Jehoiachin (597)

THE KINGS OF BABYLON
Nabopolassar (626–605)
Nebuchadnezzar (605–562)
Evil-merodach (562–560)
Neriglissar (560–556)
Labashi Marduk (556)
Nabonidus and Belshazzar (556–539)

Reading Jeremiah

Understanding Jeremiah, or for that matter any of the prophets, can sometimes be difficult. Jeremiah frequently repeats the expression "The word of the Lord," then speaks in the first person as if he were God speaking. He accuses Israel of crimes as if he were a prosecuting attorney in a courtroom. He then delivers God's judgment on Israel for its crimes, as if God were a judge in a trial that ends with the condemnation of the accused. Surprisingly, while he claims to speak as God's messenger and supports his claim by describing the vision in which God commissioned him as a messenger, he sometimes speaks in his own name (see Jeremiah's confessions in 12:1-6; 15:10-21; 17:12-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-18). These apparent inconsistencies call for an explanation.

First, the reader should understand that the primary way in which a prophet sees himself (his self-image or job description) is as God's messenger, sent to the covenanted people Israel to announce to them God's judgment on how they have failed to live up to the norms of behavior demanded of them by their covenant relationship with God.

An understanding of the prophet's role as messenger helps to explain why he speaks so often as if he were actually God speaking, and why he describes his experience of a vision in which he was called by God and commissioned as God's messenger. Once the art of writing came into existence between 6000 and 4000 B.C.E., communication over a distance could be accomplished by letter. Before the invention of letters, that is, in the preliterary age, communication over a distance could only be accomplished by means of messengers, who served as "living letters." The messenger memorized the message, physically bridged the distance between the sender and the addressee, and ultimately delivered orally the message he had memorized. In the case of a king's message, for example, the messenger would say: "The king sent me. The word of the king: 'I your king say to you . . . .'" In short, since the prophet was God's messenger, he spoke, as a messenger would, in the first person because he was speaking for God who sent him.

Second, behind the concept of God sending the prophet as messenger and with roots in very ancient mythology lay the scenario of the king's council. The pagan mythmakers imagined the world of the gods to be similar to royal society on earth. Such a scenario posited a world populated with gods, goddesses, and sons and daughters of the gods. In heaven as on earth, one god was high god or king over other gods. When the high god wished to legislate, he gathered round him his council of lesser gods. After the meeting messengers were sent out to bear tidings of the council's decisions to the other gods.

Israel took over this scenario from the mythmakers, kept the lesser gods of the council but demoted them to the status of messengers (angels), and envisioned Yahweh and the divine council in the same way that the pagans envisioned their high god and his council (see 1 Kgs 22:12-23). The plurals of Gen 1:26 ("Let us make man in our image") and Isa 6:8 ("Whom shall I send? Who will go for us?") reflect the scenario of God consulting this divine council. Jeremiah saw himself as one who had "stood in the council of the Lord, to see him and to hear his word" (23:18; see also 23:22). The role of the prophet, as we know it from Israel's history, was born when God sent humans rather than angels to be the messengers from the divine council.

The role of the messenger and the scenario of the king's council also explains why a prophet sometimes describes his inaugural vision. Anyone can claim to be God's messenger, but only the messenger sent by God can truly claim to speak God's word. Whoever has not been sent and nevertheless claims to be God's messenger is by definition a false prophet. It is a matter of great importance, therefore, for the truth of a prophet's message that he be able to authenticate his position by testifying to his experience of having been directly commissioned by God as a messenger. Jeremiah so testifies (1:1-10); so also do Isaiah (Isa 6:1-13) and Ezekiel (Ezek 1-3). Without the certainty such an experience provides and without such a positive commission, it is hard to see how Jeremiah, Isaiah, Ezekiel, or any of the other true prophets could have sustained for so long the burden of so unpopular a role. Such an experience is popularly referred to as a prophet's inaugural vision.

Third, the role of messenger explains the first-person form of speaking and the purpose of the prophet's inaugural vision experience. It explains as well why he so frequently uses such words as: "The Lord sent me" and "This is the word of the Lord." What it does not explain is the nature of the message that the prophet brings from God. To understand the prophet's message, the reader needs to advert to the accusations against Israel that make up so much a part of the prophet's message. These accusations and the judgments that follow them are all related to the demands of Israel's covenant relationship with God.

These demands are summed up in the ten commandments of the Sinai covenant, which in turn are summed up in the two great commandments: You will love the Lord your God with all your heart, and you will love your neighbor as yourself.

When Israel fails to fulfill these demands either by turning to the idol worship of the pagans (see Hos 1-3) or by committing crimes against the neighbor (see Amos 2:6-16; 3:9-15; 4-6; 8:4-9 for oppression of the poor by the rich viewed as a crime against the demands of the covenant), God sends a prophet-messenger to announce to them divine judgment of condemnation.

Thus, the major part of the prophetic message has to do with Israel's failure to live up to the demands of the covenant relationship with God. This explains why the prophets so often accuse and condemn. It explains as well why covenant theology constitutes the heart of the prophetic message, just as new-covenant theology constitutes the heart of the gospel message.

Fourth, the reader will understand the prophet's prosecuting attorney role if he or she recalls the well-known scenario of a court trial with its defendant, accusations, indictment, defense and prosecuting attorneys, and judge. God, of course, is not really a judge in our sense of the term, nor are the prophets prosecuting attorneys. But the rhetorical use of such an imaginative confrontation between accused and judge—between Israel and God—serves to dramatize for the prophets' audience the seriousness of their relationship with God and the seriousness of their crimes against the God who so lovingly initiated that relationship. Such an imaginative confrontation is popularly known as a trial or controversy and is reflected in the prophet's language whenever, as so often happens, a prophet accuses and condemns either Israel as a whole or particular individuals (see the frequent accusations in Jer 2:1–4:4 and the judgments, frequently introduced by the word "therefore" in Jer 5–9).

In summary, the reader will understand Jeremiah and any other prophet if he or she sees the prophet as one who saw himself as: (1) one who had been present at meetings of the divine council; (2) one who had been commissioned as God's messenger (inaugural vision); (3) one who accused and condemned Israel for crimes against the covenant God; (4) one who played the role of prosecuting attorney when speaking in the name of God and the role of defense attorney when speaking in his own or in his people's name; and (5) one whose concern, above all other matters, was to bring Israel to appreciate and treasure its unique relationship with God. The prophets, and Jeremiah in particular, had what might be called a passion for God and for God's people: for God, that God be truly loved and praised; for the people, that they be, in God's own words to them, "my people, my renown, my praise, my beauty" (see Jer 13:11).

COMMENTARY

PART I: JEREMIAH'S CALL

Jer 1:1-19

1:1-3 The editor's introduction to the Book of Jeremiah. These verses summarize Jeremiah's career from the time of his call in 626 B.C.E. to the fall of Jerusalem in 587. They constitute as well a heading for the collection of materials put together by an editor to make up the Book of Jeremiah as we have it now. Similar editorial headings occur at the beginning of other prophetic books, for example, Amos 1:1; Hos 1:1; Isa 1:1; and Ezek 1:1-3. The editor's heading for the book helps the reader to situate in history the career of each of the prophets.

1:4-10 The call of Jeremiah. Unless a prophet is truly called by God and sent as God's messenger to the covenanted people, there is no good reason why the people should listen to him. Speaking about false prophets, God says through Jeremiah: "I did not send these prophets, yet they ran; I did not speak to them, yet they prophesied" (23:21). To establish his credentials as a prophet, Jeremiah, along with Amos (Amos 7:14-15), Isaiah (Isa 6:1–13), and Ezekiel (Ezek 1:4–3:15), reminds his readers that he was called directly by God and commissioned to be God's messenger to them, the covenant people. That God "knew," "dedicated," and "appointed" Jeremiah to be "a prophet to the nations" even before he was born is the prophet's symbolic way of declaring that God had a role for him to play not only in the history of Israel but in the history of the gentile nations as well (v. 5).

Jeremiah's excuse, "I know not how to speak; I am too young" (v. 6), recalls Moses' attempt to escape the difficulties of the prophetic office (see Exod 4:10-13). Jeremiah knows that prophets lead a lonely life, are frequently scorned, often persecuted, and with few exceptions rejected during their lives. God, however, commands (v. 7). Jeremiah's only comfort is God's promise, "I am with you to deliver you" (v. 8). It is consoling to observe that God regularly promises to be "with" those who have been commissioned for difficult tasks in his service (see Exod 4:12; Josh 1:5, 9; Judg 6:16; 1 Sam 3:19; 16:13; Matt 28:20).

God's touching of Jeremiah's mouth (v. 9) is the prophet's metaphorical way of expressing that what he preaches to the people is truly the word of God and not any human word (compare Isa 6:6-7; Ezek 3:1-4, 10-11). Verse 10 indicates the scope of Jeremiah's message: he will deal not only with Israel but with other nations as well, and his message will be both negative and positive. He will prophesy the end of the old covenant and the existing dynasty of David, but he will also prophesy a new covenant (see chs. 30–33) and a new David.

1:11-16 Two visions. The visions of the branch of the watching-tree (almond tree) and the boiling cauldron may be later than Jeremiah's inaugural vision. They are placed here because they foreshadow the fulfillment of Jeremiah's prophecies concerning the Babylonian invasion and the destruction of Jerusalem and the kingdom of Judah. Jeremiah may have been out in the field in early February when the almond tree first blossoms, and he appears to be watching the still wintry landscape. God too is "watching"—watching over the divine Word to bring it to fulfillment (vv. 11-12). The boiling cauldron tipped to the north indicates the direction from which the invading Babylonian armies will come (v. 13) when they besiege and destroy Jerusalem (vv. 14-16 and see ch. 39).

1:17-19 God encourages Jeremiah. These verses conclude Jeremiah's call. God reminds him that he is not alone in the face of his enemies (v. 17), that it is divine power that strengthens him (v. 18), and that ultimately he will win out over his enemies because God is with him (v. 19). Jeremiah's need for such divine assurance is borne out by the despairing tone of the prophet's famous "confessions" (see 12:1-6; 15:10-21; 17:14-18; 18:19-23; 20:7-18).

PART II: JEREMIAH'S PREACHING FROM 626 to 604 B.C.E.

Jer 2:1–20:18

In all likelihood the major portion of the material in chapters 2–25 comes from the book dictated by Jeremiah to Baruch in the year 604 B.C.E. (see 36:28-32). Scholars debate about where and when Jeremiah preached what is in these chapters and even whether everything in these chapters comes from Jeremiah himself and not perhaps from the editors of the book. These questions have their place, but the when, the where, and the who are not nearly as important as the what of the prophet's message. It is because God spoke to Judah and to us through the mouth of Jeremiah that the Book of Jeremiah has entered the Bible. What God says, therefore, is the important thing, and it will be the aim of this commentary to concentrate on that divine message.

A. Jeremiah's Earliest Sermons (2:1–6:30)

When Jeremiah dictated to Baruch his book of sermons in 604 B.C.E. (see 36:28-32), he began by summarizing the gist of his message in 2:1–6:30. The message is that Judah has been unfaithful to God and therefore deserves a judgment of condemnation and punishment. Since this judgment is based on crimes against the covenant, Jeremiah, like all the prophets, begins by preaching God's accusations against Judah and concludes by threatening Judah with judgment and punishment. Chapters 2:1–4:4 deal mainly with accusations; chapters 4:5–6:30, with judgment and punishment.

2:1–3:5 Accusations. This collection of accusations begins and ends in the same way with the use of Hosea's marriage analogy for the Sinai covenant (see Hos 1–3), in which God is the bridegroom and Israel the unfaithful bride (compare 2:2 and 3:1-5). In verse 5 the people are accused of infidelity to God, a crime against the first commandment of the covenant. Verses 6-9 accuse them of ingratitude for forgetting the great things God did for them at the time of the Exodus and the conquest of the Promised Land. Verses 10-13 continue the accusations of ingratitude, contrasting the fidelity of the pagans to their gods, who are no gods at all (vv. 10-11), with the infidelity of Israel to the true God. Their crime is twofold. They have abandoned God, "the source of living waters," that is, water that flows naturally from the earth in springs and brooks and can be depended upon, and have chosen instead pagan gods, "broken cisterns, that hold no water," and therefore cannot be depended upon (vv. 12-13).

2:14-19 "Is Israel a slave, a bondman by birth?" Jeremiah demonstrates the evil of forsaking "the living waters" for the "broken cisterns" by reminding his listeners how they were punished by their Egyptian and Assyrian allies—"the waters of the Nile" and "the waters of the Euphrates"—(vv. 14-18) when they forsook God, their source of strength (v. 19).

2:20-28 "Long ago you broke your yoke." Jeremiah utilizes the language of Hosea's marriage analogy again to accuse his people of breaking their "yoke" of marriage to God by giving themselves to harlotry, that is, infidelity (v. 20). In verse 21 he uses the Isaian covenant analogy (see Isa 5:1-7), in which God is the owner of the vineyard and Israel is the vineyard, to again accuse them of infidelity. Verses 22-28 continue the accusations with Hosean language likening Israel's rampant infidelity to the covenant to the sexual ardor of a "frenzied she-camel" (vv. 22-25) and to the shame of a thief caught red-handed in his thievery (vv. 26-28).

2:29-32 "How dare you still plead with me?" Despite medicinal punishment, the way of divine pedogogy, Israel continues to rebel (vv. 29-30) and to act as if God had no interest in her (v. 31). Unlike a bride who never forgets her bridal jewelry, Israel has forgotten God.

2:33-37 "How well you pick your way when seeking love!" The indictment continues with accusations of crimes against the innocent (v. 34) and hypocritical avowals of innocence (v. 35). For such crimes God threatens the shame of subjection to Egyptian and Assyrian conquerors (vv. 36-37).

3:1-5 "If a man sends away his wife." Jeremiah concludes this collection of accusations by returning to the theme with which he began it, namely, the theme of the unfaithful wife (compare 2:2 and 3:1, 5). According to Deut 24:1-4, a divorced and remarried wife was forbidden to return to her original husband. Israel in her infidelity has sinned with many lovers and like a harlot refuses to blush (vv. 1-3). Even more, she hypocritically continues to call upon God as "My father . . . the bridegroom of my youth" (v. 4) and to expect forgiveness, all the while committing all the evil it can (v. 5).

3:6-10 "See now what rebellious Israel has done!" This prose passage both summarizes the accusations of 2:1–3:5 and at the same time takes up and develops the theme of 3:1-5: the return of the divorced wife who has rebelled against her husband—God. The key words "rebel" and "return" recur regularly (see 3:1, 7, 8, 10-14, 22; 4:1). The comparison (to the detriment of Judah) with the rebellious northern kingdom of Israel (vv. 6-10) suggests that this sample of Jeremiah's preaching dates to the reform of King Josiah (2 Kgs 22–23), which began in 626 B.C.E. and ended with Josiah's death in 609 B.C.E.

3:11-18 "Rebel Israel is inwardly more just than traitorous Judah." The theme "inwardly more just," which recurs in 4:3-4, frames 3:6–4:4 and summarizes the purpose of Jeremiah's preaching: guilty Judah, like guilty Israel, is called upon to confess its guilt and return to God not just externally but internally (v. 13). God will richly reward such a return (conversion) by bringing back the exiles of Israel (and Judah, if verses 14-18 do not come from editors during or after the Babylonian Exile) and making Jerusalem the special center for the worship of all the nations (vv. 17-18).

3:19–4:4 "How I should like to treat you as sons." This section begins with God's plaintive pleas for Israel to return (vv. 19-22a), continues with a suggested confession similar to the confession in Hos 14:2-4 (vv. 22b-25), and ends with a conditional absolution (4:1-2) and a final appeal for genuine inward conversion: a circumcision of the heart, that is, an inward rather than just an outward sign of commitment to God (vv. 3-4, and see 3:11, where the theme of "inwardly just" is first mentioned).

4:5–6:30 The judgment against guilty Judah. In this section Jeremiah summarizes God's judgment against Judah, the judgment first mentioned in 1:13-17, namely, that enemies will come from the north and destroy Jerusalem and Judah.

4:5-18 "Proclaim it in Judah." In verses 5-8 Jeremiah dramatizes the reaction of the people when they hear that invaders from the north have come to destroy the nation (vv. 6b-7). Verses 9-13 describe the dismay and desperation of the king, the princes, the priests, and the false prophets (vv. 9-10) when they witness the imminent fulfillment of God's judgment upon them (vv. 5-13). Finally, in verse 14 Jeremiah appeals to Jerusalem to "cleanse [its] heart of evil" in view of the disaster (vv. 15-17) about to take place because of its misdeeds (v. 18).

4:19-31 "My breast! my breast! how I suffer!" Jeremiah's grief as he anticipates the judgment and condemnation of Judah (vv. 19-21) is expressed in his repugnance for what his people have done (v. 22), in his horror at the approaching scourge (vv. 23-29), and in his repugnance for their attempt to prostitute themselves before their conquerors in order to stave off destruction (vv. 30-31).

5:1-31 Universal corruption. Combining accusations with judgment, Jeremiah complains to God that he cannot find even one upright person in Judah (v. 1); that all, from the lowliest to the greatest, are guilty (vv. 2-5); they will be punished (vv. 6-10) because they have openly rebelled (v. 11), denying God, as if God were powerless or nonexistent (v. 12), and rejecting the prophets (v. 13). For all this, God threatens destruction by a nation from afar (vv. 14-15), which will destroy their crops, their children, their flocks, and the "fortified city" (Jerusalem) in which they trust (vv. 16-17). Following a gloss from postexilic times (vv. 18-19), Jeremiah urges his people to pay attention (vv. 20-21) and to fear the all-powerful Lord of nature (v. 22). Verses 23-31 further accuse Judah and prepare the way for the climactic judgment that follows in 6:1-30.

6:1-30 The invaders from the north. Verses 1-5 ring with the cries of the invaded and the invaders, followed by a first series of accusations (vv. 6-10) leading up to God's judgment on young and old (vv. 11-12), small and great, false prophet and priest (vv. 13-15). A second series of accusations begins with an exhortation to remember "the way to good, and walk it," followed by Israel's reply, "We will not walk it" (v. 16), and its refusal to hearken to the warnings of God's "watchmen," that is, the prophets (v. 17). Verses 18-26 continue with further accusations and judgments, mentioning again the people "from the land of the north" (v. 22) and the destruction that the invading armies will bring (vv. 23-26). The section concludes with Jeremiah's evaluation of his ministry as a failure (vv. 27-30). He has been sent as a "tester" of his people (v. 27), and he has found them "silver rejected" (v. 30).

B. The Temple Sermon (7:1–8:3)

The temple sermon is the most memorable of Jeremiah's sermons. It is dated (see 26:1) early in the reign of King Jehoiakim (609–598 B.C.E.) and is written in Deuteronomic style, the style of the Book of Deuteronomy, which was found in the temple in 621 B.C.E. and with which Jeremiah was certainly acquainted. Like the material in chapters 2–6, the temple sermon is filled with accusations and condemnations.

7:1-15 Hear the word of the Lord. Standing near the gate to the temple area (v. 2), Jeremiah excoriates the Jews for their superstitious belief that the presence of God's temple will protect them (see Isa 36–37) from their enemies (v. 4) and calls them to reform their lives (vv. 5-7). In verses 8-11 he accuses them of crimes against the covenant, coupled with the hypocritical conviction that they can turn the temple into "a den of thieves" and still escape punishment. He reminds them that the Shiloh temple was destroyed in the time of Samuel (1050 B.C.E.) and that the same thing can now happen to Solomon's temple in Jerusalem (vv. 12-15). As chapter 26 explains, Jeremiah's threat leads to his trial for blasphemy against the temple, a crime of which he is acquitted only when someone reminds the judges that the prophet Micah made the same threat against the temple in the reign of King Hezekiah (715–687 B.C.E.) and was not condemned.

7:16–8:3 "You, now, do not intercede for this people." The sermon continues with accusations dealing with liturgical abuses (7:16-31) and concludes with a long description of the punishment that will be visited upon the people who have made God's temple a "den of thieves" (7:32–8:3).

C. Accusations and Judgments (8:4–10:25)

This section continues in different ways the accusations and judgments of chapters 2–6.

8:4-7 "Tell them." Here Jeremiah bemoans the unnatural conduct of people who, unlike the "Turtledove, swallow and thrush [which] observe their time of return, . . . do not know the ordinance of the Lord" (v. 7).

8:8-12 "How can you say, 'We are wise . . .'?" There is no true wisdom where the word of the Lord is rejected (vv. 8-9). The judgment introduced as usual by the word "therefore" is a just sentence on priests and prophets who in their greed for gain defraud the people (v. 10) and promise peace when there is no peace (vv. 11-12).

8:13-23 "I will gather them all in." The threat of punishment (v. 13) returns to the theme of invasion (vv. 14-17) and concludes with Jeremiah's soliloquy, in which he expresses his uncontrollable grief over the downfall of his people (vv. 18-23).

9:1-21 "Would that I had in the desert a traveler's lodge!" Jeremiah's soliloquy is followed by God's soliloquy (9:1-5). God would like to depart from this people and live alone in a desert lodge (v. 1), free of their lying, deceptions, and violence (vv. 2-5). The soliloquy is followed by a judgment and threat of punishment (vv. 6-8) and concludes with a long dirge that serves as a funeral song lamenting the destruction of Jerusalem and Judah (vv. 9-10), asking and answering why such calamities have come about (vv. 11-15), and calling upon the wailing women to come and intone a dirge (vv. 16-17) over the devastated land and the corpses of the slain (vv. 18-21). The dirge, which asked the question "Who is so wise . . . ?" in verse 11, concludes with a definition of true wisdom (v. 22), which consists in knowing God as the only source of "kindness, justice and uprightness on the earth" (v. 23).

9:24–10:16 "See, days are coming, says the Lord." Like the surrounding idol-worshiping nations, the whole house of Israel is circumcised in the flesh, that is, outwardly but not inwardly in the heart, the only place where true commitment to God counts for anything (vv. 24-25). Israel, therefore, is no different from the idolatrous nations. Its idolatry, the prophet declares in language similar to that of Isa 40–66, is pure foolishness (10:1-11), and its gods are not to be compared with the true God (vv. 10-13), whose greatness highlights the inanity of idolatry (vv. 14-15) and who is "the portion of Jacob," that is, the God of Israel (v. 16).

10:17-25 "Lift your bundle and leave the land." Jeremiah concludes this collection of accusations and judgments (8:4–10:25) with a poem that probably dates from 597 B.C.E., when the Babylonian armies first invaded and defeated Judah and Jerusalem. The opening lines (vv. 17-18) advise the people to prepare for deportation. In verses 19-21 Jeremiah puts into the mouth of the nation a brief soliloquy lamenting its defeat (vv. 19-21) and blaming this defeat on the shepherds (the kings) who did not seek the Lord and thus brought about the defeat and deportation of the people (v. 22). The whole section concludes with Jeremiah's prayer of intercession for his wayward people (vv. 23-25).

D. Deuteronomic Sermons, Confessions, and Parables (11:1–20:18)

This section continues Jeremiah's accusations and judgments against Judah. It varies their presentation, however, by dramatizing them in different ways, for example, by introducing more Deuteronomic sermons (chs. 11; 16; 17; 19; 20), a number of parables (chs. 13; 18; 19), and Jeremiah's five famous confessions (12:1-16; 15:10-21; 17:12-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-18).

11:1-18 The covenant sermon. In the year 621 B.C.E., in the course of cleaning and reforming the temple and its cult, the priest Hilkiah discovered a manuscript presumed to be the Book of Deuteronomy and had it read before King Josiah (see 2 Kgs 22:8–23:25). Josiah, who had begun his reform some years earlier, used the book to further his reform by sending preachers to the cities of Judah and even to the cities of the defunct northern kingdom. The reform failed, but presumably 11:1-18 is an example of the kind of sermon Jeremiah preached when he took part in the abortive reform.

12:1-6 The first "confession." The five "confessions" of Jeremiah consist of soliloquies in which Jeremiah carries on intimate conversations with God. He laments his misfortunes, considers giving up his hopeless mission, pleads with God to avenge him against his enemies, and in the end rests his hope in God alone. Few people in the history of religion have exposed with such nakedness their inmost objections to God's way of dealing with them. Jeremiah's complaint in the first confession is the age-old complaint that God appears to reward opponents and to ignore those who are loyal (vv. 1-3a). He begs God, therefore, to show preference for the righteous by punishing the wicked (vv. 3b-4). God's reply (vv. 5-6) provides no comfort: Things will get worse not better (v. 5), and even Jeremiah's own relatives will betray him (v. 6).

11:19-23 "Yet I, like a trusting lamb." These verses fit better here after 12:6 and describe Jeremiah's reaction to his relatives' plot to kill him (v. 19). He entrusts his care to God (v. 20), who promises to punish the inhabitants of Anathoth (vv. 21-23).

12:7-17 "I abandon my house." The oracle declares that just as Jeremiah's relatives have turned on him, so his "heritage" has turned on God (vv. 7-8). For this they are punished, as Jeremiah's relatives were punished (vv. 9-13). Verses 14-17, which refer to the possible conversion of the neighboring kingdoms that turned against Judah at the time of the Babylonian invasions of 598 and 588 B.C.E., echo the universalism of the promise to Abraham (Gen 12:1-3) and the later universalism of Isa 40–55. Some consider these verses to be an exilic gloss.

13:1-11 The parable of the linen loincloth. Parables are extended similies in story form. The important element is the central point of likeness. The details are secondary and pertain only to the fleshing out of the story. Most parables, like those of Jesus, are purely literary, that is, made-up stories; for example, the good Samaritan, the prodigal son, Dives and Lazarus. Some parables are acted out; for example, Jesus' washing of the feet of his disciples at the Last Supper. They are called parables in action. In each parable the reader should search out the nature of the parable—literary or in action—and the covenant themes, usually inherent in the accusations and judgments.

In the parable of the loincloth, the central likeness is the closeness of one's underclothes to one's person as the measure of the closeness intended to exist between God and the people (v. 11). The burial of the loincloth in a cleft of the rock by the Parath (Euphrates), where it rots (vv. 1-7), signifies the punishment of Israel for refusing to obey God and following strange gods instead (vv. 8-11). The nature of the parable is probably that of a parable in action. The Parath (Euphrates) is probably not the great river that runs through Babylon but a stream with the same name not far from Jerusalem, used here as a symbol of Babylon and the Exile there. Watching Jeremiah's parabolic burying of the loincloth in a cleft of rock by the Parath would excite curiosity and the question "Why?" Jeremiah answers by telling the parable (vv. 1-7) and then giving the answer (vv. 8-11).

14:1–15:4 The great drought. In the Middle East, when the winter rains fail for two or three years, drought and famine are sure to follow. The drought described in verses 2-6 caused a national emergency. What follows in 14:8 to 15:4 is Jeremiah's intercessory prayer for the nation (vv. 8-9) and God's command to him not to intercede for these people (vv. 10-12). Jeremiah then blames it all on the false prophets (v. 13). God answers him by condemning both prophets and people to sword and famine (vv. 14-16). In the lament that follows, Jeremiah again attempts to intercede for his people (vv. 17-22) and is again rebuffed (15:1-4). God is watching over the divine word (see 1:12) and is determined to see it fulfilled! It is impossible to date this section, but the frequent references to the "sword" (vv. 12-13, 15-16, 18; 15:2-3) suggest a time of war, perhaps the Babylonian invasion of 598 B.C.E.

15:5-9 "Who will pity you, Jerusalem?" This lament follows naturally upon God's determination to fulfill the word of judgment against Jerusalem in 15:1-4.

15:10-21 Jeremiah's second "confession." The mention of a mother of seven swooning away in 15:9 leads Jeremiah to think of his own mother and his own situation as "a man of strife and contention to all the land" (v. 10). Almost in despair he argues with God to avenge him on his persecutors, reminding God how he, Jeremiah, interceded for his enemies (vv. 11, 15), how he delighted in God's word (v. 16), and how this led to his unbearable loneliness (v. 17). Jeremiah concludes by accusing God of betraying and abandoning him like "a treacherous brook, whose waters do not abide" (v. 18). God's reply is a rebuke and an implied accusation. Jeremiah himself needs to repent (return to God) and weigh well his own response to God (v. 19a). If he does, he will continue to be God's "mouthpiece," and God will be with him against his persecutors (vv. 19b-21 and compare 1:18-19).

16:1-21 Jeremiah's celibacy. God commands Jeremiah to be celibate, not because celibacy is better than marriage but because in the days of thirst, starvation, and destruction that would accompany the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, Jeremiah would be spared the anguish of witnessing the terrible suffering of a beloved wife and children. In addition, like the children of Hosea (see Hos 1:4-9) and Isaiah (see Isa 7:3; 8:1-4), Jeremiah would be a living symbol of the unhappy fate of Judah and Jerusalem (vv. 1-4). He is not to mourn with the mourners (vv. 5-7) nor celebrate with those who sit eating and drinking (vv. 8-9), because Judah and Jerusalem are to be punished for forsaking God and God's covenant law (vv. 10-13). Verses 14-15 do not harmonize with the message of destruction in verses 10-13 and probably represent a postexilic gloss. Verses 16-18 continue the message of doom. Like verses 14-15, verses 19-21 probably also represent a postexilic gloss. They speak of the conversion of the pagan nations and ridicule idolatry, two popular themes of exilic and postexilic literature.

17:1-13 "The sin of Judah is written with an iron stylus." This series of sayings contrasts the true and the false Israelite. Sin begins in the heart, and Judah's guilt is undeniable (v. 1). For its sin it will be punished (vv. 2-4). The wicked trust in human beings and are cursed (vv. 5-6); the just trust in the Lord, and their future is assured by God (v. 8 and see Ps 1:1ff.). Verses 9-10 return to the mysterious workings of the human heart (see v. 1) and avow that only God can probe its incalculable ways (v. 10). An example of such incalculable ways is the one who acquires wealth unjustly (v. 11 and see Luke 12:13-21). Jeremiah's observations on the human heart conclude with a declaration of doom for those who forsake God (vv. 12-13).

17:14-18 Jeremiah's third "confession." This confession should be interpreted in the light of Jeremiah's observations concerning the mysterious workings of the human heart mentioned in 17:1, 5-10. As in his first and second confessions, Jeremiah begs God to heal him (v. 14), to observe the blasphemous scoffing of his enemies (v. 16), and to remember how he did not press for his enemies' total destruction (v. 16). Naturally, he prays that his enemies and not he himself be confounded (vv. 17-18), for only thus will it be seen that God is a just God.

17:19-27 Desecrating the sabbath. Here, as in his Deuteronomic temple sermon (see 7:1–8:3), Jeremiah attacks those who sin against God's covenant commandment of keeping holy the sabbath day. All prophetic accusations and judgments deal in one way or another with crimes against the ten commandments. This sermon is notable in that it deals specifically with only one commandment and shows that although Jeremiah is against the hypocrisy of those who make an outward show of piety (see 7:1ff.), he is not against the temple cult in itself (compare Isa 1:12-17). When commanding "Keep holy the sabbath day," God meant what the words say. As with all the commandments, God promises blessings for those who observe them (vv. 24-26) and curses on those who do not (v. 27).

18:1-12 The parable of the potter. The potter with his wheel—one wheel at the top holding the clay and the other at the bottom rotated by his feet—is master of what he will create (vv. 1-4). So is God the master of Israel's fate (vv. 5-6). But God is not a tyrant and leaves the last word to Israel. The divine blessings are conditional, and so are the threats (vv. 7-10). The message of the parable is clear: all depends on Israel. But, as verses 11-12 make clear, Judah has no intention of repenting, and therefore its fate is certain (v. 12).

18:13-17 Judah's unnatural apostasy. Jeremiah's conviction that Judah will not return to God fills him with horror (v. 13). It should be as natural for Judah to be faithful to God as it is for the snow to remain on the mountains of Lebanon and as it is for the mountain streams to run steadily down (v. 14). Yet Israel has done the unnatural thing: it has forgotten God and turned to idolatrous worship (v. 15). In view of what God the potter declared in 18:10, therefore, Judah's fate is certain (vv. 16-17).

18:18-23 Jeremiah's fourth "confession." As in his earlier confessions, Jeremiah is outraged with his enemies because they have not only persecuted him but now even plot his death (vv. 18-19). He argues with God (v. 20a), reminds God how he, Jeremiah, prayed for his enemies (v. 20b), and then launches into a bitter prayer for the destruction of those enemies (vv. 21-23). Since Jeremiah's enemies are God's enemies, it is not unlikely that Jeremiah prays for their destruction in order that all might see that God is not impotent before apparent foes. Jeremiah had, after all, interceded for them, so he could hardly have hated them.

19:1–20:6 The symbolic earthen flask. This episode cannot be dated, but the references to Babylon in 20:4-6 indicate that it occurred sometime after Babylon came to power in 605 B.C.E. The earthen flask, a clay water jar, symbolizes Judah and Jerusalem (v. 3). Jeremiah takes it with him to the valley of Ben-hinnom, the valley on the southwest side of Jerusalem later turned into a garbage dump and called Gehenna (vv. 1-2). At a Baal fertility-cult temple there in the valley, Jeremiah delivers a bitter sermon against Judah and Jerusalem, accusing it of flagrant idolatry (vv. 3-5) and threatening it with total destruction (vv. 6-9). At the end of the sermon, he hurls the earthen flask to the ground, smashing it to bits, thus indicating by a parable in action the destruction of the city and the nation (vv. 10-15). Baruch, his secretary and biographer, or perhaps Jeremiah himself, then describes what happened. Pashhur, chief officer in the temple, has Jeremiah scourged and then placed in the stocks overnight (20:1-2). The next morning Jeremiah, filled with indignation, predicts a bitter end for Pashhur (vv. 2-4a) and for the whole nation (vv. 4b-6). The prophecy is fulfilled when the Babylonians capture Jerusalem in 587 B.C.E. and deport king and citizens into captivity and exile in Babylon.

20:7-18 Jeremiah's fifth and last "confession." Goaded almost to despair, Jeremiah, in a magnificently passionate soliloquy, accuses God of seducing him into accepting a mission that brings only "derision and reproach all the day" (vv. 7-8). He contemplates abandoning his office of prophet but then, in almost a paroxysm of revulsion, admits that God's word is like a fire in his bones that he can neither hold in nor endure (v. 9). God's word brings him only denunciation, the loss of friends, and the threat of death (v. 10). Despite all this, he knows that God is with him and that his persecutors will not triumph (v. 11). With a burst of confidence, he then calls upon God to avenge him on his enemies (vv. 12-13). Finally, emotionally drained, he despairingly curses the day he was born (vv. 14-18). As many have observed, this confession says more about the nature of inspiration and the hardships of the prophetic mission than a dozen learned treatises.

PART III: PROPHECIES AGAINST THE KINGS AND THE FALSE PROPHETS

Jer 21:1–25:38

In the book that Jeremiah dictated to Baruch in 604 B.C.E. (see ch. 36), it is probable that chapter 20 was followed immediately by chapter 25, a chapter whose content sounds very much like the conclusion to that book (see 25:1-3, 13). Later, when editors put the whole book together in the form in which we have it now, they interpolated between chapter 20 and chapter 25 a collection of Jeremiah's prophecies against the kings and the false prophets. They did so in all probability because the content of these prophecies contains the overall theme of chapters 1–20, namely, accusations against and condemnations of those who have been unfaithful to the covenant.

In chapters 21–24 the editors are concerned more with content than chronology. The collection begins and ends with a prophecy against the last king of Judah, King Zedekiah (597–587 B.C.E.). By repeating the same names, Zedekiah (21:1 and 24:8) and Nebuchadnezzar (21:1 and 24:1), and the expression "sword, famine, and pestilence" (21:7, 9 and 24:10), the editors make the collection begin and end the same way, thus creating a frame or, as it is technically called, an inclusion-conclusion for the whole section.

A. Prophecies Against the Kings and False Prophets (21:1–24:10)

21:1-10 Against King Zedekiah. Following the siege of 598 B.C.E. and the deportation of the reigning king, Jeconiah, to Babylon as hostage royalty, Nebuchadnezzar placed Jeconiah's uncle, Zedekiah, the third son of Josiah (639–609), on the throne of Judah. In return Zedekiah rebelled. Infuriated, Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem for the last time in 588 B.C.E. King Zedekiah, a believer in Jeremiah, seeks from the prophet a good word from the Lord (vv. 1-2). Jeremiah's response provides little comfort: the city will fall to the Babylonians (vv. 3-7), and only those who surrender will save their lives (vv. 8-10).

21:11–22:9 Against the whole royal dynasty of David. In the section that follows, Jeremiah will deal with each of the kings in chronological order, beginning with Jehoahaz. Here he twice gives warning against the Davidic dynasty as a whole, first in 21:11-14 and a second time in 22:1-9. Each warning begins with a reminder of what God expects of the kings (21:11a and 22:1-4) and ends with a threat of destruction (21:11b-14 and 22:5-9). The whole section breathes disillusionment with the messianic dynasty of David (see 2 Sam 7 for the promise of perpetuity to the dynasty) and leads up to the promise of a future successful Davidic king (the Messiah) in 23:1-8.

The "Valley-site" (v. 13a), another name for Jerusalem, which is surrounded by valleys, is considered impregnable (v. 13b), but God will "kindle a fire in its forest," probably a section of Solomon's palace called "the Forest of Lebanon" (1 Kgs 7:2), and destroy it (v. 14). In 22:1-9 the prophecy of destruction is conditional (vv. 4-6), but with little hope that the condition will be fulfilled (vv. 7-9).

22:10-12 Against Jehoahaz. When his father, King Josiah, died in battle against the Egyptians at Megiddo in 609 B.C.E. (see 2 Kgs 23:28-30), Jehoahaz ascended the throne of Judah. He reigned three months, was deposed by Pharaoh Neco of Egypt, and led into exile, never to return. His throne name was Jehoahaz; his personal name, Shallum (v. 11).

22:13-19 Against Jehoiakim. Enthroned as vassal king by the Egyptians, Jehoiakim paid a heavy tribute to Egypt (see 2 Kgs 23:24ff.). Jeremiah accuses him of engaging in vast building projects and refusing to pay his laborers (vv. 13-15a), and contrasts him for the worse with his pious father, King Josiah (vv. 15b-17). The judgment against him is harsh: no one will mourn him (v. 18), and he will be buried as ignominiously as an ass (v. 19). It should be noted that Jehoiakim murdered prophets (see 26:20-24), forced Jeremiah and Baruch into hiding, and was so contemptuous of Jeremiah that he callously fed into the fire the first of Jeremiah's two manuscripts dictated to Baruch in the year 604 B.C.E. (see 36:20-26). Jeremiah had ample justification for his harsh judgment against Jehoiakim!

22:20-30 Against Jehoiachin. Jeremiah's longest prophecy against a king is leveled at Jehoiachin, also known as Coniah and Jeconiah (v. 24). He succeeded Jehoiakim in 598 B.C.E., reigned three months, and was then deported to Babylon as hostage royalty along with his family and many of the nobles and priests. He is mentioned as still living in Babylon in 562 B.C.E. (see 2 Kgs 25:27-30). The prophecy against him begins with the accusation that he has from his youth refused to listen to God (vv. 20-21). It continues with the threat of exile (vv. 22-23) and concludes with a long denunciation (vv. 24-30) predicting his defeat by Nebuchadnezzar (it happened in 597 B.C.E.) and exile with no hope of return (vv. 24-27). It concludes with a bitter tirade not only against Jehoiachin but against his descendants as well (vv. 29-30). Verse 30 is important because it shows Jeremiah's complete disillusionment with the Davidic dynasty, a disillusionment that leads up to his prediction in 23:1-6 of a future successful descendant of David whom Israel would look forward to as the Messiah! The prediction that Jehoiachin will be "childless" does not mean that he will have no sons (he had seven) but that none of them will ever reign as king of Judah.

23:1-8 A future son of David who will succeed. The prophecy of a future successful son of David begins with the accusation that the "shepherds," that is, the kings, have been responsible for the exile of the nation (vv. 1-2) and the promise that God will be the Good Shepherd who gathers the dispersed sheep and brings them back to their meadow, a symbolic way of speaking about the return from the Babylonian captivity (vv. 3-4 and compare Ezek 34). This promise is repeated in verses 7-8 and thus forms a frame around the messianic promise in verses 5-6. The future ideal king is described as "a righteous shoot [descendant] to David," who unlike his predecessors will reign and govern wisely (v. 5). He will be the savior of Judah and will be called "the Lord our justice." This prophecy, along with the prophecy of Isaiah about "a shoot [that] shall sprout from the stump of Jesse" (Isa 11:1ff.) fueled the messianic hopes of Israel in the centuries that followed and was fulfilled with the coming of Jesus, "the son of David," five centuries later.

23:9-40 Against the false prophets. Besides true prophets, Israel also had to deal with false prophets, those who falsely claimed to have been sent by God as messengers to the people of Israel (see 29:1-17 for an example of a false prophet who told the people the opposite of what Jeremiah told them). In verses 9-14 Jeremiah describes the depravity of some of the false prophets. In verses 14-24 he repeats many of the charges he had made against the false prophets who opposed him. He then concludes with a long deuteronomically styled diatribe against those prophets and their insolent claims (vv. 25-40).

24:1-10 Against Zedekiah. Jeremiah frames the whole section against the kings and the false prophets (21:24) by ending as he began (see 21:1-10)—with a prophecy against Zedekiah and renewed remarks about Nebuchadnezzar and the scourges he would bring: sword, famine, and pestilence. The prophecy is dated to 598 B.C.E. and deals with the fate of the exiles of 598 B.C.E. (vv. 1-7), whom Jeremiah designates symbolically as "the good figs" (vv. 4-7), and with the fate of King Zedekiah and the remaining Jews in Jerusalem, whom he designates symbolically as "the bad figs" (vv. 8-10). Undoubtedly the editors placed this prophecy last in the collection of prophecies against the kings because it not only serves to frame the whole collection but also introduces and foreshadows what will follow: God's promises for the future for "the good figs" (chs. 29–33) and God's threats of doom for "the bad figs" (chs. 34-39). The passage is doubly important because it contains the first promise of what will constitute the heart of "the new covenant" in the words: "I will give them a heart with which to understand that I am the Lord" (v. 7 and compare 31:31-34).

B. The Conclusion of Jeremiah's Book (25:1-38)

Originally this chapter followed chapters 1–20. It formed the conclusion of the manuscript that Jeremiah dictated to Baruch in 604 B.C.E. (see 36:27-32). In 605 B.C.E. Nebuchadnezzar had made himself master of the Middle East from Mesopotamia to Egypt. Jeremiah now knew that "the wind from the north" that would devastate Judah and Jerusalem (see chs. 1–6) would be the armies of Babylon. Writing in Deuteronomic style, he reminds his readers that what he has written constitutes a summary of twenty-three years of preaching (v. 3), which they have rejected, as they rejected the preaching of all the prophets (vv.

4-7). Since they will not listen, their doom is sealed. God will send "the tribes of the north" (Nebuchadnezzar's armies) to devastate the land (vv. 8-10). The nation will be in exile for seventy years (vv. 11-14).

This is the first reference to the seventy years of the Babylonian captivity, which ended in 539 B.C.E. with the destruction of the Babylonian Empire by Cyrus the Great of Persia. However one counts the seventy years, whether from 604 B.C.E., when Jeremiah first spoke of them, or from 597 B.C.E., when the first group was deported to Babylon, or from 587 B.C.E., when the major deportation took place, it is impossible to get exactly seventy years. The figure is best interpreted as a round number signifying a long time. Although Jeremiah did not know it, it was during those seventy years that his book was read, pondered, and heeded. Too late the exiles realized that Jeremiah's preaching made sense, that his enemies had erred, and that God had justly punished them. But it was not too late to return to God, from whom alone, as Jeremiah had so many times insisted, they could confidently expect forgiveness, security, and a future. Out of the ashes of the Exile came a fire, and Jeremiah's book was the spark that ignited it.

The reference in verse 14a to the nations that would destroy the kingdom of Judah leads Jeremiah in verses 15-38 to predict the future downfall of those same nations. In the Greek text, but not in the Hebrew, there follow here the prophecies against the nations in chapters 46–51. The "cup" (vv. 15ff.) symbolizes destiny. The destiny can be good, as in Ps 23:5 ("my cup overflows"), or bad, as in Matt 26:39 ("My Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass me up"). In this case the "cup" is a cup of wrath for the nations that have oppressed God's people.

PART IV: BIOGRAPHICAL MATERIAL AND THE NEW COVENANT

Jer 26:1–33:26

This section of the book comes from sources that contained biographical material about Jeremiah. Like the following chapters (chs. 34–39), it is long on narrative and short on sermons. The narrative material would seem to come from a biography of Jeremiah by his secretary Baruch. Whatever the original source or sources, it is clear that the editors did not arrange the material in chronological order. Chapter 26 deals with the temple sermon dated to 608 B.C.E. Chapters 27–29 date to 593, and chapter 36 dates to 604 B.C.E. More than likely the editors chose to arrange the material according to theme. Thus chapters 26–29 deal with the truth and efficacy of Jeremiah's prophetic words; chapters 30–33, with Jeremiah's predictions of hope for the future and a new covenant for Israel; and chapters 34–39, with the rejection of both Jeremiah himself and his word by kings and commoners.

A. The Temple Sermon (26:1-24)

The hand of the biographer (Baruch?) is evident here in the dating (609–608 B.C.E.), the beginning (v. 1) of the reign of King Jehoiakim (609–598 B.C.E.), and in the pervasive third-person narrative account. The biographer summarizes Jeremiah's famous sermon (see 7:1–8:3) predicting the destruction of the temple (vv. 2-6) and then goes on to tell what the results were for the courageous prophet. He is accused of blasphemy against the temple and threatened with death (vv. 2-6). Jeremiah responds to the charge (vv. 7-11) by declaring that it was God who sent him to prophesy against the temple and the city, and only their repentance (see ch. 18) can save both city and temple (vv. 12-13). If they execute him, they will bring down upon themselves, their city, and its citizens "innocent blood" (vv. 14-15 and see Matt 27:24-25).

In the informal trial that follows, Jeremiah is defended by some of his friends among the elders (v. 16), who remind Jeremiah's accusers that the prophet Micah a century earlier, in the reign of King Hezekiah (715–687), made the same prediction (Mic 3:12) and was not condemned to death (vv. 17-19). Jeremiah is acquitted, but his biographer highlights the danger to the prophet by telling the story of a less fortunate prophet, Uriah, who fled into Egypt, was brought back to Jerusalem, and there executed and thrown into the common grave (vv. 20-24). By placing these episodes here at the beginning of the biographical section of the book, the editors emphasize the nature of the true prophet—one whose prophecy is fulfilled. The readers know how well Jere-miah's prophecy was fulfilled, and the editors leave no doubt about it in the following chapters, especially chapter 39.

B. Jeremiah Against the False Prophets (27:1-29:32)

As in chapter 26, the editors' concern in chapters 27–29 is to emphasize the truth and fulfillment of Jeremiah's prophecies, despite the opposition of his enemies—in this case the false prophet Hananiah in Jerusalem (see ch. 28) and the false prophets in Babylon (see 29:20-32). The biographer begins by explaining the background of Jeremiah's conflict with Hananiah. In 593 B.C.E., only four years after the first siege and capture of Jerusalem, King Zedekiah of Judah, who had been put on the throne by Nebuchadnezzar, plots against Nebuchadnezzar by calling to Jerusalem the ambassadors of the kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Sidon (vv. 1-3). Using an ox yoke as a parable in action, Jeremiah declares to the assembled ambassadors and Zedekiah that it is God's will that they all bend their necks under the yoke of the king of Babylon (vv. 4-8). They must not listen to false prophets who predict a successful revolt (vv. 9-22).

What follows in chapter 28 is a vivid account of the face-to-face meeting of the true prophet and the false prophet. Hananiah predicts success (28:1-4). Jeremiah counters with a declaration that implicitly accuses Hananiah of prophesying falsely (vv. 5-9). Hananiah throws Jeremiah's ox yoke to the ground and repeats his prediction of a successful revolt (vv. 10-11). Finally Jeremiah receives word from the Lord and prophesies Hananiah's death within a year for having prophesied falsely in the name of the Lord (vv. 12-17). Once again as in chapter 26, the editors have highlighted the veracity of the true prophet by chronicling these unique encounters between the true prophet and the false prophet.

Chapter 29 continues the theme of Jeremiah's battle against the false prophets. This time the opposition comes from Babylon, where false prophets are assuring the exiles of 597 B.C.E. that they will soon return to Jerusalem. Jeremiah refutes their claims by sending a letter to the exiles via friends sent on a diplomatic mission to Nebuchadnezzar (vv. 1-3). The letter (vv. 4-23) urges the exiles to expect a long stay in the land of their conquerors, to settle down there (vv. 4-6), to pray for the welfare of Babylon (v. 7), and to pay no heed to the false prophets (vv. 8-9). In verses 10-14 Jeremiah assures them that after seventy years God will reverse their fortunes and bring them back to their own land. The letter continues with a threat against Jerusalem and King Zedekiah (vv. 15-20) and against two false prophets in Babylon (vv. 21-23). It concludes with a threat of death for Shemaiah, who had written from Babylon to the high priest urging him to arrest and silence Jeremiah (vv. 24-32).

The editors placed this letter-writing episode here not only because it continues the theme of Jeremiah's battle with the false prophets but also because it serves as an excellent preamble to the theme of the following chapters—the theme of hope for the future and the promise of a new and successful covenant (chs. 30–33).

C. Jeremiah and the New Covenant (30:1-33:26)

The editors of Jeremiah's prophecies grouped in these chapters material from different sources dealing with the prophet's predictions of hope for Israel and Judah in the future. The prophet who predicted with such certainty the fall and exile of Judah and Jerusalem with equal certainty predicted its return from exile and the inauguration of a new and successful covenant in the future. The prophet whose mission was "to root up and to tear down, to destroy and to demolish, to build and to plant" (see 1:10) here builds and plants. The hopes he plants and the future he begins to build take root during the long years of exile and come to fulfillment at the Last Supper, when Jesus declares, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood, which will be shed for you" (Luke 22:20). The editors wisely placed this collection of prophecies of hope after Jeremiah's encouraging letter to the exiles of 597 B.C.E. (see ch. 29) and before the dismal account of the last days of Judah and Jerusalem (see chs. 34–39).

30:1-24 Prophecies of hope. Chapter 30 begins with a statement of hope for the future (vv. 1-3), the general theme of chapters 30–33. Jeremiah's words are directed to Israel, the defunct northern kingdom, and Judah, the soon-to-be-defunct southern kingdom (v. 4). This statement makes applicable to Judah the prophecies of hope in 30:1–31:14; these originally were directed only toward the defunct northern kingdom, which suffered destruction and deportation under the Assyrians in 722 B.C.E. Jeremiah speaks of Israel, therefore, not so much as a national entity, but as that entity better known as the people of God, a moral entity which no national catastrophe can destroy and which exists today and will always exist despite all the vicissitudes and debacles of history.

The prophecies of hope begin with the cries of dismay and fear (vv. 5-7) that fill all hearts when it becomes obvious that the fearful "day of the Lord," the day when God will fulfill earlier threats of destruction for Judah and Jerusalem, has arrived. Bondage to pagan masters, however, will not last. In the future, Israel will serve God and its messianic king (vv. 8-9). This reversal of fortune will be the work of God (vv. 10-23), a work described in language that will be echoed thirty years later in the soaring poetry of Deutero-Isaiah (see Isa 40–55).

31:1-40 The new covenant. Chapter 31 might well be described as Jeremiah's "Hosean" chapter. It shows Hosea's influence on Jeremiah's theology, language, and style (see chs. 2–3 for earlier examples of Hosean chapters). The linguistic and stylistic similarities are obvious (compare vv. 2-3, 9, 18, 20 with Hos 2:16; 11:1-4; 14:2-8). The theological similarities become evident when the reader compares Jeremiah's and Hosea's emphasis on God's love for Israel, and Jeremiah's prediction of a new and eternal covenant (31:31-34) with Hosea's prediction of a new and eternal marriage (Hos 2:18-25).

Verses 1-6 announce the good news of return from exile, emphasizing God's love for Israel (v. 3: "With age-old love I have loved you"). Verses 7-14 rhapsodize over the joy of the returned exiles. Verses 15-20 call upon Israel to end its mourning. Verse 15 calls poetically upon Rachel, the long-dead matriarch of Israel, to cease her cries of mourning for her exiled children. They will return from exile (vv. 16-17), repentant (vv. 18-19) and assured of God's loving forgiveness (v. 20 and see Hos 14:3-9). In the New Testament, Matthew uses this same poetic allusion to Rachel in his story of Herod's slaughter of the innocents (see Matt 2:18).

In 31:21-22 Jeremiah begins to speak about the new covenant. Calling poetically upon the exiles to set up roadmarkers as they go into exile so that they can follow them on their return (v. 21), he asks dramatically, "How long will you continue to stray, rebellious daughter?" (v. 22a) and then answers his own question with the mysterious statement of verse 22b. Scholars do not agree on the exact meaning here of the verb "encompass," but most agree that the "new thing" that God "has created upon the earth" is a responsive and loving Israel, which, unlike the faithless woman of the Hosean marriage analogy (see Hos 1–3), "will encompass the man [God, in the Hosean analogy] with devotion." This is Jeremiah's indirect way of speaking about the new covenant he will describe in 31:31-34.

Verses 23-30 apply to Judah directly all that Jeremiah said about Israel in 30:1–31:22. Verse 28 repeats what was said about the positive aspect of Jeremiah's mission (see 1:10). Verses 29-30 assure the Israelites that God will judge them according to their own merits and not according to the sins of their ancestors, whose wickedness brought down upon the nation destruction and deportation.

31:31-34 The new covenant. This famous prophecy provides the foundation and the core of the central theological teaching of the New Testament. St. Paul in 2 Cor 3:1–5:21 and the author of Hebrews in Heb 8:6–9:15 explicitly expound this prophecy in relation to Christ. It underlies, but without explicit references, much of the "new life" theology of St. John and is central to the teaching of Jesus in John's Last Supper discourse (John 13–17).

What is "new" about the new covenant is not the God who makes it nor the people with whom it is made—the true Israel—nor the will of God expressed in the Sinai commandments, but the results of the new covenant and the means by which those results are brought about. In contrast to the old Sinai covenant, which failed because Israel did not respond to God's love, the new covenant will be successful. It will be successful because it will be God and God alone who will put into the hearts of the people the power to respond with love. We call this power "grace," and as the books of the New Testament, especially the Pauline letters and John's Gospel, insist, it comes to us along with forgiveness of sins through faith in Jesus who died for love of us.

Although Jeremiah speaks only here of a "new" covenant, he speaks of it implicitly in many other places: in the promise to the exiles of 597 B.C.E. to give them a "new heart" (24:7; see also 32:38-40); in the hope-filled letter to the "good figs" in exile in Babylon (29:5-14); and in the new thing that God will create on earth: "the woman [who will] . . . encompass the man with devotion" (31:22). In the years that follow, Jeremiah's prophecy will be echoed by Ezekiel (see Ezek 16:59-64; 36:25-30) and Deutero-Isaiah (see Isa 55:3; 59:21; 61:8). For Jesus, six hundred years later, the making of the new covenant will become the aim and the focus of his passion, death, and resurrection.

The remainder of the chapter emphasizes the certainty of the promise of God to Israel (vv. 35-37) and of the promise to rebuild Jerusalem (vv. 38-40).

32:1-44 More on the new covenant. This chapter, from a biographical source, was added here by the editors because its theme fits with the theme of chapters 30-31—Israel's return from exile and the new covenant. The episode described took place in the tenth year (587 B.C.E.) of the reign of King Zedekiah, when Nebuchadnezzar's armies were besieging Jerusalem and after Jeremiah had been imprisoned in the quarters of the guard (vv. 1-5 and see 37:21). Ostensibly Jeremiah purchases his cousin Hanamel's field in Anathoth because the Mosaic law demanded that the nearest of kin purchase such property in order to keep it within the clan (vv. 6-9 and see Lev 25:25). Since property during a siege is worth nothing (see vv. 24-25), Jeremiah actually buys the field not as an asset but as another way of professing his faith in God's promise of restoration (vv. 10-15). Thus his purchase of the property amounts to a parable in action. His long prayer in verses 16-44, especially verses 24-25 and 36-44, explains the central point of the parable in action. Verses 38-41 repeat in similar words the substance of what Jeremiah said about the new covenant in 31:31-34 and account for the inclusion of chapter 32 in the collection of Jeremiah's prophecies of hope in chapters 30-33.

33:1-26 More on Israel's hope. Like chapter 32, this chapter contains another prophecy of hope made by Jeremiah during the siege of Jerusalem and at a time when the prophet was imprisoned in the quarters of the guard (vv. 1-13). A second prophecy dealing with the future of the Davidic dynasty follows (vv. 14-18) and presents another version of Jeremiah's prediction of a future Davidic Messiah given more succinctly in 23:5-6. Israel's future rests on firm foundations—a new covenant and a new David (vv. 19-26 and see 31:35-37).

PART V: DISOBEDIENCE AND DESTRUCTION

Jer 34:1–39:18

As in the rest of the book, the editors arranged the material in chapters 34–39 in a thematic rather than chronological order. Chapters 35–36 date to 598 and 604 B.C.E., respectively, in the reign of King Jehoiakim (609–598 B.C.E.) while chapters 34 and 37–39 date to the last years of King Zedekiah (597–587 B.C.E.). The theme of disobedience to God and God's prophet—a disobedience that results in destruction—clearly dominates and unifies the whole section.

A. The Broken Pact with the Slaves (34:1-22)

34:1-7 "This word came to Jeremiah from the Lord." The chapter begins with Jeremiah's announcement during Nebuchadnezzar's siege of Jerusalem (v. 1) that the city will fall and King Zedekiah will be captured (vv. 2-3). A promise is made to Zedekiah that if he obeys (the key word in this whole section), he will die in peace (vv. 4-5). He does not obey, however, and does not die in peace (see 39:4-7). Verses 6-7 indicate that the siege is far advanced, since only two of Jerusalem's fortress towns, Lachish and Azekah, remain. Interestingly enough, one of the twenty-nine Lachish letters (messages to the garrison commander at Lachish written on broken pieces of pottery discovered by archeologists when they excavated Lachish) contains the words: "Let my lord know that we are watching for the signals of Lachish . . . for we cannot see [the signals] of Azekah." The message would seem to indicate that Azekah had fallen and only Lachish remained.

34:8-22 "This is the word that came to Jeremiah from the Lord." The episode of the broken covenant with the slaves accounts for the inclusion of this chapter in the section that runs from chapter 34 to chapter 39. During the siege the king and the nobles freed their slaves, in accordance with the provision of the Sinai covenant that slaves were to be freed every seventh year (Exod 19:4-6; Deut 15:12-15). However, later they went back on their word and reenslaved their compatriots (vv. 8-11), probably when an Egyptian army arrived and forced the Babylonian armies to lift the siege temporarily (see vv. 21-22 and 37:4-5). By breaking their covenant with the slaves, they also broke their covenant with God (vv. 12-20). As verse 17 puts it: "You did not obey [the key word in this section] me by proclaiming your neighbors and kinsmen free. I now proclaim you free . . . for the sword, famine, and pestilence." The chapter concludes as it began (see vv. 1-7) with a renewed threat of destruction (vv. 21-22).

B. The Rechabites Obey but Israel Does Not (35:1-19)

The editors included this chapter for the same reason they included the previous chapter: it testifies to Israel's disobedience. Jeremiah contrasts the obedience of the Rechabites to their founder, Jonathan ben Rechab, with the disobedience of the Israelites to their founder, God. Founded in the ninth century (see 2 Kgs 10:15-17), the Rechabites, a reactionary group of Israelites, disdained the settled and luxurious life of their kinsfolk who accepted the way of life of the Canaanites. They insisted on going back to the desert way of life of the time of Moses and the Sinai covenant, electing a nomadic life, living in tents, planting no crops or vineyards, and drinking no wine (a vice of the Canaanites).

35:1-19 "The word came to Jeremiah from the Lord in the days of Jehoiakim." This episode (v. 1) occurred at the end of the reign of King Jehoiakim (609-598 B.C.E.), when the Babylonian invasion of 598 B.C.E. had begun (see v. 11). Using the equivalent of a parable in action, Jeremiah tempts the Rechabites to drink wine in order to demonstrate by their refusal their staunch obedience to their founder (vv. 2-5). In justification of their refusal, the Rechabites dutifully recite the commands of their religious founder (vv. 6-11). The key line is verse 10: "we obediently do everything our father Jonadab commanded." In verses 12-17 Jeremiah draws the moral of his parable, contrasting the obedience of the Rechabites to their father with the disobedience of the Israelites to their Father and repeating four times the key word "obey" (see vv. 13-14, 16-17). The lesson concludes with Jeremiah's promise of a blessing on the Rechabites (vv. 18-19).

C. Contempt for the Word of the Lord (36:1-32)

Continuing with source material demonstrating Israel's disobedience, the editors include an episode from the fourth year (605 B.C.E.) of King Jehoiakim (609-598 B.C.E.). The Israelites not only reject God's covenant (chs. 34-35), but they reject as well the words of God's prophet (ch. 36) and the prophet himself (chs. 37-38).

36:1-4 "In the fourth year of Jehoiakim." Why Jeremiah decided to put his prophecies in writing is not clear. Probably it was because under King Jehoiakim he was forbidden under penalty of death to preach; possibly it was because Babylonian armies were in the area, and he feared the end might come sooner than he had expected. His written words read to the people might still bring them to their senses (v. 3). If he died his words would outlast him (as they did) and might eventually bring about Israel's repentance and return (as they did). Baruch the scribe writes from Jeremiah's dictation and the book is done (v. 4).

36:9-19 "In the ninth month." Jeremiah sends Baruch to read his book publicly in the temple area (vv. 5-10). Some of the nobles hear the reading and call upon Baruch to read the book before the king's assembled counselors (vv. 11-16a). The nobles decide that the king should hear about the book but fear for the author and his scribe, and urge them to go into hiding (vv. 16b-19). When the king hears the words of the book, he shows his contempt for the word of the Lord by cutting it into strips and feeding it into a fire (vv. 20-23) and by ordering the arrest of Baruch and Jeremiah (vv. 24-26). The king, however, cannot so easily destroy the word of God. Jeremiah dictates a second scroll (vv. 27-32) and adds to it a searing condemnation of the contemptuous king (vv. 29-31).

D. Contempt for the Lord's Prophet (37:1–38:28)

Chapters 37 and 38 have much in common and may even be two different versions of the same episodes. This would not have bothered the editors, who were intent on demonstrating that the people of Jerusalem not only scorned the commands of the covenant (chs. 34–35) and the written words of the prophet (ch. 36) but the prophet himself (chs. 37–38). Such contempt for the covenant, the prophetic word, and the prophet himself proved how richly deserved was the destruction of Jerusalem described in chapter 39.

37:1-10 "Coniah, son of Jehoiakim, was succeeded by King Zedekiah." The formal introduction (v. 1) suggests that this section belonged to an independent source before it was taken up by the editors and incorporated into the Book of Jeremiah. The words "Neither he, nor his ministers, nor the people of the land would listen to the words of the Lord spoken by Jeremiah the prophet" (v. 2) more than adequately express the theme of chapter 37 and its counterpart, chapter 38. Weak and irresolute and unwilling to abide by Jeremiah's advice, the king sends again and again to Jeremiah, seeking a good word from the Lord (v. 3). This particular appeal to Jeremiah is made during the break in the siege occasioned by the arrival of an Egyptian army in the spring or summer of 588 B.C.E. (vv. 4-5). Jeremiah's reply is consistent: Jerusalem will fall despite the help of the Egyptians (vv. 6-10).

37:11-21 "When the Chaldean army lifted the siege of Jerusalem." In the time between the raising and the resuming of the siege, Jeremiah attempts to go home to Anathoth but is arrested at the city gate as a deserter (vv. 11-14). He is tried and thrown into a dungeon (vv. 15-16). The king has him brought to the palace, hoping that Jeremiah will have good news for him. Jeremiah's reply gives no hope (vv. 17-18). In obvious pain and anguish, Jeremiah pleads with Zedekiah to be released from the dungeon located in the house of Jonathan the scribe (vv. 18-20). He is subsequently imprisoned in the quarters of the guard, presumably a more benign prison (v. 21).

38:1-28 "Shephatiah, son of Mattan." Presumably Jeremiah has greater freedom in the quarters of the guard (see 32:6-15). Whatever the reason, his advice to the people to flee the city is construed as treason. He is handed over to his enemies, thrown into an empty cistern, and left to die in the mud of starvation and thirst (vv. 1-6). Fortunately Ebed-melech, a friend, is able to persuade the king to have him rescued from the cistern (vv. 7-13). Meeting with Jeremiah, the king again asks for a good word from the Lord (vv. 14-16) and again is rebuffed (vv. 17-27). After the meeting Jeremiah remains in the quarters of the guard until the city falls (v. 28).

E. The Fall of Jerusalem (39:1-18)

The editors append here a succinct account of the fall of Jerusalem. Whether it is from Baruch's biography of Jeremiah or freely composed by the editors, it serves the editors' purpose of showing that despite all the opposition of kings, false prophets, nobles, and common people, the word of Jeremiah has been vindicated. God has watched over the divine word and brought it to fulfillment (see 1:11-19).

39:1-18 "In the tenth month of the ninth year of Zedekiah." The siege that began in January of 588 B.C.E. ends with the fall of the city in July of 587 B.C.E. (vv. 1-3). The king tries to escape by fleeing down the Jericho road toward the Jordan. He is captured in the desert near Jericho, taken to Nebuchadnezzar's headquarters at Riblah in Syria, and condemned (vv. 4-5). Before having his eyes gouged out, he is forced to witness the execution of his sons, thus ensuring that the last event he sees by the light of day is the death of his own children (vv. 6-7). In the days that follow, the Babylonians burn the palace, the temple, and many homes and then deport into slavery and exile the cream of the population (vv. 8-10). Jeremiah, probably because he has so often counseled submission to Babylon, is spared (vv. 11-14). The account ends with Jeremiah's promise to Ebed-melech, the eunuch who saved him from death in the miry cistern (see 38:7-13), that his life will be spared (vv. 15-18).

PART VI: DISOBEDIENCE TO THE END

Jer 40:1–45:5

The editors included this section in the book of Jeremiah for two reasons. First, it continues the theme of Judah's disobedience to God and to God's prophet, the theme that dominated chapters 34–39. Second, it proves conclusively that Jeremiah was right when he called the inhabitants of Jerusalem "the bad figs" and predicted (see 24:1-10) for them only sword, famine, and pestilence (see 29:16-19).

A. Jeremiah at Mizpah (40:1–42:22)

40:1-6 Jeremiah in prison at Ramah. This version of Jeremiah's release from prison differs from the version given in 39:8-14. Either the editors used two different sources, or, as seems more likely, Jeremiah was released twice. After his release in Jerusalem, he could easily have been swept up along with others and sent to Ramah, about five miles north of Jerusalem, to await deportation. There Nebuzaradan gave him the choice of accompanying him to Babylon or staying with Gedaliah in Mizpah (vv. 4-6).

40:7-12 Gedaliah at Mizpah. After the destruction of Jerusalem and the deportation of the most prominent citizens, Nebuchadnezzar appointed Gedaliah governor of the conquered territory. He belonged to an old noble family, and his father, Ahikam, had helped save Jeremiah from execution after he preached his famous temple sermon (see 26:24).

As governor Gedaliah sets himself up at Mizpah, a little town about eight miles north of Jerusalem. Jerusalem after its siege and fall is no doubt uninhabitable. To Mizpah come soldiers and their commanders who have successfully hidden in the hills during the last days as well as the poor of the land, whom the Babylonians did not deport (vv. 7-8). To these Gedaliah promises his intercession with the Babylonians (vv. 9-10). Later on those who hid out in Moab, Ammon, Edom, and other countries come to join the others at Mizpah. Gedaliah and his community offer a glimmer of hope in an otherwise dismal situation. But it is not to last.

40:13–41:3 The assassination of Gedaliah. Johanan, one of the army commanders who joined the group at Mizpah, warns Gedaliah that the Ammonite king Baalis has persuaded Ishmael to assassinate him (vv. 13-14). Ishmael is a royal prince. Why he would join in a plot against his own people is hard to explain. He makes no attempt to take Gedaliah's place, and he must know that killing both his own people and the Babylonians will make him an outlaw in his own land. Johanan's suggestion that he kill Ishmael and forestall the assassination attempt shows that he is well aware of the consequences that will follow upon the assassination of a governor appointed by Nebuchadnezzar (v. 15). Gedaliah's refusal to believe in Ishmael's treachery costs him his life (41:1-3).

41:4-10 More murders. Ishmael's slaughter of the eighty pilgrims to Jerusalem is as difficult to explain as his assassination of Gedaliah (vv. 4-7). His release of the ten men with the hidden store of food assures that the slaughter cannot be kept secret (v. 8); so does his imprisoning of the other people at Mizpah (v. 10). However one looks at Ishmael's actions, they remain an enigma.

41:11-18 Rescue of the prisoners. Fortunately for Ishmael's prisoners, Johanan and other military commanders arrive on the scene before Ishmael gets too far, and they liberate the prisoners (vv. 11-14). Ishmael escapes to Ammon (v. 15), but he leaves Johanan and the others with a major problem. Should they wait at Mizpah and hope that the Babylonians will not avenge the murder of Gedaliah and the Babylonian garrison, or should they escape to Egypt and thus evade Babylonian vengeance? They opt for Egypt, heading south and camping near Bethlehem (vv. 16-18). There they will consult with Jeremiah before going on to Egypt.

42:1-6 Consulting the prophet. Jeremiah's presence at Mizpah at the time of the assassination of Gedaliah (41:1-3), the massacre of the pilgrims from Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria (41:4-9), and the subsequent rescue by Johanan and the others (41:11-18) is presumed but not proven by his presence among the group led by Johanan and the others. He could have joined them later. The story in chapter 42, like so many of the stories in chapters 34-44, centers on the theme of the Jerusalem inhabitants' continued, and by now habitual, disobedience to God and to God's prophet. Here the biographer emphasizes not only their disobedience but their hypocrisy as well. They approach Jeremiah (vv. 1-4) and swear to abide by his word from the Lord (vv. 5-6), when, as will become abundantly evident (see 43:1-7), they are already determined to flee into Egypt no matter what Jeremiah says.

42:7-9 "Ten days passed." If Johanan and the other commanders were already determined to flee into Egypt, Jeremiah's delay of ten days could only have aggravated them and perhaps even incensed them against him. Possible and even probable Babylonian reprisals for the assassination of Gedaliah and the Babylonian garrison made delay agonizing. What Jeremiah did during the ten days is not explained. He probably prayed and just waited. His waiting tells us something about the nature of prophesying. The prophet cannot turn on prophecy like tap water. It is not a human activity. Only when God speaks can the messenger speak God's word to others.

42:10-12 Jeremiah's word from the Lord: Remain and trust in God. Jeremiah's reply, in language that is by now almost stereotyped (compare 25:3-14; 26:2-6; 27:4-15; 29:16-19), calls upon Johanan and the others to do what they fear in their hearts to do: remain in the land and put their trust in God's promise to build them up (v. 10) and to save them from the reprisals of the Babylonians (vv. 11-12).

42:13-22 "But if you disobey." The rest of Jeremiah's reply to Johanan and his followers emphasizes the necessity of obedience (v. 13), anticipates their by now habitual disobedience and their decision to flee to Egypt (v. 14), and concludes with two long warnings on the dire consequences of their anticipated disobedience (vv. 15-22).

B. Jeremiah in Egypt (43:1–44:30)

43:1-7 As expected, they do not obey. Even the people's disobedience needs a hypocritical defense. Despite their solemn protest that they would abide by Jeremiah's word (see 42:1-6) and the implicit belief in the prophet that such a protestation implies, they now accuse him of lying and, equivalently, of being a false prophet (vv. 1-2). The attack on Baruch, Jeremiah's secretary (see 36:4, 16-19), is probably for the sake of the crowd, in order to take their attention off the commanders' refusal to accept Jeremiah's word (v. 3).

In verses 4-7 the narrator spells out the disobedience of the commanders. Against the word of the prophet, they lead the remainder of the group left in Judah into exile in Egypt. It is impossible to tell how large the group was. It contained the leaders, Jeremiah and Baruch, and some princesses from the royal family (v. 6), all important people, most of whom had much to fear from the Babylonians. The arrival at Tahpanhes (probably modern Tell Daphneh, a city at the eastern edge of the Nile Delta) closes the story and provides a transition to the account of Jeremiah's last days among the exiles in Egypt.

43:8-13 A symbolic act in Egypt. The narrator has almost nothing to say about the situation of the exiles in Egypt. He is intent instead on emphasizing and reemphasizing what has been his constant theme: the persistent and hard-hearted disobedience of the people right down to the end. He begins and ends this section (43:8–44:30) in the same way—with a prediction concerning the defeat of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar (compare 43:8-13 and 44:29-30). In between he gives an account of Jeremiah's last words to the exiles in Egypt.

The symbolic act consists of building a throne for Nebuchadnezzar at the entrance to the royal building in Taphanhes, which was used as Pharaoh's residence when he visited the city (vv. 8-9). Since it is unlikely that a refugee from Judah would be allowed near the palace, it is quite likely that Jeremiah's act was done in pantomime. The throne, as the explanation that follows in verses 10-13 makes clear, symbolizes the future conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar. (For similar symbolic language, see 1:15; for the actual setting up of such a throne or judgment seat, see 39:3.) The point of Jeremiah's symbolic act is that flight to Egypt against the word of God will not save the people. The Babylonians will catch up with them in Egypt and there have their vengeance upon them. They cannot flee from God or escape God's word of condemnation upon them.

Nebuchadnezzar's devastation of Egypt is described in stereotyped language based upon the typical destructive acts of conquerors (v. 11). Burning temples and despoiling them of their idols were practices well-known (v. 12). Nabonidus, the last king of Babylon, was a fanatic about burning the temples of conquered peoples and carrying off to Babylon their idols and cultic accoutrements. The reference to the sacred pillars of Beth-shemesh (house of the sun) probably refers to Heliopo-lis, a city about five miles northeast of modern Cairo, famous for its temple to Ra, the Egyptian sun-god (v. 13). Nebuchadnezzar invaded Egypt in 567 B.C.E. (see Ezek 29:17-20). He did not fulfill Jeremiah's prophecy literally. The fact that he came at all, however, was sufficient to verify the substantial truth of Jeremiah's prediction.

44:1-14 Jeremiah's last words. This section summarizes and closes the preaching of Jeremiah. The setting is someplace in Egypt, probably Tahpanhes; the audience, the exiles living in different cities throughout Egypt (v. 1). The sermon resembles and repeats much that Jeremiah said earlier (see chs. 7 and 25). It begins with warning words from Jeremiah (vv. 2-14), continues with the self-justifying response of his stubborn audience (vv. 15-19), and closes with Jeremiah's final condemnation of those now residing in exile in Egypt.

Jeremiah begins by reminding his audience that Judah and Jerusalem were destroyed because of the sin of idolatry (vv. 2-6). That, however, was not enough—they have continued their idolatry in Egypt (vv. 7-8). They have forgotten the sins of their ancestors that brought about this destruction (vv. 9-10), and therefore they are condemned to suffer in Egypt the same condemnation and destruction as their ancestors suffered in Jerusalem (vv. 11-14). Jeremiah had said that the future of Israel lay with the exiles of 597 B.C.E. and not with those who remained in Jerusalem after that deportation. He had called the exiles of 597 B.C.E. "the good figs," and those who remained in Jerusalem "the bad figs" (see chs. 24 and 29). The exiles in Egypt are from those who remained in Jerusalem. They are "bad figs" to the end.

44:15-19 Stubborn self-justification. Deluded people find it easy to justify themselves. Nevertheless, the exiles' self-justification is both subtle and mischievous. Jeremiah blamed the destruction of Jerusalem and Judah on Judah's idolatrous infidelity to God and to the covenant. The exiles blame it on their "mistake" of not continuing their idolatrous practices! Their argument is based presumably on the history of the last one hundred years of the kingdom of Judah (687–587 B.C.E.). During the long reign of Manasseh (687–640 B.C.E.), they practiced idolatry and, despite the idolatry, lived in peace (vv. 16-17). When, however, they discontinued their idolatrous practices, beginning with the reign of the pious King Josiah (639–609 B.C.E.), disaster followed upon disaster (vv. 18-19), beginning with the conquest of Judah by the Egyptians in 609 B.C.E., continuing with Nebuchadnezzar's invasion of the country in 598 B.C.E., and concluding with the death and exile of the nation in 587 B.C.E. In short, they were better off as idolaters! The argument is plausible; the theology is outrageous.

44:20-23 Jeremiah's response. Jeremiah ignores the deluded logic of the argument and reiterates his contention that idolatry, and idolatry alone, explains the national disasters (vv. 20-23).

44:24-30 The last word. Jeremiah tells the stubborn and self-justified people: "You and your wives have stated your intentions, and kept them in fact" (v. 25). The future will tell who is deluded and who is truly justified, and the future Jeremiah predicts is destruction (vv. 26-28). They have trusted in the protection of Pharaoh, but Pharaoh will be handed over to his enemies. As events turned out, Pharaoh Hophra was supplanted and executed by Amasis, the general of his army, who succeeded him as Pharaoh. In addition, Nebuchadnezzar invaded Egypt. More than that we do not know. But it was enough to verify Jeremiah's word. When Judah became reestablished in Palestine after the defeat of Babylon by Cyrus the Great in 539 B.C.E., it was reestablished by exiles from Babylon. Little is known about the exiles in Egypt. The Elephantine letters testify to their continuance in Egypt in later years and to the half-pagan form of worship they practiced in their temple on the island of Elephantine in upper Egypt. Beyond that nothing more is known about them for certain.

With Jeremiah's last words in Egypt, we come to the end of what we know for certain about this extraordinary prophet. Jewish legend has it that Jeremiah was stoned to death by the exiles in Egypt. That is the legend, and no one would be surprised if it was more fact than legend.

C. A Message for Baruch (45:1-5)

When Baruch the scribe wrote down, at Jeremiah's dictation, the summary of Jeremiah's preaching from the year 626 to 604

B.C.E. (see 36:1-4, 27-32), he evidently shared Jeremiah's own dismay and depression when confronted by the dire future in store for his people, his nation, and himself (vv. 1-3). Jeremiah now has a personal word of comfort for his disheartened friend. God would indeed tear down what had been built and uproot what had been planted (v. 4), but Baruch himself will escape death (v. 5b). He is told not to seek great things for himself—as well he might, since he is a professional scribe and an educated man, and his brother (see 51:59) is an officer of importance in the entourage of King Zedekiah. Whatever great things Baruch might have sought for himself, he certainly had to give them up when he associated himself with the prophet so much opposed by the kings and the nobles of Judah.

It is a matter of speculation just how much Baruch had to do with the source materials of the Book of Jeremiah. The material in chapters 34–44, however, has all the signs of an eyewitness account. It is very specific about dates and names and frequently tells of conversations that could only have been known by one extremely close to Jeremiah. Of all the people mentioned in the book, no one seems to have been closer to the prophet than Baruch. It is not idle supposition, therefore, to credit to Baruch the major part of the material found in chapters 34–45.

Nor is it surprising, if Baruch wrote these chapters, that he should have reserved to the end, almost as his signature, this long-remembered word of comfort from his friend Jeremiah. Some authors insist that this chapter is chronologically out of order, belonging more properly at the end of chapter 36. They may well be correct, but only if Baruch intended his book to be a chronological account of the last years of Jeremiah. If he intended it, however, to constitute a theological testimony to Judah's rejection of both God and God's prophet, then the present thematic rather than chronological order would much more effectively have fulfilled his purpose. In that case he might well have reserved this early word of comfort from Jeremiah and used it, as we have suggested, as the equivalent of an author's signature on his work.

PART VII: COLLECTED ORACLES AGAINST THE NATIONS AND CONCLUSION

Jer 46:1–52:34

A. Oracles Against the Nations (46:1–51:64)

Like chapters 25–32 in the Book of Ezekiel and chapters 13–23 in the Book of Isaiah, chapters 46–51 form a distinct section in the Book of Jeremiah. In the Septuagint (Greek) translation of the book, they are placed after 25:13a and conclude with 25:15-38, and the nations are arranged in the order of their political importance. In the Hebrew they follow a geographical order moving from west to east. These variations indicate that the oracles formed an individual collection that was introduced into the book in different ways according to the tastes of the third-century editors of the prophetic books. With few exceptions, which may come from later oracles mistakenly attributed to Jeremiah, most of the oracles date to the decades immediately before and after the fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C.E.

The basic theme of the oracles against the nations both here and in the other prophets is that God is the God of all the nations and that their destinies, like Israel's, lie in the hand and design of God. In reading the oracles, the reader should be aware of the fact that Semitic poetic expression revels in the symbolic, indulges in gross exaggerations, and frequently sees things only in black and white, with no regard for fine distinctions and careful qualifications. The universal extent of God's power, majesty, and sovereignty is what the poet strives to impress upon the readers. To this all the language, symbolism, and details are subservient. In short, the oracles against the nations are impressionistic rather than realistic.

46:1-12 Egypt defeated at Carchemish. This oracle is dated to 605 B.C.E., when the Babylonian army under Nebuchadnezzar defeated the Egyptian army under Pharaoh Neco at Carchemish on the Euphrates (vv. 1-2). It was a humiliating defeat for the Egyptians and should have taught the king of Judah and the neighboring kingdoms of Palestine to think twice about allying themselves with Egypt. Shortly after this battle Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, died, and Nebuchadnezzar hastened back to Babylon to take over the reins of the neo-Babylonian empire. His defeat of Pharaoh Neco avenged the death of King Josiah (639–609 B.C.E.) at Megiddo just four years earlier.

46:13-28 Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of Egypt. After his coronation as king, Nebuchadnezzar led several campaigns against Egypt, this one in 568 B.C.E. The Pharaoh referred to in verse 17 is probably Pharaoh Hophra. He is here given the derogatory name "the noise that let its time go by" because he was noted for promising much to his allies and delivering little. Verses 25-28 represent Jeremiah's final words against Egypt.

47:1-7 Against the Philistines. The land of the Philistines lay on the coast bordering the Mediterranean Sea. Since the coast route was the easiest route from north to south and vice versa, the Philistines had the misfortune of being in the way when Egyptian armies moved north or northern armies moved south. In this case it appears that Babylonian armies were moving south against Egypt and overran the coastal cities and Philistia. The oracle cannot be precisely dated.

48:1-47 Against Moab. Moab was directly east of the Dead Sea. Lack of information about the history of Moab makes it difficult to date this oracle. Moab plotted against Babylon in 593 B.C.E. (see 27:3), escaped disaster in 587, but was eventually punished by Babylon, probably in 582, when Nebuchadnezzar marched for a third punitive raid into Palestine. Later, Arab invaders destroyed Moab completely, bringing to an end the ancient nation so long an enemy of Israel and so closely associated with the history of Israel from the beginning (see Num 22–24).

49:1-6 Against Ammon. Located east of the Jordan and just north of Moab, Ammon, like Moab, was a longtime enemy of Israel (see 2 Sam 10). And like Moab, Ammon was a member of Zedekiah's conspiracy against Babylon (see 27:3). It too escaped disaster in 587 B.C.E. but was overrun first by Nebuchadnezzar's armies in 582 and later by Arab invaders. Like Moab, it ceased to exist as a nation.

49:7-22 Against Edom. Edom lay south and east of the Dead Sea. It was remembered with bitterness by Judah not only for the long-lasting enmity between the two nations beginning at the time of the Exodus (see Num 20:14-21) but for its callous and treacherous treatment of Judah at the time of the Babylonian invasion of 587 B.C.E. It not only refused to help the Jews but collaborated with the Babylonians and cheered the downfall of Judah and Jerusalem (see Ezek 35:12-14; Obad; Ps 137:7). Later, when the Arab invaders arrived, the Edomites moved into southern Judah and occupied territory as far north as Hebron, just thirty miles south of Jerusalem. This occupied territory became known as Idumea. The oracle was probably occasioned by a Babylonian raid on Edom sometime after 587 B.C.E., but it echoes with the remembrance of earlier bitter encounters between the two longtime enemy nations.

49:23-27 Against Damascus. Northeast of the lake of Galilee, Damascus paid tribute to Nebuchadnezzar after the battle of Carchemish in 605 B.C.E. The oracle probably refers to a disaster following this date, but it cannot be dated with assurance.

49:28-33 Against the Arab tribes. In 599 B.C.E., on his way south to attack Judah, Nebuchadnezzar led a punitive raid against the Bedouin tribes in the desert area of eastern Syria. This brief oracle probably dates to that event.

49:34-39 Against Elam. Verse 34 dates this oracle to the year 597 B.C.E., the beginning of the reign of King Zedekiah of Judah. Elam lay east of Babylon in the southern part of modern Iran. Elam clashed with Babylon about this time, and Jeremiah may well have intended the oracle to quash any hopes the exiles of 597 B.C.E. had that Elam would save them from a long exile.

50:1–51:64 Against Babylon. Not surprisingly, the longest of Jeremiah's oracles against the nations is against Babylon. No other nation had such a lasting influence on the kingdom of Judah. Babylon invaded Judah in 605, 598, 588, and 582 B.C.E. As a result of the invasion of 588 B.C.E., the nation ceased to exist, its capital was destroyed, its temple burned to the ground, and its people led off into exile. Babylon was the burial ground of the Israelite nation, and only the resurrection of the nation after 539 B.C.E. kept Babylon from being its perpetual tomb. However much Judah deserved the treatment meted out to it by Babylon, it never ceased to consider Babylon its archenemy.

Since no internal evidence points to the rise of Cyrus, the conqueror of Babylon in 539 B.C.E., and since the description of the fall of Babylon differs greatly from its actual fall (it fell peacefully from within as a result of treachery), the oracle cannot be dated after 539 B.C.E. How long before that date it was composed is difficult to tell. The oracle deals not only with the fall of Babylon but with the return of the people from exile as well (vv. 4-8 and passim). Since the oracle against Babylon terminates the collection of Jeremiah's oracles against the nations, it is not improbable that the editors added to it much that had been said against Babylon by Jeremiah himself as well as oracles against Babylon spoken by others during the long years of the Babylonian captivity.

B. Conclusion of the Book (52:1-34)

This chapter is an appendix. It draws upon 2 Kgs 24:18–25:30, the last chapters of the Deuteronomist's history of Israel's covenant relationship with God, a history that runs from Deuteronomy through Joshua, Judges, 1-2 Samuel, and 1-2 Kings. The history was written after 562 B.C.E., the last date mentioned in 2 Kings. Since this chapter repeats much that was already said in chapter 39, one must ask why the editors added it. The best explanation would be that it was added to reinforce both the negative and the positive messages of Jeremiah. By once more describing the fall of Jerusalem (52:1-30), the editors remind the reader how unerringly Jeremiah's predictions of destruction came to pass. By including the good treatment accorded Jehoiachin, the last king of Judah, by the king of Babylon (52:31-34), the editors remind the reader that Jeremiah predicted not only destruction and exile but return from exile and the rebuilding of the nation. Jehoiachin's release from prison in Babylon was a clear sign of hope for the future.

52:1-16 The fall of Jerusalem. Zedekiah, the third son of Josiah and the uncle of Jehoiachin, who was exiled as hostage royalty in Babylon in 597 B.C.E., is judged by the author of 2 Kings to have done "evil in the eyes of the Lord," as had so many kings of Judah, thus bringing about the end of the kingdom (vv. 1-3). The siege began in January of 588 B.C.E. and ended in July of 587 (vv. 4-6). The escape, capture, and blinding of Zedekiah (vv. 7-11) repeat what was said in 39:5-7. A month after the fall of the city, Nebuzaradan, Nebuchadnezzar's general, arrived to overlook the destruction of the city and to supervise the deportation of the citizens (vv. 12-16).

52:17-23 The looting of the temple. The Babylonians first looted the temple in 597 B.C.E. (see 27:16 and 2 Kgs 24:13). It had been refurbished in the intervening ten years. The looted items are for the most part those bronze, silver, and gold items described in Exod 25–30 and 1 Kgs 6–7. Following the first looting of the temple in 597 B.C.E., Jeremiah warned the people that what was left would be carried off later. After the looting the temple was burned to the ground.

52:24-30 Deportation into exile. Deportation of conquered peoples as the most effective means to prevent further rebellion had long been practiced by the Assyrians (see 2 Kgs 17). Babylon continued the practice, and it would have a long history in the centuries that followed. It did not mean deportation of all the people but only those influential persons, leaders, bureaucrats, and the intellectual elite whose presence might sustain or rekindle the fires of rebellion. Some were executed (v. 27), either as examples or for their known part in the rebellion.

The numbers given in verses 28-30 cover three groups of exiles: those of 597, 587, and 582 B.C.E., respectively. The figure of 3,023 mentioned here (v. 28) differs from the 10,800 mentioned in 2 Kgs 24:14, 16. A possible explanation is that the figure mentioned here represents only the males, while the figure mentioned in 2 Kgs 24 represents the total of men, women, and children. The 745 men of Judah mentioned in verse 30 as deported in the twenty-third year (582 B.C.E.) of King Nebuchadnezzar may be those deported after a punitive raid on Judah following the assassination of Gedaliah and the slaughter of the Babylonian garrison by Ishmael (see 40:13–41:3).

52:31-34 The release of King Jehoiachin from prison. The young king who succeeded his father, Jehoiakim, in 598 B.C.E. and reigned only three months before being deported to Babylon as hostage royalty was released from prison in 561 B.C.E. by Evil-merodach, the successor of Nebuchadnezzar (v. 31). Since many people both in Babylon and back in devastated Judah considered Jehoiachin rather than Zedekiah their legitimate king, his release from prison was a sign of hope for the future.

Receipts for supplies given to the king and his entourage have been found in the Babylonian chronicles. Significantly they refer to him as "Yaukin, king of Judah."

The favors accorded Jehoiachin (vv. 32-34) may or may not have amounted to special treatment beyond that given to other hostage royalty. For the editors of the Book of Jeremiah, however, this was surely interpreted as special treatment. It was meant to remind the reader that Jeremiah had predicted an end to the Exile and the return of the exiles to their land (see chs. 25; 29; 32; 33). Thus the concluding chapter records the fulfillment of Jeremiah's predictions of disaster as well as a presage of the fulfillment of his predictions of return and rebuilding.

C. The Influence of Jeremiah

There is no simple measure of the influence of Jeremiah. In time his words, like a two-edged sword, penetrated the marrow of Israel, stirred the heart of the nation in exile, and reverberated through sacred writ even into the books of the New Testament.

Like Moses before and Jesus after him, Jeremiah lived at a turning point in his people's history and bridged the gap between the old and the new. In his inaugural vision he was set "over nations and over kingdoms, to root up and to tear down, to destroy and to demolish, to build and to plant" (1:10). He fulfilled his mission to the letter. He saw Assyria disappear from the stage of history and Babylon take over center stage. He preached the funeral oration for Judah and the Sinai covenant and at the same time foretold the institution of a new covenant. He declared the Davidic kings rejected but heralded the coming of a new David.

Of Jeremiah it can be said: no man did more for his nation and was treated worse. The mystery, however, is not in the prophet's suffering but in the resurrection of the nation that died and was buried in Babylon in fulfillment of his prophecies.

Israel's resurrection from national death in Babylon is one of the wondrous works of God. But God works through human beings, and of all those who worked for Israel's resurrection, none did more than Jeremiah. When he arrived on the scene in 626 B.C.E., there was hardly an Israelite alive who would admit that the city of Jerusalem could be taken and the temple destroyed. In the popular mind, God was bound to Jerusalem and to the Davidic kings, and Jerusalem was inviolable because God had chosen it. The defeat of Sennacherib in the time of Isaiah only confirmed the average Israelite in this false theology. More than anything else, it explains the senseless revolts against Babylon and the childish expectation, even in the last months of the siege, that God would intervene and destroy Nebuchadnezzar, as happened with Sennacherib.

Jeremiah's thankless task was the destruction of this false theology. He reminded the people in his temple address that God was not bound to the temple but could and would destroy it as Shiloh had been destroyed in times past. He insisted repeatedly that Jerusalem would be destroyed, that the kings, though they might be as the signet ring on God's finger, could nevertheless be taken off by God and cast away.

Jeremiah tried to make the Jews understand that the fall of Jerusalem would not be the work of Babylon but the work of God using Babylon as a juggernaut. He was derided, mocked, and scorned. His enemies, the false prophets, carried the day.

But when the Day of Yahweh came for Jerusalem, the nation, and the kings, there were those who remembered. Then the parables of the loincloth and the potter and the broken flask were seen in a new light. Then the temple address was seen to make sense. The false prophets were proved false, the childish optimism groundless, the popular theology a trap.

If that had been all that the people learned from Jeremiah's preaching, it would have been enough to vindicate the prophet, but at the terrible price of national despair. There was more, however. In exile the people remembered that Jeremiah had spoken of the "good figs" that would one day return to Judah and to whom the Lord had said: "Only after seventy years have elapsed for Babylon will I visit you and fulfill for you my promise to bring you back to this place" (25:10). They remembered his sermons of consolation (chs. 30–31), his buying of property in the last days of the siege, and his promise from God: "Houses and fields and vineyards shall again be bought in this land" (32:15). They remembered most of all his promise of a new covenant for Israel (31:31-34; 32:40) and his promise of a new David in days to come (33:14-26; 23:5-6).

The downfall of Jerusalem, the temple, and the kings came as Jeremiah had predicted. But when it came, some at least were prepared to understand it as it should have been understood—in the light of the covenant between God and the people of God, according to which the nation's future depended on its loyalty or disloyalty to the stipulations agreed to on Sinai. For these at least, the tragedy was explicable, and explicable in terms of the faith by which Israel lived. Among these, too, faith continued to live, through the dreadful days of siege and destruction and through the long years of exile. That faith was the link that joined the Israel of old to the Israel that arose from the grave of the Exile to become a nation again in 539 B.C.E. And it was Jeremiah who forged the link.

BARUCH

Peter F. Ellis

INTRODUCTION

In the years that followed the catastrophic destruction of Jerusalem in 587 B.C.E., some Jews were deported to Babylonia, others fled into Egypt, still others remained in the devastated homeland. In 539 B.C.E. Cyrus the Persian defeated the Babylonians and established Persian rule over what had been the empire of Babylon. As one of his first acts, Cyrus decreed the return of conquered peoples to their homelands. Thus it came about after 539 B.C.E. that the Exiles were free to return to their homeland.

Many returned, but many more remained in the land of the conquerors. Those who remained formed what came to be called the Diaspora—the Jews of the dispersion or permanent exile who never returned to their homeland but remained in colonies situated for the most part in Mesopotamia and Egypt. While many of them no doubt defected from their ancient faith, many more remained faithful. In the centuries that followed, the Diaspora Jews flourished both spiritually and temporally.

Fortunately for Israel's religious future, many of the exiles came from the influential and intellectual circles of the people—priests, scribes, and prophets. From these the exiles received instruction and encouragement. With the temple and its sacrifices so far away, the cult of the exiles came to be localized in the synagogues and centered upon the inspired writings. Thus in the course of time, they came to be the people of the book. Faithful to Jerusalem and the rebuilt temple of Zerubbabel, completed between 520 and 515 B.C.E., the Diaspora Jews gathered in their synagogues, read and studied the law and the prophets, and in due time produced their own inspired books. Among these were the books of Lamentations, Tobit, Esther, Judith, Wisdom, and Baruch.

Diaspora writings, as might be expected, dealt with Diaspora situations and challenges. This is eminently true of the Book of Baruch. It deals in its successive parts with the exiles' relations with Jerusalem, with hope for the future, and with resistance to the idolatrous worship of the surrounding pagans.

Since the material in the book reflects events late in the Exile and shows some dependence on the writings of Deutero-Isaiah (550–540 B.C.E.), it seems reasonable to believe that editors are responsible for the attribution of the Book to Baruch. Baruch had been Jeremiah's secretary (see Jer 36). He had perhaps accompanied the prophet into exile. In addition, he was well acquainted with Jeremiah's letter to the exiles (see Jer 29) and with Jeremiah's message of hope (see Jer 30–33).

It was customary in ancient times to attribute works by unknown authors to more famous authors of previous centuries. Thus many psalms written by nameless authors were attributed to David, and several wisdom books were attributed to Solomon (for example, Proverbs and the Book of Wisdom). It must have seemed fitting to the third-century editors of the prophetic books to attribute to Baruch, Jeremiah's famous secretary, this collection of writings dealing with the situation and challenges of the exiles.

COMMENTARY

A. Introduction (1:1-14)

1:1-4 Baruch's scroll. This section begins in the style typical of Baruch in the Book of Jeremiah (see the opening verses of Jer 32; 36; 38; 39)—with specific names and dates. It makes a bow toward Jer 36 by attributing this second book to Baruch (vv. 1-2). The "fifth year" (v. 2) is perhaps meant to be the fifth year of the exile (582 B.C.E.). Baruch is pictured reading his scroll before the exiled king, his courtiers, and the exiles in Babylon, somewhat as he had read Jeremiah's scroll in Jer 36:8-19 (vv. 3-4).

1:5-9 Concern for temple worship. The weeping, fasting, and praying, in addition to the taking up of a collection for the temple, provide a program for the readers that will keep their hearts centered on the temple and on their traditional Yahwistic faith (vv. 5-7). Nothing is known about a restoration of the cultic vessels taken from the temple after the Babylonian invasion of 597 B.C.E. (v. 8). That new cultic vessels were made to substitute for the looted vessels can be taken for granted (v. 9). It is mentioned no doubt as a reminder to the reader that supporting temple worship was the duty of every true Israelite. At the time the Book of Baruch was put together, the new temple of Zerubbabel had long been in existence. It was completed in 516 B.C.E. (see Ezra 1–6).

1:10-14 A message for the high priest. The message testifies to the exiles' concern for divine worship (v. 10) and concern for good treatment by their Babylonian overlords (vv. 11-12). The juxtaposition of Nebuchadnezzar, the second king of the Babylonian empire, and Belshazzar, the last king, indicates a late date for the book. Belshazzar was coregent with his father, King Nabonidus, when the armies of Cyrus the Great conquered Babylon in 539 B.C.E. No son of Nebuchadnezzar by the name of Belshazzar is known to history. The last two requests—a request for prayers for the contrite exiles and a request that Baruch's book be read publicly on feast days—emphasize what is central to the purpose of the editors: true contrition and a firm purpose of amendment (vv. 13-14). In one way or another, it will be the purpose of every section of the little book of Baruch to arouse and sustain in its readers these sentiments so critical for the spiritual health and the national survival of Israel.

B. A Penitential Prayer (1:15–3:8)

Penitential prayers such as the one preserved here are typical of exilic literature (see Neh 9:6-37; Dan 9:4-19). What the exiles refused to learn from Jeremiah, they learned from the hardships of the Exile. Prayers such as this were a feature of the synagogue services that originated in exilic times.

1:15-22 "Justice is with the Lord, our God." The prayer begins with an acknowledgment of national guilt that embraces the sins of the author's contemporaries (v. 15) and their ancestors (vv. 16-17). It then traces Israel's guilt back through history to the time of Moses and the Exodus (vv. 18-22). Mention of the curse that the Lord enjoined upon Moses (v. 20) reflects the curses of Deut 28 and prepares the way for the just fulfillment of these curses that the author acknowledges in 2:1-10.

2:1-10 Just retribution. All the evils are summed up in the two most horrible of all: the cannibalism of children in the last days of the siege of Jerusalem (v. 3) and the degradation of the nation as a whole following the fall of Judah and Jerusalem to the Babylonians in 587 B.C.E. (vv. 4-5). That all this has been just retribution for the sins of the nation is honestly acknowledged in verses 6-10.

2:11-15 An appeal for mercy. What has preceded has been preamble to the prayer that properly begins here. Firmly believing that God is just, in the sense that God is ever merciful and faithful to earlier promises to save the covenanted people, the author of the prayer, who has already confessed his people's guilt (1:15-22) and their justly deserved punishment (2:1-10), now enters his plea for mercy (vv. 11-13). He appeals to God's honor to show the whole earth, by merciful treatment of the exiles, that God is Lord of Israel and Lord of all (vv. 14-15).

2:16-18 The nether world. Up to the second century before Christ, Israel had no clear knowledge of the future life. In its prayers, therefore, it believed that praise could be given to God only by the living (vv. 17-18).

Clear revelation concerning the future life begins with Dan 12 and 2 Macc 7.

2:19-35 Hopes based on God's unfailing mercy. This section of the prayer begins with an admission that the punishment Israel suffered was deserved because the people refused to listen to the warnings of the prophets (vv. 19-20), and especially the warnings of Jeremiah (vv. 21-26). Verse 23 combines two typical Jeremian warnings (see Jer 7:34 and 27:12). Verse 25 mentions the stereotyped Jeremian trilogy of sword, famine, and pestilence (see Jer 32:24, 36; 34:17). Verses 27-35 recall the unfailing mercy of God (v. 27), who despite Israel's failure to heed the warnings of Moses (vv. 28-29) will deal mercifully with it in the time of its captivity (vv. 30-32), bring it back to the land promised to its ancestors (vv. 33-34), and establish with it the new covenant (v. 35) promised by Jeremiah (Jer 31:31-34).

3:1-8 A concluding plea for mercy. These verses sum up the heart of the whole long prayer (2:11–3:8), emphasizing again God's mercy (vv. 1-4), God's honor (vv. 5-6), and the gift of fear of the Lord, which enables the people to call upon God in praise, even in the land of their captivity (vv. 7-8). The prayer is long and repetitious but filled with a true spirit of penitence and hope. It represents Israel at its best.

C. A Poem in Praise of Wisdom (3:9–4:4)

Modern readers can understand this poem easily if they recall that for the Jews wisdom is equivalent to fear of the Lord (that is, obedience to the will of God) and that the will of God is found in the revelation of God's will contained in the Scriptures, preeminently in the books of the Pentateuch (the Torah). In brief, only God is the ultimate source of true wisdom, and God has chosen to reveal this in the Torah. As a consequence praise of wisdom is indirectly praise of God. Doing God's will, moreover, is the way of the wise; not doing it is the way of the fool. A prayer for wisdom is a prayer for the grace to do God's will. The reader should note that wisdom is personified in the poem from 3:15 to 4:4, just as it is personified in Prov 8:1-36 and Sir 24:1-31.

3:9 "Hear, O Israel, the commandments of life." This beautiful prayer begins with an exhortation to Israel to hear, that is, to obey God's commandments. It ends in 3:37–4:4 with the declaration that God has given wisdom to Israel (v. 37) and that that wisdom is found in the book of the precepts of God, that is, the Torah-Pentateuch (3:38–4:4). As a result, the whole poem is an appeal to Israel to do God's will and thus to be both wise and blessed (4:4).

3:10-14 The consequences of not hearing. Israel is asked how it came about that it is in exile (vv. 10-11). The answer: The people have forsaken wisdom (vv. 12-13 and see Jer 2:13). The admonition "Learn where prudence [that is, wisdom] is" (v. 14) leads into the question of where wisdom can be found (3:15-36), a question that will be answered in 3:37–4:4 with the declaration that wisdom is found in "the book of the precepts of God" (4:1).

3:15-23 Wisdom is not found among the Gentiles. Since by definition only Israel possesses God's revelation, it is clear that true wisdom cannot be found among the Gentiles. Here the author means the wisdom that comes from God, since wisdom and wisdom literature were well known and cultivated among Judah's neighbors, the Egyptians, the Mesopotamians, and many of the smaller nations of the Middle East. The rulers of old who heaped up wealth have not found wisdom (vv. 17-19), nor have the later generations: the Canaanites (vv. 20-22), the Midianites, the Temanites, the children of Hagar (Arabic tribes descended from Abraham and Hagar), and their pagan wisdom writers (v. 23). Human beings on their own are not able to find true wisdom!

3:24-36 Wisdom is found only with God. In all of God's creation (vv. 24-25), no human being has discovered wisdom or found the way to her (vv. 26-31). Only God, who created and established the earth and to whom no other is to be compared, knows wisdom (vv. 32-35).

3:37–4:4 Wisdom is the law. Only God knows the way to wisdom, and God has given her to Israel (v. 37) in the book of the precepts of the law, the Pentateuch. Let Israel cling to wisdom, "walk by her light" (that is, live according to God's law), and Israel will live and be blessed (vv. 1-4). Israel's "glory," which God gives to Israel and not to pagans, is the law (v. 3).

D. A Poetic Plea for Return from Exile (4:5–5:9)

In this beautiful poetic discourse, very much indebted to the poetry of Deutero-Isaiah (Isa 40–55), the speaker personifies Jerusalem as the mother of the nation, explaining to the nearby nations and to her exiled children the reason for her exile and encouraging the exiles to look for an early return home. The discourse has four parts: introduction (4:5-8); Jerusalem's explanation to the nations (4:9-20); Jerusalem's encouraging discourse to her exiled children (4:21-29); the poet's address to Jerusalem to rejoice in the return of her exiled children (4:30–5:9).

4:5-9 "Fear not, my people." The speaker begins by reminding Israel that it went into exile because of its infidelity. Verse 4 introduces Jerusalem, who will be the personified speaker in 4:9-29, as the grief-stricken mother of Israel and the exiles.

4:9-20 Jerusalem's address to her neighbors. Jerusalem mourns for the captivity of her sons and daughters (vv. 9-11), whose sins have brought upon them punishment (vv. 12-14) by a nation from afar (Babylon), which has exiled them and left their mother, Jerusalem, widowed and solitary (vv. 15-16). The widow symbolism in verses 12 and 17 flows from the Hosean symbolism of the marriage between God and the people Israel (see Hos 1–3). Jerusalem asks herself what she can do for her children. She acknowledges that only God can deliver them from the Exile (vv. 17-19). She herself will pray (v. 20) and call upon her children to pray with her. Verse 20, with the mention of crying out to God, provides a transition to verses 21-29.

4:21-29 Jerusalem trusts in God's mercy. Jerusalem calls upon her children to pray (v. 21) and speaks about her trust in God's mercy (v. 22) and her confident expectation that God will bring her children back to her (vv. 23-24). In verses 25-29 Jerusalem concludes her address. She counsels patience and promises God's vengeance on her persecutors (vv. 25-26). Her last words are a plea for repentance (vv. 27-29)—a repentance that has been a goal of the discourse from the beginning.

4:30–5:9 The poet's address to Jerusalem. Now that mother Jerusalem has finished her discourse (4:9-29), the speaker addresses her in soaring language and bids her prepare for the end of her mourning and the joyful return of her children. She should not fear (v. 30), because God will destroy Babylon, "the city that rejoiced at [her] collapse" (vv. 31-35). She should look to the east and see her sons returning home (vv. 36-37). Babylon was due east of Jerusalem, and the poet envisions God leading the exiles back across the desert, as in Isa 1:4-11. Jerusalem, which had taken off her robe of peace in 4:20 for a robe of mourning, is now told to remove the mourning robe and put on the splendor of God—the manifestation of God's saving action in returning her children from exile (5:1-4). In a final apostrophe (5:5-9), Jerusalem is called to stand upon the heights and watch her exiled children come marching home on the road laid out in the desert (see Isa 1:3-5) and led by none other than God (see Isa 1:9-11).

E. The Letter of Jeremiah (6:1-72)

Chapter 29 of the Book of Jeremiah contains a letter written by the prophet to the exiles carried off to Babylon following Nebuchadnezzar's invasion of Judah and Jerusalem in 597 B.C.E. Sometime in the centuries that followed, an unknown author wrote this long satire against the idol worship of the pagans and attributed it to the great prophet of the last days of Judah. Editors included it at the end of the collection of writings now found in the Book of Baruch. Although it exists only in a Greek translation, it was originally composed in Hebrew. Critics believe it cannot be the work of Jeremiah for several reasons, the strongest being that: (a) the editors of the Book of Jeremiah did not include it in the book; (b) it shows a strong dependence on the satires against idol worship in Isa 40–55; (c) it speaks in verses 27-31 of practices of the Mosaic law that never were of any concern to Jeremiah.

All things considered, the letter constitutes a long sermon attacking the foolishness of idol worship and exhorting the exiles not to be taken in by it. The modern reader may consider such an attack superfluous. Few today believe in idol worship. In the ancient world, however, it was otherwise. Few believed in one God. The overwhelming majority believed in many gods and worshiped them in many forms. They not only worshiped them but they built magnificent temples for them, supported a rich and powerful priesthood to serve them, and celebrated a multitude of feast days with processions, sacrifices, the singing of psalms, and elaborate spectacles.

For the Jewish exiles from a tiny Middle Eastern nation with a small unpretentious temple and a modest priesthood and cult, the power, the wealth, and the magnificence of the pagans' idol worship, especially in such a great metropolis as Babylon, must at times have seemed overwhelming. True believers, of course, would not have been impressed. Many others, however, may well have felt that truth was determined by power, magnificence, and numbers. Deutero-Isaiah as early as 550 B.C.E. feared the attraction of idol worship for lukewarm exiles and lambasted idols and idol worshipers in a series of satirical comparisons between the nature and power of Israel's God and the nature and impotence of the pagan gods (see Isa 40:18-20; 41:21-24; 44:6-20; 46:1-7). The idol-worship religion of the pagans was no mean adversary to the revealed religion of Israel!

The letter of Jeremiah proves that the idol worship attacked by Deutero-Isaiah in the first fifty years of the Exile continued, in the centuries that followed, to have a powerful attraction for the exiles who remained in pagan countries. The letter attacks idol worship with scorn, invective, mockery, and incredulity. Its message is summed up in the recurring refrain: "Thus it is known they are not gods; do not fear them" (see vv. 14, 22, 28, 39, 44, 50, 56, 64, 68, 71).

The letter reads easily, is patent in its satirical intent and requires only a few brief comments. 6:3 you will see borne upon men's shoulders gods of silver . . . : This is a reference to the great processions that were part of the pagan cult. 6:6 my angel: Symbolic of God's protective presence, the angel here recalls the angel of Exod 23:20-21. 6:10 the harlots: Sacred prostitution, that is, intercourse with priestesses in the temple precincts, was a prominent feature of pagan worship and was particularly offensive to Israel because of its prevalence in the Baal fertility cult of the Canaanites (see Deut 23:17-18). 6:12 the house: This means the pagan temple. 6:19 their hearts are eaten away: The idols were made of wood covered with gold or silver. The wood frequently rotted away or was eaten by insects. 6:25 displaying their shame: It could be that the idols were naked figures, or it could be that they displayed their weakness by having to be carried. 6:27-31 Unclean practices. Jewish law considered menstruating women unclean (see Lev 12:2-3). It was forbidden for priests to bare their heads, shave their beards, or rend their garments (see Lev 21:5-10). 6:42 girt with cords: This is another reference to sacred prostitution (see v. 10). An unbroken cord signified that the woman had not fulfilled her obligation of sacred prostitution in the temple. 6:72 the better for the just man: This final verse, following so powerful a denunciation of idolatry, is surely a provocative understatement!

CHRONOLOGICAL CHART*
for
AMOS, HOSEA, MICAH, NAHUM, ZEPHANIAH, HABAKKUK

JUDAH	ISRAEL	ASSYRIA
Uzziah 783–42	Jeroboam II 786–46
	AMOS
	HOSEA
	Zechariah 746–45	Tiglath-pileser III 745–27
	Shallum 745
Jotham 742–35	Menshem 745–37
ISAIAH	Pekahiah 737–36
Ahaz 735–15	Pekah 736–32
MICAH	Hoshea 732–24	Shalmaneser V 826–22
	Fall of Samaria 722/1
		Sargon II 721–05
Hezekiah 715–686
Manasseh 686–42	Babylon	Sennacherib 705–681
		Esarhaddon 680–69
		Ashurbanipal 668–27
Amon 642–40
Josiah 640–09
JEREMIAH	Nabopolassar 626–05	Sin-shar-ishkun 629–12
ZEPHANIAH
NAHUM
		Fall of Nineveh 612
Jehoahaz 609
Jehoiakim 609–598
HABAKKUK	Nebuchadnezzar 605–582
Jehoiachin 598/7
EZEKIEL
Zedekiah 597–87
Fall of Jerusalem 587
Exile

*Dates are dependent upon John Bright, A History of Israel. 3rd ed. Westminster Press, 1981.

AMOS

Carroll Stuhlmueller, C.P.

INTRODUCTION

The fierce champion of justice

The prophet Amos spoke plainly to the Israelites, even fiercely so. The Hebrew text, moreover, is well preserved. If some sentences seem vague or confusing, the fault lies at our doorsteps, due to our ignorance of ancient times and the ancient way of life. While Amos' words ring with the crystal tones of a bell, the person of Amos is lost in the echo. A few facts are obvious enough. He was from the village of Tekoa (1:1), some ten miles south of Jerusalem in the tribal portion of Judah. Again according to the opening verse, he prophesied during the long, prosperous reign of King Jeroboam II (786–746 B.C.E.), "two years before the earthquake," therefore around 760. We find his shaggy figure in the capital city of Samaria as well as at the venerable sanctuary of Bethel. At the instigation of the high priest, he was expelled from the northern kingdom of Israel and was sent packing back to Judah (7:12). The name Amos means "burden," and the name Tekoa probably means "to sound the [ram's] horn." His message carried a burden of destruction; it was sounded loud across the northern kingdom and was remembered long afterward at Jerusalem (1:2).

Other information about Amos has to be pieced together from details scattered throughout the book. Some of these fragments are distinct, others remain blurred. Twice Amos is described as a shepherd, yet each time the common Hebrew word for "shepherd" is not employed. Instead, in 1:1 the word is the same one used of a Moabite king in 2 Kgs 3:4; in 7:14 the word refers more to the breeding of cattle (Gen 33:13). This fact, along with Amos' acquaintance with the vocabulary and style of the wisdom literature, associates him with nobility. The prophet, moreover, shows himself an absolute master of the Hebrew language; his writing is characterized by structural unity and momentum toward a climax (1:3–2:16); the blending of irony and seriousness (4:1-5); rhetorical questions (at least thirty—2:11; 3:3-6); haunting sounds that speak a message even without words (2:16); the up-and-down, staircase style of literary chiasm (5:4-6).

Yet, any number of other details point to a person economically poor, with neither clout nor prestige. According to 7:14, Amos was forced to take a second job as a "dresser of sycamore trees" (moonlighting to make ends meet?). He worked in dangerous association with lions, bears, and snakes (3:4, 8, 12; 5:17); he knew the groan of heavily laden wagons (2:13) and was desperate about locust plagues (7:1-2). His caricature of women in 4:1-3 smacks of a rough herdsman; he spits disdain at wealthy men lying on ivory couches in their massage parlors (6:3-6). Therefore, we place Amos in the ranks of the poor. He was born brilliant and was desert-trained to perceive color, sound, grandeur, and wonder in contemplative silence. He quickly absorbed the patterns of temple worship, legal proceedings at the city gate, and the sophisticated ways of the sages.

Historical setting

Amos learned much from the marketplaces of Israel's larger cities. As he sat on the ground with other shepherds, displaying his wool, cheese, and leather goods, he swapped news from Tyre, Damascus, Moab, and Gaza. All the while he angrily detected the flagrant injustices of society: extensive international commerce for the benefit of the wealthy; deceitful business practices not only to cheat the defenseless poor but also to seize their land; the amassing of natural resources for sensual pleasure. Some documentation found amid the ruins of Samaria tells of large shipments of oil and wine for the royal court; these were paid from taxes squeezed from the poor. The country was basking in the military victories of King Jeroboam II, who had successfully completed the military plans of his father, King Joash (2 Kgs 13:24-25; 14:25, 28). Israel's long-time enemy, Damascus, had been leveled to the ground by the Assyrians around 800 B.C.E., leaving Israel free to extend its territory and privileges. Such material blessings, the people thought, proved God's good pleasure with them.

Amos' sermons and oracles were radically destructive, that is, cutting to the roots of Israel's life. All God's ancient promises to the Israelites and the divine presence among them would end. Whatever survived would be "like a brand plucked from the fire" (4:11), like the shank bone of a sheep that "the shepherd snatches from the mouth of the lion" (3:12). Yet Amos was addressing that part of the twelve tribes most directly linked with Moses' exodus out of Egypt and Joshua's settlement of the land. The promises of the covenant resided among these people of the northern kingdom.

Typical of prophecy, Amos accepted the reality of historical changes, such as the forthcoming onslaught of the Assyrian army against Israel or the earlier inauguration of the Davidic dynasty at Jerusalem. This latter fact is witnessed to in the conclusion of the book (9:11-15), composed by a disciple of Amos if not by Amos himself. In fact, Amos had politics and international affairs at his finger tips (1:3–2:16). God was mysteriously present, at work within this real world. For this reason Amos ends up far ahead of his Old Testament times, for he glimpsed the role of the nations in God's plans for salvation, especially in the one-liner of the appendix (9:7).

A person of tradition

Amos was radical in another way. His roots (the Latin word is radix) were firmly set in Israel's traditional institutions and memories. He spoke positively of prophets and nazirites (2:11-12). He did not condemn liturgy, only the selfish spirit of the devotees (4:5). He based his reflections upon the Exodus (2:11; 3:1; 9:7), Israel's hopes for the future (5:18), and its special election (3:1-2; 5:15), even though he reversed the conclusion against what the people expected from these ancient promises. Wisdom traditions show up rather abundantly: didactical questions; numerical sequence (three plus one); themes of good and evil. His morality reached back into ancient norms of the early clans or tribes.

Most of all, in Amos' eyes Yahweh was the God of the poor, as was the case when Yahweh delivered slaves out of Egypt and gave dispossessed people their own Promised Land.

Literary form

Amos is the first prophet with a book to his name. Earlier prophets, like Elijah and Elisha, Gad and Nathan, strongly influenced Israelite policy but left no books. There is no satisfactory explanation for this radical change, only some guesses. Did written scrolls become popular because of a notable advance in literacy among the people? Or did Amos' announcement of destruction point up the necessity of writing down whatever was to be preserved? Or did the sweeping internationalization of Israel, with its extensive correspondence, stir the prophets to communicate with written documents?

The book is arranged with all the neatness of a good household. After a historical and religious introduction (1:1-2), four major presentations of Amos are to be found: oracles against the nations (1:3–2:16); three judgment speeches, which begin with "Hear this word" (3:1–5:6); three collections of Woe Sayings (5:7-17; 5:18-27; 6:1-14); and four visions (7:1-9; 8:1-3). It is possible that the book ended here at one time, especially when we note that the story of Amos' final day of preaching at Bethel was inserted into the vision narratives (7:10-17), stitched in by the mention of Jeroboam in 7:9 at the end of the third vision and in 7:10 at the beginning of the biographical account of Amos' expulsion from Bethel. Later two longer portions were added—a judgment speech (8:4-14) and a vision story (9:1-4), each somewhat different in style from others in the book. Still later an appendix of four "one-liners," with each verse being a separate entity (9:10-14), was tacked on. Liturgical fragments in the style of a hymn were woven into the text (4:13; 5:8-9; 9:5-6). The final addition came during or after the Babylonian Exile, announcing the revival of the Davidic dynasty at Jerusalem (7:11-15). Typical of biblical prophecy, Amos' book thus ends with an upbeat note.

COMMENTARY

INTRODUCTION

Amos 1:1-2

1:1 Historical introduction. The editor situates Amos during the prosperous, heady days of King Uzziah of the southern kingdom of Judah (783–742 B.C.E.) and King Jeroboam II of the northern kingdom of Israel (786–746 B.C.E.). The historical orientation is from the south, where Amos' preaching was edited and preserved; Uzziah's name is given first. The words of Amos . . . received in vision: The words contain a divine message, perceptible only in mysterious moments when one is absorbed in God. shepherd from Tekoa: See p. 487. two years before the earthquake: This earthquake did severe damage to Israelite cities like Hazor in northeast Galilee; it is dated 760 B.C.E. and was still spoken of several centuries later (see Zech 14:5). Dating Amos' preaching by the earthquake may have this fearful insinuation: Soon after Amos the earth and the foundation of Israel will collapse. The rumbling theme of earthquakes spreads fear throughout the book (4:11; 6:11; 7:7-8; 8:8; 9:1).

1:2 Religious introduction. The orientation is again from Jerusalem or Zion, confessing that God's mysterious providence directed the destruction of the north, even of beautiful Mount Carmel, which juts out on the northern coastline. This "antiphon" is repeated again in Jer 25:30 against foreign nations (after the announcement of Israel's and Judah's deportation) and once more in Joel 4:16 against the foreign nations but also as a word of protection and refuge for Israel. Evidently editors in biblical times felt free to adapt ancient inspired texts to new circumstances. The setting of the preacher added a necessary ingredient to the interpretation of God's word.

ORACLES AGAINST THE NATIONS

Amos 1:3–2:16

This section is composed in a style reminiscent of sanctuary oracles and of the wisdom school. Oracles originated in the sanctuary when a person with serious difficulties came either for a blessing and solution or for protection against an enemy. Oracles designate a communication from God to one or more persons gathered in prayer, frequently at a sanctuary (Gen 26:24; 28:13; Ps 12:6). Prophets adopted this style to indicate their conviction that their words expressed a conscience formed from an immediate experience of God. The schema here of three + one consists of the sacred numbers three, four, and seven, each in some way denoting completion—no more crimes will be tolerated. The arrangement also reflects a practice within the wisdom literature of the Bible (Prov 30:15-16, 18-19; Sir 26:5-6). For Amos, the numerical sequence infers God's patience in putting up with three crimes and God's equal determination to put an end to the crimes; yet even in this last instance God is present in the act of punishment. The Hebrew word for "crimes" occurs only once in the Pentateuch (Exod 22:8), where it recalls pre-Mosaic clan traditions. Amos, therefore, may be reaching into basic human nature to judge right and wrong.

Many of Israel's neighbors, frequently hostile to Israel, are named: Aram or Damascus, to the northeast; Philistia, on the seacoast to the southwest; Tyre, on the northwest coast; Edom, south of the Dead Sea; Ammon, east of the Jordan River; and Moab, east of the Dead Sea. The prophet would have received a roar of applause after each oracle. The compact and well-coordinated style of each oracle locks the people and their enthusiasm still more firmly into the discourse. When Amos comes to the oracle against Israel (2:6-16), the audience cannot escape—they must listen in stunned silence!

Each foreign city is condemned for "crimes against humanity," such as acting as middlepersons in selling captive soldiers into slavery, waging war with excessive cruelty, and profaning the bones of the dead. While each oracle is strikingly vivid, that against Judah (2:4-5) appears dull and colorless, making us suspect its genuineness. It is probably a later addition from someone at Jerusalem not nearly as eloquent as Amos. Israel, too, is condemned for crimes against humanity rather than for violating cultic or refined religious norms.

2:6 sell [into slavery] the just man for silver . . . for a pair of sandals: This refers to the brutal enforcement of laws to pay one's debts—only a small amount for the wealthy but the total possessions of the poor—or to the seizure of ancestral lands for flimsy reasons.

Land was normally marked off by the length of one's sandals (see Deut 25:5-10, which deals with the marriage of a relative's widow in order to preserve the name of the husband and to protect the latter's property for the son bearing his name).

2:7 Son and father go to the same prostitute: This alludes either to the degradation of domestic servants in a wealthy household (the Hebrew does not use the word "prostitute") or else to an insidious, lustful father who interrupts a legitimate romance of the son.

2:8 Upon garments taken in pledge they recline: According to Exod 22:25-26 and Deut 24:11-13, the long, flowing outer cloak taken in pledge of the future payment of a debt was to be restored at each sundown, lest the person have insufficient protection against the cold evening air. In making sure that the poor fulfill their obligations, the wealthy priests break the law themselves and commit further sexual sins under the influence of alcohol.

2:16 shall flee naked on that day, says the Lord: The sound of this phrase in Hebrew is haunting, evoking the desperate, silent agony of people led off captive totally naked, to be sold for whatever purpose along the way until the remnant are resettled in a foreign land. The person's shame becomes the instrument of pleasure for the gloating conquerors. There was no need to mention the dreaded name of Assyria.

JUDGMENT-ADDRESSES AGAINST ISRAEL

Amos 3:1–5:6

This section is addressed exclusively to Israel, frequently in the form of judgment speeches. This style is modeled upon that used in Israel's law courts, presided over by elders at the city gates (Deut 16:18-20; 21:19; 25:7; Amos 5:10). A typical example is 4:1-3, which consists of: summoning of the defendant (v. 1a); listing the crimes of the defendant, who is referred to in the third person (v. 1b); words of the judge as a messenger of Yahweh (v. 2a); verdict and punishment (vv. 2b-3). See also 8:4-8. Amos, as mentioned already, remains in masterful control of style. Other literary forms are found in this section. All are linked together by the introductory formula "Hear this word" (3:1; 4:1; 5:1).

3:1-2 This oracle is rooted in Israel's election as the Lord's chosen people. You alone have I favored: The Hebrew verb means literally "to know," not in the sense to know about, but to experience and therefore to know with sensitivity, concern, and intimate love (Gen 4:1; Jer 1:5; Ps 1:6). At this time people would then conclude from Israel's election that God will bring a blessing or a happy conclusion. Amos reverses what is expected by declaring: "I will punish you." Neither blood lineage with those who came out of Egypt nor good theology ensures Israel's well-being. To be truly Israel, the people must continue the liberation of the poor, as God once liberated them from bondage in Egypt. Yet, Israelite priests and nobles are using their privileged positions to enslave other Israelites. Religion has become a veneer for supporting the upper class. By comparing Israel with other nations, here as in the oracles against the nations, Amos arrives at common basic human norms for judgment.

3:3-8 The sequence here mounts to a crescendo of strength: first it is animals against animals (v. 4), then humans against animals (v. 5), and finally humans against humans. Not only is there a purpose in each event, but there is also the insinuation that humans turn up no different from animals in their violent state. Verse 7 is probably a later reflective addition. In verse 8 Amos feels the animal urge to roar against human injustice.

3:9-10 The key word here is "castles," those of foreigners and those of Israel, citadels of extortion and robbery where Israel is no different from any other nation. How can Israel strut around as a chosen people?

3:12 This independent oracle combines a moment of shepherd existence with theology and sarcasm! A pair of legs or the tip of an ear of his sheep: These words indicate all that is to be left of Israel, hardly enough to reconstruct a sheep or the people. The few Israelites who escape with their life and are marched into exile, nakedly the butt of jokes and selfish desires (2:16), are pictured with mock pathos as clutching a piece of their ivory couch, a remembrance of their lost opulence (see 3:15; 6:4). It is as though people today, in being driven away from their homes, would treasure most their transistor radios! Implied here is Amos' intuition of the "remnant," which we will discuss at 5:15.

4:1-3 As at the beginning of chapter 3, a new subdivision is introduced with the formula "Hear this word." With brutal, even crude language, Amos likens the opulent ladies of the capital city of Samaria to the large, well-fed cows of Bashan, prized for their quality milk and meat (Deut 32:14). They grazed in the open area between Israel and Damascus, presently called the Golan Heights, then as now bitterly fought over. In this area the cattle roamed freely, munched the luscious, dew-laden grass, and became fiercely temperamental. Amos foresees a long siege, the eventual, angry capture of the capital, then the mopping up process. Amos portrays the bloated corpses of these presently pampered women pitched onto a dung heap outside one of the city gates. the last of you: The Hebrew may refer either to the very last corpse or more likely to the posterior part of the anatomy whereby barbed poles inhumanly lift the body from the streets.

4:4-5 Similar to 1 Sam 15:22-23; Ps 50:14; Hos 6:6; and Matt 9:13, these verses are not condemning liturgical worship as such but the unworthy motives of the worshipers. for so you love to do: "You get a kick out of it, don't you, folks!" Strange for the Bible but typical of Amos, these sarcastic words are placed within the literary form of a solemn liturgical oracle from God!

4:6-13 A rhetorical momentum sweeps us forward by one type of natural catastrophe after another, with the continuous refrain "you returned not to me," and at the end the fearful climax, "prepare to meet your God." Amos' striking images communicate the taste and smell of disaster. Drought is spoken of as "teeth clean of food" and pestilence as the stench of dead horses!

The transition to a historical recollection in verse 11 seems like an editorial addition; part of the verse is identical with Hos 11:8; Isa 13:14b; and Jer 50:40, a "floater" that can end up almost anywhere! Verse 13 is cast in the form of a hymn with participles that bring the excitement of creation into the present moment: "Your God, O Israel, forming the mountains, creating the wind . . . turning dawn into darkness, striding upon the heights of the earth." This verse belongs to a longer hymn, whose fragments are found as well in 5:8-9 and 9:5-6, similar to others in Jer 12:13, 16; Isa 42:5. These were added to the canonical texts as congregational refrains when the Scripture was proclaimed in synagogue worship. Theologically this section confesses the directive hand of God in nature and history, fulfilling a divine purpose for Israel.

5:1-6 This is the final sermon of Amos in the second major division of his prophecy (3:1–5:6). The editor combines a funeral dirge over dead Israel with an exhortation to "seek the Lord" (v. 6) while there is still time. In the dirge the people are sorrowfully addressed as "virgin Israel," stricken before appreciating the joys and fulfilling the hopes of life (Gen 15:2-3; Judg 11:38). As used by Jeremiah, this title indicates new hope. The sinful, barren people, described as the "adulterous spouse," miraculously return to the condition of the Lord's virgin spouse as at the moment of marriage (Jer 31:4, 21-22; see 1 Sam 1; Isa 54:1).

5:4-6 An excellent example of the literary form of chiasm (the word derives from the Greek letter "chi," written as an "x"). The sequence of words in the downward stroke (a-b-c) is followed in reverse order in the upward stroke (c-b-a), as here:

a—Seek me that you may live	a—seek the Lord that you may live
b—not Bethel	b—Bethel become nought
c—not Gilgal	c—Gilgal shall go into exile not Beer-sheba

PROPHETIC WOES

Amos 5:7–6:14

A new major section in the Book of Amos begins here, a series of three speeches whose opening word is "Woe!" (5:7; 5:18; 6:1). (We note that the Hebrew word for "Woe" is present in 5:7 only by amending the text.) In his use of this literary form, Amos is at a major turning point of its evolution; he may even be responsible for this change. Earlier passages consider "Woe!" as a way of mourning the dead at funerals (1 Kgs 13:30). Gradually it became a curse with scorn and bitterness at what ought to be dead or is already morally dead (Isa 33:1; Jer 48:1). Later "Woe!" becomes a taunt over someone's foolishness (Isa 45:9).

5:7-17 This passage condemns blatant social injustices. Small landowners are being taxed into bankruptcy and forced to become serfs on their former family homesteads or even slaves somewhere else (see 2:6). The extension of international trade and the craze for foreign luxuries by the powerful clique of noble people have bled the land of its natural resources, just as foolish military ventures will leave the country heavily in debt to pay indemnities to the conquerors. This enforced payment falls heaviest upon the poor. Even archaeology has disclosed a marked tendency by which palaces became larger as peasant dwellings became smaller! Amos does not condemn liturgy as such but the spirit with which it is performed and its split from the people's daily morality. So, too, Amos is not against politics and commerce but calls down "Woe!" upon "those who turn judgment to [bitter-tasting] wormwood" (compare Deut 29:17; Lam 3:15, 19), upon those who exact levies of grain, build sumptuous houses, and accept bribes.

5:15 remnant of Joseph: For Amos, this phrase may mean simply the few who survive, but it became a technical theological term, prominent in the Book of Isaiah (Isa 7:3; 10:19-22). Even for Amos, "remnant," is not to be interpreted externally, in this case numerically. Rather, "remnant" may designate that fragile, delicate but essential aspect of what it means to be an Israelite and a true follower of Moses, the faithful adherence to godly ideals, the courageous search for the mysterious way of the Lord, the strength to give up everything for "the pearl of great price" (Matt 13:46).

5:18-27 The second "Woe!" discourse repeats a very traditional religious idea, God's promises for the future at the heart of the Mosaic exodus out of Egypt, and then reverses what the people normally conclude from it (see 3:1-2). While the normal answer ought to be light and joy, Amos declares that the "day of the Lord" will mean "darkness and not light" (5:18). day of the Lord: This phrase already had a long history in extrabiblical documentation. In the Akkadian literature of southern Mesopotamia (modern Iraq) over a millennium before Amos, the "day of the god" indicated a special feast honoring the god with elaborate liturgical ceremonies. For Israel in Amos' time, "Yahweh's day" was characterized as a glorious celebration of the Lord's presence when ancient redemptive acts were renewed liturgically (see 5:21-25).

Amos, however, announced the opposite. After his time, "day of the Lord" came to mean a day of the Lord's wrath against Israel (Zeph 1:15), or later, during the Exile, against Israel's enemies (Isa 13:6, 9; Jer 46:10, 21); still later there was a return to the ancient idea, a day of salvation for Israel (Joel 3:4), and eventually a day of final judgment (Mal 3:19-23; Matt 24:1). Amos gave this phrase its permanent place. He relied upon a most ancient tradition, creatively challenged its misrepresentation in his own day, and thereby attempted to restore the original thrust of Israel, the liberation of oppressed people and the condemnation of oppressors.

5:25-27 These verses are plagued with textual and interpretive difficulties. Against verse

25, the Bible makes it clear that Israel offered sacrifice to Yahweh at every period up to Amos' time: Abraham (Gen 12:7-8; 15:7-21); Moses (Exod 18:12); Joshua (Josh 5:10-12); Samuel (Judg 13:16). The identity of Sakkuth and Kaiwan is uncertain.

6:1-14 This is the third and last "Woe!" statement. To manifest that the Lord can and will send devastation, Amos ticks off in verse 2 the names of once prosperous cities in north Syria, already severely weakened by Assyria and soon to be completely destroyed. He has only contempt for the soft, effete men and women of Samaria (see 4:1-3), who at times talk grandly of patriotism and religion yet remain blind to the misery of the poor, all the while luxuriating in their "massage parlors."

Verses 9-11 recall a plague in which only a single person survives in an infested house, and even that one leaves us with the haunting sound of "Silence!" (see 8:3). Verse 12 is a typical paradox from the wisdom school: Israel's situation is as unnatural as plowing the sea with oxen. In verses 13-14 Amos deflates the false hopes that surged with Jeroboam II's conquests to the east of the Jordan River and even those further north into Syria. Amos' bleak outlook is deliberately modified, almost reversed, with new but futile hopes in 2 Kgs 14:24-27.

THE VISIONS

Amos 7:1–8:3

This new major section in the Book of Amos consists of four visions, into which a biographical account of Amos' expulsion from the northern kingdom has been inserted. The visions follow a careful pattern, easily observable despite the editorial additions. In the initial two visions Amos speaks first, asking for divine patience, and the Lord relents. In the third and fourth visions the Lord speaks first and thereby settles the matter. The refrain rings out: "I will forgive them no longer" (7:8; 8:1). The Hebrew language is marked with literary devices such as question and answer, onomatopoeia, and paronomasia, so that a slight change of consonants or vowels in the Hebrew produces a new, dramatic meaning ("ripe grapes" or qais in Hebrew becomes "the end" or qes in 8:1-2).

These visions, therefore, were intended for public communication. Each centers on an object clearly visible to others: locust, fire, plummet, and ripe fruit. The vision also includes a secret or symbolic meaning, communicated individually to Amos. Because a vision or a mystic communication from God frequently occurs in the commissioning of a prophet (1 Sam 3; Isa 6; Jer 1; Ezek 1), it is possible that the vision became a normal literary style to indicate God's choice of a prophet. Thereafter the prophet will speak with the personal strength of having stood in the council of the Lord (Jer 23:18-22). The momentum within the four visions leads up to the certitude that the balloon will burst and prosperous Israel will disintegrate as much from internal decay as from external military invasion.

7:1-3 The first harvesting of a crop belongs to the royal treasury (money did not yet exist). Even the poor will be swept into the consuming mouth of destruction. In this experience of mystical prayer and of compassion for the poor, Amos is commissioned as a prophet.

7:10-17 A biographical account is stitched into the account of the visions by the repetition of the name of the king, Jeroboam, in verses 9 and 10. Such biographical accounts do occur elsewhere in prophecy (Hos 1; Isa 7; Jer 26–29 and 34–45); they were composed to provide religious insights into the prophet's mission or else, as here (and with Jeremiah), to justify its divine origin and eventual fulfillment.

7:10 The sanctuary of Bethel, sixteen miles north of Jerusalem, was one of the most ancient, existing before the patriarchs (Gen 12:8; 13:3); it was closely associated with Jacob's dream of a ladder between heaven and earth (Gen 28:10-22). Jeroboam I, founder of the northern kingdom at the death of Solomon, restored Bethel as a prominent place of assembly and worship (1 Kgs 12:26-33). The priesthood of Bethel derived independently of the Mosaic Levitical priesthood, just as the Zadokites, once pagan priests when the Jebusites controlled Jerusalem, were installed by David to officiate with Levites of Mosaic background (1 Kgs 12:21). Amaziah's worry over a revolt was not unfounded; the very dynasty of Jeroboam II was inaugurated through a bloody coup d'état at the instigation of the prophet Elisha (1 Kgs 9-10).

7:12-13 to the land of Judah! There earn your bread by prophesying: Amaziah is insinuating that Amos prophesies for a living (see 1 Sam 9:7-9; 2 Kgs 5:5, 15, 22-27; Mic 3:5). Amos will retort sarcastically that he is no prophet but works for a living as a shepherd and dresser of sycamores! In verse 13 the narrator, by a play on words, points up the obsequious surrendering of temple and priesthood to royal wishes: "never again prophesy in Beth-el" (literally, "house of God"); "for it is the king's sanctuary and a royal temple" (in Hebrew, beth mamlakah).

7:14 I am no prophet, nor a member of a prophetic guild: While some translations favor the past tense or a question ("I was no prophet" or "Was I not a prophet?") in accord with the past tense in verse 15, the present tense (which we prefer) harmonizes with verses 12-13 and also with a similar passage in Zech 13:5. Northern prophecy had sufficiently discredited itself in Amos' eyes that he repudiated any association with it. As in 3:1-2 and 4:4-5, Amos is not totally rejecting the institution but its degenerate form. In fact, in verse 12 he seems to accept the title "visionary" or "seer," a title used in the south, Amos' homeland (2 Sam 24:11; Isa 30:9-10). shepherd and dresser of sycamore trees: See p. 487.

7:15 The Lord took me from following the flock: The phrase is drawn almost literally from 2 Sam 7:8 and the story of David's call to kingship, another sign of Amos' roots in tradition, and the word "took" in Hebrew frequently signifies a radical, abrupt transfer into another way of life (Gen 5:24; 2 Kgs 2:3; Ps 49:16). Go, prophesy: While Amos rejects the categorization of prophet, or at least Amaziah's concept of prophet, he obeys the Lord's command to reinvigorate and transform the ancient institution of prophecy by doing it.

7:16-17 Even in his final words Amos remains bitterly sarcastic as he enumerates with crescendo the punishments to come upon the high priest: his wife a harlot and his children dead; then, what's worse, loss of family property; and, worst of all for a priest so finicky over ritual, death and burial "in an unclean land," without the proper blessing upon a grave in the Holy Land.

The visions and the biographical account complement and support each other. One provides the origin and the other the end of Amos' career as a prophet; each concludes with an unequivocal announcement of Israel's end in exile and of Amos' vindication as God's spokesman. While Israel collapses into exile and oblivion, Amos' words become a permanent book, remembered today as God's word.

ADDENDA

Amos 8:4–9:10

A prophetic judgment speech and a vision, each somewhat different in style from the earlier speeches in 3:1–5:6 and the visions in 7:1-9 and 8:1-3, are added to the book. Similar themes recur: dishonest commerce by which the poor become poorer, ever more dependent and even reduced to slavery (see 5:7-12); darkness as on the day of the Lord in 5:18; destruction and exile. Verse 9 of chapter 8 may be alluding to an eclipse of the sun on June 15, 763; there was another total eclipse in 784. Verses 11-12 make it clear that Israel does not decide on its own terms when and how to return to the Lord; they may "wander from sea to sea . . . and not find" the word of the Lord. Unless the journey is undertaken at God's prompting, it will lead only further into desert waste and famine.

9:1-6 While the earlier visions simply announced the end, this new vision elaborates on the end of Israel with imagery and style that match the catastrophic dimensions of Israel's collapse. Amos' words sweep through the universe, reach into the nether world, summon the sea and its monsters to undo the work of creation. The text not only alludes to the opening antiphon and its reference to beautiful Mount Carmel (1:2 and 9:3), but it also concludes with a continuation of the fragments of an ancient hymn (4:13; 5:8-9) that perceives God as once again subduing the angry sea and putting boundaries to its waves, extending the heavens and regulating the good order of nature: "I, the Lord by name" (9:6).

APPENDIX OF ONE-LINERS

Amos 9:7-10

These four verses, each seemingly an independent unit, share features of Amos' style (rhetorical questions, catchwords, disputation). Even the ideas are not as divergent from those found elsewhere in Amos' prophecy as some scholars infer: Amos saw hope for a remnant in 5:15 as here in 9:8b, 9. The mini-creed about the Exodus in 2:10 and 3:1 is repeated verbatim in 9:7. Amos is not thoroughly at home with the traditions of the Exodus; after all, he was a southerner from Tekoa, while the Exodus and other Mosaic traditions were more deeply rooted in the northern kingdom. Therefore, these four one-liners circulated separately among his disciples, who may have modified them; after the main part of the book was edited, they were added here as an appendix. Other biblical appendices are found in 2 Sam 21–24; Isa 36–39; Jer 52. Short appendices are added to chapters like Isa 1:27-31.

Verse 7 may be one of the most radical, universalist statements in the entire Hebrew Scriptures, similar to Isa 19:24-25; 66:21. Amos compares Israel's Exodus to the migrations of the other nations: the Arameans swept out of the Syrian-Arabian desert in the twelfth century B.C.E., the Philistines possibly from Crete in the eleventh century B.C.E. Amos' statement implies that Israel is no different from any other people in the external pattern of its origin and history. It was Israel's faith, formed through God's inspired word and through the leadership of faithful servants like Moses and Joshua, that transformed a secular migration into a sacred exodus. Amos is implying that the history of other peoples can also be spirited by faith in Yahweh and can become the external form and symbol for believing in Yahweh and worshiping the Lord.

RESTORATION

Amos 9:11-15

This positive, even glorious conclusion to the negative, destructive oracles of Amos not only conforms to the style of editing prophetical books with an upbeat momentum, but it also presents an important norm for our interpretation of prophetic literature.

The section is divided into two oracles, each with its introductory and concluding formulas: verses 11-12 about the revival of the Davidic empire; verses 13-15 about the abundant re-creation of Israel's cities and farmland. Stylistic and logical links bind this final set of oracles to the Book of Amos: verse 13 picks up phrases from 8:13; verse 14 repeats, only to reverse, 5:11. The Exile, so clearly announced in 2:16; 4:2-3; 5:27, will be turned around in Israel's restoration (v. 14).

The composition of this section belongs after Israel's return to its homeland from Babylonian exile. Comparisons with Joel 4:18-21 tilt toward a common date, around 500 B.C.E.

Surprisingly, this affirming, enthusiastic view of the future never permeated the rest of the book; the editors respected the dire threats and stern sarcasm of Amos, even though they saw the future differently. The future generations of Amos' disciples realized that: (1) sin and punishment could come again, so that Amos' warnings remained valid, even though the distant future will eventually turn out bright; (2) while reading of condemnation and desolation, we ought not to forget God's mercy and fidelity; (3) we need to decide whether threat or promise is more appropriate pastorally and spiritually, for "there is an appointed time for everything, . . . to kill and to heal, . . . to rend and to sew" (Eccl 3:1-8). Jerusalem and the Davidic family were the line of continuity, the inheritors of the Mosaic promises, originally received by the ancestors of the northern kingdom. The future was to be considered more a creation of God, generously given in view of just and compassionate relationships among God's people, than a human achievement at Israel's beck and call (see 8:11-12).

The apostle James, as cited in Acts 15:15-17, draws upon Amos 9:11 when approving Paul's apostolate to the Gentiles. David's empire will extend to the world, not by the sword, but by confessing Jesus as Lord and Savior. At this moment the prescriptions of the Mosaic law will not be a prerequisite for baptism. Even the Mosaic covenant is fulfilled beyond its own dreams, certainly beyond the human works of a law-abiding Jew. Amos' words receive an interpretation still more radical than that of the first disciples and editors. Yet, in quoting from Amos, James declares how necessary and valid the Hebrew Scriptures remain for appreciating faith in the new Son of David.

HOSEA

Carroll Stuhlmueller, C.P.

INTRODUCTION

Hosea was a contemporary of Amos. Both prophesied in the northern kingdom of Israel during the reign of Jeroboam II (2 Kgs 14:23-29), yet Hosea's ministry was not abruptly cut short as was that of Amos' (Amos 7:12-13). Rather, according to the scholarly position followed in this commentary, Hosea's words reflect the chaotic, mad, and finally destructive years after Jeroboam II's death. There are other differences. Hosea was a citizen of the north, stressed far more than Amos the intimate love of God for Israel, continuously inserted his own personal feelings, developed and applied such northern traditions as Exodus and wilderness experiences from Mosaic times, and moved within agricultural rather than desert images.

While Amos goes down in biblical annals as the prophet of divine justice—justice in the strict modern sense of punishment equal to the seriousness of the crime—Hosea is known as the prophet of divine love, love ever willing to suffer in order to win back one's beloved. Yet, no justice is fiercer than tender love that has been betrayed and attacked, and so Hosea ends up far more certain and definitive about the destruction of Israel: "I will attack them like a bear robbed of its young, and tear their hearts from their breasts" (13:8). "Where are your plagues, O death! . . . My eyes are closed to compassion" (13:14).

The chaotic times of Hosea

This agonizing reversal from forgiveness to angry rejection parallels the history of Israel from the prosperous years of Jeroboam II's reign to the chaotic years that followed. Hosea began announcing "the word of the Lord . . . in the days of Jeroboam, son of Joash, king of Israel" (1:1; 2 Kgs 14:23-29). As described in the introduction to the prophecy of Amos (p. 488), these were heady years of success and plenty, hard years of indifference toward the poor, years bloated with sensuality and laziness. Amos' sarcastic, even crude sketch of women fat as Bashan cows (Amos 4:1-3) and of men pampered by the sweet scent and tingling touch of massage parlors (Amos 6:4-6) says it all! While Amos viewed the sickening scene with stern eyes from a distance, Hosea experienced its poignant, cruel thrust into the heart of his marriage. Chapters 1-3 and 4:1-5:7 carry the jagged scars of Hosea's heart against the frolic and degradation of Jeroboam II's years as king.

The death of Jeroboam II in 746 B.C.E. also struck a mournful toll over the prosperous land of Israel. Flowers cut in full bloom quickly lose their lovely petals, so that only the dark stem and malodorous water remain. The succinct record in 2 Kgs 15:8-31 captures the style of newscasting on television—one stroke after another without time to breathe: "Zechariah, son of Jeroboam, . . . was king . . . for six months. . . . Shallum, son of Jabesh, . . . attacked and killed him. . . . Shallum reigned one month, [till] Menahem came up, attacked and killed Shallum. . . . Menahem punished the city of Tappuah, even to ripping open all the pregnant women. . . .

During his reign Pul (Tiglath-pileser III) invaded the land and Menahem gave him a thousand talents of silver." The two-year reign of Menahem's son, Pekahiah, was ended by the insurrection of his adjutant, Pekah. During Pekah's reign a new revolt brought the Assyrian army again; the northern provinces were enveloped in darkness (see Isa 8:23) and lost forever to Israel. Hoshea conspired against Pekah, killed him, and reigned in his stead with Assyria's blessing, only to revolt against Assyria and so bring on the end, absolutely and unconditionally. The ten northern tribes totally disappear to history. Each word of this account in 2 Kings lunges, gasps, and collapses, only to start the dreadful process once more. The details can be outlined this way:

Jeroboam II (786–746)
free and prosperous
Zechariah (746–745)
compromising and ineffective (assassinated)
Shallum (745)
anti-Assyria (assassinated)
Menahem (745–737)
pro-Assyria, paying tribute Pekahiah (737–736) pro-Assyria (assassinated)
Pekah (736–732)
anti-Assyria (assassinated)
Hoshea (732–724)
pro-Assyria; then anti-Assyria (captured and executed)

Clearly, the anti-Assyrian policy, to align with Egypt and other smaller states in military revolt against the feared monster to the east, was suicidal. Prophetically, in the evaluation of 2 Kings or in the preaching of Amos and Hosea, destruction was already determined by infidelity and injustice that had corroded the moral fiber. Military adventures were condemned, not simply for their foolish miscalculation, but principally for the smokescreen they provided for condoning social injustices.

The period from the death of Jeroboam II until Hoshea's seizure of the throne is reflected in many ways within 5:8–8:14 in Hosea's prophecy. (Note: the prophet Hosea is not to be confused with King Hoshea.) The violent rise and quick demise of dynasties tumble through the lines of 7:5-7: "They are all heated like ovens, and consume their rulers" (see 8:4). The abrupt change of policies—first an alliance with Egypt, then one with Assyria—provokes Hosea's disdain: "Ephraim is like a dove, silly and senseless; they call upon Egypt, they go to Assyria" (7:11; see also 5:13; 8:9). When Assyria pounces upon the prey and rends it mercilessly, God wants no mistake about it: "I carry it away and no one can save it from me" (5:14; also 7:8-9).

Chapters 9–12 reflect the false quiet and deceptive hope for peace and relief shortly before and immediately after the succession of Shalmaneser V to the throne of Assyria in 726 B.C.E. Hosea warns: "Rejoice not, O Israel . . . . For you have been unfaithful to your God, loving a harlot's hire" (9:1). When King Hoshea revolts, Assyria's short fuse of patience ignites and its anger explodes against Israel. After King Hoshea has been captured ("Where now is your king, O Israel?"—13:10) and the fury is roaring south against the capital city of Samaria, Hosea's reaction is recorded in 13:1–14:1. He summons the plagues and the deadly sting of destruction and declares on God's part: "My eyes are closed to compassion" (13:14).

The prophet must have escaped before the capital city was burned to the ground, leaving the charred remains of ivory inlaids for later archeologists to discover, and from Jerusalem he composed the finale (14:2-9). Hope triumphs as he writes: "Return, O Israel, to the Lord, your God, . . . [who] will heal . . . defection, [and] will love . . . freely" (14:2, 5). Most probably it was later disciples who added the editorial allusions to Judah found throughout the book (1:1, 7; 4:14; 5:5; etc.). In 12:3 the name "Israel" was replaced with "Judah," but the word "Israel" is now restored by many translators, as in the New American Bible. Finally, the admonition to "understand these things" in the book of Hosea was inserted at the very end (14:10), probably by someone of the school of wisdom that produced such books as Proverbs.

The passionate character of Hosea

The history of the times and of the text has already provided us with biographical information about the prophet Hosea. The sorrows, frustrations, and renewed hopes of his marriage supplied the major image for chapters 1–3 about the sins and infidelities of Israel, and contributed intense passion to important lines in the rest of the book. Hope and agony, springing from strong emotions, characterize not only the book but the person of Hosea. These rise prominently to the surface, as God cries out impassionately: "I will not give vent to my blazing anger. . . . For I am God, no human person" (11:9). Hopes spilling over with compassion induce Hosea to moderate the punishments of Deuteronomy, a book otherwise close to him in spirit and vocabulary. While Deuteronomy legislates the punishment of death by stoning for a stubborn and unruly son (Deut 21:18-21) and for an adulterous wife (Deut 22:13-24), Hosea pulls back from such harshness.

Comparing Hosea with Amos, we discern a whole new set of images. While Amos draws upon his experience of shepherding a flock in the desert wilderness, Hosea frequently refers to agricultural scenes. These he adduces, whether as peacefully present in their rich produce, indicative of the new espousals of Israel with God (2:23-25), or as painfully absent when "the land mourns and everything that dwells in it languishes" because of Israel's sins. While the wilderness is the haunt of lions and bears for Amos (Amos 3:8, 12; 5:19), for Hosea it can be the idyllic place of Israel's honeymoon with God (9:10; 13:4-5). Hosea's appreciation of fertility in the family, in the farmland, and in the folds of livestock should have been soured, one would think, by his wife's infatuation with fertility rites in the temple (2:4-9); yet his estimate of the dignity before God of life and sexuality won the day. He not only received back his wayward wife but responded with heroic compassion in the end.

The covenant theology of Hosea

What secured this triumph in Hosea's soul and writings can be traced back to the covenant between Yahweh and Israel in the days of Moses. Hosea even stresses the two outstanding qualities of this covenant: bonding in love and sturdy trustworthiness. These are the two words that Yahweh pronounced with dramatic compassion as Moses stood atop Mount Sinai with the two stone tablets of the law in his arms (Exod 34:6-9). Through the heartrending experience of his broken and healed marriage, Hosea transforms the somewhat legal framework of the Mosaic covenant into the intimately personal and loving contract of marriage. Hosea's remembrance of the covenant shows up in his allusion to the Decalogue in 4:2. While the covenant enables Hosea to suffuse the note of compassion, it also provides a straightforward way to brush aside flimsy excuses and to call sin by its honest name—swearing, lying, murder, stealing, and adultery.

Just as sketching the times and sequence of chapters in the book has already introduced us to the person of Hosea, so the preceding biographical details have led us into the major theological lines of this prophecy. Mosaic traditions are not only present in an impressive way, but ancient customs and inspired attitudes (about five hundred years old by now) were seen as a living, motivating force. Unlike Amos, who talked about the Exodus as a point of comparison with the present moment (see Amos 2:9-12; 3:1-2; 9:7), Hosea sees it happening right now. Israel's sins bring the people back to Egypt (8:13; 9:3; 11:5), not geographically, because they either remained in the Holy Land or were taken eastward into exile; nor politically, because Egypt pretended to be a friendly state and a place of asylum; but typologically, because Egypt was a symbol or type of sin and bondage. In this regard we note the frequent use of the word "now" in Hosea's preaching (4:16; 5:3, 7; 7:2; 8:8). This ability to see a contemporaneity in ancient redemptive acts of God was probably inherited from Deuteronomy, another ancient northern tradition (see Deut 5:1-5).

One final aspect of Hosea's theology cannot be passed over. Hosea could not refer to God simply and generally as God; at least forty-five times he uses the sacred name Yahweh (Exod 3:11-15), and if he refers to God as Elohim or El, it is almost always as "your God" or "my God" (2:25; 3:5; 4:6; 12).

The disturbed text of Hosea

The Hebrew text of Hosea seems very disturbed. Various explanations are offered: it reflects a northern style instead of the more customary Hebrew of Jerusalem; Hosea himself was emotionally disturbed and this fact leaves its scars upon the book; or later scribes handled the text with less than satisfactory care. The following variations are to be noted in the numbers for chapters and verses:

Hebrew; NAB	Greek; Vulgate; RSV
1:1-9	1:1-9
2:1-2	1:10-11
2:3-25	2:1-23
chs. 3–10	chs. 3–10
11:1-11	11:1-11
11:12	12:1
12:1-14	12:2-15
13:1-15	13:1-15
13:16	14:1
14:1-9	14:2-10

COMMENTARY

INTRODUCTION

Hos 1:1

The introduction or superscription to the book of Hosea is less elaborate and less informative than that found in the Book of Amos. Although Hosea prophesied in the northern kingdom of Israel, more attention is given here to the kings of the southern kingdom of Judah whose reigns extended beyond that of Jeroboam II. This fact hints at the book's redaction at Jerusalem, capital of the southern kingdom.

The introduction accentuates the theological or inspired quality of Hosea's preaching. While Amos' book begins with "the words of Amos," Hosea's opens with "the word of the Lord that came to Hosea." The name Hosea means "the act of saving" or simply "Savior." In Greek, the initial "h" was reduced to a small apostrophe, called a "rough breathing." These were customarily dropped when writing with only capital letters. The final "a" of the Hebrew name would have indicated feminine gender in Greek and so was changed to an "e." From the Greek came the spelling of this prophet's name in the Latin Vulgate and in older Roman Catholic editions of the Bible, namely, Osee.

Hosea was "the son of Beeri." The name Beeri is not otherwise found for a person in the Old Testament, although a village located near Bethel had this name. Beeri means "my fountain" or "O fountain." Only here in the entire book is the prophet's name recorded for us!

YAHWEH, SPOUSE OF ISRAEL

Hos 1:2–3:5

The first three chapters center upon Hosea's marriage, the infidelities of his wife Gomer, the doubtful paternity of the second and third children, and the application of this situation to Israel's covenant with Yahweh. It is important to note at the outset that in real life Hosea was the faithful spouse and Gomer the adulterous sinner, but in the application of this background to Israel, the ones targeted most as unfaithful harlots were the religious and civil leaders (particularly the former), all of the male sex (see 4:4-11; 5:1-3)!

Each of the three chapters tells basically the same thing, yet never as a story for its own sake but as a religious symbol about Israel—and for that matter, about what can happen to any one of us. Many important details are missing for a good story: the name of the paramour (or were there many?), the place of their rendezvous (at the temple for fertility rites? secretly in a private dwelling?). While chapter 1 speaks about Hosea and the children, chapter 2 consists mostly of Hosea's speech, and chapter 3 follows in an autobiographical style. Chapter 3 is the most succinct, possibly the oldest. Closest to the domestic tragedy, chapter 3 could not humanly sustain long explanations. Chapter 2 represents an outburst of violent emotion, again very near to the raw memory of what happened; chapter 1, written from a distance by a disciple, can afford to be the most explicit about the meaning of the episode.

1:2-8 A similar style is used to tell about the conception, birth, and naming of all three children. 1:2 the Lord said to Hosea: The marriage of Hosea was probably arranged in the normal way of the time by the parents, yet, viewed from the faith that God's providence covers especially significant events of human life, the Lord is said to order it. take a harlot wife and harlot's children: The grammatical form of the noun "harlot" (in Hebrew, masculine plural) indicates a woman of such tendencies. Hosea did not look for a prostitute to marry; his wife may have experienced strong temptations due to her initiation at the sanctuary's fertility rites. 1:3 Gomer: The proper name of the woman, without any significance for the story of Hosea, argues for a real marriage rather than a piece of fiction or allegory. conceived and bore him a son: This is the only time Hosea is clearly said to be the father of the child.

1:4 the name Jezreel: Each of the three children's names has a double meaning, good in itself but also bad for Israel. Jezreel refers to the fertile valley stretching from Mount Carmel in the west to the hills above the Sea of Galilee in the east, literally a breadbasket of nourishment. Jezreel was also the site of many bloody battles beginning with the Book of Judges (Judg 4–5). 1:6 Lo-ruhama: Hebrew for "No pity," a name that could have indicated a child able to hold her own against injustices; theologically, it negates one of the key qualities of the Mosaic covenant, the Lord's compassion (see p. 498). In the singular the Hebrew word denotes the mother's womb, where a child develops in warm security; derivatives like ruhama show the feminine, motherly side of God. Hosea eventually interprets the child's name as an end to the covenant. 1:8 Lo-ammi: Hebrew for "Not my people," a name that originally alluded to the boy's illegitimacy and to his ability to survive alone in this world despite all odds against him. Religiously, the name announces the end of Israel's special privileges and reduces Israel to the status of all other nations. 1:9 I will not be their God: The Hebrew refers to the divine name as revealed by God to Moses, "I am who I am." When spoken by Israel, it was read in the third person: "He who is [always there with you]," or Yahweh (Exod 3:14-15). Literally verse 9 reads, "No longer am I 'I am' for you."

2:1-3 These verses are frequently placed after 2:25 or, as in the New American Bible, after 3:1-5. The Revised Standard Version, following the ancient Greek and Vulgate enumeration, lists these verses as 1:10-11 and 2:1.

2:4-25 While the overall impact of these lines is unmistakable, the grammar, the emotions, and the sequence of verses are confusing; the New American Bible adjusts the verses in a new sequence. Some scholars claim that verses 18-25, or at least verses 21-22, are editorial additions. Perhaps the editor responsible for the biographical section in 1:2-8 drew verses 18-25 from a treasury of Hosea's speeches.

At first Hosea speaks to the children (vv. 4-5) and then about them (vv. 6-7); he explodes with vitriolic disdain (vv. 5-6, 11-12) and peacefully settles with nostalgic memories (v. 10 and the end of v. 15, into vv. 8-9); he is at the point of divorce (v. 4) and reverts to reconciliation (vv. 16-17). While bitterly denouncing Canaanite fertility rites at the sanctuaries, Hosea employs the language of this ritual to appreciate the luscious beauty of the landscape. The Hebrew word for "allure" (v. 16), describing God's way of drawing Israel closely into loving covenant bonds, is also the word for sexual seduction. 2:17 the valley of Achor: This valley southwest of Jericho was once surrounded with sinister memories of military defeat and deceit in the days of Joshua (Josh 7:24-26); now Israel is invited to reenter the Promised Land through it and take possession of its rich source of life. The days of the Exodus are now gloriously repeated and the covenant is enhanced by comparison with matrimonial bonds, as Israel calls the Lord "my husband." True love (v. 20) is never selfish, and so Hosea sees the good effects of Israel's new espousals with Yahweh spiraling outward, even to protect birds and crawling animals.

2:21-22 These lovely lines need to be unpacked for their theological richness. In this marriage between Yahweh and Israel, the Lord offers the dowry "in right and in justice" ("right": a moral rectitude that brings peace and satisfaction; "justice": a public, authoritative declaration that such is true); "in love and in mercy" ("love": affection between those bonded by blood or treaty; "mercy": see above 1:7); "in fidelity" (sturdy reliability in one's relations). you shall know the Lord: The Hebrew word for "know" is the one most frequently used for marital intercourse (Gen 4:1, 17, 25) and stresses the experiential or intuitive aspect.

2:23-25 Again intimate love reaches outward toward a new creation. The bonding between Israel and Yahweh hints at its repercussions upon people everywhere; universal mission is already being signaled from afar. Difficult or seemingly impossible, whether for adulterous Israel or for unsuspecting foreigners, God's love acts miraculously, so that Jezreel is once again a fertile breadbasket, and Lo-ruhama and Lo-ammi are to become the Lord's legitimate children. What is biologically impossible—changing a child's natural parentage—now happens. These lines are applied to the Church's universal mission in 1 Pet 2:9-10; Rom 9:25-26; 11:32.

3:1-5 This passage retells the story of Hosea's reconciliation with Gomer. For the application to Israel's covenant with Yahweh, an application continuously being made by Hosea, it is important that Hosea never divorced Gomer nor is he marrying someone else. Here we note several, very human phases in the return of Gomer. Three times verse 1 uses the Hebrew verb "to love," which denotes normal physical and emotional attachment. After Hosea obeys the Lord and brings Gomer back to his home, he still cannot consummate the marriage. After such a severe estrangement, intercourse would be too much a routine physical act, not a full expression of human love. He says to her: "Many days you shall wait for me . . . I in turn will wait for you" (3:3). Verse 5 applies the lines to the southern kingdom of Judah, probably after the destruction of the north in 721 B.C.E., reaffirms the promises to the Davidic dynasty at Jerusalem, and then extends the promises into "the last days" (3:5), a phrase also found among the southern prophets in speaking of the new Jerusalem of peace (Isa 2:2-5; Mic 4:1-5; Jer 23:5-6, 20; Ezek 38:16).

2:1-3 The New American Bible transfers these verses here; for an explanation, see the commentary on 2:23-25. Hosea seems to reach back behind the Mosaic covenant to the earliest memories of Israel with the ancient patriarchs and their wives, to whom were promised offspring "like the sand of the sea" (Gen 22:7), "children of the living God," born of parents too far advanced in age for conception or else barren for a long period of years. Yahweh is not dead like the false fertility gods of the Canaanites. 2:2 one head: Hosea avoids the title of king, perhaps out of disdain for the reigning monarchs, perhaps too as a way of uniting Israel with the premonarchic days of Abraham and Moses.

CRIMES OF LEADERSHIP IN JEROBOAM II'S REIGN

Hos 4:1–5:7

As already explained in the introduction, this section belongs to the final years of Jeroboam II's long reign (786–746 B.C.E.) and in that sense is a continuation of chapters 1–3. Although promiscuity was involved in the sanctuary fertility rites, the crime of adultery is attached to all serious offenses against the Lord and the neighbor because of the intimate love of Yahweh, which every sin violates.

4:1-3 This section is composed in the style of a legal proceeding at the city gate (see Deut 25:7; Ruth 4:1) and includes a summons of the defendant (v. 1a), evidence of crimes (vv. 1b-2a), verdict of "Guilty!" (v. 2b, literally "blood upon blood," meaning that the crimes are written across the hands), and the consequent punishment (v. 3). For other examples of this type of judicial speech among the prophets, see: Amos 4:1-3; 8:4-8; Isa 1:2-16. The crimes represent a mini-decalogue (Exod 20:1-17; Deut 5:1-21). They are all crimes against basic relationships and human trust: cursing by ritual language, lying, premeditated murder, kidnapping (the original meaning instead of "stealing"), and adultery. In order to challenge a false trust in later theologies and rituals that developed out of the Mosaic covenant, Hosea goes back to the basic ABC's of humanity as reflected in the Ten Commandments. Prophets condemn covenant religion by appealing to pre-covenant expectations enfleshed in all men and women, and even in "the beasts of the field" and "the birds of the air," which also suffer the effects of human selfishness. For 4:1b, see 2:21-22.

4:4-19 Here are graphic details about fertility rites, even at such ancient sanctuaries as Gilgal (Josh 4:19–5:15; 1 Sam 15:12-33) and Bethel (= "house of God," which Hosea con-temptuously calls Beth-aven, or "house of emptiness"; for Bethel, see Gen 28:10-22; 1 Kgs 12:29-33). Verse 4 is a very difficult verse to translate confidently from the Hebrew; in any case the accusation is targeted not so much against the ordinary Israelite but against "you, O priest" (in the singular according to the Hebrew and therefore aimed at the high priest legitimately installed but morally corrupt). 4:6 want of knowledge: See 2:22. 4:8 feed on the sin: The ritual law of sin-offerings prescribes a stipend for the livelihood of the priests (see Num 5:8-10). Hosea implies that the priests tolerate sin or sharpen the sense of guilt among the people, who then feel compelled to bring more generous offerings. The word "greedy" implies lust or an unusually strong desire. Verse 9a is a proverb found verbatim in Isa 24:2a; it reads literally: "and it will be like people like priest." The priests imitate the worldliness of people about them, and people shelter themselves under the priests' example.

5:1-7 The reference is to the continuation of the lascivious rituals in such renowned sanctuaries as Mizpah (1 Sam 7:5-14) and Tabor (Judg 4:14). The play on words in verses 1-2 makes the lines difficult to translate into English: "a snare (pah) are you at Mizpah," or in English, "a snare are you at Miznare." In verse 3, Ephraim is the name of a son of the patriarch Joseph (Gen 41:52; 48:1). Verse 7 refers to children conceived through the fertility rites.

ASSASSINATIONS, INSTABILITY, LOSS

Hos 5:8–8:14

These chapters rumble and tumble with the assassination of kings and their royal families, pro-Assyrian and anti-Assyrian policies, treaties with Egypt against Assyria, and with Assyria against Egypt, big promises and meager delivery, politics in place of moral reform, and distracting military adventures that lead to heavy losses, which again distract the people to seek remedy in new assassinations. We are living through the period from the death of Jeroboam II in 746 to the seizure of royal power by King Hoshea in 732. The period covers only fourteen years, yet it produced seven kings, five dynasties, a major war from 736 to 732, and the loss of the northeast section of the kingdom to Assyria (2 Kgs 15:27-31; Isa 8:23).

5:8-14 The various allusions are difficult to identify; the whirl of events and the tragedy of malfeasance in leadership disrupt any orderly discussion. At one point Menahem captures the throne in the north and tilts in favor of Assyria; at another time Ahaz, king of Judah, in a panic to save his throne, declares himself a vassal of Assyria, sacrificing the independence of his country and enmeshing it in international turmoil. 5:13 cannot heal you: One of Hosea's favorite words is introduced into the text here and again in 6:1; 7:1; 11:4; 14:5, generally with the other key word, "return," so that interior return or conversion becomes an absolute condition for healing the injuries of any individual or the nation. Verse 14 states that even though Assyrian armies inflicted the mortal wound, God wants no misunderstanding: "I am like a lion . . . I rend the prey and depart." The Assyrians are following through with God's plan! Implicit in such a seemingly cruel interpretation of divine providence is the consoling fact that moral conversion, not military action, can heal Israel for new life.

5:15–6:7 The centerpiece here is a prayer (6:1-3), lovely in itself, stitched carefully into the context by word play and parallel ideas, and then rejected because of Israel's insincerity. The most beautiful words cannot save an ugly heart. While the words speak of conversion, Israel refuses the consequence of adequate repentance. As one author commented, the transition from conversion to repentance is as crucial as waking up without getting up!

The words "heal" in 5:13, "rend" in 5:14, and "go back" in 5:15 are identical with "return," "rend" and "heal" in 6:1. The phrase "look for" in 5:15 is of the same Hebrew root as "dawn" in 6:3 ("dawn" is the first light that we "look for" in the early morning). As mentioned already, the prayer in 6:1-3 is carefully inserted into place. 6:2 third day: This is a technical phrase in the Bible, symbolic of the Lord's extraordinary appearance as Savior: in Exod 19:11, 16, when the Lord came down to Mount Sinai; in Gen 42:18, when Joseph said to his brothers, "Do this and you shall live"; in Jonah 2:1, Jonah's deliverance from the belly of the whale (see also Josh 3:2; Ezra 8:15; Isa 16:14; 37:30). This long tradition of "three days" converges gloriously in the New Testament doctrine of Jesus' resurrection and is enshrined in the Church's creed.

In verse 4, as in 11:8-9, we eavesdrop on the compassionate heart of God struggling against the inevitable destruction of Israel. 6:5 smote them through the prophets: A long series of non-writing prophets have been warning Israel, such as the elders in Num 11:16-30, Samuel in 1 Sam, Elijah and Elisha in 1 Kgs 17–2 Kgs 13:20. A conscience that is stirred and challenged becomes a destructive force for revenge and self-justification if one does not obey it. 6:6 love . . . not sacrifice: This is a classic text (see 1 Sam 15:22; Ps 50:14; Matt 9:13; 12:7). Ritual acts like sacrifice and holocaust were intended to externalize in a sacred assembly the interior spirit of obedience and adoration before God. Without love and knowledge of God they are a sham, or, in Ezekiel's words, a "whitewash" (Ezek 22:28).

7:3-16 Deceitful and cruel dynasties rise and collapse, as though moral turpitude is remedied by military excitement. Kings, after stirring the passions of the people to revolt in order to capture the throne, are themselves the victims of these overheated ovens as people "consume their rulers" (7:7). 7:8 Ephraim, a hearth cake unturned: Hosea evokes the image of dough being baked on burning coals, unturned, so that it remains raw and cold on one side, burnt to charcoal and reeking with smoke on the other. Hosea refers to social conditions, with half the people too rich and half too poor; religious conditions, with excessive ritualism but no spirit; political busyness, with no consistency or thoroughness; cultural veneer, pretentious and overdone in contrast to the dirt and hunger of the poor; a country of half-fed people, half-cultured society, half-lived religion, half-hearted policy, half-baked cakes.

8:1-14 This poem is carefully crafted with key words stitching the lines together and with major themes in balanced repetition, and at the center the haunting sound of a proverb (v. 7). While verses 1-6 and 11-14 modulate from frantic misdirection in politics to feverish ritualism in worship, verses 8-10 point to the disastrous effects. Such a frenzied whirl of activity can only foment more intense movement until all disintegrates.

8:1 A trumpet . . . You who watch: The latter phrase remains better in its original Hebrew, "like a vulture": first, because of the repetition of the particle "like" (in Hebrew, an emphatic, dramatic word); second, the vulture signals a field of dead bodies—carcasses of animals for immolation on the altar (?) or the bloated bodies of dead soldiers and of city inhabitants after a long siege. Sacrificial animals, sanctifying the altar in signs of adoration, now contaminate the house of the Lord in their rotten state. 8:2 "O God of Israel, we know you": Israel rejects and yet calls upon the Lord. 8:5 Cast away your calf: The golden calves set up by Jeroboam I at the sanctuaries of Bethel and Dan (1 Kgs 12:26-33) were originally considered the pedestal or throne for God's invisible presence like the ark or chest surrounded by cherubim wings at the Jerusalem temple (Exod 25:10-22; 37:1-9). Soon the symbol became an idol so as to divinize human talents and work, and to focus on the calf or bull in its fertility symbolism.

8:7 When they sow the wind, they shall reap the whirlwind: This proverb echoes in every language of the world. The three couplets in Hebrew resound with the same sounds and even rhyme at the end. Not only do the words and ideas fit compactly together, but, once begun, they rush like a whirlwind to their destruction. 8:9 Ephraim bargained for lovers: No longer attractive and with little to offer any more, Ephraim pays her lovers (foreign nations whose assistance she courts) for their sensuous enjoyment of herself—lines bitterly true of the rape and destruction that accompany military invasion. 8:13 they shall return to Egypt: see the introduction (p. 497). Although Egypt is actually a friendly nation, coaxing the revolt against Assyria, Hosea views Egypt as a type of oppression since the days of Moses. Israel's sins have reversed the covenant at Sinai and have driven Israel back to pre-Mosaic days. Beneath the surface, however, is the assurance that what God did once can be done again if Israel converts sincerely.

INTERLUDE OF FALSE HOPES

Hos 9:1–13:8

As noted in the introduction, these chapters bring us into the reign of the last king of the north, Hoshea (732–724 B.C.E.). After the Assyrian army had broken the back of the revolt instigated by King Pekah and lopped off the northern provinces of Israel, Hoshea was placed upon the throne with Assyrian help. This period of time represents Israel's last chance at conversion, healing, and survival. The nation failed to realize the futility of seeking salvation by intrigue, treaties, and military armaments. They paid little or no attention to Hosea's threats and previously to those of Amos. Perhaps they felt that they had suffered enough (or too much) and so could settle down to business as usual in the sanctuary worship and in their social injustices now that King Hoshea was enthroned and peace had returned.

Chapter 9 has more than its share of textual difficulties in a book beset with many disturbed Hebrew readings; there are also a number of puns and like-sounding words, which are always difficult to translate into another language. We spot various allusions to the autumnal feast of Tabernacles, at times simply called "the feast," as in verse 5 (see 1 Kgs 8:2; Ezek 45:25; Neh 8:14). Tabernacles was the final harvest festival, in thanksgiving especially for grapes and olives (see 9:2). Several references to dwelling places in this chapter may allude to the practice of dwelling in tents during the octave of this feast (Lev 23:42). This chapter of Hosea witnesses to the prophet's keen awareness of the Exodus traditions. In his prophecy, accordingly, Hosea is not condemning sanctuary worship in itself, because this was one of the principal means of his learning the Mosaic traditions; like Amos, he is against that worship rendered evil by its tolerance or active support of sensuality and social injustices.

9:1-2 The references to threshing floor and wine press, along with other details to follow in this chapter, place us within the eight-day festival of Tabernacles; these phrases are also used in Deut 16:13 in reference to the final harvest and the feast of Tabernacles. Harvest is normally symbolic of life. Yet the carousing and excesses even at Israel's sanctuaries contradict God's holiness and concern for the poor. The feast that celebrates God's tabernacling presence among Israel is driving God out. We are reminded of Jesus' reaction when he drove the money-changers out of the temple (John 2:13-22). Once again Egypt is a type of oppression and sin (v. 3); the people's offenses have transformed their own land into "Egypt" (see 7:16).

9:4 mourners' bread that makes unclean: As in Amos 7:17, the people and priests may be violating social justice and turning the sanctuary into a business, even for the sale of sex, yet they can still be scrupulous over fine points of the law such as unclean food or burial in an unblessed or unclean grave! Mourners' bread was unacceptable because of the mourners' contact with a corpse (Deut 16:14); strict rules isolated people mortally or contagiously ill as well as those who cared for them (Num 19:11-22; Lev 21). People of nomadic background, occupying an arid area, develop strict rules concerning contagious diseases. Israel, moreover, with very little understanding of the physical body and with little or no appreciation of the healing profession, evolved a system of health care that combined common sense with strange concoctions (see the rules for the purification of leprosy and skin diseases in Lev 14). Israel's legitimate offerings of wine become unclean like mourners' food because sensuality has reduced Israel to a state of being dead, and its sinfulness is contagious! 9:6 Weeds . . . thorns: The inhabitable oasis where tents are pitched quickly reverts to wild growth; Israel's sins corrupt the earth (4:3), and the harvest festival is replaced with weeds and thorns.

9:7-9 The play on words and sounds in the Hebrew verses carry the enigmatic touch of prophecy as well as its poetic mystique, yet the sense becomes clear enough when we read from the background of prophecy's history. Already from the start, prophecy could turn into a self-serving business for pay (Num 22:17). Even in the days of Moses prophecy needed correction, in this case because of jealousy (Num 11:26-30; 12:6-8). In a later episode we stand by, scandalized and disillusioned, as prophet argues against prophet in 1 Kgs 22 or Jer 28. Amos, we recall, refused to be associated with the prophetic guilds (Amos 7:14) once honored by the presence of Elijah and Elisha (2 Kgs 2). Hosea resounds with his own "Amen!" in declaring that the professional "prophet is a fool!" Moreover, their craft or employment has become a snare for them so that they are sinking to the sexual degeneracy of "the days of Gibeah," the site of a vicious form of homosexual activity and a hideous type of revenge (Judg 19–21).

9:10-17 These lines dramatize the meaning of the word "Ephraim" in reverse. It means, as we read in Gen 41:52 about Joseph's naming his second son Ephraim, "God has made me fruitful in the land of my affliction." Though the second-born son, Ephraim was to receive the first-born's blessing from Jacob (Gen 48:12-20), as specially precious to the Lord (see Jer 2:3). Yet the people of Ephraim (= northern kingdom of Israel) have "consecrated themselves to the Shame" (9:10), as happened when Israel was first initiated into the fertility rites at Baal-peor at the instigation of a prophet named Balaam (Num 25; 31:8, 16). The people Ephraim, whose name declares the fruitfulness of the womb, by their sexual excesses will become "childless" (9:12) through the cruel excesses of the military conqueror Assyria. The final verse begins with the formula of a blessing only to end with a curse. Verse 16 reminds us of the deep weariness of sated lust.

10:1-15 This series of short, disparate oracles may date to the early years of King Hoshea. King Pekah has been assassinated (v. 3). The land is again producing its fruit as it recovers from the disastrous war against Assyria. Yet the hopes for moral reform and for a return to social justice have turned into empty words and false promises (v. 4). The idolatrous rites continue, as indicated by the worship of stone pillars, which are representative of the male god Baal and are usually joined by wooden pillars for the female goddess Astarte (see 3:12-13).

Verses 5-8 anticipate a new and worse invasion by Assyria if Samaria continues in its promiscuous rites. Bethel is singled out, referred to as Beth-aven (v. 5) or just Aven (v. 8); the latter word stands for emptiness or shame, a sarcastic way of alluding to the famous sanctuary (see the commentary on 4:5-6). The new king will endure the same fate as Pekah (v. 7; see 13:10 for the actual event). The destruction will be so cruel and complete that people will "cry out to the mountains, 'Cover us!'" (v. 8), words repeated in Luke 22:30 and Rev 6:16. Verses 11-13a draw upon the image of harvest, as in chapter 9, only to see that Israel "reaped perversity." Israel trusted in the military; it will be destroyed by the military (vv. 13b-15). The records about Salman's ravage of Beth-arbel have been lost; the event cannot be documented. Twice the word "chastise" occurs (v. 10); its Hebrew form indicates disciplinary punishment, suffering that purifies and strengthens and so transforms. An elusive element of hope abides in lines sweeping toward destruction.

11:1-11 This chapter seems like an island around which runs the current of Hosea's preaching from chapter 10 to 12:1. The image of Israel here modulates from the adulterous spouse to the wayward child. While the rest of Hosea increases the momentum toward death, dramatically summarized in 13:14, chapter 11 draws from the intuitive hope deep within the heart of Hosea, like an island whose roots extend beneath the river currents.

Grammatically, chapter 11 is divided between verses 1-7 and 8-11. The opening section refers to Israel in the third person; the other part uses the second person. The first verses reflect Israel's wandering in the Sinaitic wilderness, while verses 8-11 reach forward to Israel's settled life in the land of Canaan. Yahweh speaks throughout in the first person singular. If ever there was an Old Testament discourse wrapping God in the warm flesh of human parenthood, this is it—the supreme revelation of divine love in the Hebrew Scriptures. To compose it, Hosea had to overcome the angry disappointment of illegitimate children from his own wife; he had to cleanse from view the lascivious excesses of Canaanite fertility rites. Reaching into the depth of his own human compassion, he recognized God's presence as the source of such heroic love.

