

1:9. In contrast with a growing Christian, a carnal believer is blind (typhlos) and nearsighted (myōpazōn). (The NIV reverses these two words; in Gr. the word "blind" comes first.) Myōpazōn (from which comes the word "myopia"), occurs only here in the New Testament. A believer with spiritual myopia is not magnifying the grace of Christ. Since his life is not evidencing the qualities cited in verses 5-7, he seems to be just like a spiritually blind (or unsaved) person (2 Cor. 4:4; cf. John 9:39). Such a person has forgotten that he has been cleansed from his past (preconversion) sins. Some commentators say this refers to unbelievers. But it seems preferable to say that Peter wrote of Christians who are spiritually immature. After all, they had been cleansed from their sins (cf. Titus 3:5), but had not grown spiritually.

C. The finality of the divine nature (1:10-11)

In order to be an effective and productive Christian avoiding spiritual myopia, one must be sure that he is genuinely saved. This is demonstrated by his new life in Christ, which provides evidence that he will reach his eternal home.

1. EXPERIENTIAL FINALITY (1:10)

1:10. Being eager (spoudasate, also used in vv. 1, 15; 3:14 ["make every effort"]; cf. spoudēn in 1:5) to make one's calling and election sure focuses on the confidence a Christian has about his standing with God. A believer hardly has the authority to assure God of his status; actually the reverse is true. The Greek word for "sure" (bebaian) was used in classical Greek to refer to a warranty deed somewhat like those people use today on houses and other pieces of property. One's godly behavior is a warranty deed for himself that Jesus Christ has cleansed him from his past sins and therefore that he was in fact called and elected by God. Bebaian is rendered "secure" (Heb. 6:19), "guaranteed" (Rom. 4:16), "firm" (2 Cor. 1:7), "courage" (Heb. 3:6), "confidence" (Heb. 3:14), and "in force" (Heb. 9:17).

"Calling" refers to God's efficacious work in salvation (cf. Rom. 1:7; 8:30; 1 Cor. 1:9), and "election" is God's work of choosing some sinners (by His grace, not their merits) to be saved (Rom. 8:33; 11:5; Eph. 1:4; Col. 3:12; 1 Peter 1:1). Election, of course, precedes calling. A believer shows by his godly life and his growth in the virtues mentioned in 2 Peter 1:5-7 that he is one of God's chosen. Such a believer will not fall (or "stumble," ptaisēte). This word "stumble" does not suggest that a believer loses his salvation, for salvation does not depend on one's spiritual growth. The Greek word for stumble means "to trip up" or "to experience a reversal." Certainly one who is maturing in Christ will not trip up in his spiritual life as readily as one who is immature and nearsighted.

2. ETERNAL FINALITY (1:11)

1:11. The ultimate reward of a growing, Christ-honoring life is the personal "welcome" by the Savior into His kingdom. Stephen experienced it (Acts 7:56); Paul knew when it was imminent for him (2 Tim. 4:7-8, 18); and every believer will experience such a welcome when he enters the Lord's presence in heaven. You will receive a rich welcome is, literally, "the entrance will be supplied richly for you." "Supplied" is from the verb epichorēgeō, translated "add" in 2 Peter 1:5. The entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ will be supplied with richness; it will be a wonderful "welcome home."

III. The Christian's Nurture: The Word of God (1:12-21)

As Peter made a transition from focusing on the work of God in believers' lives (vv. 3-11) to the Word of God as the instrument of nurture (vv. 16-21) he began with a parenthetical personal note about his readers' need to remember what he wrote (vv. 12-15). His section on the Word of God climaxes in a major statement on revelation and inspiration, reaching a high-water mark in verse 21, Peter's tribute to the Holy Spirit's role in God-breathed Scripture.

A. Memory of God's Word (1:12-15)

1:12. Peter, knowing his days were numbered, wanted his readers to retain all he would write in this epistle. Three times he spoke of this: I will . . . remind you (v. 12), "I . . . refresh your memory" (v. 13), "you will . . . be able to remember" (v. 15; cf. 3:1).

Peter was almost apologetic in the second half of 1:12; he did not want his readers to misunderstand his intention. He was not being critical nor did he suggest they were wavering. Instead, he said they did know the truths he wrote about and he was aware that they were firmly established in the truth. He wanted them to stay that way. ("Established" is from stērizō, which means "strengthen" or "be firm"; cf. 1 Thes. 3:2, 13; 2 Thes. 2:17; 3:3; 1 Peter 5:10.) A problem in many churches today is not that believers do not know what God expects of them, but they either forget (cf. 2 Peter 1:9) or are unwilling to live out the truth they now have.

1:13-14. Expecting he would soon be with the Lord, Peter wanted to refresh (lit., "keep on refreshing," pres. tense) their memories as long as he was allowed by the Lord of life to live in the tent of his body (cf. "the earthly tent" and "this tent," 2 Cor. 5:1, 4). Peter would put that tent aside, as the Lord had made clear to him. This could refer to Jesus' words to Peter about his death by crucifixion (John 21:18-19) or to his awareness that through old age or the threat of persecution, his life was almost at an end. The image of this earthly body being like a tent fits well with Peter's pilgrimage theme (1 Peter 1:1, 17; 2:11).

1:15. Peter deliberately repeated himself, perhaps for emphasis: I will make every effort translates the one word spoudasō, also used in verse 10 ("be . . . eager") and in 3:14 ("make every effort"). The word departure (exodon), though not the usual word for "death," does not veil the clarity of Peter's suggestion that he is about to die. On the Mount of Transfiguration, Jesus, Moses, and Elijah spoke of Jesus' "departure" (exodon; Luke 9:31). Interestingly this "exodus" (lit., "going out," i.e., from this body) contrasts with a believer's "entrance" into (eisodos, "going into") God's kingdom (2 Peter 1:11).

How could Peter guarantee that after his death his readers would always be able to remember these things? Some suggest this is a subtle reference to Peter's aid in preparing the Gospel of Mark, but this is only speculation. More obviously he was laboring to complete this second epistle which, when joined with the first, would provide ongoing written testimony of the truths so close to his heart. Still another possibility is that he referred to his own life and ministry extending into the lives of others, as Silas and Mark, who would carry on his work after he died. One thing is clear—Peter wanted to be sure that the Lord's people would not forget God's work and God's Word.

B. Majesty of God's Word (1:16-18)

1:16. It is important to distinguish between the written Word (the Bible) and the incarnate Word (Christ). They are both major avenues of God's revelation (cf. Ps. 19:7-11; John 1:18; Heb. 1:2) and therefore both come into focus throughout the remainder of this chapter. A Christian's faith does not rest on clever stories (mythois) as did the doctrines of the false teachers Peter attacked (2 Peter 2). Instead, true faith is founded on historical facts, which eyewitnesses corroborated. It appears that Peter introduced a new theme here. He plunged quickly into a mention of the Lord's return: the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. He had already talked about that welcome into the eternal kingdom (1:11), and had written about his own departure from this life. His defense of the doctrine of the Second Coming therefore is based on his eyewitness experience on the Mount of Transfiguration at which time he truly saw Christ's majesty. Several times in his earlier epistle he spoke of Christ's return (1 Peter 1:5, 13; 4:13). Obviously Peter considered this doctrine of great importance, one his readers should always keep in mind.

But how does the transfiguration argue that the Lord will come again with power? The transfiguration was designed to show the three apostles, Peter, James, and John, what Christ would be like in His glory, to give them a foretaste of His kingdom (cf. Matt. 16:28–17:2; Mark 9:1-8; Luke 9:28-36). This was a glorious demonstration they could never forget.

1:17-18. Peter's lofty language may stem from his burning desire to communicate the true majesty of the Savior which he, a member of the inner band of disciples, was uniquely privileged to see. Peter wanted his readers to look beyond Christ's first coming to the time when He will return with that same honor and glory He demonstrated on the mountain. In Peter's preaching during the days of the early church he was firmly committed to the doctrine of the Second Coming (Acts 2:32-33, 36; 3:16, 20-21).

Interestingly Peter was more profoundly impressed by what he heard than what he saw on that sacred mountain. The voice that came from heaven, the voice of God the Father, called the Majestic Glory (an unusual name for God), spoke approvingly of the Son.

C. Meaning of God's Word (1:19-21)

1:19. As Peter wrote of that unforgettable transfiguration experience, he was reminded of another form of God's Word, the written Word, given by the prophets. In fact, God's voice on the mountain made the word of the prophets . . . more certain (bebaioteron; cf. bebaian, v. 10) because the transfiguration pictured the fulfillment of their words. Both the prophets and the transfiguration pointed to Jesus' kingdom on earth.

In an exhortation Peter told how to derive meaning from God's Word—pay attention to it. As a Light, God's written Word has validity and authority. In today's experience-oriented societies many people, including some Christians, seek to determine or assess truth by the particular way God has worked in their own lives. But for Peter the splendor of his experience (with Christ at His transfiguration) faded as he spoke of the surety of the written revelation of the prophets.

The apostle wrote of illumination (v. 19), revelation (v. 20), and inspiration (v. 21). Old Testament prophecy is a light compared with the darkness of a squalid room. God's prophetic Word is a Light (lychnō, "an oil-burning lamp"; cf. Ps. 119:105) shining in a dark place. Though the world is darkened by sin (cf. Isa. 9:2; Eph. 6:12), God's Word, pointing to the future, enlightens believers about His ways. But the day (Christ's return, Rom. 13:12) is coming. In the daytime, lamps are no longer needed. And a lamp is nothing compared with the Morning Star (phōsphoros, "Light-Bringer"; used only here in the NT). Much as a lamp at night anticipates and is outshined by the bright morning star, so Old Testament prophecy looks ahead to the coming of Christ, "the bright Morning Star" (astēr; Rev. 22:16). Until He comes, believers are to let the Scriptures illumine their hearts (though the light which it brings on that great day will be greatly exceeded by the understanding which will be in their hearts).

1:20. Peter then wrote about revelation. The statement, No prophecy of Scripture came about by the prophet's own interpretation, has been interpreted several ways: (1) Scripture should be interpreted only in context, that is, a prophecy cannot stand alone without other prophecies to aid in its understanding. (2) Scripture should not be interpreted according to one's own individual liking. (3) Scripture cannot be correctly interpreted without the Holy Spirit. (4) The prophecies did not originate with the prophets themselves. The word epilyseōs ("interpretation," lit., "unloosing") and the word ginetai ("came about") favor the fourth view. The Scriptures did not stem merely from the prophets themselves; their writings came from God. Verse 20, then, speaks not of interpretation, but of revelation, the source of the Scriptures.

1:21. This verse also supports the view that Peter wrote in verse 20 about prophecies being born of God, not originating from the prophets themselves. Prophecy came not from the will of man, but men spoke from God as they were carried along by the Holy Spirit.

As the authors of Scripture wrote their prophecies, they were impelled or borne along by God's Spirit. What they wrote was thus inspired by God (2 Tim. 3:16). "Borne along" or "carried along" translates the word pheromenoi. Luke used this word in referring to a sailing vessel carried along by the wind (Acts 27:15, 17). The Scriptures' human authors were controlled by the divine Author, the Holy Spirit. Yet they were consciously involved in the process; they were neither taking dictation nor writing in a state of ecstasy. No wonder believers have a word of prophecy which is certain. And no wonder a Christian's nurture must depend on the Scriptures. They are the very words of God Himself!

IV. The Christian's Warfare: The Attack of False Teachers (chap. 2)

When the Edict of Milan was passed in A.D. 313 the church was then free to move into the world, legally and openly propagating its doctrines. But at the same time, the world also began to move into the church, diluting its message for the next 1,200 years until the Reformation broke forth on the scene. But it is obvious from 2 Peter 2 that the world was already in the church well before the time of Constantine. Believers in all ages must be constantly on guard against its attack.

A. Deliverance from false teachers (2:1-9)

The word "rescue" in verses 7 and 9 speaks of God's willingness and ability to deliver His people from assorted difficulties and dangers even when they themselves (like Lot) do not overtly seek deliverance. But depending on the Lord's ability to rescue is no excuse for failing to enter the warfare against false teachers and false prophets.

1. EXPOSURE OF FALSE TEACHING (2:1-3)

2:1. Satan's counterfeits with their insidious activities are always present. They appeared in Israel during the days of the writing prophets spoken of in 1:19-21, and they were present in the first-century church. Though Peter switched from writing about false prophets of the past to false teachers in the present, their teaching was the same—heresy. False prophets often rose out of Israel (cf. Jer. 5:31; 23:9-18), not from surrounding peoples. Similarly false teachers appear from the midst of the church. They secretly introduce their false teachings which are destructive heresies. "Secretly introduce" translates pareisaxousin, "bring in alongside" (cf. "infiltrated," which translates the related noun pareisaktous, in Gal. 2:4). "Heresies" transliterates the Greek word haireseis, which in classical Greek simply meant schools of philosophy. But New Testament writers used it to describe religious parties or sects (e.g., the Sadducees [Acts 5:17] or the Pharisees [Acts 15:5]), or factions probably based on false doctrine (e.g., 1 Cor. 11:19, "differences," NIV; "factions," NASB). Such heresies are "destructive," for they lead people away from Christ and thus to spiritual ruin (apōleias).

The focus of their heresies was the sovereign Lord, Christ, whom they denied (cf. Jude 4). This in turn led to their own spiritual destruction or ruin (apōleian; cf. 2 Peter 2:3; 3:16), which will be swift (tachinēn, "sudden"; cf. tachinē ["soon"] in 1:14). How can these false teachers, who were said to be among the people, and whom the Lord had bought (agorasanta, "redeem"), end up in everlasting destruction? Several suggestions have been offered: (1) They were saved but lost their salvation. But this contradicts many other Scriptures (e.g., John 3:16; 5:24; 10:28-29). (2) "Bought" means the Lord created them, not that He saved them. But this stretches the meaning of agorazō ("redeem"). (3) The false prophets merely said they were "bought" by Christ. This, however, seems to read into the verse. (4) They were "redeemed" in the sense that Christ paid the redemptive price for their salvation, but they did not apply it to themselves and so were not saved. Christ's death is "sufficient" for all (1 Tim. 2:6; Heb. 2:9; 1 John 2:2), but is "efficient" only for those who believe. This is a strong argument for unlimited atonement (the view that Christ died for everyone) and against limited atonement (the view that Christ died only for those whom He would later save).

2:2. The tragic fact about many false teachers is that they are successful—people listen to them and follow them and their shameful ways (aselgeiais, which Peter also used in 1 Peter 4:3 ["debauchery"]; 2 Peter 2:7 ["filthy"]; v. 18 ["lustful"]). (Cf. aselgeia in Rom. 13:13; 2 Cor. 12:21; Gal. 5:19; Eph. 4:19; Jude 4.) It refers to debased sexually immoral practices.

2:3. Ministerial charlatans and quacks have often troubled the flock of God. In their greed (cf. v. 14) they use others for their own mercenary purposes and turn the church into a dirty marketplace. Exploit (emporeusontai) means to commercialize ("buy, sell, trade"; cf. emporeusometha, "carry on business," in James 4:13). Stories they have made up is literally, "fabricated words" (plastois [whence the Eng. "plastic"] logois). They are artificial, not genuine. And their end is condemnation (krima, "judgment") and destruction (apōleia; used twice in 2 Peter 2:1 and also in 3:16). They fall into the same doom which God has planned for other violators of truth and righteousness (as Peter stated in vv. 4-6). Their destruction has not been sleeping (ou nystazei, used only one other time in the NT, to describe the sleepy virgins in Matt. 25:5). God's justice does not sleep and it is never late.

2. EXAMPLES OF HISTORIC JUDGMENT (2:4-6)

In verses 4-10a, Peter gave several illustrations to demonstrate both the Lord's judgment and His deliverance. After citing three examples of punishment (vv. 4-6), Peter then cited a case of deliverance (Lot, v. 7). In fact, verses 4-9 are a single sentence, one of the longest in the New Testament. Peter was intent on demonstrating that God will judge false teachers and others who sin against Him and His Word. History, Peter wrote, gives ample verification of this truth.

2:4. The first example is that of fallen angels. This refers either to their fall with Satan in his rebellion against God (Ezek. 28:15) or to the sin of angels in Genesis 6:1-4. Since Peter's other two illustrations in this section are from Genesis (chaps. 7; 19), perhaps this one is too, though it is difficult to be sure. If God in His justice punished angels, surely He would not hesitate to punish people. He plunged the angels into hell, literally, "tartarus" apparently a prison of custody (gloomy dungeons) between the time of the judgment and their ultimate consignment to the eternal lake of fire. There will be no future trial for their doom is already sealed. False prophets, Peter argued, will taste the same judgment as the rebellious angels.

2:5. Peter was greatly impressed by the significance of the Flood for he referred to it three times in his two epistles (1 Peter 3:20; 2 Peter 2:5; 3:6). Noah . . . and seven others is the NIV's rendering of the Greek "Noah, the eighth person." The others were his wife, his three sons (Shem, Ham, and Japheth), and their wives (Gen. 6:10, 18). Noah was a righteous man (Gen. 6:9), an obedient servant of God, and a shipbuilder (Gen. 6:13-22). Peter added that he was also a preacher (kēryka, "herald") of righteousness, who spoke out against the vile corruption all around him.

The primary focus of 2 Peter 2:5 is the unsparing hand of God on the antediluvian civilization, the ancient world with its ungodly people. Do false teachers today think they can escape God's judgment because of their large numbers? Peter reminded them and those who are the targets of their delusions that God can judge evil even when it involves the entire human race (with the exception of only eight people). The word brought (epaxas, past part. from epagō, "to bring on") suggests the suddenness of God's judgment in the Flood. Peter used the same verb in verse 1 in speaking of heretics who are "bringing" destruction on themselves.

2:6. God's destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah by fire is a classic example of universal destruction of the ungodly (Gen. 10:15-29). The participle tephrōsas (burning them to ashes), used only here in the New Testament, means "reduce to ashes" or "cover with ashes." Peter concluded this illustration by saying that God made them an example (hypodeigma, "model, pattern") of what is going to happen to the ungodly (cf. Jude 7). The apostle's purpose here was to cite this historical incident of judgment, not to elaborate on the cause for such severe destruction. In the present day homosexuality, which is scarring so much of Western culture, recalls the same shameful conduct in those two ancient cities (Gen. 19:4-5; cf. Gen. 13:13; Rom. 1:27).

3. EXPLANATION OF DIVINE DELIVERANCE (2:7-9)

2:7-9. Peter had spoken (v. 5) of one deliverance (of Noah and his family); now he cited another, God's rescue of Lot. Here again is an interesting New Testament commentary on a familiar Old Testament passage (cf. comments on v. 5). In Genesis 19 Lot hardly comes across as a righteous man; possibly godliness was not a consistent mark in his daily conduct. But in his standing before God he was a justified man ("righteous," occurring three times in 2 Peter 2:7-8, is dikaion, "justified"). This is evidenced by the fact that Lot was distressed (kataponoumenon, "tormented, oppressed"; used only here and in Acts 7:24 in the NT) by the enormity of iniquity all around him. The people in those twin cities were filthy (en aselgeia, "in sexual debauchery"; in 2 Peter 2:2 aselgeia is trans. "shameful"), lawless (athesmōn, "unprincipled"; used only twice in the NT: here and in 3:17), and involved in lawless (anomois, "without any standard or law") deeds. Besides being distressed, Lot was also tormented (ebasanizen, "tortured, tormented"; cf. Matt. 8:29) in his righteous soul (lit., "he tormented [his] righteous soul"). Seeing and hearing about all their vile ways day after day grieved Lot to the point of inner torture.

In 2 Peter 2:9 the point of his words in verses 4-9 unfolds. The Lord knows how to rescue the righteous and to punish the unrighteous. That God can deliver the godly . . . from trials is a source of comfort to believers, exemplified by Noah and his seven family members and Lot and his wife and daughters. On the other hand God holds (tērein, "keeps under guard") the unrighteous for the coming day of judgment (cf. 3:7), the great white throne judgment and the lake of fire (Rev. 20:11-15). Meanwhile God continues their punishment in this life (cf. Rom. 1:27b) and in hades after death (Luke 16:23). The participle kolazomenous ("punishing, injuring") is another of Peter's words that occurs only once in the New Testament.

B. Description of false teachers (2:10-16)

False teachers will be judged by God, as certainly as were the angels, the world in Noah's day, and the sinful people of Sodom and Gomorrah. In verses 10-16 (also v. 17) Peter described the true nature of the false teachers plaguing the church in the first century.

1. THEY ARE REBELLIOUS (2:10-12A)

2:10-12a. The apostles and teachers emphasized purity and cleanliness before God. But the false teachers in the church who denied these standards demonstrated their desire to be indulging the flesh (follow the corrupt [miasmou, "pollution, defilement"] desire of the sinful nature), like the people of Sodom and Gomorrah, and did so in a spirit which held authority in contempt (cf. Jude 16, 18). But this was not just any authority; these reckless antinomians despise(d) (kataphronountas, "think down on") "lordship." Kyriotētos, "authority," refers either to angelic powers (Eph. 1:21; Col. 1:16) or perhaps more likely, to the authority of the Lord (kyrios) Himself (cf. 2 Peter 2:1). One would expect people of this mentality—who are bold (tolmētai, "presumptuous") and arrogant (authadeis, "self-willed"; cf. Titus 1:7)—to slander (blasphēmountes) even to the point of deliberately speaking untruth about celestial beings (doxas, possibly fallen angels). It is possible that their blaspheming was the teaching that lustful indulgence is angelic and that God wills man to live under no restraints whatever.

False teachers were doing things even angels would not do, namely, slander such beings. One might expect stronger and more powerful beings (good angels) to criticize less powerful beings (fallen angels), but that is simply not allowed in the presence of the Lord (cf. Jude 8-9). Yet so great was the pride of these slanderers that it knew no bounds in their attack on all who disagreed with their teachings. Even so, they were totally ignorant of the very things they blasphemed (2 Peter 2:12a; cf. Jude 10).

2. THEY ARE ANIMALISTIC (2:12B)

2:12b. The false teachers of the first century were like brute beasts. They operated from instinct, which was locked into their sin nature, rather than from rational choice. Creatures of instinct translates the one Greek word physika, "belonging to nature." They followed their natural desires. Like animals in a jungle, their only value was in being caught and destroyed (cf. Jude 10). This harsh language from Peter is an indication of how serious he considered these heresies to be. Like beasts they too will perish is literally, "in their corruption (phthora) they too shall be corrupted" (phtharēsontai), an interesting play on words (cf. "corrupted" in Eph. 4:22). Corruption here probably means eternal punishment.

3. THEY ARE DECEITFUL (2:13)

2:13. The wordplay in verse 12b sets up Peter's point in verse 13a, namely, that these false teachers will be caught in their own webs. They will be paid back with harm (adikoumenoi ["being damaged," or "suffering injustice"] misthon ["wages"]) for the harm (adikias, "injustice" or "wickedness"; cf. v. 15) they have done. God will give them what they have done to others (cf. Gal. 6:7). Though the false teachers tried to pass themselves off as spiritual leaders possessing a special level of knowledge, they did not even hide their orgies under the cover of darkness but would carouse in broad daylight, while reveling in their pleasures (apatais, perhaps better trans. "deceptions"). And they did all this while obviously joining in the love feasts of the church (NIV marg.; cf. Jude 12). They were blots (spiloi) and blemishes (mōmoi; cf. 2 Peter 3:14). Like a stain on a clean shirt or a scratch on a tiny ring, they marred the Lord's Supper by their very presence. This was one of the injustices they did to others.

4. THEY ARE CHRONIC SINNERS (2:14)

2:14. Invective poured from Peter's pen as he summoned staccato phrases to condemn these heretics. Had there been any doubt up to this point about the salvation of these false teachers, Peter closed the door by indicating they were habitual sinners, their eyes consistently looking toward sinning. With eyes full of adultery is literally, "having eyes full of an adulteress," that is, thinking only of adultery when they see women. They never stop sinning is literally, "unceasing in sin," probably referring to their sinning with their eyes (Matt. 5:28). That such persons should be viewed as believers is diametrically opposed to the Johannine idea that habitual sinning does not mark one who is born of God (1 John 3:9).

Their deceit was aimed at seducing (from deleazō, "bait, entice"; used only here and in 2 Peter 2:18) the unwary or unsteadfast (cf. 3:16), and they had become specialists in greed (cf. 2:3; lit., "having a heart exercised in greed"). Experts ("exercised," KJV) translates gegymnasmenēn, from which comes "gymnasium." They "work out" in covetousness, practicing and sharpening greedy skills. Yet they never have enough. No wonder Peter called them an accursed brood (lit., "children of a curse," a Hebraism denoting certain destruction from the hand of God). Sensuality, deception, greed—all are deserving of God's wrath.

5. THEY ARE MERCENARY (2:15-16)

2:15-16. Here Peter invoked a fourth Old Testament illustration, but this time he moved from Genesis to Numbers (chaps. 22–24). These false prophets were like animals (2 Peter 2:12), and their prototype, Balaam son of Beor, was reproved by an animal (Num. 22:28, 30). In addition to his mercenary mentality (he loved the wages [misthon] of wickedness [adikias]; cf. the same Gr. words in 2 Peter 2:13), Balaam actually urged the Moabites to trick Israelite men into illicit relationships with Moabite women, thereby introducing immorality into the camp (Num. 31:16; cf. Num. 25:1-3; Rev. 2:14). The donkey . . . spoke (phthenxamenon, "was making a sound"; also used in 2 Peter 2:18), stopping the prophet in his madness (paraphronian, lit., "being apart or away from right thinking"; used only here in the NT). A mere donkey, a dumb animal, was smarter than Balaam! The false teachers, like Balaam, had sinned so long and so intensely that their sin had become a form of insanity. Also today many people have so thoroughly given themselves over to avarice and debauchery that their lifestyles are spiritually insane. Money and sex (even in the name of religion) continue to bring spiritual ruin to many people. This is "the error of Balaam" (Jude 11), his way which is diverse from the straight way.

C. Destruction by false teachers (2:17-22)

Though the ultimate judgment of heretics is assured, Peter wrote as he did because of the damage they continued to wreak in the church. Certain types of people seemed to be especially selected for recruitment by false teachers. Having explained the avenues of God's deliverance from ungodly people and offered a vivid description of false teachers, Peter now explained the destruction that such false teaching can bring into the church.

1. THE TARGETS OF DESTRUCTION (2:17-18)

2:17-18. The "accursed brood" (v. 14) is able to make an impact because of the deceptive nature of its approach and the vulnerability of its targets. False teachers are springs without water and mists driven by a storm (cf. Jude 12-13). In both cases one would look for some benefit or blessing (a cool drink from the spring; a refreshing shower from the clouds) but in each case he is disappointed. The very nature of hypocrisy is that one does not have what he pretends to have. Once again (cf. 2 Peter 2:1, 3, 9, 12-13) Peter wrote of their coming judgment. The blackest darkness (lit., "blackness" or "gloominess" [zophos; cf. "gloomy" in v. 4] of darkness) is reserved for them (cf. Jude 13). This blackness is presumably hell. As in the propagation of all heresy, human speech is the weapon that false teachers aim at their targets: they mouth (phthengomenoi, "make a sound"; also used in 2 Peter 2:16) empty (mataiotētos, "futile, worthless, without results"; cf. Eph. 4:17) boastful (hyperonka, "swollen"; still another hapax legomenon by Peter) words. Such high-sounding words by which they sought to impress and deceive people were actually worthless, being no different from the sound a donkey makes! These false teachers sought to lure the unstable by appealing to (deleazousin, "baiting, enticing," also used in 2 Peter 2:14) the lustful (aselgeiais; cf. v. 7) desires of sinful human nature. The teachers themselves were licentious and they tried to encourage Christians to be the same.

Such propaganda and sensual license appeals to some people who are just learning the gospel and weighing its claim on their lives. The enticed people who are . . . escaping from those who live (lit., "are constantly living," pres. part.) in error are not believers, according to most commentators. Some Bible students, however, say the ones enticed by the heretics are already converts to Christ, who by their conversions have recently escaped from their pagan companions who live in falsehood.

2. THE TECHNIQUES OF DESTRUCTION (2:19)

2:19. The techniques of false teachers are only workable with the naive, for the heretics are like a 300-pound man selling diet books—they promise . . . freedom but are themselves hopelessly enslaved by depravity (John 8:34-36). Their empty and boastful promises of liberty are reminiscent of Satan's words to Eve (Gen. 3:5). Slavery is not merely chattel ownership but is the mastery of one's will by any person, idea, or substance (Rom. 6:16; 1 Cor. 6:12b).

3. THE TERMINATION OF DESTRUCTION (2:20-22)

Of whom are these verses speaking? Four views are possible.

(1) Some suggest that the word "they" refers to the false teachers rather than the targets of their attack (e.g., Edwin A. Blum, "2 Peter" in The Expositor's Bible Commentary, 12:282).

(2) But the connection between the end of verse 18 ("people who are just escaping from those who live in error") and the beginning of verse 20 ("if they have escaped the corruption of the world") seems to favor a reference to the unstable, unsaved people who were "listeners" of the gospel (v. 18).

(3) Others think the reference might encompass both the false teachers and their "converts," who can lose their salvation. This, however, runs counter to many passages that assure believers of eternal salvation.

(4) Another view is that new believers are warned against being "caught up into a life of carnality . . . only to find that there is even less pleasure, less fulfillment than before they were saved" (Duane A. Dunham, "An Exegetical Study of 2 Peter 2:18-22," Bibliotheca Sacra 140. January–March, 1983:51).

2:20-21. Whether they in verse 20 refers to the teachers or their victims, both groups had available to them knowledge about Jesus Christ, which could produce liberty and life. But when that knowledge was rejected, their end was deeper corruption (again entangled in it and overcome) and presumably a more severe degree of punishment. Indeed, they would have been better off never to have known the gospel, the way of righteousness, and the sacred (holy) commandment (i.e., the apostolic message) than to have known the truth and have deliberately violated it.

2:22. Jews considered both dogs and pigs among the lowest of creatures (cf. Matt. 7:6) so Peter chose these animals to describe people who knew the truth and turned away from it. The first proverb, A dog returns to its vomit, is taken from Proverbs 26:11. The second proverb, A sow that is washed goes back to her wallowing in the mud, was presumably commonly known by Jews in the first century. The underlying principle of both is the same: these apostates (whether false teachers, their victims, or both) never were what they seemed to be and returned to what they had been all along. Dogs and pigs can be scrubbed but not kept clean, for it is in their very nature to return to unclean living. Such apostates are in a tighter bondage, they are farther from the truth, and they are deeper in spiritual filth than ever before.

Believers today do well to heed Peter's warning against false teachers, to learn how to discern truth for themselves, and to teach it to others. The false teachers will themselves meet destruction and others will be destroyed by them. But Christians can wage spiritual warfare more effectively if they know their spiritual enemies, the techniques that heretics use, and the end result of their deception.

V. The Christian Hope: The Lord's Return (3:1-16)

Few people like to wait, but that is precisely what God calls believers to do as they anticipate the Lord's return. Three times the word prosdokaō, "look(ing) forward," appears in this chapter (vv. 12-14). This is the same Greek word translated "expect" in Luke 12:46. Waiting is to be coupled with watching.

First-century Christians were close to the words of the Old Testament prophets about Christ's second coming, to which were added the promises of the Lord Himself and the constant reminders of apostles such as Peter in letters like this. Second Peter 3:1-16 presents five facts about or perspectives on the Lord's return.

A. Believers remember it (3:1-2)

3:1. Addressing his readers as Dear friends (agapētoi, "beloved, loved ones"; the first of four occurrences in this chapter: vv. 1, 8, 14, 17; cf. Jude 17-18), Peter called this his second letter to this group, and said both letters are remind- ers. Many scholars assume that the earlier letter is 1 Peter. But some suggest that calling 1 Peter a "reminder" does not suit its contents. Of greater importance, however, is Peter's purpose: to stimulate you to wholesome thinking. "As reminders to stimulate you" translates the same Greek words which are rendered "to refresh your memory" in 2 Peter 1:13. The phrase eilikrinē dianoian ("wholesome thinking") may also be rendered "sincere mind" or "pure disposition." (Eilikrinēs occurs elsewhere in the NT only in Phil. 1:10, where it is trans. "pure.") The English "sincere" is from the Latin words sine cera, "without wax." Some pottery salesmen would use wax to cover cracks and weak places in pottery. Such a cover-up could be detected only by holding the jug up to the sun to see if any weaknesses were visible. Such a vase was "sun-judged" (the lit. meaning of the Gr. eilikrinēs). God wants His people to have sun-judged minds, not those in which their sin spots have been covered over.

3:2. Peter again reminded his readers of the need to remember (cf. 1:12-15). Others, like Peter, referred to the holy prophets (cf. Luke 1:70; Acts 3:21; Eph. 3:5), whose words were oracles regarding the day of the Lord and related topics. The command of our Lord and Savior refers to His teachings, which were then proclaimed by the apostles (cf. Jude 17). Peter's linking the prophets and apostles placed them on the same level of authority (cf. Eph. 2:20). This also suits Peter's earlier purpose of distinguishing the true servants of the Lord from the false. Believers do well to recall the writings of both Testaments regarding the Lord's return.

B. Scoffers laugh at it (3:3-7)

3:3. Peter understood that he and his readers were living in the last days, the period of time between the Lord's First and Second Advents. First of all means "above all" (as in 1:20), foremost in importance. Scoffers are the false teachers who deny Jesus Christ (2:1) and His return (3:4). Jesus had said these heretics would come (Matt. 24:3-5, 11, 23-26), and Paul had written the same (1 Tim. 4:1-3; 2 Tim. 3:1-9). Peter echoed the warning, adding that their scoffing is accompanied by their . . . evil desires (epithymias, also used in 2 Peter 1:4; 2:10, 18; Jude 16, 18). Arrogant snobbery and disdain for the idea of a coming judgment led to sexual perversion.

3:4. Their mocking took the form of a stinging question: Where is this "coming" He promised? Rejecting this promise, so often repeated in the New Testament (John 14:1-3; Acts 1:11; 1 Cor. 15:23; 2 Cor. 1:14; Phil. 1:6; 1 Thes. 3:13; 4:14-18; 2 Thes. 1:10; 2:1; 1 Tim. 6:14; 2 Tim. 4:8; Titus 2:13; Heb. 9:28; James 5:7) rests on the principle of uniformitarianism. This is the view that the cosmic processes of the present and the future can be understood solely on the basis of how the cosmos has operated in the past. There is almost an incipient deism here which rules out divine intervention in the universal order. In a universe governed by natural laws miracles, mockers argue, simply cannot happen. Therefore they say Jesus Christ could not come again.

The scoffers wanted to push their argument as far back as possible. So they referred to our fathers (lit., "the fathers"), that is, Old Testament patriarchs (John 7:22; Acts 3:13; 13:32; Rom. 9:5; 11:28; Heb. 1:1), and to the beginning of Creation. Since nothing has happened in all this time, mockers reasoned, why expect the Lord's return now?

3:5-6. Peter met those arguments head on by reviewing some ancient history. Just as water by God's command played a significant role in the early formation of the earth, so water also was the agent for destruction of the earth at God's command. The heavens existed refers to the expanse or sky created on the second day of Creation (Gen. 1:6-8); and the earth was formed out of water and with water refers to the land appearing from the water on the third day of Creation (Gen. 1:9-10).

God the Creator is also God the Judge. In His sovereign will, any change in process can occur at any time for He designed and controls these "natural" processes. The scoffers deliberately (thelontas, "willingly") forget God's Creation and the Flood, an interesting contrast with Peter's constant reminders to his readers to "remember" (2 Peter 1:12-13, 15; 3:1-2, 8). The scoffers deliberately put aside God's Word and then complained that God was not doing anything. Interestingly Peter was both a creationist and a believer in the universal Flood (cf. his other references to the Flood: 1 Peter 3:20; 2 Peter 2:5).

At the beginning of 3:6 the words "by water" are literally, "through which." This may refer back to "God's Word" (at the end of v. 5 in Gr.), or it may refer to both water and the Word. But God's use of water in both Creation and destruction seems to lend credence to the NIV rendering. The world (kosmos) refers to inhabitants, since the earth itself was not destroyed in the Flood. Similarly in John 3:16 "the world" (kosmos) means the globe's inhabitants (cf. John 1:9; 3:17, 19; 4:42; 6:33; 7:7; 15:18-19; 17:14, 21, 23, 25; 1 John 2:2; 3:13; 4:14).

3:7. Verses 7, 10, and 12 are the only places where the New Testament depicts the future destruction of the world by fire. In the past the world was destroyed in the Flood by God's Word and by water; in the future it will be destroyed by the same Word and by fire. Having decided to judge the world (cf. 2:3-4, 9, 17), God is simply holding the earth on layaway. It is reserved (tethēsaurismenoi, "being stored up like a treasure") for fire and kept (tēroumenoi, "guarded" or "held") for judgment. Isaiah (66:15-16) and Malachi (4:1) associated fire with the return of the Lord. References to it are also found in the Qumran literature (Dead Sea Scrolls) as well as other sources shortly before and after Christ's birth. "The day of the Lord" (2 Peter 3:10) includes the Tribulation, the Millennium, the great white throne judgment, and the destruction of the present heavens and earth. At the great white throne after the Millennium, ungodly men (i.e., the wicked dead) will be judged and then thrown into the lake of fire (Rev. 20:11-15). This, as Peter wrote, will be their day of judgment (cf. 2 Peter 2:9) and destruction. After they are cast into fire, the heavens and the earth will be destroyed by fire. God intervened castastrophically before (in the Flood), and He will do so again.

C. God guarantees it (3:8-9)

3:8-9. Why should the Lord be so long in coming? Peter offered two answers. First, God counts time differently than does man. Once again Peter appealed to their memories (do not forget this one thing). The scoffers forget (v. 5), but believers should not. Christians should recall Psalm 90:4, which Peter quoted. People see time against time; but God sees time against eternity. In fact time only seems long because of man's finite perspective. With the Lord a day is like a thousand years, and a thousand years are like a day.

Some suggest that this statement argues against premillennialism. They point out that the concept of 1,000 years is not to be taken literally since it is merely a comparative time reference. However, the literal 1,000-year reign of Christ on earth is strongly affirmed in Revelation 20:1-6 (see comments there). Peter was simply using a simile. What to people, including scoffers, may seem like a long time is to the Lord very short. The present Church Age has lasted, in God's eyes, not quite two days!

The second reason the Lord's return seems to be so long in coming is that God wants as many people to be saved as possible (2 Peter 3:9). The Lord is not slow in keeping His promise. The words "is . . . slow" translate bradynei ("hesitate, linger, delay"), used only here in the New Testament. Again Peter gave a divine-human comparison (cf. v. 8). God's so-called "tardiness" as viewed by some people (as some understand slowness) is only a delay with respect to their time schedules, not His. In fact God's time schedule is modified by patience, a major attribute of the heavenly Father (cf. v. 15; Rom. 2:4; 9:22).

The words not wanting (mē boulomenos) anyone to perish do not express a decree, as if God has willed everyone to be saved. Universal salvation is not taught in the Bible. Instead those words describe God's wishes or desires; He longs that all would be saved (cf. 1 Tim. 2:4) but knows that many reject Him.

D. Peter describes it (3:10-13)

3:10. When the Lord does come, it will be both surprising and catastrophic: like a thief. This simile was used by Jesus (Matt. 24:42-44) and repeated by others (1 Thes. 5:2; Rev. 3:3; 16:15). The day of the Lord describes end-time events that begin after the Rapture and culminate with the commencement of eternity. In the middle of the 70th week of Daniel the Antichrist will turn against the people of God in full fury (Dan. 9:24-27; see comments on 1 Thes. 5:2; 2 Thes. 2:2-12).

In the catastrophic conflagration at the end of the Millennium, the heavens (the earth's atmosphere and the starry sky, not God's abode) will disappear with a roar, which in some way will involve fire (2 Peter 3:7, 12). The elements (stoicheia, either stars or material elements with which the universe is made) will be destroyed by fire (and will melt, v. 12), and the earth and everything in it will be laid bare (eurethēsetai). This Greek word could mean that everything will be exposed for what it really is. Or it could suggest a question: "The earth and everything in it—will they be found?" Others (on the basis of some Gr. mss.; NIV marg.) say the word eurethēsetai should be substituted with katakaēsetai, "shall be burned up." Perhaps the first of these views is preferable (as rendered in the NIV).

3:11. Peter sees all this as a strong motivational expectation which should provoke holy living. The question, What kind of people ought you to be? is rhetorical. But in case someone should miss the point, Peter answered it: You ought to live holy and godly lives. "Holy lives" (en hagiais anastrophais, lit., "in holy conduct") refers to Christian separation and sanctification—apart from the world, apart toward God. "Godly" (eusebeiais; also in 1:3, 6-7) refers to piety before God. The word "live" (hyparchein) is in the present tense, indicating that these qualities are to be constantly present in light of the Lord's return. Scoffers, questioning the Lord's coming with its ensuing judgment on them, lead ungodly lives (2:7, 10, 12-15, 18-20; 3:3). By contrast, Jesus' followers, anticipating His return, are to be godly (v. 14; cf. Titus 2:12-14; 1 John 3:3).

3:12. Holiness and piety (v. 11) not only cause God's people to look forward to (from prosdokaō, "expect and anticipate"; cf. vv. 13-14) the Lord's return but also to speed its coming. How do believers hasten it? The godly lives of the Lord's people, their praying, and their witnessing help bring others to repentance. Peter then repeated for emphasis the fact that at the commencement of eternity (here called the day of God) the heavens will be destroyed by fire and the elements will melt (cf. comments on v. 10). That event concludes "the day of the Lord" (v. 10) and commences "the day of God."

3:13. The old cosmic system will then give way to a new heaven and a new earth and this is what believers are looking forward to (cf. vv. 12, 14), not to the earth's destruction. The new heaven and new earth, given by the promise of God, will finally be the home or dwelling place of righteousness (lit., "in which righteousness dwells permanently"). It will be the home of righteousness because the Righteous One will be there (Jer. 23:5-7; 33:16; Dan. 9:24; Rev. 21:1, 8, 27). What a contrast this will be to the world's unrighteousness!

E. Behavior is changed by it (3:14-16)

3:14. To show that one's behavior is linked to his expectation of the Lord's coming, this paragraph begins with So then (Dio). What kind of people should believers be? They are to be holy and godly (v. 11), and they also are to make every effort (spoudasate; cf. 1:10, 15; also cf. spoudēn, 1:5) to be . . . spotless (aspiloi, also used in 1 Tim. 6:14; James 1:27 ["pure"]; 1 Peter 1:19 ["without . . . defect," referring to Christ]), blameless (amōmētoi, "without [moral] defect" like a sacrificial animal without a blemish; used also in Eph. 1:4; 5:27; Phil. 2:15; Col. 1:22; Heb. 9:14; 1 Peter 1:19; Jude 24; Rev. 14:5), and at peace with Him (cf. Rom. 5:1). The false teachers, Peter said, "are blots (spiloi) and blemishes" (mōmoi; 2 Peter 2:13), but believers are to make it their business to be morally clean (cf. 1:4) like Christ the spotless One (1 Peter 1:19). This is the practical result of the implantation of the divine nature (2 Peter 1:4) in the members of God's family; it is the ringing encore to the symphony of grace described in 1:5-7.

3:15. The Lord's patience is because of His desire that people come to salvation (cf. v. 9). The seeming procrastination of the Second Coming, far from being negative inaction on God the Father's part is rather a demonstration of His makrothymian ("long-suffering"). Now the world has time to repent, but this will not be so when "the day of judgment" (2:9; 3:7) comes. The Lord's patience leads toward repentance, which is precisely the point Paul made in Romans 2:4, though this may or may not be the passage Peter had in mind (cf. comments on 2 Peter 3:16). Interestingly Peter called Paul our dear (agapētos, "beloved"; cf. vv. 1, 8, 14, 17) brother. Years before Paul had severely rebuked Peter (Gal. 2:11-14), but this did not sever their love and respect for each other.

3:16. Peter said that Paul wrote about the same thing in all his letters. Though written with God's "wisdom" (v. 15), Paul's letters contain some things that are hard to understand. The Greek word for "hard to understand" (dysnoēta, only here in the NT) was sometimes applied in secular Greek literature to oracles that were ambiguous and obscure. Peter himself, as well as the ignorant (amatheis, "unlearned"), who were neophytes in New Testament doctrine, found some of Paul's statements obscure. These difficult passages (which Peter did not specify) had caused the unstable (astēriktoi; cf. 2:14) to pervert and distort (streplousin, "twist, torment"; another word occurring only here in the NT) their real meaning. But that was to be expected since that is how they handled the other Scriptures.

The fact that Peter referred to Paul's letters and then to "the other Scriptures" indicates that Paul's writings were then considered authoritative Scripture. Such behavior—twisting the Scripture to suit their own purposes—is met with God's judgment which, in this case, the ignorant and unstable bring on themselves in the form of destruction (apōleian; cf. 2:1, 3). Believers may not fully understand all the Scriptures, but they certainly ought not twist their obvious meanings.

VI. Conclusion (3:17-18)

3:17. In a warm and loving style (dear friends occurs here for the fourth time in this chap.; cf. vv. 1, 8, 14) the Apostle Peter closes this public yet personal epistle with a word of warning (v. 17) and a word of encouragement (v. 18). Both are based on an assumption: You already know this. These words translate one Greek word (proginōskontes), from which comes the English word "prognosis." When a medical prognosis is made, a patient is better able to prepare himself for what is ahead and if possible, to correct himself. When a doctor says, "If you continue to eat as much as you do now, you will have serious heart problems in a few years," the patient "knows beforehand" and can therefore change his life in accord with the information he has.

Peter then warned, Be on your guard (phylassesthe). If Peter were writing today, he might say, "Don't say I didn't warn you." If his readers were not careful they could be carried away by the error of lawless men (athesmōn; cf. 2:7). The verb "carried away" (synapachthentes; trans. "led astray" in Gal. 2:13) emphasizes a group or corporate movement. False teachers are not satisfied with ambushing one or two, now and then, here and there; they want to sweep large groups of people away from the correct doctrine of Christ. Those who keep company with such people are in danger of being led astray (referred to as "falling"; cf. 2 Peter 1:10; Gal. 5:4). This does not refer to losing one's salvation. On the other hand those who have paid attention to the warnings, carefully heeding the prognosis, can maintain their secure position in the truth. "Secure position" translates stērigmou ("firm position"; cf. the adjective astēriktos, "unstable," in 2 Peter 2:14; 3:16, and the verb stērizei, "make strong or firm" in 1 Peter 5:10).

3:18. To grow in . . . grace is not subjective, based merely on experience and emotional happenings. It is objectively related to Peter's key word knowledge (cf. 1:2-3, 5-6, 8, 20 ["understand"]; 2:20-21 [twice in v. 21]; 3:3). This is not just any knowledge; it is knowledge about our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ (cf. 1:1-2, 11; 2:20). The verb "grow" is a present imperative, which could be rendered "be continually growing." Believers are to grow "in grace," that is, in the sphere of God's unmerited favor, and in the exercise of spiritual graces which Peter spoke of in 1:5-7. This process of spiritual growth begins by knowing Christ initially in regeneration (cf. John 17:3) and it continues in one's deepening relationship with Him (Eph. 4:15; Phil. 3:10; 1 Peter 2:2). Both are necessary. Without the initial knowledge there is no opportunity for growth. But if there is only that initial knowledge, the struggling new believer forgets "that he has been cleansed from his past sins" (2 Peter 1:9).

Now the apostle, at one time more comfortable in fishing boats than with the parchments of biblical texts, affirmed the oneness of the Father and the Son in a splendid doxology. The One who is "our Lord" is also "our Savior." And glory, which belongs only to God (Isa. 42:8), is also the Son's (cf. 2 Peter 1:17). To Him be glory (lit., "the glory") is Peter's praise and prayer (cf. 2 Tim. 4:18). The glory of redemption, the glory of spiritual growth, the glory of manifesting the symphony of grace, the glory of escape from the false teachers, and the glory of His ultimate return—all glory belongs to Jesus. And He receives that glory both now and forever. "Forever" is literally, "to the day of the Age"—from the moment of the Cross, on through the days of the New Testament, throughout the history of the church, to the present hour, and throughout eternity! No wonder Peter concluded with the affirmative word of praise, Amen!

INTRODUCTION

The First Epistle of John is an intensely practical letter addressed to Christian readers. It warns against the dangers of false teaching and exhorts believers to lives of obedience to God and love for their brothers and sisters. Its controlling theme is fellowship with God the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ (1:3).

Authorship. The epistle has been traditionally ascribed to John the Apostle. The author's name, however, does not occur in the letter. Yet it is plain from the tone of the letter as a whole that the writer possessed spiritual authority. Moreover, he placed himself among the eyewitnesses to the incarnate life of the Lord Jesus (1:1-2). Early Christian writers including Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian cited the epistle as John's. There is thus no good reason for denying the traditional belief that the letter is of apostolic authorship.

Background. The letter contains no hint about the identity or location of the readers beyond the fact that they are Christians. Since early church tradition associates John with the Roman province of Asia (in western Turkey), it has often been thought that the readers lived there. This may well be true especially since this association is confirmed by Revelation 2 and 3.

The readers had been confronted with false teachers, whom John called antichrists (1 John 2:18-26). The exact character of these false teachers has been much discussed. Many have thought they were Gnostics who held to a strict dualism in which spiritual and material things were sharply distinguished. Others have seen the letter as directed against Docetism, the belief that Jesus' humanity was not real and that He only appeared to have a physical body. Often too, the letter is thought to refute the heresy of Cerinthus. According to church tradition, Cerinthus lived in Roman Asia and was strongly opposed by the Apostle John. Cerinthus taught that Jesus was only a man and that the divine Christ descended on Jesus at His baptism and left Him before the Crucifixion.

It is not possible to be precise about the exact character of the false teaching which John opposed in his letter. The only certain data is what is found in the epistle itself. It is clear that the antichrists denied that Jesus is the Christ (2:22). The statements in 5:6 may well be intelligible against the backdrop of a teaching like that of Cerinthus. The strong claims made in 1:1-2 about the physical reality of the Incarnation would be appropriate if Docetism were in view. The emphasis on "knowing" God fits the view that the heretics made special claims to "knowledge" as the Gnostics did. But Gnosticism is chiefly known from sources much later than 1 John and many characteristics of later Gnostic thought do not find reflection in the epistle.

