THE
COLLEGEVILLE BIBLE COMMENTARY

BASED ON THE NEW AMERICAN BIBLE WITH REVISED NEW TESTAMENT

General Editors

DIANNE BERGANT, C.S.A.

ROBERT J. KARRIS, O.F.M.

THE LITURGICAL PRESS
COLLEGEVILLE, MINNESOTA

NIHIL OBSTAT: Robert C. Harren, J.C.L.
Censor Deputatus

IMPRIMATUR: ✠ Jerome Hanus, O.S.B.
Bishop of St. Cloud
October 19, 1988

Scripture quotations from the New American Bible, copyright © 1970 by the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, Washington, D.C., and the New American Bible With Revised New Testament, copyright © 1986, are reproduced herein by license of said copyright owner. No part of the New American Bible may be reproduced in any form without permission in writing. All rights reserved.

Maps copyright © by Carta, The Israel Map and Publishing Company Ltd., 4-6 Yad Harutzim St., Jerusalem, Israel 91024. Printed in Israel. All rights reserved.

Copyright © 1989 by The Order of St. Benedict, Inc., Collegeville, Minnesota. All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, taping, or any information storage and retrieval system, without the written permission of The Liturgical Press, Collegeville, Minnesota 56321.

Printed in the United States of America.

7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
The Collegeville Bible commentary.
Previously published in 36 separate booklets.
1. Bible—Commentaries. I. Bergant, Dianne.
II. Karris, Robert J.
BS491.2.C66 1989 220.7'7 88-27356
ISBN 0-8146-1484-1

CONTENTS

Preface vii

Abbreviations ix

Introduction to the Bible 3
Dianne Bergant, C.S.A.

OLD TESTAMENT

Genesis 35
Pauline A. Viviano

Exodus 79
John F. Craghan

Leviticus 115
Wayne A. Turner

Numbers 144
Helen Kenik Mainelli

Deuteronomy 196
Leslie J. Hoppe, O.F.M.

Joshua 229
John A. Grindel, C.M.

Judges 248
John A. Grindel, C.M.

1 and 2 Samuel 265
Paula J. Bowes

1 and 2 Kings 296
Alice L. Laffey, R.S.M.

1 and 2 Chronicles 321
Alice L. Laffey, R.S.M.

Ezra and Nehemiah 332
Rita J. Burns

1 Maccabees 370
Alphonse P. Spilly, C.PP.S.

2 Maccabees 395
Alphonse P. Spilly, C.PP.S.

Isaiah 411
John J. Collins

Jeremiah 453
Peter F. Ellis

Baruch 481
Peter F. Ellis

Amos 487
Carroll Stuhlmueller, C.P.

Hosea 496
Carroll Stuhlmueller, C.P.

Micah 509
Carroll Stuhlmueller, C.P.

Nahum 520
Carroll Stuhlmueller, C.P.

Zephaniah 524
Carroll Stuhlmueller, C.P.

Habakkuk 529
Carroll Stuhlmueller, C.P.

Ezekiel and Daniel 533
Toni Craven

Joel 578
Mary Margaret Pazdan, O.P.

Obadiah 586
Mary Margaret Pazdan, O.P.

Haggai 592
Mary Margaret Pazdan, O.P.

Zechariah 600
Mary Margaret Pazdan, O.P.

Malachi 625
Mary Margaret Pazdan, O.P.

Introduction to Wisdom Literature 634
Lawrence E. Boadt, C.S.P.

Proverbs 644
Lawrence E. Boadt, C.S.P.

Job 675
Michael D. Guinan, O.F.M.

Wisdom 701
John E. Rybolt, C.M.

Sirach 722
John E. Rybolt, C.M.

Psalms 754
Richard J. Clifford, S.J.

Song of Songs 789
James A. Fischer, C.M.

Ruth 797
James A. Fischer, C.M.

Lamentations 804
James A. Fischer, C.M.

Ecclesiastes 812
James A. Fischer, C.M.

Esther 822
James A. Fischer, C.M.

Jonah 828
Irene Nowell, O.S.B.

Tobit 832
Irene Nowell, O.S.B.

Judith 844
Irene Nowell, O.S.B.

NEW TESTAMENT

Matthew 861
Daniel J. Harrington, S.J.

Mark 903
Philip Van Linden, C.M.

Luke 936
Jerome Kodell, O.S.B.

John 981
Neal M. Flanagan, O.S.M.

1 John 1021
Neal M. Flanagan, O.S.M.

2 John 1028
Neal M. Flanagan, O.S.M.

3 John 1029
Neal M. Flanagan, O.S.M.

The Acts of the Apostles 1031
William S. Kurz, S.J.

Galatians 1069
John J. Pilch

Romans 1080
John J. Pilch

1 Corinthians 1100
Mary Ann Getty

2 Corinthians 1134
Mary Ann Getty

1 Thessalonians 1151
Ivan Havener, O.S.B.

Philippians 1160
Ivan Havener, O.S.B.

Philemon 1169
Ivan Havener, O.S.B.

2 Thessalonians 1172
Ivan Havener, O.S.B.

Colossians 1179
Ivan Havener, O.S.B.

Ephesians 1188
Ivan Havener, O.S.B.

1 Timothy 1200
Jerome H. Neyrey, S.J.

2 Timothy 1208
Jerome H. Neyrey, S.J.

Titus 1215
Jerome H. Neyrey, S.J.

James 1219
Jerome H. Neyrey, S.J.

1 Peter 1228
Jerome H. Neyrey, S.J.

2 Peter 1235
Jerome H. Neyrey, S.J.

Jude 1241
Jerome H. Neyrey, S.J.

Hebrews 1245
George W. MacRae, S.J.

Revelation 1265
Pheme Perkins

List of Maps 1301

PREFACE

Today we are witnessing an increased interest in the Bible. Women and men from all walks of life are enrolling in classes, attending workshops, and organizing study groups. Guided reflection on the biblical tradition is a fundamental component of evangelization programs such as the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA) and RENEW. Prayer groups look for leaders who can guide them beyond private interpretation into the spiritual depths of the tradition. People are searching for new insights and are turning to biblical scholars to provide them. Non-specialists are no longer satisfied with a merely devotional understanding of the Bible. They are asking literary, historical, and theological questions that require learned answers.

In an effort to address this need, The Liturgical Press commissioned thirty-four respected scholars to provide individual booklets that together would interpret the entire Roman Catholic canon. Utilizing the most recent critical methods and incorporating the fruits of contemporary scholarship, they brought to completion in 1986 the Collegeville Bible Commentary, a series of thirty-six booklets, each including questions for review and discussion. The wide selection of authors resulted in a variety of theological positions and methodological approaches, which contributed to the richness of the enterprise. There was a consistent attempt throughout to be sensitive to contemporary concerns. This project was completed in a little over five years, thus ensuring the up-to-date character of the interpretation. In 1988 the authors of the New Testament commentaries redid their works in the light of the revised edition of the New Testament of the New American Bible.

The present volume brings together the commentaries of all thirty-six booklets. Its comprehensiveness makes it an invaluable resource, enabling the reader to refer easily to the interpretation of any or all of the biblical books. Besides being used for Bible study, it can also serve as a reference for liturgy planning, homily preparation, and biblical prayer services. This volume is an admirable response to the injunction of the Second Vatican Council: "Access to sacred Scripture ought to be wide open to the Christian faithful" (Dei Verbum, no. 22).

DIANNE BERGANT, C.S.A.
General Editor, Old Testament Commentary

ROBERT J. KARRIS, O.F.M.
General Editor, New Testament Commentary

ABBREVIATIONS

OLD TESTAMENT

Gen	Genesis	Prov	Proverbs
Exod	Exodus	Eccl	Ecclesiastes
Lev	Leviticus	Song	Song of Songs
Num	Numbers	Wis	Wisdom
Deut	Deuteronomy	Sir	Sirach
Josh	Joshua	Isa	Isaiah
Judg	Judges	Jer	Jeremiah
Ruth	Ruth	Lam	Lamentations
1 Sam	1 Samuel	Bar	Baruch
2 Sam	2 Samuel	Ezek	Ezekiel
1 Kgs	1 Kings	Dan	Daniel
2 Kgs	2 Kings	Hos	Hosea
1 Chr	1 Chronicles	Joel	Joel
2 Chr	2 Chronicles	Amos	Amos
Ezra	Ezra	Obad	Obadiah
Neh	Nehemiah	Jonah	Jonah
Tob	Tobit	Mic	Micah
Jdt	Judith	Nah	Nahum
Esth	Esther	Hab	Habakkuk
1 Macc	1 Maccabees	Zeph	Zephaniah
2 Macc	2 Maccabees	Hag	Haggai
Job	Job	Zech	Zechariah
Ps(s)	Psalm(s)	Mal	Malachi

NEW TESTAMENT

Matt	Matthew	1 Tim	1 Timothy
Mark	Mark	2 Tim	2 Timothy
Luke	Luke	Titus	Titus
John	John	Phlm	Philemon
Acts	Acts	Heb	Hebrews
Rom	Romans	Jas	James
1 Cor	1 Corinthians	1 Pet	1 Peter
2 Cor	2 Corinthians	2 Pet	2 Peter
Gal	Galatians	1 John	1 John
Eph	Ephesians	2 John	2 John
Phil	Philippians	3 John	3 John
Col	Colossians	Jude	Jude
1 Thess	1 Thessalonians	Rev	Revelation
2 Thess	2 Thessalonians

OTHER ABBREVIATIONS

NAB	New American Bible	RSV	Revised Standard Version
NEB	New English Bible

THE
OLD TESTAMENT

INTRODUCTION TO THE BIBLE

Dianne Bergant, C.S.A.

An introduction to the Bible is not merely a preface to the entire work, something elementary or preliminary, leading up to the major part. It is primarily a theological discipline in its own right and normally examines the origin of the individual books of the Bible, the history of the canon, and the history of the textual tradition. This article, though not an introduction in this strict sense, does treat some of the issues that fall within the range of an introduction.

Since the introductions to the books of the Bible in this volume address questions pertaining to the origin of particular books, such information can be found within the respective commentary. In this article attention is given to the origin, growth, and development of the biblical traditions in general—traditions that ultimately comprise the canon of Sacred Scripture. Next, a sketch of the history of the canon is offered, followed by a survey of the textual witness. The tradition formation, the development of the canon, and the textual witness are topics that seem to follow one another logically. Since the Bible claims divine authorship, the role of God's activity in this process of composition is also discussed. Finally, the interpretative tools necessary for understanding the Bible are described.

At first glance the material treated in this article may appear to be esoteric and of interest only to the professional student of Scripture. Upon closer examination, however, it should become clear that many of the basic questions that the average person asks about the Bible are answered within these pages—questions such as: What books belong to the Bible? Why do some churches have more books than others? Which is the best version? What does the Bible really mean? The sections have been arranged in such a way as to answer some of these questions as they may arise.

Perhaps one of the first questions asked by the beginning student of Scripture is: What books belong to the Bible? Close on its heels is: Why do some churches have more books than others? These are questions that pertain to the CANON of the Bible, and they are addressed in the first section. Rather than merely provide the factual information about the canon and explain the role that authority played and continues to play in this area, the first section attempts to describe the growth of the Scriptures from their very beginnings up to the time of the later decisions to "close the canon." Our knowledge of the development of the traditions, be they religious, social, political, or literary, has aided us in our investigation of this process of growth and development. Our knowledge of the socio-political and religious histories of both ancient Israel and early Christianity has also made significant contributions in this area. It seems that the process of tradition formation was dynamic rather than static, a communal venture rather than an individual accomplishment, that is, it was the work of a historical community rather than of a single author.

In this same section attention is given to the question of biblical authority. What is it? Who has it? How did they get it? The importance of historical movements and particular events has been highlighted. Thus, the Bible is seen as growing as the people grow, changing as the people change, and becoming standardized as the people seek stability. Viewing the Scriptures from this perspective should help the reader appreciate the description of the Bible as "the word of God in human words."

Even a detailed look at the human dimension of the composition of the Bible cannot adequately answer the fundamental question about its nature as Sacred Scripture. How is it the word of God? How did God speak this word in the first place? How does God speak this word today? These questions touch on the topic of INSPIRATION, the focus of the second section. This section is quite a bit shorter because it presumes the description of tradition formation outlined in the preceding one. It presents an understanding of inspiration that regards it as dynamic and operative within ordinary human events and situations. Such a view in no way detracts from the authoritative claims of the Bible; rather, it expands the scope of divine activity and places the exercise of authority squarely within the context of the believing community.

The claim that the Bible is inspired influences how its truthfulness is perceived. Human comprehension is limited and human judgment is subject to error, but surely the word of God is trustworthy. Several attempts at solving the dilemma of dual (divine and human) authorship, and the strengths and weaknesses of each solution, have been advanced over the years. Some of them are discussed in this section.

Even the beginning student of the Bible is soon aware that a variety of editions of the Bible are available. Unless every member of a Bible study group is consulting the same edition, confusion could result. This confusion may result from different translations or from the use of different sources used in constructing a text. The third section offers a brief summary of the history of the TEXTS AND VERSIONS which have survived the ravages of time and which form the basis of present-day Bibles.

The meaning of the text is ultimately the most important question. To know how the traditions developed, to believe that they were inspired by God, to be able to recover early versions of them are of very little significance if they remain unintelligible. HERMENEUTICS provides tools and methods for interpretation. These tools and methods are described in the last section. As more and more people become involved in serious study of the Bible, easy explanations of the Scriptures are being questioned and sometimes even rejected. Bewilderment over conflicting interpretations still remains. In addition, the use of biblical passages to strengthen one's point of view has become very popular in the broader society, even when a contradictory interpretation is advanced by another. All this points to the need to understand ways of interpretation in order to judge the validity and the appropriateness of the use to which the Bible is being put.

In no way does this final section claim to cover all the interpretative approaches. Its intention is to explain the basic methods used in contemporary scholarship. The authors of the commentaries in this volume frequently identify the methods they have employed in their research. The definitions found in this section might throw some light on that research and thus on the findings offered by the respective authors.

As with any other work, another author might perceive the material under discussion in another way. One of the primary goals of the COLLEGEVILLE BIBLE COMMENTARY is to bring the findings of contemporary scholarship to the beginning students of Scripture. These findings may be very new to some, not so new to others. Because of the wide selection of authors, these commentaries offer a variety of theological positions and methodological approaches. There has been a consistent attempt to be sensitive to contemporary concerns. Although efforts have been made to refrain from referring to God in gender-specific language, the lack of consensus in this area is reflected in the different styles of the authors. The work undertaken here is offered as a part of the ongoing process of biblical interpretation.

THE CANON

CANON AND AUTHORITY

Even before opening the Bible to begin a study of its contents, the serious inquirer is faced with several basic questions. What is the Bible? How did the Bible acquire its present form? Who is responsible for the contents of the Bible? Why has the Bible endured over the centuries? Is the Bible relevant to the contemporary world? While well-known answers to these questions may come immediately to mind, one very important common denominator is frequently overlooked: each answer presumes some dimension of authority.

What is the Bible? It is a collection of religious traditions that are revered as sacred because they are inspired by God. The believing community's official recognition of the inspired character of these traditions has accorded them "canonical" status. This means that they enjoy an authoritative status possessed by no other traditions of the community.

How did the Bible acquire its present form? The history of its origin and development is long and complicated and will be treated later. Here it is enough to say that the traditions that have been incorporated into the Bible and the shape that they have taken were dependent upon choices made within the community, choices made by persons and groups having the authority to so choose.

Who is responsible for the contents of the Bible? Prominent lawgivers, prophets, and teachers whose names are mentioned in the texts themselves were not the only ones responsible for the biblical material; there were also editors and compilers who refined and selected material from the community's vast literary and theological treasury. They preserved what they thought were religious norms, and thereby they exercised a significant amount of authority within the community.

Why has the Bible endured over the centuries? Acknowledging that it contains material stemming from times of the distant past and from cultures so different from our own, one can only marvel at its perdurability. The reason lies in the fact that believers throughout the ages have continued to be convinced of its authoritative character. They, too, have regarded its contents as normative and have tried to fashion their lives in accord with it.

Is the Bible relevant to the contemporary world? This question is at the heart of most of the biblical debate of our time. One does not merely ask, How can the Bible speak to the modern world? but, Can the Bible speak to the modern world? The first query raises the question of interpretation; the second, the issue of authority. Does the Bible still have normative value for women and men today? It is not enough to say that it is inspiring. The point is: Is it inspired, and therefore authoritative?

When addressing the authoritative character of the Bible, one must deal with some quite distinct but interrelated questions: (1) Why did these traditions emerge and not others? (2) Who had the right to decide about them? (3) Is the Bible relevant and still normative?

Why these traditions?

This study must begin with a brief working description of "biblical tradition." Put quite simply, a biblical tradition is at root a statement about the self-understanding of ancient Israel and/or the early Christian community. It not only specifically defined them as they perceived themselves, but it directed the further development of their self-understanding.

The expression "God's people" can serve as an example. Our religious ancestors believed that they were "God's people," and this concept not only identified them but shaped the way they developed through history, and it kept explaining for them why they continued to survive. For them, being "God's people" meant that God had called them and was leading and protecting them. They believed that they were recipients of divine revelation, and their traditions were testimonies to this revelation. Such traditions can be called authoritative to the extent that they authentically express the basic self-understanding of the people.

Slightly differing and sometimes even quite different traditions could and did arise. Examples of such diversity include the two accounts of creation (Gen 1:1–2:4a and Gen 2:4b-25) and the several accounts of Paul's conversion (Gal 1:13-17; Acts 9:1-9; 22:6-11; 26:12-18). Different traditions did not necessarily cause undue tension within the community as long as the self-identity of the people was not threatened. However, when there was a crisis of identity, the survival of the group demanded that some kind of agreement be reached. This crisis of identity frequently ushered in a crisis of authority as well. Which of the various statements of self-understanding was authentic? Which traditions could draw together the dissipated forces within the community? These were the ones that would subsequently function as the normative version of the community's self-identity. They would serve as a kind of "canon," a kind of authority within the community. They would continue as such as long as they expressed the identity of the group.

Scholars agree that not all the sacred traditions of ancient Israel and/or of early Christianity have survived. Among those that have survived, not all enjoy the same degree of authoritativeness. This brief description of the dynamic process known as tradition formation explains why such is the case. As their experience of life and the events of history forced the people to search for meaning, they came to understand themselves and their relationship with God in terms of that history. Thus, traditions arose, developed, and often had to be refashioned as the circumstances of life demanded.

The ultimate explanation for the endurance of a tradition seems to have been its ability to remain fundamentally unchanged and yet applicable to new situations. If it could not be refashioned or retraditioned, it would cease to be authoritative and its revelatory value would be questionable. In a very real sense, biblical authority has always resided in the interaction between an authentic tradition and the living community.

Who decides?

To acknowledge the authoritative character of the process known as tradition formation is not to deny the role played by significant people within the community. Some people had to make very important decisions for the rest of the group. However, these significant people did not simply create religious understandings or teachings independently of the community. Some may have had unique creative insights, but whatever they brought forth had to be recognized and endorsed by the others as a valid interpretation of the communal faith. That explains why some of the proclamations of the prophets, for example, were not accepted immediately. The majority of the people may not have regarded their proclamations as authentic. In such instances it was often the disciples of the prophets who preserved the teachings. Only at a later date was the authoritative character of the pronouncements broadly recognized.

According to this view, a variety of forces were at work shaping and reshaping the religious consciousness and self-understanding of the people. This means that there was no single locus of authority. Some individuals and groups originated the traditions; others contributed to their development and reshaping; others were involved in determining their place and significance in the communal self-understanding. Those in leadership positions within the community may have authenticated the traditions, but it was the people who had to confirm this decision.

Is the Bible relevant and still normative?

This question can be asked by believer and nonbeliever alike. In either case, it will proceed from a particular understanding of the nature of the material and will elicit a different answer. Anyone can be profoundly moved by the inspirational quality of literature, religious or nonreligious. A believer, however, accepts the traditions of the faith-community as somehow binding. They are regarded as not only explaining the faith but as forming the members within that faith. They are the norms and standards that direct the lives of the believers. They exercise a type of authority over these people. That they do this is a matter of the obedient faith of the believing community. Why they do this is a question of inspiration. How they speak to a new situation is a concern of interpretation.

The canon, then, has to do with reference to authority. It is a statement from the past that continues to be operative in the present. As literature, it is a collection of the constitutive religious writings of the community. Believers hold that these writings had their origins in revelation and that as historical memory they continue to be a source of revelation today.

THE GROWTH OF TRADITION

The study of biblical tradition is a very complicated undertaking. It includes not only an analysis of the final or "canonical" testimony of the community but also a probing into the long and labyrinthian process that brought that testimony into being. It is not enough to view tradition as a completed statement. One should also appreciate the traditioning process that created and refined that articulation. A brief examination of this process will throw light on what might otherwise be very confusing.

One of the major characteristics of this transmission process was the community's constant interpretation and application of older traditions. Tradition growth was not merely the handing down of static formulations; it also included the repeated process of actualizing earlier material within new contexts. Changes in the political, social, or religious worlds necessitated new expressions of fundamental faith as well as the articulation of new insights. The interaction between historical events and forces within the community determined the shape of the tradition, a shape that might change at another time or in another place. This process might have continued to the present day had not several significant events compelled the community to endorse certain statements over others and to confer authority on them. The destruction of the Solomonic temple at the time of the Babylonian Exile (587–538 B.C.E.—Before the Common Era) was one such event. A second historical watershed was the destruction of the Herodian temple at the time of the emergence of early Christianity (70 C.E.—Common Era). Each of these catastrophes played a major role in the choice of which traditional materials were to be preserved, the specific arrangement of what was transmitted, and their subsequent interpretation as normative theology.

Everyone is familiar with the designation "the tribes of Israel." While scholars differ in their understanding of the history of the tribal origins, most agree that the earliest organization of the people was that of a loosely united federation of clans and tribes, each retaining its unique traditions and each fiercely loyal to its own chieftains and military leaders. The traditions that grew out of their experiences were probably preserved in poetic forms, while the stability of their social structures was safeguarded by their laws. These early traditions were embedded in sagas and other narratives, the details of which readily could and did change with retelling, while the core traditions remained intact.

This was a period of great fluidity (ca. 1200–1040 B.C.E.). Groups of people changed location and shifted social and political allegiance quite frequently. As diverse peoples amalgamated, their traditions were brought together into a common story. Although this common story now flows quite smoothly, the process of assimilation never completely erased characteristics that might identify one group from another. These characteristics can be detected upon careful study of the text.

The socio-political move from a federation of tribes to a nation under the administration of a king (ca. tenth century B.C.E.) called for a review of the relationship of the people with their God. The people were forced to scrutinize their religious traditions, restating some while reshaping others. Earlier tribal narratives were retold with a bias in favor of the monarchy. Since the contemporary situation influenced the way the past was understood, inevitably these new interpretations became part of the original narrative in such a way that details from different periods now comprised one story. This interpretative process explains why the tradition known as the Yahwist (J) is both a narrative epic of early Israelite history and a justification of the Davidic monarchy.

At still another time and from another perspective, the tradition now known as the Elohist (E) took shape. This was a retelling of basically the same story as that told by the Yahwist, but the concerns were not the same and so the focus was different. During this period prophets such as Amos and Hosea in the north and Isaiah in the south were also calling for a reevaluation of the current beliefs and practices of the people. Although some of this theology had probably already established itself with some degree of authority, much of it was still in flux.

When the northern kingdom fell to the Assyrians (722 B.C.E.), the traditions that had originated there were incorporated with those of the south. Thus, different portraits of the tribal ancestors were woven together into one; legal customs that operated within one community became part of the law of another. The selection, codification, and crystallization of these various traditions resulted in a rich and sometimes contradictory testimony to the action of God in the history of the nation. This testimony became the official story, the authoritative self-understanding, of the people. The messages of early prophets were probably proclaimed again and again as long as they could be adapted to the needs of the people. More than likely they were preserved by followers of the prophets, and these disciples were the ones who made the necessary yet appropriate adaptations.

The demise of the northern kingdom had its theological repercussions in the south as well. It became a catalyst for the retelling of the stories of the initial settlement of the land, stories that not only pointed to the reasons for the fall but also served as a warning to the south. There was a renewed attention to the Law and a resurgence of prophetic critique. These concerns and the subsequent reshaping of earlier traditions set the stage for both the Deuteronomistic (D) and Priestly (P) theologies.

As stated earlier, the destruction of the temple, the downfall of the monarchy, and the deportation of the people all played a part in the fashioning of traditions. This critical period of captivity probably forged the two major biblical portions known as the Law and the Prophets. Early historical, prophetic, and legal traditions were given the shape that has, for the most part, been handed down to the present time. The precise text of the primary history of Israel, including the Law, was then fixed and was not to undergo any further significant reinterpretation. References to the existence of a version of the Law and its importance in the postexilic community are found in Ezra 7:14 and Neh 8:1. The prophetic books such as Jeremiah and Ezekiel would still be somewhat expanded and revised as new material was added, but once this expansion and revision had ceased, the prophetic corpus was also accorded a kind of authoritative status. There is a second-century mention of this status in 2 Macc 15:9. The believing community now revered these traditions as normative for them. What the institutions of monarchy, priesthood, and prophecy had done in shaping the self-identity of the pre-exilic community, the authoritative traditions that emerged from the crucible of the Exile did for the self-identity of later Judaism.

These literary and theological books of material told the story of the people's beginnings, but they ended the story with the people on the threshold of the land of promise, thus proclaiming a message of hope for a nation looking to the future for a land of its own. The national history now described prosperity as contingent upon fidelity to covenantal commitment, thus explaining the nation's present plight as both a judgment for past failures and an incentive to future repentance. The prophetic material established the credibility of the major prophets as spokespersons for God. Their teachings were to be heeded. In this way the newly forged exilic community reactualized its normative traditions, preserving them for the future.

The needs of the postexilic community called for new and different religious traditions. Theological interpretations of events, prophetic pronouncements, sapiential reflections on life, didactic stories, hymns, and other cultic songs emerged as part of the religious treasury of the second temple period. The significance of these traditions was a focus of dispute within the community.

The Samaritans appear to have dissociated themselves from the returned community sometime around 300 B.C.E., and to this day those who remain faithful to the Samaritan tradition consider only the Torah, or Pentateuch, as inspired. The Sadducees of the early Christian era were descendants of this same point of view. Not until well into the Christian period did official Judaism decide upon the authoritativeness of the third section of the Scriptures, known as the Writings. By that time there were several collections of inspired material, each claiming a position of privilege within the community.

The spread of Hellenistic thought and language prompted the translation of the traditions into Greek. This version came to be known as the Septuagint (LXX) or Alexandrian version. The former name comes from a tradition which claimed that seventy (LXX) translators, working independently of one another, produced the same translation. The latter designation stems from the name of the city of its origin. This version contains some books not found in the Hebrew Bible. It seems that both the Hebrew and the Greek versions enjoyed the same prestige, each within different communities.

A third collection that has survived from this period belonged to a sectarian group known as the Essenes. Portions of their library have been found in the caves at Qumran, a settlement in the Judean desert. They appear to have included more books in their Scripture than did either the Septuagint or the more traditional Hebrew Scriptures of the time. The existence of these different "canons" is evidence of what was stated above about the diversity of religious traditions within the believing community. This diversity resulted from different life perspectives as well as different hermeneutical or interpretative ways of understanding the material.

The "event of Christ" constituted an impact not unlike that of other revelatory events in the history of "God's people" in that it forced the believers to seriously reexamine their beliefs. It was radically different, however, in several significant ways. It was not merely another revelation of God—believers insist that it was the revelation of God. For that reason earlier traditions may now be seen in an entirely new light. By this time Judaism was a religion of "the Book"; Christianity, on the other hand, is a religion of "the living Christ." The Gospels portray Jesus as claiming authority in his own right. He did not seem to place himself within the stream of traditional authority but called directly upon divine authority. Further, he explained the traditions of Israel in terms of himself. Clearly, Jesus, not the Bible, is the focus of authority here. Hence the ultimate question inevitably arises: What relevance does the Hebrew Bible have for the Christian experience and for Christian theology? This is a question that confronted the very earliest Christians and has confronted every generation of Christians since their time.

The first Christians, like Jesus himself, had been formed within the ancient biblical traditions. Thus, they accepted or rejected him in the light of those traditions. The Scriptures became the basis of their faith in him as Lord, and he became the focus through which they understood the Scriptures. A new religious group was born out of this faith in Jesus and this reinterpretation of the traditions. The new phenomenon was the source of conflict within the original community. Jesus' radical perspective was challenged by the religious authorities of his day. The Gospels have preserved recollections of this new interpretation (see Matt 5:17-48). His followers faced the same opposition. Stephen was stoned for this reason (see Acts 7), and Paul himself suffered for his preaching (see Acts 14:4f. and 19).

This new teaching of Jesus and its furtherance by his followers gave rise to a new tradition that soon enjoyed a prominence parallel to the Scriptures (see 2 Pet 3:2). This did not happen without internal strife, however. There were those within the Christian community who felt that the Law was not only irrelevant but was actually a hindrance. This attitude appeared most frequently in the Gentile churches established by Paul (see Gal 3:23–4:7). Others clung tenaciously to observance of the Law as necessary for themselves as well as for new converts. The Judeo-Christian communities, notably the church in Jerusalem and a group known as the Ebionites, represented this position (see Acts 15:1-4). Once again, the issue was the relationship of earlier traditions to a new revelation.

Various forces were at work during this period. The Christian community was expanding and assuming several different and flexible shapes. Within the Jewish community, of which many Christians were a part, the biblical traditions were moving toward a final shape. Books that were somehow associated with the great figures of the Hebrew past were given a prominence not accorded to other writings. All the criteria for making these decisions are not known to modern scholarship, and therefore much about the closing of the canon remains unclear. One thing can be said: Neither the collection of the Septuagint nor that of the Qumran became the official canon of the Jewish community. That is interesting, since studies have shown that the version most popularly used at this time was the Septuagint, especially among Christians. When they quoted from the older traditions, they usually cited the Greek version.

While the Jewish community may have made some decisions about its authoritative list, the Christian community, which drew on the same sources, certainly did not. Although there are references to "the law and the prophets" (Matt 5:17) and to "the law of Moses and the prophets and the psalms" (Luke 24:44), significant controversy continued well into the fourth century. It was not so much conflict with forces outside the community as it was internal strife that brought the question of canon to the fore again and again. Groups like the Gnostics and teachers like Marcion, who were later condemned as heretics because of their views of Christianity, had used their biblical interpretations, especially their rejection of the Hebrew Scriptures, as fuel for their theological arguments. Thus, both the Jewish and the emerging Christian Scriptures became the weapons in the fight over Christian orthodoxy.

The great second-century apologist Justin Martyr was one of the first to witness to the practice of reading Christian writings in conjunction with the Jewish Scriptures at liturgical services. Defense of the Scriptures was at the heart of his teaching. The early champions of the faith such as Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, and Eusebius all preserved canonical lists of Christian writings. Some of them agreed with each other, others did not. In the fourth century both the church in the West and the church in the East accepted a Christian list of twenty-seven books but did not adopt a standard for the Jewish Scriptures. That would have to wait for the Reformation and the Council of Trent's response to it.

THE SHAPE OF THE CANON

The long process of tradition formation and development that has been described here was finally brought to a close. This closure resulted in a normative version of the tradition which, as the recognized testimony to divine revelation, could henceforth enable the believing community to organize its life and verify its hope. A canon or standard was thus established in this normative version. The word "canon," it should be noted, has a long and complicated history. Originally meaning "reed," it came to signify something that acted as a norm, a measuring stick. In Christian usage it refers to a model or rule.

The final canonical forms of the biblical traditions attest to God's presence and revelation in the past experiences of the people. These forms became the rule or standard for determining revelation within the believing community in the present and in the future. They also provided a means of achieving unity within the faith. Born of the community, they were instrumental in the rebirth of that community generation after generation.

There are three major Jewish theories concerning the closing of the canon. Since most of the Hebrew Scriptures were in existence at the time of Ezra in the fifth century B.C.E., Ezra himself was credited with the completion of the collection. This tradition is legendary and enjoys little prominence today. A second theory holds that a group of leaders of the postexilic community, forerunners of what came to be known as the Great Synagogue, worked under the impetus of Ezra and established the canon. However, there is no evidence that a body resembling the Great Synagogue existed before the Middle Ages, and so this theory is also usually discounted. The third position, the one generally held today, suggests that it was not until the Christian era that the Palestinian Jewish community closed its canon. The town of Jamnia (also known as Jabneh) appears to have been the center of Pharisaic Judaism. Here the leaders of the community that had survived the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the temple built by Herod decided upon the list of inspired books.

Just as it was a particular interpretation of God's presence and revelation that had shaped the tradition, so it was another particular interpretation that eventually considered the canon closed. There is no certainty about the exact criteria followed in making these decisions. Knowledge of the sociopolitical and religious forces at work at that particular time may throw some light on this question, but much necessary information has been lost to history. However, some criteria can be assumed.

If the Scriptures do testify to divine revelation, then obviously the prophetic tradition, that bearer of revelation par excellence, played a significant role in the canonization of these Scriptures. Only those books that were believed to have originated before the termination of genuine prophecy were considered uniquely inspired. Liturgical usage was a second criterion. Books that gained prominence because of their cultic or liturgical function were also accorded canonical status. Adherence to these criteria yielded the tripartite Bible: the Torah, or Law (the first five books); the Prophets (the Former Prophets, or Historical Books; and the Latter or Writing Prophets); and the Writings (Psalms, Wisdom writings, the five liturgical scrolls, Daniel, and the postexilic history). These were the sacred books of Israel that "soiled the hands." This curious phrase indicates that after handling the above-mentioned scrolls, the reader's hands were to be washed in a ritual acknowledgment of the holiness of the traditions and the unworthiness of the reader.

As stated earlier, the Greek version that originated in Alexandria was probably the one in popular use at this time (ca. 90 C.E.). However, it was the older Hebrew version that was adopted by the Jewish community at Jamnia. Some believe that this choice was due to the rivalry that had developed between the Jewish and the Christian interpretations of some of the traditions as well as to the Christian practice of adding Christian writings to the collections. Other scholars hold that disputes within the Jewish community itself influenced the decision about the canon. At this time the Pharisees were in conflict with some of the more apocalyptically minded Jewish sects, and they took a stand in favor of a more conservative interpretation. (Apocalyptic was a very imaginative and symbolic way of interpreting the events of history. It frequently included a description of the future.) The time of Ezra, the time after the destruction of the first temple, was recalled at this, the time of the destruction of the second temple. At the time of Ezra apocalyptic and messianic speculation was eliminated, and the collection of books that came out of the Exile became the normative version. So the same selection occurred at the time of Jamnia.

The apocalyptic and messianic speculation did, however, serve the Christian need to come to grips with "the event of Christ." That was probably one of the reasons for the continued use by Christians of writings that were part of the Greek version. Whether Jesus and the disciples used the Hebrew or the Greek version is not clear. What is clear, however, is that the communities from which the Christian Scriptures were born quoted from the Greek, for the vast majority of the Christians of the first century were Greek-speaking Gentile converts. Since they did not believe that revelation had ended with the death of the last prophet but continued in Christ, they continued to use the more extensive Greek version.

It was not until the second and third centuries that the debates within Judaism precipitated a move by Christians to close their list of Jewish sacred books. By the fourth century the Western churches had accepted the decision of the North African councils and had adopted the Greek Bible. The Eastern churches, on the other hand, appear to have preferred the list drawn up by the Jews. These decisions were made by local or regional churches. It was the Council of Trent that finally decided upon the canon for the churches in union with Rome.

Since the Reformers rejected the authority of the papacy and its use of Scripture to authenticate some of its teachings, they looked to the Scriptures themselves as the norms for interpreting tradition and chose the shorter Jewish canon as their official list. The Roman church, in accepting the wider Greek canon, has preserved an authentic early church tradition and is consistent with that community's usage of certain books rejected by the Jewish community. The Protestant churches, in their retention of the shorter canon, have preserved a more ancient version. These ecclesiastical decisions have resulted in the lists given on the next page.

The story of the growth and development of the Jewish canon provides solid reasons for the threefold division of Law, Prophets, and Writings. But one can only conjecture about the reasons for the order of the Alexandrian canon: Pentateuch, History, Poetry, Prophets. Perhaps it can be traced to the fact that Hellenistic Jews were trained in Greek schools of rhetoric, where literature was studied according to literary types. Finally, there is an interesting theological feature in the differing orientations with which each collection concludes. In the Jewish canon the reader is left with an exhortation to go up to Jerusalem and to rebuild the temple (2 Chr 36:23), a message dear to every Jewish heart. The Alexandrian order, reflecting a messianic concern, ends with the promise to send Elijah the prophet at the inauguration of the day of the Lord's coming (Mal 4:5). Christians could easily see this as an appropriate transition to their own sacred traditions.

Those seven books about which canonicity was disputed (Judith, Tobit, 1 and 2 Maccabees, Wisdom, Sirach, and Baruch) are called "deuterocanonical" by Roman Catholics and "apocryphal" by Protestants, who frequently include them in a separate section at the end of their Bibles. The term "deuterocanonical" does not suggest a separate canonizing process so much as a deliberate canonical recognition deemed necessary because of controversy within the community. Initially "apocrypha" meant "hidden," implying that

JEWISH CANON	ALEXANDRIAN CANON
TORAH (LAW)	PENTATEUCH
Genesis	Genesis
Exodus	Exodus
Leviticus	Leviticus
Numbers	Numbers
Deuteronomy	Deuteronomy
PROPHETS	HISTORY
(Former)	Joshua
Joshua	Judges
Judges	Ruth
1-2 Samuel	1-2 Samuel
1-2 Kings	1-2 Kings
	1-2 Chronicles
(Latter)	Ezra-Nehemiah
Isaiah	Esther
Jeremiah	Judith
Ezekiel	Tobit
(12 minor)	1-2 Maccabees
Hosea
Joel	POETRY
Amos	Psalms
Obadiah	Proverbs
Jonah	Ecclesiastes
Micah	Song of Songs
Nahum	Job
Habakkuk	Wisdom of Solomon
Zephaniah	Sirach
Haggai
Zechariah	PROPHETS
Malachi	(Major)
	Isaiah
WRITINGS	Jeremiah
Psalms	Baruch
Job	Lamentations
Proverbs	Ezekiel
Ruth	Daniel
Song of Songs
Qoheleth	(Minor)
Lamentations	Hosea
Esther	Amos
Daniel	Micah
Ezra-Nehemiah	Joel
1-2 Chronicles	Obadiah
	Jonah
	Nahum
	Habakkuk
	Zephaniah
	Haggai
	Zechariah
	Malachi

the message of these books was hidden from the majority of the community and understood only by the truly wise. Gradually the term took on a negative meaning because the orthodoxy of the books was suspect. Today the word "apocryphal" merely refers to writings that may be profoundly religious and inspirational but not canonical. Though absent from the Hebrew canon, the deuterocanonical or apocryphal material was considered part of the Jewish (and therefore also the Protestant) religious literature and was frequently used in liturgical settings.

There is another group of religious writings that, although not considered canonical by either Jewish or Christian communities, greatly influenced both. In them can be found the background for such themes as the kingdom of God, the Son of Man, the resurrection of the dead, the teachings about angels and demons. These intertestamental works (writings from the period between the times of the Old and the New Testaments), frequently apocalyptic in character, were in a rather fluid state between 200 B.C.E. and 100 C.E., and sometimes enjoyed the same respect as did some of the "Writings" that eventually became canonical.

A large number of manuscripts from this group of writings have been discovered at Qumran, a Jewish community that shared many of the same apocalyptic and messianic hopes as did the early Christians. The intensity of these widespread hopes explains the popularity of this kind of literature, which include such works as the Book of Enoch, the Book of Jubilees, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Sibylline Oracles, the Assumption of Moses, to name but a few. Because their proclaimed authorship is questionable, these works have often been referred to by Protestants as "pseudepigrapha"; because of their somewhat esoteric nature, Catholics call them "apocrypha." Actually, neither term is really satisfactory, but, because of traditional usage, the designations stand.

The rise of Christian writings to the status of Scripture is easier to trace than that of the Jewish writings because witnesses to their influence can be found in the writings of the "apostolic teachers" of the early Christian centuries. Their authority rested not so much on the fact that they were the traditions of the earliest Christians as on the fact that they preserved the authentic "Jesus tradition." It was the words of Jesus that were authoritative. Paul called upon this authority when teaching about the final coming (1 Thess 4:15) and the institution of the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11:23ff.). Although the oral tradition may have been preferred, the need for Christian writings soon became obvious. With the founding of Christian communities at great distances both from Jerusalem and from one another, written communication became necessary. As the apostles became dispersed and the eyewitnesses to Jesus began to die, the need for authoritative written testimonies increased. These testimonies became the building blocks of the Christian Scriptures.

These Scriptures themselves existed as individual works long before they were collected into fixed groups. The earliest known writings were the letters of Paul. They might have been lost to history had not someone collected them and circulated this collection throughout the church. Scholars have suggested that the compiler was the author of Ephesians, who wrote that letter under Paul's name and sent it as a general introduction to the entire collection. Whatever the case may be, even before the end of the first century an early Christian writer called Paul's letters "true inspiration" (1 Clement 47:3) similar to the Hebrew Scriptures (see 2 Pet 3:15-16). The great teachers of the second and third centuries—Ignatius, Polycarp, Tertullian, and Origen—all knew of Paul's letters and acknowledged their authority. Even Marcion, a Gnostic who repudiated the entire Jewish tradition, considered Paul as prominent. He devised a canon that consisted only of ten Pauline letters and the Gospel of Luke.

The first reference to a "Gospel tradition" appears toward the middle of the second century; a short time later Justin Martyr mentions a Gospel reading as part of Sunday worship. While there may have been earlier hints that the "Jesus tradition" was enjoying the same authority as the Hebrew tradition, this is the first clear evidence of a new canon growing up beside the traditional one.

One cannot but ask: Why four Gospels? Why not just one, as Marcion had suggested? And if more than one, why only four out of the many that were composed in the first centuries of the Christian period? Even Luke tells us that "many have undertaken to compile a narrative . . ." (1:1). Modern scholarship claims that this variety of Gospels reflects the diversity and pluralism within early Christianity and the adaptation of the Gospel tradition to new and different Christian communities.

A careful study of the apocryphal Gospels may explain why the church rejected most of them, but it does not answer the question about the fourfold Gospel tradition. Different answers have been put forward, all somewhat hypothetical. Some say that since apostolic origin was a criterion for canonization and all four Gospels could claim such origin (Matthew and John were among the Twelve; Mark was associated with Peter, and Luke with Paul), all four had to be accepted. Irenaeus thought that since there were four world regions, four major winds, four covenants in the Hebrew tradition, there should be four Gospel witnesses as pillars of the church. Others suggest that Marcion's rejection of every Gospel but Luke's played a part in the decision in favor of a fourfold Gospel tradition. Whatever the reason, by the end of the second century the collection of four Gospels was accepted everywhere but Syria, where a harmonized account known as the Diatessaron of Tatian continued as authoritative until the fifth century.

By the end of the second century a new two-part canon was taking shape. It consisted of a fourfold Gospel canon and a collection of apostolic writings. The status of several of the apostolic writings was the subject of controversy down through the fifth century. Although the early church citations and lists were the two main criteria for determining the authoritativeness of the Christian Scriptures, it is clear that there was not yet universal agreement. These diverse early church lists may reflect nothing more than the custom of each author's local church. If this was the case, the extent of the agreement that one finds is quite significant.

The earliest official or ecclesiastical list still in existence is called the Muratorian Fragment and is thought to be representative of late second-century Roman usage. The fact that Irenaeus, Polycarp, Clement, and Tertullian were all in basic agreement with it points to its catholicity. Twenty-two of the twenty-seven books of our canon were included in this listing.

At the beginning of the third century, Origen further classified the books then in use. Having traveled widely, he was able to compare the lists of various churches in different regions, categorizing them as: (1) "acknowledged"—four Gospels, thirteen Pauline letters, Acts, two other non-Pauline epistles (later called "catholic," because they are more like encyclicals intended for the whole church rather than for individual communities as the Pauline letters were); (2) "disputed"; (3) "false."

In the fourth century Eusebius categorized the writings in a similar fashion. However, it was Athanasius whose list included all and only those books that comprise our canonical Christian testament. In addition to the canonical books, he listed some of the writings that had been included in several earlier lists and suggested that they would be good for reading. The Latin church was influenced by this Greek decision, and, subsequently, several North African councils sanctioned the same list of twenty-seven books. Although there was general agreement throughout both the Greek and the Latin churches, it came about as the result of decisions made by provincial synods, not by an ecumenical council. The canon grew out of the common usage of the Christian communities.

While the West had canonized four Gospels, the Syrian church clung to the Diatessaron until the fifth century. It never completely accepted all the catholic epistles or the Apocalypse. The Ethiopic church, on the other hand, enlarged its canon. Thus, the church in the East continued to revere a different Christian Bible.

As already mentioned, several other early Christian works were often considered canonical well into the fifth century. These were: 1 and 2 Clement, the Epistle of Barnabas, the Didache, and the Shepherd of Hermas. It is still not clear in every instance why they were not included in the final listing.

Certain factors seem to have been gradually accepted for determining which books should be considered canonical and which books should not. First among these factors was apostolic origin. The work had to be associated with an apostle or with someone from the apostolic age. Second, there had to be a catholic or universal dimension to the message. This requirement did not deny that some of the writings were originally intended for individual communities, but it demanded that the message speak to all. Third, the teaching had to be in accord with the basic rule of faith and not propose some esoteric message. There is no direct evidence that these were the criteria used to determine canonicity; however, books seem to have been rejected because they deviated seriously from just this kind of criteria.

The church now had a twofold canon which, it believed, was inspired by God and which attested to God's presence and revelation in the past experiences of the people. Further, it cherished this twofold canon as the rule or standard for determining revelation within the believing community in the present and in the future.

INSPIRATION

INSPIRATION AND AUTHORITY

The Bible has been defined as a collection of religious traditions that are revered as sacred because they are inspired by God. In the preceding section we examined the process of tradition growth and development, showing how the ebb and flow of Israel's history significantly influenced it as it reshaped and reinterpreted the tradition, and how decisions about canonicity brought an end to this creative process.

Up to this point the focus of this study has been on human authorship. The communities first of ancient Israel and then of early Christianity, believed that God had been revealed in their midst through the events of their history. The Bible is a collection of those traditions that were cherished as authentic and enduring testimonies of God's revelation. By canonizing these testimonies, the community declared that, while God may be revealed in many ways, there is a unique relationship between revelation and these sacred Scriptures. This relationship is spoken of in terms of inspiration and divine authorship. Those who in any way contributed to the writing of the Bible were inspired by God. Thus, the Bible boasts both human and divine authorship.

The present consideration of biblical inspiration begins with a passage from the Bible itself: "All scripture is inspired of God and is useful for teaching—for reproof, correction, and training in holiness" (2 Tim 3:16). Here the word "inspired" can mean either "breathes" God or "is breathed of" God. While the community does indeed believe that the Scriptures continue to communicate God's word to us today (breathes God), it is the passive sense of the verb that is traditionally preferred: the Scriptures have been "breathed of" God. This idea recalls the familiar prophetic theme of the breath or spirit of God, that dynamic manifestation of God's action in the world.

It is no wonder, then, that biblical inspiration has often been understood as akin to prophetic inspiration or prophetic possession. However, if one uses the prophetic model of inspiration to understand biblical inspiration—as many people have done in the past and some continue to do in the present—one may tend to assume that each individual book can be traced back to one author who was inspired or whose words were inspired. The process of tradition formation that has been discussed in these pages rejects such a notion of authorship and finds the model inadequate and misleading.

Besides presuming single authorship, the prophetic model frequently minimizes the role played by human reflection and creativity. At times God is depicted as taking possession of the imagination and thought of the individual, and sometimes even as dictating the ideas and the very words. There can be little doubt about the difficulty in balancing the roles of the human and the divine in this kind of joint undertaking. But it is better that a difficulty stand unresolved than that the contribution of either partner in this venture be underestimated.

Without denying the unique role played by certain individual members of the community, the present study has suggested that it was really the community itself that gave birth to the sacred traditions. If this is the case, and if these traditions are indeed inspired by God, then it is within the community, and not merely in select members of that community, that inspiration is operative. Those who first recognized the action of God within their history and then developed a tradition to testify to that action, those who later reshaped that tradition in order that it speak to a new community at a new time, and those who set the tradition down in its final form were all communities inspired by God. From this perspective, the biblical text itself is not seen as the initial expression of inspiration; rather, this text is the written form that has since become normative. The Bible represents one point in the long process of divine inspiration. It was preceded by the inspired growth and development of religious traditions, and it frequently has been followed by the inspired reinterpretation of those traditions.

Before proceeding to a discussion of the process of inspiration, we must pose a crucial question: Just what is inspired? Is it the author? And how is this last question answered if one thinks that the community rather than select individuals authored the Bible? Are the words inspired? But then, which words? Would it be the ones used in the first expression of the traditions, words that probably have been lost in history? Or the words of the final text, in the original languages? And what about translations? And further, which versions of the translations? These are all very important questions and will not be neglected, but a more fundamental question has to do with the way inspiration operates within the community. The other questions will be addressed within that context.

Our earlier discussion about the formation of tradition will serve as the framework for this discussion of inspiration. Not every event left a lasting mark on the consciousness of the community. Only those events that helped to shape and refine their fundamental faith became central to the tradition. A particular event itself may have been either momentous or outwardly insignificant. It was the religious meaning of the event that was cherished and handed down from generation to generation. Those who had the actual experience saw it as contributing to their identity and to their life. By transmitting this formative tradition to others, they were inviting these others to be formed by the tradition just as they had been. Thus, there was a dimension to the tradition that was continually formative.

Now, if it was the dynamic power of God that fashioned a people in the first place, what but the same dynamic power could continue this process of formation? It must be noted here that a mutual formation was taking place: As the community formulated the tradition, so the tradition formed, that is, influenced, the self-identity of the community. The dynamic force operative in the development of the people was God's self-disclosure. The dynamic force operative in the development of the tradition was God's inspiration. Thus, it should become apparent that to limit inspiration to but one moment in this development is to confine God's activity to that moment.

Difficult as it may be, it is possible to trace the development of a tradition. The same cannot be said about tracing the movement of inspiration. The former is a verifiable human endeavor; the latter is by definition a divine activity and calls for, and is accessible only by means of, faith. A community of faith believes that God is revealed in its midst and communicates with the people through their religious traditions. These traditions will be revered as inspired as long as God is perceived as speaking through them. Since the dynamic faith of the community claims that God is not bound to the past but brings the power of the past into the newness of the present with an openness to the future, then, correspondingly, God's inspiration must be seen as ongoing. To the extent that a tradition continues to be open to God's communication, it can be said to be inspired. Traditions that originated in the past must continue to speak to the active presence of God in the ongoing life of the community. The Bible was inspired, for during its growth and development it continually formed a believing community. The Bible is inspired, for it has not ceased to perform this same wonder, giving witness even to this day to the community's origin and continually awakening it to its purpose.

INSPIRATION AND TRUTH

When one claims that God is the author of the Bible, one is thereby making a statement about its truthfulness. Surely the word of God is trustworthy. God would not deceive the community, nor would God allow the community to be led astray by either the ignorance or the limited perspectives of the human authors. In following this train of thought, many people have insisted that the Bible is inerrant, or free from all error. Such a claim raises several difficult questions.

How does one explain differing and even contradictory traditions? (Human beings were created after the plants and animals appeared—Gen 1:12, 21, 25, 27. Human beings were created while the earth was still uninhabited—Gen 2:5, 9.) Must one adhere to a perception of the universe that is contrary to scientific findings? (Light itself was created before the heavenly bodies that give off light—Gen 1:3, 16.) Can one reconcile conflicting chronology in the Gospel story? (Jesus cleansed the temple at the beginning of his ministry during one of his several visits to Jerusalem—John 2:13-17. The cleansing occurred during his only visit, which took place just before his death—Matt 21:12-17; Mark 11:15-19; Luke 19:45-48.)

Efforts to explain the inconsistencies found within the Bible have resulted in various methods of interpretation. Those who have opted for fundamentalist interpretations have frequently spurned historical and scientific evidence and have adopted the literal sense of the text, claiming that there are no real inconsistencies, for God can do even the impossible if need be.

Another approach attempts to reconcile the theory of inerrancy with the discrepancies present within the text. The Scriptures are taken quite literally until one comes upon a difficult passage. Then, believing that God's revelation can be neither illogical nor inaccurate, the interpreter concludes that what appears to be an inconsistency is really meant to be interpreted allegorically. Thus, what could otherwise be seen as discordant is harmonized.

A third way of resolving the dilemma is to make a decision about the kind of truth the Bible is intended to reveal. Biblical scholars have done just that, distinguishing between historical and/or scientific truth and religious truth—not an easy decision to make. Historical, scientific, and religious references are found to be intertwined. It is not always clear why the authors expressed ideas as they did. If their historical and scientific references are not to be understood as accurate expressions of theological truth, were they merely the best literary and figurative constructions available? Or is the very human, very limited understanding of reality simply the platform from which they launched their profound theological search for God and upon which the drama of God's loving involvement unfolded? However these questions are answered, one must decide which guidelines are to be followed when making the distinctions mentioned. Attempting to focus on what in the text is truly theological, critical biblical scholarship has taken great pains to be as honest as possible in applying literary and historical methods of research. In this way it has thrown new light on the question of the truthfulness of the Bible.

At this juncture something should be said about what is meant by "truth." Is it to be understood as something akin to honesty, integrity, the antithesis of deception? Or does it also imply precision, accuracy of fact, freedom from mistake?

Contemporary scholarship insists that the Bible is indeed inspired by God, but inspired through the natural process of the growth and development of tradition. Since the Bible is not merely the record of God's word but also of the human response to that word, the character of human authorship cannot be disregarded. Obvious discrepancies and apparent contradictions may be attributed to human error, but they may also result from those interpretations and reinterpretations produced by the living community over generations of tradition development. Both the needs of a specific community of faith and the particular insights it had into its religious tradition may also have influenced the quality or limitation of theological expression that emerged from the transmission of tradition. One would certainly not reject as either inadequate or in error the theology of Isaiah or Jeremiah simply because the prophets did not refer to or believe in the Trinity or in life after death.

The biblical traditions have been described as testimonies. The focus of the last section was on the very human composition of those testimonies. The issue in this section is the relationship between the testimonies and the revelation of God to which they testify. This relationship has been understood in significantly different ways, depending upon how one has come to understand inspiration. Those who hold that the words are inspired are more likely to revere the Bible itself as revelation. Others who believe that God is revealed primarily in the events of history are more inclined to regard the Bible as the interpreted testimony to those events. According to this latter view, the Bible is a witness to revelation. The basic difference between these two views, in essence, is the difference between what is said and what is meant. While both perspectives are indeed aspects of the same reality, they most certainly are not identical. Knowing what the Bible says is not the same as knowing what the Bible means.

A study of tradition development indicates that what the community cherished was not primarily some specific expression of the tradition but rather the fundamental meaning of it. Were this not the case, the community consistently would have resisted any attempt at reformulation.

As stated earlier, the dynamic force operative in the development of the people was God's self-disclosure. The dynamic force operative in the development of the tradition was God's inspiration. The Bible claims to be not only a testimony to God's self-disclosure and to the community's transformation in the past, but also a unique occasion for a comparable disclosure and transformation in the present. To the extent that this claim is verified again and again, the truthfulness of the Bible can be affirmed. It is not so much the accuracy of the words but rather the power of the message that bears witness to its truthfulness. The same Spirit that was operative in the formation of the Scriptures continues to bear witness to its truthfulness and to convince us of its inspired nature. Therein lies the authority of the Bible.

TEXTS AND VERSIONS

Anyone beginning the study of the Bible is quickly aware of the number of versions that are available. Why are there so many? Which one is the best? Questions such as these touch upon another very complicated but fundamental issue of biblical investigation—that of textual criticism. This particular aspect of biblical scholarship will be examined in some detail in the section on interpretation, or hermeneutics. Here attention will be given to the various texts themselves rather than to the method of examining them.

There are several reasons for the variety of biblical versions. The most obvious one is a difference in translations. One language does not easily lend itself to a literal translation in another, and translators have to make decisions about the choice of words and phrases used. Some translators made one choice, others make another; hence different translations result. This issue will be addressed at greater length below.

Another reason for some of the differences is scribal error. We all know how easy it is to make mistakes when transcribing something. If we add to this very human, very common occurrence the fact that scribes had to work long hours with manuscripts written in languages seldom their own, then the repetitions, omissions, and mistranslations are understandable. Only by pursuing the meticulous task of comparing various texts (and this is a task of textual criticism) can one correct some of these errors. As more of the ancient texts are found, more corrections can be made.

These two explanations presume that there was one common biblical version, and from this came different translations, some of which had suffered from occasional scribal error. A third reason given for the variety of translations has implications that reach deeper into the tradition. Scholars believe that even though there may have been lists indicating which books were included in the canon of inspired writings, in many cases there was not one fixed, standard text. Rather, several very similar but still different versions of the tradition were in existence. This explanation would account for some of the real discrepancies found in the modern versions.

Until recent times the earliest available complete editions of the Hebrew version of the Old Testament could be traced back no further than the fifteenth century. We know now that these editions were based on a very limited selection of manuscripts, some of which are no longer available to us for study. The earliest Greek versions containing both Testaments date from the fourth century; some fragments of books are even older. Archaeological discoveries of the twentieth century have brought the number of these manuscripts or fragments of manuscripts to the thousands. They have been classified on the basis of both material used (papyrus or parchment) and the style of writing (block-lettered uncials or cursive minuscules).

Papyrus came from a tall, reed-like plant that grows abundantly along the Nile River. It was the customary stationery of the Mediterranean world. The stem was cut lengthwise and the strips laid side by side to form a layer. The layers were then laid at right angles and pressed together to form a sheet. After being dried, they were glued together to form a scroll, which was then rolled around a stick. Scrolls averaged about thirty-five feet in length. At some time during the second century the church began to use a new format. Sheets of papyrus were sown rather than glued together, thus producing a kind of book that has come to be referred to as a "codex." While it was relatively inexpensive, papyrus became brittle with age. Hence a new, costlier, but more durable material gradually came into use. The skins of sheep and goats, once they were scraped and dried, were found to provide a smooth surface for writing. This parchment, or vellum, as it is called, soon became the most commonly used material.

Most of the early texts that have been preserved were written in large blocklike letters. This is true not only of the Hebrew, whose script was relatively square, but of the Greek as well. The influence of ancient Greek inscriptions that used only capital letters (uncials) is recognized in early Greek manuscripts. For this reason, these manuscripts have come to be known by the same name—uncials. This form of block-writing was prominent until the ninth century, when cursive script came into popular use. This script enabled the scribes to copy manuscripts much more quickly and thus to make more copies available. These more numerous copies, however, were not necessarily easier to read. Cursive script, like its uncial counterpart, gave its name to a manuscript form—minuscule.

TRANSMISSION OF OLD TESTAMENT TEXTS

The first edition of the Old Testament that can in any way be called critical did not appear until the sixteenth century. Along with the complete text, it included a system of markings that represented vowel sounds (Hebrew is a consonantal language), an Aramaic paraphrase of the Hebrew text (Targum), and some of the traditional medieval Jewish commentary. This edition was a marked improvement over those that preceded it. They were based on earlier manuscripts which, as contemporary critical scholarship has shown, were quite limited in comprehension and inferior in legibility and accuracy. The sixteenth-century edition became the norm for most of the Hebrew Bibles until 1929, when members of a German Bible Society published a very sophisticated critical edition. This work, which has undergone periodic revision, continues to enjoy a place of prominence in some circles today. This German edition includes mention of variant readings as well as citations from the Septuagint.

Two discoveries in Egypt at the turn of the century offered the scholarly world a preview of things to come. It was customary in many medieval synagogues to store copies of the sacred texts in a specially designated room, since these texts were not to be destroyed, even when they ceased to be useful. In a Cairo synagogue one such room, or geniza, was found to contain a treasury of eleventh- and twelfth-century manuscripts, including several biblical variants. In addition to the biblical and liturgical content of the manuscripts, the material revealed a primitive system for facilitating pronunciation. Studying these findings, scholars have been able to trace the development of vowel pointing, a procedure originally intended to aid public proclamation, which eventually became part of the Hebrew language.

The second discovery was a papyrus manuscript dating from about 150 B.C.E. and containing the Ten Commandments and a liturgical passage from the sixth chapter of Deuteronomy. These findings would have to await the revelation of the Dead Sea Scrolls before their value could be properly assessed and appreciated.

The year 1947 proved to be a milestone in the world of text criticism. In that year ancient scrolls were discovered in caves in the vicinity of the Dead Sea. The first finds occurred at a place known as Qumran. Manuscripts dating as far back as 250–175 B.C.E. were uncovered. Other fragments were found up and down the region of the Dead Sea well into 1964. About 190 manuscripts or fragments have been discovered in sites that date back to the first and second centuries of the Common Era. A comparison of the variant texts shows that the Jewish communities of this time had not yet standardized their traditions. They may have reached some agreement about which books were inspired, but they also tolerated a great diversity of textual expression.

This extensive material has not yet been completely translated and evaluated. Nonetheless, any critical edition of the Hebrew Scriptures must take into account the knowledge gleaned from these findings if it is to be considered a fully reliable version of the Old Testament.

The history of the Greek version of the Old Testament is no less complicated. As mentioned earlier, the tradition about the seventy scholars working independently yet producing identical translations is now considered legendary. Comparisons of early Hebrew manuscripts with Aramaic Targums and Greek versions have provided invaluable insights. At the same time, such comparisons have left scholars with many new questions. One of the first questions to be addressed is: Was the Greek translation made from the particular Hebrew version that eventually became the standard version known as the Masoretic Text? According to the study of the transmission of the text summarized above, the answer is no. The Masoretic Text, though a careful reconstruction from early manuscripts, does not claim to originate before the Common Era. In addition, the standardization of the Hebrew version apparently did not take place before the second century of that era. The Greek or Alexandrian version, on the other hand, claims a third-century B.C.E. origin. Most likely there was no unified Hebrew tradition used by the translators.

The translation itself shows textual inconsistencies. Most scholars agree that the books of the Pentateuch probably achieved comparative standardization during the postexilic period. That might be true not only of the content but also of the textual form. This standardization could explain why the translation of this material appears to be quite consistent with and faithful to a Hebrew text very similar to the one behind the Masoretic Text. The same is not true of the translation of the other books of the Old Testament; this process probably developed over a period of two hundred years. Since there was no standardization of the Hebrew, there would be no uniformity in the Greek.

One is led to ask a second question: From what was the Greek translated if not from a standardized Hebrew text? There were probably many sources. The first to be considered is the variety of Hebrew renderings which existed along with those that ultimately became the standard texts but which were not themselves included in that group. Translation of the Greek back into Hebrew and a comparison of that Hebrew with the Masoretic Text have led scholars to believe that some of the Hebrew tradition behind the Septuagint is older than that behind the Masoretic Text.

A second source came from the liturgical texts of the community. As Greek became the language of the people and knowledge of Hebrew became less and less common, the people devised a way of translating the Hebrew sounds into Aramaic. In this way they could still pray the Hebrew while reading it in Aramaic. These transliterations were known as Targums. They, too, provided biblical material that could be used in a Greek translation.

Finally, the New Testament itself has thrown some light on this question. As noted earlier, most of the citations from the Old Testament that are found in the New Testament were taken from the Greek version. Retranslating them back into Hebrew has, in some cases, uncovered a version more in line with the Samaritan Pentateuch than with any other extant Hebrew source.

These three examples suggest that when the biblical traditions were being translated into Greek, whatever Hebrew versions were in use at that time and in that place by that community were the ones that were translated. Because the Hebrew tradition was rather fluid, the Greek version would be no less variant.

The second century saw the Christians and the Jews in heated controversy. The Christians frequently used the Septuagint in their arguments, and this led the Jews to reject that version and to produce new translations of their own. Three of those translations played a role in text criticism that their authors and proponents could never have imagined. The third-century Christian writer Origen produced a sixfold version of the Old Testament called the Hexapla. He arranged his material in six parallel columns in this order: (1) the Hebrew consonantal text that was standard in the second century; (2) a Greek transliteration of the Hebrew; (3) Aquila's Greek version (one of the Jewish translations); (4) Symmachus' Greek version (another Jewish translation); (5) the Septuagint; (6) Theodotion's Greek version (the third Jewish translation). This monumental work has survived in fragments as well as in citations of it made by various early Christian writers.

Of all of the versions of the Old Testament, it was the Septuagint that served as the basis for the major manuscripts. These major manuscripts are the uncial codices that have come down from the fourth to the tenth centuries.

TRANSMISSION OF NEW TESTAMENT TEXTS

Within the last century archaeological findings have unearthed papyrus fragments of New Testament manuscripts that date as early as the second century. Prior to that time the oldest available copies of the New Testament were the great uncial codices mentioned above. There are four major witnesses and several less important works in this category: (1) Codex B or Vaticanus, so named because it has been preserved in the Vatican Library, is probably the oldest, dating from the fourth century. Though it must have once included the entire Greek Bible, it is missing certain sections today. (2) Codex ℵ or Sinaiticus is the only version containing the entire New Testament. Although it, too, dates to the fourth century, it was relatively unknown until the nineteenth century, when it was found at the Monastery of Saint Catherine on Mount Sinai—hence the name. (3) Codex A or Alexandrinus is a fifth-century work. Like the other manuscripts, it is now incomplete. It may have received its name from the city Alexandria, renowned for its school of biblical interpretation. (4) Codex D or Bezae dates from the fifth or sixth century. It lacks an Old Testament as well as some New Testament material. It is a polyglot Bible, that is, it is written in more than one language. The Greek and the Latin are given on facing pages. The work is named after Theodore Beza, the successor of John Calvin.

One other codex might be of interest. It is Codex C or Ephraemi Rescriptus. The very name tells us that rewriting (rescriptus) has occurred. The earlier writing, probably a fifth-century Bible, was scraped off, and the skin was reused in the twelfth century to preserve some of the writings of Ephraem. Such was the fate of many biblical manuscripts. This codex is a famous example of reused manuscripts, called "palimpsests."

As mentioned earlier, the ninth century saw a kind of revolution in writing. Cursive (running hand) began to replace uncial (block) writing. This resulted in a new and quite extensive category of biblical manuscripts that date from the ninth on into the eighteenth century.

In addition to the uncial and minuscule manuscripts, another source of information about the New Testament tradition is evidence from early theological works. Early church writers, such as Eusebius and Clement, cited the Scriptures in their writings. Examination of these citations has been invaluable for text criticism.

Not until the sands of Egypt yielded their papyrus treasures in the late nineteenth century were scholars able to reconstruct a New Testament text that dated earlier than the fourth century. Some of the fragments that have been recently found can be traced to the second century, only a century or less away from the original composition. Although only fragments have been found, they show that at least in second-century Egypt there was no dominant type of New Testament text.

Finally, the importance of ancient liturgical texts is beginning to be appreciated. Since worship played such an important role in forming believers in the biblical tradition, these texts should be very enlightening. Because the study of lectionaries is only in its initial stage, no definite statement can be made at this time about their contribution to the study of the text.

With all the various text sources—uncials, minuscules, citations from early church writers, lectionary readings—how is one to decide on a single text? Certainly the reconstruction of a complete New Testament is more than a subjective selection from various manuscripts. One of the most famous responses to that question is a version known as the Textus Receptus (TR), or "Received Text." The phenomenon of printing perhaps more than the excellence of scholarship brought this work of a printer-editor to the public. Until recently, versions that grew out of this edition remained prominent for many Protestant Christians. However, current scholarship has furnished us with more manuscript evidence, and therefore a truer reconstruction of the text is possible.

One way this has been accomplished is by a process of classifying all the data into categories of families of texts. The quality of the Greek used, the literary style employed, and the content are all evaluated in this process. Once this has been done, editors can confine themselves to manuscripts with similar characteristics as they attempt to reconstruct the text. In the late nineteenth century the New Testament texts were classified into four main groups:

1) Neutral texts were thought to be the earliest and purest forms. They were free from emendations and deliberate reinterpretation, and were considered the common tradition of the entire Eastern church.

2) Alexandrian texts were named for the literary center in Egypt. These texts had considerable style and polish.

3) Western texts were preferred by the Western Christian writers and were clearly edited and interpolated to reflect that bias.

4) Syrian texts were marked by a combination of readings from the other groups. They showed great similarity to the Byzantine tradition.

New archaeological discoveries and diligent reexamination of these categories have resulted in refinements in the classifications. Collation and evaluation of the material have not yet been completed, and so scholars do not yet have all the information necessary to arrive at a consensus regarding the groupings. The present study does not require more detailed information about this field. It is enough to know that steps have been taken to enable scholars to work with a particular textual tradition and thus arrive at as good a text as possible.

This brief summary of the history of the transmission of texts and of the discovery of new evidence is intended to provide some initial explanation for the many versions of the Bible. If contemporary editions appear to be saying quite different things, the reason may be that they have originated from different textual sources. One edition might base its translation on evidence derived from an uncial manuscript, while another judges the Qumran reading as superior. A good critical edition will identify its sources so that the enlightened reader will know from which text tradition the reading has come.

ANCIENT VERSIONS

As both the Jewish and the Christian religious traditions spread into new areas, the need to translate the original languages became obvious. We have already seen that it was this need that prompted the creation of the Septuagint and other Greek versions. It also led to the formation of Aramaic paraphrases known as Targums. Gradually the original Hebrew and Greek manuscripts of both Testaments, as well as the Septuagint and the Targum versions, were translated into other ancient languages. Chief among these were Syriac, Latin, Coptic, and Ethiopic. Some of these ancient versions continue to play significant roles in the study of the early Bible.

We all know from a study of ancient history that after Alexander the Great conquered the world in the fourth century, Greek culture and the Greek language began to dominate the ancient world. What we may have overlooked is that since about the fifth century B.C.E., Aramaic remained the international language of the Fertile Crescent. This situation endured well into the Common Era. Targums began to appear in the last centuries B.C.E. and on into the medieval period. They continue to be a source of Jewish study today.

In addition to the Samaritan Pentateuch, the Targums, and the Masoretic Text, the Syriac writings also stem from the Hebrew version rather than from the Septuagint. Two works from this tradition will be noted. Mention has already been made of Tatian's Diatessaron, the harmonization of the four Gospel accounts into one narrative. This document was the official Syrian Gospel until the fifth century. That same century saw the wide acceptance of a Syriac version of the Old and New Testaments. This Bible is really a blending of several sources. The Old Testament was probably based on the Hebrew version, but with Targumic and Septuagint influences. The New Testament shows several Syrian characteristics. This Bible is known as the Peshitta, the "simple" version.

The most widely known Latin version is Jerome's Vulgate, which was the authoritative text of the Roman Catholic Bible from the time of the Council of Trent until recently. Although Jerome was undoubtedly influenced by the Septuagint and some Latin versions stemming from it, the Old Testament section of the Vulgate is a translation from the Hebrew. The New Testament, however, does come from Old Latin versions. Some scholars think that Jerome revised only the Gospels, leaving the rest of the rendition for someone else to complete.

Coptic is an Egyptian language written in the Greek alphabet. This fact would render translation from the Greek much easier than from the Hebrew version of the Old Testament. The Coptic Bible itself does not derive from one tradition but from several recensions, or editorial revisions. This makes the quality of the work rather uneven. As is often the case, the New Testament is more consistent than the Old, probably because fewer New Testament sources were used, and those that were employed were more standardized.

The language of Ethiopia, like Hebrew and Aramaic, is a Semitic language. However, the Old Testament of the Ethiopic Bible derives from the Greek version, not the Hebrew. In fact, it is one of the most reliable witnesses to the unrevised Septuagint. The New Testament is the section that shows the most revision and is consequently discounted as a reliable version.

MODERN ENGLISH VERSIONS

The past few decades have seen a proliferation of new English versions of the Bible. A noteworthy development of the ecumenical period in which we live is the interconfessional character of the committees working on the translating and editing of such projects.

One of the most memorable facets of Martin Luther's revolt was the priority he placed on biblical interpretation and the accusations he hurled at the Catholic church for its use (or, according to him, its misuse) of the Scriptures. From that time until the recent past, the Bible has been seen as a kind of measuring stick for one's orthodoxy, each side of the dispute deciding upon the criteria of measurement. While the Protestants encouraged personal reading of the Scriptures and accepted a certain amount of private interpretation, the Catholic church discouraged and even forbade the practice.

It was with great caution that the first English version of the Bible appeared in print. The New Testament appeared at Rheims in 1582, followed by the Old Testament at Douay in 1609. These were the works of English Roman Catholic scholars who had been exiled or fled from their homeland because of religious persecution and settled in France. This version, the Douay-Rheims retained exclusive authoritative status in the Catholic church until 1943, when Pope Pius XII issued the encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu, encouraging Catholic scholars to return to manuscripts written in the original languages in an effort to produce new translations. The Douay-Rheims version of Latin Vulgate manuscripts was in accord with the Council of Trent's designation of that version as authoritative. About 150 years after its appearance, it was revised to bring the English in line with the development that the language had undergone. With the exception of that one revision, the Douay-Rheims remained standard until recent times.

Although the first English Bibles produced by Protestants appeared sometime in the fourteenth century, the one that enjoyed the greatest prominence for the longest time was the King James Version (KJV). It was commissioned by King James I of England and completed in 1611. A careful study of the text reveals that the committee relied heavily on several existing translations, the Rheims New Testament included. Because the Vulgate version was superior to many of the Greek codices available at that time, and because the King James Version was based on editions that relied on the inferior Textus Receptus, which utilized those Greek manuscripts, we can easily see why the King James Version underwent a major revision. The original edition was called the Authorized Version (AV), and the revision, which appeared about 250 years later, came to be known as the Revised Version (RV). The King James Version is renowned for its eloquence and lyrical quality. Quotations from this work have been woven into much of the music and literature of the English-speaking world. The beauty and artistry with which this has been done contribute to the difficulty many people have experienced in accepting a new revision of the text.

Since most of the manuscript discoveries occurred well after the appearance of the King James Version and its Revised Version, a new and even more comprehensive revision seemed in order. Some claim that the Revised Standard Version (RSV), which appeared in 1946, is in fact a new translation because the committee that produced it used all of the new text evidence that was available. Others contend that because the committee was instructed to stay as close to the King James tradition as possible, it must rightly be called a revision. Whatever the case may be, despite initial fundamentalist reaction against relinquishing the King James Version, the Revised Standard Version finally established itself as one of the best English versions of the time. Although the work was done under Protestant auspices, the Revised Standard Version received Catholic ecclesiastical approval in 1966 and has continued to be used by Catholics in educational as well as liturgical settings.

Another edition that has been quite popular in recent years is the Jerusalem Bible (JB), which appeared in 1954. Most of the translation was done from the original languages, yet it was carried out under the direct influence of the French version, La Bible de Jérusalem, thus producing what some have called a translation of a translation. This edition is replete with introductions, explanatory notes, and cross references, making it a helpful tool for study.

In 1970 several denominations of the British Isles published the New English Bible (NEB). The project was not bound to any prior biblical version or tradition. It was free to avoid unfamiliar non-English idioms in favor of modern expressions. Evidence from the latest archaeological finds was used, and variant readings are often cited in footnotes. Some of the English is more British than American, but this is to be expected from a British work that attempts to bring the best biblical witness to a contemporary audience.

Finally, the major American Catholic effort at translation has been the New American Bible (NAB). What was begun in 1941 as the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (CCD) Version was eventually published in 1970 under the new title. Going directly to the best manuscripts in the original languages, the translating committee, which included Protestant scholars, left behind the strictures placed upon Catholic biblical scholarship by the Council of Trent.

All the versions reviewed here have strengths and weaknesses. Some are especially concerned with refinement of translation, and when critical choices have to be made, they tend to sacrifice points of fluency in favor of fidelity to the original. Others opt for a smooth-flowing rendition, forfeiting precision of translation. Still other readings are quite colloquial, a feature which might be beneficial for certain communities but which also limits the version to those groups.

A final point should be made. The Revised Standard Version and the New American Bible are being replaced by new translations. These new versions will be new translations, not revisions of the respective versions. Thus, new and ever more accurate readings of the biblical texts are being produced in order to bring the word of God closer to the people of God.

HERMENEUTICS

INTERPRETATION

One of the most exciting and challenging issues in contemporary biblical study is that of interpretation, or hermeneutics. Not only has it captured the imagination of scholarship, but it has also caused considerable confusion for the general public. Just what precisely does the Bible mean? Among the many conflicting interpretations, which one is right? Which school of interpretation or which particular scholar is one to follow? A closer look at this complex and controversial issue, while it certainly will not answer all these questions with satisfaction, may throw some light on the sources of some of the confusion about the meaning of the biblical text.

We must remember that the Bible, as a basic literary reality, is a form of communication comprised of three principal components: a sender or author; a message or text; and a receiver or audience. Historically, as long as the communication recorded in the biblical texts remained within the community of its origin, the audience required very little interpretation. Most of the audience belonged to the same world of meaning as did the author. It was only when a particular biblical message was carried into another world of meaning that extensive efforts of interpretation became necessary. Inevitably, different understandings resulted, depending primarily upon whether the major interpretative focus was principally on the sender, the message, or the receiver.

The message

It seems that throughout the earliest centuries of Christianity the primary focus of most interpretations was on the message. Hence, the interpretative task was to translate this message into the new world or worlds of meaning. By the Middle Ages four distinct types of interpretation of the message had been developed. They have survived the march of time and continue to influence the way many people today understand the Bible. They are: the literal, the allegorical, the moral, and the eschatological. Since these specific designations may be unfamiliar to the reader, a brief look at each will provide some understanding.

The literal sense of a text usually refers to a meaning that the words themselves convey. In this case the text is accepted at face value. Such an understanding implies that the audience immediately grasps all the nuances of the language in the very manner intended by the author. This understanding may be readily available whenever both author and audience share the same world view. However, an audience that holds a very different world view will not so easily grasp the author's intention. The elusiveness of the literal sense becomes obvious when we reflect, for example, on how quickly the meaning of words changes. Parents of teenagers frequently stand dumbfounded as they listen to their children speak an English that has absolutely no meaning for them. Basically, the two worlds of meanings—that of the parents and that of their teenagers—simply do not coincide completely; thus they cannot understand one another fully.

Rigidly literal or fundamentalistic interpretations of biblical texts often fail to take into account the undeniable change and development of language. Biblical fundamentalists seem reluctant to recognize that the world of meaning, the world view of the biblical texts, is not the same as the contemporary one. Add to this the fact that the Bible is the product of a different culture and a different time, and the need for interpretation is magnified. The literal sense of the Bible, then, while it may seem the most reasonable and likely one, is not always arrived at with the ease that some claim.

The allegorical sense of Scripture, especially prominent in the early centuries of the Christian era as well as in the Middle Ages, opens the Bible to a myriad of interpretations. According to this approach, the text really intends to say something other than that which its literal wording suggests. The contention is that deeper mystical meanings lie hidden beneath the words. Actually, these alleged deeper meanings usually originate from outside the biblical text itself and are brought to it by interpreters who read meanings into the images and actions of the text from their own world view. For example, the story of Mary of Bethany listening to Jesus while Martha prepares a meal was allegorically interpreted to mean that the contemplative life symbolized by Mary is a higher call than the active life symbolized by Martha. Yet, this was hardly a concern of the original author. Thus, there can be as many allegorical interpretations of one text as there are interpreters with their various points of view. Hence, while a text may yield a rich breadth of meanings, these may seem arbitrary, subjective, and remote from the more immediately apparent message of the text.

In the moral sense, the text is understood primarily in terms of the spiritual life of every individual believer. For example, anyone and everyone is Abraham called into a new relationship with God. The political liberation of ancient Israel is understood as really describing the personal freedom that salvation brings to the soul of the individual believer. Although this method of interpretation has frequently been employed by spiritual writers to nourish the interior lives of religious persons, it has serious deficiencies. The Bible's communal sense is frequently lost, and social responsibilities are often overlooked. The historical references are minimized in importance, and the text sometimes seems to be forced to fit an interpreter's predetermined format.

The fourth approach is called eschatological. It refers to the spiritual meaning of the text as this pertains to the future heavenly or eschatological realities. According to this sense, the "promised land" is neither historical Israel, as a literal interpretation would indicate, nor the church of Christ, as an allegorical sense might suggest, nor the soul of the redeemed Christian, as the moral sense would assert. It is the future kingdom of heaven. This kind of interpretation, which was so common in the later Middle Ages and well into the modern era, tended to minimize the importance of life in this world. Everything was focused on the next life. Like the moral sense, this manner of understanding principally served the devotional lives of the people. Whether it did justice to the biblical text is an altogether different question.

As stated earlier, these four senses of Scripture continue to influence the way many people today understand the Bible. Some of the current confusion may stem from the diverse perspectives employed in the individual approaches as well as from any mixture of the four. Traces of all these approaches frequently surface in contemporary preaching and are prominent in certain contemporary devotional literature.

The sender

One outgrowth of the Reformation was a persistent attempt to avoid any trace of dogmatic or theological bias in the interpretation of the Bible. Many of the Reformers were particularly critical of the manner in which (they alleged) the Roman church was dealing with the Bible. They insisted that the Bible was being misused to bolster official doctrine not at all rooted in the Bible, and demanded that the original meaning of the text rather than a subjective or denominational interpretation be sought.

This concern brought a halt to the allegorizing tendencies of much of biblical scholarship. While this style of interpretation persisted among Roman Catholics, most Protestant scholars and communities began to stress the historical background of the Bible. Thus began the historical-critical movement, that is, a broad enterprise among predominantly Protestant biblical scholars to seek for the meaning of a biblical text by pursuing a careful investigation and analysis of its historical background. It was not until very recently that this movement gained prominence in Catholic circles. It had been encouraged since the time of Pope Pius XII (1943) and was given broad endorsement at the Second Vatican Council (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation).

The focus had now shifted from the multiple meanings of the message or text to the "real" meaning intended by the author. Thus, the biblical scholar now had to be as informed as possible about the circumstances surrounding the origins of the writings. Their historical, cultural, and religious settings took on new importance. The sources employed in their composition, the audiences for which they were intended, and the purposes they were to serve became the subjects that occupied the attention of interpreters.

The results of this shift in method were numerous. The Scriptures, while always recognized as inspired, began to be appreciated as human expressions of the faith of a people. From this human perspective, contemporary women and men could now see their ancient counterparts as being engaged in the very same struggles of life as they themselves were and are. They began to read the biblical narratives with renewed enthusiasm. Biblical theology came to occupy a significant place in their lives. They sought to respond to God's presence in their own history, as their ancestors of biblical times had done. The biblical revival ushered in by the historical-critical movement undoubtedly brought new life to the church.

The study of Scripture quickly became a very sophisticated undertaking. Those untrained in the method frequently grew discouraged with both its demands and some of its first fruits. Some felt that the very foundation of their faith was now being shattered by findings that did not square with their own devotional, allegorical, moral, or eschatological interpretations. Those who did acquire some facility in the approach and could appreciate its value, however, soon had to acknowledge its inadequacies. They could see that it was not enough to know the theology of the past. The questions they were grappling with had to do with the applicability of the biblical message to the present: Does biblical theology have any relevance for our day? If so, how is one to translate into the present a theological message of another era, another culture, another world view?

These questions led scholars to look beyond historical criticism and to turn to the issue of hermeneutics, or interpretation. But even this turn did not seem to be enough. More radical and more comprehensive questions were surfacing. Did revelation only occur thousands of years ago? Are we merely to reenact in our lives the saving events of the past? A second significant interpretative shift was about to take place.

The receiver

Attention is now being focused on the receiver, or the audience. This means that the contemporary interpreter and the act of interpreting have now become the objects of the analysis. The historical-critical method assumes that an objective understanding of the original meaning is possible. Such a position ignores the fact that the interpreter comes to the text with historical and religious biases. The new methods of interpretation admit that the way the text is understood depends to a large extent upon the socio-political and religious perspectives of the interpreter. Thus, for example, people from a situation of political, economic, or religious oppression will view the Bible quite differently than will those from a secure and comfortable vantage point.

This new approach is only in its infancy and therefore cannot yet be adequately evaluated. However, some very exciting and challenging results have already been achieved. Women and men are beginning to appreciate their own lives as the stage wherein revelation, as authentic as that revelation described in the biblical texts, is taking place. Biblical spirituality is no longer concerned exclusively with the individual. It has reclaimed its communal dimension.

CONTEMPORARY HERMENEUTICS

Another way to approach the question of interpretation is to distinguish between what the Bible means and what the Bible meant. As mentioned earlier, this is no problem when the authors and the audiences share the same worlds of meaning. It becomes an issue when cross-cultural and/or cross-generational communication no longer guarantee a common understanding. The professional scholars engaged in contemporary hermeneutics span a wide spectrum of positions regarding the major focus of these two poles. Some hold that the real meaning is that intended by the original author (what the Bible meant). Others contend that once a piece of literature leaves the hands of the author, it enjoys a life of its own, independent of authorial intention (what the Bible means). Most contemporary hermeneutical approaches can be found somewhere between these two poles, bridging the gap between the authorial intention and a present-day context.

Scholars today refer to authorial intention (what the Bible meant) as the literal sense. It is important to be clear as to the precise meaning of this designation. This way of understanding takes the words at face value, but it takes them as they were intended by the original author(s) or editor(s), not primarily as they have come to be understood today. A fundamentalist reading of Scripture understands the words in a literal sense too, but it ascribes contemporary meaning to them. The presupposition operative in this approach, though often unconsciously, is that today's world of meaning is identical with that of the ancient writers. A fundamentalist position claims to be able to arrive at the literal meaning merely by reading the text. Critical scholars, on the other hand, insist that extensive, precise historical analysis is required if the authors' world of meaning is to be unlocked. This critical analysis encompasses a large number of distinct but related methodologies. The principal ones will be discussed below.

Concentration on what the Bible means has led many scholars into studies that are less historical and more literary in character. Various literary theories have been examined and employed in biblical interpretation. This trend has led to further analysis of literary forms, study of the meaning of symbols, and probing into the very nature of language itself as a means of communication. Unlike historical studies, which strive to learn more about the world of the author in order to discover the original meaning, literary studies inevitably open the text to a plurality of meanings.

Without denying the importance and validity of each of these two approaches, many scholars believe that neither one is sufficient in itself. They insist that the Scriptures are more than literary works—they are also inspired tradition of an ongoing believing community. Thus, the literal sense plays a normative role in helping the present-day community come to an understanding of its identity and to an appreciation of the kind of lifestyles that should flow from that identity. If this is true, however, then different historical and/or cultural contexts will reinterpret and restate these biblical traditions in various ways. The result will be a plurality of valid meanings. The challenge of contemporary hermeneutics is to devise a method that will take both of these approaches into consideration. Such a method will be equipped to faithfully transmit the inspired tradition. Thus, a particular valid expression of the meaning of the text will function as the word of God, forming a new people into a community of believers.

HISTORICAL-CRITICAL APPROACHES

The phrase "historical-critical method" or "historical criticism" has been used so loosely and erroneously that the designation has become ambiguous and the usefulness of the interpretative approach has been questioned. As understood here, it is an approach that employs every available historical tool in an attempt to reconstruct history and to understand the documents which that history produced. Its goal is historical, and it works toward that goal critically and systematically. It seeks to understand and to interpret but not to judge the findings.

The nineteenth century saw a broadscale revolution in historical consciousness and the birth of a new historical theory. This led to the development of critical tools for studying the past. Sacred texts could not escape the critical eye of this kind of investigation. Soon believing communities were torn between the excitement of new discoveries, new interpretations, and new challenges to faith and the fear that what was exciting was also a potential threat to that faith. What had been cherished as "truth" was now questioned as "myth." Longstanding practices were viewed as irrelevant and lacking historical foundations.

Although there are still people who reject this critical approach as "faithless," it has come to be generally accepted. However, this acceptance does not imply that the historical methods have answered all the questions of interpretation. As a matter of fact, scholars now are becoming more and more convinced of their inadequacy. They are beginning to realize that more was expected of these methodologies than they could offer. The approach may succeed at addressing the historical issues, but it certainly is not adequate to uncover the theological issues. Realizing this, scholars continue to employ these historical methods, but not in a manner exclusive of other critical approaches.

Both biblical research and biblical spirituality are indebted to the historical approach. It has provided the believing community with critical editions of the Bible that far outstrip earlier editions in textual reconstruction and translation. It has thrown light on the life and history of both ancient Israel and early Christianity. It has brought the people of those times into sharper focus, enabling the reader to see them as real people whose concerns and dreams can be understood. It has revealed the depth of faith and the complexity and power of the religion of the believing communities.

Textual criticism

The function of textual criticism is twofold: (1) to reconstruct the original wording of a biblical text; (2) to trace the transmission of that text down through the centuries. The first goal is an impossible one. Since the autograph, or original copy, of every book of the Bible has been lost, the best that scholars can do is to reconstruct the text from manuscripts that are available. This task guarantees no historical certainty because of the inconsistency that exists in the manuscript material. It is by comparing manuscripts that scholars develop what is called a "critical text." This is a hypothetical reconstruction, usually accompanied by extensive footnotes (called critical apparatus) that indicate the manuscript sources of the passages as well as alternative readings. Modern translations are based on just such critical texts.

The second goal is also achieved by a comparison of texts, but with a different end in view. Reconstruction is a move backward toward one reading; the history of textual transmission is a search forward for variant readings that will enable the scholar to trace the change and development that took place. Origen's sixfold work called the Hexapla may well be the earliest attempt at such a textual criticism. It provides evidence of the changes that occurred as the text developed.

Since no manuscript contains the original text, all are more or less corrupt. The question is not which reading is reliable but in which way it is reliable. Every text reflects the period of history and the specific community from which it originated and within which it survived. Critical examination of the text and comparison with the variant texts tell us something about that period of history and that particular community. The translations reviewed in the previous chapter perform that same function. They reveal the particular stage of critical scholarship at which the community has arrived, the current stage of the language into which the text has been translated, and frequently some theological issues that the community must address.

This particular discipline requires expertise not only in the original languages but in related languages as well. Literature from cultures other than the biblical communities is studied in order to understand these biblical communities in the broader context of their respective worlds. While few people may devote themselves to this kind of research, the findings that derive therefrom must be considered by both translator and interpreter. Before any other interpretative step can be taken, the best possible rendition of the text must be established.

Much of the history of textual criticism, as well as explanations of the major manuscript sources and traditions, has been discussed in the previous section and need not be treated here.

Literary criticism

The term "literary criticism" is understood in at least three different ways. (1) In the classical sense it is the critical approach to the study of the literature. The structure, form, and language are analyzed. Such critique was brought to bear on biblical material, and as early as the time of Origen it led scholars to question the supposed authorship of some of the biblical books. (2) With the rise of historical consciousness in the nineteenth century, historical questions were being asked about literary differences, and the discipline came to be called "source criticism" by some. (3) Recently scholars have again been asking questions of a more literary nature, questions dealing with the relationship of content to form and with the philosophy of language.

Literary criticism in the traditional biblical sense actually grew out of a textual study. After noticing the use of different names for God in the Book of Genesis, an eighteenth-century scholar discovered literary patterns in that book. He concluded that the book had been composed of various preexisting sources. Eventually the explanation for the composition of the Pentateuch came to be known as the "Documentary Hypothesis" (four sources were "discovered": the Yahwist, the Elohist, the Deuteronomic, and the Priestly). Similarly, the explanation for the differences in the gospel tradition was called the "Two-Source Hypothesis" (it maintained that the Gospel of Mark and a collection of sayings known as Q were used by both Matthew and Luke). Once scholars believed that there were various sources for the biblical texts, they began to ask questions about their origins, their life settings, and the reason for their composition. Literary criticism thereby became a historical discipline.

With all the questions that were answered, literary criticism also raised some new ones that it seemed unable to address. The door was open to a new discipline that would address those questions. (New literary criticism will be explained later.)

Form criticism

The function of form criticism is to get behind the sources identified by literary criticism and to discover the life situations out of which they grew. Literary or source criticism may well be interested in authorship, but it still identifies this author in the singular. Form criticism, on the other hand, is interested in the original settings in the life of the community. It discovers these settings by identifying and analyzing the typical forms of expression found within the existing literature. Although it begins as a literary approach, its intent is to discover the historical setting and the historical function of the forms in order to understand their pre-literary (oral) stage.

Ancient Israel was probably not a highly literate culture. Thus, its oral forms of communication were most likely quite conventional. This would mean that before they attained literary form, these forms achieved a quite consistent oral expression. Such expressions were very much a part of the ordinary life of the community. Recognizing and interpreting these forms is the first step in gaining insight into that life.

In order to accomplish their task, form critics first examine the structure of the text so as to isolate the individual units of which it is composed. These units are then classified according to genre, or literary type. This classification leads directly to conclusions about the setting. Setting here does not refer to geographic location or to specific dating; rather, it refers to sociocultural situations that may or may not include a particular social or religious structure. For example, a study of the psalms of lament can tell us much, while at the same time leaving many things unanswered. A lament points to a human situation that may or may not be identified. These psalms frequently speak of social corruption and oppression or national calamity, although they also complain of personal misfortune. We know that psalms were part of the temple liturgy, but their use was not restricted to that site or to official liturgy. Thus, a lament reflects human suffering, but it is not always specific about that suffering. It suggests liturgical practice, but it was not limited to formal ritual. It was associated with the temple, but its use was not restricted to that religious institution.

The final step in the analysis of a particular form is to determine just what the genre was meant to accomplish within the community. Was the lament intended to inspire confidence in God? To offer a legitimate avenue for complaint? To serve as an admission of guilt and an acknowledgment of repentance?

Form criticism may appear to some to be a negative process, breaking down the biblical story. In fact, its goal is positive: to reconstruct the oral tradition behind the literary narrative. The forms are seen as the remnants of the early tradition. Hence, matching the fabrics, blending the colors, and discovering the designs enable scholars to detect something of the original piece.

As literary criticism grew out of textual study, so form criticism addresses questions that literary or source criticism could not answer—questions about origins and settings and reasons behind composition. But, like its predecessor, this discipline also had its limitations. It may have been able to identify the forms of the literary work, but it could not explain how they became part of the whole. Form criticism could take the text apart but could not put it back together. It would take tradition criticism to do that.

Tradition criticism

Tradition criticism, or tradition history, as it is sometimes called, is an analysis of the history of the transmission process of the traditions. It is that discipline which traces the growth and development of traditions as this process was described in the first section of this article. While form criticism locates the life-settings of the units, tradition criticism attempts to describe what happened within those settings. It is interested in what shaped the tradition as it was preserved and handed down, and it seeks to trace this development. Hence the name tradition history. Although it is really concerned with the process of transmission, it does examine the tradition that is being transmitted, primarily the oral stage of that tradition. (Redaction criticism examines the literary stages of this development. Some scholars treat redaction as a step in the tradition-history approach.)

The recurrence of similar motifs or forms makes tradition criticism possible. Various examples are analyzed in order to detect significant differences. (This process differs from form criticism, which highlights similarities.) Having uncovered the differences, the next step is to ascertain whether or not these differences are the result of development and, if so, to hypothesize as to the cause of that development. It is difficult enough to reconstruct literary history. When one is exploring the oral stages of a tradition, there is even less solid evidence available, and scholars must be on their guard lest their reconstructions be far afield of what the text actually says.

As scholars discover why the believing community preserved the traditions in the forms that it did and why these traditions went through the changes that occurred, they are able to reconstruct the tradition history of the community. In addition to this, their study also uncovers information that can be called historical, in the strict sense of that term. Streams of tradition have been found to be associated with one or another community or group, for example, the prophets or the Lukan community. Examining these streams of tradition brings one into contact with that group, with its preferences, its strategies, and its influence. Frequently traditions are also associated with specific locations. Jerusalem is a case in point. The more one knows about the site, the better one is able to reconstruct the traditioning process that took place there. All of this can aid in the discovery of the socio-political as well as the religious dynamics at work in the growth and development of the traditions.

The fruits of tradition criticism can perhaps be more directly appreciated by the average believer than can the findings of other disciplines that have so far been described. They tell us how ancient Israel understood its history. (Because the traditioning process that resulted in the New Testament took place in a considerably shorter span of time, it is usually studied under the heading of redaction criticism. Tradition criticism has become primarily an Old Testament discipline.) It also shows how significant events in that history have become types for understanding other experiences; for example, Exodus typology is often used to describe the Exile. Finally, tradition criticism shows how Israel understood the revelation of God. It was within the very process of tradition formation that Israel discerned the activity of God. As the community struggled to retain the validity of its inspired traditions within new situations and at new times, it recognized the active and directive involvement of God.

Redaction criticism

Redaction criticism is devoted to the study of how written sources were used by an editor or redactor and what this interpretative editing says about the theological interests of the redactor. This discipline is like tradition criticism, for both are concerned to show how stages of development gave new shapes to the tradition. Redaction criticism, however, is concerned with the literary rather than the oral stages. As tradition criticism is primarily an Old Testament discipline, redaction criticism developed in conjunction with New Testament study. Its principal focus is on the final literary form, the form that has come down to us.

It has been in Gospel studies that redaction criticism has provided the greatest insights. By comparing episodes from one synoptic Gospel with parallels that appear in the other two Gospels, redaction critics are able to discern the theological point of view of the evangelist. In this way they have contributed to our knowledge of the theological history of early Christianity.

NEW CRITICAL APPROACHES

Over the years the critical methods summarized above underwent constant development and refinement. Within recent years, however, new areas of interest have been probed, new analyses have been employed, and new information has been gathered. This is true with regard to both the historical approach and the more strictly literary analysis.

Sociological approaches

Sociology has come to be understood in two distinct but related ways. In the broad sense, it is the study of society. This would include the social sciences, such as sociology itself, anthropology, economics, political science, etc. In the narrow sense, sociology is concerned with the origin, development, and patterns of social behavior.

Traditional historical criticism produced detailed studies of the social realities of ancient Israel and of early Christianity (sociology in the broad sense). Scholars focused on the structures of social life and used available research methods to gather the data. Archaeology was invaluable in this approach, providing artifacts, literature, and official documents that were scrutinized, classified, and interpreted. The unearthed findings were compared with similar material belonging to other ancient cultures. Although some comparative studies proved valuable, the material analyzed had been lifted from its unique social context and was presumed to have in its own context the meaning and importance of similar material in another context. In addition, the social theories of the day determined the framework of interpretation. Prominent among these theories was the evolutionary perspective that frequently equated change and development with growth and improvement. Thus, sociological investigations were focused on the development of religion and religious structures and not on the dynamic at play.

The turn of the century saw scholars asking sociological questions and developing sociological methods to answer them. The social sciences had come of age, and sociology in the narrow sense (the sense in which it will be meant henceforth) began to make its impact not only in scholarly circles but in the world at large. This new study encouraged biblical scholars to employ sociological approaches in their investigation of the Scriptures.

Sociological study of the Scriptures is still in its early stages, and so it is difficult to evaluate its contributions. However, significant insights have already come to light. An understanding of the social and political structures of ancient Israel have underscored the role that prophets played in critiquing that society and have furthered an appreciation of the prophetic message. Studies of first-century Roman society have shown the Christian church as a unique and challenging community of equals.

One of the branches of anthropology, a second sociological field, has had a profound impact on the literary study of the Scriptures. That branch is linguistics, or the study of the structure of language. Out of it has developed structural exegesis, or structuralism. Unlike the historical-critical methods, which investigate the historical process and seek to discover the original meaning of the text, structural methods search for the meaning within the language itself rather than within the historical event beyond the language. In this way they share the same focus as does the new literary criticism.

Perhaps one of the most important insights that sociological approaches have brought to biblical studies is the realization that not only does the text have a special social context or contexts out of which it grew, but the interpreters also operate with social biases. All contexts have assumptions and pre-understandings that must be admitted if there is to be any cross-cultural and/or cross-generational communication. Just as one cannot presume that language has the same meaning in every context, one cannot expect that social structures or dynamics always play the same roles.

Canonical criticism

A second new development in biblical study, known as canonical or canon criticism, is only a little more than a decade old. Its interest is the biblical text in its canonical or final form and the role which that form plays in the faith of the community. It seeks to trace the development of the canon from the beginnings of tradition formation through the stages of interpretation, the selection and organization of material in the formation of a biblical book, and the final decisions that determine canonicity. It differs from tradition criticism (which is interested in the same development) in that it is not concerned with the historical dynamics that shaped the tradition but with the hermeneutical methods that were employed in the shaping. This does not make canonical criticism just another historical method, for its goal is not historical but theological.

Since it was interpretation that brought earlier traditions alive in a new setting, a study of the principles of interpretation should uncover how this was done. Proponents of this approach believe that the methods employed in the formation of the Bible might well be used by contemporary believers as they seek to do the same thing that was done by their ancestors, namely, to bring earlier traditions alive in new settings. Thus, the Bible can be read not merely as literature but also as the Sacred Scripture that it is.

Although scholars acknowledge that interpretative principles were employed by the different communities throughout the stages of tradition growth and development, they do not have a clear record of them. Only by applying the methods of historical and literary criticism, the very methods that have been described here, can scholars hope to bring these principles to light. The more that is known about each stage of development, the easier it will be to discern the process of development and the principles that guided that process.

It is clear that context, whether sociopolitical or religious, plays a major role in this approach. One must attend to the context when analyzing the meanings of the past as well as when arriving at meanings for the present. When a tradition of the past encountered new concerns or a new context, it was reinterpreted according to some theological perspective. In a similar manner, if that tradition is to be shaped anew in an authentic and meaningful way, it behooves the interpreter to accurately comprehend the contemporary situation. One's view of reality will influence, if not determine, the shape that the tradition will take. For example, the covenant theme might be used to assure a comfortable society that its security is a sign of God's good pleasure and it has every right to cling to it. On the other hand, it might challenge that society to assume its responsibilities to the less fortunate and to redistribute its resources in the name of social justice. The deepest needs of the community (assurance or challenge) must be recognized.

Although still in its initial stages, this approach to interpretation has generated quite a bit of excitement. Many hope that it will be a way of bridging the gap between what the Bible meant and what the Bible means today.

New literary criticism

New literary criticism seeks to understand the Bible strictly as literature. The historical issues that relate the material to its origin are ignored. The world that interests this critic is not some world of the past but the imaginative world created by the literary piece itself. To understand this world, one does not consult archaeology, sociology, or source criticism but rather the language and forms used, the structures created, and the literary movements developed within the work. To say that the world of a literary piece is imaginative does not mean that it is unreal. Rather, it means that the work does not claim to describe reality as it is; it imitates reality. Its integrity is not determined by its historical accuracy but by its internal harmony.

If the imaginative world of literature is an imitation of the historical world of reality, then the components of which the world is fashioned are not historically real but stand for historical reality. They are all basically metaphorical, analogous to something else. Clues to what they represent are not found outside the work but within it. The interpretation of these clues is to be sought within the scope of the genre or literary form to which the piece belongs. Because a genre is not so much a set of meanings as it is a set of relationships, every literary piece is open to a plurality of interpretations. There is little if any external control over the interpretation, and so one must hold strictly to the patterns set by the genre. Although a literary work may allow for several different renderings, this does not mean that its analysis can be done in a haphazard manner or that it can mean anything the interpreter wants it to mean. For example, a play can have different interpretations, but its internal relationships set certain limits. The same is true for sonnets, limericks, parables, miracle stories.

This kind of literary criticism has itself undergone stages of development. At first texts were characterized as windows through which the interpreter could look to the meaning beyond. Later other critics saw them more as mirrors within which meaning was to be found. Contemporary critics choose to see the text functioning as both window and mirror. Its meaning is to be found within itself, but not in such a way as to confine the reader to it. Good literature takes the reader beyond itself. This interpretative approach enables the critic to discover what the text means, but with no regard for what it meant.

TOWARD DEVELOPING A WAY OF INTERPRETATION

Clearly, interpretation is more than just the gathering of information about a text (narrow historical criticism). It is an explanation of the meaning of that text. And when the text in question is revered as the sacred tradition of a believing community, a tradition that is somehow rooted in the self-identity of that community, some kind of historical continuity with that ongoing community seems essential for correct interpretation. The following is an example of how both historical and literary approaches can contribute toward developing a way of interpreting the biblical text as Scripture (sacred tradition) and not merely as literature.

Returning to the model of communication described at the beginning of this section, one can focus on the sender, the message, or the audience. Another way of understanding this triad is to speak of three worlds: the world out of which the text grew; the world created by the text itself; and the world of the reader. Each world is independent of the others. However, the world of the text is indebted to the world out of which it grew for its structure and for the fundamental meaning which that structure projects. This does not mean that the text is restricted to the original meaning and cannot generate a plurality of legitimate meanings. The new literary criticism has shown that this can be done. "Indebtedness to the world out of which it grew," as used here, means that the scope of the possible interpretations was broadly set by the original context. That world intended to articulate a message (the original meaning), and it fashioned the text in such a way as to communicate that message. For example, the prophets chastised the nation through the use of an oracle of judgment. That literary form (the oracle of judgment) limits the number of ways in which the literary piece can be interpreted.

Interpretation can be defined as the meeting of the world of the reader with the world of the text in a way that the meaning of the text takes hold of the reader. This meaning may or may not be the original meaning of the text—that will depend upon whether or not the interpreter used historical or literary approaches. According to the new literary criticism, with the exception of the choice of form and all the internal relationships that are intrinsic to that form, the world out of which the text grew need play no part in the interpretation. However—and this is a most important point—the Bible is a unique kind of literature. It is the inspired word of God. No believer will deny that it is revelatory, but is its revelatory character in any way dependent upon the original meaning? In other words, is the original meaning normative? And if it is normative, in what way? The present study contends that the original meaning is indeed normative, and it explains this normative quality in the following way.

Just as during its growth and development the tradition contributed to the shaping of a believing community, it has not ceased to perform that same wonder down through the centuries. That is, it has given witness to the community's identity and has continually awakened that community to its purpose. This took place in the process of the community's reshaping of the tradition as that tradition had been handed down to it. The interpretation or understanding of the tradition that the community received may not have been identical with the tradition's original meaning (fidelity to the covenant might call for different responses in different circumstances). However, the meaning received was the meaning that had been preserved for it and transmitted to it, and it was the meaning that the community considered the correct expression of its understanding of its own identity. It appears that throughout the process of tradition formation, the believing community exercised a good deal of creative freedom. This freedom was restricted, however, by the concept of self-identity that it inherited from the preceding generation. Although different generations may have understood and expressed this identity in various ways, they safeguarded its essence. Each generation had to grasp this essence and then restate it in ways that were expressive of its time. From this point of view, the original meaning can be understood to be normative, while subsequent meanings can also enjoy validity.

A point that must be kept in mind is the role played by the believing community in determining the validity or appropriateness of various meanings. The community is the carrier of the tradition. The community is the agent of creative reinterpretation. Thus, while the interpretation of the Bible as literature might be done by any critic, only the believing community can interpret it as revelatory Scripture, because the refashioning of tradition takes place within a believing community.

Interpretation has been defined as the meeting of the world of the reader with the world of the text. The reader brings a particular perspective or understanding of life to the text; the text articulates the community's received tradition. The meaning of that tradition is shaped by the reader's perspective and in turn takes hold of the reader. In this way the tradition gives witness to the community's identity and is itself reshaped in the process.

GENESIS

Pauline A. Viviano

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Genesis often confronts us as an antiquated work of literature containing stories of questionable value for our sophisticated civilized world. And yet, because it forms a part of the Bible, we feel that it should say something to us, something about God that transcends time and place. Part of the problem in finding meaning in the Book of Genesis is the vast distance between the world that produced Genesis—a pre-scientific, Eastern world—and our own world, characterized by a scientific, Western approach to reality. To understand the Book of Genesis, we must enter its world, determine what it meant in its time, and only then can we venture to say what it means now for our world.

In this commentary we will interpret the Book of Genesis against its historical background. To do so, we will draw upon the discoveries of archaeology and the critical tools of literary analysis. Before turning to the biblical text itself, however, we want to discuss how the Book of Genesis came to be written and the forms in which it is written.

The formation of the Book of Genesis

The Book of Genesis is the story of the prehistory of Israel. Israel became a nation only when it came to occupy and rule the land of Canaan. This nation came to identify itself as a federation of tribes in covenant with a God who had brought their ancestors out of Egypt and led them to the Promised Land. The Exodus was interpreted as the moment of birth for this nation. But as these tribes consolidated their traditions that spoke of the actions of God in their past, they began to realize that even before the time of the Exodus, God was at work leading them to that moment. The Exodus came to be viewed as the culmination of a process that started when God first called Abraham and promised to make him a great nation.

Eventually Israel began to view its own history in the context of world history, and joined to the story of its origins the story of the beginnings of the universe and the history of humanity in the primeval period. It is important to recognize that this process took centuries. Stories were told and retold, adapted and reinterpreted. They were given a new context and acquired new meaning. These stories grew and developed beyond their original telling until they found their way into the larger story of Israel's relationship to God. The Book of Genesis bears the imprint of this long process of growth.

Scholars began to pay close attention to the formation of the Pentateuch (the first five books of the Bible) when it was recognized that there were two different Hebrew names given to the Deity in the Book of Genesis, namely, Yahweh, the personal name of Israel's God, and Elohim, translated simply God. The presence of these different names in various stories coincided with differences in style and vocabulary in the stories in which they appeared. Contradictions within stories (for example, compare Gen 6:19 with 7:2), which had long puzzled scholars, were resolved when these stories were divided, on the basis of the use of the divine name, into what were originally two independent traditions or sources. Further support for this theory about two or more separate traditions is evident in the occurrence of two, and sometimes three, versions of the same story (Gen 12:10-20/ Gen 20/Gen 26:1-11).

By careful analysis of the data, scholars were led to conclude that there were at least four different authors who contributed to the formation of the Pentateuch. These are identified as the Yahwist (J), Elohist (E), Priestly (P), and Deuteronomic (D) authors, also referred to as "sources" or "traditions." Of these four authors, only the Yahwist, Elohist, and Priestly are to be found in the Book of Genesis; thus we will omit from our discussion the Deuteronomic source.

The YAHWIST source (J) is so called because it uses the name Yahweh (spelled Jahweh in German, hence the abbreviation J) for the Deity. The Yahwist is the earliest of the sources, originating in the tenth century B.C.E., the age of David and Solomon. The stories of the Yahwist tradition are characterized by a vivid folk-tale style and a colorful portrayal of characters, setting the Yahwist apart as an author of great skill. The author allows the actions of the characters to speak for themselves and rarely passes moral judgment on their behavior. The anthropomorphic presentation of God in the Yahwist tradition gives a very personal character to the Deity. For the Yahwist, God is actively involved in the history of humanity and, in particular, in Israel's history. The Yahwist begins the story with creation (Gen 2:4b-31), presenting the history of humanity as the background against which Yahweh calls Abraham and extends to him a promise that is fully realized only by the Exodus and the conquest of Canaan. The theme of promise and fulfillment is dominant in the Yahwist's presentation of patriarchal history.

The ELOHIST (E) uses the name Elohim for Israel's God until Exod 3:14, where the name Yahweh is revealed to Moses. This source is generally dated in the ninth century B.C.E. and is believed to have originated in the northern kingdom. The Elohist source has been so intertwined with the Yahwist that it is difficult to separate the two sources in all instances. Since the Elohist source has been subordinated to the Yahwist, what remains of the Elohist narrative is often incomplete. Where we do find a complete story, for example Gen 22, the Elohist is seen to be an author of some skill. The Elohist resorts to dreams and angels as means of divine communication rather than allowing direct contact with the Deity, as does the Yahwist. The Elohist is most noted for his moral sensitivity, which is evident in his attempts to justify, explain, or gloss over the misdeeds of Israel's ancestors. The Elohist begins his story in the patriarchal period, and can be found for the first time in Gen 20, though perhaps in fragmentary form as early as Gen 15.

The PRIESTLY author (P) also prefers the name Elohim for the Deity until the time of Moses (Exod 6). Though the actual writing of the Priestly work is to be dated during the period of the Babylonian Exile (ca. 550 B.C.E.), the sources used by this author come from a much earlier period. The Priestly style tends to be repetitive, and his stories are rigidly structured, giving a very solemn tone to his work. The Priestly author preserves the transcendent character of God by avoiding anthropomorphisms in his portrayal of the Deity. The Book of Genesis opens with the Priestly account of creation. This author is responsible for the genealogies that form the framework of the Book of Genesis. The chronological format imposed on the Pentateuch also derives from the Priestly author.

It is generally held that the Priestly author is responsible for the final editing of the Book of Genesis. It has been theorized that the Priestly tradition incorporates the earlier Yahwist and Elohist narratives. However, there is some evidence to suggest that a later redactor, or editor, actually combined the Yahwist, Elohist, and Priestly writings. This commentary will accept the presence of these three sources in the Book of Genesis and will often refer to the final form or context of a story. Whether that final form or context comes from the Priestly author or a later redactor will be left an open question.

Forms in the Book of Genesis

In interpreting the Book of Genesis, we cannot ignore the forms in which it is written. Interpretation rests upon form. If we hear a story that begins "Once upon a time . . . ," we have no difficulty in recognizing that the story is a fairy tale; we would never mistake it for history, because we know its form. But the forms of the Book of Genesis are no longer common knowledge. Scholars in this past century have delineated and identified the forms in the Book of Genesis. Since this commentary is built upon their work, it is important to "rediscover" the forms in the Book of Genesis.

Narrative is the primary literary classification that we find in the Book of Genesis. A narrative is simply a story. To refer to the form of the Book of Genesis as story is not to devalue the book nor to minimize in any way its theological significance. Indeed, Israel's most distinctive way of speaking of the Deity is to tell the story of God's acts in its life as a nation.

The dominant form of narrative in the Book of Genesis is the saga. Sagas are stories that have a basis in fact, but as the stories are transmitted, they are expanded and enhanced by non-factual elements. Sagas originate at an oral level combining tradition and imagination. It is not unusual to find reported in a saga the direct intervention of God in human affairs. In a saga the incredible is simply part of the flow of events. Sagas may explain why something is the way it is (etiological sagas), why something or someone has a particular name (etymological sagas), why tribes relate as they do (ethnological sagas), why certain places or actions are considered holy (cult sagas), or why a particular locale has unique characteristics (geological sagas). All of these types of sagas are evident in the Book of Genesis.

In the patriarchal sagas of Genesis, the world is seen in terms of families. Jacob is no longer Jacob, he is Israel; Esau is the father of the Edomites. The history of the relationship between these tribes becomes the story of the relationship between these brothers. The patriarchs are characters larger than life. They no longer represent historical persons but become the embodiment of the characteristics of their tribes.

Many individual sagas have been joined together to form the story of the patriarchs. These stories have become a part of a larger context, and so their original meaning is changed. As we work our way through the stories, we will pay particular attention to the levels of meaning acquired by a story as it became a part of the Book of Genesis.

Scholars continue to debate about the presence of myth in the Book of Genesis. Whether or not they find myth in Genesis depends upon their definition of myth. The common definition of myth as a story about gods and goddesses excludes myth from the Bible, because Israel accepts only Yahweh as its God. But myth need not be so narrowly defined. Myth is a way of thinking about reality. What distinguishes myth is that it speaks of reality symbolically in terms of interacting divine powers in the primal era. These powers continue to affect our world through the cult.

The dominant form of expression among Israel's neighbors was myth. It was inevitable that Israel would appropriate the mythological motifs of the ancient Near East. However, Israel did not simply absorb the mythology of the nations that surrounded it; their mythology was changed and adapted to suit Israel's distinctive view of God and the world. We will find, particularly in Gen 1–11, mythological motifs that Israel borrowed but transformed. There are other forms in the Book of Genesis, but we will attend to these in context in the commentary itself.

COMMENTARY

THE PRIMEVAL HISTORY

Gen 1:1-11:27

The first eleven chapters of the Book of Genesis are designated "primeval history" because they treat of the history of humanity, and not specifically of the history of Israel. The universalist perspective of the Yahwist is seen in the placement of Israel's history within the larger context of human history, beginning with creation. The Yahwist narrative is now introduced and supplemented by the traditions of the Priestly author, but the overriding theme is still that of the Yahwist: humanity, because of sin, moves further and further from its God.

THE PRIESTLY CREATION ACCOUNT

Gen 1:1-2:4a

The Book of Genesis opens with a highly structured, hymnlike account of creation by the Priestly author. Though there are similarities between this account and the Babylonian creation account, the Enuma Elish, the Priestly author has reinterpreted and rewritten the ancient myth to reflect Israel's distinctive theology. In contrast to the Enuma Elish, creation does not result from conflict. There is no war between the gods, there is nothing that opposes God. Instead, we are informed, in a carefully ordered sequence, that God creates the world solely by the power of the divine word.

1:1-25 The creation of the world. The opening verse identifies God as the main actor, and creation as the result of God's action. In addition, the opening verse tells us that prior to God's creative act the world was a formless mass, existing as a watery chaos. This description of the world is in agreement with the mythology of the ancient Near East. Notice that darkness exists—it is not created by God. The origin of darkness, which symbolized evil and terror in the ancient world, is left in mystery. The abyss was the primordial ocean, which had to be "harnessed" for creation to occur. Upon this watery chaos the wind of God begins to act. The Hebrew text literally reads "wind of God," not "mighty wind" as in the New American Bible (v. 2). While the translation "mighty wind" captures some of the sense of the original, it fails to take account of the fact that God is the source of this wind.

The Priestly account of creation is characterized by repetition. By using a framework that remains more or less constant for each day of creation, the author achieves a maximum of repetition, with enough variation to keep the account moving forward at a rhythmic pace. This rhythm gives the account its hymnlike quality. A tone of solemnity pervades the entire creation account. The repeated framework is as follows:

1. Announcement: "And God said . . ."
2. Command: "Let there be . . ."
3. Report: "And it was so . . ."
4. Evaluation: "And God saw that it was good . . ."
5. Temporal framework: "It was evening, it was morning . . ."

In addition to this structural pattern, the author correlates the acts of creation of the last three days with those of the first three days.

Day 1	Light
Day 2	Sky, separating the upper and lower waters
Day 3	Earth and vegetation
Day 4	Heavenly lights
Day 5	Birds and fish
Day 6	Land animals and humanity

The creation of light on the first day is correlated with what gives light on the fourth day. Correspondingly, the sky, which separates the upper waters from the lower waters, becomes the habitat of the birds, whereas the lower waters are filled with fish. Animals and humanity dwell on the earth and eat its vegetation. This highly schematized picture accentuates the orderliness of creation. Nothing is left to chance or whim, but all is well organized and proceeds as planned by the Creator.

The first act of creation is light, even though that which gives light, the sun and the moon, are not created until the fourth day. The author is not concerned with scientific fact but with an ordered universe, and light is necessary in order to see. The author may also be forced to put light first because in the Enuma Elish it is a property of the gods, emanating from them, and is mentioned first in that creation account. For our author, light is no longer a property of the gods but an element of the created world. God names the light "day," and the darkness "night" (v. 5). In ancient Israel, naming signified one's power over that which was named. God names the day and night because God above has authority over them. Likewise, God will name the sky and the earth and the sea. The light is seen as good, as is the entire created universe. A strong affirmation of the goodness of the created world pervades this account. The section concludes with the temporal framework, in which evening is mentioned first, then morning. This reflects ancient Israel's manner of keeping time—the day began at sunset.

God then creates the sky (vv. 6-8), which separates the waters above the heavens from the waters below. The cosmology envisioned by the author is one that he shared with the rest of the ancient Near Eastern world. Water surrounded the entire world and was held back only by the heavens above and the earth below. It threatened to overwhelm the earth, especially when storms and floods enveloped the earth. The sky was pictured as a bowl set upside down to keep the upper waters in place. This bowl had windows, allowing the rain, snow, or hail to reach the earth. The waters below appeared on earth as streams, lakes, and springs.

God puts limits on the expanse of water so that earth can appear. From the earth God calls forth vegetation that is able to reproduce itself ("with its seed in it," v. 11). Fruitfulness is not something dependent on the gods of fertility, but God has put the power of reproduction in vegetation itself. Here again the author shows a world that is not under the control of pagan deities.

Next God creates the lights and places them in the heavens. The author carefully avoids the terms "sun" and "moon," but uses instead the terms "greater light" and "lesser light" (v. 16). The sun and moon were considered deities in the ancient pagan world. By avoiding the use of these terms, the author is in effect saying, "See what other nations consider deities! They are nothing but a 'big light' and a 'little light' in the heavens." The sun and the moon are simply elements of the created universe, not gods to be worshiped.

The sky separating the waters above from the waters below is filled with birds, and the waters below with fish. On the sixth day animals and humanity are created to inhabit the earth, which was created on the third day.

1:26-31 The creation of humanity. The whole creation account has been leading up to the creation of humanity. A habitat has been created in which humanity will dwell; time has been created as a measure by which humanity will govern its life. And finally when all is ready, man and woman are created. Since the Priestly author describes the creation of humanity in more detail than the previous creative acts, and since this act is the last in the series, the author is indicating that humanity is the high point of all creation. The special character of this creation is underscored by the fact that only humanity is described as being created in the "image and likeness" of God (v. 26).

There are three problematic expressions in this section that often cause confusion and misunderstanding. Who are the "us" in Gen 1:26? What does it mean to be created in the "image" of God? What kind of creature is this "man" created both male and female?

The "us" in Gen 1:26 is not easily explained. Several theories have been advanced, but none is entirely satisfactory. Some scholars argue that the "us" is to be explained as an example of the "plural of majesty." The plural of majesty accounts for the fact that in Hebrew the word for God (Elohim) is in the plural but is found with a singular verb, indicating that it is meant to be taken as a singular noun. It is supposed that because God is so great and powerful, the ancient Hebrews spoke of their Deity in the plural. For these scholars, the "us" in Gen 1:26 is an instance of this plural of majesty.

Since there is no other language that uses a plural of majesty, other scholars prefer to find in the use of "us" a remnant of pagan mythology. In ancient Near Eastern myths the high god creates humanity in consultation with the heavenly council. The heavenly council is composed of the lesser gods who surround the high god and act as advisors. This may well be in the background, but since the author has avoided other pagan overtones, one wonders why less care would be taken here.

More recently it has been argued that the "us" of Gen 1:26 is to be understood as a rhetorical device without much significance. It is something like saying "Let's do it" after one has debated with oneself over a course of action. Possibly the problem of the "us" in Gen 1:26 will never be solved, but each of these theories is at least plausible, if not entirely satisfactory.

In order to determine what kind of creature the human being is, it is essential that we understand what is meant by the term "image." Often this has been taken to mean that humanity is endowed with a soul, and that the soul is in the image of God. This could not be further from the intent of the author of Gen 1. The view that the human person is composed of a body and a soul is a distinctly Greek idea; in fact, the Hebrew language does not even have a word for "soul." In what way, then, does humanity "image" God? In the ancient world, "image" was used to refer to a statue of the king that was sent to the distant corners of the kingdom where the king could not be present in person. This "image" was to be the representative of the king in that area. If we apply this to Genesis, to be created in the image of God is to be God's representative on earth. This is underscored in the very next sentence of verse 26, in which humanity is given dominion over the earth. As God is ruler of the heavenly realm, so humanity, as God's representative, is ruler of the earthly realm. This is a very exalted view of humanity.

The final problem in these verses arises more from the limitations of the English language than from the original Hebrew text. In Hebrew, 'adam generally means "humanity." To refer to an individual male, Hebrew used another term. In Gen 1:26 the term is 'adam, and so the text can be translated, "God created humanity in his image; . . . male and female he created them." Humanity is not created as some kind of androgynous being, but rather humanity consists of the male and the female. Together man and woman constitute humanity.

2:1-4a The hallowing of the sabbath. Sabbath rest is associated with the rest of God on the seventh day. In six days there have been eight separate acts of creation. The author has varied the framework noted above by placing two acts of creation on the third and sixth day, and is then able to maintain a six-day structure in spite of the fact that there are eight acts of creation. This is done to underscore the significance of the sabbath. The sabbath rest mandated in the commandments in the Book of Exodus (20:8) is here bound up with the very beginnings of the world; it is tied to the created order.

CONCLUSION

The Priestly account of creation is a theological reflection on the world that the author has experienced. It is a world wherein God is seen as a powerful Being, able to create by merely speaking a word. God is seen as standing outside the universe that is called into being. The Deity transcends the created order. Humanity is seen as the high point of creation. The world in which humanity lives has been organized by God, but as God's representative on earth, humanity is to be sovereign over the world.

THE YAHWIST ACCOUNT OF CREATION AND SIN, AND THE PRIESTLY GENEALOGY OF ADAM

Gen 2:4b-5:32

Though the Yahwist account of creation follows upon the Priestly account, it is actually the earlier of the two accounts. It is written in the style of a folk tale, without the repetition and carefully delineated structure that characterizes the Priestly account. Creation is formed by Yahweh, not called into existence by the power of the divine word. The focus in this story is not on the creation of the world as such, but on the relationship of man and woman to each other and to the world.

2:4b-9 The creation of "the Human." In this creation account, what exists prior to God's creative act is not watery chaos, as in Gen 1, but rather desert. The earth is viewed as barren for two reasons: there is no water, and there is no one to till the soil. The background of this creation story is clearly the experience of the farmer, for whom water and the tilling of the soil are necessary in order to bring forth vegetation from the earth. Water aids creation, whereas in Gen 1 water had to be confined for creation to proceed.

The first thing formed by Yahweh is "the Human." This is not to be understood as an individual named Adam; rather, "the Human" is the whole of humanity. That the author views this original creature as a representative of undifferentiated humanity and not as an individual is clear from the use of the definite article "the" before "humanity" in the Hebrew text.

The human creature is made from the ground. In Hebrew, "human" and "ground" are similar-sounding words ('adam, 'adamah), and so bear a special relationship to each other. This play on words is characteristic of the Yahwist author. By using two similar-sounding words, the author is able to focus the attention of the reader on the relationship between the two words. The relationship between humanity and the ground is thus underscored. The human creature comes from the ground and so depends upon it for life.

Yahweh breathes life into "the Human" and it becomes a "living being" (v. 7). In the past this has been interpreted as the creation of the soul, but, as indicated above, the Hebrew language did not have a word for "soul." "The Human" becomes a living being. Humanity lives because Yahweh's breath is in it; when Yahweh's breath leaves, it dies. Every breath of every person depends directly upon Yahweh. It should be noted that the animals are also living beings (2:19). Humanity and animals are living, breathing creatures. Humanity and animals are to be distinguished from each other by the fact that Yahweh speaks to the human creature but not to the animals. In addition, the human creature names the animals, thus signifying humanity's control over the animal world.

Once the human creature is formed, Yahweh proceeds to create a place in which humanity will dwell. This is unlike Gen 1, where the habitat was created first, and only later were people created to live in it. Here Yahweh creates a garden (v. 8), which resembles a park with trees, not a garden of plants and flowers. These park-like gardens were cultivated by great kings in the ancient Near East. They were a source of shade from the sun, the kind of place where a king could relax. This is Yahweh's garden, and Yahweh uses it in the cool of the evening to "relax."

The author mentions two trees that will function significantly in Gen 3, the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. The tree of life appears again only at the end of Gen 3, and thus it can be seen to play a marginal role in the story. The tree of life was a symbol of immortality in ancient Near Eastern mythology; it plays the same role in this story. As long as the first couple are in the garden and have access to this tree, their life is not threatened. Once they are expelled from the garden, they become subject to death. The tree of the knowledge of good and evil, by contrast, plays an integral role in the story that follows, and we will consider its symbolism in the context of that story.

2:10-14 The four rivers. It is commonly recognized that these verses interrupt the story of the Yahwist. They contribute nothing to the action of the story. Verse 15 seems to be the continuation of verse 9, not of verses 10-14. Moreover, this insertion contradicts what was said earlier in the text about the location of Eden (v. 8). According to this passage, Eden is located in the north, and the four great rivers that surround the world flow from it. Only two of the rivers can be identified—the Tigris and the Euphrates. The Pishon and the Gihon cannot be identified with certainty, but they probably refer to rivers in the same general area as the Tigris and Euphrates. The purpose of this insertion seems to be to link the garden of Eden with a specific geographical area in an attempt to historicize the story.

2:15-17 The command. The human creature is placed in the garden and given the task of cultivating and taking care of it. This echoes ancient Near Eastern mythology, in which humanity is created to do the work of the gods. A command not to eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil is given, without any explanation for this prohibition. It is simply stated that Yahweh has created humanity and has placed certain limits upon human activity.

2:18-24 The creation of woman. The motive given by Yahweh for the creation of woman is that "It is not good for the human to be alone." While this aspect of the story has often been interpreted as a reference to the social nature of humanity, what is really intended by the author is to account for the marriage relationship, as the concluding verse of the story indicates (v. 24). We must bear in mind that in presenting that relationship the author is writing from the perspective of the tenth century B.C.E. and presents the woman from that viewpoint. A woman's position was one of support to her husband. She is, in the literal translation of the Hebrew text, a "helper fit for him." In the Old Testament, "helper" means one who gives support or strength, one who enables others to fulfill their destiny. Frequently in the Old Testament, it is actually God who is called "helper" (Deut 33:7; Ps 33:20; 70:6; etc.). No one would argue that God is subservient to anyone. The story is not about the essence of woman, but about her dignity in the institution of marriage. Woman is intended to be one in whom man finds support and strength.

In contrast to the Priestly account, creation does not appear as an organized, step-by-step process. Rather, one thing is made, then another, until God is satisfied with the results. Like the human creature, the animals are formed from the ground and become "living beings" (2:19—the phrase "living beings" is curiously omitted in the NAB). The human creature and the animals share a common origin. They are distinguished from each other by the fact that the human creature names the animals, signifying authority over them. Moreover, as previously stated, Yahweh speaks to the human creature but does not address the animals.

Even though the human creatures and the animals are both living beings, the animals do not prove to be suitable as a "helper." A second time Yahweh attempts to form a suitable helper, and this time forms a woman from one of the ribs of "the Human," who is put into a "deep sleep" lest the act of creation be witnessed. The act of creation remains a divine mystery.

One of the most puzzling aspects of this passage is the fact that Yahweh forms the woman from a rib (v. 22). We have no parallels in ancient Near Eastern mythology, and what a rib may symbolize in the text is simply unknown. We do know that in the Sumerian language "rib" and "life" are the same word. The goddess of life is at the same time the "Lady of the Rib." It is interesting to note that at the conclusion of chapter 3 the man calls his wife "Eve," a form of the Hebrew word for "life," and recognizes that she will be the "mother of all the living" (3:20). The association of life and rib with woman may indicate that in the background of the story is something akin to the Sumerian wordplay.

When the woman is brought to the man (v. 23), he exclaims in poetic form that at last a suitable helper has been found. No longer is he alone. There is a wordplay between the terms "man" and "woman" in Hebrew ('ish, 'ishshah) that highlights the special relationship between man and woman. Woman comes from man and so depends upon him. This is consistent with the position of woman in ancient Near Eastern society in the tenth century B.C.E. This passage has often been used to substantiate the view that woman is inferior to man and subservient to him. This is certainly not the intent of the author. It is clear that woman is not inferior to man. Her mysterious creation by God from human substance underscores the common nature she shares with man and the bond that unites them. That she is his "helper" does not indicate subservience.

Verse 24 is clearly the conclusion of chapter 2 and shows that our story is an etiology, a story about the past that explains a present reality. This story tells us why men and women are drawn to each other sexually and marry. The terms "leave" and "cleave" are covenant terms and suggest that marriage is here viewed as a covenantal relationship.

CONCLUSION

The Yahwist account of creation is much more local in scope than the Priestly account; it is concerned with the human relationship to the soil and the relationship between man and woman, not with the creation of a universe. Clearly drawn from an agricultural milieu, the story presents humanity as coming from the ground, and dependent upon the ground for life. In death humanity will return to the ground from which it came. Woman is the only suitable helper for man, since she is formed from human flesh. The attraction of the sexes and the institution of marriage are described as the natural destiny of man and woman, flowing from the way they were created. Yahweh, in turn, is not distant from creation but is directly involved in the act of creation and concerned about all creatures.

2:25–3:7 The sin of Adam and Eve. The final verse of chapter 2 is transitional and serves more to introduce the next story than to conclude the previous one. That man and woman are naked and yet feel no shame is more than a mere observation of their being undressed. As will be obvious later, their nakedness becomes a symbol of their relationship to God. At this time in the story, that relationship to God is still intact; thus nakedness does not cause shame. Only with the disruption of that relationship is their nakedness an embarrassment.

A new character is now introduced into the story—the serpent. This creature is characterized as being "cunning." This term carries connotations of craftiness and cleverness, and contrasts with the naiveté of the woman. In Hebrew, "cunning" ('arum) forms a wordplay with "naked" ('arummim). This wordplay underscores the fact that man and woman become aware of their nakedness because of the cunning of the serpent. It should be noted that nowhere in this text is the serpent identified as the devil; this identification does not come about until the first century B.C.E. (Wis 2:24; Enoch 69:6).

What, then, does the serpent represent? In Canaan the serpent was associated with the fertility cults. We know that these cults were a constant source of temptation to Israel, and, as indicated in the Old Testament, Israel often succumbed to such temptation. The choice of a serpent to represent the tempter of humanity is the author's way of saying, "Don't get involved with serpents (that is, the fertility cults); they will only cause trouble, as they did for the first man and woman." It becomes a way of warning Israel to stay away from fertility cults.

The story of Gen 3 says nothing about the serpent's motives in tempting the man and the woman. Indeed, the source of evil itself is left a mystery in Gen 3. What the story does tell us is that the presence of evil in the world is due to humanity's decision to oppose God's command.

Many scholars have attempted to explain why the serpent engages the woman in conversation and not the man. Their answers range from interpreting woman as inherently weak, incurably curious, to viewing her as much stronger than man. If she can be made to sin, man will automatically follow. The text supports none of these views. It is clear that the author portrays both man and woman as listening to the serpent. She eats the fruit and gives it to the man "who is with her" (v. 6). The fact that woman is presented first can be explained as simply a literary device that keeps the story moving. The serpent is introduced first, then the woman, then the man. When God comes to the garden, the man is addressed first, then the woman, then the serpent. When God punishes them, the serpent is punished first, then the woman, then the man. This movement from serpent-woman-man, man-woman-serpent, serpent-woman-man maintains an even flow to the story and has no great significance beyond this fact. It is clear that the woman is included in God's command even though she is never the explicit recipient of that command (2:11, 17). And it is clear, as indicated above, that the man is with the woman during the whole temptation scene.

The temptation scene has all the characteristics of a universal picture of temptation. This is the way every human being is tempted. The serpent, with an opening question, insinuates that God has some ulterior motive for the command, that God is keeping something from humanity. The woman jumps to God's defense, but the serpent has succeeded in attracting her attention and proceeds with three half-truths: (1) "you will not die"; (2) "your eyes will be opened"; (3) "you will be like God, knowing good and evil" (vv. 4-5). It is true that when the man and the woman eat, they do not die, yet they become subject to death and will eventually die. It is true that their eyes are opened, but not in the way they anticipated. They are now aware, as they were not before, of a whole new area of human experience—the experience of guilt and shame. They know that they are naked. And finally, they become like God, knowing good and evil, but not in the way they had expected. To determine what it means to be "like God, knowing good and evil," we must attempt to explain the meaning of the symbol of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.

There are many theories as to the meaning of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil in Gen 3. While some of these theories are attractive, they are generally based upon present philosophical positions that bear little relationship to what is actually at issue in the Genesis account. The question to which we must attend in dealing with this symbol is:

What does the expression "knowing good and evil" mean in this story? What kind of knowledge does God forbid?

To determine the meaning of this symbol is very difficult, for we have no comparable symbol in any other literature of the ancient Near East. Nor is the symbol, as such, treated elsewhere in the Old Testament. However, we do find the expression "to know good and evil" in the Old Testament. If we can discover what it means in other contexts, and then test that meaning in the Genesis context, it may be possible to find a plausible meaning of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.

In Deut 1:39 and Isa 7:15, 16, the phrase "knowing good and evil" refers to a kind of knowledge not possessed by children. They are too young to "know good and evil." In 2 Sam 19:35, Barzillai refuses the king's offer that he return with him to Jerusalem by saying, "I am now eighty years old. Can I know good and evil?" The implication is that Barzillai as an old man is beginning to lose his faculties and so cannot be of service to the king. In 1 Kgs 3:9 and 2 Sam 14:17, the phrase "good and evil" is used (though not with the verb "to know") in the context of making wise judgments by the king on behalf of his people. In summary, we can say that to know good and evil entails the kind of knowledge required in order to make adult decisions on one's own behalf.

Does this definition make sense in the Genesis story? God places a limit on humanity. Humanity can know many things, but who is to decide what is best for humanity—the God who created humanity or the creature who was created? Chapter 3 of Genesis says that God wished to retain the knowledge of what was best for human creation. The problem is that humanity overstepped the limit imposed by God and appropriated that knowledge. Now humanity exists in the position of deciding for itself what is best. It defines itself in rebellion against its Creator.

Humanity does "become like God" in the sense that now it makes its own decisions as to what is best for itself, but it makes these decisions as creature, without the wisdom and vision of the Creator. Who knows what is best for the creature—the One who created it or the creature itself? Humanity makes its own decisions, but its decisions lack the breadth and depth of God's wisdom.

The most immediate consequence of the sin of the man and the woman is the consciousness of their nakedness, which they seek to remedy by sewing loincloths of fig leaves (v. 7). We see almost at once the futility of this gesture. In the ensuing dialogue between Yahweh and the man, we note that the man, rather than answering Yahweh's question "Where are you?," gives the reason why he hid—"because I was naked." The reason is appropriate, in spite of the fact that it appears to be untrue. He is not naked, he is clothed with fig leaves. However, in relationship to Yahweh, he is naked, that is, his relationship to Yahweh has been disrupted and remains so. Humanity cannot "cover up" its own guilt and shame and restore its relationship to Yahweh. It is Yahweh alone who can remove humanity's guilt and shame. This is symbolized at the end of the story (v. 21), when Yahweh makes garments for the man and the woman.

3:8-24 The consequences. The purpose of the interrogation of the man and the woman is to bring them to an admission of their sin. It is interesting to note the all too human response of the man as he blames the woman and indirectly even God ("the woman you put here," v. 12). The woman, in turn, blames the serpent.

The punishments that follow are expressed in poetic form and are thought to be older than the story in which they are now found. The story is seen, then, as an etiology explaining such things as the reasons why serpents crawl, why there is pain in childbirth, and why farming is so difficult. These punishments are drawn from the world in which the author lives. They reflect the environmental and social conditions found in ancient Palestine.

The ongoing struggle of humanity to survive against the attacks of venomous serpents is highlighted in the first curse (vv. 14-15). The pain associated with childbirth, incongruous with the great joy that surrounds the gift of life, is attributed to woman's participation in sin. That her husband would rule over her reflects the position of woman in ancient society (v. 16). The curse under which man works (vv. 17-19) testifies to the rocky soil and desert-like conditions of Palestine, which make farming so difficult in that region. But the story does not end on a negative note. The woman receives her name, Eve, and she will become the mother of all the living. In spite of sin and its consequences, life will go on. Yahweh makes garments for the man and the woman, thus "covering up" their guilt and shame. Yahweh's care of humanity does not cease because of sin, but continues in spite of sin. On Yahweh's initiative the relationship disrupted by sin is restored.

At the end of chapter 3 the tree of life assumes importance. It has not yet functioned as an integral part of the story, but now, because of sin, humanity is denied access to this tree and is expelled from the garden. Humanity is not able to seize the Deity's prerogative of immortality. This is ensured by stationing the cherubim at the gate. They function as guardians of the tree of life and prevent humanity from re-entering the garden. These cherubim are to be identified with the winged animals that stood as guardians at the entrances of palaces and temples in Assyria and Babylon. The fiery revolving sword represents lightning, which is often a symbol of God's wrath.

4:1-16 The first murder. The story of Cain and Abel follows upon the story of the sin of humanity and represents humanity's further alienation from Yahweh. The opening verses are transitional. They once formed the introduction to the genealogy that begins in verse 17, but now they serve to introduce the main characters of our story. Cain, whose name means "I have produced," is Eve's firstborn. The etymology of Abel's name is not given, but the Hebrew root of the name means "emptiness," and may refer to the very brief life of Abel. The separateness of these brothers is brought out only by the terse sentence that contrasts their professions: Cain is a farmer; Abel, a shepherd.

As the story unfolds, it moves quickly to the actual murder of Abel and Yahweh's judgment on Cain. Many details that would interest the modern reader are simply ignored. We do not know why Cain's sacrifice was not acceptable, nor how Cain discovers that his sacrifice did not please God. The story focuses on Cain's reaction, the subsequent murder of his brother, and God's judgment on Cain. Verse 7 suggests that Cain could have controlled his anger. Sin is presented figuratively as "lurking at the door" to take possession of him, yet Cain could still overcome sin by "doing well." He does not, and so bears full responsibility for his sin.

When interrogated by Yahweh, Cain lies and then addresses a sarcastic question to Yahweh (v. 9). He is worse than the first sinners, who sought merely to shift the blame. Cain's sin cannot be ignored. The blood of his murdered brother cries out to Yahweh. In ancient Israel it was believed that blood and life are inextricably bound. As life belongs to God, so too does blood.

The punishment of Cain is more severe than that of the first parents. He is banished from the soil, cursed to be a wanderer. As in chapter 3, the punishment of the sinner is not the final word. When Cain cries out against the severity of his punishment and states his fear that others may seek vengeance against him, Yahweh places a mark on Cain to protect him. Though Cain leaves the presence of Yahweh (v. 16), he is mysteriously under God's protection.

The story of Cain and Abel is only loosely connected with the preceding story of the fall in chapter 3. This story presupposes the existence of other people (v. 14) and an organized society in which there are distinct professions and in which a sacrificial cult has been developed. The story bears all the marks of having been reduced to the bare necessities. The concern of the passage rests entirely on Cain's sin and his subsequent punishment, leaving many unanswered questions. It seems likely that we are dealing with a story that once existed independently but has been adapted by the Yahwist to suit his particular purpose.

It has been suggested that the concern of the original story was the animosity between peoples of different backgrounds and vocations, specifically farmers and shepherds. In the story the pastoral way of life wins out over that of the farmer, as can be evidenced by Yahweh's acceptance of Abel's sacrifice. If this was the concern of the original story, it is no longer the primary concern of the Genesis story. Another way of accounting for the origin of the story is to see it as an account of the origin (etiology) of the Kenites. The Kenites were a tribe that worshiped Yahweh and yet never became a member of Israel.

They were smiths and metalworkers, and continued to live as a wandering tribe long after many nomadic tribes had settled. It is believed that the members of this tribe wore a sign or tattoo on their foreheads, setting them apart from other tribes. This story suggests that Cain is the founding father of this tribe, and the story is told to account for the distinguishing characteristics of the Kenite tribe.

Though certain elements of the story may help us to better ascertain its original intention, they no longer fully explain the Yahwist's use of it. It is this level of the story that is most important to the reader. For the Yahwist, the story illustrates humanity's inclination to sin. From the first sin in the garden onward, humanity continues to move away from Yahweh, becoming so hardened in sin that Yahweh regrets ever having created the human race (6:6). According to the Yahwist, it is against the backdrop of the increasing sinfulness of humanity that a people is eventually chosen through whom all of humanity will be reconciled to God (12:1ff.). Left to itself, humanity moves toward sin. Hope is found in Yahweh's ever-present mercy and in Yahweh's will to save.

4:17-26 The Cainite genealogy. While most of the genealogies in Genesis are attributed to the Priestly author, this Cainite genealogy is the work of the Yahwist. That this piece is a separate tradition not originally linked to the Cain and Abel story is evident in the surprising appearance of Cain's wife. Since no other people are mentioned, where did the woman come from? In the previous story Cain is cursed to be a wanderer (vv. 12, 16), but in this genealogy he is the builder of a city (v. 17) and the father of civilization. Similarly, whereas Abel was described as a shepherd (v. 2), in this genealogy Jabal is the father of shepherds (v. 20). This genealogy is introduced in order to account for the origin of cities and the development of civilization with its attendant professions. Its inclusion fills the gap in the story between the account of creation and that of the flood.

There are points of contact between this genealogy and the Priestly genealogy in Gen 5. Some of the same names are repeated (Enoch, Lamech), and some names are simply variations of names appearing in the Yahwist genealogy (Mehujael/Mahalalel; Methusael/Methuselah). It appears that both genealogies come from a common source that has undergone a long period of transmission. This would account for the differences in the spelling and sequence of names. Behind both genealogies stands the tradition of an antediluvian (pre-flood) list of the kings of Mesopotamia. The points of contact between these traditions and the Genesis genealogies will be noted in the commentary on Gen 5.

Inserted into the Cainite genealogy is a "boasting song" of Lamech (vv. 23-24). It is distinct from the genealogy both in form and content. It is probably included because Cain is mentioned in the last line. The song reflects the pride and arrogance of unbridled revenge, and it is used by the Yahwist as another example of humanity's sinfulness. The disobedience of the first parents has led to an ever-increasing rebellion of humanity against God—first murder, and now wanton vengeance. As civilization advances, so does humanity's rebellion.

A Sethite fragment is appended to the Cainite genealogy. Verse 25 is similar to verse 17, and with it we return to Adam. There is, as is typical of the Yahwist, a play on words: the word for "granted" sounds like "Seth." In contrast to the Cainite genealogy, which ended with the rebellion of humanity against God, this fragment states that now humanity began to call upon Yahweh. Consistent with Yahwist theology, the section ends on a positive note.

Much scholarly debate has centered on the fact that whereas Gen 4:26 states that humanity called upon the name of Yahweh from the time of Seth, the Priestly and Elohist traditions do not introduce the name until the time of Moses (Exod 6:2; 3:14). Since we are unable to reconstruct with any certainty the pre-history of Israel's traditions, it is impossible to reconcile these two traditions. It may be that the name Yahweh was known to a small group or tribe and only later became known to the whole people, but this is highly speculative.

5:1-32 The genealogy of Adam. The first two verses of this section recall the creation of humanity in the Priestly account (1:26ff.) and serve as a transition to the genealogy of Adam drawn from that source. The relationship of this genealogy to the Cainite genealogy was noted above and can be clearly seen in the following comparison. The order of names in the Yahwist genealogy has been changed to highlight the similarity between the two lists. The numbers to the left indicate the order of appearance in the text.

Gen 4:17-26(J)	Gen 5:1-32(P)
1. Adam	1. Adam
8. [Seth]	2. Seth
9. [Enosh]	3. Enosh
2. Cain	4. Kenan
5. Mehujael	5. Mahalalel
4. Irad	6. Jared
3. Enoch	7. Enoch
6. Methusael	8. Methuselah
7. Lamech	9. Lamech
10. [Noah]	10. Noah

These are essentially the same genealogies. The Yahwist's reference to Noah is found in Gen 5:39. The change in the order of names reveals the fluid nature of genealogical traditions; they could be rearranged to suit the purposes of the author.

There is no doubt that the genealogy in chapter 5 bears some relationship to the antediluvian list of the kings of Mesopotamia. In both lists the seventh position is of special significance. In the Mesopotamian list the name of the seventh king, Enmeduranna, is the same as the capital city that served as the center of worship of the sun god. This may explain why it is that Enoch, the seventh in the Priestly list, lives precisely 365 years, the same number as that of the days in a solar year. It was believed that the seventh king was taken into the company of the gods. This could explain the rather cryptic reference to Enoch's fate (v. 24). The last king in the Mesopotamian list, like Noah, who is the last person mentioned in the Priestly genealogy, has an important role in the story of the flood. There is no direct relationship between any of the names in the two lists, nor are any of the numbers the same. Indeed, in contrast to the considerable length of reign in the Mesopotamian list (18,600–64,800 years), the life span of the biblical patriarchs is remarkably short. Nonetheless, there are striking similarities.

The genealogy in Gen 5 is introduced by the phrase "This is the record of the descendants . . ." (in literal translation: "This is the book of the generations . . ."). Since succeeding Priestly genealogies begin with a similar formula, it is commonly believed that the Priestly author took the lists from a collection of genealogical tables called by scholars the "Book of Generations."

Consistent with the Priestly style seen in Gen 1:1–2:4a, the genealogy follows a strict pattern. It is composed of the following elements: (1) the age of X when his first son is born; (2) the number of years X lived after that birth; (3) the statement that X had other sons and daughters; (4) the age of X when he died.

As with the Yahwist genealogy, the purpose of this genealogy is to fill the gap between the accounts of creation and that of the flood. But in addition to this, some distinctly Priestly concerns are evident. The blessing and command to multiply given by God in Gen 1:28 are now realized. The image of God in which the first couple were created is passed on from generation to generation, so that all humanity is created in the image of God (v. 3). Enoch's fellowship with God (v. 10) will save him from the flood. The name Noah literally means "rest," but in verse 29 it suggests comfort or relief, anticipating Noah's future role.

THE STORY OF THE FLOOD

Gen 6:1–9:29

The Genesis story of the flood is remarkably similar to Mesopotamian flood accounts, especially the Babylonian version of the Gilgamesh Epic. Gilgamesh, the hero of that story, embarks upon a search for immortality that brings him to an ancient ancestor named Utnapishtim, who is immortal. As Utnapishtim recounts how he became immortal, we readily recognize parallels to the Genesis flood story. The story is as follows. The council of the gods decides to destroy humanity. Ea, the god of wisdom, appears to Utnapishtim in a dream and warns him of the coming disaster. He instructs Utnapishtim to build a boat to save himself and his family. Utnapishtim brings his family, wild and tame animals, and artisans with him aboard the boat. The gods unleash a storm that quickly gets out of control, and the gods themselves cower in fear in the upper spheres of heaven. When the storm ends, the boat rests on a mountain and Utnapishtim sends birds from the boat to determine the extent to which the waters have receded. Upon leaving the boat, the survivors of the storm offer a sacrifice pleasing to the gods, who in turn bless Utnapishtim and his family with immortality.

It is clear that the Genesis version is essentially the same story, but there are some significant differences. In the Genesis account there is no hint of polytheism. God, and only God, is in control throughout; the storm never gets out of control. The flood is not the result of whim but is sent as punishment for sin. Noah does not gain immortality but rather enters into covenant with God.

Unlike Gen 1–5, where the Yahwist and Priestly traditions are for the most part separate, in Gen 6–9 the two versions are extensively interwoven. This is evident in the duplications and contradictions in the story in its present form. The duplications are as follows: God observes the sinfulness of humanity (6:5/6:12); God decides to destroy humanity (6:7/6:13); God announces the flood (7:4/6:17); Noah is ordered to enter the ark (7:1-3/6:18-20); Noah obeys (7:5/6:22); Noah enters the ark (7:1-3/7:18ff.); all living creatures on earth die (7:22/7:21); the waters recede (8:1/8:3a); God promises never again to destroy creation by a flood (8:21/9:11). The contradictions in the text include: the number of animals taken into the ark (7:2/6:19-20; 7:15-16); the cause of the flood (7:4, 12; 8:2b/7:11; 8:2); the flood's duration (7:24; 8:2a, 3b; 8:13/7:4, 10, 12; 8:8-12). The differences in the two versions will become clear in the commentary that follows.

6:1-4 (J) The intermarriage of the divine and the human. This is no doubt one of the strangest stories in the Old Testament. It appears to be a shortened myth taken over by the Yahwist and rewritten to serve as an introduction to the account of the flood. The "sons of heaven" (literally, "sons of the gods" or "sons of God") are certainly gods and not angels, as is often assumed. In ancient mythology the sons of God were considered members of the heavenly council, lesser deities that were of service to the high god.

What seems to be at issue here is not licentious behavior but the intermarriage between gods and human beings. If we were to eliminate verse 3, the story could be seen simply as an etiology explaining a race of giants or superhuman heroes of old. Verse 3 leads us to interpret the action described in verse 2 as a great sin. The Yahwist uses the myth to illustrate the extent of sin; it even violates the boundaries between the heavenly and earthly realms. Interestingly, the punishment is directed against humanity, whose lifespan is shortened, and not against the gods, who initiated the action. This can be explained by recognizing that the Yahwist uses the story to introduce his version of the flood, the means by which humanity is punished for its wickedness.

6:5-8 (J) Yahweh's decision to destroy all living creatures. In this section the Yahwist calls further attention to the extent of sin. It is universal. Everything conceived in the human heart is evil. In Hebrew anthropology the heart is not primarily the center of the emotions but the source of intellect and will. All human thoughts and actions are evil. Yahweh's regret over creation gives a very human touch to the Yahwist's portrayal of God. Yahweh's resolution to destroy what has been created is in response to humanity's behavior, and as such is not an arbitrary decision. The flood is Yahweh's judgment upon humanity, but this judgment is balanced by Yahweh's will to save, which is signified in the preservation of Noah and his family. Yahweh's choice of Noah remains a mystery in the Yahwist version of the flood story.

6:9-22 (P) God's decision to send the flood, and instructions on building the ark. The formula "These are the descendants of . . ." indicates that we have returned to the Priestly author. Noah's righteousness is immediately noted; because of it he is preserved from the flood. God's choice is not a mystery, as is the case in the Yahwist story. It is not simply humanity that is corrupted but the earth itself. As in the Yahwist account, God's will to destroy is in response to sin. Typical of the Priestly author, we find great attention given to details, such as the construction of the ark and the dating of the flood. Noah is to take his family and male and female members of every species of animal into the ark, as well as enough food to feed them all for the duration of the flood.

7:1-5, 7-10, 12, 16b, 17b, 22-23 (J) Instructions to Noah and the coming of the flood. Omitted from the Yahwist version of the flood is the command to build the ark. It was probably deleted in favor of the Priestly version. In view of the statement in 7:1 that

Noah alone was found to be just, it is possible that the building of the ark serves as a test for him. He is instructed to bring seven pairs of clean animals and one pair of unclean animals into the ark, at obvious variance with Gen 6:19. For the Priestly author, the distinction between ritually acceptable and unacceptable (clean and unclean) animals cannot be made until ritual laws are introduced by Moses in the Sinai narrative. The Yahwist has no problem presenting sacrificial worship as part of humanity's earliest history (4:3-4; 8:20-22). The anthropomorphic style (depicting God in human terms) of the Yahwist author is evident in the depiction of Yahweh shutting the door of the ark (7:16b). Here the flood is the result of forty days and nights of rain. The Priestly account offers another explanation.

7:6, 11, 13-16a, 17a, 18-21, 24 (P) A reversion to primeval chaos. In the Priestly account the flood is not caused by rain but by the waters above the heavens joining the waters below the earth. In other words, the world returns to the watery chaos that existed before creation (1:2). The extent of the flood is far greater in the Priestly account, for it entails the destruction of the entire cosmos and a reversion to primeval chaos.

8:2b, 3a, 6, 8-12, 13b, 20-22 (J) The receding of the waters, Noah's sacrifice, Yahweh's promise. The waters remain on the earth a total of sixty-one days. Noah sends out birds to determine if the waters have receded sufficiently so that he can disembark. The use of birds by sailors for navigational purposes was not unknown in the ancient world. The Yahwist, in good storytelling style, builds the bird-sending motif to a climax by having Noah send out three birds, the last of which is successful. As in the Babylonian myth, a pleasing sacrifice is offered to God upon leaving the ark. The mythological overtones of the phrase "the Lord smelled the sweet odor" (v. 21) cannot be overlooked. The expression is drawn from a primitive notion that food offered to the gods was actually eaten by them. This idea was later rejected by Israel. In our story this detail serves to show that the sacrifice was accepted by Yahweh, and thus reconciliation with humanity was effected. As the Yahwist's story opened with Yahweh's reflection upon humanity (6:5-8), so it now closes with comparable reflections. Humanity is the same, "evil from the start" (v. 21), but humanity's wickedness will never again become the basis for Yahweh's destruction of the earth. The order of creation is assured by Yahweh.

8:1-2a, 3b, 4-5, 7, 13a, 15-19; 9:1-17, 28-29 (P) God remembers Noah. In the Priestly account the flood lasts a full year and ten days, and restoration entails a re-creation. The "wind of God" that begins to move over the waters echoes the "wind of God" that functioned similarly in Gen 1. The turning point in the story is God's remembrance of Noah. It is God's "remembering" that sets in motion this new act of creation. The bird-sending motif is not as successfully integrated into the Priestly story as it is in the Yahwist version. Indeed, it is God who tells Noah to leave the ark; Noah does not rely on information gained from sending out the bird.

God's first words to Noah and his sons are a reiteration of the blessing given at creation: "Be fertile and multiply." In the postdiluvian (post-flood) world, the blessing of procreation continues in effect. What is altered is humanity's relationship to the animals. Recognizing humanity's violent nature, God permits animals to be killed and eaten, but the blood, because of its association with life, which belongs to God alone, must not be eaten. The prohibition against the taking of human life continues in effect; interestingly, the reason given is that humanity is created in the "image of God." If God's law against murder is transgressed, it is humanity, not God, that bears the responsibility of punishing the crime. The ancient legal formula in verse 6 was probably originally intended to set limits to blood revenge.

The divine promise never to destroy the earth again by flood takes the form of a covenant in the Priestly conclusion to the story. A covenant was a way of regulating the relationships between individuals and groups in ancient society. This covenant is introduced by the Priestly author as an anticipation of the future covenant between God and Israel. The initiation of the covenant and the responsibility to keep it rests entirely with God. The rainbow is a sign of that covenant. It is a reminder to God of the pledge to preserve the world; it is a reminder to humanity of God's faithfulness and mercy.

The story concludes in 9:28-29. These verses reveal the Priestly author's concern with chronology. Verse 29 recalls the genealogy of chapter 5, which was interrupted by the story of the flood, and in turn provides a transition to the Table of the Nations in chapter 10.

9:18-27 (J) The curse of Canaan. Again we find the Yahwist adapting a story that originally served another purpose. The original story functioned as an etiology explaining the origin of viniculture and the discovery of the intoxicating effects of wine. As such, there is no moral judgment on Noah's condition; it is simply stated that he became drunk. The interest of the Yahwist is not in Noah's drunkenness but in the curse on Canaan and in the blessings on Shem and Japheth that resulted from their behavior toward their father during his drunken stupor. Exactly what Ham did to Noah is not clear, but certainly it involved more than merely looking upon his father's nakedness (see 9:24). Nor is it clear why Canaan is cursed when, according to the story, Ham is the guilty party. The phrase "Ham was the father of Canaan" (v. 18) is certainly intended to bring the curse into harmony with the story, but this does not really remove the difficulty.

The curse of Canaan and the blessings of Shem and Japheth seek to account for the relationships between the peoples who descended from these three ancestors. The Canaanites did become the slaves of the Israelites (descendants of Shem). The identification of the descendants of Japheth is not certain. Perhaps they are the Philistines, who did "dwell among the tents of Shem," or the Hittites, who disappeared from the land shortly after the arrival of Israel. In any case, they are presented as sharing in the overlordship of Israel in the land of Canaan.

THE NATIONS OF THE WORLD

Gen 10:1–11:27

10:1-32 Table of the Nations. The genealogy of Gen 10 is actually an extensive tabulation of the nations of the ancient Near East. It is basically the work of the Priestly author, as signaled by the generation formula, but it now contains some fragments drawn from the Yahwist. The principle of division among the nations is not race or language, but geographic boundaries and political affiliations. The order in which the sons of Noah are listed—Shem, Ham, Japheth—is reversed in the genealogy that follows, in order to present the ancestors of the Israelites in a climactic final position.

The descendants of Japheth inhabit the region north of the Fertile Crescent to the coastlands west of Palestine. Many of the peoples mentioned are Indo-Europeans, but it is not possible to identify them all with certainty. Among those whose identification is certain are the following: the Madai are the Medes, the Javan are the Greeks, the Kittim are the people of the island of Rhodes.

The descendants of Ham include African and Arabic tribes that inhabited the region surrounding the Red Sea, northeastern Africa, and the land of Canaan. Ethiopia (Cush), Libya (Put), and Egypt are well known among the nations mentioned. It is surprising to find the Canaanites, who were Semites, identified as descendants of Ham, but this probably reflects the fact that Egypt controlled the region prior to Israel's claim on the land. The inhabitants of the Asiatic side of the Red Sea are also listed. Many of these names are familiar as peoples displaced by Israel's conquest of Canaan.

The descendants of Shem are the peoples occupying the region of the Fertile Crescent and the Arabian Peninsula. The known nations include Elam, Assyria, and Aram.

A later editor inserted Yahwistic materials into this Priestly genealogy (vv. 1b, 8-19, 21, 24-30). These insertions are clearly separate from their surrounding material in form and content. The Nimrod insertion (vv. 8-12) takes the form of a story rather than a genealogy. The identification of Nimrod with any known hero of the past is difficult. He is credited with the founding of several great cities, which has led scholars to identify Nimrod with Tukulti-Ninurta I (thirteenth century B.C.E.), the Assyrian king who conquered Babylon. Most of the names in verses 21, 24-30 are intended by the Yahwist to be names of individuals, unlike the Priestly author's names, which stand for peoples. Eber is the eponymous ancestor of the Hebrews, that is, the one from whom they took their name. The origin and meaning of the wordplay on the name Peleg (v. 25) is lost.

Though there is much uncertainty about this Table of the Nations, its theological significance is clear. It shows the fulfillment of God's command to increase and multiply found in Gen 1:28 and reiterated to Noah in Gen 9:1. It also shows us that Israel is one among many nations. The choice of Israel by Yahweh does not rest on any special achievement or quality that Israel possessed, but only on God's gracious intervention in its history.

11:1-9 The tower of Babel. The Yahwist tells in story form what the Priestly author has presented in genealogical form in chapter 10. The story may have once been an etiology explaining the diversity of languages and nations. The Yahwist, however, uses it not only as an example of humanity's ongoing sin, but also as a counterpoint to the call of Abraham in Gen 12:1ff. The background of the story is Babylonian. Shinar is an ancient name for Babylon (Babel). The method of brickmaking is characteristic of Mesopotamia, not Palestine, which used stone for building. In spite of the Babylonian milieu of this story, we have not as yet found an actual parallel to this story in any ancient Near Eastern mythology.

The narrative can be divided into three parts: verses 1-4, verses 5-8, verse 9. The first part is a report in which humans are the actors; the second part is discourse in which Yahweh is the chief actor. The final verse is an explanatory supplement that includes a popular etymology of the name Babel and concludes the story. It leads us back to the beginning by reversal: the people were united and their language was one, now they are not.

The people build a city with a tower, and Yahweh punishes them. It is not clear exactly why they are punished. What did they do to force Yahweh's hand? The sin can be inferred from the motive given for building the city: "to make a name for ourselves, lest we be scattered" (v. 4). There is a double motivation. On the one hand, they wish to make a name for themselves on their own initiative, in obvious independence from Yahweh. On the other hand, they seek to avoid being "scattered," which was commanded by God when they were told to "fill the earth" (1:28; 9:1). In this story the people do just the opposite: they come together in one place, a city.

Commentators often focus on the "tower with its top in the sky" (v. 4) as a sign of the sin of pride and rebellion against God, but there is no reason to separate the tower from the city. Most ancient cities were built with watchtowers. "With its top in the sky" simply means that it was a very tall tower. There is no need to identify the tower as a Babylonian temple (ziggurat), as is commonly done. Even if the tower was at one time associated with one of these ancient worship sites, in our story no religious significance is given to the tower.

As is characteristic of the Yahwist stories, this one presents Yahweh very anthropomorphically and contains wordplays. Yahweh "comes down" to see what the people are doing, appearing almost jealous or afraid of the people's growing skills. It is presumed that the "us" whom Yahweh addresses (v.7) are members of the heavenly council (compare Gen 1:26; 6:2). There are wordplays between the Hebrew for "Babel" and "confusion," for "name" and "place." The people sought to make their "name" great, but "from that place," from "Babel," "confusion" arose.

Against the background of the Babel story the Yahwist presents the call of Abraham. The people sought to make their name great, but it is Yahweh who will make Abraham's name great (12:2). They are scattered across the face of the earth; Yahweh will choose one nation, and through that nation all nations on earth will be blessed. Left to themselves they pursue sin; now Yahweh will intervene, not in punishment as in the flood, but in saving love, using Israel to call them back.

11:10-27, 31-32 The genealogy of Abraham. This genealogy of the Priestly author is patterned on the one found in chapter 5, but the lifespans given are considerably shorter. There is an insertion from the Yahwist tradition in verses 28-30. These verses really introduce the Abraham narratives and so will be treated with the call of Abraham (12:1ff.). Some of the names mentioned are actually cities of northwestern Mesopotamia (Serug, Nahor, Terah, Haran), but it was not unusual in the ancient Near East to borrow a name from a place.

In both the Priestly (v. 31) and Yahwist (v. 28) traditions, the birthplace of Terah, Abraham's father, is Ur of the Chaldeans. The identification of Ur as the city of the Chaldeans is anachronistic—the Chaldeans had entered the Mesopotamian region only after the city had reached its peak, and consequently it could not have been connected with the Chaldeans at the time of Abraham's migration. Abraham's migration begins from Haran (11:31; 12:5), and the cultural background assumed in the patriarchal narratives is that of the northwestern Mesopotamian region, not the southern Tigris-Euphrates valley, where Ur was located. Both cities, Ur and Haran, worshiped the moon god, Sin, and there was regular travel between these two cities. The Ur insertions into the text probably reflect the ancient associations between the two cities.

CONCLUSION

The primeval history in Gen 1–11 is a blend of traditions that relates a history of sin that marred the goodness of God's creation. The superiority of humanity over the rest of creation is indicated both by the statement that man and woman are created in the "image of God" and by God's command that they are to have dominion over the world. But because of its continued disobedience against God, humanity is bound to the very earth from which it was formed. Left to itself, it becomes ever more deeply caught in sin. God's forbearance is shown when each divine chastisement is tempered by care, protection, and restoration. The first eleven chapters of Genesis are the background against which the history of salvation moves forward with God's call of Abraham.

THE PATRIARCHAL NARRATIVES

Gen 11:28–36:43

From the story that ended with the whole of humanity scattered across the earth, the Yahwist now narrows the focus to one individual and his descendants. In this complex of sagas the connecting link is the theme of the promise and its fulfillment. The earliest form of the promise may have been only the promise of a son, but as the tradition developed it was expanded to include many descendants, land, greatness as a nation, and blessing. The concern for a descendant occupies most of the Abraham cycle.

It is legitimate to ask historical questions of the patriarchal narratives, but we are cautioned against an oversimplified reconstruction of the lives and historical period of the patriarchs by the nature of the narratives as saga. Nevertheless, the field of archaeology has contributed to our knowledge of the history of the ancient Near East, and there is general agreement that in view of the lifestyle and customs reflected in the patriarchal narratives, the patriarchs are to be situated in the region of the Fertile Crescent in the second millennium B.C.E.

THE ABRAHAM CYCLE

Gen 11:28–25:18

11:28-29; 12:1-9 The call and response of Abram. There is little preparation given for the call of Abram. (Abram and Abraham are variants of the same name, as are Sarai and Sarah. The changes in their names occur in 17:5 and 15 to indicate their new relationship to God as a result of the covenant.) Only the briefest mention is made of the migrations of Terah and his family. It is interesting that Milcah's father is remembered, but not the more important Sarai. Sarai's barrenness is mentioned in anticipation of later narratives and makes all the more paradoxical Yahweh's promise of many descendants in 12:2.

The promise to Abram represents a new phase in the Yahwist narrative. Previously we moved within the realm of primeval history, the history of all humanity; now we center on an individual, soon to become a family, and finally a nation. The choice of Abram remains a mystery in the Yahwist story, resting solely on God's initiative. The promise is dominated by the term "bless" (five times). What Yahweh offers to Abram will prove to be a sign of divine favor and a source of happiness to Abram himself. To be a great nation, Abram will need descendants and land. Both these aspects of blessing are spelled out in more detail in the following narratives. Abram's fame will come as a result of his trust in Yahweh's actions, not, as in the case of the Babel story, by means of making a name for himself. The final element in God's promise, the promise that all communities of the earth will find blessing in Abram, probably meant that Abram would be taken as the exemplar of divine blessing (Gen 48:20). Eventually, it came to be understood that Israel would actually be the mediator or agent of God's blessing to the world (Sir 44:21).

The Yahwist gives us no information about Abram's reaction to Yahweh's promise nor any indication of Abram's motives in obeying God's command. It is simply stated that "Abram went as the Lord directed" (v. 4). We can infer Abram's unquestioning faith and obedience from his response. The subject of the faith will come up again and again in the Abraham cycle of stories.

The narrator deliberately records that Shechem was Abram's first stop, because this ancient Canaanite city became an early center of Israelite cult (Josh 24:1; 1 Kgs 12:1). The patriarchs Abraham and Jacob are frequently presented as establishing altars and worshiping God in ancient Canaanite cities in response to some experience of the holy in these cities. This is a way of explaining why these originally pagan cities became worship centers in Israel. The terebinth of Moreh (v. 6) was a sacred tree, indicating that an ancient cult already existed at Shechem prior to Abram's visit. Old Testament events of great significance often occur near sacred trees, which were believed to be special places for receiving divine communication. It is here that Yahweh promises to give Abram the land of Canaan. Beyond being a statement of fact, the phrase "the Canaanites were then in the land" (v. 6) points to the unusual character of the promise given to Abram. The land will be possessed and the promise fulfilled by his descendants, not during Abram's own lifetime.

As Abram continues to journey south, he stops between Bethel and Ai, other ancient Canaanite cities that become important in Israel. Again he builds an altar to Yahweh, though we are not told why. Abram's travels bring him to the Negeb region, which is especially associated with him.

12:10-20 The ancestress in danger. Soon after the promise of land (12:7), we find Abram traveling to Egypt because of a famine. It was not unusual for Semitic peoples to go to Egypt in search of food, as is evidenced in Egyptian records of the period. But in light of the promise of land, it does not put Abram in the best light. What is even more striking about the story is that the patriarch, in order to ensure his own safety, knowingly compromises his wife's honor. He fears that his wife's beauty will come to the attention of Pharaoh and that Pharaoh will kill him in order to take Sarai into the royal harem. He persuades Sarai to lie by saying that she is his sister so that his life will not be in danger. As Abram had predicted, Sarai's beauty comes to the attention of the Egyptians, and Pharaoh, assuming that Abram is her brother, bestows gifts upon Abram and takes Sarai into his harem. Yahweh intervenes by sending a plague on Pharaoh's house but does not punish Abram. Pharaoh reprimands Abram and sends him away under military escort.

The wife-sister motif in this story may reflect an ancient Hurrian practice in northern Mesopotamia by which a husband adopted his wife as his sister. This gave the husband greater control over the wife, but it also gave the wife protection and privileges beyond those given to the ordinary wife. Such a practice eventually died out, and the narrator of the story does not seem to be aware of it.

Essentially the same story is also found in Gen 20:1-18 (E) and Gen 26:6-11 (J), but with some variations in characters and incidents. The alterations in subsequent versions indicate a greater sensitivity to the moral overtones of the story. Abraham no longer lies, since Sarah is said to be his half-sister, and God intervenes before her honor is compromised. The narrator of Gen 12 does not seek to excuse Abram's behavior, but rather seems to take delight in his shrewdness. The story also shows that in spite of what Abram and Sarai do, they are under God's protection, and God will intervene to secure the future realization of the promise when it is placed in jeopardy.

The story and the context in which it is found presents some difficulties. How does Pharaoh know that the plague is sent because of Sarai? How does he learn that Sarai is Abram's wife? These questions are never answered. The mention of camels in verse 16 is certainly anachronistic, for camels were not domesticated until the thirteenth century B.C.E. Is one to suppose that Sarai is actually sixty-five years old in the story (see Gen 12:4b; 17:17)? These inconsistencies were not of importance to the narrator, though they bother contemporary readers. The narrator's interest is in God's intervention that redeems the situation.

13:1-18 Separation of Lot and Abram. Abram's journey, first to the Negeb and then, by stages, north to Bethel, was typical of nomads in search of pastures for their flocks. Their movements were governed by the need for grazing land, and they were often found moving about near cities. Both Abram and Lot are described as having large flocks, and they agree to separate to forestall future arguments between them over rights to pasture-land. Their herdsmen have already begun to quarrel. Abram, though older and by rights the one who could choose first, very magnanimously defers to Lot. Lot picks the land that looked lush and fertile, the Jordan Plain, and settles near Sodom. Lot's choice is ironic, for this is a territory that will be destroyed by Yahweh. The events of Gen 19 are here anticipated by the narrator.

Verses 14-17 may not have been part of the original story, but they now serve as its climax. The promise of land parallels the promise given in Gen 12:2-3, 7; the promise of innumerable descendants is added. Abram's walking the length and breadth of the land is a symbolic act indicating that he is taking legal possession of it, even though it is not his (13:7). Abram finally settles near the terebinth of Mamre.

14:1-24 Abram and Melchizedek. There is universal agreement that Gen 14 is one of the most difficult chapters in the Book of Genesis. It is very different from the rest of the patriarchal narratives. It begins like a report from an ancient chronicle and is replete with historical and geographical details. Abram is pictured, not as a peaceful nomad, but as a commander of forces involved in a war. The sequence of events that flows from chapter 13 to chapter 15 is interrupted by chapter 14. It is impossible to determine the source of this chapter. Consequently, scholars speak of it as an insertion into the patriarchal narratives, independent of any of the sources (J, E, P).

There is considerable debate about the historical reliability of the chapter. Are the cities and kings that are named evidence of the antiquity and historical reliability of the passage, or is the author of this insertion merely imitating historical style? Can we identify with certainty the kings and cities mentioned in chapter 14? The answers to these questions are very complex and, while of interest, are beyond the scope of this commentary. Our concern in chapter 14 will center mainly on Abram and his meeting with Melchizedek.

Chapter 14 is composed of two distinct parts: verses 1-16, 21-24, and verses 17-21. It seems that Abram has been introduced into the first part of the chapter precisely because of his encounter with Melchizedek, which serves as the conclusion and climax of the chapter. The name Melchizedek means "Zedek [a god] is my king." The city of Salem is to be identified with the city of Jerusalem (Ps 76:2). That Melchizedek is both a king and a priest is not unusual—that was often the case in the ancient Near East. The god he worships, "God Most High, the creator of heaven and earth" (v. 19), was the head of the Canaanite pantheon and supreme over the other gods and the world. Melchizedek offers Abram bread and wine, which may simply have been refreshment but could have had some ritual significance; he also blesses Abram. Abram, for his part, identifies Yahweh with God Most High (v. 22) and accepts Melchizedek's blessing. There is some question regarding who pays tribute to whom (v. 20). The subject of the sentence in the Hebrew text is simply "he" and not Abram, as supplied in our text. The context would seem to indicate that it is Melchizedek who not only blesses Abram but also pays him tribute.

Many scholars see in this passage an argument in support of the reign of the Davidic dynasty and its assimilation of priestly duties. It is true that Melchizedek was seen as a prototype of the ideal Davidic king (Ps 110:4), but it goes beyond the text to say that Abram's acceptance of Melchizedek's blessing suggests that Abram's descendants will accept the Davidic dynasty. The inclusion of the passage probably reflects the author's interest in linking Abram with Jerusalem and its priest-king, and in the identification of Yahweh with the God in whose name Abram is blessed.

15:1-21 The covenant with Abram. A source analysis of chapter 15 is difficult. Some scholars have argued for the presence of the Elohist source in 15:1-6, but the consensus is that the entire chapter was composed by the Yahwist, in spite of several inconsistencies that point to a combination of sources. It is likely that the Yahwist author is drawing from several traditions and harmonizes them with only partial success.

The problems in the text are obvious. The covenant ceremony takes place at sunset in verses 12 and 17, yet in verse 5 it is already night. In verse 8 Abram expresses doubt, whereas his faith is emphasized in verse 6. Yahweh's name is revealed in verse 7 but is already known by Abram in verse 2. These inconsistencies are removed if we separate verses 1-6, 13-16, which are concerned with the issue of descendants, from verses 7-12, 17-21, which focus on a covenant ritual surrounding the promise of the land. Thus we have at least two separate traditions that make up this chapter, though they are interrelated in a carefully constructed passage.

The first six verses show elements drawn both from prophetic traditions and from the cultic sphere. The opening phrase, "this word of the Lord came to Abram," is recognized as a prophetic formula (compare Isa 1:1; Ezek 1:1; Amos 1:1) and suggests that the author sees in God's summons to Abram a call similar to that of a prophet. The cultic background of the passage is clear, for its structure is patterned after the format of cultic celebrations: God's self-manifestation (v. 1) is followed by a salvation oracle (vv. 4, 5) and a declaration of righteousness (v. 6). Yahweh's admonition against fear is not unusual, for in the ancient world an encounter with the Deity was understood as a terror-filled event. "Fear not" is often found in the Old Testament accompanying a manifestation of God (see Judg 6:23; Isa 41:10). The title "shield" is frequently used of God as protector and deliverer (see Pss 3:3; 18:2; 28:7, etc.). It is a title drawn from the cult, and this is its only occurrence in the patriarchal narratives. The reward that Yahweh promises to Abram is certainly to be read against chapter 14, where Abram returned home with no recompense.

Difficulties in the original Hebrew text make the translation of verse 2 uncertain. However, verse 3 is clear and parallels the content of verse 2: Abram is concerned that a servant born in his household will become his heir. The practice of a slave becoming the heir of a childless couple accords with the customs of Mesopotamia in the fifteenth century B.C.E., as confirmed by the discovery of legal texts from Nuzi. Yahweh's answer to Abram is not a mere reiteration of the promise of innumerable descendants, but specifically assures Abram that his own issue will be his heir. Abram's response is faith in Yahweh. He trusts Yahweh completely and sets aside his doubts and anxiety. His righteousness is affirmed on the basis of this response. His total reliance upon Yahweh puts him in right relationship to Yahweh.

Verse 7 begins with a second self-introduction of the Deity in language and form drawn from the cult. The promise now focuses on land, not descendants. The confirmation of Yahweh's promise of the land is secured in the covenant ceremony described in verses 9-11, 17-20. This primitive ritual and its significance are mentioned in Jer 34:18, and discoveries within the past century have shown that this manner of making covenants was widespread in the ancient Near East. Cutting the animal in two and walking between the separate pieces bound the parties in covenant. If they failed to keep the terms of the covenant, they were cursed to share a fate like that of the split animal. The birds of prey that swoop down upon the carcasses are probably to be interpreted as omens of evil, but the exact meaning of the portent is not clear. Abram falls into a deep sleep, a state of suspended activity, in which he can receive a divine revelation. The covenant ceremony concludes when a fire pot and a flaming torch pass between the severed parts of the animal (v. 17). Fire is often a sign of the presence of God, and this is certainly what it represents in this passage. Yahweh initiates the covenant and agrees to be bound to it. The final verses (vv. 18-21) specify the extent of the promised land, which corresponds to the extent of the Davidic empire under Solomon.

Verses 13-16 interrupt the description of the covenant ceremony. They explain why it is not Abram himself but his descendants who will possess the land. Yahweh is not lacking in power; rather, the Amorites are allotted a measure of time before they are judged by God. These verses show a theology of history in which Yahweh rules over history and brings about the fulfillment of the divine promise to Abram in that history.

Chapter 15 confirms God's covenant with Abram: he will have a son, he will have many descendants, and one day they will possess the land.

16:1-16 The birth of Ishmael. The story of the birth of Ishmael is primarily the work of the Yahwist. Only in verses 3 and 15-16 do we find insertions from the Priestly author. The Priestly insertions give the essentials of the story but lack the lively, dramatic character of the Yahwist story. Through the eyes of the Yahwist we glimpse the frustration and jealousy of Sarai, the arrogance of Hagar, and the passivity of Abram.

Actually the elements that make up the story are not as scandalous as they may appear to the modern reader. Sarai's proposal that Abraham impregnate her servant, Hagar (v. 2), was in conformity with the legal customs of Mesopotamia. A barren wife could give her servant to her husband so that children could be fathered. The children of the concubine were considered the legal offspring of the wife, just as Sarai states: "perhaps I shall have sons through her" (v. 2). It is certainly understandable that a servant who now shares the master's bed may assume a certain equality to, or even superiority over, the barren wife. The law provided for servants who "forgot their place," however, by specifying that they be returned to their former status of servant. This is precisely what happens in the story (vv. 4-6). Abram is following the law when he returns Hagar to Sarai's control. Nonetheless, Sarai's severity with Hagar exceeds the law and does not enhance her character.

Hagar, an Egyptian, flees south because of Sarai's harsh treatment. She is apparently on her way back to Egypt when she is met by the messenger of Yahweh (v. 7). There is no clear distinction between Yahweh and the messenger of Yahweh (v. 13); it is simply a way of indicating that a message comes from Yahweh and at the same time preserves Yahweh's transcendence over the created world. The messenger's words of assurance echo the promise given to Abram: Hagar will be the mother of many descendants (v. 10). The name Ishmael is explained by popular etymology as meaning "God hears." Yahweh has heard Hagar's cry and has come to her aid. The description of Ishmael that follows (v. 12) is etiological in character. Ishmael, the son of a proud and rebellious mother, becomes the ancestor of the desert tribes, known for their wild, free spirit and warlike nature. Israel does not forget that it is closely related to these peoples; they are offspring of the same father.

The final verses (vv. 13-16) are not entirely clear, but it seems that some connection is drawn between the name given to a well, "Well of living sight" (?), and the name given to Yahweh by Hagar, "God of Vision." In ancient times there may have been a sanctuary to this God at this place. "God of Vision" was the name of a deity worshiped in Canaan.

The interest of the Yahwist does not center on the etiologies in the story; rather, the episode is intended to show that the fulfillment of God's promise depends upon God alone, not on human inventiveness. By situating this incident between the promise and its fulfillment, the story delays the realization of the promise and thus heightens the suspense. The reader is drawn into the story: When will Yahweh fulfill the promise?

17:1-14 The covenant with Abram. The covenant with Abram, recounted by the Yahwist in chapter 15, is told here by the Priestly author. This account consists primarily of an address by Yahweh and lacks the human-interest quality so characteristic of the Yahwist. It is more theological in tone, telling us very little about Abram's personal reactions. The chronological details, the theological orientation, and the concern with circumcision are all typical of the Priestly author.

Like the Yahwist version, the passage opens with God's self-introduction. The name "God Almighty" (El Shaddai) has special significance for the Priestly author, who limits the use of this name for God to the patriarchal narratives; it thus becomes the distinctive name of God associated with this period (28:3; 35:11; 48:3). In the primeval history God was called Elohim; in the future God will be known to Israel as Yahweh (Exod 6:3f.). The meaning of the name El Shaddai is uncertain, but there is some evidence to support the view that it means "mountain god."

The covenant is portrayed, not as an oath taken by God, as in the Yahwist version, but as a contract. God will give Abram many descendants; Abram, for his part, is commanded to walk in God's presence, to be blameless, and to practice circumcision as a sign of the covenant between them. The change in Abram's name (v. 5) signals his new relationship to God and the new life granted by the covenant. The new name, Abraham, is said to mean "father of a multitude of nations," but actually the name is simply a variation of the name Abram, which means "my father [the god] is exalted."

Some new elements introduced into the Priestly account are to be noted. The covenant is made not simply with Abraham but also with his descendants, and it will be an everlasting covenant (v. 7). In addition, a new relationship with God forms part of the covenant: this God who makes covenant with Abraham will be his God and the God of his descendants. This anticipates the relationship between Yahweh and Israel that will be established at Sinai.

Circumcision only became an important sign of the covenant during the Babylonian Exile (586–538 B.C.E.); it is doubtful that it always had this significance for Israel. Circumcision was practiced in ancient Egypt and by the Semitic peoples that lived in Canaan. It was not practiced in Mesopotamia nor by the Philistines, whom Israel referred to as the "uncircumcised" (2 Sam 1:20). It is not clear why the practice of infant circumcision developed, since circumcision was associated with puberty rites in other cultures. Circumcision may originally have had some religious significance now lost to us, or it may have been done simply for hygienic reasons. The exiles living in Babylon took circumcision to be a sign of their religious identity over against the Babylonians, who did not practice the ritual. For the Priestly author, whose writing originated in the exilic community, circumcision becomes the sign of inclusion in the community that worships Yahweh. Circumcision is so important for this source that if one is not circumcised, he is not considered a member of the covenanted people (v. 14).

17:15-27 The birth of Isaac. The announcement of the birth of Isaac interrupts the account of the command to circumcise and its eventual enactment related in verses 23-27. In all three sources—the Yahwist, Elohist, and Priestly—Isaac is the child of promise, and the unexpectedness of his birth points to God's great power in making the impossible a reality. As Abram's name is changed to signal his new role, so too Sarai's new role as mother is accompanied by the change of her name (v. 15), even though Sarah is really only a dialectical variant of the name Sarai.

Abraham's reaction to the announcement of Isaac's birth to Sarah, who is well beyond childbearing age (ninety years old), is an understandable mixture of respect and disbelief; he shows reverence to God by paying homage, but he cannot help but laugh. The laughter motif is also found in the Yahwist and Elohist traditions. It explains Isaac's name, which means "laughter" in Hebrew. Abraham thinks of Sarah's advanced age and directs God's attention to Ishmael. God seems to have forgotten how old Sarah is, and Abraham offers God a way out, but God is not to be diverted. The promise will be fulfilled in Sarah's descendants, not Hagar's. Ishmael will not be forgotten. He too will become a great nation, but the covenant is to be with Isaac's descendants.

18:1-15 The announcement of the birth of Isaac. This is one of the Yahwist author's most delightful stories. The Yahwist draws upon a common folk-tale motif—a story in which strangers who have been treated hospitably turn out to be divine guests. They, in turn, reward those who have been gracious to them. With this motif, developed against the background of the custom of desert hospitality, the Yahwist interweaves the announcement of the birth of Isaac, and the story moves one step closer to the fulfillment of the promise.

The only real problem in the narrative is the relationship between Yahweh and the three strangers. The text states that Yahweh appeared to Abraham, and then, suddenly, Abraham sees three strangers. The shift back and forth between Yahweh and the three visitors continues throughout the story. It is difficult to determine what the author means. Is Yahweh one of the three, or do all three stand for Yahweh? Perhaps the author is drawing upon a tradition that was originally polytheistic and feels constrained to leave it unchanged. The Yahwist may have kept the ambiguity in the story to suggest the mystery that surrounds God's presence in the world.

It must be remembered throughout this story that Abraham is an old man and Sarah is an old woman. Though the exact ages of ninety-nine years for Abraham and ninety years for Sarah come from the later Priestly source, even the Yahwist considers both Abraham and Sarah to be advanced in years (v. 12). The setting of the story is the terebinths of Mamre, a holy place very appropriate for this divine visitation. Abraham is sitting in the entrance of the tent in the heat of the day, which is the only place to be in midafternoon when the desert sun scorches the earth, especially if you are an old, old man. The three visitors suddenly appear at this unusual time. Who would be out walking in the heat? Equally strange is the detail that says that this old man runs and bows profusely to the ground. All of Abraham's actions are in excess, suggesting that he suspects the divine character of his guests and hopes that by displaying his great hospitality he may exact a favor from them.

Abraham becomes extremely verbose, in contrast to his later behavior (v. 9). His offer of a morsel of bread ("little food" in our text) and a little water ("some water" in our text) is an understatement in the extreme, for he has Sarah bake nearly a bushel's worth of flour into bread, he has prepared the best steer from his herd, and, in addition, he serves curds and milk with the meal. This is not a drop of water and a crumb of bread but a banquet befitting a king. As a good host, Abraham serves his guests and, as was the custom, Sarah is not present, since women did not eat with the men. She is nearby in the tent, however, as is evident later in the story.

After the meal the strangers ask a question that could only have caused great shock to the storyteller's audience (v. 9). According to desert hospitality, a guest was given anything that was requested. This included taking his pleasure with the wife of the host. It was certainly rude to ask for the host's wife, but a guest could not be denied. The abruptness of Abraham's answer indicates his shock at their request. Sarah, who is listening near the entrance of the tent, finds the exchange quite humorous. She may have been a beauty in the past (12:10ff.), but now she is old.

The shocking request is not what it seemed at first, however, but serves to introduce the announcement of the birth of Abraham's long-awaited descendant. That the guests are aware of Sarah's laughter and inner thoughts must certainly have unnerved her, for she hastens to deny that she laughed. But the guests do not allow her denial to stand, and the final word of the story, "You laughed," would have reminded a Hebrew audience of the name of the promised child, Isaac, meaning "laughter."

18:16-33 Abraham's intercession for Sodom. This section was evidently not drawn from ancient traditions but was freely composed by the Yahwist. In it we find a rather developed theology presented in two short conversations. In the first (vv. 17-18), in terms reminiscent of the promise (12:2-3), Yahweh decides to tell Abraham of the judgment made upon Sodom. God's intentionality and actions, previously hidden, are now revealed to the chosen one, Abraham, in order that he might be able to teach his descendants about God's justice. Thus the destruction of Sodom takes on a special admonitory significance for future generations.

The second conversation is between Abraham and Yahweh. It is a rather entertaining example of Oriental bargaining at its best, but its underlying concerns are quite serious. The question of justice is at stake: Is it just to destroy the innocent, few as they may be, along with the vast majority who are guilty? Are the innocent important enough to forestall the punishment of the wicked? Tension in the encounter is created by Abraham, who, though deferential toward Yahweh, dares to enter into debate and continues to press Yahweh at each step of the exchange by boldly attempting to reduce the minimum number of innocent needed to save the city. Not only is Yahweh's patience revealed in the dialogue, but also Yahweh's great willingness to set aside punishment for the sake of the innocent few.

19:1-29 The destruction of Sodom. The story of the destruction of Sodom, though once an independent saga, is now well integrated into the Abraham cycle. The two messengers, who separated from Yahweh in 18:22, arrive in Sodom. The purpose of their visit is to determine whether the outcry against Sodom (18:20) is justified. Lot is found at the city gate, which was the usual gathering place for townsmen. Unlike chapter 13, where Lot was pictured as a herder and a nomad, he is now a city-dweller. He persuades the strangers to spend the night at his home. In the course of the evening, Lot's fellow townsmen come and demand that his guests be sent out to them so that they may take pleasure with them. It is clear that for the Yahwist, inhospitality, so serious in a nomadic society, and sexual perversion, against which there is a strong Old Testament bias, are the sins for which the city is condemned.

We are shocked by Lot's attempt to placate the townsmen by offering to give them his two virgin daughters for their pleasure, but it is unlikely that an ancient audience would have been as horrified. They would have seen in Lot's offer a noble attempt, even if extreme, to fulfill the demands of hospitality. Lot is unsuccessful, and he himself is rescued by the two guests, who strike the townsmen blind. The wickedness of Sodom is confirmed and its destruction is imminent. Lot and his family must flee to save themselves from the destruction. The weak and vacillating character of Lot is revealed in his hesitation to leave; he must be led out of the city (v. 16).

There are etiological motifs tied to the story. Lot refuses to flee to the mountains but wants to escape to a "small" city, Zoar (v. 20). The name Zoar means "little" or "insignificant." He is granted this favor, and Zoar is spared from judgment. Lot's wife becomes a pillar of salt when she turns to see the destruction, for they had been commanded not to look back. There are many salt formations surrounding the southern end of the Dead Sea; the story explains their presence and shows the consequences of disobedience.

The destruction of Sodom may be based on some actual violent natural disaster in the distant past, but this is impossible to verify. The concern of the Yahwist is to explain the destruction of the region as God's judgment upon sin. The final verse (v. 29) is a summation of the story and is attributed to the Priestly author.

19:30-38 The ancestry of the Moabites and Ammonites. This story deals with the ancestry of the Israelites' neighbors, with whom they recognized a certain kinship but who nevertheless were their enemies and were barred from ever becoming members of the covenant community (Deut 23:4). The story was probably originally told in praise of the actions of the ancestresses, who take extreme measures to ensure the continuance of the family line. They are certainly not ashamed of their actions, since their children proudly bear names that tell of their deeds: Moab ("From my father") and Ammon ("The son of my kin"). The Yahwist includes the story in order to disparage the ancestry of Israel's traditional enemies.

20:1-18 Endangering the ancestress a second time. This story is immediately recognized as a doublet of the Yahwist story in 12:10-20. There is universal agreement that it is to be identified as the product of the Elohist. In addition to the use of the Hebrew Elohim for the divine name, the Elohist's authorship is indicated by the use of dreams as a means of divine communication. The distinctive concerns of the Elohist are all the more apparent when contrasted with the earlier version. Whereas the Yahwist presented at some length Abraham's motives for passing off Sarah as his sister and explained how she came to be in Pharaoh's harem, these concerns are largely ignored by the Elohist, who focuses rather on Abimelech's guilt and deliverance. In spite of the fact that Abimelech acted in ignorance and consequently did not intend to do wrong, he is considered guilty. He has sinned by taking another man's wife into his harem, even if he acted unknowingly, and that act cannot go without some form of punishment. In this case it is Abraham, whose own guilt is overlooked, who will be able to intercede on Abimelech's behalf. Abraham, who has special access to God in virtue of his call, is depicted in the role of mediator and prophet.

There are other differences between the two accounts. It is not clear in the Yahwist's version whether Pharaoh actually had relations with Sarah, but the Elohist leaves no doubt that God intervened before Abimelech even touched her. Here Abimelech's gifts to Abraham stand as testimony to the honorableness of Abraham and Sarah. In the Yahwist's version gifts are given when Sarah is first taken into Pharaoh's harem. The Elohist's moral sensitivity is indicated by his attempt to justify Abraham's action, stating that Sarah was indeed Abraham's half-sister. Whereas the Yahwist allows the patriarch's behavior to speak for itself, the Elohist explains Abraham's actions in order to present a more honorable picture of his ancestor.

21:1-21 The birth of Isaac and the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael. All three sources are found in this account of the birth of Isaac. The Yahwist version (21:1, 6b, 7) simply presents the birth of Isaac in Sarah's old age as the fulfillment of Yahweh's promise (18:10). Laughter is connected with Isaac's name because it is the response Sarah expects from her neighbors when they hear that she has given birth in her old age. In the Priestly version (21:2-5), Isaac's birth is also said to be the fulfillment of God's promise (17:21), but this author adds that Abraham named and circumcised the child according to God's command (17:19, 12). Regarding the Elohist version (21:6a), only the motif of laughter associated with the name Isaac is retained.

The child is called Isaac because of Sarah's joy (laughter) at his birth.

The Elohist narrative of Isaac's birth (vv. 8-21) is a duplicate of the story of the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael found in the Yahwist version in chapter 16. But as one might expect, there are significant differences in this version. It is Sarah's jealousy, not Hagar's arrogance, that leads her to demand that Abraham expel the two. She fears that Isaac's future inheritance is threatened by Ishmael's presence in the home. Here Abraham reacts more strongly to Sarah's demand than in the Yahwist version, where he remained passive. He gives in to her demand only when God tells him to do so and when God assures him that Ishmael will be the father of a great nation.

The Elohist paints a very poignant picture of Hagar's departure and of her subsequent despair when lack of water threatens her life and that of the child. God intervenes through a messenger, and Hagar is assured of Ishmael's future and, by means of God's assistance, she finds water. Ishmael becomes the father of camel nomads (Ishmaelites), who lived in the wilderness between Palestine and Egypt. They lived by hunting and plundering, as indicated by the phrase "he became an expert bowman" (v. 21).

The Elohist story suppresses the etiological interests of the Yahwist version. It ennobles the figure of Abraham, and even Hagar is presented in a better light than in chapter 16. God directs the action by ensuring the future of both the child of promise and the child of Hagar.

21:22-34 Abraham and Abimelech at Beer-sheba. The passage contains two separate agreements between Abraham and Abimelech, and thus the question of separate sources arises. Some scholars attempt to find evidence in this passage of both the Yahwist and the Elohist; others suppose that one author, the Elohist, drew upon two separate traditions in the composition of the passage.

The first agreement (vv. 22-24, 27, 31, 32b, 34) is initiated by Abimelech and presupposes the events of chapter 20. Abimelech wants to be assured of Abraham's friendship and suggests a covenant as a guarantee of Abraham's loyalty. Abraham agrees. The covenant oath is sworn at Beer-sheba, a name meaning "well of the oath."

The nature of the second agreement (vv. 25-26, 28-30, 32a, 33) is quite different. Abraham initiates the covenant in response to a dispute over a well. The seven lambs accepted by Abimelech indicate that he recognizes Abraham's claim to the well. The place was called Beer-sheba, "well of the seven," because of Abraham's gift. The purpose of this account is to show that the well at Beer-sheba, a sacred place for Israel, originated with Abraham. Its cultic significance is suggested in verse 33. At Beer-sheba, Abraham calls upon "God the Eternal" (El Olam), a divine name used by the Canaanites and eventually given to Yahweh by Israel (see Ps 102:25, 28).

22:1-19 The sacrifice of Isaac. The story of the sacrifice of Isaac, generally attributed to the Elohist, is one of the great masterpieces of narrative art in the Bible. We are drawn into the action of the story from the very start and are held in suspense until the climax. We know, as readers, that what is recounted is a test for Abraham; thus we focus on Abraham's response and not on the horror of God's command. We are left to imagine Abraham's inner thoughts while the narrator tells us only what he does. We follow Abraham each step of the way as he complies with the divine command. We feel the silence as father and son walk together, coming closer with each step, to that moment of ultimate decision. We smile at Isaac's innocent question and sympathize with Abraham in his tender but evasive answer. We watch as each detail of that final moment unfolds, from the building of the altar to Abraham's poised knife, ready to claim his son's life. We wait expectantly until the angel intervenes, and finally we rejoice at the turn of events. Abraham has withstood the test, and Isaac still lives.

It is clear that the story is concerned with Abraham's great faith, which is expressed in his willingness to sacrifice his son, the child of promise, in accord with God's command. A connection between this story and human sacrifice is often made. Human sacrifice was commonly practiced among Israel's neighbors, and on a few occasions even in Israel, though it was forbidden (see 1 Kgs 16:34; 2 Kgs 3:27; 23:10). It may be that the story originally centered on a repudiation of the practice of human sacrifice. However, any earlier significance is now superseded by the motif of the testing of Abraham's faith.

The original conclusion of the story was verse 14, but a supplement was added (vv. 15-19) to link the story with the theme of promise, the dominant theme of the patriarchal narratives.

22:20-23 The genealogy of Nahor. This genealogy is attributed to the Yahwist. It lists the twelve sons of Nahor, who are Semitic (Aramean) relatives of Israel. The purpose of its inclusion is to prepare the way for the appearance of Rebekah (v. 23) in chapter 24.

23:1-19 Abraham's purchase of Machpelah. It is often argued that the Priestly author is responsible for this story, though the vividness of presentation reminds one of the Yahwist. The passage tells how Abraham bought a piece of land in Canaan as a place to bury his wife. In doing so, it provides us with another delightful glimpse at the art of Oriental bargaining.

Abraham is a sojourner in the land, and as such has only limited rights; he cannot own property legally. For Abraham to acquire property, the matter must be decided by the elders of the city. The Hittites with whom Abraham negotiates would not have been Anatolian Hittites, who were powerful in the sixteenth/fifteenth centuries B.C.E. but one of the many groups living in pre-Israelite Canaan. In the exchange each party attempts to outdo the other in courtesy. The Hittites are hesitant to sell land to a sojourner but will allow Abraham to bury Sarah in any of their burial sites. This is not what Abraham wants, and he purposely ignores their suggestion and indicates the precise piece of land he wants to buy. Ephron, the owner of the land, magnanimously offers to "give" Abraham not only the cave he wants but also the field where the cave is located. Abraham graciously refuses to take the land as a gift but insists that he will pay for it.

This exchange is entirely within the bounds of the convention of bartering. While Abraham could have continued bartering for a lesser price, he accepts Ephron's first offer. It is difficult to determine whether the four hundred shekels paid by Abraham was considered exorbitant, because the value of the shekel varied. The fact that it was Ephron's first offer, when he certainly expected Abraham to make a counteroffer, suggests that the price was high. By comparison, David pays only fifty shekels for a threshing floor and oxen (2 Sam 24:24). In verses 16-20 we find a formal contract of sale. Abraham achieves his objective—he now owns property in Canaan for Sarah's burial.

Though this chapter correctly reflects the legal and social customs of the ancient Near East, its purpose is not simply to record an event in the life of Abraham. Rather, Abraham's possession of a portion of the land stands as a pledge of the future possession of the land in its entirety.

24:1-67 Finding a wife for Isaac. This charming story is another instance of the superior storytelling art of the Yahwist. There is some evidence of compilation, but it does not affect the unity of the story. The repetition, which the modern reader finds tiresome, is typical of biblical narrative and does not really detract from the story. The theme of promise remains in the background. In the forefront is God's guidance, but this guidance is directed through the heart. God does not intervene directly.

Abraham, according to custom, must arrange for the marriage of his son. Since he is old and near death, he entrusts the task of finding a wife for Isaac to a servant, who functions more like a trusted steward than a mere servant. Abraham binds the servant by oath to carry out this mission, underscoring its supreme importance. The "thigh" of verse 2 is a euphemism for the genitalia, which were viewed as sacred because they were understood to be the source of life. The servant is not to let Isaac marry a Canaanite woman. This prohibition is meant to exclude the possibility of intermingling religions; it does not reflect a racial bias as such. Under no circumstances is Isaac to be allowed to return to Abraham's country (v. 6). Such a journey apparently was viewed as a turning back on God's promise of the land. The assurance is given that God will guide the entire enterprise and bring it to successful conclusion.