The opening line stresses that God loved the child before Israel knew how to respond (see 1 John 4:7-11). When Matthew sees the fulfillment of this line in Jesus' infancy, Hosea's prophecy enables us to recognize the passover mystery in Jesus: through the Red Sea, across the wilderness, toward new life (Matt 2:15). "Israel [as] my firstborn child" was already revealed to Moses (Exod 4:22-23); here it is reaffirmed with stronger personal bonds. The actions described in verses 3-4 are maternal; here we have one of the most striking feminine images of God in the Hebrew Scriptures. "Healer" is one of Hosea's persistent titles for Yahweh (see 5:13). 11:5 return to . . . Egypt: The typology is evident here. Sin and slavery, even in Assyria, are considered a return to Egypt. According to the Hebrew verse 7 should read: "My people are in suspense about returning to me"; the second line of verse 7 is almost unintelligible in the Hebrew and is variously reconstructed.

In verses 8-11 God speaks ever more passionately, convulsing within by the contrasting demands for death as humanly required (Deut 21:18-21), and for forgiveness and another chance to be loved yet again (see 3:1) as divinely expected. In the Hebrew verse 8 begins with a strong phrase like "but on the contrary" (Gen 39:9; 44:34). Admah and Zeboiim are the names used in northern traditions, while southern traditions referred to Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19:28; Isa 1:9-10). Both sets of names occur in Deut 29:22. With verse 10 the pattern is broken; this verse refers to the Lord in the third person (otherwise in chapter 11 in the first person); the reference to roaring lions is typical of Amos, not of Hosea (Amos 1:2, 3:4, 8). This verse is usually considered a later addition from an anonymous but inspired source.

12:1–13:8 (RSV: 11:12–13:8) Typical of so much of prophecy, this section of Hosea (a) reverts to an ancient tradition, only to reverse the people's easygoing understanding of it; (b) makes an effective use of wordplay; (c) detects a new appreciation of the present situation; and (d) has undergone later revision and application.

The charge of "lies" and "deceit" against contemporary Ephraim in 12:1 is drawn from the ancient story of the patriarch Jacob, who lied to his blind and aged father Isaac in order to acquire the birthright (Gen 27), and again to his uncle Laban, whom he "hoodwinked by not telling him of his intended flight" (Gen 31:20) after Laban had deceived Jacob about the identity of his wife (Gen 29:23-25). While the traditions in Genesis absorbed these lies and deceit into the larger theology of God's mysterious providence, Hosea lifts them out to be seen for what they were—lies! Hosea states how he himself has been victimized by lies that "surround me."

Verse 1b about Judah is a later adaptation to the southern kingdom. The application to Judah continues in verse 3a. Here where the text reads "Israel" (correctly according to Hosea's original intent), the Hebrew text reads "Judah." In verse 3b Ephraim is clearly identified as a chip off the old block continuing to lie and deceive like his grandfather Jacob!

12:4-7 The references to Jacob are intensified: "In the womb he supplanted his brother" (Gen 25:26; 27:36); the word "supplant" ('akab) is the origin of Jacob's name. "He contended with God" refers to Jacob's wrestling with the angel at the river Jabbok, where God changed the patriarch's name to Israel (see Gen 32:23-33, especially verse 29, where we read: "You shall no longer be spoken of as Jacob, but as Israel, because you have contended with the divine"). The word sarah ("contend") contains the central consonants of the word "Israel." It was at Bethel that God appeared to Jacob atop the ladder on which divine messengers ascended and descended (Gen 28:13). Verse 6 is an addition adapting the passage for a liturgical setting, like Amos 4:13; 5:8-9; 9:6b. In verse 7 Hosea's deeply embedded optimism surfaces again.

12:8-13:8 These lines thrice modulate from difficulties to a divine intervention and back again to worse difficulties (12:8-12; 12:13–13:1; 13:2-8). 12:8 merchant: The Hebrew word is also the proper name "Canaan"; from its origins Israel has been Canaanite—deceitful, covetous, and sensual. 12:9 fortune: The Hebrew word is spelled almost the same as the words translated "man" in verse 4 and "falsehood" in verse 12. Ancestor Jacob, kindred Canaanites, present Ephraimites—all are marked by greed and deceit.

Verses 10-11 speak of a new beginning with the Exodus, new reformation with the prophets. "Gilead" is possibly a reference to the pact between Jacob and Laban (Gen 31:46-54), solemnized at Galeed (Gal + ed = "hill of witness"); it is very similar to "Gilgal," the site of an ancient sanctuary whose licentious style of worship now witnesses against Israel. 12:12 heaps of stones: The phrase possibly recalls the stones of witness set up near Gilgal in Joshua's days (Josh 4). In verse 14 Moses is honored by the title of prophet (or is it vice versa?—see Num 12), yet in this section from 12:1 onward Jacob is criticized much more negatively than the traditions in Genesis.

The third poem in this subsection (13:2-8) again opens with the continuation of sin despite all warnings. For Hosea, the principal offense is idolatry and its sensual rites, prompting the scornful gibe "Men kiss calves," which refers to the golden calves that were considered pedestals for Yahweh at Bethel and Dan (see 8:5). Hosea contrasts Yahweh's shepherding of Israel in the wilderness (vv.

4-5) with the gluttonous banquets at the sanctuaries (v. 6). The divine shepherd turns into the bear or lion now attacking the flock (see Amos 3:12).

THE STING OF DEATH

Hos 13:9–14:1

This final preaching of Hosea begins as abruptly as the message is final: "Your destruction, O Israel!" 13:10 Where now is your king: King Hoshea has been captured by the Assyrians, who are now proceeding southward toward Samaria to besiege and destroy the capital city and deport whatever population remains after war's fatalities and the Assyrian executions at the captured city gate. "That he may rescue you" is a cruel pun on the name of the last king, Hoshea; in Hebrew, yoshiah reads "rescue" or "save." 13:11 I give you a king . . . and I take him away: There were four kings in the space of two years, 746–745: Jeroboam II, Zechariah, Shallum, and Menahem! Is there another sting of irony in the prophet's summoning the Canaanite god Death to condemn the Israelites for their fertility rites honoring the gods of death and life, Muth and Baal (v. 14)? Beyond a doubt, in Hosea's mind is the certainty of total destruction.

The compassion of chapter 11 is reversed unconditionally only to be reversed again by St. Paul, who combines the passage with Isa 25:8 and reads the words as a question that expects the answer "No!" (1 Cor 15:54-55). In his resurrection, Jesus Christ has overcome the sting and plague of death.

CONVERSION, HEALING, AND NEW LIFE

Hos 14:2-9

If this optimistic conclusion clashes with the absolute doom in the preceding section, such an upbeat ending is typical of prophecy. We noticed a similar finale to the Book of Amos. Whether it be the entire Bible or individual books, the beginning and the conclusion generally center on hope; in between is the superhuman struggle to sustain such ideals within the absorbing challenges of Planet Earth. As a matter of fact, Hosea has frequently hinted at the positive side of a strong faith in God as healer and savior underlying his negative, severe condemnations. He continually recognizes a redeeming quality in the worship of Israel, even in its fertility rites, for he makes abundant use of its themes and vocabulary. All the while he condemns the excesses so painfully experienced in his own marriage (5:15–6:7). Whether it is sin or virtue, each has immediate repercussions across the world of vegetation and livestock (2:20, 23-25; 4:3).

Either Hosea himself or a disciple drew upon earlier preaching to end the prophetic book, possibly at Jerusalem after the fall of Samaria (721 B.C.E.). The opening lines follow the style of a prophetic exhortation (vv. 2-3a) and a prayer composed by the prophet for the people (vv. 3b-4). The following verses (vv. 5-9) present God's reply. Each of the two sections—Hosea's preaching in verses 2-4 and God's response in verses 5-9—opens with a favorite word of Hosea, usually linked closely together: "return" and "heal" (5:13; 6:1; 7:1; 11:4-5). Physical healing depends upon moral conversion.

14:2 Lord, your God: Hosea does not speak about the nature of God from any philosophical background but from a personal experience and a liturgical memory of the Lord's intimate sharing in Israel's life (see the Introduction, p. 498).

14:3 render as offerings: The Hebrew text is somewhat disturbed. The prophet has suffered severely from the sexual aberrations at the sanctuaries on the part of his wife and others, but he still speaks positively of ritual and worship. These are the source of his hope in a God who called the people out of Egypt, taught them to walk, and formed a covenant of love with them in the wilderness (2:18-22; 11).

14:4 the orphan finds compassion: The immediate reference is Israel, yet we wonder if there is not also an allusion to Hosea's own second and third children, probably illegitimate (1:6, 8), whom he sees as fully his own, just as God accepts Israel (2:1-3, 24-25).

14:6 like the dew: Dew is a symbol of the divine gift of life. It appears without rain and is an important source of nourishment for vegetation during the long dry season in a land of cold nights and excessively warm days (see Judg 6:37-40; Pss 110:3; 133:3; Job 38:28). Verse 9 is like a divine soliloquy upon which we eavesdrop, as in 11:8-9.

CONCLUDING RECOMMENDATION

Hos 14:10

A scribal annotation—or perhaps a spontaneous exclamation in a public assembly—is attached to the book. As an accepted part of the Bible, the verse is truly inspired and comes from an anonymous inspired writer. It has the hallmark of the sapiential movement as witnessed to by Psalm 1. As the conclusion of Hosea's preaching, it reminds us that our response, too, is an integral part of the prophetical book of Hosea. The Bible remains incomplete without our listening and reflecting, our adapting and assenting within our life-setting today. Yet the Bible remains the basis and support of this reflection. It is our guide toward a conclusion; we must be true to its message and inspiration, in this case to Hosea.

As we look back over the fourteen chapters of the Book of Hosea, the concluding recommendation in 14:10 seems right at home. In his preaching, the prophet shows many other touches that relate to the sapiential movement: Hosea's high appreciation of the knowledge of the Lord (3:22; 4:1); the disciplinary role of suffering (5:9); the impact of good living across the earth (2:19-20; 4:3; 10:1). These are all important motifs in the books of Proverbs, Job, and Sirach, which are later books, of course, but representative of a movement that existed from the time of Solomon. Our adaptation to life today places us within a centuries-old tradition and shows the blending of many traditions in the Bible, traditions that include the patriarchal narratives, covenant laws, settlement in the land, scribes and wisdom, prophecy and its challenges, liturgy and its symbolic power to unite over the centuries.

MICAH

Carroll Stuhlmueller, C.P.

INTRODUCTION

Micah of Moresheth, especially when compared with Amos and Hosea, turns out to be an elusive prophet. Unlike the prophecy of Amos, the Book of Micah provides no visions about a personal call to be a prophet (see Amos 7:1-9; 8:1-3), nor any episode like Amos' tryst with the high priest Amaziah in defense of his divine summons (see Amos 7:10-17). Micah's preaching does not depend upon any highly charged emotional experience as was the case with Hosea and his tragic marriage with Gomer. The poor condition of the Hebrew text of Micah, moreover, and its successive re-editing over the centuries by a "school" of disciples cloak the prophet in a series of textual and editorial disguises. The frequent plays on words that intrigued and enticed his listeners, as they do modern students of his Hebrew style, wove its own puzzling web around the prophet from Moresheth. In this short introduction, therefore, we approach the man Micah gradually through an appreciation of the book, its literary style, and its major religious topics.

The Book of Micah

The book, as canonically accepted in its final form, is simple enough in its subdivisions, with its double sequence of threats and promises: chapters 1–3, a series of threats, and chapters 4–5, promises; 6:1–7:7, again threatening poems, followed by promises in 7:8-20. Our commonsense hunch says that Micah did not speak in such a neatly balanced way. If he had, the elders in Jer 26:18 would never have quoted the menace of 3:12; it would have been canceled out at once by the glorious promise in 4:1-5.

The preaching of Micah was re-edited on several occasions: for instance, the final lines of 1:5 were redirected to Judah and Jerusalem; 2:12-13 come from the Babylonian Exile and announce a new ingathering in the Promised Land; 4:4-5 represent two different applications of the vision of the new Jerusalem where foreign nations gather in the holy temple (see commentary below).

The style of Micah

Micah's style as a preacher is being more and more appreciated. No longer is he put down as a country bumpkin, blushing easily and embarrassed in public. He displays an unusual directness. Who can match his condemnation of animal sacrifice at the cost of overlooking the hunger and sickness of the poor in 3:2-3? Stylistically we detect a shrewd and quick turn of phrase in his frequent plays on words (see the commentary on 1:10; 2:4, 6, 11; 4:14; 5:1). Micah kept his listeners guessing, smiling, and intrigued as he enticed them into a devastating conclusion.

Along with these general stylistic qualities, Micah also displays an unusual versatility. He moves easily among: lamentations (1:8-16); question-and-answer repartee (1:5; 2:7); Torah speech, summarizing the Lord's expectations (6:6-8); personal confessions of faith, introduced by "as for me" (3:8; 7:7); oracles of judgment (2:3; 5:10-15) and of promise (4:1-4); a longer judgment speech, modeled upon legal procedures at the city gate (ch. 6).

The major topics of Micah's prophecy are to be distinguished according to the stage of preaching or editing already alluded to in this introduction. Before and during his preaching, Micah had witnessed severe, even wantonly cruel suffering on the part of the poor. Their land had been violated in order that the Jerusalem government might build defenses in such outposts as Moresheth overlooking the Mediterranean plains and then embark upon reckless military adventures. Several times, as we shall see, the dark and ominous cloud of the Assyrian army swept through the pass of Megiddo and down the coastal plain against Philistine cities or Egypt or Jerusalem, and earlier against the city of Samaria, whose three-year siege left the army time for savage entertainment and sadistic diversion in neighboring areas like Moresheth. Little wonder that Micah spoke with outrage against the social injustices and religious sham by which the administration at Jerusalem sought to distract the country from the dangers of war and the plight of the poor.

The "original" Micah leveled his criticism principally against religious and civil leaders for tolerating these excesses and then gaining financially from it all (see the commentary on 3:5-8). No hope was left when the defenders of religion and morality were themselves corrupted by pleasure and greed.

Micah's continuous interaction with temple and religious traditions, with social justice and civil leadership, points up a person with keen penetration into present reality and long roots into "ancient times" (5:1). Although he was oriented toward Jerusalem and the Davidic dynasty (4:14–5:4), he draws near at times to the style of the more northern traditions of Deuteronomy and is seriously concerned about the northern kingdom of Israel or Samaria (1:2-7; 6:16). He makes poignant use of the Exodus tradition in 6:1-5, again a more northern motif.

Micah's heirs kept his prophetic words closely in touch with the ever new "present reality," now the Babylonian Exile, a century and a half later. In fact, Babylon, the place of exile, is named in 4:10. One of the two closing psalms offers the discouraged people of postexilic times a prayer for rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (7:11).

The person of Micah

From the background of the Book of Micah, we have already begun to appreciate his character and person. Micah hails from the village of Moresheth (1:1). This city is also considered in some way a dependent of the Philistine city of Gath. The phrase "Moresheth-gath" (1:14) means "property of Gath." Originally Gath belonged to the Philistine Pentapolis of Gath, Gaza, Ashkelon, Ekron, and Ashdod, all in the southwest coastlands. These cities passed in and out of the control of the Israelites and at this time contained a strong contingent of Israelites. It is not at all impossible that Moresheth was administered through Gath. Moresheth was about twenty miles southwest of Jerusalem, nestled in the foothills overlooking the Mediterranean.

Moresheth influenced the language of Micah. His was not the desert imagery of Amos nor even the strong agricultural or rural setting of Hosea, and certainly not the cosmopolitan sophistication of Isaiah. Micah refers to the fields owned by the villagers (2:2, 4-5), the threshing floors on the hillside (4:12). More attention is given to the greedy plans and rapacious actions of people who come from the larger Jerusalem and who, in the comfort of their rented homes at Moresheth, covet and cheat (6:11) and take possession of whatever they desire (2:1-2; 6:9-11). They take over fields because of unpaid debts (2:2, 4). They strip off the mantle of debtors, which the law prescribed always to be returned at sundown (2:8).

The question is raised whether or not Micah belonged to the class of elders at Moresheth, for it was a group of "elders of the land" who recalled his words in Jer 26:17-18. In this case he would have been one of the judges at the city gate (Deut 17:5; 21:19; Ruth 4:1), responsible as well for defending the rights of the small town against the royal officials from Jerusalem. Another suggestion links Micah with "the people of the land," a group who reached back to the early days of David and always remained loyal to the ancient family. They were suspicious of others who manipulated the throne and its power for their own benefit (2 Kgs 11:18-20; 14:21; 21:24). Micah does not oppose the dynasty but wants to see it restored to its pristine purity and purpose, as when he sees its future no longer in Jerusalem but in ancient Bethlehem (Mic 4:14–5:4).

Micah and Isaiah

Both Micah and his contemporary Isaiah interacted vigorously with the Davidic dynasty but with a number of differences. While Isaiah's interests remained with the capital city of Jerusalem (Isa 1; 2:1-5; 4:2-6; 8:5-10), Micah's sympathies gravitated toward Bethlehem. Isaiah was the aristocrat, firmly attached to Jerusalem and its temple, a brilliant poet, a politician with international perspective; Micah was a countryman, less suave, brutal at times in his language, a poor person suffering with the poor rather than a wealthy person defending their rights. Sin for Isaiah turned out to be the sacrilegious act of polluting the temple (Isa 4:4); for Micah it was the callousness of stripping a man of his mantle and driving "the women of my people . . . from their pleasant homes" (Mic 2:8-9). Isaiah was the herald of a faith that demanded respect for the mysterious holiness of Yahweh; Micah was the prophet of divine justice for the inviolable rights of the poor.

Micah and Isaiah were contemporaries. It seems, however, that Isaiah began the prophetic ministry earlier, for he interacted vigorously with the king's policies at the time of the Syro-Ephraimite crisis (735–732 B.C.E.). Syria (or Damascus) and Ephraim (or Israel) had formed a coalition against Assyria; they marched against Judah when its King Ahaz refused to join (Isa 7:1-2; 22:1-14). Micah does not seem to allude to it. King Ahaz's pro-Assyrian policy was reversed into active revolt by King Hezekiah, much to the dismay of Isaiah. The king's bad politics led to an invasion by Sennacherib around 701 B.C.E. In preparation for this invasion, King Hezekiah had taken over landed property in the foothills to the west of Jerusalem. Was it at this time that many of the people of Moresheth lost their property? In this case Hezekiah may go down in the annals of the books of Kings and Chronicles as a very pious reformer of idolatrous and insincere worship (2 Kgs 18–20; 2 Chr 29–32), yet he would have remained insensitive or blind to the many social injustices left unchecked in the midst of the feverish liturgical reform or later in the all-absorbing preparations for war.

We place Micah at the earliest around 727 B.C.E., certainly before the collapse of Samaria (721 B.C.E.); his ministry would have extended into 701, the time of Sennacherib's invasion of Judah.

COMMENTARY

INTRODUCTION

Mic 1:1-2

1:1 Historical introduction. As in the case of Amos, this book too begins with some historical orientation and then with a religious, melodic opening. The editor lists Micah as prophesying under three kings, from Jotham through the reign of Ahaz into the time of Hezekiah (742–696 B.C.E.). Because the book says little or nothing about the great crisis during the reign of Ahaz, we confine his ministry to the time of Hezekiah. The editor may be thinking of Micah's earlier activity as an elder defending the rights of the dispossessed before his preaching came to the attention of many others.

Clearly enough, Micah's ministry is linked with the flow of history, particularly that of his own time. The Bible points out that God does not create the ideal setting for redemptive activity; God accepts us as we are in our total environment. The prophet's word is the product of its own age. Eternal truths emerge from the prophets, not as generic predictions of the future but rather as ideals and hopes rising from the trials and triumphs of the moment. The editor refers to "the vision he [Micah] received." Prophets peered beneath the surface to the ancient covenant, its laws and hopes, and to the merciful God who made Israel a special people. From this perspective came forth ideals and expectations for the present into the future.

1:2 Religious introduction. This verse seems to have been added somewhat late. It has all the marks of non-Mican authorship: Yahweh as accuser-witness is not found until Mal 3:5, in the postexilic age; "holy temple" is an expression not normally used at this time; "peoples, all of you" is a phrase from later literature like Lam 1:18; Ps 67:4, 6; and the use of 'adonai or "Lord" as a title for Yahweh does not occur again in the Book of Micah. Other aspects of this opening verse link it with other familiar introductions, such as the canticle of Moses in Deut 32:1 and the prophecy of Isaiah in Isa 1:2. The later editor is adapting Micah's book to a common style. While these pieces of biblical literature are directed rather exclusively to Israel, this opening or formal prelude has a universal ring ("O peoples . . . O earth") and touches everyone with faith in God, regardless of religious differences. all that fills you: This refers to the abundant gift of life across the earth, vegetation, animals, birds, fishes, and humanity. his holy temple: See the commentary on 1:3-4, below.

THREATS AGAINST SAMARIA AND JUDAH

Mic 1:3–3:12

The principal sermons of Micah against social injustices are gathered in this initial collection. The opening poem rivals some of the best in Isaiah. It comprises a theophany introducing Yahweh the Judge (vv. 3-4); presentation of the evidence (v. 5) and sentencing of the culprit (vv. 6-7); after these judicial procedures, mostly related to the final years of Samaria, a long lamentation is added as the same fate strikes Judah in the Assyrian invasion under Sennacherib in 701 B.C.E. (vv. 8-16).

1:3-4 Micah begins the trial of defendant Israel with a solemn entry of the divine Judge; the language here is that of a theophany (meaning "God's manifestation"). We are reminded of the fragments of hymns in Amos about Yahweh forming the mountains, declaring to people their inmost thoughts, and treading upon the heights of the earth (Amos 4:13; also 5:8-9; 9:5-6). Although the passage infers Yahweh's presence in earthly sanctuaries, the primary residence or throne is located above the waters of the heavens, as any number of biblical passages indicate (see Pss 11:4; 19:2; 29:9; Hos 5:15; Isa 29:21). The trembling and even the melting and collapsing of the earth at the touch of the Lord's presence are literary devices for inculcating the Lord's awesome wonder, mighty power, and transforming force upon human life, as declared at Mount Sinai (Exod 19), at the crossing of the Red Sea and the Jordan River (Psalm 114), at Israel's wandering through the wilderness (Ps 68:8-11), at Yahweh's response to the king (Ps 18:8-20).

1:5 Crimes especially of ritual immorality are brought against the defendant, the northern kingdom of Israel, under the name of its ancestor Jacob. The nation's religious and civil leaders, as we saw also in the Book of Hosea, bear the brunt of the responsibility for tolerating and even encouraging such gross transgressions of Yahweh's holiness. house of Judah . . . Jerusalem: After the collapse of the northern kingdom, a later editor, applies the statement to the southerners. The verdict of "Guilty!" leads to the harsh sentencing of total destruction (vv. 6-7); for a similar outcome, see Amos 4:2b-3; Hos 4:3. 1:7 idols: These include not only the golden calf at Dan and Bethel, originally the pedestal for Yahweh's invisible presence but superstitiously turned into an object of worship (see Hos 8:5; 13:2), but also the symbols of male and female deities of fertility (Hos 9:10-14). wages: The term refers to the "gifts" to the prostitutes in fertility rites, what Deut 23:19 calls "a harlot's fee or a dog's price" (also Hos 2:11, 14; 9:1). shall they return: What the Assyrian soldiers looted from Israel's temples will be returned to Assyrian sanctuaries as favors for their own sacred prostitutes.

1:8-9 This lament is prompted by the agony experienced by Micah's own country of Judah, which has imitated the sin of Samaria and must therefore suffer the same punishment. Several serious theological issues emerge here:

1) Must God inflict such horrendous pain as a military invasion with plunder, rape, fire, and deportation? While there is no satisfactory answer for what remains a mystery of faith, there are several "fixed spikes" (Eccl 12:11) on which to hang our reflections. Military invasion as "evil [that] has come down from the Lord" (Mic 1:12) results from God's willingness to work out our salvation in the midst of human history. Here God's presence can function quietly within our slow, process of reasoning and decision-making, but it can also function within other, more violent forms of human reaction. Secondly, when the reward from God is superhuman, even though accomplished on a human level, the struggle turns out superhuman as well, as we recognize in the cross of Jesus.

2) Another theological issue centers on Micah's participation, already by premonition, in the savage outcome of military invasion: "I go barefoot and naked" (v. 8; see Amos 2:16; 3:12). He imitates the action of the prophet of Jerusalem who around 713 B.C.E. went about "walking naked and barefoot . . . as a sign" (Isa 20:2-3). Why must the innocent suffer? Why must the wicked suffer, as Habakkuk will ask (1:13), when they are still "more just" than their conqueror? The presence of the innocent—in this case a prophet like Micah and the small villages in the way of the Assyrian army—provides the only hope for arriving at peace and human dignity as God wants.

1:10-16 In naming the cities leveled by Sennacherib on his way to Jerusalem in 701 B.C.E. Micah chooses small ones, for the most part clustered around his own village of Moresheth; some are not mentioned elsewhere in the Bible, not even in the listing of cities "in the foothills" (Josh 15:22-47). Often he announces the sorrow to be inflicted on the city by a play on words. Every Hebrew word has a meaning. At times the text has been tampered with and at other times poorly preserved.

1:10 publish it not in Gath: These words were taken from 2 Sam 1:20, part of David's dirge over Jonathan, where he mentions Philistine cities in the area of Moresheth. In Hebrew, "publish" begins with the word "Gath" spelled backward. weep not at all: This probably ought to read "weep not at Ko," so that the phrase "at Ko" (bako) relates to the Hebrew word for "weep," bakah. In Beth-leaphrah roll in the dust: the word aphrah in the name of the village signifies "dust"; beth means "house." The phrase might be read: "In the house of dust roll in the dust." The word for "roll" in Hebrew contains sounds similar to the Hebrew word for "house" and for "Philistine."

1:13 Harness steeds to the chariots, O inhabitants of Lachish: Not only do the words "chariots" and "Lachish" sound alike in Hebrew, but the entire line has a continual interchange of the letters.

1:14 Give parting gifts to Moresheth-gath: Because Moresheth, as already mentioned, denotes gift (received) or dowry, the play on words implies, "Give a gift to the gift of Gath."

2:1-5 Micah loved the pleasant fields of the Shephelah, the name given to the rolling, falling hills between the central mountain range and the Mediterranean coastland (in Hebrew shephal means "to fall"). Micah mourned, even cursed their loss. By contrast,

Amos never felt the same attachment to the fierce silence of the desert that Micah did to the Shephelah. Micah detests the way in which the fields were coveted at night and seized in the morning. People were not even ashamed of carrying out their evil dreams in open daylight.

The sacrilegious nature of the action becomes clear from such texts as Lev 25:23-24, in which God declares that "the land shall not be sold in perpetuity; for the land is mine, and you are but aliens who have become my tenants. Therefore . . . [every jubilee year] you must permit the land to be redeemed." Wealthy landowners, perhaps from the powerful city of Jerusalem, confiscated whatever they wished for it "lies within their power," words found identically in a long series of texts: Gen 31:29; Deut 28:32; Neh 5:5; Prov 3:27. The problem existed a long time and was always detestable to the Lord. 2:3 from which you shall not withdraw your neck: The first words are an alliteration in Hebrew. 2:5 you shall have no one to redistribute the land to the rightful owner once the exile sets in.

From the literary viewpoint, these verses carefully complement each other: what the people carefully plan and quickly accomplish in verses 1-2, God just as quickly reverses in verses 3-5.

2:6-11 Ancient and modern translators come up with different versions and interpretations. Is verse 6 ridiculing or affirming Micah? Is verse 10a spoken by the greedy despoilers ordering the poor from their ancestral land, or is it a command from foreign soldiers to depart for exile? Yet we may be able to detect a balanced structure: verses 6-7, an accusation against Micah and God, with a short reply from God; verses 8-11, spoken by Micah, recounting the people's sins (vv. 8-9), their punishment (v. 10), and finally a repetition of the accusation against Micah, now turned against the people (v. 11).

2:6 preach: The Hebrew verb can be taken in a derogatory sense suggesting saliva dripping out of the mouth of a prophet stirred into a rabid, ecstatic spasm (consider 1 Sam 10:10-12 and 19:22-24; 1 Kgs 18; Acts 2:13). The people consider themselves pious sanctuary-goers, so how can "the Lord be short of patience" (v. 7a)? God quickly replies that divine words promise good things only to those who act uprightly (v. 7b). Verses 8-9 are an eloquent condemnation of those who keep what the law clearly stipulates is to be returned to the poor man at sundown lest he contract intestinal colds (see Amos 2:8). Women and children are deprived of their inalienable honor and their right to the land. The culprits are ordered into exile because of their cruelty and greed. 2:10 rest: The word may refer to their once happy and peaceful lodging in the land (Ps 95:11; Deut 12:19). 2:11 futile claim: The phrase can be translated more literally, as in the Revised Standard Version, as "wind and lies." The people's mockery of Micah during their drunken revelry in the sanctuary (see Amos 2:8) ricochets upon themselves.

2:12-13 This passage is generally considered an exilic or postexilic addition, a minor upbeat note in the midst of Micah's condemnations. Verse 12 refers to the gathering of Israel safely within the sheepfold; verse 13 to Israel's breaking loose into a new freedom toward the Promised Land. In this case the king is Yahweh. According to another explanation, the verses are spoken by the false prophets of verse 11, who make use of liturgical language to reassure Jerusalem that all is well. Verse 11 attributes these false hopes to the euphoric effects of strong drink. Verses 12-13 present a liturgical procession with the solemn opening of the gates of city and temple as the ark is carried through the city back again into the holy of holies (see Psalm 24). A third possibility remains, namely, accepting both interpretations according to different periods when Micah is being read.

Chapter 3 counters the greed of Israel's leaders with some of the most violent language in prophecy. Living during the Assyrian epoch of international history, Micah and his neighbors in the villages of the Shephelah will experience the atrocious cruelty of the Assyrian army. Again the question is raised about Yahweh's interaction in history (see 1:8-9). The chapter is carefully structured: verses 1-4, against civil rulers in the northern kingdom of Israel (spoken between 727 and 721 B.C.E.); verses 5-8, against prophets, seemingly closer at hand in Judah of the southern kingdom; verses 9-12, a conclusion that condemns all categories of leadership but focuses upon Jerusalem and its impending destruction. The literary device of "inclusion" (repetition of key words) binds together verse 1 and verse 9, so that verse 9 and the following three verses bring the poem to a strong ending. They apply emphatically to Jerusalem what verses 1-4 had been directing toward the northern kingdom of Israel, an area that now lay in ruins with its population in exile.

3:1-4 These words are addressed to the "leaders of Jacob . . . the house of Israel." The opening phrase, "And I said," denotes an emphatic reversal—"But on the contrary I say!" This fact endorses the second of the interpretations for 2:12-13 (see above). The word "rulers" shows up in Isa 1:10; 3:6, 7; 22:3 for other incapable and venal leaders.

3:2b-3 The language is graphic, even crude, drawn from the action of preparing an animal for ritual sacrifice (see Lev 1:3-9). In a milder form it appears in Pss 14:4; 53:5, and with agonizing moan in Ps 79:1-4. 3:4 cry to the Lord: In the Bible civil leaders are responsible both to God and to those they govern (Rom 13:1). These leaders, however, deliberately use their divine origin as a club over the people. hide his face: The phrase is repeated in Ps 10:11 by wicked rulers as an excuse to proceed in their wickedness; and in Ps 13:2 by persecuted people appealing to God to make the divine presence felt. Micah invokes the phrase as punishment upon the evil rulers.

3:5-8 Micah is not condemning all divination, only that directed by greed, which included most of it in his day. Again the language is graphic and eloquent: feed them well and they declare shalom; fail to be generous to their rapacious appetite and (literally) "they sanctify a war against that one." As in Jer 6:4 and Joel 4:8, the word "holy" or "sanctify" occurs, stirring the whole discussion of what is called a "holy war," well known in the history of religions. 3:7 cover their lips: This is a sign of mourning (Ezek 24:17-22) and of being contagiously unclean (Lev 13:45). Verse 8 provides the purpose of Micah's ministry and clearly states its credentials. with the spirit of the Lord: This translation may not be the best. The Hebrew word for "spirit" was used by Micah in a pejorative sense in 2:11, "wind and lies." The Hebrew word can mean both "wind" and "spirit." Micah was completely disillusioned by the sensual, greedy prophets, who were driven by "wind" (see 1 Sam 10:10-13; 19:22-24).

3:9-12 A conclusion in verse 9 repeats key ideas of verse 1; verse 10 relates to the bloodshed in verses 2-3. Verse 11 condemns all leaders with the single charge of greed, yet they have the audacity to claim that God is on their side as they repeat sacred language found also in Amos 5:14 and Isa 7:14. Verse 12 will be cited by the elders of the land in Jer 26:16-19 to protect Jeremiah from being put to death for declaring that Jerusalem can be destroyed "like Shiloh." Shiloh once housed the ark of the covenant and had been the center of Mosaic religion (1 Sam 1-3), yet it was destroyed by the Philistines who captured the ark (1 Sam 4). Micah is said to have spoken these words "in the days of Hezekiah" (Jer 26:18), a king zealous for the reform of the liturgy (2 Kgs 18-20; 2 Chr 29-32) but evidently blind to other abuses against the poor. Because of Hezekiah's piety, the leaders claimed "the Lord in the midst of us" (Mic 3:11).

As we reflect on chapters 2-3, we ponder the cost in human misery because of greed and sensuality in leadership, first driving the people from their pleasant houses (2:9), finally reducing Jerusalem to rubble (3:12).

GATHERING OF THE POOR AND THE OUTCASTS

Mic 4:1-5:14

During the time of the Babylonian Exile, the material in chapters 4-5 was gathered from a reservoir or treasury of prophetic material, some from the prophet Micah, some attracted to the Micah texts by association of words or themes. The purpose of the editor seems clear enough by comparing 3:12 and its view of Jerusalem "reduced to rubble" with 4:1 and its vision of Jerusalem to which "peoples shall stream." The violent devastation of chapters 1-3 is reversed in a peaceful reconstruction. Although familiar historical names like Assyria and Babylon (4:10; 5:4), Jerusalem and Bethlehem (4:2; 5:1) reappear, they also seem to merge with other legendary names like Nimrod (5:5), are caught up in idyllic vision (4:1-3), or else are placed in perplexing parallel, like Bat-gader and Bethlehem (4:14; 5:1). Enough of Micah's style is preserved to ground us in his legitimate school of prophecy, yet too much of the visionary or symbolic is spread through the chapters for us not to strain our eyes beyond Micah's time into the "messianic" future.

Perhaps Israel's liturgical tradition is the most responsible agent for this blending of antiquity with the messianic future. Liturgy has a knack of extracting the best from historical reality, separating it from its political and military context, and highlighting God's concern—in this case, to create a new Jerusalem. This process was already at work in such pre-exilic psalms as Psalms 46–48, and it reaches sublime prophetic expression in Isa 65:17–66:24. As we will see below, the association of the Isaiah tradition suffused a new hope and grandeur about the text of Micah.

4:1-5 A number of oracles from a large prophetic repertoire reappear here. It is difficult to know who is the author, but it is certainly not Micah, for the passage would have neutralized his angry condemnation of Jerusalem in 3:12. Lines reappear in Isa 2:2-4, Zech 3:10; 1 Kgs 5:5; Joel 4:10, never with exactly the same meaning.

4:1 In days to come: The Greek text and the Aramaic Targum make it read: "at the end of days," that is, in the messianic age. higher than the mountains: This is to be understood only religiously, for even the Mount of Olives, just to the east, reaches a higher altitude than Jerusalem. A similar idea occurs in Pss 68:16-19; 89:13; Isa 60:1-3; 66:23. These texts already hint at the universal outreach of verse 2: "many nations . . . shall come and . . . climb the mount of the Lord." A lovely counterpoint is perceived here: while nations stream up the mount, instruction flows down and goes forth.

4:3 He shall judge: The subject is not clear, but it is probably Yahweh. Joel 4:10 quotes from this vision, only to reverse it into a statement of war. Earlier, in Joel 4:1-2, the nations are assembled for judgment in the Valley of Jehoshaphat (the word means "Yahweh judges"). For this reason many Jews, Christians, and Muslims today want to be buried in this valley between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives.

Verse 5 draws our eyes away from the glorious liturgy on the temple mount to the homey setting of each one's vine and fig tree—a warning against liturgical excesses! Verse 6 was added last, correcting what seemed to be the overenthusiastic "ecumenism" of verses 1-3. This text in Micah at least leaves the pagans at peace with their paganism (see Deut 4:19-20; 29:25; 32:8-9 for a similar reaction). The conversion of the nations and their dignified and equal reunion with Israel waited for St. Paul to argue the case in the letter to the Romans (Rom 9–11).

4:6-8 Someone in the days of exile looks back upon "the former dominion" (v. 8)—either the days of Micah or better the kingdom of David and Solomon—and recognizes the Lord as King (notice the end of the Davidic dynasty) over the remnant of people who are lame, outcasts, and afflicted. This scene of Jerusalem is considerably different from that in 4:1-3. We recognize the influence, or at least the parallels, joining the passage to Isa 35:4-6, 10; 41:17, from the time of the Babylonian Exile or later. Magdal-eder: The name means "tower of the flock," and is another name for the temple as a home and refuge for the flock of Israel.

4:9-10 As it stands, this poem seems to reflect best of all the period of the Babylonian Exile. Even if the poem was further refined during the Exile, its original composition may reflect King Hezekiah's agreement with Babylon, through its representative Merodach-baladan, against Assyria; the prophet Isaiah had reacted strongly against the negotiations. The solution to Judah's troubles was closer to home in remedying its social injustices (see 2 Kgs 20:12-19, repeated in Isa 39). Writhe in pain: The language of childbirth implies that new life lies hidden beneath the suffering of the people. the Lord redeem: The Hebrew word for "redeem" implies a blood bond and its consequent obligations of family love (see Lev 25:23-55).

4:11-13 The language of harvesting is applied to Israel's victory over hostile nations. This short poem may have been composed, possibly by Micah, for a harvest festival. Yet Micah's more persistent attitude of repudiating a military solution in favor of internal moral reform points to another author. The poem was stitched in here by the reference to Israel's enemies at the end of verse 10.

4:14–5:5 The play on words in verse 14 makes it difficult to be certain of the text and of the historical circumstances; the setting is probably the time of the Assyrian siege of Jerusalem under Sennacherib in 701 (see 2 Kgs 18:13–19:37; Isa 36–37). Theologically Micah and Isaiah realize the hopelessness of the current Davidic kings; even pious King Hezekiah proved ineffective in stemming the country's immorality but sought a military solution by revolting against Assyria. Both prophets begin to look to a future Davidic king. For his part, Micah indicates this by shifting attention from strong, cosmopolitan, and permissively immoral Jerusalem to small, honest, and God-fearing Bethlehem, where the prophet Samuel went to choose a king (1 Sam 16:1-13). The Lord's favor rested on young David.

4:14 The Hebrew word for "fence yourself in" is the same as gader in Bat-gader; the word for "rod" sounds very much like that for "ruler." Bat-gader harmonizes with Bethlehem.

5:1 Ephrathah: This is a place-name for a spot north of Jerusalem near Ramah where Rachel died (1 Sam 10:2; Jer 31:15); it is also the name of a clan, descendants of Ephrathah, the second wife of Caleb (see 1 Chr 2:18-19, 50-55, where reference is made to people called Bethgader and Bethlehem). These people settled around Bethlehem, south of Jerusalem, and also at Jaar, or Kiriath-jearim, west of Jerusalem (Ps 132:6). Later tradition confusedly located Rachel's tomb near Bethlehem (Gen 35:19; Ruth 4:11), where it is venerated today as a popular Israeli shrine. whose origin is from of old, from ancient times: The Hebrew text uses the plural, "origins," referring to the long, three-hundred year history of the Davidic dynasty with its accumulated promises and hopes; "ancient" does not necessarily mean eternal, but far away in the very distant past or future (see the final verse in the Book of Micah; also Isa 51:9).

5:2 she who is to give birth: Similar to Isaiah (7:14), Micah highlights the mother of the future Davidic king; in Old Testament times the queen-mother occupied an important place at court (1 Kgs 1:11-37; 2 Kgs 10:13). The silence about the father in this verse is interpreted by early Christian writers as an indication of the virginal conception of the promised Messiah. Verse 3 reflects the aura of mystery and promises surrounding the Davidic dynasty, as in Psalm 72.

5:4 he shall be peace: The New American Bible and the Revised Standard Version connect this line with the preceding description of the new Davidic king from insignificant Bethlehem. The Hebrew text joins the line with the following announcement of future shepherds and leaders whom God will raise up to deliver Israel from Assyrian domination. In this latter case a better translation would be: "this [plan] will be peace." Christian tradition certainly favors the former position. Nimrod, ancestor of Mesopotamian peoples (Gen 10:8-12), surrounds the text with mystery. seven shepherds, eight men of royal rank: Although rabbinical sources identify these persons, Micah is probably speaking symbolically, as Amos does in 1:3, 5.

5:6-8 Typically un-Micah in style and ideas, this military solution is from the time of the Exile. remnant: By now this is an important prophetical theme (see Amos 3:12, 5:15; Isa 7:3; 10:19-22). Like dew coming: The dew appears without rain, almost miraculously, a symbol of God's gift of life (Pss 110:3 [Hebrew text]; 133:3; Job 38:28), mentioned in many blessings (Gen 27:28; Deut 32:2; Isa 45:8).

5:9-14 This section ends with vintage Micah, with the destruction of Israel's military forces (vv. 9-10) and idolatrous sanctuaries (vv. 11-13). The final verse, however, condemns "the nations," so that the final word in chapters 4–5 turns in Israel's favor. "Sacred pillars" and "sacred poles" (vv. 12-13) refer to stone pillars and wooden poles representing the male and female fertility deities (Exod 34:13; Deut 16:21-22).

NEW THREATS

Mic 6:1–7:7

The second major section of threats (6:1–7:7) and promises (7:8-20) repeats the sequence of the first. The threats occupy less space than in the first section, and the Hebrew text is even more disturbed; the promises come from the period of the Exile or still later. Memorable lines occur, to resonate again in the New Testament and in the liturgy.

6:1-8 As the Hebrew word for "plea" in verses 1-2 clearly denotes, these verses follow the sequence of a legal procedure: verses 1-2, summoning the court, particularly the witnesses, and naming the defendant; verses 3-5, cross-questioning the defendant; verses 6-7, the defendant's reply and final statement; verse 8, the judge's verdict—probation—as in Isa 1:16.

The appeal in verses 1-2 to the universe as the courtroom and to the mountains and the earth's foundations as star witnesses follows a biblical pattern already found in Mic 1:2 but also in Deut 32:1; Ps 50:1-6. In the questioning of verses 3-4, not only is there an appeal to the Lord's gracious deeds, but we also glimpse God's personal agony over Israel's apostasy. These lines inspired the Improperia sung during the veneration of the cross on Good Friday. The abrupt "Answer me!" puts a limit on God's patience. The text of verse 5 is defective.

Miriam, seldom alluded to in the Bible, is accorded honorable mention with Moses and Aaron. The story of King Balak's summoning of the seer Balaam to curse Israel and his act of blessing Israel instead, is told in Num 22-24. Shittim (the word means "acacia tree") was the final stage of the journey from Egypt to the eastern bank of the Jordan River (Num 33:49); Gilgal was the famous sanctuary on the western banks near Jericho (Amos 4:4). This entire history from the Exodus out of Egypt to the settlement in the Promised Land is encapsulated as "the just deeds of the Lord," that is, God's complete or just fulfillment of every promise (see Josh 23:14).

6:7-8 The people seek shelter in feverish ritual actions as in Hos 6:1-7; 7:8; they even sacrifice their first-born, as was done by King Ahaz (2 Kgs 16:3) and King Manasseh (2 Kgs 21:6). They ritually slaughter their own children, imagining to appease God against their oppression of the poor. God's verdict, nonetheless, allows a second chance: "to do the right," as stipulated in the laws of the covenant; "to love goodness" according to bonds attaching them to one another and to Yahweh in the covenant; and "to walk humbly" by realizing that God's compassion is their only hope. This advice is addressed to "you . . . O man"; the Hebrew word 'adam includes men and women in a very generic sense, reaching outward to all humankind as in Gen 1-3.

6:9-16 The trial scene continues. In verses 9-12 Israel's crimes of greed and injustice are made public (see 2:1-3; 3:11). Verses 13-16 pronounce sentence against the defendant. Yet, because of the poor condition of the Hebrew text, we cannot be sure. Notice how the New American Bible juggles the verses to make better sense! The statements can easily be from Micah, assembled here somewhat freely as though for an appendix (see Amos 9:7-10). 6:9 cries to the city: Without doubt the city is Jerusalem. 6:10-11 criminal hoarding . . . meager ephah . . . criminal balances . . . false weights: The repetition is devastating—how low the wealthy stoop in swindling the poor and illiterate! As a result, they themselves and the entire country are completely out of balance, their delicate bonding with the Lord is upset, and their family life is torn apart (see Mic 7:5-6). 6:13 I will begin to strike you: Here the New American Bible follows the ancient versions of the Greek and Syriac by slightly modifying the Hebrew from halah ("to become sick") to halal ("to begin"). The Hebrew reveals God's anguish (as in 6:3 and especially in Hos 11:8-9): "On the contrary it is I myself, sickened [by the fact that I] must strike you with devastation . . . ." 6:14 food that will leave you empty: The meaning is not clear; it is possibly a reference to dysentery, weakness, and shame. Verse 16 is addressed directly to the northern kingdom, where Omri achieved fame by building the new capital city of Samaria (1 Kgs 16:23-28) and Ahab by defeating Damascus (1 Kgs 20), yet both were condemned for their religious indifference and social injustice. In this case verses 9-16 represent the early preaching of Micah; or else Micah applies to Jerusalem, at a later date, the lesson of the northern kingdom, whose magnificence collapsed into ruins as a "reproach of the nations."

7:1-7 This lamentation finds Micah sharing the sorrowful destruction of his own people, caused by their interior disintegration, yet in the end he says, "I look to the Lord" (v. 7). Again the Hebrew text is plagued by less than careful transmission. With a touch of pathos, Micah identifies with the vineyard far more completely and personally than Isaiah in Isa 5:1-5. This section about deception and betrayal in family and nation begins with "Alas!" in verse 1 and with "the faithful" in verse 2, the latter word denoting the blood bond and its normal obligations (see Hos 2:21-22). This passage may have influenced Jesus' cursing the fig tree that failed to provide fruit (Mark 11:12-14) and his statement about division in marriage and family (Matt 10:34-37; Luke 12:52-53). The selfish destroy themselves from within.

REBUILDING FROM ANCIENT PROMISES

Mic 7:8-20

Like other prophetical books, Micah's ends happily. In the final verse Micah reaches into the earliest traditions about the patriarchs to assure us of God's faithfulness in the future. A series of allusions to the time of the Exile help establish the date: a final collapse in darkness (v. 8); admission of guilt in experiencing the wrath of God (v. 9); wishing shame upon the enemy (v. 10); the walls of Jerusalem are still in ruins (v. 11). Verses 11-13 were added in the early postexilic Judah, but before the rebuilding of the walls by Nehemiah in 445 B.C.E. (Neh 2:17-20; 6:15).

7:8-10 An address by Jerusalem, possibly against Edom, which plundered the city, or what was left of it, after its destruction by the Babylonians in 587 B.C.E. Hatred rose to white heat against Edom, as we observe in Isa 63:1-6 and in the entire Book of Obadiah. "Fallen, I will arise" overturns the dire statements of Amos 5:12 over the "house of Israel . . . fallen, to rise no more"; "in darkness, the Lord is my light" reverses Amos 5:18: "day of the Lord . . . darkness and not light." Verse 10 is a filigree of customary formulas: "cover with shame" (Pss 35:26; 44:16; 89:46); "Where is the Lord?" (Pss 42:4, 11; 79:10; Joel 2:17); "trampled underfoot" (Isa 5:5; 7:25; 28:18). When we are numbed by pain and despair, we can only fall back upon customary or memorized prayers in order to discover thereby a new hope from the faith of our ancestors.

7:11-13 Now that the empire of David and Solomon is only a memory, hope transforms it into a new universal kingdom, to be achieved by God's mysterious power "from sea to sea." When the theology and legal system of postexilic Israel tended to become ever more narrow and exclusive, the liturgy drew upon memories to dream what God will do and so prepared for the universal apostolate of Christianity. Verse 12 is an allusion to the theme of the day of the Lord, derived from Amos as a time of overwhelming darkness for Israel (5:18) but in later tradition changed into a day of victory (Isa 11:10-11; 12). they shall come: The subject is left vague. Is it foreign countries coming to worship Yahweh? Or to pillage Jerusalem? Does "they" refer to the Diaspora Jews returning to Jerusalem from their homes in foreign countries? 7:13 land shall be a waste: Possibly this is the devastated appearance of Yehud (or Judah) upon the first return (see Haggai).

7:14-17 This prayer of confidence asks God to bring back the idyllic days "when you came from the land of Egypt." Mount Carmel is to the west, Bashan and Gilead to the east (see Amos 4:1). Nations shall stand or collapse in awe and subjugation, with their hands over their mouths (Judg 18:19; Isa 51:15) or licking the dust (Gen 3:14). This is ecumenism or universalism at its worst!

7:18-20 The opening phrase, literally "Who is God like you," may have inspired the name of this book—Micah. Yet the phrase is somewhat elaborate compared to Micah's short name ("who is like" God). Verse 18 is possibly a renewal of the covenant (Exod 34:1-9). 7:20 faithfulness . . . and grace: These words repeat the great virtues of the Mosaic covenant (see Hos 2:21-22; 4:1; Ps 89:2-3, 25, 34), which are seen to reach back to the patriarchs. Just as the mention of Miriam in 6:4 is rare in the Old Testament, the name of Abraham appears here in somewhat isolated splendor in the Hebrew Bible. Micah can look hopefully to the future because of his loyalty to tradition.

NAHUM

Carroll Stuhlmueller, C.P.

INTRODUCTION

Historical setting

Nahum, one of the most eloquent orators in the Bible, shouts, sings, and celebrates: "Nineveh is destroyed!," and he adds at once, with a play on his own name (Nahum means "the one consoled"): "Where can one find any to console her?" (3:7). For over three hundred years Assyria had controlled the Near Eastern world; the capital city had been Nineveh for over one hundred years (see the attention given to Nineveh in Gen 10:11-12). Assyria ruled by calculated terror and brutality (see the comments on Amos 2:16; 3:12), exacting heavy tribute, permitting no compromise nor repudiation of treaty, deporting entire populations, as in the case of the kingdom of Israel in 732 and 721 B.C.E., and moving new groups of people into the former territory. With clenched fist and fiery despair, people shouted at the silent skies: "How long, O Lord? Will you hide yourself forever?" (Ps 89:47), words still echoing in the New Testament: "How long will it be, O Master, . . . before you judge our cause and avenge our blood?" (Rev 6:10). Nahum's book is the Hallelujah chorus of triumphant relief. In his final verse he writes of Nineveh's destruction, "All who hear of this news of you clap their hands over you" (3:19). Details about the disintegration of Assyria are provided in the introduction to the Book of Zephaniah (p. 524).

Nineveh (in northern Iraq) was destroyed in 612 B.C.E. by a coalition of Babylonians (in southern Iraq) and Medes and Persians (in present-day Iran), with the help of smaller tribes. The leveling was so complete that when Xenophon passed by the site of Nineveh in 401 B.C.E., he was able to learn from the local inhabitants only that a great people had once occupied the site and had been destroyed (Anabasis, Bk. III, ch. IV, 10-12). Nahum composed this rhapsody of excitement and grandeur after 663 B.C.E., when Assyria captured and looted Egypt's sacred city of Thebes (see 3:8), probably after 627 B.C.E., when Babylon successfully revolted and achieved independence, but before the fall of Nineveh in 612 B.C.E.

Nahum writes so vividly that some claim that his native city of Elkosh was near Nineveh (where the Iraqi locate it today), but everyone even in far-off Judah knew about Nineveh, a city of 1800 acres with a population possibly as high as 288,000. A double line of fortifications lay to its east, the Tigris River to its west. The city had a circumference of eight miles, with moats sometimes 150 feet broad and colossal walls, some of whose ruins rise 25 to 60 feet above the surface today. While its armies cannibalized the world, its rulers patronized the arts. Ashurbanipal collected the "ancient classics," which provide entry for us today into the myths, folklore, religion, and legal systems of the area.

Style and theology

Nahum not only writes as an eyewitness of the destruction, but he also pretends to be inside the city in its last hours. In chapter 2 his sound pictures boom, with a two-beat cadence for alarm, a four-beat for marching, and a five-beat for wailing. His rhythm rumbles and rolls, leaps and flashes, like the horsemen and chariots in his poetry. If Nahum had written more, he would surpass Isaiah as the poet laureate of the Hebrew Bible.

His theology is focused upon one consuming topic: God does not tolerate injustice forever! Nahum draws upon the vocabulary of the "holy war," as it is called in Mic 3:5; Jer 6:4; Joel 4:9. Here the traditional oracle against the nations (see Isa 13–23; Jer 46–51; Ezek 25–32; Amos 1:3–2:16), always an exceptionally brilliant piece of writing, reaches white heat.

The book is subdivided as follows: 1:1, introduction; 1:2–2:1 (RSV, 1:2-15), hymn to Yahweh; 2:2-14 (RSV, 2:1-13), siege and capture of Nineveh; chapter 3, funereal epitaph.

COMMENTARY

INTRODUCTION

Nah 1:1

1:1 Unique among the prophets, Nahum's work is called a "book." Typical of other prophetical writings, his work is also designated a "vision" (Amos 7:12; Hab 1:1; Isa 1:1; 2:1; especially 13:1), stressing a unique revelation. Elkosh is a city some twenty miles southwest of Jerusalem.

HYMN TO YAHWEH

Nah 1:2–2:3

This section is textually disturbed; many translations, including the New American Bible, revise the order of verses, generally to systematize the persons addressed as "you" in 1:9–2:1; others seek to reconstruct better the alphabetic or acrostic poem at the beginning. Keeping verses 2-11 together (the New American Bible does not), we are able to arrive at an alphabetic sequence for most of the lines, including mem (the letter "M"), in which case the author stopped short of nun (the letter "N"), which would stand for Nineveh, a city not to exist any longer.

1:2-3a These verses draw principally upon Exod 34. While this chapter stresses the Lord's compassion, Nahum underlines the other theme, also present in a more muted way in Exod 34—the Lord's jealous revenge upon evildoers. Three times Nahum acclaims the Lord as "avenging"; the Hebrew for this word sounds almost like his own name. To be "jealous," in its etymological sense, means to love dearly and so to tolerate no rivals.

1:3b-8 The prophet refers to terrifying desert storms, particularly the fall sirocco. Nahum weaves into the picture the language of other storms in which Yahweh battles monstrous forces of evil, sometimes called by the names of pagan deities, as in Pss 74:13-14; 89:11-12; Isa 51:9-10. The names Bashan, Carmel, and Lebanon in verse 4 recall violent moments in nature (Amos 1:2; Ps 29:5) or moments of new peace (Mic 7:14; Ps 46). Just as the storm in Psalm 29 circles around the land of Israel to spend itself at Kadesh, Nahum allows a harbor of peace for Israel in verses 7-8.

1:9–2:3 Except for 2:2, these verses can be read more clearly by keeping in mind either the city Nineveh, addressed in verses 9, 10, 11, 14; 2:2, or the city of Jerusalem, described in verses 12-13 and 2:1; 2:3. This sophisticated procedure is forced upon us by the disturbed state of the Hebrew text. Verse 9 picks up the phrase "he . . . will make an end" from verse 8 and applies it specifically to Nineveh and adds a definitive end in verse 9c. In verse 11 "scoundrel" translates the Hebrew word belial, which comes from the root "to swallow" into the grave so that no descendants will be seen (v. 14; 2 Sam 22:5).

1:12 Speaking for the first time in his own name, the Lord assures Jerusalem, "I will humble you no more." Would that these words were true, for in 587 B.C.E. Jerusalem was not only to be humbled but even leveled to the ground by the Babylonians! Prophecy needs to be interpreted in its setting, at times according to the enthusiastic rhetoric of the speaker. In verse 13, again speaking to Jerusalem, Yahweh assures the city that the yoke of Assyria will finally be broken after more than a hundred years of oppression. Little wonder for the mighty relief, the prophetic eloquence, the angry jealousy.

2:1 This language will be taken up by Second Isaiah to announce the return from exile by "the bearer of good news" (Isa 40:9; 52:7). Celebrate your feasts: Some say the reference is the feast of Tabernacles, which later commemorated Yahweh as King and Creator at the new Jerusalem (Zech 14:16). Perhaps the interchange of speakers and addresses in this section may be explained by a ritual of blessing Judah and cursing the enemy, as we see in other biblical passages such as Num 22–24 and Joel 3–4. "The bearer of good news, announcing peace" in 2:1 ought to assuage our fear of ruthless warfare. The Hebrew for "bearer of good news" lies behind the Greek word for "gospel."

2:3 This verse foresees the restoration of the northern tribes, deported by Assyria in 733 and 721 B.C.E. Like Jer 31:1-22, it is one of the unfulfilled prophecies of the Hebrew Bible.

FALL OF NINEVEH

Nah 2:2, 4-14

These lines of attack (vv. 2, 4-6), conquest and looting (vv. 7-10), and mock lamentation (vv. 11-14) deserve first place in the hall of literary fame of biblical Hebrew. On a par with it are Ezekiel's extended image of shipwreck for the collapse of the seaport city of Tyre (Ezek 27) and Isaiah's hushed silence in Sheol as "Lucifer—the morning star" of Babylon enters "the recesses of the pit" (Isa 14:12-19).

2:2 After losing the battle in the approaches to the city, Nineveh girds itself for the fierce final assault. In quick succession and with abrupt commands the enemy sets up the battering rams and other machinery of war at key spots around the city; inside, the defenders are ordered to take their positions on the walls. For the importance of watchmen on the city walls, see 2 Sam 18:24-27 and Ezek 3:16-21; 33.

2:4-5 These verses describe by anticipation the presence of the enemy troops already within the city, or else the frenzied movement and countermovement within the city as parts of the city walls crumble under attack and emergency signals are sounded hither and thither.

2:7-10 These verses describe the collapse and plundering of the city, one of the wealthiest in the world, filled with the loot of world resources. The river gates are opened: This may refer to the river Choser, which entered the city at its northeast corner. The Medes and Babylonians may have dammed its water to empty some of the moats around the city in preparation for the moment when the dam was opened and a deluge of water crashed against the walls, flooding the city. Its muddy waters buried the palace treasuries. mistress . . . and her handmaids: These words signify the statue of the goddess Ishtar, "queen" of Nineveh, and the priestesses who serviced her fertility rites.

2:11-14 Wailing and judgment. The Hebrew of the opening lines sounds like the wind howling at night through a graveyard. Verse 12 is a cruel question when its only answer is "Nowhere!" The "lion" Assyria, which plundered the world and tore the flesh of its victims and dragged them away from their homeland for its own selfish pleasure and well-being, is "consumed in smoke." The oracle of judgment in verse 14 is spoken in the name of "the Lord of hosts" who went into battle (Exod 15; Num 10:35; 1 Sam 4:4-6; Ps 24:7-10), through his lieutenants, Cyaxares, king of the Medes, and Nabopolassar, king of Babylon.

ASSYRIA IS DESTROYED! CLAP THE HANDS!

Nah 3:1-19

While reflecting upon the fate of Assyria, this chapter is taut with excitement. It erupts with anger, smirks with pent-up revenge, moves with unbelievable cruelty, and ends with a clap of victory over the dying victim. To express one's fury this artistically, each sound and word had to be carefully crafted. Psychologically, anger has a necessary role in our life; nationally and internationally we badly need a way to release desperation and hatred and to be healed of our torturing scars; spiritually we have the inspired prophecy of Nahum. While not the height of perfection nor the only step leading to this height, it may be a necessary step somewhere along the way.

At best, it is a warning that the "Assyria" of any age and place, or the brutal despot within each of us, will not be tolerated by God. If we combine Nahum with other prophecies like that of Hosea or Jeremiah, the Bible recognizes a disciplinary or purifying power in the suffering that even "Assyria" endures.

This final chapter can be divided as follows: the siege and capture are relived (3:1-3); the guilty are punished (3:4-17); victory is celebrated over the dying tyrant (3:18-19).

3:4 Woe! This is a form of speech already encountered in Amos 5:7, 18; 6:1. Witchcraft was punished by death (Deut 18:9-12; 1 Sam 28:8-25).

3:5-7 Assyria, whose divine patroness, Ishtar, governed war and fertility with cruelty and licentiousness, is treated as a harlot (see Hos 2:4-15; Isa 47:1-3); in Assyrian law, an adulteress, found guilty, was stripped and handed over to anyone's pleasure. any to console? reverses Nahum's name, which means "the one consoled." Nineveh is compared to cities like No-Amon (religious name for Thebes), over four hundred miles south of Cairo, and to peoples allied with Egypt, such as the Ethiopians, Put (Somalia?), and the Libyans, conquered by Ashurbanipal and now an example of what is happening to Assyria.

3:11-13 The punishment of war includes accepting a place in enemy brothels just to stay alive.

3:18-19 Instead of ending with a pall of silence over the dying victim, Nahum calls for a final, triumphant clap of hands!

ZEPHANIAH

Carroll Stuhlmueller, C.P.

INTRODUCTION

Historical setting

Zephaniah breaks the prophetic silence that hung over Judah since Isaiah and Micah disappeared toward the end of Hezekiah's reign (715–686 B.C.E.). Hezekiah's son, Manasseh, reversed what seemed to be the hopeless anti-Assyrian policy of his father. Hezekiah and Jerusalem may have survived, but the rest of the countryside had been devastated and the country's resources depleted. Manasseh even introduced fertility rites into the Jerusalem temple (2 Kgs 21:7); "he immolated his son by fire" (2 Kgs 21:6). Rabbinical tradition holds that Isaiah was martyred at this time. Zephaniah may have been the first to speak out against such "abominable practices" (2 Kgs 21:2), early in the reign of Manasseh's grandson, Josiah (640–609 B.C.E.).

Several factors prepared the way: first, a conversion experience late in life for Manasseh (2 Chr 33:12-13); second, a strong movement by the "people of the land," with whom Micah had been associated, to revive ancient loyalties and morality (see introduction to Micah, p. 510). This group rose up to suppress a palace revolt that had assassinated Manasseh's son Amon (2 Kgs 21:24); the "people of the land" not only placed a legitimate heir of the Davidic line on the throne, but they also surrounded him with advisers who would eventually undertake the great "Deuteronomic reform" in 621 B.C.E. (2 Kgs 22:3–23:30). Still another condition not only made possible the revival of prophecy but also provided a setting of cosmic upheaval for Zephaniah's literary style, namely, the imminent collapse of the Assyrian Empire.

Even though the last great king of Assyria, Ashurbanipal (669–627 B.C.E.), had marched south into Egypt, captured its magnificent city Thebes, and profaned its most sacred temple in 663, the empire was heaving under symptoms of serious disease. Babylon revolted twice—the first time in 652, only to be cruelly brought back into line; the second time in 633, successfully. Coincidentally (?) King Josiah was publicly converted to the Lord in 633 B.C.E. In 629/28 Josiah began the purge of idolatrous worship across the land of Israel where Assyrian occupation forces were crumbling.

An eerie foreboding spread a mysterious suspense and a weird nostalgia over the Near East. The new twenty-sixth dynasty in Egypt revived many aspects of the age of pyramids, almost two thousand years earlier. Ashurbanipal had been gathering ancient documents at Nineveh and so made it possible for archeologists to recover them in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries A.D. Babylon began to use the Sumerian language in its official archives, thus reviving the initial dominant culture in southern Mesopotamia around 3000 B.C.E. Zephaniah's terrifying "day of the Lord" was a legitimate offspring of this world of colossal change, unbelievable upheavals, shifts of world power, dark clouds of war and destruction, and surprising rebirths from the ashes.

Zephaniah's announcement "A day of wrath is that day" (1:15), through Jerome's Latin Vulgate translation, provided the script for the famous composition of Thomas of Celano, Dies irae, dies illa (ca. 1250 A.D.), formerly sung or recited at Roman Catholic funeral masses. Zephaniah called for silence as before a solemn ritual (1:7), as princes and even royalty were tried and found guilty (1:8-9), to be driven away like chaff (2:2). Zephaniah's way of handling offenses enabled prophecy to take its first steps toward the apocalyptic style, more evident in such writings as Ezek 38–39 and fully developed in Dan 7–12.

The historical background of Zephaniah's preaching is to be located in the early years of King Josiah (640–609 B.C.E.), before his vigorous "Deuteronomic" reform (621–609 B.C.E.). Scholars once associated Zephaniah with a so-called Scythian raid which, according to the ancient historian Herodotus, swept through the Assyrian empire down into Syria and Israel around 630 B.C.E. Yet there is no corroborating evidence, and the opinion is now generally discounted. Josiah inherited not only the social injustices that Micah denounced but also the open idolatry of Manasseh's reign. Much like the Deuteronomic reform, Zephaniah focused only upon false and sensual worship and paid little attention to social injustices. Unlike Amos, Zephaniah was not a spokesperson for the poor; and unlike Micah, he never belonged to their ranks. The opening verse makes him a second cousin of King Josiah, and in 1:8 he speaks familiarly about "the king's sons." He was at home in Jerusalem (1:4, 10).

Style and structure

Stylistically, Zephaniah appears in a steady line of continuity with prophecy of the south. With Amos and Isaiah, he centers upon the remnant, the day of the Lord, sin and chastisement. Other phrases link him with Amos, for example "seek the Lord" (Amos 5:4-7, 14-15; Zeph 2:3) and the customary form of the curse (Amos 5:11; Zeph 1:13). There is scant evidence of stylistic elegance; the language is clear, correct, and sincere. We detect: little perception of the anguish of God, noticeable in Hosea and Micah (only Zeph 3:7a); no vignettes of the wealthy as in Amos, nor of the poor as in Micah; no echoes of the desert sounds that punctuate Amos' words, nor the agricultural landscape that adorns Hosea's preaching. Not even the sharp, bitter tones of satire are perceived here. Besides sincerity of heart and outrage over idolatry, Zephaniah manifests the booming sound of dissolution in the day of the Lord (see 1:14-16) and a courageous vigor to speak out even against royalty.

The plan of the book is what we will come to recognize as more and more typical of prophecy: oracles against Judah and Jerusalem (1:2–2:3); oracles against foreign nations (2:4-15); statement of hope or renewal (3:1-19).

COMMENTARY

INTRODUCTION

Zeph 1:1

Zephaniah's father is called Cushi, which is an Ethiopian name. Zephaniah refers to Ethiopians negatively in 2:12, but more positively in 3:10. While his father mixed African blood into Zephaniah's Israelite origins, his other ancestors reach back four generations to Hezekiah, very likely the king at Jerusalem. Zephaniah is the only prophet whose pedigree is recorded so extensively (normally only the father's name is provided), perhaps to offset the jealousy caused by his Ethiopian father. The name Zephaniah means "Yah(weh) protects or conceals" and was common enough (see Jer 21:11 and Zech 6:10-14).

SILENCE! THE FEARFUL DAY OF THE LORD

Zeph 1:2–2:3

This section can be subdivided for our better appreciation: a cosmic setting for the charges against Jerusalem (1:2-6); silence before the "liturgy" commences (1:7-13); the fearful day of the Lord (1:14-18); probation, perhaps, for the poor (2:1-3).

1:2-6 The opening verses direct our vista across the earth, as God sweeps away every sign of life; the story of creation in Gen 1–2 is told in reverse. Three times the Hebrew word for "sweep away" occurs, canceling out earlier promises expressed by this same word, as in Gen 8:21 after the great flood: "Never again will I sweep away the earth because of humankind." Zephaniah reneges on the benefits of the earth celebrated during the feast of Ingathering (Exod 23:16). Liturgy is no guarantee of happy results unless words and actions come from a sincere heart (see Hos 5:15–6:7).

Verses 4-6 explain why Yahweh, "a jealous God" (Exod 34:12-16), never tolerates what the same passage calls a "wanton worship" with sensual fertility rites and child sacrifice. the very names of his priests: The Hebrew text uses a rare word for "priests" (Hos 10:5; 2 Kgs 23:2), common in other Semitic languages; here it has the derogatory sense of "priestling." host of heaven: Assyrian deities (Jer 8:1-3; Ezek 8:16-18); Milcom: He was the god of the Ammonites, who inhabited Transjordan (1 Kgs 11:5); the Hebrew text refers to him under the name malcom ("their king"), poking ridicule at the king who tolerated such worship. Verses 5-6, particularly in the Hebrew, show how the people assuaged their conscience, for they also "adore the Lord"; these two-timers were long ago condemned by the prophet Elijah (1 Kgs 18:21).

1:7-13 This section opens with a call for silence in the final preparations for the liturgy of this "day of the Lord," once a time of light and joy, now a time of darkness and death (see Amos 5:18). The repetition of "day of the Lord" (vv. 7, 8, 9, 10) unites all other observations: "slaughter feast," not the animals for the sacred banquet but the inhabitants and worshipers; "foreign apparel" for the heathen ritual (2 Kgs 10:22); "leap over the threshold" superstitiously to avoid the demons there (1 Sam 5:5), yet acting deceitfully once inside the temple.

Different parts of Jerusalem are cited: "Fish Gate" (on the northwest—Neh 3:3); "New Quarter" (location uncertain); "hills" (reaching north, the area of any attack upon the city); "Mortar" (more to the south, at a "quarry," as the word means); "merchants" (or "Canaanites," if we keep the Hebrew word as a proper name), an area of Jerusalem for foreigners.

1:12 explore Jerusalem with a lamp: Like Diogenes in search of a single just person or of the wicked in their secret haunts of sin. thicken on their lees: Like undrawn wine, sweet and syrupy, such people are solicitous only for their bodily comfort. Verse 13 is from Amos 5:11 or from a repertoire of prophetic memories.

1:14-18 This Dies irae (see p. 525) receives its best commentary in the terrifying booming and rhythmic sound of the Hebrew words. One must listen to the Gregorian plainchant of the Dies irae to appreciate this plaintive but triumphant victory song of the grave.

2:1-3 Zephaniah recognizes a possibility—"perhaps" in verse 3—of shelter in the devastating day of the Lord for "the humble of the earth." Zephaniah inaugurates the long development of the theological meaning of humility, poverty, and lowliness as contained in the Hebrew word 'anawim. Some religious significance was already attached to the state of being economically poor or socially deprived (Prov 15:33; 18:12). Yet, Zephaniah recognizes these as the only ones to be saved. Military invaders executed the wealthy and powerful. During the Exile, Second Isaiah addresses all the people to be reassembled by God in their own land as poor and lowly (Isa 41:17). In the postexilic age, the promised savior is said to belong to the lowly (Zech 9:9). Still later some Jewish people deliberately embraced poverty as a godly way of life, as in the case of the Pharisees and also the covenanters along the Dead Sea (who were to produce the Dead Sea Scrolls). New Testament saints, like Mary, see in poverty an interior attitude of dependence upon God (Luke 1:48).

ORACLES AGAINST THE NATIONS

Zeph 2:4-15

For the meaning and scope of the oracles against the nations, see the commentary on Amos 1:3–2:16 (p. 489). While prompted more immediately by God's designs for punishing Israel, these sections signal God's control over foreign nations, a control that can eventually embrace their salvation. Zephaniah even states such a wild possibility at the end of verse 11 but seems to take it back in verse 15! Yet, even in verse 11 "ecumenism" is toward captured people (see Mic 7:16-17), different from the more open view in Mic 4:1-3 (yet, see Mic 4:4-5). The citation of nations moves from the western shore of Philistine territory to Moab and Ammon, east of the Jordan River and the Dead Sea, from south of Israel in Egypt, under the control of an Ethiopian dynasty (see 1:1), to the north, the route taken by Assyria to invade Israel.

AFTER REPENTANCE NEW HOPE

Zeph 3:1-20

Typical of Zephaniah's negative disposition, even the characteristically happy ending for prophecy starts with a renewed condemnation of leadership, civil and religious (vv. 1-5) and a reiteration of the destruction of the nations (vv. 6-8). Salvation is promised only to the remnant of the lowly (vv. 9-13); two psalms of rejoicing close the prophecy (vv. 14-18a; 18b-20).

3:1-5 These verses resound with themes and even lines heard elsewhere in prophecy. Verse 2a is found again in Jer 7:28; verse 4b, in Ezek 22:26. Condemnation of leaders, civil and religious, in quick succession was already heard in Mic 3:11 (see Jer 2:26). The object of this Woe! is Jerusalem. According to the Hebrew word in verse 2, the suffering is said to be disciplinary and corrective (see Isa 53:5). Verse 5 begins emphatically with "The Lord within her is just," in contrast to the other insolent leaders.

3:6-8 These verses intimate that a serious transition is underway. In a divine soliloquy (v. 7) we hear that Jerusalem will now accept the disciplinary correction repulsed in verse 2. 3:8 wait for me: Waiting upon the Lord is the prophetic posture for salvation, as in Hab 2:3 and Isa 30:15-18 before the Exile, or in Isa 40:31 during the Exile. I arise as accuser: The phrase might also be translated "as a witness." my decision to gather together: Here we meet the Hebrew word repeated negatively three times in 1:2-3, with the meaning "to sweep away," but now positively in Jerusalem's favor. 3:11 the earth be consumed: This should not be taken literally, for Jerusalem must survive! Texts like this one always need interpretation.

3:9-13 A strong transition appears here in the Hebrew text. In verse 9 a promise to "purify the lips," reminiscent of Isaiah at the time of his call (Isa 6:5) intends that the deceit and falsehood, as witnessed by Psalm 12, be removed. To "call upon the name of the Lord" (v. 9) imparts many rights and privileges, just as in the case of a child who can call someone mother or father. In verses 12-13 salvation is promised to "the remnant . . . a people humble and lowly." As mentioned in the commentary on 2:3, the humble are already on the way to being the assembly whom God saves as a special people. The Gospel of Matthew makes use of the Greek version of Zephaniah in recording Jesus' words to disciples to "Learn from me, for I am gentle and humble of heart" (Matt 21:29).

3:14-18a This first psalm, a hymn of praise, is ready to be sung "at festivals" (v. 18a). In many ways it reminds us of the many jubilant lines in Isa 40–55, particularly in chapters 40–48. Here we draw attention to a number of phrases that cluster again in Luke's presentation of the annunciation to Mary that she was to become the mother of Jesus: "Be glad," "The Lord is in your midst," "Fear not," "mighty savior" (see Luke 1:26-38). Mary, tabernacling Jesus within herself, is thus presented as the new Jerusalem, the model for the poor and lowly.

3:18b-20 As elsewhere in prophecy, the "lame" and the "outcasts" are assembled (see Mic 4:6-7), the very ones rejected from the temple, even if they were priests, by the legislation of the Torah (Lev 21:16-23). Verse 20 was probably added during the time of the Exile. As Israel is assembled, its salvation will strike the attention of "all the peoples of the earth," a hint that universal salvation is possible.

HABAKKUK

Carroll Stuhlmueller, C.P.

INTRODUCTION

Style

Habakkuk and Jeremiah inaugurate a new attitude in prophecy. Up until now, for the most part, prophecy consisted in delivering the oracle of God to Israel; now the prophet's question to God becomes for us the word of God, in some real yet mysterious way revealing God's word in our own challenge to God! Nothing as fully developed as this questioning style in Habakkuk and Jeremiah ever comes totally new. Here or there prophecy has been interrogating God, but never so extensively as to become the gist of the entire prophecy. Even Moses differed with God (Exod 32:11-14); and further back still, Abraham argued with God about the fate of the five cities (Gen 18:22-33). We find Amos putting a question to God in his first two visions (Amos 7:1-6). This style, however, will almost dominate the prophecy of Jeremiah, particularly in his famous confessions (Jer 12:1-5; 15:10-21; 17:14-18; 18:19-23; 20:7-18). In all these cases the starting point is a strong faith in God's fidelity; and at the end God closes the conversation when and how God wishes. God remains God!

Person

Little if anything is directly known about Habakkuk. The name never occurs again in the Hebrew Bible. The deuterocanonical section of the Book of Daniel refers to him as bringing some bread and boiled stew to Daniel in the lion's den at Babylon; this Habakkuk is carried by an angel, who seizes him by the crown of his head and afterward returns him to his own place (Dan 14:33-39), an episode generally considered a popular story of much later vintage. Some explain the name Habakkuk as the intensive form of a Hebrew word meaning "to embrace." Jewish tradition, other than the one in Dan 14, links the prophet with the childless woman at Shunem, to whom the prophet Elisha promised a child. The word "to embrace" occurs in the story (2 Kgs 14:8-37). Other scholars derive the prophet's name from a bulbous plant, known from an Assyrian root word but not found in the Bible. The Greek Septuagint adds to his name in 1:1, "son of Jesus of the tribe of Levi," an identification prompted, no doubt, by the liturgical poem in chapter 3.

Date

The prophecy is to be dated sometime after the Babylonians became an active threat against Judah but before their destruction of the city of Jerusalem in 587 B.C.E. Habakkuk's serious complaints about violent injustice among the people in Judah suggests sometime in the reign of Jehoiakim (609–597 B.C.E.), a king despised by Jeremiah for his abuse of power at the cost of much suffering by the poor and defenseless. Jeremiah declares that he will be given "the burial of an ass" (Jer 22:13-19; see also 2 Kgs 23:37). Certainly chapter 3 qualifies Habakkuk to be numbered among the "cult prophets," who functioned at the temple; chapters 1–2 may leave us some clues for a liturgical ceremony.

Themes

Several major religious motifs thread their way through the prophecy: God's absolute trustworthiness; God's control of the universe; our inability to understand adequately the mysterious ways of God; our failure to fathom the mysteries of the universe and the colossal struggles of nature and politics; God's determination not to tolerate violence, begotten by pride.

COMMENTARY

CROSS-QUESTIONING GOD

Hab 1:2–2:5a

This section consists of a double series of question and lament (1:2-4 and 12-17), each followed by an oracle or reply from God (1:5-11 and 2:1-5a). Such question-answer style follows a pattern that surfaces in some psalms of lament and supplication (see Pss 12; 45; 79). Doubts arise, however, if King Jehoiakim would have permitted Habakkuk, any more than he did Jeremiah, to speak in the temple against the country (Jer 26). Verses 2-4 of chapter 1 place the theme and two key words of Habakkuk before us: the question Why? (vv. 3 and 13b) and the situation of violence (1:2, 3, 9; 2:8, 17). Why does a God who "comes forth to save [the] people" (3:13) tolerate violence against the innocent? 1:4 the law (torah) is benumbed: What the prophecies of Micah and Isaiah see streaming down from the temple mount (Mic 4:1-3; Isa 2:2-4) is silenced by "leaders [who] render judgment for a bribe" (Mic 3:11).

1:5-11 God's reply is: "I am raising up Chaldea," that is, the Babylonians, who will punish Jerusalem's wicked leaders, civil and religious. From the beginning of Israel's occupation of the land of Canaan, god is said to have summoned other nations to punish the people for their sins. This theme preoccupies the Book of Judges, whose introduction offers a theological explanation: the abundance of good things induces Israel to sin; sin brings weakness and military invasion; such sorrow moves Israel to pray to God, who sends a "judge," or military leader, to liberate them; and a new prosperity sets in, almost so that the cycle can repeat itself (Judg 2:6–3:6).

Prophecy gradually recognized a more positive attitude toward the nations: in Amos 1:3–2:16 God cares enough to punish them for their offenses against humanity (they are not judged according to the Torah), and in Isa 10:5-15 they are "my rod in anger," directly called as God's instrument in determining the long-term fate of Israel. Only much later does prophecy consider the nations to have a share in Israel's light and salvation (Isa 49:6). Habakkuk's statement is an important link in this development of an ever more positive regard toward the foreigner.

Verses 8-11 reflect the swift maneuvering and sudden success of the Babylonian forces. In verse 11 we encounter the problem of translating the Hebrew word either as "wind" (NAB) or as "spirit" (see the commentary on Mic 2:11, p. 514). In the latter case the same line could read: "[God's] spirit passed by and so he [King Jehoiakim] passed onward" and continued to reign as king. Even though Jehoiakim was installed by the Egyptians, he was wily enough to win the approval of the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar.

1:12-17 God's answer is unacceptable, not because Habakkuk lacks faith, but rather because his faith in God is pure, strong, and elevated. Why does a God who is "from eternity . . . holy . . . immortal . . . a Rock . . . pure . . . [compassionate toward] misery . . . gaze on the faithless in silence while the wicked man devours one more just than himself" (vv. 12-13)? The Babylonians are more wicked than the wicked leaders of Jerusalem. 1:12 immortal: This verse contains a scribal correction. The Hebrew reads literally "you do not die," but since it seemed improper to associate death in any way with Yahweh, the Hebrew text was changed in its written form to "we do not die"!

1:13 devours: The word implies a voracious, even ruthless, appetite. The earth swallowed the Egyptians (Exod 15:12); the fish swallowed Jonah (Jonah 2:1); the Lord "destroys (literally "swallows up") death forever" (Isa 25:7).

1:14-17 Habakkuk strengthens his case against the Chaldeans: they undo God's work of creation by treating human beings like fish and animals (vv. 14-15); they offer up ritual sacrifice to their instruments of war (v. 16).

2:1-5a The Lord's reply is elegantly introduced as awaited from a "guard post" or watchtower (Hos 9:8; Mic 7:7; Isa 21:6-21; Ezek 3:17-21; 33). Already the importance of waiting is stressed. The prophet feels an obligation to find an answer for his troubling questions. He has not only a heritage to guard but a present responsibility to discharge.

The Lord's answer is immediate and clear, so precise that it is to be written down (a rare command for a prophet who at best dictated, as in Jer 36, or confided to disciples, as in Isa 8:16) in letters so large as to be read on the run, and so consoling that one runs with eagerness to report it ("run" is the emphatic word here). Verse 3 stresses the need to wait with patience, for it will come true at the "end"—the Hebrew word here does not mean "fulfillment" (see Dan 8:19; 11:27, 35; 12:4).

2:4 the just man, because of his faith, shall live: The word "just" stresses the fulfillment in oneself of the Lord's promises (see Hos 2:21-22; Zech 9:9); "faith" puts the emphasis upon fidelity, sturdiness (Exod 34:5-8); "lives," while the faithless are reduced to silent inactivity (Isa 14:15-20; 38:18-19). Wealth . . . is treacherous; the proud, unstable: These words reverse the idea of faith or sturdiness in the preceding line and link with verse 4a about the rash person without integrity. Verse 4b becomes the keystone in Paul's theology of the justification of all people by faith in Jesus, whether they have been initiated into the Mosaic covenant or not (Rom 1:17; Gal 3:11); the letter to the Hebrews links the passage with the need for patience, (Heb 10:37-38). The commentary on Habakkuk found in the Dead Sea Scrolls refers the passage to "those who fulfill the law in the house of Judah, whom God will free at the tribunal of justice on account of their labors and their faith in the Teacher of righteousness [their founder]."

ORACLES OF WOE

Hab 2:5b-20

These five oracles of woe do not name any foreign nation; in many ways they address the evils within Judah at the time of Habakkuk. Yet, because of the familiar way of editing prophetic books (oracles or sermons against Israel or Judah, followed by oracles against nations), and because the crimes in the first and fourth oracle seem to be on an international scale, this section is frequently entitled "Oracles Against the Nations." No clear pattern emerges in the five oracles, except for the format of: (a) Woe! with a statement of offenses; (b) the Hebrew word ki at the beginning of verses 8, 11, 14, 17, introducing a punishment. Yet verse 14 is not a punishment, and there are other verses out of step!

Woes such as these already occurred in a major section of Amos (5:7, 18; 6:1) and appear elsewhere in prophetic literature in a series of judgments and condemnation only in Isaiah. The style is more common in the Torah (Deut 27–28) and in sapiential books. The section here is subdivided: introduction (vv. 5b-6a); five woes (vv. 6b-19); conclusion (v. 20).

The introductory verses (vv. 5b-6a) stress the unquenchable appetite of death. The inhabitants in the nether world, the foreign nations, take up a taunt against Judah (or Assyria? or Babylon?) in a way similar to their satire against Babylon in Isa 14. The words "satire" and "epigrams," again in Mic 2:4 and Jer 24:9, indicate a message of general import, worthy of serious study.

Verses 6b-8 attack unjust and greedy ways of lending to others (Ps 15:4-5; Exod 22:25; Amos 2:6-8). Verses 9-11 are directed against proud and heartless wealthy people who construct spacious homes, whose "stone in the wall shall cry out" against them with the groaning of the poor and destitute (see Jer 22:13-19 against King Jehoiakim, who "works his neighbor without pay" as he constructs his "airy rooms" and cedar-paneled walls). Verses 12-14 speak against building "a city by bloodshed" (Mic 3:10 has identical words and even names the city), perhaps a reference to the unnecessary bloodshed in the cities of the Shephelah, or low-lying hills where Micah lived, pillaged by foreign troops because of the reckless and selfish policies of Jerusalem. Verse 14 seems to be a familiar refrain; it occurs also in Isa 11:9. Verses 15-17 might reflect the violent forms of sensuality and war among the Assyrians and their allies whose fertility rites entailed drunkenness and nakedness (see Gen 9:20-25) and who deserved the cup of the Lord's wrath (see Obad 16; Isa 51:17; Jer 25:15). Verses 18-19 rail against idolatry. Verse 20, the conclusion, prepares for the liturgical prayer by placing us silently in the Lord's holy temple.

CANTICLE

Hab 3:1-19

This final canticle moves with the momentum of Israel's most ancient hymns, like the Song of Moses in Exod 3, of Deborah in Judg 5, again of Moses in Deut 32, or the magnificent Psalm 68. Dramatic moments in Israel's history are told against a background of cosmic upheavals, so fiercely does Yahweh battle for the safety and well-being of the people. Even though quite different in style from chapters 1–2, this canticle could have come from Habakkuk. Yet the links are somewhat fragile. If not only 1:2-5 but also 2:5b-20 were directed against Judah's religious-civil establishment, then it is difficult to accept Habakkuk's authorship of chapter 3 with its friendly reference to the king or "anointed one" in 3:13.

3:1 Similar to many psalms, the canticle is introduced with a "title," with liturgical indications. Prayer: The Hebrew word, repeated five times in the psalms, indicates a supplication or lament, which this canticle or hymn of praise is not! Is this word a rubric, adapting the canticle to the more normal style of the prophecy of Habakkuk? a plaintive tune: This Hebrew word, often left untranslated, is not found elsewhere in the Bible, but because of a similar Babylonian word, it is considered a plaint or lament.

3:2 This introductory verse reminds us of the opening stanza to Ps 44:2-9, "O God, our ears have heard, our ancestors have declared to us . . . ." God is asked to remember (that is, repeat) the great redemptive acts from Israel's origins. "In the course of the years" indicates Israel's optimistic openness to the future, but also a real ennui with the length of time involved.

3:3-7 The poet's gaze sweeps from Teman and Paran, Cushan and Midian, an area to the far south where the Negeb turns into the Sinai desert; other songs like Judg 5 and Psalm 68 recognize the Lord coming up from here at the head of a victorious people: fear (symbolized by pestilence and plague) and earth-shattering victories accompany the journey into the Promised Land. Similar imagery is used in Psalm 46 to prepare for a temple liturgy at Jerusalem.

3:8-15 Yahweh's victory over world forces is told with imagery from Canaanite mythology as found already in Pss 29; 77:14-20 (introduced also by "remember" in verse 12); 89:6-19. Verse 15 seems to refer to the Lord's triumph at the Red Sea and the Jordan River (Psalm 114). Only in verses 16-20 does the element of lament for a plaintive tune (v. 1) appear. Yet the canticle may be using "fear" more as a literary device, as in verse 2, to communicate a sense of awe at what the Lord will do to "the people who attack" (v. 16). "In the course of the years" Israel must turn to the Lord and live in faith (2:4b), and if victory is delayed, must wait for it (2:3b). In verse 16b "decay" can just as correctly be translated "trembling."

Verses 18-19 begin emphatically in the Hebrew, with the meaning "But I, on the contrary." Verse 19bc is very similar to Ps 18:34, a psalm with which the canticle of Habakkuk shares other stylistic features. The psalmist moves with the swift and victorious step of the Lord. The final line, "For the leader; with stringed instruments," is a liturgical rubric, also found at the beginning of many psalms. That liturgical notes are part of the inspired word of God shows that the way in which a later generation used the canticle in its worship belonged to the essential inspiration of the psalm; the psalm will not release its full meaning until it is relived liturgically, as the opening lines of this canticle pray.

EZEKIEL AND DANIEL

Toni Craven

INTRODUCTION

Outline of contents

The Book of Ezekiel is an orderly five-part collection or anthology of writings by the prophet and his followers. Chapters 1–3 tell of the prophet's call; chapters 4–24 contain prophecies about the fate of Jerusalem before its fall in 587 B.C.E.; chapters 25–32 are prophecies against the foreign nations; chapters 33–39 encourage the hope of restoration after the fall of Jerusalem; and chapters 40–48 present a vision of the new temple and the restoration of the cultic and political life of the people in the land of Israel.

The Book of Daniel is a three-part collection containing short stories written by unknown authors about Daniel and his companions (chs. 1–6; and the deuterocanonical Greek chs. 13–14) and apocalyptic visions written in the first person and fictitiously attributed to Daniel (chs. 7–12).

Kind of literature

Form and content define the literary type or genre of Ezekiel as prophetic literature (with some apocalyptic sections, notably chs. 38–39), and Daniel as both edifying short story and apocalyptic vision.

Prophetic literature

Ezekiel, like the other classical Old Testament prophets, is a passionate, uncompromising spokesperson for God. He announces words of judgment and encouragement to his particular community as it faces a crisis in its religious and political existence. Ezekiel makes the sixth-century Jewish community in Judah and Babylon mindful of its false hope in Jerusalem and its false despair after the fall of the city in 587 B.C.E. In a variety of ways, including visions (see chs. 1–3; 8–11; 37; 40–48), symbolic actions that concretely dramatize the message (see chs. 4–5), allegories (symbolic stories with an interpretation, see ch. 16), and judgment speeches (often introduced by the oracle formula "thus says Yahweh" and closed with the recognition formula "that you may know that I am Yahweh"), Ezekiel calls for individual responsibility, repentance, and submission to the sovereignty of God. He does not predict a timetable for the distant future, though he does give voice to a poetic vision of a community restored, for the sake of the divine name, to a new national identity in a new and restored Israel.

Edifying short story

Like Ruth, Esther, Tobit, and Judith, parts of the Book of Daniel (chs. 1–6; 13–14) are self-contained short stories with distinct beginnings, middles, and endings. The nine narratives in Daniel are tales of biblical heroes who cope successfully with difficulties, survive the terrible oppression, and in the end triumph gloriously. In an entertaining fashion, the stories teach that good prevails over evil and that God rewards faithfulness. Daniel, Shadrach, Meshach, Abednego, and Susanna are portrayed as inspiring models of courage and virtue.

Apocalyptic literature

A kind of literature that flourished from 200 B.C.E. to 100 B.C.E. (see, for example, Isa 24–27; Ezek 38–39; Dan 7–12; Joel 3; 2 Esd; Rev), apocalyptic (Greek for "unveiling," "uncovering," or "revelation") works always contain some revelation of information hidden from ordinary human understanding. Through the medium of angels, visions, and bizarre symbolism, special knowledge is revealed. In the Book of Daniel, the special revelations in chapters 7–12 take the form of a kind of resistance literature that encouraged those experiencing persecution under Antiochus IV to persevere because the end of the time of tribulation was at hand. These apocalyptic predictions about the exact time of God's intervention and the heavenly events accompanying the establishment of the divine kingdom on earth are unique in the Old Testament (compare the New Testament Book of Revelation).

Geographical and historical background

Babylon, which was over 750 miles from Jerusalem, is the presumed geographical setting for Ezekiel and much of Daniel. Both books refer to the Babylonian Exile and the fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C.E. to Nebuchadnezzar. This traumatic event occurred during the lifetime of Ezekiel; for the authors of Daniel it was a remembered event that served as a springboard for their veiled discussions of the repressive rule of Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–163 B.C.E.).

Four centuries separated the composition of the books of Ezekiel (sixth century B.C.E.) and Daniel (second century B.C.E.). Ezekiel described the Exile prophetically as an occasion that demanded the conversion of a sinful, rebellious people and their acquiring of a "new heart" (Ezek 36:26). Daniel interpreted the Exile retrospectively as a time in which heroes of faith successfully resisted religious and political oppression. In Daniel, the Exile and the subsequent dominion of the Persians and the Greeks were understood apocalyptically as signs of promised reward for those who also resisted oppression and patiently awaited God's dramatic transformation of the course of history.

Historical outline

The major dates, events, and personages associated with the Books of Ezekiel and Daniel are summarized in the following historical outline.

B.C.	EGYPT	PALESTINE	MESOPOTAMIA
		THE BABYLONIAN EMPIRE	BABYLONIA
		Jehoiachin (Jeconiah), 3 mos., 598–597	Nebuchadnezzar, 605–562
		First Deportation to Babylonia, 597
	Apries (Hophra), 589–570	Zedekiah (Mattaniah), 597–587
		FALL OF JERUSALEM SECOND DEPORTATION, 587
		BABYLONIAN EXILE Ezekiel, c. 593–573
			Nabonidus, 556–539 (his son: Belshazzar)
			RISE OF PERSIA Cyrus II, 550–530
			Defeat of Media, c. 550
600 to 500			Invasion of Lydia, c. 546
		(Second Isaiah, c. 540)	FALL OF BABYLON, 539
		Edict of Cyrus, 538

B.C.	EGYPT	PALESTINE	MESOPOTAMIA
		THE EMPIRE OF PERSIA
	Conquest by Persia, 525	THE RESTORATION JUDAH Return of exiles Rebuilding of Temple, 520–515 (Haggai) (Zechariah)	Cambyses, 530–522 Darius I, 522–486
500 to 400	Egypt under Persian rule, 525–401	(Malachi, c. 500–450) Ezra's mission, 458(?) Nehemiah arrives, 445 Ezra's mission, c. 428(?)	Persia Xerxes I (Ahasuerus), 486–465 Artaxerxes I (Longimanus), 465–424 Xerxes II, 423 Darius II, 423–404
		Ezra's mission, c. 398(?)	Artaxerxes II (Mnemon), 404–358) Artaxerxes III, 358–338 Arses, 338–336 Darius III, 336–331
		EMPIRE OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT, 336–323
400 to 300	Ptolemaic Kingdom	Egyptian Control	Seleucid Kingdom (Mesopotamia and Syria)
	Ptolemy I, 323–285		Seleucus I, 312/11–280
300 to 200	Ptolemy II, 285–246 Ptolemy III, 246–221 Ptolemy IV, 221–203	Egyptian Control	Antiochus I, 280–261 Antiochus II, 261–246 Seleucus II, 246–226 Seleucus III, 226–223 Antiochus III, 223–187
200 to 100	Ptolemy V, 203–181 Ptolemy VI, 181–146 Ptolemy VII, 146–116	Syrian Conquest, 198–200 MACCABEAN REVOLT, 168 (167) Judas, 166–160 Jonathan, 160–143 Simon, 143–134 John Hyrcanus, 134–104 Conquest of Shechem, 128	Seleucus IV, 187–175 Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), 175–163 Antiochus V, 163–162 Demetrius I, 162–150 Alexander Balas, 150–145 Demetrius II, 145–138 Antiochus VI, 145–141 Antiochus VII, 138–129
100 to A.D.	Roman Conquest, 30	Pompey captures Jerusalem, 63	Roman occupation of Syria, 63
		THE EMPIRE OF ROME

The historical outline above is taken from: Bernhard W. Anderson, Understanding the Old Testament, © 1986, pp. 650, 651. Reprinted by permission of Prentice-Hall, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey.

COMMENTARY: EZEKIEL

PART I: CALL OF THE PROPHET

Ezek 1:1–3:27

The opening chapters ascribe this book to Ezekiel ben-Buzi, who had an extraordinary vision in Babylon in the year 593 B.C.E. According to the sixteen dates attached to the book, he remained active as a prophet at least until 571 B.C.E. (see the last dated oracle in 29:17). We know little about this man except that he was married and that his wife died during the siege of Jerusalem (see 24:15-18).

It is generally assumed that Ezekiel was exiled from Judah to Babylon in the first deportation of 597 B.C.E. Together with other exiles skilled in crafts, commerce, and agriculture who settled in Tel-abib, Nippur, and Babylon itself, Ezekiel took up residence in an alien land. On the banks of a river in Babylon, Ezekiel saw a vision which convinced him that God called him to speak as a prophet to the exiles.

The strange imagery of the opening chapters poetically dramatizes a new vision of God's mobile holiness suitable to the difficult times of the Exile. Ezekiel is called to submit his life to the majesty of God and is commissioned to speak a harsh word of judgment and warning to the rebellious people of Israel. The prophet is commanded to eat a scroll covered with lamentation and woe (2:9-10) and to stand as a watchman or pastor over the house of Israel.

1:1-28 The vision: God on the cherubim. Two superscriptions open the book. In the first (v. 1), Ezekiel recounts his visionary experience by the Babylonian river Chebar. In the second (vv. 2-3), the collector of his words and deeds provides information about the beginning of the prophet's career, his name, family, and position in Israelite society.

The reference in the first superscription (v. 1) to the "thirtieth year" is an enigma. The date cannot refer to either of the kingships that might have influenced Ezekiel. More than thirty years had passed from the beginning of the reign of Nabopolassar of Babylonia in 626 B.C.E., and less than thirty years had passed from the beginning of the reign of Josiah of Jerusalem in 621 B.C.E. (2 Kgs 22:23). Though interpreters have variously taken the "thirtieth year" as a reference (1) to the age of the prophet (according to Num 4:30, the minimum age for ordination was thirty), (2) to the date when Ezekiel first published his work, or (3) to thirty years from the time when the high priest Hilkiah found the book of the law in the temple during the reign of Josiah (2 Kgs 22:8ff.), no satisfactory explanation of this date has been discovered. It is even said that the ancient rabbis forbade persons under thirty to read the opening of this book lest they be led astray by Ezekiel's strange vision.

Also problematic is the incomplete date in the second superscription (v. 2). It refers to the year 593 B.C.E., but it does not specify a particular month. Both the first and the second superscriptions specify the fifth day, but neither contains full reference to a year, a month, and a day.

Verse 3 is a kind of heading found frequently in prophetic books (compare Hos 1:1; Joel 1:1; Mic 1:1; Zeph 1:1; Jer 1:2-3). Although syntactically the word "priest" in verse 3 can refer to either Ezekiel or his father Buzi, the phrase has traditionally been interpreted as an indication that Ezekiel was a priest in Jerusalem before he was called to be a prophet in Babylon. Actually, there is no information in the text about Ezekiel's homeland, although it seems highly probable that he came from Jerusalem with the first exiles deported to Babylon in 597 B.C.E.

The vision of Ezekiel is the most detailed account available to us of the call of a prophet. It is similar in many details to Isaiah's call and commissioning (Isa 6), like Jeremiah's call (Jer 1:9-10) in the one respect of the eating of the scroll, and clearly related to the type of call known from the vision of Micaiah (1 Kgs 22). Ezekiel's call combines an earthly setting with a heavenly vision. Like Isaiah and Micaiah, Ezekiel sees God seated on a throne. Ezekiel is near the river Chebar, a canal along the Euphrates River in the vicinity of Babylon, when the heavens are opened and he sees a strange and dazzling vision of God's majesty. It is in the land of exile that "the hand of the Lord came upon" the prophet (v. 3).

---

Parts of this commentary on the Book of Ezekiel were prepared as a co-authored revision of Walter Harrelson's Interpreting the Old Testament (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston) and are used with permission.

Ezekiel sees a great cloud with fire flashing about it swept along from the North. Within the cloud a bronze object appears. As the cloud draws nearer, strange living creatures are distinguishable, each with straight, human-like legs and hands, feet like those of calves, four wings, and four faces (one of a human, one of a lion, one of a bull, one of an eagle). With one pair of wings each figure modestly covers its body (compare Isa 6:2). The tips of the other pair of wings join the four figures together, so that they shield the object they carry in their midst. The motion of their wings makes a deafening sound, and flaming torches, burning coals, and fire dart out from behind the creatures. Ezekiel sees four wheels, one beside each of the beings (possibly a later expansion of the vision—1:15-21). And looking upward, he sees a firmament (a kind of platform), upon which is a throne. On the throne is a likeness of a man, although the fire and the gleaming bronze make it impossible for Ezekiel to see this figure clearly. The brilliant colors of the rainbow mark the entire scene, and its splendor overwhelms the prophet.

Ezekiel describes the strange details of his experience with care. In the midst of the cloud he sees something that gleams "like" electrum (v. 4). Within the cloud he sees figures "resembling" four living creatures (v. 5), whose four faces are "like" burning coals of fire (v. 13), and over their heads something "like" a crystal firmament (v. 22). He hears something "like" the sound of water, "like" the voice of the Almighty (v. 24). Above the firmament, on something "like" a sapphire throne, is one who has the "appearance" of a man (v. 26), who gleams from the waist up and looks "like" fire from the waist down (v. 27). Such, says Ezekiel, is the vision of the "likeness" of the glory of Yahweh (v. 28). Though this vision is not easily comprehended, it is clearly a sign that God has not abandoned the people. In the land of exile, where the ruling nation honors other gods, Yahweh comes to call a prophet for the community. The Jerusalem temple is over 750 miles away, but Yahweh's relationship to the covenant people continues.

(Fourteen passages in the Book of Ezekiel have been rearranged in the New American Bible translation. To alert the reader to these changes when they occur, comments like the one that follows will be enclosed in brackets.)

[This first chapter is one of the most difficult to translate in the entire Old Testament. The New American Bible translation deletes verses 14, 21, and 25 and transposes the order of the verses that describe what Ezekiel first sees as the stormwind approaches (notice that the text reads 7, 10, 9, 12, 8, 11, 13). The deletions are made on the grounds that certain verses repeat information already given. The transpositions are seemingly made to keep like descriptions together. In the Hebrew text, mixed gender references to the living creatures complicate translation. In verse 5 the references are grammatically feminine, and the New American Bible sensitively translates "their form was human." In verses 7-8 all the references are masculine. Since the New American Bible inserts verses 10, 9, and 12—in which grammatical vacillations are extreme—between verses 7 and 8, the reference to the faces of the creatures in verse 10 is translated "like . . . the face of a man." The Jerusalem Bible better translates, "As to what they looked like, they had human faces" (1:10a). Similar ambiguities occur in verses 23-25, and again the New American Bible reorders and omits certain verses for the sake of smooth reading.]

2:1-3:15 Eating of the scroll. The Israelites who have been taken into exile are to learn that in the alien land "a prophet has been among them" (2:5). Those who have given up hope in the Lord's guidance and who are ready to make a new life for themselves in the land of exile are reminded that even in an alien land God calls them to fidelity. Those who fix their hopes upon the homeland and expect God's deliverance to come from there are assured that God's purpose for the covenant people can be accomplished wherever the people may be. In short, God's active presence in exile is the fundamental import of Ezekiel's vision. In response to the greatly varied hopes and fears of the exiled community, the chief message of the vision is that the Lord is still with the people. Exile in Babylon does not put them outside the range of either God's mercy or God's judgment.

The words heard by Ezekiel (ch. 2) are strange and vague. He is addressed as "son of man" (2:1), an address that occurs over eighty times in this book and is regularly best translated as "human being" or "man" (compare Ps 8:5, where "man" and "son of man" are synonymous terms). In the Book of Daniel (7:13-14), this phrase refers to a special human figure who receives the heavenly gift of dominion. And in the Gospels "son of man" refers variously to a coming heavenly judge and savior; to sayings about the suffering, death, and resurrection of Jesus; or simply to Jesus himself. But in the Book of Ezekiel, "son of man" is used as an address that contrasts Ezekiel's human frailty with God's divine majesty.

God summons Ezekiel to stand up (2:1) and then commissions him to speak a prophetic word (2:4) to the Israelites. Repeatedly God says that the covenant people are a "rebellious house" (see vv. 3, 5, 6, 7, 8), but God does not explain what wrong the people have done. Ezekiel is not told what he is to say to these rebellious people, only that he must speak what God commands whether they heed or resist the message. The prophet is not to fear the looks or the words of the people (2:8) but is to obediently speak the word that God will put into his mouth (2:9). Then the prophet sees a hand extended from the midst of the fiery throne. In the hand is a scroll with terrible words written upon it, front and back (2:10). He is told to eat the scroll, does so, and finds that the scroll is as sweet as honey (3:1-3). Like Jeremiah (Jer 1:9) and Moses (Deut 18:18), Ezekiel is commanded to speak the words that the Lord has put into his mouth (3:4).

Ezekiel is reminded (as was Jeremiah, ch. 1) that the people are stubborn and will not heed the divine message (3:5-11). He is to persist, however, in speaking, letting nothing deter him from his task. He is to say, "Thus says the Lord God" (3:11), whether or not the people listen to his words. Though commissioned to speak the divine word, Ezekiel delivers no oracle until chapter 6. Instead, in the opening chapters of the book he tells how the Lord, seated upon a throne-chariot, came to him in a resplendent vision, how a hand unrolled before him a scroll with "woes, mourning, and lamentation" written upon it, and how he ate the word that the Lord God brought to him on the banks of the river Chebar in the land of Babylon.

Some interpreters believe that the vision of the throne-chariot and the giving of the scroll are two separate acts on two different occasions. They argue that the vision came to Ezekiel during the Exile in Babylon, while the giving of the scroll occurred when he was still in Jerusalem, prior to the Exile. In the present text, however, the two acts are part of one event. In exile, Ezekiel has seen a powerful vision of God that brings to him a divine word and symbolic authorization to speak God's word to the rebellious house of Israel.

The effect of the experience upon Ezekiel is now reported (3:12-15). Hearing the loud rumblings of the departure of the living creatures and the glory of the Lord behind him, the prophet is transported by the spirit from the site of the vision to Tel-abib, one of the exilic settlements beside the river Chebar. For seven days he sits among the exiles, overwhelmed and unable to speak.

3:17-21 The prophet as watchman. The solemn portrayal of the prophet as a special mediator of God's word for the people (ch. 3) relates to other passages in the book (chs. 14, 18, 33). Ezekiel's charge in 3:17-19 to warn the wicked for both their sake and his own is identical with that in 33:7-9. Chapter 33 marks an important shift of emphasis in Ezekiel's prophecies after the fall of Jerusalem in 587 from words of judgment to words of hope. It is likely that later editors of the Ezekiel tradition inserted this passage about the prophet as watchman in the opening section of the book in order to indicate that from the start Ezekiel was appointed to protect the covenant people, to watch over Israel, to turn the evildoer from evil and to confirm the righteous in righteousness. Implicit in this passage about the prophet as a lookout is a break with the narrow idea that the sins of the people in former times have brought God's judgment upon the present generation.

Especially after the fall of Jerusalem, Ezekiel was concerned with convincing the people that they must not interpret God's actions in this way. Each individual stands before the present claim of the covenant God. The prophet is charged with seeing that the individual who is condemned for faithlessness hears the word of condemnation. Though the faithless person is individually responsible for breaking the covenant, Ezekiel, too, will be punished if that person is not warned. In discharging his prophetic responsibility, Ezekiel will save his own life, and each person who heeds his warnings will also live (v. 21). The treatment of chapter 33 will enable us to see more clearly what the brief oracle in chapter 3 means.

3:22-27 Ezekiel's dumbness. This passage, like the preceding one about the prophet as a lookout, seems to belong to a time later in the prophet's career. The portrayal of the prophet as one unable to speak freely (v. 26) contradicts the sentiment of earlier passages in which Ezekiel is commissioned as God's spokesperson (2:4 and 3:4). Later in the book (24:17-23 and 33:22), a period of symbolic silence is observed by the prophet shortly before the fall of Jerusalem.

The scene portrayed in 3:22-27 (the restraining of the prophet by the people after he returned from his overwhelming encounter with the Lord) may be a symbolic act, or it may be an actual occurrence. If it is a symbolic act, its meaning is that the population in Judah will shortly be invaded, bound, and led captive into exile. Perhaps it did happen that the people restrained the prophet, thinking him to have gone mad, and that Ezekiel interpreted this act as a sign of the people's refusal to hear him and as a sign of the coming captivity of Judah. Most likely, however, 3:17-21 and 3:22-27 were later editorial additions.

PART II: BEFORE THE SIEGE OF JERUSALEM

Ezek 4:1–24:27

Chapters 4–24 record the actions and words of Ezekiel before the fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C.E. These first six years of Ezekiel's prophetic career, according to the highly edited chronology of the final form of the book, were directed to calling the people who remained in Judah as well as those in Babylon to right knowledge of God. In symbolic acts, allegorical stories, visions, parables, and judgment speeches, Ezekiel describes the imminent, irrevocable doom about to befall the chosen people on account of their idolatrous behavior. They have profaned God's holiness by turning to false gods and false prophets, and there can be no peace for them.

The divine presence has been so badly profaned in Jerusalem that in 592 B.C.E. (see 8:1), five years before the temple is to be destroyed, Ezekiel sees the glory of the Lord abandon the temple, moving first to the main entrance of the temple (10:2-4), then to the east gate (10:18-19), and finally to the Mount of Olives (11:22-23; relocated in the New American Bible to the end of chapter 10). The place of the divine presence becomes a scene of divine judgment. And Ezekiel voices God's indictment of the people for their failure to live according to the ethical requirements of the law. In his attempt to call the people back to God, the prophet speaks out against false prophets, calls for personal responsibility, and retells the disastrous history of Israel, tracing Israel's infidelity back to its very beginning in Egypt (ch. 23:3).

3:16–5:17 Acts symbolic of siege and exile. [The New American Bible text for this section has the following alterations: (1) 3:16a is inserted before 4:1; (2) 4:12-15 is placed after 4:17; (3) 5:13-15 is placed after 5:17. The rearrangements are seemingly made to untangle the text; they do not alter the sense of the passage.]

Four symbolic acts in 4:1–5:17 enact the fate of the Judeans who have not gone into captivity. Ezekiel acts out variously the role of God toward the people of Judah and the circumstances of those who will be punished. In the first symbolic act (4:1-3), the prophet draws upon a brick of the sort used in Babylonia for building purposes a picture of Jerusalem under siege. By unflinchingly "fixing his gaze" (4:3) on what he has sketched, Ezekiel dramatizes God's active power against Jerusalem.

In the second symbolic act (4:4-8), Ezekiel lies for a certain number of days on his left side facing north, then for a shorter number of days on his right side facing south, to indicate the number of years that North Israel and Judah must endure exile. Judah's exile is here fixed at forty years (4:6). The reference to God's binding Ezekiel (4:8) is a metaphor for the oppression experienced by the prophet on behalf of the people.

The third act (4:9-17) illustrates the scanty food rations in Jerusalem during its siege. The prophet is allowed only meager allotments of food and water. He eats carefully weighed-out mixed grains, which he is instructed to cook using human excrement as fuel (4:12). Such an act is so repulsive to Ezekiel that God relents and permits him to use cow dung, the more common fuel for cooking (4:15).

The fourth symbolic act (5:1-17) represents the death and hardships the people will experience at the hands of the enemy. Ezekiel cuts hair from his head and beard, and divides it by weight into three parts. One part is burned in the fire, another part is thrown into the air and scattered by a flashing sword, while the third part is blown away by the wind. Complete disaster will befall the inhabitants of the besieged city. The detailed interpretation of this symbolic act is probably very largely an expansion by the later community. The cannibalism suggested in verse 10 is elsewhere attested in the Old Testament as an expression of God's most severe punishment (see Lev 26:29; 2 Kgs 6:29; Jer 19:9).

Some interpreters have suggested that Ezekiel engages in these symbolic enactments of the divine word while still deprived of the ability to speak following his vision. This interpretation may indeed be correct. The visible acts of a prophet unable to speak would be an impressive way of communicating God's message. Yet, the appearance of the four symbolic acts together in chapters 4–5 and the fact that other prophets performed symbolic acts suggest that this interpretation is not necessarily correct. This collection was most likely made by some of Ezekiel's followers, who editorially grouped the traditions that represented the siege of Jerusalem. These dramatic enactments are reminiscent of the actions of Isaiah, who walked about Jerusalem "naked and barefoot for three years as a sign and portent" that the inhabitants of Jerusalem should not trust Egypt and Ethiopia (Isa 20:2-6); and of Jeremiah, who was instructed to buy a loincloth, wear it for a time and bury it, and then dig it up, rotted and good for nothing, to symbolize the corruption of "the pride of Jerusalem" (Jer 13:1-11). Prophets regularly use actions as well as words, visions, and dreams to symbolically portray the divine intent. In the Book of Ezekiel, this grouping of symbolic actions precedes the prophet's utterance of the divine word.

There is still no direct word or oracle from Ezekiel indicating what sins within the community are prompting God's threatened judgment. The elaboration of the last symbolic act (ch. 5) does refer to Israel's rejection of God's statutes and ordinances (5:6) and to the defiling of the sanctuary (5:11), but it is likely that these references come from the later tradition. It appears, therefore, that Ezekiel has first performed certain grim symbolic acts describing the fate of Jerusalem and Judah without having indicated why God is bringing ruin. Chapters 6–11, however, lay out in vivid detail the corruption of Israelite life and worship which, in Ezekiel's view, is leading God to complete the destruction of the holy city and its surroundings.

6:1-14 Against the mountains of Israel. Two oracles (vv. 1-10 and vv. 11-14) describe God's unrelenting anger at the inhabitants of the Promised Land. The reason for the judgment is no longer left in doubt: Israel has turned to idols, has committed abominations on high places, has forsaken God, and has become proud and arrogant.

Each oracle opens with an instruction that Ezekiel perform a gesture ("turn toward the mountains of Israel," v. 2; "clap your hands, stamp your feet," v. 11) and deliver a message in God's name ("Thus says the Lord God," vv. 3 and 11) that death and desolation will befall the entire countryside. The address to "the mountains of Israel" (6:2, 3) is meant in the Book of Ezekiel as an address to the whole Israelite people (see 19:9; 33:28; 34:13, 14; 35:12; 36:1, 4, 8; 37:22; 38:8; 39:2, 4, 17). Because of the sins committed on high places, where Israel has worshipped other gods, all Israel will experience destruction. Those who are permitted to escape the divine wrath (vv. 8-10) will be scattered in foreign lands, where they will remember their pasts with remorse. From this remnant will come those who understand the discipline of God's destruction as they turn from evil "to know the Lord."

The recognition formula "know that I am the Lord" appears over sixty times in the Book of Ezekiel and functions both as a word of judgment and of consolation. Its four occurrences in this chapter (6:7, 10, 13, 14) are harsh predictions that idol-worshipers will be slain and that those who live will remember the calamity and desolation that befell the land. The entire community will experience severe punishment for forsaking the covenant with God. Through the prophet, God here speaks a merciless word that promises utter destruction. In disaster, "then shall you know that I am the Lord."

7:1-27 The end has come. A revelation formula, "thus the word of the Lord came to me" (v. 1), and the recognition formula "thus they shall know that I am the Lord" (v. 27) set the boundaries of an exquisite poem that describes the disaster soon to befall the Promised Land. Though textually difficult to decipher because of duplications and shifts in voice, this poem sounds an alarm of imminent, irreversible doom for those who dwell in the land (verses 2-4 are repeated in a slightly more elaborate form in verses 5-9).

On "the day of the Lord" (v. 10; compare Amos 5:18), the life of the community will come to an end. The dissolution of the community (vv. 10-27) is described as a time when commerce will cease (vv. 12-13), the people will be under siege (vv. 14-16), and grief will be everywhere apparent (vv. 17-18). Wealth will be useless to those who have made idols (vv. 19-20), as God hands over the land to disaster (vv. 21-24). There shall be no peace when God's judgment comes (vv. 25-27). The community will crumble as individuals, prophets, priests, those who counsel, and those who rule can no longer do their jobs rightly. Anguish will replace peace (shalom: personal, economic, social wholeness or well-being) when God comes to punish the people.

8:3, 5-18 Vision of abominations in the temple. [The New American Bible text of chapters 8–11 has been extensively rearranged. In this section on the abominations in the temple, 8:1, 2, and 4 have been omitted. In the next section, "Slaughter of the Idolaters," 9:1-11 is followed by 11:24-25. And in the section "God's Glory Leaves Jerusalem," the text reads: 8:1, 2, 4; 10:1-22 (internally reordered); 11:22-23. These changes affect the meaning of chapters 8–11 in a variety of ways, as illustrated by comparison with translations that preserve the canonical order of the Hebrew text, such as the Jerusalem Bible or the Revised Standard Version. Instead of one transportation from Babylon to Jerusalem (8:1-4) and one return from Jerusalem to Babylon after God's departure from the holy city (11:22-25), the New American Bible suggests two round trips (one in what is basically chapters 8–9, another in what is basically chapters 10–11). Other alterations of meaning will be noted in the discussion.]

Ezekiel has a vision in which the spirit carries him from Babylon to the north gate of the Jerusalem temple (8:3). There the prophet is shown four successive acts of abomination taking place in the temple, each more offensive than the last. In 8:5-6, Ezekiel arrives at the gate of the inner court of the temple and looks out to see an altar set up before the image of a deity (perhaps Asherah, the goddess of love). The holiness of God is defiled by this abomination at the entrance to the sanctuary itself, but still greater evils are to be shown to the prophet. In 8:7-13, Ezekiel is led to a hidden room, where he sees seventy elders, including a certain Jaazaniah, the son of Shaphan (perhaps the Shaphan of 2 Kgs 22, who had been a leader in the reforms of Josiah), presenting incense offerings to loathsome creatures and beasts whose representations are inscribed on the walls of the hidden room. In 8:14-15, Ezekiel goes into the temple court, where he comes upon some women weeping for Tammuz, the Babylonian vegetation god, whose death signaled a dry season of infertility during the summer month that bore his name (June-July) until his sister, the goddess Inanna, brought him back to life in the spring. In the last scene, 8:16-18, Ezekiel is taken to the inner court between the vestibule of the temple and the altar of burnt offering, where he finds the worst blasphemy of all: twenty-five men have turned their backs on the temple where God is enthroned to worship the sun.

For Ezekiel the priest, these four acts represent complete apostasy from God and mean that the entire temple area must be violently cleansed of such abominations.

9:1-11; 11:24-25 Slaughter of the idolaters. In 9:1-11, six executioners and a man dressed in linen (linen is prescribed for priestly garments in Lev 16:4) and carrying a writing case are summoned to destroy the city. The origin of these seven figures from the north is obscure. Their job description is like that of God's destroying angel (Exod 12:23; 2 Sam 24:16-17; 2 Kgs 19:35). Their number is fixed at seven for the first time in the Old Testament in this text (compare the later usage of this number in Tob 12:15; Rev 8:2, 6; especially 15:1, 6-8, where the seven angels are dressed in white linen; 16:1-21). Perhaps the seven are an allusion to the seven Babylonian planet-gods, one of whom served as a heavenly scribe and compiled a Book of Fate. In this text the man in linen is charged with the responsibility of marking the foreheads of those to be delivered.

Only those who "moan and groan over all the abominations that are practiced" in the city are to be spared (9:4). Without pity or regard for sex or age, all others are to be smitten. As the severe punishment is being carried out, Ezekiel asks God if all Israel must be destroyed (9:8). God answers that the evil deeds of the people cannot go unpunished. Then the man in the linen garment returns (the text does not mention the return of the six executioners) and says that God's commands have been accomplished (9:11). The New American Bible here inserts 11:24-25, which tells of the return of the prophet to Babylon and his report to the exiles about everything he has seen in Jerusalem.

8:1, 2, 4; 10:1-22; 11:22-23 God's glory leaves Jerusalem. [The text of the New American Bible differs here from the Hebrew original. Verses within chapter 10 have been rearranged, and verses from chapters 8 and 11 have been added. The text thus reads: 8:1, 2, 4; 10:20-22, 14-15, 9-13, 16-17, 1-8, 18-19; 11:22-23.]

This section opens with a date (17 September 592) and the notice of a transportation from Babylon to Jerusalem (8:1, 2, 4 transposed). Ezekiel's strange guide on this occasion is described in terms much like those used to describe the mysterious figure that appeared to him by the river Chebar (compare 1:27 and 8:2-4). The prophet is seized by the hair of his head and taken to the court of the temple (compare Habakkuk's mode of travel in Dan 14:36).

Once in the temple precincts (10:20-22), Ezekiel fixes his attention upon the glory of God and the same four-faced, four-winged living creatures he had seen in Babylon (see ch. 1). Beside each of the creatures he sees "a wheel within a wheel" (10:10), rimmed with eyes (10:12; compare 1:18). These wheels, which Ezekiel now learns are called "wheelwork" (10:13), are moved by the locomotion of the living creatures' wings (10:16-17).

Above the cherubim Ezekiel sees a throne-chariot like the one he saw in chapter 1 (the notable difference is that the living creatures of 1:26 are named "cherubim" in 10:1). But this throne-chariot is empty, because the glory of the God of Israel has gone up to the threshold of the temple (10:4). The man in linen is instructed to take fire from within the wheelwork and to scatter it over the city of Jerusalem. But before the city is destroyed, God's glory must leave the temple. Thus it happens that the glory of the Lord leaves the threshold of the temple to rest in the throne-chariot, which the cherubim carry to a mountain east of the city. The divine presence departs from the sanctuary and the city. Jerusalem is now without God's protection.

11:1-13 Judgment of the princes. The prophet is transported in an ecstatic vision to the east gate of the temple, where he pronounces an oracle against Jaazaniah (a man mentioned in 8:11, but with a different father) and Pelatiah. As he prophesies the coming death of these men who are misleading the people, Pelatiah falls dead.

It is difficult to know how this story is to be understood. Presumably the exiles later heard of the death of Pelatiah and fearfully assumed that he died just as Ezekiel related his vision of Yahweh's judgment. The section ends with the prophet's haunting cry, "Alas, Lord God! Will you utterly wipe out what remains of Israel?" Ezekiel grieves over the destruction of the people (11:13), just as he did over the fate of Jerusalem (9:8), but he cannot stem God's vengeance.

11:14-21 Restoration of the exiles. A word of promise closes Ezekiel's vision (11:14-21). The people in Jerusalem say that the Lord has sent the exiles into captivity and thereby turned over the land of promise to those who remain in the land. Not so, says this passage; God will punish those who remain in the land for their abominations, while the exiles will be delivered at a later time. This entire section, including the reference to the giving of a new heart and a new spirit to the restored community (vv. 19-20), seems to belong to the later period of Ezekiel's prophecies of hope (see 36:22-32).

12:1-28 Acts symbolic of the Exile; prophecy ridiculed. Two additional symbolic acts (vv. 1-20) and two independent sayings (vv. 21-28) condemning the people's rejection of the divine word are reported in chapter 12. Though Ezekiel dwells in the midst of a rebellious people who refuse to see or heed his message (12:1), he is instructed to perform symbolic acts reminiscent of those described in chapter 5, in the hope that perhaps the people may yet "see" (12:3) and repent of their rebelliousness.

As part of the first symbolic act (12:1-16), Ezekiel is instructed to prepare an exile's baggage and to leave at night by digging through a wall (12:1-7). Though this act symbolizes the fate of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the verbal interpretation of it that follows (12:8-16) is directed to the exiles, who are warned not to put their hope in the holy city or in a quick end to the Exile. The event is interpreted as referring to Zedekiah, who left Jerusalem at night by making a breach in the walls of the city and fleeing into the hands of the Babylonians; they captured him and took him to Riblah, where he was blinded and led into captivity (see 2 Kgs 25:4 and Jer 39:4). The explanation of Ezekiel's symbolic act found in 12:8-16 is quite clearly a later reworking of the event.

As part of the second symbolic act (12:17-20), Ezekiel is told to eat his food with quaking and trembling as a sign of the panic that will seize the inhabitants of Jerusalem when their city is surrounded. The two sayings at the close of this chapter (12:21-28) prepare the way for the section against the false prophets (13:1–14:11). Those who think that the words of the prophets have lost their power are condemned (12:22-25), as are those who insist that the words of judgment apply only to a far-off day (12:26-28). The Lord's word is sure, and its fulfillment is even now ready at hand.

[Note that the New American Bible text of the two sayings reads 12:21-23, 25, 24, 26-28, presumably for the sake of smooth reading.

Chapter 13, which in its difficult and clearly layered original contains two sayings against false male prophets (vv. 1-9 and 10-16) and two sayings against false female prophets (vv. 17-21 and 22-23), has been extensively rearranged in the New American Bible. The two sayings against false male prophets are given in 13:1-2, 5, 7-8, 10-16 and 13:3-4, 6, 9, and the two sayings against false female prophets in 13:17, 22-23 and 13:18-21. Such radical reordering results in virtually rewriting the chapter. Unfortunately, there is no explanation in the notes to explain these changes.]

13:1-16 Against the prophets of peace; against false prophets in Chaldea. Thematic unity, an introductory revelation formula (v. 1), and a concluding recognition formula (v. 23, displaced in the New American Bible translation) distinguish chapter 13 (compare 12:26 and 14:2). The chapter opens with a word of denouncement for men who prophesy falsely out of their own thoughts (v. 2) when they have seen nothing (compare the parallel passage in Jer 23:9-32). Their unauthorized words are simply an adornment for the desires and wishes of the people, like whitewash placed upon a wall (vv. 10-12, 14-16). The message of these prophets is worthless. They offer hope that rests upon illusion (vv. 10, 16). God intends judgment, not peace, for the covenant people. Prophets who insist that Jerusalem and Judah will be spared have had false visions and speak lies (vv. 6-9). God's judgment is that these false prophets and their works will be utterly destroyed (vv. 15-16).

13:17-23 Against false prophetesses; against sorceresses. Ezekiel also condemns women who prophesy falsely out of their own thoughts (v. 17). These women undermine the faith of all by capitalizing on the dangers of the times to frighten people into paying for good omens (compare 1 Sam 9:7, where bread is the payment for an oracle). The women are involved with sewing magic bands and making veils for every head (v. 18), though it is unclear whether they or their clients wear these objects. They dishonor God by prophesying for venal motives, determining life or death according to the price paid them (v. 19; compare Mic 3:5). Their lies have disheartened the righteous and encouraged the wicked (v. 22). The judgment is that these false female prophets will no longer see visions or practice divination when God rescues the people from their power (v. 23).

It is sometimes suggested that these women should not be classified as "prophets," a title that the Old Testament uses for only a very few women (Miriam in Exod 15:21; Deborah in Judg 4:4; Huldah in 2 Kgs 22:14 and 2 Chr 34:22; the wife of Isaiah in Isa 8:3; and Noadiah in Neh 6:14). Instead they ought to be thought of as "sorcerers" (so the New American Bible heading) because they engage in strange acts of magic (compare the story of the medium at Endor in 1 Sam 28:7ff.). Since the text does not specify these women by the noun "prophets" but rather by a feminine plural participle—"those who play the role of the prophet" (v. 17)—their name has allowed some ambiguity about their role. But the compositional arrangement of the chapter is not ambiguous. In context, the women are understood as false prophets.

Chapter 13 is a two-part structure in which verses 2-16 are remarkably similar in form to verses 17-23. Internal symmetries and carefully drawn parallels between men (vv. 2-16) and women (vv. 17-23) who have misused their prophetic authority demonstrate an intended equation of the two groups. In each half of chapter 13, Ezekiel is instructed as "son of man" (vv. 2, 17) to deliver God's word (vv. 3, 18). Both the oracle to the men and the oracle to the women open with an unusual cry of dismay (vv. 3, 18; used elsewhere only in 34:2 in an oracle against false shepherds, the Hebrew interjection hoy expresses pain, "ah" or "alas," which is to be distinguished from the more regularly used 'oy, translated "woe"). Both the men and the women are accused of prophesying their own thoughts (vv. 2, 17), of having delusive visions and practicing false divination (vv. 6-9, 23). And both oracles contain two recognition formulas (vv. 9, 14, 21, 23). Through the word of the prophet, males and females are denounced for speaking lies that have dishonored God and disheartened the people.

If practicing acts of magic accounts for understanding the women in chapter 13 as sorcerers, then the men must also be so understood. Both groups are accused of practicing "divination" (the men in verses 6-9; the women in verse 23), an act of magic specifically prohibited in Deut 18:10. More likely Ezekiel used a participial circumlocution to address women "who play the role of the prophet" in order to condemn them for practices as abominable as those of their male counterparts (compare also the women and the men singled out for dishonoring the sanctity of the temple in chapter 8).

14:1-11 Prophecy useless for idolaters. As in 8:1 (which was transposed to chapter 10), so here in 14:1 (and again in 20:1) the elders of Judah exiled in Babylon come to consult Ezekiel. Following the revelation formula (v. 2), God explains to Ezekiel that these men are syncretists who have consulted idols and questions whether such as these should be allowed to seek an oracle of the Lord (v. 3). Through the prophet, God warns that those who consult idols before coming to a prophet will not receive a word of the Lord but rather an answer from God in person (vv. 4-5). Again the prophet is instructed to caution the people not to seek a prophetic word of the Lord while they follow idols (verse 7 is a variant of verse 4) lest they personally encounter God, who will make of them an object lesson for others by excluding them from the community. The recognition formula (v. 8) rounds out this word of warning to syncretists.

There follows a word to the prophet who responds to the requests of idol-worshipers, detailing his offense and punishment (vv. 9-10). The prophet who deludes and those who are deluded by other gods will be equally punished (compare Jer 14:15-16; 27:15). The divine purpose is to educate both the people and the prophet who might stray from an exclusive relationship with God (v. 11). Even though they are in a foreign land where Babylonian gods whose power is manifest in the achievements of Nebuchadnezzar are worshiped, the people are not permitted to give allegiance to any god other than the God of Israel without grave consequences.

14:12-23 Personal responsibility. In the remainder of this chapter and in the following nine chapters (14:12–23:49), Ezekiel's message for Israel is related to various events from its past history. Ezekiel, like Jeremiah and Second Isaiah, recounts the history of God's dealings with the people in order to draw a contrast between past acts of mercy and present experiences of judgment, and also to testify to the graciousness of God.

In a two-part oracle (vv. 12-20, 21-23), the prophet declares that even pious intercessors from Israel's past like Noah, Daniel, and Job could not divert God's wrath against the land (compare the parallel text in Jer 14:19–15:4). Four acts of judgment are about to befall its inhabitants as the sword, famine, wild beasts, and pestilence (v. 21) come upon Jerusalem. The sons and daughters who survive will serve as an object lesson justifying God's destruction of Jerusalem (vv. 22-23). Righteousness will save individuals but not the city. The prophet is insisting here on individuals' responsibility and accountability. Each must choose to act righteously and live, or to act faithlessly and die, a theme more fully developed in chapter 18.

15:1-8 Parable of the vine. In this short allegory on the wood of the vine, the prophet declares that in God's eyes the inhabitants of Jerusalem have become unproductive and valueless, like a useless vine that no longer produces fruit. Like wood that is good for nothing, the homeland will be thrown into the fire. Later on the prophet will return to this image of Israel as the vine of the Lord (19:10-12).

16:1-63 The faithless spouse. In this the longest chapter of the book, Ezekiel narrates the beginning of Israel in an allegory about Jerusalem as the unfaithful wife of the Lord. Ezekiel is regarded as the Old Testament father of allegory, a literary form in which a story is told and then application is made to the contemporary situation (see also chs. 15, 17, 19, 23, 31, 34). Ezekiel is instructed to recount this figurative story so that Jerusalem will know its abominations (v. 2).

Verses 1-14 describe Jerusalem as an unwanted orphan, born from the union of the Amorites and the Hittites, and cast aside at birth by its parents. Neither midwife nor parents cared for Jerusalem. The child lay beside the road, unloved and untended, when God came by and performed the duties of a midwife. God saw to the needs of the child and then left. When Jerusalem came of age, God returned and betrothed the city, showering presents upon it and taking it as a bride. Jerusalem was "renowned" among the nations for exceeding "beauty," queen-like dignity, and the splendid gifts that God had bestowed upon it (v. 14).

Reversing the terms of adornment that closed verse 14, verse 15 opens a section (vv. 15-34) that describes how the "beauty" and "renown" of the city led it astray. Jerusalem's harlotry was idolatry played out with passers-by (v. 16) and with self-constructed male images (v. 17; compare 23:14). Jerusalem sacrificed her children to these images (vv. 20-22). She spread her legs to all, including Egyptians (v. 26), Assyrians (v. 28), and Babylonians (v. 29). So insatiable was Jerusalem's lust that she scorned payment and even stooped to paying lovers to come to her (vv. 30-34).

Verses 35-43 tell how God sentenced Jerusalem to a violent death. The harlot is summoned (v. 35) to hear an oracle that first restates the cultic sins she has committed by turning to other lovers and idols (v. 36), and then lists the consequences she will suffer on account of these sins: she will be stripped naked by her lovers (v. 37), sentenced by God as an adulterer and murderer (v. 38; see the death penalty prescribed in Deut 22:22 and Lev 20:10), and horribly executed by the assembly (vv. 39-40). While many women (a figure for the other nations) look on, Jerusalem will be punished, so that never again will she give payment to other lovers (v. 41). Then God's wrath will be satisfied (v. 42). Jerusalem will have been justly punished according to her own conduct for forgetting her origins and for adding immorality to her other abominations (v. 43).

Verses 44-58, a diatribe comparing Jerusalem to her sisters, opens with an epigram, "Like mother, like daughter," restates Jerusalem's Amorite and Hittite parentage, and moves quickly to an unfavorable comparison of Jerusalem to her two sisters, Samaria and Sodom (vv. 44-46). Jerusalem, the most wicked of the three, is called to blush for her sins (vv. 47-52). Then follows a sequence (vv. 53-58) describing the restoration of Sodom, Samaria, Jerusalem, and their daughters (neighboring cities), and the enduring sense of shame that Jerusalem will experience in the restoration.

A messenger formula (v. 59) introduces the climactic closing section (vv. 59-63) of chapter 16, which includes a dramatic restatement of all that has preceded and the astonishing declaration of an everlasting covenant (compare v. 60 and 37:26). Verses 60-61 recall the covenant God made with Jerusalem in her youth (compare vv. 3-43) and her relationship to her sisters (compare vv. 44-58). Verses 62-63 promise a reestablished covenant between God and Jerusalem. Reconciliation will bring with it sober shame and right recognition of God for Jerusalem. No longer will the city be oblivious to its abominations (see the charge of v. 2). With exceeding graciousness, God will pardon the iniquity of Jerusalem. This closing section of promise may be from Ezekiel, but the likelihood is that it comes from the hand of an editor. In the later chapters (34–37), where Ezekiel sums up his hope for Israel, he uses different language and imagery.

17:1-24 The eagles and the vine. The allegory of the eagles and the cedar (vv. 1-10) and its interpretation (vv. 11-21) comment upon the political disquiet experienced in the land of Judah. In 597 B.C.E. Nebuchadnezzar ("the great eagle," v. 3) came to Judah and took King Jehoiachin (the "topmost branch" of the cedar, v. 4) and the leading citizens to Babylonia. Zedekiah ("seed of the land," v. 5) was then appointed head of the Judean state by the Babylonians. Yet, in 588 he rebelled against Babylonia by turning to Psammetichus II of Egypt ("another great eagle," v. 7).

Ezekiel's message is that the Egyptians will not be able to save the king or the land of Judah. Like Jeremiah (see Jer 37–38), Ezekiel insists that Zedekiah should have submitted to the rule of Babylonia. Ezekiel even declares that the oath and the covenant between Zedekiah and Nebuchadnezzar were as binding as the oath and covenant between the people and the Lord (see v. 19). Rebellion against Babylonia is actually rebellion against God, who had brought Nebuchadnezzar against Judah.

Like chapter 16, this chapter also closes with a word of promise (vv. 22-24). God will plant a sprig from the high cedar, care for it, and cause it to grow. The future of Israel is entirely in the hands of God, who can make a high tree low and a low tree high (v. 24). These closing words of promise may be an addition, although in this instance they are more in keeping with Ezekiel's own style. Perhaps the prophet added this section about the mystery of God's sovereignty to the prophecy at a subsequent time.

18:1-32 Personal responsibility. Following the revelation formula (v. 1), God questions Ezekiel about the proverb "Fathers have eaten green grapes, thus their children's teeth are on edge" (v. 2). Some of the more cynical exiles may have repeated this proverb in order to blame others or God (vv. 25, 29; compare 33:17, 20) for their sufferings. Ezekiel passionately argues that each generation is responsible for its own actions (vv. 3-20). He declares that the judgment of God falls only upon the sinner. The present generation is in no better or worse position before God on account of the sins of the previous generations. God will not destroy Israel for past sins, only for present ones. Each generation receives life or death according to its own actions (vv. 21-31). If the wicked should now turn from their evil ways, God would forgive them, and the present generation would live (see Deut 30:15-20). The prophet appeals to the people to turn back to God, declaring that God takes no pleasure in anyone's death (see vv. 23 and 32). The chapter closes with God's cry to the house of Israel, "Return and live!" (v. 32).

19:1-14 Allegory of the lions; allegory of the vine branch. The tragic end of the princely offspring of a lioness (vv. 2-9) and of a vine (vv. 10-14) is told in two allegorical lamentations. The subject of the first lament is the exile of two royal lion cubs of Judah—one to Egypt and the other to Babylon. Since only one king contemporary with Ezekiel was taken captive to Egypt, the identity of the first lion cub (vv. 3-4) is unquestionably Jehoahaz, the son of Queen Hamutal and King Josiah. After only a three-month reign in 609 B.C.E., Jehoahaz was taken captive by Pharaoh Neco and deported to Egypt, where he died (see 2 Kgs 23:30-34).

The identity of the second lion cub (vv. 5-9) is more difficult, since two kings contemporary with Ezekiel were taken captive to Babylon. If the same mother lion (v. 2) bore both cubs, then the second king is Queen Hamutal's son Zedekiah (2 Kgs 23:31; 24:18), who was taken captive by Nebuchadnezzar in 587 B.C.E., blinded, and led in chains to Babylon (see 2 Kgs 24:18–25:7). If, however, the mother lion is a metaphor for Judah (compare Gen 49:9), from whom many princes emerged, then the second king might well be Jehoiachin, the son of Queen Nehushta, who after a three-month reign in Jerusalem was led away captive to Babylon in 597 B.C.E. and kept prisoner by Nebuchadnezzar (see 2 Kgs 24:8-15).

The subject of the second lament (vv. 10-14) is the annihilation of Zedekiah (compare chs. 17 and 31) and the mother vine. This allegory tells how the vine and its strongest stem were plucked up, exposed to the weather, and burned (v. 12). Then transplanted to a desert land (taken to Babylon; see Jer 52:1-11), this once stately vine had no branches and no fruit. The strength of the royal vine was destroyed (v. 14).

The fate of Judah's royalty is thus the subject of mourning and lamentation (see vv. 1 and 14c). The two historical allegories in chapter 19 are both dirges in five-beat lament meter. Three beats followed by two give the poems a limping, halting rhythm in Hebrew (compare 2 Sam 1:17-21; Isa 14:4-21; Amos 5:1-3). Form as well as content effectively show that, for Ezekiel, nationalistic hope in the Davidic line was virtually dead.

20:1-44 Israel's history of infidelity. Chapter 20 opens with a specific date (August 591, eleven months after the last date given in 8:1, which was transposed in the New American Bible to chapter 10) and presents a familiar scene of certain elders of Judah gathering at Ezekiel's house (compare 8:1 and 14:1). The exiles come to ask that Ezekiel inquire of the Lord for them. As in chapter 14, so too here, following the revelation formula (v. 2), God questions whether the elders should be permitted to seek an oracle (v. 3). Instead of an oracle, Ezekiel is charged to deliver a jarring historical retrospective (vv. 4-31) that underscores the sinfulness of the chosen people from their very beginning in Egypt (vv. 5-9), through the rebellious first generation (vv. 10-17) and second generation (vv. 18-26) in the wilderness, even to the present generation (vv. 27-31). All have profaned God by going after idols (see vv. 7, 16, 18, 24, 30, 31).

Israel can take no delight in its past. As Ezekiel tells the story, there never was a time of right relationship between God and the people (compare the more usual interpretation that once the people entered the land of Canaan, syncretism caused a strain in their relationship with God; see Hos 2). Ezekiel claims that from the moment of the Exodus onward, there has been disharmony between God and the idolatrous chosen people. For the first time in the book, Ezekiel presents the important theological rationale (further developed in chapters 36 and 39) that God has extended mercy to the people, not for their own sake but for the sake of the holiness of the divine name (vv. 9, 14, 22, 39). Deliverance is inextricably bound to God's holiness, reputation, and character in the world. And now, at the conclusion of the historical account, to be true to the divine identity and presence, God refuses an oracle to the idolatrous elders (v. 31).

In the course of the historical recitation, Ezekiel speaks of statutes given by God that were "not good" (v. 25), laws that contributed to the defilement of those who sacrificed their first-born to God (v. 26; compare Exod 22:28-29). Retribution seemingly takes the form of God's misleading the people. Law, more ordinarily understood as a light of guidance (Ps 119:105), is here a cause for stumbling. God deals perversely with this rebellious people (compare Ps 18:26) as a mysterious, incomprehensible judge.

A disputation (vv. 32-44) following the historical recitation reiterates the charge that the present generation is idolatrous. In its first section (vv. 32-38), God promises harsh treatment for those who serve "wood and stone" (v. 32). As a wrathful king (v. 33), God will assemble the exiles and lead them to the desert in a new exodus (v. 34) for a severe "face to face" judgment (v. 35; compare the "in person" encounter promised to idolaters in 14:4). Like a shepherd, the Lord will use a staff to count out the small number of faithful people from the rebellious ones. The transgressors will never again be permitted to return to the land of Israel (vv. 37-38). Thus God promises that the exiles will know the Lord (see the recognition formula, v. 38).

The dispute then continues with a word to the members of the house of Israel urging them to put away all idols (vv. 39-44). Authentic worship requires complete awareness and renunciation of past evil conduct and actions. Then an unexpected word of genuine hope mitigates the severe judgment: God promises to bring Israel back into the land, to receive the offerings of the people, and to accept their repentance (vv. 40-44). By such means the mystery of God's holy name will be made manifest to the nations. Restoration will bring with it true recognition of the Lord (see the recognition formula repeated in verses 42 and 44).

21:1-10 The sword of the Lord. In chapter 21 Ezekiel's voice grows more strident as he warns that the sword of destruction is unsheathed and ready to strike. First the prophet is instructed to deliver an allegory against the forest of the south stating that God is kindling a fire that will devour all the trees (vv. 2-4). Ezekiel protests that the people mock him when he speaks in parables (v. 5), so he is given an interpretation of the allegory to proclaim (vv. 6-10). God is coming with an unsheathed sword, which will not be sheathed again, to destroy the wicked and the virtuous of Jerusalem.

21:11-12 Act symbolic of the city's fall. As in 6:11; 9:8; and 11:13, the prophet expresses grief over the coming suffering of his people. He is instructed to groan with deep emotional sadness as a sign that the end has come.

21:13-22 Song of the sword. Ezekiel engages in a kind of sword dance. He sings a song about a sharpened, ready sword of destruction (vv. 14-15) and performs a number of symbolic actions (vv. 16-22). He cries aloud and slaps his thigh (v. 17), claps his hands (v. 19), and brandishes the sword to the right and to the left (v. 21). He announces that the sword has been put in the hand of an unidentified slayer (v. 16) and that God approves (v. 22). God, the divine warrior, will execute fierce judgment against the people, not for them.

21:23-32 Nebuchadnezzar at the crossroads. Next Ezekiel is instructed to draw a map indicating two possible paths from Babylon (21:23-28), one leading to Rabbah in Ammon (the modern city of Amman, Jordan) and the other to Jerusalem (compare the symbolic acts in 3:16–5:17). In 587 B.C.E. these two small nations joined in an alliance against the threatening power of the Babylonian empire. In verse 26, by three methods of divination (shaking marked arrows and drawing one by lot; consulting teraphim, which were small images of household gods; and interpreting markings on the entrails of a sacrificed victim), Nebuchadnezzar determines that Jerusalem will be punished first (v. 27). Though the people may wish to dismiss this warning, their fate is marked by the arrow in Nebuchadnezzar's hand (v. 28).

Zedekiah is addressed as a depraved and wicked prince whose end is coming (vv. 29-32). A triple repetition, "twisted, twisted, twisted will I leave it" (v. 32), expresses the utter chaos about to befall the city. The sign is thus made clear that Jerusalem and its ruler are doomed to destruction.

21:33-37 Against the Ammonites. In this difficult passage, which may come from a later period, the Ammonites are depicted as wielding a sword against Israel (vv. 33-34). God stays their hand (v. 35) and declares that these people will themselves be judged and destroyed (v. 36). So complete will be their destruction that they will no longer be remembered (v. 37). No worse punishment than this could be imagined.

22:1-31 Crimes of Jerusalem. Three oracles on the common theme of the defilement of Jerusalem have been grouped together in chapter 22. Verses 1-16 attack the violence and idolatry of the bloody city (notice the sevenfold repetition of the word "blood/bloodshed" in verses 2, 3, 4, 6, 9, 12, 13). Verses 17-22 describe Israel as scrap metal of no value. And verses 23-31 condemn the princes (v. 25), priests (v. 26), nobles (v. 27), prophets (v. 28), and people of the land (v. 29) who have turned to sinful ways. The destruction of Jerusalem is inevitable, given the universal corruption of the city (compare Zeph 3:1-8).

23:1-49 The two sisters. In chapter 23 the prophet concludes his grim picture of Israel's past (see 14:12–23:49), using the coarsest language found in the prophetic literature. God tells Ezekiel an allegory about North Israel and Judah, portraying the two nations as harlots (compare ch. 16) who seek to outdo one another in their sins.

Verses 1-4 introduce the two sisters and tell of their immoral childhood in Egypt. Despite their sins, Oholah (Samaria) and Oholibah (Jerusalem) were taken as brides by the Lord and bore many sons and daughters. The names of the two whores can be translated as "(she who has) her own tent" (Oholah) and "my tent (is) in her" (Oholibah). Since the "tent" was a place of meeting with God in the wilderness (see Exod 33:7), the names may be cultic allusions. Another possibility is that the words are simply sound-alike names with a foreign flavor. Though the meaning of the names is now obscure, the symbolism of the two harlot sister cities wed to God as representatives of Samaria (the capital of Israel) and Jerusalem (the capital of Judah) is clear.

Verses 5-10 describe the depravity and punishment of the older sister, Oholah-Samaria, who offered herself to Assyrian lovers. Verses 11-21 describe the even more vile harlotry of Oholibah-Jerusalem, who made open advances to Assyria and Babylonia. In four divine sayings (vv. 22-35), each introduced by the formula "thus says the Lord God" (vv. 22, 28, 32, 35), God declares that on account of her sins Jerusalem will be punished. Original to the text is the judgment that Jerusalem will be handed over to her lovers, who will now unleash violence against her. They will mutilate her so horribly that she will never again be able to play the harlot (see v. 25: "cutting off your nose and ears," a punishment found in both Egyptian and Assyrian texts). Most likely secondary to the text are verses 28-34, which state that Jerusalem will be handed over to those she hates (vv. 28-30) and that she will be judged by sharing her sister's cup of dismay (vv. 31-34).

Verses 36-49, a later retelling of the allegory of Oholah and Oholibah, summarize the sins of the sisters (vv. 36-44) and describe their punishment (vv. 45-49). The women sin simultaneously and will be punished simultaneously. Added here is a warning to individual women not to imitate the lewdness of the two sisters (v. 48). Finally, the recognition formula appears, signaling that judgment is an experience through which God's sovereignty will be known (v. 49).

24:1-14 Allegory of the pot. The siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, began on the tenth day of the tenth month in the ninth year of Jehoiachin's captivity (v. 1; see also 2 Kgs 25:1). On this very day, which would fall toward the end of the year 588, Ezekiel, who was in Babylon, was commanded to write down the date and to deliver an allegorical oracle to the rebellious people (vv. 1-2). Ezekiel describes the coming fate of those left behind in the city of Jerusalem as the destruction of an unclean and rusty cooking pot (vv. 3-14). God avenges the crimes of the city and its inhabitants in a fire that consumes not only the contents of the pot but the pot itself. God had wished to spare the city, but now the end has come. No one need hope, for God will not relent.

24:15-21, 24, 22-23 Symbol of the destruction of the temple. [For some unexplained reason, the New American Bible translation places verse 24, which contains a recognition formula, before verse 22. There is no change in meaning with this move, but the regularity of the pattern in which the phrase "thus you shall know that I am the Lord" closes a section is here broken.]

Since the Jerusalem temple fell in the summer of 587B.C.E., God's shocking word to Ezekiel in this passage probably took place sometime after the preceding dated allegory (vv. 1-14). The prophet is told that his wife, who is "the delight of his eyes" (v. 16), will suddenly be taken from him and that he is not to mourn her death publicly (v. 17). Ezekiel proclaims this strange message to the people, and on the evening of the same day (v. 18) his wife dies, just as the Lord had said. The people ask for an explanation of these strange acts from the prophet (v. 19), who proclaims that the death of his wife is a sign of the death of Jerusalem. As he has been commanded not to weep over the loss of his beloved, so too must the people not weep over the destruction of their delight and desire, the sanctuary of Jerusalem (vv. 20-24).

24:25-27 End of Ezekiel's dumbness. It appears that Ezekiel neither laments his wife's death nor speaks at all until word reaches him that the city has fallen. Most likely an editor added these words to relate the preceding passage about the destruction of Jerusalem to 33:21, in which a fugitive from Jerusalem (first mentioned in 24:26) arrives in Babylon to announce that the holy city has been taken. As the text now stands, chapters 25–32 have been inserted between these two significant passages about the fate of Jerusalem (compare 24:26 and 33:21).

PART III: PROPHECIES AGAINST FOREIGN NATIONS

Ezek 25:1–32:32

Chapters 25–32 form a unit clearly distinct from the chapters before the siege of Jerusalem (3–24) and those after the fall of the city (33–39). In some of the most exquisite poetry in the book, Ezekiel declares God's vengeance against neighboring countries that have violated the covenant people. Seven groups of foreign people are singled out for judgment: the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Edomites, the Philistines, the inhabitants of Tyre, the inhabitants of Sidon, and the Egyptians. According to six of the seven dates listed in these chapters (see 26:1; 29:1; 30:20; 31:1; 32:1; 32:17), the oracles were delivered within the space of three years, between 585 and 588 B.C.E. A seventh date (29:17) describes a time fifteen years later. It is likely that Ezekiel himself is the author of these important oracles against the foreign nations. International as well as national concerns occupy the interest of the prophet in these chapters.

25:1-7 Against Ammon. The Ammonites are condemned for having exulted over the fall of Jerusalem and the conquest of the land. The defeat of Ammon at the hands of the people of the East is promised. God will bring destruction upon the Ammonites because they have delighted in the ruin of Israel. They will come "to know the Lord" (vv. 5, 7) in their own destruction.

25:8-11 Against Moab. Moab's fate is to be the same as that of Ammon and for the same reason. Moab, too, is to learn that the Lord alone is God (v. 11) and that the fate of Judah and Jerusalem does not mean that Israel is like all the nations.

25:12-14 Against Edom. Judgment is levied against Edom for having taken part in the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem, apparently by rounding up the fugitives and turning them over to the Babylonians and then infiltrating the land of Judah and claiming ownership (see Obadiah). The fate of Edom is different in that the vengeance of the Lord will be executed by the people of Israel. Chapter 35 expands the details of the devastation of Edom.

25:15-17 Against the Philistines. The oracle against Philistia is similar to that against Edom. The Philistines also appear to have harassed the fugitives and taken advantage of them in their plight. Although there is no indication of the means of God's punishment of Philistia, historically it almost certainly was destroyed at the same time as the campaigns of the Babylonians against Judah and Jerusalem.

26:1–28:19 Against the city of Tyre. The next three chapters are devoted to oracles against the famed commercial center Tyre, the chief city of Phoenicia. This city, located on almost impregnable rock at some distance from the Mediterranean shore, withstood the efforts of Nebuchadnezzar to capture it. In 586 B.C.E. the Babylonians began a thirteen-year siege, which ended inconclusively. Not until the time of Alexander the Great (fourth century) was part of the island itself destroyed.

The four oracles in 26:1-21 are of two types. The first two units (vv. 1-6 and 7-14) are oracles similar to those against the other nations. Because Tyre exulted over the fall of Jerusalem, it too will be punished by Nebuchadnezzar. The second units (vv. 15-18 and 19-21) are laments over the death of Tyre and its descent into the nether world. The fall of Tyre will cause all the princes of the sea to gather trembling on the shore, lamenting the death of Tyre and the threat to their own kingdoms. Tyre will be placed in the underworld, there to remain forever.

In chapter 27 Ezekiel portrays Tyre as a great ship beautifully fitted out and proudly sailing the seas. He relates the extraordinary range and variety of Tyre's trading activities (27:12-25a). Then he details the end of this great commercial city as it is destroyed by God's east wind, which wrecks Tyre's exquisite ship, much to the mourning and consternation of the people on the shore (27:25b-36).

Chapter 28 is a second oracle about the ruin of Tyre (vv. 1-10) and a lamentation over the demise of its king (vv. 11-19). Tyre is cast down for misusing its divine position, wisdom, and wealth. Ezekiel grants that God created the king even wiser than Daniel (compare 14:14) but declares that his pride is the undoing of the city. God will cause it to die at the hands of foreigners (vv. 9, 10).

The lament in 28:11-19, seemingly based on a variant version of the Eden story, is a judgment against the king of Tyre. On the holy mountain of God (v. 14) a city was established which Ezekiel calls Eden, the garden of God (see Gen 2-3). The king, the first human being, was created perfect, wise, and beautiful, and was clothed and adorned with precious stones. A cherub guarded the king (compare Gen 3:24), who was blameless until he spurned his beauty and wisdom by acts of violence and arrogance. For his sin he was cast out of the mountain city by a guardian cherub and humiliated before the nations.

Ezekiel recasts this myth to make it portray the imminent ruin of Tyre. The old story probably related the sin of the first king, leading to his expulsion from the mountain city. The mountain thereafter was the dwelling place of El, the high god, and entrance to it was barred to earthly residents. But for Ezekiel, the historical sins of Tyre constitute the real corruption of the city. God executes judgment upon Tyre by stripping away all its treasures, won through its maritime trading, and humbling the people for their pride and injustice. Ezekiel does not contest the truth of the myth of Tyre's origin; he states it in order to dramatize the reversal of Tyre's fortunes.

28:20-26 Against Sidon. A brief oracle against Sidon (vv. 20-24), the other great city of Phoenicia, and a general promise of restoration for Israel following God's judgment of the foreign nations (vv. 24-26) complete the chapter. The composite nature of this section is indicated by the four recognition formulas in verses 22, 23, 24, 26.

The oracles against Egypt (29:1–32:32) are even longer and richer in mythological imagery than were the oracles against Phoenicia. The pride of Pharaoh, who considers himself a god, constitutes the chief sin of Egypt. Repeatedly this theme recurs in the following seven sections.

29:1-16 Egypt the crocodile. In a composite of several brief oracles (vv. 3-6a; 6b-9a; 9b-12; 13-16), dated January 587 B.C.E. (v. 1), Pharaoh is chastised for thinking himself maker and master of the Nile. On account of his sin, Egypt will be reduced to the most lowly of kingdoms.

29:17-21 The wages of Nebuchadnezzar. An oracle dated April 571 B.C.E. (v. 17; this is the latest dated oracle in Ezekiel) refers to the costly siege of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar and promises the Babylonian king that he will recoup his spent treasures by the plunder of Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar is named as God's agent, and his wages are listed as the riches of Egypt.

30:1-19 The day of the Lord against Egypt. This section, which is the only undated oracle in the collection against Egypt, is clearly a composite (introduction formulas occur in verses 2, 6, 10, and 13; recognition formulas occur in verses 8 and 19). It elaborates the theme that the day is coming when God will devastate Egypt and its southern neighbor, Ethiopia. Nebuchadnezzar will invade Egypt (v. 10), and God will dry up the Nile (v. 12). These punishments will lead to international recognition of the Lord.

30:20-26 Pharaoh's broken arm. The fourth section against Egypt is dated April 587 B.C.E. (v. 20), just a few months before the fall of Jerusalem. About three months earlier, Pharaoh Hophra had come to the aid of Jerusalem, which was under siege by the Babylonians (see Jer 37:5). In this oracle all hope in Egypt's help is crushed. God declares that the arms of Pharaoh will be irreparably broken (v. 22), while the arms of the king of Babylon will be strengthened (v. 24). God will put a sword of destruction in the hand of Nebuchadnezzar (v. 25) and scatter the Egyptians among the nations (v. 26). Thus will the Egyptians know and recognize God.

31:1-18 Allegory of the cypress. The fifth section, dated June 587 B.C.E. (v. 1), is a three-part prophecy addressed to Pharaoh and his retinue (v. 2). A description of a great tree, more beautiful than any tree in the garden of God (vv. 3-9), opens the poem. Then follows a prose account describing the fall of the great tree on account of its pride (vv. 10-14), and its consignment to the nether world (vv. 15-18).

32:1-16 Dirge over Pharaoh. Dated March 585 B.C.E., this composite section opens with a fragment of a lament (vv. 1-3) over the destruction of Pharaoh, here symbolized as a lion and a sea monster. It continues as an oracle of judgment (vv. 3-8) against Pharaoh, allegorically portrayed as a sea monster that God will catch and throw upon the shore, where the beasts of the earth will devour the carcass. Then follows a series of later expansions that abandon the sea-monster imagery completely. First a prose interpretation of the grief that the nations will feel in seeing God's sword brandished against Egypt (vv. 9-10) is added. Next an oracle about Nebuchadnezzar as God's agent in bringing a sword of destruction against Egypt (vv. 11-14) appears. Then, closing the section is a brief prose subscription (vv. 15-16) which first reiterates the claim that the desolation of Egypt will be a means through which the nations will know the Lord and then concludes with an instruction to the daughters of the nations to take up a lament over Egypt's demise (on the role of women in mourning, see Jer 9:16-19).

32:17-32 Dirge over Egypt. [The New American Bible text reads 32:17-18, 20, 19, 21-32. The transpositions were seemingly made to achieve a smoother reading of this difficult passage.]

This seventh oracle opens with a date that most likely is April 586 B.C.E. (the Hebrew text lacks a month). The prophet is told to wail (v. 18) over the condemnation of Egypt to the underworld. Egypt's comfort will consist in the fact that its descent to Sheol has been preceded by that of other great world powers. Already gone down to the underworld from the Mesopotamian region are Assyria (v. 22), which fell to Babylonia in 612 B.C.E.; Elam (v. 24), a country east of Babylon, which was conquered by the Assyrian Ashurbanipal in 650 B.C.E. (see Jer 49:35-39); and Meshech and Tubal (v. 25), two tribes in Asia Minor that traded slaves with Tyre and terrorized Assyria. From the Palestinian region, Edom (v. 29) and the Sidonians (that is, Phoenicians; v. 30) lie among the slain in the pit with Egypt.

Ezekiel's prophecies against Egypt were probably the most important of all for the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem. Several of these oracles are dated prior to the fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C.E. (see 29:1; 30:20; 31:1). Ezekiel tried to convince the leaders of Jerusalem that Egyptian help was a delusion, but his words, like those of Jeremiah, went unheeded. From this group of seven oracles against Egypt (29:1–32:32), the entire cycle of oracles against Israel's seven neighbors (25:1–32:32) may then have grown as Ezekiel and his followers reflected on the worldwide significance of God's judgment of the covenant people Israel.

PART IV: SALVATION FOR ISRAEL

Ezek 33:1–39:29

The fall of Jerusalem marks the turning point in Ezekiel's message. Following the horror of 587 B.C.E., the prophet turns from dire predictions and condemnations of false hope to a radical revival of the spirit of the people. In chapters 33–39 Ezekiel and his followers counter false despair in a series of sermons that project new and renewed forms of life for the community, which doubts its ability to survive. Significantly, this section on salvation for Israel opens with God's demand for personal responsibility both for Ezekiel as a lookout for the people and for every individual.

33:1-9 The prophet as watchman. Chapter 33 resumes the theme of the prophet as God's lookout within Israel (compare 3:17-21). Ezekiel has the responsibility of declaring to the wicked their sins (vv. 8-9). If he fails to do so, the wicked will receive punishment for their misdeeds, and his own life will also be required. Ezekiel's warnings and judgments are designed to lead Israel to the knowledge that God stands ready to forgive those who have turned from their wicked ways. As the lookout, Ezekiel has assumed an awesome responsibility, greater than that of any other prophet in Israel. His duty to watch and to warn the wicked and the faithful must weigh heavily upon him, especially as the end of Jerusalem draws closer and closer.

33:10-20 Individual retribution. This section, which is a disputation on individual responsibility, also resumes an earlier theme (see ch. 18). The prophet seeks to overcome the despair of those who resign themselves to their just fate and to refute the bitter anger of those who hold that the Lord is punishing Israel unjustly for the sins of previous generations. Ezekiel maintains that God longs to forgive the wicked and awaits their repentance (see vv. 11, 19). The prophet also argues that the virtuous will live (v. 13), though just how Ezekiel supposed God would spare the righteous in the coming devastation is not indicated. Presumably he counted upon the preservation of a righteous remnant in exile, with whom the Lord would make a fresh start.

33:21-22 The fugitive from Jerusalem. This brief section reports the arrival of the fugitive who brings the news that Jerusalem has fallen (compare 24:25-27). The date listed in verse 21 is about eighteen months after the actual fall of Jerusalem. The fugitive arrives "on the fifth day of the tenth month in the twelfth year of exile." According to 2 Kgs 25:2, 8-9, Jerusalem fell on the seventh day of the fifth month in the eleventh year of Zedekiah (compare Jer 52:12, which lists the same year and month but specifies the tenth day of the month). The journey from Jerusalem to Babylon would be expected to take about four months (see Ezra 7:9). Even allowing for exhaustion or a circuitous route, the fugitive's traveling time seems unreasonably long.

The evening before the fugitive arrives, Ezekiel experiences the hand of the Lord upon him (compare his similar experience in his call to be a prophet in 1:3 and 3:14). At the same time, Ezekiel recovers his ability to speak (v. 22; compare 3:22-27). The prophet is freed to new action on behalf of the Lord. He begins a new phase in his prophetic career, and from this point onward in the book, he delivers a more hopeful message to the people.

33:23-29 The survivors in Judah. The judgment against those in the ruined land of Judah who assumed that God would restore the land through them probably belongs to the period just after the fall of Jerusalem. Since those who remain in the land continue to practice the same sins that led to the ruin of Israel, further devastation awaits them. The implication of this oracle is that the Lord's fresh start will be made with the exiles, not with those who remain in the land of Judah. The judgment is therefore an implicit word of hope for the people in exile.

33:30-33 The prophet's false popularity. In this section God speaks directly to Ezekiel about his effectiveness as a prophet. Even though Ezekiel is popular, his message is not heeded (v. 32). To the exiles he is only a clever entertainer (compare Ezekiel's complaint that the exiles regarded him as "one who is forever spinning parables," 21:5). God declares that in the near future the exiles will recognize the accomplishment of the words the prophet has spoken; then they will recognize that a prophet has been among them (compare 2:5). This word is therefore an implicit word of encouragement for Ezekiel. His effectiveness is not to be measured by his present reception in the community.

34:1-16 Parable of the shepherds. In a composite oracle (notice that following the revelation formula in verse 1 there are three introductory formulas in verses 2, 10, 11) against wicked shepherds (= rulers; see Ps 78:71; Isa 44:28; 63:11; Jer 2:8; 10:21; Zech 11:4-17), God declares their end. Because the shepherds of the past have failed in their responsibilities to the sheep (vv. 2-6), God is coming against them to punish them and to rescue the sheep. God will take over the shepherd's responsibilities (vv. 11-16). God will be the good shepherd (compare Gen 48:15; Psalm 23; Jer 31:10; Mark 6:34; John 10:1-18), tending the sheep, rescuing the scattered of the flock, bringing them to rest in good pastures in their own land, where the lost will be sought out and those who stray brought back, where the injured will be bound up and the sick healed.

34:17-31 Separation of the sheep. Sayings related to the shepherd theme are grouped here, though the emphasis shifts from the shepherd who has failed the sheep to judgments against sheep who have misused their power. In verses 17-19, which open with an introductory formula, God addresses the sheep with words of judgment, saying that callous self-interest will be punished. Verses 20-22, which also open with an introductory formula, continue the theme of the strong versus the weak sheep. In verses 23-24 there is an abrupt shift in content from the theme of sheep against sheep to the theme of the appointment of a messianic prince. A human shepherd is promised who will feed the sheep (v. 23; compare vv. 2-10, where God was personally to fulfill this task). David, the great ancestor of the royal house in Jerusalem, is to be the future shepherd/prince, and the Lord will be God.

In verses 25-27, which end with a recognition formula, shepherd imagery is abandoned completely as the passage shifts to an elaboration of the covenant of peace between God and the people. Verses 28-30, which also end with a recognition formula, provide information about the security and prosperity the restored house of Israel will experience. Verse 31 reintroduces the sheep imagery in a closing formula that emphasizes God's desire for the salvation of the people.

The many seams in this section demonstrate the importance of the concept of God's desire for the future salvation of the covenant people to both Ezekiel and his followers.

35:1-15 Against Edom. Continuing the denouncement begun in 25:12-14, Ezekiel here repudiates the hope of the Edomites that they will take over the former land of Israel and Judah. He attacks Edom for its enmity against its neighbor nation Israel at the time of Jerusalem's fall in 587 and for its effort to settle in the land (v. 10). Ezekiel denounces Mount Seir, the high place of Edom, and declares that God will not permit the land of Israel and Judah to pass into the hands of the Edomites. Because Edom has cherished enmity toward Israel, it is to suffer a fate worse than that of Judah: Edom is to become a perpetual desolation. And as the four recognition formulas in verses 4, 9, 12, 15 underscore, thus will Edom know the Lord.

36:1-15 Regeneration of the land. The oracle against Mount Seir of Edom prepares the way for the promise of restoration now delivered to the exiles. The mountains of Israel are told a word that explicitly draws a contrast between the destruction promised the high places of Edom and the future restoration of Israel.

In this complex section, which contains six introductory "thus says the Lord" formulas (vv. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 13), a displaced concluding recognition formula (v. 11) before the end of the passage, and two closing "says the Lord" formulas (vv. 14, 15), the mountains of Israel, condemned earlier in chapter 6, are promised regeneration. The promise of restoration that was begun in chapter 34 with the announcement of new leadership (the Davidic Messiah) gains momentum with the promise of a new land. Verses 1-7 promise that the nations which have ridiculed Israel, particularly Edom, will suffer reproach. Verses 8-15 promise prosperity to the mountains of Israel when the exiles return to repopulate the land.

36:16-38 Regeneration of the people. The second half of chapter 36, which develops God's reasons for the repopulation of the land, divides into five subsections defined by formulas and shifts in address. In verses 16-21 God speaks to Ezekiel about the cause of the Exile. In God's sight the defilement of the land by the chosen people was "like the defilement of a menstruous woman" (v. 17; compare Lev 15:19). Personal responsibility, as Ezekiel had earlier said, explicitly required that a virtuous person "not defile his neighbor's wife, nor have relations with a woman in her menstrual period" (18:6; see also 22:10). Because of their reprehensible defilement of the land and their idolatry, the people were scattered. Yet, even in other lands they continued to profane God's holy name (v. 20). Now grief over the preservation of the holiness of the divine name motivates God to tell Ezekiel that the Exile will end (v. 21).

In verses 22-23, which are framed as a subunit by an introductory formula and a recognition formula, God speaks directly to the house of Israel. God rehearses their wicked history and emphasizes that it is not for their sakes that the Exile will end. Zeal for the holiness of the divine name motivates God to return the people to the land. Here, as in chapter 20, the dominant motivation for restoration is concern for the preservation of God's holiness.

Verses 24-32 list a series of individual acts that God will initiate so that the people can live in the kind of obedience that will preserve the holiness of God's name. God will gather the chosen people from their exile and lead them back to their own land (v. 24). Then, in a three-stage purification, God will create a new, radically reordered human harmony. First, God will ritually cleanse the people from their past impurities and idols (v. 25; on washing as a means of purification, see Num 19:9-21; Ps 51:3-4). Second, God will transplant new hearts and spirits into the people (v. 26; compare Jer 31:31-34). And third, God will animate their human hearts with the divine spirit, so that the people will have the inner power to live by God's statutes and decrees (v. 27). Verses 28-32 describe the material prosperity God will give the people when they return to the land, and they close with a sober reminder that these benefits are given, not for the sake of the people, but to set forth God's glory in the world.

Verses 33-36, which open with an introductory formula, promise that when Israel is rebuilt, the neighboring nations will recognize God's power. And verses 37-38, which open with another introductory formula, promise that in the future restoration to the land, Israel will be abundantly repopulated.

37:1-14 Vision of the dry bones. Ezekiel's vision in the valley (or the "plain," which is the same location as that in his call, 3:22) filled with dry bones is perhaps the best known section of the book. It is composed of a dramatic report of a vision (vv. 1-10) and its interpretation (vv. 11-14). The occasion is a time when the exiles have lost all hope in the future. The people who had once hoped falsely in the inviolability of Jerusalem and their past history now despair falsely, saying, "Our bones are dried up, our hope is lost, and we are cut off" (v. 11).

The prophet experiences the hand of the Lord upon him (see our comment at 33:22) and is led to the center of a place filled with numerous dry bones (vv. 1-2). In this place filled with countless signs of death, God puts the question to Ezekiel, "Can these bones come to life?" The prophet surrenders to God the power to make such a decision about life and death, and with reserve replies, "You alone know that" (v. 3).

God then instructs Ezekiel to prophesy to the dead bones so that a new spirit, sinews, flesh, skin, and breath will revive the bones (vv. 4-6). Ezekiel does so and hears a great noise as sinews, flesh, and skin cover the bones, but no spirit comes into them (vv. 7-8). In a second instruction God tells him to call the spirit from the four winds to come and breathe life into the slain (v. 9). Again Ezekiel does as commanded, and the spirit revives a great upright army of live bodies (v. 10).

In the interpretation that follows, God declares that those whose hope has turned to despair will be led from their experience of death to new life in the land of Israel (vv.

11-12). This interpretation of resurrection employs a different picture of the place from which the dead bones are reassembled. Here the bones are raised from proper graves (v. 12), not from a valley strewn with unburied bones. The Lord will burst the bonds of the grave to restore the people to new political existence. Verses 13-14, which contain two recognition formulas, emphasize that the new life that the Lord will grant the people will revive both their understanding of God and their life in the land. The picture in Ezekiel is not that of individual resurrection from the dead. This is a visionary description of a new corporate political beginning for Israel.

37:15-28 The two sticks. A symbolic action (vv. 15-17; compare chs. 4-5; 12; 24:17) and its interpretation (vv. 18-28, to which later materials have been added; see the two introductory formulas in verses 19, 21) portray the reunion of North Israel and Judah. Ezekiel hopes not only for the restoration of the Judean exiles in Babylon, but also for the reassembly of the exiles of Israel who were carried away by the Assyrians in 721 B.C.E. to a location most likely unknown to Ezekiel. Though the exiles from Israel have long since ceased to be a recognizable entity, Ezekiel envisions that in the sovereign purpose of God they are destined to return to the land along with the exiles from Judah. The restored people will be ruled by one prince (v. 22), whose identity (v. 24) is the same as the Davidic shepherd-prince described in chapter 34. God promises to dwell among the people and to make an everlasting covenant with them (vv. 26-27). Thus shall the nations recognize that it is the Lord who makes Israel holy (v. 28).

38:1–39:29 Prophecy against Gog. [The New American Bible divides these chapters into three prophecies against Gog by rearranging the text of chapter 38 to read 38:1-13, 17-23 as a first prophecy against Gog, and 38:14-16 as a second prophecy against Gog. These chapters are complex, yet content and the appearance of only one messenger formula in 38:1 suggest that chapters 38–39 are a unity composed of four subsections: 38:2-13; 38:14-24; 39:1-16; 39:17-29, each of which is marked by an instruction to Ezekiel to speak. The first three subsections have Gog as their subject; the last subsection is directed to birds and wild animals.]

The clue to understanding these strange chapters, which are unlike the other materials in Ezekiel, is in 38:17. The question there occurs as to whether the enemy who comes from the land of Magog is that enemy whom the prophets spoke of in former days. This verse suggests that the chapters originated in later speculation concerning the great enemy from the north referred to in Jer 1:13-16; 4:5-8; 6:1-8, 22-26. The enemy here is called Gog, a name that probably does not refer directly to any world power, just as the land named Magog does not refer to any particular land (this vague enemy from the north is allied to Meshech and Tubal; compare 38:2 and 27:13).

This is an apocalyptic vision, similar to that found in Isa 24–27. It tells of the coming of a massive force against Israel, after Israel's restoration to the homeland (38:12). The enemy comes at the will of God, who is about to display a mighty show of power before all the nations. The Lord will defeat the forces of Gog, scattering the slain over the entire land of Israel. It will take seven months to gather up the bones of the slain and bury them (39:12). This carnage will have the double purpose of causing Israel to know that the Lord is their God (39:22) and of causing the nations to see the saving power of God, who exiled the people for their sins but has now secured their lives from harm (39:23-29).

These chapters may have been produced by Ezekiel (the language of 39:21-29 is quite similar to that found elsewhere in the book). More likely, however, they are the product of some of Ezekiel's disciples. The notion of a massive battle at the last day seems not to have entered Ezekiel's thoughts elsewhere in the book. It may be that some of his disciples had portrayed in veiled language the coming destruction of Babylonia. Yet, the fact that Israel will already have been liberated from exile when the enemy arises would seem to make such a view implausible. Gog seems better considered as a mythical world power invented by the disciples to emphasize God's protection of Israel.

PART V: THE NEW ISRAEL

Ezek 40:1–48:35

The closing section of the Book of Ezekiel contains an architectural sketch of the temple complex in Jerusalem (40:1–42:20), a description of restored worship in the temple (43:1–44:3), laws regarding temple personnel and practices (44:4–47:12), and the boundaries for a reapportionment of the land (47:13–48:35). These chapters are an idealized vision of the restoration of a new Israel to the homeland (compare chs. 34, 36, 37). Renewed life is now rightly centered on the temple. And the name of the new city is appropriately "The Lord is here" (48:35).

The New Temple

40:1-5 The man with a measure. Only one date, April 28, 573 B.C.E. (v. 1), appears in chapters 40–48. On this day Ezekiel is transported (compare 8:3) to a high mountain in the land of Israel, where he sees a divine vision of a city being rebuilt. He observes a celestial man at the gate of the city with two measuring devices in his hand—a linen cord and a measuring rod (six cubits long = about 10½ feet; v. 5). The divine messenger explains that he is Ezekiel's guide and cautions the prophet to pay close attention to all that he is to see. Then the guide proceeds to measure the width and height of a 10½-foot-wide by 10½-foot-high outer wall that surrounds the temple.

40:6-16 The east gate. Beginning at the east gate (which is the gate through which God departed the city in 10:19), the guide climbs its steps (there are most likely seven steps—see 40:22, 26) and measures the gate's threshold, or entrance hall, which is 10½ feet long (v. 6). Then he goes into a long corridor that is flanked on each side by three 10½-foot-square roomlike recesses (v. 7a). At the end of the corridor of the gateway is another threshold, or entrance hall, which is also 10½ feet long (v. 7b). This symmetrical entrance way leads to a roomy vestibule (about 14 by 35 feet), which opens onto the outer court of the temple.

40:17-19a The outer court. Thirty rooms occupy the north, south, and east inside perimeter of the outer wall of the temple. A pavement in front of these rooms connects the three sides of the outer court. Verse 19 fixes the distance between the outer and inner east gates as one hundred cubits (a distance of about 175 feet).

40:19b-23, 24-27 The north gate, the south gate. Built into the north and south outer walls are two gates identical in construction with the east gate (see vv. 6-16). Steps, a threshold, a corridor flanked by three rooms, and another threshold lead out to a vestibule. As decorative features, each of the gate structures has recessed windows, palm-tree reliefs on the jambs, and pilasters (rectangular columns set into the walls as an ornamental motif).

40:28-29, 31-37 Gates of the inner court. [The New American Bible omits verse 30 on the grounds that it duplicates verse 29. It should be noted that the dimensions of the vestibule are altered from 50 by 25 cubits in verse 29 to 25 by 5 cubits in verse 30. Most likely verse 30 is corrupt, since verses 29, 33, and 36 agree on the longer dimensions.]

The guide next takes Ezekiel across the outer courtyard (a distance of about 175 feet, according to verse 19) to measure the south, east, and north gates in an inner wall. These gates are duplicates of the outer gates, except that their vestibules are on the outside of the gate structures, so that they face the vestibules of the outer gates. The only difference in these reversed structures in the inner wall is that they have eight steps, not seven (compare vv. 31, 34, 37 and 22, 26) leading to them.

40:38-47 Side rooms. In verses 38-39 it is not clear exactly which gate contains the described sacrificial equipment. Perhaps the vestibules of all three inner gates are furnished with a room for washing burnt offerings (see the requirement of Lev 1:9, 13) and two tables on each side, upon which are slaughtered sin offerings and guilt offerings (see 45:13-17).

From verse 40 to the end of this section, Ezekiel sees twelve tables, which seem to be described from the perspective of the north gate. According to verse 40, two tables stand on each side of the outside wall of the vestibule of the inner gate, which most likely means that these four tables are in the outer court at the foot of the steps leading up to the north inner gate. According to verse 41, another four tables, which are used for slaughter, stand in the vestibule of the inner gate (also described in verse 39). Verses 42-43 describe four small cut-stone tables, which are intended to hold the instruments of slaughter and are most likely located near the slaughter tables on either side of the vestibule.

Verses 44-46 explain that two rooms occupy the inside of the inner court wall, beside the north and south gateways. These rooms face each other, though it is unclear whether they are located to the right or to the left of the gates. The room by the north gate is for the use of the priests who care for the temple. The room by the south gate is for the priests who sacrifice at the altar (Zadokites, according to 44:15-21).

The inner court is next measured as a perfect square (about 175 feet square), and the altar is described as standing in front of the temple (v. 47).

40:48–41:15a The temple building. From the inner north gate, the guide next takes Ezekiel across the inner court to the vestibule of the temple building. Ten steps lead up to the temple vestibule, which measures about 35 by 21 feet. The exterior of the vestibule area is described as featuring wall pillars (pilasters), two columns beside the jambs (compare 1 Kgs 7:15-22), and a wide doorway (40:48-49). Beyond the doorway is the nave, a room that measures about 35 feet wide by 70 feet deep (41:1-2). Ezekiel remains in this area while the heavenly guide proceeds to measure the holy of holies, a 35-foot-square room (41:3-4).

The architectural details of the measurements taken in chapter 41:5-15 are obscure. The guide first measures the wall of the temple, then ninety rooms built in three stories outside the temple with some kind of stairway connecting them, and finally a large structure behind the temple that is simply called "the building" (41:12).

41:15b-26 Interior of the temple. This section resumes the description of the outer vestibule and inner nave of the temple, where Ezekiel was left standing in 41:1. High windows allow light to enter the nave. Ornamental wood carvings of palm trees and two-faced cherubs, each with a human and a lion face, cover the wood-paneled walls of the nave and the vestibule (vv. 15b-20). A 5-foot 3-inch-high, 3½-foot-square table stands before the entrance to the holy of holies (v. 22; compare 1 Kgs 6:21). And two sets of double doors decorated with the same design as that on the walls separate the vestibule from the nave, and the nave from the holy of holies (vv. 23-25).

42:1-14 Other structures. This section is extremely difficult to interpret. Apparently the guide takes Ezekiel to a square area behind the west end of the temple building, where he measures two building complexes on the south and the north sides of the western square. These buildings serve as sacristies for the priests; here they eat the sacred meals, store cereal, sin, and guilt offerings, and vest for temple activities.

42:15-20 Measuring the outer court. The guide takes Ezekiel from the nave to the outer east gate and there begins the final measurements of the external east, north, south, and west walls. The perimeter of the exterior walls forms a square 500 cubits, or about 875 feet on a side. The purpose of this outer wall is to separate the holy area of the temple complex from its profane surroundings.

Restoration of the Temple

43:1-9 The return of the Lord. When full measurements have been completed, the guide takes Ezekiel to the east gate, where the prophet sees the return of God's glory to the reconstituted temple. God, who departed the temple on the throne-chariot by the east gate as a sign of judgment (11:22-23), now returns through this same gate as a sign of restoration (43:1-5). Ezekiel is overwhelmed and falls to his face (compare 1:28b), but the spirit (not the guide; compare 8:3) takes him to the inner court, where God speaks to the prophet, promising to dwell in the midst of Israel forever (vv. 7-9).