It is probably a mistake to attempt to systematize the thought of the heretics whom John opposed in this letter. According to his own statements, he had "many" false teachers in view (2:18; 4:1). There is no reason to think that all of them held exactly the same views. The ancient Greco-Roman world was a babel of religious voices, and it is likely that the readers were confronted by a variety of ideas. Still, the heretics had in common their denials of the person of Christ, though they could have done so in different ways. On the basis of 2:19 it may be suggested that they had originated chiefly in Judea (see comments on 2:19). But beyond this little can be said with certainty about the exact nature of the heresy or heresies that gave rise to John's epistle.

That the initial readers were indeed Christians is clear from 2:12-14, 21; and 5:13. The reference to "the anointing" which they possessed (2:20, 27) that is, the Holy Spirit, might also suggest that the addressees were principally the leaders of the church or churches to which John wrote. In the Old Testament the leaders of Israel—prophets, priests, and kings—were often anointed to their offices. While it is conceivable that 1 John 2:20 and 27 refer to an "anointing" which is true of all Christians, this kind of idea is rare in the New Testament. Even 2 Corinthians 1:21 may refer to Paul's apostolic office. Possibly therefore, in 1 John 2:20 and 27 the writer sought to affirm the competency of the church leaders in the area of spiritual understanding and thus to shore up their authority as over against the false teachers. The leaders did not need to be taught by any human teachers since they were taught by their "anointing," that is, by the Holy Spirit.

It is impossible to be dogmatic on this point. No doubt John knew the addressees when he wrote the epistle. Even if the leaders were primarily in view, the letter would naturally have been read to the entire congregation(s) since only in this way could it perform its purpose of supporting the established teachers' authority. The larger audience could then receive the instruction which the letter contained while at the same time being encouraged to rely on the guidance offered by their Spirit-taught leadership. In the early church one of the chief responsibilities of the elders was to protect the flock from spiritual "wolves" (Acts 20:28-29; Titus 1:9-11). If the false teachers made grandiose claims to spiritual wisdom and authority, it would make good sense for the inspired author to affirm his confidence in the regular church leaders. This would strengthen their hands with their congregation(s) in resisting the inroads of heretical ideas.

It might be thought, however, that the references to "children," "fathers," and "young men" (1 John 2:12-14) point to an audience of people of varying levels of spiritual attainment. If so, the leadership alone can hardly be considered as the principal addressees. On the other hand all the readers were addressed by this writer as "children" (e.g., 2:1, 18) and the terms used in 2:12-14 may simply be ways of addressing the same people viewed from different standpoints. (For further discussion, see the comments on those verses.)

In any case the letter was no doubt intended ultimately for the warning and instruction of the whole church or churches to which it was sent. And its truths are richly applicable to every Christian's experience.

Date. Virtually nothing in the epistle indicates a specific date or period for its writing. Many conservatives suggest a date late in the first century A.D., about the time of or shortly after the writing of the Fourth Gospel. But a good case can be made for dating the Gospel of John sometime prior to A.D. 70. If this is done, there is no particular reason why 1 John may not be assigned to the same period of time. If 2:19 suggests that the false teachers had seceded from the Palestinian churches which the apostles supervised, then this perhaps can be taken to indicate a time before the calamities of the Jewish revolt against the Romans in A.D. 66–70. After this period the influences (both good and bad) of Palestinian Christianity on the Gentile churches must have greatly decreased. If the reference of 2:19 is indeed to Palestine, then John may well have been writing from Jerusalem when he stated, "They went out from us."

These deductions are far from firm, but they might be taken to point to a date for the epistle somewhere between A.D. 60 and 65. But it must be admitted that an even earlier date cannot be excluded. Whatever the actual date of writing, the epistle gives truths of timeless value to the Christian church.

OUTLINE

The First Epistle of John is notoriously difficult to outline. Many different approaches have been offered. The justification for the following outline must be sought in the exposition which the commentary contains.

I. Prologue (1:1–4)
II. Introduction: Basic Principles (1:5–2:11)
  A. Basic principles of fellowship (1:5–2:2)

B. Basic principles of knowing God (2:3-11)
III. The Purpose of the Epistle (2:12-27)
A. In light of the readers' spiritual conditions (2:12-14)
B. In light of the world's allurements (2:15-17)
C. In light of the deceptions of the last hour (2:18-23)
D. In light of the readers' responsibilities to abide (2:24-27)
IV. The Body of the Epistle (2:28–4:19)
A. The theme stated (2:28)
B. Discerning the children of God (2:29–3:10a)
C. Discerning love for the brethren (3:10b-23)
1. What love is not (3:10b-15)
2. What love is (3:16-18)
3. What love does for believers (3:19-23)
D. Discerning the indwelling God (3:24–4:16)
1. Discerning the Spirit of truth (3:24–4:6)
2. Discerning the God of love (4:7-16)
E. The theme realized (4:17-19)
V. Conclusion (4:20–5:17)
A. Love clarified (4:20–5:3a)
B. Love empowered (5:3b-15)
C. Love practiced (5:16-17)
VI. Epilogue (5:18-21)

COMMENTARY

I. Prologue (1:1-4)

The first four verses of the epistle constitute its prologue. Here the writer affirmed the tangible reality of the Incarnation of Christ and announced that the goals of his letter were fellowship and joy.

1:1. The apostle declared his subject to be that which was from the beginning. Many have thought that he referred here to an absolute beginning, such as described in Genesis 1:1 and John 1:1. This is possible, but in view of the epistle's concern with the original message about Jesus Christ, it seems more likely that John referred to the beginning of the gospel proclamation. If so, the usage is similar to that found in 1 John 2:7, 24; and 3:11. The writer was then asserting that what he proclaimed was the truth about God's Son that was originally witnessed by the apostles who had direct contact with Him. Numbering himself among these apostolic eyewitnesses, the author described this proclamation as one which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked at and our hands have touched.

With these introductory words, the apostle directed his first shafts at the heresy with which he was concerned. The antichrists brought new ideas, not those which were "from the beginning" of the gospel era. Moreover, their denial of the reality of the incarnate life of Christ could be countered by the experiences of the eyewitnesses whose testimony was founded on actual hearing, seeing, and touching (cf. "look" and "touch" in Luke 24:39). John's message is solidly based on a historical reality.

The exact meaning of the expression concerning the Word of life has been variously explained. By capitalizing the term "Word," the NIV interprets this as a title for the Lord like that found in John 1:1, 14. But there this title has no qualifying phrase such as the expression "of life," which is used here. It seems more natural to understand the phrase in the sense of "the message about life" for which Philippians 2:16 furnishes a parallel (see also Acts 5:20). Indeed, as 1 John 1:2 shows, "life," not "word," is personified. Thus John was saying that his subject matter in this epistle deals with the original and well-attested verities that concern "the message about Life"—that is, about God's Son, who is Life (cf. 5:20).

1:2. The Life which the apostles proclaimed is intensely personal. Not only has that Life appeared, but it is nothing less than the eternal life, which was with the Father and has appeared to people. The Incarnation is unquestionably in view.

1:3. The objective John had in mind in writing about these significant realities was that you, the readers, may have fellowship with us, the apostles. Since he later, in 2:12-14, made it perfectly clear that he regarded the readers as genuine Christians, his goal was obviously not their conversions. It is an interpretive mistake of considerable moment to treat the term "fellowship" as though it meant little more than "to be a Christian." The readers were already saved, but they needed this letter if they were to enjoy real fellowship with the apostolic circle to which the author belonged. In the final analysis that apostolic fellowship is with the Father and with His Son, Jesus Christ.

Probably the false teachers denied that the readers possessed eternal life (see comments on 2:25; 5:13). If so, and if the readers would begin to doubt God's guarantees on that point, their fellowship with the Father and the Son would be in jeopardy. This, of course, is not the same as saying that their salvation would be in jeopardy. As believers they could never lose the gift of life which God had given them (cf. John 4:14; 6:32, 37-40), but their fellowship depended on walking in the light (1 John 1:7). The danger to the readers was that they might be allured into darkness by the siren song of the antichrists. How seductive their godless appeal was emerges in this letter. John's aim, therefore, was to furnish his readership with a necessary reaffirmation of the basic truths of their faith so that their fellowship with God would be sustained.

1:4. John rounded off the prologue with a delicate personal touch. If this letter would succeed in fulfilling its aim for the readership, the writer himself (and his fellow apostles) would reap spiritual joy. We write this to make our joy complete. This statement is similar to one the same author made in 3 John 4: "I have no greater joy than to hear that my children are walking in the truth." The apostles so shared the heart of Christ for His people that their own joy was bound up in the spiritual well-being of those to whom they ministered. If the readers retained their true fellowship with God and with His apostles, no one would be any happier than John himself.

II. Introduction: Basic Principles (1:5–2:11)

Since fellowship is the objective of John's letter, it was natural for him to begin with a discussion of this subject. So in 1:5–2:11 he enunciated some fundamental principles which lie at the root of all genuine fellowship with God. These principles are of immense practical value to the everyday lives of all Christians. By these principles believers may test the reality of their personal communion with God. They may also discern whether they have come to know the God with whom they commune.

A. Basic principles of fellowship (1:5–2:2)

1:5. In the prologue the author asserted that he was writing about things he had heard, seen, and touched. Here he began with something he had heard. This is the message we have heard from Him and declare to you. By the words "from Him," John no doubt meant from the Lord Jesus Christ whose Incarnation he had just referred to (vv. 1-2). The content of this "message," as John expressed it, is that God is Light; in Him there is no darkness at all. This precise statement is not found in the recorded words of Jesus, but the author was an apostle who heard much more than was "written down" (cf. John 21:25). There is no reason to think that John did not mean just what he said. This is a truth he had learned from the Lord.

In describing God as Light, which John frequently did (John 1:4-5, 7-9; 3:19-21; 8:12; 9:5; 12:35-36, 46; Rev. 21:23), he was no doubt thinking of God as the Revealer of His holiness. Both aspects of the divine nature figure in the discussion of sin and fellowship in 1 John 1:6-10. As Light, God both exposes man's sin and condemns it. If anyone walks in darkness, he is hiding from the truth which the Light reveals (cf. John 3:19-20). Thus revelatory terms such as "the truth" and "His Word" are prominent in 1 John 1:6, 8, 10.

It is important that the "message" John had heard is the one he directed to his readers ("we . . . declare to you"). Some scholars have maintained that the false assertions which are condemned in verses 6, 8, and 10 are those of the false teachers, or antichrists, about whom John wrote later. But there is no proof of this. The writer continued to use the word "we" throughout as though both he and his readership were in view. When carefully considered, the kind of claims which John refuted are precisely the kind which may be made by Christians who lose touch with spiritual realities and with God. The effort to find in verses 6-10 the doctrinal beliefs of heretical teachers lacks adequate exegetical foundation.

1:6. Since "God is Light," it follows that a Christian cannot truly claim communion with Him while living in the darkness. As John warned, If we claim to have fellowship with Him yet walk in the darkness, we lie and do not live by the truth. John knew, as does every perceptive pastor, that Christians sometimes feign spirituality while engaging in acts of disobedience. The Apostle Paul had to deal with a case of incest in the Corinthian assembly (1 Cor. 5:1-5) and laid down a list of sins for which church members should come under church discipline (1 Cor. 5:9-13). Spurious claims to fellowship with God have been a tragic reality throughout the history of the church.

A Christian who says he is in fellowship with God (who "is Light") but who is disobeying Him (walking "in the darkness") is lying (cf. 1 John 2:4). Ten times John used "darkness" to refer to sin (John 1:5; 3:19; 12:35 [twice]; 1 John 1:5-6; 2:8-9, 11 [twice]).

1:7. There can be only one sphere of real communion with God—the light itself. Thus John insisted that this is where a Christian will find that communion: But if we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship with one another. It is strange that many commentators have understood the expression "with one another" as a reference to fellowship with other Christians. But this is not what the author is discussing here. The Greek pronoun for "one another" (allēlōn) may refer to the two parties (God and the Christian) named in the first part of the statement. John's point is that if Christians live in the light where God is, then there is mutual fellowship between Himself and them. That is, they have fellowship with Him and He has fellowship with them. The light itself is the fundamental reality which they share. Thus true communion with God is living in the sphere where one's experience is illumined by the truth of what God is. It is to live open to His revelation of Himself in Jesus Christ. As John soon stated (v. 9), this entails believers' acknowledging whatever the light reveals is wrong in their lives.

It is significant that John talked of walking in the light, rather than according to the light. To walk according to the light would require sinless perfection and would make fellowship with God impossible for sinful humans. To walk in it, however, suggests instead openness and responsiveness to the light. John did not think of Christians as sinless, even though they are walking in the light, as is made clear in the last part of this verse. For John added that the blood of Jesus, His Son, purifies us from every sin. This statement is grammatically coordinate with the preceding one, "We have fellowship with one another." The statement of verse 7, in its entirety, affirms that two things are true of believers who walk in the light: (a) they are in fellowship with God and (b) they are being cleansed from every sin. So long as there is true openness to the light of divine truth, Christians' failures are under the cleansing power of the shed blood of Christ. Indeed, only in virtue of the Savior's work on the cross can there be any fellowship between imperfect creatures and the infinitely perfect God.

1:8. But when a believer is experiencing true fellowship with God he may then be tempted to think or say that he is, at that moment at least, free from sin. John warned against this self-deluding conception. If we claim to be without sin, we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us (cf. v. 6; 2:4). If Christians understand the truth that God's Word teaches about the depravity of the human heart, they know that just because they are not conscious of failure does not mean that they are free from it. If the truth is "in" them as a controlling, motivating influence, this kind of self-deception will not take place. Whether someone claims to be "without sin" for a brief period of time or claims it as a permanent attainment, the claim is false.

1:9. In view of verse 8, Christians ought to be ready at all times to acknowledge any failure which God's light may expose to them. Thus John wrote, If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just and will forgive us our sins and purify us from all unrighteousness. Though the NIV's translation "our sins" (after the words "forgive us") is quite admissible, "our" is not in the Greek text. The phrase (tas hamartias) contains only an article and noun and it is conceivable that the article is the type which grammarians call "the article of previous reference." If so, there is a subtle contrast between this expression and the "all unrighteousness" which follows it. John's thought might be paraphrased: "If we confess our sins, He . . . will forgive the sins we confess and moreover will even cleanse us from all unrighteousness." Naturally only God knows at any moment the full extent of a person's unrighteousness. Each Christian, however, is responsible to acknowledge (the meaning of "confess," homologōmen; cf. 2:23; 4:3) whatever the light makes him aware of, and when he does so, a complete and perfect cleansing is granted him. There is thus no need to agonize over sins of which one is unaware.

Moreover, it is comforting to learn that the forgiveness which is promised here is both absolutely assured (because God "is faithful") and also is in no way contrary to His holiness (He is "just"). The word used here for "just" (dikaios) is the same one which is applied as a title to Christ in 2:1 where it is translated "the Righteous One." Dikaios is also used of God (either the Father or the Son) in 2:29 and 3:7. Obviously God is "just" or "righteous" when He forgives the believer's sin because of the "atoning sacrifice" which the Lord Jesus has made (see 2:2). As is already evident from 1:7, a Christian's fellowship with God is inseparably connected with the effectiveness of the blood which Jesus shed for him.

In modern times some have occasionally denied that a Christian needs to confess his sins and ask forgiveness. It is claimed that a believer already has forgiveness in Christ (Eph. 1:7). But this point of view confuses the perfect position which a Christian has in God's Son (by which he is even "seated . . . with Him in the heavenly realms" [Eph. 2:6]) with his needs as a failing individual on earth. What is considered in 1 John 1:9 may be described as "familial" forgiveness. It is perfectly understandable how a son may need to ask his father to forgive him for his faults while at the same time his position within the family is not in jeopardy. A Christian who never asks his heavenly Father for forgiveness for his sins can hardly have much sensitivity to the ways in which he grieves his Father. Furthermore, the Lord Jesus Himself taught His followers to seek forgiveness of their sins in a prayer that was obviously intended for daily use (cf. the expression "give us today our daily bread" preceding "forgive us our debts," Matt. 6:11-12). The teaching that a Christian should not ask God for daily forgiveness is an aberration. Moreover, confession of sin is never connected by John with the acquisition of eternal life, which is always conditioned on faith. First John 1:9 is not spoken to the unsaved, and the effort to turn it into a soteriological affirmation is misguided.

It may also be said that so long as the idea of walking in the light or darkness is correctly understood on an experiential level, these concepts offer no difficulty. "Darkness" has an ethical meaning (Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, s.v. "skotos," 7:444). When a believer loses personal touch with the God of light, he begins to live in darkness. But confession of sin is the way back into the light.

1:10. However, after a believer sins, he should not deny that sin. If we claim we have not sinned, we make Him out to be a liar and His Word has no place in our lives. This statement should be read in direct connection with verse 9. When a Christian is confronted by God's Word about his sins, he should admit them rather than deny them. To deny one's personal sin in the face of God's testimony to the contrary, is to "make" God "out to be a liar." By contradicting His Word, a person rejects it and refuses to give it the proper "place" in his life.

2:1. Some of John's readers might have thought his insistence on the sinfulness of Christians somehow would discourage holiness. The opposite was John's intention as he affirmed: My dear children, I write this to you so that you will not sin. He addressed them affectionately as an apostle with a fatherly concern (The Gr. word for "children" ["dear" is not in the Gr.] is teknia [lit., "little born ones"], used seven times by John in this epistle [vv. 1, 12, 28; 3:7, 18; 4:4; 5:21] and once in his Gospel [John 13:33]. A similar word tekna ["born ones"] occurs in John 1:12; 11:52; 1 John 3:2, 10 [twice]; 5:2; 2 John 1, 4, 13; and 3 John 4. On the other hand paidia ["children"] occurs only twice in 1 John [2:13, 18].)

The statements in 1:8, 10 about believers' sinful tendencies do not encourage sin; they actually put perceptive Christians on guard against it. If a believer tries to make the claims denounced in 1:8 and 10, then he is most likely to fail to recognize and reject sin. But sin is nevertheless a reality, however much John wished his readers would not commit it. Accordingly he assured them, But if anybody does sin, we have One who speaks to the Father in our defense—Jesus Christ the Righteous One. John did not want his readers to sin, but he knew that none of them was perfect and that all would need the help available from their Advocate.

The words "One who speaks . . . in our defense" translate a single term (paraklēton). Its essential meaning is captured by the KJV's familiar "Advocate." John is the only New Testament writer to use it of the Holy Spirit (four times in his Gospel: John 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7). In these four verses the NIV renders it "Counselor" each time (cf. KJV's "Comforter"). The thought here in 1 John 2:1 is of a defense attorney who takes up the case of his client before a tribunal. The way in which the advocacy of the Lord Jesus works for His sinning people is admirably illustrated in His prayer for Peter (Luke 22:31-32). In anticipation of Peter's approaching denial, Jesus asked the Father to prevent Peter's faith from collapsing. He also had in mind Peter's future helpfulness to his Christian brethren. There is no reason to suppose that Christ must ask God to keep a Christian from going to hell as a result of his sin. Eternal life is fully guaranteed to those who have trusted Jesus for it (John 3:16; 5:24; etc.). But the consequences of a believer's failure, his restoration, and future usefulness are all urgent matters which Jesus takes up with God when sin occurs. His own personal righteousness (He is "the Righteous One"; cf. 1 John 1:9, God is "just") is what uniquely suits Christ for His role as a Christian's Advocate after he sins.

2:2. If God extends mercies to a sinning believer—and the believer does not reap the full consequences of his failure in his personal experience—that fact is not due to the merits of that believer himself. On the contrary, the grace obtained through the advocacy of Christ is to be traced, like all of God's grace, to His all-sufficient sacrifice on the cross. Should any sinning believer wonder on what grounds he might secure God's mercy after he has failed, the answer is found in this verse. So adequate is Jesus Christ as God's atoning Sacrifice that the efficacy of His work extends not merely to the sins of Christians themselves, but also to the sins of the whole world. In saying this, John was clearly affirming the view that Christ genuinely died for everyone (cf. 2 Cor. 5:14-15, 19; Heb. 2:9). This does not mean, of course, that everyone will be saved. It means rather that anyone who hears the gospel can be saved if he so desires (Rev. 22:17). In context, however, John's point is to remind his readers of the magnificent scope of Christ's "atoning sacrifice" in order to assure them that His advocacy as the Righteous One on their behalf is fully consistent with God's holiness.

In recent times there has been much scholarly discussion of the Greek word hilasmos, which the NIV renders as "atoning Sacrifice." (The word occurs in the NT only here and in 1 John 4:10.) Some say the term is not the placating of God's wrath against sin, but rather is an "expiation" or "cleansing" of sin itself. But the linguistic evidence for this interpretation is not persuasive. The view has been capably discussed and refuted by Leon Morris in The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross (Grand Rapids: Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Co., 1965, pp. 125–85).

God's wrath against sin may not be a concept congenial to the modern mind, but it is thoroughly biblical. Hilasmos could be fittingly rendered "propitiation" (cf. the noun hilastērion, "propitiation," in Rom. 3:25 and the verb hilaskomai, "to propitiate," in Luke18:13 and Heb. 2:17). The Cross has indeed propitiated (satisfied) God and has met His righteous demands so thoroughly that His grace and mercy are abundantly available to both saved and unsaved alike.

B. Basic principles of knowing God (2:3–11)

John's transition (v. 3) to the subject of knowing God may seem more abrupt than it really is. In ancient thought, the concept of "light" readily suggested the idea of "vision," "perception," or "knowledge." It seems obvious that a life of fellowship with God in the light ought to lead to knowing Him. Of course in a sense all true Christians know God (John 17:3), but sometimes even genuine believers can be said not to know God or Christ (John 14:7-9). Furthermore, Jesus promised His disciples a special self-disclosure that was predicated on their obeying His commands (John 14:21-23). It is clear that such an experience involves the knowledge of God. Finally, fellowship naturally leads to knowing the One with whom that fellowship takes place. Even on the level of human experience this is true. If a father and son live apart, they will not know each other as well as if they lived together, even though their parent-child relationship continues to exist.

It would be wrong, therefore, to read 1 John 2:3-11 as if John had left the subject of fellowship with God behind. On the contrary, the subject of knowing God is its logical continuation.

2:3. For readers who wish to decide whether their experience of fellowship with God has led them really to know Him in a personal way, John gave a simple test: We know that we have come to know Him if we obey His commands. The two occurrences of the word "know" (ginōskō) in this verse are the first of 23 times John used this word in this epistle. (A synonym, oida, occurs six times: 3:2; 5:15 [twice], 18-20.) As often in Johannine usage, the word "Him" might refer either to God or to Christ. For John, Jesus is so closely linked with the Father that a precise distinction between the Persons of the Godhead sometimes seems irrelevant. Fellowship is with both the Father and the Son (1:3) and to know One of Them intimately is to know the Other. But obedience is the condition for such knowledge (cf. John 14:21-23). It is also the means by which a Christian can be sure that he has really "come to know" his Lord (cf. "obey His commands" in 1 John 3:22, 24; 5:2-3).

2:4. It follows, therefore, that the man who says, I know Him, but does not do what He commands is a liar. As in 1:6, someone may profess a fellowship with God which his life shows he does not possess. John was not afraid to call this kind of claim what it really is: a lie. Furthermore, it may be said of the same person that the truth is not in him. The idea is similar to the statements made earlier about false claims (1:6, 8, 10). In such a person the truth is not a dynamic, controlling influence. He is seriously out of touch with spiritual reality.

2:5-6. On the other hand, obedience to God's Word ("His commands," v. 3) results in a rich and full experience of God's love: God's love is truly made complete in him. The Greek expression "the love of God" (rendered "God's love") could mean either His love for a Christian or a Christian's love for God. But the NIV rendering is perhaps the best, particularly in light of John 14:21-23. In that passage an obedient disciple is promised a special experience of the love of the Father and Son. Since a Christian is already the object of God's saving love, this additional, experiential realization of the divine affection may be properly said to make God's love complete in him (cf. 1 John 4:12, 17). That is to say, an obedient believer has a deep, full-orbed acquaintance with "God's love." Since God is love (4:16), to know God intimately is to know His love intimately.

John then added, This is how we know we are in Him: Whoever claims to live in Him must walk as Jesus did. (The translators have supplied the word "Jesus" which is represented in the original by a pronoun.) In these statements, John used two other expressions ("in Him" and "live in Him") which further his thought. As with the connection he makes between obedience and the knowledge of God, here too the Upper Room Discourse (John 13–16) is the seedplot from which these ideas come. The concept involved is derived especially from the Parable of the Vine and the Branches (John 15:1-8). The vine-branch relationship is an image of the discipleship experience. Jesus said, "This is to My Father's glory, that you bear much fruit, showing yourselves to be My disciples" (John 15:8). In 1 John 2:5-6 discipleship is also in view, as is seen from the reference to the imitation of Christ in verse 6. Moreover, the Greek term rendered in the NIV by "live" (menō) is the same verb used in John 15:4 where the NIV translates it "remain."

It would be a mistake to equate the concept of being "in Him" as John uses it here with the Pauline concept of being "in Christ." For Paul, the words "in Christ" describe a Christian's permanent position in God's Son with all its attendant privileges. With John, the kind of relationship pictured in the vine-branch imagery describes an experience that can be ruptured (John 15:6) with a resultant loss of fellowship and fruitfulness. Thus here in 1 John, the proof that a person is enjoying this kind of experience is to be found in a life modeled after that of Jesus in obedience to His Word. In short, 2:5-6 continues to talk about the believer's fellowship with God.

2:7. Verses 3-6 introduce the issue of obedience, though it was surely implicit also in 1:5-10. But John's insistence on obeying God's commands as a test of one's personal intimacy and knowledge of Him leads to a natural question: Which commands did John have in mind? The answer is offered here. John did not have in mind some new obligation which his readers had never heard. On the contrary the command foremost in his mind was an old one, which you have had since the beginning (cf. 2 John 5). No doubt John thought here especially of the command to love one another (cf. 1 John 2:9-11). He emphasized his point by adding that this old command is the message (logos, lit., "word"; cf. 1:5; 3:11) which you have heard (the majority of mss. add again "from the beginning"). Whatever innovations the readers might be confronting because of the doctrines of the antichrists, their real responsibility was to a commandment which they had heard from the very start of their Christian experience (cf. "heard" and "from the beginning" in 1:1; 2:24; 3:11).

John's affectionate concern for them is seen in his use of Agapētoi, literally, "Beloved" and here rendered Dear friends. He used the same word in 3:2, 21; 4:1, 7, 11 and Agapēte ("Dear friend") in 3 John 2, 5, 11.

2:8. Yet Jesus had called that commandment "new" (John 13:34) and John pointed out that it had not lost its freshness. It is really still a new command and its truth is seen in Him and you. This last assertion, somewhat freely rendered by NIV, seems to mean that the command to love came to realization first in Jesus Himself and then in His followers. The next phrase, because the darkness is passing and the true light is already shining, is best related back to the claim that he was after all writing a new command to them. His point was that the command to love (which Jesus and His followers exhibit) belongs to the new Age of righteousness which has begun to dawn. It does not belong to the old Age of darkness which was passing away. Christ's Incarnation brought a light into the world which can never be extinguished. The love He manifested and taught His disciples to manifest is a characteristic of the Age to come. It is the darkness of the present world and all its hatred which is destined to disappear forever (cf. 1 John 2:17a).

In speaking this way, John gave to the terms "light" and "darkness" a slant differing slightly from what they had in chapter 1. There light was defined in terms of the fundamental character of God (1:5). In that sense, the light has been shining as long as there has been a revelation of God to man. But here John wrote of the Incarnation in particular as the point at which the light began to shine. The new Age has dawned and its true character can now be defined in terms of the special revelation God has made of Himself in His Son. And above all, that revelation is a revelation of divine love.

2:9. It follows that anyone who claims to be in the light but hates his brother is still in the darkness. This warning is clearly intended for Christians as the words "his brother" plainly show. An unsaved person can indeed hate a brother of physical kin, but since he has no spiritual kin he cannot really hate his (spiritual) brother. If John thought that no Christian could hate another Christian, there was no need to personalize the relationship with the word "his." But the opinion, held by some, that a true Christian could never hate another Christian is naive and contrary to the Bible and experience. Even so great a man as King David was guilty of murder, which is the final expression of hate. John was warning his readers against a spiritual danger that is all too real (cf. 1:8, 10). And he was affirming that a Christian who can hate his fellow Christian has not genuinely escaped from the darkness of this present passing Age. To put it another way, he has much to learn about God and cannot legitimately claim an intimate knowledge of Christ. If he really knew Christ as he ought, he would love his brother.

2:10-11. By contrast, whoever loves his brother lives in the light of the new Age which has dawned in Christ (cf. v. 8). There is nothing in him (in one who loves his brother) to make him stumble. Hatred is a kind of internal "stumbling block" which can lead to disastrous spiritual falls. But the calamities to which hatred leads are avoided by one who loves his brother.

This is not so, however, for one who hates his brother. Such a person walks around in the darkness and he does not know where he is going, because the darkness has blinded him (cf. v. 9). A Christian who harbors hatred for a fellow Christian has lost all real sense of direction. Like a man wandering aimlessly in the dark, he faces potentially grave dangers.

III. The Purpose of the Epistle (2:12-27)

In the prologue John had expressed the general aim and goal of his letter. Now he told his audience the specific concerns which motivated the letter. In that sense he articulated the precise purpose of this epistle.

A. In light of the readers' spiritual conditions (2:12-14)

In the light of all the warnings John gave (1:5–2:11), his readers might think that he was fundamentally dissatisfied with their spiritual conditions. But this was not so. John now assured them that he wrote because of the spiritual assets which they possessed.

2:12-13a. In describing these assets, the author addressed his readers as dear children . . . fathers, and young men. Some have suggested that John here divided his readers by chronological age-groups. Others say he did so by their spiritual maturity. If either explanation is adopted, the sequence—which makes "fathers" the middle term—is somewhat strange. Moreover, elsewhere John addressed all his readers as "children" (vv. 1, 28; 3:7, 18; 5:21). It seems best (with C.H. Dodd and I.H. Marshall) to view the terms of address as referring to all the readers in each case. Then each experience ascribed to them is appropriate to the category named.

Thus, thought of as "children," the readers had experienced the forgiveness that their heavenly Father grants to His own. As "fathers," they had an experience that touches eternity past, since they have known Him who is from the beginning. In the light of 2:3-6, this implies they have truly experienced fellowship with God. (Here again [cf. v. 3] the word "Him" could refer to either the Father or the Son; the distinction was not important to John. His readers knew both.) As "young men," the readers had engaged in spiritual warfare and had overcome the evil one, Satan (cf. "evil one" in v. 14; 3:12; 5:18-19).

Thought of in this way, the sequence "children," "fathers," and "young men" is meaningful. The readers knew what it was to have sins forgiven and then have fellowship with the Eternal One. As a result they were like vigorous young men who had defeated satanic assaults.

2:13b-14. The attainments of the readers were then reiterated, but with some subtle variations. Thought of as children again, it can be said that they have known the Father. Unlike newborn infants (teknia ["little born ones"], v. 12; see comments on v. 1), who can scarcely recognize their fathers, these people (paidia, "children"; cf. v. 18)—through fellowship—have come to know their divine Parent. But what can be added to the experience of knowing the Eternal One? In calling them fathers again, John simply repeated the attainment mentioned earlier without changing it. Then viewing them once more as young men, the writer implied growth in strength. In verse 13, he had simply spoken of victory over Satan. Now he wrote, You are strong, and the Word of God lives in you, and you have overcome the evil one. By repeating the three categories under which he here addressed his audience, John suggested not only that they possessed spiritual attainments worthy of being called children, fathers, and young men, but also that they possessed these attainments in ample measure.

B. In light of the world's allurements (2:15-17)

The writer was not dissatisfied with the spiritual state of his readers. Much less did he question or doubt their salvation, as some expositors of this epistle imply. On the contrary, his readers may even be viewed as having matured in the faith. John wrote precisely because their present state was so good. But he wished to warn them about dangers which always exist, no matter how far one has advanced in his Christian walk.

2:15. He turned now to a warning. Do not love the world or anything in the world. The "world" (kosmos), thought of here as an entity hostile to God (cf. 4:4), is always a seductive influence which Christians should continually resist (cf. John 15:18-19; James 4:4. In other NT verses "world" [kosmos] means people, e.g., John 3:16-17.) The world competes for the love of Christians and one cannot both love it and the Father at the same time. If anyone loves the world, the love of the Father is not in him. As James also had told his Christian readers, "Friendship with the world is hatred toward God" (James 4:4).

2:16. The reason love for the world is incompatible with love for God is that everything in the world . . . comes not from the Father but from the world. The world thus conceived is a system of values and goals from which God is excluded. In describing "everything in the world," John specified its contents under three well-known phrases that effectively highlight the world's false outlook. Men of the world live for the cravings of sinful man. "Cravings" translates epithymia, which is used twice in this verse and once in the next verse. The NIV translates it differently each time: "cravings," "lust," "desires." In the New Testament the word usually, though not always, connotes desires that are sinful. The expression "sinful man" translates the Greek sarx (lit., "flesh"). The phrase refers particularly to illicit bodily appetites. The expression the lust (epithymia) of his eyes points to man's covetous and acquisitive nature. The boasting of what he has and does paraphrases the Greek hē alazoneia tou biou (lit., "the pretension of human life"), which signifies a proud and ostentatious way of life. (Alazoneia is used only here in the NT.) Christians ought to have nothing to do with such worldly perspectives as these.

2:17. After all, the world and its desires (epithymia) are temporary and pass away, but the man who does the will of God lives forever. The word "lives" renders the characteristic Johannine word menō (cf. 1:6). It suggests, as almost always in this epistle, the "abiding life" of fellowship with God. But here is obviously the additional thought that the life lived in God's fellowship, rejecting the sinful things of this passing world, is a life that has no real ending. A person whose character and personality are shaped by obedience to God will not be affected by the passing away of the world and its vain desires. It is a Johannine way of saying, "Only one life, 'twill soon be past; only what's done for Christ will last."

C. In the light of the deceptions of the last hour (2:18-23)

2:18. John's general warning against the world is now followed by a warning against one of its end-time manifestations. The false teachers who were present were worldly to the core (cf. 4:5). The readers knew about the predicted advent of the Antichrist and needed to be alerted to the appearance of many who would display his traits of hostility toward God's Christ. This is a clear indication that history has entered a climactic era: the last hour. Despite the lapse of centuries since John wrote, the climax of all things impends in a special way. The stage has been set for history's final drama.

2:19. Of the false teachers John had in mind, he wrote, They went out from us. The word "us" here is most naturally taken as the apostolic first person plural of this epistle (see 1:1-5; 4:6). "Us" contrasts with the "you" in 2:20-21, which referred to the readers. It does not make sense that the false teachers had left the churches to which the readers belonged. If they had, how were they still a problem? On the other hand if, like the legalists of Acts 15, they had seceded from the apostolic churches of Jerusalem and Judea, then they were a particular threat to the readers because they came to them claiming roots in the soil out of which Christianity arose. Thus John was eager to deny any connection with them.

They did not really belong to us paraphrases an expression more literally rendered, "they were not of us." The writer's point was that these men did not really share the spirit and perspective of the apostolic circle, for if they had their secession would not have taken place. Heresy in the Christian church, whether on the part of its saved members or unsaved people in it, always unmasks a fundamental disharmony with the spirit and doctrine of the apostles. A man in touch with God will submit to apostolic instruction (cf. 1 John 4:6).

2:20-21. The readers were well fortified against the antichrists, however, since they had an anointing from the Holy One (i.e., from God). The "anointing" is no doubt the Holy Spirit since, according to verse 27, the anointing "teaches." This clearly suggests that the "anointing" is conceived of as a Person. Jesus Himself was "anointed" with the Holy Spirit (cf. Acts 10:38). (For the possibility that the term suggests that the church leaders are in view, see the Introduction.) As a result of their "anointing," the readers (perhaps primarily the church leaders) had adequate instruction in the truth of God. John wrote them precisely because their apprehension of the truth was correct and because . . . the truth should never be confused with a lie.

2:22-23. The antichrists are liars for they deny that Jesus is the Christ, that is, God's Son and the appointed Savior (cf. John 4:29, 42; 20:31). This denial involves also a denial of the Father. Any claim they might make to having the Father's approval is false. One cannot have the Father without the Son. To reject One is to reject the Other.

D. In light of the readers' responsibilities to abide (2:24-27)

2:24. The readers must see that what they have heard from the beginning (cf. 1:1; 2:7; 3:11) remains in them. If it does (NIV paraphrases here), they will remain in the Son and in the Father. The term translated "remain" is again menō, which the NIV renders as "live" and "lives" in 2:6, 10, 14, 17. John's point was that if the readers would resist the lies of the antichrists and let the truth they had heard from the beginning "abide" (or "be at home") in them, they would continue to "abide" in the fellowship of God the Father and God the Son.

2:25-26. They could also continue to rest on the divine promise of eternal life. As John later insisted (5:9-13; cf. 5:20), they could be sure that they possessed this on the basis of God's testimony to that fact. It may well be that the antichrists denied that the readers were actually saved, since John went right on to say, I am writing these things to you about those who are trying to lead you astray (cf. 3:7). Coming as they evidently did from the apostolic churches of Judea, these men apparently sought to undermine the readers' conviction that Jesus is the Christ and that they had eternal life through Him. John's insistence that his readers genuinely know God and know His truth (2:12-14, 21) was part of his strategy for fortifying them against the antichrists.

2:27. The readers did not need teaching from the antichrists or, for that matter, from anyone. Their anointing . . . received from God, remains in them and was a sufficient Teacher. This, along with verses 12-14, may imply that John's readers were relatively spiritually mature, since the immature need human teachers (cf. Heb. 5:12). This is appropriate if John were addressing church leaders, but it would also suit a congregation that had long been in the faith. Unlike the antichrists, who may have claimed some form of inspiration, the readers' anointing was real, not counterfeit. They needed to remain (menete, "abide") in Him (the pronoun can refer to the anointing) and rely fully on His continuing instruction.

IV. The Body of the Epistle (2:28–4:19)

In the section just completed (2:12–27), John wrote both to assure his readers of the validity of their spiritual experiences and to warn them against the antichrists who denied that validity. In what may be described as the body of his letter, John then explored the true character and consequences of that form of experience which the readers already had and needed to maintain.

A. The theme stated (2:28)

2:28. Many commentators see a major break here. The words continue in Him involve again the Greek verb menō ("abide") which has already occurred 10 times in verses 6–27. (John used menō 66 of the 112 times it occurs in the NT: 40 in John, 23 in 1 John, and 3 in 2 John.) In accord with his basic theme about fellowship (1 John 1:3), John once more enjoined the "abiding" life. But now he introduced the new thought of being confident before Christ at His coming. The Greek words rendered "be confident" are literally "have confidence." The latter is parrēsia, a word that can signify a bold freedom of speech. John used it again in 3:21; 4:17; 5:14. If the readers would maintain their fellowship with God, they would enjoy a genuine boldness of speech when they would meet their Lord. How this can be so is the subject of 2:29–4:19. Should a believer fail to abide in Him, however, there is the possibility of shame when Christ comes. This intimates divine disapproval at the judgment seat of Christ, referred to in 4:17-19. The NIV's unashamed before Him might be more literally rendered: "not be ashamed before Him." The possibility is real but does not, of course, suggest the loss of salvation.

B. Discerning the children of God (2:29–3:10a)

At this point John began to develop a line of thought which culminates in the acquisition of the boldness of which he had just spoken (2:28; cf. 4:17-19). The fellowship with the apostolic circle and with God which he had in mind (cf. 1:3) requires discerning the way the lives of God's children are manifested in their actions. John was moving toward the thought that when one's life is properly manifested, God Himself is manifested in it (4:12-16).

2:29. This verse introduces for the first time in 1 John the explicit thought of new birth. Since the readers know that He (God the Father or God the Son) is righteous, they would also know that everyone who does what is right has been born of Him (the pronoun here probably refers to God the Father who regenerates). (The phrase "born of God" occurs in 3:9; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18 [twice].) The statement has nothing to do with the readers' individual assurance of salvation. It is rather an assertion that when they see real righteousness ("what is right" translates tēn dikaiosynēn) exhibited, they can be sure that the person who exhibits it is a child of God. This righteousness, of course, for John can only mean the kind that Christ had enjoined. It has nothing to do with mere humanistic kindness and morality. The converse of John's statement does not follow, namely, that everyone who is born of God does righteousness. John knew that Christians can walk in the darkness and are susceptible to sin (1:6, 8; 2:1). He was writing here of the way one can see the new birth in the actions of others.

3:1. This verse begins with the word idete ("behold, look at"), not translated in the NIV. The writer had just told the readers how to see the reality of new birth in righteous behavior; now he invited them to contemplate the greatness of the divine love which that reality displays. Behold how great is the love the Father has lavished on us, that we should be called children of God. (The words and that is what we are, rightly omitted by most mss., are probably a scribal addition.) In the Bible the word "called" indicates that this is what one actually is (cf. "called to be holy," lit., "called saints" [1 Cor. 1:2]). Believers are "called children of God" because they are the born-ones (tekna) of "the Father."

The perception to which John invited his readers is, however, lost on the world. Since the world . . . did not know Him (God or Christ), it can hardly be expected to recognize believers as His children. This kind of discernment about others is a distinctively Christian perception.

3:2-3. But even for Christians, this perception is a spiritual one. Though now we are children of God, there is no physical evidence of this that an eye can see. The physical changes in Christians await the coming of Christ. But we know that when He appears, we shall be like Him (cf. 1 Cor. 15:52-54; Phil. 3:21). Such a transformation will result from seeing Him as He is. But pending that event it is already true that everyone who has this hope in Him (the pronoun probably refers to Christ, the Object of this hope) purifies himself, just as He is pure. Here the writer probably continued to refer to the new birth. One who sets his hope by faith on the Son of God experiences an inward purification that is as complete as Christ's own purity ("just as He is pure"). John thus prepared the ground for the assertions he would soon make (1 John 3:6, 9). New birth involves a perfect purification from sin.

3:4. John now wrote about sin which stands in opposition to the purity he had just referred to in verse 3. The NIV renders his statement: Everyone who sins breaks the law (tēn anomian poiei, "does lawlessness"); in fact, sin is lawlessness (anomia). Usually in the Greek New Testament anomia is a general term like the English word "wickedness," which has some prominence in eschatological contexts (cf. Matt. 7:23; 13:41; 24:12; 2 Thes. 2:7). So its use here so soon after the references to the antichrists may be significant. The writer probably intended it to be a strongly pejorative description of sin. It seems likely, in view of 1 John 3:7, that the antichrists had a softened view of sin which John wished to refute. A person who sins does what is wicked, and sin is wickedness, John was insisting. (Lit., the first clause in v. 4 is, "Everyone who commits wickedness.") Sin must not be taken lightly.

3:5-6. The seriousness of sin is further underscored by the consideration that Christ appeared so that He might take away our sins. And in Him is no sin. The Incarnation brought into the world the One who is totally sinless and who had as an objective the removal of sin from the lives of His own (cf. John 1:29; Heb. 9:28a). It follows logically from this that a person who is ("abides") in a sinless Person must himself be sinless, for he has a sinless, regenerate nature.

This is the inescapable logic of the text. But a different point is suggested by the NIV's rendering: No one who lives (menōn, "abides") in Him keeps on sinning. No one who continues to sin has either seen Him or known Him. A widely held explanation of this verse is that a believer "does not sin habitually," that is, sin is not his way of life. However, the Greek text has no words to represent phrases such as "keeps on" or "continues to" or "habitually." These phrases are based on an understanding of the Greek present tense which is now widely in dispute among New Testament scholars (see, e.g., S. Kubo, "1 John 3, 9: Absolute or Habitual?" Andrews University Seminary Studies 7. 1969:47–56; C.H. Dodd, The Johannine Epistles, pp. 78–81; I. Howard Marshall, The Epistles of John, p. 180). It cannot be shown anywhere in the New Testament that the present tense can bear this kind of meaning without the assistance of other words. Such a view is invalid for this verse and also for 1 John 3:9. Nor is John saying that sinless perfection must be achieved, and that those who fail to do so lose their salvation. Such a notion is foreign to John's argument and to all of Scripture.

John's point is simple and straightforward. Sin is a product of ignorance and blindness toward God. "No one who sins has seen Him or known Him" (v. 6b).

Sin can never come out of seeing and knowing God. It can never be a part of the experience of abiding in Christ. "No one who abides in Him sins" (v. 6a). But though the meaning of this is not really open to question, there has seemed to be an inconsistency between such assertions and John's earlier insistence that a believer can never claim to be without sin (1:8). The solution to this problem has been suggested by the statement in 3:3 in which the purification of the one "who has this hope in Him" is comparable in its nature to the purity of Christ ("just as He is pure"). From this it follows that the regenerate life is, in one sense, an essentially and fundamentally sinless life. For the believer sin is abnormal and unnatural; his whole bent of life is away from sin.

The fact remains, however, that Christians do not experience the sinless life perfectly on this earth; hence 1:8, 10 remain true. The two ideas are not really incompatible. The Christian still experiences a genuine struggle with the flesh and overcomes its impulses only by the help of the Holy Spirit (cf. Gal. 5:16-26).

Paul's thinking also conforms with this view. In his struggle with sin he was able to conclude, "Now if I do what I do not want to do, it is no longer I who do it, but it is sin living in me that does it" (Rom. 7:20). In this way Paul could perceive sin as not a real part of what he was at the most inward level of his being (cf. Rom. 7:25). When he wrote, "I no longer live, but Christ lives in me" (Gal. 2:20), he implied the same thing. If Christ alone really lives, sin can be no part of that experience. Insofar as God is experienced by a believer, that experience is sinless. (Cf. comments on 1 John 3:9.)

3:7-8. These verses suggest strongly that the doctrine of the antichrists involved a confusion between sin and righteousness. Perhaps the antichrists felt free to sin while at the same time denying their guilt and claiming to behave righteously. John warned against such ideas: Do not let anyone lead you astray. (The Gr. verb "lead astray," planaō, used also in 2:26, is the same word rendered "deceive" in 1:8.) He who does what is right is righteous, just as He is righteous (cf. 1:9; 2:1, 29). Only righteousness springs from a righteous nature. By contrast, He who does what is sinful is of the devil. It would be wrong to water this assertion down. All sin, of whatever kind or degree, is satanic in nature. This is because the devil has been sinning from the beginning (cf. John 8:44). Sin originated with Satan and is his constant practice. To take part in sin at all is to take part in his activity. It is also opposing the work of the Son of God who came (appeared; cf. 1 John 3:5; Heb. 9:28a) to put an end (lysē, destroy) to that activity, the devil's work. Even the smallest sin runs counter to the work of Christ. Believers are to overcome "the evil one" (1 John 2:13–14), here called "the devil," and not to participate in what he is.

3:9. As was pointed out in connection with verse 6, adding such phrases as "continue to" and "go on" to John's statements about sinning is not justified on the basis of the Greek text. As before, the statements are absolute. One who is born of God (cf. 2:29; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18) does not sin precisely because God's seed remains in him, and he cannot sin because he has been born of God. "God's seed" is His nature, given to each believer at salvation (John 1:13; 2 Peter 1:4). The point here is that the child partakes of the nature of his Parent. The thought of a sinless Parent who begets a child who only sins a little is far from the author's mind. As always, John dealt in stark contrasts. All sin is devilish (1 John 3:8); it does not stem from the believer's regenerate nature, God's seed, but the child of God cannot and does not sin. The explanation here is the same as that given in verse 6. The "new man" (or "new self"; Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10) is an absolutely perfect new creation. By insisting on this point, John was seeking to refute a false conception about sin. Sin is not, nor ever can be, anything but satanic. It can never spring from what a Christian truly is at the level of his regenerate being.

3:10a. Literally, the first phrase of this verse is, "By this are manifest the children of God and the children of the devil." The words "by this" probably refer back to the whole previous discussion. By sharply differentiating between sin and righteousness, John made plain the fundamental way in which God's children are manifest over against the children of the devil. The key to his idea is the word "manifest" in which the ideas presented in 2:29 and 3:1 are touched again. Because a child of God is sinless at the core of his being, he can never be "manifest" through sin as can a child of the devil. While an unsaved person can display his true nature through sin, a child of God cannot. When a Christian sins, he conceals who he really is rather than making it manifest. If the readers perceive someone doing real righteousness, then—but only then—can they perceive this action as a true product of new birth (2:29) and can thus behold God's love (3:1). This consideration is crucial to John's advancing argument.

C. Discerning love for the brethren (3:10b-23)

John now left behind the subject of new birth which he did not mention again until 4:7. The function of the section that begins here is to define righteousness primarily in terms of Christian brotherly love and to show how such love properly expresses itself.

1. WHAT LOVE IS NOT (3:10B-15)

3:10b. Rather than taking verse 10a as introductory to verse 10b, it is better to regard 10a as the conclusion of the previous paragraph and 10b as the beginning of a new one. The words a child in 10b are not in the Greek. Thus the statement would better read, Anyone who does not do what is right is not . . . of God. The Greek expression for "of God" (ek tou theou) need mean no more than that a person so described does not find the source of his actions in God. He is "not . . . of God" in what he does. A failure to perform righteousness and a failure to love one's brother can never be traced to God. John had already said that all sin can be traced to the devil (v. 8). John also used this phrase ek tou theou ("of God") seven other times (4:1-4, 6-7; 3 John 11).

By joining together the idea of righteousness (mentioned in 1 John 2:29–3:7) with love (not mentioned in vv. 2-9), John formed a bridge to a new discussion. He now considered love as the appropriate expression of the regenerate life of which he had been speaking. Love is righteousness in action.

3:11-12. John here made it plain that his admonitions were directed to Christians. This is the message you (Christians) have heard from the beginning: We (Christians) should love one another. But before telling his audience precisely what love is, he first told them what it is not. It is most certainly not the kind of action Cain exhibited toward his brother Abel. Cain murdered his brother (Gen. 4:8) and in that action he was of the evil one (ek tou ponērou; belonged to is misleading). The reason for this murder was Cain's jealous resentment of his brother's superior righteousness (Gen. 4:2-7). In saying this, John touched a sensitive nerve, since hatred toward another Christian is often prompted by a feeling of guilt about one's own life as compared with that person's. It is well to remember that such reactions are satanic, as John bluntly affirmed here.

3:13. Such reactions of hatred and murder (vv. 11-12) are also worldly, since the world hates Christians. That fact should not surprise the readers (called brothers only here in 1 John) at all, however. What else can the world be expected to do? It is hatred among believers that is so abnormal, and against which John was fundamentally warning. In that sense it is right to treat this verse as more or less parenthetical.

3:14. In contrast with the world, however, John stated, We know that we have passed from death to life, because we love our brothers. The first "we" of this statement is quite emphatic in the original and may mean "we, the apostles." But even if it does, the writer no doubt intended that the readers apply this comment to themselves. Love for one's brothers is evidence that he has entered God's sphere of life (cf. John 13:35).