The story barely mentions the servant's lengthy journey to Haran but moves immediately to the search for a suitable wife. At a well outside the city, the servant places the success of his mission in God's hands and suggests a sign by which he will recognize God's choice. The sign of drawing water, not only for the servant but also for ten thirsty camels, is meant to reveal the character of the woman; only a generous and industrious woman would willingly draw the many gallons of water needed. Rebekah arrives (v. 15) and, unknowingly, carries out the requirements of the sign. For this she is showered with gifts, which are probably meant to be part of the bride price. The servant is even more certain of God's guidance when he discovers that Rebekah is the grand-niece of Abraham and she invites him to her mother's home. It seems clear from this reference to her mother's home and from the fact that all subsequent negotiations take place with Laban, her brother, that Rebekah's father is deceased.

Laban's character is revealed in his haste to invite this wealthy stranger to his home after seeing the expensive gifts Rebekah has been given. His greed will become even more apparent in the Jacob-Laban stories that follow. The servant is treated with all due courtesy, but the urgency of his mission compels him to relate his story before eating. This section repeats Abraham's speech in the opening scene, with one significant omission: the servant does not allude to Abraham's refusal to allow Isaac to go to his homeland, for this would probably offend Rebekah's family. Laban admits that God has directed the servant and agrees to the marriage. Appropriately, more gifts are given to seal the agreement (v. 53).

Custom demanded a period of celebration, but the servant wants to be on his way and suggests that he leave immediately with Rebekah. The family understandably objects, but the servant reminds Laban that Yahweh has been directing the mission and so there is no need for delay. Rebekah's feelings in the matter are now solicited, in accordance with ancient customs, which held that a woman's consent was necessary when her brother arranged the marriage or when that marriage meant that she would have to leave her homeland. In this instance both stipulations are operative. Rebekah agrees and is given an ancient blessing promising fertility and power over enemies in the future (v. 60).

The final scene shifts to the Negeb as the caravan is returning. The text is untranslatable, so we can only guess what Isaac was doing as he saw his future bride approaching. Rebekah veils herself, according to custom—the groom was not to see the bride until after the wedding. The passage ends with their marriage and subsequent love. The order of marriage first and love second reflects what was often the case with arranged marriages.

25:1-18 Abraham's death. This section combines genealogies of the Yahwist (vv. 1-6, 11b) and Priestly (vv. 12-18) sources with an account of Abraham's death (vv. 7-11a, P). It is hard to fit the opening verses, which tell of Abraham's marriage, with the previous story, wherein Abraham is old and certainly dies before Rebekah marries Isaac (see 24:65: Isaac is now the servant's master). This discrepancy is probably to be explained by the juxtaposition of Yahwist and Priestly stories that do not follow the same chronologies. Keturah, Abraham's second wife, becomes the mother of the Arabian tribes that inhabited southern Palestine and northwestern Arabia. The gifts given to these children by Abraham testify to his generosity but also safeguard the inheritance for Isaac.

Abraham dies after a full life. It is not surprising to find Ishmael present at his father's funeral (v. 9), for the Priestly author does not provide an account of Hagar's expulsion. Abraham is laid to rest in the family tomb (see ch. 23). The chapter concludes with the Priestly genealogy of Ishmael, who becomes the father of twelve tribes that occupy the northwestern Arabian wilderness. The promise given to Abraham about Ishmael (21:13, E) is seen as fulfilled.

THE JACOB CYCLE

Gen 25:19–36:43

The Jacob cycle of stories differs from the Abraham cycle in the inner coherence of the cycle. Only the thread of promise united the Abraham cycle; each segment remained a separate unit. In the Jacob cycle, in addition to the theme of promise that continues to run through these stories, we find the theme of the quarrel between brothers integrating these stories at a deeper level. Even the Laban cycle of stories, which may once have circulated apart from the Jacob-Esau stories, is now also related to this theme.

25:19-26 The birth of Esau and Jacob. With the Priestly genealogy (vv. 19-20) that introduces this passage, we move into a new phase in patriarchal history—the period of Isaac and Jacob. What starts as a genealogy of Isaac is interrupted by a story about the birth of Jacob and Esau, usually attributed to the Yahwist (vv. 21-26a). The story may seem out of place in view of what precedes and follows, but it is clearly presupposed in chapter 27.

The barrenness of Rebekah echoes the barrenness of Sarah, but its resolution is almost immediate, and the motif does not become a major theme of the Isaac-Rebekah traditions, as it did with the Abraham-Sarah traditions. As with Sarah, God intervenes and Rebekah becomes pregnant. Only a remnant of the cultic background of the passage is retained in the use of the words "entreat," "heard this entreaty," "went to consult," and "answered." The joy of Rebekah at her pregnancy quickly turns to despair at the struggle going on in her womb. The oracle (v. 23), which is certainly the focus of the entire passage, is both a reassurance and a cause for concern. That Rebekah is to be the mother of two nations is indeed a blessing; that one will surpass the other is not unusual. What causes trepidation is that they will be divided and that, quite apart from the ordinary course of events, the elder will serve the younger, which means a painful struggle between the two. This oracle becomes programmatic as the story of Jacob and Esau continues.

By a series of implied and explicit wordplays the narrator underscores characteristics of Jacob and Esau that form a part of the future behavior and relationship of these two brothers. Esau is "reddish" ('admoni) and "hairy" (se'ar); he later becomes the father of the Edomites, who live in the region of Seir. The statement that Jacob is gripping Esau's "heel" functions as a wordplay on Jacob's name as well as a sign pointing to his grasping nature and the fact that he will supplant his brother. The name Jacob is actually a shortened form of a name similar to Jacobel, which means "may God protect."

25:27-34 Esau sells his birthright. The tension between the two brothers is exemplified in their different vocations. Esau is a hunter, a man of the field, and, by implication, wild and crude; Jacob is a shepherd, a tent-dweller, and therefore more civilized. The difference between the two brothers is further accentuated by Isaac's preferential love for Esau, and Rebekah's for Jacob.

The unfolding story shows Esau so concerned with immediate gratification that he loses all sense of proportion. For a mere pot of "red stuff" (v. 30) he sells his birthright, which was a double portion of the family inheritance. The narrator comments at the end that "Esau cared little for his birthright" (v. 34), which is certainly shown by his actions. There is no explicit criticism of Jacob's outright manipulation of his brother. Jacob clearly takes advantage of his brother by pushing him not only to sell his birthright for a bowl of lentils, but to make the deal irrevocable by forcing Esau to swear to it.

The character of Jacob is one of the most carefully developed in the patriarchal narratives. While the narrator refrains from making explicit moral judgments, he does show that Jacob's actions will lead him away from home, penniless, and at the mercy of Laban. God's choice of Jacob remains a mystery, but from the moment God appears to Jacob (28:10ff.) his character begins to improve.

26:1-35 Fragments about Isaac. There is little to unify this chapter except the presence of Isaac. Indeed, this is the only chapter devoted to Isaac, but most of its contents are duplications or echoes of stories about Abraham. With the exception of verses 34-35, which are from the Priestly source, the chapter is the work of the Yahwist.

The story found in verses 1-11 is another version of the story of the ancestress in danger (12:10ff.; ch. 20). This narrative is the least offensive of the versions and the least intriguing. For a second time famine is given as the reason for moving into a new territory, but this famine is clearly distinguished from the famine of Abraham's day. There is never any real threat to Isaac or to Rebekah. That she has been taken into Abimelech's harem may be surmised from the other versions but is never mentioned in this version. God is surprisingly absent. Abimelech sees Isaac "fondling" Rebekah (v. 8) and realizes their relationship is not that of brother and sister. Once again Isaac's name is the basis for a pun, since "fondling" and "laughter" are derived from the same Hebrew root. No gifts are given at the conclusion of the episode, but Isaac and Rebekah are guaranteed protection.

Isaac is twice the recipient of a divine appearance (vv. 2-5, 24) in which the promise given to Abraham is reiterated in nearly the same terms. Verse 5 is certainly an insertion from a later hand, for it speaks of Abraham's obedience in Deuteronomistic language. Like Abraham, Isaac built an altar at the site of God's appearance (v. 25).

God's blessing on Isaac is immediately realized in the abundance of the harvest and his growing wealth. The dispute over wells (vv. 15-25) was already found in the Abraham stories, and this seems to be a variant tradition of the same event, just as the covenant between Abimelech and Isaac (vv. 26-33) is a variant of the Abraham story (21:22ff.). Here we find yet another etymology of the name Beer-sheba (v. 33).

The Priestly addition (vv. 34-35) prepares for the events of 27:46–28:9. The conflict between Esau and Jacob is curiously missing from the Priestly tradition. What becomes a matter of contention in the household is Esau's foreign wives.

27:1-46 The blessing. The story of Jacob's deception, by means of which he receives the blessing intended for Esau, is a masterful blend of the Yahwist and Elohist sources, but it it impossible to separate the sources in this carefully structured and dramatic story. The scene opens with Isaac and his favorite son, Esau, then shifts to Rebekah and her favorite, Jacob. Following Jacob's deception, Isaac is again with Esau, and Rebekah with Jacob. Only in the central scene, the important scene in which the blessing is transferred, is the parent not with his or her favorite son.

In the opening scene Isaac, who is old and blind, wishes to bless Esau before he dies. In the ancient world, deathbed blessings were believed to be particularly effective, and the meal that was prepared and eaten prior to the bestowal of the blessing had a sacral character. Rebekah has overheard Isaac's words to Esau and devises a plan to have Jacob receive the blessing intended for Esau. Rebekah's scheme seems incapable of success, which only heightens the suspense in the following scene. Jacob's only fear is what will happen if he is caught in the deceit. Rebekah draws upon herself any curse that might be directed against Jacob, and he makes no further objection. In the central scene of the chapter, the suspense is heightened by each of Isaac's statements: "Which of my sons are you?"; "How did you succeed . . . ?"; "Come closer that I may feel you"; "Are you really my son Esau?" Only when Isaac finally smells his son does he become convinced of the lie and proceed with the blessing.

No sooner does Jacob depart than Esau enters (v. 30). The revelation of Jacob's deception greatly affects both Isaac and Esau, who respond in shock and grief. It was believed in the ancient world that a blessing or a curse, once spoken, had a life of its own and thus could not be recalled. The blessing given to Jacob is irrevocable; there is nothing Isaac can do to call it back. Esau recognizes the correctness of Jacob's name, for he has "supplanted" (another wordplay on the name Jacob) him twice—first in bartering for the birthright, and now in gaining the blessing. Esau begs for some kind of blessing, and though Isaac attempts to comply, his words sound more like a curse. Understandably, Esau bears a murderous grudge against Jacob, compelling Rebekah to send Jacob away for his own safety. Neither realizes that they will never see each other again.

The blessing given to Jacob assures him of future fertility of the land and lordship over his brothers. Esau's "blessing" is its opposite, but his subjugation to his brother is to be only temporary. Both of these oracles reflect upon the brothers as representatives of their respective nations, Israel and Edom. Edom became a nation before Israel but was later conquered by David and became a vassal of Israel. The Edomites frequently rebelled against Israel and eventually regained their independence.

Interestingly, the narrator refrains from making an outright moral judgment on the deception carried out by Rebekah and Jacob. The narrator cannot condemn Jacob, for he knows him to be the inheritor of the promise. The oracle has been spoken: the elder will serve the younger (25:23). Is Rebekah to be condemned for assisting in the fulfillment of the divine word? Is Isaac not going against God's word by wanting to secure the blessing for his elder son? The narrator leaves these questions unanswered; he only tells the story. Yet, in the very telling of that story, the narrator directs our sympathies to Esau as the innocent and aggrieved victim. Surely he gives us a hint of disapproval as he portrays the shattering effects of this deceit. The family is torn apart by it. It will be twenty years before Jacob returns home. He has not only grasped his brother's heel but has replaced his brother, at a tremendous cost.

27:46–28:9 Jacob leaves to find a wife. This passage of the Priestly author continues the story about Rebekah's dissatisfaction with Esau's marriages, a theme begun in 26:34-35. The motive for Jacob's departure in this tradition is quite different from that of the previous story. Jacob is not fleeing from Esau's wrath; rather, he leaves with his father's blessing to go in search of a suitable wife. The enmity between Esau and Jacob has disappeared. Indeed, Esau tries to imitate Jacob's good example and obtains a wife from his father's family. The issue of intermarriage between Jews and non-Jews was especially acute during the period of restoration (after 538 B.C.E.), when Israel was concerned with the integrity of its religious practices and purity of race.

28:10-22 Jacob's dream at Bethel. The story of the origin of Bethel as a sacred shrine serves as a link between Jacob's previous life in the land of Canaan and his future life in Haran. It is a combination of the Yahwist and Elohist sources, and continues the narrative of 27:42-45. In both versions of the story, Jacob has a profound religious experience at Bethel, which testifies to the holiness of the place.

The Elohist version (vv. 11-12, 17-18, 20-22) dominates the passage. Jacob, having fled from Esau's wrath, finds himself at a shrine, where he rests for the night, using a stone for a pillow. Characteristic of the Elohist tradition, the divine revelation comes in a dream. Jacob sees a stairway going from earth to the heavens and identifies it as the "gateway to heaven" (v. 17). It was believed in the ancient world that there were certain places on earth where the divine and earthly realms met. One such place was Bethel. Jacob recognizes the sacredness of the place; the stone itself he calls Bethel, that is, "house of God" (v. 22; our text has "God's abode"). Jacob consecrates the stone and sets it up as a memorial stone. Such memorial stones were Canaanite cult symbols of fertility and have been found at major cultic centers. When Israel conquered the land, it inherited Canaanite cultic sites with these stones but associated the cultic sites with events in the lives of the patriarchs, thereby eliminating the pagan religious significance of the stones, and used them simply as memorials.

The Yahwist version (vv. 10, 13-16, 19) uses the appearance of Yahweh as an opportunity to extend the promise of Abraham to Jacob (12:1-3). Yahweh is identified as the God of Abraham and Isaac, and assures Jacob of the divine presence and protection on his way. Yahweh is revealed as the God of the ancestors, that is, committed to a family or clan, not bound to a specific place or land.

The association of both Abraham (12:8; 13:3-4) and Jacob with Bethel shows Israel's preoccupation with this city. Bethel became an extremely important cultic center in ancient Israel (see Amos 5:5, 7:10-13; Hos 10:5). It dominated Israel's cultic life in the north from the time of the divided kingdom (1 Kgs 12:28-29) until it was destroyed during the period of Deuteronomic reform (2 Kgs 23:15).

29:1-14 Jacob's arrival in Haran. The Yahwist source dominates in this story of Jacob's arrival in Haran. He comes upon a well, presumably the same well where Abraham's servant found a wife for Isaac. Jacob, who has previously contributed little in the way of conversation, becomes quite loquacious in this passage. The author vividly portrays an eager young Jacob trying to engage the local, rather taciturn shepherds in conversation. The dialogue focuses on the shepherds' inactivity, which is explained by the fact that they are waiting to water their flocks, and cannot do so until the large stone covering the well is removed. Apparently the stone was meant to guarantee equal access to the limited supply of water in the well; only when all the shepherds were gathered could the stone be removed.

The conversation includes inquiries by Jacob about his uncle (vv. 5-6). In answer, the shepherds point to Rachel, Laban's daughter, who is approaching. When Rachel arrives, Jacob removes the stone from the well and waters Laban's sheep. This is a reverse of chapter 24, where Rebekah watered the servant's camels. Rolling back the stone, Jacob reveals his great strength, which impresses Laban when he hears about it. Jacob is overcome with joy upon meeting Rachel.

After Rachel relays the news of Jacob's arrival, Laban goes out to greet him. Laban's response, "You are indeed my flesh and blood" (v. 14), is ambiguous. It may express his pleasure at meeting Jacob, but it could also betray his disappointment at meeting this poor relative. Jacob comes to him, not with the wealth that accompanied Abraham's servant, but penniless. What can Laban do but offer Jacob his home? After all, he is family. In view of Laban's later treatment of Jacob, it is more likely that the expression is an indication of his disappointment.

29:15-30 The marriages. Motifs are introduced in verses 15-30 that become dominant in the stories that follow. These motifs are developed around the words "service" and "wages"—Jacob's service and the wages paid by Laban.

The question "Should you serve me for nothing just because you are a relative of mine?" (v. 15) begins the crafty and devious dealings that will characterize the relationship between Laban and Jacob. It sounds as if Laban is being magnanimous in offering to pay Jacob for his services, but in fact he is declaring the bond of family relationship (uncle-nephew) null and void. It is replaced by a lord-servant relationship.

Jacob suggests seven years of labor for the hand of Rachel in marriage; his labor would serve as the bride price. This custom of paying a bride price recognized a woman's usefulness and was meant to compensate the family for the loss of her labor through marriage. Laban's answer to Jacob is ambiguous. He never says that he will give Rachel to Jacob in marriage; rather, he says that he "prefers" to give "her" to Jacob than to an outsider (v. 19). The reason for his lack of clarity becomes obvious as the story unfolds.

For Jacob, who is in love with Rachel, the seven years pass quickly. When the time for payment comes, Laban gives the older daughter, Leah, to Jacob. A modern reader is often puzzled by Jacob's apparent "blindness" in failing to notice that his bride is not Rachel, but it was possible for such a thing to have happened in view of the marriage customs of that age. The bride was heavily veiled, and in the course of the wedding feast she was escorted in the darkness of the night to her husband's home. We can only assume that the darkness, the veil, and probably a dullness of the senses induced by the celebration prevent Jacob from realizing that the woman he has married is not Rachel. Jacob, who deceived a blind man (ch. 27), is himself treated by Laban as if he were blind. He is made to look even more foolish than Isaac, for he has sight and yet was easily deceived by Laban.

Jacob's indignation when he discovers his uncle's deception is dismissed by Laban. Laban says that it is against their custom "to give the younger before the first-born" (v. 26, in literal translation). This has to be meant as a direct affront to Jacob, who, though younger, had usurped the position of first-born in gaining his brother's birthright and blessing. Without giving Jacob time to respond, Laban suggests that when the week-long marriage festivities end, Jacob can marry Rachel, on the condition that he will continue to work for Laban another seven years. Jacob, destined to be a ruler (27:20), remains a servant in his uncle's home. Laban has used Jacob's love for Rachel against him, without giving thought to the position in which he has placed Leah. She not only becomes the unloved wife but is a constant reminder to Jacob of his uncle's deception.

29:31–30:24 The birth and naming of Jacob's children. A number of smaller units of the Yahwist and Elohist sources are joined together to form an integrated account of the birth and naming of Jacob's children. Popular etymology is freely used to draw out the relationship between the names of the children and the bitter struggle between Leah and Rachel for love and recognition in the home. Laban has created a situation in which Jacob finds himself married to two women, only one of whom he loves. Ultimately, God controls the course of events by making Leah fruitful and Rachel barren, but at the human level the story revolves around the jealousies of Leah and Rachel. Jacob's role in the story is largely confined to fathering children.

The paradox of the story centers on the position of the two women. Leah, as first-born, first wife, and first mother, should have the love and recognition of her husband, but Jacob loves the younger, Rachel. Rachel, though loved, is barren and fears the loss of Jacob's love because of her inability to give him offspring. With each son that Leah bears, Rachel becomes more and more desperate, even to the point of demanding children from Jacob. He reminds her that it is God who gives children. Consequently, Rachel's struggle is not only for love but also for the favor of God. Rachel, like Sarah before her (ch. 16), finally becomes a mother through her maid. Likewise, Leah gives her maid to Jacob when she has ceased to bear children for a time. This was according to custom (see ch. 16).

The story of the mandrakes (v. 14) reveals how much the domestic situation has deteriorated. Leah is denied access to her husband by a jealous Rachel. Leah barters for her rights and "hires" her husband for the evening. Jacob, who had become a "servant" of Laban for "wages," now becomes a "servant" to Leah for "wages" paid to Rachel. The wages are mandrakes, herbs believed to have magical powers and used as an aphrodisiac and as an aid to fertility. In this story, however, it is because of God's intercession that Rachel becomes pregnant. It is interesting to note that God remembers Rachel only after she has granted Leah access to Jacob's bed.

Of Jacob's daughters, only Dinah is mentioned, but no etymological association is given for her name, as in the case of the name of each son. The reference to Dinah may be an insertion meant to anticipate her story in chapter 34. The birth of Benjamin is not included here but is postponed until 35:17ff., possibly because Rachel dies in childbirth and her death would be out of context in chapter 30.

30:25-43 Jacob acquires great wealth. Though there is some evidence of multiple sources in this text, it is primarily the work of the Yahwist. The motifs of "service" and "wages," previously dominant, come to the fore once again. In chapter 29 Laban deceived Jacob and was able to get fourteen years of "service" in exchange for wives, his "wages." But Jacob learned his lesson well, and now he attempts to outwit the wily old Laban.

The conversation between the two is another example of the art of Oriental bargaining. Reminding Laban of his years of service, Jacob requests permission to leave. Laban, who wants Jacob to continue working for him, ignores Jacob's request. But he admits that he has benefited from Jacob's service and asks what wages Jacob wants. Jacob, in turn, ignores Laban's question and asserts his intention to provide for his own household. He even says that Laban does not have to pay, which is certainly an overstatement, since he immediately sets the wages for his continued service. Laban is taken in by Jacob's meager request. As payment, Jacob will take the dark sheep and speckled goats, which would have been very few animals, for sheep were generally all white and goats black. Laban agrees but seeks to undercut any loss by removing all abnormally colored animals from the flock and pasturing them a distance of three days' journey from the herd in Jacob's care. The distance works against Laban, for it gives Jacob a chance to carry out his plan unobserved.

Jacob's breeding practices are based on the ancient belief that what a mother experiences while pregnant is transmitted to the fetus. Jacob sets up tree branches that he has cut in order to expose their white center. The black goats look upon these branches while mating, and the white from the inner core of the branch is transferred to their offspring and so they produce speckled offspring. He makes the white sheep look at the dark goats in order to achieve the same results. He purposely uses only the best of the flock for his selective breeding, leaving Laban with a flock of weak and inferior animals.

Throughout the account of Jacob's breeding practices, there is a series of wordplays. The "poplar," the "white stripes," and the "white core" are words that in Hebrew sound like and relate to the name Laban and its meaning, "white." In a sense, Jacob is using his knowledge of Laban's nature (white) against him. Jacob, the one deceived (ch. 29), becomes the deceiver once again.

31:1-16 Jacob prepares to leave Laban. The most important differences between the Elohist version in chapter 31 and that of the Yahwist in the previous chapter concern the role of God and of Jacob. In this version it is Yahweh who initiates the action and not Jacob himself (vv. 12-13). God has protected Jacob from Laban's double-dealing, has caused Jacob to succeed in gaining wealth, and now commands him to return home. Jacob's meeting with his wives allows him to justify himself and to see whether his wives are in agreement. Throughout the story it is implied that Jacob is not free to leave his father-in-law with his wives and children, but it is not clear why this is the case. It may indicate that Jacob's marriage was an adoption-marriage, a custom in the ancient Near East. If this were so, Jacob would be considered an adopted son of Laban, and his wives and children would be considered Laban's property. Jacob's flight with his wives and children would then have been illegal.

Yahwist insertions into the text (vv. 1, 3) indicate that the attitude of Laban's sons caused Jacob to decide to leave. The Priestly author's contribution to the story is minimal. Indeed, there is only the brief notice that Jacob left to return home (v. 18).

31:17-35 Jacob's flight. The Elohist version continues to dominate the story, though the hand of the Yahwist appears now and then. Jacob's flight takes place while Laban is occupied with the annual sheep-shearing. Jacob is able to "deceive" Laban ("hoodwink," v. 20). When the Hebrew text is translated literally, it reads, "Jacob stole Laban's heart." (The heart in Hebrew anthropology was not the seat of the emotions but the intellect.) Jacob's action is paralleled by Rachel's theft in verse 19: "Rachel stole her father's household gods." Rachel's motives are not clear. The household gods, at least in Nuzi documents, represented the credentials of the true heir. Rachel may be attempting to secure a future claim to the inheritance, or she may simply be hoping to derive prosperity and blessing from them.

Before Laban overtakes Jacob, God appears to him in a dream and warns him not to harm Jacob (v. 24). This puts Laban in a very awkward position. He has arrived ready to do battle but can only fuss and fume. He can do nothing about Jacob's departure, but the theft of the household gods cannot be ignored. Jacob denies any knowledge of the theft and unwittingly pronounces the death sentence on his beloved Rachel. The suspense that builds up during Laban's search is dissipated the moment the reader discovers that the menstruating Rachel is sitting on the household gods (v. 34). There is something ironic about the "gods," revered as sacred, being protected by the ancient taboo of "unclean" associated with blood. Whatever the original significance of these gods, there can be no doubt that the author, for whom idols are nothing but wood and stone, is ridiculing the pagan belief in, and worship of, idols.

31:36–32:3 Jacob's covenant with Laban. Jacob gains an advantage when Laban fails to find his gods. He proceeds to detail his loyal service over against Laban's shabby treatment. Laban seems unimpressed by Jacob's speech, for he continues to assert his ownership of Jacob's wives and children and flocks, but he can do nothing because of God's warning.

The present form of the agreement that Laban and Jacob eventually reach is a combination of two separate covenants, one from the Yahwist source and the other from the Elohist. The covenant in the Yahwist version is a non-aggression pact between Aram and Israel. The sign of the covenant is a mound of stones, and the covenant is sealed by a meal. The Elohist version is drawn from a boundary agreement between Aram and Israel. The covenant is marked by a memorial stone and ratified by a sacrifice and a meal. In both covenants there are wordplays associated with the name of the place where the covenant was ratified. In the Yahwist story, Gilead is a play on the Hebrew word for "mound of stones"; in the Elohist version, Mizpah is so named because it sounds like the Hebrew for "memorial stone."

The episode concludes with Laban returning home and Jacob continuing his journey (32:1-2). Jacob immediately encounters God's messengers. This experience provides the name of the place, Mahanaim ("two camps"). The reason for including this fragment certainly must exceed the meaning of the word, but it is not clear what that purpose is. Does the encounter with God's messengers give Jacob the idea of sending "messengers" to Esau? Of dividing his family into two camps? Does it prepare for the mysterious being Jacob encounters in 32:23-33?

32:4-21 Jacob prepares to meet Esau. We continue to find a blend of the Yahwist and Elohist sources as the narrative moves toward Jacob's meeting with his brother Esau. In the Yahwist story (vv. 4, 14a), Jacob sends messengers to Esau, hoping to gain his favor. When the messengers report that Esau is coming with four hundred men, Jacob is understandably alarmed and divides the camp in order to avoid total disaster. Having taken practical measures, Jacob finally turns to God in prayer. His prayer reveals his state of anxiety as he appeals for God's help by reminding God of the promise.

In the Elohist's account (vv. 14b-22), Jacob seeks to appease his brother with many gifts. The Hebrew for "gifts" and for "camp" recalls the previous wordplay of verse 3 (Mahanaim); the frequent use of the word "face" anticipates the Peniel ("face of God," v. 31) episode that follows.

32:22-33 Jacob wrestles with God. This story, which delays Jacob's encounter with Esau, is generally attributed to the Yahwist.

Jacob, left alone after sending his wives, children, and possessions across the river, is attacked by a "man," with whom he struggles until dawn. Exactly who wins remains ambiguous. The "man" cannot prevail (v. 22) and resorts to wounding Jacob by magic, yet in verse 27 the "man" asks to be released, as if he cannot best Jacob. Jacob demands a blessing but is given a new name. When he asks his mysterious contender for his name, his request is brushed aside. Verse 29 suggests that Jacob won, but in verse 31 Jacob is surprised to have seen God and still be alive. Perhaps the ambiguity is maintained to avoid stating explicitly that Jacob won, for in this story the nocturnal attacker is eventually identified as God (v. 31).

The story incorporates elements drawn from very ancient sources. The theme that one must appease a river-god in some way in order to be allowed to cross a river is often found in ancient folklore. There is also the notion from ancient folklore that the power of certain supernatural beings is limited to nighttime; they must leave or be overpowered when dawn breaks. These ancient elements explain only one level of the story. They leave unanswered questions about the relationship of this story to the larger Jacob cycle.

There is no doubt that the story, in addition to preserving ancient folkloric elements, was given a distinctly Israelite bias. Jacob's struggle is remembered by means of his new name, Israel, which is explained by popular etymology as "one who contends with God." The city of Peniel also receives its name following upon Jacob's struggle, and again popular etymology becomes the vehicle of explanation (v. 31). Finally, the story accounts for the dietary rule that prohibited Israelites from eating the sciatic nerve in memory of Jacob's wounded thigh, but this law is not recorded elsewhere in the Old Testament and Israel did not observe it.

The Yahwist's interest in the story goes beyond any of the concerns mentioned thus far. The Yahwist shows that Jacob, the contender with Esau and Laban, is brought to contend with God's very self and henceforth will never be the same. The character of Jacob is profoundly altered by this experience. From this moment until his death, he is a person of honor and integrity. In addition, Jacob (now Israel) reveals in his life Israel's own struggle with God in living as the people of covenant.

33:1-20 The meeting of Jacob and Esau. It is generally assumed that the Yahwist source is responsible for this final scene in the narrative of Jacob's return to Canaan, though traces of the Elohist can still be discerned. The actual meeting of the brothers turns out to be rather anticlimactic. Jacob's extensive preparations and subservient gestures prove to be effective. Esau no longer wishes to kill him and even expresses great joy at Jacob's return (v. 4). Jacob, for his part, compares his meeting with Esau to his encounter with God (v. 10).

Jacob's subsequent conversation with Esau suggests, however, that neither really trusts the other. Jacob will not allow Esau or Esau's men to accompany him, but persuades Esau to go on without him. Then, rather than follow Esau, Jacob turns in another direction and proceeds to Succoth. Eventually Jacob moves on to Shechem. According to the Elohist insertion in verses 19-20, Jacob buys land in Shechem and sets up a memorial stone to El, the God of Israel. Shechem was a very ancient city, important from the earliest days of Israel's occupation of the land.

34:1-31 The rape of Dinah. This story is basically from the Yahwist but has been supplemented by Elohist fragments. Dinah is raped by Shechem, but he comes to love her and wants to marry her. Hamor, Shechem's father, speaking on his son's behalf, recommends to Jacob and his sons expanded intermarriage and commerce between the Shechemites and the Israelites. Jacob's sons agree to this, on the condition that the Shechemites first be circumcised. Hamor brings the matter before the Shechemites, convincing them that they would benefit economically through intermarriage with the Israelites. The Shechemites agree to submit to circumcision, and while they are recuperating from the operation, Simeon and Levi attack Shechem and kill all the men of the city. Jacob reprimands his sons, but he is motivated more by a fear of reprisal from the neighboring inhabitants than from any moral objection to his sons' method of revenge. Simeon and Levi show no remorse but justify their behavior in avenging the injustice done to Dinah.

The narrative may preserve in story form an actual attack on the city of Shechem by the tribes of Simeon and Levi. In addition, the story may serve to explain the eventual decline of the tribes of Simeon and Levi.

35:1-29 The end of the Jacob cycle. This chapter includes two stories from the Elohist: the story of Jacob's fulfillment of his vow to build an altar at Bethel (vv. 1-8) and the story of the birth of Benjamin (vv. 16-20). The summarization of the life of Jacob (vv. 9-15), the list of Jacob's sons, and the death of Isaac come from the Priestly source. The Yahwist's only contribution is the brief notice about Reuben in verse 22a.

According to the Elohist, Jacob returns to Bethel because of a direct command from God to fulfill the vow he took on his first visit to that city (28:10ff.). The preparations for the trip indicate that Jacob's journey is to be a pilgrimage and may reflect the actual practices later associated with pilgrimages in Israel. The ritual purification before leaving on a pilgrimage includes a formal renunciation of foreign gods and anything associated with pagan cult, such as earrings, which were cultic symbols, or amulets. Changing one's clothes is a common religious symbol of renewal. The "terror from God" (v. 5) that protects Jacob's family is a kind of inexplicable paralysis or panic that renders the enemy incapable of attack (1 Sam 14:15; Exod 23:27; Josh 10:10; etc.). Arriving in Luz, Jacob builds the altar in fulfillment of his vow and renames the place Bethel.

The birth of Benjamin (v. 17) is the fulfillment of Rachel's prayer when Joseph was born (30:24). She would have named the child "Son of my sorrow" (Benoni) because of her pain in bearing him, but Jacob renames the child "Son of my right hand" (Benjamin). In the ancient world it was thought that there was a mysterious relationship between a name and its bearer; a name could determine the destiny of its bearer. Rather than mark the life of the child by the sorrow surrounding his birth, Jacob wisely gives the child a name that suggests an honorable and successful future. The name Benjamin means "southerners" and probably refers to the original geographical location of the tribe. The site of Rachel's tomb is unknown. According to 1 Sam 10:2 and Jer 31:15, it is located in the territory of Benjamin, north of Jerusalem. Thus Ephrath cannot be Bethlehem (v. 19), which is in the territory of the tribe of Judah and south of Jerusalem.

The Priestly author's contribution to the traditions surrounding the patriarch Jacob are limited. They consist of little more than summaries of the earlier traditions found in the narratives of the Yahwist and the Elohist. The Priestly author mentions only what is considered theologically important, making note on the change of Jacob's name to Israel (v. 10) and reiterating the promise given to Abraham (vv. 11-12). The list of names of the sons of Jacob given by the Priestly author (vv. 22b-29) is similar to that found elsewhere in the Old Testament (49:1ff.; Num 26:5ff.; Deut 27:12ff.; 33:2ff.; etc.), but it conflicts with the story of the birth of Benjamin in verses 16-20. For this author, the birth of Benjamin takes place, not in Canaan, but in Mesopotamia, while Jacob is still living with Laban. The Priestly author, who recorded the death and burial of Abraham, now recounts the death and burial of Isaac. Both Jacob and Esau are present at their father's burial (as were Isaac and Ishmael at their father's), for in the Priestly account there has been no break in the relationship between Jacob and Esau.

The reference to the incest of Reuben (v. 22) is but a fragment of an account that must have included Jacob's reaction to Reuben's offensive behavior. It is alluded to again in 49:4, but without any further elaboration that might give us a more complete picture of the event.

36:1-43 The genealogy of Esau. At the conclusion of the Jacob cycle of stories a genealogy of Esau is inserted. This genealogy is actually composed of six distinct lists: (1) verses 1-8; (2) verses 9-14; (3) verses 15-19; (4) verses 20-30; (5) verses 31-39; (6) verses 40-43. The first and second lists are parallel and differ only at the beginning and end. The second list includes grandchildren whose names are repeated again in the third list. The fourth list names the descendants of the original clans that settled in the territory of Seir, later inhabited by the Edomites. These people are called Horites, the biblical designation for the Hurrians. But there is no archaeological evidence that the Hurrians occupied Edomite territory, and the names of the list are clearly Semitic; thus the identity of these ancestors is difficult to determine. The fifth list contains the names of the kings of Edom who reigned prior to the establishment of monarchy in Israel. The sixth list, the clans of Esau, duplicates some of the names of the second list.

It is difficult to determine the historical reliability of any of these lists. The Edomites came east in the thirteenth century B.C.E. with the Ammonites and Moabites. They became a nation before Israel but were conquered and made vassals of Israel by David in the tenth century B.C.E.

The patriarchal sagas begin with a call to venture forth to a strange land with nothing more than a promise. Israel saw in Abraham's journeys its own call to go forth trusting in God. Israel saw in the story of Abraham's faith a testimony to its own faith. Even in the questionable behavior of Jacob, Israel saw its own history. But more important, Israel recognized in these stories God's activity. It saw a gracious God who chose to intervene in our world through a people called to be a special people. This God did not choose a perfect people, but one that, for all its faults, was willing to listen and to follow, and was open to the intervention of the Deity in their lives.

THE JOSEPH STORY

Gen 37:1–50:26

The Joseph story is set apart from the other narratives in the Book of Genesis by its distinctive literary form. It is often referred to as a "novelette" because the narrative is a unified organic whole. From beginning to end, each segment of the story is integrated into the entire narrative. It has its own distinctive theme—peace in the family—but it is also brought into the larger complex of stories. We must be attentive to its unique character, and yet also see it in the context of the entire Book of Genesis.

There is general agreement that the Joseph story has been influenced by the wisdom tradition of Israel. One of the concerns of the wisdom tradition was the success of the individual in life. Success was achieved by diligence and self-discipline. It was important to learn appropriate behavior, self-control, and propriety in speech. In Israel, fear of God was also a necessary factor in attaining wisdom. Joseph embodies all of these characteristics and thus is presented throughout the narrative as a model of wisdom.

37:1-36 Joseph is sold into slavery in Egypt. The Priestly author's contribution to this chapter (vv. 1-2), as in the entire Joseph story, is minimal. Verse 1 is the Priestly author's conclusion to the Jacob story, and verse 2 begins the Joseph story. The Jacob stories began under the caption "These are the generations of Isaac . . ."; likewise, the Joseph story begins with a reference to the generations of Jacob. The Yahwist and Elohist sources, separate at first (vv. 3-4, J; vv. 5-11, E) have been combined to form the climax of the chapter (vv. 12-36, JE).

Each of the three sources gives its own reason for the hostility of the brothers against Joseph. In the Priestly tradition (vv. 1-2), Joseph brings "bad reports" of his brothers to Jacob. The content of the reports is not specified, but the statement reveals the tension existing between Joseph and his brothers. Jacob's partiality for Joseph is the cause of the dissension in the Yahwist tradition (vv. 3-4). The "long tunic" given to Joseph is a sign of Jacob's favoritism and further arouses the jealousy of Joseph's brothers. This garment was a special coat distinguished by its length and its sleeves, not its color. The older translation "coat of many colors" was based on the Greek text of the Old Testament, not on the Hebrew.

The Elohist (vv. 5-11) introduces into the Joseph story a dream motif that is found again in chapters 40 and 41. In the dreams there is no direct address; rather, the dream itself communicates its message when interpreted. The science of dream interpretation developed to assist in deciphering a dream. The ancients held that in some dreams there was a foreshadowing of the future, and this is the sense in which these dreams are to be understood. The obvious import of the dreams—that Joseph would rule over his brothers—further alienates Joseph from them.

Once the characters have been introduced and the situation delineated, the story is set in motion when Joseph is sent on an errand by Jacob to his brothers, who are pasturing their flocks at some distance from Jacob's settlement. The contradictions in the episode are traced to the presence of the two different sources, the Yahwist and the Elohist. In the Yahwist tradition the brothers plot to kill Joseph, but Judah intercedes and the brothers decide to sell Joseph to the Ishmaelites (v. 27). It is Reuben, in the Elohist narrative, who persuades his brothers not to kill Joseph but to place him in a cistern (vv. 21-22). He hopes to return later to save Joseph, but Midianite traders find Joseph and bring him to Egypt.

It is ironic that the brothers relay the news of Joseph's death by using the now blood-stained tunic of Joseph. It once signaled Joseph's privileged status; now it announces his death. Jacob's great grief is vividly portrayed, but rather than end on this tragic note, the scene shifts to Egypt and the sale of Joseph to Potiphar, an official of Pharaoh's court.

38:1-30 Judah and Tamar. Given the importance of the tribe of Judah in Israel's history, it is not surprising to find a story specifically about its founder. The problem with the story is its present location, for it interrupts the Joseph story. But as we shall see, there are some connections between this story and the context in which it is now found.

The story is attributed to the Yahwist, who telescopes an entire generation in a few verses. Judah separates from his brothers, marries a Canaanite woman, and sires three sons who reach marital age rather quickly. The eldest son, Er, marries a Canaanite woman, Tamar. For an unspecified reason he displeases Yahweh and dies. In the ancient world an unexpected death in the prime of life was believed to be caused by sin. According to the levirate law (Deut 25:5-10), Er's brother must marry his widow because Er died without fathering a child. The first son of this union would be legally recognized as the heir of the deceased brother. Judah, therefore, gives his second son, Onan, to Tamar. But Onan is unwilling to raise up a son for his brother and fails to complete the sexual act. Onan dies because he refused to fulfill his obligation to his brother; no moral judgment is passed on his sexual behavior (vv. 9-10). Judah, after losing two sons, is hesitant to give his third son to Tamar. Judah's failure to carry out his duty sets the stage for the next act, in which Tamar has the dominant role.

After his wife dies, Judah journeys to Timnah for the shearing of his sheep (v. 12). Tamar takes advantage of the situation, disguises herself as a prostitute, and seduces Judah. She insists on taking his seal and cord and staff as pledge of payment. The seal functioned as an ancient means of identification. A seal was incised with the special design of its owner and was worn around the neck by means of an attached cord. When Judah sends his servant with the payment, Tamar cannot be found. Rather than embarrass himself further by searching for the woman, Judah drops the matter.

Tamar, as expected, conceives a child by Judah (v. 18). Tamar's pregnancy is made known to Judah, who has jurisdiction in this case because Tamar is betrothed to his third son. He sentences her to death, the punishment for adultery, but at the crucial moment she produces his seal and staff, which identify him as the father of the child. Judah exonerates Tamar and admits that he is at fault for his failure to fulfill the levirate law.

The struggle in Tamar's womb (v. 29), like that of Rebekah (25:21-26), anticipates the future conflict between tribes as one child seeks dominance over the other. The name of each child is associated with the manner of his birth. Perez "pushes" ("breach" in the NAB) his brother out of the way in order to be the firstborn; Zerah gets his name from the "crimson" thread tied about his wrist by the midwife. Through Tamar's bold act, Judah's line is saved from extinction; from that line will come the greatest of the kings of Israel, David.

Few scholars find any connection between the story of Judah and Tamar and the Joseph story. It does appear to be an intrusion into a narrative otherwise concerned with Joseph and his fate. Nevertheless, there are points of contact that should be noted. The same formula ("please verify . . . he recognized") spoken by Jacob's sons to hide their guilt (37:32-33) is used by Tamar to uncover Judah's guilt (38:25-26). The payment of a kid (38:20) by the deceived Judah recalls the goat in whose blood Joseph's garment was dipped (37:31) to deceive his father, Jacob. Finally, Judah's exposure results from his sexual incontinence, whereas Joseph's continence in chapter 39 brings him through seeming defeat to ultimate triumph. The story permits the narrator to contrast the lives of Judah and Joseph; at the same time, it gives Joseph time to journey to Egypt.

39:1-23 The rise and fall of Joseph. The Yahwist narrative of the Joseph story continues by referring the reader back to the moment when Joseph was sold to the Ishmaelites (37:26-27, 28b). Upon arrival in Egypt, Joseph is sold as a slave to an Egyptian (identified as Potiphar in the Elohist tradition). Joseph soon rises to a position of trust, and the Egyptian is blessed with prosperity because of him. In the Yahwist's view, Joseph's success is due entirely to Yahweh. Yahweh's behind-the-scenes presence is felt throughout the Joseph story and gives it its distinctive theological character.

Verses 1-6 set the scene for the attempted seduction of Joseph by Potiphar's wife. The successful and handsome Joseph is noticed by Potiphar's wife. Joseph refuses her sexual advances, for the act of adultery would be a sin against the trust his master has placed in him and a sin against God. The woman is persistent in her demands, so much so that she seizes hold of Joseph one day, and he eludes her only by leaving behind his garment (v. 12). The garment is then used as evidence against him when she falsely accuses him of trying to seduce her. The punishment for adultery is death. Joseph is in the same position that he was in in chapter 37—facing a life-and-death situation. In chapter 37, instead of being put to death he was sold into slavery; in chapter 39, instead of being put to death he is sent to prison. As Joseph had become a trusted slave, so too in jail he rises to prominence and a position of trust. The advance, as before, is attributed to the presence of Yahweh in his life.

The motif dominant in this chapter, that of an indiscreet woman incriminating a man who refuses her advances, is common in world literature. It is interesting to note that one of the closest parallels to this story is an Egyptian version entitled "A Tale of Two Brothers." This story, except for its ending, is similar to the one in Genesis. This is not to suggest, however, that there is direct relationship between the two stories; rather, both find their origin in widely distributed folklore.

40:1-23 Joseph interprets the prisoners' dreams. A return to the Elohist tradition is signaled by the difference in Joseph's position in jail and the presence, once again, of dreams. In chapter 39 Joseph was put in charge of all the prisoners, but in chapter 40 he is depicted as a slave of two noble prisoners, the royal cupbearer and the baker. The cupbearer was the official keeper and taster of Pharaoh's wine, an important position held by the most loyal and trusted of officials. Likewise, the royal baker occupied a prominent position in Pharaoh's court.

As Joseph serves the two officials, he notices their distress and discovers that it stems from the fact that they cannot get anyone to interpret their dreams (v. 8). Dream interpretation was done by professionals in Egypt. In prison these two officials do not have access to dream interpreters. Joseph dismisses their problem by maintaining that dream interpretation belongs to God. After hearing the dreams, Joseph proceeds to interpret them. Both the cupbearer and the baker will have their heads "lifted up" (vv. 13, 19); for the cupbearer this means reinstatement in Pharaoh's court, but for the baker it means death. Within three days the dreams come true. Though Joseph has asked the cupbearer to bring his case before Pharaoh, the cupbearer forgets about Joseph until Pharaoh himself dreams. Thus Joseph remains in prison for two more years.

41:1-57 Joseph interprets Pharaoh's dreams. The Elohist source continues in this chapter until Joseph comes to power in Egypt, at which point the Yahwist version is intertwined with that of the Elohist. Joseph is brought to Pharaoh to interpret his dreams after "all the magicians and sages of Egypt" (v. 8) have failed. Pharaoh tells his dreams to Joseph, not merely repeating verbatim the account found in verses 1-7 but expanding and enhancing the retelling with added detail (vv. 17-24). Joseph, for his part, repeats that dream interpretation comes from God and then proceeds with his interpretation, which is shown to come true by the end of the chapter (vv. 53-57). The symbolism of the dreams fits in well with the Egyptian background of the story. Seven good years, represented by fat cows and healthy ears of grain, will be followed by seven devastating years of famine, depicted as gaunt, ugly cows and shriveled ears of grain. Joseph follows his interpretation with practical advice, which Pharaoh immediately accepts.

In the Elohist tradition Joseph is installed as master of the palace, which puts him in charge of Egypt's finances. According to the Yahwist, Joseph is appointed vizier of Egypt, an even higher office. Joseph is placed in charge of the administration of the land. The ceremony of installation authentically reflects the political and social customs of Egypt. The signet ring was the royal seal kept by the vizier, and the gold chain was probably a ceremonial emblem of office (v. 42). The robes of fine linen and the chariots indicate Joseph's noble status, as do the criers who run before his chariot.

Joseph is completely drawn into the Egyptian royal court. He is given an Egyptian name, Zaphenath-paneah ("God speaks and lives"), and an Egyptian wife. His new name and the fact that he marries the daughter of an Egyptian priest apparently cause no problems for the Yahwist, who simply records it as part of Joseph's new position in Egypt. During the time of prosperity two sons are born to Joseph and are given names that relate to his new life. His previous suffering is "forgotten," so his first child receives the name Manasseh; his present state of prosperity is echoed in the name of the second child, Ephraim, "God has made me fruitful" (vv. 51-52).

The Priestly author's only contribution (v. 46a) tells of Joseph's age. Thirteen years have elapsed since Joseph's entry into Egypt and his rise to power.

42:1-38 Joseph tests his brothers. This chapter is dominated by the Elohist source but is supplemented by a few fragments of the Yahwist (for example, vv. 27-28). The narrative returns to the theme of the relationship between Joseph and his brothers after depicting his rise to power in Egypt. The famine has spread to Palestine, causing Jacob to send his sons to Egypt, for he has heard that food is available there. He does not send Benjamin, Rachel's other son, who presumably has replaced Joseph in his father's affection.

Joseph's dreams (37:5-10) are fulfilled when his brothers bow before him (v. 6). He recognizes them, but they do not recognize him. He begins to play a game with them, the import of which becomes clear only as the story continues. Joseph accuses his brothers of being spies. In their eagerness to defend themselves, they reveal to Joseph what he wants to know about his family. He insists that they bring Benjamin to him to prove the truth of their claim that they are not spies. By this means Joseph can determine whether or not his brothers have changed. Do they bear the same jealous hatred against Benjamin that they once directed against him? They had subjected Joseph to an unknown fate; now he does the same to them.

At first Joseph insists that all the brothers must stay in prison while one of them returns to fetch Benjamin, but finally he keeps only Simeon in prison as a guarantee that the other brothers will return (v. 24). He returns their money to their bags; they will not discover it until later. The conflation of sources is revealed by the contradiction between verses 27 and 35. According to the Yahwist (v. 27), the money is found on the first day of the journey home, but in verse 35 it is found only when the brothers arrive at their destination. The chapter ends on the same note as chapter 37, the lament of Jacob for his favorite son.

43:1-34 The brothers return to Egypt. The tension begun in chapter 42 intensifies in chapters 43–44 until it is resolved in chapter 45. In the narrative of chapters 43–44, we return to the Yahwist source, which accounts for some of the irregularities in the story as it continues. Simeon, imprisoned in Egypt, seems to have been completely forgotten in the opening scene. It also appears that Jacob is only now informed of the condition of their return to Egypt. Only the hopelessness of their situation, coupled with Judah's vow to assure Benjamin's safety, convinces Jacob to allow Benjamin to accompany his other sons to Egypt. Jacob sends gifts with them, hoping to placate the Egyptian official who has so falsely accused his sons.

When the brothers arrive in Egypt (v. 16), everything seems to go well for them. The Egyptian official has provided a banquet for them. Simeon has been returned. Gradually their hesitancy is overcome. Their attempt to return the money found in their bags is brushed off. The money is mysteriously spoken of as a gift from God (v. 23). Though they approach the banquet with a certain wariness, it disappears when they see how Joseph treats Benjamin. Finally they begin to relax and enjoy the festivities. Upon seeing Benjamin, Joseph is overcome with emotion and must leave the room to regain control, yet he still does not reveal himself to his brothers.

44:1-34 Joseph's final test of his brothers. The seriousness of the game Joseph is playing is seen in the final test of his brothers. He instructs his steward to return the money of his brothers and to place his own silver cup in Benjamin's bag. One wonders why the money is returned, for it is never mentioned again in the story; the cup alone serves as incriminating evidence. This cup was a sacred object used for divination. Exactly how it was used is not certain. One possible way was to drop objects into the cup filled with liquid and decipher the resultant rippling of the liquid. Another possibility was to mix oil and water in the cup and examine the patterns created to find their meaning. That Joseph used such a cup does not seem to have bothered the narrator, but divination practices were forbidden in Israel (Lev 19:31; Deut 18:10-11).

The brothers have gone but a short distance when they are overtaken by Joseph's steward (v. 6). They are genuinely shocked when accused of theft. Proclaiming their innocence, they vow death to the thief and slavery for the rest of them if the cup is found in their possession. These extreme punishments are rejected by the steward and later by Joseph himself. The punishment will be slavery, not death, for the thief, and the rest of them will go free. By isolating Benjamin from his brothers, Joseph wants to see whether or not they will allow Benjamin to become a slave and seize the opportunity to go free themselves.

As expected, the cup is found in Benjamin's bag, and the brothers return to Egypt. After a harsh reprimand from Joseph, Judah issues an impassioned speech. We may be surprised that he admits their guilt (v. 16) so soon after maintaining their innocence, but Judah sees in their present situation God's judgment upon them for what they had done to Joseph. They are indeed guilty, but until now they have escaped detection and punishment. Judah's stress on his father's grief at the loss of Joseph and his great fear that Benjamin would not return home become the basis for his request that he take Benjamin's place. Through Judah's speech Joseph learns that his brothers have changed. The murderous hatred that caused them to get rid of him has been replaced by a self-sacrificial concern for Benjamin. Brothers who once were indifferent to their father's grief display great solicitude and will do what they can to spare him further sorrow.

45:1-28 Joseph reveals himself to his brothers. In this chapter the Elohist source is again intertwined with the Yahwist story, giving rise to doublets (vv. 3a/4b) and discrepancies (45:16ff./46:31ff.). But rather than distracting from the chapter, the blending of sources actually adds to the chapter's inner credibility.

With Judah's speech the game has gone as far as it can go. The climax has come—Joseph must act. He is overcome by emotion upon hearing Judah's appeal and decides to reveal his identity at last. His brothers' bewilderment opens the way for Joseph's second disclosure: "do not reproach yourselves . . . . God has sent me here ahead of you" (v. 5). The underlying theology of the Joseph story is made explicit. God has directed and guided the course of events. What the brothers meant as evil, God has redeemed. God is the one who sent Joseph to Egypt to preserve a remnant and to deliver Jacob's family. The terms "remnant" and "deliverance" (v. 7) become important Old Testament terms expressing Israel's conviction that God intervenes in its history and preserves it from total destruction.

Joseph acquits his brothers and they are reconciled (vv. 14-15). The brothers are "able to talk with him" (v. 15), showing how completely the situation of chapter 37 has been reversed (see 37:4). The tension that has been building since chapter 42 is finally resolved. The denouement will include telling Jacob the news that Joseph lives, Jacob's relocation in Egypt, and the meeting between Joseph and his father.

When the brothers reveal to their father that Joseph lives and holds a position of honor in Egypt, Jacob is understandably dumbfounded. But gradually he is convinced of the truth of their claim and decides to go to Egypt. No mention is made of the brothers' guilty deed, for it has been superseded by God's saving intervention.

46:1–47:12, 27-28 Jacob travels to Egypt and settles there. The Yahwist source dominates in the final scenes of the Joseph story, but the Elohist and Priestly authors also contribute to its conclusion. According to the Yahwist, Jacob decides to go to Egypt (45:28; 46:1a), but for the Elohist this trip is taken in response to God's command (46:2-4). This Elohist insertion is different in style and form from the Joseph story. It shifts the focus of the Joseph story from that of the relationship between brothers to Jacob's descent into Egypt, and incorporates the Joseph story into the larger picture of Israel's history as a preparation for the Exodus.

The genealogical insertion of the Priestly author (vv. 6-27) certainly existed independently of its present context. Benjamin, who was a child in the Joseph story, now has ten sons! The list appears to be a summary of the genealogy found in Num 26. The number "seventy" for the descendants of Jacob (v. 27) is arrived at only by including Jacob himself and Dinah among Jacob's descendants. The original purpose of this genealogy cannot be determined, nor is it clear what purpose it serves in the present context. The Priestly conclusion to this genealogy (47:27-28) has been displaced by the conclusion of the Joseph story.

Verse 28 resumes the story interrupted by the Priestly genealogy. The long-awaited meeting between Joseph and his father presents a moving picture. Jacob's joy is complete in being reunited with this son whom he believed to be dead (46:30).

The final scene of the Joseph story takes up the practical consideration of where in Egypt Jacob and his family are to settle. Joseph's diplomatic skills are shown in his instructions to his father and brothers in preparing them for the meeting with Pharaoh (vv. 33-34). The territory of Goshen would have offered suitable grazing land for Jacob's flocks, but would Pharaoh agree to settle these foreigners in an unsupervised border province? Joseph's insistence that the family represent themselves as shepherds is meant to assure Pharaoh of their peaceful intentions as well as to indicate that Goshen would be suitable pastureland away from the city. There is no extrabiblical support for the statement that "shepherds are abhorrent to the Egyptians" (v. 34), but the attitude of distrust between settled peoples and nomads is well attested.

The meeting between Pharaoh and Joseph's family goes better than anticipated. Not only does Pharaoh give them Goshen as the place to settle, but he also suggests that they be appointed superintendents of the royal herds (v. 5a).

The final scene, with Jacob before Pharaoh (vv. 5b-11), comes from the Priestly source. In a polite exchange between Pharaoh and Jacob, the patriarch describes his 130 years of life as "few and hard" (v. 9) in comparison with the 175 years of Abraham's life and the 180 years of Isaac's life. He refers to his life as that of a "wayfarer." The term is often used in the patriarchal narratives (17:8; 28:4; 36:7; 37:1) to describe the lifestyle of the patriarchs, for whom the possession of the land is given only in promise, a promise not fulfilled for generations.

47:13-26 Joseph's land policy. There is no logical connection between verses 13-26 (from the Yahwist) and the previous section; the passage would be more appropriately located following the account of Joseph's rise to power in chapter 41. The passage relates how Joseph's economic policies during the period of famine enabled the Egyptians to survive only by selling their land to Pharaoh and becoming serfs. Only the temple lands were exempt. The situation presented describes accurately the decline of the free peasantry in Egypt. However, the story is remembered, not for its historical interest, but for the picture of Joseph that it presents. He is a wise and capable administrator, able to deal effectively with each new crisis.

47:29–48:22 The blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh. The tradition of Jacob's last days is found in all three sources. In the Yahwist version (47:29-31), Jacob's dying request is that he be buried with his ancestors in Canaan. Jacob's insistence that Joseph take an oath (compare 24:2) that he will do as asked indicates the importance of this request. Burial in the family tomb was not simply a fitting end to one's life but signified a bond with one's ancestors. In addition, for Jacob, burial in Canaan represents a claim to the land and anticipates the day of his descendants' return from Egypt.

In the Elohist tradition (48:1-2, 7), Joseph is called to his father's bedside, repeating essentially the scene found in 47:29. The reference to Rachel's grave in 48:7 is certainly incomplete. Perhaps in the Elohist tradition Jacob requests to be buried with Rachel, unlike the Priestly tradition, in which Jacob is buried in the cave of Machpelah.

In 48:3-6 the Priestly author depicts Jacob's adoption of Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, in terms reminiscent of the promise given to Jacob at Bethel (35:6, 9-12). The tribe of Joseph, early in its history (Judg 5; Num 26:5-51) split into two separate tribes, the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. They settled in the Samaritan mountains and became powerful tribes of the northern kingdom. The adoption scene is meant to show how Ephraim and Manasseh became tribal leaders even though they were not the natural sons of Jacob. By adoption Jacob makes his grandsons full members of the family (Israel) and equal to the other tribes.

A second version of the blessing and adoption of Manasseh and Ephraim is ascribed to the Yahwist (vv. 8-12). Manasseh and Ephraim are not simply adopted as sons, but the future position of the two tribes is indicated in the manner in which Jacob blesses them. Joseph seeks to place the elder under Jacob's right hand, the place of honor, but Jacob crosses his hands, so that the younger is given precedence over the elder. This is a common motif found in the Yahwist (Abel over Cain, ch. 4; Isaac over Ishmael, 17:19-21; Jacob himself over Esau, ch. 27; Perez over Zerah, 38:27-30), and reflects the future destiny of the two tribes, for the tribe of Ephraim will soon surpass the tribe of Manasseh and become the most powerful tribe in the northern kingdom.

The blessing itself is found in two forms: verses 15-16 and verse 20. Both forms use traditional blessing formulas. In verses 15-16 Jacob invokes God as the God of Abraham and Isaac, thus establishing a link between the God worshiped by his ancestors and the God he himself worships. He addresses God as "shepherd," a frequent Old Testament title that suggests God's concern for the people. The third title, "Angel," refers to Jacob's own experience of the Deity as deliverer. The blessing ensures numerous descendants and a glorious future for the tribes represented by Joseph's sons. The blessing of verse 20 is reminiscent of the promise to Abraham (12:3b).

The final verse of chapter 48 is not clear. It appears that Jacob gives a part of the land of Canaan to Joseph. The term translated as "Shechem," referring to the city, also means "shoulder" or "mountain slope." It is not clear which Jacob means, but the city itself is later associated with the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. If the city is meant, then the final phrase presents a problem, for according to chapter 34 Jacob condemned the violence of Simeon and Levi in Shechem. Perhaps a variant tradition of the conquest of Shechem forms the background of this verse.

49:1-27 The blessing of Jacob. In chapter 49, under the fiction of Jacob's deathbed blessing of his sons, we find a rather haphazard collection of sayings about the characteristics and future destiny of the twelve tribes. Some of the sayings are certainly ancient, but the poem itself cannot predate the tenth century B.C.E., for it speaks of the rule of the tribe of Judah, which occurred at that time. The text is corrupt and parts of the poem are untranslatable, compounding the problems of interpretation.

The tribe of Reuben disappeared early as an independent tribe. The saying of verses 3-4 explains its fall from prominence as retribution for Reuben's incestuous crime (35:22). Behind the curses of Simeon and Levi (vv. 5-7) stand the events recorded in chapter 34; the violence of their revenge against Shechem for the rape of Dinah is condemned. The text about Judah (vv. 8-12) is in part obscure. What is clear is the allusion to the future rule of Israel through the tribe of Judah (v. 10). Of the tribe of Zebulun, it is said only that it dwelt by the sea (v. 13). The tribe of Issachar is derided for allowing itself to be lured by the fertile plain, only to become slaves of the Canaanites (vv. 14-15). By a play on words (Dan comes from a Hebrew root meaning "to judge"), the tribe of Dan is praised for establishing justice in its own territory (v. 16). The serpent image in verse 17 is not meant to be derogatory but calls to mind the small tribe's victories over mighty enemies. The tribe of Gad is characterized as successfully defending itself against raiding bands of nomads (v. 19). The tribe of Asher occupied the fertile region north of Mount Carmel, which was noted for its rich produce (v. 20). The saying about Naphtali is obscure (v. 21). The blessing on Joseph (vv. 22-27) stands apart from the rest of the poem because of its distinctive form. It is the only blessing properly so-called, and it appears to be derived from a very ancient fertility blessing. In verses 25b-26a there are direct parallels to Canaanite blessings. The tribe of Benjamin is praised for its might (v. 28).

49:28–50:14 The death and burial of Jacob. The Priestly account of Jacob's deathbed scene (49:1a), interrupted by the "blessing" of chapter 49, is now resumed. It parallels the Yahwist's version of Jacob's request to be buried with his ancestors (47:29-31). The conclusion of the Priestly author (50:12-13) shows Jacob's sons carrying out his last request. According to this tradition, Jacob is buried in the cave of Machpelah, the burial site of Abraham and Sarah.

The death and burial of Jacob from the Yahwist source are found in 50:1-11, 14. The embalming of Jacob's body does not seem to have religious significance but is done simply to preserve the body for the long trip to Canaan. The long mourning period (v. 3b) and the presence of high Egyptian officials in the funeral procession (vv. 7-9) suggest that Jacob was given a kingly funeral. According to the Yahwist, Jacob was buried in the Transjordan (50:10-11).

50:15-21 Joseph assures his brothers. Joseph's brothers fear that he will take revenge upon them now that their father is dead. This scene gives the Elohist the opportunity before closing his story to reiterate the theology that underlies the story of Joseph. What they meant for evil, God meant for good. Joseph insists that what they did to him has been overshadowed and redeemed by God's saving will. They were but instruments in God's plan for the salvation of Israel.

50:22-26 Joseph's death. In the epilogue Joseph's last days are reviewed by the Elohist. Joseph's adoption of Machir's children provides a basis for this tribe's later standing within the Israelite confederacy (Num 32:39-40; Judg 5:14). Joseph's final words about the land of promise are significant. They indicate that though this story ends in a foreign land, the promise given by God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob will be fulfilled. The end of Genesis points to the destiny of Israel: they are to become the liberated people of Yahweh.

CONCLUSION

In the Book of Genesis we have moved from the moment of creation through a history of sin to the call of Abraham, of Isaac, of Jacob, and finally to Joseph and the tribes in Egypt. In these stories we have learned of God's relationship to the world and to Israel. We have learned of God as creator, as judge, as redeemer. We have met a God who accepts the weakness of humanity and continues to love, a God who guides and directs, a God who is able to bring good out of evil. Genesis is only the beginning of the story, the beginning of the acts of God. The story continues not only throughout the Old and New Testaments but in our own lives and our world.

EXODUS

John F. Craghan

INTRODUCTION

The significance of the Exodus

The Exodus or the going out from Egypt lies at the very heart of Israel's faith experience. The God who acted on her behalf was not an insignificant deity of the ancient Near East cut off from reality and relegated to the realm of mythical time. Rather, Israel's God dramatically entered the arena of real time and real people. As the introduction to the Decalogue puts it, "I, the Lord, am your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, that place of slavery" (Exod 20:2). To mention the name Yahweh means to conjure up the image of a totally involved deity. To utter that name is to provide an identity. Yahweh without the Exodus is no Yahweh at all!

The Exodus identifies not only Yahweh but also Israel. Israel emerges as God's people precisely in the Exodus. That event implies that the former Egyptian slaves were different from all their contemporaries. The Exodus with its covenant experience at Sinai distinguishes them as Yahweh's people. The going out, therefore, was a selection process. The author of Exodus 3:7 succinctly expresses that process in these words: "I will take you as my own people, and you shall have me as your God."

The biblical book that captures this twofold identity is the Book of Exodus. It is the biblical document par excellence for exposing Israel's roots. Israel realized that those roots lay outside the Promised Land. However, it is the glory of Israel's writers that her origins could be presented in such a powerful yet intimate way. The Book of Exodus is not simply the record of Israel's itineraries. It is her identity papers, the record of human interaction and divine grace, of human success and failure, and of divine assistance and forgiveness.

The experience captured in the Book of Exodus was never subject to a generation gap. By providing identity, this unique book did not stifle growth. Thus Israel could apply the memory of the first going out to varied but nonetheless precarious situations in her history. In the sixth century B.C.E. Second Isaiah could recount the return from Babylon to Jerusalem as a second Exodus: "In the desert prepare the way of the Lord! Make straight in the wasteland a highway for our God!" (Isa 40:3). In the second century B.C.E. the author of Judith described the overthrow of another threat to Israel's faith (Hellenism in the guise of Holofernes and his troops). Among other things he fittingly depicted his heroine after the manner of Israel at the Reed Sea: "For the Lord is God; he crushes warfare, and sets his encampment among his people; he snatched me from the hands of my persecutors" (Jdt 16:2). In the first century B.C.E. the author of the Book of Wisdom sought to resolve the problem of retribution for the just and the wicked in metropolitan Egypt. He adapted the Exodus experience and concluded: "For by the things through which their foes [the Egyptians] were punished they [the Israelites] in their need were benefited" (Wis 11:5).

No historical account

The Egyptian records are as silent as the Sphinx regarding this key event in Israel's faith experience. And this is hardly surprising. The Egyptian texts envision the greater honor and glory of Pharaoh. Moses' dealings with the handicapped leader of Egypt in the plagues would hardly contribute to the thrust of Egyptian historiography. Moreover, according to a widely accepted view, those involved in the Exodus were a typical phenomenon in the ancient Near East.

The Egyptian records speak of Apiru while those written in Akkadian (an eastern Semitic language) refer to Habiru. These 'Apiru/Habiru are often described as displaced people, disturbers of the peace, malcontents who harassed the ancient Near East during the second and third millennia. Not infrequently these 'Apiru/Habiru hired themselves out as mercenaries. It is also known that these Bedouin also provided a work force for Egyptian building campaigns.

The word "Hebrew" derives from "Habiru." However, one must bear in mind that "Habiru" is originally a sociological, not an ethnic, term. It is significant that "Hebrew" occurs in the Book of Exodus especially when the sojourn in Egypt and the Egyptian oppression are concerned (see 2:11). It is likely that a process of assimilation took place: ancestors of the Israelites who had freely gone down to Egypt later became assimilated to other 'Apiru/Habiru. Since such ancestors were seminomadic herders, they would obviously have resented a change in their lifestyle whereby they were reduced to a slave labor force.

Not only were there several entries into Egypt over the centuries but there were also several departures. The text itself reflects an awareness of several different routes. However, from the vantage point of Israel's faith experience there is only the Exodus. This is the going out led by Moses that also included the theophany at Sinai. It is likely that this group was relatively small. As this event was recited in worship and pondered by Israel's theologians, it gradually took on epic proportions. The small band grew in both size and importance. At the same time it was not simply a question of arithmetic enlargement. It was also a matter of faith perception. All Israel saw herself represented in the small yet expanding group that had managed to break free of Pharaoh's brickyards.

Setting of the Exodus

Although the biblical account provides no historical report in the modern sense of the term, there are some indications of the setting. Most authorities place the Exodus in the thirteenth century B.C.E. According to these authorities the Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites was Ramses II, the great builder of the New Kingdom who reigned from 1290 to 1224 B.C.E. One reason for this view is the testimony of Exod 1:11 that refers to the supply city of Raamses. It is known that Ramses II set up his capital in the northeast corner of the Nile Delta and that the term "city of Raamses" was not used after 1100 B.C.E.

Although some would distinguish Ramses II, the oppressor of the Israelites, from his successor, the Pharaoh of the Exodus, on the basis of Exod 2:23, reliable authors still identify Ramses II as both the oppressor and the Pharaoh of the Exodus. According to this view the Exodus would have occurred around 1250 B.C.E. in an area northeast of present-day Cairo and west of the Suez Canal. At the same time one must frankly note the ongoing study of the Exodus and Conquest date. One recent study, for example, suggests dating these events in the fifteenth century B.C.E.

The type of literature

The Book of Exodus is popular literature. As mentioned above, it is not a sober scientific historical treatise. In the other direction it is the blending of different literary types to correspond to Israel's basic perceptions and attitudes. In the plagues there is clear evidence of legendary embellishment. In the crossing of the Reed Sea there is all the dramatization of an epic account. In the rubrics for Passover the effects of liturgy are obvious. In the Covenant Code (20:22–23:19) and the Priestly legislation (chs. 25–31, 35–40) the legal hand is at work. In 15:1b-18 the songwriter is present. The variety of literary types in this popular literature witnesses to the variety of human efforts to capture a central experience. Israel did it her way and the reader must be willing to accept this fact and thus be enriched in the process.

Given the centrality of the Exodus for Israel's faith, one should not be surprised to find a number of theologians at work. Exegetes usually point to at least three theologians in the composition of this work. The first is the Yahwist (= J) who writes in the tenth century B.C.E. during the heady days of the Davidic-Solomonic kingdom. The second is the Elohist (= E) who reflects a period of religious turmoil and syncretism in the eighth or ninth century B.C.E. The third is the Priestly Writer (= P) who struggles to offer a picture of hope during the debacle of the Exile in the sixth century B.C.E. It would be wrong for the reader to attempt to harmonize their sometimes conflicting views. Rather, the reader must allow such theologians the requisite freedom to interpret. Such a stance recognizes that these writers judged the past in the light of their present and with a view to the future needs of Israel. As the commentary will show, such writers had their prejudices—inspiration does not neutralize the human tendency to impose one's view. Ultimately one must be as open as the Bible itself. It canonized not one party line but indeed a variety of party lines.

New exoduses—new liberations

The Exodus story continues to have an impact today, especially in Latin America, the locus of liberation theology. For liberation theologians the chief task is to reread the text in a new light, that is, against the background of exploitation that has characterized so much of Latin American history. In their view the ancient story of Israel's bondage and subsequent deliverance is as timely as ever. It shows that liberation is a process, not an acquired result. It is an ongoing human concern to uncover the manipulation of fellow humans and to proffer the means of genuine human transformation.

The Exodus story also underlines the need for the emergence of ever new prophets after the manner of Moses. It points up the task of such prophets to make people aware of the real malaise from which they suffer. Such prophets, therefore, must articulate the absence of genuine freedom that modern society so heartily encourages. There are ever new Pharaohs whose claims to divinity must be unmasked. At the same time these prophets are bidden to speak a word of hope. They are called upon not only to transport their people from the brickyards but also to energize them to the radical possibility of a genuine existence where misery is known as evil and hope is recognized as attainable. Moses thus transcends the limitations of the thirteenth century B.C.E. to let God's Word have an ever new impact.

COMMENTARY

PART I: THE EXODUS FROM EGYPT

Exod 1:1–15:21

The first part of Exodus provides both the background for the departure and the actual start of the going out. The final editor of the book (perhaps writing around 400 B.C.E.) has pulled together the work of his principal sources (JEP) as well as some independent traditions. In a spirit of fidelity to these sources and traditions this final editor has chosen not to even out various repetitions and inconsistencies. Nevertheless he has attained a certain unity so that, despite these variations, there is a certain flow to his narrative.

In this first part of his work the final editor seeks to provide answers to the following questions: What brought about the misery experienced by the Israelites in Egypt? What are the credentials of the leader? How did this leader respond to God's call? In what ways did the leader attempt to deal with Pharaoh? What was the final catalyst that provoked the going out? How should Israel continue to celebrate this going out? What happened as Israel journeyed to the Reed Sea? How did God intervene at the Reed Sea?

1:1-7 Israel's growth. The background of this introduction is Gen 46:1-4. This passage sums up the past by referring to the patriarchs (Isaac and Jacob/Israel). It also anticipates the future: namely, Israel will become a great nation in Egypt and God himself will lead them out. At the same time this passage creates tension and raises a problem. What will happen to God's people when they do leave Egypt? But, more fundamentally, how can such a small group become a great nation?

P is the author of 1:1-7. Genealogies and lists are a favorite device of this writer (see Gen 5:1; 6:9). Moreover, the language of verse 7 reflects P's vocabulary ("fruitful," "numerous," "filled"). It is the fulfillment of the command in Gen 1:28: "Be fertile and multiply; fill the earth . . . ." Against the background of Exile this passage is intended by P to offer hope and encouragement to God's despondent people. Their temptation is to disparage the Promised Land and not return from Exile (see Num 14:1-3, 5-10, 26-38). In its present position this passage explains how the small group developed into such a significant number.

1:8-14 The oppression of God's people. This section consists of J (vv. 8-11) and P (vv. 13-14). P states in a rather straightforward manner the results of Israel's fertility, that is, their reduction to the slave labor of building. While this policy was only logical for the Egyptian autocratic state (compare Gen 47:13-26), it was totally opposed to Israel's tradition of freedom. J, however, is not content to register Egypt's usual attitude. He accentuates the threat that Israel posed and the opposite results of Egyptian oppression.

J notes the new policy of the Egyptian government. With the emergence of a new king (whom the tradition chooses to leave nameless) there is a new manner of dealing with the prolific Israelites. Thus the oppression is directly related to the political threat that such numbers imply. One can legitimately ask whether the imposition of slave labor is really calculated to achieve the reduction of the Israelite population. With a certain irony, however, J wryly observes that the Egyptian plan was counterproductive. Instead of limiting the population, the policy only succeeded in encouraging its growth.

1:15-22 The suppression of God's people. E is generally considered the author of this doublet, that is, the repetition of substantially the same account in a somewhat different form. (Here the author prefers "God" ['elohîm] to J's "Lord" [Yahweh]; he also designates the political ruler "the king of Egypt" whereas J opts for "Pharaoh."). Here the manner of defeating God's people is not by oppression—the slave labor of building—but by suppression—the killing of all the baby boys. While suppression would appear to be more apt than oppression for the purposes of population control, it flies in the face of political expediency. Rulers are not likely to deplete their labor force and thus endanger their building programs by killing off the supply of workers. However, in this popular literature it does provide a marvelous setting for resolving the dire situation. The final editor will link E's account with J's birth of the hero in the following chapter.

There are other indications of this popular literature. Although the birth rate is enormous, only two midwives are required to care for the deliveries. Although the Egyptians thought the king was divine and therefore remained secluded from the masses of the people, here two Hebrew midwives have direct access to divine Pharaoh. Moreover, their devious explanation of the increasing population (v. 19) and hence their ability to outwit the sagacious Egyptian monarch are also in keeping with the character of popular literature.

The episode reflects what many critics regard as a motif of the E author, the fear of God (see Gen 20:11; Exod 20:20). It is this emphasis on fear of God (v. 17) that leads to civil disobedience. But the civil disobedience in such a righteous cause is not without its reward. Not only does the nation continue to increase and multiply (v. 20) but so do the offspring of the two midwives (v. 21). Nevertheless, the chapter closes on an ominous note that sets the stage for the birth of the hero.

2:1-10 The birth of the hero. There is a natural propensity to know something about the birth and youth of the hero (compare the theologically oriented infancy narratives of Jesus in Matt 1-2 and Luke 1-2). Humans seek to find extraordinary signs that stamp the person as superhuman right from the moment of birth. For example, Hercules strangles a snake in his cradle. Here J accedes to the needs of his own audience.

The ancient Near East provides certain analogues. Sargon, the great Semitic king who reigned in the twenty-fourth century B.C.E., is described in a legend as follows. His mother placed him in a basket of rushes which she sealed with bitumen. She then cast him into the river upon which he floated until drawn out. There is also an adoption account in which a child is found and then given to a nurse who is paid to keep him for three years. Afterwards the child is adopted and trained as a scribe. It is not unlikely that J's account is also inspired by this adoption story.

The final editor has wisely chosen to connect this passage with E's account of the suppression and thus set the stage for Moses' legend. This arrangement results in having the villain, Pharaoh, caught in his own trap. It is not simply anyone who rescues the baby boy—it is the Pharaoh's own daughter!

Moses is an Egyptian name meaning "is born." In keeping with Israelite sensitivities the name of the Egyptian god is omitted. (Compare Thutmose, that is "the god Thut is born.") This form of Egyptian name was given to children born on the god's anniversary. There is further evidence of Moses' Egyptian background in the Egyptian names borne by members of his family (see 6:16 for Merari and 6:25 for Phinehas). It is also noteworthy that Reuel's daughters in 2:19 refer to the hero as "an Egyptian." However, apart from these notices there is no further information about Moses' background. To be sure, the interest of the Israelite audience lay elsewhere.

2:11-22 The flight to Midian. J, the author responsible for this episode, endeavors to show Moses as a person interested in his own people. He is bent upon foreshadowing or anticipating a problem that will appear later. This problem is the question posed by the Hebrew in verse 14: "Who has appointed you ruler and judge over us?" It is precisely this question of credentials that Moses will have to face shortly. Moses' flight to Midian also foreshadows or anticipates other happenings. Just as Moses has to flee to the desert, so too the people of Israel will head for the desert. Just as Moses encounters God at the mountain (3:1), so too the people of Israel will experience God at the mountain (19:18).

The land of Midian, Moses' home for the time being, is a desert area in the Sinai peninsula. In later traditions (see Num 25:6-9; Judg 6:1–7:25) these desert-dwelling Midianites will become the implacable enemies of Israel. In the present tradition, however, the Midianites and those associated with Moses are related tribes. (Reuel is a tribal name, not a personal name.) Chapter 18 will show how Moses learned many practical things from these Midianites.

J presents Moses as a man with a checkered background. Although J likes stories of wells, for example, Rebecca (Gen 24:15) and Rachel (29:10), he must introduce this lady at the well, Zipporah, as a non-Israelite. Thus Moses is an Israelite of the tribe of Levi (2:1) who is brought up as an Egyptian but who must then flee his Egyptian home only to meet non-Israelites, one of whom he marries. These are hardly the best credentials. Hence the lingering question: With such credentials, will Moses be able to offset the oppression/suppression in Egypt?

2:23-25 The Exodus as lament liturgy. This description is not merely a passing note in the overall story. The final editor has combined the long period of time (v. 23a—probably from E) with the miserable state of the people (vv. 23b-25—a P passage). This state is presented in lament language ("groaned and cried out"). (Note the repetition of this language in 3:7, 9; 6:5.) The verb "to cry out" is the typical expression of the poor and disenfranchised; it is a cry that God cannot ignore. Lament is linked to covenant (v. 25). In covenant theology the people's problem necessarily becomes God's problem; the people's frustration necessarily becomes God's frustration. Liberation always begins by recognizing the plight of the poor.

3:1-6 The burning bush. This scene is a combination of J and E, though mostly J. (E is present in parts of verse 1, for example, "Horeb, the mountain of God," and verse 4b.) This combination of sources is significant theologically, since it indicates the diversity and richness of Israelite tradition. No one tradition could claim an exclusive right to tell the whole story. (This combination of sources will be very evident in the rest of chapter 3.) One should also note that here (v. 1) Moses' father-in-law is Jethro, whereas in 2:18 it is Reuel. Unlike Reuel, Jethro is a personal name. (For further complications see Judg 1:16; 4:11.)

J probably chose the term "bush" (in Hebrew s^{e}neh) in order to connect this scene with Yahweh's mountain (in Hebrew sînai). The burning of the bush is thus linked to the fire of the theophany of Sinai (see 19:18). Hence there is a close association of the Exodus and Sinai right from the very start. What emerges from this scene for J is the twofold dimension of awe and historical continuity. Awe is expressed in Moses' gesture of removing his sandals because of the intrinsic holiness of the encounter with Yahweh—Yahweh's presence sanctifies the ground. Consequently, Moses hides his face. Historical continuity is articulated in verse 6. The God who speaks to Moses has been active over the centuries in his concern for this people. The God of Moses is also the God of the patriarchs (see also 3:16).

3:7-15 The commissioning of Moses. This scene is intimately bound up with the divine revelation at the burning bush. The experience of God is thus related to Moses' function in Israel. Israel's theologians reflected the tradition that regarded Moses as a prophet. He was, therefore, one who spoke on God's behalf to the people of Israel—he was God's spokesperson (see Deut 18:15-20). Faithful to the perception of Moses' prophetic office, both J and E employ the literary genre of call narrative. (See Judg 6:11-21; Isa 6:1-13.) This is not intended to be a blow-by-blow account of what transpired in Midian. Rather, it attempts to communicate the meaning of God's choice for a given audience without excluding some type of original experience. The call narrative builds upon the human need for signs and reassurances.

Both J and E offer somewhat different versions of Moses' call. However, the basic structure is the same: (a) divine response to prayer that presupposes a given difficulty: 3:7 (J), 3:9 (E); (b) God's promise to save: 3:8 (J), 3:10 (E); (c) the commission: 3:16-17 (J), 3:9 (E); (d) Moses' objection: 4:1 (J), 3:11 (E); (e) overcoming the objection by a sign: 4:1-9 (J), 3:12 (E); (f) second objection: 4:10 (J), 3:13 (E); (g) God's final or quasi-final answer: 4:13-16 (J), 3:14-15 (E), 4:17 (E?).

Both J (3:7) and E (3:9) begin by noting the plight of the people in lamentation language ("cry"). In developing the divine promise to save, J and E stress different dimensions of Moses' office. In 3:8 (J) Yahweh is the one who intends to deliver the Israelites, while Moses in 3:16 (J) is dispatched to speak to the people. In 3:10 (E) Moses is sent specifically to bring the Israelites out of Egypt. Although the verb "to send" (vv. 10, 12, 13) designates the prophet as an envoy (see Jer 1:7; 26:12, 15), E appears to allot a much more substantial role to Moses.

J emphasizes not only Israel's deliverance from the Egyptians but also the goal of that intervention: entrance into the Promised Land. That land flows with milk and honey (v. 8). This expression is borrowed from mythology, depicting the land as a veritable earthly paradise. The reference to the Canaanites, Hittites, and others (vv. 8, 17) is to the pre-Israelite inhabitants of the land (for a seven-people enumeration see Gen 15:20-21; Deut 7:1). The Exodus, therefore, is not only a going out—it is also a going up, namely, into the land formerly inhabited by these nations.

The proofs demanded by Moses in the E tradition are significant. In verse 12 the sign to provide credentials for Moses before Pharaoh and Israel is that the people will later meet to worship God on this very mountain. This is an anomaly in the call narrative, since signs occur immediately, not at some point in the future. Perhaps the compactness of the E tradition is the reason for this anomaly.

Moses still needs further proof in approaching the Israelites (v. 13). In the E tradition this proof is the disclosure of the divine name (vv. 14-15). It should be pointed out that for J this disclosure of the name Yahweh (consistently translated "the Lord" in the NAB) demanded no special scene. From the very beginning of his narrative (Gen 2:4b) J uses the personal name Yahweh and in Gen 4:26 onwards presumes that this name is known by humans. Up to this scene in chapter 3, E has simply employed the general word "God" ('elohim in Hebrew—hence the distinction of divine names early became a key criterion in separating the J and E sources). As one might suspect, this scene is theologically central in E's scheme of things. (For P's use of divine names see 6:2.)

For Israel as well as for the ancient Near East, names implied real existence. Something was a reality when one knew its name. The name implied a dimension of intimacy. By knowing someone's name, one was on personal terms with that person. When one comes to the personal name of the God of Israel, however, there are two distinct issues.

The first issue is the etymology of Yahweh (actually the Hebrew text supplies just four consonants [YHWH]—the addition of the vowels a and e is already an attempt at interpretation). The solutions to this etymological problem are legion and no one suggestion commands the field. A popular view is that the divine name is really a causative form of the verb "to be." Hence "he causes to be" = "he creates." The second issue is the meaning that the author of the passage (E) intended. Here one stands on firmer ground, the context itself.

Verse 15 ("The Lord . . . has sent . . .") is the real answer to verse 13, since it provides the name that Moses asked for. Verse 14a ("I am who am") explains the name in terms of being: Yahweh's being means active participation and involvement. According to verse 10 the name means leading the people out of Egypt; according to verse 12 it means assisting Moses. Verse 14b ("I AM sent me to you") links verse 13 ("The God of your fathers has sent me") to verse 15 ("The Lord . . . has sent me"). Yahweh is committed to act on behalf of the people.

3:16-22 Expansion of the commission. In this section from J, Moses is first commissioned to assemble the elders (v. 16) and then to communicate the divine displeasure with the oppression of the Israelites. This commission is then expanded in verses 18-22. Not only Moses but also the elders are to approach Pharaoh (v. 18). This expansion is not a useless appendage. The author is preparing the reader for a twofold exodus: an exodus-flight and an exodus-expulsion. In verse 19 Pharaoh will not permit the people to go unless he is constrained; hence the people will be forced to flee. In verses 21-22 Yahweh will make the Egyptians well disposed toward the Israelites. Indeed, the Israelite women will even receive gifts of jewelry and clothing. Yahweh will so arrange matters that the Israelites finally will be expelled (see 12:35-36).

4:1-9 Moses' objection and subsequent signs. Like E in 3:11-12, J has his tradition of objection (v. 1) and signs (vv. 2-9). In order that Moses may authenticate himself to his people and thus substantiate his claims, there is the need of signs. The signs provided are a staff or type of magic wand (vv. 2-4) and a leprous sleight of hand (vv. 6-8). It is interesting to note that P will later use the J rod-turned-serpent tradition in a different context (7:9-12). In any event, the signs mentioned here are subsequently successful (4:31) and establish Moses' right to speak on behalf of Yahweh.

4:10-17 More objections, replies, and signs. J heightens the enormity of the task given Moses by formulating a second objection. Moses now maintains that he does not possess the wherewithal for public relations because he really cannot communicate (v. 10). Yahweh's reply focuses on divine omnipotence (v. 11). Yahweh promises to provide two things: (a) help in oral delivery and (b) assistance in content (v. 12). These concessions notwithstanding, J's call narrative continues with a final effort on Moses' part to evade his vocation and with a final reassurance on Yahweh's part to support the wavering candidate. There is a certain audacity here but an audacity consonant with the human penchant for escaping responsibility and passing it on to someone else (v. 13). Yahweh's reaction is anger, but, surprisingly, the anger is quickly suppressed, so that Aaron becomes Moses' prophet (vv. 14-15). Thus Moses is to function after the manner of Yahweh, and Aaron will be the divine spokesperson (v. 16; see Deut 18:18; Jer 1:9).

Concerning the staff (v. 17), one is naturally disposed to think of the J tradition in verses 2-4 where the staff is a sign given to Moses to authenticate his mission and dispose the people to accept him. Here, however, the staff is linked to signs. Perhaps this was originally part of the E tradition where here and now signs are lacking (see 3:12).

4:18-23 Moses' return to Egypt. With the exception of verses 18 and 20b this passage is from J. According to E, Moses made the return trip to Egypt by himself (v. 18; see 18:5), but according to J, Moses made this journey in the company of his wife and children (v. 20a). (The presence of Moses' wife and children will be important for the circumcision rite in verses 24-27.) In view of Pharaoh's reluctance to let Israel go (the exodus-flight tradition), J has Moses exercise the office of prophet in verses 22-23: (a) commission ("So shall you say to Pharaoh"); (b) messenger formulary ("Thus says the Lord"); (c) message ("Israel is my son, my first-born"). Pharaoh's refusal to heed the prophetic word anticipates the death of the first-born in the tenth plague (see 11:5).

4:24-26 The circumcision. The J scene, where Yahweh tries to kill Moses, seems linked to the J story of Gen 32:24-32, where Jacob wrestles with Yahweh. In both cases Yahweh suddenly appears in the night as a threatening demonic power. Jacob is on his way to the land of promise, but he must first confront his hostile brother Esau. Moses, too, has received a promise, but he must first confront the hostile Pharaoh.

The Egyptians did not practice circumcision, whereas the Hebrews apparently did. Although some see this scene as an apotropaic act on the occasion of a marriage—that is, designed to ward off all dangers on such an occasion—it is at least conceivable that Moses' lack of circumcision caused an infection. Zipporah's action would then have saved his life and have given rise to the expression "a spouse of blood." In any event, J has Zipporah circumcise her husband because, given the Israelite practice, it was not fitting for the great leader to be uncircumcised.

4:27-31 Meeting between Moses and Aaron. Aaron is a somewhat enigmatic character, yet this early tradition (J) seems constrained to associate him with Moses. In verse 30 it is Aaron who performs the signs, but according to the J tradition in 4:2-9, it is Moses who is to perform them. Nonetheless, the outcome is positive. In verse 31 the people are convinced and, rejoicing, they bow down and worship. J, however, feels compelled to express their fickleness or lack of real faith, for in the following scene the people will grumble. For J, the people genuinely believe in Yahweh and his servant Moses only in the aftermath of the Reed Sea event (see 14:31).

5:1–6:1 First audience with Pharaoh. Now that the Israelites have heard and accepted Yahweh's message as presented by Moses and Aaron, it is time to have the leaders approach Pharaoh with a view to negotiating their release from Egypt. This well-constructed J story consists of six scenes, five of them opening with a verb of action.

The first scene (5:1-5) begins with the report that "Moses and Aaron went." Verse 2 poses a question that the rest of the story will develop: Who is Yahweh? The three-day journey into the desert is probably connected with the exodus-flight tradition. According to the tradition preserved in chapters 15–19, there are only three days or camps between Egypt and Sinai (15:27; 16:1; 17:1; 19:2). This scene provides a realistic attitude toward a labor force, namely, not to allow the slaves to get away and so keep them at their work. Such an attitude rejects E's view of a suppression in 1:15-22.

The second scene (5:6-9) has Pharaoh speaking to the Egyptian taskmasters and the Hebrew foremen. (This deployment of foreign labor, whereby the taskmasters are Egyptian and the foremen members of the subject people, is historically accurate.) Unlike the rest of the scenes, here there is no verb of action, since one cannot expect the divine Pharaoh to go out to his underlings. The bricks in question are adobe—unburnt bricks dried in the sun.

The third scene (5:10-14) begins with a verb of action ("So the taskmasters . . . went out") and brings together the taskmasters, the foremen, and the people. The people are forced to look for straw while the foremen are flogged because the people cannot produce.

The fourth scene (5:15-19) has the Hebrew foremen before Pharaoh. Popular literature permits, indeed demands at times, the interaction of the divine Pharaoh with such underlings, in this case the depressed foremen. Once again the scene opens with a verb of action ("Then the Israelite foremen came"). However, the outcome of the meeting is less than what the foremen hoped for. The quota must remain the same but still no straw!

The fifth scene (5:20-21) focuses on the foremen and Moses and Aaron. Once again there is a verb of action whereby the foremen bump into the two leaders ("they . . . came upon . . . ."). The less than accidental encounter does not augur well for the two leaders. They are the recipients of nothing less than a curse: "The Lord look upon you and judge!" The start of Moses' grandiose plan is hardly optimistic, and the future looks dismal indeed.

The sixth scene (5:22–6:1) has Moses appealing to Yahweh. The verb of action in verse 22 (in Hebrew "and he returned") is expressed by the English adverb "again." The scene depicts a discouraged Moses, indeed a typical Moses, who will not cease to badger Yahweh with his complaints. One is hardly surprised, therefore, that he was hesitant about accepting his office. In any case, Moses learns that Yahweh will intervene dramatically. The reader is naturally set for the first plague. However, P chooses to review the call of Moses.

6:2-13 P's commissioning of Moses. Although P knew of J and E traditions of Moses' call in chapters 3–4, he opts to provide his own version of that call. In response to the people's lament in 2:23b-25 and in light of the setbacks in 5:1–6:1, the call of the prophet is the guarantee of support for God's chosen one and, at the same time, the overcoming of oppression/depression for God's chosen people.

For P it is a question of both continuity and discontinuity. The God who speaks to Moses is the same God who appeared to the patriarchs. However, there is a difference; that God did not reveal his personal name Yahweh to them. Instead, he employed "El Shaddai" (translated "God the Almighty," "God of the mountain," "God of the steppe," or "God of the breasts"). Unlike 3:14-15, this passage (see vv. 6-8) does not entail a personal honor for Moses that provides credentials. It is a special communication that looks to alleviating Israel's pain. For P there is only one covenant in question, the one made with Abraham in Gen 17. This scene, therefore, creates tension: the ancient promise and the present lack of fulfillment. That lack will now be addressed.

In commissioning Moses, P adopts the same basic call narrative as J and E: (a) divine response to prayer (v. 5); (b) God's promise to save (vv. 6-8); (c) the commission (vv. 9-11) (the commission to the people is only alluded to); (d) Moses' objection (v. 12, repeated in verse 30); (e) overcoming the objection (7:1-5).

Verses 6-8 are an oracle of salvation, a literary genre at home especially in the prophetic literature of the sixth century B.C.E. Against the background of P's setting of the Exile, such an oracle provides hope and lays a new foundation for Israel's faith. It shows that the God who judges is also the God who delivers. More important, this bestowal of grace is not bound up with the success of institutions in the past. Paradoxically, Israel's lack of success cannot defeat God.

The expression "I am Yahweh" is typical of P. This is royal style, such as is used at the beginning of royal inscriptions. It was taken over and used as a self-introduction in liturgy (see 20:2). It suggests that "I am here, present and acting." It is a formula that calls for responsive action on Israel's part. (See the Holiness Code in Lev 17–26, for example, 19:4.) For P as well as for the priestly school of theologians, God's interventions on behalf of Israel are clear clues to the identity of this God (see Ezek 20).

6:14-30 Genealogy of Moses and Aaron. P has interrupted the account of Moses' commissioning to insert this genealogy. (An indication of the insertion is the repetition of the last line before the insertion [see vv. 13 and 26-27].) Although some tend to find genealogies rather boring and hence skip over them, one should observe their usefulness. They represent a form of survival—the tribe, for example, takes care of all its members. They provide identity—they tell a person who he or she is. They indicate status—for example, they inform the king as to his lineage. They structure history—they are the parameters of human and/or divine activity.

Here it is clear that P is really interested in the tribe of Levi. He rushes past Reuben and Simeon to get to Levi (vv. 14-15—all three were Leah tribes [see Gen 29:31-34]). Both Moses and Aaron are sons of Amram (v. 20) and ultimately descendants of Levi. Although P makes Miriam the sister of both Aaron and Moses (v. 20), Exod 15:20 makes her the sister of only Aaron. (Note also the opposition of Aaron and Miriam to Moses in Exod 32 and Num 12.)

Originally "Levite" was a secular name, meaning "member of the tribe of Levi." Only at the end of a long process was it changed into a designation for a somewhat lowly person who performed menial cultic tasks (see 28:1-43). By emphasizing Aaron, P intends to establish a claim for the legitimacy of the group of priests that ultimately controlled the temple in Jerusalem. (P has passed over other ancient priestly families such as the Mushites mentioned in verse 19.) For P, therefore, this genealogy has served to provide identity and undergird the status of Aaron's descendants.

7:1-7 Reassurance and compliance. In answer to Moses' objection about his speaking abilities (6:13, 30), P has Yahweh reassure Moses that he will have a quasi-divine function (the Hebrew 'elohim can mean someone other than God—see Ps 45:7 vis-à-vis the prophet Aaron). The outcome of divine intervention will be that Yahweh will actually lead Israel out of Egypt (vv. 4-5). However, this intervention will also provoke Egyptian recognition of Yahweh's real identity: "so that the Egyptians may learn that I am the Lord . . ." (v. 5).

The literal translation of the beginning of verse 3 is "But I will harden Pharaoh's heart."

For the biblical writers the heart was the organ of thinking and willing (see Isa 6:10; 29:13) that focused on the person as the thinking and willing subject. It should be noted that Exodus employs three different ways of expressing the hardening of Pharaoh's heart: (a) Pharaoh's heart was hardened (7:13, 14, 22; 8:15; 9:7, 35); (b) Pharaoh hardened his (own) heart (8:11, 28); (c) Yahweh hardened Pharaoh's heart (7:3; 9:12; 10:1, 20, 27). Exodus, therefore, admits both human freedom and divine omnipotence. Like the rest of the Bible, Exodus attempts no explanation of that admission.

Besides noting the compliance of Moses and Aaron in verse 6, P goes on to record the ages of the two leaders. This fits in with his overall chronological interests. After the forty-year wandering, P later mentions that Moses died at the age of one hundred and twenty (see Deut 34:7).

7:8-13 Introduction to the plagues. In this scene P mentions the first demonstration of Yahweh's power before Pharaoh, since for him this is the first meeting between Pharaoh and Yahweh's emissaries (for J see 5:1–6:1). As noted earlier, P has changed Moses' staff from an authenticating instrument before the people (see J in 4:2-4) to a permission-seeking device before Pharaoh. Not surprisingly, Aaron has a key role to play. As Yahweh foretold (see 7:4), Pharaoh refuses to comply, despite Aaron's serpent-consuming staff.

This introductory scene should serve as a guide of sorts in approaching the plagues. A staff turned into a serpent and a river changed to blood are indications of the world of folklore, not of scientific explanations. Nonetheless, interpreters have sought a so-called natural explanation of the phenomena. According to the cosmic interpretation, a comet made contact with the earth, bringing in its wake red dust, small meteorites, earthquakes, etc. According to the geological explanation, a violent eruption of a volcano in the fifteenth century B.C.E. caused a tidal wave the aftereffects of which brought about the plagues. According to a third view, there was a natural succession of catastrophes beginning with an exceptionally large flooding of the Nile in July and August and culminating with a sirocco in March or April that killed off the remaining first fruits, not the first-born.

Ultimately, however, one must conclude that the biblical writers had only an imperfect knowledge of Egyptian matters. For example, locusts (the eighth plague) are known both in Egypt and Israel. However, the red Nile (the first plague) and frogs (the second plague) are known only in Egypt, while hail (the seventh plague) is exceptional in Egypt but not in Israel.

The biblical account itself contains doublets and inconsistencies, thus precluding a scientific exposition and suggesting a popular-literature approach. Thus the fourth plague (the flies) is a doublet of the third plague (the gnats). Similarly, the sixth plague (the boils, an epidemic affecting livestock and humans) is a doublet of the fifth plague (the pestilence, that is, the livestock epidemic). With regard to consistency, one may raise some questions. If all the livestock were killed in the fifth plague (9:6), then how could they have been affected by boils in the sixth plague (9:10), hail in the seventh plague (9:25), and death of the first-born in the tenth plague (12:29)? If frogs already covered the land of Egypt (8:2), how could the magicians repeat the feat (8:3)?

Before moving on to the question of the literary arrangement of the plagues, one should note that the presence of E is doubtful in these accounts. Hence one speaks more cautiously of JE, a combination of the Pentateuch's earliest written sources, rather than further distinguishing them as J or E. As for distribution, the final editor has taken five plagues from JE alone (the fourth, fifth, seventh, eighth, and ninth), two from P alone (the third and sixth), and three from a combination of JE and P (the first, second, and tenth).

The differences between JE and P touch on several points. With regard to roles, JE has Moses appear simply as a prophet, whereas P has Aaron play the principal part, so that Moses is upstaged. Concerning formulae, JE has Moses employ the messenger formula, while P has Yahweh speaking to Moses, who then speaks to Aaron. Finally, in terms of character, for JE the plagues are genuine afflictions to chastise Pharaoh for refusing to let the people go. For P, however, they are signs and wonders that legitimate Moses and Aaron as representatives of Yahweh, not scourges as such. (Compare the plague of gnats [8:12-15—P] with that of flies [8:16-28—JE].)

The presence of the different biblical traditions raises some further questions: How did the final editor put everything together? Did he hope to attain something concrete? If so, what indications are there?

In seeking to answer these questions, one must keep two points in mind. First, the plague account really begins in 7:8-13 because this scene contains the same outlook and vocabulary as the plagues themselves. Second, the tenth plague (the death of the firstborn) is excluded here, since its make-up and literary characteristics are different. The result is that there are ten episodes: the introduction in 7:8-13 and the nine plagues (7:14–10:29). Moreover, they are arranged concentrically so that the introduction, the first plague, etc., have counterparts of approximately the same length and with the same formula in the ninth plague, the eighth plague, etc. (Compare 8:12-15 with 9:8-12.) This concentric arrangement is not haphazard. It is intentionally designed to indicate definite progress as one reads the remainder of the story.

The plague account is not so much a series of devastations as it is a series of disputes between Pharaoh and Moses linked to the question in 5:2: "Who is the Lord that I should heed his plea to let Israel go?" The failure of Moses and Aaron in these dealings with Pharaoh is not decisive, since the story continues in the Reed Sea account. These plagues look to an even greater wonder at the sea.

7:14-25 First plague: water turned into blood. The final editor has combined JE (vv. 14-18, 20b-21a, 23-25) and P (vv. 19-20, 21b-22). According to JE it is the Nile, the river, that will be affected. Moreover, JE makes reference to the general death of the fish and the subsequent pollution. According to P, however, the waters of all Egypt are affected (v. 19), not just the Nile.

In terms of progress, one must note that the Egyptian magicians are able to match the feat performed by God's emissaries (v. 22). With regard to Pharaoh, the recognition demanded of him is relatively simple: "This is how you shall know that I am the Lord" (v. 17). As the plague account continues, there will be significant differences on both scores.

7:26–8:11 Second plague: the frogs. Both JE (7:26-29; 8:4-9a) and P (8:1-3, 11b) are unmistakably present in this account. As with the first plague, this episode reveals that the Egyptian magicians are still able to match the feats performed by Moses and Aaron (8:3). However, there are other differences. Now Pharaoh actively seeks out the intercession of Moses (8:15), although he remains adamant in the end (8:11). Besides, the recognition now demanded of Pharaoh is more embracing than 7:17: "That you may learn that there is none like the Lord, our God" (8:6).

8:12-15 Third plague: the gnats. In this account, which is solely from P, there is clear evidence of progress. Unlike the first two plagues, this plague is one which the Egyptian magicians are incapable of reproducing. In the magicians' report to Pharaoh there is the further observation: "This is the finger of God" (v. 15). However, as Yahweh had predicted, Pharaoh chooses not to let Israel go.

8:16-28 Fourth plague: the flies. This passage from JE seems to presuppose that the Egyptians are not very remote from the Israelites, since the former would be able to view the sacrifices offered by the latter (v. 22). This note is somewhat surprising, since the author claims a distinction for the Israelites, namely, that the plague will not affect the land of Goshen (v. 18). Hence the Egyptians and the Israelites do not live side by side. In any event, the animal sacrifices of the Israelites would upset the religious sensitivities of the Egyptians. Perhaps this is because animals had a conspicuous place in Egyptian religion or because the sacrifice of whole animals was not the usual practice among them. What is significant here is, first of all, the acknowledgment by Pharaoh "that I am the Lord in the midst of the earth" (v. 18). Thus Pharaoh is to admit that Yahweh is present in Egypt. Second, the permission for the three-day trip is for a point in the desert that is not too far away (v. 24). Once again Moses is to pray on behalf of the mighty ruler of Egypt. Clearly there is development in Pharaoh's character.

9:1-7 Fifth plague: the pestilence. In this JE account one must note that there is no negotiation between Pharaoh and Moses after the start of the plague, as in 8:21. However, in keeping with the preceding plague, there is the distinction between the Egyptians and the Israelites. The pestilence will strike Egyptian, not Israelite, livestock. One can see that in this account Pharaoh takes pains to be assured that this distinction is really so (see vv. 6b-7a).

9:8-12 Sixth plague: the boils. In this P account it is somewhat astonishing that Aaron plays a relatively minor role, that of Moses' assistant. In terms of development, what emerges is the downward spiral of the magicians. Although they were able to match the first two plagues, they were unsuccessful in the third and were forced to admit the work as God's doing. Here the final editor has so arranged matters that the magicians are singled out for their lack of uniqueness. They too suffer from the skin disease and are unable to stand in Moses' presence (v. 11).

9:13-35 Seventh plague: the hail. In this JE account there is an explanation given for the failure of the previous plagues to induce Pharaoh to relent. Yahweh has acted this way to show his power and to make his name resound throughout the earth (v. 16). One almost expects Yahweh's final and decisive act here and now. While even this plague does not bring Pharaoh to grant the necessary permission to leave, it does contribute to the unfolding character of the divine ruler of Egypt.

There is the notice in verse 14 that Pharaoh (as well as his subjects) is to confess that there is no one like Yahweh anywhere on the earth. This is followed in verse 27 by the mea culpa of Pharaoh: "I have sinned again! The Lord is just; it is I and my subjects who are at fault." This is truly a remarkable confession. Finally there is the statement that the plague of hail will induce an even greater confession, namely, that the earth is Yahweh's (v. 29). The God of Israel is receiving a more fitting recognition from the mighty Egyptian god, Pharaoh himself.

10:1-20 Eighth plague: the locusts. This JE account opens with an explanation of the hardness of heart of Pharaoh and his servants. This obduracy is calculated to demonstrate Yahweh's might and to provide an ongoing tradition of those exploits in the Israelite community (vv. 1-2). The author makes special mention of Moses' actual going to Pharaoh and dwells upon Yahweh's vexation: "How long will you refuse to submit to me?" (v. 3b). For the first time one learns that Pharaoh's servants are becoming exasperated to the point of urging their king to exercise restraint and so be reasonable (v. 7). The result of this intervention is that Moses and Aaron are recalled to Pharaoh's court (v. 8). In this scene, the author points out Pharaoh's suspicion that a conspiracy of sorts is underway, since Moses petitions for the whole Israelite community to take part in the desert worship (vv. 10-11).

The progress in depicting Pharaoh's change of character is found in vv. 16-17. After the speedy summons there is the clear protestation of sin: "I have sinned against the Lord, your God, and against you." Thus Pharaoh has advanced in his awareness of Yahweh's presence and power from the time of the first plague. After the customary request for forgiveness and the successful outcome of that request, there is nonetheless the concluding remark that Pharaoh remains adamant and so the people remain in Egypt.

10:21-29 Ninth plague: the darkness. Many connect this darkness with a typical Near Eastern phenomenon, the khamsin. This is a hot wind that blows off the desert in March and April, bringing darkness and a very oppressive atmosphere in its wake. In the biblical account such darkness takes on a more foreboding character inasmuch as it suggests the evil powers of chaos. Such a character matches the thrust of this JE account. There is exasperation leading to the breaking off of any further negotiations (v. 28). Pharaoh is now willing to let all Israel leave for purposes of worship (contrast 10:11), but not the livestock (v. 24). Moses reacts to such permission rather ironically. He points out that animal sacrifices are a part of their worship and hence required. However, since the sacrificial animals can be determined only upon arrival at the place of worship, it is, therefore, necessary to bring all the livestock along. Pharaoh's response to Moses' ironic request is the cessation of all further negotiations. An impasse has been reached, one which will result in Moses' death if he should attempt to appear once again before Pharaoh. To be sure, a new way must be found to force Pharaoh's hand.

11:1-10 Tenth plague: the death of the first-born. Given Moses' seemingly final appearance before Pharaoh, the reader expects a quick dash to the sea and then the trek in the desert. In other words, the writers up to this point have created suspense, and the reader naturally anticipates release of tension and denouement. To the contrary, there is another (and final) plague that is totally out of character with the previous nine. (Actually the scene at the Reed Sea does not presuppose the tenth plague.) The reader now becomes bogged down, not in a Sea of Reeds, but in a whirlpool of rubrics. There is the sudden command to prepare for liturgy, not the expected bolt for freedom. Presumably the biblical writers had a reason for the temporary demise of narrative and the exaltation of liturgy.

The death of the first-born does not come as a total surprise. In 4:23 Yahweh addressed Pharaoh through Moses in these terms: "If you refuse to let him (Israel, Yahweh's first-born) go, I warn you, I will kill your son, your first-born." Neither does the plundering of the Egyptians come as a complete surprise. In 3:21-22 the Israelites were assured that they would not leave Egypt empty-handed. However, 11:1-3 (either J or E), belonging to the exodus-expulsion tradition, assumes that this tenth plague is really the one and only plague. How else could the Israelites get silver and gold ornaments and clothing from the Egyptians? How else can one explain Moses' prestige with Pharaoh's servants and Egypt as a whole?

The literary arrangement of verses 4-8 (from J; verses 9-10 from P) suggests that this plague is not linked to the previous nine. J usually informs the reader that Moses is to speak to Pharaoh, but in verse 4 it is not clear to whom Moses delivers the divine message. Up to verse 6 the recipient seems to be Israel, but in verses 7-8 Pharaoh is addressed. At the end of verse 8 Moses leaves Pharaoh's presence in a rage. But according to 10:29 (JE) he was never again to appear before Pharaoh. Although some posit a historical link—an epidemic that struck the Egyptians and hence facilitated the departure of the Israelites—it is not unreasonable to conclude that the tenth plague has been contrived to connect with the feast of the Passover.

12:1-20 The Passover ritual. In this rubrical section P provides details for a feast that was already old among seminomadic shepherds of the ancient Near East. It was an offering by such shepherds for the welfare of their flocks when the tribe set out to search for new pasture grounds. This was in the spring and indeed at a very critical time in the life of the flock. This was the time when the young of the sheep and the goats would be born. Indications of the antiquity of the feast are the following: no priests, no sanctuaries, no altars.

Other details fit in with this pastoral background. The animal is roasted, not boiled (v. 9), since cooking utensils are at a minimum. Perhaps this explains why the bones are not broken (vv. 9, 46). The time is the twilight of the first full spring moon (v. 6). This coincides with the return of the shepherds to the camp on the brightest night of the month. The unleavened bread (v. 8) is the ordinary bread eaten by such shepherds, and the bitter herbs (v. 8) are the desert plants used by these shepherds for spices. The clothing and attire suit this background: "with your loins girt, sandals on your feet and your staff in hand, . . ." (v. 11). The blood rite (v. 7) is apotropaic in purpose, that is, the smearing of the blood on the tent poles is intended to ward off all danger to the members of the tribe and especially to the young about to be born. This danger is personified in "the destroyer" (v. 23). The blood, therefore, prevents him from striking humans and animals.

It is the blood rite that establishes the link between the tenth plague and the Passover. "The destroyer" is now subject to a new interpretation arising from Israel's history. Yahweh will go through the land of Egypt, striking down the first-born of both humans and beasts (v. 12). But when Yahweh sees the blood on the houses, "the destroyer" will not be permitted to strike. Rather Yahweh will "pass over" (v. 13).

While the etymology of "passover" is far from clear, the meaning of the term for Israel is abundantly clear. "To pass over" means "to spare, protect, deliver." What Israel did, therefore, was to interpret the ancient feast of seminomadic shepherds in terms of her own relationship with Yahweh. It was no longer the quest for a temporary pasture but for the final pasture, the Promised Land itself. The ancient feast with its focus on change lent itself admirably to interpreting the change in Israel's destiny. The shepherds were now a people in flight (v. 11). (For the unleavened bread in verses 14-20 see 13:3-10.)

12:21-28 Promulgation of the Passover. In this J passage (with the exception of P in verse 28) Moses approaches the elders, those leaders responsible for carrying out Yahweh's command. Here the emphasis is principally on the blood rite. Hand in hand with the sprinkling is the prohibition to go outdoors until morning (v. 22) because of the nocturnal devastation.

The rubrics in verses 24-27a are significant for Israel's abhorrence of any and every form of generation gap. Those taking part in the original Exodus and all subsequent Israelite communities are linked together in this pivotal experience. The question asked by the children in verse 26 is not one of mere historical interest. It is a contrived question designed to interpret the past in view of the present. To be sure, Yahweh spared the Israelites but crushed the Egyptians. But the happenings of the thirteenth century B.C.E. affect the present community: "When he struck down the Egyptians, he spared our houses" (v. 27a). To celebrate the Passover means to span generations and coalesce in an experience explaining and unifying the entire people.

12:29-39 Death of the first-born and departure. J, the author of these verses, follows up the exodus-expulsion tradition of 11:1-3. The death of the first-born has been so grave that Pharaoh summons Moses and Aaron at night (v. 31). There is no longer the hesitancy to keep the livestock from going along (v. 32; see 10:24). Indeed the devastation has been so severe that the Egyptians urge the Israelites to advance their timetable. The haste in this departure is reflected in the condition of the bread. The Israelites were so rushed that their dough was not leavened (v. 34), and, consequently, they had to be satisfied with unleavened loaves (v. 39). (P in verse 15 gave no reason why the people would eat such bread for seven days.) Finally, in keeping with the exodus-expulsion tradition, the Israelites asked the Egyptians for silver and gold articles as well as clothing. However, the despoiling went far beyond such limitations. The Israelites ended up by getting from the Egyptians whatever they wanted (v. 36).

J mentions the first destination and the number of people involved. Succoth lies thirty-two miles southeast of Raamses and is approximately in the middle of the isthmus between the Mediterranean Sea and the Gulf of Suez. J sets down the number as "about six hundred thousand men on foot, not counting the children" (v. 37). This would imply a population of some three million men, women, and children. While it is probable that the Hebrew word for "thousand" originally meant a subsection of a tribe and hence a total number of five thousand or six thousand, the epic nature of this popular literature emphasizes the larger number. "A crowd of mixed ancestry" (v. 38) suggests that non-Israelite elements of the slave labor force also departed Egypt in the company of Moses.

12:40-51 Chronology and further Passover regulations. In verses 40-41 P reveals his penchant for chronology. He calculates the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt as a period of 430 years (see Gen 15:13). The complexity of the biblical data, however, demands greater precision. In view of such data this sojourn was not necessarily continuous, made by the same group, and comprising the entire people. From a theological viewpoint P reveals a God absorbed in the real life of his people. Yahweh acted at a precise moment in time. Consequently, Yahweh's keeping vigil at the moment must be reflected in Israel's keeping vigil on this occasion each year.

P also provides additional Passover regulations, relating chiefly to admission to the Passover celebration. (Such regulations presuppose a setting where Israel is already leading an agricultural existence in the Promised Land.) Transient aliens (v. 45) and hired servants (v. 45) are excluded; their existence in the land was not so firmly rooted. Resident aliens (v. 48) and permanent slaves (v. 44) may take part in the celebration, provided they have been circumcised (see Gen 17:13). The celebration is further depicted as a domestic one (v. 46) which "the whole community of Israel" (v. 47) is to keep. This is a favorite P expression stressing the organization of Israel, especially in the desert, and underlining those responsible within this organization.

13:3-10 Feast of Unleavened Bread. 13:1-16 has been judged to reflect the language of the Book of Deuteronomy. However, its language is more proto-Deuteronomic, that is, an incipient style that would eventually culminate in the more developed language found in Deuteronomy. In its present context, this tradition deals with two matters: (a) the redemption of the first-born (vv. 1-2, 11-16); (b) the feast of Unleavened Bread (vv. 3-10).

Unlike Passover, which required no sanctuary and was celebrated at home, Unleavened Bread was a pilgrimage feast that required the attendance of the adult male at the sanctuary (see 23:15). Whereas Passover was the feast of seminomadic shepherds, Unleavened Bread was the feast of farmers. The feast expressed newness, noting the beginning of the barley harvest (the first crop to be gathered). For the first seven days of this harvest, one had to eat bread made from the new grain. Such bread was unleavened or unfermented because it contained nothing of the previous year's harvest. Since this feast presupposes an agricultural environment, it was adopted by the Israelites (possibly from the Canaanites) only after their desert experience.

It was only later that the feasts of Passover and Unleavened Bread were joined together. This was probably around the time of King Josiah (the second half of the seventh century B.C.E.—2 Chr 35:17). Since both feasts occurred around the same time of the year and since both likewise made use of unleavened bread (but for different reasons—see 12:8), they were eventually combined.

Whereas J in 12:34 connects the unleavened bread to the haste of the Exodus, the author of 13:8 attaches a more personal note: "This is because of what the Lord did to me when I came out of Egypt." This flows from the concept of remembrance expressed in verse 3. To remember means to relive, to make actual/meaningful now. Hence the feast is not the static recalling of the past but the dynamic reliving of the past because of its repercussions on the present.

13:1-2, 11-16 Redemption of the first-born. It is interesting to observe that this tradition is not attached to the Passover account itself but to the deaths of the first-born of the Egyptians. Similarly, other texts (for example, 22:28-29) do not link the redemption of the first-born to the Exodus experience (v. 15).

The practice of "buying back" the first-born reveals Israel's concern for human life and her special treatment of the first-born. Although Israel was aware of the sacrifice of the first-born among her Canaanite neighbors, she revolted against such a practice (see Gen 22:1-19). Rather, she viewed the first-born both of humans and of animals as God's exclusive property. Consequently, they had to be bought back (see Luke 2:23).

After hearing that the Israelite must buy back his first-born, one tends to think that God's act of redemption is merely that—a buying back. One is prone, as a result, to limit God's redemptive action in Jesus as another instance of such buying back. However, this passage (and several others in Exodus) provides examples of the depth and the variety of biblical thought.

According to verse 3 Israel "came out." This verb is a legal term which Israel's storytellers have borrowed (see 21:2) to interpret the Exodus experience. In both verses 3 and 8 it is a going out of Egypt, and verse 3 adds "that house of slavery." Redemption for the Israelite is thus the acquisition of freedom, something particularly important to a seminomad.

Another term is the verb "to dismiss, let go." Against its legal background it means "to set free" (a favorite verb of J). For example, in 21:26-27 a master who mistreats his slave must set that slave free. The author of the present passage uses this verb in verse 15 and thus implies that Pharaoh is a slaveholder who refuses to emancipate his slaves. Redemption for the Israelites means being removed from the caprice of Pharaoh and thus regaining their integrity.

Another term is the verb "to bring out." Since Pharaoh has refused to set Israel free, Yahweh decides to bring them out. In the present context the verb is used four times (vv. 3, 9, 14, 16), three times with the phrase "with a strong hand." This conveys the powerful, miraculous way in which Yahweh liberates his people. (Most likely the phrase derived from the very graphic way in which Yahweh delivered Israel at the Reed Sea.) Redemption means, not merely a juridical act, but a dramatic intervention that results in victory for the oppressed and defeat for the oppressors.

Another term is the verb "to cause to go up." This verb is not concerned with slavery and setting free but looks to the future (see 3:8). It means going up to the land of Canaan and so it is the precise opposite of the going down into Egypt (see Gen 46:3-4). Although those taking part in the Exodus knew it as a going out, later generations saw it in terms of entering a new land, a going up. Redemption means that the Israelite has a home, a future.

Another term is the verb "to save." (The noun usually translated "salvation" is found in 14:13; 15:2.) The word is from the language of the courtroom, whereby the savior is always on the side of justice as an advocate or witness for the defense. In the prophet Second Isaiah, who sings of a second Exodus, Yahweh is a savior since he gets back his rightful property, Israel (see Isa 43:3). Redemption also means that Yahweh takes up the cause of those treated unjustly.

A final term is "to be a redeemer" (see 15:13). A redeemer is the family member responsible for the integrity of the family. For example, if family property is in danger of going to an outsider, the redeemer sees to it that the property remains in the family (see Ruth 4; Jer 32). The redeemer thus intervenes at crucial moments of family life. Redemption also means that God is identified as a member of the family interested in other members of the family. Redemption is much more than simply buying back.

13:17-22 Israel on the march. This section, consisting of E in verses 17-19 and J in verses 20-22, brings up the problem of the route of the Exodus. While the question must remain open, it is possible to offer a hypothesis, an effort to explain a number of the data contained in the biblical traditions. This hypothesis allows for two different routes by two different groups.

Although the New American Bible consistently refers to the Red Sea, the probable translation of the body of water connected with the Exodus is the Reed Sea or the Sea of Reeds. The reed in question is a papyrus plant that is known to grow in the marshes at the north of the Delta (not in the Gulf of Suez or the Gulf of Aqabah). Although this name suggests a comparatively small body of water, its localization is doubtful and not overly significant in dealing with the problem of the route of the Exodus. (The term "Red Sea" derives from the Greek translators of the Hebrew Scriptures. The term, however, includes even the Persian Gulf.)

The first route is the northern route. According to this itinerary, when the Israelites came out of Egypt, they would have gone directly east, that is, across the northern part of the Sinai peninsula to Kadesh Barnea. However, the E tradition in verse 17 notes that the Israelites did not take the way of the Philistines, that is, the way along the Mediterranean Sea connected with the northern route. Still, the mention of Raamses (1:11), Succoth (12:37), Etham (13:20), and Pihahiroth in connection with Migdol and Baalzephon (14:2, 9—all from J with the exception of the last two) tends to support this northern route.

The second route is the southern route. According to this route the Israelites on leaving Egypt would have headed to the south or southeast to the lower part of the Sinai peninsula where they would have experienced the covenant making at Sinai. This would be the way of the desert mentioned by E in verse 18.

It is likely that these two traditions recall two different exodus experiences. Elements of the tribes of Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah (the Leah tribes) were possibly the first to leave Egypt, taking the northern route. It is further likely that they are the group connected with the exodus-expulsion tradition that invaded the land of Canaan from the south (see the J tradition in Num 13:22-23; 14:24). Elements of the tribes of Benjamin, Ephraim, and Manasseh (the Rachel tribes) possibly left Egypt later under the leadership of Moses by means of the southern route. This group would have wandered in the desert, experienced Yahweh at Sinai, and invaded the land of Canaan from the east (the Jordan River). Furthermore, this group would be connected with the exodus-flight tradition. When the different entries into Canaan were combined in the final narrative, these different exodus experiences were united as well.

In verses 21-22 J distinguishes between a column of cloud by day and a column of fire by night. However, in 14:24 J has one column of cloud and fire. Despite this variation, what is clear is the experience of God's presence. The cloud/fire is Israel's perception of her God's participation in the key events of the Exodus and desert wandering. This cloud/fire manifestation is not unlike Yahweh's "angelic" presence (compare 3:2 with 3:4a).

14:1-10 Egypt's pursuit of Israel. The liturgical connection of Passover (and Unleavened Bread) with the Exodus by way of the tenth plague and the liturgical suture between the redemption of the first-born and the tenth plague have now come to a close. The narrative resumes the action of the nine plagues in chapters 7–10 and, after the exodus-expulsion interlude (see 11:1-3; 12:33-36), resumes the exodus-flight tradition (v. 5). The action now switches to the miracle at the sea, a military undertaking that does not presuppose the death of the first-born.

This section contains both P (vv. 1-4, 8-10) and J or JE (vv. 5-7) traditions. For example, according to P Israel is trapped in the wilderness but, more accurately, it is Pharaoh who is trapped into thinking thus. The reason P gives is that Pharaoh's absolute determination to pursue Israel will result in Yahweh's definitive reception of glory through Pharaoh and his army. In the JE tradition Pharaoh has changed his mind, realizing full well the loss of such an invaluable labor force.

What is common to both traditions is that they have interpreted the crossing of the sea in terms of a holy war. A holy war was not merely the encounter between two opposing forces; it was a religious undertaking. For Israel this meant that Yahweh fought for Israel, not Israel for Yahweh. (This view persisted until the time of David's "secular" army in the tenth century B.C.E.) A holy war has five elements: (a) sacrifices and oracles to consult Yahweh (by reason of the pillar of cloud/fire Yahweh already marched with Israel); (b) absolute confidence in Yahweh (see 14:31); (c) ritual purifications (see 19:14-15); (d) fear put into the enemy by Yahweh (see 14:24-25); (e) total destruction of the enemy (see 14:28, 30). What Israel's writers clearly understood was that their commander-in-chief was none less than Yahweh himself.

14:11-18 The conquest of fear. In verses 11-14 J takes up the all-too-human reaction to the pursuit of the Egyptians. It is the reality of fear that threatens to undermine the whole purpose of the Exodus. The people are tempted to prefer the resumption of slavery in Egypt to death in the desert. This murmuring motif is one that will reappear in Israel's wandering experience. Arguing from faith, Moses replies that such an either-or is invalid. Pressing the holy war theology, he makes a demand for renewed commitment (v. 13) and concludes with the assurance of victory. "The Lord himself will fight for you; you have only to keep still" (v. 14).

In verses 15-18 P responds to Israel's cry of frustration. Yahweh's action consists of giving directions that will ensure the safe passage of the Israelites through the sea. Thus Moses is to lift his staff, stretch out his hand, and divide the sea in favor of Israel. As predicted in verse 4, the obstinate Egyptians will pursue Israel into the sea. Their corpses will then become mute yet eloquent witnesses to Yahweh's power. The Divine Warrior will thus be duly acknowledged.

14:19-31 Two traditions for the crossing of the sea. The biblical traditions are unable to present a blow-by-blow account of what actually transpired at the Reed Sea because the required sources are wanting. However, Israel has chosen to interpret that event by dwelling on Yahweh's military prowess. Holy war theology enables the traditions in this section to unfold the picture of a God who thinks resolutely on behalf of the fleeing Israelites. Liberation means, not to be free from the ennui of Israel's laments, but to be free for the bewildered and beleaguered people.

According to J Yahweh manifests himself in two ways: (a) the angel of God (v. 19a) and (b) the column of cloud (v. 19b). Yahweh in the form of a divine messenger and in the form of a cloud now takes up a position between the Israelites and the Egyptians (v. 20). This position implies protection for Israel. Moreover, during the night Yahweh drives back the sea with a strong easterly wind (v. 21b), thus making possible a passage on dry land. Just before dawn Yahweh, present in the column of cloud and fire, startles the Egyptians with a glance that results in the loss of military discipline (v. 24). Yahweh's panic-creating glance is now followed by the clogging of the Egyptian chariot wheels, a gesture that leads to the sounding of retreat (v. 25). However, at dawn the sea resumes its normal depth. At this juncture Yahweh hurls the retreating Egyptians into its midst (v. 27b). The outcome is that Israel acknowledges Yahweh's intervention to the point of believing in Yahweh and his servant Moses (vv. 30-31).

According to P Moses stretches out his hand over the sea (v. 21a). The result is a very special miracle. Dry land appears for the safe passage of the Israelites with the water forming something resembling walls to their right and left (v. 22). At this point the Egyptian forces pursue the Israelites on the dry land (v. 23). At Yahweh's command Moses once again stretches out his hand over the sea (vv. 26-27a). The returning waters then engulf the entire Egyptian army (v. 28). P finally notes much more dramatically than J the Israelite passage on the dry land with the contained waters to the right and left (v. 29). In P Moses' gesture has replaced Yahweh's strong easterly wind.

15:1-21 The Song of the Sea. The earliest tradition about the crossing is found in this section (vv. 1-18, 21) that, unlike the J and P traditions, is in poetry, not prose. It is generally regarded as an independent tradition that has been fitted into its present position by means of vv. 19-20. On the basis of several criteria the poem may be dated around 1100 B.C.E.

This poem is based on an earlier (around 1400 B.C.E.) Canaanite poem that describes the battle between Baal, god of fertility, and Yamm, god of the sea. The outcome of the battle is that Yamm is overcome by Baal who in the next episode receives his temple/palace. In this biblical account Yahweh overcomes the Egyptians by creating a storm at sea that in turn capsizes their boats and leads to their death by drowning (vv. 8-10). (J's easterly wind [14:21b] has apparently been adapted from the poem's reference to Yahweh's strong wind in verse 10.) It is interesting to note that the poem focuses on the destruction of the enemy with only an allusion to the passage of the Israelites. However, the poem goes beyond the exploits at the Reed Sea to mention the effects of such destructive power on Israel's neighbors (vv. 14-16). Finally, the poem concludes by speaking of Yahweh's kingly possession of his sanctuary (v. 17). (This need not be limited to Jerusalem. It is a general formula to denote Yahweh's dwelling place in the wake of the successful battle.)

This crossing of the Reed Sea is obviously related to the ritual crossing of the Jordan in Josh 3–4. It is perhaps due to the influence of the Jordan crossing that the Reed Sea crossing shifted focus from Yahweh's military exploits over the Egyptians to the march of his people into the Promised Land (v. 13).

PART II: ISRAEL IN THE DESERT

Exod 15:22–18:27

These chapters offer a summary of Israel's desert experience. For example, they deal with Yahweh's protection in terms of providing food and drink (15:22–17:7), the defeat of Israel's enemies (17:8-16), the organization of the people (18:13-27). At the same time, these chapters foreshadow events that the Book of Numbers will exploit. Hence the reader is not taken by surprise when the entire desert generation with the exception of Caleb and Joshua is forbidden to enter the Promised Land, but condemned to wander in the desert.

These chapters also deal with the human symbol of wandering. This symbol reflects life as a search for meaning both on the level of individuals and community (see also The Aeneid, Moby Dick, The Divine Comedy). One is thus reminded of the Lukan Jesus who resolutely determines to make the journey to Jerusalem (Luke 9:51) and so capture the meaning of his own life and his community's by experiencing passion, death, and resurrection. In their present setting these chapters are the prelude to Israel's experience of covenant making at Sinai.

In the prophetic literature there are two different traditions of this period in Israel's history. First, there is the tradition of God's graciousness and Israel's generous response to that graciousness: "I remember the devotion of your youth, how you loved me as a bride, following me in the desert, in a land unknown" (Jer 2:2; see also Hos 2:17). Second, there is the tradition of Israel's rebellion against Yahweh that is captured in the murmuring motif so prevalent in the confrontation between Yahweh and Israel: "But the house of Israel rebelled against me in the desert. They did not observe my statutes, and they despised my ordinances that bring life to those who keep them" (Ezek 20:13). In Exodus and usually in Numbers the first tradition, God's graciousness, is primary while the second tradition, Israel's rebellion, is secondary. Israel's theologians were free to adapt the wilderness experience in order to explain later theological crises.

15:22-27 Grumbling at Marah. This episode consists of three traditions: P (vv. 22a, 27), J (vv. 23-25), and Deuteronomistic (v. 26). P provides information after the manner of an itinerary—departure and arrival from stopping place to stopping place. Thus Moses leads the people from the Reed Sea through the desert of Shur to Elim. Verse 26 applies the basic theology of the book of Deuteronomy to this incident at Marah. Obedience to Yahweh's will as expressed in his commandments and precepts will prevent disastrous consequences, such as the diseases inflicted by Yahweh on the Egyptians.

The J tradition emphasizes God's generosity in meeting the needs of the desert community. After three days of travel the community comes upon water at Marah which, however, because of its bitterness is not drinkable. The people's predicament leads to Moses' cry to Yahweh that, in turn, leads to Yahweh's remedy for sweetening the water. Although J speaks of the people grumbling against Moses (v. 24), there is no indication at all that the people are in rebellion. Moreover, the content of the people's complaint is far from clear. According to verse 25 it is Yahweh who puts Israel to the test, not vice versa (see 17:2). Thus, given a concrete need, Yahweh generously responds.

This scene together with 16:1–17:7 underlines the femininity of Yahweh. In the sociology of that day it was the task of the mother and wife to provide food and drink. Mother Yahweh, therefore, senses the needs of her children in their plight and takes the necessary steps to alleviate the situation. The Divine Warrior who overcame the mighty Egyptians at the Reed Sea is also the tender mother who quickly responds to family problems.

16:1-36 The quail and the manna. This account focuses on two realities of the Sinai peninsula. The manna is the secretion of two insects that live on the tamarisk tree. The substance drops from the tamarisk to the ground where it hardens somewhat in the night air. This delicacy of central Sinai is prized by the Bedouin for its sweetness. The quail migrate to Europe in the spring and return in the fall. When they land exhausted on the northwest coast of the Sinai peninsula, they can be easily captured. (For the quail as a replacement for the manna see Num 11:5-6, 31-33.)

P, who is the principal author in this account (J is probably to be found in verses 4-5, 29-32), chooses to elaborate certain "spiritual" dimensions. Thus in verses 17-21 there is just enough manna whether one gathers a large amount or a small amount. Moreover, any quantity kept over for the next day is summarily wormy and rotten. Similarly in verses 22-26 there is the link between the manna and the sabbath. Consequently, on the sixth day one may gather twice as much in order to observe the complete rest required on the seventh. Whatever is left over from the sixth day is then used for the seventh. Indeed, those who venture out on the sabbath to find manna are in violation of that sacred day—besides, nothing is to be found then (v. 27).

The original tradition in this episode was God's gracious care of the people in the desert. Given the grumbling mentioned in verses 2 and 7, one would expect that the sudden arrival of Yahweh's glory (v. 11) would involve a punishment of sorts for the rebels. Instead, in verse 12 Yahweh assures the people through Moses that their food needs will be met. If the people had rebelled against Yahweh, it would be rather surprising for Yahweh to accede to the demands of the rebels. The simplest explanation, therefore, is the invocation of the graciousness tradition: the people were hungry and Yahweh answered their petitions for bread and meat by supplying the manna and the quail (see Ps 105:40).

In view of the Exile and hence an explanation of that debacle as the rebellion of the desert generation, P has introduced the murmuring motif. This is expressed in the form of a death wish in verse 3: "Would that we had died at the Lord's hand in the land of Egypt, as we sat by our fleshpots and ate our fill of bread!" This death wish, however, contains the element of rejection of God's saving plan. By opting for an earlier death in Egypt, they are thereby rejecting the events that led to the present impasse, the Exodus. It is not hunger pangs but the theological despair that commands center stage on this level of the tradition. The reply of Moses and Aaron in verse 6 sustains this interpretation of their rebellion. It is a question of the God who brought them out of Egypt. The tradition of God's graciousness has thus been converted into the tradition of refusing to acknowledge that the God of Israel can indeed accomplish what he sets out to do.

17:1-7 Grumbling at Massah and Meribah. This is a J narrative that is introduced by P's itinerary in verse 1a. Like the J story at Marah, this episode has the primary tradition of Yahweh's graciousness to his needy people. Unlike the Marah tradition, this episode also contains the secondary tradition of Israel's contention with Yahweh over the matter of the Exodus.

If one omits the people's attack on Yahweh at the end of verse 2, the rest of that verse may be understood simply as a quarrel with Moses and a demand that he meet the needs of the people. Moses' cry to Yahweh in verse 4 is not unlike his demand in 14:15 (P) that results in a positive answer from Yahweh. Here the favorable reply is found in verse 5 where Moses is commanded to strike the rock with his staff. (Contrast the different interpretation in Num 20:11-13.) The outcome is that Yahweh once again meets the needs of his people—in this case the need for water. One should also observe that in verse 5 there is no indication of any punishment.

Verse 3 contains the secondary tradition of rebellion in this account. It is not really the thirst that is central. Rather, the thirst serves as a backdrop for impugning the value of the Exodus: "Why did you ever make us leave Egypt?" As in chapter 16, the Exodus is the object of attack because of the lack of water. On this level of the tradition there is the rejection of the divine plan.

One view of the origin of the J murmuring motif is that it is a polemic directed against the northern kingdom of Israel, specifically against the cult of Jeroboam I (931–910 B.C.E.) in Dan and Bethel (see 1 Kgs 12:26-33). This fresh orientation of the desert experience is intended to explain how the northern kingdom lost its rights to divine election and why the southern kingdom retained them (see Ps 78:67-72). Through the rebellion of the desert generation the north forfeited its election while the south preserved its status through the Davidic king in Jerusalem.

17:8-16 Battle with the Amalekites. It is refreshing to come upon a narrative extolling a great human accomplishment in the midst of the awesome display of divine power. This J narrative is a legend, a narrative whose purpose is to edify, in this instance to reflect upon the heroic stature of Moses. While salvation always involves the interplay of divine grace and human cooperation, it is reassuring to note a story where the limelight falls on the human protagonist.

Apart from the notices in verses 14-15 explaining Israel's implacable hatred of the Amalekites and the origin of a particular altar (such explanations are called etiologies), the entire movement centers upon Moses, not Yahweh. In verse 9 Moses commissions Joshua to make the battle preparations and adds that he (Moses) will take up his position on a nearby hill. While no details of the battle are given, there is an abundant description of Moses' contributions to the successful outcome. It is Moses' tenacity and steadfastness that win the day for Israel. The stamina displayed in keeping his hands raised, albeit with the support of Aaron and Hur (v. 12), is precisely what one would expect of such a giant. These heroic dimensions are captured by the expression "steady hands" in verse 12. The steadiness described in the account is the faithfulness shown in fulfilling an official task (see 2 Kgs 12:16; 22:7). It is the courage of this one man that turns the tide of battle. For all his failings Moses retains his image as hero and superman (see Deut 34:7, 10-12).

The Amalekites who controlled the caravan routes between Egypt and Arabia lived in the Negeb, the southernmost section of Israel (see 1 Sam 15:7). Since they are linked to the tribe of Judah and are quite likely associated with the exodus-expulsion tradition, the story is out of place here. However, as a portrait of the heroic qualities of Moses, it is indeed most apropos in its present position.

18:1-27 Meeting between Moses and Jethro. This chapter, the work of E, contains two scenes: (a) the meeting between Moses and his father-in-law that culminates in a covenant meal (vv. 1-12); (b) the decentralization of judicial authority in Israel that results in the appointments of "minor" judges (vv. 13-27). It is in the desert near the mountain of God (v. 5). Unlike the mountain of God in chapter 19, this mountain is not the scene of a theophany but of a meeting.

Jethro is hardly a new character in the story. In 2:11-22 J narrated Moses' marriage to his daughter. What is striking in the present account is E's concentration on Jethro. Although the latter does indeed bring his daughter and two grandsons to meet Moses (in 2:22 Moses has only one son, but see 4:20), the woman and the two sons play a rather unimportant role. In verse 7 Moses all but ignores his wife and family. Clearly Moses and Jethro are the central figures.

The meeting revolves around Moses' story of Yahweh's exploits (v. 8), Jethro's joy-filled reaction to the story (vv. 9-11), and a covenant meal with Jethro, on the one hand, and Aaron and the elders, on the other hand (v. 12). Although some see Jethro's declaration as an indication of his conversion to Yahwism (v. 11; see 2 Kgs 5:15), it is also likely that Jethro merely recognized that Moses' god, Yahweh, was more powerful than all other gods (see Josh 2:9-11). Although Jethro is called a priest (v. 1) and hence exercised a cultic office, there is really no firm basis for suggesting that he was a priest of Yahweh or that he shared his Yahwistic faith with Moses. In verse 12, as a matter of fact, Moses is conspicuous by his absence. Here Jethro accepts (rather than "brought" as in the NAB translation) the sacrificial offerings, thereby indicating his acceptance of a mutual relationship with the Israelites. Given the subsequent enmity between Midianites and Israelites, this tradition reflects an early friendlier association between the two groups.

Verses 13-27 presuppose a situation that developed after the desert experience, in a time when the population was large and sedentary. The distinction between the more important and less important cases (v. 22) indicates a decentralization of legal authority. According to some authorities it may suggest the judicial appointments during the time of King Jehoshaphat (871–848 B.C.E.—see 2 Chr 19:5-11). In any event, a subsequent situation has been read back into the desert experience and thus the later solution has been attributed to Moses. At the same time, however, the story provides another occasion for E to emphasize his fear of God motif (see 1:17, 21). Hence Moses is instructed by his father-in-law to select God-fearing men (v. 21). This basic orientation of fear of God will ensure the common good, especially by the avoidance of bribes (see Deut 16:19).

PART III: THE MAKING OF THE COVENANT

Exod 19:1–24:11

Covenants are part and parcel of human social life. Since humans are drawn into relationships with other humans, the terms of those relationships must first of all be clarified and then accepted. A covenant, therefore, is a relationship in which the moral bond between the parties involved is defined and then accepted. For example, in Gen 31:43–32:3 Jacob and Laban make a covenant. A significant element in that relationship is the sworn oath by both parties not to attack each other (31:52-53). Moreover, a pile of stones serves as a witness to the covenant (31:45-48). A ritual meal, finally, is also central to the relationship: "He [Jacob] then offered a sacrifice on the mountain and invited his kinsmen to share in the meal" (31:54).

An obvious difference between the Jacob-Laban covenant and the Sinai covenant is the position of Yahweh. Yahweh is not an equal partner to the covenant. Rather, Yahweh is the superior and Israel the inferior. Consequently, Yahweh is the one who commands, while Israel is the one who is expected to obey. Israel's pledged word to abide by the terms of the relationship is, therefore, essential to her existence as Yahweh's chosen people. Covenant life is by definition the constant challenge to ongoing fidelity.

Since the covenant on Sinai was the experience whereby this people became God's people, it is only natural to assume that the scene at the mountain would be the logical meeting place for a variety of interpretations of this relationship. The variety of traditions reflects Israel's unrelenting efforts to fathom her unique position with Yahweh. Hence Yahweh and Israel could be perceived in various ways. At the same time, these chapters witness to a certain conservatism. Israel was not content to employ one tradition and then discard it. Instead, Israel chose to retain different traditions because each of them preserved a distinct value.

In the midst of the distinctiveness of Israel's covenant traditions there is also a certain basic outline for most of them. First of all, there is the encounter with Yahweh who overawes his people. Second, there is the expression of Yahweh's will for this people. Moses is here the recipient of the terms of covenant existence. Third, Moses reports to the people the will of Yahweh as he received it. This basic outline is also a testimony to Moses' unique position as the covenant mediator.

19:1-2 The setting. P continues his itinerary (see 16:1; 17:1), this time noting that the Israelites have arrived at Sinai. P's next tradition will come only in 24:15b, so there is no tradition of covenant making on Sinai comparable to J and E. For P there is only the one covenant made with Abraham that still perdures (see Gen 17:13). Nonetheless Sinai will become P's ideal place for many of Israel's cultic traditions.

The exact location of Sinai is not known. For those who follow the southern route of the exodus-flight tradition the mountain in question is often identified as Jebel Musa (Mount Moses). The size of the mountain (7,647 feet) is often thought to be imposing enough for the importance of the traditions associated with the biblical narrative. At the base of this mountain in the Sinai desert, the Greek Orthodox monastery of St. Catherine's now stands.

19:3-8 Attitude toward the covenant. The tradition embedded in verses 3b-8 is an independent tradition drawn from the liturgy that is now introduced by verse 3a. Its purpose is to foster the proper attitude that should guide God's people. While it is clearly a proclamation, it is not a proclamation that provides precise rules of conduct. Rather, it is one which underlines the notion of word (verse 5: "if you hearken to my voice"). Israel is bidden to listen and thus act upon Yahweh's word. The use of direct address ("I" and "you") adds both solemnity and power. Indeed, Israel is to learn from God's mighty deeds against the Egyptians (v. 4) the nature of Yahweh and the serious responsibility to heed his word.

There are other dimensions too. There is emphasis on intimacy. Yahweh brings the people, not just to a given destination in the desert but to himself (v. 4). The covenant is specifically Yahweh's (verse 5: "my covenant"), and the people are uniquely his own. The Hebrew word translated "special possession" (v. 5) conjures up the notion of the personal private property of a king (see Deut 7:6; 14:2; 26:18). There is also a stress on Israel's holiness (v. 6), a characteristic by which she is removed from the realm of the profane. The expression "kingdom of priests" does not imply that every Israelite is a priest. Quite likely the totality of Israel is intended: a royalty of priests and a holy nation. Finally, there is the accent on liberty. Israel is not coerced to accept this relationship (verse 5: "Therefore, if you hearken to my voice"). In Israel, Yahweh is never a puppeteer who capriciously pulls the strings to control human behavior. Only a free response is a fitting response.

This liturgical tradition suggests an approach whereby Yahweh can be considered the overlord and Israel the vassal. There are hints of such a conception here, hints that would come to fruition in the Book of Deuteronomy where the model of covenant is that of a treaty, in which Yahweh is the overlord and Israel is the vassal. Israel could thus use political models to great advantage.

19:9-20 Two theophany traditions. This section contains the J and E traditions of the Sinai theophany—God's manifestation on the mountain. (Verse 9 is a gloss that ties together the previous tradition with J and E.) For J (vv. 10-11a, 12-13a, 14-16a, 18, 20) the theophany is that of a volcanic eruption. It is a literary depiction that does not demand that one search for a now extinct volcano somewhere in Arabia. For E (vv. 11b, 13b, 16b-17, 19) the theophany is that of a fear-producing storm.

In the J account it is Yahweh who selects Moses to hear the revelation and then share it with the people (v. 10). Moses is to prepare the people for a ceremony on the third day (vv. 11a, 15a—see also Hos 6:1-3 and 1 Cor 15:4 for the use of the third day in a covenant setting). The ceremony involves washing their clothing and continence (vv. 14b, 15b). While the mention of readiness (vv. 11a, 15a) is also part of holy war preparations, the accent is more on holy and less on war (see 7:14; 38:7). What is expected of the people is that they will respect the limits of the mountain (v. 12) since Yahweh will occupy it (v. 20). The power and majesty of this God are evident in the fire, smoke, and shaking of the mountain. It is the presence of this God that brings about the covenant. (The precise stipulations of this relationship are now found in chapter 34.)

In the E account it is the people who select Moses to be their spokesperson (20:19). It is the fear caused by the storm (v. 16b) that provokes their decision. It is also this fear that makes them willing to receive the will of the storm god. Unlike the J account, the E tradition has Moses organize a liturgical procession but one that will place the people at the bottom of the mountain (vv. 13b, 17b). The tradition also alludes to meeting this God in the setting of a holy war. The camp in verse 17 need not be limited to a nomadic camp; it is also a military camp. While the trumpet is a liturgical instrument (see Ps 47:6), it is also a military instrument used for purposes of warfare (see Judg 7:20; also Josh 6 where the ram's horn mentioned here in verse 13b is both liturgical and military). The Hebrew verb used in verse 17 ("they stationed themselves") also means to line up in battle array (see Judg 20:2). Israel at Sinai is thus God's militia, ready to accede to the will of this commander whose presence is also marked by the cloud over the mountain.

19:21-25 The holiness of the mountain. In this passage J continues the theme of the holiness of the mountain first mentioned in verses 12-13a. Realizing that the people will be tempted to see Yahweh, J has Moses urge the people to observe a reverent distance. Not only are the people in general to sanctify themselves (v. 10) but also the priests (v. 22). Although Aaron is allowed to accompany Moses in his ascent to Yahweh, the priests and the people are expressly forbidden (v. 24). Yahweh's turf must be respected.

20:1-17 The Ten Commandments. While the basic outline calls for the expression of the divine will following the encounter with Yahweh, the condition of the biblical text is still somewhat disconcerting. In the J text of 19:25 Moses goes down the mountain to speak to the people. Next, in 20:1 God communicates the Ten Commandments rather abruptly. This is, in turn, followed by the remark in the E text of 20:19 that God's direct speaking to them will result in death. Finally, in 20:22 Yahweh speaks directly to Moses.

Both the Ten Commandments and the Covenant Code (20:22–23:19) have been associated with the E tradition. Most likely they are not E's personal work but independent traditions inserted by E at this point. At a first stage, the fear experienced by the people (see E in 20:18) was the direct result of the storm theophany in chapter 19. Moses was consequently deputed to hear the entire revelation. At a second stage, because of the importance of the Ten Commandments, the people listened to this fundamental law. This listening led to their fear that, in turn, led to Moses' receiving the rest of the legislation (the Covenant Code). This second stage clearly enhanced the stature of the Ten Commandments since, unlike the Covenant Code, God communicated them directly to the people.

The form of the Ten Commandments is significant. It is a series of apodictic laws, that is, laws that impose a command directly on a person, obliging that person to perform (or refrain from performing) some action that the legislator judges to be desirable (or harmful). Apodictic laws admit two formulations: (a) third person, as in Deut 17:6—"No one shall be put to death on the testimony of only one witness"; (b) second person, as in Lev 18:8—"You shall not have intercourse with your father's wife." Although these apodictic laws are found rather exceptionally in the ancient Near East, they are characteristic of Israel. Moreover, second person formulations, insofar as they express the fundamental religious orientation of an entire people, are unique to Israel. There is, therefore, a dimension of intimacy, especially in these second person singular formulations, since Yahweh speaks directly to the individual Israelite. Such laws are grounded in a person, not an impersonal legislative system (note Gen 2:17). Although murder and adultery were already forbidden in the ancient Near East, the fifth and the sixth commandments are new laws.

With the exception of the first three commandments, the Ten Commandments are originally a form of tribal wisdom. Before being united in their present form, they circulated in different series of commands that the young of a tribe were expected to learn from their elders (see Lev 18; Tob 4; Jer 35). These tribal elders sought to provide for the common good, and their position lent authority to the sayings.

As is clear from verse 1, Yahweh is the person behind this legislation. He is, however, more than a tribal elder. He identifies himself as one who has acted on behalf of the community. Using the liturgical introductory formula ("I am"), the text insists on the centrality of Yahweh's role in Exodus. Israel is bound to these commandments, not only because they are for the common good but also because this God has intervened decisively in her life. (Note how Deut 5:15 uses the Exodus tradition as motivation for the sabbath observance rather than the creation tradition used here in verses 9-11.)

20:18-21 Moses' appointment as mediator. The fear originally attributed to the theophany (19:16b) is now related to the divine proclamation in the Ten Commandments. (The smoking mountain in verse 18 harmonizes the traditions of J and E.) In this E passage Moses is deputed to hear the rest of the revelation (v. 19). Not surprisingly, E accentuates the fear of God motif in verse 20; such fear will be a help in avoiding sin. E concludes here by mentioning Moses' ascent in verse 21, an ascent that he will expand in 24:12-15a.

20:22-26 Introduction to the Covenant Code. The legislation that Moses now hears by himself begins in 20:22 and concludes in 23:19. It is called the Covenant Code or the Book of the Covenant because in 24:3 the people agree to accept God's will, which is then specifically labeled in 24:7, "the book of the covenant." As with the Ten Commandments, E has borrowed an independent collection or independent collections which he inserts at this point in the Sinai theophany. While this section of Exodus may strike some readers as being overly legal and perhaps legalistic and hence dry, one should nonetheless search for the values that Israel perceived here. One such value is Israel's regard for the human person, a value that stands out when viewed against other ancient Near Eastern legal codes. Such an attitude stems from her religious convictions.

These opening verses continue the apodictic form of the Ten Commandments (verse 23 is in the plural, however, and verse 25 is a mixed form). Unlike the J and E traditions that associate God's presence in one form or another with the mountain, this independent tradition has God speak from heaven (v. 24). The prohibition against images stems from the fact that Yahweh could not be seen and hence could not be represented. The law of the altar (vv. 24-26) presupposes Israel's early life in the land. More than one sanctuary is permitted—in fact, as many as there were places where God's presence was recognized. An elevated altar is forbidden, since it may involve immodesty on the part of the sacrificer (see the precautions taken in 28:40-42).

21:1-11 The law for slaves. Verse 2 introduces the casuistic or case law section of the Covenant Code. (This section continues to 22:16.) This form of law was the typical law of the ancient Near East. By its nature casuistic law is pragmatic; it does not depend directly on any ethical principle. The subject is simply reminded of the unpleasant consequences that will follow a violation of the law. In terms of obligation, case law binds the judge or judges who act for the legislator. The very core of these laws is the solution: if such and such has occurred, then such and such is the outcome. Although these laws have a personalistic overtone because of their setting at Sinai, they are, apart from that important note, practical human lay laws written, for the most part, in the third person. (For an example of second person casuistic law, see 21:2.) Their background indicates a time in Israel shortly after the occupation of the land.

This section on slaves clearly distinguishes between slaves and slaveowners, although there are certain limitations on the slaveowners' rights. The word "Hebrew" in verse 2 originally meant "Habiru"—those displaced people and malcontents who harassed the ancient Near East. In its present usage, however, the term means "Israelite." The situation described in verse 4 implies that women are the master's possessions. Ideally (see Jer 34:8-22), the enslavement of Israelites is only temporary: six years for Israelite men (v. 2). (Deut 21:10-14 applies the same to Israelite women.) Verses 8-11 contain special legislation when there is a question of giving the female slave in marriage. In that case she enjoys certain rights as a wife.

21:12-17 Offenses punishable by death. Although this section contains a mixture of legal forms, what makes it a unity is its subject—attacks on human life that involve the death penalty. While verse 12 establishes a general principle, verses 13 and 14 make distinctions. In the case of unpremeditated homicide or accidental manslaughter ("an act of God"), asylum is provided in a sanctuary. In the case of willful murder, not even the sanctuary will avail. In reverence due to parents (vv. 15, 17), Israelite legislation is more demanding than that of the ancient Near East in general.

21:18-31 Laws regarding bodily injuries. Masters cannot dispose of their slaves at their mere whim. The cases mentioned in verses 20-21 and 26-27 indicate limitations on the masters' rights. Verses 23-25 enunciate the law of talion. This law intends to curb unbridled revenge by insisting on proportionate compensation. Slaves, however, do not enjoy this right because they receive only their freedom in compensation for the injury inflicted on them (vv. 26-27). Verse 32 is another indication of the plight of the slave. In the goring death of a slave, the culpably negligent owner is obliged to pay the master the current price for a slave.

21:33–22:14 Laws regarding property damages. Israel never exacted the death penalty for crimes against property, something that the more progressive western states did not acknowledge until the beginning of the last century. The general principle exemplified in this section is that an individual who has been wronged in his property is to be compensated. The compensation is penal in character and usually greater than the damage caused. Thus a man who steals an ox or a sheep and then slaughters or sells it must pay fivefold for an ox and fourfold for a sheep (21:37). A thief who cannot make full restitution for his crime is to be sold into slavery (22:2).

Verses 6-10 have to do with divine adjudication. According to verses 7 and 8, justice is administered before God, that is, in a holy place or a sanctuary. In the legal disputes expressed in these verses, the manner of adjudication is best explained by verse 10. The party or parties involved must swear by Yahweh. This procedure reflects the sacredness of the divine name; to disparage the name is to disparage the person.

22:15–23:9 Social laws. (Although verses 15-16 belong to the casuistic section of the Covenant Code, they are grouped here because of their content.) The legislation in 22:17–23:19 constitutes the apodictic section of the Covenant Code. What is noteworthy about many laws here is the ethical sensitivity to the demands of charity toward one's fellow Israelite. By insisting so often on the obligation of love, it transcends the Ten Commandments, which concern only the demands of justice.

The deflowering of an unbetrothed virgin implies serious financial problems for a father because it would be difficult for her to obtain a suitor. (For a father's worry over a daughter see Sir 42:9-14.) The law in 22:15 states that the seducer must marry her or, in the event of the father's unwillingness to give her, pay the customary marriage price for virgins. In Israel a certain double standard exists. It is the status of the woman that determines adultery, not the status of the man. If the woman is either betrothed or married, and therefore the property of another man; it is adultery. If the woman is neither betrothed nor married, it is not adultery, even if the man in question is married.

Both sorcery (22:17) and bestiality (22:18) involve the death penalty. Sacrifice to false gods (22:19), while a capital offense, is nuanced differently. Such a person is to be doomed—totally destroyed. Some think this destruction applies to his belongings as well.

The laws in 22:20-23 and 23:9 concern those who are legally helpless. Aliens (see 12:48) are foreigners who live in the midst of Israel and enjoy certain rights. Since they do not enjoy full civic rights on a par with Israelites, they are often victims of oppression. Verse 20 exhibits a peculiarity of Israelite jurisprudence, namely, exhortation. Israel not only states the law but often provides reasons for its observance. In this instance Israel is to recall her own precarious existence in Egypt and thus treat the alien appropriately. Since the economy depends on the male heads of the household, widows and fatherless (such is the meaning of orphan in this sociological context) are exposed to the greatest dangers. To counteract these dangers, the legislation in verses 22-23 insists on divine involvement. Yahweh will listen to the laments and take punitive action against the guilty. Israel's conviction is that a truly strong society provides for its weakest members.

Exhortation is also prominent in verses 24-26. A cloak taken in pledge must be returned before sunset because this cloak also serves as bedding. The cry of such a cloakless Israelite merits prompt action from Yahweh.

The material in 23:1-3, 6-8 looks to legal procedures. Those who compose Israel's popular courts are urged not to bear false testimony (v. 1), not to follow the majority view to the detriment of justice (v. 2), and not to accept bribes (v. 8). On the positive side, they are to acquit the innocent and condemn the guilty (v. 8). Since it is unlikely that one would tend to favor the poor in court action, some emend verse 3 to read: "You shall not favor a wealthy man in his lawsuit." In any event, verse 6 clearly advocates due concern for the needy in litigation. Unfortunately, Israel's prophets had to decry the manipulation of the poor in the administration of justice (see Isa 1:23; 10:2; Ezek 22:29; Amos 5:10).

The provisions of 23:4-5 focus on one's personal enemy (some would identify this enemy in terms of an actual or imminent legal dispute). Allegiance to the covenant Lord takes precedence over personal antipathies. Or better, such allegiance demands seeing one's enemy from a new perspective. In any event, straying oxen or asses are to be returned to the proper owner and an overburdened ass is to be helped up.

23:10-19 Religious laws. Verses 10-12 refer to the sabbatical year and the sabbath itself. According to verses 10-11 the fields, vineyards, and olive groves are to lie fallow every seven years. The poor are envisioned as the primary beneficiaries of this institution (see also Lev 25:2-7; Deut 15:1-3). The mention of the sabbath in verse 12 suggests that the sabbatical year is to take place at a fixed date. However, there is little positive evidence to document its actual observance. With regard to the sabbath, the law in verse 13 declares that slaves, aliens, and even beasts are to benefit from the day of rest. (The word "sabbath" in Hebrew suggests "to halt, stop." It is a day marked by rest when everyday activities stop.)

After mentioning the exclusive worship of God's name (and hence person) in verse 13, the Covenant Code considers the pilgrimage feasts to be observed in Israel, that is, feasts requiring male attendance at local sanctuaries. The feast of Azymes or Unleavened Bread celebrates the beginning of the barley harvest (see 13:3-10). It is here linked to the time when Israel came out of Egypt (v. 15). The feast of the grain harvest or Weeks that takes place about fifty days after Unleavened Bread (Pentecost) marks the end of the wheat harvest. Finally, the feast at the end of the year, also called Tents or Tabernacles, celebrates the ingathering of all the produce of the field. Since these three pilgrimage feasts are agricultural, they were celebrated only after the desert experience.

The Covenant Code concludes with several sacrificial injunctions. Since leavened bread implies a change, it may have been deemed unfitting for use in sacrifice (v. 18a). Since the fat of an animal is considered the choicest part (see Lev 3:17), its being kept overnight would result in spoiling (v. 18b). Because Yahweh is Israel's God, he is worthy of receiving the first fruits of the soil at the local sanctuary (v. 19a). The prohibition against boiling a kid in its mother's milk (v. 19b), once thought to be a cultic practice among the Canaanites, is not clear. It seems to be a pagan practice whose specifics are not yet known.

23:20-33 Behavior in the Promised Land. Some see this passage after the manner of Lev 26 and Deut 28—a list of blessings that flow from obedience to the terms of the code. Others regard it as a departure speech that is rather loosely linked to the code. Since these blessings are not closely joined to the preceding stipulations, the second view is to be preferred. (The source of the tradition is not clear, however.)

The passage is a departure speech that aims at encouraging the people during the early monarchy in the tenth century B.C.E. (see the boundaries of the Davidic-Solomonic kingdom in verse 31). It is thus a time when Israel is threatened by Canaanite ways, since she is now living side by side with Canaanites as members of the one people of Israel. God is present through his messenger (vv. 20, 23). Such presence will mean protection, even against overwhelming odds. However, God's military action will be only gradual (vv. 30-31). During this entire time allegiance to Yahweh and his covenant must be uppermost (vv. 21-22, 24, 32-33). Although they are to live with Canaanites, they are not to adopt their ways. It is obedience of this caliber that will bring about the blessings of abundance of food and drink, health, fertility, and a long life (vv. 25-26).

24:1-2, 9-11 Covenant making and the ceremonial meal. In the wake of the J and E traditions of the theophany and the subsequent legislation in chapters 20–23, there now come two more traditions of covenant making: (a) verses 1-2, 9-11 and (b) verses 3-8. Most likely they are independent traditions. In the form of ritual actions they provide yet two more views of response to God's initiative. Although 24:1 is rather clumsily appended to the J and E traditions, and although 24:3 breaks up the initial tradition, still they preserve great values in terms of covenant making, values that Israel took great pains to preserve.

In 24:1-2, 9-11 there is the celebration of a meal in God's presence. This very simple but profound scene is a very ancient tradition stemming from Israel's perception of Yahweh as tribal chief. By means of the meal, Yahweh takes the whole community, represented by the clan elders, into his family. The meal is the assurance and support given by the superior, Yahweh, to the inferior, Israel. What is striking is that the clan elders do not accept any particular stipulations. What they do accept is the protection afforded them by the tribal chief. Israel's specific response to that gesture would be developed in subsequent traditions.

24:3-8 Covenant making and the blood rite. Sacrifices (here communion sacrifices) effect covenant. In response to the people's willingness to accept Yahweh's will (v. 3; see also v. 7), Moses writes down the stipulations (v. 4). After reading "the book of the covenant," he sprinkles the people with half of the blood of the slaughtered animals. For Israel, blood is life. The sprinkled blood joins them to the blood splashed on the altar, which symbolizes God. A union has been created from this blood relationship. However, the terms for preserving that relationship are also spelled out. By living up to those terms, Israel is assured of her ongoing union with Yahweh. Unlike the ancient ceremonial meal, this manner of covenant making lays greater stress on the demands of the covenant God.

PART IV: INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE BUILDING OF THE SANCTUARY

Exod 24:12–31:18

After the final traditions of covenant making (24:1-11), Moses ascends the mountain with Joshua to receive the tablets. This departure will set the stage for the Golden Calf story in chapter 32. Sandwiched in between these two texts is P's account of Moses' receiving divine instructions for the construction of the desert sanctuary. While P clearly rejects any covenant at Sinai, he nonetheless finds this setting the ideal place for developing his cultic interests. Hence this section as well as chapters 35–40 may rightly be termed P's political document.

Recalling Israel's infidelity that provoked the sack of Jerusalem and subsequent exile in 586 B.C.E., P aims at underlining the nature of the restored community, a holy people. Concretely, holiness entails such institutions as priesthood, sacrifices, etc. But the institutions are designed to achieve one purpose—God's presence. While Sinai is not, for P, the place of covenant making, it is the place par excellence for Yahweh's manifestation.

While P makes the desert sanctuary a portable replica of the Jerusalem temple, it is wrong to regard all his cultic elaborations as a retrojection of that temple into the desert experience. As a matter of fact, P also employs older traditions, many of which are at home in ancient Canaanite religion. While P appropriates such Canaanite institutions, he also confronts them, imposing upon them a theology of God's presence consonant with Israelite faith.

24:12-15a Moses' ascent. This E passage expands the rather laconic statement of Moses' ascent in 20:21. Although it now introduces the P material, it originally served to position Moses on the mountain to receive the divine revelation (see 20:18-20). This revelation is linked to the tablets that Yahweh will write. (In P the tablets are written by God's finger [31:18], whereas in J Moses writes them down [34:28].) It is interesting to observe that in the ancient Near East only Israel pictured her God as drafting or dictating legislation. For E the cloud is also significant as marking God's presence (see 19:16b; 20:21). Finally, the notion of additional judges in verse 14 is in keeping with E's "minor" judges in 18:21-26.

24:15b-18 P's theophany. For P this brief scene is not only an introduction to chapters 25–31; it is also a profound theological statement of the significance of Sinai. Here he links the divine manifestation on Sinai with the construction of the sanctuary (40:17, 33b) and the execution of the first sacrifice (Lev 9:1, 23-24). Just as the cloud covers the mountain and Yahweh's glory settles there (vv. 15b-16a), so too the cloud covers the tent of meeting, and Yahweh's glory fills the sanctuary (40:34). In verse 16b Yahweh calls Moses on the seventh day, and in Lev 9:1 Moses summons Aaron, his sons, and the elders of Israel on the eighth day. According to verse 17 Yahweh's glory is viewed as a consuming fire, and according to Lev 9:24a fire comes from Yahweh's presence and consumes the sacrifice. There is thus a clear parallelism between the manifestation on Sinai and the first act of worship after that manifestation. Hence Sinai becomes the model for worship.

25:1-9 Collection of materials. P's concept of Yahweh's earthly dwelling borrows yet reinterprets ancient Canaanite traditions. In that religion El, the head of the pantheon, had a tent on a mountain where he issued authoritative decrees or oracles (see 33:7-11). In verse 9 Moses is instructed to make a copy of the tent on the mountain. There is thus a similarity of form between the deity's earthly dwelling and its heavenly model. P employs two names for Yahweh's place: (a) the more traditional "tent of meeting" (for example, 40:34) and (b) his own special archaic "the dwelling" (always capitalized in the New American Bible). By using the latter term, P understands the transcendent God of Israel who will meet with that people (see 29:42-43; 30:36). For P, Yahweh will take up a permanent abode in the midst of his people (compare 33:7-11).

Unlike J and E, P provides directions for setting up the sanctuary and furnishing it (see also 36:8-38). Despite P's elaborations, modeled after the Jerusalem temple, the basic reality is that of a portable sanctuary, a tent similar to Israel's own tents during the time of the desert. This is similar to the practice of ancient Bedouin tribes that carried a small sacred tent made of red leather. During their journeys such tribes could experience the presence of their gods, owing to the stone idols carried in the tent. In human experience the presence of one's god is judged to be imperative.

25:10-22 Plan of the ark. After the manner of the practice mentioned above, Israel can meet with her God because of the ark that was most likely housed by the tent. The ark is a rectangular wooden cabinet about four feet long, two and a half feet wide, and two and a half feet high that contains the stone tablets given to Moses by Yahweh (vv. 16, 21)—hence the name "ark of the covenant" or "ark of the testimony." (In the ancient Near East it was a common practice to deposit treaties in a sacred place with a view to reading them at stipulated times.)

Although J and E do not associate the ark with the tent, P goes on to add that the ark has a propitiatory flanked by two cherubim. The propitiatory is the gold plate on top of the ark that is associated with divine forgiveness. From above the propitiatory Yahweh can speak to Moses and thus to the Israelites. (For the role of the propitiatory on the Day of Atonement see Lev 16:15-16; note Rom 3:25.) It is likely that this propitiatory was a substitute for the ark, that is, the seat of God's presence or mercy after the ark itself was destroyed (see Jer 3:16). The original ark probably functioned as a support or a pedestal for Israel's invisible God (see Num 10:35-36). Once the ark reached the Promised Land, it served as Yahweh's throne or footstool (see 1 Sam 4:4). The two golden cherubim, lesser deities borrowed from Israel's neighbors, provided protection for the throne and thus suggested the presence of Israel's God.

25:23-40 The table and lampstand. The table contains the showbread (v. 30) that consists of twelve loaves of unleavened bread (see Lev 24:5-9), replenished every sabbath and reserved to the priests. This bread serves as a reminder of God's covenant with the twelve tribes of Israel. The lampstand or "menorah," although elaborately described, is somewhat baffling to scholars. In any event it is a candelabrum that holds seven lamps. Today the term "menorah" is used for one of the best-known symbols of Judaism, the seven-branched candelabrum. (For the ten lampstands in Solomon's temple see 1 Kgs 7:49.)

26:1-37 Instructions for making the desert sanctuary. In P's conception the desert sanctuary is a collapsible temple that is exactly one half the size of Solomon's temple (see 1 Kgs 6:2, 16-17). First of all, wooden frames form a rectangular building that is approximately forty-five feet long, fifteen feet wide, fifteen feet high, and open on the east (vv. 15-29). Second, sheets of finely woven materials are sewn together to make two large sheets. These sheets are joined together by means of loops and clasps and have the cherubim embroidered on them (vv. 1-6). Third, sheets woven of goat hair are stretched like a tent over the sanctuary. These sheets are slightly longer than those in verses 1-6 and are left hanging down on both sides (vv. 7-13). Finally, ram skins dyed red cover the whole building, and tahash skins (light leather hides), cover the ram skins (v. 14).

This passage also mentions two veils. There is a veil over the entrance to the sanctuary (vv. 36-37) and one between the Holy of Holies and the Holy Place (vv. 31-32). The latter veil is more costly than the former. Behind the veil in the Holy of Holies (the most holy or most sacred area) there stands the ark with the propitiatory (vv. 33-34). This is the area reserved to Yahweh. In the Holy Place are the lampstand and the table of showbread (v. 35).

27:1-8 The altar of holocausts. This altar is basically a hollow wooden box, about seven and a half feet long, seven and a half feet wide, and four and a half feet high that was plated with bronze. It is difficult to understand how it operated, since the heat from these whole-burnt offerings would destroy the altar. To resolve this problem, some suggest that stones are placed on top of the altar for burning (see 29:18). The four corners of the altar are provided with horns. These were significant for seeking asylum in the temple (see 1 Kgs 1:50; 2:28).

27:9-19 Court of the sanctuary. P now describes the rather elaborate courtyard for the desert sanctuary, approximately one hundred and fifty feet long, seventy-five feet wide, and seven and a half feet high (v. 18). A barrier of bronze columns and silver curtain rods (that hold linen curtains) sets off the court from all other areas. One is naturally reminded of Ezekiel's vision that pictured the temple surrounded by a wall "to separate the sacred from the profane" (Ezek 42:20).

27:20-21 Oil for the lamps. The pure olive oil is to come from the people but it is to be handled by the priests. The sanctuary light is obviously intended to be a perpetual reminder of Yahweh's presence in the desert sanctuary (see Lev 24:2-4).

28:1-43 The priestly vestments. Some knowledge of the history of the priesthood in Israel is useful, if not necessary, to appreciate P's political document. Priesthood properly so called did not appear until there was considerable development of the social makeup of the community. (Note the lack of priests for the Passover in 12:1-20.) With the rise of the monarchy two phenomena occurred: (a) rival sanctuaries and (b) increased centralization at the Jerusalem temple (see 1 Sam 2:27-36; 2 Sam 15:24-29). With Deuteronomy's doctrine of only one sanctuary, Jerusalem, the priests serving the country sanctuaries were put out of work (see Deut 12:4-14). These country priests, many of whom were descendants of Levi, became second-class citizens in the Jerusalem temple and were often the objects of charity, along with the widow, the fatherless, and the alien (see Deut 26:12). The only legitimate priests were the Jerusalem Zadokites—those descended from Zadok (see 1 Kgs 2:26-27; 4:2) who were not descendants of Levi. In order to fulfill the Deuteronomic ideal that all priests, regardless of lineage, should be descendants of Levi (see Deut 17:9), the originally non-Levitical Zadokites claimed to be a special group of Levites, namely, the Aaronites or those descended from Aaron. The outcome was that the Levites now became synonymous with inferior cultic employees who were subordinate to the sons of Zadok (see Ezek 44:10-31). In Exodus, P reflects the claim of the Zadokites to be Aaronites.

This chapter endorses the claims of the Zadokites (v. 1). It focuses on Aaron, allotting only verses 41-43 to the sons of Aaron. Here it is worth noting that there was no ordination of priests as such in the Old Testament. The word translated "ordain" in verse 41 is, literally, "to fill the hand," a phrase whose original sense is not evident. In any event, priests were made holy or sacred by reason of their work.

Of the vestments mentioned here the most interesting are the ephod and the breastpiece. Originally the ephod was a garment worn by the priests and attached to the breastpiece of decision (v. 15). This breastpiece of the same material as the ephod was a bag containing the sacred lots known as Urim and Thummim (v. 30). These lots provide "yes" or "no" answers for those seeking oracles from the priests (see 1 Sam 14:36-37; 28:6). With the ascendancy of prophetism, priests were no longer sought out to give oracles. In keeping with that development the Urim and Thummim, unlike the other priestly items, are merely mentioned and not elaborated. In the P description these originally oracular devices now contain stones engraved with the names of the twelve tribes (vv. 12, 29).

29:1-9 Investiture of the priests. This investiture involves three steps: purification, clothing, and anointing (see also Lev 8:1-38). As a result of the purification or washing, the priest is enabled to enter the realm of the holy (see 30:17-21). The rite of anointing the high priest (v. 7) probably arose only after the Exile when the high priest assumed a political position and consequently received the mark of royalty. (According to 28:41 and other texts all priests are anointed.) This passage concludes by unequivocally stating the Aaronite claims of the Jerusalem Zadokite priests (see also v. 44).

29:10-37 The sacrifices of priestly consecration. There are three different types of sacrifice in this elaborate description. First, there is the sin offering, the bullock (vv.

10-14). Since the offering is for the sins of the priests, they do not share in the victim. Second, there is the holocaust, the first ram (vv. 15-18). Third, there is the communion sacrifice, the second ram (vv. 19-26, 31-37). In verse 20 Moses consecrates the priests by rubbing the animal's blood on the extremities of the body of Aaron and his sons. In verses 24-25 Moses then puts parts of the victims in their hands, has them perform the office of waving them before Yahweh, and receives them back. As a result of this ritual gesture, Aaron and his sons are invested with priestly power. (Verses 27-30 interrupt the ceremony. They determine the offering due the priests and make provision for handing down the priestly vestments.) Next, the priests boil the flesh of this second ram and share it in a sacred meal. Since this meal is a holy meal in connection with their priestly consecration, lay persons may not join them (vv. 31-35). This section concludes by noting the length of the ceremony. The exceptional holiness of the altar (Yahweh's meeting place—see verses 43-44) is underlined in the rubric of a daily sacrifice of a bullock for this seven-day period (vv. 35-37).

29:38-46 Daily sacrifices. The daily sacrifice of two yearling lambs (vv. 38-42) leads into a profound theological statement by P (vv. 43-46). The consecration of the altar, the sanctuary, and the priests looks to God's ongoing presence in the midst of Israel. Specifically, this God who dwells among them is none other than Yahweh, who brought the Israelites out of Egypt. Israel's cultic institutions are thus rooted in the Exodus and in Sinai.

30:1-38 Further cultic ordinances. The altar of the incense (called the golden altar in 1 Kgs 7:48) is perhaps a later priestly insertion, since it should be logically mentioned in 26:33-37 and is not included in the incense-related episodes in the desert (see Num 16:6-7, 17-18; 17:11-12). Each morning and each evening (vv. 7-8) a priest removes pieces of coal with a shovel from the altar of holocausts, sprinkles powder on the coals, and places them on the altar of incense (see Luke 1:8-9). Verses 34-38 provide the mixture for this absolutely sacred perfume. On the Day of Atonement (v. 10) the high priest takes this life-saving smoke screen into the Holy of Holies and rubs the blood of the sacrificial animal on the horns of the altar of incense itself (see Lev 16:12-13, 18).

Census taking is construed as a dangerous undertaking (see 32:30-35; 2 Sam 24). Everyone, therefore, of twenty years of age or over, who seeks to be enrolled and wishes to avoid the census plague must make a contribution to the sanctuary of a half-shekel (vv. 11-16; see Neh 10:33-35). Such a religious precaution is a fitting offering to the upkeep of Yahweh's dwelling place.

Verses 17-33 enact further requirements for cultic personnel and objects. According to verses 17-21 the priests must employ the laver (see 2 Chr 4:6) for washing their hands and feet prior to entering the sanctuary and when officiating at the altar (all Moslems observe this rite before prayer in the mosque). Since there is no mention of the laver in 38:29-31 and since it logically belongs with the altar of holocausts in 27:1-7, it is very likely a later priestly insertion. In addition to the washing, the priests (v. 30) and all the sacred furniture (vv. 26-28) are to be anointed with a very special holy oil (vv. 23-25). These rubrics indicate the unique character of cultic personnel and objects. They must be removed from everything that smacks of the profane (vv. 32-33). For P, however, the holiness of the sanctuary with its personnel is intended to have a sanctifying effect on the entire people of Yahweh.

31:1-11 Choice of artisans. The construction of a god's temple is not a haphazard decision. In ancient Canaanite literature the construction of Baal's temple falls to a special craftsman god. Against this background P has Yahweh single out Bezalel and, as his assistant, Oholiab. P emphasizes that Bezalel's talent results from a divine spirit (v. 3; see also 35:31). This detail is central to P's plan of divine presence whereby the creation of the world, the construction of the desert sanctuary, and the erection of the sanctuary are interrelated. Thus God's spirit in Gen 1:2 is linked to the spirit-filled architect of the desert construction (v. 3), who is, in turn, linked to the spirit-filled leader of the occupation forces, Joshua (see Num 27:18; Deut 34:9).

A key structural element in P is the execution of a command given directly or indirectly by God (see 7:6; 12:28). As noted in 25:1-9, it is eminently important to have exact correspondence between God's plan and its execution. Thus the divine command communicated through Moses to the artisans (vv. 6, 11) will be carried out exactly. In chapter 39 that execution will be noted in a context that also links the construction of the sanctuary to the creation of the world.

31:12-18 The significance of the sabbath. Although P earlier connected sabbath observance with the manna (16:23-30), he now develops the meaning of that institution for Israel. As in the other traditions of the sabbath in Exodus, there is the mention of cessation of work (see 20:9; 23:12; 34:21) and of the link to creation (see 20:11). In this passage, however, P underlines the sign value (vv. 13, 17) and the covenant thrust (v. 16) of the sabbath. Since Yahweh sanctified the sabbath (Gen 2:3) and rested (Gen 2:2) in the aftermath of creation (here in verse 17 Yahweh refreshes himself), Israel acknowledges through its observance the Holy One in her midst. Israel thereby enters into the whole rhythm of creation, celebrating anew her bond with the creator God and the created world. Israel is sacred and given over to Yahweh (v. 13), just as the sabbath is sacred and given over to Yahweh (vv. 14, 15). Later (39:43) P will connect Yahweh's action of blessing on the seventh day with Moses' blessing of the artisans.

PART V: ISRAEL'S APOSTASY AND THE RENEWAL OF THE COVENANT

Exod 32:1–34:35

This section of Exodus bristles with enormous difficulties. The source division of chapters 32–33 is far from clear. The original event behind the story of the Golden Calf is not really apparent. Nevertheless, despair should not control the general interpretation of the final text. Though the history of the traditions in these chapters continues to be elusive, what does emerge with clarity is Israel's ultimate understanding of herself as a covenanted people. The multiplicity of traditions, moreover, points to the centrality of this episode for her self-understanding.

Not a few scholars are convinced that a real event stands behind the story of the Golden Calf and that it occurred during the wilderness experience. There may have been a group that opposed Moses and his ark of the covenant symbol. Such a group under the leadership of Aaron may have broken away from allegiance to Moses and insisted on a bull figure as their symbol of the divine presence. However, to be more specific is to go beyond the evidence.

It should be noted that the Golden Calf does not violate the prescription of the Ten Commandments regarding false images (20:4-5). That prohibition concerns the person of Yahweh, whereas the Golden Calf (actually a young bull) looks to an attribute of Yahweh—strength. Such bulls could serve as supports for Yahweh's throne (see the cherubim in 25:10-22). Israel's history, however, shows that the people did not always distinguish between the deity and the deity's attribute and so identified the young bull with Yahweh (see Hos 13:2).

Jeroboam I (931–910 B.C.E.), the first king of the northern kingdom, set up such a young bull image in the cities of Dan and Bethel (see 1 Kgs 12:26-32) as a cultic move against Solomon's temple. Jeroboam's use of these images suggests that they were already an old tradition. Hence Exod 32 need not be construed as directly condemning this king's cultic changes. However, it is likely that this chapter is an indirect condemnation of Jeroboam's cultic reforms.

In their present setting chapters 32–34 reflect a theology of covenant renewal. The elements in this theological construct are: (a) sin, which is generally apostasy; (b) punishment; (c) repentance; (d) restoration (see Num 13–14; Judg 3:7-11). This pattern is theologically significant. It implies that Yahweh chooses to reveal himself, not only through a people (which is indeed a plus) but also through a sinful people. In this respect Israel considers herself a refuge of sinners.

32:1-6 Making of the Golden Calf. The sin in this covenant renewal pattern is the desire of the people to get rid of Moses and so obtain a new leader (vv. 1, 4). This tradition is certainly non-priestly. In such traditions Aaron is never identified as a priest or an ancestor of priests; indeed, as here, he even opposes Yahweh's chosen leader (see Num 12:1-8). Aaron readily accedes to the wishes of the people, constructs the young bull image, and calls for a celebration involving holocausts and communion sacrifices (vv. 2-5). It is not really clear that the reveling in verse 6 is some form of debauchery. Israel's sin of apostasy consists in rejecting Moses as leader and hence in rejecting Yahweh.

32:7-14 Yahweh's wrath and Moses' mediation. Moses appears as a covenant mediator, one who intercedes for the people, here in the context of winning forgiveness that ultimately leads to covenant renewal. Israel, therefore, envisioned a special role of intercession whereby the relationship of the people to Yahweh was bound up with the relationship of certain endowed individuals to Yahweh. It is also interesting to observe that Moses is able to oppose the God of Israel and still not be labeled unloyal.

Yahweh's violent reaction is precisely the reverse of that envisioned by the young bull devotees. Yahweh plans to wipe this people out and begin anew (vv. 7-10). Moses begins his mediatory role by pursuing the argument of continuity in history. To have the people die in the desert would only provoke ridicule from Yahweh's enemies in Egypt. The action begun in Egypt should be carried on to completion. To abandon Israel now would be to renege on the promises to the patriarchs (vv. 11-13). In the end Yahweh allows the persuasive Moses to win the argument (v. 14).

32:15-24 Twofold destruction. The tablets play a significant part in this story. In verses 15-16 these tablets are unique. Although the custom was to have such inscriptions on only one side, these are on both sides. E's tradition is hinted at. (Joshua's presence in verse 17 has already been explained by E in 24:12.) The divine revelation which Moses was to have communicated to the people is now recast to tell the account of Israel's infidelity and so necessitate Moses' return to the mountain where he will receive new tablets. Although J has Moses inscribe the tablets (34:28), this tradition insists that God himself actually did the engraving (see also P in 31:18). The tradition, therefore, went beyond the ancient Near Eastern understanding of divine writing whereby a deity did not produce the document physically. Yahweh's writing, as a result, stresses their value and authority. In the other direction, the breaking of the tablets is the breaking of the covenant relationship between Yahweh and Israel. The action of the people in the construction of the young bull image results in the destruction of the covenant bond.

The destruction of the tablets is followed by the account of the construction and subsequent destruction of the Golden Calf. Although verses 21-24 make a feeble attempt to exculpate Aaron's role in verses 2-5, they are interesting from the standpoint of the making of cultic objects. In ancient Canaanite literature, for example, cultic objects acquired their desired form by themselves. The palace of Baal is completed after a fire has worked on the silver and the gold for six days. Aaron's reply in verse 24 that the image emerged by itself is thus readily intelligible. The destruction is even more interesting. According to verse 20 Moses employs mutually exclusive acts in undoing the image: burning and grinding. In ancient Canaanite literature Mot, the god of death, is undone in the same way. Anat, Baal's consort, burns, grinds, and scatters Mot. The final act of making the Israelites drink the image-polluted water (see also Deut 9:21) is similar to Anat's scattering of Mot's remains in the open fields where birds consume them. In Exodus the Golden Calf, like Mot, is utterly destroyed and made totally irretrievable.

32:25-29 The zeal of the Levites. There are two traditions for the punishment of the people. According to verse 35 Yahweh smites the people for their sinful action. According to verses 25-29 members of the tribe of Levi rally to Moses' call to arms and execute the Israelites who sacrificed to the Golden Calf, including their own relatives. This loyalty wins for them their priestly prerogatives (see Deut 33:9). This tradition does not condemn Aaron as the ancestor of the Aaronites. It expresses the reaction of the covenant-committed Levites who rejected the cult established by Jeroboam I at Bethel, one of the cities where this king erected a young bull image. This episode also condemns the action of the king in making priests from among the people who were not Levites (see 1 Kgs 12:31).

32:30-35 The atonement. This tradition stresses Moses' identity with the people. If Yahweh is unrelenting, then the mediator wishes to share the fate of the people. The concept of God's book was known in the ancient Near East and is at home in the notion of military conscription where the lives of those enrolled in the book were fraught with danger. In this section Israel adapts the tradition—an Israel that considers herself

God's army. At the time of a census (see 30:11-16) there was a rite of expiation (see "atonement" in verse 30) and the names of the Israelites were inscribed on tablets. Those so inscribed enjoyed the rights of a member of God's militia, for example, possession of the land and worship in the sanctuary. Anyone removed from the tablets was placed among the dead, that is, separated from the community.

33:1-6 Orders for the departure. This section pursues the thrust of 32:33-34, the continuation of the journey to the Promised Land with the aid of an angel. However, the angel in 32:34 merely affirmed Moses' leadership role. The basic issue here is the personal presence of Yahweh with Moses and the Israelites (vv. 2-3). An angel is not the same as Yahweh. This bad news is reiterated in verses 4-6 and is marked by a sign of Israel's repentance, the removal of all ornaments. The people now stand under God's judgment. One naturally wonders about the efficacy of Moses' mediation.

33:7-11 Moses and the Tent of Meeting. This tradition, which is generally ascribed to E, takes up the question of divine presence already broached in verses 1-6. However, the text itself is not a unity. According to verse 7 any Israelite can visit the tent. However, according to verse 8 only Moses visits the tent while the people remain at their own tents in awe. According to verse 11b an official resides permanently in the tent. Yet verse 11a presumes that the intimate dialogue between God and Moses precludes the presence of a third person. Verses 8 and 10 presume that the tent is placed in the middle of the camp (see P in 25:1-9). But verse 7 states that the tent is outside the camp and indeed at some distance from the camp.

It seems that E has introduced changes into an older tent tradition from Israel's desert experience in order to demonstrate that the tent theophany is a miniature reproduction of the revelation of Sinai. Both the mountain and the tent are outside the camp (v. 7; 19:17). In both cases the people remain at a distance (v. 8; 20:18). (In Hebrew the same verb is used for the people stationing themselves [v. 8; 19:17].) In both cases a cloud indicates the divine presence (vv. 9-10; 19:16ab). In both cases Joshua assists Moses (v. 11b; 24:13). Finally, in both cases Moses appears as God's intimate. Israel's relationship to Yahweh hinges in no small measure on this unique mediator.

33:12-17 Moses' intercession. This section is linked to Moses' position vis-à-vis Yahweh (v. 11a) and his order to lead the people on (v. 1a). According to verse 12 the implication is that an angel simply will not do. Appealing to his status as divine intimate, Moses argues on behalf of the people (v. 13). If the leader's status is genuine, the divine conclusion must be to provide for the people. Verse 14 shows that the appeal is successful. However, it is directed only at Moses. Still dissatisfied, Moses presses his case by demonstrating that divine intimacy is real only if the people are included (vv. 15-16). The community-directed argument of Moses finally obtains divine approval (v. 17). The significance of this argumentation should not be overlooked. It implies that the welfare of the covenant people (here their renewal as God's people) is grounded in the love and trust between the covenant God and the covenant mediator.

33:18-23 Preparations for theophany. With no little audacity Moses seeks further surety for his people, since the pronouncing of the divine name is the guarantee of presence and hence of compassion (for this compassion see 34:6-7). Divine name goes hand in hand with covenant. Because of the dangers connected with the direct display of God's glory, Moses is to be set in the hollow of a rock and covered by God's hand (vv. 21-22). The viewing of God's back (but not his face) is both the limit and the proof of Moses' intimacy, but of intimacy as related to the well-being of the people. (For Elijah's similar theophany see 1 Kgs 19:9, 11-13.)

34:1-9 The theophany. Most of this section is from J (vv. 1a, 2-4, 6a, 8). Indeed, together with most of the remaining material in chapter 34, this scene is the natural sequel of Moses' ascent of the mountain in 19:20 (J). In keeping with the basic outline of the covenant proceedings, an expression of God's will is expected in J's account. This expression has been removed from its natural place—after 19:20—because of Israel's infidelity in the Golden Calf incident. In other words, the expression of God's will in the initial encounter on the mountain in J has become the expression of God's will in the second encounter of covenant renewal. According to the pattern of covenant renewal, restoration is now in order. The making of new tablets symbolizes the making of a new covenant. (References to the former broken tablets in verse 1b and to the cloud in verse 5 are editorial touches to make the J account fit its new setting.)

J's theophany has, first of all, Moses cutting the tablets and ascending the mountain alone (vv. 1a, 2-4). Next, Yahweh passes before Moses (v. 6a). Finally, in deference to the divine presence, Moses bows down to worship (v. 8).

Verses 6-7 and 9 are the conclusion of Moses' mediatorial role begun in 33:12-23. The theophany announced in 33:19 now takes place. The cultic saying in verses 6-7 (see also 20:5-6) in its present position is a statement about divine forgiveness and divine punishment. The word translated "merciful" in verse 6 (also the verb "to grant mercy" in 33:19) derives from the Hebrew word for "womb." Thus Mother Yahweh demonstrates that compassion for Israel which a mother is expected to show the child of her womb. At the same time, Yahweh will not let the guilty escape (v. 7). Ultimately the request for forgiveness (v. 9) is grounded once again in the relationship that Moses enjoys with Yahweh. The covenant renewal can now proceed because Moses has identified with Israel.

34:10-26 The Dodecalogue. There is no mention of Israel's explicit response to Yahweh's overtures in this covenant renewal. Moses' intercession and the people's repentance seem adequate (see also 1 Sam 12:16-25). The opening verses (vv. 10-11) transcend the immediate setting by focusing on the dangers that will confront Israel in the Promised Land (note also 23:20-33). Sinai appears, therefore, as the apt place for anticipating those dangers by reason of the covenant bond that will distinguish Israel from her neighbors.

Although verse 28 speaks of the Decalogue or Ten Commandments, this series of laws is actually a Dodecalogue or Twelve Commandments. (The expression "ten commandments" in verse 28 is a later development.) The Dodecalogue is often labeled cultic or ritual in contradistinction to the ethical Decalogue (see the injunction for the pilgrimage feasts in verse 23 and the law of redemption in verses 19-20). However, the prohibitions of images (v. 17) and intermarriage with the Canaanites (v. 16) are patently ethical. Moreover, most of these commandments are second person singular formulations (see 20:1-17). For J, this collection creates a healthy tension in his theological approach. According to Gen 12:1-3, Israel is to mediate blessings to the conquered nations. But a pagan environment can pose problems in mediating those blessings. This Dodecalogue, therefore, is J's form of insistence on fidelity to the covenant God in a pagan setting (vv. 12-15). It is rightly called by some Yahweh's privilege law—a statement of Yahweh's prerogatives grounded in his character as the Jealous One (v. 15). The distinctiveness of Israel flows from the distinctiveness of her God.

34:27-35 The impact of theophany. J mentions the divine command to write down the terms of the covenant and the subsequent execution of that command on the mountain for a period comprising forty days and forty nights (vv. 27-28; see Deut 9:9,18; Matt 4:2). J then narrates Moses' gathering of the people and his enjoining on them all that Yahweh commanded on the mountain (vv. 31-32).

The tradition contained in verses 29-30, 33-35 deals with Moses' shining face. It is linked to Moses' mediatorial position already noted in chapters 33 and 34. According to the tradition, Moses must veil his face when he is not performing his official duties (vv. 33-34). Whatever the background of the veil itself, what is central to the biblical account is the radiant face of Moses insofar as it derives from God and is the symbol of his authority before God. The man who was rejected by the people (32:1, 4) is the man who restored them in covenant and who now fittingly wears the symbol of his divine office. (See Paul's application of this tradition in 2 Cor 3:7-4:6.)

PART VI: THE EXECUTION OF THE INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE BUILDING OF THE SANCTUARY

Exod 35:1-40:38

P now recounts the execution of the instructions given to Moses in chapters 25–31. It is tempting to construe chapters 35–40, together with chapter 34, as a type of restoration. Thus chapters 25–31 are a creation and chapters 32–33 a fall. In any event, P utilizes the Sinai setting to develop his theology of divine presence.

35:1–36:7 The start of construction and Israel's generosity. P's basic structure here is the execution of commands given directly or indirectly by God. Thus there are divine commands for: (a) the observance of the sabbath (35:1, including the prohibition against lighting fires, in verse 3); (b) the collection of materials (35:4); (c) the call for artisans (35:10); (d) the start of work on the project (36:1). P goes on to note that the Israelites generously respond to Yahweh's command (35:20-29). In fact, they are overzealous. Moses has to make a special appeal to stop the flow of contributions (36:2-6). The outcome is nonetheless an abundance of materials to complete the work (36:7). The spirit-endowed Bezalel and Oholiab (see 31:1-11) as well as the other artisans are also portrayed as responding to the divine command to execute all the work. It is rather interesting to compare this wholehearted response in P's ideal account with the reluctance to rebuild the temple after the Exile (see the prophets Haggai and Zechariah). The biblical record does not hesitate to register both the ideal and the real.

36:8–39:31 Execution of the divine instructions. With the exception of 38:21-31 this section details how the divine instructions communicated to Moses in chapters 25–31 were in fact carried out. There is a difference, however, in the sequence. While the ark with the table and the lampstand (25:10-39) heads the list of instructions because of their greater importance, the tent (26:1-37) comes first in the order of execution. In this way there is progress from the outside inward. In general, this section basically duplicates chapters 25–31, belaboring the point that the final product corresponds to the initial directions. For the tent cloth, coverings, wooden frames, and veils (36:8-38) see 26:1-29, 31-37. For the ark with the propitiatory, table, and lampstand (37:1-24) see 25:10-39. For the altar of incense (37:25-28) as well as the anointing oil and fragrant incense (37:29) see 30:1-6, 23-25, 34-36. For the altar of holocausts and the court (38:1-7, 9-20) see 27:1-19. For the priestly and other vestments (39:1-31) see 28:1-43.

In 38:8 P notes that the bronze laver (30:18-21) was made from the mirrors of the women who served at the entrance of the sanctuary. These women reappear in a gloss of 1 Sam 2:22. Just what function they performed is not clear. There is no evidence to suggest that they exercised an office in public worship.

The passage dealing with the amount of metal used (38:21-31) is a later insertion into the text. The sanctuary tax in verse 26 that draws on the first census of Israel (to be mentioned later in Num 1:45-46) apparently ignores the tradition of 35:21 and 36:3. According to this tradition Israel generously contributes on a voluntary basis. Verse 21 notes the position of Ithamar, son of Aaron, as head of the Levites. However, the Levites (see 28:1-43) are not instituted until Num 3:5-10 and Ithamar assumes his role as head only in Num 4:33.

39:32-43 Presentation of the work to Moses. Besides enumerating the finished cultic materials that are presented to Moses, this section is especially significant for P's theology of God's ongoing presence. By a subtle use of structures, P interconnects the creation of the world, the construction/erection of the desert sanctuary, and the establishment of that sanctuary in the Promised Land (for this last point see 40:1-33). Despite Israel's infidelity, God's plan will not be thwarted. The God who created in the beginning will continue to create in Israel's ongoing history. Cult, therefore, is the principal means by which the creative presence will be manifest among the Israelites.

P not only reintroduces his execution-of-command structure (see 35:1–36:7) but here he also embellishes it with a more solemn formulation. Verse 32b may be translated literally: "And the sons of Israel did [it] according to everything that Yahweh had commanded Moses. Thus they did [it]." Similarly verse 42: "According to everything that Yahweh had commanded Moses, thus the sons of Israel did all the work." P also brings in a second structure, successful completion of work (v. 32a). In addition P has Moses make a judgment on the people's work. Verse 43a may be translated literally: "And Moses saw all the work, and behold, they had done it." Right after this judgment, P has Moses bless the people (v. 43b).

The parallels with P's creation account are evident. In Gen 1:31 God looks at everything he has made and labels it very good. Gen 2:1 observes that the heavens and the earth and all their array are finished. After concluding the six days of creation, God blesses the seventh day (Gen 2:3). Since God cannot issue a command to God, the creation account does not allow for the execution-of-command structure. As mentioned earlier (31:1-11), the spirit at work in creation (Gen 1:2) is also operative in Bezalel, the chief engineer of the sanctuary construction.

40:1-33 The erection of the sanctuary. Here P minutely relates how Moses carries out Yahweh's instructions in setting up the desert sanctuary. Besides pinpointing the time (vv. 2, 17) and accentuating the privileges of the Aaronites (vv. 13-15), P takes pains to highlight the significance of the event by means of his structures. The execution-of-command structure is mentioned no less than eight times (vv. 16, 19, 21, 23, 25, 27, 29, 32). Indeed, verse 16 has the more solemn form of the structure, which may be translated literally: "And Moses did according to everything that Yahweh had commanded him, thus he did [it]." The structure of successful completion of work is also in evidence. According to verse 33 Moses finishes everything.

P links not only creation and the erection of the sanctuary but also the setting up of that sanctuary in the apportioned Promised Land. In Num 27:18 and Deut 34:9, P describes Joshua as the spirit-filled leader and the architect of Israel's plan of occupation. In Josh 14:5, when narrating the division of the land, P employs the more solemn form of the execution-of-command structure. It may be translated literally: "As Yahweh had commanded Moses, thus the sons of Israel did [it] and they divided the land." In the same book, P also uses the successful completion-of-work structure in narrating the final apportionment: (literally) "And they finished dividing the land." This final act, moreover, takes place in front of the tent at Shiloh. In keeping with the divine command to subdue the earth (Gen 1:28), P states in Josh 18:1 that the earth was indeed subdued. In the same text he notes that the community of Israel gathered around the tent which was set up in Shiloh. For P, therefore, the event at Shiloh looks back to Sinai, which in turn looks back to the first creation. God's abiding presence in the land is the sacrament of hope for P's despairing exiles. In the final analysis, the dull rubrics are charged with life.

40:34-38 The abiding presence. For P, Sinai is the model of worship. According to 24:15b-16a the cloud covers the mountain and settles there. Here, too, the cloud covers the sanctuary and Yahweh's glory fills it (v. 34). For P, therefore, the desert sanctuary captures the experience on Sinai and perpetuates it.

This tradition of the cloud's covering and settling is also the seal of approval on and legitimation of everything that Moses and the Israelites have done. Yahweh here takes possession of his sanctuary. This is also Israel's experience when Yahweh's glory fills Solomon's temple and the priests are unable to minister because of the cloud (see 1 Kgs 8:10-11). P's cloud theophany also anticipates Israel's ongoing trek through the wilderness. P's cloud, which now does duty for the tradition of the pillar of cloud and the pillar of fire (see 13:21-22; 14:19-20), also serves as a signal. It will indicate when and how long Israel will set up camp and when Israel is to strike camp (see Num 9:15-23).

In these concluding chapters, P reveals himself to be a truly pastoral theologian. For a people that experienced God's absence in the fall of Jerusalem and subsequent exile, P now proclaims the good news of God's presence. Aware that Israel is deprived of temple worship because she dwells in a foreign land, P announces that Israel will be restored to the land and indeed that the land will be sanctified by God's presence in the sanctuary. (For the conditions of return see Lev 26.) One thus returns to the gospel of creation. By careful and proper attention to cult, the Israelite is empowered to move from chaos to cosmos.

LEVITICUS

Wayne A. Turner

INTRODUCTION

This is a book about holiness. Known also as the third book of Moses, the Book of Leviticus is one volume in the five-volume work called the Pentateuch. The term Torah, which usually means law, but more exactly is teaching, instruction, or direction, refers to the message of this book. Even though we customarily refer to Leviticus as a book, it is better to call it one chapter in the whole story of the Torah. This chapter is about a holy God and a people called to be holy.

1. Holiness means wholeness

To understand this chapter in the Torah story we need to consider "wholeness" as one meaning of holiness. This is more than a play on words and is necessary to understand the Book of Leviticus. Wholeness, in a sense, describes the life of God. More precisely, wholeness describes our lives when they reflect the life of God.

The biblical meaning of holiness includes not only the mystery of God but also the creature's response to that mystery. "Be holy, for I, the Lord, your God, am holy" (11:44-45; 19:2; 20:7, 26). The root of the word holy means "to cut off, separate," referring to the separation of the holy from the profane (unholy). "Holy" refers to persons, places, or things approached or touched only under certain conditions of ritual purity.

"Wholeness" describes particularly the response of the people to the command "Be holy, for I, the Lord, am holy." For, while there is a certain wholeness to the idea of oneness, God alone resides in absolute oneness. There is also a certain oneness about wholeness, which can reflect what Genesis calls the "image and likeness of God" (1:26).

Wholeness, unlike oneness, has parts or components. It is in the proper ordering of the parts of life that wholeness comes about and serves the cause of holiness. For example, a jigsaw puzzle must be put together in a particular order. If even one piece is left over, the puzzle lacks wholeness and oneness.

As we read the Book of Leviticus, we must keep in mind that everything fits together in a proper order. This serves the wholeness that reflects the oneness of God who called the people to be holy. The simple order of obedience, ritual purity, and holiness is as valid today as when first presented by the Priestly writers. True obedience plants the seed of an authentic ritual that purifies and prepares for the life of holiness. Once this simple lesson-plan was recognized, the Levitical material took its shape. Then this book acted as the key piece for the Pentateuch and became the third book of Moses. The five books formed one complete account of divine-human relationship, with Leviticus as the very heart of the Torah.

2. The titles tell the story

The Hebrew titles of the five books of Moses spell out a theme that is repeated again and again in the Bible and in life itself—God creates, identifies, and calls people from the wilderness of this life into the one, complete (holy) life that is God's. These books act as the "entrance" to the whole Bible.

In the Hebrew Bible the first significant word of each book is the title for that book. In the Pentateuch the Hebrew titles make a logical statement of the divine-human experience. In the beginning (Genesis) God created; these are the names (Exodus), and he called (Leviticus) Moses in the wilderness (Numbers) to speak these words (Deuteronomy). Note the place of Leviticus; the names (Exodus) of those led out of slavery needed direction to follow their calling as a "kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (19:6), especially in the wilderness (Numbers).

When reading Leviticus keep in mind the "guideline character" of this chapter in the one story that makes up the Pentateuch.

3. The title

The title in Hebrew is one word meaning "and he called." Today the common title is the Latinized Greek name Leviticus, which describes activities of the Levites (priests) from the tribe of Levi. The Hebrew title points to a vocation-call in the instruction of the Torah. So when using Leviticus, it is well to keep in mind the Hebrew overtone of "calling" or "vocation."