43:10-12 The law of the temple. God instructs Ezekiel to describe the measurements and design of the temple and to teach the house of Israel the law, or torah (instruction), of the temple, that the "whole surrounding area on the mountain top shall be most sacred." Ezekiel is charged with the priestly duty of making known to the people the torah about God's possession of this high mountain (compare 40:2) and the divine presence which sets this area apart as holy. Israel is to be ashamed of its sins in the face of the majesty of God.

43:13-27 The altar. Ezekiel receives detailed instructions about the dimensions and consecration of the altar. The altar of burnt offering is described as a large structure 18 cubits square at its base, with successive layers 16, 14, and 12 cubits square (vv. 13-17). At each of the four corners of the top layer are horns, vertical protrusions about 20.4 inches high (v. 15; traditionally these were places of utmost sanctity and refuge—see Exod 21:13; 27:2; 29:12; and 1 Kgs 1:50; 2:28). In an elaborate seven-day ritual, the Levitical priests are to consecrate this altar to God by ritually sacrificing young bulls, unblemished he-goats, and rams, and by scattering salt (vv. 18-27).

44:1-3 The closed gate. The heavenly guide takes Ezekiel from the inner court (43:5) to the outer east gate, which has been closed. The guide explains that this gate is to remain perpetually shut as a sign that God returned to the temple through it. Only the prince may sit in the vestibule of this gate structure when he eats his sacrificial meal.

The New Law

44:4-9 Admission to the temple. Next the guide leads Ezekiel to the inner court (v. 4; compare 43:5, where the spirit took him to this same place). The prophet observes God's glory filling the temple and once again falls to his face (compare 43:3). In a manner closely dependent on 40:4, the guide urges Ezekiel to listen closely to all he will hear about the statutes and laws of God's temple (v. 5).

The house of Israel is charged as a "rebellious house" (compare chs. 2; 12; 17:12; 24:3) that has in the past admitted foreigners to service in the sanctuary (vv. 6-8). The first law of the restored temple prohibits foreigners from entering the sanctuary (v. 9).

44:10-14 Levites. The next regulation limits the service of the Levites to that of temple servants and gatekeepers. Their duties include guarding the gates (perhaps they stood in the square, roomlike recesses in the corridors of the gate structures—see 40:10) and slaughtering sacrifices for the people (v. 11). This demotion to menial tasks (once performed by foreigners, according to verse 8) has come about because of the Levites' own sins (v. 12). They are now prohibited from the priestly ministries that involve handling the most sacred things of the temple (v. 13).

44:15-31 Priests. Because of their faithfulness, the Zadokites are elected to full priestly service (vv. 15-16). In a composite section, various regulations about their dress (vv. 17-19), personal conduct (vv. 20-22), duties (vv. 23-24), purification after mourning (vv. 25-27), and benefits (vv. 28-31) have been assembled. Within the sacred precincts priests are required to wear linen garments (v. 17; compare the man dressed in linen in 9:2, 11; 10:2, 7; and the vestry described in 42:14). Priests are required to keep their hair carefully trimmed (v. 20), to refrain from drinking before entering the inner court of the temple (v. 21), and to marry virgins or the widows of other priests (v. 22). Their responsibilities include teaching (v. 23) and juridical decision-making (v. 24). Should a priest become unclean by coming near a dead person, he must be ritually cleansed (see Num 19:11-12) and wait an additional seven days before entering the inner court (vv. 25-27). Priests are to own no land (v. 28; contradicted in 45:4; 48:10-12). Their income is a portion of the sacrifices (vv. 29-31).

45:1-8 The sacred tract of land. These verses detail the dimensions of a three-part division of a square area of land, about 43,750 feet on a side, into east-to-west strips (compare 48:8-22). The northernmost strip is assigned to the Levites, the middle strip to the sanctuary complex and the Zadokites, and the southernmost strip to the city and the people. An area on the east and west fringes of these strips is allotted to the prince. This idealized scheme places the temple at the center of the reapportioned land in an area separate from the city and the royal dwelling.

45:9-12 Weights and measures. Verse 9 is a self-contained oracle with its own introductory and concluding formulas. Addressed to the princes of Israel, it warns against violence and oppression. According to verses 10-12, the princes are to see that correct weights and measures are honestly regulated.

45:13-17 Offerings. Two offering ordinances have been combined detailing the contributions required from the people for the support of the temple (vv. 13-15) and from the people to the prince, who in turn is obliged to provide for the support of the temple (vv. 16-17). The original ordinance is most likely the one according to which the people support the temple directly.

45:18-25 The Passover; the feast of Booths. Three seven-day festivals are listed here. The first is an annual rite of purification of the temple (vv. 18-20). The second is the celebration of the Passover (vv. 21-24). And the third is the celebration of Booths, or the Ingathering of the crops. Passover, traditionally celebrated at the beginning of each year, and Booths, in the middle of the year, become occasions on which the prince offers sacrifices to ensure the purity of the community.

46:1-7 Sabbaths. Though the outer east gate is perpetually closed (44:1-2), the inner east gate may be opened on sabbaths and on new moons (and on other special occasions—see v. 12). The prince is permitted to enter through this gate to take sacrifices to the doorpost of the gate on behalf of the people who remain in the outer court. Listed here are the requirements for sabbath and new-moon sacrifices, which the prince presents to the priests, who alone are allowed to enter the inner court to sacrifice to the Lord (vv. 4-7).

46:8-15 Ritual laws. Ritual requires that the people enter the temple area by either the north or the south gate and that they leave by the gate opposite the one they entered (v. 9). Ritual also prescribes that the prince enter and exit in this same manner on nonfestal days (v. 10) and stipulates the offerings the prince is to take on solemn feasts as free-will offerings and as daily offerings.

46:16-18 The prince and the land. The prince's right to the land is strictly regulated. He can give land as a permanent inheritance to his sons and as a temporary gift to his servants. He is forbidden to seize land from others.

46:19-24 The temple kitchens. Once again resuming Ezekiel's tour of the temple (see chs. 40–42; 44:1-9), the heavenly guide takes the prophet first to the kitchen on the west side of the temple, where the priests eat their portions of the sacred offerings (vv. 19-20; not mentioned in the description of the priests' chambers in 42:1-14). Next they go to see four kitchens, one in each corner of the outer court, where the laity eat their sacrificial meals, which are prepared by the Levites (vv. 21-24; also not mentioned in the description of the outer court in 40:17-19; 42:15-20).

47:1-2 The wonderful stream. Ezekiel and his guide return to the front of the temple, where the prophet notices water trickling from below the south wall of the temple (v. 1). As the guide leads Ezekiel through the north outer gate, the prophet sees that the water has changed course and is flowing beneath the south wall of the temple toward the east (v. 2). The farther east the prophet goes, the greater the flow of water becomes. Four times the guide measures the water, and each time its depth increases dramatically until it has become a torrent (vv. 3-5). Ezekiel sees wonderful trees on both its banks (vv. 6-7). The guide explains that the life-giving waters of this river that springs from the throne of God will make the salt waters of the Dead Sea fresh, and barren places fertile with trees whose fruit is good for food and whose leaves drive sickness away (vv. 8-12).

Thus the measurements of the heavenly guide are finished in this climactic vision of the temple in Jerusalem as the source of a great river that flows out to the east, emptying into the Dead Sea and bringing life wherever it goes. This closing motif derives from the ancient myth of the mountain city from which the rivers of the earth flow (see Gen 2:10-14) and reappears in later apocalyptic literature (see Zech 14:8; Rev 22). It fittingly concludes Ezekiel's vision of revitalized worship in a restored temple.

The New Israel

47:13-20 Boundaries of the land. Inserted between an opening oracular formula (v. 13) and a closing formula (v. 23) is a description of the boundaries of the restored land. These boundaries portray no vast expansion of Israelite territory, but they break the old tribal boundaries by providing land in equal measure to each tribe, with little regard to the territory formerly occupied. The northern boundary is fixed as the frontier of Hamath, the pass between the Lebanon and Hermon mountains, and the southern boundary as Kadesh and the Wadi of Egypt. The Mediterranean provides the western border, and the eastern boundary is the Jordan River and the Dead Sea. The extent of this land is no greater than that held under David.

47:21–48:7 The northern portion. Before the distribution of the land begins, the notice appears that resident aliens, like native Israelites, are to have equal rights of ownership (vv. 22-23). Then, beginning in the north, the land is apportioned in equal east-to-west strips to seven tribes: Dan, Asher, Naphtali, Manasseh, Ephraim, Reuben, and Judah (48:1-8).

48:8-22 The sacred tract. The southern boundary of Judah's territory is the land set apart for the Levites, the temple, the Zadokites, and the prince. The details listed here accord with those specified in 45:1-8.

48:23-29 The southern portions. Below the sacred tract the following five tribes will settle: Benjamin, Simeon, Issachar, Zebulun, and Gad.

48:30-35 The gates of the city. The book closes with a reference to the twelve gates of the city of Jerusalem, one named for each of the tribes (the name of Joseph now appearing in place of Ephraim and Manasseh so as to make room for a Levi gate), to the city's circumference, and to its new name, "The Lord is here."

COMMENTARY: DANIEL

PART I: DANIEL AND THE KINGS OF BABYLON

Dan 1:1–6:29

The first section of the Book of Daniel is a collection of six independent, edifying short stories about Daniel and his companions. According to these chapters, Daniel was taken as a youth into Babylonian exile in 606 B.C.E. (see Dan 1:1), where he lived as a pious and loyal Jew who possessed the power to interpret dreams and visions. Purportedly telling of events that occurred in the court of Babylonia and Medo-Persia during the period of exile in the sixth century B.C.E., these stories are of two types: tests of loyalty (chs. 1, 3, 6) and displays of wisdom (chs. 2, 4, 5). They teach that through obedience to the law the faithful will triumph over adversity and convince foreign powers of the sovereignty of Yahweh.

These chapters raise troublesome issues about the date of composition, unity of authorship, and original language of the Book of Daniel. Most scholars are agreed that the Book of Daniel is the work of more than one author and that it took its present form around the year 165 B.C.E., toward the end of the oppressive reign of the Seleucid king Antiochus IV Epiphanes, who persecuted the Jews of Jerusalem and Judah (175–163 B.C.E.). The opening chapters, however, seem to be earlier compositions. Since the tales in Dan 1–6, with the possible exception of chapter 2, do not contain veiled apocalyptic historical references and do not explicitly refer to the persecution of the second-century community, they are likely from a time earlier than that of Antiochus IV. Their vocabulary, knowledge of Persian and Hellenistic customs, and fundamentally inaccurate descriptions of major sixth-century historical events and personages make it equally unlikely that the chapters come from their purported time of the Babylonian Exile. For instance, the historical Nebuchadnezzar attacked Jerusalem and led Jehoiachin, not Jehoiakim, into exile in 597 B.C.E., not 606 B.C.E., as claimed in 1:1; Belshazzar was the son of Nabonidus, not Nebuchadnezzar, as stated in 5:11; and Babylon was conquered by Cyrus, not Darius the Mede, as credited in 6:1. Chapters 1–6 employ a common folklore plot of the success of the uncompromising wise courtier, and thus contain a message for those who are living in oppression or in times when accommodation to foreign culture is a danger. Though there is room for debate, the chapters seem best to fit the need of the third-century community to resist assimilating too much Greek culture into Judaism.

That our final form of Daniel is written in three languages is an additional complication. The book begins in Hebrew (1:1–2:4a), shifts to Aramaic (2:4b–7:28), and then back to Hebrew for the remainder of the protocanonical chapters (8:1–12:13). Deuterocanonical Greek additions consisting of the "Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Young Men" (inserted into the story of the fiery furnace in chapter 3) and "Susanna," "Bel," and "The Dragon" (appended in chapters 13:1–14:42) further testify to the complex compositional history that lies behind the present text.

The Book of Daniel as a whole is a religious tract written to encourage people faced with difficult choices. The opening chapters were likely told to encourage the Jewish people to stand firm in the midst of alien pressures, as Daniel and his friends had done.

Told first most likely in the third century B.C.E. and then retold in the second century B.C.E. by the redactor/author who gave shape to the final protocanonical text (chs. 1–12), these chapters set the tone for what follows.

1:1-21 The food test. The first short story introduces Daniel and his companions, tells of their training in Nebuchadnezzar's court, and recounts their struggle with the compromises required by life in a foreign culture, particularly the dilemma involved in being required to eat and drink ritually impure food.

Verses 1-2 set the story in Babylon in the year 606 B.C.E., identified here as the year in which Nebuchadnezzar laid seige to Jerusalem and led Jehoiakim to exile in the land of Shinar (an ancient name for Babylonia; see Gen 11:2; Zech 5:11). In actuality, Nebuchadnezzar attacked Jerusalem in 597 B.C.E., when Jehoiachin was on the throne, and it was this king who was led into exile when Zedekiah was appointed to rule Jerusalem (see 2 Kgs 24:10-17). Though historically inaccurate, the opening verses create a time of exile in a foreign setting as the scene of the narrative.

Verses 3-7 define the situation and characters involved in this story. Nebuchadnezzar instructs Ashpenaz, his chief chamberlain (=chief eunuch), to choose some talented, noble young Israelites for probationary training in the king's service. During the three years of their education, the candidates are to be fed from the royal table. Among those chosen by Ashpenaz are four young men from Judah, to whom Babylonian names are assigned: Daniel becomes Belteshazzar; Hananiah becomes Shadrach; Mishael becomes Meshach; Azariah becomes Abednego. In addition to a change of name, another historical source, Josephus, explains that selection for the king's service involves being rendered a eunuch (compare Esth 1:10; Deut 23:2). Without question, the identity and destiny of these four young men are altered by their training.

Verses 8-21 show that Daniel and his companions do not completely assimilate Babylonian ways. Daniel asks the chief chamberlain to allow him to eat food other than that from the royal table (the ritual regulations about meat are found in Lev 11:2-47; Deut 12:23-24; 14:3-21; there are no ritual laws concerning wine, though mention of wine as well as food is made also in Jdt 10:5; 12:1-4; on food as a sign of obedience and separation, see Tob 1:10-11; 1 Macc 1:62-63; 2 Macc 5:27). When Ashpenaz refuses out of fear of royal retribution (v. 10), Daniel makes the same request of the steward, this time asking for a ten-day trial on vegetables and water for himself and his three companions (vv. 11-13). The steward agrees, and when the four young men flourish, he allows them to continue a diet of vegetables (vv. 14-16). God rewards the faithfulness of the four by granting them such success that at the end of their time of training the king finds them ten times more knowledgeable than anyone in Babylonia. They enter the king's service, where Daniel remains until the first year of Cyrus (v. 21; 538 B.C.E.). For these four youths, loyalty to the Lord is rewarded with success in the foreign court.

2:1-49 The king's dream. The second short story is a suspenseful tale of God's disclosure to Daniel of mysteries not known to others in Nebuchadnezzar's service. The three companions figure in only a secondary fashion (see vv. 13, 17-18, 49) in this story, which is primarily a demonstration of Daniel's great wisdom.

A brief introduction (v. 1) sets the date as 603 B.C.E., the second year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign (which contradicts the three years of training required in 1:5), and establishes the situation as Nebuchadnezzar's decree that an interpreter from his kingdom tell him the details of a disturbing dream he had dreamt and explain the meaning of the dream.

In the first episode (vv. 2-13), magicians, enchanters, and sorcerers are summoned before the king, who explains that he wants them to help him understand a terrible dream that has robbed him of rest. The first response of the interpreters (the language of the text shifts from Hebrew to Aramaic for 2:4b–7:28) is that they need only be told the dream and then they will give the king its meaning. Nebuchadnezzar commands that they tell both the dream and its meaning, or they will die (v. 6).

A second time the interpreters ask for the details of the dream (v. 7), and a second time Nebuchadnezzar refuses, claiming that he cannot trust their interpretation if they cannot tell the dream (vv. 8-9). In their third word to the king (vv. 10-11), the interpreters declare that no human being, only a god, can tell a dream. Nebuchadnezzar is so angered that he decrees the death of all the wise interpreters of Babylon (v. 12). The threatening note that Daniel and his companions are sought out as members of this condemned company closes the section (v. 13).

The second episode (vv. 14-24b) involves Daniel and Arioch, the captain of the king's guard, who has been sent to execute the wise interpreters. Though there are inconsistencies in this episode (notably between verse 16, where Daniel goes freely to the king and asks for time to discover the dream's interpretation, and verse 24, where Daniel asks Arioch to arrange an audience with the king) which suggest editorial additions, the basic story line is coherent. Daniel goes to Arioch and asks why the wise interpreters of Babylon have been sentenced to death (v. 15). Then Daniel returns home to tell Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah about the failure and fate of the interpreters, and the four young men pray for deliverance from the God of heaven (v. 18; compare Tob 10:11; Jdt 5:8; 6:19; 11:17). Their prayer is answered during a nocturnal vision, in which God reveals the mystery of the king's dream to Daniel (v. 19). Daniel blesses the name of his God (vv. 20-23) and returns to Arioch, requesting a stay of execution for the wise interpreters and an audience with Nebuchadnezzar (v. 24a, b).

In the third and final episode (vv. 24c-45), Arioch takes Daniel to Nebuchadnezzar (vv. 24c-26), and Daniel tells the king both the dream and its interpretation. In the dream, Nebuchadnezzar saw a huge, human-like statue made of various metals that crumbled when it was struck at its feet by a mysterious stone (vv. 31-35). The symbolism of the destruction is explained as the demise of four successive empires, beginning with Babylon (vv. 36-45). Since this is the only place in the Old Testament where the ages of human history are described by symbolic metals, the kingdoms have been variously interpreted. Most likely, however, the head of the statue, which was made of gold, represented Babylon; the chest and arms, which were made of silver, represented Media; the belly and thighs, which were made of bronze, represented Persia; the legs, which were made of iron, represented Greece; and the feet, which were made of iron and tile, represented Alexander's divided empire ruled by the Ptolemies in Egypt and the Seleucids in Syria (the dynasty to which the hated Antiochus Epiphanes belonged). Daniel confirms as correct Nebuchadnezzar's revelation that the smashing of the statue by the stone cut by no human hand is a sign of the end of the present age and the coming of an indestructible kingdom that the God of heaven was establishing (vv. 44-45).

In a surprising conclusion (vv. 46-49), Nebuchadnezzar falls at Daniel's feet and worships him, readily acknowledges the superiority of Daniel's God (for other instances of royal conversion, see 3:95-96; 4:31-34; 6:26-28), and rewards Daniel for his great display of wisdom in telling the dream and its interpretation (a feat thus greater than that of Joseph, who interpreted the dream that Pharaoh told him—Gen 41) by promoting him to the highest office in the kingdom. The chapter closes with the note that Daniel requests administrative posts in the provinces for Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, while he himself remains at the king's court (v. 49).

3:1-97 The fiery furnace. The third short story is a dramatic contest about the identity of the true God, in which Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego show their willingness to suffer death rather than worship a god other than the God of Israel. Daniel plays no part in the story of the fiery furnace (his brush with martyrdom occurs in the lions' den, ch. 6).

No date opens this story (though the Septuagint specifies "the eighteenth year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar," 587 B.C.E.; compare Jdt 2:1). Instead, verses 1-7 deftly sketch the cause of the crisis. Nebuchadnezzar has set up a huge golden statue (87.5 feet tall and 8.75 feet wide) in the plain of Dura (an unknown Babylonian location) and has ordered an elaborate dedication ceremony, at which all are required to fall down and worship the golden statue or be cast into a white-hot furnace.

The conflict develops when some of the Babylonians approach Nebuchadnezzar and denounce the provincial administrators, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, for refusing to serve the king's god (vv. 8-13). Enraged, Nebuchadnezzar sends for the three and demands that they worship the statue, saying, "Who is the God that can deliver you out of my hands?" (v. 15). Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego refuse (to do otherwise would violate the commandments—see Exod 20:3-6), expressing both their hope that their God will deliver them and their willingness to die if necessary (vv. 17-18; compare Jdt 8:15).

The punishment is carried out in verses 19-90b. Nebuchadnezzar orders that the furnace be heated seven times more than usual (seven is used as a symbol of fullness and totality; see also 4:13, 20, 22, 29; 9:25). So hot is the furnace that the men who bound and threw Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego into the flames are consumed themselves (for others who suffer the penalty they seek to inflict, see Dan 6:25; 13:62; Esth 7:10). But the three walk about in the flames, singing to God and blessing the Lord (v. 24).

Verses 24-90b, found only in the Septuagint, detail what happens while the three are in the furnace. Included here are two prayers (vv. 26-45, 51-90) and a brief connective narrative (vv. 46-50) known in the Apocrypha as the Prayer of Azariah (= Abednego) and the Song of the Three Young Men. Though supplements to the Hebrew Bible, these verses are considered fully authoritative, deuterocanonical portions of the story by Roman Catholics. In the first prayer (vv. 26-45), which makes no mention of the fiery furnace, Abednego praises God's wisdom and justice and confesses the sinfulness of his own nation (his petition for deliverance in verses 34 and 43 for the sake of the divine name is reminiscent of Ezek 20; 36:21; 39:25). While Abednego prays, the king's men continue to stoke the furnace, and its flames devour those nearby (vv. 46-48; compare v. 22). An angel of the Lord comes down to drive the flames from the furnace (vv. 49-50). In response to their miraculous deliverance, the three young men sing a song of praise and thanksgiving to the Lord for saving them from the raging fire (vv. 51-90; compare Ps 148).

Astonished to hear the singing and bewildered at seeing four men in the midst of the flames, Nebuchadnezzar calls Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego out of the furnace (vv. 90c-97). When the king sees that they are unharmed, he blesses their God for sending them an angel of deliverance and decrees that any persons who blaspheme the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego will be cut to pieces and their houses destroyed, for "there is no other God who can rescue like this" (v. 96). Following this testimony, Nebuchadnezzar promotes the three, mentioned here for the last time in the Book of Daniel, to higher positions in the province of Babylon. As in chapter 2, faithfulness and loyalty to the Lord are rewarded with professional advancement.

3:98–4:34 Vision of the great tree. The fourth short story is written in the form of a testimonial letter from Nebuchadnezzar to his subjects (see 3:98-100). A dream and experiences of madness and restoration have convinced the king that the God of the Jews governs all human kingdoms and determines who will rule them. In this undated narrative, the king of Babylon recounts a lesson in humility taught him by the King of heaven (see 4:34). Daniel figures only in the portion of the story dealing with the interpretation of the king's dream (see 4:1-24).

The story opens with Nebuchadnezzar's account of his interpreters' failure to explain a frightening dream (vv. 1-4; the situation is similar to that of chapter 2, except that here the king will tell his dream). Daniel comes before the king, who graphically describes his dream (vv. 5-15) of a great, flourishing tree (compare Ezek 31:1-9) and the coming of a heavenly sentinel (a designation found only in Dan 4:10, 14, 20; used as a synonym for "angel" in 1 Enoch 1:5; 20:1; 2 Enoch 7:18; Book of Jubilees 4:15; Testament of Reuben 5:7; Testament of Naphtali 3:5). The heavenly sentinel announced that the tree would be cut down, leaving only its stump bound with a band of iron and bronze, and that a man would be struck with a disease that would make him like an animal for seven years.

With polite reserve, Daniel explains to Nebuchadnezzar that he is the tree that will be cut down and he is the man who will become like an animal if he fails to realize that "the Most High rules over the kingdom of men and gives it to whom he will" (v. 22). The stump will recover when the seven years of punishment have passed, but Daniel appeals to the king to atone for his sins by good deeds and thus avoid punishment (vv. 16-24; compare Sir 3:30).

Twelve months later, according to a narrative note about the king in verses 25-30, Nebuchadnezzar is struck down for pride in thinking that Babylon was built by his own achievements. As predicted, the king goes mad and eats grass like an animal (historically this is most likely a reference to Nabonidus, not Nebuchadnezzar).

In verses 31-34 Nebuchadnezzar, speaking in the first person again, says that at the end of the seven years of punishment his health, sense, and kingdom were restored and he blesses the Most High. He closes his letter to his subjects, not denying the existence of the Babylonian gods, but explaining that he now praises and exalts "the King of heaven, because all his works are right and his ways just; and those who walk in pride he is able to humble" (v. 34). In this story, acknowledgment of the Lord brings health and prosperity to a foreign king.

5:1–6:1 The writing on the wall. The fifth short story is a simple one-scene mystery story about a swiftly punished sacrilege committed by King Belshazzar, here described as Nebuchadnezzar's son (the historical Belshazzar was only a crown prince, since his father, Nabonidus, was the last king of Babylon). At a great royal banquet, under the influence of wine, Belshazzar calls for the sacred gold and silver vessels from the Jerusalem temple and uses them as goblets for himself and his guests to toast the Babylonian gods (vv. 1-4). His desecration is dramatically halted when a human finger, unattached to a body, appears and writes a mysterious message on the wall (vv. 5-6). The terrified king offers a reward to the wise interpreter of Babylon who can read the message, but none can be found (vv. 7-9; compare chs. 2 and 4). Hearing of the king's distress, the queen comes before him and suggests that Daniel be summoned (vv. 10-12).

In verses 13-16 Daniel is brought and offered the same reward as the others if he can interpret the writing (compare vv. 7 and 16). In verses 17-23 Daniel refuses the reward (though see v. 29) but agrees to interpret the message on the wall. First Daniel delivers a brief homily about the lesson of humility the Most High had taught Nebuchadnezzar (vv. 18-21; compare ch. 4). Then he accuses Belshazzar of rebelling against the Lord of heaven by profaning the temple objects that evening (vv. 22-23) and declares that the writing translates as a divine declaration of the end of the Babylonian empire (vv. 24-28). Belshazzar rewards Daniel as promised (v. 29). And later that same night the king is slain (v. 30). So it happens in this story that Daniel's wisdom is displayed and a foreign king is eliminated for failing to respect God's sovereignty. A historically confused note that Darius the Mede succeeded to the throne closes the story (6:1; at issue here is the fact that Cyrus the Persian captured the Babylonian throne of Nabonidus in 539 B.C.E.).

6:2-29 In the lions' den. The sixth short story is a dramatic test of loyalty involving King Darius, Daniel, and officials in the Medo-Persian court (compare ch. 3). Verses 2-10 describe an intrigue in which Daniel, who is one of the three supervisors of the one hundred and twenty provinces of the empire, is entrapped by jealous court rivals, who get the king to issue an immutable, irrevocable decree that for thirty days anyone who petitions a god or a person will be cast into a den of lions. Even though Daniel hears of the prohibition, he continues his customary practices of prayer (v. 11), thus violating the king's decree. Three times a day (see Ps 55:18) Daniel withdraws to an upper chamber in his home (compare 1 Kgs 17:19; Jdt 8:5) to kneel in prayer (see also Ezra 9:5; Ps 95:6; Luke 22:41; Acts 7:60; Jewish prayer postures also included standing with hands lifted toward heaven and prostration). The officials catch Daniel offering his petitions to God (v. 12) and hand him over to King Darius, who reluctantly sentences Daniel to the lions' den (vv. 13-16). Before sealing the den, the king says to Daniel, "May your God, whom you serve so constantly, save you" (vv. 17-18).

After a sleepless night, Darius returns to the den and calls out, "O Daniel, servant of the living God, has the God whom you serve so constantly been able to save you from the lions?" (vv. 19-21). Speaking the only words he utters in the entire story, Daniel replies, "O king, live forever! My God has sent his angel and closed the lions' mouths so that they have not hurt me. For I have been found innocent before him; neither to you have I done any harm, O king!" (vv. 22-23). The king orders Daniel taken out of the den, and his accusers and their families cast in (vv. 24-25).

Then Darius sends an edict (vv. 26-28) throughout his kingdom testifying to the power and sovereignty of the living God of Daniel (compare 3:95-96). A narrative note that Daniel fared well during the remainder of the reign of Darius and the reign of Cyrus (v. 29) closes the story.

PART II: DANIEL'S VISIONS

Dan 7:1–12:13

In this section the genre changes from short stories about Daniel and his three companions to apocalyptic visions (revelations; see the introduction) written in the first person and attributed to Daniel. In this series of four visions concerning the course of world history, Daniel is not the interpreter of mysteries but rather the recipient of secret revelations. Through symbolic visions (chs. 7, 8) and direct revelations (chs. 9, 10–12), Daniel learns of divine actions soon to occur. Through the mediation of angels, it is revealed that in the immediate future God will judge and destroy Antiochus IV Epiphanes. Because the chapters anticipate the death of Antiochus, it is likely that they were composed sometime late in his reign when he had turned to persecuting the Jews (around 168 B.C.E.), before his actual death (163 B.C.E.).

7:1-28 Vision of the four beasts. Still in Aramaic (as is 2:4b–7), this dream tells of a mysterious symbolic vision (vv. 1-14) and its interpretation (vv. 15-28) which were revealed to Daniel in the first year of King Belshazzar of Babylon (v. 1; compare ch. 5; Belshazzar ruled only as a regent for his father, Nabonidus, from 549 to 539 B.C.E.). In the first scene (vv. 2-8), the four winds stir the waters surrounding the earth (compare Gen 7:11), causing four horrible, evil beasts to rise from the chaotic waters: one like a lion with eagle's wings, which has its wings pulled off and is given human-like legs and a human mind (v. 4); a three-fanged animal like a ravenous bear (v. 5); a four-winged, four-headed animal like a leopard (v. 6); and a ten-horned, ravaging beast with great iron teeth and trampling feet, which is too horrible to be likened to any animal on earth (v. 7). As Daniel watches, three of the horns of the fourth beast are torn away by the emergence of a little horn with human-like eyes and a mouth that speaks arrogantly (v. 8).

The second scene of the dream is a heavenly judgment scene (vv. 9-12) in which Daniel sees the Ancient of Days (God, portrayed as an old, white-haired man dressed in white) presiding from a fiery throne with wheels (compare Ezek 1:26; 10:1) over a court of thousands of servants (on the heavenly court, see 1 Kgs 22:19; Job 1:6). When the books are opened (v. 10; compare Isa 65:6, Mal 3:16), the four beasts are brought to trial. The fourth beast is sentenced to death, and its body is cast into the fire (v. 11). The other three beasts lose their power but are permitted to live (v. 12).

In a second event in the part of his dream about the heavenly court (vv. 13-14), Daniel sees "one like a son of man" (see comment at Ezek 2:1) coming on the clouds to the court of the Ancient One. This special human figure (a symbol for the "holy people of the Most High," according to verse 27) receives the heavenly gifts of everlasting dominion, glory, and kingship over the nations.

In his dream Daniel is bewildered by the vision of the trial of the four beasts in the heavenly court and the inheritance of the one like a son of man. He seeks the meaning of his vision from "one of those present," presumably an angel interpreter (vv. 15-28). He is told that the four beasts symbolize the four kingdoms over which the holy people of the Most High will triumphantly rule (vv. 17-18; Babylon, Media, Persia, and Greece; compare ch. 2). The ten horns of the fourth beast represent the divided Greek empire of Alexander the Great, and the blasphemous little horn represents the ruler Antiochus IV Epiphanes, who persecuted the Jews of Jerusalem and Judea (see 1 Macc 1:20-63). The angel assures Daniel that though the little horn wars against the holy ones, its triumph will be brief. Dominion over it will soon be given to the holy ones of Israel (vv. 19-27). The son of man here represents God's own people, to whom victory will be given in the immediate future (v. 27). Daniel records that the dream-vision ended and that he kept what he had seen to himself because he was terrified (v. 28).

8:1-27 Vision of the ram and he-goat. Written in Hebrew, this vision, which is dated two years after chapter 7 (see v. 1), tells of a battle between a two-horned ram (representing the Medo-Persian empire) and a he-goat (Alexander the Great). Using another set of symbols, this vision recapitulates the historical story told in chapter 7. The he-goat easily defeats the two-horned ram (v. 7; reference to Alexander's defeat of Persia in a series of battles between 334 and 331 B.C.E.). Then, at the height of the he-goat's power, its great unicorn is broken off (v. 8; reference to Alexander's early death in 323 B.C.E.) and four horns sprout in its place (v. 8; symbols of the four areas into which Alexander's kingdom was divided: Macedonia, Asia Minor, Syria-Babylonia, and Egypt). One of the horns sprouts its own little horn (v. 9; Antiochus IV Epiphanes). This little horn attacks earthly and heavenly powers, coming into combat with the prince of the host (seemingly God, though possibly the high priest, Onias III, who was assassinated in 170 B.C.E. by Antiochus) and desecrating the temple (vv. 10-12).

For this vision, Daniel (who is awake) is transported (compare Ezek 3:12; 8:3; 40:1) to Susa, the capital of Persia, to the banks of the river Ulai (vv. 1-2). There he meets the angel Gabriel (one of the archangels, according to 1 Enoch), who reveals that the appointed time of God's wrath is drawing near when Antiochus will be overthrown (vv. 15-25). The vision of the two thousand three hundred evenings and mornings that are to pass before the purification of the temple (vv. 13-14; 26) is confirmed as true (these 1150 days equal three years and seventy days, which is remarkably close to the actual time that elapsed between the desecration of the temple by Antiochus in 167 B.C.E. and its reconsecration on the twenty-fifth of Chislev in 164 B.C.E.; see 1 Macc 4:52-59; compare 2 Macc 10:3). Daniel is enjoined to keep secret all that he has seen. The note that he felt weak and ill for some days afterward and that he did not fully comprehend all that he had experienced closes this second vision (v. 27; compare 9:22, where Gabriel gives Daniel understanding).

9:1-27 Gabriel and the seventy weeks. The third vision of the divine mysteries concerning the end of time takes the form of a direct revelation to Daniel through the mediation of the angel Gabriel (see ch. 8). This narrative is set in the first year of the reign of Darius the Mede, the son of Ahasuerus (v. 1; no historical Ahasuerus ever had a son Darius; Darius I of Persia had a son Ahasuerus; Darius the Mede in Daniel is not a historical figure; the year according to the chronology of the book is 538 B.C.E.; compare 5:30–6:1). The chapter divides into two parts: Daniel's prayer (vv. 3-19) and God's answer as delivered by Gabriel (vv. 20-27).

Daniel's prayer is occasioned by his meditation on Jeremiah's prophecy that seventy years would pass while Judah remained desolate and its people captive (v. 2; see Jer 25:11-12; 29:10). As he puzzles over the truth hidden in this prophetic text, Daniel does penance and fasts (v. 3; on fasting as an appropriate way to prepare for a revelation, see 10:2-3; Exod 34:28). Then he offers a prayer that opens with a frank confession of the disobedient sinfulness of the covenant people (vv. 4-14); recalls God's graciousness in leading the people out of Egypt and God's justice in punishing Jerusalem (vv. 15-16); and petitions God to deliver the holy city and the nation that bears God's name (vv. 17-19). A threefold request (often called the Old Testament Kyrie eleison = "Lord, have mercy") summarizes and concludes the prayer: "O Lord, hear! O Lord, pardon! O Lord, be attentive and act without delay, for your own sake" (v. 19; compare 3:43).

Gabriel is sent by God to instruct Daniel on the meaning of Jeremiah's prophecy (vv. 20-27; cherubim had two wings—see Exod 25:20; seraphim had six wings—see Isa 6:2; but Gabriel is the first angel to travel by wings in the Old Testament; other angels simply appear). Daniel is given a reinterpretation of Scripture. He is told that not seventy years but seventy weeks of years (= 490 years) must pass before desolation will come to an end. The seventy weeks of years are divided into three segments: seven weeks (49 years) until an anointed leader (v. 25; that is, 587 B.C.E., the second deportation, to 538 B.C.E., the arrival of Cyrus the Persian); sixty-two weeks (434 years) until an anointed shall be cut down (v. 26; from the end of the Exile in 538 to the assassination of the high priest Onias III in 170 B.C.E.; historically not 434 but 368 years, an understandable mistake, since the precise length of the Persian period was not known to later Jewish writers like the author of Daniel); and one week (v. 27; 7 years; 170 to 163 B.C.E.), broken at the half-week when sacrifice will be abolished (presumably Antiochus IV's desecration of the temple in 168 B.C.E.). Thus, the fulfillment of Jeremiah's prophecy is at hand for Daniel.

10:1–12:13 Vision of the Hellenistic wars. The fourth and final vision divides into three parts: a lengthy introduction describing the appearance of God's emissary to Daniel and their conversation (ch. 10); a revelation that rehearses the history of the relationship between the Ptolemies in Egypt and the Seleucids in Syria and ends with the death of Antiochus (11–12:4); and an epilogue that closes with the sealing of God's secrets until the end of time (12:5-13). Chapters 10–12, which are actually a historical retrospective written in the form of prophecy, were most likely composed shortly before the death of Antiochus (163 B.C.E.), since the details of his death are inaccurately predicted (see 11:40-45).

Fictitiously dated 536 B.C.E., the third year of Cyrus, chapter 10 finds Daniel on the banks of the Tigris River (he is physically there, not transported as in 8:2). Following a three-week period of penance and fasting, Daniel is granted a revelation (vv. 2-3; compare ch. 9:3). A heavenly emissary appears to him on the twenty-fourth day of the first month (v. 4; it is unusual that Daniel fasted for much of the first month, since Exod 12:1-20 specifies it as the month during which Passover is celebrated; perhaps the author is alluding to the time when this celebration was suspended in 168 B.C.E. on account of a decree issued by Antiochus IV abolishing Jewish religion). Described in language reminiscent of Ezekiel, the angel-interpreter, a gleaming man dressed in linen with a belt of fine gold around his waist (vv. 5-6; compare Ezek 1:27-28; 9:2-3, 11; 10:2, 6, 7), is seen only by Daniel, who faints at the sight (vv. 7-9). Those who are with Daniel flee in terror.

In verses 9-14 the angel raises Daniel to his knees, addresses him as "beloved" (the title given by Gabriel in 9:23), and urges him to stand up and hear the message the angel has been sent to speak (compare Ezek 2:1). Assuring Daniel that he need not fear (v. 12), the angel explains that he was delayed in answering Daniel's prayer because for three weeks he was involved in a heavenly opposition with the patron angel of Persia, until finally Michael, the patron angel of Israel, came to his aid (v. 13; compare 10:21; 12:1). The angel reveals that he has come to tell Daniel what will happen to Israel in the days to come (v. 14).

Daniel responds by falling forward in stunned silence (v. 15). A second time the angel reaches out to comfort and reassure him. When the angel touches his lips, Daniel recovers his ability to speak (compare Isa 6:7; Jer 1:7) and says that he is seized with pangs of labor (v. 16; so also 1 Sam 4:19). Daniel wonders where he will get the breath to speak to the angel (v. 17). A third time the angel touches Daniel (v. 18), again addressing him as "beloved" and reassuring him that he need not be afraid (v. 19). And this time Daniel is strengthened and ready to hear the truth.

The revelation of what is written in the book of truth (11:2–12:4; compare 7:10) includes a brief account of the historical events from the time of Cyrus the Great to Antiochus IV (vv. 2-20) and a lengthier description of the reign of Antiochus IV (vv. 21-45). Much of the detail here is veiled and difficult to decipher. Perhaps the three kings of Persia (v. 2) are the successors of Cyrus: Cambyses, Darius I, and Xerxes. The great king of Greece (v. 3) is clearly Alexander the Great, whose empire was divided into four kingdoms after his sudden death in 323 B.C.E. (v. 4). The king of the south (v. 5) is Ptolemy, one of Alexander's generals, whose descendants controlled Egypt until 30 B.C.E.

After 248 B.C.E., Ptolemy II gave his daughter, Berenice, in marriage to Antiochus II (the grandson of Seleucus, who was king of the north) on the condition that Antiochus II divorce Laodice and disinherit their two sons. Laodice avenged herself and her disinherited children by poisoning Antiochus II and murdering Berenice and her child (v. 6). In retaliation, Ptolemy III, Berenice's brother, put Laodice to death when he invaded and plundered the Seleucid kingdom (vv. 7-8). Then Seleucus Callinicus invaded Egypt in 240 B.C.E., but he was defeated (v. 9). His sons, Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus III, continued the fight with Egypt (v. 10). But in 217 B.C.E. Ptolemy IV soundly defeated Antiochus III at Raphia on the southern border of Palestine, and Egypt gained control over Palestine (vv. 11-12). When Ptolemy V acceded to the throne at age five (203 B.C.E.), Antiochus III again attacked Egypt and recaptured Palestine (vv. 13-16).

In 193 B.C.E., hoping to gain control in Egypt, Antiochus III gave his daughter, Cleopatra, in marriage to Ptolemy V (v. 17). His plan failed because Cleopatra encouraged an alliance between Egypt and Rome. In 197 B.C.E. Antiochus III had invaded Asia Minor; in 192 B.C.E. he invaded Greece. The Romans defeated him in 191 B.C.E. at Thermopylae; and in 190 B.C.E., after the defeat at Magnesia near Smyrna, Rome forced An-tiochus III into a treaty of subservience, imposed an enormous indemnity upon him, and took his son (Antiochus IV) as hostage (v. 18). In order to pay the tribute to Rome, Antiochus III tried to plunder the temple of Bel in Elymais, but its inhabitants killed him in 187 B.C.E. (v. 19). His successor, Seleucus IV (187–175 B.C.E.), attempted to plunder the temple treasure in Jerusalem but was murdered in a conspiracy led by Heliodorus, possibly abetted by Seleucus IV's younger brother, Antiochus IV (v. 20; compare 2 Macc 3:1-40).

Shortly before his death, for reasons that are now obscure, Antiochus II negotiated an exchange of hostages with Rome. In place of his younger son, Antiochus IV, he sent his older son, Demetrius. Thus in 175 B.C.E. when Seleucus IV was murdered, Antiochus IV, "a despicable person," usurped the throne from Demetrius and seized control of the Seleucid empire (v. 21). After Antiochus IV came to the throne, various parties in Jerusalem began to compete for appointment as high priest (from this time on, Seleucid and Roman leaders assumed the right to appoint and depose the Jewish high priest). First, in 174 B.C.E. Jason, the brother of the legitimate high priest, Onias III, bribed Antiochus IV for the appointment. Then, in 172 B.C.E. Menelaus offered a bigger bribe and secured the office. Menelaus not only bought the high priesthood but he had the deposed Onias III murdered (170 B.C.E.; vv. 22-23; compare 9:26; 2 Macc 4:32-43).

Details of the two Syrian-Egyptian wars are supplied in verses 24-35. In the first campaign (169 B.C.E.) against Ptolemy VI Philometer (the son of Antiochus's sister Cleopatra), Antiochus IV succeeded in taking captive Ptolemy VI, who had been given very poor strategical advice by his counselors (vv. 25-26; compare 1 Macc 1:16-19). When nobles in Alexandria filled the throne by crowning Ptolemy VII, Antiochus IV pretended to ally himself with his prisoner, Ptolemy VI, against Ptolemy VII (v. 27). If he could not conquer Egypt, Antiochus IV hoped, at least, to keep its royal family divided.

Though not entirely successful in Egypt, Antiochus IV returned home a richer man. But trouble brewed in Jerusalem, where Jason tried to reinstate himself in the office of high priest by murdering many of the supporters of Menelaus. Enraged, Antiochus IV invaded Jerusalem, massacred many Jews, reinstated Menelaus, and looted the Jerusalem temple (v. 28).

When word reached Antiochus IV that Cleopatra had reconciled her two brothers, Ptolemy VI and Ptolemy VII, to reign conjointly, he invaded Egypt a second time (168 B.C.E.; v. 29). But as Antiochus IV marched on Alexandria, he was stopped by a Roman delegation (Kittim = eastern Mediterranean people, here Romans) and was ordered by the legate, Popilius Laenas, to leave Egypt (v. 30a). Frustrated and hearing of further difficulties in Jerusalem, Antiochus IV ordered a bitter and bloody persecution of those who resisted Hellenistic culture and religion in Palestine (168–164 B.C.E.; see vv. 30b-35). In 167 B.C.E. an idol was erected and consecrated to Zeus, and swine were sacrificed on the altar of the Jerusalem temple (this is the "horrible abomination" in verse 31; see also 9:27; 12:11). Antiochus IV behaved blasphemously, even claiming divinity for himself (v. 36; on his coins he added the appellation Epiphanes, meaning "God Manifest"; many in his kingdom, however, called him Epimanes, meaning, "Mad Man"). In turning to Zeus Olympios, Antiochus IV neglected his ancestral god Tammuz (v. 37; compare Ezek 8:14).

The description of Antiochus IV's abominable reign closes with an inaccurate prediction of a successful final campaign against Egypt and an incorrect location of the place of his death as between the Mediterranean Sea and Jerusalem (vv. 40-45). The author of Daniel seems to have been unaware that Antiochus IV died of an undiagnosed disease at Tabae in Persia during an unsuccessful campaign in the fall of 163 B.C.E. (see 1 Macc 6:1-16). On account of this break with accurate historical reporting, critics argue that this apocalypse (chs. 10–12) was composed before Antiochus IV's final eastern campaign and death.

According to the poetic conclusion (12:1-3) to the revelation of what is written in the book of truth (11:2–12:4), the great tribulation of the end times will result in the vindication of the elect of God. Michael, Israel's patron angel, will arise to assist the redemption of Israel (v. 1). Many who sleep in graves will awake to live forever, others to be given to everlasting horror (v. 2). This promise of resurrection for individual reward and punishment is nearly unparalleled in the Old Testament (compare Isa 26:19). The faithful who have stood fast during the times of persecution are promised eternal reward (compare the more widespread Old Testament view that all the dead inhabit Sheol, which, though not a place of retribution, was a place where communion with God was cut off; see Isa 38:18; Ps 88:10-12). The new life described in Daniel exceeds both metaphoric description of political restoration suggested by texts like Ezek 37:1-14; Hos 6:1-2; Pss 80:19-20; 85:7 and hyperbolic expressions about being brought up from Sheol in texts like Pss 30:4; 86:13; 103:4; Isa 38:17.

Verse 4 is an injunction that Daniel keep the revelation secret until the end of time (compare 8:26). Given the fictitious date 536 B.C.E. assigned to the fourth vision in 10:1, the injunction is necessary to complete the narrative's pretended chronology. For the author, application of the revelation belonged to the time after the death of Antiochus, a time that was imagined at hand.

Verses 5-13 are little more than an epilogue that attempts to fix the time of the end. To two angels standing on either bank of the river (v. 5; compare the opening setting in 10:4) the man clothed in linen swears that the time of severe persecution will last for three and a half years (v. 7; compare 7:25; 9:27). Baffled at what he hears, Daniel requests further illumination, but he is denied (vv. 8-10). And in what appear to be two later additions, the time of persecution is extended, first to 1290 days (v. 11), and then to 1335 days (v. 12). In verse 13 Daniel is told to go his way until the end. On this note of imminent relief from persecution, the protocanonical text of Daniel ends.

PART III: APPENDIX

Dan 13:1–14:42

The third section of the Book of Daniel is a collection of three edifying deuterocanonical short stories about Daniel (Susanna, 13:1-64; Bel, 14:1-22; the Dragon, 14:23-42). Found only in the Septuagint, these stories are like those in Dan 1:1–6:29. They, too, teach that faithfulness triumphs over adversity and that foreign powers can be convinced of the sovereignty of the Lord.

13:1-63 Susanna's virtue. In the Greek and Old Latin translations of the Book of Daniel, the story of Susanna is placed before chapter 1, as an introduction (most likely because in verse 45 Daniel is described as a young boy in Babylon). In the Vulgate (the Latin translation of the Bible made by Jerome in about 382 C.E.), the story of Susanna is listed as chapter 13.

This story is different from all others in the Book of Daniel in that the conflict is internal to the Jewish community and the protagonist is a woman. Chapter 13 is a test of Susanna's courage and loyalty to the law in the face of false accusation, as well as a display of Daniel's wisdom and cleverness in solving what is sometimes called one of the earliest detective stories.

Babylon is the setting of the narrative (v. 1; compare chs. 1–5). Verses 1-4 tell that Joakim, a very rich and highly respected Jew, married the very beautiful and God-fearing Susanna (compare Jdt 8:7-8), who had been well trained in the law of Moses by her parents (only her father, Hilkiah, is mentioned by name). Joakim's house and its garden are the scene of the tale (compare the instruction in Jer 29:5 that the exiles build homes and plant gardens in Babylon).

Verses 5-14 introduce the two antagonists and describe the situation that occasions the conflict. Two wicked old men, who are appointed judges of the exiled community, lust for Susanna, who usually came out for a walk in the garden at noon, after the judges had finished trying cases and presumably had left Joakim's garden. Secretly watching her every day, the judges develop a passionate desire to have intercourse with her (v. 11; a variety of Greek expressions for sexual intimacy are used in this narrative: "to be with/have intercourse with," vv. 11, 39; "lay down with," v. 37; "so give in to our desire and be with us," v. 20; and "making love," v. 54). Though both judges pretend to leave for lunch one day, they catch each other spying on Susanna, admit their desire, and agree to watch for an occasion when they might be alone with her.

The dreadful day is described in verses 15-27. On a very hot afternoon, when everyone has supposedly left the garden, Susanna instructs her two maids to shut the garden doors and to prepare a bath for her (v. 17). When the maids have gone, the two elders appear and demand that Susanna lie with them (v. 20), saying that if she refuses, they will testify that they saw a young man with her in the garden (v. 21).

Admitting the dilemma, Susanna chooses to call out for help (see Deut 22:23-27), saying, "It is better for me to fall into your power without guilt than to sin before the Lord" (v. 23). As she calls out, the elders also shout, and one of them runs and opens the garden gate, so as to circumstantially convict her. When those in the house rush out, the elders tell their concocted story about the young man and Susanna. Believing the elders, the servants are very much ashamed of their mistress.

The next day, when the two judges come to hear cases in Joakim's garden, they order Susanna to appear for judgment (vv. 28-41). They are determined that she be put to death. Veiled, Susanna appears with her parents, children, and relatives (her husband is not mentioned until verse 63). The elders order her to show her face, "so as to sate themselves with her beauty" (v. 32), and place their hands on her head (see Lev 24:14) as they make their case against her. Without question, the assembly believes the two respected judges and condemns Susanna (v. 41).

Susanna protests her innocence to the Lord (vv. 42-43), and her prayer is heard (v. 44). God stirs a young boy named Daniel to speak out in her defense (v. 45). Daniel refuses to participate in an execution without clearer evidence (vv. 46-49). The trial is reopened (vv. 52-59), and Daniel examines the judges. He asks each separately under which tree they saw Susanna and her lover. One answers, "Under a mastic tree," and is told he will be "split" in two (v. 55; there is a play on words in the Greek). The other answers, "Under an oak," and is promised he will be "cut" in two (v. 59—another play on words). Though Daniel declares the fate of the two evil judges before both have testified, their own lies seal their fate. According to the law (see Deut 19:16-21), they must suffer the fate they planned for the one falsely accused (vv. 60-62). Susanna's parents, relatives, and husband praise God because Susanna is found innocent (v. 63). And Daniel becomes famous among his people (v. 64).

Though seemingly trapped in a situation in which social convention allowed men of age and rank to determine her fate, Susanna teaches that purity, truthfulness, and the practice of prayer are rewarded by a God who answers a woman's prayer, inspires Daniel to interrogate her accusers, and holds out a future of hope.

14:1-42 Bel and the Dragon. Two very brief detective stories that ridicule idolatry appear in chapter 14 (compare chs. 3, 6). In the first (vv. 1-22), Daniel convinces Cyrus that the Babylonian god Bel (= Marduk) does not consume the sacrifices that are daily offered to him. By putting ashes on the sanctuary floor, Daniel proves to the king that the priests and their families enter through a secret trap door and take the sacrificial food for themselves.

In the second story (vv. 23-42), Daniel convinces the king that the great dragon is a worthless god. By feeding the animal pitch, fat, and hair, Daniel causes it to burst and die. Angered that they have lost their priests, Bel, and now their dragon, the people of Babylon demand that they be allowed to throw Daniel into a den of lions (v. 31; compare ch. 6). Daniel spends six days in the den with seven lions, but he is unharmed because God had an angel transport the prophet Habakkuk by the hair of his head from Judah to Babylon to bring Daniel food (vv. 33-39). On the seventh day the king comes out and finds Daniel in good health, praises the God of Daniel, and orders those who sought Daniel's death to be put into the lions' den. They are quickly devoured (v. 42). Daniel's wisdom is once again proven and rewarded, and a foreign power is convinced of the sovereignty of Yahweh.

JOEL, OBADIAH, HAGGAI, ZECHARIAH, AND MALACHI

Mary Margaret Pazdan, O.P.

INTRODUCTION

A variety of starting points is available for exploring a text of the Bible. The process of selection is similar to how a viewer encounters snapshots in a photo album. One individual focuses sharply on a single image, while another admires the arrangements or qualities of composition. A third person enjoys the sequence and patterning of several pages, whereas a fourth examines an entire album for imaginative contours. If the snapshots or the album captures the attention of the viewer, they may provide opportunities for additional variations by repeated inspection.

The viewer's experiences also inform what is perceived. A family member, relative, or friend is delighted to find memories suddenly revitalized by significant photos that celebrate life (for example, birthdays, anniversaries, summer holidays). Juxtaposed to these photos, however, are others that remind the viewer of circumstances that have modified the moment captured on film (for example, distance, aging, death). Viewers unfamiliar with the photos need explanations from others to give the photo meaning.

The photographer's experiences direct the selection of the subject. Often the photo represents more possibilities to the viewers than the photographer saw in framing the subject. The understanding of the photo deepens when the viewer and the photographer discuss its importance. The reality of the photo is seldom exhausted, because each viewer sees with limited perception.

Like the viewer and photographer, a number of biblical scholars began to dialogue with persons of other academic disciplines. No longer confined to the historical-critical method of the nineteenth century, commentators cautiously applied the distinctive methods of new literary, canonical, and sociological criticism to broaden the possibilities of interpreting prophecy, including the five books treated in this commentary. The interdisciplinary method indicated in scholarly and popular articles for over a decade may provide insights into the meaning of postexilic prophecy, which had been generalized and undervalued.

Why does prophecy from its early development (about 1000 B.C.E.) through the period of the Exile (586–538 B.C.E.) receive more attention in surveys of the Old Testament?

a) The books that record the growth of prophecy are wonderful literature. Nathan, the court prophet, indicts King David (1000–967 B.C.E.) by means of the parable of the ewe lamb (2 Sam 12:1-15). A cycle of narratives about northern Israel (869–815 B.C.E.) records the adventures of Elijah and Elisha: a contest on Mount Carmel with the prophets of Baal, meeting Jezebel, miracles, experiences of God, involvement with political and religious leaders (see 1 Kgs 17–21; 2 Kgs 1–9).

Prophetic books named for individuals follow the narratives about prophets. They offer biographical details, dramatic gestures, and bold prophetic oracles to communicate the word of God. Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel appear as inspiring, heroic figures in the struggles of Judah (782–586 B.C.E.). The prophets stimulate interest and imagination for scholars. Concurrently, they appeal to children and adults in catechetical and sermon contexts as well as by their association with literature, music, and art.

b) Many events described by the texts are supported by the parallel literature of the ancient Near East. Archeological data confirms the historical and literary perspectives of preexilic and exilic prophecy. Analysis and comparison with extrabiblical materials generate additional study and discovery.

c) The books indicate common political-religious dimensions of kingship and temple. Fidelity of the king and community to the Jerusalem temple is the standard by which northern Israel and Judah are judged (see 1 Kgs 12–2 Kgs 25). The prophets exhort the people to be faithful to the covenant stipulations first formed with God on Mount Sinai through Moses. They develop the ethical dimensions of Torah, images of God and future liberation, often evoking images from Exodus.

d) New Testament authors frequently refer to persons and passages from preexilic and exilic prophecy to describe Jesus, the Jews, and early communities of believers.

When earlier scholars compared postexilic prophecy with the characteristics of preexilic and exilic prophecy mentioned above, the former appeared unimportant and secondary in the prophetic corpus. The narratives are limited, lacking in personal detail, and seldom the subject of art or literature. The historical and literary data is sparse; often reconstruction is contradictory. The political, social, and religious conditions after the Exile do not compare favorably with the symbolic unity of kingship and temple. The texts are quoted infrequently by New Testament authors.

Contemporary scholars do not judge postexilic prophecy by earlier prophecy. Prophetic forms and content aligned to king and temple are no longer considered necessarily normative or significant. What, then, is appropriate for interpreting postexilic writings? In this commentary the central focus is the particular contribution of each book as a witness to restoration after the experience of exile. Information about a particular author, dating, and composition, together with an outline of the book, is given just before the commentary on each book. Considerations common to Joel, Obadiah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi are described below.

Location in the Old Testament

The Jewish canon and the Alexandrian canon include the Books of Joel, Obadiah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi among the Twelve Minor Prophets. What does the division imply? The designation "minor" has been interpreted as meaning "inferior" or "less important," because the Twelve Minor Prophets follow the Latter Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel) in the Jewish canon, and the Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Baruch, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel) in the Alexandrian canon. The term "minor" probably refers to the size of the texts compared with the prophetic books that precede them.

In a manner unlike that of the Major Prophets, the historical factors for ordering and collecting the Twelve Minor Prophets remain obscure. Scholars examine the canons and the books for implications of how the process may have occurred. In comparing the canons, the first and the seventh through the twelfth books are identical (Hosea, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi), while the second through the sixth books are in different order: Jewish canon (Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah); Alexandrian canon (Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah, Jonah).

Which list is earlier? What accounts for the change of order? There are three suggestions for the ordering of the books in each canon: (a) chronology; (b) repetition of words and phrases between books, for example Amos 1:2 and Joel 4:16; (c) mechanical considerations, for example the length of a scroll. Today the questions and suggestions are unresolved.

How twelve independent prophetic books became a collection that was considered as one book is a puzzle. Often the fact that the Twelve could be written on one scroll is given as a solution. Historically, the process of collection was completed by 300 B.C.E. Sirach, writing a century later, acknowledges the prophets in his praise of Israel's heroes:

> Then, too, the TWELVE PROPHETS—> may their bones return to life from their resting place!—

Gave new strength to Jacob and saved him by their faith and hope.
(Sir 49:10).

Sirach's grandson, translating the Hebrew text into Greek after 132 B.C.E., includes the division of prophets in his foreword: "Many important truths have been handed down to us through the law, the prophets, and the latter authors; and for these the instruction and wisdom of Israel merit praise."

The Minor Prophets were also important to the Qumran community, whose scrolls include a commentary on Micah as well as eight incomplete copies of the Twelve Minor Prophets. In Christian tradition the title "Minor Prophets" is attributed to Augustine (De civitate Dei, XVIII, 29). Canonical critics observe that the process of ordering and collecting the Twelve Minor Prophets is less important than the factors involved in shaping each book and the way the final form of each book functioned in a particular community of faith.

Historical background

The ministry and textual tradition of Joel, Obadiah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi extended over two centuries of postexilic Judaism. Although the period is poorly documented, some biblical witness and archeological data are available to reconstruct the historical context for the prophets and their literary records.

2 Kgs 23:36–25:30, 2 Chr 36:9-21, and Jer 32–34; 37–39; 52 interpret the final days of Judah and the deportations to Babylon. In 599 B.C.E. King Jehoiakim refused to pay tribute money to Nebuchadnezzar, ruler of the neo-Babylonian empire. Although the biblical texts are unclear about Jehoiakim's fate, they indicate that his son Jehoiachin had ruled for only three months when Nebuchadnezzar forced him to surrender Jerusalem in the spring of 597 B.C.E. Jehoiachin, the royal household, craftspersons, military officials, and prominent citizens were sent into captivity. The sacred vessels of the temple were also transported to Babylon.

To reduce the possibility of further rebellion, Nebuchadnezzar appointed Jehoiachin's uncle, Zedekiah, as king of Judah. For eleven years he wavered between the patronage of the pro-Egyptian party and the protection of Jeremiah. Having chosen resistance as his brother did, he, too, had to surrender to Nebuchadnezzar, who ordered the palace, the temple, and the city destroyed; the ruler and inhabitants were deported to Babylon in 586 B.C.E.

For the few persons remaining near Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar appointed Gedaliah as governor. After he was assassinated by a rebel, the Babylonian policy of deportation and division of the land continued in Judah and other parts of the empire. The Edomites, ancient enemies of Israel, seized some territory in Judah. The Book of Obadiah is directed against their treachery. The Book of Lamentations reflects the anguish and tragedy of this period for the Jews.

After Nebuchadnezzar died in 562 B.C.E., the empire gradually declined and Cyrus the Persian seized the opportunity for twenty years of conquest. His success culminated in the surrender of Babylon in 539 B.C.E. Cyrus' liberal attitude toward subject peoples extended to authorizing their return and financing the restoration of temples and cults. The Cyrus Cylinder, an inscription written on a clay barrel and telling of Cyrus' Babylonian triumph and of his policy of allowing captives to return to their homelands, indicates his intentions: "May all the gods whom I have placed within their sanctuaries address a daily prayer in my favor . . . that my days may be long."

Cyrus also issued a decree to the Babylonian Jews. Under the leadership of Sheshbazzar, prince of Judah, a small group returned bringing donations from their neighbors and the confiscated temple vessels (Ezra 1:2–2:70). Meanwhile, large numbers remained in Babylon, preferring their homes, structures of community life, and loyalty toward the lenient government to an uncertain future in ravaged Judah (compare Jer 29:1-9).

The returnees found a decimated land, inhospitable landowners, intermarriage, and syncretistic worship. Sheshbazzar, appointed governor, initiated attempts to restore the sacrificial altar and the foundations of the temple. The confused chronology and narrative detail of Ezra, the only biblical record for the period, do not indicate what happened to Sheshbazzar.

After Cyrus' death, Cambyses, his son, reigned until 522 B.C.E. At his death widespread rebellion occurred in many areas of the empire. Darius, an officer of Cambyses' army, stabilized the empire after two years of fierce battles. During that time another group of Babylonian Jews returned to Jerusalem, including Zerubbabel, appointed governor, and Joshua, the high priest. During their dual leadership there were renewed efforts to rebuild the temple.

Obstacles, however, continued to impede progress. Within the community, antagonism over property claims continued. Droughts and poor soil added to the burden of harsh living conditions. Opposition to the restoration came from neighboring areas under Persian control as well as from the Samaritans to the north. Darius intervened to settle the disputed authorization for rebuilding the temple. Haggai and Zechariah, too, encouraged the residents to persevere in their efforts.

In the spring of 515, nearly twenty-five years after Cyrus' decree, the community offered sacrifice to God and dedicated the temple (Ezra 3–6). There is no evaluation of Zerubbabel's leadership. He, like Sheshbazzar, disappeared mysteriously from the narrative of Ezra. Joshua and the priestly class associated with the temple presumably became the source of political and religious authority for the community.

There is a gap of fifty years in the biblical record, although the undated text of Malachi offers an assessment of community life just before the arrival of Ezra. The author condemns the irresponsibility of the priests in cultic matters, intermarriages with non-Jews, and social injustice.

Ezra, commissioned by Artaxerxes I, initiated a religious reform in 458 B.C.E. by condemning intermarriage, appointing honest magistrates and judges, and assembling the people for the reading of the law (Ezra 7:1–10:16; Neh 8:1–9:37). Nehemiah, cupbearer to Artaxerxes I, was governor of Judah from 445–433 B.C.E. He protected Jerusalem from its enemies by supervising the rebuilding of the city walls. After a brief absence, Nehemiah returned as governor (430–418 B.C.E.) to enforce religious laws regarding the support of temple officials, marriage, and observance of the sabbath (Neh 1:1–7:5; 11:1–13:31).

The undated Book of Joel is considered a witness to the situation of the community after the reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah. The author exhorts the people to public prayer and penance to avert God's judgment. It is a preparation for "the day of the Lord," the ultimate judgment between Israel and the nations.

There is a gap of nearly a century in the biblical record, during which time the Persian empire declined and the Greek empire developed under the leadership of Alexander the Great (336–323 B.C.E.). Second Zechariah (chs. 9–14) is addressed to the Jewish community during this emergence of a new world empire. The oracles describe a cosmic battle, the Messiah, and the new kingdom of God.

Attitudes and perspectives about reconstruction

The Babylonian Jews who returned to Jerusalem in two stages participated in the multiple tasks of reconstruction. What challenges did they encounter together with the group already well established in Judah during the Exile? In addition to the obstacles mentioned above, both groups were confronted with the complex question of identity.

The province of Judah was one of several provinces included in the satrapy "West of Euphrates" (see Ezra 4:17, 20; 5:6), whose administrator, the satrap, probably resided in Damascus. Judah enjoyed the type of independence granted to members of the nearly two dozen satrapies of the vast Persian empire, including freedom for cultic activity. Judah, with Jerusalem as its center, can be identified as a temple-community like others restored and subsidized by the central government. Jerusalem functioned both as a cultic center for prayer as well as an administrative center for the province.

The officials appointed by the central government mediated their authority as governors—for example, Sheshbazzar, Zerubbabel, Nehemiah. In daily affairs, however, the priests exercised authority over the community. They decided on the status of individuals in the community according to their participation in and support of the cult. Their legislation about the standards of purity necessary for worshipers included the condemnation of those who engaged in syncretistic worship, those who married resident aliens, and those who transacted business with non-Jews.

Both residents and returnees were affected by these criteria. Tension developed among the two groups, including the priestly class. The conflict among the priestly functionaries resulted in a division of responsibility. The Zadokite priests (returnees from Babylon) assumed the major position for cult and administration; the Levites were relegated to minor positions with little authority.

Some scholars suggest that two mainstreams of religious authority developed from this situation and that this accounts for the decline of prophecy. The theocratic group was associated with the Zadokite priests and the rebuilding of the temple and the reconstitution of religious life according to the Torah and the vision of Ezekiel (Ezek 40–48). The apocalyptic group was associated with the Levites and a future transformation of the present situation according to the vision of Deutero-Isaiah (Isa 40–55). This assessment, however, is too sharp. It does not allow for the plurality of religious experience and perspective.

The manner of restoration of the community and its identity is related to the interpretation of God's revelation as understood by the individual prophet. Each responded to the needs of a particular community. Each had a provisional proclamation directed toward encouraging that community to be faithful to God:

a) Obadiah implored God to destroy the Edomites and to vindicate Israel from their deceit.

b) Haggai and Zechariah believed that the restoration of the temple would hasten the advent of God for the purpose of dwelling in Jerusalem forever. Zechariah also considered the relationship of God to other nations. Both prophets encountered the resistance of the Jerusalemites due to shattered dreams and oppressive living conditions, which curtailed enthusiasm and stamina for reconstruction. Neither prophet was certain about the role of the governors and the priestly class. Even after the completion of the temple, the past could not be an appropriate model for the present.

The ministry of these prophets was effective because they provided inspiration for a common identity among the residents, that is, a temple-community and the reestablished locus for cultic activity. After their deaths the dilemma of unfulfilled prophecy and unresolved relationships among their neighbors continued. Uncertainty, confusion, and instability characterized the period.

c) Malachi addressed abuses in cultic practices. Joel admonished the community about its relationship to God and its symbolic expression in worship. Both prophets desired a renewal of dedicated religious life for persons who would accept their message.

d) The writings of Second Zechariah stirred dormant hope and dispelled the apathy of the community through visions of climactic struggle followed by the day of the Lord, a day when a kingdom of peace and blessing would be secured forever.

These five prophets may well be remembered for activity during a bleak period of Israel's history. Each prophet with his literary record witnesses to a particular situation somewhat influenced by imperial Persian and Greek policies, yet transcending them with a religious vision related to the experience of the community to whom the message is addressed. Being convinced of the fidelity of God, they spoke a message calling the community to respond appropriately. They exhorted the community to be faithful to God, the constant reality of their past history and their present experience.

The postexilic prophets in this series cannot be judged by whether or not their message was fulfilled in subsequent history. The mystery of the faithful God and the manner in which the individual and the community respond are the perspectives that these books develop. In addition, the fact that communities of believers preserved and edited these proclamations and considered them to be the authentic revelation of God indicates their significance for developing faith in postexilic communities.

Literary forms

The Books of Joel, Obadiah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi contain poetry and prose. There are visions and oracles attributed to the prophets whose names are the superscriptions for the books as well as editorial insertions to consolidate the material and provide interpretation for later communities. The books refer to earlier Scripture (Torah and Prophets) by allusion to and repetition of events and ideas. Occasionally there are direct quotations from earlier prophets.

The literary structure of each book is developed from the particular context in which the message was first proclaimed. Prophetic formulas common to preexilic and exilic books are sometimes located in the postexilic compositions; occasionally they are combined with new patterns. In particular, scholars often regard sections of these books as indicating a new literary form, viewpoint, and content known as "apocalyptic." Since the literary structure of a particular text is a primary indicator for its religious meaning, it is important to understand the structure in order to interpret the significance of the text. A few literary considerations for each book are presented below according to the chronological order already suggested.

Obadiah, the shortest book in the Old Testament, consists of two sets of oracles received in a vision according to the tradition of Jerusalemite prophets. The first set of oracles describes the destruction of Edom (vv. 2-9) in language similar to that of Jer 49:7-22. This neighbor of Israel is condemned for its betrayal of Jerusalem to Babylon (vv. 10-14). The second set was added later to include the day of the Lord as a judgment for all nations (vv. 15-16). The event culminates in the restoration of Israel and the establishment of the universal kingdom of God (vv. 17-21). Some scholars suggest that the structure of the oracles (vv. 2-17) indicates a community at worship proclaiming God's sovereignty through the proclamation of oracles against its enemies.

The two chapters of Haggai also contain oracles interspersed with editorial frameworks to interpret them. The frameworks include: (a) the chronology of Haggai's ministry to the residents of Jerusalem (1:1, 15; 2:1, 10, 20); (b) insertions of traditional prophetic formulas to introduce an oracle, such as "the words of the Lord through the prophet . . ." (1:1, 3; 2:1, 10, 20; compare 1:12, 13); (c) a report about the result of Haggai's preaching to the community (1:12, 14). Although words of comfort are included in the oracles, suggesting the judgment of salvation characteristic of classical prophecy (1:13; 2:4, 5), the oracles add a new development—the disputation. Some indications of this pattern are rhetorical questions (1:4; 2:3, 16) and a question-and-answer format (1:9-11).

Oracles do not function as the major literary form of revelation in First Zechariah (chs. 1–8); rather, they are a secondary pattern occurring in a collection (chs. 7–8) and attached to visions, which are the primary pattern of revelation (1:7–6:8). The visions constitute some of the most difficult texts to interpret in biblical literature. Some scholars suggest that the significance of the "night" visions consists in providing an alternative to the oracles and visions of Ezekiel (chs. 40–48) and of Haggai about temple reconstruction. Zechariah constructed a theological perspective for fidelity to God in the new situation of "in betweenness."

In the Book of Malachi the question-and-answer format that appeared in Haggai (and First Zechariah) becomes the basic structure of the oracles. This catechetical pattern was suitable for exhorting the community and its cult officials to be responsible for their relationships to God. They were urged to revitalize indifferent cultic practices and to observe the laws of marriage and the prohibitions against divorce (1:2–3:21). The two appendices (3:22-24) conclude with an instruction to be faithful to the law and a description of Elijah, God's messenger who will reconcile family members.

The Book of Joel is a collection of oracles with two interrelated themes: devastation and salvation. In the first part (1:1–2:17), the prophet functions as a cult figure. He calls the people to repentance in a communal lamentation liturgy intended to avert a disaster far worse than the locust plague. After introducing the concept of "the day of the Lord," Joel admonishes them about their expectations. In the second part (2:18–4:21), the prophet describes the day of the Lord in more detail. Throughout the oracles there is frequent allusion to, or direct quotations of, sayings found in other prophetic collections; for example, Isa 13:6 and Ezek 30:2-3 (Joel 1:15); Zeph 1:14-15 (Joel 2:1-2); Obad 17 (Joel 3:5).

Second Zechariah (chs. 9–14) is separated from First Zechariah by nearly two centuries of political and religious history. The chapters are divided into two sections. Each section has its own introduction (chs. 9–11 and 12–14). Unlike First Zechariah, the oracular structure is prominent. Within the oracles there is no original revelation; rather, the function of the oracles is to collect the expectations of earlier prophets and to indicate how they may be fulfilled; for example, Zeph 3:14ff. (Zech 9:9); Isa 5:26 (Zech 10:8); Joel 4 (Zech 14). Another major difference is the absence of any mention of the temple builders and officials. In addition, there are no chronological indications nor any coherent "historical" framework. Finally, the chapters of Second Zechariah have been assessed for apocalyptic language and viewpoint.

Relationship to apocalyptic writings

In the past fifteen years there has been renewed interest in the origin, language, structure, content, and interpretation of Jewish apocalyptic writings. Postexilic prophecy has been considered a possible source for apocalyptic, since the phenomenon did not parallel the structure and content of classical prophecy. Some scholars constructed a polarity between the "traditionalists" and the "visionaries" existing in the temple-community. Their conflict of interests resulted in the formation of two distinctive groups. The "traditionalists" reaffirmed the position of supporting the temple and its officials. The "visionaries" expressed their radical hopes for a new identity by the transformation of the present situation. Today interdisciplinary analysis with the social sciences, especially cultural anthropology, appears to support this interpretation.

Intra-group conflict and fluctuating circumstances can be catalysts for the formation of apocalyptic groups. The more difficult question is not why an apocalyptic viewpoint and literature emerged but why this particular form emerged. The religious diversity apparent in postexilic communities suggests that apocalyptic development was not the inevitable result of particular social circumstances.

Most of the present century of scholarship has considered the related question of the origins of apocalyptic language. Did it emerge from prophecy? Is it an adaptation of Persian dualism? Is wisdom literature the matrix? The search for sources appears to be misdirected, since any apocalyptic text combines allusions from a wide range of sources. The meaning of any text is dependent on the sources as well as on the way the sources are combined through the editorial process.

Current investigations of the structure and content of Jewish apocalyptic writings have indicated that some sections of the postexilic prophetic books may be categorized as proto-apocalyptic, for instance, Second Zechariah, Joel 3–4; Mal 3–4. Sharing a few structural similarities and features of content, however, does not indicate that some postexilic texts can be interpreted according to apocalyptic world views. The decision to investigate the linguistic affinity and structural parallel of postexilic prophecy to apocalyptic literature underscores the reluctance of some scholars to analyze these prophetic texts for their own contributions.

JOEL

Mary Margaret Pazdan, O.P.

INTRODUCTION

Authorship

What is known about the author of this book is limited to 1:1, which names and identifies him: "The word of the Lord which came to Joel, son of Pethuel." The verse uses a traditional prophetic formula, "the word of the Lord came to . . . ." The name Joel means "Yahweh is God." It is recorded by the Chronicler (see 1 Chr 4:35; 5:4; 7:3; 11:38; Ezra 10:43; Neh 11:9), whose texts were compiled in the postexilic period. Pethuel is mentioned nowhere else in the Old Testament. "Joel ben Pethuel" may designate the author of the book.

Other biographical detail is inferred from the text. Many scholars suggest that Joel was a cult prophet attached to the Jerusalem temple-community. His concern for temple worship and his prophecies in liturgical form may indicate that he was a temple official. He never identified himself, however, as a priest.

Dating of the text

The superscription of the book indicates no chronological setting for Joel. Earlier scholars, however, suggested a preexilic period for the book, noting its position in the Jewish canon between Hosea and Amos, and its repetition of words and phrases from Amos (compare Joel 4:18 and Amos 9:13). Although a minority of scholars still favor a preexilic dating, the majority of them locate Joel in the Persian period. The book suggests some literary dependency of Joel on earlier prophetic traditions (see p. 576). Historical allusions (1:9; 4:6), the absence of earlier administrators (kings and governors), and the lack of internal dissension and internal oppression also imply a late postexilic period. The approximate dating of the text is 400–350 B.C.E. (see p. 574).

Composition of the text

For the past century the unity of the text has been debated. Some scholars maintained that it was a work composed of two parts by two different authors. Others modified this position or emphasized its unity. Recent scholars suggest that the book has a literary unity. They refer to thematic connections, such as "the day of the Lord" (1:15; 2:1; 3:4; 4:14) and parallel expressions (2:27 and 4:17). Commentators debate whether the literary unity is the work of one author or of a few authors who edited the chapters for its present canonical shape.

Outline of the book

There are differences in the numbering of the chapters and verses in the second part of the Book of Joel. This commentary is based on the New American Bible, which uses the Hebrew text; other Bibles and commentaries may use the Greek text. The chart compares the two versions:

Hebrew Text	Greek Text
3:1-5	2:28-32
4:1-8	3:1-8
4:9-16	3:9-16
4:17-21	3:17-21

In this commentary the numbering of the Greek text is given in brackets:

PART ONE:	The Plague of Locusts and the Community (1:1–2:17)
1:1-4	Plague of Locusts
1:5-20	Call to Lamentation
2:1-11	Great Alarm
2:12-17	Call to Repentance
PART TWO:	The Response of the Lord to Israel and the Nations (2:18–4:21 [2:18–3:21])
2:18-27	Compassion for the Community
3:1-5 [2:28-32]	Blessings for the Community
4:1-17 [3:1-17]	Judgment on the Nations
4:18-21 [3:18-21]	Presence of God in Jerusalem

COMMENTARY

PART ONE: THE PLAGUE OF LOCUSTS AND THE COMMUNITY

Joel 1:1–2:17

Situations of catastrophe prompted special liturgies to respond to a particular disaster within the community (see Judg 20:26; Jer 14:2, 7-9, 12). The Book of Joel is developed according to the structure of a communal lamentation. The components of the ritual were expanded for future generations until they attained the present canonical shape. This process broadened the possibilities for interpretation of the book.

Part One consists of two units (1:1-20 and 2:1-17). Both units indicate the structure of the first part of a lamentation liturgy: (a) a call to communal lamentation; (b) a cry and prayer of lamentation. The prophet calls together the Judeans of the temple-community to reflect on the catastrophe of the locust plague. He exhorts the entire community to mourn its devastated land, to repent, and to cry out to God for assistance. The plague is compared to the day of the Lord.

1:1-4 Plague of locusts. After the superscription of the book (v. 1), the setting is introduced. The prophet initiates a summons and exhortation to the community. The elders, leaders of the community in the postexilic era, are addressed (see Ezra 5:9; 6:7-8; compare Joel 1:2, 14; 2:17; 3:1). All the members of the community are called to consider whether the present disaster ever happened to their ancestors (v. 2). The rhetorical question is a common teaching tool, especially in the Writings of the Jewish canon, which preserved the accumulated wisdom of the people. Likewise, the prophet exhorts the community to hand down its experience of the plague to future generations (v. 3).

An initial description of the locusts appears as the climax of the setting (v. 4). "Cutter," "swarm," "grasshopper," and "devourer" may indicate stages of development in the lifecycle of locusts. How they destroy crops is suggested by the triple reference to the fact that what (is) left at each stage is eaten by the next stage. The damage that the locusts cause is attested to in biblical and extrabiblical literature. The last recorded plague in Jerusalem is reported to have been in A.D. 1915.

1:5-20 Call to lamentation. Verses 5-14 address members of the community for whom the results of the plague are overwhelming. Exhortations to particular actions refer to ritual activities associated with the liturgy of lamentation. Four groups of people are highlighted:

1) Imbibers of wine (vv. 5-7) are enjoined to "weep" and "wail" for the loss of sweet, new wine used to celebrate the autumn harvest festival (Exod 23:16). Like an invading army, the locusts have destroyed the vine.

2) The second group is not specified (vv. 8-10). It is probably a call to the entire community to "lament." The analogy of "a virgin girt with sackcloth for the spouse of her youth" (v. 8) refers to the mourning ritual of a woman after the first stage of relationship. The bridal price has been paid and public vows have been declared (see Deut 20:7; 22:23-24). The second stage, bringing the woman to her husband's home, has not occurred.

The image suggests deep, personal mourning. What type of loss could evoke such grief? Temple sacrifices have ceased because locusts ravaged the harvest (v. 9). The ritual ingredients of grain, wine, and oil are in short supply (v. 10). Significantly, the community's relationship with God symbolized in worship is severed.

3) Field workers and vinedressers (vv. 11-12) are told to "be appalled" and "wail." Their toil is futile. Their harvest, too, has failed. The yield is "dried up" and "withered." In particular, the land often interpreted as a sign of God's blessing for Israel has now become a curse. Like the produce, "joy has withered away" in the community.

4) Priests (vv. 13-14) are exhorted to "gird [themselves] . . . weep . . . wail." The instruction repeats the directives given to the other groups, with additional stipulations: (a) They are to spend day and night in sackcloth, a custom invoked only in extreme situations (see 2 Sam 12:16; 1 Kgs 21:27). (b) As "ministers of the altar," their ritual activity is located in the "house of your God," the temple, where sacrifice is no longer held (v. 13; compare v. 9). (c) Their office authorizes them to announce a fast, to summon and assemble the leaders and the entire community. The formal liturgy of lamentation is convened in the "house of the Lord, your God" (v. 14).

Verses 2 and 14 comprise an inclusion mentioning the "elders" and "all who dwell in the land." Its function is to draw attention to a literary unit by separating particular verses from the text. Here verses 2-14 describe the members of the community gathered for lamentation.

A cry and a prayer of lamentation follow (vv. 15-20). An exclamation of sorrow is attached to the day of the Lord, which is identified as "near" and as a day of "ruin from the Almighty" (v. 15). The statement was alarming to the community for two reasons. First, according to prophetic oracles, the day of the Lord meant God's judgment against the enemies of Israel, "the nations" (see Isa 13:6; Ezek 30:2-3; Jer 46:10). Later the oracles included the judgment of Israel for disobeying God (see Amos 5:18-20; Lam 2:22; Ezek 34:12). After the destruction of Jerusalem (586 B.C.E.), the threatening oracles appeared to be fulfilled. Second, according to the postexilic community, the day of the Lord was considered a future event limited to the nations.

In addition, the prophet invites the community to consider its present situation with a rhetorical question regarding the scanty food supply and the absence of sacrifices (v. 16; compare v. 2). Both persons and animals starve because the locusts have devoured their sustenance (vv. 17-18). The joy especially characteristic of the community at harvest festivals and worship is banished (v. 16; compare v. 12). The clear parallelism between the day of the Lord and the devastation of the plague suggests that the prophet may be interpreting the plague as a foreshadowing of the day of the Lord for the community.

A prayer (vv. 19-20) concludes the first unit of Part One. It is structured according to many psalms of lamentation: an invocation to God and a statement of complaint (vv. 19b-20; compare Pss 12:1-3; 74:1). "Fire has devoured" is a repeated metaphor to describe the locusts as the source of the complaint (vv. 19a; 20b).

2:1-11 Great alarm. This section and 2:12-17 constitute the second unit of Part One. The relationship of 1:2-20 and 2:1-17 is problematic. A few commentators state that 2:1-17 is a doublet. Some prefer to draw literary and theological parallels. Others emphasize the differences between the two sections. Canonical critics suggest that the parallels and redaction are clues as to how later communities of believers interpreted the book.

The section compared with 1:2-14 indicates parallels and differences. Some elements are nearly identical. Catastrophe is the focus. While 1:2-14 described the results of the locust invasion, 2:1-11 describes the agents of the catastrophe. The images that alluded to the relationship of the plague to the day of the Lord (1:15-20) are repeated. The proclamation is addressed to members of the temple-community. The time-sequence, however, is different. The locust plague is an event of the past; the day of the Lord is imminent. A second difference is the addition of metaphors to indicate other characteristics of the event.

The new section indicates a parallel setting (2:1-3; compare 1:2-4). Approaching danger is announced to "all who dwell in the land" with the blast of the "trumpet" (v. 1; compare 1:2, 14). The shofar, or ram's horn, sounded an alarm for battle as well as a call for the community to assemble in worship. The day of the Lord is the source of anxiety. The event is also heralded by cosmic signs (compare Zeph 1:14-15) and an unprecedented enemy (v. 2; see 1:6). Like "devouring fire" (see 1:4, 19), the oppressor transforms the "garden of Eden" into a "desert waste" (v. 3; compare 1:20).

A series of metaphors developed according to strength, skill, and terror identifies the day of the Lord in the context of battle (vv. 4-9). The details may resemble a description of the "holy war." Some scholars consider the event as an early stage of the day of the Lord. The metaphors are: running and leaping horses, dragging chariots behind them (vv. 4-5a); a crackling, devouring flame (v. 5b; compare 1:19; 2:3); a mighty people arrayed for battle (v. 5b); warriors and soldiers running and scaling the wall with disciplined routine, assaulting the city and climbing into the houses (vv. 7-9). Two groups are affected. Anguish colors the victims' faces (v. 6; compare Isa 13:8). The cosmic forces (earth, heavens, sun, moon, stars) quake and darken (v. 10).

The image of the holy war continues with the appearance of the Lord as the leader of the army (v. 11a). The section concludes with an inclusion, the day of the Lord (vv. 1a and 11b). The short comment "who can bear it?" appears to be a postscript, another example of the rhetorical question noted above (1:2b, 16b).

2:12-17 Call to repentance. This section is constructed to provide connections with the first part of the unit (2:1-11). It also indicates structural and thematic parallels and differences when compared with 1:5-20. The verses suggest an immediate response to the day of the Lord (2:1-11), just as the plague of locusts in the first unit demanded a response. Both events are followed by an exhortation to communal lamentation.

Verses 12 and 13 indicate an unusual circumstance to alter the awesome day of the Lord. The revelation reverses the poignant more-than-rhetorical-question of section one, to which it is structurally connected (v. 11b). God's proclamation, "Yet even now, says the Lord" (v. 12a), presents a possibility other than imminent gloom and destruction (2:1-11). It offers hope to the community trembling from the locust invasion and fearfully awaiting the worse event.

What is suggested? The invitation is to "return to me with your whole heart, with fasting, and weeping, and mourning" (v. 12b; see Amos 4:6-11; Hos 3:5; 14:2). The language indicates a turning toward God with one's whole being, the complete reorientation of thoughts and decisions toward God. Participation in a communal liturgy of lamentation (fasting, weeping, mourning) is encouraged. The ritual will symbolize the process of the community's commitment to God.

Verse 13b is a reaffirmation of the earlier relationship of God and the community revealed in the covenant at Mount Sinai (compare Exod 34:6-7). God is gracious, merciful, kind, relenting in punishment. The members of the present community are dependent upon a new manifestation of God's mercy. God may relent. The community is challenged to "return." Only then will there be the restored blessing of "offerings and libations," symbols of the relationship of God and the community (v. 14; compare 1:9, 12, 16).

The new possibility for the community gives a sense of urgency to the ritual of lamentation (vv. 15-17). The ritual actions to initiate the liturgy repeat earlier directions (v. 15; 1:14; 2:1). Additional components comprise this summons:

a) Children, infants, bride and bridegroom are included in the assembly. The gravity of the situation and the witness of "all who dwell in the land" preclude any exceptions for privileges ordinarily given to a young couple (v. 16; compare Deut 24:5).

b) The location for the officials of the service is indicated: "between the porch and the altar" (v. 17a). It is the traditional place for leading the community in lamentation. The distance may refer to the lack of sacrifices due to the locust invasion as well as the symbolic interpretation of strained relationships between the community and God (compare Ezek 8:16).

The prayer of lamentation (v. 17b) that concludes the section differs from the one recorded in 1:19-20. The priests implore God to spare the community, "your people," and to prevent "your heritage" from becoming "a reproach with the nations ruling over them." The plea is a traditional one (Pss 42:4; 79:10; 115:2). Here the collective experience of Israel mirrors the current situation. A rhetorical question is attributed to the nations. It ironically emphasizes their interpretation of the community's plight: "Where is their God?"

PART TWO: THE RESPONSE OF THE LORD TO ISRAEL AND THE NATIONS

Joel 2:18–4:21 [2:18–3:21]

Part One and Part Two constitute identical literary and topical structures. Each part is constructed with two units. Each unit contains two sections. Each part refers to a particular stage of the communal lamentation liturgy. In addition, the ordering of Part One and Part Two follows a chronology of events (locust invasion and imminent day of the Lord); the order of a lamentation service (stage one and stage two); and a development of prophetic revelation.

Part Two consists of two units: 2:18–3:5 [2:18-32] and 4:1-21 [3:1-21]. Both units indicate the structure of the second part of a communal service: a series of oracles containing divine assurance. The proclamations respond to the plea of the community suffering the results of the locusts and fearing the approaching day of the Lord. They promise a future of restoration and new blessings to reverse the characteristics of the day of the Lord.

In addition to the consistencies in Part One and Part Two, some commentators have identified a new literary genre in Joel 3:1–4:21 [2:28–3:21], namely, proto-apocalyptic (see p. 577). Characteristics of this genre which describe preliminaries to the day of the Lord include: outpouring of the spirit, cosmic signs, judgment against the nations, and blessings for the community.

2:18-27 Compassion for the community. This section describes a restoration of the community's situation by God. Verse 18 provides the transition from Part One to Part Two. God's concerns are the land and the people. The phrase "stirred to concern" is better translated "became jealous" (Revised Standard Version). It indicates the passionate zeal of God for the community (see Ezek 39:25; Zech 1:14; 8:2). God responds to the plight of the community with compassion. Subsequent activity is detailed in the assurances about restored life and freedom from enemies. They are presented in three consecutive oracles:

1) Assurances are introduced (vv. 19-20). God will send supplies needed for sustenance and sacrifice: "grain," "wine," "oil" (v. 19a; compare 1:7, 9-11, 13b, 16-17; 2:14). The community will no longer be "a reproach among the nations" (v. 19b; compare 2:17). Verse 20 describes the "northerner," which may refer to the locusts as well as their symbolic counterpart, the army of invaders (see 2:1-11). Hostile forces often approached from the north (see Jer 1:14, 15; 4:6; Ezek 38:6; 39:2). Here the enemy is destroyed by expulsion to an "arid and waste" land and by drowning in the sea.

2) "Fear not" oracles are addressed to the land and the animals connected with the community (vv. 21-22). Both are assured of verdant and fruitful life (compare 1:10-12).

3) Instruction and promises are announced to the temple-community, "children of Zion" (vv. 23-27; Lam 4:2; Ps 149:2). The group is invited to "rejoice in the Lord, your God!" (v. 23a). The second part of the verse is obscure. The New American Bible has God giving the community a "teacher of justice: he has made the rain come down for you." The Revised Standard Version has God as the giver of "the early rain for your vindication." Both translations point to God who restores a favorable condition for harvest by providing rain at the proper seasons.

This favorable situation, in turn, provides supplies for temple sacrifice. "Justice" and "vindication" suggest the ritual act of worship, which represents the covenant relationship of God and the community. The daily sacrifices at the temple had ceased because of the locust invasion.

The next three verses support the interpretation. God will provide grain, wine, and oil in great abundance as restitution for the destruction of the locusts (vv. 24-25; see 1:4; 2:5-9). Needs for sustenance and for worshiping God will be satisfied (v. 26; compare Ps 126:3).

A recognition formula concludes the section (v. 27). It indicates a new understanding of God for the community. God will be in their midst. No other god is comparable to the God of Israel. The community will "nevermore be put to shame" (compare Exod 20:2-3). The reference may be to the disgrace of the Exile (v. 26). The revelation of the new relationship is a climax to the section as well as a response to the taunt of the nations: "Where is their God?" (2:17).

3:1-5 [2:28-32] Blessings for the community. These verses are connected thematically to 2:18-27. Both describe the characteristics of future restoration in successive stages. "Then afterward" (3:1) provides the transition to a new time-sequence. It presupposes that the conditions of restoration that God promised (2:18-27) have been fulfilled. It points to an uncertain time in the future when God's new blessings (3:1-5 [2:28-32]) will be realized in the community. The section is structured according to three blessings. Each is outlined in a three-line stanza:

1) Participation in God's spirit (vv. 1-2 [2:28-29]). "All mankind" identifies the members of the temple-community (2:19, 27; compare 4:2, 17, 19-21). The Revised Standard Version translates the Hebrew as "flesh" to emphasize the contrast between human weakness (see Isa 40:6; Ps 56:5) and God's vital power, which will transform their lives. The promise is radical, for Jewish tradition had limited God's spirit to persons with official status: a judge, like Gideon (Judg 6:34); a king, like Saul (1 Sam 16:14); a prophet, like Ezekiel (Ezek 2:2). Although Moses desired a spirit-filled community (Num 11:29), God's spirit had been limited to the seventy elders (Num 11:17, 25).

In these verses God's spirit will empower each member of the community to "prophesy." The activity is further clarified with corresponding terms: "dream dreams" and "see visions." The "prophets" are identified as "your sons and daughters," "your old men," and "your young men" (v. 1b). What is unusual is the mention of "servants" and "handmaids" (v. 2). Although their rights were protected according to the law for the sabbath rest (Exod 20:10) and festivals (Deut 12:12, 18; 16:11, 14), they were not considered members of the community. Participation in God's spirit implies equal status for each person in the community.

The author of Luke-Acts quotes and interprets Joel 3:1-5a [2:28-32a] in the account of Peter's discourse at Pentecost (Acts 2:17-21). The risen Lord "received the promise of the holy Spirit from the Father and poured it forth" (Acts 2:33). Greek and Jew alike have access to the Spirit if they believe in Jesus and are baptized (Acts 2:38).

2) Cosmic signs (vv. 3-4 [2:30-31]). The activity of God on behalf of the Israelites during the Exodus (1250 B.C.E.) included wonders with blood (Exod 24:4-8), fire and smoke (Exod 13:21-22; 19:18). These elements (v. 3) and the eclipse of the sun (v. 4a; compare Rev 6:12) also indicate traditional imagery associated with the terrible day of the Lord (see p. 581). The identification of cosmic signs as blessings becomes clear when the verses are considered as portents of the day of the Lord, when something unexpected will occur (v. 5).

3) Deliverance (v. 5 [2:32]). Rescue is assured for each person who "calls on the name of the Lord" (v. 5a). The directive includes recognition of God (Exod 33:19) and worship (Isa 12:4; Ps 105:1; compare Zech 13:9) before the nations. Those designated as "the rescued" are further identified in verse 5bc as a "remnant" and "survivors." Their home is located on "Mount Zion" and in "Jerusalem." The descriptions indicate the temple-community of Judah preeminently. Some commentators suggest that the descriptions may include the Jews of the Diaspora (see Isa 27:12-13; 57:19), that is, Jews living outside Israel.

Paul introduces verse 5a in Rom 10:12-13 by interpreting its significance universally: "For there is no distinction between Jew and Greek; the same Lord is Lord of all, enriching all who call upon him" (Rom 10:12). The outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost is interpreted similarly: ". . . the promise is made to you and to your children and to all those far off, whomever the Lord our God will call" (Acts 2:39).

Recognition of earlier prophetic tradition is acknowledged in the clause "as the Lord has said" (v. 5b). The use of "remnant" terminology interprets Obad 17a: "But on Mount Zion there shall be a portion saved; the mountain shall be holy." The prophet also specified the source of life for the "remnant" by drawing on Ezek 39:29: "No longer will I hide my face from them, for I have poured out my spirit on the house of Israel, says the Lord God."

"Survivors whom the Lord shall call" (v. 5c) is a recognition of the mutual relationship between the Lord and the community that "calls upon the name of the Lord" (v. 5a). In 3:1-5 [2:28-32]there is the recognition that God's community will continue. A community whose home is in Jerusalem will be given God's spirit to function as prophets.

4:1-17 [3:1-17] Judgment on the nations. This section continues the theme of Part Two: Response of the Lord to Israel and the Nations. The circumstances of the community's suffering at the hands of the nations are reviewed. They prescribe God's action and judgment against Israel's enemies consistent with traditional imagery associated with the day of the Lord. Two later additions occur in the text (vv. 4-8, 18-21).

The introduction for the section (vv. 1-3 [3:1-3]) states the reasons for God's judgment. Verse 1 is a transition linking the theme of restoration for the community (2:17–3:5 [2:17-32]) with the consequences of its enemies (3:2-17 [2:32–3:17]). In verse 1 the community is designated initially as "Judah" and "Jerusalem"; in verses 2 and 3, however, it is described in relation to God: "my people" (see 2:17, 27; 4:3); "my inheritance" (see 2:17); "my land."

God will assemble all the nations for judgment (v. 2a). The "Valley of Jehoshaphat" is probably cited more for its connection to the Hebrew phrase ("Yahweh judges") than for its location as a specific geographical area. In early Christian tradition the historian Eusebius (Onamastikon) identified the place as the Kidron Valley. In verse 14b the place is referred to as the "valley of decision."

The nations are indicted for three actions toward the community which occurred during earlier Jewish history and continued through the time of Joel (vv. 2b-3):

1) "Scattered among the nations" refers to the deportations led by Assyria and Babylon from the eighth century through the sixth century. The exilic experience of Judah and Jerusalem, in particular, is recalled here.

2) "And divided my land" describes the immediate accessibility to the land for the conquerors who settled there (see Lam 5:2).

3) "Over my people they have cast lots" indicates how little the victors valued the lives of the deportees (see Obad 11; Nah 3:10). Children, in particular, are described as the victims of their pleasures.

The prose addition (vv. 4-8 [3:4-8]) elaborates the guilt of the nations resulting from their treatment of Israel (vv. 1-3). It suggests a courtroom narrative, with God functioning as accuser, judge, and vindicator of the community. To open the trial, God poses a rhetorical question about taking vengeance and promises swift retribution. Tyre, Sidon, and the regions of Philistia (the addressees) refer to territories of traditional animosity toward Israel. Next, God condemns specific actions against the community: plundering the temple, selling persons as slaves to the Greeks, sending them into exile (vv. 5-6). Finally, God promises exact retaliation for their deeds. For engaging in slave trade (see Amos 1:6-10; Ezek 27:13), they will be sold as slaves to the community. As dealers, the community will exile its former enemies by bartering with the Sabeans. The scene concludes with a statement of divine authority: "Indeed the Lord has spoken" (vv. 7-8).

The third division in the section (vv. 9-16 [3:9-16]) continues the poetic and thematic structure of the introduction (vv. 1-3). The Valley of Jehoshaphat is the site for judgment (v. 12) and for battle (v. 14). Unknown addressees are exhorted to announce war, rouse the soldiers, and assemble the peoples roundabout (vv. 9-11). The dire situation implies additional soldiers. The untrained warriors—farmers and field workers—are urged to respond. The directive is an ironic one that intentionally reverses the call to peace declared in earlier prophetic traditions (v. 10; see Isa 2:4; Mic 4:3).

Instructions associated with harvest, "apply the sickle," "come and tread" (v. 13), now identify the ferocious battle waged against the enemies of the community. The event is closely aligned to the imminent day of the Lord (v. 14). Additional cosmic imagery heralds the day (vv. 15-16). The Lord dwelling in Zion "roars" and "raises his voice" (v. 16a; compare 2:11a). The action does not indicate anger but protection for the community, for whom the Lord is a "refuge" and "stronghold" (v. 16b; see Pss 31:3-5; 61:4).

The climax to the section is a summary declaration of the oracles of assurance and blessing. The ultimate security for the community is knowing that the Lord is "your God," dwelling among them, providing the source of holiness and protection from all enemies (v. 17 [3:17]).

4:18-21 [3:18-21] Presence of God in Jerusalem. This poetic insertion may be regarded as an appendix to the Book of Joel. It amplifies the major theme of restoration by a series of promises to be fulfilled "on that day":

a) abundant sustenance for the community: wine, milk, water (v. 18; see Amos 9:13b; Ezek 47:1-12);

b) the destruction of Egypt and Edom, enduring political enemies (v. 19; see 1 Kgs 14:25; Obad 8-14);

c) everlasting security for Judah and Jerusalem (v. 20; see 3:5; 4:16);

d) retribution for enemies and the presence of the Lord in Zion (v. 21).

Conclusion

A literary analysis of the Book of Joel suggests the structure of a communal liturgy of lamentation. The format, however, has been expanded and developed by editorial activity. While many commentators recognize the development of the book, there is no consensus about the number of persons involved in this process. Some commentators see no connection between the literary development of the book and its religious meaning. They interpret the book according to a few general perspectives:

a) The book presents a restricted, nationalistic point of view. God's promises of restoration are limited to the Zion community in fulfillment of earlier prophetic traditions. Often Joel is compared unfavorably with the breadth of Isaiah and Micah, who include the participation of the nations in the community of Jerusalem (see Isa 2:2-4; Mic 4:1-3).

b) The importance of the book is virtually dependent on the figure of Jesus. He is the fulfillment of the prophecies by dying for the "nations" and giving the Spirit to all who believed in him.

c) Jews and Christians await a future event that will surpass the expectations of restoration that Joel proclaimed (see Rev 21).

Canonical critics offer a different perspective on the relationship of the literary development of Joel and its religious meaning. How the Book of Joel emerged as a canonical text provides clues to its religious significance in future communities.

Sources available for the editorial process included the original prophecy of Joel, presenting the devastation of the locust plague, and images and terms describing the day of the Lord taken from earlier prophetic traditions. In arranging and adding to the sources, the editor(s) shaped the text to provide a message for future communities. References to the new addressees are indicated initially in the introduction to the first part of the book (1:3). The entire second part of the book (2:18–4:21 [2:18–3:21]), with its proclamations about future possibilities, is also fashioned to include them.

The editorial process provided a continuity of religious experience and hope for the original community and for future communities. It shaped the book to declare that God's compassion toward the temple-community of Judah because of their repentance would be possible for any community. Correspondingly, the blessings of restoration would be possible for future communities as well. For both types of community, original and future, neither final judgment nor blessings had definitively occurred.

The perspective of canonical critics appears preferable to the interpretation of other commentators because it assumes that a text can be valuable for its own contribution. Consequently, the methodology does not depend on prophecy-fulfillment in the New Testament or on comparison with other prophetic traditions in the Old Testament to validate the importance of the Book of Joel. Canonical criticism provides a necessary focus on the placement of Joel within the Minor Prophets. It also widens the interpretation of Joel through a different methodology that includes implications for future communities.

OBADIAH

Mary Margaret Pazdan, O.P.

INTRODUCTION

Authorship

What is known about the author of this book is limited to verse 1a, which names and identifies him: "The vision of Obadiah. [Thus says the Lord God:] Of Edom we have heard a message from the Lord." "Vision" is a technical term for prophecy (see Nah 1:1; Mic 1:1), whose contents are described in verses 2-4. "We have heard a message . . .," however, emphasizes that auditory perception is the source for prophetic inspiration. "[Thus says the Lord God:]" and the repetition of the divine name also indicate traditional prophetic formulas. The name Obadiah means "servant of Yahweh." It occurs twelve times in the Hebrew Scriptures. In the Book of Obadiah the name may be used more for its symbolic sense.

Other biographical detail is inferred from the text. Many scholars suggest that Obadiah was a cult prophet attached to the Jerusalem temple before its destruction (586 B.C.E.). The structure of the prophecies reflects a liturgical service in which the sovereignty of God is affirmed through oracles against the nations. Obadiah's connection with the temple in Jerusalem is strengthened by references to God's kingdom and Mount Zion (vv. 17, 21). Other scholars suggest that an unknown prophet utilized a liturgical structure for the deliverance of oracles.

Dating of the text

The superscription of the book indicates no chronological setting for Obadiah. The position of the book in the canons is not decisive for establishing a date. The Jewish canon lists Obadiah after Amos (preexilic), while the Alexandrian canon locates Obadiah after Joel (postexilic).

While most scholars agree that the oracles against Edom were proclaimed after 586 B.C.E., the dating of the final text is disputed. The present discussion involves a consideration of the relationship between Israel and Edom, oral and written traditions, and the process of editorial activity.

According to Jewish tradition, the relationship between Israel and Edom was one of continuous conflict. It is attributed to the fraternal conflict of two brothers, Jacob and Esau (see Gen 25:19-34; 26:34-35; 27:1-44; 32:4; 33:1-17). The hostility developed for several centuries as the descendants of Jacob (Israelites) and Esau (Edomites) refused one another rights of territorial passage (see Num 20:14-21) and freedom (see 2 Sam 8:13-14; 1 Kgs 11:15-18).

Edom revolted against Judah about 844 B.C.E. The animosity between them continued, however, for nearly 250 additional years, culminating in Edom's alliance with Babylon against Judah (see p. 573). Although the extent of Edomite activity against Judah during this period is unclear, the witness of the anti-Edom oracles (see below) indict Edom for treachery and betrayal. There is even a claim that the Edomites burned the temple (see 1 Esdras 4:45). They probably conspired with the Babylonian empire and settled in Judean territory.

A recent archeological investigation supports this position. It uncovered an inscription contemporary with the last days of Jerusalem. A troop commander in Arad sent for additional soldiers to fortify a position against an imminent Edomite attack: "Behold I have sent to warn you: are not the men with Elisha, lest Edom come thither."

Edom, unlike Judah, was independent but not untroubled for over a hundred years after the fall of Jerusalem. Tribes from Arabia frequently raided the land (see Mal 1:2-4). After 450 B.C.E. the name Edom disappeared from historical records. During the reign of Herod the Great (37–4 B.C.E.), however, the territory designated Edom was named Idumea. Mekiltha, a Jewish text of the early Christian period, identified Edom as a code name for oppression.

Commentators suggest that the enmity between Israel and Edom was preserved in oral traditions that were later recorded as anti-Edom oracles. While some fragments are located in the Jacob cycle (see Gen 25:23; 27:39-40), the most extensive witness is located outside the Torah (see Isa 21:11-12; 34:5-7; 63:1-6; Jer 49:7-22; Lam 4:21-22; Ezek 25:12-14; 35:1-5; Amos 1:11-12; Mal 1:3-5; Ps 137:7-9). In these passages Edom is condemned for less dramatic but more continuous harassment than burning the temple.

Part of the complexity involved in dating the Book of Obadiah is the relationship of the anti-Edom oracles (vv. 1-14, 15b) to Jer 49:7-22. Some commentators state that Obadiah represented the prior tradition, while others indicate that Jeremiah was the first witness to the tradition. A third group traces both Obadian and Jeremian oracles to a common earlier tradition. Both prophets incorporated the tradition and additional material after the fall of Jerusalem (586 B.C.E.).

Another question is the chronological relationship of the oracles in Obadiah. While condemnations of Edom predominate (vv. 1-14, 15b), there are oracles describing the day of the Lord (vv. 15a, 16-18) and the restoration of Israel (vv. 19-21). The difference of opinion about the approximate date of the oracles and subsequent editorial activity results in a final composition date from early postexilic (535 B.C.E.) to a century later (435 B.C.E.).

In this commentary Obadiah is identified first chronologically because of his proximity to the Edomite conspirators and redaction of earlier anti-Edom oracles. In addition, his position as a transitional figure between exilic and postexilic prophecy indicates a singular contribution among the other Minor Prophets. His contribution includes oracles against Edom after the destruction of Jerusalem as well as later oracles about the day of the Lord. These factors indicate that the date for the final edition of the text is a question of secondary importance.

Composition of the text

Although the Book of Obadiah is the shortest book of the Old Testament, discussion about the final dating of the text and related literary questions continues in the literature. There is no consensus about the priority of Jeremiah, Obadiah, or another common tradition for the anti-Edom oracles. In addition, the text has been analyzed according to two extreme positions: a literary unity or a collection of fragments. Presently, several commentators propose a moderate position. The book contains two sets of oracles and an appendix. Thematically, the unity of the oracles consists in Edom's condemnation and future situation in the day of the Lord. The appendix is related to Israel's restoration in that event.

Outline of the book

PART ONE:	Oracles against Edom (vv. 1-14, 15b)
vv. 1-9	Pride and Destruction of Edom
vv. 10-14	Treachery of Edom toward Judah
v. 15b	Condemnation of Edom
PART TWO:	Oracles about the Day of the Lord (vv. 15a, 16-21)
vv. 15a, 16	Judgment of the Nations
vv. 17-18	Return and Restoration of Israel
vv. 19-21	Appendix: Return and Restoration of Israel

COMMENTARY

PART ONE: ORACLES AGAINST EDOM

Obad 1-14, 15b

Part One is a collection of oracles that expand a common tradition of anti-Edom material. The closest parallel is Jer 49:7-22 (see p. 587). Commentators state that no more bitter diatribe exists against Edom in the whole of the Old Testament than what is recorded here.

Two perspectives are prominent about the interpretation of verses 2-9. The context of verses 1b and 7, in particular, is debated. Some suggest that the destruction of Edom has already occurred. The verses are an additional reflection on the event. Others indicate that the verses designate a future destruction. Attempts to establish the context are directly related to considerations of the dating and the composition of the text.

Proposals that seek to identify a specific historical event, that is, an Arabian conquest of Edom, appear to limit the possibilities for interpretation of the section. Although recent archeological discoveries are providing some limited support for this type of analysis, additional research and data are needed.

1-9 Pride and the destruction of Edom. Verse 1 is a prose introduction to the Book of Obadiah. It states his identity and function. It also links him to earlier prophetic tradition: "we have heard a message from the Lord" (v. 1a; see Jer 49:7).

Verse 1b relates the departure of a messenger to proclaim Edom's destruction among the nations: "Up! Let us go to war against him!" It is difficult to determine whether the statement refers to an actual event, that is, the approach of the Arabian enemy against Edom, or whether it is a prophetic formula of a war summons to the nations (Jer 49:14; Joel 4:9ff. [3:9ff.]; Mic 4:13).

God announces the destruction of Edom (vv. 2-4; see Jer 49:14-16). The dispositions of the nation's heart are condemned. Pride effects Edom's contemptible position among the nations (v. 2). False security arises from dwelling "in the clefts of the rock" and "in the heights." The "rock" refers to the terrain as well as to the Edomite capital, Sela, a nearly impregnable city.

The arrogant challenge "Who will bring me down to earth?" will prove no obstacle to an enemy (v. 3). Even a position as an eagle with a nest among the stars will not thwart God's action: "I will bring you down" (v. 4; compare Amos 9:2; Isa 14:13-14).

God's power of destruction is compared to the strategy of prowlers invading homes in Edom (vv. 5-9). If "thieves," "robbers," or "vintagers" trespassed, they would leave something behind for the household (v. 5; see Jer 49:9; Lev 19:10; Deut 24:21). The destruction of Edom (Esau), however, will be without mercy. The event is described in a traditional cry of lament (vv. 6-7; see 2 Sam 1:19-27; Jer 38:22; Lam 1:1; 2:1; 4:1). It will be as thorough as the forfeit of Jacob's birthright to Esau (v. 6; see Gen 25:27-34). Those closest to the Edomites, allies and relatives, will participate in the devastation. "There is no understanding in him!" indicates the bewilderment and surprise that the event causes among the Edomites (v. 7).

Verse 7 is as difficult to interpret as verse 1. What are the implications of "allies" and "relatives"? Is it an ironic comment on the real but spurned relationships between Edom and Judah, which were completely severed in the fall of Jerusalem? Do the terms relate to the reversal of Judah's situation in the day of the Lord? (see Part Two). Do the bonds of relationship refer to those who supported Edom after the fall of Jerusalem but who later conquered Edom? The comment "There is no understanding in him" is appropriate for each interpretation.

The divine formula "says the Lord" (v. 4) is repeated to form an inclusion expressing God's judgment against Edom (v. 8a). In a rhetorical question God states the disappearance of the "wise" and "understanding" from Edom (Esau). Their demise is related to verse 7, which also commented on "no understanding" (see Jer 49:7). The inhabitants of Edom and Arabia were traditionally considered wise persons (see 1 Kgs 5:10; 10:1-3; Job 1:1; 2:11; Prov 30:1; 31:1).

Warriors will be destroyed with the wise (v. 9). "Teman," an important city in Edom, refers to the whole territory. Another inclusive term is "Mount Esau" (vv. 8b, 9b).

10-14 Treachery of Edom toward Judah. The indictment against Edom is declared:

"violence to your brother Jacob" (v. 10). Specifically, the condemnation is collaboration by passivity toward Babylon's activity, that is, sacking and dividing up the city of Jerusalem (v. 11). A poignant question implied by the arrangement of verses 10 and 11 is: How can you, the "brother," become "one of them," the "aliens"?

Additional details of Edom's behavior during the destruction of Jerusalem imply active participation. They are presented in a series of present-tense protests for what has already occurred. This literary device highlights the sense of irony for the future situation of Edom (vv. 12-14). Although the injunctions repeat sacking the city (v. 13), the more malicious activities are mocking the calamity of "your brother" (v. 12) and hindering the escape of refugees (v. 14).

15b Condemnation of Edom. This statement, which is derived from the traditional Jewish practice of lex talionis (an eye for an eye), is the climax to Part One. It summarizes the judgment of retribution against Edom: "As you have done, so shall it be done to you" (see Exod 21:23-25; Lev 24:17-22).

PART TWO: ORACLES ABOUT THE DAY OF THE LORD

Obad 15a, 16-21

The relationship between Part One and Part Two is parallel to the Book of Joel. The plague of locusts in Part One of that book was a foreshadowing of the day of the Lord in Part Two. Similarly, in Obadiah, the anti-Edom oracles in Part One are a foreshadowing of the day of the Lord in Part Two. In addition, the different consequences of the day of the Lord are identical: punishment for the nations (especially Edom) and restoration for Judah (compare Joel 4:1-21 [3:1-21]; Obad 15a, 16-21).

Was one book the model for the other? Since Joel 4:17 [3:17] quotes Obad 17, he may have used the Obadian model with some editorial activity. It is also possible that both books are dependent on earlier traditions that they modified according to a similar structure. Some commentators consider the structure of a communal lamentation to be another convincing parallel for Joel and Obadiah.

15a, 16 Judgment of the nations. The imminent day of the Lord is announced for "all the nations" (v. 15a). The proclamation connects the previous section (vv. 11-14), where the phrase "on the day" was used ten times to detail the guilt of Edom. The proclamation also introduces the prominent theme of the present section (vv. 15a, 16-21).

Verse 16 indicates how the punishment of the nations is related to God's judgment of Judah and Edom. Again, the lex talionis is operative: "As you have drunk . . . so shall all the nations drink continually" (vv. 16a, 15b). The metaphor of drinking refers to the cup of God's judgment and wrath (see Jer 25:15-29). Just as the community experienced the bitterness of God's judgment "upon my holy mountain" (Jerusalem) in 586 B.C.E., so all the nations (including Edom) will drink the cup until they "shall become as though they had not been" (v. 16b; compare Jer 50:25-28; Joel 3:4–4:21 [2:31–3:21]).

17-18 Return and restoration of Israel. The nations' judgment (vv. 15a, 16) is contrasted with Israel's future. Jacob (Judah) and Mount Zion (Jerusalem) are emphasized in restoration images (v. 17) corresponding to Joel's vision (Joel 4:17 [3:17]). A "portion" ("those that escape" in the Revised Standard Version) develops the theme of the "remnant" who would escape God's judgment (see Isa 4:3; 37:32; Zeph 2:7-9). Holiness characterizes the group.

Although confirming the tradition of Judah's restoration, Obadiah inserts a new perspective. The prophet includes the whole country by referring to Jacob and Joseph, who represent Judah and northern Israel respectively (v. 18a). All will share in the possession of Mount Zion. The fate of Esau (Edom) and the other nations symbolized by Esau is quite different. They will not survive (v. 18; compare Joel 1:4, 19; 2:3, 5). The metaphors of "fire" ("flame") and "stubble" indicate God's judgment against the nations through Israel's agency (see Isa 10:17; 29:5-6; Ezek 25:14). Again, the divine formula confirms the judgment (v. 18b; see vv. 4, 8).

19-21 Appendix: Return and restoration of Israel. The additional verses identify the day of the Lord as a day of great blessings for all the people of Israel. The participation of the nations appears to be limited to loss of land. Verse 21, however, suggests a different role.

The appendix outlines the extensive restoration of the boundaries of Israel. Unlike the small territory to which the Judeans returned in 538 B.C.E., their future homeland implies territorial boundaries greater than the ones achieved by King David (vv. 19-20). Precise geographical locations, however, are difficult to establish, since the Hebrew text is obscure. The major emphasis of verses 19 and 20 is to claim for Israel more land than it had possessed before deportations.

The role of Jacob, who "shall take possession of those that dispossessed them" (v. 17b), parallels "occupy," which occurs five times (vv. 19-20). The verbs suggest, in language reminiscent of covenant promises (see Gen 12:7; Exod 3:8; 2 Sam 7:10), how Israel will be restored.

"They shall occupy the Negeb, the mount of Esau" (v. 19a): The Negeb, an area south of Judah, was occupied by the Edomites during their collaboration with Babylon. It is identified by the name Idumea during the rule of Herod the Great. The area is mentioned twice (vv. 19a; 20b) as an inclusion to highlight Israel's restoration as the reversal of Edomite fortune.

Instead of "They shall occupy . . . the foothills of the Philistines," the Revised Standard Version reads: "those of the Shephelah [shall possess] the land of the Philistines" (v. 19a). The Shephelah is a foothill region west of Judah and east of the Philistine coastland. Repossessing the territory of a traditional enemy, the Philistines, is one characteristic of restoration (see 1 Sam 17; Judg 13–16; 1 Sam 31:8-13; 2 Sam 21:15-22).

Ephraim, with its capital Samaria, is a region north of Jerusalem whose traditions are associated with northern Israel. This land, too, will be reclaimed. Benjamin is a territory north of Jerusalem that extends east to the Jordan River. Its inhabitants will extend borders to Gilead, a region northeast of Ephraim and across the Jordan (v. 19b).

Exiles of Israel were scattered in distant regions. Their identity and the geographical locations mentioned in verse 20 are disputed. The first group mentioned is "the captives of this host," which the Revised Standard Version translates "the exiles in Halah" (v. 20a). They may be deportees of northern Israel who were sent to Halah, a city northwest of Nineveh (see 2 Kgs 17:6). The group will occupy "Canaanite" ("Phoenician" in the Revised Standard Version) land along the Mediterranean coast, including the city of Zarephath near the coast, about ten miles south of Sidon (see 1 Kgs 17:9-24; Luke 4:26).

"The captives of Jerusalem" (v. 20b) parallels "the captives of this host" (v. 20a). Some deportees who did not return to rebuild Jerusalem are living in Sepharad. The identity of this city is disputed. Some suggest Babylon as a parallel to Halah, which is located there; others identify it with Sardis in Asia Minor (see Rev 3:1). Several Jewish commentators identify the term as Spain. Most recently it has been identified as Hesperides on the northern coast of Africa. Whatever the precise designation of Sepharad, the verse indicates that exiles far removed from Jerusalem will return to closer proximity by occupying "the cities of the Negeb."

Verse 21 forms an inclusion with verse 17 by returning attention to Mount Zion. Who will exercise dominion on Mount Zion and the mount of Esau (Edom)? The Hebrew is translated here as "saviors" (v. 21a). The people of Israel will function as judges and as God's viceroys in the kingdom. Sovereignty belongs to God alone (v. 21b). Other scholars interpret the term as God's restoration of the remnant, that is, the people who are "saved." This distinction offers Israel participation in the universal kingship of God. Other nations, however, may ultimately experience God's saving action.

Conclusion

The meager status of the Book of Obadiah among the Minor Prophets has not been transformed by later generations. The text is not listed in a lectionary for reflection on the mystery of God and human response. It is neither utilized for catechetical or preaching events nor suggested for personal or communal prayer. In addition, the book is not generally recognized in extrabiblical literature or contemporary situations. Why, then, was it preserved in tradition?

Commentaries and articles on Obadiah emphasize questions regarding the dating of the text, archeological data, and literary composition. The religious message appears less important in comparison to these considerations. When the religious dimensions of the text are investigated, the results are similar to the analysis about the Book of Joel (see p. 585):

a) The book presents a widely attested Jewish tradition about the relationship of God and the community. Restoration of the land is a symbol of the restoration of a spiritual relationship. Some reflection about the present state of Israel is occasionally related to the same premise.

b) The function of Israel among the nations is to offer witness and an invitation to future possibilities. God's blessing (restoration) can be a sign that judgment (punishment) may not be the ultimate condition.

c) Confidence in God's sovereignty is indicated through the oracles about Edom's punishment and Israel's restoration.

Obadiah's contribution to postexilic prophecy may appear to be a very limited and localized message. In style, too, its bitter invective against Edom may offend believers (although the verses parallel some of the psalms and oracles against other nations).

Nonetheless, Obadiah can be read in context as a passionate plea to the God whose sovereignty assures Israel a future. Recourse to this God demands strong faith. The experience of the Exile and the prospect of return have not restored confidence in God nor in the community's self-image. Where else can the community turn? Only this God will forgive and restore Israel. Even more unexpectedly, this God will bless Jacob's (Israel's) estranged brother, Esau (Edom). An invitation will be extended to participate in the universal kingdom of the sovereign Lord.

HAGGAI

Mary Margaret Pazdan, O.P.

INTRODUCTION

Authorship

For the Books of Joel and Obadiah the author's identification was limited to the superscription of each book (v. 1). Additional biographical information was obtained through inferences in the text. For the Book of Haggai, however, there are more citations. The name Haggai appears eight times (1:1, 3, 13; 2:1, 10, 13, 14, 20).

The superscription (1:1) identifies his function as a prophet and names the addressees to whom he proclaims the oracles. Four verses identify Haggai with the word "prophet" and a traditional prophetic formula, "the word of the Lord came to . . ." (1:1, 3; 2:1, 10). Two verses identify Haggai as a "messenger of the Lord [proclaiming] the message of the Lord" (1:13; 2:20). Two verses mention his name as one who proclaims God's oracles (2:13, 14). The absence of any genealogy may be intended to emphasize Haggai's prophetic authority. Outside the text that bears his name, Haggai is linked with Zechariah as a prophet (see Ezra 5:1, 16; 6:14).

The name Haggai means "festival." Other names in the Old Testament are also derived from the same Hebrew root (see Gen 46:16; Num 26:15; 2 Sam 3:4; 1 Chr 3:2). The name may refer to the day of the prophet's birth, that is, a festival. It may designate Haggai's task of restoring the temple for cultic activities that celebrate festivals. While some identify Haggai as a priest, there is no indication in the text for this designation. It is preferable to associate him with cult prophets in Jerusalem. His position in that group, however, is unclear.

Dating of the text

The Books of Joel and Obadiah are difficult to date for three reasons: (a) their different positions in the Jewish and Alexandrian canons; (b) the absence of chronological data in the superscriptions; (c) minimal contextual clues. The dating process for the Book of Haggai presents an opposite situation: (a) an identical position in the canons; (b) clear chronological data in the superscription; (c) five precisely dated oracles.

The Book of Haggai is listed as the tenth Minor Prophet, between Zephaniah and Zechariah in both canons. The superscription and the chronological data of the text indicate that the ministry of Haggai included five proclamations of the word of the Lord from August through December 520 B.C.E.

The addressees are members of the second group of exiles from Babylon, who returned to Jerusalem about 522 B.C.E. under the leadership of Zerubbabel, the governor, and Joshua, the high priest. These two had been appointed to the positions of leadership during the early reign of Darius I of Persia (1:1; see p. 574).

The duration of Haggai's ministry is unclear. Although he is believed to have been a contemporary of Zechariah, there is no acknowledgment in either book of the other's activity. The recorded oracles indicate Haggai's perspective on how to achieve restoration for the Judean temple-community. The final form of the text indicates additional perspectives by the editor. The final date of the text is considered a question of secondary importance among commentators.

Composition of the text

For more than a century questions about the unity of the Book of Haggai have been discussed. The literary relationship between Haggai and Ezra has also been analyzed. More recently, the process of editorial activity has been examined for additional literary forms as well as for the religious significance of the oracles.

Scholars focus attention on one section of the text (2:10-19) in particular. Rearrangement of chapter 2 has been suggested as a partial solution to the difficulties of the verses. The New English Bible prefers this order: 1:14, 15, 13; 2:15-19, 10-14, 1-9, 20-23. Others, including the New American Bible, suggest that 2:15-19 should go after chapter 1. Revision of 2:18 is indicated by brackets. The editors believe that the date of the month is a gloss or that the date should be changed from the ninth month to the sixth month. None of the proposed rearrangements is confirmed in any text or version.

In general, there is a consensus about the structure, which provides a unity to the text, namely, five oracles introduced by editorial frameworks (see p. 576).

Outline of the book

PART ONE:	Reconstruction of the Temple (1:1-15a)
1:1	Superscription
1:2-11	First Oracle: Exhortation to Rebuild the Temple
1:12-15a	Second Oracle: Response and Assurance
PART TWO:	Future Glory of the Temple (1:15b–2:23)
1:15b–2:9	Third Oracle: Assurance and Promises
2:10-19	Fourth Oracle: Decisions and Future Blessings
2:20-23	Fifth Oracle: Future of Zerubbabel

COMMENTARY

PART ONE: RECONSTRUCTION OF THE TEMPLE

Hag 1:1-15a

Part One offers a historical framework for the activity of Haggai by the insertion of chronological introductions and narrative detail. Another component of the oracles is the use of two traditional prophetic formulas: "Thus says the Lord of hosts" (1:2, 5, 7) and "says the Lord" (1:13). The contrast of prose introductions and poetic oracles is also apparent.

1:1 Superscription. This verse is not an introduction to the entire Book of Haggai but is limited to the first oracle (1:2-11). In addition to mention of the date of August 520 B.C.E., the verse identifies the current Persian ruler, Darius I. Since the position of monarch no longer existed for the Jewish community after the Exile, the superscription accommodated the new situation by substituting the name of the foreign ruler.

Zerubbabel and Joshua, the appointed representatives of Darius' government, are the addressees of the first oracle. Their names are repeated in the second and third oracles. Unlike Haggai, both are identified by function and genealogy: "the governor of Judah, Zerubbabel, son of Shealtiel, and the high priest Joshua, son of Jehozadak."

Zerubbabel was the nephew of King Jehoiachin, who had been exiled to Babylon in 597 B.C.E. (see 1 Chr 3:17-19). His civic appointment was probably considered a minor position in the extensive Persian empire. In this early stage of restoration, however, his presence was a reminder of the royal Davidic household that had ruled in Jerusalem. Symbolically, he may have been a catalyst for dreams of rebuilding a new kingdom according to the model of the preexilic monarchy (see Hag 2:20-23).

Joshua is named Jeshua in the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. He was a grandson of the chief priest in Jerusalem. Joshua and his father had been exiled to Babylon (see 1 Chr 5:40-41). The designation "high priest" occurs here for the first time. As the religious leader of the returned exiles, his position may have been more autonomous. After him priestly authority became more significant (see pp. 574–575).

1:2-11 First oracle: Exhortation to rebuild the temple. The oracle consists of three sections related to the problem of temple restoration (vv. 2-4, 5-6, 7-11). Each is introduced by a traditional prophetic formula.

The first section (vv. 2-4) considers the question of the community's attitude toward rebuilding the temple. The initial statement is presented as a quotation from the community: "Not now has the time come to rebuild the house of the Lord" (v. 2). Next, a rhetorical question offers an opportunity to reflect on experience: "Is it time for you to dwell in your own paneled houses, while this house lies in ruins?" (v. 4).

It is clear that the entire community, not just the civic and religious leadership, is being challenged. The repetition of the word "time" (vv. 2, 4) draws attention to the irony of the situation. Who really decides what is the propitious "time" for rebuilding?

In preexilic tradition an interesting parallel suggests a response to the question. God provides the perspective. Recall the encounter between God and David before the first temple was constructed. In that situation David confided his worries to Nathan about a dwelling for God, since he, David, lived in a house of cedar (2 Sam 7:2-3). God replied by promising to build David a house! The metaphor of "house" symbolized an everlasting dynasty and kingdom (2 Sam 7:7-17).

Why was Haggai's community waiting to rebuild the temple (v. 2)? The foundations for the temple had been laid in the spring of 536 B.C.E. by the first group that had returned from Babylon (see Ezra 3:7-13). No additional progress, however, had been achieved. What factors impeded the project? Had the community forgotten the edict of Cyrus for the task of restoration? Were the living conditions enervating? Did they experience opposition inside and outside the community? (See p. 574.) Perhaps they were waiting for the literal fulfillment of Jeremiah's prophecy: "Only after seventy years have elapsed for Babylon will I visit you and fulfill for you my promise to bring you back to this place" (Jer 29:10; 25:11; compare Zech 1:12, 16-17). If so, a few years still remain for the fulfillment. There is no specific reason indicated in the text to account for the community's resistance to rebuilding the temple.

The second section, too, invites the community to reflect on its experience (vv. 5-6). "Consider your ways" (vv. 5b, 7b) introduces a series of comparisons between efforts at reconstituting daily living and the results. Although they have labored for food, drink, clothing, and wages, the results are meager and unsatisfying (v. 6).

The third section consists of a command and a judgment from God (vv. 7-11). It indicates the relationship between God's activity and the present experience of the community. The community must obtain timber to build the house of God (v. 8a). The urgency of the task consists in giving glory to God (v. 8b).

The expectations about restoration cannot be met (v. 9a). Why? God has entered into the situation. Efforts are useless, especially in providing homes for themselves while God's house "lies in ruins" (v. 9b). Stark living conditions are the direct result of God's initiative for the drought. The land and its produce, persons and their livestock are affected (vv. 10-11).

The literary form of verses 9-11 is a question-answer pattern. The didactic style of the verses repeats the plight of the community (vv. 4-6). In addition, it emphasizes the need for immediate response on the part of the community. Clearly, the temple must be rebuilt. However, the physical restoration suggests a metaphorical function.

According to Haggai, to rebuild the temple means to restore the relationship of the community with God (compare the commentary on Joel 1:5-20, p. 579). Restoration of God's house is the primary responsibility of the community. Until the task is completed, the community lives under God's judgment enacted through the Exile and continuing in the harsh conditions of their lives. When the temple is completed, blessing will replace judgment. The Lord will dwell in the temple-community again.

1:12-15a Second oracle: Response and assurance. The ordering of the verses is debated (see p. 593). The dating for the oracle does not follow the pattern of the other oracles, that is, a prose introduction (see 1:1; 1:15b–2:1; 2:10, 18, 20). For some commentators, the dating information at the conclusion of the oracle (v. 15) indicates the need for rearrangement. They suggest that the phrase "on the twenty-fourth day of the sixth month" ought to be shifted to 2:15 to provide a chronology for the third oracle (2:15-19). Rearrangement, however, is not necessary.

The prose reflection of verse 12 indicates the importance of Haggai's position in the temple-community. The editor of the text draws attention to his prophetic credentials (vv. 12b-13; see p. 592). In addition, Haggai's proclamation is obeyed by the entire community. "All the remnant of the people" may be inserted to identify the returned exiles as the ones who will receive the blessings of restoration (v. 12a; 2:2; see Isa 10:20-22; Mic 4:7; Zech 8:6, 11-12). This group "listened to the voice of the Lord" (see Jer 23:3; Deut 6:2-3).

The brief oracle is located in the center of the editorial comment (v. 13). "I am with you" is a traditional proclamation of assurance (see Gen 28:15; Exod 3:12; Jer 1:8; 30:10-11; Isa 41:10; 43:5). Here the word is accompanied by action as the Lord "stirs up" the spirit of Zerubbabel, Joshua, and the community for the task of rebuilding the temple (v. 14). The Hebrew verb from which the word for "spirit" is derived is used to describe God's power to activate Cyrus, who authorized the exiles to return (2 Chr 36:22-23) and to activate the exiles themselves (Ezra 1:5).

The phrase "twenty-fourth day of the sixth month" (v. 15a) does not have to be shifted to another place in the text. The date recalls to the community the process involved in their own call to rebuild the temple. Having listened to the proclamations of Haggai (vv. 2-11), they determined to be obedient. God's subsequent word and action of assurance (vv. 13-14) encouraged their response to be faithful. They began the project of restoring the temple.

PART TWO: FUTURE GLORY OF THE TEMPLE

Hag 1:15b–2:23

Part Two refers to future blessings for the Judean temple-community, blessings that were proclaimed before the Exile. It offers hope in present circumstances, blessings for the future, and a role of prominence to Zerubbabel, the civic leader. Four identical structural components link the two parts of the book: chronological introductions; addressees; question-and-answer pattern; assurances. Promises of future blessings are a development of the Lord's assurances (vv. 6-9, 21-23).

1:15b–2:9 Third oracle: Assurance and promises. The chronological introduction (1:15b–2:1) follows the pattern of the first oracle (1:1). The "twenty-first day of the seventh month" indicates nearly one month of work on rebuilding the temple. The date is also important in the Jewish calendar: it is the final day of a week's celebration of the feast of Booths, during which the community would remember its ancestors' living in tents as they journeyed through the wilderness (see Lev 23:33-36, 39-43; Deut 16:13-15). As one of the three pilgrimage feasts (along with Passover and Pentecost), the feast of Booths would draw crowds to Jerusalem.

The addressees of the third oracle are identical with those of the previous oracle: Zerubbabel, Joshua, and the "remnant of the people" (v. 2). Haggai may have chosen the occasion of the festival because of the presence of the civic and religious leaders and other persons gathered in Jerusalem. The celebration provided an association with the period of the first temple. During Solomon's reign the temple had been dedicated on this festival (see 1 Kgs 8; compare Ezek 45:25; Zech 14:16).

The question-and-answer pattern (1:9-11) continues in the first section of the oracle (2:3-5). A series of three questions (v. 3) invites those assembled to reflect on their memories of the temple before Babylon conquered Jerusalem with the probable assistance of Edom (see the commentary on Obadiah, p. 586). The comparison of the Solomonic temple and the sporadic progress of reconstruction since 538 B.C.E. left no doubt about which was a glorious achievement.

A proclamation of assurances links the third oracle to the second oracle. While recorded briefly in the second oracle (1:13), the declaration occurs in an expanded form (2:4-5). Officials and community members are exhorted to "take courage" (three times), and not to fear (v. 4). The Lord is present; God's spirit dwells in all the members of the community (v. 5b; see 1:14).

The traditional language of assurance is developed by an editor in verse 5a. The reference to God's relationship with Israel provides a continuity of experience for the returned exiles. The specific event, "the pact," is the covenant experience at Mount Sinai. "I am with you, says the Lord of hosts" is assurance to both groups (v. 4b; see Exod 29:45-46).

The second section of the oracle announces future blessings for the community (vv. 6-9). The uncertainty of when they will be fulfilled is indicated by "one moment yet, a little while" (v. 6a). The Revised Standard Version, however, interprets the phrase to mean that God will act again in a similar way: "once again, in a little while."

While cosmic shaking is attributed to God in earlier traditions (see Amos 8:8-9; Isa 2:13-21; 13:13; Ezek 38:20; compare Joel 2:10; 4:16 [3:16]), the proclamation here promises a new reality (vv. 6b-7a). The "nations" and their "treasures" will be shaken, too. There is no indication in this verse of "universalism," that is, universal salvation, as some commentators have suggested. They compare this section to Isa 60:5-11, which presents a different concept.

The future action of God will be directed to filling the new temple with "glory" (v. 7b). "Silver" and "gold" from Babylon and the nations will be used for sacred vessels to worship God in glory (v. 8; compare Zech 6:9-15). The Lord's direct intervention, then, will accomplish what no dedicated human effort could accomplish independently. Greater glory will be in the Lord's second temple than in the period of the first temple (v. 9a). The present situation of the community will be reversed.

The section concludes with a comprehensive promise of blessings, "peace" (shalom) in verse 9b (compare Zech 8:12, 19). What constitutes "peace"? Where is it to be located? For whom? The term's multiple interpretation transcends any particular designation. The verse may be intentionally unclear in the Hebrew text. In the Greek text, however, a scribe appended a reflection: "and peace of soul as a possession for all who build, to erect this temple."

2:10-19 Fourth oracle: Decisions and future blessings. This oracle is the most difficult passage to interpret. Commentators debate virtually every perspective: dating indications; the connection between verses 11-14 and 15-19; the placement of the oracle; the addressees (v. 14); the religious significance of the passage. The division of the oracle into two sections (vv. 10-14 and 15-19) is generally agreed upon among scholars.

Verse 10 identifies the date for the oracle (compare v. 18). There are several suggestions about altering the date and the placement of the oracle (see p. 593). Rearrangement, however, is not necessary, since precise dating is not the only factor to be considered for interpretation. The verse indicates that a few months after work had commenced on the temple, Haggai proclaimed another oracle.

In the first section of the oracle, the initial statement in verse 11 exhorts Haggai to consult the "priests" for a "decision" (torah). Priests were the arbitrators for all circumstances of daily life (see Deut 17:8-13; compare Zech 7:2-3; Mal 2:7). Each decision under their jurisdiction was connected with the primary concern of the community: What constitutes holiness, that is, what is involved in purity and defilement? The verses describe a set of circumstances about ritual purity. The situation is formulated in two question-and-answer patterns (vv. 12-13; see 1:9-11; 2:3-5).

The first question is about "sanctified flesh," or roasted meat that had been blessed for ritual sacrifice (v. 12). If a person were carrying the ritual element, would the element effect holiness for other objects that came into contact with it? The priests respond negatively. Holiness is not transferred by contact with a sacred object (compare Exod 29:37; 30:29; Lev 6:26-27).

Another perspective of the first question follows (v. 13). If a person is defiled because of contact with an unclean object, would the defilement be transferred to other objects with which the person comes into contact (see Lev 6:20-21, 25-28; 11:24-28; 22:4-7)? The priests respond positively. Defilement, unlike holiness, is easily transferable. Contemporary sociological analysis of Jewish purity and defilement codes confirms the extraordinary stratification implicit in groups, religious responsibilities, and possibilities of changing one's status of purity and defilement.

The climax of the section occurs in verse 14. It states the judgment of the Lord following the norms of the priests' decisions. To whom is the judgment directed? To "this people . . . this nation." What is the verdict? "All the works of their hands, and what they offer there is unclean." The identity of the addressees and the judgment of the Lord provide the religious significance of the section.

Earlier scholarship suggested that the addressees were the Samaritans or a group later reinterpreted as the Samaritans. According to Ezra, their offer to collaborate with the returned exiles in the restoration of the temple had been spurned. During the leadership of Zerubbabel and Joshua, the Samaritans retaliated, and progress on the temple was hampered (see Ezra 4:1-5). Although the chronology in Ezra is uncertain, the events are part of a reliable tradition. As enemies of Judah, their history indicted them as "unclean." The offerings of the Samaritans would also be defiled.

Contemporary scholarship, however, does not accept the identification of the Samaritans. It prefers to identify the addressees as the temple-community of Judah because (a) the only group that Haggai addresses throughout the book is the returned exiles; (b) the term "this people" refers to the community (see 1:2a); (c) the terms "this people, this nation" are used in prophetic literature to designate Judah in judgments of reproach (see Jer 6:19, 21; 14:10, 11).

What is the indictment against the temple-community? Commentators do not agree. Six interpretations represent the discussion:

a) The phrase "the works of their hands" refers to the yield from agriculture and animals. No ritual offerings are acceptable, because the altar has not been sanctified. Although it is unclear whether the altar was destroyed in 586 B.C.E. (compare 2 Kgs 25; Ezek 43:13-26), restoration of the temple would include a rededication of the altar. Thus Haggai is exhorting the community to attend to the appropriate cleansing of the altar while the work of restoration continues.

b) A similar interpretation proposes that the temple itself may be identified with "sanctified flesh" (v. 12a). Until the temple is restored, the community remains unclean.

c) A third interpretation suggests that the ritual offerings are a symbol of the community's life. Since the group has failed to live according to God's covenant, the offerings are unclean (compare Isa 57:3-10; 65:3-7). The offerings will be acceptable if the community reforms (see Isa 1:15; compare Isa 33:14ff.; Ezek 18:5ff.).

d) Israel had been chosen to be holy (see Exod 19:6), yet subsequent history indicated that it had become defiled. Only acceptance of God's blessings and repentance will redefine the community's status before God (see 2:19).

e) God's future presence in the temple (2:2-9) will not automatically assure that the community is ritually pure for worship. The temple and its ritual are not a guarantee of holiness. Repentance and integrity of life are necessary to give the ritual its context and meaning. This interpretation is based on an addition of the Greek text: "Because of their early profits, they shall be pained because of their toil, and you have hated those who reprove at the gates" (compare Amos 5:10). The addition is the earliest interpretation of the Hebrew text.

f) There is no indictment. Rather, "the works of their hands" refers to the reconstruction of the temple. It is the effort of the community to prepare for the Lord's coming. When the temple is restored, God's presence will fill the temple with glory and renew the community (see Ezek 36:22-32; 43:1-9).

These various interpretations indicate a tension between God's initiative and human effort. They also present the importance of temple restoration and sacrificial worship as symbols of the condition of the community. Both perspectives link the temple-community with the collective experience of Israel. Both realities will continue in future communities.

Verse 15a provides a connection between the first and second sections of the oracle: "But now, consider from this day forward." The directive appeals to the community to reflect on its situation before the task of rebuilding had begun (vv. 15b-16a). The section repeats the comparison in the first oracle between human efforts and results as well as God's intervention (vv. 16b-17; see 1:5-7, 9-11). One new judgment occurs about the community's response to its stark situation: "you did not return to me" (v. 17b).

Although the section repeats the experience of the community, a new emphasis is apparent. Notice that "consider" occurs three times (vv. 15a, 18 [2 times]). The immediate object of the verb is "this day." It is not a reference to an indefinite day but to a precise day, that is, "the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month" (v. 18a). The significance of the date is specified: "a stone laid upon a stone in the temple of the Lord" (v. 15b) and "the temple of the Lord was founded" (v. 18b).

Some commentators propose that the verses identify the day on which the foundation stone of the temple was laid (compare Ezra 3:10-13; Zech 4:9). A sacred place for worship was restored. The formal ceremony of rededication is not described. Rather, the function of verses 15-19 is to compare the situation of the community before and after the event. Beforehand, the community experienced the judgment of God; afterward, however, God transformed judgment into blessing: "From this day, I will bless!" (v. 19b).

Other commentators suggest that the emphasis on "this day" is not directly related to the laying of the foundation stone. Rather, the oracle proclaimed on "this day" reveals the community's need for repentance. Blessing will follow judgment (see v. 17b) if the community returns to God.

2:20-23 Fifth oracle: Future of Zerubbabel. Verse 20 introduces the oracle with the same date as the previous one, which presented the Lord's judgment and blessing on the temple-community. The addressee is "Zerubbabel, the governor of Judah" (v. 21a). The proclamation contrasts the treatment of the nations—judgment (v. 22)—with that of Zerubbabel and the community—blessing (v. 23).

From 522 to 520 B.C.E. Darius I struggled to achieve stability among the rebelling satrapies of the Persian empire (see p. 574). The situation may have been interpreted as a fortuitous one for Judah to achieve political independence as another dimension of restoration. Zerubbabel as a Davidic descendant would restore the hopes of the returned exiles as well as promote the fulfillment of messianic expectations.

The introduction to God's action repeats the cosmic shaking of the third oracle (v. 21b; compare 2:6b). Verse 22 identifies God's action upon Judah's enemies: "overthrow," "destroy," "go down." The terms are found in the Torah and the Prophets to describe the Sodom and Gomorrah tradition (Gen 19:25, 29; Deut 29:23; Amos 4:11); in oracles against the nations (Isa 13:19; 23:11; Jer 51:20-21); and in the Exodus from Egypt (see Exod 14:23; 15:1, 5). There is no indication in the verse of when God will act on behalf of Judah.

Verse 23 describes God's action toward Zerubbabel "on that day." The verbs and titles identify Zerubbabel with other figures who were particularly chosen by God. The first action and title are presented in verse 23a: "I will take you" indicates a special election (see Exod 6:7; Josh 24:3; 2 Sam 7:8). "My servant" assigns Zerubbabel another responsibility to his position as governor. The role especially identified David (2 Sam 7:5; 1 Kgs 11:32, 36; 1 Chr 17:4; Ps 132:10; Ezek 34:23; 37:24-25), Judah, and Mount Zion (Ps 78:68-70).

"I will set you as a signet ring" is the second promise of God to Zerubbabel (v. 23b; see Sir 49:11). The proclamation is a reversal of the one to Jeconiah (Coniah), Zerubbabel's grandfather, just before the Exile: "As I live, says the Lord, if you, Coniah, son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, are a signet ring on my right hand, I will snatch you from it" (Jer 22:24).

The signet ring contained the king's seal, which was used to stamp important documents with royal approval. The ring is a metaphor to indicate the relationship of the king to God. The king functioned as God's representative. The final phrase of verse 23 appears to confirm the possibility of Zerubbabel's attaining royal status: "for I have chosen you, says the Lord of hosts."

Conclusion

The Book of Haggai has been analyzed according to the perspective of unfulfilled prophecy. Images of restoration were proclaimed during the Exile to revitalize hope (see Ezek 40–48; Isa 40–55). The experiences of the first groups of returnees from Babylon did not correspond to the prophetic oracles. Haggai's contribution about a restored temple and a reconstituted ruler of Davidic ancestry (2:1-9, 20-23) were realized neither in his own lifetime nor in the lifetimes of future communities.

Perhaps the apparent "failure" of Haggai's proclamations accounts for the minimal value given to his book by several commentators. Some commentators, however, assess the value of the book differently. Canonical critics, in particular, present the contribution of Haggai for succeeding generations. It is important to consider his message for contemporaries and for future believers.

Attending to probable expectations of both groups, one can analyze Haggai's understanding of God's revelation:

a) Haggai's directives to the community addressed both dimensions of restoration, that is, a restored temple and a reconstituted Davidic ruler. He urged the people forward in the immediate task of rebuilding the temple. The process, in turn, facilitated their identity with God as a temple-community. He also warned them that their identity consisted in integrity of life as well as prescribed ritual sacrifice to confirm their covenant relationship with God.

b) Haggai reminded the community that their efforts at restoration would contribute to the fulfillment of visions proclaimed during the Exile. The community needed the motivation to connect their labor, which was so slow and hampered, to their past history and future possibilities.

c) Haggai did not propose that there was a simple relationship between the initiative of God and the response of the community; rather, he respected the mystery of the faithful God and the struggling community. Haggai was convinced that God would never abandon the community. He believed in the God who consistently enters into the human condition, filling it clearly, at times, with glory and presence.

ZECHARIAH

Mary Margaret Pazdan, O.P.

INTRODUCTION: FIRST ZECHARIAH

Zech 1:1–8:23

The introduction indicates that two centuries of political and religious history divide First Zechariah (chs. 1–8) and Second Zechariah (chs. 9–14). As a preparation for the study of Zechariah, then, it is helpful to review the information about First and Second Zechariah, especially the sections on historical background, attitudes and perspectives about reconstruction, and literary forms (see pp. 574–577). In addition, a comparison of the material on authorship, dating and composition of the text, and an outline of the texts will provide a clearer context for study of each section of Zechariah.

Authorship

Unlike Haggai, whose name was supplemented only by his function (prophet), Zechariah is identified by function and genealogy. The superscription (1:1) and the introduction to the first vision (1:7) describe him as "the prophet Zechariah, son of Berechiah, son of Iddo." His identity as a prophet may be inferred from his name, which means "Yahweh has remembered." It occurs about thirty times in the Old Testament.

Outside the text that bears his name, Zechariah is identified with Haggai as a "prophet" and as the "son of Iddo" (see Ezra 5:1; 6:14). The phrase "son of Berechiah" (Zech 1:1, 7) is occasionally considered a gloss (see the note in the Jerusalem Bible; compare Matt 23:25). The phrase, however, may indicate Zechariah's father.

Iddo, the grandfather of Zechariah, was one of the priestly exiles returning from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Joshua; see Neh 12:4, 16). Consequently, some commentators emphasize Zechariah's priestly origin. Others identify him as a priest because of his concerns for the restoration of the temple and cult as well as the priesthood.

Dating of the text

First Zechariah, like Haggai, provides specific dates for oracles and visions. The book, which is found in the eleventh position in both canons, between Haggai and Malachi, is a postexilic text. Exact chronology is established for the beginning of Zechariah's ministry in the superscription: October-November 520 B.C.E., during the second year of Darius' reign (1:1). Zechariah's ministry began two months after Haggai proclaimed his first oracle (see Hag 1:1).

The second date suggests that Zechariah's ministry concluded two years later: November-December 518 B.C.E., during the fourth year of Darius' reign (7:1). Comparing the dates attributed to Haggai's ministry shows that Zechariah's ministry was eighteen months longer (see p. 592).

The civic and religious leaders of the temple-community mentioned in Haggai appear also in First Zechariah: Zerubbabel (4:6-10; 6:11-14) and Joshua (3:1-10; 6:11-14). The addressees of Haggai and First Zechariah are identical, that is, the second group of returned exiles from Babylon.

Nothing in chapter 8 or in any editorial revisions indicates a later chronology for Zechariah's ministry. The final form of First Zechariah is not considered apart from the dating process of the entire text (fourteen chapters) and its canonical placement (see p. 616).

Composition of the text

Visions constitute the major literary genre of First Zechariah (1:7–6:15). They are interspersed with oracles, which function as responses. A separate collection of oracles (7:1–8:23) is also apparent. Additional material has expanded the visions and the oracles to constitute the final form of the text. The motive ordinarily given for the redactional activity is a changing political context.

Scholars discuss two questions about redaction: Who is responsible for the additions? What sources were used? The questions are part of the complex considerations of the relationship of Zechariah (chs. 1–14) to apocalyptic literature (see p. 577). The relationship of First Zechariah to Second Zechariah regarding the editorial process of the book and the development of religious ideas is discussed below (see pp. 616, 623).

Rearrangement of the text is suggested for chapters 3 and 4. The Jerusalem Bible changes verses within the chapters: 3:1, 2, 3, 4a, 5, 4b, 6, 7, 9a, 8, 9b, 10; 4:1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6a, 10b, 11, 12, 13, 14, 6b, 7, 8, 9, 10a. The New English Bible rearranges chapter 4 as frames around chapter 3 (4:1-3, 11-14; 3:1-10; 4:4-5, 6-10). Note that the New American Bible rearranges only chapter 4 (4:4-10, 1-3, 11-14). Rearrangement is one solution to the difficult task of interpreting First Zechariah.

The three-part structure of the text is recognized by most commentators: (a) introduction (1:1-6); (b) visions (1:7–6:15); (c) oracles about fasting and future days (7:1–8:23). Nonetheless, there is little consensus about the interpretation of the visions and oracles. It is no wonder that several contemporary commentators concur with Jerome in their judgment of Zechariah as the most obscure book of the Bible.

Outline of the book

There are two places in the text of First Zechariah where the numbering of chapters and verses is different. This commentary, based on the New American Bible, represents the Hebrew text, while other Bibles and commentaries may use the Greek text. The chart compares the versions:

Hebrew Text	Greek Text
2:1-4	1:18-21
2:5-17	2:1-13

In this commentary the numbering of the Greek text is in brackets.

PART ONE:	Introduction to First Zechariah (1:1-6)
1:1	Superscription
1:2-6	Return to the Lord
PART TWO:	"Night" Visions and Responses (1:7–6:15)
1:7-12	First Vision: Equestrians
1:13-17	Responses
2:1-4[1:18-21]	Second Vision: Four Horns and Four Blacksmiths
2:5-9 [2:1-5]	Third Vision: Measuring Line
2:10-17 [2:6-13]	Responses
3:1-5	Fourth Vision: Joshua the High Priest
3:6-10	Responses
4:1-6a, 10b-14	Fifth Vision: Lampstand
4:6b-10a	Responses
5:1-4	Sixth Vision: Flying Scroll
5:5-11	Seventh Vision: Flying Bushel
6:1-8	Eighth Vision: Four Chariots
6:9-15	Responses and a Crown
PART THREE:	Oracles about Fasting and the Future (7:1–8:23)
7:1-3	Question about Fasting
7:4-7	Responses
7:8-14	Another Collection of Responses
8:1-8	Blessings for Jerusalem
8:9-17	Encouragement and Challenge for Jerusalem
8:18-23	Responses about Fasting and the Future

COMMENTARY: FIRST ZECHARIAH

PART ONE: INTRODUCTION TO FIRST ZECHARIAH

Zech 1:1-6

The introduction establishes a continuity between "your fathers" and the returned exiles. What the Judean prophets had proclaimed about God's imminent judgment had occurred in the destruction of Jerusalem. That experience is a mirror for the next generation who returned to rebuild Jerusalem.

1:1 Superscription. The verse is similar to the superscription of Haggai (see Hag 1:1). It identifies the Persian ruler (Darius I), the year and month, and confirms Zechariah's ministry as prophet.

While the superscription of Haggai emphasizes his prophetic credentials, Zechariah's focuses on a genealogy of a priestly family that survived the Exile. Whereas Haggai's oracle is addressed to the leaders of the temple-community and the returnees from Babylon (see Hag 1:1-2), Zechariah's oracle has no specific addressees (see Zech 1:2ff.); from the context it is inferred that it is addressed to members of the temple-community.

1:2-6 Return to the Lord. Verse 2 is an editorial insertion that interrupts the sequence of the prophetic oracle. The verse links the present generation of returned exiles to their relatives: "The Lord was indeed angry with your fathers. . . ." The connection between the two generations is continued by the repetition of "your fathers" (vv. 4, 5, 6; see Ezek 20:27, 30; Jer 7:25-26).

The divine formulas "Thus says the Lord of hosts" (vv. 3, 4) and "says the Lord" (vv. 3, 4) complete the prophetic formula introduced in verse 1. The title "Lord of hosts," which appears three hundred times in the Old Testament, occurs fifty-three times in Zechariah, fourteen times in Haggai, and twenty-four times in Malachi.

The exhortation of the Lord of hosts is "Return to me" (v. 3a). Specific reasons for returning are not indicated (compare 2 Chr 30:6-9; Isa 44:22; Joel 2:12; Mal 3:7). The community, however, is assured that the Lord will return to them (v. 3b).

The exhortation is strengthened by reference to their ancestors' experience (v. 4a). Previous generations had refused to obey the Lord's warning proclaimed through the prophets (v. 4b). By not listening, the "fathers" refused to turn to the Lord (v. 4c).

The term "former prophets" refers to the preexilic prophets (see Jer 35:15). Later, in the Jewish canon, the term indicates a collection of books describing early prophetic activity in Israel (Josh; Judg; 1-2 Sam; 1-2 Kgs).

Verse 5 consists of two rhetorical questions about the existence of "your fathers" and the "prophets." Their mortality is compared with the eternal power of the Lord's "words and decrees" proclaimed by "my servants the prophets" (v. 6a). It is God's words that "overtake your fathers." The verb "overtake" indicates God's action to impart blessing (see Deut 28:2) or curse (Deut 28:15) on a community. Here the context favors "curse," that is, the destruction of Jerusalem.

The second half of verse 6, an editorial addition, refers to the current situation of Zechariah and the community. They have learned from the past that God is faithful to promises. They have accepted the invitation to return, to restore their relationship to God, to reconstruct the temple.

What does the language of the oracle suggest about Zechariah's function in the community? Zechariah may have used traditional prophetic formulas to strengthen his position in prophetic tradition. The authority of the "former prophets" appears to have nearly canonical status: what they proclaimed was fulfilled in the experience of the Exile. In this perspective Zechariah is continuing an old tradition and contributes nothing new to prophecy.

Zechariah's intent may be to appeal to a collective history and to invite the community to be unlike their ancestors, that is, to return to the Lord and rebuild the covenant relationship. The visions indicate dimensions of that choice. Zechariah builds on the past to create new possibilities for the future. The perspectives are not contradictory. The first represents older scholarship (see p. 572), while the second indicates more recent scholarship.

PART TWO: "NIGHT" VISIONS AND RESPONSES

Zech 1:7–6:15

The "night" visions of First Zechariah are regarded as some of the most difficult passages of the Old Testament. Basic questions that contemporary scholars discuss are: What is the specific function of the visions in regard to the ministry and message of Zechariah? What is the relationship of the visions and the accompanying oracles? What is the literary genre of the visions? Does the literary genre determine the religious message?

Visions are common in prophetic literature (see Isa 6; Ezek 1:1; Jer 1:11-19). The visions of First Zechariah, however, are generally identified with a distinctive literary genre called "apocalyptic." One characteristic of the genre is the presence of a secret revelation of God transmitted through a vision. The images of the vision are not taken literally; rather, each image is a symbol that is interpreted for its own value.

Ordinarily an angel assists in the interpretation of the vision. The Hebrew term for "angel" means "messenger." It is used in connection with many persons in the Old Testament. Even the phrase "messenger of the Lord" does not necessarily designate an angelic being. Prophets are identified with this phrase (see Hag 1:13; 2:20).

Other characteristics of apocalyptic literature are well-defined ideas about God, human beings, good, evil, and the world. Since the visions of First Zechariah are "apocalyptic" in form but not in content, scholars do not situate First Zechariah in that category. Some commentators designate the visions as "proto-apocalyptic."

The visions of First Zechariah may be symbolic representations of what is necessary for the restoration for the temple-community. Each vision generally follows a pattern: introductory statement; description; question about interpretation; the angel's explanation.

1:7-12 First vision: Equestrians. The superscription offers additional chronological data (v. 7). The month Shebat is from the Babylonian calendar adopted by the Jewish community after the Exile. The name that appears here does not occur anywhere else in the Old Testament. That detail and "the second year of Darius" place Zechariah's ministry during the Persian period. The visions occurred about three months after the first oracle addressed to Zechariah.

Verse 8a is an awkward transition between the "word" addressed to Zechariah and written in the traditional third-person prophetic formula (v. 7) and the "vision" proclaimed in the first person. Verse 8a states that Zechariah's vision occurred "during the night." No other time-sequence is indicated in the subsequent seven visions. Although it is possible for all of them to occur in one night, most commentators suggest that they are a succession of "experiences."

The first vision (vv. 7b-13) can be compared to focusing a telescope. One adjustment presents a large picture; additional adjustments reveal more details. Verse 8b depicts a tranquil scene. Evergreen shrubs ("myrtle trees") grow alongside streams. An equestrian stands beside his red horse, and behind him are "red, sorrel, and white horses." An exact location is not specified. The place suggests a garden like Eden, outside Jerusalem or near the entrance to heaven.

Zechariah asks the interpreting angel for an explanation (v. 9a). The angel, however, does not offer one but provides another glance at the scene (v. 9b). The central character within the scene identifies the horses: "These are they whom the Lord has sent to patrol the earth" (v. 10). The metaphor could point to the angels of the heavenly council (see Job 1:7; 2:2) as well as to Persian messengers, who provided a thorough communication system in the empire.

A third viewing of the scene follows. The central character ("the driver" in verse 8) becomes the "angel of the Lord" (v. 11a; see the note on "angel" above). Equestrians repeat their function: "We have patrolled the earth" and state their judgment: "see, the whole earth is tranquil and at rest" (v. 11b). Cosmic peace may be a reference to the leadership of Darius, who successfully defeated the rebellious satrapies of the empire.

A fourth glance reveals the climax of the vision. The angel of the Lord petitions the Lord of hosts to relieve the oppression of Jerusalem and Judah (v. 12). The lamentation over the situation of the returned exiles, who "felt your anger these seventy years," is a sharp contrast to the judgment of the equestrians (v. 11). God's intervention is needed if there is to be reconstruction (compare Joel 2:14).

1:13-17 Responses. Responses to the vision function with verse 9 as an inclusion to bracket the visionary scene. Similar to the structure in Joel, a lament (v. 12) is followed by divine assurance (v. 13; see p. 579). Verse 13, however, is a narrative comment rather than an oracle of consolation. It serves as a transition to the oracles.

Three oracles of consolation have been appended to the vision. They respond to the lament (v. 12). Each is introduced by traditional prophetic formulas (vv. 14b, 16a, 17a). The interpreting angel exhorts Zechariah to proclaim the first and third oracles (vv. 14-15, 17).

In the first oracle (vv. 14-15), God responds. "I am deeply moved" (v. 14b) is better translated "I am exceedingly jealous" (RSV). As in Joel 2:18, the passionate zeal of God for Jerusalem and Zion is clear (compare Zech 8:2-3; 9:9). That zeal takes the form of anger against the "complacent nations" (v. 15).

The second oracle proclaims what God's zeal means for the community: "I will turn to Jerusalem in mercy" (v. 16a; compare v. 3b). The temple and the city will be restored through divine initiative (v. 16b; compare the commentary on Hag 1:2-14).

The third oracle describes the care of the Lord of hosts for "my cities" (v. 17a). Goodness, consolation, and election will again be present when God returns to Jerusalem (v. 17b). Two details are absent: the time of God's return and the outcome of the complacent nations (v. 15).

2:1-4 [1:18-21] Second vision: Four horns and four blacksmiths. This succinct vision lacks the details and oracular responses of the first vision. The visionary medium proclaims, "I raised my eyes and looked" (5:1; 6:1) and the first image, "four horns," is seen (v. 1 [1:18]). The interpreting angel is asked for assistance (v. 2a [1:19a]). The horns are identified as those who "scattered Judah and Israel and Jerusalem" (v. 2b [1:19b]).

Verse 3a [1:20a] states that the Lord is the agent who reveals the next image. The prophet asks about the function of the blacksmiths (v. 3b [1:20b]). The Lord responds that they "terrify" and "cast down" the "horns" who "scattered the land of Judah" (v. 4 [1:21]).

In earlier commentaries "horns" was a metaphor for world powers (Mic 4:13). The context would identify them as the enemies of northern Israel and Judah, especially Babylon. In the last decade, however, additional possibilities for interpretation have been suggested: two pairs of animal horns, four horns of the altar, horns in the ground, horn-shaped threshing tools, and horned helmets.

Similarly, "blacksmiths" in earlier commentaries was a metaphor for those who exercise judgment (see Isa 54:16-17), that is, the Persians, who reversed the fortunes of Babylon. In the last decade the term "blacksmiths" has come to identify ploughmen, artisans, constructive or destructive creators.

The thought of earlier commentaries is developed in two ways. Both highlight tasks of reconstruction. One identifies the horns as the horns belonging to animals that have roamed over the ruins of Jerusalem. When the ploughmen guide the animals back to their proper enclosures, there is space to rebuild and reconstitute the community. The other identifies the horns of the altar, which provided sanctuary for those who clung to them. After the Exile, artisans came to rebuild and purify the altar area for sanctuary and cult.

There is no specific oracle that responds to the second vision. Among the three interpretations of the vision, only the earlier one replies to the fate of the "complacent nations," which remained unaddressed in the first vision (1:15).

2:5-9 [2:1-5] Third vision: Measuring line. The third vision is introduced with the same formula as the second vision (v. 5a [v. 1a]). The new image is a man with a measuring line (vv. 5b-6 [1b-2]). This vision develops the image of the measuring device noted in the second oracle of the first vision (see 1:16).

Another new dimension is the introduction of a second angel (v. 7 [v. 3]). This angel exhorts the interpreting angel to give "that young man" (the measurer) a message about how people will live in Jerusalem. They will live "as though in open country." The Revised Standard Version translates this better: "as villages without walls" (v. 8a [v. 4a]). Why "without walls"? "Because of the multitude of men and beasts in her midst" (v. 8b [v. 4b]).

A divine assurance is the climax to the vision. It parallels the oracles in the first vision (see 1:13-17). The Lord promises to be present: "an encircling wall of fire . . . the glory in her midst" (v. 9 [v. 5]).

The third vision is related to the other two visions, functioning as the third adjustment of the telescope. The first focus was cosmic; the second focus was the land of Israel; and the third is the city of Jerusalem. In addition, the third vision specifies how God "will turn to Jerusalem in mercy" (1:16a): God will offer presence and glory (2:9). These gifts suggest "prosperity" (1:17b), that is, all living things will flourish (2:8b).

The third vision is a striking illustration of the use of traditional symbols to proclaim a new reality. The "encircling wall of fire" (v. 9a [v. 5a]), which recalls God's presence as a cloud of fire during the Exodus (see Exod 13:21-22; 14:20; 40:34), is reinterpreted as the protective care of God for Jerusalem. God's initiative in rimming the city offers a perspective to human effort involved in the process of reconstruction.

The rebuilding of the temple in all its complexities is also given a new perspective. The vision of temple restoration that Ezekiel offered to the exiles as hope for the return of God's glory (see Ezek 40–48) is broadened. Zechariah's vision extends God's glory (kabod) to all throughout Jerusalem.

2:10-17 [2:6-13] Responses. The oracles consist of two sections. The first section (vv. 10-13 [vv. 6-9]) comments on the enemies of Israel mentioned in the first collection of oracles (1:15) and the second and third visions (2:1-4 [1:18-21]; compare 2:9 [2:5]). The second section continues promises of blessings for Jerusalem noted in the first collection of oracles (1:14; 16-17) and the second and third visions (2:4b [1:21b], 7-9 [3-5]). In addition to a thematic division, traditional prophetic formulas separate some of the oracles: "says the Lord" (v. 10ab [v. 6ab]; v. 14b [v. 11b]); "said the Lord of hosts" (v. 12a [v. 8a]).

There is no interpreting angel for the oracles (compare 1:13ff.). Rather, the prophet is clearly indicated as the one commissioned by God (see vv. 12a, 15b [vv. 8a, 11b]). The verses suggest that the fulfillment of God's promises will authenticate the prophet's proclamation.

The first section of oracles contains imperatives for the exiles and warnings for those who conquered them. There is a parallel construction for verses 10 and 11. Those who are living in "the land of the north" (v. 10a [v. 6a]; see Jer 3:18; 16:15; 23:8; 31:8) are identical with the ones "who dwell in daughter Babylon" (v. 11b [v. 7b]).

The exiles are exhorted to "flee" and "escape to Zion" before God "scatters" the inhabitants of Babylon "to the four winds of heaven" (vv. 10-11a [vv. 6-7a]). In these verses the identification of Babylon is probably more extensive than the geographical region designated as exilic territory. It includes all oppressors of Israel.

An ironic punishment is pronounced for the nations that plundered Israel (v. 12a [v. 8a]): "they become plunder for their slaves" (v. 13a [v. 9a]). Why such harsh treatment? "Whoever touches you touches the apple of my eye" (v. 12b [v. 8b]). The metaphor indicates "pupil" or "gate" of the eye, that is, a treasured part or relationship.

The second section, like the third vision (see vv. 8-9 [vv. 4-5]), presents new revelation in traditional terms. Let those in Jerusalem rejoice (see Zeph 3:14-15; Zech 9:9; Pss 9:14; 48:11). The Lord is coming to dwell with the temple-community (v. 14 [v. 10]). The Hebrew of the verse indicates the language of manifestation and abiding presence.

The Lord's dwelling is mentioned in the next verse (v. 15 [v. 11]) with unexpected proclamations. "On that day," referring to the day of the Lord (see the commentary on Joel 2:18–4:21 [2:18–3:21]), the "many nations" shall "join themselves to the Lord . . . and they shall be his people." How the nations will be joined or how Israel and the nations shall become a "people" is not indicated. The concept of the Lord's dwelling among the nations and Israel is remarkable, especially when compared with Zechariah's contemporary Haggai. The latter limited the nations' contributions to their treasures for the temple (see the commentary on Hag 2:7-9).

Covenant language ("choose") is used to indicate the Lord's relationship to Judah and Jerusalem (v. 16 [11]). The designation of Judah as "holy land" appears only here. Everything will be holy because of the Lord's dwelling among the people.

The responses conclude with a fragment of liturgical directive: "Silence . . . in the presence of the Lord!" (v. 17a [v. 13a]; compare Hab 2:20; Zeph 1:7).

3:1-5 Fourth vision: Joshua the high priest. Chapter 3 is presented without any rearrangement of the verses (see p. 601). The vision differs from the first three visions in form. There is no introductory statement, question about interpretation, or explanation by the angel. Some commentators suggest that the unusual form indicates a later vision that was added to an original seven visions.

Verse 1 is an introduction to the vision. The "he" probably refers to the interpreting angel who accompanied the prophet during the first three visions (v. 1a; see 1:9, 14; 2:2, 7 [1:19; 2:3]). Three characters appear in the vision of the heavenly council (v. 1b):

a) "Joshua the high priest" appears for the first time (see p. 593).

b) "The angel of the Lord" who appeared in the first three visions convenes and authorizes the proceedings of the heavenly council (see vv. 2, 4-5).

c) "Satan" is a transliteration of the Hebrew word that means "adversary." It is not a personal name in the Hebrew Bible; rather, it designates a role, that is, accuser (see Job 1:6-12; 2:1-7; Ps 109:6; Rev 12:10).

Verse 2 ironically reverses the roles of Satan and Joshua. Whatever accusations the adversary had spoken against Joshua are abrogated by the double rebukes of the "Lord who has chosen Jerusalem" (see 1:17b; 2:16 [2:12]; compare Hag 2:23). Verse 2 concludes with a rhetorical question: "Is not this man a brand snatched from the fire?" (see Amos 4:11). As Joshua represents the entire community in verse 1, here their communal deliverance from exile is suggested (v. 2b).

The position of Joshua before the angel of the Lord (v. 3a) repeats verse 1a. The "filthy garments" that Joshua wears (v. 3b) are associated with the fire imagery of the Exile experience (v. 2b). The garments could symbolize mourning (see Jer 41:4-5) or the guilt associated with living in Babylon.

The authoritative angel of the Lord directs the angels of the council to reclothe Joshua (vv. 4-5). "Festal garments" and a "clean miter" replace the filthy garments. According to some commentators, the ritual dressing indicates garb of the high priest (see Lev 8:1-9). Others propose a figurative context of acceptance in the court (see Isa 62:3; Job 29:14).

The ritual activity symbolizes the judgment of the angel: "See, I have taken away your guilt" (v. 5b). "Guilt" suggests the association of Joshua with the land of Babylon as well as the transgressions of the temple-community, of which he is the religious leader (see Exod 28:36-38; Num 18:1). To function as high priest, the ritual activity was necessary. The temple ritual for purification is not available.

3:6-10 Responses. A challenge and two oracles of assurance interpret the fourth vision. Each is prefaced by a traditional prophetic formula: "says the Lord of hosts" (vv. 7a, 9b, 10a). Each proclamation is directed to Joshua the high priest by the authoritative angel (v. 6).

The challenge is made in verse 7a: "If you walk in my ways and heed my charge . . . ." The first condition refers to moral integrity (see Deut 8:6), while the second is more ambiguous. The Hebrew term suggests a general obligation or prohibition (see Gen 26:5; Lev 18:30), or a duty (Isa 21:8). It also signifies ritual activity (see Num 3). In this context the faithful cultic service of God is apt.

Acceptance of the challenge results in two areas of responsibility (and blessing) in verse 7b. Each one reflects the situation of a preexilic monarch. "Judge my house" indicates judicial functions (see Deut 17:8-13), while "keep my courts" refers to decisions about cultic activity. Both responsibilities are carried out at the temple. The judicial functions there are new for a high priest (compare Ezek 44:10-31). "Access among these standing here" describes Joshua's approach to the members of the heavenly council.

The second oracle is an unconditional blessing for Joshua and his associates (v. 8). The identity of the group is unclear. Some commentators suggest additional priests or persons of prominence in the temple-community (see Ezra 2; Neh 7). In what sense are they a "good omen"? They are considered signs of God's blessing (v. 8b; 6:12-13). The "branch" imagery was a traditional one for a just ruler (see Jer 23:5; Isa 11:1). The appearance of a monarch like David is part of the expectation of restoration of the temple-community. Haggai, Zechariah's contemporary, had proclaimed that possibility for Zerubbabel (see Hag 2:23). Verses 7 and 8 suggest some type of shared rule. The high priest (and other priests) functions in the temple, while a Davidic heir functions on the throne.

Verse 9a continues the second oracle with another image: "one stone with seven facets." Attention returns to Joshua (see v. 7) as the one before whom the stone is placed. The stone might be a person; a real stone for temple reconstruction; a stone for ritual purposes; a stone belonging to the garb of high priest.

Verse 9b provides additional details about the stone, which clarify its identity. It probably is the engraved stone that adorned the high priest's turban (see Exod 28:36-38). Its inscription, "Sacred to the Lord" (Exod 28:36), suggests cleansing from guilt (see Exod 28:38).

Something new is revealed. Aaron (and his successors) "bears whatever guilt the Israelites may incur" (Exod 28:38a). The Lord of hosts removes the "guilt of the land in one day" (v. 9b). This completes the process that the angel of the Lord started by removing Joshua's guilt (v. 5). Now God's initiative cleanses the land.

Verse 10 completes the challenge and oracles of assurance. "On that day" identifies a future possibility wherein the community will be at home and extend hospitality (see 1 Kgs 5:25 [4:25]; Mic 4:4).

4:1-6a, 10b-14 Fifth vision: Lampstand. There is some rearrangement of verses in chapter 4. Note the difference between the New American Bible text and the arrangement of the commentary (see p. 601).

The introductory statement of the fifth vision presents the interpreting angel, who stirs up the prophet (v. 1; compare Joel 4:9 [3:9]). Verse 1 may be a literary device to unify the material between the first vision "at night" (see 1:8) and the present one.

Verse 2a is a departure from the first four visions, where the prophet immediately reports what he sees. This time the interpreting angel asks the question (compare 5:1-4). Zechariah responds with a detailed description of a gold lampstand (vv. 2b-3).

The prophet questions the angel about "these things" (v. 4). The angel responds with another question, implying that the image ought to be clear (v. 5a). After the prophet admits he does not know (v. 5b), the angel explains the scene by first interpreting the lamp (vv. 6a, 10b). The seven "facets" (lights) on the lampstand are "the eyes of the Lord that range over the whole earth."

The prophet inquires again about the "two olive trees at each side of the lampstand" (v. 11). Another question follows: "What are the two olive tufts which freely pour out fresh oil through the two golden channels?" (v. 12). Again, the interpreting angel is surprised that the prophet does not recognize the image (v. 13). When the prophet admits that he does not know (v. 13), the angel explains (v. 14).

How may the major components of the vision be interpreted? A description of the lampstand explains the basic structure of the vision. Within the last century archeological discoveries have classified a number of clay lamps and lampstands conforming to a particular shape. A lampstand is at the base. Resting on the stand is a bowl for oil. On the rim of the bowl are indentations for wicks (usually approximately seven). When the wicks are ignited, they burn because they are draped over the oil.

Although the term for the lampstand is menorah, it does not match the description of the seven-branched candelabrum used in ritual contexts (see Exod 25:33). What is unusual in the description of the lampstand in the vision is not its shape but its composition of gold.

What does the lampstand symbolize? The lampstand and lights represent the presence of God, who looks kindly upon all of creation (see 2 Chr 16:9; compare Ezra 5:5). The lampstand and lights parallel and develop two images of earlier visions: the equestrians who patrol the earth (1:10-11) and the encircling wall of fire (2:9).

The olive trees (vv. 3, 11) and the olive tufts (v. 12) are clearly interpreted by the angel as the "two anointed who stand by the Lord of the whole earth" (v. 14). Who are the "anointed"? They are Zerubbabel and Joshua, equal in dignity and importance. Their proposed rule is unexpected because only a monarch like David was anticipated. Nonetheless, for the temple-community there are two who will govern. After Zerubbabel's death the office of high priest grew in prominence (see p. 574).

Many commentators considered Zerubbabel and Joshua as messiah figures because of the "anointed" terminology. The Hebrew phrase translates "sons of oil." In addition, the oil is of the type used for harvest festivals, not for an anointing ceremony. As high priest, Joshua had already been anointed. The two rulers function, however, in a revolutionary role. Although verse 12 is difficult to translate, the imagery suggests that Zerubbabel and Joshua are close to God, who needs their oil for the agency of compassionate presence ("seven facets") for the community. They, in turn, require God's support for leadership. The interdependency is new.

4:6b-10a Collection of responses. If the verses were not rearranged, they would appear between the description of the lampstand and its interpretation. The verses are a poetic insertion consisting of two oracles. Both are introduced by traditional prophetic formulas: "This is the Lord's message" (v. 6b); "This word of the Lord then came to me" (v. 8; see 6:9; 7:4; 8:1, 18). The oracles describe Zerubbabel's leadership in restoring the temple, as an earlier visionary ritual had described Joshua's preparation for the office of high priest (3:1-10).

The first oracle (vv. 6b-7) describes how the work of temple restoration will be accomplished. Neither an "army" (compare 1 Kgs 5:20) nor "might" (see Neh 4:10) is adequate to the task. Divine activity will complete the work (v. 6b).

Since God's spirit is with Zerubbabel, he is the leader in the temple reconstruction. First, Zerubbabel is compared metaphorically to a mountain of obstacles and emerges as the greater one (v. 7a; see Isa 40:4; 41:15). Second, he will bear the "capstone" amid exclamations of the community.

Commentators debate the identity of the capstone. Is it the foundation stone or the final stone on the pinnacle of the temple? Some see the oracles (vv. 6b-10a) and the visionary ritual of Joshua (3:1-10) in the wider context of Mesopotamian services for rededication of the temple. The capstone signifies continuity. It is a stone taken from the earlier temple and positioned in the new one to assure cultic continuity. The "select stone" (v. 10a) refers to another type of ritual—placing an engraved tin tablet into the edifice of the new temple.

Others propose that the capstone is the final piece of the new temple. It is the "select stone" (v. 10a) placed by the hands of Zerubbabel, the civic governor of the temple-community. The Hebrew terms used to describe the stone allow both interpretations. In general, Zechariah was convinced that Zerubbabel's leadership was necessary for the project (see 6:12-13).

The second oracle (vv. 9-10a) connects the activity of Zerubbabel with the credibility of the prophet. The Lord's proclamation assures Zechariah that Zerubbabel, who began the foundation, will finish it (v. 9a). The completion of the temple will be a sign to the community that Zechariah's proclamations are validated (v. 9b; compare 2:9, 11; 6:15).

Verse 10a describes the general attitude of the temple-community toward the task of reconstruction (compare Hag 2:3-5; Ezra 3:12). Even these scoffers "shall rejoice to see the select stone in the hands of Zerubbabel." The four references to Zerubbabel's hands (4:7 [implicit]; 9 [twice]; 10a) may refer to his royal function in the cultic ceremonies of temple restoration. In ancient Near East traditions the king often assisted in temple reconstruction either actually or symbolically.

5:1-4 Sixth vision: Flying scroll. The spatial quality and movement of the vision parallel the seventh vision: the flying bushel (5:5-11). Both visions are directed to the temple-community. What is necessary to cleanse the community for renewed relationship with God? The theme of renewal, addressed to Joshua with regard to cult (3:1-10) and to Zerubbabel with regard to temple reconstruction (4:6b-10a), has specific implications for the community as well.

Verse 1 is the introductory statement and description of the flying scroll. It repeats the literary form of the second and third visions (see 2:1 [1:18]; 2:5 [2:1]). The short formula will be repeated in the eighth vision (see 6:1).

The question of the interpreting angel (v. 2a) appears redundant, since the prophet had already announced his vision (v. 1). The vision is described with additional detail (v. 2b). While a scroll would be a familiar sight (see Jer 36:1-8) and symbol (see Ezek 2:9-10; 3:1-3), the proportions are unusual. A scroll is much longer than it is wide. In addition, although no one is holding the scroll, it is unrolled and flying in the air!

The dimensions of the scroll match the area of Solomon's temple porch (see 1 Kgs 6:3) and are similar to those of the desert sanctuary, which is half the size (see Exod 26:15-28). However, there is no apparent connection between the flying scroll and either area.

The interpreting angel identifies the scroll as a "curse . . . over the whole earth"; it will sweep away "every thief" and expel "every perjurer" (v. 3). The curse refers to consequences for covenant abrogations that were added to the ceremony by oaths (see Deut 28:15ff.; compare Gen 26:28; Ezek 17:13). The thought in verses 3-4 is a fusion of the covenant stipulations and the Decalogue prescriptions. Specifically, the thief represents the laws regarding human conduct (see Exod 20:15-16), and the perjurer represents attitudes toward God (see Exod 20:7).

Verse 4 is a divine oracle that interprets the vision. It tells of the consequences for thief and perjurer. Their houses and inhabitants will be consumed by the curse that God sends forth (compare Ps 147:15; Isa 55:11).

What is the particular situation in the community that draws attention to thievery and perjury? The perpetrators of these crimes are forbidden to enter the temple (see Ps 24:4). Thievery was a particular problem for the temple-community, especially the usurpation of land tracts by those who remained in Judah during the Babylonian Captivity. Litigation occurred. The charge of perjury is probably related to these occasions.

The curse of the flying scroll may also represent the continuity of judgment and values. Even though the community will be administered by a new model of leadership (Joshua and Zerubbabel), the standards will remain the same as before (compare the commentary on 4:6b-10a). Another factor of continuity is the phrase "the whole earth" (v. 3a). Within both Judah and the Diaspora the same obligations for all Jews will be in force.

5:5-11 Seventh vision: Flying bushel. The vision is inaugurated by a command of the interpreting angel to look up and identify the new symbol (v. 5). The familiar question pattern follows (v. 6a), with the angel's response (v. 6b). The vision reveals another character: "a woman sitting inside the bushel" is "Wickedness," whom the angel thrusts inside, "pushing the leaden cover into the opening" (vv. 7-8).

Next the prophet sees additional characters. Two women with ruffled wings like a stork's lift the bushel into the air (v. 9). The prophet seeks assistance from the angel, who explains the women's action. They are taking the bushel to Shinar, where they will deposit it in the temple when the building is completed (vv. 10-11).

The bushel container and the woman are central to the vision. Their relationship is the key to interpretation. The bushel container functions as the "setting" for both parts of the vision. The term in Hebrew means "container" (see Ruth 2:17) and a "measure" or standardized weight (see Amos 8:5; Ezek 45:10). The prophet's question, "What is it?" refers to content as well as measure.