The expression translated "passed from death to life" occurs elsewhere only in John 5:24 (there trans. "crossed over from death to life") where it refers to conversion. But a phrase which is used only twice in John's writing can hardly be said to have a fixed meaning. The context here must decide its significance. The statements of 1 John 3:14b-15 suggest that the spheres of "death" and "life" are here treated as experiential and determined by one's actions. If so, the issue of conversion is not in view here.

The statement, Anyone who does not love (the majority of the mss. add "a brother" or "his brother") remains in death, is considered under verse 15.

3:15. This verse is usually taken to mean that a true Christian cannot hate his fellow Christian, since hatred is the moral equivalent of murder. But this view cannot stand up under close scrutiny.

To begin with, John speaks of anyone who hates his brother. If John had believed that only an unsaved person can hate another Christian, the word "his" unnecessarily personalizes the relationship (cf. comments on 2:9). But it is an illusion to believe that a real Christian is incapable of hatred and murder. David was guilty of the murder of pious Uriah the Hittite (2 Sam. 12:9) and Peter warned his Christian readers, "If you suffer, it should not be as a murderer" (1 Peter 4:15; more lit., "Let none of you suffer as a murderer"). The view that 1 John 3:15 cannot refer to the saved is totally devoid of all realism. The solemn fact remains that hatred of some other believer is the spiritual equivalent of murder (Matt. 5:21-22), as a lustful eye is the spiritual equivalent of adultery (Matt. 5:28).

John insisted then that no murderer has eternal life abiding in him. The NIV does not translate the Greek participle menousan ("abiding"), which is a crucial word here. John does not say that someone who hates his brother does not possess eternal life, but rather that he does not have it abiding in him. But since for John, Christ Himself is eternal life (John 14:6; 1 John 1:2; 5:20), John's statement is saying that no murderer has Christ abiding in him. Thus once more the experience of "abiding" is what John had in view.

Hatred on the part of one Christian toward another is thus an experience of moral murder. As John had indicated in 3:14b, he held that a Christian who fails to love his brother "remains (menei) in death." He is thus experientially living in the same sphere in which the world lives (see v. 13). Because he is a murderer at heart he can make no real claim to the kind of intimate fellowship with God and Christ which the word "abide" suggests. Eternal life (i.e., Christ) is not at home in his heart so long as the spirit of murder is there. Such a person is disastrously out of touch with his Lord and he experiences only death. (Cf. Paul's statement, "For if you live according to the sinful nature, you will die" [Rom. 8:13].) John's words were surely grim. But no service is rendered to the church by denying their applicability to believers. The experience of the Christian church through the ages shows how urgently they are needed. Hate, unfortunately, is not confined to unsaved people.

2. WHAT LOVE IS (3:16-18)

3:16. In stark contrast with hatred stands the true character of Christian love. So far is it from the spirit of murder that its essence lies in giving one's life for others rather than taking lives. This was exemplified in Jesus Christ who laid down His life for us. With this as a model, Christians should be prepared to make similar sacrifices for their brothers.

3:17-18. Yet the opportunity to sacrifice one's life for another may not arise. But material possessions (as food and clothes) help sustain life and, if a Christian's love is real, he cannot see his brother in need without having pity on him. "Pity" (splanchna) suggests a deep-seated emotional concern or affectionate sympathy (also used in Luke 1:78; 2 Cor. 6:12; 7:15; Phil. 1:8; 2:1; Phile. 7, 12, 20). The true test of love is not one's verbal profession of it (loving with words or tongue) but his willingness to help and thus to love . . . with actions and in truth.

3. WHAT LOVE DOES FOR BELIEVERS (3:19-23)

3:19-20. The statement, This then is how we know that we belong to the truth, probably refers back to verses 17–18. By practical acts of love in which the needs of others are met, Christians can have a basic assurance that they are participating experientially in the truth. (The NIV's "we belong to the truth" paraphrases the Gr. "we are of the truth"; cf. "of God" [v. 10] and "belonged to the evil one" [v. 12].)

The rest of verse 19 and all of verse 20 are difficult in the original, but probably should be translated, "And we shall persuade our hearts before Him that, if our hearts condemn us, God is greater than our hearts, and knows all things." It is precisely in the sphere of a believer's love for other Christians, in which Christ has set him so high a standard, that he may feel deeply his own inadequacy and failure. But if his heart condemns him, he can remind himself that God takes account of those things which at the moment his heart ignores. If he has been engaged in the kind of practical acts of love which John enjoined, his guilt-ridden heart can be persuaded by realizing that God is well aware of his fundamental commitment to the truth. The passage clearly recalls Peter's response to the Lord's final query, "Do you love Me?" Peter replied, "Lord, You know all things; You know that I love You" (John 21:17).

3:21-22. Once a condemning heart has been silenced by resting on God's knowledge of all things, there comes a new confidence before God. "Confidence" here translates parrēsia, which John had not used since his thematic statement in 2:28 (cf. 4:17; 5:14). The halfway point in his argument had now been reached. As a result of active participation in the truth by real deeds of love, Christians can calm their disapproving hearts and achieve boldness in prayer, and their prayers will be answered because they, as believers, are consciously subject to God's will (they obey His commands [cf. 2:3] and do what pleases Him). This presumes, of course, that the requests themselves are made in subjection to God's will (5:14-15).

3:23. The writer had declared that a confident and effective prayer life is founded on obedience to God's "commands" (v. 22). Now those commands are summed up in a single command consisting of faith and love. The phrase believe in the name of His Son contains the epistle's first direct reference to faith. The Greek here contains no word for "in" so the expression could be rendered "believe the name of His Son." In this context it certainly includes the faith in Christ's name which true Christian prayer involves (see John 14:12-15; 16:24).

First John 3:23 furnishes a kind of climax to the paragraph beginning in verse 18. As a Christian actively engages in deeds of love (v. 18) and as he achieves boldness before God in prayer (v. 21), he is doing what God commands (cf. 2:3; 3:24; 5:2-3): living a life of confidence in the name of Christ which is undergirded by love (3:23; cf. v. 14; 4:7, 11, 21). Since faith and love, thus conceived, go together, this kind of life is seen as obedience to a single "command."

D. Discerning the indwelling God (3:24–4:16)

Since the thematic statement of 2:28, John's argument has passed through two stages: (1) the one born of God is manifested only through righteousness (2:29–3:10a), and (2) this righteousness takes the form of a Christlike love for the brethren that leads to boldness in prayer (3:10b-23). Now John showed that this kind of life is the manifestation of the indwelling God.

1. DISCERNING THE SPIRIT OF TRUTH (3:24–4:6)

3:24. Two new themes appear in this verse. The first theme is the epistle's first reference to God, or Christ, abiding in each obedient believer. Those who obey His commands (cf. 2:3; 3:23; 5:2-3) live (menei, "abide") in Him, and He in them. That the abiding life involves this mutuality is made plain in the Parable of the Vine and the Branches (John 15:4-5, 7).

The second new idea is the epistle's first of six explicit references to the Holy Spirit (cf. 1 John 4:2, 6, 13; 5:6, 8; cf. "the Holy One" in 2:20). The way a believer can verify that God lives (menei, "abides") in him is by the operation of God's Spirit in his life. John then showed that God's Spirit is the Spirit of both faith (4:1-6) and love (4:7-16)—the two aspects of the two-part "command" given in 3:23.

4:1-3. To begin with, the Spirit of God must be distinguished from false spirits. This is particularly necessary because many false prophets have gone out into the world. The touchstone by which these spirits (false prophets) are to be tested is their attitude toward the incarnate person of Jesus Christ. The failure to acknowledge (homologei, "confess"; cf. 1:9; 2:23; 4:15) that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is precisely what exposes the spirit of the antichrist, which John had already warned his readers about (2:18-27; cf. 2 John 7).

4:4-6. Up to now, the writer assured his dear children (teknia; cf. comments on 2:12), the readers, that they had overcome these antichrists. The readers had successfully resisted the antichrists (false prophets) by means of the One who is in them (no doubt another reference to the Spirit; cf. 3:24; 4:2). Reliance on God is the secret of all victory whether over heresy or any other snare. The indwelling One—the Holy Spirit who indwells every believer (3:24; 4:13; Rom. 8:9) and is thus "the One who is in you"—is mightier than the one who is in the world, namely, Satan (cf. 1 John 5:19). He is called "the prince of this world" (John 12:31); "the god of this Age" (2 Cor. 4:4); and "the ruler of the kingdom of the air" (Eph. 2:2).

The antichrists are from the world and . . . speak from the viewpoint of the world. For this reason they get a good hearing from the world. It is always true that satanically inspired thought has a special appeal to worldly minds. But people who are from God (ek tou theou, "of God"; cf. 1 John 4:4, "from God"; v. 5, "from the world"; and 3:12, "belonged to the evil one") listen to the apostles. The pronouns which begin verses 4-6 (You . . . They, and We) are emphatic in the original and evidently mark off three groups: the readers, the antichrists, and the apostles. Each one who can be described as "from God" (i.e., actuated and influenced by God) and thus knows God listens to the apostolic voice. In the history of the church, apostolic doctrine has always been the means by which the Holy Spirit of truth and the spirit of falsehood can be effectively distinguished. True Christianity is apostolic Christianity.

2. DISCERNING THE GOD OF LOVE (4:7-16)

4:7-8. The writer now returned to the subject of love which, like faith in God's Son (v. 13), is a product of the Spirit. As a confession of the incarnate person of Christ marks one off as being actuated by God (i.e., "from God", vv. 4, 6) so does love, since love comes from God. Hence, one who loves (in the Christian sense of that term) has been born of God (cf. 2:29; 3:9; 5:1, 4, 18) and he knows God. Love stems from a regenerate nature and also from fellowship with God which issues in knowing Him (see 2:3-5). The absence of love is evidence that a person does not know God. Significantly, John did not say such a person is not born of God. In the negative statement only the last part of the positive one (in 4:7) is repeated. Since

God is love, intimate acquaintance with Him will produce love. Like light (1:5), love is intrinsic to the character and nature of God, and one who is intimately acquainted with God walks in His light (1:7).

4:9-11. If one wishes to know how God has demonstrated His love, he need only look at the fact that God sent His One and only Son into the world that we might obtain eternal life thereby ("One and only" translates monogenē, "only born one," which also is used in John 1:14, 18; 3:16.) Moreover, this love was not a response to man's love, but an initiative on God's part (1 John 4:10). By it the Son became an atoning Sacrifice (hilasmon, "propitiation"; see comments on 2:2) for our sins. Nothing less than God's love in Christ is the model for the love Christians should have toward one another.

Important to John's argument is his reference to God's love in 4:9 as His love among us. In verses 12-16 he showed how this love, experienced among Christians, can make God visible to them.

4:12-13. In His divine nature and essence, God has never been seen by any living man (cf. John's similar statement, John 1:18). Yet in the experience of mutual love among believers, this invisible God actually lives in us and His love is made complete in us. The term "lives" once again renders John's characteristic word (menō) for the abiding life. As in 1 John 2:5, the idea of God's love reaching completeness in a believer may suggest a deep and full experience of that love (cf. 4:17).

The statement in verse 13 is intimately related to the ideas just expressed. We know that we live (menomen, "we abide") in Him and He in us, because He has given us of His Spirit. The mutual abiding of a believer in God and God in that believer (cf. John 15:4-7) is indicated by that believer's experience of the Spirit. The Greek for "of His Spirit" (ek tou pneumatos) suggests participation in the Spirit of God, literally, "He has given us out of His Spirit." The same construction occurs in 1 John 3:24. When a believer loves, he is drawing that love from God's Spirit (cf. Rom. 5:5), who is also the Source of his confession of Christ (1 John 4:2). Thus both the faith and the love enjoined in the dual "command" of 3:23 are products of the Spirit's operation in a believer. A believer's Spirit-led obedience becomes the evidence that he is enjoying the mutual abiding relationship with God that John wrote about.

4:14. The apostle now reached a climactic point in his argument. He had just written that "if we love each other," then the God whom no one has seen abides "in us and His love is made complete in us." The result of this experience is that we have seen and testify that the Father has sent His Son to be the Savior of the world. Since the first person plural in verses 7-13 is clearly meant to include the readers, the "we" of this verse includes them as well. The indwelling God, whose presence is manifested in the midst of a loving Christian community, thus becomes in a sense truly visible to the eye of faith. Though no one "has seen" (tetheatai, "beheld") God (v. 12), believers who abide in Him (v. 13) "have seen" (tetheametha, "behold") the Son as He is manifested among loving Christians. Christians who behold this manifestation have in fact "seen" and can "testify" to the fundamental truth that "the Father has sent the Son to be the Savior of the world." This great truth can be put on display through the instrumentality of Christian love.

With these words, John reached the goal he had announced in the prologue (1:1-4), namely, that his readers might share the apostles' experience. The apostles had "seen" (heōrakamen) the "life which was with the Father and . . . appeared to us" (1:2). In a loving Christian community, the believers can see that too. The term "Life" in 1:2, though it refers to Christ incarnate, nevertheless was carefully chosen by the writer. What his readers could witness is the renewed manifestation of that Life in their fellow Christians. But, as he had argued ever since 2:29, the "life" which Christians possess by new birth is inherently sinless and can only be manifested through righteousness and Christlike love. But when that occurs, Christ whom the apostles saw in the flesh is, in a real but spiritual sense, "seen" again (4:14).

4:15-16. Under the circumstances just described, confession (cf. 1:9; 2:23; 4:3) that Jesus is the Son of God is a sign that the confessor enjoys a mutual abiding relationship with God. The section is rounded off by the assertion, We know and rely on (lit., "have come to believe") the love God has for us. Living in the atmosphere of mutual Christian love produces a personal knowledge of God's love and fresh experience of faith in that love. Since God is love (cf. v. 8), one who lives in love lives (menei, "abides") in God and has God abiding with him. The last part of verse 16 ought to be taken as the conclusion of the paragraph, rather than the start of a new one. John again affirmed the reality of the abiding experience enjoyed by all Christians who love.

E. The theme realized (4:17-19)

The writer now returned to the theme of boldness (parrēsia) at the Second Advent, which he had introduced at 2:28. At the midpoint of his argument, he had spoken of boldness in prayer (3:21-22), but now he went a step further. Loving Christians can even have boldness at the judgment seat of Christ when their Lord returns.

4:17. This verse might be rendered, literally, "In this respect love is made complete with us, namely, that we should have boldness in the day of judgment." The writer was not referring here to a final judgment in which the eternal destiny of each believer hangs in balance. There is no such judgment for a believer (John 5:24). But a believer's life will be assessed at the judgment seat of Christ (1 Cor. 3:12-15; 2 Cor. 5:10). Yet even on that solemn occasion, a believer may have confidence (parrēsian; cf. 1 John 2:28; 3:21; 5:14) that God will approve the quality of his life if, through love, that believer while in this world becomes like Him. An unloving Christian is unlike his Lord and may anticipate rebuke and loss of reward at the judgment seat. But a loving believer is one in whom the work of God's love has been made complete (cf. the same words in 2:5; 4:12), and the fruit of that is boldness before the One who will judge him. In this way he achieves the goal of confidence and no shame before Him, expressed in 2:28.

4:18-19. If a believer looks forward with trepidation to the judgment seat of Christ, it is because God's love has not yet reached completeness in Him. The words here rendered perfect are no different in force from the idea of "completeness" expressed in 2:5 and 4:12. The matured experience of God's love (reached in the act of loving one another) is incompatible with fear and expels fear from the heart.

The words fear has to do with punishment are literally, "fear has punishment." Fear carries with it a kind of torment that is its own punishment. Ironically, an unloving believer experiences punishment precisely because he feels guilty and is afraid to meet his Judge. Such fear prohibits a completed love (one who fears is not made perfect in love). But a Christian who loves has nothing to fear and thus escapes the inner torment which a failure to love can bring. Nevertheless a believers' love is essentially derivative.

We love (the majority of mss. add "Him") because He first loved us. A believer who loves other believers also loves God, and in facing his Judge he is simply facing One whom he loves. There is no fear in such an experience; yet he recognizes that his love for God originated in God's love for him.

V. Conclusion (4:20–5:17)

The high watermark of the epistle was reached in 4:11-19. But the experience described there, with its astounding concept of boldness on the day of judgment, can be reached only in a most practical way. In his conclusion, John crystallized what he meant by love and how that love can be realized in one's life.

A. Love clarified (4:20–5:3a)

The brief but climactic statement of 4:19 mentioned love for God for the first time (following most Gr. mss.). But a claim to love God cannot be substituted for love for other believers. This furnished John with his point of departure.

4:20-21. Anyone who claims to love God, yet hates his brother makes a false claim: he is a liar. John often pointed up false claims by using the word "liar": 1:10; 2:4, 22; 4:20; 5:10 (cf. "lie" in 1:6). Love for the unseen God (cf. 4:12) can only be concretely expressed by love for one's visible Christian brother. Furthermore, God's command (v. 21; cf. 2:3; 3:23-24; 5:3) has joined together the two kinds of love—love for God and love for one's brother.

5:1-3a. If one asks who his Christian brother or sister is, the answer is that everyone who believes that Jesus is the Christ is born of God (cf. "born of God" in 3:9; 4:7; 5:4, 18). Whether or not a believer exhibits an admirable life, he should be an object of his fellow Christian's love. This love does not spring from something lovable in the person himself, but from his paternity, since everyone who loves the Father loves His child as well. Moreover, love for God's children is not mere sentiment or verbal expression (cf. 3:18), but is inseparable from loving God and obeying His commands (5:2; cf. 2:3; 3:22, 24; 5:3).

If a further question is asked about what it means to love . . . God, the answer is, to obey His commands. Thus the apostle, by this series of statements, reduces love for God and one's fellow Christians to its fundamental character. A person who obeys God's commands is doing what is right, both toward God and toward his fellow believers and is thus loving both God and them. But it must be remembered that this includes the willingness to sacrifice for one's brother (cf. 3:16-17).

B. Love empowered (5:3b-15)

If love for God and one's fellow Christians is at its core obedience to God's commands, how can these be carried out? Are they beyond the capacity of a believer? In this section John pointed to faith as the secret of a victorious, obedient life.

5:3b-5. As a matter of fact, God's commands are not burdensome (cf. Matt. 11:30). This is because the principle of victory resides in everyone born of God. Every such person has already overcome the world (cf. 1 John 4:4). His faith in Christ, by which he was regenerated, constitutes a victory over the world system which is satanically blinded to the gospel (cf. 2 Cor. 4:3-4). Who is it then that overcomes the world? Only he who believes that Jesus is the Son of God. With these words, the writer affirmed that a believer is a world-conqueror by means of his faith in Christ. This suggests that such faith is the secret of his continuing victory and, for that reason, obedience to God's commands need not be burdensome.

5:6-8. But the object of this faith must always be the One who came by water and blood—Jesus Christ. It is simplest to take the term "water" as a reference to the baptism of Jesus by which His public ministry was initiated (Matt. 3:13-17; Mark 1:9-11; Luke 3:21-22). "Blood" would then refer to His death, by which His earthly work was terminated. John's insistence that He did not come by water only, but by water and blood, suggests that he was refuting a false notion of the type held by Cerinthus (see Introduction). Cerinthus taught that the divine Christ descended on the man Jesus at His baptism and left Him before His crucifixion. Thus he denied that one Person, Jesus Christ, came by both water and blood. Cerinthus was doubtless not alone in such views, which John regarded as utterly false and contrary to the true testimony of the Holy Spirit. Indeed, there are three that testify: the Spirit, the water, and the blood; and the three are in agreement. The Spirit's witness may be thought of as coming through the prophets (including John the Baptist). The Spirit's witness, then, was augmented by the historical realities involved in "the water" and "the blood." Both the baptism and the crucifixion of Jesus are strongly attested historical facts (cf. John 1:32-34; 19:33-37). All three witnesses ("water" and "blood" are personified) "are in agreement" that a single divine Person, Jesus Christ, was involved in these events.

5:9-12. One therefore has no reason for not accepting God's testimony to the person of Christ. If man's testimony can be accepted when adequately attested (Deut. 19:15), God's testimony, being greater, ought also be accepted. The NIV's words, because it is the testimony of God, which He has given about His Son, are perhaps better taken as commencing a new thought which involves a slight ellipsis. It might be paraphrased "Here then is God's testimony about His Son (which we ought to accept because of its greatness)."

But before specifying the content of God's testimony (which is done in 1 John 5:11-12), John paused parenthetically to remark that accepting this testimony internalizes it for the one who believes. Each believer has God's truth in his heart. By contrast, anyone who disbelieves God has made Him out to be a liar (cf. 1:10). For John there was no middle ground, no suspension of opinion. One either believes or he impugns God's veracity.

Having said this, John returned to the content of the testimony, which is that God has given us eternal life (cf. 5:13, 20) and this life is in His Son. He who has the Son has life; he who does not have the Son of God does not have life. In the light of 2:25-26 (see comments there), John's statement of God's testimony is probably directed against a claim by some antichrists that the readers did not really have eternal life through God's Son. But God has directly affirmed that eternal life is precisely what He has given in His Son. To deny this is to call Him a liar.

5:13. John wrote these things . . . so that his believing readers would know that they had eternal life (cf. vv. 12, 20). The words "these things" are often wrongly taken to refer to the whole epistle. But similar expressions in 2:1, 26 refer to the immediately preceding material and the same is true here. What John had just written about God's testimony (5:9-12) aims to assure his readers that, despite anything the antichrists have said, believers do indeed possess eternal life. It may be pointed out, in fact, that the assurance of one's salvation always rests fundamentally and sufficiently on the direct promises that God makes to that believer. In other words, one's assurance rests on the testimony of God.

After the words that you have eternal life, most Greek manuscripts add the words found in the KJV: "and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God." Perhaps this statement seemed redundant to some early scribe or editor and for that reason was eliminated from his manuscript. But it actually prepares the ground for the discussion about prayer which follows by inviting continued faith in God's Son on the part of those who already have received eternal life through Him. Prayer too is an expression of trust in the name of God's Son (see comments on 3:23).

5:14-15. One who believes in the name of Jesus Christ has an assurance (parrēsia) in approaching God in prayer (cf. 3:21). Requests made in accordance with God's will are heard by Him and a believer can be certain of receiving answers to them. Naturally, Christians today discern God's will through the Scriptures and ask accordingly. But the unit of thought that commences with 5:3b has focused on the truth that God's commands are not a burden because faith in God's Son is the secret of spiritual victory over the world. In this context, then, it is natural to suppose that John was thinking especially, though not exclusively, of a Christian's right to ask God for help in keeping His commands. That kind of prayer is transparently according to His will. Thus in victorious living a Christian is relieved of any burden through prayer that is based on faith in the name of God's Son.

C. Love practiced (5:16-17)

But if a Christian's own needs may be met by prayerful reliance on the name of Jesus, what about the needs of other Christians? Extending his discussion of prayer, John once again wove together his dual theme of faith and love. A Christian who truly loves his brother and sister cannot be indifferent to their spiritual needs.

5:16. Verses 16-17 have been much discussed. But they should not have occasioned as much difficulty as they have. Sometimes a Christian may sin so seriously that God judges that sin with swift physical death: "a sin that leads to death." Ananias and Sapphira are cases in point (Acts 5:1-11). But most of the sins which one sees a Christian brother commit are not of such a nature, as their common occurrence shows. For these, a believer ought to pray, knowing that any sin—if continued in long enough—is a threat to a fellow Christian's life (cf. James 5:19-20; also cf. Prov. 10:27; 11:19; 13:14; 19:16). Thus the restoration of a brother may secure a prolonging of his physical life.

The words, a sin that does not lead to death, can be easily misunderstood. All sin ultimately leads to death, but the expression "that does not lead to death" (mē pros thanaton) should be understood in the sense, "not punished by death." The distinction is between sins for which death is a rapid consequence and sins for which it is not.

When a Christian sees another Christian sin in a way that is not fatal, he is instructed to pray for him and God will give him life. (The word "God" is not in the original, but it is properly supplied, as in the NIV.) However, John reminded his readers that there is . . . sin that leads to (i.e., "is punished by") death. There is no need for the word a before "sin." John was not likely thinking of only one kind of sin. The New Testament example cited earlier (Acts 5:1-11) was a flagrant violation of the sanctity of the Christian community. It is not necessary for a Christian to be absolutely sure which flagrant sins are punishable by swift death as long as he can recognize many which are not. He is commanded to pray regarding sins which are not punishable by swift death. Even for other sins, where a greater seriousness seems attached to them, Christians have the freedom to pray. John's words about fatal sin are, I am not saying that he should pray about that. But this clearly does not forbid prayer even in the most serious cases. But naturally in such cases believers will submit their prayers to the will of God. In contrast, with regard to sins not punished swiftly by death, Christians, on the basis of this verse, should be able to pray with confidence.

5:17. This verse affirms that there is genuine scope for the kind of prayer John enjoined in verse 16. All wrongdoing (adikia, "unrighteousness") is sin, but out of this broad spectrum there is sin that does not lead (swiftly) to death. This passage has suffered a great deal by the concentration of expositors on the question of what kind of sin is directly punished by death. John's emphasis, however, is on sin not thus punished. It is for this that a believer should pray. When he does so, he is demonstrating his love for his brother and is thus obeying the frequently repeated command of this letter to do so. At the same time, he is exercising faith in the name of God's Son, since his loving request for his brother is in Jesus' name. Prayer for one's sinning brother is therefore in obedience to the single two-pronged command of 3:23.

VI. Epilogue (5:18-21)

In a brief epilogue, the Apostle John sought to reinforce some of the basic truths in his epistle. The "we" which runs throughout the epilogue (six times) is probably fundamentally apostolic, as it was also in the prologue (1:1-4; cf. the "we" of John 21:24). But no doubt the writer hoped and expected that his readers could fully identify with the assertions he was making. Each verse in 1 John 5:18-20 begins with "we know" (oidamen).

5:18. As in 3:6, 9 (see comments there) the words continue to are not justified by the original. John was affirming that anyone born of God is a person whose true, inward nature is inherently sinless. (Cf. "born of God" in 2:29; 3:9; 4:7; 5:1, 4.)

The additional statement about the one who was born of God is not, as often suggested, a reference to Christ. John nowhere else referred to Christ in this way; and he was still writing about regenerate people. On this view, the word "himself" should be read in place of him. John thus affirmed that "the one who has been born of God keeps himself" (there is no word for safe in the original). This restates the truth of 3:9 in a slightly different form. A believer's new man (or "new self"; Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10) is fundamentally impervious to sin and hence the evil one (cf. 1 John 2:13-14; 3:12), Satan, does not touch him.

5:19. A regenerate person's new nature is inherently sinless (v. 18) because God's "seed" is in him (3:9). Knowledge of this truth is coupled with the conviction that we know that we are . . . of God (in the Gr., children does not occur). This assurance (founded for each believer on God's testimony [5:9-13]) is accompanied by a realization that the whole world is under the control of the evil one (cf. v. 18). John was seeking in these summarizing statements to reinforce the readers' consciousness that they are distinct from the satanically controlled world system and basically free from its power. They need not listen to the worldly ideas advanced by the antichrists (3:7-8). Nor need they succumb to worldly desires (cf. 2:15-17).

5:20. Moreover, the coming of the Son of God has granted to believers an understanding which makes possible a knowledge of God. John and his circle were in Him who is true (and so were his readers as they continued to "abide"). But to abide in God is also to abide in His Son Jesus Christ. For that matter, Jesus Christ Himself is the true God (cf. John 1:1, 14) and eternal life (cf. 1 John 1:2; 2:25; 5:11-13). With this grand affirmation of the deity of Christ, John concluded his summary of apostolic truths which stand against the falsehoods of the antichrists.

5:21. That the final admonition of the letter should be, Dear children (teknia, "born-ones"; cf. 2:1, 12, 28; 3:7, 18; 4:4), keep yourselves from idols, has seemed surprising. But there is no need to take "idols" in a figurative sense. In the Greco-Roman world of John's day, any moral compromise with worldly perspectives was likely to lead to some involvement with idolatry, since idolatry permeated pagan life at every level. To adhere to "the true God and eternal life" (5:20)—and to seek to express one's basically sinless nature as a child of God—would necessarily mean avoiding idolatry and the moral laxness which went with it. The apostle's closing admonition was thus relevant to his initial readers.

2 JOHN

INTRODUCTION

Second John is a brief epistle which could have been written on a single sheet of papyrus of standard size. The preservation of this brief letter is no doubt a tribute to its spirituality and inspiration.

Authorship. The authorship of 2 John has been traditionally assigned to the Apostle John. But the writer identifies himself only as "the elder." This title is not likely to refer to the office of an elder in a local church. It might simply be an affectionate designation (presbyteros, "the old man"; cf. 1 Tim. 5:1-2; 1 Peter 5:5; 3 John 1) by which the author was known to his readers. However, some ancient evidence exists that the term "elder" could be used to designate any apostle or other original witness to the life and teachings of the Lord Jesus. In view of the manifest similarity in style and content between 1 and 2 John, the arguments that point to apostolic authorship for the larger epistle carry force for the smaller one as well. There is no adequate reason for doubting the correctness of the traditional ascription of 2 John to the Apostle John.

Background. The letter is addressed "to the chosen lady and her children" (v. 1; cf. vv. 4-5). No personal names are found in it, and the suggestion that the recipient was named either Eklecta (from eklektē, the word rendered "chosen") or Kyria (the word rendered "lady") carries little conviction. In this respect 2 John stands in contrast with 3 John, which contains the personal names of three people. It has therefore been suggested that the apostolic writer adopted a literary form in 2 John, in which a particular Christian church is personified as "the chosen lady" and its members are called "her children." The personification of nations and cities as female personages is common in the Bible (cf. "the daughter of Zion"), and the Christian church is often referred to as "the bride of Christ" (cf. Eph. 5:22-33; 2 Cor. 11:2; Rev. 19:7).

The conclusion that 2 John is addressed to a church is further supported by the observation that in the Greek the writer drops the singular number for his pronouns after verse 5 and uses a singular again only in verse 13. Indeed, the general nature of the epistle's content is most appropriate to a community. Thus, while the possibility that a particular Christian woman is addressed cannot be totally excluded, it is preferable to treat the letter as addressed to a church. If so, the problems confronted by this church do not differ much from the ones confronted by the readers of 1 John. Here too the author warned against antichrists (2 John 7; cf. 1 John 2:18, 22). The error of which they were guilty was, as also in 1 John, a denial of the person of Christ (2 John 7; cf. 1 John 2:22-23; 4:1-3). The epistle likewise insists on obedience to God's commands, especially the command to love one another (2 John 5-6; cf. 1 John 2:3-9; 3:14-18, 23; 4:7, 11, 20-21).

Date. No independent data is available on which to base the date of the writing of 2 John. But the situation presupposed in this letter is similar to what evidently lies behind 1 John. This therefore makes possible a date approximately the same as that suggested for the larger epistle. On this assumption, 2 John may also belong in the period before the outbreak of the Jewish war against the Romans in Palestine, in A.D. 66. A date in the early 60s is thus the most probable guess.

COMMENTARY

I. Preamble (vv. 1-3)

The epistle begins in the way ancient letters usually began. The writer announced himself, stated the identity of the recipient(s), and offered a greeting. But, as noted in the Introduction, John did not specifically name "the chosen lady" and the text reads naturally if a church were addressed. The preamble stresses that "truth" and "love" are the two major concerns of this letter ("truth": vv. 1 [twice], 2-4; "love": vv. 1, 3, 5-6 [twice in v. 6]) and of 3 John.

Vv. 1-2. The elder (see "Authorship" in the Introduction) commenced his communication by asserting that he loved this church (the chosen lady; cf. "dear lady," v. 5) and its members (her children; cf. v. 4) in the truth. So in fact did all who know the truth. This seems to suggest that the church addressed was well known in Christian circles. (It is called "chosen" because it was composed of God's elect, i.e., Christians.) The love of John and others for this community of believers was founded and predicated on God's truth. It arose because of the truth, which lives in us and will be with us forever. Christian love is by no means mere sentimentalism or humanistic compassion, but is motivated by a knowledge of the truth which has been revealed in Christ. Truth is the basis of love. It is precisely this truth, on account of which the church is loved, that the church must be careful to guard.

V. 3. Instead of just wishing grace, mercy, and peace for his readers, John announced that they would be experiencing these things in truth and love (cf. v. 1). (Interestingly Paul and Peter in the greetings in their epistles include only grace and peace, except for 1 and 2 Tim., which include "grace, mercy, and peace." See the chart, "Paul's Introductions to His Epistles" at Rom. 1:1-7.) But the qualities of truth and love are precisely the ones John enjoined his readers to maintain. If they do maintain them, then they can expect to enjoy the "grace, mercy, and peace" which come from God the Father and from Jesus Christ. The fact that these blessings stem from both the Father and the Son affirms the deity of Christ. The Father's Son is an unusual expression (cf. "the Father and the Son" in 2 John 9). God's blessings—favor (charis), compassion (eleos), and inner harmony and tranquility (eirēnē)—are enjoyed in an atmosphere where "truth" and "love" are in control. John had written that truth "will be with us" (v. 2). Now he added that grace, mercy, and peace will be with us.

II. Body of the Epistle (vv. 4-11)

Getting to his point immediately, John expressed his concerns (a) that the church would continue to be obedient to God and (b) that the believers would resist all inroads by false teachers. These two objectives, of course, are inseparable.

A. The truth practiced (vv. 4-6)

V. 4. Evidently John had encountered members of this church (some of your children; cf. v. 1) somewhere and was delighted (it has given me great joy; cf. 3 John 3-4) to observe their obedience to the truth. He used their fidelity, which he had observed, as a positive starting point. What they were doing (walking in the truth; cf. 3 John 3-4) was precisely what the Father commanded. To walk in the truth is to be obedient to the truth God has made known. John wanted the whole church to do the same.

V. 5. In his final reference to the church under personification (until v. 13), John enjoined it as a dear lady. What he wrote to the church was not some new requirement but one the church has had from the beginning (cf. v. 6). (For the same idea, see 1 John 2:7.) It is nothing other than the command that we love one another. As in the larger epistle, the apostle encouraged his readers to follow the old ways as he sought to help them resist the innovations of the antichrists (2 John 7).

V. 6. But what does it mean to "love one another"? The answer: This is love, that we walk in obedience to His commands. As he had also done in 1 John 5:2-3a, John defined Christian love in terms of obedience to God. A Christian who truly seeks God's best for his brothers and sisters can only do so by obeying what God has commanded him to do. Love undirected by God's revealed will may easily degenerate into unwise, sentimental activity. Believers who are "walking in the truth" (2 John 4), that is, living in response to what God has revealed, love each other. Brotherly love is part of the truth God has revealed and commanded.

The latter part of verse 6 is difficult in the original. The NIV rendering could be essentially correct (though the words in love interpretively render the Gr. en autē, "in it"). An alternative rendering would be, "And this is the command, that you walk in it as you have heard from the beginning." Under this construction of the text, John was affirming that obeying God's commands meant adhering to what had been commanded in the form in which it was expressed from the beginning. Taken in this way, the writer's words were designed to warn against any "reinterpretation" of God's will, such as the antichrists might propose.

The movement from the plural "commands" (v. 6a) to the singular command (v. 6b) is natural for this author (cf. 1 John 3:22-23). The many specifics of God's will can be thought of as a single obligation.

B. The truth protected (vv. 7-11)

V. 7. This verse is more closely linked in thought with verse 6 than the English rendering suggests. A Greek conjunction meaning "because" (hoti) has been left untranslated. The reason for John's previous admonition is that many deceivers, who do not acknowledge Jesus Christ as coming in the flesh, have gone out into the world. As in the first epistle, the apostle expressed his concern that many false teachers had arisen (cf. 1 John 2:18; 4:1). These teachers were "deceivers" (planoi, "ones who lead astray"; cf. planaō, "lead astray," in 1 John 2:26; 3:7). Their very number (as well as a probable variety of erroneous ideas) made them a substantial threat to Christian churches such as this one. What bound the false teachers and their views together was their unbelief and rejection of Christ's Incarnation.

The present participle "coming" (in the phrase "coming in the flesh") focuses on the principle involved in the Incarnation: Jesus taking on (coming in) and continuing with a human nature (cf. 1 John 4:2). This truth about "Jesus Christ . . . coming in the flesh" is what the deceivers denied. Some taught that Jesus' body was not truly human; it only appeared that way. That, of course, contradicted the truth of the Incarnation, that Jesus Christ is both fully God and fully human (Col. 2:9).

Such a denial marks that person as a deceiver as well as an antichrist. (See comments on 1 John 2:18). The word the before "deceiver" and "antichrist" could be misunderstood. The English article "a" (rather than "the") is sometimes appropriate for rendering the Greek definite article when an unnamed individual is in view. John did not mean to say here that "any such person" is the unique, end-time figure known as the Antichrist.

V. 8. Because of the appearance of these deceivers, the readers needed to watch out for the disastrous spiritual effects which any compromise with their ideas could lead to. The danger is not loss of salvation, of course, but loss of reward. The NIV uses the second person verb (you) for all three of the statements in this verse. But "we" (following most mss.) is preferred: "that we lose not those things which we have wrought, but that we receive a full reward" (KJV). Early scribes and editors may have altered the "we" to "you" in these places to avoid the suggestion that the apostle could share in a loss of reward. But the author's touch was both delicate and humble. He regarded himself as a co-laborer with his readers and their loss would be shared by him if they did not effectively resist false doctrine. The antichrists were a threat to the work of the Lord in which he and they were mutually engaged. It should be noted that the phrase be rewarded fully shows that failure by the readers would not totally deprive them of reward. God would not forget what they had done for Him (cf. Heb. 6:10). But the fullness of their reward (cf. 1 Cor. 3:11-15) was threatened by the subversion of the antichrists.

V. 9. The danger is now spelled out clearly. Anyone who runs ahead (proagōn; most mss. read "turns aside," parabainōn) and does not continue in the teaching of Christ does not have God. These words suggest strongly that the apostle was thinking here of defection from the truth by those who had once held to it. The word "continue" renders the Greek verb menō, familiar because of its frequent use (23 times) in 1 John in reference to the "abiding" life. A person who "does not continue" in a thing has evidently once been in it. The New Testament writers were realists about the possibility of true Christians falling prey to heresy and warned against it (cf. comments on the Book of Heb.). John had just cautioned his readers about possible loss of reward (2 John 8). They were thus now (v. 9) cautioned not to "overstep" the boundaries of sound doctrine, but to "remain" where they were, to "continue in the teaching (didachē; cf. v. 10) of (i.e., about) Christ." To deviate from the truth is to leave God behind. God is not with a person who does so. What such a person does, he does without God. This, of course, does not suggest loss of salvation. Instead it points to a doctrinal deviation, with its accompanying disobedience.

In contrast with the defector from the truth, whoever continues in the teaching has both the Father and the Son. This says that God is with those who persist in the true doctrine about Christ. (Here may also be another subtle affirmation of the deity of Christ; cf. v. 3.) But John no doubt had more in mind than mere creedal orthodoxy. He used menō, his characteristic word in the Johannine Epistles for the life of fellowship with the Father and Son, for the second time in verse 9. The roots of its significance in these letters are in texts such as John 8:31 and 15:1-7. For John, a person who "continues in the teaching" is one who "abides" or "makes his home" there. His connection with the truth is vital and dynamic, so he has a dynamic relationship with God whose commands he obeys (cf. John 14:21-23 for another expression of this kind of relationship). "Abiding" and obedience are inseparable in Johannine thought.

Vv. 10-11. But "continuing" in the truth about Jesus Christ calls for a firm response against those who have become purveyors of false doctrine. Hence John added, If anyone comes to you and does not bring this teaching, do not take him into your house or welcome him. In the Greco-Roman world of John's day, a traveling philosopher or religious teacher was a familiar phenomenon. Christian preachers also traveled and relied on local believers for support and hospitality (3 John 5-8). But the readers of 2 John were urged to be discriminating. If someone "comes" to them (the implication is "in the role of a traveling teacher") without also bringing sound doctrine (didachēn), he should be refused help. The Greek verb for "bring" is pherō ("to carry"), which continues the travel motif. If the truth is not part of his "baggage," he should receive no hospitality from those who are loyal to that truth. (By contrast, hospitality is to be shown to true believers [3 John 5, 8].) But a deceiver is not even to be given a greeting of welcome, since to do so would be to share in his wicked (ponērois, "evil"; cf. "the evil one" [to ponēron], 1 John 2:13-14) work. "Welcome him" (2 John 10-11) is literally, "Say 'Greetings' to him." In Greek "greetings" here is chairein, related to chairō, "to rejoice, be glad." Chairein was used as a cordial address of welcome or farewell, something like "I am glad to see you" or "I wish you well" (cf. Acts 15:23; 23:26; James 1:1).

To some modern minds these instructions seem unduly rigid and harsh. A great part of the problem, however, lies in the modern inclination to be highly tolerant of religious differences. One must frankly face the fact that the New Testament writers did not share this spirit of toleration. Their commitment to the truth and their consciousness of the dangers of religious error called forth many stern denunciations of false teachers. Not surprisingly, this modern age, having a diminishing sense of the dangers of heresy, has lost its convictions about the truth.

But the passage ought not to be taken beyond the writer's intent. He was thinking about false teachers actively engaged in disseminating error. In this activity they are not to be helped at all. Even a word of greeting might tend to give them a sense of acceptance that could be misconstrued. The readers were to make plain from their aloofness that they in no way condoned the activities of these men. The same must be true today. But John did not directly address the question of how efforts should be made to win such people to a recognition of the truth. Yet it is clear that any such efforts must be conducted so that they are not confused with any form of approbation.

III. Farewell (vv. 12-13)

The author's farewell is similar to his words in 3 John 13 (cf. "I have much to write you"; "I do not want to use [do so with] pen and ink"; "I hope to visit [see] you"; "talk . . . face to face"). Like the format of the letter as a whole, such conclusions were probably conventional. But this in no way suggests that they were insincere.

V. 12. John indicated that he had much to write to them but preferred face-to-face communication. He anticipated a visit soon, when he would have more to say to them. Such a personal visit would make his joy (chara) complete. What he might have written if he had not been planning to see them can perhaps be surmised from the contents of 1 John. Indeed, in some respects, 2 John reads like a condensed version of the first epistle. It is likely that the author would have amplified his admonitions in ways similar to what he had done in the larger letter.

V. 13. John gave farewell greetings from the children of your chosen sister. If this letter were written to an actual Christian woman, one would expect the greetings to come from her sister, not from her sister's children. Because of the anonymity of the references to people, once again it seems easiest to construe this as a greeting sent by the members ("children," cf. v. 1) of a "sister" church to the church to which John was writing (see the Introduction)—both "lady" churches having been "chosen" (elected) by God's sovereign grace. As such it gives testimony to the network of Christian interest and concern which united the members of different churches in the earliest years of the faith.

3 JOHN

Zane C. Hodges

INTRODUCTION

Third John is a personal letter written to a specific person, a man named Gaius. If, as seems probable, 2 John was written to a church, 3 John and Philemon are the only personal letters in the New Testament. The Pastoral Epistles (1 and 2 Tim., Titus), though addressed to individuals, were probably intended for public reading. Thus the Apostle John's epistle to Gaius is a precious fragment of early Christian correspondence. Its spiritual character is evident.

Authorship. As in 2 John, the writer called himself simply "the elder." In all probability this suggests not only his seniority (presbyteros means "old man") but also his authority as an eyewitness to the life of Christ. (See the Introduction to 2 John.) The style of the epistle is manifestly the same as that of both 1 and 2 John, and efforts to deny that a single author produced all three carry no conviction. The ancient opinion that the Apostle John wrote this letter, as well as the other two, may be readily accepted. The arguments that support apostolic authorship of 1 John carry over to this tiny epistle by virtue of the clear stylistic ties. Moreover, the self-confident authority of the writer of 3 John (cf. v. 10) also befits an apostle.

Background. Where Gaius (v. 1) lived is not specified. It is likely that he belonged to a church somewhere in Roman Asia (western Turkey). Tradition assigns the Apostle John a role in this area, as does the Book of Revelation. The writer seems to have been urging Gaius to show hospitality to Demetrius (v. 12) who was evidently a traveling Christian preacher (vv. 5-8). Demetrius was probably also the bearer of the letter.

The Apostle John apparently needed to appeal directly to Gaius for the support of Demetrius, since the church was dominated by a man named Diotrephes who did not extend a welcome to traveling brethren (vv. 9-10). Indeed, Diotrephes even sought to excommunicate those who offered such men their hospitality. If Gaius was a member of this same church, he might possibly have run a risk of incurring Diotrephes' wrath as well. But conceivably Gaius was a man of some means who could not be easily driven from the church. The suggestion that Gaius belonged to a different church than did Diotrephes does not seem probable in the light of verse 9 with its simple reference to "the church."

Diotrephes may possibly be an early (and unfavorable) example of a monarchical bishop. Out of the earliest ecclesiastical situation in which a body of elders of equal authority ruled the congregations, a system emerged in which one man assumed prominence over the other elders and became the "bishop" (though this title was originally synonymous with that of elder). This process must often have happened almost imperceptibly when a man of strong character gained ascendancy over the rest of the leadership. But in the church to which Gaius evidently belonged, the process had led to the prominence of a self-willed and authoritarian individual. Diotrephes' reasons for refusing to receive traveling brethren were not spelled out specifically by John. No doubt Diotrephes rationalized his conduct in some way. But the apostle made it plain that what Diotrephes did was wrong (cf. v. 11). He expected to correct the situation when he arrived (v. 10).

Date. As with 2 John, no independent data exists on which to base a date for the writing of 3 John. It is simplest to suggest a date for all three epistles sometime in the early 60s of the Christian era.

COMMENTARY

I. Salutation (vv. 1-4)

V. 1. The elder (see "Authorship" under Introduction) briefly greeted the recipient of this letter affectionately. This salutation is unlike most New Testament Epistles, in that it lacks the usual wish for grace and peace. However, the farewell includes "Peace to you" (v. 14).

My dear friend translates the Greek tō agapētō ("the beloved"), related to the verb agapō (I love). The spirit of Christian love prevailed in the elder's attitude toward Gaius. It is precisely this same spirit which was to dictate Gaius' attitude toward traveling preachers such as Demetrius. Three times more the writer addressed Gaius with this same significant term of address (vv. 2, 5, 11).

Moreover, the apostle's love for Gaius was in the truth, that is, it was genuine and in accord with God's truth. In the same way Gaius was to express his Christian love by a hospitality that supported the truth (cf. v. 8). As in John's two earlier epistles, the thought of this letter is dominated by concern for truth and love in Christian experience ("truth": vv. 1, 3 [twice], 4, 8, 12; "true": v. 12; "love": vv. 1, 6).

V. 2. The elder was pleased with Gaius' spiritual condition and wished that he might get along equally well on a physical level. As verses 2-6 show, Gaius was evidently an outstanding spiritual man. The words I pray that you may enjoy good health and that all may go well with you are not a mere conventional expression of good wishes. The apostle was concerned for the temporal well-being of others, and not only for their spiritual welfare. He must surely have learned this from Jesus whose concern for people's physical troubles is attested in all four Gospels. Certainly this is a biblical warrant for Christians today to pray for the temporal needs of their spiritual peers.

V. 3. The elder was glad (cf. v. 4) to have learned from some brothers about Gaius' loyalty to the truth. The words, tell about your faithfulness to the truth, somewhat paraphrase the Greek which more literally reads, "witness to your truth." The apostle was saying he had heard that Gaius was a man of the truth. Quite possibly the "brothers" who brought this testimony to John had enjoyed Gaius' hospitality, the same thing which the writer apparently urged on behalf of Demetrius (v. 10). The words, and how you continue to walk in the truth, elaborate what the "brothers" had said about Gaius. Gaius' style of life (his "walk") was consistent with God's truth.

V. 4. Nothing made John happier (cf. v. 3) than to hear that his children were walking in the truth. This wording is similar to that in 2 John 4. It is possible that by referring to Gaius as one of his "children," John meant that Gaius was a convert of his (cf. Paul's use of this idea in 1 Cor. 4:14; Gal. 4:19; Phil. 2:22). On the other hand the elderly apostle may simply have thought of those to whom he ministered from a paternal perspective, with fatherly concern.

II. Body of the Epistle (vv. 5-12)

After praising the general conduct of Gaius, the writer moved directly to a matter that concerned him. Those who go forth to preach the truth need the support of Christians in the places where they travel. Unlike Diotrephes, Gaius gave this kind of assistance and the apostle wished to assure him that this was the proper course of action. This contrasts, interestingly, with the emphasis in 2 John 10-11 on not giving hospitality to false teachers.

A. Commendation of Gaius (vv. 5-8)

V. 5. Addressing Gaius again as "beloved" (dear friend; cf. vv. 1, 2, 11), the writer commended his hospitality to Christians who came his way. The NIV adopts a form of text in which brothers and strangers are equated. But many manuscripts read, "for the brothers and for strangers." Read in this way, the writer would refer to the traveling preachers as "the brothers," while also asserting that Gaius' hospitality did not stop there but extended also to "strangers" (probably esp. Christians) who happened to be in the vicinity. (Regarding Christian responsibility to entertain strangers, see Heb. 13:2.) About this course of conduct, the apostle declared, You are faithful in what you are doing. That is to say, such conduct is praiseworthy because it is an act of fidelity to the truth of God. Again, as in 2 John 1-2, love stems from truth.

V. 6. The report of Gaius' hospitality (your love) had reached the church where John now was. This may well have been the church at Jerusalem if the epistle was written before A.D. 66 (cf. Introduction to 1 John for a discussion of the possibility that the first epistle was written before that date). Undoubtedly, if this is so, Gaius would have been pleased to know that the highly respected Jerusalem congregation had heard of his service to the servants of God. But John now followed up this encouragement with an exhortation: You will do well to send them on their way in a manner worthy of God. The words "you will do well" are idiomatic in the original and virtually equal to "please." The verb for "send . . . on their way" (propempsas) no doubt carried in general usage the connotation of making adequate provisions for one's guests, both while they stayed and at the time of their departure. The force of the apostle's words was to enjoin on Gaius an openhanded generosity toward the traveling brethren. Nothing less than such generosity would be "worthy of God," who expressed His supreme generosity in the giving of His Son.

V. 7. The reason for such behavior (the verse begins in the Gr. with the untranslated "for," gar) is that those whom Gaius should help have gone out for the sake of the Name. The "Name" here is, of course, that of Jesus which was now exalted above every name (Phil. 2:9-11). To go out on behalf of that Name was a supreme honor (cf. Acts 5:41 for the honor of suffering for it). Naturally, it was inappropriate for those who did so to seek support from those who did not believe in or honor that Name. Thus the Lord's servants went out, receiving no help from the pagans. Even in the present day, there is something unseemly in a preacher of the gospel soliciting funds from people to whom he offers God's free salvation.