This central theme of a call to holiness is found in the Code of Holiness (17–26). It possibly formed an original "manual of holiness" around which the final editors of the book gathered other priestly (Levitical) material.

4. Three codes of law (instruction) in the Pentateuch

Three such Codes of Law have been identified in the Pentateuch: the Sinai or Covenant Code, which is the oldest and found in the Book of Exodus (19–24); the Levitical Code of Holiness (Lev 17–26); and an updating of the Torah in the Deuteronomy Code (Deut 12–26). Even though these three are considered the Codes of Law, many other passages in the Pentateuch speak of legal regulations. In fact, the Levitical regulations are not only in the Book of Leviticus but also in the second and the fourth books of Moses, Exodus and Numbers. Actually, there is more mention of the Levites elsewhere in the Pentateuch than in the Book of Leviticus. Here we concentrate on the "call to holiness."

5. Leviticus—heart of the Torah

Leviticus not only teaches holiness; the book itself is an example of holiness. The orderly arrangement is our first evidence of the presence of holiness. A simple arrangement of the material can be an important witness to holiness. Note that the matter of sacrifices (chs. 1–7) leads naturally into the subject of those who offer them (chs. 8–10) with their dispositions of legal purity (chs. 11–16) and legal holiness (chs. 17–27)—such a simple arrangement and yet filled with importance and authority calling the people to follow the Torah.

The book is something like the simple but decisive presence of the heart in the human organism. Even when its presence and precision of function are taken for granted, it continues to beat for the good of the whole organism. The material assigned to Leviticus seems to have a similar relation to the whole Torah. Leviticus is the heart of the Torah, and the beat of this heart is called the Code of Holiness (chs. 17–26).

The depth and elegance of the simple arrangement of Leviticus is revealed, first in the pulsating rhythm of the repeated "And the Lord spoke to Moses." After the vocational call of Moses in chapter 1, almost every chapter begins with this same refrain. The repetition is also a reminder of the form of a legal document with its repetition of formal phrases, details, and directions. In fact, roughly corresponding to the above four areas of arrangement, some legal-minded commentators point to underlying detailed arrangements. Some find seven sets of decalogues in each section. They say that they are patterned after the Decalogue (Ten Commandments) given on Mount Sinai. Thus, Leviticus, as the heart of the Torah, reflects the fine design of a heart and the simplicity of one of its single life-giving beats.

The commandments were now to come alive in the lives of the newly-formed people. The heart of the new priestly nation must now begin to beat and carry out the instruction to be holy (19:2). This holiness is at work in the Torah and throughout the whole Bible. "Holy" and "sacred" and other related forms are used over a thousand times, with nearly one quarter of such references in Leviticus.

St. Jerome in a letter to the cleric Paulinus affirms the holiness of the book: "In the Book of Leviticus it is easy to see that every sacrifice, yes, almost every syllable and both the garments of Aaron and the whole order of Leviticus breathe heavenly mysteries." Years later another Scripture writer, Peter, encourages the vocational call of Leviticus: "So gird the loins of your understanding, live soberly, set all your hope on the gift to be conferred on you when Jesus Christ appears. As obedient sons, do not yield to the desires that once shaped you in your ignorance. Rather, become holy yourselves in every aspect of your conduct, after the likeness of the Holy One who called you; remember Scripture says, 'You shall be holy, for I am holy'" (1 Pet 1:13-16 quoting Lev 19:2). This same pulsating beat of holiness endures today in the vocational call of everyone.

6. The shape of Leviticus—date and authorship

Today we usually think of a book as having one or two authors and written over just a few years. However, the Bible is the history of the people of God written by many authors and editors over two thousand years. Just as we can expect many changes in the history of a people, we can expect changes in the documents that record that history. Scholars sometimes speak of a particular manuscript family when referring to various manuscripts.

We now recognize that some final editors were not just compilers, but were true authors. Editors also reshaped or added material along the way. In Leviticus the form of the material is historical and legal, dealing with the call to holiness. Much of the material, especially in the first chapters, is "liturgical," having been written and edited by Levites or priests and given the name "Priestly" (P).

The Book of Leviticus has a unique shape and fits into a larger unit of the Pentateuch. This larger unit extends from Exod 25 through Leviticus to Num 10. Every book of the Pentateuch has some sections written by P. The emphasis given by these writers and final editors focuses on the underlying need to be holy.

One gets the impression that Leviticus, though edited, was substantially preserved, rather than abbreviated, to form a synthesis of worship regulations. This might explain why the Bible reader often bypasses Leviticus with the expression "Oh, it's just a bunch of laws and regulations." This is a valid first impression, but the editors used this material to fill a need for guidance and completeness. The final editors intentionally gave a wilderness setting to Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers. What could be more needed in the wilderness than a book on law (direction) and order?

Just as we recognize schools of writers, so we find today schools of scholars presenting various answers to dating, text, and authorship questions. For some, Moses is the author, while others hold that the book is postexilic (late fifth century B.C.E.). Yet another group stands a near-middle ground and gives a date around the eighth century B.C.E. Further, it may be that the final shape was not decided at any one of these times. Such theories should help the reader understand the final form of a biblical book.

It is in the final editing that the whole message is conveyed. The shape of the book at the time it is born into the holy life of the Bible is the time when its divine source of life (i.e., divine inspiration) is affirmed. All the oral and written traditions, development of thought and practice, writing, editing and reediting come together in the Bible to serve the one, holy God. Leviticus witnesses this presence of God.

In considering the wilderness setting of the Book of Leviticus, somewhere a prejudice against temple worship could have influenced the shaping of the material. This prejudice could have occurred more than once. Also, the dispersion of population and distance of travel affect ritual practice. It is further possible that there were those who were convinced that Yahweh should be a pilgrim God, not having a fixed abode in this world except in the Holy of Holies of the Tabernacle, an abode that could travel with them wherever they would go, even into exile.

This commentary seeks to affirm the Book of Leviticus as it is in the Pentateuch, since this is the result of the final editing. The ancient editors presented a particular coherence for the ingathering of all the materials and traditions. Sometimes that ancient part of Leviticus, the Code of Holiness (17–26), is attributed to an author called H who is earlier than any of the Priestly writers.

7. Levitical themes

A. Read the directions. One regulation in everyday life simply says, "Read the directions." Sometimes it is touched with irony when someone says, "When everything else fails, read the directions!" Reading the directions is, no doubt, the first thing to do when beginning a new project. This advice could act as a meditation for reading the Book of Leviticus. In a way Leviticus serves as the directions for the whole Torah.

Leviticus gives a simple direction for life. The direction is as important and enduring as the beat and pulse of the heart is to the body. It is found in the lesson plan of obedience, purity, and holiness. The order is important. We begin with an obedience that brings about purification. This combination, in turn, conditions one for the life of holiness. So the direction for living a holy life is in Leviticus, centered around the simple directive of chapter 19, "Be holy, for I, the Lord, your God, am holy."

The Holy One of Israel (Isa 1:4) is God and God's name is Holy (Lev 22:32). The people, too, are to be holy. This is the regulation of life: "Sanctify yourselves, then, and be holy. . . . Be careful, therefore, to observe what I, the Lord, who make you holy, have prescribed" (20:7-8; see also 22:31-33).

B. Israel's responsibility to its neighbors. To understand the Book of Leviticus, we must respect the neighborhood in which Israel lived and moved. We proceed with caution from what we know to search out the unknown. Sometimes we expect a greater responsibility (ability-to-respond) on the part of Israel than we should. This is often done by including all the people of the then known world into the circle of Israel's response to life. This approach tends to become a smothering, rather than a drawing-out experience. We need to know more about the people of that time before we transfer the biblical narrative into real life experiences and judge historical events.

The relationship of Israel with the Canaanite and other peoples into whose land they sojourned or moved is of prime importance. The discoveries at Ras Shamra (on the Mediterranean, dating from 1400 B.C.E.) and Ebla (75 miles northeast, dating from 2300 B.C.E.) shed some light on the neighbors of the people of the Bible (see, for example, Exod 23). However, much material is still in the stage of critical analysis and publication. The translations themselves take many years. Ras Shamra (Ugarit) was first excavated in 1929, and some parallels to Israel's language and literature both there and at Ebla (1968-1974) have been recognized.

C. My holy name. A more exact translation of "my holy name" is "the name of my holiness." In Hebrew "holiness" refers to a concrete reality for which the emphasis is intended. Another example, "my good day," is really "the day of my goodness." Hebrew places the emphasis where it belongs.

Another important difference is using the superlative to preserve a certain dignified identity. For "holiest," the Hebrew says "the Holy of Holies."

A third difference not to be overlooked when reading the Bible is that certain realities in Hebrew thought are not considered separate entities as they are in our Western thought. Ideas such as body and soul, blood and life, thought and action, are almost always considered the same reality. In Hebrew thought, for instance, there is no word for body. "Flesh" is used instead. Thus, "all flesh" is really every created living thing and is equivalent to "every living soul." Because blood and life are intimately associated, it is the blood of Abel that cries out to God from the soil (Gen 4:10). Nor are understanding and good apart from life itself, "Give me understanding (discernment), that I may live" (Ps 119:144). The expression "Adam knew Eve and she conceived Cain" means that they had intercourse (since there is no separation of body and soul, the action can be called a knowledge). It is sharing one's life with another in the action that truthfully (knowingly) expresses the oneness of God reflected in the man-woman creation.

Biblical thought does not really contain what we are accustomed to think of as a code of ethics. Thus, in speaking of the Torah we should avoid the Western term law. The Torah is not a system of laws. The Torah comes from God, to teach, regulate, instruct and distinguish. "Law," in our Western thought, makes it a mere code of ethics. The Bible says, "Oh how I love your Torah, it is my meditation all the day" (see Ps 119).

D. A common language of cult activity in the ancient Near East. Over the centuries various reasons have been given for ritual and dietary regulations. The historian Philo and the philosopher Maimonides believed that God gave some of the commands and regulations in order to serve as a self-discipline of the appetites. Philo says that Moses forbade pork, since it is the most delicious of all meats and that self-denial would curb one's self-indulgence. He forbade flesh-eating animals and birds in order to teach one to be gentle and kind. Sometimes analogies were made between physical and spiritual. Thus, the cud-chewing animals are permitted, since they help one grow in wisdom (by chewing over and over what one has learned). And the cloven-footed animals, because they have a divided hoof, help one know how to decide between ideas.

Regarding the prohibitions concerning food, we suspect that most ancient peoples used the trial-and-error method based on taste. What tasted good and did not make one sick was clean or good. What we call taboo was probably a scare tactic to keep people from being poisoned. The "good sign" encouraged people to eat properly. What were practical considerations for one people became directives based on religious beliefs for another and were handed on as traditions to succeeding generations. Much of what we call ancient myth was simply the stirrings of humans in seeking the source of life and how to survive in life. Nomadic, agricultural and, eventually, urban living, would inevitably bring change in outlook, custom, and religious practice. Just the natural change of the seasons and the struggle for food, which we sometimes refer to as acts of nature, influenced the shaping of desire, understanding, planning, and celebration of life.

We recognize a certain kind of common language used throughout the Near East in regard to religious belief and practice. Israel used this language also, but with a particular meaning and emphasis directed to the One Holy Yahweh.

When people began to settle in the land with an agrarian lifestyle and with food assured, the need to preserve a certain stability became dominant. Priests, prophets, kings, and queens established order to survive, not only as individuals, tribes, or small family groups but as nations. Thus the Bible is a two thousand-year-old record of a people establishing their identity in relation to their God and their neighbors.

We really do not know a great deal about the early development of cult and religious practice. Exegesis, which applies critical methods of study to Scripture with the help of other sciences, especially archaeology, has helped our understanding in some measure. We know very little about the actual ritual of the sacrifice and practically nothing about the prayers or the commentary accompanying the ritual action and the dietary laws. The Book of Leviticus is a listing of ritual regulations, rather than a detailed description of actual performance. We do not have records of what was prayed, said, or sung during the discharge of the regulations.

It is in service of the Holy One then that we live our life of holiness, and our first regulation is to re-establish the order of God's creation in oneself and community. "Be holy" is the core meaning of "Seder" ("everything in proper order") in the Passover celebration that continues to this day in Jewish-Christian religious practice. The heart of the Torah still beats in the Book of Leviticus. The repeated call of Moses and the people to holiness in the pulse of the Code of Holiness is heard and answered at the Passover meal.

COMMENTARY

PART I: RITUAL OF SACRIFICES

Lev 1–7

It is helpful to begin reading the Book of Leviticus at Part IV, Code of Legal Holiness (chs. 17–26).

The first seven chapters of the book speak of ritual regulations for offering sacrifices and seem to take for granted that the reader has already been introduced to basic ideas of Israelite holiness. Chapters 1, 2, and 3 deal with burnt offerings (holocausts); chapters 4 and 5 generally speak of atonement sacrifices, while chapters 6 and 7 give special regulations for the priests.

Now that the presence of God finds a place in the midst of the people, in the tabernacle constructed by Moses (Exod 26–40), Moses is called by God to tell the people how to recognize the presence of the holy. If we read the first three chapters together, we can see that the same order runs throughout and that the emphasis is on obedience, which is the beginning of holiness.

1:1 Moses is still the mediator. Verses 1 and 2 are connecting links to the second and fourth books of Moses (Exodus and Numbers). Throughout Exodus, Yahweh tells Moses, "Speak to the Israelites." This phrase follows through Leviticus and on into Numbers. It acts as an introductory phrase to various regulations of worship and as an assertion of Israelite solidarity. A dispersed people needs to rally around their one leader and mediator Moses to celebrate their unity and solidarity.

The Hebrew title of this book, translated "and he called," is the first word of chapter 1. The "and" keeps us in contact with the call of Moses to build the Dwelling (Exod 24:16). Now that the Dwelling is complete, Moses is to act as the mediator of the worship action (Exod 40:32 and Lev 1:2). God calls Moses to speak the rules of worship for the people to obey. Moses is the one mediator, and we are reminded again and again of the Torah instruction for the unity of the people under Moses.

1:3-9 To give oneself entirely to God. At first glance it seems that we are presented with just a number of ritual regulations. Our first impulse is to set them aside, turning away from the blood of the killing, the cutting-up and burning of animals. The stench of slaughter, squealing animals, and the choking smoke of carcasses in holocaust are repulsive to our Western atmosphere of liturgical banquet. We must consider, however, that this is the record of the people of God, a people who at this time in their history carried the painful memory of slavery in their very bones. And in view of the first law of the Sinai Covenant they needed to be weaned from the other gods to the one God Yahweh.

The incident of the worship of the molten calf along with the call to holiness on the part of the mediator Moses could have evoked some of the ritual response of the first chapters of Leviticus. Rituals attending animal sacrifice were not something new for their world. Their attempt, then, would be to return everything to Yahweh. The first command for the people is to divest the community of any alien allegiance and invest in the life of the one, holy God. The natural response would be to use the ritual practices already developed until a covenant relationship would dictate otherwise.

Disciplinary action because of infidelity seems also to have played a part in some of the ritual behavior. Whatever the history or initial reasons for some of the practices that seem so strange to us, the main purpose for including this material is to teach a lesson in obedience. The lesser member of a covenant relationship needs to learn this lesson first and witness to its exercise within the community in order to preserve the tradition. The accent is on an enduring obedience, since ritual expression can change its mode of expression. Without obedience there can be no life of holiness for the people.

One meaning of holiness is "wholeness." To be free from slavery and return to the Lord is to restore wholeness to life. Every corner of life needs to be continually examined and affirmed in the light of the call to wholeness. When this vocation is set to writing in the Hebrew way of thinking, it is no wonder that the song of Israel reaches our ears in a very concrete way, in what we might call fleshy terms (Exod 3:9; Lev 23; Deut 12:7). Just as it was the blood of Abel that cried out to God from the soil, so now the heart and flesh of this people cry out for the living God (Ps 84:3). Even the inner organs of the sacrificial animal are arranged in a special way and brought back in offering to the Lord of creation (Lev 1:8, 9, 13).

1:10-17 The sacrifice that goes up to the Lord. The three sacrifices of the bull (v. 5), the sheep or goat (v. 10), and the bird (v. 14) are described as holocausts (burnt offerings). The Hebrew verb simply means "to go up"; so the primary meaning of these offerings is to affirm the Lord as giver of the gift of life. The sacrifice is burnt up to the Lord. The smoke of the burning, along with the smoke of the sacred incense "going up" and covering up the smell of the slaughter, presents a sweet-smelling oblation to the Lord (Exod 30; Lev 1–8).

1:9, 13, 17 A sweet-smelling oblation. In Gen 8:21 the Lord smelled the sweet odor of Noah's offering and promised never again to doom the earth. In the Pentateuch God is spoken of in human terms, and for God to smell the sweet-smelling odor is like saying that God is pleased with the sacrifice. This idea of the "sweet odor" is often repeated in the Pentateuch: in Exod 29 the ram, the unleavened food, and the lamb become sweet-smelling oblations (see also Lev 1–8, 23, 26 and Num 15, 18, 28, 29). Also in the flood story of Mesopotamia "the gods are smelling the savor of the sacrifices." This show of approval was probably used in Canaanite cult and taken over by the Israelites from the time when it was believed that the gods received nourishment from the smelling or inhaling of the burning food. Even the accounts of cereal and peace offerings conclude in this same way, "a sweet-smelling oblation to the Lord" (Lev 2 and 3).

When the offering was wholly burned by the priest, a certain completeness, a holiness of the return of creation to the Lord, was expressed and experienced. It meant the same going-up or giving-up of self to God as a sweet-smelling oblation (1:4). Now the people had found a way to be wholly involved.

Note that usually the offerer performed the slaughter. The sprinkling, spilling, or splashing of the blood on the altar was reserved to the priests. The people brought the sacrificial victim to the entrance of the meeting tent where the whole community was included in the sacrifice action. There they were to accommodate and make holy the customs of the Canaanite people with whom they lived.

The Law given on Mount Sinai demanded complete obedience over the use of herd, flock, and grain (1–3). All creatures are included in "when any one of you." Even the poor, who otherwise might not be able to take part, can take from the turtledoves or pigeons plentiful in the area. Thus, Exod 19:6, "You shall be to me a kingdom of priests, a holy nation," could become a reality. By faithfully obeying these decrees, they would identify with the offerings and find favor as sweet-smelling oblations to the Lord.

Throughout Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, the Dwelling of the Lord is in the meeting tent. It is the place from which the call comes and it is the place of the sacrifice. In the offering the people and the priests are made holy by coming in contact with the presence of the Lord. The real and concrete thinking of the Hebrew mind speaks of the Lord calling from the meeting tent and of the people coming to the entrance of the tent in obedience (Lev 1:1-4). This action prepares for contact with holiness, and the sacrifice is not complete (holy) unless this condition is fulfilled (1:3; 3:8; 4:4).

2:11 Leaven or honey not to be burned. The offerings to be burned were already dead, but the action of yeast and the fermentation of the fruit syrup (included in the term honey) suggest something is still alive and, as such, could not be burned on the altar (2:11). In the Passover tradition (23) leaven was forbidden (Exod 12:15) and the people were to eat unleavened bread (matzah) for seven days (some say, in memory of the first seven days of the Exodus). One should also note that to carry unleavened bread is certainly a practical and secure way to keep wheat, barley, and oats when on a journey. It is also stated that they had to leave Egypt in a hurry and had no time for the leavening action (Exod 12:33, 34). To eat unleavened bread would be a reminder of the hurried departure. This custom was kept in the feast of Unleavened Bread (Exod 12:17).

This latter feast was joined with the Passover feast, wherein a lamb was sacrificed and the blood was put on the doorposts as a sign for the Lord to pass over these houses. People on the move need to take along something to eat. Thus, both feasts came together quite naturally. Today, however, just the bread celebration remains. The Passover victim for the Jew is remembered only in the shankbone of the lamb and the order (seder) of the celebration. Both memorials are fused into one, called the Passover Seder (Lev 23). Within the Code of Holiness of the Book of Leviticus, these pilgrim feasts have their own particular emphasis.

We have cautioned not to read into the text more than can be seen at present. We should not, however, overlook a call to holiness that is conveyed by the sacred writer. To err in either regard would do an injustice to the living Word of God. So, in the Hebrew way of thinking, everything had to be brought to the Lord. Every slaughter, even killing for food, needed to be holy. It had to be in some way interpreted as a sacrifice, a making holy, since the blood shed had to return to the source of its life, the Creator. Life is in the blood (17:14; 19:26). For the people of God and those with whom they lived or who lived with them, every mark of living had to fall into the circle of the Holy (Exod 23).

This people struggled to respond to their call to holiness (wholeness). Such a struggle is the drive and desire of life itself to which the desire to survive is related. The duty now was to cooperate in a covenant with the Holy One present in their midst (Exod 19) and to bring about a certain completeness to their life and language (Exod 23). A covenant arrangement necessarily includes the condition of obedience for the one party and a recounting for the other of the blessings and curses that will follow upon obedience or disobedience to the covenant (Lev 26).

2:13 The salt of the covenant. Salt was a symbol of the lasting covenant, since salt kept food from spoiling. In ancient times partaking of salt together was a sign of friendship and alliance. There may also be a Hebrew wordplay on the word for salt which is related to the word for king. It is to God and God alone that the first obedience belongs, and this is the meaning of covenant obedience.

3:3, 16 "All the fat belongs to the Lord." References to food for the Lord may be for the Israelites honest attempts to gather in the practices of their neighbors and to return everything, including health, property, and the general well-being of the whole community, to the one, holy Lord.

There is a sharing of food (2:10; 3:9-11, 14-16), and thus, the custom of eating with the gods is now included (accommodated, sanctified) in the expression of the relation between the one God and the people, brought on by the covenant obedience. Even today we cement relationships by inviting one to share in a meal. Here is an outward expression in the act of obedience. In Hebrew belief and practice the presence of a neighbor affirmed the presence of God in their midst.

Burning the fat on the altar may have played a role in determining that the fatty portion belongs to the Lord. On hot fire grease will flare up and produce a cloud of smoke, perhaps reminiscent of the column of fire during the night and the column of cloud during the day (Exod 13). The Hebrews may have taken this graphic reminder as divine indication that this part of the victim belonged to the Lord.

Thus the fatty portion on the altar would cause great excitement. In the cloud (Exod 13:21; 16:10; 19:9; 24:16; 40:34; Lev 16:2, 13; Num 12:5) and in the column of fire (Exod 13:21, 22; 40:38), the Lord revealed the divine presence. God came to speak to Moses and through him to the people. (See Matt 17:5; Acts 1:9; 2 Pet 1:17; Rev 14:14—in these New Testament references and in the Old Testament references cited above, both the Hebrew and the Greek words for cloud and splendor are wrapped up in the idea of appearance-revelation.)

A concluding comment to chapters 1, 2, 3. The orderly arrangement of the material in these first three chapters may have also served as a memory aid, the key words being holocaust, cereal, and peace. The order has a certain holiness (completeness) in presenting the account of the sacrifices.

Chapters 4 and 5 exhibit an order that revolves not so much around the object of the sacrifice as around the disposition of the offerer. Sin and guilt are the subject matter, along with atonement for sin committed out of ignorance (4:1-35), out of omission (5:1-13), or by commission (5:14-26). These situations seem to cover the possible dispositions of the sinner and the offerings that are needed to atone for the situations in the covenant relationship.

Chapters 4 and 5, sin and guilt offerings. In chapters 1, 2, and 3, sacrifices were brought out of obedience (because of the covenant), but willingly. In chapters 4 and 5 offerings of obligation are treated for those who are guilty of either unintentional (4:1-31) or intentional (5:1, 21-26) sins. In this covenant relation, since every action is in a relationship with God, every action is also related with everyone else involved in the same covenant. God is the source of life and the covenant is in a sense the return to life (Gen 2:7 and 6:17, 18). (The material is also summarized in Num 15:22-31.) The first person considered here is the priest who sins. The people are thereby also made guilty (Lev 4:3). Just as the priest offers on behalf of and along with the people, so the community is affected by other actions of the priest's life.

4:2 Inadvertent sin. All cases of ritual uncleanness which are unavoidable (for example, burying the dead) are included here. Note in Lev 4:1-12 that in the purification rite for a priest, the whole victim is disposed of outside the camp. Not even the hide is kept, to be given to the priest, as was the usual case (7:8). Now even the sanctuary is unclean, since the one who would usually receive the impurity of the people is himself unclean. There are other cases of inadvertent sin that affect the whole community (see Num 15:26, 27).

4:5-7 The blood rite. The angel of death passed over the houses on whose doorposts the blood of the Passover lamb was smeared (Exod 12:23). Here and in Lev 14:7 the blood is sprinkled before the Lord seven times. Some of the blood is put on the horns of the altar (Exod 29:12; Lev 8:15; 9:9). The sprinkling is a reminder of the blood of the covenant and its renewal (Exod 24:8). The smearing on the horns would remind one of every blood smearing: on the tent post in the field camp, the doorposts in the city, and on the altar at the foot of Mount Sinai. The basic idea was to ward off death and be attached to the source of life. In this case the intention is to be freed from the slavery of uncleanness, which divides the membership of the covenant, and to be restored as a full member of the human-divine community. The life that is in the blood is now returned to the Lord by actual contact with the altar. By this returning of life to the source of life, the individual, and thus the community, regains purity and the freedom to live again.

The whole community is affected by the impurity, even though it was committed by an individual. The reference to inadvertence is the attempt to cover every possible situation.

4:6 The blood is sprinkled seven times. Here and elsewhere (4:17; 14:7, 16, 27; 16:19; Num 19:4) the blood is sprinkled seven times. The number seven in ancient times was a sign of wholeness and completeness (holiness). Seven admits of a grouping of one flanked by two groups of three. Note the design of the menorah lampstand: a single center stem with two groups of three stems flanking the center. The menorah is the symbol of the perfect (holy) life. Many other examples could be cited in the use of seven as a sacred number. A primary example is the holy work of creation. God created the world in six days and then blessed the seventh day and made it holy (Gen 2:3). In Exod 31:15, the seventh day is a day of complete rest, sacred to the Lord.

5:1-26 Special cases. Here we sense the editors' insistence to include every possible situation of guilt and punishment, in reference not only to those asked to testify about a particular case but even to those who know anything at all about another's sin (impurity), but refuse to testify. These latter also have a community responsibility to speak up. Note that the Hebrew word for guilt contains not only the conscious aspect of guilt from acting contrary to law (Torah) or the omission of a particular regulation but even self-accusation and the acceptance of the penalty.

6:1–7:38 Answers to questions. Chapters 6 and 7 provide regulations that seemed to have developed from questions that came up while carrying out the basic ritual described in the first five chapters. For example, Where should this be done? What is the priest to wear? How should ashes be disposed of? What if the animal were wild and/or killed by a wild animal? As these questions were answered, they formed other regulations which eventually found their way into the Book of Leviticus. Additional regulations do not seem in any way to disturb the simple order of the first chapters. Note, however, the order that is preserved here. Chapter 6 deals with the material of chapters 1, 2, and 3 while chapter 7 gives some additions for chapters 4 and 5.

But we must stress that everyone and everything must be included in the covenant. Nothing can be omitted in the gathering-in of even the slightest ritual regulations; every possible life-situation must be ordered as construction material for purity and the eventual life of holiness.

In chapter 7 we first meet the punishment of being "cut off from the people" (7:20, 21, 25, 27; 17:4, 9, 10, 14; 18:29; 19:8; 20:3, 5, 17, 18 and on into the Book of Numbers). Lev 17:10 and 20:6 make it clear that God, rather than the priest or people, will measure out this punishment. Some commentators interpret this penalty to be a premature death. It seems that this penalty is simply a statement of fact of what happens when one party violates the covenant. The Hebrew phrase for making a covenant is "to cut a covenant." So, in the violation of a covenant, one cuts oneself off from the other. Besides the Hebrew wordplay, there is a good scare tactic in stating a fact. In eating the blood (17:10) and the wanton ways of the mediums (some may have been involved in neighboring blood rites, see 20:6), it would follow that this punishment would come from God, since the life is in the blood and God is the source of life. God would then be the immediate source of the punishment for the direct violation of life.

To avoid being cut off, in whatever way it could happen, is of special concern, for being excommunicated would not reflect the presence of the Holy One in the midst of the people. Later, in chapter 20, we see the necessity of preserving the unity of the family and a proper order to the whole of one's life in order to preserve the community as a unit. In the community, the oneness of God is reflected. Therefore, one must avoid ever being cut off. In fact, everything concerning one's own life (and thus the community's life) must in some way move in relation to the Holy One. Belief is practice.

The order of belief and practice is obedience (chs. 1–27), then purification through ritual (chs. 11–27) and finally, sanctification (chs. 17–27). It seems as simple as the example of one who takes a prescription, finds healing, and then enjoys good health. The secret is in the "order" of making holy. And one experience does not end where the other begins. Obedience is at work in purity, both obedience and purity are at work in sanctification, and all three are fully alive in the life of holiness. However, if we concentrate on just one or try to escape from one into another, we find our life to be only an endless request of obedience. This could explain why the Book of Leviticus is often neglected or even avoided (see also Introduction, no. 5, p. 116).

The overall arrangement in the book is very simple, but it is possible for the reader to become entangled in the many regulations and traditions. We need only witness the volumes upon volumes of legal transactions in our own court system with their varying decisions and changing regulations. Add to this the ease that oral traditions have of growing and changing of themselves. Then, even a long period of time may elapse before the oral traditions are written down. Finally we need to consider the time lapse of gathering the materials and the countless things that can happen between the gathering and the final editing. In the Book of Leviticus, the final editing seems to point to the very simple progression for living the life of holiness—obedience, purity, holiness.

PART II: CEREMONY OF ORDINATION

Lev 8–10

Chapters 8, 9, and 10 are a fitting place to introduce the dedication of the tabernacle and the ordination of the priest into the arrangement of the material for the Book of Leviticus. P, the Priestly writing, will continue later with the regulations for purity (chs. 11–16) and regulations for holiness (chs. 17–27). Even though the ordination ceremony and the dedication of the tabernacle have already been explained in Exod 29, they are introduced again to keep the proper order of the holiness theme.

At the same time, we can almost hear the rhythmic beat and repetition of the life flow of the people: the arrival at and covenant on Sinai (Exod 19–24); the revelation of God (Exod 19); the tabernacle construction and ceremony (Exod 25–28); the consecration of priests and altar (Exod 29); the sabbath law (Exod 31); the sin (Exod 32); Moses the mediator (Exod 33); the renewal of the covenant (Exod 34) and the giving of the sabbath law, with regulations for the construction of the tabernacle (Exod 35–40); the ceremony (Lev

1-7); the ordination of priests (Lev 8-10); the cleansing of the sanctuary, priests, and people (Lev 11-16); a new covenant life (Lev 17-27); and the revelation of God. This rhythmic beat is not just a meaningless repetition. Each time the statement of life is given in the heartbeat of the people.

Signs of life, maturing, and new insights are evident. The placing of chapters 1-7 where they are points out the necessity of obedience to the ritual of sacrifice. This ritual expresses both the desire for holiness and the conditioning element for purification. All this is antecedent to the life and practice of holiness (chs. 17-26).

8:1-36 The ordination ceremony. Moses is the mediator even of the priesthood (vv. 1-4). A more detailed description of the vestments and ceremonies has already been given in Exod 28-29. In keeping with the theme of Leviticus, the order to be followed in the ordination ceremony (vv. 5-33) is affirmed. Stress is put upon atonement for the altar and for the ones being ordained (vv. 15, 34), identifying them with the victim of sacrifice (vv. 22-31), rather than stressing their appointment by God through Moses (v. 35).

9:1-7 The octave (eighth day) sacrifice. The sacrifice completes the consecration of the priest. It consists of a combination of a calf-sin offering, a ram-holocaust (on the part of a high priest), and a he-goat sin offering. A calf and lamb for a holocaust, and an ox and ram for a peace offering, along with a cereal offering mixed with oil, are also offered on the eighth day. What a tremendous celebration that includes virtually all the sacrifices at which the priest later assists. The celebration is magnificent, for on that day, the "glory of the Lord was revealed to all the people" (v. 23; see also vv. 4, 6).

The writer or writers seem to convey two essential marks of the priesthood. First, as for the intercessory duty of the priest, every sacrifice needed to be brought forth to stand before the Lord. The priests were to intercede regarding decisions already made and ones for which understanding was needed. This is what making holy was all about—to be present to the presence of the Lord (9:5). The priest is to "keep in touch" with the Lord. The community had to present itself at the entrance of the tent and then come to the altar in the person of the priest (v. 7). The divine power could then be at work in the midst of the people, through the priest in touch with the presence of God. The second essential which the writers seem to be intent on was Moses as the mediator. He was the prophet to Pharaoh. He acted as the king in leading the people out of Egypt. He is now the high priest in the sacrifice and the ordination of those who will assist in sacrifice.

10:1-5 Death of Nadab and Abihu. Some have suggested that Aaron's sons Nadab and Abihu had filled their containers with fire that was not holy, that is, taken from a place other than the altar. Others say that their incense was not the clean mixture it should have been. Thus, they were punished with death by fire, a holy fire from the altar. Lightning could have struck them dead. Since they were at the altar at the time, the people would certainly interpret any happening as coming from the Lord.

10:9-10 Ability to distinguish. Whatever happened, the main point is brought out in verses 9 and 10, where Moses says that no wine or strong drink is to be taken before priestly duty at the meeting tent. "You must be able to distinguish between the sacred and profane." So, in the seven-day celebration, it could be that Aaron and his sons might have imbibed too much wine. Even though Nadab and Abihu could have been struck by lightning, it is possible that they put the wrong mixture on the fire, resulting in a flare-up and consequent asphyxiation (since verse 5 says they were buried in their tunics).

In view of other references in Exod 24 and Num 3, and aside from the Moses injunction to avoid on-the-job drinking of wine or other strong drink (10:9), we would do well to look further. The moment is very sacred: "Through those who approach me I will manifest my sacredness; in the sight of all the people, I will reveal my glory" (10:3). Abihu ("He is my father") and Nadab ("Na is generous") might also represent an earlier priesthood now replaced by the Aaronic and Levitical priesthood. The incident, then, is used here to introduce, in a literary but nonetheless real way, the new order (or at least the demise of the old). It is now through Aaron and his sons that both the new and the old are represented at the ordination ceremony (10:3). Other sacrifices of fire are forbidden. Recall in chapter 9, after the seven-day ordination ceremony, that on the eighth day the people saw the glory of the Lord coming forth in the form of fire from the Lord's presence. If lightning occurred, it would have given occasion for an explanation.

10:11 The priests are to teach the Torah. There is an interesting and added responsibility for the priest in regard to preparation for and maturing in holiness. He is to be a teacher of the Torah, "all the laws that the Lord has given through Moses" (v. 11—once again, an insistence on Moses as the mediator). The Hebrew word means both "to teach," and "to direct." The priest is to learn the proper direction (order) and then teach others. In English we have the fuller meaning in basically the same word, which now has the meaning of "disciple" and "discipline."

PART III: LAWS REGARDING LEGAL PURITY

Lev 11–16

The insertion here of the chapters on the priesthood is natural. Otherwise, obedience might be practiced for obedience's sake. Obedience has now become a response to the covenant relation through the mediation of the priesthood and continues to be alive in the purification-preparation (chs. 11–16) for holiness (chs. 17–27).

Now legal purity (chs. 11–15) will be explained and emphasized as a condition, along with obedience, for legal holiness that comes later (chs. 17–27). (Chapter 16 is a bridge-chapter for chapters 11–15 and 17–27.)

Recalling what has been said about Hebrew thought patterns, we can respect these regulations as alive, not simply as directions for life. They all point to and are part of the life of holiness or completeness—to be fully alive is to respect the power of the Creator of life. It seems that the final editors laid a very simple pathway to holiness. They realized that now was the time, in the whole body of the Torah, to mention this Levitical regulation. Without it, the Torah would be without a heart and its beat. The beat should be an evident sign of the presence of the Holy and the expression of the fullness of life, the Code of Holiness in 17–26 (chapter 27 is another bridge-chapter). Since the Book of Leviticus is the heart of the Torah, we refer to the Code of Holiness as the beat of that heart.

For those who are to become holy, the Lord says, "Speak to the whole Israelite community and tell them, 'Be holy, for I, the Lord, your God, am holy' " (Lev 20:7; Exod 31:13; and Lev 11:44). Obedience comes first (chs. 1–7); then the Lord manifests his glory to the people through the holy priesthood-group of the community (chs. 8–10). But before one can experience holiness, one must be clean (pure) (chs. 11–16). And since "cleanliness is next to Godliness," so purity which results from obedience to the law comes next to holiness. This is the material treated next on the way to holiness. Obedience, purity, and holiness cannot be separated any more than can body, blood, and soul. (In Hebrew thinking, these latter three are included in the one word "being.") It is important to consider this way of thinking if we are to understand the way the Levitical material conveys the meaning of holiness. Obedience is included in the understanding and experience of purity. The regulations now become more exacting. Purity conditions one for the Code of Holiness.

Since purity can come only from God, the presence of God must be in the midst of the people, above the ark (16:2). This is the place of atonement in which is contained the forgiveness and reconciliation which result in purity.

Chapters 11–16 tell how the condition of purity is established. The materials brought together in these regulations present a fit (pure) receptacle, "for-giving" of holiness. This last sentence contains the ideas of forgiveness and the condition needed for holiness. It is one thing to be forgiven, but it is another to live a life of holiness. The state of purity resulting from the forgiveness of God is the receptacle for the life of holiness; it is not the state of holiness. This is why, once a year, even to this day, atonement is made for all the sins on the feast of Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement.

This explains the placement of the Code of Holiness (chs. 17–27) in the Book of Leviticus; there is an orderly progression to the fullness of life, the life of holiness (19:1-7). It also explains the placement of the bridge-chapter 16 with the Day of Atonement, the ongoing condition for the life of holiness. Later we will see how chapter 27 also becomes a bridge-chapter, following the presentation of the material on holiness.

Chapters 11–16 concern the clean and the unclean. Chapters 11 and 12 consider what is taken internally: clean and unclean food and the uncleanness of childbirth resulting in loss of blood (the seed was taken internally). What shows up externally on the skin or garments is the subject of chapters 13 and 14. Chapter 15 deals with what flows from within a person. The well-known chapter 16, giving the account of the Day of Atonement, is the important bridge-chapter connecting the clean (pure) and the holy.

11:1-23 Clean and unclean food: the dietary laws. Animals that may and may not be eaten are listed here: those of the land (vv. 1-8), of the sea (vv. 9-12), and of the air (vv. 13-19), and finally, those found in all three areas—insects and swarming creatures (vv. 20-23).

The dead bodies of the unclean must not be touched or else one becomes unclean (vv. 24-32). For the most part these regulations are repeated in Deut 14:3-20. Both in Leviticus and Deuteronomy the people are warned to make themselves holy and to keep themselves holy by simply avoiding certain foods (Lev 11 and Deut 14:3-21). However, a straightforward reason why certain foods cause uncleanness or defilement is not known. Simple obedience seems to be a good reason in view of Gen 2:16 wherein God initially said, "You are free to eat . . . except . . . ." Even today, there are certain foods permitted by Jewish dietary regulation, called kosher, which means "proper" to eat.

Sometimes assumptions are made concerning Israelite relationship with the cult practice of their neighbors. Even though some literary references have emerged, we need to be cautious and apply studied research for further evidence of real life associations. There seems to have been a common cult language used in the Near East. From this base every tribe or nation took what would best express their relationship with the presence of the Holy in the whole of creation (see also Introduction, 7. D).

The simple and clear thrust of this material in Leviticus seems to be that everyone and everything must be brought into the order and dominion of the one, holy God. The whole of creation had already been joined to God's order and dominion in the creation stories of Genesis; now the worship-life of the people is directed to that God. The Tabernacle had just been erected (Exod 40), and now the time had come for the "Levitical material" to go through the Holy Place in preparation for entry into the Holy of Holies. The experience of the divine-human relationship could be lived out even in the written record of this people. As St. Jerome remarked, "There is an odor of holiness about the book of Leviticus."

11:36 A spring or cistern remains pure. The purity of water was necessary, not only because drinking water was scarce but also because this water had not yet been drawn out by human hands. The water is holy because its present source is the ground (spring) or heaven (rain in the cistern).

12:1-8 Uncleanness of childbirth. The reason for this defilement is found in verse 7: "Thus, she will be clean again after her flow of blood." It is the flow of blood that defiles. (The life is in the blood and because the flow is recurrent, proper control cannot be maintained. Lev 15:32-33 mentions that men and women are treated alike.) They could only come to the entrance of the tent or, in another time, they were barred from the temple mound.

Today there is still a great deal of mystery and pain connected with menstruation and childbirth. We have unraveled some of the mystery, but the pain remains (Gen 3:16). At that time fear and taboo also played a part in the experience. The afterbirth might tend to make one think that some kind of punishment was being put upon a person. And, of course, there were the stories and taboos of neighbors. The rate of miscarriage may also have been high. This would accentuate the need to explain the disorder and call for a regulation concerning defilement and the need for purification.

The offering is made only after the flow stops (Lev 15:13-14, 28-29), so there is no question of practicing magic—a ritual performed in order to bring about some change.

12:2, 5 The doubling of purification time for females. This may have something to do with menstrual flow. Remember, the life is in the blood and every precaution must be taken to recognize God as the source of life.

13:4 Seven-day quarantine. This is probably a practical precaution in the case of skin disorder. Any change in the skin should take place by then so that the priest can decide about the purity of the person. The waiting is made holy by choosing seven days.

13:46 Living outside the camp. In some cases this means living alone. To live outside the camp came to be expressed as "outside the walls of the city," or sometimes in the case of temple regulations, "outside the temple mound," or in the wilderness, "outside the tabernacle community." One could come only to the entrance of the tent, as seen in chapters 12 and 15.

In view of the extensive treatment of skin disease in chapters 13 and 14, it seems that at the time there may have been an epidemic of unknown skin disorders. We do know without a doubt the importance of the blood as containing the life of every living body (17:11, 14). Today, the importance of a blood analysis is well-known as an indication of a person's general health. Likewise in Leviticus the slightest discoloration or bruise would need to be analyzed so that proper care would be taken to affirm the power of God in any flow of blood.

If we cut a finger, we know how easy it is to bring it to our mouth. The Hebrew word in the prohibition is "not to eat" (Lev 7:26; 17:10). Even though the prohibition may have had reference to some practice in the rituals of other peoples, its primary meaning should be considered as respect for life in recognition of the creator of life.

14:3 The priest goes outside the camp. The unclean person is not a part of the living community, but the priest can go to that person. However, to avoid defilement of the community, the priest must go outside to make his analysis. "Leprosy" here stands for any number of skin disorders.

14:4 The rite of purification. A vessel of fresh water is perhaps drawn from a spring or cistern by dipping clean pottery into the water. Fresh water is taken because the cleansing was outside the camp and its pure community. The blood from the one slain bird drips into the fresh water and receives proper care by contact with the water. The water can then be poured onto the ground and the vessel cleansed. The cedar wood (type used in the construction of the temple roof), scarlet yarn (blood color), and hyssop make a sprinkler. The hyssop is probably tied onto the cedar wood with the yarn. Everything is touched with the blood of the clean bird, for the life is in the blood. One of the birds stands for Israel (the afflicted person) about to reenter into the covenant relationship. The bird mediates the purification, since much of its life is spent flying between heaven and earth.

14:7 Purification through sevenfold sprinkling. Some references to sprinkling of the blood are found in Exod 12:22; 24:8; 29:21; Lev 4:6; 5:9, and reminds one of the Sinai Covenant. In fact, in Exod 24 the blood that is sprinkled on the altar and the people is called "the blood of the covenant." So now, at the renewal of the covenant, the blood is sprinkled. It is also a reminder of the Passover blood which freed the people from slavery. The slavery now is the skin disease, holding a person captive outside the camp.

In the ancient world, seven was a sacred number and considered a complete (holy) number. There were seven planets (five plus the sun and the moon) that had movement of their own among the fixed stars. Seven is one flanked by two groups of three; three was also a perfect number since it has a beginning, a middle, and an end (1-1-1). The sprinkling towards the Lord must be perfect, complete, holy; the sprinkling in atonement for the afflicted must also be complete (holy), since the skin infection is hardly ever in just one spot but in a number of different areas on the body. The purification must extend to the entire body of the leper; leaving one spot untouched would make the person unclean and further purification would be needed.

14:7 The second bird is set free. The bird is like the scapegoat, taking the leprosy away to a place of no return. Note the important ritual directive: one shall let the living bird fly away. First, the priest sprinkles the afflicted one. Then, as the purification takes place, one is handed the other bird. The purified one releases the (scape)bird. Thus the purification is completed. One can imagine the person feeling a real cleansing receiving the remaining bird from the priest and then releasing the infection along with the bird (a real carrier pigeon!) in the direction of the atoning God. Covenant life, wholeness, is restored for the individual with God and community. There is no question of magic, since the person is already healed when the rite of purification is performed (14:3). A parallel is the present-day rite of reconciliation, which deals with the leprosy of sin. The penitent approaches the rite of reconciliation, even though the sin is forgiven by an act of contrition. The priest mediates the sacramental (holy moment-um) ritual that affirms the forgiving and healing power of God present in the community and reconciles the person to the covenant-community relationship.

14:8 The one purified remains outside. One is inside the camp now, but outside the tent. This could mean outside the tabernacle or temple, since it was only on the eighth day that one was allowed to bring sacrifice into the temple.

14:9 The afflicted shaves again on the seventh day. The root ends of the hair have grown out and the ends of the defilement are cut off. The hair is cleansed and again washed. The reason may be more practical than symbolic, since by then a good decision can be made about the disorder.

14:10 The eighth-day offering. The ritual takes place in the temple. The ephah was about half a bushel, and a log was about two-thirds of a pint. The only type of offering not mentioned is the peace offering, since peace offerings were usually voluntary. The guilt offering would be required (see 5:14-26). Also, the one cleansed may have had to bring the guilt offering to make up for the absenteeism from temple ritual during the time of being cut off.

14:12-13 The wave offering. This action might better be described as a "lifting up" rather than a wave offering. Perhaps this is the lifting up of one's hands in the manner of the priest today at the offering of the bread and wine. It could refer to praying with hands lifted up. In any case the Hebrew word is related to the English "height." Verse 13 refers to the guilt offering as "most sacred," since the wholeness of every member of the covenant is affirmed.

14:14 Blood put on the tip of one's ear, thumb, and big toe. The ancients believed that access to one's life by spirits was made through these extremities—as in the case of unclean (5:2) or sacred (6:11). Blood was used to cleanse and to ward off the unclean or evil. Later we shall see the anointing over the blood with oil. This anointing would seemingly prepare for the purification and entrance of the good spirit. Today, during baptism, the tip of the ear and the mouth are touched in preparation for receiving and speaking the word of God.

In the ordination rite of the priest, the blood of the ordination ram is splashed on the altar (Exod 29:19-25 and Lev 8–9). The priest is consecrated to the Lord. The altar splashing is not mentioned here, since it is the guilt offering of lamb's blood that is sprinkled seven times before the Lord. A change in the direction of the ritual action, or the omission of a particular rite where one might expect it to be repeated, may indicate a meaning of the present ritual. Thus, every area of life can be covered with positive regulation. However, the precision of the Levitical regulation seems to make some readers shy away from these Torah instructions. But to others this precision offers an exciting treasure hunt.

14:17 Oil over the blood of the guilt offering. Putting the oil over the blood signifies the complete return to covenant life. The oil represents God at work in the individual and community life of the people. God gives life to the blood relationship. For a priest needing such purification, this ritual acts as a mini-reconsecration rite (see also 8:10). The covenant is renewed and all are ready for the life of holiness with its enduring and maturing obedience, purification, and holy conduct.

14:21 A poor leper's sacrifice. The reduced requirement of turtledoves rather than lambs makes the purification ritual easier on the poor. The emphasis is on the recognition of the covenant, not on the requirement of the offering. However, the requirement of the guilt offering seems to have remained the same for all, since the affirmation of both God and neighbor is involved. The same requirement for everyone openly expresses this involvement, even though the guilty party acted unwillingly or inadvertently (5:14-26).

14:33-57 Cleansing the houses. Like the individual in need of cleansing and purification, so the dwelling place of the individual. Recall that even the dwelling place of the Lord was in need of purification from time to time. On the Day of Atonement there was purification of every possible defilement that could have occurred throughout the previous year (16:16-19).

14:37 "Infection on the walls . . ." This seems to be mold and rust, but in view of verse 34 and in the opinion of some rabbis, it was considered a defilement sent in punishment for one's lack of faith. Mold and rust assured that some type of life must be present. Therefore, a regulation had to ensure proper recognition of the source of life and respect for the life itself.

Some types of defilement are unavoidable or accidental, and some occur even in the normal course of events (recurrent body flows and sickness). Some can happen while performing commendable acts (Lev 16:21-28; Num 19:7, 8, 10). The rabbis call these "defilements of the body."

The rabbis thought that sin occurs when the unclean and the holy, or the clean and the profane, are brought together in a spirit of disobedience—for example, the entry into the Holy Place by one forbidden to do so or eating clean food while one is in an unclean state. Obedience is still the key in a covenant relationship. God is the only one who can say, "I am the Lord."

Obedience is the key to purification and holiness. It may seem that the Book of Leviticus speaks only of ritual obedience, but the Code of Holiness points to the necessity of obedience in the whole of life. Lev 1–7 concern obedience. Chapters 11–15 express the purification that results from obedience. Then, and only then, will one begin to live a holy life.

15:13 One is to bathe in fresh water. Cleanliness contains a twofold idea: first, to be healed of a disease or purified from uncleanness (see 14:48, 49), and second, washed (in some cases, bathing in a stream or freshwater lake, or whatever assigned regulation) to establish the purification. The process is a mini-freedom from Egypt leading into the Promised Land.

16:1-34 The Day of Atonement. This chapter has a unique place in Leviticus because it acts as a bridge connecting the rite of purification and the life of holiness (chs. 17–26). It is the Lord who initiates the atonement. The Lord does this by demanding the purification of the Holy of Holies, which has been defiled by the deaths of Nadab and Abihu.

Then the rite of sanctuary purification is joined with the confession and removal of the sins of both priests and people (16:33). This latter purification takes place in what is called the scapegoat ritual. This joint celebration, along with the mortification of fasting (vv. 29-31), begins the life of holiness. On the Day of Atonement, the sanctuary and the nation celebrate the atonement feast.

16:1 Purification after the death of Nadab and Abihu. This is the place to refer again to chapter 10, since it sets the stage for sanctuary purification. Here is a known defilement of the sanctuary. Their corpses made the Holy of Holies unclean and in need of purification. Perhaps they had gotten too close to the propitiatory (seat of mercy) on the ark. There were certain regulations for making a proper entry into the Holy of Holies. Note how the first span of the bridge to holiness is constructed from some leftover material of chapters 11–15 and reaching back into chapter 10. This first span is set in place. God and nation are ready to obey the order of purification.

16:2-5 The propitiatory on the ark. This is the mercy seat of the Lord. The place of at-one-ment must be at the mercy seat of the Lord. It is the cover over the ark containing the Ten Commandments. The cleansing of the sanctuary with its consequent purification is now able to take place here. In Hebrew the very word for cover is related to the word for atonement. It means that the guilt is covered over or that atonement is payment for being reinstated.

16:3-21 The rite of purification. The gold and white vestments are interchanged, signifying the presence of God and the people at work together. Mutually they take part in the atonement action that removes all the defilement of the past year, even that which may have happened inadvertently. Together in the life of holiness a new year is begun for God and people (chs. 17–27).

So, this atonement chapter acts as the bridge where the two members of the covenant (God and the people) come together to celebrate the at-one-ness to be experienced in the Code of Holiness.

16:20-28 The scapegoat ritual: means of atonement. There are actually two goats and a ram for a holocaust. One goat is offered as a sin offering. By the laying on of hands, the other receives the sins of the community and is sent to carry them off to a place of no return. Azazel (perhaps "power of El") seems to be a wordplay on the subduing of a foreign god (demon).

One goat represents the action of the purification of the sanctuary (v. 20). The other represents the atonement of the people in what has come to be known as a scapegoat ritual. The goat is driven into the desert, the place of no return and also the place of "just desert." This latter wordplay on desert alters the entire meaning of the word.

With the additional span of removal and punishment complete, the bridge-chapter furthers its construction towards covenant renewal.

During the ritual Aaron changes from gold to white, back to gold, and to white again. Before and after each change there are ritual bathings. God and people are represented in the vestments. Ritual directs the priest to dress up in different costumes to portray different characters. The simple white lines were also a sign of humility and honest contrition flowing between the two members of the covenant. Actions like the vestment changing (16:4, 23, 24, 32) pave the way for the atonement that is in progress.

Today Yom Kippur or the Day of Atonement is celebrated with great faith in the at-one-ment of God and people. It is a very important day for the Jew who seeks reconciliation with other members of the community and then receives atonement from God (see also Matt 5:24). One of the readings of the Jewish atonement celebration today is Isa 57:14–58:14, which speaks of a real inner, moral renewal by fasting (Lev 16:29-31). Fasting is made genuine by going out to others, especially the poor and the unfortunate, and by concentrating on a change of life for all (vv. 29, 30). In Leviticus all are now ready for the change to a life of holiness.

PART IV: CODE OF LEGAL HOLINESS

Lev 17–26

This section in Leviticus emphasizes life more than ritual, but obedience to the command of God is still at work. The covenant arrangement is still to be preserved (17:2). God is to be recognized first (v. 4). If this is not carried out, one is to be cut off from those who wish to keep this life-covenant arrangement (v. 4). It is a whole new way of life (vv. 5-7). What is presented in the Code of Holiness (17–26) is for everyone (v. 8). We need to be in touch with regulations that have gone before, but we cannot forget the practice of obedience, and the bridge (Lev 16) must be kept intact (17:2, 4, 9). Obedience is still at work now, with emphasis on principle rather than regulation. It is this change that seems to encourage more people to read this section of Leviticus rather than chapters 1–16, which stress ritual obedience. Ritual conformity, practiced only for the sake of obedience, becomes a very heavy burden in time. However, obedience, along with purification, is required in order to be fully alive in the life of holiness. Now the obedience is to a life-style embodied in the Code of Holiness.

The difference between "sacrifice" and "sanctification" should be noted. Sacrifice is the "making holy" and sanctification can be the "living holy" of life. One's living-out of purification (chs. 11–16) through obedience (chs. 1–7) opens the way to sanctification (chs. 17–27).

We now come to the very beat of the heart in the Code of Holiness (chs. 17–27). "Be holy, for I, the Lord, your God, am holy." Even the flow of the accent in this English quotation of the central theme (19:2) has a pulsating rhythm.

These chapters offer directives for living a life of holiness. They were guidelines for the people of old as they are for the people of today.

We accept, then, the real life situation of our ancestors and rejoice in their liturgical activity, whatever the expression. We can imagine the closeness they had with life and death; their struggle with the animals being dragged to the entrance of the meeting tent or temple; the shame, exposure, inconvenience, and humiliation of being people who had to keep at a distance at a time when community care and support was so needed and who were obliged to call out, "Unclean, Unclean!" (13:45). What a variety of offertory processions to the Holy One! Then came the slaughter, with the spurting, sprinkling and smearing of blood, and the smell covered over by incense. Like a grand finale, the cloud suggested that the sounds of sin and death were then transformed into a chorus of praise of the presence of God in the midst of the people (26:11-13). One can almost hear the ram's horn (shofar) and the soothing sound of the lute that are now silent. There may be a certain "away from home" feeling in the hearts of all people today, but the holy message of Leviticus is alive and pulsating, in the expectation and excitement of the Holy One, the Messiah-Redeemer, who is to establish the everlasting dwelling place (Ps 43:3).

Here we are given laws, directives, morals, and morale that beat and pulsate to real life situations. Lev 26 will put the finishing touches on the covenant arrangement by detailing the rewards of obedience and the punishments of disobedience—specifics usually included in a covenant treaty. They were both an incentive and a scare tactic to assert the dominion of the king over the subject and to encourage the subject to follow the commands of the king.

Chapter 17. Scholars have discussed whether or not this chapter is a part of the Code of Holiness. Some think that chapter 17 acts as a bridge over all the material preceding the Code of Holiness, since there is mention of the offerings of Lev 1–3 as a prelude to Lev 18:5. There God is recognized as the source of the command to be fully alive.

The people were commanded to bring everything to the entrance of the meeting tent to be offered to the Lord (Lev 1:3, 2:2, 3:2, and corresponding to these commands are 17:4, 5, and 6). The priesthood (chs. 8–10) and purification (chs. 11–16) also parallel chapter 17. Because of these features, chapter 17 seems to assume a fitting role as the introduction to the Code of Holiness. The chapter could even have been an addition to the original little "Manual of Holiness." But we see more reason to accept chapter 17 as the original first chapter of the Manual of Holiness. The preceding chapters 1–16 could be expanded ideas, practices, and traditions of the original Code of Holiness.

In Lev 1–7 the emphasis was on obedience, simply because God commanded obedience. Chapter 17 gives reason why a person is to obey, and the command to obey assumes fuller import in the covenant relationship.

17:3, 8, 13, 15 The sacredness of blood. Everyone is commanded to recognize the source of life in the one, holy God. By respecting the life that is in the blood and acting out this respect through the ritual of putting the blood on the altar (17:11), the atonement (at-one-ment) of the people's lives is effected. The text says that the blood, as the seat of life, makes the atonement. This is interesting and understandable, since the presence of the Lord is believed to reside over the seat of mercy that covers the ark in the Holy of Holies. God, the source of life, is hidden in the blood, and the sin of the people is now hidden or covered by the atoning presence of God (16:13).

The Code of Holiness will be issued in chapter 18. It is an invitation to the human-divine marriage (18:5)—to partake of the fruit of the tree of life, to eat of it, and live forever the life of holiness. The final chapter of Leviticus will hint at the everlasting character of this life.

First, we have a final comment concerning the respect and use of blood. Many regulations concerning the blood were wrapped in the fate of the lifeblood of the bleeding animal. While Western thought tends to spiritualize life and reality (in the sense of constructing an ideal world) and to speak of death as disturbing proper order, for the biblical people everything was concrete. Blood was life, and the pouring out of blood was death, and death acted as a thief stealing life.

To be able to think as did the writers of Sacred Scriptures is crucial to understanding the Bible. The biblical people thought and expressed themselves in concrete terms. Since God chose to use this medium for the Divine Word to enter into the world, we need to be aware of this way of thinking.

For the Hebrew mind the Word of God was real, spoken as real as the greeting exchanged between neighbors ("The Lord spoke to Moses . . . , and from the meeting tent gave him this message . . ."). The life of the ancient Hebrews was lived in the presence of God. The language of Scripture reflects a people who thought, lived, and moved in a real world, and their God was very much a part of the real world. Their expression of what God had to say was also real. Truth, justice, and peace were not ideas, but living things. For the Hebrew, "Kindness and truth shall meet; justice and peace shall kiss. Truth shall spring out of the earth, and justice shall look down from heaven" (Ps 85:11-12).

Also, every slaughter of an animal, even if just for food, had to be a sacrifice (a making holy) or a sanctification (a living holy), since the animal victim enabled the offerer to continue living. God, the source of life, had to be recognized in some way. Thus when people were no longer in proximity to the altar, the first regulation of putting the blood on the altar was modified (Deut 12:24). It was to be poured out on the ground like water and could then return to the Lord.

17:13 The blood of the clean animal. In the case of a clean animal killed while hunting, the blood was to be buried. Similarly, a scribe who erred in copying the Sacred Scripture did not crumple the page and start over. Rather, he carefully extracted the infected portion of the scroll (as in a surgical procedure), encased it in a little casket, and buried it (as in a funeral). As the life is in the blood (v. 14), so the Spirit of Holiness is in the Holy Word.

Even though the putting of the blood on the altar was later modified in Deuteronomy and is not possible today (the temple was destroyed by the Romans in A.D. 70), the prohibition of eating blood has remained in Jewish practice to this day. The regulation could be changed only if God, the source of life, would invite people to eat the blood. So, the command would then be, "Eat my blood," which, in Hebrew thought would be, "Become one with my life."

18:1-30 The sanctity of sex. It follows from the affirmation of the source of life that any control over that life would need to follow the order (command) of the source of life. Covenant relation concerning life demands that the lesser partner (creature) takes direction (life and order) from the greater or source-partner (creator). Holiness in the control of life (sex) is to be found in the ordering which accords with God's plan. Not only does one have life (18:5) but one can also share in the control of life (18:3). This is the reason for the constant reminder that God is the source of life, "I am the Lord." The only authentic plan of living (Code of Holiness) is the plan of the "God who is" (Yahweh). Thus, the writer begins chapter 18 with the Lord saying to Moses, "Speak to the Israelites and tell them: I, the Lord, am your God" (v. 2). One can hear this beat of the heart of the Torah in 18:2-6, 21, 30; 19:2, 4, 10, 11, 13, 15, and elsewhere. Life is found by following God's plan (v. 5).

18:18 A bridge-verse. In the language of regulation the word sex stands for both male and female, even though each has a unique sharing in the control of the one life of God.

Verse 18 is a bridge-verse. It connects a list of incest prohibitions with a list of other "out-of-order" sexual relations. Lev 18:6-17 lists the disorderly acts of incest; then verse 18 says, "While your wife is still living, you shall not marry her sister as her rival; for thus you would disgrace your first wife." The second part of the verse refers to the disorder created in the life plan of God (in the Hebrew, Yah-God is mentioned as joined to the very life of the wife). This part also acts as a bridge to all the other disorders or immoral relations that are prohibited (vv. 19–23). The disorder implied in the first part of verse 18 results because a man already united to a woman violates the covenant arrangement, marries his sister-in-law, and creates a polygamous relationship. This disorder relates to incest and affects the community in which all, including the sister, should live the same holy life. The first part of the verse connects as a bridge to prohibitions of incest; the "disgrace" connects with other community disorders.

One should notice, for the sake of completeness, that the incest of father and daughter should not even have to be mentioned, but it is included in verse 6 and is accorded one of the pulsating phrases, "I am the Lord." In verse 22 the disorder is called an abomination, which in Hebrew means trying to make holy a union that cannot be completed in the real sense of the action. This is the reason why it is usually referred to as making a sacrifice to a strange god. The ordering of the source of life and the orderly plan of God within the covenant is cut off.

When the marriage invitation in chapter 18 is accepted by both parties of the covenant, the holy life takes on the renewed dimension of oneness along with completeness. To be at one in the Lord is the goal of the divine-human covenant.

In chapter 19 we need to be careful not to read into the text more or less than the writer or editors intended.

In chapters 17–26, the Code of Holiness (H), some material has vocabulary and unity of its own and is recognized by scholars as having a very early date. It, too, centers around the call of Israel to be holy. This Code may have been the core around which the final editors gathered other Priestly material. For these reasons this section is often referred to by the letter H. Ritual regulations are absent, and the text begins to talk in terms of principle and conduct. The tone is more ethical than ritual. The reader may feel more at home in this section of Leviticus. Here we have directives for living a holy life. Echoes of Genesis and Exodus commands are heard in the regulations of the Code of Holiness. For Adam and Eve in Gen 1:28, for Noah and family after the flood in Gen 8:17 and 9:7, and for all the people in Exod 20, "Eat and multiply," is the directive, "but do not divide by defilement for I, the Lord, am your God."

19:1-37 Various rules of conduct. The two basic rules of the divine-human relationship are found here—love of God and love of neighbor. That this twofold directive is alive and breathing today is witness enough to its enduring validity. Verses 2 and 18 give the commands "Be holy, for I, the Lord, your God, am holy" and "You shall love your neighbor as yourself."

In 20:1-8 and 20:9-21, the respective penalties are given for disobeying these commands. The remaining verses of chapter 20 spell out, in no uncertain terms, what will happen to the disobedient. In other words, ethically as well as ritually, the covenant relationship is still founded on obedience. This is a basic tenet of the covenant agreement and points to a proper order. Obedience to the order of covenant relations is the basis of accepting the rules of the life of holiness. The important question is not "Who's on first?" but "Who comes first?" Often we may think that holiness is achieved by giving up some part of life or by depriving one member of the covenant. However, to submit to the superior member of the covenant is the basic meaning of a covenant treaty.

The negative directives of chapter 18 were issued because at various times the people had taken direction contrary to the plan of holiness. Often, in assessing guilt, it is not the good or evil of the action that needs to be considered, but rather the order or manner of its performance. Examples abound in chapter 18. Intercourse is not forbidden in itself. What is forbidden are the disorderly situations that are contrary to the Code of Holiness and the life-giving power of the Creator.

What seems to be given as a penalty—the "vomiting of the people out of the land"—is simply a stated result of disorderly conduct similar to what happens in the case of a social stomach disorder. In chapter 26 we find that God, as the source of life, uses time itself to retrieve the divine order from the disorder caused by the human member of the covenant. This is an aspect of the everlasting covenant—God still gives us time to live and sustains us in life even when we choose to make fools of ourselves or even when we cut ourselves off from the covenant.

19:2 "Be holy, for I, the Lord, your God, am holy." This is the first rule of conduct in the life of holiness—to recognize God as the source of life. If we wish to live we must keep God's order. Holiness is of primary importance because God is first of all holy. In God, holiness (wholeness) and oneness are the same. We speak of the one, holy God. The secret to a full (holy) life is found in the Code of Holiness. The order is so simple that we are apt to overlook the meaning of command.

The order in God is perfect, since there is only one God. The oneness of God is a mystery, and in oneness there is no room for disorder. This monotheistic conception of life and the source of life in the world and in the history of the Israelite people is traced to the revelation to Moses in Exod 3:14: "I am who am." The divine drawing out of one leader (Moses) and one people (Israel) reflects a new monotheistic way of thinking. God is drawing out of the people the life of God present in their midst, in their very living. As the people were held in slavery, so the life of God in the people was held captive. The command to be holy completes the circle by drawing out and returning life to the source of life. "I am who am" is God's way of saying "I am the source of life."

Order is heaven's first law. The proper order comes first. The "One" comes first. God is the only One who can say "I am who am." So God comes first and the Book of Leviticus records the proper order. To be holy because God is holy is to accept God as the source of life.

In Lev 19:3 the next command in order is reverence for parents, since through them we come into covenant contact with God, the source of life. This is why reverence for parents and keeping the sabbath are joined together in the text. Filial reverence recognizes parents as the contact point with the reality of life and the Creator of the whole of life.

Both parents and sabbath are joined for another reason. God rested on the seventh day and made it holy (Gen 2:3). The sabbath is, then, a holy day for the whole family. Celebration of the prime source of life will, in proper order, include the secondary source (parents). The order cannot be reversed. There is a proper order to living the Lord's day. The regulation of the sabbath is, in its final analysis, the regulation of the tithe, which puts God first. The portion, one day in seven (the holy unity), is the tithe commanded by God (Lev 27:30).

19:4 "Do not turn aside to idols or make molten gods for yourselves." Note that the making of images is not forbidden, but to turn to molten gods or images used as objects of worship is forbidden. In fact, it is the Spirit of God who continues to move today in the creative talent of artists who try, in a particular ordering of creation, to express the image and likeness of God as the source of all life. In the Hebrew rendering of this rule of conduct (v. 4), there is a wordplay on "El," the name of the god of neighboring people (18:3). The same root word is used to express "dumb idols."

19:5-8 An acceptable peace offering. Peace is the tranquility of order. If order is kept, peace results. The peace offering should be eaten on the day it is offered or on the next day, but not on the third day for then it becomes refuse (unclean). One living the life of holiness profanes oneself by eating the three-day-old offering. The obvious reason, besides spoilage, is that order is not followed. It was directed that on the third day the remaining part was to be burned, not eaten. Recall that those peace offerings are better called welfare or well-being offerings. Thus the recognition of the source of life and the insurance of the well-being of the people are brought about by following the order. The very reason for the peace offering is to recognize the continuing presence of the divine as the source of life for the well-being of the people. To partake of unclean food profanes the sacred presence of the One who is the vital part of the community.

19:9 Sharing the harvest. Next in the life-order are those lives threatened by a lack of food. Those who have food and are able to acknowledge the source of life through the peace offering (thanksgiving for well-being) are really unable to give authentic witness to a life in holiness (completeness of the community) as long as there are those in that community who are poor. The regulation in verse 9 was established to give the poor the chance to live. This allows God as the source of all life to be at work in the whole community. Completeness and wholeness are what the life of holiness is all about.

The same rule is true in regard to the vines. The people are commanded to leave the grapes that have fallen (v. 10). This is God's way of giving them to the poor and the stranger. But they are not to leave anything for the fertility gods in payment for the crop, as was the custom of the land. "I am the source of all life; I, the Lord, am your God."

This latter exclamation is repeated several times in chapters 18 and 19. It appears that these chapters are a unit; perhaps they are the very first gathering of the materials into a manual of holiness. The exclamation "I, the Lord, am your God" is a clear reference to the first commandment of the Sinai Covenant Code and draws attention to the one God as the source of life. This recognition comes first in order (Exod 20:2-6; Lev 26:45). The repetition of the exclamation could have been used as a memory aid for the original manual. It could also mean that there were neighboring unacceptable practices (Lev 18:3; 20:23) well known to them at the time, and the frequent pauses in the text would make room for a litany-like response of short oaths of allegiance. The exclamation is the beginning of the first commandment. The community would continue, then, to publicly acclaim God, the Holy One, as the source of life.

19:16 "You shall not stand by idly when your neighbor's life is at stake." This regulation is joined to the command to avoid slander. No wonder, since the phrase used for slander means "to cut someone down by the spoken word." One can either stand in the way, stand by idly, or stand up to support the life at stake in one's neighbor. A witness to the truth can be an assertion of God as the source of life. In every circumstance we are obliged to weigh properly the life of our neighbor in the scale of justice. Therefore, if we accept the life of holiness we cannot stand by idly when falsehood is parading in the guise of truth for the destruction of life.

19:17, 18 "You shall love your neighbor as yourself." This and 19:2, "Be holy, for I, the LORD your God, am holy," are the most quoted verses of Leviticus. Later Jesus will join these two together in answering "Which commandment of the Torah is the greatest?" His answer will be "You shall love the Lord, your God with your whole heart, with your whole soul and with all your mind" (Matt 22:37 quoting Deut 6:5). "The second is like to it, You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Matt 22:39 quoting Lev 19:18). If one is living the life of holiness, which is described by the use of whole and all, then, everyone is neighbor to each other in this life. However, there is a holy sequence. Love of God comes first and includes love of neighbor, but love of neighbor does not, of necessity, lead immediately to love of the Holy One.

In verse 19 certain mixtures are prohibited. In the attempt to reflect the oneness of God in the wholeness of community life, the Priestly writers list some disorderly arrangements: crossbreeding, sowing two different seeds (one atop the other), and the tension of incompatible threads. The result of crossbreeding can be monstrous; different seeds vie for the same ground and moisture; the purity of the fabric is lost and the unity of the weaving is gone.

19:20-22 Atonement for relations with a female slave. The affirmation of the one source of life and the reflection of this oneness in the community is of prime importance. Thus the seriousness of sexual disorder or disorder in the control of life (v. 20) is shown by the requirement of a ram guilt offering in reparation. The importance of recognizing and affirming the source of life is deeper than meets the eye. For example, the slave girl does not have a life of her own since she is not free. Supposedly she would win her freedom if she were put to death (the creature's relationship with God goes beyond life and death), and the justice of Yahweh would be satisfied. The question at hand is not only that justice be done but also that the holiness of life be preserved. The man in this disorderly sexual relation also has a life of his own. Thus through the guilt offering he is forgiven his sin (v. 22). She then keeps her "non-status," death is not affirmed, and the man is purified for life in holiness. The proper order of recognition of God as the source of life is not disturbed. The sanctuary is also involved (v. 21), since the text is talking about sex as the sacred control of life. The ultimate support of life-control (sex) must be a proper orientation (order in worship) to God, the source of life.

The sex act of humans outside marriage is out of order. There is an order to the use of sex. The coming together of two people in the act of sex forms one body (Gen 2:24). It is the two that choose to act as one. This new oneness can result in the affirmation of existing life and creation of life. When God blesses man and woman in Gen 1:28 with the command "Be fertile and multiply," God is inviting them to a deeper share in the divine oneness, a share in the very power of the one source of life to create new life. It is this added dimension of oneness that must be affirmed before the couple engage in sexual union—a oneness that in turn can become a source of life here on earth. This new affirmation of God as the one source of life also affirms the true role of the couple in the covenant relationship. This affirmation is what the marriage covenant is all about.

In the case of the slave girl, it must be remembered that she is already living with a man (Lev 19:20). This could mean that the oneness of the Source of Life is already recognized and affirmed. The man who now has sexual union with her is definitely acting out of order. Sexual union among humans, then, has to do with the proper ordering or control of life. First, the oneness of God as the one source of life is affirmed, and then the oneness of the couple as a secondary source of life follows.

19:23-25 Uncircumcised fruit. Fruit trees take time to mature and first fruits cannot be given to the Lord until the fourth year. Then the first fruits can be given to the Lord for that year's harvest as a thanksgiving offering. As the rite of circumcision brought a Jewish male into life-relationship with the covenant, so the fruit had to be looked upon as uncircumcised (v. 23) until the fourth year, when it was brought into the covenant. Only in the fifth year could the fruit be eaten.

19:32 Respect for the elderly. The verse states that to stand up in the presence of the aged is a way to show respect. The length of life is a gift of the Lord; respect for the length of life is reverence for the God of life. In other words, we are not looking at the person as such. The criterion for respect is not the wealth the person has accumulated nor fame attained, but simply the length of years. The time that the life-power of the Creator has been at work in the world, in the individual, and in the community must be respected in the life of holiness.

20:1-21 Penalties for various sins. There are two groups of penalties here, corresponding to the twofold commandment of love of God and love of neighbor. In verses 1-8 violation of the holy name (the name of holiness) is treated. In verses 9-21 love of neighbor, starting with one's parents, is considered. The penalty for transgression is, of course, real or symbolic death. To be cut off and to be put to death seem to come together in the meaning and the extent of the penalty. The Code puts the recognition of God as the source of life at the head of the list. It follows that one who acts contrary to the recognition is cut off from the whole of life; this is the meaning of death. To be holy means to be fully alive.

20:2 Capital punishment. Israel allowed capital punishment by stoning. It was carried out by the whole community. One who refused to recognize God as the source of life was cut off from the community and put to death by stoning. There is a reference here to Molech. The word is akin to the Hebrew word for king and may be a graphic way of explaining that God comes first. The sanctuary becomes defiled when the palace becomes the place of worship. If the king is put first, then the king becomes one's source of life. One is cut off from the life of the Holy One and is dead to life in holiness. If the king is called upon, Yahweh is not acknowledged as the source of life. God alone can say, "I am who am" (meaning of Yahweh). No wonder the Jews were disturbed when Jesus said, "I solemnly declare it: before Abraham came to be, I AM," and they picked up rocks to stone him (John 8:58, 59). The holy name is blasphemed in Lev 24:16, and the consequent punishment is stoning by the community. No longer is that person allowed to be a member of the community of people who are living the life of holiness.

20:9 Cursing one's parents. These penalties concern the regulations of chapters 17, 18, and 19. The sacredness of the parental relation heads the list. The other penalties concern the disorder of control of life (sexuality) and of relationships of family and neighbor. Cursing is making light of something. To not only refuse proper crediting but even to discredit the proper order is what convicts a person. One who curses his or her parents, forfeits life (v. 9). This, in turn, leaves little room for recognition of God as the direct source of life. Such a state results in death. One cannot cut off the source of life without experiencing death.

20:22-27 Land ownership. Identity is fixed when people have a place to call their own. God has set the land apart for the people, who are to set themselves apart from the customs of the neighbor (vv. 24, 26). They must recognize this order and actually bring it about by setting themselves apart, the clean from the unclean (20:25). Thus they assert the commanding position of Yahweh.

20:24 A land flowing with milk and honey. Exod 3:8 is referred to here. The secondary source of the milk is the cow, sheep, goat, or camel, but God is the primary source of the milk and of honey from bees (see Sir 39:26). Because of the scarcity of clean water, milk was their most important drink. The land of Canaan is fat or wealthy (one of the meanings of the Hebrew word for milk). It is truly a "land flowing with milk and honey." Bees were plentiful, and deposited honey in the crevices of rocks or in hollow trees, even in the wilderness. In verse 24 God is affirmed as the source of these life-sustaining foods.

In verses 1-21 the penalties for not recognizing relation with God and neighbor are listed. In verses 22-27 the proper order of obedience is identified. Through obedience both God and people maintain an identity which is founded on covenant faith, not on fortune-telling (20:27).

Chs. 21–22 Mediators, sacrificial banquets, and sacrificial victims. The identities of God and people have been established. For God the identity is in the ordering. For the people their identity is in the obedient response. It is appropriate to consider now the mediators of these covenant relations: Moses who directs the priesthood (21:1-24) and the victim of the sacrifice (22:17-33). The irregularities concerning priest and victim find a certain balanced presentation in the text. Many regulations required for the state of purification are restated in relation to the priest and the victim. These considerations act as an introduction for what is to come in chapter 23. Moses is still the mediator. His role might best be described as the lawgiverhigh priest. He is the one to direct and guide Aaron's sons, the priests (21:1).

The irregularities of chapters 21:2–22:33, especially those of 21:16ff., may seem strange to us, but we must remember that today we know a great deal more about many of these maladies than did the biblical people. At that time, some irregularities were simply considered punishment from God. Judgments of impurity and profanation were often based on the person's inability to perform a particular action, as in the case of blind, crippled, and disfigured individuals.

Chapter 23 has a beauty all its own. It describes the life of holiness in terms of the feasts of Israel. The list begins with the sabbath rest (23:3). By keeping a day of complete rest God is recognized as the source of the life of holiness (Gen 2:3). The list continues with mention of Passover, Pentecost, New Year's day, the Day of Atonement, and finally the third pilgrim feast, the feast of Booths. The order in which these are presented is significant. The purpose of Leviticus is not to give a detailed instruction for festival observance but to draw attention to the need for these celebrations in order to give recognition to God's plan of life. "I am the Lord, your God," must be repeated every six days. The holy number was seven; thus the seventh day became the Lord's day. The seventh day represents the tithe of time that belongs to God.

23:1-44 Holy days. Throughout the Pentateuch there are calendars of holy days (Exod 23:14-18; 34:18-25; Lev 23; Deut 16:1-16). In Leviticus the three pilgrim feasts are mentioned: Passover-Unleavened Bread (23:4-14); the feast of Weeks or Pentecost (23:15-22); and the feast of Booths (23:33-44). New Year's day (vv. 23-25) and the Day of Atonement (vv. 26-32) are added. The sabbath heads the list (v. 3). God made the sabbath holy (Gen 2:3; see Exod 20:8-11 and Heb 4:4, 9). The listing is merely an announcement on the part of Moses (Lev 23:44). As long as one is a covenant member, every day is holy. Certain days, however, are designated by God, through Moses, to be celebrated with a holy assembly (23:1-3).

In ancient stories of other peoples, the sacred assembly took place among the gods. With Israel the Holy One initiates the gathering of the people (Lev 23:4; Exod 12:16). By gathering the major feasts into one place (in the Levitical material of the Pentateuch), the Priestly writers affirm the mediatorship of Moses in the celebrations of the people.

The order in which the list appears gives the reader a mosaic of the life of holiness in the world—the Holy One living in the midst of the people. The feast of Passover-Unleavened Bread celebrates freedom from slavery. Fifty days later, the end of the harvest and the offering of the first fruits begins with the celebration of Weeks (Pentecost). Then, there is one final look back at the wilderness with the feast of Booths, which commemorates the booth made from branches and the tent dwelling of the wanderings in the wilderness. It was also called the feast of Tabernacles, and since it was celebrated at the end of harvest time it received the name of Ingathering. Throughout this description of life, the beginning of each year is announced at a celebration, and every year the whole of life rejoices in the Day of Atonement.

The feast of Booths is mentioned at the end of the list. Its many names and its accent on dwelling show a development in its significance. No wonder that later Peter will want permission to erect three booths, one for Moses the lawgiver, one for Elijah the prophet, and one for Jesus the life-giver.

Chapters 23–25 should probably be read as a unit, since they speak of holy days, holy places and holy land. The days are holy (23:1-44) and the sanctuary lamp (24:1-4) and showbread (24:5-9) point to the holy meeting place. The sabbatical year (25:1-7) and the jubilee year (25:8-22) with redemption of property (25:23-55) deal with the holy land (25:1-22), property rights (25:23-38), and freedom (25:39-55). Chapter 23 describes the life of holiness with emphasis on the presence of the Holy One living in the midst of the people, whereas the sabbatical and jubilee celebrations of chapter 25, with their note of perfection in the holy number seven, seem to be looking beyond this life to the life of perfect holiness in God (the eternal Holy of Holies). Every seven years the whole land has a complete rest as a sabbath for the Lord (25:2-4). Then, in the jubilee life of perfection (seven times seven weeks of years), all shall return to their property (25:10, 13). But the Lord does not have a role in redemption of the land as the sanctuary had a role in purification (ch. 16) because God is the source of life and the owner of the land (25:23). Recall that God actually dwelt only in the cloud above the propitiatory seat of mercy in 16:2.

24:1-4 The sanctuary lamp. This repeats the regulations in Exod 27:20, 21. Exodus closes with Moses putting the lampstand in the meeting tent and arranging the bread on the table before the Lord (40:22-40). So now, at the close of Leviticus, the lamp and the table of display are arranged in the proper Levitical order. Here, however, the emphasis is not on the pure oil as in Exod 27, but on the presence of the Holy. (This is much like the symbolism of the tabernacle light in churches today.) When there is a light in the window, there is somebody home. So, the Holy One and the people who are to be holy are at home in the one covenant. The showbread, or the bread of display, represents the people (Lev 24:5-9), with six loaves in each of two piles on a small table. The piles are a reminder of the twelve tribes, like the two onyx memorial stones with the engraved tribal names as part of the priest's vestments (Exod 28:9-12). Thus, the Holy One and the people are present to each other by real signs of life. The oil is replenished (Lev 24:2) and the bread is kept fresh (24:8). For a life of holiness it is necessary to have an ongoing experience of the presence of each other—of the Holy One and the people who are to be holy.

24:10-23 Punishment for blasphemy and murder. What is holy can become profaned (the light is snuffed out when it should be burning) or the people can become defiled (the bread becomes unclean, stale). However, means will be given to affirm both the holy and the people or to redeem them from profanity or defilement (see ch. 25). In this life of holiness there is no atonement/redemption that can be made for the blasphemer (24:16) or for the murderer (Num 35:31). The reasoning is thus: the Hebrew word for blasphemy suggests a piercing, in some way, of the name of the Holy One. Piercing could bring about the flow of the lifeblood of the victim as in the case of murder. The life of God is in the Holy Name and the life of the human is in the blood, so by blasphemy and by murder, both God and human are pierced. The blasphemer and the murderer must be put to death.

There is also a wordplay in the text on the name Shelomith (24:10), a name similar to that of a neighboring goddess who was considered complete, holy. Such a substitution for the Holy One of Israel would be a blasphemy. The punishment for this violation would be stoning and consequent cutting off such an offender from the covenant of the life of holiness.

It is important to note that the text maintains the covenant arrangement (24:23). Moses is asked what to do about the blasphemer, but God is the Holy One who gives the command for the blasphemer to be cut off from the life of holiness (v. 14). Those who heard the blasphemy must join in, since they received the profanation through their ears. They are joined together in the life of the Holy One. By the laying on of their hands, they return the blasphemy to the offender and by stoning send it to death, a place of no return (24:14).

In chapter 25 the focus is on atonement, not in the sense of forgiveness but in the sense of at-one-ment, union resulting from full acceptance of the covenant relationship. The orderly arrangement of the Priestly material continues in these final chapters.

We can now see the atonement (ch. 16) effected in and reflected by the life of holiness (chs. 17–26). The celebration of the holy days (ch. 23) brings atonement for a more complete living (ch. 25) with the rewards and punishments attached to obedience or disobedience to the Code of Holiness (ch. 26). The two members of the covenant are reidentified and reaffirmed (ch. 24). Chapter 27 becomes another bridge-chapter but, unlike chapter 16, this bridge is only partially constructed.

25:1-22 Sabbatical and jubilee years. During the seventh year the land shall have a complete rest (25:4), a sabbath for the Lord. Even the land is holy and, as the Lord set aside the seventh day, so the land is affirmed as holy in the seventh year. In the seventh month of the forty-ninth year and continuing into the fiftieth year, the celebration is called jubilee, "the year of the ram's horn." We think of jubilation. On this Atonement Day the horn is blown to call the sacred assembly. The word for horn also has the meaning of removing the veil to see the beauty of the woman or to see the clear blue sky when the cloud is gone. Chapter 25:10 says, "You shall make sacred this fiftieth year, by proclaiming liberty in the land for all its inhabitants. It shall be a jubilee for you."

The people are free and return to their families (25:10). There is no more sowing or reaping (v. 11). If they obey, their dwelling is secure (not movable as in the wilderness, v. 18). The land will yield its fruit. They will have food in abundance so that they may live without worry (v. 19). There will be crops for three years, and even in the ninth year they will eat from the old planting because the eternal covenant in the life of holiness has begun.

In 24:17-21 we saw the legal aspect of the Code of Holiness in what is usually referred to as the law of retaliation or recompense—an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a life for a life, etc. Each of three Codes in the Torah mentions this human balance of justice (Exod 21:24; Lev 24:17-21, and Deut 19:21). As we continue in the Code, we begin to experience the justice of God at one with an unconditional love. A certain holiness begins to enter into real-life situations, given unconditionally by God. A certain stability and wholeness of every life relationship comes to those who, in obedience, recognize the one, holy God as the source of life and live according to the Code.

We are not dealing here with just memories or vain hopes. These are moral directives that give beat and pulse to real living. They are life-support dynamics of the celebration of the wholeness (holiness) of life. They are the vertebrae of the divine-human covenant. Slavery and exile are still the human condition of unfaithful covenant partners, but the enduring and sustaining presence of the Holy One is at work in the midst of the people (Lev 26:44, 45).

This is as far as the Book of Leviticus takes us in the Torah of the Holy One.

Some commentators refer to these later sections as a portrayal of an ideal life. This is true but the life of holiness was never meant to remain just an ideal. When the Torah was given, with Leviticus as its heart, the world received the plan of living a holy life.

The final form of the holiness begins to take shape. The remaining pieces will fall readily into place. This chapter in the five-volume work of the Law is about to complete its message.

Before we consider the partially constructed bridge (ch. 27), we need to look at a final note about the redemption of property in chapter 25 and the material in chapter 26, which was the standard way of closing a covenant treaty.

25:23-55 Redemption of property. The perfect (holy) calendar is presented in the first part of chapter 25, followed by the sacred activity of the holy jubilation year (vv. 23-55). The intended results of the Code were to be: Yahweh recognized as king (vv. 23, 55); wealth redistributed every jubilee (vv. 6, 7); families (v. 10), the land (vv. 2-4), and everyone enjoying liberty (vv. 10, 54); the land bearing fruit (v. 19) of itself (v. 11); all debts canceled (vv. 36, 37); the poor lifted up (vv. 25, 35, 39, 47, 48)—everyone and everything whole in the life of holiness. Note that the land remains the possession of the Holy One. "The land shall not be sold in perpetuity; for the land is mine, and you are but aliens who have become my tenants." (Later you may become my children but, for now you are my renters.) "Therefore, in every part of the country you occupy, you must permit the land to be redeemed" (vv. 23, 24). That is, if they live in the life of holiness, they must acknowledge Yahweh as the original owner, the source of life.

Yahweh had already ordered and taken part in the cleansing and purification of the sanctuary, the meeting tent and the altar, as well as the priests and all the people of the community (16:20, 33). Now a further order is given. Unlike the negative order in Gen 2:17 (see also Gen 3:22), "From that tree you shall not eat," there is the positive command to share in the life of holiness: "Be holy."

While we cannot with certainty sort out the various traditions woven together in Leviticus, we can see changing conditions in the story and can come to some conclusions as to its message at the time of the final editing. For example, walled cities and open-air villages are provided for here, and throughout Leviticus the traveling tabernacle is given emphasis. Such references suggest different chronological times in Israel's development. Yet, behind these observations and the ordered structure of the regulations and directives we see the truth of Lev 25:23: God is the owner of land and property; the people are but aliens who have become tenants.

25:25 Redemption of property. After recognizing that Yahweh owns the land and the property, the poor come first and this for the good of the family (vv. 23-28). As we read verses 23-55, it is as though the owner is preparing to buy back the dwelling in the midst of the people in the wilderness. Chapter 27 will expand this idea of the plan of redemption. Chapter 26 seems to say, "Take your choice, but there is only one correct choice if you want to live the life of holiness. If you choose obedience or disobedience, here are the respective consequences!"

26:3-13 "Live in accord with my precepts." If one gives obedience to these precepts of the life of holiness and the commandments (actually the Code of Holiness in chapter 19 includes the commandments of the Sinai Code in Exod 20), then all kinds of life-giving experiences will happen (vv. 3-13). "If you obey, I will set my Dwelling among you, and will not disdain you" (vv. 11-13).

26:14-46 Punishment for disobedience. If the community members are unfaithful, terrible things will happen (vv. 16, 17). If they still disobey, terrible things will happen to the world in which they live (vv. 19, 20). If they become defiant, things will get worse by seven times (each time in vv. 18, 21, 24, and 28 punishment is increased seven times over), until they will be forced to eat their own children (v. 29). This dire situation could happen in order to survive the siege of walled cities. In their defiant struggle to survive, they themselves would revoke the results (children) of their covenant with the Source of Life. A complete breakdown in the relations of God and people with the whole of life being overturned in death and exile (vv. 30-33) would occur.

26:34 The land shall retrieve its lost sabbaths. This is the built-in payment plan put there by God. While the people are in exile, the land rests. Everything comes to a standstill. The sabbaths must be kept and the precepts followed by the people, even though unwillingly. Sabbath payments are made to God and the people can do nothing about it. Verse 36 returns to the threat of verse 17. Finally, when "their uncircumcised hearts are humbled and they make amends" (v. 41), God will start over with the people. God is holy and remembers the covenant made with their ancestors (v. 42). Exile actually gives the land and the people time to rest (v. 43). The land became defiled when the people defiled themselves by their disobedience. Now both lie desolate, in reprieve for the land and in punishment for the people (v. 43), until time has elapsed equal to the sabbaths defiled. The land is holy because it also belongs to the Lord (25:23). Whenever the land is defiled (polluted), it lies desolate.

God's love is unconditional, since the Holy One does not allow the covenant to be voided, even though God is the only faithful one remaining (vv. 44, 45). This unconditional love is under, behind, and all around the Torah Law. The Book of Leviticus has now become the heart inserted into the Torah and, with its lively beat of the Code of Holiness, the People of God find themselves invited again to share in the life of the Holy One.

Throughout the reading of Leviticus, this simple outline has been stressed: obedience (chs. 1–27), purification (chs. 8–27) and holiness-sanctification (chs. 17–27). Obedience endures as a requirement. Obedience of the human partner of the covenant is requested by and made possible by God. The purification of the relationship reaches its anticlimax in the atonement chapter (Lev 16). Here the covenant partners meet and prepare for the climax of the covenant relationship in the life of holiness (Lev 27). Chapter 27 describes only the beginning of the perfect life, and for this reason is "an open-ended bridge-chapter." The perfect life of holiness is begun in the acceptance and practice of the Code of Holiness.

PART V: REDEMPTION OF VOTIVE OFFERINGS

Lev 27

It is understandable why many commentators treat this final chapter as an appendix to Leviticus. It gives the impression of an afterthought, added later because of its importance. The meaning of Lev 27 is so simple that it can be easily overlooked: It affirms God and people as faithful covenant partners. Its open-ended character suggests that the divine-human covenant is still in the stage of promise.

Some might be tempted to read into the text the fact that the Messiah-Redeemer had not as yet come as reason for the open-ended treatment. This would be an assumption beyond what is contained in Leviticus. The concentration is still upon God as creator of life and Moses as lawgiver-mediator presenting the rules of conduct of the Sinai Covenant. Leviticus has reaffirmed the Sinai Covenant in adding the new dimension of holiness in the sense of completeness. The people are now to become fully alive (holy).

The secret in understanding chapter 27 lies in the meaning of the vow and the tithe. It begins by vowing all of creation to God: persons (vv. 2-8); livestock (vv. 9-13); dwelling (vv. 14, 15); hereditary land (vv. 16-24). The chapter ends by returning everything to God in the tithe (vv. 26-34).

In the preceding chapter the divine partner of the covenant spelled out the results, good and bad, of the obedience or disobedience of the junior member. Here the Holy One respects the free will of the human partner and points the way of respect for the divine partner.

The practice of making a vow to a deity in order to receive a favor or cure is very ancient. However, we are dealing with a more basic idea: the holiness of life. The vow and its redemption, along with the practice of tithing, make possible the holy life. As a free-will offering, the vow affirms human life. The tithe affirms divine life.

In chapter 27 God affirms human free will and gives conditions whereby the votive offering can be redeemed. Everyone and everything in creation is considered. The meaning of vow goes to the very root of life. In a way every vow to God is a promise to live a holy life. God wills the creature to be fully alive, that is, holy. In Gen 1:26, 27 the creature is created in the image and likeness of God, able to assert its own freedom. The buying back of life in all of creation must be done according to God's terms. The priest sets the price, but the terms are according to the rules of the jubilee, God's life-giving celebration (vv. 17, 18, 21, 23, 24). God, then, remains the source of life and holiness.

Certain offerings cannot be redeemed: the first-born and, at the other end of life, those doomed to die (vv. 26-29). They affirm God as the ultimate source of life. There is a refinement here of the dedication of Exod 13. Every first-born that opens the womb among the Israelites, both of humans and beasts, belongs to the Lord. It cannot be the object of a vow (dependent on human free will). It still acts as a reminder of the death of the first-born of the Egyptians, who would not recognize Yahweh as the source of life (Exod 13:14-16). Death is still the human condition (Gen 3:19), but now the emphasis is on dedication and redemption.

27:28-29 "All human beings that are doomed." The Hebrew word for "doomed" in verse 28 also has the meaning of "dedicated," that is, "set aside for the Lord." God alone has control over the human being, animal, or land that has become most sacred (dedicated). In modern-day parallel, people on death row are doomed to die, but appeal can be made to the highest authority. Another meaning of the word is "people dedicated by solemn vow to God." In the order of holiness they are on "life's row." It is the will of the divine covenant member that all live. Life, not death, is the will of God. Death came into the world because of the human covenant member (Gen 3), and death is still present to the community of the human covenant members. However, the divine partner could play the role of the lesser member and then restore life to the human condition.

27:30-33 The sacredness of tithes. The above explanation is only partial. In an unfinished bridge-chapter we expect some partial answers. As in Gen 28, the vow and the tithe are now brought together in chapter 27 to affirm and ensure the continued presence of God. The tithe becomes the span of the bridge that we set in place, even though constructed of material belonging to the Lord.

We need to rethink our definition of tithe. We are not speaking of one-tenth as of multiples of ten. In the creation of the world, the tithe was the seventh day. Each of the six days of creation is made up of the created things of the previous day plus its own works. The seventh day was made holy (Gen 1:3). The seventh day in the creation blueprint became a miniature world, holy and complete, a fitting expression of the creator's gift of the world. The Lord's day is a holy day. It is the original form of the tithe. "Seventh" and "complete rest" are from the same Hebrew root. The seventh day is the day of completion.

Deut 14:22-29 puts the finishing touches on the understanding of tithing. "Each year you shall tithe all . . . then in the place which the Lord, your God, chooses as the dwelling place of his name you shall eat in his presence your tithe . . . . that you may learn always to fear [respect the source of life] the Lord, your God" (14:22-23). In verse 26, after making provision for everyone, Deuteronomy directs all to partake of the tithe and make merry with their families.

Deuteronomy continues the regulation "at the end of every third year, you shall bring all the tithes . . . for that year and deposit them in community stores, that the Levite . . . the alien, the orphan and the widow . . . may come and eat their fill" (14:28-29). Let everyone enjoy fully the life of holiness.

The payment of the tithe is in the eating of the meal together (the Holy One and the ones called to be holy) with the feeding of the poor so that all may have life to the full. This is the life of holiness, a life that is being lived today in the Eucharist-Passover, the celebration of the redemption of the First-born. Gathered with the writers of the Book of Leviticus on the partially constructed bridge to the Dwelling of the Holy Name, we begin to hear the song of celebration: "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts! All the earth is filled with God's glory!"

NUMBERS

Helen Kenik Mainelli

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Numbers, the fourth book of the Pentateuch, is so named because it contains two censuses of the Israelite tribes (1:20-46 and 26:5-51) and of the Levites (3:14-51 and 26:57-62). It also includes lists of various kinds, some with numbers: a list of the princes who assist with the census (1:5-15); a list of gifts brought for the dedication of the altar (7:10-83); a list of the scouts sent to explore the land (13:4-15); lists of offerings to be brought for feast days and festivals (28:1-29:38); and a list of the booty taken from the Midianites (31:32-52). While the name "Numbers" fits some of the content, it does not accurately suggest the story told in the book.

The story in Numbers begins in the desert of Sinai just after the covenant event and ends forty years later with the people waiting on the plains of Moab to enter the Promised Land. It is the story of the people of God as they journey through the wilderness for almost forty years under the leadership of Moses and Aaron.

The central issue is the presence of Yahweh with the people as they journey through the wilderness: God walks with them and directs their lives. The people, for their part, often grumble and rebel; they provoke divine judgment and seek forgiveness.

The Book of Numbers is the last part of the story that begins in the Book of Genesis with creation and continues in the Book of Exodus with the liberation and election of God's people. As we read the Book of Numbers, we will continually be reminded that this is but one piece of a continuous story identified as the primary history.

The organization of the primary history

The primary history is divided into eras: the ages of Adam, Noah, and the ancestors of Israel (Genesis); the era of Israel's movement from Egypt to Sinai (Exodus); and the era of Israel's movement from Sinai to the threshold of the Promised Land (Exodus to Numbers).

The Sinai event stands at the center. What begins in the Book of Exodus with Sinai continues in the Book of Numbers. All the directives in Num 1–10, for example, are communicated to Moses at Sinai.

Likewise, from Sinai there is a look backward to creation. The law of the sabbath, given at Sinai (Exod 31:12-17), links with the creation event (Gen 2:2-3).

The Priestly authors and their audiences

The primary history was put into final form in the sixth century B.C.E. by priests intent on the restoration of the temple cult. The work is therefore called "Priestly," or "P" for short. The authors were from the family of priests, the sons of Zadok, who secured leadership among the displaced people of the Exile (sixth century B.C.E.) and motivated this people to center its life on the worship of Yahweh. They wrote the history specifically to give the exiled Israelites hope and comfort based on memory of God's actions. They challenged the exiles to recall the events of old, especially the ways in which God was present among the people, led them, and provided for them in their formative years.

The priests wrote the story of God with Israel for people whose identity and faith, like ours, were questioned in the face of dramatic political, cultural, social, and religious upheaval. They stirred people to reach behind the collapsed institutions to that early time of God's love-relationship in covenant to discover again the benefits of dependence and obedience. The priests detailed the ways of God's presence in that early time so that people might rediscover God in their midst in new ways in a new age. The priests provided a word of hope and encouragement for all of us in our wilderness experiences that we might know that others have walked before us under the protection and guidance of Yahweh.

The priests handed down traditions from Israel's past. They were not authors who made up stories nor historians whose intention was to report past events. Rather, they were writers who collected ancient documents, lists, reports, and stories, which they edited and arranged into an account of God with the people that at once told the story of the past and addressed the needs of contemporary generations. They were writers who remembered the past and handed down essentials from tradition to provide a basis for the reidentification of God's people.

The Priestly theology

The selection and organization of traditional material in the narrative were determined by covenant theology. The priests traced the covenants from the beginning of Israelite history, and in so doing they emphasized the perpetuity of the relationship between God and the people. Yahweh's covenant is eternal. The covenant with Noah (Gen 9:1-17) and the covenant with Abraham (Gen 17:1-27) prepared the way for God's ultimate self-disclosure to Israel at Sinai, the covenant that endured to the Exile and beyond.

At Sinai the covenant issued in one benefit—the presence of Yahweh in Israel's midst. The glory of the Lord settled upon Mount Sinai and remained present with the people in covenant (Exod 24:16; 25:8). The Priestly writer chose his words very carefully. Here the verb translated "settled upon" means literally "to tent" or "to walk about among." This was not a presence in the static sense of nearness in a shrine. The priests remembered the days when Yahweh, present on the ark and in the tent, moved with the people. By linking together the idea of Yahweh's "tenting" or "moving among" with various covenant formularies, they make the theological point that is central to the whole narrative:

> I will dwell in the midst of the Israelites and will be their God. They shall know that I, the Lord, am their God who brought them out of the land of Egypt, so I, the Lord, their God, might dwell among them (Exod 29:45-46; see Lev 26:11-13 and John 1:14).

Special vocabulary used in the Priestly edition

Glory of the Lord is the distinctive designation for the God-self revealed in majesty and power. The Priestly source uses the term "glory of the Lord" whenever it speaks about God being actually present and manifest (see Num 16:19; 17:7).

Dwelling is the key word of Priestly theology. Derived from the verb "to tent" or "to walk among as a tent-dweller," this idea implies mobility and nearness as well as holiness and transcendence. It is the word chosen by the Priestly author to indicate the place of Yahweh's covenant presence and carries the idea that Yahweh is always present with the people (see Num 1:50-53). This special word encompasses all of the other designations for Yahweh's presence: the tent, ark, holy place, etc.

Meeting tent refers to the traditional place of divine-human meeting. This is the place where Yahweh meets and speaks with the people through Moses (Exod 29:42; Num 1:1; 2:2; 3:7-8, etc.). The Priestly tradition sometimes uses "meeting tent" as a metaphor for the Dwelling, the place where the glory of the Lord is revealed (see 16:19).

Ark is identified by the Priestly writer as the "ark of the covenant" (Num 10:33) and as the "ark of the commandments" (Num 4:5; 7:89). In early tradition the ark was the seat upon which Yahweh was believed to be invisibly present. This instrument of Yahweh's presence was reinterpreted by the priests as the container for keeping the covenant document. In the Priestly tradition the covenant is the Decalogue, or the tablets of the law (see Exod 25:16, 21, 22).

Sanctuary is used to talk about the most sacred place, the location of the ark and the meeting tent, where Yahweh dwells among the people. It is a general term for "holy place" and is used interchangeably with "Dwelling."

Community refers to the people of the covenant and the whole family of the people of God. The priests think of Israel as a congregation, in the sense of a people at worship. This community, which participates in cult and worship, will gain the blessings inherent in the eternal covenant (see Num 1:2, 16, 18; 3:7, etc.).

"I am Yahweh" is a recognition formula that identifies God as the liberator of the people from slavery in Egypt, and therefore as the God who has chosen Israel for a special relationship:

> I am Yahweh.
> I will free you from the forced labor of the Egyptians . . . .
> I will take you as my own people, and you shall have me as your God (Exod 6:6a, 7a).

The Priestly writer uses this recognition formula throughout the narrative to lead the people to recognize that the God Yahweh who acted in the past continues to be present and active on behalf of the covenant people (see Num 3:13, 45; 35:34).

Stylistic features in the Priestly edition

The priests present their material in such patterned ways that it will be helpful for the reader to be able to recognize some of the literary peculiarities. We divide this commentary into chapters, for example, on the basis of the Priestly writers' use of the journey formula. The content in the book is set into the various segments of the journey schema.

Journey formula. The march through the wilderness begins at Sinai and ends at Moab in a sequence of stages. At precise moments the Priestly author inserts the formula "they moved on from _____ and came to rest in _____" to indicate the movement from place to place. After the events in the wilderness of Sinai (Num 1:1–10:10), the people move from Sinai to the desert of Paran (10:12); from the desert of Paran to the desert of Zin at Kadesh (20:1); from Kadesh to Mount Hor (20:22); from Mount Hor to the desert east of Moab (21:10-11); and finally they move on to the plains of Moab (22:1), where they remain at the end of the book.

The journey from Sinai to Moab takes place in six stages. The journey from Egypt to Sinai also takes place in six stages. The journey formula occurs at Exod 12:37a; 13:20; 14:1-2; 15:22a; 16:1 and 17:1a. These twelve stages correspond to an ancient tradition about the journey which the Priestly writer preserves in Num 33:5-49.

God's word spoken and obeyed. Moses is presented in the Book of Numbers as an illustration of a leader who faithfully carries out God's word. It is helpful to notice the typical formulation: "The Lord said to Moses: 'Do such and such.' Moses, therefore, did such and such in accordance with the command the Lord had given him" (see Num 1:1, 18-19; 3:14-15, 40-42, etc.).

Cycle of rebellion, punishment, forgiveness. One of the Priestly writer's intentions is to illustrate the history of Israel's infidelity. To do this, he borrows traditions of unfaithfulness and sets the incidents into a predictable story pattern. Each story has these elements: (1) the people complain; (2) God becomes angry and punishes; (3) the people cry out for help; (4) Moses intercedes on behalf of the people; (5) Yahweh responds by giving relief from the punishment. This pattern occurs in the stories in Num 11:1-3; 12:2; 9-16; 17:6-15; 21:4-9.

OUTLINE OF THE BOOK

1:1–10:10
In the desert of Sinai: Preparations for the journey

10:11–22:1
On the journey from Sinai to Moab
- Events in the desert of Paran (10:11–19:22)
- Last stops along the way (20:1–22:1)

22:2–36:13
On the plains of Moab: Preparation for life in the land

COMMENTARY

IN THE DESERT OF SINAI: PREPARATIONS FOR THE JOURNEY

Num 1:1–10:10

These beginning chapters of the Book of Numbers describe events that take place while the people are camped at Sinai. They are being readied for the great march into the Promised Land. First, a census is taken (ch. 1), and the people are organized around the Dwelling, the presence of Yahweh among them (ch. 2). Next, there is a numbering of the Levites, whose principal duty is the care of the Dwelling (ch. 3), and a description of their duties (chs. 4 and 8). There follows a series of regulations that ensure the sanctity of the camp (chs. 5 and 6). There is then a listing of the offerings by the princes/leaders to serve the Dwelling in transport (ch. 7), with final preparations for the movement out of the camp: the lights are lighted in the Dwelling (8:1-4), and guidance is provided for the trek through the wilderness (9:15-23). The second Passover is celebrated to remember that a year has passed since the deliverance from Egypt (ch. 9), and the silver trumpets are blown to signal the march (10:10).

These chapters were set down by priests in the exilic period, when the community needed instructions regarding its present circumstance. It viewed itself as being once again in the wilderness and preparing for a return to the homeland. The vision of a community organized about the Dwelling encompasses at once that early first entry into the land of promise and this new time of waiting for the return to the land.

These first ten chapters contain remembrances about life in the wilderness. The traditions are ancient ones preserved by members of the Priestly school to construct ideally that early experience. More important to the priests is the message of hope contained in the memory of the past. The account presents the exilic community with a model that has Yahweh at the center and the people as a community at worship, organized around the Dwelling. The regulations given clarify responsibilities for priests, leaders, and people that they might be holy within the organization of the new community of faith.

1:1-3 The census. The scene is the wilderness at the foot of Mount Sinai, where Yahweh and Israel celebrated the unique relationship of covenant. There, according to Yahweh's command, Moses erected the Dwelling and placed the ark in the meeting tent on the first day of the first month in the second year after the Israelites came out of the land of Egypt (Exod 40:2, 17-19; see 19:1).

Yahweh speaks with Moses in this tent one month later, on the first day of the second month of this second year after the Exodus (v. 1), commanding him to take a census of the people. The command specifically states that the sons of Israel are to be registered individually, as well as according to their clan in the father's line (v. 2). Only males twenty years or older are to be counted. Twenty years is the age at which a male person becomes an adult, and therefore subject to the full range of religious duties, including participation in military service (v. 3).

The census marks the initial preparation for the great pilgrimage to the Promised Land. Yahweh has appointed Moses as leader of the grand march. Moses is to be the people's representative before God and the one through whom God speaks with the people. The formula "The Lord said to Moses" (v. 1) is repeated over eighty times in the book. The importance of Moses cannot be emphasized enough. In continuity with the Exodus tradition (Exod 24 and 32), Moses will be assisted in his leadership role by his brother Aaron: "You and Aaron shall enroll . . ." (v. 3). The dominant role of Aaron will unfold in the course of the book.

1:4-19a Moses' assistants: Twelve princes of Israel. To assist Moses and Aaron with the census, a man holding a position of authority in each tribal unit is designated to conduct the count in his clan (v. 4). These individuals hold authority that extends to all dimensions of life. They are "councilors," or representatives in the worshiping community, "princes" within the family, and "chiefs" over the military forces (v. 16). As representatives within the worshiping community, these leaders present offerings for the dedication of the altar (7:10-88). As princes in their respective families, they are responsible for order in the camp (2:3-31). As chiefs of the military forces, they lead the people as they embark on the journey from the wilderness of Sinai (11:13-28).

It is uncertain whether the names of the leaders of the tribes have survived from an early time or whether they are names of leaders from the period after the Exile. Since some of the names appear in 1 and 2 Chronicles (see 1 Chr 6:12; 7:26; 12:3, 10; 15:24; 24:6; 2 Chr 11:18; 17:8; 35:9, etc.), which come from the time when the temple was rebuilt, we assume that these men were actual leaders known to the priests and not a recollection of leaders from the time of the wilderness sojourn.

The list of the twelve tribes found in verses 5-15 is one of the important genealogies of the people and reflects the rules of protocol in tribal hierarchy. This list follows the sequence of names first recorded in Gen 35:22b-26 in the narration of the birth of Jacob's sons, with variations that reflect the needs of the later period. According to protocol, the sons of the legitimate wives always take precedence over the sons of the maids. The lists are as follows:

	Gen 35:22b-26	Num 1:5-15
Jacob's sons by Leah:	Reuben	Reuben
	Simeon	Simeon
	Levi		Because in Numbers, the tribe of Levi is enrolled separately (see 1:47-54), Levi is omitted from the list.
	Judah	Judah
	Issachar	Issachar
	Zebulun	Zebulun
by Rachel:	Joseph	Ephraim
	Benjamin	Manasseh	To retain the count of twelve, the tribe of Joseph is divided into the two sons (see Gen 48:1).
		Benjamin
by Bilhah, Rachel's maid:	Dan	Dan
	Naphtali	Asher
by Zilpah, Leah's maid:	Gad	Gad
	Asher	Naphtali	In all lists where the sons of Joseph are listed separately, the names Naphtali and Asher reverse order for a reason unknown (see 13:4-15).

There is another pattern for the listing of the tribes that we will discuss when we comment on the arrangement of tribes in the camp and on the march (see ch. 2).

On the very day on which the Lord instructs Moses and Aaron to take the census, that is, on the first day of the second month (v. 18; compare v. 1), the assistants are named and the census begins. Every adult male is registered according to the Lord's command (vv. 18b-19; compare vv. 2-3). Thus the census takes place, with Moses, Aaron, and the tribal leaders responding obediently to God's word.

1:19b-46 Count of the twelve tribes. Rigid structure and formulaic expression characterize the Priestly narrative. The record of the census count is typical of the patterned language. Each of the twelve tribes, with its count of male members, is set forth in stylistic rhetoric that is nicely captured in our translation. Notice that the schematized recital has an introduction, "This is their census" (v. 19b), and a conclusion (vv. 44-45) that reiterates the formulas to indicate that God's command has been carried out exactly. The stylized presentation serves two functions: (1) it puts emphasis on the group included in the census—male adults capable of military service, registered in their individual tribes in their father's line; (2) it points up the names of the individual tribes and the size of each group.

The order in which the tribes are presented falls into the pattern we have described above. The only variation from the list given in verses 5-15 is the substitution of Gad for the tribe of Levi. The repetition of the precise pattern gives us a sense of the priests' reliance on traditional information in recounting the memory of that early time in the wilderness in order to sustain the faith of the people in their current passage from an exilic wilderness.

The total 603,550 in verse 46, as well as the numbers given for the individual tribes, can hardly be historically accurate. What was remembered of that idyllic period in the wilderness was the multitude of ancestors who populated the land and the pride in national history that had its beginning in the Exodus-wilderness experiences. Memory of that glorious past, however idealized and exaggerated, nurtures a people for whom the hope for a future is built on memory of the past.

1:47-54 The Levites. Because the Levites are assigned the care of the sanctuary, they are not included in the census of those who are capable of military service (v. 47). Their duties are to carry the Dwelling, to care for it, and to camp around it (v. 50). They alone are allowed to take it down and set it up again as the people move from site to site. Death is the punishment for any non-Levite who approaches the Dwelling (v. 51). When the tribes are encamped around the Dwelling, the Levites form a kind of shield to insulate the people from the divine presence (vv. 52-53).

The Dwelling is the place where Yahweh is present with the people, a presence rooted in the covenant. The phrase "Dwelling of the commandments" (v. 50) points to the Dwelling as the place where the ark with the commandments is located. There is here a merging of the various traditions of God's presence in order to emphasize what has always been true: God resides in the midst of the people. This Dwelling, given to the care of the Levites, represents Yahweh's presence not concretely but by covenant relationship.

The task assigned to the Levites is the service of the Dwelling. In verse 53 the phrase "shall have charge" is from the verb meaning "to serve," which is used most frequently in contexts of worship. It means to do worthy service, to honor and care for that which is sacred. The Levites' task is a kind of continuous performance of worship.

2:1-34 Camp around the meeting tent. Now that the census has been completed, the focus changes to the arrangement of the tribes around the meeting tent. According to tradition, the meeting tent was that place where God communicated with the people through the mediatorship of Moses (see Exod 33:7-11). The meeting tent could be moved along with the people. Wherever the people moved, Yahweh's voice could always come to Moses. In the introductory address Moses' name precedes that of Aaron because Moses is traditionally the mediator at the tent as well as the designated leader of the people on the way to the land.

The word of the Lord comes to Moses and Aaron (v. 1) with the command that the people should encircle the meeting tent, leaving some distance between themselves and the tent, and should group themselves according to the clan and family divisions of the census (v. 2). The tribes are to be arranged in a precise formation, three on each side, around the meeting tent (see next page). The Levites are situated in the center to shield the Israelites from the tent of Yahweh's presence (v. 17a; see also 3:24, 29, 35, 38).

The east side of the camp is the most prominent, since it faces the rising sun in front of the tent. As we move clockwise from the east, we discover the relative status of the tribes. Priority is given to the tribe of Judah, and the least position is given to three tribes that trace their birth to the maids of Jacob's wives (see Gen 35:25-26).

The order of the tribes differs slightly from the lists of the census in 1:5-15 and 20-43. It begins with Judah rather than Reuben.

1:20-43	2:3-31
Reuben	Judah
Simeon	Issachar
Gad	Zebulun
Judah	Reuben
Issachar	Simeon
Zebulun	Gad
Ephraim	Ephraim
Manasseh	Manasseh
Benjamin	Benjamin
Dan	Dan
Asher	Asher
Naphtali	Naphtali

By grouping the tribes in triads, we can see that the Judah group is positioned ahead of the Reuben group in order of status. The variation is important because the tradition of the preeminence of Judah in the arrangement of the camp carries over into the order of worship (7:12-83) and into the order of march (10:14-28). With this order the Priestly author is reflecting an actual situation of his own day. The exiles originally came from the territory of Judah, and they return there to reestablish Jerusalem as the religious center for the people. The prominence of Judah thus suggests the importance of the southern region as the place where the people will establish themselves as well as the new temple for Yahweh's presence.

ARRANGEMENT OF THE TRIBES
AROUND THE MEETING TENT

When the tribes move, they will move in precisely the designated order (v. 17b)—the Judah triad first (v. 9), the Reuben triad second (v. 16), the Ephraim triad third (v. 24), and the Dan triad last (v. 31). Each group consists of the males who have been numbered (v. 32), and each moves under the banner of the clan (v. 2). All this was done "just as the Lord had commanded Moses" (v. 34).

3:1-4 Priests distinct from Levites. This chapter opens with a genealogical formulary distinctive of the style of the Priestly writer: "The following were the descendants of so and so." This heading is typically used by the Priestly writer to mark off major periods in the history of God's people. From creation to the ancestors of Abraham, the formulary occurs five times to indicate major junctures (Gen 2:4a; 5:1; 6:9; 10:1; 11:10), and from the ancestors of Abraham to Jacob five more times (Gen 11:27; 25:12, 19; 36:1; 37:2). After the account of Israel's ancestors, the formulary is not used again until this place in Numbers, where we find the genealogy of the sons of Aaron, to whom the priests trace their ancestry. Thus, there is a conscious link from the priests back to the ancestors and, before them, to creation.

The name of Aaron comes before that of Moses (compare 2:1) because here the Priestly writer is talking specifically about the descendants of Aaron, who exercise the duties of the priesthood. From this point on in Numbers, a distinction is made between the priests who are descended from Aaron and the Levites who identify with Moses. The appointment of the sons of Aaron to the duties of the priesthood is everywhere emphasized (see especially 17; 25:10-13; 27:12-23).

We note that the events recorded in Numbers are always linked back to the Sinai event. So, too, is the designation of the sons of Aaron linked to "the time that the Lord spoke to Moses on Mount Sinai" (v. 1b; compare Exod 24:1-2). Aaron had four sons: Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar (v. 2; see also Exod 6:23), who were "anointed" and "ordained" to the priesthood (v. 3). Priests were anointed by the pouring of oil on their heads (Exod 29:7), the act by which they were dedicated to God (Lev 21:12). Ordaining means literally to "fill one's hand," that is, to give some task or responsibility in trust into someone's hands. The priests are entrusted with the good of the people who come to the presence of God. They are in charge of the liturgy, sacrifices, and feasts, the activities through which God's gifts of healing and life flow to the people. By being anointed and ordained, the priest is consecrated to carry out these responsibilities (see Exod 28:41).

Of Aaron's four sons, Nadab and Abihu died tragically in the wilderness of Sinai, leaving no descendants (v. 4a). This story can be read in Lev 10:1-5. The ancestry of Aaron was thereafter carried on by Eleazar and Ithamar (v. 4b). These two branches of the family can be traced through the time of David: Zadok from Eleazar, and Ahimelech from Ithamar (see 2 Sam 8:17; 1 Chr 18:16; 24:1-4). Eventually the line of Zadok rose to a position of prominence (see 2 Sam 15:24-29; 1 Kgs 2:35; Ezek 44:15-16). The designation of the sons of Aaron as a group assigned the special duties of the priesthood reflects, therefore, the actual practice from the tenth century on. The distinction between the priests and the Levites persisted into the time when the people returned from exile and after (see Ezra 2:36, 40; Neh 7:39, 43).

3:5-13 Levi's sons: assistants to the priests. In the remainder of this chapter, the Lord speaks to Moses alone (vv. 5, 11, 14, 40, 44). The concern is the Levites as distinct from the priests, and specifically as assistants to the priests (v. 6).

The Levites are traditionally identified as followers of Moses (see Exod 32:25-29), though actual descent from Moses is unclear. What is clear is the traditional status of the Levites as ministers to the priests and to the community. Only the sons of Aaron may function as priests (v. 10). The Levites are given to the priests as individuals "set apart" from the people Israel; they are "given" for Yahweh (v. 9; see 8:16; 18:6). They are to "discharge" the duties of Aaron and the community (v. 7) and to "have custody" of the furnishings of the meeting tent (v. 8). In both cases, the verb is "to serve," which more accurately means "to honor and care for something sacred." The Levites, then, would see that both priests and the community properly worship the divine presence (v. 7) by caring for the furnishings and overseeing the functions of the people at worship (v. 8).

The Levites are understood to be the property of Yahweh in place of the first-born of Israel (vv. 12-13). To commemorate Yahweh's claim on Israel, demonstrated with the death of the first-born of the Egyptians (v. 13a; Exod 11:4-8), the first-born of Israel belonged to Yahweh from that time on (v. 13b; Exod 13:2-16; 34:19-20). The Levites, as Yahweh's possession, act as substitutes for what is Yahweh's true right—the first-born of the other tribes. Yahweh has chosen the Levites, and they are given to Yahweh in place of the first-born (v. 12). The idea of being ransom for the first-born is discussed again in our commentary on 3:40-51 and 8:5-26.

3:14-39 Levi's sons: census and duties. We are once again invited to remember that these events are taking place in the wilderness of Sinai in accord with Yahweh's command (v. 14). The sons of Levi were excluded from being counted among the people of Israel in the census (see 1:47-48). As a sign that they are dedicated for service, a special census is taken of their numbers (v. 15). In their case, it is not males of twenty years or more, fit for military service that are counted (compare 1:3, 18, 45), but the entire male population from one month of age (v. 15b). This means that the Levites are "given" to Yahweh from birth, in the sense that they belong to Yahweh from the beginning of their existence. The indication of "one month" means that the infant has withstood the critical period of infancy and therefore has the potential for a full life. The Levites actually fulfill the duties assigned them only between the ages of thirty and fifty (see 4:3). Like all the Israelites, the Levites are registered by clans in their father's line (vv. 15a and 20b).

The listing of the names of the sons of Levi is intended to parallel that of the sons of Aaron in 3:2, though here the genealogical formulary is lacking. Obviously, the Priestly writer intends that the emphasis be on the priests, who are linked by the genealogical introduction to the ancestors and creation. The status of the Levites is secondary to that of the priests.

There are three sons of Levi, each of whom is named together with his descendants: Gershon, with his descendants Libni and Shimei; Kohath, with his descendants Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel; and Merari, with his descendants Mahli and Mushi. This list of names in verses 17-20 corresponds to the data given in sections in verses 21, 27, and 33. While information about the descendants is scant, it is probable that they reflect persons as well as places. What the Priestly author has done is to put the traditional material about the Levites into a pattern of relationships that has a correspondence to the other Israelite tribes.

The information about the clans in each of the sections is presented in a patterned sequence. After the names in verses 21, 27 and 33, the count of each clan is given: Gershon numbers 7,500 (v. 22); Kohath numbers 8,300 (v. 28); and Merari numbers 6,200 (v. 34). The total of 22,000 is given in verse 39. These numbers have no purpose except to highlight the disparity in size between the Levites and the other tribes (1:20-43). If we remember that all Levites from one month old were counted, in contrast with the count of adult males only from the other tribes, the disparity is even more pronounced. The priests want the reader to be aware of the comparatively small number of Levites.

Next in each section, the Levitical clans are assigned to one of the compass points between the sanctuary and the tribes of Israel. They camp immediately around the Dwelling and thus function to protect and to atone in a mediatory capacity (see 8:19). The Gershonites are located on the west (v. 23); the Kohathites on the south (v. 29); and the Merarites on the north (v. 35b). The assignment to a specific compass point appears to be arbitrary. The favored eastern side, however, is reserved for Moses, Aaron, and the sons of Aaron (v. 38a). See the model on p. 150.

Each of the groups has specific duties in regard to the holy place. The sons of Aaron alone carry out the service at the sanctuary (v. 38b). The Levites attend to the appointments of the sanctuary. According to verses 25-26, the Gershonites tend to the tent itself, with all its curtains, hangings, coverings, and ropes. (Compare the description of the wilderness sanctuary in Exod 26; 27:9-16; 36:8-19, 35-38.) The Kohathites, according to verses 28b and 31, are charged with the care of the sacred contents of the wilderness sanctuary: the ark, table, lampstand, altars, utensils, and sanctuary veil. (These appointments are described in Exod 25; 27; 30:1-10; 37; 38.) According to verses 36-37, the Merarites attend to the frames, bases, poles, that is, those parts that secure the physical structure. (Read the elaborate descriptions of these physical features in Exod 26:15-37; 27:9-19; 36:20-34; 39:40.) Together with this division of assignments, we ought to recall the description of the Levitical duties given in 1:50-51, especially the Levites' role when the camp is broken and reestablished as the people move from place to place in the wilderness.

In each section there is also the name of a "prince" from each of the Levitical clans (vv. 24, 30 and 35a) to correspond to the listing of leaders from each of the Israelite tribes in 1:5b-15. Because these individuals are not mentioned again, their leadership function remains obscure. What is certain is the leadership of Eleazar, son of Aaron, who is identified as chief prince of the Levites (v. 32). It is to the priest Eleazar, the eventual successor to Aaron, that the Levites are accountable in the execution of their various duties (compare 3:6, 9a).

3:40-51 First-born of the Israelites. This section takes up again the matter introduced in 3:11-13—the Levites as substitutes for the first-born. Here the working out of the ransom is described in detail.

The presentation falls into the pattern of Yahweh's word (vv. 40 and 44), followed by the execution of that word (vv. 42 and 49-50).

Moses does exactly as the Lord directs him. He takes a census of the first-born males, those one month of age and over. These number 22,273 (v. 43). He then assigns the Levites as ransom for the first-born of Israel, and the cattle of the Levites as substitutes for the first-born cattle (vv. 41 and 45).

The number of the first-born males of Israel matches that of the Levites, with a difference of 273 (v. 46). The surplus can be ransomed by a sum of money given to the priests (v. 48). A price of five shekels, measured by the value of the temple shekel instead of the merchant shekel, provides a ransom for those remaining among the first-born (v. 49).

Such attention to detail points to the significance of the first-born, who were spared on that night when the first-born of Egypt died (see Exod 12:29). The first-born of every Israelite family in every succeeding generation remembers this event and therefore is himself spared. On account of this event, the first-born belongs to Yahweh (Exod 13:2, 12-25; 34:19-20).

The rationale for the Levites belonging to Yahweh is rooted in this tradition of the first-born belonging to Yahweh. By memory of this event, the people come to know Yahweh their God. The recognition formula "I am Yahweh" appears here: ". . . that the Levites may belong to me. I am the Lord" (v. 45b; see 13b). The connection between the delivery from Egyptian bondage and the dedication of the first-born provokes the realization that Israel is Yahweh's own, called into a unique relationship that endures forever. The dedication of the Levites witnesses to the nature of Israel's God as one who continues to act on Israel's behalf and who also demands dedication and service. (See p. 146 for a brief discussion of the recognition formula.)

4:1-33 Levitical duties defined. The word of the Lord is again addressed to Moses and Aaron, in that order (vv. 1, 17; see also 34 and 46). The command is to take a census of the subgroups of the Levites (vv. 2, 22, 29), those falling into the age bracket of thirty to fifty years old (vv. 3a, 23a, 30a).

The descriptions of the duties of each of the Levitical groups are set within the frame of the census command. Males of the designated age are assigned specific tasks in transporting the meeting tent. In each case the formulary "to undertake obligatory tasks" (vv. 3b, 23b, 30b) introduces the particular responsibilities. The verbs in this formulary emphasize service, in the sense of an army prepared to engage in battle together with the idea of service in worship. In their choice of words, the author underscores the seriousness of the Levitical duties. The specific tasks correspond to those assigned to the Levitical groups in 3:25-26, 31, 36-37. Here the emphasis is on the dismantling and transport of the tent and the sacred objects (compare 1:50-51).

The duties of the Kohathites are given first because theirs is the care of the most sacred objects (v. 4); presumably this gives them special status. Theirs is an unassuming task, however, for they may not touch the sacred objects nor even look upon them (vv. 15b, 18-20). Only after the priests have properly covered the objects (vv. 5-14), put the carrying poles in place (vv. 6b, 8b, 14b), or set the objects on litters (vv. 10b, 12b) are the Kohathites permitted to lift them (v. 15).

In this section, attention is diverted from the Kohathites to the priests, who alone may touch the sacred objects. First they cover the "ark of the commandments" with three layers: with the temple veil, skins, and an elaborate outer cloth (vv. 5-6). Only the ark, which contains the document of covenant with Yahweh, has a colored outer covering, making it stand out among the objects in transport. The other objects are each covered with a precious cloth and an outer skin covering (vv. 7-14). The Kohathites are not permitted, under pain of death, to touch anything but the handles of the carriers. It is the holiness and transcendence of God that are being emphasized in this reverential treatment of those objects that have a direct use in worship.

The priests and the Levites each have specific functions in regard to the sanctuary. The division of duties is uppermost in the mind of the author, who represents priestly families and who is writing this account at a time when the priests are dominant in the governance of the religious life of the people. The sons of Aaron alone have charge of the holy place, and Eleazar, in particular, has charge of the Dwelling (v. 16; compare 2:32 and 3:1-4).

The duties of the Gershonites and Merarites correspond to those assigned to them in 3:25-26 and 3:36-37, respectively. Here again the emphasis is on the transport of the holy place on the journey about to be undertaken. The Gershonites will carry all the cloths, coverings, skins, ropes, etc., that are part of the physical structure and its adornment (vv. 25-26). The Merarites will carry the boards, columns, pegs, etc., the wooden and metal parts that give the place shape or are used to secure it (vv. 31b-32a). As in the case of the Kohathites, these Levitical groups come under the direction of the priests (v. 27), and specifically under the supervision of Ithamar, the other son of Aaron (vv. 28 and 33; see 3:1-4).

The reader today cannot help but sense the reverence the Israelites had for the holy place and its appointments. Only the most precious cloths and the rarest of skins were suitable for covering the sacred objects (vv. 5-14). It is this regard for the place of worship and for the position of the priests in relation to the holy place that has influenced religious practice throughout history. Without minimizing the word of God, it is important to remember that this document comes from one period in history and reflects ancient practice. The truth contained here about the presence of God with the people for all time and in all places is sometimes lost in reading the detailed regulations. It is important for the reader to remember that the delimitation of duties and the distinction of roles point to the sacredness of the Presence among the people. This Dwelling of God in the midst of people cannot be limited to one mode, nor is it dependent on particular institutions. The whole point of this dramatic account is that God is present and continually reveals the God-self in ways that are meaningful in each new era of history.

4:34-49 Census completed. The results of the census commanded above (vv. 2-3, 22-23, 29-30) are summarized in this concluding section. Composed of repetitious formularies so characteristic of the Priestly writer, it states that Moses, together with Aaron, took the census of each of the Levitical groups (vv. 34, 38, 42), as the Lord had commanded (vv. 17, 41, 45). The males, registered by clans in their father's line, were those falling within the age limit for mandatory service—thirty to fifty years of age. (Contrast this census with that of all Levites in 3:15 and 40.) The total number of Levites designated for service in the transport of the meeting tent is correspondingly less than the total of all Levites who were registered (v. 48; compare 3:43).

Thus, the Levites, set apart for special service, are assigned tasks directly related to the sanctuary. As the people prepare to embark upon the journey through the wilderness toward the Promised Land, the Levites have the important duty of dismantling and carrying the physical structure of the Dwelling. All this elaborate preparation and designation of duties stresses the fact that the divine presence remains with the people and, indeed, accompanies them on their journey.

There is a pause in the preparations at this point as attention is focused on life within the camp. Because God dwells in the midst of the people, there is no place for anything unworthy of the all-holy God. At this juncture, therefore, the Israelites are given a series of laws pertaining to ritual and ethical purity (ch. 5) and laws concerning the nazirites, who dedicate themselves completely to the Lord (ch. 6).

5:1-4 Expulsion of the unclean. The laws given here are to ensure the cleanliness of the place where Yahweh dwells in the midst of the people (v. 3b; see Lev 15:31). These were laws that actually governed life in the land of Canaan, and they were especially important for the life of the postexilic worshiping community as mirrored in the organization and order of the wilderness camp. This place of the Lord's presence is a holy place. Everything unclean must be expelled; such things are incompatible with the holy place as long as they remain unclean (vv. 3-4).

According to customary law, the unclean were those with skin disease, those emitting a discharge from the genitals, and those who came into contact with a corpse (v. 2). These particular laws governed all the people but were especially rigid in regard to the priests (see Lev 22:4).

The skin disease, identified as leprosy, could be any variety of problems that are common in tropical climates. The distinctive factor is sores that are open and running. It is the discharge from the open sore that makes the diseased person ritually unclean. The laws that govern such disease are found in full in Lev 13–14. There we learn that several periods of seven days of quarantine, that is, exclusion from the camp, may be required before being declared clean (see Lev 13:4-6, 26-27, 31-34, 50-51; 14:8-9). Every disease, insofar as it is visible, is a contamination and therefore excludes the individual from the cultic community where Yahweh dwells (v. 3b).

The discharge refers to fluids from the sexual organs of both males (see Lev 15:1-17; Deut 23:10-15) and females (see Lev 15:19-30), whether such discharge is normal or linked with affliction. There is no provision for exclusion from the community in the Levitical laws; only in Numbers is such exclusion indicated. Exclusion from the community does not imply a negative attitude toward sex. It is rather the idea that all bodily discharges are defiling. They are incompatible with physical perfection and therefore unworthy of the holiness of God who dwells among the people (v. 3b). The prescribed purificatory rites for males and females were exactly the same, as was the required offering (see Lev 15:5-10, 19-24; 15:13-15, 25-30). Especially in this matter do the priests demonstrate a consciousness of the equality of the male and female person (v. 3a; see Lev 15:32-33).

The connection between death and evil was a strong one in antiquity, as it often still is today. It was believed that evil issued from a corpse, making anyone who came into contact with it unclean and therefore unworthy of the presence of God (v. 3b). According to the law, a person who touched a dead body was banned for the stipulated period of seven days (see Num 19:11).

5:5-10 Restitution for wrongdoing. This sets up a situation of wrongdoing in very broad terms. It specifies both the man and woman as possible offenders (v. 6a) and describes the offense as any transgression of human beings, that is, wrongs done to one another (v. 6b). This is a restatement of the law of restitution given in Lev 5:20-26.

In biblical teaching there is a direct connection between evils done within the human community and relationship with God (v. 6c). Love for God and love for neighbor are inextricably bound together. We have only to read the Decalogue (Exod 20:1-17 and Deut 5:6-21), the rules given for conduct within the community (Lev 19:1-37), prophetic speeches (Hos 4:1-3; Amos 5:21-24; Isa 1:12-16), or the New Testament (1 John 4:20-21; Matt 5:23-24; 23:34-40; 25:31-46) to be made aware that regard for the community's well-being is a direct expression of reverence for God.

According to the law, an individual who transgresses against another shall not only confess the wrong and compensate for the wrong done or the character defamed, but shall also make restitution in the value of one-fifth over and above the due amount (v. 7). Compensation plus one-fifth of that value is the standard restitution demanded in all cases (see Lev 5:16, 24; 22:14; 27:13, 27, 31). So sacred is the person in the community that any harm to an individual causes harm to the whole body. And so sacred is the community that any violation of its well-being demands restitution. God's presence within this community requires that nothing violate or disrupt the integrity of the common good, and when such occurs, restoration as well as restitution is required.

If this restitution cannot be paid to the one offended, it is to be paid to the next of kin (v. 8a). If there is no next of kin, the restitution belongs to the priests, who accept it as given to the Lord (v. 8b). This restitution is over and above the offering of a ram that is required as an expiation offering in atonement for sin (v. 8c; see Lev 5:14-26).

The place given to the next of kin tells us something about the solidarity of the community of God's people. The next of kin is the nearest male blood relative on the father's side of the family. Being the next of kin carries grave responsibilities to ensure the life of the immediate and extended family. If a woman becomes a widow and is childless, the next of kin has to marry her in order that the family line might flourish (Ruth 4). If there is threat of losing property that belongs to the family, the next of kin is required to buy it so that it remains in the family (Lev 25:25). If a family member becomes enslaved, the next of kin is responsible for securing that person's freedom (Lev 25:47-52). Just as the next of kin provides when life or property is threatened, so the next of kin becomes the recipient of goods when restitution cannot be made to a wronged party. That which was taken from a particular family is thus restored and compensated, and thereby the community is made whole within itself and with God.

Appended to this law governing restitution is a general statement about the "sacred contributions" or holy gifts that belong to the priests (vv. 9-10). This sacred contribution can be a reserved portion of the offering that the priest moves up and down in ritual action, or it can be the whole offering that an Israelite presents to Yahweh by lifting it up. In either case, the sacred contribution is that which is lifted up, and it belongs to the individual officiating priest.

5:11-31 Ritual for judgment. Another circumstance inappropriate to the place of God's presence is mistrust between husband and wife, described as jealousy (vv. 14, 30a). The case presents a husband who suspects that his wife has committed adultery (vv. 12-13, 29) and might therefore bear him a child that is not his own, but who has no concrete evidence and so cannot institute normal legal proceedings through the courts. The husband may resort to a trial by ordeal when there are no witnesses or other proof.

This is the only instance in the biblical literature where a ritual of ordeal is described in detail. The ordeal seems to have been used when the question of guilt or innocence could not be ascertained by the normal methods of making judgment. The accused person submits to some practice, such as drinking a potion or walking on fire. If he or she is unhurt, innocence is proven. Adultery was the offense for which the ordeal was most often invoked, as is suggested by the detailed description in this text. Deut 17:8-13, however, states that cases involving homicide, disputes over ownership rights, and personal assault may be settled by ordeal.

The case presented here is decidedly one-sided in that the man may accuse the woman, who then must bear the burden of the charge, while the man remains without guilt even when the accusation is groundless (v. 31). To be decided is the serious matter of paternity. The rite is designed to determine the legitimacy of the man's children.

The husband brings his wife before the priest with an offering of barley that has neither oil nor frankincense over it because "it is a cereal offering of jealousy" (v. 15). The dry grain signifies that the offering is an atonement for sin (see Lev 5:11-13). Oil and frankincense on the coarse grain would produce a sweet-smelling oblation, suggesting joy and bounty (Lev 2:1-2; 6:8).

The ritual for judgment follows. Essentially the woman stands before the Lord (vv. 16, 30b), a posture that brings God into the process of legal investigation. Her head is uncovered, a sign of disgrace and uncleanness, and she holds the cereal offering in her hands (v. 18). The priest meanwhile prepares the water by placing dust from the floor of the Dwelling into it (v. 17). This water is called "holy" because it is kept in the sanctuary. The addition of the dust increases the sacredness of the drink and its danger to the woman who will drink it. It is the drinking of this water, called "bitter," that decides innocence or guilt (v. 18c). Notice that reference is made to this water throughout verses 19, 22, 24, and 27.

The priest then puts the woman under oath to speak the truth (vv. 19a, 21a). The words pronounced by the priest cause the bitter water to be effective in confirming innocence (v. 19b) or guilt (vv. 20-22). The woman responds with "Amen, Amen," thereby agreeing with the effectiveness of the ordeal procedure. The curse itself is a euphemism for miscarriage or possibly sterility. "Thigh" is often used to mean the sexual organs. It is characteristic in accounts of judgment that the punishment is a reversal of the sin. If the woman has sinned by illicit intercourse, her punishment is the termination of the pregnancy (v. 27) or the inability to bear children. The opposite situation, described in verse 28, would be the ability to bear children.

Before the woman drinks, the words of the curse are written on, then washed off, the parchment into the water (v. 23) so that the words of the curse will be effective in themselves (v. 24). Last of all, the priest burns a handful of the cereal offering on the altar; the remainder of the cereal belongs to the priest (see Lev 2:2-3). Once the woman drinks the water, there are two possible outcomes (vv. 27-28): she is either proclaimed guilty and therefore unclean, or innocent and therefore clean.

6:1-21 Dedication of nazirites. In the context of preparation for the journey toward the land, where there will be the ideal community that has God dwelling among the people, we have noted the emphasis on the holiness and purity required of the believing community. The Priestly writer includes at this point a text about the consecration of individuals, both male and female (v. 2), underlining the sacredness and nobility of total dedication to the Lord. Such an individual is called a "nazirite," a term derived from the verb meaning "to set apart" or "to consecrate." A nazirite makes a vow of dedication to the Lord (v. 21) for a set period of time (vv. 4, 5, 6, 8, 12, 13).

The tradition of the nazirite was of long standing among the people of God. Samson (Judg 13:5) and Samuel (1 Sam 1:11) are thought to have been consecrated for life. The practice continued into the time of John the Baptist (Luke 1:15) and Paul the Apostle (Acts 18:18; 21:23-26).

Our text consists of three independent sections within the framework of verses 1-2 and 21. Verses 3-8 describe the conditions and laws that govern an individual who chooses to make a vow for a set period of time. Verses 9-12 outline the required purification if a person inadvertently becomes unclean. Verses 13-21 introduce the ceremonies to be observed when the period of the vow is fulfilled.

The nazirite assumes three restrictions when taking the vow of dedication. The obligations cover the matter of drinking and eating (vv. 3-4), the cutting of the hair (v. 5), and contact with the dead (vv. 6-7).

The nazirite is forbidden to consume the grape in any form—no drinking of wine, vinegar, or even grape juice (v. 3a), nor eating of grapes, raisins, the seeds or skins of the grape, or any part of the vine (vv. 3b-4). The abstention is from the grape, not from alcoholic drink as such. The grapevine represents urban culture, settled life, comfort, and high living—pleasures in opposition to faithful allegiance to Yahweh (see Amos 4:1b; 6:6).

Second, the nazirite does not put the razor to the hair of the head (v. 6). The growth of hair is a visible sign of consecration. Symbolic of integrity and dignity, the long hair dramatically distinguishes the individual as one who serves God in a special way (v. 7b).

Third, the nazirite never approaches the dead, not even the corpses of family members (vv. 6-7a). (On the uncleanness associated with contact with the dead, see the commentary on 5:1-3 and 9:11-22.) This law is stricter than in the case of the ordinary priest, who is exempted in the case of family (Lev 21:1-3); it is, however, comparable to the restrictions imposed on the high priest (Lev 21:11).

These practices set the nazirite apart as a continual reminder to the community of what total dedication of Yahweh should be. Apparently, in Amos' day the witness of the nazirites was so disturbing that the people tried to get them to break the vow (Amos 2:11-12).

The second section of the text addresses a situation in which the nazirite might accidentally become unclean by contact with a corpse (vv. 9-12). The hair, the sign of consecration, has thereby become polluted and must be shaved off (v. 9), and the period of dedication, now invalid, must be begun anew (v. 12). The period of purification, according to law, lasts seven days (v. 9b; see Num 19:11, 14, 16). Afterward the nazirite brings the simple offering of two birds, the offering required of the poor (v. 10; see Lev 5:7; 12:8; 14:22; 15:13-15). The priest offers one bird as a sin offering to restore the relationship with a holy God that has been interrupted by contact with that which makes one unclean; the other is offered as a holocaust, the sacrifice required of everyone coming before the Lord, and therefore must be completely consumed (v. 11). After the atonement has been made, the head of the nazirite is once again consecrated (v. 11b), and a guilt offering of a year-old lamb is made. This last is a kind of punitive fine paid to God for the loss of what is due. With the nullification of the vow, something that had properly belonged to Yahweh on the basis of the vow was lost. (See Deut 23:22-24 for the laws governing anyone who chooses to make a vow, and note the restrictions imposed on women in Num 30:4-16.)

The third section prescribes the ritual to be observed at the completion of the period of consecration (vv. 13-20). The instructions are addressed to the priest who will carry out the particulars of the ceremony. The individual comes forward to the meeting tent with specified offerings (vv. 13-15). After the priest has offered the sacrifice, the nazirite's head is shaved and the hair burned in the fire of the peace offering (vv. 16-18). The priest takes his share of the sacrificial gifts (vv. 19-20), and only then is the nazirite permitted to drink wine (v. 20c).

The full range of sacrifices indicates the solemnity of the occasion (vv. 14-15). The holocaust is offered by everyone who approaches the Lord; the sin offering is given in atonement for all violations committed, however unintentional. The peace offering is presented in thanksgiving together with cereal and drink offerings. This last suggests a banquet and signifies communion between God and the participant (vv. 16-17). The hair that has been cut is burned in the fire of the peace offering, signifying the destruction of that which had been consecrated to the Lord once it has served its purpose (vv. 18-19a).

In carrying out the sacrifice, the priest puts a share of the sacrifice into the hands of the one consecrated so that the portion may be formally presented to the priest (v. 19b) in a gesture of waving (v. 20a). This motion seems to represent the act of giving back to God from the bounty God has given. This share is part of the special gift presented to the priest. The usual gift due to the priest from every offering is the breast and the leg (v. 20b; see Lev 7:34 and Num 18:8-11). The nazirite is required to make the offerings prescribed, but other offerings may also be presented in accord with the individual's means (v. 21a).

With the completion of this ritual, the nazirite has fulfilled the period of vow and wine may be taken (v. 20c). The individual then resumes an ordinary life.

6:22-27 The priestly blessing. As a kind of interlude, unconnected with what precedes or follows, the Priestly author inserts a benediction formulary that is one of the oldest pieces of poetry in the Scriptures. Perhaps the blessing is placed here to show God's blessing on the people who live the holy life in accord with the regulations set forth in chapters 5-6.

The prayer itself (vv. 24-26) is positioned within a framework that begins with the typical "The Lord said to Moses." That the priests bless the people is seen as the Lord's will communicated through Moses (see Deut 10:8; 21:5). The specific reference to the Aaronic priesthood (v. 23a) reflects the postexilic time, when the principal duty of the priests in the sanctuary was to mediate the blessing, the wellspring of life that derives from Yahweh, the source of all life (see Pss 115:12-15; 118:26; 129:8; 134:3). At the installation of the priest, his first act was to raise his hand in blessing (Lev 9:1-24, esp. vv. 22-24). This strength for life that is mediated through the priests keeps alive the promise that through this people God's blessings flow to the world.

In the blessing, the name Yahweh is repeated three times and is the implied subject three more times. Pronouncing this name is itself an effectual blessing. Thus, the conclusion states that the priests "invoke my name upon the Israelites" (v. 27a). The Hebrew rendering is an unusual expression that literally states that they "put the name on" the people, rather than the expected "call on the name." This specific idiom would seem to imply a close relationship, an indication of God's ownership and protection. The Israelites are proclaimed to be Yahweh's property through the putting of Yahweh's name on them by the priests. The concluding statement "and I will bless them" (v. 27b) means, then, that when the priests put the divine name on the Israelites, Yahweh will indeed bless them.

The blessing itself is one of the finest pieces of ancient poetry. It is written in three lines, each with two parts, and in a complex metrical pattern that increases progressively in the number of words (three in the first line, five in the second line, and seven in the third line) and in metrical counts (ten, twelve, and fourteen, respectively). The blessing is addressed to "you" in the singular, meaning the whole of Israel as a corporate entity as well as each individual. This "you" is expressed three times as a direct object (vv. 24ab, 25b) and three times as the object of a preposition (vv. 25a, 26ab).

The first half of each line invokes Yahweh's personal act upon the people: "bless" (v. 24a), "let [your] face shine upon" (v. 25a), and "look kindly upon" (v. 26a).

To "bless" means to pour forth the continual and sustaining power of life that manifests itself as growth, increase, success, fertility, and prosperity (see Gen 24:34-36). Blessing derives from the essential divine being out of which arise the promises: "I will bless you; I will make your name great" (Gen 12:2); "I will be with you and bless you" (Gen 26:3).

To "let [Yahweh's] face shine upon" means to look with pleasure or favor. Clearly an anthropomorphism used metaphorically, reference to "face" implies the totality of divine goodness directed to the recipient of the blessing (see Ps 67:2). When Yahweh is gracious toward the people, they see Yahweh's face (Pss 31:17; 80:4, 8, 20). On the other hand, to express displeasure with the people, Yahweh declares, "I hide my face" (Ezek 39:23; see Isa 57:17).

To "look kindly upon" suggests the bestowal of divine love in gestures of favor and help. Yahweh's attention is directed toward the one who is dependent and in need of help (see Pss 33:18; 34:16; 1 Kgs 8:29, 52).

Each of these acts of Yahweh is followed by a consequence of the blessing invoked. Yahweh will "keep" (v. 24b), "be gracious" (v. 25b), and "give peace" (v. 26b).

To "keep" means that in consequence of the blessing, Yahweh will protect Israel from the misfortunes that bring about the opposite of life and prosperity, such as childlessness, crop failure, threat from enemies. To "be gracious" means to show undeserved favor. As a consequence of Yahweh's face shining upon Israel, this people experiences the goodness that derives from the divine nature (see Exod 33:19; 34:6; Num 14:18; Deut 5:9-10). Finally, Yahweh "gives peace" as the consequence of looking kindly. The concept of peace is the summation of the act of blessing: "May the Lord bless his people with peace" (Ps 29:11). It is a term that means much more than freedom from war or discord. Peace is the state of being whole, of completeness, of happiness and harmony, so that a person is capable of a full and free development of life. Peace means the salvation that belongs to those whose lives are totally in harmony with God's will (see Ps 34:15; Isa 32:17). The purpose of Jesus' life was to bring peace (John 14:27; 16:33; 20:19, 21, 26).

7:1-88 Offerings of the princes. Chapter 7 returns to the preparations for the departure from Sinai after the interlude of the regulations governing life in the camp and in the community. There has been no passage of time from the date of the census (1:1, 18), which occurred exactly one month after the completion, erection, and consecration of the Dwelling (v. 1; Exod 40:2, 17; see the commentary on 1:1-3). The elaborate description of gifts creates a scene of dedication to the Lord as the tension heightens in the last preparations for the march (chs. 7–9).

The chapter is divided into two unequal sections. In the first, verses 1-9, the princes give wagons with oxen. In the second, verses 10-88, there is an elaborate listing of the gifts presented by each of the leaders.

The princes, the heads of the ancestral houses, are the same leaders of the people who assisted Moses with the census (v. 2; see the commentary on 1:4-19a). These men contribute six wagons and twelve oxen for use in the transport of the sanctuary (v. 3). The vehicles and animals will carry the sacred objects on the long journey through the wilderness.

In the stylistic pattern of Yahweh's word spoken and obeyed (vv. 4, 6), Moses is told to accept the offering and to assign the wagons to the Levites for use in carrying out their duties (v. 5). Moses gives two wagons with four oxen to the Gershonites (v. 7), whose responsibility is the tent itself and all the cloth hangings (3:25-26; 4:24-26); and four wagons with eight oxen to the Merarites (v. 8), who attend to the physical structure of the sanctuary (3:36-37; 4:31-32). Only the Kohathites, who take care of the most sacred objects, including the ark (3:28b, 31; 4:4-15), have to carry the carefully covered parcels on their shoulders (v. 9).

The remainder of the text (vv. 10-88) consists of Yahweh's command that the offerings brought by the princes for the dedication be presented on successive days (vv. 10-11); it gives a repetitive and detailed description of the gifts offered by each leader (vv. 12-83) and a final summary, with an accounting of the total number of gifts (vv. 84-88).

While the leaders are the same as those named as Moses' assistants in 1:5-15, their sequence corresponds to that of the tribes in the camp in 2:1-34 and again in the order of the march in 10:14-28 (see the commentary on 2:1-34). The privileged position of the Judah group reflects the importance of that tribe in the reestablishment of the religious center for the people who return from exile.

The gifts presented by each prince are identical in order and quantity. They are recounted in precise formulation, except for slight grammatical variation in verse 19. The only changes are in the names of the leaders and tribes. The princes bring gifts for all regular offerings—for the holocaust, the sin offering, and the peace offering. They also present silver plates and silver basins full of flour mixed with oil for the cereal offering, and a gold dish with incense. This exhaustively repetitive and detailed description of the offerings emphasizes the generosity of the leaders and has as its intention example and exhortation regarding provisions for the place of worship and its cultic celebrations. The text intentionally does not specify the offerings. The focus is not distracted from the liberality in giving.

The text concludes with a kind of accountant's report of the number of gifts presented on the occasion of the dedication of the altar (v. 84a). There is a precise listing of the numerous gifts (v. 84b), weights of the precious metals (vv. 85-86), and the number of each kind of animal offered (vv. 87-88) to reveal the extent of the princes' generosity in offering such gifts for the worship of God.

This display of gifts is a suitable conclusion to the preparation of the sanctuary and the worship therein. The Priestly writer's intention in re-creating this ideal scene in the wilderness is that it will be emulated in the postexilic community, where the people of Israel appropriately gather about the Presence among them, where everything unclean is purified, where total consecration is encouraged, and where the people tend to regular worship and contribute generously to the support of worship and the priests.

7:89 The voice. Appended to the description of the people of God gathered about the Dwelling in readiness for worship is a short piece that seems incomplete in itself but in reality concludes more than the particular chapter to which it is attached. The verse tells of Moses entering the meeting tent to communicate with the Lord (see Exod 33:7-11). Though Moses hears "the voice," the message is lost to the reader. It is probable that the text is intended to convey the idea that the divine presence does indeed dwell in the holy place, and from there will speak to the people through Moses. The hearing of Yahweh's voice is the purpose of the entire preparation of the Dwelling.

At Sinai, where instructions for the construction of the Dwelling were communicated to Moses, the Lord promised that when the holy place was complete, "I will meet you . . . and from above the propitiatory, between the two cherubim on the ark of the commandments, I will tell you all the commands that I wish you to give the Israelites" (Exod 25:22). Our text is the direct fulfillment of Yahweh's promise.

The "propitiatory," sometimes called the "mercy seat," is a slab of gold set on top of the ark, where the covenant document is kept (see Exod 26:34). At either end of the propitiatory are facing cherubim, with wings extended in a kind of canopy over the ark. This is the highest place of atonement, where, on the Day of Atonement, the priest burns incense and sprinkles the blood of the sacrifice to cleanse the people from all their sins (Exod 25:17-22; 37:6-9). At this place the people turn again to the covenant and the hearing of the voice that bonds them with Yahweh.

8:1-4 The lampstand. Activities continue in readying the camp as the place where Yahweh is present and worshiped. In accord with the Lord's word (vv. 1, 3), Aaron sets up the seven lamps. This event culminates what had been commanded at Sinai. Instructions for the material and design of the lampstand were presented in Exod 25:31-40. Verse 4 corresponds exactly with that description. A detailed account of the making of the lampstand is given in Exod 37:17-24. Finally, the lampstand is set up against the south curtain of the meeting tent, opposite the table at the north end (Exod 40:22-25).

Emphasis in our text is upon the direction of the light "toward the front of the lampstand" (vv. 2-3; see Exod 25:37). This positioning of the wicks in the lamps of oil is necessary to focus the light in one direction. As the only source of light in the meeting tent, the wicks are set to cast light upon the table on which the bread of the Presence is placed (Exod 40:23).

8:5-26 Purification of the Levites. Continuing emphasis on complete dedication to Yahweh focuses our attention on the ritual for the consecration of the Levites. The text first outlines the rites as well as the purposes for the Levites' dedication in the pattern of God's word given (vv. 5-19) and obeyed (vv. 20-22), then designates the limiting age for Levitical service (vv. 23-26).

Earlier, in chapters 3 and 4, we learned about the census and duties of the Levites. Here the emphasis is on the Levites as a special offering to Yahweh. They "belong to Yahweh" (vv. 14, 16, 18); they are "taken from among the Israelites" (vv. 6, 14, 16, 18) and "dedicated" (vv. 16, 19) for service as a special contribution (vv. 11, 13, 15, 21; see the discussion below on the wave offering).

When the Levite reaches the age of service, he submits to a rite of purification (v. 7). He is first sprinkled with the "water of remission," that is, water that effects the forgiveness of sins. He then shaves the hair from his entire body, thereby removing all imperfection and rendering future growth pure and clean. Last of all, he washes his clothes to make them clean, just as the Israelites did at Sinai to ready themselves for the divine presence (Exod 19:10, 14).

These Levites are clearly distinguished from the priest who is consecrated with oil (Exod 29:7; Lev 8:12) and adorned with completely new garments (Exod 28:40-43; 29:8-9; Lev 8:13). The Levites are men taken from among the people to represent the people. To dramatize this representation, the Levites come before the assembled community. The people "lay their hands" upon them (vv. 9-10). The dedication of the Levites substitutes for the consecration of the first-born of every Israelite family (vv. 16-18; see 3:11-13, 40-51). The Levites thus serve in the place and in the name of the community. Their service in the care of the sanctuary is a kind of protection so that no harm will come to anyone who might approach the sanctuary unworthily (v. 19).

For the sacrifice, the Levites bring offerings for a holocaust and a sin offering (vv. 8, 12). Each Levite lays his hands on the head of the animals to demonstrate his giving of himself totally to God. The one bull and the cereal, like a banquet meal, symbolize union between Yahweh and the Levite, and are therefore wholly consumed. The other bull is offered to atone for sin.

The priest participates by offering the Levite as a "wave offering" (vv. 11, 13; also vv. 15, 21). The ritual for other occasions would be for the priest to put a share of the sacrifice into the hands of the offerer, who would return it to the priest. The priest would receive this share as the portion for his own use. The motion of this giving back and forth and to Yahweh resembles a waving. On this day of dedication the priest receives the Levite himself, who is given as the share from all Israel for the use and service of the priest (vv. 13-14; see 3:5-10). The Levite enters the service of the sanctuary as a subordinate to the Aaronite priests (v. 19). He belongs to Yahweh and takes care of the place where Yahweh dwells among the people.

The Levites engage in this special service of the sanctuary only during their prime years. The age limits given are between twenty-five and fifty years old (vv. 24-25). Apparently the time for initiation into service varies according to need and numbers of men available. In chapter 4, the age given for beginning service is thirty years old (vv. 35, 39, 43, 47); in other texts, twenty is given as the entry age (1 Chr 23:24; 2 Chr 31:17; Ezra 3:8). There are no variations for the age of retirement from service. Once the Levite has reached the age of fifty, he may assist the younger Levites in their work, but he may no longer be responsible for particular duties (v. 26).

9:1-14 The second Passover. A sense of excitement is created with a series of final preparations for departure from the wilderness of Sinai. It is the prescribed time for the celebration of Passover (vv. 1-5), which was first celebrated on the eve of deliverance from bondage in Egypt (see Exod 12–13). The legislation for keeping the feast is enjoined by Moses in the style of Yahweh's command (vv. 1-3), followed by obedient execution of the command (vv. 4-5). Moses commands the people to celebrate the feast when the same calendar date and time come around again, that is, at the beginning of the year in the month of Abib in the evening of the fourteenth day (vv. 2-3, 5; see Exod 12:2, 6, 18; 13:4; Lev 23:5).

The remainder of the text presents real-life situations that interfere with the observance of Passover. We find here an example of new instructions that become the precedent for subsequent practice. The people consult Moses regarding these problems, and Moses seeks direction from Yahweh to answer them (v. 8; see 15:34; 27:5; Lev 24:10-23 for other examples of seeking a decision from Yahweh).

The first situation is one of uncleanness. What should a person do who has become ritually unclean from contact with a corpse (v. 6; see 19:11-22) but who desires to participate in the feast (v. 7)? The instruction given in response includes another situation—that of a person who "is absent on a journey" (v. 10). While the case of uncleanness reflects the wilderness situation, this latter case suggests a later time when people traveled abroad and the practice of observing the feast in the central sanctuary prevailed (see Deut 16:2; Ezra 6:16-22).

The answer to these situations is the stipulation that a secondary feast might be celebrated one month later at the same time and in accord with all the laws for the feast (vv. 11-12; see Exod 12:8-10). According to this provision, one who is unclean might be purified, and one who is absent on a journey might be able to observe the feast on this later date. That this supplementary legislation was actually observed is evident in the case of Hezekiah. The Chronicler (2 Chr 30:1-5) records the occasion when Hezekiah invited the people from the northern tribes to Jerusalem for the feast. To accommodate the situation, the Passover feast was observed during the second month that year.

This provision must not be misconstrued, however, to exempt people from observance of the feast on the specified day for just any reason. From the tone of verse 13, only accidental circumstances or situations beyond one's control are legitimate exemptions. Those who excuse themselves from this community observance for reasons of neglect bring exclusion from the community upon themselves. The text says that they "shall be cut off from [their] people" (v. 13).

The second situation pertains to aliens or foreigners who wish to keep the feast. This is an issue that must have arisen time and again in the course of Israelite history. The problem is also addressed in Exod 12:43-49 in the regulations for the Passover feast. What we find in Numbers corresponds exactly. The stranger who has accepted circumcision, the one who "lives among you" (v. 14), meaning one who has accepted the God of the Israelites, may participate in the feast. There are no exceptions to the rules and regulations for these individuals, however. They will observe the feast in exactly the same manner as the natives.

9:15-23 The cloud and the Presence. The time has come for departure from the wilderness site. The great event at Sinai reaches its conclusion at this point. The Dwelling is now complete; it is filled with the "Glory of the Lord" and the "cloud settles down upon it" (Exod 40:34-35).

This cloud is the visible sign of the divine presence in the Dwelling. Where the cloud is visible, Yahweh is present. It manifests Yahweh "in the midst of this people" (Num 14:14). The cloud guided the people as they fled from Egypt (Exod 13:21-22), and it hid them from the approaching Egyptians (Exod 14:19, 24). When the cloud is visible over the meeting tent, Moses enters the tent to speak with the Lord (Exod 33:9-10; Num 12:5). This same cloud will determine Israel's movements on the long journey through the wilderness (Exod 40:36-38; Num 10:12). It hovers over the Dwelling by day, and at night it takes on the appearance of fire (vv. 15-16).

With the focus on Yahweh's presence in the midst of the people under the symbol of the cloud, the author stresses two points that are important for the generations of believers who will read or hear the story over and over again. The first is that the cloud determines the length of Israel's stay in a given place (vv. 19-22). Sometimes the stay is long; at times it is for a few days; sometimes it is only from evening to morning. The time of departure and the time for setting up camp are in no way self-determined. As the people embark on their journey, every phase of movement will be in response to the cloud.

Second, the point being made emphatically is that Yahweh speaks through the cloud. Two phrases emphasize that the Israelites obediently heed Yahweh's direction in the breaking and setting up of the camp. They move "at the bidding of the Lord" (vv. 18, 20, 23), an expression used seven times over; they "obey the Lord" (v. 19), and they "heed the charge of the Lord" (v. 23). Israel conforms totally to the will of God every step of the way on the long trek toward the land. The picture is of an ideal time when the people listen to the voice of God and comply willingly with God's instructions and commands.

10:1-10 Two silver trumpets. Our attention turns from the cloud as the Lord's guiding presence to the silver trumpets, the instruments used to assemble and move the community (v. 2). Known from the period of the postexilic community, the association of the trumpets with the wilderness generation reinforces the realization that the Priestly author intends to merge the ideal wilderness community gathered about the holy place with the worshiping community of the later period, when the people are being instructed in the ideals for living properly in the presence of a holy God.

These trumpets are blown in a sustained blast to give the signal for assembly. The specific verb "blown" is used in verses 3-4 and again in verses 7a, 8, 10 to indicate the type of signal. When both are blown, the entire community is being called to assembly (v. 3); when one trumpet is blown, only the leaders are being called (v. 4).

The signal for setting out, whether on a journey or into war, is a series of short, staccato-like notes. The silver trumpets are mentioned here because the people are ready to set out on the journey. The preparations that have been undertaken as described in the preceding chapters are now complete, and the people are ready to move forward under the guiding protection of Yahweh. When the first alarm is given, the Judah group on the east side of the camp marches out (v. 5); at the second alarm, the Reuben group, positioned south of the sanctuary, follows; then the Ephraim group from the west side of the camp; and finally the Dan group from the north side (v. 6; see ch. 2 for the arrangement of the tribes around the Dwelling). The tribes are readied to move out in an orderly manner and in the order of precedence.

The remainder of the text regulates the use of the trumpets once the people have come into "their own land" (v. 9a). It is the task of the priests to blow the trumpets (v. 8). This practice is frequently mentioned in the literature of the postexilic period (see 1 Chr 15:24; 16:6; 42; 2 Chr 7:6; Neh 12:35; 41). The trumpets are used to signal entry into battle (v. 9; see 2 Chr 13:12). They are blown most often to announce the observance of the various feasts, to summon the community to worship, and to express thanksgiving on joyous occasions (v. 10; see 2 Chr 5:12-13; 29:26-28; Ezra 3:10-11).

The text tells us that the reason the trumpet is blown is to cause God to "remember . . . and save" (v. 9b; see also v. 10b). The blowing of the trumpet is an act of prayer and dependence, a calling upon God to be present especially in situations of need and celebration.

This passage, and indeed the entire section in chapters 1–10, ends with the recognition formula, "I, the Lord, am your God" (v. 10c; see p. 146 for an explanation). It was Yahweh who invited Israel into the unique relationship that resulted in so many blessings. It is Yahweh who acts at this moment to be with the people, to lead them, protect them, and bring them safely to their own land.

ON THE JOURNEY FROM SINAI TO MOAB

Num 10:11–22:1

Up to this point the people have been encamped in the wilderness of Sinai. They now embark on a journey that will include a number of stops in the course of many years and will end on the plains of Moab, located across the Jordan River opposite the land of promise. This section begins with the departure from Sinai (10:12) and ends with the arrival at Moab (22:1). Throughout we will notice the journey formula and mention of various locations that make the reader aware of movement from site to site (10:12, 33; 11:35; 12:16; 20:1a, 22; 21:4, 10-20; 22:1). The Priestly writer uses a structure based on the tradition of the wilderness journey to support the record of events that happen along the way.

Many stories about the threat of danger, lack of food and water, tribal factions, and jealousies were passed down within the families who made the journey. These stories became the source from which our author gathered material to tell about the trials of the journey. The stories are found in chapters 11–14, 16–17, 20–21. Their narration is lively and very unlike the stylized language of the earlier chapters. These stories give the reader a glimpse of the very real struggles of people whom God had favored. They teach important lessons about the consequences for individuals and groups who turn from following God and the designated leaders. Directed at the community that is in passage from the wilderness of the Exile to their own land and in the process of resettlement and reorganization as a faith community, the stories provide lessons from history for future life.

Scattered throughout the narration of these chapters we find treasures of ancient poetry at 10:35-36; 12:6-8; 21:14-15, 17-18; 21:27b-30. These pieces survived from the time of the events they celebrate and allow the reader to hear what Israel itself sang, recited, and remembered.

As a kind of interruption to the dramatic action of these chapters, the author inserts some regulations in chapters 15, 18, 19. There is no apparent connection between the content of the narratives and these cultic regulations. They are directed to future generations, providing them with guidelines for living in a holy manner in the presence of a holy God.

Events in the Desert of Paran

(10:11–19:22)

10:11-28a Departure from Sinai. The departure from the wilderness is once again associated by date with the Exodus experience. After nearly a year's delay at Sinai—from the first day of the third month (Exod 19:1) to the twentieth day of the second month a year later (v. 11a)—and after final preparations that are telescoped to just nineteen days (compare Num 1:1), the signal is given for the beginning of the march.

The cloud covering the Dwelling rises from its place to signal movement from the camp (v. 11b; see the discussion on the cloud at 9:15-23). The cloud will guide the Israelites on the move until it settles in the desert of Paran, the first camping site on the continuing journey (v. 12). While the location is not certain, it is probable that this first stop was at Wadi Feiran, an oasis in the northern Sinai Peninsula south of the Negeb (see 13:17). The name Paran suggests that the author has the well-known Feiran oasis in mind.

The order of the march in verses 13-28 corresponds to the designated arrangement in the camp and the instructions for departure in 2:1-31, once again including mention of the leaders of the individual tribes. The Judah group from the east side of the Dwelling holds first place and leads the march (vv. 14-16). After them, the Levites, who transport the paraphernalia of the Dwelling, set out (v. 17; 2:17; see the duties of the Gershonites and Merarites in 4:21-33). Next come the three tribes headed by Reuben (vv. 18-20), followed by the sacred objects of the Dwelling carried by the Kohathites (v. 21; see 4:4-20). The sacred items are separated from the structure and coverings so that the tent might be readied at the new site in preparation for housing the ark, altar, table, and lampstand at the new campsite (v. 21b). The Ephraimite group follows the sacred objects (vv. 22-24), acting, no doubt, as a rear guard. Finally, as "rear guard for all the camps," the Dan group follows last of all (vv. 25-27).

10:28b-32 Moses' brother-in-law as guide. The very practical need for human wisdom on the journey through the wilderness balances the story that has focused exclusively on divine guidance. Moses asks his brother-in-law Hobab, a Midianite (v. 29a), to serve as "eyes" for the people, because he "knows where [they] can camp in the desert" (v. 31). The Midianites are nomads who live in the wilderness and know its routes and camping places. Hobab is from the clan of Zipporah, Moses' wife, who was, according to one tradition, the daughter of Reuel (see Exod 2:15-22). Elsewhere Jethro is the name of Moses' father-in-law (see Exod 3:1; 4:18; 18). The traditions agree that the father-in-law was a priest of Midian (Exod 2:16; 18:1).

In his bidding, Moses promises Hobab a share in the prosperity that the Lord has promised in the land (vv. 29b, 32). The implication is that those who associate themselves with the people of Yahweh share in the benefits that come as a result of Yahweh's covenant promise.

Hobab at first declines the invitation because he prefers to return to his own people (v. 30). This passage does not report Hobab's final answer. We presume his positive response, since Moses' relatives are mentioned among those who enter the land (see Judg 1:16; 4:11; 1 Sam 15:6. The Kenites named in these texts are part of the Midianite group).

10:33-36 The ark leads into the desert. Attention once again turns to the Lord's continual presence with the people. In the camp the cloud rested upon the sanctuary (v. 11), and on the march the cloud moves with the "ark of the covenant of the Lord" (v. 33) to lead the people forward. The ark, which traditionally was the portable seat of Yahweh's invisible presence, is specifically mentioned to show that Yahweh indeed moves with the people and leads them.

Inserted here is an ancient ritual cry that was recited over many years whenever the people of Israel engaged in warfare (see Pss 68:2; 132:8). One hymn is sung when the ark sets out with the troops (v. 35), another when it returns with them to the camp (v. 36). The hymns carry the tradition that Yahweh, the God of the armies, marches ahead to defeat the enemy.

The language of the hymn is clear. When the ark is moved, Yahweh arises and goes before the people to scatter their enemies. When the ark rests, Yahweh returns and sits enthroned in the midst of the troops.

According to tradition, the ark led the people through the wilderness, and it led the people into the land (see Josh 3:1-8). The ark remains with the people in the camp when they complain and prove themselves to be faithless.

11:1-3 Discontent at Taberah. No sooner have the people moved from Sinai than they do what they will do over and over again—they "complain in the hearing of the Lord" (v. 1). This first account of the people's discontent functions as a summary introduction in that it sets forth a pattern of behavior that will recur often in the stories of events in the wilderness. There is a predictable cycle of actions: the people complain (v. 1a); Yahweh's anger provokes punishment (v. 1b); the people cry to Moses to obtain relief (v. 2a); Moses intercedes on behalf of the people (v. 2b); Yahweh hears Moses' prayer (v. 2c).

There are actually two separate themes stressed in these stories. One theme is that of rebellion and punishment as characteristic of Israel's relation to Yahweh in the wilderness (see also Exod 14:11-22; 15:23-25a; 16:2-15; 17:1-7, though the telling in Numbers is highly stylized in comparison). The other theme is that of Moses as the intercessor to whom Yahweh responds with forgiveness and deliverance. This latter theme is especially important. Moses' unique leadership position and his authority are issues of such concern that the controversies regarding him are the basis for the stories in chapters 11–12 and 16–17.

The incident at Taberah is told to introduce the two major themes. There is no explanation of why the people complain nor any particulars about the fire sent as punishment. The cycle of rebellion and forgiveness moves quickly to the explanation for the name of the place (v. 3). The name Taberah derives from the verb "burn" or "consume." Stories were often told to explain the names of places. This feature is, in fact, a characteristic of the older stories (see, for example, Gen 16:13-14; 19:20-23; 21:31; 28:19-22; Exod 15:23; 17:7).

11:4-35 Complaint at Kibroth-hattaavah. Another incident, more complex in its structure, also ends with the explanation of the name of the place. Kibroth-hattaavah means "graves of greed" (v. 34). The story is about the people's complaint that they do not have enough meat in the wilderness. As a result, the people are fed with quail (vv. 4-9, 10, 13, 18-24a), and they also are punished for their greed (vv. 31-33).

Intertwined with the account about the craving for meat is a story about the sharing of Moses' leadership (vv. 11-12, 14-17, 24b-30). We will look at each story separately and consider how they are combined.

The account of the quail contains the elements of a typical complaint story. Two separate groups of people—the foreign element and the Israelites—complain about the lack of meat (v. 4). They long for the days in Egypt, when they enjoyed an abundance of fish and vegetables (v. 5). They are dissatisfied that all they have to eat is the manna, out of which they daily make loaves that taste like cakes with oil (vv. 6-9; see Exod 16:13-14, 31).

The "Lord became very angry" at the Israelites' display of greed (v. 10). Moses and Yahweh will each respond to the complaint. Rather than responding with intercession, Moses feels sorry for himself. He grieves that he alone must provide for the great multitude, saying, "Where can I get meat to give to all this people? They are crying to me" (v. 13). Moses presumes that it is his responsibility to find meat but expresses his inability to do so. Rather than seeking Yahweh's help, he shows resentment at the position in which he has been placed.

Yahweh, however, ignores Moses' lament and speaks to him in his capacity as mediator (vv. 18a, 24a). Yahweh responds, not to Moses' expressed concern, but directly to what the people have said. Yahweh makes plain that the people are in reality wishing to return to Egypt (vv. 18, 20b), thereby rejecting the Lord's deliverance. Yahweh instructs Moses to tell the people to "sanctify" themselves (v. 18), for they will receive meat in such abundance that they will become sick from it (vv. 19-20). Moses interjects again with a doubt about Yahweh's ability to provide the amount of meat that would be required to satisfy so many people (vv. 21-23).

In the fulfillment of Yahweh's word (vv. 31-34), Moses is conspicuously absent. Yahweh sends quail from the sea in great abundance. The people gather it (vv. 31-32), but before they can begin to eat it, Yahweh sends a plague to punish the greedy for their complaint (v. 33). Thus, the place was called "graves of greed," because those who were greedy were buried there (v. 34).

If we compare the elements in this story with those outlined in the incident at Taberah (vv. 1-3), it is obvious that Moses' response to the situation makes the difference. When Moses intercedes for the people, Yahweh responds with forgiveness (v. 2). In the incident of the quail, Moses' intercession is lacking, and the result is Yahweh's anger. By placing these stories side by side, the author is deliberately highlighting the effectiveness of Moses' intercession.

The lament of Moses (vv. 11-15) provides the link for the inclusion of the second story concerning the sharing of Moses' leadership. The issue raised by this lament is that he is burdened with the sole leadership of a people who are not his (vv. 12,14). Moses sees this as a punishment (v. 11), and his distress is so great that death is preferable (v. 15). Moses does not ask for help in leadership; he requests only the ultimate end of the burden.

Yahweh ignores Moses' death wish and takes up the matter of Moses' being alone. Yahweh instructs Moses to choose seventy elders and to bring them to the meeting tent (v. 16; see Exod 18:13-26 for the tradition regarding the selection of judges to help Moses with the care of the people). Yahweh will "take some of the spirit that is on [Moses] and will bestow it on [the elders], that they may share the burden" (v. 17). Moses does exactly as Yahweh has instructed (vv. 24b-25a). However, in the execution, a new element is added. In the sharing of Moses' spirit, nothing is said about sharing the burden with him (v. 25b). Instead, when the spirit rests on the elders, they prophesy (v. 25c). This story also supports the uniqueness of Moses' position as leader. Others may prophesy, but they cannot share the burden of the responsibility assigned to Moses—to communicate Yahweh's word and to bring the people safely into the land of promise (v. 12).

The theme of prophecy is continued in yet another story (vv. 26-30). Eldad and Medad, though not called elders, are among those chosen by Moses. Instead of going to the meeting tent with the seventy, they remain in the camp, where the spirit comes upon them also so that they prophesy (v. 26). Joshua, Moses' young assistant (see Exod 33:11), for some reason objects to this and pleads with Moses to stop them (vv. 27-28). Moses instead voices the wish that the "Lord might bestow his spirit" on all the people that they might all be prophets (v. 29). It is not Moses' spirit but rather Yahweh's spirit that is upon them. Moses approves of the distribution of Yahweh's spirit and is not concerned that his own prestige might be lost: "Are you jealous for my sake?" (v. 29). What appears to be a diminishing of Moses' position in the sharing of the spirit leads instead to a further delineation of Moses' uniqueness in chapter 12, a delineation that focuses the prophetic role.

Before the next story, there is a brief note about the people's move from Kibroth-hattaavah to Hazeroth (v. 35), the site of the next incident of rebellion.

12:1-16 Jealousy of Aaron and Miriam. Opposition to Moses comes from those closest to him. The tradition holds that Aaron and Miriam accompanied Moses from the time of the Exodus event (Exod 15:20-21; see Exod 6:20). Miriam and Aaron challenge Moses on two accounts: his marriage to a Cushite woman (v. 1) and his unique position as sole spokesman for Yahweh (v. 2). We have here another story that is told in the pattern of rebellion and eventual forgiveness through the intercession of Moses (see the discussion on 11:1-3).

The reason for the complaint that Moses has married a Cushite woman is obscure, since there is no evidence for a marriage other than with Zipporah, a Midianite (see Exod 2:15-22; 4:24-26; 18:2-3). If, however, the reference to Cush is actually a parallel to Midian, as in Hab 3:7, then the complaint is in opposition to Moses' marriage with a foreigner. There is, in fact, a tradition recorded in Num 25:6-18 that polemicizes marriage with Midianites, who are described as archenemies of Israel. This complaint reflects a strong anti-Moses bias because of his foreign wife.

In the second complaint Miriam and Aaron challenge Moses on the ground that they are prophets as well as he—"Does the Lord not speak through us also?" (v. 2). This opposition reveals resentment against Moses' exclusive role as mediator between God and the people. This issue was raised in the preceding story (11:26-30). If all people can be prophets, does Moses have a claim to uniqueness? The response and punishment are such that they both clarify (vv. 6-8) and affirm (vv. 13-14) the authority of Moses.

Moses makes no response to the complaints. The text states that he is the "meekest man on the face of the earth" (v. 3). This statement has been interpreted as a description of a person with personal honor and integrity of character. In spite of opposition, Moses will honorably stand by his responsibility as leader when he is called upon to intercede for Miriam (v. 13).

The response to the complaint comes directly from Yahweh in the form of an instruction (vv. 4-8) and a punishment (vv. 9-15). Overhearing the complaint, Yahweh summons Moses, Aaron, and Miriam to the meeting tent (v. 4), calls Aaron and Miriam aside (v. 5), and instructs them with a detailed account of the difference between Moses and a prophet (vv. 6-8). The words that Yahweh speaks express a tradition about Moses that survives in a piece of ancient poetry. The poem states that Yahweh communicates with the prophet in "visions" and "dreams" (v. 6), but with Moses, Yahweh speaks "face to face" and "plainly" (v. 8). Moses' relationship is more personal and intimate. He beholds the "presence of the Lord" (v. 8). He is thus set over all others as the peerless mediator of Yahweh's word. Aaron and Miriam stand rebuffed with the final question upholding the authority of Moses—"Did you not fear to speak against my servant Moses?" (v. 8b).

After this rebuke, Yahweh responds in anger (v. 9). Miriam is made snow-white with leprosy (v. 10). Aaron thereupon appeals to Moses for help and identifies with the punishment in his confession that both have sinned (v. 11). Moses prays for her healing and by his intercession wins Yahweh's forgiveness. Moses' authority receives legitimation and confirmation in the restoration of Miriam (vv. 14-16).

Miriam's leprosy is described as being "snow-white" (v. 9) and is compared to the appearance of a stillborn child (v. 12). She is fully restored after a period of seven days outside the camp (vv. 14-15a). To illuminate the situation, we look at the law pertaining to a leprous person in Lev 13:9-17. In summary, the law states that the leprous person is brought to the priest. If the leprosy covers the whole body and the body has turned white, the priest pronounces the leper clean. Miriam's whiteness and her confinement outside the camp for seven days point not to active but to burnt-out leprosy. Miriam was punished with a post-leprous condition. Her exclusion from the camp is for the period necessary to verify her cleanness.

During the period of Miriam's confinement, the people remain encamped at Hazeroth (v. 15b). Afterward they set out and settle in the desert of Paran (v. 16; see the discussion on 10:11-28).

Chapters 13-14 present the continuing drama of the people's rebellion, even when they are in sight of the Promised Land. These chapters are developed from a number of ancient traditions that the Priestly author weaves into one explanation for Israel's long sojourn in the wilderness. Though we have one story, we will approach the content in sections to facilitate reading.

13:1-24 Scouts enter Canaan. In accord with Yahweh's word (v. 1), Moses sends a delegation of scouts to explore the Promised Land (v. 2). The Israelites are encamped in the desert of Paran (v. 3a) at Kadesh (see v. 26), a well-known oasis located southwest of the southern tip of the Dead Sea. They are situated directly south of the Promised Land and in range of entrance. From this location Moses dispatches twelve leaders, one from each tribe, to look around (vv. 3b-16).

The names of the leaders are set in a tribal list that is a rather free arrangement of that in 1:5-15. The leaders are not the same as those appearing earlier (see also 7:12-83). And except for Caleb and Joshua, who play a major role in this story (13:30; 14:6, 24, 30), the leaders are not mentioned again by name. There is a special note that Moses has changed the name of Hoshea to Joshua (v. 16). Joshua, which means "Yahweh is salvation," is related to Hoshea, which means "salvation." Joshua receives his new name in preparation for his future role as successor to Moses (see 27:12-23). It is Joshua who will finally lead the next generation of Israelites into the land (14:30; see Deut 31:7-8; Josh 1:1-11).

The scouts are sent into the Negeb, a parched area south of Judah, to proceed into the highlands that run the length of central Canaan (v. 17). They reach Hebron, a city located about twenty miles south of Jerusalem, where three tribes are settled (v. 22; see Josh 15:14; Judg 1:20). The territory around Hebron has a reputation for its grapes, pomegranates, and figs. It is because of this that the place is called Wadi Eshcol, the "valley of the cluster," and the exaggerated story is told about two men required to carry the grapes (vv. 23-24).

One tradition says that the men scouted from the desert of Zin as far as Hamath (v. 21); that is, they went from the southern frontier to the northern limit of the land. The desert of Zin is part of the desert of Paran near Kadesh (see 20:1; 27:14; 33:36), and Hamath, a pass near the Orontes, is located in Lebanon at the northern border of Israel's territory (see 34:8; Josh 13:5; Judg 3:3; 2 Kgs 14:25; Amos 6:14).

Moses instructed the scouts to secure information about the land and the people (v. 18), the towns and fortifications (v. 19), the terrain and the soil. He also told them to bring back some of the fruit of the land (v. 20).

13:25-33 Return of the scouts. After forty days, a stay of significant duration to adequately survey the situation (v. 25), the scouts return to Kadesh, where they report to Moses, Aaron, and the entire community and present them with the fruit (v. 26). They describe the land as flowing "with milk and honey" (v. 27), an expression that traditionally identifies the land as that promised by Yahweh (see Exod 3:8, 17; 13:5; 33:3, and frequently in Deuteronomy). But they quickly add that the inhabitants are powerful descendants of the Anakim, and the towns are well fortified (vv. 28, 31-33). A tradition prevailed that the Anakim were a numerous, tall, and strong people (see Deut 1:28; 2:21) who had to be defeated when Israel entered the land (Josh 11:21-22; 14:12, 15). That the population was mixed—Amalekites, Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, and Canaanites (v. 29)—also accords with tradition regarding the inhabitants before the conquest. The Amalekites were encountered near Sinai (Exod 17:8-16); the Hittites were early inhabitants in Hebron (Gen 23:13-19); the Jebusites controlled Jerusalem (2 Sam 5:6-9). The Amorites were early inhabitants of Canaan who were later forced from the coastal plains and the Jordan valley to settle in the highlands. They were part of the indigenous Canaanite population. This latter group had settled in the fertile valleys and coastal region.

The scouts paint a fearful picture and recommend that the Israelites abort their attempt to enter the land because they will never survive the might of the inhabitants (vv. 31-33). The scouts thus challenge the guidance of Yahweh and the promise of the land to their ancestor Abraham. They, in fact, reject the land Yahweh is about to give them. Only Caleb encourages the people to proceed and expresses confidence in their success (v. 30). The interjection of Caleb at this point prepares for his role, along with Joshua, as one of the leaders who trusts the God of Israel (14:6-9). In tradition, the descendants of Caleb controlled the bountiful territory of Hebron and its surroundings (Josh 15:13-14; Judg 1:20). This story in Numbers provides an explanation of why Caleb and his descendants were favored with such a possession.

With the report from the scouts, the stage is set for the rebellion of the people. In this sense, the whole of chapter 13 functions as an introduction to the cycle of rebellion and forgiveness that follows in chapter 14.

14:1-10 The people's complaint. The whole community grumbles against Moses and Aaron on account of the report from the scouts (vv. 1-2a). The people reject Yahweh when they wish that they had never left Egypt. They are fearful of the disaster that awaits their families and themselves (vv. 2b-3). They conclude that it would be better to return to the security of bondage in Egypt, and they even decide to choose a leader of their own mind (vv. 3b-4).

Moses and Aaron respond by falling to the ground in helplessness (v. 5). Caleb and Joshua tear their garments in grief (v. 6). They appeal to the people, reminding them that the land is good (v. 7), that the Lord promised the land and will bring them to it (v. 8). They exhort the people to trust Yahweh who is with them (see Exod 33). And they remind the people that they need not fear the inhabitants, because "their defense has left them" (v. 9). The term "defense" is actually the word "shadow," which means literally that the inhabitants are left exposed and vulnerable to the ferocity of the sun, and metaphorically that Yahweh has removed the protection of their local gods. The inhabitants who have no protection will be "food for us," that is, they will be easily consumed.

The words of Caleb and Joshua are not heeded. The people rebel and threaten to stone them (v. 10a) and would have succeeded if Yahweh had not intervened. The "glory of the Lord appeared at the meeting tent" (v. 10b). The phrase "glory of the Lord" is always used by the Priestly author to express the revelation of Yahweh in power and majesty.

14:11-19 Punishment and Moses' intercession. Yahweh, manifest to all Israel, laments to Moses about the contempt of the people and their refusal to believe in spite of all the signs (v. 11). Yahweh announces the obliteration of the whole people and promises to start anew by creating a greater and mightier nation from Moses (v. 12).

Moses intercedes at this point and persuades Yahweh to set aside this harsh judgment (vv. 13-19). Moses pleads boldly, using Yahweh's reputation among the other nations as his argument (vv. 13-16). He asserts that Yahweh is known as a God in the midst of the people, a God who accompanies them by day and night. Should this people be annihilated, the nations will have cause to say that Yahweh did not have the power to bring them into the land and therefore killed them in the desert. Moses advises that Yahweh's honor and standing among the gods are at stake.

Quoting a confessional formulary from Exod 34:6-7, Moses suggests that the Lord's power will be better shown, not by killing, but by patience, kindness, forgiveness, and by just punishment of sin (vv. 17-18). Moses summarizes his request by asking that Yahweh forgive the iniquity of this people according to the greatness of the covenant love, just as Yahweh has forgiven them many times from Egypt until now (v. 19). Moses is pleading with Yahweh to preserve the covenant relationship that was made when Yahweh brought the people from Egypt. He thus appeals to Yahweh's covenant faithfulness and at the same time recognizes Yahweh's utter freedom to maintain or break off relationship with the people. The forgiveness that Moses asks is the preservation of relationship between Yahweh and the people, and the decision not to disinherit the present community by creating a new nation from Moses or from anyone else. Because Israel's only existence is relationship with Yahweh, there is room for punishment that does not include dissolution of the covenant.

14:20-38 The sentence. Yahweh answers Moses' prayer by announcing forgiveness (v. 20), that is, the continuation of the fundamental covenant relationship that is the basis of Israel's existence. But there is punishment also. In the strong language of an oath (v. 21; see also vv. 28, 35), Yahweh asserts that those who rebelled will be denied entry into the land on account of their infidelity: "not one shall see the land which I promised on oath to their fathers" (vv. 22-23). Only Caleb, who trusted the Lord's promise, will enter the land, and his descendants will inherit it (v. 24; see Josh 14:6-15). So also is Joshua spared the punishment (vv. 30b, 38; 32:12).

Yahweh continues with a description of precisely which members will be denied entry into the land: all those who "grumble against me" (v. 27) and those over twenty years old who were registered in the census (v. 29). Only the children, the next generation, will enter the land to enjoy it (v. 31). The Israelites are thus sentenced to remain in the wilderness for forty years, a year for each day of the scouting (v. 34). The children have to suffer the sin of their parents by languishing with them in the wilderness until the last of the generation has lived out a natural life (vv. 33, 35). While the community is being punished, Yahweh's covenant continues and endures.

There is a more immediate judgment on the scouts who instigated the grumbling by their discouraging report. They are struck with a plague and die (vv. 36-37).

This story of rebellion answers two questions. First, it gives the reason for Israel's prolonged stay in the wilderness, so that the whole generation that came from Egypt perished there. Because the Israelites rejected the land, they are rejected from entering the land. Second, it explains why Israel journeyed east to enter the land from the Transjordan rather than taking the more direct route from the south. The explanation given is that because the Amalekites and Canaanites live in the valleys, Israel must return south and travel the road that will take them around the Dead Sea (v. 25; see 20:14–22:1 for the details of the journey).

14:39-45 Unsuccessful invasion. Another story of rebellion arises from the issue of the route to be taken for entry into the land. It is an account of failure because of refusal to obey the word of God.

The people grieve when Moses tells them that they are to turn and head southward away from the Canaanites and Amalekites (v. 39; see vv. 25, 43a, 45). The people admit that they were wrong when earlier they listened to the report of the scouts (13:27-33; 14:1-4), and they resolve to head directly north into the foothills of Canaan (v. 40). Moses admonishes them that they are acting disobediently. He warns that failure is certain because the Lord is not in their midst (vv. 41-43). This headstrong people dare to set out without the presence of the ark, the leadership of Moses, and in opposition to the word of Yahweh (v. 44).

This is a story of failure. It demonstrates the consequences of acting apart from the word that is the basis for covenant relationship with Yahweh. Israel faces the enemy on its own counsel and is pursued as far as Hormah, a city located in the region of Beersheba (v. 45; the ultimate defeat of Hormah is reported in 21:1-3).

The long section in chapters 11–14 contains five stories of rebellion: the incident at Taberah, the greed for meat, the jealousy toward Moses, the rejection of the land, and the unsuccessful invasion. There follows an insertion of five ritual laws that have no apparent connection. All the instructions are intended for the guidance of the community when it has reached the land. The laws are thus future-oriented. They reflect modifications arising from everyday practice.

15:1-16 Secondary offerings. Every dimension of life belongs to Yahweh; therefore, all laws are directly attributed to Yahweh. Each directive is the Lord's explicit instruction (v. 1). Each focuses on the time when Israel will have entered the land (v. 2).

The first law outlines the quantities of grain, oil, and wine that are to accompany the "sweet-smelling oblation" given for the various sacrifices (v. 3). The phrase "sweet-smelling" means that the oblation is acceptable to the Lord. It is based on the idea that God smells and delights in the sacrifice presented on occasions of joy.

Each sacrifice, whether of a lamb (vv. 4-5), a ram (vv. 6-7), an ox (vv. 8-10), or goat (v. 11), should be presented with a proportional weight of cereal, oil, and wine. The quantities of cereal, oil, and wine increase with the size of the animal.

It is uncertain why a grain offering and a drink offering are to accompany each sacrifice. It could be the idea of providing a complete meal. It could also be the idea of giving from the natural resources of the land (see Deut 7:13). Whatever the meaning of the sacrifice, the text is concerned with giving God a full and acceptable offering.

There is an additional note which stresses that the instruction applies to the native and the alien alike (vv. 13-16). It states that the foreigner who has made a home among the Israelites has equal rights as well as the corresponding obligations. The detail of this note suggests that the presence of "resident aliens" is a matter of considerable concern. The principle of the law—"Before the Lord you and the alien are alike" (v. 15)—reflects a basic attitude of justice that witnesses to the authenticity of Israelite faith.

15:17-21 Offering from the first batch of dough. The second regulation belongs in the category of first things belonging to Yahweh (see Exod 13:11-16; Deut 26:1-2; Num 18:12-13). The text is focused on the future time in the land (vv. 18-19a) and applies to all future generations (v. 21a).

The regulation specifically identifies the cake made from the coarse grain taken from the threshing floor (v. 20). Since the whole harvest is a gift from God, the first dough made from the harvest grain belongs to God.

In the temple period, the cake made from the first dough was presented to the priest to eat. This offering symbolized the giving back to God from the abundance that was given. This offering was part of the priests' provisions (see 18:13; Lev 23:10-11).

15:22-31 Sin offerings. The third instruction is divided into two sections: the offerings for sin or violations that are "inadvertent" or unintentional (vv. 22-29), and punishment for willful sin (vv. 30-31).

In the case of the unintentional violation of instructions, separate provision is made for atonement when the community is involved (vv. 22-26) and when an individual is involved (vv. 27-29). Prescribed sacrifices (vv. 24, 27) are to be offered in atonement by the priest so that the sin committed unwittingly may be forgiven (vv. 25, 28). There is specific mention again that the regulation applies to the native and alien alike (vv. 26, 29).

When it is a case of deliberate sin, an "insult" to the Lord, no sacrifice can atone. The individual, native or alien, who has defiantly "despised the word" or "broken [the Lord's] commandment" has, in fact, chosen to be cut off from the community of God's people. The punishment for this person is separation from the community.

15:32-36 The sabbath-breaker. The fourth regulation is given as the solution to a specific behavior that is described. The people find a man gathering wood on the sabbath day (v. 32). They keep him in custody because there is "no clear decision as to what should be done with him" (v. 34). The case in point is an example of the way new regulations arose that would be normative for future similar situations (see the commentary on 9:6-13).

The law of the sabbath clearly states that work is forbidden (see Exod 20:8-11), and the death penalty is the prescribed punishment for breaking the law of the sabbath (see Exod 31:14-15; 35:2-3). What is unclear is the form of execution to be used in the case of deliberate violation of the law.

The answer given is that the man is to be stoned by the whole community outside the camp (v. 35). This person is thus excluded from the community symbolically by being led outside the camp as well as physically by the death sentence (v. 36). The strict observance of the sabbath took on greater importance after the Exile and continued into the time of Jesus (see John 9:16).

15:37-41 Tassels on the cloak. The fifth regulation makes the ancient practice of wearing tassels on the end of the outer garment a requirement with a specific meaning (see Deut 22:12). This practice survived into Judaism (Matt 9:20; 14:36; 23:5; Mark 6:56; Luke 8:44).

The tassels are attached with a violet cord (v. 38) and function to catch the eye. They thereby serve as a reminder of the Lord's presence and commands (v. 39). The external ornament is intended to continually remind the people that a holy God is among them and that to live in the presence of a holy God, they must observe the commandments by which covenant is preserved. Observance of the commandments is the mark of a holy people (v. 40).

The reason for observing the instruction is that Yahweh is present and will continue to be with a faithful people. The formulary "I, the Lord, am your God who . . . brought you out of Egypt that I, the Lord, may be your God" (v. 41) is a reminder of the very basis of Israel's existence. It concludes the last instruction as well as the series of five instructions. The people are invited to obedient response to demonstrate loyalty to covenant. If the covenant relationship is broken, it is because Israel has turned from observing the word that the Lord has given for their direction since Egypt.

The section 16:1–17:5 picks up the theme of rebellion once again. This is one continuous narrative made up of two separate stories of rebellion: Korah and company against Aaron (16:1a, 2-11, 16-24, 32b, 35; 17:1-5), and the two Reubenites, Dathan and Abiram, against Moses (16:1b, 12-15, 25-32a, 33-34). Each story reflects ancient struggles for power that broke out again and again in the course of history. The Priestly tradition is responsible for knitting the two incidents into a continuous narrative of simultaneous rebellion.

16:1-11 Rebellion of Korah. The report begins with a presentation of the lineage of Korah, son of Izhar, son of Kohath, son of Levi (v. 1a; see Exod 6:17-25, esp. vv. 18, 21, 24). Generally, the longer the list of names, the more significant the individual. It is noteworthy that Korah is a Levite and belongs to the family of Kohathites, to whom is assigned care of the most sacred items of the sanctuary (see 3:27-32; 4:1-20). In the execution of their service, however, they are always subservient to the priest (4:15, 20).

Korah's rebellion undoubtedly arises from a long struggle for greater authority. The Kohathites are allowed to come near the holy vessels, but if they touch them, they will die. They carry them in transport, but only after the sacred utensils have been covered by the priests. Korah, a leader among the Kohathites, leads the rebellion against the authority of the priests. The tension between these groups will come to the forefront again at the very time when the document is being written down by the Priestly writer. There was a struggle to secure the priesthood by the Zadokites, descendants of Eleazar (see 3:1-4, esp. v. 4b; 1 Chr 24; Ezek 44:10-31). The story in Numbers reflects the supremacy of Eleazar and the Zadokites (17:1-5). The Levitic Korahites had to be content to be doorkeepers (1 Chr 26:1) and temple singers (Pss 42–49, 84, 85, 87, 88).

The story of Korah itself reflects two major conflicts. In one, Korah and the two hundred fifty conspirators maintain that the tribe of Levi, which includes Moses, Aaron, and their descendants, is not more sacred than the other tribes (vv. 2-3). They argue that because Yahweh is in the midst of the community, Moses and Aaron have no right to claim holiness for themselves above the rest. Each member of the community is holy because of Yahweh's presence. A second conflict represents Korah and his followers as Levites who oppose the authority of Aaron and attempt to take the power of the priesthood for themselves (vv. 8-11). The Levites are not content with the special status assigned them in the service of the sanctuary but desire the full authority of the priesthood. These two very ancient and very real struggles—recognition of the holiness of each person and conflict over the privileged status of the priesthood—merge into one story of rebellion to which Moses responds.

Moses falls prostrate (v. 4); he does not intercede. Instead, he lets Yahweh decide who is the holy one and whom God chooses to come near (v. 5). This rebellion against the leaders is recognized as a rebellion against Yahweh to be resolved by Yahweh (v. 11).

Moses instructs Korah and his followers to prepare censers with fire and incense (vv. 6-7), an action reserved to the priest. Moses is telling Korah to take the priesthood and then see whom Yahweh will choose.

16:12-15 Rebellion of Dathan and Abiram. The lineage of Dathan and Abiram appears at the head of the chapter in the merging of the two separate stories. They are descendants of Jacob's first-born son Reuben (v. 1b; 26:5-8; Gen 35:23). The tradition of their rebellion is an ancient one that is recounted elsewhere (Ps 106:16-18 and Deut 11:6).

Dathan and Abiram represent the political faction that refuses to acknowledge the leadership of Moses. When they say, "We will not go" (vv. 12b, 14c), we are inclined to think that they might be leaders who conspired with the scouts in refusing to enter the land (14:1-4). Their concerns identify them. They lament having been brought from Egypt, and they fear perishing in the wilderness (v. 13a). They complain that Moses has set himself up as prince (v. 13b; see Exod 2:14). They complain, further, that Moses has not fulfilled his promise to bring them into a land where they will acquire fields and vineyards (v. 14a). As the ultimate insult, the rebels claim that Moses is deceiving them when they ask, ". . . will you also gouge out our eyes?" (v. 14b). This is an idiom for leading astray with false promises (see 1 Sam 11:2; Prov 30:17).

Moses responds angrily. He does not defend himself against the accusations but rather confesses that he has not harmed anyone (v. 15). The statement "I have never taken a single ass from them" is used to defend oneself against the charge of abuse of position (see 1 Sam 12:3; 8:16).

16:16-24, 35 Punishment of Korah. The story of Korah is resumed here, continuing from verse 11. Moses tells Aaron, Korah, and his supporters to each prepare a censer and to take his stand at the entrance to the meeting tent (vv. 16-17). The preparation of the censers is described in detail to emphasize the action of assuming the priesthood (v. 18). This is done in anticipation of judgment.

At this moment the "glory of Yahweh" is manifest in power and majesty before the entire community (v. 19). Moses and Aaron are instructed to separate themselves from the group about to be punished because they are exempt from judgment (vv. 20-21). They respond by falling down and pleading that the whole people of God might not perish on account of the sin of one group (v. 22). They address Yahweh by the old title "El," which is simply God, the Creator of life. They ask that God not destroy the life that has been given (see also 27:16). Yahweh thus exempts the community from judgment. The people are told to move away from the place (vv. 23-24). No sooner have they done this than fire bursts out from the Lord and consumes the rebellious individuals (v. 35). There is a note in 26:11 which states that not all descendants of Korah died.

This story settles once and for all the question of priestly authority. The object of Korah's rebellion was the desire and ambition to be a priest, to take the censer, the fire, and the incense and stand before the Lord. The Kohathites had been warned that they should not touch any of the sacred objects under pain of death (4:15, 20). Death by fire was foreshadowed in the taking of fire from the altar (compare the story in 3:1-4 and Lev 10:1-2).

The mention of Dathan and Abiram alongside Korah in verses 24 and 35 reflects the intent to make the two stories one. Korah's punishment occurred near the meeting tent. Reference to the Dwelling in these verses comes from the story of Dathan and Abiram, who, according to the following account (vv. 25-34), are punished near their own tents.

16:25-34 Punishment of Dathan and Abiram. This is the conclusion to the story of rebellion against the leadership of Moses. It picks up directly from verse 15.

Moses and the elders approach the defiant Dathan and Abiram (v. 25). Moses speaks directly to the community, warning them to separate themselves from the rebellious Reubenites, lest they also suffer punishment (v. 26). Dathan, Abiram, their wives and children stand outside their tents in expectation (v. 27). The scene is set for an act of judgment.

The word of judgment comes directly from Moses in confirmation of his authority and in refutation of any suspicion that he is acting on his own (v. 28). The judgment will be recognizable by the fact that death, "the fate common to all mankind," will not be from natural causes (v. 29). The Lord will do "something entirely new," that is, Yahweh will do an act of creation, so that they will die in a way that has been unheard of until this time (v. 30a). The earth will literally open up and swallow them and all their possessions (v. 30b).