The question of content is immediately clarified by the angel: "their guilt in all the land" (v. 7b). What is the source of guilt? The woman named Wickedness is the symbol of evil surrounded by guilt (v. 8). Like the genie in the bottle and unlike Pandora and her box, Wickedness and guilt can be controlled by the leaden cover that the angel thrusts into the opening of the container.

Many speculate about why the woman personifies wickedness. Some refer to the feminine gender of the Hebrew word for "wickedness." Others associate it with Israel's sin, which is often described by use of the metaphor of harlotry (see Jer 3:8; Hos 1:2; Ezek 16). A few point to the garden event (Gen 3) as the origin of the personification.

Two figures, half-animal (stork wings) and half-human (women), appear as deae ex machina to remove the bushel basket. Stork wings suggest flying animals (see Jer 8:7) and unclean animals (see Lev 11:9; Deut 14:18). Soaring in the wind, they carry the container to Shinar, an ancient name for the land of Babylon (see Gen 10:10; 11:2; Dan 1:2; Rev 14:8). There Wickedness and guilt will have a temple in which to reside.

The image of removing evil and guilt is parallel to the image of Joshua's "filthy garments" (3:3). God initiates the removal of extensive evil ("in all the land") of the community and the impurity of the high priest through agents—two women and the angel (3:5). God is not contaminated by impurity or evil.

The bushel container and the woman are considered non-standards for the temple-community that has returned to restore relationship with God. Covenant obligations (5:1-4) and the removal of evil and guilt are dimensions of reconstruction.

6:1-8 Eighth vision: Four chariots. The final vision forms an inclusion with the first vision (1:7-12). The first verse (1:7) and the last verse (8:8) indicate visionary experience. Details of place (glen, mountain pass) and time (night, sunrise) are different. Important images, however, parallel one another: horses, colors, patrolling functions.

Verse 1 is a short introductory statement with an initial description of the vision; details appear in verses 2-3. Four chariots emerge between two "bronze mountains" (v. 1). Each chariot is numbered and described by a colored horse (red, black, white, spotted) that pulls it. All the horses are "strong" (vv. 2-3).

The question of the prophet (v. 4) is readily answered by the interpreting angel (v. 5). The chariots turn in different directions (v. 6). While anticipating their patrolling function, the "strong horses" are commanded directly by God (vv. 6b-7a). While they are patrolling the earth, God issues a second command to the prophet (v. 8).

The final vision reveals personified "winds" patrolling the earth for the Lord, whose abode is protected by two bronze mountains. The chariots are primary, while the number and color of the horses are secondary details (vv. 2-3). They may resemble military forces (see 2 Kgs 23:11; Ps 104:4) that are eager to facilitate conditions so that the Lord's spirit may "rest in the land of the north" (v. 8b).

The first and eighth visions function as opening and closing scenes of the night visions. In the first vision toward nightfall, the report of the equestrians patrolling the earth indicates that "the whole earth is tranquil and at rest" (1:11). Nonetheless, there is a plea for mercy on behalf of the temple-community, which does not experience that "rest" (1:12). The Lord is moved to compassion for the community but is "exceedingly angry with the complacent nations" (1:16).

The intervening visions present the plight of the community, especially the importance of dual leadership, temple restoration, and purgation. In contrast, the situation of the oppressors of Israel is included briefly (see 2:1-4, 12-13). The phrase "the whole earth" and movement patterns characterize the process of the visions.

In the eighth vision there is tranquility because God's spirit is at rest "in the land of the north." The downfall of the oppressors as well as the return of the exiles to Jerusalem signals a new reality. Exact chronology is not a concern in any of the visionary narratives or oracular responses.

6:9-15 Responses and a crown. The structure of the final section of the eighth vision consists of two oracles. The first oracle (vv. 9-11, 14-15) frames the second oracle (vv. 12-13). The first oracle is a private proclamation to the prophet: "This word of the Lord came to me" (v. 9), while the second oracle is a public proclamation: "And say to him: 'Thus says the Lord of hosts' " (v. 12a). Both oracles respond to the visions whose reality will occur when the temple is completed. The oracles in their final, edited form, however, focus on an indefinite future.

After the oracular introduction (v. 9) the prophet is commanded by God to take something from the "returned captives Heldai, Tobijah, Jedaiah" (v. 10a). What the returnees possess becomes clear in verse 11: "silver and gold." The names are not found in Jewish tradition. Their orthodox position in returning to Jerusalem is indicated by their theophoric names, that is, the consonants for Yahweh appear in their names. They also represent others in the Diaspora who contribute materials for temple restoration.

The returnees are commanded to go immediately to the "house of Josiah, son of Zephaniah (these had come from Babylon)" (v. 10b). There may be continuity between the two groups of returned exiles if Josiah had been taken into exile. On the other hand, if he had remained in Judah, there would be continuity in the two groups who now lived on the land restoring the temple.

The silver and gold brought back from exile will be fashioned into a "crown" (v. 11a). Other ancient texts read "crowns." Arguments based on subsequent verses are persuasive for both the singular and plural forms of the noun. The discussion about "crown" is the beginning of many difficult textual decisions in the section.

Who will wear the crown? The New American Bible states: "place it on the head of [Joshua, son of Jehozadak, the high priest] Zerubbabel" (v. 11b). The Revised Standard Version and the New English Bible, however, delete the reference to Zerubbabel and the brackets around the Joshua description. Again, there are persuasive arguments for either Joshua or Zerubbabel and the crown.

Those favoring Joshua note that the fate of Zerubbabel is unclear in the tradition. The final editor probably inserted Joshua's name to clarify what happened historically, that is, the high priest became the source of authority for the temple-community (see p. 574).

Commentators who propose Zerubbabel's name refer to his function as the temple-builder (see 4:9; compare 4:12). He would be the logical one to be crowned in a royal ceremony, since the installation as high priest would be a separate ceremony. Others argue that the coronation had to be symbolic due to the position of the temple-community of Judah within the Persian empire.

One scholar noted that Zerubbabel's role was diminished in the lampstand vision by its position in the middle of the vision. Now, Joshua's role is similarly diminished by its position in the middle of the final oracles.

Finally, since a two-person rule had been a possibility suggested before in visionary material (see 4:1-5, 10b-14), two crowns may be apt for Zerubbabel and Joshua.

A public oracle of the Lord follows the description of the crown (vv. 12-13). Its focus is temple reconstruction (see 4:6-10a), in particular an individual who has an important role in the project. The person is identified as "Shoot," a name used to describe a future Davidic figure (see the commentary on 3:8). Zerubbabel is the logical referent drawn from 3:8 as well as from the additional detail at the end of the verse: "he shall build the temple" (v. 12b).

The choice of Zerubbabel is strengthened by the details of verse 13. The first part repeats the function of temple-builder and adds the royal function of ruling from the throne (v. 13a). The priest mentioned in the second part of the verse is probably Joshua. Both reign from the throne area, yet Joshua appears to claim more status. "Friendly understanding" describes their new model of leadership for the temple-community (v. 13b).

The next two verses are the conclusion of the first oracle (vv. 9-11, 14-15). The symbolic function of the crown (see the commentary on v. 11b) is described (v. 14). While memorial offerings on behalf of the community were known (see Exod 30:16), the crown will immortalize several individuals.

A comparison of the names in verses 14 and 10 indicates that two of the four names are different: Heldai and Helem (Hebrew text); Josiah and Hen (Hebrew text). In addition, the function of Joshua changes from one whose house served as a meeting place (v. 10b) to one who will be immortalized with the other three (v. 14b). Some commentators suggest that Helem and Hen are nicknames for Heldai and Josiah.

Verse 15 reiterates themes mentioned in the visions and response oracles. First, there is an acknowledgment of assistance for temple reconstruction from those "who are from afar." Not only will they send materials (see v. 11), but they will actively engage in the process (v. 15a).

Second, the cooperation in rebuilding will be another sign of the prophet's authentication from God (v. 15b). The other signs described a new relationship between the temple-community and God (see the commentary on 2:13 [2:9]) as well as leadership for the temple reconstruction (see the commentary on 4:9b).

Third, the last part of the verse, which is incomplete, presents a challenge that was neglected by ancestors before the Exile. It suggests that obedience to the Lord is adhering to the visions and oracles of Zechariah. The challenge offers the community a new beginning and an opportunity for returning to God as God desires to return to the community. The final words of First Zechariah, then, form an inclusion with the first divine oracle (see 1:3ff.).

PART THREE: ORACLES ABOUT FASTING AND THE FUTURE

Zech 7:1–8:23

Part Three consists of the final two chapters of First Zechariah. It is a collection of oracles arranged from various contexts to form a coherent message. The sections present hortatory material that could be developed in greater detail for preaching occasions. The tone of the oracles is an interweaving of encouragement and warning, with constant reference to past experience as a model for present and future activity. The basic structure of chapter 7 is a question-and-answer format, while chapter 8 is a series of ten proclamations. It is impossible to separate the prophet's oracles from the elaboration of the editor.

7:1-3 Question about fasting. The superscription combines a traditional prophetic formula and a precise chronology (v. 1). It is one year after the visions and two years after the beginning of temple restoration, that is, November-December 518 B.C.E. The chronology also indicates the ninth month of the year (Chislev). The notation of month occurs in one other superscription (1:7). The mention of Darius as king occurs here and in Hag 1:1.

Verse 2 introduces individuals who are new to the temple at Jerusalem. Scholarly discussion suggests that Bethelsarezer was a Jewish official in Babylon who acted on behalf of his community. He sent Regemmelech and his retinue to Jerusalem with a request. The phrase "implore the favor of the Lord" describes a situation needing immediate attention (see Exod 32:11). Note that the phrase is structurally parallel to "ask the priests of the house of the Lord of hosts, and the prophets" (v. 3a).

The "priests of the house of the Lord" and the "prophets" (v. 3a) describe those who functioned with authority in the temple-community after the Exile (compare Mic 3:11). Since the verse implies that temple restoration had been completed, it may be an editorial remark. Nonetheless, the cooperation of both groups is needed to address the community's plight both in Babylon and Jerusalem. Their response would probably affect Jews throughout the Diaspora as well. Ironically, the text indicates only the response of the prophet.

The question before the authorities concerns ritual activities of mourning and abstaining (v. 3b). The temple had been destroyed in the fifth month (2 Kgs 25:8-9). Consequently, rituals were observed to commemorate that event. Ought any community observe them now that reconstruction on the temple was in progress? According to several commentators, a deeper question is implied. Has the promise of the prophets been fulfilled? Are we living in a new age following upon the restoration of the temple? If so, mourning is transformed by rejoicing.

7:4-7 Responses. The replies are two oracles consisting of rhetorical questions from God and one from Zechariah. The divine-oracle formula is found in verse 4, and verse 5a states that "all the people of the land" (compare Hag 2:4), including the priests, will be the addressees of the proclamation. In verse 5b another time for ritual mourning commemorates the assassination of Gedaliah, the Jewish governor of Jerusalem, who had been appointed by Babylon (2 Kgs 25:22-26; see p. 573).

The first question focuses on intentions for fasting and mourning (v. 5b). The second question follows immediately. Wasn't the opposite situation of eating and drinking also "for yourselves"? (v. 6). Self-centeredness is the attitude challenged in both situations (compare Hag 1:4-8, 10; Isa 58:3-7, 13).

Zechariah's rhetorical question is a comment on the Lord's question (v. 7). He draws attention to the tradition of the community before the Exile. The "former prophets" had spoken God's word when Judah was populated and at peace (v. 7b). Their collective proclamation vindicates his message, too. Zechariah had spoken about a meager population in Judah after the Exile (see 2:10 [2:8]; compare 2:8 [2:4]). He may be suggesting that fasting before and after the Exile is problematic; its focus is on the individual, not God.

7:8-14 Another collection of responses. These verses can be divided according to topic. Verses 8-10 interrupt the response about fasting (vv. 4-7). They present a summary of ethical teaching promulgated by the prophets before the Exile. Verses 11-14 return to the response about fasting.

Verses 8-9a introduce a divine oracle with a traditional prophetic formula. The oracle (vv. 9b-10) states the genuine nature of fasting proclaimed in earlier tradition. The first part is a general maxim for social conduct: be honest in judgment; be compassionate toward one another (v. 9b; see Jer 7:5). The maxim is reinforced by specific prohibitions (v. 10; see Jer 7:6; compare 1:4b).

Verses 11-14 provide a picture of the community before the Exile (compare 1:3b-6) as a model for reflection. The admonitory style is similar to the Chronicler's (see 2 Chr 30:6-9; Neh 9:25-31). The instruction issues warnings and provides hope. The section reinforces Zechariah's and the editor's claim to authority.

Earlier communities had refused to listen to the Lord's imperative about true fasting (v. 11a). Metaphors of body language dramatize their stubbornness (vv. 11b-12a). What were they resisting? "The teaching and the message that the Lord of hosts had sent by his spirit through the former prophets" (v. 12b). No one but the prophets was entrusted with God's teaching and message (compare 1:4). A closer relationship between God and the prophets is indicated by the phrase "his spirit." Since the prophets shared in God's spirit, to reject them is virtually to reject God.

God's response to the community's stubbornness was reciprocal: "he would not listen when they called" (v. 13). The concluding verse extends the consequences of the preexilic community through the Exile and the restoration attempts of the current community. God acted by scattering the community "among all the nations that they did not know" (v. 14a). The land, too, suffered: it became desolate (v. 14b).

8:1-8 Blessings for Jerusalem. Two prophetic formulas introduce the first oracle (vv. 2-3). The omission of "to me" indicates that Zechariah is repeating what he had heard before (v. 1). God's "intense jealousy" of, and "wrath" toward, Zion indicates passion and concern for the returned exiles (v. 2). The proclamation functioned initially as a response to the first vision (see 1:14). Verse 2 also initiates promises of blessings (8:2-23) following the oracles of warnings (7:4-17).

Verse 3 states how God will respond to the community. Again the language parallels the response after the first vision (see 1:16). In both sections God "will return to Zion . . . and . . . will dwell within Jerusalem" (v. 3a). God's dwelling recalls how the people and God lived in tents (see Exod 25:8; 29:46). However, there is a new revelation here. God's presence initiates a new name for Jerusalem: "faithful" and "holy mountain" (v. 3b; see Joel 4:17 [3:17]; compare Isa 1:21-26; Ezek 48:35).

The second oracle (vv. 4-5) is introduced with a traditional formula (v. 4a). It specifies two groups of persons who will revel in the Lord's presence. "Old men and old women" (v. 4b) and "boys and girls" (v. 5) will fill the streets of the city and enjoy their activities without fear (see Amos 5:16; Lam 2:11-12; Isa 65:20; Ps 127:3-4; Jer 30:18-21). The two groups are described in harmony and sexual equality. They represent those who would have found the journey back from exile quite difficult. The groups also reverse the anxiety about the present depopulation of the temple-community (see 7:14; compare 7:7).

The third oracle (v. 6) is introduced as the first two oracles were (v. 6a). It presents God's rhetorical question about the expectations of the community toward divine activity (v. 6b). Does the reversal of present circumstances, that is, depopulated city, "remnant" group (see Hag 1:12), appear impossible? (Compare Gen 28:14; Jer 32:17, 27.)

God reassures the community in the fourth oracle (vv. 7-8). After the introduction (v. 7a), God promises to repopulate the city by delivering the exiles from captivity (v. 7b). The "land of the rising sun . . . of the setting sun" refers to Babylon and Egypt (compare 2:10 [2:6]; Jer 31:8). The exiles will share God's dwelling in Jerusalem (v. 8).

"They shall be my people, and I will be their God" indicates that the covenant contracted by their ancestors remains a reality for those returning (v. 8b; see Lev 26:12; Jer 31:33). The phrase "with faithfulness and justice" suggests God's response to the covenant as well as the challenge of mutuality for the community in maintaining the covenant.

8:9-17 Encouragement and challenge for Jerusalem. The section is comprised of two parts (vv. 9-13 and 14-17). Each begins with a traditional prophetic formula as an introduction (vv. 9a, 14a). Each presents past tragedy and develops future possibilities of blessing. Both refer to earlier ethical teaching as well as to earlier verses in First Zechariah.

After the introduction (v. 9a), the first exhortation is "let your hands be strong." The addressees are those who had heard Haggai speak about the necessity of temple restoration, especially the "foundation of the house of the Lord." The term "prophets" suggests that the addressees of that prophet had also heard Zechariah, who was Haggai's contemporary (v. 9b; see Hag 1:6-11; 2:15-19).

Verse 10 describes the situation before temple restoration began in earnest. At that time there was no economic security (v. 10a). In addition, hostile forces precluded security. God initiated the circumstances by setting each person against the neighbor (v. 10b).

Verse 11 introduces a new oracle. God's judgment is reversed. God will act differently: "But now I will not deal with the remnant of this people as in former days . . . ." The expression is similar to covenant language. How will the present situation be different for the temple-community? It is described as "the seedtime of peace," that is, vine and land will be productive; the heavens will water the earth (v. 12a; compare Hag 1:10-11).

Another contrast concludes the first part. As Israel and Judah were "a curse among the nations," now they will be a "blessing" through God's saving intervention (v. 13a; see v. 7b). The oracle concludes with two exhortations: "do not fear, but let your hands be strong" (v. 12b; compare Deut 28:1-28). The second exhortation forms an inclusion with verse 9b, formally closing the oracle.

The second part begins with an introduction to another oracle (v. 14a). The construction "as . . . so" provides the structure for comparing past history and present experience (vv. 14b-15; see 1:6; 7:13). It also repeats previous oracles. As God had decided to harm the community because of its ancestral history and "did not relent" (v. 14b; see 1:6b; compare Jer 4:28; 51:12; Lam 2:17), so God decided "in these days . . . to favor Jerusalem and the house of Judah" (v. 15).

The oracle concludes with a short summary of ethical teaching about truth and honesty in judgments (compare 7:9); exhortations against evil plans for others (compare 7:10b) and against false oaths (compare 5:3-4). God detests these activities (vv. 16-17).

8:18-23 Responses about fasting and the future. Two oracles conclude First Zechariah. The first one (vv. 18-19) responds to the delegation's question about fasting (7:2-3), while the second is a description of the role of Jerusalem for the temple-community and the nations.

A prophetic formula introduces the first oracle (v. 18). The phrase "to me" is added to indicate that the response to the delegation is mediated through Zechariah and not the priests (see 7:3). The decision begins with a listing of traditional times of fasting: "the fourth, the fifth, the seventh and the tenth months" (v. 19a).

Compared with the other notations (see 7:3b, 5b), this listing has two additional months. The significance for these days of the months is identical with the other months' commemoration: the tragic events leading to the destruction of Jerusalem. The fourth month commemorates the Babylonian attack on the walls (see 2 Kgs 25:3-7; Jer 39:2), while the tenth month marks the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem (see 1 Kgs 25:1-2; Jer 39:1).

Verse 19b dramatically reverses the commemorative status of the collective days of the four months. The days previously given to mourning and fasting are designated as "occasions of joy and gladness, cheerful festivals for the house of Judah" (v. 19b). The expressions in Hebrew identify times of celebratory banquets (see Esth 8:16-17); happiness at social festivities (1 Sam 18:6; 1 Kgs 1:40; Isa 9:2); and happy assemblies for cultic activity (Isa 33:20).

The addition "only love faithfulness and peace" (v. 19c; RSV: "truth and peace") stipulates qualities of living. "Truth," in particular, attends to how community members are challenged to interact with one another and how they regard one another (see vv. 16-17). Can the community be commanded to love truth and peace? The oracle states a promise for a better future if the community responds according to this norm (compare Deut 6:4-5; Amos 5:4; 6).

A prophetic formula introduces the second oracle (v. 20a). "Peoples, the inhabitants of many cities" (v. 20b), will approach Jerusalem (compare 2:11; Isa 2:2-4; 66:18-21; Mic 4:1-3). There will be a mutual interaction among them as they invite one another to approach (v. 21a). The same motivations of the delegation to approach Jerusalem (see 7:2-3) characterize the city-dwellers: "Come! let us go to implore the favor of the Lord . . . I, too, will go to seek the Lord" (v. 21b).

Verse 22 reiterates verse 21b by forming a chiastic structure, a literary device resembling an X. The first clause of verse 21b parallels the last clause of verse 22, forming the left stroke of the X. Likewise, the second clause of verse 21b parallels the first clause of verse 22, forming the right stroke of the X.

Verse 23 continues the notion of the repopulated city drawn from persons of the Diaspora and the nations. "Ten men of every nationality" refers to a number of completeness and the number needed to constitute a prayer grouping (v. 23a). What is even more remarkable is how these persons of different nationalities and tongues "shall take hold of every Jew by the edge of his garment and say, 'Let us go with you, for we have heard that God is with you' " (v. 23b).

The term "Jew" appears only in verse 23 and Jer 34:9. Some suggest that the role of invitation to approach Jerusalem gives the Diaspora Jews a significant role. Others find the expression a missionary statement. The proclamation "we have heard that God is with you" is the fulfillment of God's promise to the temple-community: "Return to me . . . and I will return to you" (1:3). The role of the community is twofold: to live with integrity and hasten the return of the Lord to Jerusalem; and to invite others to share in the Lord's blessings by approaching and residing in the city where God dwells.

Conclusion

First Zechariah, like Haggai, has been assessed according to the criterion of unfulfilled prophecy. The perspective is deceptive. It limits any contribution of the prophet to his contemporaries and subsequent communities of believers. When one evaluates the text according to literary form, redaction, and closely aligned religious insights, however, the prophet stands as an exemplary source of how to construct and discover meaning in the process of restoration.

Zechariah, like Haggai, had a few common goals. This is to be expected, since they functioned separately but as contemporaries.

a) Both encouraged efforts at temple reconstruction. Bleak conditions challenged their vision of the future importance of the temple. Its completion would symbolize the restoration of the community's relationship with God. God's presence would provide a new community identity.

b) The prophets proclaimed a necessary ethical component for the restoration of relationship with God and the continuance of this relationship. Yet neither prophet proposed a simple cause-effect relationship between human effort and God's response. They lived in the mystery of the faithful God who continued to reveal mercy within the community through "glory (kabod)" and "spirit (ruach)."

c) Leadership in the community was shared. Zerubbabel was a clear candidate for leadership, since he symbolized the restoration of a Davidic figure and stability to the returned exiles.

First Zechariah also contributes individual insights through the complex "night" visions and interpretive oracles:

a) The visions witness to his broad experience of God, whose presence is not limited to Jerusalem. Interesting characters, angels, and an interpreting assistant interact with him to provide a rich understanding of how and why God continues to be with the temple-community. The oracles added by a final editor bridge the distance between the experience of Zechariah and the interpretation necessary for later communities to understand that experience.

b) The visions are characterized by an indefinite geography, fluidity of movement, and solitary or frequent occurrence through "all the earth." No longer is Israel isolated in its efforts at restoration. The cosmos participates and supports the struggle. This dimension adds mystery and awe to the situation of "in betweenness," that is, a time between promises of a new community proclaimed during the Exile (see Isa 40–55; Ezek 40–48) and fulfillment for the recently returned exiles.

c) The visions are directed to "theological" concerns, that is, God's presence, restored ritual, and purity. God, however, is no longer localized in the temple but is described as "glory" and "a wall of fire" for the community. Restored ritual is dependent upon the purity of the high priest and the integrity of the community.

There is also a close correspondence between these concerns and other factors, including leadership, punishment of evil community members, and the future population of Jerusalem. Leadership is to be equally shared by civic and religious authorities, who assist God in the directives for the new community. "Curses" mete out punishment to those who are irresponsible toward one another. Possibilities of urban dwellers to populate Jerusalem are dependent on the cooperation of the Diaspora Jews.

INTRODUCTION: SECOND ZECHARIAH

Zech 9:1–14:21

The reader is invited to follow the suggestions outlined in the introduction to the Book of Zechariah (see p. 600). Reviewing sections of the introduction and preliminary considerations for First and Second Zechariah will provide a clearer context for the commentary on Second Zechariah.

Authorship

There is no indication of authorship. Although the earliest manuscript of the Minor Prophets from Qumran shows no break between Zech 1–8 and 9–14, modern scholarship does not agree that both parts originated from one author. The history of scholarship from the early 1700's, which includes the linguistic analysis of the past decade, offers the same conclusions.

Three arguments against the unity of authorship are presented:

a) The content of First Zechariah, which is concerned with temple reconstruction, historical figures, and dated oracles, contrasts with the material of Second Zechariah, which addresses God's judgments and "eschatological" promises (promises about God's future action). The historical context is obscure.

b) The style is considerably different. First Zechariah is a compilation of "night" visions and interpretive oracles written in prose, while Second Zechariah is a series of oracles derived from reference to earlier prophets and written in poetry. First-person references of the prophet are absent.

c) The vocabulary is different in introducing oracles. First Zechariah uses traditional prophetic formulas, whereas Second Zechariah uses the phrase "An oracle: The word of the Lord" to introduce the two major sections (9:1; 12:1). The vocabulary of Second Zechariah, like the style, is dependent on earlier prophets.

Dating of the text

There are no verses that contain any specific dates. Possibilities for identifying a historical context are dependent upon internal clues:

a) The use of preexilic and exilic prophecy (Isaiah, Hosea, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Joel), as well as themes characteristic of Joel, for example "day of the Lord," indicates a postexilic context.

b) Some allusions to events that occur after 333 B.C.E. appear especially in chapter 9 (see the commentary on ch. 9).

c) Apocalyptic style and content, especially in chapter 14, suggest a period later than the early postexilic that characterizes First Zechariah.

The consensus among scholars is to date the text after the conquest of Alexander the Great (333 B.C.E.) and within two decades following his formation of the new empire. The final date for the editorial process of First and Second Zechariah is before 200 B.C.E. There is no agreement, however, about the number of editors, the extent of redaction, and the length of time required for the canonical shaping of Zechariah.

Composition of the text

How the oracles were ordered and edited is unknown. Scholars propose that two units of material, each three chapters long, were arranged with common superscriptions: "An oracle: the word of the Lord" (9:1; 12:1). The same superscription appears in Mal 1:1. The two units of Second Zechariah were appended to First Zechariah because of a perceived relationship. The fourteen chapters became the eleventh Minor Prophet. The one unit of Malachi was added to the other prophetic scrolls, thus constituting the Twelve Minor Prophets (see p. 572).

There are several problem verses in Second Zechariah due to the poetic language. Less rearrangement of Second Zechariah is suggested than for First Zechariah. The New English Bible is the only translation that suggests the following order: 9:1–11:17; 13:7-9; 12:1-14; 13:1-6; 14:1-21.

Outline of the text

PART ONE:	First Oracle: Judgments of God (9:1–11:17)
9:1a	Superscription
9:1b-8	Invasion by the Lord
9:9-10	Coming of the King
9:11–10:1	Victory for the Community

10:2–11:3	Shepherd Oracles
11:4-17	Shepherd Allegory
PART TWO:	Second Oracle: Restoration (12:1–14:21)
12:1	Superscription
12:2-9	Jerusalem and Judah
12:10–13:1	Mourning in Jerusalem
13:2-6	Purification in Jerusalem
13:7-9	Sword and Fire
14:1	Superscription
14:2-5	War and Victory
14:6-11	Transformation of Land
14:12-15	Plague and Tumult
14:16-21	Celebration in Jerusalem

COMMENTARY: SECOND ZECHARIAH

PART ONE: JUDGMENTS OF GOD

Zech 9:1–11:17

Part One is an interweaving of God's judgments: destruction and restoration. All judgments are future-oriented. Unlike the future proposed by First Zechariah, however, this future appears closer and virtually imminent. There is one theme that indicates development among the edited oracles. It is the contrast between the leadership that genuine and false shepherds exercise over the community.

9:1a Superscription. The wording of the superscription, "An oracle: The word of the Lord," has already been noted (see p. 616). The translation is common to most versions. The Hebrew, however, specifies the first word as "burden."

As an introduction to the first and second oracles (9:1–11:17; 11:1–14:21), the superscription suggests that a particular responsibility has been given to the prophet on behalf of God's people. Since the first oracle is equally concerned with God's judgments of destruction and restoration, the unknown prophet might well hesitate to proclaim God's message. Yet God's word must be announced as it was received.

The rest of the superscription directs the Lord's word to "the land of Hadrach, and Damascus is its resting place" (9:1a). Although Hadrach does not occur in the Old Testament, archeological data locates it in Syria north of Hamath (v. 2). Damascus, the capital, is located in central Syria. What is the relationship of God's word to this country? The translation "against the land" suggests God's negative judgment toward Syria, especially Damascus, a traditional enemy (see Amos 1:2).

9:1b-8 Invasion by the Lord. Verse 1b describes additional "cities of Aram" and "all the tribes of Israel" as belonging to the Lord. Verse 1 proclaims God's judgment against northern cities that belong to God just as Israel does. Verses 2 and 3 enumerate additional cities under God's judgment: Hamath (in Syria), Tyre and Sidon (south along the seacoast). Some commentators identify the cities (vv. 1-7) as those conquered by Alexander as he destroyed the Persian empire and promised a new age. Alexander may have raised hopes for the messianic age as he conquered Israel's enemies.

The wisdom and riches connected with Tyre and Sidon (vv. 2b-3) will be useless against the Lord's attack and destruction "by fire" (v. 4). Other southern cities, such as Ashkelon, Gaza, Ekron, will witness the consequences and respond with fear, anguish, and despair. The king will flee, as will the inhabitants, and the "baseborn will occupy Ashdod" (vv. 4b-6a; see Neh 13:24).

A grammatical change to first person singular (v. 6a) heightens the role of the Lord in the invasion. God will intervene to destroy the pride of the Philistines and their abominable sacrifices. Nonetheless, even the Philistines will become part of God's "remnant" and will be "like a family in Judah" (v. 7). The final note promises the Lord's protection for all who will live in Jerusalem, "my house." The designation of the trespassers and the promise of the Lord's watching parallel two passages of First Zechariah (see 7:14 and 4:10b).

9:9-10 Coming of the king. The transformation of God's judgment of destruction to restoration noted in the previous section may be the context for the description of the future king (vv. 9-10). Exhortations to rejoice and shout for joy are addressed to the community named "daughter Zion . . . daughter Jerusalem" (v. 9a; compare Zech 2:10).

The king will be "a just savior . . . meek, and riding . . . on a colt" (v. 9b; compare Matt 21:5; John 12:15). Most commentators identify the figure as a messianic king who is "just," one actively involved in all aspects of vindication. He is "meek" in his corresponding role as "servant" (compare Isa 49:4; 50:8; 53:12). Riding on a colt was a custom of officials (see Gen 49:10-11; Judg 5:10; 1 Kgs 1:33).

Again a grammatical change to first person singular (see v. 6a) emphasizes the Lord's role. All implements of war will be banished: chariot, horse, warrior's bow (v. 10a). Reconciliation of the northern (Ephraim) and southern (Jerusalem) kingdoms issues forth in "peace to the nations" and worldwide "dominion" (v. 10b; compare Ps 78:7-8).

9:11–10:1 Victory for the community. The section consists of three oracles joined by word associations. The images of return, "theophany," that is, God's manifestation, and restoration of the community and land are highlighted. Earlier history and references to ideas in Second Isaiah are bases for the development of the section.

The grammatical change to first person indicates a new oracle (vv. 11-13). Israel is addressed directly: "As for you, for the blood of your covenant with me . . ." (v. 11a; see Exod 24:8; compare Mark 14:24). The relationship prompts the Lord to initiate a rescue of prisoners from the dungeon of exile (vv. 11-12a; compare Isa 42:7; 61:1b). The exile experience will be reversed: "This very day I will return you double" (v. 12b; compare Isa 40:2; 61:7).

Those who captured Israel will be judged by the captives. Verse 13, which concludes the section, describes how Judah and Ephraim (the totality of Israel) will be as a bow and arrow (RSV) for God's judgment against their enemies (compare Ps 7:13-14). They will be as a "warrior's sword" against "your sons, O Yavan." Although Yavan occurs in the Old Testament to indicate the Greeks (see Gen 10:2, 4; Isa 66:19; Joel 4:4 [3:3]), it probably was added here during the Maccabean era (ca. 167 B.C.E.) to point to current oppressors of Israel.

The role of the Lord as a victorious warrior (vv. 14-15) is the second oracle of the section. It draws on the concept of the holy war (see the commentary on Joel 2:1-11; compare Pss 18:7-15; 77:16-20). The images of lightning, trumpet, and storm correspond to God's theophany on Mount Sinai (v. 14; compare Exod 24:9-10, 15, 18). God protects the covenanted community as they engage in the battle, overcoming and trampling their enemies (v. 15a; see 2 Sam 22:8-18). The victory is described as a sacrificial ritual (v. 15b; Exod 24:6-8; compare Lev 16:14-15; 17:11).

The victory for the community is described in the third oracle (9:16–10:1). God will save the people, who are "like a flock" and "jewels in a crown raised aloft over his land" (v. 16; compare Zech 6:14). Abundance of grain, new wine, rain, and grassy fields indicates a restored community and land (9:17–10:1; see Joel 2:19, 22-24; compare Hag 1:10-11; 2:19).

10:2–11:3 Shepherd oracles. This section and the following one (11:4-17) provide different images of shepherds. The theme constitutes over fifty percent of the first oracle (9:1–11:17). Again, the oracles are separated by third-person and first-person grammatical changes. Themes of genuine leadership, restoration, and punishment for Israel's enemies are used.

The Lord speaks (vv. 2-5). Verse 2 is a transition connecting the theme of "grassy fields" for "everyone" (v. 1b) to the shepherd and sheep theme (v. 2b). "Diviners" have duped the community, utilizing "teraphim" or household gods (see Judg 17:5; 18:5) for future speculations, which God judges as "nonsense," "false visions," "deceitful dreams," and "empty comfort" (v. 2a; compare Jer 23:32; 27:9). Many commentators think use of the teraphim was limited to the preexilic period and the chaotic condition of the community before the Exile. To some extent, they were also used in the postexilic community (compare Mal 3:5a; Isa 65:3-5; 66:17).

Earlier tradition claims that treacherous leadership led the community astray (see Hos 4:4-9; Mic 3; Jer 2:26). The shepherd as leader had been a personal symbol of Hammurabi (1728–1686 B.C.E.). Later "shepherd" was used to designate God (see Gen 49:24; Ps 23), as was "just king" (see Isa 44:28; Jer 23:2-4; Mic 5:4; Ezek 34:23-24).

"Shepherds" and "leaders" are parallel terms and the objects of God's wrath (v. 3a). The verb states that God "visits" different persons, God's visitation "will punish the leaders," but the visitation of the flock results in making them a "stately war horse" (v. 3b). The flock, identified as the house of Judah, is the context for the development of the victor-warrior in verses 4-5 (see 9:11–10:1).

Verses 4 and 5 list a number of traditional metaphors which indicate the type of leadership that will come forth from Judah ("from him"—v. 4). The Revised Standard Version and the New English Bible render the sense of the Hebrew better than the New American Bible for both verses. In verse 4a three metaphors occur: "cornerstone" (NAB: "leader") indicates stability (see Judg 20:2; 1 Sam 14:38; compare Ps 118:22); "tent peg" (NAB: "chief") suggests endurance (see Isa 22:23); "warrior's bow" (NAB also) suggests fearless courage (see 2 Kgs 13:17; compare Rev 6:2). Verse 5 identifies the leaders as "warriors" who will be victorious: "the Lord is with them . . . ."

The second oracle, a composite of several divine proclamations, develops the theme of restoration (vv. 6-12). Verse 6 concludes the focus on Judah by noting God's activities of strengthening and saving Judah and the "house of Joseph," that is, the northern kingdom (v. 6a). Judah and Joseph will be brought back and treated with mercy (see Jer 33:26; compare Hos 11; Zech 7:13). A wonderful expression describes the new situation: "They shall be as though I had never cast them off . . . ." (v. 6b).

Verses 7-9 reveal the future of Ephraim (the northern kingdom). As "valiant warriors" (RSV; see Judg 7:24-25; 8:1-3) with cheerful hearts, their children will witness them and "be glad . . . and rejoice in the Lord" (v. 7; compare Isa 29:19). The Lord will bring them back from exile with a "whistle," that is, a signal. It is an ironic expression first used to denote God's "signal" to Israel's enemies (compare Isa 5:26-30). Ephraim will experience the past in a new way (v. 8a; compare v. 6b). Although scattered "among the nations," they "remember" the Lord and "rear their children and return" (v. 9).

Verses 10-12 continue the theme of restoration of the exiles. Egypt and Assyria were countries involved in the destruction of the northern and southern kingdoms (see Isa 7:18). Gilead and Lebanon are fertile, rich areas ideal for restoration. In Egypt, the Nile will dry up and the scepter will be taken away. In Assyria, "pride . . . will be cast down" (v. 11). For those returning from exile, however, God's strength will enable them to continue home (v. 12; compare v. 6; Isa 40:31).

The final section is a "taunt song" against the treacherous shepherds (11:1-3). The literary form was used by earlier prophets to proclaim God's judgment on Israel's enemies (see 5:2; Isa 14:4-21; Jer 6:1-5). Here the enemies of Israel are compared to trees, and their leaders are shepherds (compare Isa 10:33-34; Ezek 31). Lebanon and Bashan are particularly singled out for judgment; they were often linked together in earlier prophecy (see Isa 2:13; Jer 22:20; Ezek 27:5-6).

Lebanon is addressed first: cedars and cypress are destroyed, devastating the wealth of the area (vv. 1-2a). Cedar was a symbol of the royal house of Judah (see Ezek 17:3, 4, 12f.). Next Bashan is considered: "the impenetrable forest is cut down!" (v. 2b). The different trees symbolize various nations. Finally the shepherds lament, for "their glory has been ruined" (v. 3a). "The roaring of the young lions" may suggest other leaders whose territory is devastated "in the jungle of the Jordan" (v. 3b; compare Jer 25:34-37; 50:44; Ezek 19:1-9).

11:4-17 Shepherd allegory. This section is prose except for verse 17, which is poetry. While the themes of shepherd and sheep have been noted above (see 9:16; 10:2, 3, 8-9; 11:3), they are most developed here. Oracles in the first person contain three symbolic acts. Most commentators interpret the section as allegory, proposing that the symbolic acts are a written imitation of earlier prophetic tradition. The section is divided into three parts: verses 4-6; 7-14; 15-17.

The superscription of the first oracle (vv. 4-6) is unusual (v. 4a). The phrase "my God," found in many prayers (see Pss 7:2; 18:3; 22:2; 88:2), suggests a separation of the speaker from the hearers (see Joel 1:3; Josh 9:23). The prophet may be initiating controversy both through use of the phrase as well as through his self-identification as the shepherd of the flock (v. 4b).

The prophet uses the image of a market with buyers and sellers of sheep to condemn the leaders with Israel. The buyers—foreign nations that occupied Israel—"slay them with impunity," while the sellers—religious leaders within Israel—"do not even feel for them" (v. 5; compare Amos 2:6; Jer 38:8-22; Neh 5:10-13). God's judgment mirrors the conduct of the shepherds. Neither leaders nor people will be delivered by God (v. 6b).

The second oracle (vv. 7-14) contrasts the prophet as leader with previous leaders (vv. 4-6). Verse 7 parallels verse 4b. The Lord's command to "shepherd the flock" (v. 4b) is obeyed by the prophet, who is employed by the sheep merchants (v. 7a). Staffs in hand, the prophet "fed the flock" (v. 7b).

Verse 8a is a gloss whose meaning is unclear. Who are the "three shepherds"? How did they function? At least forty interpretations have been suggested in the past century. Since there is little information about what transpired in the Jewish community between 350–200 B.C.E. (see p. 574), it is believed that the three shepherds may have functioned during that time either as high priests or as temple officials.

Verse 8b resumes the narrative and indicates the mutual dissatisfaction of shepherd (prophet) and flock (undetermined). The prophet's rejection impels him to withhold leadership from the people. He leaves them to their own resources (v. 9).

The next response of the prophet is to "snap asunder" both staffs. Verses 10 and 14 function as an inclusion for verses 11-13. The literary structure is similar to the "vision within the vision" (see the commentary on 4:1-6a; 10b-14; 6b-10a). Verse 10 describes the prophet's action of breaking his first staff, called "Favor," and interprets it as "breaking off the covenant which I had made with all peoples." The implication is that gentile nations as well had contracted a covenant with God. The second staff, called "Union," is also broken, which is interpreted as "breaking off the brotherhood of Judah and Israel" (v. 14), the period of the divided kingdom before and after the Exile.

The second symbolic act is described in verses 11-13. The prophet indicates through his action that in rejecting him, the people have rejected God (compare Matt 27:4-6). In Hebrew, "treasury" is also translated "to the potter." Artisans worked in the temple area to provide clay receptacles for the treasury, which held sacred objects and served as a bank for private holdings (2 Macc 3:10ff.; compare Matt 27:6-9).

The third oracle (vv. 15-17) includes a command of the Lord to the prophet to perform a third symbolic act. Although the description of the act is omitted, its significance is emphasized: "God will raise up" an utterly incompetent shepherd unconcerned that the flock will "perish," "stray," need healing or food (v. 16a). Who is the foolish shepherd? Again, the verse defies a clear historical context. Some commentators suggest the office of high priest (compare Ezek 34:1-6).

The allegory concludes with a poetic "woe" imprecation to the "foolish shepherd who forsakes the flock" (v. 17a). Curses of a useless arm and blind eye will render the shepherd incompetent and unable to lead (v. 17b).

PART TWO: RESTORATION

Zech 12:1–14:21

Part Two is a collection of edited oracles about God's restoration of the temple-community. Future battles, purification, and blessings will occur "on that day" for the community as well as for the nations. The collection may have been added to restore communal hope after Alexander's career did not fulfill messianic expectations. Part Two, especially chapter 14, contains more proto-apocalyptic characteristics than Part One (see p. 577).

12:1 Superscription. "An oracle: the word of the Lord" repeats 9:1 and introduces Part Two (see p. 616). The phrase "concerning Israel" was probably added by an editor, since Israel is not mentioned again. It may, however, refer to all the inhabitants of Israel (see 1 Chr 21:1; 2 Chr 29:24). Verse 1b is a new introduction: "Thus says the Lord." The description that follows identifies the Lord as creator, similar to other hymnic identifications (see Isa 40:22; 42:5; Ps 24:1-2).

12:2-9 Jerusalem and Judah. This section is a series of divine oracles proclaimed in the first person. The creator God promises prominence to Jerusalem and Judah as victorious over the nations. Traditional metaphors are used frequently. The phrase "on that day" occurs in five verses of chapter 12 (sixteen times in chapters 12–14).

The first oracle is constructed in perfect parallelism (vv. 2-3). God will make "Jerusalem . . . a bowl . . . and a weighty stone for all peoples roundabout" (vv. 2a, 3a). Both will thwart enemies: "stupefy . . . injure themselves badly" (vv. 2b, 3b). The bowl is a symbol of God's wrath toward Israel's enemies

(see Jer 25:15-16; Ezek 23:31-34; compare Isa 51:17), while the weighty stone indicates an unmovable barrier for the enemy (see Isa 8:14-15; 28:16; compare Zech 3:9). "For all peoples roundabout" is a repetition of Joel 4:11-12 [3:11-12].

The second oracle presents the Lord as the victorious warrior on behalf of Judah and Jerusalem (vv. 4-5). The third oracle describes the "clans of Judah" taking a more active role in the vindication of Jerusalem (v. 6). Jerusalem, however, will remain "on its own site" (v. 6b).

The next two oracles have a grammatical change to the third person, that is, the prophet speaks of the Lord (vv. 7-8). The Lord's preference for Judah is indicated by saving her "tents . . . first" (v. 7a) in order to prevent the exaltation of the "glory of the house of David and . . . inhabitants of Jerusalem" (v. 7b). It is unclear whether the references to Jerusalem mean that the community also needs purification or that the verse describes the humbled condition of the community in an ironic manner. Either interpretation provides the context for the next verse as well.

The Lord's protective care as "shield" will protect the Jerusalemites (v. 8). The verse recalls the prestigious memory of David, whom supplicants addressed as an "angel of God" (see 1 Sam 29:10; 2 Sam 14:17, 20; 19:28). Was David's line still represented in the community? Were there new hopes and dreams of a final age when David's ancestor would reign? The difficulty of dating the oracle prevents a response.

The final oracle (v. 9) is God's proclamation about the enemies of Jerusalem. It is a summary of the section.

12:10–13:1 Mourning in Jerusalem. The abrupt departure from the scene of the liberation of Jerusalem (12:1-9) to that of murder and mourning prompted some editions of the Bible to transpose the section to the end of 11:4-17. Nonetheless, the context of the previous passage (12:1-9) prepares for this section with its challenge for repentance. Verse 10, especially difficult to interpret, appears in Johannine literature (John 19:37; Rev 1:7), in Handel's Messiah, and in Christian devotion to the crucified Jesus.

Verse 10a promises God's gift, "a spirit of grace and petition," to the "house of David and . . . the inhabitants of Jerusalem." In addition to military victory (vv. 2-4; 6-9) and recognition of God's strength (v. 5), the community will participate in an interior renewal of heart (compare Ezek 36:26-27; 39:29; Joel 3:1-2 [2:28-29]). The "grace" of repentance appears to be the focus of the conversion. It is linked to a specific event: "They shall look on him whom they have thrust through." Intensive and extensive mourning follow (vv. 10b-14).

Who has been "pierced" (RSV)? Hebrew and Greek manuscripts differ here. Some read "on him," some read "on me." The more difficult reading ("on me") is preferred. The emendation "on him" denies the possibility that it is God who is pierced. Some commentators also question the translation "thrust through." Is it literal? Metaphorical? (see Lam 4:9; Prov 12:18). The same question arises when comparing verse 10 to Isa 53:5, which parallels the verse exactly.

Most commentators propose a literal interpretation for "piercing." The identity of the pierced one varies. Possibilities include a representative of God; a collectivity, such as the martyrs of Judah in the Maccabean era; a historical figure who had been murdered, for example, Josiah, Onias III, or Simon Maccabeus; a charismatic figure cast out by officials; the good shepherd of Zech 11. The identity remains unclear. The only "facts" from the verse are of a man murdered by the inhabitants of Jerusalem. Mourning and repentance occur afterward.

Verse 10b begins the detailed description of the mourning. The loss is especially poignant. The description recalls the Egyptians grieving over their first-born (Exod 4:22) and David's lament over his first-born (2 Sam 12:15-23) and over Absalom (2 Sam 18:33).

Two images note the intensity of grieving (v. 11). The name Hadadrimmon recalls the lamentation rites associated with the fall and spring seasons ritualized by the pagan weather-gods Hadad and Rimmon. Megiddo recalls the historical site at which the beloved King Josiah was killed (609 B.C.E.). National rites of mourning were conducted yearly (see 2 Chr 35:24-25).

The "land" and all its peoples are involved in mourning. First, royal houses are mentioned (v. 12; see 2 Sam 5:14), then priestly houses (v. 13; see Num 3:18), then everyone else (v. 14). The phrase "and their wives" (5 times) suggests the separation of women and men during mourning.

Mourning "on that day" is connected with the opportunity "on that day" for purification "from sin and uncleanness" (13:1), which include all human misconduct, ritual and sexual impurity. There was a ritual cleansing for Zerubbabel and the community (see Zech 3:4, 9) and a similar promise according to Ezekiel (see Ezek 36:25).

In Isa 53:5 the piercing and death of God's messenger are related to forgiveness of sin. Yet in 13:1 Zechariah does not identify the pierced one as "servant." The identity of the fountain, its relationship to the one "thrust through," and the effect on the community are perplexing. The interpretation is difficult for us because Christian tradition has appropriated 12:10 and 13:1 to refer to Jesus.

13:2-6 Purification in Jerusalem. As Jerusalem would be cleansed of bogus leaders (see the commentary on 11:4-17), so idol worship and false prophets would be purged from the land. Ezekiel had specified that rejection of idolatry was part of the purification of the community (see Ezek 36). Some suggest that even worship of the temple may have been a problem.

Idol worship may have been promoted by dishonest prophets who sought to reclaim the glory of the preexilic era for themselves. The "spirit of uncleanness" associated with them impeded the community's relationship with God. The phrase occurs only here in the Old Testament, while it occurs frequently in the Gospels as something over which Jesus had power.

The punishment accorded to false prophets is described in verses 3-6. Parental accusation initiates the process (v. 3a; compare Deut 13:1-9; 18:19-22). If the son continued to prophesy, the parents were to "thrust him through" (v. 3b). The verb is the same used in 12:10.

Verse 4 suggests that the false prophet is somewhat honest by being ashamed to speak about visions or to assume a "hairy mantle" for leadership (see 2 Kgs 1:8). The irony of verse 5, however, contradicts this. There the false prophet mimics Amos, who preferred to till the soil (see Amos 7:14).

The deception is uncovered in verse 6, where the false prophet explains that his wounds are the result of punishment by his parents (v. 4b). Several suggest, however, that the lacerations were part of a ritual enacted for idols (see 1 Kgs 18:28), and the "dear ones" (RSV: "friends") were associates in the idolatrous worship (see Hos 2:7, 10-12; Ezek 23:5-9).

13:7-9 Sword and fire. The poetic section takes up the theme of shepherd and sheep. In contrast to previous sections (10:3; 11:4-17), where the shepherds were guilty of not fulfilling their duties, this shepherd is not condemned. He is described as the one who "is my associate" (v. 7a). The Hebrew word is otherwise limited to Leviticus, where regulations are given about relationships among the Israelites. "Near neighbor" is the translation there (see Lev 6:2; 18:20).

Who is this shepherd? As is the case with the pierced one, there are several interpretations. Some link the shepherd with the one who appeared before (see 11:4, 17; 12:10). Others suggest a good leader not previously mentioned. However uncertain the identification, the text describes the shepherd as the one against whom the sword is raised (13:7). Consequently, the sheep scatter and God turns a hand "against the little ones." Why the shepherd is struck down is not clear. The act precipitates the dispersal of the Lord's community, that is, the sheep.

The consequences are quite extreme. Two thirds "shall be cut off and perish" (v. 8a; compare Ezek 5:1-12). The remaining one third will be judged again. Traditional metaphors for God's cleansing action describe their plight: "into the fire" (compare 3:2; Ezek 5:4; Mal 3:3); refined "as silver is refined"; tested "as gold is tested" (v. 9b). The result is a reconciled relationship: "They shall call upon my name, and I will hear them . . . They are my people . . . The Lord is my God" (v. 9c).

14:1 Superscription. The ominous note that begins the final chapter of Zechariah parallels the "day of the Lord" (see Joel 1:15; 2:1). Two battles are then described in which the Lord will be present as antagonist against and protagonist for Jerusalem (vv. 2-3).

14:2-5 War and victory. In a first-person oracle God announces plans for "gathering all the nations against Jerusalem" (v. 2a). Grim consequences mark the defeat of the city: capture, plundered houses, ravished women, and half the inhabitants sent into exile (v. 2b). The rest of the people will remain in the city (compare Isa 1:9).

A grammatical change to the third person narrates another battle in which the Lord will fight against the nations (v. 3; compare Isa 43:13). Verses 4-5 contain the only mention of the Mount of Olives in the Old Testament (compare 2 Sam 15:30), while the earthquake is compared to the one attributed to Uzziah's seizure of priestly functions (see 2 Chr 26:16-21). No Davidic figure is mentioned; God's presence is primary.

14:6-11 Transformation of the land. The changes in the land noted in verses 4-5 continue in this section. Vegetation, animals, and persons alike will benefit from the favorable conditions (v. 7; compare Rev 21:23, 25).

According to verse 8, the valuable gift of water will be assured (compare Ezek 47:1-2; John 4:18; 7:37-39). The changes in the cosmos are related to the Lord's kingship "over the whole earth" (see Ps 97:1). It will be recognized and proclaimed in credal formula (v. 9; compare Deut 6:4-5).

Jerusalem will be accorded greater prominence (v. 10a). The territory described is from the reign of Josiah, who ruled twenty years before the Exile. Geba is six miles north of Jerusalem, and Rimmon is thirty-five miles southwest of Jerusalem (see 2 Kgs 23:8). Jerusalem, however, "shall remain exalted in its place" (v. 10b). Unfortunately, the places for the area markers of the city (v. 10c) are difficult to locate. Today they indicate four directions.

14:12-15 Plague and tumult. This section is an addition that enlarges upon the description of verse 3. The style is exaggerated, characteristic of apocalyptic writing. Verse 12 describes how the plague will affect "flesh," "eyes," and "tongue" (compare Ezek 28:21-22; 39:17-20; Rev 16:6; 19:17-18). Verse 13 attributes the "great tumult" among neighbors to the Lord. "Judah also shall fight against Jerusalem" (v. 14) ought to be interpreted as "with" or "in" Jerusalem, which the Hebrew also allows. Verse 15 concludes the section by mentioning a similar plague that will affect all the animals.

14:16-21 Celebration in Jerusalem. The final section of Second Zechariah parallels the corresponding section in First Zechariah (8:20-23). The verses indicate that nations that were Jerusalem's enemies will come to worship and celebrate the feast of Booths (v. 16). A curse will be leveled against "any of the families of the earth" who do not come for worship. "Lack of rainfall" will be the punishment (compare v. 8). The feast of Booths occurred just before the autumn rains.

Because of the Nile River, rain shortage will not be a serious problem for the Egyptians who fail to come to Jerusalem. However, the plague is the potential curse for them and for all the nations that fail to celebrate the feast of Booths (vv. 18-19).

The concluding verses suggest the total dedication of Jerusalem and Judah to God. The temple itself is not the source of holiness. Instead, ordinary objects will become holy because of the persons who own them.

The Book of Zechariah has no conclusion. The editor probably wanted to use Malachi as the final message. For this purpose, the beginning of Malachi parallels Part One and Part Two of Second Zechariah (see pp. 616–17).

Conclusion

The two parts of Second Zechariah develop the future judgment of God upon the temple-community and upon the nations. Chapters 9–11 outline battles against the enemy, consolation of the community, and the concept of shepherd and sheep. Chapters 12–14 use proto-apocalyptic language and content to dramatize what mourning and celebration entail. The second part also broadens the concept of the significance of Jerusalem and Judah for the nations.

Are there points of continuity between First Zechariah and Second Zechariah? The editor of the scroll and the persons responsible for the canonical status of Zechariah used literary devices to ensure that all fourteen chapters would be considered as one Minor Prophet (see pp. 601, 616).

Beyond literary considerations, there are religious relationships of continuity and development between the chapters.

a) Historically, First and Second Zechariah addressed communities separated by nearly two hundred years. While the political situation was different in the Persian and the Greek empires, the religious struggles were similar. Who will provide civic and religious leadership? What is required? Can an emperor fulfill expectations?

b) In proclaiming a future in which God would initiate victory, both communities heard about their renewed relationship to

God. God as warrior and protective presence would give them comfort and support for their activities. Before this happened, however, the community would suffer the ravages of war and the comprehensive process of purification.

c) Fidelity to God's covenant through faithful living and restored worship would characterize those who lived in Judah. Evil is not denied but recognized. God assured the communities that evil will not be ultimately victorious. Transgressors could repent or be punished.

d) God's relationship to the nations, as well as their own relationship to traditional enemies, was developed in radically new perspectives. "On that day" Israel and the nations would share in God's compassion. They would live together in a land free from war and for holiness. Communal worship would be one symbol of the new reality.

e) The vision of an unexpected future was offered to both communities while the uncertainties of the present weighed heavily in their daily experience. How would the communities prepare for the blessings of "that day"? Attention to God's word spoken in the past and reinterpreted by the minor prophet Zechariah would provide some direction in living during periods of "in betweenness."

MALACHI

Mary Margaret Pazdan, O.P.

INTRODUCTION

Authorship

What is known about the author of the Book of Malachi is derived from 3:1, where the phrase "my messenger" occurs. An editor probably used the Hebrew transliteration (mal'achi) "Malachi" for 1:1, where the proper name appears. The name Malachi does not occur anywhere else in the Old Testament. The absence of any precise chronology and genealogy in the superscription (1:1) lends support to the suggestion that the author was an anonymous prophet.

The superscription includes the word "oracle" (the Hebrew means "burden") rather than a personal name. It parallels Zech 9:1; 12:1, where the literary device marks collections of oracles that were added to First Zechariah (see p. 616). While a common superscription unites Second Zechariah and Malachi, the historical background, literary structures, and religious significance of the collected oracles differ greatly.

Dating of the text

According to its canonical position, the Book of Malachi is the twelfth of the Minor Prophets. This location is not conclusive for establishing a chronology of the text. The Book of Malachi describes situations that place the prophet about fifty years after the completion of the temple (515 B.C.E.) and just before the ministry of Ezra (about 460–445 B.C.E.). For an understanding of the historical context, see pp. 573–574.

The book offers some perspective about the challenges the prophet encountered. Although the community was under the office of a governor (see 1:8; Hag 1:1; Neh 5:14), civic authority had declined. The priests had assumed civic and religious authority for the community. The priests, however, were irresponsible leaders, failing to correct several abuses: worship, moral and social problems, and mixed marriages.

The book offers valuable insights into Jewish communities in the mid-fifth century B.C.E. It corresponds to Ezra and Nehemiah and supplements these books. It is a historical witness to how a community may participate in the process of restoration with a population of about twenty thousand living in an area twenty by twenty-five miles square.

Composition of the text

A collection of oracles has been edited and unified by a literary device called the disputation. It is a catechetical structure consisting of three elements: (a) an affirmation of God or the prophet occurs at the beginning of each section; (b) a question arises from the audience, usually a reproach or a complaint; (c) God or the prophet responds often with an argument.

The prophet and the editor depend on Ezekiel and Deuteronomy for ideas and images for the disputation. The Levitical sermons of the Chronicler are similar in structure and content. The two appendices were added to conclude the Book of Malachi and the scroll of the Twelve Minor Prophets. The identification of the precursor of the messianic day links the collection to the New Testament (see the commentary on 3:23-24).

Outline of the book

Like Joel and First Zechariah, where the numbering of chapters and verses are different, the Book of Malachi has one discrepancy in the numbering. This commentary, based on the New American Bible, follows the Hebrew text, while other Bibles and commentaries may use the Greek text. The chart compares the versions.

Hebrew Text	Greek Text
3:19-24	4:1-6

In this commentary the numbering of the Greek text is in brackets.

PART ONE:	Oracles (1:2–3:21 [1:2–4:3])
1:1	Superscription
1:2-5	First Oracle: God's Love for Israel
1:6–2:9	Second Oracle: Sins of the Priests
2:10-16	Third Oracle: Sins of the Community
2:17–3:5	Fourth Oracle: God's Justice
3:6-12	Fifth Oracle: Ritual Offenses
3:13-21 [3:13–4:3]	Sixth Oracle: God's Servants
PART TWO:	Appendices (3:22-24 [4:4-6])
3:22 [4:4]	Conclusion of Twelve Minor Prophets
3:23-24 [4:5-6]	Identification of Precursor

COMMENTARY

PART ONE: ORACLES

Mal 1:2–3:21 [1:2–4:3]

The six sections of Part One are addressed exclusively to Israel and concern its covenant relationship with God. A covenant theme is developed in the first oracle, which proclaims God's love for Israel (1:2-5). It forms an inclusion with the first appendix, where the people are enjoined to "remember the laws of Moses . . . the statutes and ordinances for all Israel" (3:22 [4:4]). Abuses within the community are discussed in connection with covenant stipulations.

1:1 Superscription. For discussion of "an oracle" and "Malachi," see above (p. 625). "Israel" refers to the whole nation, not merely the northern kingdom. The phrase introduces the focus of Part One: concern for the Jewish community and the experiences of daily life. There is no discussion about the role of the nations; neither are there any judgments of future orientation.

1:2-5 First oracle: God's love for Israel. The catechetical pattern, the structure for the oracles, uses language suggestive of an intimate relationship between the dialogue partners. The oracle begins with a statement of the Lord: "I have loved you" (v. 2a). Anticipating the listeners' response, the Lord's oracle continues: "but you say, 'How have you loved us?' " (v. 2b).

The disputation concludes with a response from the Lord (vv. 3-5). The Edomite situation is offered as a vivid memory from tradition. The mutual distrust of two brothers (Esau and Jacob) ignited enmity between their families and descendants, an enmity that grew to an irreconcilable impasse when Babylon invaded Jerusalem (586 B.C.E.). Complicity with the enemy and against Judah was unforgivable to the exiles and their descendants (for the historical development of the tradition, see p. 586 and the commentary on Obad 10-14.

In verse 3a God asks a rhetorical question to situate the response: "Was not Esau Jacob's brother?" Next, the declaration of God's love identifies Jacob as the special one (v. 3b). The Hebrew verb designates the elective sense of "love." The specific meaning was used in the covenantal context when God declared love for Israel (see Deut 4:37; 7:7, 8; 10:15) and extended an invitation to Israel to respond in love (see Deut 5:10; 6:5; 11:1, 13).

The choice of Jacob ought to be seen as an election. This is not clear in the English translation. The election of Jacob rather than Esau does not entail "hatred" toward Esau. It is a matter of choice, of the mysterious decision of God. Ironically, although Jacob was chosen, his family experienced the Exile while Esau's did not. Paul uses verses 2-3 to develop the theme of election and predestination in Rom 9:13. In the present context, however, predestination is not the issue.

Another appeal to the community's experience is remembrance of the fate of Edom after the Exile. The Lord ravaged the area, toppling the mountains (where the tribe lived in safety) and ruining the land (v. 3c). Historically, the event corresponds to the raids of Arabian tribes that greatly diminished Edom's influence in the Negeb about a century after the fall of Jerusalem.

The downfall of Edom appears to be permanent. Even if they attempt "to rebuild the ruins . . . I will tear down" (v. 4a). More devastating than the ruined land is the name that Edom will bear forever: "wicked country" (RSV) and the judgment of the Lord: "the people with whom the Lord is angry forever" (v. 4b).

The oracle concludes with a third appeal to experience (v. 5a). The conviction of being chosen by the faithful God will impel the community to praise (v. 5b; compare Zech 9:1-8). The ironic expectation of the prophet is a hope that the community will become observant; look beyond Israel and acknowledge that God's dominion is greater than the "land of Israel."

1:6–2:9 Second oracle: Sins of the priests. Eight oracles have been combined to disclose the two principal sins of the priests: offering polluted sacrifices (1:6-14) and abrogating the roles of teacher and leader (2:1-9). Each oracle is identified by an introductory or concluding prophetic formula: "says the Lord of hosts." The literary structure continues the disputation format. The characteristic elements indicate expansions.

The sin of offering polluted sacrifices is described in two sections (vv. 6-9; 10-14). The first section begins with a comparison of familial and household relationships with covenant relationship (v. 6a). The Lord questions the fidelity of the covenant partners. The tone of the rhetorical questions suggests that the covenant relationship has deteriorated: "Where is the honor due to me? Where is the reverence due to me?" (v. 6b; compare Exod 4:22; Hos 11:1; Isa 1:2).

The prophetic formula follows (v. 6b). What is unusual here is the addition "to you, O priests, who despise his name." The grammatical change from the third person to the second person suggests that the judgment is that of the prophet who has spoken the Lord's word or of an editor. The charge of despising the Lord's name is extremely serious. It is equivalent to despising the very being of God.

The next two topics are concerned with priestly matters (vv. 6c-7: see v. 12). There were very strict standards for suitable sacrificial offerings (see Lev 22:18-25; Deut 15:21; 17:1). Contemporary sociological criticism of biblical texts confirms the complexity of standards in regard to purity (holiness) and pollution (sinfulness).

The phrase "table of the Lord" appears only here in the Old Testament, although the idea appears elsewhere (see Ps 23:5; Ezek 44:16). The tables for slaughtering the sacrifices were located at the gates of the inner court of the temple. A single table was located in the sanctuary, where only the priest was allowed (see Ezek 40:39-43).

The questions about sacrifice are answered by additional rhetorical questions of the Lord appealing to priestly experiences (v. 8; see vv. 3-5). Blind, lame, and sick animals constitute "polluted food" (v. 8a). Such offerings would not be acceptable to the governor nor invite his hospitality (v. 8b). The governor's refusal and attitude are the analogy for God's disposition. An ironic question from the prophet concludes the oracle (v. 9; compare Zech 7:2).

The Lord's response to the polluted offerings is developed in the second section (vv. 10-14). Let there be a cessation of all temple sacrifice (v. 10a; see Ezek 40:39-41). God's preference is for no sacrifice: "I take no pleasure in you . . . neither will I accept any sacrifice from your hands" (v. 10b). The statement would cause anxiety among the priests. Their function as well as the efforts of the community to restore the temple for worship were being threatened.

The Lord's response continues a contrast between the priests and people of the covenant community and the "nations." There are various interpretations of verse 11. Some commentators suggest that the verse describes imminent expectations of a messianic age when Gentiles will worship with Jews (compare Isa 66:18-21; Zech 14:21). A few Catholic commentators propose that the verse is a reference to the sacrifice of the Mass. Others relate the verse to the situation of the Diaspora Jews and their synagogue activities (prayer and study), which have replaced or substituted for temple sacrifice. The last argument is most probable. However, whatever the particular interpretation may be, the general context identifies a type of activity that is pleasing to God.

The remaining verses of the section continue the contrast between the priests and the nations by indicting priestly thoughts and behavior.

The concluding oracle of the section issues a curse to the priest who deceives himself and the community by offering a "gelding" and holding back a "male" animal (v. 14a; see Lev 22:18). There is an implied contrast between the covenant community and the "nations." The Lord is a "great King whose name will be feared among the nations" (v. 14b). The repetition of "great" (vv. 5, 11, 14) and "name" (vv. 6, 11, 14) throughout the indictment for polluted sacrifices (vv. 6-14) emphasizes the nature of God and how inadequately the priests respond.

The second indictment condemns the failure of the priests as teachers and leaders because they have abandoned personal integrity (2:1-9). The entire section is the Lord's response in covenantal terminology. The priests will be cursed if they do not heed the Lord's warning (vv. 1-2; see Deut 27:14–28:68). "Shoulder" (v. 3) is interpreted literally as the choice portion of animal sacrifices given to the priests (see Deut 18:3). The Revised Standard Version renders "shoulder" as "offspring," implying that the whole priestly lineage will be cut off with no successors, while the New English Bible translates the term as "arm," suggesting that priests will be prevented from officiating at the altar.

God offers a sign to the priests that the commandment is intended for them. It is the "covenant with Levi," whereby "life and peace" were offered. Levi responded by fearing God and standing in awe of God's name (vv. 4-5). In addition, Levi spoke true doctrine (torah) honestly, lived "in integrity and uprightness, and turned many away from evil" (v. 6; compare Deut 31:9-13). While the covenant with Levi (v. 4) is not recorded in the Old Testament, it is presupposed in other texts (see Jer 33:21; compare Num 25:11-13).

The covenant with Levi is the model for the priest, who is to be knowledgeable in the law and is to instruct the community (v. 7a; see Deut 17:9; 33:10). The priest must be faithful to the covenant "because he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts" (v. 7b). This is the one verse in the Old Testament where a priest is given the title "messenger," which traditionally was associated with a prophet. The transfer of title and function from prophet to priest may refer to the historical circumstances of Malachi's experience.

The comprehensive model of the covenant with Levi and the additional role of "messenger of the Lord of hosts" are the basis for the judgment of the priests (vv. 8-9). They have not been faithful to the obligations of the covenant nor to their role as teachers and leaders (v. 8). Since they voided the covenant of Levi, the Lord has stripped them of their status. They have become "contemptible and base before all the people," since they refuse to keep God's covenant and to instruct the community in its stipulations (v. 9).

Some commentators have suggested that the description of the covenant with Levi and its authority may be a reference to the contrast between the Zadokite priests (returnees from Babylon) and the Levites. The latter had been given menial tasks in the service of the temple, while the priests were important functionaries (see p. 575). Malachi may be favoring Levitical rather than Zadokite jurisdiction in the community.

2:10-16 Sins of the community. The community is guilty of breaking covenant with God in different situations. While the section begins with a general admonition (v. 10), the sin that is emphasized is the faithlessness of husbands to wives. Divorce, which Jewish law only permitted husbands to initiate under specific conditions, was becoming troublesome (see Deut 24:1-4; Hos 2:4; compare Ezra 9–10).

The returned exiles were wealthy and may have expected to enhance their position in the community by marrying a local woman. The practice of divorce meant that the community included many single, divorced Jewish women. Intermarriage meant that non-Jewish mothers would be responsible for teaching their children the practices of a religion that was foreign to them. It is not clear from the text what reasons were given for the divorce proceedings.

The prophetic injunction goes beyond earlier Jewish law, which regarded the wife as a possession of the husband (see Exod 20:17). The prophet identifies the relationship between husband and wife as a covenant that affects the partners, the individuals in their relationship to God, their children, and the other members of the community. As in the case of the indictments against the priests, here the covenant is the basis of the indictment against the community.

The prophet poses rhetorical questions that address the reality of the community's experience of common origin to begin a new disputation (v. 10a; compare Deut 32:6; Isa 63:16; 64:8). Referring to a common historical tradition, the prophet points out the "abomination" (RSV) that Judah, Jerusalem, and Israel have committed (v. 11a). "Abomination" is a technical term used to describe idols and the practice of idol worship forbidden by the covenant (see Deut 32:16; Isa 44:19). The present community is guilty of the same offense (v. 11b).

The consequences of the community's action (v. 11b) are interpreted in two ways. Literally, the verse identifies worship as unacceptable to the Lord due to the covenant faithlessness of the worshipers. Metaphorically, the "temple," "sanctuary" (RSV), "holiness" (NEB) of the Lord may also identify the community members, who are called to belong to God (see Deut 32:9). Whether worship or the members themselves are described, the indictment is the same: members have married "the daughter of a foreign god" (RSV; see 1 Kgs 11:1-8; Neh 13:23-27). Mixed marriages violate the covenant with God and the bond that unites the community (see Exod 34:13-16; Deut 7:1-4).

The first section concludes with a threatening curse (v. 12a). The identification of "witness and advocate" is difficult. Most commentators propose a universal meaning, that is, anyone involved in the situation. Exclusion from the community and prohibition to sacrifice in the temple are the closely related civic and religious punishments (v. 12b).

Sacrifices are no longer acceptable (v. 13b; compare 1:10b). Verse 14a is the only occurrence of a community question in the disputation: "Why is it?" The relationship of faithful living to genuine ritual is reiterated for the community as it was for the priests (see the commentary on 1:6b-13; 2:3-9). The prophet responds to the question by identifying the Lord as "witness between you and the wife of your youth" (v. 14a; compare Isa 54:6; Prov 5:18).

The severity of the broken relationship is indicated in verses 15-16. This obscure text may be an addition by scribal editors who disagreed with the prophet's insight. The emphasis is on God who created each person as "one being, with flesh and spirit," who in turn creates "godly offspring." The implication is that according to the model of God who is one, the married partners ought to be faithful to their union as "one" and "not break faith" (v. 15). Synonymous parallelism (vv. 14b, 15b) underscores the importance of fidelity to the marriage covenant.

Verse 16 consists of two divine oracles, which conclude the section. Two situations are hateful to the Lord. The first is divorce. While the English translations concur about the clause "I hate divorce," the Hebrew renders it "if he hates send (her) away" (v. 16a). Perhaps the text was amended by a scribe who desired to bring Malachi's teaching into conformity with earlier permission for divorce (see Deut 24:1). The oracle is attributed to the "Lord, the God of Israel," a phrase used nowhere else in the Old Testament. The title fits the context of continuing covenant relationships.

"Covering one's garments with injustice" is the second object of the Lord's hatred (v. 16b). It is an obscure clause. The "garment" may be a symbol for the divorce partners. The final injunction of the prophet (v. 16c) forms an inclusion with verse 15b, which brackets the Lord's oracles. It is a general exhortation to be faithful in all relationships with others and with God.

2:17–3:5 Fourth oracle: God's justice. Consistent with the focus on Israel, God's justice will be enacted upon that community through a judgment that both eliminates social abuses and purifies the Levites. The section 3:1-21 [3:13–4:6] is characterized as "proto-apocalyptic" because of the imminent judgment of the Lord (see p. 577). Nonetheless, the "nations" are not included in the judgment (compare Joel 3–4 [2:28–3:21] and Second Zechariah).

The disputation begins with a statement from the prophet (2:17a; compare Isa 43:24), followed by a question formulated to anticipate the audience (2:17b). The response identifies two attitudes of the community that are weakening the covenantal relationship. The people assume that evil is pleasing in God's sight (see Jer 12:1; Hab 1:2-4). Their belief in a just God is waning, that is, they are beginning to doubt God's existence (2:17c).

Thus the final verse of chapter 2 provides a transition to the next theme, God's justice. The questions about "wearying God" and the "just God" are repeated (3:13-15) and answered (3:16-18) in the context of the sixth oracle (3:13-21 [3:13–4:3]).

The next section (3:1-5) offers an entirely new focus on the "messenger" who will appear before the Lord's judgment. Verses 1a and 5 are first-person oracles representing God, while verses 2-4 are a third-person narration of the prophet. God announces that "my messenger" will be sent to prepare "the way before me" (v. 1a), while the prophet proclaims the coming of this messenger (v. 1b).

The identity of the messenger of the covenant is unclear. Verses 1b-4 are confusing. Did the editor of the book identify "my messenger" with the prophet Malachi (see p. 625)? Will the "messenger of the covenant" fulfill a Levitical role (see 2:4-8; compare Isa 40:3)? Are "my messenger" and the "messenger of the covenant" different individuals or the same individual? Does the description designate an angelic being? God? Or the imminent presence of God?

The prophet probably envisioned "my messenger" as a Levitical figure. A later editor, however, identified him as Elijah (see 3:23 [4:5]). It is possible that the Levitical figure could also function as the "messenger of the covenant." While commentators are divided about the identity of the messengers in Malachi, the messenger is unanimously identified in the Gospel traditions as John the Baptist (see Mark 1:2-8; Matt 3:1-11; Luke 3:2-16).

Verses 2-4 describe the coming of the Lord as judge in traditional metaphorical language. The double questions about the coming of the Lord refer to battle imagery (v. 2a; see 2 Kgs 10:4; Amos 2:15). "Like a refiner's fire or like the fuller's lye" are consistent images in prophecy (see Isa 1:25; Jer 6:29-30; Ezek 22:17-22). In Malachi the images signify that God will remove all impurities and cleanse the sons of Levi (vv. 2b-3; compare Zech 13:9).

In verse 4 the prophet compares future Levitical sacrifices on behalf of Judah and Jerusalem with the sacrifices that pleased the Lord in the past. The era of Moses is an appropriate identification for that period (see Jer 2:2; Isa 63:9, 11; compare Amos 5:25; Jer 7:22). The purification and acceptance of Levitical sacrifices (vv. 2-4) present a sharp contrast to the concluding verse of the section, which enumerates the evildoers who will be judged (v. 5; see 2:17c).

Verse 5a presents a court context in which the Lord is both witness and judge (see 2:14). With the exception of sorcerers (see Deut 18:10-11; Jer 27:9), all the groups responsible for social evils are indicted: adulterers and perjurers (compare 2:11-16); employers who defraud (see Lev 19:13; Deut 24:14-15); those who oppress widows and orphans (see Zech 7:10) or maltreat the sojourner (v. 5b). The perpetrators of social evils are described as the ones "who do not fear me" (v. 5c).

3:6-12 Fifth oracle: Ritual offenses. Four oracles of the Lord have been combined in the section to address the community about the quality of their ritual activity. Their deeds indict them when they approach the altar, just as the priestly activities and attitudes condemned the priests earlier (1:6–2:9).

The Lord's statement about the covenant bond initiates the disputation (v. 6; compare 1:2; 3:5; Gen 27:36). Next, there is a judgment about how that relationship was defiled throughout history (v. 7a). A plea to return to the Lord concludes the oracle (v. 7b). Malachi, like Zechariah, does not idealize past generations (see Zech 1:2, 4). Both invoke earlier Jewish tradition in pleading with their communities to return to God (see the commentary on Zech 1:3).

The Lord anticipates the question of the community: "How must we return?" (v. 7c) and responds with instructions about tithing. This is an unusual prophetic injunction, for earlier tradition insisted that community gifts were neither needed (see Ps 50:7-15) nor acceptable (see Amos 5:21-23; Isa 43:23).

Tithes represented one-tenth of an individual's produce; this portion was given to the Levites, who in turn gave a tithe to the priests (see Num 18:23-24, 28). According to the law, tithes were given to the Levites and to destitute members of the community every three years (see Deut 14:28-29). Therefore, if tithes were not given, members of the community suffered (compare 3:5). Offerings were portions of sacrifices and voluntary gifts given to the priests (see Exod 29:27-28; 25:2-7). By "robbing" God, the community is judged:

"you are indeed accursed" (v. 9; compare Prov 11:24).

Three oracles describe blessings promised to the community if they return to God by obeying the law about tithes and offerings (vv. 10-12). This is probably the prophet's response to those members who doubted God's existence (see 2:17).

The imperative "try me in this" suggests God's willingness to be tested. God's fidelity to the community will be seen in the blessings they enjoy (v. 10b). However, an obedient response of the community is a pre-condition for God's blessings. Two images of land harvest describe some of God's blessings: no locusts will "destroy your crops; and the vine . . . will not be barren" (v. 11; compare Joel 1:4; Hag 2:16, 19; Zech 8:12).

Abundant harvests will be evident to the nations, which "will call you blessed, for you will be a delightful land" (v. 12). Unlike Zechariah, there is no indication here that the nations will share in God's blessings bestowed on the community (see Zech 14:16-19).

3:13-21 [3:13–4:3] Sixth oracle: God's servants. The priests had been indicted for their actions and words. The same judgment is passed on the community, who had already been indicted for their actions (3:6-12). This section describes why their words nullify the covenant with God. The first part contains the questions of the evildoers. The second part is a contrast between those who fear God and the evildoers.

The attitudes of the community indicate skepticism. Lack of personal gain in observing the covenant requirements contributes to an apathetic spirit. The description of being clothed "in penitential dress" (NAB), "as in mourning" (RSV), "behaving with deference" (NEB) is difficult to interpret. It may identify a particular group of the community, such as the Levites, who had suffered because the tithes were not sufficient. They dressed in repentance but continued to experience hardships (compare Neh 13:10-13). Not only is the community lacking in fervor, but judgment suffers as well (v. 15; compare 2:17; Ps 73:2-14). Although these attitudes are widespread among community members, the situation is not a definitive one.

A shift from the Lord's oracles to prophetic narration and oracles announces the second part of this section. Responding to the disputation (vv. 13-15), some members seek to "return" to God (v. 16; compare 2:1). To preserve a record of those who "fear the Lord and trust in his name," a "book of remembrance" is compiled (v. 16c; compare 2:4-5). The book is a traditional symbol in Jewish tradition (see Exod 32:32-33; Isa 4:3; Ps 69:29; compare Esth 6:1-2). The phrase "book of remembrance," however, occurs only in Malachi.

God promises the people another blessing. They will be "mine . . . my own special possession," thus reaffirming the covenant with the Lord (v. 17a; see Exod 19:5; Deut 14:2; Ps 135:4). Compassion is another blessing from God (v. 17b; see 1:6a; 3:6). The ability to "again see the distinction between the just and the wicked" (v. 18a; compare 2:17b) will definitively challenge: "Every evildoer is good in the sight of the Lord" (v. 2:17c).

The second distinction that will become clear is between the one who serves God and the one who does not serve God (v. 18b). The approaching judgment of God will satisfy the scoffers' question: "Where is the just God?" (2:17c). The apocalyptic image of judgment as fire describes the separation of the community. Unlike the "refining" fire (3:2), the "blazing" quality will reduce "all the proud and all evildoers" (to) "stubble . . . leaving them neither root or branch" (v. 19 [4:1]).

For "you who fear my name, there will arise the sun of justice with its healing rays" (v. 20a [4:2a]; compare 3:16c; Isa 57:18-19; Luke 1:78-79). This is the one verse where the "sun of righteousness" (RSV) occurs in the Old Testament. Most commentators attribute the symbolism to the Egyptian and Mesopotamian sun-god, who is pictured with a winged solar disc on many Near Eastern monuments. The god functioned as judge among the gods of the pantheon.

Experiencing the "sun of righteousness" will rouse the energies of those who fear the Lord: "you shall break loose like calves released from the stall" (v. 20b [4:2]; NEB) and "tread down the wicked" (v. 21a [4:3a]). Consistent with the image of consuming fire (v. 19), the wicked will "become ashes under the soles of your feet on the day I take action" (v. 21b [4:3b]). God will vindicate those who fear the Lord (see Deut 32:35; Prov 20:22). The clause "on the day I take action" (vv. 17b; 23b [4:3b]) is an inclusion bracketing the Lord's future activities.

PART TWO: APPENDICES

Mal 3:22-24 [4:4-6]

The appendices summarize characteristic teaching, identify the messenger of the Lord, and describe the day of the Lord. There is no consensus about when they were combined, edited, and added to Part One of Malachi. Their inclusion indicates the importance of the closing verses of Malachi, the scroll of the Twelve Minor Prophets, and the conclusion of the Old Testament for future generations of communities.

"Remember the law of Moses . . . all Israel" (v. 22 [4:4]) points to the importance of the first five books of the Old Testament. Each phrase of the verse is an exhortation to be committed to Mosaic law. The phrases are taken from Deuteronomy's covenantal descriptions.

The next verse identifies the mysterious messenger of Mal 3:1 as the prophet Elijah (v. 23a [4:5a]). Descriptions of him in 2 Kings and Sirach correspond to the functions of the messenger (see 2 Kgs 2:11; Sir 48:10-12; commentary on Mal 3:1). "Before the day of the Lord comes, the great and terrible day" repeats the traditional imagery of that "day" (v. 23b [4:5b]; see Isa 3:5; Joel 2:11; 3:4 [2:31]).

Verse 3:23b [4:5b] may have been judged an inadequate conclusion of Malachi. For whatever reason, another verse was appended (v. 24a [4:6a]). It continues the thought of the first appendix (3:22a [4:4a]) in a chiastic structure whereby "fathers" is the left stroke of the X and "children" is the right stroke of the X. The verse offers a comment on the purpose of the covenant law, that is, mutual love among parents and children. The verse concludes with a traditional warning from the Lord: "Lest I come and strike the land with doom" (v. 24b [4:6b]).

The verse that concludes Malachi in the New American Bible is not found in the Hebrew text. Commentators propose that rabbis included it in order to formulate an appropriate conclusion, not one of doom. They inserted a repetition of verse 23 [4:5], which associates Elijah with the day of the Lord.

Conclusion

The prophet Malachi ministered to the community of Israel at a "trough" period. The process of rebuilding the temple and reconstituting a religious identity had been completed nearly fifty years beforehand. The glorious visions of Haggai and First Zechariah had not been fulfilled. Expectations of a new age related to the cosmopolitan world-view of Alexander the Great had also been disappointing.

The prophet faced a lethargic priesthood and community in which serious cultic, religious, and social abuses were not examined nor judged adequately. How could he revitalize the situation? He would appeal to the one consistent memory of a faithful God of the covenant! His exhortations would give all concerned a sense of continuity with a faded but glorious tradition. Opportunities to meet the same requirements of faithful living in the present would challenge everyone.

The Book of Malachi emerges as an effective text for rousing the hearts of the disenchanted and disappointed. In an age in which nothing spectacular occurred in religious, social, or political arenas to offer temporary distraction or assistance, Malachi offered a clear critique on the status quo. The prophet presents a creative relationship between the Law and the Prophets that can sustain and carry forth the community. The covenant offers a model of integrity between actions and words that is the basis for worship, leadership, and teaching.

The structure of the book is an effective resource for initial evangelization as well as later situations. The disputation style carefully distinguishes between God's exhortations and comments and the questions of the community. The additional responses offer opportunities for clarification and deeper understanding.

The language combines traditional metaphors and new insights in a clear, direct style. The book is not pedantic, dense, or unappealing. The insights often expressed in ironic phrases, questions, and statements breathe a new spirit into traditional material from the Law and the Prophets.

The Book of Malachi is an appropriate text with which to conclude the Twelve Minor Prophets as well as the Old Testament. It is a witness to the mystery of a faithful God who gives individuals and communities what is needed for the present. It is a perennial call to respond to the God who first loved all of creation and continues to transform the cosmos until the blessings promised "on that day" are no longer expectations.

An Introduction to the Wisdom Literature of Israel

Lawrence E. Boadt, C.S.P.

The nature of a wisdom book

After the Revolutionary War, when the delegates of the thirteen American colonies were writing a constitution, it got to the point where everyone objected to some part of the new document, and it looked as though it might never win approval. During the discussion Benjamin Franklin, the elder statesman of the group, noted that while he also did not agree with all the provisions, he had lived long enough to know that he often changed his mind and would likely do so again. He thought that this probably was not the best document, but it was far from the worst, and he would vote for it. It soon passed overwhelmingly. His good sense, discretion, and prudent judgment gave him the right to the title "Father of American Wisdom."

This same spirit that characterized Franklin also marks the wisdom books of the Old Testament. They are an often neglected part of the Bible but reflect an important insight into Israel's religious ideal, which is certainly not just the same as fidelity to the Mosaic law or obedience to the prophets. The Book of Daniel describes this further dimension of the ideal well when the Babylonian king wants some of the captured Jewish youths brought to his court to study wisdom: "young men without defects, handsome, intelligent and wise, eager to learn, prudent in judgment and competent to serve in the king's palace" (Dan 1:4). Other descriptions of the wise person are found in Gen 39:1-6; 41:8-32 (Joseph), 1 Kgs 4:29-34 (Solomon), and 2 Sam 16:15–17:14 (Ahithophel and Hushai).

The wisdom books are not all alike; they differ in style and content from one another. But certain characteristics do set them off from other biblical books; they show:

1) very little interest in the major traditions of the Pentateuch, such as the law of Sinai, the covenant, the cult, the special call of Israel;

2) little or no concern with the history of Israel as a people;

3) a searching for the meaning of life and the mastery of life as it is known from experience and not from faith alone;

4) an eagerness to explore the unknown and the difficult problems of sickness, suffering, death, the inequality of rich and poor, the seeming arbitrariness of divine blessing on people;

5) a curiosity about the world as a whole and the universal experience of all nations and peoples;

6) a commitment to discovering proper moral behavior, the right way to live.

These concerns invited the wise to be questioning about life while at the same time analyzing and ordering common experience into rules to live by. Wisdom encouraged discipline of thinking, careful reasoning, and the control of passions. "Go not after your lusts, but keep your desires in check. If you satisfy your lustful appetites, they will make you the sport of your enemies," says Sirach (18:30-31). At the same time, the sages were extremely broad-minded about borrowing from other peoples. They were, in short, interested in life in all its dimensions from the very practical viewpoint of "How can I get the best out of it for me and for society as a whole?"

This approach often makes the wisdom writings seem very secular in outlook. Many proverbs are never related to divine law at all. Even a non-believer can heartily agree with the admonition "Consort not with wine-bibbers, nor with those who eat meat to excess, for the drunkard and glutton come to poverty, and torpor clothes a person in rags" (Prov 23:20-21). The Rabbis of the centuries immediately after Christ argued vehemently whether Qoheleth (Ecclesiastes) was an atheist before they decided that the book had to be canonical because Solomon's name was attached to it. Whether optimistic about the world, as is Proverbs, or pessimistic, as are Job and Qoheleth, wisdom looks at the world from a very worldly point of view. The key example of this is Joseph in the Book of Genesis, who acts with discretion and prudence and does God's will without ever receiving any revelation from God at all.

While such qualities are valued almost everywhere in the Old Testament, only a few books can be called specifically "wisdom books" because they maintain the focus on intellectual reflection about the world from a humanist's standpoint throughout. These are: Proverbs; Job; Ecclesiastes (or in Hebrew, Qoheleth); Ecclesiasticus (or in Hebrew, Sirach or Jesus ben Sira); The Wisdom of Solomon. Closely related to these is the Canticle of Canticles (Song of Songs). Although the Song is love poetry, it is also a confident affirmation of creation and the human capacity for happiness. A number of the psalms may also be listed as wisdom writings: 1, 32, 34, 37, 49, 73, 111–112, 128 and possibly a few others (19:8-15; 119 and 127). Scholars have also pointed to wisdom influences in the prophets, especially Isaiah and Amos, who both place emphasis on knowing the divine "counsel" or wisdom and frequently make use of wisdom expressions. A few echoes of wisdom thinking occur elsewhere, such as in the story of the Garden of Eden (Gen 2–3), the life of Solomon (1 Kgs 3–11), the story of Joseph (Gen 37–49), and the Book of Daniel (chs. 1–6).

Observations on life were not restricted to Israel. Proverbial statements are nearly universal. In the past, biblical scholars often treated the wisdom material almost entirely in relation to other books of the Bible; but in the past few years, the discoveries of wisdom writings from the Egyptians, Sumerians, and Babylonians have increased enormously, and now the evidence points clearly toward how much Israel was indebted to these nations for its wisdom tradition. This should not surprise us. Wisdom's focus on the common questions of human beings everywhere would naturally lead the Israelites to study famous works from other nations.

Egypt, in particular, was a source of study. It produced many collections of proverbs dating from 2400 B.C.E. down to 500 B.C.E. Often these were in the form of a father's instruction to his son, which may well have been a formal way of talking about teacher and pupil. The earliest of these, the Instruction of the Vizier Ptah-hotep, gathered advice on how to succeed in life and resembles the older proverbs in the Book of Proverbs. Compare Ptah-hotep's "If you are sitting at the table of one greater than yourself, accept whatever he gives when it is set before your face" with Prov 23:1, "When you sit down to dine with a ruler, keep in mind who is before you." The much later Instruction of Amenemope, written sometime between 1000 and 600 B.C.E., has thirty instructions that match very closely the collection in Prov 22:17–24:22. One example is Prov 23:10: "Remove not the ancient landmark, nor invade the field of orphans." Compare this with Amenemope's "Do not carry off the landmark at the boundaries of the arable land nor disturb the position of the measuring cord." The Israelite sage has modified the saying somewhat to apply to the custom of leaving the gleanings for the poor (Deut 24:19; Ruth 2:1-7). For more detail on the relation of Amenemope to Proverbs, see the commentary below on 22:17–24:22.

Egypt's wisdom schools also produced school texts in praise of scribes (see Sir 39:1-11), name lists and classifications of all kinds of things (see the claim for Solomon in 1 Kgs 5:13), pessimistic reflections on life (see Job and Qoheleth), and even a story of honesty and uprightness threatened by lust (the Story of Two Brothers) that became the model for Joseph tempted by Potiphar's wife in Gen 39:1-20.

In Sumeria and Babylonia the wisdom tradition was just as developed as in Egypt. Sumerian proverb collections date before 2000

B.C.E. and many of their sayings sound like counterparts in Israel. "While your glance flits to it [wealth], it is gone! for assuredly it grows wings, like the eagle" (Prov 23:5) is similar in message to the Sumerian adage "Possessions are sparrows in flight that find no place to land." Interestingly, the Sumerian editors collected their proverbs by topic, while it is very difficult to find any order in Israel's collections. Also, the Sumerians favored nature images and offered a minimum of moral judgment. In this, too, they differed from Israel.

Babylon produced a great number of works dealing with questions of human life. The poem I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom (in Babylonian, the Ludlul bel nemeqi) grappled with the question of why the gods allowed undeserved suffering. It is sometimes called "the Babylonian Job." Other works explore the question of meaninglessness, and there is even a Dialogue of Pessimism between a man and his slave, ending with a hint of suicide. A work popularly known as the "Babylonian Qoheleth" also explores the problems of theodicy (God's treatment of the innocent sufferer).

Whereas Sumerian proverbs had a harsh side to them—the forces of nature can be brutal and indiscriminate, and so can the gods—Babylonian wisdom tried to grapple with the uncertainties of life and to reconcile the contradictions of experience. They accented the need to understand the universe in terms of moral laws that would guide human behavior. Thus they could produce many reflective proverbs that are not unlike those favored by the sages in the Book of Proverbs. "What your eyes have seen bring not forth hastily against an opponent; for what will you do later on when your neighbor puts you to shame?" (Prov 25:8) is not far from the advice of the Babylonian Counsels of Wisdom, "Do not frequent a law court . . . . for in the dispute they will have you as a testifier, and you will be made their witness and they will bring you into a lawsuit not your own to affirm."

Egyptian, Mesopotamian, and Israelite wisdom generally agreed that traditional wisdom, passed down from long ago, had a special value that no individual could match by a single lifetime of experience. Almost all known works emphasized the importance of sitting at the feet of a father or teacher and learning from the past. The introduction to the Wisdom of Shuruppak, a Sumerian work, is typical:

> (Shuruppak) offered instructions to his son. . . .
>
> Oh, my (son), instruction I offer you, take my instruction. . . .
>
> My instruction do not neglect, my spoken word do not transgress.

Since both Mesopotamian and Egyptian wisdom writings were well established and highly developed long before Israel existed as a nation, we must conclude that their influence on later Israelite thinking was very deep.

Wisdom's two ways

The Greek philosopher Protagoras said that "man is the measure of all things." The ancient wisdom teachers of the East would have agreed that this is the starting point for the analysis of experience. While the sages were not truly philosophers in the modern sense of seeking a systematic explanation of the first principles of reality, they were keen observers of the world in which they lived and attempted to find patterns and predictable events that would help humans cope with that world. We must remember that they knew little about the causes of disease and sickness, about the causes of weather conditions, and about the extent of civilization except what was nearby. This meant that they could do little to prevent disfiguring diseases or to cure them, to stop floods or predict droughts, to understand the strange ways of far-off peoples. The physical world in which they lived was much more uncertain, and therefore more frightening, than ours. But it was just as interesting, and the curiosity of the wisdom teachers constantly sought interlinking connections between things. Despite the uncertainties, they were convinced that the world is orderly and can be understood well enough to allow the formation of norms for moral behavior.

The wise would observe, classify, reflect, make comparisons and analogies, and finally draw conclusions for daily behavior. Wisdom oriented its disciples to the good order of the universe, whether called maat in Egypt, ME in Babylon, or sedeqah in Israel. Common observation usually supported a world of order—the sun rises and sets daily, the seasons are predictable, but human certainty was also tied to faith in the divine order of creation. The cause of this certainty lay in the goodness of the gods and their plan for the universe. Only the gods fully understood such a plan, but humans could learn of it in a limited way and act accordingly. Thus on one level ancient wisdom was extremely confident and positive about life and the human ability to live successfully according to divine order. The use of proverbs—short sayings that capture the essence of right behavior—reflects this attitude.

On the other hand, tension developed between what was deduced as good order and passed on as true, and people's day-to-day experience of failure and uncertainty. In contrast to the confident wisdom of Proverbs and Sirach, a second stream of skeptical and questioning reflection developed. It wrestled with the human pain and suffering that arose from not understanding why life was often inconsistent with the beliefs based on divine good order. The Books of Job and Qoheleth are vehement at times in their challenges to traditional wisdom. They fully question our capacity to know and understand why nature acts the way it does and what God intends for us to do. Both propose solutions that rely more on a personal relationship with God than on an understanding of reality. Of course, both Job and Qoheleth also begin with experience and use its discovered regularity to present their cases; they only deny its ultimate ability to explain the purpose for which God acts.

Israel's wisdom teachers tried to solve the tension by more and more affirming that there are limits to what humans can know. Sir 3:20 advises, "What is too sublime for you, seek not," while 3:21 adds, "what is hidden is not your concern." God always lets us know enough by which to direct our lives, but the ultimate meaning of each life is hidden in the silence of the divine purpose. In this, wisdom rejoins the faith proclamations of the Law and the Prophets.

The cosmic horizon

Experience is both highly personal and often impersonal. When bad or good fortune happens to me alone, I turn to the intimacy of prayer to praise God or to beg help; but many events, such as war, natural disasters, the oddities of strange animals, or the regularity of the seasons, have little to do with me personally and raise larger questions about the universe as a whole. It is not at all surprising that wisdom gave great attention to cosmic origins and the wonder of creation itself.

While Israel's Mosaic faith stressed personal salvation by Yahweh for the people, its wisdom circles based their discoveries on the order to be found in the very plan of creation. Hymns in praise of the divine goodness and majesty of God revealed in creation fill the wisdom tradition. Job 28, Prov 8, Sir 16 and 43, and Wis 7 all identify wisdom with the vast and incomprehensible greatness of creation itself. Passages in other parts of the Old Testament (Gen 1, Ezek 28, Isa 40, Ps 8) also praise creation as a sign of God's greatness, but nowhere does it play such a central role in our approach to God as it does in the wisdom tradition. Indeed, many if not all of these other passages may be influenced by wisdom. Even in the short sayings of Proverbs, the Creator plays a focusing role (Prov 14:31; 17:5; Eccl 12:1).

This emphasis on creation places wisdom in the stream of Ancient Near Eastern religion, especially Mesopotamian, in which cultic practice centered on a return to the right order and perfect goodness of the first creation by the gods. The pagan peoples tried to erase the time in between then and now—the sin and the failure—and to restore the wholeness and vitality of that first moment. To a certain extent, Babylonian religion was an escape from the present time to a timeless, ideal world by means of cult.

Israel's attitude differed profoundly on that point. It was convinced that time moved on and one could never return to what was lost. But God would always act again to heal, rebuild, or re-bless the world, and one could trust God completely because God acts unfailingly out of innate goodness. In Gen 1–3 this conviction is expressed by God's blessing of the first humans, their rejection of the blessing, and the divine re-blessing without completely restoring what they had lost. It is expressed in the faith proclamations of the covenant, where God's fidelity to the promise endures despite Israel's infidelity. And it is expressed in wisdom by appealing to the divine act of creation as a source of understanding the goodness of the world. The beauty of divine order and harmony is revealed to our intelligence by reflecting on creation, and although we cannot fully grasp its meaning, it shows us the basic options before us: the way of goodness or evil, the way of the wise or the fool; the attitudes of humility or human arrogance. These themes are treated more fully in the commentary on the Book of Proverbs that follows.

Late wisdom, reflected in Sirach and the Wisdom of Solomon, brings faith and creation reflections closer together by affirming that God as Creator is only fully known through obedience to the law (see especially Sir 24 and Wis 18–19).

Where does wisdom find its home?

Scholars have argued for several different sources of the wisdom tradition. One that appears frequently behind proverbial sayings is the family. Many proverbs are directed explicitly from father to son (Prov 1:8; 2:1; 10:1) or from mother to son (Prov 31:1-2). But more than that, a significant number of maxims are directed to questions of relations between parents and children, moral instruction of the young, and family manners. Prov 19:26 warns, "He who mistreats his father, or drives away his mother, is a worthless and disgraceful son"; and 20:11, "Even by his manners the child betrays whether his conduct is innocent and right."

Although everyone agrees that some education had to take place at home, not all believe that Israelites attended formal schools. But the many references to masters as "fathers" in Proverbs, as well as the widespread existence of schools in Egypt and Mesopotamia, suggest that Israel, too, had programs of education that at least some boys attended over many years. These included learning the alphabet, followed by writing and mastering short proverbs, and finally studying longer works of literature. The foreword to the Book of Sirach, written about 132 B.C.E., gives one account: ". . . my grandfather Jesus [ben Sira], who, having devoted himself for a long time to the diligent study of the law, the prophets, and the rest of the books of our ancestors, and having developed a thorough familiarity with them, was moved to write something himself in the nature of instruction and wisdom . . . ." This formal education was probably aimed at developing a professional class of scribes and bureaucrats who would serve administrative functions in the temple, the royal government, and houses of business. There are many examples of Sumerian and Egyptian essays in praise of the scribal profession as the highest in the land. A similar passage can be found in the Bible in Sir 38:24–39:11, and there are many hints at the importance of the scribe elsewhere (1 Chr 27:32-33; Isa 8:16; Jer 26:1-21).

Above all, wisdom in the Ancient Near East was associated with kings and royal administration. David is called wise in 2 Sam 14:20, and Solomon's wisdom is described in detail throughout 1 Kgs 3–11. Prov 25:2 declares, "God has glory in what he conceals, kings have glory in what they fathom." 1 Kgs 5:9-14 declares of him:

> God gave Solomon wisdom and exceptional understanding and knowledge, as vast as the sand on the seashore. Solomon surpassed all the Cedemites and all the Egyptians in wisdom. He was wiser than all other men—than Ethan the Ezrahite, or Heman, Chalcol, and Darda, the musicians—and his fame spread throughout the neighboring nations. Solomon also uttered three thousand proverbs, and his songs numbered a thousand and five. He discussed plants, from the cedar on Lebanon to the hyssop growing out of the wall, and he spoke about beasts, birds, reptiles, and fishes. Men came to hear Solomon's wisdom from all the nations, sent by all the kings of the earth who had heard of his wisdom.

This tradition attributes encyclopedic knowledge to the king, as well as the ability to rule successfully and to make good judgment (1 Kgs 3). But kings gathered around themselves skilled advisors to assure that they did as well as possible (see 2 Sam 16:15–17:23; 1 Chr 27:32-33; 1 Kgs 12:6-7; Jer 8:8-9; Isa 31:1-3). The Books of Daniel and Esther portray the royal courts of the Babylonians and Persians filled with wise counselors of the kings. Still other passages in the Bible refer to the fame of sages in the courts of the kings of Edom and Assyria (see Ezek 28:3-4; Jer 49:7).

When David created his empire, he brought Israel from local tribal organization to world power overnight. He needed diplomats, administrators, and recordkeepers quickly. This necessitated borrowing the techniques of neighboring kingdoms, especially Egypt. Under his son Solomon this training became well established, and a burst of literary activity took place, including the first writing down of Israel's religious traditions by the Yahwist, the historical accounts of David's own rise to power, and the cultivation of wisdom as an art. Even the titles of Solomon's government officials—"the one over the house," the secretary, and the herald (1 Kgs 4:1-6)—are borrowed from the top offices in Egypt, corresponding to vizier, royal scribe, and royal announcer. In this situation, schools for the gifted would have flourished. An Israelite youth chosen to study would have seconded the enthusiastic cry of an Egyptian scribe, Duauf: "The scribe—every position at court is open to him!"

There is no statement in the Old Testament that actually says someone made a living as a teacher of wisdom, but it is highly probable. Jeremiah mentions the wise on the same footing as the priest and the prophet: "Come," they said, "let us contrive a plot against Jeremiah. It will not mean the loss of instruction from the priests, nor of counsel from the wise, nor of messages from the prophets" (Jer 18:18).

Although it may be hard to show a full profile of the professional wise person functioning outside of a political role in the palace, there are enough hints in the Scriptures to put together a reasonable sketch. The philosophy of life found in the Book of Proverbs often reflects the concerns of the wealthy and those with leisure time for study. The emphasis on good speech, writing skills, proper manners, and money lending describes a ruling elite rather than the farming or laborer class. The conservative bent of proverbial wisdom is sometimes attributed to the "haves," who value political stability above everything. Thus the wisdom teacher ran classes for upper-class youths. One proverb seems to imply that the wealthy families paid the teacher directly: "Of what use in a fool's hands are the means to buy wisdom, since he has no mind for it?" (Prov 17:16).

The methods of the wise

Part of the task of education was to memorize the valuable teachings of the past; another part was to learn to reason and make associations. To achieve these goals, the sages perfected many distinctive literary forms, the chief of which were the proverb and the comparison. Since education was for the most part oral, one can well imagine the teacher asking the students questions, and the students answering according to set keys that aided their memories. In light of this, it is surprising how few riddles and fables are found in Hebrew literature. The wisdom teachings of Mesopotamia favored both as teaching aids, but only one or two fables occur in the Old Testament (Judg 9:8-15; Ezek 19:10-14) and a single complete riddle (Judg 14:12-18). The small collection of numerical sayings in Prov 30:15-33 may originally have been riddles, but they now appear in the text as proverbial observations on life.

The proverb was an important element in Israelite wisdom because it distilled the lessons of the past in a clever, practical manner, with a touch of the sermon, and in easily remembered form. The popularity of the proverb in Israel was due to its ability to capture both the most commonplace insight into daily life and the most difficult problem of experience in new and interesting ways. In the same way, the comparison forced the hearer to make analogies between what was observed in the animal or plant world and human behavior. Neither proverb nor comparison hoped to explain reality fully, but by collecting insights side by side, a richer and more varied picture would emerge.

This search for the multiple faces of life also helps to explain the other literary genres favored by the wisdom schools. They are mostly non-dogmatic and yet educational. The way of wisdom was persuasion, not command, and so the more important genres include allegory (Prov 5:15-23; Eccl 12:1-6); numerical sayings (Prov 6:16-19; 30:15-33; Sir 25:7-11); onomastica (that is, name lists: Ezek 27:12-25; Sir 24:13-17; hymns (Prov 8:22-31; Job 28; Sir 24); dialogues (Job); beatitudes ("Blessed is the one who . . .": Prov 3:13; 8:32ff.; 14:21; 16:20; Eccl 10:17; Sir 14:1-2); question and answer formats, especially rhetorical questions (Qoheleth); confessions of praise (Sir 33:16-18; 51:13-22); partial riddles (Sir 39:3; Wis 8:8); quotations used as departure for reflections (Eccl 4:8; 10:18; 11:1; 7:3-4; 10:2); and philosophical reflections (Wisdom of Solomon). When not using one of the more clever literary forms, the wisdom writers fell back on the straightforward instruction, a form borrowed from the Egyptians (Prov 1–9).

Because the wisdom schools developed such effective methods of educating people, the prophets often borrowed their techniques. The rhetorical question was a favorite of the major prophets, particularly Isaiah, as was the dialogue between God and prophet (see especially the so-called Confessions of Jeremiah in Jer. 12, 15, 17, 18 and 20). Some prophets, notably Ezekiel, loved the parable and the metaphor as ways to make a point (see Ezek 16, 17, 19, 23, 29, 30, 31, and 32). Amos used the numerical saying as a dramatic device (Amos 1:3–2:6). But whereas wisdom employed these means to open young minds to the world around them, the prophets used them to challenge people's understanding of the covenant. The introduction to the Book of Proverbs (p. 646) discusses many of these in greater detail.

A brief survey of the wisdom books

Solomon's reputation for wisdom was so great in Israel that he was believed to have been the author of the Books of Proverbs and Qoheleth, the Song of Songs, and the Wisdom of Solomon. An amusing legend in the Talmud tells how the great king had written the Song of Songs in his lusty youth, Proverbs in mature middle age, and Qoheleth in his skeptical old age! Proverbs is treated fully in the following commentary, but a brief overview of the other major wisdom books at this point will help to understand their interrelationships.

—Job. The Book of Job uses an old folk tale about an absolutely righteous man who proves faithful under severe trials (chs. 1–2; 42) as the framework for a great dialogue on the question of human suffering and the problem of the human search for personal knowledge of the transcendent God (chs. 3–41). It has many elements of drama, with the outcome uncertain until the end. The Job of the dialogues is neither the patient sufferer of tradition nor the prayerful accepter of his fate found in the folk tale. Instead, the author (seventh or sixth century B.C.E.) had the courage to move beyond simple acceptance of God's will to ask hard questions of the traditional and sometimes overconfident wisdom presented by proverbs and instructions. If God always cares for the just, why do the wicked seem to prosper? Why do the innocent suffer? What hope does uprightness offer?

The book also explores the deeper question of how one can know God. Many of Job's complaints deal with the silence of God before the human search for justice and faithfulness. The divine answer, when it comes, denies us any claim to a relationship with God based on our justice but calls for personal knowledge through obedience and reverent worship. As Job finally admits, "I had heard of you by word of mouth, but now my eye has seen you" (Job 42:5). Job's questions are also well known in Babylonian wisdom literature, but the author of Job situates the answer within Israel's commitment to Yahweh's personal self-revelation to them. Job in many ways resembles the psalms of lament with their threefold structure: (1) a cry of pain and lament; (2) a call to God for help; (3) a promise to praise God forever. Job teaches us that ultimately from the midst of doubt and questioning comes trust.

—Qoheleth. The author of this book is the most skeptical writer in the Bible. Like Job, he challenges the traditional certainties of wisdom, examining the same world of experience. "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," he begins, and he ends no more convinced. It is not for us to understand the meaning of life or to figure out the divine purpose behind events, especially success and failure, reward and punishment of moral behavior, or finally death itself. Instead the writer highlights the transcendence of God, the need to recognize limits to human wisdom, and the ability to accept life as it comes, bearing its pains and enjoying its pleasures in moderation (Eccl 5:17). Everything has a proper time (Eccl 3:2), but it is known only to God in its fullness. Qoheleth's advice to enjoy life as it is given may not seem very religious, but he tempers it with warnings to "fear God" (Eccl 5:6). The outlook is far more pessimistic than that of the optimistic Book of Proverbs, but it stands clearly in the tradition of searching questions directed to all creation on the problems of human justice, the existence of evil, life and death.

—Sirach. Written in the early second century B.C.E., the Wisdom of Jesus ben Sira most resembles the positive outlook of Proverbs. It gathers advice on all the traditional subjects of wisdom by theme and sets them out as a guidebook for young students who want to obtain wisdom. Although wisdom can be attained by study, it is meant to serve as guidelines for human conduct, not as speculation. Sirach makes a special point of identifying sage advice with the religious practices of Judaism, especially linking wisdom with the law of Moses (ch. 24). Wisdom is thus a divine gift to Israel in a unique way. Even more so than for Proverbs, "fear of the Lord" is the way of wisdom. The achievements of the teachers can only be rightly appreciated in the light of divine revelation. Because of its late date, the Book of Sirach was never accepted into the Hebrew canon, but became a favorite part of the Christian Scriptures—hence the later name, Ecclesiasticus, the "church book."

—Wisdom of Solomon. This may be the latest book in the Old Testament and reflects a reaction to Greek philosophy in Alexandria and its challenges to Jewish faith during the first century B.C.E. Because of its date and the Greek language in which it was written, it never entered the Hebrew canon. The main purpose of the book is to reassure the Jewish community in Egypt that keeping their faith is worthwhile despite the hardships met in a pagan culture. It borrows the language of philosophy to achieve this goal. But it also stands out from earlier wisdom books by its intense concern with (1) salvation history as a lesson directed to the wise, and (2) immortality as an explanation of God's care for the suffering of the just. While it stands in the optimistic tradition of Proverbs and Sirach, it often makes wisdom so abstract that it obscures any practical value for living (see 7:22-25). But it does manifest the ability of Jewish wisdom to creatively meet the challenge of Hellenistic thinking.

—Song of Songs. It is hard to know where to put the Song of Songs among the biblical books. It is frequently included among the wisdom writings because its message is interpreted as an allegory of Israel's loving relationship to Yahweh. Although most scholars today admit that it began as a collection of down-to-earth love songs composed for weddings, it has had a long history of development before reaching its present form. There may have been a stage of application to royal weddings (see Psalm 45), which would have given the songs a religious setting. In any case, it has always invited reflection on the wonder and beauty of divine creation, the mystery of divine (and human) love, and the ramifications of relationships built on the covenant. It uses the dialogue form, which is one of the techniques preferred by wisdom teachers as a way of challenging students to think. The Song of Songs probably received its final editing after the Exile in circles that knew the wisdom traditions of Job, Qoheleth, and Proverbs well.

—Wisdom Psalms. No two lists agree on how many psalms belong to the category of wisdom. The problem is deciding on the criteria. The most certain criteria are: (1) the reflective contrast between the just and the wicked person, or between the wise and the foolish—Psalms 1, 34, 37, 49, 73, and 112 all qualify on this ground; (2) the use of special wisdom expressions such as "happy is the one who . . ." or the "fear of the Lord," as in Psalms 32, 111, and 128. Many other psalms make use of wisdom themes but put their major emphasis elsewhere.

The achievement of wisdom

Biblical theology usually gives much less attention to wisdom than it does to the prophets, the history of salvation, or the legal material. Yet wisdom was important through all of Israel's history. Before prophecy was born, wisdom had a long tradition behind it. The prophets themselves often borrowed wisdom's insights and expressions; and when prophecy failed, in the period after the Exile, wisdom was just reaching its peak. Its international character allowed it to bring the best of other cultures into Israel's thinking and gave a broader context to the special covenant theology that prevented a too nationalistic and too narrow idea of God's will.

Some of the major contributions of wisdom thinking to Israel's religion were:

1) Emphasis on cause and effect. Acts have consequences, and moral decisions can never be made outside the context of social responsibility and the experience of others before us. Often much that is unexplainable can be partially explained by analogies with common experience.

2) Appreciation of time. Israel did not strive to erase time and return to origins. Time moved on and God always acted with the present and future in view. This gave Israel a true sense of history and a confidence that God would always act again. At the same time, Israel could not hope to control the cycle of time by cult or magic as the pagans did; rather, God alone knew the times and controlled the future.

3) Confidence in order. Wisdom believed in the empirical search for the hidden order of divine purpose in the world. It could be studied and reflected upon, and could provide guidelines for conduct. While wisdom therefore gave great value to tradition, it also provided Israelite faith with the confidence to make new applications in changed situations throughout its history.

4) God revealed in creation. The Mosaic law and the prophets brought Israel an awareness of God as a personal savior, but wisdom opened up the more universal dimension of Yahweh as the Creator and the only God by pointing to the order and beauty of creation and the divine will revealed in it. It also gave emphasis to the positive role of human understanding and management of the world.

5) Humans as responsible. Wisdom is often accused of having a theology of God's justice but none of divine mercy until the latest periods (Sirach). This is not entirely true. Whereas the prophets stressed mercy after sin, wisdom stressed the continuity of God's creation, so that after misfortune or failure there was another chance. More than that, humans share the creative power of God and must exercise it responsibly and prudently according to wisdom.

6) Personification of wisdom. Several passages treat wisdom as though it were an independent being close to God (Prov 1:20-33; 8:22-31; Sir 24:1-31; Wis 9:9-11). This is primarily a literary device to express how the transcendent God becomes present in a personal and immanent way by communicating himself to our intelligence, understanding, and faith. Without this development, Christianity's theology of Jesus as Son of God and Word-made-flesh could not have found such expression.

7) Wisdom as divine gift. While wisdom put high value on human reasoning, it more and more refined its understanding of the limits of human knowledge to give greater emphasis to the divine initiative. Knowing God and divine revelation gave light to human understanding, light unattainable by experience of the world alone. Wisdom was always ethical in orientation, but it developed a richer stance in which religious knowledge and ethics worked as one.

8) The meaning of suffering. Based on experience and reflection, wisdom wrestled with the challenge of suffering and offered several answers that could guide practical decisions of sufferers. None were very adequate (evil as the result of sin, a testing from God, a disciplinary correction of our faults), but neither are most modern answers. It rejected pagan responses of magical protection or legitimate despair and placed evil firmly in the area of ethics. Whatever the reason for a particular evil, the results are always in the hand of a just and merciful God who listens.

9) Trust as the basic virtue. Wisdom recognized its limits and emphasized that trust is the basic virtue of the wise. Experience is often paradoxical and seemingly contradictory; fundamental questions of life and death are beyond our control, and God cannot be made to conform to our expectations. Thus the ultimate wisdom looks ahead confidently and bases reasonable hopes and responsible decisions on a firm commitment to Yahweh for better or for worse.

10) The value of community. This may seem a strange claim to give wisdom, which so often highlights the individual struggle for growth. But it is deserved in the sense that wisdom's concern with the universal human pool of knowledge led it to value other peoples and their contributions, the power of communication and dialogue through words, listening and respecting other opinions, and the need for justice, honesty, and integrity in human dealings. The vision that combined social interdependence and individual worth is far more highly developed in the wisdom writings than in other parts of Scripture.

Wisdom does not stand opposed, therefore, to the teachings of the Pentateuch or the Prophets but serves to unite the teachings of revelation and the obedience demanded by faith with the practical experience of everyday reality in order to enrich both.

Wisdom's relevance today

Religious faith in the modern world has come under increasing pressure from the expansion of human knowledge. Areas of life that were once considered the inviolable preserve of divine action alone are now open to human investigation and even management.

Travel in space, prolongation of life, the creation of human embryos in test tubes, and even genetic engineering of the individual touch on areas that traditional wisdom reserved to the mystery of divine purpose. These are on top of human victories in understanding the factors of climate and weather, the causes of disease and sickness, and the movement of the heavenly bodies that so baffled the ancient thinkers and led them to suggest prayer where human knowledge failed. Many people in our culture no longer see how God impinges on daily life in any meaningful way; their outlook has been, de facto, totally secularized, even if they still nominally profess to believe in God. Their world is a world of human control, and human decisions are all that matter.

Many others, experiencing the horrors of modern war and aggression or living through a personal tragedy of disease or sudden death in the family, wonder why God is silent when most needed. They question the value of creeds and biblical laws, elaborate religious worship, and the theologies of the churches when God seems so distant from human affairs and so unnecessary to solving our worldly problems.

It is here that wisdom has the most to say to us. On the one hand, it affirms that the order, goodness, and beauty of the universe we have discovered and mastered by our powers are really an unfolding of God's own designs. Humans are created in the image of God and given dominion over the universe to govern it wisely by the powers of understanding, prudence, and verbal skills with which God has endowed them. On the other hand, as our own understanding of the world deepens, the wisdom literature assures us that it is natural and permissible to question and to doubt along the way. Job and Qoheleth proclaim that questioning the hidden God often helps us understand better that even in silence God is present.

Above all, wisdom both encourages us to use our human power of reflection and questioning and warns us that today, just as much as in Old Testament times, we run the risk of human pride claiming too much for itself and foolishly, even arrogantly, rushing us toward the destruction of God's good creation.

PROVERBS

Lawrence E. Boadt, C.S.P.

INTRODUCTION

The structure of the book

Proverbs has nine different divisions of varying length. The shortest is seven verses, the longest, thirteen chapters.

1:1-7	Title and general introduction to the whole book
1:8-9:18	The instruction of a wisdom teacher
10:1-22:16	The collected "Proverbs of Solomon"
22:17-24:22	The "Words of the Wise"
24:23-34	Additional "Words of the Wise"
25:1-29:27	Proverbs of Solomon collected under Hezekiah
30:1-33	The collected Words of Agur
31:1-9	The collected Words of Lemuel
31:10-31	"The ideal woman": an appendix to Lemuel

These divisions in turn may well include smaller collections that once stood by themselves, for example 25:2-27 or the group of numerical sayings in 30:10-33. What strikes us immediately, of course, is that this book is a collection of collections. It is substantially different from most other books of the Bible because of the brevity of its single units. The section from 10:1 to 22:16, for example, contains 375 individual proverbs. Even the longest unit, the poem of Wisdom personified as a woman in chapter 8, seems more a series of separate commands and a litany of titles than a strictly integrated work of art. Sayings often stand side by side with no apparent connection to one another. Thus, "Do you see a man hasty in his words? More can be hoped for from a fool!" in 29:20 is followed by: "If a man pampers his servant from childhood, he will turn out to be stubborn." Both are good advice in different circumstances. One can only wonder what brought them together at this point in the text. As a result, many scholars believe that there is no real order in the Book of Proverbs. They suggest that the separate collections were gathered up over a long period of time and loosely joined together by means of the editorial headings that begin each section.

That is far too negative a view, however. While no one denies that many of the short sayings were originally written down as remembered and not necessarily arranged in a set order, signs of organization are everywhere in the book. The instructions of Lady Wisdom in chapters 1-9 clearly parallel the ideal women of chapter 31. The "Words of the Wise" in 22:17-24:23 are modeled on and match the "Thirty Sayings of Amenemope" from Egyptian wisdom literature. And the introductory preface in 1:1-7 sets a clear course that governs the purpose of the whole book. Proverbs is not a novel with a single, carefully written, very dramatic plot, but, as the comments that follow will show, the editors and collectors of Israel's wisdom certainly intended to present a theology in which the great educational tradition of the wise could be understood.

Literary characteristics of the Book of Proverbs

There are two main types of material in the Book of Proverbs. The first is the proverb proper, and the second is the instruction. Other literary forms also occur here and there but are quite subordinate to the main two. These less frequent genres include riddles, prophetic urgings, admonitions or warnings, personified self-praise, and extended metaphors or model stories. These are discussed where they occur in the text.

—The Proverb. While almost all people recognize a proverbial statement when they hear one, few agree on a definition. The most common characteristics include (1) brevity, (2) cleverness, (3) memorable form, (4) rootedness in experience, (5) universal truth, (6) practical aim, and (7) long use (traditional origin). The first three deal with the form, the last four with the content. Thus the proverb is almost always described as poetic or metrical, with terse, vigorous, forceful, striking imagery. Its style is easy to remember and may have originated in oral societies before writing was common.

The content, on the other hand, is often paradoxical at first sight. Proverbs combine real experience of the concrete with general applications to all times and situations. This makes them partially true and partially false at the same time. What one does at one moment may be all wrong at the next. It is no accident that the Book of Proverbs can place contradictory sayings side by side as in 26:4-5: "Answer not the fool according to his folly, lest you too become like him," and "Answer the fool according to his folly, lest he become wise in his own eyes." No generalization ever captures all the human experience for every occasion. The very nature of a proverb forces the hearer or reader to ask, "How does this so-called truth apply to me?" The better the proverb, the more questions it raises along with its apparent answers.

Some writers distinguish between a proverb, which has roots in the common people's usage over many, many years and whose origins are unknown, and an aphorism, a clever saying invented by a well-known literary figure.

The Ancient Near East was a much more traditional society than modern society, and proverbs are found in all the ancient civilizations, almost always presented anonymously as the lessons of past generations to the youth of today. Israel shared this view completely, and this fact, together with a common tradition of poetic expression, shared cultural values, and identical experience of coping to survive in similar geography makes Israel's Proverbs appear more like the proverbs of Egypt, Sumeria, or Babylon than many modern Jews and Christians feel comfortable with.

—The Instruction. Chapters 1-9; 22:17-24:23; and possibly 31:10-31 can be best compared to the well-known Egyptian wisdom form called "Instruction," which is usually framed as the legacy of a father to his son and includes commands and prohibitions along with the reasons why they should be heeded (the motivation for obeying). A number of plain proverbs and warnings are thrown in as well. It usually begins with a call, "Listen, my son . . ." The most notable features of this particular kind of wisdom literature are the absolute authority of the father or teacher and the belief that such wisdom can be learned by hearing and doing it. The instructor does not appeal beyond experience nor expect the student to question the truth of the teaching. At the same time, the teacher shows no doubt whatever that the student can master the lesson by understanding and obeying it. Such teaching was based on the conviction that the world is ordered by maat, the concept of divine right order (often a goddess), and that the good person can live according to that order and attain success by proper conduct.

Israel saw much of value in this view and made use of the ideas of (1) instruction or discipline (used often, beginning in Prov 1:2); (2) the contrast in the ways of the righteous and the wicked; (3) the conviction that evil deeds reap retribution; and (4) the belief that self-control is essential to success. But while Egyptian literary works such as Amenemope and Ptah-hotep were written only for the professional training of court scribes, Israel's Proverbs opened up the ideal to every youth. What may have started as an elite school program was broadened to become a religious ideal of wisdom for the nation, parallel to the Law and the Prophets.

The artistic beauty of Proverbs

The word for "proverb" in the title of the book, "The Proverbs of Solomon," comes from mashal, the Hebrew word for "likeness" or "comparison." But mashal has a much wider meaning in the Bible than merely "proverb." It is used in Ezekiel of allegories and stories (Ezek 17:2; 24:3) as well as of short maxims (18:2; 16:44). In several prophetic passages it refers to a taunt song or mocking image (Isa 14:4; Jer 24:9; Mic 2:4). In each case a lesson is to be learned, and so the best interpretation of the term used as a title for the whole Book of Proverbs might be "paradigms," "models," or "examples," as many authors suggest, but always as a work of art. The mashal is the product of the skill of the poet and gains acceptance because of its pleasing use of language and imagery.

The chief artistic device is, of course, the good comparison. Often the images are drawn from nature or family life. The aim is to find just the right metaphor or analogy from ordinary experience to capture the extraordinary lesson in the proverb. Thus, in order to describe the evil charms of an adulteress, the teachers compared them to honey-sweet tidbits that cause terrible stomach aches (Prov 5:3-4). Another well-loved tradition was the contrast between the lazy person and the ant. How demeaning to realize that even an ant is better than that (6:6-11)!

More specifically, most of the actual proverbial sayings and many of the instructions in the book are fashioned according to classical Hebrew poetry, with two parallel parts to each verse. This parallelism, or better, use of balanced lines, is the most easily recognized element in biblical poetry. The major types of parallelism employed make the second half of the line say either the same or the opposite of the first half, or else elaborate a part of the first half. These are called:

1) synonymous parallelism:

"Even in laughter the heart may be sad, and the end of joy may be sorrow."
(Prov 14:13)

2) antithetic parallelism:

"The memory of the just will be blessed, but the name of the wicked will rot." (Prov 10:7)

3) synthetic parallelism:

"Entrust your works to the Lord, and your plans will succeed."
(Prov 16:3)

In this last case, the second part describes the results of the first action, thus extending the scope of the message instead of repeating it. Other variations occur occasionally, such as:

4) "better than" comparisons:

"Better a dish of herbs where love is than a fatted ox and hatred with it."
(Prov 15:17)

5) comparisons:

"Like golden apples in silver settings are words spoken at the proper time." (Prov 25:11)

6) numerical series:

"Three things are never satisfied,
four never say, 'Enough!'
The nether world, and the barren womb;
the earth that is never saturated with water, and fire, that never says 'Enough!' "
(Prov 30:15-16)

In all these examples a balance is created between the first and second half of a thought. Usually it is expressed in a regular three-beat-plus-three-beat meter that gives the poetry both solemnity and weight:

"The-glóry of-young-men is-their-strength
And-the dignity of-old-men is-grey-hair"
(Prov 20:29).

Other poetic devices are also used for effect: rhetorical questions (6:9; 23:29); hyperbole (2:18; 5:5); fables (6:6-8); irony (19:24; 23:27; 26:13-15); chiasmus (1:16, 29; 2:16); alliteration (13:3, 14); puns (13:20; 23:5); and acrostics (31:10-31—each line begins with the next letter of the alphabet in order). Naturally the last four poetic techniques only appear in the original Hebrew and do not show up in our English translations. How much richer our appreciation would be if we all read Hebrew!

Purpose of the Book of Proverbs

While the Torah and the Prophets stress faith and obedience, wisdom, especially the Book of Proverbs, stresses understanding and obedience. The two poles within which it moves are clearly the intellectual and the ethical. Since the ancient Israelite considered the heart to be the seat of thinking and reasoning as well as of decision, it is to the heart that the teaching of Proverbs is directed. An Israelite would agree with Socrates' maxim "The unexamined life is not worth living." But unlike the great Greek philosopher who asked about the ultimate meaning and nature of life itself, the Israelite sages sought the practical results. They wanted to know how behavior affected the life a person led. They insisted upon reflection as the key to understanding, but theirs was not truly a philosophical outlook in the Greek tradition that asks about the origin and why of things. Instead they examined human experience as a series of many different actions that must be sorted out, classified, and their results evaluated. This could not be done by one generation, but required the cumulative verification of many centuries. Thus, while proverbial wisdom is very particular about life, it often seems somewhat rigid and unbending in its conclusions. What is the same about life always appeared more important than what varied or did not fit established patterns.

The purpose of proverbial wisdom in Israel can be summed up in one word: education. Many proverbs originated in family and tribal education of youth, perhaps long before the nation Israel came into being. One can well imagine the village elders advising young farmers-to-be, "He who tills his own land has food in plenty, but he who follows idle pursuits is a fool" (Prov 12:11). Still other proverbs are the products of formal education, oriented toward professional careers in administrative posts or teaching: "By patience is a ruler persuaded, and a soft tongue will break a bone" (25:15). The chapters belonging to the Instruction genre (1–9 and 22:17–24:22) are almost entirely school lessons, whereas the general collections of proverbs in chapters 10–22 and 25–29 contain many more family or folk proverbs, as well as proverbs that have a general social lesson that may or may not stem from a formal classroom.

The vocabulary of the wise

The subject matter of proverbial wisdom ranges over most of the areas of life also met with in other books of the Bible, except for the cultic or legal aspects of the Pentateuch and the events of Israel's history. Thus we regularly find sentences dealing with poverty and evildoing, with mercy and trustworthiness, themes familiar to us from the prophets and the psalms. But there is a whole body of words that occur again and again in Proverbs (and often in Job or Qoheleth) but are rarely used outside of the wisdom tradition. These will be discussed as they occur in the text, but it is worth listing them here to underline how much wisdom is tied to the intellectual activities of intention, understanding, and thinking.

Wisdom	An overall mastery of life through understanding and successful action.
Discipline	Education with a heavy dose of coercion as well as self-control.
Understanding
Capacity
Counsel	Good advice and critical sharpness.
Prudence	Trained cleverness.
Competence	Successful grasp of affairs.
Political expertise
Resourcefulness
Intelligence
Rebuke

On the negative side, there are special terms for those who reject the learning process or who cannot seem to learn.

Simple	Uneducated and in need of much teaching still.
Fool	Usually lacks self-control and discipline.
Stupid	Intransigently wrong-headed.
Scoffer	One who refuses to listen and reviles the value of wisdom.
Arrogant	Basically conceited and always causing strife.
Godless	No respect for God (found only in 11:9).

Lazy	Lives only for the moment with no thought of tomorrow.
Impious	A stupid person but with a blasphemous attitude.

The theology of Proverbs

The religious teaching of Proverbs reflects a long period of development. Among the lasting values inculcated from the very earliest materials are the ideals of family life and filial obligation, and the absolute place of justice in society. Honesty, truthfulness, and above all integrity are taught in dozens of different ways. Concern for the poor and helpless and the value of hard work are both held up to the reader as good. Self-control and the restraint of desires and passions are a common theme. Also, the contrast between the just person and the wicked is explored again and again. Indeed there is a constant conviction that evil does not go unpunished in the divine order of things, even though in the older wisdom God is not always named as the one who brings justice. In this, Proverbs stands in harmony with the theology of Deuteronomy, which promises blessing for fidelity to Yahweh but curse for infidelity. In many ways this older level of proverbial teaching can be summed up as a guidebook for success in life, where life is seen as divine blessing.

With time the wisdom teachers of Israel drew their lessons ever closer to the specific national traditions of their faith, and much of chapters 1–9 reflects the attempt to identify wisdom with the divine authority of their own God Yahweh. This includes equating wisdom with fear of the Lord (faithful fulfillment of religious duty) in 1:7, 29; 2:5; 9:10; and 31:30; and asserting the divine origin of wisdom before the world began (8:1-36). Many individual proverbs in the great collections of chapters 10–22:16; 22:17–24:22; and 25–29 are directly connected to Yahweh and Yahweh's control of history (see 15:3, 11; 16:1, 4, 9; 19:21; 21:2). All of wisdom is now seen as practical lessons that put us into proper relationship to God as well as to our fellow citizens. The final edition of Proverbs proved to be a great achievement because it united the common wisdom of the Ancient Near East with the special insights of Israel about the God who is really present and caring in the affairs of everyday life.

The final edition

Sumerian proverbs similar to those in the Bible are known in collections as far back as the middle of the third millennium B.C.E. And as discussed in the introduction to wisdom literature, there is good reason to presume that the monarchy of David and Solomon established schools modeled on the wisdom academies in Egypt and to a lesser extent those in Mesopotamia.

Thus we may discern at least three major stages in the formation of the Book of Proverbs. The first is the collection of short proverbs used in traditional teaching of youth, whether in family, village, or tribal settings. Some individual groupings may date back to the time of the Judges or earlier.

A second important stage was the court and temple school founded on Egyptian models in the monarchy period. In this regard, Solomon may indeed have been the original inspiration, although the claim that he authored most of the proverbs in the book is not to be taken at face value. To this period belong the majority of the proverbs and most of the instructions found in chapters 1–9 and 22:17–24:22.

A third stage is represented by the additions and expansions that related these teachings specifically to Yahweh as the single guarantor of world order and justice and as the giver of wisdom to human beings. Not that every mention of Yahweh in individual proverbs is necessarily late. For example, Prov 19:3, "A man's own folly upsets his way, but his heart is resentful against the Lord," is more of an observation on life than a theological attempt to prove that Yahweh is the source of wisdom. But generally proverbs with Yahweh's name (the New American Bible has "the Lord") establish a later context for interpreting the meaning of older wisdom sayings. This level of synthesis and the final editing of the book should be probably dated soon after the Exile, about 500 B.C.E., since the book now conforms well to both the general teaching of Deuteronomy on the right way of life and to the affirmation of the vital creative power of God so evident in the exilic prophet Second Isaiah.

COMMENTARY

PART I: WISDOM'S INSTRUCTIONS

Prov 1:1–9:18

Overall plan

Chapters 1–9 stand apart from the collection of proverbs in chapters 10–22 and 25–30 in several ways. They are first of all written in much longer units than the two-line proverbs that dominate the remaining sections. They are also much more impassioned in tone, more like homilies aimed at persuading young minds of the power of wisdom. And they are not neutral, third-person observations about life and reality as proverbial sayings are, but they frequently address the hearer in the second person and even include long speeches from Wisdom personified as a woman. The arguments and warnings addressed to the seeker after wisdom are bolstered by elaborate motivations and reasons why they should be obeyed and even embraced. These are all characteristics of the international "Instruction" genre of literature (see p. 645). It is aimed at the education of youth, usually for positions as scribes or administrators in government. Chapters 1–9 have broadened this to include all citizens on every corner and in every square of the city (Prov 1:8; 8:1).

There has been much discussion over exactly how many individual instructions can be found in these nine chapters. The structure of the whole is the product of some growth, and clear additions such as 6:1-19 (a group of proverbs) break up and to some extent hide the original plan. Chapters 1–9 certainly were intended as an extended preface to the collected proverbs that follow in 10:1 and the chapters following. The role of wisdom as a speaker in chapters 1 and 8 is essential to the plan, as is the contrast between "Lady Wisdom" and the evil woman who is described sometimes as an adulteress and sometimes as foolishness ("Dame Folly") itself.

Fitting all the instructions into one simple outline has proven a block to all commentators. The number of suggested instructions ranges from seven or eight up to twelve or more. Some scholars have thought that the occurrence of "my son" in direct address marked off the separate passages; but a look at 1:15 will show that some occurrences of this phrase fall in the middle of a speech. The best guide is still the natural sense of when one topic ends and another begins. In this way chapters 1–9 can be divided as follows:

(1:1-7)	(General introduction to the whole book)
1:8-19	First instruction
1:20-33	Wisdom's first speech
2:1-22	Second instruction
3:1-12	Third instruction
3:13-35	Fourth instruction
4:1-9	Fifth instruction
4:10-27	Sixth instruction
5:1-23	Seventh instruction
6:1-19	Proverbial collection (a comment on 5:21-23?)
6:20-35	Eighth instruction
7:1-27	Ninth instruction
8:1-36	Wisdom's second speech
9:1-18	Tenth instruction

As noted in the comments that follow, other structures are also present. Chapter 2 is a theme statement for chapters 3–7, and the first seven instructions together may make up the seven pillars of wisdom's house mentioned in 9:1. But how they developed still remains somewhat of a mystery.

1:1-7 The purpose of the book. What stands out immediately in the search for wisdom is its intellectual quality. It is not vision or smell or skill in a worker's craft that receives praise, but the virtues of studying diligently and developing good judgment. "Discipline" is formal education at the hands of a teacher. It is hard work, requiring lessons and practice. The title announces that what follows are the "proverbs" of the wisest king, Solomon. As pointed out in the introduction (p. 646), the Hebrew sense of mashal means more than a saying—it is a lesson or model to be followed. Thus the special wisdom of leadership and judgment proper to kings is being offered to all who submit to disciplined study. Humans can become wise by learning and are capable of growth in understanding, but never simply on their own.

The "simple" in verse 4 are the unlearned, especially the young, but also those who have never had formal education.

The impression that is left when all the nouns about knowledge are piled up together in these few verses matches the intention of the older Egyptian instructions. The teachers want to impress upon open and promising minds that successful careers in public service demand thinking for both decision-making and dealing with people. This is what we might call "old wisdom," a self-confident, positive reliance on human ability to learn and to master the world. Israel shared this view in part, and many sections of Proverbs breathe just such optimism about gaining wisdom through mental ability.

The intellectual aspect is matched by moral conduct. Verse 3 mentions three important qualities of behavior to be seen frequently in the following chapters: it must be right, just, and honest. The ultimate criterion, however, is summed up in verse 7: fear of the Lord, which is both piety and religious fidelity. Without it the search for wisdom becomes folly (see the comments on 9:6). Possibly, too, the editors sum up the entire contents of the book in verse 6: it contains proverbs (chs. 10–22; 25–29); parables (chs. 1–9); words of the wise (chs. 22–24); and riddles (chs. 30–31).

1:8-19 First instruction: A warning against the wicked. As in Egyptian models, the instruction is framed as the address of a father to his son, or since it is really a metaphor, a teacher to the pupil. The most important lesson for the beginner in wisdom is how easily one can be misled by temptation and seductive arguments to do evil. The only protection is a firm adherence to what has been learned about the right way of acting.

The sinners of verse 10 contemplate violence to gain money or wealth. Perhaps verses 10-12 describe a theft in the planning stages, or better, thoughts of a general life of crime and extortion that will prove very rewarding financially. It does not really matter, since a larger lesson is involved here, illustrated by the reference to the nether world. Because Israel had no concept of an afterlife as a place of happiness and vitality, life was for here and now. To destroy the quality of life of the innocent, to harm them, defraud them, or dishonor them was as good as killing them. It was handing them over to the power of death that would destroy a rich and vibrant life. Sin is service to the powers of death. The more people become involved in evil, the farther from real life they travel. They themselves will soon be trapped in the meshes of death. (See a similar thought in Isa 59:7.)

The image of verse 17 is not clear. It means that the traps set by the wicked will hardly entice a youth into them if they are seen being prepared. But some scholars think that the image says the opposite: some birds are so naive that they go after seed even in an easily visible trap.

The teacher promises that obedient learning at home and school will lead to honor and respect in society. These are the real marks of success, described by the image of the royal crown on the head (v. 9). The whole passage argues from common sense and not from any divine commandment of the Lord. It is old wisdom at its best.

1:20-33 Wisdom's first speech: an invitation scorned. The previous section argued from reason; now the authors present Wisdom speaking as a prophet. She calls aloud in public places, as did the classical prophets (Jer 11:6; Isa 58:1), to persuade people to convert their hearts to Yahweh. Verse 32 suggests that the people's "turning away" ("self-will" misses the point) will be the reason for their condemnation, as will be their rejection of Yahweh's "spirit." Both ideas are common in the prophets (see Jer 2:19; 8:5; Hos 11:7 for "turning away," and Isa 40:13; 44:3; 61:1; Ezek 11:5; Mic 2:7; Joel 3:1 for the divine spirit).

In many ways Wisdom is modeled here on the prophet Jeremiah, who by and large also experienced rejection of his message. The expression "How long?" (v. 22) is a favorite in his oracles (Jer 4:14, 21; 12:4; 13:27; 23:26; 31:22; 47:5). And, like Wisdom in verses 26-28, Jeremiah was finally driven by God not to answer the people when they did finally seek help during the catastrophe of the Babylonian invasion (Jer 14:11). The combination of rebuke for sins and veiled threat of punishment, which is proper to prophetic preaching, is here employed as the power of the word of wisdom to offer life. Wisdom promises rest and peace free from fear to those who seek counsel and reproof (vv. 25, 30), knowledge and fear of the Lord (v. 29), and spirit and word (v. 23; see also Deut 12:10; Ezek 34:25).

In contrast, the simple (v. 22) see no value in working for wisdom. They love their simplicity (NAB: "inanity"). "In ignorance is bliss" becomes their motto. The NAB omits the second part of verse 22: "(How long) will the scoffers rejoice in their scoffing, and the stupid hate knowledge?" It may be an added comment, for it is in the third person, unlike the rest of the passage. But it illustrates what is finally made clear in verse 30: the choice of ignorance ends up in deliberate folly and self-destruction.

2:1-22 The second instruction: the benefits of wisdom. Here the wisdom teacher waxes eloquently on the blessings that wisdom can bestow. Clearly a receptive student is in mind, the ideal candidate for instruction. The chapter is chiastic in structure, with the opening theme repeated at the end, and the two middle sections parallel to one another in an A-B:B-A pattern. Verses 1-11 describe wisdom's blessings; verses 12-15 warn against the evil man; verses 16-19 warn against the adulteress; and verses 20-22 return to the promise of blessing. The whole forms a theme statement for the fuller treatment of both the evil man and the adulteress in chapters 3–7. If 1:20-33 sounded prophetic, this passage echoes Deuteronomy and the psalms, especially in the contrast between the ways of the just and wicked, and the call to obey God's commands (see Deut 4; 11; Pss 1; 37).

In 2:1-11 the vocabulary of old wisdom that was seen in 1:1-7 reappears, but this time it is explicitly related to Israel's conviction that all knowledge and blessing come from Yahweh alone. Wisdom is a gift of God and not the product of native human intelligence or ability. There is no rejection of human searching and questioning in this, but a subordination of ends. The source of knowledge, understanding, and intelligence that can guide right conduct is knowledge of God's role in the process. It is the exact opposite of what the proverbs often refer to as the attitude of those "wise in their own eyes" (3:7; 26:5, 12, 16; 28:11).

The first warning in verses 12-15 sketches the way of the wicked. Their thinking is crooked and their speech is crooked. They are the opposite of the upright and honest person of verse 9. Evil is so much their way that they could no longer be straight if they wanted to! The second warning is against the adulterous woman. Sexuality is always an area of temptation, but involvement with a seductress who is married can lead to grave social consequences beyond merely personal sin. It is the destruction that is death itself. Like Psalm 1, the passage ends by proposing two ways of life to the youth and calling for a decision in favor of wisdom's way.

3:1-12 The third instruction: the blessing of fidelity to God. Verse 1 mentions the Torah and divine commands in the context of a promise of long life. "Kindness and fidelity" (v. 3) also fit into this pattern, which is very close to Deuteronomy's theological view of the covenant on Mount Sinai. Indeed, many aspects of this short section suggest that it is a deliberate attempt to counteract the older concept of a self-reliant wisdom. It twice condemns those who judge themselves wise (vv. 5, 7) and opposes such self-confidence by proposing an ideal of trusting in and fearing the Lord. Although echoes of traditional wisdom are present (long life is also the goal of Egyptian instructions), it has been reworked away from a sharp emphasis on intellectual achievement toward a more meditative and prayerful attitude. This is seen in verse 6: "In all your ways be mindful of him." Even verses 11-12 conclude with a form of reproof that has little in common with the corrections of the teachers and is closer to an explanation of suffering as a way to God (Deut 8:5).

A look at the direct imperatives in these twelve verses shows that not one of them is clearly directed toward the intellectual pursuit of wisdom. In fact, verses 9-10 are close in spirit to Mal 3:10, "Bring the whole tithe into the storehouse, that there may be food in my house, and try me in this, says the Lord of hosts: Shall I not open for you the floodgates of heaven, to pour down blessing upon you without measure?" Among the prophets, Malachi is the most priestly in tone and combines the outlook of Deuteronomy that blessing comes in return for fidelity with a spirituality centered on worship. Not unexpectedly, the priestly-oriented Letter to the Hebrews in the New Testament directly quotes verses 11-12 in Heb 12:5-6, but applies it naturally to Christian believers.

3:13-35 Fourth instruction: wisdom's value in society. Many commentators break up this unit into two parts: a hymn on the worth of wisdom (vv. 13-24) and a collection of short sayings dealing with other people (vv. 25-35). But neither part stands alone. The instructions for social conduct in the second part follow upon the promise of peace and security in verses 23-24. They place human conduct within the context of the divine command to love one's neighbor (Lev 19:18) and thus reveal the real nature of "life" that wisdom offers to those who grasp her (vv. 16, 18). In many ways this entire instruction continues the message of the preceding one in 3:1-12 on the necessity of bringing wisdom under the revelation proclaimed in the covenant with Yahweh.

Some important ideas are raised in this passage. Verses 13-15 hint that wisdom can be personified as an ideal wife (similar to Prov 31:10), more valuable to a young man for success in life than the most costly gems. Verses 16-18 deepen this claim by comparing wisdom to the tree of life at the center of the Garden of Eden in Gen 2:9. At the time of creation it represented the human hope for eternal life; here it symbolizes medicine or balm that gives pleasant help and life to the soul (v. 22). Wisdom also brings peace (v. 17). The Hebrew word shalom means much more than our English word "peace." It is wholeness, blessing, prosperity—a full, successful life.

In verse 19, the claim that creation was given order by wisdom prepares us for the full description found in chapter 8. It also reflects Egyptian wisdom's concept of maat, "right order," which is at the heart of mastering wisdom. Here Yahweh, the God of Israel, alone gives good order to all things, and not some abstract principle. In the same way, the list of commands about treatment of others in verses 27-31 reflects the universal wisdom of the Ancient Near East, but it is brought under Yahweh's guidance by verses 32-35. There are two ways: one brings friendship with God, blessing, kindness (divine mercy), and honor; the other, curse, retribution, and shame.

4:1-9 Fifth instruction: the summons to get wisdom. In truly traditional fashion, this instruction calls on the pupil or child to receive education eagerly. The terms "instruction," "understanding," and "teaching" in verses 1-2 refer to the lessons of the wise, either passed down in the family or the schools. Here again wisdom is treated almost as a bride to be loved and treasured above all else in life. The strong stress on the home as the source of this insight is probably due to the author's concern to make the point extremely personal. Wisdom is not just another commodity; it must be loved for its own sake.

There is no mention of the Yahweh of faith in this whole passage. The images and metaphors are borrowed from the remembered joys of a warm and loving childhood, in which education was mixed with affection and concern. Like a deeply devoted parent, wisdom will guard and stand by the individual for life (v. 6); like a friend, she will return favor for favor and honor for honor (v. 8); and like a wife that is herself a jewel, she will give the crowning touch to every aspect of a person's life. Perhaps there is even a hint that wisdom is a queen who bestows royal honors on favored servants and courtiers. But one must first get wisdom, and that requires listening, obeying, and the trusting spirit of a child who heeds the words and commands of the father and teacher (v. 4).

4:10-27 Sixth instruction: the two paths. One of the major themes of wisdom literature is that of the two ways. One leads to light and life, the other to darkness and death. One is straight, the other is crooked and devious. To give the metaphor power, various words for road, path, or highway are used. Each step must be deliberately taken. The passage is very artistically arranged in a chiastic fashion to show how walking is as easy on the one path as on the other, but the decision will lead to major differences. The way of wisdom stands opposed to the path of the wicked, while the path of the just opposes the way of the wicked. The A-B:B-A pattern argues against the decision to place verse 18 after verse 19, as in the NAB translation. The contents of the right way or path are the traditional wisdom teachings of the sages. The strong command to shun evil in verse 15 comes from the experience of generations that once a person gets into the grip of temptation to evil, it is harder and harder to free oneself.

Verses 20-27 reinforce this message with a series of warnings against playing the two ways off against one another. It is always a human urge to toy with just a few sinful things or to indulge certain vices no matter what, while trying to keep a basically upright lifestyle. But the masters of wisdom had no use for this indecisiveness or deliberate playing with fire. A choice must be made, and one's whole life must then be directed to attaining wholeness and uprightness.

Above all, speech betrays the real directions of a person's heart. False speech is the chief enemy of wisdom everywhere in Proverbs. The strict command in verse 24 is paralleled by the Egyptian advice of Amenemope: "God hates him who falsifies words; his great abomination is the one contentious of belly" (the belly being the source of speech for the Egyptian as the heart was for the Israelite). An Aramaic work, The Words of Ahiqar, reinforces the message: "My son, more than all watchfulness, watch your mouth!" Verses 26-27 return to the two paths with a final warning against any compromise. Heb 12:13 quotes verse 26 as the discipline for Christians.

5:1-23 Seventh instruction: the dangers of the adulteress. If speech can be the greatest internal enemy of a person, the lures of the adulteress are the greatest external enemy. The word for the woman is specifically "foreign woman," and many have thought the entire treatment of this theme in Prov 1–9 is a metaphor for apostasy, expressed by participation in the cults of fertility in honor of goddesses of sexuality such as Ishtar (Babylonian) or Astarte (Canaanite). Given the prophetic condemnations of such cults (Ezek 8; Jer 44), some echo of this may be present in part, especially in chapter 9. But the description in chapter 5 is so vivid and direct that there can be little doubt that real-life marriages are being discussed.

Warnings against violating the wife of another man go back as far as the earliest known wisdom literature. The Instruction of Ptahhotep (before 2000 B.C.E.) says, "Beware of approaching women. A thousand men have been led astray from their good; a man is but mocked by their glistening limbs . . . but death is the penalty for enjoying it." The Wisdom of Ani (1500–1200 B.C.E.) explicitly warns, "Beware of the woman from abroad . . . a woman whose husband is far away."

This section contains four separate statements that contrast the evil woman with the faithful wife. Verses 1-6 describe her words, which quickly snare the youth's uncontrolled passions and enslave him to death itself. Discretion, that is, prudence, is the only safeguard (v. 2). Verses 7-14 then draw the conclusions of failure. The youth's life and reputation are ruined (v. 9), his position and money are lost (in penalty payments to the wronged husband? or to the wife for her favors?), and his whole body is diseased and beaten in punishment. Actually, the penalty in the law was death by stoning (Deut 22:23-24; Lev 20:10), but in practice, the text suggests, it was often much milder. Too late the youth wishes he had listened to instruction.

In sharp contrast, verses 15-19 draw upon the age-old metaphor of fresh running water to describe a faithful marriage. Verses 20-23 then draw the moral conclusion from this: why go after forbidden and disastrous pleasure that merits death and loss because of its folly when so much can be found in faithful love? On top of this, a hint is made in verse 21 that God will see and judge evil. But otherwise the lesson is drawn from common experience.

6:1-19 Four lessons about wise conduct. This section is entitled "Miscellaneous Proverbs." But "proverbs" is a misleading term, since in fact there are four extended descriptions here, far from simple two-line sayings. In the first case, a person agrees to back up the loan of another, probably a foreigner, as the Hebrew word for "neighbor" suggests. This is considered rash and foolish because the guarantor can easily be stuck in the deal. The solution proposed is to browbeat and pester the moneylender until he lets you out of the deal. It is similar to Jesus' solution in his parable of the unjust judge in Luke 18:1-5.

In the second case, verses 6-11, a scene from nature becomes a moral. The ant is famed for its constant, busy search for food and its highly organized community life, which makes the most out of collective effort. The lazy person, on the other hand, acts as though no plans ever need to be made for the future. Everything will somehow work out. The authors cite what must have been a very popular saying in verses 10-11, since it is found again in 24:33-34. The message is plain: disaster overpowers those who do not plan ahead—they are as helpless as the victims of vicious armed robbers!

The third example, in verses 12-15, deals with the person who cheats and defrauds others. He talks fast and his line is smooth; he puts his arm around the intended victims' shoulders, gives a knowing wink, and soon has gotten hold of their life savings, with a promise of future wealth that will never be realized. This kind of evil person destroys trust in social agreements and contracts, creates bitterness and strife, and in the end always gets caught in his own trap—at least that is the pious hope of the sages!

Finally, the section ends with a numerical proverb in verses 16-19, similar to those that appear in chapter 30. Seven is the symbolic number for completeness and equals the summary of all the vices mentioned in verses 1-15. Artistically, the authors have arranged them as though they were a list of the parts of the body, but each comes from within an evil mind that rejects the lessons of wisdom.

6:20-35 The eighth instruction: a further warning against adultery. This instruction opens with a call to accept the commandments and teaching of one's parents. The language is the language of Deut 6:7-8 and 11:19 with one difference: in Deuteronomy it is the profession of faith in Yahweh that one is bound to, whereas here it is the moral lessons of Israel's wisdom traditions. Ps 119:105 says, "A lamp to my feet is your word, a light to my path." So, too, here it is discipline, traditional instruction, which is the light that guides rather than divine revelation.

Sexual license is condemned because it results from uncontrolled lust; but even more wrong is violation of another's marriage rights out of such lust. It leads only to terrible consequences that hurt all the parties, including the betrayed husband. The folksy images of verses 27-29 make the point clear. If you do X, you always get Y. Verses 30-35 bring out some of the more practical consequences. A thief who gets caught may be punished or fined until he has nothing left, but at least people will sympathize with the need that led him to steal, and may actually respect him for his desperate solution. But an adulterer is publicly humiliated, and the enraged husband will seek vengeance in every possible way. The young man will never forget this foolish mistake. Beyond the punishments, physical and monetary, he will probably be barred from any hope of obtaining position or respect in the community again.

Akkadian wisdom understood another lesson from such conduct. After the affair, the woman may well let the adulterer take the consequences as she sides with the very husband she has cuckolded: "Do not take a harlot, whose husbands are many, an Ishtar priestess devoted to a god. In your trouble she will not support you, in your conflict she will ridicule you; reverence and humility are not with her!" The youth who gets himself into such trouble is said to be a "fool" in verse 32 (the word actually means "lacking a mind"). Adultery is the shortest-enjoyed and longest-paid-for evil act in the wisdom dictionary.

7:1-27 The ninth instruction: more on the adulteress. That this is an independent instruction is shown by the elaborate introduction in verses 1-5, matching the one in 6:20-24. Both cite Deut 6:4-9 as divine law and urge the readers to make wisdom teaching as much a part of their lives as a sister or close friend would be. The description of the adulteress is much more colorful and detailed than the ones in chapters 5 or 6. Although it seems to stick to the case of a married woman who seduces a young man, several new elements enter the picture. Now the woman acts more like a cult prostitute on the lookout for clients. The young man in turn obviously goes to the area where he knows he will find her waiting as she looks out her window. Shortly after, she suggests a connection between sex and religious duty (vv. 14-15; note also the combination of vow-offerings and peace-offerings in the law of Lev 22:21 and Num 15:8).

Illustrating this scene are the well-known ivory images of the goddess Ishtar at the lattice of a window which have been found at various ancient sites but which all originate in Phoenician (Canaanite) areas. They represent love amulets associated with the temple rites dedicated to the goddess, which often included ritual sexual intercourse between worshipers and priestesses. Deuteronomy itself emphatically warned against the dangers of such cultic infidelity on the part of Israel and promised curse and death for those who fell into it (Deut 11:26-28; 30:15-20). There is good reason to believe that in chapter 7 we are dealing with a warning against cult prostitutes and not just with a wayward wife. But the two images are joined into one, and verses 19-20 return to the explicit image of adultery.

Verses 21-27 describe, in metaphors of dumb animals, the stupidity of the youth who becomes involved. Several times before (2:18; 5:5) the penalty has been described as death. The seductive words of the woman are like the mouth of Sheol itself—a pit or gaping jaws that swallow the guilty alive. It is an image borrowed from Canaan. The Epic of Baal from Ugarit describes the hero-god's descent into the underworld through the mouth of Death, who is said to have "one lip to earth, one lip to heaven, and his tongue to the stars."

8:1-36 Wisdom's second speech: her incomparable value. In sharp contrast to the woman of chapter 7, Wisdom herself now calls for attention and offers a counter-ideal. Again the comparisons to prophecy are strong, especially in the introduction of verses 1-11. Like the prophet Jeremiah, Wisdom opposes her true words to the false and lying words of other prophets (see Jer 2:8; 6:13; 23:13-14). But as in chapter 4, Wisdom does not at first appeal to divine authority but to human reason and the value of wisdom for its own sake (see a similar thought in 3:13-15). Her call lays stress on the power of upright words to help the simple gain sense and competence ("resource" in verse 5).

Wisdom's second claim (vv. 12-16) also comes from the best of old wisdom. She offers the gifts of statesmanship, the skills of public office. Much of the vocabulary of traditional older wisdom is found in verses 12-14. We can note, however, that later passages, such as Job 12:13 and Isa 40:13-14, attribute these qualities only to Yahweh. Here Wisdom claims them for herself, thus suggesting an identity between personified Wisdom and God. The same can be said of the divine power to appoint kings in verses 15-16. Note, too, the titles of Ishtar in Babylonian tradition: "Ishtar, creator and majesty, lady of peoples, goddess of humanity, who gives the sceptre, the throne, the royal insignia to the totality of kings."

Wisdom's third offer is made in verses 17-21: a personal relationship of love. There is no direct mention of God in these verses, but the merely abstract comparisons to gold and wealth hardly do justice to understanding the promise made in verse 17 that Wisdom loves those who love her, and she will be found by all who seek her. Job 28 insisted that for a pious Israelite wisdom cannot be found except when given by God as a gift. In an indirect way, the same view is maintained here, for it is by duty (really "judgment") and by justice that Wisdom is found and in return for which she gives her love. These terms, "judgment" and "justice," are the major terms of the covenant law (see Isa 1:21; Hos 2:21; Pss 72:2; 85:12; 89:15).

Finally, the greatest of Wisdom's claims appears in verses 22-31. She belongs to the divine world far more than to the human world of the older sages. She claims to have been created before all else, before all those natural wonders of the heavens that aroused Israel to acknowledge God's almighty power over human affairs. Verses 22-29 refer specifically to Israel's literary accounts of creation, with elements drawn not only from Gen 1–2 but also from Job 38:4-18 and Ps 104:1-9. The purpose is to show that if Wisdom took part in God's creative action, she has a right to as much acknowledgment from the Israelites for her value as they give to the heavenly bodies as signs of God's goodness. Verse 30 has always been the key verse. The New American Bible has translated the Hebrew word for wisdom's role as "craftsman," which suggests a very active role for Wisdom in the process of creation. Others think that it may mean "darling" or "beloved" and may refer more to the playful aspect described in the rest of the verse. Both, however, emphasize a similar point, namely, that Wisdom was before God's presence as a model on the day of creation.

Many attempts have been made to identify the remains of a Near Eastern myth about Wisdom as a creation goddess in this passage. The closest parallels are Egyptian descriptions of maat, the personified goddess of world order: "Even to the gods she is precious, to her forever belongs the sovereignty; in heaven she is treasured up, for the lord of holiness has exalted her" (from The Words of Ahiqar, found in a Jewish colony at Elephantine in Egypt). Israel uses similar language to express how Wisdom mirrors the orderly plan of Yahweh revealed in his creation. In Prov 8 the personification does not suggest that Wisdom exists apart from God, but is instead a way of expressing the purpose of the divine will as it is made manifest in the world. The passage ends with a peroration in 8:32-36: to find Wisdom is to find life as well as divine favor. In fact, they are the same.

9:1-18 The tenth instruction: a parable of two banquets. To cap the eight chapters arguing for Wisdom's superiority to folly, the author or authors end by describing two banquets—one given by Lady Wisdom, the other by Dame Folly. Both sit by the road and call people in; both appeal especially to the simple and to those lacking sense (vv. 3-4, 14-16); both offer a rich reward (vv. 5, 17). But Wisdom's reward turns out to be life (vv. 6, 11), while Folly's turns out to be a poison that brings death (v. 18). The two may not seem equal, but since Wisdom's banquet requires a long period of learning, the lure of quick pleasure offered by Folly easily captures many.

The chapter is divided into three sections. Wisdom's banquet takes up verses 1-6, Folly's 13-18. In between stands a section with three proverbs from old wisdom contrasting once again the way of the wicked and the way of the wise. It includes a warning that all that has been said about wisdom in chapters 1–9 is summed up in the theme already announced in 1:7: the beginning of wisdom resides in piety and true fidelity to Yahweh (fear of the Lord). This is Wisdom's final word. The emphasis placed on it indicates that verses 7-12 are not accidentally inserted here. They are intended to summarize Wisdom's offer. The accent on fear of the Lord also suggests that the strange reference to a house of seven pillars in 9:1 and to Folly's house high on a hill in 9:14 contrasts different temples. The Jerusalem temple and its worship of Yahweh stresses the blessing of life that comes to those who search it out (see Pss 15; 24). The temples of the cult prostitutes and their sexual rites confer only death on their devotees.

Wisdom's house of seven pillars is made up of her teachings. The seven may refer to a holy place (main room of the temple) that consists of the instructions in chapters 2 to 7. In this case the vestibule would be made up of chapter 1 and the holy of holies of chapter 8, thus forming a spiritual model of the temple of Solomon. In any case, the nine chapters of Part I continually interrelate priestly torah and prophetic challenge with Wisdom's advice. This hints that the authors or editors saw these chapters as an argument for wisdom as an equal source next to law and prophecy for Israel's faith. Jer 18:18 already alluded to such a triple parallel: "Instruction shall not be lost from the priests, nor counsel from the wise, nor the word from the prophets."

PART II: THE PROVERBS OF SOLOMON

Prov 10:1–22:16

This first collection of proverbs attributed to Solomon is the longest section in the Book of Proverbs, but there are no internal subdivisions marked in the text. It consists of 375 single proverbs covering just about every aspect of conduct involving social relationships. Sayings on one topic, such as proper speech, are not all grouped together, however, but are scattered throughout the collection. The same is true of other topics. Scholars have long sought the principles by which individual proverbs were grouped, but no one has yet proposed a convincing answer. We know that Sumerian proverbs were often collected by topic. In one tablet, sayings on dogs are in one place, followed by those involving wild oxen, and then those using the metaphor of the ass, etc. Perhaps someone will yet find a key to unlock the secret of Hebrew ordering.

A few clues already exist. For example, chapters 10–15 are very heavy with proverbs contrasting the just and the wicked person. Chapters 16–22, on the other hand, deal more with practical advice on how to be successful. Perhaps these originally represented two separate collections. Certain smaller sections seem to follow special themes: thus 11:4-11 stresses the rewards of the just; 16:1-9 is on God's rule of life; 16:10-15 is on the behavior of kings; and most of chapter 18 is on the use of speech. None, however, can be clearly identified as originally a separate unity.

Many scholars do not believe that we will ever be able to identify the original collections of proverbs. Individual sayings would have been reworked often, and it is better to distinguish those sayings that reflect earlier wisdom thinking from those that show a later, more developed faith in Yahweh. Three stages have been suggested. The oldest accents practical rules for success in life and rarely or never mentions God. A second stage shows concern for the effects of social versus antisocial behavior, and a third stage uses the thought and language of a fully working Israelite piety. The second group could easily be absorbed into the first group, which would leave only two major stages of proverb development: an older, more neutral proverb used for educating the young and the apprentice public servant in the mastery of life; and a later stage when these were modified and "corrected" by sayings which emphasize Yahweh's control over success and failure, and which make a close connection between wisdom and faith. A possible middle stage between older and later wisdom would have been a developing awareness that moral attitudes are basic to divine order and that upright behavior is always rewarded.

In any case, most scholars agree that few of the proverbs actually come from Solomon's time. A long history of development has taken place, and it is only in the final reading of the total collection that the message of proverbial wisdom for Israel is fully seen. The message combines keen observation of both practical moral conduct and the consequences of human decisions with trust in God and reliance on the divine ordering of the world.

In order to gain the most out of reading this section, it is important to look over a chapter or a good part of a chapter at a time, reflect on how the individual proverbs relate to one another or how they differ, and then ask: How do these diverse sayings build up a picture of the wise believer? How do they reinforce one another? The differences and the apparent lack of unity will sharpen our looking—an essential purpose of the proverb form itself!

10:1-32. The major topic that runs through chapter 10 is the role of the just person. Again and again the just are related either to the wise or to the wicked. It is a kind of theme statement for the rest of chapters 11–22. Smaller units can be seen in verses 18-21 on the power of speech, and in verses 27-32 on the rewards of just behavior. Almost all the proverbs are in antithetic parallelism, setting the ideal against undesired foolish or evil behavior. Above all, the foolish or stupid person lacks self-control over speech and over appetites, and it is primarily on these that the sayings focus here.

Verses 1-7 give examples of careful stewardship on the part of the wise in contrast to the lack of foresight and short-sighted cravings of the foolish. Verses 8-17 focus on still another aspect distinguishing wisdom from foolishness—intention. What does the fool or evil person want? Strife seems to be one answer; quick gain at someone else's expense seems to be another. Violence is never far from the ways chosen by such people, since they want what they want at any cost. These same verses keep returning to the far different goal of the wise—life. It is long-term (v. 14) and requires careful learning (v. 17), careful speech (v. 11), and careful choice of goals (v. 16).

Verses 18-21 illustrate one aspect of wise calculation—the use of speech. Words can destroy and wound, or they can reveal too much and offend against propriety. But they can also contribute advice or comment of value and support others in need of encouragement and recognition. The training of wisdom teachers gave great attention to speech as the means of communicating and revealing wise decisions. (See more on this in chs. 12 and 18.)

Verse 22 asserts the primacy of God's blessing over human effort in the search for success. The following few sayings strengthen this conviction by showing how the upright outlast the wicked.

Verses 27-32 close the chapter by detailing the rewards of God's blessing: long life, joy, security, peace, as well as skill in speaking and a charming manner. In all ways, being just has the advantage over evil behavior.

11:1-31. The proverbs in this chapter continue the theme of uprightness. Verses 2-8 contrast the personal attitudes of the just and the wicked, while verses 9-15 describe the social implications of the two ways. The remaining sayings are harder to classify, but they generally keep up the opposition between right behavior and evil conduct.

The most common idea in this chapter is that the just person who has virtue expresses most fully the idea of the ideal order (maat of the older Egyptian wisdom). This ideal order forms the perfect unifying link between practical wisdom and religious wisdom, since it expresses both good sense and religious obedience to God's will. Closely associated with this concept is the word translated "upright" in verses 3 and 6, and "righteous" in verse 11. It emphasizes the inner, personal commitment to a living out of the divine ideal. It implies the spirituality of a person totally committed to making justice really work.

We can note that this chapter has a strong urban orientation. Verses 9-15 in particular express the ramifications of justice toward one's neighbors. The social community as a whole benefits or suffers from the choices one makes. The chapter opens with a saying on fair scales that typifies the concern for justice. Law and prophets demand just dealings in buying and selling (Deut 25:15; Lev 19:36; Ezek 45:10; Amos 8:5; Mic 6:11). In this they are one with wisdom. But this is part of a larger concern with the evil attitude that is always out to cheat someone else. The Egyptian Amenemope names both false weights and cheating as "abominations" to the god, as does Proverbs in verse 20. The opposite hope is expressed by verse 26: generosity in goods merits divine blessing.

The New American Bible has filled out verse 16 from the Greek Septuagint. Actually the Hebrew text reads: "A gracious woman holds on to honor, but ruthless men cling to wealth." It does not create a perfect contrast, but it makes sense as it stands and did not require a change.

Another small note can be made on verse 22. Nose rings are still known in Bedouin tribes as a sign of beauty, so the point is that a rebellious spirit seems as inappropriate in a woman as putting a sign of beauty on a pig.

Verse 31 can be considered the moral lesson of the chapter. It is quoted in 1 Pet 4:18 as a comfort to Christians under persecution. Indeed, the author of 1 Peter was a great admirer of this section of Proverbs. 1 Pet 4:8 quotes a saying from Prov 10:12.

12:1-28. The education of the beginner in wisdom continues with further examples of the differences between the just and the wicked. Verses 1-3 set the tone by bringing together the older ideal of wisdom through correction and the development of good habits with obedience to Yahweh's will. In verse 5 it is explicitly asserted that the intentions and considerations of the heart are all-important. Those motivated by justice are "legitimate" (NAB), those of the wicked are "deceitful." The word for "legitimate" in this verse might be better translated "good judgment." The sense is taken from legal usage, where the judge must render a decision on a given case. What is justice in this situation? The religious meaning is that the upright do what is just, and God accepts them as legally guiltless. On the other hand, the wicked only produce fraud and dishonesty. The Hebrew word for "deceitful" is the same as that used for "false scales" in 11:1. Legally, the guilty will be condemned for the concrete acts of fraud that their machinations lead to.

The remainder of the chapter gives various examples of the good habits typical of the just: steady work, prudence, kindliness, and self-control. But the largest emphasis falls on speech and the thoughts that motivate it. Verses 14-15 express it as a mixture of choosing good words that win people over and of listening to others in order to learn rather than speaking before thinking. This is given flesh in the series of sayings in verses 17-23 dealing with thought versus speech. Lying and dishonesty can be destructively powerful uses of the tongue, but their gain is short-lived. Truth endures, and it not only outlasts dishonesty but also brings the benefits of peace, security, and joy to the one who serves it.

Once again the message is drawn from older wisdom but given a specifically Israelite turn in verse 22, where it is God who will demand an answer to the abomination of false speech. Amenemope expressed a similar insight: "God hates the falsifying of words, his great abomination is the one who is sick within." Verse 23 also reflects a saying of Amenemope: "Better is the man whose news stays in his body than the one who speaks it out injuriously." Often in the Old Testament an "abomination" is tied to false worship (Dan 9:27; 11:31; 12:11), but in Proverbs and Amenemope it means a fundamental moral flaw. Further Egyptian influence can be detected in the sayings against anger (v. 16; see ch. 14).

13:1-25. This chapter opens, as does the beginning in 10:1, with a contrast between the wise and foolish son (or pupil). Generally the chapter has two major themes to develop this contrast: the dangers of uncontrolled appetites or desires (vv. 2-12), and the quality of life that results from the choices each person makes (vv. 13-25).

The power of appetites was well known to Israelite teachers. Their instructions concentrated on internal dispositions, however—the longing for what belongs to another, the desire for external show, anger, and above all pride. Verse 10 calls it "insolence," a quality that puffs up one's own importance while seeking to cause embarrassment and shame to others (v. 5). Dishonest and violent behavior is always tempting in order to achieve such goals.

Another area that the sages associated with uncontrolled appetite was money. Wealth can be a sign of divine blessing and success for the good person who follows the path of justice (v. 11), but it also focuses the dreams and hopes of the wicked on acquiring more. With wealth they can receive the external signs of blessing. Verse 8, for example, can make the neutral observation that wealth frees one from many normal worries, while poverty makes instruction almost impossible. A similar thought occurs in 18:23: "The poor man implores, but the rich man answers harshly," and also in 18:11: "The rich man's wealth is his strong city." But the search for wealth as a primary goal of life leads to treachery and fraud, so roundly condemned in the proverbs we have already seen. True wealth is in wisdom (3:14; 8:10; 8:18-19; 16:16); in turn, wise behavior, especially generosity, will lead to wealth (recall 12:24-25). A spiritualized interpretation of this is found in verse 21.

The quality of a life of wisdom is summarized in the choice between life and death. Life is more than mere existence, of course. It is the fullness of blessing now. So it is described as a fountain (v. 14) that brings reward (v. 13), favor (v. 15), healing (v. 17), honor (v. 18), good (v. 21), an inheritance for one's children (v. 22), and a full stomach (v. 25). The sinner, naturally, receives the opposite—misfortune, ruin, poverty, shame, and an empty belly. These belong to the realm of death (v. 14). The fundamental message is to acquire this life quality, best expressed by verse 20. The only way to gain wisdom is to walk with the wise.

14:1-35. The difference between the wise and the foolish continues to occupy center stage in this chapter, especially as the one is prudent and cautious, and the other rash and foolhardy (vv. 3, 6, 7, 16, 24, 33). Discipline is needed (vv. 8, 12, 15, 18) and prudent judgment (vv. 4, 10, 13, 20, 23, 30). All of this fits the tradition of international wisdom, but it is tempered here with two religious convictions proper to Israel. Divine concern for the world means that wicked and foolish behavior can expect punishment (vv. 11, 14, 19, 32), and "fear of the Lord" rules the actions of the just (vv. 2, 26, 27).

This "fear of the Lord" does not imply a frightened obedience in order to avoid punishment. It relates to the awe and reverence one must show before the transcendent power and majesty of God. There is a healthy fear of the consequences of sin, but there is also love and a sense of trust in the divine power that cares for and directs all things in our lives. It can be described as loyalty to Yahweh. It is devotion, fidelity, and obedience at the same time (see Lev 19; Deut 10:12; Ps 34:10-12). In practice, it is piety: the observance of the religious obligations and moral standards of the law. In 2 Kgs 17:25-29 priests had to be sent to Samaria to teach the new settlers how to "fear the Lord," that is, to be good Jews. In the later wisdom tradition, keeping the law was identified with fearing the Lord, which in turn was the same as wisdom (Sir 1:14, 16, 18, 20; 15:1; 19:20; 21:11), and the law is the path to wisdom (Sir 1:26; 9:14-15; 24:22-23; 39:1-3). In Proverbs, fear of the Lord has a strong ethical content, whereas in Gen 20:11 and other Pentateuchal passages it seems primarily tied to cultic concerns. The development of religious wisdom brought the two into one by the time of Sirach, but in Proverbs the connection to living uprightly is still dominant.

Many of the proverbs echo themes already seen. Lying, arrogance, laziness, refusal to learn from discipline, and rash behavior are all condemned. Resourcefulness, truthfulness, and shrewd planning are all praised. A new theme of anger and quick-tempered behavior appears in verses 17 and 29. It is common elsewhere in Proverbs (12:16; 15:18; 16:32; 17:27-28, etc.). It reflects one of the most frequent topics in Egyptian wisdom: the value of the "cool" versus the "hot" spirit. One Egyptian noble left this epitaph on his tomb in self-praise: "Silent, cool in temperament, calm in expression." It sums up the ideal scribe and statesman for Egypt—indeed, it is exactly the description of Joseph as vizier of Egypt in Gen 37–50! The "hot" man cannot control his speech, his desires, his temper, or his rash decision-making. He expresses everything he feels, and wants all his cravings satisfied. No one is less suited to work with or cooperate with others. Amenemope says of such a person, "Like a storm which arises as fire in the straw is the hot man in his time." A few chapters later, it adds, "Do not make the hot man your companion, and do not hold a conversation with him!"

15:1-33. The proverbs in this chapter typify the conduct of the cool temperament over against the hot spirit. The "ill-tempered man" of verse 18 is literally in Hebrew "a man of heat." The early part of the chapter stresses calm speech, cautious affirmation of "knowledge," and an openness to learning (vv. 1-7). They are themes covered many times before (see 12:1; 13:18, 24; 14:33). Above all, discipline is needed to develop such a cool spirit (vv. 5, 10, 12, 20, 21, 24, 31, 32). "Discipline" and "reproof" are the bases of old wisdom's formula for worldly success. A very intentional effort has been made here to link these to the practice of Israel's faith. Proverbs that name Yahweh as the source of wisdom and judgment are more frequent in this chapter than anywhere else in chapters 10–22 except for chapter 16. In verse 33, "fear of the Lord" is equated with both discipline and wisdom. Verse 8 even mentions the role of worship and prayer, a theme very rare in Proverbs. Verse 9 forms a general conclusion on the mutual roles of worship and wisdom that identifies rejection of Yahweh and evil conduct as equal abominations.

Verse 11 presents the only positive view of the nether world in Proverbs. Usually Sheol is a place cut off from life and from God. Here the saying suggests that God takes a personal concern even for the world of the dead. Verse 12 presents us with the "senseless" person. The characteristic of this type of person is that he or she refuses to change anything. Thus there is no way for wisdom to enter moral decision-making.

The concern of Yahweh for the poor and defenseless is a major proclamation of both the law and the prophets (Deut 10:18; 14:28-29; 24:17-22; Exod 22:21-24; Isa 1:17, 23). It is just as important to the wisdom tradition. Verses 16-17 turn two well-known Egyptian sayings of Amenemope into a statement of faith: "Better is bread when the heart is glad than riches with vexation," and "Better is the poor man in the hands of the god than riches in the storehouse" (see Prov 14:31; 19:17; 22:9; and 29:4). Verse 25 goes on to include the widow among the helpless. This, too, fits the traditional Near Eastern sentiment. An inscription of Pharaoh Amenemhet I says,

> I gave to the poor, I nurtured the orphan,
> No one has been hungry in my years,
> No one has been thirsty.

The Epic of King Keret at Ugarit, a Canaanite text of the thirteenth century B.C.E., accuses the king of failing in his duty:

> You do not give the widow her rights . . . .
> You do not overthrow those who oppress the poor.
> The orphans are not fed by you,
> Nor the widows fed behind your back.

Israel has made this a divine obligation placed upon all Israelites and not just upon kings: Pss 72:1-4, 12-13; Jer 7:5-6; 22:2-3; Ezek 22:6-7; Zech 7:10. The wisdom teachers do not extol poverty as a special favor from God, but they acknowledge the priority of faithfulness to Yahweh even in want over material signs of blessing.

16:1-15. These fifteen verses are the center of Solomon's collection in chapters 10–22. Verses 1-9 detail the proper relationship of God to human wisdom, and express mention of Yahweh occurs in eight of the nine sayings! This is followed in verses 10-15 by a mini-guidebook for kings. The two groups belong together, since the king enjoyed a special relationship with God as "son" (Pss 2:7; 72:1) and "shepherd" of the people (Ezek 34:23). Kings, therefore, must embody the divine concern for justice. The thought in these two sections rests squarely on the older wisdom insights, but it has been transformed into a declaration of Yahweh's direct control over every aspect of life and especially over human planning.

Verse 1 affirms that even words, those most intimate expressions of a person's private thought, are directed to effects never dreamed of by the speaker. The Assyrian work The Words of Ahiqar (seventh century B.C.E.) likewise declares, "If he were beloved of the gods, they would put something good in his palate to speak." Verses 2-3 extend this insight. Only if God directs human plans will they succeed. Compare the early Egyptian advice of Merikare: "If the tongue of a man be the rudder of the boat, the Lord of all is its pilot!" The key attitudes are listed then in verses 5-8: humility rather than pride, kindness, piety, peaceful relations with others, and virtue (that is, uprightness) even in the middle of difficulty. Finally, verse 9 sums up the lesson by repeating the opening insight. Wisdom recognizes its limits. God is beyond human understanding, a mystery not comprehended by the skills of learning, and thus Yahweh ultimately exercises control even over wisdom itself.

Verses 10-15 obviously presume an ideal king. His words share divine authority and uphold the order of both justice and right judgment. But verses 11-12 assert that no kingdom can achieve this unless the people also live by the same qualities as kings. Verses 13-15 concentrate on how to win royal favor. They seem to be directed to the instruction of potential diplomats for the royal service. The advice is purely practical. Success will depend on winning the king's favor, and this is done by catering to his ways. But at least Proverbs keeps such fawning suggestions quite limited in scope. The Wisdom of Ptah-hotep (ca. 2450 B.C.E.) and the Words of Ahiqar (seventh century B.C.E.) both agree on extensive submissiveness before kings to gain favor. One example from Ahiqar reads: "If a thing is commanded you in the presence of a king, it is a burning fire; hasten to do it!"

16:16-33. The remainder of chapter 16 returns to the general advice on good conduct for everyone. If advancement in the king's service had a certain self-serving pride attached to its practical requirements of bowing and scraping, this should not be carried over as the ideal of every Israelite. They were members of the chosen people who bound themselves in a covenant of worship and obedience to Yahweh alone. These more general sayings, which would have been treasured in Egypt or Babylon as well, extol virtues important to the covenant: prudent speech (vv. 21, 23, 24), respect for elders (v. 31), praise of a cool temper (v. 32), and excoriation of evil words (vv. 27-30). But the spirit of humility before Yahweh and the submission of all human hopes and plans to the divine will are declared the only true road to success.

The combination of healthy respect for the limits of human knowledge with deep trust in the providence of Yahweh is summed up in the final saying of verse 33. Although applied here to the search for knowledge by means of learning, the mention of the lots reminds the reader that all major decisions throughout Israel's history were sought by asking God to indicate the answer through the casting of lots or other divination practices (see examples in Num 26:55; Lev 16:7-10; Josh 7:14; 14:2; 1 Sam 10:20-21; Prov 18:18). Later Egyptian wisdom came to the same realization. Amenemope could say, "One thing are the words men say, another is that which the god does." It is a universal insight—there is even a Malay proverb that goes, "Man's designs and God's decrees differ."

17:1-28. Among the general words of advice in this chapter are a number of sayings on strife (vv. 1, 4, 14, 19, 20) and bribery (vv. 8, 23). The first series underscores the importance of social relationships in the thinking of wisdom. The right relations between parents and children (v. 25), servants and employers (v. 2), business associates (v. 18), and friends (v. 17) are constant themes in the Book of Proverbs. Strife breaks down the proper order that exists and creates the sources of future hatred, violence, and lying. As verse 4 puts it, evil seeks ever more evil, and, like a dam that bursts, it becomes a flood (v. 14). The wise also know that evil ways are very hard to dislodge from our thinking. Verse 13 is an Old Testament version of "Those who live by the sword shall die by the sword." The thought of verse 1 agrees with 15:16-17 and the saying of Amenemope, "It is better to be praised as one who loves men than to have riches in the storehouse."

The attitude toward bribery in Proverbs has two sides. In a non-judgmental way, the wise observe that bribes often obtain results (18:16; 21:14). But more often the sayings take a stand against such perversions of justice, not only in this chapter but also in 28:21. In this regard, wisdom condemns bad judges (17:15, 23; 18:5) and perjury (19:5, 9, 28; 21:28) as well. All of these represent the destruction of society's divine order and of law. In this they agree wholeheartedly with the psalms and the prophets (Pss 15:5; 26:10; Isa 1:23; 5:23; Ezek 22:12; Mic 3:11). Deut 16:19 captures the essence of wisdom's position: "You shall not pervert justice or show partiality; and you shall not take a bribe because a bribe blinds the eyes of the wise and undermines the cause of the just."