V. 8. But the fact that faithful Christian preachers sought no help from the unsaved meant that Christians were under a special obligation to assist them. By extending the needed help (showing hospitality to such men), Christians such as Gaius could work together for the truth. This last phrase might be better rendered "be fellow workers with the truth" (NASB). The thought is of partnership with what the truth accomplishes in people's hearts and lives. It was a noble objective for Gaius to follow.

B. Condemnation of Diotrephes (vv. 9-11)

V. 9. Not everyone shared this worthy objective, however. John stated, I wrote to the church, but Diotrephes, who loves to be first, will have nothing to do with us. The simple reference to "the church" suggests strongly that this was the church to which Gaius belonged. It sounds as if Gaius may not have known about John's letter to the church. It may well be that Diotrephes had suppressed it and kept it from the church's attention. Diotrephes, John observed, was motivated by a love for preeminence in the church. He was not the last church leader to be so motivated. The temptation to use a role in the Christian assembly as a means of self-gratification remains a real one that all servants of God need to resist. As a result of his personal ambitions, Diotrephes resisted the apostle's wishes. The expression, "will have nothing to do with us," may also be translated, "does not welcome us as guests." The apostle was probably thinking of Diotrephes' refusal to accord hospitality to the traveling brethren (cf. v. 5) who came to the church (perhaps with the letter just mentioned), and he took Diotrephes' rejection of the brothers as a rejection of himself. Quite possibly Diotrephes did not present himself as a personal opponent of John, but in rejecting John's representatives he was rejecting John (cf. John 13:20).

V. 10. The writer, however, knew that he could deal with this matter in person. So if I come, I will call attention to what he is doing. This assertion should probably be taken as an understatement. The verb (hypomnēsō) means basically "to remind" or "to call to mind." Here the phrase might be translated, "I will call his works to mind" with the manifest implication that Diotrephes' works would be dealt with appropriately.

Diotrephes, the writer asserted, had been guilty of three things. First, he was gossiping maliciously about us. These words are literally "bringing false charges (phlyarōn, used only here in the NT) against us with evil (ponērois) words." No doubt that self-willed leader did his best to tear down the reputation of those whom he was not prepared to receive (as in v. 9, the "us" may refer chiefly to John's representatives).

But Diotrephes went beyond mere talk, wrong as that was. Not satisfied with that, he refuses to welcome the brothers. This was his second wrongdoing. His malicious prattle no doubt laid the groundwork for actual refusal of hospitality (in contrast with Gaius' hospitality). And, third, like many other ecclesiastical dictators since his time, Diotrephes did all he could to enforce his will on others: He also stops those who want to do so and puts them out of the church. Using his self-acclaimed authority, having a prominent position (v. 9), he forced other believers to be inhospitable or, if they weren't, even prevented them from gathering with the church.

Perhaps Gaius already knew most of these facts. It is likely that John was indirectly reminding him of the potential difficulties he faced in welcoming men who served the truth. But Gaius' obvious dedication to hospitality (vv. 5-6) suggests that he was a man of some means and probably in a good position to resist the authority of Diotrephes. He would be further encouraged by John's promise that he would deal with Diotrephes when he arrived.

V. 11. At any rate, Gaius was not to imitate what is evil but what is good. Diotrephes' behavior was to be avoided, not copied. One's conduct clearly reflects one's relationship with God. Anyone who does what is good is from God. The words "from God" translate the Greek phrase ek tou theou, which occurs a number of times in 1 John (e.g., 3:10; 4:1-4, 6-7). It suggests that the source of one's actions or attitudes is in God. Conversely, anyone who does what is evil has not seen God. With this, the statement of 1 John 3:6 should be compared (see the discussion on that verse). The assertion should not be watered down. Evil never arises from a real spiritual perception of God but is always a product of darkness of heart and blindness toward Him. John was not questioning Diotrephes' salvation, but he was affirming that Diotrephes' conduct manifested real blindness toward God. Gaius was to be careful to shun such an experience as this.

C. Recommendation of Demetrius (v. 12)

V. 12. If Gaius would indeed "imitate what is . . . good" (cf. v. 11), he would extend hospitality to Demetrius. This is not explicitly requested, but seems the obvious implication of John's recommendation of Demetrius. In accordance with the Jewish law of witnesses (Deut. 19:15), the apostle adduced a threefold testimony to the character of Demetrius. (1) He was well spoken of by everyone who knew him. (2) He was also vouched for by the truth itself. Here the truth is personified as a "witness" and John no doubt meant that Demetrius' character and doctrine were in such conformity with that truth that the truth itself virtually spoke on his behalf. (3) As a third line of testimony, John wrote, we also speak well of him, and you know that our testimony is true. John himself could personally attest the worth of this man. Thus Gaius had no reason to hesitate showing Demetrius the kind of hospitality he had shown others. (The Demetrius of this letter is not to be confused with the Demetrius of Acts 19:24, an enemy of the gospel.)

III. Farewell (vv. 13-14)

Vv. 13-14a. John was now finished with what he wished to say in this short letter, but he still had much to write to Gaius. He could have said much more in writing, but (as he had also written in 2 John) he hoped to be able soon to communicate those things face to face.

V. 14b. The apostle wished Gaius peace and passed on greetings from the friends here. Similarly, he wanted Gaius to greet the friends there by name. The use of the term "friends" twice in these closing statements is perhaps one final reminder to Gaius that Christians in every place are or should be a network of friends who are ready to help one another whenever a need arises. It is part of the genius of Christianity that one can meet people whom he has never seen before, in places far from home, and discover through a shared faith an immediate bond of friendship.

JUDE

Edward C. Pentecost

INTRODUCTION

Authorship. The writer of the Epistle of Jude, the last of the "General Epistles," introduced his letter with one simple declaration about himself: "Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ, and a brother of James" (v. 1).

Who was this Jude? Three possibilities exist. The author may be either (a) Judas, a half brother of Christ, or (b) Judas, the apostle, or (c) Judas, a leader in the early church of Jerusalem. This latter Judas was sent to Antioch with Paul, Barnabas, and Silas (Acts 15:22). His surname was Barsabbas, indicating that he could have been a brother of Joseph Barsabbas, who was one of two "nominees" to replace Judas Iscariot (Acts 1:23). Thus he would have been known in the church. But little other evidence points to this individual as the author of this epistle.

As to whether he was the Apostle Jude, verse 17 in his letter seems to indicate that he did not consider himself to be an apostle, though modesty could have led him to write as he did. However, the important subject that he wrote about would probably have called for his identifying himself with the other apostles, for authority's sake, if he really was an apostle.

The most probable identification is that the author Jude was a half brother of Christ, a son of Joseph and Mary after Jesus. The term "servant" would be fitting, for though at first Jesus' brothers did not believe in Him (John 7:5), yet later they saw the resurrected Christ and were convinced (Acts 1:14). Among these was Judas, who did not consider himself worthy to call himself a "brother" but just a "servant" of Jesus Christ.

The James referred to by Jude as his brother was thus also a half brother of the Lord (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3), as well as a leader of the church at Jerusalem (Acts 15:13), and author of the epistle bearing his name (James 1:1).

Jude wrote with a heart of love and understanding, and with a note of concern and authority. He wanted to write on a joyful theme, "about the salvation we share" (Jude 3), but was compelled to write a much more somber epistle. His love for believers whom he saw endangered by encroaching adversaries moved him to turn from the more pleasant theme to sound a solemn warning.

Style. Jude wrote in a dynamic style, using many figures of speech (e.g., shepherds, clouds, and trees, v. 12; and waves and stars, v. 13).

Jude frequently wrote in triads, with some commentators discerning as many as 18 such series. Outstanding among them are his introduction: "Jude . . . servant . . . brother" (v. 1); his address: "to those . . . called . . . loved . . . kept" (v. 1); his greetings: "mercy, peace, and love" (v. 2); his description of the apostates: "godless men . . . change the grace of our Lord . . . deny Jesus Christ" (v. 4); his examples of other apostates who were judged: "people out of Egypt . . . angels . . . Sodom and Gomorrah and the surrounding towns" (vv. 5-7); his description of these heretical "dreamers": "pollute their own bodies . . . reject authority . . . slander celestial beings" (v. 8); his description elaborated: "taken the way of Cain . . . rushed for profit into Balaam's error . . . destroyed in Korah's rebellion" (v. 11).

Then Jude went beyond the triad, adding figure on figure, to emphasize his denouncement of the apostates. He called them "blemishes . . . [selfish] shepherds . . . clouds without rain . . . autumn trees without fruit . . . wild waves . . . wandering stars" (vv. 12-13).

In other trilogies Jude said these "grumblers and fault-finders" "follow their own evil desires . . . boast about themselves . . . and flatter others" (v. 16), and were characterized as those who "divide you . . . follow mere natural instincts . . . do not have the Spirit" (v. 19). Jude's readers were to "be merciful . . . snatch others from the fire . . . to others show mercy" (vv. 22-23).

Jude frequently referred to the Old Testament. He spoke of the Exodus (v. 5), the death of many Israelites in the wilderness (v. 5), Sodom and Gomorrah (v. 7), Moses' body (v. 9), Cain (v. 11), Balaam (v. 11), Korah (v. 11), Enoch (v. 14), and Adam (v. 14).

Date. Scholars disagree on the date of the writing of this book because Jude did not directly identify either the assembly he addressed the epistle to or the exact heretical group about whom he was writing. Most commentators, however, assign the date between A.D. 67 and 80. Jude was probably influenced by Peter, who wrote his second epistle about A.D. 67-68. (Peter predicted that false teachers would arise [2 Peter 2:1; 3:3], but Jude stated that they have "slipped in among you" [Jude 4].) And the antinomian Gnostic heresy (to which Jude may have been responding), was beginning to make its influence felt in the first century.

Purpose. One thought characterizes this epistle: beware of the apostates. In keeping with this warning, Jude proceeded to sound an exhortation to his readers to "contend for the faith" (v. 3). The heresy of Gnosticism had raised its head. "Here, in an undeveloped form, are all the main characteristics which went to make up later Gnosticism—emphasis on knowledge which was emancipated from the claims of morality; arrogance toward 'unenlightened' church leaders; interest in angelology; divisiveness; lasciviousness" (Michael Green, The Second Epistle General of Peter and the General Epistle of Jude, p. 39).

The incipient Gnostics against whom Jude warned were denying the lordship of Christ (v. 4), exercising sinful license (vv. 4, 8, 16), rebelling against authority (vv. 8, 11, 18), giving in to their own desires (vv. 16, 19), being concerned only with gain for themselves (vv. 11-12, 16), being divisive (v. 19), fault-finding (v. 16), and boasting (v. 16).

Gnosticism declared that the spirit was good and the material was evil. Therefore the spiritual was to be cultivated and fed, with freedom to pursue its good inclinations. In addition Gnostics felt free to give vent to the desires of the flesh. Thus the heart of this apostasy was that it turned the grace of God into license and lasciviousness. Jude wrote to warn of this dual apostasy of wrong conduct and false doctrine.

Original Readers. The tone of the letter demonstrates that the original recipients may have been Christian Jews of Palestine who were gathered into local fellowships. The references made to Old Testament incidents and to extrabiblical literature identified the recipients as people who would understand these references with no need for explanation. Egypt, Sodom and Gomorrah, Moses, Cain, Balaam, Korah, Enoch, Adam, and the fallen angels all point to a people familiar with Old Testament history and possibly apocryphal literature.

Application. The book is a solemn warning to Christians everywhere, since all are subject to the same doctrinal and practical errors. Though its theme regarding apostasy was specifically directed to first-century Jewish Christians, its message is applicable to all Christians. All believers need to avoid the pitfalls of denying Christ's lordship, promiscuously following the fleshly desires, rejecting authority, being divisive, and living for self.

COMMENTARY

I. Salutation (vv. 1-2)

V. 1. The author introduced himself simply as Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ and a brother of James. He made no appeal to his readers on the basis of his personal authority. He was satisfied with being identified as a "servant" (doulos, "bondslave") of Jesus Christ. (For a discussion of the identity of this Jude, see the Introduction.)

Jude's epistle was directed to those who have been called, who are loved by God the Father, and kept by Jesus Christ. This threefold description of the people of God is one of many triads in this letter. The first expression "to those who have been called" reflects on the past—God's sovereign call to salvation in His electing grace (cf. Rom. 1:6; 8:30; 1 Cor. 1:24; Eph. 4:4; 2 Peter 1:3). The phrase "who are loved by God the Father" refers to the present. The verbal form of "loved" indicates that God's love was manifested in the past but also continues in the present. His third description, "kept by Jesus Christ," expresses the most positive assurance regarding the future, for He preserves those who trust Him till His coming (1 Thes. 5:23; 2 Tim. 1:12; 1 Peter 1:5; Jude 24). The calling is the active work of the Holy Spirit; the love emanates from the Father (cf. 2 Cor. 13:14); and the keeping work is the ministry of the Son. Thus the entire Godhead is included in Jude's salutation. The knowledge of God's calling, loving, and keeping brings believers assurance and peace during times of apostasy.

Each of these points in Jude's address seem to be alluded to later in the epistle: the calling may be hinted at in the words "the salvation we share" (v. 3), the love of God is mentioned in verse 21, and the keeping power of Jesus may be implied in the words, "as you wait for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ to bring you to eternal life" (v. 21; cf. v. 24).

V. 2. The divine provisions of mercy, peace, and love included in Jude's greeting are needed by Christians living in the licentious atmosphere of apostate teaching. God's mercy can sustain them in times of difficulty (Heb. 4:16); His peace can give a subtle calmness when evil abounds (Rom. 15:13; Phil. 4:7); and His love can protect and assure believers in the face of peril (Rom. 5:5; 1 John 4:12, 15-16).

The nature of the salutation reflects the writer's attitude. Jude's choice of words introduces his deep-seated compassion and heartfelt concern for his readers. He longed for them to know in the fullest measure God's "mercy, peace, and love." Jude overflowed with love for the believers while warning them about those who were making their way into the church to destroy it, those who knew nothing of God's mercy, peace, or love.

II. Warnings concerning Apostates (vv. 3-4)

Vv. 3-4. Wishing to write of the more pleasant theme of salvation, Jude was forced by his concern to write on an urgent and abhorrent theme. Circumstances had arisen that demanded immediate action, thus presenting an emergency situation. Jude addressed himself to a recognized problem, and exhorted the believers to respond with positive determination.

Jude got directly to the point: I . . . urge you to contend for the faith. Then he proceeded to tell his readers why he was so concerned. Godless men had secretly slipped in among them. They had joined the assemblies of believers, pretending to belong with them when actually they were enemies.

Jude's words were written to those who shared faith and salvation. His words were a warning to the believers to beware of those apostates who had made their way into local assemblies and would destroy if possible the foundation of faith on which the church was built.

"The faith" that God had once for all entrusted to the saints is the body of truths taught by the apostles. The term "the faith," used also in Galatians 1:23 and 1 Timothy 4:1, refers to things believed. The false teachings of the apostates called for the believers to contend (epagōnizesthai, "agonize earnestly") with all diligence in defense of those truths, which ungodly men were trying to destroy. In effect Jude said, "Let us hold firmly to the faith we profess" (Heb. 4:14).

The intrusion of the libertines refers to outsiders who would poison the church and who should be rejected. These apostates were not followers of Christ who had erred, but intruders who did not belong and who sought to wreck the believers' faith.

The condemnation of these men, which was written about long ago, may refer to Old Testament prophecies (e.g., Isa. 8:19-22; Jer. 5:13-14). Their end is also predicted in the New Testament (e.g., 2 Thes. 2:6-10; 2 Peter 2:3).

Two characteristics identify these godless (asebeis, "irreverent"; cf. Jude 15) apostates: perverting God's grace, and rejecting God's Son.

Claiming liberty in Christ, they interpreted His grace as license to do what their flesh desired with no inhibitions. Their libertinism turned grace into barbarous licentiousness. These antinomians declared that since the flesh was not created by God, it was proper to give in to its desires. Not surprisingly, this perversion in practice was accompanied by a perversion in doctrine—a denial of the person and authority of Jesus Christ.

III. Warnings concerning the Peril of Apostasy (vv. 5-16)

Jude first warned his readers of the peril of apostasy by citing three examples from the past of apostates who were destroyed (vv. 5-7), and then by describing the upcoming judgment on present apostates (vv. 8-16).

A. Examples of apostates in the past (vv. 5-7)

1. EGYPT (V. 5)

V. 5. Egypt is mentioned as a reminder of the fact that most Israelites who left Egypt were not faithful. An entire generation perished in the wilderness because of their unbelief (cf. Heb. 3:16-19).

2. ANGELS (V. 6)

V. 6. Among the angels were those who had remained in their first abode and had been obedient to God. But others rebelled and left their first positions of authority and are now in darkness, bound . . . for judgment on the Great Day.

Jude's source of information for this statement is debated. Some feel that this may refer to Genesis 6:1-4, and that "the sons of God" who cohabited with "the daughters of men" on earth were the angels who left "their positions of authority" in disobedience to God. (But see the comments on Gen. 6:1-4.) Others feel Jude was making use of the apocryphal Book of Enoch. Since Jude did not identify his source, any decision is only conjecture. The way Jude referred to the angels gives reason to believe that this truth was well accepted by his readers and thus needed no further explanation.

3. SODOM AND GOMORRAH (V. 7)

V. 7. Jude's third illustration, of Sodom and Gomorrah and the surrounding towns, serves as a dreadful example of what happens to those who turn from God to follow their own lustful natures. The fate of the unbelievers in those two cities (Gen. 19:1-29) foreshadows the fate of those who deny God's truth and ignore His warnings. The punishment by fire on the perverse inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah illustrates the eternal fire of hell, which will be experienced by false teachers.

B. Actions of apostates in the present (vv. 8-16)

1. REJECTING AUTHORITY (VV. 8-10)

V. 8. Jude returned to the apostates within the church, altering the order of his historical references in verses 5-7. Those who pollute their own bodies are like Sodom and Gomorrah. "Pollute" is miainousin, literally, "defile, deprave" used elsewhere only in Titus 1:15 and Hebrews 12:15. Those who reject authority are like the unbelieving Israelites who rejected the authority of both Moses and Yahweh. Those who slander celestial beings recall the angels who abandoned their home. These three actions reveal their inner attitudes of physical immorality (cf. Rom. 1:24, 26-27; Eph. 4:19), intellectual insubordination, and spiritual irreverence. As dreamers, they are unrealistic in thinking their ways will bring satisfaction.

V. 9. The archangel Michael was sent to bury Moses' body, but according to Jewish tradition (the pseudepigraphical book, The Assumption of Moses), the devil argued with the angel about the body, apparently claiming the right to dispose of it. But Michael, though powerful and authoritative, did not dare dispute with Satan, so he left the matter in God's hands, saying, The Lord rebuke you! The false teachers Jude spoke of had no respect for authority or for angels. The apostates' slandering of celestial beings (v. 8) stands in arrogant contrast to the chief angelic being, Michael, who would not dare slander Satan, chief of the fallen angels.

V. 10. Whereas Michael did not dare accuse the devil, these apostates, by contrast spoke abusively against what they did not understand. This abusive speech may refer to their slandering of angels (v. 8). Their understanding was debased, for it followed only natural animal instinct. The apostates' only "reasoning" was like that of unreasoning animals. Rather than comprehending what was above them (the angels), they really understood only what was below them (the animals). Jude thus demolished their Gnostic claim to superior knowledge. And their understanding—polluting "their own bodies" (v. 8)—was, like the sin of Sodom, self-destructive.

2. WALKING IN ERROR (V. 11)

V. 11. Again Jude returned to one of his triads. The apostates erred in three respects so Jude said, Woe to them!

They have taken the way of Cain. This may mean either that they, like Cain, (a) disobediently devised their own ways of worship, (b) were envious of others, or (c) hated others with a murderous spirit (cf. 1 John 3:12).

They have rushed for profit into Balaam's error. Balaam, under the guise of serving God, encouraged others to sin, while at the same time seeking to gain monetarily from their error (2 Peter 2:15-16; Num. 22:21-31). Similarly the false leaders of Jude's day, greedy for money, led others into sin without recognizing the danger of their actions.

They have been destroyed in Korah's rebellion. Korah led a revolt against Moses and Aaron, not acknowledging that God had delegated authority to them (Num. 16). So their rebellion was actually against God Himself. Likewise the men of whom Jude spoke (perhaps local church leaders) rebelled against God's authority and as a result would be destroyed suddenly. That destruction was so certain that Jude stated in the past tense that "they have been destroyed."

3. LEADING FALSELY (VV. 12-13)

V. 12. Jude pointed out how craftily the apostates had moved into the church. They had made their way into the love feasts—which were the closest celebrations of believers—meals (indicated by the words eating with you), which were probably followed by the Lord's Supper. Yet these false teachers, though participating outwardly, were inwardly denying the Lord (v. 4b). This is the most outrageous blasphemy possible. Such men were thus blemishes that marred the inner beauty of the church. Furthermore they were intruding (cf. "secretly slipped in among you," v. 4a) without the slightest qualm or inhibition. "Blemishes" is spilades ("stains"); cf. the verb form espilōmenon ("stained") in verse 23. In staining others (v. 12) they stained themselves (v. 23).

In addition these unbelievers had taken a shepherding role, but did not function as shepherds. Instead of feeding the flock of God, they selfishly would feed only themselves. How unthinkable for a shepherd not to feed his sheep—which was his major responsibility! Their leadership was false, for it was deceptive, hardened, and selfish.

As leaders, these apostates were clouds without rain, blown along by the wind. This is the first of four vivid comparisons from nature in verses 12-13. These men had no water for thirsty souls; they only pretended that they did. And they were soon gone, unstable as wind-driven clouds.

As leaders these apostates were spiritually dead. A tree in the autumn (the time of gathering fruit from fruit trees) without fruit appears (or is) dead, and a fruitless tree that is uprooted is dead forever—thus it is twice dead. The dead condition of apostate leaders was indicated by two things: (a) they did not bear spiritual fruit in others, and (b) they were without spiritual roots themselves, and thus faced judgment.

V. 13. Like wild waves of the sea, raging back and forth and producing only froth on the shore, these apostates spewed their foam with nothing solid, edifying, helpful, or nourishing. What they produced was only shame, which their actions caused.

Wandering stars (i.e., "shooting" stars), move across the sky, shining briefly, and then vanish without producing light or giving direction. Fixed stars help guide navigators, but wandering stars are useless to them. If any shipmaster would be stupid enough to follow one, he would be led astray. Similarly the prominence of apostate leaders is short-lived, useless, and false. They do lead unwary followers astray, pretending to be what they are not. They will therefore be swallowed up into the blackest darkness forever; eternal judgment is certain for them.

These apostates were not unfruitful believers, who would not receive rewards in heaven at the judgment seat of Christ. Instead they were impostors who would be judged according to their evil deeds.

4. PLEASING SELF (VV. 14-16)

Vv. 14-15. The judgment on apostates, already mentioned in verses 4-7, 13, was now confirmed by a reference to a pre-Flood prophecy made by Enoch, the seventh from Adam (Gen. 5:4-20). However, scholars have puzzled over the absence of any reference in the Old Testament to this prophecy attributed to Enoch. Since Jude's statement is similar to a passage in the apocryphal Book of Enoch (1:9)—written prior to 110 B.C. and thus probably known by the early Christians—many assume that Jude is quoting from that book. Others suggest that the difference between Jude's words and the Book of Enoch indicate that Jude received the information about Enoch directly from God, or that under divine inspiration he recorded an oral tradition. None of these views affects the doctrine of inspiration adversely. If Jude quoted the apocryphal book, he was affirming only the truth of that prophecy and not endorsing the book in its entirety (cf. Paul's quotation of the Cretan poet Epimenides, in Titus 1:12).

Enoch's prophecy pointed to the glorious return of Christ to the earth with thousands upon thousands of His angels (holy ones) (Matt. 24:30; 2 Thes. 1:10), when His purpose will be to judge everyone (2 Thes. 1:7-10) and to convict all the ungodly with unanswerable evidence that their actions, manners, and words have been ungodly (asebeis, "irreverent"; cf. Jude 4). Jude's fourfold use of this word ungodly reinforces his description of their nature. Rather than being true spiritual leaders, they had spoken harsh words (cf. "speak abusively" in v. 10) against Jesus Christ whom they denied.

V. 16. Here Jude described the apostates in a fourfold way. These descriptions justify Enoch's calling them "ungodly." (a) They were grumblers and faultfinders who faulted others but saw no flaws in themselves; (b) they lustfully followed their own evil desires (cf. vv. 8, 10, 18-19); (c) they bragged about themselves (the word hyperonka, used only here and in 2 Peter 2:18, means to be "puffed up" or "swollen"); and (d) they flattered others, currying favor only when it was to their own evil advantage to do so. Vocally discontented, sinfully self-centered, extravagantly egotistical, and deceptively flattering—such are apostates, then and today.

Thus in unflinching terms Jude clearly identified the apostates, while at the same time exposing their character in order to warn believers of their true nature and their final destiny. He was laying the groundwork to call his readers to action against these ungodly men and their practices.

IV. Guidelines for Avoiding Apostasy (vv. 17-23)

Having identified the apostates in expressive language, Jude gave the believers guidelines on how to avoid the apostates' errors. It is not enough to recognize false teachers; it is also necessary to avoid falling into their errors.

A. Remembering the teaching of the apostles (vv. 17-19)

Vv. 17-19. Jude told his readers to remember what the apostles had foretold about scoffers. At Ephesus, Paul warned of the "savage wolves" that would come in to destroy the flock and distort the truth (Acts 20:29-30). He sounded similar warnings of apostasy to Timothy (1 Tim. 4:1; 2 Tim. 3:1-5; 4:3-4). Peter had addressed the same issue (2 Peter 2:1-3; 3:3-4). The quotation in Jude 18 is a loose rendering of Peter's words in 2 Peter 3:3, and at the same time it summarized Paul's warnings.

As stated in Jude 18-19, these intruders (a) scoffed (cf. vv. 10-15), (b) followed their own ungodly desires (cf. v. 16) and mere natural instincts (cf. vv. 10, 16), and (c) sought to divide believers. Such men obviously did not have the Holy Spirit and thus were not born again (Rom. 8:9).

B. Nurturing themselves (vv. 20-21)

Vv. 20-21. In addition to remembering what the apostles had said about the apostates, Jude's readers were to give attention to themselves. Here is the heart of his message: build yourselves up in your most holy faith . . . pray in the Holy Spirit, keep yourselves in God's love and wait for Christ's return. (The NIV seems to suggest four exhortations, but the Greek has three parallel participles—building, praying, expecting—and one command, keep. The evident contrast of these actions to the scoffers was introduced by the words But you. And for the third time Jude addressed his readers as dear friends (vv. 3, 17, 20).

Personal edification ("build yourselves up") comes from progressing in the knowledge of "your most holy faith." This "faith that was once for all entrusted to the saints" (v. 3) was the teaching of the apostles now recorded in the Scriptures, to be studied (Acts 20:32; 2 Tim. 2:15).

Praying in the Holy Spirit is not speaking in tongues, but is "praying out of hearts and souls that are indwelt, illuminated, and filled with the Holy Spirit" (George Lawrence Lawlor, Translation and Exposition of the Epistle of Jude, p. 127). It is praying in the power of the Holy Spirit (cf. Eph. 6:18).

Keeping oneself "in God's love" (Jude 21) does not indicate that salvation depends on one's own efforts, for that would contradict other Scripture passages (e.g., v. 24). Instead, a believer is nurtured as he is occupied with God's love for him, and is in fellowship with Him (cf. John 15:9-10, "remain in My love").

Waiting (prosdechomenoi, "looking expectantly") for the blessed hope, the return of Christ for His church, is a fourth means of personal nurture. Waiting for that event is waiting for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ in the sense that the Rapture will be the consummating evidence of His mercy. Jude added that it will bring you to eternal life, that is, to enjoying never-ending life in God's own presence (cf. 1 Peter 1:5, 9, 13).

C. Being merciful to others (vv. 22-23)

Vv. 22-23. Because the words of the apostates were confusing, probably many believers were in doubt as to whether to follow them. Such persons, Jude wrote, should not be slandered or criticized. They should be dealt with in love and mercy—the same way in which the Lord dealt with them (cf. v. 21). They needed encouragement, not criticism. They needed to be built up, not torn down.

Others—those who are unsaved—were about to fall into the fire, the eternal fire of hell (cf. v. 7). Jude exhorted his readers to snatch them from the fire and save them.

To still others, a third group, believers should show mercy. But they were to do so in an attitude of fear, that is, caution, lest they become contaminated by the sin of "the most abandoned heretic" (Michael Green, The Second Epistle General of Peter and the General Epistle of Jude, p. 188). Such persons are so corrupt that the stench of death has polluted them and even their clothing, as it were, reeks with the odor of corrupted flesh (cf. comments on "stained" in v. 12).

In his short epistle, Jude gave seven commands to believers:

1. Earnestly contend for the faith (v. 3).
2. Remember the teaching and warning of the apostles (v. 17).
3. Build yourselves up in the most holy faith (v. 20).
4. Pray in the Holy Spirit (v. 20).
5. Keep yourselves in the love of God (v. 21).
6. Look for the mercy of the Lord to bring you to eternal life (v. 21).
7. Show mercy to Christians who are doubting, snatch unbelievers from the fire, and cautiously show mercy to the corrupt (vv. 22-23).

V. Victory over Apostasy (vv. 24-25)

Vv. 24-25. In this final paragraph Jude exploded with a most elevated doxology, answering the unexpressed question, "But who will deliver us from the apostates and the apostasy into which they lead the unsuspecting?" His proclamation was, praise be to Him who is able to keep you from falling. Victory over apostasy is found in Jesus Christ! He is the One who will "keep" believers. Christ will present believers to His Father without fault and with great joy—joy both for Himself and for them (Heb. 12:2; 1 Peter 1:8). Here is the greatest theme of victory to be sounded, the highest note of praise and adoration possible, and the greatest assurance for the redeemed. Jude attributes to God—to the only God our Savior . . . glory, majesty, power, and authority, which are all available to believers through the Victor, Jesus Christ our Lord. And this exalted position is true of God in eternity past, in the present, and for all eternity in the future.

Thus Jude fulfills his heart's desire of writing in the most joyful terms (Jude 3), for in Christ there is hope in victory, which gives believers joy and confidence.

REVELATION

John F. Walvoord

INTRODUCTION

Importance. The Book of Revelation is important because it is the last inspired book of the Bible to be written and is rightly positioned as the New Testament's final book. As the New Testament opens with the four Gospels relating to the first coming of Christ, so the Book of Revelation closes the New Testament with the general theme of the second coming of Christ. The Book of Revelation is also the climax of many lines of revelation running through both Testaments, and it brings to conclusion the revelation of many prophecies yet to be fulfilled.

The second coming of Christ and the years immediately preceding it are revealed in Revelation more graphically than in any other book of the Bible. The Book of Daniel describes in detail the period from Daniel's time to Christ's first coming and speaks briefly of the Tribulation and Christ's rule on earth. But the Book of Revelation amplifies the great end-time events with many additional details, culminating in the new heaven and the new earth.

Authorship. As the opening verses in Revelation plainly state, the book was written by John. From the first century to the present, orthodox Christians have almost unanimously agreed that he is the Apostle John. Dionysius was the first to dispute the Johannine authorship, and did so on the grounds that he disagreed with the book's theology and found many inaccuracies in its grammar. These objections were disregarded in the early church by most of the important fathers such as Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen. (For a full discussion see John F. Walvoord, The Revelation of Jesus Christ, pp. 11-4.) Practically all scholars today who accept the divine inspiration of the Book of Revelation also accept John the Apostle as its author. However, Erasmus, Luther, and Zwingli questioned the Johannine authorship because it teaches a literal 1,000-year reign of Christ.

Date. Most evangelical scholars affirm that Revelation was written in A.D. 95 or 96. This is based on accounts of the early church fathers that the Apostle John had been exiled on Patmos Island during the reign of Domitian who died in A.D. 96. John was then allowed to return to Ephesus.

Because of a statement by Papias, an early church father, that John the Apostle was martyred before A.D. 70, the Johannine authorship has been questioned. However, the accuracy of this quotation from Papias has been seriously challenged by statements by Clement of Alexandria and Eusebius who affirm that the book was written by John on Patmos in A.D. 95 or 96.

Inspiration and Canoncity. Those accepting John the Apostle as the author universally recognize the divine inspiration of Revelation and its rightful place in the Bible. Because its style differs from that of other New Testament books, acceptance of Revelation by early Christians was delayed by a rising opposition to premillennialism. The doctrine of the literal 1,000-year reign of Christ was rejected by some church leaders in the third and fourth centuries. The evidence, however, shows that orthodox theologians readily accepted the book as genuinely inspired. Early fathers who recognized the book as Scripture include Irenaeus, Justin Martyr, Eusebius, Apollonius, and Theophilus, the bishop of Antioch. By the beginning of the third century the book was widely quoted as Scripture. The fact that the Book of Revelation complements other inspired Scripture such as the Book of Daniel has confirmed its divine inspiration.

Style. Like the Old Testament Books of Daniel and Ezekiel, Revelation uses symbolic and apocalyptic forms of revelation extensively. The fact that symbols must be interpreted has led to many diverse interpretations. In most cases, however, the meaning of the symbolic revelation is found by comparing it with previous prophetic and apocalyptic revelation in the Old Testament. This has led many interpreters to view the Book of Revelation as presenting realistic predictions of the future. Its apocalyptic and symbolic character sharply contrasts with books of similar nature written outside the Bible which are classified as Pseudepigrapha. While many of these extrabiblical books are almost impossible to understand, Revelation, by contrast, presents a sensible view of the future in harmony with the rest of Scripture (cf. Walvoord, Revelation, pp. 23-30).

Interpretation. Because of its unusual character, Revelation has been approached from a number of interpretive principles, some of which raise serious questions concerning its value as divine authoritative revelation.

The allegorical or nonliteral approach. This form of interpretation was offered by the Alexandrian school of theology in the third and fourth centuries. It regards the entire Bible as an extensive allegory to be interpreted in a nonliteral sense. The allegorical interpretation of the Bible was later restricted largely to prophecy about the Millennium by Augustine (354–430), who interpreted Revelation as a chronicle of the spiritual conflict between God and Satan being fulfilled in the present Church Age. A liberal variation of this in modern times considers Revelation simply as a symbolic presentation of the concept of God's ultimate victory.

The preterist approach. A more respected approach is known as the preterist view which regards Revelation as a symbolic picture of early church conflicts which have been fulfilled. This view denies the future predictive quality of most of the Book of Revelation. In varying degrees this view combines the allegorical and symbolic interpretation with the concept that Revelation does not deal with specific future events. Still another variation of the preterist view regards Revelation as setting forth principles of divine dealings with man, without presenting specific events.

The historical approach. A popular view stemming from the Middle Ages is the historical approach which views Revelation as a symbolic picture of the total church history of the present Age between Christ's first and second comings. This view was advanced by Luther, Isaac Newton, Elliott, and many expositors of the postmillennial school of interpretation and has attained respectability in recent centuries. Its principal problem is that seldom do two interpreters interpret a given passage as referring to the same event. Each interpreter tends to find its fulfillment in his generation. Many have combined the historical interpretation with aspects of other forms of interpretation in order to bring out a devotional or spiritual teaching from the book. The preceding methods of interpretation tend to deny a literal future Millennium and also literal future events in the Book of Revelation.

The futuristic approach. The futuristic approach has been adopted by conservative scholars, usually premillenarians, who state that chapters 4–22 deal with events that are yet future today. The content of Revelation 4–18 describes the last seven years preceding the second coming of Christ and particularly emphasizes the Great Tribulation, occurring in the last three and one-half years before His coming.

Objections to this view usually stem from theological positions opposed to premillennialism. The charge is often made that the Book of Revelation would not have been a comfort to early Christians or understood by them if it were largely futuristic. Adherents of the futuristic school of interpretation insist, on the contrary, that future events described in Revelation bring comfort and reassurance to Christians who in the nature of their faith regard their ultimate victory as future. The futuristic interpretation, however, is demanding of the expositor as it requires him to reduce to tangible prophetic events the symbolic presentations which characterize the book.

Purpose. The purpose of the Book of Revelation is to reveal events which will take place immediately before, during, and following the second coming of Christ. In keeping with this purpose the book devotes most of its revelation to this subject in chapters 4–18. The Second Coming itself is given the most graphic portrayal anywhere in the Bible in chapter 19, followed by the millennial reign of Christ described in chapter 20. The eternal state is revealed in chapters 21–22. So the obvious purpose of the book is to complete the prophetic theme presented earlier in the prophecies of the Old Testament (e.g., Dan.) and the prophecies of Christ, especially in the Olivet Discourse (Matt. 24–25). Along with the predictive character of the Book of Revelation is extensive revelation in almost every important area of theology. In addition, many verses suggest practical applications of prophetic truths to a Christian's life. Specific knowledge and anticipation of God's future program is an incentive to holy living and commitment to Christ.

Application. In addition to passages that suggest practical application of prophetic truth, chapters 2–3 are especially important for they consist of messages to seven local churches which appropriately represent the entire church. The pointed message of Christ to each of these churches is the capstone to New Testament Epistles dealing with the practical life of those committed to the Christian faith. On the one hand believers are exhorted to holy living, and on the other hand unbelievers are warned of judgments to come. The book provides solid evidence that the righteous God will ultimately deal with human sin and bring to consummation the salvation of those who have trusted in Christ. A solemn warning is given to those who are unprepared to face the future. A day of reckoning, when every knee will bow to Christ (Phil. 2:10), is inevitable in the divine program. Because of its broad revelation of events to come as well as its pointed exhortation to righteousness, the book pronounces blessing on those "who hear it and take to heart what is written in it, because the time is near" (Rev. 1:3).

COMMENTARY

I. Introduction: "What You Have Seen" (chap. 1)

A. Prologue (1:1-3)

1:1. The opening words, The revelation of Jesus Christ, indicate the subject of the entire book. The word "revelation" is a translation of the Greek apokalypsis, meaning "an unveiling" or "a disclosure." From this word comes the English "apocalypse." The revelation was given to John to communicate to others, His servants, and it prophesies what must soon take place, rather than relating a historic presentation as in the four Gospels. The word "soon" (en tachei; cf. 2:16; 22:7, 12, 20) means that the action will be sudden when it comes, not necessarily that it will occur immediately. Once the end-time events begin, they will occur in rapid succession (cf. Luke 18:8; Acts 12:7; 22:18; 25:4; Rom. 16:20). The words, He made it known, are from the Greek verb esēmanen, meaning "to make known by signs or symbols," but the verb also includes communication by words. The angel messenger is not named but some believe he was Gabriel, who brought messages to Daniel, Mary, and Zechariah (cf. Dan. 8:16; 9:21-22; Luke 1:26-31). The reference to John as a servant (doulos, which normally means "slave") is the term used by Paul, James, Peter, and Jude (cf. Rom. 1:1; Phil. 1:1; Titus 1:1; James 1:1; 2 Peter 1:1; Jude 1) in speaking of their positions as God's servants.

1:2. John faithfully described what he saw as the Word of God and the testimony of Jesus Christ. What John saw was a communication from—and about—Jesus Christ Himself.

1:3. The prologue concludes with a blessing on each individual who reads the book as well as on those who hear it and take to heart what is written in it. The implication is that a reader will read this message aloud to an audience. Not only is there a blessing for the reader and the hearers, but there is also a blessing for those who respond in obedience.

John concluded his prologue with the time is near. The word "time" (kairos) refers to a period of time, that is, the time of the end (Dan. 8:17; 11:35, 40; 12:4, 9). The end time, as a time period, is mentioned in Revelation 11:18 and 12:12. In 12:14 the word "time" means a year (cf. Dan. 7:25); and the phrase "time, times, and half a time" means one year ("time") plus two years ("times") plus six months ("half a time"), totaling three and one-half years—the length of the time of "the end." Revelation 1:3 includes the first of seven beatitudes in the book (1:3; 14:13; 16:15; 19:9; 20:6; 22:7, 14).

The prologue presents concisely the basic facts underlying the entire book: its subjects, purpose, and angelic and human channels. It is most important to observe that the book was primarily intended to give a practical lesson to those who read and heed its contents.

B. Salutation (1:4-8)

1:4-6. This salutation—like Paul's salutations in his epistles and the salutation of John himself in 2 John—specifies the book's destination. The recipients of this message were the seven churches in the Roman province of Asia in Asia Minor (Rev. 1:11; chaps. 2 and 3). The words grace and peace concisely summarize both a Christian's standing before God and his experience. "Grace" speaks of God's attitude toward believers; "peace" speaks both of their standing with God and their experience of divine peace.

The salutation is unusual in that it describes God the Father as the One who is, and who was, and who is to come (cf. 1:8). The seven spirits probably refers to the Holy Spirit (cf. Isa. 11:2-3; Rev. 3:1; 4:5; 5:6), though it is an unusual way to refer to the third Person of the Trinity. Of the three Persons in the Trinity, Jesus Christ is here mentioned last, probably because of His prominence in this book. He is described as the faithful Witness, that is, the source of the revelation to be given; the Firstborn from the dead (cf. Col. 1:18), referring to His historic resurrection; and the Ruler of the kings of the earth, indicating His prophetic role after His second coming (chap. 19).

The Seven "Beatitudes" in Revelation

"Blessed is the one who reads the words of this prophecy, and blessed are those who hear it and take to heart what is written in it, because the time is near" (1:3).

"Then I heard a voice from heaven say, 'Write: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from now on. "Yes,' says the Spirit, 'they will rest from their labor, for their deeds will follow them' " (14:13).

"Behold, I come like a thief! Blessed is he who stays awake and keeps his clothes with him, so that he may not go naked and be shamefully exposed" (16:15).

"Then the angel said to me, 'Write: "Blessed are those who are invited to the wedding supper of the Lamb!" ' And he added, 'These are the true words of God' " (19:9).

"Blessed and holy are those who have part in the first resurrection. The second death has no power over them, but they will be priests of God and of Christ and will reign with Him for a thousand years" (20:6).

"Behold, I am coming soon! Blessed is he who keeps the words of the prophecy in this book" (22:7).

"Blessed are those who wash their robes, that they may have the right to the tree of life and may go through the gates into the city" (22:14).

Christ's resurrection was from the dead. As the "Firstborn," He is the first to be resurrected with an everlasting body, which is a token of other selective resurrections including those of saints who die in the Church Age (Phil. 3:11), the Tribulation martyrs (Rev. 20:5-6), and the wicked dead of all ages (20:12-13).

In His dying on the cross Christ who loves us is the One who freed us from our sins by His blood (some Gr. mss. have the word "washed" instead of "freed"). Believers are now a kingdom and priests with the purpose now and forever of serving God. This prompted John to express a benediction of praise and worship culminating with Amen (lit., "so be it").

1:7-8. Readers are exhorted to look for He is coming. This is His second coming which will be with the clouds (cf. Acts 1:9-11). Every eye will see Him, even those who pierced Him. Though the literal executioners and rejectors of Christ are now dead and will not be resurrected until after the Millennium, the godly remnant of Israel "will look on [Him], the One they have pierced" (Zech. 12:10). This godly remnant will represent the nation.

Christ's second coming, however, will be visible to the entire world including unbelievers, in contrast with His first coming at His birth in Bethlehem and in contrast with the future Rapture of the church, which probably will not be visible to the earth as a whole. The present tense of the expression "He is coming" (Rev. 1:7) points to the future Rapture of the church (John 14:3). John again appended the word Amen. The salutation closes with a reminder of Christ as the eternal One, the Alpha and the Omega, the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet (also used in Rev. 21:6; 22:13). He is further described as the One who is, and who was, and who is to come (cf. 4:8; 11:17), the Almighty. The Greek word for "Almighty" is pantokratōr, "the all-powerful One." It is used 10 times in the New Testament, 9 of them in Revelation (2 Cor. 6:18; Rev. 1:8; 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 16:7, 14; 19:6, 15; 21:22). The major revelation of the entire book is referred to in these salutation verses.

C. The Patmos vision of Christ glorified (1:9-18)

The location of the dramatic revelation of Christ recorded in this book was the island of Patmos, a small island in the Aegean Sea southwest of Ephesus and between Asia Minor and Greece. According to several early church fathers (Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Eusebius), John was sent to this island as a prisoner following his effective pastorate at Ephesus. Victorinus, the first commentator on the Book of Revelation, stated that John worked as a prisoner in the mines on this small island. When the Emperor Domitian died in A.D. 96, his successor Nerva let John return to Ephesus. During John's bleak days on Patmos, God gave him the tremendous revelation embodied in this final book of the Bible.

1:9-11. This section begins with the expression I, John. This is the third reference to John as the human author in this chapter and the first of three times in the book when he referred to himself as I (cf. 21:2; 22:8). This contrasts with his reference to himself in 2 John 1 and 3 John 1 as an elder and his indication in John 21:24 that he was a disciple.

In these opening chapters addressed to the seven churches of Asia, John described himself as a brother who was patient in his endurance of suffering. His suffering had come because of his faithful proclamation of and faith in the Word of God and the testimony of Jesus. (Some Gr. texts add "Christ" after Jesus.) "The testimony of Jesus" means John's testimony for and about Jesus, not a testimony given by Jesus. Like many other well-known writers of Scripture (Moses, David, Isaiah, Ezekiel, Jeremiah, and Peter), John was writing from a context of suffering because of his commitment to the true God.

John's revelation occurred on the Lord's Day while he was in the Spirit. Some have indicated that "the Lord's Day" refers to the first day of the week. However, the word "Lord's" is an adjective and this expression is never used in the Bible to refer to the first day of the week. Probably John was referring to the day of the Lord, a familiar expression in both Testaments (cf. Isa. 2:12; 13:6, 9; 34:8; Joel 1:15; 2:1, 11, 31; 3:14; Amos 5:18, 20; Zeph. 1:7-8, 14, 18; 2:3; Zech. 14:1; Mal. 4:5; 1 Thes. 5:2; 2 Peter 3:10). "In the Spirit" could also be rendered "in [my] spirit" (cf. Rev. 4:2; 17:3; 21:10). That is, he was projected forward in his inner self in a vision, not bodily, to that future day of the Lord when God will pour out His judgments on the earth.

The stirring events beginning in Revelation 4 are the unfolding of the day of the Lord and the divine judgments related to it. The idea that the entire Book of Revelation was given to John in one 24-hour day seems unlikely, especially if he had to write it all down. Being transported prophetically into the future day of the Lord, he then recorded his experience.

Hearing a loud voice like a trumpet, John was instructed to write on a scroll what he saw and heard and send it to seven churches located in Asia Minor. This is the first of 12 commands in this book for John to write what he saw, a command which seems related to each preceding vision (cf. 1:19; 2:1, 8, 12, 18; 3:1, 7, 14; 14:13; 19:9; 21:5). One vision, however, was not to be recorded (10:4).

Each of these churches was an autonomous local church and the order of mention is geographical in a half-moon circle beginning at Ephesus on the coast, proceeding north to Smyrna and Pergamum, then swinging east and south to Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea. (For more information on these seven churches see comments on chaps. 2–3).

1:12-16. Hearing the voice behind him, John turned . . . to see its source. What he saw was seven golden lampstands. Apparently these were individual lampstands rather than one lampstand with seven lamps as was true of a similar piece of furniture in the tabernacle and the temple.

Among the lampstands John saw Someone "like a Son of Man," an expression used in Daniel 7:13 to refer to Christ. The description was that of a priest dressed in a long robe . . . with a golden sash around his chest. The whiteness of His hair corresponded to that of the Ancient of Days (cf. Dan. 7:9), a reference to God the Father. God the Son has the same purity and eternity as God the Father, as signified by the whiteness of His head and hair. The eyes like blazing fire described His piercing judgment of sin (cf. Rev. 2:18).

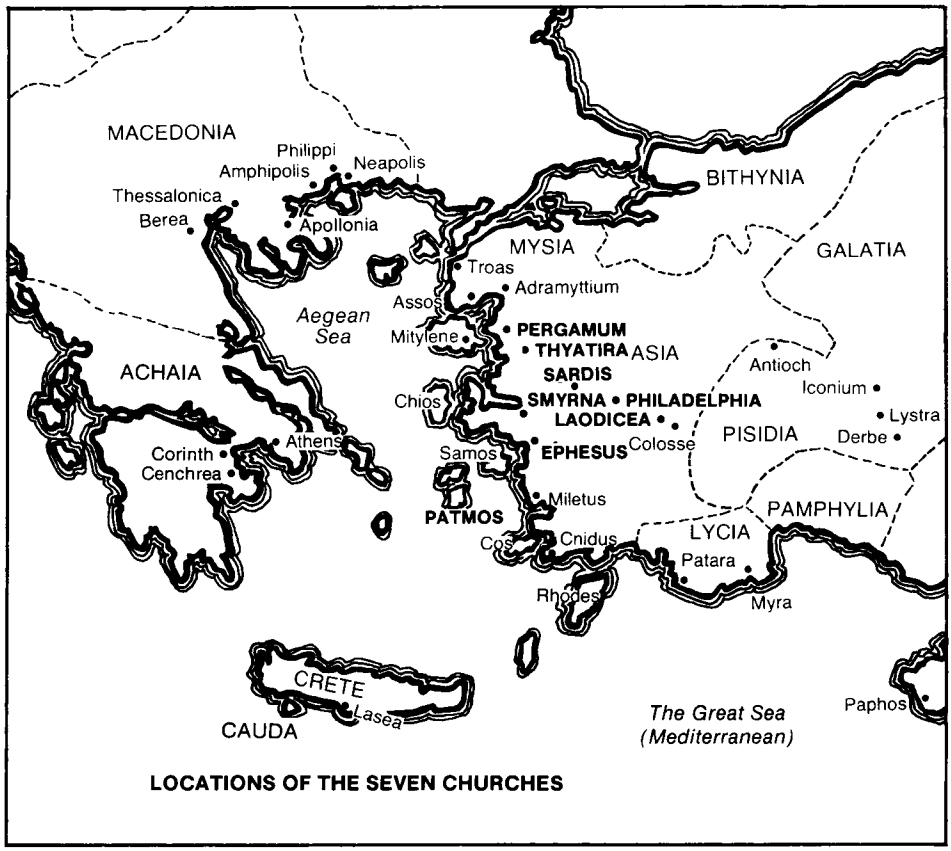
This concept is further enhanced by His feet which were like bronze glowing in a furnace (cf. 2:18). The bronze altar in the temple was related to sacrifice for sin and divine judgment on it. His voice was compared to the roar of rushing waters. His face glowed with a brilliance like the sun shining. John noticed that in His right hand He held seven stars, described in verse 20 as the angels or messengers of the seven churches. Significantly Christ held them in His right hand, indicating sovereign possession. Speaking of Christ's role as a Judge, John saw a sharp double-edged sword coming out of His mouth. This type of sword (rhomphaia, also referred to in 2:12, 16; 6:8; 19:15, 21) was used by the Romans in a stabbing action designed to kill. Jesus Christ was no longer a Baby in Bethlehem or a Man of sorrows crowned with thorns. He was now the Lord of glory.