No sooner has Moses spoken the word of judgment than his authority is vindicated in the sight of all. The earth opens, and those who refused to go up (vv. 12, 14), ironically, face the fate of going down to the nether world with everything belonging to them (vv. 31-33). Those who accused Moses of bringing them out of Egypt "to make [them] perish in the desert" (v. 13) suffer the fulfillment of their accusation. Dathan and Abiram disappear from the face of the earth and there is no evidence or trace of them. Mention that Korah's men suffer the same fate is made in verse 32b to knit the two accounts.

Quite understandably, all the Israelites flee in fear that the same thing might happen to them (v. 34). The story is told so that Israel might know the uniqueness of Moses in his call to lead the people from Egypt and into the land of promise.

17:1-5 A sign for the Israelites. This piece offers an explanation for the layer of copper that covers the altar, and it also foreshadows the succession of Eleazar as priest after Aaron (see 20:22-29). The word comes to Moses (v. 1) that Eleazar is to gather the censers that have been consecrated, and, after scattering the fire, he is to hammer them into plates to overlay the altar (vv. 2-3). Eleazar does exactly as the Lord commands (vv. 4-5). Because the censers have been made sacred at the cost of so many lives, they are to be protected from any abuse (see Exod 29:37; 30:29). The cover made from the consecrated censers would be a reminder that no person who is not a proper priest, a descendant of Aaron, should ever approach the altar. The cover stands as a warning of the consequences of any improper action.

17:6-15 The people grumble. Another story that contains the elements of the typical rebellion-forgiveness story (see commentary on 11:1-3) evolves out of the events of Korah's rebellion. The people grumble and blame Moses and Aaron for the death of so many of their compatriots (v. 6).

Yahweh appears in the usual manner and resolves to consume the entire community. Only Moses and Aaron are to be spared. Moses instructs Aaron to take his censer, fill it with fire from the altar, put incense on it, and make atonement for the people (v. 11). Aaron's intercessory action puts an end to the scourge, but not before a significant number of people have perished (vv. 12-15). Aaron the priest thus acts in the capacity of high priest, mediating healing and life from God. He stands "between the living and the dead" (v. 13); he makes intercession that effectively averts further destruction.

This story vindicates Aaron and his descendants and clarifies still further the role of the priest. The priest is consecrated for the good of the people. Through the priest the life-giving forces flow from God. For this mediatory task the priest is uniquely chosen. God's choice of the priestly family is based on the following legend.

17:16-26 Aaron's staff. The legend of the blooming of Aaron's staff is a delightful literary piece developed upon a wordplay. The Hebrew words for "staff" and "tribe" are exactly the same. The dead staff that bursts into life represents the tribe that God chooses and blesses for the service of the priesthood. The story is told to silence once and for all the "grumbling" (vv. 20, 25) against Aaron and his sons as the chosen of God.

The repetition of details in the word of God to Moses (vv. 16-20) carried out exactly (vv. 21-23) emphasizes the divine choice of the staff/tribe. In accord with Yahweh's direction, Moses requests that each prince representing one of the tribes bring a staff on which is written the prince's name. The name of Aaron is inscribed on the staff from the tribe of Levi (v. 18). The twelve staffs are then laid in the meeting tent in front of the commandments. Yahweh will signify the choice of tribe by a miracle.

The next day Moses enters the tent and finds that Aaron's staff has not only sprouted and sent out shoots but has blossomed and bears ripe almonds (v. 23). Moses brings all the staffs out for the people to see and returns each to its owner (v. 24). Aaron's staff, however, is returned to the meeting tent, where it will remain as a sign and a warning for future generations that the sons of Aaron are chosen to be the sole legitimate priests (v. 25).

17:27-28 Sacred objects. These verses are appropriately inserted as a transition between the preceding series of stories and the following clarification of priestly duties and rewards. The verses present the people crying out to Moses, as they have done so often when facing punishment (v. 27). In this instance they cry out in fear that all of them will surely die if they ever come near the Dwelling (v. 28). The concern expressed here reflects an actual question that caused disputes among the categories of priests. It is also a legitimate concern of the people who encamp about the Dwelling and know the punishment that befalls those who encroach upon the holy. The despair that resounds in the choice of verbs—"perishing," "lost," "die"—highlights the seriousness of the issue. The clarification of the duties of the priests and Levites that follows answers the concern.

18:1-7 Duties of the priests and the Levites. Only in this section is Yahweh's word addressed directly to Aaron (v. 1; see also vv. 8, 20). This is appropriate, since the instruction distinguishes the priests from the Levites and gives priority to the priests. The role of each is made clear. Aaron, his sons, and their descendants, as legitimate possessors of the priesthood, have sole responsibility for the sanctuary (v. 1). Only they may draw near the altar, perform the priestly functions, and touch that which pertains to the altar (vv. 1, 5, 7).

Death is the punishment for any layperson who comes near the altar (vv. 4b, 5b, 7b). The Levites, kin to the Aaronites, have been set apart in place of the first-born of Israel for the service of the sanctuary so that "no plague may strike among the Israelites should they come near the sanctuary" (see the commentary on 8:19). They are dedicated to the Lord and given as a gift to the priests (v. 6; see 3:5–4:49; 8:5–26). The Levites are to be assistants to the priests. Theirs will be the service of the priests and the holy place, but they may not touch the altar or the sacred objects (vv. 2-4).

The clear priority of the Aaronic priesthood over the Levites is defined in this text by the word "gift" (v. 6). The Levites are given as a gift to the priests, and the priesthood is given as a gift to Aaron and his sons. The ascendancy of the Aaronic priesthood was most pronounced in the period of the Exile and after.

18:8-20 Priests' share of the sacrifices. This is an elaborate description of the remuneration due to the priests and their families for their services on behalf of the people. The priests have no land or property; their sole possession is the God to whom they belong (v. 20; see Josh 13:14; 14:3-4). They therefore have a right to support from the people. What is offered to God in sacrifice belongs to the priests as their share (v. 8).

The priests have a share of all the most sacred offerings, be they cereal offerings, sin offerings, or guilt offerings. The only injunction is that their portion be treated as most sacred (vv. 9-10). They receive the breast and right leg from the wave offering (vv. 11, 18b). Also, the best of the oil, the new wine, and the grain presented as first fruits belong to the priests and may be consumed by members of their families (vv. 12-13). Theirs is whatever is "doomed," that is, whatever has been devoted to God and cannot be redeemed (v. 14). In early Israel, for example, everything taken in war belonged to God and had to be destroyed. In later years, what belongs to God is claimed by the priests, including all the first-born. The first-born sons and unclean animals are to be redeemed and the money presented to the priests. The first-born of the clean animals belong to the priests, except for the blood, which is splashed on the altar, and the fat, which is burned in the fire (vv. 15-18a).

The Lord promises all this to the priests and their families, both sons and daughters, as "an inviolable covenant to last forever" (v. 19). This very strong language reads literally "a covenant of salt." The phrase occurs again only in 2 Chr 13:5 in reference to the Davidic kingship. According to the priests responsible for both texts, only that which applies to the priests and to the family of David is guaranteed forever.

18:21-24 Tithes due the Levites. The Levites who attend the property of the sanctuary shield the people from danger (vv. 22-23a). They have no heritage of their own (vv. 23b, 24b) and therefore depend on the support of the people. The Lord designates that the tithes given as a contribution to the Lord be assigned to the Levites in return for their service (vv. 21, 24a). The tithe consists of one-tenth of the produce of the land, trees, and cattle (see Lev 27:30-33). The practice of presenting the tithe for the support of the Levites continued, with some variations, from early to postexilic times (see Deut 14:22-29; 12:17-19; 26:12; 2 Chr 31:4-6).

18:25-32 Tithes paid by the Levites. The tithes presented to the Levites for their support are to be looked upon as God's gift to them from the earth and the vineyard. The Levites, too, must tithe. Yahweh commands that they present a "tithe of the tithes" (v. 26) to the priests as their offering, as if from their own threshing floors and winepresses (vv. 27, 30). They are cautioned to offer the best part, so that they return to God the very best of that given to them (vv. 28-30, 32a). What remains can be eaten by themselves and their families—it is their remuneration for service. This food is sacred because it has been offered as a contribution to God. It must therefore be consumed, lest the Levite bring upon himself punishment for abuse of that which has been consecrated (vv. 31-32).

Besides distinguishing between the priest and the Levite, this chapter establishes the practice of providing support for those dedicated to God who carry out duties in service of the people.

Chapter 19 presents an ancient ritual that is entirely unrelated to the context other than the fact that it is carried out by a priest. The ritual has to do with cultic purity, specifically purification after contact with the dead.

19:1-10 Ashes of the red heifer. The animal to be used for the rite is a young red heifer which is without defect in the cultic sense and which has not been used for any other purpose (v. 2). It is to be given to Eleazar, taken outside the camp, and slaughtered in his presence (v. 3). The priest will take some of the blood on his finger and sprinkle it seven times in the direction of the meeting tent, presumably to signify total dedication (v. 4). The animal is then burned in its entirety before the priest, who adds to the fire some cedar wood, hyssop, and scarlet yarn (vv. 5-6). These items are understood to have a cleansing and purifying effect, and are used otherwise to purify lepers (see Lev 14:6-7). After the burning the priest and the one who has burned the animal are to wash their garments and bathe themselves. They remain unclean until evening, when they may reenter the camp (vv. 7-8).

Finally, a man who is clean from a cultic point of view gathers the ashes and stores them in a clean place outside the camp, so that they are available for use in the water of purification (v. 9a). The statement that the heifer is a sin offering (v. 9b) is strange, since the animal is not sacrificed or presented to God but is totally burnt and used to produce ashes for the purifying water sprinkled in rites of purification. The man who gathers the ashes also becomes unclean. He, too, must wash his garments and remain outside the camp until evening (v. 10). The ritual described here has no parallel. It carries magical overtones that suggest adaptation of a practice from the foreign environment.

19:11-22 Use of the ashes. The ashes are prepared specifically for use in the purification rites of those who have become unclean from contact with the dead. We saw earlier that contact with the dead is a means of defilement (5:2). The various regulations and rituals for cleansing this uncleanness are presented in this one place.

According to law, anyone who touches a corpse becomes unclean for a period of seven days. This individual must be banned from the camp lest the community be defiled. The unclean person is unworthy of the holy place where Yahweh dwells. To become clean, the person must be purified by being sprinkled with water on the third and seventh days (vv. 11-13).

There follows a listing of circumstances that bring about uncleanness (vv. 14-16). Anyone who enters a tent where there is a corpse, as well as those already in the tent at the time of the death, are unclean. So also is anything exposed to the dead, such as the contents of a jar that has been left open. A person does not have to touch the body. However, if anyone touches a corpse—even a part of it or the grave—that person is unclean. It does not matter whether the death was caused by natural or unnatural causes.

Instructions for purification are presented next (vv. 17-18). The unclean individuals are required to submit to a ritual of purification in which the ashes of the red heifer, mixed with fresh water, are sprinkled on them, their tents, and possessions. This is done by someone ritually clean, not necessarily a priest, on the third and seventh days. Those being cleansed then wash their garments, bathe themselves, and return to the camp in the evening of the day of purification. The person who sprinkles the water also becomes unclean and must therefore wash his garments and remain outside until evening.

An unclean person who does not submit to the purificatory rite remains unclean. Everything and everyone who comes in contact with this unclean person becomes unclean. This individual must be excluded from the community, being unworthy of the place where Yahweh dwells (vv. 20, 22).

It is probable that this reminder about ritual cleanness is added at this point to focus attention again on the community about to move forward on its journey to the land. This is a people among whom Yahweh dwells. Whether in the wilderness or in the land, only a ritually clean people is worthy of the presence of a holy God. Ritual cleanliness is, then, a sign of the people's fidelity to Yahweh.

Last Stops Along the Way (20:1–22:1)

20:1 Death of Miriam. After a long interval of struggles and rebellion, focus is again on the community encamped in the desert of Zin at Kadesh (v. 1a). This desert is part of the larger desert of Paran, from which the scouts were sent (see 10:12; 13:3, 21, 26). A sequence of events follows to mark the passage of time and the movement toward the land.

There is a brief note that Miriam died and was buried at Kadesh (v. 1b; see ch. 12 and Exod 15:20-21). This is a reminder that because of the people's rebellion an entire generation will pass away before Israel moves on to the Promised Land.

20:2-13 Moses and Aaron punished. In a retelling of the Meribah incident (v. 13; see Exod 17:2-7), an explanation is offered of why Moses and Aaron are denied entry into the land. The reason develops from the event of contention over water. (Meribah means "contention" or "controversy.") The people quarrel with Moses and Aaron and accuse them of bringing the community from Egypt, where there was plenty of food, to the wilderness, where there is not even water to drink (vv. 2-5). All Moses and Aaron can do is turn to Yahweh, who at that moment is revealed to them at the entrance of the meeting tent and speaks to them (vv. 6-7). Yahweh instructs Moses and Aaron to take the staff, to assemble the people, and, in the presence of the community, to order the rock to give forth water for all to drink (v. 8).

There is a significant difference between the older story and the incident as told here by the Priestly writer. In Exod 17:5-6 Moses is told to strike the rock with the staff. Here Yahweh commands Moses and Aaron to "order" the rock, that by a miraculous occurrence in the presence of all, the "sanctity" (holiness) of Yahweh might be shown (vv. 12-13; see Isa 29:23). The Hebrew words for "sanctity" and for "Kadesh," the place of the present controversy, derive from the same root (see v. 1). It is to hint at this association that the point of Yahweh's sanctity is stressed.

However, the staff becomes the object of disobedience. It is identified with the staff of Aaron, which was placed before the Lord in the sanctuary (v. 9; 17:16-26). Rather than doing exactly as Yahweh has commanded, Moses asks the community a question that suggests doubt and lack of faith: "Are we to bring water for you out of this rock?" (v. 10). Using the staff, Moses subsequently strikes the rock not once but twice. The rock issues enough water for all to drink (v. 11), though Moses did not "order" the rock as Yahweh had directed.

Tradition holds that this infidelity is the reason for Yahweh's decision that neither Aaron nor Moses would enter the land (v. 12; see v. 24 and Ps 106:32-33). It is unclear, however, whether the infidelity is a lack of faith or an act of disobedience. Perhaps the lack of clarity is intentional so that the people will remember both. This story is told near the end of the journey to prepare for the designation of new leaders as well as to supply a reason for the need for new leaders. (See Deut 1:37; 3:26 and 4:21-22 for another explanation of why Moses is denied entry into the Promised Land.)

20:14-21 Edom's refusal. The easiest passage from Kadesh across the southern tip of the Dead Sea would be through Edom and Moab. To do this and to avoid conflict, Moses sends messengers to the king of Edom requesting permission to pass peacefully through his land (v. 14a). Moses appeals to the kinship between the two peoples (v. 14b), since Edom/Esau and Israel/Jacob are twin ancestors of the nations (Gen 25:21-26; 32:4; 33:1-17). Moses recounts the history of how Yahweh has led the people from Egypt to this place in the wilderness near the edge of Edomite territory (vv. 15-16). He promises that the people will not disturb their fields or vineyards nor drink any of their water. They will pass through the district on the royal road without deviating right or left (vv. 17, 19). The royal road, sometimes called the King's Highway, was an ancient, frequently traveled caravan route through Edom (see 21:22; Deut 2:27).

Edom refuses Moses' request twice and threatens attack if Israel attempts passage (vv. 18, 20; see Amos 1:11-12). Israel is then forced to travel southward as far as Elath on the Gulf of Aqaba to skirt the territory of Edom and to penetrate from the eastern desert. This story, rooted as it is in the tradition of dissension between the brothers, gives an explanation for embarking on such a circuitous route.

20:22-29 Death of Aaron. Before beginning the trek southward, the whole community moves to Mount Hor, which is located a short distance north of Kadesh on the border of Edom (vv. 22-23).

Yahweh's word spoken (vv. 23-26) and fulfilled (vv. 27-28a) once again indicates divine direction in the course of events. The word is very simple and clear. Aaron is about to die (v. 24; see 33:37-39), in fulfillment of the word given in 20:12. God commands that Moses install Aaron's son Eleazar as priest in succession to his father by transferring the robe from Aaron to his son (vv. 25-26, 27a, 28a; see Exod 39:1-31 and Lev 8:7-9 for a description of the robes and the installation ceremony). When this has been done, Aaron dies on the mountain and the community mourns him for thirty days (v. 28b). Of the first generation, only Moses remains to lead the people toward the land. Later Moses will die on a mountain and will be mourned for a thirty-day period (see Deut 34:1, 5-8).

21:1-3 Victory over Arad. This story explains the name Hormah, which is related to a Hebrew word meaning "doomed" (v. 3b; see Judg 1:17). In an earlier report the Israelites had attempted to enter Canaan from the south on their own initiative. They were routed by the inhabitants and chased back to Hormah (see 14:39-45 and Deut 1:41-46). The successful attack by the Canaanite king is a detail continuing from this earlier story (v. 1). A change of events occurs, however, when the Israelites turn to the Lord with the vow to "doom their cities" if Yahweh will deliver the Canaanites into their hands (v. 2). Because of this vow, Israel destroys the defeated Canaanite cities and calls the place Hormah, the "doomed" place (v. 3).

This story seems out of place, for the Israelites, who are heading southward, must travel north to Hormah. In an old list there is allusion to the event after the death of Aaron (see 33:40). Because the Priestly writer used that list as the basis for the present narrative, the story of Hormah is told here regardless of the geographical problem created.

21:4-9 The bronze serpent. This is a very old story that explains why a bronze serpent stood in the temple of Jerusalem. This figure was destroyed in the time of Hezekiah because of the worship that grew up around it (see 2 Kgs 18:4). Because of its ability to regenerate itself the serpent symbolizes life and was used as a fertility symbol from ancient times.

As we have the story, it is told in the formalized pattern of rebellion-punishment-intercession-forgiveness that has been used a number of times (see 11:1-3; 12:2-16; 17:6-15; 21:4-9). Our attention is turned once again to a rebellious people. Though this is a new generation and though they are within range of entrance into the land, they complain against God and Moses (v. 5a). The people have no sooner set out from Mount Hor and upon the road south toward the Gulf of Aqaba than they lose patience (v. 4). The complaint once again centers on food and drink and a longing to return to Egypt (v. 5b).

Yahweh responds immediately with punishment by sending serpents that bite the people, resulting in a great number of deaths (v. 6). The people turn to Moses for help. They confess that they have sinned and ask Moses to pray that Yahweh will remove the serpents from them (v. 7). Moses intercedes for them and receives instructions for bringing about an end to the suffering. He does exactly as Yahweh commands. He makes a bronze serpent and raises it on a pole. Anyone who looks at the serpent recovers (vv. 8-9). The healing of the bites is linked to obedience and to faith. And, ironically, the healing comes from a source like that of the punishment.

For the last time in the wilderness, Israel rebels and is forgiven. As the new generation advances toward the land, they walk in the footsteps of their ancestors who perished on account of their rebellion.

21:10-20 Journey around Moab. A remarkable piece, made up of a series of place names interspersed with fragments of ancient poetry, hastens the journey toward the plains of Moab, where the next events will take place. The movement is from the Arabah, the region south of the Dead Sea, through the Jordan Valley. The people reach the Wadi Zered, the boundary between Edom and Moab (vv. 11-12). From there they push on to the Arnon, a river dividing the territory of Moab from that of the Amorites (v. 13). The Amorite kingdom lies between Moab and Ammon. It is this territory that Israel will have to traverse to reach the Jordan (see vv. 21-32). All the sites named in verses 16, 18b, 19-20, as far as is known, are on the east side of the Dead Sea. Nahaliel is a valley a short distance north of the Arnon, and Pisgah is one of the peaks overlooking the plain where the Jordan River enters the Dead Sea.

Within the travel schema, there are two pieces of poetry (vv. 14-15, 17-18). The first of these is said to be from the "Book of the Wars of the Lord" (v. 14). Though the book is unknown otherwise, it is probable that there once existed a collection of songs celebrating victories from the early days of the settlement. The poem is included because it mentions the Arnon and verifies that this river formed the border of Moab. The other poem is a traditional song celebrating the springing up of well-water when the well was first dug. It was added in this context because of the place name Beer, meaning "well," and because the gift of water at any site in the wilderness was celebrated as a gift from God (see v. 16).

21:21-32 Victory over Sihon. The Amorite kingdom, with its capital of Heshbon, is located between Moab and Ammon. Its ruler Sihon had warred against Moab and had taken the entire plateau of Moab between the Jabbok River on the north down to the Arnon River, and from the desert on the east to the Jordan River on the west (v. 26; see Judg 11:22). Possession of this territory would put Israel within reach of the Promised Land. The defeat of the Amorites is therefore the first of the conquest stories.

According to the text, Moses sends messengers ahead to request passage through the land on the royal road. The alert reader recognizes immediately that the request parallels exactly that made to the king of Edom (vv. 21-22; compare 20:14, 17). Scholars believe that the Heshbon tradition is the older and that the Edom text was modeled after it.

Sihon, king of the Amorites, denies the request and engages Israel in battle at Jahaz (Jahzah). Israel defeats the forces of Sihon and takes possession of the entire land between the Jabbok and Arnon Rivers up to the territory of the Ammonites (vv. 24-26, 31-32). So significant is this victory that gives Israel possession of Canaanite land that the tradition of it is recorded again in Deut 2:24-37 and Judg 11:19-22.

Linked with this victory narrative there is also an ancient poem in verses 27-30 celebrating the victory. What is interesting is that the poem is a non-Israelite composition of great antiquity. The reference to Chemosh (v. 29a), the god of the Moabites, and the statement that Moab and the people of Chemosh are taken captive by the Amorite king Sihon suggest that this is the poem originally sung in celebration of the Amorite victory over Moab. The poem was appropriated by the Israelites without alteration and included as a reminder that the conqueror is now the conquered. This poem is quoted once again in a prophetic word against Moab (see Jer 48:45).

21:33-22:1 Victory over Og. Because the names of the kings Sihon and Og are associated in the tradition (Pss 135:11; 136:19-20), the story of Og's defeat follows immediately upon that of Sihon's defeat.

Bashan is the Amorite territory north of the Jabbok River. A fuller description of the confrontation with Og, king of Bashan, is given in Deut 3:1-11. Verses 1-3 of the Deuteronomy speech of Moses form the substance of the Numbers narrative. It is told as a story of Yahweh's victory (v. 34; see Deut 3:2-3a). As a sign of total dedication to Yahweh, the population is destroyed and the land is inhabited by the Israelites (v. 35; compare Deut 3:3b-6). With this victory Israel has gained control of the entire region outside the limits of Ammon, Moab, and Edom. Israel is now in possession of the entire Canaanite land of the Transjordan, separated from Canaan proper only by the Jordan River.

An itinerary formula concludes the section to summarize the final movement to the plains of Moab (22:1; see the discussion on the journey formula on p. 146). All the remaining events in the book take place while the people remain encamped here. Moses will die and be buried here (Deut 34:1-8), and from here Joshua will lead the people forth (see 27:12-23 and Deut 34:9).

ON THE PLAINS OF MOAB: PREPARATIONS FOR LIFE IN THE LAND

Num 22:2–36:13

The long journey from Sinai has spanned an entire generation. The length of the sojourn in the wilderness and the denial of entry into the land to Moses and Aaron are understood to be the consequence of infidelity to Yahweh's word. The deaths of Miriam and Aaron mark the passage of time to a new generation of adults. The people who survived the wilderness finally arrive, under the leadership of Moses, on the plains of Moab. The whole of the third part of the Book of Numbers takes place in Moab and focuses on the future life in the land of promise.

The content of this section is a mixture of traditions collected by the Priestly school from a variety of sources spanning the history of the nation.

The story of Balaam (chs. 22–24), the account of the unfortunate incident at Shittim (ch. 25), and the Midianite polemic (ch. 31) are very old narratives incorporated by the Priestly author. These accounts retain their original lively narrative and poetic style and therefore stand out against the formalized language of the legislation (27:1-11; chs. 28–30, 32, 35, 36) and lists (chs. 26 and 33).

The primary objective of this material is preparation for the future, when Israel will organize itself as a worshiping community of faith centered on Yahweh's presence in its midst. Questions about territorial possession and issues pertinent to inheritance of property are settled prior to entry into the Promised Land to forestall quarrels and divisions within the community. Laws for the observance of the major feasts guarantee an ordered religious life. Stress upon obedience to Yahweh's word reminds Israel that it alone can turn away from the covenant relationship. Observance of the law and the cult makes possible Yahweh's dwelling in the midst of this people forever.

When putting together this material, the Priestly author is reflecting upon Israel's history for the instruction of a people who are once again in a wilderness of exile and looking to the day when they can reenter the land of promise and reorganize themselves as a community of faith.

Chapters 22–24 contain a remarkable narrative complex, made up of a legend about a foreign prophet and told as the basis for a series of oracles that express Yahweh's blessing on the people of God. The setting for the narrative is the arrival of the Israelites on the plains of Moab. Frightened by the presence of the Israelites so near his borders, Balak, the king of Moab, seeks out the prophet Balaam to utter a curse on Israel. Balaam, however, presents himself as a prophet who speaks nothing else but Yahweh's word and therefore becomes a hero and model for all generations of Israelites.

Yahweh's word for Israel is one of blessing. Each of the oracles presents Israel as a people of election who have been wondrously blessed in the past and who will be victorious and prosperous in the future. The oracles are told at this juncture because of their content, which foreshadows what Israel will become in the land and provides an example of a truly obedient individual who is radically dependent on God's word.

22:2-14 Balaam summoned. The narrative begins with the introduction of one of the main characters, Balak, the king of Moab. He fears the Israelite forces encamped so near his borders. This is the army that defeated the Amorites, the people who had earlier defeated Moab (vv. 2-3; see 21:26). The Israelites are a numerous people who "cover the face of the earth" and who have demonstrated their strength (v. 6a).

Balak sends messengers from Moab and from Midian (vv. 4, 7) to hire Balaam to curse this enemy in order to make victory over them possible (v. 6a). The aim of the curse is to create a situation that will make defeat of the Israelites possible, that is, remove the protection of their God. To curse is to set one god against another and thereby unleash the destructive forces of the enemy God (see Jer 10:25; Pss 35:4-8; 79:6-7; 2 Sam 18:32).

Why the Midianites, neighbors from the desert south of Moab, are involved with Balak raises questions. Perhaps they are named here for the sake of continuity with the Peor and Midian incidents that follow, both of which are linked with Balaam in 31:8 and 16.

As the story goes, Balak involves Midian by pointing out the devastation of which Israel is capable, using the striking metaphor "as an ox devours the grass of the field" (v. 4). They seek out a foreigner, a reputed seer from the Euphrates valley in Mesopotamia, to utter a curse (v. 5a). This prophet, Balaam by name, is known to speak the word of God so effectively that Balak can be certain of the power of his word: "For I know that whoever you bless is blessed and whoever you curse is cursed" (v. 6b). Prophets such as Balaam were known in many of the countries of the ancient world from very early times. He can be compared to the earlier prophets of Israel, such as Samuel and Elijah, who were respected for their powerful word from God.

Following this introduction, there is a series of scenes that feature the prophet. In the first scene, verses 7-14, the messengers, with fee in hand, visit Balaam in his own territory (v. 7). From the perspective of those who solicit the prophet, Balaam is one of the diviners who deliver a message for pay. When a seer is paid for his services, as one would expect, he is more likely to utter words that the client wants to hear.

The response that the messengers receive for their offer, however, shows Balaam to be of a different disposition. He is a man who speaks only the word of Yahweh, regardless of the consequences and without reward. The messengers and the reader ought to take notice, for this Balaam, a foreigner from Mesopotamia, names Yahweh as the source of his word. Right from the start Balaam identifies himself as a prophet attentive to the God of the people upon whom Balak is seeking a curse. The stage is set for each of the scenes that follow.

Balaam invites the messengers to stay the night that he might inquire of Yahweh what to do (v. 8). The reader is privy to the conversation that takes place between God and Balaam. God asks Balaam to identify his visitors (v. 9). Obviously, these are individuals unknown to the God of Israel. Balaam answers by restating the request sent from Balak (vv. 10-11; compare vv. 5-6). God tells Balaam not to go with the messengers and not to curse the Israelites, because "they are blessed" (v. 12). This statement is the crux of the narrative. Because Yahweh has "blessed" this people, they are blessed; no word of curse will come upon them. The word "blessed" identifies Israel as a people to whom a unique identity has been given. The repetition of the phrase "out of Egypt" in this section (vv. 5, 11) points to the Exodus event as the foundation for Israel's life, the covenant relationship that unites Yahweh and Israel. Because of this unique relationship, Israel is blessed with greatness, prosperity, and the presence of Yahweh in their midst (vv. 3, 5, 11).

The telling point is that Balaam acts according to God's direction. His response to the invitation of the messengers is that Yahweh has refused to let him go (v. 13). He thus presents himself as a prophet who is faithful to the word spoken to him.

When the messengers report back to Balak, they do not mention that Balaam sought direction from Yahweh but say only that Balaam refused to come back with them (v. 14).

22:15-20 Second appeal to Balaam. Once again Balak sends messengers to Balaam. This time they are more numerous and more distinguished (v. 15). They entice Balaam with the promise of a handsome reward and anything he desires if he will come and put a curse on the Israelites (vv. 16-17).

Balaam's response indicates his total dependence on God's word in every instance. He says that regardless of what Balak will give him, "I could not do anything, small or great, contrary to the command of the Lord, my God" (v. 18). This warning given, Balaam inquires once again what Yahweh will command him (v. 19). That night, God comes to Balaam, gives him permission to accompany the messengers, and cautions him to do exactly as he is told (v. 20).

The focus of the narrative is Balaam's dependence at each step on word from Yahweh. God had earlier directed Balaam not to go; now Balaam is told that he may go. Earlier Yahweh had told Balaam not to curse this people; now Yahweh's word is simply "do exactly as I tell you" (v. 20).

22:21-35 The talking ass. An independent fable that is awkwardly fitted into the narrative follows. God has just told Balaam to go, but when Balaam goes off with the princes, God is angry at him for going (vv. 21-22a). At the end God again tells Balaam to go and to speak only what Yahweh tells him (v. 35). This is a return to the theme of the narrative. Within these literary parameters, a once independent fable about a talking ass is inserted to heighten the sense of the prophet's need to be attentive to Yahweh's direction.

According to the fable, Balaam travels from his home to an unnamed location. Because this journey is in opposition to what God has told him, an "angel of the Lord" blocks his way. Three times the ass sees the angel and responds appropriately; and three times Balaam beats the ass to force it to continue the journey (vv. 23-27). Only the ass sees what the seer does not see; it responds to the angel sent to prevent Balaam from continuing on a road that is contrary to God's intention.

In the next scene the animal and Balaam converse as if it were perfectly normal for them to be talking. The ass asks why Balaam has beaten it three times and points out that it has never before treated Balaam this way and would not this time had there not been a reason (vv. 28-30). The implication seems to be that Balaam ought to have trusted the perception of the animal against his own.

Then the seer sees what only the animal has previously seen. Balaam falls to his knees and bows to the ground before the angel of God (v. 31). The angel rebukes Balaam for his treatment of the animal and explains to him that the way is blocked because his journey is contrary to Yahweh's designs (vv. 32-33; see the use of this in 2 Pet 2:15-16). Balaam confesses that he has sinned and resolves to return to his home (v. 34).

The fable shows a Balaam who tries to act contrary to Yahweh's word. Yahweh, however, intervenes to reverse the action. This negative tradition about Balaam was one often remembered and restated to demonstrate the action of God for good (see Deut 23:5b-6; Josh 24:9-10; Mic 6:5; Neh 13:2).

22:36-40 Balaam arrives. The third scene in the narrative reports the first direct meeting between King Balak and Balaam. When Balak hears that Balaam is coming, he goes to the Arnon, the river separating Moab from the Israelites, to meet the prophet (v. 36). His greeting is more of a chiding that Balaam did not come promptly when summoned. Balak reminds the prophet that the rewards would be great (v. 37).

As an apology for his initial refusal, Balaam explains that he can speak only what God puts in his mouth (v. 38). Balaam's answer picks up the theme of the legend and further clarifies the prophet's dependence on Yahweh. The king hears for himself what Balaam has said about the source of his word, but he does not understand the implication of Balaam's reliance on Yahweh, the God of the Israelites.

The scene concludes with the king's sacrifice of animals, portions of which are sent to Balaam and those with him. Each of the oracles about to be spoken is delivered at a different site where animals have been sacrificed. The change of sacrificial scene separates one oracle from another.

22:41–23:12 The first oracle. Balak and Balaam go to Bamoth-baal, the high places of Baal, from which they can see some of the clans of Israel (22:41). Balaam there orders Balak to prepare seven altars and to offer sacrifice on each (23:1-2), the usual way to implore a deity. The prophet leaves Balak beside the altar, however, and goes aside to seek Yahweh. He announces to the king that if Yahweh meets him, he will report whatever Yahweh lets him see. God does meet him, "puts an utterance in [his] mouth," and tells him to go back to Balak and to speak the word (vv. 3-6).

In prophetic tradition the words "see" and "hear" (23:3; 24:4, 16) are often interchanged to express the means by which Yahweh's word is received (see Isa 1:1; 2:1; 13:1; Amos 1:1; Mic 1:1). Some of the prophets were visionaries who spoke the word out of the visions given to them (see Isa 6:1-13; Amos 7:1-3, 4-6, 7-9; 8:1-3; 9:1-6; Ezek 1-3).

Balaam returns to the altar, where he had left Balak and the princes, (v. 6) and speaks the oracle Yahweh has put in his mouth (vv. 7-10). While the oracle does not contain an explicit word of blessing, Balaam does not curse Israel: "How can I curse whom God has not cursed?" (v. 8). The oracle stresses that Israel is a people that lives apart from the nations; they are a unique people because they are Yahweh's own (v. 9). They are a people so numerous that they cannot be counted; they are like "dust" or "wind-borne particles" (v. 10a). This greatness is a sign of the blessing promised to Israel (see Gen 13:16; 28:14). Balaam ends the oracle by invoking a blessing on himself, that he and his descendants may be given such increase as Israel has received under God's blessing (v. 10b).

Balak is understandably distressed by Balaam's oracle (v. 11). Balaam retorts with a reminder that he can repeat only what Yahweh has put into his mouth (v. 21). Thus, Balaam consistently presents himself as one who depends totally on Yahweh for each word he will speak.

23:13-26 The second oracle. Balak and Balaam move to another site, the top of Pisgah (see 21:20), from which some of the Israelites can be viewed. There they prepare seven altars and offer sacrifice in anticipation of the curse (vv. 13-14). The circumstances of this meeting are told in the same pattern as the previous attempt to secure a curse.

The prophet tells the king to remain by his sacrifice while he goes apart for a meeting (v. 15). Yahweh meets Balaam once again, puts an utterance in his mouth, and sends the prophet back to Balak to speak accordingly (v. 16). Upon his return to Balak and the princes standing near the sacrifice, it is the king who names Yahweh as the source of the prophet's word: "What did the Lord say?" (v. 17). In answer, Balaam delivers the oracle of blessing on Israel.

When seeking oracles, it was the practice to persist until a favorable word was received. Balak does this, because he does not appreciate Yahweh's relationship with Israel. The Moabite king has no realization that Yahweh is a God who will never "change his mind" (v. 19). Yahweh has blessed Israel and the word given to Balaam to speak will always be a word of blessing (v. 20). No harm can come to Jacob/Israel because Yahweh-God, its King, is with it (v. 21). Israel's God has brought this people from Egypt, and the wonders that God will yet do on Israel's behalf cannot be imagined (vv. 22-23).

Two metaphors describe the nation of which Yahweh is an ally. Israel is called "a wild bull of towering might" (v. 22b), an animal with horns capable of goring the most powerful of enemies (compare Deut 33:17). And Israel has the strength of the "lioness" and the "lion," which do not rest until they have devoured their prey (v. 24; compare Gen 49:9; Mic 5:7). The oracle is a clear warning that Israel, supported by the power of Yahweh, can easily defeat Moab or any other nation.

After this oracle the king shows impatience with Balaam. He tells the prophet that if he cannot curse Israel, at least he should not bless it (v. 25). Rather than diminishing Israel's strength, Balaam has instead acclaimed the union between Israel and Yahweh, the source of its power and might.

Balaam's explanation shows once again why the narrative is told: Balaam is a man who "must do all that the Lord tells him" (v. 26). In this the prophet exemplifies a characteristic that is desirable for all Israel.

23:27–24:13 The third oracle. Though two attempts to secure a curse have been unsuccessful, Balak tries one more time. The pair move to the top of Peor and prepare a sacrifice on seven altars as before (23:27-30). This time, however, Balaam does not leave the king in order to inquire of Yahweh; he sees Yahweh's blessing on Israel immediately (24:1). Balaam stands forth, with the Israelite tribes in view, and the spirit of God comes upon him (v. 2). To say that the "spirit of God" comes upon someone is to ascribe to the recipient the onrush of power from God. Balaam is like other great figures through whom Yahweh acted for Israel, such as the judges (see Judg 3:10; 6:34; 14:6, 19); the prophets (see 1 Sam 10:10; Mic 3:8); and the kings (see 1 Sam 10:6, 10; 11:6; 2 Sam 23:2).

Balaam's oracle comes from one who sees the truth, because what the prophet sees and hears is Yahweh's word given to him (vv. 3-4).

The oracle emphasizes once again the strength and vitality of the Israelites. It speaks of the fullness of Israel's blessing and the power, prosperity, and life that flow from that blessing. So many and great are the tents of this nation that they are compared to the abundance of well-watered gardens and to the strength of the mighty cedars (vv. 5-6). There will be no end to their prosperity: their wells will flow with water; they will possess the lands all the way to the sea; and their king will dominate all others (vv. 6-7). Israel is described in its greatness, the result of the blessing promised to Abraham (Gen 12:2-3) and fulfilled in its becoming a nation (2 Sam 7–8).

On account of the covenant relationship rooted in the deliverance from Egypt (v. 8a), Israel has a vitality that can be compared to that of a wild bull that devours the nations like grass (v. 8b; compare 23:22) and to that of a lion and a lioness stalking their prey (v. 9a; compare 23:24). The message to Israel's neighbors is that this people is blessed because it is the people of Yahweh. For the nations to affirm the blessing would be to accept Yahweh as God and therefore come under the promise of blessing themselves. This would fulfill the promise "Blessed is he who blesses you, and cursed is he who curses you" (v. 9b; see Gen 12:3a). Because the king of Moab is intent on cursing Israel, the consequence for his nation is certain defeat.

Balak is extremely angry that Balaam has blessed Israel three times and dismisses him without reward and with the remark that the Lord is responsible for withholding the reward (v. 11), as if to ridicule Balaam because he obediently spoke God's word and did not try to earn a rich reward and honor by manipulating the word. To the end, Balaam is unmoved in his purpose. Remuneration does not matter, as he told the messengers earlier (v. 12; see 22:18). His sole motivation is to do what the Lord commands and to say what the Lord puts in his mouth (v. 13). Only one thing matters to him—not pleasing the host, not wealth nor honor, but only doing and saying what Yahweh commands.

24:14-25 The fourth oracle. Before going on his way, Balaam speaks an unsolicited word that announces Israel's ultimate victory over the peoples of the region. This is a most magnificent oracle spoken on the word of Yahweh (vv. 15-16), the culmination of the series of oracles. It promises the future rise of the nation—a "star" and "staff" from Jacob/Israel (v. 17a). These symbols for rulers and kings point to the Davidic monarchy (see Gen 49:10). The empire will include Moab and Edom, the peoples who denied Israel passage through their lands (vv. 17b-19; 20:14-21; 21:10-20; compare 2 Sam 8:11-12). The oracle proper ends at this point with the announcement of the defeat of the nations.

The oracle is expanded with a series of sayings that begin in the same way: "Upon seeing _____, Balaam gave voice" (vv. 20a, 21a, 23a). These sayings attack other nations that threatened Israel at various times throughout its history. "Amalek" (v. 20b) refers to the wandering tribes of the deserts of Sinai, who were traditionally the most hated of Israel's enemies. The Israelites faced the Amalekites when they first came from Egypt (Exod 17:8-13; Deut 25:17-19) and again as they sought to enter (14:43-45) and settle the land (Judg 3:12-13; 6:3, 33; 7:12; 10:12). The Amalekites were defeated under Saul (1 Sam 14:48; 15:2-9) and again under David (1 Sam 30:1-20; 2 Sam 8:12).

The reason why the Kenites are named among the enemy nations is not certain, for according to tradition the Kenites are ancestors of Moses (see Judg 1:16 and 4:11). The tradition also states that the Kenites lived among the Amalekites (see 1 Sam 15:6 and Judg 1:16). It is probable that because of their association with the worst of Israel's enemies, they face the defeat described in the oracle (v. 22). The first line of the oracle, verse 21b, obscure as it is in meaning, contains the words "smith" and "nest," both of which play on the sound of "Kenite" in the Hebrew. The poetic value carries more importance than the meaning.

Finally, the Ishmaelites, descendants of Abraham and the maidservant Hagar (Gen 16 and 21), are named among the enemies to be defeated (v. 23b; see Gen 16:12). The Ishmaelites, who dwelt in the wilderness of Paran (Gen 21:20-21), were scattered throughout the land from Egypt to Asshur (Gen 25:18), among the other neighboring foes (see Ps 83:7-8).

The victors in this case will not be the Israelites but rather the Kittim, who will also defeat Asshur (the Assyrians and Eber), the patronymic ancestor of the region that Abraham left for the land of promise (see Gen 10:21-25). "Kittim" is the name given to the people who settled the island of Cyprus (Isa 23:1, 12; Jer 2:10; Ezek 27:6). The Kittim were no doubt the Sea Peoples, the Philistines, who invaded lands along the Mediterranean Sea, including Canaan and that of other enemies of Israel. Reference here to the victories of the Philistines looks to their future role as provocateurs in the rise of the empire (see 1 Sam 4–6; 2 Sam 5:17-25) and their defeat by Israel: "He too shall perish forever" (v. 24b; Josh 13:2-3; 2 Sam 5:17-25; 8:12).

All the oracles, even those appended, are directed to the defeat of Israel's enemies and to the rise of Israel as a great nation. The oracles are fittingly recited at the moment of Israel's arrival on the plains of Moab to project from this place to the future possession of the land. The entire emphasis in the remainder of the book is on Israel's future life in the land. Even Balaam, as he is cast in this tradition, serves as a model for living faithfully by the word of God. As Balaam obeyed Yahweh's word, the result was blessing, and such is promised to an obedient Israel.

Chapter 25 contains two stories, verses 1-5 and 6-13, that have as their setting a place near the Promised Land. Both involve women, and both tell about Israelite infidelity and consequent punishment. These stories function as a foreshadowing of life as it will be when Israel enters the land (see Judg 2:10-23). They immediately follow the oracles of blessing to illustrate that the blessing is not automatic but rather is dependent on fidelity to the covenant relationship between Yahweh and Israel.

25:1-5 Worship of Baal of Peor. Ironically, what Balak was unable to do to Israel by curse, the people do themselves. Balak had hoped that the curse would effect vulnerability and destruction, the results of separation from God. This narrative recounts how the people turn from God and unleash upon themselves the anger of God and the punishment of death.

The incident takes place at Shittim (v. 1a; 33:49), the very place from which the Israelites would later depart to cross the Jordan into Canaan (see Josh 2:1; 3:1). The people have relations with the Moabite women, sacrifice to their gods, and eat the sacrifices (vv. 1b-2). This description suggests that the people took part in the fertility rites of Canaanite religion. The fertility god Baal was appeased by sexual acts and sacrifice in an attempt to guarantee productivity of the soil and procreation. These practices proved especially tempting to Israel in the Promised Land (see Hos 2:10, 15; 4:14) and were expressive of Israel's rejection of Yahweh (see Judg 2:13; 3:7; Deut 6:12-14; 7:5; 8:19, etc.). There were high places for Baal worship throughout the land. The name Baal of Peor refers simply to one of these places at Peor (v. 3a).

To turn to another god is to reject Yahweh and to arouse the anger of Yahweh, who is a jealous God (see Deut 4:24; 5:9; 6:15; Exod 20:5; 34:14-15). Because the people have indeed turned from Yahweh, Moses is commanded to have the leaders execute the guilty ones in the sight of the whole community (vv. 4-5). The usual punishment for violation of covenant unity is public hanging with the breaking of the bones (see 2 Sam 21:6, 9, 13). The word used for this punishment means also to alienate one from another (Jer 6:8; Exod 23:17-18). Thus, the consequence of alienation between covenant partners is the alienation of the members in the body.

25:6-15 Zeal of Phinehas. The second story carries the theme of infidelity and punishment, but its primary point of interest is the legitimation of the Zadokite priesthood, which claims descent from Eleazar through Phinehas (see Exod 6:25; 1 Chr 24:3a; 2 Sam 8:17).

There is no connection with the event at Peor, and parts of the story seem to be missing. The people are weeping at the entrance of the meeting tent (v. 6b), and a slaughter of Israelites is in process (v. 8b). There is no explicit mention of a plague, the usual punishment for sin, though it is certainly implied. And the nature of the sin is unclear. The story fragment tells only that an Israelite has brought a Midianite woman into the camp (v. 6a) and that when Phinehas, the grandson of Aaron, sees this, he pierces the two of them with his sword, thereby appeasing God's wrath (v. 11). To put the deed of Phinehas in bold relief, the names of both the man and the woman appear in the text, along with their ancestry. Both individuals were of noble descent (vv. 14-15).

The action of Phinehas gains him a reputation for zealousness for God's honor (v. 11; see Sir 45:23-24), and succession to the priesthood. Yahweh's word to Moses is a pledge of friendship with Phinehas and his descendants that bestows on them special rights (vv. 12-13; see the story of the Levites in Exod 32:25-29).

The presence of the Phinehas story in Numbers reflects the struggles among the groups of priests for position and power after the Exile. Though the Zadokite priesthood, descended from Phinehas, dominated from the time of the early monarchy, its position needs to be secured once again as the community looks forward to reestablishing itself in the land.

25:16-18 Vengeance on the Midianites. An appendix to the stories serves to knit the two preceding incidents together by claiming that the Midianite woman was responsible for the infidelity at Peor and by linking her death and the slaughter of the Israelites with the infidelity at Peor (v. 18).

This is the work of the Priestly author, who has another purpose in mind—to explain why the Midianites have become such enemies (v. 16), though traditionally they were friends and even related to Moses' wife (see 10:29). The continuation of this piece and the execution of the curse on the Midianites will follow in 31:1-18.

26:1-51 The second census. The Priestly writer links the new census with the narrative by referring to the slaughter (25:18b and 25:8-9), though the census is not the result of that punishment. Because a whole generation of Israelites perished in the wilderness, so that not one of those named in the first census remained except Caleb and Joshua, Yahweh orders Moses and Eleazar, who has succeeded Aaron (20:22-29), to take a register of those about to enter the land. This census takes place while the people are camped along the Jordan on the plains of Moab, in anticipation of entry into the land (v. 2; see v. 63).

The heading of the listing, those "who came out of the land of Egypt" (v. 4b), can be misleading. It is intended to show that the second census parallels and replaces the first taken at Sinai (compare 1:1, 19a).

The criteria for those registered are the same as for the first census. The count includes the men of twenty years or more who are fit for military service; they are listed by their father's lineage (vv. 2, 4; see 1:2-3, 18). The order of the tribes is the same as in the first census (1:20-43), except for Manasseh, who is listed before Ephraim (v. 28; compare 1:32-35). In this second list the individual clans are also named to emphasize the tribal structure, size, and ancestry in the postexilic time. (There are other lists of clans in Gen 46:8-25 and 1 Chr 2 with variations that reflect fluctuations in structure at different times in history.)

The purpose of the census list, as it is given here, is to determine the proportionate size of each group in preparation for the land assignment that will follow (vv. 52-56). A comparison between the numbers in the two lists reveals that while the totals do not differ dramatically—601,730 in 26:51 and 603,550 in 1:46—there is a marked change in the strength of individual tribes. Five tribes—Reuben, Simeon, Gad, Ephraim, and Naphtali—have decreased in size; and Simeon, which was the third largest in the first census (1:23), is now the smallest (v. 14). The greatest increase is registered by Manasseh (v. 34; compare 1:35), a fact that accounts for the transposition in order between it and Ephraim (v. 28; compare 1:32, 34). Judah holds its position as the largest of the tribes in both lists (v. 22; compare 1:27).

The list is made more interesting by the commentary in verses 9-11. This elaboration is placed here to account for the loss of particular clans. Dathan and Abiram (v. 9) perished because of their rebellion, as did the sons of Korah (see ch. 16). The reminder that not all the descendants of Korah died (v. 11) reflects a later period when the sons of Korah were active as singers (see the headings to Pss 42, 44-49, 84, 85, 87). The mention in verse 19 of the death of Er and Onan, sons of Judah, has the same effect. The loss of these clans is called to memory because they failed to abide by God's law. That story is told in Gen 38:6-10.

An opposite problem, the possibility of the extinction of a clan, is the reason for the comment on Zelophehad in verse 33. It states that this individual, the head of a clan, has five daughters but no sons. The problem that arises when there are only female heirs is dealt with in 27:1-11 and chapter 36.

26:52-56 Allotment of the land. The census is taken in preparation for the distribution of the land. Two principles upon which the allocation will be based are stated in this legislation. The land will be apportioned in accord with the size of the tribe (vv. 53-54); and the land will be distributed by lot (v. 55). A summary legislation attempts to reconcile the two principles by combining the two methods (v. 56; 33:54). The summary combines the human element of tribal size and the divine element of lot.

26:57-62 Census of the Levites. A separate census is taken of the Levites, just as it was earlier (3:17-39). The criterion for their numbering, as in the first census, is the time of their birth (v. 62a; see the commentary on 3:14-39). However, they are numbered separately in the first census because of their consecration for the service of the sanctuary (1:47-54); here it is because they receive no land for a heritage (v. 62b). This census is taken in preparation for the assignment of cities and land where the Levites might dwell in the land given to the tribes as a heritage (see 35:1-8).

The groups of Levites named in verse 57 are the traditional three: Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. They are listed here as the heads of clans rather than simply as the sons of Levi (compare 3:17) to emphasize that it is their descendants who will live in the assigned cities. The clans named in verse 58 are only five from the list given in 3:17-20. We can only speculate that these five Levitic clans were more prominent at the time this was written.

The ancestry of Amram, a descendant of Kohath, is traced in detail because from this line came Moses, Aaron, and Miriam (vv. 59-60; see Exod 6:20). Only the family of Aaron (v. 60) is given further mention. Recollection of the death of Nadab and Abihu accounts the loss of these families to their infidelity (v. 61; see 3:4; Lev 10:1-5) and indirectly points to Eleazar and Ithamar as the sole successors in the priestly line.

26:63-65 Census completed. A summary statement announces the completion of the census on the plains of Moab, as if to bring the reader once again to an awareness that the people are in readiness on the threshold of the land (v. 63). Those who are registered are the new generation who grew up in the wilderness while waiting for the death of their parents. They, together with Caleb and Joshua, were spared the judgment (v. 65; see 14:28-35).

27:1-11 Inheritance by daughters. This passage contains a legal question for which there is no solution in existing legislation. The matter, therefore, must be brought before the leaders of the community (v. 2), who in turn seek direction from Yahweh (v. 5). We have come across other such cases in 9:6-14 and 15:32-36. Each provides an example of new instruction for a specific situation, becoming a precedent for subsequent practice.

The case in point concerns the five daughters of Zelophehad of the tribe of Manasseh (v. 1; see 26:33), who are the sole descendants of their father. In ordinary circumstances the family land passes to the sons, who alone have the right to retain it and the family name. The daughters argue that their father's name will be dropped from the tribe just because he has no sons. With no male members to inherit the land, there will be no land ownership in the family, and the family name will no longer exist in the community. The daughters ask that they might inherit the land and thus keep alive their father's heritage and name (v. 4). Their argument is persuasive. They stress that though their father died in the desert, his death was not related to the judgment on Korah (16:16-24, 35). He died "for his own sin," which is to say that he came under the general judgment on rebellious Israel (see 14:26-35). There is, therefore, no reason that their father's name should be blotted out.

Moses' decision first answers the request of the daughters and then gives new general legislation pertinent to inheritance. The case is decided in favor of the daughters: they receive their father's inheritance and a place within the family by virtue of their inheritance (v. 7). The general legislation that follows provides that the family heritage be retained within the family even though there are no children (vv. 8-11a). The property never passes to the wife. If there are no sons, the land passes to the daughters in the family (v. 8); if there are no daughters, it is given to the man's brothers (v. 9), uncles (v. 10), or the nearest surviving relative in the clan (v. 11a). The legal norm stipulates that the land be retained in the family in the father's line (v. 11b) to ensure that no property is lost to a particular tribe, thus unbalancing the tribal holdings.

This particular legislation is of significance at this place in the narrative because the land in question belongs to the half-tribe of Manasseh that will settle in the Transjordan (v. 1; compare 32:39-42). The issue of land inheritance by the daughters of Zelophehad settles a territorial claim to land that will be assigned prior to crossing over the Jordan.

27:12-22 Joshua to succeed Moses. The time of Moses' leadership is drawing to a close. The scene patterns that of the death of Aaron in 20:22-26. Moses is told to go into the Abarim Mountains (v. 12) to Nebo, the place of his death, to view the Promised Land (see Deut 32:48-52; 33:47; 34:1-6). Before his death Moses is reminded that he is deprived of the land because of his infidelity in the wilderness (v. 14a). Mention of "the water of Meribah of Kadesh" (v. 14b) is meant to trigger memory of the incident. It involved a "contention" (Meribah) over water during which Moses was instructed to manifest Yahweh's "sanctity" (Kadesh) by commanding the water to come forth (see 20:2-13).

Moses' last concern is to provide a capable successor to lead the people. Addressing Yahweh as "God of the spirits of all," a title for the Creator (see also 16:22), Moses asks Yahweh to preserve the life of the nation by choosing a new leader for it (v. 16). This leader will, literally, "go out and come in," "lead out and bring in" the people, as a shepherd leads the sheep (v. 17). The role of the leader, though in succession to Moses, will be a new one. That is why Moses calls upon the Creator to bring about a new thing. The phrases "go out and come in," "lead out and in" are technical language for political and military leadership (see 1 Sam 18:13, 16; 29:6; Josh 14:10b-11; 1 Kgs 3:7), as is the shepherd reference (1 Kgs 22:17; Ezek 34:5-6; Zech 10:2-3; 11:8; 13:7). The successor to Moses will lead the people in the conquest battles and in the settlement of the land.

The man chosen for this task is Joshua, son of Nun, a man of spirit who has already demonstrated his God-given abilities for leadership (see 11:28; 14:6, 30, 38; compare Deut 34:9).

The commissioning ceremony has the effect of distinguishing the role of priest from that of political leader. Joshua stands in the presence of Eleazar the priest and the whole community (vv. 19, 22), where Moses lays his hands on him (v. 18), a sign of passing his authority on to his successor (v. 20). Joshua, however, is unlike Moses, who received instruction directly from the Lord (see 12:6-8). Joshua will seek direction through the priest, who will use the sacred lots, the Urim and Thummim, to obtain the Lord's decision (v. 21; see Deut 33:8; Exod 28:30).

In his commissioning, Joshua receives authority from Moses that the people might obey him (v. 20b); but in all other respects Joshua's role is different. The transition in leadership stresses the uniqueness of Moses' role in all of Israelite history; it also traces the distinction between the priestly and political powers to the time of Joshua. This last was a matter of particular concern in the time after the Exile (see Zech 6:12-13; 4:14; Ezek 45:17; 46:2).

Moses carries out the commissioning of Joshua exactly as Yahweh commanded him (vv. 22-23). The provision of a successor is complete and Moses' death is expected. The account of the death is separated, however, in the structure of the document so that Moses might complete the instruction of the people. All of the final legislation is thus attributed to Moses. The report of Moses' death is found in Deut 32:48-52 and 34:1-9.

Chapters 28–29 contain the regulations for public sacrificial worship to be carried out by the community in the land. The emphasis is on worship by the community as a whole and deals with daily, weekly, monthly, and yearly observances. These are regulations that the priests gathered in this one place and attributed to Moses. A comparable, though less detailed, list of observances is found in Lev 23.

28:1-2 General sacrifices. This introduction stipulates that at designated times food offerings will be presented to God. Burned upon the altar, they produce an odor pleasing to the Lord. The language speaks figuratively of God actually delighting in the aroma of the food presented. A "sweet-smelling oblation" is a metaphor for an acceptable sacrifice.

28:3-8 Each morning and evening. The morning and evening food offerings consist of two yearling lambs, one offered in the morning and one in the evening (vv. 3-4), along with a cereal offering (v. 5) and a drink offering (v. 7). The wine is poured out around the altar and the food is completely burned upon the altar as a sign of full dedication to the Lord. This oblation is the required regular communal offering and the basic sacrifice to which all other offerings are added. As such, it was legislated at Sinai (see Exod 29:38-42). Reference to this Sinai tradition is made in verse 6.

28:9-10 On the sabbath. To set the sabbath day apart from all others, a food offering of lambs, cereal, and wine is presented in addition to the regular oblations. Thus, the sabbath offering is double that of a weekday.

28:11-15 At the feast of the New Moon. In the ancient calendar the day of the new moon marks a new beginning and is treated as a festival day. A sacrifice of greater quantity is required. In addition to the regular food offerings for each day (v. 15b), the sacrifice for this festive occasion consists of two bullocks, a ram, and seven lambs (v. 11), with proportionate amounts of cereal and wine for each of the animals (vv. 12-14; see the commentary on 5:1-16). In addition, a goat is sacrificed as a sin offering (v. 15). The offerings listed here are the usual oblations for all solemn occasions.

28:16-25 At the Passover. The feast of the Passover is celebrated on the fourteenth day of the first month of the year (v. 16; see 9:1-5 and Exod 12:2, 18); and the following day, called the feast of Unleavened Bread, is the beginning of the seven-day period during which only unleavened bread is eaten (v. 17). The first and seventh days of this week are sacred occasions for assembly when no work is done (vv. 18, 25). On each of the seven days the oblation appropriate for solemn festivals is offered (vv. 19-22; see vv. 11-15 above). This is in addition to the food offering required for each day (vv. 23-24).

28:26-31 At Pentecost. Seven weeks after the feast of Passover, the grain harvest is celebrated. Gifts of the harvested first fruits are brought to the temple as an offering (v. 26a; see Lev 23:9-22). This day is a sacred occasion on which no work may be done (v. 26b). The acceptable sacrifice for this solemn festival consists of the prescribed food offerings and sin offering for all such feasts (vv. 27-30; compare vv. 19-22, 11-15). These offerings are made in addition to the offerings required each day (v. 31).

29:1-6 On New Year's Day. The first day of the seventh month, also an occasion of the New Moon (see 28:11-15), marks the beginning of the New Year. This solemn feast is sometimes called the feast of Trumpets, because on it the trumpet is sounded (v. 1c; see the commentary on 10:1-10). No work is permitted on this sacred occasion (v. 1b), and the prescribed oblations for all such festivals are offered, except that only one bullock, rather than the usual two, is prescribed (vv. 2-5; see 28:11-15). That the offerings for the occasion are in addition to the oblations required for the monthly New Moon and for the daily offering (v. 6) accounts for the change in the number of animals required.

29:7-11 On the Day of Atonement. The tenth day in the same month as New Year's Day (v. 7a; compare v. 1) is the Day of Atonement, a day of fasting and self-denial. No work may be done on this day (v. 7b). The offering is the same as on New Year's Day, with one less animal (v. 8; compare v. 2) and the usual cereal (vv. 9-10) and sin offerings (v. 11a). The prescribed offerings for this day are in addition to that required for the atonement sin offering (v. 11b; see Lev 16 for the ritual of the scapegoat).

29:12-39 On the Feast of Booths. Exactly six months after Passover and the seven-day pilgrimage of Unleavened Bread, Israel celebrates another feast that lasts for eight days (v. 12; compare 28:16-17). The first and last days are sacred occasions on which no work is permitted (vv. 12, 35). This is a joyous celebration of the harvest, with pilgrimage and great sacrifices. On this day Israel remembers the time spent in the wilderness (see Lev 23:39-43).

The required food offerings for each day of the festival are listed in detail. On the first day thirteen bullocks, two rams, and fourteen yearling lambs are offered (v. 13). On each subsequent day the number of bulls decreases by one, while the number of other animals remain the same (vv. 17, 20, 23, 26, 29, 32). The proportionate offerings of cereal and drink accompany each animal sacrifice each day, and the sin offering is sacrificed each day in addition to the usual offerings required for every day (v. 16). On the eighth day (vv. 35-38) the prescribed sacrifice is the same as that required for the other festivals celebrated in the seventh month—New Year's (vv. 2-5) and the Day of Atonement (vv. 8-10).

The final comment in verse 39 concludes the whole of chapters 28–29. It is a reminder that the listing of offerings is the required sacrifice for each occasion. Individuals, however, may make offerings over and above these in accord with their own ability and desire.

30:1-17 Validity and annulment of vows. The total obedience of Moses is stressed with the comment in verse 1. It is placed here as a reminder that the regulations before and after must be obeyed by the faithful worshiping community.

This section deals only with the question of when vows or pledges made to God are binding. This legislation on vows clarifies a matter of authority and is, therefore, addressed to the heads of the tribes (v. 2).

A male person, having full authority, is always responsible for his own actions and must therefore fulfill the vow or pledge he makes (v. 3). A female person, on the other hand, has no authority of herself; she is dependent on her father before marriage and on her husband after marriage (see v. 17). Only a widow or a divorced woman, both of whom fall among the disenfranchised, retain responsibility for their own actions (v. 10). All other women come under the authority of men. The regulations in this chapter ensure that a woman will do nothing that might divest the family of property or progeny, the rights to which are retained by the male members. For example, a woman might vow a child to God (see 1 Sam 1:11), or make a pledge that would result in the loss of possessions.

The legislation is divided into three sections: laws governing the unmarried woman in her father's house (vv. 4-6); laws governing the woman who is under vow at the time of her marriage (vv. 7-9); and laws governing the married woman (vv. 11-13). In each case the situation for making a vow is the same. If her father or husband says nothing when he learns of the vow, the vow is valid and the woman must fulfill it (vv. 5, 8, 11-12). If, on the other hand, the father or husband disapproves of the vow, it is not binding. The voice of the man invalidates the vow and releases the woman from fulfilling it before the Lord (vv. 6, 9, 13).

The final section, verses 14-16, is meant to prevent a vow from becoming a matter of divisiveness in marriage. The husband's authority must be exercised upon hearing of the vow. The responsibility for failure to keep the vow falls upon the husband if he tries to invalidate it at a later time.

Chapter 31 reports a holy war against the Midianites as a prelude to the series of wars that Israel will fight to take possession of the land. In all instances a holy war ends in an ideal victory, because it is a war in which Yahweh participates.

The account of the war is followed by descriptions of the rites of purification and disposition of booty that have as their interest the ritual cleanliness and loyalty to God expected of a people who live with God in their midst. The actions following the battle are in compliance with regulations set forth in Numbers and witness to Israel's faith in Yahweh's covenant presence. This chapter is put together to illustrate the meaning of utter and uncompromising loyalty to Yahweh and to encourage those returning to the land from the Exile if they should run into difficulties in their attempt to reestablish themselves as a community of faith.

31:1-18 War against the Midianites. The narrator chooses as the context for the holy war the incident of the Midianite woman (25:6-15). Earlier this incident was linked with Peor (25:16-18), and here both the Peor and Midianite stories are linked with Balaam the prophet (vv. 8b, 16). Other points of contact are the priest Phinehas, who leads the battle against the Midianites (v. 6) and who, in the Midianite incident, demonstrated zeal for the Lord by thrusting his sword into the couple (25:7, 11-13); and mention of Zur, one of the five Midianite kings killed (v. 8a), who was also the father of the Midianite woman (25:15). The holy war is waged to fulfill the curse on Midian that followed from the affair with the Midianite woman (see 25:16-17).

The basis for a holy war is the understanding that an enemy of a people is an enemy of the god of that people. Thus the god would execute vengeance (v. 3b). In this context the technical word "vengeance" means the demonstration of power or use of force by legitimate authority against the enemy of that power and authority. For a reason that is unclear in the old story, the Midianites show themselves to be enemies of Israel and thus provoke a display of Yahweh's power. The ingredients of a holy war are the usual: a limited number of men take part in the battle (vv.

4-5): they rally behind the leader, who carries with him the sacred vessels and trumpets to sound battle (v. 6); and the victory is total (vv. 7-8). There is another description of a battle with the Midianites under the leadership of Gideon to which this account corresponds at many points (see Judg 6-8).

To signify complete possession by the victorious deity, all that is taken in battle belongs to Yahweh. For this reason the Israelites kill all the men (v. 7); they burn the towns and encampments (v. 10); and they present the women, children, livestock, and valuable items to Moses, the priest Eleazar, and the community (vv. 9, 11-12). But because of the circumstances that necessitated the war, Moses is angry that the lives of the women have been spared (vv. 13-16). He orders the death of all the male children and all the women except the virgins (vv. 17-18).

31:19-24 Purification after battle. Anyone and anything that comes into contact with a corpse is made unclean and must therefore submit to a ritual of purification (see ch. 19). Following the war with the Midianites, the combatants and everything with them must undergo the seven-day period of exclusion from camp and the ritual of sprinklings (v. 19). Perishable items, such as cloth, leather, goats' hair, and wood, are purified with them (v. 20). Materials that can withstand burning have to be cleansed in fire as well as in the purification water, whereas those materials that cannot withstand the fire are cleansed in the water alone (vv. 22-23).

On the seventh day, after washing their clothes, the soldiers are clean and may reenter the camp (v. 24).

31:25-42 Division of the booty. There remains the final disposition of all that is taken in battle. To signify its dedication to Yahweh, it is distributed proportionately in the community. Half is given to those who took part in the battle and half to the rest of the community, so that they, too, share in the glory and benefits of the victory (v. 27). From the distributed property, a portion is given to the priests and Levites as a contribution to the Lord (see ch. 18).

The amount assigned to the priests comes from the booty given to the combatants. They give one out of every five hundred of the people and livestock to the priest (vv. 28-29). The amount assigned to the Levites comes from the community's half of the booty. They are taxed at the rate of one out of every fifty persons and animals given to them (v. 30). The tremendous amount of booty taken in the war—a sign of the significance of the battle—is spelled out in great detail in the text: the total numbers of the spoils taken (vv. 32-35); the numbers of the half given to the combatants as well as that levied for the priests (vv. 36-41); and the numbers of the half given to the community, with mention that one-fiftieth belongs to the Levites (vv. 42-47).

31:48-54 Gifts of the officers. A final offering is presented by the officers of the campaign in thanksgiving for the safety of all the Israelites who engaged in the battle (v. 49). They pledge that each will contribute a precious article from the items they picked up on their own in the course of the battle (v. 50). The gold that the priests receive from the commanders is of great value (vv. 51-52). It is placed in the meeting tent as a portion freely offered to God (v. 54). The comment in verse 53 that the soldiers are allowed to keep their loot points up the free will and generosity of the officers in giving from their treasure. Placed in the sanctuary, the gold is a reminder that as God has spared the lives of all the warriors (compare 17:5), so God will remember Israel in the future.

Chapter 32 deals with the assignment of the Transjordanian land, the territory that the Israelites seized from Sihon (21:21-32) and Og (21:33-35) as they journeyed to the plains of Moab. Decisions in regard to the land are made by Moses in dialogue with the requesting tribes. The expected phrase "the Lord said to Moses" is noticeably absent in the telling. The fact that Yahweh does not speak and that God does not give the land suggests that the division of the people on two sides of the Jordan remains an unresolved issue. So important is this matter that its conclusion is narrated in full in Josh 1:12-18; 4:12-13; 22:1-8.

32:1-5 Request of Gad and Reuben. The tribes of Reuben and Gad request of Moses, Eleazar, and the leaders of the community that they might be given the land east of the Jordan for their inheritance. They argue that the region would be ideal for their livestock. And to make the request legitimate, they remind the leaders that this is land "which the Lord has laid low before the community of Israel" (v. 4). They are referring to the region extending from the Jabbok River south to the Arnon, land that the Israelites had taken from the Amorites (see 21:24).

The problem caused by the request is summarized in the statement "Do not make us cross the Jordan" (v. 5b). From Sinai and through the wilderness, the picture has been of one people journeying to enter one land. The granting of the request would mean a divided people in a divided land.

32:6-15 Moses' angry response. Moses' response to the idea of division within the community is immediate and passionate. He sees the request as a threat to all of Israel. The other tribes will be discouraged from going into the land the Lord has given them (v. 7). Moses accuses the Gadites and Reubenites of being "a brood of sinners" responsible for diverting the Israelites from entering the land and thus bringing the anger of God on the nation once again (vv. 14-15).

Moses invokes the incident (told in chapters 13–14) of the Israelites' failure to enter the land from the south (vv. 8-13). He claims that the behavior of the two tribes is like that of the spies who earlier discouraged the people. Just as Yahweh's anger caused Israel to wander for forty years until a whole generation died out, Yahweh will punish again. The result will be the ruin of the whole nation (v. 15b).

32:16-19 Compromise. The tribes of Gad and Reuben offer a compromise. Moses does not object to possession of the Transjordanian land; his concern and anger center on the unwillingness of these groups to cross the Jordan. The tribes therefore promise that they will accompany the Israelites into the land as the vanguard, that they will not return until every one of the Israelites has taken possession of his heritage, and that they will not claim a heritage for themselves in the land of Canaan (vv. 17a, 18, 19a).

The Gadites and Reubenites, however, make provision for themselves before helping the rest of Israel. Their promise of help is contingent upon their receipt of a heritage in the Transjordan (v. 19b) and on securing their families and animals before departure (vv. 16, 17b).

32:20-32 Agreement reached. Moses accepts the compromise proposed by the Reubenites and Gadites. The negotiations are settled in a sequence of four speeches.

In his acceptance Moses proposes the opposite of that suggested by the two tribes (vv. 20-24). He provides first for the entry and settlement of the Israelites in the land of Canaan, and only afterward for the establishment of the tribes in the Transjordanian territory.

The Gadites and Reubenites reaffirm their commitment (vv. 25-27). They reply that they, leaving their families and livestock behind, will indeed go across the Jordan to fight the battle before the Lord. They still put their own interests ahead of those of the rest of the Israelites.

Moses then instructs Joshua, the priest, and the leaders about the carrying out of the agreement (vv. 28-30). The settlement depends upon the good faith of the two tribes. If they cross the Jordan as combat troops and when the victory is complete, Joshua will give them Gilead as their property. But if they do not keep their promise to accompany and fight with the Israelites, they will be given a heritage in Canaan with all of Israel. Moses' instruction points to a future resolution of the situation. The request will not be honored if the Gadites and Reubenites do not keep their part of the bargain.

The two groups readily reply that they will do what the Lord commands (vv. 31-32). They thus perceive that Yahweh wills their actions. They reaffirm that they will cross the Jordan into the land of Canaan as troops before the Lord and that they will retain the property in the Transjordan. Their response is enthusiastic and religiously motivated.

32:33-42 Moses gives the land. It would seem that Moses is responding to the evidence of faith in the two tribes, for, contrary to his instructions in verses 28-30, he proceeds to give the land to the Gadites and Reubenites as well as the half tribe of Manasseh. The land distributed is that taken from Sihon, king of the Amorites, and from Og, king of Bashan (vv. 33; see 21:21-35). The land is not assigned by lot nor by tribal size, as the instruction clearly stipulates (see 26:52-56). In this sense the land falls outside that legitimately assigned to the Israelites.

The Reubenites and Gadites are assigned the territory of Sihon, the region south of the Jabbok River (vv. 34-38). The half tribe of Manasseh is given the land north of the Jabbok taken from Og. This land of Gilead was assigned to the Machir and Jair clans of the Manasseh tribe, which had invaded and settled in it (vv. 39-42; compare 21:33-35). It is because of this territorial possession prior to entry into the land that the case of land inheritance by women of the Machir line of the Manasseh family became an issue (27:1-11).

With this assignment of land, provision is made for the settlement of part of Israel. Other issues pertinent to designation of boundaries will also be settled by Moses before his death (chs. 34–36). The history of this time is presented in such a way that the future is seen as the fulfillment of Moses' leadership under the authority of Yahweh.

33:1-49 Stages on the journey. To both summarize and conclude the account of the journey through the wilderness, the Priestly author adds a very old record that lists the stations from Egypt to the plains of Moab (vv. 5-49). This is the same list used as the structure for the narrative account of the wilderness journey.

The formal introductory words echo the stylized heading that is characteristic of the Priestly author. "The following are the stages . . ." (v. 1a) is patterned after the heading "These are the generations . . ." (see Gen 5:1; 6:9; 10:1; 11:10; 11:27; 25:12, 19; 36:1; 37:2). The bold introduction highlights the importance of the list of stations that follows. Its significance is also underlined by the fact that Yahweh commands that Moses record it (v. 2).

The journey began at Rameses in Egypt (Exod 1:11; 12:37) with the celebration of Passover (Exod 12-13) at the time when Yahweh slew every first-born in the land of Egypt (Exod 12:29-30). The memory of the beginning out of Egypt in verses 3-4 comes from a song composed to celebrate the occasion.

The list of stations in verses 5-49 is much more detailed than the sequence of stops mentioned in the narrative. No tradition about many of the places was preserved, so the Priestly author employs the list in broad outline only.

The first segment goes from Rameses in Egypt to the desert of Sinai (vv. 5-14). This is the part of the journey told in the Book of Exodus from 12:37 to 19:2. Most of the places in the list occur also as headings in Exodus (see Exod 12:37; 13:20; 14:1-2; 15:22-25a; 16:1; 17:1a; 19:2). The events that took place at Sinai are related by the Priestly writer in Num 1:1 to 10:10.

The second segment outlines the journey from Sinai to Kadesh (vv. 16-36). This leg of the journey is recounted in Num 10:11 to 19:22. The limits of the journey are mentioned in the journey formula at 10:12, though in this text Kadesh is replaced by the desert of Paran, the name for the locality that includes Kadesh (see Num 2:16; 13:3, 26). Kibroth-hattaavah (vv. 16b-17a) appears in the narrative in connection with the quail story (11:34-35a); and Hazeroth (vv. 17b-18a) is the place where Aaron and Miriam rebelled against Moses (11:35b; 12:16). In the narrative, the desert of Paran is meant to include the whole range of places in the list not explicitly cited (vv. 18b-36).

The third stretch of the march goes from Kadesh in the desert of Zin to Mount Hor (vv. 36-40), places named in journey formulae at Num 20:1a and 22. The events are told in the relatively brief section of 20:1 to 21:9. The list in verses 38-39 is expanded with mention of two specific incidents that are part of the narrative: the death of Aaron (vv. 38-39; see 20:23-29) and the confrontation with the king of Arad (v. 40; see 21:1-3 and 14:39-45).

Finally, the Israelites traveled from Mount Hor to the plains of Moab (vv. 41-49). These places are named in the journey formulae at Num 21:10-11 and 22:1, headings that encompass the narrative material from 21:10 to the end of the book. In the narrative, the locality called the "desert fronting Moab on the east" (21:11) is cited to include the whole range of places named in verses 42-48a.

33:50-56 Rules for the conquest and division of Canaan. The effect of the list of stations is to bring the reader back to an awareness that the people remain on the border of the land. At this place Yahweh gives Moses more instructions concerning the future (v. 50). The first one deals with the taking and distribution of the land across the Jordan (v. 51).

The task before the Israelites is to drive out the inhabitants of the land and to destroy all the vestiges of their religion (vv. 52, 55a; see Deut 12:2-3). The conquest must be absolute. There are to be no non-Israelites remaining nor anything uncharacteristic of Israel's God. This is a land that Yahweh has given to Israel as an inheritance. It is a sign of the covenant relationship between Yahweh and Israel (v. 53). This relationship demands total love and loyalty.

The command is followed by a warning expressed in the typical conditional curse (see Deut 30:16-17). If the inhabitants of the land are permitted to remain, they will be a constant source of irritation and trouble (vv. 55; see Josh 23:13); and ultimately the removal from the land intended for the inhabitants will befall the Israelites themselves (v. 56). This last statement has special meaning for the people in exile who have been removed from the land. At issue is radical and uncompromising loyalty. Yahweh's land, as a theological idea, is the place for the faithful followers of Yahweh only.

Wedged into the instruction concerning occupation of the land is a repetition of the procedure for division of the land (v. 54; compare 26:52-56). That the land will be assigned "by lot" is repeated intentionally so that Israel might know that Yahweh will give the land, emptied of its inhabitants, for the possession of the families of Israel.

34:1-49 The boundaries. Yahweh's instruction for the future in the land continues with a description of the boundaries of the territory that will be given to Israel (vv. 1-2). An ancient boundary list is used for this idealized territorial description. The description does not correspond with the actual boundaries during any period after the tenth century B.C.E; it does correspond with the limits of Egypt's possession in Canaan in the thirteenth century B.C.E. as those limits are defined in the peace treaty between Egypt and the Hittites. The Priestly writer borrows this specific description of the land of Canaan because it includes only territory actually possessed by Israel, and because the eastern limit borders on the Jordan. For the purpose of the narrative, the writer is not interested in the land beyond the Jordan at this time.

The description of the southern boundary (vv. 3-5) is very similar to that of the southern border of Judah as presented in Josh 15:1-4.

The western boundary at the Great Sea (v. 6) is reminiscent of the idealized description in the promise statements, such as Gen 15:18 and Exod 23:31.

The description of the northern boundary (vv. 7-9) has only slight variations from the limits of the land as described in Ezek 47:15-17 and 48:1.

The eastern boundary, however, differs from the usual idealized extent of the land that would include territory on both sides of the Jordan (compare Ezek 47:18). The definition in verses 10-12 follows the line of the Jordan River and thus excludes the Transjordanian land.

The boundary at the Jordan is, of course, intentional, to indicate that the land in question is that to be divided among the "nine and one half tribes" (v. 13). The other two and one half tribes have already received their heritage on the eastern side of the Jordan (vv. 14-15; ch. 32). It is the land to be divided in the future that is highlighted.

To carry out the allotment of the land, Joshua and Eleazar are to be assisted by leaders from the individual tribes (vv. 17-18), in much the way that Moses and Aaron were assisted in the census (see 1:4-16). All the names of the leaders in verses 20-28 are new. Only Caleb (v. 19), who survived the wilderness period, has a place in tradition (see 14:6, 24, 30, 38).

The order of the tribes differs from any other, whether for the census or for the arrangement in the camp. Here the listing is governed by the geographical order in which each tribe holds land in Canaan, going from the south to the north (compare Josh 14–19). The nine and one half tribes that will occupy Canaan are grouped into the four southern tribes (vv. 19-22), the one and one half central tribes of the family of Joseph (vv. 23-24), and the four northern tribes (vv. 25-28).

35:1-8 Cities for the Levites. Because the Levites have no land for their inheritance, they are assigned cities in which to live and an expanse of land around the cities for their pastures (vv. 2-5). The cities and the land are to be appropriated from the tribes according to their size (v. 8). Forty-eight cities in all will be given to the Levites (v. 7).

We have here only the regulation for the assignment of cities and lands to the Levites. The apportionment that totals precisely forty-eight cities can be found in Josh 21:4-8. The land is to come from territory of all the tribes, including those in the Transjordan.

35:9-15 Cities of asylum. The cities of asylum are linked with the Levitical cities in verse 6. This verse states that of the forty-eight cities assigned to the Levites, six must be set aside as places where a person who takes a life unintentionally may find refuge (also v. 11). Three of these cities will be located in Canaan and three in the Transjordan (vv. 13-14). This regulation only specifies that such cities must be set aside; their names are given in Josh 20:1-9, especially vv. 7-8, and 21:21, 27, 32, 36, 38.

The cities are designated as places where all people, resident or alien (v. 15a), may seek refuge from revenge before they have had a chance to face trial (vv. 12, 15b) in cases where blood has been spilled. The law stipulates that a person who commits murder deserves death (Exod 21:12, 14). The death sentence is often carried out by the "avenger of blood" (v. 12), the nearest male relative of the deceased, before there is proof that the death was caused deliberately. The designation of cities of refuge represents a development in the law based on respect for human life. The legislation guarantees legal protection for an accused person.

35:16-34 Murder and manslaughter. The stipulations make clear which individuals have the right of asylum. The willful murderer is to be handed over to the avenger, the next of kin to the deceased, who is responsible for carrying out the death sentence (vv. 19, 21b). Willfulness is evidenced by a death-dealing weapon in hand (vv. 16-18) or when there is indication of hatred or enmity (vv. 20-21).

On the other hand, if death was caused accidentally (vv. 22-23), the community is required to protect the accused from the avenger (vv. 24-25a). After first determining that there was no intention to kill, the community will send the accused back to the city of asylum, where that person will stay safely until the death of the high priest (v. 25b). Loss of life is such a serious matter that, though it may have been caused accidentally, the person involved is nonetheless deprived of freedom. In fact, an accused person who leaves a city of asylum before the specified time can still be put to death by the avenger (vv. 26-28). Underlying this eagerness to take a life for a life is a keen sense of maintaining the balance of power in individual tribes. Intentional loss of life in one family calls for loss of life in the other.

Other norms govern the community when it is making decisions that justice might prevail and that both the accused and the community might be protected (v. 29). First, an accused person cannot be condemned to death except on the evidence of several witnesses (v. 30; see Deut 17:6; 19:15). Second, the condemned murderer may not substitute payment in place of suffering loss of life (v. 31); nor may a person relegated to a city of asylum buy release from the city (v. 32).

The demands seem very great. Israel is a society in which life is regarded as a precious gift from Yahweh. The shedding of blood desecrates the land—the very land in which Yahweh dwells in the midst of Israel, where Yahweh is present with the people in covenant. The land is not to be defiled for the simple reason that the God who is present with Israel is Yahweh, the God who brought Israel out of Egypt in order to dwell among them (v. 34; see Exod 29:45-46; Lev 26:11-13).

The chapter ends on a note that summarizes the theological focus of the Priestly work. All the preparations for entry into the land and all the legislation for living faithfully in the land have one motivation—to make Israel a holy place worthy of a holy God who is present in its midst.

36:1-12 Property of heiresses. The case brought to Moses for resolution in 27:1-11 created a problem that is presented here for consideration. The case has its immediate setting in the Machir clan of the tribe of Manasseh, which has already been assigned territory in the Transjordan. The leaders of that clan now come before Moses and Eleazar (v. 1) with the concern that the daughters of Zelophehad might marry into another Israelite family and thereby cause the loss of land to their father's tribe (vv. 2-3), for when a woman marries, all her possessions become the property of her husband. At issue is the diminishment of land allotted to the tribe under God's direction. The leaders add that the land would become the permanent possession of the husband's tribe in the jubilee year (v. 4; see Lev 25:8-34). The laws governing the jubilee year require that all land that has been sold be returned to its original possessor every fiftieth year. This law apparently does not affect land that has passed to another tribe as a result of marriage into the tribe.

The first ruling created a problem that requires modification. The new ruling does not negate the first decision, which gives women the right of inheritance when there are no male members. Moses offers the modification that Zelophehad's daughters may marry only into a clan within their own family so that no land will be lost to the family (vv. 5-7). The new legislation, then, becomes the precedent for all cases of inheritance by women so that each tribe might retain the inheritance allotted to it (vv. 8-9).

A final note is added with the announcement that the daughters of Zelophehad did marry within the clans of their father's family (vv. 10-12).

36:13 Conclusion. The Book of Numbers closes with a subscription to the rules and regulations gathered together in chapters 27–36. These were given while the people remained on the plains of Moab so that they might live faithfully when they enter the land Yahweh has given them and thus possess the land as a permanent inheritance.

DEUTERONOMY

Leslie J. Hoppe, O.F.M.

INTRODUCTION

Deuteronomy and the biblical tradition

The Book of Deuteronomy is certainly one of the most important and influential books in the Hebrew Scriptures. It provided the theological perspectives that dominated the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings), now commonly known as the Deuteronomistic History of Israel. It exerted its influence over the final shape of a number of prophetic books, notably Hosea and Jeremiah. Indirectly it influenced the Chronicler's History of Israel (Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah). The Temple Scroll of the Qumran community was basically an Essene reinterpretation of Deuteronomy. The New Testament cites or alludes to Deuteronomic texts almost two hundred times. Deuteronomy's reinterpretation of selected items of ancient Israelite law and history provided a model for the rabbis who produced the Mishnah and the Talmud. Finally, Deuteronomy's self-understanding as a written, authoritative document gave rise to the very concepts of Scripture and canon.

Deuteronomy stood at a pivotal point in the life of ancient Israel. Its pages preserved traditions that were ancient at the time of its own production. Some of the legal traditions handed on by the Deuteronomists had their origins in the pre-Israelite era of the ancient Near East. The Deuteronomists, however, were not antiquarians or even historians. Their purpose in preserving, transmitting, and reinterpreting ancient tradition was to provide Israel with some direction for its future at a time when that future was in great doubt. The Deuteronomists did their work well, for the phenomenon we know today as early Judaism was shaped in large measure by the Book of Deuteronomy. Their work, then, stood as the bridge between the religion of ancient Israel and the faith of early Judaism.

The meaning of Deuteronomy

Because of its obvious importance, the Book of Deuteronomy has attracted much attention over the years. Interpreters of the book have described it as a covenantal document, an example of Levitical preaching, a charter for religious revival, a response to the culture shock of foreign domination, an attempt at humanizing ancient laws, a call for cultic purity, and the basis for cult centralization. It has been disparaged as being morally simplistic and praised for its call for Israel to love God (Deut 6:5). The Deuteronomists have been called harsh and unsympathetic teachers as well as some of the greatest liberal theologians of all time. The diversity of these comments on, and characterizations of, Deuteronomy show how difficult it is to find a simple description for this very complex and sophisticated theological work.

Despite the complications presented by interpreters of Deuteronomy, the aim of the book was really quite simple. The Deuteronomists wanted to make ancient tradition speak again in a time of great crisis for Israel in order to help Israel survive that crisis. They saw that the great institutions of ancient Israel were dead or dying. The monarchy, prophecy, temple, and priesthood had all failed to prevent the nation from arriving at the brink of destruction, which was being caused by both internal and external forces. Deuteronomy suggested that Israel relearn the lessons of its formative years in the wilderness under Moses: obedience to the law of the Lord was the only way for Israel to secure its future. The meaning of Deuteronomy, then, was Deuteronomy itself. The book presented itself to Israel as the last hope: obey and live, or disobey and die (Deut 30:15-20).

The origins of Deuteronomy

There is no universal agreement as to the specific crisis that prompted the production of Deuteronomy. One of the longest held positions of modern biblical studies dates from the early nineteenth century and identifies the Book of Deuteronomy with the "book of the law" found in the temple by the high priest Hilkiah during the reign of Josiah (2 Kgs 22:8ff.). While the book includes much material that can be dated to the late seventh century B.C.E. and earlier, it is clear that Deuteronomy, in the form it now has, dates from the Babylonian Exile (587-539 B.C.E.). It was during the Exile that the remnant of the nation stood on the edge of extinction. In this life-or-death situation, the Deuteronomists presented Israel with the challenge of obedience to a written, authoritative book of the law and called for the nation to choose life (Deut 30:19). This exilic date for Deuteronomy does not eliminate the possibility that earlier traditions were used in the production of the book. On the contrary, Deuteronomy was the result of a conscious reinterpretation of ancient legal traditions for the sake of providing Israel with hope for the future.

Who were the Deuteronomists? From what circles did they emerge? Again, there has been a variety of answers to that question. At first, the prophets were presented as responsible for Deuteronomy, because at one time anything in the Hebrew Scriptures of ethical or theological value was ascribed to prophetic circles. But Deuteronomy does not treat the prophets very well (see the comment on 18:9-22).

Other interpreters have suggested that Deuteronomy reflects the preaching of the Levites. However, there are no examples of Levitical preaching in the Bible, so it is impossible to say that Deuteronomy is the product of such activity. In addition, the book consistently portrays the Levites as objects of charity, hardly a flattering self-portrait.

The sages of Israel have even been credited with the production of Deuteronomy, but they never even appear in the book that they supposedly composed and presented to Israel as the pattern for its life.

The one group that remains a possibility is the elders of Israel. These were the leaders of the community who were the traditional administrators of the very laws preserved in Deuteronomy. They were the principal guardians of ancient Israel's legal traditions. Why should they not be credited with Deuteronomy, the depository of these traditions?

Deuteronomy was composed in order to provide a new pattern of life for Israel in its land. During the Exile, Israel found itself outside that land, hoping to take possession of it once again. Deuteronomy came to light during the Exile. It was created by the elders, who considered themselves to be the custodians of Israel's ancient legal traditions. They took those traditions, altered them, developed them, enlarged them, and drew theological conclusions from them—all for the sake of providing Israel with a new pattern of life. It was this vision for a new life that gave the elders the impetus to create the Book of Deuteronomy.

Form and structure

Any analysis of Deuteronomy's literary form must begin with the book's connections with ancient Near Eastern treaty traditions. In the ancient world, treaties between nations followed a particular pattern, which usually included the following five components: (1) a title that identified the king offering the treaty; (2) a historical prologue, in which the king offering the treaty listed his beneficent acts toward the people accepting the treaty; (3) stipulations or demands made by the king offering the treaty; (4) a list of witnesses to the treaty, and occasionally provisions for storing and periodic reading of the treaty; (5) curses and blessings that would follow upon violation and observance of the treaty. Even a superficial reading of Deuteronomy will make it clear that there is a connection between Deuteronomy and the international treaty form.

At the same time, it is important to note that Deuteronomy is not presented as if it were a treaty. It makes use of literary forms from the treaty tradition, but it is presented as a series of addresses given to Israel by Moses just before his death. Deuteronomy is Moses' testament to Israel, which is to take possession of the land of Canaan in a short while. It is not the text of a treaty or covenant. While the book may contain elements of the treaty form, it also contains material that cannot be included among such forms (see Deut 32–34).

In its present form, Deuteronomy is composed of four addresses given to Israel by Moses. The tone of these addresses is exhortatory. The book is meant to encourage Israel to obey the law. Moses portrays Israel as specially chosen by God to take possession of Canaan. Israel will maintain its hold on that land as long as it is obedient. (This commentary will follow the structure evident in the book itself, which divides the material into four separate addresses, each introduced by a formulaic expression which asserts that what follows are the words of Moses: Deut 1:1; 4:44; 29:1; 33:1.)

The exhortation to obedience is the core of Deuteronomy, but, as Deut 29:1 indicates, this exhortation was transformed into the text of a treaty or covenant between God and Israel. The ancient customs and laws that regulated the mutual relationships of the people became the test of their loyalty to God. The quality of intersocietal relationships within Israel became the barometer of Israel's relationship with God. Accordingly, for Deuteronomy, to know and love God means to love one's neighbors and do them justice. This, of course, is affirmed in the New Testament in a number of places, for example, Mark 12:29-31 and 1 John 4:7-12, 20-21. Thus, the elements of the ancient Near Eastern treaty tradition were introduced into the Book of Deuteronomy in order to give new value and importance to obedience. The effect of this transformation was to make one's love of neighbor the standard and test of one's love of God.

COMMENTARY

MOSES' FIRST ADDRESS

Deut 1:1–4:43

The scene of Moses' address to Israel is the region known as the plains of Moab, immediately east of the Jordan River. The time is just before the tribes are to take possession of the land promised to their ancestors. The context of these final words of Moses is an exhortation to obedience. This "testament" of Moses is his advice to Israel to heed the lessons of the past if it wants to secure its future. The lesson is simple enough: God expects complete loyalty from Israel; nothing less is satisfactory. Israel's trek through the wilderness after its departure from Egypt has taught it over and over again that loyalty is rewarded and infidelity is punished. Moses will now spend his last energies in trying to move Israel to the kind of obedience, loyalty, and commitment that will secure Israel's future in the land it will soon come to possess.

1:1-5 The preface to the first address. These verses function as a preamble, introducing not only the first of Moses' four addresses but also the entire book as well. They specify the persons involved in the events of the book, the scene of the action, and the exact time and purpose of the work. Deuteronomy purports to be the words of Moses addressed to all Israel. Here the book underscores the unity of the people of God, all of whom are subject to the divine will.

While the location where the address is given is specified with precision (vv. 1b-2), the exact location of all the sites mentioned is not known, though it is clear that the scene of the action is on the east side of the Jordan River.

Moses begins his first address to the tribes just before Israel is to cross the Jordan to take possession of the land promised to its ancestors. It is now forty years since the Exodus. Preliminary victories have already been won, but Israel, poised on the plains of Moab, hears Moses deliver a final plea for obedience as he makes the Lord's will absolutely clear to all Israel. The purpose of this exposition is to move Israel to renewed commitment.

1:6-18 The move from Horeb. Moses' first address begins with a direct quotation of God's words at Horeb (Mount Sinai) calling Israel to begin the journey that will end with acquisition of the land that is to be the scene of its subsequent history. The dimensions given for the land (v. 7) reflect the promise made to Abraham (Gen 15:18) rather than any set of historical borders. This promise is now fulfilled as the land is shown to Israel and thereby passes into its possession. All that remains is for Israel to take physical possession of its inheritance. That, however, will be no easy task.

Verses 9-18 interrupt the account of Israel's departure from Horeb, which is resumed in verse 19. After arriving at Horeb, Moses foresaw the difficulties ahead and suggested that the people select leaders to share the burdens of leadership with himself (v. 13). Though Moses had played an indispensable role in leading Israel from Egypt to the threshold of the Promised Land, Israel reached a point in its life when others were to first share, and then finally take over, the responsibilities which up to that point Moses had had to bear alone. It is significant that Israel was to choose its own leaders. Any breakdown in the morale or loyalty of the people would be due to the decisions of these leaders. God could not be blamed, since Moses simply confirmed those leaders whom the people themselves presented to him.

Among the leaders confirmed in office by Moses were judges, who were specifically charged to administer justice without regard to the social and economic differences between the people who had disputes before them (vv. 16-17). Justice among Israelites was based on the premise of the equality of all Israelites. In fact, the mantle of equality was even placed on the shoulders of aliens residing among the Israelites (v. 16).

This section closes with the parenthetical note that Israel was fully instructed regarding its responsibilities in its new relationship with God (v. 18). Israel could not plead ignorance if it failed in that relationship.

1:19-46 Israel's failure at Kadesh-barnea. The journey from Horeb ended at Kadesh-barnea, a site in the south of Canaan. Kadesh-barnea was to serve as a base of operations from which the Israelite tribes were to begin the process of acquiring the land promised to them. It should have been the scene of initial victories; instead, it was the scene of Israel's first defeat. The nation was defeated because of its lack of confidence in God.

The people suggested that spies be sent to reconnoiter the land and its inhabitants (v. 22). The spies returned with glowing reports about the land, but with terrifying reports about the indigenous population of Canaan. The Israelites recoiled at the possibility of having to face the Canaanites in any type of armed conflict. Moses tried to encourage the people by reminding them of God's deliverance of Israel from Egypt and the guidance through the wilderness, but to no avail.

God's response was to allow the people just what they wanted—a safe haven outside the Promised Land. God would wait for the next generation to begin the settlement of Canaan. In addition, Moses was condemned to die outside the new land (v. 37). As the people's leader, he was most responsible for Israel's loss of faith. Only Caleb, Joshua, and the children of the rebellious generation would be spared the effects of the people's decision to remain outside Canaan.

After some time the people decided that they indeed wanted to take possession of Canaan, but it was too late. They were easily defeated by the Amorites. They had to live with the effects of their disobedience. Kadesh, not Canaan, was to be their home.

2:1-23 Peaceful transit through Edom, Moab and Ammon. In telling the story of Israel's experiences in Transjordan, the Deuteronomists assume that there was a peaceful transit through the areas that were not settled by the Israelite tribes. There was to be no conflict over these territories, since God had allotted them to their respective inhabitants at another time (vv. 5, 9, 19).

Other biblical traditions consider the populations of these territories to be related to the Israelites: in the case of the Moabites and Ammonites, through Lot, Abraham's nephew (Gen 19:36-38); and in the case of the Edomites, through Esau, the brother of Jacob (Gen 36:9).

Still other traditions preserve the memory of tensions that did exist between these people and the advancing Israelites. According to Num 20:14-21, Edom refused to permit the Israelites to traverse its territory, and Num 22-24 reports the attempt of Balak of Moab to obtain a curse upon Israel.

The most significant feature of the Deuteronomic tradition about Israel's relations with these peoples is the universalism which undergirds that tradition here. The God of Israel also gives the peoples of these Transjordanian countries the land they inhabit. Clearly, God's concern extends beyond the pale of Israel.

While Israel was spared conflict with these nations, according to Deuteronomy, Israel was locked in a conflict that took the lives of a whole generation of warriors. The enemy who caused Israel to suffer such a devastating defeat was none other than God (vv. 14-15). Israel's infidelity at Kadesh-barnea cost it dearly. Though God had fought for Israel against Pharaoh, God will just as easily turn against an unfaithful Israel. The Deuteronomists want to issue a warning: divine acts of deliverance in the past are no guarantee for the future! There is only one way Israel can look to the future with any hope, and that way is through obedience.

2:24–3:22 Conflicts with Sihon and Og. Though the historical presence of Israel on the east bank of the Jordan was short-lived, Deuteronomic tradition holds that the tribes of Reuben and Gad and two clans of Manasseh settled there. The tradition also assumes that the territory of these tribes was acquired in much the same way as were the lands west of the Jordan, where the other tribes settled—through armed confrontation with the indigenous population. The conflicts with the Amorites under Sihon and the people of Bashan under Og are presented as violent in the extreme (2:34; 3:6). Any conflict over the limited amount of arable land in the region had the potential for becoming very costly in terms of human lives, as are similar conflicts in the same region today. The intensity of these conflicts is not surprising, nor is the human tendency to attribute them to the divine will. The dark side of Israel's belief that it received the land as a gift from God was the practice of eliminating those who held a different belief.

Another theological issue raised by this text is the relation between the human and the divine wills. Sihon opposed Israel's entrance into his territory, but this came about because God hardened his heart (2:30). The victories that Israel won over Sihon and Og were the Lord's doing (2:33; 3:3), yet Israel's armies had to fight and defeat the forces of these two kings. The text seems to assert that both the divine and the human actions were necessary, but it does not deal at all with how the two were related.

Verse 11 is a parenthetical remark on the great size of Og's bed or sarcophagus, which was still to be seen in the Deuteronomists' day. In spite of Og's great power, his kingdom fell to an obedient Israel. Fidelity has a power that far outweighs military or political power.

The victories over Sihon and Og resulted in the distribution of their territories among the tribes of Reuben and Gad and among Machir and Jair, two clans of Manasseh. Since Sihon and Og defied the Lord (2:30; 3:1), they were defeated by the Lord's might. Their lands were now forfeit and passed to Israel. The allocation of the conquered territories was more than the settling of geographic boundaries. It was, first of all, a celebration of God's victory and a statement of belief in the divine origin of the territorial claims made by the tribes and clans named here. The same pattern—conquest followed by allocation of land—provides the basic outline of the Book of Joshua (conquest: Josh 1–12; allocation: Josh 13–21). The victories over Sihon and Og and the distribution of their land among the Israelite tribes were a harbinger of future victories on the other side of the Jordan.

The stipulations in 3:18-20 emphasize the unity of Israel, an important Deuteronomic theme. The militia of any tribe cannot rest until all the land of Canaan is acquired according to God's promise.

3:23-29 Joshua. Tradition locates Moses' grave outside the Promised Land (Deut 34:5). There then needs to be an explanation for this apparent injustice and for the eventual succession to Moses' position of leadership among the tribes. Regarding the former issue, the Deuteronomists opt for a solution that preserves Moses' integrity. Though he was personally innocent of any guilt, Moses was unfortunately caught up in the wake of infidelity that enveloped the whole generation of rebellion at Kadesh-barnea (1:26). This contrasts with the Priestly tradition, which accused Moses himself of a breach of faith that resulted in his exclusion from the Promised Land (Num 20:12). These two different explanations for the tradition about the grave of Moses probably reflect the exilic debate between communal guilt and personal responsibility as an explanation for the presence of evil and suffering in Israel's life.

Another concern of the Deuteronomists is to demonstrate that the Mosaic office could continue beyond the death of Moses. Joshua was the first successor to Moses. There could then be others in the future who could do what Moses once did for Israel—transmit and interpret the divine will for Israel. If the law was to be the one guide for Israel's life in the land, Moses had to have legitimate successors who could provide Israel with access to the law and its interpretation (see Matt 23:2; Pirke Aboth 1:1).

4:1-40 The conclusion to the first address. Moses' first address concludes with a summary not simply of the foregoing material but of the entire Book of Deuteronomy. The material found here was incorporated into Deuteronomy during the Exile (587–539 B.C.E.), when circumstances forced Israel to reconsider the meaning of its relationship with God and to examine the status of that relationship.

The Book of Deuteronomy as a whole and this chapter in particular speak of the fundamental loyalty that is essential to Israel's unique relationship with God. Here the Exile is explained as one result of a serious lapse in that loyalty as manifested in Israel's disregard of the prohibition of images (vv. 25-27). The folly of serving other gods brought on the Exile (v. 28). Once Israel realizes what befalls those who are unfaithful, repentance is possible (vv. 29-30). Finally, the compassion of God does not allow Israel's infidelity to end the relationship that exists between God and Israel, since God remains faithful to the promise made to Israel's ancestors (v. 31). As disastrous as was Israel's disloyalty, it still did not mean the end of its relationship with God.

It is clear that obedience is the key to maintaining Israel's relationship with God, which is made tangible by its possession of the Promised Land. Five times this text speaks of the connection between obedience and possession of the land (vv. 1, 5-8, 14, 21-22, 40). The text uses the concrete example of the prohibition of images to show the results of disobedience (vv. 3-4, 15-26). When Israel disregarded God's commandments, disaster followed. Flouting the stipulations of the covenant (v. 13) resulted in Israel's exile from the land (vv. 26-27). The faith of the Deuteronomists leads them to expect that God will bring blessing from the curse of the Exile (v. 31) and restore Israel to an intimacy with God that is unparalleled (vv. 32-39).

Obedience, then, is the foundation of Israel's relationship with God, since it brings Israel closer to God than is thought humanly possible (v. 6). It is the uniqueness of Israel's God (v. 39) and of the covenant this God makes with Israel (v. 13) that makes Israel unlike any other people. To secure its future, Israel need only recognize what is so obvious and order its life according to the commandments. A life lived in obedience will bring not only renown (vv. 6-7) but also long life in the Promised Land (v. 40).

This text is a clear warning: disobedience arouses Israel's God, who does not tolerate infidelity. Disobedience will mean that God's power will be turned against Israel just as easily as it was once manifested for Israel (vv. 34-35). The key of Israel's future is the Book of Deuteronomy itself, since it is the collection of the "statutes and commandments" that Israel must obey to secure long life in the land (4:1, 40).

4:41-43 The cities of refuge. A complete presentation on the cities of refuge occurs in Deut 19, which makes no allusion to this passage. In Num 35:13-14 it is stated that three cities of refuge are to be set up on the east side of the Jordan. The three cities in question are named in Josh 20:8. Clearly, this text was added to its present context under the impression that these cities were established by Moses. This text probably would have fit better after Deut 3:12-17, in which Moses allots land to the tribes and clans that will remain in Transjordan. The exact location of these cities is unknown.

MOSES' SECOND ADDRESS

Deut 4:44–28:69

4:44-49 Introduction. Both the time and place of Moses' second address are specified. Moses gives this speech near Beth-peor (v. 46). This was the site of an infamous act of apostasy (Num 25). Here the Israelites had shown themselves ready to compromise the absolute fidelity that God expected of them. It was also within the borders of the new land that God had just given the tribes (Deut 2:24–3:17). Thus, Beth-peor is a reminder of God's graciousness, which overcame Israel's infidelity. The law that follows is to be the means of assuring that Israel will remain committed to the service of God alone. This speech is given by Moses after the initial victories of Israel over the Amorites (vv. 46-47). These latest demonstrations of God's graciousness should be a powerful stimulus to fidelity.

5:1–6:3 The Ten Commandments. With Israel standing in Transjordan, the promise made to the ancestors of the Israelite tribes is on the verge of fulfillment. The people who have been living by the promise now need to learn how to live with the fulfillment. The most dramatic shift in this transition is to learn that continued possession of the land is dependent upon fidelity to God. The initial acquisition of the land is the result of God's fidelity to the promises made to the ancestors of the Israelite tribes; now the Israelites need to respond to that fidelity if they wish to remain in their new land.

The Ten Commandments are to guide Israel in this transition from living by the promise to living with its fulfillment. The Decalogue provides Israel with a means to maintain a continuing relationship with God. These Ten Words, as Jewish tradition calls them, serve to pattern Israel's response to the God who brought it out of slavery in Egypt (5:6) and who is about to lead it into a new land. The commandments are restrictive in only one way: they call for Israel's uncompromising fidelity to the God who has fulfilled every promise made to Israel. They commit Israel to the exclusive service of God. This ensures that Israel will live and prosper in the land God is about to give it (5:33–6:3).

(Note: The numbering of the commandments here follows the Roman Catholic and Lutheran tradition. Other Christians and the Rabbis divide the prohibitions against false worship into two separate commandments [vv. 6-7 and 8-9] and unite the prohibitions of coveting into one [v. 21]. Another version of the Ten Commandments can be found in Exod 20:2-17.)

The first commandment (vv. 6-10) exemplifies God's passion for Israel's absolute fidelity. Once Israel settles in its land, there will be temptations to compromise the loyalty owed to God. The Israelites are looking forward to what will be a new experience for them—a life of freedom in their own land. What must not change for them is their commitment to God. Their whole life is to be determined by their relationship with the God who brought them out of Egypt. The prohibition of images (vv. 8-9) reminds Israel that its knowledge of God is to be gained from its experience of the reality of God that it encountered in the Exodus from Egypt and in the guidance in the wilderness.

The second commandment (v. 11) prohibits the attempt to harness with magic the power that the ancients believed was inherent in the divine name. In early Jewish tradition it became customary to avoid mentioning the divine name entirely. The God of Israel was beyond manipulation. God's name was not to be linked with any selfish human purpose. The commandment regarding the sabbath (vv. 12-15) imposes two obligations: to make the sabbath day holy (v. 12) and to cease work on that day (v. 13). The two obligations are related, since the day of rest provides the Israelites with the opportunity to remember their slavery in Egypt and their liberation by the power of God. The sabbath is to be a regular weekly reminder of Israel's dependence upon God.

The fourth commandment (v. 16) stands as a bridge between those that precede and those that follow it. The commandments deal with two kinds of relationships. The first three commandments focus on the relationship between God and Israel, while the last seven deal with the relationships that must exist within the Israelite community itself. Israel will be able to remain loyal to God as long as the people remain loyal to one another. The parent/child relationship is not only analogous to the divine/human relationship (1:31), but it is also the core relationship within the Israelite community.

This community will not be able to endure if human life can be taken for personal and illegitimate reasons, so murder is prohibited (v. 17). Murder ignores a person's status and worth as God's creature, and as such it is an attack on the Creator's prerogatives. Another threat to the life of the community is any threat to the binding commitment of faithfulness made by husband and wife. The sixth commandment (v. 18) aims to protect the marriage relationship. Infidelity is reprehensible to God, who is always faithful.

The seventh commandment (v. 19) is most probably concerned with crimes against persons rather than theft of property. Members of the Israelite community are not to turn against one another. For example, the slave trade is forbidden here. But in a wider sense, any action by which one human being takes control over the life of another is outlawed. Human beings are not to be manipulated but are to be given the freedom necessary to maintain a faithful relationship with God.

Another prerequisite for a healthy community is integrity and honesty in human relationships. The eighth commandment (v. 20) seeks to protect these values. The God who is faithful in every word and deed requires the same honesty in human relationships. Finally, the last two commandments (v. 21) prohibit coveting. Not only are actions disruptive to community life forbidden, but also proscribed are the desires that lead to such crimes. Self-interest must be kept in close check before it becomes the dominant force in a person's life. The position of the wife in the Deuteronomic form of this commandment differs from that of Exod 20:17, in which the wife is placed among the husband's property. Here the woman has a more favorable status.

The commandments come from God, but they are interpreted through Moses (vv. 22-33). Both the people and God choose Moses as the mediator of the law, which derives its authority from God and its applicability from Moses. Later, Deuteronomy will speak about the successors to the Mosaic office (18:15-19). But this text attests to the authenticity of Israel's encounter with God as mediated through a human being.

The section of the second address containing the Ten Commandments closes with a short exhortation that attempts to provide motives for obedience (6:1-3). The principal reason given is that obedience will lead to the fulfillment of the promises made to Israel's ancestors: a fruitful land and a numerous progeny. The Exile, which meant living outside the land and in numbers decimated by the war with Babylon, could be seen as nothing less than a course resulting from Israel's disobedience.

6:4-25 The love of God. The concern of this text is to promote obedience to a particular commandment: the prohibition of the worship of gods other than the Lord. The Israelites are preparing to enter a very prosperous land (vv. 10-11). Moses warns them against rashly concluding that the prosperity of the land is due to the beneficence of the gods worshiped by that land's indigenous population. Israel is never to forget what happened in Egypt (v. 12). The Lord's liberation of Israel from slavery in Egypt has forged a bond that must never be severed by Israel's service of deities worshiped by other peoples. Israel is not to divide its loyalties.

There are a variety of ways in which verse 4 can be translated (compare the rendering of the Revised Standard Version: "The Lord our God is one Lord"). Though each can be defended on linguistic and theological grounds, the New American Bible translation best fits this context, which emphasizes the exclusiveness of Israel's service of Yahweh. While this verse and its context underscore the loyalty that Israel owes to the Lord, this is not a statement of explicit monotheism. In fact, the possibility that other gods exist is implicit here. For Israel, however, there is only one God, and all of its energies are to be directed to the service of that one God.

Some may find it odd that verse 5 commands the love of God. The love envisioned here is the kind of deep loyalty and affection that Israel owes to the God who ended its cruel bondage in Egypt. Secondly, in Deuteronomy love is virtually synonymous with obedience. The image behind this injunction is the parent/child relationship, in which love and obedience are equivalent terms. The love that Israel owes God is all-encompassing. In fact, the entire Book of Deuteronomy is nothing else but a drawing out of the practical implications of verse 5. Jesus cited this verse when asked about the greatest commandment of the law (Matt 22:36-37; Mark 12:28-30).

The injunctions of verses 7-9 stress how total Israel's devotion to God's commands must be. Israel is to keep the commandments in mind at all times and under all circumstances. Early Judaism turned these metaphors into commands. Jews began the custom of wearing phylacteries (small leather containers holding tiny scrolls, on which were inscribed verses 4-9 as well as other biblical texts). Jesus' criticism of this custom assumes that obedience to this command was not always accompanied by the kind of total obedience envisioned by verse 5 (see Matt 23:5). Jews also began to attach a mezuzah (a small container holding a written biblical text) to the upper part of the right doorpost. Rather than establishing any specific customs, Deuteronomy is trying to insure that individual Israelites, their homes, and the entire community will be outstanding in their loyalty to God. The basis of this loyalty is God's liberation of Israel from slavery (v. 12) and God's insistence on fidelity (v. 14). There is no need to determine the strength of God's loyalty to Israel; that was tried once before, with disastrous results (v. 16; see Exod 17:1-7).

The last section of this passage (vv. 20-25) is simply a reprise of what has already been said. (Such repetitions are characteristic of Deuteronomy and lead some interpreters to locate the origins of the book in the situation of teaching and/or preaching.) At one time Israel was a slave of Pharaoh (v. 21). God freed Israel from slavery through a mighty display of power against Egypt (v. 22). The purpose of this gracious act was the fulfillment of the promises made to Israel's ancestors (v. 23). God now requires absolute loyalty from Israel, and this loyalty is Israel's only hope for the future (v. 24). Obedience, loyalty, and reverence are the keys to the kind of relationship with God that will preserve Israel's future (v. 25).

7:1-26 The nations. The Bible's pendulum swings back and forth with regard to the non-Israelite nations. At times the nations, too, will share in the blessings promised to Israel (Gen 12:1-3; Isa 42:1-4). They will be converted to the Lord (Isa 45:14-25; Jonah). At other times the nations are presented as Israel's implacable enemies, whose downfall is cause for rejoicing (Amos 1–3; Nahum).

This text is one of the harshest condemnations in the whole Bible, requiring Israel to annihilate the indigenous population of Canaan in the process of settling in the land promised to the ancestors of Israel (v. 2). Such a command is clearly abhorrent to the moral sensitivities of contemporary readers, but we should remember that this command was never carried out, nor was it ever intended to be. What, then, would have been the point of forbidding covenants and marriage with non-Israelite nations (vv. 2b-3)? This chapter represents a theological judgment on the nations, not a historical account of Israel's treatment of them.

While this theological judgment also is not very attractive to believers today, it reflects Israel's experience with the nations, especially Assyria and Babylon, which were serious threats to Israel's very existence at the time the Deuteronomic tradition was beginning to take shape. In these circumstances, Deuteronomy uses the strongest possible terms to mandate that Israel avoid any contact with the nations. The assumption behind such a prohibition is that cultural assimilation is just as great a threat to Israel's existence as is the political and military pressure being brought to bear upon Israel by the powerful nations warring against it.

7:1-5 Israel's enemies. Here the attitude toward the nations is unmistakably negative: every possible contact with them is to be avoided. No political agreements are to be made with them (v. 2b), for entering into such agreements would entail an explicit acknowledgment of the gods of the nations. While verse 3 may be directed at any type of intermarriage, the Deuteronomists more than likely have in mind marriages as political maneuvers (see 1 Kgs 11:1-8). These, too, inevitably involve explicit recognition of foreign deities. Finally, Israel is to destroy the appurtenances of the worship associated with these gods (v. 5). Adapting these to the worship of Yahweh, which apparently has been attempted (see 2 Kgs 18:4b), results in blurring the distinction between the God of Israel and the gods of the nations. Israel is to be committed to the service of Yahweh alone (Deut 6).

7:6-11 Holiness. The prohibitions regarding contact with the nations arose, not from any superiority on Israel's part, but because of Israel's election and the grave danger of Israel's failure to its responsibilities to God. Israel has been set apart from all other nations. The law was given to Israel in order to maintain that special relationship with God. The basis of this relationship is not Israel's inherent qualities but the divine love that focused its choice upon the least of all nations. People are to recognize Israel as God's choice because of Israel's love and obedience directed toward God. This fidelity will be rewarded, but quick retaliation will come to the unfaithful.

7:12-16 Blessing. God's fidelity is beyond question. The course of Israel's future, then, is largely dependent upon the quality of its adherence to the responsibilities that flow from its unique relationship with God. In a sense, the complete fulfillment of the promises made to Israel's ancestors depends upon Israel's obedience. Here Deuteronomy welds two covenantal traditions together. The unconditional promises made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob become bound to the conditional covenantal traditions related to Moses. The result of obedience is blessing, which is described here as abundance of life, prosperity, and well-being—a stark contrast to the conditions that afflicted those who experienced slavery in Egypt. But these blessings depend upon Israel's firm commitment to God and the preservation of its unique identity as the elect people of God.

7:17-26 Israel's victories. The nation of Israel ought to devote itself to obedience with reckless abandon. The metaphor used to illustrate this kind of obedience is Israel's armed conflicts with the population of Canaan. If Israel approaches these conflicts with absolute trust in God and total fearlessness in the face of human opposition, victory can be assured, for God will throw all Israel's opponents into a terrible panic, resulting in Israel's total victory. Verse 22 is an interesting bit of apologetic to explain why Israel's victories during the conquest were not complete. Judges 2:20-23 provides still another explanation: a few of Israel's enemies were allowed to survive in order to test Israel's faith.

8:1-20 A study in contrasts. Though Israel may eliminate external threats to the loyalty it owes to God, this does not mean that this loyalty is assured. There are also internal threats to Israel's commitment. These need to be identified. They may not appear to be as insidious as the worship of foreign gods, but in reality they are no less threatening to the allegiance that God expects of Israel. Moses now turns to these dangers from within and speaks of them by contrasting "remembering" and "forgetting," the desert and the arable land, human self-sufficiency and dependence upon God. These three contrasts are interwoven throughout this chapter, whose purpose is to keep Israel ever mindful of God.

Remembering the gracious acts of God in the Exodus from Egypt and in the guidance in the wilderness is basic to Israel's relationship with God, for such remembering is a stimulus to obedience. Remembering what God has done allows every generation to experience the reality and fidelity of God. Forgetting God leads inevitably to disobedience. The human will substitutes for the divine will. The claims of God are pushed to the sidelines of human awareness.

The contrast between the desert and the arable land does not intend to highlight the sterility of the former and the fertility of the latter; the contrast between the two lies in how the desert kept Israel from forgetting God, while the richness of the new land that Israel will possess can numb Israel to the divine presence. The wilderness was a place of testing as Israel learned to see its existence as totally dependent upon God. The harshness of life in the wilderness made it almost impossible to ignore divine nurture. To drive the point home even more dramatically, God cut off even the meager supply of food in the desert and had Israel live off manna, a miraculous source of nourishment. In the land of promise, Israel will have food in abundance, and then will come the inevitable temptation of believing that the abundance is the result of human efforts. In reality, divine providence supplies Israel's needs in both the wilderness and the new land.

God's purpose for Israel was achieved through human cooperation. Moses was the instrument God used to lead Israel out of Egypt and through the wilderness. The land of the promise is to be acquired through the leadership of Joshua and the efforts of the tribal militia. What begins with human cooperation can end with the pride of human self-sufficiency. Moses warns Israel that it can never afford to ignore the sustaining power of God, which may have been more evident in the wilderness but is just as much a reality in the arable land. Israel will be as dependent upon God in the new land as it was in the desert.

These three contrasts are intertwined with three commands calling for the fundamental, unswerving loyalty to God that is the hallmark of the Deuteronomic tradition (vv. 1, 11, 18). In each of these commands the word "today" emphasizes that every generation of Israel needs to remember God. Forgetfulness will lead to disaster.

The first command (v. 1) is the typical Deuteronomic call for obedience. It locates the motivation for obedience in the gifts of land and prosperity.

The second command (v. 11) is a more specific warning against ignoring the continuing role that God plays in Israel's life. Yahweh's sustenance of Israel is not limited to the wilderness period. Israel should broaden its horizons beyond that which is immediately known and experienced. Its prosperity in the land must not allow the reality of God to fade from its consciousness.

Finally, the third command (vv. 18-20) is a stern reminder of the consequences of "forgetting." It puts Israel on the same level as the nations that were not chosen to be God's own people. This, of course, would be the worst kind of disaster, for Israel is to remain a people with a unique relationship to God. But if Israel does not "remember" God, it will become easy to follow and serve the gods of the nations. Israel would then behave just as the nations it dispossessed behave. If Israel forgets God, it can look forward to being expelled from the land just as the nations were expelled.

9:1–10:11 Israel's stubbornness and God's grace. Another internal threat to Israel's relationship with God is Israel's belief in its own righteousness. Israel is, of course, totally dependent upon God's help in acquiring the land, but in order to reinforce the theme of Israel's unworthiness, Deuteronomy reminds Israel of its rebellion in the wilderness. Even as Moses was sealing the covenant between God and Israel, the people were worshiping an idol. The act of rebellion was enough to prompt God to destroy Israel. It was only through the intercession of Moses that Israel was saved from the full effects of God's anger so that the promises made to Israel's ancestors might be fulfilled.

9:1-6 The land as gift. Israel's victories over the Canaanites, represented by the Anakim (legendary giants), and their fortified cities will be due to God's power and fidelity. But because Israel itself will have to subdue the Canaanites (v. 3b), there will be the temptation to ignore God's help. In addition, the belief stated here (vv. 4-5) and in Gen 15:16 that the nations are being dispossessed because of their wickedness can easily be warped into a belief in Israel's righteousness. The truth is that Israel is no better than the nations. Despite all that God had done for Israel, the people were rebellious and stubborn in their refusal to serve God alone. The only reason Israel is favored over the nations is the oath that God swore to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (v. 5).

9:7-14 Rebellion. While Moses was in communion with God at Horeb, Israel turned to idolatry. At the very moment the covenant was being sealed, it was being broken by Israel. The irony is bitter. There could not have been a more inappropriate time for Israel to rebel, yet rebel is just what Israel did even as it stood at the very foot of God's mountain.

In verse 6 Moses called Israel a "stiff-necked" people; in verse 13 it is Yahweh who voices this condemnation of the people, along with the clear intention to destroy them. The wickedness of the nations led God to dispossess them; Israel's rebellion was now turning God against it as well. God's words to Moses in verse 14, "Let me be," were not taken by him as a prohibition but rather as an invitation to intercession. It is Moses who was able to turn God's anger from Israel, but before he began his intercession, Moses came down from the mountain and confronted the people who forgot their God.

9:15-21 The covenant is broken. Whatever the reason for the construction of the golden calf, Deuteronomy understands it as a direct breach of the command of God prohibiting false worship and the use of images. Moses' action in breaking the two tablets was not the result of an angry fit; he destroyed the tablets, which symbolized the covenantal bond between God and Israel, because Israel chose to destroy that relationship. As symbols, the tablets were robbed of all their significance when Israel constructed the golden calf. By not hesitating to include Aaron among the guilty (v. 20), the Deuteronomists are ready to indict the priesthood for helping Israel choose the way of rebellion.

9:22-24 More rebellion. Israel rebelled more than once. These verses mention four other incidents of rebellion in order to attest to Israel's rebellious character. This fatal flaw showed itself more than once during the wilderness period. Israel survived because of Moses' intercession, but what will become of Israel when there is no one like Moses to make intercession?

9:25-29 Moses' prayer. This prayer is another contrast drawn by the Deuteronomists. When speaking to Israel, Moses recalled the past to remind the people of their wickedness and disobedience. When speaking to God, Moses reminded God about the promises made to Israel's ancestors (v. 27) and of the gracious acts of salvation in the Exodus from Egypt (v. 29). Moses reminded God about the identity of the people destined for destruction: they are "your people and your heritage" (v. 25). They are the people whom God liberated from the slavery of Egypt. Moses was hoping that he could elicit from God another act of divine liberation. Israel needed to be freed from the debilitating effects of its own rebelliousness.

10:1-5 The ark of the covenant. To symbolize a renewed covenant between God and a rebellious Israel, the Lord authorized the manufacture of two new tablets. Once these had been inscribed with the Ten Commandments, they were placed in an ark, a wooden container used to hold these memorials of the covenant. Originally the ark was a symbol of the Israelite tribes' resistance to the Philistines (see 1 Sam 4:1b; 7:2). Later it was housed in the temple and was considered to be the footstool of God's throne and therefore symbolic of the divine presence (see Exod 25:1-22). In Deuteronomy the ark is simply a container for the tablets of the law. It is obedience to that law which guarantees God's favor, not any supposed presence of God in the temple.

10:6-9 An insertion. This text intrudes upon the story of Moses' intercession for the rebellious Israelites. Verses 6-7 reflect a somewhat different tradition about Aaron's death than is found in Num 20 and 33. Verses 8-9 give information found elsewhere in Deuteronomy (see 31:9, 25-26). The Levites were the ones who transported the ark when necessary. Two other Levitical functions are mentioned: their responsibility to lead worship and to bless the people in God's name.

10:10-11 The answer to Moses' prayer. Israel was not to be destroyed; the covenant was to be re-established. All this was the result of God's mercy and love. Divine justice called for Israel's annihilation. The Lord's fidelity to the promises made to Israel's ancestors and the Lord's willingness to hear Moses' pleas made the continued existence of Israel possible.

10:12–11:32 The great commandment. Before the Deuteronomists get into the specifics of the law for Israel's life in the land (chs. 12–26), they restate the great commandment, which calls for Israel's wholehearted love for God (10:12–11:25). Then, as a bridge to the specific commands, a warning is given (11:26-32), stating that the law has the potential of bringing a great blessing or a terrible curse upon the people. The requirements God makes of the nation have consequences. Israel's experience has shown quite conclusively that God is capable of fulfilling every promise made. If Israel wishes to secure its future in the land, loyalty to God and obedience to the law provide the only way to do so. Infidelity to the Lord and disregard of the commandments will bring disaster.

10:12-22 Israel's allegiance. The command calling for total commitment to God begins this transition to the Deuteronomic Code (chs. 12–26). In a variety of ways a single message comes through: the love of God is the centerpiece of Israel's response to Yahweh. This God is none other than the Creator of the universe, who freely chose to single out Israel's ancestors for special love. Israel's response is to include observance of rituals which celebrate that choice. Among these rituals is circumcision. But these observances must go beyond ritualistic activity to transformation of the spirit. Israel's entire approach to God must be overhauled (v. 16).

One way the people can show how seriously they take their election as the people of God is to accept responsibility for those members of the community whose social and economic status does not ensure their survival. In choosing Israel, God singled out a weak and powerless people to be the object of a unique love (Deut 7:7). In responding to that love, Israel must love the same kind of people God loves. Such a pattern of behavior will bring the complete fulfillment of the promises made by God to Israel's ancestors. One of those promises has already been fulfilled by the phenomenal growth in Israel's numbers (v. 22; see Gen 15:5-6). Another part of the promise, the gift of the land (Gen 17:8), still remains to be fulfilled. Israel's obedience will lead to the total fulfillment of all God's promises.

11:1-25 Memories. Here commands alternate with stories from Israel's collective memory to encourage obedience. Verse 1 begins this pattern. Its formulation of the basic command underlying the entire book introduces three lessons from the past that ought to promote obedience: the Exodus (vv. 2b-4), the wilderness experience (v. 5), and the affair of Dathan and Abiram (v. 6; see Num 16). These references to Israel's past provide both positive and negative illustrations of how God's grace and judgment affect the lives of the obedient and the disobedient. Remembering these great and terrible experiences is an education into the ways of God.

Verse 8 once again urges the people to keep the commandments of the Lord. In verses 9-12 a comparison between Egypt and Canaan provides the motivation for obedience. The Promised Land that awaits Israel is blessed by an abundance that rests on the provision of God. Egypt, by way of contrast, yields harvests only because of an irrigation system that is the work of human ingenuity and labor. The providential care of God over the land of Canaan is another inducement to obedience.

The thought of the previous section is carried on by verse 13, which calls for obedience as the means to ensure provision and prosperity from God in the future. God will provide the rain which, at the proper time, will bring success to Israel's agricultural endeavors. If Israel succumbs to the lies which assert that the land's fertility is guaranteed by other gods, Israel will find it impossible to survive in the land. The people will then have to learn the truth the hard way.

The last few verses of this section (vv. 16-25) are a concluding summary of Moses' address thus far. The main emphasis here is the obligations that God places upon Israel. These verses are a pastiche of admonitions given by Moses previously (see Deut 1:7-8; 2:25; 4:9-10, 38, 40; 6:2, 8-9, 17; 7:23-24). The repetition of this message underscores its importance: Israel's very existence is dependent upon its willingness to respond in kind to God's love.

11:26-32 The alternatives. Moses wants Israel to decide its future. He states the alternatives very clearly. The people can choose to be blessed, or they can choose to be cursed. Blessing is, of course, contingent upon Israel's obedience to the law. The detailed stipulations of that law are about to be presented to the people. Moses advises his audience that their acceptance of a life guided by the law is the only way they can expect the blessings promised to their ancestors. The law, then, is not simply a legal code to pattern Israel's behavior; it is the key to the fullness of life that awaits Israel on the other side of the Jordan River.

The last few verses (vv. 29-32) provide the outline of a ritual celebrating the relationship between God and Israel (a more detailed presentation of this ritual is given in Deut 27:1-26). The choice the people are called to make is really quite simple—it is a choice between Yahweh and other gods. Israel's choice is represented dramatically by a ritual celebrated near Shechem on the twin mountains Gerizim and Ebal. Israel knows that God has chosen it from all the nations of the world. Now it remains for Israel to choose Yahweh above all other gods. In reality, there is no real choice, but if Israel abandons Yahweh for what are really no gods, only misery and disaster will follow. If, however, Israel remains loyal to God, there is no limit to the expressions of God's love.

12:1–26:19 The Deuteronomic Code. Some of the laws found here are unique to Deuteronomy; most, however, are found in other codes, both Israelite and ancient Near Eastern. Deuteronomy's particular stamp may be recognized in its abiding concern for the poor, its humanization of older laws, and especially in its association of obedience with continued existence in the land. If the people wish to secure a future for themselves in the land God has provided, there is only one way—the way of obedience.

The term "code" is used rather loosely here. The Book of Deuteronomy is less a practical guide to legal matters than a recitation of traditional values and practices that the respected members of the community see as constitutive of the Israelite identity. There is no "logical" arrangement in this code, and, beginning with chapter 22, there is a succession of isolated laws that are not explained at any length; in fact, they seem to be unrelated to one another. This may confuse the contemporary reader.

Key words sometimes provide the connection between various laws, but sometimes this is not readily apparent in translation. In addition, the study of Hebrew rhetorical style is just beginning. Perhaps someday the "logic" of Deuteronomy's arrangement will become clear. Nonetheless, it is still important to remember that this book is not an exhaustive legal collection. It offers its readers a convenient summary of traditional practices and calls for their observance. The Deuteronomists are trying to inspire an attitude of submission and obedience. They are not necessarily concerned with providing the people with a complete code of law.

12:1-28 Centralization. The law requiring the centralization of Israel's sacrificial worship is unique to Deuteronomy and the literature dependent upon it. Previous legislation and practice envisioned such worship as taking place at any number of altars throughout the land (see Exod 20:24). Deuteronomy's departure from earlier usage is based on a concern for purity in Israel's cult and on the belief that a multiplicity of sanctuaries is incompatible with the worship of Israel's God. This concern for cultic purity and the desire for cultic unity are related, because both are founded on the recognition that Israel's God is not like the gods of the nations. The many local shrines that were once associated with the old Canaanite deities are unfit for Yahwistic worship. Those shrines have been replaced in favor of a single site chosen by the one God.

There are two other important dynamics in this passage that are characteristic of Deuteronomy: desacralization and humanization. Unlike the old gods of Canaan, the Lord is not a personified natural force; consequently, nothing in nature is sacred in itself. If a place becomes a medium of the divine presence, it is because of God's free choice rather than because of the site's inherent sacredness.

Second, this passage allows the slaughter of domestic animals for profane use (vv. 15, 20). Though blood is not to be consumed with the meat, it has no special sacred character and is therefore poured out like water (vv. 16, 24). The blood is to be offered to God (v. 27), probably as an acknowledgment of the divine sovereignty over life, which is symbolized by the blood.

Finally, Deuteronomy invests sacrifice with a twofold purpose. The first represents private religious concerns, such as the fulfillment of a vow (v. 7). A second purpose is more humanitarian in its orientation, providing the worshiper with an opportunity to share the blessing of the land, rejoice in the Lord, and offer help to the economically dependent (vv. 7, 12, 18).

In this passage there are repetitions, conflicting viewpoints, and differences in terminology, pointing to its complicated literary history. The original law regarding the central sanctuary can be found in verses 13-19. Later additions (vv. 2-7, 8-12 and 20-28) all agree to the restriction of worship to a single shrine, the choice of which is left to God alone.

12:1-7 Destruction of Canaanite sanctuaries. Centralization of worship is presented as the logical consequence of carrying out a previously given command to destroy Canaanite shrines and their appurtenances (v. 3; see Deut 7:5). Hills and shady trees were often chosen as sites for sanctuaries because they were associated with the divine by various Semitic peoples. The cultic activity that took place at these sites was unequivocally condemned as evil by the prophets (see Hos 4:3; Jer 2:20; Ezek 6:13).

The expression "designated as his dwelling" (v. 5) is a formula used by kings in the ancient Near East to indicate ownership. The Deuteronomistic History uses this same expression to refer to Jerusalem (1 Kgs 9:3; 11:36; 14:21; 2 Kgs 21:4, 7). Similarly, the expression "out of all your tribes" refers to Jerusalem in 1 Kgs 8:16; 11:32; 14:21; 2 Kgs 21:7. This implies that the place chosen by the Lord for the one sanctuary permitted is Jerusalem. Of course, Deuteronomy could not name the city, since Jerusalem was not incorporated into Israel until the time of David (see 2 Sam 5:6-12).

12:8-12 Centralization as the goal of Israel's pilgrimage. The Deuteronomists are very well aware that the requirement of a single sanctuary flies in the face of earlier, legitimate practices. This passage characterizes all those earlier usages as provisional. The "rest" that the Lord gives to Israel (see 1 Kgs 5:4; 8:36) inaugurates a new age marked by worship at one sanctuary chosen by God. Centralization of worship was apparently attempted by Hezekiah (2 Kgs 18:4) and Josiah (2 Kgs 23:8-9, 12-15, 20), but their attempts did not outlive them. Deuteronomy's goal of centralization of worship succeeded because the war with Babylon reduced the land under Israelite control to Jerusalem and a few square miles surrounding it. Thus, the Deuteronomists made virtue out of necessity.

12:13-19 Some effects of centralization. The earliest of the laws about the central sanctuary is addressed to Israel in the second person singular, as is the case with most of the early Deuteronomic legislation. One consequence of this law is permission for profane slaughter of domestic animals. That becomes a practical necessity because ritual slaughter is to be limited to the central shrine. Even though the daily diet rarely includes meat, the slaughter of animals for food has to be disconnected from the cult. The Levites who minister at the shrines to be eliminated in favor of the one sanctuary are commended to the charity of the Israelites, as are other economically dependent groups (widows, orphans, and aliens: see Deut 12:12; 14:27-28; 16:11; 18:6-7; 26:11-12).

12:20-28 A limitation. The effect of verse 21 is to limit the rather broad permission of verse 25 regarding the non-cultic slaughter of animals for food. Such permission is restricted to sites whose distance from the central sanctuary makes ritual killing of the animals a practical impossibility. Verse 28 is a homiletical conclusion to the entire passage about the central shrine. Obedience is commended because it assures Israel of God's favor.

While the law of centralization is an important Deuteronomic innovation, the bulk of the book deals with legislation that neither requires nor even mentions centralization. Still, this innovation was a decisive moment in the life of ancient Israel. It offered a sense of unity and cohesion at a time when Israel's other institutions were dead or dying. Centralization of worship was indeed an innovation, but one that resulted from a fresh interpretation of the ancient cultic pattern of the wilderness. What was entirely feasible in Moses' day was never again realized by Israel until Deuteronomy. Under the influence of this book, centralization became the way to express the unique nature of Israel's God and Israel's unique relationship with the Divine.

12:29–13:18 The specter of infidelity. The unsympathetic treatment of the nations in Deuteronomy is not so much the result of a feeling of ethnic or cultural superiority by the Deuteronomists as it is the result of their fear that Israel is in very real danger of being lost forever in a sea of assimilation. If Israel is to have any future at all, it will be because of a clearly formulated self-definition manifested through distinctive cultural patterns that mark Israel as different from the nations. Certainly the most distinctive of those cultural patterns is Israel's religion, with its emphasis on loyalty to one, and only one, God. As a result of this concern, Deuteronomy is almost ruthless in its determination to ensure that Israel maintain its loyalty to Yahweh alone. This particular section deals with attempts at subverting Israel's allegiance and how these are to be handled.

12:29-31 Foreign religious rituals. Historians of religion are quite certain that much of Israel's cult was adopted from the religious rituals of Canaan, which were modified to conform with Yahwistic beliefs. For example, the agricultural festival of Passover took on a distinctively Yahwistic tone through its association with the Exodus (see Deut 16:1-6). In a similar fashion, the Israelite priesthood, sacrificial system, and even the Jerusalem temple derived from Canaanite patterns in use for a long time before Israel came into existence. But all this was lost in Israel's collective memory by the time Deuteronomy was written.

What the Deuteronomists have before their eyes is the temptation Israel faces: the desertion of Yahweh in favor of the gods of the conquered nations. To counteract this temptation, Deuteronomy recalls traditions associated with the settlement period (vv. 29-30) and reminds Israel of the disgusting nature of the religious rituals never adopted officially by Israel, such as child sacrifice (v. 31). The unremitting critique of non-Israelite religion is to overcome the impulse toward assimilation that threatens not only Israel's unique religious identity but also its very existence.

12:32–13:18 Internal threats. As severe as their critique of non-Israelite religions is, the Deuteronomists recognize that the most serious threats to the covenant come from within. The steps to be taken with regard to these threats show how seriously Deuteronomy takes the obligation of absolute loyalty to God.

Surprisingly enough, the first to come under scrutiny are the prophets (13:1-5). The enticement to apostasy can and has come from religious authorities such as the prophets. Deuteronomy betrays a real lack of confidence in those religious authorities by listing them as first among those who can lead Israel to compromise its allegiance to Yahweh. Of course, Deuteronomy presents itself as the authoritative word from God which, in effect, makes prophecy obsolete. The people can determine the divine will by consulting this written, authoritative document rather than by relying on human and fallible religious authorities who have the potential of leading them astray. Israel will never go astray by obeying the prescriptions found in Deuteronomy.

The loyalty Israel owes to God transcends every human bond, even that of the family (13:6-11). If a family member is an enticement to idolatry, Israelites loyal to God will not let familial love take precedence over the love they have for God. While this text makes use of legal language, its basic thrust is homiletical. It focuses on the value of allegiance to God rather than on the presentation of specific rules of conduct. It should be understood and interpreted as are similar passages in the New Testament, such as Matt 10:34-38 and its parallels.

A third internal threat can be an entire city that has gone over to the worship of other gods (13:12-18). From the perspective of the Exile, this is not simply a rhetorical exaggeration. The Assyrian and Babylonian conquests reduced Israel to a fraction of what it once was. All of Galilee and central Palestine was lost. From the perspectives of the Deuteronomists, those losses could be explained in only one way—Israel's disloyalty. If the remnant of Israel will not be engulfed by the nations, it will be because of a firm decision to foster absolute loyalty to the Lord.

According to Deuteronomy, Israel's continued existence is dependent upon maintaining its commitment to God. Any compromise is equivalent to communal suicide. The Deuteronomists make their point with shocking clarity and single-minded conviction. There is no room whatsoever for anyone within the community who fosters an attitude of apostasy. Israel's life and future hang in the balance. What choice does Israel have?

14:1-21 Holiness. At first glance the material of this chapter seems to have little to do with holiness. That is true if one defines holiness in terms of virtues to be acquired and vices to be avoided. From the Israelite perspective, holiness is a consequence of God's uniqueness. The God of Israel is not like the gods of the nation, and so those who serve this God cannot pattern their behavior according to the customs associated with the service of foreign gods. Israel is to be holy, that is, unique, as its God is holy.

Verses 1 and 2 prohibit the observance of mourning rites practiced in Canaanite religions. (Such rites apparently perdured throughout Israel's history, even into the exilic period—see Ezek 9:14-15.) Those mourning rituals are associated with the worship of the dying and rising god, reflecting the alternating agricultural cycles of infertility and fertility. For Israel, those cycles do not form an apt metaphor for Yahweh, whose rule over the cosmos is absolute. Israel is the Lord's own possession (v. 2). It is unthinkable, then, for the Lord's own people to observe foreign rituals.

The rest of this unit (vv. 3-21) deals with dietary laws. The origin of these observances is beyond recovery. Even the English translations of the names of some of the animals and birds listed here are no more than educated guesses. No matter what the origin of these laws may have been, their importance in the exilic and postexilic community cannot be overestimated.

Observance of these dietary laws helped early Judaism develop its identity. It effectively cut off socializing with non-Jews and thereby helped to fend off the impulse to assimilation. Gradually these dietary laws, as they were developed and enlarged in early Judaism, became so ingrained in the Jewish religious identity that the first Christians had a difficult time conceiving of the possibility of genuine religion without them (Acts 15:29; Col 2:21). The basic assumption behind these dietary laws is that the people of God cannot be like the people who worship foreign gods, and this distinction is to extend even to matters of diet.

Especially interesting is verse 21b, which prohibits the boiling of a kid in its mother's milk. (Later the rabbis extrapolated from this law the prohibition of eating dairy and meat products at the same meal.) This prohibition is unlike the others in this section, which deal with clean and unclean animals. There is some evidence that this law may be a conscious rejection of a particular Canaanite ritual, but the evidence is not sufficient to make a firm conclusion. In any case, all these laws remind Israel that its future depends on its willingness to keep away from anything that may be construed as compromising its commitment to God.

14:22–15:23 Israel's bounty. A basic Israelite belief was that though God gave the land to Israel, it really belonged to the Lord who gave it as a gift to Israel, in accordance with the promises made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. An important consequence of this belief was a recognition of Israel's dependence upon God's bounty. The wealthy and the poor alike were to acknowledge God as the source of their sustenance. The legislation in this section describes some of the ways in which Israel chose to express this belief: the tithe, the year of release, the treatment of slaves, and the offering of firstlings.

Throughout this section Deuteronomy's particular regard for the poor is quite evident. In fact, Deut 15:4-5 claims that obedience could make poverty non-existent, but a more realistic assessment of Israel's potential for obedience recognizes the existence of poverty and the need for generosity on the part of the wealthy (15:11). This concern for the poor is one manifestation of a broader humanitarian bent within Deuteronomy. For example, Deut 14:22-27 implies that the purpose of tithing is to provide food especially for the poor. There is no mention of any sacral purpose for tithing, as an offering made for God's benefit. Even the use of the tithe as support for priests and Levites is ignored by Deuteronomy (compare Num 18:21-28). The Levites receive part of the tithe, not because of their priestly status, but because of their need as those without economic status (14:27, 29).

Finally, Deuteronomy makes practical accommodations in view of its expectation that there is to be only one sanctuary. Deut 14:25 speaks of turning the tithe into cash, which would obviate the necessity of transporting agricultural products over long distances to the central sanctuary. Similarly, while Exod 22:30 expects the sacrifice of the firstlings to take place eight days after birth, Deut 15:20 eliminates the necessity of frequent trips to the central sanctuary by stating that this sacrifice could take place anytime during the year.

The tithe (14:22-29) was an offering of a portion of agricultural produce originally intended for the support of sanctuaries and their personnel. It was a custom widely practiced in the ancient Near East. (Though the word "tithe" in Hebrew appears to be etymologically related to the word "ten," not all Hebrew philologists agree. They see "tithe" as related to the Ugaritic word for "libation, offering.") In the monarchic period, the king probably appropriated a portion of the tithe to support royal sanctuaries, such as the temple in Jerusalem. Deuteronomy ignores this use of the tithe. It simply provides the menu for a festal meal celebrated at the central sanctuary. Every three years the tithe is to be used locally for the welfare of the poor (14:28-29).

The law of release (15:1-11) reflects the Israelite practice of allowing the land to lie fallow at regular intervals (Exod 23:10-11). Obviously, the observance of such a practice would have been staggered throughout the land, but each time it was observed by an individual farmer, the fallow year made it difficult for those economically dependent upon agriculture. They would have found repaying their debts almost impossible. This law probably intended that debts not be called in during a farmer's fallow year, though later Jewish tradition required that the debt be forgiven rather than simply postponed. The "foreigner" spoken of in 15:3 is not the resident alien, who is somewhat integrated into the Israelite economic and agricultural system, but the traveling merchant or craftsman, who is not affected by the fallow year. The law makes it clear that no one is to take advantage of another's financial difficulties. The poor are to experience the generosity of their fellow Israelites (15:9-11).

One way to settle a debt is for debtors to work off their indebtedness. Verses 12-19 attempt to prevent abuses in this system. The service of the slave working off debts is to be limited. Male and female slaves have the same rights. When the service of slaves is completed, they are to be given financial support in order to ease their transition to freedom. To provide motivation for the observance of these humane regulations, Deuteronomy reminds its readers that they are descended from slaves. The Israelite who is working off a debt always remains an Israelite. The lender needs to remember the origin common to all (15:15).

The law regarding the offering of male firstlings (15:19-23) probably had its origin in rituals intended to ensure continued fertility by offering the firstlings to the gods. Deuteronomy upholds this practice adopted by Israel (see Exod 13:2), but once again the purpose of this action is not for the sake of supporting the sanctuary and its clergy; rather, it is to supply food for a festal meal.

Israel has experienced the wondrous power of the Lord to provide for all the people. Israel's response to this experience of God's abundance is to be a sharing through which both rich and poor can acknowledge their dependence upon God. Through their tithes the rich testify that God is the source of their abundance. By accepting the generosity of their fellow Israelites, the poor receive their support from God, who gives all Israel a share in the wealth of the land.

16:1-17 A calendar of feasts. This section deals with the pilgrimage feasts of Passover-Unleavened Bread, Weeks, and Booths. These feasts are known from other portions of the Pentateuch (Exod 23:14-17; 34:18-23; Lev 23; Num 28–29). Deuteronomy's particular stamp on the celebration of these festivals lies in transforming them into occasions of pilgrimage to the central sanctuary. For example, according to this text, the Passover meal must be eaten at the central sanctuary (vv. 5-6) rather than in the towns of the land, as was the previous custom (Lev 23:3).

The first feast, Passover-Unleavened Bread, is a combination of what were originally two separate observances. The Passover, marked by eating a lamb from the flock, probably originated among shepherds as they were changing pastures in the spring (Abib corresponds to March/April). The feast of Unleavened Bread probably originated among farmers as they renewed their supplies of leaven each year by first ridding themselves of the previous year's supply. These two feasts were joined already before the Deuteronomists began their work. Israelite tradition associated this feast with the Exodus from Egypt. Deuteronomy maintains this association but does not develop it in any significant way, except to insist upon its celebration at the central sanctuary.

The feast of Weeks derives its name from the way the time of its celebration is calculated. Since this feast is observed on the fiftieth day after Passover, the New Testament calls it Pentecost (Acts 2:1). It, too, originated as an agricultural festival, celebrating the grain harvest (see 15:9), which occurs in June. In rabbinic tradition this feast became associated with the giving of the law on Sinai, but no such association is made here. Verse 12 does remind the readers of Israel's slavery in Egypt in order to move them to obedience. Again, the principal concern of Deuteronomy is to encourage a pilgrimage to the central sanctuary for a festival of rejoicing for all to enjoy (v. 11).

The third feast is Booths, which is an autumnal agricultural feast celebrated at the conclusion of the harvest of dates, olives, grapes and other fruits. The name probably derives from the temporary dwellings that were erected in the orchards for the harvesters. Rabbinic tradition used this feast to commemorate Israel's time in the desert, when the people lived in temporary dwellings (tents). Again, this text makes no such allusion. The agricultural dimensions of this celebration are dominant here. In fact, there is no allusion at all to any element of the Exodus tradition. Deuteronomy simply describes the feast of Booths as the third pilgrimage feast to be celebrated at the central sanctuary.

The final two verses (15:16-17) summarize the obligation to make the three annual pilgrimages to the central sanctuary. Since these feasts celebrate the agricultural abundance of the land, it is appropriate that those making the pilgrimage come with offerings as a sign of thanksgiving for the bounty God has given them. This legislation as stated is quite impractical. It envisions the entire male population (at the very least) at the central sanctuary for each of these three festivals. The improbable scene becomes a bit more probable if this portion of Deuteronomic legislation is considered to have originated in the exilic or postexilic period, when Judah was reduced to Jerusalem and about twenty square miles surrounding it.

16:18–18:22 Israel's leaders. An important concern in Israel was the quality of its leadership. The Deuteronomists describe their expectations of those who are to hold specific offices: judge, king, priest, and prophet. What is most significant in Deuteronomy's presentation is the assumption that Israel's leaders, especially the king, are subject to the written, authoritative law found in the Book of Deuteronomy. The rule of the king is not absolute. All Israel's leaders are bound by the sacred traditions that find expression in Deuteronomy. This serves to limit the authority of the leadership class and makes it more responsible to the people as a whole. Deuteronomy clearly espouses belief in the value of limited government.

16:18–17:7 Judges and officers. Before the establishment of the monarchy, Israel's leaders were tribal elders for the most part. The elders were the leaders of important families and clans. They functioned in such a way as to prevent political power from being concentrated in the hands of a single person. With the rise of the monarchy, the influence of the elders waned, and their role in Israelite society was taken by officials appointed by the king. Verse 18 suggests official appointments made by some sort of centralized authority. It is difficult to be certain of all this because the Bible presents no theoretical account of Israel's social, political, and judicial institutions. In 2 Chr 19:5 there is mention of the judicial reforms of Jehoshaphat, who reigned in Judah during the ninth century B.C.E., so there is evidence for the appointment of judges by the central authority.

The role that the judges played in Israelite society was not confined to the judicial sphere. The judges were probably the equivalent of local governors responsible for the affairs of the district assigned to them. They exercised executive and legislative prerogatives as well as judicial ones. While the judges formulated policy, the officers were responsible for communicating and enforcing the decisions of the judges to whom they were responsible.

Deuteronomy is adamant about the integrity of the legal system, which was even more open to corruption in antiquity than is the case now. Judges supported themselves from their positions, and bribery was the easiest way to acquire a comfortable position. Verse 20 asserts that justice is the way to ensure prosperity for all. Harsh experience has taught Israel how destructive lapses in judicial authority can be.

At first glance the material in 16:18–17:7 seems to be intrusive in a context that deals with leadership. The concern of these verses is the purity of Israel's worship. What this section does, however, is to provide an example of how the judicial system operates (17:2-7) and samples of the matters that ought to concern the judiciary (16:21–7:1). Judges are to keep a keen eye on any attempts at introducing Canaanite religion practices into Yahwistic worship. Such attempts would be repulsive to God and destructive of Israelite society.

Second, the judges are to oversee sacrificial practices in order to ensure that Israel is taking this aspect of worship seriously. To offer inferior animals for sacrifice is nothing less than a mockery of the very purpose of such worship.

Finally, the judicial process demands integrity not only of those administering it but of all involved in it (17:6-7). No one can be convicted on the testimony of a lone witness. Witnesses have to be prepared to face the severest of penalties if their testimony proves false. All Israel is responsible for the integrity of the judicial system. The principal purpose of that system is to purge Israel of corrupting practices that threaten the very existence of the community.

17:8-13 The court at the central sanctuary. Deuteronomy makes provision for the handling of matters too involved for the local judiciary. The text does not make it clear who initiates the appeal, though Exod 18:13-23 suggests that appeals are made by local authorities. The central court is composed of priests and a judge. The inclusion of the former rests on the traditional expertise of priests in legal matters. The Deuteronomists probably introduce the judge as a way to break the exclusive control of the priests in such matters. The judgments of the central court are to resolve legal problems in a definitive way. Without such finality the judicial system would be too weak to be effective.

17:14-20 The king. The institution of the monarchy began as a response to the anarchy caused by the pressure brought to bear on the Israelite tribes by the Philistines (see 1 Sam 8–10). Because the beginnings of the monarchy were part of Israel's historical memory, this institution could not be mythologized, as it was in the other ancient Near Eastern cultures, as part of the divinely willed order of creation. Israel knew that the monarchy was established as a result of human initiative. This made Deuteronomy's approach to the monarchy possible.

Deuteronomy does not reject the monarchy as such. It is part of Israel's past and cannot be ignored; however, its role in Israel's future needs to be carefully understood. The king is not to imitate his counterparts in the ancient Near East by amassing a large standing army, by engaging in diplomacy through marriage, or by accumulating vast wealth. If Israel's God is unlike the gods of the nations, Israel's king has to be different as well.

For Deuteronomy, what makes Israel's monarchy unique is the subjection of the king to the law. Like every other Israelite, the king, too, is to order his life according to the Book of the Law. This is an important check on the monarchy's inherent tendency toward absolutism. Obedience to the law will lead to the maintenance of the king, while disobedience will surely lead to disaster. The king, like every other Israelite, is bound to the observance of the law. United in this observance, king and subjects are one people of God.

18:1-8 Priests and Levites. Priests and Levites as such are not discussed in Deuteronomy except when a layperson has some occasion to deal with them. The lone exception is this text. This is in marked contrast to the legislation of the Priestly writer. This passage tries to deal with the conflict over priestly rights—a conflict that raged between the priests of Jerusalem and the priests of the outlawed local shrines. The latter lost their source of income with the centralization of sacrificial worship mandated by Deuteronomy. The solution provided by verses 6-8 is completely impractical and was probably never put into practice (see 2 Kgs 23:8-9). Early in the postexilic era an accommodation was worked out by which the Levites became a type of second-rank clergy in the temple, while the priests of Jerusalem retained their exclusive position as those responsible for the conduct of the sacrificial cult (see Ezek 44:9-31). The end of the feud between these two groups, however, was not the achievement of Deuteronomic circles.

Some interpreters suggest that Deuteronomy was the product of Levitical circles. In light of this text, such an alternative seems unlikely, since the presumed authors of a book such as Deuteronomy would settle any disputes to which they were a party in their own favor. At the very least, they should have presented a more workable suggestion than is given here. In a few of the other times the Levites are mentioned in Deuteronomy, they are presented as objects of charity whose economic situation is so perilous that they need the help of their fellow Israelites (14:28-29; 16:11-14; 26:12). This is not a very flattering self-portrait by the supposed authors of Deuteronomy.

18:9-22 Prophets. Before the Deuteronomists discuss the role of the prophet, they deal with some of the mantic techniques that were obviously very popular in ancient Israel. According to the biblical tradition, there are three legitimate methods of divine-human communication: dreams (Gen 40); the Urim and Thummim (see the comment on 33:8-11 below); and prophecy.

The ancient Near East in general, and Mesopotamia in particular, was renowned for the variety of techniques developed to determine the divine will. Verses 10-11 mention a few of these. Deuteronomy rejects all of them as being incompatible with Yahwism. The chief objection to these techniques probably is not their use for determining God's will but rather their use in various rituals designed to manipulate the deity. Once the divine will has been determined, the ones making the inquiry would be given advice as to how they might change any decisions of the deity that might affect them adversely. The child sacrifice cited in verse 10 is likely one of the more gruesome rituals used with divination. From Deuteronomy's perspective, the God of Israel is above such gross manipulation. Use of divinatory techniques is the grounds justifying the Canaanites' expulsion from the land (v. 14). This ought to be warning enough for Israel.

Deuteronomy's treatment of the prophet does not lead to unqualified confidence in this form of leadership. Verses 15-19 apparently presume the continuance of the prophetic office, but who can claim to be another Moses (v. 15)? The text does not assume that there will be many prophets able to make this claim. Some interpreters suggest that this text testifies to the existence of a succession of prophets to an office of "the prophet." There is no direct evidence of such an office anywhere in the Bible. Its existence is unlikely.

Prophets are mentioned only twice in Deuteronomy—here and in 13:1-6. In both instances the prophets are presented as potential threats to the loyalty that Israel owes God.

Prophets are to be monitored very carefully, for they can lead, and presumably have led, Israel away from undivided service and obedience to the Lord (see Jer 28). The test for true prophecy given in verse 22 is quite impractical and of no use to anyone who has to make a decision regarding a specific case with any immediacy.

Deuteronomy can afford to be so negative about prophecy because it effectively eliminates its usefulness. If people want to know the divine will, all they need to do is study the Book of the Law, that is, Deuteronomy itself. The book's treatment of prophecy makes it highly unlikely that Deuteronomy arose amid prophetic circles, as some interpreters claim. At one time any text reflecting moral sensitivity was attributed to prophetic circles. Deuteronomy shares with prophecy a passionate concern for the ethical dimension of Israel's life with God, but it presents a singularly unflattering portrait of the prophet.

19:1-13 The cities of refuge. Though Deuteronomy itself does not use the term "cities of refuge," as does Num 35, both texts envision the same institution. Its origins are not easy to determine. Because the cities of refuge presuppose a transtribal identity, they must have been established some time in the latter part of the settlement period. On the other hand, the monarchy probably provided some sort of centralized authority to deal with the judicial determination of any killing as accidental or criminal. The cities of refuge, then, were an intertribal institution that attempted to restrain acts of revenge. Deuteronomy provides the theological support for this institution by asserting that it prevents the shedding of innocent blood and the consequent guilt, one effect of which would be the loss of the land (compare Gen 4:8-14).

In its presentation of the cities of refuge, Deuteronomy discusses both their use (vv. 4-10) and their abuse (vv. 11-13). As unfortunate as an accidental killing may be, its terrible effects will be multiplied if people rush to judgment and punish people responsible for accidental deaths as if they were murderers. Such a reaction would set off another act of "justice" and could thereby begin an unremitting cycle of killings. The cities of refuge provide the opportunity for a calm determination of guilt or innocence.

Unfortunately, the wrong people may take advantage of the sanctuary provided by these cities. The elders, who were the premonarchic dispensers of justice, must be vigilant to prevent a murderer from escaping justice. Those guilty of murder are themselves to be killed, because their shedding of innocent blood threatens the continued existence of Israel in the land. According to the religious perspectives of the Deuteronomists, the effects of a sin such as murder touch not only the one responsible for it but all those who seemingly acquiesce to it. By punishing the guilty individual, the community demonstrates its revulsion for the crime and thereby escapes any guilt and punishment flowing from it. While the cities of refuge help prevent the shedding of innocent blood, they must never become a way for the guilty to escape the consequences of their crimes.

19:14 The landmark. This is the Deuteronomic version of an ancient, pre-Israelite law found in other ancient Near Eastern law codes. Without the legal safeguards of deeds recorded and maintained by civil authorities, respecting landmarks is essential in avoiding disputes over territory. Deuteronomy adds its own typical flavor to this ancient law: the land was given by the Lord to its present owners. Attempts at expropriating it are nothing less than acts of rebellion against the Lord.

19:15-21 Witnesses. The integrity of the judicial system depends on the truthfulness of witnesses. What was decreed with regard to accusations of idolatry (17:6-7) is extended to all cases. When the veracity of witnesses is in doubt, appeal is to be made to the court at the central shrine (v. 17). The text does not describe the procedures used by the court to decide the issue of perjury. The focus here is on the punishment due to those guilty of lying in the course of judicial proceedings. The punishment for perjury corresponds to the punishment for the crime of which the false witnesses accused their fellow Israelites. In the end, evil will overtake those who plan evil for others. Verse 21 underscores this principle. Those who endanger the lives of the innocent by their perjury will find that their own lives are forfeit.

20:1-20 Rules for warfare. Deuteronomy has already dealt with the topic of war (see 7:1-26). This chapter provides additional legislation, which will be augmented by Deut

21:10-14; 23:9-14; 24:5; 25:17-19. All this attention to war may be offensive to modern sensibilities, but one cannot deny that ancient Israel acquired the land of Canaan, in part, through violent means. In fact, some interpreters believe that war was a cultic institution in the early years of Israel's history. The term "holy war" was coined to describe this institution. "Holy war" is a particularly infelicitous expression. It occurs nowhere in the Bible. It is doubtful that any manner of waging war was ever a fixed cultic pattern in Israel's history. The theology of divinely willed and directed wars was an ancient Near Eastern commonplace. What we read here and elsewhere in Deuteronomistic literature is an interpretation of Israel's battlefield experiences and memories. It hardly describes actual strategy and tactics.

A basic conviction of this ideology of warfare is that the outcome is determined in the heavens, where the gods of the warring nations fight one another for power and domination in the heavenly sphere. What happens on earthly battlefields merely reflects what has already happened in the heavenly realms. That is why the priest is the first to exhort those entering battle (vv. 2-4). That is why Israel's strength does not depend on numerical superiority or formidable weaponry. Deuteronomy reminds Israel that God fought against and defeated Egypt, a powerful empire, when Israel itself was powerless.

This chapter deals with three specific concerns regarding the conduct of war: exemption from military service (vv. 5-9); the treatment of enemy cities (vv. 10-18); and the protection of natural resources in time of war (vv. 19-20).

The laws specifying circumstances allowing for various exemptions from military service find many parallels in the laws of other ancient Near Eastern countries. Originally these exemptions recognized that people in "transition" were in a particularly vulnerable situation. The ancients spoke of that vulnerability in terms of subjection to demonic powers. There was no need to expose the entire army to these dangers, so those experiencing transitions in their lives were simply exempted from military service. Deuteronomy demythologizes those practices and allows for the same exemptions on purely humanitarian grounds. In addition, Deuteronomy exempts from battle all those whose faith is weak. In difficult circumstances their weakness could affect the whole army. It is better that they not be a part of the battle at all.

The treatment of enemy cities appears brutal, but what is described here (vv. 10-18) is not any more brutal than the practices of other nations in the ancient Near East. In interpreting these verses, it is important to remember that Deuteronomy is more ideological than realistic in its presentation of Israelite military policies. Israel is not in a position to conduct itself according to these prescriptions. Israel is more in danger of having its cities destroyed than its neighbors are.

No quarter is to be given to any Canaanite cities because of the dangers the Canaanites pose with regard to the absolute fidelity that Israel owes to God (vv. 16-18). That Israel's prophets consistently upbraided it for following the ways of the nations is proof enough that Israel did not engage in any full-scale extermination of the Canaanites. Though there were conflicts between the Israelites and the Canaanites, most of the latter gradually became assimilated among the Israelite population as Israel acquired hegemony over Canaan.

Finally, verses 19-20 indicate that Israel is not to implement a scorched-earth policy in its conflicts with other nations. Resources, especially those connected with food production, are to be preserved with care. Here Israel departs from the more common practice of the day, which witnessed the indiscriminate use of military destructiveness. Only that which threatens Israel's loyalty to God is to be treated without mercy; in other cases humanity and common sense ought to keep a rein on the destructive potential of war.

21:1–25:19 Miscellaneous laws. The next five chapters contain laws covering a wide variety of topics. They are not arranged in any particular order, but all serve to describe the pattern of Israel's life in the land. They all are supported by a single assumption: obedience to these laws will help Israel secure its future in the land.

21:1-9 The unsolved murder. This is another instance of Deuteronomy's adaptation of a practice that was probably pre-Israelite in origin. Ancient Near Eastern law codes held that the city nearest the site of an unsolved murder had to bear responsibility for the crime. The leaders of that community were required to perform a ritual that not only accepted responsibility for the crime but also deflected the guilt and punishment for the crime from the city. This practice reflects the strong ancient Near Eastern belief in group solidarity and the religious implications of a crime such as murder. Unless specific action was taken, the consequences of that crime had the potential of destroying innocent people.

The text describes a ritual that cannot be considered sacrificial, since Deuteronomy allows sacrifice only at the central shrine. The Levitical priests are simply mute witnesses rather than officiants. The ritual is conducted entirely by the elders of the city nearest the site of the unsolved murder. At the conclusion of the ritual, the elders pray that the guilt of the crime not be attached to their city nor to the nation as a whole. The words of this prayer transform the remnants of a magical rite into an act of obedience to the law and a petition for mercy. This Deuteronomic composition testifies to the belief that forgiveness is an act of God's grace, which cannot be manipulated by the performance of any ritual.

21:10-21 Family relationships. In the first two situations dealt with here (marriage with a female prisoner of war, vv. 10-14; and the inheritance rights of the first-born, vv. 15-17), the Deuteronomists assume the existence of polygamy. Though polygamy was practiced in ancient Israel, monogamy was far more common because of economic and social problems, such as those presented in this legislation. Later, for theological reasons, monogamy became the only form of marriage permitted in Judaism.

When an Israelite soldier wishes to marry a prisoner of war, he has to consider the woman's sensibilities and control his own impulses. First of all, the woman is to have time to deal with the shock of captivity, the separation from her family, and the integration into a new household. To allow for these transitions, the marriage is to be consummated only after one month. Once the former captive becomes the wife of an Israelite, she must be treated as his wife. In the case of divorce, she does not revert to her former status but is given the freedom due to any Israelite woman.

Laws of inheritance in the ancient world tended to favor the first-born. As a consequence, there developed the custom whereby a father selected his "first-born." This situation became especially complicated in a polygamous household. The Deuteronomists want to secure the rights of the actual first-born son, irrespective of the father's feelings toward him or his mother. No doubt conflicts like this one contributed to favoring the monogamous form of marriage.

Finally, the Deuteronomists deal with disputes that arise between parents and children (vv. 18-21). Because of the great respect due to the older generation in general, and parents in particular, rebellious young people put themselves into a precarious situation. The elders (v. 19) probably serve as mediators to calm the passions that might develop out of domestic squabbles. They prevent parents from becoming carried away by their anger with a recalcitrant son. The elders are permitted to let the full penalty of the law (v. 21) fall upon the "stubborn and rebellious" son only in cases where there are no other alternatives. The elders, then, serve as a societal safety-valve preventing family arguments from being blown all out of proportion.

21:22-23 Hanging. Hanging was not a form of capital punishment in ancient Israel. After some other form of execution, the criminal's body was put on public display as an object lesson to those who might threaten Israel's existence by their crimes. The Deuteronomists mercifully limit this gruesome spectacle by requiring burial on the same day as execution.

22:1-4 Respect for property. The principle behind this law is that a person's ownership of property does not cease when that property becomes lost. It is the duty of every Israelite to respect the property rights of all people. Another version of this law is found in Exod 23:4-5. Deuteronomy generalizes the beneficiary of the law from "your enemy" (Exod 23:4) to every Israelite, and the property concerned from livestock to every type of property. For Deuteronomy, these prescriptions do not arise from any abstract notion of property rights but from the conviction that Israel's future is dependent upon the ability of the people to remain united. Disputes over property can be nothing but divisive. Respect for others' property is one of the practical components of a genuinely effective communal spirit.

22:5 Transvestism. This law is more extensive than a simple prohibition of wearing the opposite sex's clothing. The Deuteronomists also have in mind ornaments, weapons, and other objects that pertain to one or the other sex. It is not possible to be certain whether this text forbids transvestism because of its association with homosexuality, which is proscribed by Lev 18:22, or because of possible links it may have with various Canaanite religious rituals. This prohibition also reflects a concern evident throughout the cultures of the ancient Near East to accept the distinctions that exist in nature. From the perspectives of antiquity, blurring these obvious distinctions is foolish, since they are present in nature for a good reason determined by the Creator.

22:6-7 Birds in the nest. Here the Deuteronomists show how ahead of the time they could be. This law, which is unique to Deuteronomy, accepts the possibility of raiding a bird's nest for food. While it allows the taking of eggs and the young, the text requires that the adult bird be freed. Such action precludes the possible extinction of a species in the quest for food. The adult bird is free to reproduce again, and thereby the survival of the species is ensured. Unrestricted hunting threatens the survival of the species.

22:8 The Deuteronomic building code. Roofs of homes in ancient Israel were part of the homes' living space. Roofs were used for entertaining, sleeping, and working. Here the Deuteronomists require the taking of simple safety precautions. Though the erecting of a parapet is an additional expense, it can prevent serious accidents and their consequences. In our culture these consequences would include lawsuits. In ancient Israel an accident resulting from negligence could set off a blood feud. Deuteronomy wants to prevent that.

22:9-11 Combinations. One of the recognized scholarly pursuits in the ancient world was the classification of natural phenomena. These verses probably reflect a concern to respect the differences in nature that these classification efforts brought to light. Elements that are separate in nature should not be combined by human efforts. Rabbinic Judaism took up and developed this Deuteronomic concern. An entire tractate of the Mishnah is devoted to the elaboration and application of the principle behind these verses.

22:12 Tassels. This is another bit of Deuteronomic legislation that became quite important in rabbinic Judaism. Matthew 23:5 testifies to the concern of Jesus' contemporaries over the observance of this law. It is still observed by modern orthodox Jews, who attach tassels to a special inner garment they wear. Again, the origin and purpose of this law are unknown. A similar law in Num 15:37-41 describes the tassels as reminders of the commandments that Israel is to obey. This is surely a later homiletic explanation of a custom whose original meaning was unknown even to the Priestly authors of Numbers.

22:13-29 Marriage and sexual relationships. The rest of this chapter is devoted to legislation regulating the expression of human sexuality. While the ancients were generally quite reticent about such matters, they did not regard human sexuality as an evil force that must be carefully controlled or suppressed. On the other hand, they were quite aware of how powerful a force human sexuality can be. What on the surface may be behavior between consenting adults can have important repercussions for the entire community. These matters must be handled prudently in order to maintain healthy relationships within the community.

The first case deals with the accusations against the virtue of a newly married woman by her disaffected husband (vv. 13-21). The case is spelled out in some detail, as compared with the others presented in this chapter. The values behind this law, as well as the law itself, do not immediately resonate with contemporary views regarding the role and status of women in society. In particular, the concern for the woman's virginity, without any concomitant concern for that of her husband, is inequitable. Second, the absence of any role for the woman in the forum where her future is being determined is unjust. This legislation underscores how different ancient Israelite society was from our own. While we may rightly reject some of the presuppositions behind this law, we ought to admire the concern it shows for the woman's rights in view of her husband's false accusations.

The cases envisioned by the rest of the chapter are not presented in as much detail as the previous case is. The value at stake in each of these cases is the prohibition of adultery (Deut 5:18). Because adultery involves a breach of the marriage relationship, the penalty is severe. (A betrothed woman is treated the same as a married woman, since both are committed to an exclusive relationship with a man.) The rape of a single woman (vv. 28-29) is treated differently because it does not involve the breach of any marriage relationship. This, of course, ignores the single woman's trauma resulting from a rape; it will not be any less severe than that of a married woman. The law does attempt to protect the raped woman's rights, but not in a way our culture finds acceptable.

The final law in this series (v. 30) forbids an incestuous relationship between a man and his father's wife. This law probably had in mind a man's stepmother, for it is doubtful that an explicit law would be needed to prohibit incest with one's natural mother.

23:1-9 Who is an Israelite? This legislation has a rather narrow view on full membership in the community of Israel. This attitude is understandable, given the situation in which Deuteronomy was written. It was a time when Israel's very existence was threatened by both internal and external forces. It is little wonder that the Deuteronomists were not in a very inclusivist mood as they dealt with the question of who should be admitted to full membership in the community.

While the Deuteronomists do not go so far as to withdraw the traditional protection accorded to the resident alien (see 1:16 and 10:18-19), still they draw the circle of full membership in the community very carefully—some might say too carefully. For example, the laws of verses 1-2 probably intend to bar people who are directly associated with the service of foreign deities. Verse 1 most likely envisions those who have had themselves castrated in order to participate in certain non-Yahwistic rituals. There also may be some cultic concerns behind the law of verse 2, which may refer to children conceived by a woman involved in Canaanite fertility rituals. Rabbinic tradition has understood this law as referring to children of incestuous relationships.

This interpretation may have been fostered by the permanent prohibition denying Moabites and Ammonites full membership in the Israelite community. Genesis preserves the tradition that both groups were offspring of the incestuous relationship between Lot and his two daughters (Gen 19:30-38). Deuteronomy, however, justifies its prohibition by adverting to traditions associated with Israel's entrance into Canaan (see Deut 2 and Num 22–24). The Deuteronomists show a bit more openness toward the Egyptians and the third Transjordanian nation, the Edomites. Individuals from both groups may be admitted to the Israelite community because the Edomites are kin through Jacob, and the Egyptians provided hospitality to Jacob and his family during a time of famine (Gen 25:24-26; 36:1).

At a later time, elements within early Judaism attempted to break the strictures of these laws. The Isaianic school especially is noted for its more universalist approach. In particular, Isaiah 56 should be pointed out as a later and more open approach toward some of the same groups mentioned here.

23:10-15 A sense of shame. Shame was a more powerful force among the ancient Israelites than it is among people of contemporary Western culture. These laws specify certain actions as expressions of that sense of shame. In a positive light, one can say that Deuteronomy here reflects ancient Israel's concern for dignity and hygiene. Deuteronomy wants to maintain these standards. Later the community at Qumran will be marked by a strong solicitude regarding these same issues. The practices of that community show a further specification of the general laws found here.

23:16-17 Escaped slaves. This law deals with slaves who have run away from foreign masters (no provision is made for slaves who have fled their Israelite masters). Escaped slaves who seek asylum in Israel are to be given protection. Usually international treaties provided extradition for runaway slaves. Deuteronomy does not envision the possibility of such agreements, because an international treaty is at least an implicit acknowledgment of foreign deities. While this law provides help for escaped slaves, its real intent is to preserve the sanctity of Israel's covenant relationship with Yahweh.

23:18-19 Cult prostitution. Sexual activity cannot be mythologized into a quasi-sacral rite that ensures divine favor, especially regarding fertility. That is what Canaanite rituals of fertility are all about. Sexual activity is human activity. Acting as if it were anything else implies a lack of faith in God, who is the one source of the land's fertility. Since cult prostitution is forbidden as evil, any monetary profit made from it is tainted and cannot be offered to the Lord.

23:20-21 Interest. The loans envisioned here have no resemblance to the loaning practices that are central to a modern capitalist economy. In the situation addressed by Deuteronomy, loans are used only as a means to escape economic disaster. To take advantage of partners in the covenantal community when they are in financial distress is incompatible with Deuteronomy's view of community. Loans made to those outside the community are another matter. God will give adequate provision to all Israel if the community is faithful to the law. There should be no need to supplement God's gracious bounty with interest earned on loans to brothers and sisters in financial need.

23:22-24 Vows. The making of vows out of religious devotion is not a required but a permitted form of piety. Once people commit themselves to some form of action by a vow, it is important that they fulfill the vow. Unfulfilled vows create an atmosphere in which it becomes acceptable to countenance failures in Israel's relationship with God. From Deuteronomy's perspective, such an attitude is disastrous.

23:25-26 Sharing God's bounty. Deuteronomy looks upon the fertility of the land as a gift given by God to all Israel. Individuals should be willing to share God's bounty with their fellow Israelites. The Deuteronomists are practical enough to recognize that such an attitude can be abused. The one who sowed the wheat and planted the vineyard is the one who should reap their harvest. Others may help themselves in time of need, but this right is limited by the property rights of those who own the field and vineyard.

24:1-4 Remarriage after divorce. This text does not legislate regarding divorce but simply accepts it as a matter of custom. Its concern is to forbid a man from remarrying his former wife if she has remarried and been divorced by another man. The reasons for this prohibition are not immediately clear, but perhaps the Deuteronomists are concerned that unrestricted divorces and remarriages serve to make divorce a legal form of adultery.

24:5 Another exemption for the military. This is an addition to the exemptions granted in 20:5-8. Similar exemptions are found among other ancient Near Eastern peoples. The transition from the single state to the married state was considered by the ancients as a time when a man is particularly vulnerable to attacks from evil powers. It would not make any sense to have such people in the army. Deuteronomy offers its own humane rationale for this exemption.

24:6 Collateral. If a lender requires a borrower to hand over collateral for a loan, it should not be a millstone, which is an essential piece of equipment in the home. Without it, grain cannot be ground to prepare bread, the staple in the ancient Israelite diet. Demanding such collateral would involve a genuine hardship for any family.

24:7 Kidnapping. The kidnapping described here does not involve holding someone for ransom but the sale of a person into slavery. It is treated as a capital crime because the victims of this crime are cut off from their communities, which are the source of their lives. The law protects the person who does not enjoy the safety afforded by family and wealth, since the victim of kidnapping would typically be a social outcast. No one, however, should be cut off from the covenantal community, no matter what his or her social or economic position may be.

24:8-9 Leprosy. This passage offers no guidance on how leprosy is to be treated. That is a matter for the priests. Deuteronomy's readers are advised to respect the expertise of the priests in this matter. The text probably presumes the existence of the Priestly legislation of Num 13–14 and specifically refers to the tradition about Miriam (Num 12:9-16). This is good evidence that the origins of Deuteronomy are to be found among the laity and that the Priestly source antedates Deuteronomy by a few years at the very least.

24:10-13 More on collateral. It is difficult enough to ask for a loan without having to deal with the hounding of creditors. The treatment of the borrower is to be marked by understanding, compassion, and charity. There is no excuse for adding to the burdens of the poor.

24:14-15 The wages of the poor. Deuteronomy is marked by a special concern for those whose economic status is marginal. Here the Deuteronomists require that the wages of the poor be paid each day, for the little they make is the only hedge their families have against hunger and want. Failure to pay the poor their wages will cause them to turn to the Lord for help. Since God hears the cry of the poor (Ps 69:34), the Lord's anger will be directed against Israel for its failure to consider the welfare of those in need.

24:16 Individual responsibility. This text seems to be opposed to that of Deut 5:9. Both texts contain important insights into the reality of crime and punishment. This text states unequivocally that each person is to be treated as an individual when it is a question of criminal responsibility. This means that the guilty individual must accept the criminal penalty for any breach of the law. The text of Deut 5:9 states that the nature of the criminal act is such that its effects cannot be confined to a single individual. For example, a parent's actions will inevitably affect the entire family. Punishment of a crime may be directed at individuals, but its repercussions will touch many more people.

24:17-22 Gleaning the harvest. Once again Deuteronomy's concern for the poor comes to the foreground. This legislation addresses the prosperous landowners and asks for some form of studied inefficiency in harvesting. That will allow the poor to survive without requiring them to accept obvious charity. They will have to work for their own support. The Deuteronomists remind the wealthy that all Israel would have the status of slaves were it not for God's mercy. One response expected from those who have benefited from God's goodness is compassion for those who do not have a full share in the community's wealth.

25:1-3 Corporal punishment. The Deuteronomists accept corporal punishment as one way to deal with the guilty. At the same time, they require specific safeguards to protect the ones undergoing punishment, because, despite their crimes, they are still Israelites. Punishment is to follow a legal trial. It is to be administered under the supervision of a competent authority and is to be limited to a specified number of lashes. Rabbinic tradition limited any whipping to thirty-nine lashes to avoid any possibility of breaking the requirement of verse 3 (see 2 Cor 11:24).

25:4 Concern for the ox. This is another law that is unique to Deuteronomy and shows to what extent this tradition went in its concern that all share in the land's God-given bounty. Even the oxen are not to be denied their fair share. The New Testament cites this passage as a justification for the practice whereby ministers of the gospel gained their support from their ministry (1 Cor 9:9; 1 Tim 5:18).

25:5-10 Levirate marriage. The custom described here (levir is Latin for "brother-in-law") was practiced in some form throughout the ancient Near East. The presumed origin of this custom lay in the desire of the patriarchal social system to keep the wealth (dowry) and fertility of the widow in the same patriarchal line. With the rise of urbanization and the devolution of the patriarchal extended family in ancient Israel, this issue became less important, though levirate marriage apparently persisted into the first century of the Common Era (see Matt 22:23-28; Luke 20:27-33). The elders can use their moral authority to encourage compliance with this ancient custom, but they cannot compel it (v. 8).

25:11-12 Mutilation as a penalty. Though mutilation was a common penalty in the ancient Near East, this is the only instance of such a penalty in the Bible apart from the lex talionis (Deut 19:21). In fact, some interpreters consider this an extension of the lex talionis, which, in this case, cannot be applied literally. While the wife's intention to save her husband from injury may be a good one, there are limits to the kind of action she can take on his behalf.

25:13-16 Trade laws. What kind of society could have any cohesion if every commercial transaction were suspect? Trust is a basic component of community life. Here the Deuteronomists require that those involved in trade adhere to honest business practices.

25:17-19 The Amalekites. By the time Deuteronomy was written, the Amalekites had already disappeared into the pages of history. The Deuteronomists imply that this was due to people who were obedient to the Lord's command. An additional implication is that Israel is to remember all that the nations did to it. That memory should help Israel avoid the disaster of assimilation, so that those nations will not achieve by Israel's cooperation what they cannot achieve by force of arms.

26:1-15 Two liturgies of remembrance. Ancient Israel's ritual was one vehicle for acknowledging its debt of gratitude to God who gave Israel a bounteous land. In paying that debt of gratitude, Israel also chose to remember a prior act of God on its behalf that was even more important than the gift of the land. That was the Exodus, which transformed Israel from a nation of slaves into a people set free. The two rites described here fuse both traditions of thanksgiving: gratitude for freedom and for the land.

Verses 1-11 deal with the annual tithe of agricultural products made by the grateful Israelite. The portrait the Deuteronomists paint here is that of a highly successful farmer who comes to the central sanctuary to present his tithe. His party includes not only his family but also the economically dependent Levites and resident aliens. The whole community benefits from the bounty God gives to Israel, and so all Israel is to be involved in the ritual of thanksgiving.

The heart of this passage is the confession that the Israelite makes as the offering is set before the Lord (vv. 5-10). The worshipers acknowledge their origins as a people without land or freedom. They can now present their tithes only because God took the side of their ancestors against the Egyptians and because God gave them a bountiful land as their new home.

Following the ritual, the whole group assembled by the wealthy farmer celebrated with a festal meal the bounty given by God. This is in accord with the typically Deuteronomic view of the elements of a sacrifice being used for a meal to be shared by the participants in the ritual.

Verses 12-15 deal with the triennial tithe, which is not brought to the central shrine but is to be used in each locality for the support of the poor. Instead of a profession of faith in God's gracious activity for Israel, the farmer offering the tithe makes prayerful assurances that he has been obedient to all stipulations regarding the offering of the tithe. The prayer ends with a petition for God's continued benevolence toward Israel, which is completely dependent upon God for its sustenance.

This passage marks Israel as distinct from its Canaanite neighbors, who see fertility as the outcome of skillful manipulation of divine powers. For Israel, fertility is a gift that can only be gratefully received. Israel's freedom, bounty, and future belong to God alone. Israel rejoices because of the gifts God has freely chosen to give it.

26:16-19 Recommitment. The Deuteronomic Code, which began with chapter 12, concludes with a mutual declaration of commitment made by both God and Israel. The people proclaim their allegiance to God, and through Moses God assures the people of the blessings that come to the obedient. The triple occurrence of "today" (vv. 16, 17 and 18) reflects a liturgical assembly at which Israel once again accepts the law as constitutive of its relationship with God. One effect of this relationship is Israel's great renown among the nations. A national life lived in accord with the divine law cannot help but reflect divine glory (v. 19). The substance of this ritual of recommitment or covenant renewal serves as the conclusion to the Deuteronomic Code as well as a transition to what follows: Moses' serious warning regarding the dire consequences that will come to a disobedient Israel.

27:1–28:69 Blessings and curses. Now the Deuteronomists turn to the future. For the law to have its beneficial effect, every generation will have to remember the law and its stipulations and be prepared to commit itself to that law. This address describes efforts to make certain that Israel will never forget that law but remain firmly committed to it.

27:1-8 The written law. These verses consider Deuteronomy as the written, authoritative law for Israel's life in the land. It is fitting, then, that copies of this law be left at significant sites connected with Israel's entrance into the land. A set of stones inscribed with the law are to be erected at the very spot where Israel crosses the Jordan. A second set of stones are to be left on Mount Ebal, where a great ceremony of covenant renewal is to take place.

This text indirectly preserves the memory of two Israelite shrines at which the entrance into the land was remembered in ritual. The first was at Gilgal, just west of the Jordan; the second was at Shechem, the town at the foot of Mount Ebal. The rituals at both these shrines celebrated not only Israel's entrance into Canaan but also the giving of the law, which became operative at the moment the people began to enter their new land.

27:9-10 Moses and the priests speak. These two verses are very significant from a theological perspective, for they assert that obedience to the commandments is to be Israel's response to its election. Obedience was not the reason why Israel became the elect people of God; Israel's election was an act of grace. Deuteronomic theology is usually caricatured as a theology of retribution that infuses a mentality of bargaining with God. Here it is quite clear that Deuteronomy holds that the basis of the divine-human relationship is an unmerited act of divine grace. It is because the Israelites have been chosen as the people of God that they are to obey the commandments.

27:11-26 A ritual on Mounts Gerizim and Ebal. Like the rest of this chapter, these verses reflect some sort of rite connected with the renewal of the covenant between God and Israel. Unfortunately, it is not possible to reconstruct the shape of that rite simply on the basis of what remains here. The image created by this text has the worshipers divided into two groups, each assembled on one of the two mountains that overlook Shechem. These two groups are to recite the blessings and curses associated with Israel's covenant with Yahweh. This ritual is probably meant to demonstrate Israel's free acceptance of the consequences flowing from the relationship established with God through the law.

The twelve curses in verses 14-26 provide a summary list of actions that are incompatible with Israel's status as the people of God. This list is certainly not exhaustive; it simply serves to remind the people that obedience to the law is to characterize the life of the nation. The people's response to each curse indicates their understanding and acceptance of the consequences that come to the disobedient.

There does not seem to be any unifying theme to the content of the curses, though some interpreters see the secrecy of the proscribed acts as a common element. If this is correct, the Deuteronomists are probably trying to avoid a type of legalism that identifies guilt with discovery. Here they may be saying that any action which disregards the law is an offense against God, whether that offense comes to the light of day or not.

The last curse is all-inclusive. It brings under God's curse the apathy and inactivity of those who know what the law requires but make no effort to obey. The term "this law" (v. 26) is another indication that this list of curses was composed at a time after Deuteronomy had been accepted as a written, authoritative document.

28:1-69 Blessings and curses. Many interpreters believe that the Deuteronomists consciously used covenant (international treaty) as a metaphor in presenting the relationship between God and Israel. While all the elements of the typical covenant form are not found in Deuteronomy, the three most important are. Chapters 5–11 are equivalent to the prologue of the covenant, which is an exhortation to fidelity based on what God has done for Israel. The stipulations of chapters 12–26 make up the core of the covenant, in which Israel's obligations to God are spelled out clearly. Finally, this chapter represents one of the concluding elements of the covenant, the blessings and curses. Here the consequences of fidelity and infidelity are stated with unmistakable clarity. As is the case with ancient Near Eastern treaties, the curses far outnumber the blessings. The covenant metaphor explains the relationship between God and Israel in a manner readily understandable to the ancient Israelites. In addition, it underscores the Deuteronomic presentation of the law as a loving response of Israel to the God who saved it from Egyptian slavery.

The sheer number of curses (vv. 15-68) as compared with the blessings (vv. 1-14) appears to belie the assertion that, for the Deuteronomists, obedience is a response of love. While some of these curses may have been introduced into this list after the Exile (for example, verses 36-68), the number of curses may simply be a rhetorical device to encourage Israel to obedience. For the Deuteronomists, many of these curses have already become a reality. They are trying to recommit the people to obedience, for their future depends upon faithful obedience.

In terms of form, verses 1-46 and 58-68 contain conditional blessings and curses. If Israel is obedient, it may expect God's favor; if Israel is disobedient, it may expect God's judgment. The election of Israel, though it was a matter of divine grace, does not exempt Israel from bearing the consequences of infidelity. Israel's relationship with God is dependent upon fidelity to the divine will as expressed in the law.

Verses 47-57 promise God's curses on a disobedient Israel. There seems to be no question of "if Israel is disobedient." These verses presuppose the people's infidelity: "Since you would not serve the Lord, your God . . ." (v. 47a). This text apparently reflects the tragedy that befell Israel during the siege of Jerusalem and the other cities of Judah (597–587 B.C.E.). Verses 53-57 are particularly gruesome in their description of the horrors that accompany a lengthy siege. The consequences of disobedience are terrifying indeed.

One common thread running throughout the blessings and the curses is how these are related to the land. First and foremost, blessing means fertility of both the people and their land. The curses bring sickness, death, drought, disease, poor harvests, and a horrifying siege, followed by exile from the land and reenslavement in a foreign land. The land is God's great gift to a liberated Israel. Disobedience brings the reversal of all God's beneficent acts (vv. 60-68). As great as God's deeds for Israel were, they could be undone by an ungrateful people. This is the curse for disobedience, which is simply specified in verses 15-68.

Moses' second speech closes with a powerful call for Israel's fidelity. The intensity of language displayed in these curses shows how seriously Israel is to take its relationship with God. It is indeed a matter of life and death.

MOSES' THIRD ADDRESS

Deut 29:1–32:52

The major concern of this address is Israel's immediate future. Moses makes provisions for Joshua to assume the leadership of the tribes after his death. Equally important are the provisions made for storing the book of the law and for its periodic reading. The law is to be the guide in Israel's future existence in the land. Individual human leaders come and go, but the law endures as the most effective way to safeguard Israel's commitment to the Lord.

29:2-8 A call for fidelity. Moses' third address begins in a fashion that should be quite familiar by now—the recital of God's saving acts on Israel's behalf, from the defeat of Pharaoh (v. 2) to the defeat of Sihon and Og (v. 8). It continues in typical style with a plea for obedience, followed by a promise of prosperity in the new land (v. 8).

What makes this passage unique is the comment in verse 4 which asserts that Israel has not always been able to recognize God's presence in the events we consider "miraculous." This should be a reminder that God's saving deeds are not so unequivocal that they do not require faith on the part of those who experience them. If Israel is to recognize God's presence in its life, it will be because God supplies the kind of understanding and insight which can discern that presence.

29:9-14 Parties to the covenant. Here the Deuteronomists wish to include every generation of Israelites as partners in the covenant made with God. The obligation to fidelity falls not just on the people who experienced the Exodus and the guidance in the wilderness but on every generation. The covenant that Moses concludes between God and Israel involves not just those present at Horeb and Moab but those who are yet to be born and will likewise experience the benefits of God's goodness toward Israel.

29:15-20 A warning against false worship. The great commandment of the law is Israel's obligation to serve God alone. Moses repeats this central command here. Usually when Moses mentions Egypt, it is to remind Israel of its wondrous deliverance from slavery; here, however, Egypt serves as a model of the kind of false worship Israel is to avoid. The people will be tempted to abandon the service of God for that of foreign deities. If any of the people succumb to such a temptation, they may expect the severest of penalties. There can be no compromise whatever regarding the exclusive commitment God requires of Israel.

29:21-27 Consequences of disobedience. When people see the terrible effects of Israel's infidelity, they will have to be told the truth. Their first impulse may be to credit the gods of the nations who defeated Israel. They may conclude that a small nation such as Israel could not possibly withstand the onslaughts of powerful world empires. The real truth is that Israel's downfall was caused by its own failures to observe the stipulations of the Lord's covenant (v. 25). The consequences of these failures were defeat and exile. This constant emphasis on God's response to Israel's behavior emphasizes the personal nature of Israel's God. This was already revealed in the many acts of love that God has done for Israel's sake; it can also be revealed through the acts of judgment upon an unfaithful Israel.

29:28 A disclaimer. This verse is probably a gloss introduced into the text by a late editor. This, of course, does not affect its theological value in any way. Though there is no consensus on the meaning of the text, it may serve to acknowledge that Israel's God cannot be measured by the theological perspectives of the Deuteronomists, no matter how respected their views may be. What we have is a partial insight into the workings of the divine. While this insight is given for our sake, it should not serve to limit the prerogatives of God. This is as close as Deuteronomy gets to an acceptance of the relativity of human insight. The mystery of the divine always eludes our grasp.

30:1-14 Repentance. Human beings are not only limited in their ability to grasp fully the mystery of the divine, but the human will cannot make the kind of commitment that eliminates the possibility of unfaithfulness. This passage calls for Israel to return to the Lord after lapses. Repentance will bring restoration to the land from which Israel has been exiled (v. 4). Restoration will mean the complete reversal of the effects of infidelity. Not only will Israel be restored to its land, but it will enjoy a renewed prosperity. The only requirement is obedience—obedience that is the offshoot of Israel's love for God.

To prevent Israel from becoming discouraged by its failures, God will provide an inner source of commitment that was previously unavailable. Israel will no longer have to rely on its own strength but will receive a heart circumcised by God and fit for a renewed commitment (v. 6). Moses goes on to assure the people that obedience is not an impossible task. Israel's past performance may give rise to the view that the commandments are impossible to fulfill, but this text (vv. 11-14) presents obedience as a genuine possibility.

The law is designed as a guide to human life. It is not part of an inaccessible divine mystery (v. 12). To believe otherwise is nothing less than an attempt to evade responsibility. Second, the law is a practical guide to daily living. It is not some obtuse, rationalist system that is beyond most people (v. 13). The law is the way of life open to all.

30:15-20 The choice. The whole of Deuteronomy has been leading up to this dramatic choice that Moses sets before the people. These verses contain all the elements found in the rest of the book: commandments, blessing and curse, the appeal for obedience. After all has been said, the entire thrust of the book comes down to a choice that people need to make. Israel's future is dependent upon that choice. God's graciousness is not at issue. It is the response of Israel that causes its future to hang in the balance. Moses is not a neutral observer in the process; he is passionately concerned for Israel's future. That is why he virtually commands Israel to choose life (v. 19).

The life-and-death alternatives are broader than may be apparent to the contemporary reader. "Life" refers to that sphere of human activity under the protection of the divine; "death" refers to that sphere of human activity which is devoid of the divine presence. Death, then, is more than the cessation of physical life; it is existence outside the land, existence in the nether world of exile. Death is life without God. Life is the blessing, death the curse.

Good and evil here do not necessarily refer to moral choices. Good refers to the consequences of life with God: fertility, prosperity, and happiness. Evil refers to the consequences of life apart from God: exile, disease, and death. It is up to Israel to make one of two choices: (1) life with God, which brings blessing and good; or (2) life apart from God, which is nothing less than the curse of death. There are no other alternatives.

Moses calls upon the heavens and the earth to witness Israel's choice (v. 17). In ancient Near Eastern treaties, personified forces of nature were witnesses to the conclusion of a treaty, and it was presumed that they would deal with any partner to the treaty who proved unfaithful to its provisions. Israel, of course, demythologizes this aspect of covenant form, but it retains the idea of witnesses to the covenant by referring to the heavens and earth here.

Israel will find its true self by making a decision for life. The nation's very purpose is to love the Lord (v. 20). Every generation of Israel is to put itself in the place of those who were personally addressed by Moses, because all Israel needs to remember is that it has only two choices and that in making the right choice Israel will find "a long life" (v. 20).

31:1-8 Joshua, the successor of Moses. The Deuteronomists have already prepared their readers for the death of Moses and its significance for Israel's future (1:37-38 and 3:23-29). Though Moses was more than a heroic figure in the epic story of Israel's deliverance from Egypt and its guidance into the Promised Land, God, after all, was the actual liberator of and warrior for Israel (v. 3a). Moses is to die, but his death will not deprive Israel of the leadership it needs to settle the new land. Moses' role in Israel's life will be taken by Joshua. He is the one to lead Israel as it faces the crucial period of the settlement in Canaan.

31:9-13 Reading the law. While Moses' responsibility of providing leadership for the people is to be taken up by Joshua, there is to be a different arrangement regarding Moses' function as the people's teacher of the law. Moses has written the law and now gives it to the Levitical priests who carry the ark, which is the depository for the written document.

The written law is also given to the elders. The priests are given custody of the document, but the elders actually take up Moses' task of teaching the law. The elders were traditionally responsible for preserving the common life of the community through guiding its life and settling disputes in terms of traditional practices and values. The elders were the guardians of traditional legal lore not only in Israel but throughout the premonarchic societies of the ancient Near East. Here the elders are told to have the law read to the people periodically so that "they may hear it and learn it, and so fear the Lord . . ." (vv. 12, 13). This custom of public reading was the vehicle of covenant renewal.

There is no record of this command being fulfilled as prescribed here, though there was undoubtedly some ritual of recommitment. More important than the ritual itself is the expression of Deuteronomy's view that the Mosaic office is carried on in part by the elders, who handed down and administered the observance of ancient Israel's legal traditions.

31:14-32 Introduction to the Song of Moses. God's instructions to Moses concerning the song he is to compose and teach Israel (vv. 16-21) are framed by God's commissioning of Joshua. Again, provisions are being taken in view of Moses' imminent death (vv. 14, 16). Joshua is to provide Israel with the leadership it needs as it begins the settlement of Canaan. The song is to be a moral force touching Israel's conscience in the midst of the material blessing that the new land is to bring.

The determinism that marks verses 16-21 indicates their late introduction into this context. Israel's infidelity is not a possibility—it is inevitable. God's abandonment of the people in view of their infidelity is just as inevitable. These verses date from the Exile, when the full effects of Israel's rebellion and God's absence were being experienced by Israel. It is in the midst of this experience that the song will serve to remind Israel that what has happened to it is nothing but the curse that falls on the disobedient.

31:24-29 The book of the law. This is another attempt to deal with the loss of Moses. The law that he promulgated is to be preserved for future generations. Moses has written an account of the covenant that he has mediated between God and Israel. This written document, under the protection of the Levites, will be a perpetual reminder of the covenant. Moses calls the elders of the people and advises them of his own lack of faith in Israel's willingness to remain committed to God. Bitter experiences have shown the level of the nation's commitment. Again Moses calls upon the heavens and the earth to witness his final charge to Israel (v. 28). Moses' call for these witnesses is the link connecting this passage to the song that follows. The song begins with a similar invocation (32:1).

31:30–32:47 The Song of Moses. The Song of Moses is, in part, an indictment of Israel's infidelity to the covenant. It resembles the legal procedures used by an offended party in covenant to receive satisfaction from the offending party. The song begins with the summoning of witnesses (vv. 1-3). In this case it is the heavens and the earth that can testify that a covenant existed between God and Israel (see 30:19; 31:28). Next follows a statement of Israel's lack of commitment to the covenantal relationship (vv. 4-6). The prosecution begins with evidence of God's goodness toward Israel (vv. 7-14) and concludes with the evidence of Israel's apostasy (vv. 15-18). Finally, the people's guilt is declared and sentence is passed (vv. 19-25). Israel can expect total destruction in view of its total apostasy.

Following the trial, the song takes an abrupt turn in verses 26-27. God's enemies will misunderstand Israel's defeat. Those nations that cannot discern God's power at work in Israel's defeat will find themselves facing their own doom. The song encapsulates Israel's tragic history while affirming that the nation's defeat is not God's last word to Israel.

The song is a subtle corrective of a mechanistic application of Deuteronomic theology. From the perspective of the Exile, it is clear enough that Israel chose death rather than life. Here Deuteronomy makes a significant advance when it envisions blessing beyond the curse and proclaims a new life for Israel in spite of its infidelity. What begins with a sentence of death ends with a promise of new life.

32:48-52 The imminent death of Moses. These verses are an elaboration of Num 27:12-14, which come from the Priestly history of Israel. This is evident from the explanation that verse 51 offers for Moses' death outside the Promised Land. In Deut 1:32 Moses' fate is blamed on the people's sin and not on any personal failing of his own.

MOSES' FOURTH ADDRESS

Deut 33:1-34:12

The final component of Deuteronomy includes Moses' final testament to the tribes (ch. 33) and the account of his death (ch. 34). Moses' last words take the form of a blessing in which he foresees the fate of individual tribes (compare Gen 27 and 49). The final chapter does not come from the Deuteronomists, who wished to emphasize the continuity between the Mosaic era and every subsequent period in Israel's history. The thrust of the final chapter emphasizes a radical change that takes place with the death of Moses.

33:1-29 The blessing of Moses. The core of this text is the blessings Moses speaks upon individual tribes. These blessings are framed by a song of praise celebrating God's kingship and victories on Israel's behalf, as well as the gift of the land's prosperity (vv. 2-5, 26-29). It is through the conquest that Yahweh becomes the king of the Israelite tribes (v. 5). At this point the blessings begin.

The blessings name twelve tribes, though Simeon is missing (compare Gen 49 and Num 1:5-15). The number twelve is retained because the tribe of Joseph is divided into Ephraim and Manasseh. Apparently each tribal blessing existed independently, as evidenced by the diversity of their form and content. These independent sayings are brought together as a fitting climax to Deuteronomy. The last word spoken to the tribes is a word of blessing.

Of the particular blessings that call for specific comment, the blessing of Levi (vv. 8-11) stands out. The Thummim and Urim (v. 8) are lot oracles by means of which answers to yes-or-no questions can be ascertained. How these objects looked or how they were manipulated cannot be determined with certainty (see 1 Sam 14:18-19, 41-42; 23:9-12). Verse 10 shows that priests are more than cultic functionaries; they are also responsible for teaching traditional Israelite moral values.

34:1-8 The death of Moses. These final verses are an elaboration of what the Deuteronomists have written above in 3:27. The statement that Moses was buried "in the ravine opposite Beth-peor" might give the impression that a well-known grave site is indicated; however, the remark in verse 6b states that the exact spot of Moses' burial is unknown. Apparently by the time these words were written, the grave of Moses was no longer visited or even known, though the writers were aware of a tradition about the general area associated with Moses' death.

34:9-12 The conclusion. Here Moses is a unique, irreplaceable leader (compare Deut 18:18). In fact, verse 12 describes Moses in language usually reserved for God alone. Such a portrait could become oppressive. Though Moses is remembered as a great leader, others will have to take his place if Israel is to remain loyal to the covenant. Certainly the Deuteronomists consider themselves as continuing the role of Moses for their generation. Later, even Jesus will recognize the Pharisees' claim to the Mosaic office (see Matt 23:2). Jesus, too, believed that his mission was to fulfill "the law and the prophets" (Matt 5:17-18) and thereby bring Moses' task to completion. Thus, later generations that recognized Moses' special role in Israel's life also recognized that what Moses did for the first generation of Israelites, others must do for succeeding ones.

JOSHUA

John A. Grindel, C.M.

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Joshua is named after its chief actor, Joshua, the son of Nun. Joshua had been Moses' aide and succeeded him as the leader of the people. In Hebrew the name Joshua means "Yahweh saves" or "May Yahweh save."

The theme of the book is the occupation of the land west of the Jordan River. The book falls into three distinct sections: the conquest of Canaan (chs. 1–12); the division of the land (chs. 13–21); the return of the Transjordan tribes and the farewell of Joshua (chs. 22–24).

The Deuteronomistic History

In the Hebrew Bible the Book of Joshua is the first of what are termed the "former prophets," so called because of the importance of the prophetic word in the books. Today the book is usually seen as the first volume in what is known as the Deuteronomistic History. The Deuteronomistic History includes the Books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, and spans the period from the conquest of Canaan in the twelfth century B.C.E. down to the time of the Exile in the sixth century B.C.E. The Book of Deuteronomy is often considered the introduction to these books.