The fool figures prominently in these sayings (vv. 10, 12, 16, 21, 24, 25). This is not the ordinary foolish person, but one who has too little ability to learn in school and who therefore acts in just the opposite manner out of spite. There is a hard-headed stubbornness in the fool that really tries to break up the accepted order and established ways of human relationships in society.

18:1-24. Several of the proverbs in chapter 18 return to the topic of good speech. This is not surprising in light of the intellectual tradition of wisdom. Even Babylonian wisdom literature gives its greatest attention to the quality of speech. At least ten separate expressions for sinful speech occur in the major Babylonian texts. These include words that are wicked, seditious, offensive, blasphemous, lying, exaggerated, and slanderous. In Prov 18 we meet still other categories of sinful or foolish speech: quarreling (v. 1), vain and empty self-opinion (v. 2), scorn spoken out of contempt (v. 3), creation of strife (v. 6), talebearing (v. 8), and speaking without thinking (v. 13). This reflects wisdom's message elsewhere in the book: empty chatter is foolish (15:2; 14:23); stirring up strife is evil (10:19; 26:21; 29:22 and most of chapter 17); gossip is destructive (11:13; 20:19; 26:20, 22); seeking scandal is wrong (16:27; 17:4).

At the same time, speech rightly used is a powerful tool for the wise person. Frankness and truth can change people (15:32; 24:26); words can heal (12:18; 13:17; 15:1; 16:24); persuasion can win people over (10:32; 11:9, 11); silence or reticence in speaking protects reputations (17:9; 25:8-9); holding back in speech acts shrewdly (12:23; 13:3; 21:23); and patient speech cools tempers (15:18; 17:27; 20:3).

In general, the wisdom teachers valued reserve and careful consideration in speech. It is true that they also had enough of a sense of humor to depict the foolish and stupid in slightly exaggerated cartoons of themselves. But they had a serious purpose in mind, namely, to steer the student through the pitfalls of the most difficult area of human conduct: the impulse to speak out what pops into the mind. The Letter of James in the New Testament is heir to this understanding in its treatise on the use of the tongue in 3:1-12.

19:1-29. No particular theme dominates chapter 19. It has several sayings on the problems of laziness (vv. 15, 24), royal service (v. 12), control of anger (vv. 11, 19), false witnesses (vv. 9, 28), and the training of children through discipline (vv. 13, 18, 25, 27), similar to those in earlier chapters. The most attention is paid to the dangers of wealth. Riches can lead to crooked behavior, false friends, greedy associates, and eventually to dishonesty (vv. 1, 4, 6, 7, 22). On the other side, there is no sign of God's disfavor in being poor (vv. 1, 17), although it leads to all sorts of undesirable difficulties (v. 7).

Wisdom's attitude on the subject of wealth was always ambivalent. Older wisdom saw a definite connection between material blessing and divine favor, while later wisdom developed a piety of the 'anawim, the righteous who have no inheritance in this world except the Lord. This latter theology is found mostly in the psalms, but its beginning can be found in verse 17 and in 22:4. God's special concern for the poor (see the comments on chapter 15 above) guarantees that any generous charity to the poor will be like a loan to God—its repayment is assured! Late Babylonian wisdom developed a similar insight, expressed in the Dialogue of Pessimism: "The man who sacrifices to his god is satisfied with the bargain; he is making loan upon loan."

Scattered throughout the proverbs of Solomon are a number of sayings about the value of a good wife (12:4; 18:22; 19:14). As far back as the Instruction of Ptah-hotep in Old Kingdom Egypt, this had been a staple of wisdom teaching: "If you are a man of standing, you should establish your household and love your wife at home as is fitting. Make her heart glad as long as you live. She is a profitable field for her lord." While a minor theme in chapters 10–22, it is a major element in the final summation of wisdom in Prov 31:10-31.

The value of "counsel" is emphasized in verse 20. It is above all the quality of shrewd political advice. It frequently appears in contexts in which scribes are called on to advise the king: 2 Sam 8:17; 20:25; 2 Kgs 18:18; 22:8. Perhaps the most famous episode occurs in 2 Sam 16, where the two most famous givers of counsel in David's kingdom, Hushai and Ahithophel, duel against each other. Ahithophel gives sounder counsel, but Absalom follows the deceptive words of Hushai and thus loses his opportunity to win his revolt against his father David. Joseph, too, is portrayed as a wise counselor of Pharaoh in Genesis.

In Proverbs, counsel is often directly equated with wisdom (15:22; 19:20; 21:30), as it is also in certain royal passages of Isaiah (11:2; 19:11) and in an oracle of Jeremiah (Jer 49:7). Verse 21 gives a definite religious response to older wisdom's pride in human cleverness by affirming that God's counsel is greater than ours. This agrees with the polemical stance of prophets such as Second Isaiah who mock the pretensions of human counselors who think that they can figure out what course God is likely to take. See Isa 40:13-14 as a good example. God does not act according to human decisions but establishes the order according to which humans must act.

20:1-30. The proverbs in this chapter are of a general nature. In some cases it seems that later wisdom thinkers have actually tried to soften or correct some of the more optimistic claims of older wisdom. Verse 12 attributes all seeing and hearing (that is, learning) to God's foresight and intention, lest people claim that goodness or justice or integrity or their virtuous conduct from childhood onward came from their own moral uprightness (vv. 6-11). This should be related to the question of intention. Verse 5 describes human intentions as coming from the very depth of our being. The word used is also "counsel," and the lesson is the same as in chapter 19. Right intention draws on the counsel of God, who makes the eye and the ear instruments of learning and communicating wisely.

Several of the proverbs echo themes found primarily in chapters 1–9. Verse 4, on the lazy farmer, reflects 6:6-11, while the warning against standing bond for a neighbor's loan in verse 16 is similar to 6:1-5. The bread of deceit that seduces someone resembles the stolen bread and water of folly in 9:17. The proverb on sleep and wakefulness in verse 13 is the ancient counterpart to our modern saying "The early bird catches the worm." And the very realistic scene in verse 14 still takes place regularly in the bazaars of the Near East, where bargaining over items for sale involves an elaborate ritual of feigning how much one is losing in the deal. The warning against gossips (v. 19) echoes many similar cautions in Amenemope and other ancient sources.

The careful advice in verse 18 illustrates perfectly the proverb found in 1 Kgs 20:11: "It is not for the man who is buckling his armor to boast as though he were taking it off" (1 Kgs 20:11). The explicit sayings about Yahweh's guidance and the need to trust in God found together in verses 22-24 balance those in verses 10-12. The saying about just weights seems somewhat out of place in verse 23, but it is repeated in both halves of the verse and must represent the ideal behavior of those who trust in the Lord. All the other proverbs in the chapter must be read in the light of these two Yahweh sayings in verses 22-24.

Finally, in verse 29 we come to another saying in praise of old age. Wisdom and age are closely associated in the proverbial literature, and especially in those who serve as town elders. See 16:31 and 17:6 for like sentiments. Ezek 7:26 associates the gift of "counsel" with the elders. Other biblical passages that link age and wisdom are Ezek 27:8-9; Job 26:3; 32:7-9; Eccl 4:13; Ps 105:22.

21:1-31. This chapter opens with three sayings about Yahweh and closes with two more. In between is a body of traditional old wisdom offering advice on a wide range of subjects. Since it is probable that the five sayings on Yahweh are intended to interpret the context for all the others, we can broadly characterize the chapter theme as divine control of events. "Man proposes but God disposes" would be the modern equivalent of the editors' judgments on these proverbs. They are very practical, and some may even be a little offensive to our modern sensibilities (vv. 9, 14). The three opening proverbs stress the major fields of divine action: the king subject to Yahweh, final judgment at death, and the importance of worship to ethical conduct. These symbolize all of life's major moments that fall under divine supervision.

The saying on God as weigher of hearts may be a Hebrew equivalent to the Egyptian belief that the god of wisdom, Thoth, judged the heart of the deceased. The heart is often shown on a balance scale weighed against the feather of maat, "right order." If the heart comes out lighter, the soul deserves punishment. Similar references may be seen in Prov 16:2 and 24:12. Generally, Proverbs shows little interest in the question of an afterlife, and so one must be careful not to make too much of this possible interpretation of verse 2. It could mean no more than that Yahweh rewards the just and punishes the wicked in this life. However, verse 3 also has Egyptian parallels on the greater value of right conduct over sacrifice. Merikare says, "Righteousness of the heart is more acceptable to God than the sacrifice of an ox by an unrighteous man."

Other interesting sayings include verse 13, which is an equivalent to the modern boy who cried "Wolf!" once too often; and verse 16, which mentions the "shades" (that is, the spirits of the dead) as though they formed a community in Sheol, the land of the dead. Verse 18 seems strange. It may suggest that God often allows enemies to be defeated so that Israel may benefit from freedom, but it may just as well reflect the thought that God forgives the faults of the just by making the wicked bear the punishment for both. It is a reverse atonement. The only other place where a theology of atonement exists in the Old Testament is in Isa 53, the passage on the suffering servant.

Verse 19 returns to one of the favorite themes in Proverbs, the quarrelsome wife (see 6:14; 6:19; 10:12; 18:18-19; 19:13). Verses 30-31 close the chapter by reaffirming the theology of Second Isaiah discussed above in chapter 19. God's counsel and wisdom far exceed all human efforts, and especially in war; only Yahweh decides the outcome of battles. A particularly effective example to illustrate this is the story of Gideon's battle against the Midianites in Judg 7:1-23.

22:1-16. The final group of proverbs in chapters 10–22 deals with general, practical advice more than with any special summary of what has gone before. Education, wealth, laziness, and adultery all make their return appearance in variations of earlier sayings. Indeed, one of the striking features of these verses is how abruptly they end without any notable attempt to sum up or close out the whole.

Since Israel did not have a belief in an afterlife full of blessing for most of the Old Testament period, a good "name" and reputation were highly valued. One lived on after death in the honor and esteem of generations to come. Thus verse 1 places the value of a name above wealth, just as earlier proverbs placed integrity and justice above wealth (15:16; 19:1). The good name, then, must also include a life of integrity and justice. The theology of verses 2 and 4 brings this point out in reference to Yahweh. God values people, no matter whether rich or poor, and will give reward to those who are humble and reverent. The same can be said of the message of verses 11-12, which emphasize Yahweh's approval of integrity and rejection of dishonest plans and calculations.

The cryptic expression of verse 13 shows the humorous side of proverbs. Even in ancient Israel, one would be hard-pressed to run across a lion in the street very often! Verse 14 recalls the repeated warnings in chapters 1–9 against the adulteress as the jaws of death—see 3:18; 5:5; 7:27; 9:18. Verse 15 links the values of physical discipline and learning. From what we can gather, no one spared the rod in ancient education. Proverbs such as 13:24; 23:13-14; and 29:15 extol the value of using a stick to teach wisdom. Comparison with verse 6 and other passing references indicate that the philosophy behind its use was to knock foolishness out of the student. If he or she made the association between mistaken ways of thinking and the painful consequences, the lesson would last a lifetime. This type of education was probably closely tied to memorizing proverbs for the teacher. Forgetting one could lead to a swift rap on the knuckles.

PART III: THE THIRTY SAYINGS OF THE WISE

Prov 22:17–24:22

For over fifty years scholars have recognized the close connection between 22:17–24:22 and the Egyptian Teaching of Amenemope. Both are classical examples of the Instruction genre, in which commands alternate with motives for obeying. Proverbs 1–9 and 30–31 are also largely in this form. But what sets 22:17–24:22 apart are the extremely close parallels in wording to Amenemope (particularly in 22:17–23:11), sometimes appearing in the same order! Moreover, the general introduction to Amenemope has a decided similarity to the introduction to Proverbs in Prov 1:1-7. Both state the same purpose, as can be seen from Amenemope: "The beginning of the teaching of life, the instruction for success. All precepts for conversation with the great, the rules for courtiers, to know how to answer one who speaks, to return a written message to one who sends it, to direct one on the paths of life, to make him prosper on earth . . . ." The major difference between this stated purpose and Prov 1:1-7 is that the Egyptian work certainly directed its teachings to an elite class of trainees and emphasized the practical success that would result. The Israelite work was ordered more to understanding the meaning of life, particularly the relationship of human knowing to the divine will.

The same is true in Prov 22:17–24:22. While it seems to have known and borrowed from Amenemope, it did not simply reproduce the Egyptian theology. It modified many sayings and added others to give a specifically Israelite faith perspective. The closest parallel to the message of this section of Proverbs is found in Psalm 37. The psalm stresses the salvation of the just and the punishment of the wicked, as does Proverbs, but it places more emphasis on Yahweh as the sole hope of salvation.

Amenemope was composed sometime between 1000 and 600 B.C.E. It is divided into thirty chapters and includes both long and short thought units. In selecting from these, the Hebrew authors left aside many sections that applied only to Egypt or Egyptian beliefs. Thus they eliminated chapter 5 of Amenemope and its long description of the Nile, as well as the extended directive on praying to the sun-god in chapter 7. Israel kept the form of thirty sayings by adding new ideas of its own. In asking why Israel valued this foreign work so highly, the reason must be found in the particular sensitivity of Amenemope toward human dependence on the gods—a characteristic not often prominent in early Egyptian wisdom, which seemed so often to be mostly clever advice on how to get ahead by one's own efforts. Israel's sages obviously felt that much of this material would help deepen their own understanding of Yahweh's action in the world.

22:17-21: The general introduction. The New American Bible translation of these verses is quite radical. The traditional translations do not recognize "Amenemope" or "thirty" sayings, which make the connection clear. But the text of the Hebrew at these points is extremely uncertain and even corrupt. Where verse 19 has "the words of Amenemope" in the New American Bible, the Hebrew today literally reads, "I make known to you today, even to you," which makes little sense. And in verse 20, where "Thirty" stands, the Hebrew suggests "formerly," in the sense that "I wrote to you formerly." Since no one can identify when this former time was, even the ancient Jewish scholars marked this as a corrupted passage. The New American Bible has made only the slightest correction of the Hebrew and is almost certainly the most accurate reconstruction of the original presently available. Chapter 1 of Amenemope uses almost the same wording: "Give your ears, hear what is said, give your heart to understand it . . . . Let it abide in your breast so that it may be a key to your heart. When there is a whirlwind of words, it will be a mooring-stake for your tongue." In chapter 30 of Amenemope, the author concludes: "See these thirty chapters—they entertain and instruct. They are the greatest of all books, they give knowledge to the ignorant." The Egyptian work then dedicates them to the education of the scribe, while the Hebrew adapter leaves them open for anyone to study.

The message of verses 17-21 follows the traditional methods of the wise. There is first a call to hear and listen to teachings that have been discovered and treasured already by others (see Prov 1:8; 2:1; 4:1; 5:1). This is not an invitation to go out and discover the world for oneself. There is a treasury that has been stored up and is now offered to the minds and hearts of the listeners so that they may own the entire deposit personally.

Verse 18 goes on to indicate that possession is not enough—the wisdom of these words must be communicated and acted upon. For what purpose? To trust in God. This is the ethical dimension of faith. One could be asked to believe in God through sheer faith, to obey God through the commandments, or to fear God through worship. But the author picks the word "trust," used by the psalmists again and again to express their confidence that God is a refuge, a source of strength and protection for the moment of need (Pss 9:11; 22:5; 25:2; 31:15; 52:10; 56:5; at least thirty times in all). An interesting insight into what this trust meant to ancient Israel occurs in 2 Kgs 18:19-24, where the Assyrian general belittles the citizens of Jerusalem for trusting in Yahweh over the gods of Assyria. Jer 17:5-7 presents another parallel from prophecy; the prophet challenges the people to choose: either trust in themselves and be cursed, or trust in Yahweh and be blessed. This passage breathes the spirit of wisdom!

22:22-23 First saying. Amenemope says, "Guard yourself from robbing the wretched and driving away a weak man." The context presumes a legal attempt to cheat the poor of their rights. Trials were held at the city gates (Pss 69:13; 127:5; Ruth 4), where the elders would gather. Like the widow and the orphan, the poor often had few defenders (see the insights of Prov 19:4, 6, 7). But Yahweh had special concern for the poor and the weak and would fight their cause (see Pss 69:19; 103:4; 119:154).

22:24-25 Second saying. Here, too, there is a closely related saying in Amenemope: "Do not associate with the hot man, and do not approach him to converse." The hotheaded have very little control over their temper or their words. Both are anathema to the ideals of the wisdom schools.

22:26-27 Third saying. A bit of humor has been injected into an otherwise serious warning: Even the bed with you in it could go! Cautions against standing as the guarantor of a loan are frequent in Proverbs (6:1-5; 11:15; 17:18). Apparently defaults were frequent, and many friendships no doubt came to an end over bad debts. It is still a common maxim that friends should never lend one another money.

22:28 Fourth saying. This is similar to 23:10. Amenemope also warns against the practice: "Do not carry off the landmark at the boundaries of the arable land nor disturb the position of the measuring cord." Deut 19:14 and 27:17 doubly reinforce this same law for Israel. In rocky and hilly Palestine, it is an easy matter to push the boundaries around by moving the piles of rocks that serve as fences and landmarks for each family's ancestral claims. It is therefore a serious matter.

22:29 Fifth saying. The point is that a person skilled in the art of wisdom and proper behavior will go far in the royal bureaucracy. Amenemope closes with this saying: "As for the scribe who is experienced in office, he will find himself worthy to be a courtier."

23:1-3 Sixth saying. If one wants the king's favor, it is necessary to act with proper decorum and humility. This is common Egyptian advice. Ptah-hotep insists, "If you sit at the table with one greater than yourself, take what he may give when it is set before you." Amenemope suggests, "Do not eat bread before a noble, nor lay on your mouth at first." See also Sir 31:16.

23:4-5 Seventh saying. Amenemope is the source of this saying: "Cast not your heart in pursuit of wealth. They have made themselves wings like geese and are flown away to the heavens." The Hebrew author changed the unfamiliar goose to a familiar eagle, but otherwise kept the saying as is. The first line means, "while your glance flits away from it, it is gone."

23:6-8 Eighth saying. The "grudging man" is, literally, a man "of evil eye." This helps make sense of the saying. The meal is a metaphor for involvement with crooked planners. They are either preparing to cheat you or else you will pay a price that poisons you if you join them. Amenemope is clearer: "The property of a poor man is a block to the throat; it makes the throat vomit. If it is obtained by false oaths, his heart is perverted by his belly."

23:9 Ninth saying. Speaking advice to a fool is wasted effort. Compare Amenemope: "Empty not your belly to everybody, and thus damage the regard for yourself."

23:10-11 Tenth saying. This is similar to 22:28 and its parallel from Amenemope. Another saying of the same sage fits here also: "Guard against disturbing the boundaries of the field lest a terror carry you off." It goes on to proclaim that the god protects the land. In Israelite tradition Yahweh is the "redeemer" of the helpless (Prov 19:17; 21:23; 22:9).

23:12 Eleventh saying. This is the standard introduction to the wisdom Instruction form. It seems out of place in the middle here but may introduce a new source for many of the following sayings: The Words of Ahiqar. Prov 22:22–23:11 was closely dependent on Amenemope; the remaining sayings are often similar to Ahiqar, but many are independent. Ahiqar was popular among the Jews—a copy was found in the Jewish colony at Elephantine in Egypt (fifth century B.C.E.).

23:13-14 Twelfth saying. Ahiqar 81-82 is very close: "Withhold not your son from the rod or you cannot keep him from wickedness. If I smite you my son, you will not die, but if I leave you to your own heart, you [will not live]." Ignorance puts one into the grip of death's kingdom, and true life is found only in wisdom, "the fountain of life" (13:14).

23:15-16 Thirteenth saying. Again this saying makes a close link between our interior understanding and our public performance, especially in speaking. The teacher's appeal is both intellectual and emotional. Note the artistic arrangement of the two verses in a chiasm: your—my:my—your.

23:17-18 Fourteenth saying. There are two antitheses here: (1) the zeal for sin or the zeal for fear of the Lord; (2) a lasting future or a future without hope. The value of sin is short-lived, while fear of the Lord offers a future of blessing. God's promises of security and life will endure. A Christian can understand a fuller sense of eternal life in this passage based on the New Testament and not seen by the writer of Proverbs.

23:19-21 Fifteenth saying. This brings together a group of related vices: gluttony, drunkenness, and sloth, all of which were considered destructive of making a living. They were grave social offenses—see Deut 21:20 and prophetic denunciations in Isa 5:11-12; 28:7-9; Ezek 23:33; Amos 6:6.

23:22-23 Sixteenth saying. This and the following saying deal with the family as source of wisdom. This is sometimes called "clan wisdom," because it is passed down by parents and elders in the tribe rather than in formal schools. The language is the same as for school wisdom, however: truth, wisdom, instruction, and understanding.

23:24-25 Seventeenth saying. Many scholars would consider this to be part of the preceding saying. It moves beyond the older wisdom ideal to exalt the value of justice above everything. Note that all four lines stress the joy that being just will bring.

23:26-28 Eighteenth saying. This instruction is close in spirit to chapter 7. The theme is prominent in chapters 1–9 as the greatest danger to a young man seeking wisdom (2:16; 5:3-6; 6:24-25; 7:5-27; 9:13-18). The "pit" may be Sheol, as noted earlier (ch. 7; see also Ps 30:4), but there may be a double entendre here for the sexual role of the female. Hebrew poets loved puns.

23:29-35 Nineteenth saying. This is the longest of the instructions, and the most free in its format. It makes its point about the evils of alcohol by opening and closing with two vividly described scenes of the effects of heavy drinking. Much of the message is carried in rhetorical questions and answers. In fact, verses 29-30 were perhaps originally a riddle and its answer. The warning comes in verses 31-32: wine is great going down, but its effects afterwards! The image of the biting like serpents suggests its fatal results. The authors end on a note of humor that is sadly all too true. The ancients did not know of alcoholism as a disease, but they knew well its symptoms.

24:1-2 Twentieth saying. This proverb echoes Ps 37:1. It is a standard admonition with a standard reason why. Interestingly, this and the next two sayings begin with succeeding letters of the alphabet: aleph in verse 1, beth (v. 3), and ghimel (v. 5). It fails to continue further, but was there perhaps earlier a collection of twenty-two sayings in which each began with the next letter of the alphabet?

24:3-4 Twenty-first saying. Life itself is the house that is furnished by wisdom. A prosperous house is the same as a life full of honor as well as strength. See 9:1 and 14:1.

24:5-6 Twenty-second saying. Wisdom together with strength is the ideal in Israel. See Dan 1:4; 2:23; Isa 11:2, and especially the picture of David and Solomon together. David is the strong hero, and Solomon the wise ruler. Their united monarchy established the pattern of Israel's royal theology. Yahweh, however, is the model for both (see Isa 31:2; Jer 10:12; 51:15; Dan 2:20; Ps 147:5; Job 26:12). Wisdom, though, is superior to strength alone, for it guides strength toward success (see Prov 20:18). The prophets sometimes must condemn human pride in one's own wisdom and strength (see Isa 10:13; Jer 9:23; 51:57).

24:7 Twenty-third saying. The setting for this saying is the city gate, where justice was administered (see the comments on 22:22 above). The NAB translation is strange and somewhat contradictory. The Hebrew text reads more clearly: "Too high is wisdom for the fool; he is not to speak in the gate."

24:8-9 Twenty-fourth saying. The intrigue that is condemned is calculated evil, carefully planned out. A person who plans this is identified with the worst of wisdom's enemies. A literal translation of verse 9 makes the condemnation clearer: "The intrigue is sinful foolishness, and such a scoffer is an abomination to all people."

24:10-12 Twenty-fifth saying. There is some question whether verse 10 belongs with verses 11-12. But it stands as a call to action, which is given concrete application in verses 11-12 for an extreme case. The situation that the proverb writer has in mind is not absolutely certain, although it must deal with the case of an innocent person condemned. Execution was often immediate, so that if a witness knew the truth, the time to act was right away. The reference to God as the tester of hearts is discussed above (p. 663).

24:13-14 Twenty-sixth saying. Honey has always served as the natural sugar and favorite sweet of the Near East. Even today stores throughout the Arab world are filled with pastries smothered in honey. It is very high praise of wisdom to think of it as the honey of the soul.

24:15-16 Twenty-seventh saying. The two parts are not connected by logic. Verse 15 serves as a warning not to do violence against the just person. The reason given in verse 16 suggests that plotting evil soon trips up the plotter in quick ruin, while the upright bounce back from sin. It probably refers the judgment to God, who will forgive the just many times. Note the Aramaic proverb, "Seven parts for the righteous, one part for the wicked."

24:17-18 Twenty-eighth saying. Lev 19:18 commands Israelites not to bear grudges or seek vengeance against their own people. This proverb can be understood as an extension of that law. Its final line, however, gives an unexpected reason: if we do not rejoice in the enemy's downfall, God will assure that it will take place anyway. The ultimate sense must be that we are to leave retribution in God's good judgment.

24:19-20 Twenty-ninth saying. The message of this saying is similar to that of the preceding one, but it is much clearer. Do not be angered yourself nor seek after vengeance (NAB's "envious"). It is God who controls the future and extinguishes the lamp (=life) of the wicked (13:9; 20:20) or establishes it (1 Kgs 11:36; 15:4; Ps 132:17; 2 Sam 21:17—all said of David).

24:21-22 Thirtieth saying. All ancients knew the power of kings to do as they chose. Ahiqar warns his son, "Soft is the tongue of a king, but it breaks the ribs of a dragon!" An example of royal power perverted in the service of evil is found in the story of King Ahab and Naboth's vineyard in 1 Kgs 21. How much more must one fear the judgment and punishment of God!

24:23-34 An appendix: Further sayings of the wise. These twelve verses have a separate heading, indicating that they were attached to chapters 22–24 as a supplement. There are two themes: justice in the law courts and the ethic of responsible work. No special connection to Yahweh is mentioned, and it is reasonable to assume that these are an older series of proverbs aimed at the student of wisdom in the schools. The two themes are interlocked, so that verses 23-26 deal with false judges, verse 27 with work, verses 28-29 with false witnesses in court, and verses 30-34 with laziness at work.

Society depends on both values—justice and work—for health. The false judge and the lying witness are strongly denounced by citizens because the community's basis of trust is undermined. The kiss on the lips in verse 26 was a sign of trust and friendship. The Gospels confirm how sacred was the symbol when they record that Judas betrayed Jesus with a kiss (Matt 26:48-50; Mark 14:44-45; Luke 22:47-48). Verse 29 cautions against vengeance and gives the same basic advice as verses 20-22: leave the punishment in the hands of God.

The picture of the untilled field is a sharply drawn cartoon of the lazy man. Its theme is much the same as that of 6:9-11, and the technique of education by ridicule is exactly the same as that employed in the instruction on drinking in 23:29-35.

PART IV: HEZEKIAH'S COLLECTION OF OLD PROVERBS

Prov 25:1–29:27

A second Solomonic collection

The title of this section states that officials of King Hezekiah (715–688 B.C.E.) edited and collected proverbs that stemmed from the time of Solomon (or from Solomon himself or from the royal schools founded by him!). Two aspects can be noted from the start. One is that many of the proverbs repeat those in the earlier collection of chapters 10–22. Compare, for example, 25:24 and 21:9; 26:15 and 19:24; 27:12 and 22:3; 28:19 and 12:11; 29:3 and 10:1. The second is that the connection to Yahweh is rarely made. Chapter 25 mentions God once, chapter 28 twice, chapter 29 three times, chapters 26 and 27 not at all. The first three chapters are good examples of older secular wisdom, while the last two provide somewhat more direct reflections on Israelite piety.

25:1-28 An Egyptian-style instruction. It has been shown that this chapter is based on an Egyptian model of instructions for a king and his subjects. It is a mixture of admonitions and practical sayings about life. But it has a clear structure. There is an introduction in verses 2-5 stating the role of the king (vv. 2-3) and then that of the wicked who threaten the king's rule (vv. 4-5). This is followed by an extended section on the king (vv. 6-15) and then on the wicked (vv. 16-26). Each part has six units. A general statement concludes the section (vv. 27-28). The chapter is thought to be a product of the royal schools because of its high regard for the king and for loyal obedience by subjects. It contains very few of the important words that occur regularly in chapters 10–22. This probably indicates that this chapter was edited earlier than chapters 10–22.

This royal instruction opens in verses 2-3 with praise for the special divine favor shown to kings. Kings were invested with greater wisdom than ordinary mortals (see 1 Kgs 3) and were subject only to the vastly greater wisdom of the gods. Ancient kings saw themselves as delegated by the god to govern the divine kingdom on earth. And yet, as verses 4-5 make clear, evil tolerated or allowed to gain power will destroy the blessing from the gods.

The advice in verses 6-15 on how to act before a king and how to speak as a diplomat is generally quite practical if we keep in mind that the student of the scribal school is to master the art of speaking well. Verse 6 becomes a parable of Jesus on places of honor at table (Luke 14:7-11). Verse 14 could be summarized as "all talk, no action" in modern idiom. Verse 15 recalls the saying of Ahiqar that a king's speech is soft but is also sharper than a sword and stronger than a club that breaks ribs (see also Prov 15:18).

The more general advice in verses 6-16 concentrates on the contrast between moderation combined with self-control (vv. 16, 17, 21, 22, 25, 27, 28) and the destructive effects of disorder (false witnesses, v. 18; unreliability, v. 19; grief, v. 20; backbiting, v. 23; and weak resolve, v. 26). Verses 21-22 propose treating enemies with kindness as a way of putting them to shame and, by means of the image of coals, to "burn" the lesson into them. It may sound anything but altruistic in spirit, but it is a practical way of reducing the bitter violence that hatred causes. Some scholars would soften the picture a little by translating the first part of verse 22 as "live coals you will take from his head."

In verse 28, the New American Bible has "feelings" for the Hebrew ruah, "spirit." Someone's spirit is the power of life in "the image and likeness of God" (Gen 1:27; see Ezek 37:1-14). Evil will easily overcome the person whose spirit has not been trained in the moderation and self-control proposed by the wisdom teachers.

26:1-28. There is no specifically religious content in chapter 26. It can be divided into three major topics: the fool (vv. 1-12, using the strong Hebrew sense of the "stupid one"); the lazy person (vv. 13-16); and evil speech (vv. 17-28).

Generally, the wisdom position on the fool can be stated simply: to deal with the fool seriously makes one a fool in turn. Wisdom is perverted by the fool, who does not understand the value of good order, logical thinking, self-control, or self-denial for a larger good. The fool thinks only of what he or she can get right now and interprets everything in that selfish light. The result is a totally unbridled person, badly in need of severe disciplining to get back on the way of social responsibility (v. 3). The opposite advice in verses 4-5 shows the difficulty involved in dialogue with fools. They do not learn, and their speaking endangers all around them. The fool cannot be taught and cannot be corrected, and all who attempt it come to grief themselves (v. 10). Verse 11 illustrates the point graphically and is later quoted by 2 Pet 2:22 in the New Testament.

Verses 13-16 gather together another small section on the lazy. Verse 13 repeats 22:13; verse 15 repeats 19:24; verse 14 is similar in theme to 24:33. Thus these are not a new series of ideas. The attention to laziness was popular among the wise, and there were probably two independent collections that used the same sayings.

The remainder of the chapter deals with the harmful effects of speech wrongly used. It is focused on hypocrisy and deceptive words. A surface seriousness conceals evil intentions in the heart of the speaker. Like glaze on the surface of a pot that has never been fired (and thus is likely to break easily), smooth words conceal much deception that will shortly bring the trusting listener to disaster or loss. Verse 26 suggests that such hidden evil is found out by observing the religious practice of the individual. Verse 27 expresses the traditional Israelite conviction that evil brings evil on itself (the plots of both Daniel and Esther are examples).

27:1-27. The advice covers the full range of wisdom concerns, and the individual sayings are not grouped by themes that can be easily identified. Friendship and neighbors appear the most frequently (vv. 5, 6, 8, 10, 14, 16, 19). Verses 23-27 form a single extended image of agrarian life.

The chapter opens with a saying similar to one in Amenemope, "Man does not know what the morrow is like." A parable of Jesus about the rich man who filled his barns and then died the same night makes the same point (Luke 12:16-21). Verses 3 and 7 both echo imagery used in the words of Ahiqar, "I have lifted sand and carried salt, but there is nothing heavier than debt," and "hunger sweetens what is bitter." While Prov 27 certainly does not use the images identically, it does reflect the influence of international wisdom.

Friendship is extolled when it is frankly honest. Correction and learning can only come from a forthright "telling it like it is" in contrast to the flatterer or liar. The New American Bible translation has lost the analogy of friendship in verse 9 by suggesting the word "grief." The second half of the verse more properly reads, "and the sweetness of friends (is better) than perfumed wood." A friend is valued because he or she is close at hand and presumably concerned enough to give help and support.

Other practical advice warns against anger and jealousy (v. 4), loans to strangers who may leave the country without repaying (v. 13), and excessive curiosity (v. 20), which can be as greedy as death itself, never allowing even one victim to go free from its hold. Finally, verses 23-27 draw for us an ideal farming community that is self-sufficient. Such pastoral imagery occurs occasionally in Proverbs and reflects the predominant occupations of farming and herding. But most of its advice is directed to the urban professional class found in palaces, schools, temples, law courts, and civil government. This reminds us that Israel was also an important trading nation that carried on commerce throughout the Mediterranean world and needed large numbers of experts trained in language and diplomacy, and possessing economic and mathematical skills to work out business transactions. This merchant-orientation of Proverbs also explains the insistence on just weights and honest speech free from any hint of fraud or deceit in negotiations. International trust depended on it.

28:1-28. Although Yahweh is mentioned only in verses 5 and 25, the majority of the proverbs in chapter 28 reflect a very developed piety and morality built around the concepts of care for the poor and obedience to the law. The chapter opens with another saying on the just versus the wicked. Poverty is not extolled as a good, but it is far better to be poor and have integrity than fall prey to the temptations of greed that plague the wealthy, who always seem to crave more.

The major development of this theme is seen in verses 3, 6, 8, 11, 20, 22, 25, 27. Wealth may be a sign of both divine blessing and of industrious behavior (vv. 19-20); it is only greed that runs over others that is condemned. This is not, however, merely a late piety speaking. Care for the poor is the foundation of a king's throne, and a nation without justice will fall. This belief is reflected in all ancient societies around Israel as well. Compare the words of Esarhaddon, king of Assyria (681–669 B.C.E.), explaining why Babylon fell to his armies and was destroyed: "They [the citizens] oppressed the weak and gave him into the power of the strong. Inside the city there was tyranny, the receiving of bribes; each day without fail they plundered each other's goods . . . Marduk, the Enlil of the gods, was angry and devised evil to overwhelm the land and destroy the peoples."

The defense against such rampant injustice, according to the authors of this chapter, is faithfulness to the law (vv. 4, 7, 9). The law of Moses is closely associated with the ideal of justice (see Exod 21; Lev 19; Deut 14–15; Ps 119:142). Thus the common wisdom of ancient nations is given a specifically Israelite framework for putting it into pratice.

Another mark of human wisdom subjected to worship is the concern of verse 13 that everyone needs mercy for sins committed. It can be achieved by an open admission of guilt to God. The Babylonians also recognized the value of confession but were not as confident that it always worked. Verse 26 can be taken as a summary of the Israelite point of view. Humans cannot be truly wise if they trust only in themselves. There are too many evils catalogued in these sayings—fraud (v. 24), greed (vv. 22, 25), flattery (v. 23), and partiality (v. 21)—that will lead them astray. All of them result from pride, and the only safeguard is humble submission to Yahweh (see also 29:23).

29:1-27. Many of the sayings in chapter 29 deal with two themes: the king (vv. 1, 2, 3, 4, 12, 14, 16, 26) and the need for disciplined learning (vv. 15, 17, 19, 21). A subtheme, related to these two, deals with the passion of anger and its subsequent loss of self-control. Much of the wisdom language of Prov 1–9 and 10–22 returns in this chapter: the just, the wicked, the wise, the fool, the upright, and the arrogant, as well as justice, correction, and rebuke. It is the best of old wisdom organized around Yahweh, who gives blessing and life to every individual equally (vv. 13, 26).

The proverbs in verses 8-11 center on the wise as peacemakers in the community, and verses 17-22 stress aspects of speaking according to wise training. Verses 13-14 return to the theme of the poor (see chapter 28). Verse 13 in particular reminds one of Jesus' saying, "The sun rises on the evil and the good alike" (Matt 5:45). It is also close to Prov 14:31; 17:5; 22:2. Verse 14 on the responsibility of the king toward the poor is very much like the demands of Psalm 72 and reflects the Israelite ideal of kingship (see the earlier discussion on Prov 15:1-33, p. 660, and the Ugaritic text of King Keret quoted there).

Discipline is praised as the means to guide a person on the way of the just. The strong statement on the value of physical beating in verse 15 is based on the need to check our personal urges until we have had a chance to examine and question what we should do. This is the method of the wisdom tradition.

Verse 27 closes this fourth collection of materials with the unmistakable assertion that there can be no compromise between the way of the wicked and the way of uprightness. In this, wisdom is completely equated with moral behavior.

PART V: THE WORDS OF AGUR AND LEMUEL

Prov 30:1–31:31

30:1-9. These nine verses are a single unit attributed to Agur, the son of Jakeh, who is otherwise unknown. If, as the New American Bible translates, he is from Massa, it suggests wisdom from the East beyond Edom. Gen 25:14 identifies Massa as an area in northern Arabia. Edom itself, another north Arabian neighbor, was famed for its wisdom in biblical tradition (see Jer 49:7; Obad 8). However, many scholars doubt that this Massa is meant. The Hebrew word also means "oracle," and is closely followed here by a standard prophetic formula, "The pronouncement (of the Lord)." The second part of verse 1 is also very difficult. It may mean either "I have no God" or "who has no God." Some propose another sense, "one who wearies himself about God." The only translation that is certainly not correct is the traditional literal rendering of the Hebrew, "The man says to Ithiel, to Ithiel and Ucal." Such names are unknown and make no sense in this context.

The meaning of the whole passage, however, is not in doubt. Human knowledge is nothing compared with that of God. It is the same message as Isa 40:12-18, prophetic in spirit, challenging the hearer to learn humility before the mystery of God's transcendence (v. 4). God's word is always to be trusted and stands without need of any help from us. The thought echoes the orthodox defense of the divine word found in Ps 18:30 or Deut 4:2. It concludes in verses 7-9 with a double wish: that God may guard the author both from a lying tongue and from want, so that there will not be any temptation to destroy his or her trust in God's powerful care.

Numerical proverbs in 30:10-33. Most of these verses are in the form of comparisons or riddles. The formula for the riddle is the use of succeeding numbers, "three things and four," or just a set number, "four things there are . . . ." Recall the old English riddle: "Four stiff-standers, four dilly-danders, two lookers, two crookers, and a wig-wag." The answer is a cow, and it is gotten by making a relationship between the five descriptive comparisons. Though Proverbs does not ask us to guess the answers, it does force us to figure out what the four given elements have in common in the five examples: vv. 15-17, 18-19, 21-23, 24-28, 29-33. Riddles are fun but also educational, and they help train students in the use of analogy.

30:10-14. The New American Bible places the end of Agur's reflections at verse 6; other scholars see it continuing to verse 10. The answer is according to taste. The slander mentioned in verse 10 may be connected to the lying in verse 8, or else it may introduce the groups named in verses 11-14 who do harm by what they say. Since verses 11-14 belong together as four examples of those who destroy the spirit of trust in a community, verse 10 may be a later addition placed next to verse 11 because it also mentions cursing. Probably the four lines were introduced by a formula similar to the ones that follow: "Three groups, yes, four I disdain" (or something like it). This grouping shows strong overtones of condemnation and is not merely a casual observation of behavior.

30:15-16. An independent saying about the leech introduces this first real numerical proverb. The common element in both this saying and the four examples is an unlimited desire for more—greed. Since the focus in these riddles is on human behavior, the key comparison is not in the images from nature, but the example of the barren womb and what it says about longing for parenthood.

30:17. This short saying returns us to verse 11 and thus rounds out the whole section from verses 10-17. The overall theme has been selfish greed, and its worst form leads to rejection of respect for parents. The law in Exod 21:17 and Lev 20:9 is just as strong!

30:18-20. The key to this comparison is in the mystery of how a thing happens, especially the mystery of love between a man and a woman. Some hold that seduction is the issue, but that would make the comparisons meaningless. Others think it is the attraction of forbidden sex because of verse 20. But that is an addition from later intended as a warning against allowing lust to overcome love.

30:21-23. The four objects of comparison in this riddle are all human stereotypes of arrogance. In a sense they are the standard cast of characters from comedy shows, and more than a little humor is intended here. Each one represents the Peter Principle at its worst—someone who has gone way past ability and makes up for incompetence by being overbearing.

30:24-28. In contrast to the preceding, the images in this saying are all from the animal world. The ant is famed for its industry, the badger for its tenacity, the locust for its disciplined mass migrations, and the lizard for its resourcefulness under any conditions. Naturally, the lesson of how these weak creatures succeed so well is intended for the human audience.

30:29-31. The Hebrew text is difficult in these verses and so translations differ. The combination of three proud beasts and a human king fits the pattern of verses 18-19, so that the translation in the New American Bible is probably correct. The message is not profound, but it represents well the ancient experience of kings and their splendor.

30:32-33. This summarizes the riddle collection. The major theme has been pride and proneness to easy anger when others disagree. The reader is warned against both by the prophetic tone of the chapter.

31:1 The words of Lemuel. The label in 31:1 presents the same problem as 30:1. Does "Massa" mean an Arab place name or does it mean "oracle"? The New American Bible fudges here by translating it both ways, "king of Massa" and "The advice." At least the sense is not lost by preserving both! A second problem is whether this heading covers both verses 1-9 and 10-31. Most scholars would consider the poem on the ideal woman to be a separate piece attached at the end as a kind of conclusion to the whole Book of Proverbs. This is discussed below.

31:1-9. This piece is written in the traditional Instruction genre for royal officials. Probably the person of Lemuel is a fiction to give weight to the advice that follows. Under the cover of the education of the king-to-be, the author presents practical guidelines for a prudent and wise life. The fact that it is called a mother's advice probably underscores that what is taught here was reckoned as traditional family or clan wisdom. On the other hand, it may indicate a Judean origin in the royal schools. From the Book of Kings we know that the queen-mother was an important position in the royal administration of the southern kingdom (1 Kgs 14:21; 15:2; 1 Kgs 11:1-16).

The lesson comes with three commands:

restrain your sexual appetite, do not become the victim of drink, respect the rights of the poor by doing justice. The first probably refers to harem intrigues—many kings have fallen or been assassinated because of strife that began in the jealousies of the palace. Wine, too, undoes all of the self-control and discipline that wisdom teaches (see 23:29-35). Israel itself records a fanatical group, the Rechabites, who opposed all drinking of wine (see 2 Kgs 9 and Jer 35). But the most important teaching is last. The king represents justice in the land and must be the final refuge and appeal of the poor against corrupt officials. See the earlier discussion at 16:10-15; 28:1-28 and 29:1-27.

31:10-33. Proverbs ends with this acrostic poem of twenty-two lines (each line beginning with the next letter of the Hebrew alphabet). This makes it a highly artistic creation, and more impressionistic perhaps than strictly logical in its order of thought. The good wife has been an important theme throughout Proverbs (11:16; 12:4; 18:22; 19:14), and so it is not surprising that the book should end with the example of a woman as the ideal wise person. In some ways the litany of good qualities resembles the traditional marriage song in praise of the bride, an example of which is found in Song of Songs 7:1-10. These marriage songs describe the physical beauty of the woman from head to foot to show that her beauty is complete. Here it is her wisdom and good management that are complete.

In light, however, of the themes found in chapters 1–9 on Lady Wisdom versus the adulterous woman or the foolish woman, it is probably better to see in this passage more than a picture of the perfect wife. She is wisdom in action—the model of self-control, prudence, understanding, and just behavior. Even more particularly, it is the wisdom who called out at the city gates for people to listen (1:21; 8:3), and wisdom that was manifest in fear of the Lord (1:7; 9:10), just as this woman is marked by fear of the Lord and her praises sung in the city gates (31:30-31). The husband can be identified with the young man of chapters 1–9 who heeds wisdom's call. As a result, he is a man of stature and respect in the community.

The poem opens with a stanza describing how much a man depends on a good wife for prosperity (vv. 10-12). The remaining verses then alternate between her ability as a business woman and her prudent care of her own family. It may seem strange that a woman is praised for her commercial dealings, since this is an area reserved to men in the Old Testament (except for the rare case of a queen in power—for example, the queen of Sheba in 1 Kgs 10). But we should understand "commerce" in verses 13, 14, 16, and 24 as a metaphor for wisdom. The international exchange of wisdom throughout the Ancient Near East is aptly portrayed as a commercial transaction. Israel buys only the best of what will fit its own theology. The search, however, often leads to far places.

An Arab proverb states, "A clever woman is never without wool." This ideal woman is prepared; she is the opposite of the fool or lazy person. She "delights" in her primary responsibility to her family, working late at night, creating things by the skills she has mastered, seeing needs ahead of time. Making clothes is the chief metaphor of such practical wisdom. The clothes cover the body and give it shape, protection, and a liveliness in the same way that wisdom forms, guards, and enriches the mind and spirit. Moreover, verses 23 and 25 promise that the reward of a marriage to wisdom will be respect and honor—the same "weight" mentioned in other proverbs (11:16; 21:21; 22:4; 29:23). The reference to the city gates in verse 23 emphasizes the judicial role of the husband in settling disputes.

The woman's teaching consists of wisdom and mercy ("kindly counsel" in verse 26). It excels all other virtues that one can strive to obtain (v. 29), and may well combine the ideals of prophet and wise person into one, since "mercy" is the central concept of the covenant theology of the prophets. If we can push this mere hint that far, chapter 31 would correspond nicely to the mix of teaching and prophetic exhortation found in chapters 1 and 9, so that the beginning and end balance one another. Then the children and the husband of the ideal woman represent the disciples of wisdom, who have accepted as one the teachings of the law, the prophets, and the wisdom books.

Although the passage most certainly has Lady Wisdom in mind, we must not forget that it also gives a real example of womanly ability and achievement. Rather than being just another passage describing the submissive wife in the ancient world, it reveals the remarkably even-handed approach of Proverbs that recognizes wisdom where it is found—in men and women alike.

JOB

Michael D. Guinan, O.F.M.

INTRODUCTION

One of the most basic characteristics of being human is the capacity to sense injustice and to fight against it. We experience something as unfair and are willing to stand up and say so; we put ourselves on the line rather than submit. The biblical Book of Job is an expression of just such a capacity and just such a stand. Throughout the centuries many have found in it an eloquent presentation of their own pains and sufferings as they have struggled to understand the justice of God in the face of their own broken experience. (In scholarly circles, such an undertaking is known as "theodicy.") To study the history of the interpretation of Job is almost as revealing of human experience as to study the book itself.

The problem is, of course, nothing new. Some of the oldest literature we know from the ancient Near East, from Sumer, wrestles with this question of the suffering of the innocent. In addition, several treatises along similar lines have come down to us from both Mesopotamia and Egypt. As beautiful a voice as it is, then, Job's is not a solo voice but soars over a surging chorus.

When the Book of Job joined the chorus is not an easy question. Scholars have generally been inclined to locate it in the context of the Babylonian Exile. Some would see it more in the struggles and confusion leading up to the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem in 587 B.C.E. Others locate it in the search for meaning and soul-searching during the time of the Exile itself. Still others place it after the Exile in the Persian period (after 538 B.C.E.), reflecting back on the trauma and chaos recently survived. While full certainty about the dating may be elusive, we must admit that the book has such a universal quality to it that ultimately the dating question may not be of great importance.

The question of dating is not the only problematic aspect of this book. Its readers and interpreters face difficulties on almost every page. It may be helpful to sort these difficulties into two broad clusters: (1) difficulties arising from the book itself; and (2) difficulties arising from its social and religious background. In short, we face problems of text and context.

Difficulties arising from the text

The first problem is the received Hebrew text itself. It is very corrupt, many passages being practically unintelligible. Compounding this is the vocabulary of the book. As very elevated poetry, it abounds in rich and diverse expressions, rare words, and words occurring only once in the Bible. Some scholars have even suggested that the composer of Job made up words to convey multiple levels of meaning. All of this means that Job is an exceptionally difficult book to translate. Recourse is often had to the related Semitic languages—Aramaic, Arabic and Ugaritic—in an attempt to elucidate obscure passages. A comparison of modern translations would prove interesting in this regard. A glance at ancient translations (for example, the Greek or Aramaic) assures us that they faced the same basic problems that we do today.

When we move to the next level, that of literary history and composition, problems again abound. A prose, narrative prologue and epilogue encase a long poetic dialogue between Job and his friends. Was the prose story originally older and separate? There seem to be three cycles of speeches between Job and the three friends, but the third cycle is in considerable disarray. How is this to be sorted out? Are the wisdom hymn in chapter 28 and the Elihu speeches (chs. 32–37) original or later additions? Scholars dispute these and many other points of detail. We will be concerned primarily with the Book of Job as we have it and with the translation of the New American Bible (NAB). While at times we will have to refer to disputed points, they will not loom large in our commentary.

A third type of problem involves the overall meaning of the book. It does not seem to answer nor deal directly with the questions Job raises. We will defer our discussion of this until the end of our commentary, until after we have read and studied our way through the book.

Difficulties arising from the context

The Book of Job was written about 2500 years ago within the context of Israelite culture and religion. We can well imagine that ancient Israelites, reading or hearing the story, would respond from within that context and would pick up overtones and undertones that escape us as inhabitants of another space, time, and thought world. While we can never expect to carry ourselves back in such a way as to catch all the nuances, we can discern certain broad aspects of the ancient culture and religion that can help us to situate ourselves and to begin to bridge the culture gap. Here we would highlight three elements of both the cultural and the religious contexts of Job.

Cultural

1) Job lives within a tribal culture. He is the patriarch of the tribe and is concerned about its needs, namely its growth, in terms of both his own descendants and his land, possessions, and prosperity. Family ties are close, and he can expect to live on (at this time the Israelites did not have any concept of a life after death) in the presence of his descendants and in their memory.

2) The tribal culture is also an oral one. Communication and education depend primarily on the spoken word; it is this that ties society together. As the exchange between Job and his friends heats up, the rhetoric will become more bombastic, even insulting. This is consonant with an oral culture in which the important thing is not simply that something be said but also how it is said. What people say looms very, very large as well, and this leads directly to our third trait.

3) The tribal, oral culture is predominately a shame culture. In such a context honor and shame are pivotal values, if not the pivotal values. A good name or reputation carries weight and makes one honorable (the Hebrew word for "honor," in fact, means basically "to have weight"). That Job seems to be in the wrong, and is called such by his friends, would have been in itself a source of great suffering and affliction. It is important not only to be right and just but to be recognized as such by others. While such a position may seem strange to us, for whom "being honest" and "doing your own thing" are so important, many other parts of our globe, such as the Mediterranean cultures (Spain, Italy, Greece, the Arab countries) and the Asian cultures of the Far East, still largely convey an honor-shame value system.

Religious

1) According to Jer 18:18, three sources of religious leadership and guidance were available to ancient Israel: the law of the priest, the word of the prophet, and the counsel of the wise. It is to this third category that the Book of Job belongs. It speaks from the context of the wise and wisdom theology. For our purposes, two aspects of wisdom thought may be singled out: (a) Wisdom depends on and speaks from experience. It is in the everyday happenings of our lives and in our reflection on them—expressed most characteristically in proverbial form—that we find wisdom and God's teaching. (b) According to the common teaching of wisdom, wise, righteous living should, generally speaking, bring with it the rewards of fuller life, especially offspring and prosperity. It is precisely Job's experience (a) which seriously calls the doctrine (b) into question.

2) In presenting Job's argument with God, the Book of Job draws heavily on legal imagery. If someone had a complaint against another, that person would first try to settle the issue informally. If this failed, the defendant swore an oath of innocence and appealed to a third party, a judge, who would call on the accuser to present evidence. Legal language abounds as Job protests his innocence and calls for some third party to stand with him (for example, 9:33; 16:19; 19:25).

3) In addition to wisdom themes and legal expressions, the Book of Job is situated within the context and language of lamentation. In times of distress and affliction, Israel poured out its lament before the Lord. Lamentation is the spontaneous response to the presence of the realm of death, in whatever manifestation of brokenness, in our lives. It is a loud, religious "Ouch!" When we stub our toe, we cry out in pain; when something in our experience stubs our "religious toe," we lament. Lamentation is present throughout the Bible (the Book of Lamentations, Jeremiah, many of the psalms), but it is something we today have lost touch with and may need to rediscover. We will return to this at the end of our study.

These elements of culture and religion obviously overlap and influence each other. Thus, Job suffers the loss of his family and possessions; he seems to be unrighteous, a conclusion his friends quickly draw. In his shame he pours out his lament to God and calls on God for a hearing that will acknowledge his innocence for all to see. At various points in our commentary we will refer back to these issues.

Outline of the book

The following general outline may guide us as we work our way through the Book of Job:

I. The Prologue (1:1–2:13)
There is a wager in heaven and the just Job is despoiled of everything. Three friends arrive to console him.

II. The Poetic Dialogue (3:1–31:40)
After Job bitterly laments his lot, the three friends rise to God's defense. They argue back and forth through three cycles of speeches until Job ends with a fervent oath of innocence.

III. The Elihu Speeches (32:1–37:24)
A brash youth interrupts and manages to say little that is new or helpful.

IV. The Yahweh Speeches (38:1–42:6)
Yahweh finally responds in two long speeches and overwhelms Job into silence.

V. Epilogue (42:7-17)
Job's fortunes are restored and they all live happily ever after.

COMMENTARY

I. PROLOGUE

Job 1:1-2:13

A prose prologue in five scenes, alternating between earth and heaven, opens the book, sets the stage, and introduces the characters. From a calm and happy beginning, the action moves quickly, ending in suffering, tension, and confusion.

1:1-5 Scene one: Earth. We meet "a man" (the first word in the Hebrew text) whose name is Job. Although the name was not uncommon in the ancient Near East, its precise meaning is uncertain. The best guess—"where is [my] Father [God]?"—is appropriate but almost certainly coincidental. The figure of Job seems rather to be an old legendary hero of faith (see Ezek 14:14, 20). Uz is certainly located in the broad territory east of the Jordan River, but whether it is in the more northerly Aramean region or the more southerly area of Edom is hard to determine. At any rate, Job is presented as a non-Israelite.

More important, this man is a model of upright and virtuous living. His "fear of God" refers not to a servile emotion but to a response of obedient faith (see Deut 10:12). Within the context of wisdom theology, the fear of God is also the beginning and the essence of wisdom (Job 28:28; Prov 1:7; 9:10) and usually brings with it prosperity and a full life (see Prov 3:13-18). Job is thus blessed with seven sons and three daughters, an abundance of livestock, and male and female slaves (better than NAB's "work animals").

Job's righteousness is highlighted even further. On the chance that one of his children, in the midst of their periodic family celebrations, might have sinned and cursed God, Job intercedes for his loved ones and sacrifices whole-burnt offerings on their behalf. This rosy, idyllic situation is about to end.

1:6-12 Scene two: Heaven. Yahweh (NAB: "the Lord"), like an Oriental monarch holding court, is surrounded by the "sons of God." In ancient mythology these were originally lesser divine beings, but in the Bible they are demoted to the status of servants and attendants of Yahweh (see 1 Kgs 22:19-23). To imagine them as angels, in the sense of later Christian theology, is surely an anachronism. Among them is the Satan. This is not a proper name, as in the same later Christian theology, but rather describes an office and a function: "the adversary." He seems to have been God's CIA agent checking up on things around the world. We, the readers, are aware of Job's integrity; now we learn that God is also aware of it, and in fact takes pride in Job (v. 8). The Satan is skeptical and, in front of the whole heavenly court, suggests that Job is virtuous simply because he gets something out of it. If Job were to lose all these blessings, what would he say then? He would flagrantly curse God. In the context of a shame culture, Yahweh's honor is now involved and has a stake in the outcome. The Satan is allowed to put Job to the test, something he hastens to do.

1:13-22 Scene three: Earth. In quick succession, four messengers rush in reporting disaster. Job's blessings of scene one are stripped away—first his livestock, then his slaves, finally his children. Forces of destruction both human (Sabeans and Chaldeans) and natural (lightning and whirlwind) are let loose by Satan, reducing Job's cosmos to chaos. With dramatic gestures typical of lamentation and mourning, Job tears his garments (see, for example, Gen 37:29, 34), shaves his head (see Isa 15:2; Jer 7:29), and casts himself to the earth from which he was taken and to which he will return. The Satan, however, is frustrated in his hopes. When Job opens his lips to speak, he utters what seems almost a religious proverb and blesses God. He does not say anything to bring shame to God.

2:1-6 Scene four: Heaven. The scene quickly changes; the heavenly court is again in session. God, almost chuckling, is enjoying the vindication of both God's servant and God's honor. Verse 3b is important because it further confirms what we already know—and what Job will staunchly maintain throughout the book: there is no connection between Job's virtuous life and his sufferings. The Satan replies with a proverb so terse (three words in both Hebrew and English) that its meaning almost completely eludes us. It seems to suggest some sort of trade-off. Job has blessed God, it would seem, only in order to protect his own life. If Job's person is attacked as well, he will surely curse God. Thus Job falls into the power of the Satan, who rushes out to do his dirty work.

2:7-13 Scene five: Earth. Job is immediately struck with a repulsive disease whose poetic description, both here and elsewhere in the book (7:5; 19:17, 20), will not yield to more precise medical diagnosis. His wife enters the stage, delivers her one line, and then disappears into the wings, thus creating a vacuum that later tradition would fill by giving her both a name (Sitis) and a more prominent place. Job reproves her for speaking "as senseless women do" (v. 10). He is not implying that women as such are foolish; biblical wisdom recognizes and praises wise women (Prov 31:10-31; Judg 5:29; 2 Sam 14:1-20). In this instance, his wife has offered foolish advice. Folly, the opposite of wisdom (Prov 9:1-12, 13-18), describes primarily the behavioral failure to recognize, speak, and do the right thing at the right time. As such, folly contributes to the breakdown of social and cosmic unity and harmony that God, through wisdom, calls all of us to foster and manifest. Job does not yield to the temptation to speak foolishness. As the Hebrew text says, "in all this, he did not sin with his lips" (v. 10).

Three friends (there is no basis for the later belief that they were kings) hear of Job's plight and gather from their distant homelands, which cannot be identified with certainty. Moved by genuine compassion, they come to offer comfort and consolation, but the sight of his condition, so radically changed, moves them too to traditional expressions of lamentation (see 1:20 above; also Josh 7:16; 1 Sam 4:12). They sit with him in the dust and speak perhaps the wisest consolation, their silence.

And so the prologue ends. Job is left, "a man" now literally on the earth, and God, who dwells in heaven, looks down. How will these two, in their two places, relate and interact? The Satan has loomed large, using natural phenomena, marauders, physical disease, and Job's wife to get him to curse God, to "sin with his lips" (1:11, 22; 2:5, 9, 10). With his failure, the Satan too disappears into the wings; in what follows, his work will be furthered by Job's friends, until now silent. We, the readers, and God know that Job is in fact completely innocent. The issue at stake is: What will Job say? The audience, the listeners—God, the friends, the readers—wait in anticipation. We do not have long to wait.

II. JOB'S MONOLOGUE: LAMENTATION

Job 3:1-26

The proverbial "patience of Job" comes to a dramatic end, never to reappear. So far Job's responses to his various afflictions have manifested a dangerous conflict between his actions (grief and mourning) and his words (praise of God). This dichotomy is now resolved: his words and actions agree as he pours out his lamentation, to no one and to everyone.

Lamentation, as we noted above, is the spontaneous cry of pain when our lives are overwhelmed by chaos, brokenness, and confusion. The common ancient Near Eastern mythology dealt with this struggle between order and chaos, life and death. Chaos is there symbolized in two ways: (1) as a sea monster, variously called Sea, Rahab, Leviathan, the twisting serpent. The storm god (in Canaan, Ba'al) defeats Sea, tramples it in victory, and then reigns/rains life and fertility from his palace in heaven until the arrival of his other foe; (2) as death, manifested in the hot, dry summer and the barren wilderness. There is no rain and everything dies. Ba'al dies, only to revive with the coming of the fall rains, which usually bring life and fertility for another year. Since language borrowed from this mythic complex recurs in the Book of Job (7:12; 9:8, 13; 26:12), it would be well to keep this in mind.

3:3-10 Curse the day and night. Job does not curse God but rather the day of his birth and the night of his conception (v. 3b, better translated: "the night when they said, 'A man is conceived!' "). In language which reverses that of the Genesis creation account (Gen 1:1–2:4), he prays that the day become night, and the night be wiped out of the calendar. In his affliction, Jeremiah expressed a similar wish (Jer 20:14-18). The translation and meaning of verse 8 are obscure. Since Leviathan was thought to cause eclipses by swallowing the sun, this would fit the context of Job's prayer for darkness.

3:11-19 Longing for death. The struggle between light and darkness was part of the cosmic struggle between order (life) and chaos (death). Job has prayed for darkness; now he prays for death: "I wish my womb had become my tomb!" Two common features of lamentation appear: (1) the repeated question

"Why?" (see Pss 22:2; 43:10; 43:2). While this implies, "I do not understand," it is a cry of pain rather than a request for theological or scientific explanation; (2) the focus on "I" (see Ps 77:1-6). In the face of intense suffering, it is hard to look outside oneself. Job looks to death, in which all are equal (vv. 14-19), to bring him tranquility and rest.

3:20-26 Deliver me from God! The "bitter in spirit" (v. 20) refers more probably to profuse weeping. The expression in Hebrew is literally "bitter of throat" and reflects the belief that in times of great distress, the intestines put pressure on the liver and heart, breaking them down ("broken-hearted") and turning them to liquid, which passes through the throat, leaving a bitter taste, and then exits the eyes as tears.

The question "Why?" recurs for those "whose path is hidden from them" (v. 23a). Verse 23b shows a strong ironic twist. In 1:10 the Satan had accused God of "surrounding" Job with blessings; here Job uses the same word to describe his being "hemmed in" by God. For ancient Israel, Yahweh was the God who had delivered them from death; here, in a statement of great irony, Job prays for death to deliver him, the servant (v. 19; see 1:8; 2:3), from God, the taskmaster (vv. 18-19).

III. FIRST ROUND OF SPEECHES

Job 4:1–14:22

Shocked by Job's lament and moved to answer his repeated "whys," the friends abandon their wise silence (see 13:5). It is difficult to characterize the chapters that follow. Discussion? Debate? Dialogue? Perhaps "speech" is helpful, if we think of politicians less interested in really responding to arguments point by point and more interested in playing to an audience and scoring points that way. We, the readers/hearers, are the audience.

The speeches are given roughly through three rounds: (1) 4:1–14:22; (2) 15:1–21:34; (3) 22:1–27:21. In the first two, each of the friends speaks, and Job responds, usually at greater length; the third round is in some disarray, perhaps the result of textual confusion.

4:1–5:26 Eliphaz's first speech. Beginning politely enough, Eliphaz suggests that the "instruction" (an important word in Old Testament wisdom circles) Job has offered to others in the past should not be forgotten now when Job is in need (4:2-5). After alluding to Job's general uprightness of life ("piety" and "integrity" in verse 6 reflect the Hebrew words translated "fear of the Lord" and "blamelessness" in 1:1, 8; 2:3), Eliphaz makes his first main point. Based on experience ("Reflect now" . . . "As I see it"), he affirms the doctrine of retribution: the innocent do not perish (4:7). Only those reap mischief who have previously sown it (4:8). In proverbial fashion (see Prov 28:15; also Pss 17:12; 22:14, 21), the wicked, like the lion, may make a big noise, but in the end they are cut down and their families left destitute.

In remarkable fashion, Eliphaz appeals next, not to wisdom experience, but to a special vision; the eerie description might best fit a nightmare. Preceded by fear and shuddering, a wind blows over his face (a better translation than "a spirit passed before me") causing him to shudder (4:15). He peeks out and perceives ein Etwas, a vague something. And then a voice that makes Eliphaz's second, fairly platitudinous point: All humans are sinful; none are blameless! The reference to the imperfections of God's servants and messengers in verse 18 has nothing to do with the later theory of good and bad angels. If the members of God's own court are not blameless, how much less blameless are human beings, creatures of clay who perish quickly without ever knowing wisdom! Eliphaz does not pursue the implications of this last phrase for himself and his own theory. The anthropological view of human existence expressed here (4:17-21 and 11:11; 15:14-16; 25:4-6), while similar to that of many a radio and television preacher, seems almost a parody of the higher anthropology of Psalm 8 and Gen 1:26-31.

Eliphaz goes on to taunt Job (5:1-2): "Do not bother calling on any of the lesser beings in Yahweh's court either!" Since some Near Eastern religions held that everyone had a personal god who would speak his or her case in the heavenly council, some polemic may be involved here. In fact, Job will later call for some kind of mediator to stand between himself and God (9:33; 16:19; 19:25). Insinuating that Job is a fool, Eliphaz uses the proverb in 5:2 to argue that the prosperity of fools is only apparent; their way ends in disaster that affects not only themselves but their whole family. Their children will have no one to speak for them or rescue them "at the gate" (5:4), the place where tribal business and legal matters were handled (see Ruth 4:1; Prov 22:22). In verses 6-7 a third point is made: Whatever mischief and trouble we find in our lives is a human product.

Between his contrasting descriptions of the lot of the fool (5:3-7) and that of the righteous (5:17-26), Eliphaz urges Job to do as he, Eliphaz, would do, that is, appeal to God! A hymn-like section follows, describing God as the creator and source of the life-giving rain (verse 9 is omitted in the New American Bible as a duplicate of 9:10); as the all-wise one who ordains things justly (vv. 12-14); and as the protector and defender of the poor and oppressed (vv. 11, 15-16). All these images are commonplace in Old Testament thought.

Beginning with a beatitude—suffering can be God's parental and ultimately healing correction—the description of the rewards of righteousness falls into two parts, verses 18-22 and verses 23-26. Verses 18-22 present the negative side: basically, God saves from oppression and death. In an oral-shame culture, the tongue (v. 21) could indeed be a terrible scourge, as Job is in fact experiencing! Verses 23-26 present the positive side. The life-giving relationship of humans with both the earth and the animals, fractured by sin (Gen 3), is here restored (v. 23). The power of life is manifested further by begetting many offspring (so important in a tribal society) and by living to a ripe old age. Fidelity to God, then, brings abundance of life.

Having made his four basic points—what innocent person perishes? (4:7); can mortals be blameless against their maker? (4:17); humans themselves beget mischief (5:7); happy those whom God reproves (5:17)—Eliphaz concludes his opening remarks (v. 27) with a ringing appeal to experience: "So it is, and what's more, you should know it!" Unfortunately, Job knows no such thing.

6:1–7:21 Job's reply to Eliphaz. Job responds with a strong emotional outburst. His anguish and calamity may be too great to be measured (vv. 1-2), but they can, even must, be spoken (v. 3). The divine hunter pursues him with poisoned arrows (v. 4). As the rhetorical question in verse 5 suggests, Job is not braying without reason. To add insult to injury, Eliphaz's advice is too much for Job to stomach (vv. 6-7). The "white of an egg" in verse 6b is a traditional rendering of a very obscure Hebrew phrase.

Job turns to prayer (vv. 8-12). As in chapter 3, he still longs for death to bring relief and consolation, but, as there and throughout the book, this never brings him to contemplate suicide. Job is not an unfeeling statue of stone or bronze (v. 12) but a human being who is being pushed to the limit.

At last Job clearly acknowledges the presence of his friends. Apparently responding only to Eliphaz, throughout Job addresses "you-all" (plural) and gives an object lesson on the meaning of friendship. A friend owes kindness, loyalty, and fidelity to one in despair, even when—or especially when—that one is moved to abandon religion ("fear of the Almighty," v. 14). A friend in need is a friend indeed! Instead, the friends are like the Palestinian wadis (gullies), which fill quickly with rain but just as quickly run dry. They are totally undependable; they cannot be trusted. An ancient caravan, trusting them, would risk not only frustration but even possible death.

This is what Job's friends are; in a way, they came, took one look and ran (v. 21). He had never imposed on them for anything, but he had a right to expect honest words. Job challenges them to show where he has sinned to deserve this treatment (v. 24). Their fear (v. 21) prevents them from hearing the truth in the "sayings of a desperate man" (v. 26). Job's charge in verse 27 would seem as gratuitous as Eliphaz's suggestion that he has sinned. Job resolutely affirms that right and justice are still on his side (v. 29).

To answer Job's first outcry, Eliphaz had painted a fairly unflattering view of human existence (4:17-21). Here Job would seem to agree. Life is a drudgery, and humans are all slaves. The night drags on forever, while life flies by like the wind (vv. 4, 7). Job will soon be gone, descended to the nether world (v. 9). This is one of several statements (10:21; 14:10-12; 16:22) which show clearly that no hope for resurrection or afterlife appears in the book. After death all alike, with no distinction between rich and poor, wicked and upright, go down to the realm of death. But does Job really agree with Eliphaz? It does not seem so. Eliphaz presented a theological view of the way things are; Job is giving an existential description of his experience, which is not the way things should be. If he agreed, why his constant outcry against it as something unjust?

Job will not keep silent. The purpose of the test proposed by the Satan was to see what Job would say, and now he will have his say. Verse 11 is a very important statement in the context of the whole book. God is treating Job like the mythological monsters Sea and Leviathan. Job's struggles stand in the context of the cosmic battle between order and chaos, life and death. Since God has apparently put Job on the side of chaos, he longs to be with the other mythological figure of chaos and oppression, Death (v. 15).

Psalm 8 asks, "What is man, O God, that you watch over him" and concludes to the exalted nature of human existence. Job clearly parodies this. Yes, God watches over him, but like Big Brother in Orwell's 1984 (vv. 17-18, 20). Why won't God leave him alone, at least long enough to catch his breath (v. 19)? Even if he had sinned, why (again that question!) does God not simply forgive? A chasm separates any possible guilt of Job from his sufferings. Job will soon be dead, and then it will be too late (vv. 20-21).

8:1-22 Bildad's first speech. "When are you going to shut up, you old windbag?" (8:2). Thus the second friend jumps with both feet into the fray and comes immediately to a defense of God's justice. While it was implicit before, this is the first time the issue is stated so clearly (v. 3). With logical consistency that allows no room for uncertainty, the death of Job's children (perhaps discreetly alluded to by Eliphaz in 5:4) is attributed to their own sins (v. 4). Still, if Job will only turn and repent (something Eliphaz had likewise recommended, with himself as model, 5:8), he will be restored to his former prosperity (vv. 5-7). This is quite irrelevant, as Job has consistently longed, not for his old possessions, but for understanding and justice.

In the best wisdom tradition, Bildad appeals to the accumulated wisdom of the ages passed down from the ancestors (vv. 8-10). In their name he cites a proverb with Egyptian coloring. Just as plants need water if they are to grow and blossom, so humans need God if they are to grow and prosper (vv. 11-12). Bildad then develops the example of one who forgets God. Forgetting God is not a simple lapse of memory; it is cutting off our water supply in the middle of the desert! It is a personal amnesia. We forget who we are, where we are from, where we are going, and how we are to live. Such persons might find some prosperity, but it hangs by a thin thread (vv. 14-19).

On the other hand, God does not forsake the upright (vv. 20-22). If only Job will repent, he will again be filled with laughter and rejoicing. Verse 21a recalls Israel's happiness when God returned them from exile (Ps 126:2). In verse 22 Bildad gives an ironic foreshadowing of what in fact is going to happen at the end of the book (42:7-17).

9:1–10:22 Job's reply to Bildad. These chapters are beset with many problems of text and translation, but it is clear that they abound in legal images. At times Job is the plaintiff who wants to haul God off to court (9:3). Unfortunately, since the defendant and the judge are the same, what chance does he have? At other times Job seems to be the defendant who has to answer for his life (9:14). Job's sense of helplessness also keeps coming up, especially in the face of God's awesome creative power. At any rate, it is clear that Job's speech is getting bolder and more outspoken.

The friends had argued, "How can one be justified before God?" meaning "All are sinners" (4:17). Job agrees with the question but with quite a different meaning. One cannot be justified when the judge and defendant are the same and so powerful (vv. 2-3). God can overturn the order of creation (vv. 5-7) just as God first established it. Like a warrior with his victorious foot on the back of the fallen prey, God plants a foot on the back of the defeated Sea (v. 8; see Ps 110:1-2). Later (chs. 38–41) Yahweh will appeal to these same wonders of creation.

Job's utter confusion and helplessness are reflected in verses 11-21. He does not know what to do or say that would make any difference. Verse 13 again alludes to God's defeat of the primal sea monster, this time under the name of Rahab. Throughout these verses a series of "if" questions shows Job turning first one way and then another as he looks for some course of action. There is none. He despises his life (v. 21). Who is there to blame but God (vv. 22-24)?

Job's life is going by swiftly, like a runner, a speedy boat on the Nile, or an eagle.

There is no way that he can win; even should he succeed in cleansing his name, God would just muddy it up again (vv. 25-31). Forsaken by his friends, alone, Job longs (in the first of three such passages; see 16:19; 19:25) for some third party, here a neutral arbiter, who might stand between him and God and work out a fair judgment. But he knows that this is hopeless; again, he loathes his life (vv. 9:32–10:1a).

Job now returns to lamentation. Since he does not know what else to say, he will at least speak his complaint (as in 7:10), "Let me know why . . ." (10:1b-2). Does God get pleasure from afflicting this creature, God's handiwork? Job appeals to God's memory of happier days, namely, when Job was created, and compares God then to a potter, a maker of cheese, and a tailor doing their work with care and skill (vv. 9-12). So why does God pursue Job, hunting him down like a wild animal (v. 16)? As in 3:11 and 7:15, Job once more longs for death. His days are so few; why does God not just leave him alone for a breather (see 7:19) before he goes to the dark land of death, from which there is no return (vv. 18-22)?

11:1-20 Zophar's first speech. Zophar's opening attack on Job makes Bildad's (8:2) seem polite in comparison. Job has indeed been outtalking his companions about two to one, but should the one who talks the most be declared right (v. 2)? Zophar sums up Job's excessive "babbling" in five words in Hebrew! "My doctrine is true; my life is clean." Even though Job has not said this in so many words, it seems a fair inference. In fact, Job has not been trying to communicate doctrine but a sense of his own confusion and pain, something the friends completely fail to hear. You may be missing something, Zophar suggests, namely, the "secrets of God's wisdom," and God knows you are guilty! While rebuking Job for being too sure of himself and not respecting the mystery of wisdom, Zophar is himself quite sure and not aware, apparently, of limits to his own wisdom.

Extended praise of the vastness and immeasurability of God's wisdom follows (vv. 7-12). Zophar shares with his friends their low opinion of human beings as worthless and full of iniquity (v. 11). The proverb in verse 12 is illusive, partly because the Hebrew text is not completely clear. As translated in the New American Bible, it suggests that certain creatures cannot really be changed. Can one make a silk purse out of a sow's ear?

Like the two others (Eliphaz, 5:8; Bildad, 8:5), Zophar gives Job advice on what he should do: get rid of those radical ideas, say your prayers, and shape up (vv. 13-14). If he does, then, in accord with his friends' doctrine of retribution, he will enjoy a prosperous life and will find rest (see 3:13, 17, 26). He will also recover the honor and respect of others, for many will recognize his virtue and come asking for his intercession (v. 19b). This is especially ironic because at the end (42:8-9), the friends will have to rely on Job's intercession. The last phrase (v. 20c) makes a final point: it is the wicked who eagerly look forward to death. Job has been doing exactly this (3:11; 10:18-19); just what you would expect from one who is wicked!

12:1–14:22 Job's reply to Zophar. Unfazed by Zophar's accusation of verbosity, Job launches into what is, with the exception of chapters 29–31, his longest speech. Chapter 12 abounds with wisdom terminology and ideas; chapter 13, with legal expressions; and chapter 14, with lamentation.

Taunted by the sarcasm of his friends, Job shows himself able to rise to the occasion (vv. 2-3). "Intelligence" in verse 3 is literally "heart" in Hebrew, the core of the person from which flow thoughts, feelings, and actions. In a shame culture, "what the neighbors say" is very important, and in verses 4-6 Job tells us. His misfortunes have made him a mockery and brought him disgrace.

In 8:8-10 Bildad had appealed to the authority of tradition passed down from the ancients. Here Job parodies this with his own appeal to the dumb animals, all of which know what the friends do not—that misfortune equally comes from God, and it is not always connected with sinful behavior. The proverb in verse 11 makes the point that the traditional wisdom must be tested by experience, just as the mouth tastes food. Job has already said that he finds his friends' advice indigestible (6:6-7). In this light, verse 12 is almost certainly sarcastic.

Eliphaz had earlier (5:10-13) sung a hymn to the God of order and creation. Here Job sings to the God of chaos and uncreation (vv. 13-25). For the people of the Old Testament, the world was all of a piece; nature and human society were closely interconnected (an insight we, with our ecological and social crises, would do well to relearn). God brings on chaos in natural creation (vv. 15, 19-21, 22; the Hebrew phrases echo the flood story of Gen 6–8) and also in human society, where social order (that is, justice) depends on the wise governance of kings, counselors, and judges (vv. 17, 18, 20). Verse 20b supports our reading of verse 12 as sarcastic. Job does not say that all this is haphazard and pointless. God's might and strength go together with wisdom and prudence (vv. 13, 16). The problem is that we cannot figure it out; we grope in the dark and stagger with drunken senselessness (vv. 24-25). Like his friends, Job has heard and seen much; he has had much experience (13:1-2), but he wants more.

Job again wants to take God to court (13:3)! The word translated as "reason with" in verse 3b is the same technical legal term translated as "rebuke" in verses 6 and 10. The sense of verse 4 is that the friends whitewash God with their lies (a theme to recur in vv. 6-10), and their treatment of Job exposes them as quack doctors—not to mention their bedside manner! If they were indeed wise, they would know when to be silent (see Prov 17:28).

In an oral culture like Job's, words were the very fabric of society, and this was nowhere more important than in the most formal situations of religion and law. Thus we find in the Old Testament a great stress on bearing truthful witness (Exod 20:16; Deut 5:20; 19:16-21) and on the necessity of two or three witnesses to establish a charge (Deut 19:15). Job does have three witnesses, but their testimony is false! Do they think that God is served by their falsehoods? Is it for God that they are lying? Or is it perhaps for themselves and for their theology, which brings them such security (vv. 6-8)? Verses 9-11 foreshadow what will happen in 42:7-9.

Job will not be intimidated or silenced by the ashen aphorisms of his friends, but persists in speaking out of the depth of his experience (13:12-13). The expression in verse 14 occurs only here in the Old Testament, but the sense is clearly that Job will speak even at the risk of his life. Job is so sure of his innocence that he says he will argue his case in God's very presence—and survive! This alone will prove him right, because sinners cannot live in God's presence (v. 16).

"Pay careful heed to my speech" (v. 17)—the plural verbs here are addressed to the friends, but also to all of us who hear Job's words. The issue at stake, we recall, is precisely that of Job's speech. In verses 20-27 Job addresses God (something the friends never do!) and realistically prays that if he is to stand a chance with God, there have to be some ground rules: God must promise not to overwhelm Job with divine power ("hand") nor divine "terror," which renders helpless those at whom it is directed (see Exod 23:27; Josh 2:9). Then Job is willing to be either defendant (v. 22a) or plaintiff (v. 22b).

From his almost foolhardy confidence, Job suddenly turns to lamentation. He is caught in a quandary: God is either too far away (v. 24a) or much too close (v. 24b). The Hebrew of verse 24b contains a pun: God is treating Job ('iyyob) as an enemy ('oyeb). This is a source of recurring pain for Job; no one can hurt a person as close friends can. The image in verse 25 is almost ridiculous. The mighty God (v. 21) is relentlessly chasing Job, a mere leaf in the universe. Job has been accused, sentenced, and punished (the shame of the stocks!), but he does not know why. He does not claim to be completely sinless (v. 26), but whatever he may have done, he does not deserve what he is getting.

In chapter 14 Job's lament returns to the dark side of human existence. Two aspects particularly are highlighted:

1) All human life ("Man" in verse 1 is all humanity) is weak and transitory (vv. 1-6). We fade, wear out, disappear like a flower, a shadow, a leather bottle, a garment (13:28 has been moved to follow 14:3). The text and interpretation of verse 4 is obscure; surely a reference to original sin, which some early Church theologians saw here, is most unlikely.

2) There is no hope for life after death (vv. 7-22). Job's remarks on this move through four stages: (a) A tree does have hope. Even though it has been cut down, all one need do is water it and it will sprout again (vv. 7-9). (b) Human life is not like that at all! When we are gone, we are gone, like evaporated water (again, water imagery). Three times it is affirmed (v. 12): no rising, no waking, no being roused. To say something three times in Hebrew (for example, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts," Isa 6:3) gives a superlative emphasis. We are dead and that is it—period! (vv. 10-12). (c) Job wishes that things were otherwise. "Oh, wouldn't it be nice if . . ." God would call, and Job, once again in good graces, would respond, whatever misdeeds he may have committed sealed up and forgotten. (d) There is no "if." This is impossible. Reality imposes itself on the dream. Like water (again, water imagery) wearing away stones, so God erodes human hope. The only survival lies in the continuation of the family, in the next generation. And do they know honor or shame? The dead are oblivious of what transpires. The afflicted one is left only with bodily pain and inner distress (vv. 18-22).

And so, on this dim note, the first round of speeches comes to an end. The issues are squarely on the table. For the friends, God's justice is at stake; for Job, the integrity of his experience. Given the choice, the friends side with God, or better, with their theory about God, which, all too easily for "religious people," replaces God. But Job will not give in. He holds to his experience and, perhaps even worse, refuses to keep quiet.

IV. SECOND ROUND OF SPEECHES

Job 15:1–21:34

15:1-35 Eliphaz's second speech. In his first speech (chs. 4–5), Eliphaz was rather gentle and encouraging, but having sat through three speeches of Job, he now changes his tone. If Job were indeed as wise as he claimed (13:1-2), he would not have replied with so much hot air (vv. 2-3). He has, in fact, uttered folly and not wisdom; his words tear down true religion (v. 4; Hebrew, "fear [of God]"; NAB, "piety"). Job is condemned out of his own mouth, tongue, and lips; all the speech organs get into the picture (vv. 5-6). A better translation of verse 5 might be: "Your mouth instructs wickedness, and your tongue chooses craftiness."

Continuing his attack on Job's wisdom, Eliphaz sarcastically asks Job if he is some mythic, primordial sage (see Ezek 28:11-19), begotten in some special way before creation (v. 7). The same image in almost identical words is applied, in Prov 8:25b, to the personified figure of God's wisdom. Or has Job been privy to the council (better than "counsels") of God (v. 8)? This is especially ironic, because we, the readers, know that it was precisely there, in the divine council, that Job's troubles have their root and cause.

Verse 10 perhaps implies two things: that Eliphaz includes himself among the wise, gray-haired elders; and that Job might not be as old as we often depict him. Since he will later beget and raise another family, he might now be in middle age. The godly consolation and gentle speech in verse 11 probably refer back to Eliphaz's first speech; in case Job has forgotten, some of its highlights are repeated here, but in harsher tones. Since not even the members of the heavenly council are completely clean, how much less the abominable, disgusting, sinful creatures we call humans! (vv. 14-16; see 4:17-19).

Appealing, typically, to ancient tradition (vv. 17-18; see 8:8), Eliphaz offers, not as before (5:17-26) a description of the blessings of the righteous, but a harrowing, admonitory account of the fate of the wicked (vv. 17-35). They live in constant inner torment and anxiety (vv. 20-24); impending death lies particularly heavy (vv. 23b-24). Verse 25 surely contains a barbed reference to Job's behavior, and with it the implication that he deserves all that he has received. Grown fat and lazy (v. 27), the wicked cannot survive adversity. Using a series of botanical comparisons, Eliphaz concludes his description, ending with a proverbial comment (see Ps 7:15; Isa 59:4) on the futility of folly (vv. 30-35).

16:1–17:16 Job's second reply to Eliphaz. Job is getting exasperated with the unimaginative advice of his "comforters," who bring weariness (v. 2b) and not the rest he longs for. If they could change places, it would be easy for Job to give them some of the same medicine (see 13:4). In the context verse 5 is ambiguous. It is either sarcastic, or it means that Job would in fact teach them the proper way to bring consolation, with appropriate speech or appropriate silence. But whether Job speaks or keeps silent, it makes no difference; he cannot escape his pain (v. 6).

In typical lamentation language (see, for example, Ps 22:7-9, 13-14, 17, 22) Job speaks of the assaults of his enemies. At times the thought moves back and forth between God and the friends. They are described as traitors (vv. 8, 11), ferocious beasts (vv. 9-10a), bullies (v. 10b), assault-and-battery muggers (v.

12a), an archer (v. 12c-13a), and a fencer who pierces Job's kidneys (not "sides," v. 13bc). Job has reacted with gestures of grief and mourning (see 1:20); they are not expressions of penance. He continues to affirm his innocence; he has not committed deeds of social injustice (a common meaning of "violence"), and his prayer is sincere (vv. 15-17).

Job feels that he is fast approaching death (16:18–17:2). In the Old Testament the blood of an innocent victim was believed to cry out from the ground asking for justice (for example, the blood of Abel in Gen 4:10; see also Ezek 24:8). Job hopes that even after death has closed his lips, his blood will not be silent. Earlier, forsaken by his friends, Job looked for an arbiter to stand between him and God (9:33-35); then he dreamed of God's restoring him after death (14:13). Here, in the midst of his somber reflections, he hopes for a witness, an intercessor on high (16:19). This has been variously interpreted. Is it God? Or Job's prayer? More likely it is some member of the heavenly council who, unlike the Satan, would speak on Job's behalf. He hopes that God may be moved to justice by his weeping. But, as in the two previous situations (9:35–10:1; 14:18-22), Job knows that his dream is hopeless. He is fast on the road to death (16:22–17:2).

The interpretation of 17:3-10 is difficult because the Hebrew text is far from clear. Job seems to ask God to grant someone to offer a pledge for him (v. 3), a practice common in legal and commercial contexts (see Gen 38:17; Deut 24:6-17). Again, there is no one. Job has become a mockery and byword for all; he is held up to shame. If verses 8-9 are accurate, they should probably be read as being sarcastic: "If there were any upright or righteous people, they should be astonished, but since no one is astonished, I guess there are no upright or righteous ones among you."

Forsaken, alone, and mocked, Job returns to thoughts of death (vv. 11-16). The grave is presented under a series of negative images: the land of the dead (vv. 13, 16), darkness (v. 13), corruption and maggots (v. 14), the dust (v. 16). Some of the poignancy of verse 15 is lost in the translation. In the Hebrew, the word "where" is expressed twice in a row with slightly different words: "Where? Where is my hope?" There is none; all go down to death.

18:1-21 Bildad's second speech. With a few words of rebuke, Bildad begins. When will Job be quiet? Let him stop and think a little first; then we can discuss! In 16:9 Job had accused God of angrily tearing him apart. Bildad turns the words against Job (v. 4): "You tear yourself apart in your anger!" and then he adds sarcastically, "because you are upset, you want the whole order of the universe to be rearranged to suit you" (v. 4bc).

The rest of Bildad's speech is an extended depiction of the fate of the wicked, not unlike that of Eliphaz in 15:20-35. Again, a series of images is used. Those who sin forsake the light, so they dwell in darkness (vv. 5-6). Their own counsels and behavior bring retribution with them; they are ensnared in traps of their own devising. Six different hunting terms are used (net, pitfall, trap, snare, noose, toils [a type of net]); their precise meanings are not always clear, as a comparison of translations will show (vv. 7-10). The terrors of Death (the king of terrors), disaster, and disease (the first-born of Death) haunt the wicked at every turn (vv. 11-14).

The references to the tent being destroyed (vv. 14b-15) and to dying childless (vv. 16-19) probably recall Job's afflictions in chapter 1. In the tribal society of Job's time, people had no belief in an afterlife and therefore survived only in descendants who bore their names and preserved their memories. Without these, it would be as if they had never existed. With no children, grandchildren, or survivors, they were surely "banished out of the world" (v. 18b). No worse fate could be imagined.

The people who are appalled and struck with horror at the fate of the wicked (v. 20) are ambiguous. The Hebrew terms, literally "the after-ones/the before-ones," can refer either to time (younger and older ones, as in the New American Bible) or to space (westerners and easterners; directions were taken facing east). The latter is perhaps more likely. This, then, is the fate of the wicked.

19:1-29 Job's second reply to Bildad. Bildad had just asked "When?" Using the same Hebrew word, Job throws it back, "How long?" The "ten times" in verse 3 is to be taken in the same sense as our "I've told you a thousand times," that is, often and repeatedly (see, for example, Gen 31:7, 41; Num 14:22). While unclear textually, verses 4-5 seem to imply something like "Even if I am at fault, that is my business; and you have no right to gloat over me." For the record, Job affirms again that God has dealt with him in a crooked way (v. 6).

As earlier (16:7-14), Job recounts the ways God has mistreated him. When he cries for help, his screams fall on deaf ears (v. 7); he has been stripped of his honor (v. 9; NAB: "glory"). He repeats his charge (16:9), reversed by Bildad (18:4), that God's wrath is turned against him (v. 11a). Although the Hebrew pun is missing, verse 11b expresses the same idea as 13:24: once friends, Job and God now seem to be enemies.

Not only has God forsaken him, but as a result all Job's friends and relatives do the same (vv. 13-22). Not only is he alone, but his shame is so great that his servants ignore his calls, and young children poke fun at him (vv. 15-16, 18). Those whom we love and with whom we have shared intimately can hurt us more than anyone (v. 19). The whole web of relationships that make life both possible and meaningful is cut; Job is as good as dead. While verse 20 has contributed a phrase to our language (escape by the skin of one's teeth), its exact text and meaning are uncertain. The sense must be something like, "I am reduced to such extremities that I am barely alive." In agony, Job calls for some pity from those who should have offered it unasked (v. 20). Verse 22b is better translated, "Are you not satisfied with my flesh?" This is a common ancient idiom referring to calumny. "Aren't you finished," Job asks, "with telling lies about me?" (see 13:7-8).

Close to death and all alone, Job turns, as so often before, to some last hope of vindication (vv. 23-29). First he wishes that his proclamation of innocence be chiseled in stone to speak for him after he is gone. Certainly no other voice has been found in his defense (vv. 23-24). Next (vv. 25-27) Job looks for a different kind of vindication, but what? And when? These are among the most famous—and most difficult—verses in the book. "Vindicator" was an office within the tribal society with the obligation of protecting and defending the weaker members of the family. Perhaps the closest parallel in our experience might be the Mafia Godfather! While the responsibilities of the vindicator could take various forms (see Lev 25:23-24, 47-55; Deut 25:5-10; Ruth 4:1-6), the basic concern was the preservation of the living unity of the family or tribe. Job has just said that all his friends and kin have forsaken him; now he grasps at a straw. He is innocent, and there must be a kin somewhere who will stand up in court ("stand forth") and deliver him.

Who is this vindicator? Some commentators think it is God, like the arbiter (9:33) and the witness (16:19); others, however, see here some third party who can stand with Job against God (who is, in fact, judge, prosecutor, and executioner!). This second opinion is more convincing. And when will the vindication take place? St. Jerome's translation in the Vulgate and its use in Handel's Messiah make belief in a resurrection on the last day very explicit. This is surely too much; such a belief goes against the clear position scattered throughout the rest of the book (for example, 14:10-22). Job seems to be clinging to a hope of some last-minute rescue that he will see while still "in the flesh." He will at last see his vindication before God. Such, at least, is his urgent longing (v. 26b). However, given the confused state of the text (apparent also in the ancient translations), any interpretation must remain somewhat tentative.

Job ends with a final warning (and foreshadowing). Those who persist in blaming him and holding him guilty will ultimately have to face judgment themselves (vv. 28-29; see 42:7-9).

20:1-29 Zophar's second speech. Like Eliphaz (15:17-35) and Bildad (18:5-21) before him, Zophar rushes to give his description of the fate of the wicked. Verse 3 is the only instance of one of the friends admitting that anything Job has said has made any impression at all. To answer Job, Zophar relies, in good wisdom style, on both his own reflection (v. 2) and on tradition handed down from of old (v. 4; see Bildad's remarks in 8:8-10).

The wicked ignore God and God's commands and set themselves up in God's place. Almost by definition, then, the wicked are proud and arrogant (v. 6). But any apparent success is short-lived. The wicked perish forever like their own dung (v. 7; NAB: "like the fuel of his fire"). What is more, the actions of the wicked bring with them their own built-in consequences. What seems sweet and delicious in the eating turns to poison in the stomach (vv. 11-16). One of the major consequences of setting oneself up in God's place is that one soon violates the rights of others.

Social injustice follows upon idolatry. The following verses focus on this issue, which will recur later (22:6-9; 29:12-16; 31:16-23). The greed for riches leads one to oppress the poor and the needy (vv. 17-22).

Enjoyment of ill-gotten gain does not last. God, like a mighty warrior, will assail the wicked with a display of cosmic weaponry (vv. 23-28). Both the opening (v. 23) and closing (v. 28) verses of this section contain references to God's wrath, about which there has already been much discussion (16:9; 18:4; 19:11a). If Job is indeed experiencing, as he himself has said, God's wrath, what does he expect? This is the portion of the wicked (v. 29).

21:1-34 Job's second reply to Zophar. This particular speech of Job is a remarkable one; in a real sense, it is a response to the arguments of the friends. It contains many allusions (too numerous to note here) to their previous remarks and thus approaches genuine dialogue or debate. And it is directed entirely to the friends; unlike any other speech of Job's, it contains no soliloquy or prayer to God.

If the friends cannot offer Job their silence (13:5), they can at least pay attention to what he is saying (v. 2). The import of verses 3-5 is this: "My argument is not about (better than "toward") humanity in general; I'm not interested in abstract philosophy. I am a real, concrete individual in pain. Look at me and stop mouthing your platitudes."

A large part of the friends' argument thus far has focused on the respective fates of the wicked (the brunt of the second round of speeches) and the righteous (more in the first round; see 5:15-27; 8:5-7; 11:13-19). Here Job takes this up and rejects it. The wicked do not suffer; as often as not, they thrive and prosper. Wickedness separates one from God, the giver of life, so sinners belong instead to the realm of death. But look at their ripe old age, at the fertility of their families and flocks (vv. 8-11)! This is all evidence of the power of life. And their growing family life is one continuous party (v. 12).

On the one hand, sinners manifest the outward signs of the power of life; on the other, they experience neither the terrors of death (see 15:20; 18:11-14) nor inner torment, but they die a peaceful death (v. 13b). And what is more, they actually thumb their noses at God! "Who needs you? We have no desire to learn how you want us to live ('your ways,' v. 14). We're doing just fine without you" (vv. 14-15). Does experience tell us that they are wrong? No! God's anger is not their portion (vv. 16-17). Here Job directly refutes Zophar's last words to him (20:28-29).

It was a common belief that the effects of a person's sins flowed out and affected the family and its descendants. This may have its truth, but it is not enough for justice. The one who sins must personally feel the punishment; what happens after death makes no difference (vv. 18-21; see also Jer 31:29-30; Ezek 18:1-4). Job's remarks on death as the great leveler (vv. 23-26; also 3:13-19) resemble those of Qoheleth (for example, 9:2-6).

Job turns on the friends directly. "I know that you think I am guilty. If your experience convinces you that you are right, then you haven't been around very much! Ask any traveler; they can tell you how life really is (vv. 27-29). No, the wicked do not suffer; they prosper and die a peaceful death. That is pretty much the way things are now, have been before, and will be afterward" (v. 33b). The friends' "vain comfort" is "empty wind," "vanity" (a word dear to Qoheleth; see, for example, 1:2 and passim); they persist in speaking falsehood (see 13:7-9). So ends the second round of speeches.

V. THIRD ROUND OF SPEECHES

Job 22:1–27:21

Unlike the first two rounds, which proceeded in orderly fashion, the friends speaking in turn and Job responding to each, the third round is considerably confused. Eliphaz speaks, and Job responds; Bildad's speech, five verses long, is surely truncated; Zophar does not speak at all. In addition, part of what Job says seems more appropriate in the mouth of his friends (for example, 26:18-25; 27:13-21). Chapter 28 is generally recognized to be a separate composition. Various scholarly attempts have been made to sort this out and provide a more balanced representation; the New American Bible follows none of these but does signal the problems in Job's speeches with a series of asterisks. Here we will follow the New American Bible text, simply noting that the overall effect of these chapters, starting out normally but degenerating into a chaos, as if everyone were trying to shout at once, might not be an unfitting ending for the "dialogue" about cosmic and moral order.

22:1-30 Eliphaz's third speech. After Job's rebuttal, Eliphaz flies right back with a series of rhetorical questions meant to show how wrong Job's position is. Ironically, as we, the readers, know from the prologue, the answers to verses 2, 3, 4 are "Yes." Eliphaz draws the obvious (for him) conclusion (v. 5).

Eliphaz then accuses Job of a series of serious sins (vv. 6-11) that could easily be committed by the "man of might" and "the privileged" (v. 8) against the poor and the helpless. In the ancient Near East the widow and the orphan were especially helpless because they had no one to defend them at law. Throughout the Old Testament it is the task of those in positions of power to stand with the weak and helpless and to work for the establishment, not the perversion, of justice. The "therefore" in verse 10 is ironic. "Because you have done these things, therefore you are now suffering." Eliphaz's reasoning process is exactly the opposite: "You are now suffering; therefore you must have done these things." Job is also accused of thumbing his nose at God. "God is too far off; God will never see me!" In this he is acting just as the generation swept away by the flood did (see Gen 6-9).

But Eliphaz does not give up on Job. One last time he urges Job to come to terms with God (vv. 21-30). If Job will repent (v. 23; NAB: "return"), he will again enjoy prosperity, peace, and power (v. 28). Apparently Eliphaz cannot conceive of serving God without getting something out of it.

So Eliphaz has said his last. He began (ch. 5) with some sensitivity, deference, and encouragement for Job; he ends making wild, raving accusations for which there is not a shred of evidence. In Eliphaz we see a sad picture of the degeneration of a religious person who has too easily confused his own attempts to understand God with divine revelation itself. It would be naive to consider this only an ancient problem.

23:1–24:25 Job's third reply to Eliphaz. Returning to his former pattern, Job reflects, in soliloquy fashion, on his predicament. God's hand lies so heavily upon him that he longs once again (see 9:13-21; 13:14-27) to take his case to court. These verses (vv. 3-7) abound in technical legal vocabulary. Curiously, here Job does not wish for a mediator (arbiter, witness, or vindicator) but is ready to plead his case in person. He is sure he will be proven innocent.

Things are not so easy, however. God is nowhere to be found (vv. 8-9). Verse 10 is probably better translated, "Indeed, he knows (his) way with me." The problem is that Job does not have a clue. The irony of verse 10b is striking: God is testing Job, and Job does come out vindicated. The next verses (11-14) juxtapose two very important concepts. Job has been completely faithful to God, whose dealings, however, are mysterious. And who knows what other surprises lie ahead (vv. 13-14)? Here we have in focus the pervasive tension between Job's fidelity and God's freedom, which cannot be reduced to the size of our human minds.

It is precisely this tension that underlies Job's confusion and fear (v. 15; the Hebrew word used here is different from that representing "fear of God," religious piety). Job is left in his dark night of the soul. He wonders why God does not have scheduled times for holding court and rendering decisions, presumably scenes such as we saw in 1:6 and 2:1 (24:1).

Picking up the theme of social injustice, Job describes the work of the wicked oppressing the weak and helpless (vv. 2-4), but he then goes on to give us an extended portrait of the plight of these poor as they struggle to survive (vv. 5-12). Again, it would be naive to think that this was only an ancient problem; the scene is repeated daily in our streets. But, inexplicably, God does not interfere; the wicked are not punished nor are the poor rescued (v. 13b). The simple view of justice espoused by the friends simply does not work.

The following unit (vv. 13-17) is a wisdom-like reflection on the two ways, light and darkness, and those who love the darkness. Day and night are symbols for two different ways of life. The murderer, the adulterer, and the thief love the dark to accomplish their evil deeds. For them, the coming of darkness is like morning when they rise to go to work. Their lives thus reverse the natural order of things.

The next few verses are very problematic, the text being both corrupt and obscure. The New American Bible has, in effect, thrown up its hands. Given the situation, not much else can be said. Verse 25 would be an appropriate comment after verse 12.

25:1-6 Bildad's third speech. Bildad begins his final words, not with the customary sarcastic remarks about Job, but with hymnic praise of the creator-God who establishes peace (v. 2b; NAB: "harmony") in heaven. Behind this language lies the familiar myth of cosmic combat in which the warrior-god overcomes Sea, the force of chaos, thus establishing cosmic peace. This heavenly condition is expected to be reflected in our earthly situation as well.

The following verses (vv. 4-6) reprise the oft-repeated anthropology of the friends (see 4:17-21; 11:11; 15:14-16). All human beings are corrupt and filled with iniquity. Job's claim to be innocent is thus impossible; there is no such thing as an innocent human being. If the heavenly bodies are unclean (earlier the other heavenly beings were also called unclean; see 4:18 and 15:15), how much more human beings, who are nothing but maggots and worms.

Some scholars see this very brief speech as merely interrupted by Job's outburst in 26:1-4 but resumed in 26:5-14, where similar creation imagery recurs. This is possible but conjectural. In the text as it stands, the exalted reflections on the human condition are the friends' last recorded words.

26:1–27:21 Job's final reply. The following two chapters are problematic and seem almost to be patched together from fragments. Job begins with a typical taunt of his friends and rebukes them with an abundance of classical wisdom terminology: counsel, wisdom, advice (vv. 2-3). However, by failing to take account of a large block of experience, namely Job's, they have departed from the path of authentic wisdom.

As noted above, the magnificent description of God's creation that follows (vv. 5-14) may be a continuation of Bildad's hymn to the Creator (25:2-6), but as our text now stands, Job, after cutting Bildad off, goes on to finish the hymn for him. As we might anticipate in material of this kind, mythological references abound.

God's power is not limited to the heavenly bodies and the earth, but extends even to the realm of Death, variously called the land of shades, the nether world, and Abaddon (place of destruction) (vv. 5-6). In the ancient mythology, the North was the place where the gods dwelled. As if putting up a tent, God stretches out the North over the primordial chaos (the same Hebrew word as Gen 1:2 used to describe the disorder from which creation, or ordering, began); the earth is then hung over the same primordial "no-thing" (v. 7). It would be anachronistic to see later ideas here, such as creation out of nothing or our view of the world hanging, as it were, in space. The next two verses (vv. 8-9) deal with the clouds, first viewed as cosmic wineskins intended to hold the rain, and then seen as the dark clouds which cover the light of the moon and upon which the storm-god rides out to battle.

God then marks out the horizon of the ocean, which is the place where we see the separation of night and day (v. 10). The cosmic pillars (v. 11) hold up the heavens, that is, the dish-shaped dome (or firmament) that keeps out the "waters above" (see Gen 1:6-8). God's "rebuke" (v. 11) is the storm-god's thunder or war cry, which strikes fear in the heart of God's foes (see Ps 104:7-9). Verses 12-13 name the sea dragon, the mythological figure for chaos: God stirs up Sea (better than NAB, "the sea"), crushes Rahab, and splits open the dragon. And all this is but the outline (Hebrew: "the extremities") of God's ways (v. 14)! In the speeches of Yahweh soon to follow (chs. 38–41), some of the outline will be filled in.

The New American Bible omits the new heading in 27:1, "Job once again took up his discourse." Beginning with a solemn oath, "As God lives," Job goes on to maintain yet again his innocence. It is God who is wronging him; unlike his friends, Job will not serve God with lies and falsehood (v. 4; see 13:7-9). He will not concede anything to his friends' position. That Job maintains "my justice" does not imply that he is or has been completely sinless; rather, his position is correct, that of his friends false (v. 6).

The remaining verses (27:7-21) remind us once more of the fate of the wicked. This was the constant theme of the second round of speeches and was thoroughly refuted by Job in chapter 21. For this reason, these verses have struck scholars as curiously out of place in the mouth of Job. The same scholars have tried to reconstruct from them a lost third speech of Zophar. Be that as it may, the verses are now in the mouth of Job; can we make any sense of the text as it stands?

In ancient Israelite law, one convicted of false witness against an innocent person was subject to the same penalty that the innocent party would have undergone. Job wishes that his enemy (that is, his friends who are bearing false testimony) be as the wicked (v. 7), and then quotes back to them the penalties with which they had previously threatened him (vv. 8-21). The only new element is verse 17, which says that the innocent will possess the riches of the wicked.

VI. POEM ON WISDOM

Job 28:1-28

This chapter stands rather loosely in the book. A general scholarly consensus holds that it was originally an independent composition before being incorporated here. Its present function is to act as a resting place, an interlude, or better, an editorial aside of the narrator. Its theme is set in the refrain found in verses 12 and 20, "Whence can wisdom be obtained, and where is the place of understanding?" The answer is captured in the caption, "The Inaccessibility of Wisdom." The Hebrew text is difficult, and while the rearrangement of verses in the New American Bible is rather extensive, that is what we will follow here.

28:1-6 Wisdom cannot be mined. Beginning rather abruptly, the poem mentions precious metals that are taken from the earth. Humans use their ingenuity, skill, and resourcefulness to find them and mine them: silver, gold, iron, copper, precious stones. The New American Bible has regarded verse 4 as hopeless, and a glance at other translations indicates that it may be right. But in all the search for precious things, where is wisdom to be found? What is the way to understanding (v. 12)?

28:13-18 Nor can it be purchased. That wisdom is more precious than silver and gold is a truism of the wisdom literature (see Prov 3:14-15; 8:10-11, 19; 16:16). Here the same thought is developed as we stroll through the whole literary jewelry store. Ophir (v. 16; see also 22:24) was the source par excellence of gold (see 1 Kgs 9:26-28; 10:11; 22:48), but its location is not known. The two great sources of human achievement, ingenuity and skill on the one hand, and riches on the other, are of no avail in the search for wisdom and understanding.

28:21-22 Nothing in creation knows the way to it. Not only is human effort of no avail but no help can be found anywhere else in creation. The sharp-eyed birds have seen nary a trace; the proud beasts have not come on it either. Nor do the two great mythic symbols of chaos, Sea-Abyss and Death-Abaddon have a clue. The quest for wisdom would seem to be hopeless. But is it?

28:23-28 God knows. In the fullness of knowledge and creative power, God alone knows the way to wisdom. General creative activity is described first (vv. 3, 9-11). The association of wisdom with creation is found throughout the Old Testament wisdom tradition. Prov 3:18-20 and 8:22-31 are especially good examples. Verses 25-26 narrow the focus to God's control of the thunderstorm, perhaps a foreshadowing of God's speaking to Job from the storm in 38:1. Then it was that God saw, appraised, established, and searched out wisdom. Just as human wisdom is manifested in human behavior, so too God's wisdom is manifested in God's activity.

It might seem at this point that the human quest for wisdom is at a dead end. Such is not the case. God has told us that fear of the Lord and keeping from evil are the beginning of wisdom. In other words, the human quest for wisdom begins with getting our relationship with God in right order; then our quest will not violate the limits of creaturehood. Interestingly, these are precisely two of the four terms used to describe the virtuous Job in 1:1, 8.

Chapter 28 does serve an important editorial role at this point in the book. It looks back over the preceding debate and suggests that the search recorded there has been misguided. The friends certainly have not respected their limits and have claimed too much. On the other hand, the chapter looks forward to the Yahweh speeches and the end of the book. There it is affirmed that wisdom is with God, manifested in creation, but beyond human grasp. The focus shifts to Job's relationship to God and away from his understanding of God's ways.

VII. JOB'S MONOLOGUE: HE RESTS HIS CASE

Job 29:1–31:37

Job is left with little recourse. His pleas for arbitration, for an "out of court" settlement, as it were, have fallen on deaf ears. God cannot be found to receive a subpoena; the witnesses are false witnesses who will lie on the stand. These three chapters (29–31) constitute one extended speech presenting Job's review of his case, his final lament, and a ringing reassertion of innocence. Like chapter 3, it is a public outcry addressed to any or all who will listen.

The discussion up to now has been fairly general. With the exception of 22:6-9, the friends have accused Job vaguely of being a sinner; just as vaguely (see 6:29; 27:6), Job has rejected their accusations. Now Job replies with much more detail and specificity. He begins with a description of his past happy relationship with God (ch. 29), proceeds to a painful lament from his present situation (ch. 30), and ends, looking to his future vindication, with a resounding oath of innocence illustrated by a series of very specific moral behaviors.

29:1-25 "Oh, for the good old days!" This nostalgic poem begins by recalling God's closeness in the past and the blessings that flow therefrom. Blessing is, above all, the power of life, and this was manifested first in fertility (the life-force) of family, flocks, and field (vv. 5-6). It is manifested in other ways as well, and chief among these in the ancient Near Eastern culture was the experience of honor. The rest of the chapter develops this. At the city gate, where people gathered for social, business, and legal matters, Job was an honored sage, elder, and counselor (vv. 7-10, 21-25, moved in the New American Bible to follow verse 10). Others honored Job especially by the way they waited for, responded to, and respected his speech (vv. 21-23). In the context of the whole book, this is particularly ironic.

Job's honorable behavior appears clearly in the way he has treated others. Refuting Eliphaz's groundless accusations (22:6-9), Job has dealt justly with the poor, orphans, widows, the blind and lame, the needy, strangers, and those being victimized by the wicked (vv. 12-17). Job, therefore, had every right to expect that he would experience these blessings into his old age. Verse 18 is uncertain: Job will multiply years either "like the phoenix" (a legendary bird thought to rise anew from its own ashes, hence a symbol of immortality), or, more likely, "like sand (on the seashore)." Verse 20 summarizes: Job knows strength and vitality (v. 20b) as well as "glory" (v. 20a; in Hebrew the root means "to be/have weight," here social weight, honor). Job was, alas, mistaken.

30:1-31 "Now the tables are turned." Now the situation is reversed. Instead of honor, Job is held in shame and disgrace. Above all, and most painfully, he is derided by the dregs of society, who deserve the mean situation in which they live ("saltwort" and "roots of the broom plant" in verse 4 both represent bitter foods that only the most destitute would consider eating). They are not only poor and hungry (Job had protected and fed these), but they are people "without a name" (v. 8), that is, with no claim to reputation or honor. The hands of such as these have snatched away Job's dignity and welfare (v. 15; literally, "salvation," but here the reference is to the outward signs of abundance, comfort, and honor).

Job's lament now turns to God (vv. 20-26). As usual, God is deaf to Job's cries of distress. Not only this, it seems God will consign Job to death and the nether world. When others were in a similar situation, Job stood by and helped them. Now that he is in need, who will stand with him (vv. 24-26)?

Job has spoken of his enemies and of God; now he describes his own situation (vv. 16, 17, 27, 28-31). His inner life is flowing away; his bones ache; his inward parts (v. 17; literally, "his intestines") are in constant turmoil. He is forsaken and alone. All along he has cried out for a friend to stand with him. Pathetically, his only friends now are the jackal and the ostrich, both beasts of the wilderness known for their offensive "speech" (v. 29).

This chapter is in many ways a classical lament. It echoes many characteristic phrases and images, and moves through the threefold relationship of the lamenter to enemies, to God, and to self. A comparative reading of Psalms 22, 88, and 102 in this light might prove helpful here. Psalm 88 in particular could almost be a prayer straight from the mouth of Job himself. But Job does not stop here.

31:1-40 "I swear I am innocent!" In the prologue, Job, deprived of all, had prayed, "The Lord gave, and the Lord has taken away" (1:21). Chapter 29 described what the Lord gave; chapter 30, how the Lord took away. But now Job has somewhat more to say. Twice before (13:13-19; 23:2-7) he had called on God directly to stand in court and answer his charges. In the form of a "negative confession" (known elsewhere in the ancient Near East), he now utters a lengthy oath of innocence. This was an especially serious step to take. As we have seen, in the ancient, oral culture, words were of utmost seriousness, and words of blessing (see, for example, Gen 27:31-38) and cursing were among the most solemn. Here Job avers his innocence using a self-curse form: "If I have done X, then may Y happen to me" (see Ps 7:4-6). If Job is guilty, God should bring the curse to pass; if innocent, the curse will not happen, and Job's name is cleared publicly. This is a move of desperation to force God's hand.

Job first calls on God to weigh him in the scales of justice, that is, with a true balance (v. 6). False scales are frequently condemned in the Old Testament (see Lev 19:36; Prov 11:1; Amos 8:5). The figure of God's judgment as weighing may derive from Egypt, where the heart of the deceased was often pictured being weighed against the feather of Truth. Job then begins his "negative confession": "If you accuse me of X, I plead 'Not Guilty!'" He presents a truly exalted and challenging moral summary, but the exact number of areas mentioned is problematic. The text is at times uncertain; the New American Bible makes three changes: verse 1 precedes verse 9; verse 6 follows verse 4; and verses 38-40 follow verse 8. Thus we end up with nine general areas of moral concern.

1. Falsehood and deceit (vv. 5-8).
2. Exploitation of the land (vv. 38-40). In our day of ecological crises, we need not belabor the need to recover a sense of the seriousness of this concern.
3. Lust and adultery (vv. 1, 9-12). Coveting the wife of another (see Exod 20:17; Deut 5:21) is the subject of frequent warning in the wisdom tradition (Prov 2:16; 5:3-6; 6:27-35; 7:6-23). Here the self-curse punishment dramatically and graphically fits the crime.
4. Rights of servants (vv. 13-15). Slaves were usually considered one's property and did not strictly come under justice. This was not adequate for Job; not only did he treat slaves fairly, but men and women were equal before him. The reason for this was simple: our common humanity—we are all creatures of the one Creator. This idea is a commonplace in wisdom literature (see Prov 14:31; 17:5; 22:2; 29:13).
5. Hardheartedness against the poor and needy (vv. 16-23). Concern for the poor and oppressed runs throughout the Old Testament and has already appeared several times in the Book of Job (22:6-9; 24:2-9; 29:12-17).
6. Idolatry (vv. 24-28). Social injustice is the reverse side of idolatry; the two go together and are often intertwined (see, for example, Jer 7:1-11; Ezek 18:5-9). It is very appropriate that here numbers 5 and 6 come back to back. Verses 24-25 depict the idol of wealth and money; verses 26-28 warn against the surrounding pagan religions, which worshiped the sun and moon and other heavenly bodies.
7. Hatred of enemies (vv. 29-30). Calling down curses on one's enemies is not uncommon in the lament psalms (for example, 69:23-29; 109:1-20), but other parts of the Old Testament urge us to help our enemies (Exod 23:4-5) and to repay evil with good (Prov 20:22; 24:17-18; 25:21-22). Job is in line with this more difficult position, which is concerned not only with outward behavior but with inner attitudes as well.
8. Hospitality (vv. 31-32). In ancient society, without a police force or highway patrol for help and protection, a stranger traveling alone was an easy and inviting target. Hospitality toward strangers was an especially sacred social obligation. Attempts to find reference here to sexual abuses are not convincing.
9. Hypocrisy (vv. 33-34). Again Job focuses on attitudes of inner integrity. We can all, I suspect, appreciate Job's honesty; it is not an easy virtue.

Job's review has covered all the types of relationships that run throughout the webs of our lives: to God, to self, to others (friends, enemies, servants, the poor and needy), to the natural environment itself. All these are covered by the biblical concept of justice; Job is clearly just and cries out to be recognized as such. If his accuser would write out the charges, they would be so obviously false that Job could wear them proudly as a badge of honor for all to see (vv. 35-37). This is his final plea. The Hebrew (v. 35b) says, "Behold my tau." Tau is the final letter of the Hebrew alphabet and, in ancient times, was written like our letter X. Job is saying, in effect, "I sign on the bottom line; here is my X; I have nothing more to say. Now let God answer me!"

VIII. ELIHU'S SPEECHES

Job 32:1–37:24

Job has finished his defense by calling on God to respond. We wait, eagerly anticipating what will happen next. Totally out of the blue, an intruder called Elihu jumps on the stage. Previously unmentioned, he says his piece and disappears into the oblivion from which he came. Scholars discuss whether these speeches were part of the original book and whether they were composed by the same author or added by a later editor. These questions need not detain us as we seek to understand the text before us.

Elihu (the name means "He is my God") is an angry young man who has apparently been following the proceedings closely. Thoroughly dissatisfied with what he has heard, he is bursting to have his say (32:19). He does this in four speeches (32:6–33:33; 34:1-37; 35:1-16; 36:1–37:24), which add little that is new, but he does this with passion, conviction, and long-windedness.

32:6b–33:33 Elihu's first speech. Despite his youth, Elihu will speak. Wisdom does not always or necessarily abide with age; it is a gift of the breath/spirit of God (32:8, 18), and Elihu has as much a right to speak as they who have been unable to answer Job satisfactorily. "We can't do it; let God answer him!" (v. 13). Unlike the friends, Elihu addresses Job by name (33:1, 31). Job need not be afraid; after all, he and Elihu are both creatures of God.

After a long windup (32:6b–33:7), Elihu comes to the point. In his speeches he refers to earlier statements of Job, but the quotations are less verbatim and more ad sensum. Here (33:9-11) it is recalled that Job has claimed to be innocent, that God is wrongly treating him as an enemy and ignores his cries for help (see 9:20; 10:7; 13:24, 27; 19:11). In this Job is wrong (33:12). God does speak; perhaps Job has missed it. God uses dreams and nightmares on the one hand, and sickness on the other to warn sinners and to get them to return to the path of life (vv. 14-22). Elihu, too, mentions a heavenly mediator, one of the divine court (v. 23) who will help lead the sinner to repentance. Job had longed for such a mediator (16:19-22), but had something else in mind for this mediator to do. The friends had often begun by taunting Job; Elihu here ends in that way.

34:1-37 Elihu's second speech. Elihu now turns his attention directly to the friends, sarcastically called "wise" (v. 1). The ability to adapt proverbs to different situations was a skill of the wise; Elihu quotes a proverb (v. 3) similar to one Job had used in a rather different context (12:11). Again, Job is cited (vv. 5-6), but instead of arguing with him, Elihu mocks him as a blasphemer who wallows in evil company (vv. 7-9). A lengthy defense (vv. 10-29) of the justice and righteousness of God follows. Addressing Job, Elihu rebukes him. "You wouldn't talk to a king or prince that way! And who are they in comparison with God?" (vv. 18-19). God sees all and renders judgment. Those who turn away from God have only themselves to blame (vv. 24, 27). As the friends had done in the first round of speeches, Elihu suggests to Job what he might say to God in repentance (vv. 31-32). The choice is up to Job. The concluding verses (vv. 34-37) are as harsh and cruel (and irrelevant) as anything the friends had said.

35:1-16 Elihu's third speech. Elihu continues to develop the theme of God's transcendence and grandeur. "Look at the skies, the heavens above" (v. 5). Human behavior, for good or ill, affects only other humans; what arrogance to think it somehow affects God (vv. 6-8)! The oppressed (like Job) cry out for deliverance, and God seems not to hear. But God does hear. Perhaps no answer is given because they have been too self-centered and have not sufficiently "trembled before him"

(v. 14). This is a glib answer given all too often and all too casually to protect a pet theory about God.

36:1-37:24 Elihu's fourth speech. The first part of this speech (36:1-21) continues the debate of the previous sections. The fate of the righteous and the wicked is reviewed once again. Suffering can be sent by God to educate and instruct us (v. 15). Verses 16-21 are very corrupt and so are omitted in the New American Bible.

The second part (36:22-37:13) is a hymn in praise of the vastness of the Creator. God's power, wisdom, and knowledge are beyond our ability to understand (v. 26). Elihu focuses on God's gift of rain and draws, as we might expect, on the common Near Eastern language about the storm-god who rides on the dark clouds, gives off a war shout (the voice of God, the thunder; see Psalm 29), and hurls spears (the lightning) to the ground. It is an awesome experience; animals and humans react with fear and wonder.

"Consider, Job, the wondrous works of God" (v. 14). In other parts of the Old Testament, the "wonders" of God refer to the mighty deeds that delivered Israel out of Egypt. In the wisdom tradition, with its more universal creation perspective, God's wonders are the deeds of creation, which all can see and respond to. Elihu hurls a series of questions at Job, to which, of course, Job can only answer "No" (vv. 15-21).

God comes from the North, the mythological home of the gods. We cannot call God to account, however wise we may be. All we can do is "fear" (worship and revere) God, and this is, after all, the beginning of wisdom (28:28).

Elihu is indeed an intruder on the scene, but nonetheless he is a real transition figure. His earlier remarks look back to the speeches of Job and his friends. Some of this is reviewed and attacked for one last time, without much new being added. The latter speeches look ahead, focusing more and more on God and ending with the description of a storm and a series of questions meant to humble Job. Now Yahweh will speak from the storm and with a similar list of questions.

IX. THE YAHWEH SPEECHES

Job 38:1-42:6

The Yahweh of the prologue who has, as Elihu observed (35:13), been hearing and taking notice now speaks, and it is a surprise for all involved. The friends had said, in effect, that it was unnecessary for God to speak—Job's condition could be adequately explained by their theory. They were wrong. Job had called either for a list of charges against him or for a verdict; he gets neither. Yahweh enters the argument as another debater.

Yahweh's replies are given in two speeches (38:1-40:2; 40:6-41:26), to which Job gives brief replies (40:3-5; 42:1-6). None of Job's questions are answered. In fact, Yahweh's remarks are little more than a series of counterquestions. Like a teacher springing a surprise quiz, Yahweh is trying to involve Job in the process of learning and to lead him out (the literal meaning of "educate") of his own small context into the larger world. If the speeches contain no answer to Job, do they perhaps contain an answer for Job? We will return to this later when we discuss the meaning of the book.

38:1-40:2 Yahweh's first speech. Yahweh speaks out of the storm (v. 1). In the Old Testament, appearances of God are frequently described with storm terminology (see Exod 19:17-20; Ps 18:7-17). In fact, Job had predicted just such an eventuality (9:17). Girding the loins (v. 3) is preparation for a difficult and arduous undertaking (see Exod 12:11; 1 Kgs 18:46). Now it is Yahweh's turn to ask questions and Job's turn to respond. This, too, Job had earlier requested (13:22) but with slightly different expectations.

God interrogates Job about the marvels of creation, which manifest the divine power and wisdom. Does Job understand any of these? Can he do any of these? Job is led back to experience anew the mystery of the cosmos from its beginning. First, the founding of the earth is described as if it were a house being built to architectural specifications. The heavenly council rejoiced; where was Job (vv. 4-7)? Next, God restrained the primordial sea (vv. 8-11). There is no hint of a struggle against a monster, as in the myths. Instead, the sea is born, clothed, and confined to its cosmic playpen with clear parental orders. And what of the morning (vv. 12-15), when dawn colors everything (v. 14) and brings to light the dark deeds of sinners (v. 15)?

Verses 16-18 return to the theme of the primordial chaos, but here sea appears with its destructive partner, death. Does Job's understanding reach that far? Verses 19-20 resume the theme of light, which now appears with its partner, darkness. Does Job know where they dwell? Verse 21 records a touch of divine irony.

Having discussed the primary structures of the cosmos, Yahweh now turns to mysteries within the universe, particularly weather phenomena (vv. 22-30). First come the snow, hail, and wind (vv. 22-24), followed by the rain, which also falls in the wilderness (vv. 26-27). God's concern is larger than Job's humanity-centered preoccupations (vv. 25-28). Finally, what of the ice and hoarfrost? All this manifests God's continuing providence for creation.

For many in the ancient world, human destiny was written in the stars. The heavenly constellations are now cited (vv. 31-33). The reference in verse 32 to "the Mazzaroth" is unclear. Various proposals have been made; it may have something to do with the zodiac. Can Job exercise any control over these? Or can he bring the rain, wrapping himself in a storm cloud (vv. 34-35)? Yahweh has indeed created all with wisdom (see also Prov 3:18-20; 8:22-30).

In the remainder of the speech, attention turns to the animal world (38:39–40:30). Five pairs of wild animals are mentioned: the lion and the raven (38:39-41); the mountain goat and the hind (39:1-4); the wild ass and the wild ox (39:5-12); the ostrich and the warhorse (39:13-25); the hawk and the eagle (39:26-30). Yahweh's knowledge and provident care are highlighted. But perhaps there is more here than meets the eye. This animal parade might not have been chosen at random. Studies in ancient Near Eastern art and iconography have shown that almost all these animals are associated with negative images (demons, wilderness, chaos). They represent a world in opposition to human society. Yahweh is saying not only that these mysterious beasts and their ways are understood but that they are controlled and that this is a boon to human society.

Thus the two parts of Yahweh's first speech answer Job's charge that there is no plan, direction, or providence in the world (Job obscures divine plans, 38:2). First, Yahweh shows who is in charge of the natural cosmos, both in its structure and its regular operation; it will not revert to chaos. Then, as Lord of the threatening wild animals, Yahweh protects human civilization from reverting to the same chaos.

40:1-5 Job's first response. Yahweh pauses to catch a breath and to give Job a chance to respond. In his final speech in chapters 29–31, Job had spoken of his honor (weight) and of how others, in a deferential gesture, had placed their hands over their mouths (29:9). Now Job feels small; he has been "overweighted" by God. His response in verse 4 could be translated literally, "I am a lightweight," and he covers his mouth in respect. Job does not confess any sinfulness. He has, rather, been caught up into the mystery of God and the universe. His stance now is somewhat different from that of his concluding words in chapter 31.

40:6–41:26 Yahweh's second speech. Yahweh renews the challenge for Job to stand up like a warrior and respond (see 38:3). Then, at long last, Yahweh shows that he is aware of Job's challenges (v. 8). Is it really necessary for Job to condemn God in order to affirm his own innocence? Yahweh goes on to ask Job, basically, "Are you as big and strong as I am? If so, let's see you administer justice to the wicked." Job had not in fact claimed or requested superhuman power; his desire to understand had motivated him.

The description of two mighty beasts follows—Behemoth (vv. 15-24) and, at much greater length, Leviathan (40:25–41:26). Scholars have noted resemblances to the hippopotamus and the crocodile, but they are also symbols of primordial chaos, which Yahweh subdues in creating. Thus we probably have a mixing of the zoological and the mythological here. Of both of them Job is asked, "Can you put a rope through their nose? Can you capture them?" (vv. 24-26). They can thrash and strut around, trying to return things to chaos, but they are not in charge. Yahweh is! Yahweh does not demolish them but limits them, gives them some rope. In fact, he looks on them with something like joy and admiration.

Perhaps we can go further. It has been suggested that the two beasts are used by Yahweh not only to rebuke Job but also, and especially, to console him. The two beasts are meant as symbols, even caricatures, of Job himself, who thrashes and struts about saying, "Everything is going back to chaos!" Job does compare himself at birth to Leviathan (3:8) and later to the sea monster (7:12). As Job sat on the dust (2:8), so Leviathan knows no equal "on the dust" (v. 25; NAB: "upon the earth"). By looking at these animals as described by Yahweh, Job may also be instructed and consoled. Not only will God not destroy Job, but, in fact, God actually takes pride and delights in him ("Have you seen my servant Job?" 1:8).

42:1-6 Job's second response. Job's final words recognize God's power and purpose, and admit that these are beyond his ability to understand. The wondrous works (v. 3; 37:14) are too much for him. Previously Job had learned of God from the words of tradition, but now, caught up in his experience of Yahweh, he has a more direct kind of knowledge. Job disowns what he has said and "repents" (v. 6). Has Job finally done what they all (the Satan, his wife, his friends, Elihu) have been trying to get him to do? That is hardly likely. Now, as earlier, God is not served by lies. Job may have overstepped his limits in his search for understanding, but his suffering was not the result of sin. The Hebrew word translated "repent" does not primarily convey a confession of sinfulness or guilty remorse; it means "to change one's mind" or "to be sorry." Even God "repents" (see Gen 6:6). "Dust and ashes" is most likely a reference to Job's new realization of creaturely limitation.

X. EPILOGUE

Job 42:7-17

The book began with a narrative prologue; a narrative epilogue brings the story quickly to an end. Job finds that for which he has so ardently hoped: vindication from God and before the community. The conclusion moves through three stages:

1) Yahweh reprimands Eliphaz and the friends, "You have not spoken rightly of me as Job has done!" (v. 7). This is as ironic as it is important. Job has just said that he had spoken of things he did not understand and "repented" his words. "I spoke wrongly." The first thing God says is, "No, you did not!" And in case we might gloss over the remark, it is repeated in the next verse. Job's speaking has been vindicated. Now, if the friends are to escape more severe punishment, they must approach Job, once again called God's "servant," and ask for his intercession. This he gives, and God accepts it. The friends are spared.

2) In addition to having his speech vindicated, Job has his property restored (vv. 10-11). He himself had never mentioned or asked for this; the friends had promised him this, but only if he confessed his guilt. Job's friends and relatives come now and offer real comfort.

3) Finally, Yahweh blesses Job (vv. 12-17). As we have seen before, blessing is the power of life in its various manifestations. Now Job's livestock are returned, but double the quantity in chapter 1. He begets seven new sons and three new daughters, who receive names symbolic of their attractiveness: Jemimah (dove), Keziah (precious perfume), Kerenhappuch (mascara jar). Job dies, full of years and surrounded by his children to the third generation.

XI. THE MEANING OF THE BOOK

Now that we have read, studied, and reflected on the Book of Job, we can return to the question we left open in the Introduction: What is the meaning and the message of the book as a whole? We will look at four aspects of the question.

1) The problem of the suffering of the innocent. This is surely the first of the recurring themes that catches our eye; it forms, in fact, the substance of the debate between Job and his friends. Suffering, they affirm, is a punishment for sin (see 4:7-9; 8:20; 11:4-6; 22:4-5). When Job rejects this in his own case, they respond, "Don't give us that! All humans, maggots that they are, are sinners!" (14:1-4; 15:14; 25:4-6). Both these positions of the friends deny that there is any such thing as a sufferer who is innocent.

The situation is, however, more complicated, and other answers appear. Suffering is mysterious, and who are we to understand God's ways (11:7-10; 15:8-9; 28; 42:3)? Suffering is God's way of disciplining us and making us better (5:17-18; 36:15). Suffering is allowed by God to test the virtue of the righteous (chs. 1–2). All these answers allow us to hold on to both human innocence and divine justice. Both Job and his friends, in fact, hold strongly to divine justice. For the friends, it is the basis of their pat, traditional explanation; for Job, it is the basis of his crying out for a hearing and of his certainty of being acquitted.

As pervasive as this theme is, though, it is not likely that it is the main point of the book. On the one hand, we, the readers, know the answer to Job's particular case from the beginning: his suffering is probationary. Will Job serve God without getting any reward for it (1:9)? On the other hand, the problem is not really answered within the context of the debate. Even the Yahweh speeches are not much help; they do not add substantially anything that has not already been said (for example, by Elihu, 37:14-24). If the main point of the book lies here, it must be judged pretty much a failure.

2) The mystery of suffering and relationship with God. The first approach views suffering as a problem to be argued on the intellectual level. This second aspect takes us deeper. A problem is something "out there"; we can see all the pieces, all its dimensions. The question is, How do we put it together? A mystery, on the other hand, is a situation in which I, as a unique human being, am so immersed that I can never get far enough away to see it "out there." Love is a mystery; so is death. So is suffering. Problems are solved; mysteries are lived, and lived most fully in relationship with others.

For Job, the greatest pain comes from the confusion about his relationship with God. Previously he and God were friends (ch. 29); then that friend seems to become an enemy (13:24). From this perspective the Yahweh speeches do provide an answer, and the answer derives less from what is said (the content) and more from the fact that something is said. The mere fact of Yahweh's response shows that Yahweh has been present and listening all the time and reaffirms the relationship. Job is thus enabled, despite his continuing darkness about why he has suffered (he never does learn about the heavenly contest), to live through the struggle because he knows that he is not, and has not really been, alone. The book, then, addresses less a problem of theology (though this is, as it were, all over the surface) and more a mystery of faith, of our relationship with God, which is, indeed, its own reward.

From this perspective we can notice a real change in the protagonists. Job at the end is not the same as Job at the beginning. This change has been described as "the humanization of Job." The Job of the prologue may be very virtuous, but he is certainly not a human being like ourselves. He is just unreal. From his first speech in chapter 3, Job is in the depths of human anguish and rises progressively through the debate until, at the end, he stands strongly—perhaps a bit too much so—and throws his oath of innocence at God (chs. 29–31). After the Yahweh speeches, Job admits that now he knows quite a bit more about being "dust and ashes" (42:2-6). Even though the concluding idyllic scene seems to be a return to the prologue setting, it is not. Job has been profoundly changed.

We must also observe—and frequently this is not noted—that the other half of the relationship, God, has changed too. God at the beginning is not the same as God at the end. In the prologue God speaks of Job as a proud parent might. Then the test begins. God is not a disinterested spectator, but God's honor and God's person are at stake as well as Job's. It is not God on one side and Job on the other (as Job thinks), but God-with-Job on the one side, and the Satan, Job's wife, and the friends on the other. Perhaps it would be true to the dynamism of the story to picture God looking down on the debate, anxiously hanging on every word, cheering Job on, wincing at the friends, and more often than not holding back until Job has had his say. Finally, unable to prolong the restraint after holding it in for thirty-four chapters (chs. 3–37), God bursts out like a whirlwind, enters the debate, ostensibly chiding Job's audaciousness, but behind it all a proud parent once again. The test has been passed in glorious fashion. God and Job ("my servant," 1:8; 2:3; 42:7, 8), wiser for the journey, are seen again to be what they always were—friends.

In describing this journey through the Book of Job, some scholars have spoken of Job as a comedy. In the classical sense, a comedy is a story that goes through three acts:

(1) all's well; (2) all's not well; (3) all's well once again. (Think of any—or every—I Love Lucy episode you have seen!) In addition, there are recurring moments of humor and irony. Humor is very hard to capture across the great gap of time and culture that separates us from the people of the Bible, but certain moments of irony have been suggested in the commentary. For our canonical Book of Job, this does seem to be a helpful analogy. This dimension of the book—the mystery of suffering and relationship to God—is a rich one that moves us deeply into the concerns and structure of the book, but is there more that can be said to situate this movement more concretely?

3) "Job has spoken rightly of me." This powerful and ironic statement of Yahweh (42:7-8), which contradicts in a way the evaluation Job has just offered (42:2-6), points to another dimension of the book and its concerns of suffering, mystery, and relationship. A key point at issue, often noted in this commentary, is precisely: How will Job speak in adversity? Will he flagrantly blaspheme God, as the Satan twice predicted (1:11; 2:5)? Twice he was wrong (1:22; 2:10): "In all this, Job did not sin with his lips" (2:10). The core of the book is, appropriately enough, discourse—speech follows speech follows speech. Job accuses his friends of speaking falsely for God (13:7-9), while he himself refuses to be silent (7:11; 10:1; 13:13; 27:4) until he is finished (31:35, "Here is my taul"). Balancing off the two challenges of the Satan in the prologue, Yahweh, in the epilogue, affirms two times that "Job, my servant, has spoken rightly of me" (42:7-8).

How is "rightly" to be understood? Grammatically, the word, can be either an adverb ("in the proper way") or a noun ("right things"). Both meanings would seem to be operating in this text. First, Job has spoken in a proper way. He has lamented; he has argued; he has prayed (something the friends never do); he has challenged. All this can be summed up in a phrase: in all his speaking, Job has strenuously maintained the integrity of his experience. What else did he have left to claim as his own? If he abandoned that, he would indeed be bereft of all. Despite pressures to the contrary, he honestly spoke his pain, his confusion, and his doubt, but he never doubted or betrayed his own integrity. God is not served with lies, no matter how well-intentioned (13:7-9). Job knew instinctively that if any healthy relationship was to be maintained with God, it had to be based on the truth; and Job spoke his truth loud and clear for all to hear. He was not satisfied with the theological explanations of the friends, handed down from "former generations" (8:8). Whatever truth they may have had, they violated the integrity of Job, who will not or cannot let them go unchallenged to the next generation. His cry has echoed to the next generation now for over two and a half millennia.

But, secondly, Job has spoken right things as well. Not bought off by cheap "God-talk" and holding to his own integrity, Job was able to see and affirm the presence of a mystery. "I know the theories as well as you; I also know my own experience. What I do not know is what's going on or how I can explain it!" God and our relationship to God are too deep and too vast to be reduced to or contained in our intellectual propositions. The Yahweh speeches (chs. 38–41) are a strong reminder of that. Furthermore, at the center of the mystery, Job has left room for the freedom of God. The speech of the friends had sold short not only Job but God as well. We see once again how Job and God are basically on one side and suffer the same distortions. It is a perennial danger of overly religious people to get their God too much from the past and thus miss the surprises of the biblical God who calls us forward (not backward!) into newness (see Gen 12:1-3). It was speaking rightly of himself that enabled Job to speak rightly of God. Both of these are profound and courageous acts of faith that lie beyond the reach of the friends and their followers through the ages.

4) The meaning of friendship. Closely related to this is our fourth and last dimension of the meaning of the book—the role and function of friendship. Here we are drawn first and obviously to the negative example of "the friends." Moved by genuine sympathy, they gathered and came from afar; when they saw Job, they sat on the ground in grieving (and wise, 13:5) silence. But as soon as Job spoke (ch. 3), his words were so shocking that they had to jump to God's defense. We can legitimately wonder if they were defending God or their own overly tidy construction of God. "A friend owes kindness to one in despair, though he have forsaken the fear of the Almighty" (6:14). Even in the most extreme conditions, a friend should stand by with loving loyalty. Job bewails his friends' unreliability (6:13-27); they have become simply another pain among many. He begins to hope for and dream of someone who will stand with him and say, "That's all right." First it is an arbiter (9:33); then a mediator (16:19); then a vindicator (19:25); finally, any helping hand will do (30:24). But there is no one. As Job says so pitifully, "Only the jackal is my friend" (30:29). He remains alone and forsaken, or so it seems to him.

This is not the only example of friendship in the book. Job himself represents a positive model. He stands by his children, thinking ahead and offering sacrifices to shield them from harm (1:5). He had been friend repeatedly to the needy and the oppressed (29:12-17) and had wept for the hardships of others (30:24-25). Zophar had told Job, with great irony, as things turned out, that if only he confessed his sin, he would prosper and others would come to him, asking his intercession (11:19b). In the end (42:7-9), the three had to come to Job, seeking his intercession. And, good friend that he was, Job stood by them, interceded for them, and turned away their further punishment.

Job has shown himself a true friend, but does he really have no friend at all in the book? We get caught up so easily in Job's speaking that we sometimes forget what we as readers know and Job does not. Despite appearances, God is Job's friend and has done exactly what the three friends did not do: kept silent and let Job have his say. A study of lamentation in the Bible shows that almost every lament psalm ends, rather unexpectedly, with a sudden turn to praise (for example, Pss 22:23-32; 28:69). Scholars have offered various explanations for this, but from a viewpoint of prayer, the meaning is fairly clear. When we experience brokenness and negativity in our lives, it is only after we face it and speak it in some way, only after we lament, that healing can really begin. We may face this negativity in a positive way (lament suggests that we speak it strongly to God) or in a negative way (denial and repression, which eventually take their toll). A friend should stand by and allow us to lament; this is exactly what God has done for Job. It was only after Job had said, "I am finished!" (31:35) that God would speak in turn. God is and has been on Job's side all along.

There is, finally, one more friend who, in some ways, is most important for us. Because of this friend, the situation for us, the readers, is changed. The Book of Job is a classic because it speaks so eloquently to human experience down through the ages. And we, too, know suffering, doubt, and confusion that push us at times to the breaking point. But we need never find ourselves in Job's position, with only the jackal for our friend (30:29). We do have a friend to stand with us and tell us, "That's all right; speak your pain. Hold on to your integrity with all your might. Respect the mystery and freedom of God. Get it all out, even though it be offensive to the pious ears of so-called orthodoxy. God is not served by lies." This friend is the author of the Book of Job, who is also a model of how we can and should be friends to others who are in need. The voice of this author, speaking in the Book of Job, is now part of our wisdom handed down from "former generations" (8:8). If we yield to the "orthodoxies" of our day and falsify our experience, we will falsify God as well, and God is not served by falsehood (13:6-9). If we betray the integrity of our experience, we may never discover in the depths of a renewed, living relationship that God is indeed with us and has been our friend all along.

WISDOM

John E. Rybolt, C.M.

INTRODUCTION

Title

The title "The Book of the Wisdom of Solomon" tells the reader both the subject of the book and the purported author. This is its most traditional designation. Early Latin texts, on the other hand, often name it simply "The Book of Wisdom," and some early Christian writers referred to it as "Solomon." Due to doubts about its authorship, both ancient and modern writers customarily follow the Latin style.

Author

Solomon never appears in the book as the author; the "I," however, refers clearly to acts of Solomon (see his prayer in chapter 9). Unfortunately, we do not know who the author is who masquerades behind the king's history. Scholars have suggested possible authors, but none of these is accepted today. We can conclude from his words that the writer was a pious Jew, loyal to the law. He had a good education, as can be seen from his large and rich vocabulary, some of which contains his own original terms. He knew poetry and demonstrated acquaintance with Greek philosophy. He may have been a teacher, but he was not strictly a philosopher with a firm system to impart.

Unity and structure

The author has presented his readers with a complex structure, using themes and specific terms to hold the form together. This structure has convinced modern researchers that the work is a unified whole. The possibility remains that portions of the work may have been composed previously, even in Hebrew; if so, these sections (perhaps chapters 1–5) have been greatly retouched. No significant differences in theology, philosophy or vocabulary appear among the various parts. The abrupt ending of the book causes questions as to whether the work is complete as we have it. Despite its abruptness, a good case can be made that it was finished. Granted that the structure is clever and complex, scholars differ on the book's outline and the boundaries of its sections.

Date and place of composition

Questions about the date and the purpose of the book are intertwined; hence a decision on one of these issues affects the outcome of the other. It appears that the book uses the Greek translation of certain biblical passages; this translation was done in the middle of the second century B.C.E. Many scholars believe that the Jewish philosopher Philo of Alexandria, born about 20 B.C.E., knew this book. Conversely, many leading ideas in Philo do not appear in the Book of Wisdom. The New Testament, too, seems to know the Book of Wisdom without quoting it exactly. The result is a date in the middle of the first century, about 50 B.C.E.

All these works, however, share in a larger thought-world, with its vocabulary and themes, and it is difficult to untangle the relationships among them. The place of composition was probably Egypt, judging by the author's intense interest in Egyptian matters. His language reflects the upper-class language of Alexandria in Egypt, the largest center of Jewish life in that country. An origin in Israel is also possible, since so much Greek thinking and language had infiltrated the land by the first century.

Purpose and audience

If the first century B.C.E. date is correct, then the purpose of the book is to build up the faith of its Jewish readers. Some readers would be pious, and the author encouraged their faith amid the troubles of life. Other readers were probably less convinced of Israel's faith, being captivated by Greek philosophy. For them, the book would support the traditional faith against developments of science and free thinking, reminding them of the nobility of their religion in comparison with that of their pagan neighbors. A few readers had abandoned Judaism in Egypt; the book called them back to God. Finally, some readers must have been Gentiles; the book pointed to the folly of idol worship. In all cases, the audience must have been educated, since the book abounds in figures of speech and subtle constructions accessible only to sophisticated readers.

Background and occasion

As mentioned above, the author had a good education, and he betrays his awareness of Greek lifestyle, art, literature, and philosophy. He either quotes or paraphrases the great writings of the Greeks and uses technical terms. He then weds his Greek education to his Hebrew heritage. He knew the Bible thoroughly and dealt with it as educated rabbis did, following similar lines of thought. A good education in Israel must also have included familiarity with Egypt, Israel's closest great neighbor. The author, at least in his attacks on idol worship, demonstrates this. Scholars have pointed to a possible familiarity with the Book of Qoheleth (Ecclesiastes) and theorized that his work appeared in opposition to Qoheleth. This, too, may have been due to certain common ideas in his period.

Language and style

The Book of Wisdom differs from other wisdom works much as Sirach does, that is, both works avoid simple lists of proverbs and write at some length on their topic. The book was composed in Greek; no Hebrew text exists, unlike Sirach. The Hebrew flavor of the book comes through in the author's use of Hebrew ideas ("heart" for the seat of thinking rather than "mind," as the Greeks taught) and in the poetic style. For his larger purpose, the author has written an exhortatory discourse, designed to move his audience to do something practical based on the reasons he presents. The traditional methods employed are personifications, the supposed speeches of adversaries and their objections (together with the author's answers), ridicule, and invocation of past heroes, whose names are often omitted.

Teaching

Again, like Ben Sira, the author is less a theologian than a preacher, with a passionate attachment to his subject. As a result, his teachings are often not carried out to logical conclusions, and contradictions occur. He teaches that God is everywhere active, knows everything, and loves all creatures. God also punishes and rewards, though the rewards may not be temporal ones. Evil in the world has its source in the envy of the devil. Wisdom is almost the same as God, since it emanates from God and somehow is responsible for doing God's will in the world. The pursuit of wisdom is the highest accomplishment; to attain wisdom is to be close to, even identified with, God.

God's human creatures have immortal souls; after death the just will be with God and the holy ones. The author does not speak of the resurrection of the body, however. Righteousness is the key to this immortality; humans are free in some way to seek God and to reject evil.

It is noteworthy that the author omits mention of sacrifice or Israel's cult. Yet Israel has a central place in God's historical plan. Moses, for the author, is a prophet but not a lawgiver. No personal Messiah appears, yet Israel's destiny speaks to this phase of their thinking.

Importance and authority

Echoes of the Book of Wisdom abound in certain New Testament books, particularly in John and the epistles of Paul; despite that, no New Testament author quotes the book directly. It seems to have influenced the development of New Testament Christology (and even Trinitarian thinking), particularly through the activity of the spirit of God in the world and the personification of wisdom. Christian readers can easily meditate on the pursuit of wisdom, especially when this is understood as an imitation of and even identification with God. Themes of providence in history and the immortality of the soul readily mesh with New Testament thinking.

The rabbis did not include this book as part of Scripture, probably because it was not written in Hebrew and betrayed an origin outside of Israel. Early Christians used it often, though the majority understood it as a work by someone other than Solomon. These hesitations have placed it at the edges of Old Testament thinking, and it thus forms part of the deuterocanonical (apocryphal) books of the Bible.

COMMENTARY

The Book of Wisdom falls into three main sections: wisdom, the reward of justice (1:1–6:21); praise of wisdom by Solomon (6:22–11:1); the providence of God in the Exodus (11:2–19:22). Not all scholars agree on the precise numbering of the verses in each section, but the outline is generally accepted.

Wisdom, the Reward of Justice (1:1–6:21)

The first section of the Book of Wisdom is traditionally divided into several clear parts: an exhortation to justice (1:1-15), the speech of the wicked (1:16–2:24), counsels from God (3:1–4:19), final judgment (4:20–5:23), a closing exhortation (6:1-12). These sections teach the value of wisdom, explore its meaning and results, and offer contrasts between the wise and the foolish.

1:1-15 Exhortation to justice, the key to life. As the entire Book of Wisdom is an exhortation, the author appropriately commences with a thematic exhortation: love justice, for this leads to wisdom. The passage begins with the advice to love, think, and seek—three ways of saying the same thing: the pursuit of God. The judges of the earth (recalling Ps 2:10) are Solomon's equals. In reality this is a figure of speech, giving an exalted tone to an essay addressed to everyone. The lesson of Wisdom applies universally.

In addition, "justice" is not simply legal rectitude. Rather, the term echoes the constant Hebrew notion of God's order imposed on the universe. As one seeks to know and then to live in accord with God's justice, one begins to imitate in personal activity the very life of God.

A series of reasons (vv. 2-11) follows, upholding the author's original invitation. To "test" God (v. 2) implies a basic lack of faith; the Lord does not come to such a person. "Perverse counsels" (v. 3) implies thoughts or plans that seek to go contrary to the manifest will of God. The following verse (v. 4) includes both body and soul, referring to the whole person rather than teaching a profound distinction between the two. The "debt of sin" does not mean that human bodies are by their nature sinful; all creation is good (see 1:14). The expression simply means that a person can freely come under the sway of sin.

Throughout, the author uses different expressions to refer to the same reality, a practice common in poetry. Ultimately even "wisdom" is another way of speaking of God, just as "spirit" is. Even though the reasons are complex, the thought is fundamental: seek God in simple piety, and God will come to you. Without simplicity a person is crooked, devious, deceitful (v. 5), and God is absent. God knows all (v. 6) and judges all evil. The text of verse 6 mentions three parts of the human make-up: inmost self (literally "kidneys," the seat of emotion and instinct), the heart (the seat of thought), and the tongue, which manifests one's life. The author employs a term from Greek philosophy, "all-embracing" (v. 7), to explain that God, by divine creative power, holds all the world in existence.

The text mentions again the act of divine justice (vv. 8-9) to uphold God's universal power: God who created has imposed divine order on reality. Any breach of that will be punished. Even one's words (v. 9) will reach the Lord. This may recall Mal 3:16, where a great heavenly record book is mentioned. Even God's ear (v. 10) finds a place: the Lord is jealous of the right order of creation.

The next three verses (vv. 11-14) advise against any evil utterances (v. 11), since each one must be accounted for. To lie is to violate God's order by freely giving witness to an alternate, ungodly way of life. This can "slay the soul," that is, result in life apart from God. The author does not teach that the soul is immortal—suffering eternal punishment or enjoying eternal bliss with God. The emphasis is more on a condition of temporal living, in which one lives unjustly, thus giving proof of internal death.

To "court death" (v. 12) is an expression taken from ancient initiation rites, implying entering into a relationship with anti-God forces. God's commitment to life is further emphasized by the surprising assertion that God did not create death (v. 13); its author is the devil (see 2:24). The Lord made creation perfect and filled it with life (v. 14). The domain of the netherworld (literally, "the palace of Hades") had no place on earth, apart from human choice of evil.

Verse 15 closes this initial exhortation with an expression called by some the essence of the book. As God is undying, so God's order for the universe is undying. To follow this order in personal living is to open oneself to being possessed by God.

1:16–2:24 The wicked speak. In this section, which both exemplifies the first section and contrasts with the just in 3:1-9, we have the words of the wicked (2:1-20), followed by the author's own reflections (vv. 21-24). The writer, of course, is not quoting a group of people but symbolizing their attitudes in speech. This was a common method of writing in ancient times. Modern writers would doubtless prefer to cite their sources exactly, in order to avoid the charge of biased writing.

The introductory verse (v. 16) states strongly the basis of human evil—individual choice. The "wicked" here might refer to Adam and Eve as those who dallied with the evil one, but more likely the passage is simply a generic assertion about human wickedness. The relationship with evil is direct, involving both deeds ("hands") and words; it deepens into friendship and even lust (implied in the Greek for "pined"), and then into long-lasting commitment (the covenant, recalling Isa 28:15). That the wicked deserve to be in the grip of evil is a result of choices, just as wisdom comes to those who seek God (1:2). This manifests the concept of proportion, a predominant feature of the Book of Wisdom.

The wicked speak of the shortness of life (vv. 1-5) in a way not unlike the words of Job (as in 7:1-4). If they are Israelites, the wicked are doubly wrong, since they also overlook the instances in Israel's history where the dead revive (as in the case of Elijah, 1 Kgs 17:17-24). Their approach to human conception is godless: "haphazard" rather than due to loving creation (v. 2). The author echoes here, although not systematically, teachings of contemporary philosophers on the origin and end of life and reason (vv. 2-3). The insubstantial end of life has a further terror, particularly so for Israelites: no memory remains (v. 4). The author did not set out to give his readers a scientific treatise, whether on life and death or on weather; yet his occasional comments on the activities of nature betray the thoughts of an educated observer ("mist pursued by the sun's rays," v. 4). The closing verse (v. 5) balances the opening (v. 1), in good Greek style: brief life, no escape from dying, no return from death.

The outcome of such reflections might lead to pessimism (as in Eccl 2:1-3) or even suicide. Instead, they lead here to wanton behavior (vv. 6-9). Such actions have a certain truth about them, since God's creation is wise and good (see 1:14), and the Old Testament does not advocate austerity or self-denial as a virtue. Pleasure, like all reality, must have its limits. This is something fools do not understand; only the wise know the proper order of creation (see Eccl 3:1-8). The "tokens of rejoicing" (v. 9) recall the heedless littering of modern times; here they are empty containers for wine and perfume, dead flowers, trampled meadows. The most horrifying part of this wanton behavior is the conviction that the wicked must live this way ("our portion . . . our lot"). The wise, by contrast, will see the falsehood of this assertion and will live according to God's plan.

The degeneracy of the wicked takes an evil turn when they wish to silence the voice of wisdom and justice (vv. 10-20). They set out both to oppose the wise (including the elderly, wise with experience) and to violate divine prescriptions of care for the poor and the widow (see Exod 22:21). To join the term "needy" with "wise" is also to subvert Old Testament promises of God's blessings on the just (or wise). For them, the norm is not God's law but their own bullying strength (v. 11).

The author's deft psychological touch is evident in verses 12-16. Here the style of life of the just, involving speaking out against evil, and even their own self-understanding prick their consciences. Like white corpuscles in the bloodstream rushing to attack a foreign body, the wicked fall on the just, whose ways differ so from theirs (v. 15). The expression "child of the Lord" (v. 13, as well as "God is his Father," v. 16, and "Son of God," v. 18) speaks of the close relationship of the just with the Lord, a theme of the Book of Wisdom.

The wicked then plan to test the just (vv. 17-20) to see whether, like Job (Job 1:6-12), the just would persevere in their conviction. It does not appear, however, that the wicked are open to conversion, so blind are they. There is a terrible irony in their words in verse 20: if God truly protects their victim, then they will be punished. The Hebrew term that may underlie "take care of" can also mean "punish."

The author comments on their words in verses 21-24. They erred, not out of stupidity, but because of a fundamental option taken long before (see 1:16). For them, God's order of the universe is inverted: good appears as evil, and evil as good. This is the ultimate foolishness. They have denied the traditional Old Testament affirmation that virtue will be rewarded (v. 22). Even more fundamentally, they did not perceive that humans are the image of God (Gen 1:27). As God is imperishable, so too in some way are God's human creatures. This would have been the lot of everyone had not death come into the world in the murder of Abel by Cain, at the instigation of the Serpent and due to resentment (see Gen 4:3-10). As is evident in many parts of the Book of Wisdom, the author does not clearly separate physical death from spiritual death. The two are functions of the same reality.

3:1–4:19 Counsels of God. This section comprises three parts: suffering (3:1-12), childlessness (3:13–4:6), and early death (4:7-19). Because of the fluidity of the author's language, however, it is difficult to mark these sections off precisely; thus, scholars differ as to their extent.

Typically, theme statements (vv. 1-3) open the discussion. The purpose of the entire section is to shed light on God's designs for the world. Both "souls of the just" and "hand of God" (v. 1) are poetic expressions: the just are in God's care. The "torment" refers more to the earthly sufferings they underwent previously at the hands of the wicked (2:19, for example). Christians customarily read this passage as an exaltation of heavenly bliss for the righteous. The author, however, is less clear than that.

Even though the godless thought the end of the just to be a punishment (vv. 2-3), this would reverse God's design of reward and punishment, and make virtuous living absurd. The peace of the just recalls Isa 57:1-2; this peace is the absence of torment. Nonetheless, the concept of life with God, begun through the gift of wisdom, must have led pious Jews to reflect on the ancient expression "forever," such as "his mercy endures forever" (Ps 118:1). Coupled with this reflection was consideration of the Greek expression "immortality," a term appearing here for the first time in the Bible (v. 4). The just died in the hope of continuing life, marking them off from the foolish, who expected nothing (2:5).

Chastisement of the just (v. 5) is not denied; its briefness is emphasized, a theme that reappears later to explain the punishment of Israel (see 11:9 and 12:2). Suffering, therefore, is purifying, removing what little dross remains. The finished products then are in a condition that makes them ready to be assimilated in some way to God. This same idea continues in verse 6: even gold can be purified, but purification demands a furnace. Sacrificial offerings, too, are good in themselves but acquire a special significance when dedicated and consumed in some way, mainly through fire.

The image of fire continues in the following verse (v. 7). The exact time or occasion of this visitation remains unspecified here. Christians traditionally refer to it as the final judgment, though the concepts in the Book of Wisdom were not so well developed. "Sparks through stubble" would be a common experience for farmers, who burned off the grain stubble yearly, and would be particularly captivating at night. The exact import is unclear, although the figure appears elsewhere (as in Obad 18). The just, though fire-tried, stand out from the stubble of the wicked, dark and lifeless.

Changing the figure, the author advances his thought in verses 8-9. The poetic basis for the theme of judging nations comes from the ancient mythology of Canaan: the holy ones (or gods) had their own peoples, whom they ruled under the headship of a supreme deity. The author adopts this perspective, rewarding the just with life with God on the model of the "holy ones" of myth. They live with God (v. 9a). This assertion is buttressed by a psalm-like couplet, more Hebrew than Greek in style (v. 9b). (This same passage appears in some versions at 4:15; the New American Bible omits 4:15 entirely.)

The fate of the wicked forms the theme of verses 10-12. The thoughts of the wicked have appeared previously (see 1:9 and 2:21). Here the punishment is proportionate, that is, as the wicked forsook God, so God will now forsake them. The text joins neglect of justice with forsaking God. The two are actually parts of the same reality: God is the author of justice, and to forsake the one is to forsake the other. The same remarks can be made concerning abandonment of wisdom and instruction (v. 11a). Both the works of the wicked (v. 11b) and their families (v. 12) are accursed. The tradition of the curse of futility is imposed on the works and the family: neither will turn out well. Common experience shows this often to be the case, especially as a parent's evil involves the children in the ruin to come.

The lesson on childlessness (3:13–4:6) connects easily with the foregoing verses. Just as suffering can appear otherwise than purification for the just, so lack of children can be a blessing. Here the author makes an advance on traditional biblical concepts (see Gen 30:23, for example). The woman of the verse could be either unmarried or married. The fruitfulness required of creation at its beginning (Gen 1:28) is spiritual rather than physical. At the great judgment (see v. 7) this woman's true glory will be apparent.

The author builds on Isa 56:3-5 in his discussion of the eunuch who has remained undefiled, like the woman of verse 13. His reward will be inclusion in Israel (against the decision of Deut 23:2), more likely a reference to a heavenly temple than the earthly one in Jerusalem. Like the landless Levite, the eunuch's reward is God. The author concludes with a proverbial expression (v. 15), advancing a motive for the above: great struggles bear great fruit because their root (wisdom) never fails.

By contrast, children of adulterers (vv. 16-19) are doomed to childlessness. The teaching here is not that childless couples must either be holy or the offspring of adultery; rather, the focus is the contrast between the two kinds of childlessness. Even if the children of adulterers survive into old age, God's curse will follow them (see vv. 11-12). The great judgment will be a day of sorrow, since punishment follows evil (v. 19). Due proportion in punishment is a mark of God's wise creation.

The text concludes, in 4:1-6, with contrasts between the virtuous and the wicked. The opening statement, beginning "Better," seems like the first half of a typical proverbial statement, such as the following: Better is childlessness with virtue, than many children amid sin. "Virtue" is a Greek philosophical term, familiar to the original audience of the Book of Wisdom but employed by the author as a synonym for justice or even wisdom. The author then asserts that the memory or recollection of virtue lasts forever (v. 2), especially since God takes it into account. To be "crowned in triumph" recalls the victory processions of Greek athletic and military celebrations.

The author turns to comparisons between the wicked and trees. This ancient figure has been used of both the virtuous (as in Psalm 1) and the wicked (Ps 37:35-36). In the latter case the success of the wicked is only apparent and lasts only for a time. The issue is significant, since the wicked apparently prosper, contrary to repeated biblical promises. Here the wicked may have numerous children (v. 3), and their branches may flourish (v. 4), but this is only temporary: "for a time" (v. 4) and "untimely" (v. 5). The author uses the same ideas in reference to the apparent punishment of the just—it is temporary (see 3:5). The curse of futility also appears: even though fruit exists, it is useless (v. 5). The conclusion (v. 6) repeats past assertions (3:12, 16), which, to modern minds, seem unjustified. Beyond any theological concepts, the author's experience shows that in ill-run families the children will turn out badly.

The third of the teachings in the section 3:1–4:19 treats of untimely death, a new idea in the Old Testament (4:7-19). "The good die young" is contrary to the biblical teaching that length of days is a sign of divine favor. A more precise examination of events, apart from this theological perspective, shows that at least in some cases the good do die young. A wisdom teacher should explain this apparent contradiction. Isa 57:1-2 seems to offer some background here. The author of the Book of Wisdom chooses quality of life over quantity of years (v. 8) and draws out the implication that grey hairs do not necessarily signify virtue (see Prov 20:29). Traditional wisdom teaches that things aren't always what they seem.

Another motive is given in verses 10-12: the good person was taken away by God from a nearly overpowering world of sin. The language of verse 12 is unusual; the author, in fact, coined a new word, translated as "whirl of desire," not an easy concept to tie down, one that speaks more to the heart than to the mind. The author does not specify where the just are being taken; the supposition is that they shall be with the Lord (as in 3:6).

A question also left unanswered throughout the Book of Wisdom is whether God loves only those who have become perfect or loves all creatures indiscriminately. Is there any love for those who turn from God? Is a change of heart possible for sinners? In 4:13-14a, the answer appears to be that God loves the just once perfected, either quickly, as here, or after a long life.

The ideas of the wicked conclude this section (vv. 14b-19; v. 15 is omitted). Being wicked, they are by definition foolish, and the author underscores their ignorance (vv. 14b, 17). An implication is that the wise can ponder the realities of life and death, free of earlier theological formulations. The condemnation of the just (v. 16) is a moral condemnation or a sting to conscience rather than an act of heavenly judgment. In verse 17 the author again hints at the afterlife without giving exact details: "what the Lord intended . . . made him secure."

A curse of reversal of fortune appears in verse 18, building upon Ps 2:4 and 37:13, in which the laughter is more than delight or surprise. It is an act involving final punishment. The last verse (v. 19) contains recollections of a large number of biblical passages, listed in the New American Bible footnotes. This verse sounds almost homiletic in the vigor of its denunciation by means of well-known citations. The author's intent, therefore, is not to teach when or how this punishment will take place (hell?) but simply to bring the weight of tradition to bear on the fate of the wicked. To be a "mockery among the dead" recalls an underworld existence in which the once proud dead are mocked for their pretensions (see Isa 14:9-11 for a vivid example).

4:20–5:23 The final judgment. The fourth major section of Part One (1:1–6:21) concentrates on the outcomes of both evil and just living, the result of the quest for wisdom. As previously, we have the speech of the wicked (5:3b-13), followed by a description of the just at the time of judgment (5:15-23).

The author has spoken of the great judgment before (see 3:7, 13, for example). The picture in 4:20 has more of the idea of the great account book filled with the record of misdeeds, truly a book worthy of heaven. When and where this takes place is, as before, not specified. The Old Testament concept of retribution is also evident—one's sins carry their own punishment.

The just one (that is, the wise one), said to judge nations (3:8), here is the accuser in the great courtroom (v. 1). God apparently is the judge, although it may also appear that misdeeds return to convict their author, apart from God's direct intervention. The author's psychological interests are apparent in verses 2-3; the shaking and groaning of the wicked remind the reader of Saul's encounter with the shade of Samuel (1 Sam 28:20-21). Part of their anguish comes from an act of perverted wisdom: they finally had their eyes opened to the reality of their lives. The expression "unlooked-for" (v. 2) is typical of wisdom writing, especially showing divine entry into one's life.

The speech of the wicked, similar to the reflections in 2:1-20, brings the reader into the heart of foolishness. Their thoughts were in error (v. 3), their acts were perverted (v. 6), they ignored the Lord (v. 7). The reflections here parallel those of 2:10-20, but now the wicked come to the reward they deserve. The traditional reversals of fortune occur in a somewhat transposed format: the just was accounted foolish by the wicked, but the wicked are the fools in fact. "Sons of God" (v. 5) is an ancient expression for semi-divine beings, even the gods of the heathens, and came to Israel from the Canaanites. The phrase disappeared in earlier Old Testament writing but reappeared, shorn of its mythological overtones, in later Jewish life. The translation "saints" masks the original concept of "holy ones," another expression for "sons of God" in ancient times. Also, this traditional view allowed Israel to grow in its understanding of life after death as life with God, such as the "holy ones" enjoyed.

The wicked then confront their own condition in a great confession of their sins (vv. 6-7). Repentance is no longer possible, mainly because the tenor of their entire life was anti-God. The "light of justice" seems better rendered as "the light which is justice," or, "the light offered by justice." Heretofore the wicked spent themselves in the pursuit of temporary pleasure (2:6-9); now with eyes opened they call their lives "mischief" and "ruin" (v. 7). Verse 8, a cry of remorse on their lips, recalls "What shall it profit . . ." of the Gospels (Matt 16:26).

In the next few verses (vv. 9-12) the writer's poetic imagination outstrips the importance of the thought. He may, in fact, be imitating some of the pompous but sterile rhetoric of the wicked. Comparisons are made with shadows (v. 9), ships (v. 10), birds (v. 11), and arrows (v. 12). The vanity of misspent lives leaves no memory—a curse in Israel's thinking. The observations on ships, etc., probably came from school questions in the author's day: Why can we find no trace of a ship? How do birds fly, and why do their traces disappear, unlike those of other animals? How, too, does an arrow find its way? The wise, of course, know the answers. These are the questions of adult fools. The truth of their condition appears again in verse 13.

The author's own comments parallel the earlier descriptions: the wicked have hopes, but they are as insubstantial as down, foam, smoke, and the recollection of a one-day guest (v. 14).

The rewards for the just conclude the passage (vv. 15-23). The first verse (v. 15) is complex, raising many questions, such as: What does it mean to live forever? Is it to live on this earth or to live apart from the body, associated with the Lord in some way? In succeeding verses the author adopts expressions from Israel's earlier writings to help explain the reward coming to the just (see Isa 62:3; Ps 17:8; and 57:2).

As before, the poetry of verses 17-20 overpowers the simple issues. To describe a hero and military armor, both in real and in poetic terms, is not an unknown biblical method (see Isa 59:16-18 and Eph 6:11-17). This idea has its roots in pre-biblical literature, where ancient heroes wear magical armor to overcome the powers of evil. As with other ancient figures, this one reappeared in the last days of Israel's writing. God's sword, too (v. 20), appears in Isa 49:2 and Ezek 21:8-10.

The heavens were said to fight for Barak and Deborah in Judg 5:20, one of the most ancient and lively pieces of Hebrew poetry. So too here, in verses 21-23a, the author's exuberance strikes the modern reader. God's bow was placed in the clouds (Gen 9:13), but God continued to use it to hurl lightning arrows (v. 21). The hailstones recall the great plague in Exod 9:23-25 and Joshua's victory aided by hail in Josh 10:11. "Sea" and "rivers" (or "streams") are regarded as the same in ancient Hebrew poetry (as in Ps 80:12). All these elements pile up here to give a sense of solemn divine judgment: the Creator alone will punish evildoers. The Hebrew hearer or reader of these words would experience an enhanced sense of God's purpose.

Verse 23b concludes the passage and seems to mean that evil acts will destroy creation as we know it. God will restore it in some way for the just.

6:1-21 Seek wisdom. The first major section of the Book of Wisdom concludes with another exhortation, in many ways closely related to chapter 1. The introduction (vv. 1-4) repeats the address to the powerful on earth (see 1:1). What they are to hear and to understand is explained in verses 3-4 and again in verse 9: their works are subject to God's scrutiny, so they should be performed wisely/justly.

As God gave authority to David and his line of kings in the past, so the author asserts that God is the source of every king's authority. This view repeats the emphasis of Yahweh as Lord of history so prominent in Deutero-Isaiah and later books (see, for example, Isa 44:24–45:25 in reference to God's power over Cyrus of Persia). The author of the Book of Wisdom adopts this theme to apply to those latter-day Israelites enticed by a complete freedom of thought and expression to hold themselves arrogantly independent of God. To "walk according to the will of God" (v. 4) recalls many expressions in Deuteronomy (see 5:33; 8:6).

Divine punishment is described in verses 5-8. The reason for punishment is, as always, sin. Its quality varies according to the responsibilities each one exercises: the lowly have problems enough—hence God's special care for them (another echo of Deuteronomy's call to care for the "alien, the orphan, the widow"—16:11; 24:19). The implication also exists that the mighty are in some way the cause of the misery of the lowly. A further theme (v. 7b) is God's universal providence ("provides for all alike"), recalling Jesus' teaching about the rain (Matt 5:45).

The writer states his purpose again in verses 9-11. Note the connection between wisdom and justice (v. 9): to learn wisdom is to learn how to live justly, or without sin. In the Book of Sirach, the author connects wisdom with the content of the law of the Bible. A similar connection appears here in verse 10. The "ready response" refers to the courtroom scene at the great judgment. The writer concludes with two exhortations, "desire" and "long for." These seem to have little real effect, since simple desire will not make one wise. Rather, desire or longing put into practice through study, observation, and prayer will lead to the gift of God.

As if to back up the exhortation, the author turns to a laudatory description of wisdom (vv. 12-21), thus concluding the entire first section of the Book of Wisdom. Wisdom has several attributes that make the pursuit of her both enjoyable and easy. In the first place, she is easy to see (v. 12). The implication is that, being so, the foolish/wicked should have chosen her. Instead, they willingly looked away and so are blameworthy. Secondly, wisdom will be there when one begins to seek her (vv. 13-14). The implication here too is that the wicked would have had the same opportunity but chose to ignore wisdom sitting at the gate. Verse 15 adds an explanatory comment: prudent planning will include a search for wisdom.

Wisdom's willingness to come to those who seek her is expressed again in verses 16-17a. The picture of wisdom walking the streets on the lookout for others reflects Prov 8. The worthiness of candidates for wisdom is somewhat unclear, both here and elsewhere in the book, in terms of time sequence. Who makes the first approach? Is one worthy even before God bestows wisdom, or does the bestowal of wisdom make one worthy? The same questions bedevil Christian theological reflection on the meaning of grace and election. A further answer appears in the next few verses.

Scholars point to verses 17-20 as a type of Greek logical thinking (the syllogism called "sorites") in which one part of a preceding statement is picked up in the next statement, all of which lead up to a climactic conclusion. The terms here are "discipline," "desire," "love," "keep laws," "incorruptibility." The conclusion is that the desire for wisdom leads, through the steps outlined, to closeness to God. This is understood (v. 20) as possession of a kingdom. As is clear from previous chapters, this kingdom is a symbol for the state of just or wise living, leading ultimately to a reward of life with God.

The final sentence (v. 21) moves from earthly power (itself a symbol of intellectual power and freedom) to the truest power, lasting "forever." This last term, unfortunately, is obscure. It may reflect the blessing called down on kings, "May my lord, King David, live forever" (1 Kgs 1:31). But it may refer at the same time to life forever with God, alluded to in the first part of the Book of Wisdom.

Praise of Wisdom by Solomon (6:22–11:1)

This second part of the Book of Wisdom is devoted entirely to words in praise of wisdom. After describing wisdom and explaining its workings in relation to the just and the unjust, the writer furthers his plan by praising wisdom in the person of Solomon. Part Two is therefore divided into several smaller sections: introduction (6:22-25); Solomon, only a mortal (7:1-6); Solomon's prayer and wisdom came after prayer (7:7-12); prayer for help to speak of wisdom (7:13-22a); nature and qualities of wisdom (7:22b–8:1); Solomon sought wisdom (8:2-8); Solomon sought a counselor (8:9-16); wisdom, a gift of God (8:17-21); Solomon's prayer (9:1-18); activities of wisdom in history (10:1–11:1). Several scholars see the material from 7:1 to 8:21 as seven sections arranged around a central passage on wisdom (7:22b–8:1).

6:22-25 Introduction. Similar in style to the self-revelation of Ben Sira, this passage repeats the author's initial exhortation. The difference from the Book of Sirach is that the figure of Solomon is a literary fiction, while Ben Sira himself speaks as the author. The character of wisdom is laid out in 7:22b–8:1. The expression "consuming jealousy" personifies jealousy as consuming either "Solomon" or, as some translations have it, being consumed itself. Jealousy cannot be associated with wisdom, since the wisdom teacher must not claim selfish possession of wisdom. It must be shared, or it ceases to be wisdom (v. 23). In the next verse (v. 24), the author presents a proverb and then comments on it (v. 25), using it as an exhortation self-evident to the wise.

7:1-6 "Solomon" is only a mortal. This first section opens with a theme statement (v. 1). All kings, despite their pretensions or the exalted rhetoric used of them by others, are human in origin. Even the great David, on whom the promises of God rested (see 2 Sam 7:8-16), never claimed supernatural origins. The author also follows his normal practice of not naming his heroes: "first man" instead of Adam. These normal origins are spelled out in verse 2. The ten-month pregnancy has been explained in various ways; it seems simply to be a commonplace expression. His birth was also normal (v. 3). To "fall upon the earth" may signify a method of birth but may just as easily be a poetic expression. The earth is "kindred" in the sense that all humans share the same experience. The section concludes by stating that every king (that is, everyone) shares humanity, with both birth and death. The author repeats the word "same" from verse 1, providing a traditional bracket around the passage through repetition of a key term.

7:7-12 Wisdom and riches came after prayer. The meaning of "therefore" (v. 7) is that "Solomon," having no special advantage of birth, chose to turn to God in prayer. The text of the prayer is 9:1-18, which itself is modeled on 1 Kgs 3:6-7 (and 2 Chr 1:8-10). In answer to his prayer, he received "prudence" (another term for wisdom). The sequence of events whereby one is led even to ask for wisdom does not find an exact treatment in this poetic text (as in 6:17-20). Repeating 6:21, "Solomon" rates wisdom (in vv. 8-9). The comparisons of gold/silver with sand/mire (or clay) have a typical Hebrew proverb form. Part of the rewards coming to the real-life Solomon were all the elements he compared with wisdom (v. 11): gold and silver (see 1 Kgs 10:14-17, 27, and other descriptions of the building of the temple, 1 Kgs 6:20-32); health, beauty, and light (his long reign of forty years, 1 Kgs 11:42). Note, too, that the expressions "came to me" and "riches" in verse 11 repeat the same words in verses 7 and 8, bracketing the passage. The king did not realize, as he abandoned earthly desires, that wisdom was also the cause of earthly delights (v. 12). It is clear here that "wisdom" is another expression for "God."

7:13-22a A prayer to speak of wisdom. If this entire second part of the Book of Wisdom can be said to have any inherent suspense, it is surely heightened by another interruption before "Solomon" tells his readers the nature of wisdom. The two opening verses (vv. 13-14) praise wisdom again. Verse 14 also demonstrates a kind of logical progression after the manner of 6:17-20; also here wisdom is seen as something leading to, but not identified with, God.

"Solomon's" first prayer is reported, not quoted, in verses 15-20. The distinction between wisdom and God appears in verse 15b and continues in verses 17-20. God is the source of all the king's knowledge, not exactly wisdom itself. The Greek text is emphatic on this point. The knowledge of "Solomon" begins with prudence and handicrafts (called "wisdom" in Hebrew, as in the case of Hiram, the famous bronze worker in 1 Kgs 7:14, where it is translated "skill"). The other intellectual gifts that "Solomon" enjoys correspond to interests of Hellenistic science. Hebrew thought was enriched by Greek inquiry into elements (v. 17), astronomy (vv. 18-19), zoology and pharmacology (v. 20). The author's interests in human behavior are reflected in several places in the Book of Wisdom, but "thoughts of men" seems out of place between winds and plants.

The conclusion (v. 21) means to refer to all things, encompassed between "hidden" and "plain" (recall "seen" and "unseen" in the Christian Creed). The term "hidden," in addition, is a repeat from verse 13 ("hide away"). Lastly, in verse 22a the author identifies God, the Creator of all, with wisdom.

7:22b–8:1 Nature and qualities of wisdom. This central passage, around which the sections from 7:1 to 8:21 are built, finally lays out the qualities of wisdom. The author follows Prov 1–9 in personifying wisdom apart from God (see Prov 8:22-31, where wisdom attends creation; also Sir 24). As separate, wisdom even has a spirit (v. 22b).

The qualities are not meant to convey exact descriptions in which each word refers to a distinct reality. Like individual colors in a painting, the descriptions give a final picture of wisdom as holy, all-present, and all-knowing (note that there are twenty-one of these attributes, three times the sacred number seven). Wisdom's separation from God (vv. 25-26) has challenged scholars to find background for the terms "aura," "effusion," "refulgence," "mirror." The result is a picture showing wisdom as identical with God in all but the most subtle senses, somehow distinct, somehow the same. The issue of time sequence appears again in verse 27: Are souls holy before wisdom comes or because wisdom comes? "Souls" refers to the entire human person. "Friends of God" may be a technical term from Greek life. Comparisons in verses 29-30 recall verses 9-10, and they end with a moral comparison: night and wickedness with light and wisdom.

The final verse (8:1) forms a fitting conclusion. Wisdom appears as the order which the wise God put into creation and by which it continues its orderly existence. (Note the many repetitions of the word "all," the universe-wide perspective of Greek philosophy embraced by the writer.)

8:2-8 Solomon sought wisdom. This small section parallels 7:13-22a as a report of the "king's" wishes in prayer. It opens with an introductory theme that recalls the marriage imagery of Hosea and the Song of Solomon. The image emphasizes closeness with wisdom, and is repeated in verse 3: "companionship," a term used of marriage in Greek writing. Wisdom's distinction from God is quite clear in verses 2-4.

In verses 5-8 the author lists motives to acquire wisdom: riches, prudence, justice, learning; these recall the prudence and riches of 7:7-12. The four virtues (v. 7) are the traditional "cardinal virtues," or the main strengths of the human character. These four qualities appear individually elsewhere in the Old Testament, but their mutual association comes from Greek thinking. Wisdom as the source of learning (v. 8) corresponds closely with the knowledge of 7:13-22a. The connection with the historical Solomon is evident in 1 Kgs 5:9-14.

8:9-16 Solomon sought a counselor. These verses parallel 8:7-12 in the "king's" prayer for power. Note the bracketing words "live/living with" in verses 9 and 16. The introductory verse (v. 9) connects with the marriage motif of the previous section. The results (vv. 10-15) recall the glories of Solomon in Israel's past: glory, judgment, respect, awesome power, and even immortality. In this latter case, his immortality parallels everlasting memory (v. 13) rather than life with God on the model of the "sons of God" (see 5:5). The conclusion (v. 16) asserts the absence of pain. Unfortunately this did not match the career of the Solomon of history (see 1 Kgs 11:4-13).

8:17-21 Wisdom a gift from God. This last section matches 7:1-6 in reflecting on "Solomon's" origins and repeats the same advantages enumerated just above: immortality, pleasure, riches, prudence, renown (vv. 17-18). The terms for relationship with wisdom are also varied, but convey the same closeness: kinship, friendship, etc.

Verses 19-20 have occasioned much scholarly debate. It may appear that the author teaches that souls (or personalities) exist before being implanted in bodies. The point is, rather, that the author is speaking poetically, not philosophically. Likewise, "unsullied" does not refer to the absence of original sin but to "Solomon's" noble character and natural endowments.

The concluding verse (v. 21) adds another thought to the issue of time sequence: wisdom comes from God, who bestows it as a response to prayer. Even to pray is a mark of incipient wisdom, called "prudence" here.

9:1-18 Solomon's prayer. The prayer divides into three sections. The first two (vv. 1-6, 7-12) have the same general structure; the third (vv. 13-18) has general reflections.

The first part of the prayer opens, like the prayers of the Book of Sirach, with an address to God, followed by attributes of God (vv. 2-3) as Creator. This creation culminates, in the author's mind, in divine wisdom bestowed on humans, particularly on kings for the sake of a just rule. This hierarchical arrangement, with the king closest to God, is more characteristic of the theology of Judah than of Israel in pre-exilic times. The role of prophet or priest is ambiguous in this design.

In the petition that follows (v. 4), wisdom has a position reminiscent of Prov 8 and Sir 24, but also recalls similar statements in current thinking outside of Israel. It is not clear that withholding wisdom will cause "Solomon's" rejection from among God's children. This petition may refer to the "king's" fear of eventual rejection from the "sons of God," those who live with God (see 5:5).

Motives conclude the first part (vv. 5-6). The reflection on weakness comes from the text of Solomon's prayer in 1 Kgs 3:7. To be perfect (v. 6) doubtless refers to having many natural endowments. This expression may also suggest that condition of the human being which is called "worthiness" elsewhere (see 6:16).