1:17-18. John stated, When I saw Him, I fell at His feet as though dead. Paul was struck to the ground in a similar way when he saw Christ in His glory (Acts 9:4). Previously John had put his head on Jesus' breast (cf. John 13:25, KJV). But now John could not be this familiar with the Christ of glory.

John received reassurance from Christ in the words, Do not be afraid. Christ stated that He is the eternal One, the First and the Last (cf. Rev. 1:8; 2:8; 21:6; 22:13), and the resurrected One, the Living One, who though once dead is now alive forever and ever! Here Christ affirmed that He alone has the keys of death and hades that is, authority over death and the place of the dead (cf. John 5:21-26; 1 Cor. 15:54-57; Heb. 2:14; Rev. 20:12-14). Though the glorified Christ is to be reverenced, faithful believers like John can be sure they are accepted by the Son of God. The Christian's death and resurrection are both in His hands. This picture of Christ glorified contrasts with the portrayal of Christ as a Man in the four Gospels (cf. Phil. 2:6-8), except for His transfiguration (Matt. 17:2; Mark 9:2).

D. The command to write (1:19-20)



1:19-20. Following the revelation of Christ in glory, John was again commanded to write. The subject of his record has three tenses: (a) what he had already experienced: what you have seen; (b) the present experiences: what is now; and (c) the future: what will take place later. This appears to be the divine outline of Revelation. What John was told to write was first a record of his experience (chap. 1), now history. Then he was to write the present message of Christ to seven churches (chaps. 2–3). Finally, the main purpose of the book being prophetic, he was to introduce the events preceding, culminating in, and following the second coming of Christ (chaps. 4–22).

The chronological division of the Book of Revelation is much superior to many other outlines in which interpreters often seize on incidental phrases or manipulate the book to fit their peculiar schemes of interpretation. This outline harmonizes beautifully with the concept that most of Revelation (beginning in chap. 4) is future, not historic or merely symbolic, or simply statements of principles. It is significant that only a futuristic interpretation of Revelation 4–22 has any consistency. Interpreters following the allegorical approach to the book seldom agree among themselves on their views. This is also true of those holding to the symbolic and historical approaches.

In Revelation a symbol of vision is often presented first, and then its interpretation is given. So here the seven stars were declared to be the angels or messengers of the seven churches, and the seven lampstands are the seven churches themselves. The Book of Revelation, instead of being a hopeless jumble of symbolic vision, is a carefully written record of what John saw and heard, with frequent explanations of its theological and practical meanings.

Revelation, with assistance from such other symbolic books as Daniel and Ezekiel, was intended by God to be understood by careful students of the entire Word of God. Like the Book of Daniel, it will be better understood as history unfolds. Though timeless in its truth and application, it is a special comfort to those who need guidance in the days leading up to Christ's second coming.

Before unfolding the tremendous prophetic scenes of chapters 4–22, Christ first gave a personal message to each of the seven churches with obvious practical applications to His church today.

LOCATIONS OF THE SEVEN CHURCHES

II. Letters to the Seven Churches: "What Is Now" (chaps. 2–3)

As stated in Revelation 1:11 Christ sent a message to each of seven local churches in Asia Minor. The order of scriptural presentation was geographic. A messenger would naturally travel the route from the seaport Ephesus 35 miles north to another seaport Smyrna, proceed still farther north and to the east, to Pergamos, and then would swing further to the east and south to visit the other four cities (1:11).

There has been much debate as to the meaning of these messages for today. Obviously these churches were specially selected and providentially arranged to provide characteristic situations which the church has faced throughout its history. Just as Paul's epistles, though addressed to individual churches, are also intended for the entire church, so these seven messages also apply to the entire church today insofar as they are in similar situations. There were many other churches such as those at Colosse, Magnesia, and Tralles, some larger than the seven churches mentioned in Asia Minor, but these were not addressed.

As the contents of the letters are analyzed, it is clear that they are, first, messages to these historic local churches in the first century. Second, they also constitute a message to similar churches today. Third, individual exhortations to persons or groups in the churches make it clear that the messages are intended for individuals today. Fourth, some believe that the order of the seven churches follows the order of various eras in church history from the first century until now.

There are some remarkable similarities in comparing these letters to the seven churches to the movement of church history since the beginning of the apostolic church. For instance, Ephesus seems to characterize the apostolic church as a whole, and Smyrna seems to depict the church in its early persecutions. However, the Scriptures do not expressly authorize this interpretation, and it should be applied only where it fits naturally. After all, these churches all existed simultaneously in the first century.

Though each message is different, the letters have some similarities. In each one Christ declared that He knows their works; each one includes a promise to those who overcome; each one gives an exhortation to those hearing; and each letter has a particular description of Christ that related to the message which follows. Each letter includes a commendation (except the letter to Laodicea), a rebuke (except the letters to Smyrna and Philadelphia), an exhortation, and an encouraging promise to those heeding its message. In general these letters to the seven churches address the problems inherent in churches throughout church history and are an incisive and comprehensive revelation of how Christ evaluates local churches.

This portion of Scripture has been strangely neglected. While many turn to the epistles of Paul and other portions of the New Testament for church truth, often the letters to these seven churches, though coming from Christ Himself and being climactic in character, are completely ignored. This neglect has contributed to churches today not conforming to God's perfect will.

A. The letter to the church in Ephesus (2:1-7)

1. DESTINATION (2:1)

2:1. At the time this letter was written, Ephesus was a major city of Asia Minor, a seaport, and the location of the great temple of Artemis (cf. Acts 19:24, 27-28, 34-35), one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. Paul had visited Ephesus about A.D. 53, about 43 years before this letter in Revelation was sent to them. Paul remained in Ephesus for several years and preached the gospel so effectively "that all the Jews and Greeks who lived in the province of Asia heard the word of the Lord" (Acts 19:10). This large city was thoroughly stirred by Paul's message (Acts 19:11-41), with the result that the silversmiths created a riot because their business of making shrines of Artemis was threatened.

The church accordingly had a long history and was the most prominent one in the area. The pastor or messenger of the church was addressed as the angel (angelos). The word's principal use in the Bible is in reference to heavenly angels (William F. Arndt and F. Wilbur Gingrich, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957, pp. 7-8). But it is also used to refer to human messengers (cf. Matt. 11:10; Mark 1:2; Luke 7:24, 27; 9:52).

Christ was holding seven stars in His right hand and walking among the seven golden lampstands. The "stars" were the angels or messengers of the churches and the "lampstands" were the seven churches (1:20).

2. COMMENDATION (2:2-3)

2:2-3. Christ commended those in the Ephesian church for their hard work . . . perseverance, their condemnation of wicked men, and their identification of false apostles. (False teachers were present in each of the first four churches; cf. vv. 2, 6, 9, 14-15, 20.) In addition they were commended for enduring hardships and not growing weary in serving God. In general this church had continued in its faithful service to God for more than 40 years.

3. REBUKE (2:4)

2:4. In spite of the many areas of commendation, the church in Ephesus was soundly rebuked: Yet I hold this against you: you have forsaken your first love. The order of words in the Greek is emphatic; the clause could be translated, "Your first love you have left." Christ used the word agapēn, speaking of the deep kind of love that God has for people. This rebuke contrasts with what Paul wrote the Ephesians 35 years earlier, that he never stopped giving thanks for them because of their faith in Christ and their love (agapēn) for the saints (Eph. 1:15-16). Most of the Ephesian Christians were now second-generation believers, and though they had retained purity of doctrine and life and had maintained a high level of service, they were lacking in deep devotion to Christ. How the church today needs to heed this same warning, that orthodoxy and service are not enough. Christ wants believers' hearts as well as their hands and heads.

4. EXHORTATION (2:5-6)

2:5-6. The Ephesians were first reminded to remember the height from which you have fallen! They were told to repent and to return to the love they had left. Similar exhortations concerning the need for a deep love for God are frequently found in the New Testament (Matt. 22:37; Mark 12:30; Luke 10:27; John 14:15, 21, 23; 21:15-16; James 2:5; 1 Peter 1:8). Christ stated that one's love for God should be greater than his love for his closest relatives, including his father, mother, son, and daughter (Matt. 10:37). Paul added that love for God should even be above one's love for his or her mate (1 Cor. 7:32-35). In calling the Ephesian believers to repentance Christ was asking them to change their attitude as well as their affections. They were to continue their service not simply because it was right but because they loved Christ. He warned them that if they did not respond, the light of their witness in Ephesus would be extinguished: I will . . . remove your lampstand from its place. The church continued and was later the scene of a major church council, but after the 5th century both the church and the city declined. The immediate area has been uninhabited since the 14th century.

One additional word of commendation was inserted. They were commended because they hated the practices of the Nicolaitans. There has been much speculation concerning the identity of the Nicolaitans, but the Scriptures do not specify who they were. They apparently were a sect wrong in practice and in doctrine (for further information see Henry Alford, The Greek Testament, 4: 563-65; Merrill C. Tenney, Interpreting Revelation, pp. 60-1; Walvoord, Revelation, p. 58).

5. PROMISE (2:7)

2:7. As in the other letters, Christ gave the Ephesian church a promise addressed to individuals who will hear. He stated, To him who overcomes, I will give the right to eat from the tree of life, which is in the paradise of God. The tree of life, first mentioned in Genesis 3:22, was in the Garden of Eden. Later it reappears in the New Jerusalem where it bears abundant fruit (Rev. 22:2). Those who eat of it will never die (Gen. 3:22). This promise should not be construed as reward for only a special group of Christians but a normal expectation for all Christians. "The paradise of God" is probably a name for heaven (cf. Luke 23:43; 2 Cor. 12:4—the only other NT references to paradise). Apparently it will be identified with the New Jerusalem in the eternal state.

This encouragement to true love reminded them again of God's gracious provision for salvation in time and eternity. Love for God is not wrought by legalistically observing commands, but by responding to one's knowledge and appreciation of God's love.

B. The letter to the church in Smyrna (2:8-11)

1. DESTINATION (2:8)

2:8. The second letter was addressed to Smyrna, a large and wealthy city 35 miles north of Ephesus. Like Ephesus, it was a seaport. In contrast to Ephesus, which today is a deserted ruin, Smyrna is still a large seaport with a present population of about 200,000. Christ described Himself as the First and the Last, who died and came to life again. Christ is portrayed as the eternal One (cf. 1:8, 17; 21:6; 22:13) who suffered death at the hands of His persecutors and then was resurrected from the grave (cf. 1:5). These aspects of Christ were especially relevant to the Christians at Smyrna who, like Christ in His death, were experiencing severe persecution.

The name of the city, Smyrna, means "myrrh," an ordinary perfume. It was also used in the anointing oil of the tabernacle, and in embalming dead bodies (cf. Ex. 30:23; Ps. 45:8; Song 3:6; Matt. 2:11; Mark 15:23; John 19:39). While the Christians of the church at Smyrna were experiencing the bitterness of suffering, their faithful testimony was like myrrh or sweet perfume to God.

2:9. What a comfort it was to the Christians in Smyrna to know that Christ knew all about their sufferings: I know your afflictions and your poverty—yet you are rich! Besides suffering persecution, they were also enduring extreme poverty (ptōcheian in contrast with penia, the ordinary word for "poverty"). Though extremely poor, they were rich in the wonderful promises Christ had given them (cf. 2 Cor. 6:10; James 2:5). They were being persecuted not only by pagan Gentiles but also by hostile Jews and by Satan himself. Apparently the local Jewish synagogue was called the synagogue of Satan (cf. Rev. 3:9). (Satan is mentioned in four of the seven letters: 2:9, 13, 24; 3:9.) In the history of the church the most severe persecution has come from religionists.

3. REBUKE

Notable is the fact that there was no rebuke whatever for these faithful, suffering Christians. This is in striking contrast with Christ's evaluations of five of the other six churches, which He rebuked. Smyrna's sufferings, though extremely difficult, had helped keep them pure in faith and life.

4. EXHORTATION (2:10A)

2:10a. The word of Christ to these suffering Christians was an exhortation to have courage: Do not be afraid (lit., stop being afraid) of what you are about to suffer. Their severe trials were to continue. They would receive further persecution by imprisonment and additional suffering for 10 days. Some have taken these words "for 10 days" as a symbolic representation of the entire persecution of the church; others think it refers to 10 persecutions under Roman rulers. The most probable meaning is that it anticipated a limited period of time for suffering (cf. Walvoord, Revelation, pp. 61-2). Scott finds precedence in Scripture that 10 days means a limited period of time (Walter Scott, Exposition of the Revelation of Jesus Christ, p. 69). He cites Genesis 24:55; Nehemiah 5:18; Jeremiah 42:7; Daniel 1:12; Acts 25:6. Alford holds the same position, citing Numbers 11:19; 14:22; 1 Samuel 1:8; Job 19:3 (The Greek Testament, 4:567).

The problem of human suffering, even for a limited time, has always perplexed faithful Christians. Suffering can be expected for the ungodly, but why should the godly suffer? The Scriptures give a number of reasons. Suffering may be (1) disciplinary (1 Cor. 11:30-32; Heb. 12:3-13), (2) preventive (as Paul's thorn in the flesh, 2 Cor. 12:7), (3) the learning of obedience (as Christ's suffering, Heb. 5:8; cf. Rom. 5:3-5), or (4) the providing of a better testimony for Christ (as in Acts 9:16).

5. PROMISE (2:10B-11)

2:10b-11. In their suffering the believers at Smyrna were exhorted, Be faithful, even to the point of death. While their persecutors could take their physical lives, it would only result in their receiving the crown of life. Apparently up to this time none had died, but this could be expected. Later Polycarp, having become the bishop of the church in Smyrna, was martyred, and undoubtedly others were also killed (cf. Robert Jamieson, A. R. Fausset, and David Brown, A Commentary Critical, Experimental and Practical on the Old and New Testaments. Grand Rapids: Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Co., 1945. 6:662). "The crown of life" is one of several crowns promised to Christians (cf. 1 Cor. 9:25; 1 Thes. 2:19; 2 Tim. 4:6-8; 1 Peter 5:4; Rev. 4:4). The crown of life is also mentioned in James 1:12. Believers are encouraged to be faithful by contemplating what awaits them after death, namely, eternal life.

As in all the letters, an exhortation is given to the individuals who will listen. The promise is given to overcomers, referring in general to all believers, assuring them that they will not be hurt at all by the second death (cf. Rev. 20:15).

The reassuring word of Christ to Smyrna is the word to all suffering and persecuted Christians. As stated in Hebrews 12:11, "No discipline seems pleasant at the time, but painful. Later on, however, it produces a harvest of righteousness and peace for those who have been trained by it."

C. The letter to the church in Pergamum (2:12-17)

1. DESTINATION (2:12)

2:12. The third church was in Pergamum or Pergamos, about 20 miles inland from Smyrna. Like Ephesus and Smyrna it was a wealthy city, but it was wicked.

People in its pagan cults worshiped Athena, Asclepius, Dionysus, and Zeus. Pergamum was famous for its university with a library of about 200,000 volumes, and for manufacturing parchment resulting in a paper called pergamena. The atmosphere of this city was adverse to any effective Christian life and testimony.

Anticipating Christ's rebuke for their being tolerant of evil and immorality, John described Him as the One who has the sharp, double-edged sword (also mentioned in 1:16; 2:16; 19:15, 21). The sword is a symbolic representation of the Word of God's twofold ability to separate believers from the world and to condemn the world for its sin. It was the sword of salvation as well as the sword of death.

2. COMMENDATION (2:13)

2:13. Following the same order as in the two preceding letters, commendation is given first. Christ recognized the difficulty of their situation. They lived where Satan has his throne. This may refer to the great temple of Asclepius, a pagan god of healing represented in the form of a serpent. Further recognition of Satan is indicated at the close of the verse. Pergamum was where Satan lives. The saints there were commended for being true, even when Antipas (which means "against all") was martyred. Nothing is known of this incident. The Christians at Pergamum had been true to God under severe testing but had compromised their testimony in other ways, as seen in the next two verses.

3. REBUKE (2:14-15)

2:14-15. They had been guilty of severe compromise by holding the teaching of Balaam and the teaching of the Nicolaitans. Balaam had been guilty of counseling King Balak to cause Israel to sin through intermarriage with heathen women and through idol-worship (cf. Num. 22-25; 31:15-16). Intermarriage with heathen women was a problem in Pergamum where any social contact with the world also involved worship of idols. Usually meat in the marketplace had been offered to idols earlier (cf. 1 Cor. 8).

They were also condemned for following the Nicolaitans' teaching. Earlier the Ephesian church had been commended for rejecting what appears to be a moral departure (cf. Rev. 2:6). Some Greek manuscripts add here that God hates the teaching of the Nicolaitans, as also stated in v. 6. Compromise with worldly morality and pagan doctrine was prevalent in the church, especially in the third century when Christianity became popular. So compromise with pagan morality and departure from biblical faith soon corrupted the church.

4. EXHORTATION (2:16)

2:16. Christ sharply rebuked the church with the abrupt command, Repent therefore! They were warned, Otherwise, I will soon come to you and will fight against them with the sword of My mouth. He promised that the judgment would come "soon" (tachys) which also means "suddenly" (cf. 1:1; 22:7, 12, 20). Christ would contend with them, using the sword of His mouth (cf. 1:16; 2:12; 19:15, 21). This again is the Word of God sharply judging all compromise and sin.

5. PROMISE (2:17)

2:17. The final exhortation to individuals, as in the messages to other churches, is again addressed to those who are willing to hear. Overcomers are promised hidden manna and a white stone with a new name written on it. The "hidden manna" may refer to Christ as the Bread from heaven, the unseen source of the believer's nourishment and strength. Whereas Israel received physical food, manna, the church receives spiritual food (John 6:48-51).

Scholars differ as to the meaning of the "white stone." Alford is probably right in saying that the important point is the stone's inscription which gives the believer "a new name," indicating acceptance by God and his title to glory (The Greek Testament, 4:572). This may be an allusion to the Old Testament practice of the high priest wearing 12 stones on his breastplate with the names of the 12 tribes of Israel inscribed on it. Though believers at Pergamum may not have had precious stones or gems of this world, they had what is far more important, acceptance by Christ Himself and assurance of infinite blessings to come. Taken as a whole, the message to the church in Pergamum is a warning against compromise in morals or teaching and against deviating from the purity of doctrine required of Christians.

D. The letter to the church in Thyatira (2:18-29)

1. DESTINATION (2:18)

2:18. Thyatira, 40 miles southeast of Pergamum, was a much smaller city. Thyatira was situated in an area noted for its abundant crops and the manufacture of purple dye. The church was small, but it was singled out for this penetrating letter of rebuke.

In keeping with what follows, Christ is introduced as the Son of God, whose eyes are like blazing fire and whose feet are like burnished bronze. This description of Christ is similar to that in 1:13-15, but here He is called the Son of God rather than the Son of Man. The situation required reaffirmation of His deity and His righteous indignation at their sins. The words "burnished bronze," which describe His feet, translate a rare Greek word chalkolibanō, also used in 1:15. It seems to have been an alloy of a number of metals characterized by brilliance when polished. The reference to His eyes being "like blazing fire" and the brilliant reflections of His feet emphasize the indignation and righteous judgment of Christ.

2. COMMENDATION (2:19)

2:19. Though much was wrong in the church at Thyatira, believers there were commended for their love . . . faith . . . service, and perseverance (cf. 2:2). And the Thyatira Christians were doing more as time went on (in contrast to the Ephesus church which did less). But despite these evidences of Christian life and testimony, the church at Thyatira had serious problems.

3. REBUKE (2:20-23)

2:20-23. Jesus' major condemnation concerned that woman Jezebel, who claimed to be a prophetess and taught believers to take part in the sexual immorality that accompanied pagan religion and to eat food sacrificed to idols. What was acceptable to that local society was abhorred by Christ. Their departure from morality had gone on for some time (v. 21). The church in Thyatira may have first heard the gospel from Lydia, converted through Paul's ministry (Acts 16:14-15). Interestingly now a woman, a self-claimed "prophetess," was influencing the church. Her name "Jezebel" suggests that she was corrupting the Thyatira church much like Ahab's wife Jezebel corrupted Israel (1 Kings 16:31-33). Christ promised sudden and immediate judgment, called her sin adultery and promised that all who followed her would suffer intensely. He also promised, I will strike her children dead, meaning that suffering would extend also to her followers. The judgment would be so dramatic that all the churches would know that Christ is the One who searches hearts and minds.

4. EXHORTATION (2:24-25)

2:24-25. After His condemnation, Christ extended a word of exhortation to the godly remnant who existed in the church in Thyatira, implying that the rest of the church was apostate. The remnant He called the rest of you in Thyatira . . . you who do not hold to her teaching and have not learned Satan's so-called deep secrets. On this godly remnant He imposed one simple instruction: only hold on to what you have until I come. Perhaps because the church was small, Christ did not command them to leave it but to remain as a godly testimony. Judgment on Jezebel and her followers would come soon and would purge the church. In modern times Christians who find themselves in apostate local churches can usually leave and join another fellowship, but this was impractical under the circumstances in Thyatira.

The parallels between Thyatira and other apostate churches throughout church history are clear. Some compare Thyatira to believers in the Middle Ages when Protestantism separated from Roman Catholicism and attempted a return to purity in doctrine and life. The prominence of Jezebel as a woman prophetess is sometimes compared to the unscriptural exaltation of Mary. The participation in idolatrous feasts can illustrate the false teaching that the Lord's Supper is another sacrifice of Christ. In spite of the apostasy of churches in the Middle Ages, there were churches then which, like the church of Thyatira, had some believers who were bright lights of faithfulness in doctrine and life.

5. PROMISE (2:26-29)

2:26-27. Christ promises believers who are faithful that they will join Him in His millennial rule (Ps. 2:8-9; 2 Tim. 2:12; Rev. 20:4-6). The word in verse 27 translated "rule" (poimanei) means "to shepherd," indicating that they will not simply be administering justice but will also, like a shepherd using his rod, be dealing with his sheep and protecting them as well. Though Psalm 2:9 refers to Christ's rule, John's quotation of it here relates the ruling (shepherding) to the believer who overcomes. Believers will have authority just as Christ does (1 Cor. 6:2-3; 2 Tim. 2:12; Rev. 3:21; 20:4, 6). Christ received this authority from His Father (cf. John 5:22).

2:28. In addition, the faithful will receive the morning star, which appears just before the dawn. The Scriptures do not explain this expression, but it may refer to participation in the Rapture of the church before the dark hours preceding the dawn of the millennial kingdom.

2:29. The letter to Thyatira closes with the familiar exhortation to hear what the Spirit says to the churches. Unlike the earlier letters, this exhortation follows rather than precedes the promise to overcomers, and this order is followed in the letters to the last three churches.

E. The letter to the church in Sardis (3:1-6)

1. DESTINATION (3:1A)

3:1a. The important commercial city of Sardis was located about 30 miles southeast of Thyatira, on an important trade route that ran east and west through the kingdom of Lydia. Important industries included jewelry, dye, and textiles, which had made the city wealthy. From a religious standpoint it was a center of pagan worship and site of a temple of Artemis, which ruins still remain (cf. comments on 2:1 regarding another temple of Artemis). Only a small village called Sart remains on the site of this once-important city. Archeologists have located the ruins of a Christian church building next to the temple. In addressing the message to the church Christ described Himself as the One who holds the seven spirits of God and the seven stars, similar to the description in 1:4. Here Christ said He holds them, speaking of the Holy Spirit in relation to Himself (Isa. 11:2-5; cf. Rev. 5:6). As in 1:20 the seven stars, representing the pastors of the churches, were also in His hands (cf. 2:1).

2. COMMENDATION (3:1B)

3:1b. The only word of approval is in actuality a word of rebuke as Christ declared that they had a reputation for being alive and apparently were regarded by their contemporaries as an effective church.

3. REBUKE (3:1C, 2B)

3:1c, 2b. Christ quickly stripped away their reputation of being alive by declaring, you are dead. Like the Pharisees, their outer appearance was a facade hiding their lack of life (cf. Matt. 23:27-28). Christ added, I have not found your deeds complete in the sight of My God. They were falling far short of fulfilling their obligations as believers.

4. EXHORTATION (3:2A, 3)

3:2a, 3. They were exhorted to wake up from their spiritual slumber and to strengthen the few evidences of life they still had. He exhorted them to remember . . . obey . . . and repent. He warned them that if they did not heed this exhortation, He would come on them like a thief, that is, suddenly and unexpectedly.

5. PROMISE (3:4-6)

3:4-6. While this church as a whole was dead or dying, Christ recognized a godly remnant in the Sardis church who had not soiled their clothes with sin. He promised that true believers will be dressed in white (cf. v. 18), symbolic of the righteousness of God, that their names will remain in the book of life, and that He will acknowledge them as His own before His Father and His angels.

The statement that their names will not be erased from the book of life presents a problem to some. But a person who is truly born again remains regenerate, as John said elsewhere (John 5:24; 6:35-37, 39; 10:28-29). While this passage may imply that a name could be erased from the book of life, actually it only gives a positive affirmation that their names will not be erased (cf. Walvoord, Revelation. pp. 82, 338). Six times John referred to the book of life (Rev. 3:5; 13:8 [cf. comments there]; 17:8; 20:12, 15; 21:27).

The letter also concludes with the exhortation to hear what the Spirit says to the churches. The letter to Sardis is a searching message to churches today that are full of activity and housed in beautiful buildings but are so often lacking in evidences of eternal life. Christ's word today is to "remember," "repent," and "obey," just as it was to the church in Sardis.

F. The letter to the church in Philadelphia (3:7-13)

1. DESTINATION (3:7)

3:7. The city of Philadelphia was 28 miles southeast of Sardis. It was located in an area noted for its agricultural products but afflicted with earthquakes which destroyed the city several times, most recently about A.D. 37. The city was named for a king of Pergamum, Attalus Philadelphus, who had built it. "Philadelphus" is similar to the Greek word philadelphia, meaning "brotherly love," which occurs seven times in the Bible (Rom. 12:10; 1 Thes. 4:9; Heb. 13:1; 1 Peter 1:22; 2 Peter 1:7[twice]; Rev. 3:7). Only here is it used of the city itself. Christian testimony continues in the city in this present century.

Christ described Himself as the One who is holy and true, who holds the key of David, and who is able to open or shut a door which no one else could open or shut. The holiness of Christ is a frequent truth in Scripture (1 Peter 1:15), and being holy He is worthy to judge the spiritual life of the Philadelphia church. "The key of David" seems to refer to Isaiah 22:22, where the key of the house of David was given to Eliakim who then had access to all the wealth of the king. Christ earlier had been described as the One who holds "the keys of death and hades" (Rev. 1:18). The reference here, however, seems to be to spiritual treasures.

2. COMMENDATION (3:8-9)

3:8. As in the messages to the other churches, Christ stated, I know your deeds. In keeping with the description of His authority to open and close doors (v. 7), He declared, See, I have placed before you an open door that no one can shut. There is no word of rebuke, though Christ said, I know that you have little strength. These words, however, become a basis for His commendation that you have kept My word and have not denied My name.

3:9. Christ referred to their enemies as the synagogue of Satan (cf. 2:9). They were Jews who opposed the believers' Christian testimony. False religion has always been a formidable antagonist against true Christian faith. The day will come, however, when all opponents of the faith will have to acknowledge the truth (cf. Isa. 45:23; Rom. 14:11; Phil. 2:10-11). Then Christ declared, I will make them come and fall down at your feet and acknowledge that I have loved you.

3. PROMISE (3:10-12)

3:10. The church in Philadelphia received no rebuke from Christ. Instead they were commended and given a promise because they had been willing to endure patiently. The promise was, I will also keep you from the hour of trial that is going to come upon the whole world to test those who live on the earth. This is an explicit promise that the Philadelphia church will not endure the hour of trial which is unfolded, beginning in Revelation 6. Christ was saying that the Philadelphia church would not enter the future time of trouble; He could not have stated it more explicitly. If Christ had meant to say that they would be preserved through a time of trouble, or would be taken out from within the Tribulation, a different verb and a different preposition would have been required.

Though scholars have attempted to avoid this conclusion in order to affirm posttribulationism, the combination of the verb "keep" (tērein) with the preposition "from" (ek) is in sharp contrast to the meaning of keeping the church "through" (dia), a preposition which is not used here. The expression "the hour of trial" (a time period) makes it clear that they would be kept out of that period. It is difficult to see how Christ could have made this promise to this local church if it were God's intention for the entire church to go through the Tribulation that will come on the entire world. Even though the church at Philadelphia would go to glory via death long before the time of trouble would come, if the church here is taken to be typical of the body of Christ standing true to the faith, the promise seems to go beyond the Philadelphia church to all those who are believers in Christ (cf. Walvoord, Revelation, pp. 86-8).

3:11. Additional promises were given. Christ promised, I am coming soon, a concept repeated often in the Book of Revelation. The thought is not simply that of coming soon but coming suddenly or quickly (cf. 1:1; 2:16). They were exhorted in the light of His coming to continue to hold on to what they have.

3:12. Everyone who is an overcomer will become a pillar in the temple of . . . God. This is of course symbolic of the permanent place in heaven for believers, referred to here as the temple of God. The entire New Jerusalem will be the ultimate temple (21:22). In contrast to earthly temples and earthly pillars which fall, believers will continue forever in the temple. Christ specified that He was referring to the city of My God, that is, the New Jerusalem (cf. 21:2). He repeated His promise: I will also write on him My new name (cf. 2:17; 14:1; 19:12). Because believers have identified with Christ by faith, He will identify Himself with them.

4. EXHORTATION (3:13)

3:13. The letter closed with the familiar appeal, hear what the Spirit says to the churches. The promise given to the Philadelphia church and the challenge to continue to be faithful is certainly God's Word to His whole church today.

G. The letter to the church in Laodicea (3:14-22)

1. DESTINATION (3:14)

3:14. The wealthy city of Laodicea was located on the road to Colosse about 40 miles southeast of Philadelphia. About 35 years before this letter was written, Laodicea was destroyed by an earthquake, but it had the wealth and ability to rebuild. Its main industry was wool cloth. There is no record that Paul ever visited this city, but he was concerned about it (Col. 2:1-2; 4:16).

In addressing the church Christ introduced Himself as the Amen, the faithful and true Witness, the Ruler of God's creation. The word "Amen," meaning "so be it," refers to the sovereignty of God which is behind human events (cf. 2 Cor. 1:20; Rev. 1:6). In speaking of Himself as "the faithful and true Witness" Christ was repeating what He had said earlier (1:5; 3:7). As "the Ruler of God's creation" Christ existed before God's Creation and is sovereign over it (cf. Col 1:15, 18; Rev. 21:6). This description was in preparation for the stern word of rebuke which Christ would give the church in Laodicea.

2. REBUKE (3:15-17)

3:15-16. No word of commendation was extended to the Laodicean church. They were pictured as utterly abhorrent to Christ because they were lukewarm. This was addressed to the church and also to the messenger or the pastor whom some believe was Archippus (Col. 4:17). It is improbable, however, that Archippus, if he had been the pastor of the church, was still living. In referring to the church as "lukewarm" Christ had in mind that this was its permanent situation. In their feasts as well as in their religious sacrifices people in the ancient world customarily drank what was either hot or cold—never lukewarm. This rebuke would have been especially meaningful to this church, for water was piped to the city from Hierapolis, a few miles north. By the time the water reached Laodicea, it was lukewarm!

3:17. Their being lukewarm spiritually was evidenced by their being content with their material wealth and their being unaware of their spiritual poverty. Christ used strong words to describe them: wretched, pitiful, poor, blind, and naked.

3. EXHORTATION (3:18-19)

3:18-19. They were urged to buy not ordinary gold, but refined gold, referring to that which would glorify God and make them truly rich. Through its banking industry the city had material wealth. But the church lacked spiritual richness. Though they had beautiful clothes, they were urged to wear white clothes (cf. v. 4), symbolic of righteousness which would cover their spiritual nakedness. As wool was a major product of the area, Laodicea was especially

THE LETTERS TO THE SEVEN CHURCHES

	Christ	Commendation	Rebuke	Exhortation	Promise
Ephesus (2:1–7)	Holds the seven stars in His right hand and walks among the seven golden lampstands.	Deeds, hard work, perseverance. Does not tolerate wicked men. Endures hardships. Hates the practices of the Nicolaitans.	Has forsaken her first love.	Remember; repent; do the things you did at first.	Will eat from the tree of life.
Smyrna (2:8–11)	The First and the Last, who died and came to life again.	Suffers persecution and poverty.	—	Do not be afraid. Be faithful, even to the point of death.	Will receive a crown of life; will not be hurt by the second death.
Pergamum (2:12–17)	Has the sharp, double-edged sword.	Remains true to Christ; does not renounce her faith.	People there hold the teachings of Balaam and of the Nicolaitans.	Repent.	Will receive hidden manna and a white stone with a new name on it.
Thyatira (2:18–29)	The Son of God, whose eyes are like blazing fire and whose feet are like burnished brass.	Deeds, love, faith, service, perseverance, doing more than at first.	Tolerates Jezebel with her immorality and idolatry.	Repent; hold on to what you have.	Will have authority over the nations; the morning star.
Sardis (3:1–6)	Holds the seven spirits of God and the seven stars.	Deeds; reputation of being alive.	Dead.	Wake up! Strengthen what remains. Remember what you received, obey it, repent.	Will be dressed in white; will be acknowledged before My Father and His angels.
Philadelphia (3:7–13)	Holy and true, holds the key of David.	Deeds, keeps Christ's word and does not deny His name, endures patiently.	—	Hold on to what you have.	Those who overcome will be pillars in the temple; the name of God, of the New Jerusalem, and of Christ's new name, will be written on them.
Laodicea (3:14–22)	The Amen, the faithful and true Witness, the Ruler of God's creation.	—	Lukewarm, neither cold nor hot. Wretched, pitiful, poor, blind, and naked.	Buy from Christ refined gold, white clothes, and eye salve. Be earnest, and repent.	Overcomers will eat with Christ; will rule with Christ.

famous for a black garment made out of black wool. What they needed instead was pure white clothing.

Then Christ exhorted them to put salve . . . on their eyes. A medical school was located in Laodicea at the temple of Asclepius, which offered a special salve to heal common eye troubles of the Middle East. What they needed was not this medicine but spiritual sight. The church at Laodicea is typical of a modern church quite unconscious of its spiritual needs and content with beautiful buildings and all the material things money can buy. This is a searching and penetrating message. To all such the exhortation is be earnest, and repent. Christ rebuked them because He loved them, which love would also bring chastisement on this church.

3:20-21. Dramatically Christ pictured Himself as standing outside and knocking on a door. In a familiar painting the latch is not shown but is assumed to be on the inside. The appeal is for those who hear to open the door. To them Christ promised, I will go in and eat with him, and he with Me. With Christ on the outside, there can be no fellowship or genuine wealth. With Christ on the inside, there is wonderful fellowship and sharing of the marvelous grace of God. This was an appeal to Christians rather than to non-Christians. This raises the important question concerning the extent of one's intimate fellowship with Christ. To those who respond, Christ promises to give the right to sit with Him on His throne and share His victory.

3:22. Once again the invitation to listen and respond is given: He who has an ear, let him hear what the Spirit says to the churches.

The letters to the seven churches are a remarkably complete treatment of problems that face the church today. The recurring dangers of losing their first love (2:4), of being afraid of suffering (2:10), doctrinal defection (2:14-15), moral departure (2:20), spiritual deadness (3:1-2), not holding fast (v. 11), and lukewarmness (vv. 15-16) are just as prevalent today as they were in first-century churches. Because these letters come from Christ personally, they take on significance as God's final word of exhortation to the church down through the centuries. The final appeal is to all individuals who will hear. People in churches today would do well to listen.

III. The Revelation of the Future: "What Will Take Place Later" (chaps. 4–22)

In keeping with the divine outline given in 1:19, God unfolded to John the details of the future, "what will take place later." This includes the stirring events leading up to the second coming of Christ (chaps. 4–18); then the Second Coming itself (chap. 19); then the aftermath, the millennial kingdom (chap. 20); and finally the New Jerusalem and the new heaven and new earth (chaps. 21–22). It is obvious that the central truth is the second coming of Christ in chapter 19, just as the central feature of the four Gospels was the first coming of Christ.

While many interpretations of the Book of Revelation have been suggested, the only views which provide a cogent understanding are those which consider the book, beginning with chapter 4, as referring to future events. Any other system of interpretation gets lost in a maze of conflicting opinions.

While the events portrayed in this futuristic section are not necessarily all in strict chronological order, they are all yet future. As such, they present a more graphic picture of the future, given in more detail, than is found in any other part of the Bible. Such a revelation is a fitting climax to all the biblical prophecies relating to human history, which are properly centered in the person and work of Jesus Christ.

The revelation of the future opens with a vision of heaven (chaps. 4–5). Beginning in chapter 6 the seven seals, as they are broken, constitute the main chronological movement of the Great Tribulation, leading up to the second coming of Christ. The seven trumpets give the details of events which will follow the breaking of the seventh seal. Likewise in chapter 16 the seven bowls of the wrath of God unfold the content of the seventh trumpet.

The order is climactic, and as the period approaches the second coming of Christ, events occur with increasing rapidity and greater devastation. Once Christ's second coming is revealed, the concluding chapters briefly summarize the wide expanse of future events—chapter 20 relating to the millennial kingdom, and chapters 21–22 describing the new heaven and the new earth.

It is obvious that the main purpose of the Book of Revelation is to present the second coming of Christ and accompanying events and to alert the people of God as well as the world as a whole to the importance of being prepared for God's coming judgment.

A. The vision of the heavenly throne (chap. 4)

1. THE INVITATION (4:1)

4:1. John saw the vision of the heavenly throne after he heard the revelation of the messages to the churches. The time sequence is indicated by the expression after this (meta tauta, in the NASB, "after these things").

John saw a door . . . open in heaven and heard a voice inviting him, Come up here, and I will show you what must take place after this. The words "what must take place after this" are similar to those in 1:19, "what will take place later." Whereas 1:19 indicates that the events will take place later, in 4:1b the Greek word dei is used, which means that the events must occur. This points not only to the future but also to the sovereign purpose of God. The similarity of the two expressions confirms the threefold chronological outline given in 1:19. Both the revelation and its fulfillment are chronologically subsequent to chapters 1–3.

2. THE HEAVENLY THRONE (4:2-3)

4:2-3. John stated that immediately he was in the Spirit (or "in [my] spirit"; cf. 1:10; 17:3) meaning that experientially he was taken up to heaven though his body was actually still on the island of Patmos. In heaven he saw a great throne with One sitting on it who had the appearance of jasper and carnelian. This jasper (cf. 21:18) is a clear stone in contrast to the opaque jasper stones known today; it may have resembled a diamond. The carnelian, also known as ruby (the NIV trans. it "ruby" in the OT), and sardius, were a ruby-red color. The jasper and the carnelian were the first and last of the 12 gemstones worn on the high priest's breast (cf. Ex. 28:17-21). Jasper and sardius were used in relation to the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13) and will be in the foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:19-20). The throne's overall appearance was one of great beauty and color, enhanced by a rainbow, resembling an emerald, which encircled the throne. The green color of the emerald added further beauty to the scene.

3. THE 24 ELDERS (4:4)

4:4. Around the principal throne were 24 lesser thrones on which were seated . . . 24 elders. They were dressed in white and were wearing crowns of gold on their heads. The crowns were similar to those given victors in Greek games (stephanos), in contrast with the crown of a sovereign ruler (diadēma, "diadem"). The crowns seem to indicate that the elders had been judged and rewarded.

There has been much speculation on the identity of the elders. The two major views are (1) that they represent the church raptured prior to this time and rewarded in heaven, or (2) that they are angels who have been given large responsibilities. The number 24 is the number of representation, illustrated in the fact that in the Law of Moses there were 24 orders of the priesthood. (For further discussion of the identity of the 24 elders see the comments on 5:8-10.)

4. THE SEVEN SPIRITS OF GOD (4:5)

4:5. The impressive scene of heaven was enhanced by flashes of lightning, rumblings, and peals of thunder. Thunder is mentioned eight times in Revelation (4:5; 6:1; 8:5; 11:19; 14:2; 16:18; 19:6). John also saw seven lamps which were blazing. These seven lamps were said to be the seven spirits of God. These should be understood to represent the Holy Spirit rather than seven individual spirits or angels, with the concept of the sevenfold character of the Spirit (Isa. 11:2-3; cf. Rev. 1:4; 5:6). With God the Father seated on the throne and the Holy Spirit represented by the seven lamps, the stage was then set for the revelation (chap. 5) of Christ Himself as the slain Lamb.

5. THE FOUR LIVING CREATURES (4:6-8)

4:6-8. A sea of glass, clear as crystal, was before the throne and reflected all the brilliant colors of the entire heavenly scene (cf. 15:2). In the center of the picture four living creatures were compared to a lion . . . an ox . . . a man and a flying eagle. Each of the . . . creatures had six wings and was covered with eyes all around. They were said to be continually praising God as the holy . . . Almighty (pantokratōr; cf. 1:8; 11:17; 15:3; 16:7, 14; 19:6, 15; 21:22), and eternal One (who was, and is, and is to come; cf. 1:8; 11:17). This is the first of 14 doxologies in the Book of Revelation (see the chart).

Many interpretations have been given of the four living creatures. As the Holy Spirit was seen symbolically in the seven lamps, probably the four living creatures symbolically represent the attributes of God including His omniscience and omnipresence (indicated by the creatures being full of eyes)—with the four animals bringing out other attributes of God: the lion indicating majesty and omnipotence; the ox, typical of faithful labor and patience; man, indicating intelligence; and the eagle, the greatest bird, representing supreme sovereignty.

Another possible view is that they represent Christ as revealed in the four Gospels: in Matthew, the lion of the tribe of Judah; in Mark, the ox as the servant of Yahweh; in Luke, the incarnate human Jesus; and in John, the eagle as the divine Son of God. Another alternative is that the four living creatures are angels (cf. Isa. 6:2-3), who extol the attributes of God.

6. WORSHIP IN HEAVEN (4:9-11)

4:9-11. The worship by the four living creatures is attended by the 24 elders also worshiping the One on the throne and attributing to God glory and honor and power (cf. 5:12-13) and acknowledging that He is the Creator and Sustainer of the universe (cf. John 1:3; Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:16-17; Heb. 1:2-3; Rev. 10:6; 14:7). They lay their crowns before the throne in ascribing all glory to Him as the Sovereign.

B. The seven-sealed scroll (chap. 5)

1. THE SEVEN-SEALED SCROLL INTRODUCED (5:1)

5:1. All of chapter 4 is an introduction to the main point of chapters 4–5, that is, to introduce the scroll with its seven seals. The symbolic presentation showed a scroll or a rolled-up parchment with seven seals affixed to the side in such a way that if unrolled the seven seals would need to be broken one by one.

2. THE QUESTION, "WHO IS WORTHY?" (5:2-5)

5:2-5. John saw a mighty angel (cf. 10:1; 18:21) and heard him ask in a loud voice, Who is worthy to break the seals and open the scroll? This is the first of 20 times "loud voice" occurs in Revelation. The last is in 21:3. The Greek word rendered "scroll" is biblion, from which is derived the word "Bible." When no one was found to be worthy, John wept and wept (lit., "kept on shedding many tears"). One of the 24 elders, however, told him not to weep, and introduced him to the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David (cf. Isa. 11:1; Rev. 22:16). The elder informed John that He had triumphed, that is, had already achieved victory, and that He alone was able to break the seals and open the scroll.

3. THE LAMB (5:6-7)

5:6-7. Though introduced as a "Lion" (v. 5), what John saw was a Lamb that appeared to have been slain or sacrificed. Yet the Lamb was standing in the center of the throne. About Him were the 24 elders and the four living creatures. The Lamb had seven horns and seven eyes.

The Lion and the Lamb surely refer to Christ, with the Lamb referring to His first coming and His death and the Lion referring to His second coming and His sovereign judgment of the world. This is the only place in Revelation where Christ is called a Lion, whereas the word "Lamb" (arnion, "a small or young lamb") is found 27 times in Revelation and nowhere else in the New Testament. But two similar words for a sacrificial lamb are used in the New Testament: arēn, found only in Luke 10:3, and amnos, which occurs four times (John 1:29, 36; Acts 8:32; 1 Peter 1:19).

Since horns symbolize strength (1 Kings 22:11), the "seven horns" represent the authority and strength of a ruler (Dan. 7:24; Rev. 13:1). The "seven eyes" defined as the seven spirits of God (cf. Zech. 3:9; 4:10) symbolically represent the Holy Spirit (cf. Rev. 1:4, 4:5). Because He alone is worthy, the Lamb took the scroll from the right hand of Him who sat on the throne (cf. Dan. 7:9, 13-14).

4. THE WORSHIP OF THE LAMB (5:8-14)

5:8. When the scroll was taken by the Lamb, the 24 elders fell down before the Lamb in worship. Each elder had a harp and golden bowls full of incense, which was interpreted as the prayers of the saints (cf. Ps. 141:2). While the angels presented the prayers, they were not priests or mediators. Only the harp (lyre) and the trumpet are mentioned as musical instruments in heavenly worship in the Book of Revelation.

5:9-10. In a new song the 4 creatures and 24 elders ascribed worthiness to the Lamb to take the scroll and break the seals, stating that the Lamb had been slain and had purchased men for God from every tribe and language and people and nation. Those He purchased with His blood were made a kingdom and priests to serve our God (cf. 1:6), and to reign on the earth. "Purchased" is from the verb agorazō, "to redeem." (See the chart, "New Testament Words for Redemption," at Mark 10:45.)

A textual problem exists in these verses. The Greek text used by the KJV indicates that the new song is sung by those who themselves have been redeemed: "Thou . . . has redeemed us to God . . . and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth."

The NIV, however, reads, "You purchased men for God. . . . You have made them to be a kingdom and priests to serve our God, and they will reign on the earth." If the KJV is correct, the 24 elders must represent the church or saints in general. If their song is impersonal as in the NIV and they simply are singing that Christ is the Redeemeer of all men, it opens the possibility that the 24 elders could be angels, though it does not expressly affirm it.

While scholars differ on this point, it would seem that since the elders are on thrones and are crowned as victors, they represent the church rather than angels. Angels have not been judged and rewarded at this point in the program of God. But angels soon join the creatures and the elders in praising the Lamb (5:11-12). The two different interpretations here should not mar the beauty of the picture and the wonder of this song of praise.

5:11-12. The elders were joined by the hosts of angels in heaven who added their words of praise in a loud voice. The words they sang are literally "they said" (legontes). This is in contrast to verse 9 where the 24 elders "sang" (adousin). In the angels' praise they ascribed power and wealth and wisdom and strength and honor and glory and praise to God.

5:13-14. Every creature in heaven and on earth and under the earth and on the sea and all that is in them joined the heavenly throng in words of praise to God. In this final act of praise the four . . . creatures said Amen, and the 24 elders fell prostrate in worship.

With the heavenly vision of chapters 4–5, the stage was set for the dramatic events to follow, the opening of the seven seals. It is clear from this revelation that heaven is real, not imagined. These two chapters reveal the indescribable glory and infinite majesty of the Godhead in heaven. The following chapters reveal this sovereign power of God expressed in judgment on a wicked world sunk in unprecedented depths of sin and blasphemy. Though believers today do not have the privilege of sharing John's vision or a similar one granted to Paul (2 Cor. 12:1-3), every believer can take the word pictures of Scripture here and anticipate the glory and the wonder of the heavenly scene that he will someday see with his own eyes.

C. The opening of the six seals: the time of divine wrath (chap. 6)

1. THE FIRST SEAL (6:1-2)

Five important questions must be answered before the events of chapter 6 can be understood: Are the events which begin with the breaking of the first seal past or future? Though many have tried to find fulfillment in the past (see Introduction), there are solid reasons for believing that the revelation concerns events yet future.

The vision in chapters 4–5 is described in 4:1 as "after this," that is, after the revelation to the seven churches which is described in 1:19 as "what is now," in contrast to "what will take place later." Since the scroll in 5:1 is "sealed," the clear implication is that the seals are broken at a time after chapter 5. All attempts to find fulfillment of the seals in history have failed to yield any uniform interpretation with no two commentators agreeing. Actually there is no sequence in history that clearly corresponds to these events. So it may be concluded that they are yet future.

A second question arises: What is the relationship of the seals to the Rapture of the church? In the letter to Thyatira the Rapture is pictured as yet future (2:25, 28) and the Rapture is in view in the letter to the church in Philadelphia (3:10-11). Beginning in chapter 6, however, there is no reference whatever to the churches or to the Rapture that is described in familiar passages (e.g., 1 Cor. 15:51-58; 1 Thes. 4:13-18). Since neither the Rapture nor the church are the subject of Revelation 6–18, many conclude that the Rapture of the church takes place before the events beginning in chapter 4 and thus precedes the Tribulation (for full discussion see Charles C. Ryrie, Revelation; Charles C. Ryrie, The Final Count- down; and John F. Walvoord, The Rapture Question).

A third question: What is the relationship of the seals to Daniel 9:27? Israel's program, concluding in the 70th week of Daniel, is best understood as related to the scenes here described in Revelation. Though some have tried to find historic fulfillment of Daniel 9:27, nothing in history really corresponds to it; so it is better to consider the last seven years as the final period leading up to the Second Coming and therefore still future.

A fourth question: Does Revelation deal with the entire seven years anticipated in Daniel 9:27 or only with the last three and one-half years, often referred to as "the Great Tribulation" or "a time of great distress"? (Jer. 30:7; Dan. 12:1; Matt. 24:21) Because the Great Tribulation is specifically mentioned in Revelation 7:14 and the same period is called "the great day of their wrath" (6:17), there seems to be clear identification of Daniel 9:27 with the events of Revelation. Most expositors assume that the events beginning in Revelation 6 cover the whole seven-year period. The Book of Revelation, however, never uses a seven-year figure but frequently refers to three and one-half years or 42 months (11:2; 13:5). Because the events of chapter 6 and afterward seem to coincide with the Great Tribulation rather than with the time of peace in the first half of the seven years (1 Thes. 5:3), there are good reasons for concluding that these great events are compacted in the last three and one-half years before Christ's return to the earth. Certainly at least by the fourth seal (Rev. 6:7-8), the events described anticipate a time of unprecedented trouble.