Our modern understanding of the larger Deuteronomistic History owes much to the work of a German scholar, Martin Noth. He was able to show that someone who shared the theological perspective, as well as literary style found in the Book of Deuteronomy, formed a continuous historical work by pulling together into a coherent whole many different units of material which were originally independent and came from various periods of Israel's history. The author drew from numerous written and oral sources, such as annals, kings' lists, and stories of different kinds. Some of the units were of substantial size, such as Josh 2–11. The author's own additions established an interpretative framework that linked the disparate material together and provided judgments on the events in the story. The editor's additions are especially found in punctuating comments—sermons and speeches put into the mouths of important characters at periods of significant transition in the story (e.g., Josh 1 and 24; 1 Sam 12; 1 Kgs 8), bridge passages, and summaries. Scholars debate whether one person produced this work or a school of writers. Most presume that the present edition was composed soon after the last event reported in it, namely, the release of the last Judean king, Jehoiachin, from a Babylonian prison in 561 B.C.E. Though most believe the work to have been composed in Palestine, others think that it was written in Babylonia.

While Martin Noth thought that there was only one edition of the work, written around 550 B.C.E., it is more common today to speak of two editions. The earlier first edition was probably written during the reign of King Josiah (620–609 B.C.E.). The later second edition, which was quite thorough, would have been compiled during the Exile in the sixth century. This commentary will explain the book from the perspective of the second edition, that of the exilic editor.

The Deuteronomistic History was not written just to preserve a memory of the past; rather, its purpose was to give a theological explanation of the loss of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah, and to provide a theological basis for a hope in the future. To understand the work it is necessary to see it against the background of the times in which it was written.

In 721 B.C.E. the Assyrians destroyed the northern kingdom of Israel; and in 587 B.C.E., the Babylonians destroyed the southern kingdom of Judah. When Jerusalem fell in 587 B.C.E., the city, with its magnificent temple and palace, was leveled, and the leaders of the people were led off into exile in Babylonia.

The period of the Exile was a time of despair and deep questioning on the part of the people. Yahweh had promised to watch over the people, and to protect and guide them; but now all had been lost. Why had the Lord allowed this destruction and the loss of everything? The people especially wondered if they were still the people of God, and if there were any basis for a hope in the future. Would God remain true to the promises made in the past despite all that had happened since? It was in this context that the Deuteronomistic History was written.

The author's purpose is to explain that Israel had lost all because of her sinfulness. The Lord had called the people to fidelity to the covenant, and had warned them of the consequences of infidelity, but the people had sinned. Hence, in exile they were experiencing the divine judgment. Israel had not been faithful to Yahweh, and her long history of sin justified the punishment she was enduring.

The work is also an exhortation to the people to repent and turn back to the Lord and to trust that God will keep the ancient promises. The people are to believe that as God responded positively to repentant people in the past, so will God now hear their cries and forgive them once again. All the ancient promises are still in force, though temporarily suspended because of the sinfulness of the people. At the same time these promises can serve as a basis for the future if the people will only repent.

The purpose of the Book of Joshua

In the context of the Deuteronomistic History the specific purpose of the Book of Joshua, with its emphasis on the conquest and division of the land, is to show the fidelity of God to the promises made in the past to the patriarchs and Moses—particularly the promise of the land. One of the chief themes found in the Pentateuch is the promise of the land. That promise is fulfilled in the Book of Joshua so as to engender in the people a trust in God's promises. Now Israel, in the midst of the Exile, can trust in God's continuing care and presence, and trust especially that the promise of the land remains in force. At the same time, obedience to the Law is important lest, having been forgiven and brought back to the land, Israel again bring down upon her head such destruction as she is now experiencing.

Historical accuracy

A question that is often raised regarding the Book of Joshua is just how accurate is it from a historical perspective, especially in terms of its reporting on the conquest of the land in the twelfth century B.C.E. This is not an easy question to answer. There are inconsistencies and contradictions in the book itself (compare 4:3 and 4:9; 8:3 and 8:12). What are we to think of the conflicting reports of the conquest of the land found in Josh 1–12 and Judg 1:1–2:5? While the picture presented in Joshua is that of a violent and complete conquest of the land by a united Israel, the picture painted in Judges is that of individual tribes or clans slowly taking their own land and settling down next to the Canaanites in the country. This latter picture is probably closer to the reality.

The author uses different kinds of material in the book, ranging from factual documents to legends. It is also clear that the author, writing over five hundred years after the events being presented, has chosen material so that it would stress a theological viewpoint. In addition, the author has interspersed speeches created out of this theological perspective throughout the work.

Archaeological evidence also raises questions concerning the historical reliability of some of the material in the book, especially the traditions about the cities of Jericho and Ai. While the Book of Joshua gives extensive reports about the conquest of these two cities, archaeological evidence shows that they were not occupied after the fourteenth century B.C.E., and that Ai had been destroyed about a thousand years before the Israelites entered the land.

In conclusion, then, it is clear that the story, as we have it in the Book of Joshua, is simplified, schematic, incomplete, influenced by the theological views of the author, and the result of compiling very diverse material. We will make some judgments about the historical accuracy of the individual stories as we continue this commentary.

It is interesting to note that most of the material in chapters 1–12 dealing with the conquest of the land seems to be associated with the territory of Benjamin (see ch. 18:11-28) and the sanctuary of Gilgal. It would appear that the traditions in the first part of the book were gathered together and handed on at the sanctuary of Gilgal. The tribal lists in chapters 13–21, on the other hand, all date from the period of the monarchy. While some of the lists incorporated here may go back to the time of David and Solomon in the tenth century, others, such as those in chapters 20 and 21, come from the period of Josiah in the seventh century. One must be careful in accepting too quickly the biblical story of the conquest and the division of the land at face value. The reality was much more complex. We must keep in mind that the author was more interested in bringing out the meaning and significance of the events reported than in reporting exactly what happened. For it is in the meaning of events that one learns of God, oneself, and what God demands of us.

The person and work of Joshua

Against the above background on the historical reliability of the material in the Book of Joshua the person and work of Joshua also becomes a problem. If one accepts the view presented in the Deuteronomistic History that the conquest was the result of a united military action, then Joshua, as the supreme commander of the Israelite forces, plays an important role. But when we know the conquest to have been a century-long process of internal revolution, slow infiltration, and occupation by individual groups, then the figure of Joshua is difficult to explain. What adds to the problem is that while the traditions of the conquest preserved in the Book of Joshua are from the tribe of Benjamin, Joshua was from the tribe of Ephraim.

What all of this shows is that the very complicated history of the conquest has been reduced in the Book of Joshua to a small group of typical stories which are now attributed to all Israel, but which originally came primarily from the traditions of the tribe of Benjamin. These exploits have now been attributed to Joshua, a well-known person who had been active either militarily or in resolving conflicts in the central hill country of Palestine.

COMMENTARY

PART I: THE CONQUEST OF CANAAN

Josh 1:1–12:24

1:1–2:24 Preparations. The book begins with a report on the preparations for entrance into the land of Canaan. First, there is the Lord's commissioning of Joshua (1:1-9), which is followed by Joshua's orders to the people (1:10-18) and the sending of spies across the river to reconnoiter the land, especially Jericho (2:1-24).

1:1-9 The commissioning of Joshua. This passage, like all of chapter 1, comes from the hand of the Deuteronomistic Historian (henceforth D) and forms the transition from the death of Moses (see Deut 34) to the conquest of the land. The passage picks up on and develops the original commissioning of Joshua in Deut 31. In sermon style the passage follows the formula for the divine installation of a person into public office: a description of the task to be performed, an expression of encouragement, and an assurance of divine assistance. Joshua is presented as the successor to Moses with the command to complete his work.

The task that is given to Joshua is to lead the people into the land that the Lord will give to the Israelites. From the beginning (v. 2) it is made clear that the land is a gift of the Lord to the people; it is not something that they have earned. The granting of this gift is the fulfillment of the promise to Moses (v. 3). The description of the boundaries of the land in verse 4 is the most comprehensive description of the land found anywhere in the Bible. There are three fixed points in this description: the "desert," which refers to the Negeb in the south and the area east of the Jordan River; the "Euphrates," which describes the northeastern boundary; and the "Great Sea," which describes the Mediterranean on the west. As defined here the land included the area of Lebanon to the northwest and almost the whole of present-day and ancient Syria. However, these boundaries were never a reality. The only time Israel even began to have such extensive boundaries was in the time of David and Solomon in the tenth century. Joshua will be able to fulfill the promise because of the Lord's presence with him (v. 5).

Though the land is a gift of the Lord, verses 6-9 insist upon the necessity of Israel being "firm and steadfast," i.e., observing all that is written in the law in order to attain possession of the land. In other words, Israel's disobedience can frustrate the divine promises. All of this is an important message for the exiles, who can hear in this passage both the reason for the loss of the land (their disobedience) and the conditions for regaining the land (obedience to the law, trust in the Lord, and the Lord's promises of presence).

1:10-18 Joshua's orders to the people. Having received the Lord's instructions, Joshua now gives orders that the people are to be instructed to prepare provisions, because in three days they are to march in and take possession of the land that the Lord is giving them (vv. 10-11). Notice how the conquest is described as something peaceful, almost like a cultic procession. It is as if the Lord has already decreed that Israel will possess the land and now the people need only to carry it out.

In verses 12-15 Joshua reminds the tribes who have already settled in the area east of the Jordan River of the command of Moses (see Deut 3:12-20) that all the warriors from these tribes must help their kinspeople to settle in the land across the Jordan before they can return to their own land. The conquest must be seen as a unified undertaking by Israel.

Verses 16-18 present the response of the Transjordanian tribes. They will do all that Joshua commands as long as they are assured of the presence of the Lord with him (vv. 16-17). The main purpose of these verses is to show the acceptance of the transfer of leadership from Moses to Joshua.

2:1-24 Reconnaissance of Jericho. The attentive reader will notice immediately the tension between this chapter and the material in chapters 1 and 3. First of all, the location of the Israelite camp is now said to be at Shittim, which is probably the Abel-shittim mentioned in Num 33:49.

Secondly, the chronology of this chapter is incompatible with that of chapters 1 and 3. Chapter 1 speaks of three days as the interval between Joshua's orders to the people and the actual entrance into the land (see v. 11). However, the present story says that the spies spent three days in the hills before returning to the Israelite camp (2:22), not to mention the time spent going to Jericho and returning. Also, verses 1 and 2 of chapter 3 seem to flow directly after 1:18.

Finally, one encounters a different style in the present story from the style of the material in chapters 1 and 3. All of this means that this present story undoubtedly was a later insertion into the narrative. In fact there are indications that the story of Rahab is quite old and possibly goes back to the time before David. It appears that D has used the story as it was found, with the possible exception of Rahab's profession of faith in verses 9-11. This profession of faith reflects Deuteronomic themes (compare to Deut 26:5b-9 and Josh 24:2b-13).

In its original form the story of Rahab and the spies was probably an etiological tale, i.e., a narrative that explained something by giving the story of its origins. What the story explained was the survival of the Canaanite family of Rahab in the midst of the Israelites after the conquest. In its present context, however, the interest of the author is in Rahab's profession of faith. Through Rahab's profession D is emphasizing that it is the Lord who is responsible for all that is about to take place. The one who is God in heaven above and on earth below has given the land to Israel and with power will now lead them into the land. D is attempting to instill hope in the exiles by reminding them of who their God is. If the Lord could act like this in the past, then that same Lord can act with power on their behalf now.

3:1–5:12 The crossing of the Jordan. Having dealt with the preparations for entering the land, the author narrates the crossing of the Jordan. What is found in this section is a series of events that lack internal unity but are held together by their concern with the crossing and with the ark of the covenant. This is the only place where the ark is mentioned in the conquest narrative. The crossing falls into five scenes: preparations (3:1-13); the crossing (3:14-17); the setting up of memorial stones (4:1-9); the completion of the crossing (4:10-18); and the cultic encampment at Gilgal (4:19–5:12).

3:1-13 Preparations. This narrative, along with the narrative of the crossing, presents the event as a solemn liturgical procession. More than likely the story developed as a cultic reenactment and memorial of the crossing of the Jordan. The author has taken this ancient liturgy and used it as an outline for the story, mainly to show that it was the living God, the Lord of the whole earth, who was responsible for bringing Israel into the land (vv. 10-11). Once again an important message is here for the Israelites, namely, that the Lord is powerful and can bring the exiles back to the land as the Lord once before had brought the people into the land.

The text in verses 1 and 2 follows more from 1:18 than from chapter 2. Verses 2-6 point out that it is Yahweh who leads the people. The ark is a sign of the Lord's presence. The distance that people are to keep from the ark emphasizes the respect that one must show the Lord. The call to holiness in verse 5 flows from the idea that the people are about to experience wonders performed by the Lord, i.e., extraordinary actions. Such a divine intervention requires adequate human preparation. Involved in this sanctification is a series of purification rites and abstinence from all sexual activity and certain foods (see Exod 19:10-15; Num 11:18; Josh 7:13).

Verse 7 presents the purpose of the action to follow: it is to exalt Joshua in the sight of all Israel and to confirm his role as the successor of Moses. What will happen will show the presence of the Lord with Joshua. Joshua's sermon in verses 10-13 states who is responsible for what is about to happen—the living God who is the Lord of the whole earth. It is this Lord who will bring the waters to a halt so that the people can cross over. Verse 10 lists the indigenous population of the land in standard form: the Canaanites are found in the coastal cities; the Hittites in small colonies here and there; the Hivites around Shechem and Gibeon; the Amorites inhabited the hill country; and the Jebusites lived in Jerusalem. It is not clear who the Perizzites and Girgashites were.

3:14-17 The crossing. Everything happens now as foretold. In solemn procession the people follow the priests carrying the ark of the covenant and, when the waters halt, the people cross. The crossing is consciously presented as a parallel to the crossing of the Red Sea, because the entrance into the Promised Land is, in a sense, the conclusion of the Lord's great act of deliverance that began with the Exodus. One sees here how the Exodus becomes the prism through which all of God's great acts of deliverance are seen. The return from the Exile will also be seen as a new Exodus. To heighten the sense of the miraculous and the greatness of God's activity, it is made clear that it is late winter or early spring, when the Jordan overflows its banks because of melting snow from the mountains to the north. The river halts at "Adam," a city at the junction of the Jabbok and the Jordan Rivers, several miles north of Jericho. The Salt Sea refers to the Dead Sea, and the Arabah is the desert south of the Dead Sea. The people cross over opposite Jericho. There are several known times when the Jordan has been dammed up for a period of hours because its banks collapsed and formed a natural dam. Perhaps such an event stands behind this story.

4:1-9 The memorial stones. The present episode is a secondary insertion into the text. This is clear from the summary statement in 4:10, which refers back to the crossing in 3:14-17, and from the special interest in the twelve stones at Gilgal. Though the actual location of Gilgal is unknown, it is somewhere in the area of Jericho. From a very early period it was an Israelite national shrine. More than likely it was the natural presence of a group of stones at this sanctuary, later linked to the crossing of the Jordan, that gave rise to this episode. The stones were understood to be a physical reminder, a perpetual memorial (v. 7), of how "the waters of the Jordan ceased to flow before the ark of the covenant of the Lord when it crossed the Jordan." The episode, then, originated as an etiological tale, like the story of Rahab in chapter 2. In these verses two traditions are combined: one that explains the presence of the stones at Gilgal (vv. 1-8) and one that explains the presence of stones in the middle of the Jordan River (v. 9). It is unclear where the latter tradition came from and why it is included in verse 9.

In the present context these verses are meant to emphasize that it was the Lord who brought the Israelites across the Jordan. For the exiles this is a message of hope: this same Lord can bring the exiles back into the land. The explanation of the twelve stones in verse 17 is the midpoint of the whole block of material in 3:1–5:12. The inclusion of this episode may also be an attempt at a further assimilation of the crossing of the Jordan to the tradition of the Exodus-Sinai event (compare with the twelve stones for the twelve tribes of Israel commemorating the covenant at Sinai in Exod 24:4).

4:10-18 Completion of the crossing. Though these verses seem jumbled, there is a certain logic to them. The condition of the text here is the result of several editors dealing with various concerns. After the insertion of 4:1-9, verse 10 returns the reader to the main narrative by summarizing 3:14-17. Verse 11 is a summary in advance of the exit of the ark from the river. In this liturgical procession the people, having safely crossed the river, now line up to witness the ark being brought out of the river.

Verses 12-13 are an addition by D, who wishes to emphasize here, as in 1:12ff., that all the tribes of Israel were involved—even those that had been granted land east of the Jordan. The number forty thousand is certainly an exaggeration. Perhaps the solution is that the word that can be translated as "thousand" can also be used as a technical term to indicate a military unit of considerable size.

Verse 14 returns to 3:7 and stresses the major purpose of this miraculous crossing, namely, to exalt Joshua before all Israel. This purpose was accomplished by the great miracle; henceforth, the people respected Joshua as they had Moses. With all the goals of the miracle accomplished, the priests now come up from the river and, as soon as they hit dry ground, the Jordan resumes its course and once again overflows its banks.

4:19–5:12 Cultic encampment at Gilgal. With the crossing of the Jordan, one period in the life of Israel is about to end and another to begin. This section, with its emphasis on various cultic rites at Gilgal, forms the transition from the period of deliverance to the occupation of the land. The section is framed by two cultic events that explicitly refer back to the deliverance from Egypt: the actual setting up of the stones at Gilgal (4:20-24), and the celebration of the Passover (5:10-12). The narrative in 5:1 shows the impact of Israel's entrance into the land on the inhabitants of the area. The circumcision of all males, reported in 5:2-9, is to prepare for the celebration of the Passover.

The scene is set in 4:19. The date is the tenth day of the first month, known as Nisan. This is the time of the harvest in March-April. The date is important in view of the celebration of the Passover, which is soon to follow. The place where the people camp after crossing the Jordan is explicitly identified for the first time; it is at Gilgal, here located on the eastern limits of Jericho.

In the story of the memorial stones (4:20-24), it is the explanation of the stones that is important. Notice the explicit comparison of the drying up of the waters of the Jordan to the drying up of the Red Sea (see Exod 14:21). The two events provide the beginning and ending points of the period of deliverance. With the entrance into the land, Israel has achieved the goal for which she was delivered from Egypt (see Exod 3:8). The purpose of the Lord's actions is explicit: that all the people of the earth might learn of the might of God, and that the Israelites might fear the Lord. This is an important message for the exiles: in the midst of their pain they must put hope in the power of their God, and give their full allegiance to the Lord who can deliver.

The point of 5:1 is to show that the Lord's purpose has been achieved among the kings in the land of Canaan. They have recognized the might of the Lord in the events of the crossing and have become "disheartened"; literally, "their hearts melted." See the same term used by Rahab (2:10-11) and in Exod 15:13-17, which narrates the results of the Exodus. Once again the author parallels the crossing of the Jordan and the crossing of the Red Sea.

The story of the circumcision in 5:2-9 is placed here more for theological reasons than for historical ones. Exod 12:48 explains that only the circumcised can take part in the celebration of the Passover. For whatever reason (the text gives none), however, the children who were born in the desert during the forty years of wandering since leaving Egypt had not been circumcised. Hence, for a proper celebration of the Passover, circumcision is now necessary. The reference to circumcision taking place for a "second time" (v. 2) intends to show the circumcision and celebration of the Passover at Gilgal as a repetition of the rites surrounding the Exodus (see Exod 12). The site of the ritual is called Gibeath-haaraloth, which means "Hill of the Foreskins," referring to a place near Gilgal where the rite of circumcision was practiced. Notice D's need to explain the reason for the death of all the warriors who had come out of Egypt (see Num 14), probably to explain to the exiles why they had lost their land, namely, because of their disobedience. In verse 9 an attempt is made to explain the name Gilgal. The place is so named because here the Lord "removed," literally, "rolled away" the reproach of Israel. One of the meanings that the root of the word "gilgal" can have is "to roll away." It is not clear what is meant by the "reproach of Egypt."

The section concludes with the celebration of the Passover (vv. 10-12), the festival celebrating the Exodus. The fourteenth day of the first month was the proper date for this celebration (see Exod 12:1-6). As the Exodus began with the celebration of the Passover, so the entrance into the land, which brings this period of deliverance to an end, concludes with the same celebration. The next day the people eat of the produce of the land, and with this event the manna (see Exod 16 and Deut 8:3) ceases, since there is no longer a need for it. It is truly the end of an era.

5:13–12:24 The conquest. These chapters contain the narrative of the conquest: the conquest of the central part of the land (5:13–9:27); the conquest of the southern part (10:1-43); and the conquest of the northern part (11:1-15). The concluding verses (11:16–12:24) present a summary.

5:13–9:27 The conquest of the center of the land. These chapters narrate the capture of Jericho (5:13–6:27), the defeat and victory at Ai (7:1–8:29), the altar on Mount Ebal (8:30-35), and the Gibeonite alliance (9:1-27).

5:13–6:27 The capture of Jericho. The story begins with the apparition of a divine being that recalls Exod 3, the call of Moses. Joshua is to be understood as the new Moses. Though the material in 5:13-15 probably belonged originally to an independent epic, it now forms a unit with 6:1-5, which tells of the Lord's pronouncement of the fall of Jericho and instructions on how the city is to be taken. The presence of the captain of the host of the Lord shows the presence of the Lord in the conquest, right from the beginning. As 6:2 brings out, it is the Lord who is responsible for the fall of Jericho. The trumpets made of rams' horns (6:4) were commonly used in warfare and liturgies.

Archaeological evidence shows that Jericho was already in ruins when the Israelites entered into Canaan. Any habitation of the site of Tell es-Sultan, the site identified as Jericho, was sparse at the time of the conquest. What gave rise to the belief that it had been destroyed in the conquest was the fact that the site had lain in ruins in the period of the Judges and on into the period of the monarchy. Being close to the national sanctuary of Gilgal, the presupposition arose of its destruction under Joshua. Historically, it is not possible to say what lies behind the present narrative.

The narrative in chapter 6 is quite complicated and seems to have gone through various editions. In its final form the story has the characteristics of a religious ritual, a liturgy. D wants to stress to the exiles that it was Yahweh who was responsible for the conquest of the land and that same Yahweh can once again lead them to victory. This first success in Canaan takes on a symbolic value of the power of the Lord. The multiple use of the number seven, a sacred number in Israel, plays up the presence of the Lord in this narrative.

Having received instructions from the Lord on how to go about the conquest of Jericho, Joshua passes them on to the priests and people. These orders are executed and the city falls before the Israelites (6:12-21). The point of the "ban" in verses 17ff. is that since the Lord is the warrior and the victor, the enemy and booty belong to the Lord. Hence, they are sacred and taboo. To approach too close is to approach too close to God. To destroy such is an act of devotion to the Lord.

Verses 22-25, along with the reference to Rahab in verse 17, are probably an addition to help tie the story of the fall of Jericho to the story of Rahab in chapter 2. These verses conclude the etiology begun in chapter 2 that explains the presence of Rahab and her family in the midst of Israel. The mention of the treasury of the house of the Lord in verse 24 is often understood to refer to the temple of Jerusalem, which had not yet been built! More likely, it refers to the sanctuary at Gilgal.

The narrative of the fall of Jericho seems to recall memories of a military conquest on the basis of a ruse (6:1, 20, 21, 25). These may well be ancient memories of the original fall of the city. The curse, which is reported in 6:26, explains why the city was not rebuilt, and finds its fulfillment in 1 Kgs 16:34. (One of these texts depends upon the other, but it is not clear which way the dependency goes.)

7:1–8:29 Defeat and victory at Ai. The material in chapters 7 and 8 is composed of at least two narratives that were combined, probably before the time of D. The main story told of an original defeat of Israel at Ai. To this has been combined an ancient story of the crime and punishment of Achan in order to give an explanation of the defeat. The only difficulty with the combined narrative is that at the time of the Israelite conquest, Ai (today identified as et-Tell) was uninhabited. Archaeological evidence shows that the city was last inhabited at the end of the third millennium and not settled again until the eleventh century. Several theories have been advanced to explain the present narrative. One prominent theory says that the story originally described the fall of Bethel, which is only a couple of miles away, and was later connected with the ruins at et-Tell. The basis for this theory is the archaeological evidence, which shows that Bethel was destroyed toward the end of the thirteenth century. However, it is not clear that this destruction was due to the Israelites. Though the real source of the story is unknown, it is evident that both narratives are quite old. As we shall see, the major thrust of the combined narratives is to show to the exiles that a violation of the covenant leads to defeat and destruction, while faith and obedience lead to victory.

The author begins (v. 1) by explaining that the Lord was angry with Israel because Achan had violated the ban (see 6:18); hence, there should be no surprise at the defeat that is about to take place. Here is introduced the idea of corporate guilt, i.e., how the whole people could suffer because of the sin of one person.

Notice that nothing is said in verses 2-3 of the Lord's involvement. All is being done at the initiative of Israel. Hence, when Israel attacks she is defeated and the confidence of the people melts away (vv. 4-5). The word used here for "thousands" probably refers to a military contingent of some size.

Joshua with the elders now consults the Lord (vv. 6-9). Joshua's real concern is expressed in verse 9, namely, that when the other inhabitants of the land hear of the defeat, they will turn on Israel. The rites described in these verses pertain to the ritual of mourning (see Deut 9:26; Exod 32:11; 2 Sam 12:15-17). The passage recalls Israel's complaints against Moses and the Lord when they were in the desert (see Exod 16:2-8).

In the Lord's response (vv. 10-15) Joshua learns of the reason for the defeat, namely, that Israel has taken goods subject to the ban and so has violated the covenant. Israel is now under the ban and the Lord cannot and will not remain with Israel unless she removes from her midst the one who has incurred the ban. The legal procedure described (v. 14) is that of a trial by sacred lot, though we are given no details of the procedure. The verses express clearly the idea that the whole community can suffer for the sins of one.

Once Achan is identified as the culprit, he and all of his possessions are taken to the valley of Achor and stoned, and the Lord's anger toward Israel relents (vv. 16-26). The final verses present two etiologies as an explanation of the story of Achan. One of them explains a pile of stones in the valley of Achor (v. 26); the other, the name of the valley of Achor (vv. 24 and 26). This latter etiology is developed through a play on the words "Achor" and "Achan" and by the fact that the Hebrew root for "misery" and "afflicted" (see v. 25) is similar in sound to "Achor." More importantly, however, the purpose of the story is to explain to the exiles that the violation of the covenant leads to defeat.

Now that the Lord's anger against Israel has relented, the Lord tells Joshua to prepare to attack Ai. Notice that in contrast to chapter 7 victory is assured (8:1) because it is the Lord who leads Israel into battle. Hence, Israel is not to be afraid; she is only to be obedient and destroy Ai as she destroyed Jericho (v. 2). However, the Israelites are now allowed to take booty, and the Lord sets out the general lines of the conquest—it is to be through an ambush.

Joshua then gives instructions to the warriors who are to carry out the ambush (vv. 3-8), and they leave to take up their positions (v. 9). Notice again the emphasis that the Israelites will be able to take the city because the Lord has delivered it into their power (see 8:1).

Verses 10-23 describe the battle. As the main body of Israelites fled once again in seeming defeat before the king of Ai, all of the soldiers in Ai came out after the Israelites, leaving the city open and unprotected. When Joshua, at the Lord's command, stretches out his javelin towards Ai, the soldiers in ambush rise up and take the city, setting it on fire. By the time the soldiers of Ai realize what is happening, it is too late. They find themselves caught between the two parts of the Israelite army and are cut down to the last person. Only the king of Ai is spared, and he is taken alive and brought to Joshua. Joshua's stretching out of the javelin (v. 18 and v. 26) recalls the action of Moses during the war with Amalek (see Exod 17:8-13). This appears to be another incident in which the life of Joshua is paralleled to the life of Moses.

The story concludes (vv. 24-29) with the report of the slaying of all of the inhabitants of Ai (see Deut 20:16-18), the taking of booty, and the destruction of the city. These final verses contain another double etiology that explains how all was reduced to a mound of ruins, "as it remains today" (an explanation of the name of the city, "the ruin"), and how the pile of stones at the entrance of the city gate came into being—they were used to cover the body of the slain king of Ai.

In contrast to chapter 7, chapter 8 shows how Israel, when she fights under the leadership of the Lord and does the Lord's will, can be victorious. The message for the exiles is clear: while sin leads to disaster, obedience leads to victory.

8:30-35 The altar on Mount Ebal. These verses are an editorial addition, since they interrupt the flow of the story in 8:29 and 9:1. The verses report the fulfillment of the commands of Moses (see Deut 27:1-8, 11-13 and Deut 11:29) concerning what is to happen once the people have entered the land. Notice the often repeated reference to Moses in these verses. We shall see later that these verses are closely related to the material in chapter 24.

Mounts Ebal and Gerizim face one another across a deep ravine in north central Israel, about 20 miles north of Ai. Between them is the city of Shechem, an ancient cultic site. These two mountains flanked the important east-west pass through the central hill country of Israel.

9:1-27 The Gibeonite alliance. The two narratives in verses 1-2 and 3-27 show the possible responses of a people threatened with total destruction: to form a common alliance against the threat, or to enter into an alliance with the threatening party.

The reference (v. 1) to the mountain region, the foothills, and the coast of the Great Sea identifies the three regions (from east to west) of the land of Palestine.

The narrative about the Gibeonites in verses 3-27 reflects a complex literary history. Aside from D's later additions in verses 9-10, 24-25 and 27b, the figure of Joshua appears to have been a secondary insertion into the text, and verses 16-27 appear to be a secondary addition to the original story (one can jump from 9:15 to 10:1 without any sense of a gap). It is also not clear whether one city or four cities (see v. 17) entered into the alliance with Israel; nor is it always clear who was acting for Israel—the "men of Israel" or Joshua.

Like the story of Rahab (see ch. 2) this story is an etiology that has been preserved to explain the presence of the Gibeonites in the midst of Israel, despite the prohibitions of Deut 20:10-18, and their role as slaves (hewers of wood and drawers of water) at an Israelite sanctuary. The story also explains how Israel came into control of the central hill country and serves as background for chapter 10. For the exiles in the sixth century, the purpose of the story would have been to call them to faith in the power and promises of Yahweh (see vv. 9-10 and 24-25). There is little question about the historicity of an alliance between Israel and the Gibeonites (see 2 Sam 21:1-9).

The first part of the narrative (vv. 3-15) reports the deception of the Gibeonites and the conclusion of the alliance. Gibeon is identified with modern el-Jib, a site in the central hill country about seven miles northwest of Jerusalem and situated along an important east-west road from Jericho to the coastal plain. Seemingly, Gibeon belonged to a small four-village alliance (see v. 17). Whatever settlement existed at el-Jib in the time of Joshua, archaeological evidence shows that it was not a large settlement, although it later became an important city.

The Gibeonites come to Israel at Gilgal (v. 6), to which Israel has returned after the covenant ceremony reported in the preceding chapter. Israel's hesitancy regarding the proposed alliance (v. 7) flows from Deut 7:2 and 20:10-18. The alliance would have included peace between the two parties, as well as mutual defense (see 10:1-15). The reason given for seeking this alliance is the fame of the Lord, the God of Israel, and all that this God had done for Israel in Egypt and against Kings Sihon and Og (see Num 21:21-35). Israel, without seeking the advice of the Lord, agrees to the alliance and the parties partake of a covenant meal to seal it (vv. 14-15).

The second part of the narrative (vv. 16-27) reports the discovery of the ruse and Israel's response. The oath was so important that even the discovery of the trickery was not sufficient reason to release Israel from her obligations. However, the Gibeonites must be punished, so it is recommended that they be made "hewers of wood and drawers of water" (vv. 16-21), an expression referring to an inferior form of membership in the community (see Deut 29:10). Joshua confronts the Gibeonites and tells them that they are to carry out their tasks for "the house of my God" (v. 23). It is not clear if the reference here is to Gibeon or Gilgal. In their response (vv. 24-25) the Gibeonites seem to reflect a knowledge of Deut 20:10-18.

10:1-43 The conquest of the south. In a series of related incidents Joshua takes control of the southern part of Israel. The occasion for this conquest is the attack on Gibeon by the five kings from the south.

10:1-27 The Gibeon campaign. When Adonizedek, the king of Jerusalem, hears of how Joshua has dealt with Ai and Jericho and their kings, and that Gibeon has made a covenant with Israel, he becomes frightened and sends for four other kings from the neighborhood to help him attack Gibeon (vv. 1-4). The fear springs from the strength of Gibeon and because Gibeon has gone over to Israel, thus giving Israel an important bridgehead in the central hill country. Thus, the five kings put Gibeon under siege, as a way of stopping Israel's advance into the hill country, and as a punishment. The Gibeon in chapter 10, "large enough for a royal city" (v. 2), contrasts with the Gibeon in chapter 9, so weak that it sought an alliance with Israel. The picture presented in chapter 10 is also at odds with archaeological evidence. When the Gibeonites appeal to their protector, Joshua, he responds immediately and, after an all-night march, takes the five kings by surprise and inflicts a great slaughter on them (vv. 5-10). The march would have covered about eighteen miles along mountainous roads. Note that Joshua is victorious because the Lord has delivered the five kings into his power (v. 8). The hailstones mentioned in verse 11 were, no doubt, the result of an unusually severe midsummer storm that wreaked as much havoc as the army of Israel. Beth-horon was the name of an important pass that was a major point of entry from the west into the hill country.

Verses 12-14 should not be taken too literally. The compiler certainly understood them to be the description of a miraculous prolonging of the day so that Joshua would have enough sunlight to finish off the enemy. However, we should view these verses as a poetic description emphasizing that Yahweh fought for Israel and was responsible for the victory. Much of this story is reported in Judg 1:4-20, where three of the cities listed here are said to have been captured by the tribe of Judah.

Verses 16-27 describe the death of the five kings who had initiated the attack on Gibeon. Makkedah was west of Jerusalem. When the kings are discovered, Joshua does not want to waste time with them. He tells his men, after making sure that the kings cannot escape, to pursue the fleeing soldiers, and to kill them before they escape into their fortified cities (vv. 16-19). The later humiliation of the kings (v. 24) was meant to build up the confidence of Israel and to emphasize the power of the Lord in her midst. The story ends on an etiological note that explains the existence of a pile of stones at the mouth of a cave in Makkedah (v. 27). The point of the story, then, is to build up the confidence of the exiles in the power of their God to overcome their enemies (see vv. 8-14 and 25).

10:28-43 The conquest of the south concluded. Having defeated the coalition of five kings, Joshua follows up this victory with raids against six cities to the west and southwest of Jerusalem (vv. 28-39). The descriptions of these raids follow a definite pattern that reports how the city was captured and its inhabitants put to the sword with no survivors. In this way Joshua fulfilled the doom on each city according to the will of the Lord (Deut 20:10-18). Israel was successful because the Lord had delivered the cities into her power.

It is not possible to harmonize fully the description of the coalition in verses 1-5 with the account of the campaign against the south depicted in these verses. While there is some overlapping of cities, verses 28-39 seem to reflect a tradition different from the one in verses 1-5. What seems to lie behind these verses is a presupposition that Israel's enemies always followed the same route when advancing against Jerusalem at different points in history. It was the route of Sennacherib in 701 B.C.E. (see 2 Kgs 18:13) and of Nebuchadnezzar in 587 B.C.E. (see Jer 34:7) when they advanced on Jerusalem.

The concluding verses (40-43) summarize this part of the conquest. The author's purpose is to show that Israel had conquered all of the territory south of Gibeon under Joshua's leadership. The description is highly exaggerated, the author using the summary to emphasize how Joshua had followed the Lord's commands and had been successful because the Lord fought for Israel. Again, the message for the exiles is clear: they are to be obedient and trust in the power of the Lord.

11:1-15 The conquest of the north. The chapter begins abruptly with no clear connection to the preceding material except that the king of Hazor "learned of this." Originally, this material was probably an independent tradition that is now presented as the northern counterpart to the conquest of the south reported in chapter 10. This tradition may have belonged to one or more northern tribes and was later extended to all Israel. So too, the figure of Joshua has probably been introduced into the story secondarily. However, the tradition seems to rest upon a historical foundation. Notice that this chapter follows the same outline as chapter 10: one king forms a coalition to defeat the Israelites, but Joshua defeats the coalition through a surprise move, and attacks the cities involved.

The narrative begins with Jabin, the king of Hazor, calling together a coalition of northern kings. Notice how the description begins with specific details and then becomes more and more vague. All of the members of the coalition, with their troops, horses, and chariots, now gather together at the waters of Merom, a few miles southwest of Hazor, to launch an attack against Israel (vv. 1-5). The topography of these chapters covers the general area of Galilee, an area that was later assigned to the tribe of Naphtali. Archaeological excavations show that Hazor, located about eight miles north of the Sea of Galilee, was a very impressive city in the thirteenth century B.C.E. and could well have fit the descriptions of it in these verses. Excavations also show that it was destroyed in the mid-thirteenth century, which would coincide with the time of Joshua. The other three cities named here are located south of Hazor. The Arabah is the great rift that contains the Sea of Galilee (here called "Chinnereth"), the Jordan River, and the Dead Sea. The size of the opposing army is no doubt exaggerated here to magnify the victory.

Israel was successful against the coalition because the Lord had delivered the Canaanites into her power and because Joshua had obeyed the Lord by following the tactics laid out for him (vv. 6-9). Notice that nothing is said about where Joshua received the word of the Lord. From the context it would seem that he was still at Gilgal. The crippling of the horses prevented the Canaanites from using their chariots, which were subsequently burned. The Canaanites then had to flee on foot, allowing Israel to defeat them. Since Israel did not begin to use chariots until the time of David and Solomon, it is doubtful that they could have defeated a chariot-equipped army.

The reason for Joshua's actions against Hazor is that Hazor had been the chief of all those kingdoms (vv. 10-12). Behind the remark about Israel not burning any of the other cities "built on raised sites" (v. 13) is a reminder that Israel had neither the strength nor the technical knowledge to defeat the chariot armies of the Canaanites. The extent of the destruction described in these verses is, therefore, probably exaggerated.

This section concludes with a summary regarding the obedience of Joshua: he did all that the Lord had commanded Moses (v. 15). The message to the exiles is reiterated: the need for obedience to the Lord and trust in the power of the Lord. With such trust, victory is possible.

11:16–12:24 Summary of the conquest. The conquest is now summarized in an idealistic fashion by two separate texts. The editorial summary in 11:16-23 was the original summary and conclusion to the narrative. Chapter 12, with its list of conquered kings, was inserted later.

11:16-23 Editorial summary. These verses come from the original compiler of the conquest stories. The basic theme, set out in verses 16 and 23, is that Joshua "captured all this land." Therefore, the Lord has kept all the promises made to Moses (see Josh 1:1-9). The description of the conquered land (vv. 16-17) goes significantly beyond the description in the preceding chapters and also beyond the classical description of "from Dan to Beersheba." Mount Halak, which marks the southern boundary, is at the southern end of the Negeb desert, south of Judah. Baalgad, the northern boundary, refers to a site at the southern end of the Beka valley in Lebanon.

Verse 18 attempts to correct any notion that the conquest was swift. It is pointed out that Israel had to do battle with all these cities because it was the will of the Lord. The Lord had designed it so that all the cities, except Gibeon, would wage war against Israel and so give reason for their extermination (see Deut 20:10-20).

Verses 21-22 are a bit jarring in the context. The Anakim are described elsewhere as "giants" (Num 13:33). The editor wants to show that there were trouble spots where not all the indigenous population had been driven out.

Once more, the conclusion in verse 23 emphasizes that the Lord has kept the promises made to Moses. The same verse forms the transition to the apportioning of the land that begins in chapter 13. The insistence on the Lord's fidelity to the promises made to Moses was an important message for the people in exile.

12:1-24 List of conquered kings. This chapter falls into two parts: a listing of the kings conquered by the Israelites under Moses, east of the Jordan (vv. 1-6), and a listing of those kings whom Israel had conquered under Joshua, west of the Jordan (vv. 7-24). The chapter is an elaboration of 11:23, and is intended to emphasize that the whole country had been conquered by Israel.

The material in verses 1-6 has been developed from Deut 3:8-17 and Josh 13:9-32. Verse 1 points out the northern and southern boundaries of the territory conquered east of the Jordan, namely, Mount Hermon in the north and the River Arnon in the south. The southern half of this area from the River Arnon to the River Jabbok had belonged to Sihon, king of the Amorites, who had his capital in Heshbon (vv. 2-3). The area north of the Jabbok had been under the control of Og, king of Bashan (vv. 4-5). Num 21:21-35 (see Deut 2:26–3:11) recounts the defeat of Sihon and Og. Num 32 reports how Moses had assigned this land to the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh (v. 6). The Rephaim mentioned in verse 4 were a legendary people of great stature who had inhabited Syria and Palestine in ages past (see Deut 2:11, 3:11; Gen 14:5; 2 Sam 21:16-20).

The listing of the kings conquered west of the Jordan in verses 7-24 is a very important list because verses 13b-24 contain names of cities not previously mentioned. These latter verses are not simply a summary of the preceding stories but represent an independent tradition of the conquest that some scholars say is very ancient, dating from the time of Solomon. Verses 16b-24 are especially interesting, since they list cities found in the territories of Ephraim and Manasseh in central Palestine, where no previous conquests have been mentioned.

The impression given by these lists is that of a total conquest of the land; and that is almost certainly the intention of the author. The interest of the author in these chapters of the conquest (6–11) has not been to give an exact historical account, but rather to show God keeping past promises through great acts on behalf of Israel.

PART II: THE DIVISION OF THE LAND

Josh 13:1–22:34

13–22 The division of the land. These chapters contain elaborate geographical details about how the land was divided among the various tribes, and provide statistical information about persons, places, and tribes. Their purpose is to show how God has given the whole country to Israel as its heritage, just as the Lord had promised Moses (see 11:23). This was an important message for the original audience of this book, the exiles, who had recently lost the land. To these exiles the Book of Joshua is promising above all that the Lord is faithful to the ancient promises made to the patriarchs.

The data found in these chapters are the result of combining various sources. Martin Noth claims that the section is the result of combining two documents: a list of towns of the kingdom of Judah, which dates from the time of King Josiah (d. 621), and a survey of boundaries dating from before the monarchy. Admittedly, the roots of some of this data are quite old, but the chapters reflect the impact of later events. This section may have been composed before the writing of Joshua, and may even be a later insertion into the original narrative of the conquest (compare 13:1b and 23:1b).

While the primary interest of these chapters is with the area west of the Jordan, the section begins with a survey of the allotments of the land east of the Jordan that Moses had made to the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh (13:8-33). It concludes with the narrative of the return of these tribes to their territory in order to take possession of it (22). Chapters 14–21 deal with the allotment to Judah and the Joseph tribes at Gilgal (14–17), the allotment at Shiloh to the remaining seven tribes (18–19), and the setting aside of the cities of asylum (20) and the Levitical cities (21).

In the material that follows, this commentary will not present a detailed analysis of the boundaries and lists of towns given in the biblical text. Readers interested in such detail are referred to the more technical commentaries and atlases. This commentary will limit itself to general remarks.

13:1-33 Introduction to the division of the land. With Joshua far advanced in years, the Lord orders him to apportion the land west of the Jordan among the nine tribes and the half-tribe of Manasseh that still do not have land. This chapter is a D composition in which the author points out that not all of the territory to be allotted had been conquered (v. 1), describes the lands that must still be conquered (vv. 2-6), reminds the reader that the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh had already been allotted territory east of the Jordan by Moses (v. 8), and gives a general (vv. 9-13) and a specific description (vv. 15-31) of this land. Two footnotes have been added to explain why the tribe of Levi had not received an allotment of a block of territory like all the other tribes (v. 14 and v. 33). While the author's purpose seems clear, a certain lack of logic and continuity in these verses is apparent (compare

v. 7 to vv. 1-6 and v. 14 to vv. 8-13). This tells us that there are several layers of material in these chapters.

Verses 1-7 identify the parts of Canaan that Israel had not been able to conquer. That verses 2-6 were added secondarily is apparent from the lack of connection between the description of the land to be conquered and the subsequent order to apportion the land among the nine and a half tribes (v. 7). The area envisioned by verses 2-6 is the area belonging to the empire of David and Solomon.

Verses 8-14 are another addition to the text to explain why Joshua was to apportion land only to nine and a half tribes (v. 8), and to give a general picture of this territory (vv. 9-13). These verses seem to be based on Deut 3.

Verses 15-31 describe the lands allotted to the tribes of Reuben and Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh. The Reubenites receive the tableland stretching north of the Arnon River to Medeba and Heshbon; the Gadites receive the highlands north of Heshbon; and the half-tribe of Manasseh receives the area of Bashan and a portion of Gilead.

The chapter concludes with another reminder that Moses had apportioned these lands to these tribes when he was in the plains of Moab (v. 32).

14:1–21:42 Allotment of the land west of the Jordan. This is the core section of the second half of the Book of Joshua and falls into five sections: an introduction (14:1-5); the allotment to Judah and Joseph at Gilgal (14:6–17:18); the allotment at Shiloh to the remaining seven tribes (18:1–19:51); a list of the cities of asylum (20:1-9); and a listing of the Levitical cities (21:1-42).

14:1-5 Introduction. These verses present the specific introduction to the allotment of the land west of the Jordan. They stress that Eleazar the priest and Joshua and the heads of the families divided the land (v. 1), and that it was done by lot, in accordance with the instructions that the Lord had given through Moses (vv. 2 and 5; see Num 33:54; 34:13). It is also explained why the land was divided among twelve tribes, even though the tribe of Levi was not given a block of land, namely, because the descendants of Joseph formed two tribes (vv. 3-4).

In the later traditions in the Old Testament Eleazar the priest (v. 1) is presented as a son of Aaron (Exod 6:25; Lev 10:5; Num 3:2). Though the use of the lot is referred to several times in the Old Testament it is not clear from the contexts what was involved. The reason for the need to explain why Joseph's descendants formed two tribes (vv. 3-4) flows from the tradition that Israel was composed of twelve tribes. Not all of the traditions agreed, however, on the identity of the twelve tribes; and some traditions did not even recognize the twelve tribe schema. For example, while one tradition spoke of Joseph as one tribe (17:14-18), another tradition spoke of Joseph's descendants as two tribes. Hence, the editor clarifies from the beginning that the descendants of Joseph formed two tribes: Ephraim and Manasseh.

14:6–15:63 Allotment to the tribe of Judah. This section is composed of four units: the portion given to Caleb (14:6-15); the list of the boundaries of Judah (15:1-12); the gift to Othniel (15:13-19); and the list of the cities of Judah (15:20-63).

14:6-15 Caleb's portion. The story tells how Caleb came into possession of the city of Hebron: it was a reward for his loyalty to the Lord when Moses had sent him to spy out the land many years earlier. Num 13–14 (see Deut 1:20-45) reports how all the spies, except Caleb and Joshua, advised against invasion. As a result God delayed the conquest until that whole generation, except Caleb and Joshua, had died. While a specific promise of land to Caleb is not found in Num 13–14, it is presupposed in Deut 1:36.

In several Old Testament passages, Caleb is identified as a Judahite (e.g., Num 13:6; 34:19), but elsewhere as a Kenizzite (e.g., Num 32:12). The Kenizzites were originally part of the Edomite people (Gen 36:11, 15, 42) who had settled in the southern hill country of Judah and were eventually assimilated into the tribe of Judah. Accordingly, Caleb is presumed to be part of the tribe of Judah. Note that in Judg 1:10 the region shown here as occupied by Caleb was conquered by Judah and Simeon, who defeated the three Anakim chiefs.

Because this passage, as well as 15:13-19, disrupts an otherwise carefully organized presentation of tribal allotments, some claim that they were inserted into the text secondarily. Some also argue that 14:6-15 originally followed 11:21-23 and that 15:13-19 has been drawn from Judg 1:10-20.

15:1-12 Boundaries of Judah. This first of the boundary lists is also the most detailed, indicating that the D editor had more complete records for Judah than for the other tribes. The list, though idealistic, is ancient, and may predate the period of the monarchy. It is certainly older than the list of cities in 15:21-62.

15:13-19 The gift to Othniel. This story, an almost verbatim duplicate of Judg 1:10-15, is an etiology to explain why the Othnielites, who also belonged to the Kenizzite group, had access to pools of water which should have belonged to the Calebites in Hebron. Notice that Caleb is said here to have taken by force the area given him as his heritage in 14:6-15.

15:20-63 Cities of Judah. This list of cities is based on a catalog of twelve provinces that composed the southern kingdom of Judah, probably drawn up for governmental administrative purposes sometime after David. Verse 63 has been added to explain why Jerusalem has not appeared in the city list, namely, because the Judahites could not drive out the Jebusites who lived in the city. It will be David who eventually captures the city (2 Sam 5:6-9).

16:1-17:18 Allotment to the Joseph tribes. This section is made up of four parts: a broad description of the area occupied by the Josephites, in which the Josephites are presented as one tribe (vv. 1-3); a list of the boundaries of the tribe of Ephraim (vv. 4-10); a list of the allotment made to the descendants of Manasseh, other than Machir, who had already obtained land east of the Jordan (17:1-13); and a story of how Joseph's descendants complained that they needed more land (17:14-18).

These lists are in obvious contrast to the detailed Judahite lists in the previous chapters. Fewer details are given and the material is often presented in a very confused way. Notice the concern to explain why Canaanites continued to live in the midst of these tribes (16:10; 17:12), though in both cases it is insisted that the Canaanites were eventually impressed as laborers, even if they were not driven out.

In verses 1-6 we find delineated, by means of a genealogical formulation, the members of the half-tribe of Manasseh, who settled in the area west of the Jordan (see Num 26:28-34). The clan of Machir (v. 1) made up the half-tribe that settled east of the Jordan.

Verses 14-18 consist of two versions (14-15; 16-18) of the same tradition combined into one narrative. The theme of both is a request by Joseph's descendants for more territory, because the hill country they had been given was not large enough to accommodate all of them. In verses 16-18 they also complain that they had been unable to drive out the Canaanites because of their iron chariots. In both versions Joshua responds by telling the Josephites to make better use of their hill country by clearing out some of the forest. In the second version he also encourages them to overcome the Canaanites.

18:1-19:51 Allotment at Shiloh. Having presented the allotment of land to the major tribes of Judah and Joseph, the editor, after an introduction (18:1-10), describes the allotments to the seven remaining tribes: Benjamin (18:11-28); Simeon (19:1-9); Zebulun (19:10-16); Issachar (19:17-23); Asher (19:24-31); Naphtali (19:32-39).

The introduction (18:1-10) describes the procedure of allotting the land: after a representative body (three members from each tribe) surveys and prepares a description of it, the land is divided into seven parts. Joshua assigns the various parts to the seven tribes by casting lots, but it is highly unlikely that the tribes actually received their land in this way. In reality the process was a highly complex one of historical settlement over a period of time. Note that whereas the tribes of Judah and Joseph initiated the procedure for getting their allotment, Joshua is pictured here (v. 3) as admonishing the other seven tribes for not taking more initiative in possessing the subdued land. The reference to Shiloh is probably secondary, since the reference to Judah in the south and Joseph in the north (v. 5) does not make sense if the reference point is Shiloh, which was in the territory of Ephraim. The original tradition supposed Gilgal as the place for this allotment of land. Historically, Shiloh succeeded Gilgal as the national shrine. The reference to the meeting tent (v. 1) is curious, since references to the meeting tent are very rare in the Deuteronomistic sections of the Old Testament (see Deut 31:14-15; 1 Sam 2:22). This reference to the meeting tent is probably due to a later editing of the text.

In general the allotments given to the different tribes are described in terms of ancient boundary lists and city lists drawn up for administrative purposes. Notice that for Simeon (19:1-9) no tribal boundaries are given. The reason is that from a very early period the tribe of Simeon was absorbed into the tribe of Judah and had no territory of its own. Rather, Simeon occupied certain cities within the area belonging to Judah. D justifies this allotment to the Simeonites on the basis that Judah's portion was larger than it needed to be.

Seemingly, the original allotment to Dan was very small. However, the main reason the Danites were forced to migrate north (v. 47) was because they could not conquer the Canaanites in the coastal plain that was part of their original allotment (see Judg 17–18).

That Joshua was granted a specific city as his own is reported only here. Perhaps the passage (vv. 49-50) was added to justify the later statement that Joshua was buried within his own heritage (Josh 24:30; Judg 2:9).

The conclusion to this section is based on 14:1 and 18:1.

20:1-9 The cities of asylum. The right of sanctuary is an ancient tradition that is found in both classical and oriental antiquity and is normally associated with certain sanctuaries. This passage lists those cities where a person who has accidentally killed another could find refuge and asylum. Behind this passage is the fact that in ancient semitic society, in the case of murder, it was the responsibility of the victim's next of kin to avenge the death by taking the life of the murderer. This was true even in the case of an accidental killing. Hence, there was a need to protect a person who accidentally killed another. Cities of asylum have no parallel that we are aware of. The six cities that are listed here show up again in the list of Levitical cities in chapter 21, and Shechem and Hebron housed famous sanctuaries. That a sanctuary also existed at Kadesh (the name means "holy") is also probable. Therefore, it would seem that the right of asylum is connected with these cities because of the sanctuaries located in them.

A difficulty with the picture this chapter presents is that, aside from the laws concerning this custom of asylum in Num 35:9-15 and Deut 19:1-13, no biblical text provides a concrete example of its practice. So, serious questions may be raised about the historicity of what is presented here, and no sufficient evidence is available to give any satisfactory answers.

21:1-42 Levitical cities. D has pointed out several times that the tribe of Levi received no heritage, i.e., no block of territory (13:14, 33; 14:4; 18:7). The Levites received only cities to live in along with their pasture lands (14:4). This chapter lists those cities that were given to the Levites in fulfillment of the Lord's command to Moses (Num 35:1-8).

The major issue regarding the chapter is whether the institution of the Levitical cities is historically true. The list of cities as we have it is artificially arranged, as is apparent in the twelve-tribe scheme imposed upon it. Again, we see nowhere in the Old Testament any concrete example of how this institution functioned. It is not surprising, then, that some see the institution of Levitical cities, and hence this list, as purely theoretical and idealistic. However, there are scholars today who claim that there is a historical reality underlying the story. Specifically they say that the Levitical cities represent "colonies," i.e., places assigned to faithful groups like the Levites in order to bring stability to a given area. Others argue that the list represents an administrative arrangement established by David for governing the frontier areas of his new empire. It is true that Israel controlled the extensive territory presupposed by the list only in the time of David and Solomon, and the majority of the cities listed here are known to have been difficult frontier areas of the empire conquered by David. The Levites were not the only inhabitants of these cities, but they did have certain prerogatives and rights regarding these cities and their pasture lands.

The story of the origin of the Levites as descendants of the three sons of Levi (Kohath, Gershon and Merari) is both late (post-exilic) and an over-simplification of the reality. Notice that the Kohathites are divided into two groups: the descendants of Aaron (the priests) and the other Kohathites.

21:43–22:34 Conclusion. These verses conclude the narrative of the division of the land (21:43–22:9) and provide an appendix regarding the building of a great altar by the Transjordanian tribes on their return to their own lands (22:10-34).

21:43–22:9 Summary and dismissal of the eastern tribes. Verses 43-45 are a summary of the book up to this point. This summary, like the others noted in the book (9:1-2; 10:40-43), goes beyond what has actually been reported in the individual stories that precede it. Despite allusions to the contrary (13:1-6), the editor claims here that Israel has conquered all of the land. What is important, however, is the message that the editor wishes to convey here, namely, that the Lord has been faithful to all the promises made to the patriarchs. As a result Israel has taken possession of all the land and has found peace. As we have noted, this is the major theme of the Book of Joshua and an important message for the people in exile in the sixth century. The exiles can trust this God who is faithful to past promises and who has the power to fulfill them.

The material in 22:1-9 is closely linked to 21:43-45 because it is the "peace" described in 21:45 that permits the dismissal of the eastern tribes reported in 22:1-9. These verses frame the theme developed in 1:12-18. Joshua acknowledges the fidelity of the eastern tribes (vv. 1-3) and, because the tribes west of the Jordan are settled, he dismisses the eastern tribes so that they can return to their own lands (v. 4) with the admonition to remain faithful to the law of Moses (v. 5). He then sends them on their way with his blessing (v. 6). The editor gives special attention to the eastern tribes throughout the book in order to emphasize that the conquest of the land was the work of all Israel. The unity of all of the tribes was quite important to the editor.

22:10-34 Appendix: The construction of the great altar. This story constitutes an appendix to the narrative of the conquest and division of the land. On the surface it tells of how, on their way home, the eastern tribes construct a very large altar in the region of the Jordan River (v. 10). When the other tribes hear of this, they meet to declare war on the eastern tribes (vv. 11-12). The reason for such a strong reaction to the altar is found in the accusation of the delegation sent to get an explanation, namely, the altar is seen as an act of rebellion against the Lord (v. 16). The objecting tribes are fearful of the ramifications of this sin upon all of the tribes (vv. 17-20). What is presupposed here is the belief of the D editor that there can be only one place of worship. The western tribes are mollified when the eastern tribes assure them that the altar is not meant for sacrifices but for a memorial—a reminder to all the tribes that the eastern tribes, though not living in the Promised Land, strictly speaking (see v. 19), did have a right to worship the Lord (vv. 21-29).

Behind the story stands an older narrative that probably dealt with some conflict between the eastern and western tribes over religious practices, and which provided an etiology to describe some great altar. The story has been so thoroughly reworked, that it is impossible to say anything about the original narrative. As it stands, it is a clear warning against illegitimate cultic places, and it stresses the unity of all the tribes. This latter point is found in the concept of corporate guilt expressed in verses 17-20, where the presumed treachery of the eastern tribes is understood to affect all of the tribes, and in the reason given by the eastern tribes for building the altar—as witness to the unity of the eastern and western tribes.

It is not clear from verses 10 and 11 if the altar was built on the western or eastern side of the Jordan. For the story of Peor, see Num 25:6-18. The thrust of the remark in verse 18 would seem to imply that Israel is still offering sacrifices to atone for that sin.

PART III: JOSHUA'S FAREWELL AND DEATH

Josh 23:1–24:33

23–24 Joshua's farewell address. Though these two chapters have separate introductions, they go together in the final edition of the book as the last will and testament of Joshua. Joshua, realizing that his end is near, gathers the people together to remind them of all that has taken place and to encourage them to be faithful to the covenant. He also warns them of the dire consequences of rebellion against the Lord.

Both chapters must be seen against the background of ancient Near Eastern treaties. Scholars are aware of strong parallels between the way the covenant at Sinai is presented in the Old Testament and the form of ancient Near Eastern vassal treaties. These treaties usually contained the following elements: self-introduction by the sovereign; a recounting of history, i.e., what the sovereign has done for the vassal; stipulations that the vassal is to observe as a response to what the sovereign has done for him; blessings and curses for fidelity, or lack thereof, to the treaty; calling upon witnesses; and a demand that the treaty be read periodically before the people. These elements, in different ways, give shape to these two chapters.

23:1-16 Joshua's final plea. This chapter falls into the category of a farewell address. Joshua recalls the past, especially God's actions on behalf of the people, reminds the people of what the Lord asks of them, and of what must still be done. The address has been affected by the style of the Levitical sermon, in which there is much repetition and a mixture of history, stipulation, curses, and blessings. In these latter elements one sees the influence of the ancient vassal treaties.

The chapter is a total creation of the D author, and forms the conclusion to the narrative of the conquest. The purpose of the chapter is to explain to the exiles why they have lost the land, namely, because of their disloyalty to Yahweh, which has brought about the fulfillment of the Lord's threats of destruction. By emphasizing that the Lord has fulfilled all the promises made in the past (vv. 2-11), the author is telling the people that if they again turn to the Lord, they can have their land back; because the Lord is faithful to past promises. Through specific warnings in the text, the author is telling the exiles how they must act in their present situation.

After the Lord has given the Israelites rest from all their enemies, Joshua, in his old age, summons Israel for his farewell address (vv. 1-2). He recalls all that the Lord has done for the people (v. 3), points out that in accord with the promises that have been made, the Lord will drive out the nations before the Israelites from the regions allotted them (vv. 4-5), and calls the people to obedience to the law of Moses (vv. 6-8). The people are to avoid any activity that might even imply the existence of the gods of the foreigners (v. 7). Then the author once again recalls how the Lord drove out the nations before Israel (v. 9) out of fidelity to the promises made in the past (v. 10), and calls Israel to love the Lord (v. 11). Joshua threatens Israel: if she abandons Yahweh and in any way allies herself with the foreign nations (v. 12), then the Lord will no longer drive out the nations before her, but will abandon her to the nations (v. 13). Israel is to acknowledge that every promise of the Lord has been fulfilled (v. 14). Joshua points out that as the Lord has fulfilled all the promises made in the past, so also will the Lord fulfill every threat, namely, to exterminate Israel from the land if she transgresses the covenant (vv. 15-16).

24:1-28 Renewal of the covenant. In contrast to chapter 23 this chapter is based on a tradition that contains authentic memories of ancient covenant renewal ceremonies. The dating of this covenant ceremony to the end of Joshua's life is provided only by the context—not by the report itself. These verses are closely related to the ceremony on Mount Ebal reported in 8:30-35 and, historically, would fit better into that context than at the end of Joshua's life.

While the text may be rooted in some past ceremony, such as a renewal of the Sinai covenant in which the Shechemites were invited to participate, the present text has been influenced by covenant renewal ceremonies that were celebrated periodically in Israel. These ceremonies in turn had been influenced by the form of the ancient Near Eastern vassal treaties.

Joshua gathers together all the tribes of Israel at Shechem in order to address them (v. 1). Shechem, an ancient cultic center, is near the present town of Nablus, about 30 miles north of Jerusalem. No information is available on how Israel came into control of the central hill country where Shechem is located. It was probably a peaceful occupation. Joshua now addresses the people (vv. 2-15). The major part of the address is a recitation of Israel's history from the time of the patriarchs to the period of the conquest (vv. 2-13). Joshua stresses that it was the Lord who was responsible for all that had taken place.

The river referred to in verses 2 and 3 is the Euphrates, and the mountain region of Seir (v. 4) refers to the area south of the Dead Sea. The land of the Amorites (v. 8) is the region east of the Jordan. On Balaam, see Num 22-24. Verse 14 contains the stipulation of the covenant: total commitment to Yahweh because of all that Yahweh had done for them. Verse 15 contains Joshua's challenge to the people: decide whom you will serve! The response of the people (vv. 16-18) is that they, as Joshua's household, will serve the Lord because of all that the Lord has done for them.

In response to the warning of Joshua about the implications of disloyalty (vv. 19-20), the people reaffirm their commitment (v. 21). Following upon the declaration of witnesses (v. 22), the people solemnly profess their willingness to serve the Lord in response to Joshua's invitation (vv. 23-24). The covenant is then made, a large stone is set up to commemorate the event, and the people are dismissed (vv. 25-28). The function of the stone is not clear. It is possible that the terms of the covenant were written upon it.

In its present context the purpose of this chapter is clear. The author is calling the exiles to total loyalty to the Lord in response to all that the Lord has done for them. As the original Israelites had committed themselves to Yahweh, so now must the Israelites in exile choose whom they will serve. By reporting the renewal of the covenant the editor also makes it clear to the exiles that the covenant can be renewed again if Israel is willing to commit herself completely to Yahweh as her ancestors had done. The threat about the response of the Lord to Israel's infidelity (vv. 19-20) is meant to remind the Israelites once again that the reason they had lost their land was because of their disobedience.

24:29-31 The death of Joshua. After a long life Joshua dies and is buried at Timnath-serah, the Ephraimite town that had been given to him for his services (19:49-50). Verse 31 serves as a transition to the Book of Judges.

24:32-33 Burial traditions. Someone else has added these brief notes about the reburial of the bones of Joseph at Shechem (see Gen 50:25 and 33:19), and the burial of Eleazar, the contemporary of Joshua.

JUDGES

John A. Grindel, C.M.

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Judges tells the story of Israel between the death of Joshua and the rise of Samuel. The core of the book is a collection of stories about several heroes from Israel's past—the judges. Attached to the stories are various traditions concerning the period before the monarchy.

The book is in three sections: a prologue (1:1–2:5); stories of the judges (2:6–16:31); and an appendix dealing with the migration of the tribe of Dan and the civil war against Benjamin (17:1–21:25).

The judges

The book is named for its major protagonists, who are said to have "judged" Israel. The writer distinguishes between the "major" judges and the "minor" judges. The major judges are charismatic military leaders, the subjects of extended narratives. The minor judges are those about whom little information is given beyond their names and the length of their office.

The Hebrew verb that is normally translated as "judge" has two basic meanings: to exercise the function of a judge (in the context of a court or in private judgment) and to rule. None of the judges are ever associated with any function of judgment or arbitration except for Deborah (4:4-5); but this is before she is called by God. Rather, the major judges are shown exercising a specifically military role and sometimes acting as civil rulers. No information is provided on the activity of the minor judges.

Another title that is used for several of the judges is "savior," probably the original title of at least some of the judges. The major judges are presented as charismatics, i.e., people who are raised up by the spirit of the Lord to deliver the people from oppression. Whatever power is given to them is seen as an exceptional measure.

Composition of the book

The book is a series of stories about Israelite heroes who had delivered the people from oppression. The stories originally told of the deliverance of individual tribes and so were limited in their geographical scope. Only later were the heroes made into deliverers of all Israel. These heroic tales from the folklore of the people were meant to entertain and edify, and had been collected together before the Deuteronomistic Historian (D) decided to make use of them. (On the work of the Deuteronomistic Historian, see the introduction to the Book of Joshua, p. 229.)

It was probably D who gave these heroes their pan-Israelite orientation. D also imposed a theological framework on the stories of the major judges. This framework provides an introduction that describes how the people have sinned; how God has allowed them to fall into the hands of their enemies; and how, when the people cried out, the Lord sent a savior to deliver them. Each story ends with a note about how long the land was at peace as a result of the deliverance effected by each savior-judge. D's framework provides the key for interpreting the stories of the judges, i.e., how sin leads to punishment, but repentance leads to deliverance.

The purpose of the Book of Judges

The Book of Judges must be read in the context of the Deuteronomistic History. The author's purpose is to present a basic theology of history: sin leads to punishment, but repentance brings forgiveness and deliverance. This message was meant for the people in exile who had recently lost their land. The author is explaining to them that they had lost the land because of their sinfulness; but if they now repent and turn back to the Lord, the Lord will once again forgive them and deliver them. While a message of hope is present, the book as a whole shows the progressive intensification of the sin of the people. The occasion of this sin is what is presented in the first chapter, namely, that Israel did not drive out of the land the nations with their idolatrous practices. As one goes through the book, the disastrous consequences of this situation become more and more apparent.

Historical accuracy

The basic traditions about the major judges, the material about the conquest in chapter 1, and the reports on the activities of the tribes of Dan and Benjamin in the appendix are quite old. The later Deuteronomistic editors did not significantly rework these stories, but confined themselves to adding comments at the beginning and end of them and inserting connectives between the stories. There is no reason to deny that the stories are based on real events, though each tradition must be studied separately in terms of its historicity. Just because the stories are old does not mean that they can be accepted uncritically as historical.

Later editors modified two aspects of the stories by imposing the "pan-Israel" perspective on them and by adopting an artificial chronology. As we mentioned above, the "pan-Israel" perspective was introduced at a later time on stories that originally spoke of the deliverance of a limited number of tribes. The chronology found in the book is another matter. If one counts up all the years mentioned in the text, then the period of the judges would cover 410 years, obviously much too long, since the evidence available places the period of the judges somewhere between 1200 B.C.E. and 1050 B.C.E., approximately 150 years. A close reading clearly shows that the chronology in the book is stereotyped and artificial. D has imposed the chronology to support the comment in 1 Kgs 6:1 that there were 480 years between the Exodus and the beginning of the construction of the Jerusalem temple. Though the book shows the judges as following one after the other, in reality some of the major judges could have been contemporaries. The sequence chronology is demanded by having each of the judges be a deliverer of all Israel.

COMMENTARY

PART I: THE CONQUEST

Judg 1:1–2:5

This section presents a different view of the conquest of Palestine from the one presented in Josh 1–12. Here there is no acquaintance with the idea of a comprehensive conquest of Palestine by a united army of Israel. Rather, the picture is that of each tribe, alone or with one or two others, struggling to carve out a territory for itself.

The chapter is not a unified literary composition, but has been built up from separate traditions, many of which are quite old, and which come from different sources than the traditions used in Josh 1–12. The material has been arranged to describe the activity of the various tribes on a line from south to north. The Israel presented here is unable to occupy the coastal plains either in the south or in the central part of the country, and is unable to control the plain of Jezreel. As a result, the people are cut off from the great fertile areas of the land. This seems to be more in keeping with the archaeological evidence than the picture presented in Joshua.

However, it is important to see that the editor has not introduced this material either to counter or correct the picture in Joshua, but rather as a report on the activities of the generation after the death of Joshua but during the lifetime of the elders who outlived him. This is clear from the fact that 1:1-3, which come from D, presuppose the singular view of the conquest found in Joshua and the allotment of the land reported in Josh 13–22, and that the material in 2:10 refers to the generation that followed after the elders who survived Joshua. The editor, then, has introduced this prologue to prepare for the negative evaluation of the period that is found in 2:1-5. Chapter 1 is, therefore, intended to provide the basis for the explanation in 2:1-5 of why the Israelites would not be able to clear out the inhabitants of the land from their midst, namely, because they had disobeyed the Lord by making pacts with the inhabitants of the land, and by not pulling down their altars. As a result the Lord will not clear these nations out of Israel's way but will leave them in the land so that they can oppose Israel, and so that their gods will become a snare for Israel (2:3).

As the book opens, the editor seems to presuppose that Israel is still at Gilgal (see 2:1 and Josh 4:19; 10:43; 14:6; and the comments on Josh 18:5). Now that the land has been subdued and apportioned among the tribes (see Joshua), it is necessary for each tribe to lay claim to its territory. They consult the Lord to see who will be the first to attack the Canaanites (1:1). The Lord's response is that Judah shall be first, and Judah invites Simeon to join them (vv. 2-3). This association shows that the tribe of Simeon was absorbed into the tribe of Judah at a very early period, and had no territory of its own (see Josh 19:1-9).

Verses 4-36 present the successes and failures of the various tribes. The fact that Judah is presented first and given such a large amount of space (vv. 4-20) shows that the editor presupposed the preeminence of the tribe of Judah. To a large extent Judah is successful in its encounters with the inhabitants of the land, but not completely (see vv. 18-20). The Perizzites (v. 4) were part of the indigenous population of Palestine (see Josh 17:15 and Gen 34:30). The incident with Adonibezek at Bezek is reminiscent of the story of Adonizedek in Josh 10 and may be related. The location of Bezek is uncertain. Adonibezek's mutilation is intended to humiliate him and render him incapable of war in the future. Verse 8, concerning the capture of Jerusalem, appears to be a later insertion into the text and does not agree with verse 21. The material in verses 10-15 is basically a duplicate of Josh 15:13-19, and is meant to explain why the Othnielites had access to the pools of water that should have belonged to the Calebites in Hebron. The reference to the Kenites in verse 16 explains their presence among the tribes of Judah. Judah is unable to take control of the southern coastal plain because the people there had iron chariots (vv. 18-19). The Benjaminites are mentioned next (v. 21) because of their close association with the tribe of Judah. Jerusalem will not be taken until David personally conquers it.

The editor now presents the attack on the central part of the country by the house of Joseph (vv. 22-29). Note that the house of Joseph is shown capturing Bethel, even though the city has been allotted to Benjamin (Josh 18:22). The story (vv. 22-26) is probably meant to illustrate how Israel made pacts with the inhabitants of the land. Verses 27-29 tell of the tribes being unable to take control of the central coastal plain or the plain of Jezreel. These verses, along with the references to the failures in the north (vv. 30-35), are reported as examples of how Israel sinned by living among the original inhabitants of the land instead of driving them out. Notice that it is not said that they could not drive out the natives but that they did not; rather, they put the natives into forced labor.

In 2:1-5 the editor gives the reason for the survey in chapter 1, namely, to explain why in the stories that follow, Israel will be unable to drive out the native inhabitants of the land: because Yahweh will not be with them, since they have been disobedient (see Josh 23:12-13). These verses, composed by D, are the key to the whole section, and send a clear message to the exiles. D is explaining that they have lost the land because they have been disobedient, and have not lived up to the demands of the reform of Josiah (see 2 Kgs 22:1–23:30). The location of Bochim is unknown. Many surmise that the text here originally read "Bethel" (see 20:18, 26; 21:2). The change to "Bochim" in verse 1 supports the etiology of verse 5, where it is explained that the place came to be called Bochim (weepers) because the people wept there. The angel or "messenger" of the Lord is the envoy of the Lord who can speak in the name of the Lord.

PART II: THE JUDGES

Judg 2:6–16:31

2:6–3:6 Introduction. These verses provide the specific introduction to the stories of the judges. Several hands have shared in the formation of this text, which falls into three sections: the report of the death of Joshua (2:6-9); the specific introduction to the stories of the judges (2:10-23); and a list of the nations that remained in the midst of Israel (3:1-6).

2:6-9 The report of the death of Joshua. These verses parallel Josh 24:28-31, but in a different sequence. The repetition shows that Judg 1:1–2:5 is a later insertion into the text for the reasons already given, and to provide a background for understanding the sinfulness of the people and the Lord's judgment upon them as described in 2:10-23. The report of Joshua's death and burial is repeated here to show that a new era has begun.

2:10-23 The specific introduction to the stories of the judges. This material is not unified. It is highly repetitious with an almost identical content found in verses 11-17; 18-19; 20-23. More than likely verse 10 and verses 20-23 were original, D having inserted verses 11-19 later. Their purpose is to show the tremendous apostasy within Israel during the period of the judges. The gods of the native inhabitants have truly become a snare for Israel (see 2:3). Hence, the need for the "saviors," the judges. The verses make clear that in spite of the deliverance that will be brought by the judges, one should not be misled into thinking that the Israelites truly repented of their sinfulness. Rather, the whole period is described as a time of ever-increasing apostasy (2:19).

The author points out that a new era has begun. There is now a generation that has not experienced the Lord's saving deeds on behalf of Israel nor the law of the covenant (v. 10). Rather they have served the pagan god Baal and the Ashtaroth (plural form for various manifestations of the goddess Astarte), abandoning the God of their ancestors who had led them from Egypt, thus provoking the Lord (vv. 11-12). Baal and Astarte (v. 13) were the embodiment of the idolatrous Canaanite cult. The use of the plural "Baals" and "Ashtaroth" does not indicate many deities bearing these names but rather the various local forms of them.

This abandonment angers the Lord, and so the Lord allows the people to fall into the power of their enemies (vv. 13-15; see Josh 23:11-13). Even when the Lord raises up judges to deliver them, the people do not listen to them or follow their example of obedience, but continue to worship other gods. And when the judge dies the people relapse and do even worse than before (vv. 16-19). Most scholars believe that D introduced verses 11-19 here to serve as an introduction to the stories of the judges, and that the elements of the theological framework for the stories may be found in them, i.e., the sinfulness of the people, the Lord becoming angry with the people and allowing them to fall into the hands of their enemies, the cry of the people, and the Lord's deliverance. Notice, however, that the third element of the framework, the cry of the people, is only mentioned in passing (v. 18). Also notice that the cry of the people is not one of repentance, but only a cry of distress under affliction (but see 10:6-16). The Lord seems moved more by the suffering of the people than by their repentance. What is revealed here is the Lord's love for and dedication to the people.

The people's sinfulness is so great, however, that the Lord must pass judgment on the people; so the Lord swears not to clear away any more of the nations that Joshua left when he died. These nations will test the Israelites and make them prove again their fidelity to the Lord (vv. 20-23).

The message in all of this for the exiles is clear: Israel lost the land because of continuing infidelity to the covenant. However, there is still hope because, as the Lord responded to the cries of distress of the people in the past, so the Lord may do again now. Also, the idea of testing that is emphasized in verse 22 leaves a door open for the exiles—perhaps they can pass the test. The one thing that becomes quite clear from this passage is that God's salvation is a gift; it is not a mechanical response to an action on the part of the people, not even an act of repentance (see 10:10-17).

3:1-6 The nations who remained. These verses give two lists of the nations who remained in the midst of Israel, as well as later reflections on the reason why the Lord left them. The classical listing of the nations who lived in Palestine before the conquest is given in verse 5 (see Josh 3:10). The "five lords of the Philistines" (v. 3) refers to the five cities inhabited by the Philistines (non-Semites who entered Palestine at about the same time as the Israelites) on the southern coastal plain. The added reasons for the Lord leaving the nations in Israel's midst (3:1-2) are intended to be more benevolent than the ones already seen.

3:7-11 Othniel. This report on the first of the judges appears to be constructed by D, and presents an ideal example of D's theology. Because of the generalized nature of the story it is difficult to pin it down to any place or time. Being so short, it helps one to understand clearly the basic elements of D's theology of history.

Israel, forgetting the Lord, serves the Baals and Asherahs (v. 7). This angers the Lord, who delivers the people into the power of Cushan-rishathaim, king of Aram Naharaim. When the people cry out to the Lord, the Lord sends them a savior, Othniel, son of Caleb's younger brother, Kenaz (see Josh 15:17). Here in all their simplicity are seen the introductory formulas of D's framework. The location of Aram Naharaim is unknown. The spirit of the Lord that comes upon the judges in these stories connotes an impersonal power or force that so envelops a person that he or she becomes capable of extraordinary deeds. Verse 11 presents D's normal concluding formula.

3:12-30 Ehud. In the story of Ehud one is able to detect for the first time the existence of an ancient tradition that has been taken up and used by the editor. The story begins with D's framework in which Israel sins, the Lord raises up an oppressor, the people cry out, and the Lord sends a savior (vv. 12-15). The story is filled with humor. The oppressor is "Eglon," which means something like "young bull" or "fat calf" (see v. 17). This king with the ridiculous name is slain by the left-handed Benjaminite (Benjamin literally means "son of the right hand") and the king is so fat that the foot-long dagger gets lost in his belly. The story gloats over how the Israelite hero outsmarts the oppressor and his guards. As a result of the deliverance through Ehud, the land is at rest for eighty years (v. 30).

Moab (v. 12) is situated on the southeastern shore of the Dead Sea. Here the king of Moab is shown in alliance with the people from the north (Amorites) and with southern nomads (Amalekites). The setting for this story, however, is the western shore of the Jordan around Jericho (v. 13), confirmed by the reference to the "cool upper room" (v. 20), appropriate to the desert area around Jericho. The location of Seirah (v. 26) is unknown. Thrown into confusion by the discovery of their dead king, the Moabites attempt to cross the Jordan and return to their home; but the Israelites are ready for them at the fords (vv. 26-29). The story originally dealt only with the tribe of Benjamin in the neighborhood of Jericho (v. 13 "the city of psalms").

3:31 Shamgar. Both the origin and the reason for this reference to Shamgar here in the text is unclear. The reference has no parallel either to the stories of the major judges or to the references to the minor judges. Moreover, it seems to be a late insertion, since 4:1 seems to follow directly on 3:30. The reference to the Philistines as the enemy of Israel is strange here, since they didn't become a problem to Israel until late in the period of the judges. The slaying of the Philistines with an oxgoad recalls the exploits of Samson (15:14-17). Shamgar does not seem to be a Semitic name, and some have surmised that he was really a Canaanite who defeated the Philistines and so delivered Israel.

4:1–5:31 Deborah and Barak. The story of Deborah and Barak is told twice. Chapter 4 is a prose account, while chapter 5 contains a poem celebrating the same victory. Both texts are concerned with a battle between Israel and a strong coalition, perhaps made up of Canaanites and Philistines, near the Wadi Kishon in the valley of Jezreel. Chapter 4 locates this battle on the northern edge of the valley of Jezreel in the neighborhood of Mount Tabor, but chapter 5 locates it more toward the southeastern side of the valley.

4:1-24 The prose narrative. The prose narrative begins with the regular D framework (vv. 1-3). This time the oppressor is the Canaanite king, Jabin, who reigns in Hazor and has a general named Sisera, who lives in Harosheth-ha-goiim. The real actor is Sisera, and the mention of Jabin seems to be secondary, a reference perhaps related to Josh 11:1f. The location of Harosheth-ha-goiim is uncertain, but it would have been in the northern part of Palestine.

Verses 4-10 report the call of Barak through Deborah and his summoning of the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali for battle. Deborah is described as a prophetess and one to whom people came for judgments (vv. 4-5). She is a judge, then, in the forensic sense. Ramah and Bethel are just a few miles north of Jerusalem. The tribal connections of Deborah are not clear. While she may pass judgments in the mountain regions of Ephraim, she is connected here with the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali. Barak is from Kedesh, north of Hazor, in the territory of the tribe of Naphtali. The figure of ten thousand men (v. 10) from only two tribes appears to be an exaggeration.

Verse 11 acts as a footnote to prepare for verse 17, explaining how a group of Kenites, who should be located much farther to the south, were to be found in this region.

The battle proper is described in verses 12-16, but there is little detail in the report. God is shown as being responsible for everything that happens. The Lord alone is deserving of glory.

The killing of Sisera (vv. 17-22) is a flagrant violation of the law of hospitality. It also appears that Hazor and the clan of Heber, the Kenite, had an alliance with one another! For whatever reason Jael, wife of Heber, decides to stand with the Israelites. Verses 23-24 are the normal D conclusion, though a partial one. D postpones a final chronological reference until 5:31 so as to present chapters 4 and 5 as a unit.

5:1-31 The Canticle of Deborah. Considered one of the oldest texts in the Bible, this poem, because of its age and the condition of its text, is notoriously difficult. The meaning of many early Hebrew words is uncertain and some verses are nearly incomprehensible. Moreover, the connections with chapter 4 are not always clear. In its present form the poem is a song praising Yahweh, the God of Sinai and the conquest, for what the Lord accomplished through Deborah and Barak.

Originally, verse 1 may have been directly linked to the prayer in verse 31 before the song was inserted. Verse 2 introduces the subject of the song, namely, the chiefs of Israel and the noble deeds of the people, i.e., what was accomplished by Deborah and Barak. Verse 3 is an invitation to listen to this hymn to the God of Israel. Verses 4-5 recall how Yahweh led Israel into Palestine accompanied by a series of cosmic events. Verses 6-8 describe the situation before Deborah: it was not safe to travel the roads, people were worshiping new gods, and Israel was unarmed before foreign armies. Verses 9-11 extend another invitation to sing about the leaders of Israel and about Yahweh. Verses 12-18 describe the muster of the tribes for the battle that is to come. Verse 12 describes the general call to Deborah and Barak to muster the tribes. The gathering of the tribes is described in verse 13, and verses 14-17 describe those tribes that responded positively to the invitation of the Lord and those that did not. Special praise is given to Zebulun and Naphtali in verse 18. Verses 19-22 describe the battle. Behind verses 20-22 there is the idea of a sudden storm that trapped and bogged down Sisera's chariots so that his army was easily defeated.

The events surrounding Sisera's death are reported in verses 23-30. First, the town of Meroz is cursed because, unlike Jael, it did not offer any aid to Israel, perhaps by ignoring the fleeing Sisera. Verses 24-27 gleefully describe the death of Sisera at the hand of Jael. This account is a bit different from what is reported in 4:21. Here Jael appears to hit Sisera as he was drinking the milk. Verses 28-30 report in a mocking way the concern of Sisera's mother over the delay in his return and the response she receives from her wisest princess. Verse 31 summarizes the poem's theology and presents the concluding part of D's framework.

For the exiles the episode of Deborah and Barak is a strong motivation to hope and trust in the Lord, who can destroy Israel's enemies and grant freedom from oppression if Israel will only cry out to the Lord.

6:1–8:28 Gideon. These chapters reiterate the basic cycle of sin, punishment, repentance, and deliverance. This time it is the Midianites who oppress Israel, and the savior sent by the Lord is Gideon. Gideon destroys the altar of Baal at Ophrah, erects an altar to Yahweh in its place, and receives a new name, Jerubbaal. With a few men he wins a great victory over the Midianites, but will not accept the kingship when it is offered to him. While the narrative appears basically clear and consistent there are many tensions within it. First of all, there is the double name for the hero, Gideon and Jerubbaal. Secondly, chapter 6 is obviously made up of a series of different traditions (vv. 11-24; 25-32; 33-35; 36-40). There is significant tension between 6:33-35, where all the tribes are mustered, and 7:3-6 where almost immediately most are sent back home for purely theological reasons. In 8:1-3 Ephraim is angry with Gideon because he had not called them, but this seems directly opposed to what is said in 7:24f. Finally, Gideon is presented not only as a champion of the people, but also as a man set on vindicating the death of brothers. All this suggests that the chapters are a collection of originally independent traditions that have been edited into a continuous whole, but not skillfully enough to rid the stories of all inconsistencies. Many of the stories originally concerned only the family of Abiezer from the tribe of Manasseh, but they were later made to refer to all Israel.

Most scholars accept the historicity of the oppression of the Israelites by the Midianites, a people from the desert region southeast of Palestine. Gen 25:2ff. points out that Midian was a son of Abraham who was sent eastward so as not to interfere with the inheritance of Isaac. It is not clear here if the chapters describe just isolated raids, the movement of a seminomadic people into cultivated areas at certain times of the year, or a full-scale invasion akin to Israel's own invasion of the land. This issue cannot be solved, but what is clear is that the editor was more interested in presenting a theological message to the exiles than in recounting a political and military event.

These chapters fall into four main sections: the call of Gideon (6:1-40); the defeat of the Midianites (7:1–8:3); the pursuit of the kings of the Midianites (8:4-21); and the offer of kingship (8:22-28).

6:1-40 The call of Gideon. The story of Gideon begins with the standard framework for the stories of the judges. The Midianite oppression is described as being very critical and widespread, extending from central and northern Palestine to the southwest. The Midianites, together with other nomadic peoples, the Amalekites and Kedemites, were rapidly and indiscriminately plundering the countryside. The Israelites were forced into hiding, where they established a series of strongholds and invented a way to signal the approach of the Midianites (vv. 2-5). Reduced to utter misery, the Israelites cry out to the Lord (v. 6). A new element now appears: in response to Israel's cry the Lord sends a prophet to remind the people of all that the Lord had done for them and how the Lord had commanded them not to venerate the pagan gods of the Amorites. But Israel disobeyed the Lord and had indeed worshiped the pagan gods. The point of these verses (vv. 7-10) is the indictment that the Israelites had brought on their own suffering through disobedience, an important message for the audience of the book, the exiles.

The call of Gideon is reported in what appears to be two variant traditions in verses 11-24 and verses 25-32. The first is a cultic legend explaining the origins of the sanctuary at Ophrah, and shows Gideon, a farmer, threshing his wheat in a concealed wine press, in order to hide it from the plunderers. An angel of the Lord appears to Gideon and commissions him to save the people (v. 11). The angel here, as in other places in the Old Testament, represents Yahweh and is interchangeable with Yahweh. Gideon, obviously unaware of the prophet's explanation in verses 7-10, challenges the angel's greeting with a sarcastic remark, claiming that rather than being with him, the Lord has abandoned the people (vv. 12-13). Despite Gideon's sarcasm, the Lord appoints him to save Israel (v. 14) and assures him of success because "I will be with you" (vv. 15-16). This interchange reinforces the idea that God alone is responsible for what is about to happen (see ch. 7). Gideon, still not satisfied, asks for a sign, which the Lord gives (vv. 17-21). The sign here is a cultic one in which the deity consumes the offering in a particular way. Consecrated by the fire from the rock, Gideon builds an altar there and calls it "Yahweh-shalom" (vv. 22-24). "Shalom" is a complex word that expresses ideas of peace, cooperation, and agreement between two parties. The idea that seeing Yahweh can be fatal (v. 22) is found several times (e.g., Exod 19:21; 33:18-23).

The story of the destruction of the altar to Baal and the building of a proper altar to Yahweh (vv. 25-32) is a variation of the previous story. The editor has included it here for two reasons: to show that Gideon cannot hope to defeat the enemies of Israel unless he purges out the worship of the foreign gods; and to explain Gideon's other name, his "baal" name, "Jerubbaal," the explanation of which is connected with the people's reaction to Gideon's tearing down the altar of Baal. They want Gideon's father, Joash, to hand him over so they can kill him (vv. 28-30). Joash's response (v. 31) is that if the people act in Baal's place by taking action against Gideon without Baal's authorization, they, too, will be put to death, and if Baal is really a god, he can take care of himself. Gideon's second name is a pun on the Hebrew word which means to "litigate, take action against, sue." Hence, his name means something like "let Baal sue" or "take action."

Verses 33-40 form the transition into the battle with the Midianites described in chapter 7. The Midianites and their allies come across the Jordan from the desert on one of their raids and take control of the valley of Jezreel (v. 33). Originally the story dealt only with the family of Gideon and the family of Abiezer from the tribe of Manasseh, but at some stage in the editing of the material it has become a story about all Israel. Hence, the references here to the tribes of Asher, Zebulun and Naphtali are secondary. Before going into battle Gideon seeks reassurance of divine approval through an oracle (vv. 36-40). Oracles before battle are commonplace in the Old Testament (see e.g., 4:6-7; Josh 6:2-5; 7:10-15; 8:1-2). The use of the fleece may have been an accepted practice. Gideon asks for a second proof, since the first one may have been inconclusive, i.e., because the fleece could have collected dew even though the ground appeared dry.

7:1–8:3 The defeat of the Midianites. Assured of divine approval for entering into battle, Gideon encamps on a hill above the Midianites' camp. Topographical details in verse 1 are not too clear, but it appears that the opposing forces were encamped toward the southeastern end of the valley of Jezreel. Though the Lord said nothing when Gideon first mustered his troops (6:34-35), the Lord now tells him to reduce the size of his army so that the Israelites will not take credit for the forthcoming victory. The point of 7:1-8 is to show that it is the Lord who is responsible for the victory over the Midianites. The original story described the victory of only three hundred Abiezerites over the Midianites. Later, when the victory was attributed to all Israel, the editors took the opportunity to make the point that God had brought about the victory by having Gideon send all but three hundred warriors home. There are two troop reductions (vv. 3-6). The nature of the test in verses 4-6 is unclear. Why pick the soldiers who lap up the water with their tongues like dogs? It may have been an arbitrary test to provide a means by which God can make a selection. Verse 8 explains how the three hundred get enough jars and horns for use in the battle strategy (see vv. 16-22).

Knowing Gideon's need for continued assurances of success, the Lord now takes the initiative and tells him to sneak down to the Midianite camp with his aide and hear what they are saying (vv. 9-11). What is revealed, in contrast to the weakness and fear of Gideon, is the power of the Lord. What Gideon overhears is one man telling another about his dream (vv. 13-14). The point of the loaf of bread symbolizing Israel is to show how small and inadequate the breadloaf is in relation to what it is capable of doing. Once again the point is made that it is the Lord who will be responsible for the victory.

Verses 16-22 describe the attack against the Midianites. Notice that Gideon and his men are not engaged in any fighting; rather, it is the Lord who sets the Midianites against one another (v. 22). Israel divided the night into three watches of four hours apiece. The attack begins at the beginning of the middle watch, about 10:00 p.m. (v. 19). It is hard to imagine how the Israelite soldiers could simultaneously carry out the actions described in verses 19-20. More than likely several different traditions have been combined here. Frightened by the sudden burst of light all around their camp and the noise created by the breaking jars and the horns and the shouts, the Midianites are thrown into disarray and take off toward the east and the Jordan River.

Gideon once again musters the tribes for battle and sends them down to the river fords to intercept the fleeing Midianites as they try to cross the Jordan. Logistically, Gideon's procedure here does not make much sense. He gathers all the tribes and sends all but three hundred home. Then, almost immediately, he turns around and summons the other tribes back. This would have taken time and is not compatible with the speed needed to reach the river fords that is presumed by the text. This tension in the text is the result of making what was originally the victory of one tribe into a victory of all Israel. The summoning of Ephraim in verse 24 does not fit well with the complaint of Ephraim in 8:1-3. Seemingly, the Ephraimites are complaining about the lateness of their summons to battle. The text presupposes that Ephraim was the most important tribe at the time. With good oriental diplomacy Gideon calms down the Ephraimites by quoting a proverb that says how little the family of Abiezer has been able to achieve when compared with what Ephraim has done (vv. 2-3).

8:4-21 The pursuit of the Midianite kings. The focus in this section shifts from the actions of God to the actions of Gideon. Yahweh does not appear in this chapter except for a reference in Gideon's speech (v. 7 and v. 19). The editor may only have wanted to show what became of Gideon. It is not a complimentary picture.

The section begins with a flashback to the situation at 7:22 with Gideon chasing the fleeing Midianites. Both Succoth and Penuel were cities in the Jordan valley, but east of the Jordan River. The reference to the two Midianite kings in verse 5 is surprising, since there has been no previous mention of them. It appears that 8:4-12 may be a variant on 7:22–8:3. The names of the kings are distorted and mean something like "sacrificial victim" and "protection withheld," obvious references to what is going to happen to them. The occupants of Succoth and Penuel are not too convinced that Gideon is going to be victorious and so are not ready to help him, lest they later suffer reprisals from the Midianites (vv. 6-8).

Gideon captures the two kings as they flee from a surprise attack on their camp (vv. 10-12). The location of Karkor is uncertain, but it may have been the central camp from which the Midianites made their periodic raids on Palestine. There is no real proportion in verses 13-17 between the crime and the punishment. Obviously Gideon is attempting to give a message to other people in the area. The "elders of the city" (v. 16) were the governing body when there was no king.

Verses 18-21 come as a real surprise but they explain why Gideon was chasing the two Midianite kings, namely, blood vengeance. They had killed his blood brothers and so now they must be killed. Nothing is known of the incident at Tabor (v. 18) that gave rise to this vendetta.

8:22-28 Offer of kingship. Originally, Gideon (vv. 22-23) would not have been offered kingship by all of Israel as presented here, but by a more limited group or particular city. As a good follower of Yahweh Gideon refuses the offer and states an orthodox Yahwistic principle: the Lord must rule over you. Though Gideon refuses the title of king, it seems clear from 8:24f. and 9:2f. that he accepts power over the people and demands the trappings of a judge. The ephod made from the booty was a cult object used in obtaining oracles (see Exod 28:15-30). This ephod became an object of idolatrous worship, a practice the editor blames for the eventual downfall of Gideon's family (see ch. 9). Notice how the editor stresses that "all" Israel paid idolatrous homage to the ephod (v. 27). The sinfulness of Israel continues.

8:29–9:57 Abimelech. Though there are some tensions in this material, for the most part the story proceeds with a series of clearly defined scenes. Abimelech, one of Gideon's sons, manages to get himself accepted as king over the city of Shechem by killing all of his brothers except one, Jotham, who invokes a curse upon the city and Abimelech. Tension soon develops between Abimelech and the citizens of Shechem and, as a result of a conspiracy headed by a man named Gaal, military conflict breaks out. Abimelech is victorious, but it is an empty victory. In putting down the revolt he destroys the city, wipes out its citizens, and is killed himself. There is no reason to deny the historicity of the story told here. Shechem was on the southern border of the territory of the tribe of Manasseh in the central highlands and had become part of the Israelite confederacy in the twelfth century. Archaeology confirms a significant destruction of the city toward the end of the twelfth century.

The story of Abimelech does not fit the pattern of the other stories of the major judges. First of all, Abimelech is not portrayed as a hero who saves Israel from oppression. Secondly, the D framework is missing, except for the opening statement on the sin of Israel. This passage (8:33-35), along with the conclusion to the story (9:56-57), provides the key for understanding the story. In 8:33-35 Israel is indicted for sinfulness and for being ungrateful to the family of Jerubbaal (Gideon); and in 9:56-57 is found the explanation of the story: it is to show how God requites the evil of Abimelech and the citizens of Shechem who have turned to idolatry and destroyed Gideon's family. In other words, the story is about Israel's sinfulness and punishment. Because it comes immediately after Gideon's refusal of the crown, the story of Abimelech stands out as the tale of the wicked son who accepted the crown—in fact sought it. The story also has a strong anti-monarchy sentiment. The emphasis on sin and punishment is meant especially for the exiles: the reason for the destruction of Jerusalem and the loss of the land in their own time is their sinfulness, especially their following after strange gods.

The all-Israel emphasis in the story is clearly secondary, i.e., added after the fact. Abimelech never ruled over all Israel, but only over the city-state of Shechem and its territories.

The description of Gideon's sons and the note on Gideon's death in 8:29-32 acts as a transition to the story of Abimelech. A concubine (v. 31) is a legitimate wife, but a wife of second rank. The god Baal of Berith (v. 33) was the patron deity of Shechem. By accepting him the people returned to the pre-Israelite form of governance known at Shechem, the monarchy. Rejection of Yahweh is also rejection of a social-political system.

Because Abimelech did not have any right to rule over Shechem, he had to approach the citizens of Shechem through intermediaries, namely, his mother's kinsfolk in Shechem (9:1-3). The "citizens," the prominent people of Shechem who formed a civic assembly, had the power to appoint a person king. Behind the story lies the fact that even though Gideon did not accept kingship, his sons exercised considerable influence after his death and the citizens of Shechem were unhappy with such a situation. They are willing, therefore, to give Abimelech the money to hire the ruffians he needs to kill his brothers (vv. 4-5). The reference to the "one stone" (v. 5) suggests a public execution of all of them at the same place. The number seventy is a round figure for many. For the sacred oak (terebinth) at Shechem see Gen 12:6; Deut 11:30; Josh 24:26.

Jotham's fable (vv. 7-15) has been made to fit here by the addition of verse 15, and reflects a strong rejection of the institution of the monarchy. While the olive, fig, and vine are typical and prized trees in Palestine, the buckthorn, aside from producing beautiful flowers in the spring, seemed worthless to the ancients and a real nuisance because of its thorns. The point of the fable is that only the worst and least qualified are disposed to accept the crown. Jotham's speech (vv. 16-21) is aimed at the citizens of Shechem who have not acted honorably in making Abimelech king, and he utters a curse against both of them. Verses 17-18 are a later addition to the text to explain the statement in verse 16.

After only three years the citizens of Shechem rebel against Abimelech. The author attributes this to the action of God (v. 23) so as to bring on the succession of events that lead to the destruction of Shechem and the death of Abimelech. The civic assembly could depose the king as well as appoint him. What really brings things to a head is the arrival of Gaal, who instigates a full-scale rebellion against Abimelech (vv. 26-29).

When Abimelech hears of these matters from the ruler of the city, he arrives with his army and defeats Gaal (vv. 30-41). Notice that Abimelech does not live in Shechem but at Arumah, a town nearby. Tabbur-Haares means "navel of the world" and Elon-Meonenim means "diviner's oak." They refer to places near Shechem. Once Gaal is defeated Zebul will not allow him to continue to use Shechem as his base of operations, and Gaal disappears. The next day Abimelech returns and ambushes the people of Shechem as they come out to investigate the damage to their crops. Sowing a site with salt (v. 45) is an ancient rite of cursing. From verses 46-49 we learn that Abimelech has destroyed only the lower part of the city. The upper city stood on an artificial platform of earth that supported the ruler's palace and the temple of Baal Berith (also known as Beth-millo; see verses 6 and 20). The remaining citizens take refuge in the "crypt" of the temple of El-Berith. The true meaning of the Hebrew word translated "crypt" here is unknown. Some would translate it by "citadel." The reference is to some part of the fortified temple that Abimelech sets on fire, killing those who had taken refuge there (vv. 46-49).

Abimelech's end comes when he attacks Thebez, a town northeast of Shechem (vv. 50-55). Seemingly, Thebez had taken part in the revolt. Death at the hand of a woman was considered a disgrace (v. 54). With his death the first attempt at initiating the monarchy in Israel fails.

10:1-5 Tola and Jair. These are the first of the "minor" judges. There is a regular pattern followed in the descriptions of these men: name, origin, length of time in office, death, burial, and family. Since the numbers of years of their time in office are not stereotyped, they are probably original to the tradition. Though now they are said to have judged all Israel, their original sphere of influence was probably limited to a particular area. Also, their terms may have been contemporary with other minor judges or even one of the major judges. Their role is unclear. We have already explained in the introduction to this book that the Hebrew word meaning "to judge" can also mean "to rule." It is possible, then, that they were a type of local administrator. Tola is said to have "saved" Israel, perhaps meaning that after the confusion and unrest of the time of Abimelech, Tola brought some stability through his administration.

10:6–12:7 Jephthah. The story of Jephthah is a composite of various traditions to which some later additions have been made. The story proceeds as follows: a prologue (10:6-16); the recall of Jephthah (10:17–11:11); Jephthah's negotiations with the Ammonites (11:12-28); Jephthah's vow and defeat of the Ammonites (11:29-40); and the defeat of the Ephraimites (12:1-7).

10:6-16 Prologue. These verses introduce the story of Jephthah and contain an expanded version of the D framework. What is interesting here is how this framework has been expanded: first by inserting the list of deities in verse 6; then the list of Israel's opponents, past, present, and future in verses 11 and 12; and the discussion between Yahweh and the people regarding Yahweh's response to their cry in verses 10-16. By recapitulating 2:6–3:6 and referring to the past and future enemies (Philistines) of Israel, this section becomes a theological introduction to the second half of the Book of Judges. The point is that there is nothing automatic about Yahweh's response to Israel's cry (see vv. 11-14). More than words admitting guilt are necessary. What eventually moves the Lord to grieve over the misery of the Israelites (v. 16) is that aside from admitting their guilt they also show themselves ready to accept punishment (v. 15) and, most importantly, to cast out the foreign gods from their midst (v. 16). The author is telling the exiles what is expected of them.

The oppressors this time are the Ammonites, who occupied the territory of the Moabites east of the Jordan River. They especially afflicted the Israelites in Bashan, east of the Jordan near the Sea of Galilee, and in the southern part of Gilead, which belonged to the tribe of Gad. At times they crossed over the Jordan and harried the southern tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim.

10:17–11:1 Recall of Jephthah. It is obvious from 10:17-18 that none of the princes of Gilead wanted to begin the war against the Ammonites. Hence, attention turns to Jephthah, the chieftain of a group of brigands who plundered the area (vv. 1-3). Because of his illegitimate birth he had been driven out from his own land by the same people who now want him back to lead them in battle. Unlike the stories of the other judges, Jephthah's calling to be a judge does not take place in a single moment; rather, it takes place through negotiation. In negotiations with the elders (vv. 4-10) the elders first offer him only the role of commander (v. 6). When Jephthah does not immediately accept, they raise the ante to being "leader of all of us who dwell in Gilead" (v. 8). This seems to imply that the office of judge included administrative as well as military responsibilities. Verse 11 is about a certain form of investiture.

11:12-28 Negotiations with the Ammonites. Before rushing into battle Jephthah attempts to clarify the reasons for the Ammonite hostility and discovers that the Ammonites want back the land that they claim Israel took from them when they came up from Egypt (vv. 11-13). Jephthah then gives historical and theological justification for Israel's occupation of the disputed land east of the Jordan. The material in verses 13-27 is no doubt a later insertion to justify Israel's possession of the land between the Arnon and Jabbok rivers. The historical argument is that the territory in dispute did not belong to either Ammon or Moab but was part of the former kingdom of Sihon, which Israel had conquered under Moses. The theological argument is that territories belong to those who received them from their particular deity and the Israelite God had given them this territory. The historical survey in verses 15-22 is in basic agreement with Num 20-24.

11:29-40 Jephthah's vow and defeat of the Ammonites. The spirit of the Lord now comes upon Jephthah and he inflicts a severe defeat upon the Ammonites. The center of attention in this scene is Jephthah's vow that if the Lord will deliver the Ammonites into his power, he will offer up to the Lord as a holocaust whoever comes out of his house upon his return (vv. 30-31). The one who comes out is his daughter. There are a number of parallels to this event in comparative folklore. The surprising thing is that the author has not censored this report of human sacrifice! Elsewhere in the Old Testament it is condemned (Lev 18:21; 20:2-5; Deut 12:31; 18:10; Mic 6:7). The fact of human sacrifice here is secondary, however, to the theme of the irrevocability of Jephthah's vow. The vow, once it has been made, must be kept. What complicates the situation is that the story is now used as an etiology for a defunct lamentation festival in Israel (vv. 39-40). Some see the story as a myth passed off as history to explain the festival. Perhaps the story is meant to show the lamentable effects of not trusting in the Lord's willingness to save Israel. There is no need for such pagan practices.

12:1-7 Defeat of the Ephraimites. This story, which preserves memories of frontier conflicts between Gilead and Ephraim, is loosely joined to the rest. As in the story of Gideon (8:1ff.) the Ephraimites are upset because they had not been summoned to help in the battle against the Ammonites. Jephthah claims that they had been invited but had not responded (vv. 1-3). In the dialect spoken by the Ephraimites the initial sibilant of "Shibboleth" could not be pronounced correctly, thus giving them away. The meaning of the taunt in verse 4 is not clear.

The conclusion to the story of Jephthah in 12:7 is from the formula used for the minor judges, leading some to see Jephthah as a later development of one who was originally only one of the minor judges. This idea is supported by the fact that the story of Jephthah stands between the two lists of the minor judges (10:1-5 and 12:8-15).

12:8-15 Ibzan, Elon and Abdon. This is the second and final list of the "minor" judges, following the pattern of the first list (10:1-5).

13:1-16:31 Samson. The Samson stories contain the most extensive cycle of traditions in the Book of Judges. Though there is no reason to deny their historicity, it is clear that these traditions have been deeply colored by legendary, cultic, and folklore elements—possibly even by ancient solar myths. Samson's name is related to the Hebrew word for sun, and he comes from an area not far from Beth-shemesh (temple of the sun).

There are some significant differences between the Samson traditions and the other material in the book. The D framework is reduced to a report on the sin of the people and the Lord's deliverance of them into the power of the Philistines. Nothing is said of a cry to the Lord. Also, Samson never commands an army and he does not liberate Israel either from the Philistines or from any other oppressor. His relations with the Philistines appear to be on the level of a private feud. However, the editor sees these exploits as the beginning of Israel's deliverance from the power of the Philistines.

Each of the various traditions had its own prior independent existence. However, the editor has artfully woven them together into a coherent whole. The material falls into four sections: the birth of Samson (ch. 13); the marriage of Samson (ch. 14); Samson's defeat of the Philistines (ch. 15); and the capture and death of Samson (ch. 16).

13:1-25 The birth of Samson. The chapter begins with a short form of the D framework (v. 1). The Philistines had entered Palestine about fifty years after the Israelites as part of the migration of the sea peoples from the Aegean and Crete. Repulsed by the Egyptians around 1200 B.C.E., they had settled on the southern coast of Palestine.

Verses 2-5 report the angel's announcement of the forthcoming birth of Samson to his unnamed mother. His father is from Zorah, a town in the territory originally allotted to the tribe of Dan and the point of departure for the migration of the Danites to the extreme northern part of Palestine (ch. 18). Barrenness is a common theme in the Old Testament (see Gen 11:30 and 1 Sam 1:2f.) and is used as an occasion for a miraculous divine intervention whereby a child is born to undertake a unique mission. In verses 4 and 5 the nazirite rule (Num 6:1-8) is adapted for the consecration of a person in the womb. Normally nazirites were adults who voluntarily consecrated themselves to the Lord for life or for a particular period. Samson is consecrated from his conception, so the rites before his birth apply also to his mother. The regulations that Samson will live under are: abstaining from wine and strong drink, not shaving his head, and avoiding all contact with the dead. Verse 7 adds that he will be a nazirite until his death.

Because the following chapters do not refer to the nazirite vow that Samson is under, it is possible that this chapter was composed as the introduction to the cycle later on in order to make the story of Samson a narrative of the violation of the nazirite vow. It is this sinful person whom the Lord uses to begin the deliverance of the people from the power of the Philistines (v. 5).

In verses 6-23 Samson's father, Manoah, shows typical Semitic caution about the testimony of a woman and so needs to hear for himself what he and his wife must do for the boy who will be born (vv. 8-14). Manoah, in his conversation with the angel, is looking for a sign, which he receives in the consumption of the holocaust by fire and the ascent of the angel in the flame (v. 19). Only then is he convinced that the messenger is from God. When Manoah asks his name, the angel does not reveal it, saying that it is "mysterious," i.e., incomprehensible, like the works of God (see vv. 18 and 19).

14:1-20 The marriage of Samson. Samson's first exploits take place in the context of his marriage. At Timnah, a Philistine town a few miles from Zorah, Samson falls in love with a Philistine woman and asks his parents to obtain her for his bride (vv. 1-3). Normally, marriage negotiations were carried out by the bridegroom's father. Samson's parents are displeased because she is not an Israelite; a foreign wife was considered dangerous to security. "Uncircumcised" (v. 3) is used only of the Philistines in the Old Testament, pointing to the fact that they were the only ones in the region who did not practice the rite of circumcision. Perhaps the editor did not approve of this marriage either, but in verse 4 he provides the interpretative key for the rest of the chapter: what is about to take place is part of God's plan. Though not explicit, it appears that the editor sees the events here, especially those in verses 19-20, as the way the Lord begins the deliverance of Israel from the Philistines (13:5).

The whole process of Samson's coming and going to Timnah (vv. 5-9, 10) is obscure, and the references to his parents in verses 5 and 10 are awkward. These references might be later additions to show that Samson's parents went along with him and set up the marriage in spite of their opposition. The important issue, however, is the killing of the lion and later finding the honey in its carcass. It is the spirit of the Lord that gives Samson the strength to deal so easily with the lion (v. 6). Notice that Samson breaks the nazirite vow by eating the honey, which is impure because it has been taken from a corpse.

Samson's riddle (vv. 10-18) is impossible to solve unless one knows about the private actions of the hero. The Philistines are able to answer it only by threatening his new wife (v. 15). This treachery causes Samson to perform one of his feats against the Philistines (v. 19). Ashkelon was a Philistine stronghold on the coast, southwest of Timnah.

15:1-20 Defeat of the Philistines. After his anger subsides Samson goes to visit his wife, taking along the gift of a kid (v. 1). However, he is refused entrance to visit her because her father has already given her to Samson's best man, having interpreted Samson's abrupt withdrawal (14:19) as a repudiation and divorce of her. The father proposes an alternative, but Samson departs in anger (v. 3).

The incident with the foxes is difficult to visualize (vv. 4-5). It is obviously intended to be some sort of guerilla tactic. In all of this Samson seems to be overreacting, since he had been offended by only one family.

The Philistines retaliate swiftly against Samson's wife and her family, and Samson takes revenge against the Philistines (vv. 6-8). Having escaped to Etam in the territory of the tribe of Judah, the Philistines pressure Judah to turn Samson over to them (vv. 9-10). The sites of both Etam and Lehi are unknown. Lehi means "jawbone," its presence here preparing us for the wordplay in verse 17. Men of Judah now go down to capture Samson and, to their surprise, find him ready to surrender (vv. 11-13). That they did not expect such an easy time is reflected in the large number who set out for him (v. 11). When Samson sees the Philistines the spirit of the Lord comes upon him, moving him once again to extraordinary action (vv. 14-16), another deed by which the Lord begins to deliver Israel from the Philistines (see 13:5).

Notice that Samson again violates the law of the nazirite by touching an animal carcass. Verse 17 tells us that the name of the site "Ramath-lehi" (throwing of the jawbone) is explained by Samson's action of discarding the weapon. Verses 18-19 present the etiology of a spring at Lehi called "Enhakkore," that is, "spring of one who called."

The notice about Samson's judgeship in verse 20 probably indicates a conclusion to an early edition of the Samson stories and that chapter 16 was added later (see 16:31).

16:1-31 The capture and death of Samson. This chapter has three separate episodes: Samson and the harlot (vv. 1-3); Samson and Delilah (vv. 4-22); and the death of Samson (vv. 23-31). While the last two episodes are clearly related, the first one appears to be independent. However, because of its emphasis on Samson's strength, it is a good preparation for the question in verse 5.

The episode with the harlot (vv. 1-3) takes place at Gaza, one of the Philistine cities on the southern coast of Palestine. The city gates at that time had a tunnel-like opening that was flanked by guardrooms. Samson was able to escape the ambush at the gate by leaving at an unexpected time when the men were waiting in the guardrooms, since they did not expect Samson to leave until the morning. The distance from Gaza to Hebron is about 38 miles and uphill.

Samson now falls in love with Delilah. This episode (vv. 4-22) is a series of stereotyped scenes in which Samson is shown as so infatuated with Delilah that his behavior is ridiculous and abnormal. A strong element of magic runs through the episode. First of all, the Philistines appear to believe that some magical or supernatural force gives Samson his strength (v. 5). Samson's first three explanations of his strength are also based on magical ideas (vv. 6-14). Bowstrings (v. 7) were made from the tendons of slaughtered animals; hence, once again Samson disregards the nazirite rule by coming into contact with part of a corpse. Finally, the fourth time that Samson gives the explanation for his strength he tells the truth (vv. 15-17). This is the first time that Samson's strength is presented as something permanent and residing in his unshorn hair. In the other stories his strength is given only on specific occasions as a gift of the spirit of the Lord (14:6, 19; 15:14). The story in 16:1-3, however, presumes some kind of permanent strength, as does 15:8. The ominous note in verse 22 prepares for verses 28-30, where Samson's strength is again the result of a gift of the Lord. One can see the tension between the older stories about Samson's extraordinary strength and the later editor's theological explanation of his strength as a gift of the Lord for the deliverance of Israel. Samson is unable to escape after his hair has been cut off (v. 20) because the Lord has left him. The final breaking of the nazirite rule—once too often—occurs with the shaving of Samson's head.

Perhaps the reason that the death episode

(vv. 23-31) was added was to show that though Samson had squandered away his strength out of his own self-interest, in the end he turned to the Lord (v. 28) and died honorably by bringing about God's justice on the Philistines. Dagon (v. 23) was an ancient agricultural deity of the West Semitic world. In the Bible he appears exclusively as a Philistine deity. Dagon means "grain." The number three thousand in verse 27 seems an exaggeration, and was probably the editor's intention in view of the statement in verse 30.

The chapter concludes (v. 31) by repeating the length of time that Samson judged Israel (see 15:20). No reference is made to any peace in the land, since the editor realized that Samson's exploits were only the beginning of the deliverance from the Philistines.

PART III: APPENDIX

Judg 17:1–21:25

The appendix to the Book of Judges contains two episodes that have been placed here because they deal with the period before the monarchy: the migration of Dan to the north (17:1–18:31); and the civil war against Benjamin (19:1–21:25).

The statement, "In those days there was no king in Israel; everyone did what he thought best," appears at the beginning (17:6) and at the end of the appendix (21:25). In both 18:1 and 19:1 there is the reminder that "at that time there was no king in Israel." These are really pro-monarchy statements that the editor has inserted because he did not see the events narrated in these chapters as commendable. They could only have happened because there was no king in the land. The editor saw the monarchy as a necessary stabilizing factor in Israel.

17:1–18:31 The migration of Dan. The purpose of these two chapters is not merely to report on the history of the tribe of Dan, but to give information about the origins and nature of the sanctuary of Dan. This sanctuary had become important in 922 B.C.E., when the northern tribes had broken off from the southern tribes and formed the kingdom of Israel. As a result of this break, the sanctuary at Dan had become the national sanctuary of the northern kingdom along with the sanctuary at Bethel. The priests in Jerusalem frowned upon the Yahweh cult at the sanctuary of Dan. These two chapters argue against this sanctuary by pointing out that its cult there represented a merger of disparate worshipers, and that the silver used for making the sacred object kept there derived from stolen money. The priesthood there, although having a noble lineage, is also shown as having been compromised.

Chapter 17 is a background for the events in chapter 18. Note that the carved idol (vv. 3-4) is an idol of Yahweh, something that is strictly forbidden by the Mosaic law (see Exod 20:4-6). Micah also makes an ephod (see 8:24-27) and household idols, i.e., items used for divining (v. 5). In the beginning he makes one of his sons the priest, i.e., one who took care of the sanctuary and gave oracles.

A young Levite from Bethlehem comes looking for a better situation, and Micah convinces him to be his priest (vv. 7-13). Micah's concern to have a Levite priest suggests that Levites were already known for being more skilled in cultic matters. The title "father" (v. 10) emphasizes the priest's role as cultic diviner and oracle giver.

Chapter 18 begins by stating that the Danites were searching for an area in which to live, since they had received no heritage among the tribes of Israel (v. 1). This statement is difficult to accept in light of Josh 19:40-48. They had been allotted territory to the west of Benjamin and south of Ephraim and north of Judah. However, they were so restricted by the Amorites and Philistines (see 1:34) that they could not control their territory, so they sent out scouts to look for a better district. Zorah and Eshtaol (v. 2) are cities from the old Danite territory that were encountered in the Samson stories. The scouts probably recognized the Levite by his accent as coming from the south (v. 3). One of the primary roles of the priest was to consult God on behalf of the people (v. 5). The priest's favorable response will be used later to justify the conquest of Laish and the slaughter of its inhabitants (v. 10).

Laish (v. 7) was a city at the northern extremity of the land, near the sources of the Jordan River. The place is rich in resources, and the people, quiet and trusting, live in an unwalled city. The statement that the people lived "after the manner of the Sidonians" seems to indicate that the city followed Phoenician customs. The scouts justify their recommendation to attack the city by saying that God has given it into their power (vv. 8-10 and see v. 6). "Mahaneh-dan" (v. 12) means "camp of Dan."

The Danites put their little ones, their livestock, and their goods at the head of the column (v. 21) because they expect to be attacked from the rear as soon as Micah discovers that they have stolen his idols and priest. Micah does chase after them but, when he discovers how strong a force they are, he returns home (vv. 22-26).

The slaughter of the people of Laish (v. 27) is unjustifiable. What sin has led to! The Danites rebuild the city, name it after their ancestor, and set up the carved idol that was Micah's (vv. 28-30). In verse 30 the Levite suddenly has a name, Jonathan, son of Gershom, son of Moses. The "time of the captivity of the land" (v. 30) refers to the year 734 B.C.E., when northern Palestine came under the Assyrians and the temple at Dan was destroyed. Verse 31 mentions that the Danites had preserved their sanctuary at Dan during the same time that the real house of God was at Shiloh (v. 31).

19:1–21:25 Civil war against Benjamin. These three chapters are made up of a number of originally independent narratives that have been skillfully combined into a continuous story. They present another example of how things could go wrong because "in those days there was no king in Israel; everyone did what he thought best" (21:25). A hideous crime is committed, and Israel so overreacts to it that they bring on a full-scale civil war.

These chapters fall into three scenes: the episode with the Levite and his concubine (19:1-30); the assembly of Israel and the resultant war against Benjamin (20:1-48); and the getting of wives for the surviving Benjaminites (21:1-25).

19:1-30 The Levite and his concubine. The story of the Levite who goes to Bethlehem to retrieve his wife, and who then suffers a gross indignity on his return, is told to explain why war breaks out between Benjamin and the other tribes of Israel. The story is full of dramatic irony: the father-in-law's hospitality so delays the Levite's return that he cannot make the trip back home in one day; had he stopped in Jebus, the Canaanite city, he would have avoided the outrage; he is offered hospitality in Gibeah, not by a Benjaminite but by another sojourner.

That the man is a Levite is not important for the purpose of the story. Though the editor identifies "Jebus" as "Jerusalem" (v. 10), Jerusalem, in fact, never bore that name. Perhaps Jebus was a suburb of Jerusalem. At this time Jerusalem was still a Canaanite city. Gibeah was about three miles north of Jerusalem, and Ramah was about two miles further north.

Entering Gibeah, the Levite receives no offers of hospitality from the Benjaminites there, but is taken in by another stranger, an old man who, like the Levite, also came from the mountain region of Ephraim. The old man shows the Levite the same hospitality that his father-in-law had shown him in Bethlehem. The verb "abuse" in verse 22 is an attempt to translate the Hebrew verb that means "to know," a verb used euphemistically in the Old Testament to denote sexual intercourse. It is used here in a deliberately ambiguous way.

The gruesome act of cutting up the dead woman and sending pieces of her to all the tribes serves the purpose of arousing the tribes against Gibeah for the outrage they have committed (see 1 Sam 11:7). The implication is that the tribes must help the Levite take revenge on Gibeah or suffer a like fate.

20:1-48 War against Benjamin. In response to the call of the Levite the Israelites gather at Mizpah, about eight miles north of Jerusalem (vv. 1-2). "Dan to Beer-sheba" is a phrase that represents the northern and southern boundaries of ancient Israel. The Israelites on the eastern side of the Jordan River (land of Gilead) also come to the assembly. The size of the armies (vv. 8-10) is exaggerated. Perhaps the Hebrew word for "thousand" refers to a particular military grouping or contingent, as we saw in the Book of Joshua.

In verse 16 the narrator seems to suggest that one reason why the Benjaminites will endure and be able to inflict great losses on the Israelites is because of the seven hundred sharpshooters. The Israelites go over to Bethel, a few miles away, to consult the Lord on who should attack first. The lot falls to Judah (vv. 17-19).

The first two attacks against Gibeah are repulsed, and the Israelites suffer some significant losses (vv. 20-25). After the second loss the Israelites consult the Lord, they fast, and offer holocausts and peace offerings (vv. 26-27). This time they are told that they will be successful because the Lord will deliver the Benjaminites into their power (v. 28).

Verses 29-43 are two accounts, clumsily combined, of the same event. The account in verses 29-36 describes more the field tactics of the troops, while the account in verses 37-43 describes the victory from the perspective of the successful ambush. Both have a resemblance to the capture of Ai in Josh 8. Notice that in verse 35 it is the Lord who defeats Benjamin. Verses 44-48 give the statistics on the fallen. In the end there remain only six hundred, who escape to the rock Rimmon (v. 47). The location of Rimmon is unknown. Though the tradition of war against Benjamin may be early, the story as we have it here has been revised to make it fit. The original tradition probably dealt with a war between Benjamin and its northern neighbor, Ephraim. It is unlikely that such a near obliteration of a tribe ever occurred.

21:1-25 Wives for the Benjaminites. Having almost wiped out an entire tribe, the Israelites realize that if that tribe is going to survive they must obtain wives for the six hundred male survivors. This chapter presents two accounts of how they obtained wives. The separate accounts have been harmonized by the explanation that each stratagem provided only a partial solution to the problem (v. 14).

The first account (vv. 1-14) states the underlying problem, namely, that at Mizpah the men of Israel had sworn that none of them would give their daughters in marriage to anyone from Benjamin (v. 1). The solution that they eventually hit upon was to see if anyone had not come up for the assembly, since a solemn oath had been taken that anyone who did not come up would be put to death (vv. 2-5). Jabesh-gilead was east of the Jordan.

The second stratagem has parallels in Roman and Greek folklore (vv. 15-23). The elders remember the yearly feast at Shiloh when the girls of Shiloh came out to dance. Each Benjaminite is told to seize one of them for a wife. The elders promise to intercede for the Benjaminites when the fathers or brothers of the girls complain. Because they have been stolen from them, not given to the Benjaminites, the men of Shiloh will not be guilty of breaking their vow not to give their daughters in marriage to a Benjaminite (v. 22). The great assembly, called in 20:1, is now dispersed and the Israelites return to their own heritage (v. 24).

The narrator concludes by saying again that all these sad goings-on took place because "in those days there was no king in Israel; everyone did what he thought best" (v. 25). Israel's history of sin has begun. Eventually that sinfulness will lead to the destruction of the northern kingdom of Israel in the eighth century and the destruction of the southern kingdom of Judah in the sixth century. However, the book has pointed out more than once not only the saving power of the Lord, but also the Lord's will to save the Israelites when they cry out to the Lord.

1 AND 2 SAMUEL

Paula J. Bowes

INTRODUCTION

1 and 2 Samuel were originally one book, as were 1 and 2 Kings and 1 and 2 Chronicles. These were divided into two in the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible known as the Septuagint, from which early translations into Latin and English were made. The Books of Samuel are the centerpiece of a larger collection of narratives which span Israel's history from their entrance into Canaan in about the twelfth century B.C.E. to the Babylonian Captivity (587–586 B.C.E.). This Deuteronomistic History, so called because the writers based their theology on the teachings of the Book of Deuteronomy, was compiled about the seventh century B.C.E. Its basic message was that God has chosen Israel as a special people and has through Moses redeemed them from slavery in Egypt and made with them a covenant on Mount Sinai. God's word which came to Israel through Moses continues to guide and correct the people as well as their kings through the prophets. If they are faithful to the covenantal laws, they will have prosperity and peace; if they disobey, they can expect punishment through natural disasters, invasion, and even exile. They should therefore, out of loyalty and gratitude, keep the commandments of the Lord who has shown them so much favor and grace. The Books of Samuel, then, are not history in the modern sense but theological history—narrative accounts of God's dealings with the chosen people.

The protagonists

Personalities are important in these books, especially three: Samuel, the prophet of their title; and the first two kings of Israel, Saul and David, whom Samuel anointed as king. The account of the miraculous birth of Samuel, so like other portentous births in the history of Israel, sets the tone for the whole. God has intervened to bring another savior in answer to Israel's need for the Word of God. Like most of Scripture, the Books of Samuel tell of God's care and correction of this special people, and of God's justice and mercy toward them.

Disasters and deliverance

It is noteworthy that the deliverance which comes to Israel at the beginning of Samuel's prophetic mission is accompanied by the ruin of the priestly house of Eli and the loss of Israel's most precious possession, the ark of the covenant, the sign of God's dwelling among them (1 Sam 2–4). Out of this national disaster, it is God who is portrayed as causing the Philistines to return the ark (1 Sam 6). Samuel's covenant with the Lord at Mizpah (ch. 7) would seem to bring satisfaction to the people, but they still fear the Philistines enough to ask for a human king like other nations. In Num 11, God answered the people's demand for meat with quail until they were sick of it. Here God gives them what they want despite the disadvantages of a human king and their rejection of the divine. Over Samuel's objections, God commands the prophet to anoint Saul, with the implicit expectation that the king will always be under prophetic direction and required to obey the Mosaic law.

Israel gets a king

The first king, Saul, although gifted and acceptable to the Israelites, proves to be unacceptable to the Lord, who then determines to try again with a man after God's own heart, David (1 Sam 13:13-14). There now ensues the puzzling situation (for us) of two anointed kings, one of whom is in hot pursuit of the other lest his throne be taken from him. Throughout Saul's persecution of David, the fugitive receives help from various quarters, even from Saul's own children, Jonathan and Michal.

A few years later Saul's career comes to its end in a disastrous battle with the Philistines (1 Sam 31). David is eventually made king, first by the Judahites (2 Sam 2:11) and then, at the death of Saul's last eligible heir, by the Israelites (2 Sam 5). This separate anointing by the two major factions in Israel shows the religious and political division that was to last as long as the monarchy, that is, until 586 B.C.E., when Jerusalem was sacked by the Babylonians.

David's rise

The period from Samuel's first anointing of David (1 Sam 16) until his actual enthronement over both houses of Israel (2 Sam 5) is usually designated as the account of David's rise. Just as Samuel's rise at the beginning of the First Book of Samuel was concomitant with the downfall of the Elides, so David's rise is concurrent with Saul's demise. The Second Book of Samuel contains the accounts of David's accession (ch. 5), his bringing the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem (ch. 6), the promise of a lasting succession (ch. 7), and the engrossing story of David's life as king (chs. 9–20).

The peaceful kingdom and the troubled family

Much like Adam's peaceful life in the Garden of Eden (Gen 2), David finds himself with his enemies subdued on all sides (2 Sam 7:1) and a prosperous and enlarged kingdom (2 Sam 8). As did Adam, David disobeys God's word, bringing unexpected sorrows. True to Nathan's prophecy in 2 Sam 12, a sword will always trouble David's house, for four of his sons will die untimely and violent deaths. These trials chapters 9 to 20 recount for us in dramatic realism. The use of dialogue to portray character and move the action forward provides some of the most fascinating reading in the whole Bible.

Although the unknown author uses techniques of the novel in his writing, these accounts are not products of his imagination. They show, by vivid stories, that God works with human freedom, caring for the people with a love that continually forgives and saves.

OUTLINE OF THE BOOKS OF SAMUEL

1 Sam 1–3	Part I: Samuel and the House of Eli
1 Sam 4–7	Part II: The Ark of the Covenant
1 Sam 8–15	Part III: Saul, the First King
1 Sam 16–31	Part IV: Saul and David
2 Sam 1–8	Part V: The Struggle for the Kingdom
2 Sam 9–20	Part VI: David the King
2 Sam 21–24	Part VII: Appendices

COMMENTARY: 1 SAMUEL

I. SAMUEL AND THE HOUSE OF ELI

1 Sam 1–3

The First Book of Samuel opens with a double need: the longing of Hannah for a son and the counterpart, Israel's spiritual need for the word of God. This word of the Lord, so necessary for Israel's life, is, according to the Deuteronomistic tradition, Israel's greatest blessing, just as the greatest blessing of a woman in Israel is a child. Israel's need is not disclosed until readers have first savored Hannah's suffering. Understanding this will prepare them to appreciate the magnanimity of the Lord in supplying both needs.

1:1-8 Hannah asks for a son. As is true for other birth announcements in the Bible, this one begins with a short genealogy of Hannah's husband Elkanah (compare Manoah's in Judg 13 and Joseph's in Matt 1). None of these is the protagonist; instead their wives carry the action. Here the barren, despised (by all but Elkanah) wife Hannah is set over against her fertile and scornful rival Peninnah. Just so did Hagar gloat over Sarah (Gen 16:4) and Leah struggle with Rachel (Gen 30).

Another characteristic of biblical birth narratives is the portrayal of the particular child's parents as devout and observant of the commandments of the Lord (1 Sam 1:3; Luke 1:5-6). Elkanah's and Hannah's yearly pilgrimages and sacrifice show them to be worthy parents of a specially favored son, Samuel.

Mentioned also in verse 3 are Eli and his sons Hophni and Phinehas, all priests at the shrine in Shiloh, the center for Yahweh worship before the city was taken by the Philistines (see ch. 4). Although Eli's sons do not yet figure in the story, their presence early in the narrative suggests a connection between Hannah and the larger problems of Israel.

While she bears her reproach, not even Elkanah's patient, loving attempts to comfort Hannah can stop her from weeping and being unable to eat. From these depths, the action can only rise, in hope of change and relief.

1:9-19a Hannah prays for the Lord's gift. The biblical author has described what happens in this family year after year. Now he narrows to a particular day in Shiloh. Eli, from his seat by the door of the temple, observes the distraught Hannah at prayer. She bargains: if she is given a son, she will consecrate him to the Lord as a nazirite. Such a vow entailed abstinence from wine, strong drink, the cutting of the hair and contact with a dead body (see Num 6; Amos 2:11-12). Samson (Judg 13–16) was under this vow, but in his case the angel announcing his birth, not his mother, required it. Hannah offers this condition of her own accord, showing considerable renunciation, since the child would be with her only three years.

It is ironic that abstinence from drink is what Hannah offers, while it is drunkenness that Eli suspects from her movements. Once Hannah is able to satisfy Eli that such is not the case, Eli endorses her request. Since he has not heard any words, he does not know that, in effect, he asks for the one who will replace him in the priesthood. After the prayers of Eli and Hannah, there is a noticeable change in the latter. Now she no longer weeps but can eat and drink (v. 18)!

1:19b-28 Samuel is born. When Hannah bears her son, she names him Samuel, explaining that she had asked him of the Lord. The name Samuel however means "he who is from God" and not "asked." The name Saul would be closer to that. This kind of ambivalence is not unusual for biblical names.

Elkanah is characteristically kind in excusing Hannah from the next three pilgrimages until Samuel is weaned. The parents' concern for the worship of the Lord is underlined by its prominence in the story and in the generous details of offerings and customs at that time (eleventh century B.C.E.).

When she at last brings Samuel to the temple, it is natural for Hannah to let Eli know that her prayer has been answered, since he had supported it (see Judg 13 and Matt 1). The key words: "ask," "give," and "pray," repeated in 1 Sam 1:17-28; 2:1, give evidence of divine answer to persistent prayer. Hannah little suspects that the boy Samuel will supply not only her need to be a mother but also Israel's need for a prophet to bring the people the word of the Lord.

2:1-10 Hannah's song. The canticle the biblical author has put into Hannah's mouth finds a counterpart in the New Testament in Mary's Magnificat (Luke 1:46-55). Both hymns express joy at the birth of a special child; both praise God's power, holiness, and salvation. In both the proud rich are cast down and the humble poor are raised up. Hannah's poem reminds of God's justice; Mary's of God's mercy. The Magnificat only hints at enemies, but Hannah's song begins and ends with their discomfiture and derision (vv. 1,10).

In this poem the Lord is seen as holy, omnipotent, omniscient, and in control of all the life events of all creatures. There are strong contrasts between the hungry and the well-fed, the barren and the fertile, the faithful and the wicked. The theme of the Lord's protection of the people, including the foreshadowed king and anointed one of verse 10, pervades the section.

2:11-21 The sins of Eli's sons and the blessings of Samuel. In these verses the approved service of Samuel, even from childhood, is contrasted with the profligacy of Eli's sons. They are characterized as worthless fellows (literally "sons of Belial"), the same designation Hannah hoped Eli would not level against her in 1:16. The summary indictment against Hophni and Phinehas is that they did not know the Lord, a knowledge which meant experience of and obedience to God.

Normally, Israelite priests were allotted portions of the sacrificial animal, in particular the breast and right leg (Lev 7:29-36). But Eli's sons demanded their share before the ritual burning of the fat had taken place, and even before the meat had been cooked—hardly the dignified control one would expect of priests.

The story of their cultic irreverence is immediately followed by the idyllic picture of the boy Samuel wearing the ephod, a foreshadowing of his future role. Eli's grateful blessing to Samuel's parents results in the birth of five more children, God's most welcome gift to the Israelite (see Gen 18:13-14; 21:5-8; Ruth 4:11-15).

2:22-26 Eli rebukes his sons. In remonstrating with his sons, Eli asks the question David will fail to ask his son Adonijah when the latter declares himself king in his father's lifetime: "Why have you done these things?" (1 Kgs 1:6). Intercession can be made for their fornications, but their sins against the Lord, those connected with the sacred sacrifice, have no mediator. Eli warns to no avail, but Hophni and Phinehas cannot cry ignorance. Because they refused to obey their father, the author lets us know they deserved their punishment, since the Lord had decided on their death. Verse 26 underlines again the contrast between Eli's unfaithful sons and Samuel, who as he grows earns the approval of both the people and the Lord (see Luke 2:52).

2:27-36 The prophecy against Eli's house. The accusation by the man of God begins in the traditional prophetic pattern of recalling the Lord's former benefits to the accused, listing their duties, their transgression, and finally their punishment. Eli is implicated along with his sons in verse 29 for enjoying the spoils which they had seized. The heart of the matter is that he had preferred his sons to the Lord. Therefore, their office as priests is for the most part cancelled, and those who do minister will have a miserable existence, begging for some employment which will bring them a stipend.

Nathan's encounter with David (2 Sam 12) after his adultery with Bathsheba and the murder of Uriah, has several parallels here. For both Eli and David, the punishment will be worked out within their families. Like Hophni and Phinehas, David's son by Bathsheba will die (2 Sam 12:19; 1 Sam 2:34), but, unlike Eli, David is forgiven and allowed to continue as king (2 Sam 12:13). The key to the different treatments of Eli and David may lie in 2:25, which states that sins against the Lord have no intercessor. While David's sin was against Uriah, Eli's sons have sinned directly against the Lord by profaning divine worship. Therefore David's kingship remains, but the priesthood of the Elides is replaced. The new priest, who will do what is in God's heart and mind, will have a sure house and will minister before the Lord's anointed (1 Sam 2:35). The prophecy is fluid enough to include as the faithful priest (the same adjective in Hebrew as that for "sure" house) Samuel, the anointed king Saul, Zadok, David or even the Messiah, whose name means "the anointed one."

3:1-18 Samuel's call. The prophecy which removed Eli and his house from the priesthood is not immediately implemented. Samuel was in training and not yet aware of his future role. Although at this time direct word from the Lord was rare, Israel longed for her God as much as Hannah longed for a son. The Lord now moves to remedy this just as Hannah's barrenness was reversed, both through the instrumentality of Samuel.

The picture of Eli asleep and practically blind describes Israel's state in relation to the Lord. The lamp of God, that is, God's word, is almost extinguished through the unworthiness of the officiating priests. The Lord ignores Eli and calls directly to the boy Samuel to receive this divine word. There is humor in Samuel's naive running to Eli three times before the old priest realizes that it is the Lord calling. The fourth call brings Samuel's willing response, "Here I am," the same made by Abraham when the Lord called him to sacrifice Isaac (Gen 22:1-2). Samuel's readiness contrasts with the priests' unwillingness to hear (1 Sam 2:25). Samuel is the faithful, chosen priest who will soon replace the unfaithful and rejected house of Eli. Later a similar drama will be played out between the rejected first king of Israel, Saul, and the chosen king David.

The chapter begins with the notice that visions from the Lord were few and ends with Samuel receiving frequent revelations at Shiloh. In between, Eli and Samuel speak to each other twice (vv. 4-9, 16-18). The center of the chapter is given to the Lord's words to Samuel alone (vv. 10-14). The Lord says nothing about Samuel's future but concentrates on the condemnation of Eli's house, adding that there is no chance for expiation. Eli's resignation under this sentence is an exemplary acknowledgment of the divine sovereignty and justice.

When Samuel opens the doors of the temple in the morning light, he enacts the bursting forth of the word of the Lord to the people after a long silence. For Israel as for Samuel, it is to be a new day.

II. THE ARK OF THE COVENANT

1 Sam 4–7

Ever since their journeyings in the desert of Sinai, the Israelites were accompanied by the ark of the covenant, the tangible symbol of the Lord's presence dwelling among them (Exod 37:1-9). This was a gold-plated wooden box said to contain the tablets of the law given to Moses on Mount Sinai (Exod 19–20). The traditions of chapters 4–7 bridge the gap between the ministry of the Elides and the formal inauguration of Samuel as prophet. During this time leadership of Israel is centered in the ark, for despite the silence of the word, the Lord remained with Israel. Even when captured the ark works against the enemy for the good of Israel. This section of the narrative shows the Israelites, greatly disadvantaged before their Philistine enemy and attempting to use the presence of the Lord to bring them victory.

4:1-11 Israel brings the ark into battle. After their disastrous defeat at Aphek (vv. 1-2), the people of Israel look for a more efficacious defense against their most dangerous enemy, the Philistines. These "Sea Peoples" had entered Canaan from the west and had settled along the coastal plain about 1200 B.C.E. They were non-Semitic, worshipers of the grain god Dagon, and were militarily and culturally superior to the Israelites.

The usual battle strategy having failed, the Israelites send for the ark of the Lord. The Lord is described (v. 4) as seated upon cherubim, representations of winged mythological beasts which guarded pagan temples. These cherubim were positioned on the cover of the ark as emblems of God's ministering spirits. The ark's presence in the Israelite camp disappoints the Philistines but induces them to fight with extraordinary bravery out of fear that they might become slaves of Israel. Not only were thirty thousand Israelites slain (v. 10), but the ark itself is captured—an event that causes all ears to tingle when they hear of it (3:11).

4:12-22 The glory of Israel departs. With the capture of the ark, the ministry of the house of Eli comes to an end in the death of Hophni, Phinehas, and their father. The shock of loss is such that Phinehas' wife dies giving birth (v. 19). Her son, whom she names symbolically Ichabod, meaning "Where is the glory?," lives and is mentioned in 1 Sam 14:3 as the uncle of Ahijah, a priest in Saul's camp. (Giving a name from the circumstances of a child's birth is common in the Bible. Sarah's son Isaac bears such a name [Gen 21:3-6], as do the sons of Jacob [Gen 30:6-24; 35:18]. It is particularly applicable in the case of Rachel who, like Eli's daughter-in-law, dies in the distress of childbirth.)

5:1-5 The humiliation of Dagon. As a relief from the sad events of chapter 4, this account introduces a lighter note. The Israelite audience is assured that though the ark was lost, the Lord whose presence it represented has not lost divine power. Here the Philistine god Dagon is disdained in two increasingly demeaning episodes. In the first he seems to be worshipping before the ark which had been moved into his temple. In the second he is dismembered before it. We are not told if he was ever able to be mended. Such is the fate, says the story, of gods made by human hands.

5:6-12 The ark afflicts the Philistine cities. In the previous section the ark had made trouble for the god Dagon in his temple at Ashdod, one of the five principal Philistine cities. Now it makes trouble for the Philistines themselves. There is a plague of mice in Ashdod, hemorrhoids in Gath, and death in Ekron. Four times (vv. 6, 7, 9, 11) we are told that this happens because the hand of the Lord is heavy upon the Philistines. With the same repetition, this time of the Hebrew verb "to go around," the biblical author emphasizes that the ark was sent around from one city to another (vv. 8, 9, 10). In each city the suffering is escalated, as was the indignity of Dagon. There was a similar escalation during the ten plagues in Exodus 7–12 and in the pressures brought on the captors of Sarah and Rebecca before their release (Gen 12, 20, and 26). We may smile with the Israelite hearers that the Philistines were thus bested, but also that their cry of pain went up, not to Dagon, but to the God of Israel in the heavens.

6:1-9 The Philistines plan to send back the ark. In this theological narrative, the Philistines implement their desire to send back the ark. After consulting their advisors, they let the direction taken by the calfless cows point to the originator of their plagues. The normal response would be for the cows to return to their calves. But if they head toward the Israelite border, it would mean that it was the Lord who had brought their troubles upon them.

The Philistines know enough Israelite history to see a parallel between this event and the plagues brought on the Egyptians before the Exodus, and they are determined not to repeat the Pharaoh's stubbornness nor its consequences. In a kind of sympathetic magic, they shape their conciliatory gifts of gold into five hemorrhoids and five mice, one for each of their cities. With the departure of the symbols of their plagues, they hope to eliminate them from their land.

6:10-18 The ark returns; some unexpected consequences. The cows hitched to the ark perform in exemplary manner as if leading a procession to Beth-shemesh, probably the Israelite town nearest to Ekron, where the ark was last kept. The Israelites rejoice to see it and celebrate by offering a sacrifice, much as Elisha will sacrifice his oxen, using the plowing equipment for the fire (1 Kgs 19:19-21). As often happens, a large stone marks the place of the sacrifice and of the divine intervention.

6:19-21 Trouble for Israel. The ark's homecoming is marred by the death of seventy who failed to greet it and thereby committed a sin of irreverence (compare Uzzah's plight in 2 Sam 6:6-8). The Lord's power and holiness represented in the ark become as frightening to the Israelites as they had been to the Philistines. Without divulging their reason, the people of Beth-shemesh send word to the inhabitants of Kiriath-jearim, about eight miles north of Jerusalem, to come for the ark. The chapter ends as it began with the ark, unwelcome to both Philistines and the Lord's own people.

7:1-6 Samuel begins his ministry. Except for the ark's transfer to Jerusalem in 2 Sam 6, the story of the ark concludes with verse 2. Despite its doubtful welcome and the absence of a fitting shrine as had existed in Shiloh, the Israelites are satisfied that it is at least in their own land once more. Its stay in Kiriath-jearim has positive results, for verse 3 tells of the people's desire to return to the Lord. Twenty years later, they are willing to affirm this publicly before Samuel at Mizpah, probably the site north of Jerusalem. (The scene is reminiscent of Jacob at Bethel [Gen 35:1-7] where the Lord asked him to make an altar. There as here the putting away of all foreign gods was required.) Samuel explicitly mentions Baals and Ashtaroth, fertility objects used in idolatrous worship.

The Israelites express their submission in a ceremony of atonement, which involved the pouring of water, fasting, and the confession of sin. Samuel's leadership in this inaugurates his active ministry in Israel. Hophni and Phinehas were priests who had no knowledge of the Lord (2:12). Now Samuel comes in their place as priest and judge, in that knowledge, and through him Israel receives blessing and victory.

7:7-17 Samuel's leadership. The gathering of Israel at Mizpah was for religious purposes, but the Philistines use it for a military confrontation. Once again Samuel intercedes, and before it is necessary to fight, the Philistines are routed by their own fear of thunder. Israel seizes the opportunity to pursue. The victory is credited to the Lord and duly marked by Samuel with a stone. This "stone of help" (Ebenezer) is not the same as in 4:1, though both show the Lord as helping Israel, the one through the ark, the other through Samuel's intercession.

The presence of Samuel now replaces that of the ark. While among the Philistines, the ark went around their cities; now it is Samuel who goes around judging in the four cities mentioned.

For now, the Philistines are no longer a threat to Israel. David will have to fight them later (chs. 17, 23 and 2 Sam 5:17-25), but at this point the cities which the ark had visited come under Israelite control.

In building an altar to the Lord, Samuel is in the tradition of Noah (Gen 8:20), Abraham (Gen 12:7; 22:9), Isaac (Gen 26:25), Jacob (Gen 35:7), Moses (Exod 17:15; 24:4), Aaron (Exod 32:5), and Joshua (Josh 8:30). Samuel is a prophet like Moses, and like Joshua, is both priest and judge. He is the only biblical figure who is priest, prophet, and judge. After him the priestly and prophetic callings begin to separate. However, even Samuel, with the fullness of authority and charism, does not satisfy the people, who long to be like other nations led by a king.

III. SAUL, THE FIRST KING

1 Sam 8–15

These chapters recount the turbulent change from the rule of leaders like Samuel to that of a king. With the loss of the ark and the ever-present threat of the Philistines as background, the Israelites increasingly see a solution to their weakness in the establishment of the monarchy. Samuel resists at first, but at the Lord's command, he anoints Saul (8:22). After being chosen by lot (10:21) and defeating the Ammonites, Saul is officially inaugurated at Gilgal (11:15). In a negative vein, Samuel warns the people of a king's prerogatives (ch. 12). Monarchy may bring advantages, but they must be ready for side effects.

Samuel's warning finds a certain fulfillment in the Lord's later rejection of Israel's first anointed king. Saul fails, the text indicates, because he disobeyed the word of the Lord mediated to him through the prophet Samuel (chs. 13 and 15). Neither extenuating circumstances nor zeal for the worship of the Lord can overrule this crucial test of obedience to the word, for the king as well as every Israelite.

8:1-5 The people demand a king. The Hebrew text uses the noun or verb for the making of a king a dozen times in this chapter, with the word "judge" a close second. Kingship is about to replace the old system of governing in Israel. Up to this time, charismatic heroes sent by the Lord had led the people in battle against their enemies. Now, instead of praying for a new judge, the people ask Samuel to appoint a king.

8:6-22 The price of kingship. Hardly flattered by this request, Samuel is angry on behalf of the Lord whom he recognizes as the true and only king of Israel. In the revealing conversation between Samuel and the Lord, Samuel is faced with the reality of a people who have been continuously disloyal despite great favors. Verse 8 is encapsuled in a double command to Samuel to obey the people. After Samuel outlines for them what their king will do, the command of verses 7 and 9 is repeated a third time in verse 22. If the sons of Samuel took bribes, the king will take everything they value including their liberty (vv. 11, 13, 14-17).

The warning is not heeded despite the reminder that there is no way back (v. 18), for once the king is installed, it will be useless to complain. Sometimes God gives us that for which we ask before we know whether or not we really want it.

Verses 11-17 may have been written in hindsight, after the Israelites had learned all too well what it meant to have a king. The description is of a well-established, flourishing kingdom, hardly comparable to Saul's early and simple reign.

9:1-2 Saul is introduced. Twice we are told that Saul is a Benjaminite from the north in contrast to David whose origins are in Judah in the south. This distinction will mean more as the story unfolds. Saul's entrance into it is auspicious. He is handsome, taller than most, and the son of a man of substance. "Handsome" and "stalwart" are also used to describe David (16:18), whose ancestor Boaz was also a man of substance (Ruth 2:1). In the Books of Samuel there are a number of beautiful or handsome people: David, Bathsheba, Amnon, Absalom and Adonijah, but more often than not they come to an unhappy end (see 2 Sam 11, 13; 1 Kgs 1–2). The author seems to warn that such external gifts do not necessarily indicate divine approval and that they can be a source of pride and disobedience to the law. It is not the externals that God approves, but what is in the heart (16:7).

9:3-10 The unsuccessful search. Here we see Saul in action. He is an obedient son, diligently seeking his father's lost asses. Saul and his servant go through four different regions in their wide-ranging but fruitless search. Just as they are ready to give it up, the servant's suggestion leads them to the man of God in Zuph. It is not revealed until verse 14 that the man of God is Samuel. In the discussion whether and how to go to the man of God and what gift to bring for the advice about the asses (vv. 3-10), the verb "go" is used in Hebrew eleven times. The action verbs convey the intensity of the search.

9:11-13 Samuel presides over the sacrifice. Now the verbs change from going to going up, showing that Saul and his servant must not only climb to reach the city but, once within it, they will go up again to the high place where the seer was to officiate at the sacrifice. The high place here is a place of worship of the Lord, but later such places were condemned for idolatrous worship (Jer 2:20; 3:6).

Instead of "man of God," they ask for the seer, that is, one who sees more perceptively either the present or the future. The narrator interjects the information that at his time of writing the proper epithet for both was "prophet" (v. 9).

Verse 13 is important for not only does it include all the action words of the chapter: go, go up, find, eat (three times) and call or invite, but it contains the carefully stated prohibition against eating until Samuel comes and blesses the sacrifice. Knowing this will help the reader understand the significance of Saul's failure to wait for Samuel's arrival in chapter 13. Also, the mention of invited guests implies that the sacrifice was not a public ceremony but by invitation only. The girls who give directions do not seem to be participants.

9:14-25 Samuel and Saul meet. In the revelation in which the Lord prepares Samuel for the arrival of Saul, the word "king" is never used. Saul is to be a military commander who will rescue Israel from the Philistines. Though this had not been the practice with the judges, Samuel is instructed to anoint Saul. This anointing and the special portion Saul is given to eat (vv. 23-24) are indications of the religious character of the newly instituted monarchy.

Without knowing what is ahead of him and before he is anointed, Saul finds himself the guest of honor at Samuel's banquet. Saul objects humbly to Samuel's praise, insisting, as had Gideon, that his family is the least of his tribe (Judg 6:15). Samuel promises to tell all that is in Saul's heart. With this prophetic backing, Saul begins a process of self-discovery as the Lord makes his will known to Samuel. In view of the previous revelation to Samuel that Israel had rejected the Lord in favor of a king (8:7), it is pure irony for Samuel to describe Saul as one ardently desired by Israel (9:20). Both Samuel and Saul in their different roles answer a need of Israel, one for a prophet and the other for a king. Which one will be the real leader of Israel?

9:26-27 After the feast. It is a surprise that the anointing is not public. If all Israel awaited a king, why this secrecy? It may be a way of reminding the people that the Lord works in his own time and in his own hidden way.

10:1-8 The signs of Saul's anointing. Samuel provides Saul with three signs to confirm his anointing as Israel's commander. Each occurs in a different place and each answers a future need of Saul. The first is at Zelzah, a name derived from the Hebrew verb "to rush upon." The verb appears twice in this chapter and refers to the spirit's rushing upon Saul (vv. 6, 10). This sign points to the location of the asses and to Saul's life-work as well. The second sign, the provision of kids, bread and wine, supplies the sustenance for his task. Because the gifts are consecrated as offerings to God, they indicate divine approval. The third sign connects Saul's kingship with the gift of the spirit and the ability to prophesy. The existence of a Philistine garrison (v. 5) at Gibeath-elohim recalls Samuel's prediction (9:16) that Saul will save Israel from this troublesome enemy.

Despite the positive signs, that is, Saul's change into another man and Samuel's promise that the Lord is with him (vv. 6-7), Saul is to undergo an immediate test: he must wait for Samuel for seven days in Gilgal, and then the prophet will tell him what to do. From the beginning Saul is "another man," but he is not his own man.

10:9-13 Saul as prophet. It is easy to see that Saul's prophetic abilities do not win him the respect accorded to Samuel. At this time prophecy was a more common phenomenon in Israel than would be the case later. The early prophets traveled in bands headed by their "father" (v. 12) and were given to ecstatic states often brought on by music (v. 5). (Elijah and Elisha [1 Kgs 17–21; 2 Kgs 1–9] were of this sort.) Saul's experience here foreshadows a similar event in 1 Sam 19:22-24.

10:14-16 Saul's silence. Was it natural modesty that caused Saul to omit the news of his anointing when his uncle questioned him? Or was it that Saul needed the ratification of his kingship by the people before it could be made public? In any case ratification does take place later at Mizpah (vv. 20-24). Much the same will happen in the case of David who will be anointed by Samuel (16:1-13) long before he becomes king over Judah (2 Sam 2:4). A future king of Israel, Jehu, will also be anointed years before he ascends the throne (2 Kgs 9–10). Saul did not in fact become king until after he had proven himself victorious over the Philistines.

10:17-27 Saul is chosen by lot. As happened in 7:5, Samuel once again calls all Israel together at Mizpah for the formal selection of the new king by lot. The Lord's message begins like a treaty between a lord and his vassal, recalling the good the Lord had done for the people in the past. Although the Lord had delivered them from oppressors, the people have rejected the divine king in favor of a human king. Samuel's tone is one of rebuke and chastisement rather than rejoicing over an awaited gift. The choice of Saul proceeds in the manner of an inquisition. Again and again little embarrassments cloud the accession of Saul, hinting that all was not well with his kingship from the start.

In answer to the people's cries in the desert, God had given both quail and manna (Num 17). Eating the quail answered the people's desire for meat but brought them death. Manna was God's answer to their need for food; they soon tired of it, but it kept them alive. In like manner, Saul was what the people wanted but he failed as king. The worthless fellows' question whether Saul could save them will be answered by Saul's deliverance of the men of Jabesh (11:9).

11:1-11 The challenge of the Ammonites. These were ancient and troublesome neighbors of Israel who settled along the northeastern shore of the Dead Sea. Nahash's answer to the request for a treaty with Jabesh is cruel, especially to modern ears. While it terrifies all who hear it, Saul's response would be equally abhorrent today. What is interesting is that Saul, anointed king, has no knowledge of the event because he has been plowing (!) and must be informed by the people. Only then does the spirit rush upon him and impel him to military action.

Saul's gory call to arms carries with it a terrifying threat of punishment, bringing thousands out for battle. A similar dismemberment and sending of parts to all the tribes of Israel is told in Judg 19–20, this time to punish an Israelite atrocity.

Beyond Saul's charismatic leadership, there is no special sign of divine intervention in the battle with the Ammonites (v. 11). The Jabeshites had lulled the Ammonites into expecting surrender (v. 9), a successful trick which the Israelite hearers must have reveled in. Saul's zeal brings the victory which confirms his kingship.

11:12-15 Renewal of Saul's kingship. Although the people ask Samuel to produce the men who challenged Saul's rule, it is Saul who makes the decision to pardon them. However, Samuel's initiative brings about the renewal of the kingship at Gilgal. Samuel retains his role as religious leader and kingmaker, but Saul has emerged as a triumphant military hero worthy to be king.

12:1-5 Samuel asks for an accounting. As Samuel's life comes to a close, he demands an evaluation of his ministry, an unusual event in biblical history. His list of possible infractions would make a fitting examination for any politician's career. Samuel is completely exonerated from fault. He has taken nothing, in contrast to the king who, as predicted in 8:11-18, will take everything the people value. The rule of a prophet, Samuel implies, is just, compared with that of a king.

12:6-12 A history of Israelite infidelity. His own record cleared, Samuel launches into Israel's continued ingratitude to the God who brought their ancestors out of Egypt and saved them from their enemies. Previously Israel had been given a judge in time of oppression, but now the fear of Nahash the Ammonite is great enough to make them demand the permanent rule of a king. Although Saul is now that king, Samuel still smarts under the people's rejection of the Lord as the true king of Israel. Verse 10 explicitly mentions Israel's perennial temptation: the trusting in and worship of other gods.

12:13-18 A sign of the Lord's displeasure. If the people think they can rest easily as far as obedience and worship of the Lord is concerned, they are wrong. Samuel warns them again that the Lord their God is the Lord of history with or without a human king. The king is not above the divine law. The sign of the divine sovereignty comes with Samuel's request for thunder and rain during a season when these almost never occur. The harvest is ruined; in anger the Lord has done the people's will.

12:19-25 Samuel intercedes for the people. While the people admit they have sinned in asking for a king, they cannot undo their act. When they ask Samuel to intercede with the Lord, he gives them support and encouragement but warns against idolatry. Such will be the typical message of later prophets, despite the people's infidelity. They will be punished if they do evil, but, like Samuel, the Lord will never abandon them. For their part they must fear and worship the Lord or else they will be swept away.

13:1-7 Jonathan's victory over the Philistines. After the Ammonite victory (11:11), Saul faces a far superior enemy in the Philistines. Without chariotry and cavalry his three thousand are pitifully outnumbered. The only cheerful note is Jonathan's successful attack on the Philistine garrison in Gibeah (v. 3). After it, Saul claims the victory (v. 4), causing the Philistines to renew the fight. The frightened soldiers desert in large numbers (vv. 6-7) while Saul, holding on to those who are left, awaits Samuel to preside over the sacrifice which will prepare them for the battle.

13:8-18 Saul's test. With his scattered troops deserting, there was enormous pressure on Saul to keep his army from disintegrating. Samuel's failure to arrive on time is puzzling, since delay was demoralizing the soldiers. The point has been made that the people were required to wait for the priest to sacrifice (9:13). It is then disobedience for Saul to usurp Samuel's role and offer the sacrifice himself. Saul's trust was in the "magic" of the offerings—and perhaps the strength the food would give—more than the God to whom the offerings were made and who would decide the outcome of the battle.

This was a test that the impulsive Saul failed, and the failure resulted in the loss of his kingship. Saul is a tragic figure whose story has several portents of an unhappy end. Samuel's rebuke suggests this and points to a new divine choice, a man after the Lord's own heart (v. 14). Samuel departs, leaving Saul with a decimated army to face a threefold attack from the Philistines.

13:19-23 The Philistine advantage. The Philistines controlled not only the price of sharpening tools but the manufacture of iron. The Israelites had to be content with bronze plowshares and weapons which could only be sharpened by the Philistines. If Saul and Jonathan, the only ones who possessed weapons, would attempt battle under such disadvantages, it is because victory in war was seen as belonging to the Lord. If Israel lost, the reason was that the Lord had departed from the people in anger. If they won, the Lord was with them. An important aspect of Israelite warfare in Samuel's time was the ban, which required that all the spoil taken in victory be devoted to the Lord, that is, be completely destroyed as a holocaust or sacrifice. This question of destruction of a conquered people provides a second test for Saul in chapter 15.

14:1-15 Jonathan causes a Philistine panic. The presence of Ahijah (v. 3) associates Saul's efforts with the rejected Elide priesthood. Jonathan, who dominates this chapter, is an exception to this rejection, for, in contrast to his father, nothing adverse is ever reported about him. Jonathan's faith is behind his attribution of his success to the Lord (v. 6). The armor-bearer's loyalty recalls the loyalty the Lord had expected and not received from Saul. In this awareness of the Lord, Jonathan is like David, who will regularly inquire of the Lord before going into battle (see 23:2, 4; 30:8; 2 Sam 2:1). In Jonathan's exploit, the Philistine panic and the ensuing earthquake are clearly acts by the Lord. Jonathan's trust is a foil for the misjudgment and impulsiveness of Saul.

14:16-23 Saul leads the rout. The unnatural confusion in the Philistine camp caused by Jonathan's raid has two results advantageous for Israel: the formerly fearless Philistines begin to slay one another; and the Israelite deserters return to Saul, who again capitalizes on Jonathan's success (see 13:4). The author attributes the victory to the Lord (v. 23).

14:24-30 The rash oath. Saul's ill-considered oath forbidding his weary soldiers to eat is obeyed by all except his son, who had not been informed. Both the soldier who tells Jonathan of it and Jonathan himself are openly critical of the wisdom of Saul's command (vv. 28-30). The soldier points to the weakness of the people; Jonathan tells of his own revival at having eaten a bit of honey, describing his father's action as troublesome to the people and therefore counterproductive (compare Judg 11:29-31).

14:31-36 Saul corrects ritual disobedience. Saul again shows poor judgment when the over-hungry people fail to let the blood drain from the meat before eating, as they were required to do (Lev 3:17). Saul shows himself piously concerned for the proper ritual and, to his credit, quickly makes appropriate arrangements. Although he wants to do the will of the Lord, he is a bungler who puts more faith in ceremony than in the Lord. Even the altar he builds out of devotion seems unnecessary and extra.

14:37-46 Jonathan freed by the people. After Saul, who had to be reminded to consult the Lord (v. 36), receives no answer from the Lord, he concludes that the cause is someone's sin. Even the life of his son is not too small a price to pay to remove the Lord's silence. Failure to know God's will dogs Saul's reign and will herald his death (see chs. 28 and 31). When the people rescue Jonathan from his father's fanaticism, Saul's sanity is put in question.

14:47-54 Saul's wars and genealogy. Despite the above, Saul seems to have overcome militarily his neighboring enemies (v. 47). The chapter concludes with a list of Saul's sons, wives, and generals. This is standard biblical treatment at the end of a reign. Perhaps it also signals the end of Saul's kingship.

15:1-9 Saul "reinterprets" his orders. Samuel's words make it plain that the Lord is supreme and that since he made Saul king, the king must obey the Lord. Saul's sparing of Agag thwarts the divine decree of punishment, which was to recompense Israel for Amalek's cruelty (Exod 17:8-16; Deut 25:17-19) and flouts the ban (see comment on 13:19-23).

15:10-23 Saul's second rejection. When Saul disobeys by sparing Agag and the best of the Amalekite spoil, the Lord repents of having made him king. Saul's rule now takes a noticeably downward course. Samuel, seeking to rebuke Saul, finds that he has gone to Carmel to erect a monument for himself. When they meet, Saul says confidently, "I have kept the commandment of the Lord." These incidents point to Saul's vanity and failure to know the Lord.

Their meeting is both humorous and ironic. The bleating and lowing which Samuel hears, he should not be hearing; the disobedience Samuel comes to castigate is denied by the one who is guilty. Samuel's poetic oracle (vv. 22-23) puts in perspective external sacrifice as related to an interior attitude of obedience. It also connects Israelite practices of divination and idolatry to sin and presumption. In overrating ritual, Saul has fatally confused his values (see 13:11-13; 14:33-35).

15:24-31 Saul repents. Saul admits his guilt, blaming the people, but Samuel neither accepts the explanation nor acknowledges that Saul may have acted in good faith. Saul finds the rejection impossible to bear and begs Samuel to accompany him to the sacrifice. Samuel agrees, but not before another symbolic rejection is enacted: the tearing of Samuel's cloak stands for the tearing away of Saul's kingship.

15:32-35 Samuel does Saul's job. Samuel's sentence on Agag is a restatement of the lex talionis which prescribes that punishment should fit the crime (Lev 24:17-21). Just as Agag rendered women childless by his sword, so shall his mother be made childless. It is a terse, incontestable sentence from the Lord (v. 33), who uses human events to accomplish his inscrutable will.

Today's reader may be astonished at the cold-bloodedness of the prophet as he completes the ban with the slaying of Agag, but biblical prophets are not known to shrink from death (compare Exod 32:25-28; 1 Kgs 18:40). There can be no sentimentality in obeying a God who "puts to death and gives life" (2:6).

IV. SAUL AND DAVID

1 Sam 16–31

Just as the Elide priesthood was cut off and replaced by Samuel, so here Saul is rejected and replaced by David. The Elides sinned against the Lord's worship; Saul sinned by not imposing the ban against Amalek and by usurping Samuel's role as priest in offering the sacrifice. Both infractions touch the worship of the Lord and both incurred the destruction of the respective houses.

As Eli functioned as priest after his rejection (1 Sam 2–3), so Saul continues as king though the Lord is no longer with him. Directed by the Lord, Samuel anoints a new king, David, who proves to be an able soldier and successful in all he does. In these chapters Saul pursues David in jealousy over this success, but David handily escapes each time. Saul at last falls victim to the very enemy he was made king to defeat (9:16; 10:1).

David has all the desired characteristics of a biblical hero: pleasing appearance, speech, and musical ability as well. Compared to Saul, David is superior from his first introduction. More important is that the Lord is with him, something said only once about Saul (10:7) and several times about David (16:18; 17:37; 18:12, 14, 28; 20:13).

16:1-13 David's anointing. Samuel's grief at Saul's rejection suggests not only that he had entertained hope for Saul's success as king but was personally attached to him (see 15:11). The brusque intervention of the Lord precludes further mourning: the Lord is determined to choose another king.

We are surprised that Samuel fears Saul will kill him (v. 2), for it negates the impression that Samuel held authority over Saul. The Lord encourages Samuel by a subterfuge. The new anointing is to be done under the cloak of a sacrifice at the home of Jesse in Bethlehem. The people's question (v. 4), "Is your visit peaceful?" warns that the prophetic word could bring both good and evil (see 1 Kgs 1:9-16; 2:23-24).

Samuel anoints David at a private banquet with little fanfare (compare Saul's in 9:22-27; 10:1). This is Samuel's last recorded prophetic act before his death (25:1; 28:3).

16:14-23 David the future king. In another sign of rejection, the spirit of the Lord now departs from Saul to be replaced by a spirit of melancholy. But Saul is not left without some relief. It can hardly be coincidence that David is the means of banishing the evil spirit, at least temporarily.

David's relationship to Saul has a happy beginning. Saul is immediately attracted to David and gives him the office of armor-bearer, which amounts to on-the-job training for kingship. But this very closeness will soon cause problems.

17:1-11 Goliath taunts Israel's army. The challenger who comes out of the Philistine camp is so powerful and magnificently armed that he terrifies Saul and his army that is encamped on the opposite hill. They seem to have forgotten that it is the God of Israel who determines the victory (14:6; 17:47).

17:12-37 David the hero and savior. Without mentioning his previous anointing by Samuel, the author reintroduces David as a younger son sent by his father with provisions for his brothers in the Israelite camp. This inconsistency has been assigned by some commentators to another tradition which has here been interwoven into the text. However, what we today see as contradiction was often not a problem for the Israelite. David's fearless acceptance of Goliath's challenge shines out against the abject terror of the Israelites (v. 11).

The reward Saul has promised to Israel's defender calls to mind fairy tales wherein the hero is promised wealth and the hand of the king's daughter in marriage. A more realistic advantage comes in the form of tax exemption for the hero's family. From this we see how Saul's army and government were funded and that Samuel's warning about the rights of a king was being realized (8:10-17).

Saul's offer to make David his son-in-law gives him a strong claim to succeed to the throne. Jonathan's later prediction that David would become king may reflect this custom (20:12-16; 23:17).

Now a domestic mini-drama takes place in the angry reception David receives from his oldest brother Eliab (v. 28). David's role here is comparable to that of Joseph, who was sent out to his brothers by his father while they guarded the flocks (Gen 37). In both cases a younger brother of extraordinary promise is the object of jealousy and contempt.

17:38-54 The decisive encounter. When David cannot use Saul's armor to fight the Philistine, he resorts to other skills and puts his trust in the Lord. These along with stones and a sling were the simple means of bringing down Goliath. The theology of the event is summed up by David's statement that "it is not by sword or spear that the Lord saves" (v. 47).

There is an obvious anachronism in verse 54, since Jerusalem was not an Israelite city until after David had become king (2 Sam 5). The mention of Jerusalem and of David's tent is a later addition.

17:55-58 Saul meets David for the first time. It is puzzling that Saul, who had made David his armor-bearer and harp player in 16:21-23, knows nothing of the new hero, nor does his general Abner. Commentators suspect that an alternative account may have been superimposed here.

18:1-4 The covenant of friends. Father and son are immediately attracted to David as a result of his victory over Goliath. Saul makes him part of his household and Jonathan strips himself of his royal garments and weapons to clothe David with them. The gift is tantamount to abdication of the throne in favor of David. Theirs is an unsparingly generous friendship, lasting their lifetime, while Saul's less disinterested love of David soon grows sour.

18:5-30 Saul turns against David. When David's popularity grows with his victories so that the women sing of him to Saul's disadvantage (v. 7), Saul in a fit of jealousy attempts to pin David to the wall as he plays his harp. The king's fear increases when David escapes, and he realizes that the spirit of the Lord had departed from him and rested on David (vv. 12, 15). This transfer of the spirit was the biblical explanation of David's continued success against the Philistines (vv. 5, 30).

Saul, who had cause to be grateful to David, three times acts with duplicity against him. First, he offers his older daughter Merob in marriage, only to give her to another man (vv. 17, 19); second, he sends David into battle with the hope he will be killed by Philistines (v. 17), a tactic David himself will use against Bathsheba's husband in 2 Sam 11–12; third, he offers David the status of son-in-law on delivery of one hundred Philistine foreskins, hoping the danger of the undertaking will bring David death instead (v. 25). Although David demurs at becoming son-in-law out of modesty (vv. 18, 23), he is pleased and seems unaware of Saul's animosity (v. 26). On delivery of double the number of foreskins, Saul gives his younger daughter Michal to David in marriage.

David seems already to have surpassed Jonathan militarily, for no other victory beyond that of chapter 14 is reported of him. Jonathan decreases while David increases (compare John 3:30).

19:1-17 Jonathan and Michal help David. In defense of his friend, Jonathan extracts an oath from his father that he will not kill David (v. 6). However, when the evil spirit returns to incite Saul again to spear David, Michal joins Jonathan in protecting David. After convincing him of the danger from Saul (v. 11), and letting him down from a window to safety, she shows inventiveness in deceiving her father's soldiers (vv. 13-16) and courage in facing his rebuke (v. 17). The unhappy Saul thus finds himself alienated from both his children because of his behavior toward David. The fact that Michal's household contained an idol suggests that the worship of the Lord was not as pure in practice as the biblical ideal demanded (compare Gen 31).

19:18-24 Saul joins the prophets. The spirit of the Lord works to frustrate Saul in his attempt to seize David. Bystanders must have laughed to see all Saul's messengers and then Saul himself seized by the spirit when they approached the frenzied prophets among whom David had hidden himself. The scene in which Saul, in a highly undignified state, rolls helplessly about, raving along with his messengers, confirms the popular taunt of 10:11-12, "Is Saul also among the prophets?"

Such a portrayal reinforces Saul's inadequacy and rejection and at the same time reflects popular disparagement of early prophecy. The main point is that the Lord is protecting David against Saul, to the king's discomfiture.

20:1-10 Jonathan pledges loyalty to David. With the same words Saul spoke when sparing the malcontents who had formerly opposed his rule (11:13), Jonathan utters what is almost a royal decree that David will not die at the hand of his father (v. 21). In so doing he opposes his father's will and transfers his allegiance from Saul to David. On his side David's trust in Jonathan is so great that he requests Jonathan to kill him, should he be proved guilty (v. 8), rather than Saul (compare 2 Sam 14:32).

Jonathan seems at first to be an obstacle to David's becoming king, since he is Saul's legitimate heir. Instead he is the means by which David's destiny is achieved. This chapter marks the change in Jonathan's role from crown prince to David's subject. Also, in his success against the Philistines in chapter 14 and his subsequent rescue by the people, Jonathan in effect replaces his father as king. When Jonathan gives David all the trappings of royalty, he abdicates the throne (ch. 18). David's kingship, divinely instituted by Samuel's anointing (ch. 16), is thus humanly mediated by Jonathan.

20:11-17 The oath of loyalty. The pact David and Jonathan make holds two premonitions: Jonathan, the expected heir to the throne, will give place to David, and then he will die (vv. 14-16). Both face death; both stand in line for the kingship. Jonathan's blessing for David (v. 13) acknowledges Saul's rejection and points to David's succession.

20:18-34 Jonathan tests his father. Saul desperately tries to hold back the tide that is coming in for David by killing him. When Jonathan makes excuses for David's absence, Saul's reaction comes with a vengeance. In highly abusive words, Saul attacks not only Jonathan but his mother, hinting at an undisclosed defection on her part. Rather than attempt to win Jonathan to his side, Saul enlarges the breach by lunging at his own son with a spear. For the first time Jonathan is angry and stalks from the room.

20:35-42 Jonathan sends David on his way. Jonathan here joins his sister Michal in courageously defending David against the murderous intent of their father. With Jonathan's departure from Saul, the king's isolation increases and with it his madness. When the elaborate charade of shooting arrows is over, David offers Jonathan the triple homage befitting a royal person. By saving his life, Jonathan has helped David to become king. David will later preserve Jonathan's posterity by saving Jonathan's son (2 Sam 9; 21:7).

21:1-10 Ahimelech helps David. With David's unexpected arrival alone at Nob, Ahimelech has a premonition that not all is well. He is afraid that David is a fugitive and that he and his supposed men are not religiously prepared to eat the bread designated for the priests. By representing himself as on a mission of Saul's and under the rubrics of holy war, which required abstinence from women (Lev 15:18; Deut 23:10), David allays his fears and enlists his help. Convinced that everything is in order, Ahimelech takes no pains to conceal from Doeg, Saul's henchman, his having given bread and weapons to David (v. 8). Doeg's presence will have to be reckoned with later. The episode shows that human needs take precedence over cultic regulations, a point also made at the disciples' pulling ears of grain to eat on the sabbath (Matt 12:3-4; Mark 3:25-26; Luke 6:3-4).

21:11-16 David flees to Achish of Gath. The second person David meets on his flight from Saul is Achish of Gath. With Ahimelech he had played the part of one commissioned by Saul; with Achish he pretends madness, since insanity was looked upon as possession by an evil spirit and therefore made him untouchable. Although David, the hunted, looks mad, he is not; it is Saul, the hunter, who is the true madman.

22:1-5 David provides for his parents. David's refuge at Adullam's cave makes possible the formation of a guerilla band. Now no longer hostile, his brothers join him, and along with some outcasts of society, provide him with protection. It is the beginning of a power base that will lead to David's coronation.

In view of Saul's pursuit, David asks permission for his parents to settle temporarily in Moab. David's doubt as to where he should go next is resolved by instructions from the prophet Gad to go back to Judah—and the dangerous ambit of Saul. Through all vicissitudes, the Lord continues to care for David.

22:6-23 Doeg betrays Ahimelech. The scene shifts to Saul's camp where, spear in hand, he is complaining about the disloyalty of his men. Paranoia is enveloping Saul's appreciation of events, so that even those closest to him are suspect. Doeg's revelation of David's encounter with Ahimelech at Nob propels Saul into action. When Ahimelech appears before him, Saul again makes a charge of conspiracy (vv. 8, 13) and refuses to hear his pathetic but valid defense. Ahimelech's punishment is a foregone conclusion, but the reaction to Saul's command to slay the priests is not. When not one man moves to obey the command, Saul presses the Edomite Doeg into the cruel business, assuming that a foreigner would be less squeamish about executing Israelites.

Doeg's slaughter begins with the priests and extends to the rest of the inhabitants and livestock of Nob. What Saul should have done to Agag and the Amalekites, he does here against his own people (15:3). Although the true target of Saul's animosity escapes, one son of Ahimelech, Abiathar, survives to report the massacre to David (vv. 20, 21). With the arrival of Abiathar, the story returns to the fugitives in the forest. Here David accepts responsibility for the slaughter at Nob, offering Abiathar what protection he can.

23:1-6 David consults the Lord. In contrast to Saul, who had to be reminded to consult the Lord and then received no answer (14:36-37), David, when he asks whether to engage in battle with the Philistines, not only receives a positive answer but can ask a second time for the sake of his frightened men. David's victory is predictable because the ephod is in his camp, brought by Abiathar in his flight from Saul. Now the Lord is with David in a concrete way, for the ephod permits him cultic access to the Lord's will.

23:7-13 Saul frustrated again. Saul reads David's presence in Keilah as a God-given chance to seize his enemy. His plan to pursue him, as well as the treachery of the ungrateful citizens of Keilah, are made known to David by two further uses of the ephod. Because of this knowledge, David and his men, now six hundred strong, make their escape. Again the narrative contrasts Saul and David: the latter is seen as devout, God-fearing and obedient; the former is hobbled by his lack of the knowledge of God.

23:14-18 David and Jonathan meet for the last time. The essential details of David and Jonathan's relationship, sketched in 18:1-4, are here amplified. Jonathan openly acknowledges that David will be king and that his father will be unable to capture him (v. 17). Only the prediction of Jonathan's position as second to David remains unfulfilled, since Jonathan does not live long enough to see David made king. Jonathan's words confirm his loyalty to David and the relinquishment of any claim to the throne.

Jonathan's brief visit strengthens David's resolve and attests to the hidden care the Lord has for this favored king. Their covenant renewed, Jonathan departs from David and, except for notice of his death in 31:6-7, from the narrative.

23:19-28 Saul is distracted from the pursuit. When the Ziphites offer to disclose David's hiding place, Saul unaccountably asks for further inquiry. Earlier when he heard that David had been at Nob, he acted immediately (22:11). Now he proposes a wide-ranging search, which will only give David more time to flee.

Twice since his complaint that no one tells him anything (22:7-8), Saul is given information which almost leads to David's capture (vv. 7, 19). Each time he has had to abandon the chase because of unexpected developments, or divine intervention. However, Saul has no insight into this, nor does he give up the chase.

24:1-16 David asks justice from the Lord. This is the third sighting of David by spies loyal to Saul, whose three thousand men (v. 3) vastly outnumber David's six hundred (23:13). Saul, discovered in the cave by David and his men, is in his most humiliating predicament. The king's embarrassment serves as a foil to heighten two characteristics of David: his restraint when the enemy is in his grasp, and his extraordinary care not to harm the anointed of the Lord. Since piety holds back his hand from killing Saul, David looks to the Lord to vindicate him.

David argues with Saul with considerable wit. By disparaging himself as a dead dog or flea, he tries to show the king the futility of his chase.

24:17-23 Saul admits David will be king. David's skillful speech (see 16:18) proves so persuasive that Saul is reduced to tears. Gratitude and contrition are in Saul's response, but the announcement that he knows David will be king is prophetic. Like his son Jonathan, Saul also asks David to spare his posterity, forestalling the accepted custom of a new king's eliminating the previous ruling house.

Saul is here no longer a dangerous pursuer but a beaten captive at the mercy of one who refuses to kill him. The situation is so emotionally charged that, forgetting their enmity for a time, each leads his army off to his own place.

25:1 Israel mourns Samuel. With the death of Samuel, the role of judge in Israel passes to the king. Samuel was also a priest and a prophet, both of which offices now take on increasing importance in providing a check on the power of the king.

25:2-11 David seeks provisions from Nabal (the Fool). Between the two encounters between Saul and David (chs. 24, 26), there is here what amounts to a romantic interlude. If we have wondered how David supplied his men in the desert, this story provides an answer. Nabal offers David a different kind of opposition from Saul's, but one which could be equally life-threatening. Nabal refuses to share food with David and his men at a time of traditional hospitality, the sheep-shearing festival (compare Gen 38:13; 2 Sam 13:23ff.).

When David asks for gifts from Nabal's feast, he does so by artfully leading from polite greetings, a hint at Nabal's probable indebtedness, advertence to the feast, and finally to the request for provisions. In reply Nabal first tries to make David a nonentity and then equates him with a run-away slave. David addresses Nabal as brother (v. 6) and father (v. 8), but Nabal dismisses him as an unknown (v. 11). Although David may have had no strict right to a share in the feast, Nabal, for his part, fails to recognize (know) what is in his best interest.

25:12-35 Abigail (the Wise) saves David. After hearing Nabal's repulse, David in silent anger girds on his sword, ordering his men to do likewise. By repeating the girding three times, the author delays the action to heighten suspense and show the grim determination of David and his hungry men.

Meanwhile, Nabal's servants inform their mistress Abigail of what has transpired and attest to the good David and his men have done them (vv. 14-17). Their openness in describing Nabal as "mean" (literally, "a son of Belial"—Hannah's "ne'er do well" of 1:16) indicates not only that she had their confidence but that Nabal's ill-nature was well known.

Unlike her husband, Abigail knows wherein her best interests lie. She hurries off with gifts just in time to deflect David's growing wrath. In a speech as skillful as David's, she first blames Nabal for acting the fool and herself for not seeing David's men when they came. Pointing out that the Lord has saved David from blood guilt (v. 26), she presents her gifts. A proof of her wisdom is her perception that because David is fighting the battles of the Lord and there is no evil in him, the Lord will establish a lasting dynasty for him (v. 28).

Abigail concludes her speech with a blessing for David (v. 29) in which she uses two metaphors: (1) she refers to the "bundle of the living" into which David will be bound as a promise of life, and (2) she asks the Lord to hurl the lives of David's enemies as from the hollow of a sling, recalling David's victory over Goliath with a sling (17:40, 49f.). Abigail's last wish, that David remember her when all she predicts comes to pass, brings an equally gracious response from David who then lets her depart in peace.

25:36-39 Nabal's feast. In three short verses Nabal's life comes to an end, with a drunken orgy followed by a stroke. He had prepared for himself the royal banquet (v. 36) which should have been prepared for the true king, David. David had appealed to him as a servant; instead Nabal's wife presents herself as a servant (vv. 27, 41) while predicting David's kingship. Thus the good which David did (vv. 15, 21) is rewarded (v. 30), and the evil which Nabal dealt David (vv. 17, 21, 26, 39) is punished.

25:40-43 David's wives. In making Abigail his wife, David receives not only a woman of wisdom, skilled in speech, but very likely the control of Nabal's estate in the Calebite territory of Hebron (Josh 14:13-14). This advantage is offset by Saul's giving of Michal to another. The name Ahinoam, later listed as mother of David's first-born, Amnon (2 Sam 3:2), appears as Saul's wife in 14:50. If she was now David's and had been Saul's, it could relate to Saul's vicious outburst that Jonathan was the son of a rebellious woman (20:30).

26:1-12 David confronts Saul. This chapter introduces Joab's brother Abishai, who is second in command of David's army and a man consistently ready with the sword (2 Sam 3:22ff.; 8:16). When he pleads with David to finish off the sleeping Saul, David refuses, once again honoring the sacredness of an anointed king (24:7). Instead of taking Saul's life, David takes away his means of defense, his spear, and his life provision, his water jug. The entry and seizure take place successfully because of the deep sleep the Lord had sent over the camp (v. 12). It is another example of the divine helps continually accorded David at the expense of Saul (see 19:22ff.).

26:13-20 A double rebuke. Abandoning the diffidence he used in his previous encounter with Saul (ch. 24), David, from a safe distance on an opposite hill, openly accuses Saul's general, Abner, of neglecting his king. When this draws Saul's attention, David leaves Abner to attack the king with words. David is willing to accept Saul's persecution if it comes from the Lord, but if from men (that is, Saul), he will be forced by it to flee to a foreign land, where he will be tempted to worship other gods (v. 19).

26:21-25 Saul repents again. Contrite and thankful, Saul admits he has been a fool (compare Nabal, ch. 25). David, however, makes no pact with him as he did in their previous meeting (ch. 24). Ignoring Saul's promise not to harm him (v. 21), David reminds the king that the only reason he has been spared is because he is anointed. This reflects badly on Saul, who, in pursuing one he knows will be king, has no such qualms of conscience. Although the two part in mutual blessing, Saul has stretched David's patience to the breaking point.

27:1-4 David leaves Israel. David experiences discouragement similar to that of Abraham after repeatedly being promised a son (Gen 15:4). Although both Saul and Jonathan have foretold that he will be king, while Saul pursues him, David has little hope for his life in the future.

27:5-12 Achish gives David Ziklag. In a mutually agreeable arrangement, Achish finds an able soldier in David, and David is able, through Achish, to provide for himself and his men. We may wonder why there is no indication of their previous meeting, in which Achish showed himself reluctant to harbor another madman (21:11-16). With the information we have, there is no conclusive resolution to this incompatibility.

In both meetings with Achish, David never betrays his steadfast loyalty to Israel. The raids David makes, ostensibly in Achish's behalf, are against traditional enemies of both Israel and the Philistines. David is careful to kill all the humans lest, if they returned as prisoners, they betray him. This deception, like others in the Bible, goes unreprehended.

28:1-2 Achish trusts David. When Achish says that David realizes (in Hebrew, "knows") he is to go out with the Philistines against Israel, David answers that Achish will learn (in Hebrew, "know") what his servant can do. David's response is a cover for his loyalty which has never turned from Israel and means that he hopes not to have to betray himself before Achish. The matter is taken out of his hands in the next chapter.

28:3-6 The Lord does not answer Saul. We are again told that Samuel has died, a fact which, along with Saul's banishing of fortune-tellers (according to Deut 18:10-14), severely limits Saul's knowledge of God's will as he faces his enemy. Seeing himself outnumbered, Saul is afraid, something that is never said of David. David is, however, said to be afraid of Saul (23:15). Again, as in 14:37, Saul is left without divine direction, a disadvantage David never had to contend with.

28:7-14 Saul seeks a medium. The name "fortune-teller" in Hebrew is a form of the verb "to know." In contrast to Achish, who will know (v. 2) what David will do, Saul does not know what the Lord will do and goes to one who knows to find out. Although it means breaking his own regulation, Saul in his great fear, seeks out such a medium. At once she parries his request with the statement that Saul—or anyone in Israel—knows that it is a capital offense to practice divination. As soon as she brings up Samuel, she knows who her petitioner is. Her scream of recognition has echoed down the ages in music and literature.

28:15-19 Saul finds out what he wants to know. Samuel, showing surprise that Saul has not accepted the departure of the Lord from him, repeats the divine rejection of his kingship. Saul is being punished here for the failure to slay Agag (ch. 15). Israel will fall before the Philistines, as will Saul and his sons. The reluctant answer from Samuel tells Saul all that he would rather not know.

28:20-25 The kindness of the medium. Taking a cue from Samuel's declaration that Saul had disobeyed the word of the Lord in verse 18, the author now begins a play on the word "obey." When the woman sees that Saul has fallen to the ground in weakness, she reminds him that up to now she has obeyed him (v. 21). In turn, he must obey her (v. 22) when she insists on preparing him some food. With his companions urging him, Saul obeys (v. 23) and he is given a feast of a fatted calf (compare Luke 15:23, 27). It is Saul's last banquet before his death in the next day's battle.

29:1-11 Achish reluctantly dismisses David. As they had been when the ark was lost, the Philistines are again encamped at Aphek (4:1), ready to fight against Israel. Achish had ordered David and his men to go out with him in 28:21, showing that his trust in David was firm. However, the other Philistine chiefs remember David's history of slaying thousands of their men (v. 5; 18:6-7; 21:11-12) and realistically assess his presence among them as an opportunity for David to ingratiate himself with Saul by turning on them from the rear.

Achish's speech in which he sends David back is flattering, to the point of calling David an angel of God (compare 2 Sam 14:17; 19:28). When Achish finds nothing wrong with David, he is in the tradition of Potiphar and his jailer, both of whom found nothing wrong with Joseph and who trusted Joseph enough to leave everything in his charge (Gen 39:6, 23). David inspires the same confidence in Achish. It is high praise for both David and Joseph from foreigners. Fellow Israelites were not so easily captivated.

David asks Achish why he cannot go out to fight against "the enemies of my lord the king" (v. 8). His words can refer to Achish or to King Saul (compare 28:2). Here David has again adroitly escaped with his friendship with Achish intact.

30:1-10 The Amalekite raid on Ziklag. Although Saul's devastation of the Amalekites in chapter 15 should have rendered them powerless, they now take their revenge by sacking the city Achish had given David. Instead of being put under the ban, as Saul had been ordered to do, Ziklag's occupants were fortunately taken alive. Before they know this, the narrative builds the sorrow of the returning soldiers to a crescendo with the recounting of their weeping until exhausted, the information that David's two wives were among the captured, and finally the extreme bitterness of the men toward David to the point that they were ready to stone him, a rare sign of popular disenchantment with David. In turning to the Lord, David acknowledges that God is the source of his strength and success.

In obedience to the oracle received through the ephod (v. 8), David pursues Amalek, leaving two hundred of his weariest soldiers guarding the baggage. They will have a significant role in the distribution of the spoil (vv. 21-25).

30:11-16 The abandoned Egyptian. David receives providential help in the person of the sick Egyptian slave left behind by the Amalekites. In return for food, drink, and asylum, the Egyptian brings him to the carousing Amalekites. He joins a lengthening list of David's helpers: Michal, Jonathan, and Ahimelech, all of whom appear at the crucial moment.

30:17-25 David recovers the Ziklag captives. After an untold number of Amalekites are slaughtered, all the captives and possessions from Ziklag are rescued. David immediately faces another challenge from his own men in their unwillingness to share the spoil with those left behind with the baggage (v. 10). The ones who complained are called stingy and worthless (v. 22), but it is of such that David's small army was made (22:2). He must continually encourage them to trust in the Lord (23:1-5) and do good to their fellow soldiers out of gratitude to him (30:23). David's quick, sure decision to share the spoil among all members of his army becomes a precedent for Israel (v. 25).

30:26-31 The division of the spoil. David shows himself an astute politician by sending gifts from the booty to the Judean settlements in the Negeb where David was already known. These gifts could be means of gaining acceptance later when David is considered for the kingship after the death of Saul (2 Sam 2:1-4).

31:1-8 How Saul and Jonathan died. The happy picture of David sharing the spoils of the Amalekite victory gives way to the darker picture of Saul and the Israelite army fleeing and falling wounded before the Philistines. Once again David's fortunes rise as Saul goes into decline, both as king and human being.

Ignoring battle details, the narrative section, which begins and ends on Mount Gilboa (vv. 1-8), repeats its notice of the slaying of Saul's three sons and the finding (hit) of Saul (vv. 2, 3, 8), the coming of the uncircumcised/the Philistine (vv. 4, 7, 8), the fleeing of the Israelites (vv. 1, 7), and the discovery of Saul's death first by the armor-bearer and then by the Israelites (vv. 5, 7). In concentric fashion these events enclose the central message of Saul's death (v. 6). The literary embellishment heightens the pathos and significance of the event.

31:9-13 Mercy for the bodies of the slain. The Philistines desecrate Saul's body in three ways: they cut off his head, knowing that any mutilation of a corpse is a horror to Israelites; they strip him literally and figuratively of his glory as a soldier by taking his armor and putting it in their temple; lastly, they do the unforgivable: they impale his body on the city wall. Trophies of war hung in a house of worship apparently credit the god with victory (compare 5:2; 21:10).

While the burning of the bodies is usually abhorrent, it is here a mercy since no further atrocities can be done with them. Their proper burial (v. 13) means they are in peace.

Saul's body returns to Jabesh, the scene of his first victory after being anointed king (ch. 11). The man who was to save Israel from the Philistines (9:16) has himself fallen into their hands.

COMMENTARY: 2 SAMUEL

V. THE STRUGGLE FOR THE KINGDOM

2 Sam 1-8

After the death of Saul, David does not seize power, but waits for the Lord to give him the kingship. David rejects Saul's crown offered by the Amalekite messenger, but after being anointed by the Judeans (ch. 2) does accept the allegiance of the north brought him by Abner, Saul's former general. Although this plan is frustrated by Abner's death at the hand of Joab, the last obstacle to kingship over a united Israel is removed by events beyond David's control (chs. 4-5). Once king, David consolidates both his religious and political position by bringing back the ark of the covenant to the new capital in Jerusalem. All Israel is then a divine gift to David who, despite temporary setbacks, prospers under God's blessing and protection.

1:1-16 The Amalekite's report to David. "Death" is a word used eight times in this section, beginning with the death of Saul and ending with David's execution of the Amalekite who brought him Saul's crown and armlet as testimony of his death. If the Amalekite expected a reward from a man he supposed ambitious for the kingship, he is gravely mistaken. Instead of gratitude, he earns death for claiming to have slain an anointed king. David is here consistent in his remarkable reverence for anyone the Lord had anointed, as he demonstrated in 1 Sam 24:7 and 26:9.

1:17-27 The fall of the mighty. The Hebrew word for "warrior," which also appears in translation as "valiant" (v. 22) or "stronger" (v. 23), is the key word for David's elegy. The repeated "fallen" and "slain" underline its somber mood, while David's special love for Jonathan is emphasized in verse 26. Instructions to keep the news from the Philistine women who might rejoice over the slain is contrasted in verse 24 with orders for the Israelite women to weep over Saul and remember his kindnesses to them. Dew and rain are summoned to share the mourning by not appearing on the mountains where the slain lie (v. 21). Saul's neglected shield, no longer anointed with oil, symbolizes the rejection of Saul's own anointing.

2:1-7 David's announcement of kingship. Instead of his birthplace, Bethlehem (1 Sam 16:1), the Lord directs David to Hebron from where he includes, in a message of gratitude, the announcement that he has been anointed king over Judah. Since the area around Hebron was part of the traditional Calebite allotment, David may have gained control of property in Hebron through his marriage to Abigail, widow of the Calebite Nabal (Josh 14:13; 1 Sam 25:3).

2:8-11 Israel follows Saul's son Ishbaal. Not the Lord, but Abner, his own general, makes Ishbaal king over all Israel, except for David's territory in Judah. Such political weakness in Ishbaal is portentous for David's future.

2:12-24 The three sons of Zeruiah. A symbolic but indecisive combat between the Israelites under Abner and the Judahites under Joab, David's general, escalates to full battle. After the Israelite defeat, Asahel, brother of Joab and Abishai (v. 18), refuses to give up. Compulsively, he pursues Abner who tries to dissuade him, knowing that if he kills Asahel he will be liable to blood vengeance. When Abner is forced to stop Asahel with his javelin, Joab and Abishai continue the pursuit. The introduction of the three brothers, cousins to David, begins in violence and is associated with it throughout their lives.

2:25-32 Benjamin and Judah count their losses. The story has moved from one bloody confrontation in Gibeon to another in Geba. Although the losses of Benjamin are far greater than those of Judah, both sides are grateful to return to their respective camps.

3:1-6 The house of Saul and the house of David. The house of Saul weakens as the house of David grows stronger, a process marked by the death of Saul's sons in contrast to the fertility of David, whose six wives produced as many children. Only three of these—Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah—will figure in the biblical narrative.

3:7-11 The matter of Rizpah, the concubine. Abner's relationship with Ishbaal's concubine Rizpah, more than an insult to a superior, could be read as a bid for the throne. However, Abner refrains from a coup, recognizing David as the predicted leader of Israel (vv. 9-10).

3:12-21 Abner and David make a covenant. With Abner's defection, all the tribes of Israel associated with Saul are ready to come under David's rule. But David makes the return of his wife Michal, Saul's daughter, the condition of his agreement. Without any compassion for Paltiel, to say nothing of the feelings of Michal, the painful deed is done, clearing the way for serious negotiations between Abner and David. Abner refers to no known biblical passage when he quotes the Lord as saying David will deliver Israel from the Philistines (v. 18). Rather this was promised of Saul (1 Sam 9:16), had he obeyed the Lord (1 Sam 13:13-14). The narrative underlines that Abner departed in peace (vv. 21-24), but it was not a peace that was to last.

3:22-30 Joab's zeal. Abner's insubordination to Ishbaal (vv. 8-10) is mild compared to Joab's attack on David for making an agreement with Abner. Joab says in effect, "How could you let an obvious enemy get away?" Then, without orders, Joab dispatches Abner in cold blood (v. 27), not the last time Joab will act with violence for the good of the state. Substituting vindictiveness and frustration for actual punishment, David delivers a dire curse on Joab and his posterity (v. 29). Presumably impressed by David's outburst, Joab submits to David's order to mourn Abner publicly.

3:31-39 The burial of Abner. David's distress over Abner's death can be felt in the bitter elegy he composed for the funeral. This and the king's extravagant mourning (v. 32) convince the people that David had not ordered Abner's execution. David's acknowledged weakness before Joab is a persistent puzzle in the narrative (v. 39). It required him to endure a man who was a continual thorn in his side at the same time that David owed Joab much of the success of his wars and his rule.

4:1-4 The successors of Saul. With only the crippled grandson Meribbaal left to the house of Saul, besides the frightened Ishbaal, the Israelites can look for no effective leadership from within the northern tribes. Little seems to stand in the way of David's kingship.

4:5-12 The murder of Ishbaal. With Ishbaal demoralized and security lax, it is easy for the two murderers to enter the royal bedroom. Understandably, they see Ishbaal's rule as effectively ended, but they hardly expect David not to welcome their gift of his head. It is a second example of David's refusal to seize the kingdom through violent means (compare 1:1-16).

The execution of the two men, cruel to us, is done according to the law in Deut 21:22f. As the Philistines treated Saul (1 Sam 31:9), so are the slayers of his son treated.

5:1-5 King of all Israel. When the Israelite (northern) tribes come to anoint David king, they have two motivations. First, they claim him as brother (their bone and flesh), a condition for kingship required to prevent foreign rule (see Deut 17:15). Second, they recall David's military leadership (1 Sam 18:16) and the divine promise that David's throne would be established over both Israel and Judah (3:10). Thus he becomes king over an externally united nation, but one whose internal conflicts are never very far below the surface.

5:6-16 A city and a house for the new king. The account of how David made Jerusalem, previously held by pagan Jebusites, his capital is truncated and confused. Despite Jerusalem's reputation of being impregnable (the blind and the lame could defend it), David is able to take it after Joab courageously climbs the water shaft to gain access to the city. This information comes from 1 Chr 11:6, which adds that David rewarded Joab for his bravery by making him commander of his troops.

David's new capital is, for political purposes, ideally situated, since it is on the border between two chief tribes of his kingdom: Judah and Benjamin. Once settled, David has the leisure and resources to build himself a palace. From his friend Hiram of Tyre, David sends for cedar and workmen, just as his son Solomon will later do for the building of the temple (1 Kgs 7).

5:17-25 The Lord goes before David in battle. Success has not yet gone to David's head, for he continues to consult the Lord before going into battle with the Philistines who now seem to resent David's new power. After the first rout of the enemy, David names the place Baal-perazim (literally, "lord of the breaking through"), a play on words referring to the Lord's breaking through the enemy lines so that both the Philistine soldiers and the gods they left behind are scattered (vv. 20-21; compare Gen 38:29).

At the Philistines' second attack, it is the Lord who directs the defense by ordering a rear attack by Israel and by giving an audible sign (v. 24) that the Lord is leading the march. Saul never had the advantage of such tangible support.

6:1-10 The striking of Uzzah. The transfer of the ark is told in fuller detail in 1 Chr 13 and 15, whence we learn in 13:6 that Baala of Judah is another name for Kiriath-jearim, where the ark was left (1 Sam 7:1-2). The joyful procession of thirty thousand (!) is interrupted by the unexpected death of Uzzah when he touches the ark (v. 6). David, upset by the event, leaves the ark at the home of Obededom, significantly identified as from the Philistine city of Gath. If the ark is to bring destruction to the Israelites, let it stay with the Philistines, David's action seems to say. Although this account makes no attempt to explain Uzzah's death, in 1 Chr 15:13 David attributes the Lord's anger to the absence of the priests and Levites.

6:11-19 David brings the ark to Jerusalem. When the king hears of the blessings to Obededom's house, he ventures another transport. In the festal procession David, clothed only with the linen ephod used by priests at liturgical functions, distinguishes himself by his energetic dancing (v. 14). It is a time for joy, music, and the giving of gifts (v. 19). By the transfer of the ark to Jerusalem, that city is established as the religious and political capital of Israel.

6:20-23 The scorn of Michal. For the third time, the presence of the ark brings trouble (1 Sam 6:19; 2 Sam 6:6-7). The Lord, whose presence is said to dwell in the ark, indicates in this way that he is free to dwell wherever he will and not necessarily at the desire of the king. Now David meets another reversal: the scorn of Michal for what she considers his immodest dancing (v. 20). David's wounding retort reminds her that the Lord has rejected her father's house. Her punishment is to remain childless, in that society a woman's greatest reproach (compare 1 Sam 1).

7:1-17 The house of the Lord and the house of David. In peace with all the nations round about, David has the leisure to turn to internal matters, including the public worship of God. In the ancient world a god was truly established when he had a fitting house. Nathan's immediate approval of David's plan to build the Lord a house is revoked by a nocturnal oracle. That the Lord does not communicate directly with David but through Nathan underlines the continued importance of prophecy in relation to the monarchy.

Pointing with pride to his simple tent-dwelling while Israel sojourned in the desert, the Lord turns David's good intentions around. The Lord himself will build a house for David, a house in the sense of dynasty, one that will rule forever (v. 13). In an elaborate play on the word, "house" means palace (v. 1), a dwelling (vv. 2, 5, 6, 7), royal dynasty (vv. 11, 16), and temple (v. 13). Reminding David of his humble beginnings, the Lord unconditionally promises him a great name (v. 9) and a firmly established throne (vv. 13, 16). The prediction that David's son will build a temple comes to realization under Solomon (1 Kgs 8). For another account of the dynastic promise, see 1 Chr 28:1-10.

This passage has been interpreted as the Lord's personal covenant with David. By it the Lord's direct rule over Israel is replaced with a human king, chosen by God, whose posterity will continue to occupy the throne for all generations. Samuel's previously hostile attitude toward allowing Israel to be like other nations has been changed to divine endorsement of the Davidic kingship as well as the establishment of its sure dynastic succession. This text, along with Ps 89 and 1 Chr 17, is the biblical rationale for the royal theology according to which the king was the Lord's representative in bringing Israel victory and blessings.

7:18-29 David praises the Lord. In grateful response to the Lord's promise, David contrasts his own littleness to the Lord's greatness (vv. 18, 19, 22). The Lord is the only God and Israel is his specially favored people (vv. 22, 23). As the Lord did in verse 6, David also recalls Israel's deliverance from slavery in Egypt (v. 23). Then, in a covenant renewal, David reaffirms Israel as the Lord's people and the Lord as their God (v. 24), closing with a prayer for the Lord's blessing (v. 29).

8:1-14 David's victories. This chapter could be called "David strikes" because the verb, variously translated, "defeat," "attack," and "slay," appears in verses 1, 2, 3, 5, 9, 13. The list of victories begins with the Philistines and continues through the countries bordering Israel. The range of conquests includes Moab, Aram (Syria), and Edom.

That David had use for only one hundred chariot horses shows his army inferior in equipment to those of his enemies. However, the plentiful booty enriched David with shields (v. 7), articles of gold, silver, and bronze (vv. 8, 10), all of which were consecrated to the Lord (v. 11).