The second part of the prayer (vv. 7-12) has a similar structure: address and attributes (vv. 7-9), petition (v. 10), motives (vv. 11-12). The attributes match the occasions of King Solomon's own life. "King" and "magistrate" are parallel terms, with no difference in meaning here. Likewise "temple" and "altar" (v. 8) refer to the same construction. That the earthly temple is a copy follows from reading 1 Chr 28:11-19. This idea in itself may come from earlier pre-Israelite thinking: when the world was created out of chaos, the victor in the battle between order and chaos built a heavenly temple. All earthly temples were in some way modeled on the heavenly one and represented heavenly order on earth. The idea worked forward in time as well: Christians often refer to the heavenly liturgy, to which we join our voices on earth. Personified wisdom also appears: she is said to be with God (v. 9), present at creation (see v. 4 above). As wisdom was present, she must have a sense of God's laws.

The petition (v. 10) asks that wisdom now be with "Solomon" as she was with God, a very bold statement. Just how wisdom could be God's attendant, the king's attendant, and the attendant of all who seek her is left unanswered here. An answer is found in the qualities listed in 7:22-23: subtle, pervading all spirits. The motives (vv. 11-12) differ from those in the first part (in vv. 5-6): here "Solomon" is closer to his goal and, relying on wisdom's power and glory, will be a wise ruler, and his acts will be deserving of God's blessing (v. 12).

The final section is a set of reflections (vv. 13-18). The answer to the questions in verse 13 is "No one." These questions do not look for information; they are intended to form part of an act of praise (see Jer 9:11 for one among many examples). The author then turns to other motives, one built on the other: the plans of mortals are unsure (v. 14), since they are earthly (v. 15), and even earthly problems are difficult (v. 16). Scholars have avidly discussed whether the author of the Book of Wisdom holds to a duality: the earthly and corruptible body versus the spiritual soul. Such dualism would not be consistent with Old Testament thought, which emphasizes the unity of the human person; yet everyone perceives differences between the lofty thoughts of mind and heart, and bodily passions. The poetry of the verse does not set out to solve this complex theological issue.

Questions appear in verse 17, again expecting the answer "No one" (recalling Isa 40:13). The "holy spirit" is another way of saying "wisdom," but undoubtedly the expression led Christians to reflect on the identity of the Spirit apart from the Father and from Jesus.

When God sent wisdom in times past, Israel's ancestors were saved (v. 18). This verse links "Solomon's" prayer with the chapter to follow, as well as with Part Three of the Book of Wisdom: 11:2–19:22. It is absolutely necessary, in the author's mind, for wisdom to be on earth in order for human beings to live correctly.

10:1–11:1 Wisdom's activities in history. "She" is mentioned numerous times in the emphatic first place in sentences, an indication of the author's wish to concentrate on wisdom. Because of this, the author does not mention by name the heroes of Israel's past, familiar enough to his readers and giving pleasure through recognition.

The seven characters are sometimes listed with their adversaries. First is Adam (vv. 1-2) with Cain (v. 3). It is hard to see what wisdom protected Adam from in the Garden; perhaps the reference is to naming the animals (Gen 2:18-20), an action demanding great wisdom.

Noah, in the author's view, was only the means by which creation was saved through wisdom (v. 4). To credit the Flood to the sin of Cain exaggerated his role, but at least it shows historical connections between the first sin and the depravity of Noah's time. "Frailest wood" is poetic and belies the huge size of the ark (Gen 6:15).

Abraham's connection with wisdom is unclear: which came first—Abraham's goodness or wisdom? No matter, wisdom triumphed even over a father's love (v. 5).

Lot (vv. 6-7) was preserved in the nick of time. The implication is that the wicked were being destroyed because of their sin (as Genesis taught, 19:13). The remnants of the disaster are evident even in the twentieth century: burning bitumen, having floated to the surface of the Dead Sea, and the "Sodom apple," impossible to eat despite its outward appearance. It was not the author's purpose to teach that the soul of Lot's wife was entombed in a pillar of salt; his poetic imagination handled the story loosely (Gen 19:26). General reflections on the end of Sodom and Gomorrah follow (vv. 8-9). Note the reverse time sequence: leave wisdom, then lose knowledge of the right way, and finally become a mockery to all (v. 8). Lot's wisdom is seen probably in his choice of Zoar for his escape (Gen 19:20-22).

Jacob, particularly through his dream of the heavenly stairway at Bethel (Gen 28:12-15), was given the resources to make a new life in Egypt (vv. 10-12). The "kingdom of God" occurs here for the first time in the Old Testament and must refer to God's heavenly dwelling shown to Jacob. Verse 11 recalls Gen 29:1–31:21, the story of Laban. The ambush (v. 12) refers to the struggle at the Jabbok (Gen 32:23-33). The prize for this struggle was long life and a numerous family.

Joseph (vv. 13-15) has an extensive account in Genesis (chs. 38–50), but is here reduced to three verses, intended as a figure on which to meditate. Wisdom in the dungeon (v. 14) revealed the meaning of dreams (Gen 40). Joseph rose to prominence just as he had previously dreamed (Gen 37:5-11), thereby reversing his brother's mockery and cruel treatment.

The designation of Israel as "holy people, blameless race" neglects other data present in the text of Exodus and Numbers: the worship of the golden calf (Exod 32:1-6) and the constant murmuring of Israel (Num 14:2). The theological point of salvation at the Red Sea overshadows other considerations.

Moses (10:16–11:1) receives the lengthiest treatment; the account of the Exodus leads into Part Three of the Book of Wisdom. Wisdom came to Moses (his "soul," following Greek thought; not his heart, as in the Hebrew manner), and the future of Israel was secured (v. 16). The "kings" may refer generically to rulers in Egypt or to the other kings whose lands Israel entered (see Ps 135:9-11). The people, again called holy, passed through the sea ("a wondrous road") and continued through wisdom's guidance. The author has, of course, taken liberties in associating wisdom with the cloud ("shelter") and the pillar of fire. "Red Sea" and "deep waters" are synonyms (v. 18). The picture of what happened to the Egyptian pursuers is unclear in historical texts. Here the homiletic flavor has them sinking to the depths and then floating to the surface (v. 19). In Exod 12:36 Israel despoiled the Egyptians before their departure. Here the Israelites despoil the corpses. The author's intent is not to add a second despoiling but to show the reversal, since formerly the wicked Egyptians despoiled Israel (mainly of children, Exod 1:8-22).

The song of Israel is Exod 15:1-18 (v. 20), in which the formerly speechless (possibly Moses, Exod 4:10-17) and even infants took part (see Ps 8:2, although the psalm does not refer to the Exodus event).

The concluding verse (11:1) could belong just as easily to the opening of the next section. To style Moses a prophet recalls one strand of tradition, coming mainly from the north of Israel, emphasizing divine guidance through prophets rather than through the Davidic kingly family (see Deut 18:15 and Hos 12:14, both northern products). By the time of the Book of Wisdom, this distinction had faded.

The Providence of God in the Exodus (11:2–19:22)

Part Three of the Book of Wisdom can be divided as follows: introduction (11:2-5); first example: water (11:6-14); second example: animals (11:15-16); digression on God's mercy (11:17–12:22); second example again (12:23-27); digression on false worship (13:1–15:17); second example concluded (15:18–16:15); third example: manna (16:16-29); fourth example: darkness and light (17:1–18:4); fifth example: first-born (18:5–19:21); conclusion (19:22). The general purpose of this third part is to demonstrate, by a series of contrasts, how wisdom preserved the people of Israel in the Exodus. The tone is homiletical, and the author takes liberties in explaining the text of the Book of Exodus.

11:2-5 Introduction. The passage reflects on certain aspects of the Exodus without following the historical sequence. The reader finds Israel in the desert after crossing the Sea (see Exod 17:2-6). These few verses (vv. 2-4) recall Ps 107:4-6, although the psalm does not refer directly to the Exodus. "Sheer rock" and "hard stone" are parallel expressions in Hebrew poetic style. Verse 5 sets the theme for this entire part of the Book of Wisdom: Israel benefited by the very things used to punish its foes. This is a new idea in biblical writing, one that borrows from the ancient concept of reversal of fortune occurring often, even in this book. In addition, these realities show the wise teacher at work, looking deeply into events to see hidden order. What is uncovered is a grand design, worthy of the Creator, who has so ordered creation to benefit the people.

11:6-14 First example: water. The first three verses (vv. 6-8) form one sentence both in the original Greek and in English, something virtually impossible in Hebrew. The intricate design of these verses makes the message, and indeed the entire book, more difficult to perceive. The teaching is that God punished Egypt with impure water (Exod 7:17-24) but blessed Israel with pure water (Exod 17:5-7). The author likewise has compressed the events in time, since "instead of a spring" seems to refer to the wells that the Egyptians had to dig laboriously (Exod 7:24); simultaneously, Israel received water without labor. The idea in verse 7, "as a rebuke," does not appear in Exodus and is the author's own homiletic conclusion.

Israel's punishment (thirst in the desert, Exod 17:1-2), was only temporary, and for a purpose (vv. 9-14a). God's punishment is father-like for Israel, but king-like for Egypt (v. 10). (The brief punishment appeared first in 3:5 and is a continuing theme in the Book of Wisdom.) For Israel the punishment was an education, as they were to learn from their sufferings, the lesson being that their punishment was mild in comparison with Egypt's. The question why Israel, God's chosen people, should be punished at all does not form part of the author's commentary, since he was discussing just the existing texts of Exodus.

Psychological observations appear again in verses 12-13. Scholars differ on the meaning of "twofold grief"; it may refer to the Egyptians' own torments (thirst) and the blessings given to their enemies (water to Israel). That Egypt "recognized the Lord" (v. 13) refers to their understanding that God was with Israel (probably Exod 12:31). Among other passages, Num 14:13 shows some conviction that Egypt knew of the events concerning Israel in the desert. In any event, such a conclusion on the author's part is not foreign to his method of writing.

The writer adds a final comment (v. 14) to add a motive for punishment. Moses, once rejected, now is the object of wonder—again, apparently, by the Egyptians. The reversal of fortune—a blessing for Israel, a curse for Egypt—occurs once more. Moses, the instrument of Egypt's thirst, is the instrument of Israel's relief. The thought is obviously densely packed in a few words.

11:15-16 Second example: animals. These two verses begin a long sequence, which is interrupted twice. The message is clearly in verse 16. The Egyptians were senseless or irrational, since they worshiped animals, themselves dumb or irrational. The harmony seen in their punishment is a call for the wise to see in it the hand of the Creator.

11:17–12:22 Digression on God's mercy. This passage parallels another digression (13:1–15:17) and opens with further remarks on God as Creator (vv. 17-22). The phrase "formless matter" (v. 17) recalls Gen 1:2 ("formless wasteland"), but does not mean to say that any matter pre-dated creation. As Creator, God could have sent bears or lions on the Egyptians, as had happened to others (see 2 Kgs 17:26 for one example). God's power could have formed completely new animals (v. 18), which, like the classical head of Medusa, would have frightened them to death (v. 19). God might have tracked them down for instant punishment (v. 20a). Instead the Creator acted wisely, proceeding in order: "measure, number, weight" (a phrase possibly known among the educated, coming from the philosopher Plato). The motive (v. 21) ends with the type of question typical of words of praise. The comparisons in verse 22 recall Isa 40:15: all is nothing in God's sight, save his chosen people.

Yet, God's mercy extends to all, despite their low condition (11:23–12:1). Here the author again expresses his convictions on divine love and punishment: God's creatures are good. Only their choice of sin keeps them from God, who does not punish immediately (v. 23). This also explains the apparent success of the wicked (as in 4:4-5). Nowhere else in the Old Testament is such complete divine love explained with such vigor, and opens up continuing possibilities for reflection on the meaning of Jesus for Christians.

The final motive (12:1) sounds strange to modern readers. Is the author expressing the view that a divine spark exists in all creation, or at least in all humans? If so, this is not a biblical teaching. Yet, from a Hebrew perspective the spirit of God is creative (Ps 104:30), and God's creatures live by this spirit (Gen 2:7, "breath of life").

Verses 2-11 expose God's mercy in a set of examples, while concentrating on the gradual nature of punishment for sin. This theme occurs in verse 2; the purpose is repentance, not vengeance. Evidently sinners are reminded by the type of punishment they receive, which in some way is in harmony with their sin.

Even the ancient Canaanites (vv. 3-8), proverbially wicked, suffered punishment little by little. The author here seems to be following popular legend more than biblical tradition; the charge of cannibalism is not borne out in the historical books (but see Ezek 16:20). The expression "holy land," so popular now, makes its first appearance in Zech 2:12, also a late composition. The divine harmony of creation is evident also in verse 7: "worthy colony," that is, the land's holiness required a people who were holy (see 6:16 for similar teaching).

Verse 8 repeats the theme of "little by little" (v. 2) in recalling the wasps (hornets, Exod 23:28) of the ancient story—a detail still not well understood. The disclaimer in verse 9 reminds one of 11:20, but despite divine mercy, the Canaanites were so evil as to preclude their repentance (vv. 10-11). The author balances the great evil of Canaan against God's delay in exterminating them.

The digression concludes with reflections on God's unchallenged power (vv. 17-22). The very sensitive issue of why innocent people die is broached in verses 12-13. The answer is that God is both their maker and the one who cares for all. Since God's power is complete, it should not be challenged. This is also the teaching of the Book of Job.

In the case of the wicked who perish, God does not hold a judicial court to weigh arguments as a judge (v. 12). There is only one God, supreme over all; hence, questioning the divine decree of death or suffering is sinful. Note the repeated "unworthy," a sign of the writer's sense of divine proportion or harmony. This extends to justice (v. 16), which the wicked held to be a function of brute force (2:11); for God, creative power establishes justice and right, and this will teach others whose faith is weak (v. 17).

Israel, following the model of the disciple in quest of wisdom, should learn from these events (vv. 19-22). The greatest lesson is to imitate God's justice (v. 22). Israel's closeness to God is symbolized as being God's elect with whom God chose to enter into multiple covenants (v. 21). Earlier Hebrew thinking would have concentrated on one or other ancient covenant (particularly the Sinai and Davidic covenants). By the period of the Book of Wisdom, the majority of Israel's experiences were explained in covenant language (see Sir 45:24 for a covenant with Phinehas), hence a multiplicity of covenants.

12:23-27 The second example again. The author's complex language is evident in these few verses, but the issue remains the same: the Egyptians acted like foolish children. By divine proportion or harmony in creation, they deserved to become ridiculous in turn. The harmony was broken, since they attributed godhood to mere animals, "worthless" beasts.

Their punishment was proportionate ("worthy," v. 26). As a result, Egypt, like Israel, came to see God's hand (see Exod 10:16, Pharaoh's admission of sin). In the case of the Egyptians, further repentance was ruled out, probably since they were sinful to the core, like the Canaanites (12:4, hated by God, a sentiment shared by Ben Sira, Sir 46:6).

13:1–15:17 Digression on false worship. This lengthy section divides into two parts: 13:1-9, on nature worship, and 13:10–15:17, on idol worship. The author's tone in the first part is remarkably peaceful and understanding, at least up to the final verses. The theme is stated in verse 1 and is repeated in verse 9: God's human creatures should be able to see God's power at work in the world (see Rom 1:18-25). "Him who is" conveniently expresses in Greek philosophical terms a traditional explanation of the divine name Yahweh (Exod 3:14). This name—the God who is—contrasts with the final part of the sentence—the God who acts—completing the description of God.

The writer lists (v. 2), not the base animals of the Egyptians, but the heavenly powers (from Mesopotamian religion, which also influenced the early Greeks). Even the author calls the heavenly lights "governors," but only in the sense of Gen 1:16-18: the sun and moon that "rule." Verses 3-4 repeat the same lesson, one that forms part of wisdom training. Wonder or amazement normally forms the basis for attaining wisdom, since it leads to questions and analysis of experience. This experience should lead one to work "by analogy," that is, by comparisons, to reach the beautiful and powerful Creator (v. 5). Note that the emphasis on beauty is not strictly a Hebrew interest but more Greek.

Just why idolaters turned from God is hard to explain, especially in comparison with Canaanites and Egyptians, being completely corrupt. Worshipers of the heavens sought God avidly (vv. 6-7) but were "distracted." What they saw were the externals of creation rather than the deepest level of meaning, the Creator of these marvels. Those gifted with divine wisdom surely perceived the truth. The author, however, does not explain clearly why these individuals are blameworthy. Did they deliberately turn from God? Were they intellectually lazy?

The second part (13:10–15:17) has three major sections (13:11–14:11; 14:12–15:6; 15:7-13), with a reflection on the Egyptians (15:14-17). Following the usual pattern, a theme statement opens the section (v. 10): far worse than nature worship is the worship of human artifacts. God made the heavens, but humans made idols—the ultimate foolishness. These idols, unlike the sun and moon ("governors of the world," v. 2) are useless. To show better the foolishness of idolatry, the writer makes fun of the entire process, following the lead of several previous writers (see Jer 10:1-16; Bar 6; Isa 44:9-20).

Carpenters have God-given skill (vv. 11, 13), but they can use it badly. The author heaps scorn on them by showing that they can even use the most useless part of leftover wood (v. 13) to make an idol, full of blemishes. Once secured in its shrine, its maker calls on it—turning the divine order of creation upside down. The most succinct statements are in verses 17-18: "for vigor he invokes the powerless; for life he entreats the dead." This is the ultimate in folly. Idolmakers should rather rejoice in their skill, given by wisdom (14:2), than in a work to no purpose and powerless to save.

In verses 3-11 the author turns to God in prayer and exasperation. The term "providence" appears here for the first time in the Bible (v. 3), even though the concept is clear enough in other expressions, such as "hand of God" (see Josh 4:24 and 1 Kgs 18:46 for examples). Providence is a quality of God, whose creative power does not cease at the moment of creation. The road in the sea recalls the path through the Red Sea (see Ps 77:20) but refers directly to the right way to reach a destination (see Ps 107:28-32). To make one's way through an apparently trackless sea is a work of wisdom, but even Noah ("one without skill," v. 4) could rely on divine guidance.

Other goods of the earth, products of wisdom, would perish if they could not be shipped elsewhere (v. 5); even commerce is a work of wisdom. "Raft" and "frailest wood," referring to 10:4, are terms chosen deliberately to magnify God's power, even though transport ships were doubtless more than simple rafts. Noah, "hope of the universe," came safely to land again, and thus the human race was preserved by wood (v. 6). The author connects the account of the giants (Gen 6:1-4) with the great flood, a possible reading of the Genesis account but not the normal interpretation.

As a result, the author can pronounce some wood blessed and other wood cursed (vv. 7-8), and likewise some woodworkers blessed and others cursed (vv. 8-10). A further reason for a curse is for having bestowed the name "god" on a non-god. In Israel's thinking, the name stands for the reality, and God's name is incommunicable (see 14:21). To dare to act otherwise is to become worthy of punishment. Finally, even the idols themselves will be "visited," that is, judged and condemned (v. 11; see Jeremiah's thoughts on the destruction of the idols of Egypt in Jer 43:12-13).

The author's teaching on the origin and evils of idol worship (14:12–15:6) is the centerpiece of the entire section and is remarkable for its sensitive analysis (like that in 13:1-9). The theme (vv. 12-14) lays out the evil of idol worship: besides being folly in itself, it leads to other sin (v. 12). The writer does not specify when the sudden end will take place (v. 14).

Two origins for idol worship are proposed, and both are understandable in their context: the missing child (vv. 15-16) or a distant ruler (vv. 17-20). However innocent the original motives, corruption takes over. The royal father contrives rites to honor his dead son, and these assume the force of law; afterward they degenerate into folly, since the incommunicable name of the living God is given to a dead man (v. 15).

In verses 17-20 the king may be the same as the father of verse 15. Whether he is or not, his subjects begin in earnest to honor him through God-given artistic work (vv. 17-18). Human folly takes over and rites develop. The conclusion (v. 21) repeats the author's conviction about the proper order of the universe, now overturned by worshipers of idols ("stocks [wood] and stones").

The resulting evils are explained in verses 22-31. The language in verse 22 is complex. Idol-worshipers made two mistakes: they were in error about God, and they saw nothing wrong in evil rites. They gave the name of God to objects and gave the name of peace to war. The social results of such folly are given in verses 23-26: three evil rites (v. 23), murder and adultery (v. 24), and a welter of other disorders (vv. 25-26). Without the Creator, humans left to themselves tend to sin—traces of the original sin. Once the sense of shame has vanished, any evil is possible. The rites (v. 23) were practiced at various times, particularly in Israel's past (recall the condemnation of the Canaanites, 12:3-6).

The origin, repeated in verse 27, is idolatry. The results are all folly: "mad with enjoyment" is to lose control of reason; "prophesy lies" is to overturn God's order of truth. Without the true and living God, every kind of evil can take place (v. 29, a key verse in understanding how idol worship leads to wicked living). Punishment will overtake idol-worshipers (vv. 30-31) for both reasons; this is the law of the universe, restated in the final clause: it "ever follows" sin.

A second address to God follows (15:1-6); in it Israel disclaims idol worship. Regrettably these earnest words do not square with some periods of Israel's history; recall the idol worship in the Jerusalem temple (Ezek 8–9). It is true that apart from some superstitious practices characteristic of popular religion, Israel held true to the worship of the one God after the Exile.

Verse 1 is quoted from elsewhere (Ps 86:5, 15, for one example), giving traditional warrant for the author's teaching on forgiveness. The following verse is contradictory both in language and in fact ("if we sin . . . we will not sin"). Israel belongs to God by covenant (12:21). The tone of verse 3 is intellectual: justice and immortality come from the knowledge of God. The doing of justice is lacking here; the omission probably signifies nothing. Idol-making is "fruitless," that is, of no real effect and subject to the curse of futility. Note also the proportion in creation, "worthy of such hopes," that is, idol-makers are wicked and foolish, since they long for wicked and foolish things.

A second satire on idol-makers appears in 15:7-13, similar in many respects to that in 13:11–14:2. The writer holds the potter responsible, since he should have learned something from molding clay—namely, that he too was molded from the earth (Gen 2:7). He should in fact have imitated God in creation, working only for the good. Instead he used his God-given skill wickedly, doing meaningless work, a true mark of folly. He should have known, too, the end of his life, when he returns to dust (vv. 8b-9a). That life is lent to God's creatures is an unusual expression (see v. 16). Reflection on the idea, however, could have led Israel to consider that the spirit is tied to individual humans, and does not lose that connection after death. Hence, even though earthly life is ended, the spirit returns to God for reward or punishment.

In addition to the punishment coming to the potter for his foolishness, he is also blameworthy for greed and for making counterfeits. These latter are either imitations of more expensive work or represent gods that do not even exist (vv. 9-12). Like the carpenter's hopes (14:10), those of the potter are doomed (v. 10). A distinction between soul and spirit (v. 11) should not be easily drawn, since the terms are in a poetic parallel construction, signifying the same thing. Nonetheless, the terms eventually came to signify, along with body/flesh, the parts of human existence (as in Paul, 1 Thess 5:23, for a clear example).

The writer concludes with a set of reflections on the guilt of the Egyptians (vv. 14-17). They are foolish, not wise like Israel (v. 14). The main cause was idol worship, especially since the idols had no life, no power to act. The satirical description of idols basically adapts Ps 115:4-7 and Ps 135:15-18. The last two verses (vv. 16-17) also satirize the idolmaker. Being alive, the maker is infinitely greater than the lifeless object. The last sentence recalls 13:18, contrasting true life with death.

The issue of how idol-worshipers judged their worship remains undiscussed. It is quite likely that they understood the difference between life and death, and used the idol to focus attention and respect on other-worldly ideas.

15:18–16:15 The second example concluded. Resuming the argument left off in 12:27 on the worship of animals, the writer concludes. Mention of the Egyptians resumed in 15:14, though not by name, in the usual fashion. Verses 18-19 are quite harsh in their judgment, beyond even traditional biblical teaching on animals. "Loathsome" animals might include dung beetles (scarabs) and various snakes. The assertion that some of these beasts escaped God's approval is a very surprising affirmation in view of the author's teaching on divine wisdom in creation (especially 1:14). It seems quite likely that the writer's vehemence in denunciation got the better of his theology. Punishment for Egypt resulted in insect plagues (gnats and flies, Exod 9:12-20), loathsome creatures in their own way.

Israel, on the other hand, benefited while Egypt suffered. The "novel dish," quail in the desert, satisfied Israel's hunger; an equally novel occurrence—plagues of frogs, gnats, and flies—failed to satisfy Egypt. Israel may have suffered a little, but this follows the author's theory of retribution seen previously (see 3:5). In verse 4 Egypt, formerly an oppressor, did not itself experience hunger. Tormented by Egypt, Israel now sees how Egypt was tormented in turn. This knowledge was not simple vengeance, but gave the Israelites the opportunity to learn God's goodness toward them.

The author contrasts Egypt and Israel again in verses 5-10. True, Israel was punished (Num 21:4-9) as a result of murmuring; but the punishment was not complete, as it might have been in strict justice. To avoid a charge of idolatry, the author makes it clear that it was God who saved, not the serpent symbol erected by Moses. "Savior of all" (v. 7) must refer, in the Book of Wisdom, to God's power to save rather than actually saving all (v. 7).

In the case of the Egyptians, they suffered both from the knowledge of God's power to save from the serpents (v. 8) and from their plagues (v. 9). "He who delivers from all evil" sounds like a divine title, similar to "savior of all." The standard version does not record the death of the Egyptians due to locusts and flies; possibly the author is taking homiletic liberties, based on Exod 10:17, "deadly pest." Divine proportion affects the punishment coming to the oppressors ("they deserved," v. 9).

A few reflections conclude the section (vv. 11-15). Israel's brief punishment is explained again (v. 11), this time using "forgetfulness," a typically Greek expression. This state is a manifestation of folly, since it keeps persons from seeing and knowing God's hand in their lives.

No particular "word" of God seems intended in verse 12, but probably just a general decree or decision to save. To affirm God's power over both life and death claims universal jurisdiction and denies any supreme evil, an adversary of God. "Lead down . . . lead back" (see Tob 13:2) means to bring death and bring life, but more exactly it refers to bringing back from the gates of death, that is, being near death through illness. In the author's day, however, this ancient thought was used more globally, as seen by the contrast in verse 14 (spirit and soul are synonymous here).

16:16-29 Third example: manna. The examples are meant to show divine protection for Israel, contrasted with proportionate punishment for Egypt. Verses 16-19 deal with Egypt's twofold punishment in hail and fire, and open with the usual thematic sentence. Hail, mixed of course with cold rain, is virtually unknown in Egypt. The wonder of it all for the author is that two opposite forces, water and fire (that is, lightning), existed together in doing God's will, whereas they could not do so naturally (Exod 9:22-26). The explanatory clause beginning "for" in verse 17 stems from Israel's most ancient traditions (as in Judg 5:20).

In the text of Exodus, the plague of hail, which kills the animals, follows other plagues involving animals (Exod 9:1-7). In the present text, however, events are compressed; only some beasts are killed (v. 18) so that others could plague Egypt, which in turn would acknowledge God.

Israel thrived on manna, a food that came down from the heavens, pleasing everyone, even those with differing tastes (v. 20). The author follows the older traditions of Ps 78:25 (and Ps 105:40) regarding manna as food of the heavenly beings. Manna had a moral meaning also as a symbol of divine sweetness—another new idea.

Verses 22-29 examine these events more theoretically. Israel took comfort, as noted often before, in the punishment meted out to Egypt (v. 22). Divine creative power so altered the normal operations of nature that God's will was done. Fire (lightning) continued its work even amid water (snow and ice/hail). The explanatory sentence (v. 24) stands as a universal principle to explain miracles. The purpose of it all was to grow in wisdom: "that your sons . . . might learn" (v. 26). In verse 27 the author has also mixed events into one, seeing the hail of Exod 9 as the hoarfrost of Exod 16:14.

The concluding two verses (vv. 28-29) are somewhat disconnected from the foregoing. Verse 29 is a moralizing comment, adding nothing to the strength of the lesson.

17:1–18:4 Fourth example: darkness and light. Following a brief introductory comment (v. 1), the author writes about the darkness afflicting Egypt (vv. 2-21). This section, too, begins with an introduction which, however, treats night as a moral condition rather than a physical reality (see also 17:21). Israel was not, of course, removed from God's providence; it only seemed so.

Apparitions in the night terrified the Egyptians (vv. 3-6). This concept, elaborated at some length here, does not appear in the accounts of the Book of Exodus. The author has dramatized the relatively tame account of Exod 9:21-23, drawing out implications about ghosts (vv. 3-4), sounds in the night (vv. 4, 9), and sights (vv. 5-6, fires). Psychological torment, as always, is worse than physical ones (vv. 6-9). Magicians (as in Exod 9:11), to whom the terrified Egyptians called in the darkness, could do nothing this time. In the thought typical of the Book of Wisdom, shrewd magicians are themselves turned into objects of mockery by the force they sought to expel (vv. 7-10). "To face the air" is an obscure phrase but may be a psychological comment, namely, that the sorcerers were afraid even of harmless air; the only terrors were in their imagination.

Verses 11-13 comment on the fears that accompany evil. The term "conscience" (v. 11) makes its first appearance here; it will be used extensively in the New Testament. The rest of the comments must draw on abundant experience.

On this psychological basis, the writer then explains events further in verses 14-21. The source of this "night" is unusual: the nether world, where eternal night reigns (as in Job 42:17). Sleep is perhaps a symbol of their condition in the darkness rather than their actual state in this period of three "days" (Exod 10:22-23). It is also called a prison (vv. 16-17), taking in Egyptians everywhere. The seven sounds of their terror (vv. 18-19) are beautifully described, but did not form part of the narration of the Book of Exodus. The exemption of Israel and the rest of the world in verse 20 parallels Exod 10:23b. The closing verse (v. 21) refers to night as symbol, similar to the hope of the wicked (in 16:29).

Comments on light for Israel (18:1-4) conclude the example. The author calls the Israelites "holy ones," a new term (repeated in verse 5) destined to move from a description of heavenly beings (as in 5:5) to temple personnel, and finally to the people and the land (12:3). The text puts Egyptians and Israelites in close proximity, a further cause for terror in the night. Once the plague ceased, the Egyptians begged Israel to go (v. 2). "Instead of this" (v. 3) refers to the darkness over Egypt. The pillar (v. 3) and the cloud (causing a "mild sun") lit the night sky for Israel in the desert (Exod 13:21-22). Proportionate punishment ("deserved to be deprived," v. 4) falls on Egypt in the form of darkness, the comparison calling Israel's slavery darkness (17:2, 21). A completely new idea closes the passage: the law, to be given soon on Sinai, is an imperishable light (as in Ps 119:105).

18:5–19:21 Fifth example: Death of the first-born. This last section speaks first of death for both Egypt (18:5-19) and Israel (18:20-25), and then of the events at the Sea (19:1-21).

Following the author's cast of thought, the Egyptians were to suffer a fate proportionate to the murder of Israel's children (v. 5); also, whereas one child of Israel (Moses) was saved from the Nile, all of Egypt's soldiers perished at the Sea. Their time of punishment was announced to Israel (Exod 11:4) when Israel was to celebrate the first Passover (Exod 12:1-28). This Passover (v. 9) was celebrated by the holy people, sanctified in a particular way at this festival and having experienced the dangers of life in Egypt. The praises of the ancestors are either praises of them or more likely the songs of praise they had sung previously. These may be the Great Hallel ("Praise" in Hebrew), Psalms 113–118, which came to be sung at Passover, and may have been used as such in the author's time.

The wailing of families, both high and low, bereft of their first-born sons (vv. 10-12) contrasts with Israel's songs. The Egyptians should have known what would happen, since Moses predicted the disaster to Pharaoh (Exod 11:4-8). The cause of their disbelief was magic, according to the author, who had little other reason to explain this extraordinary obstinacy. A further reason appears in verse 13: Egypt's sons died, but God's son, Israel, was saved. This is a motive in addition to the more usual one of recompense for the death of Israel's children (v. 5).

The next passage (vv. 14-19) elaborates on the traditional accounts of this most dreadful punishment. In the first place, the author sets the stage carefully: at midnight, in the quiet and darkness, the personified word of God appears. At this coming, the scene changes from peace to mourning, and from darkness to a disturbed mixture of ghostly manifestations. These visions found no place in the text of Exodus, but form part of the writer's psychological tools in making his point. We find that the purpose for these visions is to increase the sting of punishment; also, at the point of their death the first-born moved from ignorance to knowledge of the God of Israel.

1 Chr 21:16, which pictures an angel "standing between earth and heaven," may have provided the impetus for later images of a divine figure of great height, that is, of all-encompassing power, similar to wisdom itself (as 8:24). This figure appears in verse 16 as well as in later Jewish writing.

Israel also suffered thousands of deaths in the wilderness (Num 17:14). The difference, as previously, is that Israel's punishment was brief (v. 20). Aaron the priest put an end to the deaths with his weapon (vv. 21-24). Since God sent the punishment for Israel's sins, it is difficult today to appreciate Aaron's role in mitigating it. His priestly robes (praised in Sir 50 for their beauty) here have a mystical power, symbolizing the beautiful world and the tribes of the chosen people. This destroyer, possibly the same figure as the personified word of verse 15, finally yielded (v. 25).

The events at the Red Sea climax the narrative (19:1-21). Even though the Egyptians suffered the full punishment, they were foolish enough to ignore the clear lesson of God's protection for Israel (v. 1). The Lord knew this beforehand and planned an even greater punishment (vv. 1b-2). Their foolishness reached new heights even in their grief (vv. 3-4), with the result that Israel's deliverance was greater again, and the punishment of the Egyptians even more terrifying (v. 5).

The author in the next few verses (vv. 6-12) shows again how the Creator could refashion creation for the benefit of the people. Verse 6 stands as a theme, and the rest of the section gives examples. The Lord brought dry land out of the sea, as happened in the original creation of the world (Gen 1:9-10). The crossing is painted vividly: a grassy plain filled with people roaming like horses or lambs (vv. 7b-9). As usual, the text of Exodus is less colorful (Exod 14:21-22).

Unlike the forgetful, foolish Egyptians (vv. 3-4), the Israelites knew what was happening and why (vv. 10-12). In contrast to the first creation, the land did not bring forth beneficial living creatures (Gen 1:24) but gnats (Exod 8:17). The quail were new, since they came apparently out of the sea, following Num 11:31.

The author moves to an elaborate comparison between the Egyptians and the inhabitants of Sodom. Egypt suffered due to its foolishness, ignoring warnings and enslaving Israel, originally their guests (v. 13; see Exod 1:8-10). The Sodomites did not receive guests hospitably (v. 13b); the guests in this case were heavenly visitors, "strangers" (v. 15). The punishment was destruction. The Egyptians (v. 16) first received Israel with rejoicing (Gen 45:17-20) but later turned to oppression, and their punishment was even greater than that of Sodom. Both the Egyptians and the people of Sodom were punished with blindness (the darkness in Exod 10:21-23; a blinding light in Gen 19:11).

Reversals in nature, a kind of new creation (see v. 16), conclude the book. Verse 18 states the theme by means of a musical image. The "land creatures" were the animals that accompanied Israel through the Sea (Exod 12:38). The water creatures were the frogs that invaded Egypt (Exod 7:25-29). The fire and water (vv. 20-21) appeared in 16:16-29.

The final verse (v. 22) concludes Part Three (11:2–19:22) but applies to the entire book. Addressed directly to God, it praises God's providential care for the chosen people, with whom God has remained, no matter the occasion. The lesson for the disciple of wisdom is to examine Israel's history intently to perceive God's guidance, and thereby to grow in closeness to wisdom, that is, God.

SIRACH

John E. Rybolt, C.M.

INTRODUCTION

Title

There has never been any question about the title of major biblical books, such as Isaiah, Jeremiah, or the Gospels; but books like Sirach are not as well known, and as a result their titles often vary. This book goes by two names, each having several variations. The first is the Book of Sirach (or the Book of the Wisdom of Sirach); the second is the Latin name Ecclesiasticus, meaning "church [book]." The first takes its name from the author, and the second from the use of it made by the church—possibly because others had doubts about it. This commentary uses the name Ben Sira for the author, and Sirach for the book.

Author

It is unusual for an Old Testament book to bear the name of its author, since the books usually contain the words or deeds of individuals—for example, a book about Jonah, not a book by Jonah. The foreword calls the author "Jesus"; his more complete name is given in 50:27: "Jesus, son of Eleazar, son of Sirach." Ben ("son of") Sira is the common form of his name.

Even though we know the author's name, we know nothing about him other than what we can deduce from the book. He was a family man, given to study and writing. He taught (51:23), read widely, recommended travel, and doubtless enjoyed a good reputation. His concerns reflect upper-class life, and he probably wrote them down in his later life. He has an extraordinary interest in matters liturgical, but this does not prove that he was a priest. His grandson, who translated the book from Hebrew into Greek, remains completely unknown.

Date and place of composition

Scholars have determined the time of composition as the first part of the second century B.C.E., about the year 180. The high priest Simon (50:1-21) died about 190; Ben Sira speaks of him as having died recently. The foreword speaks of King Euergetes, whose thirty-eighth year was 132 B.C.E. Working backward from grandson to son to father brings us close to 180 B.C.E. Finally, the book does not reflect the revolutionary troubles that broke out in 168 B.C.E.

It is more difficult to ascertain where the book was written. Jerusalem is thought to have been the place of composition, since it was the main center of culture, education, and religious life. The foreword was composed in Egypt; scholars suspect that Alexandria was the place, and for the same reasons: Jewish culture, education, and religion.

Language

The New American Bible took the bold step of using the surviving portions of Sirach in Hebrew as its fundamental text. For centuries Sirach existed only in Greek, together with some quotations in Jewish writings. As the foreword notes, a Hebrew version existed and was translated into Greek. In the years 1896–1900 archeologists uncovered about two-thirds of a Hebrew version, and since that time fragments of other manuscripts have been added. Unfortunately it is not always clear that today's Hebrew version is original or even older than the normal Greek version. In many cases, however, the Hebrew and the Greek are identical, and in some cases the Hebrew makes better sense. The differing versions have led to a differing enumeration of verses, sometimes a very confusing situation for a modern reader.

Authority

The Book of Sirach forms part of the "deuterocanonical" books, or as they are often called today, the "Apocrypha." This designation means that from earliest times Jewish scholars did not include it among the books of Scripture. They did use the book on occasion in worship and for study, but since it was unlike standard Judaism in many respects, it did not take its place in the list of sacred books (or "canon"). Early Christian lists often omitted it or at least questioned its authority, but the church used it extensively, and continues to do so. The foreword is always included with the book but is not regarded as inspired Scripture.

Background

The author's work grew out of the experience of Israel, with its concerns and styles of writing and thinking. However, Greek thought and life had been making an impact on upper-class Jewish life for some time before Ben Sira wrote. His book even quotes or paraphrases pagan Greek texts, and his style as a scholar at leisure is much more characteristic of the Greeks than of the Jews, whose scholars made their living with daily labor. The author also demonstrates his acquaintance with Egypt's thought world and quotes from its literature.

Style

The book appears to be Ben Sira's collected notes put into poetry and arranged for publication. This makes an outline of the book quite difficult, apart from major sections. The poetry abounds in rich images taken from nature and shows wide variety in types of writing. Ben Sira often uses multiple terms for the same idea. Sirach is a work of wisdom literature. Unlike Job and Ecclesiastes, it does not treat of a single theme. It resembles the first part of Proverbs in style but does not contain single proverbs without commentary. It also resembles the Book of Wisdom in its interest in history and theory.

Teachings

Ben Sira himself did not summarize his teachings, but in a book as long and complex as Sirach, a summary seems needed. For him, God is all, the only God, the almighty Creator who brought order to all facets of life, both natural and moral. God, the source of good, acts justly but also forgives sin. God is also active in history and is bound by covenants to a special relationship with Israel. Ben Sira has a worldwide view of God's activity and sees the law as applicable in some way to everyone. For him, life continues in some way after death; but judgment takes place at death, not afterward.

For Ben Sira, fulfilling the law of Moses is great wisdom. The law prescribes the liturgy, a feature of great interest to Ben Sira. His spirituality might be called liturgical in some fashion. Whether humans are completely free or in some way subject to destiny is unclear. It is clear, however, that virtuous living will be rewarded, and wickedness punished. Ben Sira knows reason and its demands; the ethical content of his work is high. For that reason it is hard to say that Sirach is "revealed" in any way.

Particularly disturbing to many is the author's harsh treatment of women. Since the author accommodated Jewish teachings to Greek rational philosophy and did not have much to say about oral traditions, scholars have called him an early Sadducee. This observation is even clearer when one compares his teachings with those of Jesus in the Gospels, where Jesus appears to follow more closely the methods of the Pharisees.

COMMENTARY

The Introduction to Sirach

Foreword

Only the Book of Sirach comes with a prologue of this type. Other biblical books have introductions (for example, Psalm 1 for the Book of Psalms, and Deut 1:1-2 for the rest of that book), but none of them gives such details on the book's composition and translation. In the case of Sirach, the author of the foreword had to refer to the translation from Hebrew (into Greek), since Hebrew was no longer the generally spoken language of Alexandria in Egypt, where a large Jewish community made its home.

In the first paragraph the translator, whose name we do not know, makes mention of the law, the prophets, and the "later authors." Scholars see this as the earliest reference to the division of the books of the Hebrew Bible into their three traditional parts: the law, the prophets, the writings. The last category was not fully developed in Ben Sira's day. Further, the usual order followed in Christian editions is law (Pentateuch), history, writings, and prophets. Israel, however, understood the books of history as one with the prophets and joined the two, leaving the writings till last.

The one mention of Israel's wisdom should be read in the light of a more general attempt on the part of Jewish authors of the period to defend the quality of their wisdom teaching over against that of their pagan neighbors. This defense grew stronger in the next couple of centuries, since it was important for Jews living outside of Israel to realize how valuable their own traditions were. The translator offers his readers the insight that wisdom is not just a matter of learning alone but of proper living, in accordance with the whole Jewish law. His insistence on this is derived from many places in the Book of Sirach.

In the second paragraph the translator comments on the difficulties of translation, from Hebrew in particular. The common understanding of this passage is that he is referring to Greek translations, yet translations into Aramaic, the spoken language of Jews in Israel, were already known in Israel itself. Eventually a number of Greek translations were brought together in Egypt in a version known as the Septuagint (meaning the "Seventy," after an old story about seventy scholars in Alexandria producing this version).

In the final paragraph of the foreword, the word "reproduction" refers most likely to other wisdom literature, probably in Greek translation. The publication that the translator mentions involved preparing a master text to be given to copyists for mass production. These copies were then sent to those "living abroad." This expression probably has Israel as its point of reference, since living abroad for a Jew meant living anywhere else than in Israel, not just outside of Egypt.

A person evidently acquires wisdom by reading and reflecting on texts, a method recommended even today. Ben Sira's grandson concludes by repeating his insistence that a change of life (we might call it "conversion") must accompany growth in wisdom.

IN PRAISE OF WISDOM

Solemn Introduction to Wisdom (1:1-29)

These verses summarize the teaching of the sages on wisdom up to the period of Ben Sira and give the author's own developed thought.

1:1-8 The origin and character of wisdom. The book opens with a thematic statement contrasting somewhat with other statements in the book praising the wisdom of Israel, which, to be sure, has its origin in God. The author's use of examples drawn from nature (vv. 2-3) and their application to human experience are characteristic of all wisdom writing—encouraging students to have a contemplative regard for God's creation. Ben Sira pairs wisdom with understanding (v. 5) in Hebrew fashion, intending no difference between them. Elsewhere in the Old Testament wisdom is associated with skill, common sense, or even accumulated human knowledge; but here wisdom is of a higher quality: hidden in God (v. 5), created by God alone (v. 7). As in Prov 8:22, wisdom is not understood as coeternal with the Lord but is created by God. The "friends" of God (v. 8) are likely the people of Israel.

1:9-18 Wisdom is the fear of the Lord. Fear is traditionally understood as reverence, devotion, or awe in the presence of God. To have this quality is a great blessing, compared here to the gladness of a festive banquet (v. 9). It brings blessings, including a long life, to the one who has it (v. 10)—a conservative view uninfluenced by thoughts of eternal life (v. 11).

Ben Sira then discusses fear of the Lord, opening with a traditional statement, copied often (see Job 28:28; Ps 111:10; Prov 1:7, 9:10). Then he goes beyond this with his own expansion. Often in this work the author's sense of predestination is evident, as in verses 12b-13. He does not clearly develop this position, however. He continues with sensory descriptions (drunk with wisdom, v. 14; taste, v. 15; sight and smell of flowers, vv. 16-17). The tree metaphor (v. 18) is traditional in wisdom writing (see Ps 1). "Knowledge and full understanding" are here the results of wisdom, not its synonyms (as in v. 4).

1:19-29 Marks of wisdom. Verses 19-21 seem out of place here, contrasting as they do with the previous verses. In fact, some manuscripts are disturbed here, showing hesitancy even in the tradition. The teaching on patience for a time (vv. 20-21) is developed further in Sirach: a proper time reflects God's order in creation, to be modeled in wise living. Likewise, the connection between wisdom and justice, or right living according to the law, is a major theme in Ben Sira's writing (vv. 22-24).

The negatives of verses 25-29 are counsels against duplicity, in prophetic style. The public humiliation of the unwise (with no hint of the final judgment) is rooted in the conviction that reliance on self rather than on God is the ultimate blasphemy and a reversal of divine creation.

Lessons on Faithfulness and Humility (2:1–4:10)

2:1-18 Duties to God by enduring trials. The first lesson opens traditionally with "My son," words that often mark new sections in Sirach. By "son" the author means "disciple," a student in Ben Sira's lecture hall. The author treats first the theme of preparation for trials, that is, adversity and misfortune. The basis for these trials is not given, but it is probably a test of faith. Then follow lessons (vv. 4-6), a natural experience and its moral application (v. 5). Just as impurities can be removed even from gold, so the just can be purified. One's true value will thereby be seen.

Verses 7-11 set a different tone, since Ben Sira writes in the plural. These sound like psalm verses, recalling Pss 46:1; 71:5; 103:4-5, and others. To emphasize his point, the Sage counsels the study of history, chiefly the Scripture. But his advice is too simple, for it does not account for the apparently meaningless suffering of some biblical heroes such as Josiah. As a result of his own biblical studies, Ben Sira claims that the main motive (v. 11) for being faithful is that God's mercy is consistent (recalling Exod 34:6-7).

Verses 12-18 enumerate the curses (or woes) on those without hope in God. This theme appears only here and in 41:8. Those condemned should have known of God's mercy and forgiveness in history. The blessed (vv. 15-17) stand in contrast. Note that "fear" and "love" occur as parallel terms in verses 15-16; the author intends them to refer to the same state of heart. The final verse recalls 2 Sam 24:14.

3:1-16 Honoring parents. Ben Sira divides his lesson on the honor owed to parents into positive (vv. 1-9) and negative duties (vv. 10-16). In general for Ben Sira, the father serves as the focus, and the mother just as a poetic contrast (see vv. 2, 3, 6, 9, 11, 16). If this is Ben Sira's commentary on the fourth commandment, it is the earliest one we have.

For the positive duties, the text opens with a statement about a parent's right, together with the motive: life—a clear echo of Exod 20:12. The basis for the command is found in the Lord's doing, with its rewards: atonement for sin, children, prayers answered, life, family harmony. The concept of atonement for sin by honoring a parent is a feature new to biblical teaching. Before Ben Sira's day it was taught that atonement is accomplished by sacrifice. Ben Sira also develops the atoning value of alms (3:20; 28:2; 34:26; 35:3). Atonement, however, is not automatic; repentance is also required.

Verse 9 is probably a popular proverb, known from the introductory "for." The contrast here is not between father and mother but between a parent's blessing and curse.

The negative duties (vv. 10-16) begin with a contrast between shame and honor. These lines might also be rephrased as follows: to show honor for a father is honor in a son; but shame for a mother is shame in her children. The interpretive possibilities of such a brief proverb are probably intended. Such pithy statements can be twisted and examined from many points of view. Those of us who read them should extract all the meaning possible from them.

Verses 12-15 do not necessarily refer to Ben Sira's views on family life. He counsels consideration or human kindness for all children. The motive is divine: God will take such kindness (literally "almsgiving") into account. Verse 15 continues the lesson, alluding possibly to a storehouse (or account book?) for good acts. This may sound too mechanical for Christians. Verse 16 is in standard proverbial style, with roots in Exod 21:17.

3:17-28 Lessons on humility. Recall here the upper-class situation of the Sage and his students. Against such a background lessons on humility are dramatic. In verses 17-18 he introduces his lesson with the motive: loved by others, rewarded by God. Verse 19 adds another: an assertion of divine power and condescension to the lowly. Verses 20-24 are negatives. Ben Sira introduces another concept characteristic of his writing, namely, one's lot in life (here, "what is committed to you"). He stands in contrast with Greek thinking, which emphasized freedom of investigation. For Ben Sira, one's lot in life reflects God's created order. Verse 23 is an argument from personal experience, and verse 24 offers an example from nature, designed to provoke reflection about right living.

In verses 25-27 the author contrasts the stubborn (literally, "heavy heart"), with the humble. The assertion of punishment here is fundamental to Ben Sira's thought: each act has its own reward bound up with it. Results follow inevitably.

The section concludes with a general comment (v. 28). Proverbs such as these are wise sayings, usually memorable and sharp, briefly summing up human experience. They were the stock in trade of wisdom teachers. (See also 6:35; 8:8; 13:25; 20:20; 21:15.)

3:29–4:10 Alms. These verses form the last part of the lesson on fidelity and humility and fall into three parts: theme (3:29-30), negative (4:1-6), and then positive recommendations (4:7-10).

The theme here is astonishing: alms can atone for sins. As noted above, this teaching is characteristic of our author. Note that the form is typical: experience (water and fire) and application (atonement). Nothing is implied, however, as to just how alms atone for sin.

The negatives in the next verses are followed by a final assertion of God's activity (v. 6). One would like to read in these verses a completely charitable approach, that is, to do good simply for its own sake. The lesson here is self-protection: doing good to others will involve a reward, just as not doing good (or doing evil) will lead to punishment. Note also that God is called "his Creator," a commonplace expression for us but a relatively new idea in Old Testament times. This term underscores the oneness of all creatures: God made both the rich and the poor.

The positive recommendations of verses 7-10 change the scene from public life on the streets (implied in verses 1-6) to the assembly, some sort of general gathering that heard cases and gave judgment. Ben Sira presumes here that his students will be in a position to help, given their social status. Verse 7 itself is general and may be a quotation. The results of this charitable activity will be the same as in the previous section—reward from God for oneself. ("Most High" is a title for God used principally in the late Old Testament period.) The motherly tenderness of God is surprising, given the rigidly masculine viewpoint in Sirach.

Pursuit and Marks of Wisdom (4:11–10:5)

4:11-19 Rewards of wisdom. The theme statement in verse 11 is typical: wisdom is a female. (The father of these children is not otherwise specified because of the poetic nature of these teachings.) Various rewards are specified: life, favor, glory (or renown). The connection between wisdom and God ("the Holy One") is very close (v. 14). It has proven difficult in many cases to separate wisdom and God clearly (as in the opening chapters of Proverbs). Such a division is rather the task of theology than of biblical poetry.

Verse 15 ("judges nations") refers to the Gentiles among whom the Jews live. The original Hebrew, however, may mean "judges aright." The difference is due to a possible confusion of terms.

Growth in wisdom comes by trusting her (v. 16). This itself comes through testing by wisdom, possibly by the decision that an official might have to make (reflecting the social status of Ben Sira's students). Small, wise decisions will lead to a conviction that wisdom can be trusted. The secrets of wisdom (v. 18) come only with struggle. To abandon wisdom is an evil, and Ben Sira's treatment of this is normal—a reversal of positions takes place: to abandon wisdom means that wisdom will abandon us, and misery will be our lot. We have only ourselves to blame for this, since that is the way God's creation is ordered.

4:20–6:4 Excess and defect of wisdom. Ben Sira knew public life well enough to realize that balance or proportion is needed in all things, even in humility. His teaching here probably revolves around proportion rather than any specific element. Proportion would be, for example, a feature of well-ordered creation, and an observant or wise creature would seek to imitate it.

Verse 21 is a learned explanation of one word with two meanings. Ben Sira may be citing Hesiod, an ancient Greek author; whether directly or indirectly is not known. This points to the general international character of wisdom teaching.

The issue of proportion is carried through lessons about speech (speaking at the proper time, v. 23) and about being vulnerable (admitting guilt or ignorance, v. 26). The proper proportion (or "truth," v. 28) is ultimately at stake, and God, the guarantor of right order, will uphold it. These lessons about created order contrast to some degree with the sense of right and wrong Christians have traditionally learned from a meditation on the commandments. Ben Sira teaches an alternative form of reflection on God.

One of the defects of wisdom is arrogance (vv. 29-31). These negatives recall the prophetic distinction between words and actions, but the text (particularly verse 30) is obscure. The early church (in the Didache) quoted verse 31 as a typically Christian attitude toward life.

The section 5:1-10 treats of self-reliance as a defect of wisdom. The introductory theme (vv. 1-2) is a true religious message, counseling against reliance on two false gods, wealth and power. Although self-reliance can be recognized as a good—and was so by many Greek philosophers—its excess is being considered here.

A series of contrasts follows (vv. 3-7), using prohibitions and assertions proving the point at issue. An exception is verses 5-6, which seem to allude to a psalm. The motive for this prohibition contains another instance of the balance or proportion characteristic of Ben Sira's teaching: God's mercy and anger are both in proportion to the human acts involved.

The conclusion (vv. 8-10) is homiletic in style, which is unusual for Sirach. The summary in verse 10 points to the danger of reliance on apparent power; wealth has no real power in the ultimate issues of life.

The next section, on sincerity in speech (5:11–6:1), marks the first appearance of a common theme in Sirach. The author lays out his general views (vv. 11-16), beginning with a rural proverb and drawing out its implication (vv. 11-12). Since some winds are too strong, the prudent person will choose the proper occasion to winnow or speak. The Epistle of James (1:19) quotes verse 13, although in another setting; verse 15 recalls the lengthy discussion in Jas 3:1-12 on restraining the tongue.

The motives behind the general teaching are shame (v. 17) and disgrace (6:1). In a small and closely knit society, shame would be more evident than in today's large, impersonal cities. Notice that both motives are human conditions rather than eternal punishment for sin. Ben Sira has discussed shame with guilt in 4:21; this passage is an example of that teaching.

A few verses on lust (6:2-4) complete Ben Sira's teaching on excess and defect in wisdom. His principal idea is that the wise person should never be in the grip of anything—in this case lust. The comparison differs in the Greek text, which mentions a bull consuming one's soul; even though the versions differ, the idea is clear enough. Both fire and bull can destroy a strong tree, the traditional picture of the wise (see Ps 1:3).

6:5-17 True friendship. One of the loveliest aspects of Sirach is the author's thoughts on friendship, developed in this book more thoroughly than elsewhere in wisdom literature. His normal caution is evident here and is a good check against multiplying friends; his experience teaches him that one's truest friends are few and far between (v. 6).

In verses 8-13 Ben Sira contrasts false and true friends in a set of assertions and explanations. Inconstant friends (vv. 8-10) are the opposite of wise friends, who are true to their word and selfless. The refrain "be with you" (vv. 8, 10) has deep biblical roots, drawn mainly from the presence of God with the chosen people or with particular heroes as a guarantee of success and blessing. Experience shows that a friend must be present particularly in times of need, even though words or solutions to the problems encountered are not available. A very cautious summary (v. 13) concludes these contrasts coming from a long life and broad experience; scholars have seen here an echo of the words of the Greek author Theognis, possibly known to educated Jews like Ben Sira.

True friends, by contrast, are described and praised (vv. 14-16) in a fashion recalling the virtuous wife of Prov 31:10-31. The concluding motive (v. 17) calls for fear of God (internally), coupled with good behavior (externally).

6:18-37 Attaining wisdom. One of several similar sections, these few verses lay out ways for disciples to grow toward wisdom. In the first place (vv. 18-23), the attainment of wisdom involves toil. Discipline, self-control, and longing are prerequisites for a life of work (v. 18). By contrast, the undisciplined (vv. 21-22) will never attain wisdom. The stone (v. 22) may be a heavy stone cast aside by the fool or perhaps a touchstone used to test genuine metals. The Hebrew text of verse 23 contains a play on words: the same word may mean "discipline" or "bond" or "removed."

Another lesson on the same topic opens solemnly with "my son" (vv. 24-31). This section, on submission, has a schoolroom atmosphere, with emphasis on activities—carry, draw close, search, seek (vv. 26-28). As a result, rest and joy will follow. The purple cord (v. 30) recalls Num 15:38-39 and links the law and wisdom. The burden, therefore, is not that of slaves but of scholars and royalty.

The author closes with a lesson emphasizing the will (vv. 32-33). On this basis he mentions other means (vv. 34-37a), principally the company of the wise and virtuous. The connection of law and wisdom (Torah wisdom) is clearly expressed here in summary (v. 37). The last half-verse parallels 1:1: if a person prepares for wisdom, God will grant it.

7:1-9:16 Advice and counsels. This section forms part of 4:11-10:5, on the pursuit of wisdom, and is further divided into public life (7:1-17), states in life (7:18-36), and relations with others (8:1-9:16).

Ben Sira's advice on public life opens with reversals of fortune (vv. 1-3). These are normally employed in Sirach to show how punishment takes place (evil acts carry with them their own punishment). The wise will want to avoid evil consequences. The verses on leadership (vv. 4-7) carry a double message: do not seek leadership, it leads to evil (v. 7); but if you have native abilities, then it is a good (v. 6). At root here is the conviction that all have their own places given them by God. Favoritism (v. 6) is unjust, since it violates the integrity or proportion to be observed in life's dealings.

In verses 8-10 the message is that each sin is punished; this is the order of the universe. Hence God cannot be bought off (v. 9); rather, true piety consists in both prayers and alms (faith and works, v. 10).

Insensitivity in public life (vv. 11-16) is also a great evil. Ben Sira has offered us a series of prohibitions, with a few reasons or motives, such as verse 13: lying always begets more lying. Verse 15 contrasts with the upper-class ethic seen in other places in Sirach. The author's approach recalls Paul's work as a tentmaker (Acts 18:3), living as a scholar by the work of his hands. The truly humble will have their reward (v. 17) elsewhere than in death, the common lot of all.

The verses on states in life (vv. 18-36) are arranged in groups, beginning with the family (vv. 18-26). Negative and positive recommendations are gathered together here. Noteworthy is the author's treatment of slaves (vv. 20-21): they are human beings, deserving of good treatment and respect. Theirs was generally an economic slavery, not one based on race or origins, nor were slaves regarded generally as a class in society. (For the release of slaves, see Deut 15:12.) Other property receives similar treatment (vv. 22-26): stock, sons, daughters, wife (evidently this is a man's world).

Honor is due parents (vv. 27-28; see 3:1-16) for their gift of life, now returned to them by a dutiful son. Priests likewise are to be honored (vv. 29-31), not for their own worthiness, but for the God whose ministers they are. (The offerings alluded to are not intended to describe precisely the rituals of the temple.) The poor, that is, the neglected and powerless, and even the dead deserve attentive treatment. The results will benefit the wise person, since God has ordered the universe so. The summary (v. 36) may lead to considerations of an afterlife; more likely Ben Sira had in mind the consequences of a good life on one's descendants.

The author's advice on relations with others (8:1–9:16) is divided into lessons on men (8:1-19), women (9:1-9), and friends (9:10-16).

The lessons on men treat first of the rich and powerful (vv. 1-2). History shows that wealth can corrupt (v. 2b). The unruly (vv. 3-4) should be avoided, since they are controlled by their passions and speak unwisely. The comparisons in verses 5-7 demonstrate Ben Sira's psychological sensitivity, a feature encountered several times in the book. The Sage may be speaking of his own experience also in verses 8-9. Training in proverbs (as in 3:28) will stretch one's mental potential to see clearly into reality. Real knowledge, which enables one for princely service, comes from accumulated experience (as in Deut 4:9; 11:19; Pss 44:1; 78:3; Job 8:8; 12:12).

Those to avoid (vv. 10-16) are described in terms of the reversals that come to the unwise disciple: the impious man (v. 11) will turn on you, for example. Financial matters (vv. 12-13) show that power can be abused; the wise should be in command of their own finances. The message of verse 14 recalls that of 7:6, but the perspective differs; Ben Sira offers no advice on handling disputes with judges.

Special advice on handling secrets (vv. 17-19) further demonstrates the author's well-known caution in matters of human relationships and contrasts to some extent with his teaching on trusting one's friends (see 6:5-17).

The experience of a man's world continues in 9:1-9, where Ben Sira, following the custom of other wisdom writers even outside Israel, writes negatively of women (see also 25:13–26:27). To give a woman power over a man (or to allow anything to have this power, such as desire or wealth) is a great evil (v. 2). Consorting with "strange women" likewise involves handing over self-control—in this case, to prostitutes or unmarried women (vv. 3-5). The same lessons are featured in verses 6-8a: it is the mark of a fool to hand over control to another. The punishment is to "go down in blood to the grave" (v. 9). This expression (see Prov 2:18; 7:27) probably refers to the death penalty inflicted on adulterers (see Lev 20:10).

The verses on the choice of friends (vv. 10-16) add to the discussion of 6:5-17. The negatives (vv. 10-13) are filled with sound advice. Ben Sira counsels patience, implicitly, concerning the inevitable punishment of sinners (v. 11). Verse 13 recalls Matt 10:28: Avoid the one who can kill both body and soul. The snares and net are pictures taken from bird-hunting.

The positives (vv. 14-16) connect wisdom with holiness, and counsel good companions as the great road to growth in wisdom—timely advice in any age.

9:17–10:5 Wisdom in rulers. This is the sixth and concluding section on the pursuit of wisdom, begun in 4:11.

Ben Sira here compares good rulers with evil ones (9:17–10:3) and then speaks of God as the source of wisdom (vv. 4-5). In the first section the skill of artisans is a kind of manual wisdom. The rash speech of verse 18 reminds one that rulers whose speech is rash or uncontrolled are not successful. The order of 10:1 reflects God's own order in the universe. The traditional proverbial style of 10:2 recalls other proverbs: Like mother, like daughter, etc. God's majesty or glory (v. 5) is a theme seen later in the book, and manifests divine choice and protection.

Lessons on Pride, Violence, and Wealth (10:6–15:10)

10:6–11:28 Eight discourses on pride. These are divided thus: 10:6-18; 10:19-26; 10:27–11:1; 11:2-6; 11:7-9; 11:10-13; 11:14-19; 11:20-28. The first, on the sin of pride, deals also with the violence that can accompany pride. Apparently Ben Sira believes that to act freely involves acting violently (v. 6). The motives in verses 7-8 are that both God and the chosen people hate arrogance, and that history shows that dominion has been transferred to other states.

"Dust and ashes" is a traditional expression for lowliness and the human condition; this is reinforced in verse 10. (Some translations speak here of disease that mocks the doctor's skill.) The origins of pride (vv. 12-13a) point to a central idea: withdrawal from God into self mocks the divine order of the universe and is therefore the worst sort of idolatry. The punishments are the traditional reversals (vv. 14-16) in plant imagery. Two statements (vv. 17-18) conclude the lesson, the second being the stronger.

The second lesson (vv. 19-26) contrasts with verses 6-18. Here Ben Sira has collected various comments reminiscent of rote lessons. The saying in verse 19 is complex, with the English translation making sense of the Hebrew and Greek texts: "can be" means that the human state can be honorable or dishonorable; "are" refers to the certainty of the state of those who fear God or not. In verses 20-21 Ben Sira teaches that personal honor, despite one's social state, comes from honoring God. Since the "poor" fear God alone, they have great honor (vv. 22-23).

The third discourse (10:27–11:1) opens with a theme and a typical introduction, "my son." The question-and-answer format (vv. 28-30) is common in wisdom literature, recalling the scholastic origin of much of Ben Sira's writing. He concludes by going against the upper-class ethic evident elsewhere in his work: wisdom is common to all classes (11:1).

The fourth lesson treats of deceptive appearances (11:2-6). Reflection on the popular proverb on the bee should cause a student to realize that, despite appearances, the bee is a beneficial creature. Likewise, appearances in human beings can deceive. The wheel of fortune (see also 20:10) is not a biblical expression but a way of understanding human experience. The upper-class comments here are apt for Ben Sira's students.

The fifth lesson, on imprudent speech, is very brief (vv. 7-9) and presents a common-sense approach, contrary to the "shoot first, ask questions later" method. The author's usual insistence on maintaining one's proper place (v. 9) involves a sense of the ancient (non-biblical) rule called the Golden Mean, "Nothing to excess."

The sixth lesson (vv. 10-13) deals with self-made men. The sentences in verse 10 recall the Golden Mean and show that violating it brings a curse of futility. "Seek and find" here recalls the gospel injunction to seek and find God. A series of comparisons (vv. 11-13) shows that the Lord, not fate, is the source of one's success, almost passively so. This is not the whole story for the author, since he also encourages one to pursue wisdom actively.

The seventh discourse (vv. 14-19) treats of wealth and death. In the face of the proverbs here, it is difficult to see the role of human freedom. Ben Sira also teaches that God is in some way the source of all, even evil, death, and poverty. Possibly the author is quoting a popular proverb and contrasting it with verses 15-16. The miserliness of a rich man is ultimately foolish, since this man has not reckoned with God's control of all events (this lesson recalls Luke 12:19).

In the eighth and final discourse (vv. 20-28), Ben Sira speaks of wealth and loss. His basic message is: Do your job, that is, stay at the post assigned you in God's plan, a plan with its own time (v. 21). Ben Sira also speaks to the vexing experience of the (apparent) success of the wicked, a problem faced in all wisdom literature. Ben Sira answers by pointing to the judgment (v. 27) to take place at the end of life. Recall that this judgment does not pertain to life after death.

Warnings Against Exploitation (11:29–13:13)

11:29-34 Exploitation by strangers. The caged bird (v. 30) suggests that this innocent bird is to attract wild birds into a trap. The stain resulting from evil does not describe sin (v. 33) but simply the ruin to come. Ben Sira concludes with a reversal of fortune: if you lodge a stranger, you will become a stranger in turn. The gospel teaches a more open-handed hospitality, but Ben Sira's focus differs here.

12:1-7 Exploitation by the recipient of alms. This passage is simply constructed in terms of opposites, the theme (v. 1) being thoughtful and ordered charity as befits the wise. The rewards are stated as opposites: they come from the Lord (v. 2) and not from the wicked (v. 3). Ben Sira's advice consists in asserting motives for behavior (vv. 5-6): reversal of fortune (arms against you) and double evil. The conclusion is very general, not specific to this brief section.

12:8-18 Exploitation by enemies. This lesson is quite elaborate by contrast, particularly with the symbols (vv. 13-17). The theme (v. 8) can better be understood by reversing its order: in prosperity enemies will remain concealed; in adversity we can know our true friends. The author advises not trusting mere appearances, applying the theme in verse 9 and using an example from daily life: a bronze mirror needs constant care and, once pitted with corrosion, cannot be easily polished. The personal comments (v. 12) are surprising here, bringing us clearly into the classroom.

Lessons about snakes and handlers (vv. 13-17) are applied to the same issues, opening with a rhetorical question, the answer being that either no one or only a fool will pity him.

The applications of the lesson (vv. 14-17) echo the teaching of the prophets to keep one's life virtuous both externally and internally. To plunge one into the abyss (v. 16) means to bring one to death. The conclusion (v. 18) parallels the theme statement about true friends and a true face. The actions (nod, clap, hiss) are intended as signs of derision, mentioned elsewhere in the Old Testament, but not in Sirach.

13:1-7 Exploitation by the rich. The opening statement may conclude the previous lesson but can be understood well enough as a part of this one. The form is traditional: a lesson from nature and its application to daily living. The following verse is similar in style but contains a comparison known to the earlier Greek author Aesop; it is possible that his writings formed part of Ben Sira's education.

A series of examples follows (vv. 3-7), pointing out that riches can cause one to let down personal safeguards and become violent, contrary to the stance proper to the wise. The reversal of the moral order (the poor man must ask forgiveness when he should rather be seeking redress) is an enormous evil, since God's designs are subverted, even temporarily. The gesture of shaking the head is, as in 12:18, one of disrespect or cursing.

13:8-13 Exploitation by the powerful. This lesson recalls Prov 25:6-7 as well as Luke 14:8-11. Ben Sira uses a pattern here similar to previous sections: introduction, examples, results, conclusions. His examples (vv. 9-11a) are basically comments of human wisdom and recall even Egyptian thinking known to us from ancient sources. These may not have been Ben Sira's direct source, but these connections at least reflect the international character of wise teachings. The psychological tone of verses 11b-12 is typical of the author's close observation of human behavior, seen often in his book.

13:14–14:19 Lessons on wealth. Ben Sira is clearly of the upper class, and has had the advantages of broad experience, travel, and other opportunities. This leads him to look at wealth with wise discernment, condemning excesses and approving what is good.

The introductory or thematic statements (13:14-15) in Ben Sira's lesson on equals (vv. 14-19) advise that people should keep to their own station in life. This conservative position comes from his theological conviction that God has given people their lot in life, and to act against this is a mark of folly. The examples (vv. 16-18) are known from other ancient literature. Ben Sira does not counsel class warfare (v. 17) but emphasizes observance of law to avoid the evils inherent in differences of class and outlook. Note the connection he makes between the rich and the proud (v. 19); the two conditions of life are similar.

The three verses here on support for the rich (vv. 20-22) point to the paradoxes of living with differences. Verse 20 is quite pessimistic but may be a common proverb explained and expanded by the two succeeding verses. There is almost a comic tone to the word picture in verse 22.

Ben Sira's teaching on a clear conscience (13:23–14:2) is probably connected to what has preceded, showing some good in wealth. The proverb in verse 23 can, like other proverbs, be taken apart and reassembled to show the inherent paradoxes: wealth is evil by the standard of the just, poverty is good when there is no sin. This method is one of the ways open to wisdom students to delve into the possibilities of proverbs. The final verses (14:1-2), in the form of a beatitude, are only loosely connected to the rest of this section.

The theme of the subsection on the bad use of wealth (14:3-10) basically leads to issues of being generous with self and others, that is, taking one's full place in society (see 39:1-11). The remaining parts of the lesson are examples. Verse 4 recalls Luke 12:16-21, where others inherit piled-up wealth. The old concept of automatic punishment occurs in verse 6: by God's design each evil act carries with it its own punishment. Verses 7-10 are lessons about miserliness. The miser's eye (v. 10) repeats the same expression, translated "opinion" (v. 8). Note the curse of reversal of fortune in verse 9.

In his teaching on the good use of wealth (vv. 11-19), Ben Sira is no Christian ascetic, practicing evangelical poverty. Rather, he acknowledges the wealth and position of his disciples and counsels them on the best way to live in their conditions. First of all, enjoy wealth (v. 11, the theme). The motive, surprisingly, is the approach of death. The "covenant of Hades" (or Sheol, the Hebrew term) is the literal translation of the Hebrew text and refers to the decree of the date of one's death, determined of old by God. The wise will understand that there exists a time for everything. Ben Sira, here as elsewhere, shows his very traditional view of death (v. 16): no joys in any afterlife.

The lesson concludes in traditional ways. The proverb in verse 17 is found in Gen 2:16-17 and elsewhere. The teaching of verse 18, a lesson from nature and its application, is very similar to Homer's text in the Iliad. Indeed, Ben Sira may even have borrowed the text, aware of it from his own education. The handiwork that follows (v. 19) refers to one's work, but not to other goods—family, reputation, example. (See also Rev 14:13, where one's goods also follow.)

14:20–15:10 Associating with wisdom. The extended beatitude in 14:20-27 presents a series of verses extolling the pursuit and nearness of virtue, done in a style more Eastern than Western—giving a multiple impression rather than a clearly logical expression. The picture is evidently of a suitor who eventually gains the object of his desire, moving from pursuit (v. 22) to living with (v. 27). The symbols here will be resumed in 51:13-30.

To "meditate" (v. 20) implies not simply quiet prayer but pondering, working through the meanings of teachings, and examining proverbs and human experience in wisdom fashion (see also Psalm 1).

The author's teachings on good and evil men (15:1-10) open with a theme statement (v. 1) that clearly identifies wisdom with the observance of the law (joining 14:20-27 with this section). This identification is quite characteristic of Ben Sira's teaching. Calling wisdom both mother and bride (v. 2) does not convey any opposition but is simply a parallel expression typical of Hebrew poetry. The bread and water (v. 3) simply bespeak the nourishment coming from wisdom: understanding is like bread, and learning like life-giving water. As a result (vv. 4-6), wisdom never fails and gives an eternal reward (literally, "eternal name" or "reputation"). Note that the reward here is not eternal life. "Joy and gladness" recall for some scholars the vocabulary of the Greek Stoic philosophers, with which the author may have been familiar.

By contrast (vv. 7-8), the wicked never attain wisdom. The four terms here—worthless, haughty, impious, liars—are not four categories of sins but are Hebrew parallel expressions. Ben Sira concludes (vv. 9-10) by contrasting the sinner and the wise. Likewise, he identifies the wise with the pious, joining wisdom and true worship. The ability to offer praise is itself a gift from God.

Lessons on Sin and Sorrow (15:11–18:13)

15:11-20 Free will. This important teaching opens with negatives: God is not the source of human sin. This assertion contrasts with others in Sirach about God as the source of both evil and good (see 11:14; 16:26-28). The theme statement (v. 13) sets the tone, both as to the origin of evil and its power to reach the virtuous. Ben Sira's lesson on free will (vv. 14-15) is key for later theological developments. For him free will goes back to the beginning of creation and forms part of human nature. Thus good and evil cannot be forced on us. "Free choice" translates a Hebrew term understood by the rabbis as "inclination," either to good or evil; for the author the term has a neutral meaning (see also 21:11, "impulses").

The text closes with a set of assertions about God's wisdom and power (vv. 18-20). Even though powerful (v. 18), God does not command one to sin, nor does God even give the power to sin (v. 20). That we do have the power to sin is not considered by Ben Sira, nor does he give his readers a complete theology of free will.

16:1-14 Certainty of punishment. Ben Sira opens with examples taken from child-rearing (vv. 1-4). He basically teaches that it is better to have a few (or even no) pious children than many who are sinners. Sinners with many children might say, "Since I have children, I know that God has blessed me." The author denies this implication. In the Hebrew mind, the short life of sinners is their curse; it appears that Ben Sira believes that for some people there is no possibility of conversion. Verse 4, a short summary proverb, reshapes Prov 11:11.

A personal expression such as that in verse 5 is rare for Ben Sira; here it refers to verse 4 (see also 12:12). Also rare is his choice of various examples from the history of Israel (vv. 6-10), unknown in the book except for the historical section beginning in chapter 44. The examples he chooses are more allusions than direct historical commentary: verse 6 on the rebellion of Korah (see Num 16:35); the leaders (v. 7) appear as "giants" in other translations (see Gen 6:4); the Canaanites are the doomed people (v. 9), seemingly denied free will in Ben Sira's mind; and the six hundred thousand are the Israelites who murmured in the desert (see Num 11:21).

Despite his belief that the Canaanites were doomed (v. 9), Ben Sira holds out the possibility of mercy (vv. 11-14). God is completely impartial; the wicked simply refuse to repent (v. 12). Examples (vv. 13-14) conclude the section to prove his point.

16:15-21 Lack of escape. In this third set of reflections, the author follows his normal pattern: introduction, theme, application, conclusion. The "world of spirits," an unusual expression, means the world of living human beings, that is, creatures who live because of the spirit they have. The theme (vv. 16-17) reviews parts of the visible creation: heaven (sky); heaven of heavens (God's realm beyond the sky; see 1 Kgs 8:27); earth (the world as we know it); abyss (the area below the world, including both seas and the abode of the dead). That the mountains shake (v. 17) is typical of the presence of God (see Hab 3:6). For one to say that God does not know about him/her, since God is so great and he/she is so small, is to deny God's omnipotence; this is justly condemned as foolish (vv. 18-20).

16:22–17:12 Divine concern visible in creation. The introduction is in very solemn form, in the first person (vv. 22-23), similar to 39:12-35 and 42:15–43:33. Some scholars see here a major introduction to a much larger section of Sirach, running to 23:27.

The theme (vv. 24-25) is that all creation is ordered and has its place. This shows divine wisdom existing before creation (as in Prov 8:22-31). The examples (vv. 26-28) bring the reader through a catalogue of creation: stars (v. 26), plants (v. 27), animals (v. 28). The animals return to earth eventually (as in Ps 104:29); presumably, for Ben Sira humans have the same end.

A second theme statement (17:1) continues the series in nature, from stars to plants to animals and finally to human beings. This reflects the order of creation as given in Gen 1. "God's own image" (vv. 2-8) is explained in a series of simple explanations. After life we return to the earth (v. 2); there is a hierarchy of power over objects (vv. 3-4); we have the ability to think and the means to do so (v. 5). In verse 6 there is a shift about good and evil: we are given wisdom and can know how to distinguish between good and evil, as in Gen 3:22.

With this wisdom we are shown God's works (v. 7), and the ultimate purpose is praise, the acknowledgment of God's power coming from a contemplation of his works (see Rom 1:20-23, where pagans are condemned for not perceiving God through creation). Ben Sira concludes his review of creation with a reflection on the great gift of the law (vv. 9-11). Through Moses, God revealed his commands to Israel (vv. 10-11). In summary, Ben Sira gives his version of the two great commands of the law (v. 12): Avoid all evil, both toward God and toward fellow creatures.

17:13-19 The certainty of judgment. This small lesson continues the section on sin, judgment, repentance, and God's mercy begun in 15:11. Through his theme Ben Sira enunciates God's knowledge of all people (v. 13), and then follows up with reasons: Israel is the Lord's special portion, and God knows both good and bad actions. Possibly verse 14 is a common saying, since it does not fit the context too well here, but it recalls the apportioning of the nations among the deities (see Deut 32:8 and Dan 10:13 for this ancient theme). Also, Ben Sira rarely mentions Israel, apart from the historical section beginning in chapter 44.

The reward of the good (vv. 17-19) usually happens later; the wicked apparently are often rewarded immediately. Yet God does not act capriciously and has no favorites who are protected from the effects of their sin. For the sinner, however, there is always a way back (v. 19). This final verse may belong with verse 20, but in any case it is a sort of pivot around which the two sections revolve.

17:20–18:13 Sorrow and God's mercy. The theme (v. 20) continues with the exhortation to hate what God hates (that is, sin and unjust living). The dead cannot praise God from their place in the nether world, so praise God now. Ben Sira mentions the nether world, not to give a clear idea of a separate place for the dead, but to say that the individuals are truly dead.

The assurance of forgiveness begins with a psalm of praise in the format characteristic of other psalms. A major theme is God's incomparability (vv. 25-27): God has no peer, and human beings, by comparison, are "dust and ashes" (see Gen 18:27 for Abraham's view of himself).

The psalm continues with an assertion emphasizing the mercy of God, a characteristic of acts of praise. A similar form is the question about comparability: no one or nothing is like God (see 17:25). In the same vein, contrasts with human weakness point up the greatness of God (vv. 6-8). The question "What is man?" (v. 6) recalls Ps 8:5 and Job 7:17; the age of human life contrasts with the figure seventy or eighty of Ps 90:10. The conclusions (vv. 9-13) contain a surprising assertion about the universal mercy of God, mentioned here for the first time in the Old Testament, and contrasting even with a kind of predestination that has appeared previously in Sirach (16:9, for example). Also appearing here for the first time is the teaching that God's mercy is instructive, that is, one can learn of God's love and care through his acts of mercy toward oneself or others.

Counsels About Behavior (18:14–23:27)

18:14-29 Uses of caution. The few verses on charity (vv. 14-17) teach that one's charity should be complete, and exercised without harshness. The lessons (vv. 15-16) come from nature, and the conclusion is in the poetic and elevated style of literary proverbs.

The author then turns to a series of instructions on forethought (vv. 18-29). His practical advice on acting in good time resembles the gospel lesson on the man building a tower (Luke 14:28-30). A specific example of forethought is the question of vows (vv. 22-23; see also Eccl 5:2-6). A theologically important verse (v. 24) deals with the problem of evil in the world. For Ben Sira, God's face is hidden. This is an uncommon expression in Sirach and means that God allows evil to happen while not causing it. (To show one's face means to act with kindness.)

The formal conclusion (vv. 28-29) is that the wise are to make wisdom known and to praise her. This involves making their own gift of wisdom known, not hiding their light under a bushel (see Mark 4:21 and parallels). The wise will dispense proverbs (as in 8:8) for the benefit of others and the praise of God.

18:30–19:16 Self-control. After a theme verse (v. 30), Ben Sira offers traditional thinking on the punishment coming from lack of self-control in sexual matters: what causes pleasure will eventually cause pain. It is not quite clear how momentary pleasure will bring on poverty, other than through extravagant living (v. 32). Self-control in food and drink is urged; the apparent reason is simply the possible loss of control that would result from immoderate living—not a preferred condition for the wise. (The events in the story of the prodigal son, Luke 15:11-32, parallel the development here.)

Wine and women can also cause one to lose self-control (vv. 1-4). The theme in verse 1b is a type of ancient proverb, parallel to Prov 23:20-21. The text of verses 2-4 in the New American Bible places verse 4 before verse 3 to make a better flow. When one is giddy there is no self-control, and the wise person can no longer be thoughtful. Ben Sira appreciates merriment and enjoyment but wants to maintain control. "Contumacious desire" (v. 3), that is, reckless or stubborn desire, is an expression not used elsewhere in Sirach. From Ben Sira's perspective, desire also destroys in a kind of reversal, since desire for something else will eventually consume the one who desires. "Rottenness and worms" (v. 3) possibly refers to venereal diseases coming from sexual indulgence.

Self-control in speech (vv. 5-11) opens with a proverb and application (v. 5), and continues on to various lessons (vv. 6-8). Although Ben Sira values friendship, he knows where to be cautious (vv. 7-8). The comparisons in verses 10-11 both refer to the need to remove quickly what is lodged within.

All the sentences on rash judgment (vv. 12-16) have the same general thrust: if you do admonish, know that the person may be innocent, or if guilty, may take the admonition in good spirits. The exception is verse 15, which appears to be an extended commentary on the series, like a teacher's comment in class. The reference to law in the concluding summary (v. 16b) probably is meant generically, with no specific command in mind.

Making Right Distinctions (19:17–20:30)

19:17-26 True and false wisdom. The distinctive Torah wisdom of the Book of Sirach appears in the theme (v. 17); this may have been linked with verse 16b just above, on fulfillment of the law. If so, the method of using key words or ideas helps students to progress through the material of the book. There is also a false knowledge (vv. 18-21), and the author makes distinctions between knowledge, prudence, shrewdness, and intelligence in the righteous, and those same apparent qualities in sinners. The difference is that the truly wise also fear (that is, believe and worship) the Lord.

The word picture of one man (vv. 22-24) brings to mind the injunction of Isaiah: ". . . honors me with their lips alone, though their hearts are far from me" (Isa 29:13; also Matt 15:8). Common sense tells what a person truly is interiorly, despite appearance. Fools may be deceived, and they may also try to deceive (vv. 25-26). Compare this also with 13:25, where natural signs can tell what one truly is.

20:1-7 Speech and silence. The lessons (vv. 2-3) include a "better" proverb and a memorable simile on eunuchs. This latter probably came from court life, where eunuchs were kept to guard the women's quarters. The simile amuses in a bawdy way and speaks of one's results being frustrated.

The comparisons on silence point to paradoxes in life. They show modern readers more of Ben Sira's psychological sensitivity, mentioned elsewhere. The lesson of verse 6 echoes a general theme in Sirach about right order and the proper time to act. This mirrors God's order of the universe.

20:8-16 Paradoxes of reality. This third collection of sayings on proper distinctions (begun in 19:17) presents general paradoxes (vv. 8-11) and lessons on the wise and the fool (vv. 12-16).

In general, paradoxes by their very nature point to real life: it isn't everything it seems. The wise should learn that life is paradoxical at times and should delve below surface appearances. The concept of "wheel of fortune" is not biblical, but something like it comes through here: one day up, down the next (v. 10). This reflects the incompleteness and tentative nature of human life.

The next few verses present a series of contrasts between the wise and the fool. The two verses on the rogue (vv. 13-14) complete the lesson in verse 9 on gifts. The final verses (vv. 15-16) speak of the realization, known from ancient times, that for both good and evil their present lot in life can be reversed. The curse here comes to the generous fool: the recipients of his ill-gotten goods turn on him. (This lesson recalls 18:14-17.)

20:17-30 Proper and improper speech. The introduction (vv. 17-19) mentions the proverb itself, stock in trade of the wise, who also know when to use it; they have a sense of God's order and the right time to act. The basis for the judgment on lies (vv. 23-25) is that lies bring about their own punishment, entrapping liars in further lies. One's standing in the community is ruined thereby. Similarly, in verses 26-30 appropriate speech will help the wise to advance themselves, and prosperity will be their reward. The fact that doing evil results in shame and doing good results in prosperity points to the wise ordering by God of all reality.

21:1-10 Avoid sin. The religious tone here strikes the modern reader strangely, since it is a feature often absent from other wisdom writings. The theological introduction teaches that forgiveness is possible through prayer and reformation of life. Elsewhere Ben Sira mentions sacrifices and good acts as accomplishing the same end. But the lesson here contrasts with his teaching that the foolish (that is, the wicked) seem destined to live and die in their sins.

Ben Sira does not define or describe sin but only compares its effects on the sinner to the destructive effects of sharp and pointed objects (vv. 2-3). His teaching in verses 5-7 links the poor with those denied justice. As immediately above, the author offers no definition of the poor, yet he is conscious of them and their needs (see 4:1-8; 10:21-26; 13:18-22, for example).

In the comparisons of verses 8-10, the implication is always that unjust activities lead to death. "Tow" (v. 9) is an easily flammable fabric used to give shape to a torch and meant to be burned. The "smooth stones" (v. 10) are also pleasant to the just and may tempt them. Yet, note that Ben Sira also teaches that the end of both the just and sinners is the nether world without discrimination (see 14:16). The difference in reward lies either in the miserable end of sinners or in the extinction of their memory.

The Wise and the Fool (21:11–22:18)

21:11-18 Contrasts. The teaching of the theme (v. 11) is the "Torah wisdom" typical of the Book of Sirach: wisdom is not just secular skill or diplomacy. The "impulses" may refer to the Hebrew concept of the inborn tendency to good or evil that we all possess. (The Hebrew text of this chapter is unfortunately lacking, so the reference here cannot be precisely stated; yet the concept is known in late Old Testament and rabbinic writings.)

The comparisons (vv. 12-17) seem to be a series of disconnected proverbs, perhaps original to Ben Sira or his students, on the same subject. The concept of teachability appears here (v. 12) and in the next section (v. 18). Note also the automatic process of evil: evil committed comes down upon the evildoer eventually (vv. 27-28).

22:1-18 The lazy and the foolish. A very vivid comparison sets the theme for the discussion of various types of foolish behaviors (vv. 1-2, recalled in v. 13). Typically the author prescribes very rough treatment for daughters (see also 42:9-14 for a more extended but similar discussion). Women in general have value only as they help and support their father or husband. Verse 6 is a general conclusion, applicable to sons and daughters alike.

The difficulty (or impossibility) of teaching a fool forms the theme of verses 7-15 (as in 21:18-21). The obvious lesson of verses 7-8 is to avoid culpable fools; being with them is a waste of time. This approach contrasts strongly with the gospel teaching of love and care for all; even the ignorant deserve help. The basis for Ben Sira's harsh judgment lies in commonsense observation, not in theology. Verses 9-11 should be read together. The sense is not readily clear, but it need not be in order to engage the student in pondering reality. One conclusion is: Better to be dead than to be a fool.

Verses 14-15 are a riddle, a device rarely used in the Bible but a form of education and entertainment then and now. Here the riddle presents experience in a question form (v. 14) and applies the answers to the lesson. The last sentences (vv. 16-18) are a fitting conclusion and are of the same type: experience (v. 16) and application (v. 17). The comparison is well wrought, like the wall in the proverb. Verse 18 resumes verse 1 as a contrast and concludes verse 17.

22:19-26 Preserving friendship. The friendship here evidently exists between males, but it can be applied equally to females. Ben Sira made several contributions to the literature of friendship (see 6:5-17; 19:12-14; 37:1-6). The opening verses (vv. 19-20) follow the traditional pattern of experience and application; verses 21-22 show that reconciliation is possible. The gospel calls for a higher perfection, beyond mere human forgiveness. In his typical fashion (v. 23) Ben Sira puts forth self-interest as a motive. (Verse 24 seems out of place here.) The final sentences (vv. 25-26) change perspective. Treating friends well summarizes the section.

22:27–23:27 Prayer and teaching on sins of speech and lust. This remarkable section concludes the long series on discretion in behaviors begun in 18:14. The prayers here and elsewhere in the Book of Sirach are unusual, since such passages do not normally appear in wisdom literature; these are very personal and true to life, whereas other wisdom books are generally abstract and impersonal.

The questions in 22:27 and 23:2 come from the traditional language of praise; they expect the answer "God alone." They also imply that personally it is impossible to avoid sin (see also Ps 141:3). There are some echoes of original sin here, in its passions and lack of control. Petitions follow (vv. 1, 4-6), acknowledging a personal relationship with God, not just as an abstraction (the Creator of the universe) but as a personal Deity. Also, Ben Sira appears to be the first writer to address God as "Father." This also contrasts with Old Testament wisdom, which is more about God than addressed to God. (The only other prayer is in Prov 30:7-9.)

The "brazen look" (v. 5) and the lifting up of the eyes are not signs of pride but of lust

(as in 26:9, where the woman acts wantonly).

In verses 7-15 we have an extensive instruction on this topic, with the kinds of distinctions students must learn. The theme (v. 8) also shows a sense of punishment for sin as being involved in the act itself. The "Holy Name" (vv. 9-10) is the divine name of God, gradually drawn out of common speech; in Ben Sira's time it was still apparently used by some in oaths.

Verses 11-12 offer similar lessons on the types of words. The motive is simply: it isn't done. The reason is that the wise are also the just, and thus the wise avoid all sins (as in v. 13).

The discussion on sins of lust (vv. 16-27) is impressive, contrasting men with women. The women, true to Ben Sira's form, come out badly. The theme (v. 16) typically compares lust to fire. What is atypical is the numerical form (introduced here for the first time in Sirach). In verses 19-21 Ben Sira deals with punishment. The answer to the question is: "God alone" can see. The one who questions in this way is a fool, and should have known the answer. The "eyes of the Lord" is an unusual figure, but they should be understood as searchlights blazing rather than as receivers of light or windows to the soul.

Women sinners (vv. 22-26) receive greater condemnation than men, since, according to Ben Sira, the first woman broke the law; even her children will suffer. This teaching should be contrasted with that of Jesus in the Gospel according to John, where the adulterous woman is forgiven and her male accusers leave shamefaced (John 8:1-11).

Verse 27 concludes the whole section, perhaps even the first half of the book according to some scholars. Some suggest that Ben Sira originally concluded his work here, emphasizing anew the connection between law and wisdom. One would expect the conclusion "nothing is better than wisdom" rather than "nothing is better than the fear of the Lord."

Attractive and Hateful Things (24:1–36:17)

24:1-31 A treatise on wisdom. After a brief introduction (vv. 1-2), Ben Sira reports an address of wisdom (vv. 3-21) and comments on wisdom and the law (vv. 22-31). Chapter 8 of the Book of Proverbs is a model for this entire section, connected with it in its use of both terms and themes. The introduction (vv. 1-2) opens the discourse speaking about wisdom; and then wisdom herself, in the heavenly council, speaks to her own people, the people of Israel, understood as assembled in Jerusalem.

The main feature of the section is the address of wisdom (vv. 3-21), which speaks of wisdom's origins being rooted in Israel, and offers an elaborate series of comparisons, closing with a summons to partake of wisdom. The origin of wisdom (vv. 3-7) is in God; wisdom is not a being separate in origin from God. The perspective is that wisdom is basically a word or utterance from God. The description of wisdom is poetic and should not be pressed for firm details. After her creation, wisdom scours the universe high (the vault of heaven) and low (the deep abyss), looking for a dwelling. That wisdom is feminine is a natural development from the feminine gender of the Hebrew hokmah; but this may also fulfill some need to see a female side to the Deity.

God commands (vv. 8-12) a residence in Israel. The subordination of wisdom to God is quite clear here: wisdom is God's gift to Israel. The comparisons (vv. 13-17) run the range of human senses (touch, sight, taste, smell) and refer to Israel both north (Lebanon) and south (Jericho). The perfumes recall the act of priestly anointing (Exod 30:23-24). Amid all this beauty (vv. 18-21), wisdom calls out, almost as a street vendor would. Verse 20 appears to contradict human experience—those who need to eat should be filled; but the focus here is on the increasing pleasure in partaking of wisdom.

The next section (vv. 22-31) associates wisdom with the law, a most important theme in the Book of Sirach. Verse 22 quotes Deut 33:4, showing that the Torah in particular, but also the rest of Scripture, commanded by God as Israel's inheritance, is true wisdom (see v. 8). Ben Sira is the major figure in Israel to equate law with wisdom and to draw forth its implications. More comparisons follow: of wisdom with rivers—here the seasons change from Pishon (winter) to Tigris (spring) to Jordan (summer) to Gihon (fall). The order of the universe is God's.

In verses 27-31 Ben Sira gives a major first-person account, nearly unique in biblical books (except, possibly, Jeremiah). The symbolism continues the water theme above. Ben Sira's words are as vast as a sea. His meaning is like the prophecy of old, an interesting connection of wisdom teaching with the prophets. At root, both prophet and wise teacher interpret reality for the people under divine guidance.

25:1-11 Numerical proverbs. The movement in the introductory verse (v. 1) moves concentrically from brethren (probably Israelites) to neighbors (in town) to husband and wife (the family). This section is in the first person, an unusual occurrence. The next verse (v. 2) is not concentric but speaks of the persons who are the opposite of those in verse 1: the proud man disrupts harmony; the dissembler is lying, devious, and disrupts friendship; the lewd man destroys family love. There is also a contrast between being proud and a pauper; this is fundamentally against divine wisdom, since it violates the established order of life. The detail in this one verse demonstrates how these little proverbs could be examined from various viewpoints.

Verses 3-6 expand and explain verse 2; it appears possible that the preceding two verses are traditional, and Ben Sira adds verses 3-6 himself.

The numerical proverbs (vv. 7-10) have the usual form of one number followed by the next greater. Here there are actually ten persons mentioned. This is a mixed group, including both the fortunate (vv. 7b-8a) and the pious (v. 8b). The reference to the unequal animals is an application of Deut 22:10 to married life. There is an important conclusion in the case of the tenth man. Ben Sira places fear of the Lord as greater than wisdom (see v. 11). The teaching somewhat contradicts the praises of the uncreated wisdom of God living in Israel, known elsewhere in the book.

25:12–26:18 Lessons on good and evil women. This section has mixed passages on good and evil, and some scholars prefer to place them together, not separated as the present text shows. Possibly Ben Sira did so, but the oppositions in the passages point up significant contrasts.

In verses 12-25 there is no question that Ben Sira had a very negative view of women. Verses 12-14 offer a series of comparisons, including women as the source of evil for men. In verse 14 there is the typical form of experience (serpent) and application (the spite of women). In the comparisons in verses 15-17, women fare worse. Ben Sira has obviously given close psychological attention to men with family problems.

After an assertion of the greatness of evil in women (v. 18), the author turns to some assorted proverbs (vv. 19-22), probably collected, or at least adapted, by him. In verse 23 we have the first place outside Genesis where sin is ascribed to Eve. Elsewhere the origin of sin was regarded as the result of the cohabitation of evil heavenly beings with human women (Gen 6:1-4). Ben Sira's point of view is picked up by Paul.

The conclusion (vv. 24-25) teaches that a husband is to control his wife and should divorce an evil wife. The expression in Greek for divorce is a very violent one, unknown in other biblical books.

These verses (26:1-4) discuss the good wife in general, but only from the viewpoint of her husband. As in other passages in the book, women are not valued on their own. Numerical proverbs (vv. 5-6) are so framed to show that the jealous wife is worse than the preceding three evils.

Verses 7-12 present some of Ben Sira's most bitter comments. Note that he has no comparable section on evil husbands, though the evils of various classes of men are discussed widely in the book. The "bad wife" and the "drunken wife" are unknown figures elsewhere in the Old Testament. Ben Sira gives advice in verses 10-12 on watching over such a wife. The concluding verse (v. 12) is a surprisingly obscene statement, unique in biblical language (but parallel to the prophetic indictments in Ezek 23, among others).

The good wife appears again in verses 13-18, treated more precisely this time than in verses 1-4. Still, the focus is on the husband. To show the value Ben Sira puts on a smoothly running relationship, he compares a good wife to the temple, a very high blessing indeed; the columns recall the desert tabernacle in Exod 26. (Note that in some manuscripts a passage partly composed of quotations from Proverbs appears here. The exact numbering of the verses and their placement here and elsewhere in Sirach are a cause of confusion to modern readers.)

Sins and Sinners (26:19–28:6)

Verse 19 is a numerical proverb, possibly out of place here but connecting in some way with what follows concerning business dealings.

26:20–27:3 Business dealings. In verse 20 Ben Sira asserts the difficulty of maintaining justice in business transactions. The shopkeeper or merchant is rarely mentioned in the Old Testament; and there is very little in the Bible about fair business dealings, apart from the early prophets, such as Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah. Verses 1-3 continue this brief discussion.

Verses 4-10 constitute a digression of sorts, following up on the suggestion of the last few verses about honest living. These verses speak of testing to find one's real character. An important statement follows (v. 8) on the possibility of attaining justice. Comparisons (vv. 9-10) show the familiar experience-application method of proverbs.

Ben Sira continues with a lesson on sinful speech (vv. 11-15). Here the wise are associated with the pious, a viewpoint typical of Ben Sira. There are problems with the speech of the godless. It comes from a godless and disordered spirit, and is seen from the multiplicity of oaths (that is, offensive cursing). The result is bloodshed. This picture is perhaps taken from a tavern filled with evil men, whose drinking and wild behavior lead to quarrels, bloodshed, and even death.

Secrets and friendship (vv. 16-21) change the scene to relations among friends. Once secrets are betrayed (v. 16), nothing can repair the evil done; the experience of the bird released (v. 19) and the swift desert gazelle is applied here. This section closes with a summary statement (v. 21).

The following section on deceit (vv. 22-29) is nearly a standard model of Ben Sira's method: theme (vv. 22-23)—the deceitful person will ruin you; comparisons (vv. 24-27)—stones, a pit, a snare; conclusion (vv. 28-29). In the last two verses Ben Sira outlines a theory of retribution that undergirds his entire presentation, namely, that evil necessarily brings about its own kind of punishment. God is not the direct source of retribution; rather, the divine order has established the system (shown by the comparisons in verses 24-27).

27:30–28:7 Vengeance. The introductory theme (28:1) should be compared with Lev 19:17-18, which counsels one not to take revenge, basically the same message as Ben Sira's. Verses 1-2 involve a reversal of fortune, a typical form of divine punishment. Here the vengeful will have vengeance shown them (itself a reversal of the beatitudes of the Gospels). The next three verses (vv. 3-5) illustrate reversals. In verses 6-7 Ben Sira uses a form of education common in the Old Testament: remember! To do so, his students need a history of some sort, either personal or national, to reflect on.

28:8-11 Strife. This is an additional section with the usual plan: theme (avoid strife, v. 8a), motives (vv. 8b-9), applications based on experience (vv. 10-11). This lesson probably illustrates a common teaching method of the period.

28:12-26 Slander and an evil tongue. This section represents a development in Old Testament teaching, one not dealt with elsewhere, at least in such eloquent detail. Verses 12-16 speak of slander, and verses 17-26 of the evil tongue. Both sections open with lessons from nature and include observations on proper and improper speech.

Both life and death come from the mouth; the abuse of its power makes one "double-tongued" (v. 13), an expression occurring only in Sirach and once in Proverbs. In verse 15 virtuous women have been cast out (divorced) on account of slander of a "third tongue" (following the Greek text); thus they are cut off from their children and household.

The perspective is reversed in verses 18-23, turning from the one who slanders to the victims of evil speech. This involves a kind of living death, being cut off from one's own community, a state worse than physical death. As elsewhere in Sirach, there is no reference to eternal life here. The fire (vv. 22-23) is more a symbol of the consuming power of death than the fires of punishment. Verses 24-26 conclude with comparisons of the normal type in Sirach, and verse 26 concludes the entire lesson. The foe here is death rather than any human enemy.

Borrowing and Lending (29:1-28)

29:1-7 Lending. This is another model section beginning with a theme: to lend to a neighbor is to fulfill a precept of the law (as in Deut 15:8). The point of verses 2-3 apparently is not that lending itself is a good but that its purpose is to cement friendships. By working to restore the divine order of a world in which all have what they need to live, one participates in the creative act of God.

This generosity is contrasted (vv. 4-6) with borrowers who cannot or will not repay loans. The scenes are very true to life, as much so in ancient times as today. Repayment with curses is condemned partly because it violates God's order.

29:8-13 Generosity. The rationale for generosity to the poor here is "the precept," which probably does not refer to any single verse in the Bible but gives the sense of many passages (such as Lev 19:9-10). Ben Sira urges spending money rather than hoarding it idly; the only hoard should be almsgiving (v. 12). This thought recalls the gospel (Luke 12:32-34).

29:14-20 Surety. To go surety is to offer financial guarantees to someone involved in business transactions. The focus of these verses shifts from one who goes surety to one who benefits. The lesson urges prudence and caution, an attitude typical of Ben Sira and summarized in verse 20. The sinner (v. 19) is by definition unwise and does not know or admit his limits. As a result he fails. Interestingly, Proverbs counsels against surety (Prov 6:1-5 and elsewhere), but changed conditions in Ben Sira's time make it acceptable but risky.

29:21-28 Frugality. This lesson opens with what may already be a proverbial statement of life's basic needs: water, food, clothing, shelter. The following verses (vv. 22-23) expand on the theme but urge moderation with piety. The homeless form the subject of verses 24-27. Far better to have a poor home than be at another's beck and call, as a person would be who regularly ate at the expense of another and performed menial tasks in partial repayment. The last verse is a conclusion of sorts, but its connection with what preceded it is not too clear.

Causes of Joy and Sorrow (30:1–31:11)

The sections on children (30:1-13), health (30:14–31:2), and wealth (31:3-11) can be gathered under one heading, although they do not all contain the same format or lessons.

30:1-13 Children. Despite the term "children," Ben Sira undoubtedly refers only to sons, in view of his bias against women. Good care of children must involve discipline (vv. 1-3); this will give the father cause to rejoice in later years. A person's immortality is guaranteed in some way by survival in offspring; no indication of an afterlife is given. Verse 6 contrasts with strictures against vengeance in 27:30–28:7. What is intended here is probably a legal method of guaranteeing the rights of the deceased.

The results of spoiling children are discussed in verses 7-11. Principally, the son will be undisciplined, causing grief to himself and to his father. The wise man has attained wisdom partly through self-discipline, and should therefore help his children grow in it.

The passage closes with two commands: Start early and be severe. The motives include bringing disgrace on the father, much as the discussion on wives focused on the husband rather than on the wife.

30:14–31:2 Health. Here Ben Sira offers a "better" proverb and other comparisons. The "better" form may be an answer to the implied question, "What is better than a rich man with a wasted frame?" The author may even have used this method in his school. Note in verse 17 another expression to cover the issue of the afterlife, "an unending sleep," a poetic parallel to "death." Literally it reads "going down forever," a new expression in the Bible.

Verses 18-20 offer an object lesson on the evils of ill health. Ben Sira also ridicules the religious practice of tomb or idol offerings, which he either saw in his travels or more likely saw in the Israel of his day. Deut 26:14 condemned the practice, which was seen as idol worship. The verses from 30:21 to 31:2 are a remarkable passage on mental health, a positive mental attitude. Ben Sira recognized the close connection between worry or depression and physical illness.

The last three verses (30:25–31:2) are a bridge passage, linking cheerfulness at meals with a proper approach to making a living. Note that weight loss is regarded as a curse (31:1), not as the blessing it would mean today. (At this point the texts of several editions vary, due to a probable disruption of pages. The order in the Greek is 30:24; 33:16–36:11; then 30:25–33:15; finally, 36:12 and on.)

31:3-11 Wealth. Verses 3-4 are both on the pessimistic side, recalling the approach of Qoheleth: no rest for either the rich or the poor. Verses 5-7 concentrate on the pursuit of gold and all it stands for. At root, gold takes the place of wisdom, justice, or even

God; to pursue it is to go astray. Experience has shown this (v. 6); the wise profit from such lessons, but fools never learn (v. 7). That the pursuit of gold is a curse is seen from the traditional formula, "reversal of fortune"—that is, if you try to snare gold, it will snare you instead (v. 7b).

Verses 8-11 are happier in tone, congratulating the one fortunate enough to pass the test inflicted by gold (literally, "mammon" in Hebrew, a word used in Matt 6:24 and Luke 16:13). Verse 10b should be extended beyond this instance to a general praise of all those who overcome temptation. Verse 11 recounts traditional blessings—prosperity and a good name.

Temperance and Good Manners (31:12–32:13)

31:12-24 Eating. These verses are among the most colorful in Sirach, and at the same time the most secular. Certainly no biblical revelation is involved here; rather, the collected common sense of experience is all important. Recall that Ben Sira's audience was mainly wealthy young men, for whom banqueting was common; in earlier times, such meals were generally restricted to religious affairs or victories.

Verses 12-15 call for order, moderation, and sensitivity to the host. Verses 16-18 call for the same, the lesson being that this sort of meal is not principally designed for nourishment but for the event as a whole. Besides, moderation has other rewards, such as health and sound sleep (vv. 19-21). The reference to emptying the stomach may point to the recently introduced practice of inducing vomiting (v. 21). In any case, it is not mentioned elsewhere in the Bible. A general recommendation closes this section: moderation above all else.

The final two verses serve as an appendix (vv. 23-24), referring to generosity in giving a banquet. In this area moderation is not to be counseled.

31:25-31 Drinking wine. Here Ben Sira has collected various statements on the proper use of wine, opening with a theme (v. 25) and a comparison (v. 26). He acknowledges the joys of wine as a gift of God (v. 27). As expected, he also counsels moderation. The author continues this theme, counseling proper order—the essentially wise decision, imitating divine order (v. 28). Misuse of wine violates this order and brings its own recompense (vv. 29-30). Ben Sira concludes with a separate idea on the proper use of words when others are "merry," that is, light-hearted, but not drunk (v. 31).

32:1-13 Proper behavior at banquets. The preceding sections dealt with attending a banquet given by another; Ben Sira here offers wise counsel for one who hosts his own banquet or who acts as a master of ceremonies—a Greek custom in vogue in his day. His advice follows his usual pattern: be modest with guests (vv. 1-2); be moderate in speech and considerate (vv. 3-4). The types of banquets envisioned in chapters 31–32, together with other of Ben Sira's observations, demonstrate his familiarity with upper-class practices and possessions (carnelian, a semi-precious stone, gold, and emeralds, vv. 5-6).

Ben Sira's comments to the young (presumably his students) counsel modesty and brevity in speech and manner. As previously (vv. 5-6), he closes with a comparison (v. 10). The lesson concludes by shifting the focus from host to guest; evidently the banquet is not for self-indulgence but for socializing. Save self-indulgence for home (vv. 11-12).

The final verse is somewhat unexpected, given the secular tone of the last few lessons (vv. 30-32). Some scholars regard them as a conclusion to the entire section beginning with 24:1.

Stability under Law (32:14–33:6)

The tone changes abruptly here as Ben Sira introduces a solemn discourse on disciplined study and wisdom. He proceeds from a consideration of divine providence (32:14-24) and the trials coming to a fool (33:1-3) to preparations for study (33:4-6).

32:14-24 Providence of God. As before, the author begins with his theme, connecting the pursuit of wisdom with the pursuit of God (vv. 14-15). One of the tasks of the wise is to find divine order even in obscurity—basically to interpret confusing reality; this is the import of verse 16, "to draw forth a plan." Sinners/fools are compared with the wise (vv. 15b, 17, 18).

The wise do not act alone; rather, the pursuit of wisdom demands the help of the wise and the discipline they impose (vv. 18-19). Being on guard is the theme of verses 21-23, where the language recalls Deuteronomy (as in 4:9: be on your guard, keep the commandments, keep the law). Verse 24b recalls various psalm passages (for example, Ps 119:31).

33:1-6 The wise and the fool. These verses are a gathering of apparently independent statements that link the verses together through references to the law and wisdom, and the expected comparisons with natural objects: boat, cartwheel, stallion. Verse 3 refers to a "divine oracle," probably an allusion to the practice of Urim and Thummim (1 Sam 14:41-42) or to words of priestly or prophetic benediction.

33:7-15 Moral order of creation. This extremely important section sets out Ben Sira's views on the divine order undergirding all of reality.

The importance of days comes from divine designation of some of them as feast days—an indication of the author's interest in matters liturgical. The illustration shows a balance between ordinary and special days, and also serves the author's usual method of examples followed by applications to daily life. The examples continue (vv. 10-14) with comments about different kinds of persons: even though man (the Greek text has "Adam") was the first human, yet people differ due to God's free choice. Resuming an old theme, Ben Sira shows that each one has his own function or lot in life as part of God's order—a far cry from the contemporary Western concept of the freedom, progress, and change possible to everyone. The author chooses to examine the realities of life, not their possibilities.

A further example/application is given in verse 14—evil/good, death/life, sinners/just—and this is concluded with Ben Sira's general theory of order. Everything works in pairs, as opposites, with a balance between each one. A person should therefore expect both good and bad out of life. The reason why this must be so is God's choice. In Ben Sira's mind, there is nothing one can do about this—human freedom seems nearly ruled out, apart from the choice to sin. Job struggles against this order but finally abandons himself to divine providence.

33:16-18 Author's note. After the all-encompassing theory presented above, Ben Sira speaks in his own name, acknowledging that he has made some progress (v. 17), not for himself but for all, probably his students (v. 18). This section may have ended the book at one point in its growth.

33:19-22 Duties to property, servants. A solemn introduction (v. 19) opens this section, which first advises a man to be independent or self-sufficient, allowing nothing to have control over him. This freedom is to be the mark of the wise in all aspects of life. Without it, a person's "glory" (v. 23) is diminished, a concept expanded later in the book.

33:25-33 Slaves. A particular example of control is over slaves, which were regarded as human property, much like wives and even children. Two proverbial sentences open the lesson (vv. 25, 27); verse 26 seemed out of place where it was and hence appears after verse 27 in our version. On the other hand, this reality is to be tempered by consideration for the human dignity of the slave (vv. 30-32); this good treatment will even have benefits for the master (v. 33). Ben Sira did not call for the abolition of slaveholding, but at least he made suggestions for the betterment of the condition of slaves.

34:1-17 Grounds for future hope. This section offers two contrasting grounds for hope: dreams (vv. 1-8) offer false grounds, whereas the Lord alone is the true ground (vv. 9-17). This division itself further illustrates the law of opposites (33:7-15).

As usual, a theme statement begins Ben Sira's lesson (v. 1), followed by perhaps a traditional proverb (v. 2). His teaching continues with a series of observations. Verse 4 is in a traditional proverbial question, expecting the answer no. Verse 5 condemns not only reliance on dreams but also their superstitious use in divination and omens. Such use is blameworthy, since it attempts to control the future, which only God can do. The author concludes with the possibility of divine intervention (v. 6), such as happened to Joseph in Egypt (Gen 37:5-10), but cautions that experience shows how wrong reliance on dreams has been (v. 7). His conclusion (v. 8) shows that the written law is the real means of divine revelation, and the wise become so because of their fidelity to this law.

God's providence, on the other hand, offers sure ground for hope (vv. 9-17). Ben Sira's remarks on the advantages of travel for growth in wisdom are not completely apropos here (vv. 9-12) but seem to focus less on travel itself than on its inherent dangers and the consequent need of relying, not on one's own means, but on God. Ben Sira's travels are evident here and there in his book, but remarks on exotic places or practices do not form part of his teaching.

Verses 13-15 extol the happiness of the one who trusts in the Lord. Such a one has courage (v. 13) and never fears (v. 14). The question in verse 15 is unexpected; the answer is clear: the Lord alone. The final two verses are attributes of God, quite reminiscent of certain psalms. Here as elsewhere Ben Sira shows considerable freedom in gathering citations to support his teaching. This was and is a common method in biblical studies, though not recommended, because the shaping context of the words is lost. "Sparkle to the eyes" (v. 17) is an unusual expression but not completely unknown in the Greek Old Testament.

Worship of the Lord (34:18–36:17)

34:18-26 Unacceptable worship. Verse 18 is the theme statement, recalling numerous prophetic oracles (Hos 7:4; 8:13, etc.). The prophets called for worship from the heart, not just with outward forms. Ben Sira, in a very violent and pointed comparison, denounces gifts made at cost to the poor (v. 20). Alms, he continues, are life-giving for those who give them as well as for those who need them (v. 21). To deprive a laborer of wages is murder, apparently to be punished as such (v. 22).

The next three verses contrast senses of "gain" for the virtuous and the wicked. The only gain comes to the virtuous, despite outward or temporary gain (vv. 23-25). In verse 25 the reference is to ritual impurity (Num 19:11). The conclusion (v. 26) is in the same vein and ends with the usual teacher's question, expecting the answer "No one."

35:1-10 Acceptable worship. In these verses Ben Sira unites the concepts of law and worship. The theme verse (v. 1) sets out the argument. "Oblation" and "peace offering" refer to types of Hebrew sacrifices, as do "fine flour" and "sacrifice of praise" in verse 2 and "atonement" in verse 3. The author must have been speaking generically, for this listing of sacrifices does not exhaust the possibilities envisioned elsewhere in the Old Testament, even with the addition of "tithes" in verse 8.

The individual recommendations of verses 4-9 are in general wisdom form and may even be from other sources used by the author. Verse 10 concludes the lesson with the basic motive, given in the "timeless" form of proverbial motives: the Lord repays—an assertion true in the past, present, and future. Here as elsewhere the concept of personal reward for doing good is mentioned—charity for Ben Sira is not simply its own reward.

35:11-24 Divine justice and mercy. The prophetic strain in Sirach continues in this next lesson, begun in verses 11-12 with a theme statement and motive. The motive asserts justice and no favorites for God, possibly because there can be no favorites in a world already ordered by God's justice (that is, God's founding decree, establishing the right).

Against this static position Ben Sira places the compassion of God in the face of human sin and need (v. 13). "Orphan" and "widow" are traditional terms designating the most abandoned and helpless (v. 14). Like the blood of Abel calling for revenge (Gen 4:10) are the tears of widows.

In fact, the prayers of the lowly are heard (vv. 16-18). They pierce the clouds—not just atmospheric clouds but the attendants at God's throne (see Lam 3:44), or perhaps God's chariot (Ps 104:3); at the very least, God dwells far above the visible clouds. Delay in prayer, a perennial theme, does not form part of Ben Sira's teaching, apart from verses 18-23, where the concentration is on what God will do. The worshiper is to realize that it takes time to root out all evils and that God is constantly engaged in this task. Being merciless and proud is a mark of the same individuals for Ben Sira: those who rely on themselves alone are led to violence. God repays like with like but shows mercy to humble people (v. 23). Against whom or in what court God is to defend the people is not spelled out; the expression in verse 23 is traditional.

36:1-17 Prayer for Israel. This section both continues the previous chapter and concludes the section beginning with chapter 24. The prayers in Sirach are a distinctive feature of the book, in contrast particularly with other books of wisdom. It is difficult to be precise about the conditions that led to the composition of this psalm-like prayer. Since many psalms lack specific references, Ben Sira may have followed that style here. Thus this prayer would be applicable to Israel at all times—in the disturbed period of Ben Sira's life or later.

The oneness and universal power of God are strongly expressed in verses 1-4. As the one God, Yahweh exercises power over all the nations. The Israelites, beginning probably in the Babylonian Exile, began to proclaim God's holiness (the Hebrew term implies separation) by practicing holiness themselves; defeat of these enemies in the future will show God's power to Israel (v. 3).

Ben Sira moves from a plea for renewed wonders (v. 5) to more traditional and violent expressions (vv. 6-8). These latter are more marks of the author's depth of feeling than his actual literal curses of enemies. The "time" (v. 7) recalls the sense of order and proper time of Israel's wisdom teachers (as in Eccl 3:1-8).

The specific petitions for Israel look to a restoration of the ancient order. The people's origin in fact goes back to Jacob/Israel. The latter name has the traditional element el, meaning "God"; hence Israel is called by God's own name (v. 11). The plea to fill the temple with God's glory (v. 13) recalls the mournful period when the glory of God departed the temple (Ezek 11:23). If the glory returns, the prophets like Ezekiel will be proved true (vv. 14-15).

Ben Sira repeats his plea in conclusion, along with the motive that God is always and forever gracious to Israel (v. 16). If God answers, the result will be greater glory for God, to be acknowledged as eternal God by all the world (v. 17). This verse shows a blossoming interest in Israel's vocation as the prophet of the one God throughout the world, and may have encouraged a missionary outreach of the type that converted Galilee to Judaism shortly before Ben Sira's time.

Making Right Judgments (36:18–42:14)

These chapters comprise a major section dealing with advice on how to judge reality correctly. Social relationships (36:21–39:11) and good and evil things (39:12–42:14) are the two major divisions.

Social Relationships (36:18–39:11)

This division opens with a brief introduction (vv. 18-20) and then continues with the following subsections: choosing a wife (36:21-27), choosing friends (37:1-6), choosing advisors (37:7-15), speech of the wise (37:16-25), temperance (37:26-30), illness and physicians (38:1-15), mourning (38:16-23), craftsmen and the wise (38:14–39:11).

The introductory verses (18-20) are two proverbial statements of different types: experience (v. 18) and its applications (v. 19); and contrasts (v. 20). All deal in some way with the distinctions to follow.

36:21-27 Choosing a wife. This passage opens typically with a theme statement (v. 21) showing again Ben Sira's bias against women. Her good qualities (vv. 22-23) are not valued for themselves but make the husband fortunate. A good wife is a support to her husband and makes a home for him (vv. 24-25). This last observation is underscored with two rhetorical questions; the expected answer is "No one."

37:1-6 Choosing a friend. The lesson on true and false friends opens with a general introductory statement warning against false friends. Some so-called friends become enemies (v. 2). Ben Sira exclaims in lament for such an outcome, the only time this method of writing is employed in the book. (Some scholars see the "companion" of verse 3 as the "evil inclination" mentioned elsewhere in Sirach and rabbinic sources.) After a comparison of false with true (vv. 4-5), the author shifts the focus, summoning the person addressed to care for his friends in return.

37:7-15 Choosing advisors. This lesson parallels the previous one on friends, opening with distinctions between good and bad advisors (v. 7). The next verses recommend caution—a typical wisdom point of view, one characteristic of Ben Sira. The series of recommendations on whom to avoid appears to be traditional advice, perhaps collected in one spot (vv. 10-11). The wise should rely first on the godly (Ben Sira's association of wisdom, law, and piety) and then on their own best instincts (vv. 12-14). "Conscience" (v. 14) is "heart" in Hebrew, the seat not of emotion as with us, but of decision-making. The best advisor of all is God (v. 15), a fitting conclusion to this lesson.

37:16-25 The speech of the wise. Continuing the subject of proper choices, Ben Sira introduces a lesson on the wise and how they speak. The usual introductory statements (vv. 16-18) are of major importance, since Ben Sira places reason (word/thought/mind) at the center of human acts. By contrast, he might have asserted that human beings are under influences from outside (whether good or bad) or inside, such as the "evil influence" cited above, or even that we have no will at all. The emphasis, in fact, is on the tongue, whose baleful influence even over reason is easily understood.

Next comes a set of distinctions on time and counterfeit wisdom (vv. 19-25). Ben Sira teaches that wisdom is a gift for others—a "charism," in the theological language of the New Testament. Verse 23 seems out of place; it is only loosely connected to the preceding verse.

37:26-30 Temperance. In a few verses Ben Sira offers his students lessons about moderation in food and other delights. Discipline, balance (vv. 26-29), and learning from observation of others (v. 30) are all required in the wise.

38:1-15 Illness and physicians. Though perhaps intentionally joined to the previous discussion on food, this lesson has independent status. The author discusses the physician, the source of medical wisdom, and general ways to think about illness.

Ben Sira doubtless had to call his young hearers to respect physicians, whose profession is mentioned rarely in the Old Testament, and then only in the late period. Under the influence of Greek culture, medicine grew in stature, and its practitioners developed from healers to those who would diagnose and treat illness. The physician draws wisdom (that is, skill) from God, and is justly to be esteemed (vv. 1-3).

Medical skill comes from wise use of the gifts of God on earth; the reference to Exod 15:25 is proof enough (vv. 4-5). The physician thus participates in God's own work of establishing (or re-establishing) order (vv. 7-8). Ben Sira counsels a regimen to effect cures: pray quickly (v. 9), repent of evil (v. 10), sacrifice generously (v. 11). Once in the proper disposition, turn to the physician (vv. 12-13). Note that the shift is from sacred to secular, since the source of medical skill is God (vv. 14-15).

38:16-23 Mourning. Ben Sira introduces here a topic almost new to the Old Testament. In earlier times laments for the dead were certainly practiced, but his explanation, cautions, and sensitive psychological tone are distinctive. For Ben Sira, it appears that custom and civility rather than prayer for the dead or even with survivors were uppermost in his mind (vv. 16-17). The period of mourning was generally seven days (Gen 50:10; also Sir 22:12), probably more for close relatives than for friends. Ben Sira advises a brief time and gives a psychological motive (vv. 18-19).

In the rest of this short lesson the author counsels attention to right living and one's own end (vv. 20-22). No hope of afterlife exists for Ben Sira, apart from God's judgment near or at death. Verse 23 summarizes the passage. The term "soul" represents, not our concept of the composite of body and soul, but the Hebrew nefesh, a word implying personality or individuality. By the time of Ben Sira, nefesh may have begun to acquire a more philosophical sense.

38:24–39:11 Craftsmen and the wise. This section either closes the unit on social relationships (36:21–39:11) or begins a new section, the third added by Ben Sira to his earlier work. If the latter, the author is opening with a general description of his own lifework.

Ben Sira here compares various skilled occupations (vv. 25-34) with that of the scribe (39:1-11). The scribe in question (v. 24) is a legal scholar, not simply a person who knows how to read and write. The farmer (vv. 25-26), engraver (v. 27), blacksmith (v. 28), and potter (vv. 29-30) all have practical wisdom in the sense of skill, with its attention to practical order, balance, and beauty. Their work is important in its own way (vv. 31-32) and a gift of God (v. 34), but the great work of decision-making at the top is in the hands of others (v. 33).

With a rare exclamation, Ben Sira extols the difference between the intellectual work of scholars and the manual labor of the craftsmen (as 38:24). Despite his reverence for the priesthood and the accolades given to other professions, such as physicians, this section (vv. 1-11) places the legal scholar on the highest level. The scribe is a conservator of ancient wisdom, personally wise, knowing the deeper levels of meaning of proverbs (v. 2). As a result, the scribe enjoys a good reputation among the world's great. The sources of wisdom are in experience (travel, v. 5), but most especially in personal holiness—the scribe prays to be emptied of sins, and as a result is filled with divine wisdom (vv. 6-7).

Ben Sira appears to offer his pupils reasons for the difficult pursuit of wisdom in verses 8-11—in this case public renown. Self-interest predominates here: wisdom sought not for its own sake but for an eternal memory. Christians would more likely place their trust in divine providence, rejoicing in the utterance given them and in giving glory to God alone.

Note the repeat of the traditional divisions within the biblical canon: law (v. 1a), prophets (v. 1b), writings (v. 2); this appeared previously in the foreword. Some scholars see a developing interest in oral tradition (v. 2) alongside the written word, though this opinion is hard to sustain.

Good and Evil Things (39:12–42:14)

The author begins a new section here, the second main division of 36:18–42:14 on proper discrimination.

39:12-35 A psalm of praise. The content of this psalm is similar to that of 16:24–17:14, but the form is typical of certain psalms: an invitation to prayer (vv. 13-15), motives (vv. 16-31), conclusion (vv. 32-35). The invitation, addressed to disciples ("children"), employs sense images, a style foreign to traditional psalms (petals of roses, odors of the lily, blossoms, harp music).

A theological assertion gives the basic motive (v. 16): the perfection of God's works and of divine providence. This assertion finds proof in divine acts (creation, v. 17). The truly wise should know how God acts and, like God, find nothing unexpected. The theological picture that Ben Sira paints is simplistic: the good are blessed at the right time by good things, whereas the evil are cursed by things both good and evil. It appears that death-dealing events or objects never afflict the good and that the virtuous never suffer. The lesson learned in Job was not learned by the author.

A subsidiary consideration is the proper time (vv. 29, 34). This ordering of the systems of the universe should be pondered by the wise, for it is at the heart of the revelation of God's orderly justice. This psalm-like section concludes by repeating the opening exhortation to praise, that is, to acknowledge publicly God's goodness. To "bless the name" (v. 35) is a late Hebrew expression meaning to proclaim God as good (as in Pss 96:2; 103:1; 1 Chr 23:13).

40:1-11 Suffering. In these verses Ben Sira expands on the evils coming to the wicked, sketched in 39:28-31. This brief section, like several others, has a simple structure: introduction (v. 1a), examples (vv. 1b-7), applications (vv. 8-11). This simple format models the activity of anyone seeking wisdom: observe the realities in faith and then draw conclusions for right living.

The Sage does not discuss why God should allot anxiety to human life; he only observes its universality. "Sons of men" in Hebrew may be translated as "children of Adam" (v. 1a); this is followed by an ambiguous reference to Eve ("mother of all the living"), based on Gen 3:20. The previous verse in Genesis makes it clear that Mother Earth is intended here.

Ben Sira shows his usual psychological insight in the description he gives of human fears, even internalized into nightmares (vv. 2-5). He also partially answers the complaint that the wicked prosper—as king (v. 3) or even priest (v. 4—the Hebrew refers to the priestly turban); retribution will come to them eventually. They share common human anxieties. Even animals are troubled (v. 8).

The issue of predestination is not far from Ben Sira's discussion here or in 39:25. It appears that the author holds that the evil are simply so, "of earth," with no hope of repentance; the good, too, are virtuous throughout, "from above." In holding this, Ben Sira is close to some strains of Old Testament thinking. Despite that, the possibility of repentance for the wicked, as well as of sin in the just, plays a part in other strains of biblical thinking, in the Old Testament and certainly in the New.

40:12-17 What is enduring and what is passing. The next few verses present mainly some comparisons drawn from nature— the traditional contemplative stance of the wise person. Such a person will learn that the evil will ultimately suffer punishment, and the good will endure. No matter how powerful and intimidating evil seems, God's plan will triumph. The wise should come to learn this. The comparisons in verse 15 recall the gospel parable of the sower (Matt 13:3 and parallels).

40:17b-27 Joys of life. These verses are loosely connected with what precedes. They give us some insight into Ben Sira's classroom. The Sage would present a riddle (following v. 17b): wealth and wages can make life sweet; what is better than either? This would provoke several answers. Those that the author chose here have no inherent similarity among them. They rather demonstrate flashes of insight, emphasizing the unexpected (v. 17) or the ordinary (vv. 21, 22). A particularly brilliant answer is found in verse 24: "charity that rescues," that is, in times of stress having helpers is truly good, but an act of charity that relieves the root causes of the stress is better.

Verses 26b-27 appear to be a type of gloss or commentary on verse 26a. Ben Sira has previously extolled the fear of the Lord; such references characterize the entire book. The "canopy" of verse 27 appears to derive from Isa 4:6 ("his glory will be a shelter"; the Hebrew terms for "shelter" and "canopy" are related).

40:28-30 Begging, an evil in life. A life of beggary is one of the evils of life, though the reason for its position here is unclear. Note the refinement of Ben Sira's psychological insight. Also, he follows in the footsteps of Israel's prophets who counseled that outward appearances (particularly of religion) should match inward realities.

41:1-4 Death. Ben Sira continues to reflect on good and evil, and here addresses death dramatically. Death is bitter for the strong but welcome for the weak. The seeker after wisdom should ponder the one at peace and see not contentment but a shadow cast over him by death. Though bitter, death can be welcome—the wise should see this as well. The wise (vv. 3-4) will know God's decree in Gen 3:19: death comes to all. Life does not exist after death; only Sheol, the abode of the dead, remains (v. 4).

41:5-13 Memorials. The previous discussion leads Ben Sira to consider the only remnants of the good and evil—children and reputation. While it is often true that evil parents can create a situation in which children will develop badly, modern readers have to reject the author's blanket statements. Neither do all wicked parents have evil children, nor do wicked offspring have evil parents. Free will doubtless has a role to play.

The woe in verse 8 occurs only here and in 2:12-14. Ben Sira does not draw out the theological implications of the verse. Is the man sinful because he forsakes the law (an expression of Deuteronomic origin), or is he sinful by nature and thus turns from the law? The author closes with a summary statement, noteworthy for its use of the Hebrew term tohu, "nought" or "nothingness," a rare word, used in Gen 1:2 ("wasteland") to describe the nothingness existing before creation.

A good name (vv. 11-13) by contrast endures, apparently forever. One may also conclude that virtuous children attest to the virtue of their parents.

41:14–42:8 True and false shame. This section continues the series of observations on good and evil things begun in 39:12. The author focuses on shame, having mentioned the subject in 4:21. After his introduction (vv. 14-17), the text lists evil acts for which one should truly be ashamed (vv. 18-24), and then good and lawful acts for which one should never be ashamed (42:1-8).

The schoolroom atmosphere of Ben Sira's day comes through clearly in these verses. The riddles of 40:17-26 called for student answers; so too the objects of shame before certain individuals seem to call for wise responses. Ben Sira has treated of nearly all the subjects previously (9:8 on lust; 18:44 on harsh words), and the topics here require no lofty insight to be understood. The teaching of Jesus in the gospels follows similar paths (for example, Luke 6:34 on lending).

The motive (v. 24) comes as a surprise: human respect. Doubtless Ben Sira had in mind observance of God's law, which would ultimately bring esteem of the highest type.

Other biblical versions based on the Greek text will show significant differences in the text of verses 15-17.

Ben Sira holds out another kind of human respect in 42:1, here influencing toward sin. Human esteem has its value in enforcing public morality, but the company of the wicked can work just the opposite. The person of integrity will do what is right, specified in verses 2-8.

The first series of acts (vv. 3-5a) focuses on business dealings. Sensitivity about honest dealing (v. 4) took on a special refinement in Israel; prophets voiced similar concerns (for example, Hos 12:8).

The second series focuses on managing one's household. Again, the advice comes from experience and common sense. The chastisement of the aged (v. 8) refers to sexual impropriety in the elderly; the good (read "wise") manager will hold them accountable for their acts as long as they form part of the household. As before, the motive is recognition by others as being wise, one of the chief characteristics of which is caution and discretion.

42:9-14 Wickedness of women. In these few verses the author gives his most extensive treatment of daughters (see also 7:24-25 and 22:3b-5). Nowhere else in the Old Testament are one's daughters discussed as a topic by itself. As elsewhere in the book, Ben Sira treats women from a man's bias. Daughters are usually compared unfavorably with sons; they are a burden and a source of anxiety and potential shame. Since daughters could be a source of economic benefit, the wise father would guard them (v. 9). Women, judged to be foolish, could not have sense enough to preserve themselves from sexual entanglements, so it fell to the father to provide all needed safeguards (vv. 10-12).

Ben Sira concludes this difficult section with two proverbs, possibly not original with him. Verse 14 is particularly difficult for modern readers. Many translators read the text as: "Better a man's evil than a woman's goodness."

Praise of the Lord in Nature (42:15–43:35)

For many scholars the section 42:15–50:24 marks the last great division of the Book of Sirach. In the outline followed here, 42:15–43:35 forms the ninth major section of the book. The passage is psalm-like, similar to others (1:1-10; 24:1-22). This poem has three clear divisions: introduction (42:15-25), catalogue of wonders (43:1-27), conclusion (43:15-25).

Ben Sira concludes his book with the hymn in this section and follows with a lengthy praise of Israel's heroes (44:1–50:29). The two together form an elaborate doxology to his collection of wise teachings. As such, the section serves an educational purpose similar to his use of proverbs: observe the realities of life and draw conclusions for wise living.

Verse 15a introduces the hymn, and the following verses (15b-22) speak of the origin of God's works and the impossibility of describing them all—not even the "holy ones" (v. 17) can (an ancient expression for God's attendants). "Depths" (v. 18) translates the Hebrew term for the region under the visible world; it and the human heart are symbols of impenetrable realities. The Creator alone can understand them. Verses 23-25 add a series of observations on the goodness and order of creation. Ben Sira does not mean to teach that there will never be an end to the world (v. 24).

43:1-27 Catalogue of wonders. This listing treats the sky and sun (vv. 1-5), heavenly phenomena (vv. 6-12), weather (vv. 13-23), and the sea (vv. 24-26).

The Hebrew text is difficult in the first several verses, and translations differ considerably. The language of praise used here is typical of psalms: exclamations (v. 2), questions expecting a negative answer (v. 3), assertions of greatness (v. 5). Ben Sira's poetic view of the sun drawn across the sky by horses is a commonplace idea in the ancient Near East (v. 5).

The value of the moon, besides its beauty, is that it guarantees the observance of festivals on their proper days; for Israel (and even for many in the modern world) both the feast and its fixed day were of equal value. In verse 8 we have an echo of two Hebrew words, yerah (moon/month) and hodesh (new moon/month). The poetic view of the relationship between stars and bad weather (v. 10) is clear: the stars must protect against bad weather, since when they appear, weather is good; should they "relax their vigils," bad weather results. God's bow (v. 12) is likewise an ancient poetic view of the rainbow (see 9:13).

Similar to Job 38 is Ben Sira's treatment of weather phenomena (vv. 13-23). The storm serves as an instrument of God's wrath: the arrows from his bow are lightning (v. 13; see Ps 29). The ancient Canaanites viewed the storm as a god; by Ben Sira's day, Israel knew that storms received their power from God (v. 15), at God's command (vv. 16-17).

The images of cold (vv. 18-21) contrast strongly with the heat of verse 22—both phenomena are known in Israel. The dew (v. 23) was regarded as a great blessing in a land of scant rainfall (see Deut 33:28; Ps 133:3; Isa 18:4). Israel's awe in face of the sea is evident in verses 24-26. It is noteworthy that the ancient idea of rivalry between the sea with its creatures and God had disappeared by Ben Sira's time. Here God calms the deep;

God alone is the maker of all its exotic inhabitants.

The final verse (v. 27) appears to conclude this catalogue by asserting that God alone is in control of all the great phenomena, using them to carry out the divine will.

43:28-35 Conclusion. Ben Sira concludes by resuming his former theme of the impossibility of knowing God through and through. "He is all in all" does not express any supposed pantheistic notions, as some scholars have held. It seems rather an expression of praise and wonder at the Creator of all (as in verse 35). The piety of our author is evident: his contemplation of the wonders of creation does not lead him to become a scientist, but instead to give praise. The result of this is the gift of wisdom.

Praise of Israel's Ancestors (44:1–50:29)

Just as the previous section both praises God and shows disciples how to grow in wisdom, so this last section praises God for his greatness toward Israel and leads disciples through a sort of gallery of heroes, holding them up for emulation. We do not have a history here in the sense of a connected series of causes and effects. Consequently, Ben Sira felt free to omit details or even to reshape events for his own purposes.

44:1-15 Introduction. "Let us now praise famous men" is the traditional wording of verse 1. The Hebrew is in the singular and focuses on the piety (Hebrew hesed) of Israel's ancestors. "Portion" (v. 2) is a traditional expression recalling the early belief that each deity had his/her own people. Israel was the Lord's portion among all others (see 17:14; also Deut 32:9; Jer 10:16). The twelve types of heroes, probably all Israelites, strangely do not include priests. In verse 4 the "spikes" of the wise makers of epigrams refers to the pointed quality of their words (as in Eccl 12:11), which encourage reflection.

Verse 9 seems to be a general comment on the wicked (as in 10:17). Verses 8 and 10 are joined and repeat Ben Sira's views on the long memory and numerous children of the just.

44:16-23 Early patriarchs. This section begins, not with Adam, but with Enoch. Just why Adam is omitted is not clear. The Enoch verse is enclosed in brackets to show its doubtful place; many say it is an expansion of 49:14. That Enoch did not die but was simply taken up became a source of much speculation in late Old Testament times.

Ben Sira's interest in the preservation of Israel through divine providence is clear in the verses that follow: Noah preserved the race (v. 17), Abraham's (v. 21) and Isaac's (v. 22) descendants. In addition to God's plan, the virtue of the patriarchs was rewarded in the usual way, with numerous offspring. Each of them received signs and had an agreement or covenant with God. A close check of the corresponding passages in Genesis will show the freedom Ben Sira employed in shifting events for the sake of his argument. He also quoted Ps 72:8 in verse 21. The references here to sea and river, at least in the mind of the psalmist, were to the great sea surrounding the land. No specific sea or river (the poetic counterpart of sea) should be looked for, even less a divine promise concerning modern boundaries for the state of Israel.

God's hand in Israel's history is seen in the division of the land and its allotment. That this system no longer existed in Ben Sira's day seems of no concern.

45:1-26 Moses, Aaron, Phinehas. Ben Sira begins this section with Moses, not with Joseph, as one might expect. The omission seems to be corrected in 49:15. Moses is here regarded as a worker of wonders, endowed with divine power. After beholding God face to face, Moses hands on the law, the truest wisdom. Elsewhere Ben Sira has made a close identification of wisdom with the law (see 19:17 and 32:14-16). The basis of God's choice of Moses appears to be his natural but God-given endowments (v. 4).

The treatment of Aaron is surprising in its length (vv. 6-22) and in its detailed descriptions. The attention given by Ben Sira to the priesthood, and to the cult in particular, has been taken as proof of his being a priest. True or not, the author's interest seems to be more in the presence of God to Israel, along with Israel's proper response in worship. The Lord deserves the best and most magnificent worship possible.

Ben Sira points to the single priesthood (v. 7), probably with an eye to the pre-exilic struggles between two priestly branches (Aaron and Zadok). The vestments listed in verses 8-13 are not exactly described (Ben Sira confuses the meaning of ephod); rather, the author gives a poetic evocation of their glory.

The mention of colors (vv. 10-11) is quite rare in this book, indeed throughout the Old Testament.

Similarly, the sacrifices listed in verses 14-17 are only loosely described. Following his usual practice, Ben Sira mentions several covenants (vv. 15 and 24-25). These do not conform exactly to the details of other Old Testament books, where relationships between God and Israel or with individuals are called by various names. Ben Sira has subsumed all these into a single system of covenants—an apt theological construction on his part.

A further element of the ensemble is the focus on permanence: Aaron's priesthood (v. 7), use of vestments (v. 13), Aaronic covenant (v. 15). God's commitment to Israel thus becomes a further motive for his praise. The persistence of the liturgy is a symbol of this commitment.

The zeal of Phinehas (Num 25) had become legendary (see, for example, Ps 106:30-31, where his merit is said to endure forever). Ben Sira, true to his previous thinking, equates Phinehas's act with sacrificial atonement (see 3:3). As a grandson of Aaron, ("third of his line," v. 23), he was already in the priestly line. The author restates the outcome of his zeal—a recommitment to the priesthood (see Num 25:12-13). The office of high priest, however, developed only after the Exile.

The final verse appears to be addressed to the priests of Ben Sira's day, though on what occasion is unclear. His message to them comes from his concern to preserve the cult, guaranteed in a way more wondrous than the covenant with David, which at that time was in fact not being realized, since there was no Davidic king.

46:1-20 Joshua, Caleb, Judges, and Samuel. This brief chapter is clearly divided into accounts of Joshua (vv. 1-6), Caleb (vv. 7-10), the judges (vv. 11-12), and Samuel (vv. 13-20). As previously, Ben Sira has shaped and understood the events of Israel's past from his own perspective: God continues the choice of Israel, the glory given to Israel thereby, manifested in the continuing glory of the cult and in the wisdom given to Israel; lessons for contemporary Israel in the piety of her ancient heroes in the face of foreign oppressors.

Joshua appears here as a prophet, a role not given him elsewhere, since he was chiefly a military leader. As a successor of Moses, he would have to be, in Ben Sira's mind, his successor in all ways, including the prophetic office. Moses, in fact, is styled a prophet only in texts coming from the northern kingdom, where the title of prophet was used more widely than in the south (see Hos 12:14; Deut 34:10).

Joshua as commander of Israel's armies is found in verse 2 (the battle at Ai, Josh 8:18-19) and in verses 4-6 (the battle at Gibeon, Josh 10:12-14). "Most High God" (v. 5) is an ancient designation (El Elyon) found here in Sirach for the first time and repeated three times in the rest of the book. In these uses Ben Sira may be consciously adopting a more elevated, liturgical style to correspond to his subject matter.

Joshua and Caleb are linked in the next few verses as the only two spared from the desert wanderings (Num 26:65). The "summits of the land" (v. 9) refers to the hills around Hebron in southern Judah, where the Caleb tribe settled.

In the case of the judges, their record of devotion is not entirely stainless. Possibly Ben Sira refers (v. 11) to Gideon and Samson, not exactly models of piety. "May their memory . . ." becomes a traditional rabbinic expression of regard for the deceased. Verse 12 clearly is not a prayer for the judges themselves to rise from the dead (see his wish for prophets in 49:10); this would run counter to all of Ben Sira's thinking. The prayer is for a renewal of their spirit in the author's age. Despite that, may we not see here a dawning hope of resurrection, prominent in other late Old Testament writings?

Ben Sira includes a quiet wordplay on the name Samuel and the term "dedicated," a feature evident only in the Hebrew. Since Samuel was so complex a figure, later authors see him as prophet, the last of the judges, and a priest. These three roles are developed: judge (v. 14), prophet (vv. 15, 20), priest (v. 16). In addition, Samuel exercised some political power (anointing Saul and David as kings, v. 13b).

Ben Sira's reluctance to paint too dark a picture of parts of Israel's past leads him to mention Saul only indirectly (prince, vv. 13, 19; king, v. 20).

47:1-24a Nathan, David, Solomon. In these verses appear Nathan (v. 1), David (vv.

2-11), and Solomon (vv. 12-24a), the latter two having accounts of the same relative length, but both somewhat sanitized.

The inclusion of Nathan as part of the succession of prophets (Moses, Joshua, Samuel) is a contribution made by Ben Sira to our thinking. The account of David's young life is colored by poetry: parallels between lions and kids, bears and lambs. The account of his military prowess is based on 2 Samuel, and his interest in liturgy on 1 Chronicles. The latter work is notorious for its whitewash of David's career, a decision taken by Ben Sira as well.

"The might of his people" (v. 5) is literally "horn of his people," a traditional expression for power, similar to the power exercised by animals through their horns. Notice also the twofold mention of El Elyon ("Most High God" vv. 5, 8). The might of the Philistines (v. 7) had been shattered indeed, but the Roman conquerors of Israel adopted their name for occupied Israel, Palestine.

A possible play on Solomon's name ("man of peace") occurs in verse 13. The peace characteristic of his reign allowed him the leisure to pursue the building of the temple (v. 13), wisdom (vv. 14-17), and commerce (v. 18). He shared a name, "beloved of Yah[weh]" (Jedid-iah) with the whole people of Israel (in Jer 11:15).

The dark cloud that began to overshadow Israel's life in the career of Saul (not mentioned by name, but see 46:19-20) and of David (his sins, 47:11) is quite apparent in Solomon's career (vv. 19-21). His sin, at least in Ben Sira's view, consisted in allowing self-control to slip away in favor of control over him by women. The author has already spoken critically against this (see 9:2; 25:12). Despite sin, God's promise remains—an assertion made here clearly (v. 22). Note also the principle useful for interpreting biblical passages: God does not "permit even one of his promises to fail."

Many translations include both Rehoboam, Solomon's son, and Jeroboam, the first king of the independent northern kingdom. Since the latter should not be remembered (v. 23), some translations omit mention of him. "Expansive in folly" is a wordplay on Rehoboam's name.

47:24b-48:16 Elijah and Elisha. The growth of sin, mentioned previously, continues in ominous counterpoint to the accounts of Israel's heroes. The connection of Elijah with fire (vv. 1, 3, 9) is a brilliant poetic accommodation. This prophet's powers over nature (restricting rain, 1 Kgs 17) reinforces his reputation: because of him the sun scorched the earth and broke the staff on which Israel relied—abundant grain (v. 2). He had powers to raise to life (v. 5) or to cause death (v. 6). So God-like in many ways was he that he did not die a human death but was taken up (like Enoch, 44:16). This event became the source of much speculation in Elijah's case too; Mal 3:23 records it. The allusion here to the text of Malachi shows that that book was known to Ben Sira (see the mention of all the twelve prophets in 49:10).

The author includes some small measure of messianic hope in 48:10: "to re-establish the tribes of Jacob." Despite his interest in the continuation of God's promises, he knew from the facts of daily life that the Davidic monarchy had ceased and that the old tribal organization was long out of use.

If Elijah was a wonderworker, his successor Elisha was even more so. Nonetheless, the wonders worked through him had little effect on righteous living in the northern kingdom. As a result, the people of Israel were destroyed. Ben Sira exaggerates for effect the totality of the destruction and scattering; probably only a small percentage of Israel was taken away and resettled in a few specific locations in the Assyrian domains. Judah's territories were also annexed by Assyria, and what was left to the Davidic kings was tiny indeed (v. 15).

48:17-23 Hezekiah and Isaiah. Ben Sira gives his readers another wordplay in verses 17 and 22: the Hebrew for "to strengthen, hold fast" is at the root of the name Hezekiah. For the people of subsequent centuries as well as for Ben Sira, the salvation of Jerusalem from Sennacherib's attack stood as the most striking proof of God's faithfulness to the Davidic kings. Ben Sira modifies the tradition to include the whole people of Jerusalem at prayer, whereas in 2 Kgs 19 it is Hezekiah alone.

Isaiah appears here mainly on account of his deeds, not his prophetic speeches. Modern scholarship attributes to an unnamed prophet or prophets chapters 40–66 of Isaiah. Ben Sira's view is that prophecy involved foretelling the events of the Exile (vv. 24-25). His reference to these chapters demonstrates that they were known under Isaiah's name in Ben Sira's time.

49:1-10 Josiah and the prophets. Ben Sira gives us abundant proof of his regard for Josiah, appealing to smell (incense), taste (honey), and hearing (music). The reason for Josiah's renown is found in his thoroughgoing piety. Note that the author connects himself and his contemporaries with their ancestors: "our betrayals" rather than "their betrayals" (v. 2). He then turns to a traditional restatement of the causes of Judah's destruction (vv. 4-7): the kings—and the people—turned from God's law. As in other places in the book, we find here the implication "they should have known better." As a result, their foolishness (lack of wisdom and foresight) is proved, and the punishment is a foregone conclusion.

Ben Sira includes Jeremiah, even quoting Jer 1:5, 10, and Ezekiel, whose chariot became a feature of later rabbinic speculation. The reference to Job is customary, as in Jas 5:11; both Ben Sira and the apostle James have neglected the anger and impatience of Job in the main chapters of the book in favor of the conclusion, Job 42:7-9.

The "twelve prophets" (v. 10), Hosea through Malachi, are the minor prophets—those whose names are attached to brief prophetic books, which form almost a fourth major book in company with Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. The role of the minor prophets in the sustenance of Israel has been correctly evaluated by Ben Sira. Yet, through all of these accounts Ben Sira does not mention Babylon—nor Assyria, for that matter—nor the Exile.

49:11-13 Postexilic heroes. The three heroes have one verse each. The concept of the signet (v. 11) may refer to the use God would make of Zerubbabel (see Hag 2:23), as one uses a signet ring to formalize a document or offer proof of authenticity. The obscure Jeshua (the Joshua of Hag 1:12) stood with Zerubbabel and continued the priestly line after the return from exile. To Nehemiah is given the credit for building the city's walls again to shelter the temple. Note, too, the repeated use of "our" (v. 13), joining Israel of the past with Ben Sira's contemporaries.

49:14-16 Heroes before the Flood. There are nearly as many theories to explain the inclusion of Enoch (v. 14), Joseph (v. 15), and Adam and his sons (v. 16) as there are writers on the subject. Whether included deliberately or not, these men close the historical circle begun in 44:1. The splendor or glory so often mentioned in Sirach comes to a fitting climax associated both with Adam as well as the great high priest Simon, whose praise fills the following chapter.

50:1-24 Simon. We do not know of the repairs mentioned in verses 1-2 from other biblical texts, but the historian Josephus confirms them. These are the only acts mentioned for which Simon should receive praise. The next several verses describe in loving detail Simon's appearance in his high priestly vestments and as presiding at temple sacrifice.

The images employed here appeal almost entirely to sight; as such they contrast with 24:13-17, similar in its attention to detail. A close examination of these images will reveal overtones: for example, clouds (v. 6) recall incense; sun on the temple (v. 7), the golden plates that adorned the Jerusalem temple and were brilliant in the sun; the rainbow (v. 7), God's covenant after the Flood; trees of Lebanon (v. 8), which provided material for the temple's construction and for sacrificial wood; olive tree (v. 10), a symbol of eternal life. Above all is the theme of glory, running all through the sections beginning in 42:15.

The liturgy described here was very likely that prescribed for the Day of Atonement. The detail in verse 15 was not fixed exactly in earlier biblical texts; Ben Sira is describing the practice of his day. The mention of the very name of the Lord (v. 20) refers to the custom of reciting the exact name only once yearly on the festival.

Note also the various designations for God: Lord (vv. 13, 20), Most High (vv. 14, 16, 17, 21), Most High God (v. 15), Holy One of Israel (v. 17), Merciful One (v. 19), God (v. 19), God of all (v. 22). These were all familiar to Ben Sira and his contemporaries from their liturgical life.

The little hymn in verses 22-24 is addressed to no one in particular, but seems to arise from Ben Sira's consideration of the liturgy. He recommended the same praise after contemplation of the majesty of nature (see 43:11 for the rainbow). (The popular hymn "Now Thank We All Our God" takes its origin from verse 22.) The actual Hebrew text of verse 24 is a prayer for Simon; the translators of the New American Bible omitted it here, choosing to follow the canonical Greek version.

50:25-26 Fragments. The surprising numerical proverb (see 25:2; 26:5) focuses on the third group of despised peoples, namely, Samaritans. The Edomites on Mount Seir and the Philistines were traditional enemies of Israel but no longer a threat. Particularly galling for Ben Sira must have been the rival Samaritan temple and clergy at Shechem. The woman of Samaria (John 4:19-20) referred to the ancestral rivalry. Their pretension to the true cult must have led Ben Sira to include these verses.

50:27-29 Epilogue. Another surprise is the signature, a feature unknown elsewhere in the Old Testament, though Ben Sira has referred earlier to himself on occasion in the first person. He concludes with a piece of advice to his students, joining together his themes of wisdom, proper living, and divine guidance.

Appendix (51:1-30)

Several Old Testament books have appendix materials, for example 2 Sam 21–24; Isa 36–39; even Lamentations is attached as a sort of appendix to Jeremiah. The purpose of this appendix is unclear, but it may have been intended to preserve (pseudo?) Ben Sira materials still in circulation but not yet a part of Sirach.

The hymn of thanks is a personal composition, referring to events in the life of Ben Sira that are otherwise unknown to us. In any case, the author has mined the treasures of Old Testament prayers to derive a new composition. It follows the traditional form, known from the psalms: introduction addressed to God (v. 1); a narrative offering motives for thanks (vv. 2-6); a prayer for deliverance (vv. 7-11a); God's response (vv. 11b-12). The reference to death and the nether world may simply be a commonplace expression for danger or suffering. Calling the Lord "father" (v. 10) is not original with the New Testament.

The second poem is an acrostic, each succeeding verse beginning with the next letter of the Hebrew alphabet. This acrostic is incomplete; up to half is missing. The author is probably not Ben Sira himself.

The first section speaks of the quest for wisdom (vv. 13-22), often with erotic overtones. The writer began with a search for wisdom, followed the "level path" (of the law, v. 15), and so grew in wisdom—the object of which is the praise of the Lord (v. 22). This approach is consistent with Ben Sira's methods.

In the second section (vv. 23-30) the author turns to his students. The poem has the feel of an advertisement. The "house of instruction" (v. 23) is an expression that appears here for the first time, meaning a school. He urges hard work and promises rewards ("silver and gold," v. 28, which may stand for blessings other than simply material gain).

The Hebrew text ends with "in his own time," an expression consistent with Ben Sira's teaching about the providence of God, who acts according to the wise divine plan.

PSALMS

Richard J. Clifford, S.J.

INTRODUCTION

At the center of every psalm is the presence of Yahweh, the God of Israel, "the Lord" in Jewish and Christian translations. Yahweh is present to the psalmists most often in the temple. Built on Mount Zion in Jerusalem by King Solomon in the tenth century B.C.E. and rebuilt in the late sixth century B.C.E., after the Babylonian Exile, the temple complex was the site of the three great annual festivals: Passover in early spring, Pentecost seven weeks later, and Ingathering (also called the Feast, or Booths) in early fall. In the temple court the people encountered their Lord; they recalled the moment of their creation, the Exodus-Conquest (sometimes depicted in mythic language of victory over the sea) in solemn liturgical remembering.

According to the psalms, the temple was not the only institution through which Yahweh was present to the people. They also encountered God in the king, son of God by adoption, intermediary between God and people, and conduit of divine blessings to the people. Another mode of presence was the divine word to Israel, the law or torah. The Christian church sees in Jesus Christ and in the church that embodies him a presence so definitive as to include and fulfill all previous modes of presence.

The 150 psalms express Israel's experience of the Holy One, directly and concretely, with a wide range of feeling. As deep and as true as the psalmists' feelings are, their expression is strongly marked by the ancient Near Eastern tradition of hymnody. Genuine religious feeling, a strong tradition, and literary craft—these made the psalms. To know them, to share their religious feeling, one must be willing to study the tradition and the craft.

The most concise approach to the tradition and craft of the psalms is that perfected by Hermann Gunkel (1862–1932), professor of Bible at Berlin and later at Halle, in his great commentary (1926) and in his introduction (1933). Gunkel, with a romantic's love of the popular feeling and spontaneity of the psalms, and with a scholar's mastery of the relevant literatures and languages, recognized that the thoughts and emotions of the psalms are expressed in extremely traditional ways, "forms" or "genres," customary ways of speaking in the ancient Near East. Largely on the basis of his observations, scholars divide the psalms into a relatively few genres or forms: laments (individual or communal), thanksgivings (individual or communal), and hymns. A few psalms do not come directly under the above categories; these include royal psalms, songs of Zion, songs of trust, and psalms influenced by wisdom literature themes. These are classed according to their subject matter rather than according to their formal structure.

We sketch below the typical features of the main genres of (A) lament, (B) thanksgiving, and (C) hymn. References to this general treatment will be given throughout the commentary.

A. Psalms of lament are characterized by:

—a direct, unadorned cry to Yahweh.

—Complaint. A vivid description of the affliction of the community, such as military or agricultural distress, or of the individual, such as sickness, unfair legal process, treachery of former friends, or the consequences of sin. Sometimes there is a protestation of innocence; the punishment is undeserved.

—Expression of trust. Despite the crisis, the psalmist maintains a hope, however modest, that God will act. Such a hope is often introduced by "but" or "nevertheless."

—Petition. The psalmist prays for his own or his people's rescue, and often for the enemies' downfall.

—Words of assurance. A word delivered to the psalmist by a priest in the course of the lament. Only rarely is it transmitted with the text of the psalm, for example, Pss 15:5 and 60:6-8. Apparently, it was considered the priest's part, not the petitioner's.

—Statement of praise. A serene statement at the end of the psalm, in striking contrast to the anxiety of what has gone before. The psalmist states the intention to live the word of assurance delivered by the priest as the word of the Lord.

Each lament records a drama with three actors: the psalmist, God, and "the wicked." In the complaint the psalmist dramatizes his plight and protests his innocence so as to move God to action: Will you, just God, allow this innocent poor person to be vanquished by the wicked? In community laments the question is: Will you allow your choosing of Israel to be nullified by another power? The words of assurance, the fifth element in the outline above, function like a judicial verdict, affirming that the Lord does not allow evil to triumph ultimately and will vindicate the poor person. In the vow of praise the psalmist promises to live in the hope that God will act.

B. Thanksgiving psalms are closely allied to laments; in essence they are the report of rescue from the hands of the wicked. The term "thanksgiving" is somewhat misleading, for in the Bible to "give thanks" does not mean to say "thank you" but to tell publicly of the rescue that has occurred. The audience then recognizes the hand of Yahweh and gives praise. As a result, Yahweh's glory is acknowledged by human beings.

Most such psalms begin with an expression of thanks and then describe the act of rescue: the psalmist was in distress, even near despair, cried to Yahweh for help, and was saved. The psalmist is conscious of the congregation as he delivers his prayerful report, for the world must acknowledge what Yahweh has done.

C. The hymn is simple in its structure: a call to worship, often with the addressees named; for example, "Praise the Lord, all you nations," (Ps 117:1). The main section gives the basis for praise and is introduced by "for." The basis for praise is the activity that displays the Lord's majesty on earth.

The Psalter is an anthology of small collections finally edited into five books, perhaps in imitation of the five books of the Pentateuch: Psalms 1–41, 42–72, 73–89, 90–106, and 107–150. It is sometimes called the hymnbook of the second temple of 515 B.C.E.–A.D. 70, an accurate designation as long as we remember that songs of many periods of Israel's history, including the pre-exilic, are represented in the collection, and that non-liturgical considerations may have influenced the later editing.

A striking feature of the later editing of the Psalter is the superscription, like that written at the beginning of Psalm 51: "A psalm of David, when Nathan the prophet came to him after his sin with Bathsheba" (see 1 Sam 12). Such redactional statements make psalms originally at home in the temple liturgy applicable to any individual, since David was the typical Israelite; what happened to him could happen to each of us.

COMMENTARY

BOOK I: PSALMS 1–41

Psalm 1

This poem is classified as a wisdom psalm because it depicts and contrasts dramatically the "two ways," the two fundamental options for human beings. Hebrew rhetoric often views moral life as action, as choosing, and describes it by mentioning typical actions and their consequences. The psalm divides people into two groups: those obedient to the will of the Lord in verses 1-3, and the wickedly disobedient in verses 4-5. Each group will experience the consequences of their activity: life and prosperity for the obedient, ostracism and unrootedness for the wicked. The psalmist is not self-righteous, disdainfully separating people into righteous and sinners; rather, he celebrates the Lord's world, which is experienced as inherently just, rewarding the righteous and punishing the unrighteous. One places oneself in the community of the righteous or of the unrighteous by one's actions. The psalm therefore invites the person of faith to join those who revere and obey the Lord and to avoid those who rebel against the Lord.

Psalm 2

This royal psalm affirms the Israelite king to be regent of the Lord. In four sections of approximately equal length (vv. 1-3, 4-6, 7-9, 10-11), the Lord's sovereignty over the earth, a sovereignty exercised by the Israelite king, is expressed in a series of actions. In verses 1-3 the kings of the world try to throw off the dominion of the Lord and the Lord's anointed: "Let us break their fetters!" Such a wish is laughable (vv. 4-6). There is but one God in the heavens; the "gods" that the nations believe guide their destinies are not powerful before the one God who chose Israel. In verses 7-8 the narrator pronounces, in the legal adoption language of the day, the divine decree that has made the Israelite king the representative on earth of the one true God. In principle, then, this king is the ruler of the whole world and all its other kings (vv. 8-9). In verses 10-11 the unruly kings are warned: Revere the Lord, revere the king!

Psalm 3

In this lament (A—see p. 754) the psalmist is surrounded by enemies who threaten his life and deny the possibility that the Lord will come to the rescue (vv. 2-3). Against such taunts, the psalmist hopes that the Lord will answer heartfelt prayer, even managing to boast that the Lord will give protection in life's most vulnerable moment—lying down to sleep (vv. 5-7). Verse 8 prays that the Lord, like a warrior, will defang the taunting enemy. Such defeat of the enemy constitutes public vindication of the psalmist. Verse 9 is a peaceful statement of praise uttered after hearing the oracle of salvation promising rescue. The "salvation," or rescue, that the enemies denied will come without fail.

Psalm 4

This lament shows a more vigorous confidence in the Lord's protection of the just than in most instances of the genre; it can be called a song of trust. The psalmist prays to the God whose help was experienced in the past (v. 2). Out of that confidence he lectures the wicked; they, not he, are in danger and should make their peace with the Lord through ritual means. The psalmist's nearness to God enables him to warn those who have distanced themselves to be reconciled (vv. 3-6). That nearness also makes the psalmist a model of the blessings of God (vv. 7-9).

Psalm 5

In this lament (A) the psalmist contrasts the security of the house of the Lord (vv. 8-9 and 12-13) with the danger of the company of the wicked (vv. 5-7 and 10-11). He therefore prays insistently for God to hear him (vv. 2-4). Both worlds—the danger of the wicked and the enjoyment of the righteous—are imagined concretely: verses 8-9 describe admittance to the temple; in verses 12-13 the verbs "be glad," "exult," and "be the joy of" describe the singing and shouting of liturgical procession.

Psalm 6

This lament (A) is one of the Penitential Psalms, a designation that originated in the seventh century A.D. for seven psalms (6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, 143), that are especially suitable to express repentance. The psalmist feels burdened with the consequences of his sin—bodily and mental distress (vv. 3, 7-8) and harassment by enemies (vv. 9, 11). The word "sin" in the Bible can denote not only the act of sinning but its consequences as well. Sin brought consequences that had to be borne, consequences such as personal distress and the taunts of enemies. The speaker pleads for forgiveness not only for the past act of sin but also for the consequences of that act. Thus he asks that his bodily self be healed and that his enemies depart. The return of health and the departure of enemies publicly demonstrate divine acceptance. In the last stanza the psalmist shows the effect of hearing the word of assurance—confidence in the Lord's nearness.

Psalm 7

Psalm 7 is a lament (A), specifically the prayer of an accused person who flees to the presence of the Lord in the sanctuary for justice and protection (vv. 2-3). He takes an oath that he is innocent of any crime that would justify his enemies' attack (vv. 4-6). Since in this case he is innocent, having allowed God to scrutinize his inmost heart, the attacks upon him constitute attacks upon the innocent just person. The God of justice must therefore put the enemies down (vv. 7-14). The rout of the enemies by the Lord is at the same time the judicial verdict: the psalmist is declared innocent, and the enemies are declared guilty. The punishment of the wicked comes about by the inherent force of the wicked actions themselves (vv. 15-17). The psalmist dares to put his whole life in God's hands and to rely on God alone for protection against evil and violence.

Psalm 8

The psalm is a hymn (C) in praise of God for having given human beings responsibility and dignity. One should compare Gen 1:1–2:3 and Psalm 104. Verses 4-5 declare that heaven and earth, now arranged in beauty and order, invite praise. The hymnist expresses wonder at the marvelous world crowned by human beings (vv. 6-7). Human beings stand between heaven and earth; the world is made for them.

Psalms 9–10

The two psalms are actually one acrostic poem, that is, each section begins with a successive letter of the twenty-two letter Hebrew alphabet. Like many other acrostic poems, this one appears to be a series of brief, disparate statements given unity by the outer frame of the alphabet. The poem deals with three themes: (1) the rescue of the helpless and poor from their enemies; (2) the Lord's worldwide judgment and rule over the nations; (3) the prosperity of the wicked, which tempts the believer. A clue to the genre may be 9:14-15, where the psalmist offers thanksgiving (B) for being rescued by God. The psalmist, from the experience of personal salvation, points to other instances of divine power.

Psalm 11

Some themes of lament have been made the basis of a song of trust: instead of calling out for rescue from a specific danger, one rests contentedly in the Lord's presence. The psalmist is in danger; friends counsel flight to the hill country, the traditional hideout for people in danger (vv. 1-2). The chaos that, in the Bible, always lurks on the edge of God's creation is closing in on the psalmist; his own innocence appears to offer no help (v. 3). The psalmist chooses not to follow the advice and leave town but to seek the Lord in the temple. He entrusts his plight to the Lord, all-powerful and all-knowing (vv. 4-5). The psalmist's desire for the punishment of the wicked is a desire that God's justice in its totality be done (vv. 6-7).

Psalm 12

In this lament (A) the psalmist is caught in a human jungle, where violent people and liars oppress the just (vv. 2-3). The psalmist prays that the unjust be punished (vv. 4-5), not from a desire for revenge but from a desire to see God's will appear on earth. Verse 6 preserves the words of assurance delivered to the lamenter; usually it is not transmitted with the psalm. Verses 7-9 are statements praising the word of assurance the psalmist is willing to live by.

Psalm 13

In this lament (A) the psalmist prays to be healed lest his death be interpreted by his enemies as divine condemnation. Untimely death and serious sickness could be interpreted as the consequences of sinful conduct. The psalmist is afraid that his enemies will be vindicated. His healing would be a divine verdict in his favor.

Psalm 14

In this lament of the individual (A), duplicated in Psalm 53, the psalmist imagines the world as consisting of two types of people: "the fool" in verses 1-3 and the "just generation" in verses 4-6 (also called "my people" and "the afflicted"). The psalmist complains that the wicked persecute the community of the just (a better translation than "just generation," v. 5), while God watches from heaven. He expresses a firm hope that God will stride forth from the temple, punish the wicked, and uphold the faithful.

Psalm 15

This psalm, like Psalm 24, reflects the ceremony admitting the Israelite to the temple court. The temple was not like a church that one could enter at any time. It was God's house and could be entered only at certain times and under the proper conditions. One had to be admitted by a priest. The visitor had to answer the question of the priest at the gate: "Who may sojourn in 'your tent'?" (a traditional designation for the temple in Jerusalem). The response in verses 2-5 is a list of twelve stipulations, which sum up the covenantal obligations. Without commitment to the covenant, without conversion, one cannot enter the presence of the Lord. The psalm shows that nearness to the Lord is not a matter of external ritual alone; it demands heartfelt commitment as well.

Psalm 16

In this song of trust the psalmist takes refuge in the temple ("for in you I take refuge," v. 1), expressing trust that the Lord, and not the so-called gods of other nations, reigns over the land of Israel. Verses 3-6, despite corruption in verses 3-4, apparently express the psalmist's refusal to honor the local "gods." Only the Lord, who has displaced the Canaanites and their gods by giving the land to Israel, will receive the psalmist's worship (vv. 5-6). Verses 7-11 express how committed the psalmist is to Israel's God, how willing to trust the Lord who has brought the people here.

Psalm 17

This psalm is a lament (A) of one unjustly accused who has taken refuge in the temple to await divine settlement of the case. Verses 1-2 are a prayer for vindication; verses 3-5 are an affirmation of innocence. Verses 6-9 are another prayer, more anxious than the first because of the pressure of the foe in verses 10-12. Verses 13-14 plead that the wicked be broken, and verse 15 is a serene statement of praise. The psalmist seeks a public judgment. He prays for the public punishment of his enemies so that everyone will know that he has been found innocent by the court of last resort, the Lord.

Psalm 18

Psalm 18, duplicated in 2 Sam 22, is a royal thanksgiving (B) for a military victory. The king, in the throes of his suffering, prays in the temple (vv. 5-7), trusting not in his privileges as king but in his loyalty to God (vv. 21-25) and in his membership in God's people (v. 28).

Thanksgivings are in essence reports of divine rescue. The rescue and establishment of the king are told twice, once in mythic language (vv. 5-20) like that used in the narratives of Pss 77:14-21 and 89:10-28, and then in historical language (vv. 36-46). The outline is as follows: (I) hymnic introduction, vv. 2-4; report, vv. 5-20; conclusions regarding why the Lord effected the rescue, vv. 21-25; (II) hymnic introduction (in the second person), vv. 26-35; report, vv. 36-46; proclamation of the Lord's glory to the nations, vv. 47-51.

The king represents Israel, especially to the nations (vv. 44-46, 48, 50); his victory shows to the nations the power of his patron God, Yahweh. The movement of the king from humiliation and suffering (vv. 5-7, 19) to exaltation over the nations (vv. 44-46) makes him a living witness to the Lord's fidelity to the promises made to David and to the Lord's power.

Psalm 19

This unusual poem is a prayer that the law of the Lord, which contains such power to enlighten and enrich the person (vv. 8-11), not be denied to "your servant," the psalmist (vv. 12-15). The serene functioning of the universe expresses the wide scope and precision of the Lord's victory over what once was unbounded sea and primordial darkness, a chaos that had made human society impossible. The picture is the same as that in Psalm 104 and Gen 1.

The "glory of God" that the heavens declare in verse 1 is the power and wisdom that the Lord displays on earth in arranging them. In comparable religious literatures the sun is a judge and lawgiver; hence verses 5b-7 form a transition to the description of the law. The law is the will of the powerful Lord visible to the servants of that Lord; hence the prayer for openness to it (vv. 12-14).

Psalm 20

The psalm is a prayer for the king, who is the representative of the people, before he and his army set out for battle. In the first section (vv. 2-6) the people ask for divine help, and in verses 7-10 they express confidence that such help will be given. A solemn promise of God's help must have been given between the two sections in the liturgy, something like the promise of Pss 12:6 and 21:9-13. The "name" as a surrogate for the Lord occurs frequently in this psalm (vv. 2b, 6b, 8b) and indeed elsewhere in the Psalter (for example, Pss 44:6; 54:8; 118:10-12; 124:8). The idea is that Yahweh dwells in heaven and the name makes Yahweh present on earth. The name is not a magic force but aids those who trust in it alone (vv. 8-9).

Psalm 21

The first part of this prayer for the king is a thanksgiving for benefits given (vv. 2-8), and the second is a promise that the king will triumph over enemies (vv. 9-14). Verse 14 is a brief prayer. The psalm may reflect a temple ceremony that celebrated the Lord's choice of the Davidic king. The king's trust in the Lord (v. 8) and his confident prayer (vv. 3, 5) enable him to receive divine gifts. Vitality and peace are not the only divine gifts visible in the king; through his military prowess the land is kept secure. Hence verses 9-14 portray the warrior-king as helped by the Lord. The heightened language is typical of the Oriental court. When kings ceased in Israel after the sixth century B.C.E., the language came to be used of a future son of David.

Psalm 22

The exceptionally powerful lament (A) freely recasts the lament structure. The complaint is duplicated. The first complaint, verses 2-12, contains two expressions of trust, verses 4-6 and 10-11, with the petition of verse 12 as the climax. The second complaint, verses 13-22, extended by vivid images, climaxes in the petition of verses 20-22. The psalm is unusual in the length of the statement of praise (vv. 23-32), which usually consists of only a verse or two at the end of the lament. The psalmist appears to have had an intense experience of God who saves, and boldly praises God "in the midst of the assembly" (v. 23) for coming to the poor person who hoped for salvation. The psalmist has come to know the Lord in a new way through the divine act and cannot restrain his appreciation and love.

Psalm 23

This, the most beloved psalm in the Psalter, is a song of trust. The Lord is portrayed as a shepherd, a common designation for the god or king in ancient Near Eastern poetry. The title connotes care for the people and, in the case of Israel, leadership in the Exodus-Conquest (compare Pss 78:52-55; 80; Isa 40:11 and Jer 31:10). The psalmist is so confident of the divine shepherd's leadership as to trust even when the path leads through dangerous mountain passes (v. 4a); the shepherd is there (v. 4b). The Exodus-Conquest ended with Israel safe in the Lord's land. That journey is concluded in the psalm with a banquet. The enemies that tried to hinder the journey toward the divine dwelling are shamed as they see God's favor bestowed on the psalmist in the temple.

Psalm 24

Like Psalm 15, this psalm appears to have accompanied the ceremony of admittance to the temple on a solemn occasion (compare v. 3 with Ps 15:1, and vv. 4-6 with Ps 15:2-5). One had to affirm commitment to the covenant in order to appear before the Lord. Verses 1-2 and 7-10 reflect the ceremony. In the first verses the Lord's sovereignty over the created world is celebrated. People of that time imagined that the earth was suspended over vast waters, supported by great pillars. Verses 7-10 describe the procession of the Lord approaching the temple in triumph. Two choirs, singing antiphonally, identify the approaching Lord (perhaps represented by the ark carried by priests). The psalm invites worshipers to commit themselves anew to their Creator-Lord as they join in the triumphant procession.

Psalm 25

The psalm is an acrostic poem, each verse beginning with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Acrostic psalms are often a series of unconnected statements; poetic unity is supplied by the extrinsic device of the successive letters. Despite the looseness, the psalm is a lament (A) containing complaints mixed with pleas to be delivered from enemies (vv. 1-2, 16-22). The psalmist is acutely conscious of having sinned; there is no claim of innocence as in some other psalms. The psalmist's fragility leads to reiterated prayer to be led along the path taken by the friends of God, where one is safe from one's enemies.

Psalm 26

Psalm 26 is often classified as a lament, but the enemies here do not attack, as in laments. Probably the song was sung by the priests who ritually washed before they offered sacrifice. Exod 30:20-21 states: ". . . when they approach the altar in their ministry, to offer an oblation to the Lord, they must wash their hands and feet, lest they die." The psalm was suitable for use by all who sought God's protection as they entered the temple. Verses 1-3, echoed in verses 11-12, remind God of past sincerity while asking for further purification. Verses 4-5, matched in verses 9-10, make a sharp distinction between the wicked and the just; the psalmist prays to be of the company of the righteous. Verses 6-8 are the central panel and the center of the poem. The psalmist expresses the inner meaning of the ritual: joy before the transcendent God who draws near.

Psalm 27

Tradition has handed down the two sections of the psalm, verses 1-6 and verses 7-14, as one psalm, though each part could be understood as complete in itself. The first section is a song of trust, and the second a lament (A). A common theme unites the poem: those who seek the Lord in the temple are protected (see vv. 4-6 and v. 9). Verses 1-3 remind one of another song of trust, Psalm 23, in which the psalmist's conviction of the Lord's protecting presence is intense. Verses 4-6 refer to the temple and the delight and safety to be found there in the midst of a broken and dangerous world. In the liturgy the living, victorious God appears. Verses 7-13 are an anxious prayer that the saving presence not be withheld from the psalmist, who is in danger from enemies. Verse 14 is the statement of praise that customarily ends such psalms.

Psalm 28

In this lament (A) the statement of praise (vv. 6-8), uttered after the priest's words of assurance (not transmitted in this or in most psalms), is exceptionally lengthy and vigorous. The psalmist turns toward the temple, the unshakable center of an otherwise dangerous universe (vv. 1-2). "Those going down into the pit" in verse 1b is a stereotyped expression for those overcome by death and descending to Sheol, the shadowy nether world. Verses 3-5 are a petition that God judge publicly. The psalmist knows that evildoers are heading toward annihilation as a result of their actions; by praying for their destruction he is lining himself up with the just and is thus able to claim God's promised protection of the just. The last verses express the psalmist's acceptance of the word of assurance as effective divine words. The psalmist does not neglect to pray for the people also (v. 9).

Psalm 29

The hymn (C—see p. 755) invites the members of the heavenly court to join in giving glory to Yahweh, the sole God (vv. 1-2). The "glory and strength [rather than praise]" that they give is their recognition that Yahweh alone is king (v. 10), who alone has shaped the world by means of victory. The weapons in that victory are those of the storm-god—thunder ("the voice of the Lord," in verses 3-9), lightning, and wind. With these the Lord has vanquished the forces hostile to civilization and has made them part of the world of men and women. Verse 11 prays that the Lord will impart the power that shaped the universe to the king of Israel and, through that king, to the people. Thus the hymn celebrates the power of the Lord and the sharing of that creative power with the people of God.

Psalm 30

In this thanksgiving (B—see p. 755) praise is given to God for rescue from near fatal illness. Verses 2-4 describe the divine mercy, the snatching of the sick person from the annihilating power of death. As often in thanksgivings, the one rescued is so relieved and delighted that he teaches and exhorts the assembly to trust the saving Lord (vv. 5-6). The assembly learns about the psalmist's inner journey, from his unthinking self-confidence (vv. 7-8a) to his panicky pleas and bargaining when illness struck (vv. 8b-11). Verses 12-13 express the delight of one who has experienced God's favor and forgiveness.

Psalm 31

The psalm is primarily a lament (A), with elements of a thanksgiving (the rescue seems to have already taken place according to verses 8-9 and 20-21) and a song of trust (vv. 4, 6, and 15-16). Moreover, the psalm seems to unfold in two narrative phrases, verses 2-9 and 10-25, probably an instance of the parallelism characteristic of Semitic poetry.

As usual in laments, the affliction is couched in general terms. The psalmist is in danger of being overwhelmed by evil people. In all these pains the psalmist turns to the "faithful God" (v. 6), whose being is described in verses 20-21.

Psalm 32

This thanksgiving (B) is the second of the seven Penitential Psalms of church tradition (see p. 756). The psalmist reports the Lord's rescue: sin once reigned over him, body and soul. Sin here, as often in the Bible, is not only the personal act of rebellion against God but also the consequences of that act—the waning of vitality and frustration.

Burdened with the consequences of personal folly, the psalmist declares everyone blessed who has been forgiven by God (vv. 1-2). Verses 3-4 describe his past refusal to open himself up to the Lord, and verses 5-7, the happy result of letting God be the forgiving God. In verses 8-11 the psalmist becomes a teacher, sharing with the assembly the fruits of personal experience: the wicked (v. 10), who do not open themselves to the forgiving Lord, are unhappy, but those who trust in the merciful God are filled with gladness.

Psalm 33

In this wonderfully complex hymn (C) the just are called to praise God, who made the world by a mere word (vv. 4 and 9). The world is portrayed as three-tiered: the heavenly tier and its inhabitants, the cosmic waters that surround the universe, the earthly tier and its inhabitants (vv. 6-9). The words and plans of human beings, in contrast to God's word, effect nothing (vv. 10-11).

Of all the wonders created by the word of the Lord, human beings are special because they are free to plan and to revere the Lord (vv. 8, 10-11). Verses 12-19 sketch how a people and its king are to conduct themselves on the earth God created. Their greatness consists in God's choice of them and God's clear vision into their hearts (vv. 12-15), in their leader's acknowledgment of the Lord (vv. 16-17). The psalmist directs the people to trust in the One who makes the people great (vv. 20-22).

Psalm 34

This thanksgiving (B) is in acrostic form, each line beginning with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. In this psalm one letter is missing and two are in reverse order. The psalmist, fresh from the experience of being saved by the Lord from danger (vv. 5, 7), calls on all the "lowly" (vv. 3b-4) to praise the Lord, who saves the poor who trust. The "lowly" are the defenseless, who have only the Lord to turn to. If the defenseless person prays, the Lord will hear and that person will become powerful (vv. 7-11). In the second part of the poem, the psalmist, taught true wisdom by his suffering, now teaches the assembly (vv. 12-23). Anyone who is wise will, by right conduct, join the company of the righteous and thus enjoy God's favor.

Psalm 35

In this lament (A) a person unjustly accused by former friends takes refuge in the court of last resort, coming before the divine judge (v. 1) and all-seeing witness (v. 22). Verses 1-8 are a prayer for justice, asking that the evildoers be publicly exposed as such by their punishment. Verses 9-10 are a kind of anticipatory thanksgiving, praising God in advance of the rescue. Verses 11-16 extend the complaint of verse 7: friends have done it! Verses 17-21 press for speedy assistance, and verses 22-26, like verses 1-8, pray for the destruction of the psalmist's unjust persecutors. The modern reader, offended perhaps by the vindictive tone of the psalm, should remember that the psalmist asks for public redress of a public injustice and leaves in God's own hands the carrying out of the work of justice.

Psalm 36

This lament (A) is the prayer of one who feels threatened by "evildoers," people who attack the just (v. 13). The psalmist depicts the wicked in all their arrogance and moral obtuseness (vv. 2-5), and then comes before the just and merciful God, who punishes such evildoers and draws near in tenderness to the beleaguered just (vv. 6-10). Verses 8-10 show the closeness of the saving Lord in the temple service. "The shadow of your wings" refers to the cherubim in the holy of holies. "They have their fill of the prime gifts of your house" reads literally, "they are sated with the fat [of the temple sacrifices]."

Psalm 37

A wise teacher speaks to disciples troubled by the prosperity of the unjust and the hiddenness of God. The psalm is an acrostic; its statements are unified by the extrinsic device of beginning the verses with successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet. In the culture of the time, lore was handed down orally, its authority being based upon the stature and experience of the teacher. Priests, kings, royal officials, and parents were expected to hand on what they had received.