A fifth question: What is the relationship of the events of Revelation to Christ's sermon on the end times? (Matt. 24–25) As J. Dwight Pentecost points out (Things to Come, pp. 280-82), the order of events in Revelation and the order of events in Matthew are strikingly similar: (a) war (Matt. 24:6-7; Rev. 6:3-4), (b) famine (Matt. 24:7; Rev. 6:5-6), (c) death (Matt. 24:7-9; Rev. 6:7-8), (d) martyrdom (Matt. 24:9-10, 16-22; Rev. 6:9-11), (e) the sun and the moon darkened with stars falling (Matt. 24:29; Rev. 6:12-14), (f) divine judgment (Matt. 24:32–25:26; Rev. 6:15-17). It should be obvious that the events of Revelation have their background in previous prophecies, which aids in interpreting John's symbolic revelation. The evidence points to the conclusion that it describes the final period (probably the final three and one-half years) climaxed by the second coming of Christ to set up His kingdom (for further discussion, see Walvoord, Revelation, pp. 123-28; also cf. comments on Matt. 24–25).

6:1-2. As John watched the events after the opening of the first . . . seal by the Lamb, he saw a white horse with a rider holding a bow, wearing a victor's crown (stephanos), and going forth to conquer. Because Christ in His second coming is pictured (19:11) as riding on a white horse, some have taken it that this rider in 6:2 also must refer to Christ, as the white horse is a symbol of victory. Roman generals after a victory in battle would ride a white horse in triumph with their captives following. The chronology, however, is wrong, as Christ returns to the earth as a conqueror not at the beginning of the Tribulation but at the end of the Tribulation. Also the riders on the other horses obviously relate to destruction and judgment which precede the second coming of Christ by some period of time.

A better interpretation is that the conqueror mentioned here is the future world ruler, sometimes referred to as Antichrist though Revelation does not use this term. He is probably the same person as the ruler of the people mentioned in Daniel 9:26. This ruler has a bow without an arrow, indicating that the world government which he establishes is accomplished without warfare (see comments on Rev. 13:4). The future world government begins with a time of peace but is soon followed by destruction (1 Thes. 5:3). In general, the seals, trumpets, and bowls of divine wrath signal the terrible judgments of God on the world at the end of the Age, climaxing in the second coming of Christ.

2. THE SECOND SEAL (6:3-4)

6:3-4. With the breaking of the second seal a red horse appeared with a rider empowered to take peace from the earth (cf. "the red dragon," 12:3; the "scarlet beast," 17:3). In contrast with the first rider who has a bow without an arrow this second rider carried a large sword. This again was a picture of political power with the rider as the world ruler.

3. THE THIRD SEAL (6:5-6)

6:5-6. With the opening of the third seal a black horse was revealed with a rider carrying a pair of scales in his hand. At the same time a voice was heard from among the four living creatures saying, A quart of wheat for a day's wages, and three quarts of barley for a day's wages, and do not damage the oil and the wine! "A day's wages" refers to a silver coin, the Roman denarius, worth about 15 cents, which was the normal wage for a worker for an entire day. So this passage is saying that in that food shortage an entire day's work would be required to buy either a quart of wheat or three quarts of barley. If one bought wheat, it would be enough for one good meal; if he bought barley, it would be enough for three good meals but nothing would be left for buying oil or wine. Famine is the inevitable aftermath of war. This will be a major cause of death in the Great Tribulation. The black color of the horse speaks of famine and death.

4. THE FOURTH SEAL (6:7-8)

6:7-8. A pale horse was introduced when the fourth seal was opened. "Pale" is literally a pale green (cf. the same word used of vegetation in Mark 6:39; Rev. 8:7; 9:4). John stated that the rider's name was Death and that hades was following close behind him. Here is the aftermath of war, famine, and death. With war and famine people fall prey to a plague and the wild beasts of the earth. The startling fact is revealed that a fourth of the earth, or approximately a billion people by today's population figures, will be killed by these means. It should be obvious that this is not a trivial judgment but a major factor in the Great Tribulation, thus supporting the conclusion that the Great Tribulation has begun. The first four seals may be considered as a unit and a general description of the Great Tribulation as an unprecedented time of trouble (cf. Jer. 30:7; Dan. 12:1; Matt. 24:21-22).

5. THE FIFTH SEAL (6:9-11)

6:9. With the opening of the fifth seal John had another revelation of heaven itself and his attention was directed to souls pictured as under the altar and identified as those who had been slain because of the Word of God and the testimony they had maintained. (For "under the altar," see Ex. 29:12; Lev. 4:7.) These are obviously martyrs, mentioned in more detail in Revelation 7. This makes it clear that souls will be saved in the Great Tribulation, but many of them will be martyred.

6:10-11. They will cry out to the Lord, asking how long it will be before He will avenge them. In reply each is given a white robe and informed that the Tribulation is not over and that others must be martyred before God's judgment on the wicked and deliverance of the righteous occurs at the Second Coming. This passage shows that the time period is the Great Tribulation, but not its end.

Spirits without any substance could not wear robes. The fact that they will be given robes supports the concept that when believers die they are given temporary bodies in heaven which are later replaced by resurrection bodies at the time of resurrection (cf. 20:4).

6. THE SIXTH SEAL (6:12-17)

6:12-14. As the sixth seal opened, John recorded that a great earthquake occurred. More dramatic than the earthquake was the transformation of the heavens with the sun turning black, the moon turning blood red, and stars falling like late figs from a fig tree. The heavens appeared like a scroll being rolled up. At the same time, due to the earthquake, all the mountains and islands were moved from their places. Here again in the sequence of events, the end had not been reached as there was still another seal. But this was the most dramatic judgment thus far in this time of great distress before the Second Coming.

Many expositors have attempted to see a figurative fulfillment to this prophecy. It is preferable, however, to take this prediction literally. The trumpet and bowl judgments, to be revealed later in Revelation, also include great disturbances in the heavens and on the earth before Christ's second coming.

6:15-17. The practical effect of the judgment was fear in unbelievers from all walks of life. They called on the mountains and the rocks to fall on them and to hide them from God's wrath. Their fear was so great they would rather be killed by a falling mountain than to face the wrath of the Lamb and Their wrath, referring to the anger of the Triune God. Again this is not a picture of ordinary trouble but the period of greatest distress in world history.

Taken as a whole, chapter 6 is one of the most important and pivotal chapters in the entire book. It describes the first six seals and also introduces the seventh seal which consists of and introduces the seven trumpets and the seven bowls of the wrath of God in chapters 8–9; 16.

The contents of chapter 6 should put to rest the false teachings that God, being a God of love, could not judge a wicked world. It also raises the important question contained in the closing words of verse 17: Who can stand? Only those who have availed themselves of the grace of God before the time of judgment will be able to stand when God deals with the earth in this final period of great distress. Those who will be saved in the Great Tribulation are described in the next chapter.

D. Those who will be saved in the Great Tribulation (chap. 7)

1. THE SEALING OF THE 144,000 OF ISRAEL (7:1-8)

7:1-3. The question was raised in 6:17 whether any would be saved in the Tribulation. This is answered in this chapter, and two classes of the saved are mentioned specifically: (1) those who are saved in Israel, (2) those of all nations who, though saved spiritually, are martyred. Four angels were told to withhold judgment on the earth until the servants of . . . God were sealed (v. 3). The seal on their foreheads symbolizes protection and ownership and God's intention to protect the 12 tribes that are mentioned, much as He protected Noah from the Flood, Israel from the plagues of Egypt, and Rahab and her household in Jericho.

7:4-8. John heard the names of 12 tribes with 12,000 from each tribe . . . sealed and thus protected. The 12 tribes are not "lost" as some contend.

Attempts have been made to identify the 12 tribes here with the church, mostly to avoid the implication that this is literally Israel. The fact that specific tribes were mentioned and specific numbers from each tribe were indicated would seem to remove this from the symbolic and to justify literal interpretation. If God intended these verses to represent Israel literally, He would have used this means. Nowhere else in the Bible do a dozen references to the 12 tribes mean the church. Obviously Israel will be in the Tribulation, and though men do not know the identification of each tribe today, certainly God knows.

Much speculation has arisen about why the tribe of Dan is omitted. Joseph and one of his two sons, Manasseh, are listed, but Ephraim, Joseph's other son, is omitted. Thus if Dan were included, there would have been 13 tribes. According to J.B. Smith, Scripture contains 29 lists of the tribes of Israel in the Old and New Testaments and in no case are more than 12 tribes mentioned (A Revelation of Jesus Christ, p. 130). The tribe omitted was usually Levi, from which the priesthood came. Inasmuch as it is normal to have only 12 and not 13 tribes, the omission of Dan is not significant. Perhaps Dan was omitted here because it was one of the first tribes to go into idolatry (Jud. 18:30; cf. 1 Kings 12:28-29). However, Dan is mentioned in Ezekiel 48:2 in the millennial land distribution.

The most important fact taught here is that God continues to watch over Israel even in the time of Israel's great distress. There is no justification whatever for spiritualizing either the number or the names of the tribes in this passage, to make them represent the church.

2. THE MULTITUDE OF MARTYRS (7:9-17)

7:9-12. Then John saw a multitude of people from every nation, tribe, people, and language, who were standing before the throne (i.e., before God the Father) and in front of the Lamb (i.e., God the Son). This is the same group mentioned in 6:9, but here they were wearing white robes and holding palm branches, apparently signifying righteous triumph. As this multitude ascribed salvation to God and to the Lamb, all the angels, the 24 elders, and the 4 living creatures joined them in worship as they did in 5:9-10.

7:13-17. One of the 24 elders asked about the origin of those who stood in white robes. Is it not significant that if the 24 elders represent the church these described here are a different group of the saved? When John indicated that he did not know the answer (v. 14a) the elder himself answered the question as to who this multitude was and where they came from: These are they who have come out of the Great Tribulation; they have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

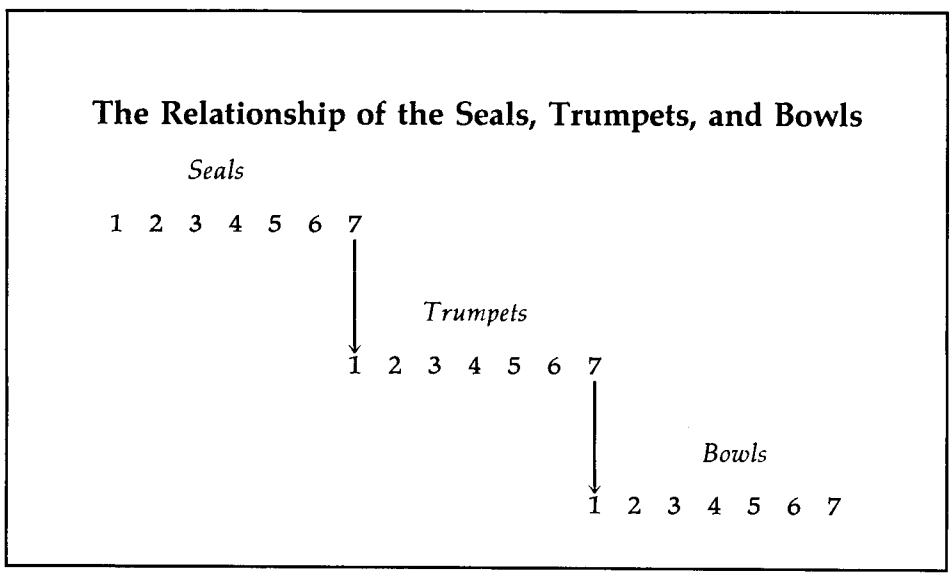
It seems evident that these "who have come out of the Great Tribulation" have been martyred and were then safe in heaven. They were given the special privilege of being before God's throne and serving Him day and night in His temple. They were protected by God Himself and never again would they experience hunger . . . thirst, or scorching heat, with the implication that this was their experience of suffering on earth. They were under the special shepherd-care of the Lamb and were drinking from springs of living water. The narration concludes with the comforting truth that all their tears would be wiped away.

The two groups seen by John were the 144,000 Israelites and a great multitude from every nation, including some Israelites who were not thus protected and who were martyred in the Great Tribulation. A natural explanation of these two groups is that neither represents the church, the body of Christ in the present Age, because both groups are distinguished from the 24 elders and neither group is clearly identified with the church in this present dispensation.



The events of this chapter, like those in other chapters to follow, do not advance the narrative but are a pause in the description of the events to spotlight a concentrated revelation on a special feature, in this case the answer to the question of 6:17, "Who can stand?"

Though the chapters of Revelation are not all in chronological sequence, chapter 7 depicts a scene in heaven which precedes the second coming of Christ to the earth. Those seen in heaven were said to "come out of the Great Tribulation" (v. 14). The chapter accordingly indicates how they will be marvelously blessed in heaven after their trials on earth. The 144,000 will appear again (14:1-5), and the multitude of martyrs who were killed for refusing to worship the beast appear again at the time of the resurrection in 20:4. That they are not millennial saints should be evident from the fact that they will be in heaven before God's throne, and will have been resurrected.

E. The opening of the seventh seal and the introduction of the seven trumpets (chaps. 8–9)

1. THE OPENING OF THE SEVENTH SEAL (8:1)

8:1. The opening of the seventh seal is a most important event, confirmed by the fact that there was silence in heaven for about half an hour after it was opened. The contents of the seven trumpets indicate that they differ from the seven seals. W. Graham Scroggie states, "The trumpets, therefore, do not double back over all or some of the seals, but lie under the sixth seal, and proceed from it" (The Great Unveiling, p. 111). He also holds that the bowls of the wrath of God (chap. 16) "do not double back over the seal and trumpet judgments" (p. 112).

C.A. Blanchard holds the same position: "The series of three sevens are really included in one series of seven, that is, the seven trumpets are included under the seventh seal and the seven bowls are included under the seventh trumpet, so that we have in fact a single series in three movements" (Light on the Last Days, p. 58). The seventh seal accordingly is important because it actually includes all the events from 8:1 through 19:10.

2. THE SEVEN ANGELS AND THE SEVEN TRUMPETS (8:2)

8:2. As John observed the heavenly scene, he wrote that he saw the seven angels to whom were given seven trumpets. The fact that these are angels' trumpets distinguishes them from the trumpet of God (1 Cor. 15:52; 1 Thes. 4:16) and from other New Testament trumpets (Heb. 12:19; Rev. 1:10; 4:1).

3. THE GOLDEN CENSER (8:3-5)

8:3-5. Before the trumpets sounded, however, a dramatic introduction was given them by another angel, one in addition to the seven, who stood before the golden altar with a golden censer. In the Old Testament tabernacle a censer made of copper, probably heavy to handle, was used to carry coals from the brazen altar outside the tabernacle to the altar of incense inside. Later, in the temple, Solomon used censers made of gold (1 Kings 7:50; 2 Chron. 4:22).

This is the only reference to censers in the Book of Revelation, though golden bowls full of incense, which probably were not censers, are mentioned in Revelation 5:8. Like the golden bowls of 5:8, however, the golden censer offering incense here is symbolic of the prayers of all the saints.

This offering in heaven corresponds to the custom of offering incense on the altar of incense in both the tabernacle and the temple. The censer would hold the coals, and a separate vessel would carry the incense which was to be poured on the coals once the altar was reached. The resulting smoke was typical of prayer ascending before God.

In verse 5 the angel offered the incense on the coals before God, and then, taking the censer with the fire still in it, he threw it on the earth. As a result there were thunder, rumblings, flashes of lightning, and an earthquake. The picture is one of ominous anticipation.

4. THE FIRST TRUMPET (8:6-7)

8:6-7. As the first angel sounded his trumpet . . . hail and fire mixed with blood . . . was hurled down upon the earth, resulting in a third of the earth being burned up, including the trees and all the green grass. This devastating judgment, like that announced by most of the trumpets, primarily affected a third of the earth.

5. THE SECOND TRUMPET (8:8-9)

8:8-9. As the second . . . trumpet sounded, something like a huge mountain, all ablaze, was thrown into the sea. The result was that a third of the sea turned into blood, and this caused a third of the living creatures in the sea to die, and also a third of the ships were destroyed. It is best to interpret these events literally though the description of the sea being turned into blood may be the language of appearance as in the mention of blood after the first trumpet blast. Reference to blood as a divine judgment is found in the plagues of Egypt (cf. Ex. 7:14-22).

Obviously the results of these judgments are literal. The sea turned to blood results in the death of a third of the sea creatures, and the blazing mountain cast into the sea results in destruction of a third of the ships. The mountain is probably best understood as being a literal large body that fell from heaven. Since the results are literal, it is reasonable to take the judgments as literal also.

6. THE THIRD TRUMPET (8:10-11)

8:10-11. The judgment following the third . . . trumpet was similar to that of the second. But here the mass falling from heaven to earth was a great star, blazing like a torch. This fell on a third of the rivers and on the springs of water; in other words, waters other than the oceans.

The star was named Wormwood. Wormwood is a bitter desert plant mentioned only here in the New Testament. It is mentioned seven times in the Old Testament where it represents sorrow and bitter judgment (Deut. 29:18; Prov. 5:4; Jer. 9:15; 23:15; Lam. 3:15, 19; Amos 5:7).

Though many have attempted to interpret the third trumpet symbolically, it seems best to consider it as a large meteor or star falling on the earth from heaven and turning the water, as indicated, into bitterness so that people who drank it died. The contrast found in the Cross of Christ is symbolized in the sweetening of the waters of Marah (Ex. 15:23-25) and the turning of bitter judgment into sweet mercy, bringing life and hope. The third trumpet is another awesome judgment resulting in great loss of life.

7. THE FOURTH TRUMPET (8:12)

8:12. At the sound of the fourth . . . trumpet the light of the sky was reduced by one third. Without a third of the sun a third of the day was lacking normal light, and a third of the night was without light from the moon and the stars. Again the best interpretation is literal. Just as the first three trumpets dealt with a third of the earth, so the fourth trumpet dealt with a third of the heavens.

8. ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE FINAL THREE TRUMPETS (8:13)

8:13. Warning was given that the next three trumpets would be more severe and devastating than those which preceded them. The triple woe announced by an eagle warned of coming judgment. Eagles are also mentioned in 4:7 and 12:14.

9. THE FIFTH TRUMPET (9:1-11)

9:1-6. The events after the sounding of the fifth . . . trumpet are given considerable explanation, implying that this is a most important step in God's progressive and increasing judgments on the earth. Because of the he in verse 2 and "king" in verse 11, the star that fell to the earth was a person rather than a fragment of a star (cf. Isa. 14:12-17; Luke 10:18). Even in modern terminology it is customary to speak of an unusual athlete or performer as a star. This star, probably representing Satan cast out of heaven at the beginning of the Great Tribulation (Rev. 12:9), was given the key to the shaft of the Abyss ("bottomless pit," KJV). The "Abyss" (abyssos) is the home of demons (cf. Luke 8:31; Rev. 9:11; 11:7; 17:8; 20:1, 3; in Rom. 10:7 it is translated "deep"). Satan will be confined for a thousand years in the Abyss during the reign of Christ on earth (Rev. 20:1-3).

Here the star (Satan) used his key to allow demons in the Abyss to come out and afflict the earth. Visually this event was represented as a great smoke, darkening the sky and the sun. Out of the smoke came creatures called locusts with the deadly sting of scorpions. While they were harmless to natural vegetation and trees, they stung people who did not have the seal of God on their foreheads.

In chapter 7 the 144,000 of Israel were sealed, and protection from the plague was extended to all who knew the Lord in that day (cf. Eph. 1:13-14; 2 Tim. 2:19). In the Old Testament locusts were a fearful plague, for they were able to reduce the land to starvation by eating up all green vegetation (Ex. 10:12-20; Joel 1:4-7). These locusts, however, did not eat vegetation, but had the power to torment people for five months (cf. Rev. 9:10). Thus they might be demons who appeared in the form of locusts. This is confirmed by the fact that they came from the Abyss, the home of demons (Luke 8:31). Their demonic control over people was such, however, that though the victims desired to die they could not take their own lives.

9:7-11. The description of the locusts compared to horses prepared for battle is awesome: human faces . . . crowns of gold . . . women's hair . . . lions' teeth, ironlike breastplates, and wings that sounded like horse-drawn chariots rushing into battle.

Obviously John was describing what he saw but did not interpret each characteristic. The picture is one of Satan's awesome supernatural power and the demon world especially in relation to unbelievers.

Unlike the previous judgments which apparently were short in time this judgment extended for five months (v. 10; cf. v. 5). This is important as it refutes clearly the notion that all these judgments will occur in a brief span of time immediately before the second coming of Christ.

The demons had a ruler over them whose Hebrew name is Abaddon and whose Greek name is Apollyon. Both words mean "destroyer." Though Satan is sometimes portrayed as an angel of light (2 Cor. 11:14), here Satan and his demons are seen for what they really are, destroyers of people. This judgment confirms what was already intimated in preceding judgments, that the Great Tribulation, as Christ described it, will be a time of "great distress, unequaled from the beginning of the world until now—and never to be equaled again" (Matt. 24:21).

10. THE SIXTH TRUMPET (9:12-21)

9:12. The fifth trumpet described as the first woe is now to be followed by the two final trumpets, also called "woes" (cf. 8:13).

9:13-15. The sixth . . . trumpet seems to relate to the final military conflict described in 16:12-16 (cf. Dan. 11:40-45). At the sounding of the sixth trumpet John heard a voice coming from the horns of the golden altar that is before God. The sixth angel was then instructed to release the four angels . . . bound by the Euphrates River. These four angels are clearly demons, as holy angels are not bound. The release of these four is minutely timed at a particular hour and day and month and year, and they kill a third of the world's population.

The fourth seal (Rev. 6:7-8) resulted in a fourth of the earth's people being killed. Here a third of the remainder were put to death. These two judgments alone, disregarding all intervening judgments, would account for the death of half the earth's population. This fact is to be taken literally as it confirms the statement by Daniel (Dan. 12:1) and the words of Christ (Matt. 24:21) that the Great Tribulation will be without precedent and would end in the death of all mankind if it were not stopped by His second coming (Matt. 24:22).

9:16. The loosing of the four angels (not the same as the four angels of 7:1) resulted in releasing an army of 200 million . . . mounted troops. Most interpreters do not take the number literally, though there is good evidence that all other numbers in Revelation are literal. Even if taken symbolically, this figure clearly represents an overwhelming military force. Years ago Red China claimed to have an army of 200 million (cf. Time, May 21, 1965, p. 35).

Some interpreters say these millions are demons, but demons are not normally marshaled as a military force. The fact that John heard the number, as obviously he could not visually count 200 million men, seems to lend credence to the concept that this is literal and predicts that an army will come from the East crossing the dried-up Euphrates River (16:12).

Great dams have already been placed across the Euphrates River to divert water for irrigation so that at times the riverbed is dry or partially so. A large invasion from the East and North in the end times is predicted in Daniel 11:44.

9:17-19. The horses and their riders had breastplates of red, dark blue, and yellow. The lionlike heads of the horses imply something other than natural horses. Furthermore, John declared, out of their mouths came fire, smoke, and sulfur. Some have taken this as a picture of modern warfare including the use of armed vehicles such as tanks. Whether symbolic or literal, the passage certainly implies terrible destruction and an awesome invading force. The results are twice stated and include the death of a third of mankind (vv. 15, 18).

9:20-21. Though the judgment was devastating and obviously from God, it did not bring men to repentance, and they continued to worship demons and their representation in idols and kept on murdering and participating in the occult (magic arts, pharmakeiōn, from which is derived "pharmacies"; cf. Gal. 5:20; Rev. 18:23; 21:8; 22:15), their sexual immorality, and thievery.

The trumpet judgments clearly grew in a crescendo, becoming worse and more devastating. In spite of the clear evidence of God's power to judge the world, no evidence was given John that there would be any change of heart on the part of the great mass of humanity. Though the sixth judgment produced fear, it did not produce repentance.

F. The mighty angel and the little scroll (chap. 10)

1. THE INTRODUCTION OF THE ANGEL HOLDING THE SCROLL (10:1-4)

Chapter 7 dealt parenthetically with the 144,000 and the many martyrs, without advancing chronologically the events of the Great Tribulation. Similarly 10:1–11:14 give additional information as a background to the seal, trumpet, and bowl judgments.

Another angel was introduced, apparently not one of the seven angels sounding the trumpets. Some believe this angel was Christ, pointing to the angel mentioned in 8:3 as also probably a representation of Christ as a priest. But though Christ appeared frequently as the Angel of Jehovah in the Old Testament (e.g., Gen. 16:13; 24:7; 31:11, 13; Jud. 6:22), there is no evidence that this person was other than a mighty angel (cf. Rev. 5:2), perhaps Michael the archangel.

10:1-4. This angel, however, was pictured dramatically as robed in a cloud, having a rainbow above his head, his face brilliant with glory like the sun, and with his legs . . . like fiery pillars. John added that the angel held a little scroll and stood with his right foot on the sea and his left foot on the land. At the same time he shouted like the roar of a lion. The scene is certainly one to inspire awe, and when this angel shouted, the voices of the seven thunders spoke. John was forbidden to record what the seven thunders said. While Revelation is primarily designed to reveal and not to conceal God's purpose and future events, some revelation was kept hidden as illustrated by God's prohibiting John to write what "the voices" of the seven thunders said.

In contrast with the seven-sealed scroll (biblion) held by the Lamb (5:1), this angel held a small scroll (biblaridion, also used in 10:9-10). This scroll apparently contained the angel's written order for the mission he was about to fulfill.

2. THE ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE IMPENDING END (10:5-7)

10:5-7. The dramatic introduction of this angel (in vv. 1-4) was a preparation for the pronouncement which followed in verses 5-7. Solemnly swearing by God the eternal Creator, the angel declared, There will be no more delay! The KJV rendering, "There shall be time no longer," has been mistakenly interpreted as an abolishment of the present time system with its sequence of events. But this is not the thought of the passage, as the NIV translation is accurate. The clear reference to God as Creator (cf. 4:11; 14:7) answers evolutionary speculation as to the origin of the earth, and it also affirms the omnipotence of God in dealing with the world in judgment when the time is ripe.

Announcement was made that the seventh . . . trumpet would bring about the accomplishment of the mystery of God. This mystery had been previously announced to God's prophets. The reference, therefore, is not to hidden truth but to the fulfillment of many Old Testament passages which refer to the glorious return of the Son of God and the establishment of His kingdom of righteousness and peace on the earth. While God's purposes are not necessarily revealed in current events where Satan is allowed power and manifestation, the time will come when Satan no longer will be in power and the predictions of the Old Testament prophets will be fulfilled. Then all will know the Lord and the truth about Him (Jer. 31:34). Here again is evidence that the seventh trumpet introduces the seven bowl judgments of God's wrath described in Revelation 16.

3. THE EATING OF THE SCROLL (10:8-11)

10:8-11. John obeyed the angel's instruction to eat the scroll, and though it was sweet (like honey) in his mouth, it soured in his stomach. The angel then added that John would prophesy again.

What does this incident mean? Though no interpretation was given John, it is evident that in partaking of the book he was appropriating what the book states (cf. Jer. 15:16). The scroll seems to symbolize the Word of God and divine revelation in general, for John was told to deliver the Word faithfully.

To John the Word of God was indeed sweet with its revelation of the grace of God and its many precious promises that belong to believers. As such it sharply contrasted with his circumstances on Patmos Island. David stated, "The ordinances of the Lord are sure and altogether righteous. They are more precious than gold, than much pure gold; they are sweeter than honey, than honey from the comb" (Ps. 19:9-10). Though the Word is sweet to believers, it will be bitter to unbelievers when it brings divine judgment on them.

G. The two witnesses (11:1-14)

While it is clear that 11:1-14 continues the parenthetical section begun in 10:1, an amazing variation of interpretations of this portion of Scripture have been offered. Alford calls this chapter "one of the most difficult in the whole Apocalypse" (The Greek Testament, 4:655).

The best guideline to follow in interpreting this section is to take each fact literally. In line with this principle, a literal temple will be in existence during the Great Tribulation, and the city should be considered the literal city Jerusalem in keeping with its identification in 11:8. The time periods of 42 months (v. 2) and three and one-half days (vv. 9, 11) again should be considered literally. The earthquake will kill literally 7,000 individuals, and the two witnesses should be considered as two individual men.

1. THE MEASURING OF THE TEMPLE (11:1-2)

11:1-2. John was given a reed, a lightweight rod, to be used as a measuring instrument. John was instructed to measure the temple and the altar but not the outer court, meaning he was to measure the holy place and the holy of holies. While others could come into the outer court, only priests could enter into those two temple rooms. The explanation was given that this would be under the control of the Gentiles who would trample on the holy city for 42 months.

Why should John measure the temple? Measurement is usually taken of one's possessions, and the temple belonged to God. In a similar way the temple of Ezekiel 40 was measured and the New Jerusalem was measured (Rev. 21:15-17). The temple here will be constructed so that orthodox Jews can offer sacrifices according to the Mosaic Law in the period in the first half of the seven-year period known as Daniel's 70th week. At the beginning of the 42-month Great Tribulation, however, the sacrifices will stop and the temple will be desecrated and become a shrine for the world ruler of the Great Tribulation who will put an idol in it and proclaim himself to be God (cf. Dan. 9:27; 12:11; 2 Thes. 2:4; Rev. 13:14-15).

John was also instructed, however, to count the worshipers who came to the temple. Here the thought seems to be that God will evaluate both the temple and those in it.

The tendency of some is to spiritualize the 42-month length of the Great Tribulation, but this should be taken as a literal period, as confirmed by the 1,260 days of 11:3 which are 42 months of 30 days each. From this it is also clear that "the times of the Gentiles" (Luke 21:24) will not end until the second coming of Christ to the earth to set up His kingdom. Though Jews may possess Jerusalem temporarily, as they have in this century, they will lose possession in the Great Tribulation.

Some believe that the 42 months refer to the first half of Daniel's 70th week (Dan. 9:27). While it is not clear, the evidence surrounding this passage in Revelation seems to refer to the final three and one-half years. This also seems to be confirmed by the fact that in the first half of the last seven years the Jews will actually possess the city of Jerusalem and worship in their temple, whereas here the context indicates that this is the period when Gentiles will tread down the Holy City, implying ill treatment of the Jews and desecration of the temple.

2. THE MINISTRY OF THE TWO WITNESSES (11:3-6)

11:3-6. It was revealed to John that the two witnesses would be empowered by God to serve as prophets for 1,260 days or 42 months. They would be clothed in sackcloth and would be called two olive trees and two lampstands.

Numerous and varied interpretations have been given concerning the two witnesses. Some have suggested that they are not literal individuals. However, in view of the fact that they die and are resurrected, the implication is that they are actual people.

Another problem is their identification. A common interpretation is that they are Moses and Elijah because the judgments inflicted by Moses and Elijah in the Old Testament are similar to those of these two witnesses (11:5-6). Further support is given the identification of Elijah because of the prediction (Mal. 4:5) that he will appear "before that great and dreadful day of the Lord comes." Christ said this prophecy of Elijah was partially fulfilled in His lifetime (Matt. 17:10-13; Mark 9:11-13; cf. Luke 1:17). And both Moses and Elijah were involved in the transfiguration (Matt. 17:3), which anticipated the Second Coming. But a problem with this suggested identity is that Moses had already died once. Some have identified the two witnesses as Enoch and Elijah inasmuch as they did not die but were translated (cf. Heb. 9:27).

While there is room for considerable discussion of these various views, the fact is that the passage does not identify the two witnesses, and they probably do not have historic identification.

The description of the two witnesses as olive trees and lampstands has an Old Testament background (Zech. 4:2-14). The two witnesses in this passage were Joshua the high priest and Zerubbabel the governor. Their connection to the lampstands was that they were empowered by the Holy Spirit, symbolized by the olive oil. In a similar way the two witnesses of Revelation 11 will be empowered by the Holy Spirit.

Like prophets of old the two witnesses will be able to do supernatural miracles, and fire will destroy those who will try to harm them (Rev. 11:5). Like Elijah they will have power to stop rain, and will have power like Moses to turn water into blood and to bring on plagues (v. 6). In the midst of the unbelief, apostasy, and satanic power of the Great Tribulation these two witnesses will be a threat to the entire wicked world for a literal period of 1,260 days.

3. THE DEATH OF THE TWO WITNESSES (11:7-10)

11:7-10. With the ministry of the two witnesses ended, God permitted the beast that comes up from the Abyss (cf. 9:1-2, 11; 17:8; 20:1, 3) to overcome them. The beast, that is, the Antichrist, is mentioned nine other times in Revelation (13:1; 14:9, 11; 15:2; 16:2; 17:3, 13; 19:20; 20:10). After the witnesses were killed, their bodies were left unburied in Jerusalem, figuratively called Sodom and Egypt, because of the people's apostasy and rejection of God.

For three and one-half days the whole world gloated over their dead bodies. This implies some worldwide display, now made possible by television. Their deaths were considered a great victory for the world ruler and Satan, and were celebrated by people sending each other gifts.

4. THE RESURRECTION OF THE TWO WITNESSES (11:11-12)

11:11-12. After three and one-half days in the street, however, suddenly the two witnesses were resurrected and stood on their feet. They responded to the invitation, Come up here, and went up to heaven in a cloud, while their enemies looked on with great fear.

5. THE RESULTING JUDGMENT OF GOD ON JERUSALEM (11:13-14)

11:13-14. At the same moment an earthquake occurred in Jerusalem with a 10th of the city collapsing and 7,000 people were killed. In contrast with previous judgments where revolt and rebellion against God continued, the survivors were terrified and gave glory to the God of heaven. So ended the second woe, leaving only the seventh trumpet, the final and third woe, to come.

H. The sounding of the seventh trumpet (11:15-19)

11:15. Though the full results from the sounding of the seventh . . . trumpet are only introduced here and not brought to finality (as they will be in chap. 16), the introduction of the seventh trumpet itself is dramatic. As the trumpet sounded, voices were heard in heaven: The kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ, and He will reign forever and ever. (Cf. predictions of the earthly kingdom of Christ in Ezek. 21:26-27; Dan. 2:35, 44; 4:3; 6:26; 7:14, 26-27; Zech. 14:9.) The fact that this will be fulfilled at the Second Coming makes it clear that the period of the seventh trumpet chronologically reaches to Christ's return. Therefore the seventh trumpet introduces and includes the seven bowl judgments of the wrath of God revealed in chapter 16. In contrast with previous trumpets where a single voice was heard, here a mighty chorus from heaven joined in the proclamation.

11:16-18. After this announcement, the 24 elders, who appear frequently (4:4, 10; 5:5-6, 8, 11, 14; 7:11, 13; 11:16; 14:3; 19:4) and who were seated on their thrones before God, were seen by John as falling on their faces to worship God. Their song of praise indicates that the time had come for God to judge the nations, to judge the dead, and to reward God's servants.

God was described as the Almighty (pantokratōr; also used in 1:8; 4:8; 15:3; 16:7, 14; 19:6, 15; 21:22), eternal (who is and who was; cf. 1:8; 4:8), and possessing power (dynamin) (11:17). In general their hymn of praise anticipates the second coming of Christ and the establishment of His rule on earth.

11:19. The chapter closes with another dramatic incident. John wrote, Then God's temple in heaven was opened. At the same time John was able to look into the temple where he saw the ark of His covenant. This refers to the heavenly temple rather than to a temple on earth. The corresponding results in the earth, however, included lightning . . . thunder, an earthquake, and a great hailstorm (cf. 8:5).

The dramatic introduction of the events relating to the seventh trumpet concluded here and will be resumed in chapter 16. Chronologically the time was close to Christ's second coming.

I. The seven great personages of the end times (chaps. 12–15)

Though the seventh trumpet was recorded in 11:15 as sounding, the details of what will come out of the seventh trumpet are not revealed until chapter 16. Accordingly chapters 12–15 view the prophecies of the end time from another perspective and introduce the great personages who are involved in the second half of the seven-year period.

Many have pointed out that seven personages appear in chapters 12–13: (1) a woman clothed with the sun, representing Israel (12:1-2); (2) the red dragon with seven heads and 10 horns, representing Satan (12:3-4); (3) the male Child, representing Christ (12:5-6); (4) the archangel Michael, casting Satan out of heaven (12:7-12); (5) the offspring of the woman, persecuted by the dragon (12:13-17); (6) the beast out of the sea, the future world dictator (13:2-10); (7) the beast out of the earth, the false prophet (13:11-18). These chapters do not advance the narrative chronologically, but present events and situations that are concurrent with the soundings of the trumpets. Chronological progress of events resumes in chapter 16.

1. THE FIRST PERSONAGE: A WOMAN CLOTHED WITH THE SUN (12:1-2)

12:1-2. The first great personage to appear was a woman clothed with the sun, with the moon under her feet and a crown of 12 stars on her head. She was called a great and wondrous sign (sēmeion mega, lit., "a great sign"; cf. 13:13). Undoubtedly the sign provoked wonder, as indicated in the KJV and NIV, but the translation "a great sign" (NASB) is more accurate, since John did not use the Greek word for wonder (teras). This was the first of a series of events called "signs" or "miracles" (12:3; 13:13-14; 15:1; 16:14; 19:20). As signs they were symbols of something that God was about to reveal and usually contained an element of prophetic warning. Though this sign was seen in heaven, the events which followed obviously occurred on earth.

The woman symbolized Israel, as indicated by Genesis 37:9-11, where the sun and the moon referred to Jacob and Rachel, Joseph's parents. The stars in the woman's crown clearly related to the 12 sons of Jacob and identified the woman as Israel fulfilling the Abrahamic Covenant. J.B. Smith cites Isaiah 60:1-3, 20 as proof that the sun refers to Israel's future glory (A Revelation of Jesus Christ, p. 182).

Many commentaries are so intent on attempting to identify Israel as the church that they ignore these plain indications that the woman is Israel. Robert H. Mounce, for instance, makes the woman "the messianic community, the ideal Israel . . . the church (Rev. 12:17). The people of God are one throughout all redemptive history" (The Book of Revela- tion, p. 236). While there is a unity of the people of God, this does not wipe out dispensational and racial distinctions.

The symbolism, while not referring specifically to Mary, the mother of Christ, points to Israel as the source of Jesus Christ. Thus it does not refer to the church. Wicked women are sometimes used to represent false religions, as in the case of Jezebel (2:20), the apostate church of the end time as a prostitute (17:1-7, 15, 18), and Israel as the unfaithful wife of Yahweh (Hosea 2:2-13). The church by contrast is pictured as the virgin bride (2 Cor. 11:2), the Lamb's wife (Rev. 19:7).

The woman was said to be pregnant and about to give birth (12:2). While in some sense this may be fulfilled in the birth of Christ to the Virgin Mary, the context seems to refer to the emerging nation of Israel in its suffering prior to the second coming of Christ. This is further supported by the verses which follow.

2. THE SECOND PERSONAGE: THE RED DRAGON WITH THE 7 HEADS AND 10 HORNS (12:3-4)

12:3-4. The second wonder (semeion, "sign"; cf. v. 1) appeared in heaven, though it actually related to scenes on earth. It was a great red dragon, having 7 heads and 10 horns, and 7 crowns on his heads. From similar descriptions in Daniel 7:7-8, 24 and Revelation 13:1, this beast represented Satan's control over world empires in the Great Tribulation. Revelation 12:9 identifies the dragon as Satan. The color red might indicate the bloodshed related to this period. The 10 horns presented symbolically the 10 kings (see Dan. 7:24) who reigned simultaneously with the coming world ruler and who were mentioned both in Daniel 7:7 and Revelation 13:1.

The casting down of a third of the stars out of the sky seemed to imply satanic power which extended to the heavens and the earth. Satan was seen here to extend his power over those who opposed him spiritually or politically. The dragon's attempt to devour the newborn Child (12:4) seemed to point to Satan's attempts to destroy the Infant Jesus. Satanic opposition to Israel and especially to the messianic line is clear in both Testaments.

3. THE THIRD PERSONAGE: THE MALE-CHILD, CHRIST (12:5-6)

12:5-6. When the Child—described as a Son, a male Child, who will rule all the nations with an iron scepter—was born, He was snatched up to God and to His throne. The Child obviously is Jesus Christ (Ps. 2:9; Rev. 19:15). Alford states that "the Man-Child is the Lord Jesus Christ, and none other" (The Greek Testament, 4:668). The catching up of the Child referred to the Ascension, not to the later Rapture of the church though the same word for "snatched up" is used of the Rapture (1 Thes. 4:17; cf. Acts 8:39; 2 Cor. 12:2-4). The Rapture of the church would not constitute a deliverance of the Man-Child from Satan.

The deliverance itself took place when the woman fled into the desert to a place prepared for her by God, and she was preserved for 1,260 days, which was three and one-half years or 42 months of 30 days each. Matthew (24:16) referred to the flight of Israel at the beginning of the Great Tribulation (cf. Mark 13:14). References to both desert and mountains are not a contradiction as both were wilderness areas. In her desert hideout Israel was cared for perhaps as miraculously as Israel was in her wilderness journey from Egypt to the Promised Land.

The time period was 1,260 days, later described as "a time, times, and half a time" (cf. comments on Rev. 12:14). This action (vv. 5-6) followed what is described in verse 7 as a "war in heaven."

4. THE FOURTH PERSONAGE: SATAN CAST OUT OF HEAVEN (12:7-12)

12:7. Michael the archangel (cf. Jude 9) and his angels fought Satan and his angels, that is, demons. The time of this war in heaven was not indicated but the context refers to the end time. The efforts of some expositors to make this coincidental with the first coming of Christ, linking it with Luke 10:18, are not justified by the context in Revelation 12. Also Satan is most obviously active throughout the period of the Church Age (cf. Acts 5:3; 1 Cor. 5:5; 7:5; 2 Cor. 2:11; 11:14; 12:7; 1 Tim. 1:20; 1 Peter 5:8).

The concept that Satan is inactive in the present Age is a false conclusion based on an attempt to place the binding of Satan at the first coming of Christ (Rev. 20:1-3). However, the binding of Satan is still a future event that relates to the millennial kingdom.

12:8-9. The outcome of the war was that Satan was hurled to the earth, and his character was clearly revealed in the various titles ascribed to him: the great dragon . . . that ancient serpent . . . the devil or Satan. With him went the fallen angels of the demon world.

While the concept of Satan in heaven is difficult to comprehend, it is clear that he is now the accuser of saints (cf. Job 1:6; Rev. 12:10). Though Satan was defeated at the first coming of Christ (John 16:11), his execution was delayed and is in stages. Here (Rev. 12:8-9) he will be cast out of heaven in the middle of the Tribulation. Later he will be bound for the duration of the millennial kingdom (20:1-3). The devil will finally be thrown into the lake of burning sulfur (20:10) where the world ruler (Antichrist) and the false prophet will have been cast a thousand years earlier.

Satan and his activities in heaven and earth opposed Christ as Priest in heaven, as King in Satan's world rule in the Great Tribulation, and as the true Prophet by advancing the beast out of the earth (13:11), who was the false prophet (20:10). Satan was identified as that ancient serpent, alias the devil or Satan, and was declared to be the one who led the whole world astray. When he will be cast into the earth, all the fallen angels or demons will be cast down with him.

12:10-12. John then heard a hymn of praise uttered by a loud voice in heaven. Announcement was made of the coming demonstration of divine salvation and power with the advent of the millennial kingdom. Satan was characterized as the one who accuses believers before our God day and night. The principle by which he was overcome and cast out of heaven was the blood of the Lamb and the word of their testimony. Not only did Christ provide the victory, but also those who were martyred took part in that victory. Those in the heavens were called on to rejoice because of Satan's defeat, but the earth was warned that the devil was filled with fury, because he knew that his time was short. The devil knew that his time was limited to 1,260 days, the period of the Great Tribulation. By no stretch of the imagination can these prophecies be spread to cover the whole Interadvent Age as some attempt to do.

5. THE FIFTH PERSONAGE: THE OFFSPRING OF THE WOMAN PERSECUTED BY THE DRAGON (12:13-17)

12:13-14. The woman introduced in verse 1 became the special object of Satan's persecution. She was given supernatural help symbolized by the two wings of a great eagle which enabled her to fly to the place prepared for her in the desert.

This hiding place was not clearly identified. Some suggest that it might be Petra, fortress capital of the Nabateans in Edom, south of the Dead Sea. This city has a narrow access which could easily be blocked but which opens up into a large canyon capable of caring for many thousands of people. Though Scripture is not specific, some believe the 144,000 of chapter 7 are to be preserved here. The Scriptures themselves speak of God's seal of protection on them.

The two wings probably do not refer to modern airplanes but rather to God's delivering power, and are a figure of speech taken from such Old Testament passages as Exodus 19:4 and Deuteronomy 32:11-12. The flight of Israel to a place of safety was also indicated in Matthew 24:16; Mark 13:14; and Luke 21:21.

Though Revelation 12:6, 14 referred to the refuge as a desert and the Synoptic passages referred to mountains, this is no contradiction as both desert and mountains are in a wilderness area. The length of time of her preservation was said to be a time, times, and half a time. This refers to the three and one-half years of the Great Tribulation with "a time" equaling one year, "times" equaling two years, and "half a time" indicating 6 months (cf. Dan. 7:25; 12:7 with the 42 months referred to in Rev. 11:2; 13:5). References to these specific time periods show that the Great Tribulation is not the entire present Age but the three and one-half years preceding the second coming of Christ.

12:15-17. Pursuing the woman, the devil as the serpent originated a flood to sweep her away with the torrent, but the earth swallowed up the water. Some have taken this as a literal flood, but since Israel could flee in every direction the contour of the Holy Land does not lend itself to such a flood. Probably the flood represents Satan's effort to exterminate Israel. This is thwarted by the rough terrain which provides hiding places. In some way God assists the Israelites so that they are not completely destroyed, though Zechariah 13:8 indicates that "two-thirds will be struck down and perish."

Though only one-third of Israel in the land is thus preserved (of which the 144,000 of Rev. 7 are a portion), Satan the dragon continues to war against the rest.

Revelation 12 introduces four important persons and one group of people living at the end time: Israel, Satan, Christ, the archangel, and the remnant of Israel. In Revelation 13 two important persons complete the scene.

6. THE SIXTH PERSONAGE: THE BEAST OUT OF THE SEA (13:1-10)

a. The beast out of the sea introduced (13:1-2)

13:1-2. Chapter 13 presents a most important personage of the end time—a beast coming out of the sea. His 10 horns and 7 heads, with 10 crowns on his horns, depict the revived Roman Empire, which was also represented by the fourth beast of Daniel, which also had 10 horns (Dan. 7:7-8; cf. Rev. 13:3; 17:3, 7). In Revelation 13 and 17 the beast is the world ruler, whereas in Daniel 7 the little horn on the beast was the world ruler.

The fact that the beast comes out from the sea indicates that he is a Gentile, for the sea of humanity is involved as his source (cf. Rev. 17:15).

Many have said that the beast refers to some character in past history, but the context clearly refers to the final three and one-half years before Christ's second coming. Under the control of this central ruler in the Middle East during the Great Tribulation will be 10 nations (cf. Dan. 7:24, "The 10 horns are 10 kings"). (For discussion of various alternative views, see Walvoord, Revelation, pp. 198-99.)

In Revelation 13:2 the beast was seen to gather in the symbolism of the three preceding empires—Greece (a leopard, cf. Dan. 7:6), Medo-Persia (a bear, cf. Dan. 7:5), and Babylon (a lion, cf. Dan. 7:4). The power of the beast was derived from Satan himself: the dragon gave the beast his power and his throne and great authority. This accords with Paul (2 Thes. 2:9) who referred to "the lawless one" (i.e., the Antichrist, this first beast of Rev. 13) as working "all kinds of counterfeit miracles [dynamei], signs [sēmeiois], and wonders [terasin]."

b. The fatal wound of the beast (13:3)

13:3. The seven heads of the beast seem to represent important rulers, and one of them, probably the seventh, suffered a fatal wound caused by a sword (v. 14), which was subsequently healed, causing astonishment in the entire world.

Many have attempted to identify this beast as someone in the past or present who is to become the final world ruler. Among the suggestions have been Nero, Judas Iscariot, Mussolini, Hitler, Stalin, Kissinger, and many others; but such men obviously do not fit the details of this yet-future ruler.

What is the meaning of the fatal wound that is healed? Two possibilities seem to fit this description. Alford, for instance, sees the deadly wound as the destruction of "the Roman pagan Empire" by "the Christian Roman Empire," thus making it a matter of history rather than prophecy (The Greek Testament, 4: 675). The revival of the Roman Empire would then be its miraculous healing. Another plausible explanation is that the final world ruler receives a wound which normally would be fatal but is miraculously healed by Satan. While the resurrection of a dead person seems to be beyond Satan's power, the healing of a wound would be possible for Satan, and this may be the explanation. The important point is that the final world ruler comes into power obviously supported by a supernatural and miraculous deliverance by Satan himself.

c. The worship of Satan and the beast (13:4-6)

13:4-6. The supernatural character of the beast makes him the object of worship along with Satan, the source of his power. It has always been Satan's purpose to receive the worship due to God alone, as stated in Isaiah 14:14: "I will make myself like the Most High." This is Satan's final form of counterfeit religion in which he assumes the place of God the Father, and the beast or the world ruler assumes the role of King of kings as a substitute for Christ. This situation is probably introduced at the beginning of the last three and one-half years when the Great Tribulation begins.

Recognizing the supernatural character of Satan and the ruler, the question is raised, Who is like the beast? Who can make war against him? (Rev. 13:4) This apparently explains how the beast could become world ruler without a war. His blasphemous assumption of the role of God continues for 42 months, during which time he blasphemes God as well as heaven and those who live in heaven.

d. The worldwide power of the beast (13:7-8)

13:7-8. The beast becomes a worldwide ruler, for his authority extends over every tribe, people, language, and nation. As predicted in Daniel 7:23, he does "devour the whole earth, trampling it down and crushing it."

In addition to achieving political domination over the entire world, he also abolishes all other religions and demands that everyone worship him (cf. 2 Thes. 2:4). All inhabitants of the earth worship the beast except for those whose names are recorded in the book of life. In the expression the Lamb that was slain from the Creation of the world, the words "from the Creation of the world" seem, as in the NIV margin, to relate to the time in eternity past when the names were written in the book of life, rather than to Christ's crucifixion, since He was not crucified when the world was created. As Paul wrote, those who were saved were foreordained to salvation before Creation (cf. Eph. 1:4).