8:15-18 The heads of government. Besides being a military leader, David governs and administers justice (compare 15:1-6). Joab commands the army and Benaiah the Cherethites and Pelethites, believed to be Cretans and Philistines (see 15:18). By using foreign mercenaries, ancient kings knew how to protect themselves from palace coups.

VI. DAVID THE KING

2 Sam 9–20

David sits on the throne in Jerusalem at peace with his neighbors. Assured of a lasting dynasty (ch. 7), he seeks to do good with his increasing power and wealth. In a moment of passion David breaks the law, bringing on himself divine punishment which escalates from his family to threaten even his throne. These chapters comprise a narrative unit, called the Court Narrative because it tells the story of David's life as king. It is thought to be a separate tradition from those about Saul and David called the Late Source. There are however narrative links in chapters 9–20 to earlier themes, for example, the influence of Joab on David and the recurrent division between the northern and southern tribes, which speak against complete independence of the sources.

9:1-13 David fulfills his oath. A prosperous David remembers his covenant and friendship with Jonathan by looking for descendants to whom he may show kindness. With such close ties to Saul's house, it is strange that David should have to ask if there were any Saulides alive. However, if the events recorded in chapter 21, where David spared Meribbaal when he handed over two sons and five grandsons to the Gibeonite vengeance, took place before those recorded in chapter 9, we can more easily understand why only Meribbaal was left.

When the crippled son of Jonathan, Saul's grandson, is brought to David's court from the house of Machir (see 17:27), David goes out of his way to make Meribbaal feel welcome. Although he protests he is a dead dog—an expression of political and psychological inferiority—Meribbaal becomes part of David's household and has the honor of eating at his table. Ziba, his servant, is assigned to run the family farm, which would provide for them all, including Ziba's fifteen sons and twenty servants.

In doing this David fulfills his oath and shows that he has little to fear from this Saulide. Twice the narrator mentions that Meribbaal is crippled, saying in effect that he is unqualified for kingship (vv. 3, 13). It is then doubtful that making Meribbaal part of his household was a means of keeping an eye on a possible conspirator to the throne. Against this is the allegation of treason that Ziba implies when David's throne is in jeopardy (16:1-4).

10:1-5 David and the Ammonites. David continues his good works, here extending condolences to the Ammonite king on the death of his father. But things turn out adversely due to the negative advice of the young king's advisors. By shaving the beard and exposing the nakedness of David's emissaries, Nahash delivers the ultimate insult. David is considerate and allows the men to stay in Jericho until their beards grow again.

10:6-12 Joab leads the defense against Ammon. Expecting reprisal, the Ammonites prepare to attack first, with the help of Aramean mercenaries. After skillfully arranging his troops for defense, Joab encourages them to fight bravely and leave the outcome to the Lord. The success of battle will then be the typical biblical combination of human effort and the power of God.

10:13-19 The defeat of the Ammonites and Arameans. When the Arameans flee before Joab, their Ammonite allies do likewise before the rest of the troops under Joab's brother Abishai (v. 10). The victory is only temporary, for the Arameans, having gathered fresh recruits from sympathetic rulers beyond the Euphrates, try again to conquer Israel. David now takes the field himself, wipes out the enemy and makes subjects of the Arameans. This account marks the high point of David's military exploits.

11:1-15 David and Bathsheba. While the army is besieging Rabbah, David has little to do but take naps and walk about on his roof. On one such idle afternoon, he sees the beautiful Bathsheba and sends for her. In an extended play on the word "send," the author has David "send" frequently in chapters 10 and 11, alerting the reader to his full royal powers. However, Bathsheba also sends when she informs David she is pregnant (v. 5), and Joab, too, sends Uriah back from the front lines (v. 6).

Not even the information that Bathsheba was the wife of one of his army officers deters David from possessing her. Once he knows she is pregnant, he begins an elaborate intrigue to cover his paternity. When he asks Uriah the triple question about how are Joab, the people, and the war, it is so much talk masking his real purpose to make Uriah go down to his house to his wife.

This attempt is made for three nights (vv. 8, 10, 13), but Uriah sleeps with the king's servants instead. When David asks why, Uriah's amazing answer painfully contrasts the king's evil designs with the moral uprightness of his loyal soldier. On the third evening, although David has made Uriah drunk, he persists in avoiding his house. The frustrated David then devises a way out of his dilemma by instigating Uriah's death under cloak of battle. The irony is that David sends the instructions to Joab in a letter carried by the victim himself.

11:16-27 David arranges Uriah's death. The instructions David gives Joab are not carried out exactly as given. David had intended for Uriah alone to be slain and for the deed to look like an accident. Joab, understandably concerned for his reputation as military tactician, entices the men of Rabbah to attack, causing some Israelites to be slain, among them Uriah.

Now Joab, anticipating the wrath of David for the deviation, prepares his messenger carefully for a possible angry reaction. What David does say gives not only a look at how wars were then fought but what was going on in Joab's mind. For example, the warning about letting the troops go too near city walls recalls Abimelech's shameful death in similar circumstances at the hand of a woman (v. 21; Judg 9:50-54). Joab may be letting David know how Uriah's death actually took place.

David's response is unexpectedly mild. Things like this happen in war, he says, and the sword devours indiscriminately (v. 25). David will later be very much concerned whom the sword devours when it is a matter of his sons. Here he responds as to a run-of-the-mill war report, with appropriate messages to keep up the siege and be of good courage.

After delaying over the scene between the messenger and David, the narrative regains speed at the telling of Bathsheba's mourning for Uriah, her marriage to David and the birth of their son, all in verses 26-27. The adultery and murder completed, the Lord's judgment comes at last: the thing David did was evil in the Lord's eyes (v. 27). This judgment is the key for what follows.

12:1-7a "You are the man!" Now it is the Lord's turn to send. The power-drunk David is about to be brought to his senses. Nathan, the prophet who brought the promise of David's lasting kingdom (7:16), now conveys the Lord's disapproval. In a parable Nathan tells of a poor man (Uriah) whose beloved lamb (Bathsheba) has been appropriated by a rich man (David). The picture of the lamb's intimate daily life with its master reflects the happy marriage David has usurped in selfishness and cruelty. Although nothing is said in the parable about murder, David breaks in with a decree that the rich man shall die. When he adds that the thief shall make fourfold restitution, he inadvertently foreshadows the loss of his own four sons (12:18; 13:28; 18:15; 1 Kgs 2:24-25).

12:7b-15a The sword over David's house. Nathan, reporting the words of the Lord, recites all the benefits given David: the kingship over both Judah and Israel, the harem of the deceased Saul, a fact not made known before. Was this not enough? The Lord would have added more, had David asked (v. 8), so pleased was the Lord with this divine favorite. David was like a spoiled son for whom not enough can be done. Now he has betrayed the Lord's generosity by despising his word (v. 9).

The punishment Nathan outlines comes in reverse order to the deeds. Because of the murder, the sword will not depart from David's house. Because he took Bathsheba, his friend (identity not disclosed) will lie with the king's wives. As David had done this secretly, the punishment will take place before all. At David's humble admission of sin, Nathan replies that the Lord has already forgiven him. The death David deserved will not be his but that of Bathsheba's yet-to-be-born child.

12:15b-25 David prays for his son's life. Although David adds to his prayer fasting and sleeping on the ground (an ironic touch in view of David's concern for sleeping in chapter 11), the child becomes ill and dies. David in effect has mourned in advance and when death is confirmed, surprises his household by rising, washing, dressing, and eating. From all these an Israelite in mourning ordinarily abstained; by ignoring them David shows his independence of established ritual as well as his acceptance of the child's death (compare 1 Sam 21:1-7).

After David consoles Bathsheba, now his wife, the Lord blesses their union with another son. The divine approval is signaled by the sending of Nathan to add the name Jedidiah, or "beloved," to the name already given him, Solomon. The Lord's love for Solomon will be proved by his accession to the throne after David (1 Kgs 1).

12:26-31 David conquers Rabbah. Rather than take the besieged city of Rabbah himself, Joab sends for David to claim it. Along with the gold crown of the Ammonite deity Milcom, David takes much booty and many captives whom he puts into service. From David's military victories, the story now turns to David the king and father.

13:1-22 The rape of Tamar. Absalom, David's third son, dominates the chapter because of his relationship to Tamar, whom his half-brother Amnon loves. The "love" turns out to be an irrational passion that has made Amnon ill. Taking his cue from this, Amnon's clever advisor Jonadab urges him to use the "illness" as an excuse to bring David to visit him.

David suspects nothing in Amnon's request to have Tamar bake cakes for a sick brother. Once Tamar has the food ready and the room has been cleared (v. 9), Amnon, instead of eating, demands that she lie with him. By using the word "lie" in verses 5, 6, 8, 11, 14, the narrator recalls David's lying with Bathsheba and Uriah's refusal to lie in his own house (ch. 11). The reiteration of "brother" and "sister" stresses the evil that is corroding David's own family.

Tamar makes a poignant and eloquent plea to Amnon not to commit an intolerable crime (literally "folly") in Israel, but Amnon will not listen to her sensible arguments. His passion spent, Amnon's underlying hatred surfaces. Where before he had sent all his servants out (v. 9), now he calls his servant to throw Tamar out (v. 17). Tamar pleads not to be humiliated further; again Amnon refuses. His sending her away is the reverse of David's sending for Bathsheba (11:4). In grief, Tamar tears the special garment that marks her a princess and ultimately finds a home with Absalom. David, though very angry when he hears of the deed, makes no move against his first-born. Absalom's silent anger however has an air of foreboding.

13:23-39 Absalom punishes Amnon. Patient but determined, Absalom waits two years to settle the score with the hated Amnon for a crime his father had failed to punish. As Absalom usurps his father's prerogative, David is seen as gradually losing his control over his children.

A false report that all the sons were slain (v. 30) causes David to fear the worst. The strangely knowledgeable Jonadab explains that only Amnon was killed. Here David is typical of many powerful leaders who suffer isolation from their subordinates' plans. As with Amnon (v. 21), David does nothing to Absalom who is allowed to flee unchecked to his paternal grandfather in the non-Israelite region of Geshur (compare Gen 34).

14:1-24 The wise woman of Tekoa. When Joab judges the time is right, he engages a woman skilled in speech and acting to instigate Absalom's return. Like Nathan's parable (12:1-6), her story must bring David to make a judgment on a case close to the king's actual situation but with enough difference to offset suspicion until it is too late. Like David's, the woman's story includes two sons who have quarreled and as a result one has been killed. There are two differences: her son's death was not premeditated murder as was Amnon's, and her family is demanding blood vengeance, as David's is not. Both have the problem of saving the surviving son, in the woman's case because he is the only one to provide posterity, and in David's, Absalom is the heir to the throne.

When David promises to protect her son, she immediately makes a correlation with David's situation. Unaware, the king has judged himself, because what he will do for her son, he will not do for his own (v. 13). The woman presses her point: God does not bring the dead to life but devises ways of returning the banished. If the king would protect her son from death by an avenger, so should he provide a home for Absalom (v. 17).

To win David over, the woman has used disguise (v. 2), homage (v. 4), metaphor (v. 7), and outright flattery (vv. 17, 20). (Compare 1 Sam 29:10; 2 Sam 19:27.) At last David recognizes the hand of Joab in the charade, but he is not angry. Joab's ruse permits him to bring back Absalom for the face-saving reason that the country needs the heir to the throne. However, Absalom returns to Jerusalem not completely reconciled to his father, for David refuses him presence at court.

14:25-27 Absalom's beauty. To fill in the passage of time before David's next contact with Absalom, the narrator concentrates on Absalom's beauty and the weight of his hair. This should alert us to possible trouble, because Bathsheba and Tamar were also beautiful and both had trouble because of it.

14:28-33 Absalom reconciled to David. Once again Absalom bides his time for two years (compare 13:23) before bringing his frustration into the open. We are not told the reasons why Joab who engineered Absalom's return should refuse to come when summoned or why Absalom chose to resort to aggressive means to bring Joab to him. The violence of Absalom's character is apparent in this and in his willingness to have David kill him should the king find him guilty (v. 32).

In Absalom's reunion with his father, there is not a word of welcome or forgiveness, only a kiss. Is it the kiss of one who will betray him (compare Luke 22:48)?

15:1-6 Absalom the politician. Absalom now adopts a high profile with chariots, horses, and men to run before him. By touting himself as a judge for litigants who come to Jerusalem, and by fawning on those from the northern tribes, Absalom works to widen the breach between the North and the South in Israel. The picture is of a person of great vanity and treachery.

15:7-12 David tricked a third time. As he was duped in allowing Tamar to go to Amnon (13:5-7) and Amnon to Absalom (13:26-27), David again lets the sword threaten his house by permitting Absalom to go to Hebron. Absalom's reason for going, the fulfillment of a vow he made in Geshur, is one with which the king can hardly quarrel (v. 8). Why Absalom could not have worshipped in Jerusalem, David never challenges, possibly because Hebron was the place of Absalom's birth (3:2-3) and where David was made king over Israel (5:3). These considerations make Hebron both a logical and ironic place for Absalom to rally his followers. When David's counselor Ahithophel defects to Absalom, the conspiracy is launched.

15:13-18a The loyalty of David's officers. The gravity of Absalom's threat is reflected in David's immediate decision, on hearing of the treason, to flee Jerusalem. All David's officers prepare to depart. By noting that ten concubines are left to guard the house, the narrator anticipates another fulfillment of Nathan's prophecy (12:11). On David's sorrowful journey out of Jerusalem, the party stops first opposite the ascent of the Mount of Olives (the scene of Jesus' via dolorosa, compare Luke 22:39). It is the first of seven stations.

15:18b-23 The loyalty of a foreigner. As his people pass before him heading east out of Jerusalem, David stops to urge Ittai of Gath to go back to the king, referring not to himself but to Absalom in Jerusalem. Ittai's loyal determination to stay for life or death (v. 21) counterbalances Absalom's treachery. After this second station, David crosses the Kidron (compare John 18:1).

15:24-31 The arrival of the ark. The sorrowful procession is brought to a halt a third time when the priests Zadok and Abiathar appear with the ark. Perhaps with Shiloh in mind (1 Sam 4:4-11), David sends the ark back in the hope that the Lord will once more let him see it in Jerusalem (v. 25). Resigned though he may be to whatever is in store for him, David does not fail to use the priests and their sons as a source of intelligence about Absalom's activities in Jerusalem.

David continues up the Mount of Olives, weeping and barefoot. The heads of all are covered as a sign of deep sorrow. When the king is told that his advisor has joined Absalom, David for the first time prays publicly for Ahithophel's counsel to be frustrated (v. 31).

15:32-37 Hushai sent on a mission. David and the people have now reached the summit of the Mount of Olives where we are told, significantly, that people used to worship God (v. 32). At this fourth station help comes to David in the form of his friend and confidant Hushai (see 1 Chr 27:33). As with the ark, David does not keep him by his side but sends Hushai to counter Ahithophel's counsel to Absalom.

16:1-4 Ziba brings gifts. The tide of adversity begins to turn for David as he descends from the mountaintop. Stopping for the fifth time, David is met by Meribbaal's servant Ziba (9:2-4; 9-10) with three kinds of provisions: transport, food, and drink. Offering no sign of gratitude, David on inquiring learns that Meribbaal is waiting in Jerusalem to be made king. Without further investigation of this treasonous charge, David impulsively gives all Meribbaal's estate to Ziba. Later Meribbaal will attempt to exonerate himself (19:25-31), but David's touchiness at what may be a resurgence of the house of Saul underlines the persistent threat of secession by the North.

16:5-14 Shimei curses and stones David. The sixth stopping place on David's flight from Jerusalem brings the king into confrontation with another Saulide, also treacherous but more hostile. Shimei of Bahurim brings on David the greatest public humiliation he has yet suffered, but to David none of the cursing and stoning compares with the pain of Absalom's rebellion (v. 11). Shimei rejoices that David's bloody history (referring perhaps to the events of 21:1-14) have brought him the Lord's punishment (v. 8), while David, refusing Abishai's offer to behead Shimei, accepts patiently what the Lord has allowed, hoping his trial will win compensation later (v. 12). Mourning, humiliation, doubt, and betrayal have dogged David's journey since leaving Jerusalem. The support of his people, the loyalty of Ittai, and the promise of help from Hushai and the priests' sons (15:36) are the only bright spots. Exhausted, king and people arrive at the Jordan, the seventh station.

16:15-23 Absalom and his counselors. Back in Jerusalem, Absalom holds a council of war. Hushai joins the enemy camp with cries of "Long live the king!" Absalom's vanity urges him to assume "the king" means himself, but he nevertheless questions Hushai's transfer of loyalty. (For a similar play on misunderstood words, see 1 Sam 28:1-2.)

The devotion Hushai now offers to the one "whom the Lord and all Israel have chosen" (v. 18) is likewise understood by Absalom to mean himself. With these two seeming assurances, it needs only Hushai's pledge to serve Absalom as he did his father to convince Absalom of Hushai's sincerity.

Before Hushai's counsel is sought, Absalom obeys Ahithophel's instructions to take David's concubines. This astute political move to claim the kingship will deal a death blow to any hope of reconciliation between father and son (compare 3:6-11). The tent on the roof recalls David's portentous stroll on the roof of his palace (11:1) and the prophecy that David's neighbor would take his wives in broad daylight (12:11). With tongue in cheek, the narrator comments on the high regard both David and Absalom had for Ahithophel's counsel (v. 23).

17:1-14 Ahithophel and Hushai counsel Absalom. Perceptively analyzing David's situation, Ahithophel advises Absalom to move quickly and silently against the weary king. The discouragement of David's followers will cause panic and flight, leaving the king alone and exposed. With David out of the way, the people can be brought over to Absalom in peace. Ahithophel's apt simile for this, the return of a bride to her husband, is the only flattery for Absalom's swollen ego, but it brings initial agreement for his plan.

As if to show off his new counselor, Absalom asks Hushai to speak as well. Making the most of his chance, Hushai diplomatically suggests that while Ahithophel usually gives good counsel, this time it falls short. Hushai describes effusively David's prowess in war, his tactical skill, the courage of his men, warning that failure on the first attack will discourage Absalom's men. All Israel should therefore be called out and Absalom himself lead the army. Since Ahithophel's plan had not given the prince a role in the pursuit, this alternative must have proved highly attractive to Absalom.

Hushai's elaborate picture of a victory in which all Israel falls upon David and drags the city harboring him into a gorge blinds Absalom and his followers to the unreality of the scheme. The narrator comments that Ahithophel's effective plan was rejected because the Lord planned Absalom's ruin (v. 14).

17:15-22 David crosses the Jordan. Hushai must have feared that Ahithophel's plan could still be adopted, for he urges David not to tarry on this side of the Jordan. The two priests' sons, with the help of a clever woman much like Rahab (see Josh 2), are able to deliver the message in time. David and his people spend the night crossing the Jordan, a move that means both separation and safety.

17:23-29 Help for David. Ahithophel knows that Hushai's plan will bring defeat for Absalom and the rebels. It is not the disappointment of personal rejection that leads him to suicide. Ahithophel is a realist who gambled for high stakes and lost. His is not a shameful death, since he was buried in the family grave. Malefactors earned a pile of stones (compare Josh 7:25-26; 2 Sam 18:17).

Well ahead of Absalom, David reaches Mahanaim (see Gen 32:1-3, 11). Necessary and welcome provisions for David's weary men are brought by the Ammonite prince Shobi, by Machir who had housed Meribbaal before David brought him to Jerusalem (9:4), and by Barzillai, a wealthy adherent of Saul's. This unexpected support from non-Judahites helps restore the strength and courage of the fugitives.

18:1-5 David pleads for Absalom. David's battle preparations include dividing the army into three commands: Joab, Abishai, and the newly arrived Ittai of Gath with his men (15:18-22). Ittai's support may have been decisive because of the large number of soldiers lost to Absalom.

David's bid to lead the soldiers into battle is politely refused, either because they were aware that the king was a target for capture or because they wanted to spare him a confrontation with Absalom. David, who was once praised for slaying tens of thousands (1 Sam 18:7; 29:5), is touchingly told he is worth tens of thousands—behind the lines. Before departing, the soldiers and their commanders hear David's clear request not to harm Absalom.

18:6-18 Absalom defeated. The brief notice of the battle in which David's men are victorious (vv. 6-8) tells of heavy casualties caused by the treacherous forest more than by actual fighting. As with many biblical battles, natural forces—mud, hornets or disease—often bring hostilities to an end. The victory is not to those who fight as much as to the Lord who moves events according to the divine will.

The aftermath is far more dramatic than the battle itself. Absalom is caught by his head in a tree, as the loyal soldier and the disobedient Joab argue about who will kill him (vv. 11-14). The soldier's reminder of David's charge fails to deter Joab, who like a matador places his darts in Absalom and lets his picadors finish him off. As was true with Abner (3:22-27), Joab cannot tolerate a threat to the throne. He is a man of action operating under human counsels; David, more sensitive to the will of God in his life, loves his son more than royal power. Here he is made increasingly aware of the punishing sword that Nathan predicted would never depart from his house (12:10).

With the blowing of the ram's horn (v. 16), the battle for the throne is over. The Israelites flee and Absalom is covered with a mound of stones, a malefactor's burial (compare Josh 7:26). The pillar Absalom built for himself recalls the memorial trophy of Saul (1 Sam 15:12). The notice that Absalom had no son is a direct contradiction to 14:27, which gives him three.

18:19-32 Bringing the news to David. Joab may have had in mind David's execution of the Amalekite who brought news of Saul's death (1:13-15) when he keeps Ahimaaz from running to tell David that Absalom is dead. Although Ahimaaz outruns the Cushite, he is unable on reaching David to relay the bitter truth (v. 29). With distractions about runners sighted and formal greetings (vv. 24-28), the narrative delays tantalizingly for some thirteen verses before the blow of Absalom's death crushes the king.

19:1-5 Joab reproves the grieving David. The simple repeated words "My son, Absalom my son!" convey the depths of David's grief more than any description. As before David had wept and covered his head while ascending the Mount of Olives (15:30) because of Absalom's rebellion, here he weeps with covered head (v. 5) because Absalom is dead. Instead of victory songs and rejoicing, the people have stolen back into the city like a defeated army (v. 4). The use of "stole" recalls that Absalom had stolen the hearts of the people in his attempt to win the throne from his father (15:1-6).

Joab's is the voice of reason, and of the state, in contrast to David's absorption in the death he had so hoped to avoid. Disregarding the king's grief, Joab reminds David that he is insulting the very people who have saved his life. David responds to the threatened loss of support by forcing himself to greet his people. The effects of David's sins here pass beyond his family to touch the throne. He is a beaten man, no longer the self-satisfied monarch of chapters 9 and 10, who enjoyed doing good deeds. Now he is forced to do them.

19:10-15 The return of the northern tribes. The narrative leaves the scene at Mahanaim with its half-hearted victory procession before David to what is left of Absalom's fleeing army. Leaderless and divided in their loyalties, they slowly realize that David was not the failure as king that they had once thought. When David hears they want to restore him (a frequent word in vv. 11-15), he becomes the persuasive politician, reminding them of their common kinship and promising to give Joab's command to Absalom's former general Amasa (17:25). This demotion will rankle the hot-headed Joab until he brings about his own restoration (ch. 20).

19:16-24 The apology of Shimei. This will be the first of three meetings which parallel those of David's descent from the Mount of Olives (16:1-14). The Benjaminite Shimei who had cursed and stoned David hurries to be first in bringing the king across the Jordan. The narrative by repeating the words "cross" and "escort" (the same word in Hebrew) conveys the urgency of the king's crossing.

Ziba comes with Shimei (v. 18), showing that his loyalty was with the Saulides all along. At Shimei's plea for forgiveness, Abishai again offers to take off his head, but David will suffer no vengeance on his day of victory (compare 16:9; 1 Sam 11:13). David refers to Abishai as a satan, or adversary, as Jesus did of Peter (Matt 16:21-23).

19:25-31 Meribbaal explains his absence. Blaming his delay on Ziba's betrayal, the crippled Meribbaal shows his loyalty by appearing as a mourner. Although Meribbaal claims Ziba has slandered him and flatters David by calling him an angel of God (v. 28), David answers him brusquely and reassigns him half the estate he had previously given Ziba (16:1-4). This encounter does not prove Meribbaal's loyalty, but it is telling that Meribbaal is willing to let Ziba have the whole property as long as David is safe (v. 31).

19:32-41a David tries to reward Barzillai. Although he is a Benjaminite, Barzillai has shown his allegiance to David in his gift of supplies at Mahanaim (17:27-29). Although he is a man of substance, like Nabal (1 Sam 25:2), the wise, generous Barzillai is a pleasant opposite to the foolish, stingy Nabal.

From Barzillai's protest that he is too old to enjoy life at court, we learn how ancient kings spent their days.

19:41b-44 The smoldering division. By this time all of Judah and half of Israel are with David. The Israelites, who had been reconsidering their position, accuse the Judahites of stealing David away, perhaps in an attempt to cover their own indecision. The Judahites defend themselves vigorously, despite Israelite protests that they have a greater share in the king (v. 44). David's return to Jerusalem cloaks a deeper division between the two parts of the land which will erupt decisively under David's grandson Rehoboam (1 Kgs 12).

20:1-3 Israel follows Sheba. A new leader for the dissatisfied Israelites who had recently brought David across the Jordan appears in a Benjaminite named Sheba, whom the narrator labels a rebellious individual (literally, a "son of Belial" as in 1 Sam 1:16; 10:27; 25:17; 30:22). With Sheba's cry "Every man to his tent," the men of Israel again desert David (compare 1 Kgs 12:16). Once in Jerusalem, David puts the ten dishonored concubines who had been left behind to guard the house (15:16; 16:21-22) into a guard-house (confinement) for the rest of their lives.

20:4-13 The pursuit of Sheba. David in addressing the new threat from Sheba, assigns Amasa to muster the Judahite army. When Amasa fails, David, bypassing Joab, sends Abishai in pursuit. Suddenly we find (v. 7) Joab and his men marching behind Abishai. For all David's reluctance to deal with him, Joab seems too powerful to be suppressed.

On the way, at Gibeon, Joab interrupts the pursuit to eliminate his rival Amasa with characteristic ruthlessness. By killing Amasa, Joab has rid David of one more political problem; this time we do not hear that David wept. The people standing about the dead soldier wallowing in his blood are dismayed. Only after the body is covered and removed from the highway can the pursuit of Sheba continue.

20:14-22 The wise woman of Abel Beth-maacah. When Joab called on a wise woman before in chapter 14, she was told what she was to do and say. Here a wise woman tells Joab what to do (v. 16). Their conversation is about his planned destruction of a city which is a mother in Israel, that is, a place to which Israelites in trouble can resort for advice. To prevent this, the woman is willing to sacrifice one life for her people. With the bloody murder of Amasa just accomplished, it is high irony for Joab to deny so vehemently that he wants to ruin or destroy anything (v. 20). When the woman delivers Sheba's severed head, Joab can sound the horn for retreat.

20:23-26 Government leaders. Joab is securely in command with the restored government in Jerusalem, but Abishai is strangely missing. With this list of officials, the long narrative segment contained in chapters 9 to 20 ends.

VII. APPENDICES

2 Sam 21–24

These chapters supply information about David which does not fit well into the continuous narrative of 2 Sam 9–20. David's devotion to the Lord is here highlighted so that his loyalty to the divine covenant recalls the Deuteronomistic theme of obedience to the Lord and its attendant blessings. David's life story is concluded in 1 Kgs 1–2 with Solomon's accession to the throne and David's death.

21:1-14 David relieves the famine. These events may have preceded David's taking of Meribbaal into his house (ch. 9). Here after consulting the Lord according to his usual practice (see 1 Sam 23:2, 4, 9-12; 30:7-8; 2 Sam 2:1), David is told that the blood vengeance incurred by Saul in an otherwise unknown attack must be avenged. Saul had apparently violated the covenant which the Gibeonites had tricked the Israelites into making (Josh 9:3-27) by wholesale slaughter. It is not the surviving Gibeonites but the Lord who demands restitution. The Gibeonites, however, decide the means of atonement, for which David chooses two sons of Saul and five grandsons for execution.

With a devotion like that of Antigone to her dead brother, Rizpah guards the bodies of the slain, two of whom are her own sons (v. 8). A death which involved exposure to the birds of the air and beasts of the field was considered a horror in Israel. Report of this kindness to the dead arouses David's sympathy so that he has all seven, as well as the bodies of Saul and Jonathan (1 Sam 31:11-13) buried in the tomb of Saul's father Kish (v. 14).

The account of their deaths includes two foreshadowings of the end of the famine: the barley harvest is about to begin (v. 9) and the rain is about to come (v. 10). The bodies are sacrifices to plead with the Lord for a good harvest by means of expiating past unrepented sins. The incident is an example of the Israelite idea of collective guilt for which the people suffer along with the king when he has offended God.

21:15-22 David and his heroes. There follow four short accounts of battle with Philistine giants who are equipped like Goliath (1 Sam 17:4-7). The story of Abishai's rescue of David (v. 17) shows how necessary to him were the "ruthless" sons of Zeruiah (3:39). The reference to David as the lamp of Israel indicates the soldiers' affectionate regard (compare 18:3-4). The confusion between verse 19, with its attribution of Goliath's slaying to Elhanan, and 1 Sam 17:48-51, where David is the hero, finds resolution in 1 Chr 20:5. There Elhanan is said to slay Goliath's brother, thus giving David and Elhanan one giant each.

22:1-51 David's rock of deliverance. In a majestic poem, a duplicate of Psalm 18, David praises the Lord in humility and gratitude for having saved him from his enemies. The opening verses offer seven synonyms for the Lord as savior: rock, fortress, deliverer, shield, horn, stronghold, refuge. The Lord keeps David from violence (v. 3) and rescues him from the violent man (v. 49). The Lord hears the psalmist's voice (v. 7), but foreigners hear the same voice, now clothed with power to subdue other nations (v. 45).

The Lord's action in David's life is compared to the action of nature: breakers surge and floods overwhelm (v. 5); the earth sways, quakes, trembles, shakes (v. 8); fire, wind, darkness, cloud, lightning, waters appear in tumultuous action to portray the Lord's response to the cry of the persecuted one (vv. 5-17). The Lord's rescue is described in mythological terms: The Most High mounts a cherub and flies, borne on the wind (v. 11; compare 1 Sam 4:4; 2 Sam 6:2; Exod 25:10-22). The reasons for the rescue are the Lord's love (v. 20) and because David was found free of guilt (v. 21), loyal (v. 22), and innocent (v. 25).

In the center of the psalm, the poet addresses the Lord directly. "You are faithful . . . you are wholehearted . . . sincere . . . astute . . . you save . . . you are my lamp . . . you brighten the darkness" (vv. 26-29). The Lord deals with people according to their righteousness. Note the contrasts: the sincere vs. the crooked (v. 27), lowly vs. lofty (v. 28), darkness vs. light (v. 29).

Resuming the third person, God is presented again as rock (v. 32), the poet's way is unerring and his feet are swift (v. 34). Preparing for war, God trains David to use the bow and girds him for battle (vv. 33, 35, 40). With this God-given strength, the poet overcomes his enemies, who flee and are destroyed (v. 41), are forsaken (v. 42), ground to dust and trampled (v. 43), enslaved (v. 44), obedient (v. 45), fawning and cringing (v. 46). The poem ends with praise for the Lord's kindness to the anointed king, "to David and his posterity forever" (v. 51; compare 1 Sam 2:10).

23:1-7 David praises God. These "last words" of David begin in the style of the oracles of Balaam (Num 24:3-4, 15-16; Gen 49; Deut 33). After describing himself as raised up, anointed, and favored by the Mighty One of Israel, the poet attributes his words to the spirit of the Lord (v. 2). A just and God-fearing ruler is compared to the action of morning light playing on wet grass (compare Hos 6:3). David's rule has been established in an eternal covenant (2 Sam 7), for he has seen salvation and the fulfillment of every desire (vv. 5-6). By contrast the wicked are dangerous to the touch and like thorns destined for the fire (compare Ps 118:12).

23:8-39 David's heroes. David has attached to himself a loyal group of outstanding warriors. Three are singled out for strength and bravery (vv. 8-12). Together they risk their lives to draw water for David from a well guarded by the enemy (v. 16). David's pouring out of the water before the Lord links their dedication to him with an act of worship. Of the remaining warriors cited, only Abishai and Benaiah have significant roles in David's story.

24:1-9 David's temptation. Ancient Israelites saw the anger of God in every calamity. Here the pestilence in Israel begins because of David's curiosity to know how great his people were, knowledge evidently reserved for the Lord alone. Joab tries to dissuade David from taking a census but fails (vv. 3-4). His subsequent journey through the land gives an idea of the extent of Israel during David's reign. The kingdom is bordered by the Mediterranean on the west, Gilead on the east, Dan in the north, and Beer-sheba in the south. By counting women, children and the aged, the total population could be as much as five times the one million three hundred thousand listed (v. 9).

24:10-17 David repents. Once again David regrets an impulsive act (compare 1 Sam 24:6). The prophet Gad offers a threefold expiation, all of which contain three time units. Seeing the Lord as more merciful than humans, David chooses the three-day pestilence, the shortest but the most intense.

As the famine of 21:9 ended at the beginning of the barley harvest, so here the plague breaks out at the time of the wheat harvest, both signs of divine mitigation. These, with the Lord's merciful staying of the destroying angel's hand before Jerusalem (v. 16), are lessons of God's love in the midst of trial. David sounds a progressive note in ancient theology when, instead of the accepted collective atonement, he asks the Lord to punish him and his family alone.

24:18-25 The threshing floor of Araunah. The command to build an altar in Jerusalem, with the promises to make a lasting house for David (7:8-16), is the basis for Israel's Zion theology which celebrates God's holy mountain Jerusalem as the focal worship place for all humankind (see Isa 2–4; Psalms 46, 47, 76, 84, 87, 122).

David's need to purchase the threshing floor of Araunah means that he did not own all the land in his capital and that Canaanites shared the land with Israel. As Abraham made his ownership of Sarah's grave in Machpelah legal by buying rather than accepting the site as a gift (Gen 23:10-16), so David refuses Araunah's offer and insists on paying a high price for land that will later become the ground for the temple.

Epilogue

The Lord has satisfied the people with two important needs: a prophet to deliver the divine word and a king to govern them. These are the leaders by whom the Lord guides their history, punishing them or delivering them as required. God exacts obedience, loyalty, and gratitude, but does not abandon the sinner. The lives of all are bathed in God's goodness and love.

1 AND 2 KINGS

Alice L. Laffey, R.S.M.

INTRODUCTION

The two books of Kings are, properly speaking, the final chapters of a larger section of the Old Testament known as the Deuteronomistic History. This history also includes the books of Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, and 1 and 2 Samuel.

In Deuteronomy the law is set forth. Fidelity to the law is to be Israel's response to its covenant relationship with Yahweh, its God. The book details the responsibilities of the people once they have entered the land promised by God to their ancestors.

The Book of Joshua describes Israel's successful conquest of the land of Canaan under the capable leadership of Joshua, a conquest easily and speedily accomplished because of the faithfulness of the people to Yahweh.

The Book of Judges gives a more realistic account of the Israelites' entrance into Canaan. Progress was slow and not always totally successful. Because the people were not always faithful to Yahweh and often worshiped idols, the Lord left Canaanites to dwell alongside the Israelites in the land. During this period of approximately 240 years of Israelite history, leadership in the land took the form of judges—military leaders or prudent advisors whose governing role was not hereditary.

The Book of Samuel introduces Samuel, the last of Israel's judges, the prophet who will anoint Israel's first king. Despite some opposition, Saul is named Israel's first monarch. However, his unfaithfulness to Yahweh leads to his downfall, and he is replaced by David, the Lord's servant, on whom God's spirit rests. The Second Book of Samuel continues the account of David's rise to power and records his covenant with Yahweh, in which he is promised a dynasty.

The two books of Kings tell the story of David's dynasty. David's son Solomon succeeds him as king and the dynasty is initiated: the Lord's promise is fulfilled. Moreover, Solomon builds a temple for Yahweh, also in accord with the Lord's promise to David.

The First Book of Kings details Solomon's reign, the building of Yahweh's temple, and Solomon's eventual degeneration into unfaithfulness. Solomon's sin and his son's stupidity lead to the division of the kingdom into north and south—Israel and Judah. Much of the remainder of this first book deals with the northern kingdom, especially its idolatrous leaders; for them there can be no lasting dynasty.

The Second Book of Kings continues to assess Israel's and Judah's monarchies. Judah weaves an intricate pattern among its more or less good and bad kings, in contrast to the consistent pattern of evil found in the northern kingdom. Finally the evil northern kingdom is definitively punished; the Lord sends Assyria to conquer it, and the Israelites are taken into exile. Eventually the southern kingdom follows a similar path. Because of infidelity—most explicitly because of the sins of the evil King Manasseh—the Babylonians destroy the temple and lead the people of Judah into exile. Thus do the Second Book of Kings and the Deuteronomistic History end, except for the hopeful note of Yahweh's continued faithfulness in the final three verses of 2 Kings. There it is recorded that Judah's exiled king, Jehoiachin, is released from prison and receives kindly treatment from Babylon's new king.

The Deuteronomistic editor

Most scholars agree that these seven Old Testament books—Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings—originally existed in fragments written at different times by different people in different places. These sources were combined by one or more editors into a literary and theological unity. Some of the material may be as old as the tenth century B.C.E., dating back to the reign of King Solomon; other material, such as the account of Judah's destruction, cannot be dated before the sixth century B.C.E. A final author, usually named the Deuteronomistic editor or the Deuteronomistic historian and referred to as "Dtr" by scholars, wove together the sources at his disposal into a unified, interpreted account of Israel's past.

The Deuteronomistic theology

A consistent theological thread, the perspective from which the entire Deuteronomistic History is recorded, delineates the basic postures between God and the people. Yahweh initiates good for the people, but they turn from God and worship idols. This evil provokes the Lord's anger, and God's response is to punish the people, for example, by selling them into the hands of their enemies. The oppression the people experience leads them to turn again to their God and to ask for forgiveness and deliverance. The Lord hears the people's prayer and saves them, only to have them soon afterward turn from the Lord once again. The pattern—God's good, Israel's sin, God's anger and punishment, Israel's affliction and prayer, God's forgiveness—repeats itself frequently throughout the History.

This theology surfaces in the books of Kings in the form of blessings for kings' fidelity (for example, Solomon's wealth and honor because he sought wisdom to govern the Lord's people) and punishment for kings' sins (for example, the denial to Jeroboam of a dynasty because he caused Israel to sin). Consistently, fidelity issues in well-being, while unfaithfulness leads inevitably to ruin.

As one reads through the History and recognizes this frequently repeated pattern, one wonders if they (we) will ever learn.

Themes

1. The Davidic covenant. 2 Sam 7 introduces a special relationship between the Lord and King David. This special relationship, often called the Davidic covenant, is a further explication of the Lord's covenant with Israel. David is "the Lord's servant," "a man after the Lord's own heart." Because the Lord is with David, he is victorious over the Philistines; the Lord grants him rest and enables him to build for himself a palace of cedar. David sins, but he acknowledges and repents of his sin; though he is punished, he is forgiven, and the Lord neither rejects him nor revokes the covenant. Thus David becomes a model—one who walked in the ways of the Lord.

This theme of the Lord's special love for David, and David's faithful response, continues to appear throughout the books of Kings. The fidelity of Yahweh to Solomon and to Judah's kings is very often explained as a consequence of David's intimate relationship with the Lord; David's was a proven faithfulness from which others benefited. We note, then, that Judah's good kings are "like David" in their obedience to the Lord's commands and the evil kings are "not like David." Solomon and Judah's kings are buried "with their ancestors in the city of David." A special effort is made to show that each successive king of Judah is the son of his father, that is, a direct descendant of David. In fact, the Lord relents of the punishment that his people deserve and postpones the end of the kingdom "for the sake of David, his servant."

2. The Davidic dynasty. As a consequence of the Lord's covenant with him, David, unlike Saul, will have a dynasty; his sons will rule after him. This theme underlies much of the books of Kings. The promise is fulfilled when Solomon succeeds David. Again, according to the theology of the Deuteronomistic editor, fidelity leads to blessing, wealth, and prosperity for the king and for the people, while unfaithfulness brings ill. Solomon's fidelity leads to wisdom, wealth, honor, and the temple, but his infidelity leads to the division of the kingdom. Yet David's dynasty remains intact. One tribe, Judah, remains loyal to David's descendants. For some four hundred years, and until the final chapter of 2 Kings, there is a son of David on the throne of Judah.

3. The Lord's temple. David is willing to build the Lord a temple, but the Lord prefers that David's son Solomon build it. Its construction is described in the early chapters of 1 Kings. If Yahweh is important, then the dwelling place of his presence must be grand. Three chapters are devoted to elaborate descriptions of the temple's construction, and finally, in 1 Kgs 8, Solomon dedicates it.

The temple figures prominently in the remainder of the History. The major sin of Jeroboam, Israel's first king, was that he built shrines at Bethel and Dan to prevent the people from going south to Jerusalem to worship. Those kings of Judah judged by the Deuteronomistic editor to be "good in the eyes of the Lord" are those who elaborately adorn the temple, who bring offerings to it, who order its restoration, and who remove the idols brought there by their evil predecessors. When Judean kings form alliances with foreign nations, the temple is pillaged and stripped of its treasures. Inevitably, the destruction of the kingdom of Judah and the demise of Yahweh's temple go hand in hand.

4. Prophecy and fulfillment. Throughout the books of Kings we find many examples of the editor's conviction that God is faithful. God's word, spoken through chosen representatives, is effective; it always comes to fulfillment. Because the Deuteronomistic editor viewed Israel's history as the lived-out expression of the Israelites' fidelity or infidelity to their covenant relationship with Yahweh, prophets promise, warn, and threaten. They reveal the future consequences of present attitudes and action. They do not speak the word of the Lord in vain. The power of God will bring that word to pass, and the History records explicitly that it does.

5. The law. Leadership's fidelity to Yahweh, or lack thereof, is expressed throughout the Deuteronomistic History, including the books of Kings, in terms of Israel's obedience to Yahweh's law. The Mosaic law and the response of David's descendants are the measurements by which to evaluate the monarchy. The Deuteronomistic editor interprets the events of Israelite history according as the kings and people obey or disobey these laws.

These five themes—covenant, dynasty, temple, prophecy, and law—are interdependent and pervade the History. They are key instruments in the Deuteronomistic editor's exposition of his theology, and central to the unity of the books of Kings.

Women and the books of Kings

Many commentators do not notice the significant roles played by women during the period of Israel's monarchies and how these figures have been incorporated into the books of Kings. It is important not only to recognize the evil leadership of a Jezebel, who even outdid her husband in idolatry, malice, and deceit, but also to note other female characters who significantly affected the course of Israel's history: Bathsheba, the queen of Sheba, Jeroboam's wife, the widow for whom Elisha multiplied oil, the Israelite servant girl and Naaman's wife, who together with Elisha made possible his cure. This commentary will make a special effort to point out the contributions of women.

In a similar vein, one cannot accept unqualifiedly that the Deuteronomist—or the Chronicler either, for that matter—was a man. However, considering the period in which the texts were produced, as well as their content and style, I am inclined to attribute them to male authorship.

Then and now

Though the final editing of the books of Kings took place no later than the late sixth century B.C.E., we, as a believing community, regard their word as sacred and as meaningful to us. It is important that we understand the context in which these books were written—by whom and for whom—and that we seek to understand what they meant to the people to whom they were originally addressed. But we must go further. If these texts are to have meaning for twentieth-century Jews and Christians, we must dialogue with the texts against the socio-political and cultural situations in which we find ourselves. We must together seek to understand what constitutes twentieth-century covenant fidelity and, conversely, what forms our idolatry takes.

COMMENTARY: 1 KINGS

PART I: THE REIGN OF SOLOMON

1 Kgs 1:1–11:43

To better understand many of the allusions given in the introductory chapters of the First Book of Kings, some insight into the life of the Israelites in their land in the first millennium B.C.E. might be helpful. First, let us consider the problem of syncretism (the fusion of different religious practices) and foreign women. The Israelites worshiped Yahweh, the God whose marvelous acts in history on their behalf had brought them out of Egypt and into a land that had become their own. But once in this land, they were frequently tempted to incorporate into Yahwism the fertility cults of their Canaanite neighbors. This can be partly explained by their new dependence on agriculture and by their need to guarantee a fertile land and a prosperous harvest. Yahweh had done wondrous things, but could Yahweh make the crops grow?

The infiltration of pagan fertility practices into the Israelite religion was often occasioned by the marriage of Israelite men to Canaanite and other "foreign" women. These women would retain their belief in fertility gods and goddesses after their marriage to Israelite men and were, consequently, often accused of leading Israel into idolatry. That is why the Deuteronomistic historian warns against intermarriage (for example, Josh 23:12) and why, in the text, marriage to foreign women is frequently a foreshadowing of doom.

One must keep in mind, also, that the text we have as Scripture is theologized history; that is to say, history has been shaped here by a theological perspective. A twentieth-century interpreter of history may expect documents to convey what really happened and may facilely label as untrue the shaping of events (for example, by deliberate omissions, emphases, editorial comments, even literary constructions). Yet, are we really so different when we differentiate between an economic history and a political history (with appropriate emphases and omissions), or easily recognize that a Southern interpretation of the American Civil War may read very differently from one produced in Massachusetts?

Applying this principle to the books of Kings, one can only presume that things may not have actually happened precisely as they are here described. In keeping with the intention of the final editor to show how fidelity to Yahweh led to success and the converse, the characters' actual history—what really happened to them and to Israel during their reigns must be interpreted as the consequence of their fidelity or infidelity to Yahweh. This commentary will look closely at how the text portrays the characters and will suggest, when there is obvious inconsistency, what was probably happening in Israel's history.

The first chapters of 1 Kings connect the previous two Old Testament books, 1 and 2 Samuel, to what follows. The "hero" of 2 Samuel, King David, dies and bestows the kingship on Solomon, the son of his favored wife, Bathsheba, despite the fact that an elder son, Adonijah, is a lively contender for the throne. The chapters that follow emphasize that Solomon's reign is characterized by devotion to the Lord, thereby explaining its political and economic success. Solomon begins by acknowledging his fidelity to the covenant, his reverence for the Lord. It is for the Lord and because of the Lord's gift that he will succeed as king. The last chapters (11–12), however, show a shift in Solomon's loyalty. He who had "loved the Lord" now "loves foreign women" (11:1), who lead his heart astray. This judgment accounts for the fact that Solomon, because he oppressed his own people (for example, by taxation and forced labor), lost their support—so much so that the kingdom is split after his death.

1:1-4 David on his deathbed. Most scholars believe that this incident—David, now old and "cold," that is, unable to engage in sexual intercourse—functions as an inclusion. (Inclusion is the technique of framing a literary unit by using the same or a similar word, phrase, or episode at both the beginning and end of it.) David's first sin was his sexual encounter with Bathsheba (2 Sam 11). There he took for himself a woman who already belonged to another. Here, ironically enough, Abishag, a "beautiful girl" legitimately his, is not able to warm and arouse him. In this patriarchal society a woman is understood to be the possession first of her father and then of her husband; yet these women—Abishag and Bathsheba—significantly affect the life of the king, the well-being of the kingdom, and even the circumstances surrounding the king's death. The verses also point out that David, who had stayed home "in the spring when kings go out to war" (2 Sam 11:1), will not die in battle like his predecessor Saul. The kingdom, by the time of David's death, is well established and at peace.

1:5-10 Ambition of Adonijah. One might expect that David's elder son Adonijah would succeed his father as king. Even before his father's death and, seemingly, with his father's tacit approval, Adonijah prepares to take over. He acquires chariots, drivers, and henchmen, the appropriate possessions of one who will soon "lead in warfare and fight the people's battles" (see 1 Sam 8:20). He rallies support, yet he lacks crucial support from Yahweh's spokesman, the prophet Nathan. This, surely, is an evil omen.

1:11-53 Solomon proclaimed king. Nathan supports Solomon as Israel's future king and plans accordingly. Nathan served as the Lord's spokesman to David at least twice before. It was he who communicated to David the Lord's promise of a dynasty (2 Sam 7), and he who communicated the Lord's judgment of David's sin with Bathsheba (2 Sam 12). David has every reason to take Nathan's word seriously. Now, to convince David that Solomon should reign after him, Nathan arranges a meeting between David and Bathsheba. She is to remind David of his promise to her that her son will succeed to the throne. Nathan assures Bathsheba that he, too, will try to persuade David that Solomon should be king.

Bathsheba and Nathan execute their plan successfully. David names Solomon as his successor, orders Solomon to ride on his mule, to be anointed king, and to sit on his throne. The contender, Adonijah, now has no chance. His only hope is that Solomon will spare his life, which, at least for now, he does.

Was this text written during Solomon's reign, at his court? Is it, in fact, the legitimation of a conspiracy? From a historical perspective, perhaps one must answer in the affirmative; yet, from a theological perspective, the spokesman of Yahweh, supported by David's wife, has indeed revealed Yahweh's will.

2:1-11 David's last instructions and death. David's last advice to his son has to do, first and foremost, with covenant fidelity. Solomon is to revere the Lord as David has done; only thus will Solomon be guaranteed success in his undertakings; only thus can it be guaranteed that a descendant of David will remain on the throne. This is the first time explicit conditions are made regarding the dynasty; its continuance is dependent on faithful response to the covenant.

David's other advice regards specific persons: Joab, Barzillai's sons, and Shimei. Because Joab, David's general, had, without David's knowledge and consent, stabbed Abner (see 2 Sam 3) and Amasa (see 2 Sam 20), David wants Solomon to punish Joab. (One must ask here whether Solomon wants Joab out of the way because he had supported Adonijah, whether this request of David legitimates Solomon's decision to kill a political enemy.)

Barzillai, in contrast, represents loyalty. He had helped David flee from Absalom, and such faithfulness merits reward. Twice elsewhere in the Deuteronomistic History (2 Sam 9:10; 2 Kgs 25:29) eating at table with the king is an explicit sign of favor.

Finally, Shimei should be punished. David has kept his promise and has not put him to death, as his treason deserves (see 2 Sam 19:24). On the other hand, such infidelity cannot be ignored. Solomon's reign must not be thwarted by potential conspirators.

Having spoken his last, David dies. He had reigned seven years in Hebron and thirty-three years in Jerusalem, that is, a total of forty years. Whether these numbers denote historical accuracy or are used symbolically is uncertain. (In many biblical texts, including the Deuteronomistic History, as will become evident, the numbers three, four, seven and twelve [thirty, three hundred, and the like] express totality or completion.) David is laid to rest with his ancestors and buried in the City of David. This assertion is the first of many similar expressions that occur throughout the Deuteronomistic History with reference to the Davidic kings. The Deuteronomistic editor explicitly refers to the place of burial to emphasize the close connection between David and each king of Judah.

2:12-46 The kingdom made secure. David legitimated Solomon's elimination of Joab and Shimei as political opponents. Solomon must now legitimate his removal of Adonijah, his half-brother, for Adonijah will be a potential threat to the throne as long as he lives. Adonijah asks for Abishag, the woman who had "warmed" the dying David (1:3). Recognizing Bathsheba's influence with Solomon, Adonijah petitions her to intercede for him that he might take Abishag for his wife. Solomon's response is a vehement refusal, for he recognizes such a request as a clear bid for the throne (note again the indirect but very real importance of Abishag; compare 2 Sam 16:22). Solomon is now justified in ordering his brother's death.

Solomon next removes the priest Abiathar from his position of prestige (v. 27). After all, he had supported Adonijah. The text legitimates this decision by a reference to the prophetic denunciation of Eli's house (see 1 Sam 2:30-36). The word of the Lord is thus fulfilled.

Another threat to Solomon's throne is David's general, Joab. Joab deserves death for killing two men without David's knowledge, and David himself had wished it, or so we are to understand. Coincidentally, it just so happens that Joab, too, had been one of Adonijah's supporters! Once Abiathar is out of the way, Solomon replaces him with Zadok; once Joab is out of the way, Solomon replaces him with Benaiah (v. 35). Obviously, both Zadok and Benaiah had been strong supporters of Solomon (see 1 Kgs 1:8).

Finally, some excuse has to be found to make Shimei's death legitimate. David had wanted Shimei to be punished for his disloyalty, and Solomon has only to find a way to eliminate him. Solomon creates circumstances conducive for Shimei to violate a sworn oath, and then Solomon waits. His patience is rewarded, and eventually Shimei is put to death (v. 46).

Having removed all the opposition, Solomon is now secure on the throne. The theological perspective of the text's author has established that Yahweh's will, expressed through the prophet Nathan and through David, has been accomplished. If we are to interpret verse 39 historically, it took three years to make the kingdom fully secure.

3:1-15 Wisdom of Solomon. With political threats removed, political alliances are in order. Solomon wastes no time in securing the "friendship" of Egypt by marrying the daughter of Pharaoh. This removes the possibility of invasion from the south and creates the peaceful climate in which Solomon can build his palace, the Lord's temple, and the walls of Jerusalem. Though he has intermarried, no mention is made of idolatry. In fact, his worshiping at the high places—activity that is later associated with infidelity to Yahweh—is explained by the fact that the temple had not yet been built (v. 2).

The first part of Solomon's reign is characterized by covenant fidelity to the Lord, by love and obedience. He worships at the best shrine and, from the abundance of prosperity with which the Lord has blessed him, he makes generous sacrifices to Yahweh. Often, as here, dreams occasion an encounter with Yahweh (note, for example, Nathan's dream in 2 Sam 7). In the ensuing dialogue, Solomon perceives himself as Yahweh's servant and requests from the Lord an understanding heart by which to govern the people and to distinguish right from wrong.

Yahweh responds generously. Solomon's request will be granted, and, in addition, he will receive the standard blessings of covenant fidelity—riches and glory and a long life. (When these texts were being written, the Israelites did not believe in life after death. Therefore, for the Deuteronomistic historian, reward for covenant fidelity took the form of material prosperity, a long life, and progeny to continue one's life.) Solomon's reverence for the Lord, proven by his altruistic request, would merit him wisdom in addition to the usual covenant blessings. Solomon awakes from his dream and again sacrifices to the Lord (an inclusion).

3:16-28 Solomon's judgment. Solomon immediately begins to make judgments with the understanding heart the Lord has given him. Cleverly, he sets forth the condition that will enable him to determine the real mother of the living child, and his insightful decision wins the awe of the people, that is, the glory that the Lord had promised.

4:1-6 Chief officers of the kingdom. Solomon's cabinet, if we can call it that, was composed of Jehoshaphat, who had supported David (see 2 Sam 8:16; 20:24); Abiathar (the same Abiathar rejected in 1 Kgs 2:27?); Benaiah and Zadok, who had supported Solomon in his bid for the throne (see 1 Kgs 1:8); sons of Solomon's supporters (Azariah, son of Zadok, and two sons of Nathan); and, finally, some unknown men not referred to elsewhere in the Bible.

4:7–5:14 Solomon's royal state. Just as there had been twelve sons of Jacob and twelve tribes of Israel, so now the land is divided into twelve parts. This time each commissary is to contribute one month's supply of provisions to the king's household. This is the first textual evidence that Solomon used the people for his own benefit. What Samuel had warned—that the king would set the people to do his plowing and his harvesting, that he would tithe crops and vineyards and flocks (see 1 Sam 8:12, 15, 17)—is here acknowledged.

Each commissary has a leader, but the identity of the leader seems to be of no particular interest. Seven men are named, as if to distinguish them from other persons similarly named. Five are identified merely as the son of somebody. None is delineated elsewhere in the History in greater detail. Nevertheless, one may safely conclude that what these men have in common is loyalty to Solomon.

The shrewd organization of Solomon's empire ensures peace and prosperity in the land. For this reason Solomon continues to be characterized by the God-given gifts of wisdom, exceptional understanding, and knowledge. Further, his political savvy is complemented by his literary and musical talents, as well as by his expertise in biology. No wonder he wins international acclaim!

[The editors of the New American Bible have rearranged several verses of the original Hebrew here and elsewhere for the sake of better comprehension. It is for this reason that verse 7 begins chapter 5 and verse 20 follows verse 8.]

5:15-32 Preparations for the temple. Solomon builds alliances wherever he can (see 1 Kgs 3:1), and the one he continues with the Phoenicians stemmed from David's time (see 2 Sam 5:11). Appealing to his father's past history of good relations with Hiram, Solomon obtains Lebanese lumber and workers for the construction of the temple. Solomon's kingship is from the Lord, and the building of the temple will fulfill Nathan's prophecy (see 2 Sam 7:13). In this way the text justifies the consolidation of kingship and religion in Jerusalem.

The first stages of temple-building are marked by cooperation between the two countries. The terms of their agreement or "covenant" are observed by both parties. But is there internal cooperation? Or, to put the question another way, under what conditions and obligations do the Israelites participate in the building project? Do the thirty thousand workmen, in relays of ten (note the numbers!) represent forced labor? Does their resentment cause some of the hostility the dynasty experiences at the end of Solomon's reign (see 1 Kgs 11–12)?

Scholars suggest that there was an anti-temple faction in Israel, just as there had been an anti-monarchy faction (see 1 Sam 8). According to this view, a conservative group—how extensive we do not know—resisted a permanent dwelling for Yahweh's presence in their midst. To join temple and king would be to become even more "like the other nations." The presence of such a conservative element would explain why David had not built a temple. It would also explain a certain resistance to temple-building during Solomon's reign. Moreover, the resistance would have been compounded by inhumane treatment of the temple workers.

6:1-38 Building of the temple. The specific dating we encounter here relates this new and important event to two other major events in Israel's history: the Exodus and Solomon's accession to the throne. This dating pattern is common in the Old Testament, including the books of Kings. Dating is never given by year (for example, 964 B.C.E.), but by relating an event to other significant events.

Next follows a detailed description of the temple. The sacredness of the temple is attested to by the statement that as much work as possible is done at a distance from the building site (v. 7). Its magnificence is asserted by the frequent references to fine woods (olive, fir, and imported cedar), finely carved stone, and an abundance of gold and other decoration. The holy of holies, which would contain the ark of the covenant, is singled out by its elaborate wealth of ornamentation.

Inserted into the account of the building of the temple is a prophetic word that sets conditions for Yahweh's fulfilling his promise to David (the lasting dynasty?), as well as for Yahweh's dwelling in the midst of Israel and not forsaking them: Solomon must observe the Lord's statutes, ordinances, and commands (vv. 11-13). This text is a strong echo of Deuteronomistic theology: obedience will yield good, but the blessings are dependent on fidelity. The chapter ends with the assertion that the temple was completed seven years after it was begun.

7:1-12 Building of the palace. Immediately after saying that it took seven years to complete the Lord's dwelling the text tells us that it took thirteen years to complete the king's dwelling. Are we to conclude that "seven" is meant to be symbolic for the completion of the temple, while "thirteen" is intended as an accurate estimate of the time it took to build Solomon's palace? Or are we to conclude that the king cared more for the grandeur of his own house than he did for the Lord's dwelling? Whereas the Lord's temple measures 60 by 20 by 25 cubits, the palace is larger: 100 by 50 by 30 cubits (a cubit varied from 15 to 22 inches). And, in addition, Solomon builds a tribunal, and separate living quarters for himself and Pharaoh's daughter. Everything is well made; he makes a court and a porch for his own palace similar to those made for the temple.

7:13-51 Furnishing of the temple. These verses form an inclusion—temple, palace, temple. Although the temple itself, including the altar, the table for the showbread, and the lampstands, is heavily laden with gold, many of the articles made for use inside the temple quarters—the columns, the water tank, the stands, basins, pots, shovels, and bowls—are shaped from bronze. Hiram, king of Tyre, had been contracted to provide cedar for the temple; now Hiram, a skilled metalworker and an Israelite whose father had been from Tyre, is contracted to help with the furnishings.

David's act of dedicating offerings to the Lord becomes a precedent for Solomon and future kings (v. 51). Such gifts to God are safeguarded in the temple treasury. Whether this treasury was also the palace treasury is uncertain, but pillaging valuables from the Lord's dwelling would certainly be regarded as a serious offense. When everything is completed, the temple is dedicated.

8:1-21 Dedication of the temple. Verses 1-4 bring together the old and the new: the elders, the tribal leaders, the princes of the ancestral houses, the ark and the tent of meeting, the Levites and the priests, the City of David. Whether the text reflects a combination of sources or a later effort to win all to Solomon and the temple is uncertain. In any case, the past—Israel's former leadership and Yahweh's former dwelling place—comes now to the temple at Jerusalem.

The entire community of Israel, Solomon included, is said to have sacrificed sheep and oxen to the Lord and to have watched the priests march in procession with the ark, bringing it to its resting place in the temple's holy of holies. The reader is explicitly reminded that the ark contains the two stone tablets, which symbolize the Lord's covenant with Israel (v. 9). What better way to connect king and Yahweh, to show Solomon's fidelity to the Lord (compare 1 Kgs 3:4, 15), and to express the approval of the people for what Solomon had built? The cloud that filled the temple is a clear indication of the Lord's approval (compare Exod 16:10; 40:38; Num 9:18; and many similar texts). Again, validation is made for king and temple. The prophetic promises made in 2 Sam 7 that David's son would sit on the throne and that David's son would build a temple for the Lord have now both been fulfilled.

8:22-66 Solomon's prayer. The remainder of this long chapter is constructed as Solomon's prayer to the Lord at the time of the temple's dedication. Verses 22-26 are similar in form to David's prayer in 2 Sam 7:22-29: first the singularity of the Lord is extolled; then Yahweh is thanked for the blessings already bestowed and for future divine promise; finally the Lord is asked to effect the remainder of the promise. Here the specific request is for Solomon's sons and the continuation of the dynasty. Solomon then cleverly brings together pro-temple and anti-temple sentiments. He affirms that no place, not even the highest heavens, can contain Yahweh, yet he also affirms that the temple which he has built is the very place in which Yahweh wants to be honored (vv. 27-30).

Many scholars believe that verses 33-34 and 46-51 are later additions to the original prayer because they suggest a condition of exile. This is quite possible, since the original prayer understands the temple as the appropriate place toward which to petition for forgiveness from sin, sin that results in any of a variety of punishments—defeat, drought, famine, pestilence, blight, and the like. The temple is also understood to be the place of just judgment and the place toward which Israel is to pray for victory in battle (the ark will no longer be taken into battle).

Verses 41-43 and 60 suggest an openness to foreigners, which may originate either in Solomon's policies of imperialism or simply in his foreign diplomacy. These verses may even be an exilic addition dating to a time when nationalism was no longer a possibility.

Israel's election as the Lord's chosen people is explicitly and repeatedly given as the reason why the Lord should listen to Israel's prayer.

Solomon's address to the people (vv. 56-61) repeats the form of the opening of his prayer to Yahweh: he praises Yahweh for fulfilling the divine promises and then petitions for the Lord's continued blessings into the future. Again, the text connects Israel's obedience to the Lord with the Lord's not forsaking the people. The dedication concludes the same way it began, with Solomon and the people sacrificing to the Lord. Only after seven days do the festivities end. The people return home contented with king and temple.

9:1-9 Promise and warning to Solomon. The dialogue continues. Solomon has spoken in prayer to the Lord; now the Lord again speaks to Solomon (compare 1 Kgs 3:10-14). Whereas the Lord had previously required obedience for continuing the divine presence in the temple and to Israel, the Lord now sets forth conditions for the continuation of David's dynasty (compare 1 Kgs 6:12-13). Further, the text explicitly names the sin of idolatry (v. 6). The punishment for Solomon's and his descendants' infidelity will include destruction of the temple, loss of nationhood, and exile. The text here foreshadows what is to come.

9:10-18 Other acts of the king. This text suggests Solomon's additional failings. He conscripted his own people to build the temple (see 1 Kgs 5:27-31), and later he dealt unjustly with Hiram. The twenty Galilean cities that Solomon gave to Hiram amounted to less than adequate payment for the materials he provided for the temple and the palace. Moreover, Solomon forced the non-Israelites living in his dominion to help not only in the building of the temple and the palace, but also in the construction of Jerusalem's walls, several cities, and a fleet. Nevertheless, Solomon, at this time in his reign, is still faithful to Yahweh, as attested by his concern for the temple and by his offerings.

10:1-13 Visit of the queen of Sheba. A wealthy woman submits to Solomon's superior wisdom and is duly impressed by his grand style and by his fidelity to God. The two exchange an abundance of precious gifts. Verses 11 and 12 seem misplaced, belonging rather with 1 Kgs 9:26-28. In any case, they attest to the close cooperation between the fleets of Hiram and Solomon, to Solomon's benefit. The gold from Ophir is now supplemented by precious wood and stones.

10:14-29 Solomon's wealth. Solomon is ostentatious with his wealth; he uses gold everywhere. His drinking vessels and utensils are of gold, and he puts gold shields and gold bucklers on display in his palace. Every three years his ships bring a new cargo of precious metals. Solomon seems to have everything: the Lord's wisdom, peace in his land, abundant wealth, recognition by everyone. Perhaps his fame leads to envy and resentment, since part of his wealth comes from annual tribute. One must also ask whether the text describing Solomon's chariots is a subtle allusion to the condemnation of kingship in 1 Sam 8:11-12.

11:1-43 The sins of Solomon. Solomon has married Pharaoh's daughter and loved the Lord (see 1 Kgs 3:1-3). Now he loves foreign women, and in symbolic abundance (seven hundred and three hundred!). Because marriage to foreign women inevitably led, in the judgment of the Deuteronomist, to the worship of their gods, Solomon merits the Deuteronomist's stereotypical condemnation of idolatry. Solomon's heart, therefore, is no longer like his father David's, fully faithful to the Lord. His disobedience is explicit. The Lord had promised the continuation of the dynasty on the condition that the people worship Yahweh and Yahweh alone. The Lord's response to Solomon's sin can only be anger and punishment. And so the Lord again speaks to Solomon (vv. 11-13). One notes the absence of prophetic mediation here; the Lord personally names the punishment. The kingdom will fall not to Solomon's son but to Solomon's servant; yet, "for the sake of David," this will not happen during Solomon's lifetime, nor will the entire kingdom be taken away.

During the latter part of Solomon's reign, political adversaries abound: Hadad and the Edomites to the southeast; Rezon of Syria to the northeast; and even his own servant Jeroboam from the north of Israel. And the king of Egypt gives refuge to Jeroboam! The text vindicates Jeroboam's rebellion with a prophetic word (vv. 31-39). Ahijah delivers to Jeroboam basically the same message the Lord gave to Solomon: the kingdom will be divided, and part will be given to Solomon's servant. Because of David, this will not happen until after Solomon's death.

If ten tribes are given to Jeroboam and one to David's descendant, what happened to the twelfth tribe? Most scholars conclude that the reference here is symbolic (the numbers ten and one can each represent the whole) rather than historical. By this time certain tribes had been incorporated into others; for example, Simeon and Levi into Judah and perhaps part of the tribe of Benjamin as well (compare 1 Kgs 12:21).

The Deuteronomistic editor, whose words are put in the mouth of the prophet Ahijah, is swift to make conditions for Jeroboam's future reign and dynastic potential; they will depend on fidelity to Yahweh's commands. David has become the model par excellence. For his sake his descendants will continue a dynasty; only if Jeroboam is faithful to Yahweh, as David was, can he hope for a lasting dynasty. David's descendants will indeed be punished, but the Deuteronomist sees an end even to that.

The record of Solomon's death (vv. 41-43) is similar to that of most Judean kings. Reference is made to a source, no longer extant, where more information can be found regarding Solomon's reign. Reference is also made to the duration of his reign—in this instance forty years (a generation), the same number of years as his father's reign. Further, Solomon is buried with his ancestors, including David, in his father's city. Finally, the text notes that his son Rehoboam, in dynastic fashion, reigned after him.

PART II: JUDAH AND ISRAEL TO THE TIME OF AHAB

1 Kgs 12:1–16:34

This section chronicles the history of a divided kingdom between approximately 930 B.C.E. and 870 B.C.E. During that time three of David's descendants reigned in the southern kingdom of Judah: Rehoboam, Solomon's son; Abijam, Rehoboam's son; and Asa, Abijam's son. A dynasty could not be sustained in the northern kingdom. The house of Jeroboam endured only until Jeroboam's son Nadab was murdered. The house of Baasha endured only until Baasha's son Elah was murdered. Zimri held the throne only seven days until he himself was murdered. The house of Omri succeeded in maintaining a dynasty of four generations. Because the biblical text deems Ahab the most evil king of the north—the king whose wife, Jezebel, killed the prophets and led Ahab to ruin—the Deuteronomistic historian incorporates into his History an entire section devoted to Ahab's reign and his confrontations with the prophets Elijah, Micaiah, and Elisha.

12:1-25 Secession of Israel. Ahijah's prophecy to Jeroboam (11:31-39) is fulfilled. Had Rehoboam been politically shrewd, he might have avoided the split. As it happened, brash self-confidence led to authoritarianism and ultimately to defeat. Solomon's reign produced a rival, but a leader with few followers. Rehoboam's reign produces the followers and the revolt. The Lord warned Solomon of the division to come; Ahijah prophesied to Jeroboam; now Shemaiah tells Rehoboam and his people the same thing. Three times the kingdom's division is explained by the infidelity of the Davidic kings.

Because Jeroboam lacks a geographical center like the one David and Solomon established at Jerusalem, he moves about during the first years of his reign. From this time onward in the books of Kings, the term "Israel" refers only to the northern segment of what had been David and Solomon's united kingdom. "Judah" now refers to the southern kingdom, that part of the land ruled over by a descendant of David.

12:26-32 Religious rebellion. Could there be a religious solution to Jeroboam's political dilemma? Creating a new king demands a new capital and, so it would seem, a new temple. How else can the political-social-religious unity of the people be maintained? Their very identity as a people and a nation is intricately bound to belief in, and worship of, Yahweh, even if idolatry and syncretism are sometimes practiced. Is Jeroboam really guilty, or is he guilty only in the eyes of the Deuteronomistic historian, for whom all the northern kings, without exception, do evil in the eyes of the Lord?

Whatever the true answer to that historical query may be, Jeroboam, from the perspective of the biblical text's author, does the very things that can only merit condemnation: he makes golden calves for the people to worship (v. 28; compare Exod 32); he builds temples on the high places (v. 31); he ordains non-Levitical priests (compare Exod 28ff.); and he arbitrarily establishes a pilgrimage feast (v. 32).

12:33–13:34 Message of the prophet from Judah. It is no surprise that a prophetic condemnation follows. As Jeroboam is offering sacrifice on the altar at Bethel, he is confronted by a Judean prophet, who condemns not only the altar but also the priests whom Jeroboam has created. Later, during Josiah's reign in Judah, the illegitimate priests of the high places will be sacrificed. (Was the text written during Josiah's reign to legitimize the purge?)

The truth of this prophetic word is confirmed by the fulfillment of another of the prophet's words—the destruction of the altar (see 1 Kgs 13:5). The prophet of God is in touch with the power of God. When Jeroboam begs him to ask the Lord that his outstretched, withered hand might be restored, he does so, and the king recovers (13:6). Yet, in spite of his experiences of the power of God, Jeroboam does not repent.

God's power can work through God's representative even when that agent is not obedient to God. Students often ask why the old prophet tricked (deceived!) God's envoy. Should not prophets be believed and obeyed? Prophets are to be believed and obeyed by those who hear the word of God through them, but prophets are to be obedient to the word of God that they themselves have heard. One must not trust a human being—even God's messenger—when one has heard God. The younger prophet is now confronted with God's condemnation of his disobedience by another prophet: he will not be buried with his ancestors. Again, the text records that the prophetic word is fulfilled. The prophet of God dies and is buried, but he is not buried with his ancestors. Yet, he was a true prophet; the word that he spoke against Bethel will be fulfilled. ("Samaria" is used in verse 32 as a synonym for "Israel.")

14:1-20 Death of Abijah. When in trouble, consult God; when all goes well, do as you please—such would seem to be the philosophy of Jeroboam. The sickness of his son brings him to the same prophet whose promise of kingship to him has been fulfilled (see 1 Kgs 11:30-39). Now Jeroboam seeks out Ahijah to learn the fate of his son. Why doesn't Jeroboam himself go to see Ahijah? Why must Jeroboam's wife disguise herself? Is it because the king does not want his people to know that he needs a prophet's help? Just as the prophets in the previous section remained nameless, so does Jeroboam's wife. Abijah is named once. The text deliberately highlights Jeroboam as the central character—Jeroboam, the unfaithful king.

Jeroboam's son will die—such is the word of the Lord. One could have expected as much (compare 2 Sam 12:14). Moreover, the same prophet through whom God conditionally gave Jeroboam a dynasty now removes it. Of Jeroboam's children, only Abijah will not suffer a violent death. Jeroboam is so evil that even the burial of Abijah has to be justified: there is something in him pleasing to the Lord (v. 13)!

Just as the chronicles of Solomon are no longer extant (see 1 Kgs 14:41), neither are the chronicles of Israel (v. 19) nor, for that matter, the chronicles of Judah (v. 29). The length of Jeroboam's reign, his burial, and his son's accession to the throne tie him to the succeeding Israelite reign.

14:21-31 Reign of Rehoboam. The text alternates its accounts of the reigns of the kings of Judah and those of the kings of Israel. Along with the stereotypical notice of Rehoboam's age when he began to reign and the duration of his kingship, his mother's name, Naamah, is given. This pattern is common for most of the kings of Judah. Because the kings had many wives, it was important to record in which house a new king had been raised. For Rehoboam, the detail that his mother was an Ammonite (v. 21) recalls 1 Kgs 11:1-6, where we are told of Solomon's marrying foreign women and his consequent practice of idolatry.

Verses 22-24 tell how Judah under King Rehoboam succumbs to idolatry. This explains the warfare that Judah experiences with both Egypt and the northern kingdom of Israel. Under Rehoboam's leadership Judah becomes like Israel. The books of Kings here begin to depict a proportionate relationship between the quality of the king and the condition of the temple, a thread woven throughout the remainder of the Deuteronomistic History.

In spite of his evil, Rehoboam is David's descendant; therefore, he is buried with his ancestors, and his son Abijam replaces him on the throne.

15:1-8 Reign of Abijam. The description of Rehoboam's son given here is totally stereotypical: What year of whose reign in the north was it when so-and-so began to reign in the south? How long did he reign? Who was his mother? How is his reign to be evaluated from a covenant perspective and in comparison with David's? If the judgment is that the particular king of Judah was unfaithful to the Lord, then the fact that he endured on the throne is explained by a reference to the Lord's faithfulness to his servant David.

If nothing of particular import occurred during a particular king's reign, from a theological perspective, then a reference is made to the king's death and burial with his ancestors. The name of his successor is given. If one should want further information regarding the king, the reader is referred to the court chronicles.

15:9-24 Reign of Asa. Asa reverses his father's reign. Whereas Abijam reigned for only three years, Asa reigns for forty-one. Whereas his father was not entirely with the Lord like David, Asa, like David, pleases the Lord. Whereas Rehoboam allowed the cult prostitutes (see 1 Kgs 14:24), Asa banishes them. Whereas Abijam made idols, Asa removes them. Whereas Maacah, the queen mother of Abijam's reign, venerated a Canaanite goddess, Asa banishes her. Further, Asa brings to the temple precious offerings, appropriate gifts from himself and even from his father. Asa's reign endures through the reigns of at least five northern kings; he has many accomplishments and has built many cities, blessings of Yahweh for fidelity.

The only shortcoming Asa seems guilty of is letting the high places remain (v. 14). Does this mean he tolerates the idolatry of others within his kingdom? Is this the cause of the continued warfare between the south and the north? On the other hand, is Asa's overwhelming fidelity and resemblance to David the Deuteronomistic historian's explanation of why Asa is able to summon Aram to his defense against Israel (compare 2 Sam 10:19 and 1 Kgs 10:29)? Later the text condemns foreign alliances because they evidence a lack of trust in Yahweh.

15:25-32 Reign of Nadab. The reign of Jeroboam's son, concurrent with the first years of Asa's reign in the south, is similar, from a theological perspective, to his father's. On him and on the entire house of Jeroboam the prophetic word of Ahijah is fulfilled (see 1 Kgs 14:10-16). Verse 32 duplicates verse 16. Scholars usually explain such repetitions as the products of multiple sources. The emphasis that repetition gives is often deliberate.

If the historical reality was constant warfare between the northern and southern kingdoms, then the truth must be acknowledged, in spite of the theological judgment that Baasha was evil and Asa good. History can be shaped by Deuteronomistic theology only so far.

15:33–16:14 Reign of Baasha. The capital of the northern kingdom is not yet Samaria but Tirzah, the city in which Jeroboam eventually settled (compare 1 Kgs 12:25 and especially 1 Kgs 14:12, 17).

The Lord, through his prophet Jehu, condemns Baasha. Baasha's evil, like Jeroboam's, will merit for him the same end: his house will be destroyed; only one son will reign, and that son will meet a violent death. From a historical perspective, written discreetly into the text, one may conclude that Baasha's reign was relatively stable. He survived for twenty-four years on the throne, and his son was able to succeed him. Yet, from a theological perspective, his covenant infidelity made eventual punishment inevitable.

16:8-14 Reign of Elah. The Deuteronomistic historian records only one thing about the reign of Elah: Jehu's prophecy is fulfilled. Elah is murdered and the house of Baasha destroyed. His successor is his servant and murderer, Zimri.

One cannot help but note of the instability of the northern kingdom. The house of Jeroboam reigned for twenty-four years before Nadab was murdered; the house of Baasha reigns for twenty-six years before Elah is murdered. In both instances the murderer becomes king. Neither house reigned a full generation.

16:15-22 Reign of Zimri. Elah's murderer lasts only seven days on the throne before he commits suicide (compare 1 Sam 31:4) and is supplanted by the army general, Omri. Omri apparently has more popular backing than either Tibni, another contender for the throne, or Zimri. The Deuteronomistic historian-theologian blames Zimri's short reign and fate on his sin. No sin is imputed to Tibni, and therefore no explanation is given for his death. In accordance with the violence of the period, a likely historical explanation is that Omri's supporters removed his opposition.

16:23-28 Reign of Omri. Omri moves the capital from Tirzah to Samaria—no small accomplishment in Israel's political history. He dies a natural death and is buried with his ancestors. His son Ahab succeeds him on the throne. Nevertheless, punishment will inevitably come for his idolatry and other sins.

16:29-34 Reign of Ahab. Whereas other kings of the north are compared with Jeroboam and may even have done "more evil" than their predecessors, Ahab is clearly cited as being guilty of evil far beyond that of any of the others. His specific sins are marrying Jezebel and worshiping Baal; he even builds a temple for Baal in the capital.

Moreover, Hiel's rebuilding of Jericho during Ahab's reign merits the fulfillment of the curse in Josh 6:26. He loses his first son when he lays the foundation, and his youngest son when he sets up the gates. Whatever the relative dating of these texts (whether Hiel built Jericho and sacrificed his children—historical events condemned in the later text from Joshua—or whether the passage from Joshua represents an earlier tradition that was inserted into 1 Kings to further document Ahab's evil), there is no doubt that 1 Kgs 16:34 serves as an additional indication of Ahab's sin.

PART III: STORIES OF THE PROPHETS

1 Kgs 17:1–22:54

The remainder of 1 Kings is composed of ancient legends about prophets and their disciples. The content is episodic, inserted into the reign of Ahab in Israel and, indirectly, into the reign of Jehoshaphat in Judah. Throughout the narrative the nature of prophets that has thus far been delineated is further emphasized. The word that God proclaims through a prophet will be fulfilled; more powerful than the king is the prophet.

17:1-6 Drought predicted by Elijah. The word of Elijah to Ahab is a warning of drought and an assertion that Elijah will control its duration. The word of the Lord to Elijah is a promise of protection: food and water and a place of safety. Implicit in the word of the Lord to the prophet is the power of Yahweh; implicit in the word of the prophet is Yahweh's punishment for Ahab's sin.

17:7-24 Elijah and the widow. The miracles of the multiplication of oil and flour and the raising back to life of a widow's only son are the second and third accounts of acts of the Lord's power through Elijah; he has already caused the drought. Ahab's sin brought suffering for the people of Israel; Elijah's fidelity brings nourishment, as does the woman's faith. The power of Yahweh to take away life and to restore it is here demonstrated, as is Elijah's confidence in the Lord.

18:1-46 Elijah and the prophets of Baal. The reader should not be surprised at another miracle, certainly not when an episode is meant to contrast the power of God with the power of no-god. The Lord will bring rain after three years of drought and famine.

Elijah emerges as Yahweh's representative, while Ahab and Jezebel are devotees of the Baals. Obadiah functions as their intermediary. Although he is faithful to the Lord, even to the point of risking his well-being to hide the persecuted prophets, Obadiah nevertheless works for and fears the evil king. However, because Obadiah is faithful to the Lord, he obeys Elijah and occasions the meeting, after three years, of Ahab and Elijah. Each experiences the other as the "troubler of Israel." Who, ultimately, caused the drought—the prophet Elijah or the evil King Ahab?

Mount Carmel becomes the place of confrontation: Elijah, Yahweh's prophet, against 850 false prophets. In a text similar to Deut 30:15-20 and Josh 23:14-16, Elijah exhorts the people to choose Yahweh (v. 21). Next follows a demonstration of the power of Yahweh. One prophet against 850, two bulls prepared for sacrifice, extensive intercession (three pourings of four jars of water over the twelve-stone altar), and a single request. Yahweh's sacrifice catches fire. When Yahweh's supremacy has been securely reestablished, drought gives way to rain (v. 45). The incident is meant to teach Ahab the evil of his ways and to teach the reader the power of Yahweh.

Students often comment on Elijah's killing the Baal prophets. The text is not about killing people; it is about the power of Yahweh. Within that context evil must be removed from the midst of Israel.

19:1-18 Flight to Horeb. Elijah's encounter with God on Mount Horeb has been the subject of much study and reflection. Horeb is another name for Sinai, the mountain of God where the Lord spoke to Moses through a burning bush (see Exod 3) and later gave Moses the Decalogue (see Deut 4–5). The episode is artistically constructed. Before the encounter with the Lord, Elijah is discouraged and almost despairing. The land is evil, the king is evil, the prophets are dead, and Elijah's life has been threatened by Jezebel. He wishes he could die.

But just as Elijah was nourished during the drought and famine, so now he is likewise protected. Twice an angel awakens him to eat, the second time suggesting the journey he is to undertake (v. 7). Just as the Israelites wandered forty years in the desert, so now Elijah takes a journey into the desert for forty days and forty nights. Elijah's complaint to God (v. 10) elicits the Lord's invitation to meet him, an encounter that takes place, not where the power of God is most expected—in heavy winds, an earthquake, a fire—but in a tiny, whispering wind, a noisy silence.

No time now for sulking. Elijah states his plight to Yahweh, but God seemingly ignores his problem and addresses him immediately on another issue. Elijah is a prophet, and as prophet he is commissioned to leave the desert and to anoint three people: Hazael as king of Aram, Jehu as king of Israel, and Elisha as his own successor. These men together will effectively remove all those persons who have been unfaithful to Yahweh. However, a faithful remnant (seven thousand) will be spared.

19:19-21 Call of Elisha. Elijah first calls his successor. The function of the cloak may be symbolic (compare 1 Kgs 11:30-31) or at least an allusion to Elijah's encounter with Yahweh (v. 13). Elisha recognizes the subtle call and follows, symbolically putting an end to his former life.

20:1-43 Ahab's victories over Ben-hadad. That the northern kingdom of Israel was at war with Aram during much of Ahab's reign is certain. There had been hostility and intermittent fighting between the two countries since Baasha's time. But the historical fact is that Israel was victorious over Aram during Ahab's reign. How could the Deuteronomistic theologian account for this? How could Ahab's evil merit victory? Remember the power of Yahweh's prophetic word, especially when a prophet is listened to and obeyed? The first encounter results in an Israelite victory because Ahab seeks the prophet's word and acts accordingly. The second encounter also results in an Israelite victory, this time because the Arameans stupidly believe that Israel's god can be conquered in the plain. The disproportion between the two armies is designed to show the power of Yahweh. Victory is the Lord's.

According to the rules of Israel's "holy war" theology, Yahweh is the warrior who fights for Israel, and, consequently, all spoils belong to Yahweh. Yahweh was victorious over Aram; it was the word of the prophet that directed Ahab's strategy in the first battle; the word of the prophet also warned of a second attack. Yahweh showed great power in achieving Israel's victory over the exceedingly larger forces of Aram. Therefore, Ben-hadad belongs to Yahweh, and Ahab has no right to set him free (v. 34). (The growing power of Assyria in the ancient Near East may be the historical explanation behind the interim peace between Aram and Israel. Shalmaneser's Assyrian Annals refer to an alliance between Aram and Israel toward the end of Ahab's reign [compare 1 Kgs 22:1].)

From a theological perspective, the reference to a prophet's companion who refuses to obey a prophet and is consequently killed (v. 36) is a fitting introduction to the prophetic condemnation of Ahab. Ahab condemns himself in his encounter with the prophet (compare 2 Sam 12). Just as the soldier must bear the penalty for neglecting his charge, Ahab's sparing King Ben-hadad (compare 1 Sam 15:8-9) would lead ultimately to his own death.

21:1-29 Seizure of Naboth's vineyard. To understand why Naboth would not sell or exchange his ancestral heritage, one must refer to such texts as Lev 25 and Josh 13. The interaction of characters shows Ahab accepting traditional values and Naboth's verdict, however unwillingly.

Jezebel, on the other hand, who has appeared in the text only minimally until now—she had killed the prophets and threatened Elijah—does not respect Naboth's decision and ridicules her husband for doing so. She therefore usurps Ahab's power, that is, his name and his seal, and successfully plots Naboth's death. Ahab tacitly cooperates with Jezebel and reaps the benefits. Or so it would seem, until Ahab is again confronted with Elijah! Prophetic condemnation is in order; murder and theft will not go unpunished. Elijah now pronounces a condemnation similar to the ones Jeroboam and Baasha had heard—the violent end of Omri's dynasty. Ahab's body will lie at the very site of his sin. And the evil Jezebel will likewise be destroyed.

Because Ahab hears the word of the prophet for what it is—Yahweh's word of power—he repents. One can expect the prophetic word to be fulfilled, but here as elsewhere (compare 2 Sam 12:13-14) it is mitigated; the punishment owed him is delayed until his son's reign.

22:1-40 Campaign against Ramoth-gilead. Probably at some earlier stage in the text's compilation, notice was given that Jehoshaphat had succeeded Asa on the throne of Judah (see 1 Kgs 22:41-45) before this account of an Israelite-Judean alliance against Aram. Jehoshaphat is here depicted as recognizing the former unity and the potential for unity between Israel and Judah. He therefore seeks to help the northern king regain territory. Though never named in the chapter, that king is Ahab. Perhaps he fades into the background when compared with Jehoshaphat! Whatever happened to Asa's treaty with Aram? Did Aram become greedy and begin to infiltrate southward? Did Jehoshaphat see an alliance with Israel as strategically more important than an alliance with Aram? Israel was, after all, a closer northern neighbor than Aram.

In any event, Jehoshaphat wants the prophets to be consulted (v. 6). The northern king sends for the compromised prophets, those who maintain favor by saying precisely what the king wants to hear. He will go through the motions, but he dare not risk the truth lest the word of the Lord be adverse. Jehoshaphat presses for a more trustworthy prophet, one who will say "whatever the Lord tells" him (v. 14).

Ahab recognizes Micaiah's first sarcastic word to him as untrue (v. 16). The true prophet could only condemn the wicked Ahab. Micaiah's real response is a prediction of Ahab's death in battle: the sheep (see 2 Sam 7:8 and 24:17) will be without a shepherd. Ahab's evil has been so great that the Lord's judgment against him is final. To guarantee that Ahab will not listen to the prophets' prediction of his death and be delivered, Micaiah says that Yahweh has even allowed a lying spirit within the prophets' mouths. Whether Ahab seeks consolation in the deceitful assurance of the false prophets or takes seriously the word of Micaiah, his end will not change. The Lord has decreed evil against him (v. 23).

Micaiah's being sent to prison is not the first reference in the books of Kings to the persecution of a prophet. Jezebel killed many, and Elijah fled for his life from her.

With Ahab's death (v. 35) comes the fulfillment of several prophecies, including Micaiah's. Moreover, Aram has helped to wipe evil out of Israel (compare 1 Kgs 19:17). Ahab is buried, and his son Ahaziah succeeds him (compare 1 Kgs 21:29).

22:41-51 Reign of Jehoshaphat. Jehoshaphat's twenty-five-year reign is relatively uneventful from the perspective of the Deuteronomistic historian. Like his father Asa, he does good in the eyes of the Lord. He continues his father's good practice of removing the cult prostitutes (see 1 Kgs 15:12). Yet, like his father, he also allows the high places to remain active as places of worship (see 1 Kgs 15:14). The reference to Edom and a fleet (vv. 49, 50) implies relative power and prosperity.

22:52-54 Reign of Ahaziah. Like the other kings who end dynasties in the north, Aha-ziah reigns for only two years. His evil is compared not only to Jeroboam's and to his father Ahab's, as we might expect, but also to his mother's. We conclude that his mother was the evil Jezebel, especially since his idolatry is specified as Baal worship.

COMMENTARY: 2 KINGS

PART IV: THE KINGDOMS OF ISRAEL AND JUDAH

2 Kgs 1:1–17:41

1:1-8 Ahaziah consults Baalzebub. A new opening and a new king of Israel. Immediately the reader knows what kind of king the Deuteronomistic theologian judges Ahaziah to be—he consults an idol! What follows immediately is prophetic judgment and condemnation.

1:9-12 Death of two captains. For the Deuteronomistic theologian, the power of the prophet far surpasses the king's. No mere soldiers can overpower the power of God. Rather, Elijah pronounces doom on the soldiers sent to capture him, the two groups of fifty and their captains (compare 1 Kgs 18:13). The word of God through Elijah cannot be silenced; it is effective.

1:13-18 Death of the king. The third captain sent by Ahaziah recognizes Elijah's power and pleads for his own safety. He knows what the king has failed to understand: Yahweh, God of power, is with Elijah. When Elijah meets Ahaziah in person, he repeats Ahaziah's fate: the consequence of idolatry is death.

2:1-8 Elijah and Elisha. Elijah's departure is developed literarily with great detail and leads to a climax. Elisha knows of their imminent separation and wants to be with Elijah as long as possible. Elisha follows the prophet southward, from Gilgal to Bethel, to Jericho, and even to the Jordan. Other prophets testify to Elijah's departure and even follow the two as far as the Jordan. The symbolic role of Elijah's cloak as an instrument of power again surfaces when it is used to divide the waters.

2:9-18 Elisha succeeds Elijah. The other side of the Jordan is the place of God's intervention. Elijah is taken up in a flaming chariot drawn by flaming horses. When Elisha sees this, he knows that, according to Elijah's word, prophetic power in good measure will be bestowed upon him. He tears his own cloak in two; he picks up Elijah's and uses it to recross the Jordan, where he meets those who will now become his followers. Elijah is not to be found; the power of God that had been in him is henceforth to be sought in his successor, Elisha.

Many historical-critical scholars have suggested historical and literary confusion between the two men. This is partly because God had told Elijah to anoint Hazael and Jehu (1 Kgs 19:15-16), but the texts later record that Elisha directs the anointing (see 2 Kgs 8:13 and 9:6). It is sometimes conjectured that the miracles now attributed to Elijah were originally ascribed to Elisha and that they have been altered, repeated, and rearranged in order to heighten the literary contrast between Ahab and Elijah.

2:19-22 Healing of the water. Proof of the efficacy of Elisha's prophetic word is recorded immediately. Potentially fertile land needs pure water if the harvest and the people are to be healthy. Therefore, at the request of the people, Elisha throws salt into the water, and it is henceforth considered a source of well-being. The power of the prophet effects good.

2:23-25 The prophet's curse. The power of the prophet can also effect harm, especially for those who do not take the prophet seriously. Such is the common interpretation of this episode: the cursing of small boys, leading to their death. The writer does not intend to depict the prophet's heartlessness but rather the gravity of taking a prophet lightly.

3:1-27 Campaign of Joram against Moab. Ahab's son Joram succeeds his brother to the throne, another "chip off the old block." Though not as evil as his mother (Jezebel) and his father, in the Deuteronomist's judgment, nevertheless, Joram is evil, like all the northern kings.

Continued peace between Judah and Israel during Jehoshaphat's reign occasioned their alliance, this time along with the Edomites, against Moab (compare 1 Kgs 22). Faced with a water shortage, the kings, at the request of the king of Judah, consult a prophet about their dilemma. They approach Elisha. He rejects Joram, who is too much like his father for Elisha's taste, but for the sake of the king of the south he consults the Lord: they will have sufficient water and even be victors over the Moabites (vv. 17-18). Yahweh effects the victory. Through the miraculous misperception of the Moabites, the promise of the prophet is fulfilled.

Defeat in battle causes the Moabite king to seek Syrian aid, and when that recourse fails, he sacrifices his own child in hopes of winning his god's favor over Israel. This horrifies the Israelites, who return to Israel. Perhaps even they fear the power of the Moabite god in his own land!

4:1-7 The widow's oil. Multiplication of a widow's oil—a miracle Elijah had performed (see 1 Kgs 17:14-16)—is performed also by Elisha. Her own husband had been a prophet, and she trusts the prophet's power. Her complaint brings her deliverance.

4:8-37 Elisha and the Shunammite. Yahweh's prophet has power over life and death. Elisha promises the barren Shunammite a child, and later raises that dead child back to life (compare 1 Kgs 17:21-23). The woman had recognized Elisha as a prophet and had volunteered to provide for his needs; he rewarded her with a child. Now she seeks the prophet after her child's death, again showing confidence in God's representative; again she is rewarded. Gehazi, Elisha's servant, is introduced here. He was unable to bring life back into the child (v. 31).

4:38-41 The poisoned stew. A famine (compare 1 Kgs 18:3) occasions Elisha's next miracle. Just as salt had purified contaminated water (2 Kgs 3:19-22), now meal purifies a poisoned stew. In each case the prophet intervenes and effects miraculous good on behalf of his people's health.

4:42-44 Multiplication of loaves. This miracle complements verses 1-7, and together they parallel 1 Kgs 17:14-16. Twenty barley loaves and ears of grain—food for the prophet, yes, but hardly enough to feed a famine-stricken people. Hardly enough, that is, unless the power of Yahweh is with you.

The close literary connection between the miracles performed by Elijah and Elisha, especially the multiplication of food and the raisings from the dead, and similar miracles of Jesus recounted in the synoptic Gospels cannot be ignored. The New Testament writers seem to have selected particular acts of Jesus to assert, especially to their Jewish converts, that the power of God worked through him.

5:1-27 Cure of Naaman. Five persons are introduced in this episode: Naaman's wife; the Israelite servant girl of Naaman's wife; Naaman himself; Naaman's master, the king of Syria; and, finally, the king of Israel. Four are identified by their relation to the leper, and they all support a request that the king of Israel cure him. Israel's king, however, is powerless, as he himself admits. In contrast, Elisha, the prophet of God with the power of God, can heal.

Elisha commands Naaman to wash seven times in the Jordan, but the leper had washed in other rivers before and refuses. He does not yet realize that the word of the prophet contains the power of God. He ignores the word of the prophet but later is persuaded by his servants, who re-echo the prophet's words. He does what Elisha ordered and is cured (v. 14).

Naaman's physical cure becomes the basis of faith in Israel's God. He wishes to repay the prophet, or at least to buy some of Israel's soil, on which he can, in the future, worship Yahweh in Syria. Elisha refuses the gifts but commends Naaman's conversion.

Gehazi, however, is another story. The power of Yahweh had worked through Elisha to effect Naaman's cure, but why not reap personal benefit from Yahweh's power? Such would seem to be Gehazi's motivation in asking Naaman for the silver talents and the festal garments—motivation strong enough to allow Gehazi to lie, first to Naaman, then to Elisha. But God's knowledge and God's power are both present to God's prophet, who denounces Gehazi's deceit and condemns him to Naaman's leprosy. Infidelity can only yield a curse!

6:1-7 Recovery of the lost ax. Elisha performs another miracle, this one on behalf of one of the prophets. The prophet of God has the power of God and the knowledge of God (see 2 Kgs 5:26-27) to effect good for those who are faithful to God.

6:8-13 Aramean ambush. Elisha is here depicted as a prophet of God with extraordinary knowledge, which he puts to good use on Israel's behalf and against the Arameans.

Proof of his power is the fact that the Arameans want to take him captive.

6:14-23 Blinded Aramean soldiers. The prophet of God can overcome any obstacle with the power of God. He can inspire confidence in his otherwise frightened servant; alone against an Aramean army, he can mediate their being blinded; he can himself lead a blinded army into their enemy's capital; he can even persuade an Israelite king to feed and free Arameans. Further, he can so frighten the Arameans that he causes the raids to cease—raids whose effectiveness the knowledge of God is preventing in the first place. Elisha is in control—or so the Deuteronomistic theology of prophecy would have us believe.

6:24–7:2 Siege of Samaria. War with Syria and famine in Israel describe a country under curse, a land far from fidelity to its God. Sometimes idolatry prompted child sacrifice; now the imminence of starvation has prompted even child cannibalism. The Israelite king blames Elisha for the famine and tries to kill him. Elisha's response is to reassert the power of God: the famine will end the following day, yet the king's adjutant who questioned the prophet's word will die.

7:3-13 The lepers at the gate. What great option is there between death by starvation and death by the sword? Such is the thinking of the lepers as they flee to the Aramean camp. Their courage is rewarded. The power of God, this time giving the impression of a large army and causing the enemy to flee, works on behalf of his people.

7:14-20 End of the siege. The flight of the Arameans signals the end of Israel's captivity in Samaria and, in consequence, the end of their hunger. The Arameans' supplies become spoils of war. Moreover, the word of Elisha to the king's adjutant (see 2 Kgs 7:2) is fulfilled; he is trampled at the city's gate.

8:1-6 Prediction of famine. The woman who had been good to Elisha, to whom he had given a child and for whom he had raised her child back to life, again believes the prophet. Elisha warns of a famine and she flees the land. The famine lasts seven years, after which time she returns to claim her property in Israel. The encounter with the king reveals a believing king. Hearing Gehazi's testimony and the woman's own account, the king returns the woman's possessions. Though always unnamed, she is a model of one who takes God and God's word seriously.

8:7-15 Death of Ben-hadad foretold. Aram has to have taken notice of the power of Yahweh's prophets before now. Elisha had thwarted the Aramean raids into Israel (see 2 Kgs 6:12) and had led the Aramean army into Samaria (see 2 Kgs 6:19). Now the king of Aram consults the prophet of Israel about his health (compare Ahaziah's consulting idols in 2 Kgs 1:2). Elisha uses this occasion to prophesy to Hazael that he will replace Ben-hadad as king.

The historical fact is that Ben-hadad was murdered by his servant, Hazael, who usurped the throne of Aram. The historical fact is, also, that Hazael waged war against Israel (see 1 Kgs 18:17). However, the Deuteronomistic theologian does not accuse Elisha of precipitating the murder. Elisha merely names the end result and Hazael chooses the means.

8:16-24 Reign of Jehoram of Judah. Though king of Judah, Jehoram is like Ahab. He is married to Ahab's sister (implied is the fact that she is "a chip off the old block," just as his sons Ahaziah and Joram were). Jehoram's reign, judged on its own terms from a theological perspective, deserves termination, but God preserves the dynasty for the sake of Jehoram's faithful ancestor, David. There are hard times, however, like the war with the Edomites and the loss of Libnah, political difficulties interpreted as religious condemnation. In spite of his sin, Jehoram is buried with his ancestors in the City of David, and his son Ahaziah succeeds him.

8:25-29 Accession of Ahaziah. Ahaziah's mother was Ahab's sister. Knowing only that, one can predict the Deuteronomist's judgment on his reign! He does evil and is like Ahab. The Judah-Israelite alliance against Aram results in Joram's being wounded in battle (1 Kgs 18:17 predicted that Hazael would kill many Israelites). This occasions a visit by Ahaziah to Joram at Jezreel.

9:1-15 Anointing of Jehu. The story line is interrupted to legitimize Jehu as the successor of Joram. The prophetic message, this time delivered for Elisha by a guild prophet, places Jehu, Joram's servant, on the throne of Israel. The prophetic pronouncement against the house of Ahab (1 Kgs 21:21-22) and Jezebel (1 Kgs 21:23) will now be fulfilled. The other army commanders affirm the anointing and form a conspiracy with Jehu against Joram.

9:16-26 Murder of Joram. Drama accompanies Joram's murder. While being comforted by Ahaziah, king of Judah, his own army commander betrays him. But treason is easy, as attested by the fact that Jehu can so easily win over Joram's drivers. The encounter of Jehu and Joram is depicted as the encounter of good and evil. Jehu, having been anointed by Elisha, vindicates the Lord for the evil that the house of Ahab has done. Moreover, Joram's blood is spilled in a place symbolic of Ahab's guilt, the vineyard of Naboth (see 1 Kgs 21:21).

9:27-29 Death of Ahaziah. Ahaziah, whose mother was Athaliah, Ahab's evil sister, must also be removed. Jehu orders his death and it is accomplished. Yet, because he belonged to the line of David, his body is returned to Jerusalem and buried there with his ancestors in the City of David.

9:30-37 Death of Jezebel. Punishment comes, finally, to the evil Jezebel. Just as Jehu won over Joram's drivers, so now he wins over two or three eunuchs, who throw Jezebel out the window to her death. The manner of her death and the decomposition of her body are fitting theological judgments for evil such as hers. The word of the prophet—the power of Yahweh—is thereby executed (see 1 Kgs 21:23).

Jezebel addressed Jehu as Zimri. Zimri was a chariot commander who killed his master, Elah, the king of Israel, thus terminating the house of Baasha (see 1 Kgs 16). Now Jehu has terminated Ahab's house. Yet Jehu is here understood as the Lord's instrument in purging both Israel and Judah of their evil leadership.

10:1-11 Killing of Ahab's descendants. Jehu is not content to have killed Joram, Ahaziah, and Jezebel; he must rid Israel of all the house of Ahab, seventy descendants. Just as the other army commanders joined Jehu in conspiracy (2 Kgs 9:13-14), the drivers joined him (2 Kgs 9:18-20), and the eunuchs supported him (2 Kgs 9:33), so now the leaders in Samaria do his bidding by slaying all Ahab's living relatives. Jehu sees their deaths—and the extermination of all of Ahab's supporters—as the fulfillment of Elijah's prophecy against the house of Ahab (1 Kgs 21:21).

10:12-14 Ahaziah's kinsmen. The termination of Ahab's house and of the evil king of Judah, Ahaziah, is still not enough. Ahaziah was Athaliah's son, and there were other sons; and Athaliah was Ahab's sister. These are still living. The relatives going to visit Ahaziah's family must also be terminated—all of them.

10:15-17 Jehu in Samaria. These verses reemphasize Jehu's gathering of supporters (see 2 Kgs 9:18-19, 32; 10:5), his killing of those who supported the house of Ahab (see v. 11), and the editor's understanding that these deaths were a fulfillment of Elijah's prophecy (see v. 10). Whether in Jezreel or in Samaria or elsewhere in Israel, all who supported the evil machinations of the house of Ahab are destroyed.

10:18-36 Baal's temple destroyed. This is not the first time a character has used trickery to accomplish God's purpose. Remember the prophet who lied (1 Kgs 13)? Jehu must accomplish his mission to rid Israel of the evil that the house of Ahab has perpetrated in Israel, and this he does (see 1 Kgs 19:17). His reward is that his sons will reign on the throne of Israel to the fourth generation.

But Jehu is also guilty of walking in the sin of Jeroboam by tolerating the shrines at Bethel and Dan. The text judges that sin with reference to loss of the eastern segment of Israel's land to Aram.

11:1-20 Rule of Athaliah. Even those who know the books of Kings will fail to take serious note of Athaliah. In a patriarchal period such as this, no woman could legitimately rule. Jezebel may in fact have been stronger than Ahab (see 1 Kgs 21), and Athaliah, Ahab's sister, may in fact have ruled Judah for seven years, but the house of the male, be it Ahab or David, is always credited.

Just as the courage of certain women saved Moses (Exod 2), so now Jehosheba, Ahaziah's sister, saves Joash (the Davidic dynasty) from Athaliah's murderous hand. The place of protection is none other than the temple, and the protector is the priest Jehoiada, who anoints Joash king of Judah. When Athaliah realizes what has happened—that a male descendant of David has been anointed king—she, and those who support her, are powerless. The death she inflicted on Ahaziah's other sons now becomes her own fate.

Restoration of the Davidic line demands covenant renewal, a recommitment of king and people to the Lord, and a recommitment of the people to the king. Once Baal's temple is destroyed (compare 2 Kgs 10:18-28) the king, having reestablished the appropriate covenant relationship, moves from the Lord's temple to his own palace and throne.

12:1-22 Reign of Joash. Joash was seven when he began to reign, and he reigns for forty years. The Deuteronomist credits the good of his reign to the guidance of Jehoiada.

The account of the temple's repair during Joash's reign describes priests who are not administrators. Apparently Joash's rapport with the priests leads to what he considers a convenient agreement: you keep whatever monies you receive, but you also keep up the temple. For twenty-three years the priests keep the money—period! Called to render an accounting, they beg off responsibility; they will no longer accept the funds, but neither will they be responsible for temple repair. Jehoiada's leadership effects a compromise; he facilitates the collection of the money and its use for temple repair.

Joash's reign has a flaw, however—the high places remain. Usually the high places that the Deuteronomistic historian condemns are associated with Israel. But Athaliah had been Ahab's sister . . . In reality, the continued existence of syncretism in Judah, as well as remaining traces of the idolatry that had existed under Ahaziah, can be presupposed. Furthermore, there may still have been resistance in the countryside, even among Yahwists, to the centralization of worship in Jerusalem. The reader should not be surprised, then, to discover a limited punishment for Judah: Aram poses a threat to their well-being.

The fact that Judah buys off Aram with tribute may be a historical fact, as is Joash's violent death. One may suggest, however, that the juxtaposition of the statements is intended to assert an implicit cause-and-effect relationship, from the theological perspective of the Deuteronomistic historian. Whatever his sins, Joash is David's descendant; he is buried with his ancestors in the City of David, and his son Amaziah succeeds him.

13:1-9 Reign of Jehoahaz of Israel. One might think that this text was lifted from the Book of Judges. Jehoahaz's sin leads to the Lord's anger and oppression by Samaria. However, Jehoahaz entreats the Lord, who sends a deliverer, and the Israelites are liberated from Aram. The pattern, however, will quickly repeat itself (compare Judg 2:11-19). Once back in their land with relative security, the people continue to sin; their fate is lack of prosperity. When Jehoahaz dies, Jehu's descendant continues the line (see 2 Kgs 10:30).

13:10-25 Reign of Joash of Israel. If one were to read these verses logically, one would place verses 22-23 after verse 7; verses 24-25 after verse 19; and verses 12-13 after verse 21. Thus, the Israelites who did evil during Jehoahaz's reign would merit the continued oppression of Aram; yet, the fact that Aram did not totally destroy Israel would also be theologically explained.

Joash's encounter with Elisha again demonstrates the power of the prophet. That Joash takes the prophet seriously is a good sign (though he is desperate) and merits Israel's military successes over Aram; on the other hand, his carrying out of the prophet's word with less than full obedience—thus Elisha interprets the three arrows—accounts for the fact that the victory is limited. The text also hints of conflict between Israel and both Judah (compare 2 Kgs 14:8-14) and Moab.

In spite of Joash's encounter with Elisha, or perhaps because of his less than full success, he receives the traditional Deuteronomistic judgment for a northern king: he is evil, like Jeroboam. Joash is buried in Samaria, and his son succeeds him (see 2 Kgs 10:30).

There is a certain confusion regarding this king's name—Joash or Jehoash; the Hebrew text varies. The accounts recorded here about the king come, most probably, from at least two sources (note, for example, the duplication of verses 12-13 in 2 Kgs 14:15-16).

Elisha, unlike Elijah, dies and leaves no specific successor. Yet, as with Elijah, an aura of the miraculous attends his passing. Because the power of the prophet is in his person—in his life and in his bones—one should not be too surprised that, for the Deuteronomistic historian, even contact with Elisha's bones can restore life. To the end Elisha functions to mediate the power of God.

14:1-22 Amaziah of Judah. Amaziah's mother, Jehoaddin, was from Jerusalem. She, like Joash's mother, Zibia, from Beer-sheba, was of southern origin, which suggests that Amaziah's may be a more positive reign. He is victorious over the Edomites. Yet, like his father, he allows the high places to remain. He engages in an unsuccessful battle against Israel, which depletes the treasuries of both the temple and the palace. Jehoash's advice to Amaziah—don't fight with me because you'll lose—given as an allegory, recalls Jotham's parable (Judg 9:7-15).

Despite Amaziah's violent death outside Jerusalem, he was of David's line. Amaziah is buried in the City of David with his ancestors, and his son Azariah succeeds him.

14:23-29 Jeroboam II of Israel. Jeroboam II, like his namesake, is an evil northern king. Yet his reign is long and prosperous (we know this from 2 Kings and from the prophets Amos and Hosea). This combination of evil and a long prosperous reign is inconsistent with traditional Deuteronomistic theology, where prosperity is normally a consequence of good, and suffering a consequence of evil. However, the long prosperous reign of an evil king can be explained if it fulfills a prophetic promise: the power of the prophet's word will always be accomplished. An interesting thing about verse 25, however, is that it notes the fulfillment of a prophecy that no preceding text has made. This is the first time in the Deuteronomistic History that Jonah, son of Amittai, is mentioned.

15:1-7 Azariah of Judah. The Deuteronomist's judgment of Azariah's reign, like the reign of his father, is mixed. His mother, Jecholiah, is from Jerusalem. Azariah does good in the Lord's eyes; his reign is long (through the reigns of five northern kings). But the high places remain, and he becomes a leper. Azariah, of David's line, is buried with his ancestors in the City of David and is succeeded by his son Jotham.

15:8-12 Zechariah of Israel. Jeroboam's son stands in contrast to his strong father; he maintains the throne for only six months before falling victim to a conspiracy. The Deuteronomistic historian sees both his reign and its termination as the fulfillment of the Lord's word to Jehu (see 2 Kgs 10:30).

15:13-16 Shallum of Israel. Not much can be said about Shallum's one-month reign. The instability of the throne is obvious. Another conspiracy and another king. Even before the Deuteronomistic theologian can evaluate Menahem, Shallum's murderer and successor, the reader can predict what the judgment will be for a king who cruelly takes revenge on the innocent and on those who had been faithful to their king.

15:17-22 Menahem of Israel. Menahem receives the Deuteronomist's condemnation, as one would expect. He is evil, like Jeroboam. He postpones the potential Assyrian threat and secures his throne by paying tribute to the Assyrian king—tribute he has exacted from his own people.

15:23-26 Pekahiah of Israel. Pekahiah is not spared the Deuteronomistic judgment accorded all northern kings. Menahem's son maintains the throne for two years but is then murdered by his adjutant, Pekah.

15:27-31 Pekah of Israel. Pekah is also evil and is compared to Jeroboam. During his reign Israel continues to be troubled by Assyria. Tribute is no longer sufficient; Assyria takes over some Israelite land. Pekah is not strong enough to withstand Hoshea's conspiracy.

15:32-38 Jotham of Judah. The first thing to note is another confusion in names—Azariah and Uzziah as designations for Jotham's father—probably caused here, too, by the presence of two sources. Jotham, like his father, does good in the eyes of the Lord; he survives a sixteen-year reign and builds one of the gates of the temple. Yet the high places remain; Aram and Israel oppress Judah. When Jotham dies, he is buried with his ancestors in the City of David and is succeeded by his son Ahaz.

16:1-20 Ahaz of Judah. Ahaz merits condemnation of the Deuteronomistic historian for his idolatry and child sacrifice (compare Gen 22). Judah is significantly weakened at this time. The Edomites have recaptured territories, and the Aram-Israelite coalition has attacked Judah, with the intention of removing Ahaz from the throne. Though their plan is unsuccessful, it forces a Judean-Assyrian alliance that, for all practical purposes, makes Judah a vassal of Assyria. The prophet Isaiah warned against such an alliance (Isa 7:1-16). The increase of Assyrian influence means not only the continued presence of syncretism, the high places, and idolatry, as well as the pillaging of the Lord's temple, but also the replacing of Yahweh's altar with an Assyrian one. From the Deuteronomistic theologian's perspective, what greater insult could Yahweh be rendered?

Yet, in spite of everything, Ahaz is David's descendant. Therefore, he is buried with his ancestors in the City of David and is succeeded by his son Hezekiah.

17:1-41 Hoshea of Israel. Assyria destroyed the northern kingdom of Israel once and for all about 721 B.C.E. (see 2 Kgs 18:9-12). It was standard Assyrian policy to take into exile many of the leading citizens of a conquered nation (for example, the priests) and to transplant foreign peoples into the subjugated territory. The aim was to prevent the development of opposition capable of effecting a conspiracy.

The text notes three stages in the development of postexilic syncretism in Israel. Since Yahweh is the God of the land, appropriate worship need be rendered to Yahweh alone. However, since the dominant population, at least in influence, is now non-Israelite, Yahweh is ignored. A compromise is reached when Yahwism is combined with the idolatrous practices of other peoples.

The Deuteronomistic theologian interprets Israel's demise as fitting punishment for all the evil committed against the Lord. Both Israel and Judah have constantly and consistently turned a deaf ear to prophetic warnings. Now Israel, at the hand of Assyria, has paid for its infidelity. Moreover, the future seems ominous for Judah. The dynasty of David remains, but if it has more kings like Ahaz (see 2 Kgs 16), one must ask, "For how long?"

PART V: THE KINGDOM OF JUDAH AFTER 721 B.C.E.

2 Kgs 18:1–25:30

18:1-12 Hezekiah. Hezekiah is very unlike his father; he is even compared to David! Not only is Hezekiah credited with destroying the remnants of Ahaz's idolatry, but he even removes the bronze serpent that Moses made (see Num 21:9). His fidelity is rewarded with a twenty-nine-year reign, prosperity, victory over Philistine cities, and the securing of independence from Assyria in the early stages of his reign, at the very time when Israel is conquered.

18:13-37 Invasion of Sennacherib. Yet, Assyria remains a serious threat. The dialogue recorded here focuses on whom to trust: Hezekiah and his God, or the powerful king of Assyria (compare Isa 36 and 1 Kgs 18). Hezekiah is made to look weak, whereas past Assyrian victories are recounted. By now the reader can predict the Deuteronomist's judgment. Fidelity to the Lord and the covenant will yield success, no matter what the odds. Trust in a foreign power and an idolatrous people, however, can only bring doom.

19:1-19 Hezekiah and Isaiah. Having heard the message of the Assyrian king, Hezekiah proceeds to the temple of the Lord and consults Yahweh's prophet Isaiah. Before Hezekiah has even heard the prophet's consoling word, he imagines a happy outcome: Yahweh angry at Assyrian pride and punishing them accordingly. Isaiah confirms that there is no reason for Hezekiah to fear the Assyrian king. When the king of Assyria repeats his threats, Hezekiah again seeks the Lord (compare Isa 37:1-20).

19:20-37 Punishment of Sennacherib. Isaiah again consoles Hezekiah. "For the sake of David," the Deuteronomistic historian reminds the reader, Assyria will not destroy Jerusalem.

The power of the prophet's word is quickly effected. Yahweh, Israel's warrior, destroys many Assyrian troops, and the survivors flee. Nor does the Assyrian king escape punishment; rather, his own sons kill him. Whereas Yahweh's temple had been a source of deliverance for Hezekiah and Judah, Nisroch's temple becomes the site of Sennacherib's murder (compare Isa 37:21-38).

20:1-21 Hezekiah's illness. Hezekiah's relationship with the Lord is further developed by his cure. Although Isaiah had prophesied that Hezekiah would die from his illness, Hezekiah entreats the Lord, who hears his prayer and adds fifteen years to his life. The sign that the prophet's revised word would be fulfilled is the miraculous movement of a shadow (compare Isa 38:1-8), an immediate indication of the effective power of Yahweh (compare 1 Kgs 13:3-5).

With the emergence of Babylon as a world power, Assyria ceased to be a major threat to the nations of the ancient Near East. Such was the political reality. The Deuteronomistic History, however, uses this opportunity to foreshadow Babylon's eventual victory over Judah with a prophetic proclamation to Hezekiah. Friendliness to Babylon, whether now by Hezekiah or later by Josiah, will not prevent Judah's demise at their hands. Yet, Hezekiah himself will continue to be rewarded for his own fidelity; the doom will come only after his death (compare Isa 39). Hezekiah, of David's line, is buried with his ancestors and is succeeded by his son Manasseh.

21:1-18 Reign of Manasseh. Manasseh's desecration of Jerusalem with innocent blood and his violation of the Lord's temple with every possible expression of idolatry are unforgivable. The promise made to Solomon of the Lord's continued presence in his temple and a Davidic descendant continually on the throne of Israel (see 1 Kgs 9:3-5) was conditioned on the kings' adherence to covenant fidelity. The Deuteronomistic theologian now calls on the word of God, through the prophets, to condemn Manasseh's sin and to predict the dire consequences it will have on Judah. The end is coming.

The Deuteronomistic historian acknowledges the fact that Manasseh survived on the throne of Israel for fifty-five years, the longest recorded reign of any Davidic king, yet he was also judged theologically to be the most evil of them. Perhaps the subtle note that Manasseh was buried "in the palace garden, the garden of Uzza" (v. 18) rather than an explicit statement that he was buried with his ancestors in the City of David is his way of judging Manasseh most harshly. To be buried, first of all, and then to be buried with one's ancestors was of prime importance to the Israelites. In spite of Manasseh's evil, his son succeeded him; a Davidic king remained on the throne as long as the nation of Judah existed.

21:19-26 Reign of Amon. A "chip off the old block," Amon is condemned for doing evil similar to that which his father had done. However, Amon falls more easily into the curses such sin merits: his reign lasts only two years; he is murdered; and he is buried, like his father, in the garden of Uzza. The instability of the people can be seen by the murder of those who murder. In any case, Amon's son Josiah is able to succeed him as king.

22:1-7 Reign of Josiah. Josiah, like Hezekiah, merits comparison to David. Moreover, just as Joash restored the temple after the evil Athaliah's reign, so Josiah sets out to do likewise (compare 2 Kgs 11–12).

22:8–23:30 The book of the law. Josiah is in the process of renovating the temple when the book of the law is found. When he hears its content, he judges his own ancestors by its standards and becomes fearful for Judah's future; the nation merits Yahweh's curses. To further evaluate the book's potential impact on Judah, he sends it to the prophetess Huldah, who will render the Lord's judgment. The word she speaks is twofold: yes, Judah will be punished for its history of sin; however, because of Josiah's distress over the Lord's word, the nation will not be destroyed until after the king's death (compare 1 Kgs 21:29).

The reading of the book of the law in the presence of all the people recalls Moses' command that such a reading be done (Deut 31:9-13). The covenant renewal ceremony recalls both Josh 24:25-27 and 2 Kgs 11:17-20. The covenant ceremony and the proclamation of the law symbolize Israel's recommitment to Yahweh.

Josiah's purification of the temple is as extensive as Manasseh's desecration of it. Specific comment is also made concerning the removal of all the idolatrous remnants left over from the reigns of Solomon, Ahaz, and Manasseh in Judah, and even from that of Jeroboam in Israel. Josiah does, in fact, fulfill the word of the prophet recorded about him in 1 Kgs 13:2. Moreover, the celebration of Passover—a return to the nation's roots—is here reestablished (compare Exod 12; Num 9; Deut 16; Josh 5).

How can the Deuteronomistic theologian accommodate the good that Josiah effected in Judah with the imminent fall of the nation to Babylon? He repeats the prophetic condemnation of Manasseh (see 2 Kgs 21:10-15), reminding the reader of the curses Judah would suffer for its neglect of the covenant (2 Kgs 22:16). And Josiah dies before his nation falls.

Josiah dies at the battle of Meggido (609 B.C.E.). Judah has aligned itself with Babylon against an Egypt-Assyrian coalition; thus the king is killed at the hands of Egypt. This historical truth cannot be denied, in spite of the Deuteronomistic judgment of Josiah's reign. However, Josiah is returned to Jerusalem to be buried and is succeeded by his son Jehoahaz.

Many scholars question whether the book of the law was found in the temple or compiled for the first time, from ancient laws, at this period. They also question whether Josiah established—again, for the first time—or reestablished the Passover. For the purposes of this commentary, it suffices to know that there are good arguments to support both positions.

23:31-35 Reign of Jehoahaz. The Deuteronomistic judgment on Jehoahaz is quite simple: he does evil, for which he is punished. His punishment is a three-month reign, exile to Egypt, and death in exile. His successor, although a Davidic descendant, is not his son but one of the sons of Josiah, his half-brother. Egypt's power over Judah's king is symbolized by the change in name—Eliakim to Jehoiakim; he is not to be understood as a servant of the Davidic covenant and of Yahweh but of Egypt. He does what a vassal should do: he collects tribute from the people to placate Pharaoh Neco.

23:36–24:7 Reign of Jehoiakim. With Babylon's decisive victory over Egypt at the battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.E.), Judah's enemy changed names. The threat that had been Egypt-Assyria was now, decisively, Babylon. In fact, Judah became Babylon's vassal.

Jehoiakim's vain attempt to overthrow the power of Babylon could only yield disaster. The Deuteronomistic historian uses this opportunity to explain Judah's fall as prophetic fulfillment. The Lord has changed sides; God now supports all those nations that are against Judah, and this because of Manasseh's sins (see 2 Kgs 21:10-15). Yet, in spite of Jehoiakim's evil, he is of David's line; he rests with his ancestors and is succeeded by his son Jehoiachin.

24:8-17 Reign of Jehoiachin. Jehoiachin, whose mother, Nehushta, is from Jerusalem, himself does evil in the Lord's eyes. His reign lasts only three months. Isaiah had foretold Jehoiachin's exile to Babylon, along with the exile of others and the confiscation of the temple and palace treasuries (see 2 Kgs 20:17-18). Again, the word of the Lord is effective. When Nebuchadnezzar places Jehoiachin's uncle as puppet king on Judah's throne, he changes his name, the same thing Pharaoh Neco had done to Eliakim and for similar reasons. Mattaniah (Zedekiah) is fully under Babylonian control.

24:18–25:21 Reign of Zedekiah. Zedekiah does evil in the Lord's eyes as his predecessor had done. In fact, he functions as Nebuchadnezzar's puppet for a while, in spite of Babylon's harsh treatment of Judah, but then he rebels. He is not strong enough, however, to rebel, either militarily (from a historical perspective) or by way of fidelity to Yahweh (from a theological perspective). The consequence is, as one might expect, disaster. Zedekiah is captured and blinded, his sons slain. Moreover, Jerusalem is totally devastated: the temple is dismantled and burned, as are the palace and the other large dwellings. The city walls are destroyed, and another wave of people are taken into exile. In addition, the exiles close to the king are killed.

25:22-26 Governorship of Gedaliah. Nebuchadnezzar's delegate, according to this testimony, wants a peaceful situation in Judah and is willing to abide Judah's former army commanders and the citizens who remain in the land. Among these, however, is one Ishmael, who leads a rebellion; a takeover, however, is impossible. As a result, since they have murdered the Babylonian governor, the Judeans are forced to flee to Egypt, for fear of Babylonian retaliation (compare Jer 40–44).

25:27-30 Release of Jehoiachin. The granting of amnesty on the occasion of a new king's inauguration was a relatively common practice in the ancient Near East. For this reason many think that the notation that Jehoiachin was released from prison is historically accurate. But, even so, why should these verses, a duplication of which is found at the end of the book of Jeremiah, end the Deuteronomistic History? Some scholars believe that the History was written to explain why Judah fell. Others hold that the History is a call to future fidelity: learn from the past for the present. Those who prefer this latter interpretation see these final verses as open to a new future. Yes, Judah had been destroyed; yes, the temple had been burned; yes, the Davidic dynasty, as it had been known, was at an end. But . . . the king had not been killed; the Davidic promise had not been totally snuffed out. In fact, Jehoiachin is given a seat above other kings and eats daily at the Babylonian king's table. That this assertion has symbolic significance—whether or not it is historically true—is clear from a similar reference in the Deuteronomistic History (compare 2 Sam 9:7).

If we were to follow the inspired record of Judah's history further, we would see that hope does lie, long after the Exile, in a Davidic successor. The Gospel of Matthew, for instance, is quick to name Jesus as "son of David" (Matt 1:1).

1 AND 2 CHRONICLES

Alice L. Laffey, R.S.M.

INTRODUCTION

Scholars believe that the books of Chronicles are a rewriting of Israel's history from the perspective of postexilic priests. It is commonly agreed that these books were written after the Deuteronomistic History, probably even after the exiles had returned to Judah. Generally speaking, the unique texts and the additions describe matters of particular interest to priests, including sabbath observance, ritual specifications, descriptions of various temple accessories, and the like. Because much of the content of these books is identical to the content of the Deuteronomistic History, and since space is limited in a commentary such as this, only those passages which are unique to the books of Chronicles and which, by the nature of their content, shed light on the Chronicler's particular theological purpose will be commented on here.

Yahweh's temple and Israel's postexilic identity

Yahweh's chosen people, those for whom Yahweh had been warrior and king (see Exod 15:3, 18; compare Zeph 3:15, 17), the recipients of the Lord's promises of land, progeny, and prosperity, are now deprived of national independence. The glorious promises lie in Israel's past; the present is haunted by Persian domination. If there is to be hope for the future, it must be found in Israel's identity as Yahweh's people and, consequently, in conscientious and enthusiastic dedication to the Lord's presence in their midst—thus the importance of Yahweh's temple and Yahweh's priests for postexilic Israel and for the Chronicler. The Chronicler encourages a downtrodden people. All is not lost. They remain the Lord's people, and in that very bond is their future.

The monarchic ideal

Reading through the books of Chronicles, one notes radical differences between the Deuteronomist's and the Chronicler's portrayal of Judah's kings. David and Solomon are idealized by the Chronicler. There is no lust for Bathsheba, no prophetic condemnation, no betrayal by one's son, no potential conspiracy. David emerges as the model monarch. And the same can be said of Solomon. One never learns from the Chronicler of Solomon's seven hundred foreign wives and consequent idolatry. Solomon, like his father, is fully faithful to his God. Pride in one's past is hope for one's future; fidelity is the foundation on which to build the future. The God of David's covenant, the God who continues to give life to postexilic Israel, needs fully faithful followers, and they, in turn, need the memory of model monarchs.

The northern kingdom, condemned by the Deuteronomist from Jeroboam I onward, does not even merit mention in the Chronicler's account. There is no time for their infidelity, no place for memories best forgotten. The Chronicler deemphasizes the two kingdoms of Israel's sinful past in order to highlight the one chosen people of the Lord.

The Deuteronomistic theology

While the Deuteronomist understood well-being and prosperity as God's blessing and reward for covenant fidelity, while curses of one kind or another were God's punishment for infidelity, the Chronicler makes the relationship even more precise. He makes no mention of Hezekiah's possessing any shortcomings. The evil Manasseh receives not only immediate condemnation but also immediate punishment. And for the Chronicler, it is not Manasseh who causes Judah's downfall (compare 2 Kgs 23:26), since he is succeeded by the noble Josiah; rather, Judah's fall is fitting recompense for cumulative evil, and especially for the sinfulness of Judah's last kings.

COMMENTARY: 1 CHRONICLES

PART I: GENEALOGICAL TABLES

1 Chr 1:1–9:34

The first section of Chronicles has no parallel in the Deuteronomistic History. Genealogies are normally associated, however, with the Priestly writer of the Pentateuch. For example, Gen 5:1-28 traces the lineage from Adam to Noah (compare 1 Chr 1:1-4); Gen 11:10-17, 31-32, the lineage from Shem to Abraham (compare 1 Chr 1:10-27, 31-32); and Gen 25:12-17 traces the sons of Ishmael (compare 1 Chr 1:29-31). Moreover, a table of nations compiled by the Priestly writer in Gen 10 indicates where the families in the patriarchal line settled (compare 1 Chr 1:4-23 and 4:1–8:40).

The Priestly writer has a penchant for order. Creation, in his account, takes place in climactic order within six days (Gen 1:1–2:4); there is a census taken of the Israelite tribes before their departure from Sinai (Num 1:1-54; compare 1 Chr 4:1–8:40), and the tribes are arranged for departure (Num 2:1-34); a separate census is taken of the Levites (Num 4:1-49); and, finally, a list of the scouts sent to spy out Canaan is enumerated (Num 13:16).

The line of descent from Jacob to David consists of ten men: Perez, Hezron, Ram, Amminadab, Nahshon, Salmah, Boaz, Obed, Jesse, and David (1 Chr 2:3-25). One notes also how tersely the Davidic line is summarized (1 Chr 3:1-24) with an indication that Judah is carried into captivity in Babylon because of its rebellion (1 Chr 9:1). Those who return, those with whom the Chronicler is most familiar, are lay Israelites, Levites, priests, and temple slaves (1 Chr 9:2).

In postexilic Jerusalem the remnants of the tribes, those originally both from northern Israel and from southern Judah, dwelt together. Yet those most influential in the land were the priests and those associated with them.

PART II: THE HISTORY OF DAVID

1 Chr 9:35–29:29

The remainder of the first book of Chronicles is devoted to David. The text is similar to, yet different from, the books of Samuel. First of all, there is no elaborate description of the pros and cons of kingship; monarchy is a given. King Saul functions here—his genealogy and the account of his death and burial—as no more than a context in which to introduce David. In contrast, the role of priests, sacred objects, and sacred places is emphasized. Though 1 Chr 15 in many ways parallels 2 Sam 6—David's bringing the ark of the covenant up to Jerusalem—the following chapter in Chronicles, an addition, is dedicated to the Levites who minister at the ark and their prayers. Moreover, toward the end of David's reign, he himself begins preparations for the temple (1 Chr 22:2-5).

Similarly, the Chronicler notes that before David's death, he organized the Levites into classes (1 Chr 23): the priests (1 Chr 24); the singers (1 Chr 25); the gatekeepers, the treasurers, and the magistrates (1 Chr 26); the army commanders, the tribal heads, and the overseers (1 Chr 27). These chapters have no counterparts in the books of Samuel.

10:13-14 Judgment of Saul. This small addition to the account of Saul's death in Kings is a good example of how the author of Chronicles makes even more explicit the Deuteronomistic theology. Saul's death is explained as a consequence of his rebellion against the Lord (compare 1 Sam 13:13-14 and 15:22-23) and of his consulting the witch of Endor (1 Sam 28).

11:42–13:5 David's mighty men. Typical of the Chronicler, he lists names in great number. In addition to the military supporters enumerated in 1 Chr 11:10-41 (compare 2 Sam 23:8-39), additional names are here given. Except for this mention, we know nothing of these men.

David's army is described in ideal terms: the bowmen can shoot arrows and sling stones with both hands (12:2); the warriors are experts with shield and spear. Men from all Israel—all the tribes—support David. Everyone recognizes that God helps David (1 Chr 13:18); his great army is like an "army of God." David is anointed king over Israel in Hebron (1 Chr 11:3) and gradually wins support for kingship over all Israel (1 Chr 13:38).

15:1-24 The ark brought to Jerusalem. This is a more extensive version of 2 Sam 6. Again, emphasis is given to the Levites. They alone may transport the ark, and they are to direct the appropriate musical accompaniments for the occasion.

16:37-42 Attendants before the ark. Having brought the ark to Jerusalem and having celebrated its presence there, David commissions certain men to remain with the ark. These will offer appropriate sacrifices and make appropriate thanksgiving, while others will serve as gatekeepers and musicians.

21:26–22:19 The altar, the temple, and Solomon. The text asserts that the site of Ornan's threshing floor became the site of Jerusalem's temple. It was more appropriate than Gibeon because the Lord had heard David's prayer here.

Chapter 22 builds on chapter 17. The promise announced there to David—that his son would build the temple—is here developed. David collects materials and workers for the temple and commissions his son. In contrast with David, who fought wars and shed blood, Solomon is to be a man of peace. Whereas 1 Kgs 3 explains that there was not yet sufficient peace in Israel during David's reign for him to build the temple, the Lord now grants this peace to Solomon. Postexilic Judah longs for peace. Shalom means much more than an absence of fighting; the term refers to the fullest possible well-being.

23:1-32 The Levitical classes. In contrast with the account in 2 Kgs 1–2, the Chronicler does not depict Solomon as having any rivals to his throne.

All Levites thirty years old and older (v. 3; but see v. 24) are to serve the Lord's temple, the courts, and the chambers. Whether by their presence at the sacrifices, their care of the sacred vessels, or by prayer, their lives are to be devoted to the temple.

24:1-19 The priestly classes. At the time of David there was no distinction between the Levitical and priestly classes. Here lies an anachronism. These men are also temple officers, whose functions are assigned impartially by lot.

24:20-31 Other Levites. The men whose names are listed in typical priestly fashion also served the temple and, just like Aaron's descendants, they too are assigned temple tasks impartially.

25:1-30 The singers. One notes here a reference to David's musical talent (compare 1 Sam 16:18). The music ministers also cast lots to determine their functions in nonhierarchical fashion: young and old, master and apprentice—twenty-four lots in all.

26:1-19 Classes of gatekeepers. The families of Kore and Merari provide the gatekeepers. Again, lots are cast to determine the watches and the gates. No preference is accorded larger families over smaller ones, or vice versa.

26:20-28 Treasurers. All the temples of the ancient Near East had treasuries, and the temple at Jerusalem was no exception (compare 1 Kgs 14:26). These treasuries contained the valuable offerings from previous kings as well as the treasures of the present ruler.

26:29-32 Magistrates. David also appoints civil officials, judges, and police officers to ensure the efficient and effective administration of his kingdom.

27:1-15 Army commanders. Twelve groups of twenty-four thousand men, with each group having its own commander, form David's standing army.

27:16-24 Tribal heads. There is also a leader for each of Israel's twelve tribes. A census is not permitted, since the Lord had promised that Israel would be numerous beyond counting (compare 2 Sam 24 and 1 Chr 21).

27:25-31 Overseers. David also appoints administrators over his treasury, the storehouses, farm workers, the vineyards and their produce, the olive and sycamore trees and the oil, over the cattle, camels, she-asses, and the flocks.

27:32-34 David's court. Jonathan and Jehiel tutor David's sons. Ahithophel (compare 2 Sam 16:23), Jehoiada, and Abiathar (compare 1 Sam 22:20-23) are counselors; and Hushai is David's confidant (compare 2 Sam 17:1-23). Joab commands the king's army (compare 2 Sam 8:16 and 20:23).

28:1-10 The assembly at Jerusalem. 1 Chr 17 (compare 2 Sam 7) promises David a dynasty; the prophet further proclaims that David's son will build the Lord's temple. 1 Chr 22 gives a further explanation of why David will not build the temple—he has shed too much blood. But Solomon must be careful to observe the precepts and decrees that the Lord gave Moses for Israel (1 Chr 22:13). Now, in chapter 28, David commissions Solomon as his successor and reasserts Solomon's role in establishing David's dynasty and in building the Lord's temple. More explicitly than in the other texts, however, the author warns of the consequences of Solomon's infidelity: if he abandons the Lord, he will be cast off forever (1 Chr 28:9).

28:11-21 Temple plans given to Solomon. In contrast with the account in 1 Kings, in which David is already dead before Solomon initiates the building of the temple, here David does the planning and lays most of the groundwork. By the time of the writing of Chronicles, David is clearly understood to be Israel's ideal king.

29:1-9 Offerings for the temple. The temple, the house of the Lord, deserves the most exquisite adornments. Therefore, as a statement of David's wholehearted commitment to the Lord and his dwelling place, David freely gives his personal treasury to enhance the future temple. In so doing, David becomes a model for all wealthy Israelites.

29:10-22 David's prayer. 2 Sam 22 is a thanksgiving prayer attributed to David and inserted into the Deuteronomistic History. The Chronicler parallels this prayer with a shorter one of his own. Not only do his sentiments include praise, but David here adds typical self-abnegation formulae with appropriate petitions (compare 2 Sam 7:18-19 and 1 Chr 17:16-27).

29:22-25 Solomon anointed. David had named Solomon his successor (1 Chr 23:1). In contrast with the first chapters of 1 Kings, this account presents no struggle; here there are no contenders for David's throne; here no enemies or potential conspirators need be removed. This latter account is, of course, an idealization. Anything needlessly problematic, anything that would show either David or Solomon in less than favorable light has been omitted.

29:26-30 Death of David. The Chronicler accords David a slightly more expanded death notice than that which he receives in 1 Kgs 2:10-11. It resembles those given by the Deuteronomistic historian to the other kings of his line. However, here three sources are named—two of the allusions are probably the creations of the Chronicler—from which one is supposed to be able to secure further information about David's reign. The Book of Samuel is a legitimate source familiar to readers of the Old Testament, but what about the histories of Nathan and of Gad? Did those prophets, like the Chroniclers of Israel and Judah, once compose written records that now are lost? Or is the allusion meant merely to call one's attention to these three men of God who validated David as Yahweh's chosen servant and Israel's king?

COMMENTARY: 2 CHRONICLES

PART I: THE REIGN OF SOLOMON

2 Chr 1:1–9:31

The first nine chapters of 2 Chronicles closely parallel 1 Kgs 3–11 and describe the reign of Solomon. More attention, however, is paid to priestly things, as one might expect. For example, in 2 Chr 1:2-5, the narrator makes a special point of distinguishing between the tent of meeting at Gibeon, where Solomon went to pray and to offer sacrifice, and the ark of God at Jerusalem, in the tent that David had pitched for it. No attempt is made in 1 Kings to explain why, if both the ark and the tent were in Jerusalem (see 2 Sam 7:2), Solomon went to Gibeon to worship (see 1 Kgs 3:4). The Chronicler notices the inconsistency and provides an explanation. Although Gibeon no longer functioned as an appropriate place for David to worship (see 1 Chr 21:28–22:1), the tent of meeting still remained there; thus it was appropriate for Solomon to go there.

In a similar way, Solomon, in appealing to Hiram of Tyre for aid in building the Lord's temple, adds a far more detailed explanation than is found in 1 Kgs 5:1-12 of the functions to be performed in the future temple: the burning of incense and sweet spices (compare Exod 30); the continual offering of the showbread (compare Lev 24:5-9); the burnt offerings—morning and evening, on the sabbaths, on the new moons, and at the appointed feasts. The Israelites who were ordered to help with temple building were "aliens living in the land" (1 Chr 22:2; 2 Chr 2:17-18; but compare 1 Kgs 9:15-22 and 2 Chr 8:7-9).

The Chronicler specifies what the Deuteronomistic historian had only suggested: that the site purchased by David where he had offered sacrifice after the census (see 2 Sam 24:18-25 and 1 Chr 21:16-30) became, in fact, the location of the temple. The only other reference to Moriah in the Old Testament occurs in Gen 22. There it is the mountain on which Abraham almost sacrificed Isaac to the Lord. The Chronicler here connects the fidelity of Abraham and the sacredness of his sacrifice with Israel's new cultic site.

After the temple had been built, the ark was brought into it in procession (compare 1 Kgs 8:1-9). To the Deuteronomist's description the Chronicler adds further detail: the priests present sanctified themselves without regard to divisions (compare 1 Chr 24); all the Levitical singers stood with their cymbals, harps, and lyres alongside the priest trumpeters east of the altar, and they all praised the Lord in unison (compare 1 Chr 25). The words of their song echo Psalms 118 and 136.

7:1-3. After Solomon's prayer dedicating the temple, the Chronicler adds that God's acceptance of it took the form of a fire coming down from heaven and consuming the offerings (compare 1 Chr 21:26; Lev 9:24; and even 1 Kgs 18:38-39). The people responded by rendering adoration to the Lord. The musical instruments made by David for the Lord's praise are used at the dedication (compare 1 Chr 17:41-42).

7:13-15. The Chronicler inserts into the Lord's response to Solomon's prayer an affirmation that Solomon's requests will be granted. After drought, locust plague, and pestilence—the Lord's punishments for Israel's sins—if the people repent and seek the Lord, God will forgive them and restore their health and the well-being of their land. Yet, the same conditions set forth in 1 Kgs 9 are included here: Fidelity to the Lord like David's will ensure the continuation of the dynasty; idolatry, however, will lead to the temple's destruction and to exile.

8:11. Solomon had married Pharaoh's daughter, and, according to the account in 1 Kings, she lived in the City of David until Solomon built her a home. The Chronicler, subtly emphasizing the taint of a foreign woman, acknowledges her role as Solomon's wife, but points out that she does not live in the house of David. The place where the ark of the Lord had been is considered holy; therefore, it is inappropriate for her to dwell there.

8:12-15. The Chronicler establishes Solomon as a model worshiper. According to the duty of each day—the sabbaths, the new moons (compare Num 28:14; 29:6), the three annual feasts (compare Lev 23)—Solomon offers appropriate sacrifices; he also appoints the divisions of the priests (see 1 Chr 24), the Levites (see 1 Chr 23), and the gatekeepers (see 1 Chr 26). The Chronicler idealizes Solomon; contrary to the Deuteronomist's record, there is no mention of Solomon's infidelity.

9:29. Just as the Chronicler names sources for further information about David and his reign (compare 1 Chr 29:29), so here mention is made of records containing more information about Solomon: the history of Nathan, the prophecy of Ahijah, and the visions of Iddo.

PART II: THE MONARCHY BEFORE HEZEKIAH

2 Chr 10:1–27:9

10:1–12:16 The reign of Rehoboam. The Chronicler adds to the Deuteronomist's account of Rehoboam's reign the building of several fortified cities. He further reports that the priests and Levites who had been in the north came south to Judah and Jerusalem, having been expelled by Jeroboam. In addition, those who sought the Lord also came south to Jerusalem to sacrifice.

The first three years of Rehoboam's reign are secure not only because he administers well but, more importantly, because he is faithful to the Lord (no such testimony is given in Kings!). The Chronicler gives an account, omitted from Kings, of Rehoboam's family: eighteen wives, sixty concubines, twenty-eight sons, and sixty daughters. Rehoboam wants Abijah, the eldest son of his favorite wife, Maacah, to succeed him (in 1 Kgs 1–2 Solomon, the eldest living son of Bathsheba, is David's choice).

The second part of Rehoboam's reign is characterized by infidelity to the Lord. The Chronicler's insertion here is consistent with Deuteronomistic theology: the Lord sends Shishak, king of Egypt, to punish Judah's sin (12:1-2). The Lord, however, sends Shemaiah to Rehoboam to interpret for him what is happening. Rehoboam has abandoned the Lord, so the Lord is abandoning Rehoboam. Repentance leads to a mitigation of the intended and deserved punishment; though Shishak attacks Jerusalem, Judah is not completely destroyed.

More information about Rehoboam can be found in the chronicles of Shemaiah and of Iddo (12:15). Again, we note a priestly alteration of the text of Kings, which says that further information about Rehoboam can be found in the chronicles of the kings of Judah.

13:1-22 The reign of Abijah. Whereas Rehoboam's son Abijah (Abijam in Kings) is dispensed with in a brief eight verses of the Deuteronomistic History, the Chronicler devotes considerably more attention to him and characterizes him very differently. In 1 Kgs 15:3 he walks in the sins of his father, and his heart is not wholly true to God. For the Chronicler, he is a foil for Jeroboam. Abijah, in contrast to Jeroboam, has fallen heir to the covenant of salt (compare Lev 2:13). The two fight, and despite Jeroboam's larger army and shrewder military strategy, Abijah's trust in the Lord is rewarded with victory. The Chronicler also adds a note about his family: fourteen wives, twenty-two sons, and sixteen daughters. More information can be learned about the ways of Abijah by consulting the story of the prophet Iddo (v. 22).

14:1–15:19 The first part of Asa's reign. A mere fifteen verses describe Asa's reign in 1 Kgs 15; in contrast, the Chronicler elaborates for almost three chapters. Though nowhere in the Chronicler's account of the previous kings of Judah does it say that they worshiped idols, the Chronicler, nevertheless, praises Asa for removing the foreign altars, the high places, the pillars, the Asherim, the incense altars. Moreover, the earliest part of Asa's reign is blessed with peace, and when there is war with the Ethiopians, the Lord rewards Judah's faithfulness and brings victory.

The prophet Azariah, introduced as Asa's counselor, warns Asa to be faithful. Again, there is explicit reference to the theology of the Deuteronomist: If you seek the Lord, you will find the Lord; if you forsake the Lord, the Lord will forsake you. The prophet's words spur Asa on to greater fidelity, evidenced by the removal of idols, the repair of the temple, and even a recommitment to covenant fidelity. (Joash and Josiah are the only kings of Judah in the books of Kings who explicitly make a covenant with the Lord [compare 2 Kgs 11:17 and 23:3].)

16:1-14 Asa's infidelity. The latter part of Asa's reign meets with political, personal, and theological disaster. Asa turns from trusting God to trusting human forces; for protection against Israel he makes an alliance with Aram instead of trusting in God. Hanani the seer (missing from the Deuteronomistic History) condemns Asa's sin, suggests the happy outcome that would have accrued to Judah had Asa not sinned, and names the punishment. Asa does not repent and imprisons Hanani. Later, when the king's feet become diseased, Asa does not seek relief from God but consults physicians. Such lack of fidelity can only lead to trouble. The Chronicler makes explicit Deuteronomistic theology: the latter part of Asa's reign suffers from instability and war.

17:1–21:3 The reign of Jehoshaphat. Just as the Chronicler's accounts of most of the kings of Judah contain more detail than their Deuteronomistic counterparts, so likewise the Chronicler gives a more extensive record of Jehoshaphat's reign. He is introduced as a king zealous for the law (compare 1 Kgs 22:43, 47). But then he makes a marriage alliance with Ahab. Anyone familiar with the books of Kings knows that, in the Deuteronomist's judgment, Ahab is a very evil king of Israel. One waits for further judgment on Jehoshaphat. When Ahab and Jehoshaphat fight against Ramoth-gilead, Jehoshaphat wishes to consult the Lord; he therefore escapes theological condemnation. The Chronicler's account of Ahab's and Jehoshaphat's encounter with the lying prophets and Micaiah is very similar to the narrative of 1 Kgs 22.

Added to the Deuteronomistic account of Jehoshaphat's reign is another narrative about battle, this one with the Moabites and the Ammonites (20:1). Jehoshaphat seeks the Lord and is rewarded; Jahaziel, a Levite, proclaims the assuring word of the Lord. The Lord will fight for Judah, and Judah will be victorious. The Chronicler is consistent with only part of the traditional holy-war theology, however. Yahweh wins the victory, but whereas customary holy-war theology demanded that all the spoils of the battle be sacrificed to Yahweh, here all the enemy soldiers are dead (they have killed each other), but the spoils of war—cattle, clothing, and precious things—are, without any later theological reprimand, seized by the Judean army.

Although Jehoshaphat's first alliance with Israel had not caused theological condemnation, his latter alliance with King Ahaziah does. According to the Chronicler, the two of them built ships together. The prophet Eliezer condemns the alliance and predicts the ships' destruction (20:37).

21:4-20 The reign of Jehoram. Both the Deuteronomist and the Chronicler judge Jehoram to be an evil king. The Chronicler justifies his judgment with further elaboration of Jehoram's wrongdoing. He, the first-born of Jehoshaphat's six sons, has killed his brothers and other princes of Israel. And if that were not enough, he has built high places and has encouraged idolatry. The prophet Elijah is inserted into the Chronicler's account with the kind of condemnation one might expect: the Lord will bring a great plague on Jehoram's family, and he himself will suffer from a severe disease of the bowels. Elijah's prophecy is fulfilled when the Philistines and the Arabs take into exile all Jehoram's possessions, including his family, with the exception of his youngest son. Jehoram himself is stricken with the predicted terminal disease.

A major change made by the Chronicler is to note that Jehoram was buried in the City of David, but not in the tomb of the kings (compare 2 Kgs 8:24).

22:1-9 The reign of Ahaziah (Jehoahaz in 2 Chr 21:17). Ahaziah is an evil king in the judgment of both the Deuteronomist and the Chronicler. He is, after all, related to Ahab through his mother, Athaliah. Consequently, it is appropriate for both the Deuteronomistic historian and the Chronicler to associate Ahaziah's downfall at the hands of Jehu with his visit to the Israelite King Jehoram.

No mention is made of the place where Ahaziah is buried. In fact, the only reason the Chronicler's account buries him at all is that he was Jehoshaphat's grandson!

22:10–23:21 The reign of Athaliah. The Chronicler adds very little to the Deuteronomist's portrayal of Athaliah's reign. Simply put, the priests play a larger role, as one might expect. Jehosheba, the woman who saved Joash from Athaliah, is, in this account, the wife of the priest Jehoiada, in addition to being the daughter of King Jehoram (north) and the sister of King Ahaziah (south). In the Chronicler's account, the captains summon the Levites and elders and make a covenant with the king (Joash) in the temple. The priests and Levites arrange the king's debut to the people; they alone are allowed to enter the temple; "they are holy" (23:6).

After Athaliah's death, one of the first things Joash does is to post watchmen under the direction of the Levites and the priests. They are to see to it that no one who is unclean enters the temple (23:19).

24:1-27 The reign of Joash. The Deuteronomistic historian attributes the good that Joash did to Jehoiada's counsel, and the Chronicler specifies this judgment even further. Joash sets out to repair the damage done to the temple by Athaliah. Under Jehoiada's and the priests' leadership, money is collected from the people, and the restoration is accomplished. Jehoiada was so faithful, from the Chronicler's theological perspective (he had saved Joash and had restored the Lord's dwelling), that he is reported to have been buried with the kings. No similar reference is made regarding any non-king in the Deuteronomistic History.

After Jehoiada's death, Joash is influenced toward evil by the princes of Judah and he succumbs. In spite of prophetic warning, idolatry prevails. The Chronicler inserts another priest who prophesies—this time Jehoiada's son, Zechariah. Zechariah predicts that Joash's rejection of the Lord will have dire consequences, but Joash's response is to silence the bad news; he whose life had been saved by Jehoiada now kills Jehoiada's son. Punishment for such sin is inevitable and comes in the form of Aram. The fact that Judah has a larger army means nothing; Judah has forsaken the Lord. Moreover, Zechariah is avenged: Joash's own servants slay him.

For the Chronicler, such an evil king cannot be buried in the tombs of the kings. This is the first mention of the "midrash of the book of the kings" (24:27). Because the Chronicler omits accounts of the northern kings of Israel, he has no need to distinguish the chronicles of Judah from those of Israel.

25:1-28 The reign of Amaziah. The Deuteronomist accorded Amaziah a mixed judgment, and the Chronicler does likewise. The Chronicler inserts two episodes; one speaks of Amaziah's fidelity, and the other speaks of his infidelity. Amaziah has mustered a large army—so large that it includes Israelite mercenaries. But when a prophet cautions him not to include Israelites in his army—because God's strength is far superior to those men, and God is not with them—Amaziah obeys the prophet, takes the financial loss, and dismisses the Israelites. Amaziah is victorious against the Edomites, although the mercenaries' anger causes them to plunder several Judean cities.

After that victory, however, Amaziah does an about-face, in the Chronicler's judgment. He begins to practice idolatry, worshiping the gods of the people he has conquered. He ignores prophetic wisdom—after all, those no-gods have proved powerless; they are unable to secure victory for their own people. Punishment for his infidelity is inevitable, and it comes in the form of a serious military defeat and the consequent pillaging of Jerusalem.

26:1-23 The reign of Uzziah (Azariah in 2 Kgs 15). Like his father, Uzziah gets a mixed rating from both the Deuteronomist and the Chronicler. For the Chronicler, as long as Uzziah seeks the Lord and listens to Zechariah's counsel, he is faithful and all goes well. His successes are both military (a well-equipped army and victories over the Philistines, the Arabs in Gurbaal, and the Meunites) and domestic (cisterns, and towers in Jerusalem and in the wilderness), and he is very prosperous.

However, the Chronicler condemns Uzziah's pride. He records an episode in which Uzziah attempts to usurp the prerogative of priests by burning incense at the altar of incense in the temple. His punishment is leprosy. The Deuteronomist had indicated Uzziah's leprosy but had not explained, from a theological perspective, its cause.

27:1-9 The reign of Jotham. The Chronicler adds little to the Deuteronomist's account of Jotham's reign. He is like his father, but he does not sin by presuming for himself any priestly function. Consequently, the Chronicler emphasizes a prosperous reign for him "because he lived resolutely in the presence of the Lord, his God." He builds cities, forts, and towers; he is victorious over the Ammonites and, consequently, he receives from them substantial tribute.

PART III: REFORMS OF HEZEKIAH AND JOSIAH

2 Chr 28:1–36:1

28:1-27 The reign of Ahaz. The Chronicler adds to the Deuteronomist's description of Ahaz's reign the fact that he makes molten images for the Baals and burns incense in the valley of the son of Hinnom (vv. 2-3). Additional sin merits additional punishment: the Lord gives him into the hand of the king of Aram and into the hand of the king of Israel. Further, an Ephraimite kills the king's son, the palace commander, and the king's assistant. Both the Arameans and the Israelites take captives from Judah, and the Arameans retain theirs. The Israelites, warned by the prophet Oded, know that taking the Lord's people captive can only lead to their own punishment. They therefore return the people of Judah to their own land.

Ahaz's sin, from the perspective of the Chronicler, leads to even further punishment. The Edomites, the Philistines, and even the Assyrians, to whom Ahaz pays tribute, pillage Judah. To depict the extent of Ahaz's evil, the Chronicler comments that Ahaz's ill fortune leads, not back to the Lord and to repentance, but to further idolatry. Although he sleeps with his ancestors and is buried in Jerusalem, he is not brought to the tombs of the kings of Israel. (Postexilic Judah is also called Israel.)

29:1–32:33 The reign of Hezekiah. Hezekiah's reign begins with a commission to the Levites and priests to purify the temple. This they complete in seven days. Hezekiah then commands that burnt offerings and sin offerings be made for all Israel: seven bulls, seven rams, seven lambs, and seven he-goats. The burnt offering is made amidst the music of harps, cymbals, and lyres, amidst singing and rejoicing, while both king and people worship. The people add to these offerings more burnt offerings, peace offerings, and thanksgiving offerings.

The Chronicler describes Hezekiah's next reform as the reintroduction of Passover (ch. 30). Hezekiah calls large numbers of the people to Jerusalem for the celebration, and encourages those who have avoided exile to Assyria to return to the Lord; perhaps the Lord will even return the exiles to their homeland. Included in this feast are Israelites from the north, from Ephraim, Manasseh, Issachar, and Zebulun. The Chronicler, as might be expected, emphasizes the priests' and Levites' role, especially their killing of Passover lambs for those who have not sanctified themselves—the northerners and the unclean. The feast lasts seven days, and then another seven days. According to the Chronicler, Hezekiah reestablishes the Passover, a feast that had not been so celebrated in Jerusalem since the reign of Solomon. (The Deuteronomistic historian credits Josiah with reestablishing this feast; it had not been celebrated since the period of the Judges; compare 2 Kgs 23:21-23.)

The Chronicler inserts more information about the priests and Levites (31:2ff.). Hezekiah divides them into classes, according to the service they will perform—offering holocausts and peace offerings, ministering in the gates of the camp of the Lord, and giving thanks and praise. Both king and people contribute generously, so that the priests have more than enough to offer and to eat; there is even an abundant surplus.

When the Assyrians come against him (ch. 32), Hezekiah prepares for combat; he is confident that the Lord is with Judah and will fight for it. Although other gods have not been able to save their people against the superior strength of the Assyrian army, Yahweh can and will save Judah. Thus Hezekiah believes, and his faith is rewarded.

Hezekiah does what is good and right and faithful in the eyes of his God. Everything he does he does with his whole heart, and he becomes very prosperous. Yet the Chronicler alludes to Hezekiah's illness (compare 2 Kgs 20:1-11) and to his insufficient gratitude for the Lord's response to his prayer (32:24-25). This provides an occasion for the Chronicler to refer to Hezekiah's humbling himself and to punishment that will come upon Judah and Jerusalem after Hezekiah's death. A foreshadowing of the form this punishment will take may be seen in the envoys who arrive from Babylon. The Chronicler comments that the Lord will test Hezekiah through them, to see what is in his heart (compare 2 Kgs 20:12-19).

In addition to the book of the kings of Judah and Israel, the Vision of Isaiah has more to say, according to the Chronicler, about the reign of Hezekiah (32:32). He is buried in the ascent of the tombs of the sons of David. Hezekiah merits the note that all Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem honor him at his death.

33:1-20 The reign of Manasseh. Contrary to the account of Manasseh's reign as given in the Deuteronomistic History, the Chronicler inserts into Manasseh's reign an account of his being taken into exile to Assyria, his petitioning the Lord for help, his deliverance, and his reformed lifestyle. Perhaps the Chronicler is, with this very unusual addition, trying to account for the fifty-five-year duration of Manasseh's reign. How could such an evil king have reigned so long, unless at some point he had repented? Perhaps the Chronicler is simply explaining why the kingdom of Judah did not fall during or after Manasseh's reign.

The chronicles of the kings of Israel and the chronicles of the seers contain a more detailed account of Manasseh's life (33:18). No mention is made of his burial with the other Judean kings; rather, he is buried in his house, or "in the garden of his house, in the garden of Uzza" (2 Kgs 21:18).

33:21-25 The reign of Amon. The Chronicler adapts the reign of Amon to his purposes. Amon is more evil than his father, Manasseh, had been; he sacrifices to the images his father had made, which suggests that Manasseh's idols remain in place. His father's repentance, also added by the Chronicler, was therefore incomplete. The Chronicler makes no mention of Amon's burial. The Deuteronomistic historian states that he was buried in the same garden as his father (2 Kgs 21:26).

34:1–35:27 The reign of Josiah. An interesting contrast can be drawn between the character of Josiah as depicted in 2 Kgs 22:1–23:30 and in 2 Chr 34–35. Though the events recorded are basically similar, the order of the events is significant. The Deuteronomistic historian portrays Josiah as purging idolatry from Judah after the restoration work in the temple had recovered the book of the law, while the Chronicler has the purging of idolatry in Judah and parts of Israel as the first act of Josiah's reign; only after such purification does he commission the Levites and priests to oversee the repair of the temple, and only subsequent to that is the book of the law discovered (34:14). Further, to the Passover account of 2 Kgs 23:21-25 the Chronicler adds copious priestly detail (35:1-19).

In contrast with the account in 2 Kings, the Chronicler makes no mention of Manasseh, nor does he associate the doom to come with delayed punishment for Manasseh's evil reign. For the Chronicler, Manasseh's son Amon was even more evil than his father. While both the Deuteronomist and the Chronicler mention the battle of Meggido, during which Josiah is mortally wounded at the hands of Egypt, only the Chronicler (35:20) mentions Carchemish (605 B.C.E.), where the Babylonians were victorious over Egypt.

Josiah, like Hezekiah before him (2 Chr 32:33), receives honor from the people at his death. The Chronicler even comments that Jeremiah made a lament for him (2 Chr 35:25); no such allusion is found in 2 Kings. Josiah is accorded burial among the tombs of his ancestors (2 Kgs 23:30 notes: "in his own burial place").

PART IV: END OF THE KINGDOM

2 Chr 36:2-23

36:1-4 The reign of Jehoahaz. The reign of Jehoahaz is short. The Egyptians had slain Josiah at Meggido. Now they force Judah to pay tribute, exile the reigning king, and replace him with his brother, Eliakim (Jehoiakim). Whereas the Deuteronomist compares Jehoahaz's evil to the wrongdoing of his ancestors, the Chronicler makes no such comparison. Jehoahaz simply does evil and is exiled.

36:5-8 The reign of Jehoiakim. Jehoiakim lasts for a while as Egypt's vassal. When Egypt is conquered, he becomes Babylon's vassal. The Chronicler adds that, eventually, Jehoiakim is exiled to Babylon. In contrast with the Deuteronomist, the Chronicler does not explain the present evils in Judah as a consequence of Manasseh's sins (compare 2 Kgs 24:2-4).

36:9-10 The reign of Jehoiachin. Jehoiachin, Jehoiakim's son, reigns for only slightly more than three months before he is exiled to Babylon, and before his uncle Zedekiah replaces him on Judah's throne.

36:11-14 The reign of Zedekiah. For the Chronicler, one of Zedekiah's major sins is his refusal to defer to the spokesman of Yahweh. Zedekiah revolts against Babylon, in spite of the fact that Jeremiah has interpreted Nebuchadnezzar as the Lord's servant who is executing God's just judgment on Judah's sin; Jeremiah counsels the people to submit to Babylon (compare Jer 21:7). Zedekiah is also guilty of other infidelities, though the Chronicler omits any description of his fate (compare 2 Kgs 25:4-7).

36:15-21 Dissolution of Judah. Nebuchadnezzar destroys Judah and Jerusalem, sparing neither city walls nor Yahweh's temple. The people are slaughtered or exiled. Yet, unlike the Deuteronomistic historian, the Chronicler does not bring his history to an end until the end of Judah's exile.

36:22-23 Decree of Cyrus. The word of the Lord is effective. The seventy years prophesied by Jeremiah are completed (compare Jer 25:11-12 and 29:10). In the first year of the reign of King Cyrus of Persia, he commissions the Jews to go up to Jerusalem to build a temple to the Lord God of heaven.

CONCLUSION

The Deuteronomistic historian chronicled Israel's history from the perspective of fidelity to Yahweh, to the obligations of the covenant, to the word of the Lord through the prophets. Infidelity meant punishment and, eventually, the destruction of the temple, the loss of the land, and exile. No king is supreme. Yahweh is king, and a human king is faithful only to the extent that he observes the covenant. The rulers are male, except for the brief reign of Athaliah. In contrast, the prophets are no respecters of sex, as Deborah (see Judg 4–5) and Huldah illustrate. Only the king who obeys the words of the prophet—the words of the Lord through the prophet—is faithful.

For the Deuteronomistic historian, the person who does not know history is bound to repeat it. Therefore, he retells Israel's past so that those living in the present and in the future may learn from it. These are "the facts"; this is the "theological interpretation" of the facts. If you do not want a future of condemnation and exile, you must take God seriously. There is no substitute for obedience and covenant fidelity. Many of the historical circumstances have changed since the Deuteronomist wrote, and all interpretation must take this into account; yet, even now, many of his insights remain valid.

The Chronicler, with a different audience, different leadership, and a different historical situation, also recalls Israel's past, this time ending explicitly in a new beginning. If the priests are to lead a postexilic people to fidelity, they must have credentials, and these the Chronicler provides.

The theological purpose of the two interpretations of Israel's history is quite similar: Learn from the past for the present. Leaders and people alike must observe covenant fidelity and listen attentively to Yahweh's word through the prophets.

EZRA AND NEHEMIAH

Rita J. Burns

INTRODUCTION

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The setting for the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah is the two-hundred-year period in which God's people were citizens of the Persian Empire. The Persian period began in 539 B.C.E. when Cyrus the Great of Persia (Iran) wrested control of the ancient Near Eastern world from the Babylonians. It ended in 333 B.C.E. when the same area fell into Greek hands under Alexander the Great.

More specifically, events narrated in the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah fall within the first part of the Persian period, from 538 B.C.E. to shortly after 400 B.C.E. For the Jews this was a time of return and restoration. Over the course of several generations, groups of Jewish exiles in Babylonia made their way back to their homeland of Judah in southern Palestine. There they undertook the work of restoration. They began by rebuilding the temple in Jerusalem and reviving its worship. Later, under Nehemiah's leadership, they rebuilt the walls of the city of Jerusalem and repopulated the city. Nehemiah and Ezra also initiated reforms based on the law of Moses and aimed at restoring the identity and integrity of the Jewish people. The return and restoration, then, were gradual, interwoven processes which together pressed toward revitalization. The temple lay at the center. Around it grew the city with protective walls. Within and around Jerusalem a people was fashioned anew through the influence of the law of Moses.

Our knowledge of this period in history is, in some cases, sketchy. From the Bible we rely primarily upon the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah, but we also turn to other works relative to the period, including Isaiah chapters 40–66, the Book of Haggai, and the Book of Zechariah. Some extra-biblical documents from the Persian period supplement our understanding of this period.

The writers of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah were selective in the events they chose to narrate. They focused upon two periods: (1) the early period (538–515 B.C.E.) when the first exiles returned to Judah under the leadership of Sheshbazzar and rebuilt the temple under the leadership of Zerubbabel and Jeshua, and (2) the period marked by the restoration of the wall of Jerusalem and religious reforms under the leadership of Nehemiah and Ezra (445–c. 398 B.C.E.).

Before reviewing these periods in greater detail, it is fitting to set the scene which gave rise to the return of the Jews to Judah and the need for restoration.

The early years of the sixth century B.C.E. marked the end of a four-hundred-year period in which the religious identity of the people of God was intertwined with their existence as an independent nation. A little over one hundred years after the northern kingdom of Israel had been swept away by the Assyrians, the tiny kingdom of Judah in the southern part of Palestine fell into the power of a major ancient Near Eastern empire centered in Babylonia. The final blow came in the year 587 B.C.E.

when Babylonian armies destroyed the capital city of Jerusalem. Many citizens of the country, including civic and religious leaders, were taken to Babylonia. The temple, which had served as the religious center since the days of Solomon, was demolished, and its precious furnishings were stolen. The broken land was left in the hands of powerless people, the country's poor.

Forty-six years after the fall of Jerusalem the Babylonian Empire itself capitulated to Cyrus the Great, head of an expanding Persian Empire. This turn of events was interpreted by an anonymous poet in Exile as the beginning of a new era for the captives from Judah. In the Book of Isaiah, chapters 40–55, the writer whom we know only as Second Isaiah speaks of Cyrus as the one through whom Yahweh was doing a new thing. With the advent of Cyrus, wrote Second Isaiah, there would be a new Exodus in which the chosen people, like their ancestors of old, would be led out of bondage back to their land (Isa 43:1-7; 44:24-28; 45:1-3, 11-13).

Indeed, it was the policy of Cyrus to allow peoples exiled by the Babylonians to return to their homelands and build new lives by reviving their native customs and religions. In a document dating from this period (the so-called Cyrus Cylinder), the Persian king describes his policy:

> I returned to (these) sacred cities on the other side of the Tigris, the sanctuaries of which have been in ruins for a long time, the images which (used) to live therein and established for them permanent sanctuaries. I (also) gathered all their (former) inhabitants and returned (to them) their habitations.

It has been suggested that the Persians may have gone so far as to allow the freed exiles a limited recovery of national identity as well. Two leaders in the Jewish return and restoration, Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel, seem to have been descendants of the pre-exilic royal family. No doubt their authority was limited, but it is significant that they were appointed and patronized by Persian rulers. Such treatment of exiled peoples was almost certain to win Persia the trust and loyalty of subjects who, through securing their own welfare, could live as productive and content citizens of the empire.

Return and restoration of the temple (538–515 B.C.E.)

The edict which authorized the return of Jewish exiles to Judah is said to have been issued in the first year of the reign of Cyrus (over Babylonia), that is, 538 B.C.E. Not all of the exiles, however, chose to return. The relative freedom they experienced during their years in Babylonia had afforded them the opportunity to become settled and, in some cases, prosperous. Judah, on the other hand, was still marked by devastation and poverty, so few Jews returned in the initial contingent, although others would follow over the course of the next few generations.

The far-flung empire of Persia was divided into several administrative units called satrapies. Each of these units was governed by a satrap or governor who was responsible for several smaller territorial districts which fell under his jurisdiction. Although the Persian rulers maintained a firm hold on the empire, they seem to have upheld a policy of noninterference in the internal affairs of the satrapies as long as taxes were paid and the governors maintained peace and order within their respective regions.

Within this imperial system, Judah belonged to the satrapy called "West-of-Euphrates," an area extending from the Euphrates River westward to the Mediterranean Sea. Its headquarters were in Samaria. In the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah, Samaritan leadership figured prominently in hardships facing Jews who returned to Judah. Samaritan governors may have feared the political rivalry of a restored Jewish community to the south. In addition to political concerns, religious animosities contributed to the tension between the Jews and Samaritans. Samaria had been the capital of the ten tribes which constituted the kingdom of Israel until it fell to the Assyrians in 721 B.C.E. In accord with Assyrian policy, some of its inhabitants were deported while peoples of other conquered areas were transported into Samaria to settle. Such mixing of populations was aimed at breaking the solidarity of captured peoples. Although the Samaritans continued to claim a place among God's people, leaders in the community of Jews who returned to Judah after the Exile did not consider the Samaritans to be truly Jewish because they had intermarried with foreign peoples. When the people of Samaria offered to help rebuild the temple of Yahweh in Jerusalem, they were rejected by the returning Jews.

Cambyses came to the throne of Persia after the death of Cyrus in 530 B.C.E. During his brief reign he succeeded in bringing Egypt under the umbrella of the Persian Empire. Cambyses, however, is passed over in the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. It may be that the next two Jewish leaders to figure prominently in the biblical record, Zerubbabel and Jeshua, came to Judah during the reign of Cambyses, but the Bible describes their activities within the context of the reign of Darius I (522–485 B.C.E.). Although the change of power from Cambyses to Darius was marked by turmoil and revolution, the greater part of the reign of Darius saw the Persian Empire at its height.

Exiles who accompanied Zerubbabel (a civic leader) and Jeshua (a priest) to Judah bolstered the numbers and strength of the restoration community. Perhaps because uprisings in other parts of the empire sparked hopes in Jewish circles for political independence, there seems to have been a movement afoot to establish Zerubbabel as king on the throne of his ancestor, David. At least this was the vision of two prophets from this period, Haggai and Zechariah (see Hag 2:20-23 and Zech 6:9-15). Although these prophets' messianic hopes were not realized, the strongly nationalistic spirit fostered by the two prophets together with international unrest must have contributed to the rebuilding of the temple. Darius himself supported the temple project, perhaps because he wanted the allegiance of those who lived on the borders of recently conquered Egypt.

Whatever the reason, the reign of Darius was a time of growth and progress for the Jewish community in Judah. Under the leadership of Zerubbabel and Jeshua, the temple was completed and dedicated in solemn ceremony in the year 515 B.C.E. This second temple served as a center for Jewish life in Judah until its destruction by the Romans in A.D. 70. Its reconstruction was the first major achievement and the foundation stone of the restoration community.

Restoration of the wall of Jerusalem and reforms (445–c. 398 B.C.E.)

The Books of Ezra and Nehemiah are virtually silent about the seventy-year period between the dedication of the temple (515 B.C.E.) and the beginning of the mission of Nehemiah (445 B.C.E.). The successor of Darius, Xerxes (485–465 B.C.E.), is mentioned only in Ezra 4:6 where he is called Ahasuerus. (He is given the same name in the Book of Esther.) Xerxes was followed by Artaxerxes I and his reign (465–425 B.C.E.) was a second period of significant progress for the restoration community.

By the middle of the fifth century B.C.E. the Persian Empire had lost some of the strength it had enjoyed under the leadership of Darius I, and revolts in Egypt may have motivated Artaxerxes to try to insure the strength and loyalty of his subjects in Judah, the region which bordered Egypt. Nehemiah was a high-ranking official in the Persian court, and we are told that in the twentieth year of the reign of Artaxerxes (445 B.C.E.) the emperor sent Nehemiah to Judah to serve as leader in the Jewish community (Neh 2:1). There is little doubt that the biblical witness about the date of Nehemiah's mission is historically accurate. The Book of Nehemiah tells us that Sanballat was leader of the province of Samaria in Nehemiah's day (Neh 2:10, 19; 3:33-34). That Nehemiah and Sanballat were contemporaries is confirmed by papyri from a Jewish colony at Elephantine in Egypt. From this extra-biblical material we learn that Sanballat's two sons were governors of Samaria at the end of the fifth century B.C.E. Moreover, the Jewish high priest at the end of the century was Johanan, a grandson of the high priest Eliashib who served during Nehemiah's time. On the basis of the Elephantine texts, it is reasonable to date the beginning of Nehemiah's mission at 445 B.C.E., the twentieth year of the reign of Artaxerxes I.

During his first term as governor of Judah, Nehemiah oversaw the rebuilding of the wall around Jerusalem in spite of considerable opposition from Sanballat and others. Having completed the project, Nehemiah returned to Persia in 433 B.C.E. A short time later, however, he returned to Judah. During this second period he initiated several reforms designed to strengthen the solidarity of the restoration community, a positive effort not only for the Jews but also for the Persian throne which was eager to bolster the strength of the western edges of its empire.

The place of Ezra in the chronology of the restoration period continues to be a question among scholars. The biblical text presents Ezra before Nehemiah. Moreover, the appearance of Ezra within the Book of Nehemiah (Neh 8) creates the impression that the respective missions of the two overlapped. Ezra 7:7 tells us that Ezra came to Judah from Persia in the seventh year of Artaxerxes. If the reference is to Artaxerxes I (465–425 B.C.E.), then Ezra arrived in Judah in 458 B.C.E. and began his work thirteen years prior to the arrival of Nehemiah.

However, there are difficulties with this understanding of the biblical witness. Ezra 10:6 says that Ezra was a contemporary of the Jewish high priest Johanan. If Johanan, Ezra's contemporary, was the grandson of Eliashib (as discussed above) whom we know to have been a contemporary of Nehemiah (Neh 3:1, 20-21), then it is clear that Ezra did not precede Nehemiah but came two generations after him. Therefore, the emperor named in Ezra 7:7 might be Artaxerxes II (405–359 B.C.E.) in which case Ezra's mission is dated 398 B.C.E., the seventh year of the reign of Artaxerxes II.

A third proposal on the date of Ezra's mission is that it began in 428 B.C.E., the thirty-seventh year of Artaxerxes I. Some scholars have suggested that the text of Ezra 7:7 contains a slight scribal error in which the first number of the year ("thirty") was omitted. According to this view, Ezra came to Jerusalem a few years after the beginning of Nehemiah's second mission in Judah.

Although the exact date of Ezra's mission is still a topic for discussion, most scholars agree that Nehemiah's mission preceded that of Ezra. This helps to explain why the Nehemiah material in the Bible acknowledges no awareness of the reform of Ezra which, if Ezra had come first, would have occurred less than thirteen years before Nehemiah arrived in Judah. It is possible that the persons who were responsible for the composition of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah were simply in error about historical sequence. It is more probable, however, that the overall arrangement of these two biblical books was designed with theological purposes in mind rather than to serve as an accurate historical chronicle of the period (see below on Theological Interests).

Because we do not know the exact dates of Ezra's activity in Judah, we cannot be certain where to end the timeline of historical events which form the background to the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. We adopt the widely accepted view that Nehemiah preceded Ezra. For purposes of this commentary, we also follow the scholarly opinion that places Ezra's mission in the initial years of the fourth century B.C.E. We do so, however, with full awareness of the uncertainty which remains on this question.

The historical relationship between Persian rule and Jewish restoration can be seen at a glance in this outline:

Persian Emperors	Jewish Restoration
Cyrus the Great (539–530 B.C.E.)	Return to Judah
Cambyses (530–522 B.C.E.)
Darius I (522–485 B.C.E.)	Rebuilding of temple
Xerxes (485–465 B.C.E.)
Artaxerxes I (465–425 B.C.E.)	Nehemiah's mission including restoration of wall of Jerusalem and reforms
Darius II (425–405 B.C.E.)
Artaxerxes II (405–359 B.C.E.)	? Ezra's mission including promulgation of the law and reform

THEOLOGICAL INTERESTS

History and biblical accounts

The Books of Ezra and Nehemiah appear within one of three great blocks of material in Hebrew Scripture which present successive events in Israel's history. The first four books of the Bible (Genesis through Numbers) cover the period from the beginnings of humanity to the time when the children of Israel stood on the borders of the Promised Land ready to inherit that space which God had promised to their ancestors. A second block of material sketches Israel's story from the entrance into the Promised Land through the era of the monarchy to the fall of the nation and the Babylonian Exile (see Deuteronomy through the Second Book of Kings). The First and Second Books of Chronicles and the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah trace the last part of Israel's story from the rise of King David (although this is prefixed in chapters 1–9 of the First Book of Chronicles with genealogies which trace Israel's roots back to Adam) through postexilic reconstruction efforts ending shortly after 400 B.C.E.

All of these writings are actually theological interpretations of events rather than historical annals. Each school of writers sets forth its theological reflections on Israel's experience. Readers of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah must keep this in mind. While the two books contain historical information about the restoration period, the primary aim of the writers was not to present a disinterested chronological account of events. The writers were theologians who carefully selected and arranged materials in accord with theological interests.

Arrangement of materials

A theological order is evident in the present arrangement of the Ezra-Nehemiah materials:

Part I Ezra 1–6
  Restoration of the temple
Part II Ezra 7–10
  Restoration of the worshiping community
Part III Neh 1–7
  Restoration of the wall of Jerusalem
Part IV Neh 8–13
  Restoration of the community around the law

The foundation of postexilic Judaism in Judah was the temple and its worship. Thus Part I of the Ezra-Nehemiah material centers around the rebuilding of the temple even though neither Ezra nor Nehemiah was involved in this initial phase of restoration. Legitimate temple worship required that the worshipers themselves be pure, a people set apart. Part II describes a reform initiated by Ezra to set Jews apart from foreign influence. The city made holy by God's presence in the temple had to be strong and secure. To this end the city wall was rebuilt under Nehemiah's leadership (Part III). All of these works of restoration prepared for and culminated in the restoration of the Jewish community under the law (Part IV). Since both Ezra and Nehemiah were instrumental in restoring the Jewish community, it is theologically appropriate (although perhaps not chronologically accurate) that both be presented as participants in the culmination of their work.

Theological emphases

Just as theological considerations gave direction to the final arrangement of materials in the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah, so certain theological emphases can be seen in the books.

a. God's work and Persian help. Like writers before them, the theologians who composed the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah presupposed that Yahweh, the God of Israel, directed world history. The fall of the nation and the Exile had been Yahweh's doing. Now the same God was bringing the purged people to new life. In the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah, the Persian rulers' ongoing support for the restoration of the Jewish people is traced to God's hand. Likewise, the Jews call upon God to help them in the work of reconstruction and attribute their success to God's gracious aid.

b. Temple and cult. The Books of Ezra and Nehemiah give much attention to the temple and its worship. They present the restoration of the temple as the primary goal of the return from Exile. Moreover, the writers are eager to show that a full life of worship (including sacred festivals and sacred offerings) was an important part of the restoration movement. The writers also show special concern for cultic personnel, priests and Levites.

c. A people set apart. Prior to the Exile, Israel had a national identity, political independence in a land of its own with a capital in Jerusalem, its own king descended from David, and a temple where they thought God was accessible in a special way. The Exile had destroyed all of that. Without land, independence, temple, or king, the postexilic community searched for a new identity which was one with the Israel of the past and yet appropriate for drastically different circumstances.

Membership in the restoration community was limited to those who had been purified through the experience of Exile and who sought to maintain their purity and uniqueness by setting themselves apart from foreigners. Pure blood lineage was especially important, and marriages with foreigners were regarded as threats to the integrity of the restoration community. The objection to marriages with foreigners rests on an identification of holiness with separation—a physical separation from people and things which were not exclusively dedicated to Yahweh. While this perspective might be jarring to today's ecumenically-minded readers who long to reverse centuries of human intolerance based on religious loyalties, the biblical writers reflect a different world and different concerns. The exclusivist policies of the restoration period must be viewed within the context of a community struggling for self-preservation in the rubble of questions of identity occasioned by the experience of Exile.

d. Continuity. The biblical writers sought to show that postexilic Judaism was an authentic extension of pre-exilic Israel. Members of the restoration community had to prove that their ancestors came from pre-exilic Israel. "All Israel" is frequently symbolized by the number twelve, representing the twelve tribes who constituted ancient Israel. For the most part, those who returned from Exile settled in regions their pre-exilic ancestors had inhabited. The temple was restored on its ancient foundations and Jerusalem's wall was rebuilt from the charred stones of the pre-exilic wall. Leadership in worship was reserved to the descendants of pre-exilic Israel's cultic officials. The worshiping community resumed ancient festivals and offerings. The law which gave direction to the community's life was the ancient law of Moses.

LITERARY CONSIDERATIONS

Author and date of composition

We do not know all of the details about the composition of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. Contemporary scholarship is virtually unanimous in attributing a significant part of the composition to the Chronicler, that is, the circle of tradition which is responsible for the First and Second Books of Chronicles. In support of this view, one can see points of continuity in the Books of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah. First of all, the fact that the opening verses of the Book of Ezra duplicate the final verses of the Second Book of Chronicles reflects a deliberate effort to connect the works. Secondly, some of the thematic concerns which come to the fore in Chronicles recur in the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. These include the prominence given to the temple, the city of Jerusalem, and the cult together with its leading personnel. The manner in which lists and other sources are used has been cited as additional evidence for connecting the author of Ezra and Nehemiah with that of Chronicles.

Despite this, we must guard against imagining that in one sitting a single author composed the final text of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah from start to finish. Chapters 1–6 of the Book of Ezra bear the strongest traces of the Chronicler's hand. It might be that the rest of the Ezra-Nehemiah materials (Ezra 7–10; the Book of Nehemiah) was subsequently incorporated into the Chronicler's work, perhaps in separate stages.

Although many of the details elude us, it is safe to say that the Chronicler played a significant part in the composition of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah although the final text probably includes accretions and editing which came from other hands. Thus, when we speak of the authors/editors of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah, we shall refer to the Chronicler but we do so with the understanding that other unknown writers also contributed to the work of composition.

The language of the books bears the marks of Persian but not Greek influence which suggests that the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah originated prior to the beginning of the Greek period (333 B.C.E.). The latest Persian emperor to be named is Darius II (425–405 B.C.E.) and the latest high priest included is Johanan who is known to have held that position until at least 410 B.C.E. Johanan's son, Jaddua, also appears in Neh 12:23, but we are not told if he yet exercised the office of high priest. For these reasons, most scholars hold that the bulk of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah was completed in the early years of the fourth century B.C.E. although some additions to the books may have been made later.

Sources

Like many other biblical works, the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah represent a compilation of materials of diverse origin. Because of this, it is proper to regard the Chronicler as a compiler and editor as well as author of biblical tradition. Since the sources used by the Chronicler are no longer available to us in other biblical or extrabiblical works, in most cases it is difficult to judge their historical authenticity. It is possible that previously existing materials were incorporated into the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah exactly as the Chronicler found them. However, it is also possible that the Chronicler altered the materials, shaping them in ways which would serve the theological purposes of this particular part of the biblical tradition. The Chronicler is thought to have used three types of materials: (a) memoirs of Ezra and Nehemiah, (b) official records and correspondence, and (c) lists.

a. Memoirs. Parts of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah which contain descriptions of the activities of the two main figures are written in the first person. This has led to the suggestion that those parts represent firsthand reports of the activities of Ezra and Nehemiah. It is uncertain whether these sections should be regarded as memoirs (written by the chief figures themselves) or memorials (written by others about the chief figures). Other inscriptions from the ancient Near Eastern world are similar to the Ezra and Nehemiah memoirs. In these inscriptions the first person is used, and their contents typically recount the accomplishments of an individual. Scholars think that these inscriptions were intended as testimony to a deity about the loyalty of a devoted worshiper.

The memoirs of the two biblical figures constitute the most extensive independent sources utilized by the Chronicler in the composition of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. The Ezra memoirs appear in Ezra 7:27–9:15. This section contains two lists (8:1-14 and 26-27) which may have been added to the memoirs from separate sources. Although Ezra's prayer (Ezra 9:6-15) also appears in the first person and so may have belonged to his memoirs, it is possible that this was the composition of another writer, since prayers are known to have been placed on the lips of biblical figures by writers in a later period (see, for example, Dan 3:24-45, 51-90; 9:4-19).

The parts of the Book of Nehemiah which appear in the first person are referred to in many circles as Nehemiah's memoirs. These sections constitute a sizeable portion of the book (Neh 1–7; 12:27–13:31). These texts contain a record of restoration efforts under Nehemiah's leadership. They include two lists which may have been added to the memoirs at some later stage of composition.

b. Aramaic source. For those who read biblical texts in the languages in which they were originally written, the most obvious clue to the diversity of sources in the Book of Ezra is that Ezra 4:8–6:18 and 7:12-26 are in Aramaic while the rest of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah is written in Hebrew. The bulk of the Aramaic material in Ezra 4:8–6:18 claims to be a record of official correspondence between governors in West-of-Euphrates and two different Persian emperors. It also includes a version of the edict in which the Persian monarch Cyrus authorized the rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem (6:3-5). The Aramaic section of Ezra 7:12-26 contains a copy of the official papers regarding Ezra's mission authorized by the emperor, Artaxerxes.

It is commonly accepted in scholarly circles that these Aramaic sections represent material from separate sources, perhaps records which were retained in official archives either of the Persian emperors or of Jewish leaders.

c. Lists. A number of lists in the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah probably came from records preserved in Jewish archives. The lists include the names of persons and regions as well as records of temple vessels and community responsibilities.

While it is impossible to know the sources and degree of authenticity of the above-mentioned official correspondence and of the numerous lists, it is likely that they represent materials which originated independently of the narratives which now appear in the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. It is possible that different records were adopted into the Ezra-Nehemiah traditions at different stages in the composition of the biblical books.

SIGNIFICANCE

The Books of Ezra and Nehemiah are important to contemporary readers for several reasons. First, they are our chief source of information about the restoration of the Jewish community following the Exile. Even though some of the historical details in the books are puzzling to contemporary biblical scholars, nevertheless they provide the best data at hand for our understanding of this period.

Second, we see in these books a community's courage in picking up the pieces of a shattered past and arranging them in creative ways, even in the face of considerable opposition. We encounter a community willing to engage the slow, gradual process of rebuilding. The community succeeds through God's protection, its own fierce resolve, properly focused efforts, and good leadership.

Finally, in the figures of Ezra and Nehemiah, contemporary readers see models of piety. Both men depend upon and recognize God's help, but they work without the spectacular interventions which characterize God's gracious presence in much of the rest of the biblical tradition. In their time true piety required human initiative and human effort. Ezra and Nehemiah were marked by devotion to their community, and out of that zeal flowed their commitment to the task of recovery. They saw what situations demanded and devised constructive ways to promote the life of the fragile community. Nehemiah was a model organizer resolute in restoring life to a city in ruins. Ezra founded postexilic Judaism in the law. Jewish tradition would eventually compare him to Moses. Both put their talents and efforts at the service of the tradition that had shaped them. They are models of how to be faithful to one's heritage in creative ways required by new situations.

COMMENTARY: EZRA

PART I: RESTORATION OF THE TEMPLE

Ezra 1:1–6:22

The first six chapters of the Book of Ezra contain an account of events beginning with the return of the exiles from Babylonia (ch. 1) and ending with the completion of the temple (ch. 6). The initial return (during Cyrus' reign) is said to have been led by Sheshbazzar, "the prince of Judah" (1:8). Shortly thereafter Zerubbabel (a royal prince) and Jeshua (a priest), with the support of the Persian king Darius, led the community in completing the reconstruction of the temple.

These chapters seem to be carefully documented. Attention is given to personal and place names, and inventories of goods and offerings, frequent dates, and records of official documents including the edict of Cyrus and correspondence between officers of West-of-Euphrates and Persian emperors.

On the other hand, this is a highly selective account. While it covers events spanning a period of twenty-three years (from the edict of Cyrus in 538 B.C.E. to the dedication of the temple in 515 B.C.E.), it is clear that the writers neglect to mention many aspects of life during the return and restoration. We see a preoccupation with the cult: altar, temple, sacrifices, offerings, temple vessels and utensils, religious feasts, and temple personnel. The writers view the restoration of temple worship as the goal of the return and the foundation of the restoration community.

Special concerns are evident in the writers' portrayal of the Jewish community. There is no hint of poverty or internal tension. According to the account, the only hardship facing the second generation of the restoration movement was the opposition of Samaritan leaders and peoples of the land. We see an idealized community: large in number, great in wealth, single-heartedly dedicated to restoring the life of worship with the help of able leaders of legitimate royal and priestly lineage and the patronage of the Persian throne. Moreover, just as the return is said to have been inspired by God (1:1-5), so the pursuit of a restored cultic life is said to have been carried forward by the community's faithful response to religious traditions begun by Moses and David, as well as to prophetic inspiration of its own day.

1:1-11 The decree of Cyrus. The three opening verses of the Book of Ezra repeat the closing verses of the Second Book of Chronicles. In concluding the record of Israel's life as a nation, with reference to the edict of Cyrus the Persian (2 Chr 36:22-23), the Chronicler testifies that the fall of the nation is not the end of Israel's story. The conclusion to Chronicles then forms a fitting background and introduction to the same writers' view of the period of return from Exile and restoration of the people.

A Jewish perspective pervades this account. The subject of the opening sentence (1:1) is Israel's God. Yahweh is said to have inspired Cyrus to issue the edict of release from Exile. Although the Chronicler does not cite the poet of the Exile, Second Isaiah, their theological perspectives are similar. Second Isaiah regarded Cyrus as Yahweh's "anointed" (Isa 45:1; compare 44:28), the one through whom Yahweh's plan for Israel's release would be realized. Moreover, the biblical writers connect the edict of Cyrus with God's word as spoken through the prophet Jeremiah (Ezra 1:1). This is consistent with what the Chronicler recorded in 2 Chr 36:21. It is a reflection on Jeremiah's earlier prophecy about Israel's release from Babylonian captivity after a period in which God's purpose in allowing the Exile would have been realized (see Jer 25:11-12; 29:10). Although the prophet spoke of this period lasting seventy years, we, like the biblical writers, must understand seventy as a symbolic number suggesting fullness or completion. In calling attention to the fulfillment of God's word, the Chronicler shares with other exilic and postexilic writers (for example, Second Isaiah and the priestly writers) the view that events of salvation history take momentum and direction from God's power-filled word.

A Jewish perspective is also evident in the date which appears in the opening verse. The "first year of Cyrus" refers not to Cyrus' ascent to the throne in Persia (c. 557 B.C.E.), but to his conquest of Babylonia and the beginning of his rule over the Jews. For the biblical writers, the "first year of Cyrus" is 538 B.C.E.

The citation of the edict of Cyrus represents the first of the writers' frequent use of documentation. An Aramaic version of the edict appears in Ezra 6:3-5. Most scholars agree that the edict quoted in Ezra 1:2-4 represents a Jewish version of the Persian document and not a verbatim record. Several details support this view. First, it is extremely unlikely that the Persian emperor would have regarded his power as having come from Yahweh, the God of Israel. In fact, in the record preserved in the Cyrus Cylinder the ruler cites Marduk, the god of the Babylonians, as the one who gave Babylonia into his hand. The record in Ezra 1:2-4 is similar to other Jewish theological perspectives, for example, that of Second Isaiah (see Isa 45:1). Second, it is also unlikely that Cyrus expected the Babylonians to contribute provisions for the travelers as well as free-will offerings for Yahweh. It is possible that the writers of Ezra 1:4 were seeking to parallel this return from Exile with the Exodus from Egypt when the Israelites took with them goods contributed by the Egyptians (see Exod 3:21; 11:2-3; 12:35-36).

While the particular Jewish view of the edict cited in Ezra 1:2-4 should be recognized, it is true that in some ways the biblical testimony is true to the spirit of Cyrus' policies. The Cyrus Cylinder includes the emperor's mandate that the restoration of Babylonian captives on their native soil include the rebuilding of shrines to their local patronal deities. In accord with that policy, Second Isaiah prophesied that Cyrus would authorize the rebuilding of Jerusalem and its temple (Isa 44:28). The writers of Ezra 1:2-4, however, have assigned prime importance to this particular detail of Cyrus' overall policy. In their view, Yahweh commanded Cyrus to rebuild the temple in Jerusalem, and that is why the emperor released the Jewish captives and called upon the support of the Babylonians.

The section which follows (vv. 5-11) is a narrative beginning with preparations for the return to Judah and ending with an abrupt notice about the return itself. Verses 5-6 clearly flow from verses 1-4. We see that as God had inspired Cyrus (v. 1), so God inspired those Jews who chose to return (v. 5). The returnees left Babylonia enriched by the donations of their neighbors who had complied with the directive cited in verse 4. And, in accord with God's plan and Cyrus' edict (v. 2), the exiles' purpose in returning was to rebuild the temple (v. 5). Thus, the writers tell us that it was a wealthy, inspired, temple-oriented community that returned.

The Jews who had been taken into Exile were Judahites along with members of the tribe of Benjamin with whom they were closely associated. Therefore, the returnees belong to these two clans. The Chronicler's interest in worship prompted the specific mention of priests and Levites along with the tribal heads (v. 5). Since the restoration of the temple is said to have been the goal of the return, it is appropriate that this preparation for the return emphasize the collection of temple utensils which had been taken by the Babylonian Nebuchadnezzar as trophies of his victory over Judah (compare 2 Kgs 24:13; 25:13-16; 2 Chr 36:10, 18; Jer 52:17-20). The Chronicler's concern for the continuity of Israel's religious tradition required this note. Vessels for the restored worship were those which had been used in pre-exilic worship.

According to verses 8 and 11, Cyrus entrusted the temple vessels to Sheshbazzar who was leader of the initial return. Very little is known of Sheshbazzar, since he is only mentioned here and in Ezra 5:14-16 where he is credited with having laid the foundations for the temple in Jerusalem. Many scholars link him with Shenazzar who is described in 1 Chr 3:18 as son of Jeconiah (that is, Jehoachin, the last king of Judah) and therefore a member of the royal family during the generation in Exile. In Ezra 1:8 Sheshbazzar is called "prince of Judah" (compare Ezra 5:14). We cannot be certain of the meaning of this title. It may refer to his royal lineage and be used here as nontechnical terminology designating his civic leadership among the returnees.

The biblical writers complete their account of preparations for the return with an inventory of vessels taken back to the land by Sheshbazzar. Readers will note the discrepancy between the tally of individual pieces and the total given in verse 11.

2:1-70 Census of the province. After the brief notice at the end of chapter 1, Sheshbazzar's return to Jerusalem, the scene shifts to the land of Judah where the former exiles settled. Ezra 2 is only one of many examples of the Chronicler's fondness for lists and other official documentation. An introduction (vv. 1-2) is followed by a census of the people by families and towns (vv. 3-35), a listing of special groups within the community (vv. 36-58), those without proof of lineage (vv. 59-63), numerical totals (vv. 64-67), and a concluding description of gifts brought to the temple and of the geographical distribution of the settlers (vv. 68-70). Scholars generally regard the list as a composite of the records of various groups (probably from different time periods) which have been brought together. The numbers are suspiciously large.

The introduction to the census (vv. 1-2) neglects to mention Sheshbazzar, the leader of the earliest return (see ch. 1), and includes instead Zerubbabel and Jeshua who are described in Ezra 3–6 as active in the temple building project around 520 B.C.E. The list of leaders in verse 2 also includes Nehemiah. It may be an anachronism or it may refer to a different person from the one who is the chief figure in the Book of Nehemiah.

In verses 3-35 the census of the laity alternates between listing people by families (vv. 3-19 or 20, 30-32, 35) and by locale (vv. 20 or 21-29, 33-34). In some cases (particularly vv. 19 and 20) it is difficult to know if the name refers to a person or place, though the designation "men of" instead of "sons of" would appear to signal town names (but compare vv. 21 and 33-34 where "sons of" is used for citizens of particular places).

The numbering of members of special groups (vv. 36-58) includes priests, Levites, singers, gatekeepers, temple slaves, and the descendants of the slaves of Solomon. All appear to designate groups of people who exercised functions within the temple, although virtually nothing is known of the group called "descendants of the slaves of Solomon." The special listing of temple personnel witnesses to the cultic orientation of the writers.

Verses 59-63 include the names of lay people who were unable to prove that their lineage was truly Israelite (vv. 59-60) and priests who could not produce records to show that they were legitimate heirs to the rights and privileges of Israel's priestly family (vv. 61-62). We are not told of the resolution of the confusion over the families of lay persons, but verse 63 indicates that the questions surrounding the validity of priests could be settled by casting lots with the Urim and Thummim, two sticks or dice which served as primitive means for consulting the will of God (see 1 Sam 14:41). Late biblical tradition says they were carried in the breastplate of the high priest (see Exod 28:30; Lev 8:8). We are told that until this judgment was made, "His Excellency" (that is, some civic leader; the same title is applied to Nehemiah in Neh 8:9 and 10:2) prohibited the priests without credentials from sharing consecrated food (see Lev 2:3; 7:28-36), a privilege of the priesthood.

Readers will note that the total number given in verse 64 is greater than the sum of the parts tallied in the preceding verses, a discrepancy which we cannot explain. The total number of slaves and animals (vv. 65-67) is impressive and does not harmonize with the humble beginnings of the restoration community nor with the hardships of the Jews in Nehemiah's day (see Neh 5:1-5).

Just as the newly freed slaves contributed to the construction of the tabernacle when Israel came out of Egypt (Exod 25:1-6; 35:4-9), so verses 68-69 portray a people zealous for the restoration of Israel's cultic life. The closing verse of the second chapter (v. 70) describes the settlement of the returnees. Cultic and civic leaders and others who probably assisted them in their duties naturally settled in the religious and civic center, Jerusalem. Those Jews whose performance of cultic functions rotated and those who had no official duties probably returned to regions which had been their ancestral homes prior to the Exile.

The order in which the Chronicler presents materials is important. The census in Ezra 2 is followed by an account of the restoration of the altar in Jerusalem and a celebration of the feast of Booths (Ezra 3:1-6). A parallel arrangement appears in Nehemiah chapters 7 and 8. The census of Ezra 2 is repeated in Neh 7:6-72a where it is followed by the promulgation of the law (Neh 8:1-12) and the celebration of the feast of Booths (Neh 8:13-18). The restoration of the altar and the promulgation of the law were two very important moments of the restoration period according to the biblical writers. By preceding accounts of the restoration with a census list, the writers sought to emphasize that the groups who took part in these events were truly the people of God, people purified by the experience of Exile whose ancestral roots linked them with earlier generations of Israelites.

3:1-6 Restoration of the altar. The primacy of the cult is clear in this account. It is an idealized picture of the apparent haste and ease with which Israel's elaborate life of worship was restored.

As David had built an altar prior to the construction of the first temple (2 Sam 24:25; 1 Chr 21:26; 22:1), so the returned exiles began by restoring the altar. The entire community worked together, supervised by the families of priestly and civic leaders (vv. 1-2). The writers underscore the importance of continuity with past religious tradition by saying that the altar was rebuilt on its old foundations (v. 3) and by noting that the reestablished cult was in accord with ancient religious practice: they offered holocausts "prescribed in the law of Moses" (v. 2), they celebrated the feast of Booths "in the manner prescribed," and "they offered the daily holocausts in the proper number required for each day" (v. 4; see also v. 5).

The high point of communal worship in the postexilic period was the offering of sacrifice, and this required a legitimate altar. Holocausts (burnt offerings) were sacrifices which were completely burned, a symbolic expression of the totality of the gift. According to Exod 29:38-42 two lambs were offered as holocausts daily, one in the morning and another in the evening. Sacrifices prescribed for other sacred feasts (v. 5) are described in the legislation of Num 28 and 29. Free-will offerings (v. 5) could be brought at any time by worshipers. In verse 4 the writers speak of the restoration of the feast of Booths (Hebrew sukkot, "booths" or "huts"; Latin tabernacula, "Tabernacles"), a seven-day festival which for much of the biblical period was the most prominent of Israel's religious festivals. From earliest times it marked the harvest of grapes and olives (see Exod 23:16; 34:22) and was characterized by great rejoicing and thanksgiving (Deut 16:14-15; Lev 23:40). In this passage we see that Israel's liturgical calendar also included a special observance to mark the beginning of each month ("new moon", v. 5; see Num 10:10; 28:11-15).

Ezra 3:1-6 raises some chronological questions. First, verse 1 places the efforts to reestablish the life of worship in "the seventh month" although the year is not designated. Most scholars suggest that in both verses 1 and 6 the reference is to the seventh month of the year of the earliest return, that is, 538 B.C.E. If this is the case, however, a second question of chronology arises. Verse 2 attributes leadership in the rebuilding of the altar to Jeshua and Zerubbabel. Their leadership is problematic in light of the fact that chapter 1 names Sheshbazzar as leader in the return of 538 B.C.E. whereas chapters 4–6 connect Zerubbabel and Jeshua with the temple building activity which occurred between 520 and 515 B.C.E. Thus, distinctions in the chronology of Sheshbazzar, Zerubbabel and Jeshua have been blurred.

3:7-13 Founding of the temple. Confusing Sheshbazzar's work with that of Zerubbabel and Jeshua continues in the present section. Here we are told that Zerubbabel and Jeshua oversaw the laying of the foundations of the temple. But Ezra 5:16 attributes the same role to Sheshbazzar. The vagueness of the date in verse 8 does not shed light on the matter. The work is said to have begun in the "year after their coming to the house of God in Jerusalem." The pronoun "their" could refer to Sheshbazzar and the earliest returnees in which case the year was 537 B.C.E. But if "their" refers to Zerubbabel and Jeshua it would have been somewhat later. The former possibility is to be preferred because Ezra 4:5 says that delays in temple reconstruction lasted from the final years of Cyrus until the time of Darius. Since Sheshbazzar was a contemporary of Cyrus (see 1:8-11) and Zerubbabel and Jeshua were contemporaries of Darius (see Ezra 5:1-5 and Hag 1:1), we conclude that it was the earliest returnees who laid the foundations of the temple building. If Sheshbazzar is identified with the Shenazzar who appears in the genealogy of 1 Chr 3:18 (as many scholars suggest), then Sheshbazzar was the uncle of Zerubbabel (see 1 Chr 3:18-19). It is reasonable to view the situation as follows: Sheshbazzar led an initial contingent of Jews back to the land where he began work on the temple building in Jerusalem. His nephew Zerubbabel led a second group to Judah some years later, and he resumed work (perhaps virtually started over) on the temple which his uncle had begun in the earlier period but which had been stopped by Judah's opponents.