To people troubled by the fact that the unjust victimize the just without being punished, the wise teacher asserts that the disturbing situation is only temporary; the Lord will punish the wicked in the future. In the view of the psalm, people place themselves in the ranks of the unjust by their actions and attitudes. Each path of life, or "way," has its own inherent dynamism—eventual frustration for the wicked, eventual reward for the just. Good things, especially symbolized by the land, lie in the future for the just, a theme with echoes in the New Testament beatitudes. Let the just wait for the Lord!

Psalm 38

In this psalm of lament (A), one of the Penitential Psalms (see p. 756), the psalmist is afflicted with deadly sickness, commonly a sign of divine disfavor. People believed that actions brought consequences of themselves: health, reputation, and prosperity came from good actions; illness, loss of face and poverty followed from evil actions. The psalmist is gravely ill (vv. 4, 6-9) and recognizes that his own actions are the cause (vv. 4-5, 19) of physical and mental suffering and ostracism. There is no one to turn to for help; only the Lord can destroy the cause-and-effect chain of past folly and present misery.

Psalm 39

A mortally ill person, keenly aware of the imminent end of life, prays this individual lament (A). In verses 2-4 the psalmist resolves to remain silent, lest he speak against the God from whom all things come. The psalmist's strategy of reverent silence and submission before the all-knowing and all-effecting God has not, however, brought the hoped for healing and peace. Verses 5-7, uttered with a keen sense of the fleetingness of life, ask how long the psalmist has to live. Verses 8-10 are in tension with verses 5-7; they are a hopeful prayer for rescue after the acceptance of death. Verse 9 should read "Deliver me from all those who rise up against me," on the basis of the parallel verse. "Those who rise up" are the ones who have concluded that the illness is a punishment from God for sinful behavior and are ostracizing the psalmist. People judge the sick person to be punished by God and are hurling insults.

Verse 10, recalling the resolve of silent submission of verses 2-4, is key. The psalmist, recognizing that God is the author of all, including the mortal illness, can only lay out the whole situation before God: "it was your doing." Verses 11-12 again reveal the tension between acceptance (v. 12) and change (v. 11), as do verses 13-14 by the reference to Israel as guests in the Lord's land who have no claim on the life to be found there yet have hope.

Psalm 40

Verses 2-13 are a thanksgiving (B). A distinct psalm, a lament, comprising verses 14-18 has been appended, probably because it reprises some of the vocabulary of verses 2-13. (Verses 14-18 appear also in Psalm 70 and will be treated there.)

The psalmist describes God's rescue in spatial terms, as the pulling out of someone trapped in a bog onto dry land. Even in adversity he hoped. Verse 4 states that rendering thanks is not simply a gift one makes to the Lord in return for rescue but is itself a gift of God. It makes visible to one's neighbors the divine act of mercy (v. 4b). The next verse associates the individual salvation with the great acts of salvation of Israel's past.

Verses 7-9 have suffered some displacement but the gist is clear: the rescued person was expected to offer sacrifice but declares that God desires obedience instead. The verse recalls the memorable words of Samuel to Saul in 1 Sam 15:22: "Obedience is better than sacrifice, and submission than the fat of rams." The mysterious "Behold I come" in verse 8 may reflect a scene like that of Ps 118:19, "Open to me the gates of justice; I will enter them and give thanks to the Lord." The psalmist, then, would enter the temple precincts to give thanks, not with the sacrifice of animals, but with a new song and a devotion to "your law." The final verses emphasize the unrestrained, open-hearted proclamation that characterizes one who has experienced the saving mercy of God.

Psalm 41

This psalm of thanksgiving (B) recounts God's rescue of a sick individual (vv. 4, 5, and 9). The psalmist begins by declaring blessed, that is, regarded favorably by God, those who behave well toward the poor (v. 2). Other psalms use the same formula for those who have been placed in a right relation to God (Pss 32:1-2; 34:9; 40:5; 65:5), but here the right relation is toward the special friends of the Lord.

The psalmist has apparently become part of that privileged group who have experienced the Lord's protection (vv. 3-4), sometimes called "the poor" in the Bible. The narrative of the rescue, essential to a thanksgiving, is done in this psalm by quoting the psalmist's lament before rescue (vv. 5-11). Verse 5 is the beginning of the prayer, "Once I said . . . ." The misery of the past contrasts with present safety. The quoted prayer shows that the chief pain was not physical but emotional—betrayal by enemies, among whom were friends. They wanted all memory of the sufferer erased (a horrible fate for the Hebrew) because they judged the affliction to be the fruit of sin. By their talk they encouraged the separation of the sufferer from the community of God.

Verse 11, the petition for health to requite the enemies, is disturbing to modern readers; the point is that the healing itself is an act of judgment through which God decides for the defendant and against the false friends. The judicial tone carries over to verses 12-13: recovery from illness is a mark of favor showing God's love for this individual. The integrity of which the psalmist boasts is his innocence in the present situation, not for the totality of his life. The blessing in verse 14 is not part of the psalm; it marks the end of Book I, the so-called collection of David's psalms.

BOOK II: PSALMS 42–72

Psalms 42–43

The refrain "Why are you so downcast, O my soul," repeated in 42:6, 12, and 43:5, shows that Psalms 42–43 are a single poem; the traditional separation into two psalms is wrong. It is a lament (A) of an individual who lives beyond Israel's borders in the north and who longs to join the community of God worshiping in the temple in Jerusalem. In the Hebrew scriptures Yahweh is the God of all the world but is revealed only in Jerusalem. What distresses the psalmist is the absence of God, the feeling of deep hunger without the ability to satisfy it because of distance from Jerusalem and the hindrance of enemies. Their taunt, "Where is your God?" (vv. 4, 11), intensifies the pain.

Verses 7-8 show that the psalmist is in the north; Mount Mizar is generally thought to be a mountain in the region of Mount Hermon. In verse 9 the psalmist is caught like Jonah (Jonah 2:3-4) in the deep, a metaphor for the place where Yahweh will not be found. In the last of the three stanzas, Ps 43:1-5, the psalmist prays that Yahweh decide against the enemies who say that Yahweh cannot bring the psalmist to Jerusalem.

Psalm 44

Community laments (A) are often built on the contrast between God's gracious creation of Israel through the Exodus-Conquest and the present distress that seems to negate that creation. The Lord expelled the nations in order to give Israel its land (vv. 2-9), but now the nations expel Israel from that land (vv. 10-17), undoing God's work. Verses 2-9 emphasize the divine initiative in the grant of the land. Israel does nothing—everything is done because of God's own gracious will. But the Lord is now silent as the people are despoiled, even though they are not conscious of any sin against the covenant (vv. 18-23). Here the community struggles with being the Lord's special people and witness while the Lord remains silent before their real pain. Keenly aware of the divine favor that gave them the land in the past, they wait for God's return. The last three verses are a spirited prayer for help, showing that the people do not lose hope.

Psalm 45

This poem is perhaps the most specific in the Psalter; it was sung at the king's marriage to a princess of Phoenicia. Retained in the collection when there was no reigning king, it came to be applied to the anointed king who was to come, the Messiah.

The court poet, conscious of the power of his song (vv. 2, 18), sings first of the Lord's choice of the king over others (vv. 3, 8bc) and of his privilege of establishing the Lord's purpose (vv. 4-8). In verse 9 the poet depicts the ceremony in which the bride, in a majestic procession, is led to the king. The princess is to forget the royal house she came from ("your father's house" of verse 11) and be wife to the king, the viceroy of the Lord of all the earth. Verse 17 is addressed to the king; with his new wife the ancient Davidic (and Abrahamic) promise of progeny and power will come true.

Psalm 46

In this song of Zion, Yahweh is hymned for making the holy city a sure refuge to worshipers, who are terrified by the prospect of a collapsing world. There are three stanzas (vv. 2-4, vv. 5-8, vv. 9-12); the last two are ended by the refrain of verses 8 and 12.

God created the world by subduing the disorderly primal forces that made human life impossible, and established Zion as the glorious divine dwelling. Because God is present at the ordered world's center, the psalmist is confident that there will be no unleashing of those once unruly forces (vv. 2-4), especially in the Lord's own space. The city and temple of the Lord are the place where the memory of God's creation victory is most vivid. That creation can be celebrated in the Lord's shrine, even though the nations, unruly like the primal forces, rage outside (vv. 5-8). The very buildings of the city make visible to the chosen community how powerful the Lord is over all that is chaotic and anti-human. Verse 11 majestically commands all hateful and hurtful powers to submit to the Lord.

Psalm 47

This enthronement psalm celebrates the kingship of Yahweh over all the beings of heaven and earth. The Lord, invisibly enthroned upon the ark is carried in procession into the temple.

The psalm is divided into two parts of equal length, verses 2-6 and 7-10, each beginning with a call to praise. The thought expressed in each stanza is the same: Yahweh is the king, victorious over the powers of heaven and earth (the powers of earth are emphasized in this psalm), and selects Israel as a special people (vv. 5 and 10). The choice of Israel is part of the establishment of the world. Verse 6 probably refers to the trumpet blasts and shouts that accompanied the entry of the ark into the temple, the entry signifying Yahweh's taking possession of the temple as king.

Psalm 48

This psalm praises Zion, the city where Yahweh's world-establishing victory is remembered. The splendid buildings, especially the temple, bespeak Yahweh's power to protect the people from all attack. So suffused with Yahweh's presence is the site of the holy mountain that the psalmist declares the mountain to be higher and more beautiful than any other and to be impregnable to all enemies.

Verses 2-3 praise the mountain where God graciously encounters human beings. The next section, verses 4-9, describes the great deed that proved the Lord's presence on the mountain: the easy defeat of the enemy kings by means of God's storm wind. Verses 10-12 describe the festivities of triumph, resounding far and wide in celebration of the victory that establishes the world. "We ponder" (v. 10) means "we recite" (the stories of Yahweh's victories). The final part, verses 13-15, sees in the solid structures of the temple and city such clear evidence of divine might and loving protection that one need only walk through them to feel secure and loved.

Psalm 49

Though often called a "wisdom psalm" because it contains reflections about the human condition, Psalm 49 is really a confession of trust in God like Ps 27:1-6, except that here there is a more confident tone (note the assurance of vv. 2-5). Also, the enemy is seen in greater profundity—it is death itself.

The opening verses, like Ps 78:1-4, boldly make a new statement about human life before God. In verses 6-10 the psalmist refuses to fear the wealthy who are wicked; their wealth cannot protect them from the ultimate enemy, death. Experience shows that death takes all, the wise (=the righteous) and the wicked. The wealth that once emboldened the wicked to do violence will be scattered. A refrain stating that death levels all closes the first part in verse 13, as it will the second part in verse 21. Verses 14-15 emphasize the theme of the first part: those who live by wealth and violence somehow have death as their shepherd. In contrast, the innocent afflicted person who refuses to fear (v. 6) has as shepherd Yahweh, who will in a mysterious way protect that trusting person from death. The perhaps deliberately enigmatic "by receiving me" recalls God's taking of Enoch in Gen 5:24 (compare 2 Kgs 2:11-12). The Hebrew of verse 16 sounds like and plays on verse 9: a human cannot ransom or save another human but God can save "me," the trusting or persecuted person. In verses 17-21 the psalmist exhorts from the conviction that human beings are not to be feared—they will all die. Only God is the ultimate ransomer.

Psalm 50

Psalm 50 is the record of a ceremony in which the Lord judges the people gathered on Mount Zion. Have they been faithful to the covenant, positively by worshiping and calling upon the Lord alone (as opposed to false gods, vv. 14-15), negatively by avoiding violations of the Ten Commandments (vv. 16-20)? Only a selection of the basic commandments are listed in the psalm. The liturgy reenacts the great encounter of the Lord and Israel at Sinai (Exod 19-24). In liturgical time Mount Zion stands for Mount Sinai as each generation of Israel faces the Lord.

Verses 1-6 describe the manifestation of the Lord on Mount Zion, mediated, in all probability, through trumpet blasts and smoke and fire. In verse 6 the heavens are summoned as witnesses to the people's conduct; heaven and earth (and other cosmic pairs) were often invoked in antiquity as witnesses at the sealing of covenants. Verses 7-15 are divine speech, mediated by the voice of the priest; the Lord does not need the food of animal sacrifice as do the gods of the ancient world (vv. 8-17) but desires the freely given response of the people (vv. 14-15). In verses 16-21 that same divine voice judges the wicked, that is, those who violate the fundamental covenant relationship. Such people are to repent, change. Verses 22-23, despite their vigor, are a positive conclusion to the liturgical encounter: the Lord seeks the free response of the people.

Psalm 51

One of the great laments (A) in the Psalter, this Penitential Psalm (see p. 756) is primarily a plea for the removal of the personal and social distress that sins have caused. The poem is divided into two parts of approximately equal length: verses 3-10 and 11-19, with a coda in vv. 20-21. The two parts are carefully interlocked by repetition of significant words: "blot (wipe) out" in the first verse of each section (vv. 3 and 11); "wash me" in the verse just after the first verse of the first section (v. 4) and just before the last verse (v. 9) of the first section; the repetition of "heart," "God," and "spirit" in verses 12 and 19.

In the first section the psalmist, relying entirely on God's gracious fidelity, prays to be delivered from sin. Verse 10 suggests that the psalmist is sick, and attributes the sickness to sin. Sin is depicted with intense realism, not just a past act against God but its emotional, physical, and social consequences. The psalmist experiences the destructive results of sin (v. 5) and knows that this suffering is self-inflicted and deserved. Before the all-holy God a human being can plead no self-righteousness (v. 7) but can only ask for God's purifying favor (vv. 8-10).

Verse 11 begins the second part by repeating the prayer for forgiveness. Something more profound than the wiping clean of sin is the theme of verses 12-19, namely, a state of nearness to God, a living by the spirit or power of God (vv. 12-13). Such nearness brings joy (v. 14) and enables the forgiven sinner to speak from personal experience to all who are estranged from God (vv. 15-16). That proclamation is the response that God desires, even more than sacrifice in the temple (vv. 17-19). The last two verses make precise the situation: the experience of sin is the exilic absence of God from the temple and its ceremonies.

Psalm 52

Though often classed as a lament, this psalm is unique. The psalmist pronounces judgment upon the wealthy and self-sufficient violent person whose prosperity is a temptation to "the godly," that is, those loyal to God in all things. One can compare Isa 22:15-18, in which the prophet denounces Shebna, a royal official, for his arrogance.

Verses 3-6 resemble a prophetic accusation against the arrogant. The speaker is one of the righteous: in the psalms they often are the victims of "champions of infamy." Lies, violence, and exploitation are their way of life; their prosperity tempts those who believe that God rewards only the righteous. The cry for judgment in verse 7 comes from the troubled heart of a righteous person who believes that the Lord will not allow the godless to triumph. The removal of the godless from the land of the living assures the righteous that the just God is active in their regard; the divine act makes them rejoice (vv. 8-9). Rejoicing over a fallen enemy is distasteful to modern readers, as are the neat categories "the righteous" and "the worker of treachery." The psalmist, however, is not speaking of permanent categories of being but only of the present unfair situation. The psalmist presumably would not deny that a righteous person could join the ranks of the wicked tomorrow, or vice versa.

The last verses are full of confidence. Nearness to God is the ultimate answer to the experience of injustice. Olive trees grow in the sacred precincts of the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem even today, their fertility testifying to God's presence in the shrine. The last verses thank God for upholding justice; the godly can rejoice in divine protection.

Psalm 53

Psalm 53 is a duplicate of Psalm 14 (see p. 758 for commentary). As in Psalm 14, the psalmist sees two kinds of people: the fool (v. 2) and the just (called "my people" in verse 5).

Psalm 54

The psalm is almost a textbook lament (A). The troubled person, attacked by the wicked, calls upon Yahweh directly for help (vv. 3-5). The psalmist refuses to despair and hopes in God, who is active in human history and is just (vv. 6-7). Verses 8-9 render thanks with a certitude that suggests that a priest has in the meantime spoken a reassuring oracle (not transmitted) and the psalmist has accepted it as the word of the God who has promised protection to the poor.

Psalm 55

The psalmist, betrayed by those who were once intimate friends (vv. 14-15 and 21-22), prays that God punish those oath breakers and thus be recognized as the protector of the wronged. The customary structure of the lament (A) is verified here: the unadorned address to God (v. 2); the prayer for deliverance and punishment of the enemy (vv. 3, 10, 16); the vivid dramatization of the oppressive situation so as to appeal to God's sense of honor (vv. 4-9, 11-15, 21-22). The malice of the personal enemy is seen by the psalmist as an instance of the mysterious residual evil in the world, an evil that is palpable in the streets of the city (vv. 11-12). It frightens and discourages those who trust in the Lord. As in other laments, the psalmist trusts so strongly in the salvation of God that he can exhort others (v. 23) and live calmly in the expectation of salvation (v. 24).

Psalm 56

The lament (A) of a person whose enemies threaten death (v. 14) but cannot ultimately keep him from uttering a prayer of trust is enclosed by a refrain (vv. 4-5 and 11-12). The psalmist is glad to be one of the poor, the 'anawim, who by their vulnerability to the attacks of the powerful and wicked invite the special protection of the just and merciful Lord (vv. 2-3). So sure is the hope of the poor that they need not fear even at the height of danger (vv. 4-5 and 11-12). At the moment of danger, which the psalmist does not minimize (vv. 2-8), they can be certain that God tenderly regards their tears (v. 9). No enemy can stand in the way of their joyous duty to give thanks publicly, by vows and offerings, for the life that God has given back to them.

Psalm 57

A lament (A) in which the victim of hostile actions by enemies (vv. 4, 5, 7) prays that God be a refuge and a protection. The drama of the lament, featuring the victim, the wicked, and God, is here especially vivid. The enemies are lions with teeth like swords to devour the just (v. 5); they dig a trap (v. 7). The psalmist expresses with deep feeling his fragility and his confidence in God's protecting presence. "The shadow of your wings" (v. 2) probably refers to the wings of the cherubim (powerful winged animals) whose wings spread over the ark, the throne of the invisible Lord, in the inner chamber of the temple (see 1 Kgs 6:23-28). The refrain "Be exalted . . . O God," is repeated boldly in verses 6 and 12. The psalmist's confession, "My heart is steadfast, O God" (vv. 8-11), is exceptionally vibrant and joyous. The whole psalm is the record of a sensitive yet exuberantly trustful person.

Psalm 58

In this lament (A) the psalmist expresses great trust in the Lord's power to dethrone all that stands in the way of the divine governance of the world. The first verses condemn "the gods," the demonic forces that were popularly imagined to control human destinies (vv. 2-3), and "the wicked," the human instruments of these forces (vv. 4-6). Verses 7-12 pray that God take away their ability to harm the just (vv. 7-10). Such divine vengeance will make the righteous glad; they will see that their Lord is not indifferent to their suffering and has in fact upheld them.

Psalm 59

A lament (A) in which a person endangered by the lying tongues of those who seek to separate him from his God (vv. 7-8, 13, 15) prays that God will uphold him and punish them, and hence be seen as the just God of Israel. Verses 2-8 alternate prayer (vv. 2-3, 5b-6) and depictions of the wicked rampaging against the innocent psalmist (vv. 4-5a, 7-8). The psalmist vividly expresses confidence in the God who is just and loving (vv. 9-11). The near curse upon the enemies in verses 12-13 is not a crude desire for blood vengeance but a wish that the supremacy of Yahweh, about to break into human history, be recognized as such by all people (v. 14b). The God who rules the world (vv. 9, 14b) is also the God who rules the psalmist's life (vv. 17-18).

Psalm 60

In this community lament (A) the people dramatize their situation as defeated and deprived of their God-given land. Informing their complaint before God is their conviction that they are "[God's] people," "those who fear [God]," "[God's] loved ones" (plural; vv. 5-7). They claim the protection of their God Yahweh, who is the Lord of all the nations of the earth. Yahweh has permitted their present plight and hence can reverse it.

The prayer of verse 7 is for an oracle of salvation; "answer us" is a special term for the seeking of the divine word of assurance in crises of war (see, for example, 1 Sam 14:37; 28:6, 15). The oracle of verses 8-10 is the divine response to the prayer, spoken by a priest in the temple. The Divine Warrior, through the priest, declares ownership of the land; the invasion of other nations is not permanent and will ultimately be reversed.

The territories mentioned in verses 8-9 were all part of the God-given territory. Whenever any were taken by an enemy, the people could hold God to that ancient oracle of grant. Verse 11 is the community's faith-response: "The land is ours; let's take it!" Verses 12-14 continue the opening lament, but now, in the light of the favorable divine promise, the words are uttered with a new confidence in the Lord and with a sober awareness of the limits of unaided human power.

Psalm 61

This psalmist, using elements of the lament (A) and thanksgiving form (B), prays in a place far distant from God's saving presence ("from the earth's end," v. 3) to be led to the security of God's presence. The language for security with God is traditional: rock, refuge, tower (vv. 3-5); to dwell forever in the Lord's tent (see Pss 15:1; 27:4); beneath the outstretched wings of the cherubim.

In the second half of the poem the psalmist confesses that God has come to the rescue and given "the heritage [the land] of those who fear [God's] name" to the one who trusted (v. 6). The holy land has a king; prayer is offered that the king reflect adequately the divine vitality (vv. 7-8). The one rescued is happy to sing praises to the name.

Psalm 62

This song of trust takes from the lament a sense of the fragility and danger of life, and from the thanksgiving a serenity arising from the experience of God's power. The serenity appears in the two refrains, verses 2-3 and 6-7, with verse 8 expanding the theme; the anguish is in the angry taunt against the rampaging wicked in verses 4-5. In verses 9-10 the psalmist steps forward as teacher to the community, so vivid has been his experience of God's power. That experience can be Israel's. Verse 12 reveals the astonishing source of the psalmist's contagious trust and inner poise: not the removal of danger but the word of God received as such, which relativizes all other powers.

Psalm 63

Like Psalm 61, this psalm also has elements of a lament (vv. 3-4 and 10-11), of a thanksgiving (vv. 4-6), and of a song of trust (vv. 7-9). The psalmist's situation explains the unusual juxtaposition of diverse genres: the psalmist, beset by liars and enemies (vv. 10, 12b), seeks God (v. 2) in the temple as an asylum in danger (vv. 3 and 8). He may even be spending the night in the sanctuary (vv. 7-8), intending to provoke a dream of reassurance. The one endangered then goes to the place of God's holy presence, the temple, in whose protective power he may be safe and where he can pray that justice be meted out to the wicked.

Psalm 64

This lament (A) is uttered by a person who feels overwhelmed by the malice of the wicked, the enemies of the righteous in the psalms (vv. 2-7). They seek to cut off the individual from the holy people. Hence the prayer to destroy the evildoers' plan is vehement—that God turn against them the very arrows they had aimed against God's friends. The world will then see who is the true ruler of the world (vv. 8-10). Verse 11 is a vow of praise expressing the lively hope that God will bring about a just world.

Psalm 65

There are hymnic elements in this community thanksgiving (B), recited, most probably, at the festival when Israel enjoyed the fruits of the land. The festival could have been Pentecost, when wheat was harvested, or the feast of Ingathering of fruits, grapes, and olives in early autumn, when the rains resumed after the summer dry spell (vv. 10-14).

The Lord is given praise for three mercies: for making Zion a place of encounter and reconciliation for the holy people (vv. 2-5); for overcoming the primordial unbounded waters that once covered the earth and prevented human life from appearing (vv. 6-9); and for making those same waters fertilize the earth to bear fruit (vv. 10-14).

Psalm 66

In genre, this liturgical poem resembles a hymn (C) in verses 1-12 and an individual thanksgiving (B) in verses 13-20; it is now a unified liturgy. Verses 1-2 contain an invitatory exhorting the world to acknowledge Israel's God as uniquely powerful. The greatest proof of this power is the way Yahweh broke the sea's power to keep Israel from its land; let the nations revere this just God (vv. 5-7). Israel's history, the story of its humiliation and exaltation (probably the Babylonian Exile and the restoration), witnesses to God's justice and fidelity—justice, because God punished Israel's sins; fidelity, because God did not abandon the people forever (vv. 8-12).

Any member of this sinful yet rescued people may acknowledge the merciful God through appropriate sacrifice (vv. 13-16). As often in thanksgiving, the one who has experienced God's mercy steps forward as teacher; God is ready to be merciful to all who repent (vv. 16-20).

Psalm 67

The psalm reflects a temple liturgy in which the congregation echoes a part of the famous benediction of Aaron (Num 6:24-26). The people affirm the priestly blessing (v. 2), conscious that their God-given prosperity witnesses to the mercy and power of their God (v. 3). The first of two refrains, inviting the nations to acknowledge Yahweh (v. 4), serves as preface to the statement that Yahweh guides the nations; the second refrain (v. 6) serves as preface to the statement that Yahweh makes the earth bountiful.

Psalm 68

About no other psalm are there so many and such radically different interpretations. The text is disturbed. Some scholars believe that the psalm is simply a collection of short fragments. This commentary sees the psalm as reflecting a liturgical ceremony, a procession to the temple; it is like Pss 24; 106:19-29; and 2 Sam 6.

In verses 2-7 the procession begins, the people following the ark of the covenant, the throne upon which Yahweh is invisibly enthroned. The movement of so powerful a Deity frightens any possible foes but gladdens friends. In verses 8-21 the procession of the ark symbolizes the great battle between Yahweh and Yahweh's enemies, Sea or Death. The evil powers were defeated, and a shrine to the victory was prepared (vv. 16-19). The psalmist acknowledges that the victory of Yahweh over the forces of chaos creates a just world in which the righteous will be safe from the attacks of the wicked (vv. 20-24). The procession includes all the tribes of Israel, rejoicing in their unity (vv. 25-28). The psalm ends with a warning to the nations: recognize the one God and honor God's people.

Psalm 69

The psalm is a lament (A), unusual by its length and by the sufferer's keen sense of suffering for the Lord (vv. 8, 11-12). The depiction of suffering is both metaphorical (vv. 2-3; 15-16: the waters characterize chaos before God creates) and realistic (vv. 4, 5, 9, 11-13: exhaustion, alienation from family and community, misunderstanding of religious acts). Especially in the second part of the psalm is there fervent prayer that the enemies be punished (vv. 23-29). God's punishment of the psalmist's enemies is public vindication of the psalmist. As in other laments, the psalmist expresses hope in God and makes a vow of praise at the end (vv. 31-37); the vow recognizes that God is more pleased with praise than with sacrifice. The sufferer fasts and laments, conscious of the need for purification before the all-holy God, who is no longer encountered in the destroyed temple. These gestures are misinterpreted by his enemies, who judge him to be guilty and rightly afflicted by God. The psalmist's situation of suffering for the Lord and his hope of vindication by an attentive and faithful God applies to all servants of the Lord (vv. 18, 36-37).

Psalm 70

In this lament (A) one of the "afflicted and poor" (v. 6), a group which recognizes that they have no other resource than Yahweh, cries out to be saved from the enemy, "who seek my life" (v. 3). May the group of righteous, to which the psalmist belongs, be upheld with the divine presence that brings joy to the heart (vv. 5-6)!

Psalm 71

This lament (A) is uttered by an old person (v. 9) who seeks asylum in the temple. Persecuted by enemies, who interpret the afflictions of old age as divine judgment (v. 11), the psalmist turns to the God of righteousness whose praise he has sung from his youth. Verses 1-4 are an impassioned cry to God, the immovable rock of refuge. Verses 5-9 express a hope learned from a lifetime of praising God. Verses 10-13 dramatize the menace of the enemies and pray for their downfall. Verses 14-21 develop a prayer for deliverance. The psalmist has sung of God's wonders all these years. Will God allow that voice of praise to grow silent under the attack of enemies? Verses 22-24 are a vow of praise; the psalmist, in the light of the reassuring oracle given by the priest in the temple, will continue the song of praise begun in his youth.

Psalm 72

This royal psalm presents the king as the vicar of Yahweh. He represents to Israel and to the world the justice and peace with which the world was created. The king, however, is a human being who gives only what he has been given; intercession must be made for him. Intercession is the purpose of the psalm.

In verses 1-4, echoed in verses 12-14, the king is the "lengthened arm of Yahweh," exercising divine judgment. Justice here—and generally in the Bible—is not impartial deciding but vigorous upholding of the oppressed party. Verses 12-14 state that the king redeems the life of the poor; he is the agent of Yahweh's rescue of the people. The king embodies not only divine justice but also divinely intended peace and fertility; in verses 5-7 and 16 he embodies health and fertility for the whole land. Yahweh, the sole Deity in heaven and on earth, has a sole vicar, the Israelite king. To that king, therefore, all the nations of the earth come, bringing gifts that acknowledge the just and life-giving divine presence manifest in him (vv. 17-19).

BOOK III: PSALMS 73–89

Psalm 73

This unique probing of the just power of God fits no single genre but comes closest to the thanksgiving psalm (B—see p. 755). The psalmist tells of his rescue from near despair by an experience of God in the temple (vv. 16-20, 21-26).

The opening verse, "How good God is to the upright," is the conclusion. The painful experience behind that faith-inspired affirmation is the matter of the rest of the poem. What scandalized the psalmist was the prosperity of the wicked (vv. 2-14). Israel imagined life as two paths—the path of the wicked that leads to destruction and the path of the righteous that leads to prosperity (see Psalm 1). The prosperity of the wicked makes a mockery of God's governance of the world. To seek a solution to this temptation, the psalmist goes to the temple and there realizes that the end of the wicked shows that God does indeed rule the world with justice (vv. 15-20). Their sudden destruction shows their impermanence.

In the temple the psalmist receives a special sense of God's care: "Yet with you I shall always be" (v. 23). Verse 24, "and in the end you will receive me in glory," has traditionally been understood as a mysterious rescue by God, like the taking up of Enoch in Gen 5:24. The experience of being near God allows the sufferer to affirm God's justice (vv. 1, 27-28).

Psalm 74

This communal lament (A—see p. 754) could appropriately be sung whenever an enemy overran the temple of Yahweh. The destruction of Jerusalem and the temple by the Babylonians in 587 B.C.E. was surely such an occasion. Verses 1-11 directly summon Yahweh to look upon the ruined sanctuary and to remember the very congregation that Yahweh has created (better than "built up") and redeemed (v. 2). Zion and Israel, Yahweh's shrine and people, are inextricably bound together; an attack on the temple is an attack on the project Yahweh has initiated. "How long?" (v. 10) is a real question; ancients often looked for oracles that would tell them how long a disaster would last.

To persuade Yahweh to act, the community remembers liturgically the deed that established their world. As often in the Bible, creation is portrayed as conflict; first unbounded water is tamed and then unbounded darkness (vv. 13-17). Will the one who led Israel to dwell in Zion (vv. 1-2) allow the enemy to scoff (vv. 18-23)? "Your dove," "the humble," "the afflicted and the poor" (vv. 19-21)—these are the terms the faithful use of themselves; they prefer to wait for their God Yahweh to defend them rather than take matters into their own hands as if there were no promise.

Psalm 75

The psalm is a national thanksgiving (B). There had been threats against the people from their enemies, the people cried out, and God judged for them, that is, upheld them and put down their enemies. Verses 3-4 state that in crises threatening the very existence of the world, God alone determines the time of an intervention. That intervention is an act of judgment, which is not an impartial judicial decree but an act in favor of the wronged party (vv. 5-6). That judgment comes from no other source than Israel's God (vv. 7-9). The cup of the Lord that the enemies must drink is a common biblical metaphor for the unopposed power of the Lord over all nations. The community rejoices in the peace brought by the just God (vv. 10-11).

Psalm 76

Psalm 76 is a song of Zion that glorifies the holy mountain as the place where Yahweh is revealed as the creator by vanquishing forces hostile to human community. Verses 2-4 state that Zion is the place where God is acknowledged as sole God because it is the site of the world-establishing victory. Yahweh is the God of all but is uniquely revealed in Jerusalem/Zion. Verses 5-7 and 8-11 describe the victory of the Lord; at the divine rebuke all enemies lay stunned. The afflicted of the earth in verse 10 are all those who wait for Yahweh to save them from the arrogant ones of the world. The final two verses urge those who recognize that the Lord is present in Zion to hasten there with tokens of homage.

Psalm 77

In this community lament (A), someone speaking for the community ("I") describes the intense anguish of Israel when its Lord does nothing for the people. "Will his kindness utterly cease?" (v. 9) is the root question. Has Yahweh forgotten the loving commitment meant to ensure the people's peaceful existence? The assurance had been given time and again in the past to the patriarchs and to the people at Sinai. Verses 12-21, the second half of the poem, recite the divine deed that brought Israel into existence; it is retold in liturgical context ("remember," "meditate," and "ponder" in verses 12-13 really mean "recite") so as to awaken the community's faith that Yahweh will not let that initiating act become null and void. The "works" of the Lord (v. 13) are the victory over the sea that enabled Israel to cross over to Canaan and live as a community under Moses and Aaron, as God intended. The psalm prays that God will be faithful to this original intent.

Psalm 78

This long retelling of Israel's traditions of the Exodus-Conquest makes important changes in the ancient story, changes that would be immediately perceived by the sensitive Israelite. The speaker promises, in the tripartite introduction (vv. 1-4, 5-7, 8-11, each section ending with "the wonderful deeds of Yahweh" or a similar phrase), to draw a new meaning from the ancient story. That story contains a lesson: the present generation ought not defy the new act of God as did their ancestors.

The rest of the psalm consists of two parallel recitals of approximately the same length; they illuminate each other.

First Recital

Wilderness events, vv. 12-32
- Gracious act, vv. 12-16
- Rebellion, vv. 17-20
- Divine anger and punishment (manna and quail), vv. 21-31
- Sequel, vv. 32-39

Second Recital

From Egypt to Canaan, vv. 40-64
- Gracious act, vv. 40-55
- Rebellion, vv. 56-58
- Divine anger and punishment (destruction of Shiloh), vv. 59-64
- Sequel, vv. 65-72

The first recital arranges the old narrative so that the crossing of the Red Sea and the water in the wilderness constitute one great miracle of water, making all the more inexcusable the consequent rebellion—"Can he also give bread, or provide meat for his people?" (v. 20). In punishment, God does not hesitate to make use of the gracious gift of manna and quail to smite them. In the sequel the people fail to recognize the true significance of what has happened.

The second recital concerns Israel's movement from Egypt (whom Yahweh defeats in seven attacks) to the holy mountain shrine of Shiloh. The people's infidelity again provokes divine wrath and punishment, the destruction of Shiloh (the gracious gift). The sequel is the choice of a successor to the rejected Shiloh—Zion and David. Will Israel now fail to see the significance of the divine pattern of gift, sin, punishment, new gift? Will the people recognize that the southern kingdom of Judah is the heir to the destroyed northern kingdom? God has not left the people without a shrine and shepherd. But they must come to both in faith.

Psalm 79

This communal lament (A) complains to God that the nations have defiled the temple and murdered the holy people, leaving their corpses unburied (vv. 1-4). The situation is apparently that which existed after the destruction of the temple by the Babylonians in 587 B.C.E. The people ask "how long" the withdrawal of divine favor will last (v. 5). They acknowledge that their sins have brought the suffering upon them (vv. 8-9). In their plea for divine intervention, the people complain that nations that do not acknowledge Yahweh as God are running rampant (v. 6); that Yahweh's honor is compromised (vv. 1, 10, 12); that Israel, Yahweh's servants, suffer (vv. 2-4, 11). The last verse is a vow of praise, a statement of faith in the Lord who saves.

Psalm 80

In this communal lament (A) the people, defeated in war, appeal to the Lord of all heavenly powers ("O Lord of hosts," v. 5). By reciting the story of their founding, they appeal to God's honor: Will God allow the nations to ravage the chosen vine that was taken from Egypt and planted in Canaan? The magnificence of the vine once proclaimed God's greatness; its despoliation now insults God's honor. The people's hope is in God, not themselves; they promise repentance so that God will never again turn away (v. 19).

After the opening two verses call upon the shepherd of Israel to intervene, the usual lament elements of plea, recital of history, and complaint are punctuated by the refrains of verses 4, 7, and 20. The Davidic king in verse 18 represents the people; his restoration means favor again for everyone.

Psalm 81

The psalm seems to be a record of a liturgy celebrated at one of the three great festivals—Passover, Pentecost, or Harvest. The community is summoned before God in verses 2-4, the gathering being commanded by the law (vv. 5-6). A speaker then recites to the community the great act of liberation that made Israel into a people: the Exodus from Egypt (vv. 6b-8). In Egypt the people had been unwilling servants of Pharaoh, but at Sinai they became willing servants of Yahweh, freely agreeing to obey the commandments, the first of which is repeated in verses 10-11. The speaker rebukes the people for violating the commandment that makes them God's people (vv. 12-13). But there is still time to obey, to "hear" the great commandment; to obey will bring divine protection and nurture (vv. 14-17). The psalms bring the people before their God, who seeks from them a free and loving response.

Psalm 82

The psalmist paints a vivid picture of the heavenly assembly, where Yahweh declares that no other divine being controls human history. In the ancient Near East, people commonly assumed there were many gods who controlled human destinies. Yahweh accuses these "gods" of injustice, of not upholding the cause of the defenseless (vv. 2-4), and proclaims judgment in earthshaking thunder (v. 5). Verses 6-7 strip power from such beings. Because Yahweh is now the sole judge (=ruler), the faithful are to direct their pleas for justice to this God alone (v. 8).

Psalm 83

The community laments (A) the attacks of the nations against Zion. Yahweh's shrine on earth is inviolable (Psalms 2, 46, 48, 76). When enemies overrun it, Yahweh's claim to be the sole Deity comes into question.

After the unadorned cry to God in verse 2, the complaint in verses 3-9 portrays all the enemies who have plagued Israel through the ages as conspiring to wipe out Israel's name. The name (vv. 5, 17, 19) is the means by which one is known. Verses 10-13 pray that Yahweh destroy the current crop of enemies as the enemies of old were destroyed. The children of Lot are Moab and Edom (Gen 19:36-38 and Deut 2:9). The victory of Gideon at Midian is told in Judg 6–8; the defeat of Sisera and Jabin, in Judg 4–5; of Oreb and Zeeb, in Judg 7:25; of Zebah and Zalmunna, in Judg 8:21. Verses 14-19 extend the prayer: Yahweh is to storm against the foes so that they will learn that the sanctuary is indeed a secure place for the people.

Psalm 84

How joyfully the Israelite fulfills the obligation of the law to go up to Jerusalem three times a year (Deut 16:1-17) is vividly portrayed in this psalm. All living things are safe from threat in the presence of the Lord (vv. 3-4). The pilgrim forgets the difficulties of the journey (vv. 5-8). The king is the representative of Yahweh, and prayer is offered by him at the feasts (vv. 9-10). The Lord's presence is not just a matter of space; only those who walk uprightly and who trust enjoy the blessings of divine nearness (vv. 11-13).

Psalm 85

In this national lament (A) Israel recalls how their God in the past has forgiven their sins and restored their land and fortunes (vv. 2-4). To Yahweh, their forgiving and restoring God, they pray in their distress: Once more show yourself a healing God (vv. 5-8). The people, because of their sins, do not demand restoration; they wait in faith for God: "I will hear what God proclaims." God's favor is neither automatic nor indiscriminate; only those among the people who fear the Lord can hope to enjoy salvation (vv. 9-10). The divine answer comes in verses 11-14. God's attributes, "kindness and truth . . . justice and peace," will once again work in the land, making a place fit for God to dwell. The psalm was probably composed during the sixth-century Exile, when Israel was tempted to believe that God had left forever.

Psalm 86

In this individual lament (A), which draws many of its expressions from other psalms, the singer describes himself as "afflicted and poor" (v. 1); "devoted" (v. 2); "your servant" (vv. 2, 4, 16); "rescued from the depths of the nether world" (v. 13); attacked by the haughty (v. 14). These are the self-designations of one who confesses that there is no other protection from life's dangers than the graciously bestowed protection of Yahweh. All the elements of a lament are here—the unadorned cry for help, the complaint, the prayer, the expression of hope. But in this psalm the distress of the psalmist seems less particular; the servant does not seem to be overly frightened by threats, for somehow they bring him closer to the Lord. In that attitude the servants find their identity.

Psalm 87

This poem, unfortunately textually damaged, is a song of Zion, like Psalms 46, 48, 76, and 132. The situation seems to be the Exile or its aftermath, when Zion's citizens were scattered over Babylon and Egypt. To be a citizen of Zion is protection enough for anyone, for it is the city of the only powerful God.

Psalm 88

In few laments (A) is the fear of death so vividly portrayed. A land of darkness and oblivion far below the earth (vv. 4-8), of separation from friends and human society (vv. 9, 19) is the way the psalmist imagines Sheol in the era before there was any thought of resurrection from the dead. Nonetheless, the frightened and afflicted person continues to cry out to the God of life; prayers punctuate the psalm (vv. 2-3, 10, 14). The psalmist's strategy is clever: he reminds God that only the living remember and celebrate the wonderful divine mercies (vv. 11-13). The life that the psalmist seeks is life with God and with one's community. What is terrifying in death is the loss of others.

Psalm 89

The community laments (A) the defeat of the king, who represents Yahweh's mastery of the world and its inhabitants. That mastery was shown by God's creation victory. The defeat of Yahweh's lieutenant on earth, the king, raises the question of whether Yahweh is truly the powerful God. Verses 2-5 hymn the God who made secure in one creative act the heavens and the Davidic dynasty. Like other communal laments, verses 6-38 narrate the original event that brought Israel into existence—in this psalm, the conquest of primordial sea, the making of the earth through orderly pairs of elements, and the leading of the people to the land (vv. 9-19). Part of that world-establishing victory is the installation of the Davidic king, with whom Yahweh shares the fruit of this universal victory in a solemn promise (vv. 20-38). But now in our day, complains the community, our king is not protected; enemies break through at will (vv. 39-52). The community, despite its grief, has faith enough to hold Yahweh to the original promise.

BOOK IV: PSALMS 90–106

Psalm 90

In most community laments (A) Israel recalls the founding event, the divine act that brought them into existence—the Exodus-Conquest, the act of creation. The people's plea is that God not allow the present danger to wipe out the community that has been graciously established. In this psalm the danger is not external, for example a foreign nation, but the evil intent of the people themselves. Humans and God are incommensurate—their life, plans, and power (vv. 3-11). The psalmist remembers the eternity of God; even before the world was made, God was (vv. 1-2). Hence the prayer in verses 12-17 that God teach the people to know themselves before God, to let them experience the special joy of servants, of those who see the power of God and see their own plans affirmed by grace. The poem is not simply a meditation on human frailty; it speaks from the experience of God's just punishment of sin and from confidence in God's forgiveness.

Psalm 91

This song of trust comes from a person who has experienced the asylum of the temple. From that spot, safe under the wings of the Most High (vv. 1-2; see 1 Kgs 6:23-28), the psalmist assures those laboring under the dangers always besetting the just that God will overcome all. Verses 3-13 are a series of promises that the salvation of the Lord, so palpable in the temple, will be available in all areas if one makes the Lord one's refuge. In verses 14-16 the Lord speaks directly to all who maintain their trust in the face of the danger and bitterness of life. Adapted from the promise of salvation in the lament (A), it invites those in danger to the ultimate protection and loving relationship.

Psalm 92

The song is a hymn (C), in that it states how appropriate it is to praise God for the work of just and gracious governance, and a thanksgiving (B), in that it tells how the psalmist was rescued from personal enemies (vv. 10-11). Because of the triumph of the wicked, the psalmist must have been tempted by the kind of doubts about God's justice that are vividly described in Psalms 37, 49, and 73. Profound rejoicing in the just and merciful God mark this psalm. Verse 9, "while you, O Lord, are the Most High forever," is the exact center of the poem. Also, the same Hebrew verb is repeated at the beginning and end (translated "to proclaim" in verse 2 and "declaring" in verse 16).

Verses 2-5 emphasize how beautiful and fitting it is to praise God for showing justice. Verses 6-12 describe the experience of one who has just seen that merciful justice in action. That supremacy can be seen, however, only by those who are themselves just. "How very deep are your thoughts!" (v. 6) means "your intentions are hidden." The person who waits for the Lord, like this psalmist, will experience rescue. The last section (vv. 13-16) describes what life in the presence of the only God consists in. The trees in the great court of the temple symbolize the life offered to those who are just. The security and happiness of the just will declare the Lord's mercy and fidelity.

Preface to Psalms 93, 95–100

These psalms all elaborate the kingship of Yahweh in a similar way. In all of them "Yahweh reigns." In the ancient Near East, polytheistic except for Israel, a god was acclaimed powerful over the other gods because of a specific act of power. The greatest act was creation, bringing the world of men and women into existence. In the Bible creation is frequently the creation of Israel as a people securely dwelling before Yahweh in the sanctuary. This could be expressed either in the language of the Exodus-Conquest or in the language of cosmogony, the overcoming of forces hostile to human community. The latter language was already centuries old when borrowed by Israel. Yahweh proves to be supreme among the gods by conquering the annihilating power of sea (less frequently, the power of primordial night). Yahweh then arranges the elements to support human community and brings the people to dwell securely in the sanctuary, the temple. The temple and its ceremonies figure prominently in these psalms. The jubilant people are admitted into the court, where they acknowledge Yahweh's great victory that has made them God's people. Whether Israel annually celebrated Yahweh's kingship is a matter that is still unsettled.

Psalm 93

(Read the preface to Psalm 93 above.) This hymn (C) celebrates the kingship of Yahweh, who created the world (vv. 1-2) by defeating sea (vv. 3-4). Sea completely covered the land, making human life impossible. Sea in the psalm, as customary elsewhere in the Bible, is endowed with will; it roars in wrath against the power of Yahweh. The decrees of verse 5 are the designs that the Lord imposes upon the newly ordered world, designs also found in Israel's law. Verses 1ab and 5 thus frame the poem; a gloriously garbed Yahweh utters those words that structure the world.

Psalm 94

This lament (A) complains to God that the wicked and the arrogant have the upper hand and that those who are faithful, "the righteous," are their victims. It is more a personal than a national lament (the psalmist speaks of personal distress in verses 16-19), yet there is concern for the people as well (vv. 5-7, 20-21). It is probably placed among the psalms of Yahweh's kingship (Psalms 93 and 95–100) because of its expectation that Yahweh will judge the earth.

Verses 1-2, a cry to Yahweh, contain the striking epithet "God of vengeance." "Vengeance" here means the intent to right an unfair situation by punishing the wicked. "How long" introduces the complaint of verses 3-7: For what length of time must the psalmist suffer the silence of God in the face of rampant injustice against the poor? Verses 8-11 and 12-15 are declarations of faith. The first bravely tells the evildoers that their statement that the Lord does not see (v. 7) is false and that their plans (rather than "thoughts," v. 11a) are doomed; the second assures the persecuted that their sufferings have meaning and are only temporary. In verses 16-19 the psalmist teaches the people from personal experience that the Lord does indeed console, even in the midst of trials like these. The last section (vv. 20-23) boldly affirms, on the basis of God's justice and the psalmist's experience, that the Lord will indeed rectify the present intolerable situation.

Psalm 95

(Read the preface to Psalms 95–100, p. 774). Verses 1-5 and 6-7 are parallel (ten lines in the first section, five in the second). Each invites the people to come to the temple, the sole place where Yahweh's power is manifested in building and ritual. In verses 3-5 Yahweh's supremacy over all powers in the heavens is shown through the easy arrangement of the paired elements that make up the world: the depths of the earth and the mountains, the sea and the land. After the second invitation in verse 6, the second step in creation is mentioned—the creation of Israel as Yahweh's special flock (v. 7). In verses 7c-11 the flock is abruptly confronted: Will they be obedient as befits Yahweh's flock? People had to be admitted in a gate ceremony like those portrayed in Psalms 15 and 24. "Does your behavior really say you are God's people?" they were asked. This psalm ends with such a scrutiny. The question is not simply a convention; Israel's first generation was never admitted to the holy land because of its apostasy. Yahweh's people must live by Yahweh's word.

Psalm 96

(Read the preface to Psalms 95–100, p. 774.) The theme of the sole kingship of Yahweh is again elaborated in this hymn (C), but with a special call to the nations (vv. 7-10)—indeed all creation, animate and inanimate (vv. 11-12)—to join the chorus of welcome. The first section (vv. 1-6) calls for a new song, that is, a song appropriate to the renewal of the earth through creation. The very proclamation of the act of creation, ("his salvation," "his glory," "his wondrous deeds," vv. 2-3), is itself a denial of other gods, for they had nothing to do with the making of the world (vv. 4-5). The temple, the last great deed in Yahweh's creating, embodies divine glory in a special way (v. 6).

The second invitation, that the nations bring their gifts to Yahweh in the temple (vv. 7-10), flows logically from the first section. Verses 1-6 state that Yahweh, by virtue of creation, is supreme over "the gods," the patrons of the nations, and that this work of creation is specially visible in the temple. The final section (vv. 11-13) exhorts nature to greet the Creator-God who comes to judge, that is, to see that the newly created world operates according to the divine intent.

Psalm 97

(Read the preface to Psalms 95–100, p. 774.) This hymn (C) extols the reign of Yahweh, portraying in its two sections the manifestation of that reign to the world at large (vv. 1-7) and then, in a special way, to Zion and its cities (vv. 8-12). The sections are demarcated by the repetition of the verbs "rejoice" and "be glad" in verses 1 and 8 and the polar opposites of worshipers of images and worshipers of Yahweh in verses 7 and 12. In the first section the kingship of Yahweh is manifested dynamically in the weapons of thunder and lightning that overcame all opposition; other so-called gods and their worshipers are shamed. In the second section Zion welcomes its victorious Creator-Lord. The righteous are those who worship aright; they are the ones who are vindicated when their Lord comes in power.

Psalm 98

(Read the preface to Psalms 95–100, p. 774.) In this hymn (C) the community celebrates the victory of Yahweh, which brings joy to the world and establishes Yahweh as judge over all (v. 9). The victory of which verse 2 speaks (the "wondrous deeds" of verse 1 and the "justice" of verse 2) is specific: the conquest of all threats to the peaceful existence of Israel. The threats are depicted in the psalms in various guises—cosmic forces such as sea, nations bent on Israel's destruction, evildoers seemingly triumphant. Yet all are reductively one: those who condemn Yahweh's will for a just universe in which Israel dwells secure. God's judging can only cause exultation to all peoples, for evil forces will be destroyed (vv. 7-9). God's judging is not an impartial settlement of claims but the vigorous upholding of the wrong and oppressed; such protection was promised to Israel of old (v. 3). The hymn is structured by a threefold invitation (vv. 1, 4, and 7).

Psalm 99

(Read the preface to Psalms 95–100, p. 774.) The emphasis in this hymn (C) to the supreme King is upon Zion, the place where that supremacy is visible, and upon Israel, the people who have transmitted God's royal decrees. Yahweh is, to be sure, the sole God of all the world, but Yahweh is revealed in Zion by means of the people Israel. The poem is structured by the threefold statement that God is holy (vv. 3, 5, and 9) and by the twice-repeated command to extol Yahweh (vv. 5 and 9). Verses 6-8 single out Israel as the sole nation in dialogue with Yahweh by mentioning its most famous spokespersons—Moses, Aaron, and Samuel. They heard the authentic word of Yahweh and handed it on. Yahweh's help, given when "he answered them" (vv. 6, 8), is a sure sign of the validity of that word. All nations are to respond to Yahweh, God of the world, by serving this God in Zion of Israel.

Psalm 100

(Read the preface to Psalms 95–100, p. 774.) Though this hymn (C) does not mention kingship explicitly, it presumes the same thought-world as the other psalms of kingship—the invitations to the world to rejoice and to do so in the court of the temple. Much is condensed in this brief poem. The world is to rejoice and to come to the temple because Yahweh is God. It must be assumed that God's supremacy here is manifested through the same act as in Psalms 93, 95–99: the creation victory over hostile forces, a victory that makes the world and Israel. It is appropriate, then, to enter and give thanks.

Psalm 101

In this royal psalm the Davidic king liturgically affirms his task of overseeing the justice of God in the kingdom. The first verse is the leitmotif: kindness and judgment describe God's gracious choice of the king, and, through the king, of Israel. The king here, as in Psalms 72 and 89, is the agent of God's holiness and justice in the world of men and women. He cleanses his house of evildoers (vv. 3b-5, 7-8), his "house" (vv. 2, 7) meaning his family and palace. He is the model Israelite (vv. 2-3a) and champions all who are faithful by putting them in positions of responsibility (v. 6). The psalm is a vow in the sight of God; before the people the king promises to avoid Oriental despotism and to be the servant of the just God.

Psalm 102

In this lament (A), a Penitential Psalm, the psalmist's experience of bodily and psychic disintegration (vv. 4-12) impels a cry to God (vv. 2-3), whose "fury and wrath" (v. 11) have caused the suffering. The psalmist attributes whatever happens to God; hence the present affliction must be due to God's "fury and wrath."

Psalms of individual lament include a statement of hope in the midst of the complaint. In verses 13-23 the distressed person, standing in the temple, the very place where Yahweh has promised to be present, hopes that help will be given. In verses 17-18 the Lord has built Zion, and so it is a refuge from every danger. Verses 19-23 are the motto of Zion: In this spot the Lord protects the people; and this protective care is revealed in the sight of the whole world. Verses 24-29 restate the original complaint and prayer for salvation (vv. 24-25) and add an act of faith in the God who will always guard the faithful servants. The psalmist, by going to the temple and being one of the Lord's servants, finds security in the midst of suffering.

Psalm 103

In this hymn (C) the speaker praises the God whose graciousness has been shown in all moments of personal life—in actions of forgiveness and protection from life-threatening forces (vv. 1-5). This is the same Lord who ever acts on behalf of the needy, having acted for Israel through the mediation of Moses. Verses 6-18 characterize the God of Israel as just, yet never allowing justice to circumvent a merciful choice. Human sin cannot destroy God's favor (vv. 11-13), nor can frailty and insignificance (when measured against God's eternity). Those who are faithful to the covenant become members of that company with whom God has promised to remain (vv. 17-18). The praise of the Lord is not the task of Israel alone; the beings of the heavenly world are to join in the praise (vv. 19-22).

Psalm 104

This hymn (C) praises God, who with ease and skill has made primordial night and rampaging waters into a world everywhere vibrant with life. The conception of the psalm is the same as Gen 1, where a dark and watery chaos (Gen 1:1-2) receives light on the first day and dry land on the second day. The two forces, night and waters, that had made human community impossible are not annihilated; they are made into an integral part of creation.

In verses 1-4 the speaker acknowledges that the Lord's palace, entourage, and very self by their splendor reflect God's mastery over the heavenly world. In verses 5-18 the divine mastery extends to the waters; the waters that once completely covered the earth flee to their proper place at the divine rebuke (vv. 5-9). Water now is tamed for the service of people, nourishing life in rivers (vv. 10-12) and in rain (vv. 13-15), and even fertilizing the fabled mountain of Lebanon (vv. 16-17). Verses 19-23 show the mastery over darkness; it is now part of the sequence of night and day, necessary and helpful to humans and animals (vv. 19-23). In the face of such wisdom and power, the psalmist exclaims in awe (v. 24). Even the vast sea, the mysterious fringe of the known world, is under God. There, too, God has placed a living being, Leviathan, that it might enjoy life, (vv. 25-26). God's world is not the clock of the Deist philosophers, wound and left to run mechanically; at every moment each creature looks to God for its being. God's spirit, or breath, is necessary for life, as it is in Gen 2-3 and Ezek 37:1-14 (vv. 27-30).

Control over the elemental forces on earth shows the glory of the Lord, the theme of religious song (vv. 31-34). The only thing that can obscure God's glory is human sin. The psalmist prays that sinners no longer deface the handiwork of the Lord (v. 35).

Psalm 105

This is a hymn (C) to the Lord who has promised the land of Canaan to the people, the Lord who can be sought in all places and at all times, whose word of promise is everywhere effective. In verses 1-6 Israel, descendant of the patriarchs Abraham and Jacob, is invited to praise and seek the Lord's presence. Verses 7-11 identify God as the Lord of the whole world and as the one who remembers the promise of land to the patriarchs. Verses 12-45 retell the mighty deeds of the past that are relevant to the present situation:

vv. 12-15	the ancestors in the land of Canaan
vv. 16-22	Joseph in the land of Egypt
vv. 23-38	Israel in the land of Egypt
vv. 39-45	Israel in the desert on the way to Canaan

In each of the four episodes there are three elements: (1) a servant(s) through whom appears (2) the ancestral word of promise of (3) the land of Canaan. Yahweh has always been faithful to the promise to give Israel the land of Canaan. The psalm seems to be a song of Israel in the sixth-century Exile, when it did not actually possess the land. It invites praise of the Lord who will act to bring the people home.

Psalm 106

This community lament (A) retells incidents from Israel's national story, the Exodus-Conquest, to show that God's mercy has been as evident as God's justice. The speaker's "I" in verses 4-5 includes all Israelites, whose plea for mercy rests completely in the God whose work has never been destroyed by sin.

The opening five verses praise God and God's great deed of fashioning a people. May the speaker and the congregation always be among those whom God favors! Verses 6-12 portray the first of the eight incidents in the psalm in which the people responded to God's gracious act by rebellion. At the Red Sea (Exod 14–15), the Lord saved the people despite their rebellion. The same will to save is depicted in the scenes of divine deed, rebellion, and punishment of verses 13-15 (see Num 11); vv. 16-18 (see Num 16); vv. 19-23 (see Exod 32–34); vv. 24-27 (see Num 13–14); vv. 28-31 (see Num 25:1-15); vv. 32-33 (see Num 20:1-13); vv. 34-39 (see Judg 3:3-6). Verses 40-46 describe the same general rhythm of apostasy, punishment and rescue that characterized Israel during the period of the judges (see Judg 2:6–3:6). Israel's history shows that God has punished justly but has never let destruction be the last word. Therefore, in verses 47-48 the people pray that God bring them back from the just punishment of their exile so that they might again give praise.

BOOK V: PSALMS 107–150

Psalm 107

This hymn (C) invites all Israelites to praise the Lord, who has brought them into being as a single people, redeeming them from every danger, bringing them from the four corners of the earth (vv. 1-3). In verses 4-32 four archetypal divine rescues of perishing people are described: rescue from the sterile desert in verses 4-9, from the bonds of primordial night in vv. 10-16, from mortal illness in verses 17-22, and from the angry sea in verses 23-32. God's power on behalf of the endangered and needy invites them to praise (vv. 8, 15, 21, 31). The number four in ancient Near Eastern literature often suggests totality, as in the phrase "the four corners of the earth"; the four cases, therefore, represent all cases of extreme need.

The same redeeming activity of the Lord is shown in Israel's story in verses 33-41. Yahweh destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah in Gen 18–19, which this psalm sees as a type of the destruction of the wicked inhabitants of Canaan in order to clear the land for Israel (vv. 33-34). The Lord led Israel in the desert, settling them in the land and giving increase to crop and herd (vv. 35-38). Whenever the people are endangered, as in the four cases of verses 4-32, the Lord rescues them (vv. 39-41). Israel thus becomes a showcase of this Lord's power and mercy to the entire world. Verses 42-43 invite all to see that Israel witnesses to the Lord's graciousness; in the daily life of the people graciousness of the Lord appears.

Psalm 108

This poem is a composite of old pieces. Verses 2-6 are the same as Ps 57:8-12, and verses 7-14 are the same as Ps 60:7-14. Probably it is a prayer for victory. Verses 2-7 are a bold song of confidence and of petition to God for victory. Verses 8-11 are an oracle of salvation, uttered most probably by the priest in the temple during war; they promise that God the Warrior will defend the land. Verses 12-14 take up and develop the petition of verses 6-7.

Psalm 109

This lament (A) is noteworthy for length and vehemence of its prayer against the evildoer (vv. 6-20). The cry to God in verse 1 and the complaint of verses 2-5 and 22-25 are brief in comparison. The psalmist apparently is the victim of a campaign of slander, which could be devastating in a society where reputation and honor are paramount. In the dramatic perspective of the psalm, there are only two types of people: the wicked and their poor victims. The psalmist is one of the poor (vv. 22, 31), one of the friends of God who are enemies of the wicked. The poor person asks vindication not because of personal virtue but because God has promised to be the friend of the poor.

Psalm 110

In this royal psalm, which resembles Psalm 89 and especially Psalm 2, a court singer delivers three oracles concerning the king (vv. 1, 2, 4). They promise, respectively, a place of honor with God, who achieves victory over evil, divine sonship, and priesthood or mediation between God and people. The three oracles are expanded in verses 5-6; the king, as ruler for Yahweh, will exercise divine sovereignty over the whole world. Verse 3 is corrupt; the translation is a guess. The poem is most probably from the coronation of the Davidic king. The last verse about drinking from the brook may refer to a rite at Gihon brook, like that implied in 1 Kgs 1:38-40.

Psalm 111

Like Psalms 9-10, 25, 34, 37, and 112, this poem is acrostic, each verse beginning with a successive letter of the twenty-two-letter Hebrew alphabet. Verse 1 gives the situation: a temple singer praises the Lord by reciting the Lord's actions in Israel's history. The singer is a teacher as well as a leader in song. Verses 2-10 teach that the Lord is revealed in historical act. In the recital, precept and gracious act are both divine gift; to remember and to obey are simply two modes of responding to God's initiative.

Psalm 112

Like Psalm 111 and other psalms, this poem is acrostic, each line beginning with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Like Psalm 1, it assures life to the person who remains close to the Lord by willingly obeying the divine will. In the psalm life consists of abundant progeny (v. 2), wealth that enables one to be magnanimous (vv. 3, 5, 9), and virtue that enables one to support other people in the community (v. 4). The words "forever" or "everlasting" occur three times, spaced evenly throughout the poem (vv. 3, 6, 9), showing how rooted and stable is the person near the Lord. The just person is an affront to the wicked, whose life wastes away in envy and frustration (v. 10). The psalm draws upon the tradition of the two ways of life; the ways are starkly set before every person so as to elicit a choice.

Psalm 113

This hymn (C) exhorts the servants or worshipers of the Lord to praise the divine name, that is, the way in which God is presented to the world. The name is especially manifest in the celebrations of the temple (v. 1), but, since God is over all things, praise cannot be confined to a particular time or place (vv. 2-3). Yahweh, Israel's God, acts in the heavens above and on the earth below. The last three verses celebrate Yahweh acting as judge. In the Bible, to judge is not to render an impartial verdict from afar but to right wrongs and relieve the poor.

Psalm 114

This hymn (C), lacking the usual invitation for others to join in, celebrates the Exodus-Conquest, the act by which Israel came into being as a people. In the concentrated perspective of the poem, the people move directly from Egypt to Israel/Judah, the sacred land of Yahweh (vv. 1-2). Sea/Jordan, which stands between the people and their land as an obstacle, is personified. Like a panic-stricken soldier, it flees before the mighty Yahweh, who fights at the head of the people. The earth quakes at the cosmic battle and victory (v. 4). The natural elements are then taunted, as one would taunt a defeated enemy (vv. 5-6). As Yahweh heads the procession of the rescued people into the safety of the holy land, the natural elements are commanded to greet their new master, Yahweh.

Psalm 115

The psalm probably records a liturgy performed by Israel at a time when its misery and small numbers provoked its neighbors to taunt, "Where is your God?" The community answers with a prayer to Yahweh to uphold the divine name (vv. 1-3) and with a countertaunt that the neighbor's gods are as impotent as the statues that represent them in the splendid rituals (vv. 4-8). Israel has no images of its God, Yahweh; it is itself the image of Yahweh, testifying to God's glory by its actions. Verses 9-11 describe the Israelite community as constituted by its trust in Yahweh, its sole support. And that hope is answered by the blessing in verses 12-18. Blessing means enhancement of life and increase of progeny. Israel is confident that its own blessed existence on earth redounds to God's glory, showing that Yahweh is a living God (vv. 14-16). This psalm and Psalm 135 make use of ideas about Israel as the image of God found in Second Isaiah. The psalms are probably postexilic.

Psalm 116

In this loosely knit thanksgiving (B), the speaker responds to God's rescue of him from the clutches of death (vv. 3-4) and from near despair (vv. 10-11) with vows and sacrifice in the temple (vv. 13-14, 17-19). The chief praise, however, is expressed in the vivid description of the divine mercy and the public proclamation of the Lord's attentiveness to the cry of the poor. Grievous indeed in the Lord's sight is the death of the faithful ones (v. 17). It is the experience of the saving Lord that enables one to say, "I am your servant" (v. 16).

Psalm 117

In this shortest of all hymns (C), the nations are called to acknowledge Yahweh's sovereignty because of God's never-ending fidelity to Israel. Israel's secure existence, owed entirely to Yahweh's grace, is the proof to the world that only Yahweh is God.

Psalm 118

A thanksgiving (B) after a victory, this psalm accompanies a procession into the temple precincts. Solemn entry into the temple by king and people and their partaking of a banquet were ways of celebrating the Exodus-Conquest, when Yahweh led the people from the domain of Pharaoh to Yahweh's own domain. Verses 1-4 call upon the ranks of worshipers to praise the Lord, for the Lord is faithful. In verses 5-18 the speaker tells of the divine mercy shown by Yahweh's rescue of the people from their enemies. The citation of the old poem about the Exodus-Conquest in Exod 15 (v. 14 = Exod 15:2; vv. 15-16 = Exod 15:6; v. 28 = Exod 15:2) suggests that today's victory is an extension of the original victory that made Israel a people.

Verses 19-29 echo the cries of the procession as it enters the great court of the temple. Only the just, those whom God has chosen, may enter; victory today has shown the people that they are chosen and thus may enter. Verse 22 is a proverb; what is insignificant has become great through divine election. The reference may be to the foundation stone of the temple. The psalm orchestrates the people's movement and shouts a hymn to the Lord of victory.

Psalm 119

Psalm 119 is the longest psalm in the Psalter. The 176 verses of the poem are arranged acrostically, according to the order of the Hebrew alphabet; there are twenty-two sections of eight verses. In its great length and in its utilization of many psalmic genres—the blessing, the individual lament, the song of trust, the individual thanksgiving, the hymn—it is unparalleled in the Bible. It is an anthology of poems praising the law. There are eight words for law in the psalm: way, law, decrees, precepts, statutes, commands, ordinances, words. The poem expresses faith in the word of God delivered to the people in various situations, such as the inexperience of youth (vv. 9-16), pain (vv. 25-32), contentment (vv. 97-104), but mostly the situations of ordinary life. The singer stands for us all—people conscious of life's limits and wise enough to ask for the illuminating and strengthening hand of the Lord.

Psalm 120

This thanksgiving (B) was sung in the temple by a person who, like the author of Psalms 42-43, sojourned in a foreign land away from Yahweh's presence, the victim of liars and violent people (vv. 5-7). Verse 1 reports the rescue, verse 2 cites the psalmist's prayer in the grim time before salvation, and verses 3-4 cite the psalmist's wish that the wicked be punished by the Lord. Verses 5-7 further recall sentiments from the past. The verbs of verses 5-7 should be in the past tense. The speaker suffered from being among a people that did not observe the Lord's precepts. Violence prevailed. It is not certain whether Meshech, a region in the far north (Gen 10:2), and Kedar, a tribe of the north Arabian desert (Gen 25:13), are meant literally as places where the speaker actually resided as an alien or metaphorically as typical places far distant from the temple.

Psalm 121

This blessing assures those embarking on a dangerous journey of the Lord's protection. It may well be the priest's dismissal of pilgrims who have come to the temple and have experienced, in common with their fellow Israelites, the presence of the Lord in the services. About to return home from Jerusalem, the people look anxiously at the wooded hills; danger lies along those roads. Will the Lord of the temple protect them on their journey (v. 1)? In their moment of anxiety the priest declares that the Lord is not confined to a place or a time (v. 2), that every step is guarded (vv. 3-4); night and day (vv. 5-6) the Lord guards their return and their dwelling (vv. 7-8).

Psalm 122

The song is sung by pilgrims arriving at the gates of Jerusalem in obedience to the command of the Lord to gather in worship three times a year. The singer can scarcely contain his joy as he waits to join the procession into the court: "We will go up to the house of the Lord" (v. 1). The splendor of the city is not simply its great buildings. Jerusalem is the place of encounter. Here the people praise the Lord (v. 4) and hear God's authoritative words to them (v. 5). The very buildings bespeak the power of Yahweh (see Ps 48:13-15). The last four verses turn into prayer. May the grace and peace experienced here transform the people at all times!

Psalm 123

In this communal lament (A) a speaker for a people taunted by its neighbors for its weakness and poverty cries out to God for salvation. The speaker makes a gesture for the whole community, lifting up his eyes to the powerful God who dwells in heaven, a gesture of obedience and of hope (vv. 1-2). Verses 3-4 contain the plea and the motive for divine action: Take pity for we are scorned. The speaker does not cite the righteousness of the people as the motive. The very poverty of the people is motive enough for the Lord to act on behalf of those who have been chosen.

Psalm 124

In this thanksgiving (B) the singer teaches Israel to attribute its very existence to the Lord who rescues it. Israel's enemies are compared to a mythic dragon (vv. 2b-3a; see Jer 51:34) and to the Flood (vv. 3b-5; see Isa 51:9-10). Sometimes the Bible, in order to express the full malice of historical enemies, portrays them with the traits of the primordial enemies of creation. Verses 6-8 praise the saving God directly and with touching simplicity: Israel is a bird freed from the trapper's snare. Israel is ever a freed people—freed originally from the clutches of Pharaoh and now from the clutches of the current enemy.

Psalm 125

The poem is a song of trust that the righteous, those who are faithful to the Lord and delight in God's law, will inherit the land and live safely in Zion. It is a response to post-exilic anxieties about whether God would honor the ancient promises of restoration. Will Israel again possess the land? Will Zion be rebuilt? What about promises like Isa 57:13: "The one who takes refuge in me shall inherit the land, and possess my holy mountain"? The answer is that those who trust are like Mount Zion, surrounded by God like the high mountains that surround Jerusalem (vv. 1-2). Verse 3 cites perhaps an ancient promise that the just will not be contaminated by the wicked. Verses 4-5 are a prayer recognizing that the inheritors are righteous by the Lord's grace, not by their virtue. To live on Zion is a gift.

Psalm 126

This communal lament (A) was most probably sung shortly after Israel's return from exile in Babylon. Verses 1-3 express the intense joy of being in the holy city. Mere presence in Zion, however, is not enough; the people must pray for the divine intervention that will give fertility to the land (v. 4). Verses 5-6 are an oracle of promise: the painful labor of sowing will be crowned with life by the Lord who has brought them back.

Psalm 127

The psalm puts together two proverbs (vv. 1-2 and 3-5), both concerned with Yahweh establishing families, in order to affirm that all life is a divine gift. "House" in verse 1 means the family or household. In biblical times a household often consisted of several families under the authority of the oldest married man. The prosperity and protection of this group are not the work of humans; God has chosen to provide for them (v. 2). Verses 3-5 expand the affirmation with a proverb. "Gift" in verse 3 is the word that traditionally describes the holy land; like the land, children are pure gift, evidence of the Lord's favor.

Psalm 128

The poem is a statement of faith that the ever reliable and just God will always bless those who show reverence. "Fear of the Lord" does not mean craven fear or mere obedience to a set of commandments but a way of life (v. 1b) that sets God above all. As Psalm 1 shows, the Bible often dramatizes human life as two ways, the way of the just and the way of the wicked; each person must choose which of the two paths to walk. Verses 2-4 portray the consequences of the way of the Lord: enhanced life in the family. The perspective is that of the adult male, ordinarily the ruler of the household in the biblical world. In verses 5-6 the speaker, possibly a priest on the temple staff, extends the blessing on the household to the whole people of Israel for generations to come.

Psalm 129

The song resembles a thanksgiving (B) in which the speaker narrates a specific rescue by the Lord. Here, however, Israel looks back, not on one rescue, but on a whole series of divine acts since its "youth." Israel's history has been a series of trials, but the Lord has always given freedom, like the freedom of a beast when its harness is removed (v. 4). Israel's oppressors have been the wicked; in oppressing Israel they have opposed Yahweh. Hence the prayer in verses 5-8 is that Yahweh will continue to uphold Israel and cut off the life of the wicked. Like the stray blades of grass on the roof sod that shoot up and die quickly, may the wicked never know the joy of harvest.

Psalm 130

This poem, one of the Penitential Psalms, seems to be an individual lament (A). As in Psalms 12 and 60, the priestly assurance of salvation (vv. 7-8), given in response to the psalmist's plea, is included; ordinarily the assurance is not transmitted in the lament. The petitioner cries out from the depths, the abyss of the underworld. The pain and alienation make the psalmist feel "like those who go down into the pit" (Ps 143:7). Yet even here one can cry out to the God who does not keep books and whose last word is a word of forgiveness (vv. 3-4). Though the trial is severe, the sufferer still hopes (v. 5). Perhaps the psalmist is keeping vigil in the temple during the night and sees help coming with the dawn (v. 6). The priest's answer to the psalmist is that God's steadfast loyalty to the covenant will be available to each Israelite, as it has always been available to Israel.

Psalm 131

This is a song of trust, like Psalms 16, 23, and others, in which the psalmist lays aside all self-sufficiency in order to be completely open before the God who saves. The psalm is a song of the poor, the 'anawim, who renounce power in order to stand more surely under the divine protection. The image of a child, quiet with its mother, unselfconsciously trusting, memorably sums up the inner attitude.

Psalm 132

This psalm accompanied a liturgical ceremony in which the Lord, invisibly present on the ark-throne, was carried in procession to the temple. The Israelite king, "son of God" by adoption, played a central role in the rites. The blessings of God include preeminently the king and his dynasty (vv. 11-12). 1 Sam 4:1-7:1 and 2 Sam 6-7 tell the story of the movement of the ark from the town of Kiriath-jearim ("the fields of Jaar," v. 6) to the temple in the time of David (tenth century B.C.E.). The psalmist reminds God of David's fidelity, in particular his care to build a suitable house for his Lord (vv. 1-5). Verses 6-10 record the shouts of the marchers, who begin their procession in Kiriath-jearim, a few miles north of Jerusalem, and end it at the temple. After having taken possession of the temple, the Lord now founds David's "house," the dynasty. If his sons will be loyal vassals like David today, the dynasty will have no end (vv. 11-12). And the place that the Lord has chosen, Zion, will become a place of blessing—abundant life, joy, and security for all those who rely on God present in the temple and in the Davidic king (vv. 13-18).

Psalm 133

Though often termed a "wisdom psalm," Psalm 133 does not teach but declares a particular situation blessed by God. The situation was a common one in ancient Israel whenever the property of the (extended) family, held in trust as Yahweh's gift, became the eldest son's upon the death of the father. The younger brothers' families then came under the headship of the eldest brother. Would peace still reign among family members? The psalm utters a blessing over the fragile family in crisis. Brothers and sisters living in peace are like the refreshing oil poured out in hospitable greeting, like dew watering the crops in the rainless summer. Both metaphors hint at the key role of the oldest brother, the source of blessings to his siblings. In a peaceful house the Lord's blessings unfold.

Psalm 134

In this brief liturgy a priest exhorts the other temple singers to "bless" (that is, acknowledge publicly) the great deeds of the Lord. The clergy are ministers in the sanctuary during a night service (see Isa 30:29). In verse 3 the priest utters a blessing of the Lord in response to the other priests' blessing, a blessing from the Creator enhancing the life already bestowed. Mount Zion is the place where God dwells and where the fruitful encounter between God and creature takes place.

Psalm 135

This hymn (C) begins and ends with an invitation to Israel to praise the Lord (vv. 1-3, 19-20) who has created Israel, an act demonstrating that the Lord is the only God. Only the Lord creates. The song is appropriately sung in the Jerusalem temple, for it is the gathering place for the people the Lord has created.

In the first verses the people are invited to praise the Lord, to tell God's story to the world. That story is summed up in verse 4, the choosing of Israel as a special possession. Verses 5-14 narrate a single event. Creation in verses 5-7 should not be distinguished too sharply from redemption in verses 8-14, since both describe the emergence of an ordered and secure human society. Verses 6-7 allude to Yahweh's easy mastery over chaos by means of the weapons of wind and lightning. The power that mastered chaos in verses 6-7 also destroys the enemies of Israel in verses 8-14. God liberates Israel from Egyptian bondage, defeating Pharaoh and the kings who stand in the way of Israel's entry into Canaan.

Yahweh's defeat of hostile powers means that images representing those powers are worthless; the inertness of the images shows that what they represent is without power. Verses 15-18 also appear in Ps 115:4-8.

Psalm 136

The hymn (C) praises Yahweh, the only powerful God ("the God of gods" in verse 2), who has created the world in which Israel lives. The refrain "for his mercy endures forever" occurs after every line, suggesting that a speaker and chorus sang the psalm antiphonally. "Mercy" is God's fidelity to the oath to Israel, God's noblesse oblige. To "give thanks" (vv. 1-3 and 26) is to tell publicly what God has done. Verses 4-25 ought not be divided into deeds of "creation" in verses 4-9 and deeds of "redemption" in verses 10-22, as is commonly done; rather, the actions constitute a single process. God makes the environment for human community by arranging heaven and earth, and makes the community itself by freeing the people from Pharaoh and giving them their land. Verses 23-25 are intimately related to the previous verses. The Lord who made Israel a people by giving it this land continues to make it a people by ever rescuing it from its foes and giving it the produce of the land.

Psalm 137

This lament (A) was sung by the community in Babylon during the exile of the sixth century. In verses 1-3 Israel is engaged in a liturgical rite of lament. The lyres for joyful song hang unused nearby. The captors' question, "Sing for us the songs of Zion," are like other taunting questions in the Bible, such as "Where now is your God?" How can Israel sing songs of Zion, such as Psalms 46, 48, and 76, which speak of Zion as impregnable and its inhabitants as happy and safe? In verses 4-6 the singer swears never to lose hope in Zion; the Zion songs will ever be sung. Verse 7 wishes annihilation upon Edom, a country to the east of Judah that raided Jerusalem during the Exile. In verses 8-9, appalling to the modern reader, Babylon, the archetypal enemy of God, is to be eradicated; its children, therefore, are to be killed.

Psalm 138

The psalmist gives thanks (B), telling in the temple how Yahweh heard his cry and came to the rescue. Not because of the psalmist's virtues did Yahweh act but because of Yahweh's own merciful fidelity (vv. 1-3). The deed is not simply a private transaction between an individual Israelite and Yahweh; it is great enough to provoke the nations of the world to praise God's grandeur and God's care for the people (vv. 4-6). Rescued, the psalmist trusts that Yahweh will always be there in moments of danger, continuing the earlier protection (vv. 7-8).

Psalm 139

This famous psalm resembles a thanksgiving (B) in that it narrates God's merciful care in the past (vv. 1-18), and an individual lament (A) in that it prays that sinners be punished (vv. 19-24). The drama is simple: the psalmist is keenly aware of the Lord's penetrating gaze (vv. 1-6), of God's guidance in every part of the universe (vv. 7-12), and of God's control over the psalmist's very self (vv. 13-14). Verses 17-18 are an expression of wonder summing up verses 1-16. There is only one thing that can keep God and psalmist apart—sin. The psalm speaks of sin in verses 19-24.

The Bible frequently imagines the world as divided into two communities—the wicked and the righteous. The psalmist prays to be reckoned in the number of the righteous, that is to be separated from the wicked. He opens his being to God; if there is any evil, let it be cleansed (vv. 23-24).

Psalm 140

In this individual lament (A) the psalmist, beset by liars and attackers (vv. 2-6), makes a statement of trust in God in the temple (vv. 7-8). The psalmist prays that the wicked people's plans fall back upon their own heads (vv. 9-12). Verses 13-14 presumably are the statement of praise that the psalmist utters after receiving an assurance of salvation from the priest (not transmitted in psalms of lament). The psalmist expects the Lord to exercise judgment in a public way by punishing the liars and attackers and by upholding him, one of "the afflicted," "the poor," "the just," "the upright," that is, a member of the group that God has promised to uphold.

Psalm 141

This individual lament (A) is uttered by a person who is aware that only the righteous can properly worship God and who, consequently, is fearful of becoming one of the unrighteous through personal sin. In the perspective of this and other psalms of the "two ways," there are two groups of people: the righteous, pleasing to God, whose works perdure; and the unrighteous, hostile to God, rootless and doomed. The psalmist prays to be among the just, whose prayer is acceptable (vv. 1-2). God must, therefore, guard the person against being drawn into the plots and feasts of the wicked.

Verses 3-5 may be compared to Ps 85:11. The gist: Better to be reproved by the righteous than to be feted by the unrighteous. Verses 6-7 are corrupt; the translation is a guess. In verses 8-10 the psalmist prays to be saved from the corrupting fellowship of the wicked. Only God can admit one to the company of the just.

Psalm 142

The persecuted speaker of this lament (A) feels utterly alone (v. 5), exhausted (v. 7), and may actually be imprisoned (v. 8) prior to undergoing an ordeal to prove guilt or innocence (see Lev 24:12 and Num 15:34). Prison is possibly a metaphor for general distress. In the temple the psalmist lays out the complaint: attacks by the wicked with no one to give protection (vv. 2-5). Nonetheless, the psalmist still hopes that the just God will rectify the unjust situation ("you know my path," v. 4). The opening cry for help is repeated in verse 6, with a more vivid expression of hope and a more vivid complaint and prayer in verses 7-8ab. The last two verses of the poem are the vow of praise the psalmist makes after receiving an assurance from the priest: the Lord always protects the just, among whom is the psalmist.

Psalm 143

In this lament (A), ranked among the church's Penitential Psalms, the psalmist prays to be freed from death-dealing enemies. Verses 1-2 contain a straightforward address to God, made with a keen sense that there is no equality between God and humans; salvation is utterly gracious. Verses 3-4 contain the complaint: the psalmist is the victim of evil people. Verse 5 is much more vivid than most translations suggest; the verbs mean "to recite aloud." The psalmist recites the old stories of God's rescues of the poor from the power of evil, and the recitation encourages him to pray for personal salvation now (vv. 6-9). Mere rescue from the present danger is not enough, however. The psalmist goes on to pray that God's life-giving breath inspire the psalmist's life and give protection from enemies (vv. 10-12).

Psalm 144

The psalm seems to reflect a ceremony at which the king, the leader of Israel's armies, asked God's help in national crises (vv. 1-8). The tone of the poem shifts abruptly in verse 9 from pleading to thanksgiving, and then (verse 11 apart) it shifts again to prayer for the well-being of the people.

Verses 1-4 acknowledge that all the king's military prowess is from the Lord; the king, like any human being, is fragile and undeserving of God's help. May the Divine Warrior fight for Israel with the storm weapons of thunder and lightning (vv. 5-7). Perhaps in response to an oracle assuring divine assistance to Israel (not transmitted), the king vows to praise God for the expected victory. The victory is given in virtue of the divine promise to be with "David, your servant," not because of the king's military skill (vv. 9-11). The psalm concludes with the king, representing the people before God, praying for shalom, peace in its fullness.

Psalm 145

The hymn (C) is acrostic, that is, each verse begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The poem, like most acrostics, states several themes without developing them much. In verses 1-3 and 21 the singer invites "all flesh" to bless the name of the Lord. The "works of the Lord," God's activity in the world, make God present and invite the praise of all. According to verses 4-7, unending generations give thanks to the Lord, their thanksgiving climaxing in the confession of verses 8-9. Verses 10-20 urge all to acknowledge and acclaim the kingship of Yahweh, which directs all human activity in justice and love. The kingship of Yahweh will become a major theme of Jewish and Christian literature.

Psalm 146

The singer of this hymn (C) urges the hearers to praise and rely upon the Lord who rules all, and at the same time warns against relying upon mere mortals, no matter how powerful they seem. Verses 1-2 and 10 constitute the invitatory; the psalmist's exhortation to self is a model to all. The psalmist's concept of praising implies reliance upon God alone—hence the exhortation not to rely on human beings in the place of God (vv. 3-4). Israel's happiness is assured if it relies upon its God, "the God of Jacob," who created all things. Part of creation is the governance of the people. God's powerful care makes an environment fit for humans and maintains society in justice and peace (vv. 5-9). God's kingship is expressed in the favor shown to the oppressed and to those who rely upon God's help alone (v. 10).

Psalm 147

The hymn (C) is divided into three sections by separate commands to praise (vv. 1-6, 7-11, and 12-20). In the first section people are to acclaim God, who has built Jerusalem by bringing back the exiles. Verse 4 shows Yahweh's power over the divine beings who were thought to be in the stars, controlling the fate of human beings. Yahweh's control of even them means that nothing can hinder the people's return.

The second section hymns the God who makes the earth bring forth vegetation for animals and humans; from the latter a free and loving response is called for.

The third and climactic section exhorts the holy city to recognize that it has been recreated and that it is the privileged place of divine disclosure. From there Yahweh sends forth the word to Israel alone of all the nations, a word that is as life-giving as water.

Psalm 148

This hymn (C) invites the beings of heaven (vv. 1-6) and of earth (vv. 7-14) to praise the Lord. The singer does not distinguish between inanimate and animate (and rational) nature. Since every being hangs upon the divine decree (a better translation than "duty" in verse 6), it is oriented by that fact toward God (vv. 5-6). The motive for earth's praise in verse 13 is noteworthy: because "his name alone is exalted; his majesty is above earth and heaven." The name is what makes one present to another. Only Yahweh among all the "gods" is truly present on earth, and hence only Yahweh deserves acclaim. Verse 14 is the climax, which may be paraphrased in this way: Of all the peoples on earth, God has chosen Israel ("lift up the horn" = "to strengthen," "to favor") to render special thanks and praise to God.

Psalm 149

The hymn (C) is sung by "the lowly" (v. 4), who have sought asylum from danger in the temple on Zion. The hymn resembles songs of Zion (Psalms 2, 46, 48, 76): Zion is Yahweh's inviolable dwelling, where impious kings are defeated. Verses 1-3 invite Israel, gathered in Zion, to shout joyfully to its Creator. The reason is given in verse 4: the Lord loves Israel and protects "the lowly," those who have made the Lord their refuge. Verses 5-9 describe the equipping of the people who have sought protection. In the power of their Lord they attack and defeat the kings assaulting the holy city. At this critical hour the people are the means whereby the Lord's glory is displayed to the nations.

Psalm 150

A fitting end to the Psalter, this hymn (C) calls upon all in the temple and under the sky, "all flesh," to give due honor to God. A variety of musical instruments underline and unify the human voices. The reason for the praise is scarcely developed amid all the imperatives to sing and play. Verse 2 explains that praise is due because of Yahweh's mastery of nature and history.

SONG OF SONGS, RUTH, LAMENTATIONS, ECCLESIASTES, ESTHER

James A. Fischer, C.M.

INTRODUCTION

This commentary contains an explanation of five books of the Old Testament called Megilloth ("scrolls") by the Jews. They are gathered together for convenience, since the Jews read them on feast days in the synagogue. The tradition, however, is not constant and unanimous, and it is certainly not as old as the books.

The Song of Songs comes first because it was read during Passover. There are passages in the Song that speak of winter being over, so it is appropriate for the spring. The Exodus seems to be suggested by the reference to Pharaoh's steeds (Song 1:9). Most of all, the Song speaks of youth and love, and that is certainly the theme of Passover.

The Book of Ruth was read for the feast of Shavvoth, an early harvest festival, or what Christians call Pentecost. The story of Ruth takes place during the harvest season. There was also an ancient tradition that King David was born on Shavvoth.

The Book of Lamentations was read on the ninth of Ab, which is in July or August. This is the traditional date for the destruction of the temple by the Roman emperor Titus in A.D. 70. It was, therefore, a day of mourning.

The Book of Ecclesiastes was read on Succoth, the most popular of the three major feasts. Succoth was celebrated in the fall as a farmers' festival for gathering in the grape and olive harvests. The theme of aging, either of the year or of people, fits both the festival and the book. Some traditions said that the Song of Songs remembered Solomon in his youth, and Ecclesiastes in his old age, since both books refer to Solomon. However, using Ecclesiastes for synagogue reading is the least consistent part of the tradition and a rather late development. Some groups do not use it at all.

The Book of Esther contains the story that is the basis for the celebration of the feast of Purim, a kind of Jewish Mardi Gras. This tradition began in Persia and only later spread to Western Judaism. It apparently was an attempt to counteract pagan New Year's celebrations.

The Greek translation of the Bible known as the Septuagint, which was completed by at least 100 B.C.E., has a different order for these five books. The Book of Ruth is put right after the Book of Judges. The New American Bible follows the Greek in the order of books.

The curious grouping here offers an opportunity for a word about the kind of commentary given for these books. There is no common theme or approach in the books themselves. Ruth and Esther are stories, but of very different kinds; the Song of Songs is love poetry, and Lamentations is sad poetry; Ecclesiastes is an essay on human life. Since they are all so different, they cannot all be interpreted in the same way. The conclusions to be reached will depend on the method one adopts to interpret them.

If the principal concern is to discover what the original Hebrew text said, then we must study differences that have occurred in copying the manuscripts and alternate ways of understanding the text. This is called textual and grammatical criticism. The commentary will occasionally refer to such verbal problems. If we want to find out what actually happened, we need historical criticism to get at "the facts," as much as possible. There are no serious historical problems in our books. If we want to know how the original units were composed according to standard forms of writing, we need form-criticism. This will concern us often. If we want to know how these units were put together to form a book, we use redaction criticism. If we ask what role this book plays within the whole body of the canonical Scripture, we need canonical criticism. And if we ask how this story or poetry or essay works as literature and how good it is, we need literary or rhetorical criticism.

Each of these methods can only tell us something about the text; none of them is immediately the key to interpretation. All of them are important, but they do not get at what the ordinary reader of the Bible wants to know, namely, how does it help my faith or spiritual understanding? To make the step to a spiritual meaning for ourselves, we must appropriate the reading into our own experience. This commentary is written largely from the viewpoint of rhetorical criticism, in the hope that that will give us the quickest and closest approach to experience.

SONG OF SONGS

James A. Fischer, C.M.

INTRODUCTION

The problem with the Song of Songs is to find some honest reason why it should be in the Bible. Unlike most other books of the Old Testament, it has nothing to do with the sacred history, the law, the covenant, or the prophets. In fact, it does not even mention God. It seems to be a somewhat disjointed collection of popular love songs. We do not know when it was written or by whom; we do not know for what purpose it was written or for what it was used.

The Jews themselves had misgivings about including this book in their list of sacred writings. At the final determination made by the teachers of Judaism about A.D. 90, much discussion took place. The matter was finally settled when Rabbi Akiba, one of the leaders, was won over to the interpretation of the Song of Songs as reflecting the marriage of Yahweh to the chosen people. It was finally appointed for reading in the synagogue during the feast of Passover. Christians accepted the book as sacred without dispute, but its use in the liturgy was rather restricted. In later times various passages were applied to the Virgin Mary on her feasts.

Literary form

At first reading the Song seems to be a jumble of poetry in which various parties are speaking. Unfortunately, they keep shifting, and whatever plot there may be keeps disappearing. The New American Bible translation helps by identifying in the margin who is speaking. A girl lover (designated B for bride) can be identified as expressing her longing; a shepherd and/or king (designated G for bridegroom) is also actively involved. These identifications have a long history; they were first noted in Greek manuscripts made about A.D. 400. A vague "we" and some "daughters of Jerusalem" (designated D) also appear. Solomon and brothers of the bride complete the cast (these are not designated by any letter in the text). None of this is particularly consistent; as soon as the poetry begins to concentrate on one person or theme, it dissolves and another scene unfolds.

Discerning some structure in these eight chapters is a frustrating quest. Efforts have been made to read the Song as a story, but there is too little plot, except for a general feeling that the lovers are finally united despite the efforts of antagonists such as the brothers and perhaps the king to keep them separate. Since much of the poetry is couched in direct speech, attempts have been made to cast the Song as a drama or a dramatic reading. No agreement has been reached, however, as to how the parts should be played or by whom. More important, we have no evidence that dramatic presentations, whether in the temple or elsewhere, were ever a part of Jewish life.

This leads to a theory that the Song of Songs is simply an unstructured collection. The use of direct speech in love poetry can be illustrated from other ancient cultures, particularly Egyptian. Different parts of the discourse can be classified on the basis of themes and forms. Thus we have titles assigned by scholars, such as: song of admiration, self-description, the tease, song of yearning, description of a love-related experience, descriptive song, boasting song, and so on. The meanings are usually self-evident, and the forms do show some consistency in the elements used to compose them. Unfortunately, they do not shed a great deal of light on how one should interpret the passages. How these poems functioned is still unknown. Were they simply notes written between lovers? Recited? Used at weddings? Some sort of popular music of which we know nothing? All of this eludes us.

The explanation that the Song is simply a collection of about twenty-five love poems or sayings has its own difficulty by way of being too little. There is something of a story line in the Song. A girl loves a shepherd boy. She desires to be with him and sometimes fantasizes about him as a king and herself as a queen. But something keeps them apart. Verbs of coming and going, which are characteristics of storytelling, abound. And there is tension: at the end something—a lattice, a gate, a departure, watchmen—prevents them from the final touch.

This much of a story line clearly exists: there are characters with a definite form, movement, tension, and a resolution. The outline of it is faint and overlaid with a kaleidoscope of love imagery, which keeps intruding. The pictures are mostly from the rustic life of those who live closely with nature. The girl is a dove, sweet-scented, like a lily of the valley, beautiful, adorned with gems, enclosed in a garden. The boy is a gazelle, fleet, gentle as a lily, glitteringly beautiful as ivory or gold. He is neither warrior nor hunter, but perfumed and handsome. King Solomon enters either as competitor or fantasy. The images of him are always of opulence, and he is rejected. The imagery as well as the story line sets up a tension here.

The mood is one of "love conquers all"—but not yet. Love is celebrated in all its physical joy. Lips are made to be kissed and savored like good wine, breasts to be admired, hair to be caressed, the wedding couch to be enjoyed. The invitation is to meet beneath the apple tree where your mother conceived. The mood of love is unrestrained by prudery, but not by prudence.

> Do not arouse, do not stir up love, > before its own time (8:4).

The mood may be destroyed by our own reaction to some of the imagery. Who could love a girl whose nose is like a tower of Lebanon and whose hair is like a flock of goats, or a boy whose hair is like palm fronds? Our own love imagery may appear as odd to others. At any rate, these comparisons do seem to come from a fairly conventional vocabulary of love.

The meaning of the book

Over the centuries both Jews and Christians have tended to give the Song a symbolic meaning and have thus avoided the plain references to physical love and its ecstatic emotions. The marriage of Yahweh to Israel or of Christ to the Church has dominated. Sometimes, as in the Christian liturgy, the girl has become the Virgin Mary. In the writings of the mystics the individual soul has often been the soul's yearning for her lover, Christ.

How this identification is made determines much of the interpretation. If the interpretation is allegorical, then every verse and every detail has a secret meaning in which this equals that. Obviously this has spiritual value; equally, it may become silly if it is carried too far. Some commentators have opted for parable, that is, it is the story line, not the details, that parallels the spiritual meaning in our own lives, either communal or individual. This avoids difficulties and has much to commend it, but since the story line is so tenuous, it leaves much of the text without meaning.

Completely different is the wisdom interpretation. In this view the Song is indeed composed of popular love songs joined only by a whisper of a plot. Human love is good. It need not be justified by esoteric spiritual reasonings. The sages taught that God's order and goodness pervade all; there is no such thing as the secular. The love of boy and girl is one of God's beauties. Even so, it went far beyond emotion. One was aware of a secret, mysterious force, an uncontrollable power that might overwhelm. So we have the only explanation of the refrain which links together the various songs:

> Set me as a seal on your heart,
> as a seal on your arm;
> For stern as death is love, > relentless as the nether world is devotion;
> its flames are a blazing fire.

Deep waters cannot quench love,
nor floods sweep it away.
Were one to offer all he owns to purchase love, he would be roundly mocked (8:6-7).

If one adopts this viewpoint, then the Song turns back the corner of the page of human love to reveal a deeper reality. The overall interpretation adopted in this commentary is that the Song originated as somewhat isolated love songs, was arranged in the order in which it now stands to give a faint story line, which built up to the climax expressed in the wisdom saying in 8:6: "For stern as death is love."

COMMENTARY

1:1 The title. The title "Song of Songs" is not part of the canonical text but was added later. "Song of Songs" is simply a Hebrew superlative: "The best song." "By Solomon" simply says that the tradition associated the Song with Solomon in some way. As it stands, it has a whole gamut of possible meanings: Solomon as author, Solomon as inspirer of all song and wisdom, Solomon as king of marriage, etc.

1:2-4 Invitation to a wedding. This first song seems to be an invitation to a wedding. The bride is looking forward to wedding kisses. The invited "we" are presumably the bride's party ("daughters of Jerusalem"); the king is the bridegroom, either in fantasy or as a title in wedding festivities. Some sort of exchange of voices in the song is indicated by the switch of speakers from "me" to "we" and by the marginal notations. This song introduces us to the setting of joy and praise for the bride and groom.

1:5-6 Praise of the bride. The second song is a song praising the bride herself. She is a sunburned girl, perhaps in contrast to the city daughters of Jerusalem. Yet she is not a naive country girl, but a coquette, as her brothers had found out. She had not taken care of her own "vineyard" (a biblical stand-in word for one's self), perhaps by dalliance with her lover, so they put her to work taking care of real vineyards.

1:7-8 A duet of love. This duet sings of the search for love. The girl wants to know where her shepherd-lover is so that she will not be annoyed along her way by falling in with other shepherds. His reply implies that she knows well enough where they are accustomed to meet.

1:9-11 The girl's beauty. Comparing the girl to a horse may seem ungracious to us. This is a special kind of horse, however—one of Pharaoh's chariot steeds. The text seems to suggest sexual appeal as the point of the comparison. This horse is a mare, and mares were not used in war; in fact, they were kept far from the stallions lest they distract them. The rest of the song describes the attractiveness of the bride. Perhaps it is another way of looking back to those shepherds in verse 7, who would have been glad to have had the girl wandering among them.

1:12-17 A wedding duet. This last duet in chapter 1 is an exchange of anticipations about the wedding feast. The girl can only describe the coming delights in terms of perfumes; then the bride and groom exchange professions of the beauty they see in each other. Oddly, the girl's eyes are said to be like doves. Just what is intended is not clear—perhaps "sparkling" if the dove's iridescence is the point, or "gentle and loving," as some of the ancients believed. The final wish is for the bridal chamber, pictured here as a magnificent hall made of cedar and cypress.

2:1-7 A love duet. This unit consists of a duet between the girl and her lover, followed by a description of the arousal of love, and ending with the refrain in verse 7. It seems to be separate from the springtime song which follows and which is less passionate. The refrain (see also 3:5 and 8:4) always occurs at the climax of the love scenes. The action here proceeds from the introduction of the girl as a lily of the valley (beautiful) and the boy as an apple tree (a symbol of sexual desirability in some way) to the bridal chamber and a desire for sexual union, but it ends with an admonition not to go too fast.

2:4 "His emblem over me is love" seems to be the obvious reading of the Hebrew text. The "emblem" seems to be some sort of military insignia. As such, it does not make much sense, and we do not know to what it might refer.

2:5 Raisin cakes were foods considered to be an aid to love, but we know nothing more specific. Cookies in the form or symbol of love goddesses were used in the banqueting of some fertility rites, but the connection with Israelite courting customs is not at all clear.

2:7 The refrain begins solemnly with an adjuration that interrupts the passionate wishes of the girl. The appeal to gazelles and hinds may be to animals that were thought to be amorous, or the phrase in Hebrew may be a stand-in for the similar-sounding "by the Lord of hosts," just as our old-fashioned "Jiminy Crickets" is really a substitute for "Jesus Christ."

"Do not arouse, do not stir up love before its own time" is not exactly what the Hebrew text says. The word "time" is not used in Hebrew; it is only implied in the conjunction "until," that is, "until it is satiated or eager." Whatever the exact sense, it is clear that some brake is being applied to the runaway love-making previously described, since we have a solemn oath and an admonition of some sort. More will be said about this at 8:6.

2:8-17 The springtime song of love. This delightful love song has left its traces in our own literature from "In the spring a young man's fancy" to "The voice of the turtle dove is heard in the land." It is a self-contained song as defined by the theme and the use of "gazelle" at the beginning and end. This is an ancient way of marking off a unit, much as we use paragraphs.

This song begins with a gentle longing, a considerable cooling off of the passionate phrases in the preceding verses. The young girl seems to be confined at home behind a wall, windows, and lattices. Yet she keeps hearing her lover's invitation: winter is over, the time for love is here. She will not go to him, but she can tease him with hints that others may be vying for her favors.

2:9-10 The lover is pictured as coming from afar to visit his beloved. Something keeps them apart, and he can only rush around, gazing through windows, peering through lattices. Why she does not come out to meet him or invite him in is not revealed, but the poem centers on longing that cannot be satisfied. And yet it should be.

2:11-13 All this delightful imagery, including the dove, which is a sure sign of spring, hints at a proper time for love, as 2:7 had hinted and as Qoheleth will later express in his song about a time for everything (see Eccl 3:8).

2:15 "Catch us the foxes" is apparently a line from a well-known song. Its connection is not entirely clear. The girl is the vineyard; foxes are predators, and the intimation is that this girl has a lot of them watching her and needs protection. This is called a tease song.

3:1-11 A wedding dream. Although this chapter can be divided between a song of seeking and finding (vv. 1-5) and a description of a wedding procession (vv. 6-11), the two need to be connected to account for the second half. The poem begins with a dream wish by the girl and ends with a picture of the king on the day of his marriage. That is what the dream is all about, and the wedding procession is a fantasy creation.

We left the girl in chapter 2 still confined to her home. Now in her dream she is wandering the streets of the city looking for her lover. The watchmen cannot tell her where he is, but love can. She finds him and holds him fast, but then the dream is restrained by the refrain and the admonition not to arouse love before its time. This is followed by another dream fantasy of a wedding procession in which her lover is King Solomon coming to his wedding couch in splendor.

3:3 Among the many shifts of scene in the song we have this change from countryside to city. The watchmen, of course, are the police.

3:4 In the preceding song the girl knew where her lover was but could not or would not go out to him. Now she does not know where he is and must look for him. She intends to bring him to her mother's house (v. 4). We do not know why she would not have brought him there before, or what cultic or mythological background there may be for such a statement. Numerous solutions have been offered.

3:5 Whatever the situation implied in verse 4 may be, it is quite clear that the girl wanted to seal her marriage at home. But just before the final act, the refrain is once more introduced to delay the consuming expression of love.

3:6-11 The description given here is certainly of a royal procession connected with a marriage, but it does not fit the facts we know about Solomon. It is part of a dream sequence like the preceding; the girl is dreaming of her lover as King Solomon and fantasizing her wedding day. The physical descriptions given here, the column of smoke, the perfumes, the sixty valiant soldiers, the dangers in the watches of the night, the wood of Lebanon, the columns and roofs and ivory, etc., are all mentioned in connection with something pertinent to kings and gods and weddings in the Old Testament, but never together. We can only assume that this is a product of imagination.

4:1–5:1 A song of longing. Verses 1-7 are a song in praise of the physical beauty of the girl. It is a well-known type of hymn from Hebrew and Arabic styles. Assigning it a name does not help very much to interpret what it means, but it does take away some of the strangeness of the details describing the girl's beauty. This leads to an admiration song (vv. 8-11) that is more symbolic. It begins with an invitation to a celebration, and then speaks of the girl in terms of a garden (v. 12). This is common biblical imagery for one's beloved. The garden is fragrant, fruitful, and full of delights. Then the beloved is called "a fountain sealed." The fountain of flowing water is a symbol of life. What is being spoken of, therefore, is a faithful and fruitful marriage. This part of the song ends with an invitation to the friends of the bridegroom to eat and drink of the wine of love.

4:1 In content all this verse says is that the girl has long hair, but the image is one of richness and constantly changing shades.

4:2 Once again the physical fact is simply praise for the girl's white and regular teeth, which are as extraordinary as ewes having twins.

4:3 The girl has firm and rosy cheeks. The pomegranate is something like an orange, reddish in color.

4:4 We do not know what David's tower was, but that would not help very much anyway. Apparently the picture is of a lady, stately and erect, who is wearing tiers of necklaces, which suggests the battlements, bucklers, and shields of which the poet speaks.

4:5 The picture is one of softness and perfection. The gazelle is the boy, and he is a lotus-eater. This last image conjures up some idea of a drug-like ecstasy. All these physical images are probably foreign to our tastes.

4:8 Lebanon is far to the north. The other places mentioned—Amana, Senir and Hermon—are also remote, sometimes unknown. The poet intends to create a feeling that a great distance separates the lovers. To complete the image, he mentions the haunt of lions and the leopard's mountains.

Consistently in this song (vv. 9, 10, 12, and 5:1) the girl is described as "my sister, my bride." Considering the broad usage of "sister" in the Bible, this is not surprising. Love's relationship is reinforced by a reference to family ties, whether real or conferred.

4:12 The Hebrew text has a stronger expression: "sealed garden." The reference is to a signet ring that can be used only by the owner. The enclosure is to keep away those who do not have a right to be present.

4:15 The fountain suggests life, as does the following description: "flowing fresh from Lebanon." Prov 5:15-20 has a beautiful use of the same imagery, with a strong emphasis on the husband's obligation to be faithful to his own fountain: "Let your fountain be yours alone."

5:1 The bridegroom has arrived and shares his gladness by inviting his friends to the wedding banquet.

5:2–6:3 A dream sequence. This is the longest continuous passage in the Song, but it is probably a secondary addition. Basically it is a dream sequence in which the girl loses and finds her lover. As in a dream, the action is disjointed and illogical. However, there is motion as the girl hears her lover trying to get in the gate, but then being too late when she finally gets up to admit him. She pursues him through the city at night but cannot find him. The watchmen beat her, and she has to appeal to the daughters of Jerusalem to help her find him. At the end she finds him in her garden. The search sequence is interrupted by a praise song for the boy, which leads up to a final song of yearning and fulfillment.

5:4 From the later reference to a lock (v. 5), it would appear that the boy was reaching through the keyhole to open the door. Ancient keys and locking devices were huge, often made of wood. Apparently by the time the girl had beautified herself ("With my fingers dripping choice myrrh"), he had already gone.

5:7 In this dream the girl is now roaming the streets at night. The watchmen naturally consider her an intruder or a prostitute.

5:8 It is quite unrealistic for the daughters of Jerusalem to appear so suddenly at night, but this is a dream. The dialogue between them is only hinted at. After the girl explains her search, they ask: "What shall we tell him?" As the next section demands, they also ask what he looks like.

5:11 It is probable that "palm fronds" simply means "curled" or "luxuriant."

5:12 Previously the girl's eyes were described as dovelike, but here there is added "beside running waters." Possibly the bridegroom has dark pupils, as suggested by doves, and sparkling irises, as suggested by running water.

5:14 That the lover's arms should be described as gold is understandable; in the next verse his legs are columns of marble. But the word "rods" is strangely inappropriate, although it is an accurate translation.

6:3 The final statement of the girl is that she, and she alone, claims her lover. "Browsing among the lilies" probably has sexual connotations. The refrain that urges restraint is not used at this point, although the adjuration was mentioned in 5:8. As noted at the beginning, this section seems to be a secondary addition.

6:4-12 A description and a meeting. Most of chapter 6 seems to be a song of admiration for the girl, leading first to a rejection of the royal beauties and then a choice of the girl alone, and ending in an enigmatic description of some meeting between the two. As we will see, the chapter ends in an unintelligible statement where we would expect some decisive development in the love affair.

6:4 Tirzah was the capital of the northern kingdom of Israel between 930 and 880 B.C.E. On this basis some commentators have dated the whole Song of Songs. The text is quite clear about the name of the city, but we have no information as to why Tirzah was considered beautiful or how the girl was like it. Oddly enough, the very ancient Greek translation and the Jewish paraphrases read: "You are beautiful and pleasing," but we do not know how they got this wording.

The phrase "as awe-inspiring as bannered troops" recurs in verse 10. It is the only harsh image used of the girl, and one wonders why it is used. If the text is accepted, some reference must be made to the usual mythology of the goddess of love who is also the goddess of war. If the text is emended, it will probably read: "as awe-inspiring as these great sights."

6:8 Previously the girl had fantasized about her lover as though he were King Solomon; here the boy seems to be daydreaming about his girl as a queen whom he would choose in preference to innumerable royal ladies. The "sixty . . . eighty . . . without number" progression is probably an escalating superlative built up from twenty times three, four, and x. At any rate, as the next verse says: "One alone is my dove," and she is better than all.

6:11 The last part of this poem is spoken by the boy, who wants to see if the girl is ready to receive him. Clearly, she is the garden. Here the garden is described as a nut garden, specifically a walnut garden. The word occurs only here in the Bible and we have no idea what its significance might be.

6:12 This must be the decisive verse in chapter 6 because chapter 7 will treat a quite different topic. Unfortunately we have no clear idea what the Hebrew text means. English translations differ widely. The New Jewish Version has: "Before I knew it, my desire set me amid the chariots of Ammi-nadib," and the Anchor Bible reads: "Unawares I was set in the chariot with the prince." In effect, we do not know what happened in the walnut garden.

7:1-8:4 A song of yearning and restraint. It might be well to consider this section together, however disparate and disconnected the individual units. Here we begin with a dance that displays the girl's charms (7:1-6); sexual closeness under the image of climbing a palm tree (7:7-11); a yearning for love under the image of springtime awakening (7:12-14); and finally a fervid desire for union, ending in the refrain that counsels the proper moment (8:1-4). The shifts in scene and speakers (sometimes enigmatic, as in 7:10) suggest that these songs were originally independent and so do not fit neatly together. Yet, they are all full of motion, and the action does seem to be going somewhere—hence the importance of the conception of a story line, however faintly hinted at. All this depends, of course, on what one has read consistently into the refrain.

7:1 We really do not know what the term "Shulammite" implies. It may be the feminine form of Solomon (like the name Salome in the New Testament), or it may be derived from a town in Esdraelon noted for its beautiful women, or it may have a hint of "the peaceful one." None of these meanings, however, helps us to understand the significance better. Neither do we know what kind of dance is referred to here. Suggestions have been made of a sword dance, a special dance before a wedding, or a war dance. However out of place the last-mentioned may be, it does have something to do with the description.

7:5 Whether this is a special, well-known tower, or whether Mount Lebanon looks like a tower is unclear. In any event, it probably does not increase our aesthetic response.

7:8 The palm tree is a symbol of richness and fertility. Its figs hang in clusters by the hundreds.

7:10 As indicated in the New American Bible text, the speaker shifts suddenly from the groom to the bride in the middle of the sentence. We suspect that two poems have been run together here, and not very skillfully. The imagery also shifts suddenly from the palm tree to a springtime scene in the country.

7:11 Previously the girl had said: "My lover belongs to me and I to him" (6:3). There is a different emphasis here. She is committed to him and recognizes that he must be drawn to her. The phrase "for me he yearns" is reminiscent of Gen 3:16: "your urge shall be for your husband." These are the only times in the Bible that the expression is used. Something more than physical passion is hinted at.

7:14 Mandrakes are underground tubers related to the potato and reputed to have aphrodisiac powers. This verse again brings out the intensity of physical love.

8:1 Although this is a separate song of yearning, it goes naturally with the preceding. Indeed, there would be no climax to chapter 7 without this. Something still keeps the lovers apart. The girl wishes that her lover were her brother so that she could freely consort with him.

8:4 The poetic climax is reached with the repetition of the refrain just at the moment of most intense feeling. The Hebrew wording of the text is somewhat different here than previously. The appeal to the gazelles and hinds is dropped; after "I adjure you" we have not a request but a prohibition. In other words, the reading is shorter but stronger.

The New American Bible translation ends the sentence with "Do not arouse, do not stir up love, before its own time." This implies that the time is not yet here. Various other translations and commentators understand that the time has come to reach the conclusion of the longing. Such an interpretation depends upon an understanding of the total Song of Songs as culminating in the fulfillment of love's desires. Then one needs to explain from a literary, aesthetic viewpoint why this happens three times in the Song and yet the poem continues. The more normal and traditional understanding of the refrain would imply that every time love reaches its climax, something hinders the final consummation. What this is will depend upon the interpretation given to the following section.

8:5-14 Finale. The finale of the Song of Songs is a series of disjointed and perhaps fragmentary pieces. It begins with verse 5, which, according to the New American Bible text, is a jerky dialogue between the daughters of Jerusalem and the groom. The bride is coming to meet her lover. As she approaches, he points out the apple tree under which he was conceived. This is followed by what appears to be a completely incongruous reference to love being as stern as death. Then there is some sort of dialogue between the brothers, who do not want their little sister to get married yet, but she is determined to go ahead. It ends with a final song of the bride that she prefers her lover to all of Solomon's wealth and desires only him.

It is agreed by all that verses 6-7 are decisive for the meaning of the Song of Songs. It is also clear on purely poetic grounds that the songs turn much more serious at this point. The playful celebration of falling in love is replaced by serious thoughts of childbearing. The allusion to the apple tree under which one of them was conceived sounds a new note. The love they have been enjoying is recognized as being as relentless as death. Once committed, they cannot escape. The girl's response is a deliberate and free choice of total fidelity. The final choice of her lover instead of Solomon's wealth also sets her future unchangeably. The insight of the Song, therefore, seems to be that however delightful falling in love may be, its flames have an unquenchable power that cannot be extinguished.

8:5 A problem exists here as to who is speaking. The Hebrew text indicates that it was the boy's mother who conceived and that the speaker is the girl. The whole of verse 5 seems to be rather fragmentary. What is decisive for our understanding is that the question of children is introduced for the first time.

8:6 "Stern" is "relentless." That is the common description of death in many passages of the Old Testament. Death is a hunter that cannot be eluded. The parallel line reinforces the idea: "relentless as the nether world is devotion," and this in turn is further strengthened by "its flames are a blazing fire." It is possible to translate the final word as "a flame of God," but that is unusual both as translation and within the context of the Song.

8:7 The metaphor is not of putting out a fire, but of death as a raging torrent that cannot be held back. The picture is used consistently in the Old Testament. The only power stronger than death is love, but the point of the comparison is the enormous strength of both. The final saying here, "Were one to offer all he owns to purchase love, he would be roundly mocked," is not in poetic form and seems to be an inserted wise saying.

8:8 The brothers object that their sister is too young for marriage and childbearing. The following description about building up a wall and protecting a door describes their strategy in military terms. They do not seem to be cruel in their plans but want to overwhelm the girl with gifts. She rejects this by asserting that she is ready for marriage.

8:11 The sudden shift seems to have nothing to do with Solomon as such. The girl is simply saying that even if she were offered the wealth of Solomon, she would still choose her lover. In verse 12 she asserts her own independence: "My vineyard is at my own disposal."

8:13 The conclusion begins with an appeal by the boy to learn what his lover's final choice will be. Her response is, "Be swift, my lover." We have come to a decisive conclusion. However, it will be noted from the remarks above on this last section that the final choice is not of the pleasure of love-making but of the acceptance of love as a power that demands total commitment.

RUTH

James A. Fischer, C.M.

INTRODUCTION

The story

The best way to read the Book of Ruth is simply as a good story. It really is a short story, one of the best that has come down from antiquity. In four brief chapters the author has created unforgettable characters and a plot that involves us in our own solution.

The actions can be briefly described in scenes:

ACT ONE—Prelude: Naomi the Loser (1:1-22)

Naomi, a pleasant and capable Jewish girl, follows her husband into the frontier land of Moab during a famine, raises a family, loses her husband and her children, and is forced by another famine to return to Bethlehem. There she curses God for having taken everything from her.

ACT TWO—The Harvest and the Matchmaking (2:1-3:18)

In Bethlehem, Naomi sends her daughter-in-law Ruth to glean in the fields. Ruth meets Boaz, a rich bachelor, and is encouraged by Naomi to court him. Ruth and Boaz fall in love.

ACT THREE—The Marriage Contract Concluded (4:1-12)

Boaz must first clear up some legal problems connected with a field that Naomi wants to sell. The terms include an obligation to marry Ruth. Boaz settles the matter fairly and openly, and then takes Ruth as his wife.

ACT FOUR—Conclusion: Naomi the Winner? (4:13-16)

In due course a child is born to Ruth, but it is hailed by the local women as Naomi's. A curious genealogy (4:17-22) attributes the child to Boaz and traces the succeeding generations to David.

The history of the book

The setting of the story is during the days of the judges (approximately 1200-1050 B.C.E.), probably toward the end. There are no specific references in the text that would enable us to check more exactly the date or the historical accuracy. Although the Hebrew Bible placed Ruth among the Megilloth, the pre-Christian Greek translation known as the Septuagint put it after the Book of Judges. The least we can say is that there was an ancient tradition that the story belonged to the time of the judges. The picture it paints of early Israelite village life conforms to what we know of the era. Things such as the meeting place at the city gate, the words used for weights and measures, the names, the techniques of harvesting, and so on, all fit into our data.

The story was written at a later time. The first words, "Once in the time of the judges," indicate a distance between the writer and the events. In 4:7 the author explains a forgotten custom about handing over a sandal as a way of concluding an agreement. The book concludes with a genealogy that traces the descendants of Boaz down to the time of David (1004–965 B.C.E.). Most likely the story was written sometime shortly after David. Similar forms of storytelling, such as the story of Joseph in Egypt and the story of David, seem to come from about the same time.

The only alternate date of writing proposed is in postexilic times, more specifically in the fifth century B.C.E. Apart from a few late expressions, the argument for postexilic dating depends upon interpreting the book as a protest against the rather harsh marriage laws of Ezra and Nehemiah. However, this is to base the dating upon a very questionable interpretation of the story as story, as we shall see later.

Interpretation

One type of interpretation would center on the details concerning marriage regulations. The point of the story would be that from ancient times pagan girls were legitimately taken as wives, and entered into the stream of Israel's history. The problem with such explanations is that they do depend upon details, especially the concluding genealogy. That may or may not be an addition to the original text. In any case, it is clear that the story was not told simply to explain the genealogy.

Another set of interpretations centers on the example of the virtuous life illustrated by Ruth and Boaz. The word hesed (1:8; 2:10; 3:10), variously translated as "kind," "merciful," "loyal," is a key term in the story. Ruth is a gracious girl who sacrifices everything to embrace the God of Israel. Boaz is a magnanimous and kindly kinsman who rescues a family in distress. Concern for the poor is one of the major obligations of the chosen people. Loyalty to God and kinsfolk ranks high. This is undoubtedly an important impression created by the storyteller. Unfortunately, it has little to do with Acts One and Four of the story. Neglecting the beginning and ending of this story is like tearing out the first and last pages of a detective story.

The approach in this commentary is to consider the story first of all simply as story. As a rule of thumb, all storytelling is either hero story, tragedy, or comedy. The hero story leads the principal character through various perils to victory. It has a rather rigid chain of cause and effect. In the Bible there are very few hero stories, and God alone is the hero. If we interpret the Book of Ruth as an exemplar story of virtuous living, we have made it into a hero story. By and large, that neglects the character of Naomi and certainly downplays the role of God, who appears only in oblique references.

If we interpret the story as a protest against overly harsh marriage laws, then the Book of Ruth is a tragedy of sorts. A tragedy is a story that inevitably results in the destruction of the principal character. It is clear that this is not the plot of this story. The only tragedy may have been that the protest went unheard.

Comedy is the most difficult literary style. To be successful, a comedy must link together actions that have a certain fittingness and yet whose conclusion defies rational expectation. Most of the stories of the Bible are comedies in this sense. God's actions cannot be confined to normal human ways of acting. Obviously, we are not talking about comedy as fun or frivolity.

To get at the literary character of the Book of Ruth, we have to reflect on it as we do on other stories. First of all, it is a self-contained story, and we do not need to worry about where it begins and ends. Secondly, we instinctively develop our own pictures of the characters, and these are finely drawn in Ruth.

NAOMI is pictured at the beginning as an earlier Ruth—pious, practical, and loyal. But when she returns to Bethlehem, she changes into an embittered woman who blames God for all her troubles and demands an accounting from God. In the following chapters Naomi is pictured as a scheming woman who manipulates people to accomplish what God would not.

RUTH is a loving and loyal girl. She has a strange mixture of initiative and submissiveness.

BOAZ is pictured in regal dress. He is rich, magnanimous, discreet, and protective. He talks in a rather formal manner. At the end, however, he simply vanishes from the action.

YAHWEH has no speaking part, but the story is always aware of Yahweh's presence.

A good story needs tension or conflict. There is no tension between Ruth and Boaz or between Naomi and Ruth; the tension is between Naomi and God. It begins at the end of the first chapter when Naomi curses God. At the end the scheming woman has achieved her purpose of having an heir who assures her future. And yet the village women sing: "Blessed is the Lord who has not failed to provide you today with an heir" (4:14). Who won? The comic conclusion leaps from the page, but the author leaves us to handle it ourselves.

COMMENTARY

NAOMI IN MOAB

Ruth 1:1-22

The first chapter sets the scene for the main action of the story. Here the action rushes along in breathless fashion. The famine triggers the migration to Moab. The characters are introduced briefly: Elimelech, Naomi, Mahlon, and Chilion. The husband dies; the two sons are married to Moabite women, Orpah and Ruth. Then the two sons die, and Naomi makes ready to go back to Bethlehem, since she has heard that the famine there has abated. It will be noticed that no adjectives are used; the story is bare-bone fact, but the facts are arranged in dry-eyed fashion to elicit our sympathy.

Then the pace slows to record Naomi's conversations with her daughters-in-law. This is a loving family that Naomi has presided over; the "Go back!" that is wrenched from her (1:8, 11, 12, 15) is mingled with tears. But Naomi is ever a realist, even when she is fantasizing about her own childless future. She accepts her fate as due to the hand of the Lord. Ruth refuses to leave her: "Wherever you go I will go, wherever you lodge I will lodge, your people shall be my people, and your God my God" (1:16). Ruth's dedication is first to Naomi and then to Yahweh.

So the two women go back to Bethlehem, and there in familiar surroundings Naomi's character suddenly changes. "Do not call me Naomi. Call me Mara, for the Almighty has made it very bitter for me" (1:20). The "amiable one" has become the "bitter one." The challenge to Yahweh has been laid down unequivocally and publicly. We are now fully informed as to what the point of the story will be.

1:1 The narrator indicates clearly that this is a story; no interest is shown in citing specifics of time or place that could be tied to historical facts.

1:2 We do not know the exact significance of Ephrathites. The tribe of Ephraim lived far to the north, so the reference cannot be to them. Perhaps it was a clan name for one of the Caleb families of the tribe of Judah. At any rate, they belonged to the village of Bethlehem and, as emerges later (4:3), Naomi owned property there. Naomi belongs and yet she doesn't; she is always one who is different.

Moab is across the Jordan in an area the Israelites had never fully conquered. Sometimes relations with Moab were hostile and sometimes friendly. The story implies that the Judean family had no problems in being allowed to settle on this high and windy land.

1:3-4 The storyteller makes no comment at all about these mixed marriages, which seem to have been forbidden to the Israelites (see Deut 23:3), although this is not entirely clear. At any rate, the story treats the marriages as well as the sojourning in a foreign land as matters of practicality that need no justification.

1:8 The repetition of the advice to return has already been noted in the preliminary comments. The "mother's house" is odd and of uncertain implication. What is clear is that Naomi is always the practical one. Three widows are now the problem; women know best how to handle such matters and to arrange marriages. It is not the time to grieve but to do something.

1:16 The prose of the Book of Ruth has a lilt to it and can easily pass over into poetic form, as this balanced speech certainly does. Later on Boaz will know about Ruth's conversion. We know this passage as a popular song; perhaps it was so originally. It is also somewhat ironic: Naomi's first defeat in arranging things comes from the girl who loves her most.

1:20 Naomi means "lively," "delightful"; Mara means "bitter." These are authentic-sounding names from ancient times. Whatever may be the connection of such names with God, the storyteller is obviously contrasting personal qualities, perhaps nicknames. The admirable girl who had left Bethlehem in her youth has returned as a quite different character. The change in Naomi's character is essential for the story to work.

1:21 Naomi is exaggerating, for they had to go away because there was a famine. She seems to have enjoyed the good life in Moab, and that was an expected result for being a good Israelite. The problem posed is the eternal one: Why did this happen to me? It is presumed that God is in control. Naomi, like Job, blames God when that control seems irrational. The "Almighty" (Shaddai) is a name given to God particularly as judge.

"The Lord has pronounced against me": These are quasi-legal terms taken from a court setting. As in Job, the conflict between Naomi and Yahweh is open and absolute. At the same time, Naomi, as a practical woman, takes it for granted that nothing can be done about the situation.

THE MEETING

Ruth 2:1-23

Chapter 2 is a self-contained scene. It begins with the storyteller's note that Naomi has a kinsman named Boaz. It ends with Naomi recognizing him as the one in whose field Ruth has been gleaning. The description of Boaz befriending Ruth creates vivid pictures of both the girl and the man. Ruth is energetic in setting out to provide for her mother-in-law and in bringing home both provisions and news. She is also portrayed as highly submissive and deferential toward both Naomi and Boaz. Boaz, on the other hand, is more than generous in safeguarding the rights of the poor and the alien, in protecting Ruth and providing for her convenience. He speaks in formalized language, which sets him above Ruth. He is and acts like a prominent man (2:1). It is precisely these qualities that Naomi recognizes at the end (2:20). The point of chapter 2 is to show how Ruth comes under his protection and how Naomi recognizes it as a good thing.

2:1 The kinsman was not just a relative, but someone bound by custom to take the side of those who were in trouble. It was later used to mean "redeemer." Boaz is honoring an obligation as well as being magnanimous.

2:2 The obligation of allowing the poor and the alien to glean was recognized by law (see Lev 19:9; Deut 14:19-22). Ruth is both poor and alien. There is really no need for her to ask permission of Naomi or even Boaz.

2:8 Boaz is rather peremptory about deciding what Ruth shall do. Still and all, there is a pragmatic understanding that however pleased the young men are at having Ruth working in the fields with them, there is some danger that demands the protection of Boaz (2:9).

2:11 Boaz is not only prominent, but well-informed. However, he makes no allusion to being a kinsman. His initial kindness to Ruth is based simply on the report.

2:14 Boaz is here going beyond the demands of the law in allowing Ruth to glean in his fields. He gives instruction to the harvesters to let her get in with them and even to drop some handfuls of grain for her. All this emphasizes his graciousness.

2:19 The story is very realistic about this at-home talk between the two women. Naomi knows that Ruth has been successful, for she has brought home a bag of barley.

2:20 As readers, we already know of the relationship from 2:1. As a story, however, the identification implies more. Naomi sees in it not happenstance but opportunity.

2:22 Naomi's advice is prudent, especially in the Hebrew text, where the language is considerably more explicit than "insulted." Yet, in the light of Naomi's character, there is already a hint of advantages to be gained by staying close to the prominent kinsman.

NAOMI THE MATCHMAKER

Ruth 3:1-18

Chapter 3 is a model of artistic suspense that will lead up to chapter 4. All the actors think that they know where they are going. Naomi has just identified Boaz as their kinsman (2:20). It was not idle chitchat. Naomi knows that the kinsman-redeemer must provide for the widows. But she must draw him closer.

Nothing further happened during the harvest season. Now it is time for winnowing the grain, a happy time when Boaz will be in the right mood. Naomi makes the bold move of sending Ruth out in her best finery for a night meeting. She does not know exactly what will happen, but she realizes that she must push Boaz.

Ruth has her own mind. She does not wait for Boaz to begin the courting but creeps under his blanket. She reminds him that he is her kinsman, not to justify her bold conduct but to inform him that she has ties to him.

Boaz himself has plans. He wants to marry Ruth, but he is a prominent and honorable man. The setting and the wording clearly imply a tension that night: will they or will they not? Boaz knows what Ruth and Naomi do not: he cannot honorably marry Ruth because a closer relative has a prior claim.

And so the night scene ends inconclusively with nothing happening. It is all kept very quiet. But when Ruth tells Naomi what happened, the old lady knows what she must do. At the end of chapter 1 Naomi lost her faith that God would provide; at the end of this scene she tells Ruth to wait. Naomi already knows why Boaz will settle the matter today. She has her own way.

3:1 Ordinarily it was the duty of the menfolk to provide for widows. Already in 1:9 Naomi expressed her concern about providing for her two daughters-in-law. Yet she is not entirely disinterested. Ruth's security is a guarantee for herself.

3:3 "So bathe and anoint yourself; then put on your best attire and go down to the threshing floor." This is a nicely balanced chain of words in Hebrew; it was meant to go together. There were no highly restrictive customs keeping girls away from boys. However, this is pushing events a bit. Boaz himself is later aware (3:14) of what the neighbors will say.

3:4 Without advising deliberate seduction, Naomi is well aware of what might happen when Ruth lies at the feet of Boaz. The Hebrew words have a certain suggestiveness. The tension is deliberate on the part of the storyteller.

3:9 "Spread the corner of your cloak over me": literally, "spread your wing over me." The words are intended to call to mind the protecting wing of Yahweh. Ruth's intentions are more than amorous; the most important thing she wants to remind Boaz of is that by custom he is her protector. But she makes a mistake in thinking that Boaz is her closest kin.

3:12 Obviously Boaz has done his homework. The protector was not just any relative; there was a definite line of priority, although we do not know precisely how it worked. The point of the story is that Boaz does. In spite of his enthusiasm, however, and his promise to resolve the matter tomorrow, Boaz does not know how to bring this about. The storyteller has caught all of his characters at loose ends.

3:18 Naomi seems very confident, but we are not told why. There is a gap in the story here. In 4:3 we are told for the first time that Naomi is putting up a piece of property for sale. At the end of chapter 3 we are simply left wondering: What will happen now? Quite clearly, Naomi has been busy making sure of what will happen.

BOAZ MARRIES RUTH

Ruth 4:1-12

The marriage negotiations are described with considerable haste. We do not know what some of the customs were about, but the general tenor is clear enough. Boaz knows two things that the other characters do not: there is a nearer kinsman, and Naomi is putting up a piece of property for sale.

The kinsman and the elders are conveniently present when Boaz needs them. As a good trader, he holds out the most attractive prospect first. Naomi's field is available, and in fairness he offers the first bid to the kinsman. Only then does he put in the hook—he must also buy Ruth. The redemption of the widow involves her support, Naomi's support, and that of possible children.

At this the nearer relative cedes the right to buy the field. Boaz is obviously waiting in the wings to take over. And so, in a curious ceremony the arrangement is legally closed. The people at the gate witness to the transaction and pronounce a blessing upon Boaz and his house to come.

At this point it looks as though everybody has won. Naomi has provided for Ruth and for herself. In all likelihood she has also preserved her family line. Boaz has his girl and his field. Ruth has the man who has been so kind and faithful to her. But there is more to come.

4:1 The description of the proceedings corresponds to what we know of biblical times, but there are specific difficulties because we do not know enough. Each town had some sort of governing body of elders. A quorum of these members—ten in this case—sufficed for public hearings and decisions. General principles of law drawn from the Mosaic legislation governed the proceedings, but all citizens were not equally informed about legal niceties, nor are we.

Two general laws were involved in this case. Property was to remain in the hands of members of the same tribe or family. If it was lost, the relative-protector had to help get it back. Secondly, if a husband died before he had a son, then a brother-in-law or some other relative was to marry the widow and have a son in the name of the deceased. This is called a "levirate marriage" from the Latin word levir, meaning "brother-in-law." In such cases the brother-in-law or near relative recognized his obligation to continue the family line. Implicitly, this was a way of providing social security for the widow. In this case, it is not quite clear why the two widows are involved.

"He called to him by name, 'Come and sit beside me!' " From the beginning Boaz is totally in charge and dominates the whole scene. The closer relative is never named in the story. Perhaps the storyteller did not want to complicate matters by naming another character at this late point.

4:3 The conditions under which women could own land are somewhat obscure, but they certainly could do so. Just how Naomi came to sell the property at this time or how Boaz knew about it is not made clear in the story.

4:4 Boaz is being fair. At the same time, he lets it be known that he wants to buy the land. He takes it for granted that it would be an attractive purchase.

4:5 First the good news, then the bad. The closer relative had an advantage by his prior claim on the property; now he is told that he also has a stronger obligation to take care of the widow. The widow in question should be Naomi, but it seems taken for granted that she can no longer have children and that Ruth will have to be the bride.

4:6 With so many more mouths to feed and the need to leave an inheritance, the closer relative recognizes that he will be hurting his present family. No criticism is leveled against him in the story. The obligations fell upon the whole relationship, and it is evident that Boaz is willing to assume them.

4:7 We do not know who took off whose sandal, and we have no references elsewhere in the Bible to this curious custom.

4:10 This is the last time that Mahlon is mentioned. Boaz is always called the father, despite the levirate law, which was intended to preserve the name of the first husband.

4:11 Rachel and Leah were the wives of Jacob. In the next verse the blessing is: "May your house become like the house of Perez, whom Tamar bore to Judah." Jacob was the hero of the northern tribes; Judah, of the southern tribes. Both are mentioned apparently in reference to David, who was king of both north and south. Tamar was the widowed daughter-in-law for whom Judah neglected to provide a husband. By disguising herself as a prostitute, she managed to have a son by Judah himself (Gen 38).

THE BIRTH OF OBED

Ruth 4:13-17

The final scene centers on Naomi. It balances the prologue in chapter 1. Naomi had been the faithful wife who had everything taken away from her by Yahweh. It was Yahweh whom Naomi fingered as the villain. Through the rest of the story Naomi tried to take life into her own hands and to make provision for her old age and for the continuance of her family. Apparently she succeeded, although her manipulations did not always come out as she planned. But now she has a rich son-in-law and a successor. Did she win? As Naomi sits there with her grandson in her lap, the village women once more greet her. They had nothing to say when Naomi bitterly denounced Yahweh at the end of chapter 1. Now they sing: "Blessed is the Lord who has not failed to provide you today with an heir!" The storyteller does not spell out what this means. But it is dramatic.

4:13 Everything happens rapidly at the end. Ruth had been barren for the ten years of her marriage to Mahlon, but now she conceives quickly.

4:14 We cannot miss the point that it is Naomi, not Ruth, who is on stage. We do not know what customs may have been involved, but it is clear that this is deliberate as a storytelling technique. We are brought back to chapter 1, where the village women last appeared.

4:15 Ruth's worth is based on two claims: she loves Naomi and she has provided an heir. This may sound rather self-serving, but Naomi's complaint was precisely that Yahweh did not take care of her, although Yahweh has just now taken care of Ruth. The conflict between Yahweh and Naomi has been resolved, but not by Naomi's craftiness.

4:16 No more seems intended than that Naomi has become a good grandmother to the boy. The glad cry "A son is born to Naomi" need not have any legal implications of adoption.

4:17 It is too legalistic to ask why the neighbor women name the boy. The context indicates that they are celebrating this glorious birth and congratulating Naomi by using the boy's name, Obed. Obed is a name to remember. He will be the grandfather of King David.

THE GENEALOGY OF DAVID

Ruth 4:18-22

The story ends with a genealogy: Perez, Hezron, Ram, Amminadab, Nahshon, Salmon, Boaz, Obed, Jesse, David. There is no question that the genealogy is authentic within the traditional way of citing such lists. Despite all that was said in the story about raising up a son for Elimelech or Mahlon, neither is mentioned in the genealogy. Whether the genealogy was an afterthought of the author or a later addition to the text cannot be determined. It fits in well enough with the storyteller's chorus of village women crying "May he become famous in Israel." In that sense it would simply round off the story without being the central point.

On the other hand, it is rather odd that the author should conclude his story of Ruth with a genealogy that does not even mention her. Nor is she mentioned in the corresponding list in 1 Chr 2. Yet the tradition was preserved. Matt 1:5 does mention Ruth. Three women are remembered in Matthew's genealogy: Rahab the harlot, Ruth the Moabitess, and Bathsheba (although she is mentioned only discreetly in connection with Solomon, "whose mother had been the wife of Uriah"). Even in the final genealogy there are surprises.

LAMENTATIONS

James A. Fischer, C.M.

INTRODUCTION

Traditionally the Book of Lamentations has been pictured as the writing of Jeremiah the prophet as he saw the destruction of Jerusalem in 587 B.C.E. This certainly gives visual expression to much of the thought. The prophet was watching the smoke rise from the destroyed city. He heard the wailing of women as they found their dead ones or sought those long lost. Soldiers milled about, driving victims before them and setting fire to the ruins. It was the prophet's city and his people. Often had he preached in it, imploring his compatriots to turn back from folly. Now the terrible word of the Lord had come. It was too much. God had been right, but who could live with such a ruthless God? Prayer to God had been as useless as preaching to the people. God had made a mockery of former glorious promises and deeds.

Such is the literary setting of the five poems (chapters) that comprise the Book of Lamentations. They are incandescent with emotions of desolation, grief, incomprehension, and indignation. Sin has been revealed in its raw evilness. Nothing of nobility survived except a bleeding memory.

The form of the book

Yet the book is a rigidly controlled outpouring. As poetry it is spontaneous, heartfelt, torn from exacerbated feelings and yet elaborately planned and precisely executed. Three of the poems are acrostics, each verse beginning with a succeeding letter of the Hebrew alphabet; the other two are also built on the pattern of twenty-two. Such a numerical pattern gives a feeling of inescapable completion. In each poem a break occurs just slightly before the middle, setting the two parts against each other. The middle poem (chapter 3) is totally different in mood, as we shall see. All five poems must be read to grasp the overall feeling and meaning; that is the aim of the poet.

Some of the poems are written in the rhythm of a funeral dirge. Some verses have the form of taunt songs. The meter is still disputed; reconstructions and explanations based on it do not seem to get us very far.

Out of the controlled literary form comes a theological insight. God can be faced and prayed to in all the divine anger and stony silence. Grief and bitterness can be surmounted to arrive at repentance and acceptance. When history has become unendurable, faith still endures.

The history of the book

The picture given of Jeremiah at the beginning will not stand up to historical analysis. Although he could have composed the lamentations, it appears more probable that they were written over a period of years after him. Perhaps, indeed, many such laments were written for memorial services in the ruined city or elsewhere and our collection represents a selection by an editor. The first and second poems seem to be eyewitness compositions; the rest are clearly from a later time. All are heavily flavored by the expressions and thoughts of the prophet Jeremiah and so have been traditionally associated with him.

Certainly the book as we know it was completed by 538 B.C.E. It is possible, but not provable, that the poems were sung in some liturgical setting. We know that much later they were used in synagogues for the celebration of the ninth day of Ab in late summer to remember the destruction of Jerusalem.

COMMENTARY

JERUSALEM ABANDONED AND DISGRACED

Lam 1:1-22

The first poem (chapter 1) or dirge is an acrostic, that is, a poem whose lines begin with succeeding letters of the Hebrew alphabet. It is divided into two parts. Each begins with a cry:

> How lonely she is now, > the once crowded city! (1:1)
> Look, O Lord, and see > how worthless I have become! (1:11)

The first section describes the utter loneliness of the daughter of Jerusalem, now a widow. It is a funeral dirge over Jerusalem itself. The precise rhythm of the dirge song is used. The widow weeps. Her friends have betrayed her, and she has no peace. There are no more pilgrims coming to her; her priests groan, her foes triumph, her little ones have gone away, her glory is vanished, she has no home, her foes gloat over her. And added to all this, she is aware that it is her own sins that have brought it about. This first section winds down to a piteous plea:

> Astounding is her downfall, > with no one to console her.
> Look, O Lord, upon her misery, > for the enemy has triumphed! (1:9)

The second section begins with a confession of guilt and yet a plea for others to understand her misery:

> "Come, all you who pass by the way,
> look and see > Whether there is any suffering like > my suffering, > which has been dealt me . . ." (1:12).

Images are heaped up: blazing wrath, fire, sins plaited together and tied around her neck, brought to her knees, young men crushed, trodden into the winepress. There is no one to console her: Jerusalem has become a thing unclean. This section also finally emerges into a prayer, but a prayer for vengeance:

> "Let all their evil come before you;
> deal with them
> As you have dealt with me > for all my sins;
> My groans are many,
> and I am sick at heart" (1:22).

It is a dark mood that has come upon the poet. Loneliness is the most dreaded evil; there is no one, not even God, to offer any consolation. There is no denying that God has been just in punishing; yet God seems to be playing favorites by not punishing the more sinful invader. Repentance comes down to a need for some immediate vindication against the foe: "deal with them as you have dealt with me for all my sins."

1:1 The note of loneliness is struck from the beginning. Jerusalem never had a large population, but during the festival days it was overflowing with Jews from all over Palestine and foreign countries.

The city is "she." Such was the ancient way of referring to cities. Wealth, education, and power flowed from cities. Capital cities were referred to as "queens." In the Bible "daughter of Zion" or "mother Jerusalem" are the ordinary designations. The metaphor gets mixed up here, for although the dirge is for the female whose funeral song is sung, it is the widow who pronounces it over herself.

1:3 The text is not clear. It seems to refer to Judah in exile, but that has not yet happened and the Hebrew text supports the usual picture of pre-exilic Judah as living among the nations as their savior. If so, the pity is that Judah has failed to bring "rest" or peace to the nations.

1:5 As elsewhere in the Old Testament, there are no explanations about the sociological or political forces at work. The Lord is fingered from the first as the cause of disaster. So also in verse 12: "the Lord afflicted me."

1:8 Although Jews were not at all squeamish about sex, they did abhor nakedness. There is some dispute about the actual meaning in Hebrew; perhaps the picture does rely on a known punishment for treaty violations, namely, the political leaders were stripped naked so that they should be shamed before their own people. The same punishment also seems to have been used sometimes for prostitutes.

1:10 The Babylonians carried off the sacred vessels of the temple. What hurt the most was not the loss of money but the desecration of such treasures. The Book of Daniel (Dan 5:2) knows of this tradition (see 2 Kgs 25:13-17).

Deut 23:4 has a most severe rule against any Moabite or Ammonite ever being accepted into the community. The tradition persisted with uneven application for centuries. Actually, there do not seem to have been any Moabite or Ammonite soldiers among the Babylonian conquerors. For the poet this is immaterial; the picture is of utter desecration of the sacred.

1:12 The second section begins with an appeal for help against the Lord. Presumably those who pass by the way are uninvolved people who could make an unbiased judgment. The suffering of widowed Jerusalem is not just another normal tragedy of war; it is unprecedented, since it comes directly from the Lord.

1:14 The poet knows that sin is not a bit of dirt to be brushed off. It is "plaited," woven together into an entangling and heavy burden that cannot be shaken off.

1:17 Jacob is another name used generically for all Israel or for parts of it, such as Judah. Once more the lament is against the Lord directly. The physical terrors of war must be borne; the spiritual terrors of God as the enemy are less perceptible but are the cause of real grief.

1:19 The lovers seem to have been nations such as Egypt and Assyria, with which Judah had attempted to make alliances to stave off Babylonia. The verse also suggests a trifling with paganism. Unfaithful Jerusalem is often called a temple prostitute, a woman willing to abandon her husband to consort with the gods.

1:20 The poet knows that Jerusalem has been unfaithful and that she knows it. The pain lies not so much in the external suffering as in the loss of integrity. "My heart recoils within me from my monstrous rebellion." So the problem is posed in its most excruciating form: Jerusalem knows that the Lord is just (see v. 18), but accepting this is just too painful.

1:21 The ungracious ending begins quite openly. The "Day of the Lord" was a familiar theme—a time when God would defeat the nations and usher in God's glorious reign. The prophets had warned that the Day of the Lord was a two-edged sword; it could be directed against the chosen people also. So it had happened. But the Day had not fallen on the oppressors. If there is vengeance here, it is at least based on the belief that the Lord alone could do it. At this point acceptance is very slight; it is inescapable but narrow-minded.

THE LORD'S WRATH AGAINST ZION

Lam 2:1-22

The second poem is a wild outpouring of grief over destroyed Zion, but the wildness is controlled both by the literary artist and by the believer, as is signified by the same use of the alphabetical arrangement. This poem, too, divides into two parts. The problem is first raised:

> How the Lord in his wrath > has detested daughter Zion! (2:1)

The Lord has been ruthless in punishing, even self-distrustful, as the poet implies: "unmindful of his footstool." The Lord has dishonored everything in the land: dwellings, fortress Zion, king, princes. Then follows a poetic reverie: "his hand has brought ruin, yet he did not relent" (v. 8). The images heap up into an overwhelming picture of awesome destruction.

Then the poet turns to his own reverie:

> Worn out from weeping are my eyes, > within me all is in ferment (2:11).

Like King Jehoiakim, who saw his children slaughtered and then had his own eyes put out, the poet can see and feel the final scenes:

> As child and infant faint away > in the open spaces of the town.

They ask their mothers,
"Where is the cereal?"—in vain,
As they faint away like the wounded in the streets of the city, And breathe their last in their mothers' arms (2:11b-12).

There is no recourse but a cry to God, a cry bound to fall on deaf ears. It is unmerciful and unparalleled in history:

Look, O Lord, and consider:
whom have you ever treated thus?
Must women eat their offspring, their well-formed children?
Are priest and prophet slain
in the sanctuary of the Lord? (2:20)

No hope pervades these dreary thoughts. The day of wrath continues to the end.

The problem is the total disregard of God for mercy. Rather than deny it or cover it over with pious words of promise, the poet flings it in God's face. It is God's own self-interest that is badly served. What will the enemies think of such a God?

2:1 Each of the first eight verses describes the Lord as an enemy; the Lord detests, consumes in anger, blazes up, shoots, scorns, and so on. What is left unspoken is the implicit paradox: it is the Lord's chosen that is detested.

Zion is sacred soil because it is there that the Lord's feet have touched the earth and consecrated it. It is this sacred touch that the Lord now seems to forget.

2:3 The horn as a symbol of strength is a common Old Testament figure; see Ps 75:11 for an example.

2:6 The exact meaning is unclear. Perhaps the reference is to the shelters that were erected in the vineyards during the growing season so that the owner could mount a guard. They could be easily demolished. Israel is God's vineyard; God should have protected it.

2:8 The image is of an architect measuring a building. He knows precisely the size and shape that he wants. So the Lord has decreed destruction of Zion's wall not haphazardly but with precise planning.

2:9 The reference is to the bars that were put up to lock the gates of the city after they were closed.

Among all the calamities, the worst were the losses of spiritual things, such as the instruction in the law given by the priests. Religious education had come to a halt.

2:10 The esteemed elders are sitting on the ground either humiliated or as a sign of mourning. At any rate, the education by the wise has ceased. Usually the daughters of Jerusalem are pictured as dancing; now they are mourning.

2:11 The first part of the poem has concentrated on what God the enemy has done. Now the thought turns back to the personal dismay of daughter Jerusalem (see 1:20 for the same phrasing).

2:12 Nothing more vivid could be added to this picture of starving children. It is just a few words, but it is the detail that says immense amounts. In verse 20 the poet will allude to women eating their offspring. It was one of the terrors of sieges amply attested by the Old Testament and by other ancient Near Eastern texts.

2:14 The Hebrew text is more vivid: "Your prophets saw visions that were mere whitewash." The reality was horrendous and the prophets knew it; they whitewashed it by crying "Peace!" when they knew that there was no peace of the Lord in the land.

2:15 Obviously the passersby are not clapping in approval as we do. Clapping of the hands is a fairly frequent sign of derision in the Old Testament.

2:20 The paradox here is brought near the surface. The enemies of Israel were obviously the sinners and deservedly suffered defeat, famine, pillage, and siege. But nothing like this had ever happened to the chosen ones. It is a reproach to the justice of God that God has punished the chosen people without mercy.

2:22 The poem ends on a note of total disgust and reproach; God doesn't even have manners, and God's feast day is a grisly banquet of death. There is nothing more to be said than "if that is the kind of God you are, we don't want you." It is notable that it is not said. The twenty-two-verse pattern ends precisely before it, and nothing more can be added.

SUFFERINGS OF THE PROPHET AND HIS PEOPLE

Lam 3:1-66

The third poem is completely different. It is not the agonized outpouring of an eyewitness over Jerusalem in its death throes. It is a personal meditation or reverie:

> I am a man who knows affliction > from the rod of his anger (3:1).

How can such a man live with his God? The problem of affliction is described in rather traditional images having only a vague reference to the destruction of Jerusalem. But in any affliction, mysterious as it may be, the sages can still assert that God is good.

> The favors of the Lord are not exhausted, > his mercies are not spent;
> They are renewed each morning,
> so great is his faithfulness.
> My portion is the Lord, says my soul;
> therefore I will hope in him (3:22-24).

Affliction is seen to have a medicinal effect:

> Why should any living man complain, > any mortal, in the face of his sins?
> Let us search and examine our ways > that we may return to the Lord! (3:39-40)

At this point the meditation turns from the personal "I" to the collective "we." The rest of the poem is a somewhat conventional lament that confesses sin, complains that the enemy is still triumphant, expresses confidence that God will hear, and ends with a prayer for vindication against enemies.

It is a soothing prayer. The imagery is much less violent than in the preceding two poems. The alphabetic form has been used, but now the poem has stretched out from twenty-two to sixty-six verses to heighten the understanding that not only has all been said, but it has been fully said. The poet often reaches back for hallowed phrases traditionally sung in the temple; some ten verses are very close to psalm quotations. Often the vocabulary and style parallel the wisdom writers' techniques, and so give a calming effect. God is viewed as the Creator, the Most High, the Lord from heaven. Despite the harsh note of vindictiveness at the end, the poem carries the gentler spirit of the sages of Israel. God is hidden in these harsh facts of life, but God is still there, and still there as a good God.

Seen against the background of the first two poems, this lengthy meditation begins to investigate a livable solution. It is a mysterious solution, since, as the sages realized, no one can understand God. But if the question is raised of how Israelites can live with their God, as it was in the preceding poems and in the beginning of this one, then the ancient faith in a good God who eventually uses power both to chastise and to vindicate must be added. It does not solve the problem. This poet has managed to quiet the raw emotions of loneliness and incomprehensibility into something more peaceful where the thought that things may not be what they seem to be can begin to emerge.

3:2 The sharp contrasts between light and darkness, life and death, good and evil in this poem are characteristic of the sages' techniques.

3:6 The Jews of this period did not speculate about what happened in the afterlife, although they believed that life continued for them. The experience of death was that a body was placed in a grave and stayed there. As far as anyone could see, such a life was useless. So death was darkness and a nonentity.

3:8 We are so accustomed to saying that God always hears prayer that we ignore our own experience. The Hebrews felt more comfortable admitting that God did not need to hear anything and that their efforts to reach God often seemed to be ignored. Thus verse 44 says: "You wrapped yourself in a cloud which prayer could not pierce."

3:10 For the next six verses the poet pursues the picture that God is the enemy. The Jews had no theories to explain evil in the world. It simply existed, and in some way it was due to God (see vv. 37-38). The experience of life often seemed to make God the enemy.

3:20 Here again the experience of life dominates. We keep mulling over our problems and the broken-record process gets in the way of our ever seeing more in our situation.

3:22 Note the sudden inbreaking of light here. This is a standard feature of the lament psalms and is called a "certainty of a hearing." No lament is complete without it. Here it introduces a new section.

3:24 "My portion is the Lord": Ps 16:5 and 73:26 use the same metaphor. It was the conviction of all that God has given each person a place in life and a work to do. This might become specific, as in the allotting of portions of the land to the various tribes. There was a portion for all, and it was given not haphazardly but because the Lord decreed it.

3:25 "Good is the Lord to one who waits for him": This is part of the faith statement. It is also put in the form of a wisdom admonition. It will be noted that verses 25, 26, and 27 all have the same form: "It is good . . ."

3:29 The metaphor expresses surrender and is probably taken from a scene of political subjugation.

3:31 We are getting into an insight of how evil actually operates in the world. Experience taught that the Lord always came to rescue Israel, although this might take time. The worst thought was that God simply did not care about what went on here on earth. Verses 34 to 36 are a repudiation of that idea. The same occurs in the Book of Job (see Job 35).

3:37 Here we have, not a philosophical explanation of the problem of evil, but a simple statement of observed fact and faith. Good and evil do come; unless one is prepared to say that there is another god of evil, one can only say that both good and evil come from God in some way. What that way may be is subject to endless philosophizing, but the assertion here bears on the fact that there is only one God who controls everything.

3:39 Whatever turns the notion of disaster and sin took, it seemed reasonable to the Jews to concede that all human beings were sinful, and if they were not punished for one thing, they deserved it for another.

3:40 This is another wisdom admonition, and, typically, it makes practical use of the reflections that have preceded it. Suffering has a medicinal value if only we will search for it.

3:48 This is the first reference to the destruction of Jerusalem, and apart from verses 48-51 there is no other allusion to it in this poem.

3:54 Water as a symbol of trouble is common in the Old Testament.

3:65 There is no doubt about the vindictiveness of this prayer. But it should at least be conceded that the poet was thinking in spiritual terms. The worst evil he could wish was a spiritual one—hardness of heart. From that there was no escape, as he himself knew from his own experience.

MISERIES OF THE BESIEGED CITY

Lam 4:1-22

After the reflective mood of the third poem, the fourth chapter can take a more reasonable approach to lament. Past and present jostle for sorrowful consideration at the beginning.

> How tarnished is the gold,
> how changed the noble metal! (4:1)

The glory of Zion past is compared with the present ignominy, the prosperity of yesteryears with the starvation of today. The poet will not flinch from even the worst:

> The hands of the compassionate women > boiled their own children,
> To serve them as mourners' food > in the downfall of the daughter of > my people (4:10).

Then the mood changes to one of honest admission that all this punishment has come upon them because of their sins. Prophets, priests, elders, even the anointed (king) have proven false and have been dispersed. The last hope is gone with the king in prison:

> He in whose shadow we thought > we could live on among the nations (4:20).

And the simple fact is admitted: the Lord himself has dispersed us (v. 16). There is one last outburst of resentment—this time against Edom, the traditional enemy. However, it is clear that the poet has made progress in elevating his thought. God is the punisher, and yet punishment is justifiable.

4:3 The starving mothers of Jerusalem know that even wild animals can feed their young; they cannot. "The daughter of my people has become as cruel as the ostrich in the desert." There was a widespread belief that ostriches abandoned their eggs after laying them and allowed them to be trampled on.

4:12 The belief was that of the Israelites; we have no evidence that any others held it. Still and all, Jerusalem remained unconquered from the time of David to the Exile, some four hundred years.

4:13 No specific sin is mentioned, and the Hebrew text is somewhat uncertain. However,

Jeremiah himself was unjustly imprisoned and accused of treason by the priests and the prophet Hananiah (see Jer 26). So also Christ refers to a tradition of bloodshed in Jerusalem caused by the officials (see Matt 23:35). It should also be noted that the Old Testament does not distinguish, in using the title "prophet," between false prophets and true ones, as present-day scholars are accustomed to do. Among those called prophets there were many political sycophants and downright liars.

4:20 The reference is to King Zedekiah, who was captured trying to escape from Jerusalem during the last siege (see 2 Kgs 25:3-6). The king is called "our breath of life," a very ancient Canaanite title for a king. There is no reason to suspect irony.

4:21 "Daughter Edom" is, of course, the country across the Jordan. A somewhat vagrant tradition says that Esau, the brother of Jacob, was their progenitor. Actually, they seem to have been a mixed people among whom the Jews mingled and did business. For some reason that is not entirely clear from the Bible, they are usually singled out by the prophets for the fiercest of denunciations.

4:22 This is about the happiest thing said in the Book of Lamentations. In contrast to Edom, whose punishment is in the future, Zion is on the upswing.

THE PROPHET'S LAMENT AND SUPPLICATION

Lam 5:1-22

The last poem must be seen against the backdrop of the preceding chapters. The poems began with an untrammeled lament over the destroyed city and a questioning of how God could do this. The third poem introduced a reflective mood: God is still the good God, and suffering has its curative value. The fourth poem spoke much about a true confession of faith. Now the poet is ready to put this horrendous experience in the light of Israel's historical traditions.

> Remember, O Lord, what has befallen us, > look, and see our disgrace:
> Our inherited lands have been turned > over to strangers, > our homes to foreigners (5:1-2).

The exiles are the foreigners now, worked to death and begging for water. The facts cannot be belied. Sin has worked its havoc according to the ancient law that children are to be punished for the crimes of their parents. So be it.

But there is more to remembering than that. The destruction of Jerusalem is in the past for these exiles. And it was not simply the sins of the parents that had brought it about.

> Woe to us, for we have sinned! (5:16)

Yet Israel's God has always been a king, unchanging in both goodness and power. Such a king cannot forget his own.

> You, O Lord, are enthroned forever;
> your throne stands from age to age.
> Why, then, should you forget us, > abandon us so long a time?
> Lead us back to you, O Lord, that we > may be restored:
> give us anew such days as we had
> of old (5:19-21).

On this humbly supplicant note the Lamentations end. The poet has come to the peace of confession and of waiting for God to remember without any bitterness against God who inflicted the punishment and without resentment against the enemy who did it. There is an opening into a new understanding of the tragedy of the destruction of Jerusalem. As if to indicate this by the literary form used, the poet has dropped the acrostic formula and has not employed the funereal meter of lament. The future is open. It is a simple theological statement of hope.

Title: Some Greek manuscripts have a title prefixed to this chapter: "A prayer." So it is. The tone of this chapter is prayerful and calming. Although it has twenty-two verses, this poem is not alphabetical (an acrostic) like the others. It is in the form of a national lament with all the expression of confidence that such a song demands.

5:6 Although the Exodus from Egypt and the events leading up to it were hundreds of years in the past, it continued to be the central experience and measuring stick for most later reflections on the ways of God. The Hebrew text is not as harsh as the translation: "We shook hands with Egypt . . ."

5:7 The idea that the sins of parents are visited on their children is common in the Old Testament. It is also common sense from a historical perspective. The poet accepts such guilt, or at least such punishment, as just. He also allows space for the guilt of the present generation.

5:8 The Hebrew word is used as a slur on government officials, especially the lower ones, who were often corrupt.

5:11-14 These verses picture a society in which all the norms of accepted social behavior are overturned. Wives and maidens are no longer respected and protected; princes are executed; elders are not honored; young men have no job opportunities; the elders who govern prudently do not even bother to gather at the city gates, and the young do not have fun.

5:18 The more terrible prophetic threats predicted the destruction of Jerusalem and pictured wild animals as the only inhabitants. That Jerusalem as the center of worship, and so of all religion, should be abandoned was unthinkable. The rallying cry for the preservation of Judaism in exile centered on the unquenchable desire to return to the Holy City.

5:19 The enthronement of Yahweh as King was both a theological conviction and a liturgical celebration of great importance in pre-exilic Judaism. Essentially, the statement expressed the faith that God alone ruled all things and would eventually win. It is noteworthy that the Exile brought out some of the strongest expressions of this faith in Old Testament history. It was a time when the Old Testament was largely edited, and the events of the past reinterpreted in dynamic fashion.

5:21 The New American Bible translation catches the right meaning of the words: "help us to repent!" That repentance was still possible is taken for granted. In synagogue reading the Jews repeat this verse after the end of the chapter, so that the whole of Lamentations ends on a hopeful note that God will grant repentance. Thus was the book conceived. It is not a pious book of idealistic sayings that tell us how we ought to be. It is a human as well as a divine document that witnesses to the power of God to save even when we are in the depths of despair and resentment. It is salvation achieved, but at a great price.

ECCLESIASTES

James A. Fischer, C.M.

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Ecclesiastes is the most damnable book in the Bible and yet the most satisfying for those who have learned to live comfortably with doubt. That it is damnable seems clear; it has been denounced many times as cynical, pessimistic, worldly, and downright heretical. That it is in the Bible at all and provides great comfort for those who are willing to face life honestly is also a fact. Ecclesiastes—or to give him the Hebrew name by which he is often known, Qoheleth—destroys most of the accepted clichés on which the superficially pious live.

> Because the sentence against evildoers is not promptly executed, therefore the hearts of men are filled with the desire to commit evil—because the sinner does evil a hundred times and survives (8:11-12).
>
> Consider the work of God. Who can make straight what he has made crooked? (7:13)
>
> A good name is better than good ointment, and then Qoheleth adds:

> and the day of death than the day of birth (7:1). One man out of a thousand have I come upon, but a woman among them all I have not found (7:28).

That may be the unkindest cut of all. On the other hand, Qoheleth's favorite slogan is "Eat, drink and be merry" (Eccl 2:24; 3:13; 5:17; 9:7-10). Somewhere among all this one must begin to wonder what Qoheleth believed in, if anything. And then there is the greater problem that a whole people accepted this as the word of God. The Book of Ecclesiastes is one of the great books of the Bible and of ancient times. It is not an easy book to deal with. But neither is life, and that is what Qoheleth ventured to examine.

We do not know much about the author. The name "Ecclesiastes" is a title made up from the Greek word for "church" or "synagogue." It is roughly a translation of the Hebrew "Qoheleth," but neither is a very happy title for somebody who apparently was much more a professor in an academy than a churchman. He must remain forever unknown.

From the contents of the book we can create a somewhat imaginative but largely responsible picture. Qoheleth lived sometime between 300 and 200 B.C.E. The quality of his diction betrays that. Apparently he was a teacher in Jerusalem. We know too little about the educational system of that time, but we can reasonably suspect that Jewish education was a cut above the average in the ancient world, and that there was a well-organized system from the grades to the college level in Jerusalem. Qoheleth appears to have been one of the more honored members of that academic community. He also appears to have been wealthy, and that certainly was not due to his academic pursuits. Apparently he was happily married, at least in his youth. Children do not figure in his admonitions; "son" is always a conventional term for "student."

After many years in the classroom, Qoheleth was compelled by the usual demon of professors to set down his best discoveries in life. Many young men had sat before him and gone out into the world. They came back occasionally to consult their old teacher. They were successful, full of importance, with a formula for "making it." The old man looked at them and wondered if he had overaccomplished his task. They still had not learned, and beneath the veneer of achievement he detected a great doubt and fear. So he asked the question for them: Is it all worthwhile? He himself had been through it. He realized that he first had to impress them with the impossible question so that they would admit their need. Only then could he give them the answer that life is worth living, not just for the sheer joy of living to the hilt, but for the deeper reason that this is what God had appointed them to do when creating them as caretakers on earth. But that took a good deal of explaining.

The book was originally written in Hebrew. The style is excellent, as is also the somewhat free Greek translation that was made very early on. It is hard to determine for whom it was written. It certainly was not written for church reading, whatever that word may mean. It was an essay to be distributed and cherished among students. But somehow it came to be read in synagogues. Today it is read for the feast of Succoth to add a somber note to the ending of the year. This is not entirely compelling; there is really nothing in the book to suggest fall, and some Jews do not read it at all.

How the book got into the Bible is also something of a mystery. The title, "The words of David's son, Qoheleth, king in Jerusalem," is probably a later addition. It gives some justification for including the work in the sacred Scriptures by placing it within the wisdom tradition, which was always connected with Solomon. Especially in later times, when the title was taken more literally, this seems to have been a powerful argument among the rabbis. The last verses of the book (Eccl 12:9-14) were added by an editor, as is clear from the text itself. Someone else, therefore, published the book.

Between publication and acceptance as a sacred book, however, there is a large gap. This book did not have the backing of priests, prophets, synagogue officials, or other authorities. It had to be accepted because of its own excellence and then transformed from being an insightful essay into being a word of God. There were arguments among the Jewish rabbis of a later date as to whether it should be accepted in the list of sacred writings, but when it was accepted, it was accepted without further argument. Perhaps the ascription to "David's son" did carry the day. If so, the book is in the Bible for the wrong reason—which would please Qoheleth no end. The Christians found no problem whatever in embracing it, although it is obviously no inspiring Sermon on the Mount.

Form of the book

Unlike the Books of Ruth or Lamentations, this book has no intricate or tightly controlled form. For purposes of reading, it may be just as well to simply note the following divisions:

First section—1:1-3:15 is a fairly well organized series of reflections on life as a pursuit of objectives that always end up being unsatisfying. It begins with a poignant poem on the inevitability of the constant round of activity in this world and ends with another poem about a time for everything, followed by a reflection that we do not know why this should be.

Middle section—3:16-11:8 seems to be a jumble of occasional remarks on various topics that Qoheleth found particularly enigmatic. Included here are mostly proverbs—sometimes proverbs that stand traditional proverbs on their heads; occasionally a parable; sometimes that refrain about "Eat, drink and be merry"; and, toward the end, a tendency to indulge in poetry.

Final section—11:9-12:8 strikes a different note, as if the author were aware that he might leave his readers with a dissonant sound reverberating in their ears. So he goes back to his job of giving hope to the young. Live life to the full, he advises. Old age comes too quickly. But what are we walking into? The darkness of a deserted village? The grave? That is only for the dust that we are. What of the life-breath? Where does it go?

Editor's footnote—As indicated above, the final verses are from an editor. It is not your conventional dust-jacket blurb. This editor tells us that Qoheleth taught the people proverbs and true sayings with precision. Yet even here he recognizes that "of the making of many books there is no end." So he published another one. Qoheleth would have liked that.

Theological insight

This is obviously a problem book, and the first need is to define the problem. It seems from the middle section of the book that the young Qoheleth had high ideals of justice and honesty in human affairs. He was perhaps a brilliant and competent student, and had access to the inner chambers of government. Despite the "perhaps," it is clear that he was disillusioned. His first thought in the middle section is of the intractability of injustice in the world.

> And still under the sun in the judgment place I saw wickedness, and in the seat of justice, iniquity (3:16).

The higher one went, the worse it got. The petty graft of tax-collectors and civil servants was nothing compared with that of judges and administrators.

> If you see oppression of the poor, and violation of rights and justice in the realm, do not be shocked by the fact, for the high official has another higher than he watching him and above these are others higher still (5:7).

And there the author leaves it, although he adds somewhat bitterly that people still say: "Yet an advantage for a country in every respect is a king for the arable land" (5:8).

But Qoheleth was no prophet who could go to his death denouncing injustice in the land. He was a party man who succumbed to the wisdom that one cannot fight City Hall. So he could only fold his hands while protesting:

> I have seen all manner of things in my vain days: a just man perishing in his justice, and a wicked one surviving in his wickedness. Be not just to excess, and be not overwise, lest you be ruined (7:15-16).

On the other hand, he never gave up protesting the dishonesty he saw in his society. Much of his concern about justice was simply that politicians will not call a spade a spade. But then he found out that this was true among his academic friends as well. They peddled knowledge as the cure-all. But it was not true, as Qoheleth knew from personal experience.

> When I applied my heart to know wisdom and to observe what is done on earth, I recognized that man is unable to find out all God's work that is done under the sun, even though neither by day nor by night do his eyes find rest in sleep. However much man toils in searching, he does not find it out; and even if the wise man says that he knows, he is unable to find it out (8:17).

It was simply dishonest to fool people by repeating the popular wisdom that had been handed down without question through the centuries. Good and evil constantly happened, but no one could say exactly why. The law and the prophets were powerless. Although people did not say so explicitly, they expected that virtuous living would be rewarded with prosperity, peace, family, and happiness; on the other hand, the wicked always perished. Qoheleth knew that it was not true. The older wisdom had extolled the values of hard work, moderate pleasure, and the discipline of wisdom. Indeed, this had become almost a stained-glass picture of a sage. Job had railed against it by using the story of the good man who was afflicted in every way and then demanded to know why.

Qoheleth had suffered the opposite fate. He had everything that the traditional wisdom said that a sage should have. And he found it nothing but a vapor, a puff of smoke, the greatest "vanity" of all. So his essay begins with a rather slashing attack on wisdom, pleasure, and toil as means of attaining any understanding that was worthwhile. The truth was that life kept flowing in the same channel no matter what a person did or was. Life and death, war and peace, love and hatred—these things happened, they were not caused. They were all the inevitabilities of time. What was behind them? The central problem is that we admit they have meaning, but we cannot in any way find the meaning.

> I have considered the task which God has appointed for men to be busied about. He has made everything appropriate to its time, and has put the timeless into their hearts, without men's ever discovering, from beginning to end, the work which God has done (3:9-11).

That is the problem. Without a religious code, there is no problem with the craziness of the world. It is only when a person like Qoheleth really believes, that the incomprehensibility of it all becomes unendurable. The best of human resources fail where they must succeed.

Something of balm comes from the recognition that life itself is good. Qoheleth was one of those normally happy persons who could not doubt the glory of sunshine in the morning.

> Indeed, for any among the living there is hope; a live dog is better off than a dead lion (9:4).

We are alive and we can enjoy. So Qoheleth has his comforting refrain (2:24-36; 3:12-13; 3:22; 5:17-19; 7:13-14; 8:15; 9:7-10; 11:7-10):

> Go, eat your bread with joy and drink your wine with a merry heart, because it is now that God favors your works (9:7).
>
> Anything you can turn your hand to, do with what power you have (9:10).

Life blossoms in doing something; don't just sit there and die. Even in acquiring knowledge Qoheleth knew that there is a difference between the wise person and the fool even when there was no pay-off.

> I went on to the consideration of wisdom, madness and folly. And I saw that wisdom has the advantage over folly as much as light has the advantage over darkness. The wise man has eyes in his head, but the fool walks in darkness (2:12-14).

The sheer exuberance of living is some consolation and validation of life. In all of this there is a usually implied but sometimes expressed understanding that everything good is a gift of God. It cannot really be merited; it is simply there, and sometimes there in surprising places, such as among the unjust. But as long as one has one's own measure, that can be borne. So the goodness of God is also a partial reason for accepting life as it is. That God wants to be good to others may be inexplicable, but not unacceptable.

Yet there was a deeper problem. If the sages had the advantage of having eyes in their heads, they ended up in the same grave as the fools. If the just and the unjust both seemed to enjoy life, the grave swallowed them both. If the wise could save a city by wisdom (Eccl 9:13-16; see 2 Sam 20:14-22), they could also be forgotten along with the fools who started the war. The inexplicability could not simply be accepted; it had to be understood.

And so Qoheleth pursued his way toward his own solution. It was not all that much of a solution, for it too leads to the grave. In the last great and haunting bit of poetry in the book, he pictures himself, an old man now, walking slowly through a devastated village. The strong men stand bent; the mourners inside shroud their heads as he passes; the birds stop singing. He finally comes to the village well, which had been the source of life. As he watches, the waiting pitcher topples and breaks, and the pulley falls into the deep pit.

> And the dust returns to the earth as it > once was,
> and the life breath returns to God > who gave it.
> Vanity of vanities, says Qoheleth, > all things are vanity! (12:7-8)

What happened after that no one knows. But Qoheleth had gotten them as far as he could. The new revelation awaited the Son of God.

COMMENTARY

THE FIRST SECTION

Eccl 1:1–3:15

Chapter 1

1:1 Despite the apparent meaning, the author is not Solomon but Qoheleth. Forging authorship was not a practice among the Jews. Rather, the need was for one to remain unknown while indicating the kind of writing that one intended. Later the author will dress up his own experience as a well-to-do bonvivant and businessman in terms more suitable for King Solomon. This was accepted practice.

1:2-8 The introductory poem is matched by the concluding one in 3:1-8. Both concern the relentless succession of events, and both are well-known because of their elegant style. The images conjure up the feeling of endless sameness; the balanced phrases are measured to lull us into acceptance. Here one generation succeeds another endlessly; the sun rises and sets each day; the wind keeps blowing, now from one direction and then from another; the rivers keep running down to the sea but never fill it; we keep explaining, but we never really say anything; we keep seeing and hearing, but we never learn what it is all about. The whole enterprise is the greatest puff of vapor imaginable, "vanity," for that is what "vanity of vanities" means.

1:11 The one thing that is thought to have permanence is a family name. People live on in that endless remembering that is so much a part of their religious heritage. Qoheleth denies it.

1:12-18 Qoheleth's first attempt to solve the riddle is by wisdom. Those with wisdom are the observers, sometimes the natural scientists of their day. Qoheleth sees it all and concludes that it is all made up of crooked lines and leads nowhere—"a chase after the wind." All that work for nothing! He can only reach the opposite conclusion that the sages before him reached: "For in much wisdom there is much sorrow" (1:18). Disillusionment, not contentment, is the fruit of learning.

Chapter 2

2:1-12 This section recounts Qoheleth's attempt to find an answer in frantic pleasure. It is not the heady flower-children escapism in which the Greeks were tempted to indulge (see Wis 2:1-9). This is the more substantial Jewish way of displaying power by banquets and sumptuous building projects—in short, becoming a patron of the arts. "Nothing that my eyes desired did I deny them, nor did I deprive myself of any joy, but my heart rejoiced in the fruit of all my toil" (v. 10). But who will keep it all up when he is gone? "For what will the man do who is to come after the king? What men have already done!" (v. 12).

2:12b-17 An aside is inserted here to reflect on the vanity of it all. Qoheleth might just as well be a fool, one who simply spurns the ethics of Jewish righteousness and lives selfishly as though there were no God; such is the meaning of "fool." Even though those with wisdom have eyes in their head, they come to the same end as the fool; all will be forgotten. And so he loathes a life that has no real meaning whatever one does.

2:18-26 Next Qoheleth buries himself in work. From the beginning he knows how vain this is. He knows not whether he will leave it all to a fool or a wise person. Meanwhile he must worry about it, so that "even at night his mind is not at rest" (v. 23). Still and all, working at play is about the best one can do. "There is nothing better for man than to eat and drink and provide himself with good things by his labors" (v. 24). It was not exactly escapism which Qoheleth embraced, but thankfulness. Hard work did not produce results; it did make one aware that everything good came from the hand of God.

Chapter 3

3:1-8 This famous poem, which we have made into a popular song, celebrates the inevitability of life. "There is an appointed time for everything under heaven." It is not a moral judgment of which times are good and which are bad, but the much worse judgment that they are simply inevitable. Birth and death, sowing and harvesting, killing and healing go on no matter what we do. And so it comes down to those alternatives on which we all take sides: a time to love and a time to hate; a time of war and a time of peace. It will not do to say that we opt for love, not hate; or peace, not war. That is immaterial—they simply happen.

3:9-15 So the poem leads to a meditation on what we are all thinking of: Why? Merely working for peace or love does not seem to affect the outcome very much, despite all the glorious stories of how one person changed the world. Somehow God has placed us all here in these intractable situations that keep us busy without ever bringing us closer to a conclusion or even revealing what it is all about. All we know is hustling time that will not let us rest with the good things we want.

Yet the tradition of the sages said that there is an appropriate time for all things. Nothing happens haphazardly or outside its time. But we do not know what or why the appropriate time is.

> He has made everything appropriate to its time, and has put the timeless into their hearts, without men's ever discovering from beginning to end, the work which God has done (v. 11).

This is the crux of the problem. Unfortunately, the Hebrew is not quite clear about the word we translate as "timeless." It is an adverb, and the translation might be: "he has put the love of the world into their hearts." If so, the final problem is that all are earthbound. The final poem (see Eccl 12:7) seems to persuade acceptance of our translation. At any rate, Qoheleth returns to his refrain about eating and drinking. Now, however, his thought goes further than thanks. All things happen because God has done them; that remains, and nothing can be added to it or taken away from it. God alone can put things back in their proper place: "God restores what would otherwise be displaced" (v. 15). The exact meaning is somewhat obscure.

THE MIDDLE SECTION

Eccl 3:16–11:8

As noted above, the middle section has no real order to it. It seems to be a collection of various proverbial sayings and reflections on almost all aspects of Israel's wisdom. Some of them Qoheleth accepts, others he modifies, and many of them he rejects outright and ridicules. However, it is possible to see a concentration on matters of justice and honesty. Our commentary will simply investigate the sayings that seem more striking or obscure.

3:16-18 Qoheleth begins his collection with a bitter saying about injustice at the highest government levels. He has a traditional confidence that God will eventually judge all, but meanwhile nothing more can be done than to accept that God is testing us.

3:21 Qoheleth is apparently referring to some popular saying that there is a happy future in store for good people. He challenges them to produce the evidence. Both the good and the wicked return to the dust.

Chapter 4

4:4 It was accepted that Jews should be hard-working, not lazy. But Qoheleth doubts the validity of such high-flown reasons as are given. In the end competition, not spiritual motives, prevails.

4:9 Again Qoheleth is citing a popular saying that teamwork is better than working alone. He continues a similar thought in verse 11 that marriage is better than being single. Then he laughs it to scorn by saying that there is nothing more in it than that a team makes more money and that a married partner is a good bed-warmer.

4:13-16 This section of reflections on the political community might be connected with "court wisdom," as it is called, except that the sentiment expressed would never be taught to young persons aspiring to government office. There is no end to the bootlickers at court, but the one whose boots are licked isn't worth remembering. There are a fair number of such reflections on the lifestyle of government officials; perhaps Qoheleth had had some role in this himself.

4:17 This is one of Qoheleth's few references to temple worship. It is respectful of God and scornful of the hypocrisy that Qoheleth observed.

Chapter 5

This chapter begins by continuing the theme of religious practice mentioned above. Then it shifts to a consideration of the folly of riches and ends with the refrain "Eat, drink and be merry."

5:4 The sentiment was traditional; Deut 23:22 and Sir 18:21 both say the same thing. In Qoheleth, however, it has a sharper tone, perhaps a repudiation of those scribes who were mostly interested in finding a way around fulfilling vows.

5:9-11 The vanity of riches is a consistent theme in both the Old and New Testaments. Qoheleth expresses it in pragmatic terms: "Where there are great riches, there are also many to devour them."

Chapter 6

Chapter 6 is mostly a series of reflections on the canker of wealth. Riches beget a desire for riches; even the approach of death does not seem to assuage it. "All man's toil is for his mouth, yet his desire is not fulfilled" (v. 7). Why people should react like this cannot be explained; that is the way God made them, and they might as well desist from arguing with One mightier than themselves. And yet, is that a tolerable explanation? That is Qoheleth's problem, as it was Job's. "Who is there to tell a man what will come after him under the sun?" (v. 12).

6:1 "There is another evil . . .": In effect, it is the same evil with which chapter 4 ended. The rich are never satisfied. If the rich man has a hundred children, he worries about the money that slips out of his grasp and whether he will be buried with suitable pomp. "The child born dead is more fortunate than he" (v. 3).

6:9 Apparently this is a quote from a common proverb. For once Qoheleth agrees.

6:10 ". . . he cannot contend in judgment with one who is stronger than he": The "one" refers to God. No one can demand that God give a reason for what God does. And if God won't, nobody else can.

Chapter 7

Chapter 7 is particularly unorganized. It begins with a litany of proverbs, some of which Qoheleth accepts and some of which he ridicules. Then it turns to considering a mean that is not a Golden Mean but a livable compromise. Toward the end Qoheleth confesses that he is in over his head as a sage and then compounds it by some scathing words about women in general. Apparently Qoheleth found trouble himself observing his admonition to avoid excess.

7:1 "A good name is better than good ointment, and the day of death than the day of birth": This is usually cited as the typical example of Qoheleth's technique. He has taken a proverb that is exceedingly common and turned it on its head by adding a comment that ridicules it. Verses 2, 3, and 4 use a similar approach but are less biting, since they do not trap us but warn us from the beginning that the author's views are unconventional.

7:13 The cliché is that God writes straight with crooked lines. Qoheleth will not suffer clichés. He turns the saying around. Experience has taught him about the crooked things in life and his inability to do much about them. All one can do is accept (see v. 14).

7:16-18 The New American Bible puts these words in quotation marks to indicate the translator's opinion that they are common sayings that Qoheleth knows but repudiates. Qoheleth was no martyr, willing to die uselessly for a justice he could not achieve. Nor did he think that he himself could lead a blameless life. He could not be self-righteous, nor could he be ruthless. Yet life constantly caught him in such dilemmas. His wisdom did not give him a way out. There was some truth in both sayings, but not enough in either. He went back to the traditional saying that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. It arrived, but it was only the beginning. So he would counsel simply trying to stand in awe of the great God and letting things take their course. "He who fears God will win through at all events" (v. 18).

7:23 The personal note gives punch to the traditional view that wisdom, like everything else, is a gift, not a reward for work. The wisdom to unravel the enigma that has just been discussed is beyond Qoheleth.

7:26-29 This section on the human race is characteristic of Qoheleth. It is partly tongue-in-cheek and partly serious. It begins with "the woman who is a hunter's trap." The reference is probably to Egypt or some such symbol of paganism that led Israel astray. Escape from her is due solely to God. Yet there is a more personal note to the section. From experience Qoheleth does not have much faith in the men he knows; he accuses them of being unjust and dishonest. He would say even less of women. It may be a social prejudice or a deliberate slur intended to provoke dissent and proof to the contrary. That, too, would be like Qoheleth.

7:29 The Hebrew text is not quite clear, especially as to who is doing the calculating—the men or the women. Most likely Qoheleth means that the whole race has engaged in spoiling the work that God created good. That would be a normal wisdom viewpoint.

Chapter 8

Chapter 8 begins with some conventional sayings taken from the court wisdom, that is, instructions to students on how to act in the service of the king. Loyalty is stressed, especially sticking by the administration when injustices seem to have been done: "while one man tyrannizes over another to his hurt" (v. 9). The wise man knows that there is a proper time and judgment for all things; he does not know when the proper time or judgment is.

The second half (8:10-17) almost seems to deny the wisdom of the above as Qoheleth reflects on the lack of any apparent consistency in retribution. The wicked are not punished, and so society is tempted to lawlessness. However, he clings to his religious belief that reverence toward God finally pays off, but he does not know when. The wicked still prosper, and the wise can simply try to enjoy life as best they can. This reflection continues into the next chapter (9:1-3). The most perplexing thing about life is the apparent lack of any different result between being good or bad: "Among all the things that happen under the sun, this is the worst, that things turn out the same for all" (9:3).