Some hold that the book of life originally contained the names of every living person to be born in the world, and that the names of the unsaved get blotted out when they die. This interpretation stems from Revelation 3:5, where Christ promised the believers in Sardis that their names would not be erased from the book of life, and from 22:19, where a person who rejects the messages in the Book of Revelation is warned that "God will take away from him his share in the tree of life" (cf. "tree of life" in 2:7 and 22:2, 14 and "book of life" in 3:5; 17:8; 20:12, 15; 21:27). However, 13:8 probably means simply that those who are saved had their names written in the book of life in eternity past in anticipation of the death of Christ on the cross for them and that they will never be erased.

Taken together, verses 7 and 8 indicate the universal extent of the beast's political government as well as the final form of satanic religion in the Great Tribulation. Only those who come to Christ will be delivered from the condemnation that is involved.

e. The exhortation to hear (13:9-10)

13:9-10. In a format similar to the exhortation to the seven churches of Asia Minor (chaps. 2–3) this passage gave an invitation to individuals who would listen. The dream of many today, of a universal church and a universal religion, will be realized in the end time, but it will be satanic and blasphemous instead of involving worship of the true God. In such a situation, appeal can only be made to individuals who will turn from it to God. In every age God speaks to those who will hear, a concept mentioned frequently in the Gospels (Matt. 11:15; 13:9, 43; Mark 4:9, 23; Luke 8:8; 14:35).

In contrast with the invitation addressed to the seven churches where each exhortation was addressed "to the church," the mention of churches is notably absent here. This is another indication that the church has been raptured before the time of these events. Revelation, instead of being interpreted as addressed only to first-generation Christians facing persecution, is better understood as an exhortation to believers in all generations but especially those who will be living in the end time. Those who are willing to listen are reminded that their obedience to the Word of God may result in their captivity or martyrdom (Rev. 13:10), so the exhortation closes, This calls for patient endurance (hypomonē, "steadfastness, perseverance"; cf. 14:12) and faithfulness on the part of the saints.

7. THE SEVENTH PERSONAGE: THE BEAST OUT OF THE EARTH (13:11-18)

a. Introduction of the beast out of the earth (13:11-12)

13:11-12. In contrast with the first beast who came "out of the sea" (v. 1), the second beast came out of the earth. He was similar to the first beast (thērion, "a beast," was used of both personages). However, while the first beast was a Gentile, since he came from the entire human race as symbolized by "the sea" (v. 1), the second beast was a creature of the earth. Some have taken this as a specific reference to the Promised Land and have argued that he was therefore a Jew. There is no support for this in the context as the word for "earth" is the general word referring to the entire world (gē). Actually his nationality and geographic origin are not indicated, and he is apparently the one referred to as "the false prophet" in 19:20 and 20:10. (For a comprehensive discussion of the two beasts see Alford, The Greek New Testament, 4:678-79.)

The second beast had two horns like a lamb, but he spoke like a dragon, that is, like Satan. From this it can be gathered that he was a religious character whose role was to support the political ruler, the first beast. He had great authority apparently derived from Satan and the political ruler, and he made the earth and its inhabitants worship the first beast, the one whose fatal wound had been healed.

The false religious system, which was supported in this way imitated the divine Trinity. Satan seeks to take the place of God the Father; the first beast assumes the place of Jesus Christ, the Son, the King of kings; and the second beast, the false prophet, has a role similar to the Holy Spirit who causes Christians to worship God. This is Satan's final attempt to substitute a false religion for true faith in Christ.

b. The miracles of the beast (13:13-15)

13:13-15. To induce people to worship the first beast, the second beast performs great and miraculous signs (lit., "great signs," sēmeia megala; cf. "a great . . . sign" in 12:1), including fire . . . from heaven. People sometimes overlook the fact that, while God can do supernatural things, Satan within certain limitations can also perform miracles, and he used this power to the full in this situation to induce people to worship Satan's substitute for Christ. Accordingly the second beast deceived the inhabitants of the earth.

In addition to causing fire to come down from heaven, the second beast set up an image of the first beast. The image was probably set up in the first temple in Jerusalem which was taken over from the Jews. According to Paul (2 Thes. 2:4) the first beast actually sat in God's temple at times and received worship which properly belonged to God. Perhaps the beast's image was placed in the same temple to provide an object of worship when the beast himself was not there.

This image was mentioned frequently (Rev. 13:14-15; 14:9, 11; 15:2; 16:2; 19:20; 20:4). Whether the image was in the form of the world ruler, the first beast, or merely some object of worship is not clear, but it did seem to symbolize the power of the first beast.

The fact that the second beast could give breath to the image of the first beast, even making it speak, has created problems for expositors, for the Bible does not seem to indicate that Satan has the power to give life to an inanimate object. Only God is the Creator. So probably the beast's image is able to give an impression of breathing and speaking mechanically, like computerized talking robots today. There might be a combination of natural and supernatural powers to enable the beast out of the earth to accomplish his purpose. It apparently was quite convincing to people and induced them to worship the image.

The command to worship the image as well as the first beast was enforced by killing those who refused to do so. But there was a difference between the decree to put them to death and its execution. The problem of ferreting out everyone in the entire earth who would not worship the beast would naturally take time. Hitler, in his attempt to exterminate the Jews, took many months and never completed his task. The multitude of martyrs is referred to in 7:9-17.

c. The mark of the beast (13:16-18)

13:16-18. Enforcing his control over the human race and encouraging worship of the beast out of the sea, the second beast required everyone . . . to receive a mark on his right hand or on his forehead, and without this evidence that he had worshiped the beast no one could buy or sell. The need to buy or sell such necessities as food and clothing would force each person in the entire world to decide whether to worship the beast or to bear the penalty. Apparently the great majority worshiped the beast.

There has been much speculation on the insignia or "mark" of the beast, but it could be any of several kinds of identification. Countless attempts have been made to interpret the number 666, usually using the numerical equivalents of letters in the Hebrew, Greek, or other alphabets. As there probably have been hundreds of explanations continuing down to the present day, it is obvious that if the number refers to an individual it is not clear to whom it refers.

Probably the best interpretation is that the number six is one less than the perfect number seven, and the threefold repetition of the six would indicate that for all their pretentions to deity, Satan and the two beasts were just creatures and not the Creator. That six is man's number is illustrated in many instances in the Bible, including the fact that man should work six days and rest the seventh. (For further discussion of the many views cf. Mounce, The Book of Revelation, pp. 263-65; Smith, A Revelation of Jesus Christ, pp. 206-7; and Walvoord, Revelation, pp. 209-12.)

The practice of gematria, the attempt to find hidden meanings in numbers in Scripture, was prominent in the ancient world. Maybe John had in mind a particular person whom his close associates would be able to identify. Literature from the early church fathers, however, reveals the same confusion and variety of meanings that exist today, so probably it is best to leave this puzzle unsolved. Probably the safest conclusion is that of Thomas F. Torrance, "This evil trinity 666 apes the Holy Trinity 777, but always falls short and fails" (The Apocalypse Today, p. 86).

Chapter 13 is important because it introduces two of the main characters of Revelation: the beast out of the sea, the world dictator; and the beast out of the earth, the false prophet and chief supporter of the political ruler. There is no evidence that either of them is a Jew though some have identified one or the other as an apostate Jew based on the expression "the God of his fathers" (Dan. 11:37, KJV). However, the Hebrew word 'ĕlōhîm is a general word for god, quite different from Yahweh, and there is no proof that in Daniel it refers to the God of Israel. In recent translations it is "gods" (cf. ASV, NASB, NEB, NIV, AND RSV). Thus while it has been popular to consider either the first or the second ruler of Revelation 13 as an apostate Jew, the supporting evidence is lacking. Both beasts are probably Gentiles inasmuch as this will be the final hour of the time of the Gentiles, when Gentiles will tramp underfoot the city of Jerusalem (Luke 21:24), and both rulers will persecute Jews as well as believing Gentiles.

Revelation 13, however, gives much insight into the character of the Great Tribulation. It will be a time of one world government and one world religion, with one world economic system. Those who will resist the ruler and refuse to worship him will be subject to execution, and the martyrs may outnumber the believers who survive. It will be Satan's final and ultimate attempt to cause the world to worship him and to turn them from the worship of the true God and Jesus Christ as their Savior.

This chapter also makes it clear that the postmillennial dream of a world getting better and better through Christian effort and gospel preaching is not supported in the Bible. Instead the final form of world religion will be apostate, satanic, and blasphemous. There are many indications today that the world is heading in this direction, with the corresponding conclusion that the coming of the Lord may be near.

8. THE RESULTING SCENE IN EARTH AND HEAVEN (CHAPS. 14–15)

a. The 144,000 on Mount Zion (14:1-5)

In chapters 14 and 15 various other details of the world scene in heaven and earth are introduced in preparation for the final series of seven bowl judgments in chapter 16 and the judgments in chapters 17–18.

14:1-2. First, another view is given of the 144,000 who were standing on Mount Zion with the Lamb. It is reasonable to conclude that this is the same group mentioned in 7:4-8, except that here they are in a later period of the Tribulation. Chronologically the vision anticipates the triumph of the 144,000 still intact at the time of Jesus Christ's return from heaven to earth. In contrast with many others who become martyrs, these people live through the period. But they are not the only ones to survive, as many Gentiles and Jews will turn to Christ in the end time and somehow escape martyrdom and be honored to welcome Christ at His return.

Again the scene in heaven is dramatic with a loud noise similar to rushing waters . . . thunder, and harpists (cf. "thunder" in 4:5; 6:1; 8:5; 11:19; 16:18; 19:6).

14:3-5. John wrote, And they sang a new song before the throne and before the four living creatures and the elders. These singers were apparently a heavenly group. They could be the multitude in white robes mentioned in 7:9-17. But there is no justification here for symbolizing Mount Zion as heaven. It is better to take the chorus as the 144,000 (cf. 14:1) who had not yet died and would still be on earth at the literal Mount Zion.

Reference to the purity of the 144,000 could be recognition that during the difficult times of the Tribulation they could not have led normal married lives. Or it may refer to spiritual purity, often symbolized by virginity (cf. 2 Kings 19:21; Isa. 37:22; Jer. 18:13; 31:4, 21; Lam. 2:13; Amos 5:2). In 2 Corinthians 11:2 the concept of virginity is extended to the entire church, including both sexes.

Some people believe that the 144,000 will be evangelists in the Great Tribulation. But there is no indication that the 144,000 were preachers or prophets; their testimony was largely from their moral purity and the fact that they were not martyred like many others. They follow the Lamb wherever He goes. John further stated, They were purchased from among men and offered as firstfruits to God and the Lamb. The word "firstfruits" suggests that these converted Israelites precede many others who at the Lord's second coming will turn to Him (Zech. 12:10; Rom. 11:15, 26-27). They were also described as blameless (amōmoi, a word used of sacrificial animals without defect) and as those who, living in a period of great satanic deception, were free from lying. The passage as a whole is a prophetic foreview of the triumph of the 144,000 when Christ returns.

b. The message of the three angels (14:6-12)

14:6-8. John was then given a vision of an angel carrying a message called the eternal gospel. The angel was commissioned to bring his message to every group of people on the earth. Because of the word "gospel," some have felt that this was a message of salvation or the good news of the coming kingdom. The context, however, seems to indicate otherwise, for the message is one of judgment and condemnation. The angel announced, Fear God and give Him glory, because the hour of His judgment has come. So the "eternal" message seems to be a message of God's righteousness and judgment rather than a message of salvation.

The first angel was followed by a second angel who announced that Babylon the Great, which intoxicated others with her adulteries, has fallen. This apparently is in anticipation of the description of that city (see comments on chap. 18).

14:9-12. A third angel followed with another judgment that worshipers of the beast and his image who receive his mark will be objects of God's wrath and will be destined for eternal torment along with Satan, the demon world, and all unsaved people. The everlasting character of this judgment is stated plainly in verse 11: The smoke of their torment rises forever and ever, and they will have no rest. Those who keep God's commandments and are faithful to Him will need patient endurance (v. 12; cf. 13:10). The doctrine of eternal punishment, though unpopular with liberal scholars and difficult to accept, is nevertheless clearly taught in the Bible. Jesus and the Apostle John say more on this subject than does all the rest of the Bible.

c. The blessing of the faithful saints (14:13)

14:13. After the solemn pronouncement of the third angel John heard a voice from heaven commanding him,

Write: Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from now on. To this the Holy Spirit added the promise, they will rest from their labor, for their deeds will follow them.

This passage is often quoted in regard to God's general blessings on all Christians, but the context indicates that the blessing is especially for those who die in the Great Tribulation. For them it is a blessed release from persecution, torture, and trial and a deliverance into the glorious presence of the Lord.

d. The messages of the second group of three angels (14:14-20) 14:14-16. John in his vision next saw seated on a white cloud one like a Son of Man wearing a crown of gold and holding a sharp sickle. Though some have identified "a Son of Man" as an angel, it is more probable that it is Christ Himself who is frequently called "the Son of Man" (cf. 1:13). In the Book of Matthew alone this title is ascribed to Christ more than 25 times (Matt. 8:20; 9:6; 11:19; 12:8, 32; 13:41; etc.). The sickle in His hand suggests judgment. And this is supported by the messages of the three angels (Rev. 14:15-20).

An angel called out to Christ to reap, because the harvest of the earth is ripe. The ripeness is in the sense of withered or overripe (exēranthē). What follows is judgment as the sickle is swung . . . over the earth. Alford holds that verse 14 refers to the harvest of the saints, and that verses 15-16 describe judgment on the wicked (The Greek New Testament, 4: 691). But it is difficult to imagine a harvest of saints as being withered or overripe.

14:17-20. Another angel had a sharp sickle, and a fellow angel commanded him to gather . . . clusters of grapes from the earth's vine, because its grapes are ripe. Here a different word is used for ripe (ēkmasan), meaning "to be fully grown" or "in prime condition." The grapes were full of juice and ready for harvest. In obedience the angel gathered the grapes and threw them into the great winepress of God's wrath. They were trampled there outside the city, probably Jerusalem (cf. "the great city" in 11:8).

The custom was to produce grape juice by trampling on grapes in a winepress. The result here, however, is different. Blood flowed out of the press rising as high as the horses' bridles for a distance of 1,600 stadia, about 180 miles. While this distance may be literal and may designate the area of judgment as around the city of Jerusalem, it is of course impossible for the blood to reach a height where it would touch horses' bridles. What this affirms is a tremendous bloodletting in which blood is spattered as high as the bridles of horses. This is a graphic picture of a great slaughter (Isa. 63:1-3). Other Scriptures (e.g., Rev. 16:14; Dan. 11:40-45) make it clear that there will be a world war of tremendous scope underway at the time of the second coming of Christ, and this may be a partial fulfillment of these prophecies.

Taken as a whole, Revelation 14 on the one hand refers to the preservation of the 144,000 through the Great Tribulation. And on the other hand it graphically declares some of the terrible judgments that will be inflicted on the world which rejects Christ and follows Satan's substitute for the Lord.

William Kelly regards this chapter as an outline of major events at the end of the Age: (1) the appearance of the godly remnant of Israel; (2) a testimony to Gentiles; (3) the fall of Babylon; (4) the doom of the worshipers of the beast; (5) the blessedness of saints who are martyred; (6) the harvest; (7) the wrath of God on the world (Lectures on the Book of Revelation, p. 330).

e. The seven angels introduced (15:1-8)

15:1-2. With the background of the scene in heaven described in chapter 14, John then recorded more details of God's judgment. He wrote that he saw in heaven another great and marvelous sign. Seven angels—each having a plague which all together were described as the seven last plagues—were introduced as the final step in the outpouring of God's wrath on the earth. This final "sign" relates to the preceding great signs of the woman in 12:1 and the red dragon in 12:3. These seven angels should not be confused with the two groups of three angels in the preceding chapter (14:6-20) or with any other previous group of angels.

John also saw what looked like a sea of glass mixed with fire. This is probably the same sea that was described in 4:6. Beside this sea John saw the martyred dead, the same group described in 7:9-17.

15:3-4. The victorious saints sang with harps the song of Moses . . . and the song of the Lamb. These may be two separate songs, the first referring to God's faithfulness to Israel and the second referring to their present situation in the Great Tribulation. Some, like Walter Scott, refer the song of Moses to Exodus 15 where Israel triumphed over the Egyptians (Exposition of Revelation, p. 315). Others, such as J.B. Smith, suggest that this is the song of Deuteronomy 32, which gives a comprehensive review of God's faithfulness to Israel (A Revelation of Jesus Christ, pp. 224-25). In this song in Revelation 15:3-4 God is praised for His great deeds, justice, truth (cf. 16:7), glory, and holiness (see 4:8 for a chart of the 14 doxologies in Rev.). Then a prediction is made that all the nations will worship God.

This description of praise to God and prediction of universal worship is in keeping with many other Scriptures and relates, of course, to the second coming of Christ and worship of God by the entire world in the millennial kingdom (Pss. 2:8-9; 24:1-10; 66:1-4; 72:8-11; 86:9; Isa. 2:2-4; 9:6-7; 66:18-23; Jer. 10:7; Dan. 7:14; Zeph. 2:11; Zech. 14:9). The awful hour of wickedness and blasphemy against God, which will characterize the period leading up to the Second Coming, will be followed by a full vindication of God's judgment and holiness in the next period.

15:5-8. As John continued to look at the heavenly vision, he saw the temple described as the tabernacle of Testimony. The allusion to a temple in heaven seems to be the heavenly counterpart of the earthly temple. As it was opened, the seven angels with their plagues exited from it. The clean, shining linen of the angels indicates their purity, and the golden sashes around their chests point to the glory of God.

John saw one of the four living creatures give the seven golden bowls filled with the wrath of God to the seven angels. When this was done, smoke filled the temple, making it impossible for anyone to enter it until the seven plagues were poured out on the earth (cf. Ex. 40:34-35). Taken as a whole, Revelation 15:5-8 presents a fearful picture of impending divine judgment on a wicked world. The judgments which are to be poured out (chap. 16) fully justify this ominous introduction.

J. The bowls of divine wrath (chap. 16)

Chronologically this chapter is close to the time of the second coming of Christ, and the judgments described fall in rapid succession. Alford says, "There can then be no doubt here, not only that the series reaches on to the time of the end, but that the whole of it is to be placed close to the same time" (The Greek Testament, 4:696). Daniel indicated that these closing days of the Tribulation will be a time of world war (Dan. 11:36-45). World events are now pictured by John as rapidly coming to their climax.

1. THE FIRST BOWL (16:1-2)

16:1-2. John recorded that he heard a loud voice from the temple instructing the seven angels to pour out the seven bowls of God's wrath on the earth. This is undoubtedly the voice of God speaking from His heavenly temple. The adjective translated "loud" (megalēs) is frequently used in this chapter (v. 17 also refers to the loud voice). But the same Greek word is used in connection with intense heat (v. 9), the great river Euphrates (v. 12), the great day of God Almighty (v. 14), a severe earthquake (v. 18), the great city (v. 19), Babylon the Great (v. 19), huge hailstones (v. 21), and a terrible plague (v. 21). The judgments being poured out are greater, more severe, more intense than anything that has happened in the preceding events. When the first angel . . . poured out his bowl of wrath, it produced ugly and painful sores on those who had the beast's mark and worshiped his image.

The question has been raised as to whether the bowls of the wrath of God are chronologically subsequent to or identical with the seven trumpets of the angels. There is clearly much similarity between the trumpet judgments and the bowl judgments. They both deal with (a) the earth (8:7) or the land (16:2), (b) the sea (8:8; 16:3), (c) the rivers and springs of water (8:10; 16:4), and (d) the sun, moon, and stars (8:12) with only the sun mentioned in the bowl judgments (16:8-9). The fifth trumpet dealt with demon possession with the sun and sky darkened (9:1-3), which is similar to the fifth bowl in which darkness will cover the earth and sores will cause agony among men (16:10-11). The sixth trumpet deals with the river Euphrates (9:13-14), and the sixth bowl will dry up the Euphrates (16:12). The seventh trumpet implies that the Great Tribulation is coming to its end (11:15-19), and the seventh bowl of the wrath of God records a loud voice from heaven, saying, "It is done!" (16:17) with resulting destruction of the earth by earthquake and hail, which is also included in the seventh trumpet (11:18-19).

Similarities, however, do not prove identity, and a comparison of the trumpets with the bowls of God's wrath reveals striking differences even though the order of the judgments is the same. In the trumpet judgments, generally speaking, a third of the earth or heaven is afflicted, whereas in the bowl judgments the effects of the judgments are on the entire earth and are much more severe and final in character. Accordingly it seems best to follow the interpretation which has long been held in the church that the seven bowls are an expansion of the seventh trumpet, just as the seven trumpets are an expansion of the breaking of the seventh seal. The order is climactic and the judgments become more intensive and extensive as the time of the second coming of Christ approaches. All indications are that the bowl judgments fall with trip-hammer rapidity on a world that is reeling under previous judgments and a gigantic world war. Some bowl judgments are selective and extend only to the wicked (16:2, 8-11), and several affect parts of nature (sea, rivers, sun, etc.).

In the first bowl judgment people who followed the Antichrist received painful sores. Sores also come with the fifth bowl (vv. 10-11).

2. THE SECOND BOWL (16:3)

16:3. After the second trumpet blew (8:8-9), "a third of the sea turned into blood," killing "a third of the living creatures" and destroying "a third of the ships" (8:8-9). In the second . . . bowl, however, every living thing in the sea died (16:3). It is probable that the ocean here did not chemically correspond to human blood, but that it looked like blood and had the same effect in killing everything. Just as in the second trumpet, the blood here is analogous to the first plague in Egypt (Ex. 7:20-25). As most of the earth's surface is covered by the seas, this is a worldwide, tremendous judgment.

3. THE THIRD BOWL (16:4-7)

16:4-7. Just as the third trumpet made "a third of the waters" bitter (8:11), so the third . . . bowl extends the judgment of the second bowl on the sea to rivers and springs and they became blood (16:4). John heard the angel in charge of the waters proclaim that God the Holy One is just in His judgments (v. 5). For God's work in turning the waters to blood is in response to the shedding of the blood of . . . saints and prophets (v. 6). This is echoed by a word from the altar declaring the judgment just (v. 7; cf. 15:3).

4. THE FOURTH BOWL (16:8-9)

16:8-9. This judgment focused the intense heat of the sun. In response people cursed . . . God and refused to repent (cf. v. 11). By contrast, the fourth trumpet (8:12) darkened a third of the heavens but did not include additional intense heat. It is clear from this and other prophecies that dramatic changes in climate will occur in the Great Tribulation.

5. THE FIFTH BOWL (16:10-11)

16:10-11. This judgment was directed toward the beast's throne, imposed darkness on the earth, and inflicted painful sores (cf. v. 2) on people. Again they cursed . . . God and refused to repent. This is the last reference in Revelation to a failure to repent (cf. 2:21; 9:21; 16:9; cf., however, 16:21). The fifth bowl is similar to the fifth trumpet (9:1-11) in that both will bring darkness, but the fifth trumpet has to do with demon possession rather than physical pain.

6. THE SIXTH BOWL (16:12-16)

16:12. According to John's revelation, the sixth angel poured out his bowl and dried up the river Euphrates to prepare the way for the kings from the East. There has been endless speculation about "the kings from the East," with many expositors trying to relate them to some contemporary leaders of their generation. A survey of 100 commentaries of the Book of Revelation reveals at least 50 interpretations of the identity of the kings of the East. The simplest and best explanation, however, is that this refers to kings or rulers from the Orient or East who will participate in the final world war. In the light of the context of this passage indicating the near approach of the second coming of Christ and the contemporary world situation in which the Orient today contains a large portion of the world's population with tremendous military potential, any interpretation other than a literal one does not make sense. Alford states it concisely: "This is the only understanding of these words which will suit the context, or the requirement of this series of prophecies" (Alford, The Greek Testament, 4:700).

This is related to the great river Euphrates because this is the water boundary between the Holy Land and Asia to the east (cf. comments on 9:12-16). While the implication is that the water is dried up by an act of God, the fact is that dams have been built across the Euphrates River in this century to divert water for irrigation so that there are times even today when there is little or no water in the Euphrates. The Euphrates River is frequently mentioned in Scripture (e.g., Gen. 15:18; Deut. 1:7; 11:24; Josh. 1:4). The drying up of this river is also predicted in Isaiah 11:15.

16:13-16. John was then given a symbolic and comprehensive view of the preparation for the final bowl of God's wrath. He saw three evil spirits that looked like frogs coming out of the mouths of Satan (the dragon) and the two beasts (Antichrist [13:1-10] and the false prophet [13:11-18]). One need not speculate on the identity of the three frogs, for verse 14 explains that they are spirits of demons performing miraculous signs. These demons go throughout the world influencing kings to assemble for the battle on the great day of God Almighty ("Almighty" [pantokratōr] is also used in 1:8; 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 16:7; 19:6, 15; 21:22).

While the meaning of this symbolic presentation is clear, there is a major problem involved in what the demons do. The coming world government in the Great Tribulation will be established by the power of Satan (13:2). Here, however, Satan, the world ruler, and the false prophet unite in inciting the nations of the world to gather for the final world war. Actually the war is a form of rebellion against the world ruler. Why then should satanic forces be let loose to destroy the world empire which has just been created?

The answer seems to be in the events which follow. Satan, knowing that the second coming of Christ is near, will gather all the military might of the world into the Holy Land to resist the coming of the Son of Man who will return to the Mount of Olives (Zech. 14:4). Though the nations may be deceived in entering into the war in hope of gaining world political power, the satanic purpose is to combat the armies from heaven (introduced in chap. 19) at the second coming of Christ.

The war is said to continue right up to the day of the Second Coming and involves house-to-house fighting in Jerusalem itself on the day of the Lord's return (Zech. 14:1-3). The reference to "the battle" (ton polemon, Rev. 16:14) is probably better translated "the war" (NASB). Thus it is better to speak of "the war of Armageddon" (see v. 16) rather than the "the battle of Armageddon." The war will be going on for some time, but the climax will come at Christ's second coming. "Armageddon" comes from the Greek Harmagedōn, which transliterates the Hebrew words for Mount (har) of Megiddo. That mountain is near the city of Megiddo and the plain of Esdraelon, the scene of many Old Testament battles.

Accordingly John heard the warning coming from Christ Himself: Behold, I come like a thief! Blessed is he who stays awake and keeps his clothes with him, so that he may not go naked and be shamefully exposed.

Christ's return is often compared to the coming of a thief. It implies suddenness and unpreparedness as far as unbelievers are concerned. Just as Christians are not to be surprised by the Rapture of the church (1 Thes. 5:4), so believers at the time of the Second Coming will be anticipating His return. Blessing is promised to the one who is prepared for the coming of the Lord by being attired in the righteousness or clothing which God Himself supplies.

Taken as a whole, the sixth bowl of the wrath of God is preparation for the final act of judgment before the Second Coming, and is the later stage of development related to the river Euphrates, anticipated earlier (Rev. 9:14). The time factor between the sixth trumpet and the sixth bowl is comparatively short.

7. THE SEVENTH BOWL (16:17-21)

16:17-20. The seventh angel then poured out his bowl into the air. John heard a loud voice from the throne, saying, It is done! A similar pronouncement followed the seventh trumpet (11:15-19). Here also John saw lightning flashes and heard thunder, which was followed by a severe earthquake (16:18). John was then informed that this will be the greatest earthquake of all time (other earthquakes are mentioned in 8:5 and 11:19), and the resulting description indicates that it will affect the whole earth with the possible exception of the land of Israel. The great city which split into three parts refers to the destruction of Babylon. The most important event, however, is that the cities of the nations collapsed. The huge earthquake will reduce to rubble all the cities of the nations (Gentiles). The stage is thus being set for the second coming of Christ. Obviously in the collapse of the world's cities there will be tremendous loss of life and destruction of what is left of the world empire.

Though Jerusalem is mentioned in 11:8 as "the great city, which is figuratively called Sodom and Egypt, where also their Lord was crucified," "the great city" here is specifically Babylon, as indicated in 16:19. God will give Babylon the cup filled with the wine of the fury of His wrath, that is, she will experience a terrible outpouring of His judgment. Some have suggested that this city is Rome, but is called Babylon because of its spiritual declension. While this has been debated at length by scholars (cf. J.A. Seiss, The Apocalypse, pp. 381-82, 397-420), it is preferable to view "Babylon" as the rebuilt city of Babylon located on the Euphrates River, which will be the capital of the final world government (cf. Walvoord, Revelation, pp. 240-41).

In addition to the terrible earthquake and probably because of it, John recorded, Every island fled away and mountains could not be found. These verses (vv. 18-20), if taken literally, indicate topographical changes in the earth which eventually will also include great changes in the Holy Land in preparation for Christ's millennial kingdom.

16:21. In addition to the earthquake, huge hailstones of about 100 pounds each fell on people. Such huge masses of ice supernaturally formed would destroy anything left standing from the earthquake and would no doubt kill or seriously injure those they hit. In spite of the severity of the judgment and its cataclysmic character the hardness of human hearts is revealed in the final sentence: And they cursed God on account of the plague of hail, because the plague was so terrible.

The question is sometimes raised why eternal punishment is eternal. The answer is that people in the hardness of their hearts will not change; they deserve eternal punishment because they are eternally unrepentant. With the final destruction coming from the seventh bowl of the wrath of God, the stage will then be set for the dramatic and climactic second coming of Christ, revealed in chapter 19. Before this event, however, a future detailed description is given of Babylon in chapters 17–18.

K. The fall of Babylon (chaps. 17–18)

Babylon—the source of so many heathen and pagan religions which have opposed the faith of Israel as well as the faith of the church—is here seen in its final judgment. These chapters do not fall chronologically within the scheme of the seals, trumpets, and bowls of the wrath of God, and expositors have had difficulty in determining precisely the meaning of the revelation in these chapters.

In general, however, in chapter 17 Babylon is seen in its religious character climaxing in a world religion which seems to fit the first half of the last seven years preceding Christ's second coming. Chapter 17 also records the destruction of Babylon by the 10 kings (v. 16).

Chapter 18, by contrast, seems to refer to Babylon as a political power and as a great city and as the seat of power of the great world empire which will dominate the second half of the last seven years before Christ's return. Babylon, referred to about 300 times in the Bible, is occasionally viewed as a satanic religious program opposing the true worship of God, but primarily it is viewed as a political power with a great city bearing the name Babylon as its capital. The end times bring together these two major lines of truth about Babylon and indicate God's final judgment on it.

1. RELIGIOUS BABYLON DESTROYED (CHAP. 17)

17:1-2. One of the seven angels (in chap. 16) who had one of the seven bowls invited John to witness the punishment of the great prostitute, who sits on many waters. This evil woman symbolizes the religious system of Babylon, and the waters symbolize "peoples, multitudes, nations, and languages" (v. 15). The angel informed John that the kings of the earth had committed adultery with the woman; in other words, they had become a part of the religious system which she symbolized (cf. 14:8).

17:3-5. John was then taken in the Spirit (or better, "in [his] spirit," i.e., in a vision, not bodily; cf. 1:10; 4:2) to a desert where he saw the woman herself. She was sitting on a scarlet beast that was covered with blasphemous names. The beast had 7 heads and 10 horns. The beast is an obvious reference to the world government (13:1). The 10 horns are later defined (17:12) as 10 kings who had "not yet received a kingdom." The 7 heads seem to refer to prominent rulers of the yet-future Roman Empire.

The woman was dressed in purple and scarlet, and was glittering with gold, precious stones, and pearls. Her adornment is similar to that of religious trappings of ritualistic churches today. While purple, scarlet, gold, precious stones, and pearls can all represent beauty and glory in relation to the true faith, here they reveal a false religion that prostitutes the truth.

In her hand the woman held a golden cup . . . filled with abominable things and the filth of her adulteries (cf. "the wine of her adulteries" in v. 2). This confirms previous indications that her character and life are symbolic of false religion, confirmed by the words written on her forehead: MYSTERY BABYLON THE GREAT THE MOTHER OF PROSTITUTES AND OF THE ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH. The NASB and NIV are probably right in separating the word "mystery" from the title which follows because the word "mystery" is not a part of the title itself; it describes the title.

The Bible is full of information about Babylon as the source of false religion, the record beginning with the building of the tower of Babel (Gen. 10–11). The name "Babel" suggests "confusion" (Gen. 11:9). Later the name was applied to the city of Babylon which itself has a long history dating back to as early as 3,000 years before Christ. One of its famous rulers was Hammurabi (1728–1686 B.C.). After a period of decline Babylon again rose to great heights under Nebuchadnezzar about 600 years before Christ. Nebuchadnezzar's reign (605–562 B.C.) and the subsequent history of Babylon is the background of the Book of Daniel.

Babylon was important not only politically but also religiously. Nimrod, who founded Babylon (Gen. 10:8-12), had a wife known as Semiramis who founded the secret religious rites of the Babylonian mysteries, according to accounts outside the Bible. Semiramis had a son with an alleged miraculous conception who was given the name Tammuz and in effect was a false fulfillment of the promise of the seed of the woman given to Eve (Gen. 3:15).

Various religious practices were observed in connection with this false Babylonian religion, including recognition of the mother and child as God and of creating an order of virgins who became religious prostitutes. Tammuz, according to the tradition, was killed by a wild animal and then restored to life, a satanic anticipation and counterfeit of Christ's resurrection. Scripture condemns this false religion repeatedly (Jer. 7:18; 44:17-19, 25; Ezek. 8:14). The worship of Baal is related to the worship of Tammuz.

After the Persians took over Babylon in 539 B.C., they discouraged the continuation of the mystery religions of Babylon. Subsequently the Babylonian cultists moved to Pergamum (or Pergamos) where one of the seven churches of Asia Minor was located (cf. Rev. 2:12-17). Crowns in the shape of a fish head were worn by the chief priests of the Babylonian cult to honor the fish god. The crowns bore the words "Keeper of the Bridge," symbolic of the "bridge" between man and Satan. This handle was adopted by the Roman emperors, who used the Latin title Pontifex Maximus, which means "Major Keeper of the Bridge." And the same title was later used by the bishop of Rome. The pope today is often called the pontiff, which comes from pontifex. When the teachers of the Babylonian mystery religions later moved from Pergamum to Rome, they were influential in paganizing Christianity and were the source of many so-called religious rites which have crept into ritualistic churches. Babylon then is the symbol of apostasy and blasphemous substitution of idol-worship for the worship of God in Christ. In this passage Babylon comes to its final judgment.

17:6. The woman symbolizing the apostate religious system, was drunk with the blood of the saints. This makes it clear that the apostate religious system of the first half of the last seven years leading up to Christ's second coming will be completely devoid of any true Christians. As a matter of fact the apostate church will attempt to kill all those who follow the true faith. John expressed his great astonishment at this revelation.

17:7-8. The angel explained the meaning of the woman and of the beast she was riding. The beast . . . will come up out of the Abyss, the home of Satan (11:7) and the place from which demons come (9:1-2, 11). This indicates that the power behind the ruler is satanic (cf. 13:4) and that Satan and the man he controls are closely identified. Their power is one. The fact that the beast was, now is not, and will come up in the future is another indication of what was introduced in 13:3. The supernatural survival and revival of both the world ruler and his empire will impress the world as being supernatural and will lead to worship of the beast and Satan. (On the book of life see comments on 3:5; 13:8. Also cf. 20:12, 15; 21:27.)

17:9-11. The angel informed John, This calls for a mind with wisdom (cf. 13:18). The truth that is being presented here symbolically requires spiritual insight to be understood, and the difficulty of correct interpretation is illustrated by the various ways it has been interpreted in the history of the church.

The angel informed John that the beast's heads are seven hills on which the woman sits. Many ancient writers, such as Victorinus, who wrote one of the first commentaries on the Book of Revelation, identified the seven hills as Rome, often described as "the city of seven hills." This identification has led to the conclusion this passage teaches that Rome will be the capital of the coming world empire. Originally Rome included seven small mountains along the Tiber River, and the hills were given the names Palatine, Aventine, Caelian, Equiline, Viminal, Quirimal, and Capitoline. Later, however, the city expanded to include the hill Janiculum and also a hill to the north called Pincian. While Rome is often referred to as having seven hills or mountains, different writers do not necessarily name the same seven mountains.

A close study of the passage does not support the conclusion that this refers to the city of Rome. Seiss, for instance, offers extensive evidence that the reference is to rulers rather than to physical mountains (The Apocalypse, pp. 391-94). This is supported by the text which explains, They are also seven kings (lit., "the seven heads are seven kings"). If the mountains represent kings, then obviously they are not literal mountains and refer not to a literal Rome but to persons.

This view is also supported by verse 10, Five have fallen, one is, the other has not yet come; but when he does come, he must remain for a little while. John was writing from his point of view in which five prominent kings of the Roman Empire had already come and gone, and one was then on the throne (probably Domitian, who caused the persecution which put John on the island of Patmos). The identity of the seventh king, the one to come after John's time, is unknown.

Verse 11 adds that the final world empire will be headed by an eighth king. . . . The beast who once was, and now is not. . . . belongs to the seven and is going to his destruction. The eighth king is obviously identical to the final world ruler, the man who heads up the final world empire destroyed by Christ at His second coming.

One possible explanation of the difference between the seventh and eighth beast is that the seventh beast itself is the Roman Empire marvelously revived in the end time, and the eighth beast is its final ruler. These verses show that in the end time, particularly during the first half of the last seven years, there will be an alliance between the Middle East ruler (the Antichrist) and the apostate world church of that time. This will come to a head, however, at the midpoint of the seven years, when that political power becomes worldwide.

17:12-14. Verse 12 explains that the 10 horns . . . are 10 kings. While many commentators have tried to identify 10 successive kings in the past, the passage itself indicates that they are contemporaneous kings who are heads of the countries which will form the original alliance in the Middle East that will support the future world ruler. They will receive authority for one hour . . . as kings along with the beast. While the 7 heads may be chronologically successive rulers of the Roman Empire who are singled out as prominent, the 10 horns by contrast are contemporaneous with each other, and as the text indicates they will receive political power for a brief time.

The 10 kings will unite their power to support the beast (v. 13), the Middle East ruler who will emerge in the end time and will make a covenant with Israel seven years before the second coming of Christ. Their antagonism to Christ is indicated throughout the entire seven years. And when Christ returns, these 10 kings will war against Him but will be defeated (v. 14). Interestingly Christ the Lamb is also the Lord of lords and King of kings (cf. 1 Tim. 6:15; Rev. 19:16).

17:15. Verse 1 stated that the woman "sits on many waters." These waters are now interpreted as peoples, multitudes, nations, and languages. This indicates that there will be one ecumenical world religious system, embracing all nations and languages.

17:16-18. The chapter closes with the dramatic destruction of the woman. The beast (the world ruler, the Antichrist) and the 10 horns (10 kings) will hate the prostitute and will bring her to ruin. While the exact time of this event is not given in this passage, it would seem to occur at the midpoint of the seven years when the beast will assume the role of world dictator by proclamation (Dan. 9:27; Matt. 24:15).

When the ruler in the Middle East takes on worldwide political power, he will also assume the place of God and demand that everyone worship him or else be killed (cf. Dan. 11:36-38; 2 Thes. 2:4; Rev. 13:8, 15). The world church movement, which characterizes the first half of the seven years leading up to the Second Coming, is thus brought to an abrupt end. It will be replaced by the final form of world religion which will be the worship of the world ruler, Satan's substitute for Christ.

This is part of God's sovereign purpose to bring evil leaders into judgment, For God has put it into their hearts to accomplish His purpose by agreeing to give the beast their power to rule, until God's words are fulfilled.

The final description of the woman is given in 17:18: The woman you saw is the great city that rules over the kings of the earth. The reference to the woman as a city is another link with ancient Babylon, this time regarded as a religious center for false religion. The apostate church represented by the woman was a combination of religious and political power. As stated in verse 5, the city and the woman are a "mystery," and are therefore a symbolic presentation. Verse 18, however, introduces the next chapter which seems to refer to Babylon more as a literal city than as a religious entity.

2. POLITICAL BABYLON DESTROYED (CHAP. 18)

18:1-3. Further revelation on the destruction of Babylon was made by another angel coming down from heaven. This contrasts with "one of the seven angels" mentioned in 17:1 and should not be confused with angelic representations of Christ. Angels do have great authority and often make pronouncements in the Book of Revelation. The power and glory of this angel was such that the earth was illuminated by his splendor (18:1).

The angel's message is summarized: Fallen! Fallen is Babylon the Great! The question has been raised as to whether or not this is another view of the same destruction mentioned in 17:16-17. A comparison of chapters 17 and 18 reveals that these are different events. The woman in chapter 17 was associated with the political power but was not the political power itself, and her destruction apparently brought no mourning from the earth. By contrast the destruction of Babylon in chapter 18 brings loud lamentation from the earth's political and economic powers. Instead of being destroyed and consumed by the 10 kings, here the destruction seems to come from an earthquake, and it is probable that this is an enlarged explanation of what was described in 16:19-21.

What is pictured here is a large prosperous city, the center of political and economic life. The judgment of God makes it a home for demons and a haunt for every evil spirit, a haunt for every unclean and detestable bird. For all the nations have drunk the maddening wine of her adulteries. This false religion is like a drug that drives men to madness. While it brought riches to merchants, it is now doomed for destruction.

18:4-8. Following the pronouncement of the angel, another voice from heaven instructed the people of God to leave the city so that they would escape the judgment to come on it (vv. 4-5). Babylon will receive torture and grief commensurate with her glory and luxury, in which she boasted that she was a queen (v. 7). Death, mourning, and famine, also fire, will come on the city in one day (v. 8).

18:9-20. When kings who were involved with the city see its destruction they will be grieved, and will cry, Woe! Woe, O great city, O Babylon, city of power! (v. 10) Merchants too will bemoan the city's downfall since they will no longer be able to carry on commerce with the city. The description in verses 12-13 indicates the great luxury and wealth of the city. This obviously refers to an economic and political situation rather than a religious one. The mourning of the merchants is similar to that of the kings: Woe! Woe, O great city . . . ! (v. 16)

Sea captains . . . sailors, and others in navigational occupations will lament in similar fashion: Woe! Woe, O great city . . . ! (v. 19) All three groups—kings, merchants, and sailors—speak of her destruction as sudden: in one hour (vv. 10, 17, 19). As the world mourns the destruction of Babylon, the saints are told to rejoice because God has judged her for the way she treated you (v. 20).

18:21-24. The final and violent destruction of the city is compared to throwing a large millstone . . . into the sea (v. 21). The lament follows that those who once characterized the city—harpists and musicians, flute players and trumpeters, and workmen of any trade (v. 22)—will not be seen in the city again. Nor will there be light and the joy of weddings (v. 23). The reason for her judgment is that by her magic spell (pharmakeia; cf. 9:21) all the nations were led astray from God (18:23; cf. 17:2), and she was guilty of murdering prophets and . . . saints (18:24; cf. 17:6).

The question remains as to what city is in view here. A common view is that it refers to the city of Rome, because of the prominence of Rome as the seat of the Roman Catholic Church and the capital of the ancient Roman Empire. Some find confirmation of this in the fact that the kings and sea merchants will be able to see the smoke of the burning of the city (18:9, 18).

Other evidence seems to point to the fact that it is Babylon itself, located on the Euphrates River, which in the end time will be converted into a ship-bearing river. When all the evidence is studied, the conclusion seems to point to Babylon being rebuilt as the capital of the world empire in the end time rather than to Rome in Italy. Bible expositors, however, continue to be divided on this question.

The events of chapter 17 will be fulfilled at the midpoint of the seven years, whereas the events of chapter 18 will occur at the end of the seven years, immediately before the second coming of Christ. The destruction of the city of Babylon is the final blow to the times of the Gentiles, which began when the Babylonian army attacked Jerusalem in 605 B.C. (cf. Luke 21:24).

With chapters 17 and 18 giving additional insight and information concerning the earth's major religious and political movements during that final seven years, the stage is now set for the climax of the Book of Revelation—the second coming of Christ (chap. 19).

L. The song of hallelujah in heaven (19:1-10)

1. THE HALLELUJAH OF THE MULTITUDES IN HEAVEN (19:1-3)

Revelation 4–18 dealt primarily with the events of the Great Tribulation. Beginning in chapter 19 there is a noticeable change. The Great Tribulation is now coming to its end and the spotlight focuses on heaven and the second coming of Christ. For the saints and angels it is a time of rejoicing and victory.

19:1. Beginning in chapter 19 a chronological development is indicated by the phrase after this (meta tauta). Literally this phrase means "after these things," and refers to the events of chapter 18. Accordingly John heard what sounded like the roar of many people in heaven praising God, obviously because of the judgment on Babylon. Interpreters have shown much confusion in understanding the order of the events in chapters 19–20; thus it is important to note that this praise in 19:1 follows Babylon's destruction in chapter 18.

The word "roar" (phōnēn) is literally a "sound," modified by the adjective "great" (megalēn). This loud noise is from a great multitude, the same phrase used in 7:9 where the "great multitude" refers to the martyred dead of the Great Tribulation. For them in particular the judgment of Babylon is a great triumph. The Greek word for Hallelujah is hallēlouia, sometimes translated "alleluiah." The word "hallelujah" is derived from the similar Hebrew word in the Old Testament. It occurs in the New Testament only four times, all of them in Revelation 19 (vv. 1, 3-4, 6). This is the biblical "Hallelujah Chorus."

19:2-3. In expressing their praise of God, God's glory and power resulting from and caused by His salvation are mentioned along with the fact that His judgments are true and just. The destruction of the great prostitute (cf. 17:1, 4) is a proper act of vengeance for her martyring the servants of God (17:6). The judgment that is wrought on her, however, is only the beginning of the eternal punishment of the wicked, indicated in the statement that the smoke from her goes up forever and ever.

2. THE HALLELUJAH OF THE 24 ELDERS (19:4-5)

19:4-5. The 24 elders and the 4 living creatures also sing a hallelujah chorus. This is another reminder that the 24 elders, representing the church of the present Age, are distinguished from the Tribulation saints, described in verse 1 as "a great multitude." The 4 living creatures, previously introduced in 4:6-8, seem to refer to angels who praise God. Still another voice of praise, apparently coming from an angel, also praised God and exhorted all you His servants (19:5) to join in this praise.

3. THE PROPHETIC PROCLAMATION OF THE WEDDING OF THE LAMB (19:6-9)

19:6-8. The fourth and final hallelujah of this chapter, according to John, sounded like a multitude of people, rushing waters, and loud thunder. Here the rejoicing is prophetic for what is about to happen rather than for the judgment just executed.

The second coming of Christ is anticipated in the words, for our Lord God Almighty reigns. John used the word "Almighty" (pantokratōr; also in 1:8; 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 16:7, 14; 19:15; 21:22). Along with the exhortation to rejoice, announcement is made that the wedding of the Lamb has come, and His bride has made herself ready.

In Scripture, marriage is often used to describe the relationship of saints to God. In the Old Testament Israel is pictured, as in Hosea, as the unfaithful wife of Yahweh who is destined to be restored in the future kingdom. In the New Testament, marriage is also used to describe the relationship between Christ and the church, but the illustration contrasts with the Old Testament, for the church is regarded as a virgin bride waiting the coming of her heavenly bridegroom (2 Cor. 11:2).

The fine linen with which the bride will be adorned is explained as representing the righteous acts of the saints (Rev. 19:8). (In the OT the high priest's clothing included linen: Ex. 28:42; Lev. 6:10; 16:4, 23, 32.) While some think this refers to the fact that the saints are justified by faith, the plural expression "the righteous acts" seems to refer to the righteous deeds wrought by the saints through the grace of God. Though all this has been made possible by the grace of God, the emphasis here seems to be on the works of the bride rather than on her standing as one who has been justified by faith.

This is the last of 14 outbursts of praise to God in the Book of Revelation by saints, angels, the 24 elders, and/or the 4 living creatures. The hymns or shouts of praise are in 4:8, 11; 5:9-10, 12-13; 7:10, 12; 11:16-18; 15:3-4; 16:5-7; 19:1-4, 6-8 (see the chart near 4:8).

19:9. The angel who commanded John to write (14:13) commanded him again to record the message, Blessed are those who are invited to the wedding supper of the Lamb!

One of the false interpretations that has plagued the church is the concept that God treats all saints exactly alike. Instead, a literal interpretation of the Bible distinguishes different groups of saints, and here the bride is distinguished from those who are invited to the wedding supper. Instead of treating all alike, God indeed has a program for Israel as a nation and also for those in Israel who are saved. He also has a program for Gentiles in the Old Testament who come to faith in God. And in the New Testament He has a program for the church as still a different group of saints. Again in the Book of Revelation the Tribulation saints are distinguished from other previous groups. It is not so much a question of difference in blessings as it is that God has a program designed for each group of saints which corresponds to their particular relationship to His overall program. Here the church, described as a bride, will be attended by angels and by saints who are distinct from the bride.

Expositors have debated whether the wedding will be in heaven or on earth. While the difference is not that important, the interpretive problem can be resolved by comparing the wedding described here to weddings in the first century. A wedding normally included these stages: (1) the legal consummation of the marriage by the parents of the bride and of the groom, with the payment of the dowry; (2) the bridegroom coming to claim his bride (as illustrated in Matt. 25:1-13 in the familiar Parable of the 10 Virgins); (3) the wedding supper (as illustrated in John 2:1-11) which was a several-day feast following the previous phase of the wedding.

In Revelation 19:9 "the wedding supper" is phase 3. And the announcement coincides with the second coming of Christ. It would seem, therefore, that the wedding supper has not yet been observed. In fulfilling the symbol, Christ is completing phase 1 in the Church Age as individuals are saved. Phase 2 will be accomplished at the Rapture of the church, when Christ takes His bride to heaven, the Father's house (John 14:1-3). Accordingly it would seem that the beginning of the Millennium itself will fulfill the symbolism of the wedding supper (gamos). It is also significant that the use of the word "bride" in 19:7 (gynē, lit., "wife,") implies that phase 2 of the wedding will have been completed and that all that remains is the feast itself. (The word commonly used for "bride" is nymphē; cf. John 3:29; Rev. 18:23; 21:2, 9; 22:17.)

All this suggests that the wedding feast is an earthly feast, which also corresponds to the illustrations of weddings in the Bible (Matt. 22:1-14; 25:1-13), and thus will take place on earth at the beginning of the Millennium. The importance of the announcement and invitation to the wedding supper, repeated in Revelation 22:17, is seen in the angel's remarks, These are the true words of God.

4. THE COMMAND TO WORSHIP GOD (19:10)

19:10. So impressive was the scene in heaven with the four great hallelujahs and the announcement of the coming wedding feast that John once again fell down to worship the angel, as he had done before (1:17). Then, however, he was worshiping Christ, which was proper. But here the angel rebuked him, urging him to worship only God and not him since he was a fellow servant with John. The angel added, For the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy, that is, the very nature or purpose of prophecy is to testify of Jesus Christ and to bring glory to Him. In the present Age one of the special functions of the Holy Spirit is to glorify Christ and to inform believers of "what is yet to come" (John 16:13). The tremendous revelation in the first 10 verses of Revelation 19 is a fitting introduction to what is about to be revealed, the second coming of Jesus Christ, the subject of the entire book (1:1).