Although the description of the laying of the temple foundations and the accompanying celebration narrated in verses 7-13 has the appearance of an eyewitness record of events, a careful examination of the details suggests that, to a large extent, this account was shaped by community tradition. First, the returnees are said to have planned carefully for the building project by securing proper materials and craftspersons (v. 7). The details of their preparation parallel the Chronicler's version of preparatory efforts undertaken by David (1 Chr 22:2, 4, 15) and Solomon (2 Chr 2:1-15) for the construction of the first temple. Second, beginning the work "in the second month" is in chronological accord with the beginning of construction of the first temple in Solomon's day (see 1 Kgs 6:1; 2 Chr 3:2). Finally, the account of the celebration which followed the laying of the temple foundations accords with the Chronicler's tendency to highlight both the cultic and musical, and it is consistent with other cultic occasions narrated in the Books of Chronicles. For example, trumpets are assigned to the priests (v. 10) as in 1 Chr 16:6 while the Levites play the cymbals (v. 10; compare 2:41 where the "sons of Asaph" are singers) as in 1 Chr 25:1, 6 (compare 2 Chr 29:25-26). The refrain of the hymn which is included in verse 11 likewise appears in 1 Chr 16:34 and 2 Chr 5:13 and 7:3 (see also Pss 106:1; 136:1). It is clear that the writers of Ezra 3:7-13 were eager for events in the early period of the reconstruction to appear continuous with Israel's past.

According to these verses those who laid the foundations of the temple were "all who had come from the captivity to Jerusalem" and we are told that the priests and Levites directed the exiles' labors (vv. 8-9). Here again the writers underscore the importance of legitimacy. The core of the restoration community consisted of those who had been purged by the experience of Exile, and their efforts to reestablish the cult were directed by those who held legitimate authority in cultic affairs. The writers' idealized view of matters is probably responsible for the notation that the whole community of returned exiles participated in the founding of the temple.

The writers include a tender scene of the community's mixed response following the laying of the temple foundations. Some of the Jews were sad, some joyful (vv. 12-13). The Chronicler's picture of the sorrow of those who remembered the glory of the first temple has probably been influenced by familiarity with the witness of Hag 2:3 which says that the temple rebuilt during the second year of Darius (that is, in 520 B.C.E.) was a disappointment to the older generation.

4:1-5 Samaritan interference. Chapter 3 ends with the completion of the foundations of the temple presumably during the second year of the return in 537 B.C.E. (see our discussion on 3:7-13). Chapter 5 opens about seventeen years later with resumption of work on the temple building during the reign of Darius. In chapter 4 the biblical writers account for the intervening delay by describing the opposition of the returnees' neighbors, the Samaritans and the "people of the land." Opposition which had only been hinted at in Ezra 3:3 comes into full view in chapter 4.

According to verses 2-3, the controversy began when descendants of the mixed populations of Samaria expressed a desire to be part of the rebuilding project. In offering their help, they refer to the reign of the Assyrian Esarhaddon (681–669 B.C.E.) although 2 Kgs 17:24-41 links the Assyrian mixing of populations in the northern kingdom of Israel with the reign of Shalmaneser V (726–722 B.C.E.) while Assyrian records credit Sargon II (721–705 B.C.E.) with the repopulation of defeated Israel. We do not know where the writers of Ezra 4:1-5 turned for their information; although the population to the north does seem to have been mixed, we know very little of what went on there after its final capitulation to Assyria in 721 B.C.E. The petitioners base their desire to assist in the temple reconstruction on their fidelity to Yahweh. The Judeans, however, thought that they alone were orthodox, and they dismissed the request by referring to the mandate of Cyrus. The Judeans' rebuff of the Samaritans stems from their concern for cultic purity among the Jews, an issue which comes to a head during Ezra's leadership and is narrated in subsequent chapters.

Verse 4 (and 5) traces the hostility to the "people of the land." We cannot be certain whether this refers to Samaritans from the north, to people of mixed blood who had moved from the north into Judah, or simply to residents of Judah who had remained in Judah during the Exile and hence, in the eyes of the returnees, had not undergone the purging required of those who, in their view, constituted the orthodox community. Whatever the case, these opponents intimidated and discouraged the returnees and subverted their progress. The end of verse 5 describes this state of affairs as lasting from the days of Cyrus (539–530 B.C.E.) to the reign of Darius I (522–485 B.C.E.).

4:6-23 Later hostility. Chronological shifts as well as changes in content mark verses 6-23 as a unit which interrupts the flow from 4:5 to 4:24. First of all, with regard to chronology, verse 6 jumps from the reign of Darius (v. 5) to that of his successor, Xerxes (here called Ahashuerus). Verses 7-23 take readers forward another generation into the reign of Artaxerxes I (465–425 B.C.E.). Secondly, although the particular issues over which there is controversy in verses 6 and 7 are unclear, the matter of concern in verses 8-23 is the rebuilding of the wall of the city of Jerusalem. This sets these verses apart from the concern of verses 1-5 and verse 24 where the issue is the rebuilding of the temple. This change in topic along with the chronological shifts in verses 6-23 show us that these verses interrupt the flow of the narrative. Presumably they have been inserted into this account about the rebuilding of the temple as additional examples of the kind of opposition which hampered the restoration efforts of the postexilic community.

Verses 6 and 7 are related to verses 8-23 insofar as they witness to written statements composed by the enemies of the restoration community and designed to obstruct their efforts. The enemies of verse 6 are the anonymous "they." Those named in verse 7 (Mithredath and Tabeel) appear to have some official roles but we know nothing further about them. In verses 8-23 the enemies are clearly designated as the governor and officials in the Persian province of West-of-Euphrates.

Verse 8 is the beginning of the Aramaic section of the Book of Ezra which continues until Ezra 6:18. An editor prepares the reader of the Hebrew text for the shift in verse 7b. The contents of verses 8-23 claim to be a record of official correspondence to (vv. 8-16) and from (vv. 17-22) the Persian king. This demonstrates the writers' characteristic style of documenting their accounts with what appear to be official records. The question of whether or not the correspondence recorded here is, in fact, an authentic record remains open, since we have no extrabiblical evidence with which to verify it.

The letter to Artaxerxes reports the rebuilding of Jerusalem (v. 12) as a threat against the Persian throne (v. 13). In verse 14 the writers declare that their report is an act of loyalty. Partaking of the "salt of the palace" refers to an ancient custom wherein sharing salt with another symbolized alliance (see Num 18:19; Lev 2:13; 2 Chr 13:5). In verse 15 the composers of the letter suggest to the Persian emperor that their accusation against Jerusalem can be substantiated by an investigation of the city's past. Jerusalem, they say, has a history of rebellion which is documented in Persian records and which will lead to Persia's loss of the entire province of West-of-Euphrates if the rebuilding of the city is not stopped (v. 16).

The letter from Artaxerxes (vv. 17-22) shows that the enemies of the restoration community achieved their desired result: the suspicions of the accusers were substantiated, and the Persian emperor ordered that the rebuilding of Jerusalem be stopped. The truth of the matters which the Persian emperor said were documented in his records is difficult to assess. That any foreign king ever ruled the territory from the Euphrates River to the Mediterranean Sea (the area subsequently called West-of-Euphrates) from Jerusalem is especially questionable. Whatever the case, verse 23 narrates that Artaxerxes' orders were carried out and the rebuilding of Jerusalem stopped.

4:24–5:17 Rebuilding of the temple. Verse 24 of chapter 4 is a transitional statement which resumes the narratives of verses 1-5 of the same chapter and leads into the materials contained in chapters 5 and 6. Verse 24 takes readers back to the later years of Cyrus and the first years of Darius when the concern was not the restoration of Jerusalem (as in 4:8-23) but the reconstruction of the temple.

In Ezra 5:1-2 renewed efforts to rebuild the temple are traced to the inspiration of two prophets from the early years of Darius' reign, Haggai and Zechariah. The Books of Haggai and Zechariah tell us that during the period extending from the second to the fourth year of Darius (between 520 and 518 B.C.E.) these two prophets were concerned about the necessity, even urgency, of rebuilding the temple. Haggai and Zechariah corroborate the witness of Ezra 5:1-2 that Zerubbabel and Jeshua were leading figures in the restoration community during this period.

Having briefly reported the resumption of work on the temple, the biblical writers divert our attention to the question of proper authorization for the project, a concern which continues throughout the remainder of chapter 5 and throughout the bulk of chapter 6. Regional officials representing Persian interests came to Jerusalem to conduct an investigation regarding the temple project. The blatant hostility which marked the narrative of chapter 4 is absent from the present inquiry (vv. 3-5) and from the subsequent correspondence with the Persian emperor (vv. 6-17). We are not told what precipitated the investigation; although it may have constituted a subtle form of harassment, the text offers no clear indication that this was its purpose. The officials simply inquire regarding proper authorization for the temple reconstruction and the identity of those involved in the work. Verse 5 reports that, unlike the incident reported in Ezra 4:1-5 and 24, the present investigation did not retard progress on the rebuilding and that this was due to God's protective presence. At this point in the narrative the "elders of the Jews" appear to take the lead in the temple project and in dealings with the Persian officials (see Ezra 5:9; 6:7, 8, 14).

The remainder of chapter 5 and 6:1-12 reflect the Chronicler's fondness for including documentation, this time in the form of official correspondence between officers of the Persian province West-of-Euphrates and the Persian emperor. Verses 7-17 claim to be a copy of the letter sent by the provincial officers to Darius. Their report on the rebuilding in Jerusalem (vv. 7-8) and the nature of their inquiry (vv. 9-10) is in accord with what had been narrated in verses 3-4 except that the report contains additional information about building materials and the spirit and progress which marked the Jews' work (v. 8). Verses 11-16 contain a relatively lengthy response on the part of the Jews (a response which is missing from the incident as narrated in verses 3-5). The Jews address only the question about authorization for the rebuilding of the temple. The names which had been requested are not given. (Some have suggested that the list which now appears in Ezra 2 may originally have served this purpose.)

The Jews' response is set within the context of a brief review of history from the beginnings of the first temple. The language of the historical review makes concessions to the fact that this report was prepared for foreigners. The specific identity of the builder of the first temple would have been of no interest to Persian authorities, so Solomon is referred to simply as "a great king of Israel" (v. 11). For the same reason, the personal name of the God of Israel, Yahweh, does not appear, and instead the Jews refer to their God with a more general designation ("the God of heaven and earth" in verse 11 and the "God of heaven" in verse 12) which would have been more familiar to foreigners. At the same time, a specifically Jewish view of history surfaces in verse 12 where we read that the fall of Israel into Babylonian hands was not simply a human exchange of power but an act of God following upon the sinfulness of the covenanted people. The abbreviated report of the fall of the temple and the captivity agrees with longer witnesses to the same events which appear in 2 Kgs 25:8-21 and 2 Chr 36:17-20.

Persian authorization for the rebuilding of the temple appears in verse 13 where Cyrus the Persian is called "king of Babylon." Verse 13 neglects to mention that Cyrus' decree mandated the return of the Jewish exiles. It limits itself to the part of Cyrus' edict which relates to the matter at hand, that is, the rebuilding of the temple (compare the decree as cited in Ezra 1:2-4). Verses 14-15 extend the discussion to some degree by including Cyrus' decree providing for the recovery of sacred temple vessels which had been confiscated by the Babylonian captors.

When we are told in verse 14 that Cyrus appointed Sheshbazzar "governor," the meaning is unclear. The same word was used to describe Tattenai, the non-Jewish official of West-of-Euphrates who sent the letter (see 5:6; compare Ezra 1:8 where Sheshbazzar is called "prince of Judah" and Hag 1:1 where Zerubbabel is called "governor of Judah").

We have said that verse 16 attributes the laying of the foundations of the temple to Sheshbazzar even though Ezra 3:8-10 (and Zech 4:9) gave credit for its beginning to Zerubbabel (see our discussion on Ezra 3:7-13).

The officials' letter ends with their request that Darius verify Cyrus' authorization of the rebuilding of the temple as the Jews had reported and that Darius tell the officials what he wants them to do about this matter.

6:1-18 The decree of Darius. The opening verses of chapter 6 are a further example of the biblical writers' fondness for including official documentation. The statement by Cyrus which Darius found in Ecbatana, one of the imperial centers of Persia, also underscores Persian patronage of Jewish efforts—a consistent witness throughout the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah except for Ezra 4:8-23. The text confirms that the rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem was authorized, and as such it serves as a response to the inquiry which was the subject of chapter 5. It is presented as an edict issued by Cyrus in the first year of his reign, so it is an alternate witness to the edict cited in Ezra 1:2-4. Although the exact wording of the edict is not the same in the two texts, the content of 1:2-4 is in essential agreement with that of 6:3-5 with the following exceptions: (a) 1:2-4 includes permission for the exiles to return to their land along with permission to rebuild the temple while 6:3-5 confines itself strictly to the temple restoration; (b) 6:3-5 provides for the return of the temple utensils while the document cited in 1:2-4 does not mention them (compare 1:7 and 5:14-15); (c) 6:3-5 contains specific information about the construction of the temple which does not appear in the copy of the edict in 1:2-4. The building materials specified in verse 4 are the same as those used in Solomon's temple (see 1 Kgs 6:36), but there is a significant discrepancy between the proportions of the temple in verse 3 and the size of Solomon's temple recorded in 1 Kgs 6:2. Scholars, citing Ezra 3:12 and Hag 2:3, are skeptical that the second temple was larger than the one which Solomon built.

Having documented the claims of the Jewish leaders, in verses 6-12 the biblical writers cite Darius' response to the final request of the provincial officials that Darius voice his own directives on the matter under investigation. Darius tells the local officials not to interfere with the rebuilding of the temple. He also orders them to facilitate the work with monies collected through taxation within the province and to provide materials for the daily temple offerings required by the Mosaic law (see Exod 29:38-42). Verse 10 makes clear that the Persian emperor's directives are not without self-interest.

In the face of the long delays which mark the biblical writers' account of the rebuilding of the temple, the brief account of the completion and dedication of the temple and the restoration of cultic service (vv. 13-18) may strike the reader as abrupt. Work on the temple went forward in accord with the promptings of the God of Israel, the Persian emperors (Artaxerxes is a later gloss added to verse 14), and prophets of the period, Haggai and Zechariah. It was completed in the spring of 515 B.C.E. The temple was dedicated by a legitimate community of faith defined in verse 16 as priests, Levites, and other Jews who had been purified by the experience of Exile. The offerings for this occasion are relatively modest compared to the sacrifices at the dedication of Solomon's temple (compare 1 Kgs 8:5, 63) and probably reflect the poverty of the struggling community. Finally, we are told that priestly and Levitical personnel assumed their traditional cultic offices (see Num 3; 1 Chr 23–24). Thus the writers establish continuity between ancient practice and the worship of the postexilic community in Jerusalem.

These verses mark the end of the Aramaic section of the Book of Ezra. The concluding verses of the first section (6:19-22) appear in Hebrew.

If the witness of Ezra 6:15 is correct, that is, if the second temple was dedicated in the month of Adar (the twelfth month), then it is realistic to expect that Passover was celebrated soon after, for according to the legislation of Exod 12 Passover was held on the fourteenth day of the first month (Nisan). In including the account of Passover after a description of the temple dedication, the writers are presenting what appears to be a historically reliable account. At the same time, when we note that the Chronicler presents the feast of Booths (Ezra 3:1-6) following the dedication of the altar and that the celebration of Passover followed the reconsecrations of the temple which were part of the reforms of King Hezekiah (2 Chr 29–30; compare 2 Kgs 18–20) and King Josiah (2 Chr 34–35; compare 2 Kgs 22–23), we wonder if the biblical writers offer more of a theological construct than historical fact in Ezra 6:19-22. Whatever the case, a celebration of Passover is presented as following the rededication of the temple, and Passover observance is linked with the feast of Unleavened Bread as it is in the priestly legislation of Exod 12:1-20. Because the law permitted non-Jews to join in the celebration of Passover (Num 9:14), outsiders are invited to join in the celebration described here. However, the biblical writers' inclusiveness on this occasion is restrained by the repeated reference to members of the legitimate community (those who had been purged by the experience of Exile) and by the qualification that those non-Jews who celebrated Passover had separated themselves from the cultic uncleanness of the "peoples of the land."

The concluding verse of this first section of the Book of Ezra reminds readers of the aim of the entire account of these early years of the restoration. The biblical writers recall that it is Yahweh ("the Lord") who controls history and made the Persian king (certainly this is the intent of the expression "king of Assyria" in verse 22) facilitate the rebuilding of the temple which, according to the view of the writers (see Ezra 1:2), was the primary goal of the return from Exile.

PART II: RESTORATION OF THE WORSHIPING COMMUNITY

Ezra 7:1–10:44

Chapters 7 through 10 of the Book of Ezra constitute the second major part of the Ezra-Nehemiah materials. The chief figure in these chapters (and in chapter 8 of the Book of Nehemiah) is Ezra, a reformer important in the reconstruction, whose name was given to the biblical book. Chapters 7 and 8 introduce Ezra and describe the return from Exile which he led. Chapters 9 and 10 narrate the marriage reform which Ezra is said to have initiated within the restoration community. Much of the material was taken from Ezra's memoirs. Ezra 7–10 and Nehemiah 8 credit Ezra particularly with zealous efforts to establish the law of Moses as the center around which Jewish life was reconstructed. This is the foundation for the postbiblical view of Ezra as a second Moses.

Readers must be aware of the chronological, theological, and literary complexities woven into the Ezra materials. Although the exact time of Ezra's mission is unknown, we accept the scholarly opinion which places Ezra within the reign of Artaxerxes II (405–359 B.C.E.). Thus, a lengthy historical gap separates the materials of Ezra 1–6 (ending with the dedication of the temple in 515 B.C.E.) and the mission of Ezra (about 398 B.C.E.) as described in Ezra 7–10. In the intervening years, Nehemiah led the community in the reconstruction of the wall of Jerusalem and in cultic reforms (see Neh 1–7, 9–13).

The present arrangement of the text is understandable if one recalls the theological interests of the writers (see Introduction, (p. 336). They present community purity, the goal of Ezra's marriage reform, as the second stage of the restoration movement, following the reconstruction of the temple. True worship required not only a legitimate temple with proper rituals and feasts (Ezra 1–6), but also worshipers made cultically pure by their separation from foreigners (Ezra 7–10).

Ezra's proclamation of the law (Neh 7:72b–8:18) is now separate from the biblical writers' account of the rest of Ezra's mission. If one sought to reconstruct an accurate chronology of events, one might read Neh 7:72b to 8:18 between chapters 8 and 9 of the Book of Ezra. However, the present arrangement of the text stresses that the proclamation of the law was the theological culmination of all other works of restoration, the event which marked the full restoration of the Jewish community. Therefore, Ezra's reading of the law is presented in the Book of Nehemiah as part of the fourth and final stage of restoration.

7:1–10 Ezra the scribe. With the simple phrase "after these events," the biblical writers span the years which lay between the dedication of the temple and Ezra's mission. The genealogy of verses 2-5, which in part parallels 1 Chr 5:29-40, is not so much concerned with factual data (it is a historical impossibility that the time period between Aaron and Ezra was only seventeen generations) as with Ezra's priestly legitimacy. He is presented as a descendant of the precursor of all Israel's priests, Aaron. If Seraiah is the same person mentioned in 2 Kgs 25:18, Ezra is also presented as son of the last official high priest before the fall of the temple to the Babylonians (see 1 Chr 5:40; since the fall was in 587 B.C.E., it is clear that Ezra was not, in fact, Seraiah's son). The biblical writers use the genealogy not only to tell us that Ezra was a priest but to underscore the legitimacy of his priestly lineage and to emphasize that his leadership in the restoration community was an authentic extension of priestly leadership in pre-exilic Israel.

Ezra's more significant role was that of scribe, a term which originally designated an expert in writing who exercised a significant role, politically. In later periods scribes were experts in the law. That is the meaning of scribe as it is used here although Ezra's close relationship with King Artaxerxes also suggests that, prior to being sent to Jerusalem, he held a position (secretary for Jewish affairs?) in the royal court of Persia. It is difficult to know with certainty what constituted the "law of Moses" in which Ezra was well-versed. It may have been the Pentateuch as we know it or some portion of the law contained therein.

According to the biblical writers, Ezra had other credentials for his mission: he was favored by God and by the Persian king. This is consistent with Ezra 1–6 where God showed graciousness to the Jews by providing the generous patronage of the Persian kings.

Having introduced the chief figure in the second stage of the restoration, the biblical writers offer an overview of his return from Exile, a journey which will be considered in greater detail in Ezra 8. The writers' concern for worship in the restoration community led them to include references to the cultic officers who accompanied Ezra (v. 7). They also provide dates for the journey. It seems to have taken about four months. It is interesting that Ezra left Babylon during the first month of the year, the same month which the priestly writers assigned to the Exodus journey (Exod 12:2; Num 33:3). It is difficult to know whether or not the biblical writers were suggesting a theological parallel between the two events.

The introductory verses to the second stage of the reconstruction close with a portrait of Ezra as one who not only studied and taught the law but also zealously practiced it (v. 10).

7:11-26 The decree of Artaxerxes. Interested in including official documentation for various parts of the return and restoration, the biblical writers offer what claims to be a statement by the Persian emperor which (a) authorized a return under Ezra's leadership, (b) commissioned Ezra to establish the law as the basis for life in the restoration community in Judah, and (c) put Ezra in charge of monetary and other gifts for the temple in Jerusalem. The fact that the decree (vv. 12-26) appears in Aramaic gives it the appearance of authenticity. Yet some of its details (such as the list of offerings in verse 17 and the list of temple personnel in verse 24) suggest that it was written by someone with considerable knowledge of cultic affairs in the Jewish community. Some scholars have proposed that it was drafted by a Jewish member of Artaxerxes' court, while others think that an authentic letter of appointment was amplified by the biblical writers.

The opening (vv. 11-12) and closing (vv. 25-26) of this section echo the main emphasis which appears in the introduction to Ezra in 7:1-10, Ezra's authority with regard to the law. Following his commission to lead a group of exiles back to Jerusalem (v. 13), Ezra's basic role in the restoration community is to be guardian of the law of God within the Jewish community. This role represents an extension of the authority of the Persian government (v. 14).

The remainder of Artaxerxes' decree orders Ezra to obtain sufficient provisions to establish full worship in the temple in Jerusalem. The king and his officers not only contributed silver and gold for temple worship out of their own treasuries but also authorized Ezra to take to Jerusalem any gifts which he could collect from Jews living in Babylon. In addition, Artaxerxes sent utensils for temple worship with Ezra, just as Cyrus had done when Sheshbazzar led an earlier return (see 1:7-11; 5:14-15). As a further gesture of generosity, Artaxerxes promised to provide from the royal treasury whatever else was needed for proper worship and included explicit instructions for his officers in the province to which Ezra travelled. Finally, he declared all cultic personnel in West-of-Euphrates tax-exempt. In verse 23 we see that Artaxerxes' magnanimity toward the Jews and their worship was not without self-interest: proper worship was to be conducted in order to secure Yahweh's favor for the Persian king.

The conclusion of Artaxerxes' decree (vv. 25-26) returns to Ezra's role as chief caretaker of God's law. Like Moses (see Exod 18), Ezra is authorized to appoint administrators of justice within the restoration community. Ezra's own role is to offer instruction in the law. Finally, the Persian emperor provides for the punishment (even the death) of those who fail to obey "the law of your God and the law of the king."

7:27–8:14 Ezra and his companions. The biblical text returns to Hebrew in verse 27. The same verse marks the beginning of what scholars call "Ezra's memoirs," the first-person account which extends to Ezra 9:15 (see our discussion of sources, p. 338). Verses 27-28a are a blessing placed on the lips of Ezra. Its contents reiterate the notion expressed in 7:6 that the generosity of the Persian officials was ultimately an expression of Yahweh's graciousness to the Jewish community. In the remainder of verse 28 Ezra also connects his own work with the providence of God.

Just as the biblical writers included a list of the names in conjunction with an earlier return to Judah (Ezra 2), so the narrative about Ezra's return is delayed by a similar listing which appears in the initial verses of chapter 8. The list begins (v. 2) with the names of returning descendants of ancient Israel's priestly leaders (Phinehas and Ithamar) and of the royal house of David. Verses 3-14 list the names of the heads of twelve lay families who returned along with the total number of returning males belonging to each group. In naming twelve families the biblical writers suggest that "all Israel" returned, that is, representatives from all the twelve tribes of Israel. Nearly fifteen hundred males returned with Ezra—a sizeable number especially if one adds the women and children who must have returned with them. Family names in this list also appear in the longer list in chapter 2, although in a different order.

8:15-36 The journey to Jerusalem. The account of Ezra's journey to Jerusalem is marked by an order similar to that of a religious service. There is (a) an initial gathering of returnees at a location ("by the river that flows toward Ahava") unknown to modern scholars and a three-day rest which will be repeated when the journey to Jerusalem has been completed (see 8:32), (b) recruiting of cultic personnel (Levites and temple slaves), (c) a fast and prayer for a safe journey, (d) the consignment of temple treasures to cultic personnel, (e) the journey itself which unfolded in accord with the prayer of verses 21-23, (f) the delivery of gifts for the temple which in part repeats verses 24-30, and (g) sacrificial rituals to Yahweh and a visit to local civic officials. The biblical writers devote much attention to preparations for the journey and to activities which occurred upon Ezra's arrival in Jerusalem. Among these, interest is particularly focused on cultic concerns. Events during the long journey are only hinted at in verse 31.

Verses 15b-20 contain a record of Ezra's attempts to include cultic personnel in his return. We do not know why Levites did not originally join his group. Some scholars have suggested that not many Levites had gone into Exile because earlier shifts in their cultic duties at the temple had led to their dispersal among outlying cities and towns prior to the fall of Jerusalem. Others suggest that Levites had gone into Exile but had taken up non-cultic professions while they were there. Whatever the case, the recruiters that Ezra sent to Casiphia (Levites were apparently concentrated in this city the location of which is not known) brought a few Levites and a greater number of temple slaves into the caravan. This, like much else in the present account, is attributed to God's guidance. The emphasis upon divine protection likewise appears in the fast and prayer which preceded the journey (vv. 21-23) and in the notation that the group and its many treasures arrived safely in Jerusalem despite the fact that they had neither requested nor received military protection along the way.

Ezra selected twelve priestly leaders and twelve of the cultic personnel recruited from Casiphia to take care of the temple gifts from Persian officials and from Jews in Babylon. The appointment of cultic leaders for this role is in accord with ancient tradition, since Num 3-4 tells us that priests and Levites were appointed to attend to sacred objects on the journey that Moses led through the Sinai wilderness when ancient Israel journeyed toward the Promised Land after the Exodus. The fact that it was twelve priests and twelve other cultic leaders who were guardians of the sacred offerings and utensils again reflects the biblical writers' propensity for the number which symbolized the ideal, "all Israel." Immediately following a brief summary of the journey (v. 31), the biblical writers tell us that the sacred gifts arrived intact and were delivered to the proper officials as Ezra had directed. Cultic matters were most important to them; this priority given to cult led the biblical writers to suggest that, following the standard three-day rest period, the first activity of the returnees was to offer sacrifices to Yahweh.

9:1-2 Denunciation of mixed marriages. Ezra's work in the restoration community (decrying mixed marriage) is narrated in chapters 9 and 10 of the Book of Ezra and in chapter 8 of the Book of Nehemiah (Ezra's ceremonial reading of the law). Some scholars propose that Neh 8 was originally part of the Ezra materials which appear in the Book of Ezra. Accordingly, they have suggested that Neh 7:72b–8:18 be read between the end of Ezra 8 and the beginning of Ezra 9. While this proposal has merit because of the somewhat nebulous opening of Ezra 9 ("when these matters had been concluded"), for purposes of this commentary we shall follow the text as it has come down to us. In view of the reply that Artaxerxes sent to Ezra, the learned scribe, to "supervise Judah and Jerusalem in respect of the law of your God" (7:14), it is surprising that the first reported incident involving his leadership is the dissolution of mixed marriages and not the reading of the law.

The biblical position on marriages with foreigners is not consistent. While some prominent biblical figures (for example, Joseph, Moses, David) had foreign spouses and the Book of Ruth witnesses to the blessings God bestowed on the Hebrew community through the Moabite woman who married the Hebrew Boaz, the prohibition of mixed marriages which appears in the Book of Ezra has precedents in earlier stages of Israelite tradition (see Exod 34:16; Deut 7:1-4). Marital practices in different ages were shaped by changing social, political, economic, and religious situations. In Ezra's time concern for cultic purity and for securing the identity of the Jewish people required pure blood lines.

The situation is reported to Ezra: laymen and clergymen alike have taken foreign wives, and the worst offenders are community leaders. The "people of the land" with whom they were joined are defined by an editor who had access to the lists of Deut 7:1; Josh 3:10; 24:12. The transgressors are also linked with the "abominations" of their spouses; that is, their marriages had brought them into contact with the worship of other gods.

9:3-15 Ezra's exhortation. Ezra was distressed by the report. In a traditional expression of grief, he tore his clothes and pulled out his hair. As the smoke of the evening offering marked the hour of community worship in the temple, Ezra fell on his knees and stretched out his hands.

Ezra begins praying in the first person singular but changes immediately to the first person plural, which he uses consistently throughout the remainder of the confession of guilt.

Ezra states that Israel's entire history has been characterized by sin which brought on the downfall of the nation and the Babylonian Exile (v. 7). This sinful past provides the perspective within which Ezra interprets Israel's present situation. In the present era the punishment of captivity which was an expression of God's justice has given way to God's mercy. A remnant of the Jewish people was spared and brought once again to Jerusalem. As elsewhere in the Book of Ezra, this mark of divine favor is brought into conjunction with the kindness of the Persian emperors toward the exiles. The end result of these divine and human mercies is that the temple was rebuilt and Jerusalem and Judah were made secure (vv. 8-9). But the present favor is now in jeopardy. The land and its peoples are impure (see Lev 18:24-25), and Israel has transgressed God's commandment by intermarrying with foreigners (Deut 7:1-4). (It is noteworthy that the Deuteronomic tradition cited by Ezra prohibits the marrying of Israelite women to foreign men as well as the marrying of Israelite men to foreign women, a more inclusive view than Ezra's own reform which deals only with marriages which Jewish men had contracted with foreign women.)

While Ezra explicitly addresses his questions to God in verses 13-14, the reader senses he has also aimed them at the Jews assembled for worship in order to call to their attention what was happening in their midst. Have they not learned from experience that punishment follows sin? If God were to punish the present guilt, would not the Jews now living in Israel be completely destroyed? Justice is certain, but mercy is a gift. The fragile remnant of Jews in Jerusalem exists only because of gift. Their sin of marrying foreigners will require that God act justly with them.

10:1-15 The people's response. The dramatic confession of chapter 9 serves as the background for the decisions and actions reported in chapter 10. The use of the third person suggests that the report in chapter 10 did not come from Ezra's memoirs but from another source.

Ezra had attracted a very large crowd of men, women and children. A layman, Shecaniah, was stirred by Ezra's speech to confess the community's guilt ("We have indeed betrayed our God"). To ward off the possibility of total destruction, a punishment of which Ezra had warned, Shecaniah proposed that Jewish men dismiss their foreign wives and their children.

Shecaniah's exclamation, "Let the law be observed!" (v. 3) is something of a puzzle. While Pentateuchal law prohibited marriage with foreigners (see Exod 34:16; Deut 7:1-4), it did not make provision for what to do in cases where mixed marriages already existed. In other words, the law did not require divorce in cases of mixed marriages. It is possible that what we see here is the beginning of a new practice adopted to meet the demands of a situation not addressed by tradition. Whatever the case, Shecaniah's proposal makes clear that Ezra's condemnation of mixed marriages in chapter 9 was accepted by the community and required the dissolution of already-established families. Concerns about religious tradition took precedence over regard for the sacredness of family bonds. At once, action to dissolve mixed marriages begins. Ezra demanded that the priests and people of the community swear to act. All exiles in the country (that is, all legitimate members of the Jewish community) were required to come to Jerusalem within three days under threat of dispossession and excommunication.

Meanwhile Ezra retires to the temple quarters of Johanan (v. 6). This brief note has played an important part in biblical scholars' discussions about the dates of Ezra's mission. Johanan is described here as son of the high priest Eliashib. However, Neh 12:10-11 and 22 are probably more accurate in presenting Johanan as Eliashib's grandson. Now Eliashib is known to have served as high priest during the time of Nehemiah (445–433 B.C.E.; see Neh 3:1, 20-21). Most scholars conclude from this that, contrary to the chronological witness of the present arrangement of the Ezra-Nehemiah materials, Nehemiah preceded Ezra in the work of restoration. The biblical writers do not tell us whether or not Johanan served as high priest in Ezra's day. (Extra-biblical sources indicate that Johanan held the high priestly office near the end of the fifth century B.C.E..) He did, however, have his own quarters in the temple.

When the biblical writers say that "all the men of Judah and Benjamin" appeared as ordered (v. 9), they refer to "all Israel" by naming the two ancient tribes who constituted the southern part of the country during much of its history. The biblical writers describe a scene both grave and comic. It was Israel's rainy season and those who gathered on the temple mount shivered—over the seriousness of the matter at hand and "because it was raining" (v. 9). Apparently oblivious to their pathetic condition, Ezra (now specifically described as priest instead of scribe) began accusing those gathered before him in the rain. Without awaiting response or confession, he gave the order for separation. The assembled community acknowledged that it was their duty to obey Ezra but pointed out that because of their numbers and the rain it was both humanly impossible and uncomfortable to proceed immediately. They suggested that appointed leaders could handle the matter for the whole community, in light of the numbers involved, and establish a more realistic deadline for the dissolution of mixed marriages.

Verse 15 notes some dissenting voices among those gathered, but the subject of their disagreement is left ambiguous. We do not know whether they objected to the decision to divorce foreign women or to the procedures designed for the reform.

10:16-44 The guilty. Verses 16-17 report that the leaders appointed by Ezra judged the legitimacy of marriages of Jews with foreign women. These hearings took three months. Most of the remainder of the chapter is a list of the offenders, beginning with priests and other cultic personnel and concluding with members of the laity named by families. The list has some parallels with those in Ezra 2 and 8, although it is not a duplicate of either. It contains only 111 names, a surprisingly small total in view of the thousands who constituted the community. This may have been only a partial listing of the people involved. An alternate explanation is that if mixed marriages were widespread only a few people responded to the action taken by Ezra.

COMMENTARY: NEHEMIAH

PART III: RESTORATION OF THE WALL OF JERUSALEM

Neh 1:1–7:72a

Drawing heavily upon Nehemiah's memoirs, chapters 1–7 of the Book of Nehemiah narrate events of the two-month period from the beginning of Nehemiah's mission to shortly after the reconstruction of the wall around Jerusalem, the third major achievement during the restoration period. Work on the wall presses on in spite of both continuous opposition from Judah's neighbors and tensions within the Jewish community itself. Throughout the chapters there is an underlying parallel drawn between the welfare of the city and the welfare of the Jewish community. The restoration of the city wall in Part III thus functions as a fitting preparation for the full restoration of the community under the law in Part IV.

In these chapters we find the biblical portrait of Nehemiah. Throughout, he is presented as a pious Jew, prayerful and dependent upon God's help. His initial fears are transformed to fearlessness before all but God, and he counsels the Jewish community not to capitulate through fear to the evil designs of its enemies. Other prominent characteristics of Nehemiah's piety are the initiative and zealous effort which mark his mission. His oneness with the Jewish people sparks his decision to act when he hears of the brokenness of Jerusalem and its people. He gives practical matters his full attention, assessing situations carefully before acting.

Nehemiah's mission to Judah was authorized and patronized by the Persian throne, as were the missions of Sheshbazzar (Part I) and Ezra (Part II). Nehemiah's appointment as governor over the province of Judah put him in a position to deal firmly with rulers of neighboring regions and with leaders in the Jewish community who needed to be called to account for their acts. With the community at large, he was consistently decisive but not coercive. He was attentive to their needs, even to the point of self-sacrifice. His view of community included women as well as men.

1:1-11 Nehemiah's vocation. The opening chapter of the Book of Nehemiah falls into two sections: (a) a report about the Judean Jews and the city of Jerusalem (vv. 1-3) and (b) Nehemiah's response to the report (vv. 4-11). Succinctly the chapter presents the roots out of which the remainder of the book will grow. First of all, we learn that it is 445 B.C.E. (the twentieth year of the reign of Artaxerxes I) and that, even though nearly a century has passed since the Jews returned to Judah from their captivity in Babylon, they continue to live as a broken people, a plight symbolized by the brokenness of the wall around the city which is their center. Secondly, this first chapter introduces us to Nehemiah, a Jewish official in the Persian court ("cupbearer to the king"), who has both a strong sense of identification with the Jews in Judah and a recognition that the brokenness in Judah constitutes a call to action on his part.

As the book opens we find ourselves in the memoirs of this Jewish layman. Nehemiah was in Susa, a winter residence of King Artaxerxes whom he served. He met with a group of men from Judah whose mission is not stated. They could have come to solicit help from the Persian throne or from Nehemiah. Or, they may have been on a routine business trip within the empire and secondarily functioned as part of an informal network of communication between Jews in Judah and those scattered abroad. Whatever the case, the group included Hanani, a "brother" to Nehemiah, that is, either a blood relative or perhaps just a fellow Jew. In answer to Nehemiah's inquiry, Hanani reports both about the Jews and about the city of Jerusalem. The fact that Nehemiah is reported to have asked about both the people and the city signals a perspective which flows through the work of Nehemiah. We shall see that for him the welfare of the two are closely intertwined. For Nehemiah, the restoration of the people and the restoration of the city are somehow two sides of the same concern.

The news from Judah is bad, and it grips the spirit of Nehemiah (v. 4). The disgraceful situation of the Jews in Judah and of the city of Jerusalem becomes his own diminishment. In the prayer of verses 5-11 we see the strong bond between Nehemiah and the Jews: their sin is his sin (vv. 6-7); their need for God's favor is his need (v. 11). Into his confession and petition Nehemiah weaves words pushing God to act. He politely reminds God of exactly who is speaking to whom. He and the sorrowing Jews in Jerusalem—those who beg for a hearing—are, like Moses before them, God's own servants (vv. 6, 7, 8, 10, 11). At the same time, he reminds God that God is the one who chose and bought this people for the divine self (v. 10), who preserves a "covenant of mercy" for faithful servants (v. 5), and who, after all, has promises to keep (vv. 8-9).

The prayer of Nehemiah is shot through with elements firmly rooted in Israel's religious tradition. In verse 10 he refers to the Exodus from Egypt. Nehemiah's restatement of God's promise (vv. 8b-9) is a paraphrase of Deut 30:1-5 which Nehemiah freely interprets not simply as God's commitment to bring the Jews back to the land of Judah but specifically to bring them back to "the place which I have chosen as the dwelling place for my name," a Deuteronomic way of referring to the city of Jerusalem.

Much takes place in this seemingly simple chapter. Nehemiah has moved from his initial inquiry about Jerusalem to grief, prayer, and a decision to act. It is a fitting introduction to Nehemiah, a man of action who identifies deeply with his fellow Jews. He hears a vocational call: the Jews and Jerusalem are in distress and he is in a position to help. Empathy and prayer are not enough. The closing words of the chapter (v. 11b) reflect his decision to help Jerusalem.

2:1-10 Appointment by the king. The memoirs resume four months later when Nehemiah is in a position to do something about the vocational call narrated in chapter 1. While Nehemiah performed his duty as cupbearer, Artaxerxes noticed that something was wrong with his servant. Nehemiah reports (v. 2) that he was "seized with great fear" when Artaxerxes inquired about the reason for his sadness. To understand Nehemiah's fear we must recall the incident described in Ezra 4:8-23. At some time earlier in his reign Artaxerxes had halted Jewish efforts to reconstruct the wall of the city of Jerusalem. He did so out of a conviction that the restoration of Jerusalem was tantamount to rebellion against the Persian throne. Hence, Nehemiah was fearful because, in effect, he had to tell the king that his sadness was due to a decision that the king himself had made.

The exchange between Nehemiah and the king constitutes a masterpiece of diplomacy. Politics is left out of the conversation. The personal concern which started the discussion ("Why do you look sad?" v. 2) carries to its end. Nehemiah avoids the word "Jerusalem" and instead speaks of the devastation of "the city where my ancestors are buried" (vv. 3, 5). Thus, his request to go and rebuild the city is made only on personal grounds. The king does not refer to his earlier decision either, although he must have been aware that he was being asked to reverse his decision regarding the reconstruction of Jerusalem. It may be that doing so now was politically expedient. In the earlier period there had been much unrest in the area of the empire surrounding Judah, and the reconstruction of a fortified city in Judah may have only fed fires of revolt. But by 445 B.C.E. revolts in that part of the empire had died down, and entrusting Nehemiah (whose loyalty the king knew personally) with the task of fortifying Jerusalem might indeed enhance imperial strength and security in the area. If politics motivated Artaxerxes to grant Nehemiah's request, we are never told so. Instead, the permission to return to Jerusalem is cast as a personal favor to one who had endeared himself to the king. The permission, however, constitutes a political appointment. In Neh 5:14 we are told that Nehemiah went to Judah as governor. The length of his appointment is only alluded to in Neh 2:6, but Neh 5:14 shows that Nehemiah left to begin a term of office which would last twelve years.

Neh 2:6 implies that Nehemiah's commission came from both the Persian king and queen. The inclusion of the queen (whose name, Damaspia, we know from extrabiblical documents) is an unusual but interesting detail. Queens exercised considerable influence during some periods of the Persian Empire (see the Book of Esther) and this was especially so during the reign of Artaxerxes. In addition, we shall see that the Book of Nehemiah frequently includes the role of women as well as men (see Neh 3:12; 5:1-5; 8:2-3; 10:31; 12:43).

The account of Nehemiah's appointment by the king is consistent with the first chapter's portrayal of Nehemiah as a pious believer. At the same time that he asks Artaxerxes for help, he calls upon God's help (vv. 4-5), and the favor of Artaxerxes is interpreted by Nehemiah as an expression of God's favor (v. 8). Nehemiah is a man of decisive action who links his efforts at reconstruction to the generative presence of God in the situation (see also Neh 4:3).

Nehemiah shows himself to be a practical man. He secures an official letter of appointment from Artaxerxes and a letter granting him access to the royal supply of wood which he will need for the work he is undertaking (vv. 7-8). Moreover, he receives a military escort for the journey (v. 9).

Verse 10 is a warning of things to come. Nehemiah's reconstructive efforts will consistently be undermined by Sanballat and Tobiah, two officials who appear here for the first time. Sanballat was governor of the province of Samaria to the north of Judah. Readers will recall that his predecessor, Rehum, had successfully blocked the reconstruction of Jerusalem's city wall in an earlier period (see Ezra 4:8-23). Tobiah appears to have been governor of the province of Ammon in the Transjordan area east of Judah. No doubt they viewed Nehemiah's appointment and the restoration of Jerusalem as threats to their own political power in the area of Judah. It is also possible that there was more at stake than political jurisdiction. Extra-biblical documents from the end of the fifth century B.C.E. suggest that Sanballat may have considered himself a worshiper of the God of the Jews because the names of his sons (Delayah and Shelemyah) contain elements of the divine name Yahweh. Neh 6:17-19 and 13:4-9 show that Tobiah was related to some of Judah's most influential people, and he, too, may have been a Yahwist or considered himself so. Thus, in addition to their political concerns, Sanballat and Tobiah may have claimed that they had a legitimate voice in the religious interests of the Jews in Judah. The Book of Nehemiah is unclear about their motivations. We only see their consistent opposition to Nehemiah.

2:11-16 Circuit of the city. Upon his arrival in Jerusalem, Nehemiah rested for three days (compare Ezra 8:15, 32) and then conducted a firsthand assessment of the actual condition of the city wall. The account from his memoirs bears all the intrigue of a modern mystery novel. He set out in the darkness of night with only a few companions and one animal so as not to attract attention. He told no one of his plans (vv. 12, 16). By his secrecy he delayed the interference of those who were hostile toward the restoration of Jerusalem. Although he was convinced that his mission was prompted by God (v. 12), he was practical enough to want to assess exactly what needed to be done before prematurely presenting a plan to the Jews.

Verses 13-15 form one of three texts in the Book of Nehemiah which offer some description of Jerusalem during this period. Like Neh 12:31-39 the present text contains only a partial description whereas Neh 3:1-32 is more complete. In a general way the information in all three is consistent, and, taken together, the three texts constitute an important resource for study of the city's history. At the same time, the picture offered in these texts is not perfectly clear to modern scholars because the exact locations of the landmarks named by Nehemiah are not certain.

According to Neh 2:13-15 Nehemiah left and re-entered the city through the Valley Gate, so named because it either faced the central valley of the city (the Tyropoeon Valley) or because it opened onto the Valley of Hinnom. Nehemiah's inspection took him past the Dragon Spring, the Dung Gate, the Spring Gate, and the King's Pool, sites which are no longer certainly identifiable. At some point the ruins of the wall were so bad that passage was impossible for the animal on which Nehemiah rode so he proceeded on foot "up the wadi" which is generally identified with the Kidron Valley. No further sites are mentioned so some scholars suggest that Nehemiah soon turned around and retraced his steps to the Valley Gate, while others think he forged ahead until he had completed a circuit which brought him back to his starting point.

2:17-20 Rebuilding Jerusalem's walls. Up to this point Nehemiah has shown himself to be a pious, practical man of action. Now we catch a glimpse of his qualities as a leader.

Some time after Nehemiah inspected the condition of the city wall, he addressed the Jews (presumably those mentioned in v. 16). First he articulated succinctly and clearly what they knew to be true: "You see the evil plight . . . Jerusalem lies in ruins . . ." (v. 17). He then challenges them to correct that situation by doing something about it, but he does so through words of invitation: "Come, let us rebuild . . . ." Finally, he identifies the brokenness of the city with the brokenness of its people when he speaks of the purpose and goal of the work: "so that we may no longer be an object of derision" (v. 17 emphasis added). The invitation to rebuild the city is at the same time an invitation to restore themselves as a people deserving respect. Throughout his short speech Nehemiah's use of the first person plural shows his identification with his fellow Jews, a trait demonstrated in the previous chapter as well. Nehemiah invites the Jewish community of Jerusalem to acknowledge the relationship between their city and themselves, to face the situation squarely, and then to undertake bold measures to act in a constructive way. All the while, he speaks as one who is with them in brokenness and in the effort to rise up. He assures them that this effort is indeed a call from God and that it has imperial endorsement as well (v. 18a). The people respond wholeheartedly (v. 18b).

Nehemiah's enemies respond as well. In verses 19-20 Sanballat and Tobiah are joined by Geshem who, some say, headed a group of Arabs controlling the Transjordan region of Edom and the Negeb area to the south and southeast of Judah. The three opponents, then, represent Judah's neighbors to the north, east, and south. They surround Judah and encircle the Jews. Through mockery and ridicule they attempt to undermine the spirit of renewal among the Jews. In charging them with revolt, the enemies no doubt intended to haunt the Jews by recalling the past. In an earlier period, work on the city had been called revolt and that had been enough to halt the effort (see Ezra 4:8-23). In the present situation these enemy leaders probably were well aware that Nehemiah's project was authorized by Artaxerxes, so their charge of revolt was in all probability merely an empty accusation aimed at intimidating the Jews.

Nehemiah stands his ground with them. He ignores their charge and the reference to imperial authority. The work will go on not because of Artaxerxes' patronage but because of God's. Moreover, he defines the position of Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem with regard to the project. In effect he tells the three that what the Jews are doing is none of their business. They are not part of the Jewish people. They have no authority over the Jews. They are not part of the Jews' religious community. It is a bold declaration of the Jews' independence from those who seek to keep them under control. They take their stand in God alone.

3:1-32 List of workers. The memoirs of Nehemiah are interrupted by a list which was probably borrowed from the temple archives. It describes the entire circuit of the wall around Jerusalem. The naming of strategic landmarks (gates, towers, barracks, arsenal) reflects a sense of order and orientation. Many of the workers on the wall are identified by name or family while others are described by role (priests, members of professional guilds) or residence (Tekoites, Gibeonites). The text conveys the impression that this was a precisely organized effort: identifiable workers are linked with identifiable sections of the wall. This well-ordered sense is enhanced by frequent repetition of words which describe the work itself (see vv. 1, 3, 6, 13, 14, 15) and which link the workers with one another (see "at their side . . . next to them/him" in verses 2-12 and "after him/them" in verses 17-31). As in chapters one and two of the Book of Nehemiah, the text portrays the relationship between city and people.

This section of the Book of Nehemiah is the Bible's most comprehensive description of the wall of Jerusalem. Although efforts have been made to link the picture presented here with modern archaeological data, extensive correlation between this text and the findings of archaeology eludes us. Some portions of the wall built under Nehemiah's leadership have been recovered. They are about eight feet thick and their rough construction might suggest that the rebuilding of the wall was a hurried effort (compare Neh 6:15). Modern archaeology has also discovered that the city enclosed by the wall in Nehemiah's time was much smaller than once thought. It seems to have comprised only a part of the pre-exilic City of David on the southeastern crest of the hill facing the Kidron Valley, the Ophel area connecting the City of David with the temple area to the north, and the temple area itself. It is generally believed that the wall constructed during Nehemiah's time did not encompass the entire populated area of Jerusalem. Some people probably lived to the west of the rebuilt wall.

The description of the building effort begins at the Sheep Gate in the temple area (v. 1), proceeds in a counterclockwise direction around the contours of the city, and finally returns to the starting point (v. 32). Most of the landmarks on the north and west sides of the wall are various city gates (vv. 1-16). The remaining sections of the wall (vv. 17-32) are described in terms of both public sites (vv. 19, 24, 25, 26, 28, 31, 32) and private homes (vv. 20, 21, 23, 24, 28, 29, 30). Archaeological evidence suggests that although the pre-exilic City of David extended downward onto the slopes of the city's southeastern hill facing the Kidron Valley, during Nehemiah's time the slopes of the hill were abandoned and the city wall was constructed instead along the top ridge of the hill. Thus, some of the work on the wall was probably new construction while part of it was undoubtedly an effort to reconstruct the ruins of a more ancient wall.

The high priest Eliashib, the grandson of Jeshua (who was high priest during Zerubbabel's time), and other priests were appropriately assigned to work on the part of the wall around the temple area (v. 1). The compiler of the list gives priority to this area by making it the beginning and end of the circuit. All in all, there seems to have been widespread participation in the rebuilding effort, including citizens from nearby towns and villages. The text even notes that one of the workers was assisted by his daughters (v. 12). Only in verse 5 do we encounter a slight hint that not all the citizens of Judah were in total agreement about the project.

3:33–4:17 Opposition from Judah's foes. Nehemiah's memoirs resume with a scene similar to the one which immediately preceded the list of workers in chapter 3. By now the reader detects a regular rhythm in the book: Nehemiah's mission meets with opposition from Judah's neighbors at every step. Nehemiah's arrival in Judah met with displeasure (2:10), the community's decision to rebuild Jerusalem met with ridicule (2:19), and now Judah's enemies meet the workers' progress with anger and contempt. Neh 3:33–4:17 is preoccupied with the dangers posed by enemies. It is a series of three escalating tensions for the Jewish community.

In 3:33-38 we are faced for the third time with Sanballat, the Samaritan instigator of troubles for the Jews, and his Ammonite collaborator, Tobiah (compare 2:10, 19). Sanballat appears to be addressing an official assembly in Samaria, and, as was the case in 2:19, he and Tobiah speak words aimed at undermining the rebuilding effort. Sanballat asks questions. Tobiah gives answers. Both ridicule. Sanballat minimizes the worth both of the Jews themselves ("these miserable Jews") and their work ("Will they recover these stones . . . from the heaps of dust?"). Tobiah limits himself to a verbal attack on the city wall. Ancient city walls were ordinarily penetrated by siege weapons only after considerable effort, but Tobiah sarcastically says that the wall of Jerusalem could not withstand the force of a fox hurling itself against it!

Apparently Nehemiah was aware of what was being said and responded to their hostile words with words of his own (vv. 36-37). As in 2:20 Nehemiah does not dignify the enemies' remarks by correcting what they say. Rather, once again he turns his attention to God. He prays for God's vengeance on these enemies in much the same way other believers had (see Jer 12:3; 17:18; 20:11-12; Ps 137:7-9). It is noteworthy that he identifies their crime not as an insult against the city (compare vv. 34-35) but against the people themselves (v. 37). Once again, the text presupposes a close bond between city and people. In spite of enemy hostility, however, the builders are indomitable. They continue work on the wall and at this point have half completed it.

A second, more threatening stage of opposition is narrated in 4:1-5. The host of Judah's enemies has increased. They now include Samaria to the north, Arabs to the south, Ammonites to the east, and Ashdodites (from what had been Philistine territory along the Mediterranean coast) to the west of Judah. In other words, Judah is now encircled by groups poised to launch a common attack on Jerusalem. Hostile words had not been enough to stop them, for the wall was now half complete. Their enemies prepare to use military might. The Jewish response is consistent with what we have seen in Nehemiah before: in the crisis situation they pray and take action (see Neh 1:11; 2:4-5) by posting a watch. But fatigue and despair have taken hold among the builders. Nehemiah quotes what may have been a chant commonly heard in the community (v. 4). In Hebrew the verse rhymes and flows with the distinctive rhythm of chants used by mourners. Meanwhile the enemies conspire to attack.

According to verses 6-17, a third and final threat shows itself in the fear that had taken hold of the community. The Jews came "from one place after another" (that is, from all directions) and reported "ten times over" (that is, repeatedly) that an enemy attack was imminent. The enemies had succeeded in breaking the spirit of the Jewish community. City and people alike were now very vulnerable and Nehemiah took concrete measures to address both problems. He organized the Jews to defend the city against attack. At the same time he addressed their fear by challenging them to fear only God. Once again we see the two sides of Nehemiah's religious zeal: depend upon God and fight for yourselves. He pointed out that defending the city was indeed defending their own people. Again, the city and its people are one.

The measures taken by Nehemiah met the enemies' challenge, and he interpreted that as God's work (v. 9). Freed from the grip of helplessness, the community again gave itself to the rebuilding of the wall. From now on, however, the work of rebuilding and the work of defense go hand in hand. Half of a special group around Nehemiah (the "able men") worked on the wall while the rest stood ready to defend the city. Those who could work with one hand ("the load carriers") did so and held a weapon in the other. Those whose work required the use of both hands kept swords at their sides. Nehemiah watched over the whole procedure accompanied by a trumpeter who could summon the workers scattered along the circumference of the wall to the place of attack if one should come. Nehemiah took an additional security measure: he directed workers not to return to their homes outside the city at night. No doubt this was intended for the protection of the city and the protection of the commuters as well. The long days of work on the wall continued, and even at night Nehemiah and his company were ready for battle.

5:1-5 Antisocial conduct. Chapter 5 puts aside concerns about the restoration of the city wall and turns instead to the brokenness which exists within the community itself. Men and women alike (one translator says especially the women) call some errant Jews to justice. The charge was exploitation. The times were hard, especially for those who made their living from the soil. Verse 3 mentions a famine but it is also likely that the demands of the restoration project in Jerusalem kept farmers from their work. Certainly this was the case if they remained within the city during work on the wall (see 4:16). The issue raised here, however, was not with the project nor with Nehemiah's directives. Rather, it was with those affluent Jews who used this situation to exploit the needy. The situation is described in verses 2-4. The farmers could not raise their own food which meant they had to buy it. In order to pay for it they had to pawn their own children (v. 2) or mortgage their property (v. 3). Others had to borrow money to pay their taxes (v. 4). Presumably their creditors were other Jews. The charge is levied in verse 5: the standard of the community members' fundamental equality had been broken. Community bonds were supposed to be like family ties (see v. 5 "these are our own kinsmen"). Yet some Jews were victimizing other Jews, and the daughters of the poor suffered the most violent indignities. (One translation says that they were raped.)

Once again there are parallels between the city and its people. Just as opposition threatened efforts to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem, so now injustice threatened the strength and integrity of the community. But in this case the attack does not come from foreigners. It comes from within the community itself.

5:6-13 Nehemiah's action. Nehemiah responds immediately even though as in 2:11-16 he does not take action before carefully assessing the situation (vv. 6-7a). He charges corrupt leaders (the Hebrew root "called . . . to account" has legal overtones) with breaking the law by charging interest to other Jews. This is clearly prohibited in Jewish law (see Exod 22:24-26; Deut 23:20; Lev 25:35-38). The New American Bible continues: "I then rebuked them severely" (v. 7c), but this is better translated: "I brought them before a great (official) assembly." In other words, he first accused the nobles and magistrates privately and then brought them to court. In court Nehemiah addresses the buying and selling of members of the community. He attests that the community had made a concerted effort to redeem those poor Jews who had been sold to foreigners (an effort not mentioned elsewhere in the Book of Nehemiah). The honor of the Jewish community required this. (On the practice of paying a ransom for fellow Jews whose dire circumstances had forced them to sell themselves as slaves see Lev 25:47-55.) Now that honor is even more severely offended by the fact that Jews are enslaving other Jews.

The silence of the accused pronounces their guilt. As he had done in the past, Nehemiah calls them back to the only honorable posture for Jews, to stand right before God (compare 4:8). This travesty within the Jewish community invites ridicule from non-Jews just as the brokenness of Jerusalem had.

Verse 10 is difficult. The New American Bible translation seems to exonerate Nehemiah, and in doing so, it follows the witness of the Latin Vulgate translation. A better textual tradition, however, omits "without charge." In other words, Nehemiah confesses that he himself and his closest associates had also broken the law by exacting interest. This seems to flow more naturally into the exhortation which follows: "Let us put an end to this usury!" (emphasis added). He proposed measures of reform which were to be taken at once (v. 11), and these were accepted (v. 12).

Finally, Nehemiah put the whole matter in an explicitly theological context by convening a religious service. Priests were called to administer an oath while Nehemiah ritually acts out, then speaks, a curse upon those who do not uphold their oath: may your pockets be emptied if you are unfaithful to your promise.

As the city wall was being restored out of stones left over from a past age, so Nehemiah laid the foundation for a restored people by rooting them in ancient social and religious law.

5:14-19 Nehemiah's lack of self-interest. In the present text the architect of the restored people embodies an ideal of community which goes beyond the strict requirements of the law. As a government official Nehemiah was entitled to appropriate for his own use a portion of the local taxes collected for the Persian throne. But he testifies that, unlike his predecessors (probably the governors from Samaria whose jurisdiction formerly included Judah), he had not used the allowance due him. Moreover, he had contributed to the work on the wall even though he was not a citizen of Judah and at his own expense had extended hospitality as circumstances warranted. He reports the motivations for his actions: he feared God (v. 15) and he had compassion for his people (v. 18).

In verse 19 Nehemiah prays that God remember his service. This and similar prayers (13:14, 22, 31) echo the contents of ancient memorial inscriptions which presented to a deity the righteous deeds of a faithful believer.

6:1-14 Plots against Nehemiah. For the fourth time the enemies of Judah conspire to subvert the work of restoration. Verbal intimidation, ridicule, and rumors of war had been ineffective; the city wall was nearly finished now. The enemies' final assault was to destroy the Jewish leader or, better yet, to trick him into destroying himself. Through it all, Nehemiah remains intractable. His vision and purpose are fixed on restoration.

By now the conspirators are familiar to us (see 2:10, 19-20; 3:33–4:17). Their initial tactic (vv. 1-4) was to lure Nehemiah out of Judean territory (into the plain of Ono) on the pretext of conferring with them. Whatever their real intent (assassination?), Nehemiah viewed the invitation as a trap though his reply to them reveals nothing of his suspicions. He simply says, "I have more important things to do" and points to the work of restoration. One can hardly imagine a response which would arouse more ire in opponents whose sole aim was to prevent the restoration of the wall of Jerusalem. Repeated invitations got the same reply. Nehemiah refused to divert any energy in their direction.

Lack of success in the first plan precipitated a second one (vv. 5-9). It, too, was an invitation to meet. This invitation, however, is attached to news of a widespread rumor that Nehemiah was spearheading a revolt against the Persian throne. The rumor is a covert accusation and threat. It is the same charge which had been issued against the whole of Jerusalem in 2:19 except that here Nehemiah is singled out as the instigator of the treason. Nehemiah dismisses their words with his reply: "It's a lie, and you have fabricated it." As often happens in cases of harassment, the enemies' designs only gave momentum to Nehemiah's resolve.

The final attempt to do away with Nehemiah (vv. 10-13) is more subtle than the first two. The voices of the familiar foes speak deceptively in the words of a prophet, Shemaiah, who appears to be a member of the Jewish community in Jerusalem. There is no agreement among scholars regarding what lay behind the note that Shemaiah was "unable to go about." Whatever the case, Nehemiah sought out the prophet who said he had Nehemiah's best interests in mind when he counseled the Jewish leader to take refuge from his enemies within the sacred space of the temple. As he had done before (see 2:11-16; 5:7), Nehemiah carefully considered the matter and discerned that this one who pretended to deliver God's word had been bought off by Sanballat and Tobiah. The man counseled not just cowardice (seeking refuge) but also sacrilege, for the temple precincts into which Shemaiah urged Nehemiah were reserved for priests alone. A layman like Nehemiah would have been subject to the death penalty for entering them (see Num 18:1-7), or just as effective in his enemies' eyes, such an abomination would have undermined Nehemiah's credibility within the Jewish community. To follow the prophet's advice would have been to fly in the face of hallowed religious practice. One way or another, Nehemiah was being enticed by Shemaiah to bring his influence to an end. In response to Shemaiah, Nehemiah curtly refused cowardice and sacrilege alike. Once again, we witness his fearlessness and his piety.

In the final verse of this section we see Nehemiah's brief petition that God remember. Like 3:36-37 it asks that God make note of the enemies' work. Tobiah and Sanballat are mentioned by name. Alongside them Nehemiah names prophets whose aim was also to divert his energies from the work of restoration. Of these one might expect that Shemaiah be singled out. Instead the name of a prophetess, Noadiah, appears. The Bible offers no other information about her, but she must have been part of a group within Jerusalem who sought to subvert Nehemiah's efforts. The appearance of her name indicates that women served in religious capacities within Judaism during this restoration period as they had during pre-exilic times (see Exod 15:20; Judg 4:4; Isa 8:3; 2 Kgs 22:14).

6:15–7:3 Conclusion of the work. The announcement of the completion of the city wall of Jerusalem is registered with some solemnity in the memoirs of Nehemiah. The date (both day and month, early October of 445 B.C.E.) is precisely chronicled (compare 1:1 and 2:1). It had been only a few months earlier in Susa that Artaxerxes' cupbearer had heard of the sad state of affairs in Jerusalem and only fifty-two days since the rebuilding project had begun. Such an amazing feat seems incredible, and some scholars accept as more likely the witness of the first-century A.D. Jewish historian Josephus, who reported that the wall was constructed over a period of two years and four months. Others, however, point to the relatively small circumference of the city, the probability that a significant portion of the project simply entailed repair or reconstruction of a damaged wall, and the recent findings of archaeologists that the (only) new section of the wall (that on the eastern ridge of the hill facing the Kidron Valley) was very crudely constructed and conclude that, amazing as it is, the biblical text is probably accurate in saying that the task was completed in fifty-two days.

One is somewhat taken aback that immediately following the notice of completion there are no words of relief or exultation. Instead Nehemiah registers the effect upon Judah's enemies (they "lost much face in the eyes of the nations" v. 16). The completion of the wall is foremost a vindication of the Jews over their enemies. God had indeed been the power within this movement, and now that was clear to all. The enemies' effort to frustrate the work had been there through all stages of Nehemiah's mission (2:10, 19-20; 3:33–4:17; 6:1-14), and the Jewish leader triumphantly attaches a pronouncement of their judgment to his announcement of the Jews' success.

One would expect verses 15-16 to bring to an end the ongoing controversy with the opponents and the text to continue with the contents of 7:1-3 and perhaps the account of the dedication of the city wall (which now appears in 12:27-43). Instead we hear about the enemy Tobiah. Some scholars suggest that verses 17-19 have been misplaced from their original position after verse 14. Whatever the case, we learn that Tobiah was related by marriage (his own and his son's) to very influential Jews in Jerusalem and that in his struggles with Nehemiah, Tobiah had won the support of these Jews so that his subversive influence continued. Viewed together with the witness of 13:28 (that Nehemiah's other enemy, Sanballat, had marital ties with the Jewish high priestly family), Neh 6:17-19 cautions us that even though the Jerusalem wall is complete, the work of the restoration of the Jewish people itself will have to deal with the continuing presence of Nehemiah's opponents.

In 7:1-3 Nehemiah reports that he has arranged for proper leadership and security for the city. Guards were stationed at the city gates. ("Singers and Levites" is very likely a gloss which was mistakenly added to verse 1. They were officials in the temple.) Nehemiah appointed Hanani and Hananiah as administrators over the city of Jerusalem. Both were dependable and apparently not susceptible to the influence of Nehemiah's opponents. It had been Hanani who had first informed Nehemiah of the distress of Jerusalem and the Jews (see 1:2), and Hananiah possessed a quality valued by Nehemiah: the fear of God (see also 4:8; 5:9, 15). Although the Hebrew text of verse 3 is troublesome, it appears that Nehemiah directed that guards carefully watch the city gates and open them only during daylight hours. Nehemiah arranged for another precaution: security guards were stationed at various places within the city. It is clear from these verses that Jerusalem continued to be threatened and that the Jews needed to continue to protect what they had accomplished.

7:4-72a Census of the province. The beginning of this section appears to be a continuation of Nehemiah's memoirs. It describes the Jewish leader's effort to strengthen the city of Jerusalem by addressing the problem of its small population. It was this concern that led Nehemiah (with God's coaxing) to call an assembly in the city. An editor's insertion interrupts the account, however, and Nehemiah does not take up his concern about the smallness of Jerusalem's population again until his memoirs resume in chapter 11.

The contents of verses 4-72a are virtually the same as those in the list of Ezra 2. The few minor discrepancies are probably slight emendations which crept in through the copyists' transmission of the text. As in Ezra 2, we find in the present text an early population listed according to family or places of residence, a listing of liturgical officials and of some who could not trace their ancestry, and a total tally of the people and their belongings as well as a list of gifts contributed by these people. As in Ezra 2 the list concludes with a single sentence about where the citizens took up residence. A careful comparison of Ezra 2:70 with Neh 7:72a shows that the latter text diverges slightly from the former in omitting reference to any settlement in Jerusalem. No doubt this represents a slight editorial change designed to fit the list of Neh 7 into the concern for increasing the population of the city.

The exact purpose of the insertion of the ancient census list is puzzling, especially since it apparently played no role in the repopulation of Jerusalem. What it does, however, is temporarily draw attention away from the city itself to the other effort which was part of Nehemiah's mission, that of rebuilding the Jewish people themselves. The city wall had been rebuilt on the stones of ages past. Now an editor recalls for us those who had pioneered the effort to restore God's people in the land of Judah. Just as the list of Ezra 2 precedes the restoration of the altar as the center of Israel's worship, so now the same list precedes a service in which God's people once again gather to commit themselves to what had from ancient times been the center of their life as a community, the law of Moses.

PART IV: RESTORATION OF THE COMMUNITY AROUND THE LAW

Neh 7:72b–13:31

In this final section of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah the biblical accounts of the restoration period come to an end. The text begins with Ezra's proclamation of the law (ch. 8). The community acknowledged its dependence upon God's help (ch. 9) and agreed, communally, to abide by the law of Moses (ch. 10). Jerusalem's population is restored, and the completed city wall is dedicated in solemn ceremony (chs. 11–12). Finally, Nehemiah initiated several reforms to maintain the community's fidelity (ch. 13).

This section is something of a patchwork quilt incorporating in its complex design elements which had appeared in earlier sections. Ezra and Nehemiah are both present, Ezra in chapter 8 and Nehemiah in chapters 11 through 13. In an effort to lessen the jarring impact of the sudden appearance of Ezra in the Book of Nehemiah, an editor has added the name of Nehemiah to the Ezra materials in chapter 8. Ezra's name was also appended to the lengthy prayer in chapter 9, and he was added to the account of the dedication of the city wall narrated in chapter 12. Both Ezra and Nehemiah have been editorially inserted at the end of the list of priests and Levites in chapter 12. In all of this we see an effort to bring together two great leaders who were probably separated from one another chronologically but who were alike in their commitment to the restoration of God's people.

As in earlier sections, the cult and its personnel receive much attention. We see religious festivals and prayer as well as concern for offerings, observance of the sabbath, cultic personnel, and the purity of the temple and of the worshiping community.

In these final chapters, we see the Jewish community of the restoration period mooring itself in pre-exilic Israel. The law which brought to completion the restoration of the community is the ancient law of Moses. The terms of the community's pact are founded on that law, as are Nehemiah's reforms. The community's prayer reviews the past relationship between God and Israel and that past relationship is the basis for their present reforms.

The entire community, including women and children, is restored in the law and in its commitment to the law. Near the end of the book the city of Jerusalem, made secure by a sizeable population and sure city walls, is whole. The community is restored through the law of Moses and through its attentiveness to the cult. All of this is celebrated at the temple, the place where the work of restoration began.

It is worth noticing that the Book of Nehemiah ends in reform. The story ends not at the temple nor at the city wall but in the community and its struggle to be faithful. The temple building and the walls of Jerusalem were concrete realities. They were externals around which the religious identity of the Jewish people centered. But true religion is dynamic; it is a continual process which takes place not in stones but in the hearts of people. Perhaps in ending their narrative as they did, the biblical writers were suggesting that the work of restoration is a continuing one.

7:72b–8:12 Ezra reads the law. Concerns about Nehemiah and the wall of Jerusalem give way to a description of a solemn religious service led by the priest-scribe, Ezra. The entire community gathers in a public square in Jerusalem. It is the beginning of the seventh month, the high point of Israel's liturgical year, at least in a late period. (According to Num 29, the religious festivals of the seventh month included the Day of Atonement on the tenth day and the feast of Booths from the fifteenth to the twenty-second days of the month. In addition, there seems to have been a regularly recurring festival on the first day of the seventh month, but the feast is unnamed both in Num 29:1 and Lev 23:23-25.)

Even though Ezra proclaimed the law, several details in the account suggest that the biblical writers sought to emphasize the community-centeredness of this event. First, we are told explicitly (twice) that the assembly consisted of the entire community—men, women, and children (vv. 2-3). Second, the writers pay close attention to the community's role in the service. Members of the community initiated the service by summoning Ezra to proclaim the law (v. 1) and then they "listened attentively" as he read (v. 3). They saw the scroll as he opened it and stood for the reading (v. 5). They accepted the proclamation with their "amens" and performed ritual gestures of raising and lowering their hands and bodies (v. 6). They responded with tears which gave way to festive celebration (vv. 9-12). From beginning to end the rhythm of the service is marked by the community's participation. The biblical writers repeatedly show that the Jewish community knowingly and willingly accepted the law of Moses. We see this in the description of the children present at the reading of the law of Moses. They were those "old enough to understand" (vv. 2-3). We see it also in the stress given to the interpretation of the law. Verse 8 assigns the interpretive role to Ezra, emphatically stating the goal that the community understand the law. An editor supplemented Ezra's interpretive role by adding that he was joined by Levitical assistants (vv. 7, 9; compare 2 Chr 17:7-9 and 35:3; the Hebrew verb in verse 9 is singular, which suggests that originally Ezra was the only subject. Nehemiah's name was also a later addition). Some scholars think that the Levites' task was to translate the Hebrew words of the law into the community's vernacular tongue, Aramaic. Others suggest that the Levites explained the meaning of the law. Whatever the case, verse 12 states that the goal was successful. We see that the community which actively sought the law not only saw and heard it but also understood it.

The law which was solemnly proclaimed was probably taken from what now constitutes the Pentateuch of the Hebrew Scriptures. The present text suggests that the law directed the community's attention to the life of worship. This is signalled by Ezra's words of verse 10 (where "rejoicing in the Lord" probably refers to worship) and by the editorial addition in verse 11 which refers to the holiness of the day. (Moreover, see the restoration of the liturgical feast which follows immediately in 8:13-18.) The reading of the law must have exposed their failures for the community responded with tears. (Compare Josiah's response to the reading of the law and the liturgical reform which follows in 2 Kgs 22:8–23:24.) However, Ezra counseled the community to view the liturgical reading of the law not as a source of condemnation but as a source of life and strength. A full-fledged holiday followed the reading of the law. The people brought out their best food and drink and shared them with the needy. (The practice of sharing on festive occasions also appears in Deut 16:9-12; 26:11; 2 Sam 6:19.)

8:13-18 The feast of Booths. On the day following the proclamation and celebration of the law, the community gathers to study its contents further. Lay leaders, priests, and Levites join Ezra, and together they find legislation for the feast of Booths. (On the feast of Booths see our comment on Ezra 3:1-6.)

To observe the feast of Booths the community dwells in makeshift huts. This ritual may have originated with the custom of harvesters living in temporary quarters of branches and leafy boughs constructed in the orchards and vineyards where grapes and olives were harvested in the fall of the year, the season of the feast of Booths. Lev 23:42-43 assigns religious significance to the practice by comparing it with the time the ancient Israelites lived in makeshift dwellings while they wandered in the wilderness between Egypt and the Promised Land. Verses 16-17a report that the community immediately prepared to observe the feast of Booths as the law prescribed. The notice in verse 17b is probably not to be taken literally, especially in light of the witness of 2 Chr 8:13 and Ezra 3:4, which attest to the continued observance of the feast of Booths. Comparison with 2 Kgs 23:22 and 2 Chr 35:18 indicates that this was a stylized way of relating a current festival to the past. The writers of verse 17b want to convey the idea that a new age of religious observance is beginning, but they stress that the newness is actually a revival of authentic ancient practice. The community once again restores itself in continuity with the practices of their ancient ancestors in faith. Their foundation is in the law, the prescriptions of which are followed exactly (compare vv. 15-16 with Lev 23:39-42; also compare v. 18 with Deut 31:10-13).

9:1-37 Confession of the people. Chapter 9 reports a community penance service (vv. 1-5) and a long prayer that includes a summary of the relationship between God and Israel (vv. 6-37). Although they are adjacent to one another in the present text, there is little direct connection between the contents of the two parts of the chapter. They may have originated independently of one another and been inserted here by an editor.

As in the services described in chapter 8, the law stands at the center of the service in 9:1-5. The penitential character of the service is clear from the traditional gestures of repentance and mourning, which include fasting and the wearing of sackcloth and ashes (v. 1). Public confession of guilt and prostration also occur (vv. 2-3). It is noteworthy that Ezra does not appear here. Leadership in prayer belonged to the Levites whose role included leading the community in antiphonal responses of blessing and praise (v. 5).

We cannot be certain of the particular occasion for this service. Because the authors mention in verse 2 that the Jews separate themselves from foreigners before their confession of guilt, some scholars suggest that this service originally followed the Jews' divorce from foreign wives described in Ezra 10.

The prayer of 9:6-37 is a beautifully woven tapestry of threads of tradition from other parts of the Hebrew Scriptures, especially the Pentateuch. In its historical orientation it is similar to other prayers in the Bible (see Pss 78, 105, 106, 135, 136). It offers an overview of God's longstanding relationship with Israel. The biblical view of a God of both mercy and justice is carefully intertwined with a portrait of an unfaithful Israel.

Ezra's prayer begins with the acknowledgement of God's creative activity in heaven and on earth (v. 6) and ends with the political distress of the writer's own day (vv. 36-37). Within these boundaries Ezra rehearses salvation history. It began when God chose Abraham and was faithful to the promise that Abraham would have many descendants who would inherit the land of Canaan (compare vv. 7-8 with Gen 12 and 15). The prayer recites Israel's bondage in Egypt and God's redeeming activity through the plagues and the rescue at the Red Sea (compare vv. 9-12 with Exod 1–15). God's continuing gifts included the law given to Moses at Mount Sinai (vv. 13-14), sustenance during the wilderness journey, and the invitation to inherit the land which had been promised (v. 15). (These traditions run through the Books of Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy.) Up to verse 15 the recital summarizes God's activity, consistently gracious. Israel's response was unfaithful all along the way, but in spite of that, God was "a God of pardons," merciful (vv. 16-22).

Israel's life in the Promised Land is summarized in verses 23-31. As in the earlier traditions, God continued to give, and Israel continued to be unfaithful. In the face of Israel's response, God executed justice against the chosen people while extending divine mercy toward them as well. (Essentially, this is a capsule form of the Deuteronomic history which appears in the Books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings.) Hardly a mention is made of the monarchy and the traditions of God's covenant with David through which the Davidic dynasty was established.

The "Now, therefore . . ." of verse 32 signals a change from a recital of salvation history to petitionary prayer. The writer asks God to take into account the hardships that the Jewish people have suffered for several hundred years. (Although the exact reference is unclear, "from the time of the kings of Assyria" may point to the fall of the northern kingdom into Assyrian hands in 721 B.C.E.) In verses 33-35 the writer acknowledges that God has been just in allowing disasters to befall the chosen people but suggests that now is a time for mercy. God's graciousness in giving Israel the Promised Land is compromised by the fact that its rich gifts flow through their hands into the coffers of foreign rulers. They are slaves once again, not in Egypt but in their very own land.

As in 9:1-5, the particular occasion for the prayer of verses 6-37 is not clear. Verses 36 and 37 describe an oppressive situation although it is unspecified. If Persian authorities are the offenders, this is an unusual witness, since most of the Ezra-Nehemiah materials witness to gracious patronage of the Jewish people by the Persian throne. Some scholars have suggested that the prayer of verses 6-37 originally belonged to the prayer of Ezra reported in Ezra 9. (Specifically, some would have us read Nehemiah 9:6-37 between verses 7 and 8 of Ezra 9.) Ancient Greek tradition connected this prayer with Ezra, for in the Greek translation known as the Septuagint the prayer was attributed to Ezra. Translators of the New American Bible have followed this tradition (see v. 6). However, in the official Hebrew text Ezra's name does not appear with the prayer.

Whatever the origin of this text, the lengthy prayer of verses 6-37 reflects the views of a Jewish community which turned to the past and found insight into the present. As in other parts of the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah it shows us a postexilic Jewish community mooring itself in pre-exilic Israelite religious tradition.

10:1-28 Agreement of the people. The community which stood primarily as receiver of God's gifts and mercy in chapter 9 adopts a different stance in its relationship with God in chapter 10. Now it commits itself to responsibility. It solemnly swears to fashion itself according to the law of God given through Moses. No leader administers the oath. Rather, through mutual consent, members of the community bind one another to the requirements of the law.

The bulk of chapter 10 appears to be official documentation of those who entered into the agreement (especially vv. 2-28) and of the contents of the oath (vv. 31-40). This material may have come from records preserved in the temple archives.

The text opens with a connecting verse probably supplied by an editor (v. 1). The introductory phrase, "In view of all this," is vague and functions as a transition to the record which follows. The editor then summarizes the groups who entered into the agreement to live by the law although the order in verse 1 (princes, Levites, priests) differs slightly from the order of the list itself (civic officials, priests, Levites, community leaders). Nehemiah's name heads the list, and it is accompanied by the name of Zedekiah who may have been the secretary who recorded the names (v. 2). Priests are listed according to family (vv. 3-9) while the Levites appear to be listed as individuals (vv. 10-14). We know some of the leaders of the people (vv. 15-28) from the lists of Ezra 2 and Neh 7, although new names also appear here.

10:29-40 Provisions of the pact. Before recording the obligations of the pact (vv. 31-40), the biblical writer stresses that this was a commitment of the entire community. All, including women and children, assume equal responsibility for community life (compare Neh 8:2-3). The obligations of the pact are taken from Pentateuchal tradition. The restoration community adopts ancient law as its own charter thereby establishing itself as a legitimate continuation of pre-exilic Israel. (A number of the obligations listed here will surface again in chapter 13 as the concerns of Nehemiah's reform.)

Preserving the integrity of the community is the first obligation mentioned. The community agrees to be a people set apart by not contracting marriages with foreigners. (Here, unlike Ezra 9–10, there is no provision for what to do in cases where mixed marriages already exist.) It secures the place of daughters as well as sons in the community (v. 31).

According to verse 32, the community also promised to forgo commercial dealings on the sabbath and holy days in accord with Pentateuchal law (see Exod 20:8-11; Deut 5:12-15). The land, too, shall rest every seven years (see Exod 23:10-11; Lev 25:2-7), and those burdened by debts shall have relief in accord with Mosaic law (Deut 15:1-3).

Earlier, the Persian kings had provided materials necessary for the temple cult. Now the community pledges to maintain supplies for regular worship out of its own resources. These included monetary contributions as well as offerings of bread, grain, and meat which were needed for rituals prescribed for daily temple service and also for special days. (For a list of prescribed offerings, see Num 28–29.) In addition, verse 35 describes the arrangement for provision of the firewood needed for temple sacrifice. According to verses 36-38a, the community promises to continue ancient Israel's practice of recognizing that all things which are given to them for their sustenance and growth come from and ultimately belong to Yahweh. They offer back to Yahweh the first of everything—products of the soil as well as the first-born of animal and human life (see Exod 23:19; 34:26; Deut 26:1-11). The community will contribute tithes for the support of temple personnel (vv. 38b-39). All the cultic pledges are summarized in the final sentence of the chapter: "We will not neglect the house of our God."

11:1-2 Repeopling of Jerusalem. Chapter 11 returns our attention to the city of Jerusalem and specifically to a concern first addressed in the opening verses of Nehemiah chapter 7. The city wall had been completed, Jerusalem's officials appointed, and precautionary measures taken to protect the city in case of enemy attack. Only one point of vulnerability remained: the smallness of the city's population (Neh 7:4). The author says Nehemiah convened a meeting "to examine their family records" (7:5a). Presumably Nehemiah was initiating steps to address the population problem. At that point, however, the text digresses. We see a list of those who first returned from Exile (7:6-72a), Ezra's proclamation of the law (7:72b–8:18), prayer (9:1-5, 6-37), and the community's solemn pact (10:1-40). Finally, chapter 11 returns to the population issue. It is reasonable to assume that, prior to the final editorial arrangement, the present text originally followed Neh 7:4-5a.

To solve Jerusalem's population problem, community leaders settled in Jerusalem as did one family in ten chosen by lot. Those who willingly became this "tithe" of the entire community were endorsed by the rest (v. 2). Just as the rebuilding of the temple and the city wall physically restored Jerusalem, so now the "holy city" (as Jerusalem was frequently called in the postexilic period) restored its population.

11:3-24 The residents of Jerusalem. Those chosen by lot from outlying areas are passed over, and we are given a record of the leaders who took up residence in Jerusalem. The list of verses 4-19 is enveloped by reminders that the rest of the population was settled in cities in the surrounding region of Judah (see verses 3b and 20).

The people living in the region of Judah traced their ancestry to two of the sons of Jacob, Judah and Benjamin, so the list begins with names and totals of Judahites (vv. 4-6) and Benjaminites (vv. 7-9) who moved to Jerusalem. There follows a list of cultic leaders: priests (vv. 10-14), Levites (vv. 15-18), and gatekeepers (v. 19). A comparison of this list of settlers with the list of 1 Chr 9:2-18 shows that, while the two are not identical, they have much in common. It is possible that one was taken from the other or that both were taken from a list preserved in the temple archives. The list of 1 Chr 9 claims to be a record of those who settled in Jerusalem following the return from Exile. Here a somewhat parallel list is said to be a record of those who settled in Jerusalem following the completion of the city wall.

As mentioned above, verse 20 notes that the remainder of the population was scattered throughout Judah and to this was appended the miscellaneous information which appears in verses 21-24. There we learn the names of various officers residing in Jerusalem: leaders of the temple slaves (v. 21) and singers (vv. 22-23) and a Jewish ambassador to the royal court of Persia (v. 24).

11:25-36 The other cities. The closing verses of chapter 11 spell out in greater detail what had been said in summary fashion in 11:3b and 20. They list towns and regions outside Jerusalem where Jews resided. Verses 25-30 name seventeen places (many the same as in Josh 15) as far south of Jerusalem as Beersheba where Judahites lived. Verses 31-36 list sixteen areas (some the same as in Ezra 2 and Neh 7) to the north and west of Jerusalem where Benjaminites lived. The entire area is suspiciously large. Scholars suggest that the list may include some cities which lay beyond the provincial borders of Judah but which nevertheless had sizeable Jewish populations.

12:1-9 Priests and Levites under Zerubbabel. These verses constitute the first of a series of lists of cultic personnel from different periods in the restoration movement. They are a record of the priests (vv. 1-7) and Levites (vv. 8-9) who were part of the earlier return to Judah from Exile when Zerubbabel was civic leader and Jeshua was priestly leader (see Ezra 1–6). Some of the priestly names here also appear in the list of those who signed the community pact (see especially 10:3-9). Likewise, some of the Levites named in 12:8-9 appear in other lists in the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah (see, for example, Neh 7:43 and Ezra 2:40). The Levites are temple singers, and here they seem to be arranged in choirs for antiphonal singing.

12:10-11 High priests. Verses 10-11 are a record of those who served as high priests from around 538 B.C.E. to sometime in the early 300s B.C.E. The high priesthood was an inherited office. Little is known of these men except that Jeshua is clearly from an early stage of the restoration shortly after 538 B.C.E. (see his role in Ezra 1–6) and that his grandson Eliashib was Nehemiah's contemporary and thus held the high priestly office during 445–433 B.C.E. (see Neh 3:1, 20, 21). If Johanan, the high priest listed here as Eliashib's grandson, is identical with the Johanan who appears in Ezra 10:6, then he was in office around 400 B.C.E. and was a contemporary of Ezra.

12:12-26 Priests and Levites under Joiakim. The editor's fondness for archival lists again shows itself. Here we find a list of priests who purportedly served during Joiakim's term as high priest, that is, after the dedication of the second temple (in 515 B.C.E. when Jeshua held the high priestly office) but before Nehemiah came to Judah (in 445 B.C.E. when Eliashib was high priest). There is close similarity between the families listed here and those who purportedly belonged to the previous generation (see the list of Neh 12:1-7) although slight differences in names and spellings have crept in, probably as a result of scribal error. The Levitical names in verses 24-25 are also similar but not identical to the families of Levites said to have been from the previous generation (see Neh 12:8-9; also compare the Levitical lists of Neh 7:43-45; Ezra 2:40-42; and Neh 11:15-19). As in verses 8 and 9, the Levitical singers seem to have been arranged in antiphonal choirs. Other Levites served as gatekeepers.

Verses 22-23 suggest that these records agreed with the temple records. (Verse 23 is in error in describing Johanan as Eliashib's son. Verses 10-11 clearly present him as Eliashib's grandson.) The official register of priests and Levites is referred to as the Book of Chronicles but one must not identify these records with the biblical books which bear the same title.

The parenthetical note which concludes this section (v. 26b) is an editorial addition designed to relate the list of cultic leaders from the time of Joiakim to the chief figures of the two biblical books under consideration. It is not chronologically accurate, for all other evidence firmly presents Nehemiah as a contemporary of the high priest Eliashib (see Neh 3:1, 20, 21).

12:27-43 Dedication of the city wall. This account opens with the gathering of the Levites from surrounding villages into the city of Jerusalem for the solemn dedication of the completed city wall. As such, it bears some connection with the note at the end of chapter 11 (v. 36) which told where the Levites settled.

A more logical progression might juxtapose this account of the dedication of the city wall to Neh 6:15, the notice that work on the wall was complete. In the present arrangement of materials, however, a compiler thought it fitting to address other concerns before describing the solemn dedication of the completed wall. Among these concerns were a city strengthened by security measures (7:1-3) and a larger population (7:4-5a and 11:1-2), and a Jewish community restored through the law (ch. 8), prayer (ch. 9), and commitment (ch. 10). Throughout the Book of Nehemiah we have seen that Jerusalem and its people are inextricably linked. The welfare of one somehow signals the welfare of the other. Therefore, it would have been inappropriate to dedicate the restored city wall before the restoration of the people was complete. With the pact described in chapter 10, the people have been restored in the ancient law of Moses. Now the wall, restored from ancient ruins, can be dedicated.

According to verses 27-29 the Levitical musicians (instrumentalists and singers) came to Jerusalem. The first act in the dedication service was purification both of the community and of the city gates and wall (v. 30). The community then formed a grand procession which moved in opposite directions on top of the city wall toward the temple area. Half moved toward the right. The choir was followed by a civic official, half of the community's family leaders, the priests with trumpets, and Levites with musical instruments. (An editor, eager to coordinate the missions of Ezra and Nehemiah, has added Ezra's name as leader of this group.)

A similar group moved in procession toward the left. Nehemiah was part of this group (vv. 38-39). By verse 40 the two groups have converged in the temple where the ceremony continues. There was singing (some have suggested that Psalm 147 might have been used in this service), elaborate sacrificial rituals, and so much festive noise that it could be heard far off (vv. 40-43; compare the clamor at the service marking the laying of the foundations of the temple in Ezra 3:13). As he has done in other parts of his memoirs, Nehemiah specifically notes the presence of women (and children). It was a community, whole and entire, which now dedicated its own restored wholeness in dedicating the wall.

12:44-47 Offerings for priests and Levites. The community's provisions for cultic personnel has been appended to the account of the dedication of the city wall. Many scholars regard this part as the composition of the Chronicler, for like the Chronicler, it features cultic personnel (especially the Levites) and paints a picture of the ideal workings of the community, especially with regard to the cult and its personnel.

The sections open with information about the storage of goods brought to the temple (v. 44a). These were the "wages" of the temple officials contributed by the community in accord with the law (see Neh 10:36-40a). Then the writer subverts any suspicions that these tithes for the clergy's use were obligations imposed on a reluctant community. Indeed, "Judah rejoiced in its appointed priests and Levites" who had a prestigious tradition of service extending back several hundred years to the original design of King David (vv. 44b-46; compare 1 Chr 23–26). Having described the collection of goods (v. 44a) and their recipients (vv. 44b-46), the writer concludes that the system of providing for the cultic personnel functioned with smooth regularity (v. 47). The original writer attested that this was the case in the early days of the return when Zerubbabel was governor. Another writer added a gloss to bring this information up to date. We are told that it was also the case during the time of Nehemiah.

13:1-3 Separation from aliens. Once again the text calls our attention to the prohibition against mixing with foreigners. The topic comes to the fore at a public reading of the law (vv. 1-2). The prohibition is taken from Deut 23:4-7 which, in turn, has its background in the incident recorded in Num 22-24. Ammonites and Moabites are to be excluded from the "assembly of God," an expression which may be technical terminology referring to the worshipping community or it may, by extension, encompass the whole of the Jewish community. It is unclear whether the law excluded Ammonites and Moabites only from the temple or from all contact with the Jewish community. If verses 1-3 were intended as a basis for the reforms described in verses 4-31, both meanings apply. Nehemiah threw the Ammonite Tobiah out of the temple precincts (vv. 4-9), and he also denounced marriages with Ammonites, Moabites, and other foreigners (vv. 23-27). Whatever the case, the community responded immediately to the demands of the law. It set itself apart from all foreign elements (v. 3).

13:4-14 Reform in the temple. We now return to the memoirs of Nehemiah. His first term as governor of Judah had ended in 433 B.C.E. when he returned to the service of Artaxerxes. The monarch is referred to as "king of Babylon" in verse 6 when, in fact, he ruled the Persian Empire. But, like Cyrus before him (see Ezra 5:13), Artaxerxes adopted the title of the king of the empire which the Persians had conquered.

During Nehemiah's absence from Judah, contaminating influences and lax observance compromised some of the Jewish community's earlier accomplishments. Nehemiah held Jewish leaders responsible for the backsliding. After some time (we are not told how long) Nehemiah returned to Judah and initiated a series of reforms aimed at correcting abuses which threatened the purity and smooth functioning of the temple cult (vv. 4-14), restoring strict sabbath observance (vv. 15-22), and maintaining the purity of the Jewish community by strict separation from foreigners (vv. 23-31).

During Nehemiah's absence Tobiah the Ammonite had made his way into the temple precincts and had his own quarters there. Offerings and utensils for use in the temple worship as well as material goods contributed by the community as payment to cultic officials had been removed from storage areas in the temple, and the space was given over for Tobiah's use. Tobiah had not seized the area. It was given to him by the priest in charge, Eliashib (who is not to be identified with the high priest). Nehemiah immediately ousted Tobiah from the temple chambers. The area was then purified and restored to its proper use (vv. 4-9).

Another problem came to Nehemiah's attention; the Levites had abandoned temple service and Jerusalem itself (vv. 10-14) out of necessity. For some reason the tithes contributed to cult officials by the community in return for their service had ceased, so the Levites were forced to move to the country to make their living by farming. (Note how far this situation is from the ideal described in Neh 12:44-47.) Nehemiah held the leaders responsible for this neglect of temple worship. He called the Levites back to their regular service in the temple and resumed the practice of tithing whereby the people brought offerings of food to provide the Levites and singers with a steady income. He placed trustworthy men in charge of the storage and distribution of these goods.

In verse 14, in a manner similar to that found on ancient Near Eastern memorial stones, Nehemiah asked God to remember this proof of his deep concern for the temple and its services (compare 5:19; 13:22, 31).

13:15-22 Sabbath observance. Strict observance of the rules for sabbath rest was an important feature of postexilic Judaism. The sabbath was a day set apart—holy. Through sabbath rest Jews witnessed that their lives and livelihood ultimately were gifts of God. Just as the sabbath was a day set apart, so sabbath observance set Jews apart from others. It was a distinguishing feature of their identity as a religious people. Profanation of the sabbath was a threat to the distinctiveness and integrity of Jewish life.

When Nehemiah returned to Judah to undertake his second term as governor, he saw Jews conducting business as usual on the sabbath. They made wine and transported their produce to Jerusalem to sell it in the marketplace. There they encountered Phoenician traders selling their imported merchandise. Nehemiah instructed the people to stop trading on the sabbath (v. 15) and issued a weightier accusation against the Jewish officials (v. 17). The prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel had attributed the fall of Jerusalem and the Babylonian Exile to Jewish profanation of the sabbath (Jer 17:19-27; Ezek 20:12-24). Now Nehemiah tells Jewish officials that their neglect of the sabbath might well have the same result (v. 18).

Nehemiah was a man of action. Not content with warnings and accusations, he had the city gates closed on the sabbath (which began near sundown one day and continued until sundown the following day; see v. 19). When vendors continued to appear at the city gates, perhaps hoping to lure some customers outside, Nehemiah drove them off with threats of violence (vv. 20-21). He appointed Levites to monitor the gates so that the sacred character of the day would be maintained (v. 22a). Once again, he asked that God remember what he had done (v. 22b).

13:23-31 Mixed marriages. Mixed marriages seem to have been a recurring problem in the restoration period, for concern about them appears here for the fourth time in the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah (see Ezra 9–10; Neh 6:18; 10:31 and now 13:23-27). During Nehemiah's absence the practice of marrying foreigners had returned (or perhaps continued). Nehemiah saw the consequences of this transgression in the voices of the community's children: some of them spoke Ashdodite and none of them knew Hebrew. The language of Ashdod (a Philistine area near the Mediterranean coast) was Aramaic, probably not too different from the speech of the Jews at this time. The difference that came to Nehemiah's attention, then, may merely have been particular accents or pronunciations. But Hebrew was the Jews' distinctive religious language, and not understanding it was tantamount to a breakdown of their identity as a people.

Nehemiah's reaction to the situation was violent: he beat the guilty. Unlike Ezra, he did not demand divorce in cases of mixed marriages. He did, however, strictly reiterate the requirement to which the community had already agreed (see Neh 10:31). As was his method in the argument with violators of the sabbath (13:18), he recalled an incident in their history from which they should have learned. King Solomon had contracted marriages with foreigners and this had led to sin (see especially 1 Kgs 11:1-10). Could they not see that they were making the same mistake? Women were an essential part of the Jewish community. Jewish daughters were not to be married off to foreigners and foreign women were not to take their places in the community.

Once again, community leaders were among the worst offenders. The high priestly family itself was now related through marriage to Nehemiah's archenemy, Sanballat the Horonite (see Sanballat's role in Neh 2:10, 19; 3:33-38; 4:1-5; 6:1-14). One of Eliashib's grandsons, the son of Joiada the high priest, had married Sanballat's daughter. If the Jewish high priestly family was on such familiar terms with Sanballat who had opposed Nehemiah's mission from the very first, surely this was a serious threat to Nehemiah's earlier success in strengthening the Jewish community. Enemy influence now lived in the leading house of the religious community. Moreover, according to Lev 21:14, the high priest was forbidden to marry outside the Jewish community. Although Joiada's son was not yet the high priest, he was a potential candidate for the office and that may account for part of Nehemiah's reaction. Whatever the considerations were, Nehemiah ousted the young Jew from the community.

In the final verses of the book (vv. 30-31), Nehemiah once again asks that God remember his efforts. The summary of his works seems modest. Essentially, it is a summary of the terms of the community agreement described in Neh 10:31-40.

Nehemiah does not ask to be remembered for having engineered the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem which, ironically, is the accomplishment for which most students of the Bible remember him. In 5:19 he asked God to remember his refusal to impose greater financial hardship on an already burdened people. Here, in 13:30-31 as in 13:14 and 22, he asked God to remember that he had abided by the pact that the community had made (compare 10:31-40). It appears that Nehemiah wanted to be remembered only as a faithful member of the community for which he spent himself.

1 MACCABEES

Alphonse P. Spilly, C.PP.S.

INTRODUCTION

This work, originally written in Hebrew, survives only in a Greek version. It mentions John Hyrcanus' leadership at the end, so the earliest date for the book would be sometime during his reign (129–104 B.C.E.). The friendly attitude toward the Romans would indicate that the book was written prior to Pompey's invasion in 63 B.C.E. Most scholars date the book during the reign of John Hyrcanus or his main successor, Alexander Jannaeus (103–76 B.C.E.).

Hellenization

The book depicts the confrontation between traditional Jewish religion and Hellenistic culture. The latter was a mixture of Greek and Near Eastern culture, and it had a very important impact on the Near East from the death of Alexander the Great in 323 B.C.E. well into the Roman period. After the death of Alexander, his empire in the Near East was divided between the Ptolemies in Egypt and the Seleucids in Syria. Jerusalem was under the influence of the Ptolemaic kingdom until 198 B.C.E. Under the Ptolemies, there was some Hellenistic influence, but Judaism was able to conduct its affairs in relative freedom.

When Jerusalem fell under the rule of the Seleucids, however, there was increasing confrontation with Hellenism. Segments of the Jewish community actively promoted the Hellenization of Judaism, and Seleucid rulers such as Antiochus IV were more aggressive than their predecessors in spreading Hellenistic culture throughout the empire.

Civil war

Events within the Jewish community led to a civil war between the orthodox and the Hellenizers. When the Seleucids threw their weight into the struggle, the balance was clearly in favor of the Hellenizing party. At stake was the very survival of Judaism as it had been known up to that time. The struggle between Judaism and Hellenism is reflected in other Jewish literature of the period. Earlier influence of Hellenism on Jewish culture is reflected in the Book of Sirach, written to persuade Jewish youth of the value of their traditions. When the Hellenization process entered a much more aggressive phase (167–164 B.C.E.), the Book of Daniel was written to encourage faithful Jews to persevere despite the defilement of the temple and religious persecution. Non-canonical Jewish literature also survives from this period and provides further perspective on the confrontation with Hellenistic culture (for example, the Book of Jubilees, the Testament of Moses, and parts of 1 Enoch). The first-century (A.D.) Jewish historian Josephus also chronicles this period of Jewish history, but with a rather sympathetic view toward the Hellenization process.

Seleucid domination

The Seleucid empire gained control over Palestine in 198 B.C.E. after the battle of Panium (Baniyas). At first the Jewish population welcomed Antiochus III, the Seleucid king. He, in turn, showed them great consideration and made some improvements in their lives. Antiochus III was succeeded in 187 B.C.E. by Seleucus IV, who appears in the narrative about Heliodorus in 2 Macc 3. The Heliodorus incident portrays increasing conflict between the Seleucids and at least part of the Jewish populace.

The conflict escalated during the reign of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, who ruled the Seleucid empire from 175–164 B.C.E. His policies seem to have been determined by two major considerations: he needed money to finance his military endeavors, and he needed the people under his rule to be unified for defensive purposes. In 169 B.C.E. he plundered the temple in Jerusalem, returning in 167 B.C.E. to put down a rebellion that had been based on false rumors of his death. He set up a citadel at one corner of the temple precincts and manned it with Hellenist soldiers. He forbade the practice of Judaism and set up an "abomination of desolation" (an altar to Zeus) in the temple itself. These are the events that sparked the Maccabean resistance and rebellion.

The Maccabees

The First Book of Maccabees tells the story of a particular family who decided to rebel against the forced Hellenizing of Judaism, first under the leadership of their father, Mattathias, and then successively under the leadership of three brothers. Unlike the Hasideans who preferred a non-violent resistance, the Maccabean family decided to meet force with force. It is difficult to date the brief activities of Mattathias, but they probably took place in late 167 or early 166 B.C.E. Upon his death, Judas assumed control of the rebellion until his own death in 160.

Judas won a series of victories against the Seleucid generals and was able to purify and rededicate the temple in 164 B.C.E. The narrative first recounts his early successes in primarily defensive campaigns, but a turning point occurred when he began to take the offensive against neighbors who were persecuting the Jewish people. Although he was able to restore a measure of religious freedom for his people, his work was often frustrated by the intrigues of the high priest Alcimus. Judas died in battle and was succeeded by his brother Jonathan (160–142 B.C.E.).

Under Jonathan's leadership, political activity began to supplant military efforts. When Antiochus V (164–162 B.C.E.) died, two rival claimants to the throne emerged—Alexander Balas and Demetrius I. Both courted Jonathan's favor because they needed his support, and he alternated in receiving honors and gifts from both of them. In 152 B.C.E. Alexander Balas appointed Jonathan high priest; he assumed the office on the feast of Tabernacles. Jonathan was able to regain parts of the territory of the old Davidic-Solomonic empire, but, in the end, his involvement in Seleucid politics led to his own death at the hands of a treacherous Seleucid general, Trypho.

The third Maccabean brother, Simon (142–134 B.C.E.), followed closely in the footsteps of Jonathan, not only accepting the high priesthood from Demetrius II, but also involving himself in Seleucid politics. He was relatively successful as a leader and further expanded the territory over which he governed on behalf of the Seleucids. He called his family "Hashmonay," and historians refer to the dynasty he established as the "Hasmoneans." Simon and two of his sons were murdered at a banquet by one of his sons-in-law, the assassin in turn being killed by John Hyrcanus, Simon's second son.

John Hyrcanus I (134–105 B.C.E.) continued the Maccabean/Hasmonean agenda by accepting the high priesthood, distinguishing himself as a military leader, and expanding the territory under his control. In 109 B.C.E. he took Samaria and destroyed the Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim, attempting to force the Samaritans to worship in Jerusalem. The Hasideans, who were basically supporters of the Maccabees (although reluctant supporters because of Maccabean assumption of the high priesthood), seem to have definitively broken with Hyrcanus over his Samaritan policies. The Sadducees, the priestly aristocracy who often seem to have been favorable toward Hellenization, backed Hyrcanus. Although he did not take the title of king, there seems little doubt that Hyrcanus understood himself as restoring the Davidic-Solomonic empire by his expansionist policies.

John Hyrcanus was succeeded by his eldest son, Aristobulus I, in 104 B.C.E. He was quite friendly to Hellenism but unfriendly to his mother and brothers. He imprisoned them and let his mother starve to death. After taking the title of king, he died suddenly and was succeeded by Alexander Jannaeus (103–76 B.C.E.), the oldest surviving son of John Hyrcanus and an avid promoter of Hellenistic institutions. His very name betrays what had happened to the Maccabean rebellion by this time. We might wonder what Mattathias or Judas Maccabeus would have thought of one of their descendants named Alexander, after the famous Greek who started the Hellenization process! The Pharisees, successors of the Hasideans, openly opposed Jannaeus and his policies. The rebellion had come full circle.

The First Book of Maccabees

1 Maccabees differs from 2 Maccabees in several important regards. Clearly all the Maccabees are featured as heroes in 1 Maccabees, whereas 2 Maccabees recounts the deeds of Judas alone and tends to relegate him to the role of a mere agent of God. From what can be compared with other sources from this era, the author of 1 Maccabees is rather reliable when describing the events that took place, although he clearly does so from a Jewish point of view. He tells of Maccabean successes and defeats. With regard to the latter, he tells the story succinctly, not glossing over or altering the facts, but without attempting to develop a theology of defeat.

This book gives the impression of agreeing with the pragmatism of the Maccabees (as opposed to the idealism found in 2 Maccabees). When Judas and his brothers find that military operations are less feasible, they engage in typical Hellenistic political and diplomatic maneuvers to achieve their goals. They take the same pragmatic attitude toward the law; they are very flexible in applying it to various situations. Their attitude toward the sabbath provides a key example of this (they are willing to defend themselves on the sabbath), as is their approach to the high priesthood. They are concerned about the Jewish people perhaps more than about the temple as such (unlike 2 Maccabees, which centers attention consistently on the temple). 1 Maccabees covers a much broader time period than 2 Maccabees, which limits itself to part of the story of events that took place while Judas was still alive and the leader of the rebels.

The theology of 1 Maccabees

The theology of 1 Maccabees might be called covenantal. The people are expected to observe the law, the Torah. When they fail to do this, God punishes them. Those within Judaism who are called breakers of the law or non-observers of the law are the ones considered responsible for the disasters that Judaism experiences during the Seleucid period. They include people within Jerusalem, the priests of the temple, and, at times, the high priest himself. 1 Maccabees clearly condemns them and their activities.

At the same time, the book focuses attention on the aggressive and oppressive policies of the Seleucid regimes. There are repeated invasions of the land and attempts to prevent the Jewish people from observing the law, especially regarding worship in the temple.

One of the most important contributions of the Maccabees was their restoration of the temple, the memory of which is still celebrated by Jewish people as the feast of Hanukkah. The Maccabees are described as observers of the law, although they apply it flexibly to particular situations. The Hasideans, or pietists, are presented in 1 Maccabees as rather naive and simplistic in their rigid adherence to the law, especially by not defending themselves on the sabbath and thereby perishing.

The Hasideans were among those who were at first skeptical about the methods of the Maccabees but supported them for a time, after seeing some of their successes. Later a rift occurred when Jonathan Maccabeus became the high priest. There were serious obstacles to recognizing the legitimacy of his claim to that office: he was a warrior with blood on his hands, and he was not of the high priestly family. Onias IV, the son of the last fully legitimate high priest, was living in exile in Egypt. There were probably some within Judaism who favored bringing him back to Jerusalem to serve as high priest. Jonathan, however, was able to remain in office because he was the leader of the people at the time and had great power. Simon, his brother, and his dynastic successors also became high priests and remained in office for the same reasons.

Although the author of 1 Maccabees shows considerable respect for the Maccabees, at times the reader may get an impression that the author did not approve of everything they did. The narrative is very blunt about the fact that violence leads to further violence. The more the Maccabees engage in political and diplomatic maneuvering, the more they find themselves betrayed. At times it costs them their lives. As the narrative unfolds, each of the brothers comes to a tragic end. The reader may wonder whether the author might not be addressing the then-current Hasmonean ruler, subtly recommending that he learn from the mistakes of his predecessors.

Theologically, the author makes clear that all of the victories and successes in the narrative are due to the help and beneficence of God. He tells the story with frequent allusions to Jewish tradition, often comparing the Maccabees with heroes of old, such as Joshua and the judges, David, and others. This he does especially when the Maccabees engage in a controversial action, such as in 2:23-26, where Mattathias slays a Jew about to offer sacrifice in obedience to a Seleucid command, Mattathias being compared with Phinehas of old (see Num 25:6-14). We can presume that the author was trying to influence those who did not fully support Maccabean actions or their assuming the high priesthood.

Theologically, the Seleucids may be considered to be the instruments of God, who is punishing the people for breaking the covenant. However, the arrogance of some of the Seleucid leaders, whether kings or military commanders, is such that it mocks the power of God. These leaders develop their own plans, which often conflict with the plans of God. The reader may anticipate who wins in such a struggle with the divine.

In the story of Israel, and especially among its prophets, there is an important theme of a remnant who remain faithful to God and to the Torah. The Maccabees are presented as the leaders of those within the community who remain faithful despite persecution and constant threats to survival. In the end, despite the deaths of the Maccabees, the people are relatively free to live in accordance with their ancestral customs and their law. God is once again shown to be faithful to the people.

OUTLINE OF 1 MACCABEES

1:1–2:69	Introduction
3:1–9:22	Part I: Judas Maccabeus
9:23–12:53	Part II: Jonathan Maccabeus
13:1–16:24	Part III: Simon Maccabeus

COMMENTARY

INTRODUCTION

1 Macc 1:1–2:69

The first two chapters of 1 Maccabees set the scene for the rest of the book by describing the events that led up to the Maccabean rebellion.

1:1-9 Alexander and his successors. The book opens with a brief description of the career of Alexander the Great, who seemed determined to impose Greek culture on the peoples of the Near East. The mention of his pride and arrogance (v. 3) is quickly followed by the notice of his impending death. After his death in 323 B.C.E., his generals divided up the empire. The two most important divisions in terms of Jewish history were the Ptolemaic kingdom (with its capital at Alexandria in Egypt) and the Seleucid kingdom (with its capital at Antioch in Syria).

Palestinian Jews found themselves situated between these rival kingdoms, and the history of Judaism during this period is closely interwoven with that of the Ptolemies and the Seleucids. The latter kingdom began to dominate the area of Palestine after 198 B.C.E. A Jewish interpretation of this course of events (v. 9) suggests that the Jews' troubles are to be blamed primarily on the Greeks. The association of the Kittim (v. 1) with the "cause of distress" (v. 9) may be an allusion to Num 24:24.

1:10-15 Antiochus and the lawbreakers. In 175 B.C.E. Antiochus Epiphanes became the Seleucid king and greatly influenced Jewish history. Although 1 Maccabees chronicles historical events, it does so from the viewpoint of Jewish tradition and theology. One of the early themes in these first chapters is the tension between the plans of Antiochus and those of God, a familiar theme in Jewish tradition (see Exod 5–15 for a similar contest between Pharaoh and God).

Antiochus is described in these early chapters as arrogant, a second Alexander. The name he chooses for himself, Epiphanes, may indicate that he thinks of himself as the manifestation of a god, or at least as "illustrious." Arrogance is one of the most serious sins according to Jewish tradition. It seems to be a key to understanding the story of the tower of Babel (Gen 11:1-9) and may be related to the motivation that led the Man and the Woman to sin in the story of the Garden (Gen 2–3). Readers familiar with Jewish tradition, therefore, are forewarned in these early chapters that they can expect Antiochus to fall eventually, just as Alexander the Great did. This must be kept in mind, even though at various points in the narrative Antiochus may appear to be winning in his struggle with God's people.

At the same time, it is clear that not all the problems facing Judaism are originating from outsiders such as the king. There are those within the Jewish community itself, "breakers of the law" (v. 11), who find Hellenistic culture attractive and perhaps also convenient, especially those engaged in trade and commerce with Hellenists. Their seduction consists in making foreign alliances, probably to improve their economic circumstances. However, in Jewish tradition, making foreign alliances or covenants always endangers Israel's covenant with its God (see Deut 7:2, for example). It brings Israel into close association with neighboring peoples, an association which can—and which, in fact, often did—lead to worshiping the gods of their neighbors.

The Hellenistic gymnasium (v. 14) was not only a place of recreation, but a center of Hellenistic culture and ideas; it was a rival, therefore, to the dissemination of Jewish tradition among the young. Exercise was taken in the nude, and this seems to have caused embarrassment for circumcised Jewish youths, who consequently took measures to cover over this sign of God's covenant with the people. (For the implications of such an action, read Gen 17:9-14).

Jewish tradition is clear that all will go well for God's people as long as they remain faithful to the covenant and observe the law. On the other hand, when the law is not kept and the covenant is broken, disaster can be expected to follow. Therefore, readers familiar with Jewish tradition will expect from what is described in verses 10-15 that crises will arise within Judaism because of the lawbreakers.

1:16-40 Punishment of the Jews. We do not have to wait long to encounter such crises, punishments for the sinfulness of some within the community: Jerusalem is despoiled, its walls torn down, the sanctuary defiled, and a citadel housing foreigners and apostates established in one corner of the temple area. There is an implicit irony in the telling of the story. Antiochus invades Egypt in 169 B.C.E. and plunders Jerusalem on his way back to Antioch, possibly to help finance his adventures. One might presume that Antiochus is conducting these activities simply on his own initiative. However, for our author, looking at these events with the eyes of faith, what is really happening is that God is allowing the people to be punished for the sinfulness in their midst. It is not surprising that Antiochus is described like a second Nebuchadnezzar because of his profanation of the sanctuary and of sacred things (see 2 Kgs 25).

Antiochus comes to Jerusalem a second time in 168 B.C.E., perhaps in response to a threat of civil war between the Hellenizing Jews and those who are resisting Hellenization. The building and staffing of the citadel, in effect, give control of the city to the Hellenizing party.

The narratives describing these events are interspersed with two laments (vv. 24-28 and 36-40) resembling those that were sung after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians in 587 B.C.E. (see the Book of Lamentations). They contain many allusions to Old Testament passages and follow a traditional style.

1:41-61 Hellenizing policies of Antiochus. Conditions deteriorate further for the Jewish community. According to the author's view, Antiochus wants to unite all peoples of his kingdom by having them abandon their particular traditions and religious practices and adopt the king's religion. The remainder of the chapter describes the reactions of two groups of Jews: those who comply with the king's edict (vv. 41-61) and those who do not comply (vv. 62-64).

Those who comply are closely associated with the dismantling of Jewish religion: Jewish religious practices are forbidden, objects associated with Jewish worship are destroyed, the observance of the sabbath and feast days is proscribed, circumcision is forbidden, dietary laws are not to be observed, and Jewish sacred books are burned. The temple itself is defiled and turned into a typical gentile sanctuary, in violation of Jewish law. This crisis, in the author's view, is precipitated by the sins of the apostates and any who tolerate them.

1:62-64 Jewish resistance to Hellenization. Although many Jews cooperated with this dismantling of their religion, some—the heroes and heroines of this book—resolve to maintain their fidelity to the covenant at the risk of their lives. The theme of a remnant of the people remaining faithful to God and to the covenant is a cherished aspect of Jewish tradition. Especially from the time of the Babylonian Exile and its aftermath, keeping themselves separate from other peoples is understood as essential for their survival as God's people.

There is a second classic struggle, therefore, being outlined in this first chapter—the tension between the breakers of the law who adopt Hellenistic ways and those who remain faithful to the covenant and Jewish tradition. Again, for those familiar with the tradition, the outcome of this struggle is already known, but the story is still worth telling. God will win a great victory for the people, accomplishing this through human instruments—the Maccabees. It is time for the author to introduce us to this family of heroes.

2:1-14 Mattathias and his family. Mattathias and his family are of priestly descent. Their initial reaction to the Hellenizing policies of Antiochus and to the Jewish collaboration with the Hellenists is mourning and lament. This first reaction is somewhat passive and is expressed in the traditional language and gesture of lamentation.

2:15-28 Incident at Modein. What happens next, however, is decisive in their adopting an aggressive response of resistance to the Hellenization process. At Modein representatives of the king attempt to force Jews, including Mattathias and his sons, into apostasy. Mattathias is singled out as a person of some prominence in the community and is invited to be the first to obey the king's edict by offering sacrifice (vv. 17-18). Despite flattery and attempts to persuade him with privileges and wealth, Mattathias answers for himself and his family by utterly refusing to comply with a request that would imply abandoning the law and covenant (vv. 19-22). The refusal is in accordance with Jewish tradition and gives evidence of great fidelity to, and zeal for, the tradition.

Not everyone in the crowd, however, is disposed to follow his example by resisting the king's officers and risking death. When someone comes forward to comply, Mattathias kills him (v. 24). The author recalls the example of a priestly predecessor (see Num 25:6-15 for a similar action by Phinehas during the wilderness wandering period of Jewish tradition) and thereby justifies the violent deed. Mattathias and his family now have no alternative but to flee to the wilderness to protect their lives and prepare their defenses. They invite all who intend to remain loyal to the covenant to join them (vv. 27-28).

2:29-41 Early example of Jewish resistance. Evidently not all who go to the wilderness in resistance to the king's policies and edicts immediately join the Maccabees. We are told about some rebels who are destroyed because they refuse to defend themselves on a sabbath. Whereas the Maccabees flee to the mountains, where it is safer, this other group merely goes out into the desert. The Maccabees leave their possessions at home in order to move more quickly, but the others take their families and possessions with them. In addition to these encumbrances and vulnerability, this latter group also interprets the sabbath law in a rather extreme way—all of which leads to their destruction (vv. 37-38).

The Maccabees, by way of contrast with these martyrs, decide to fight even on the sabbath in their resistance to Hellenization. Their realism is not only practical (they see their actions as necessary for the survival of the people) but also theologically based (the law is for the people, not the people for the law).

2:42-48 Organization of Jewish resistance under the Maccabees. Those who are faithful to the covenant join the Maccabees and begin to attack the lawbreakers. The Hasideans are probably members of the scribal class, hence interpreters of the law, but here they are described primarily as mighty warriors. These verses describe in summary fashion and with theological nuance the classic struggle between the faithful and the apostates: faithful Jews are successful over arrogant sinners. We are thus given a preview of the victory that God will eventually win for the people through the agency of the Maccabees.

2:49-69 Farewell discourse of Mattathias. The remainder of the chapter describes the last days of Mattathias, especially his farewell address to his family. Farewell discourses are found elsewhere in Jewish tradition (see Gen 49, for example). The fact that Mattathias is a venerable and faithful patriarch adds weight to his words, but they are even more important because they are his last words before he dies. The words put on his lips are a summary of Maccabean theology, deeply rooted in Jewish tradition and focusing on the importance of remaining faithful to the covenant and the covenant God. Various models of such fidelity are raised up from Jewish history, implying by these references that remaining faithful will result in victory. Those under duress who remain faithful to the law and the covenant will be rewarded. (For a similar list of heroes, see Sir 44–49).

It is significant that military leadership is passed on to one of the brothers, Judas, with the charge to inflict vengeance on the Gentiles (Hellenists) who have caused the people such suffering (vv. 66-68). The farewell discourse ends in a traditional way with a description of Mattathias' death and burial. We are at a transition point in the story.

PART I: JUDAS MACCABEUS

1 Macc 3:1–9:22

Judas is the first of the Maccabean brother-heroes to begin turning the tide against the Hellenists and the Hellenizing Jews. Our author again uses traditional language to sing Judas' praises, often comparing him to the judges and King David—Jewish leaders who were victorious against the enemies of God's people because the spirit of the Lord empowered them in battle (see, for example, Judg 3:9-10).

3:1-9 Introduction to Judas' career. Mattathias' choice of a leader to succeed him is confirmed by his family and their supporters. In song the author summarizes Judas' career, describing him as a giant and as a lion, winning victories on behalf of God's faithful people against their enemies (see Sir 46:1-6 for a similar poem and description of Joshua). The language is as theological as it is military. This may help explain the "joyful" waging of war for the preservation of Judaism and the covenant (v. 2). God's plan is being carried out against the Hellenizing Jews and their Seleucid supporters, and Judas is God's instrument.

3:10-26 Early victories of Judas. Judas' first victory is achieved against Apollonius. After defeating him, Judas takes his sword, just as David took Goliath's (see 1 Sam 17:51).

Seron, a commander of the Seleucid army, is the next one to encounter Judas in battle. Motivated by ambition as well as perhaps by duty, Seron makes plans for battle. The author subtly forewarns the reader that, because Seron's plans are not the plans of God, they are doomed to failure. Seron is joined by many renegade Jews who have suffered from Judas' earlier attacks, but Judas is fearless in this encounter, despite the superior numbers of the enemy. Being so clearly outnumbered by the enemy is an opportunity to show that God is the one who achieves the victory, not the human soldiers or their commander (see Judg 7 for a similar concept). Those who attack Judas and his troops are arrogant and non-observers of the law. The outcome can be predicted easily by a believer.

Judas responds with a similar theological assessment of the situation when he is confronted with the fear of his guerrilla companions, who have been weakened by lack of food. Echoing David's friend Jonathan (see 1 Sam 14:6), Judas encourages his men with the assurance that God will help those who fight on behalf of the law. He then immediately takes the initiative and defeats Seron (v. 23). The enemies who survive the defeat retire to the region known in tradition as Philistia, recalling the enemies of God's people who dwelt there and fought Israel during the days of Saul and David. Judas has told his soldiers not to fear the godless; but now the godless begin to fear Judas because God is on his side (see 1 Chr 14:17 for a similar statement about David, or Exod 15:15-16 and Josh 5:1 for similar statements about Israel as a people).

3:27-37 The reaction of Antiochus. Antiochus is understandably angry at this defeat of his armies. His reaction is swift and predictable: he begins to build up a full-scale army to defeat Judas. As is usually the case, however, this requires a substantial financial outlay. The author of 1 Maccabees explains, perhaps with some amusement, that Antiochus is short of money because of his mismanagement and foolish policies that have disrupted the kingdom (v. 29).

Before he goes to Persia to raise the needed monies, Antiochus places Lysias in charge of his kingdom and his army, with the order to destroy Jerusalem and Judah and to settle colonists in the land (vv. 32-36). Again, even though such threats of annihilation seem particularly ominous for the Jews, a believer will rest secure that somehow God will not allow Lysias to be successful against the covenanted people.

Antiochus relies on collecting sufficient revenue for his armies and making alliances with his neighbors. In what follows, Judas' reliance is primarily upon prayer.

3:38-59 Preparation for war. Lysias moves against Judas and Jerusalem with a large army of infantry and cavalry. Slave traders of the region prepare for the enslavement of the Jews, who, they presume, will lose the war. For the Jews, such an enslavement would be tantamount to negating the Exodus and returning to Egypt. Lysias is joined by people from "the land of the Philistines" (v. 41). The author identifies the region in such a way that his readers' memories are turned to the days of old when it seemed certain to all except God's faithful people that the Philistines would dominate them for all time. In those days God raised up David, who definitively defeated these enemies of God's people. Without having to be explicit, the author once again points to Judas as a kind of new David (there are echoes, in this narrative, of 2 Sam 5:17-25 and 1 Chr 14:8-17).

Judas' preparation seems to be primarily liturgical. He and his forces gather at Mizpah, a site famous in the early history of the judges and Saul, but not mentioned again until this passage (v. 46). When Israel was afraid of the Philistines on a particular occasion, the prophet Samuel gathered Israel at Mizpah and prepared them for battle by fasting and acts of penitence (see 1 Sam 7:5-12). Judas' preparation is similar: prayers, fasting, and acts of penitence. In another place in the tradition, all Israel was summoned to Mizpah to combat an enemy; those who did not come were to be put to death (see Judg 20:1, 3 and 21:1, 5, 8).

While their enemies consult the images of their gods, Judas and his followers seek direction from their sacred writings, which have been outlawed by the king (v. 48). The law reserves the use of priestly vestments, the presentation of tithes and first fruits, and the presentation of nazirites for the temple. However, even though the temple has been defiled, it remains a center of focus in this narrative. The people's prayer of lamentation in the face of such severe danger is accompanied by traditional liturgical preparation for war: blowing trumpets and raising a "loud shout" (see Josh 6, for example).

Judas then organizes his army in a manner similar to that of Moses (see Deut 1:15 and 20:5-8) and reduces the size of his already small force by sending home those who were in the process of building new homes, those who are engaged to be married, and those who were planting vineyards (v. 56). He also dismisses the fainthearted, those who perhaps do not have enough faith in God's power to save them all. Victory will come from God, not from the army.

Judas' final prayer focuses the attention of his troops not only on the nation but on its primary symbol, the temple of the Lord in Jerusalem. The last verse is the key to the whole section: "Whatever Heaven [that is, God] wills, he will do" (v. 60).

4:1-25 Gorgias attacks Judas. The account of the first stage of this battle demonstrates Judas' superior strategy and tactical maneuvers. Despite the treachery of renegade Jews who serve Gorgias as guides, Judas is able to elude his adversary. Later, when Judas' forces encounter Gorgias' army, Judas reassures them by recalling what happened under similar circumstances during the Exodus from Egypt, when the people were trapped and in danger of being enslaved once again (see Exod 14). His further words of encouragement echo such passages as 2 Kgs 19:19 and others that refer to the rescue of Jerusalem on another occasion when the Assyrian general Sennacherib besieged the city—unsuccessfully. Judas also recalls for his troops the Jews' covenantal election.

In the ensuing battle the Gentiles are defeated and lose about half of their troops (vv. 12-15). Judas does not allow his own troops to take time out for plundering what is left of the enemy's camp because he does not want them encumbered with booty. There are still contingents of Gorgias' army in the vicinity. When these see what has happened to the rest of their army, however, they flee once again to the land of the Philistines. After Judas' troops plunder the enemy camp (v. 23), they go away singing hymns of praise (see Ps 136 for a similar song). The preparation for battle was primarily liturgical, and the celebration afterward partakes of the same quality.

4:26-35 Battle with Lysias. Lysias' discouragement at being defeated by Judas prompts him to raise a much larger army and to head it in person. The year is probably 165 B.C.E. Lysias moves toward Jerusalem from the south this time, from Idumea.

Judas, too, has a much larger army but is still outnumbered about seven to one. In the face of such odds, he once again prepares for battle by prayer (vv. 30-33), recalling earlier successes of Israel against the Philistines: David over Goliath (see 1 Sam 17) and Jonathan against the Philistines (see 1 Sam 14:1-15). Drawing on consistent Jewish tradition, Judas asks God to destroy the Jews' enemies, who are presumed to be the enemies of God as well.

The tide of battle once again goes against Lysias (v. 34), who then returns to the capital city, Antioch, to raise an even larger army. A more complicated picture is painted in 2 Maccabees, suggesting that Lysias was persuaded that Judas' increasing support from the Jewish population would dwindle once the pressure of persecution was eased. However, the author of 1 Maccabees omits any details in the story that might reflect poorly on his hero. At any rate, Lysias' withdrawal to Antioch provides an opportunity for Judas and his supporters to take control of the temple in Jerusalem.

4:36-59 Rededication of the temple. Although the text may give the impression that Judas proceeded directly to the purification of the temple after the battle with Lysias, a careful reading shows that this did not happen for nearly a year, not until 164 or even 163 B.C.E. The delay may have been caused by those who were concerned that contemporary apocalyptic writings contained predictions for the near future, and only after the passage of time had shown that these predictions were not accurate could Judas proceed with the purification of the temple.

In the ancient world, people faced issues of order and chaos in a religious way. The Jews understood God's work of creation primarily as making order out of chaos. They thought of the wilderness as the place of chaos farthest removed from order. On the other hand, the city (especially Jerusalem with its temple) was the place of greatest order. When the temple is described as a wilderness (v. 38), it symbolizes the great chaos or undoing of creation that the people were experiencing during the Hellenization process. What is needed is a new creation—setting the temple in proper order, following the guidelines of the law.

When Judas and his supporters arrive at the temple, they find it much like a typical Syrian-Canaanite sanctuary, the kind of worship space condemned in Jewish tradition (see Deut 12:2, for example). Their first response is one of lamentation in word and gesture (vv. 39-40). But before they can proceed with the work of purification, they first have to attack the citadel, staffed with government forces, presumably to neutralize it.

Judas selects blameless priests for the work of purification (v. 42). We know from 2 Maccabees that many of the Jerusalem priesthood had been supporters of the Hellenizers. When the carefully chosen priests begin the task of purification, a dilemma arises regarding the altar. Because it has been used for idol worship, the law commands that it be destroyed (see Deut 12:2-3). However, the same law forbids destruction of the Lord's own altar (Deut 11:4). The priests work out a compromise: they tear down the altar to make room for its replacement, but carefully store the stones of the altar until a prophet indicates what God wants to be done with them (v. 46).

Then, in accordance with the ancient law, they erect a new altar, make new vessels and furnishings, and restore the temple to its status before its defilement by the Hellenists. The rededication probably took place in December 164 B.C.E., three years to the day when the first heathen sacrifice had taken place. This is the origin of the annual feast of Hanukkah, a feast of joy and praise because the "disgrace" (v. 58) was removed from among the people. Order is once more established; they have experienced an act of new creation.

4:60-61 Defensive fortifications. Judas fortifies the temple mount and stations a garrison there to protect the temple from any future incursions by the Hellenists.

5:1-8 Judas on the offensive. In areas outside Maccabean control or influence, the Gentiles grow angry at the turn of events and begin to exterminate the Jews who live in their midst. The theme of gentile opposition to the temple is a familiar one in Judaism (see Ezra 4 and Ps 47). Judas moves first against the Idumeans (identified here in somewhat archaic terms as the "sons of Esau," possibly alluding to Obad 15-21, and seeing Judas' action as fulfilling that prophecy).

Judas next turns his attention to the "sons of Baean," whose identity continues to elude us. The Ammonites lived east of the Jordan River. This is the first time that Judas takes the offensive, but it is in defense of Jewish lives that are being threatened.

5:9-54 Deliverance of Jews in Galilee and Gilead. Although the author describes real events in this section, the narrative develops in such a way that Jewish readers would recall Joshua's rescue of the Gibeonites (see Josh 9) as well as Jephthah's deliverance of Gilead (Judg 12:1-7).

Jews whose lives are threatened in Gilead (the territory east of the Jordan River) and Galilee are unable to defend themselves without help from the Maccabees. Ptolemais is the city of Acre (Acco) in the northwest corner of Israel. Tyre and Sidon are towns along the Phoenician coast just north of the Galilean border.

Judas' brother Simon is sent with troops to aid the Jews in Galilee (v. 21), while Judas himself goes to rescue those in Gilead. Joseph and Azariah are left in charge of Judea. Although Azariah is not mentioned elsewhere, Joseph is mentioned in 2 Macc 10:19-22 in unfortunate circumstances.

Simon's campaign is quite successful, but he cannot guarantee the safety of the Jews in Galilee and therefore evacuates them to Judea. Judas and Jonathan cross the Jordan River into Gilead (v. 24). The Nabateans (v. 25) were an Arab people who played an important role in the life and politics of the region from the fourth century B.C.E. until the Muslim conquest. Although our author says that they were peaceable with Judas, 2 Macc 12:11-12 states that they became peaceable only after being defeated in a violent skirmish. The skirmish was probably unimportant for our author's purposes, so he omits it.

Judas' opponent in these Transjordan battles is Timotheus, who rallies many Gentiles to his cause and hires Arab mercenaries as well. Judas wins the battles through superior tactics, including taking the initiative away from Timotheus. The gentile survivors take refuge in a temple (v. 43), either because they think the Jews will respect it as a place of asylum or because they think their goddess (probably Astarte) will save them. Judas evacuates the Jews from the area, probably for the same reason that Simon evacuated people from Galilee. When they return to Judea, they proceed at once to the temple to offer sacrifice and celebrate the victories that God has given them.

5:55-64 A defeat for the Jews. The author draws attention to something that happened while Simon was in Galilee and Judas and Jonathan were in the Transjordan. Joseph and Azariah, left in charge of Judea and motivated by ambition, attack the Gentiles around them, violating their orders, which were defensive rather than offensive. Making a name for oneself in battle is a familiar theme in the Hellenistic world, but it is not acceptable motivation for action in Jewish tradition. These two are defeated because they did not obey Judas' orders. God's salvation is to come through the Maccabees, and other efforts that are not consonant with theirs will not succeed.

5:65-68 Judas attacks Edom and Philistia. Problems accompany Judas on his next campaign. Some priests seem to have ambition similar to that of Joseph and Azariah, and they too are killed in battle. The headiness of victories won by the Maccabees should not distract them or the reader from the real purpose of the military operations: to bring salvation to God's people, not to provide opportunities for individuals to realize personal ambitions.

6:1-17 Death of Antiochus IV Epiphanes. Our author is taking us back to 4:35, resuming the narrative after the defeat of Lysias. We know from other sources that Antiochus IV Epiphanes died in December, 164 B.C.E., around the time of the rededication of the temple. Our author implies that Antiochus died only after he had heard about the rededication of the temple. 2 Maccabees says that Antiochus died after unsuccessfully attempting to plunder the temples of Persepolis. The Seleucids had a reputation for robbing temples, and Antiochus was no exception.

The narrative states that Antiochus realizes that his defeat at Elymais and his impending death are the consequences of the way he has treated the Jews (vv. 12-13). The news of Lysias' defeat and the taking of Jerusalem and Beth-zur provide additional support for this assessment. However, what seems to surprise Antiochus is no surprise to the reader, who has been expecting such a fall since 1:10 above. The fact that he is going to die in a foreign land (v. 13) would be seen by the Jews as further evidence of the severity of his punishment.

The narrative may be historically correct when Antiochus is described as saying that he is "kindly and beloved" in his reign (v. 12), because his son is called "Eupator" (someone with a good father). In appointing Philip as regent of his son Eupator, Antiochus IV probably means to demote Lysias. Eupator is only a boy at this time, somewhere between the ages of nine and twelve. Antiochus gives Philip the insignia of royal office—the crown, the purple robe, and the signet ring, with which he seals important documents (v. 15). However, even this plan of Antiochus is not to be fulfilled exactly as he has decided. His son Eupator is with Lysias, who appoints the boy king (Antiochus V Eupator) and assumes the regency himself, thereby becoming Philip's rival.

6:18-63 Campaigns of Antiochus V against Judas. Although we have witnessed Judas' successes against nearly all the enemies of the Jews, the only territory that he actually controls is the temple area and Beth-zur. The garrison in the citadel is still intact, despite the attack just prior to the rededication of the temple. Judas will find it difficult to meet other challenges if the citadel is able to force him to reserve part of his troops for the defense of the temple area. Judas and his supporters are still probably only a militant minority in the country.

Judas, therefore, decides to attack the citadel (v. 20), garrisoned by troops of the king and by some Hellenizing Jews. From what has been related so far in this book, the reader may presume that Judas will be successful; however, that is not the case. What is striking about the rest of this chapter is that it contains no theology of defeat. It tends to accentuate the positive by noting Maccabean courage and bravery. The siege instruments that Judas uses demonstrate that he is now in a position to challenge the government seriously. The siege probably begins in the autumn of 163 B.C.E.

Some of the garrison in the citadel escape (v. 21) and report to Antiochus V what is happening in Jerusalem, apparently exaggerating the situation enough to motivate him to take action against Judas. Although Judas could make a case for attacking Jewish apostates (in view of Jewish law) and of defending Jews who are being persecuted in the neighboring territories, his siege of the citadel and fortification of the temple and Beth-zur are clearly rebellious acts against the kingdom.

The boy-king decides, probably with the guiding hand of Lysias, to raise an enormous army to fight Judas (vv. 28-30). There will be no more underestimation of Judas' military abilities. In the Jewish tradition, Gideon slew one hundred twenty thousand Midianites with a force of only three hundred men (see Judg 7). Lysias' army is similar in size, and our author may be suggesting that Judas' defeat came about because he had too many soldiers! The text focuses attention, however, on the enormous size of the Syrian army and on Maccabean courage.

The Syrians attempt to take Beth-zur before advancing on Jerusalem. Judas has to lift the siege of the citadel to confront the Syrian army. Not to do so would not only endanger Beth-zur but would also involve the risk of eventually being caught between the Syrian army and the citadel garrison.

The exact significance of verse 34 has long been debated. Ancient sources tell of other occasions in which elephants were intoxicated, but this was a dangerous tactic, because they could easily turn on their own troops in such a wild state. Presumably they were given something to rouse them for battle. The phalanx, a distinctively Greek military formation introduced by Philip of Macedon and his son Alexander the Great, was particularly difficult to penetrate and hence successful. This battle is described in more detail than other battles, probably to underline the near invincibility of the Syrian force and to help explain Judas' defeat.

Eleazar (v. 43) is a younger brother of Judas. His act of heroism and courage is remembered with good reason; his success in penetrating the phalanx is itself a remarkable feat (vv. 43-46). His motive in killing the elephant seems to be to kill the king (who because of his age is probably not actually involved in the battle, however). Eleazar gives his life to "save the people and win an everlasting name for himself" (v. 44). This may mean that he gave his life for his people and hence won everlasting renown as a martyr. It is not the same kind of making-a-name-for-oneself encountered in the cases of Joseph and Azariah (see ch. 5).

Judas is defeated. Beth-zur is taken by the Syrians, who station a garrison there. Beth-zur could not withstand a siege because of a food shortage. During a sabbatical year crops were not sown. The campaigns of earlier Syrian generals had probably also disrupted agricultural work and storage in the preceding year. Moreover, we learn in verse 53 that supplies were also short because of the number of refugees that had been brought to Jerusalem from Galilee and the Transjordan. Judas is being defeated by lack of supplies as well as by the strength of the Syrian army.

The Syrians turn their attention to the siege of the temple area. We are told that few Jews remained in the sanctuary (v. 54), while the rest were scattered, some of them going home. Judas, curiously, is not mentioned during this siege. He may have avoided the trap of being cornered in the temple and may have fled to the hills or even back to Modein. The author is silent on the matter. To admit that Judas was not a part of the defense of the sanctuary would have been embarrassing to his hero, but his silence about the matter also obviates any difficulties that might arise when we learn about the negotiations with the Syrians and their subsequent treachery.

Jerusalem had been under such a siege before; in 701 B.C.E. the Assyrian general Sennacherib besieged it and then had to lift the siege in order to put down a rebellion in the eastern part of the empire. Something similar occurs here, but the author does not exploit the similarity. Lysias, who is clearly in charge of the entire military operation, learns of a challenge to his authority by Philip, who had been appointed regent by the dying Antiochus IV. Lysias sues for peace with the Jews (v. 58) so that he can return to Syria and defend his position against Philip. His words, designed to convince his fellow officers of the rightness of this move, tactfully leave out his personal concerns. Seemingly, the sabbath-year shortage of food is affecting the Syrians as well, but taking care of the "affairs of the kingdom" (v. 57) is the primary motive for the withdrawal.

The terms offered the Jews amount to a repeal of the decree outlined above in 1:41-50. We are simply told that the Jews accept. Again, Judas is not specifically mentioned in the account. Lysias treacherously reneges, however, when he enters the temple area and orders that its fortifications be destroyed (v. 62). He also leaves a military garrison behind, although the Jews presumably are free to go to the temple and to conduct their worship according to their own law. We might think that the problems are over for the Jewish faithful, but we will learn that the truce is an uneasy one.

No high priest has been mentioned so far in the narrative. We know from other sources that Menelaus was the high priest up to this point. His Hellenized name gives us a clue as to which side he was on in the civil war. According to 2 Macc 13:3-8, Lysias arranged for his execution. The absence of a high priest at this point in Jewish history is a further complication in the story.

7:1-4 Demetrius I becomes king. Demetrius, a cousin of Antiochus V, had been a hostage in Rome. When a Roman delegation came to Antioch, the head of the delegation was murdered. The Romans retaliated by allowing Demetrius to return home as a rival claimant to the throne with the support of the army, and his rivals were killed. The Maccabean story becomes more complicated from this point on because of the internal struggles within the Seleucid kingdom.

7:5-20 Bacchides is sent to Judea. We do not know much about Alcimus' background, but he was of a priestly family. Menelaus, the previous high priest, and other Jerusalem priests were prominent in the Hellenizing party within Judaism. It is not surprising then to find Alcimus in the company of people who make charges against Judas (v. 6). We know from other sources that Demetrius was preoccupied with the rebellious province of Babylonia, and this explains why he entrusted the Judean matter to someone else. Bacchides seems to have been given wide discretionary powers.

Once again, the Seleucid king does not underestimate Judas' capabilities, and Bacchides is sent to Judea with a large army. This large force belies Bacchides' offers of friendship and peace. Judas and his brothers are evidently strong enough to resist or ignore such offers.

The scribes (v. 12) are probably the same group as the "Hasideans" (v. 13). These scholars of the law are duped by Bacchides and Alcimus, the newly appointed high priest. The Hasideans are caught in some theological dilemmas. On the one hand, Menelaus had not been a member of the high priestly family, but Alcimus was. For the Hasideans, this was something very much in his favor. They also believed, on the basis of their tradition, that a high priest was to be appointed by a legitimate king, so placed by God. Was not Demetrius the lawful ruler of the land, and was not Alcimus his choice for high priest? The Maccabees might argue theologically, on the other hand, that the victories given them by God showed that the period of Israel's subjugation by the Seleucids was over; therefore Demetrius was not the divinely appointed ruler over the Jews.

At any rate, the Hasideans are portrayed as naive in trusting Alcimus and Bacchides. The treachery of Alcimus must have been a rude awakening for many of the people, but not for the Maccabees. The fulfillment of Scripture alluded to in verse 17 is a quote from Psalm 79. After Bacchides makes Alcimus the ruler of Judea and Jerusalem and assigns troops to him, Bacchides returns to Antioch. The problems have multiplied for the Maccabees. The high priest has the authority to regulate temple worship and also has civil authority, with troops to back him up. From the author's viewpoint, this is clearly a low point in the Maccabees' career.

7:21-25 The intrigues of Alcimus. The enemy, at this point in the narrative, becomes the high priest and his supporters, highly placed fellow Jews. Evidently they control Jerusalem, while Judas seems to be strong in the countryside. He begins to retaliate against these enemies, who are worse than the Gentiles (v. 23), while Alcimus seeks his primary support from the Syrian king.

7:26-50 Nicanor battles Judas. Nicanor is an archvillain in 1 Maccabees, described as someone who hates all Jews, including perhaps Alcimus and his allies. A somewhat different portrait is painted in 2 Maccabees, where Nicanor and Judas become friends for a time (see 2 Macc 14:18-28). Nicanor might have come to Judea to work out a reconciliation with Judas rather than commit his troops to the difficult task of subduing a guerrilla force. According to 2 Maccabees, he persuades Judas to settle down and marry. Later the Hellenizing party forces his hand by complaining to the king that Nicanor is not carrying out the task for which he was sent. Judas is warned and refuses to associate with Nicanor any longer. In our narrative these events are telescoped (vv. 28-30).

When Nicanor loses some men in his first skirmish with Judas, he does not defeat or capture Judas, but his attitude toward Jews hardens. The sacrifices being offered in the temple for the king would be supported not only by the Hellenizers but by all Jews who recognized Demetrius' authority as coming from God. Nicanor's behavior is particularly tactless at this point, and his demand that Judas be delivered to him is impossible to carry out. His threat to destroy the temple prompts the priests to sing a lament once again (vv. 37-38). The prayer borrows heavily from Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple (see 1 Kgs 8:29, 33-34). We can safely presume that Nicanor will be punished for his blasphemies against the temple.

As both sides prepare for battle, Judas prays, alluding to what happened to Sennacherib when he besieged Jerusalem in 701 B.C.E. (see 2 Kgs 19:32-36 and Isa 37:33-38). The implication is clear: God is asked to do to Nicanor what he did to Sennacherib. Judas' forces are considerably fewer than on earlier occasions. However, when the people of the countryside see that he is being victorious against Nicanor, they seem to realize that God is with the Maccabees, so they come out to help Judas defeat the enemy (v. 46).

The treatment of Nicanor's corpse (v. 47) may offend more sensitive readers, but such gloating over a defeated enemy is commonplace even in our contemporary world. The author sees a fitting irony in Nicanor's severed arm being put on display in Jerusalem near the temple against which he had raised the same arm. The feast commemorating this event was still being celebrated in the first century A.D.

The author concludes this chapter with the notice that for a short time there was peace in the land (v. 50). The battle is probably to be dated in March, 161 B.C.E., and Judas will die in battle nearly a year later. The Maccabees have risen somewhat in the estimation of the people of the countryside, but they are a long way from solving the Hellenization problem.

8:1-16 Reputation of the Romans. Judas attempts to break the stalemate of power among the Jews by engaging the Romans as allies. The description of the Romans is decidedly positive in tone. The author has not yet had direct experience of them. He is at pains to point out how similar the Romans are to the Jews! He especially respects their renowned organization and military power as well as their longstanding opposition to the Greeks.

8:17-32 Embassy of Eupolemus and Jason. The Romans seem to have been disposed to allow the Jews to live according to their own law. No doubt there were Jews among Judas' supporters who were favorably disposed toward Rome. However, there were potential theological problems involved in what Judas was attempting to do. The prophets had often warned the people against making foreign alliances rather than trusting God. We can assume that Judas probably would have made appeal to the foreign alliances contracted by Solomon (see 1 Kgs 3:1) as a way of preserving and expanding his empire and influence.

Rome, on the other hand, was probably willing to support the Maccabees against the Seleucids to keep a balance of power in the area. Demetrius had become king against Rome's wishes. Rome had nothing to lose in this arrangement with Judas, and, to a great extent, neither did he. Although Rome pledged to defend Judas and his supporters, they did not interfere in the affairs of the region until much later, when Aristobulus II invited Pompey into Palestine in 63 B.C.E.

It is interesting that the two ambassadors sent to Rome have Greek names (v. 17). No doubt they are also fluent in Greek, the popular language used in Rome at the time. Judas is shrewd and pragmatic. Although he prays in preparation for battle, he also is willing to use whatever seems necessary to achieve victory.

The brief speech of the ambassadors before the Roman senate is noteworthy because it singles out Judas and his brothers as the leaders of the Jewish people (v. 20). Alcimus and his supporters are no longer considered part of the Jewish people, at least not by our author. The agreement that is made requires Rome and the Jews to come to one another's help should someone attack either of them. The wording is rather loose, however (see v. 30 in particular), and the treaty is made specifically with "the Jewish nation," not with Judas or his brothers. The author refers to a threatening letter allegedly sent by the Roman senate to Demetrius (vv. 31-32). However, the wording of the letter seems to be more Jewish than Roman. At any rate, Demetrius (if he did in fact receive such a letter) does not seem to have been very concerned about such a threat.

9:1-22 The death of Judas. The narrative resumes with events after the defeat of Nicanor (see 7:50 above). Despite the important defeat of Nicanor and even after the return of the ambassadors from Rome, Judas still does not seem to enjoy wide support among the people. In the first part of this chapter morale seems very low. Demetrius sends reliable Bacchides into the land, presumably to reinstate Alcimus as high priest and to destroy Judas.

The situation is precarious. The Syrian army attacks a city in Galilee, far from the influence of Judas, and kills the inhabitants. Judas is not in Jerusalem at this time, so Bacchides does not seem to spend much time there. When the Syrian army does encounter Judas' forces, it is clear that once again he is greatly outnumbered. Desertions leave him with a greatly reduced army (v. 6). It is strange but probably true that Judas did not have more support from the people after his brilliant career and the definitive victory over Nicanor.

What is even stranger is his statement just before the battle is joined (v. 10). So often on earlier occasions he had seemed pleased with the fact that he did not have many troops, because then it would be clear to all that the inevitable victory came from God. His preparation for battle on earlier occasions was primarily prayer. This time he adopts a fatalistic approach and speaks about dying with bravery, sounding more like a Hellenistic warrior than the man of faith we encountered earlier.

As was his usual tactic, Judas takes the initiative, but despite a long-fought battle, he is killed. His brothers bury him, and his supporters mourn his passing. Verse 21 is a brief lament recalling David's words of grief at the death of his close friend Jonathan (see 2 Sam 1:17-27).

PART II: JONATHAN MACCABEUS

1 Macc 9:23–12:53

9:23-27 Aftermath of Judas' death. With Judas no longer a threat, the supporters of Alcimus are given the opportunity to reestablish their control of the country. The agricultural situation probably had been greatly affected by the series of wars. During time of famine the government (under the leadership of Alcimus) probably controlled the distribution of food, so it is not surprising that people desert the remaining Maccabees at this time. Those who do not desert are derided and punished. The country is once more in a crisis, as though all that Judas had fought for now eludes his supporters. At this low ebb in Maccabean fortunes Jonathan's career begins to emerge.

9:28-31 Jonathan takes Judas' place. Maccabean supporters choose Jonathan, the youngest of the brothers, to be "ruler and leader" in terms that are reminiscent of the selection of Jephthah, the judge of long ago (see Judg 11:4-11).

9:32-53 Bacchides opposes Jonathan. Jonathan inherits less power, fewer friends, and more enemies than Judas had. In the eyes of Bacchides, Jonathan is a rebel against a king who has ceased persecution of the Jews. Jonathan has to withdraw from the area that had once been controlled by Judas and retires to a wilderness area southeast of Jerusalem, the same area to which David fled when he was being pursued by Saul (see 1 Sam 21–29).

Verse 34 is omitted in this translation, as in others, because it is merely a repetition of verse 43 and out of place here. The Nabateans (v. 35) could be expected to befriend the Maccabees and oppose the Seleucids. Jonathan, in expectation of a Seleucid attack, does not want to be burdened with too many possessions. The "sons of Jambri" (v. 36) are a tribal group; the author does not identify them as Nabateans. Jonathan and Simon decide to carry out revenge against this tribe, which had stolen their baggage and kidnapped or killed their brother John. The bride's father is identified in a curious way as a prince of Canaan (v. 37). Canaan no longer existed as a political entity, but the identification of such an ancient enemy might help explain the violence that ensues.

Bacchides will not let the attack go unpunished and seeks out Jonathan on a sabbath. Jonathan's rousing cry to his troops is an echo of Josh 3:4. Jonathan, like his father, Mattathias, on a previous occasion, decides that it is more important to survive than to observe the sabbath (v. 44). The punishment spelled out in Deut 28:7 affects, not Jonathan, but Bacchides. Jonathan, like Judas before him, counsels prayers to God for deliverance as preparation for the upcoming battle. However, Jonathan seems to be defeated, although the narrative does not say so directly. Bacchides loses many soldiers, while Jonathan and his men escape. There are echoes in this passage of the exploits of David's general, Joab (see 1 Chr 19:10-15).

Bacchides then sets out to consolidate his control of the country by building fortresses (v. 50). He garrisons them, takes the sons of leading families as hostages against their good behavior, and turns the citadel in Jerusalem into a kind of prison. Jonathan and his supporters are conceded the wilderness and probably considered adequately neutralized.

9:54-69 Death of Alcimus and a plot against Jonathan. In 159 B.C.E. Alcimus decides to tear down a wall in the temple. It is not clear exactly which wall, but it may have been one that kept Gentiles away from the inner courts, thus making it possible for them to enter the previously forbidden area. At any rate, he joins the list of people in the Maccabean books who sin against the temple and suffer punishment accordingly. There is some irony in his loss of speech; he can no longer give orders about the temple. Eventually he dies "in great agony" (v. 56).

Once again there is no high priest, and so the Hellenizing party is without a leader. Bacchides returns to Antioch either because his presence is perhaps no longer needed or merely to get new instructions from the king. A period of relative calm seems to take place at this point.

But the peace is not to last. Some of the Hellenizers develop a conspiracy against Jonathan. Peaceful coexistence is not their way. They persuade Bacchides to return and capture Jonathan. Bacchides prefers to have his allies capture Jonathan even before he arrives, but it is difficult to keep such conspiracies secret. Jonathan learns of the plot and kills the ringleaders (v. 61). Jonathan then prepares for a siege by developing fortifications at Bethbasi in the desert, probably two miles southeast of Bethlehem and eight miles from Jerusalem itself.

Bacchides has no choice but to besiege Jonathan. The latter escapes and annihilates some nomadic tribes that evidently were planning to join Bacchides in the siege. Simon and Jonathan take the initiative, attack Bacchides, and overcome him. By now the Syrian's patience with the Hellenizers has come to an end. The Hellenizers are the ones who invited him to capture Jonathan; so, in a sense, they are responsible for Bacchides' present situation. He has some of them executed and prepares to return to Antioch.

9:70-73 Jonathan makes peace with Bacchides. Jonathan is probably the only Jewish figure of any importance with whom the Syrians could make peace. Despite earlier attempts at peacemaking and subsequent treachery on the part of the Syrians, Jonathan offers to make peace, and Bacchides accepts. The text makes it clear that this time the Syrians prove trustworthy. Jonathan, the guerrilla chieftain, becomes in effect a judge, similar to leaders in the days of old (see the Book of Judges). His "judging" amounts to ruling the people, but it is unclear exactly what his authority was. He receives no specific office from the Syrians at this point and does not live in Jerusalem. The reference in verse 73 may be more theological than political in its intent. Meanwhile, there are still Jewish hostages in the citadel at Jerusalem.

10:1-14 Alexander Balas challenges Demetrius. Jonathan's fortunes change rather dramatically in 152 B.C.E., when a rival claimant to the Syrian throne challenges Demetrius by setting up a throne in Ptolemais, a seaport easily defended. Alexander (known as Balas) claims to be the son of Antiochus IV Epiphanes. He is supported against Demetrius not only by the Roman senate, but also by the kings of Cappadocia, Pergamum, and Egypt. Demetrius' problems are multiplied by his unpopularity with his troops. In the ensuing narrative, both Alexander and Demetrius attempt to acquire Jonathan as an ally. He in turn is able to play them off against each other, accepting the best offer in typically pragmatic Maccabean style.

Demetrius is the first to approach Jonathan, giving him permission to raise an army (v. 6)—as though he needed such authorization! Jonathan does not object to this, but he uses Demetrius' letter to arrange the release of hostages from the citadel in Jerusalem. He then takes up residence there and sees to the restoration of the city and the fortification of the temple area. The Hellenizers realize that Jonathan is no longer vulnerable and they flee, some of them taking up residence at Beth-zur.

10:15-21 Jonathan becomes the high priest. Alexander in turn writes a flattering letter and designates Jonathan high priest. Two factors militate against Jonathan's accepting the appointment: it is made by a king whose legitimacy is still a matter of dispute, and Jonathan is not of the high priestly family. On the other hand, expediency gives way to principle, and Jonathan accepts the high priesthood (as well as membership on Alexander's council), thereby consolidating his power (v. 20).

Throughout their history, theological problems concerning their accession to the high priesthood will continue to plague the Maccabees (or Hasmoneans, as they are later called). At this time, however, Jonathan was the only person with so much power and authority within the Jewish community, and it is not clear whether he was seriously challenged for accepting the high priesthood. However, it may have been this event that led to the establishment of the Essene group at Qumran, a group that became alienated from the temple and its "wicked priest." 1 Maccabees does not raise these theological problems, of course, because the Maccabees are its heroes.

The price to be paid for the honors bestowed on Jonathan is loyalty to Alexander. In October, 162 B.C.E., at the feast of Tabernacles, Jonathan assumes the office of high priest. We are not told how the people receive him.

10:22-47 Demetrius attempts to win back the Jews. In a letter to the Jewish nation, Demetrius, Alexander's rival, pointedly does not mention Jonathan. The two references to the high priest in verses 32 and 38 presumably refer to someone yet to be appointed by Demetrius. The letter outlines financial arrangements he is willing to make, arrangements extraordinarily favorable to the Jews. In short, Demetrius seems to be making a very attractive offer to the Jewish people, with the intention of wooing them away from Jonathan. This probably would not have been too difficult; there were those who opposed Jonathan and the Maccabees, and those who did not like his accession to the high priesthood.

Demetrius' opening words (v. 22) seem to imply that he either does not know of Alexander's arrangement with Jonathan (which is very unlikely) or that he is presuming he can count on the nation to respond favorably after the people have heard his terms: exemptions from certain taxes and tithes, special tax status for Jerusalem, turning the citadel over to a high priest, and release of Jews taken into captivity in the various battles. Moreover, he names Jewish feasts as tax-exempt days, makes it possible for Jewish mercenaries to be hired for his armies at favorable conditions, and offers to include Jews in prominent places within his kingdom.

Verses 38-39 are somewhat problematic, for Demetrius offers what he probably cannot deliver. He seems unaware of the centuries of hostility between the Samaritans and the Jews. Because Alexander holds Ptolemais, Demetrius can hardly deliver it for the benefit of the temple. He may be implying that he will take Ptolemais soon and overcome Alexander, but such a prediction is seldom wise.

Demetrius makes provisions for royal revenues to be donated to the temple (v. 41) and seems willing to consider it a place of asylum for those who are in debt to the crown. He is not the first king to make provisions for restoring the temple (Cyrus and Antiochus III had done this earlier [see Ezra 6:3-5 and Josephus, Antiquities, XII.3.3]). But it is quite extraordinary for a Seleucid king to be willing to finance the fortification of Jerusalem. These extraordinary measures show to what extent Demetrius is determined to win the support of the Jews, and possibly how desperate his situation is.

Jonathan and his supporters do not accept Demetrius' offer (v. 46). The Hellenizing party is ignored. It is not surprising that Jonathan rejects an offer designed to turn the people away from his support!

10:48-50 Alexander defeats Demetrius. The manuscripts vary in their reading of verse 49, and it seems (from other sources) that the confusion is due to the seesaw nature of the battle, with Demetrius gaining the upper hand at first and later being defeated, falling from power in 150 B.C.E. Alexander then takes measures to develop foreign alliances.

10:51-58 Alliance with Egypt. Alexander's request for an alliance with Egypt, sealed by marriage with the Ptolemaic royal family, is probably motivated by a concern that Egypt not ally itself with Demetrius' family. Demetrius has sent his sons abroad for their safety, and Alexander can expect a later challenge to his rule from them. Ptolemy VI responds somewhat cautiously and requests that the marriage be celebrated in Ptolemais, a city named after an Egyptian king.

10:59-66 Alexander honors Jonathan. The gathering for the royal wedding becomes the occasion for both Hellenistic kings to court Jonathan. Alexander still needs his support, and it is possible that Ptolemy has designs on recovering Palestine as part of his empire. Jonathan, on the other hand, also has reasons for going to Ptolemais with gifts. Onias IV, a rival claimant for the high priesthood, is in Egypt. Jonathan's "friendship" with Ptolemy can neutralize Onias and his supporters.

Jonathan's lavish gifts may well be at the expense of the Hellenizers—booty taken from them. Those who come before Alexander to protest against Jonathan are not heeded. Jonathan is in a position of great power and influence.

If there is any doubt among his enemies about Jonathan's current status, the clothing with royal purple and the invitation to sit at the king's table dispel such notions (vv. 62-63). The Hellenizers, the supporters of Onias, and the Hasideans (who seemingly object to Jonathan's assumption of the high priesthood because he is not of the high priestly family) are all effectively silenced by these actions and the royal proclamation that no one should interfere with Jonathan.

Jonathan returns to Jerusalem not only as high priest but also as military and civil governor. He has reason to be pleased. The civil war seems to be over, with the Maccabees the clear winners. However, there are still garrisons of Syrian troops in parts of Judea, including the Jerusalem citadel. The Jews are not yet an independent nation.

10:67-89 Jonathan is victorious in battle. Nothing is said about the years 150–147 B.C.E., presumably a time of Judea's settling down under the rule of Jonathan. In 147 B.C.E. problems develop with the return of Demetrius II to challenge Alexander's rule. Demetrius II, the son of Demetrius I, is still a teenager. What makes his challenge possible is the ineptitude and unpopularity of Alexander. The Syrians are ready for a new ruler.

Demetrius appoints Apollonius as governor (v. 69). Apollonius realizes that before he can successfully attack Alexander, he will have to deal with Alexander's faithful ally, Jonathan. The letter he allegedly sends is modeled on 1 Kgs 20:23-32, dealing with an earlier Syrian invasion. Apollonius' intention is to lure Jonathan into battle by taunting him. The approach works, and Jonathan sets out with a large army and his brother Simon. Jonathan is bound to defend the southern coastal cities by his alliances with Ptolemy and Alexander.

Jonathan is able to drive a strategic wedge between Apollonius and Demetrius by taking Joppa (v. 78), which might have been Apollonius' main supply port (there are not many harbors along the Palestinian coast). Apollonius' retreat southward might have been a ruse to lure Jonathan into the kind of terrain that would favor Apollonius' cavalry (see his taunt in 10:70-73). The ruse works, and Jonathan soon finds himself surrounded by the cavalry. At the same time, Jonathan's forces outnumber the Syrians. By sheer courage and determination, Jonathan's forces hold their ground and wear down the Syrians. When the cavalry weakens, Simon attacks the infantry successfully. When this happens and the cavalry flee, Jonathan is not able to follow them because he has no cavalry. The Syrian infantry seek refuge in the temple of Dagon (v. 83). Jonathan does not honor its status of asylum but destroys the temple and the men who are in it. The neighbors in Ashkalon decide to honor Jonathan, as does his ally, Alexander. Jonathan's rank is raised still further to "Kinsman" of the king (v. 89), and the rest of "Philistia" is given to him. In short, he survives Apollonius' challenge very well.

11:1-19 Ptolemy VI plots against Alexander. Although ancient sources differ about Ptolemy's motives in the actions that follow, 1 Maccabees remains favorable to Alexander and his son against both Ptolemy and Demetrius. Ptolemy may have been merely acting as though he were a faithful ally, coming to Alexander's rescue against Apollonius and Demetrius II. In reality, he may have been taking advantage of the weakness and unpopular position of his son-in-law and attempting to reestablish Egyptian control over Palestine and perhaps Syria as well.

In 145 B.C.E. Ptolemy VI Philometor begins a march toward Syria, probably moving along the Palestinian coast. The fact that he leaves garrisons in each of the cities along his route gives us a hint at his motivation (v. 3). Although some people try to turn Ptolemy against Jonathan, the king needs his support—or at least he does not want to antagonize such a powerful person. Jonathan's behavior is very correct toward this ally. He tactfully withdraws to Jerusalem, leaving Ptolemy and Alexander (both of whom are his allies) to settle their own disputes.

Ptolemy invites Demetrius to form an alliance with him (v. 9) and offers to give him his daughter, Cleopatra, who is Alexander's wife! Ptolemy's intention is probably not so much to underwrite Demetrius' claim to the throne as to undermine Alexander. Ancient sources make clearer the accusation of attempted assassination (v. 10). According to the Jewish historian Josephus, Ammonius, a minister in Alexander's court, tried unsuccessfully to kill Ptolemy while he was enroute to Antioch. Our author, however, defends Alexander and provides us with Ptolemy's "real" motivations.

While Alexander is out of the capital, Ptolemy arrives and assumes the kingship of "Asia," that is, Syria (v. 13). So much for his support of Demetrius II! Ptolemy, however, for all his boldness, does not make a wise decision because he cannot count on Jonathan's support. Moreover, he can expect the opposition of Demetrius II and the Romans, who had kept Antiochus IV from uniting Syria and Egypt in 168 B.C.E. We are told that Alexander was in Cilicia putting down a rebellion (probably fomented by Demetrius, who seems to have been there at the same time). Alexander's immediate return to Syria leads to direct conflict, which ends in the death of both antagonists (vv. 17-18). The populace, not favorably disposed to the Egyptian occupational forces, eliminate them. The way is now open for Demetrius II to assume the Seleucid throne.

11:20-38 Jonathan and Demetrius II. Jonathan has wisely stayed out of the conflict between Ptolemy and Alexander. Before Demetrius has a chance to consolidate his position, Jonathan moves against the citadel in Jerusalem. Both men will need the support of each other, and Jonathan's move against the citadel probably puts him in a stronger bargaining position with Demetrius. Naturally the Hellenizers, who may have become a minority by now, complain to the new king about Jonathan's actions.

What happens next is a lesson in Maccabean diplomacy. Although Demetrius reacts angrily to Jonathan's move, he proceeds more carefully in dealing with him. Demetrius moves south with a threatening army but requests a conference and the lifting of the siege. Jonathan does not honor the request regarding the siege but approaches Demetrius with important Jewish leaders and gifts (vv. 23-24). This pleases Demetrius, who inherited financial problems brought on by a series of wars and fiscal incompetence.

Demetrius confirms Jonathan in the high priesthood and in his status as a Chief Friend. Nothing is said about the citadel at this point, but we will learn later (v. 41) that the siege was lifted. Presumably in return for this "favor," Demetrius agrees to the same basic financial favors that had been offered by his father (see 10:30, 38). Demetrius' letter (vv. 29-37) is addressed both to Jonathan and to the Jewish people. The letter is basically a copy of what Demetrius had sent to his chief minister, Lasthenes, who as a general had helped Demetrius press his claims to the throne.

The letter in effect gives Judea a favored status and increases its territory with the addition of the three Samaritan districts. Taxes previously sent to Antioch now go to Jerusalem for the support of the temple and its priests. However, Judea remains a Syrian possession, and the Syrian garrison remains in the citadel. Afterward Demetrius makes a serious blunder in demobilizing his troops. We know from other ancient sources that he led a dissipated life, and his minister, Lasthenes, was very corrupt. The peace that Demetrius believes he has brought to his kingdom is not to last.

11:39-56 The revolt of Trypho. The next episode in our narrative seems extraordinary when the reader remembers the earlier struggles of the Maccabees against the Hellenizers and the Hellenists. In this segment of the story, Jonathan sends Jewish troops in an attempt to save Demetrius!

Trypho's career is interesting. He first came to public notice as a soldier of Demetrius I; then he became a governor of Antioch under Alexander; he was, perhaps, one of the two courtiers who crowned Ptolemy VI in Antioch; and later he became one of the "Friends" of Demetrius II. Such shifts in loyalty help explain his next adventure—rebellion against Demetrius II and installation of a new king in the person of Antiochus VI, a mere boy. Antiochus VI would have been well advised not to trust such a person.

Meanwhile Jonathan again requests that Demetrius remove the garrison from the Jerusalem citadel (v. 41). Demetrius I had agreed to such an action but did not implement it. Perhaps Jonathan is aware that Demetrius II could use the additional troops in Antioch to shore up his own faltering position. Demetrius agrees to arrange the move later, but after he is secure once again, he also reneges (see vv. 52-53). But, at this point in the narrative, he requests Jewish troops to help defend him.

Demetrius' unpopularity reaches alarming proportions, and the Jewish mercenaries ruthlessly put down a rebellion of the populace. The reader may be excused for wondering what is happening to the Maccabean religious revolution at this point. Demetrius does not become wiser from this experience. He alienates his sole ally, Jonathan, not only by reneging on his promises but also by causing Jonathan new problems, revoking the provisions of the letter found in verses 29-37.

11:57-62 Antiochus VI and Jonathan. Trypho now returns to Antioch with Antiochus VI, who was probably about four years old. Demetrius' army rebels against him and enthrones the boy-king, who promptly confirms Jonathan in the high priesthood and sends him lavish gifts. The letter alluded to in verse 57 was probably ordered by Trypho and drawn up for the young king by royal secretaries. Jonathan's allegiance is once more being courted by restoring the rank he had held under Alexander (see 10:89).

Simon Maccabeus is made governor of the coastal area from Tyre in the north to somewhere between Gaza and the Nile in the south, including some Hellenistic towns that were not pro-Jewish. Jonathan sets out on a tour, ostensibly to develop support for the new regime, but probably in reality to ensure his own control over the area. He is well received at Ashkalon but rebuffed at Gaza (v. 61). Significantly, after he overcomes the dissidents at Gaza, he takes hostages back to Jerusalem rather than send them to Trypho.

Meanwhile Demetrius II counterattacks by sending a large force to confront Jonathan in Galilee and, presumably, to prevent him from organizing forces loyal to Antiochus. Simon Maccabeus takes Beth-zur, the place of refuge for Hellenists who had escaped from Jerusalem (see 10:14). When Jonathan meets the enemy armies, he is defeated in an ambush (v. 68). His expressions of grief—tearing his clothes and throwing earth on his head—are expressly forbidden activities for a high priest (see Lev 10:6; 21:10). Seemingly, there were exceptions to the rule. Verses 71-74 echo Josh 7:5-9, implying that God has listened to Jonathan's prayers. (See also 1 Sam 14:21-22 for a similar victory by an earlier Jonathan.) Jonathan's troops rally to him, and after decisively defeating the enemy, he returns to Jerusalem.

12:1-23 Alliances with Rome and Sparta. According to 2 Macc 11:34-38, there had been diplomatic activity between the Jews and the Romans in 163 B.C.E., and, as we have read earlier (see 1 Macc 8), Judas had contacted the Romans in 161 B.C.E. It is not surprising, therefore, that Jonathan also makes diplomatic overtures to the Romans. What is less clear is why the Romans or the Spartans would consider embroiling themselves in Jewish matters in the Near East. Perhaps they have no intention of actually doing so. Jonathan may simply be seeking international recognition and status, as well as giving Trypho and Demetrius pause before attacking a people who have become friends of Rome. The Romans seem to receive the Jewish embassy courteously and, presumably, at least renew their friendship with the Jewish people.

Although there may be reasons for questioning the authenticity of Jonathan's letter to the Spartans as presented in verses 5-18, the basic contents of the letter might be authentic. The date of the letter seems to be 144 B.C.E. Sparta had become independent two years earlier when the Romans helped it defeat Corinth and the Achaean League. The Spartans might be expected to understand Jewish nationalism and would provide an example of how an ally of Rome had benefited when attacked by neighbors. Undoubtedly, the example would not be lost on Trypho or Demetrius. In other words, in this chapter we probably have two more examples of Jonathan's political and diplomatic maneuvering that at the same time demonstrate his adaptation to Hellenistic ways. Eventually this approach will cost him his life.

The letter to Sparta is sent by Jonathan, the "senate" (the Sanhedrin), "the priests, and the rest of the Jewish people" (v. 6). The reference to not needing such an alliance or friendship because of the "sacred books" (v. 9) is not very tactful or diplomatic in a letter such as this and raises questions about the authenticity of the letter. Jonathan sends emissaries with Greek names; no doubt they are also fluent in the Greek language.

Although there is clear precedent for approaching Rome, Jonathan and his followers need something to establish bonds with the Spartans. That is why they recount a legend about the common origins of both peoples and quote earlier correspondence between Arius, a Spartan king, and Onias, a Jewish high priest (vv. 19-20). Identifying these people is a problem because there were at least two people each with the names of Arius and Onias during the period in question.

The Hebraic nature of verse 23 provides further complications regarding the authenticity of the letter. There are indications, however, that at times the Greeks were interested in associating themselves with ancient Egypt and the Near East. Perhaps the legend that both the Spartans and the Jews were descended from Abraham would have impressed the Spartans at this point in their history. No response is recorded from Sparta, however, and perhaps the very mention of such an embassy has already achieved the author's purpose of increasing Jonathan's prestige.

12:24-34 Demetrius again attacks Jonathan. Jonathan is currently loyal to Antiochus VI and his general, Trypho. When he learns that Demetrius has prepared a large army against him, Jonathan once again takes the initiative by leaving Jerusalem and crossing the border into Syrian territory (Hamath). When the enemy discover how prepared Jonathan and his troops are, they flee (v. 28). While Jonathan is in the territory, he attacks a group of Arabs. His motive is not clear, but they may have been at least partly responsible for the assassination of Alexander Balas, who had been friendly toward the Maccabees. The reason for Jonathan's march to Damascus (v. 32) is also unclear, but he may have had some dreams about restoring the Davidic empire, which at one time included Damascus (see 2 Sam 8:5-7).

Meanwhile Jonathan's brother Simon moves to the coastal area to prevent any active support of Demetrius among its inhabitants. Once again a threat to Maccabean supremacy has been overcome.

12:35-38 Jonathan builds up Judea's defenses. Jonathan seemingly has control of the Sanhedrin (the assembly of elders) and secures their agreement to build up the defenses of Judea. Part of this program includes the attempt to isolate the citadel in Jerusalem from the rest of the city because it is still held by foreigners. In effect, this initiates another siege.

12:39-53 The deceit of Trypho. The general Trypho decides to realize his ambition to become king. According to the author, Trypho thinks that Jonathan, the faithful ally of King Antiochus, will prevent such a move. That is why he now sets out to destroy Jonathan. We are not told what Jonathan knew of this plot, but he goes out to meet Trypho and his army with a large force of his own (v. 41). Trypho, deceitfully changing tactics, flatters Jonathan and gives him gifts. Jonathan makes the fatal mistake of accepting both, along with the advice to allow all but a few of his troops to return home. In past Maccabean history, a small army and prayer were adequate for defense or victory. Such is not the case at this point in the narrative.

Jonathan is invited to Ptolemais, the place where he had been honored by Ptolemy of Egypt and Alexander of Antioch (see 10:59-66). However, this time there is no Egyptian king to protect him, nor is there a Syrian king who needs his support. The inhabitants of Ptolemais seize Jonathan and kill many of his troops (v. 48). When Trypho attempts to destroy Jonathan's remaining troops in Galilee, he is not successful, and Jonathan's men return to Judea to mourn the loss of Jonathan. We are not told whether he is still alive or not. Perhaps they do not know his fate at this time.

The closing verse of this chapter (v. 53) reminds one of Psalm 2, which describes the temptation of surrounding peoples to rebel and attack the Jewish nation when someone (God's anointed) is assuming a new leadership role in Israel. The full psalm in Jewish tradition, however, assures us that these matters are ultimately in God's hands, and God will take care of the people.

PART III: SIMON MACCABEUS

1 Macc 13:1–16:24

13:1-11 Simon becomes the new leader. When Trypho prepares to invade Judea, Simon delivers an address to the people in Jerusalem, drawing upon such familiar themes of 1 Maccabees as devotion to the law and the temple and also commitment to the nation. The author, of course, does not mention any self-interest on the part of his heroes, the Maccabees. Simon appears to believe that Jonathan is already dead (v. 4). As had happened on previous occasions, the people accept a Maccabee as their leader (see 1 Macc 2:65ff. and 9:29-31). It is noteworthy that the people accept Simon as their leader but not as high priest. Perhaps this is an indication of the popular belief that only the legitimately reigning Seleucid king could appoint a high priest. Simon's first task is to complete the defensive measures begun by Jonathan.

13:12-24 Trypho kills Jonathan. Trypho invades the land of Judah, bringing Jonathan along as a prisoner. The offer he makes Simon involves a clear dilemma. If Simon refuses Trypho's offer, the people will hold him responsible for his brother's death. If he accepts the offer, he is taking a major risk with the deceitful, treacherous, and ambitious Trypho. In effect, however, he has no choice but to pay the ransom money and deliver Jonathan's children to the Syrian general. True to form, Trypho reneges on his offer (v. 19).

As Trypho marches deeper into the land, ravaging it as he goes along, Simon counters his every move and prevents him from taking a direct approach to Jerusalem itself. Trypho becomes a natural ally of the Syrian garrison in the Jerusalem citadel, who accordingly appeal to him for help. But Trypho is prevented from coming to their aid by a seasonal snowstorm; he turns back to Syria, but first he kills Jonathan and probably his sons as well.

13:25-30 Jonathan is buried at Modein. Jonathan's body is buried in the family tomb at Modein. He does not receive the eulogies that Judas had (see 3:1-9) or that Simon will later receive (see 14:28-47). Jonathan's deeds were more political than military. He seems to have been working toward the independence of the Jewish nation but was captured and killed before he could accomplish this. The stage has been set, however, for Simon to realize that dream.

A careful reading of Simon's burial procedures for his brother reveals an astonishing borrowing from Greek or Hellenistic ways (vv. 27-30). The practice of setting up pyramids is borrowed from the Egyptians (and Hellenistic Ptolemies). The setting up of carved suits of armor (trophies) is a Greek burial custom for victorious warriors. The Greeks also had the practice of setting up victory monuments near the sea in memory of sea battles. Simon adopts the practice, even though the Maccabeans were not seafaring. They had no fleet and had won no naval victories. Perhaps the capture of the port town Joppa may have triggered some Maccabean dreams about the potential of developing a navy. At any rate, we seem to have come some distance from Mattathias' zeal and passion for matters Jewish! On the other hand, this cultural adaptation is often found at some point in revolutions throughout history.

13:31-42 Simon and Demetrius become allies. Predictably, Trypho kills the young Antiochus VI and assumes the royal throne. Simon's response seems limited primarily to further defensive measures in Judea. He was probably fairly independent of Trypho, who had demonstrated his vulnerability earlier (see vv. 12-24).

Although the Maccabees had not been on good terms with Demetrius II, Simon now turns to him in order to form an alliance. Trypho was probably already in trouble with the Syrian populace for assassinating Antiochus VI, and there is some indication that his dictatorial ways had also alienated his army. That is why Demetrius was probably in a position to regain the Seleucid throne. The gifts that Simon sends him imply allegiance.

The response of Demetrius seems gracious enough, but he probably has little choice but to respond positively. He addresses Simon as "high priest" (v. 36). Although it is quite likely that the populace or the Sanhedrin had already chosen Simon as high priest, the author of 1 Maccabees is careful to call him by this designation only after it is at least confirmed by a king with some semblance of legitimacy to his reign. The favors Demetrius bestows on Simon are not all they may appear to be at first reading. He has little choice but to revalidate grants he had made earlier (see 1:24-37), to agree to Simon's retaining control over the fortifications over which he already has control, to pardon any acts of rebellion on the part of the Maccabees, and to exempt the Jews from all taxes. At the same time he is also willing to take Jews into his service.

Although verse 41 implies a kind of independence of gentile "yoke," full political independence will not come until later.

13:43-53 Simon captures Gazara and the citadel. Simon now moves to assure complete military control over all Judea and the coast by capture of the remaining Syrian garrisons there. First he takes Gazara, resettles it with Jews who observe the law, and builds himself a residence there.

Jonathan had begun the siege of the citadel two years earlier (see 1 Macc 12:36), and Simon brings it to a successful end in 141 B.C.E., when the garrison surrenders. The citadel is entered with great jubilation and rejoicing (v. 47). For the first time since 169/168 B.C.E., the temple area is free from the menace of the citadel (see 1 Macc 1:33-37). Verse 53 introduces Simon's son John, who is later known as John Hyrcanus, Simon's successor, who ruled from 134 to 104 B.C.E.

14:1-3 Demetrius is captured. According to the author, Demetrius II marched into Media to get help in his campaign against Trypho. However, it is possible that Trypho was fairly immobilized at this point and that Demetrius turned his attention to Media because of the threatening progress of the Parthian empire there. At any rate, the Parthians capture Demetrius, Simon's ally, and imprison him. Arsaces (v. 2) is probably Mithradates I, who actually treated Demetrius fairly well, even giving him his own daughter in marriage.

14:4-15 Song of praise to Simon. At this point in the narrative, the author inserts some poetry that sums up the praises of Simon in much the same way as he did earlier with the praises of Judas (see 3:3-9). The song recounts some of Simon's important military accomplishments, notably the capture of the port of Joppa and the citadel in Jerusalem. It is interesting that Simon Maccabeus is praised for capturing Joppa (v. 5), the gateway to commerce and communication with the Greek isles. Such contact with Greeks was not where this story started! At the same time Simon is described in language that is reminiscent of the reign of Solomon (see 1 Kgs 5:5, for example).

The second part of this song of praise seems to describe Simon's reign as a kind of messianic age, a familiar theme in intertestamental literature. The poem contains several allusions to Old Testament texts (see Lev 26:4; Zech 8:4, 12; Ezek 34:27; Isa 52:1; 1 Kgs 4:25; Mic 4:4; and Isa 27:5-6). The Jewish apocalyptic movement, especially during the second century B.C.E., looked forward to a period of peace for God's people, a time when they would be ruled by someone who was just, someone who would see to it that everyone, including the poor, had enough to eat—that they could eat their bread in security.

Despite what one might think of the political and religious developments in Judaism during the period of the Maccabees, it must be admitted that, under Simon, the Jewish people in Judea experienced their first quasi-independence since the fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C.E. We might excuse some people of the time, including our author, who might have thought that the messianic prophecies and apocalyptic predictions were indeed being fulfilled under the Maccabees—especially under Simon.

14:16-24 Rome and Sparta renew alliances with Simon. Rome and Sparta learn of the death of Jonathan and express their interest in renewing alliances with Simon. Numenius, the Jewish emissary who had been sent to Sparta and Rome by Jonathan, figures prominently in this narrative also. The full chronological sequence of events is not clear at this point because of the way the author has schematized and telescoped events. Simon responds to the Romans' offer of friendship by sending a significant gift, a golden shield weighing nearly half a ton—an expensive gift from a small nation struggling to stay alive.

14:25-49 The Jewish people honor the Maccabees. We have heard the author's summary praise of Simon as well as the offers of friendship from Sparta and the important ally, Rome. Now it is time to hear what the people themselves thought of the Maccabees. Setting up a memorial inscription to record the great deeds of leaders was a familiar practice in the Hellenistic world. The inscription in this part of the narrative is dated September, 140 B.C.E.

What is curious is what the inscription does not say. Although Mattathias, the father, is mentioned (v. 29), Judas' name does not appear, and Jonathan's role is described cursorily. The majority of the praise, of course, is heaped upon Simon, who is the current ruler. Perhaps it was considered impolitic to praise his brothers while he was ruling. Perhaps also the manners in which Judas and Jonathan came to their deaths was a cause of some embarrassment, and therefore not suited to the author's purpose of praising his heroes.

As a result of all that he had done on behalf of the nation, the people acknowledge Simon as permanent leader, high priest, and governor general, implying military, spiritual, and civil authority. His power is just short of royal, as is his official clothing. In effect, we have here a new constitution that outlines Simon's responsibilities and his acceptance of them, as well as the implied responsibilities of the people who have offered these positions to him.

15:1-9 Antiochus VII and Simon. Antiochus VII, the younger brother of Demetrius II, was called "Sidetes" by the people, because he was born at Side in Pamphylia. When he decided to wrest control of the Syrian kingdom away from the unpopular Trypho, he sought the friendship of Simon. Although Antiochus probably would not have embarked on such a venture without adequate financial and moral support, Simon was nevertheless someone to be reckoned with.

In his letter to Simon (vv. 3-9), he may be exaggerating the conditions in Syria somewhat to enhance his claim to the throne. Although he seems to grant Simon what had been granted by others (or simply taken by the Maccabees), his concessions or privileges make it clear that he considers Judea to be a Syrian province. The authorization to coin money is a new privilege, however. Presumably the coinage was in bronze, because silver and gold were reserved to the king. Since he withdraws most of these concessions a few months later, it seems probable that Simon did not mint any coins.

15:10-14 Antiochus VII invades Syria and Judea. In the autumn of 139/138 B.C.E., Antiochus invaded Syria, forcing Trypho to flee to Dor, a city south of Mount Carmel. In our narrative Antiochus pursues him and besieges this port city. Since Antiochus has moved south into Judea, we might expect some encounter with Simon. However, the author inserts a notice about renewed friendship between Simon and the Romans before resuming the narrative about Antiochus' relationship with Simon.

15:15-24 Rome renews alliance with the Jews. Numenius, the Jewish legate to Rome, brings a letter addressed to such neighboring kings as Ptolemy and Demetrius. The latter, perhaps, had not yet been captured by the Parthians when the letter was written, or perhaps the Romans simply were not aware of his fate. The renewal of friendship is expressed especially in the acceptance of the large golden shield that Simon had sent to Rome (v. 20). The letter provides for a kind of protection of the Jews from their neighbors and includes provisions for extradition to Jerusalem of all troublemakers who seek refuge in neighboring countries. It is not clear why this letter is included precisely at this point in the narrative, but it does in fact provide a kind of contrast between the way the Romans deal with the Jews and the way the Syrians do. The various kingdoms mentioned in verses 22-23 are primarily independent states of the eastern Mediterranean, an area of increasing interest to the Romans.

15:25-41 Antiochus attacks the Jews. The narrative resumes with the story of Antiochus' pursuit of Trypho. Although Antiochus besieged the city of Dor by land and sea (v. 25), Trypho was able to escape (v. 37); however, he has no further influence on the development of events in this area. Antiochus is already in control as this part of the narrative begins. Simon sends some troops to help Antiochus, presumably as a way of indicating his acceptance of Antiochus' offer (see vv. 3-9).

The situation has changed, however—Antiochus no longer needs Simon's help. He refuses to accept the assistance and reneges on his earlier agreement. Moreover, he demands the return of Joppa, Gazara, and the citadel in Jerusalem, all of which formerly belonged to the Syrian kingdom. Simon, in effect, is being asked to make recompense for the cities taken by force. The substitution of a financial arrangement instead of returning the cities or the citadel demonstrates that the matter is open to some negotiation. Although the sum of money is high, Simon can probably afford it.

Simon receives the Syrian envoy, Athenobius, in full Hellenistic splendor at his court (v. 32). Again, the picture given suggests that we have traveled far from where Mattathias and his family began in the revolt against the Hellenization of Judaism. Instead of impressing the envoy with his wealth, however, Simon unwittingly makes it clear that he can in fact afford the recompense demanded by Antiochus. His refusal to pay can now be taken as an indication of his intransigence and rebellion.

Simon's formal response, however, appeals to Greek international law which provided, for example, for one's right to retake ancestral lands that had fallen into the hands of others. The Jews' claim to their land is based on divine promises to their ancestors. Likewise, Greek international law provided for conquest of territory outside the ancestral land through just wars of retribution. Accordingly, Simon argues that the citizens of Joppa and Gazara were doing harm to the Jews (v. 35), and that is why those cities were taken. His willingness to pay a mere tenth of what Antiochus demands as recompense is perhaps an attempt to show that the Jews are willing to make some concessions in the negotiations. On the other hand, the amount is so small that its offer seems to indicate defiance.

The Syrian response is anger. Antiochus appoints Cendebeus as commanding officer of the coastal region to succeed Simon, thereby in effect removing him from office. Cendebeus is also sent to Judea and Jerusalem to prepare for an attack on the Jewish people, while Antiochus himself continues to pursue Trypho. (Trypho died eventually at Apamea, a Phoenician city.) The situation described in verses 40-41 reminds us of earlier days when the Maccabees fought the Syrians and the Hellenists in the heart of Judea. The peace and security that Simon seemed to have achieved have been short-lived.

16:1-10 John Hyrcanus attacks the Syrians. The narrative is nearing its end. Simon, the last of the Maccabean brothers to rule over the Jewish people, is getting too old to lead the troops into battle. He passes on the Maccabean military leadership to his sons Judas and John (Hyrcanus), while retaining other power and authority (v. 3). John attacks Cendebeus with a large army and with cavalry as well, the first reference to cavalry in the Maccabean narrative. Although Judas is wounded in battle, John is victorious and brings peace to the land once again.

16:11-17 Simon and his two sons are murdered. We are now introduced to Simon's son-in-law, Ptolemy, son of Abubus. Ptolemy's name might be a surprise even among the in-laws of the Maccabees. The name Abubus is a Hellenized form of a Semitic name. We have become familiar with Maccabean behavior, which so closely parallels and resembles Hellenistic leaders' actions—their drinking parties, their mistresses, and their tendency to eliminate rivals. This latter tendency emerges in Ptolemy, who decides to succeed his father-in-law and become an ally of Antiochus VII.

Ptolemy invites Simon, Judas, and Mattathias to his home at Jericho and provides a sumptuous banquet for them. One might expect Jewish hospitality and table fellowship, but instead there is treachery and assassination. Simon's death is described very briefly and without comment (v. 16). He joins his brothers in an ignominious death—dying while drunk at the hand of his own son-in-law. We do not know how many Jewish people supported Simon, but a return to Syrian vassalage and taxation probably would not have been very acceptable to them. This may explain why Ptolemy writes to Antiochus and requests troops to help him in ruling the country.

16:18-24 Conclusion. Ptolemy has a traitor in his own midst. Someone warns John of what has happened to his father and brothers and of Ptolemy's intention to have him murdered as well. John has his would-be assassins killed and returns to Jerusalem before Ptolemy can arrive there. The rest of the story is merely summarized in our narrative. We learn that John also became high priest. The book ends on a note similar to that found so often in the books of Kings, referring the reader to the chronicles of John's pontificate.

The book ends somewhat abruptly. The Maccabees have clearly been considered heroes by the author. However, the way the book is composed may provide a clue as to the author's final verdict. Most of the songs of praise about the brothers come at the beginning of their respective narratives rather than at the end. All three brothers died because of treachery. All three fully and freely engaged in Hellenistic diplomacy and became more and more Hellenistic in their ways. One wonders whether the author is not saying that, although they did great deeds on behalf of the nation and had great potential for leadership, there was a flaw in each of their characters. Most of what they gained was soon lost.

On the other hand, Jewish independence became a reality under John Hyrcanus, who seems to have dreamed of restoring the Davidic-Solomonic empire. Perhaps this is what prompted the author of 1 Maccabees to tell the story of the Maccabees' heroism.

2 MACCABEES

Alphonse P. Spilly, C.PP.S.

INTRODUCTION

This book, originally written in Greek, is said to be a summary of a five-volume work written by Jason of Cyrene (2 Macc 2:23). Although it is difficult to date the work, it may be from the reign of John Hyrcanus (129–104 B.C.E.) or later, but before the arrival of Pompey in 63 B.C.E. The work differs from 1 Maccabees in many ways, but significantly in its not being pro-Maccabean or pro-Hasmonean. Because some of its main tenets were contrary to the policies of John Hyrcanus, some date the book to the early years of his reign, a time when the author might have tried to influence a policy debate. Although it might well have been written in Jerusalem (because of its emphasis and propaganda regarding the temple), some would place its origins in Egypt, and more specifically in Alexandria (in part, because of its occasional confusion of Palestinian geography). It may have been written as a corrective to 1 Maccabees (or vice versa). The two books clearly have different purposes and different points of view and thereby complement each other.

The theology of 2 Maccabees

From the prologue to the epilogue, the book's primary concern is with the temple in Jerusalem. It covers a period of the Hellenistic age when the temple experienced profanation, purification and restoration, and renewed attacks, primarily during the reigns of Antiochus IV and his son. The temple is a symbol of what happens to the nation as a whole: the people suffer persecution, followed by liberation and restoration.

The book's theology is primarily Deuteronomic: sin leads to punishment, repentance leads to salvation. Sin means a failure to observe the law, and it breaks the covenantal relationship between God and the people. One of the limitations of this theology is that it has no explanation for innocent suffering and can lead one to think that all suffering is a punishment for sin.

Unlike 1 Maccabees, this book sees the main problems as beginning within the Jewish community. Individuals, including high priests, introduce Hellenistic ways into Judea, Jerusalem, and even the temple—practices that are considered incompatible with the authentic exercise of Jewish religion. The sins of these few bring God's punishment on the community, symbolized especially in the profanation of the temple and experienced in the proscription of Jewish religion.

The reader encounters martyrs here, those especially singled out as models of perseverance and fidelity to the law and religion. Persecution is God's way of purifying the people because of the sin that has been found in their midst. It is not simply punishment but discipline or correction. Remaining faithful during persecution, even to the point of giving one's life, has important effects on the course of events and hastens the people's restoration.

The Gentiles also play an important role in this book. In a manner well known within the Deuteronomic tradition, they become the instruments of God's punishment. However, as is also the case in that same tradition, they frequently become arrogant and step beyond their role as God's instruments to challenge divine authority and power. This results in their fall. The higher they attempt to raise themselves in their arrogance, the lower they seem to fall.

What underlies the theology of this book is the divine control of events. If the Gentiles are mere instruments of God's punishment, then leaders such as Judas are mere agents of God's salvation. Before each major confrontation, Judas prays with the people for divine protection; victory is always attributed to God. Frequently heavenly manifestations and mysterious figures appear to bring about the victory or at least to guide and encourage the people.

The theological viewpoint of the author controls the unfolding of the narrative. Where this calls for modification of historical events, the author does not hesitate to gloss over unpleasant facts or simply to change the presentation of the facts. Whereas 1 Maccabees at times admits that Judas occasionally lost a battle, he does not lose any ground in 2 Maccabees after the rebellion has begun. Characterization is done, not on the basis of historical facts known about the actors in this drama, but in terms of the demands of the author's theological bias. Enemies are archvillains, and heroes and heroines are also much bigger than life. This gives some of the major episodes in the book their legendary quality.

The relevance of 2 Maccabees

The stark nationalism of the book, its earthiness and violence, its near delight in gory details, and its simplistic theology of retribution may not attract the reader to return often to this narrative for spiritual reading. However, there is something valuable in its theology of martyrdom for a world that experiences so much oppression of individual and religious freedoms. The martyrs provide us with striking examples of courage in the face of immoral coercion and of the willingness to sacrifice even life itself rather than deny something as sacred as human and religious rights.

OUTLINE OF 2 MACCABEES

1:1–2:32	Introduction
3:1-40	Part I: Heliodorus
4:1–10:9	Part II: Profanation and Restoration of the Temple
	A. Profanation and Persecution (4:1–7:42)
	B. Restoration (8:1–10:9)
10:10–15:36	Part III: Defense of the Temple
	A. Events Under Antiochus V (10:10–13:26)
	B. Final Defeat of Nicanor (14:1–15:36)
15:37-39	Epilogue

COMMENTARY

INTRODUCTION

2 Macc 1:1–2:32

The first two chapters of 2 Maccabees provide an introduction to the thought of the book with two letters and the author's own prologue.

1:1-10a Letter of 124 B.C.E. The Jewish people in Palestine are writing to their coreligionists in Egypt, primarily about the observance of the feast of the rededication of the temple (Hanukkah). The dating of the letter (v. 10) is significant in the history of Egyptian Jews because it was in 124 B.C.E. that Ptolemy VIII (Euergetes II) and his sister Cleopatra II agreed to end their civil war. The Jewish populace in Egypt had supported Cleopatra and might have needed some encouragement in the face of possible retaliation by Ptolemy VIII. The reference to a "time of adversity" in verse 5 might refer to this specific historical context.

The first six verses contain a typical greeting and prayer for the welfare of the addressees. Noteworthy are the senders of the letter—no high priest, Sanhedrin (senate), or member of the Maccabean family is mentioned. This may be in keeping with a tendency within the book to downplay leadership (with the exception of Judas Maccabeus) and to highlight the common people, who are the real heroes and heroines of the book.

The religious content of the letter centers on God's covenant with the patriarchs of Israel. God's "remembering" this special relationship with the people is not so much a matter of divine memory as God's continuing commitment on behalf of the people—not only those in Palestine but those in Egypt as well. This divine commitment includes rescuing them in their present distress.

The covenantal relationship also has implications for the people's behavior: they are to observe the Torah, the law, the manifestation of God's will for the people. Even their capacity for observing the law is attributed to God's gift. There may be a subtle hint in verse 5 that the reason for their present distress is their sinfulness, but this is not clear.

The next part of the letter (vv. 7-8) alludes to an earlier letter, sent in 143 B.C.E., which chronicled their problems with Jason, a high priest who bought the office from the Seleucid king. Jason and his associates rebelled and brought violence and destruction to the land, as 2 Maccabees will detail later. Prayer led to God's rescuing the people from these calamities.

The letter ends with an exhortation to celebrate Hanukkah, called here the feast of Booths because of its resemblance to that great feast commemorating the years of wilderness wandering after liberation from the slavery of Egypt and its Pharaoh.

This letter may at first seem a strange introduction to a book, but it outlines themes that will run throughout the ensuing narrative: the attacks against Jerusalem and God's rescue of the people. The festival that is to be celebrated is the rededication of the temple, and the rest of the book will continue to focus our attention on that sanctuary. The theology is, as we have noted, basically Deuteronomic: sin leads to punishment, but repentance to salvation.

1:10b–2:18 Letter of 164 B.C.E. The focus of this second letter is also the temple and the feast of Hanukkah. In this letter both the Sanhedrin (senate) and Judas Maccabeus are included among the senders, but the people themselves retain the first place in the greeting. Aristobulus may be a second-century B.C.E. Jewish philosopher who lived in Alexandria and whose writings have survived as fragments preserved in the writings of early Christian writers. He was at the court of Ptolemy VI and, according to this letter, was a member of the high priestly line.

The allusion to historical events in verses 11-12 is vague, although verses 13-16 refer to the death of Antiochus at the temple of Nanea. The author seems to be referring to Antiochus IV, although it was Antiochus III who died in a raid against a temple. This family, at any rate, was known for its raiding of temples. The pretext for the visit to the temple was the ceremonial marriage of the king with the goddess of fertility, but the real intention, according to this author, was his greed for money. This motif will reappear later in the book. The priests at the temple seemingly were aware of the purpose of the king's visit, and became responsible for his death and that of his associates.

Verse 17 contains the moral of the story: this is how God deals with the wicked, especially those who attack temples. The next part of the letter contains five subdivisions, connected primarily by association of ideas rather than by logical development.

Verses 18-36 demonstrate the continuity between the temple of Nehemiah and that of Solomon through the telling of a legend, according to which the fire used for sacrifices in Solomon's temple was hidden at the time of the temple's destruction in 587 B.C.E. and turned to liquid. Nehemiah directed the priests to find the liquid and, in actions that resemble those of Elijah on Mount Carmel (see 1 Kgs 18:30-39), ignited the sacrifices through the power of the sun enflaming the liquid, identified as naphtha. We know, however, that the temple was rebuilt by Zerubbabel many years before Nehemiah arrived on the scene. The point of the story is less historical accuracy than theological highlighting of the importance of the temple in the eyes of the Lord.

The prayer recited on this occasion is notable for its numerous attributes of God, who is designated as the only king of Israel (v. 24). The prayer asks two things of this beneficent God: acceptance of sacrifice and restoration of the people (that is, liberation from the Gentiles who oppress them). This language is appropriate, given the date of the letter—a year or so after the writing of the Book of Daniel.

The next section (2:1-8) centers attention on Jeremiah, who is reputed to have been the one who told the priests to hide the fire in the first place. Although the letter of Jeremiah to the exiles in Jer 29 does not mention the fire, it does mention the observance of the law and contains warnings against idolatry (as in 2 Macc 2:2). The legend continues with a description of Jeremiah's alleged journey to Mount Sinai, where he hid the tent, the ark, and the altar of incense until such time as the Lord would reveal to the people where they could find these objects. The expectation of the glory of the Lord manifesting itself in the cloud (2:8) would remind the Jewish readers of the Lord's presence in the wilderness and especially at Sinai, and also at the dedication of Solomon's temple.

The mention of Moses and Solomon in 2:8 introduces another section of this letter (2:9-12), comparing the roles of these two leaders. Both prayed and fire is said to have come from the heavens to light the sacrifice, just as happened with Nehemiah. This led to the celebration of a dedicatory feast for a whole week—similar to the feast of Hanukkah.

The mention of celebrating a feast for eight days leads back to the days of Nehemiah, who is said to have collected some of the scriptures just as Judas Maccabeus is alleged to have done (2:13-14). These scriptures are made available to the addressees of the letter (2:15).

The last part of the letter perhaps contains its real purpose: notice of the celebration of Hanukkah, celebrating God's deliverance of the people (presumably through Judas Maccabeus' ability to take control of the temple, to purify it, and to reestablish Jewish worship there). However, Judas is not mentioned as the agent of God here; instead, God alone is said to be the one who has had mercy on the people and brought them back together so that they could worship God in the temple. This is consistent with the theological emphasis of the book. Whereas 1 Maccabees highlighted the human agency of the Maccabean family in achieving independence, 2 Maccabees insists upon the ultimate causality of divine favor and intervention.

2:19-32 Author's preface. The author now presents his own introduction, noting that this is the story of the Maccabees, but also of heavenly manifestations. Emphasis is put on the temple and altar once again. It is clear that God has accomplished all this (2:22). The author also identifies his source, a work by Jason of Cyrene, condensed in the present version.

It is remarkable that a book that is so preoccupied with Jewish matters and opposed to Hellenizing efforts is so consciously written with Hellenistic historiographical principles! The analogies of festive banquets and the adornment of houses are also more Hellenistic than Jewish. There is even what approaches humorous self-consciousness at the end of the preface (2:32). With this we are ready to begin the narrative proper.

PART I: HELIODORUS

2 Macc 3:1-40

The introduction has focused attention on the temple and God's protection on its behalf, and has also promised to tell about heavenly manifestations. The story of Heliodorus is a dramatic narrative that delivers on this promise. Although there is a historical core to the story, it is told with great literary license in order to highlight the theological viewpoint of the author.

Events center on two Jews: Onias III, the high priest, and Simon, a wicked schemer. There are also two Hellenistic characters: the greedy king Antiochus and his minister Heliodorus. The story follows the basic outline of a well-known literary type from this period in which a deity defends his or her temple with whatever means are necessary, and so commentators often refer to this narrative as a blend of historical information and pious legend.

3:1-6 Onias versus Simon. Jerusalem is described as living in "perfect peace" because of two factors: the high priest Onias is pious, and the people observe the Torah. Antiochus III was generous in donating sums of money to temples within his domain, and we have no reason to think that Jerusalem would fare any differently. The money donated by the king was meant to underwrite the temple's expensive sacrificial system. However, this royal donation is not the money which will figure in the story that follows.

Simon, the brother of Menelaus (whom the reader will meet in the next chapter), is an official of some standing in Jerusalem. It is not clear what his quarrel with Onias was (v. 4), but there is some evidence that Onias was pro-Ptolemaic (pro-Egyptian) while Simon was pro-Seleucid (pro-Syrian). The politics of the day may lie behind this narrative, as is the case with so many others in the Maccabean books.

Simon's subsequent actions would be considered treasonous as well as illegal by upright Jews and Gentiles. His approach to the governor may be seen as an attempt to ingratiate himself with the Syrian authorities. Antiochus III needs finances to pay a tribute levied against his kingdom by Rome. Simon alleges that there are excess funds in abundance in the Jerusalem temple (v. 6). He says that not all of the funds are needed for the sacrificial system and that the king could have easy access to them. (Later in the narrative we will learn the nature of these excess funds.) The effect of Simon's treachery will be seen in the subsequent narratives in 2 Maccabees. Whereas 1 Maccabees suggests that the Jews' difficulties were primarily caused by the Hellenists, 2 Maccabees focuses the blame on wicked people among the Jewish populace.