M. The second coming of Christ (19:11-21)

As John saw heaven open, he saw prophetically Christ's second coming and the events which will follow it. The second coming of Christ is a prominent doctrine in Scripture (Pss. 2:1-9; 24:7-10; 96:10-13; 110; Isa. 9:6-7; Jer. 23:1-8; Ezek. 37:15-28; Dan. 2:44-45; 7:13-14; Hosea 3:4-5; Amos 9:11-15; Micah 4:7; Zech. 2:10-12; 12; 14:1-9; Matt. 19:28; 24:27-31; 25:6, 31-46; Mark 13:24-27; Luke 12:35-40; 17:24-37; 18:8; 21:25-28; Acts 1:10-11; 15:16-18; Rom. 11:25-27; 2 Thes. 2:8; 2 Peter 3:3-4; Jude 14-15; Rev. 1:7-8; 2:25-28; 16:15; 22:20). So this is obviously a major event in the divine program.

Conservative interpreters of the Bible almost universally recognize this as a yet-future event, as indicated in orthodox creeds throughout the history of the church. Just as the first coming of Christ was literal and was fulfilled in history, so the second coming of Christ which is yet future will be fulfilled in the same literal manner.

Among conservative interpreters, however, the question has been raised whether the Rapture of the church, as revealed in such major passages as 1 Thessalonians 4:13-18 and 1 Corinthians 15:51-58, is fulfilled at the time of the second coming of Christ to the earth or, as pretribulationists hold, is fulfilled as a separate event seven years before His formal second coming to the earth.

It should be noted that none of the many details given in Revelation 19:11-21 corresponds to the Rapture of the church. In Revelation Christ returns, but in none of the Rapture passages is He ever pictured as touching the earth, for the saints meet Him in the air (1 Thes. 4:17).

Most significant is the fact that in Revelation 19–20 there is complete silence concerning any translation of living saints. In fact the implication of the passage is that saints who are on earth when Christ returns will remain on earth to enter the millennial kingdom in their natural bodies. If the Rapture were included in the second coming of Christ to the earth, one would expect to find reference to such a major event in Revelation 19. But no such reference is to be found. For these and many other reasons chapter 19 is a confirmation of the teaching that the Rapture of the church is a separate earlier event and that there is no translation of the living at the time of His second coming to the earth. (For further discussion see John F. Walvoord, The Rapture Question.)

1. THE REVELATION OF THE RIDER ON THE WHITE HORSE (19:11-13)

19:11-13. As John gazed into heaven, he saw Christ on a white horse. Though some have identified this rider with the rider in 6:2, the context is entirely different. In 6:2 the rider is the world ruler of the Great Tribulation, while here the rider is a ruler who obviously comes from heaven itself. The white horse is a sign of His coming triumph. It was customary for a triumphant Roman general to parade on the Via Sacra, a main thoroughfare of Rome, followed by evidences of His victory in the form of booty and captives (cf. 2 Cor. 2:14). The white horse is thus a symbol of Christ's triumph over the forces of wickedness in the world, the details of which follow.

The horse's rider is called Faithful and True for, as John declared, With justice He judges and makes war. His piercing judgment of sin is indicated in the words, His eyes are like blazing fire (cf. Rev. 1:14), and His right to rule is evidenced by the many crowns He is wearing. Written on Him is a name that no one but He Himself knows, suggesting that Christ is the ineffable, indescribable One. But actual titles are given for Him. Revelation 19:13 says, His name is the Word of God (cf. John 1:1, 14; 1 John 1:1), and Revelation 19:16 states that the name of His robe and on His thigh is KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS (cf. 1 Tim. 6:15; Rev. 17:14). The rider obviously is Jesus Christ, returning to the earth in glory. That He is coming as Judge is further supported by the fact that He is dressed in a robe dipped in blood (19:13; cf. Isa. 63:2-3; Rev. 14:20).

2. THE COMING OF THE KING AND HIS ARMIES OF HEAVEN (19:14-16)

19:14-16. The drama of the scene is further enhanced by the multitude of the armies of heaven described as riding on white horses and dressed in fine linen, white and clean (cf. v. 8). In Christ's mouth was a sharp sword (cf. 1:16; 2:12, 16; 19:21) which He would use to strike down the nations. The word for "sword" (rhomphaia) was used of an unusually long sword and sometimes used as a spear, thus indicating a piercing action. In addition to using the sword for striking down, He will use an iron scepter for ruling (cf. Ps. 2:9; Rev. 2:27). Christ is also described as the One who treads the winepress of the fury of the wrath of God Almighty (cf. 14:19-20; and cf. "Almighty" in 1:8; 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 16:7, 14; 19:6; 21:22). This scene is a dramatic indication of the awfulness of the impending judgment. Matthew 24:30 indicates that those on earth will be witnesses of this impressive scene.

The scene on earth is the final stage of the great world war that will be under way for many weeks. With armies battling up and down the Holy Land for victory, on the very day of the return of Christ there will be house-to-house fighting in Jerusalem itself (Zech. 14:2). Combatants will have been lured to the battle site by demons sent by Satan to assemble the armies of the world to fight the armies of heaven (cf. Rev. 16:12-16).

3. THE DESTRUCTION OF THE WICKED (19:17-21)

19:17-18. The armies of earth are no match for the armies from heaven. The sharp sword in Christ's mouth (v. 15) is symbolic of His authoritative word of command that destroys earth's armies by divine power. Millions of men and their horses will be destroyed instantly. In keeping with this, John recorded that he saw an angel standing in the sun, who cried in a loud voice to all flying birds to gather together for the great supper of God to eat the carcasses of kings, generals, horsemen, and all people slain by Christ.

19:19-21. The beast and his armies will gather to fight against Christ and His army. The outcome of this battle—referred to in 16:14 as "the battle on the great day of God Almighty"—is summarized in 19:19-21. The world rulers—the beast and the false prophet—will both be captured. Their former miraculous demonic power will no longer be sufficient to save them. Both of them will be thrown alive into the fiery lake of burning sulfur.

The wicked who have died throughout the history of the world up to this point are in hades (Luke 16:23). The fiery lake, a different place, was prepared for the devil and his angels (Matt. 25:41), and will not be occupied by human beings until later (Rev. 20:14-15).

The armies themselves will be killed by Christ's sword (19:21; cf. 1:16; 2:12, 16; 19:15). The number of dead will be so great that the vultures will have more than they can eat. The defeat of the earth's wicked will then be complete, and will be finalized as later judgments search out the unsaved in other parts of the earth and also kill them (cf. Matt. 25:31-45).

The same inspired Word of God which so wonderfully describes the grace of God and the salvation which is available to all who believe is equally plain about the judgment of all who reject the grace of God. The tendency of liberal interpreters of the Bible to emphasize passages dealing with the love of God and to ignore passages dealing with His righteous judgment is completely unjustified. The passages on judgment are just as inspired and accurate as those which develop the doctrines of grace and salvation. The Bible is clear that judgment awaits the wicked, and the second coming of Christ is the occasion for a worldwide judgment unparalleled in Scripture since the time of Noah's flood.

N. The millennial reign of Christ (20:1-10)

This chapter presents the fact that Christ will reign on earth for a thousand years. If this chapter is taken literally, it is relatively simple to understand what is meant. However, because many Bible interpreters have rejected the idea that there will be a reign of Christ on earth for a thousand years after His second coming, this chapter has been given an unusually large number of diverse interpretations, all designed to eliminate a literal millennial reign. In general there are three viewpoints, each with a number of variations.

The most recent view is what is known as postmillennialism. According to this view the thousand years represent the triumph of the gospel in the period leading up to the second coming of Christ. The return of Christ will follow the Millennium. Usually traced to Daniel Whitby, a controversial writer of the 17th century, this view has been advanced by other prominent scholars in the history of the church including Charles Hodge, A.H. Strong, David Brown, and more recently, Loraine Boettner. Basically it is an optimistic view that Christ will reign spiritually on earth through the work of the church and the preaching of the gospel. This view has largely been discarded in the 20th century, because many anti-Christian movements have prospered and the world has not progressed spiritually.

A second major view is amillennialism, which denies that there is any literal Millennium or reign of Christ on earth. The millennial reign of Christ is reduced to a spiritual reign in the hearts of believers. This reign is either over those on earth who put their trust in Him or over those in heaven. Both the amillennial and postmillennial views must interpret Revelation 20 in a nonliteral sense. Often there is wide difference among amillenarians in their interpretations of various passages in the Book of Revelation. Amillennialism historically had its first important advocate in Augustine who lived in the 4th and 5th centuries. Before Augustine, it is difficult to find one orthodox amillenarian. Modern advocates include such respected 20th-century theologians as Oswald Allis, Louis Berkhof, William Hendriksen, Abraham Kuyper, R.C.H. Lenski, and Gerhardus Vos.

A third form of interpretation is premillennialism, so named because it interprets Revelation 20 as referring to a literal thousand-year reign of Christ following His second coming. As the Second Coming occurs before the Millennium, it is therefore *pre*millennial. Twentieth-century advocates of this position include Lewis Sperry Chafer, Charles L. Feinberg, A.C. Gaebelein, H.A. Ironside, Alva McClain, William Pettingill, Charles C. Ryrie, C.I. Scofield, Wilbur Smith, and Merrill F. Unger. Other premillenarians can be found from the first century on, including Papias, Justin Martyr, and many other early church fathers. Arguments for this position are based on the natural sequence of events in chapter 20 following chapter 19, viewing them as sequential and as stemming from the second coming of Christ. Many passages speak of the second coming of Christ being followed by a reign of righteousness on earth (Pss. 2; 24; 72; 96; Isa. 2; 9:6-7; 11–12; 63:1-6; 65–66; Jer. 23:5-6; 30:8-11; Dan. 2:44; 7:13-14; Hosea 3:4-5; Amos 9:11-15; Micah 4:1-8; Zeph. 3:14-20; Zech. 8:1-8; 14:1-9; Matt. 19:28; 25:31-46; Acts 15:16-18; Rom. 11:25-27; Jude 14-15; Rev. 2:25-28; 19:11–20:6).

It should be evident that one's interpretation of Revelation 20 is an important decision that serves as a watershed for various approaches to prophetic Scripture. The approach taken in this commentary is that the events in chapter 20 follow chronologically the events in chapter 19. Many also believe that chapters 21–22 follow in chronological order (for more detailed discussion of various views, see Walvoord's Revelation, pp. 282-90; and The Millennial Kingdom. Grand Rapids: Zondervan Publishing House, 1959, pp. 263-75).

1. THE BINDING OF SATAN (20:1-3)

20:1-3. Chapter 20 begins with the familiar phrase, And I saw an angel (cf. 7:2; 8:2; 10:1; 14:6; 18:1; 19:17). The "and" with which this chapter begins suggests that it continues the sequence of events begun in 19:1, which is introduced with the words "after this." In chapter 19 the Greek has "and" at the beginnings of 15 verses (but it is omitted in the NIV in vv. 4, 8, 10-11, 13-16, and 21 and is trans. "then" in vv. 5-6, 9, and 19 and "but" in v. 20). The use of the word "and" (kai) often indicates action that follows in logical and/or chronological sequence. Accordingly there is no reason why chapter 20 should not be considered as describing events which follow chapter 19. "And" (kai) continues throughout chapter 20, beginning each verse except verse 5. There is thus no linguistic or grammatical suggestion that these events are anything other than events following the second coming of Christ and occurring in sequence.

In addition to the grammar which connects these incidents, there is also the causal connection of the events which follow naturally from the fact that Christ will have returned to the earth. In chapter 19 these events include casting the beast and the false prophet into the lake of burning sulfur and destroying their armies. Having disposed of the world ruler and the false prophet as well as the armies, it would be only natural that Christ should then turn to Satan himself, as He does in chapter 20.

Accordingly John saw an angel descend from heaven holding the key to the Abyss and a great chain. The angel grabbed Satan, the dragon (cf. 12:3-4, 7, 9, 13, 16-17; 13:2, 4, 11; 16:13), that ancient serpent (12:9, 14-15), bound him, and threw him into the Abyss, and locked it, in order to prevent Satan's work of deceiving the nations any more for a thousand years.

An important interpretive question is whether Satan was bound at the first coming of Christ, as is commonly advanced by amillenarians, or will be bound at His second coming, as is held by premillenarians. Revelation 20:1-3 rather clearly contradicts the amillennial interpretation that Satan was bound at the first coming of Christ. Throughout the Scriptures Satan is said to exert great power not only against the world but also against Christians (Acts 5:3; 1 Cor. 5:5; 7:5; 2 Cor. 2:11; 11:14; 12:7; 1 Tim. 1:20). If there is still any question whether this is so, it should be settled by the exhortation of 1 Peter 5:8: "Be self-controlled and alert. Your enemy the devil prowls around like a roaring lion looking for someone to devour."

Amillenarians answer this by saying that Satan is limited by the power of God. But this has always been true, as illustrated in the Book of Job and elsewhere. To describe Satan's present situation as being locked in the Abyss and unable to deceive the nations for a period of a thousand years is simply not factually true today, and it requires extreme spiritualization of the literalness of this passage as well as other New Testament references to Satan's activities and present power. This same power of Satan is further revealed in the Great Tribulation when he empowers the world ruler (Rev. 13:4). Satan will have been cast out of heaven at the beginning of the Great Tribulation and will then be more active than ever (Rev. 12:9, 13, 15, 17).

If Satan is actually deceiving the nations today, as the Scriptures and the facts of history indicate, then he is not now locked in the Abyss, and the thousand-year Millennium is still future. This interpretation is also supported by the final statement that after the thousand years, he must be set free for a short time (20:3). Here expositors again are at a loss to explain this except in a literal way, making possible a final satanic rebellion at the end of the millennial kingdom.

2. THE RESURRECTION AND REWARD OF THE MARTYRS (20:4-6)

20:4. Next in the series of revelations John recorded that he saw thrones on which were seated those who had been given authority to judge. In addition he saw the souls of those who had been beheaded because of their standing true to the Lord and His Word in the Great Tribulation. The fact that John could see them implies that they had received intermediate bodies in heaven and were awaiting their resurrections.

A distinction should be made between what John saw and what he received as revelation. Though he could see the souls, he was informed that they had been beheaded because they had refused to worship the beast or his image and would not receive his mark. What John saw was not all the souls in heaven but a particular generation of martyred dead who had been contemporaneous with the world ruler, the beast out of the sea (13:1). If the church were raptured prior to this event, as premillenarians teach, it would make sense to single out these martyred dead for resurrection. But if the church were not raptured, it would be most unusual to ignore all the martyrs of preceding generations, the church as a whole, and to specify this relatively small group.

John apparently was not told the identity of the individuals seated on the thrones. They evidently do not include the martyred dead themselves. Christ had predicted (Luke 22:29-30) that the 12 disciples would "eat and drink at My table in My kingdom and sit on thrones, judging the 12 tribes of Israel." As the disciples are also a part of the church, the body of Christ, it would be natural for them to sit on these thrones.

According to the Scriptures a series of judgments is related to Christ's return. The beast and the false prophet will be cast into the fiery lake (Rev. 19:20), Satan will be cast into the Abyss (20:1-3), and then the martyred dead of the Great Tribulation will be judged and rewarded (v. 4). In addition, Israel will be judged (Ezek. 20:33-38), and the Gentiles will be judged (Matt. 25:31-46). These judgments precede and lead up to the millennial kingdom.

John stated that these martyred dead came to life and reigned with Christ a thousand years. Their coming to life suggests that they will be given resurrected bodies. In addition to receiving the visual revelation, John was informed as to the meaning and character of the judgment that was here taking place.

20:5. John was also informed that the rest of the dead did not come to life until the thousand years were ended. This refers to the resurrection of the wicked dead, discussed later (vv. 11-15).

John stated that what he was seeing is the first resurrection. Posttribulationists refer to this as proof that the church will not be raptured before the Tribulation and that no resurrection has taken place prior to this point in fulfillment of God's prophetic program. It should be obvious, however, that in no sense could this be the number-one resurrection chronologically because historically Christ was the first to rise from the dead with a transformed, resurrected body. There was also the resurrection "of many" (Matt. 27:52-53) which took place when Christ died. In what sense then can this resurrection in Revelation 20:5 be "first"?

As the context which follows indicates, "the first resurrection" (vv. 5-6) contrasts with the last resurrection (vv. 12-13), which is followed by "the second death" (vv. 6, 14). It is first in the sense of before. All the righteous, regardless of when they are raised, take part in the resurrection which is first or before the final resurrection (of the wicked dead) at the end of the Millennium. This supports the conclusion that the resurrection of the righteous is by stages. Christ was "the Firstfruits" (1 Cor. 15:23), which was preceded by the token resurrection of a number of saints (Matt. 27:52-53). Then will occur the Rapture of the church, which will include the resurrection of dead church saints and the translation of living church saints (1 Thes. 4:13-18). The resurrection of the two witnesses will occur in the Great Tribulation (Rev. 11:3, 11). Then the resurrection of the martyred dead of the Great Tribulation will occur soon after Christ returns to earth (20:4-5). To these may be added the resurrection of Old Testament saints which apparently will also occur at this time, though it is not mentioned in this text (cf. Isa. 26:19-21; Ezek. 37:12-14; Dan. 12:2-3).

20:6. All those who share in the resurrection of the righteous are said to be blessed and holy, and the second death has no power over them, but they will be priests of God and of Christ and will reign with Him for a thousand years. While all the righteous will be raised before the Millennium, individuals will retain their identities and their group identifications such as Gentile believers and believers in Israel in the Old Testament, the church of the New Testament, and saints of the Tribulation.

It should be noted that the term "a thousand years" occurs six times in chapter 20. This was not something that could be seen visually; John had to be informed of it and the vision had to be interpreted as relating to a period of a thousand years. While amillenarians and others have tended to view this as nonliteral, there is no evidence to support this conclusion. This is the only chapter in Revelation where a period of a thousand years is mentioned, and the fact that it is mentioned six times and is clearly described as a period of time before which and after which events take place lead to the conclusion that it means a literal thousand-year period.

Since other time designations in Revelation are literal (e.g., "42 months," 11:2; 13:5; "1,260 days," 11:3; 12:6) it is natural to take "a thousand years" literally also. If the term "a thousand years" designates a nonspecific but long period of time, the present Age between Christ's two advents, as amillenarians hold, then one would expect John to say simply that Christ would reign "a long time," in contrast to the "short time" of Satan's release (20:3).

Events which precede the thousand years are (a) the second coming of Christ, (b) the beast and the false prophet thrown into the fiery lake, (c) the armies destroyed, (d) Satan bound and locked in the Abyss, (e) thrones of judgment introduced, and (f) the martyred dead of the Tribulation resurrected. These events revealed in their proper sequence make it clear that the thousand-year period follows all these events, including the second coming of Christ. The conclusion that the Second Coming is premillennial is clearly supported by a normal, literal interpretation of this text.

3. THE FINAL DOOM OF SATAN (20:7-10)

Apart from frequent mention of the thousand years, no details are given concerning the reign of Christ on earth except that it is a time of great blessing. Many Old Testament passages supply additional information about the Millennium. The main point of the revelation here is that the Millennium follows the Second Coming.

20:7-8. John was told what would happen at the conclusion of the thousand years. Satan will be released from the Abyss, his prison, and will make a final attempt to induce nations—called Gog and Magog—to come and battle with him against Christ. Satan's release will produce a worldwide rebellion against the millennial reign of Christ. The armies will be so vast in numbers that they are said to be like the sand on the seashore.

Who are these who will follow Satan? Those who survive the Tribulation will enter the Millennium in their natural bodies, and they will bear children and repopulate the earth (Isa. 65:18-25). Under ideal circumstances in which all know about Jesus Christ (cf. Jer. 31:33-34), many will outwardly profess faith in Christ without actually placing faith in Him for salvation. The shallowness of their professions will become apparent when Satan is released. The multitudes who follow Satan are evidently those who have never been born again in the millennial kingdom.

The question has been raised as to whether this war is the same one discussed in Ezekiel 38–39, where Gog and Magog are also mentioned (Ezek. 38:2). These are two different battles, for in the war of Ezekiel 38–39 the armies come primarily from the north and involve only a few nations of the earth. But the battle in Revelation 20:7-9 will involve all nations, so armies will come from all directions.

Furthermore nothing in the context of Ezekiel 38–39 is similar to the battle in Revelation, as there is no mention of Satan or of millennial conditions. In Revelation 20:7 the context clearly places the battle at the end of the Millennium, whereas the Ezekiel battle takes place in connection with end-time events.

Why then is the expression "Gog and Magog" used by John? The Scriptures do not explain the expression. In fact it can be dropped out of the sentence without changing the meaning. In Ezekiel 38 Gog was the ruler and Magog was the people, and both were in rebellion against God and were enemies of Israel. It may be that the terms have taken on a symbolic meaning much as one speaks of a person's "Waterloo," which historically refers to the defeat of Napoleon at Waterloo, Belgium, but has come to represent any great disaster. Certainly the armies here come in the same spirit of antagonism against God that is found in Ezekiel 38.

20:9. The armies will surround the camp of God's people, the city He loves. This could mean only Jerusalem, which will be the capital of the world government of Christ throughout the millennial kingdom (cf. Isa. 2:1-5). The result is immediate judgment. Fire will come down from heaven and devour them.

In contrast with Ezekiel 38, there is no mention of earthquake, hail, or other disasters. The only similarity is that in both cases there is fire from heaven, a frequent method of divine judgment on the earth (cf. Gen. 19:24; Ex. 9:23-24; Lev. 9:24; 10:2; Num. 11:1; 16:35; 26:10; 1 Kings 18:38; 2 Kings 1:10, 12, 14; 1 Chron. 21:26; 2 Chron. 7:1, 3; Ps. 11:6; etc.).

20:10. After Satan's followers will be destroyed, he will be thrown into the lake of burning sulfur. Being cast into the lake that was prepared for him and his angels is the final judgment on Satan (cf. Matt. 25:41). Most significant as a support of the doctrine of eternal punishment is the concluding statement, They will be tormented day and night forever and ever. The word "they" includes the devil, the beast, and the false prophet. The lake of burning sulfur is not annihilation, for the beast and false prophet are still there a thousand years after they experienced their final judgment (Rev. 19:20).

O. The judgment of the great white throne (20:11-15)

1. THE RESURRECTION AND JUDGMENT OF THE WICKED DEAD (20:11-13)

20:11. The final five verses of chapter 20 introduce the judgment at the end of human history and the beginning of the eternal state. John wrote, I saw a great white throne. The events here described clearly follow the thousand years of verses 1-6. The great white throne apparently differs from the throne mentioned more than 30 times in Revelation beginning with 4:2. It apparently is located neither in heaven nor earth but in space, as suggested by the statement, Earth and sky fled from His presence, and there was no place for them. It is not indicated who sits on this throne, but probably it is Christ Himself as in 3:21 (cf. Matt. 19:28; 25:31; John 5:22; 2 Cor. 5:10—though the throne in these references is not necessarily the same throne as in Rev. 20:11). While Christ is now seated on the throne in heaven and will be seated on the Davidic throne on earth in the Millennium (Matt. 25:31), this white throne judgment is a special situation.

The question has been raised as to whether the earth and the starry heavens as they are today will be destroyed at this point in the future or will be simply restored to a new state of purity. Many references in the Bible suggest that the earth and the heavens, as now known, will be destroyed (cf. Matt. 24:35; Mark 13:31; Luke 16:17; 21:33; 2 Peter 3:10-13). This is confirmed by the opening statement of Revelation 21, "the first heaven and the first earth had passed away."

The present universe was created like a gigantic clock which is running down, and if left to itself, would ultimately come to a state of complete inactivity. Inasmuch as God created the universe and set it in motion for the purpose of enacting the drama of sin and redemption, it would seem proper to begin anew with a new heaven and a new earth suitable for His eternal purpose and built on a different principle. The new heaven and new earth described in chapter 21 has no similarity to the present earth and heaven.

20:12. The purpose of establishing the great white throne is to judge the dead. John wrote that the dead, great and small, stood before the throne. From other Scriptures it seems that all the righteous dead have been raised, including Old Testament saints, the dead of the Great Tribulation, and the church saints, the body of Christ (see comments on v. 5). Thus it may be assumed that verses 11-15 refer to the judgment of the wicked dead, who according to verse 5 would not be resurrected until after the thousand years and will have no part in what is called "the first resurrection."

At that judgment John saw books . . . opened, including a book called the book of life. The text does not state clearly what these books are, but the first opened books may refer to human works and "the book of life" is the record of those who are saved (cf. 3:5; 13:8; 17:8; 20:15; 21:27). The fact that these dead have not been raised before is evidence in itself that they do not have eternal life and that their judgment is a judgment of their works.

All final judgments deal with works, whether the works of Christians rewarded at the judgment seat of Christ or the works of the unsaved which are in view here. The question of who is saved is determined not in heaven but in life on earth. What is revealed here is the confirmation of one's destiny by means of God's written records.

Some view the book of life as the record of all the living and that when the unsaved die their names are deleted from it. A better view is that the book is the record of those who are saved whose names were "written in the book of life from the creation of the world" (17:8). Regardless of which view is taken, at this time only the saved are in the book of life.

20:13. In order for the wicked dead to be judged . . . the sea . . . death, and hades will give up their dead. Those who are unsaved at the time of death go immediately to a state of conscious punishment described in the Old Testament as sheol and in the New Testament as hades. Neither sheol nor hades ever refer to the eternal state and should not be considered equivalent to the English word "hell," which properly is the place of eternal punishment. The lake of fire (vv. 14-15) referred to as "the fiery lake of burning sulfur" (19:20) is the same as gehenna (cf. Matt. 5:22, 29-30; 10:28; 18:9; 23:15, 33; Mark 9:43, 45, 47; Luke 12:5; James 3:6) and is translated "hell" in the NIV and KJV with the word "fire" added in several passages. Actually gehenna was originally a name for the place of burning refuse, located in the Valley of Hinnom south of Jerusalem. The term, however, goes far beyond this geographic background and refers to eternal punishment.

The statement "death and hades gave up the dead" means that the physical bodies of the unsaved will be joined with their spirits which have been in hades. The mention of "the sea" giving up its dead makes it clear that regardless of how far a body has disintegrated, it will nevertheless be resurrected for this judgment.

2. THE LAKE OF FIRE (20:14-15)

20:14-15. Following the great white throne judgment death and hades were thrown into the lake of fire. The lake of fire is the second death, the final destination of the wicked. The doctrine of eternal punishment has always been a problem to Christians who enjoy the grace of God and salvation in Christ. The Bible is clear, however, that the punishment of the wicked is eternal. This is confirmed in verse 10, where the beast and the false prophet are still in the lake of fire after the thousand years of Christ's millennial reign. Though the wicked dead will receive resurrection bodies, they will be quite unlike the resurrection bodies of the saints. The former people will continue to be sinful but will be indestructible and will exist forever in the lake of fire.

Though many have attempted to find some scriptural way to avoid the doctrine of eternal punishment, as far as biblical revelation is concerned there are only two destinies for human souls; one is to be with the Lord and the other is to be forever separated from God in the lake of fire. This solemn fact is motivation for carrying the gospel to the ends of the earth whatever the cost, and doing everything possible to inform and challenge people to receive Christ before it is too late.

P. The new heaven and the new earth (21:1–22:5)

1. THE NEW HEAVEN AND THE NEW EARTH CREATED (21:1)

21:1. The opening verses of chapter 21 describe the creation of the new heaven and the new earth, which chronologically follows the thousand-year reign of Christ described in chapter 20. Chapter 21 begins with the familiar words I saw, an expression repeated in verse 2 (cf. v. 22, "I did not see"). This new creation is described as a new heaven and a new earth. That it is a totally new heaven and a new earth, and not the present heaven and earth renovated, is supported by the additional statement, for the first heaven and the first earth had passed away (also see comments on 20:11). An amazingly small amount of information is given about the new heaven and the new earth. But one major fact is stated in this verse: there was no longer any sea.

In contrast with the present earth, which has most of its surface covered by water, no large body of water will be on the new earth. The Bible is silent, however, on any features of the first heaven except the statement in 21:23 that there will be no sun or moon and, by implication, no stars. The new heaven refers not to the abode of God, but to the earth's atmosphere and planetary space.

No landmarks whatever are given concerning the new earth, and nothing is known of its characteristics, vegetation, color, or form. The implication, however, is that it is round and is the residence of all who are saved. A few other references are found in Scripture in relation to the new earth, including Isaiah 65:17; 66:22; and 2 Peter 3:10-13.

Because in some of these passages the Millennium is also discussed, expositors have often confused the eternal state with the Millennium. However, the principle is well established in Scripture that distant events are often telescoped together. Examples of this are Isaiah 61:1-2 (cf. Luke 4:17-19), which speaks of the first and second comings of Christ together, and Daniel 12:2, which mentions the resurrection of the righteous and of the wicked together even though, according to Revelation 20:5, they will be separated by a thousand years. Sometimes even the chronological order is reversed, as in Isaiah 65:17-25 (vv. 17-19 refer to the new heaven and new earth whereas vv. 20-25 clearly refer to the Millennium). End-time events are all also brought in close proximity in 2 Peter 3:10-13, where the beginning and the end of the day of the Lord are mentioned in the same passage.

Though expositors have differed on this point, the principle that clear passages should be used to explain obscure passages supports the conclusion that the second coming of Christ is followed by a thousand-year reign on earth, and this in turn is followed by a new heaven and new earth, the dwelling place of the saints for eternity. With the absence of any geographic identification and the absence of a sea, the new earth will obviously be entirely different. By contrast, the sea is mentioned many times in relation to the Millennium (e.g., Ps. 72:8; Isa. 11:9, 11; Ezek. 47:8-20; 48:28; Zech. 9:10; 14:8). The evidence is conclusive that the new heaven and new earth are not to be confused with the Millennium.

2. THE NEW JERUSALEM DESCRIBED (21:2-8)

21:2. John's attention was then directed to a specific feature of the new heaven and new earth, namely, the Holy City, the New Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God, prepared as a bride beautifully dressed for her husband. The New Jerusalem is called "the Holy City," in contrast with the earthly Jerusalem (which spiritually was compared to Sodom in 11:8). As early as 3:12 the New Jerusalem was described as "the city of My God, the New Jerusalem, which is coming down out of heaven from My God." The fact that the New Jerusalem comes down from heaven and that it is not said to be created at this point has raised the question as to whether it has been in existence during the Millennium (see further discussion on this under 21:9).

Many expositors regard the promise of Christ in John 14:2, "I am going there to prepare a place for you," as referring to this city. The suggestion has been made that if the New Jerusalem is in existence during the millennial reign of Christ, it may have been suspended in the heavens as a dwelling place for resurrected and translated saints, who nevertheless would have immediate access to the earth to carry on their functions of ruling with Christ. J. Dwight Pentecost, for instance, quotes F.C. Jennings, William Kelly, and Walter Scott as supportng this concept of the New Jerusalem as a satellite city during the Millennium (Things to Come. Grand Rapids: Zondervan Publishing House, 1958, pp. 577-79). In the Millennium the New Jerusalem clearly does not rest on the earth, for there is an earthly Jerusalem and an earthly temple (Ezek. 40–48).

The New Jerusalem then will apparently be withdrawn from its proximity to the earth when the earth will be destroyed at the end of the Millennium, and then will come back after the new earth is created. Though this possibility of a satellite city has been disregarded by most commentators and must be considered as an inference rather than a direct revelation of the Bible, it does solve some problems of the relationship between the resurrected and translated saints to those still in their natural bodies in the Millennium, problems which otherwise are left without explanation.

Here, however, the New Jerusalem is described as it will be in the eternal state, and it is said to be "a bride beautifully dressed for her husband." Because the church is pictured in Scripture as a bride (2 Cor. 11:2), some have tried to identify the New Jerusalem's inhabitants as specifically the church saints, excluding saints of other dispensations. However, the use of marriage as an illustration is common in Scripture, not only to relate Christ to the church but also Yahweh to Israel. Though the city is compared to a beautifully dressed bride, it actually is a city, not a person or group of people.

21:3-4. Following this initial revelation of the New Jerusalem John wrote, I heard a loud voice from the throne. This is the last of 20 times that the expression "a loud voice" is used in Revelation (first used in 5:2).

The final revelation from heaven states that God will then dwell with men, that the saints will be His people and He will be their God. In eternity saints will enjoy a new intimacy with God which is impossible in a world where sin and death are still present. The new order will be without sorrow. God will wipe every tear from their eyes, and death with its mourning, and pain with its crying will vanish, for the old order of things will have passed away.

Some have wondered if grief and sorrow will exist for a while in heaven and then be done away with here at the establishing of the new order. It is better to understand this passage as saying that heaven will have none of the features that so characterize the present earth.

21:5-6. The dramatic change to the new order is expressed in the words, I am making everything new! This revelation is trustworthy and true, and John was instructed to write down that fact. The One bringing about the change is Christ, who calls Himself the Alpha and the Omega (cf. 1:8; 22:13), the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, interpreted by the phrase the Beginning and the End.

Those who are thirsty are promised that they will be able to drink without cost from the spring of the water of life. Apparently this refers not to physical thirst but to a desire for spiritual blessings.

21:7-8. Christ explained that he who overcomes will inherit all this, and I will be his God and he will be My son. This expresses the intimate relationship between the saints and God in the eternal state.

By contrast, those who practice the sins of the unbelieving world will be excluded from the New Jerusalem and will be destined for the fiery lake of burning sulfur. This judgment is a righteous punishment for their sins, eight of which are itemized here. He adds, This is the second death.

It should be obvious that this passage is not affirming salvation by works, but rather is referring to works as indicative of whether one is saved or not. Obviously many will be in heaven who before their conversions were indeed guilty of these sins but who turned from them in the day of grace in trusting Christ as their Savior. Though works are the evidence of salvation or lack of it, they are never the basis or ground of it. Similar lists of sins are found elsewhere in Revelation (cf. v. 27; 22:15).

3. THE NEW JERUSALEM AS THE BRIDE (21:9-11)

21:9-11. One of the angels of chapter 16 who had poured out a bowl of wrath on the earth then invited John to see the New Jerusalem as a bride. Come, I will show you the bride, the wife of the Lamb. Carried by the Spirit to a high mountain, John saw the New Jerusalem coming down out of heaven from God, shining with the glory of God.

Expositors have raised questions about the additional revelation of the New Jerusalem, beginning in verse 9. Some believe that this section is a recapitulation and pictures the New Jerusalem as it will be suspended over the earth during the millennial reign of Christ. A preferred interpretation, however, is that the passage continues to describe the New Jerusalem as it will be in the eternal state. Obviously the city would be much the same in either case, but various indications seem to relate this to the eternal state rather than to the Millennium.

The overall impression of the city as a gigantic brilliant jewel compared to jasper, clear as crystal indicates its great beauty. John was trying to describe what he saw and to relate it to what might be familiar to his readers. However, it is evident that his revelation transcends anything that can be experienced.

The jasper stone known today is opaque and not clear (cf. 4:3). It is found in various colors, and John apparently was referring to the beauty of the stone rather than to its particular characteristics. Today one might describe that city as a beautifully cut diamond, a stone not known as a jewel in the first century.

As in the earlier references to the New Jerusalem as a bride, here again is a city, not a person or group of people. This is confirmed by the description of the city which follows.

4. THE NEW JERUSALEM AS A CITY (21:12-27)

21:12-13. John saw a gigantic city, "square" in shape (v. 16), and surrounded by a great, high wall with 12 gates. The 12 gates bore the names of the 12 tribes of Israel. The number 12 is prominent in the city with 12 gates and 12 angels (v. 12), 12 tribes of Israel (v. 12), 12 foundations (v. 14), 12 apostles (v. 14), 12 pearls (v. 21), 12 kinds of fruit (22:2), with the wall 144 cubits—12 times 12 (21:17), and the height, width, and length, 12,000 stadia, about 1,400 miles (v. 16). The city has walls north, south, east, and west with three gates on each side (v. 13) and with an angel standing guard at each gate (v. 12).

This is an entirely different situation from the earthly Jerusalem in the Millennium. But if the names of the gates corresponded to the millennial Jerusalem described in Ezekiel 48:31-34, the north side from east to west would have the gates named Levi, Judah, and Reuben. On the west side from north to south were Naphtali, Asher, and Gad; on the south side from east to west, Simeon, Issachar, and Zebulun; and on the east side from north to south, Joseph, Benjamin, and Dan. In contrast to Revelation 7:5-8, where Dan is omitted and Joseph and Manasseh are included, Ezekiel mentioned Dan but not Manasseh.

21:14-16. The 12 foundations to the city's wall bore the names of the 12 apostles of the Lamb. The apostles were part of the church, the body of Christ. Thus both the church and Israel will be in the city; the former are represented by the apostles' names on the foundations (v. 14), and the latter by the names of Israel's 12 tribes on the gates (v. 12). The distinction between Israel and the church is thus maintained. An angel measured the city with a measuring rod of gold, about 10 feet in length. The city is 12,000 stadia in length and width, approximately 1,400 miles on each side. Tremendous as is the dimension of the city, the amazing fact is that it is also 1,400 miles high.

Commentators differ as to whether the city is a cube or a pyramid. The descriptions seem to favor the pyramid form.

21:17-18. Surrounding this huge city is a wall 144 cubits or 216 feet thick. The reference to man's measurement simply means that though an angel is using the rod, he is using human dimensions.

As John gazed at the wall, he saw that it was made of jasper, and that the city was made of pure gold, as pure as glass. John was using the language of appearance, for apparently both the jasper and the gold differ from these metals as they are known today. In verse 11 the jasper is translucent, and in verses 18 and 21 the gold is clear like glass.

21:19-21. The decorations of the foundations (with the apostles' names inscribed on them) include 12 stones involving different colors. The color of the jasper is not indicated. The sapphire was probably blue; the chalcedony comes from Chalcedon, Turkey and is basically blue with stripes of other colors. The emerald is a bright green; the sardonyx is red and white; and the carnelian, called a "sardius" in the NASB, is usually ruby-red in color, though it sometimes has an amber or honey color. In 4:3 the carnelian stone is coupled with the jasper to reflect the glory of God. The chrysolyte is a golden color, probably different from the modern chrysolyte stone which is pale green. The beryl is a sea green; the topaz is a transparent yellow-green; the chrysoprase is also green; the jacinth is violet in color; and the amethyst is purple. The stones together provide a brilliant array of beautiful colors. The gates resemble huge, single pearls, and the street of the city was of pure gold, like transparent glass (cf. 21:18).

While the beauty of the city may have symbolic meaning, no clue is given as to the precise interpretation. Since it is reasonable to assume that the saints will dwell in the city, it is best to take the city as a literal future dwelling place of the saints and angels.

21:22-27. John declared that he did not see a temple in the city because God the Father and the Lamb (God the Son) are its temple. There will be no need for light from the sun or moon because the glory of God will provide the light. As John explained, the Lamb is its lamp.

From the fact that the nations (the Gentiles) will be in the city (vv. 24, 26)—as well as Israel and the church—it is evident that the city is the dwelling place of the saints of all ages, the angels, and God Himself. The description of the heavenly Jerusalem in Hebrews 12:22-24 itemizes all those mentioned here and adds "the spirits of righteous men made perfect," which would include all other saints not specifically mentioned.

John learned that the gates of the city will never be shut, and because God's glory will be present continually there will be no night there. The glory and honor of the nations will be in the city, and everything that is impure . . . shameful, or deceitful will be excluded (cf. Rev. 21:8; 22:15). The inhabitants will be only those whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life. It is interesting that in the six references to the book of life in Revelation only this one calls it "the Lamb's" (cf. 3:5; 13:8; 17:8; 20:12, 15).

Though the description of the city does not answer all questions concerning the eternal state, the revelation given to John describes a beautiful and glorious future for all who put their trust in the living God.

5. THE RIVER OF THE WATER OF LIFE (22:1-2A)

22:1-2a. In the opening verses of chapter 22 additional facts are given about the New Jerusalem. The angel showed John the river of the water of life, as clear as crystal, flowing from the throne of God and of the Lamb. While this may be a literal river, its symbolism is clear. Out of the throne of God will flow pure water, symbolic of the holiness and purity of God and the city. This reference to a river should not be confused with similar millennial situations such as those in Ezekiel 47:1, 12 and Zechariah 14:8. These refer to literal rivers flowing from the temple and from Jerusalem and will be part of the millennial scene. The river in Revelation 22:1 will be part of the New Jerusalem in the new earth. The water flows down the middle of the great street of the city. This apparently refers to a main thoroughfare in the New Jerusalem coming from the throne of God with the river being a narrow stream in the middle of the street. The KJV attaches the phrase "in the midst of the street" to the next sentence rather than to the river.

It is significant also that the Lamb is pictured on the throne (mentioned also in v. 3). This makes it clear that 1 Corinthians 15:24, which states that Christ "hands over the kingdom to God the Father after He has destroyed all dominion, authority, and power," does not mean that Christ's reign on the throne will end but that it will change its character. Christ is King of kings and Lord of lords (cf. Rev. 17:14; 19:16) for all eternity.

6. THE TREE OF LIFE (22:2B)

22:2b. As John contemplated the heavenly city, he saw the tree of life, bearing 12 crops of fruit, yielding its fruit every month. Interpreters have puzzled over this expression that the tree of life is on each side of the river. Some take this is as a group of trees. Others say that the river of life is narrow and that it flows on both sides of the tree. The tree of life was referred to in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3:22, 24), where it was represented as perpetuating physical life forever. Adam and Eve were forbidden to eat of the fruit of this tree. Earlier in Revelation (2:7) the saints were promised the "right to eat from the tree of life, which is in the paradise of God."

While the literal and the symbolic seem to be combined in this tree, there is no reason why it could not be an actual tree with literal fruit. The practical effect would be to continue physical life forever. While the verse does not state that the fruit can be eaten, this is presumably the implication.

The tree's leaves . . . are for the healing of the nations. Based on this statement some have referred this situation back to the millennial times when there will be sickness and healing. However, another meaning seems to be indicated. The word "healing" (therapeian) can be understood as "health-giving." The English "therapeutic" is derived from this Greek word. Even though there is no sickness in the eternal state, the tree's fruit and leaves seem to contribute to the physical well-being of those in the eternal state.

7. THE THRONE OF GOD (22:3-4)

22:3-4. As if to remind the reader that healing as such is not necessary, John added, No longer will there be any curse. As the curse of Adam's sin led to illness requiring healing and death, so in the eternal state there will be no curse;

therefore no healing of illness is necessary.

As mentioned earlier, God and the Lamb are in the new city (21:22-23; 22:1). The New Jerusalem will be the temple of God (21:22), and the throne of God will also be in it. Then John wrote, His servants will serve Him. The highest joy and privilege of the saints in eternity will be to serve their blessed Lord, even though it is true that they will also reign with Him (2 Tim. 2:12; Rev. 5:10; 20:4-6). They will have a privileged place before the throne for they will see His face. The implication is that they are under the Lord's good favor and in His "inner circle." This intimacy is also indicated by the fact that His name will be on their foreheads (cf. 2:17; 3:12; 7:3; 14:1). Their freedom to be in the presence of God indicates that they will then be in their glorified bodies (cf. 1 John 3:2).

8. THE SAINTS' REIGN WITH GOD (22:5)

22:5. Once again John wrote that the glory and light of the New Jerusalem will be the presence of God, with no artificial illumination (cf. 21:23-24). And once again the statement is made that the servants of God will reign with Christ forever (cf. 20:6b).

Q. The final word from God (22:6-21)

1. THE CERTAINTY OF THE RETURN OF CHRIST (22:6-7)

22:6-7. Confirming both the truth and possibility of comprehending the prophecies previously given, the angel told John that the words of this book are trustworthy and true. The purpose of these communications is not to bewilder and confuse but to reveal many of the things that must soon take place.

This directly contradicts the point of view of many scholars that the Book of Revelation is an imponderable mystery for which no key is available today. This book is the Word of God and not the vague imaginations of John. In addition it is intended to describe future events. When taken in its literal, ordinary meaning, this is exactly what it does, even though much of Revelation is written in symbolic form. The Word of God was not given to be obscure. It was given to be understood by those taught by the Spirit.

The theme of Revelation is stated again in verse 7: Behold, I am coming soon! (cf. 1:7; 22:12, 20) Also He is coming quickly. The Greek word tachy may be translated "soon" (NIV) or "quickly" (NASB, ASV), and from the divine standpoint both are true. The coming of Christ is always soon from the standpoint of the saints' foreview of the future, and when it occurs, it will come suddenly or quickly. Accordingly a special blessing is pronounced on those who believe and heed the prophecy of the book. As stated earlier, this last book of the Bible, so neglected by the church and with its meanings confused by many expositors, contains more promises of blessing than any other book of Scripture. This reference to blessing is the sixth beatitude in the book (the seventh is in v. 14). The first blessing (in 1:3) is similar to this one in 22:7.

2. THE WORSHIP BY JOHN (22:8-9)

22:8-9. As this tremendous revelation was given to John, he once again fell down to worship . . . the angel. Again he was rebuked and reminded that angels should not be worshiped because, like the saints, they are fellow servants. John was commanded to worship the Lord, not angels (cf. 19:10).

3. THE COMMAND TO PROCLAIM THE PROPHECY OF THE BOOK (22:10-11)

22:10-11. Daniel was told that his prophecies would be "sealed until the time of the end" (Dan. 12:9). But John was told not to seal up the words of these prophecies. Again it should be emphasized that the viewpoint of some scholars that the Book of Revelation is an impenetrable puzzle is expressly contradicted by this and other passages. Revelation, both via its plain statements and its symbols, is designed to reveal facts and events relating to the second coming of Christ.

The exhortation which follows has puzzled some. Those who do wrong and are vile are encouraged to continue to do so, and those who do right and are holy are encouraged to continue to do so (Rev. 22:11). The point here is not to condone what is evil, but to point out that if people do not heed this prophecy, they will continue in their wickedness.

On the other hand those who do heed the prophecy will continue to do what is right. Relatively speaking, the time of the Lord's return is near and no major changes in mankind's conduct can be expected.

4. THE COMING JUDGMENT AND REWARD (22:12)

22:12. The words with which this verse begins: Behold, I am coming soon! are the same as those at the beginning of verse 7. In connection with His return, which will be "soon" (cf. vv. 7, 20), a reward is promised to His saints for what they have done for Christ. The reference is to the judgment seat of Christ (2 Cor. 5:10-11). The final judgments of both the wicked and the righteous will be judgments of works. This is the joyous expectation of those who are faithful and the fear of those who have not been faithful.

5. THE ETERNAL CHRIST (22:13)

22:13. Once again Christ is described as the Alpha and the Omega (first and last letters of the Gr. alphabet), the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End. Christ is before all Creation and He will continue to exist after the present creation is destroyed. He is the Eternal One (cf. 1:4, 8, 17; 2:8; 21:6).

6. THE COMING BLESSING AND JUDGMENT (22:14-15)

22:14-15. The last of the seven beatitudes of Revelation is bestowed on the saints, those who wash their robes. They have access to the New Jerusalem and its tree of life (cf. v. 19). The other six beatitudes are in 1:3; 14:13; 16:15; 19:9; 20:6; 22:7. In the manuscripts followed by the KJV, the expression "those who wash their robes" is translated "that do His commandments." In both cases the words accurately describe the righteous.

By contrast, judgment is pronounced on those who are unsaved (dogs refers to people; cf. Phil. 3:2): those who practice magic arts (cf. Rev. 9:21; 18:23; 21:8), the sexually immoral, the murderers, the idolaters, and everyone who loves and practices falsehood. As in the similar description of the unsaved in 21:8, 27, the wicked works which characterize the unsaved are described. Though some saints have been guilty of these same practices, they have been washed in the blood of the Lamb and are acceptable to God. But those who refuse to come to the Lord receive the just reward for their sins. Though the world is excessively wicked, God will bring every sin into judgment. And the time for Christ's return may be drawing near, when this will be effected.

7. THE INVITATION OF THE SPIRIT AND THE BRIDE (22:16-17)

22:16-17. The entire Book of Revelation was delivered by Christ through His angel and is for the churches. Christ described Himself as the Root and the Offspring of David, and the bright Morning Star. Historically Christ comes from David (Matt. 1:1; cf. Isa. 11:11; Rev. 5:5). Prophetically His coming is like the morning star, the beginning of a bright new day. The Holy Spirit joined with the bride, the church, in extending an invitation to all who heed. Those who hear are encouraged to respond and also to extend the invitation to others. The wonderful promise is given that all those who are thirsty may come and will receive God's free gift.

This is the wonderful invitation extended to every generation up to the coming of Christ. Those who recognize their need and realize that Christ is the provider of salvation are exhorted to come while there is yet time before the judgment falls and it is too late. As the Scriptures make clear, the gift of eternal life (here called the water of life; cf. 22:1; John 7:37-39) is free. It has been paid for by the death of Christ on the cross and is extended to all who are willing to receive it in simple faith.

8. THE FINAL WARNING (22:18-19)

22:18-19. While on the one hand an invitation is extended to those who will listen, a word of warning is also given to those who reject the revelation of this final book of the Bible. A dual warning is given against adding to it or subtracting from it (cf. Deut. 4:2; 12:32; Prov. 30:6). How great will be the judgment of those who despise this book and relegate it to the mystical experiences of an old man, thereby denying that it is the inspired Word of God. Rejecting the Word of God is rejecting God Himself. And those who deny His promises of blessing and subtract from His truths will receive His judgment and will have no part in the tree of life or access to the holy city (cf. Rev. 22:14).

9. THE FINAL PRAYER AND PROMISE (22:20-21)

22:20-21. One further word of testimony was then given: Yes, I am coming soon (cf. vv. 7, 12). To this John replied in a brief prayer, Amen. Come, Lord Jesus.

With this tremendous revelation completed, a final word of benediction was pronounced. The grace of the Lord Jesus be with God's people. Amen. This expression, so common in other New Testament books, brings this final word from God to an end. For those who believe that Christ in His first coming provided salvation, there is the wonderful promise of His coming again to bring full and final deliverance. As the book began by introducing a revelation of Jesus Christ so it ends with the same thought that He is coming again.

Probably no other book of Scripture more sharply contrasts the blessed lot of the saints with the fearful future of those who are lost. No other book of the Bible is more explicit in its description of judgment on the one hand and the saints' eternal bliss on the other. What a tragedy that so many pass by this book and fail to fathom its wonderful truths, thereby impoverishing their knowledge and hope in Christ Jesus. God's people who understand and appreciate these wonderful promises can join with John in his prayer, "Come, Lord Jesus."