3:7-14 The mission of Heliodorus. The governor reports the financial good news to the king, who immediately sends one of his ministers to appropriate the excess funds for royal use. What follows makes it clear that the major difficulties between Jerusalem and Antioch have not yet developed, and relationships between the two are primarily cordial. Heliodorus' subterfuge (taking an indirect route) may have been designed to prevent any depositors from withdrawing their money before his arrival at the temple.

Heliodorus is direct with the high priest, asking him about the excess revenues in the temple treasury (v. 9). Onias' response is probably accurate: some of the funds have been collected to help care for widows and orphans, as Jewish law prescribes in so many places (see, for example, Deut 16:12-13), and some of the money has been deposited by a certain Hyrcanus, son of Tobias.

During the Hellenistic period, the Tobiads were a powerful and wealthy Jewish family. Their initial holdings were in Transjordan, but they also had residences in Jerusalem and Alexandria. They were pro-Hellenist merchants who were primarily pro-Egyptian. During the course of their history, they were often at odds with the high priestly family of the Oniads, although that does not seem to figure in the present narrative. The Hyrcanus of this narrative had earlier collected taxes for the Ptolemies and had remained pro-Egyptian after the Seleucids had taken control of Palestine (after 198 B.C.E.). During this latter period he had maintained a territory in the Transjordan almost independent of Seleucid rule, and evidently had deposited his earnings and family fortune in the Jerusalem temple for safekeeping. He and Onias III probably shared pro-Egyptian sympathies.

At stake in the Heliodorus incident are some legal questions. Because Hyrcanus is pro-Egyptian, he can be considered a rebel by the Seleucids, and his rights could be considered nil. On the other hand, Onias appeals to both Jewish and Greek law regarding the inviolability of a sanctuary and the safety of any funds deposited there. Heliodorus, rather than trying to sort out the legal moral dilemma, relies instead on his orders from the king (v. 13) and makes preparations to defraud the temple. In the dramatic account that follows, the reader may have recourse not only to law but also to the theology of this book: God will defend the temple. The only question that remains is how it will be done.

3:15-21 The reaction of the faithful Jews. With great dramatic strokes, the author describes the impact Heliodorus' mission and intent have on the Jewish faithful. They are helpless in resisting Heliodorus and his royal mandate, but they turn to God with prayer and gestures of mourning and lament. Can God fail to hear the prayers of a people in so much anguish?

3:22-34 God's response to Heliodorus and the Jews. When Heliodorus approaches the temple with his associates and retinue, God is manifested in such a powerful way that Heliodorus' associates are thrown into panic and fainting. A mysterious rider on a magnificent horse charges Heliodorus, and the rider's two companions whip Heliodorus, who falls to the ground, seemingly unconscious (v. 27). His bold approach to the temple precincts ends dramatically with his being ignominiously carried away on a stretcher, utterly helpless. The Jewish people change their prayer from lament to praise at this mighty manifestation of God's power and protection.

The story is not yet over, however, in accordance with this literary genre. Fearful for his death, Heliodorus' associates intercede with Onias, asking him to pray for Heliodorus to the God who has so awesomely struck him down. Perhaps they are already worrying about what they are going to explain to the king about Heliodorus' condition, presuming the king might be somewhat skeptical if they describe what occurred.

Onias' motives in what follows may be equally pious and political. How will he explain to the king that an important minister on an equally important mission has met with such grief in Jerusalem? While Onias prays on behalf of Heliodorus, the young men appear once again to Heliodorus with a message of salvation (because of Onias' prayer) and a mandate to proclaim God's power and majesty. They disappear as mysteriously as they appeared.

3:35-40 The witness of Heliodorus. Heliodorus' offering of sacrifice is not against temple practice. Although Heliodorus bears witness to the power of the God of the Jews as commanded, the king understandably remains skeptical, for he has not shared Heliodorus' experience. The king, by asking who might be better qualified for such a mission (v. 37), appears to accuse Heliodorus of incompetence. Heliodorus replies with some irony: send your worst enemy or someone who plots against your government and he will be appropriately punished. The irony stems from the fact that later in history Heliodorus did plot against Antiochus and brought him to his death. The narrative ends with a suitable summary statement about the "power" that is present in Jerusalem, power that will destroy whatever or whoever tries to harm the temple or the people.

PART II: PROFANATION AND RESTORATION OF THE TEMPLE

2 Macc 4:1–10:9

A. Profanation and Persecution

2 Macc 4:1–7:42

The events described in 4:1–7:42 cover the period from 175 to 167 B.C.E. and tell the story of the assault of evil on the Jewish nation and their religion.

4:1-6 Simon continues to oppose Onias. Simon accuses the high priest Onias of treason, a charge that the author of 2 Maccabees is quick to deny. Onias proceeds to the Syrian court to defend himself, probably in the eyes of both the Seleucid king and his own people. His mission is aborted, however, by the king's death.

4:7-22 Jason purchases the high priesthood. With the accession of Antiochus IV Epiphanes to the Seleucid throne, Onias' own brother, Jason, promises the king money in return for being appointed high priest and introducing Hellenistic practices into Jerusalem. The gymnasium and youth club were basic institutions of Greek education. Enrolling the men of Jerusalem as Antiochene citizens probably meant a shift of power to Jason's supporters. All these actions demonstrated a shift away from Jewish values and practices to a Hellenistic way of life.

At the new gymnasium Jason introduced Jewish youths to Hellenistic training. The Greeks exercised naked, wearing only broad-brimmed hats to shield their heads from the hot sun. The author's lack of esteem for Jason is found in verse 13, where he is described as "outrageous," "wicked," "ungodly," and "pseudo-high priest." The temple priests are themselves caught up in Hellenistic fashions and ways. There will be a price to pay for abandoning Jewish practices, especially worship.

The competitive games played every five years were similar to the Olympiad, and Jason, with his predilection for matters Hellenistic, sends a delegation to Tyre. It is not clear how he understands the offering of sacrifice to Hercules, but the delegation has qualms about this and instead donates the money to the building of Antiochus' fleet.

Later Antiochus himself visits Jerusalem, where he is received with great pomp and celebration. This was quite possible because Onias was in exile and Hyrcanus was dead; hence the pro-Ptolemaic party was powerless.

4:23-29 Menelaus supplants Jason. Jason makes a tactical error by sending Simon's brother Menelaus to deliver the promised money to the king. Menelaus betrays Jason by outbidding him for the office and supplants him as high priest. Jason had not proved himself to be a loyal brother to Onias, but at least he was of the high priestly family. Menelaus is not of the high priestly family and can be expected to encounter opposition among the Jewish populace. Further opposition might also be expected because of the high rate of tribute promised by Menelaus. The date is 172 or 171 B.C.E.

Jason becomes a fugitive in the Transjordan (Onias is presumably still in Syria), and Menelaus cannot make good on the money promised to the king. Accordingly, he is summoned to appear before the king.

4:30-38 Andronicus murders Onias. When some important cities in the northwest part of his kingdom rebel, Antiochus marches to pacify them, leaving Andronicus in charge. This man had assassinated the son of Seleucus IV, making it possible for Antiochus IV to succeed to the throne. This perhaps helps to explain the power he wields in this narrative. Menelaus lives up to his wicked reputation and, after stealing some golden vessels from the temple, gives them to Andronicus (v. 32). He also sells some along the way, but we are not told what he did with the money.

Onias III, still in exile in Syria, denounces Menelaus' actions and implicates Andronicus in the deed—the one who is acting in the place of the king! Onias, realizing the seriousness of his accusations, takes refuge in a sanctuary, albeit a Greek one. (Jerusalem, the nearest Jewish sanctuary, was inaccessible.) Menelaus and Andronicus conspire, and Andronicus treacherously persuades Onias to leave his place of refuge, whereupon he is immediately killed (v. 35). The author is quick to point out that this terrible deed prompts a response of outrage among both Jews and Gentiles. Even Antiochus is said to have been remorseful and angry over this action. At any rate, by executing Andronicus, Antiochus also removes a possible threat to his own throne. The author points out that the punishment fits the crime.

4:39-50 Menelaus plots evil against his fellow Jews. The scene shifts back to Jerusalem, where Lysimachus, with the connivance of Menelaus, further plunders the temple of its golden vessels. The people begin to riot and are opposed with Hellenistic armed force. In the battle that ensues, the people are victorious and kill the perpetrator near the treasury, where he committed the crime.

The people bring charges against Menelaus. He in turn promises a bribe to the new governor, Dorymenes (v. 45), who promptly intercedes with the king on Menelaus' behalf. Menelaus is acquitted and his accusers are punished instead. Menelaus remains in power, but the reader will have to ask how long it will be before he is punished for his wickedness, especially his crimes against the temple.

5:1-10 Jason dies in exile. Antiochus invades Egypt in 169 and again in 168 B.C.E. The appearance of mysterious horsemen in the sky for forty days indicates that an event of special importance is about to happen. The motif is frequently found in Greek and Roman literature. Here it would be interpreted as a portent that God is about to act. Although the people pray, hoping that the omen will prove to be a favorable one, that is not how the narrative unfolds.

It was not unusual in ancient (or modern) times for people to attempt rebellion upon the death of a sovereign. If Antiochus had actually died, Jason's acts would not take on the character of treason, because there would be no legitimate king. If that were true, it would also imply that Menelaus was no longer the high priest until reconfirmed in office by a subsequent king.

However, Jason's assumptions are incorrect, and Antiochus is very much alive. Before he finds that out, Jason attacks Jerusalem to regain the high priesthood (v. 5). We are not informed of the role of the people in the matter, but Menelaus takes refuge in the citadel. Jason slaughters his fellow citizens, but is unsuccessful in the venture and has to flee for his life. For a time he becomes a man without a country. His first place of refuge is the Transjordan, but there he is called to account by Aretas, the king of the Nabateans. He might have expected to find refuge eventually in Egypt because he was anti-Seleucid at this point, but he does not find a home there. Eventually he takes up residence in Sparta, where he eventually dies and is buried as an exile. Again the punishment fits the crime.

5:11-27 Antiochus IV attacks the Jews. Even though it is doubtful that the majority of people in Jerusalem defended Menelaus or sided with Jason, neither do they seem to have accepted Menelaus as their high priest. To Antiochus this means rebellion, and he moves swiftly to put it down. He is described in somewhat exaggerated terms to underline his ruthlessness and his pride.

The depth of Antiochus' arrogance is demonstrated by his decision to enter the temple precincts, something we know from ancient historians as historically accurate (v. 15). The traitor Menelaus, who should be expected to know and enforce the Jewish law regarding foreigners' being forbidden to enter the temple, instead leads the way and serves as a guide! Antiochus dares to lay his impure hands on sacred vessels and to remove them for his own use. The actions remind the reader of the impious activities of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar in the Book of Daniel.

Antiochus is contrasted with Heliodorus (5:18); the latter was merely on an inspection tour when he was flogged by the mysterious horsemen. Antiochus could have expected much worse treatment for his looting of sacred vessels—had it not been for the sins of the people that led to this event. The appearance of the heavenly horsemen at the beginning of this chapter is now clear: they came to show that God is about to punish his people for the sins connected with Hellenization, especially those committed by Jason, Menelaus, and their followers.

This is not a new biblical theme. Earlier the Assyrians and the Babylonians were described as being the instruments of God's punishment because of the people's sins. Nevertheless, the Assyrian and Babylonian kings often thought that they were acting on their own, as does Antiochus, and eventually they were brought down because of their pride and arrogance. The reader can expect the same fate to befall Antiochus, but that will not happen until chapter 9.

The author makes clear why, despite the theme of divine protection of the temple, Antiochus is successful against the temple and the inhabitants of Jerusalem (vv. 17-20). Divine protection of the temple is conditioned by the people's observance of the law and their fidelity to the covenant relationship. When the broken relationship is restored, the temple will return to its former glory.

Antiochus is described as being so high and mighty that he thinks he can sail on land and walk on the sea (v. 21). When he leaves Jerusalem and Judea, he leaves behind tyrants such as Philip, Andronicus, and Menelaus. The reference to Mount Gerizim (v. 23) means the Samaritans. Perhaps the overbearing attitude of a governor like Philip caused the people to rebel once again; otherwise it is not clear why Antiochus sends Apollonius to punish the people further.

Apollonius deals treacherously with the populace, seeming to be peaceable until the sabbath, when he parades his men through the streets; those who leave the relative safety of their homes to view the parade are then massacred. The reader is now introduced to Judas Maccabeus, who escapes to the wilderness with a few companions (v. 27). The date is probably early 167 B.C.E. There is no suggestion in 2 Maccabees that Judas does not observe the sabbath (contrary to what 1 Maccabees states). Here there is only a brief mention of Judas, but the keen reader will remember that Judas is waiting in the wings for his day of vengeance on the Hellenists. For now the deliverance of the people remains in the future. Things will get worse before they get better.

6:1-5 Antiochus profanes the temple. Antiochus III had granted the Jews freedom to worship in their own manner and according to their own law. Antiochus IV in effect now abrogates the earlier decree. Although it is not clear exactly what Antiochus has in mind, it is clear that the Jews are no longer free to worship as they wish. The first change is profaning the temple and dedicating it to Zeus, the head of the Greek pantheon. Introducing prostitution into the temple precincts would recall for the Jews their past history when sacred prostitution, an important part of Canaanite ritual, was introduced into the temple despite the repeated condemnation of the prophets. Because it was considered to be one of the reasons for the downfall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C.E., verses 4-5 would have special meaning for the Jewish people.

6:6-11 Antiochus proscribes Jewish practices. The next changes are prohibitions regarding the celebration of the sabbath and Jewish feasts. Then the Jews are forced to observe Hellenistic customs relating to the monthly celebration of the king's birthday and participation in Dionysiac processions. These decrees are adopted by other cities in the area as well. According to verse 10, circumcision is outlawed, and two women who have circumcised their sons are killed. Those hiding in caves are burned to death because they do not defend themselves on a sabbath.

6:12-17 A theology of persecution. The reader was advised earlier that the reason for the ills that befell Jerusalem and the people was that the people had sinned by engaging in various Hellenizing activities. The author now explains that the punishment was not meant to be destructive but corrective, like a parent disciplining a child. In effect, the author states that God gives other nations enough rope to hang themselves; with Israel, God punishes them before they reach the fullness of their sinfulness so that they can then experience God's mercy. The assertion that God does not abandon the covenanted people is found throughout Jewish tradition.

6:18-31 Eleazar becomes a martyr. The narrative now includes a typical account of a martyr's death. These verses describe Eleazar's joyful acceptance of death rather than doing anything—even something trivial—against God's will, the dialogue between the person and the tormentors, his sufferings, his perseverance to death, and the reactions of the tormentors.

There may be an implied contrast between the Eleazar of 2 Maccabees and the Mattathias of 1 Maccabees. Both are priests, and both assess the persecution for its true intent. But whereas Mattathias defies the king's orders and defends the right to observe Torah, Eleazar refuses to violate the law and instead goes to his death. (There are also interesting parallels between this story of Eleazar and that of Socrates.)

In the course of the narrative, Eleazar seems to believe that judgment or punishment takes place after death (v. 26), but he does not mention a resurrection of the body. Besides keeping his integrity before the Lord, Eleazar hopes that his witness will provide a helpful example to youth. The next episode in the narrative demonstrates youth's response to Eleazar's wish.

7:1-42 Seven youths and their mothers become martyrs. This narrative is skillfully written, with each character providing another element of the theological argument in favor of martyrdom. The number seven, in Jewish tradition, symbolizes perfection; accordingly, the reader may look upon this as a "perfect" family. The story, despite its gruesome details, is meant to edify. It underlines the premise that observance of the law is more important than life itself. The presence of the king adds further import to the story.

Each of the seven sons presents a part of the theological argument: (1) it is better to die than to transgress the law; (2) the king may take their lives, but God will raise them up again; (3) the king may dismember them, but God will restore their limbs; (4) they will be restored to life, but the king will not be restored; (5) God will not forsake the people but will torment the king and his nation; (6) they are suffering because they have sinned as a people.

The mother exhorts her sons to remain faithful by recalling for them God's power to create and to restore life (v. 23). When the king intercedes on behalf of the youngest boy, the mother returns to the theme of God's creation and re-creation, arguing that if God can make the whole universe and humanity out of nothing God can also restore life. The last son then sums up all the preceding arguments, adding a new one at the same time: the martyrs' deaths play a role in bringing to an end the divine discipline that the people are undergoing. Martyrdom makes a difference in the life of the people. In the end the mother also becomes a martyr. Eleazar's example has been followed, and it is time to move on in the narrative to demonstrate the effects of the martyrdoms.

B. Restoration

2 Macc 8:1-10:9

In rapid succession Judas Maccabeus defeats an important adversary, Antiochus IV dies a horrible death, and the people purify the temple and Jerusalem. God brings this about, partly because of the faithful witness of the martyrs. The text moves from the assault of evil to its elimination.

8:1-36 Judas defeats Nicanor. We are at the midpoint of the book. The narrative again is skillfully written; the author does not give many details of the battle in order to highlight his theological emphases: God's help in achieving the victory, the disposal of the booty, and Nicanor's fate.

Judas first gathers associates and prays to God, asking for God's favor on the people, their temple, their city, and the blood of the martyrs (vv. 2-3). Verse 5 makes it clear that the tide has turned—God's anger has changed to mercy. The Gentiles and Hellenizers will be helpless now. Judas attacks cities of the Hellenizers and gains a reputation that attracts the attention of Philip, the commissioner in Jerusalem. He contacts Ptolemy, the son of Dorymenes (4:45) and the governor of the area, requesting assistance. Ptolemy in turn sends Nicanor, a skilled general and trusted official of the royal court, to put down Judas' rebellion.

According to 2 Maccabees, the Seleucids still owe considerable tribute to the Romans, dating from an agreement in 190 B.C.E. (It is possible that the tribute had been paid in full by 173 B.C.E., and that the author of 2 Maccabees is mistaken.) At any rate, Nicanor plans to raise money by selling the Jewish populace into slavery (v. 10). Although in 1 Maccabees the slave-traders take the initiative and follow Nicanor's army like vultures, in this narrative Nicanor invites them because he is presumptuous about a victory over the Jews.

Although some of Judas' troops desert at the advance of the enemy army, the rest prepare for battle. Selling whatever property that is left, they show their determination and make themselves less vulnerable to later reprisals. Judas sums up their theological position before the battle succinctly: the Gentiles trust in weapons and strategy, whereas the Jews simply trust in an all-powerful God (v. 18). He further recalls the famous defeat of Sennacherib (recounted in many places in the Old Testament; see, for example, 2 Kgs 19:35-36) and another battle not known from existing sources—both of which demonstrate what happens when the people trust in God rather than in themselves.

The battle is described in a single verse (v. 24), but the accumulation and distribution of booty receive more attention. First of all, scrupulously observing the sabbath, Judas' men do not pursue the enemy as far as they might have otherwise. After observing the sabbath, they distribute the booty not only to the soldiers who had participated in the battle (as was the custom) but also to the widows, orphans, and those who had been tormented (perhaps referring to the surviving members of the martyrs' families). Taking care of the widows and orphans is a key responsibility in the law.

Those who persecuted the people receive their deserved punishments: those who set fire to the temple gates are themselves destroyed by fire; Nicanor, who sought to enslave the people, flees the country dressed like a runaway slave. Verse 35 describes his defeat with sarcasm: he was "eminently successful"—in destroying his own army! He who had promised to enslave the Jews has to acknowledge them as champions instead—because of their observance of the law. The tide has clearly turned.

9:1-19 God punishes Antiochus IV. This narrative follows the typical story about the death of those who set themselves against God, especially with arrogance. The description of the death of Antiochus IV at this point in the narrative differs somewhat from that in chapter 1, but its development and details enable the author to make the appropriate points that fit the overall theology of the book.

Although there is no way of confirming the story that Antiochus attempted to despoil a temple in Persepolis, such an action would not be out of character for this family. As he heads home in disgrace after his unsuccessful raid on the Persian temple (vv. 1-3), he learns of Nicanor's defeat and plans to achieve a definitive victory against the Jewish people. He drives his chariot with determination, but God's condemnation rides with him (v. 4)! He is struck down with a terrible malady, experiencing great pains in his bowels (again the punishment fits the crime). That does not deter him from his plans against God's people, but then he is thrown from his chariot, suffering racking pain throughout his body. Like Heliodorus, despite his great pride and arrogance, he is ignominiously carried away on a stretcher, helpless. His condition worsens with the onslaught of worms and putrefaction. The turning point is described in verse 11: he begins a personal transformation from arrogance to understanding. From this point of the narrative on, it is difficult to verify the historicity of his deathbed conversion. It fits the author's theme well, however, and may be primarily a theological write-up.

What happens next is ironic: Antiochus makes vows to God and writes a surprisingly cordial letter to the Jewish people. However, God will no longer have mercy on him (v. 13). In the end he remains, in the mind of the author, a "murderer and a blasphemer" (v. 28). It is possible to read verses 14-27 as the feeble attempts of Antiochus IV to reverse the inevitable end he is fast approaching. In turn, he promises to set Jerusalem free (despite earlier threats to turn it into a graveyard); to give the Jews full-citizen status (despite earlier judgments that they are not even worth burying); to donate to the temple and restore what had been stolen (despite earlier thefts); and even to become a Jew himself (v. 17)! Like Heliodorus, he is also willing to proclaim the power of God to all. Again, the judgment that frames this part of the narrative is repeated: his promises do not bring any relief from his suffering (v. 18).

Antiochus then composes a supplicating letter to the Jews (vv. 19-27). Jewish gloating over the hideous details of his suffering perhaps gives way to laughter at the words that are said to come from his hand. He addresses them as "esteemed citizens," sends them "hearty greetings and best wishes." Piously he asserts that his hopes lie in heaven (which the reader knows has already condemned him and which will not relent). He tends to gloss over details of his terrible illness, which the reader already knows is serious and nearly unbearable. He speaks of hope for recovery, but commends his son, who, he suggests, will treat the Jews "with mildness and kindness"! Another possible purpose of the letter is to make clear to the reader that the problems Antiochus faces are of his own making. The Jews are good citizens, reliable people who can be trusted.

Antiochus is trying to ingratiate himself with the Jews, according to the letter, and is also attempting to arrange for his successor. According to 1 Maccabees, his son, Antiochus V, was only a boy at this time. Antiochus designated Philip as regent, but Lysias assumed the regency in opposition to Philip (1 Macc 6:12-17).

Antiochus dies in the mountains on foreign soil, while Judas and his associates celebrate in Jerusalem. The archenemy of the temple has been disposed of.

10:1-9 Purification of temple and city. The purification of the temple becomes a symbol of God's mercy, signaling that the period of God's wrath has clearly come to an end. The purification is possible only because of God's help; the providential nature of the action is also alluded to by the notice that the purification takes place on the very anniversary of its defilement.

After restoring the furniture of the temple (v. 3), Judas and his followers pray to God, asking that any future punishment for their sins come directly from God rather than through the mediation of a foreign enemy. Again, the rededication of the temple is compared with the feast of Booths.

This entire section comes to an end in verse 9 with the notification that "such was the end of Antiochus."

PART III: DEFENSE OF THE TEMPLE

2 Macc 10:10–15:36

A. Events Under Antiochus V

2 Macc 10:10–13:26

10:10-13 Lysias becomes commander-in-chief. Although the narrative states that Antiochus V put Lysias in charge of the government and the military, it would be more accurate to say that Lysias made the boy Antiochus king. The first activity under the new regime consists of accusations of treason against Ptolemy Macron, who had treated the Jews with fairness. This possible ally commits suicide. Thus the first section of this narrative opens on an ominous note. The reader will learn that the problems with Hellenization are not over; the temple needs to be defended by Judas and his associates.

10:14-23 Victory over the Idumeans. The Idumeans are harassing the Jews and welcoming fugitives (Hellenizers) from Jerusalem. Responding to these provocations, Judas and his forces attack the Idumeans successfully. When the survivors withdraw to two large towers, Judas leaves some lieutenants, including at least one of his brothers, in charge of besieging the towers. The author of 2 Maccabees dares to write what would not be found in 1 Maccabees: some of Simon Maccabeus' men accept a bribe and commit treason. Judas returns, puts them to death, and successfully completes the siege of the towers.

10:24-38 Judas defeats Timothy. When Timothy approaches Judea with a large force, Judas and his followers pray, as is their custom, before advancing to meet the enemy. After Timothy's forces are overcome, he flees to a stronghold called Gazara (v. 32), which is promptly besieged by Judas. The defenders blaspheme with impunity because of their reliance on the strength of the fortress. Eventually, however, Judas and his associates overcome their resistance and kill Timothy. (However, a Timothy will reappear [see 12:10-25] and fight Judas once again. Presumably it is a different Timothy.) Judas' troops praise and thank God for the victory.

11:1-12 Judas defeats Lysias. The previous attacks were primarily local skirmishes, but now Judas and the main minister of the kingdom engage in battle. Lysias has three objectives in mind in his expedition against Judas: (1) to make Jerusalem a Hellenistic settlement, (2) to levy a tribute or tax against the temple, and (3) to continue to sell the high priesthood to the highest bidder. Although none of this is new in the Maccabean books, at this point in the narrative it demonstrates that the problems of the faithful are far from being over.

Lysias makes the same mistake as his Seleucid predecessors did: he relies on his military might and does not take God's power into consideration. When he begins to besiege Beth-zur, Judas goes to its defense, after having prayed for an angel to help the Jews. He barely leaves Jerusalem when a mysterious horseman appears at the head of the army (v. 8), encouraging Judas' forces. Needless to say, they are once again victorious, and Lysias escapes in shame.

11:13-38 Peace with the Syrians. There follow four letters that purport to give the terms of the treaty arranged between Lysias and the Jewish people (vv. 17-21; 22-26; 27-33; and 34-38). According to the dates given in the letters, three of them are from the reign of Antiochus IV, and only the second letter is from the time of Antiochus V. All the letters may be authentic. Their order and placement at this point in the narrative fit the author's objectives. Antiochus IV was the archenemy of the temple and of the Jews. Conciliatory correspondence is not to be attributed to him but will fit his son's reign.

The intent of the earlier correspondence may have been to undermine Judas' rebellion. The letters might be addressed to the Hellenizing party and those Jews (probably a majority) who had not yet allied themselves with the Maccabees.

The second letter (vv. 22-26), which may be from Antiochus V, is particularly conciliatory. If it is authentic, the reader will wonder what happened in the meantime to break the truce. Perhaps it was the activities of Judas Maccabeus.

The third letter (vv. 27-33) grants a kind of amnesty to those who had rebelled against the proscription of Jewish practices and the forcing of Hellenistic ways. The letter says they acted out of ignorance; the king is clearly not apologizing for the Hellenization process. The reader may wonder whether the recipients of the letter were reassured by the return of Menelaus, the high priest who was not of a priestly family and who had purchased the office.

The fourth letter (vv. 34-38) is the earliest evidence we have of relations between the Romans and the Jews.

12:1-37 Renewal of hostilities. Although 2 Maccabees goes to great lengths to insist that the Jews want to live in peace, hostilities between the Syrian government and the Jewish people resume. The problems are said to have been caused by some of the local governors and some of the Jews' neighbors. Some of their neighbors may have been fearful that the Maccabean revolt might spread.

The people of Joppa (near present-day Tel Aviv) deceitfully invite some of the Jews for a boat ride and murder them (vv. 3-4). Judas' response is quick and decisive. Although he does not have access to the city itself during his night attack, he destroys the port and boats that are outside the city walls. The people of Jamnia are reported to be considering a similar stratagem, and Judas deals with them in the same way.

The attack by Arabs (12:10-12) is probably geographically displaced. With the help of God once again, Judas is victorious. The battle against Caspin (vv. 13-16) involves themes encountered elsewhere in the book. The inhabitants, relying on the supposed strength of their fortifications, blaspheme. Judas, with the help of God similar to that experienced by Joshua in the battle for Jericho (see Josh 6), overcomes their resistance. A terrible slaughter follows. From this point on, Judas takes the initiative, moving from a defensive to an offensive strategy.

Judas next marches into the Transjordan in search of a certain Timothy, presumably a Syrian military commander (vv. 17-18), but finds that Timothy has already departed from the area. Two of Judas' commanders attack the garrison that Timothy left behind and successfully overcome it (vv. 19-20). Judas continues his pursuit of Timothy, who is accompanied by a large force, and eventually engages him. Once again, despite their overwhelming numerical superiority, the Syrians encounter a mysterious being ("the All-seeing") and flee. Predictably, Judas follows up the rout with slaughter, but Timothy bargains for his freedom and escapes (v. 24).

Judas next marches against Karnion, Ephron, and Scythopolis. The Jews living in the last city testify to their good relations with the citizens of that town, and Judas spares the town (vv. 26-31).

Judas and his soldiers go to Jerusalem for the feast of Pentecost, or feast of Weeks, as it is called in the Hebrew Bible. Afterward they once again take the initiative and march off in search of Gorgias, the governor of Idumea, to the south of Jerusalem. They encounter Gorgias and his army, and a fierce battle ensues. Gorgias escapes capture through the agency of a Thracian mercenary and flees to an Idumean town, Marisa (v. 35). Judas rallies his troops by raising a Hebrew battle cry, perhaps from one of the psalms, and they put the Syrians to flight. Judas retires to a nearby town not far from Marisa, but far enough not to be surprised by an attack on the sabbath. He and his troops purify themselves there and observe the sabbath.

12:38-46 Atonement for the dead. On the day after the sabbath, Judas and his associates prepare to bury those who fell in battle. However, they find forbidden amulets in the clothes of each who died in battle. Whether they wore the amulets because they believed they had special protective qualities or whether they had simply been part of the booty taken during the battle, either action was against the law. The judgment is made that they died because of their sins. This incident resembles the battle at Ai recorded in Josh 7.

The occasion is used to warn the living to avoid such a sin in the future. Judas and his troops pray that the sinful deed be removed, perhaps so that the community would not suffer any further setbacks. However, he then collects money to underwrite an expiatory sacrifice on behalf of those who died in their sins (v. 43). According to the author, Judas was thinking of the resurrection of the dead. Presumably this means that he was praying so that, released from their sins, they would enjoy the rewards of the resurrection with all those who fought on behalf of the Jewish cause.

13:1-2 The Syrians invade Judea again. In the autumn of 163 B.C.E., not quite a year after the rededication of the temple, Antiochus V and Lysias invaded Judea with a very large, well-equipped army. The king was about twelve years old at this time; presumably the invasion was due to complaints about Judas' attacks on the citadel and other offensive activities (see 1 Macc 6:21-27).

13:3-8 The death of Menelaus. With the rededication of the temple under Judas' leadership, Menelaus probably was excluded from functioning as high priest. On the other hand, it is not clear that Antiochus V confirmed him in the high priesthood after the death of his father, Antiochus IV. At any rate, Menelaus wants to return to Jerusalem and resume the privileges of office. God intervenes, and the young king turns against Menelaus (v. 4). The irony in the story is that Menelaus, a leader among the Hellenizers, is executed by the Hellenistic Syrians.

Lysias may have realized that a military solution or a policy of force was not resolving the problems in Judea. He may also have realized that the populace did not consider Menelaus to be fit for the high priesthood because he was not a member of the high priestly family and because of his high-handed manner of carrying out the office. Antiochus V condemns Menelaus to death by asphyxiation. The author of 2 Maccabees once again points out that the punishment fits the crime.

13:9-26 Judas attacks the invading army. Antiochus V is probably unfairly depicted in this narrative, but the Syrian army poses a serious threat to Judea's security. Judas fights on behalf of the country, the temple, and the law. The people prepare for this important battle with prayer, weeping, fasting, and prostrations, in typical Maccabean fashion. Judas moves his troops north of Jerusalem to block access to the city and pitches his camp near Modein, the Maccabean family home (v. 14).

As is often his strategy, Judas attacks at night and begins to rout the Syrians. At dawn he withdraws, and the Seleucid king counterattacks, attempting to draw Judas into battle in another location. Antiochus attacks Bethzur unsuccessfully, and Judas provides the garrison there with supplies. (According to 1 Macc 6:31, 49-50, Beth-zur capitulated because it did not have adequate supplies. The author of 2 Maccabees overlooks the problems involved and simply presents Judas as a hero in this incident.)

After a second unsuccessful attack, the king turns his attention directly upon Judas. Verse 23 may refer to Antiochus' attack on the temple (1 Macc 6:51-52). But internal affairs of the kingdom turn the king's attention back to Antioch, where Philip is said to have been left in charge and to be in rebellion. This is probably not true, because Antiochus IV had designated Philip to be regent, but Lysias, who had Antiochus V in his care, usurped the office. Antiochus V would hardly have put Philip in charge while he went off to Judea. Philip is simply in rebellion, and the king must return to Syria to defend his throne.

Before he does so, he reaches a truce with the Jews (v. 23). He appoints Judas as military and civil administrator of the territory between Ptolemais (modern Haifa) and the Egyptian border. Not everyone is pleased with the outcome of this expedition (vv. 25-26), but Lysias defends the treaty. However, the opposition to the treaty and the particular circumstances that brought it about may alert the reader that Judas' troubles are not yet over.

B. The Final Defeat of Nicanor

2 Macc 14:1–15:36

14:1-11 Alcimus is antagonistic toward Judas. In 162 or 161 B.C.E., Demetrius, son of Seleucus IV, arrived in Syria to challenge Antiochus for the throne. A change in government could be expected to prompt new requests from the Hellenizing party in Jerusalem. A possible spokesman for this group is Alcimus, who seems to have been appointed high priest by Antiochus V to succeed Menelaus. Once Antiochus was no longer the king, Alcimus would have to be confirmed in office by Demetrius, the new king. 2 Maccabees accuses Alcimus of willfully incurring defilement at the time of the revolt, but no specifics are given.

Alcimus approaches Demetrius with gifts but keeps silent (v. 4). Later when he is invited to a council meeting by the king, he names the Hasideans, led by Judas, as the ones who consistently foment rebellion. (Elsewhere the Hasideans and Judas do not always agree on goals or strategies.) Alcimus objects that they are the ones who keep him from exercising his high priesthood. His speech to the king covers all the rules of Greek rhetoric, including the explanation that his first concern is for the king's interests, and his second, for his people's interests. He gives the king the opportunity to make an independent evaluation of the situation, but at least some of the people attending the meeting heartily agree with Alcimus' assessment of the Judean problem.

14:12-25 Judas and Nicanor. Nicanor, someone familiar with the Judean scene, is sent to kill Judas and restore Alcimus to the temple. Once again, the author makes clear that the violation of the treaty does not come from Judas but from a sinner within the community, in collusion with Syrian authorities. There will be another attack on the temple and its territory. The Gentiles in Judea rally to Nicanor, while the Jews lament and pray for God's help. Judas takes the initiative and decides to encounter Nicanor, but, after a brief skirmish, Nicanor (perhaps like Lysias on an earlier occasion) opts for a non-military solution to the problem. Working first through emissaries, the two leaders finally meet and agree to a truce.

At this point something curious occurs in the narrative. Nicanor moves to Jerusalem, where he behaves quite appropriately. He develops a fondness for Judas and keeps him in his company (vv. 23-24). Judas even follows Nicanor's suggestions, marries, and settles down. Although 1 Maccabees presents Nicanor as a crafty, untrustworthy foe, 2 Maccabees first describes him as fond of Judas, and only later does he become untrustworthy and dangerous.

14:26-36 Alcimus plots against Judas. Naturally Alcimus is not pleased with the progress of events. Taking a copy of the agreement between Nicanor and Judas, Alcimus goes directly to Demetrius and tries to convince the king that Nicanor and Judas are plotting against the throne. The king is understandably angry, but rather than accuse Nicanor of treason, he simply demands that he capture Judas and transport him to Antioch.

This puts Nicanor in a difficult position, and he wrestles with the dilemma long enough for Judas to realize that something amiss is developing. He gathers some associates and escapes (v. 30). Nicanor becomes very angry that Judas has outwitted him and at the same time put him in a very difficult position with his king. Ignoring the right of sanctuary, Nicanor looks for Judas in the temple precincts and, not finding him there, raises his right hand and his voice against the temple, threatening it with destruction. The reader, remembering the opening chapters of this book and the story line to this point, can readily anticipate the outcome of Nicanor's threats.

14:37-46 The story of Razis. Razis, a man of important standing in the community, becomes Nicanor's next intended victim. Despite his status in the community and his reputation as one who stood up to earlier persecution, the reason why he is singled out is not clear. Perhaps Nicanor suspects that Razis knows where Judas is to be found. Although he sends a sizable force to arrest Razis, the effort fails because Razis commits suicide rather than allowing himself to be taken (v. 4). (He may have done so to avoid revealing under torture where Judas was hiding.) Although suicide was not common in ancient Judaism, neither was it unknown (see 2 Sam 17:23). Seemingly, it was not considered sinful, and in desperate situations might have been thought of as morally allowable. In this narrative, Razis' defiance of Nicanor fits the tenor of these chapters, despite the gruesome details.

15:1-5 Nicanor blasphemes against the sabbath. The reader learns that Judas has escaped to Samaria. Nicanor decides to attack on the sabbath, but some Jews in his party plead with him not to act like a barbarian but to respect this day of rest. His answer is filled with arrogance, implying that the one who decreed the sabbath should keep to heaven while Nicanor is ruler on earth. In effect, Nicanor has challenged the God of Israel. Such arrogance is a prime target for God's punishment.

15:6-16 Onias III and Jeremiah appear to Judas in a dream. Judas, meanwhile, rallies his troops in a way reminiscent of the holy war, while adding the story of a dream he had in which Onias III, a respected former high priest, appeared praying for the Jewish community. When another figure also appeared, Onias introduced him to Judas as the great prophet Jeremiah, who also was praying for the people and Jerusalem. Jeremiah gave Judas a golden sword, in accordance with his frequent threats of sending a sword against Israel or its enemies (see Jer 50:35-37, for example). The sword comes from God, he says, and with it Judas would destroy his enemies. This is a familiar motif in ancient literature; the offer of the special weapons gives divine assurance of ultimate victory.

15:17-35 Defeat of Nicanor. With such backing the Jewish forces decide to attack the enemy, primarily to defend the city, the temple, and its sacred vessels. In reality they are also concerned about the Hellenizing party's gaining control once again over Jerusalem and the temple. In proximate preparation for the decisive battle, Judas prays for divine help, reminding God of the defeat of Sennacherib by Hezekiah (2 Kgs 18:13–19:35; Isa 36–37). Martial music accompanies Nicanor's troops; liturgical prayer accompanies Judah's (vv. 25-26). The Jews fight the enemy with hands and hearts, and they are once again victorious, with God's help. Gloating over the dead Nicanor follows; his head and right arm are displayed opposite the temple, against which he had risen both in defiance and blasphemy.

The narrative ends with the celebration of a festival in honor of Nicanor's defeat, similar to the feast of Purim or Mordecai's Day.

EPILOGUE

2 Macc 15:37-39

The epilogue matches the preface. Despite the subject matter, the author states his intention: to delight the ears of the readers. The author, who consistently has argued that the main problems arose within the Jewish community rather than from the Gentiles, ends his book in fairly typical Hellenistic fashion, demonstrating how far the Hellenization process had developed by the time the book was written.

ISAIAH

John J. Collins

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Isaiah presents in a particularly acute way two problems that confront the Christian interpreter of the Old Testament. The first concerns the discrepancy between the surface impression of the text and modern critical reconstructions of its history and meaning. Christian tradition, like Jewish tradition, long regarded the entire book as the work of a single prophet, Isaiah of Jerusalem. Critical scholarship, however, has taught us to distinguish First Isaiah (chs. 1–39), Second Isaiah (chs. 40–55) and Third Isaiah (chs. 56–66). Second and Third Isaiah are now dated to the late sixth century B.C.E., two hundred years after Isaiah of Jerusalem. Moreover, it now appears that less than half of First Isaiah actually contains words of the prophet himself. The remainder was added by anonymous scribes over several hundred years. Jewish legend had it that the prophet Isaiah met his death by being sawn asunder during the reign of the impious King Manasseh. Some conservative Christians have felt that his book has suffered a like fate at the hands of the critics.

The second problem concerns the Christological interpretation of the Old Testament. The Book of Isaiah has been treasured by Christians because it seems to predict crucial elements in the life of Jesus; the most striking examples are the virgin birth in Isa 7 and the passion and death in Isa 53. The book is cited or alluded to more than three hundred times in the New Testament. Jesus himself claimed to fulfill a text from Isaiah (61:1–2) in his sermon at Nazareth (Luke 4:18). Yet, critical scholarship has insisted that we must first understand the biblical texts in their own historical context. Isaiah had a message for the people of his own time, and this message did not require foreknowledge of events that would happen several hundred years later. The use of Isaiah by the Gospel writers tells us about the faith of the early Christians rather than the prophet's own message.

Critical scholarship, then, has cast doubt on the unity of the Book of Isaiah and on the Christian belief that it predicts Christ. Both these points have been shocking for Christians, although the shock has worn off, except in very conservative circles. Yet, the critical approach to the Bible should not be seen as a negative development. It has enriched our understanding of the Scriptures by showing how "the word of the Lord" is rooted in and speaks to concrete historical situations. The Bible is not a book of dogmatic propositions to be learned and believed, but a moving illustration of the faith of a people in ever-changing circumstances. If we know how an oracle conveyed its message in its original setting, we then have a guide to the way it should be understood in other settings. We cannot fully appreciate Matthew's use of the Immanuel prophecy (Matt 1:23) unless we understand the message Isaiah was delivering to King Ahaz when he originally spoke it (Isa 7:10–17).

For those who have mastered it, historical criticism has been a tremendously liberating force, for it has brought to light many aspects of biblical faith that had been submerged by the dogmatic theology of a later age. We now recognize, however, that a purely historical approach is also limited. In the case of Isaiah, we simply do not know the historical setting of some oracles, or we know it only in a very general way. Besides, the power of some passages lies in the fact that they transcend their original situations; they express fundamental hopes, fears, or insights that are applicable in recurring situations. The great messianic prophecies of Isaiah fall into this category. A passage like Isa 11, which dreams of a day when the wolf will lie down with the lamb, articulates a universal yearning for peace that is not peculiar to any historical situation. In this commentary we will try to do justice both to the historical particularity and to the universality of Isaiah's prophecies.

The composition of the book

Fundamental to the critical understanding of Isaiah is the insight that chapters 40–66 cannot be the work of Isaiah of Jerusalem but come from a much later time. Not only do these chapters predict the restoration of Jerusalem after the Babylonian Exile, but they presuppose the Exile itself. Second Isaiah presupposes that the Exile is already at an end. Third Isaiah (chs. 56–66) presupposes that the Jewish community has already returned to Judea. The issue, then, is not whether the prophet Isaiah could have predicted events of a much later time; the fact that the later events are presupposed is a sure indication of the time when these chapters were written.

Even within First Isaiah there is much material that was added later. Chapters 13–23 consist of oracles against various nations. Only a few passages in these chapters (for example, ch. 20) are likely to have come from the time of Isaiah himself. Chapters 24–27 constitute the so-called "Apocalypse of Isaiah." These chapters are no earlier than the Babylonian Exile and may even be later than Third Isaiah. Chapters 34–35 come from the sixth century, about the time of Second Isaiah. Finally, chapters 36–39 are taken, with very little modification, from 2 Kgs 18–20. The original oracles of Isaiah are found primarily in chapters 1–12 and 28–33 (plus a few passages in chapters 13–23). Even these chapters have come to us through the hands of editors who left their mark by the arrangement of the material and by minor insertions. (Most of the editorial work can be placed after the Exile, but some may have been associated with the reform of King Josiah in 621 B.C.E.) The Book of Isaiah, then, is not a monograph by an individual author but the collection of an ongoing tradition that spanned more than two hundred years.

The prophet Isaiah

At the origin of this tradition stands Isaiah of Jerusalem. The superscription in Isa 1:1 tells us that he prophesied "in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of Judah." The great vision in chapter 6, which is usually thought to mark the beginning of his prophetic activity, is dated to the year of Uzziah's death, probably 742 B.C.E. We know that he was active late in Hezekiah's reign at the time of an Assyrian invasion in 701 B.C.E. (described in Isa 36–38). His career, then, spanned roughly the second half of the eighth century B.C.E. His contemporaries included the prophets Amos, Hosea, and Micah.

Isaiah's career was marked by a series of crises caused by the military encroachment of the great superpower of the East, Assyria. The first great crisis, in the years 735–733 B.C.E., was the Syro-Ephraimite war. Syria joined forces with the northern kingdom of Israel (Ephraim) to form an alliance against the Assyrians. When King Ahaz of Judah refused to join, they mounted a campaign against him with a view to deposing him and installing a more cooperative king. This was the occasion of Isaiah's famous Immanuel prophecy. Ahaz appealed to Assyria for help. In 733 B.C.E. Samaria, the capital of northern Israel, was forced to submit. Ahaz remained king in Jerusalem as a subject of Assyria.

The next great crisis came about a decade later. The northern kingdom of Israel rebelled against Assyria, and in 722 B.C.E. Samaria was destroyed. Its population was deported and foreign settlers were brought in. The northern kingdom of Israel ceased to exist. This catastrophe may be prophesied in Isa 28:1-4.

Judah was again in danger in 713 B.C.E., when the Philistine city of Ashdod rebelled against the Assyrians. Isa 20 records the activity of Isaiah on this occasion.

Finally, in 701 B.C.E., Hezekiah of Judah revolted and provoked the famous campaign of Sennacherib. Most of the southern kingdom was ravaged. The Assyrian king boasted that he shut up Hezekiah in Jerusalem "like a bird in a cage." Yet Jerusalem was not destroyed, and Hezekiah remained on the throne. The prose account in Isa 36–38 attributes the deliverance of Jerusalem to "the angel of the Lord" (37:36).

This succession of crises plays some part in the ordering of the material in First Isaiah. Chapters 6–8, which are widely thought to be a memoir from Isaiah himself (see 8:16), clearly belong to the early period. Some material in chapters 10–23 can be attributed to the middle period, between 722 and 701 B.C.E. The oracles in chapters 28–32 relate to the time of Sennacherib. Some scholars think that the oracles in chapters 2–5, which deal primarily with social abuses, belong to the earliest period of the prophet's activity, before the Syro-Ephraimite war, at a time when Amos was making similar charges in northern Israel, but there is no clear evidence of their date.

The politics of Isaiah

Isaiah's preaching is directly concerned with the events of the day. He denounces the luxury of those who join house to house and field to field and of the women who parade in jewelry. His ideal seems to be the simple way of life in which people can live on curds and honey, the natural produce of the land. He does not see the loss of the vineyards—a source of wealth and luxury—as a great catastrophe. He certainly does not urge his people to fight to defend them; rather, he advocates a quietistic, pacifistic stance in the face of the Assyrian threat.

Isaiah's ideal of social simplicity was not conceived in rustic isolation. He was an urban prophet familiar with the temple (ch. 6). He had access to the king as a kind of political advisor, both in the early days of the Syro-Ephraimite war and in the time of Sennacherib at the end of his career. He was an educated man, as we can see from his mastery of Hebrew verse and from his familiarity with international politics. His social and political vision did not arise from naïveté but from his fundamental theological convictions.

Theological principles

At the heart of Isaiah's prophecy is his vision of God as "the Holy One of Israel," which is presented most vividly in chapter 6. The holiness of God shows up the inherent sinfulness of humanity. The power of the spirit contrasts with the powerless flesh (Isa 31). The emphasis on God's holiness is rooted in the praise of God's glory in the temple cult (compare Psalms 29, 93, 96–99). For Isaiah, the exaltation of God is the corollary of human finitude. Human pretensions to power are pathetic and doomed to failure. Consequently, Isaiah is very critical of the attempts of the Judean kings to play power politics or even to control their own destinies. He is in conflict with the sages, the professional advisers of the king, whose plans are overridden by the "plan of the Holy One of Israel" (5:19).

The central demand of Isaiah is for faith in this God. "Unless your faith is firm," he tells Ahaz, "you shall not be firm!" (7:9). Faith here means trust and reliance on God rather than on one's own resources. The context for this faith is provided by the royal ideology of the Davidic house. The divine charter of the dynasty is provided by the oracle of Nathan to David, recorded in 2 Sam 7. There the Lord promises David:

> I will establish a house for you. . . . I will raise up your heir after you, sprung from your loins, and I will make his kingdom firm. . . . And I will make his royal throne firm forever. I will be a father to him, and he shall be a son to me. And if he does wrong, I will correct him with the rod of men and with human chastisements; but I will not withdraw my favor from him as I withdrew it from your predecessor Saul, whom I removed from my presence. Your house and your kingdom shall endure forever before me; your throne shall stand firm forever (2 Sam 7:11-16).

One of the terms used to express the "firmness" of the dynasty is derived from the same root as the word for "faith."

The promise to David is the basis for a theology of kingship found in the psalms. The essential points are found in Psalm 2. If the kings of the earth rise up against the Lord and "his anointed" (the king), God will laugh at them, for "I myself have set up my king on Zion, my holy mountain" (Ps 2:6). The decree of the Lord is then proclaimed: "You are my son; this day I have begotten you" (Ps 2:7). This special father-son relationship is reaffirmed in Psalm 110, where the king is invited to "Sit at my right hand till I make your enemies your footstool" (Ps 110:1). The king can even be addressed as "God" (Ps 45:7), although he is clearly subordinate to the God who blesses him. The king is hailed as God's representative without reservation.

This glorification of the monarchy presumes certain responsibilities. The king is supposed to act "in the cause of truth and for the sake of justice" (Ps 45:5), to defend the afflicted and crush the oppressor (Ps 72). The whole ideology assumes and demands a very high degree of trust and reverence for the kingship (compare also Pss 89, 132).

Trust in the kingship goes hand in hand with trust in Mount Zion, the site of the temple in Jerusalem, as the dwelling place of God. Later Jewish theology might qualify the idea that God actually lived in the temple (1 Kgs 8:27; compare Isa 66:1; Acts 7:48), but Psalm 46 declares that it is "the holy dwelling of the Most High. God is in its midst; it shall not be disturbed" (Ps 46:5-6). The people of Jerusalem need not fear, "though the earth be shaken," because "the Lord of hosts is with [them]" (Ps 46:3, 8; compare Psalm 48). The worshiper in the temple could hope to see God's power and glory (see Ps 63:3), as indeed Isaiah does (Isa 6). The rhetoric of the temple worship, then, proclaims that the people need fear no adversary, because they have God's presence in their temple and God's support for their king.

This theology of kingship and temple provides the context for Isaiah's faith. (Unlike his contemporaries Amos and Hosea, Isaiah does not draw upon the tradition of the Exodus.) Isaiah demands that king and people alike live by the faith they profess. But this was not so easy when the Assyrian army was at the door. Isaiah is not so naive as to think that God will obligingly protect the people from all harm. He recognizes the extent of the suffering and destruction that will be inflicted, but he insists that life will go on. God will leave the people a remnant.

This theme of Isaiah's message, proclaimed in the name of his son Shear-jashub ("A remnant shall return," 7:3), is at once both good news and bad news. The remnant will ensure the survival of the people, but only after widespread destruction; it will be like the survival of a stump when a tree has been cut down. From this stump will come an ideal ruler in a future time (ch. 11), and Mount Zion will be exalted as a center for all peoples in days to come (ch. 2).

The ideal king and ideal temple are future ideals for Isaiah. They highlight the shortcomings of the present rulers and present cult. Isaiah affirms his faith in the royal theology but prevents it from serving as political propaganda for the kings of his day.

The political theology of Isaiah uses the popular traditions in an ironic way. The irony is best captured in the symbolic name Immanuel. "God is with us" was the professed faith of the Davidic line. For Isaiah, however, this is not a guarantee of easy salvation. The presence of God can be mediated by the sword of the Assyrian, the rod of Yahweh's anger (10:5). Salvation, for Isaiah, is not identical with wealth and prosperity, but with the purified worship of God. The people might, ironically, be better off when reduced to a remnant, stripped of their vineyards and forced to rely on curds and honey like the first Israelites.

Isaiah's quietistic stance goes hand in hand with his social criticism. The people who tried to survive by alliances with Egypt or who relied on horses, the armaments of their day (Isa 31), were the same people who joined house to house and field to field and got drunk on the produce of their vineyards. These were the people who stood to gain from national independence, who had something to fight for. Ironically, Judah and Israel were vulnerable to Assyrian greed because they had a measure of wealth and luxury. If they lived the simpler life, without wealth or power, they would be left in peace. The ideal kingdom sketched in Isa 11 is not a powerful empire, but one of peace and simplicity.

We can appreciate why the early Christians saw correspondences between Isaiah's prophecies and the kingdom proclaimed by Jesus. Two thousand years later Isaiah's political ideals have lost none of their relevance to the issues of international politics and the welfare of society.

Second Isaiah

The prophet we know as Second Isaiah worked in a very different situation. In the early years of the sixth century B.C.E., the kingdom of Judah had finally collapsed. In 586 B.C.E. Jerusalem was destroyed by the Babylonians. King Zedekiah had seen his sons slain before his eyes and was then blinded and taken in fetters to Babylon with the leaders of his people. The Jewish people were decimated, and the survivors humiliated. Some Jews saw this catastrophe as a punishment for their sins, but many must have wondered whether their God enjoyed any control over the course of events at all.

Then hope came from an unexpected quarter. The Persian king Cyrus entered Babylon as conqueror in 539 B.C.E. Within a year he had authorized the Jewish exiles to return home. This decree was consistent with Cyrus' generally tolerant policies toward subject peoples. He presented himself to the Babylonians as a liberator who was granted his triumph by the god of the Babylonians, Marduk. To the Jews he proclaimed that it was the Lord, the God of heaven, who had sent him, and that the Lord had also charged him to rebuild the temple in Jerusalem (so Ezra 1:1-4). Second Isaiah, elated at the unexpected deliverance, gladly proclaimed that Cyrus was the anointed ("messiah") of Yahweh (Isa 45:1).

The oracles of Second Isaiah are written in celebration of this deliverance and attempt to reformulate the faith of Israel in light of it. They consist of short hymnic units. It is not clear whether they have been arranged in a deliberate order. Chapter 40 is certainly an introduction to the collection and establishes several of its main themes. Some scholars find a shift at chapter 49. Chapters 49–55 are somewhat more sober in tone than chapters 40–48. They abandon some characteristic themes of the earlier chapters, such as the polemic against idolatry and disputes with the Babylonians. The later chapters show a strong interest in Zion. The differences, however, do not lead us to suppose that chapters 49–55 have a setting different from that of chapters 40–48. All these oracles were delivered after the rise of Cyrus and before the practical problems of the restoration had become apparent. They were probably written in Babylon.

Four of the short poems that make up Second Isaiah are commonly set apart as the "Servant Songs": Isa 42:1-4; 49:1-6; 50:4-9; 52:13–53:12. These passages are distinguished by their focus on the figure called "the Servant of Yahweh." Scholars of an earlier generation thought that these oracles were the work of a different prophet, but that view is now widely rejected. It is also doubtful whether they even represent a distinct, late stage in the composition of the book, as is sometimes claimed. Rather, they should be seen as an integral part of the collection that makes up Second Isaiah and interpreted in that context.

Theological themes

Second Isaiah, no less than Isaiah of Jerusalem, celebrates the transcendent power of God, before whom all flesh is like grass. He relates this to two distinctive themes.

First, Yahweh, God of Israel, is the Creator of all, the first and last, and there is no God besides Yahweh. Second Isaiah affirms that Yahweh alone is God in a more emphatic manner than any other biblical writer. Earlier biblical writers admit the existence of other gods but forbid the Israelites to worship them. Even Second Isaiah does not deny the existence of Babylonian gods (for example, Bel and Nebo—46:1), but he views them as helpless idols that have no power to save, and so they are in effect "no-gods." The monotheism of Second Isaiah is the basis for his highly sarcastic polemic against the worship of idols. All nations are obligated to serve Yahweh, since Yahweh is Creator of all.

Second, this Creator-God is the redeemer of Israel who buys it back from a state of slavery. This theme is based on the idea that Yahweh is bound to Israel by bonds of kinship. It also goes hand in hand with the prophet's view that the liberation from Babylon is a new Exodus.

The theme of the new Exodus is introduced already in 40:3: "In the desert prepare the way of the Lord!" The prophet is not interested in the Exodus as ancient history but as the myth or paradigm that reveals what God is like in the present. Yahweh is a God who liberates slaves, who overturns the status quo. Yahweh is a hidden God (45:15) whose ways may be obscure for a time but who will then be revealed in unexpected ways.

Undoubtedly the best known theme of Second Isaiah is the portrayal of the figure of the Suffering Servant, especially in the great Servant Song of Isa 53. This passage has attracted much attention because it has traditionally been taken as a prophecy of the passion of Jesus, and indeed it played some part in the early Christian understanding of Jesus' death. The original significance of this figure for the Jews of the sixth century is still in dispute. The Servant has been identified with a wide range of historical figures from Moses to Zerubbabel (the governor at the time of the restoration and heir to the Davidic throne) or even the prophet himself. More probably, however, the Servant was not a historical individual but an idealized representation of the faithful Jews in exile.

The Servant poems, then, can be read as Second Isaiah's explanation of the Babylonian captivity. The view that the Jews were being punished for their sins is inadequate. They had received double for all their sins (40:2). Rather, their suffering had a positive purpose; they were to serve as a light to the nations. It was the infirmities of the other nations that they bore. Their lives were an offering for the sins of the Gentiles. Second Isaiah believed that the unexpected restoration of the Jews would bring the other nations to their senses and lead them to acknowledge Yahweh as the true God. In this he was disappointed, but the Suffering Servant persisted as a model of piety that has had profound influence on both Jewish and Christian spirituality.

Third Isaiah

Isa 56–66 is closely related to Second Isaiah but comes from a slightly later period, after the exiles had returned to Jerusalem and discovered the harsh realities of the situation. Some of the oracles, especially chapters 60–62, still resound with the enthusiasm of Second Isaiah; other passages, however, attest to deep divisions within the postexilic community and a sense of near desperation on the part of the prophet (chs. 63–66). Yet, out of these circumstances emerged the powerful vision of a new heaven and a new earth (65:17) that would be picked up later by the author of the Book of Revelation in the New Testament. These chapters raise fundamental issues concerning the priorities of a community in difficult times and the nature of true worship.

The so-called "Apocalypse of Isaiah"

The oracles that were inserted into First Isaiah at chapters 24–27 resemble Third Isaiah in their sense of near desperation with the present and desire for a radically different future. They are called "the Apocalypse of Isaiah" because of their heavy reliance on mythological symbols, which is a well-known feature of apocalyptic literature. They are not cast in the particular form of an apocalypse, however, which is a supernatural revelation, usually a vision mediated by an angel (see Dan 7–12). These chapters are prophetic oracles from an unknown prophet. They are often thought to reflect the further deterioration of the postexilic community after the time of Third Isaiah, perhaps about 500 B.C.E. Some scholars put the date much later, even as late as 300 B.C.E.

The difficulty of establishing a firm date for these chapters in itself tells us something about their nature. The heavy reliance on mythical symbols has a generalizing effect. These oracles provide a cluster of metaphors for a recurring type of situation. (This is also true of some of the oracles against the nations in Isa 13–23.) The portrayal of cosmic devastation in Isa 24 is as apt in an age of ecological crisis and nuclear threat as it was at any time in the ancient world. The hope that God "will destroy death forever" and "wipe away the tears from all faces" (25:8) remains the ultimate human aspiration.

Within the Book of Isaiah these chapters form a conclusion to the oracles against the nations by moving away from particular denunciations to more general, cosmic descriptions of judgment and salvation.

The unity of Isaiah

It is easier to show that the various parts of the Book of Isaiah come from different periods than to provide an explanation as to why they were all combined under Isaiah's name. Some scholars are willing to suppose that it was sheer accident, that material copied on a single scroll came to be regarded as a single book. The more plausible suggestion is that the later writers considered themselves part of an Isaianic tradition. Despite the differences between the various sections, there are some basic themes that run throughout. These include:

—the centrality of the holy mountain of Zion;

—a reliance on mythical symbolism to express the hopes (and fears) for the future;

—a yearning for universal peace that involves not only Israel but the right ordering of all nations.

All these themes are related to the cult of the Jerusalem temple. It may be that the continuity of the Isaianic tradition is simply that it is a Jerusalem tradition and that "all the Isaiahs" drew on a tradition of cultic piety. We will find that this is true even when the prophets were sharply critical of current cultic practice, for example in Isa 1 and 66. There are also some indications that later "Isaianic" writers drew motifs and allusions from the earlier Isaianic corpus; for example, the oracle on the vineyard in Isa 27 builds on the "song of the vineyard" in chapter 5. In the "new creation" of Isa 65 the wolf and the lamb will graze together, as in the messianic prophecy of Isa 11.

The fondness for mythical symbolism and ideal representations throughout the Book of Isaiah has lent itself to reinterpretation by subsequent generations. The general character of the messianic prophecies allowed the early Christians to see their fulfillment in Jesus. This classical Christian reinterpretation of Isaiah should not, however, cause us to ignore the fundamental messages of these writings in their historical contexts; nor should it distract us from seeking analogies between the prophet's situation and our own or from asking how his religious ideals can be correlated with our modern problems.

COMMENTARY: FIRST ISAIAH (Isa 1–39)

INTRODUCTORY PROPHECY

Isa 1:1-31

The opening chapter singles out the themes of judgment and salvation, which are characteristic of the whole book. It contains some oracles of the original Isaiah but has been edited as an introduction to the collection of oracles. The editor probably wrote after the fall of Jerusalem in the sixth century B.C.E. His message is simple: Whatever disasters befell Jerusalem are a punishment for infidelity; but if the people repent and are obedient, they will again eat the good things of the land.

1:1 The superscription. The "vision" here refers to the entire revelation of Isaiah, most of which is in verbal form. The prophet's father, Amoz, should not be confused with the prophet Amos, whose career overlapped Isaiah's. The reigns of the kings listed cover most of the second half of the eighth century. If Isaiah's career began in the year of Uzziah's death, the probable dates are 742–701 B.C.E.

1:2-8 Judah devastated. The description of Zion, "left like a hut in a vineyard" (1:8), recalls the boast of the Assyrian king Sennacherib that he had shut up Hezekiah of Judah "like a bird in a cage," and may refer to the same situation in 701 B.C.E. Isaiah, however, does not put the blame on the Assyrians but on the Judeans themselves: "They have forsaken the Lord, spurned the Holy One of Israel" (1:4). The opening line, "Hear, O heavens, and listen, O earth" (1:2), introduces an indictment for breach of covenant in Deut 32:1. In this case, however, there is no appeal to the Sinai covenant or to the Exodus from Egypt. Instead, the prophet appeals to an instinctive natural law: if an ox and ass can know their master, then Israel should know its God and know what is right. The prophet's concern is not merely with the breach of specific laws but with the lack of a proper religious attitude that should inform all of life.

Verse 9 introduces the theme of the remnant. It is a small remnant, ensuring survival, but little more.

1:10-16 An oracle on true worship. This oracle begins with a mention of Sodom and Gomorrah, and is placed here because the same cities are mentioned in verse 9. Sodom and Gomorrah were the cities of the Plain, destroyed by fire from heaven because of their corruption (Gen 19). In verse 9 the analogy was with the total way in which they were destroyed. In verse 10 the Judean leaders are addressed as "princes of Sodom" because they are equally corrupt.

The theme of this oracle is true worship. God professes no pleasure in the constant sacrifice of animals or even with the observance of the new moon and sabbath, because "your hands are full of blood!" (1:15), not only because of the sacrifices but because of the violence of their lives. Isaiah is not opposed to ritual as such. He says they need a ritual of washing to symbolize repentance and purification. Ritual, however, is only as good as the intentions it expresses. What matters is how people treat the widows and orphans, not how often they go to the temple or offer sacrifice. A very similar critique of the cult and plea for justice is found in Amos 5:18-27, also from the eighth century B.C.E.

1:18-20 Call to repentance. This brief insertion has the tone of the law in Deuteronomy and expresses succinctly the message of the editor. Rather than just proclaim judgment or salvation, as the prophet typically does, it sets a goal for repentance and so emphasizes human responsibility. The assumption that obedience ensures prosperity is naive, however, and was sharply criticized in the later biblical tradition, most obviously in the Book of Job but also in Second Isaiah.

1:21-31 Redemption by judgment. The chapter concludes with a threat of punishment for political and social corruption. The main point to note is that the punishment is seen as redemptive, like the refining of metals by fire. Zion will be purified. The experience will be severe, but it is necessary if the cherished claims to justice and faithfulness are to be rendered appropriate.

ORACLES AGAINST JERUSALEM AND JUDAH

Isa 2:1–12:6

These chapters are given a new introduction in 2:1 and gather oracles that are mainly from the early period of Isaiah's activity. We may distinguish the rather general social oracles of chapters 2–5, the memoir of Isaiah in chapters 6–8, the messianic oracles in chapters 9 and 11 (separated by oracles on Samaria and Assyria), and a concluding psalm in chapter 12, which may have marked the conclusion of a distinct collection.

2:2-5 The future of Mount Zion. Verses 2-4 are duplicated almost exactly in Mic 4:1-3. Micah, like Isaiah, was an eighth-century prophet of the southern kingdom. We do not know which prophet, if either, composed this oracle. The prospect of nations streaming to Mount Zion is often related to the pilgrimages of Jewish exiles to Jerusalem in the postexilic period. Even in the pre-exilic period, however, Mount Zion was considered to be a sacred mountain, the center of the earth, and important for the whole world (see Psalms 46–48).

In the lifetime of Isaiah, King Hezekiah is said to have tried to destroy the "high places" where people worshiped outside of Jerusalem and to centralize the cult (2 Kgs 18; 2 Chr 31). Samaria and the northern kingdom had recently been destroyed, and Hezekiah was trying to rally the survivors to Jerusalem. Isa 2:2-5 would make good sense in this context. The "house of Jacob" that is invited to walk in the light of the Lord (v. 5) certainly includes the northern kingdom of Israel.

This vision of the future of Zion already contains the idea that Israel is a light to the nations, a theme we will meet again in Second Isaiah. The Israelites are not told to go out to convert the nations but to attract them by their worship on Zion. In the ideal world of the future time, all nations will come together to the central city of Jerusalem. Recognition of the claims of Jerusalem is the converse of recognition of Yahweh as sovereign. This recognition and the acceptance of Yahweh's instruction are seen as the keys to world peace, when swords will be beaten into ploughshares.

Whatever the origin of this oracle, it introduces themes we will meet repeatedly in the Book of Isaiah and is in harmony with the great messianic prophecy of Isa 11. We should note that the prophet Joel (Joel 4:10) inverts the great vision of peace and bids the nations beat their ploughshares into swords in anticipation of battle on the day of the Lord. Neither prophecy should be taken as a prediction of the future; both are projections of basic human hopes and fears.

2:6-22 The Day of the Lord. This long oracle begins by giving reasons why God has abandoned the people, the house of Jacob (probably the northern kingdom, which was conquered by the Assyrians in 733 B.C.E. and again decisively in 722 B.C.E.). The offenses include idolatry and pursuit of treasures and armaments. All are symptoms of human pride. In response, God will manifest his majesty "on that day" (v. 11). The "Day of the Lord" is known from a famous passage in Amos 5:18-20. There it appears that most people look forward to the Day of the Lord, but Amos says that it will be "darkness and not light." Most probably it was a festival day

(perhaps during the fall festival of Tabernacles) when God was supposed to be manifested to the cultic community.

Amos suggests that when God is really manifested, most people will not be able to endure it. Similarly, in Isaiah the "day" takes on the character of a battle day when God will rout any foes. The description of the divine manifestation echoes the cultic celebration of the psalms (for example, Psalms 29 and 97) and is related to the tradition of God's kingship. Isaiah is thinking not only of a theophany in the cult, however, but of an occasion when all will flee to caves from the terror of the Lord. It is possible that the terror will be conveyed through the Assyrian invasion, but Isaiah sees it as the manifestation of God. Humanity will then recognize its puny nature before the overwhelming power of God, and the folly of human ambitions to wealth and power will be exposed.

3:1-12 Anarchy in Jerusalem. "That day" will also have effect in Jerusalem. Isaiah sketches a breakdown of the social order. "Hero and warrior," anyone who could lay claim to power is removed. The people will be ruled by mere boys (v. 4), women, or even a babe in arms (v. 12). That "a little child" should be leader may sound idyllic in Isa 11, but here (v. 5) it is a symptom of chaos. There was no such breakdown of order in Isaiah's time. The prophecy is partly a wish and partly an assertion that such a breakdown could happen, and that the pride of the leaders has a shaky foundation.

3:13-15 The accusation. The formal accusation in verses 13-15 focuses on one aspect of that foundation. The political leaders, the elders and princes, have built their wealth by appropriating land and exploiting the poor. A similar theme is characteristic of Amos. We will meet it again in Isa 5.

3:16–4:1 The women of Jerusalem. Isaiah is especially severe on the women. He provides an impressive inventory of their finery. He seems to relish the prospect that their heads would be shaved and they would be led away in sackcloth by the Assyrians (they were not, but it was a distinct possibility). He treats the women as the representatives of the culture of luxury and pride, and therefore especially ripe for a fall. We find a similar attitude in Amos, who called the women of Samaria "cows of Bashan" (Amos 4:1).

4:2-6 The glorious remnant. The final oracle relating to "that day" is probably the work of a later editor. Elsewhere in Isaiah the remnant is not portrayed in such glorious terms. The signs of God's presence—the smoking cloud by day and the flaming fire by night—recall the Exodus tradition, which is also out of character for Isaiah. Yet the passage is developing a genuine theme of Isaiah: Jerusalem must be purged if it is to be holy, but the purge is ultimately the means to salvation.

The "branch of the Lord" here is a general reference to whatever God will cause to grow, synonymous with "the fruit of the earth." The same word is used for a messiah in Jer 23:5; Zech 3:8; 6:12.

5:1-7 The song of the vineyard. This famous poem is a parable, like Nathan's parable in 2 Sam 12 or some of the parables of Jesus. The speaker does not at first disclose his true subject but leads his listeners to pass judgment before they realize that they are condemning themselves. The vineyard involves a double allegory. On the one hand, there is the obvious agricultural sense of the words. On the other hand, the fact that the song is said to be a love song, sung for a friend, suggests that the friend's vineyard is really his wife. There is a hint, then, of marital infidelity as a second level in the allegory. The song is not very explicit about the sins of Israel, except that they involve bloodshed and injustice. The indictment draws its force from the analogy with the unproductive vineyard and the less obvious analogy with marital infidelity. It appears that both kingdoms, Israel and Judah, stand accused.

There is yet another nuance to the allegory. The vineyard was very valuable property that contributed greatly to the life of luxury. It symbolized the wealth of the land. The parable suggests that this wealth has not produced a just society. The threat that the vineyard would be overgrown by thorns and briers was fulfilled rather literally after the Assyrian invasions.

The entire poem may be compared to Hos 2, where God threatens to make the land a wilderness and the analogy with marital infidelity is again present. The vine is a favorite symbol for Israel in the Old Testament: compare Hos 10:1; Jer 2:21; Ezek 15:1-8; 19:10-14. Compare also the parable of the vineyard in the New Testament: Matt 21:33-42; Mark 12:1-10; Luke 20:9-18.

5:8-16 Denunciation of social abuses. These oracles are proclamations of woe and have a dirge-like effect. They do not invite the wicked to repent but are announced as certain and unavoidable. They paint a vivid picture of Israelite society in the eighth century. The large landowners add house to house by foreclosing on debtors or pressuring the smaller farmers off the land (see the story of Naboth's vineyard in 1 Kgs 21). The large estates could then be turned into profitable vineyards, which supported the luxurious (and drunken) lifestyle of the rich rather than supplying the staples of life for the poor. Isaiah insists that those who exalt themselves in this way will be humbled before the majesty of God.

5:17-25 Denunciation of the wise. Isaiah is especially angry at the professional sages, the political advisers of their day. They are skilled in political rhetoric, call evil good and good evil. They indulge in petty corruption, acquitting the guilty for bribes. Besides, being "wise in their own sight" (v. 21), they do not allow for God's control of events or for the ability of a prophet to discern it. Isaiah insists that the "Holy One" has a plan, which will humble human pride. The sages doubt this and challenge God (and Isaiah) to get on with it. They are pragmatic politicians. Isaiah can only retort by proclaiming the wrath of God.

5:26-30 The Assyrian danger. Isaiah's threat that Yahweh would disrupt the plans of the wise was not totally lacking in practical reason. He does not simply envisage a miracle. God would act through a "far-off nation" (5:26). Isaiah was an astute political observer who saw the menace of Assyria and had no illusions that Judean diplomacy would be able to avert disaster. The complacency of the wise and their self-indulgent lifestyle left them vulnerable to a changing political situation.

6:1-13 The call vision of Isaiah. Isaiah's vision, reported in chapter 6, is usually thought to mark the beginning of a memoir (6:1–8:20) that was recorded in the time of the prophet himself. The vision is dated to an early point in his career (742 B.C.E.). Since it involves the commissioning of the prophet, it is usually regarded as his inaugural vision. Hebrew prophets were thought to receive their message in the heavenly council (compare Jer 23:19, which claims that Jeremiah's opponents have not had this experience). Such visions were not necessarily confined to the beginning of a prophet's career. The closest parallel to Isaiah's vision is attributed to a prophet named Micaiah ben Imlah in 1 Kgs 22, and it is not an inaugural vision.

Isaiah makes the astonishing claim that he has seen the Lord. There is some ambiguity in the Bible as to whether a person can see God. In Exod 33:11 we are told that God used to speak to Moses face-to-face, but also that Moses was only allowed to see God's back, since "my face you cannot see, for no man sees me and still lives" (Exod 33:20; compare Isaiah's fear that he is doomed in 6:5). The prophet Ezekiel sums up his own introductory vision as "the vision of the likeness of the glory of the Lord"—a very circumspect claim (Ezek 1:28). Isaiah, by contrast, is perfectly direct: "I saw the Lord" (6:1). The parallel with the vision of Micaiah ben Imlah in 1 Kgs 22 suggests that there was a prophetic tradition that prophets could indeed see God.

Here it must be said that what a prophet sees in a vision is inevitably conditioned by his preconceptions and by the beliefs of his contemporaries. A prophet in the eighth century B.C.E. could have a vision of God because it was believed to be possible, and the report would be accepted by a significant number of his contemporaries. God is envisaged as a king because the king was the most powerful and majestic figure in the prophet's experience. (The similarity between the heavenly and earthly courts is more obvious in 1 Kgs 22.) The seraphim in Isaiah's vision are evidently inspired by the cherubim, the hybrid figures in the Jerusalem temple above which Yahweh was supposed to be enthroned.

Isaiah apparently had this vision in the temple, possibly on a cultic occasion when the house was filled with the smoke of incense. Such an experience may not have been unique to prophets. The psalmist speaks of gazing toward God in the temple "to see your power and your glory" (Ps 63:3). It may be that worshipers hoped for such a vision when they attended worship in the temple. In any case, the claim to have seen God lends considerable authority to the prophet's message. If it comes directly from God, it takes precedence over the claims of any human institution.

The cry of the seraphim expresses Isaiah's central affirmation about God: "Holy, holy, holy" (6:3). The significance of God's holiness is shown in the prophet's immediate confession of impurity. Isaiah does not recall a specific sin. The impurity is inherent in his human condition and endangers him in the presence of God. The remedy is a drastic one: his lips are purified with a burning coal. An analogous remedy will be prescribed for the whole people.

The prophet's vision is never an end in itself. He is not practicing a life of contemplation. Instead, he is given a message that bears on the political situation in Jerusalem. This message is not to save the people; on the contrary, it ensures their doom by making their hearts sluggish. The prophet's job here is to announce the coming judgment, not to bring about the conversion, at least not directly. We may compare Exod 7:3, where God hardens Pharaoh's heart, thereby setting him up for further destruction.

It would seem, then, that the judgment on Judea cannot be avoided. The question raised by the prophet is not "whether" but "how long?" The answer involves the familiar theme of the remnant. Israel will be like a tree that has been cut down, so that only a stump remains. The editorial gloss, "Holy offspring is the trunk" (6:13), gives the prophecy an upbeat ending. It also is in keeping with the thought of Isaiah that this remnant does indeed have a future. Yet the emphasis in chapter 6 is overwhelmingly negative. The good news of the remnant is overshadowed by the destruction of the majority. The destruction will presumably purify the remnant, as the burning coals purified the prophet's lips.

7:1-25 The prophecy of Immanuel. The opening verse of chapter 7 refers to the campaign of Syria (Aram) and northern Israel (Ephraim) against Judah in the reign of Ahaz. The campaign in question took place between 735 and 733 B.C.E. (see 2 Kgs 16) and is known as the Syro-Ephraimite war. Syria and Israel had already been paying tribute to Assyria since 738 B.C.E. but had now decided to revolt by withholding payment. Judah had refused to join the alliance. As yet Ahaz had no quarrel with Assyria, and in any case hopes of success were remote. Israel and Syria then attempted to overthrow Ahaz and replace him with a king more amenable to their wishes.

The royal ideology of the Davidic dynasty professed a sublime confidence that God would protect his chosen king and city. Recall Ps 46:1-4:

> God is our refuge and our strength, > an ever-present help in distress.
> Therefore we fear not, though the earth > be shaken > and mountains plunge into the depths > of the sea . . . .
> The Lord of hosts is with us;
> our stronghold is the God of Jacob.

Such a profession is easily made when there is no immediate danger. Faced with an actual invasion, however, "the heart of the king and the heart of the people trembled, as the trees of the forest tremble in the wind" (7:2).

At this juncture Isaiah goes to meet Ahaz, who is apparently checking his water supply in anticipation of a siege. Isaiah is accompanied by his son, whose name, Shear-jashub, means "a remnant shall return." His advice to the king is startling. He does not suggest the course that Ahaz would eventually take, to appeal to Assyria for help (2 Kgs 16:7). Instead, he tells him to "remain tranquil and do not fear" (7:4) because the attack will not succeed and the state of northern Israel will soon come to an end. (The reference to "sixty years and five" (7:9) has puzzled commentators. It is too far away to have immediate relevance for Ahaz, and besides, Israel was effectively terminated in 722 B.C.E. Some scholars suggest that this verse is a gloss added in 671 B.C.E. when further settlers were brought to Samaria by the Assyrian king Esar-haddon [see Ezra 4:2]. Others suggest that the original text read "six years or five" [so the Jerusalem Bible], but there is no textual evidence for this reading.) The divine commitment to make the Davidic line "firm" (2 Sam 7:16) is conditional on the faith of the king. (In Hebrew the words for "firm" and "believe" are derived from the same root.)

The birth of a child. Isaiah then offers Ahaz a sign and proceeds to give it even when the king refuses to ask for it. The sign is that a young woman will bear a son who will be "living on curds and honey by the time he learns to reject the bad and choose the good"

(7:15). The mother is called an almah in the Hebrew, that is, a young woman of marriageable age, though not necessarily a virgin. The Greek translation of Isaiah used the word parthenos, which means "virgin" unambiguously, and this translation is cited in Matt 1:22-23 and formed the basis of the traditional Christian interpretation of this text as a prophecy of the birth of Christ. The Hebrew, however, does not suggest that the birth in itself was miraculous.

Since the sign was given to Ahaz, we must assume that the young woman in question was known to him. There are two possible identifications. The first is the prophet's wife. We know that the prophet gave symbolic names to his children. The second is the king's wife. The name Immanuel, "God is with us," could serve as a slogan for the Davidic house. While the prophet could predict the name of his own child more confidently, a royal child would be the more effective sign for the king. While either identification is possible, it seems more probable that the woman in question was one of Ahaz's wives.

The child about to be born will be "living on curds and honey by the time he learns to reject the bad and choose the good" (7:15). The translation of this sentence is disputed. It could be that he will live on curds and honey so that he may learn (so the Vulgate). The age of moral discrimination is usually put at about twenty years. According to this interpretation, Immanuel would be brought up on a diet of curds and honey in order to form his moral discrimination. Some scholars, however, think that the age in question may be much lower—three to five years of age. The lower figure seems more probable in view of 7:16: "For before the child learns to reject the bad and choose the good, the land of those two kings whom you dread shall be deserted." If this sign has any urgency, the interval can be no more than a few years.

The meaning of the sign. The diet of curds and honey is evidently part of the sign and illustrates the ambiguity inherent in this whole passage. The land of Israel was proverbially "a land flowing with milk and honey" (Exod 3:8; 13:5; Num 13:27; Josh 5:6). Such food would appear abundant to nomads from the wilderness; it would surely seem spartan to a king accustomed to live in luxury. The implications of the diet of curds and honey can be seen in 7:21-25: those who remain in the land will have to live on its natural produce, since cultivation will be impossible. Curds and honey will be the only available food. The phrase "On that day" (7:20, 21) suggests that the coming destruction is "the day of the Lord," but it is clear that the instrument of destruction is "the razor hired from across the River" (7:20)—the Assyrians.

Isaiah not only predicts that Syria and Israel will be destroyed but also that Judah will suffer "days worse than any since Ephraim seceded from Judah" (7:17). It would seem from 7:18-20 that the real menace to Judah is seen to come from the Assyrians rather than from the Syro-Ephraimite coalition.

What, then, is signified by the birth of Immanuel? Evidently the name "God is with us" is not a promise that God will shelter the king from all harm if only he has faith; rather, it is an ambiguous sign. The presence of God is not always protective. It can also be destructive, as on the "day of the Lord" (see above, chapter 2). Yet it is not entirely destructive. The birth of a child is perhaps the most universal and enduring symbol of hope for the human race. The newborn child does not contribute to military defense or help resolve the dilemmas of the crisis, but he is nonetheless a sign of hope for a new generation. The prophet predicts that he will reach the age of discernment, however bad the times may be. Even if cultivation becomes impossible, people will survive on curds and honey. Moreover, they can recall a time at the beginning of Israel's history when such a diet was seen as a bountiful gift of God. Isaiah prophesies that the vineyards, worth thousands of pieces of silver, will be overgrown with thorns and briers (see the Song of the Vineyard, Isa 5:6). This would be a loss to the ruling class but not necessarily to the common people. The demise of the vineyards might mark a return to a simpler lifestyle, in which Israel and Judah would be less wealthy, but also less torn by social oppression and less entangled in international politics.

Isaiah's advice to Ahaz, then, is to wait out the crisis, trusting not for miraculous deliverance but for eventual survival. The prophet probably feels that there is no need to fight against Syria and Israel, Assyria will take care of them. Sending for aid to Assyria is probably also unnecessary and would bring Judah directly into subjection. In the meantime Judah might be ravaged and reduced to near wilderness, but life would go on, and the society would be purified in the process.

Ahaz, of course, does not follow Isaiah's advice. He sends gold and silver to the king of Assyria and becomes his vassal. Damascus is destroyed. Samaria survives only because a coup puts a new king on the throne, but even then it survives for a mere decade. The politics of Ahaz seem to work well enough for the present, but Isaiah would surely hold that they do not go to the heart of the matter.

The figure of Immanuel in Isa 7 is not presented as a messianic figure, although he probably was a royal child. Nothing is said of his future reign. Instead, he is a symbol of hope in weakness, of new life in the midst of destruction. When early Christianity read this passage as a prediction of the birth of Jesus, it implied an analogy between the two births. In the Gospels, too, a birth in inauspicious circumstances was nonetheless taken as a sign of the presence of God.

8:1-15 Prophecies concerning Assyria. A series of short oracles in chapter 8 throws some light on Isaiah's stance in the crisis of 735–738 B.C.E.

First, the prophet has another child, who becomes a living sign that the Assyrians will plunder Syria and Israel. Unlike Immanuel, this child is explicitly said to be the prophet's son. His relevance to the prophet's prediction, however, is similar: Damascus and Samaria will be destroyed before he begins to talk. The time period is presumably not much less than was implied in the case of Immanuel.

A second short oracle is found in verses 5-10. The people have rejected the waters of Shiloah (a stream in Jerusalem) by not trusting in the divine promises to David and succumbing to fear. The waters of Shiloah flow gently; they are not mighty or threatening. Because the Judeans have not been content with such a passive role, the great river of Assyria, the Euphrates, will flood them. There is pointed irony in this. Ahaz has appealed to Assyria for protection, but the protection of Assyria is overpowering and oppressive in itself. Isaiah is adamant that anyone who resists will be crushed (as indeed they were). The plans of the counselors are in vain, for "With us is God!" (v. 10). Here again the prophet is playing on the name of Immanuel. God is present in the Assyrian onslaught, not with those who resist it.

A third brief oracle in verses 11-15 dismisses political alliances as futile and says that the fear of the people is misplaced—they should fear the Lord. The point here is not only that they should fear the Assyrians as God's weapon but concerns a basic religious attitude. Isaiah renounces all political intrigue and its goal of international power. Yahweh becomes a stumbling block, frustrating the designs of the counselors in Jerusalem as well as Samaria. Isaiah seems to regard political intrigue as sinful in itself. In the context of the Assyrian crisis, he had, at least, good reason to regard the intrigue of the Israelites as ineffectual.

8:16-20 Conclusion of the memoir. This passage gives a rare glimpse of the formation of a prophetic book. The prophet gives instruction that his words be recorded and preserved by his disciples. The memoir (probably chapters 6–8) is, then, a testimony, a public reminder of the prophet's message, like the symbolic names of Isaiah's children. It will be available for consultation, so that people will not need to resort to mediums and fortunetellers (compare the story of Saul in 1 Sam 28). Such signs are necessary when God is "hiding his face from the house of Jacob" (v. 17). At this juncture God was most obviously hidden from the northern kingdom, but Isaiah apparently thinks of all Israel as one people, subject to the God who dwells in Jerusalem on Mount Zion.

8:23–9:6 A new king. The famous prophecy of the birth of a child is properly called a "messianic" prophecy because it describes an ideal king whose reign is still in the future. There is disagreement as to how the oracle was originally understood. It could refer to the birth of a royal child (compare Vergil's famous Fourth Eclogue, which was written to celebrate the birth of the Roman emperor's son). More probably it was a hymn in honor of the enthronement of a new king (compare Ps 2:7, where the king is told the decree of the Lord: "You are my son, this day I have begotten you"). Apparently the king was adopted as "son of God" when he came to the throne. The king in question in Isa 9 is surely Hezekiah, Ahaz's successor, who became king in either 725 or 715 B.C.E. (the evidence is inconsistent). The earlier date would make better sense here.

Isa 8:23 refers to the dismemberment of northern Israel by the Assyrians in 733–732 B.C.E., when three districts were taken away from Samaria and made Assyrian provinces. It is disputed whether the text should be translated as "he has glorified the seaward road" or "he has oppressed" it. If "glorified" is correct, the prophet is anticipating something that has not yet happened. In any case, chapter 9 announces light for those who live in darkness—new hope for the people of northern Israel oppressed by the Assyrians. The prophet says that God has smashed the oppressor "as on the day of Midian" (a battle described in Judg 7). He probably says this in anticipation, because of his confidence in the new king. The hope for northern Israel is found in the arrival of a new Davidic king in Jerusalem and involves the reunification of Israel.

The titles given to the royal "child," especially "God-Hero" (9:5), suggest that he is more than a human being. There can be no doubt, however, that the prophet Isaiah is thinking of an actual king in Jerusalem in the late eighth century B.C.E. The divine titles are part of the royal ideology. Ps 2:7 declares that the king is the begotten son of God, although this is probably understood as a formula of adoption. Ps 45:7 addresses the king as elohim, "god." The king is not considered equal to Yahweh, but he is regarded as a superhuman being.

This king is expected to bring about an era of peace. He will be able to do this because God will give him all the empire governed by David. This, of course, did not come about in the time of Hezekiah, nor has it ever come to pass since then. In the context of Isaiah's message, this is a vision of hope. The glory of the king is still in the future—it is a matter of potential and possibility, not of accomplished fact. The oracle has endured because it formulates a goal of universal peace, which is still desired by humanity.

Christianity applied this prophecy to the birth of Jesus. In doing so, it disregarded the real political concern of Isaiah for the land of Israel. It picked up instead the fact that these wonderful attributes were attached to a child, to one who has no real power in this world. As in chapter 7 the birth of a child symbolizes the hope of humanity for a brighter future. The prophecy affirms that the key to this future lies in justice and innocence rather than in military might.

9:7–10:4 Judgment on the northern kingdom. We have seen that Isaiah is concerned with the northern kingdom of Israel as well as with his own state of Judah. This series of oracles announces God's judgment on the north. The time in question is not clear; it may have been as early as the Syro-Ephraimite war (see 9:20). The grounds for the judgment are partly arrogance (9:8), partly the social injustice implied by the pursuit of luxury, and partly the failure of the Israelites to turn to Yahweh, who, in Isaiah's view, dwells in Jerusalem (8:18). Since no conversion follows the early setbacks of Israel, Yahweh's wrath is not turned back, so worse destruction is to come. The series concludes with a woe-oracle on social injustice that is closely related to the woe-oracles in chapter 5. Some scholars think that material has been displaced and that some verses from chapter 5 originally belonged in chapter 9 (compare the formula in 5:25, which corresponds to 9:11, 16, 20, and 10:4).

10:5-34 The role of Assyria. Pagan Assyria is the rod with which Yahweh chastises Israel. Yet, Assyria is not itself exempt from judgment, since its intention is not to serve Yahweh but to wreak destruction. This oracle is somewhat later than the passages in chapters 7–9. It comes from a time when Jerusalem rather than Samaria was being threatened, either in 713 B.C.E. on the occasion of a revolt by Ashdod or in the better-known invasion of Sennacherib in 701 B.C.E.

The pattern of this oracle is a familiar one in the Bible (see Isa 14; Ezek 27–28). The king of Assyria is guilty of excessive pride, or hybris: "By my own power I have done it, and by my wisdom, for I am shrewd" (v. 13). In Isaiah's view, human power and wisdom accomplish nothing. Assyria is an unwitting helper in the plan of God. The prophet's conviction that Assyria would be broken appears to be based on the divine commitment to Mount Zion. Zion can be struck with a rod (10:24) and so is not protected from all harm. Yet, the ironic quotation of Assyria's claims in 10:8-11 clearly implies that Jerusalem is not like Samaria or other cities and cannot be completely destroyed. So the threatening advance of the Assyrians in verses 28-32 comes close to Jerusalem but stops short of the city. The final assertion of God's majestic power (vv. 33-34) is ambiguous. It is manifested in the subjection of Judah by the Assyrian advance, but it also casts a shadow on the Assyrian success and suggests that it too will be cut off.

The passage on the remnant in verses 20-21 is inserted here because of the occurrence of the word "remnant" in verse 19. The insert shows the typical ambiguity of the remnant: the survivors will be purified and learn to rely on the Lord, but only a remnant will be left. This idea is consistent with the message of Isaiah throughout his career.

11:1-9 The ideal king. The messianic prophecy in chapter 11 refers more obviously to a future time than was the case in chapter 9. It is not apparent that the king in question has even been born. He is described as "a shoot from the stump of Jesse," that is, from the Davidic line (compare Mic 5:1, where the lineage is expressed through a reference to Bethlehem, the home of Jesse). This description does not presuppose that the line had been broken: "stump" is roughly equivalent to "roots" in the parallel line.

The oracle that follows falls into two parts. Verses 2-5 describe the attributes of the king. The spirit of the Lord will be upon him, and he will do all that a righteous king should do. Verses 6-9 describe a transformation of nature in his reign. This description is quite fantastic, as it concerns a transformation of animal nature that no king could achieve. It is like a return to the garden of Eden. The reference to "all my holy mountain" in verse 9 suggests that the whole earth will then partake of the sanctity of Mount Zion.

It should be obvious that this is a poetic passage, a fantasy of an ideal world rather than a prediction of the future. Such friendship between wolf and lamb has never come about, and there is no reason to think that Isaiah expected it would. Rather, the purpose of this passage is twofold. On the one hand, it is a beautiful picture that comforts the reader in the midst of the turmoil of the Assyrian crisis. On the other hand, it paints a picture of what an ideal world would be like. As such, it presents a challenge for any king. Perhaps Isaiah had come to realize that Hezekiah was not an ideal king, despite the hopes expressed in Isa 9. Indeed, what king could possibly measure up to the ideal presented here? Yet the ideal is important. It reminds us of the imperfections of the present and gives us a goal to work toward, even though we may never fully attain it.

The goal expressed in Isa 11:1-9 is perfect peace, without "harm or ruin"(11:9). In such a world "a little child [will] guide them" (11:6). The motif of the child was prominent in chapter 7 and in the imagery of chapter 9 (but see also 3:12). The child as leader is a contradiction of political and military reality. In Isaiah's view, the power and supposed wisdom of human rulers are of little account. What matters is "the knowledge of the Lord" (v. 9) that goes hand in hand with "the fear of the Lord" (v. 2)—single-minded devotion to justice and abandonment of human pretensions and ambitions.

11:10-16 Reunification of Israel. This oracle of restoration comes from a later time when not only Israel but also Judah had been scattered in exile. The point of contact with Isaiah's prophecy lies in the opening reference to the root of Jesse. The image of the "signal" or standard for the nations recalls how the nations are said to stream to Mount Zion in chapter 2, but of course the motif of "a light to the nations" is also prominent in Second Isaiah in the exilic period. Here the restoration is presented as a new Exodus (a motif also repeated by Second Isaiah). By contrast, there are no references to the Exodus in those oracles that are ascribed with any confidence to Isaiah himself. The ideal situation envisaged, however, is quite compatible with the hopes of Isaiah. It looks for a reconciliation of Israel and Judah, and their joint sovereignty over the other nations.

12:1-6 A song of thanksgiving. This short hymn of thanksgiving probably concluded an independent booklet of Isaiah's prophecies. The hymn is the work of an editor, despite the use of the characteristically Isaian phrase "the Holy One of Israel" (12:6). The psalmist looks back on hard times but can now praise God, since the crises are past. The judgment oracles of Isaiah are thus put in perspective, for the editor can view these events with hindsight. The reader, too, is encouraged to put the words of Isaiah, bound as they were to specific situations, in a broader, long-term context.

ORACLES AGAINST VARIOUS NATIONS

Isa 13:1–23:8

The oracles in this section are addressed to various foreign nations but include an oracle against Judah and Jerusalem in 22:1-14 and an oracle against a particular official in 22:15-25. Similar collections of oracles against foreign nations are found in Jer 46–51 and Ezek 25–32 (see also Amos 1:3–2:6; Nahum; Obadiah). The number of such prophecies that have survived shows that it was traditional for prophets to predict doom on other nations (and perhaps thereby bring it about—compare the role of the Moabite seer Balaam, who is called on to curse, or prophesy against, Israel in Num 22–24). Usually the prediction of doom on a nation's enemies carries the implication of blessing for the nation itself.

At least some of these oracles come from a time long after Isaiah (for example, the oracles against Babylon in Isa 13–14). Chapter 20 describes an action in Isaiah's own career, and a few passages may be original oracles of the prophet (for example, 14:24-27; 17:1-11). In several other cases there is no clear evidence of origin. We must allow that Isaiah delivered some oracles against foreign nations, that this collection was expanded, and that much of the present collection may not be from the prophet himself.

The oracles against the nations are of historical interest but offer relatively little religious guidance for the modern reader. Here we will comment only on the more notable passages.

13:1-22 The destruction of Babylon. The occasion envisaged by this prophecy is the fall of Babylon to the Medes and Persians, so it was probably composed about 540 B.C.E. Here the destruction of Babylon is "the day of the Lord," a phrase that can be applied to any manifestation of God in judgment. In verses 10-13 the heavens are darkened and the earth shaken. Yet it is apparent that what the prophet has in mind is a military event, described in gruesomely realistic terms in verse 16. The cosmic effects are metaphorical. They provide vivid images of the collapse, not of the world at large but of the world of the Babylonians. This metaphoric use of cosmic imagery plays an important part in other sections of the book and in later apocalyptic literature.

14:1-22 The king of Babylon. The taunt-song against the king of Babylon is famous for its comparison with "Lucifer, Son of Dawn." The comparison is drawn from an ancient Canaanite myth, where Attar, the Daystar, tries to occupy the throne of Baal. The pattern of the story is a very popular one in the Bible. Whoever tries to rise too high will be cast down lowest of all. In a sense this was already the pattern of the story of Adam and Eve, who were cast out of the garden because they wanted to be like God (see Isa 14:14). The same pattern is found in Ezek 27 and 28. By contrast, the pattern is inverted in the case of Jesus, according to Phil 2. Because he did not deem equality with God something to be grasped at, he received a name above every other name. The model of Lucifer can obviously be applied to many figures in history besides the king of Babylon. (Lucifer in this context is simply the Daystar, a heavenly being, but is not identified as Satan. This model, however, played a part in the popular legend of the fall of Satan from heaven, which was developed by John Milton in Paradise Lost.)

One other aspect of these chapters should be noted. The prophet evidently delights in the overthrow of Babylon. There is a certain amount of vengefulness here and considerable resentment toward the overlord—an emotion that superpowers often arouse in less powerful people. This aspect of the prophecies may not be to everyone's taste, although anyone engaged in a struggle for liberation will surely resonate with it. It may not be the ideal attitude toward our enemies, but it is at least realistic. Few people get through life without such sentiments. It is better to express them than to deny them hypocritically. The taunts against Babylon are echoed in the New Testament Book of Revelation (chs. 17–18) to vent the feelings of some early Christians against Rome.

14:24-27 The destruction of Assyria. This brief oracle appears out of context here. It suggests that God will allow the Assyrian to invade Israel and will break him there. It raises the question of how Isaiah envisaged God's overall plan for Israel and Assyria. We will return to this question later (p. 432).

17:1-11 Oracle against Syria and northern Israel. This passage is an authentic oracle of Isaiah from the time of the Syro-Ephraimite war. The prediction is that Syria and northern Israel will be brought low, so that they will come to respect the Holy One of Israel.

17:12-14 The turbulent nations. Chapter 17 concludes with a general statement on the nations, which has many parallels in the psalms (for example, Psalms 2, 48). The viewpoint in these verses is that of the Jerusalem cult, which Isaiah shared only with qualifications. The presupposition is that Yahweh and the nations are in opposition. The conflict is expressed through a metaphor drawn from Canaanite myth. The Canaanites had a story in which the god Baal, the god of fertility, is challenged by the unruly figure of Yamm (the Sea) but proceeds to trounce him with two clubs. Here the nations are like Yamm, turbulent rebels, but the same fate will befall them. God's ability to rebuke the sea is given as testimony to the divine power in the Old Testament (Nah 1:4; Ps 106:9). The same motif is used to show the divinity of Jesus in the New Testament (Matt 8:23-27 and parallels).

19:1-15 Oracles against Egypt. It is uncertain whether any of these oracles actually come from Isaiah. We should note at least that the taunts against the sages of Egypt in verses 11-15 recall Isaiah's quarrel with the sages of Jerusalem (5:18-25). Isaiah's interest in Egypt comes from the fact that Egypt is a potential ally, and Judah might be tempted to rely on Egyptian aid.

19:16-24 The future of Egypt. The short oracles with which the chapter concludes are less likely to come from Isaiah. They fantasize how in the future Egypt will fear Judah and come to worship the Lord. Here we must recognize the desire of the powerless little state to get the upper hand over its powerful neighbor. We know that there were Jewish temples in Egypt at Elephantine (about 400 B.C.E.) and at Leontopolis (about 150 B.C.E.), although this was contrary to the law in Deuteronomy. It is unlikely that the passage in Isaiah had either of these in mind. It is simply indulging in a fantasy about the conversion of the Gentiles. Verses 23-24 add another fantasy—that one day Israel will rank as a third world power with Egypt and Assyria. This fantasy was never realized (at least until modern times!). It is strangely in contradiction to the ideals of Isaiah as we have seen them in chapters 2–11, where he held that Judah would be better off to renounce all ambition in the international arena.

20:1-6 A naked prophet. Symbolic actions were a favorite device of the prophets to dramatize their message. Hosea married a harlot. Ezekiel performed numerous strange acts, including the use of dung to cook his food (Ezek 4). Here we find that Isaiah went naked for three years at the time of the rebellion of Ashdod (713 B.C.E.). This was a sign that Egypt and Ethiopia would fall to Assyria, and the captives would be led away naked.

The symbolic action is a kind of street theatre. It grabs the attention and presents the passerby with a visual image more powerful than any speech. How the people react is, of course, up to them. First they must find out what the sign means, then decide what to do about it. In this case the sign is not performed for the benefit of Egyptians or Ethiopians; rather, it is meant to show the people of Judah and the coastland the folly of relying on Egyptian aid. Egypt was not in fact conquered, but it did not protect the rebels either. Isaiah's warning was justified.

21:1-10 The fall of Babylon. Yet another oracle on the fall of Babylon in the sixth century is inserted here. Two points should be noted. The phrase "Fallen, fallen is Babylon," (21:9) is picked up and applied to Rome in Rev 18:2. The significance of this message for the Jews is underlined in verse 10. Judah has been threshed and winnowed by Babylon—she can hardly fail to delight in the fall of the oppressor.

22:1-14 The fall of Jerusalem. This lone oracle against Jerusalem is included in the oracles against the nations, perhaps to make the point that Judah, too, is subject to judgment (compare the treatment of Israel in Amos 1–2). Much of this oracle presupposes the actual fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians in 587–586 B.C.E. (so 22:4-11). Some scholars, however, recognize an oracle of Isaiah in verses 1-3 and 12-14, which presuppose that the city did not fall. This oracle may have been delivered on the occasion of Sennacherib's campaign against Jerusalem, which we will examine below in Isa 36–39.

In verses 1-3a the prophet chides the people of Jerusalem for their panic and lack of trust. Then in verses 12-14 he rebukes them because they turned too easily to celebrating instead of taking their narrow escape as an occasion for repentance. The slogan attributed to the revelers, "Eat and drink, for tomorrow we die!" (22:13), is often quoted (see Isa 56:12; Wis 2:6; 1 Cor 15:32). The force of the prophet's criticism may be that the people in Jerusalem did not show enough concern for the sufferings of their fellow Judeans and did not take the lesson of the folly of rebellion to heart.

22:15-25 Rivals at court. The two officials who are the subjects of verses 15-25 are also mentioned in Isa 36 and 2 Kgs 18, where Eliakim is called "master of the palace." The oracle cited here may have been setting a seal of divine approval on a reorganization of the royal cabinet. The wrath of the prophet is aroused by the luxury of Shebna, especially the tomb he has prepared for himself. The prophet sees this as an attempt to control his fate, which will be frustrated by God. He also objects to Shebna's delight in chariots. It is interesting to see the prophet engaging in day-to-day politics and endorsing one official against another. Such participation in political life is necessary for anyone who seriously wants to influence public policy.

THE APOCALYPSE OF ISAIAH

Isa 24:1-27:13

These chapters stand out from their context, as they are much less specific than the oracles against foreign nations which precede them. They are loosely structured and were not necessarily composed as a coherent unit. Attempts to tie them to a specific historical setting have usually focused on allusions to the destruction of a city (24:10-12; 25:1-5; 26:5; 27:10-11). The city in question has been identified with a whole spectrum of cities from Babylon in the sixth century B.C.E. to Samaria in the second. It is not certain, however, that all references are to the same city or that all passages envisage a specific city at all. If the references are to a single city, the most likely referent is Babylon, but the lack of specific detail makes these chapters into a general description of a desolate world and the hope for definitive salvation through the power of God.

24:1-20 The desolation of the earth. This passage reads like a ritual mourning for the land. We may compare Joel 1-2, but there the occasion is quite specific—it is a plague of locusts. In Isa 24 the occasion is not clear at all. It may have been a severe drought or some unspecified historical crisis. Some scholars identify the "city of chaos" in verse 10 as a particular city (for example, Babylon, when it was destroyed by Xerxes of Persia in 482 B.C.E.), but it may also be read as a more general reference. Just as the whole land is turned upside down, cities too are reduced to chaos. Special attention is paid to the lack of wine, which dampens festivity (v. 11). The disorders extend also to social relations. Distinctions in status break down. Servant and master are on equal footing. The prophet is developing themes which we have seen already in Isa 2-3 and which were associated with the "day of the Lord" (see also Joel 1-2). The destruction of the earth and the breakdown of social order are seen as manifestations of the majesty of God and correctives to human pride. Hence the surprising call to give glory to the Lord in verses 14-16 (compare Psalm 29, which takes the thunderstorm as an occasion to give glory to the Lord).

Only two verses give a reason for the desolation of the earth. Verses 5-6 lay the blame on humanity. The offenses are stated in very general terms: they have transgressed laws, broken an everlasting covenant (v. 5). The covenant in question is not necessarily the one made with Moses at Sinai. The phrase "everlasting covenant" (our text reads "ancient covenant") is used in Gen 9:16 for the covenant with Noah, which was a covenant with all peoples, not just Israel. The disruption of the earth, then, may be due to a breach of natural law. The underlying idea is that the order of nature is directly affected by human behavior. This idea was common in ancient Israel, especially in the temple cult. We can appreciate it anew in modern times as we observe the effects of technological progress on the environment or contemplate the threat to nature from the development of nuclear power.

The desolation of the earth redounds to the glory of God, but it is nonetheless a hardship for humanity. Verses 16b-20 evoke the sense of terror for humanity in the manifestation of God's majesty (compare Amos 5:19 on the impossibility of escaping from God's judgment; also, more directly, Jer 48:43-44). Verses 18b-19 describe the destruction of the world. The "windows on high" will let in the floodwaters that have been restrained since creation (compare Jer 4:23-26, where the whole earth is returned to its primeval state and creation is undone). Both in Isa 18–20 and in Jeremiah this total destruction is still in the future. It should not be taken literally as a prediction of the end of the world but as a vivid metaphorical way of conveying a sense of impending desolation.

24:21-23 The final judgment. The last oracle in chapter 24 picks up explicitly the motif of "the day of the Lord." The judgment described, however, has no parallel in the Old Testament, for it includes the punishment of the host of heaven—that is, the stars, which were regarded as angels (see Judg 5:20) or as pagan gods (Deut 4:19; Jer 8:2). The story of rebellious angels who are then punished by God is told in detail in the apocalyptic book of 1 Enoch in the second century B.C.E. This passage in Isaiah raises the possibility that some mythological notions that first appear in post-biblical Jewish literature had in fact been current at a much earlier time.

The parallel punishment of the host of the heavens and the kings of the earth suggests that the two are closely related. The kings of the earth have their heavenly patrons (compare the notion of guardian angels), who are the real source of their power. This idea was widespread in antiquity. We will meet it again in Isa 36–37.

The culmination of the entire "day of the Lord" is that the Lord of hosts will reign on Mount Zion. The basic concepts in these oracles are drawn from Jerusalem cult traditions. The goal is the veneration of God on Mount Zion. This goal is to be reached through widespread destruction that will bring all peoples, including the Jews, to their knees. It is assumed, however, that life will go on on earth. God is to be glorified in Jerusalem, not in heaven. Christian readers may have difficulty with the prophet's insistence on the particular place, Mount Zion. They can at least appreciate some of the implications. The God of Mount Zion is the God of all the earth, and the frailty of humankind is the converse of the majesty of God.

25:1-5 A hymn of thanksgiving. This short hymn would appear to be written to celebrate the fall of a particular city (the most obvious candidate is Babylon). The lack of specificity, however, makes it possible to reapply it to any other city, or even to take it as a general affirmation of God's ability to upset the status quo (see the song of Hannah in 1 Sam 2).

25:6-8 The final banquet. The image of the great banquet is taken from ancient mythology and has a long history in the folklore of the world. The motif is developed in the "wedding feast of the lamb" in Rev 19 (see also the parable of the great supper in Matt 22:2-14; Luke 14:16-24). The banquet suggests a celebration after the victory is won. In this case the banquet is given "on this mountain," presumably Mount Zion. It is, however, a feast for all peoples, in accordance with the tradition that all the nations would flock to Zion. The feast is described with mouth-watering vividness. This is not the heaven of a disembodied soul but probably reflects the desire of impoverished people for a bountiful meal. The salvation desired goes beyond this, however. God will destroy death forever. In Canaanite mythology, Death (Mot) was the name of a god, the opponent of Baal, god of fertility. The prophet is probably alluding to that myth. The resurrection of those who have already died is not implied here. Rather, the point is that God will ultimately remove every threat that hangs over humanity, including the ultimate one. God will also remove all sorrow and the humiliation of the Jewish people during the Exile. The prophet may have hoped for such salvation after the end of the Exile, but the destruction of death remains, inevitably, a distant horizon. Christianity transferred the land without tears to heaven; for Judaism it remains a utopian ideal for life on earth. (For the destruction of death, see Rev 20:14.)

25:9-12 Oracle against Moab. The specific reference to Moab here is usually taken to indicate a date after the Exile when relations were bad between Judea and her neighbors. (The oracle in Isa 24:17-18 is cited as an oracle against Moab in Jer 48:43-44.) Moab was located east of the Dead Sea.

26:1-19 Song of trust. Isa 26 begins as a standard psalm of trust in God, affirming that God vindicates the life of the righteous poor. Verses 11-19 proceed to contrast the other lords who have ruled over Israel with the people of God. The other lords are dead; they cannot rise. The allusion here is probably to Babylon, which was indeed dead as a world power. The Israelites had long labored in vain, failing to achieve salvation. But now,

"your dead shall live, their corpses shall rise" (26:19). Some scholars take this verse as the earliest attestation of belief in resurrection in the Hebrew Bible. In view of the context, however, that is unlikely. The point is that Babylonian power is broken and will not be revived. Israelite power, which had been broken, will be revived. The resurrection involved is probably another formulation of the increase of the nation noted in verse 15 (compare Ezekiel's vision of the valley full of dry bones in Ezek 37, which is explicitly interpreted to refer to "the whole house of Israel"). It is the resurrection of a nation through a new generation, not the resuscitation of those who are already dead. Of course, the use of resurrection language to describe the restoration of the Jewish people helped to pave the way for the eventual emergence of a belief in the resurrection of the dead (which is first attested in Judaism in the second century B.C.E.).

26:20-21 Hiding from the wrath. This short oracle suggests that Israel (or perhaps the remnant) is exempt from the wrath of God. The idea that some people can hide from the wrath recalls the Exodus story in which the Lord passes over those houses that have been properly marked (Exod 12). For God going forth to judge the world, the reader should compare the theophanies in Judg 5; Deut 33; Hab 3; also Psalm 98. The prophet also assures the people that the time of God's wrath is a brief moment. If they can wait out the bad time, they will yet be glorified. This idea also plays an important role in Second Isaiah's explanation of the Exile.

27:1 Leviathan. A number of passages in the Bible allude to a battle between God and a monster (variously called a dragon or Rahab; see Isa 51:9; Job 26:12). Usually this battle is in the past. The story of this battle is not told in Genesis or Exodus, and we have only recently come to understand the allusion. The Canaanite myths (which were discovered at Ugarit in northern Syria in 1929) include the story of a battle between the god Baal and the Sea. Associated with the Sea are monsters called Lotan, the dragon, and the crooked serpent. All these are probably the same figure, called by different names. The dragon is a symbol of chaos—all the forces opposed to peace and order. The battle between a god and a dragon was a Canaanite story and symbolized the victory of life and order over chaos. For the Canaanites, Baal was the god who slew the monster and made civilized life possible. When the biblical authors referred to this story, they substituted Yahweh for Baal. For them, it was their God who slew the dragon when the world was created or Israel was led out of Egypt.

Leviathan in Isa 27:1 is the Lotan of Canaanite myth and another name for the sea dragon. This passage, however, suggests that he has not yet been slain. The decisive battle for the welfare and salvation of the world has not yet been won. It remains in the future, to be fought on the "day of the Lord." This expectation of a decisive action by God in the future becomes increasingly prominent in later biblical writings and in the apocalyptic literature. The symbolism of the sea monsters plays a prominent part in Dan 7 and in the Book of Revelation, especially chapters 12 and 13.

The symbol of the monster, Leviathan, is exceptionally powerful. Traditional Christianity would relate this figure to Satan, but the original symbol could be used for any threat to human welfare. "Doing battle with the monster" remains a useful metaphor for our various struggles in life.

27:2-13 The restoration of Israel. This section of Isaiah concludes with a series of oracles introduced by the phrase "On that day." The first picks up the motif of the vineyard from Isa 5. Now Yahweh is no longer angry. Briers and thorns are no longer means of punishment; rather, God will burn them.

The restoration of Israel is conditional, however, on cultic purity—essentially observance of the reform carried out by King Josiah in 621 B.C.E. (see 2 Kgs 22–23), which involved the destruction of altars and places of worship outside of Jerusalem, in accordance with the law of Deut 12.

The "fortified city" (v. 10) and "not an understanding people" (v. 11) would seem to refer to a specific city and people. Many scholars identify the city in this case as Samaria. The allusions to Jacob and Israel, then, should be read as "the northern kingdom," and the implication would be that Israel should find its center in Jerusalem and not in Samaria. The passage is obscure, however. Both its origin and its reference are uncertain.

The last two oracles refer to the gathering in of Jews from the Diaspora. As we have come to expect in the Book of Isaiah, they are to worship on the holy mountain in Jerusalem. Part of the editor's program was apparently to reunite the whole people with Mount Zion as the place of worship for all. In this respect he was probably in continuity with Isaiah of Jerusalem.

POLITICS AND SALVATION

Isa 28:1-33:24

With chapter 28 we return to a cluster of oracles from Isaiah himself. The core of this cluster comes from the time of Hezekiah's decision to revolt against Assyria in 701 B.C.E. A major factor in Hezekiah's decision to revolt was the hope that Egypt would support the various rebel states. Many of Isaiah's prophecies are concerned with the folly of that hope.

These chapters have come to us through the hands of an editor. The oracles are arranged so that judgment and salvation alternate. Many of the oracles of salvation may come from a later time. Nearly all of chapters 32-33 consist of later material. The final editing of this material probably took place after the Babylonian Exile.

28:1-4 The fall of Samaria. The first oracle of this section comes from an earlier period of Isaiah's career, before the fall of Samaria in 722 B.C.E. It is included here partly to ensure that the prophet's word will be seen to address all of Israel and partly because drunkenness is also a theme of the following oracle in verses 7-22. The oracle in verses 1-4 recalls Isaiah's preaching in Isa 5 and that of the prophet Amos. The downfall of Samaria comes from the lifestyle of the upper classes, symbolized by their drunkenness. The "garland" in verse 1 refers to the city of Samaria, perched like a crown on a hill.

28:5-6 The remnant. These verses are the work of an editor who wants to give a positive connotation to the image of a crown. The remnant here has a purely positive meaning. For the prophet Isaiah it was always ambiguous.

28:7-22 Judah's covenant with death. Verses 7-13 refer to Isaiah's dispute with the priests and the other prophets. The heavy drinking may have been in the context of a cultic celebration of Canaanite origin. People drank themselves into a stupor in a celebration of fellowship with the dead. It was an expensive practice that only the rich could afford. Whether Isaiah is referring to this ritual or not, the drunkenness of the priests implies social irresponsibility.

Verse 9 is presumably a quotation of Isaiah's opponents. In verse 10 they mock his preaching as if it were the stammering of a child. (The Hebrew makes no real sense.) Isaiah retorts that his speech sounds strange because they do not listen (see Isa 6:9 and, more directly, Ezek 3:5-9). The word of the Lord becomes nonsense to them, so that they stumble without guidance.

Verses 14-15 are addressed to the rulers of Jerusalem, probably including the religious leaders. They are arrogant because they think they are secure. The "covenant with death" probably refers to an alliance with Egypt. The rulers think that the scourge of Assyria will not touch them because of this alliance. Isaiah, however, sees it as a covenant with death. Death (Mot) was the name of the Canaanite god, enemy of Baal, the god of fertility. Egypt, the traditional enemy of Israel, is called "Death" here, as it is given the name of another Canaanite deity, Rahab, in Isa 30:7. The point is that the attempt to secure life ends in death (see the story of Adam and Eve, and also Hos 13:1, where the Israelites who worship Baal find Mot [Death] instead). Isaiah says that the rulers have made lies their refuge. The lies are the double-talk inherent in diplomacy, but also the hope for Egyptian protection, which was only an illusion.

The cornerstone that God lays in Zion (v. 16) is either God or righteousness and justice. It implies a reference to the Davidic covenant, but the security of Zion depends on its adherence to justice (compare the oracle to Ahaz in Isa 7:9: "Unless your faith is firm you shall not be firm"). Those who trust in anything other than God will be swept away by the flood of Assyria (see Isa 8:8). The saying about the short bed in verse 20 means that there will be no place to rest or hide. The Assyrian invasion is the "strange deed" of God, just as surely as David's victory over the Philistines at Mount Perazim (2 Sam 5:17-25) or Joshua's victory over Gibeon when the sun stood still (Josh 10:1-15). The oracle ends with a definitive assurance that Isaiah has heard of the coming destruction directly from God.

28:23-29 A parable of salvation. The severe proclamation of judgment is followed by a promise of relief. The argument is based on analogy from nature: there is a season for everything, destruction cannot go on forever. Whether Isaiah spoke this oracle is disputed. It accords well with his overall message. He never predicted that Judah would be left without any remnant. It is unlikely that he delivered this oracle together with the preceding one, since it would have undermined the threat, but he may well have spoken it later, when the Assyrian invasion was underway or already past. An editor placed it here to show that the threat of destruction was ultimately modified and should not be taken as final.

29:1-8 Ariel, Ariel. Ariel is evidently a name for Jerusalem. Its meaning and origin are obscure. It may be derived from a word meaning "altar."

Verses 1-5a represent God as attacking Jerusalem (presumably through the Assyrians) just as David did long ago. Verse 1 gives the impression that the festivals are observed in a mindless manner and to no avail. Verse 4 vividly describes how Jerusalem will be brought low, but it stops short of saying that the city will be captured.

The sudden visitation by God in verse 6 is ambiguous here. On the one hand, it completes the humiliation of Jerusalem; on the other hand, it is also a saving act. The enemy will be frustrated at the last moment and will vanish like a dream of the night. This passage strongly resembles the Zion ideology presented in the psalms. According to Ps 48:5-6,

> . . . the kings assemble,
> they come on together;
> They also see, and at once are stunned, > terrified, routed.

The psalm attests the belief in the inviolability of Zion, a popular belief in Jerusalem that was later sharply criticized by Jeremiah (Jer 7:4). Many scholars question whether Isaiah would have endorsed such a belief. Yet, we have found throughout that Isaiah's message was double-edged. First, Judah would be brought to its knees, but it would not be utterly destroyed. Isaiah modifies the Zion theology by insisting that Jerusalem is not protected from humiliation. The "strange deed" (28:21) of the Lord, then, includes both extensive destruction and ultimate deliverance, and is presumably meant to teach Judah a severe lesson.

29:9-16 Criticism of the "wise." These verses continue the critique of 28:7-22. The blindness of the leaders recalls the prophecy of Isa 6:9-10. The reasons for the criticism are twofold: superficial worship (v. 13; compare Matt 15:8; Mark 7:6) and the attempt of the king's advisers to control their destiny by devious diplomacy. Isaiah's ideal of simple submission to the plan of God would, of course, eliminate Judah's ambitions as a state.

29:17-24 Prophecy of salvation. In some respects, the predominant optimism of this prophecy is closer in spirit to Second Isaiah than to Isaiah of Jerusalem (compare 29:18 with 42:7). Yet, much of what it anticipates concerns the internal reform of Judah, especially the removal of the arrogant rulers. This theme follows well enough on verses 9-16. It may be that an original oracle of Isaiah was recast by the editor to provide a counterpart to the negative oracles of verses 9-16.

30:1-18 Alliance with Egypt. Isaiah again castigates the Judeans for relying on international intrigue and especially on the promise of Egyptian help. The gifts given to Egypt are wasted. Egypt is called "Rahab," a name for the chaos monster (see Job 26:12), but it is a subdued Rahab, not only evil but useless. The prophet is irate at the unwillingness of the people to listen to his own message or to consider the Holy One as a factor in their plans. The king's counselors found prophets useful enough when they spoke flattery and were willing to spread propaganda; the prophet who had an independent point of view was merely a nuisance.

Isaiah's message to Hezekiah was essentially the same as his advice to Ahaz: "By waiting and by calm you shall be saved." First, they should not provoke the Assyrians by revolting. Second, they should not compound the problem by alliances and attempts at resistance. Isaiah makes no allowance for national pride, nor even for the natural instinct to provide for one's own protection. The trust is that God will protect them, not indeed from all harm, but from being wiped out. This passive approach might mean accepting much suffering, but Isaiah could validly argue that the alternatives were worse. They could not hope to flee from the Assyrians. Patient trust here becomes the cornerstone (Isa 28:16) of the hope for salvation in Zion. We may compare Isaiah's stance with the ethic of nonresistance attributed to Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5:38-42).

We should emphasize, however, that for Isaiah nonresistance was a political tactic that might lessen the danger of outright destruction.

30:19-26 Salvation for Zion. Verses 19-26, probably the work of an editor, expand on the idea that God is willing to show favor. The concern for the destruction of idols (v. 22) and the transformation of the high places (v. 23) point to the time of King Josiah's reform, when the cultic sites outside Jerusalem were destroyed (2 Kgs 23). Verse 21, "This is the way . . . ," is the fulfillment of the promise of Isa 2:3 that God would "instruct us in his ways."

30:27-33 Judgment on Assyria. This oracle, too, may be a later addition, from the time when Assyria fell to the Babylonians in 612 B.C.E. The idea that Assyria would eventually be destroyed had its precedent in Isa 10. The manifestation of God in the thunderstorm is the image used throughout Isaiah for destruction, whether of Israel or of Assyria. The prophet points out that the oppressors of history eventually fall. Even though the prophets use historical crises as occasions to press for the reform of their own people, it is important that they do not thereby endorse the actions of the superpowers.

31:1-3 Flesh and spirit. Yet another indictment of the alliance with Egypt puts the matter in a new way: the Egyptians are human and not divine, their horses are flesh and not spirit. The contrast here is not between body and soul but between human power and divine power. The Egyptians have only fallible human power; they are not supernatural and can work no miracles to save Judah from Assyria. The point is that Judah overrates Egypt. Similarly the horses, a crucial element in the armaments for the day, are only flesh; they cannot withstand what Isaiah sees as the plan of God. This contrast of flesh, as mere humanity, to the spirit or power of God will play an important role in the theology of St. Paul in the New Testament.

31:4-6 Deliverance of Zion. As in the preceding chapters, an editor has balanced the prophet's indictment with an oracle of salvation. The image of God sheltering Jerusalem like a flock of birds fits well with the popular Zion theology but is far too simple for Isaiah, who preached consistently that only a remnant would survive. The reference to idols in verse 7 again shows the concerns of King Josiah's reform.

31:8 Fall of Assyria. Like the preceding chapter, chapter 31 ends with a prediction of the fall of Assyria, to set the record straight. When Assyria did fall, the sword was wielded by the Babylonians, but a Jewish prophet would still see that event as the work of the Lord.

32:1-8 A just king. Unlike the messianic prophecies in Isa 9 and 11, this passage does not refer explicitly to the Davidic line or the royal ideology; therefore it has been thought to come from a later hand. It does presuppose the existence of the monarchy, however, and so must be preexilic. The contrast of the fool and the noble is typical of the wisdom literature. Verse 3 would seem to deliberately revoke Isa 6:10. The concern of the passage is with justice in the land, with feeding the hungry and giving drink to the thirsty. It implies a criticism of the rulers of the day, who are branded as fools for their neglect of the Lord and for social injustice. The oracle is in continuity with the preaching of Isaiah, but the generalized references to the fool and the trickster lack the specificity of a passage like Isa 5.

32:9-13 Prophecy of impending destruction. This passage picks up motifs from earlier prophecies of Isaiah (see the oracle against the women of Jerusalem in 3:16-26 and the briers and thorns in 5:6; 7:23-24). Here, however, the address is to women of the countryside, in view of the references to fields and harvest. It does not indict them for luxury but wants to alert them to imminent danger. The occasion of this oracle is unknown.

32:14-20 A rustic utopia. The New American Bible has transposed verse 19 and placed it before verse 15, thereby altering the sense of the passage. In the Hebrew the transformation of the desert goes hand in hand with the destruction of the city. When the city is destroyed, the people will live in the quiet countryside, imbued with the spirit of the Lord. This passage does not accord well with either the message of Isaiah or with most of the tradition in this book, all of which had an important place for a purified Jerusalem in any final utopia (see especially 2:1-5, but also 33:17-24). The New American Bible solves the difficulty by moving the last verse and so allowing that the city may share in the restoration. Others suggest a different translation (for example, the "cities shall lie peaceful in the plain"—New English Bible), but even this contrasts with the exaltation of Zion in Isa 2. We may at least see some continuity between Isaiah's disdain for the luxury of the upper classes and the negative attitude toward the city here. The blooming of the desert appears again in 35:1 and 43:19-20.

33:1 Oracle against an enemy. This very brief oracle is addressed to Assyria or Babylon or some other enemy. The logic is the same as in Isa 10 or 30:27-33: the day of the oppressor will come.

33:2-16 Prayer for God's manifestation. This section is made up of smaller units that alternate between distress and hope for the manifestation of God. Verses 2-4 pray for God to be revealed on Zion and terrify all enemies. Verses 7-9 describe the breakdown of the country. Verses 10-13 are an oracle proclaiming the theophany. Verse 14 states the initial human response: who of us can live with the consuming fire? The manifestation of God is terrifying even for God's own people. Verses 15-16 give the answer: the virtuous can stand in the presence of God. This whole passage would seem to be derived from a liturgy in the Jerusalem temple (see Psalm 24).

33:17-24 The restoration of Zion. This passage may well have concluded one edition of the prophecies of Isaiah. The editor promises a full restoration of the monarchy and of Zion, which had been major points of reference in the prophecy of Isaiah. Compare the earlier prophecies in Isa 2, 9, and 11.

POSTEXILIC ORACLES

Isa 34:1-35:10

These two chapters are generally believed to belong together. The deliverance of Jerusalem is the counterpart of the destruction of Edom. There are also similarities of language in the two chapters. The setting is after the Exile, when the Jewish community experienced much tension with all its neighbors. Edom lay immediately south of Judah.

34:1-17 Oracle against Edom. This oracle begins with a call to judgment (see Deut 32:1) against all nations and then moves to the specific case of Edom. The presuppositions of the judgment are drawn from the royal ideology: the Lord is Zion's defender and defeats all nations that oppose it. The passage is notable for two reasons. First, it uses the imagery of cosmic destruction—the heavens will be rolled up like a scroll. This imagery is obviously metaphorical here. It is a poetic evocation of utter desolation, which attests the absolute power of God over the world. In the later apocalyptic literature this imagery is used in a more literal way.

Second, we cannot overlook the fact that this is a rather gory fantasy of vengeance. It is true that the vengeance of the Lord is closely related to the idea of justice. It is a matter of punishing the oppressor and vindicating the oppressed (see Deut 32:34-43). Yet, it is no less true that this oracle expresses the frustration and resentment of the Jewish community in the hard times of the postexilic period. The sentiments expressed are less than admirable, but they are certainly an honest expression of human nature. Religious people have often expected their God to satisfy their desire for vengeance. The expectation, however, is seldom fulfilled.

35:1-10 A triumphal procession. Chapter 35 provides the positive counterpart to chapter 34 by focusing on Israel's liberation. The imagery is closely related to that of Second Isaiah: there will be a highway in the desert (see Isa 40:3), the desert will bloom and burst forth with springs (see Isa 43:19). Verse 10 is repeated directly in Isa 51:11. The liberation involves opening the eyes of the blind and the ears of the deaf (see Isa 42:7). The theme of the procession, which is also fundamental to Second Isaiah, is probably derived from the temple cult. The message is one of comfort and hope. Undoubtedly the author of these chapters saw the destruction of enemies like Edom as a necessary precondition for the transformation. In both cases we must recognize the role of fantasy, but the images of chapter 35 have lasting power to console and encourage those in need of liberation.

STORIES FROM THE TIME OF KING HEZEKIAH

Isa 36:1-39:8

The prose narrative that concludes First Isaiah is paralleled, almost word for word, in 2 Kgs 18:13-20:19. Since the account fits into the ongoing narrative of Kings and is written in the style of that work, we may assume that it was borrowed from there by the editor of Isaiah.

The narrative is made up of three episodes: the invasion of Sennacherib in chapters 36–37, the sickness and recovery of Hezekiah in chapter 38, and the Babylonian delegation in chapter 39. The stories in chapters 38 and 39 qualify the miraculous deliverance in chapter 37. Chapter 38 suggests that Hezekiah is a special king in any case, and chapter 39 warns that the deliverance from the Assyrians will not be repeated when the Babylonians attack.

36:1–37:38 The invasion of Sennacherib. The narrative in Isa 36 differs from that of 2 Kgs 18 in one major respect. It omits 2 Kgs 18:14-16, which says that Hezekiah submitted and paid an exorbitant tribute to the king of Assyria, including even the gold overlay from the panels of the temple. The accuracy of that passage in 2 Kings is confirmed by an Assyrian account, which boasts that Hezekiah was shut up in Jerusalem "like a bird in a cage," his territory reduced, some two hundred thousand of his people taken into slavery, and the tribute increased. The account in Isaiah (like 2 Kgs 18:17–19:37) makes no mention of this humiliation but ends instead with a miraculous deliverance by the angel of the Lord.

There are other difficulties in the narrative. 2 Kgs 18:9 puts the accession of Hezekiah before the fall of Samaria, in 725 B.C.E. His fourteenth year then would be 711 B.C.E., but we know that Sennacherib's campaign took place in 701 B.C.E. The dates have been somehow confused in the transmission of the text. Tirhakah, mentioned in Isa 37:9, did not become king of Egypt until 690/89 B.C.E. He is named here by mistake, by an author who evidently wrote long after the events. Moreover, the narrative is not really one account but two—the first in Isa 36:1–37:9a, the second in Isa 37:9b-36. The second account repeats part of the words of the Assyrian messengers from the first account but gives a slightly different account of the role of Isaiah. The main problem, however, concerns the relation of the incident described here to that in 2 Kgs 18:14-16.

Some scholars resolve this problem (and the mention of Tirhakah) by supposing that there was a second invasion by Sennacherib about 688 B.C.E. There is no extrabiblical evidence for this. It is simpler to suppose that a single invasion was remembered in different ways, as indeed there are differences between the two accounts in Isa 36–37. In that case, we must assume that Hezekiah was forced into submission. The cost to Judah was enormous, but Jerusalem was spared and Hezekiah was allowed to continue on the throne. Even this much must have seemed like a miraculous deliverance to the people of Jerusalem, since they had little hope of withstanding the Assyrian attack.

The reason for Sennacherib's relative leniency is not clear. Isa 37:7 suggests that he was eager to return home to forestall conspiracy. Isa 37:9 suggests that he was threatened by an Egyptian advance. There is a report in the Greek historian Herodotus that an Assyrian army was overrun by field mice near the Egyptian border. This report has the appearance of a legend, but some have supposed that it arose from an outbreak of bubonic plague in the Assyrian army, and that this in turn was perceived by the Jews as the work of the angel of the Lord. In any case, Judah had not escaped unscathed. The description of the ravaged land in Isa 1:2-8 probably refers to this time.

36:1–37:9a The first account. The first account is largely taken up with the speech of the Assyrian messengers. The capture of Lachish, southwest of Jerusalem, is known from an Assyrian wall relief and from excavations at the site. The speech of the messengers is probably a creation of the Jewish author, inspired perhaps by Isaiah's oracle against Assyria in Isa 10:5-11. The unreliability of Egypt might indeed be a theme of Assyrian propaganda, as it was of Isaiah's preaching. The suggestion that Hezekiah had alienated Yahweh by tearing down some altars presupposes knowledge of Hezekiah's reform (2 Chr 29:3–31:21). The claim that Yahweh sent the king of Assyria anticipates the propaganda of Cyrus of Persia at a later time. In all, the speech reads like clever propaganda, although it may tell us more about Jewish perceptions than about Assyrian views. The punch line comes in verse 18: "Has any of the gods of the nations ever rescued his land from the hand of the king of Assyria?" The success of a nation is taken to reflect the power or weakness of its God. In Jewish eyes, the assault on Jerusalem was a direct affront to Yahweh (see Ps 79:10: "Why should the nations say, 'Where is their God?' ").

The response of Isaiah (37:6) in the first account recalls his advice to King Ahaz in Isa 7:4: "Do not fear." The advice to remain calm was not, of course, easy advice in the circumstances, but it was consistent with the prophet's stance throughout his career.

37:9b-36 The second account. The second account elaborates on the role of Isaiah. First, he recites a lengthy psalm, affirming that an attack on Jerusalem is an insult to the Holy One of Israel and is doomed to defeat (see Psalms 2, 48). Some of the wording of the psalm recalls Second Isaiah (37:26; see also 45:21; 46:10), and this contributes to the impression that it does not come from Isaiah himself (also compare 37:29 with Ezek 38:4). In verses 30-32, however, we may well have an authentic prophecy of Isaiah, since it recalls his position in Isa 7. Cultivation will not even be possible for two years. Only a remnant will remain, but it will be the bearer of God's promises to Zion. Here the full cost to Judah is acknowledged.

Isaiah's prophecy of the remnant is overlaid here, however, with pious legend. First, in verses 33-35 Isaiah is said to prophesy that the Assyrians would not even reach Jerusalem. The Assyrian account, by contrast, explicitly claims to have cast up earthworks against the city. Then comes the action of the angel of the Lord. Even if we assume that a large number of Assyrians died in a plague (185,000 is impossibly high), attribution of this to the angel of the Lord requires a leap of faith and is the stuff of legend.

What actually happened is far from clear. Sennacherib must have offered Hezekiah terms that did not require his abdication, and he accepted. Whether Isaiah approved of the surrender is not reported. The occasion can hardly have aroused much rejoicing in Jerusalem. Yet, with the passage of time the humiliation was forgotten, and the fact that Jerusalem was not destroyed was seen as proof of God's protection. In one sense this showed a proper appreciation of the gift of life, which was preserved against all expectations. On the other hand, it surely contributed to the complacent belief that Zion could never fall, a belief that Jeremiah encountered with much frustration a century later.

The violent death of Sennacherib is also reported in nonbiblical stories.

38:1-8 The sickness of Hezekiah. The king's own experience parallels the deliverance of Jerusalem. At first his death seems certain; then he gets a reprieve. The reason is apparently his wholehearted piety. We may infer that this is also why Jerusalem was reprieved. Things might be different under another king. This story, too, has a legendary quality in the supernatural sign of the reversal of the sun. Such stories are meant to arouse wonder, not to report fact. Note that Hezekiah is not criticized for asking for a sign, as Ahaz had been.

38:9-20 Hymn of thanksgiving. Hezekiah recites a psalm of a type that is well-attested in the Psalter (see Psalms 6, 13, 22). It begins by describing the plaintiff's distress and then moves to thanksgiving for the Lord's deliverance. The moral in 38:16 applies also to the experience of Jerusalem in the preceding chapter. Note that this psalm entertains no hope for God's favor beyond death. The finality of death made the plight of Hezekiah and of Jerusalem all the more urgent.

39:1-8 The delegation from Babylon. The story of the delegation from Babylon prepares us for the transition to the Babylonian era. The fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians is never described in the Book of Isaiah, but it is the presupposition of Isa 40–55. The editor of the book fills the gap by having Isaiah prophesy it here in the story taken from 2 Kgs 20. At the same time, the prophecy corrects the impression that Zion cannot fall, which might be derived from chapters 36–37.

Hezekiah's action in displaying his treasures is typical of ancient diplomacy and was designed to impress his visitors. Babylon at that time was a rising power eager to foster rebellion against Assyria. That such a delegation should have visited Hezekiah is not in itself implausible. Hezekiah's reaction to Isaiah's prediction smacks of Louis XIV's famous dictum "Après moi le déluge." The author probably meant only to emphasize that Hezekiah ended his days in peace because of his piety. (Compare the idea that the punishment of King Ahaz was deferred until the time of his son because he repented [1 Kgs 21:29].)

COMMENTARY: SECOND ISAIAH (Isa 40–55)

At Isa 40:1 we move to a new setting at the end of the Babylonian Exile (539 B.C.E.), and the oracles that follow are very different from those of Isa 1–39 in tone. They are often called the "Book of Consolation." Unlike chapters 1–39, all the oracles in these chapters are likely to be the work of a single prophet. They may be divided into two parts: chapters 40–48 deal predominantly with liberation from Babylon; chapters 49–55 with the restoration of Zion. The difference between these parts, however, is a matter of degree of emphasis and cannot be taken to indicate different origins or settings.

LIBERATION FROM BABYLON

Isa 40:1–48:22

The first part of Second Isaiah takes the good news that the Exile is at an end as the occasion to contrast Israel and Babylon and their respective gods.

40:1-11 The proclamation of release. This passage serves as an introduction to all of Second Isaiah by specifying the occasion of the oracles—the release of Israel from the Babylonian Exile. In Ezra 1 this event is attributed to a decree of Cyrus, king of Persia. The prophet, however, claims that there is a more fundamental cause, namely, a decree of Yahweh in the heavenly council. The idea of a heavenly council of gods was widespread in the ancient world and was based on the assumption that God has a royal court like any great king. Vivid biblical illustrations are found in Psalm 82, 1 Kgs 22, and Isa 6. The scene in Isa 40 may be viewed as a counterpoint to that of Isa 6. In the earlier chapter the decree was one of judgment on Israel; here it is one of consolation. (Note that Jerusalem can stand for the people as a whole.)

Verse 2 presupposes the usual view that the Exile was a punishment for Israel's sins, but adds that Israel has received "double for all her sins." The implication is that the suffering is not fully explained as punishment. We will find later that Second Isaiah finds a more positive way to understand the experience of the Exile.

The voice in verse 3 is the voice of an angel implementing the divine decree. The "way" is analogous to the great ritual processions of the Babylonian gods, but also the triumphal procession of Yahweh from Mount Sinai at the time of the Exodus (compare Ps 68:8-9; Deut 33:3). The Exodus motif is made explicit by the location "in the desert." The return from Babylon is seen as a reenactment of the original liberation of Israel out of Egypt. The hope for a new Exodus was found as early as Hosea (ch. 2) in the eighth century, but now Second Isaiah claims that it is actually taking place.

The liberation of Israel is viewed as a revelation of God. In the first Exodus, Israel's God went before the people in a pillar of cloud or a pillar of fire. Now all flesh would see the glory of God. The prophet is told to proclaim the difference between the passing power of humanity and the unshakable word of God. The power of the Babylonians, which had seemed so great, had now faded like the grass of the field.

In verses 9-11 Zion/Jerusalem is told to proclaim the good news to "the cities of Judah." (The familiar translation "O thou who bringest good tidings to Zion" is possible but improbable, since the verbs are feminine in agreement with Zion.) Here again Jerusalem is an ideal figure, representing the community of exiles who would join the prophet in returning to restore the actual city. We should bear in mind that not all the Jews who were in Babylon took the opportunity to return; many decided that they were better off in exile. The prophet is not only proclaiming deliverance but urging the people to accept it. He bases his exhortation on the assurance that God is with them with power, but also with loving care, suggested by the popular image of the shepherd (compare Psalm 23 and John 10).

This passage of Second Isaiah is best known to Christian readers from the citations in Matt 3:3 and John 1:23, where Isa 40:3 is taken to mean "the voice of one crying in the wilderness" and applied to John the Baptist. The citation is not quite accurate and does not give the original meaning of the passage. The application to John was apt enough, however, since he too was proclaiming a new act of salvation like the Exodus, and he set himself to prepare for it.

40:12-31 The incomparable God. The threefold oracle in verses 12-31 follows naturally from the declaration "Here is your God" in verse 9. The first stanza (vv. 12-17) asks a series of rhetorical questions reminiscent of Job 38–41. The implied answer is that it is Yahweh alone who has created the earth. The nations are as nothing before Yahweh, since the whole earth is in this God's grasp.

The second stanza (vv. 18-24) begins with another rhetorical question: To whom can God be likened? Second Isaiah mocks the statue-makers, as he will do at much greater length in chapter 44. (The New American Bible unnecessarily inserts verses 6-7 of chapter 41 here.) The initial question is balanced by another: "Do you not know? Have you not heard?" (40:21). What has been told from the beginning is the sovereign power of Yahweh to bring princes to nought and make rulers as nothing (40:23; compare Psalm 107). Yahweh's ability to overthrow the Babylonians comes from the fact that it was Yahweh who created the earth, as the cult tradition of Jerusalem had long claimed (for example, Psalms 93, 95).

The third stanza (vv. 25-31) closely parallels the second in form. The introductory question, "To whom can you liken me . . . ?" (40:25), is followed by a command to look up at the stars, which were often honored as divine by Babylonians. The prophet shares the common belief that the stars are a heavenly host of supernatural beings but insists that they are subject to Yahweh, who keeps them in order. At this point the prophet directly reproaches the Israelites for their despair in feeling abandoned by their God. The second half of the stanza, "Do you not know, or have you not heard?" (40:28), responds directly to this despair. The Creator is everlasting. Not only does God not grow faint but the Creator is a source of renewed power for those who are attentive to the divine will. Hope did not come easily to the Jews during the Exile. It was only possible for those who deeply believed that their God was indeed the supreme God. Second Isaiah was convinced that his faith was now vindicated by the fall of Babylon. Note that in verse 25 God is called "the Holy One," a title often found in First Isaiah.

41:1–42:9 Judgment and election. Many commentators divide this long passage into several short oracles. In particular, 42:1-4 is commonly set apart as one of the so-called "Servant Songs." The key to understanding the passage, however, is to recognize that there are two parallel and complementary trial scenes in 41:1-20 and 41:21–42:9. In each case there is:

—summons to trial	41:1	41:21
—legal questioning	41:2-4	41:22-29
—election and reassurance of Israel	41:5-20	42:1-9

In the first scene the nations are summoned for judgment. The issue to be decided is: Who raised up Cyrus of Persia, the "champion of justice," who overthrew Babylon? The answer is given unequivocally: Yahweh, first and last, is responsible for all developments in history. Verses 5-7 (verses 6-7 are inserted after 40:20 in our text) parody the reaction of the Gentiles. They have to encourage one another in making their idols, since the idols cannot encourage them. By contrast, Israel is chosen as the Servant of the Lord. However despised Israel may be in the Exile as a "worm" or "maggot" (compare Ps 22:6), there is no reason to fear. Yahweh is the servant's redeemer (41:14), buying his freedom from slavery. This section concludes with a prophecy of the transformation of the desert with water for the needy. The reference to the desert suggests that the Exodus theme is implied here and that the poor and needy are Israel. The transformation, however, is also for the Gentiles, so that they will recognize the work of the Holy One of Israel.

The second section has a long series of questions and constitutes a more coherent trial. The challenge is: Which of the gods had foretold the rise of Cyrus, and, more crucially, had heralded good news for Israel? The answer is a resounding "Not one." The conclusion is that "all of them are nothing" (41:29). Second Isaiah is more emphatic in denying the power of pagan gods than any earlier biblical book. The argument presupposes the prophet's faith that it is Yahweh who is responsible for the collapse of the power of Babylon. Anyone who did not already share that faith would hardly be persuaded.

The so-called Servant Song in 42:1-4 corresponds to 41:8-9 in singling out a chosen Servant. In both passages the Servant is Israel, conceived in terms of its ideal destiny. The mission of the Servant is specified much more fully in chapter 42 than in chapter 41. The spirit of the Lord is upon him, as on the messianic king in Isa 11. He is to bring justice to the nations, but in a nonviolent, nonaggressive way. The role is further elaborated in 42:6-7. The Servant is a covenant of the people, a light to the nations. We may recall the portrayal of Mount Zion as a center for the nations in Isa 2:2-4. The precise understanding of "a covenant of the people" (42:6) is disputed, but the idea seems to be that God makes a covenant with the nations through the mediation of Israel. The Servant is also sent to open the eyes of the blind and liberate the imprisoned. In the following passages the "blind" refers to Israel (42:16) and specifically to the Servant in 42:19! The most obvious "prisoners" in this context are the Jewish exiles in Babylon. Yet, the Servant Israel is being sent to help the blind and imprisoned.

Some scholars have drawn the conclusion that the Servant in this passage is not Israel but an individual, and that the passage comes from a different hand than the surrounding oracles. We will see in Isa 42:18–43:8, however, that there is considerable ambiguity in the idea of the Servant. There is tension between the ideal of what Israel is supposed to be and what the community actually is. It is Israel's destiny to be a light to the nations, but in order to fulfill this, the blind among the people must recover their sight and the exiles must be liberated.

The section concludes with affirmations that God does not give divine glory to idols (compare 41:6-7) and that "the earlier things have come to pass" (42:9; compare 41:22-23, 26). In this way the prophet concludes this long section by referring back to two important themes of chapter 41.

42:10-17 A hymn to Yahweh the warrior. The "new song" (v. 10) is a hymn of praise like Psalms 96 and 98, which begin with the same invitation. The reason for praise is given in verses 13-17: Yahweh the warrior, who has held back for a time, will let loose divine anger. Here again there is reference to the Exodus, when Yahweh was first recognized as a warrior (Exod 15:3). The divine warrior was traditionally supposed to have a destructive effect on nature (Isa 42:15; compare Judg 5:4-5; Hab 3:5-15; Nah 1:2-6). In Exodus 15 God leads the people to their triumphant occupation of the land; here too God will lead the "blind" Jews on their return journey. The confusion of idol worshipers in verse 17 is the corollary of the recognition of Yahweh as the true God.

42:18–43:8 The deaf and the blind. Despite his general euphoria, the prophet has moments of dejection. The address to his people as "blind and deaf" betrays some frustration on his part. The problem is not only that they are despoiled and plundered but they have become indifferent. So the prophet insists that even their humiliation in the Exile was the work of their God and was a punishment for sin. Yet Israel is still the Servant (42:19). The tension between Israel's vocation as Servant and its present reality is most obvious in this passage. Despite the past divine wrath, God has now redeemed Israel and promises to protect it in any ordeal, be it fire or water. The Holy One is identified as the savior of Israel, which is more precious than Egypt or Ethiopia. The implication is that the Persians will be allowed to conquer other countries in return for the release of Israel. The reason given in 43:4 is simply "because I love you" (compare Deut 9, which insists that the original gift of the land was not merited by Israel). The new Exodus is an Exodus of the blind.

There is some vacillation in Second Isaiah's portrayal of Israel. Some passages emphasize the ideal, what Israel is called to be, and minimize the people's sin. This passage is exceptional in its frank criticism of their shortcomings. The apparent inconsistency comes not only from the emotional intensity of the prophet but also from the nature of his program, which was to project an ideal of Yahweh's Servant that was not fully realized in the exilic community.

43:9-12 The Servant as witness. This brief trial scene repeats some of the motifs of the longer unit in 41:1–42:9. Again the issue is who is the true God, and the test is the ability to foretell the future. A new motif is introduced with the idea that the Jewish people are witnesses. They are called "my servant" collectively (the Hebrew reads the singular; the New American Bible changes it to "my servants"). The mission of witnessing is the same as being "a light for the nations" (42:6). Whereas in earlier times the Davidic king was Yahweh's representative on earth, that role has now passed to the people.

Isa 43:10 is exceptionally strong in its denial of the other gods and may be taken to mean that they do not even exist. The prophet is not a philosopher, however. What concerns him is not the existence of the gods as such but the power to save. He is completely unequivocal in his assertion that there is no savior but Yahweh.

43:14–44:5 Exodus and election. The immediate point of reference in this oracle is stated at the outset: the release of the Jews from Babylon. Isa 43:15-21 puts this event in context. Yahweh is the creator of Israel by virtue of the Exodus, yet the Jews are told not to remember the things of the past. The Exodus is not past history! It is something new, something that is happening in the present. The present tense in verse 16 ("opening a way") is quite deliberate. God's saving action, summed up in the Exodus story, is not all past but is repeatable. Exodus is a pattern in history. What matters is not so much whether it happened in the time of Moses but whether it is happening in the present. Second Isaiah thus points the way to using the Exodus story to throw light on a new situation. In our own time the Exodus story has been appropriated in a similar way by the liberation theologians of Latin America.

The original Exodus was followed by failure on Israel's part (see especially the indictment in Deut 32). Second Isaiah acknowledges this and even asserts that the destruction of Jerusalem was a punishment for Israel's sin. (The "first father" in 43:27 is probably Jacob; compare Hos 12:3.) Yet Jacob is also the Servant, formed from the womb (44:2; compare 49:5). The descendants of Israel will fulfill their destiny by the help of the spirit (compare 42:1), which will vitalize them as water brings life to dry ground. Compare the transforming power of the spirit in Ezek 36, where there is also an analogy with water, and in Joel 3. Here again we find a contrast between Israel's sinful history down to the present and its future as the Servant of the Lord.

44:6-23 The futility of idols. The comparison of Yahweh with the other gods begins by touching on some themes that are now familiar. Yahweh alone can predict events, and Israel is Yahweh's witness. The passage continues with a scathing attack on idolatry. The prophet is engaging in polemics. He is not attempting to give a sympathetic or even fair presentation of the idol-makers. The idol is only a piece of wood, such as one burns in the fire. It can have no power to save. Of course, the pagans probably looked on their idols much as Roman Catholics have looked on statues of saints—not as the actual sources of power but as representations that are helpful to the worshiper's imagination. The point of the polemic, however, is that the pagan gods are fittingly represented by pieces of wood, because they have no more power than their idols. The God of Israel, by contrast, is represented by a living people, whose resurgence from the Exile witnesses to God's vitality.

The polemic against the idols, then, culminates in the contrast with Israel, whom God has formed to God's own glory. Israel is not an icon but a Servant, a living representative. The "fashioning" of Israel entails wiping out its sin and redeeming it. The liberation from the Exile, then, is the occasion when Israel is to be remade into an appropriate reflection of the glory of God.

44:24–45:13 The Persian messiah. The central contention of this oracle is that Yahweh is creator of all, and therefore the fall of Babylon and the rise of Persia are God's work. The prophet's primary purpose is not to convince the Gentiles of this but to convince the Jews. So he begins by affirming that Yahweh is the redeemer of Israel and by highlighting the restoration of Jerusalem and Judah. The novelty of this passage, however, is the explicit statement that the decree to rebuild Jerusalem will come through the mouth of Cyrus, who is God's anointed king, or messiah (45:1).

The idea that God's purposes are achieved through pagan kings is not a new one. Isaiah of Jerusalem had said that Assyria was the rod of Yahweh's anger (Isa 10:5). Jeremiah declared the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar to be the servant of God (Jer 27:6). Unlike the Assyrian of Isa 10, Cyrus is not accused of pride or arrogance. He fulfills every wish of God. One purpose of his mission is that he himself may come to know that Yahweh is God. The prophet is preaching here a thorough universalism. Pagans may serve Yahweh even though they do not know the God of Israel. Ultimately Yahweh must be known from the rising of the sun to its setting (compare Mal 1:11).

The basis for this universalism is a thorough monotheism, which emerges here more clearly than in any earlier biblical book. There is no God beside Yahweh. Persian religion was dualistic: there was a god of light, responsible for the good, and a god of darkness, responsible for evil. Second Isaiah holds that one God creates both light and darkness, good and evil (45:7). (Compare the rugged insistence of Amos 3:6 that if evil befalls a city, Yahweh must have caused it.) The evil that befell Jerusalem was Yahweh's work; so now it is the rise of Cyrus that brings its restoration.

Not all the Jewish exiles could so readily accept a Persian messiah. The "woes" of verses 9-10 are addressed to those doubters who question whether this can be the work of God. All humankind is created by God and counts as children of God (v. 11). Yet, Second Isaiah has by no means abandoned the special place of Israel. The hand of God can be seen in Cyrus' career because he liberates the Jews and mandates the rebuilding of Jerusalem. It is for the sake of Jacob that Cyrus is called (v. 4). It is in the interest of the Jews themselves to accept the Persian sovereignty as the work of their God.

45:14-25 The hidden God. Nations may serve God without knowing it, but Second Isaiah believed that the time had come for universal recognition. People from the ends of the earth would bring gifts to the temple in Jerusalem. Verses 14-17 formulate a confession for these Gentiles. Verse 15 can also be translated "You are a God who hides yourself." The point is that until now the Gentiles would not have suspected that Yahweh controls all history. What has been hidden, however, is now made manifest. Yet the notion of a hidden God is important. What is going on in history may not always be obvious. We should not jump to conclusions because one party is prospering for a time while another is down; we must wait and see how things come out in the end. The prophet assumes that the humiliation of Israel was temporary and is now over. Its exaltation, which is now beginning, will be lasting and definitive.

The Gentiles say that Yahweh was a hidden God. Yet Yahweh protests that the word of God was not spoken in hiding but in the Jerusalem temple, the sacred space that is the very opposite of an empty waste. The predictions to which Second Isaiah repeatedly refers are the claims traditionally made in the Jerusalem cult that Yahweh is king of all the earth (compare Psalms 93, 96-100). Yahweh has been hidden from the Gentiles only because they have not sought God in the right place. Now, claims the prophet, they are like fugitives from a battle, forced to acknowledge Yahweh by the course of events.

We must observe at this point that the prophet's expectations were not fully realized by the Jewish restoration. Other nations did not feel compelled to acknowledge that Yahweh was responsible for the rise of Persia. Israel would suffer further humiliations in future ages. The aspect of the prophecy that has enduring validity is that Yahweh is a hidden God. Only on rare occasions, like the fall of Babylon, does Yahweh appear to be in control of history. The challenge of Jewish and Christian faith has been to wait for such occasions, to affirm that Yahweh is God even in the depths of the Exile, and to hope that the day of liberation will finally come.

46:1-13 The gods of Babylon. Bel and Nebo are gods of the Babylonians. They are being carried on pack animals in flight from the fallen city. By contrast, Yahweh has carried Israel from its birth. Once again, the release from Babylon is seen as evidence that the God of Israel has power over and above the people of Israel, while the Babylonian gods are no more than their wooden statues.

The warning to the rebels, both Jewish and Gentile, is reminiscent of Psalm 2. God is established on Mount Zion. From there God summons Cyrus from a far land. The "former things" are the events by which Yahweh was first established on Zion (see Exod 15) and which are now being reenacted in the return from the Exile.

47:1-15 A taunt against Babylon. The taunt-song against a fallen enemy was a convention of ancient warfare. In this case the gloating is intensified by the fact that Babylon had humiliated Jerusalem. Two charges are brought against Babylon. First, there is the lack of mercy toward the Jews. The Exile was indeed a punishment designed by God, but Babylon was guilty too. We may compare the indictment of Assyria in Isa 10, even though it was "the rod of Yahweh's anger." Second, Babylon was guilty of hybris, the pride that sets itself equal to God. The boast, "I, and no one else!" (47:8) echoes a claim only Yahweh can make, and is therefore blasphemous. The taunt against Babylon here is similar to Isa 14, where it is called "morning star, son of the dawn," and to the taunts against Tyre in Ezek 27 and 28. Babylon's wisdom led it astray, as the pursuit of wisdom misled Adam and Eve in Gen 2–3. Babylon was famous for astrologers, who claimed they could predict the future by observing the stars, but they have no power to help.

This poem is imbued with a spirit of vengefulness that may be distasteful to modern Westerners. It was fully endorsed, however, in the Christian Book of Revelation, where Babylon is used as a symbol for Rome and is taunted bitterly in Rev 17–18 and contrasted with the new Jerusalem. The vengefulness must be seen in context. It is the outpouring of resentment by the oppressed. It is not love of one's enemy and it is not the noblest human emotion, but it is certainly understandable. The fall of Babylon was a necessary part of the liberation of the Jews. The taunt-song plays a part in rebuilding the self-esteem of a Jewish community that had been humiliated by Babylon. It can still strike a sympathetic cord with any people who are oppressed by an arrogant overlord and whose resentment is too deep to be glossed over by professions of charity.

48:1-22 Rebukes and exhortations. The oracle that concludes the first part of Second Isaiah is exceptional in the severity of its tone. We get the impression that the prophet is exasperated by the people's failure to respond. Many scholars have questioned the unity and authenticity of this chapter. There are indeed problems of coherence and consistency, but the chapter is held together by a number of recurring motifs (for example, the allusions to "stock" and "name" in verse 19 refer back to verse 1).

The prophet begins by establishing the reliability of God's word by referring to the "things of the past" that were foretold long ago. He then proceeds to argue for the need for a prophet, since he is now proclaiming something that has not been previously predicted. The denial that anyone could have heard of these things before is hard to reconcile with a passage like 45:21 ("Who announced this from the beginning. . . . Was it not I, the Lord?"), but compare the emphasis on novelty in 43:19. It may be that only the fall of Babylon is regarded as foretold, while the actual return is absolutely new (as in 43:18-19, "Remember not the events of the past . . .").

Verses 9-11 appear as a digression that affirms God's motive for action: for his own sake. This motivation is well established in the tradition (see already Deut 32:27 and several psalms and prayers). Despite the apparent scorn for Israel here, this passage lays a secure foundation for the restoration, since it does not depend on human merit. Verses 14-15 reaffirm that Cyrus will do God's will against Babylon. Verse 16 makes an unusual assertion of the prophet's own authority. Just as the word of God has been public in the past, so the prophet is sent openly now. Verses 17-19 follow with an appeal for obedience. Finally, in verse 20 we get the climactic command, which is the real "new thing" proclaimed by the prophet—the actual command to flee from Babylon. This command comes as the climax not only of chapter 48 but of the first half of Second Isaiah. It is echoed, appropriately, in Rev 18:4, where flight from another imperial city is demanded of Christians in the time of the end. The flight from Babylon becomes a metaphor for liberation from imperial power in any age.

Despite the severe rebukes of the preceding oracles, the prophet concludes that the Lord has redeemed the Servant. Israel's status as Servant is not something established by its past actions but something that is now being brought about by a new creative act of God. It is an ideal on the verge of realization.

THE RESTORATION OF ZION

Isa 49:1–55:13

49:1-7 The call of the Servant. Here, as in Isa 42, we have a direct reflection on the mission of the Servant. (The unit is often identified as 49:1-6, since a new oracle begins in verse 7, and distinguished as one of the Servant Songs.) The Servant is explicitly identified as Israel in verse 3, yet many commentators have argued that this identification cannot be original, for two reasons: first, the statement "from my mother's womb he gave me my name" strongly suggests that the Servant is an individual; second, in verse 5 the Servant appears to have a mission to Israel, and therefore to be distinct. Some commentators, then, have argued that the Servant in this passage is the prophet himself. The passage is indeed problematic, but there is no warrant for rejecting the clear identification with Israel or for supposing that the Servant here is different from other passages in Second Isaiah.

The statement that the Servant has been called "from the womb" echoes the call of Jeremiah (Jer 1:5: "Before I formed you in the womb I knew you"), and indeed Jeremiah appears in many ways to be a model for understanding the Servant. More broadly, the commissioning of the Servant here follows a traditional pattern already found in the call of Moses in Exod 3:1-4:17. God makes the commission, Moses protests his inadequacy, but God reassures him. The call from the womb is a way of saying that the mission of the Servant is like that of a prophet or Moses.

The apparent distinction between the Servant and Israel in verses 5-6 is more difficult. It is not absolutely certain that it is the Servant who is to raise up the tribes of Jacob; it is possible that God is the subject and that the restoration of Israel coincides with the realization of its mission as Servant. The more common understanding, however, sees the Servant as the subject. In this case we must recognize that the prophet has a special role in the transformation of Israel. He has to live out the role of the Servant and persuade the rest of the people to follow him. He and his followers represent the new Israel, and they still have a mission to their fellow countrymen. Isa 49:4 reflects the discouragement of the prophet, which we have already seen in chapter 48. The reassurance, however, is not only that he will be able to persevere (compare Jer 15:19-21) but that the model of Israel which he represents will prevail.

The mission of the Servant is not only concerned with the restoration of Israel; he must also be "a light to the nations" (v. 6), as in 42:6. Jeremiah, too, was appointed as a prophet to the nations (Jer 1:5). The way in which the mission is to be carried out is clarified in the supplementary oracle in 49:7. The "one despised . . . the slave of rulers" (v. 7) is surely Israel in exile (compare Isa 53:3). When Israel is restored, however, the kings of the earth will be astonished by the transformation and will be led to acknowledge the sovereignty of Yahweh. In this way Israel can be to the nations what the individual prophet was to the Jewish people.

Needless to say, princes did not prostrate themselves as readily as the prophet expected. What is significant, however, is the universal breadth of the mission. Israel remains a chosen people, but salvation must reach to the ends of the earth.

49:8-50:3 Consolation for Zion. This passage has a well-balanced structure. It begins with the triumphal procession back to Israel, as in chapter 40. The central part of the prophecy is a reassurance for Zion. Then the prophet returns to the gathering in of the exiles, viewed this time from the vantage point of Zion (compare Isa 11:10-16). Finally, it concludes with two short oracles affirming Yahweh's power to save.

The most striking lines in this passage are surely those in 49:15: "Can a mother forget her infant . . . ?" Female experience, as well as male, can serve as analogy for God. The analogy of the mother is then transferred to Zion. The abundance of children is indicative of the Hebrew idea of salvation—abundance of life in the land of Israel.

The tenderness toward Israel in this passage is in sharp contrast to the vindictive statement in 49:26: "I will make your oppressors eat their own flesh . . . ." The reference is to cannibalism in a besieged city. Yet, even this atrocious situation has a positive purpose, namely, that all flesh may come to know the Lord. The repetition of the word "flesh" is significant, and it highlights the condition of humanity over against the power of God.

The point of 50:1-3 is that the rejection of Zion was only temporary (for the metaphor of divorce, compare Hos 1-3). It was not that Yahweh was overcome by any other power. How could it be, when Yahweh even overcame the primeval power of the sea? Accordingly, no one should doubt Yahweh's ability to save.

50:4-11 The faithful disciple. This unit is often defined as 50:4-9 and distinguished as a Servant Song (although the word "servant" only occurs in verse 10). The reason it is set apart is that it is written in the first person, like 49:1-6, and appears to describe the sufferings of an individual, as does chapter 53. The "well-trained tongue" of verse 4 is literally "a disciple's tongue." The notion of disciple may be picked up from Isa 8:16, where the prophet's message is entrusted to his disciples.

The portrayal of the disciple here recalls the confessions of Jeremiah (Jer 11:18-23; 15:10-21; 20:7-18). Jeremiah was "like a trusting lamb led to the slaughter" (Jer 12:19), and his pain was continuous (Jer 15:18), yet God made him "a solid wall of brass" (Jer 15:20; compare also Ezek 3:9, where the comparison with flint is used, as in Isa 50:7). The disciple here, like Jeremiah and Ezekiel, is upheld by God in the face of adversity. Moreover, the disciple appears to accept his afflictions willingly, although 50:10-11 may invoke evil on his adversaries, as Jeremiah also did. (Verses 10-11 are very obscure. "Kindle flames" may refer to a Persian ritual or may be merely a metaphor for trying to provide human solutions rather than wait for God.)

The "servant" mentioned in verse 10 is presumably the speaker in verses 4-9. Here again there is some ambiguity as to whether the reference is to the prophet himself or to the community of Israel. The passage makes good sense as an account of the hardships of the prophet, but it could also speak metaphorically of the mission of Israel to the nations. It may be that the prophet and his disciples represent the true mission of Israel, although they meet resistance even within the Jewish community. The enduring significance of the passage is ultimately independent of the historical reference. It paints a picture of the true disciple as one who perseveres in the face of adversity without concern for self-preservation. Christians have appropriately seen a correspondence between this model and the conduct of Jesus in his passion.

51:1-8 Exhortations to trust. The prophet recalls how Abraham was promised numerous descendants while Sarah was yet barren. During the Exile, Zion was as barren as Sarah, but it too will become fertile. Isa 51:4-5 alludes to the oracle in Isa 2:2-4 ("from Zion shall go forth instruction"—the same Hebrew word, torah, is used in both passages). The light to the peoples, associated with the Servant in 42:6 and 49:6, is here the justice of God, manifested from Zion. The permanence of God's justice is then contrasted with the potential transience of the earth and the actual transience of humanity. The power and justice of God cannot be judged on the basis of passing circumstances but only in view of the long-term outcome of events.

51:9–52:12 A rousing call. This long oracle is structured by a triple call of "Awake, awake." The first is addressed to "the arm of the Lord," urging God to repeat the wonderful deeds of old. The Bible has no story of a battle between Yahweh and Rahab or a dragon. The battle with the sea monster was part of Canaanite mythology. It is taken over by the Israelites as a metaphor for the work of creation, when God reduced order to chaos (see Job 26:12). Here it also serves as a metaphor for the Exodus, when God "dried up the sea." The prophet is not interested in verifying the historical facts of the Exodus—"slaying the dragon" and "drying up the sea" are equally appropriate ways of referring to God's ability to overcome any enemy or obstacle. What matters is not what God did in the past but what God is doing in the present.

The second call is addressed to Jerusalem. Ezekiel had said that Jerusalem would drink the cup of her sister Samaria, a cup of grief and destruction (Ezek 23:32-33; Jer 25:15-29 uses the image of a cup for the destruction to come upon the nations). Now Second Isaiah proclaims that the cup has been drunk and is being taken away and given to Jerusalem's enemies. We may note that the image of Jerusalem giving her back to her enemies to walk on resembles the Servant giving his back to the smiters in Isa 50:6.

The final call (52:1) urges Zion to put on strength (like the arm of the Lord in 51:9) and promises redemption. In the future, Jerusalem would be pure—free from the uncircumcised. The apparent exclusion of the uncircumcised here serves as a reminder that the universalism of the prophet is not religious pluralism but requires the conversion of the Gentiles to the religion of Israel.

The concluding oracle of this section develops the theme of the new Exodus in a manner reminiscent of Isa 40. This Exodus will not be in haste, as was the first one. God will go before and after, like the pillars of fire and cloud. The joy of liberation is coupled with the call for those who carry the sacred vessels to purify themselves. The return to Jerusalem has the character of a religious procession from the profane place of Babylon to the sacred area of Jerusalem. There God is proclaimed king, just as in the psalms of the old Jerusalem cult.

52:13–53:12 The Suffering Servant. The so-called fourth or last Servant Song is Second Isaiah's best known contribution to Judeo-Christian spirituality, and deservedly so. Christianity has traditionally seen here a prophecy of the passion of Jesus. Historical criticism, however, proceeds on the assumption that the prophecy made sense to the people of the prophet's time, whatever further levels of meaning were later found in it. The original meaning is inevitably bound up with the identification of the Servant. Scholars who distinguish the Servant Songs as separate compositions usually identify a historical figure here—often the prophet himself or Sheshbazzar, the heir to the Davidic throne. In the context of Second Isaiah as a whole, however, the Servant must be identified as Israel, although the prophet holds an idealized view of the Servant's role, and not all the exilic community lived up to it.

The significance of this passage goes beyond the historical identification of the Servant. It presents a model of piety which allows that suffering can have a positive purpose. As such it broke with a long biblical tradition that regarded suffering as a punishment for sin. It laid the foundation for one of the basic ideas of Christianity.

Isa 52:13-15 is presented as an utterance of God. It focuses on the coming transformation of the Servant from extreme humiliation to glory. Since this change will be witnessed by kings and nations, we must assume that the Servant is the Israelite nation or someone who represents it.

In 53:1 the speaker changes. Chapter 53 expresses the astonishment of the "kings" and the "nations" mentioned in 52:15. It attributes to them a startling affirmation: "it was our infirmities that he bore, our sufferings that he endured . . ." (53:4). The Servant, we are told, was delivered up to death and was counted with the wicked, although he had done no wrong. His life was given as a sacrifice for the sins of others. The concluding verses in 53:10-12 are apparently spoken by God and confirm this affirmation.

The statement that the Servant had done no wrong appears to contradict other statements in Second Isaiah (for example, Isa 50:1: "It was for your sins that you were sold."). The contradiction is only apparent. Isa 53:1-10 is not giving a factual account of Israel's experience but is presenting a model for understanding it. The guilt of Israel is not important for this model. Relative to the nations, Israel was innocent. As we were told in chapter 40, the punishment exceeded the guilt in any case. Here the prophet is concerned with the excess of punishment.

The model of the Servant is indebted to the precedent of the prophet Jeremiah. Jeremiah was like a lamb led to the slaughter (Jer 12:19); so also was the Servant in 53:7. More generally, the experience of Jeremiah showed that a faithful prophet might have to suffer to fulfill his mission. As Jeremiah was a prophet to Israel, so Israel is to the nations.

The model of the Servant goes beyond Jeremiah insofar as the Servant is apparently put to death (53:8-9) and yet will prolong his days and see his descendants. The people of Israel were said to die in the Exile and rise again at its end in Ezekiel's vision of a valley of dry bones and in Isa 26. That is also the original meaning of chapter 53. It is not difficult, however, to see how Christianity could claim that this model was again exemplified in the death of Jesus of Nazareth.

The key notion in chapter 53 is that the sufferings of the righteous can bear the sin of others. This idea is based on the analogy of sacrifice. The logic of the procedure can be illustrated by the famous ritual of the scapegoat in Lev 16. Aaron confesses the sins of the Israelites over the goat and puts them on its head, and then it carries the sins off to the wilderness. This ritual is evidently a symbolic act. It can have a powerful effect on the people, but only if they participate actively in it. They must understand the symbolism and intend to express their separation from sin. The mere performance of the ritual will not of itself transform the people without their involvement.

The dynamic interaction involved in bearing the sin of others can be seen even more clearly in a symbolic action of the prophet Ezekiel. Ezekiel was famous for his insistence on individual responsibility (Ezek 18:4: "only the one who sins shall die"). He clearly defined the role of the prophet as that of a watchman (Ezek 3:17; 33:1-9). His job is to warn the people. They have to save themselves by their reaction. Yet this prophet is told to lie on one side for 390 days, and on the other for forty days, to bear the sins of northern Israel and Judah respectively (Ezek 4:1-8). In Ezekiel's case, bearing the sin is clearly a symbolic act. The strange posture of the prophet is meant to attract attention, give rise to reflection, and lead people to recognize the gravity of their situation. Only if they do this can they hope to be saved. The suffering of Ezekiel does not automatically prevent the destruction of his people. There is not a set amount of suffering that he can undertake instead of them. His suffering is only a sign to them. Whether they then escape their doom depends on how they heed his warning.

The suffering of the Servant in chapter 53 can be understood most satisfactorily on the model of Ezekiel. The Servant is a light to the nations. The experience of Israel is to catch the attention of the other nations, lead them to reflect on their situation, and realize that they are even more deserving of such punishment. The purpose of the Exile was ultimately to bring about the conversion of the Gentiles. The mission of the Servant, to which the Jews were called, was to accept unmerited suffering in patient fidelity and so to serve as an example for the nations.

The Gentile nations did not react to the Jewish experience in the way the prophet hoped. Yet the model of the Servant has endured. It provides a way of making positive sense of suffering, which is always a challenge to the human spirit. It also suggests a style of evangelizing, not by conquering others but by bearing their burdens and setting an example. For Christians this model was intensified by the example of Jesus, whose suffering and death were also understood as a sacrifice for the sins of others.

54:1-7 A promise to Zion. The prophet resumes the joyful proclamation to Zion that was the theme of Isa 52:1-12. Two motifs are especially important here. First, Zion is the wife of God. The prophet Hosea used this metaphor to great effect and suggested that God was divorcing Israel. Second, Isaiah insists that Zion was only cast off for a moment (compare Isa 50:1 for the motif of divorce). Moreover, the abandoned wife will have more children than one who has a husband. (This is a favorite biblical theme. To illustrate how God can reverse any situation, compare the Song of Hannah in 1 Sam 2.) Underlying the metaphor of marriage is the idea of a covenant, a binding mutual commitment. The language of marriage, however, adds an emotional dimension to the covenant and deepens the commitment by arousing feelings of love.

The second theme is the analogy with the days of Noah. After the flood God guaranteed the future of life on earth: "Never again will I doom the earth because of man . . . . As long as the earth lasts, seedtime and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease" (Gen 8:21-22). That promise had been kept since the days of Noah. The promise to Zion is equally sure. Second Isaiah is reaffirming the traditional Zion theology found, for example, in Ps 46:3: "Therefore we fear not, though the earth be shaken . . . ."

Here we cannot fail to observe that Zion was destroyed again. On a literal level the promise would seem to be broken. Yet, both Judaism and Christianity continue to affirm that "my love shall never leave you nor my covenant of peace be shaken" (v. 10). The peace must be understood as an inner peace that can survive not only the shaking of the hills but the destruction of Zion itself. The restoration from the Exile had shown that God was with the people even in the darkness. The moment of clarity enjoyed by Second Isaiah would have to be remembered as a witness again in darker days ahead.

55:1-13 Call to a feast. The invitation to eat and drink resembles the call of Wisdom to her feast in Prov 9. The prophet suggests that wisdom lies in heeding his words and returning to Zion. The feast is identified with the promises of the covenant to David. As the king was a witness to other nations, so now the restored people is to assume that role. The prophet does not anticipate a renewed Davidic dynasty; his messiah is Cyrus of Persia. Yet the Davidic covenant is not broken. It is fulfilled through the restoration of the Jewish people. Such transformations are possible because "my ways are not your ways." Second Isaiah maintains the contrast made by First Isaiah between the power of the Holy One (spirit) and mere human flesh (compare Isa 31:1-3).

Isa 55:10-13 provides a fitting conclusion to Second Isaiah by affirming the effectiveness of the prophetic word. The triumphal procession back to Jerusalem with which the prophet began in chapter 40 is the crowning validation of the reliability of prophecy and the power of the God of Israel.

COMMENTARY: THIRD ISAIAH (Isa 56–66)

Chapters 40–55 were set in Babylon on the eve of the return from the Exile. Chapters 56–66 are slightly later in date and reflect the problems of the Jewish community after the return. It is possible that they are the work of Second Isaiah, at least in part, that is, if we allow that his style of prophecy was altered by the new circumstances. It is more probable, however, that they are the work of his disciples, who emerged as a distinct group in the returned community. These disciples are referred to as the servants of the Lord in chapter 65. Presumably they saw themselves as carrying on the mission of the Servant, which played such a prominent part in Second Isaiah.

56:1-8 Qualifications for admission to the temple. Only two things are necessary for admission to the rebuilt temple—observance of the sabbath and fidelity to the covenant. The prophet does not spell out what the latter requirement entails. The point of the oracle is to insist that two classes of people, eunuchs and foreigners, are not automatically excluded. Eunuchs had been specifically excluded according to Deut 23:1: "No one whose testicles have been crushed or whose penis has been cut off, may be admitted to the community of the Lord." Some high officials at royal courts in the ancient world had to be eunuchs so that they could be trusted with the royal harem. Some people castrated themselves in the worship of pagan gods. At least some of these people could not subsequently be circumcised, and Third Isaiah does not appear to insist on circumcision as a requirement. "To hold fast to my covenant" (v. 4) appears to be a broad moral attitude rather than a matter of specific rituals, except for the case of sabbath observance.

The second class in question is that of foreigners (v. 6). The prophet is speaking here of converts who want to join themselves to the Lord. The point is that people who were not born Israelites can become servants of the Lord. The significance of this oracle can be seen by contrasting it with Ezek 44, which presents a different program for the postexilic temple, according to which "no foreigners, uncircumcised in heart and in flesh, shall ever enter my sanctuary; none of the foreigners who live among the Israelites" (Ezek 44:9).

It is evident that there was disagreement within the Jewish community as to whether foreigners should be allowed to worship in the temple. What is remarkable is that both sides of the debate were preserved in the canon of the Scripture. The authors of Isa 56 and Ezek 44 were both sincerely concerned with the welfare of their community, and both were trying to be faithful to older traditions. The exclusivist viewpoint of Ezek 44 received powerful support from Ezra in the following century and may be credited with strengthening the distinctive identity of Judaism. Christianity has undoubtedly found the inclusive vision of Third Isaiah much more congenial in this matter.

56:9–57:21 Denunciation of abuses. There is no agreement among commentators about the unity, origin, or meaning of this passage. Since it resembles preexilic oracles against idolatry, some scholars think that this material is preexilic too. Others read the whole passage as an attack on the postexilic priestly leaders of the community and think that idolatry here is a metaphor for a style of religion of which the author did not approve. Very likely neither of these extremes is correct. The oracles are evidently directed against religious leaders—compare the use of watchman (as prophet) in Ezek 3:17; 33:1-9; Jer 6:17 and of shepherd (as leader) in Ezek 34. We must assume, however, that the charges are meant literally. The leaders are at best negligent, and there is widespread pagan worship. (Isa 57:9, which speaks of sending ambassadors to the "king," melek, even down to the netherworld, probably means that people offered human sacrifice to the Canaanite god Molech.) The people who engaged in these practices were certainly not the more exclusive faction whose views are represented in Ezek 44 and with whom Third Isaiah had a different quarrel. Much of the Jewish community after the Exile was quite lax in its religious observance, as we can see from the tirades of the prophets Haggai and Malachi, and from the reforms that were necessary in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah.

The rhetoric in much of this passage is simply abusive. The prophet was unlikely to win over the leaders by calling them "dumb dogs" (56:10) or the like. This is the language of polarization, which presumes that the situation is beyond remedy. Such language can only seldom be justified.

Chapter 57 concludes with a more positive attempt "to revive the spirits of the dejected" (57:15) and seems to hold out the prospect of forgiveness. Even the sinners are souls that God has made. In 57:14 ("prepare the way") the prophet seeks to recapture some of the initial enthusiasm of Second Isaiah. The final verse, however, maybe added by an editor, dampens this spirit of reconciliation by insisting that there is no peace for the wicked.

58:1-14 The value of fasting. After the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.E., it became customary to observe four fast days, in the fourth, fifth, seventh, and tenth months (Zech 8:18; compare Zech 7:5). Third Isaiah denies that this observance has any intrinsic value. He does not object to ritual as such—he complains of inadequate observance of the sabbath. Ritual only has value, however, when it is the expression of a just society. Self-affliction is not a good in itself; feeding the hungry is. Verses 6-7 give a concise summary of the essentials of true religion: free the oppressed, feed the hungry, shelter the homeless, clothe the naked. The prophet anticipates the criteria for the final judgment in Matt 25:31-46, but he is drawing on a long tradition of prophetic criticism (compare Amos 5:18-27, which insists that worship without justice has no value). The problems of injustice were apparently as great in Third Isaiah's time as before the Exile, although we might have expected a more close-knit community after the return (the prophet refers to the poor as "your own" in 58:7).

The postexilic community experienced much difficulty after the return. The prophet Haggai attributed their lack of prosperity to their tardiness in rebuilding the temple. Third Isaiah attributes it to the lack of social justice. In this he was the more typical of the older prophetic tradition.

59:1-21 A promise of divine intervention. Chapter 59 continues the theme of chapter 58. Lack of prosperity is not due to Yahweh's weakness but to human sin. In this case the prophet goes on to predict a divine response. Yahweh would be girded as a warrior, as at the time of the Exodus and the Conquest. Underlying this prediction is the prophet's faith that God has the power to punish the wicked and the hope that God will do so immediately, within the course of human history.

There was no miraculous transformation of Jewish society after the Exile. Later biblical literature would increasingly postpone God's judgment to an end-time or until after death. Belief in an eventual judgment remained vital, however. The hope and concern for justice in this world is an important part of the prophetic legacy and is inseparable from belief in the sovereignty of Yahweh.

We should note that Yahweh is expected to take vengeance on a segment of Jewish society, not on foreign nations. Those who will be redeemed on Zion are "those who turn from sin" (v. 20). We find here a division within the Jewish community and a distinction between the servants of God and the members of the Jewish nation as such.

60:1-22 Restoration of Zion. Chapters 60–62 stand out from the rest of Third Isaiah by their exuberant tone, which is very similar to Second Isaiah. Perhaps these chapters were written shortly after the return, before the problems that dominate the other chapters had developed. Jerusalem is seen as the focal point of the nations. The prospect of caravans coming from such places as Sheba (v. 6) recalls the glory of Solomon. The foreigners and their kings will be subject to the Jews and be their servants, but they will be welcome in Jerusalem and their offerings will be accepted in the temple. The vision of the new Zion is universalistic in this sense, in contrast to the exclusive vision of Ezek 44. The prophet envisages a wonderful transformation—the people will all be just, and Yahweh will give light to the city by means of the divine presence. This vision of the new Jerusalem is echoed in Rev 21:22-27 in the context of a new creation after the end of this world. The idea of a new creation is also found in Third Isaiah (65:17). The prophet knew that such a wonderful state is not the stuff of history or of human experience but represents an ideal goal that can serve as a guide for our values.

61:1-11 Good news for the poor. The opening verses are very similar to the so-called Servant Songs in Isa 42 and 49. The prophet sees himself as realizing the mission of the Servant. The prisoners in question are the Jewish exiles in Babylon. The year of favor is the sabbatical year, traditionally the time for the cancellation of debts and the release of Hebrew slaves (see Deut 15; compare Lev 25). The anointing is probably metaphorical (virtually meaning "appointed"). Prophets were not usually anointed, although Elijah was told to anoint Elisha in 1 Kgs 19:16.

In the context of Third Isaiah, this passage illustrates again the concern of the prophet for the poor, a concern that was prominent in Isa 58 and 59. The importance of the passage transcends its historical context, however. It presents a concise summary of the mission of a servant of God in any age. It is a mission to raise up the lower strata of society. The Gospel of Luke has Jesus read this text, with minor variations, at the outset of his career (Luke 4:17-19).

The prophet is here the bearer of good news, like Zion itself in Isa 40:9. Verses 4-9 repeat the universalistic vision of Isa 60 but add a note of concern for justice in verse 8 and a promise of an everlasting covenant, presumably a renewal of the promise to David, as in Isa 55:3. Now all the people are the beneficiaries of that promise. Further, all the people will be named priests of the Lord (v. 6). The prophet sees the whole Jewish people as priestly mediators between God and the Gentiles. This extension of the priesthood inevitably dilutes the role of the official hierarchy and contrasts very sharply with the program for the restoration in Ezek 44, which assigns a very special role to the Zadokite priests. (Compare the dispute in Num 16, where Korah rebels against Moses and Aaron, contending that the whole people is holy, but is swallowed alive by the earth for his impertinence!) The canon of Scripture has preserved both sides of this debate without resolving it. In the New Testament, Rev 20:6 says that all the martyrs who are raised in the first resurrection will serve God as priests for a thousand years, without distinguishing a special priestly class. This, of course, is resurrected life, but it presents an ultimate ideal for the people of God.

62:1-12 Reminding the Lord. Chapter 62 retains the positive tone of chapters 60–61, but it also reflects some initial disappointment after the return to Jerusalem. It is necessary to "remind the Lord" because God does not appear to be fulfilling earlier promises. The prophet insists that all will yet be well, because the Lord has sworn. The purpose of this oracle is to encourage the returned exiles to plant grain, in confidence that it will not all go in taxes, and to build up the city. We may compare the oracles of Haggai of about the same time, when he promised that all would be well if they built the temple.

The assurance of a divine oath, or promise, is a powerful motivating factor. There is a risk in such rhetoric, however. If the land remains relatively desolate, the discrepancy between the promise and the reality can breed extreme disillusionment. The prophet was attempting to use the power of positive thinking (unlike most other prophets!) to raise the morale of the people, in the hope that their efforts would be blessed. Even if the result fell short of the ideal, the efforts of the prophets may have borne fruit insofar as they inspired people to work at rebuilding their community.

63:1-6 God the warrior. The mood changes abruptly in chapter 63. The warrior imagery picks up from Isa 59 (63:5 corresponds very closely to 59:16), but the imagery is much more violent here. The violence is directed against the Gentiles, specifically against Edom and its capital Bozrah. Edom, Judea's southern neighbor, had become a major enemy during the exilic period. It is possible that this oracle was evoked by some hostile action taken by the Edomites, although many commentators assume that Edom is representative of all hostile nations. We met another violent oracle against Edom in Isa 34.

The image of God as warrior is deeply entrenched in the oldest traditions about the Exodus and the Conquest (for example, Exod 15). The God of Israel was never a pacifist, although the people are often urged to take a submissive stance. The assumption here is that Edom and some other neighboring states were impeding the restoration of Judah. The prophet does not call on the Jews to make war on them, but he hopes that his God will remove the offenders by whatever means are necessary.

63:7–64:11 A plea for God to act. This passage is virtually a psalm and especially resembles the communal laments of the Psalter (for example, Psalm 44). It reflects a traditional pattern, which begins by recalling God's saving deeds in the past (especially the Exodus and the Conquest), acknowledges the sin of Israel, and ends with a plea for mercy (compare Deut 32, which ends with a promise rather than a prayer, and such postexilic prayers as Neh 9 and Dan 9). In part it also resembles the laments for the temple in the period of the Exile (for example, Psalm 79). The prayer that God "rend the heavens and come down" (63:19) has a ring of desperation to it. The main problem in interpreting the passage is to determine why the author was moved to such desperation.

Two verses are especially important for the author's situation. One is 63:18. The first half of that verse is translated in the Revised Standard Version as "Thy holy people possessed thy sanctuary a little while," and this rendering is more probable than that of the New American Bible. Does this mean that the whole duration of Solomon's temple—about 350 years—seems short in retrospect? Or does it mean that one Jewish party occupied the sanctuary for a short time after the return from the Exile and was then ousted by its enemies? (Some scholars think here of Ezek 44, which makes the Levites subordinate to the Zadokite priests, and suggest that chapter 63 was written by Levites.)

The second relevant verse is 63:16: "Were Abraham not to know us . . . you, Lord, are our father." This translation suggests a purely hypothetical situation—compare Isa 49:15: "Can a mother forget her infant . . . ? Even should she forget, I will never forget you." The Hebrew, however, could be translated more naturally as "for Abraham has not known us." This understanding of the text has prompted the view that the author of chapter 63 belonged to a party that was rejected by the official leaders of the community, represented here as Abraham and Israel. The passage, then, can be understood in either of two ways: either it reflects a bitter struggle within the Jewish community after the Exile, or it more simply reflects the initial failure of the returned exiles to rebuild and restore the holy place. In view of the other indications in Third Isaiah (especially in chapters 56 and 66), it seems more probable that the prophet's desperation arose from conflict within the Jewish community.

Whatever the precise origin of this passage, it is clearly a prayer for a time of despair. Two features should especially be emphasized. The first is the frank admission of sinfulness: "all of us have become like unclean men" (64:5). Even if there is a split in the community, no party can claim complete innocence. Second, when no human aid is forthcoming, the prophet appeals directly to God. It was God who brought them out of Egypt (63:9: "It was not a messenger or an angel but he himself" can also be phrased differently and understood to say that "the angel of his presence" saved them. In either case the point is the same: it was no human resource). The plea to rend the heavens forcefully (63:19) expresses the need for help from beyond (compare Isa 59:16 and 63:5: "there was no one"). The plea is based, not on the justice of God, but on God's mercy; he is the Father of all. The idea of God as Father assures the right of even outsiders and castaways to invoke God, irrespective of their standing in the community. The motif is used in a similar way in Mal 2:10 in an argument against divorce. The fatherhood of God was a characteristic motif on the lips of Jesus, who argued that the one Father made the sun shine and rain fall on the just and the unjust (Matt 5:45).

65:1-16 My servants will eat. The division within the postexilic community is more explicit here. The prophet evidently identifies with the "servants" who continue the mission of the Servant of Second Isaiah. This group is at odds with another party, which is accused of a range of idolatrous practices. Yet these people claim to be holy and warn others not to touch them. This puzzling passage reminds us of Ezek 44:19, where the Zadokite priests are told to change their vestments when they leave the altar so that they will not transmit holiness to the people. Some scholars read the grotesque practices of 65:3-4 as a parody of the official cult of the legitimate priests (see the commentary on Isa 66). It is more probable, however, that chapters 65 and 57 show that there was actual idolatry going on. The fact that the idolaters think they are holy only adds to the grotesque character of their abuses.

We must also assume that the idolaters enjoyed the main power in the postexilic community. They have now inherited the land. The "servants" are outsiders, who are powerless for the present. The prophecy in 65:13-16 anticipates the beatitudes of Jesus, especially in the Lukan version: "Blest are you poor; the reign of God is yours. Blest are you who hunger; you shall be filled" (Luke 6:20). A major function of religion has always been to give hope to the hopeless. The prophet merely asserts that fortunes will yet be reversed. He offers no evidence for his claim. Neither does Jesus in the beatitudes. The only evidence for such a claim is faith in the power of a God who will ultimately set things right and the knowledge that all human power and wealth must eventually pass.

65:17-25 A new creation. The prophetic dissatisfaction with the present is even more evident in 65:17, in the oracle about a new creation. The idea that God would do something radically new was familiar from Second Isaiah (compare Isa 43:18-19). The replacement of heaven and earth, however, goes far beyond the earlier concepts. This prophecy is picked up in Rev 21:1 ("Then I saw new heavens and a new earth") and is often thought to be typical of apocalyptic literature. In chapter 65, however, the new creation is remarkably similar to the old one. Life will go on on earth. People will still die, and there is no promise of resurrection or immortality, in sharp contrast to the apocalyptic literature. Rather, the prophet presents his ideal of earthly life: freedom from grief, from premature death, from oppression and exploitation.

The concluding mention of the wolf and the lamb (v. 25) very deliberately recalls the messianic prophecy in Isa 11. Both prophecies are fantasies, although chapter 65 is more restrained in its imagery. Both provide consolation and relief from the distress of the present. The ideal presented must also be taken seriously, however, as a portrayal of the goal toward which we strive, even if we cannot fully attain it.

66:1-6 True and false worship. The interpretation of these verses has been greatly disputed. Some scholars contend that the prophet is rejecting temple worship as such; others hold that the issue is how much importance should be attached to the temple. The second point of view is the more probable. Third Isaiah seems to presuppose a temple in other passages (including 66:6). Even Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple (1 Kgs 8:27) had declared: "If the heavens and the highest heavens cannot contain you, how much less this temple which I have built!" The point is that the temple must be seen in perspective. It is not the most important thing in the religion.

Third Isaiah's perspective on the temple here contrasts sharply with that of Haggai, who preached that rebuilding the temple was the primary requirement for prosperity in the postexilic community. Here again, the canon of Scripture has preserved both sides of a heated debate. The temple was very important for the morale of the community, and we can appreciate why a prophet like Haggai insisted on thinking positively about it. On the other hand, Third Isaiah walks in the footsteps of the great prophets, including Isaiah of Jerusalem, when he points out the danger of trusting too completely in an institution and reminds people of the ethical demands of their religion.

The interpretation of 66:3 is even more controversial. The Hebrew juxtaposes four pairs of actions, indicated by participles: "slaughtering an ox, slaying a man," etc. These pairs can be understood in either of two ways: "one who slaughters an ox is like one who slays a man" (so the New American Bible and the Revised Standard Version), or "one who slaughters an ox also slays a man." The first interpretation empties the sacrificial cult of all value; even a cereal offering is no better than swine's blood. If the second interpretation is correct, the problem is syncretism: those who offer the sacrifices to Yahweh also engage in pagan practices. In either case, there is a division within the community, and the prophet and his followers find themselves rejected. The understanding of this passage depends on our understanding of other passages, such as Isa 57. It seems more probable that pagan worship was the issue. The evidence does not warrant the drastic conclusion that the prophet totally rejected the sacrificial cult.

66:7-24 The Lord's power shall be known. The book concludes with a twofold oracle of judgment. On the positive side, the prophet points out how far the postexilic community has already come. Would God have brought them so far only to abandon them? The prophet cloaks his message in plentiful metaphors of childbirth and mother love. At verse 14, however, the negative side of the judgment appears. Power for the servants of God is wrath for God's enemies. The fiery coming of the Lord resembles the coming of God's messenger in Mal 3:2: "For he is like the refiner's fire."

The conclusion, then, has two aspects.

The exiles will return from all the nations. Some will even serve as priests and Levites. All humankind will worship in Jerusalem. This bright prospect has a dark side too. The corpses of the wicked will burn and be eaten by worms forever, as a spectacle for the rest of humanity. The wicked will not be alive to feel the pain of this punishment. The idea of hell did not emerge in the Jewish tradition until about three hundred years after Third Isaiah, yet this passage is rightly seen as a precedent for hell, because it attempts to describe an unending punishment of the wicked.

The lurid spectacle of 66:24 is a rather unpleasant note on which to close the Book of Isaiah. The idea was surely born of the resentment of the prophet's followers, who were excluded from power in the postexilic community. It expresses their hope for justice, but seems excessive in its prolonged torture of dead bodies. It does, however, provide a powerful closing image for the Book of Isaiah. Much of the book was concerned with salvation on Mount Zion. This theme was repeated in chapters 65–66 and reinforced with the theme of a new creation. The final image does not detract from these themes, but it adds a reminder that salvation cannot be achieved without judgment. The wolf will not lie down with the lamb until human evil is eradicated. The smoldering fire of Gehenna stands as a reminder of the reality of evil and its inevitable unpleasant consequences.

JEREMIAH

Peter F. Ellis

INTRODUCTION

Jeremiah the man

Jeremiah lived in changing times. He grew up in the best of times and died in the worst of times. He grew up during the reign of King Josiah (639–609 B.C.E.), when Judah was at peace and when king, priests, and people were engaged in a revitalization of Mosaic faith and worship. He died around 580, an exile in Egypt in the worst of times, when Judah was no longer a nation, Jerusalem was in ruins, the temple had been burned to the ground, and the Jews had been deported into exile in Babylon. His life spanned the last twenty years of the Assyrian empire (destroyed by the Babylonians between 612 and 605) and the first twenty years of the neo-Babylonian empire (605–539). He was and had to be "a man for all seasons."

Jeremiah was born in Anathoth, a few miles north of Jerusalem, belonged to a priestly family, and was called to the office of prophet at an early age (c. 626). During the forty or so years he served as a prophet (626–580), the kingdom of Judah went through one religious reformation (626–609); three wars (against Egypt, 609; against Babylon, 597 and 587); three exiles (597, 587, and 582); and five Davidic kings (Josiah, 639–609; Jehoahaz, for three months in 609; Jehoiakim, 609–597; Jehoiachin, for three months in 597; and Zedekiah, 597–587). During these years Judah went from one of the brightest periods in its history (under King Josiah from 639–609) to the darkest (609–587) in all the 443 years of the Davidic dynasty (1025–587).

Few people in history have been involved so crucially in the fate of a nation as Jeremiah was. He preached the renewal of the covenant under King Josiah in 621. He lived through the first (597) and the second siege (587) of Jerusalem. He saw the temple destroyed, Jerusalem devastated, and his people marched off into exile in Babylonia. At the end he himself was forced into exile in Egypt. There he died, stoned to death, as the legend goes, at the hands of his own people.

With the exception perhaps of Jesus and St. Paul, we know more about Jeremiah as an individual than about any other person in the whole history of Israel. We know from his own words that he was a quiet, peace-loving mystic sent by God, against his inclinations, to rebuke kings, accuse his fellow Jews of infidelity to the covenant, and draw upon himself in return the scorn, contempt, and homicidal hatred of his enemies.

Jeremiah did not want to be a prophet. The prophetic office guaranteed trouble. Jeremiah wanted peace. He had no peace. His own relatives plotted his death (11:18–12:6). Pashhur, the high priest, had him scourged and thrown into the stocks overnight (20:1-2). He preached against abuses in the temple, was put on trial for his life and barely acquitted (ch. 26). He had to go into hiding during most of the twelve-year reign of King Jehoiakim. When a book of his sermons was read before the king, the king fed the manuscript page by page into a fire (ch. 36). During the siege of 588–587, he was first arrested and thrown in prison. Later he was dropped into a cistern to die. He was rescued only at the last minute by his Ethiopian friend, the eunuch Ebed-melech (ch. 38). When the Babylonians captured Jerusalem, they found Jeremiah in chains with other Jews, awaiting deportation to Babylon (44:1-6). Jeremiah describes his internal sufferings in his famous confessions (11:18–12:6; 15:10-21; 17:12-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-18).

All in all, no one in the history of Israel was more like Jesus than Jeremiah. Jesus taught in parables; so did Jeremiah. Jesus was rejected by his own people; so was Jeremiah. Jesus wept for his people; so did Jeremiah. Jesus was scourged, imprisoned, and put on trial for his life; so was Jeremiah. In the end the tragedy of Jerusalem in the time of Jesus paralleled the tragedy of Jerusalem in the time of Jeremiah. Jesus prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple by the Romans; Jeremiah prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple by the Babylonians. In each case the prophecy was fulfilled: in 587 B.C.E. by the Babylonians, in A.D. 70 by the Romans. Jeremiah resembled Jesus in so many ways that the Jews of Jesus' time wondered if Jesus might not be Jeremiah come back from the dead (see Matt 16:14)!

It is perhaps too much to say, as Ernest Renan said, that "without this extraordinary man, the religious history of humanity would have taken another course." It certainly is not too much to say that without Jeremiah the mystical side of human nature and the unfathomable capacity of the human heart for unselfish suffering might have lain hidden until the coming of Jesus. The theology Jeremiah lived, more than the theology he preached, influenced the ages that followed him and produced psalmists and wisdom writers who sounded the depths of Jeremiah's heart. His life more than his teaching was a ferment and a fire that permeated the bones of Israel after the Exile and prepared the way for him who came to cast a similar fire on earth and to see it kindled in the lives of innumerable saints.

Jeremiah's message

Jeremiah's message as a prophet to his people was at the same time the most pessimistic and the most optimistic that could be conceived. When he looked at the abysmal state of Judah's covenant relationship with God, he sank into pessimism. When he looked at the patient and long-suffering God of Israel, he was filled with optimism. His God was a God of hope, of promise, of power, and of an indomitable will to make the people of Israel a holy people.

In typical prophetic fashion, Jeremiah accused his people of sins against the covenant and predicted God's judgment upon them. But he did more than just accuse and condemn. He raised the consciousness of his people. He made them see that crimes against each other were crimes against God. He made them see that God loved them even when he chastised them. Finally, when he saw that destruction was inevitable, that Israel was not responding to God, and that the old covenant was finished, he predicted a new covenant (31:31-34). This was the covenant inaugurated by Jesus on the night before his death (see Luke 22:20 and 1 Cor 11:25).

The Book of Jeremiah

In 604 B.C.E. while in hiding, Jeremiah dictated to his secretary, Baruch, the gist of what he had preached during his past twenty-three years as a prophet (see ch. 36 and 25:1-14). When the king had Jeremiah's manuscript burned (36:21-23), Jeremiah had Baruch compose a new manuscript (36:32). Scholars believe that the greater part of this second manuscript has been preserved in chapters 1–20 and chapter 25 of the present Book of Jeremiah. Verses 1-14 of chapter 25 appear to be the conclusion of the manuscript written in 604. The rest of the book (chs. 26–52) is made up of biographical material about Jeremiah (chs. 26–44), a collection of Jeremiah's prophecies against the pagan nations (chs. 45–51), and a final chapter (ch. 52) taken from 2 Kgs 25.

What confuses the reader of Jeremiah is the lack of chronological sequence in the book. The siege of Jerusalem in 588–587 B.C.E. is first mentioned in chapter 21. In chapter 25, however, the reader is back in the year 604 B.C.E. This happens regularly. What is the explanation? The best explanation is that the editors of the prophetic books had before them several collections of material dealing with the preaching of Jeremiah, stories about him, and historical accounts of the last days of Judah. They had the manuscript dictated in 604, together with collections of prophecies against the kings of Judah (chs. 21–23) and against the false prophets (23:9-40). In addition, they had a collection of prophecies dealing with the new covenant (chs. 30–33), a large collection of biographical material (chs. 24; 26–29; 34–45; 52), and a collection of Jeremiah's prophecies against the pagan nations (chs. 46–51). Instead of placing all this material in chronological order, a task that would have been extremely difficult, they put it together more or less end to end and thematically, so that events mentioned earlier in the book in one collection are sometimes duplicated later in another collection of material. An example of this confusion is Jeremiah's famous temple sermon. Jeremiah gives his version of the sermon in chapters 7 and 8; someone else gives another, abbreviated version in chapter 26.

All this is the fault—if we can call it that—of the third-century editors. Nothing can be done now to change it. The best the reader can do is to try to read each collection of material as a collection, asking of each collection what its message as a whole is. This is the way we shall deal with the book in this commentary. It is not the only way, but it is the least confusing way. Reading the book in its present order, we shall comment on its message under the following headings:

PART I Jeremiah's call (1:1-19)

PART II Jeremiah's preaching from 626 to 604 B.C.E. (2:1–20:18)
- A. Jeremiah's earliest sermons (2:1–6:30)
- B. The temple sermon (7:1–8:3)
- C. Accusations and judgments (8:4–10:25)
- D. Deuteronomic sermons, confessions, and parables (11:1–20:18)

PART III Prophecies against the kings and the false prophets (21:1–25:38)
- A. Prophecies against the kings and false prophets (21:1–24:10)
- B. The conclusion of Jeremiah's book (25:1-38)

PART IV Biographical material and the new covenant (26:1–33:26)
- A. The temple sermon (26:1-24)
- B. Jeremiah against the false prophets (27:1–29:32)
- C. Jeremiah and the new covenant (30:1–33:26)

PART V Disobedience and destruction (34:1–39:18)
- A. The broken pact with the slaves (34:1-22)
- B. The Rechabites obey but Israel does not (35:1-19)
- C. Contempt for the word of the Lord (36:1-32)
- D. Contempt for the Lord's prophet (37:1–38:28)
- E. The fall of Jerusalem (39:1-18)

PART VI Disobedience to the end (40:1–45:5)
- A. Jeremiah at Mizpah (40:1–42:22)
- B. Jeremiah in Egypt (43:1–44:30)
- C. A message for Baruch (45:1-5)

PART VII Collected oracles against the nations and conclusion (46:1–52:34)
- A. Oracles against the nations (46:1–51:64)
- B. Conclusion of the book (52:1-34)
- C. The influence of Jeremiah

THE LAST KINGS OF JUDAH

Josiah (639–609)

Jehoahaz (609) Jehoiakim (609–598) Zedekiah (597–587)