Chapter 9

This section seems to run from 9:4 to 10:2, as the translation indicates. It begins with the sunshine of seeing the joy of living. Here Qoheleth has put his longest statement of the refrain into almost poetic form. Not only can one find satisfaction in good food and drink; fine clothes and perfumes help. Enjoy life with the wife whom you love. Give all you got in everything you do. Then comes the somber note: death is on the way. Life is a game of chance; victory does not go to the best, and we do not know when uncontrollable accidents will wipe out all we are trying to do.

In Eccl 9:13-16 occurs one of the finest uses of parable in the Bible. A parable is not a simplistic story telling us to do in like manner; it is a thought-provoking story that traps us with simple pictures and then stings. It is conventional to say that wisdom pays off and the wise are respected. Qoheleth says that it does not happen if you are wise but poor. His sage saved a city—and was promptly forgotten. A single fly falling by chance into the ointment can spoil it all.

9:5 "For the living know that they are to die, but the dead no longer know anything." So also in verse 10 Qoheleth concludes that "there will be no work, nor reason, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the nether world where you are going." Such was the traditional attitude. Israel had been chosen to be God's worshiper on earth. Very little was said to them about the afterlife. In Qoheleth's time the view was beginning to change. A hundred years later there was not only a full-blown belief in a judgment in a world beyond, but also the clearest statement about the doctrine of purgatory, as we call it. But Qoheleth was a theological conservative; he lived on what had been handed down, even when he challenged it.

Chapter 10

Chapter 10 probably runs from 10:3 to 11:2. It is a grab bag of wise sayings from conventional wisdom.

10:2 The right hand is used as a symbol of skill for biblical authors; the left is used to express foolishness.

10:11 Snake charming was (and is) a realistic feat in the Near East. The proverb is cautionary, like the modern proverb that says: "It's no use locking the barn door after the horse has been stolen."

10:19 This is somewhat cynical but observable. Money does seem to "provide" for all our merrymaking.

10:20 We may well think that this is fanciful, but so is the spy system that gets word back to the king of what one says secretly, and that is the meaning of the admonition.

11:1 The meaning of this familiar quotation is to make doubly sure that one has plenty of everything so as not to be caught short.

Chapter 11

Only verses 3 to 6 are considered here. These are prudential remarks on providing abundantly, since we do not know what the future will bring. The rain falls just so much and that is that; the tree falls and stays there. Too much caution gets in the way. We do not know how babies are fashioned, and we do not know what God is doing in the world, so we should work hard and provide doubly. The words are conventional wisdom that Qoheleth does not contradict, but he centers them on the thought that we do not know what God is doing.

THE FINAL SECTION

Eccl 11:9–12:8

The final hymn is to life. This is one of the most hauntingly beautiful poems in all of literature. The impact is achieved by a careful conjuring up of images and balancing of structure.

We can see the sun shining, the clouds gathering, the dawn and the sunset, the birds in the trees, the village well. Yet these images are also carefully balanced against opposites. Light and darkness, the nothingness of death and the life breath jostle one another. The strong stand but they are bent; the mill still grinds, but slowly; the birds sit in the trees, but do not sing; the well is full of water, but no one is around, and as one looks, the rope breaks and the bucket falls into the depths.

So also the addresses to the youth and the aged are contrasted. Qoheleth gives four verses to youth and then multiplies this to eight verses for those his own age. It is this careful structuring of image against image, age against age, that gives an internal rhythm to the thought and produces the right mood.

The thought can then emerge. Qoheleth first addresses the young men before him. He is consistent with his previous teaching: life is good; live it to the full.

> Rejoice, O young man, while you are young, > and let your heart be glad in the days > of your youth.
> Follow the ways of your heart,
> the vision of your eyes;
> Yet understand that as regards all this
> God will bring you to judgment (11:9).

"Judgment" sounds a discordant note, and we wish it meant something else. Apparently it does. Qoheleth knew nothing of judgment as the Last Judgment in our sense, nor does he ever mention any examination of merit and punishment. Judgment is revelation. His consistent cry has been that life is inexplicable; good and bad seem so haphazard; success and failure do not belong to us; justice and injustice mix in such strange ways. He has concluded that only God knows, and God is not talking. Yet somehow, sometime, God will reveal it all. Qoheleth does not admonish youth to live a good life lest they be punished, but not to presume to know more about life than they really do, lest they transgress God's secret border.

Yet, youth is fleeting, and Qoheleth stands at the end of the road. He is like an old man wandering into a silenced village. The sun has gone behind the clouds, the menservants stand bent over, the women waiting at the mill are few, the ladies in the house only occasionally peek out of the windows. The doors of houses are closed; the birds do not sing; the old man totters along precariously as though on a precipice, fearing a mugging; the trees blossom but do no more. And as he passes through this silent village, he arrives finally at the well, the center of town. But no one is trading news at the well. As he looks at this source of life—for good water is called living water—he sees the whole apparatus of pulley, bucket, and counterbalance fall into the pit as the rope breaks. Need anything more be said?

> And the dust returns to the earth as it once was,
> and the life breath returns to God who gave it.
> (12:7)

Qoheleth shrieks for some greater knowledge. Faith says that life is safe in the hands of the Life-giver. But how? And why?

12:1 The tradition of the sages was strong on God the Creator. In spite of everything pessimistic that he says, Qoheleth always believes in a good Creator behind the universe. That conviction of goodness is central to wisdom thinking. It is not God the Judge that youth needs to think of, but God the Creator; and then they must strive to be creators themselves.

12:3 The older Jewish rabbis were accustomed to interpret each of these images as referring to some part of the body. Later scholars thought they saw only a smorgasbord of varied images that had no connection with one another. However, the impression and central theme seem to relate to a silent village or estate. These are the usual employees who are now idle.

12:4 A catastrophe of some sort, such as a plague, has idled all these people.

12:5 This is an old man who is being pictured. He totters as though he were on a high place. He also fears the young who roam the streets.

"When the almond tree blooms": This is not clear. One meaning may be that the trees bloom, but do not bear. The caper berry was reputed to restore sexual powers, but even that does not work anymore.

"Because man goes to his lasting home": It is lasting because it is the grave; it is not much of a home. Meanwhile, he can see the mourners already assembling for his funeral.

12:6 Apparently the rope is old and white. The pitcher is the bucket, and the golden ball is some sort of counterbalance.

12:7 "And the dust returns to the earth": The phrase undoubtedly reflects the well-known saying: "Dust thou art and unto dust thou shalt return." On the other hand, the word used for "life breath" is more normally used for a word of God or a spirit from God. It is not the equivalent of our word for "soul."

THE EPILOGUE

Eccl 12:9-14

The epilogue speaks of Qoheleth in the third person, so we presume that it was written by someone else. He is described as holding some sort of official position as a teacher. He was also something of a research scholar, collecting the traditions of the past. Here the editor makes his own comment, perhaps to apologize that Qoheleth's research did not uncover many comforting proverbs. His were like "fixed spikes." Then he seems to presume that many books of this sort have been published, although we know of only a few. One should appreciate authors; they spend much time doing the writing. And, being a much more conventional man himself, he adds the theme-saying of all wisdom writers: "Fear God and keep his commandments." He is not laying down a law; he is expressing the conviction that the only wise way to live is to be in awe of the incomprehensible God who lives behind the appearances of things and to try to be holy as God is holy. One day God will reveal what this is all about.

> Because God will bring to judgment every work, with all its hidden qualities, whether good or bad (12:14).

ESTHER

James A. Fischer, C.M.

INTRODUCTION

The Hebrew Book of Esther is a melodrama. When the story was read in the synagogue during the feast of Purim, the men stomped their feet, banged the tables, hissed the villain, and cheered the hero. It was a riotous celebration with much drinking; "too much" was when one could not tell the difference between "Bless Mordecai" and "Curse Haman," said some rabbis. In medieval times Purim became a kind of carnival celebration with dramatizations of the story spinning off from the biblical tale.

The ancient tradition should be respected for its insight. The story was heard as a hero tale in which the Jews triumphed over their enemies by better intrigue. The hero, Mordecai, was cast in the role of the trickster, as Jacob and Joseph before him had been in more discreet ways. The justification for the celebration was simply that the Jews of Persia had been given relief from persecution and had thus been able to care for their poorer neighbors. Such were the reasons given by Queen Esther in her official decree establishing the feast. Some such justification is also given by many modern Jewish scholars. The story itself does not mention God; it has no pious lesson, nor does it raise any disturbing questions in the text. It was just fun to recall one triumphant moment of salvation for one's people.

The acceptance of the Book of Esther has always been a problem of more or less concern in Jewish circles. Esther has not been found among the Qumram documents (which is unusual), and even after its acceptance as Scripture by the Jewish scholars at Jamnia around A.D. 90, it was still denounced by some rabbis as unworthy of honor as sacred Scripture. Present-day Jewish scholars tend to vindicate the book on the basis that whatever preserves the Jewish community must be part of God's plan. God is not mentioned in the Hebrew text, but Jewish spirituality rests on the conviction that God is present in the most mundane affairs, even when not seen. There is much to be said for this viewpoint.

The Hebrew and the Greek versions

The hero story is the one preserved in Judaism and in most non-Catholic Bibles. The Greek translation, which Catholics use, introduced a more somber note. The moral problem raised by the slaying of so many pagans was addressed by a dream sequence added to the beginning and the end. The pious need was met by interspersing various prayers to God and confessions of guilt.

The history of the Book of Esther

Since the Hebrew story of Esther is so obviously a tale to be enjoyed, there seems to be little reason to delay over questions of historical accuracy. That there was a King Ahasuerus, otherwise known in Persian chronicles as Xerxes I, who ruled from 486 to 465 B.C.E., is indisputable. In many places, the book reflects authentic information about the Persian period. On the other hand, there is nothing known about a Queen Vashti or a Queen Esther or a Haman or a pogrom against the Jews. Some of this seems unlikely. The most prudent supposition seems to be that some master storyteller welded together several stories that may have arisen from local events and produced a story of intrigue that was credible and exciting without being an attempt to chronicle actual facts.

We do not even know whether the story produced the feast of Purim or whether a preexisting feast attracted the story to itself. The feast was called Purim ("lots") from the mention of the lots that were cast before the king to determine the date for the extermination of the Jews (3:7). It was celebrated in the spring of the year on the fourteenth and fifteenth of the month of Adar. The story and the feast originated among Persian Jews sometime between 465 and 167 B.C.E. and spread westward to the rest of Judaism.

The story

The Hebrew story (designated in our text by the usual chapter numbers from 1 to 10) tells of how Mordecai, a Jew at the court of King Ahasuerus, revealed a plot to kill the king, but was left unrewarded. The king had to choose a new queen, and Mordecai was able to have his cousin Esther selected. She became the favorite and learned of a plot to destroy all Jews. This was the work of Haman, the prime minister, who personally hated Jews, and Mordecai in particular. One night the king suddenly remembered that Mordecai had saved his life and summoned Haman to tell him how to honor a man to whom the king was indebted. Haman thought that he was the man and heaped up the honors. He planned to execute Mordecai on a huge scaffold in his yard. But then he discovered that Mordecai was to be the honoree. Moreover, Esther revealed to the king that Haman had already issued a decree that all Jews be killed. Haman knew that he was undone and went to plead before Queen Esther and threw himself before her. The king entered the room and thought he was attacking the queen, and ordered him hanged on his own scaffold. Then Esther got another royal decree that the Jews would be allowed to defend themselves. So they did, and that day was proclaimed by both Mordecai and Esther as a great festival day for the Jews.

Such is the Hebrew story. To it the Greek translators added the chapters that are designated in the text by the letters A to F. The first and last chapters are dream sequences reminiscent of a kind of literature called apocalyptic. They have two dragons, a saving river, and a cosmic battle. The other chapters are prayers of confession and petition or official documents. Only one piece of additional narrative is supplied; chapter D tells how God made Esther appear even more beautiful and so averted the king's anger.

The touch is light, but the implications for the story are enormous. In the initial dream Mordecai sees two dragons threatening every nation. In the final explanation of the dream, Mordecai identifies the two dragons as Haman—and himself. The story had raised disturbing moral questions about the Jewish role in the pogrom. The Greek editors had fingered their own people as equal culprits. The dream sequence is a common enough way for an author to add editorial comment, but the apocalyptic technique did elevate the problem to one of the cosmic struggle of good and evil. God enters the story. Mordecai's character gets changed around at the end. He is no longer the trickster but the honest man who must face his own lack of integrity in victory. God alone is the hero; the story has passed from straight fun to irony.

COMMENTARY

INTRODUCTION

Esth A:1-17

A:1 Ahasuerus is very probably Xerxes I (485–464 B.C.E.), known to European history as the villain who attacked Greece. He was, however, an enlightened ruler. Mordecai is unknown to secular history, although we know of a Marduka, an imperial accountant from the capital of Susa under Darius and Xerxes. Mordecai is described as a prominent man, and later on we learn from the Hebrew text that he was a minor official at court.

"Mordecai had a dream . . .": This is a storyteller's technique for indicating that the author already knows what the story means. It is used frequently in the Bible in such narratives as those of Joseph in Egypt, Gideon, and Daniel, and in Matthew's infancy narrative (see v. 11).

A:4 Mordecai's dream includes a cosmic battle, darkness, confusion among all nations, dragons, and a saving river. This is common stock-in-trade for writers of apocalypse (Ezek 47; Dan 12:5-7; Rev 12 have similar elements). All this introduces us to a world in which good and evil fight on a cosmic level.

A:12-16 The plot against the king's life is also narrated in the Hebrew text (2:21-23). However, the Greek editor has combined the apocalyptic dream sequence and a political awareness of some future pay-off to capture the bi-level approach of apocalyptic, which deals with both heaven and earth.

A ROYAL BANQUET

Esth 1:1-22

1:3 No occasion is given for the feast. It will be noted that most of the action in the story takes place during banquets. This motif ties the story together and serves as an appropriate connection with the feast of Purim.

1:10-22 It is difficult to judge whether the author admired Queen Vashti for refusing to perform for the king or whether he agreed with the decree that women should be kept in a proper place. In either case, he is simply telling a story, and he certainly sets up a contrast between the strong-willed Vashti and Queen Esther, who does what she is told to do. Evidently Esther is not so much a heroine as a pawn.

1:19 The royal decree is irrevocable. This odd provision of Persian law is referred to also in the story of Daniel in the lion's den (compare Dan 6:8), but it is not known from any other source.

ESTHER MADE QUEEN

Esth 2:1-23

2:2 The theme of the contest to choose a new queen is fairly common in literature, most notably in the Arabian tale A Thousand and One Nights. A historical difficulty exists here, since Esther was a Jewess and the Persian queens were always selected from the seven dominant Persian families. Xerxes' queen was named Amestris. The name Esther seems to be a take-off on the Babylonian name for the goddess Ishtar, but that does not seem to have any significance in the story.

HAMAN'S PLOT AGAINST THE JEWS

Esth 3:1-15

3:1 Haman the Agagite is unknown to history. Obviously he is intended to be a Persian, but his genealogy is traced back to Agag, the king of the Amalekites whom Saul slew (see 1 Sam 15:7ff.). Mordecai's ancestry is traced back to Saul. This looks suspiciously contrived but explains that the antagonism between the two men is irrevocably rooted in the past.

3:6 In the story there is no Persian prejudice against the Jews. This seems to be factual. Mordecai the Jew was accepted as a royal official without comment. The same is also implied in the story of Daniel. As the storyteller had it, the sole cause of hatred for the Jews was the personal animosity of Haman.

HAMAN'S LETTER

Esth B:1-7

This letter was composed by the Greek editor as a propaganda piece, specifying the racial prejudice of the nations against the Jews who lived outside Palestine. It probably reflects Alexandrian social situations more than those of Persia.

ESTHER'S PROBLEM

Esth 4:1-16

Now that Esther has become queen, she begins to use some of her power to protect Mordecai. However, it will be evident to the end of the story that Mordecai is the principal actor throughout, both as a Persian official and as the family advisor of Esther.

4:9 Verses 8-9, which refer to invoking the Lord, are not in the Hebrew text. They have been imported into the English translation from the Greek.

PRAYERS OF MORDECAI AND ESTHER

Esth C:1-30

C:1-11 Mordecai's prayer is a rather traditional lament recalling God's past favors to the Israelites.

C:12-30 Esther's prayer is a traditional complaint against paganism and a confession of righteousness. The Greek interpretation, which makes Esther some sort of savior of her people, describes her far more piously than the incidents of the story warrant.

ESTHER RECEIVED BY THE KING

Esth D:1-16

This is the only Greek addition to the narrative itself. It quite clearly shifts Esther's success from her beauty and cunning to the initiative of God, who makes all things happen rightly.

ESTHER'S PLOT

Esth 5:1-14

5:1-8 The banquet motif is here expanded to introduce an essential tension to the plot. The first banquet is apparently useless except as an invitation to a second banquet. However, this allows time for Haman to act.

5:9-14 Haman thinks that he is to be exceptionally honored by the second banquet. Full of confidence in his own success, he anticipates his victory by building a mammoth scaffold, fifty cubits high, on which to hang Mordècai. For vanquishing a superior foe no ordinary gibbet would do.

HAMAN'S DOWNFALL

Esth 6:1-14

Haman is now firmly set on the road to tragedy. In the classical understanding of tragedy, the final destruction must necessarily occur because of some essential weakness in a noble character. Haman has been portrayed as a quite successful prime minister. His flaw is his own hatred and pride. Esther is merely the catalyst that sets the tragedy in motion. So in verse 13 the inevitable tragedy is predicted by Haman's wife and friends. Nothing can prevent it from occurring. Later in the story (see 9:1, 24-26) the word pur, "lot," will be interpreted as fate.

THE PUNISHMENT OF HAMAN

Esth 7:1-10

7:1-6 Esther's appeal to the king to cancel the pogrom against the Jews is based on his own self-interest. She cites the harm that will be done to the king by the destruction of the Jewish community. That does not seem to convince him. It is only then that she reveals that Haman is behind the plot. Obviously the king has not been paying much attention to business.

7:7-8 The king, who is already angered, re-enters the room and finds Haman on the couch with his wife, pleading his case. He makes the natural conclusion and executes Haman, not for any official policy decision, but for the personal insult.

7:9-10 The theme of reversal is again stressed in the ironic execution of Haman on the grandiose scaffold he himself has erected.

THE DECREE REVERSED

Esth 8:1-17

8:2 The king's signet ring is given to Mordecai, and that virtually makes him prime minister. It is noteworthy that it is Mordecai and not Esther who is given the regal power.

8:3-17 King Ahasuerus once again shows his little interest in the pogrom against the Jews by simply commissioning Esther to write anything she wants. In her letter she instructs all the officials to ignore Haman's letter. According to the previous reference to the laws of the Persians, which cannot be changed, this is impossible, so she adds a separate protocol that allows the Jews to defend themselves on the thirteenth of Adar. She also encourages them to celebrate.

8:11 "To kill, destroy, wipe out, along with their wives and children, every armed group of any nation or province which shall attack them, and to seize their goods as spoil": This bloodthirsty decree is actually required to reverse the earlier edict of Haman, which was put in the same terms (see 3:13).

THE ATTACK

Esth 9:1-32

9:5 The text records that five hundred Persians were killed in Susa, in addition to the ten sons of Haman. More were killed on the second day. In the provinces, the Hebrew text says, seventy-five thousand were killed; the Greek version mentions fifteen thousand. Numbers, especially round numbers, in Old Testament texts are subject to considerable doubt. Since this is a story, the author's intention was simply to say that there was a great victory for the Jews. The decree had authorized the killing of any who attacked the Jews. The numbers are limited to indicate restraint. So also the text in three places (9:10, 15, 16) emphasizes that the Jews took no booty, although they were commissioned to do so.

9:21-22 It is noteworthy that it is Mordecai who writes the first and decisive letter authorizing the feast of Purim. Although the slaughter of the Jews was set for the thirteenth day of Adar, the feast is celebrated on the fourteenth, when the riots took place in the provinces, and on the fifteenth, when the mopping up was completed in Susa. Even with this explanation the chronology of the feast of Purim does not work out exactly. It is to be noted that Mordecai stresses that the feast commemorates the "rest" that was granted to the Jews on this occasion. Rest is a gift of God. He also specifies that Purim is to be a time of feasting and gladness, with the sending of food to one another and of giving gifts to the poor. The victory concept is considerably played down.

9:24-26 A curious summary of the whole plot is given here. However, it brings in the essential concept of tragedy. In the original story of Saul and Agag (see 1 Sam 15), Saul failed to put Agag the Amalekite to death as God had commanded. That led inevitably to Saul's destruction. The text here mentions Mordecai as the descendant of Saul, and Haman as the descendant of Agag. In this case, it is inevitable that Mordecai should destroy Haman. In our text the word pur, "lot," is taken in its Akkadian sense of "fate." Purim does symbolize the inevitable destruction of God's enemies.

THE DREAM EXPLAINED

Esth F:1-10

F:1 The dream will now explain how God, who was not mentioned in the Hebrew text, nevertheless was working behind the scenes. That there is an order in the world is the general supposition of wisdom literature, and the Greek Book of Esther is certainly related to wisdom.

F:2-6 The identifications are clearly made. The saving river is Esther; the nations are the persecutors of the Jews, who are in turn saved by the Lord. The surprising identification is: "The two dragons are myself and Haman." Dragons are biblical symbols for the enemies of the just. The Hebrew story had developed a series of reversals: Mordecai the oppressed became Mordecai the victor; Haman the Jew-hater was executed on his own gibbet; the day of slaughter became a day of rest for the Jews. The Greek editor simply carried the motif to its final step; Mordecai the hero became Mordecai the villain. His hands were as bloody as Haman's.

F:7 To continue the tragic or saving theme, the author once more has recourse to the doctrine of fate. God arranged two lots—one for the people of God, the second for all other nations. The lot for God's people is the joy and happiness of the feast of Purim (see v. 10). Nothing is said about the nations' lot.

JONAH, TOBIT, JUDITH

Irene Nowell, O.S.B.

INTRODUCTION

It has been said that we use stories to tell ourselves the truths we cannot explain. Biblical authors used many types of literature to convey the word of God. Besides historical accounts, parables, hymns, and love songs, they also used stories, fictional tales crafted to carry truths more profound than a simple recital of everyday facts could bear.

The Books of Jonah, Tobit, and Judith are among the best examples of such fiction in all of biblical narrative. The authors of these three books took essential elements of biblical faith and used all the techniques of their literary skill to weave stories that illustrate the dynamic effectiveness of traditional beliefs in the situation of their audience. They constructed plots that show the workings of God in ordinary human activities and events. They drew characters who, through stubborn resistance and courageous obedience, would be witnesses to the ongoing relationship between God and believers. They used irony and humor to attract their audience and to fix the message in their memory. In short, the authors of these three books were master storytellers. Their message was vital for the audience of their time, and it remains vital for us: the word of God is living, effective, and demanding in every age, including the present one.

The authors of these three little books do not directly answer the questions put to them; rather, they tell stories. To a fifth-century audience bent on separating itself from the rest of the world, one author tells the story of an eighth-century prophet who fled from God's call to bring the good news to the rest of the world (Jonah). To a second-century audience wondering if God is still active in their lives, another author tells the story of a seventh-century family who find God's healing power hidden in their obedience and care for one another (Tobit). To a mid-second-century audience despairing of God's deliverance from horrible persecution, a third author tells the story of God's victory through the hand of a woman (Judith). Each author used the power and beauty of literary skill to bring the word of God to life in the stress and need of the contemporary situation.

The basic truths about God and the people who strive to be faithful to God can be found throughout the Bible. The application of these truths to the specific audience of their own time was the mission and service of the authors of the Books of Jonah, Tobit, and Judith. It is our task to discover what these three books have to tell us about the dynamic presence and insistent demands of God in our own time.

JONAH

Irene Nowell, O.S.B.

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Jonah was written in Palestine around the fifth century B.C.E., when the Jews were still recovering from the Babylonian Exile, a serious threat to their existence. Throughout the ninth and eighth centuries B.C.E., major foreign powers had nibbled away at the territory once controlled by David and Solomon. In 722 B.C.E. Assyria had conquered the northern kingdom of Israel, taken its leading citizens captive, and settled groups of people of other nationalities in northern Palestine. The little kingdom of Judah hung on through another century, survived a change of power in Mesopotamia from Assyria to Babylon, but could not escape indefinitely. In 587 B.C.E. Nebuchadnezzar and the Babylonian army destroyed Jerusalem and led the blinded king and much of the population into exile in Babylon. Fifty years later, in 538 B.C.E., the Persian king Cyrus, having defeated Babylon, issued a decree permitting the Jews to return to Jerusalem and to rebuild the temple there. The struggles between the returning exiles and those who had remained behind, along with grinding poverty and the incessant labor necessary to rebuild a land left desolate and destroyed, provide the background for the Book of Jonah.

The returning Jews were convinced that they had suffered exile because of their infidelity to God. As a result, they developed an attitude of exclusivity and rigorous observance of the law. They avoided anything that might lead them away from God, such as foreign customs or even foreign wives (see Ezra 9:1-3; 10:10-15; Neh 13:23-30). Even the people of the former northern kingdom of Israel, called Samaritans because their capital city had been Samaria, were scorned because they had become a mixed race after the Assyrian invasion (see Ezra 4:1-5).

The author of the Book of Jonah sets his story in opposition to the attitude of exclusivity. In the story, God calls Jonah to prophesy, not to his own people, but to the people of Nineveh, the hated capital of Assyria. Not only must Jonah associate with the idolatrous Gentiles of that city, but he is called to be the instrument through which God's mercy is brought to them. Jonah makes a desperate attempt to flee from God's call. As he complains in chapter 4, he knows what God is like. "I knew," he says to God, "that you are a gracious and merciful God, slow to anger, rich in clemency, loathe to punish" (Jonah 4:2). Jonah knows what effect his message might have. Because he knows that God is merciful, Jonah fears that Nineveh will be converted. Jonah would prefer a god who would destroy Nineveh to one who would forgive it. The author told this story to an audience that desired to avoid other peoples in order to be faithful to God. The story of Jonah presents the shocking truth that "other nations" may also be dear to the heart of God. It is a hard truth, conveyed through a powerful story.

COMMENTARY

CONFRONTATION BETWEEN JONAH AND YAHWEH

Jonah 1:1-16

The Book of Jonah opens with a title announcing the word of the Lord to Jonah, son of Amittai. Jonah, son of Amittai, was the name of an eighth-century prophet who prophesied the restoration of Israel's boundaries by Jeroboam II (see 2 Kgs 14:25). The Book of Jonah, however, was written much later, probably in the fifth century B.C.E. The author wanted to establish his main character as a prophet and so chose the relatively unknown Jonah to fill the role.

The call of Jonah is an exaggerated version of the call-narrative pattern, which consists of the following parts: (1) divine confrontation; (2) introductory words of God; (3) commission of the prophet by God; (4) objection by the prophet; (5) reassurance by God: "I am with you"; (6) promise of a sign. There are some noteworthy correspondences between this pattern and the events in the Book of Jonah. Jonah is confronted by the word of the Lord (1:1) and commissioned to go to Nineveh to preach against it (1:2). Jonah not only objects to this task but flees from it (1:3). The Lord does not simply reassure him but goes after him and brings him back by force (1:4–2:10). Then the call narrative begins again: "The word of the Lord came to Jonah a second time . . ." (3:1).

The city of Nineveh to which God sent Jonah was hated by the Israelites. It was the capital of Assyria, the major power in Mesopotamia in the eighth century. The Assyrians conquered Israel, the northern kingdom, in 722 B.C.E. and took its most powerful citizens into captivity. Israel's hatred of the Assyrians is powerfully described by the prophet Nahum. Jonah is reluctant to go to Nineveh, not so much because he wants to avoid the prophetic call, but because he is unwilling to bring the word of the Lord to such a hated enemy.

The story of Jonah's flight is a masterpiece of irony. According to the narrator, it is Jonah's purpose "to flee away from the Lord" (1:3), so he boards a boat sailing for Tarshish. A storm arises. The sailors pray to their gods to no avail until, by casting lots, they determine that it is Jonah's God who is angry. When the sailors wake Jonah to question him, he tells them, "I worship [fear] the Lord, the God of heaven, who made the sea and the dry land" (1:9). (If he believes this, why does Jonah think that Tarshish is far enough away to escape the Lord?) When the storm begins, the sailors have enough wisdom to pray to their gods while the prophet sleeps. When Jonah tells the sailors that he is running away from God, they are wise enough to be afraid, while the self-proclaimed God-fearer Jonah seems untouched by fear. The word "fear" is repeated in 1:16, after the men have thrown Jonah into the sea. The sailors themselves become God-fearers: "Struck with great fear of the Lord, the men offered sacrifice and made vows to him" (1:16).

Jonah describes Yahweh as the one "who made the sea and the dry land" (1:9). Yahweh controls the sea and its creatures. Yahweh sends the wind to stir up a great storm, stills the storm as soon as Jonah is stopped in his flight by being cast from the ship, and commands a great sea creature to bring Jonah back to his starting point. The sea and the sea monsters are mythological images of creation (see Pss 74:12-14; 89:10-11; 104:25-26; Isa 27:1; Job 40:25). Yahweh created the world by defeating the sea monster, set limits for the sea that it might not pass (Ps 104:9), and made the sea monsters to play in it (Ps 104:26). The image of Yahweh in chapter 1 of Jonah is the image of the all-powerful Creator who commissions the prophet and pursues him until he accepts.

JONAH'S PRAYER

Jonah 2:1-11

Chapter 2 consists of a psalm probably inserted into the narrative from another source. It is set in context by putting the prayer in Jonah's mouth as he rides home in the belly of the docile sea monster.

The prayer belongs to the genre of lament. It is constructed of standard phrases of lamentation and begins and ends in the pattern of laments. The psalmist opens by calling upon God (2:2) and moves immediately to a description of his distress. The end of the prayer is an expression of confidence and thanksgiving to God by the psalmist, who, with unwavering trust, believes in God's salvation.

Many of the phrases in this prayer are common to the psalms; for example:

2:3a—Pss 86:6-7; 120:1;
compare Pss 34:7; 81:8
2:3b—Pss 18:6-7; 116:3-4
2:4b—Ps 42:8
2:5a—Ps 31:23
2:6a—Pss 18:5; 69:2-3;
compare Pss 88:17-18; 116:3
2:7b—Pss 16:10; 30:4
2:8a—Ps 42:7
2:8b—Ps 18:7; compare Ps 88:3
2:10a—Pss 50:14; 116:17
2:10b—Pss 22:26; 50:14; 66:13-14;
116:14, 18; 3:9; 37:39

There seems to be a special correspondence between the lament of Jonah and Psalms 18 and 116.

The psalm lends itself well to Jonah's situation. He is certainly in lamentable straits and needs to turn to Yahweh in confidence. The references to the nether world (vv. 3, 7), however, indicate that the psalm describes general distress. Water, a symbol of primeval chaos, is only one of the images used, but it fits Jonah's situation well. The psalm is well placed, but probably not original to the context.

JONAH IN NINEVEH

Jonah 3:1-10

Chapter 3 begins with Yahweh's second call to Jonah. This time Jonah makes no objection. Jonah surrenders to God's call far more readily than Moses did. Moses objected to Yahweh's call five times before he surrendered (Exod 3:11, 13; 4:1, 10, 13). His last objection is the most poignant: "If you please, Lord, send someone else!" (Exod 4:13). Jonah's compliance with the Lord's second call is only outward, however; his inner feelings will become obvious in chapter 4.

Jonah goes to Nineveh, the ancient city on the left bank of the Tigris River across from modern Mosul. In the nineteenth century, two tells (mounds covering ancient ruins) were identified as Nineveh. Archeologists found many historical treasures in the ruins, among them relief sculptures from the palaces of Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and Ashur-bani-pal and an extensive library of Ashur-bani-pal. The city itself was occupied from the fourth millennium B.C.E. to 612 B.C.E., when it fell to the Babylonians and Medes. The inner wall, which encloses a space of less than three square miles, is about seven and one-half miles long. One day's walk would have put Jonah well beyond its center.

The description of Nineveh as an "enormously large city" that required three days simply to go through it, illustrates a key technique in the whole book—exaggeration. "Great" or "large" is one of this author's favorite words; it occurs fourteen times in the book. Nineveh is a "great" city (1:2; 3:2; 3:3; 4:11). Yahweh sends a "great" wind upon the sea, and the tempest that results is "great" (1:4 [twice], 12). The sailors fear with a "great" fear (1:10, 16). After the sailors throw Jonah into the sea, Yahweh sends a "great" fish to swallow him (2:1). The repentance of the people of Nineveh extends from the "great" to the small (3:5), and it is proclaimed throughout Nineveh by decree of the king and his nobles (his "great" ones, 3:7). When God shows mercy toward Nineveh, Jonah's displeasure is "great" (4:1), but his delight in the gourd plant is also "great" (4:6).

The frequent use of the word "great" emphasizes the exaggeration in the content. Everything is larger than life-size. Nineveh is not only great, it is exceedingly great (literally, "great even for God," 3:3). The fast that is proclaimed is worthy of such a great city. It extends from king to beasts and is a total fast even from water (3:7). Jonah's objection to his call is excessive; Yahweh's pursuit of him is equally excessive. In this story there is no moderation.

The numbering of days has a significant balance. Jonah spends three days in the belly of the fish and is then returned to his responsibility to Yahweh. Three days, however, are not enough to bring about a real change of heart in Jonah. The city to which Jonah is sent is reported to be a city so large that it requires a three-day journey to go through it. Yet the city does not need even three days for its repentance; one day is sufficient. Yahweh's mercy, however, does not limit Nineveh to three days. Yahweh allows "forty days," a very large number of days, before the city will be destroyed (3:4).

The message of Jonah proclaims destruction. The response of the Ninevites contains a key word of conversion, "turn." The king proclaims that everyone should "turn" from evil ways; then perhaps Yahweh might "turn" and "repent" of retaliating against Nineveh. Indeed the Ninevites "turn"; indeed Yahweh "repents" (3:8-10). The word "turn" is a key word in the writings of the prophets. It is developed particularly by Jeremiah, and forms the basis of his call to the people. The word "repent" is used primarily of Yahweh in the prophets. If the people "turn," Yahweh "repents" (see Joel 2:12-14). These two words merge into the concept of metanoia, or repentance, which, in the New Testament, is demanded of those who would belong to the kingdom of God (see Mark 1:15 and parallels).

RESPONSE TO NINEVEH'S CONVERSION

Jonah 4:1-11

The final chapter contrasts God's merciful response to Nineveh's conversion with Jonah's anger. The chapter is a modified palistrophe (mirror):

A. Jonah's anger (4:1).
  B. Jonah knows God's mercy (4:2).
    C. Double refrain: Let me die (4:3). Do you have a right to be angry (4:4)?
      D. God's mercy on Jonah (4:5-8; note "appoints" 3 times).
    C'. Double refrain: Let me die (4:8b). Do you have a right to be angry (4:9)?
  B'. God knows Jonah's anger and lack of mercy (4:10).
A'. God's mercy (4:11).

Both the irony and the theology reach a peak in this chapter. First of all, we discover Jonah's reason for fleeing in chapter 1. He dreads the conversion of Nineveh. Because he "knows" that God is "a gracious and merciful God, slow to anger, rich in clemency, loathe to punish (4:2; compare Exod 34:6; Num 14:18-19; Joel 2:14), Jonah fears that he will be a successful prophet and convert the Ninevites. He is angry because he knows that God is not a judge who exacts retribution equal to the crime but rather a merciful God who repents of anger.

God, on the other hand, is merciful because God knows who Jonah is. Instead of punishing Jonah for his flight, for his half-hearted prophesying, for his lack of mercy, God works with Jonah as if he were a child who "cannot distinguish his right hand from his left." God teaches Jonah a lesson. Near his hut God provides a gourd plant that gives Jonah joy and shade. The next day God allows a worm to destroy the plant; this angers Jonah. Then God sends an east wind so hot that Jonah desires death. This is the heart of the chapter and the center of the palistrophe. Divine mercy knows no bounds. God is even merciful to the recalcitrant prophet.

The book ends with a question that challenges the audience of the author's time and all its future readers. God asks: "Should I not, may I not, be merciful even to Nineveh?" Is God free? Or must God act, as Jonah thinks, according to the narrow limitations of human justice?

TOBIT

Irene Nowell, O.S.B.

INTRODUCTION

Not all canonical lists of biblical books include the Book of Tobit. There are seven books which, for various historical reasons, are found in the Roman Catholic canon and not in Jewish or Protestant canons of the Bible. They are: Judith, Tobit, Wisdom, Sirach, Baruch, and 1 and 2 Maccabees, along with additions to the Books of Daniel and Esther. These books are referred to as "deuterocanonical" by Roman Catholics and "apocryphal" by others. They are universally recognized as good books. The primary distinction in modern times is in their use in the liturgy. They are used liturgically by Roman Catholics, but not by Jews or Protestants. They are sometimes found in a separate section in some editions of the Bible.

The Book of Tobit was written around the beginning of the second century B.C.E. Alexander the Great's powerful sweep through the Near East had brought Palestine under his domination in 332 B.C.E. Alexander's death in 323 resulted in a division of his territory, with Syria falling to the Seleucids and Egypt to the Ptolemies. Palestine, a buffer zone between these major powers, was controlled first by the Ptolemies and then, after 198 B.C.E., by the Seleucids. This period was marked by growing Hellenization. Greek customs were adopted, the Greek language became common, and Greek cities were built with gymnasia and hippodromes.

Jewish response to Hellenization was mixed. Zealous Jews resisted every trace of Greek influence, while others found ways to adapt Greek philosophy and language to the service of Judaism. The question of whether to adapt to Greek culture became crucial under the Seleucids, who began to force what had been a rather peaceful progress of Hellenization. The author of Tobit wrote for Jews who were concerned about being faithful to God and who were questioning God's fidelity to them in the midst of this cultural turmoil.

The author uses several old folk tales—the Grateful Dead, the Monster in the Bridal Chamber, and the Story of Ahiqar—as the framework for his story about two ordinary believers, Tobit and Sarah. From the beginning Tobit declares that he has "walked all the days of [his] life on the paths of truth and righteousness" (Tob 1:3). Sarah can say to God, "I have never defiled my own name or my father's name" (Tob 3:15). Each of these faithful people is struck by disaster. Tobit is blinded by bird droppings; Sarah is grieved and humiliated by the sudden deaths of seven successive bridegrooms on the wedding night. The question raised by these crises plagued the faithful Jews under the domination of the Ptolemies and Seleucids: How can we be virtuous if the only result is increasing darkness and disaster?

The author proposes an answer to the question through a story that demonstrates the fidelity of God and the courage of believers. Tobit and Sarah each turn to prayer in their grief. The author informs the readers that their prayer is answered; an angel has been sent to bring them healing. The characters, however, do not know the end of the story, and their continued fidelity bears witness to their courage. Their healing comes about and their fidelity is demonstrated in the midst of the joys and sorrows of family life. The characters trust in a God who is both merciful and just. They in turn act in mercy and justice toward God and one another by rigorous observance of the law, hospitality, almsgiving, and loving respect within the family. Through their fidelity to one another, and specifically through the courage and obedience of Tobit's son Tobiah, who becomes Sarah's husband, both Tobit and Sarah are healed and the power of God's love in their lives is revealed. The story shows that, although God's fidelity may be hidden, human beings are ministers of God's providence, and ordinary human events are the setting for God's faithful care.

COMMENTARY

THE DISTRESS OF TOBIT AND SARAH

Tob 1:1–3:17

1:1-2 Title. The Book of Tobit opens with the common introduction to a historical work: "The book of the words of . . ." In the Septuagint (Greek version) and in English Bibles where it is included, this book is put with the historical works. It cannot, however, be considered a historical work. First of all, there are many historical inaccuracies, which indicate that the author had no intention of producing strict history. The story is set in the reigns of the Assyrian rulers Shalmaneser V (726–722 B.C.E.), Sennacherib (704–681 B.C.E.), and Esarhaddon (680–669 B.C.E.). Sargon II, who should be listed between Shalmaneser and Sennacherib, is missing. It seems that the author of Tobit used 2 Kgs 17:1-6 and 18:9-13 for his list of kings. In that account Sargon is not mentioned. Thus the author of Tobit may have presumed that Sennacherib was the immediate successor of Shalmaneser.

The style of the book also indicates that the author did not intend to produce a historical account. The prayers and monologues could not possibly have been known to a recorder of facts. Parallel events occur simultaneously in such a striking fashion that they indicate an author's manipulation of facts rather than a strict account of happenings. The interests of the book also indicate a period much later than the seventh century B.C.E. in which it is set.

The use of historical information, however, conveys an important theological point in the book. The chronicle of public events, which situates the story in the context of world history, occurs only in the first and last chapters. In the first chapter we find the succession of Assyrian kings—Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon. A few notes about Tobit's life indicate what life was like under each of these kings. Under Shalmaneser there was civil order, and exiles like Tobit could hold positions of importance and acquire reasonable sums of money. Under Sennacherib travel was unsafe, and the exiles were persecuted. Restoration of order occurred under Esarhaddon (2:1). There is no mention of public events from the last mention of Esarhaddon in 2:1 until the discussion of the fall of Nineveh to Cyaxares, king of Media, in chapter 14. The fall of Nineveh is mentioned twice in the last chapter. Tobit predicts its fall, and Tobiah rejoices over it.

By setting his story within the context of Assyrian history, the author has made a subtle commentary on the main events of Tobit's life. The Assyrian kings mentioned in chapter 1 are wicked. Shalmaneser takes the Israelites into exile; Sennacherib persecutes them. In chapter 14 Assyria is punished. In contrast, Tobit is righteous all the days of his life, and in chapter 14 he and his family are rewarded. The contrast is subtle but effective.

1:3-22 Tobit's life. After the title (1:1-2) chapter 1 continues with the exposition. Three main sequences are set in motion: (1) Tobit walks in the way of truth and righteousness; (2) Tobit marries Anna; (3) Tobit deposits money in Media. These three sequences open the plot and prepare the way for the questions that will finally be answered in the resolution.

The exposition opens with Tobit speaking in the first person: "I, Tobit, have walked all the days of my life on the paths of truth and righteousness." Three key words in 1:3 are repeated in 14:9 to form an inclusion. The book is a story of "truth," "righteousness," and "almsgiving/mercy." Chapter 1 portrays Tobit's life as an example of truth, righteousness, and almsgiving or charitable works. His righteousness during his youth is illustrated by his fidelity to worship in Jerusalem and his strict keeping of tithes. He follows the rigorous interpretation of tithing common in the second century. It was believed that Num 18:21-24, Deut 14:22-26, and Deut 14:28-29 referred, not to different ways of distributing the one tithe, but to three different tithes. Josephus, a Jewish historian, interprets the texts in this fashion: "In addition to the two tithes which I have already directed you to pay each year, the one for the Levites and the other for the banquets, you should devote a third every third year to the distribution of such things as are lacking to widowed women and orphan children."

Almsgiving is another example of Tobit's fidelity. During Shalmaneser's reign, Tobit reports, he fed the hungry, clothed the naked, and buried the dead (1:16-17). Burying the dead put Tobit in danger of death during the reign of Sennacherib (1:18-20). He flees Nineveh, returning only during the reign of Esarhaddon, when he again begins to invite the poor to dinner and to bury the dead (2:1-7). Tobit's active charity is his most evident characteristic.

In chapter 1 Tobit says that he has been faithful to Jewish law and custom. He has observed the dietary laws of Judaism and has married a woman from his own lineage and family (1:9).

Tobit's marriage to Anna introduces the second sequence of the plot. His marriage is not only an example of his fidelity to Jewish law and custom, but it also introduces two other main characters: Anna, Tobit's wife, and Tobiah, his son. Tobiah becomes the major instrument of God's providence in the rest of the story. Marriage, with its joys and sorrows, is a major theme of the book. The relationships in marriage manifest the working of God.

The third sequence of the plot opens with Tobit's trip to Media to do business for Shalmaneser (1:12-14). On one of his trips, Tobit deposits a large sum of money with a kinsman, Gabael, who lives in Media. The central section of the plot revolves around Tobiah's journey to Media to regain the money. He is guided on his trip by an angel, Raphael, and he becomes the instrument of healing in both families.

Two questions are raised by these three sequences. Tobit is a model of fidelity. What will be his reward? In Media there is money that belongs to Tobit. How will he regain it? The marriage sequence does not raise an immediate question. The solution to the questions from sequences one and three, however, will be found in sequence two.

2:1–3:6 The affliction and prayer of Tobit. We must read chapters 2 and 3 as panels of two different events happening simultaneously. The first scene is set at Tobit's home in Nineveh, the second at Sarah's home in Media. The first scene (2:1-8) opens with Tobit the almsgiver telling Tobiah to find a poor kinsman with whom he can share his Pentecost dinner. Tobiah finds a dead man in the square instead. Tobit immediately buries the dead man, a practice that had previously won for him exile and poverty. The neighbors mock his folly, and the reader wonders what his reward will be for such selfless righteousness.

That night Tobit, weary after the burial, sleeps in the courtyard of his house and is blinded by droppings from birds nesting above him. His reward for righteousness seems to be suffering rather than blessing. The blindness gradually becomes total. Tobit is left dependent on his wife Anna, who goes to work weaving cloth. In an incident that illustrates the tension in the household, Tobit accuses his wife of stealing a goat that was given to her as a bonus. Her retort cuts to the heart of the matter. Since the righteous should be rewarded and Tobit is being punished instead, Anna taunts: "Where are your charitable deeds now? Where are your virtuous acts? See! Your true character is finally showing itself!" (2:14). Tobit is grief-stricken and prays to God for death (3:1-6).

3:7-15 The affliction and prayer of Sarah. Simultaneity is a key technique in this chapter. "On the same day" that Tobit quarrels with Anna and prays for death, Raguel's daughter Sarah is taunted by one of her father's maids and also turns to prayer. Sarah is troubled by a demon who has killed her seven bridegrooms on the wedding night. There is no other near kinsman for her to marry (3:15). She is driven to despair and considers suicide. She reconsiders, however, for love of her father and turns instead to God in prayer. Her prayer is similar to that of Tobit. She, however, gives God a choice: she prays either for death (3:13) or for another solution to her problem (3:15).

Sarah's story picks up the important theme of marriage. She recognizes the significance of marriage and is willing to comply with her father's wishes and the prevailing Jewish custom by marrying a close relative. But the demon, who loves her and wants her for himself, keeps killing off her intended bridegrooms. Her situation has become unbearable.

The two prayers in chapter 3 also demonstrate the importance of prayer in this book. Both a man and a woman turn to prayer in desperate situations. Their prayers are equally significant for the plot. Both pray with phrases familiar from other biblical prayers. Tobit asks to die. He thinks that death is the only solution to his problems. Sarah puts herself completely in God's hands. She illustrates the proper way to pray: she spreads out her hands and turns to face Jerusalem.

3:16-17 The answer to prayer. The conclusion to the chapter emphasizes both the importance of prayer and the technique of simultaneity. The prayers of Tobit and Sarah are heard simultaneously, and God sends the angel Raphael to answer both prayers for help. Raphael's task is to heal both of them. He is to restore Tobit's sight and to free Sarah from the demon. While Raphael is God's messenger to both Tobit and Sarah, the instrument of both healings will be Tobit's son Tobiah. "At that very moment" both Tobit and Sarah return from prayer to their families. Now both lives are linked, both prayers are linked. The reader now knows that both of their prayers will be answered. Only the characters in the story must continue in the darkness of faith. The exposition of the story's plot ends here, but the reader is left with three questions: How will Tobit be healed? How will Sarah be delivered from the demon? How will the lives of these two families continue to be linked?

THE JOURNEY

Tob 4:1-6:18

4:1-21 Preparation for the journey: a father's speech. Chapter 4 belongs to the genre of farewell discourse. In biblical literature this genre has several distinct parts. Some of the parts found in the farewell discourse in the Book of Tobit are: (1) the speaker announces his departure; (2) the speaker recalls the past, either of the people or himself; (3) the speaker exhorts the hearers to keep God's commandments; (4) the speaker exhorts the hearers to unity of spirit; (5) the speaker predicts the future of his children; (6) the speaker wishes peace and joy to his children; (7) the speaker promises his children that God will be with them. Examples of this genre in the Old Testament are the farewell of Jacob (Gen 47:29–49:33); Joshua's farewell (Josh 22–24); David's farewell (1 Chr 28–29); and the whole book of Deuteronomy, which is cast as Moses' farewell discourse. In the Book of Tobit there are three farewell discourses: two of Tobit (4:3-21 and 14:3-11) and one of Raphael (12:6-10).

Tobit instructs Tobiah in the three virtues characteristic of his own life: truth (fidelity), righteousness, and almsgiving. The instruction to almsgiving is the most lengthy. Tobit tells Tobiah to care for Tobit's burial just as his father has cared for the burial of others (4:3; compare 4:17). He instructs Tobiah to pay servants' wages immediately (4:14), to feed the hungry and to clothe the naked (4:16), and to give alms in proportion to what he has (4:7-8, 16). Almsgiving will be for him a protection from death and will be a worthy offering, a worthy worship, to God (4:9-11; compare Sir 35:1-9).

Tobit also instructs Tobiah in the basic theory of retribution: if you are righteous, you will be blessed; if you are evil, you will be cursed (see Deut 28). Even though Tobit's own situation seems to belie the theory—he seems to be cursed even though he has been righteous—he tells Tobiah that doing good works "will bring success" to him and to all who live in righteousness (4:6, 21). Even as he recites the theory, however, Tobit leaves God free to choose how to execute retribution. He tells Tobiah that "if the Lord chooses, he raises a man up; but if he should decide otherwise, he casts him down to the deepest recesses of the nether world" (4:19). Whatever happens comes from God. Tobiah is to trust that God, too, is faithful, righteous, and merciful.

Marriage is the third major subject of Tobit's instruction. In the last centuries of the Old Testament period, the custom had arisen for Jews to marry within close kinship. The Book of Nehemiah reports the harsh requirement that returning exiles who had married non-Jewish women had to put away their foreign wives and marry Jewish wives (Neh 10:31; 13:1-3, 23-30) if they wanted to remain in the Jewish faith. Tobit cites the example of the patriarchs marrying close relatives: Abraham (Gen 20:12), Isaac (Gen 24:3-4), and Jacob (Gen 27:46–28:5). The tradition that Noah married a relative is not found in the Pentateuch but in the Book of Jubilees (4:33). The practice of marriage not only with Jews but within close family ties is probably based on the story of the daughters of Zelophehad (Num 27:5-11; compare Num 36:2-10), who had no brothers to inherit Zelophehad's property. In their case, they were to marry within their clan so that their father's property might remain within the clan. Sarah's situation, since she has no brothers, is the same as that of the daughters of Zelophehad. There is no evidence, however, that for her to marry outside her relationship would be "a capital crime," as Raphael says in 6:13.

The plot is advanced through this section by comments before and after Tobit's speech. The reason given for his farewell discourse is twofold: he has prayed for death and therefore expects it. He remembers the money that he deposited with Gabael and decides to send his son Tobiah to Media to get it (4:1-2). Tobit tells Tobiah about the money and, characteristically, connects it with the theory of retribution: "Do not be discouraged, my child, because of our poverty. You will be a rich man if you fear God, avoid all sin, and do what is right before the Lord your God" (4:21).

5:1–6:1 Preparation for the journey: a guide. Chapter 5 begins immediately with the practical preparations for the journey. Tobiah, although willing to obey his father's wishes, brings up two difficulties: since he does not know Gabael, he will need a sign to give him so that Gabael will give him the money. Also, he does not know the way to Media.

The answer to the first difficulty is simple. Tobit informs his son that when he deposited the money with Gabael, they exchanged signatures on a document written in duplicate. One copy was put with the money. It is implied that Tobit kept the other copy.

Finding a guide to Media occupies the rest of the chapter. Tobit instructs his son to look for a trustworthy man who knows the way. Raphael's immediate appearance answers the question left at the end of chapter 3: How will Raphael function?

The narration of the hiring of Raphael as guide is a masterpiece of irony. With the exception of Raphael, the audience knows more about what is happening than any of the characters involved. As soon as Tobiah finds Raphael, the narrator informs the audience that he is an angel but that Tobiah does not know it (5:4-5). Raphael ("God heals") tells Tobiah that his name is Azariah ("Yahweh is my help"). From this point on, all the characters will call the angel Azariah. The narrator, however, will continue to refer to him as "the angel Raphael," "Raphael," or simply "the angel" (see 5:8, 10, 12, 13, 16; 6:2).

Raphael's disguise makes his conversation with Tobit and Tobiah another element of the irony. When Tobiah asks Raphael who he is, Raphael replies that he is a kinsman who has come to find work (5:5). Indeed he has. He was commissioned in 3:17. When Tobit greets Raphael, the angel replies that there is healing in store for Tobit (5:10). He surrounds his assurance of healing with words that appear in all the healings: "Take courage" (5:10; compare 7:17; 11:11). Tobit ignores the promise of healing and moves on to the business at hand, but the readers know that Raphael's assurance is true.

Tobit, who is careful about his son's associations, quizzes Raphael regarding his identity. He is interested not only in his ability as a guide but also in his tribe and family. After turning the question aside once (5:12), Raphael finally answers: "I am Azariah ['Yahweh is my help'], son of Hananiah ['Yahweh is merciful']." Tobit adds the information that Hananiah is the son of Shemaiah ("Yahweh hears"). It is true that Raphael is there because Yahweh is merciful and Yahweh hears, but not true in the way that Tobit understands it. Raphael's statement inspires Tobit to exclaim, ". . . you are a kinsman, and from a noble and good line!" (5:14). That statement is far truer than Tobit realizes!

The chapter ends with a final twist of irony. Anna, Tobiah's mother, worries in typical motherly fashion. Tobit, equally worried, as we will learn later (see 10:1-3), reassures her by telling her what he has also prayed in blessing over his son: "A good angel will go with him, his journey will be successful, and he will return unharmed" (5:22; compare 5:17).

The relationship between Tobit and Anna and their parental concern for their son are carefully drawn in this chapter. Anna's attention throughout the book is concentrated on her son. The narrator identifies her as "his [Tobiah's] mother." She complains to Tobit: "Why have you decided to send my child away?" (5:18, emphasis added). After a single mention of "our child" (5:19), she refers to Tobiah as "my child" from this point until his return (10:4, 7). Only when she sees him coming down the road does she turn and tell Tobit, "Your son is coming" (11:6, emphasis added). In her relationship with Tobit, Anna tends to be sharp-tongued and quick (compare 2:14). In this chapter she turns the conversation to an attack on Tobit, accusing him of preferring money to the life of "her" son (5:19).

Tobit is also devoted to his son, who is the center of his life (see 11:14). He is careful to instruct him in the ways of righteousness (ch. 4). He, too, worries about Tobiah's journey (see 10:1-3). He characteristically puts aside his worry, however, to reassure Anna (5:21-22; compare 10:4-6), who, for the moment, stops weeping (6:1).

6:2-18 The journey. Tobiah's journey is outlined by the few statements that make up the itinerary. On the first night the travelers make camp beside the Tigris River (6:2). "Afterward they traveled on together till they were near Media" (6:7). They enter Media, and finally, in 7:1, they arrive at Ecbatana, which seems to be the goal of their journey. This is a surprise to the reader, who thinks that the two set off for Rages to get Tobit's money from Gabael (see 4:1, 20; 5:3). Raphael's instructions to Tobiah, however, indicate the real goal of the journey: the healing of Sarah and her marriage to Tobiah.

The angel's instructions to Tobiah form most of the material written concerning the journey. They consist of three parts, each one occurring in a different segment of the journey: instruction concerning how to prepare the fish (6:4-6); information about the healing properties of the fish's heart, liver, and gall; and detailed instructions concerning Tobiah's marriage to Sarah and her healing (6:10-18).

The fish represents a common element in romantic quests in folklore. The hero on a romantic quest conquers a dragon or a water monster such as Leviathan. This sea monster then becomes the source of life for the hero and for other characters in the story. Water as a source of both life and death is a common biblical image (see Gen 1:2; 2:5-6, 10-14; Job 38:8-11; 40:25–41:26; Pss 74:13-15; 89:10-11). The fish in the story of Tobit attempts to swallow Tobiah's foot (or to swallow Tobiah in the shorter Greek text!), but when Tobiah follows Raphael's instruction, seizes the fish, and saves its gall, heart, and liver, it becomes a source of healing.

The struggle with the fish occurs on the first night of the journey. Night is a common image for death. The alternation of the words "night" and "day" in the Book of Tobit reveals an important progression in the plot. There is a concentration of references to "night" in the chapters referring to Tobiah's journey and the healing of Sarah. Between 6:2 and 8:18, "night" occurs ten times (6:2, 11, 13 [twice], 14, 16; 7:10, 11 [twice]; 8:9). It occurs only twice more: once in 2:9 when Tobit is afflicted with blindness, and once in 10:7 when Anna weeps all night. "Day," on the other hand, is concentrated toward the beginning and end of the book: fourteen times in the first five chapters (1:2, 3, 16, 18, 21; 3:7, 10; 4:1, 3, 5 [twice], 9; 5:6, 21); eighteen times in chapters 8 through 14 (8:20; 9:4 [twice], 10:1 [4 times], 7 [twice], 12 [twice], 13; 11:17, 18). The movement of the plot goes from apparent light and life for both Tobit and Sarah, to darkness with Tobit's blindness and Sarah's affliction on her wedding nights, back into light with the return of Tobit's sight and the transformation of Sarah's wedding night into joy. The skillful use of these two words symbolizes the direction of the plot.

Raphael begins to fulfill his commission from 3:17 when he gives instructions regarding the healing of Tobit and Sarah. In the first instruction (6:7-9), Raphael informs Tobiah that the heart and liver of the fish are useful in removing an evil spirit from a man or a woman, and the gall is useful in curing blindness in a man. The reader, of course, knows that it is a woman who is afflicted by a demon and a man who is blind. Tobiah, instructed by Raphael and supplied with the parts of the fish, will be the means of their healing.

Raphael's detailed instructions concerning Tobiah's marriage to Sarah and her healing point forward and backward in the plot. Raphael reminds Tobiah that he has been instructed by his father to marry someone from his own kindred (6:16; compare 4:12-13). The reader also knows that Tobit himself married a wife from his own lineage (1:9) and that Sarah expects to marry either a relative or no one (3:15). It is not only the reader who knows that marriage to Sarah is a dangerous enterprise. Tobiah also knows that she has had seven husbands who have already dropped dead on the wedding night and that it is a demon who killed them (6:14-15). However, Tobiah also knows from Raphael that burning the heart and liver of the fish can drive off demons. Once the demon is banished, Tobiah is to begin his marriage in the spirit of prayer, and that prayer, joined to his willing obedience to his father and the great love he already feels toward Sarah, will seal the marriage that was determined "before the world existed" (6:18).

THE HEALING OF SARAH AND TOBIT

Tob 7:1–11:18

7:1–8:18 The wedding. When the travelers arrive in Ecbatana, they are immediately greeted by Raguel and introduced to his family. The greetings lead to a discussion of Tobit after Raguel recognizes Tobiah's likeness to him. The dialogue is well structured. Edna, like her counterpart Anna, is a strong woman who emerges as the moving force in the questioning of Tobiah. Two emotions characterize the meeting: joy at seeing Tobit's son and grief over Tobit's blindness.

The narrative moves immediately to a banquet scene that sets the stage for the wedding of Tobiah and Sarah. The scene fits a common pattern for betrothals in the Old Testament, for example, that of Isaac (Gen 24:1-67) and that of Jacob (Gen 29:1-30). The structure of Isaac's betrothal scene is much like that of Tobiah's. The father commands his son to take a journey to find a bride among his own kindred. (This is the obvious motive in Gen 24:3-4; in Tobit the motive is disguised by the matter of the money.) The travelers are given a meal (Gen 24:33; Tob 7:9) but refuse to eat until the betrothal is arranged (Gen 24:33; Tob 7:11). The host yields, recognizing that the marriage has been decided by the Lord (Gen 24:50; Tob 7:11). There are other similarities to the betrothal scene of Jacob. After an opening conversation, which in Tobit is cited directly from Genesis (Gen 29:4-6; Tob 7:3-4), the traveler is greeted warmly when he makes himself known as a relative (Gen 29:12-13; Tob 7:6). The father of the bride is reluctant to agree to the marriage (Gen 29:23-27; Tob 7:10-11). By using the common pattern of the betrothal scenes of the patriarchs, the author of the Book of Tobit is linking the marriage of Tobiah and Sarah to the patriarchal marriages, a connection already made by Tobit (4:12).

The wedding scene reveals much about the characters. Raguel, who is modeled after Abraham, is a man of hospitality. His favorite words are "Eat and drink" (7:10, 11; compare 8:20). He loves his daughter and is reluctant to see her suffer an eighth attempt to marry. Tobiah, who has been in the shadow of Tobit and Raphael until now, emerges in this scene as a man in his own right. When the travelers arrived in Ecbatana, Tobiah instructed Raphael to take him straight to Raguel's house (7:1). In the banquet scene, he refuses to eat until the marriage is determined (7:11). He has taken hold of the instructions given him by Raphael, and he will carry them out.

The wedding itself follows the pattern of a marriage contract found among the fifth century B.C.E. papyri discovered at Elephantine in Egypt. The marriage contract of Mibtahiah reads: "She is my wife and I am her husband from this day for ever" (compare Tob 7:11).

The phrase "Be brave" introduces the healing of Sarah (7:17; compare 5:10; 11:11) as Edna prepares her daughter for her eighth wedding night. When he is led into Sarah's bedroom, Tobiah remembers Raphael's instructions and performs the necessary ritual of burning the fish's heart and liver (8:2). This is the third description of the manner of Sarah's healing (see 6:8, 17-18). Each of the healings is described three times.

Sarah's healing, however, is not accomplished by means of the fish's heart and liver alone. They are only the physical symbols. Raphael pursues the demon after he flees and binds him (8:3). Even more significantly, Tobiah and Sarah turn to prayer, in accord with Raphael's instructions (8:4-9; compare 6:18). Prayer is an important activity throughout the book. At every crucial moment the main characters turn to prayer (see 3:2-6; 3:11-15; 11:14-15; 13:1-18). It is this turning to God in prayer that finally delivers Sarah from the demon Asmodeus.

In his prayer Tobiah links their marriage, not only to the patriarchs, but to creation and Adam and Eve. It is in this spirit of unity with the people of God that Tobiah and Sarah are united in marriage. Sarah joins Tobiah in the "Amen," the only word she speaks in the presence of another human being in the whole book.

Sarah is healed; the marriage is consummated. The irony of the book, however, continues. Raguel has given his daughter in marriage for the eighth time because he has no choice (see 6:13; 7:11), but he is not convinced that the end will be other than tragic. Protecting himself, he has a grave dug so that Tobiah can be buried "without anyone's knowing about it" (8:12). Had Tobiah died, one wonders whether Raphael would simply have gone home alone. Would Anna and Tobit have inquired about their son? Raguel, however, is worried about the neighbors. After the grave has been dug, he asks Edna to send a maid to see if Tobiah is dead. The maid becomes the messenger of the good news: "He is alive!" Raguel immediately turns to prayer and then instructs his servants to fill in the grave before the new day dawns. All signs of death will be wiped away from the new day (8:18).

8:19–10:7 The delay. As soon as day comes, Raguel prepares a feast (compare 7:9). In his great joy he doubles the length of the normal seven-day wedding celebration. He puts Tobiah under oath to stay the full fourteen days and bring joy to Sarah. The resulting delay in Tobiah's journey has two consequences.

First of all, Tobiah, who cannot leave Ecbatana, sends Raphael to Rages for Tobit's money, the original goal of the journey. Raphael is also instructed to bring Gabael back with him to the wedding feast. The journey to Rages and back seems to take very little time. This corresponds to Raphael's statement in 5:6 that Rages is only two days away from Ecbatana. As a matter of fact, it took Alexander's army eleven days of forced march to cover the same distance, approximately three hundred kilometers. We can draw two conclusions from this discrepancy. For one thing, the author is not interested in geographical details, nor is he intending to present a historical account. Also, the aura of speed and haste that seems to surround Raphael is not inconsistent with his angelic character (compare 5:8; 8:3; 11:4).

The second consequence of the delay is the effect on Tobiah's worried parents. Both parents act in typical fashion. Tobit, "day by day, was counting the days," and when the appointed day arrives and Tobiah has not returned, he begins to worry and to imagine all sorts of alternatives. Anna, who was already worried on the day Tobiah left, is convinced that her son is dead. She is not so convinced, however, that she does not go out every day to watch the road by which he will return. Just as he reassured his wife and concealed his own worry at Tobiah's departure (5:21-22), Tobit attempts now to console Anna. This time he is unsuccessful. She refuses to eat, and she weeps all night. She and Tobit are still in the dark, even though the day has dawned in Ecbatana.

10:7–11:18 Vision. The next section picks up the thread of the story after the fourteen-day delay. The scene in which Tobiah and Sarah prepare to leave Ecbatana and return to Nineveh illustrates several of the ideas concerning marriage in the book. First of all, marriage is seen to link families. Raguel instructs Sarah to honor Tobiah's parents, since, as he says, "they are as much your parents as the ones who brought you into the world" (10:12). Both Raguel and Edna refer to Tobiah as their son (10:11, 13). Edna tells Tobiah directly that she is his mother and that Sarah is his sister (10:13; compare Raguel's speech in 8:21). ("Sister" as a term for "beloved" is used throughout the book [7:11-12; 8:21; 10:12]. The same term is used in the Song of Songs [4:9-12; 5:1-2; compare also Prov 7:4].) Joy is an expected outcome of marriage (10:13; compare 8:20). Children are expected and are considered a blessing (10:11, 13; compare 4:12).

After being blessed by both Raguel and Edna, Tobiah begins the journey back to Nineveh in a spirit of prayer (10:14). The journey itself is summarized in one verse (11:1). The arrival, which is masterfully set up in a series of scenes alternating between the travelers and the parents as they approach each other (Raphael and Tobiah, 11:1-4, 7-8; Tobit and Anna, 11:5-6, 9-10), is a character study of all concerned. Raphael is hurrying again (11:3) and functioning in his angelic role as giver of information (11:4, 7-8). Tobiah, obedient to Raphael's instructions, is on his way to be the instrument of healing. Anna is still watching the road for her son, who she is sure is dead (compare 10:4-7). When she sees him coming, however, her true love for Tobit emerges. She turns "to his father, and exclaims, 'Tobit, your son is coming' " (11:6; emphasis added). In response, the blind Tobit gets up and stumbles toward the son whom he cannot see (11:10).

Tobiah begins the process of healing his father with the words that are characteristic of all the healings, "Take courage" (compare 7:17). The description of his actions is the third description of the method by which his father's blindness is to be healed (see 6:9; 11:8). Tobit's first words after vision returns are an exclamation of joy at seeing his son, the light of his eyes (11:14). Then he immediately turns to prayer.

Tobit prays in praise of God, whom he sees both as a source of affliction and as a source of healing (11:15; compare 13:2-5; 1 Sam 2:6; Wis 16:13). He thus declares one of the major theological principles of the book: God is free, and God's actions are beyond human understanding. Tobit, although he believes that God rewards obedience and punishes wickedness (see 1:12-13; 4:6, 21), accepts his blindness as coming from God (see 3:5). Throughout his affliction he never turns away from God and never ceases praying. His prayer as his sight is restored is a striking manifestation of his own extraordinary faith.

The joyful scene concludes with the greeting of Sarah, who has just arrived at the gate of Nineveh. Tobit continues the insistence that marriage has linked the two families. He refers to Sarah as "daughter" four times in his effusive welcoming speech (11:17).

Another seven-day celebration is begun, with Ahiqar (see 1:21-22; 2:10; 14:10) and his nephew Nadab in attendance (11:18). The Story of Ahiqar is one of the major sources of the Book of Tobit. Knowledge of the story is presumed in 11:18. The story probably originated as an Assyrian tale, and was written down in Aramaic around 500 B.C.E. It circulated widely in many languages, and several late versions are still in existence. The outline of the plot concerns a man named Ahiqar, who was a royal official under Sennacherib and Esarhaddon. He adopted his nephew Nadab and trained him to succeed to his royal position. Nadab, however, accused Ahiqar of treason, and Ahiqar was condemned to death. The executioner spared his life and hid him because of a kind deed Ahiqar had done for him earlier. When the king began to wish for Ahiqar back again, the executioner produced him, and Ahiqar was restored to his former honor. Meanwhile, Nadab was imprisoned and died. Thus the story, like that of Tobit, concerns a man who suffers unjustly but who, in the end, is rewarded for his virtue.

DENOUEMENT

Tob 12:1–14:15

12:1-22 The angel. The final chapters of the Book of Tobit reiterate the main themes and conclude the remaining details of the plot. The first detail to be settled is the matter of Raphael's wages. Tobit had assured Tobiah that his guide would be paid well (5:3), and Tobiah repeated the assurance to Raphael (5:7). In Tobit's conversation with Raphael he promised him a bonus as well (5:15-16). The journey has been completed with far more success than either Tobit or his son anticipated. Thus the two decide not only to give Raphael a bonus but to pay him half of the money that was brought back from Gabael (12:1-2). This motif belongs to a folk tale widely known in the Near East and in Eastern Europe called The Grateful Dead. This folk tale is one of the sources for the plot of Tobit. In the folk tale a dead man, whom the hero has buried at great difficulty to himself, returns to act as a guide for him in his quest for a bride. The grateful dead man saves the hero from the demons that afflict the bride and kill her bridegrooms. As a reward, the hero offers the grateful dead man half of all the treasure he has acquired. At that point, the grateful dead man reveals his identity and disappears.

Raphael, following the model of the grateful dead man, refuses the wages and reveals his identity. This is the occasion for the second farewell discourse of the book (see 4:3-21; 14:3-11). Raphael's speech reiterates the major themes of the book. He exhorts Tobit and Tobiah to pray, to give thanks to God, and to praise God before all the living (12:6-7, 17-20). He also exhorts them to give alms, one of Tobit's characteristic virtues, in which he has also instructed his son (12:8-10; see 1:3, 16-18; 4:7-11, 16-17).

The major content of Raphael's speech is the revelation of his identity: "I am Raphael, one of the seven angels who enter and serve before the Glory of the Lord" (12:15). The developed figure of the angel is a primary contribution of the Book of Tobit to Old Testament theology. Four functions of angels, all of which derive from the identity of angels as messengers (the word angelos in Greek means "messenger"), can be seen in the character of Raphael. The angel is guide and protector, instructor, mediator, and tester.

The function of guide and protector is the primary function of the angel in this book. Raphael emerges as a main character only in the scenes that involve the journey (5:1–6:18; 11:1-8) and in the farewell speech (12:6-22). It is in those scenes that the narrator continually reminds us that Raphael is an angel (5:4; 6:2, 4, 7). After the opening scene with Tobiah, the first dialogue in which he participates is the discussion with Tobit concerning his qualifications as guide (5:10-17); his first activity is the journey (6:2–7:1). It is he who travels to Rages to get Tobit's money in order to complete the initial task of the journey (9:1-6). In answer to the initial question, Raphael will function primarily as guide and protector.

Raphael also functions as instructor and conveyor of information. He has two major conversations with Tobiah in which he functions in this role. In 5:5-9 Raphael is a channel of information concerning the trip to Rages and Ecbatana. The second exchange is far more important (6:7-18). He is the conveyor of information concerning the three major events of the plot: the marriage and the two healings. Raphael performs few actions, but he consistently instructs other characters how to act. He tells Tobiah how to gain mastery over the fish (6:4) and how to use its parts for the healings (6:5, 8-9, 16-18; 11:4, 7-8). He instructs him to marry Sarah (6:10-13). In his farewell discourse he instructs Tobit and Tobiah to pray and praise God (12:6-7, 17-20).

Raphael is a mediator of prayer. He comes in answer to prayer (3:16-17). He instructs Tobiah to pray on his wedding night (6:18). In this chapter he exhorts Tobit and Tobiah to pray in thanksgiving (12:6-7, 17-20). He identifies himself as one who presents prayers before the Glory of the Lord (12:12).

Finally, Raphael is a tester. He tells Tobit that he was sent to put him to the test (12:14). There is no indication of what his function in the test is. Does he bring the blindness? Is his hidden identity part of the test? He certainly tests Tobiah's obedience (6:4-5, 11-18). Beyond those implications, we have only Raphael's own statement concerning his function as a tester.

The angel in this book is a messenger. He mediates between God and the believers. The primary agents of God's providence are the human beings. Throughout the book, Tobiah is the instrument of healing. The primary actor is God. It is God who heals, as Raphael's name ("God heals") asserts; it is God who deserves thanks and praise (see 12:17-20).

13:1-18 Praise and thanksgiving. Raphael's exhortation to Tobit and Tobiah in chapter 12 to praise God is followed in chapter 13 by Tobit's song of praise. The prayer falls into two major sections: God's freedom and mercy (vv. 1-8); Jerusalem's distress and glory (vv. 9-18).

The first section is cast in the form of a hymn, with several calls to praise (13:1, 3, 4b, 6cd) alternating with the reasons for praise (13:2, 3b-4, 5-6). It ends with Tobit's presenting himself as an example to his kindred (13:7-8). The message of the first section reflects several themes of Deuteronomy. God is one who both scourges and has mercy (see Deut 32:39; compare 1 Sam 2:6). Although the people have been scattered, God will again gather them (see Deut 30:1-5). The condition for their restoration is their turning back to God, an idea common to both Deuteronomy and Jeremiah (see Deut 4:29-31; 30:1-10; Jer 3:12, 14, 22; 4:1).

The second section, also a hymn, is addressed to the city of Jerusalem. After an introductory section that links the situation of Jerusalem, scourged and raised up, to the situation of the exiles, scourged and raised up (see 13:2, 5), the poem moves into a modified ring structure. A description of Jerusalem as a bright light drawing all nations (13:11) parallels a description of Jerusalem built of precious metals and jewels (13:16b-18). These descriptions of Jerusalem surround a set of curses and beatitudes:

Cursed are those who harm Jerusalem (13:12).
Happy are those who bless the Lord of the ages in Jerusalem (13:13).
Happy are those who love Jerusalem and rejoice in its prosperity (13:14).
Happy are those who grieve over Jerusalem's distress; they shall rejoice (13:15).
Happy is Tobit if a remnant of his offspring survives to rejoice in Jerusalem (13:16).

The second section is dependent on the imagery of the prophets. The vision of Jerusalem built with precious stones is found in Isa 54:11-12. Jerusalem as the source of great light to which many nations will come is the image of Isa 60:1-14 (see also Mic 4:2; Zech 8:22). Those who love Jerusalem will rejoice (Isa 66:10, 14) while those who do not serve Jerusalem will be destroyed (see Isa 60:12). Tobit believes in the word of the prophets (see 14:4), and the description of Jerusalem in his prayer is dependent on the prophets' vision.

The prayer of Tobit reflects the story of his own life. In his prayer he makes himself an example for his people. He exhorts them to praise God (13:1, 3, 4, 6, 8) as he does (13:7) and to trust God in adversity as well as joy (13:2-3, 5). In the second section he makes the same call to praise (13:10) and to trust God both in sorrow and in joy (13:9). He concludes the prayer with a hymn of joy over Jerusalem's future glory (13:16-18).

Joy is a primary characteristic of Tobit in the last part of the book (see 14:7). The prayer he composes is described as "joyful" (13:1), and "joy" is its constant refrain. Tobit himself rejoices (13:7). He prays that God's tent be rebuilt in Jerusalem with joy (13:10), that all the former captives be made glad (13:10), and all generations give joyful praise in Jerusalem (13:11). He exhorts Jerusalem to rejoice over the children of the righteous (13:13). He declares happy those who love Jerusalem, who rejoice with it, and who grieve over its distress. They shall rejoice in it as they behold its joy forever (13:14). Even the gates of Jerusalem shall sing hymns of gladness (13:18).

Tobit sees his own distress as a model of the distress of Jerusalem during the Exile. Just as God had mercy on him (see 11:15), so God will have mercy on Jerusalem. The return of Tobit's sight parallels Jerusalem's return to glory. Just as he praises God, so Jerusalem shall praise. His prayer makes it clear that the author understands the story of Tobit as a paradigm for the Exile and the restoration of the people.

14:1-15 Farewell. The third and final farewell discourse is found in 14:3-11 (compare 4:3-21; 12:6-10). It is introduced by the information that Tobit was indeed rewarded with the Deuteronomic blessings for righteousness: long life, joy and prosperity, and many descendants (14:1-3; compare Deut 4:1, 40; 5:32-33; 12:7, 12, 18; 30:15-20; 32:46-47).

Just as Tobit had called his son Tobiah to him in order to instruct him after Tobit had prayed for death (4:2-3), once again Tobit calls his son and his seven grandsons to him (14:3). First he tells them to trust the word of the prophets (14:3-4, 8). The prophet Nahum's dire prophecies concerning Nineveh will surely come to pass. In fact, the word of all the prophets shall come to pass in the proper time; therefore, it will be safer for Tobiah and his family to flee Nineveh and to take up residence in Media.

The second prophetic word to be proved true concerns the Exile and the destruction of Jerusalem (14:4-7). Just as the prophets announced the fall of Jerusalem, however, they also announced its restoration. The key word in the first section of this exhortation is "desolate," which is repeated three times. The country of Israel will be "desolate"; the capitals, Samaria and Jerusalem, will be "desolate"; God's temple will be "desolate." The key word in the second section is "rebuild." They will "rebuild" the temple; they will "rebuild" Jerusalem; within Jerusalem the temple will be "rebuilt"; the temple will be "rebuilt" for all generations to come, just as the prophets said. Finally, as the prophets said, all nations will "turn" and fear God. All true Israelites will remember God and will be gathered in Jerusalem. The land in which they will dwell is the land of promise, promised generations ago to Abraham with a promise that has never been taken back.

Tobit ends his discourse with an exhortation to his descendants to live as he has lived. He walked all the days of his life "on the paths of truth and righteousness" and "performed many charitable works" (1:3). He exhorts his children to "serve God in truth," "to do what is right," and "to give alms" (14:9). As he has remembered God and constantly turned to God in prayer (see 3:2-6; 5:17; 11:14-15; 13:1-18), so his descendants are to do (14:9). As he is instructing them (see also 4:3-21), they are also to instruct their children (14:9). Tobit concludes with the story of Ahiqar, which illustrates the reward for almsgiving, just as his own life illustrates the reward for almsgiving (14:10). His final sentence summarizes the message of the book: Almsgiving gives life; wickedness brings death.

After Tobit's death, Tobiah proves himself a worthy son of his father. As his father had concern for the honorable burial of others, so Tobiah buries his parents and his wife's parents (compare 1:16-20; 2:1-7; 4:3-4, 17). He obediently leaves Nineveh and lives to see his father's faith in the prophets vindicated by Nineveh's destruction (14:15). Like his father, Tobiah is rewarded with prosperity and a long life (14:14).

JUDITH

Irene Nowell, O.S.B.

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Judith was written in the second century, somewhat later than the Book of Tobit. This book was a response to a new crisis that arose to threaten Jewish believers in Palestine. In 175 B.C.E. the Seleucid ruler Antiochus IV Epiphanes came to power in Syria and Palestine. He soon embarked on a policy to force the Jews not only to adopt Greek ways of thinking and worshiping but also to abandon traditional Jewish practices such as circumcision and special dietary laws. Stories of the horrible persecution that ensued can be found in the Books of the Maccabees.

At the height of the persecution (167 B.C.E.) a courageous Jew named Mattathias, forced to offer sacrifice on a pagan altar, killed the king's messenger and fled to the hills with his five sons. Soon other faithful Jews joined Mattathias and his sons and began what came to be known as the Maccabean revolt. (The name "Maccabean" comes from the nickname of Mattathias' son Judas, who was called Maccabee, which probably means "hammer.") The Maccabees reclaimed the temple and rededicated it in 164 B.C.E. After a long period of guerrilla warfare and intrigue, the Jews finally achieved a period of relative independence under Hasmonean rulers who were descendants of Mattathias and his sons.

The Book of Judith was written during the period of the Maccabean revolt. Its setting is in an earlier period, but many details reveal the author's interest in his own time rather than that of the seventh century B.C.E. In the story, an Israelite town is besieged by Holofernes, commander-in-chief of the Assyrian army. The town leaders despair of help from God and declare that if deliverance does not come within five days, they will surrender. A beautiful widow—an observant Jew—upon hearing the decision of the elders, scolds them for their lack of faith. She prays, placing herself in the hands of God. Finally, she prepares her weapon—beauty. Because God works through her beauty, she beheads Holofernes and delivers her people.

The message of the book is that victory comes not from human might but through the power of God. God can deliver the faithful people at whatever time and in whatever way God wishes. Even though the way of deliverance may look like folly from a human point of view, the story of Judith demonstrates that the real fools are those who place their trust in human power and weapons. The whole army of Holofernes is defenseless against God's weapon—the beauty of a faithful woman.

COMMENTARY

THE ASSYRIAN THREAT

Jdt 1:1–3:10

1:1-16 Nebuchadnezzar's war against Arphaxad. The opening chapter of the Book of Judith sets the stage for the conflict that is to follow and presents Nebuchadnezzar, one of the main protagonists. The date and names given in the first verse signal immediately that the intention of the author is not the presentation of historical material since they are not accurate. The story opens in the twelfth year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, 593 B.C.E. Nebuchadnezzar is identified as one of the Assyrian kings who ruled in Nineveh. Actually, Nebuchadnezzar reigned as king of the Babylonians from 604 to 562 B.C.E.; his capital was the city of Babylon. Nineveh, the capital of Assyria, was destroyed in 612 B.C.E. by Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, during the Babylonian rise to power.

Other historical inconsistencies abound throughout the book. In the first chapter, Nebuchadnezzar's enemy is Arphaxad, king of the Medes (1:1). The ruler Arphaxad is unknown. The name is found in Gen 10:22 in the list of descendants of Shem. The city named as his capital, Ecbatana, was fortified around 700 B.C.E. by Deioces. The kingdom of the Medes, founded by Phraortes (675–653 B.C.E.), lasted until 550 B.C.E., when Cyrus, not Nebuchadnezzar, conquered Astyages, not Arphaxad (see 1:13-16).

The geographical information is equally inconsistent. The list of peoples summoned to assist Nebuchadnezzar in his battle against Arphaxad (1:7-10) includes regions moving from Mesopotamia in a counterclockwise fashion to the northwest and down the Mediterranean as far as Egypt. The places mentioned are in the right general area, but many are out of sequence. For example, Anti-Lebanon belongs between Damascus and Lebanon, the plain of Esdraelon between Carmel and Gilead. The cities of Egypt (1:9-10) also seem to be in no particular order.

Nebuchadnezzar, the protagonist in this drama, is, like everything else in the work, painted larger than life. He expects the inhabitants of most of the known world to come to his aid. The peoples of the West, however, are not impressed. They see him as one lone mortal (1:11) and not only refuse to assist in his battle but even turn away his messengers. Nebuchadnezzar's impression of himself is that of a divine being rather than a mortal. At the refusal of the western peoples to assist him, he falls into a violent rage and swears, not by a god but by himself, to destroy all the nations as far as the two seas (the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf). Before he can begin that terrible expedition, however, he must destroy Arphaxad, king of the Medes. He achieves this victory in the seventeenth year of his reign (588 B.C.E.). The chapter ends with Nebuchadnezzar feasting for 120 days in celebration with his army. The stage is set for the campaign against the West.

2:1-28 The war against the West. The second chapter begins with another date, the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar, the twenty-second day of the first month (Nisan). Both the year and the month are significant. The eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar was 587 B.C.E., the year in which his siege of Jerusalem succeeded and he took its citizens captive (see Jer 52:29; but compare Jer 52:12). The twenty-second of Nisan is the day after the Passover celebration ends (see Exod 12:2, 18). The author, by means of one date, is reminding the readers both of Israel's most terrible defeat (587 B.C.E.) and Israel's greatest deliverance by God, the Exodus, which is memorialized in the Passover.

Nebuchadnezzar's divine pretensions are clearer in the second chapter than in the first. He declares his intention of taking revenge on "the whole world" in verse 1. His vengeance will be nothing less than total destruction. The language he uses in summoning Holofernes is language that ordinarily belongs to Yahweh in biblical literature. For example, he begins, "Thus says the great king" (see Exod 4:22; Jer 11:3; Amos 1:3), "the lord of all the earth" (see Josh 3:11; Zech 6:5). Other phrases include: "to the very ends of the earth" (see 1 Sam 2:10; Ps 59:14; Isa 41:5); "what I have spoken I will accomplish by my power" (literally, "my hand will accomplish"; see Deut 32:39; Isa 43:13; compare Isa 10:12-15). He swears with a formula proper to divinity: "as I live" (see Isa 49:18; Jer 22:24; Ezek 5:11). Nebuchadnezzar, the first major character, has set himself up as a god, thereby opposing Yahweh. In this opposition, the Book of Judith is similar to the Exodus event in which the opponents are Pharaoh, considered to be divine, and Yahweh (see Exod 4:22-23; 15:3-4).

Each of the divine figures is represented in the action by a mortal figure. Nebuchadnezzar is represented by his general in chief, Holofernes; Yahweh is represented by the holy woman Judith. Holofernes is introduced in chapter 2. The name Holofernes is found among the generals of Artaxerxes III Ochos (359–338 B.C.E.). The name Bagoas (see Jdt 12:11) is also found in lists of his retinue. For this reason some scholars have thought that the Book of Judith originated in the fourth century, either with regard to the events it narrates or to the period of its writing.

When Holofernes is summoned by Nebuchadnezzar, he is identified as "general in chief of his forces, second to himself in command" (2:4). From this point on, as soon as Nebuchadnezzar finishes his speech of instruction, Holofernes is in the foreground, and we see Nebuchadnezzar only through him. Nebuchadnezzar's punishment of the West, his challenge to Judea, and his ultimate defeat are acted out in the person of Holofernes. The power of Nebuchadnezzar comes to an end as Bagoas cries out: "A single Hebrew woman has brought disgrace on the house of King Nebuchadnezzar. Here is Holofernes headless on the ground!" (14:18).

Holofernes begins the campaign with an army consisting of 120,000 select troops and 12,000 cavalry (2:15-16). He gathers abundant provisions and much money for the support of his army. He sets out with this regular army and its provisions, along with a huge irregular force, "like locusts or the dust of the earth" to "cover all the western region" (2:19-20). This mammoth war effort will be matched against Bethulia, a tiny Israelite village whose main hero is a woman. The battle is between gods. Each god summons the best in human power in order to defeat the other. Nebuchadnezzar trusts in human force, Yahweh in human virtue.

The geographical notations continue to be confusing. The general direction again seems to be toward the northwest, then sweeping down along the Mediterranean. Bectileth, the camping place reached by the army after a three-day march, is unknown. Upper Cilicia, the next camping place, is, however, at least three hundred miles from Nineveh, an impossible distance for such a short march. Put and Lud are mentioned in Gen 10 (compare Nah 3:9); they are generally understood as African and Semitic peoples. Lud, however, is also identified as a place in Asia Minor (see Isa 66:19), maybe the same as Lydia. In any case, if the two names are taken together, they cannot be taken literally as part of the progress of Holofernes' army. Many of the other locations are unknown, such as Rassis and Japheth. Some identify not places but nomadic tribes, such as the Ishmaelites and the Midianites. Many of the names come from the table of nations in Gen 10, for example, Japheth, Put, and Lud. The effect of the geographical notations is to create a list of peoples long enough and disparate enough to indicate that Nebuchadnezzar, through Holofernes, is well on his way to conquering the whole world. Fear of him has indeed spread to the ends of the earth.

3:1-10 Surrender of the West. Holofernes expects that the result of his sweep through the lands west of Mesopotamia will be the surrender of all peoples to him. Chapter 3 seems to confirm that expectation. The author says that "they," presumably all the peoples listed in the last ten verses of chapter 2, "sent messengers . . . to sue for peace" (3:1), offering total surrender: "Do with us as you will." Wherever Holofernes and his troops arrive, they are welcomed with feasting and dancing.

Holofernes, however, responds to the welcome by devastating the territory and destroying all the shrines to local gods. "He has been commissioned to destroy all the gods of the earth, so that every nation might worship Nebuchadnezzar alone, and every people and tribe invoke him as a god" (3:8, emphasis added).

It would seem that Holofernes' victory is complete and that no one stands in the way of Nebuchadnezzar's being declared god of all the earth. At this point Holofernes stops in the plain of Esdraelon to rest and refurbish his army before attacking the Israelites. Now, the territory of Esdraelon is familiar to the biblical reader who knows that this is not the first time that Yahweh has appeared to be defeated here. More than once here the people of God have had defeat turn to victory in the most surprising circumstances. In the time of the judges, when the Israelites were oppressed by the Canaanite king Jabin and his general Sisera, Yahweh won a great victory for his people at the Wadi Kishon in the valley of Esdraelon. Even the stars fought for the people of God (Judg 5:20). The army of Sisera was defeated by the Naphtalite Barak. The final victory, however, belonged to Yahweh, who worked through two women. The prophetess Deborah, judge of Israel, instructed Barak, telling him that God had delivered the enemy into Israel's power (Judg 4:4-7). Jael, wife of the Kenite Heber, killed the enemy general, Sisera, with a tent peg (Judg 4:17-22; 5:24-27). For this victory Jael was declared "blessed among women" (Judg 5:24).

The people of God would also remember that the valley of Esdraelon had received the blood of their own kings. Saul was defeated there and died on Mount Gilboa with his son Jonathan (1 Sam 31). Josiah, "before [whom] there had been no king who turned to the Lord as he did, . . . nor could any after him compare with him" (2 Kgs 23:25), was killed there defending the pass at Megiddo against Pharaoh Neco in 609 B.C.E. (2 Kgs 23:29-30).

It would seem that nothing stands in the way of Holofernes' victory and Nebuchadnezzar's pretensions to divinity. But the army of the enemy rests in the valley of Esdraelon, the valley of defeat and victory, and the people await the action of Yahweh.

SIEGE OF BETHULIA

Jdt 4:1–7:32

4:1-15 Resistance of Israel. Just as all the peoples to the north and west of them feared Holofernes' army, so all the Israelites who lived in Judea were afraid when they heard of Holofernes' exploits. The Israelites' reaction to invasion differs from their neighbors in two respects: the nature of their fear and their response. Their fear is not only for themselves but primarily for Jerusalem and the temple of the Lord (4:2). The temple is the center of their lives and the sign of God's presence among them. They had, the narrator reports, only lately returned to their own land from exile. Only lately had the temple been purified from profanation (4:3). The people fear another profanation of the temple and perhaps even another exile.

The historical inaccuracies are a manifestation of high irony. The profanation of the temple and the deportation of the people to Babylon did indeed take place under Nebuchadnezzar in 587 B.C.E. The exile from which it seems the people have only lately returned was the Babylonian Exile (587–538 B.C.E.). Thus Nebuchadnezzar functions as a symbol for the worst that could possibly happen. With regard to the second century, the author's own time, the most recent profanation of the temple was that which took place under the Seleucid ruler Antiochus IV Epiphanes during the Maccabean war. The temple was restored and purified in December of 164 B.C.E., after the victory of Judas Maccabeus. (The yearly celebration of this rededication forms the basis of the feast of Hanukkah.) Thus the author, by claiming that the people have only lately returned from exile (538 B.C.E.), that the temple has only lately been purified (164 B.C.E.), and that the threat comes from Nebuchadnezzar (587 B.C.E.), has layered three events one on top of the other: the major disaster of the past, the major restoration of the past, and the crisis of his own time. Nebuchadnezzar may have brought the greatest disaster, but even that disaster was turned to victory within forty years. The crisis of the second century, it is implied, will also be reversed.

The second way in which the Israelites differ from their neighbors is in their response to invasion. Their neighbors surrendered and welcomed Holofernes with joy, but the tiny country of Judea prepares to defend its most precious possession, Jerusalem with the temple, against Holofernes' advance. Their preparation takes two forms. First of all, there is material preparation. The Israelites in Judea notify the whole region. The people post guards and store up provisions from the newly gathered harvest. Those living near the Esdraelon valley prepare to hold the mountain passes that give the only access from that region through the Carmel range to the country in the south.

The people's most important preparation for siege, however, is spiritual. They pray and fast, practices that will later become two of the three pillars of Pharisaism. They act like the people of Nineveh in the Book of Jonah. Not only the men, women, and children but even the domestic animals join in penance

(4:9-10; compare Jonah 3:8). Their efforts, like those of the people of Nineveh, are rewarded: "The Lord heard their cry and had regard for their distress" (Jdt 4:13). Thus the narrator informs the reader of the eventual outcome of the story. The people of Judea, however, will face many days of distress before they know the answer of the Lord.

A key word in this chapter is "cry." During the oppression in Egypt the people seemed to be doomed. God appeared to be absent and is only mentioned twice between Exod 1:1 and 2:22, and then only with regard to the Egyptian midwives. Yet when the people "cried" out to God, "he heard their groaning and remembered his covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob" (Exod 2:24). Their cry was the beginning of their deliverance. In the Book of Judges this pattern is repeated consistently: (1) Israel abandons Yahweh; (2) Yahweh is angry with them and gives them over to their enemies; (3) they "cry" out to Yahweh, and (4) Yahweh sends a judge to deliver them (see Judg 3:2-11). In Judith, the people "cry" to Yahweh three times in seven verses (4:9, 12, 15), and Yahweh hears their "cry" (4:13).

5:1–6:21 Holofernes' response. Holofernes reacts to Israel's resistance in two ways. He summons the leaders of the lands surrounding Israel, indicating that he has the military power to squeeze the little nation to death. Then he asks two key questions: (1) Who are these people? Why are they different? Why has every other nation of the West surrendered and this tiny country refused? (2) Who is their king? What is their power? In the answers to these questions the reader finds the central message of the book.

Achior, leader of the Ammonites, answers Holofernes' first question, and the dialogue between the two men forms the basis of this section. Achior functions as the reporter for Israel, and the author indicates that through him the truth will be told (5:5). Achior begins by reciting the history of the people of God. He starts with Abraham and continues through the patriarchs, the sojourn in Egypt, the Exodus, and the conquest. He ends with the story of the Exile and the return. His historical survey is reminiscent of Joshua's speech during the covenant renewal that took place at Shechem after Israel had gained a foothold in the land of Canaan (Josh 24; see also Deut 26:5-10; Neh 9:6-31).

The historical recital answers the question "Who are these people?" Achior turns next to the second question: "What is their power?" He repeats the basic principles of the Deuteronomic theory of retribution: If Israel is obedient to God, the people will be blessed; if Israel is disobedient, they will be cursed. This theory finds its clearest expression in Deut 28. It is one of the basic principles illustrated in the Deuteronomic history (Joshua–2 Kings), and in the Book of Judith, Achior incorporates it into his advice to Holofernes. "If these people are at fault, and are sinning against their God, . . . then we shall be able to go up and conquer them. But if they are not a guilty nation, . . . their Lord and God will shield them" (5:20-21). The power of this people comes from their God.

The question Holofernes should ask, according to Achior, is whether or not the people of God are faithful. If they are, then God will fight for them and they cannot be defeated. If they are not, then Holofernes will be able to conquer them. The implication of Achior's speech is unavoidable: Even if Holofernes wins, it will not be because of his own power but because God has sold the Israelites into the hands of their enemies on account of their infidelity (see Judg 3:7-8; 4:1-2). Holofernes has finally met a power stronger than his own.

Holofernes, however, misunderstands the real question. Neither he nor his attendants can envision a power greater than the material power of arms. His advisers tell him that the Israelites are a powerless people, incapable of a strong defense. "Let us therefore attack them; your great army, Lord Holofernes, will swallow them up" (5:23-24). This misunderstanding of true power will prove to be a fatal error for Holofernes.

Holofernes ignores the advice of Achior and follows the advice of those who counsel attack. However, before the attack he makes a three-point response to Achior's recommendations. First of all, he recognizes that Achior's function is that of prophet (6:2), even though he condemns Achior for delivering the message of the God of Israel. Holofernes' analysis of Achior's role is accurate. A prophet is "one who speaks for," one who delivers a message for another. Achior is delivering to Holofernes God's message concerning Israel: If they are faithful, you cannot defeat them. Achior is also delivering God's message concerning Israel to the people of the second century: If you remain faithful, you will not be defeated in this time of distress. Achior the Ammonite functions as a prophet of the God of Israel, a role recognized although repudiated by Holofernes the Assyrian.

Secondly, Holofernes proposes a course of action directly opposed to the advice of Achior. He refuses to accept Achior's message because he does not recognize the God from whom the message comes. He recognizes no god but Nebuchadnezzar (6:2); therefore Holofernes thinks that the God of Israel is powerless to save the people. Holofernes thinks that he himself will be the instrument by which the power of Nebuchadnezzar, "lord of all the earth," will be unleashed. No other god exists to withstand him. The words of Nebuchadnezzar "shall not remain unfulfilled" (6:4). Holofernes, in the name of Nebuchadnezzar, has declared war on Yahweh, God of Israel.

Thirdly, Holofernes condemns Achior to share the fate of the Israelites (6:5-9). He instructs his servants to hand Achior over to the people of Bethulia. Because the Israelites hurl stones down at them, Holofernes' men leave Achior bound at the foot of the mountain below Bethulia. When the Israelites untie him and bring him into the city, Achior again functions in the role of messenger-prophet. All the people gather to hear his report concerning Holofernes' declaration of war, and the Israelites' response is in direct contrast to that of the Assyrians. The Israelites understand the question about the source of their power. They know that their only power, their only hope is in God, and they call upon God to witness the arrogance of the enemy and their own lowliness.

7:1-32 Siege of Bethulia. The siege of Bethulia is described by a series of scenes that alternate between the Assyrian army and the Israelites. The two opening scenes are brief. Holofernes initiates a threefold action against the Israelites: to move against Bethulia, to seize the mountain passes, and to engage them in battle (7:1). Holofernes completes the first maneuver immediately, and his army lies spread out before the eyes of the Israelites at the spring that waters their city (7:3). The Israelite response is mixed (7:4-5). They are terrified by the size of the army that opposes them, yet they continue to keep watch and to maintain communication with the surrounding towns by means of fire signals. There is a reference to the use of such fire signals in one of the letters found at Lachish describing the siege of the city in 589 B.C.E.

The two remaining scenes (7:6-18, 19-32) portray the siege in greater detail. Holofernes seals off the approaches to the city and seizes the water sources. Traditional enemies of Israel—the Ammonites, the Edomites, and the leaders of the seacoast—advise him not to attack but to wait. The siege, in midsummer, will soon render the inhabitants of Bethulia helpless from thirst. In one respect, the time of year proves to be an advantage to the Israelites because the harvest has already been gathered (see 4:5); however, they cannot expect any rain until October. Thirst will be the Assyrians' weapon.

The Israelites, meanwhile, begin to suffer the effects of the siege (7:19-32). They suffer thirst. Water is rationed, and people begin to collapse from dehydration and weakness. The physical effects, however, are far less serious than the spiritual ones. The people become disheartened and begin to lose faith—first of all in God. Perhaps God has sold them into the power of the enemy as in the days of the judges (Jdt 7:25; compare Judg 3:8; 4:2; 10:7). They begin to murmur as the Israelites did in the wilderness: It would be better to fall into the hands of the enemy and live than to continue resisting them and die (7:26-27; compare Exod 16:3; Num 14:2-4). They also lose faith in themselves. The Deuteronomic theory of retribution says that suffering comes as a result of sin; therefore, they must be suffering because of their own sins and those of their ancestors (7:28). In either case the only solution is to surrender to the enemy.

Uzziah, whose name means "Yahweh is my strength," exhorts the people to have courage; however, he demands that God act within five days. If not, the people of Yahweh will abandon themselves to the army of Holofernes, and Nebuchadnezzar will declare himself god of all the earth (see 3:8; 6:2-4).

The five days stipulated by Uzziah (7:30), added to the thirty-four days of the siege (7:20), make a total of thirty-nine days. Deliverance will come on the night between the fourth and fifth days of Uzziah's limit (see 12:10). Thus within forty days, the traditional length of affliction (Moses' forty days of fast on Sinai, forty years in the wilderness, forty years of exile, Judith's forty months of mourning [see 8:4]), Yahweh will indeed send help to the people.

JUDITH, INSTRUMENT OF YAHWEH

Jdt 8:1–10:10

8:1-8 Judith, Yahweh's representative. War has been declared between Yahweh and Nebuchadnezzar, God against god. Each divinity has an acting human representative. The reader has been introduced to Holofernes, who functions as the representative of Nebuchadnezzar. In this chapter the reader meets the representative of Yahweh, the widow Judith.

Judith's introduction is one of the most lengthy genealogies in the Old Testament. It extends back sixteen generations. This alone declares the importance of this woman. It also indicates that her name, "Jewess" or "Judahite," is a true indication of her identity. In exilic and postexilic times the ability to trace one's ancestry back to the patriarchs, to know oneself to be a true descendant of Abraham and thus heir of the blessing, was of great importance. The Priestly tradition in the Pentateuch, which developed in the exilic period, lays great stress on genealogies. The people of God, when they regather in the land, need also to rediscover their roots. Judith's genealogy indicates that she is indeed a true Judahite, a true exemplar of her people.

Judith is a model of Jewish observance. She had, according to custom, married within her own tribe and clan (see the commentary on Tob 4:12-13). She lived piously—fasting, wearing widow's weeds and sackcloth, and fearing God. She was beautiful, a clear indication in biblical literature of virtue as well (see Gen 29:17; 39:6; 1 Sam 16:12; Esth 2:7; Dan 1:4-15). She is not only a model for her people because she is a true descendant of the patriarchs; she is also a model for their behavior.

Judith is a widow. Widows are significant in biblical stories. They are, first of all, objects of special concern, especially in Deuteronomy (see Deut 10:18; 14:29; 16:11, 14; 24:17, 19, 20, 21; 26:12-13; 27:19). Care for them is required because God cares for them (Deut 10:17-19; compare 24:18, 22). They are among those people who know that they have no help except in God; therefore, they are under God's special protection.

In addition to their special status as a group, there are several individual widows who have affected the history of the people of God. In the patriarchal narrative, Tamar, widow of Judah's son Er, continues to insist on the right of levirate marriage even after she is left a widow a second time by Judah's second son, Onan. Her determination finally leads her to take matters into her own hands and pose as a prostitute so that her husbands' father might give her a child to raise up in the name of her husbands (Gen 38). Judah himself claims that Tamar is more righteous than he (Gen 38:26). Because of her courage, the line of Judah continues. Twins, Perez and Zerah, were born to Tamar. A second widow who took matters into her own hands married into the line of Perez. Ruth, the Moabite woman who left her homeland to follow her mother-in-law back to Bethlehem, married Boaz, descendant of Perez, in another levirate marriage. A son named Obed was born to Ruth and Boaz. Obed became the father of Jesse, who was the father of David (see Ruth 4:18-22). Thus the genealogy of Israel's greatest king was shaped by the lives of two courageous widows. In the Book of Judith, another courageous widow becomes the instrument by which God delivers the people.

8:9-36 Judith and the elders. When the holy woman Judith hears that the people, in their despair, have challenged the elders' judgment (see 7:23-32), she sends her maid to ask the elders to visit her. She talks to the elders about the two major doubts of the people—their lack of faith in God and their lack of faith in themselves. She concludes her speech with an exhortation to action and a statement of the basic theological principle in question.

The first doubt that Judith treats is the people's lack of faith in God's fidelity to them (see 7:25). She scolds the elders for limiting God to the human understanding of the Deuteronomic theory of retribution. They have allowed themselves to be convinced that if God is just, God must reward all virtue and punish all disobedience according to human understanding of reward and punishment. They can see only the immediate distress; therefore, if God is just and they are virtuous, God must relieve their thirst within five days. Judith corrects this misunderstanding by declaring the basic principle that God is free, that God's ways are not human ways (8:12-16; compare Isa 55:8-9; Tob 4:19). The proper thing to do is to wait for God's salvation and trust in God's good pleasure (8:17).

The second doubt that Judith treats is the people's lack of faith in their own fidelity to God (see 7:28). They think that if God is just and yet they are suffering, then they must have been unfaithful. They have made the theory of retribution into an equation that is automatic and interchangeable. If disobedience brings suffering, then all suffering must be the result of disobedience. But the relationship between God and the people is personal rather than mathematical. Just as God is free to send blessing when it is undeserved, so also is God free to send suffering for purposes other than punishment. The people must not abandon hope in God. They have reason for hope because they have been faithful. They have not worshiped other gods; they know no other god but Yahweh (8:18-20, emphasis added). They have need for hope because if they despair and abandon God, the sanctuary will be profaned, the people will be slaughtered, and the land will be devastated. They will then bear the responsibility for this destruction because they have failed in hope. As a result, they will be enslaved and become the mockery of all (8:21-23).

Having treated the two problems of the people, Judith concludes with an exhortation to action and a restatement of the basic theological principle involved. Her call for action has three parts. The people of Bethulia must set an example because the fate of the land, the temple, and the people depends on them. They must be grateful to God, even in the midst of distress and even on account of their distress, because their affliction is a proof of God's love for them (see Prov 3:12). Finally, they must remember God's dealings with their ancestors so that they will understand God's fidelity and the meaning of their own suffering. The theological principle upon which Judith bases her argument is the freedom of God: God can send blessing even if it is undeserved; God may send suffering, not as punishment but as a test (see Deut 8:2-5, 16; Judg 2:22-23; Tob 12:14; Job 5:17-18).

Uzziah responds to Judith by confirming her wisdom but excusing the weakness of the elders for succumbing to the demands of the people (8:28-31). Even though he recognizes the rightness of Judith's words, he is caught in a dilemma. The elders have sworn an oath that they cannot take back (see Gen 27:33). The two different solutions to the dilemma, proposed by Uzziah and Judith, emphasize the contrast between Uzziah's small hope and Judith's great courage. Rain is the only solution he can imagine to relieve the immediate distress (8:31). Judith, on the other hand, envisions a total liberation to rank with the Exodus, a liberation that "will go down from generation to generation among the descendants" of Israel (8:32).

Judith does not tell Uzziah her plans. Both he and the readers are left in suspense, wondering how God will rescue Israel through her. The readers, however, have an advantage over Uzziah: they have been told by the narrator that God will deliver Israel (4:13). What they do not know is how.

9:1-14 Judith prepares for war: prayer. Judith makes two preparations for her war of liberation. The first preparation is prayer. Her prayer is important, first of all, as a model of how to pray. Judith prays during the time when the incense is being offered in the temple in Jerusalem, thus joining her prayer to the official prayer of her people (9:1). Her prayer posture is the classic posture of radical humility—prostration. Her attire is symbolic of penitence—sackcloth and ashes. She prays in traditional fashion, first reminding God of the mighty deeds performed for her ancestors (9:2-4; we may disagree with her evaluation of the slaughter of Shechem by Simeon and Levi), and then calling upon God to exercise divine power in her behalf (9:5-11). She concludes by reminding God of the benefits that will come from aiding her (9:12-14). Her prayer mirrors the exhortation she has given to her people to call upon God in hope (see 8:17).

The content of her prayer illustrates three basic principles of Holy War. The first principle has to do with trust. Those who trust in horses and chariots will be defeated; those who trust in Yahweh will be victorious. It is not possible to trust in both (see Ps 20:8-9). Trust in armaments is the same as trust in another god. It is idolatry (see Mic 5:9-12). The Assyrians' folly is that they trust in weapons of war, horses, and chariots. They do not know that Yahweh crushes warfare (Jdt 9:7-8; see Exod 15:3; Ps 76:4-7).

The second principle has to do with power. Those who trust in armaments trust in human power, those who trust in Yahweh trust in divine power. A key biblical word for power is "hand." Divine power is exercised for the people by Yahweh's mighty hand (see Exod 3:19-20; 6:1; 13:9). Frequently the power of Yahweh comes through the hand of a chosen instrument such as Moses (see Exod 9:22-23; 10:21-22; 17:11-12), the judges (see Judg 3:15, 21, 28; 6:36-37), or David (see 2 Sam 3:18). Yahweh's chosen instrument is sometimes weak, for example Jael (Judg 4:9, 21; 5:26) or the reduced army of Gideon (Judg 7:2, 7, 14-15). The weapons of Yahweh are not the same as human weapons. Judith, trusting in the power of Yahweh, asks for a strong hand so that by the hand of a woman the pride of the Assyrians might be crushed (9:9-10).

The third basic principle of Holy War has to do with victory. Victory belongs to the lowly and the vulnerable. The lowly, the oppressed, the weak, and the forsaken are not tempted to trust in human power; they have none. They know that they have no hope except in the power of God (Jdt 9:11; compare 1 Sam 2:4; Zeph 2:3).

On the basis of these three principles, Judith makes her plea to God. She does not trust in horses and chariots. She does not trust in human power. She knows that she has no hope except in the power of God; therefore she calls upon Yahweh to win the victory (9:12-14).

10:1-10 Judith prepares for war: beauty. Judith's second preparation for war is the enhancement of her beauty. After bathing, she uses all the human arts available to her to make herself both beautiful and captivating: perfumed ointment, a fancy hairstyle, festive clothing, and jewelry (10:1-4).

Judith understands the goodness of her body. She knows that her physical beauty is good and that it comes from God. She also knows that the power of her beauty comes from within her, from her holiness, from her faithfulness to God. Since both her exterior and interior beauty come from God, her beauty must be devoted to the service of God. God intends to use her beauty as a weapon to liberate the people. She will wield the weapon to the best of her ability.

The response of others to this second preparation of hers testifies to its effectiveness. The men of her own city are astounded at her beauty (10:7). After she arrives at the enemy camp, the guards of Holofernes gaze at her face in awe because of its wondrous beauty (10:14). The crowd that gathers within the camp at her arrival marvels at her beauty. They say to one another: "Who can despise this people that has such women among them? It is not wise to leave one man of them alive, for if any were to be spared they could beguile the whole world" (10:19).

Judith's preparation is now complete. She gathers provisions (kosher food) and departs with her maid for the enemy camp. Let Holofernes beware!

JUDITH GOES OUT TO WAR

Jdt 10:11–13:20

10:11-19 Judith in the enemy camp. In her words to the elders, Judith advised her people to trust in God and to call upon God to help them (8:17). She has already been an example of calling on God in prayer (9:1-14). Now she demonstrates her trust in God. With great courage, alone except for her maid, she leaves her city at night and walks to the Assyrian camp. She has proclaimed in her prayer that God protects the powerless (9:11). Now she puts that word to the test.

Her trust in God is not misplaced. As soon as she meets the guards of the enemy camp, they are overcome by the weapon of God, her beauty (10:14-17). The same victory is won when she meets the crowd of soldiers within the camp (10:18-19).

Judith's words are a masterpiece of irony. She treads lightly through deceit and guile (a true Israelite, indeed!—see Gen 27:36; 30:25-43; 32:28-29). In her prayer, she had already announced her intention to deceive (9:10, 13). An element of truth is consistently present in what she says but cleverly masked throughout. She tells the guard truthfully that she is a daughter of the Hebrews (10:12). She announces that she is fleeing, which is false, but the reason for her flight seems true to everyone but her: the Israelites are about to be delivered up to the Assyrians as prey (10:12). She announces truthfully that she has come to see Holofernes, and the message that she has for him is indeed trustworthy. Those who will be saved from loss of life, however, are not Holofernes' men but her own people (10:13).

The statements of the soldiers are also high irony. They do not know the implication of their words when they tell Judith that by coming to see Holofernes she has saved her life (10:15). She has indeed saved her life, but Holofernes has lost his. The soldiers unwittingly recognize Judith's power. They proclaim that the power of Israel is in women such as she. Women like Judith, they declare, could beguile the whole world (10:19). They are soon to discover how right they are.

10:20–11:23 Judith meets Holofernes. The encounter between Judith, servant of Yahweh, and Holofernes, servant of Nebuchadnezzar, opens with Holofernes reclining on his bed. The scene of Judith's victory over Holofernes will be that same bed. As soon as Holofernes sees Judith, it is evident that she will be successful against him because her beauty strikes Holofernes with amazement.

Their encounter proceeds with two speeches. Holofernes makes the initial statement. At the beginning and end of it, he exhorts Judith to take courage (compare Tob 5:10; 7:17; 11:11) because he presumes she serves Nebuchadnezzar, the king (Jdt 11:1, 3-4). In actual fact, she has already taken courage because she serves the Lord. Holofernes has missed the key point. Judith is courageous and her life is spared because she is a servant of Yahweh, the true king of all the earth (compare 11:1).

Judith's answer to Holofernes, like her speech in chapter 10, is a cunning mixture of truth and deceit. She weaves her message through three topics: the destiny of Holofernes, the message of Achior and its effect on the Israelites, and the deed that she herself will accomplish. She says to Holofernes that if he follows her advice, "God will do the deed perfectly" with him (11:6). Her Lord will not fail in any undertaking (11:6). Holofernes presumes that this means he will be victorious. Precisely the opposite interpretation—that Yahweh will be victorious—is also possible. Judith continues to deceive him when she refers to "the power of him who has sent you to set all creatures aright" (11:7). Holofernes again presumes wrongly that she refers to Nebuchadnezzar.

Judith concludes her treatment of Holofernes' destiny with words of great flattery and turns to the subject of Achior's speech and its effect on the Israelites (11:9-15). Again she begins by telling the truth. She confirms Achior's message that if Israel is guilty (which she knows is not true), then Israel will be punished; then she turns to deceit by reporting the imagined guilt of her people (11:11-15). Her description of their guilt provides a list of the most significant practices of Judaism in the second century: dietary laws, laws regarding first fruits and tithes, laws regarding the sanctuary (see commentary on Tob 1:3-22).

She concludes her speech by declaring her own intentions. It is true, as she says, that God has sent her "to perform with [Holofernes] such deeds that people throughout the world will be astonished on hearing of them" (11:16). She is indeed a God-fearing woman. It is also true that she will set up the judgment seat of Holofernes (11:19), but it is he who will be judged and found worthy of condemnation. She deceives by her report of the truth.

Holofernes and his servants respond to her speech in wonder. Previously they had marveled at her beauty; now they marvel at her wisdom. Holofernes ends the encounter with a speech worthy of Judith. Even though he does not understand the truth, there is truth woven through his words. "God has done well in sending you ahead of your people. . . . You are fair to behold, and your words are well spoken. . . . You shall be renowned throughout the earth" (11:22-23). The battle lines have been drawn.

12:1–13:10 Battle and victory. The conflict between Judith and Holofernes is introduced by the narrator with a series of incidents that demonstrate Judith's piety, even while in the enemy camp (12:1-9). She continues to keep the dietary laws. Holofernes offers her food, but she insists that her mission will be accomplished before her own provisions run out. She continues to depend upon prayer. Every morning before dawn she leaves the camp to beseech God to "direct her way for the triumph of his people" (12:8). She keeps ritual purification. Along with her daily prayer, she bathes in the spring of the camp.

The primary function of these incidents is to demonstrate Judith's piety. They serve two other functions, however. First of all, they further the plot by establishing a regular routine for Judith. When the crucial morning comes, she will need to leave the camp before dawn to avoid being questioned. Her ordinary daily practices provide the means of her escape after Holofernes' death. The second function served by these daily incidents is the creation of suspense. For three days, long enough to establish the routine, Judith bides her time and follows a regular daily schedule. The reader knows that her time is short. On the fifth day Uzziah is bound by oath to surrender the city. The crucial encounter does not come until the last possible day. Trust in Yahweh is pushed to the limit before relief comes.

On the fourth day Holofernes invites Judith to a banquet. The excuse he gives to Bagoas is that Judith will laugh them to scorn if they do not entice her (12:12). Judith's response continues the impression that she is eager to be enticed. She sends the messenger back with the response that the evening's activities will be a joy for her until the day of her death (12:14). As she begins her preparations, however, it soon becomes evident who is enticing whom. She prepares her weapon, her beauty, with care and sallies forth to battle.

The power of her beauty is immediately evident. Holofernes is overcome with desire for her, and because of her charm he drinks a greater quantity of wine than he has ever drunk in a single day in his life. As a result, by the end of the banquet he lies drunk on his bed. The stage is set for the victory. All the other guests have departed. Holofernes and Judith are left alone. Judith is armed; Holofernes is helpless.

Judith begins by turning to God, the source of her power, her hope for victory (13:4-5). She reminds God that she acts for the sake of God's people and God's sanctuary in Jerusalem. She draws Holofernes' own sword, prays for strength, and with all the power that God gives her, she beheads him (13:8). Judith, widow of Israel, servant of Yahweh, has vanquished Holofernes, general in chief of the Assyrian army, servant of Nebuchadnezzar. The Assyrian advance is stopped; the Assyrian victory has been reversed. Nebuchadnezzar, who claimed to be king of all the earth, has been defeated by Yahweh, true Lord of all the earth.

Judith then returns to her normal routine. After she wraps up the head of Holofernes and gives it to her maid, who has been waiting for her, the maid puts the head in the food pouch, and the two go out of the camp together "as they were accustomed to do for prayer" (13:10).

Judith's words throughout this section continue to be ironic. When Holofernes asks her if she has enough food, she replies, "As surely as you, my lord, live, your handmaid will not use up her supplies till the Lord accomplishes by my hand what he has determined" (12:4). As surely as Holofernes lives, this is true. As soon as the Lord accomplishes the victory through her, Holofernes will no longer be alive. There can be no more than five days to wait. When Judith is invited to the banquet, she replies, "Who am I to refuse my lord? Whatever is pleasing to him I will promptly do. This will be a joy for me till the day of my death" (12:14). The misunderstanding turns on the meaning of "my lord." The servant undoubtedly understands her to mean Holofernes; the reader knows that she means Yahweh. Her action will please Yahweh because it will bring about the downfall of Holofernes. It is that action which will be her joy. At the banquet itself, Judith tells Holofernes that she has never enjoyed life as much as on that day. That day will bring victory to her, death to Holofernes.

13:10-20 Liberation proclaimed. Before dawn on the fifth day, Judith announces their liberation to the people of Bethulia. This whole section is built around proclamation and prayer. Judith calls out the news in three statements, each one more specific than the one preceding it. Her statements are answered by two blessings, one by all the people and the second by Uzziah, to which the people answer, "Amen! Amen!"

The parallel structure and the repeated words in Judith's statements and in the responding blessings indicate an underlying poetic base in the original Hebrew. Her first two statements begin with repeated words (vv. 11 and 14; compare Ps 24:7). All three of her statements are rich with parallel structure (vv. 11 and 15). If the blessings by the people and by Uzziah are taken together, they form a threefold beatitude (vv. 17-18). The poetic style is significant. At the moment of victory, both the savior and those saved break forth into praise of God, by whose power they have been victorious. Prose has been sufficient to announce their distress; their deliverance calls for poetic praise of God.

VICTORY

Jdt 14:1–16:25

14:1–15:11 Response to the news of Holofernes' death. After the initial liturgy of rejoicing when Judith proclaims the news of Holofernes' death, several clean-up activities remain to be done. The story of the response to Holofernes' death is set in three scenes: (1) in Bethulia, (2) in the Assyrian camp, and (3) throughout Israel.

In Bethulia, Judith acts as general of the army and leader of the people. She has won the victory by assassinating the enemy's general. What remains is to consolidate the winnings. She gives orders, first of all, to the Jewish men to hang the head of Holofernes on the city wall and then to fake an attack on the Assyrian camp (compare Gideon in Judg 7:16-22). This action will rouse the enemy camp and will bring about the demoralizing discovery of the death of Holofernes.

Secondly, Judith summons Achior the Ammonite, whom Holofernes had sent to share the fate of the Israelites (see 6:10-14). Achior had understood the source of the Israelites' power (see 5:17-21). He had recognized that their victory would be through God alone (5:21). Now, when he sees the head of Holofernes in the hand of one of the Jewish men, he recognizes the manifestation of the power of God. He responds in threefold fashion. Recognizing the presence of God in the victory, he faints (see Gen 32:31; Judg 6:22-23). Recognizing in Judith the instrument of God's power, he falls at her feet in homage and blesses her. Recognizing God's fidelity to the Jews in Judith's account of her visit to the Assyrian camp, he believes in God and joins the house of Israel through faith and circumcision (14:6-10).

Meanwhile, the Assyrian camp responds to the fake attack of the Israelites as Judith had predicted. Observing protocol, the enemy soldiers notify all the proper authorities until the news comes to the tent of Holofernes (14:11-13). Bagoas attempts to rouse Holofernes discreetly, but getting no response, he enters Holofernes' tent, only to find him headless and Judith absent (14:14-17; compare Eglon in Judg 3:24-25). Bagoas proclaims the news to the troops: "A single Hebrew woman has brought disgrace on the house of King Nebuchadnezzar!" The announcement causes complete disarray among the Assyrian troops (14:19–15:3). "No one kept ranks any longer" (15:2, emphasis added). Judith's action has completely ruined the army of Nebuchadnezzar.

Throughout Israel messengers arrive to report the good news and to summon the Israelites to pursue the fleeing Assyrians. From Jerusalem in the south to Damascus in the north and Gilead in the east, the Israelites pursue and eradicate the enemy. The victory is complete; the quantity of booty is enormous (15:4-7).

The high priest Joakim and the elders arrive from Jerusalem to recognize the victory officially. They come to "see for themselves the good things that the Lord had done for Israel and to meet and congratulate Judith" (15:8). They officially recognize God, the source of the victory, and Judith, the instrument of God. They sing another hymn of blessing (15:9-10), to which all the people respond "Amen!"

Their hymn points out succinctly what has been evident throughout the story. Judith, "the Judahite," is a type of the whole people. Her fidelity to God is symbolic of the fidelity of the Jewish people as a whole. Her victory, by her own hand, is the victory of the whole people. God is pleased with her, as with the whole people, and God's blessing is called down upon them all forever. The message for the people of the author's time, the second century, is evident. God will win their deliverance from oppression. What they must do, together and individually, is remain faithful. God may choose the weakest hand among them, even that of a woman, to bring about the victory. But even though the whole people is weak, the victory is not impossible for God.

15:12–16:17 Judith's prayer. Judith's prayer of praise and thanksgiving is set within the victory celebration of the whole people (15:11-12; 16:18-20). Before and after the prayer there is a report of the physical results of victory. Before the prayer the Israelites plunder the Assyrian camp and Judith is given the choicest booty, Holofernes' tent and furnishings. After the prayer all the people go to Jerusalem to worship God and to offer holocausts and gifts. Judith offers God all Holofernes' things that she possesses. The booty hardly passed through her hands. No sooner had she received it than she loaded it on wagons to take to Jerusalem (15:11). This is not a war for personal gain; it is a war for the liberation of God's people. After offering their gifts to God in thanksgiving at the temple, Judith and the people remain in Jerusalem to celebrate for three more months.

The material gains from victory are turned back to God. The spiritual results, the people's joy and exultation, are also returned to God in celebration. The celebration begins in Bethulia with a dance by the women in honor of Judith. Then Judith joins the dance as leader. Finally, the men, dressed in their armor, join the procession singing hymns.

The celebration is reminiscent of other victory celebrations in Israel. When Saul and David returned after David's victory over Goliath, a victory in which God acted through a youth with a slingshot who seemed powerless, the women came out to meet them, singing and dancing, with tambourines and joyful songs (1 Sam 18:6-7). The model for every deliverance, however, and for every victory celebration, is the Exodus. After Israel marched through the sea, a victory over the pursuing Egyptians in which Israel was powerless, "the prophetess Miriam took a tambourine in her hand, while all the women went out after her, dancing with tambourines, and she led all Israel in the victory song" (Exod 15:20-21). Judith's victory over Holofernes is a victory to be compared to that of David over Goliath; the deliverance of her people is comparable to the Israelites' deliverance from slavery in Egypt.

The song of Judith is a hymn built according to the basic structure of that genre. The song opens with a call to praise (16:1) and continues with the reasons for praise (16:2-12). There is a new beginning in verse 13, which is followed by additional reasons for praise (16:13b-16) and a concluding remark on the fate of the wicked (16:17).

The theme of the book is stated in verse 2: "The Lord is God; he crushes warfare" (see 9:8). The statement is a quotation from the Septuagint of Exod 15:3, the victory hymn of Miriam. Judith's song, as well as her victory, is comparable to the corresponding section in the Book of Exodus. After the announcement of a song to the Lord (Jdt 16:1; compare Exod 15:1; Jdt 16:13) and the declaration of Yahweh's power (Jdt 16:2; Exod 15:2-3), each song continues with a description of the powerful enemy and his boasting (Jdt 16:3-4; Exod 15:4-5, 9). In Exodus (15:6, 12), the right hand of the Lord shatters the enemy; in Judith, the Lord confounds the enemy by a woman's hand (16:5). Foreign nations are dismayed at the story (Exod 15:14-16; Jdt 16:10). Each song refers to the power of Yahweh's breath/wind/spirit (Exod 15:8, 10; Jdt 16:14). In the Exodus, the deliverance of the Israelite people by Yahweh when they were utterly helpless is celebrated by a hymn to Yahweh's power. Judith personifies the powerlessness of the people in the face of the Assyrian threat (Jdt 16:5-6, 11-12). The victory that Yahweh accomplishes through her is also celebrated by a hymn to Yahweh's power.

Judith's hymn may also be compared to Deborah's victory song in Judg 5. The situation is similar. In Judg 4 the hero who exhorts the people to have hope is a woman, Deborah; the deliverer who conquers the enemy by cunning is also a woman, Jael. The announcement of a new hymn to be sung to the Lord is found in both (Judg 5:3). The mountains tremble at the power of Yahweh (Judg 5:5; Jdt 16:15). In the midst of each hymn is a song of praise for the woman whose hand Yahweh used to bring deliverance (Judg 5:24-27; Jdt 16:5-9). Each song concludes by contrasting the fate of Yahweh's friends with that of Yahweh's enemies (Judg 5:31; Jdt 16:15b-17). The Book of Judges is built on the premise that Yahweh sends heroes to deliver the people when they cry out for help. The victory of Judith confirms that premise.

The hymn of Judith is called a "new song" (16:1, 13). That phrase is common in the psalms of Yahweh's kingship (see, for example, Psalms 96; 98). Those psalms share a common imagery connected to the autumn feast of Sukkoth (Booths). The references to fire, heat, earthquake, and wind suggest the fall weather pattern of the sirocco (see Pss 97:2-5; 99:1; Jdt 16:14-15, 17; compare also Isa 66:15; Joel 4:15-16). These psalms also describe the great eschatological battle of the nations (see Pss 48:5-8; 98:2; 99:1-3; Joel 4:1-2, 11-12; Isa 66:16, 24; Jdt 16:17). Yahweh has won victory, and will bring the new creation (see Pss 96:11-13; 98:7-9; Isa 66:22-23; Jdt 16:14). The people will rejoice and sing a new song to the name of Yahweh (see Pss 96:1; 98:1; Jdt 16:1, 13). Much of the imagery throughout the Book of Judith reflects the Exodus event and the feast of Passover. The Passover celebration is also suggested by the reference to Nisan (Jdt 2:1). But the siege begins after the end of the harvest (4:5; compare 2:27), a time closer to the feast of Weeks, or Pentecost. The thirty-nine days of siege (7:20, 30) and the thirty days of plundering (15:11) suggest a time for the celebration close to Sukkoth. Judith's victory would then be symbolic of Yahweh's final victory over evil, the preservation of the sanctuary, and the deliverance of the people. Later exegesis, which saw in Judith's beheading of Holofernes a symbolic defeat of the devil, would support this interpretation.

The Vulgate adds a note at the end of the chapter (16:25) concerning the feast day on which Judith's victory is celebrated. There is no such celebration known in the Jewish calendar. In Jewish folklore, however, the story of Judith has been connected with the feast of Hanukkah, the celebration of the purification of the temple at the time of the Maccabees, the time in which the book was written. Thus the Book of Judith has connections to the whole Jewish liturgical year, to Passover, Weeks, Sukkoth, and Hanukkah.

16:21–16:25 Conclusion. The rest of Judith's life is a confirmation of the Deuteronomic theory of retribution. Judith remains faithful beyond the demands of the law, both in life and in death. She honors the memory of her husband Manasseh, although taking a husband would have been acceptable. At her death she frees the maid who shared in her daring exploit and distributes her wealth to her own and her husband's relatives. In reward for her obedience to God in crisis and her fidelity throughout her life, she is prosperous, renowned, and lives to a ripe old age.

The book ends with a statement similar to the ending found in the stories of the judges: During her life and after her death, no one disturbed the Israelites (see Judg 3:11, 30; 5:31; 8:28). This section of the book is clearly reminiscent of Judges. Bagoas' discovery of Holofernes' body is like the discovery of Eglon (see Judg 3:23-25); the Israelites' faked attack is like the action of Gideon (see Judg 7:16-22). Judith herself is modeled in part on Deborah and Jael (Judg 4–5). The message of the Book of Judith is like the pattern of the stories in Judges: (1) the people are in distress; (2) they cry out to Yahweh; (3) Yahweh sends a judge to deliver them; (4) they have peace throughout the lifetime of the judge.

The people of the author's time, who suffered under Seleucid persecution, needed to hear the message of the Book of Judith. The message remains pertinent for us, who face powers of evil beyond our strength. The story of Judith teaches us that the power of God can bring victory even through the most vulnerable. Judith's example exhorts God's people to persevere in hope. Uzziah proclaims: "Blessed are you, Judith, by the Most High God, above all the women on earth . . . . Your deed of hope will never be forgotten by those who tell of the might of God." And all the people answer "Amen! Amen!"

THE NEW TESTAMENT

MATTHEW

Daniel J. Harrington, S.J.

INTRODUCTION

Tradition and newness in tension

Matthew's Gospel has a strongly Jewish flavor. Its special concerns are to place Jesus of Nazareth within the traditions of God's chosen people and to show how this same Jesus burst the bonds of those traditions and brought them to fulfillment. From beginning to end, there is a tension between tradition and newness. Neither pole of the tension is rejected. The interplay between the two generates life and fresh insights.

Matthew takes pains to point out how this or that event in Jesus' life fulfills the prophecies of the Old Testament. All through the account of the passion and death, he assures us that those terrible events conform to God's will as expressed in the Old Testament. Nevertheless, at certain points (see 5:21-48) Jesus seems to contradict or abolish some precepts of the law. He can do so because, as the Son of God, he is the authoritative interpreter of the Jewish tradition.

The identity of Jesus is expressed in terms that have rich Old Testament backgrounds. Jesus is the Son of David, the Messiah or Christ, Wisdom, and so forth. All these titles express aspects of Jesus' identity, but no one of them alone is an adequate description of him. The two most prominent terms are Son of Man and Son of God. The former title reflects Jesus' way of referring to himself and probably has some connection with the heavenly figure of Dan 7. The latter title could be used in the Old Testament with reference to the king (see Pss 2 and 110). When applied to Jesus, however, these titles take on new meaning and go far beyond whatever content may be attributed to them in the Old Testament.

The identity of God's people is also worked out in the tension between tradition and newness. Matthew has no doubt that Israel is God's people, and so a major thrust of his Gospel is to show the continuity between Israel of old and the new thing that God has done in Christ. But after the coming of Jesus, who are God's people and who inherits the kingdom of God? Matthew's answer is simple and straightforward: Those who follow Jesus are God's people. Attachment to Jesus the Jew makes membership in God's people possible even for those who are not Jewish by birth (see 21:41, 43). Those Jews who do not accept this new definition of God's people are said to belong to "their synagogues" (see 4:23; 9:35; 10:17; 12:9; 13:54), which are also called the synagogues of the hypocrites (6:2; 23:6, 34).

Sources and structure

When the person whom we call Matthew determined to write about Jesus, he decided to write a Gospel—a literary form something like a biography. Though surely not a biography in the nineteenth- or twentieth-century use of the term, Matthew's Gospel does follow the story of Jesus of Nazareth from his birth, through his public activity as a preacher and a healer, up to his death and resurrection. Matthew could have written a long letter or a poem or a chronological report of the events in Jesus' life; instead, he chose to write a narrative about Jesus. His Gospel is a collection of stories that portray Jesus as a powerful and living person. By means of these vivid stories we are invited to become part of the story of Jesus, the Son of Man and the Son of God.

Matthew did not compose the Gospel entirely out of his own imagination and experience. He appears to have had at his disposal several written sources. In chapters 3–4 and 12–28 he drew heavily on Mark's Gospel. Mark wrote before Matthew did, and so it is fair to call Matthew's Gospel a revised and greatly expanded version of Mark's Gospel. Furthermore, in about two hundred verses Matthew and Luke are so much alike that it is reasonable to assume that both evangelists made independent use of a common source. This source was a collection of Jesus' sayings that circulated in Greek in the fifties of the first century A.D. This source used by Matthew and Luke is usually designated by the letter Q (from the German word for "source," Quelle). Finally, Matthew had access to sayings and stories that no other evangelist had. This material peculiar to Matthew's Gospel is often designated by the letter M.

The fact that Matthew depended very much on existing material indicates that his story of Jesus is deliberately traditional. But in addition to handing on the traditions about Jesus, Matthew also interpreted these traditions in order to bring out certain aspects and to speak to certain problems that the Christian community of his time faced. Perhaps his most original literary contribution was the general structure that he imposed on the story of Jesus. Since Matthew was telling the story of Jesus, he was clearly obligated to follow the pattern provided by the life of Jesus. Since he had access to Mark's Gospel, he could not disregard entirely the outline of Jesus' life provided by it. Q was simply a collection of sayings, and so the evangelist had more freedom in using it.

What structure does Matthew's story of Jesus take? The most obvious features are the beginning and end of the Gospel. Mark's story of Jesus began with Jesus' adult years, but Matthew in chapters 1–2 goes back to his birth and infancy. Mark's story ends with the death of Jesus and the discovery of the empty tomb in Jerusalem. Matthew in chapters 26–28 follows Mark very closely, but he adds the story of Jesus' appearance to the eleven disciples in Galilee (28:16-20). Between chapters 1–2 and 26–28, Matthew presents five major speeches by Jesus: the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5–7), the missionary discourse (ch. 10), the parables discourse (ch. 13), the advice to a divided community (ch. 18), and the eschatological discourse (chs. 24–25). We must not assume that these five speeches are exact transcriptions of sermons given by Jesus on five occasions; rather, everything about them indicates that Matthew has constructed the speeches out of traditional materials and imposed upon them their present literary structures. Matthew was obviously very interested in Jesus' teaching and went to great lengths to highlight it.

The five speeches of Jesus are an important structural principle in the Gospel, and they are separated from one another by large blocks of narrative material. When we look at the Gospel as a whole, the following general outline emerges:

1:1–2:23	The genealogy and itinerary of Jesus
3:1–4:25	The beginning of Jesus' ministry
5:1–7:29	The Sermon on the Mount
8:1–9:38	The powerful deeds of Jesus
10:1-42	The missionary discourse
11:1–12:50	The importance of Jesus and the rejection of him
13:1-53	The parables concerning the kingdom of God
13:54–16:4	Miracles and controversies
16:5–17:27	The way to the cross
18:1-35	Advice to a divided community
19:1–23:39	Growing opposition to Jesus
24:1–25:46	The coming of the kingdom
26:1–28:20	The death and resurrection of Jesus

Authorship and historical setting

Originality of authorship was not an important value in the culture in which the Gospel of Matthew was written. The title "According to Matthew" was most likely not part of the first edition of the text, and no explicit claim is made in the Gospel that its author was an eyewitness to the events described in it. The Gospel is basically an anonymous composition. But calling the Gospel "anonymous" does not mean that we know nothing about the author. The evangelist was a Christian who was well versed in Jewish methods of teaching, living in Syria or some other area in which Jewish influence was strong, around A.D. 85. He sought to show that those who acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah will inherit the kingdom of God.

The traditional ascription of the Gospel to Matthew the tax collector (see 9:9) who became an apostle (see 10:3) generates more problems than it solves. Why is the same tax collector named Levi, the son of Alphaeus, in Mark 2:14? How did a tax collector, living on the fringes of Jewish religious life, produce such a religiously sophisticated Gospel? Why did an eyewitness depend on written sources like Mark and Q, and never put forward the claim that he saw this or that take place? Perhaps the church for which the Gospel was written took the apostle Matthew as its "patron saint." Or perhaps the apostle Matthew was responsible for some of the special material (M) in the Gospel.

The tradition of the existence of an Aramaic or Hebrew version of Matthew also generates more problems than it solves. The church historian Eusebius quotes the early Christian writer Papias to the effect that Matthew collected the "oracles" in the Hebrew languages and then others translated or interpreted them. Does this statement refer to the completed Gospel, or to the Old Testament quotations used in it, or to the sayings of Jesus? Why does Papias say Hebrew, when Jesus spoke Aramaic? Did Papias have any special reasons for placing Matthew's Gospel before Mark's? All these questions indicate that the ascription to Matthew the apostle and the tradition of an Aramaic or Hebrew version of Matthew involve too many problems for us to place much reliance on them in interpreting the Gospel.

Matthew's Gospel was put into final form around A.D. 85, perhaps in Antioch of Syria. That means that the Christian community had existed for about fifty years since Jesus' death, and about fifteen years since the Jerusalem temple had been destroyed in A.D. 70. This dating is based to a large extent on what appears to be a partial description of the events of A.D. 70 in 22:7: "The king was enraged and sent his troops, destroyed those murderers, and burned their city." Other possible allusions to the destruction of Jerusalem occur in 21:41 and 27:25.

The Matthean community was a mixed group, but the majority apparently were Jewish Christians. By A.D. 85 it had become clear that not all Israel was going to accept Jesus as the Messiah of Jewish expectations and that non-Jews represented a very promising missionary field (see 28:19). Matthew was encouraging a largely Jewish-Christian community to recognize itself as the legitimate heir of God's promises to Israel. He also wished them to broaden their missionary horizons to include the Gentiles. Antioch in Syria would have been an appropriate location, but there is no absolute certainty on this matter.

This commentary

The following commentary on the Gospel of Matthew aims to explain clearly and simply what the evangelist whom we call Matthew was trying to say to his first readers. It pays particular attention to the literary structures and the theological concerns of the passages. Since the readers of this commentary live in a world that differs greatly from that of the original readers of the Gospel, historical information and explanations about cultural presuppositions are also supplied. The goal of the expositions is to allow twentieth-century readers to share more deeply in the excitement that the Gospel of Matthew must have inspired among its first readers.

COMMENTARY

I. THE GENEALOGY AND ITINERARY OF JESUS

Matt 1:1–2:23

1:1-17 The genealogy of Jesus the Messiah (see Luke 3:23-38). The genealogy at the beginning of the Gospel establishes Jesus' place within the Jewish tradition. Jesus is the son of Abraham and of David as well as the continuation of David's line after the exile of 587 B.C.E. The names in the genealogy up to Abiud in verse 13 are found in the Old Testament, and here they are arranged in three sets of fourteen names each (v. 17). Israel's history is traced from its beginning with Abraham (v. 2), through its high point with King David (v. 6) and its low point in the Babylonian Exile (v. 11), to its fulfillment in Jesus the Messiah (v. 16). Luke emphasizes Jesus' universal significance by tracing his lineage back from Joseph to Adam (see Luke 3:23-38), but Matthew is concerned with rooting Jesus of Nazareth in the heritage of God's chosen people, Israel.

The literary flow of the genealogy is disturbed by the inclusion of the names of four women. Not only is the occurrence of women's names in a Jewish genealogy unusual, but what is known about them from the Old Testament makes their appearance all the more surprising. Tamar (v. 3) disguised herself as a prostitute and conceived her sons by Judah, her father-in-law (see Gen 38). Rahab (v. 5) was a prostitute of Jericho whose life was spared on account of her collaboration with Joshua's spies (see Josh 2; 6). The tradition that she was the mother of Boaz is found only in Matthew's Gospel. Ruth (v. 5) was a Moabite who joined herself to Israel through her husband's family (see Ruth). The "wife of Uriah" (v. 6) was Bathsheba; King David shamefully arranged her husband's death in battle and took her as a wife (2 Sam 11).

The appearance of these four unusual women in the genealogy of the Messiah prepares for the surprising birth of Jesus in verses 18-25. Just as their inclusion breaks the genealogical pattern of "A became the father of B" and just as what is known about them from the Scriptures indicates some kind of irregularity, so the birth of Jesus breaks the traditional pattern (v. 16) and is highly irregular. Thus, the genealogy of Jesus in Matt 1:1-17 goes in two directions: It stresses the continuity of Jesus with the great figures of God's people ("son of Abraham . . . son of David"), and it also prepares for the very irregular and indeed unique birth narrated in the following passage.

1:18-25 The birth of Jesus (see Luke 2:1-7). The story of Jesus' birth is really an extension of the genealogy. Its primary concern is Jesus' right to a place in the messianic genealogy through Joseph, and its climax comes in Joseph's resolve to make Jesus a Davidic child by assuming the legal obligations of paternity. The tension between continuity with the Jewish tradition (legal paternity through Joseph) and the sharp break with tradition (the miraculous conception of Jesus) develops the basic theme already raised in the genealogy.

Engagement or betrothal in Jewish society of Jesus' time involved a much stronger commitment than it does in modern Western society. The description of Joseph's embarrassment and his plans in verses 18-19 may presume his suspicion that Mary had been raped or seduced. As a devout observer of the Old Testament law, Joseph could not take Mary as his wife (see Deut 22:23-27). Not wishing to subject Mary to the shameful trial of the woman suspected of adultery (Num 5:11-31), he decided to forgo the public procedure and took upon himself the responsibility for the divorce. Divorce proceedings were carried out, not in a law court, but rather on the initiative of the male (see Deut 24:1).

Joseph's plans are interrupted in verses 20-23 by the appearance of a messenger from God in a dream—a device familiar from the Old Testament account of the birth of Samson (Judg 13). The angel's message assumes the virginal conception of Jesus by the Holy Spirit and concentrates on the names of the Messiah. As the legal son of Joseph, Jesus will be named the "Son of David" (v. 20). His given name is Jesus, which is related to the Hebrew verb for "save." This name is entirely appropriate because, in Matthew's perspective and in the faith of all the early Christians, Jesus saved the people of God from their sins. The third name applied to Jesus appears in the citation from Isa 7:14: "and they shall name him Emmanuel." As a sign to King Ahaz and his royal court, the prophet Isaiah had announced that a certain woman would bear a son. The early Christians took the Greek translation of "young woman" as "virgin" to confirm their belief in the virginal conception of Jesus. But Matthew may have been more interested in the child's name "Emmanuel." In Hebrew, "Emmanuel" means "God with us," and this expresses the significance of Jesus for Matthew and the early church. A similar note is struck in the final verse of the Gospel: "And behold, I am with you always, until the end of the age" (28:20).

The dream allayed Joseph's fears. Not only had Mary not been raped or seduced, but this child has been conceived by the Holy Spirit and deserves the names Son of David, Jesus, and Emmanuel. Joseph acts in accordance with the divine communication and takes Mary to be his wife (v. 24). The statement in verse 25 that he did not have sexual relations with her before the birth of Jesus neither affirms nor denies the perpetual virginity of Mary.

The whole of Matt 1:1-25 serves both to situate Jesus firmly within God's people and to call attention to his extraordinary status. On the one hand, he is the descendant of Abraham and David and the fulfillment of the promises and hopes attached to those great Old Testament figures. On the other hand, the mode of his birth is highly unusual, and the names given to him—Jesus and Emmanuel—suggest that he far surpasses any of his ancestors.

2:1-12 Wise men worship Jesus at Bethlehem. Each of the four episodes in chapter 2 revolves around a place name: Bethlehem, Egypt, Ramah, and Nazareth. Jesus was known as a Galilean (see John 7:41-42) from the town of Nazareth. The four scenes in the chapter explain how Jesus the Son of David was born in Bethlehem, how he was taken to Egypt in order to avoid the threat of death, why he did not return to Bethlehem, and how Nazareth came to be his home. Each episode includes an Old Testament quotation that contains the name of a place. This appeal to the Old Testament indicates that the Messiah's itinerary was guided by the will of God.

After situating the place of Jesus' birth in Bethlehem and its date late in the reign of King Herod the Great (37–4 B.C.E.), the first episode introduces wise men from the East who possess astronomical and astrological knowledge. The "star" that they observed may have been the conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn. There may also be a reference to speculations based on Num 24:17 ("A star shall advance from Jacob") that connected the Messiah's birth with the appearance of a star.

Efforts at identifying the star should not divert attention from the more central concerns of the passage. The threefold occurrence of "do him homage" in verses 2, 8, 11 expresses the basic theme, and the contrast between the Magi and Herod (and those on his side) is developed in the course of the story.

In response to the imperfect revelation given in the star, the Gentile wise men come to worship Jesus. But they need to learn from the Jewish Scriptures that the Messiah is to be born in Bethlehem (vv. 5-6). They proceed to Bethlehem and worship the infant Messiah. From the three kinds of gifts listed in verse 11, the tradition of three wise men developed in the fifth century; in the eighth century the three were given names.

The faith of the Gentile wise men stands in contrast to the cynical cunning of Herod. As an Idumean whose Judaism was suspect, Herod would naturally fear all Jewish messianic movements as threats to his political power. Even though he had access to the Scriptures and could see plainly what the prophet Micah (see Mic 5:1; 2 Sam 5:2) had said about the place of the Messiah's birth, Herod was not willing to worship the newborn king. The episode of the wise men reflects the early church's experience of the Gentiles' readiness to accept the gospel and the disappointing slowness of all Israel to receive it. It also prepares for the recognition of Jesus as King of the Jews (Matt 27:11, 29, 37) and for the universal mission of the disciples (Matt 8:11-12; 28:18-20).

2:13-15 The flight into Egypt. The structure of the story of the flight into Egypt is similar to that of the birth story in 1:18-25. It consists of the angel's appearance to Joseph in a dream, a command and the reason for the command, Joseph's determination to carry out the command, and a quotation from the Old Testament.

Egypt was a common place of refuge for Jews of this time, and only after the death of Herod in 4 B.C.E. was it safe for Jesus to return to Palestine. The quotation from Hos 11:1 ("Out of Egypt I called my son") places this part of the Messiah's itinerary within the framework of God's will. It not only identifies Jesus as the Son of God, but it also suggests that he is the personification of the people of God. Just as God called Israel of old out of Egypt in order to create a special people for himself, so he calls Jesus out of Egypt into the land of Israel in order to create a new people (see Matt 21:41, 43). The principle of continuity between the old people and the new people is Jesus the Jew.

2:16-18 The slaughter of children in Judea. Although the slaughter of innocent male children two years and under is consistent with Herod's ruthlessness in defending his throne during the last years of his reign, there is no record of this event in any ancient source outside of Matthew's Gospel. The quotation from Jer 31:15 focuses on Ramah, a place about five miles north of Jerusalem. Ramah was the place where Rachel, the wife of Jacob, died; it was also the place where the Jews in the sixth century B.C.E. gathered for their march into the Babylonian exile.

Herod's savage action is a repetition of Pharaoh's slaughter of the Israelite children in Egypt (Exod 1:15-22). Indeed, this episode and the preceding ones seem to suppose a reversal of the Exodus story: Jesus is taken to Egypt for his own safety, and the king of Jerusalem represents unbelief and hardness of heart. Herod acts as the enemy of God's people represented by the newborn Messiah. The Old Testament passage explains Herod's action as consistent with God's will but does not condone or justify it.

2:19-23 Jesus' arrival in Nazareth. After Herod's death in 4 B.C.E., his kingdom was divided among his sons. Archelaus ruled Judea, Samaria, and Idumea from 4 B.C.E. to A.D. 6. The story of how Jesus got to Nazareth follows a now familiar pattern: the angel's appearance to Joseph in a dream, a command and the reason for it (see Exod 4:19), Joseph's determination to carry out the command, and a quotation from the Old Testament. The precise source of the quotation is not certain; the texts most often cited as possible sources are Judg 13:5, 7 and Isa 11:1. At any rate, the episode explains why Jesus was connected with Nazareth and why he began his public ministry in Galilee.

The tension between the continuity with the Jewish tradition and the new act of God in Jesus that was so prominent in Matt 1:1-25 also emerges in chapter 2. Each point in the Messiah's itinerary is grounded in a quotation from the Old Testament, and the individual episodes contain phrases and characters reminiscent of certain biblical passages. On the other hand, the Gentile wise men come to worship the newborn king of the Jews while Herod does everything in his power to destroy him. The future of the people of God seems to rest with Jesus of Nazareth—the Son of God who has been called from Egypt to live and work and die in the land of God's own people.

II. THE BEGINNING OF JESUS' MINISTRY

Matt 3:1–4:25

3:1-12 John's preparation for Jesus (see Mark 1:2-8; Luke 3:1-18; John 1:19-28). In the summary of the preaching of John the Baptist, material from the Markan and the Q sources has been used. Matthew's most important contribution comes at the very beginning (v. 2), where John's preaching is summarized in exactly the same words as Jesus' preaching is summarized in 4:17: "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Both preachers demand a radical conversion of the whole person to God, and both urge it as preparation for the new age when the God of Israel will be acknowledged as the Lord by all creation. That time is very close at hand.

The first part of the material about John the Baptist (vv. 1-6) makes John's activity a part of the momentous and eventful time of Jesus ("in those days") and locates him in the wilderness of Judea—the area in which the community that has given us the Dead Sea scrolls had its center. The relation of John to Jesus is explained by the quotation from Isa 40:3: John's preaching in the wilderness prepares the way for Jesus. The description of John's haircloth and belt in verse 4 reminds the reader of the prophet Elijah's clothing as described in 2 Kgs 1:8. John cultivates the prophet's lifestyle and can be aptly described as the new Elijah (see Matt 11:14; 17:11-13). The Jewish historian Josephus (Antiquities 18:116-119) confirms that John drew large crowds for his exhortations to justice and piety. He describes John's ritual of baptism as a symbolic action signifying that conversion of heart had taken place.

In verses 7-10 John's preaching is directed to members of two Jewish groups ("the Pharisees and Sadducees") that will furnish unbelieving opposition to Jesus throughout the Gospel. They are warned to reform their lives as a preparation for the decisive intervention of God ("the coming wrath"). They are warned not to rely on their Jewish descent ("Abraham as our father") to protect them. The references to "children" and "stones" probably reflect a play on two very similar Aramaic (or Hebrew) words. Finally, they are warned that the time is short ("the ax lies at the root"). In the coming time of judgment prior to the fullness of God's kingdom, it is the fruit of good deeds that will count. John's stress on repentance, action now, and "bearing fruit" in good deeds foreshadows Jesus' instructions to his own disciples.

The second sample of John's preaching (vv. 11-12) subordinates John to Jesus. In this context "the one who is coming after me" must be Jesus. In verse 11 John protests that he is not even worthy to act as the slave of Jesus by carrying his sandals, and he contrasts his own symbolic water-baptism with the immersion in the Holy Spirit and the refining fire of judgment that will complete Jesus' proclamation of God's kingdom. The traditional image of the last judgment as a harvest is used in verse 12. The judgment will separate the good ("wheat") from the bad ("chaff"); it is very near.

Whatever the historical relationship may have been between John the Baptist and Jesus (and their followers), Matthew and the other New Testament writers took care to draw John into the circle of Jesus' influence and to subordinate him to Jesus. Far from contradicting Jesus, John preaches precisely the same things: conversion of heart, the coming of God's kingdom, and bearing fruit in good deeds. Far from engaging in a rivalry with Jesus, John makes it clear from the start how much the person and baptism of Jesus surpassed him and his baptism. John the Baptist emerges as a faithful "Christian" preacher! His warnings have relevance not only to the Pharisees and Sadducees but also to Christians.

3:13-17 The baptism of Jesus (see Mark 1:9-11; Luke 3:21-22). That Jesus was baptized by John is undoubtedly a historical fact. According to the Gospel accounts, Jesus received from John a baptism connected with the forgiveness of sins. It is inconceivable that the early Christians, who held Jesus in such high esteem, would have invented a story in which Jesus received something from John and that this reception would involve the baptism of repentance (see Matt 3:2, 6, 8, 11).

Indeed, the early church's embarrassment at Jesus' having been baptized by John is reflected in the dialogue found only in Matt 3:14-15. John demonstrates his humility and reveals his prophetic insight that Jesus is the "one to come." Jesus' first words in the Gospel are a request that he be baptized by John because this is in accord with God's will; it must be done in order to fulfill the divine plan. Thus Matthew explains how Jesus the sinless one could have received a baptism of repentance.

Jesus' emergence from the waters of the Jordan (vv. 16-17) is accompanied by several extraordinary, supernatural phenomena with long and rich Old Testament backgrounds. With the opening of the sky, the separation between heaven and earth is broken through (see Ezek 1:1; Isa 64:1). The descent of the Holy Spirit "like a dove" recalls the activity of the Spirit of God in the creation (see Gen 1:2). The voice from heaven describes Jesus in phrases taken from various Old Testament passages (Gen 22:2; Ps 2:7; Isa 42:1). The story reaches its climax in the identification of Jesus as the Son of God.

The theories that the events following the baptism occurred as a private vision granted to Jesus and that only then did Jesus become conscious of his divine sonship have no foundation in Matthew's account. The public character of the signs in verses 16-17 and the message referring to Jesus in the third person ("This is . . .") leave no doubt that, for Matthew, these events could have been experienced by onlookers. Matthew's primary concern is to show that at the very beginning of Jesus' public ministry he is publicly acknowledged as the Son of God. This in turn makes clear the significance of everything that Jesus will do in the course of that ministry. His is the ministry of God's own Son. A new age under the power of God has begun, and in it all the plans of God will be fulfilled.

4:1-11 The testing of God's Son (see Mark 1:12-13; Luke 4:1-13). The theme of Jesus as the Son of God that is so prominent in the baptism account is developed in the story of the temptation. The passage is best entitled the "testing of God's Son," because the first two tests are introduced by the phrase "if you are the Son of God." The tests and Jesus' responses to them show what kind of Messiah and Son of God he really is. The setting in the desert (v. 1) and the use of the number "forty" (v. 2) suggest a contrast between ancient Israel and Jesus. During its wandering in the wilderness after the escape from Egypt, ancient Israel was tested and found wanting. Where ancient Israel failed, Jesus now triumphs.

Mark's narrative of the testing of Jesus (Mark 1:12-13) contains only two verses, but Matt 4:1-11 and Luke 4:1-13 provide a lengthy debate in which the devil presents three tests and Jesus answers with three quotations from the Book of Deuteronomy. After forty days and nights of fasting, Jesus would be very hungry. So the first test (vv. 3-4) is the temptation to change stones into bread in order to feed himself. Jesus takes his reply from Deut 8:3: The Son of God is fed by the word of God, not by bread alone.

The second test (vv. 5-7) involves Jesus' being taken up to the highest point on the wall surrounding the Jerusalem temple. There he is tempted to throw himself down and call on God for aid, thus fulfilling Ps 91:11-12. Jesus takes his reply this time from Deut 6:16: The Son of God does not put his Father to such foolish and magical tests.

The third test (vv. 7-10) promises all the kingdoms of the world to Jesus if he will offer worship to the devil. Jesus' reply is taken from Deut 6:13: The Son of God offers worship only to his heavenly Father.

What kind of a Son of God is Jesus? His conduct during the three tests makes it clear that he does not seek to satisfy his own material needs, to make a miraculous display of his status and power, or to enter into partnership with the devil for the sake of political authority. Jesus emerges as totally obedient to the will of his Father, especially as that will is expressed in the words of the Old Testament Scriptures. His attitude provides a model for Christians who may be tempted to pay too much attention to material goods, to provoke God, or to seek influence and wealth without regard for justice and morality. Having personally withstood the assaults of Satan on these matters, Jesus is able to free others from their tyranny.

4:12-17 Preaching God's kingdom (see Mark 1:14-15; Luke 4:14-15). After being identified publicly as the Son of God in the baptism account (3:13-17) and after proving what kind of Son of God he is (4:1-11), Jesus journeys from Judea to Galilee in order to begin his public ministry (4:12-17). Unlike Mark (see Mark 1:14-15), Matthew feels obligated to explain in some detail why the Messiah should exercise his ministry in Galilee rather than in Jerusalem and Judea. John's arrest by Herod Antipas (a son of Herod the Great) and the danger that spelled for Jesus were not sufficient reasons for this move. As was the case in Matt 2:1-23, geography is explained in light of the Scriptures: Jesus' Galilean ministry is in accord with the words of Isa 9:1-2, and thus in accord with God's will.

The substance of Jesus' preaching is summarized in Matt 4:17: "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." The same message was attributed to John the Baptist in 3:2. The first part of the message contains the command calling for a complete conversion and reorientation of life. The second part supplies the reason for the command: The definitive display of God's power and judgment and the establishment of his rule over all creation are near. In fact, as we will see, the ultimate victory of God is being inaugurated in the ministry of his Son.

4:18-22 The call of four fishermen (see Mark 1:16-20; Luke 5:1-11). Matthew's story of the call of the first disciples is very similar to Mark 1:16-20. In the overall plan of Matthew's Gospel, it introduces three of the disciples who will form Jesus' inner circle among the Twelve: Peter, James, and John. It also prepares for the presence of the disciples at the Sermon on the Mount (5:1) and for the promise to Peter (16:17-19). Jewish teachers did not usually call their own disciples; rather, prospective disciples sought out a teacher with a good reputation for learning and holiness. This account emphasizes the extraordinary attractiveness and magnetism of Jesus.

The first disciples encountered Jesus in their everyday occupation of fishing in the Sea of Galilee—then as now, an important and profitable business in Israel's economy. Without any preparation and with little or no deliberation, they leave behind their business and their families in order to follow Jesus. Discipleship is first and foremost being with Jesus, and the quick response of the first disciples ("at once" according to verses 20, 22) suggests how appealing the invitation to be with Jesus must have been. But discipleship also involves sharing in the mission of Jesus ("fishers of men" according to verse 19), and that dimension too is stressed from the very beginning.

4:23-25 A summary of Jesus' activities (see Mark 1:39; Luke 4:44). Almost every word in the summary of Jesus' preaching, teaching, and healing activities is found in some passage in Mark (see Mark 1:39; 1:28; 3:10; 3:7-8). Although Jesus' activity is confined to the region of Galilee, word of it spreads to the whole province of Syria. The outward movement of Jesus' reputation as a teacher and healer results in the movement of many people toward him. People suffering from all kinds of diseases are brought to him, and they are cured (v. 24). People from every region of Israel except Samaria join the crowds that follow him (v. 25). Such people, along with the disciples, form the audience for the Sermon on the Mount (see 5:1; 7:28).

By way of preparation for the Sermon on the Mount, Matthew has established Jesus' superiority to John the Baptist (3:1-12), recounted the divine acknowledgement of Jesus as the Son of God (3:13-17), and shown what kind of Son of God Jesus is (4:1-11). He has also explained why Jesus taught and healed in Galilee (4:12-17) and how he attracted an inner circle of disciples (4:18-22) and a larger circle of interested followers (4:23-25). The Sermon on the Mount (5:1–7:29) will reveal what a powerful teacher Jesus is.

III. THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT

Matt 5:1–7:29

The Sermon on the Mount is the first of Jesus' five major speeches in the Gospel. It is obviously related to the Sermon on the Plain in Luke 6:20-49 but is more than three times as long. Matthew has gathered together traditional sayings and shaped them into an epitome of Jesus' teaching. The basic thesis of the Sermon is stated in 5:20: "Unless your righteousness surpasses that of the scribes and Pharisees, you will not enter into the kingdom of God."

The introductory section (5:1-20) describes those who are blessed (5:3-12), the role of the disciples (5:13-16), and the role of Jesus (5:17-19). The second major section (5:21-48) contrasts the holiness or righteousness of the experts in the interpretation of the Old Testament law ("the scribes") and the better holiness or righteousness taught by Jesus. The third section (6:1-18) warns against the purely external holiness cultivated by groups like the Pharisees, and the fourth section (6:19–7:29) furnishes more advice for Christians in their pursuit of holiness.

The teachings contained in the Sermon on the Mount have been interpreted in many different ways: principles of Christian ethics, counsels of perfection, ideals that are impossible to practice, and so forth. For Matthew, these teachings are the directives of Jesus the Messiah and Son of God, whose authority far surpasses that of every other teacher (see 7:29). They are presented as a sample of Jesus' basic demands made on his disciples and as an expression of Christian values. They presuppose the personal experience of Jesus and the good news of God's coming kingdom, and thus they offer practical advice on how to respond to Jesus and his preaching.

5:1-2 The setting. The site for the Sermon is a mountainside, presumably in Galilee. In the Bible and in other religious literatures, the mountain is frequently a privileged place for revelations of or from God. The fact that Jesus' first extensive block of teaching is set on a mountainside gives it special importance. The audience for the Sermon has already been introduced. It certainly contains the disciples chosen by Jesus (4:18-22). It also includes some of the crowd (4:23-25), as both the beginning (5:1) and the end (7:28) of the Sermon indicate. The Sermon is intended for a wider audience than the inner circle of Jesus' followers.

5:3-12 The beatitudes (see Luke 6:20-23). The beatitudes declare "blessed" or "happy" some surprising people. The beatitude is a literary form common in the Old Testament book of Psalms. There persons or groups are declared to be blessed or happy (see Pss 1:1; 32:1-2; 41:1; 65:4; 84:4-5; 106:3; 112:1; 128:1), and sometimes the reason for the declaration is supplied. The Matthean beatitudes differ from the Old Testament models in their references to the coming kingdom of God and to the reversal of human values that accompanies it. The four beatitudes in Luke 6:20-23 are commonly thought to reflect the form ("Blessed are you . . .") and the content (blessings on the poor, the hungry, the weeping, and the persecuted) of Jesus' preaching more closely than the Matthean beatitudes do. Matthew's version tends to spiritualize ("poor in spirit" . . . "hunger and thirst for righteousness") and contains further beatitudes that do not add appreciably to the content of Luke's version.

The first set of beatitudes (vv. 3-6) proclaims as happy the poor in spirit (those whose condition demands total trust in God), the sorrowing (see Isa 61:2-3), the meek (see Ps 37:11), and those who hunger and thirst for righteousness (those whose central task in life is the fulfillment of God's will). Their happiness is largely future, but it also extends into the present time. By living out the values of the kingdom of heaven here and now, they anticipate and share the happiness that a fuller form of life with God will bring. God is the source of all their happiness.

The second set of beatitudes (vv. 7-10) also climaxes with a reference to righteousness, just as the first set did (see v. 6). Here a blessing is pronounced upon the merciful, the honest (see Ps 24:3-4), the agents of peace, and those who suffer on account of their search for righteousness. They too are promised future happiness from God. The final beatitude in verses 11-12 (see Luke 6:22-23) develops the theme of persecution for the sake of Jesus and relates this to the persecution suffered by certain Old Testament prophets.

5:13-16 The role of the disciples (see Mark 9:50; Luke 14:34-35). The role of the followers of Jesus is expressed by the images of salt and light. In Jesus' time, salt was used not only to improve the taste of food but also to preserve meat and fish. When Jesus compares his followers to salt (v. 13), he says that they improve the quality of human existence and preserve it from destruction. In Jesus' time, the only lamps available were small dish-like devices in which oil was burned. By our standards these lamps did not give off much light, but in the time before electricity their light must have seemed very bright. When Jesus calls his disciples the light of the world (vv. 14-15), he says that their actions serve as a beacon of light in a dark world. The disciples are challenged to let their light shine (v. 16) as a witness to their fidelity to Jesus and his heavenly Father.

5:17-20 The role of Jesus. The role of Jesus is treated with reference to the Old Testament, or rather, the Old Testament is treated with reference to Jesus. Jesus came to reveal the true meaning of the Old Testament, to express what the law and the prophets wished to say, and thus to bring it to fulfillment (v. 17). The saying in verse 18 appeals to the Jewish idea that the law is eternal, or at least that it remains in force "until all things have taken place" (the fullness of God's kingdom, or perhaps the death and resurrection of Jesus). In its context in the Sermon on the Mount, "these commandments" in the third saying (v. 19) may refer to Jesus' own instructions rather than to the precepts of the Old Testament. Jesus appears as the authoritative interpreter of the Jewish tradition, the one who is able to bring to light its most profound aspects. The final saying (v. 20) demands that Jesus' disciples surpass the scribes and Pharisees in seeking righteousness; otherwise they cannot enter God's kingdom. This saying states the basic thesis of the entire Sermon and gives structure to the various sayings contained in the three remaining sections.

5:21-26 Murder and anger. The second part of the Sermon (5:21-48) contrasts the scribes' ideal of holiness based on the literal reading of Scripture and Jesus' more radical and demanding teaching. This contrast is carried out by means of six antitheses in which the words of the Old Testament ("You have heard") are placed beside the sayings of Jesus ("But I say to you"). The antitheses illustrate how Jesus came to "fulfill" the law and the prophets by explaining the meaning of the Old Testament commandments at their deepest levels. In some cases, the biblical precept is extended in order to get at the root disposition beneath the forbidden action. In other cases, the precept itself is pushed so far as to be effectively repealed or superseded. Sayings on topics having some connection with the subject matter of the six antitheses are also included.

The first antithesis (vv. 21-26) concerns the prohibition against murder (Exod 20:13; Deut 5:17). Jesus' followers cannot be satisfied with merely avoiding the act of murder but must also curb the anger and the insults that lead to murder. The three courts or places of judgment mentioned in verse 22 (judgment or the local court, the Sanhedrin, the fiery Gehenna) would normally be connected with trying a case of murder, but here they are related to anger. The point is that anger should be taken as seriously as murder is. Two illustrations of putting away anger and being reconciled to others are provided in verses 23-26. The first instance (vv. 23-24) suggests that reconciliation may even take precedence over participating in worship at the temple, and the second instance (vv. 25-26) warns against letting a dispute go so far as to end up in court, where the judgment could go against one.

5:27-30 Adultery and lust. The second antithesis demands that lust as the root cause of adultery (Exod 20:14; Deut 5:18) be avoided. The mention of the lustful look in verse 28 is developed by means of the sayings about the right eye (v. 29) and the right hand (v. 30) being occasions of sin (see Matt 18:8-9). The salvation of the whole person is of more value than the preservation of any one part that may lead to sin.

5:31-32 Divorce. The antithesis concerning divorce seems to repeal or reject the permission and procedure found in Deut 24:1. According to Jesus, divorce is not allowed (see Luke 16:18; 1 Cor 7:10-11; Mark 10:2-12; Matt 19:3-12). The Matthean versions of Jesus' teachings on divorce include some kind of exception: "unless the marriage is unlawful" (5:32; 19:9). The Greek word is porneia, which refers to some sort of sexual misconduct or irregularity. In Acts 15:20, 29 porneia has to do with marriages contracted within the degrees of kinship forbidden by Lev 18:6-18, and thus technically incestuous unions. These exceptive clauses were probably intended to deal with members of the Matthean community who were already in such irregular marriages before they became Christians.

5:33-37 Oaths. The antithesis regarding oaths also seems to go so far beyond the Old Testament prohibition against swearing falsely (Lev 19:12; Num 30:2; Deut 23:21) as to do away with it entirely. At a time when oaths and vows were proliferating in Judaism, Jesus recommends that his disciples simply be honest and straightforward in their speech. No human being has control or ownership of the heavens, the earth, or Jerusalem. Only God does. We cannot even control our own bodies completely. Therefore, no one has the right to make an oath based on such things as witnesses.

5:38-42 Retaliation (see Luke 6:29-30). In the fifth antithesis the Old Testament law of retaliation (Exod 21:23-24; Lev 24:19-20; Deut 19:21) is also pushed to the point of abrogation. The law of retaliation ("an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth") was intended to restrict vengeance and to keep violence within limits. Jesus urges his followers to forgo even the limited retaliation allowed by the Old Testament and thus to interrupt the whole cycle of revenge. The disciples must not adopt the attitudes and actions of their enemies, and four practical examples of non-retaliation in the face of evil are provided in verses 39-42 (see Luke 6:29-30). Each example challenges accepted, instinctive human behavior patterns.

5:43-48 Love of enemies (see Luke 6:27-28, 32-36). The final antithesis demands that Jesus' followers love not only the members of their own national or religious group (Lev 19:18) but even their enemies. This new demand is based, not on human nature, but on the example of God. It is human nature (represented by the tax collectors and pagans) to love those who love you and to greet only members of one's own family. But God makes the sun rise on good and bad alike, and rain falls on both the just and the unjust. When God's love and care for all people are taken as the standard, the disciples of Jesus cannot limit their love to their own group or their own nation. The disciples' perfection reflects and is measured by God's perfection.

6:1-4 Almsgiving. Three religious practices that would have been especially important for the Pharisees are treated in the third major part of the Sermon (6:1-18). After stating the general principle that religious acts should be done to honor God and not simply to better one's own reputation (v. 1), the passage considers almsgiving (vv. 2-4), prayer (vv. 5-15), and fasting (vv. 16-18). Each section contains a description of behavior that should be avoided, an instruction on the proper attitude, and the promise of a reward from God. Pious self-display is criticized, not the pious actions in themselves.

In a society without a highly organized welfare system, the obligation to offer charity (vv. 2-4) to the poor, the defenseless, and the sick was taken very seriously by religious people. In verse 2 Jesus criticizes those who make a great display of their charity by means of the image of blowing a horn. He calls such people "hypocrites," a term that originally referred to actors on a stage but here carries the sense of "phonies." The charge of hypocrisy is also leveled against the scribes and Pharisees in chapter 23. Jesus' disciples are instructed to be so free from religious showiness that they do not even seek the self-satisfaction of knowing what they are giving (6:3). Both verses 2 and 3 rely on obvious exaggerations in order to contrast self-seeking and selflessness in religion. The God who sees acts hidden from human sight will surely reward charity given without fanfare (v. 4).

6:5-15 Prayer (see Luke 11:2-4). The section on prayer begins the same way as the preceding section did. Here the behavior to be avoided is making a public spectacle of oneself in prayer (v. 5). The only fitting reward for such prayer is the public notoriety that it attracts. Indeed, prayer offered to win human praise is not prayer at all. Jesus' disciples are instructed to avoid making a public display of themselves in prayer (v. 6). That public prayer should be condemned outright was unthinkable for Jews like Jesus and Matthew, and it is not condemned here. Rather, another exaggerated statement is used in order to underline the warning against religious showiness. God will reward only genuine prayer offered in sincerity to him.

Attached to this teaching are sayings on prayer (vv. 7-8), a sample prayer (vv. 9-13), and sayings on forgiveness (vv. 14-15). In Jewish piety the prayer of petition was very important, and Jesus' disciples are warned not to confuse quantity with quality (v. 7). God as a loving Father knows the needs of his children even before they make their requests, but he wants them to ask in confidence and trust (v. 8). In petition, we do not so much inform God of some situation as express our dependence and faith.

The so-called Lord's Prayer or Our Father (vv. 9-13) is offered as a sample. Most of its phrases have close parallels in Jewish prayers of the time. The shorter and perhaps more primitive version in Luke 11:2-4 addresses God simply as "Father" and lacks petitions found in Matt 6:10, 13. The Matthean version begins with a typically Jewish form of invocation in prayer: "Our Father in heaven." The three "you-petitions" are addressed directly to God (vv. 9b-10) and pray for the coming of God's kingdom. They ask that God let the time come when he will be recognized as the Holy One by all creation, that the fullness of his kingship be revealed to all creation, and that the perfection with which his will is done in heaven should extend to earth also. The three "we-petitions" (vv. 11-13) ask for physical and spiritual well-being in the difficult period before the fullness of God's kingdom. They ask that God provide the bread we need today, that the forgiveness we receive from God may lead us to forgive those who have wronged us ("debts" is a metaphor for sins), and that in the time of testing accompanying the coming of God's kingdom we may not fall prey to the Evil One.

The saying on forgiveness (vv. 14-15) is joined to the Lord's Prayer because it concerns the same issue that the second of the "we-petitions" (6:12) treats. It makes our willingness to forgive one another the necessary condition for God's willingness to forgive us our sins.

6:16-18 Fasting. The section on fasting follows the pattern set in the sections on almsgiving and prayer. There were special days designated for fasting in the Jewish calendar, and pious Pharisees fasted two days a week. Not the act of fasting itself, but rather making a public display of one's fast, is criticized in verse 16. Jesus' disciples are instructed to disguise their fasting by looking as if they are preparing for a holiday (v. 17). God will know that they are fasting and will reward them accordingly (v. 18).

6:19-34 Trust in God (see Luke 12:33-34; 11:34-36; 16:13; 12:22-34). The final section of the Sermon (6:19–7:29) gives advice regarding the Christian pursuit of holiness. The basic theme is the decision for or against God. The major topics bear some relation to the "we-petitions" in the Lord's Prayer: trust in God to provide food and clothing ("Give us today our daily bread"), avoiding the condemnation of others ("as we forgive our debtors"), approaching God as Father with our requests

("Our Father in heaven"), and traveling the narrow and hard way ("deliver us").

The material in the first part (vv. 19-34) concerns various aspects of the choice between God and earthly wealth. The sayings on true riches in verses 19-21 (see Luke 12:33-34) contrast the fragile nature of earthly treasures and eternal treasure with God, who rewards those who give alms, pray, and fast in secret (vv. 1-18). The following saying (vv. 22-23) assumes that the eyes are the conduits for the entire body. In this context (see Luke 11:34-36), it refers to the need for sound spiritual vision if the person is to act properly. Those whose vision is not focused on obedience to God will plunge their whole selves into darkness. The decision for or against God carries over into all dimensions of the person's life. The choice between God and earthly wealth is made explicit in verse 24 (see Luke 16:13), where the latter is personified as Mammon ("that in which one puts trust or faith").

The sayings on care and anxiety in verses 25-34 (see Luke 12:22-34) seek to free the followers of Jesus from excessive concern about food and clothing (see v. 31) by means of several considerations. They are urged to reflect on God's care as shown in nature (the birds and the wild flowers) and to realize that human beings are even more important in God's sight. They are asked to admit that worrying does not really solve anything (v. 27) and to recognize that if their heart is set on serving God alone, these matters will take care of themselves (v. 33). The God whom they address in prayer as Father knows all that they need.

7:1-6 Avoiding condemnation (see Luke 6:37-38, 41-42). The followers of Jesus are warned to avoid condemning other people ("stop judging"). This is the prerogative of God on the day of judgment. The way in which they deal with others in this matter will determine in large part the way that others and God himself will deal with them (vv. 1-2). This does not rule out the practice of correction within the community (see 18:15-18), but such correction must be carried out with an awareness of one's own failings and prejudices (vv. 3-5). It also does not rule out discernment and discretion in dealing with hostile outsiders or even with apostate and unrepentant Christians (v. 6).

7:7-11 Approaching God in prayer (see Luke 11:9-13). In prayer, God is to be approached with boldness and confidence. The importance of the prayer of petition is underlined ("ask . . . seek . . . knock"), and the efficacy of such prayers is assumed (vv. 7-8). The way that a human father cares for his children and gives them good gifts when they ask him is used in verses 9-11 to illustrate the way that the heavenly Father answers petitions in prayer.

7:12 The golden rule (see Luke 6:31). The so-called golden rule of verse 12 about treating others as you would wish them to treat you is not original or unique to Jesus. Matthew's primary interest was the use of it as a summary of the Old Testament tradition. The Jewish teacher Hillel offered a similar teaching ("What you do not like, do not do to your neighbor") and asserted that the rest of the law and the prophets is a commentary on this (see Tob 4:15).

7:13-27 Decision for or against God (see Luke 13:24; 6:43-44; 13:25-27; 6:47-49). The Sermon concludes with a series of contrasts regarding the decision for or against God. The image of the two ways in verses 13-14 (see Luke 13:24) is common in the Old Testament and was developed in the Dead Sea scrolls and in the early Christian writing called the Didache. The idea that the gate is narrow and the way is constricted is noteworthy in Matthew. The false prophets of verses 15-20 (see Luke 6:43-44) are to be judged in accordance with Deut 13:1-5 and 18:20-22. Does the prophet's word come true? Does the prophet lead the people astray? The results (or fruits) show the prophet's character (the tree).

The sayings in verses 21-23 (see Luke 13:25-27) also focus on the relationship between word and action: It is not enough merely to say "Lord, Lord," for only doing God's will gives entry to his kingdom. The firm foundation mentioned in verses 24-27 (see Luke 6:47-49) includes both word and deed.

7:28-29 Conclusion. The Sermon on the Mount ends as the four other major speeches of Jesus in the Gospel do (see 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1): "Jesus finished these words." The contrast between the authority displayed by Jesus and the lack of authority on the part of the scribes (see Mark 1:22) was important to Matthew and his community as they experienced the split between the church and the synagogue ("their scribes").

IV. THE POWERFUL DEEDS OF JESUS

Matt 8:1–9:38

Having illustrated the power of Jesus as a teacher by the Sermon on the Mount, Matthew now gives examples of his power as a healer and a wonder-worker in chapters 8–9. Jesus is powerful in both word and deed. Nine acts of power are arranged in three groups of three (8:1-17; 8:23–9:8; 9:18-34). The groups are divided from one another by non-miraculous materials (8:18-22; 9:9-17; 9:35-38) in which the theme of discipleship is prominent. Both the Sermon and the mighty acts of Jesus are set in the framework of his ministry in Galilee (see 4:23; 9:35).

8:1-4 Power over leprosy (see Mark 1:40-45; Luke 5:12-16). The first cycle of Jesus' mighty deeds (8:1-17) presents demonstrations of his power over leprosy, paralysis, fever, and demonic possession. He shows mercy to the marginal people of Jewish society: lepers, Gentiles, servants, women, and the possessed.

Matthew's version of the healing of the leper (vv. 1-4) contains a transitional sentence (v. 1), the leper's request for healing (v. 2), Jesus' response and the miraculous healing (v. 3), and the final instruction that the healed man show himself to the priest in the temple (v. 4). The key words are "make clean" or "cure," which appear in the request for healing (v. 2), in Jesus' response (v. 3a), and in the narrator's description of what took place (v. 3b).

The Matthean account is simpler than Mark 1:40-45. The references to Jesus' emotions in Mark 1:41, 43, as well as the report about the public impact of the healing in Mark 1:45, are absent. In Matt 8:2, Jesus is addressed as "Lord," which not only heightens his dignity but also places the miracle in the framework of praying faith. The simpler structure also helps to highlight Jesus' concern that the Old Testament law regarding lepers who had been cleansed (Lev 14:2-9) be fulfilled exactly. The authority of Jesus as Messiah and Son of God, how he should be approached in prayer, and his fulfillment of the Old Testament emerge as the central themes in Matthew's account.

8:5-13 Power over paralysis (see Luke 7:1-10; John 4:43-54). The themes of Jesus' authority and power are carried on in the healing of the centurion's servant. But here special attention is given to a non-Jew's act of faith in Jesus' power. The centurion was a Gentile soldier (probably a Syrian) who was stationed at the military garrison in Capernaum. Whereas Luke's account portrays him as communicating with Jesus through intermediaries (the elders of the Jews and friends), Matthew pictures him in a dialogue of faith directly with Jesus. His request in verse 6 is prefaced with the title "Lord," and his response to Jesus' willingness to cure his paralyzed servant highlights the power of Jesus' word (v. 8). As a military man, he knows the force of a verbal command in a well-run army, and so he believes that the word of Jesus is powerful enough to cure his servant (vv. 8-9).

The Gentile centurion's faith is praised as surpassing anything that Jesus has encountered among God's chosen people (v. 10). It is seen as anticipating the situation after Jesus' death and resurrection when the Gentiles will find a place among God's people at the heavenly banquet (and in the church) and many Jews by birth will be excluded for their unbelief in Jesus (vv. 11-12). As a response to the centurion's display of faith, Jesus carries out the act of healing (v. 13).

8:14-17 Power over fever and demons (see Mark 1:29-34; Luke 4:38-41). In 8:14-17, Matthew compresses Mark's accounts of the healings of Peter's mother-in-law and of the many sick at Capernaum. Besides omitting the Markan context, Matthew also omits the mention of Simon (Peter), Andrew, James, and John. Jesus miraculously heals the woman, and as proof of the healing she serves him (not them, as in Mark 1:31). In the account of the general healing (vv. 16-17), Matthew leaves out what he regards as extraneous details as well as Jesus' refusal to let the demons speak. On the other hand, in verse 17 he adds the notice that in this healing activity Jesus brings to fulfillment the prophecy of Isa 53:4. This quotation not only carries on the theme of Jesus as fulfilling the Old Testament but also serves to identify Jesus as the Suffering Servant of God.

8:18-22 The demands of discipleship (see Luke 9:57-60). The first and second triads of Jesus' acts of power (8:1-17; 8:23–9:8) are separated by sayings on the radical demands of discipleship. In the first instance a scribe addresses Jesus as "Teacher" and offers to follow him anywhere, only to be warned that Jesus the Son of Man gives no guarantee of security. In the second instance a "disciple" requests permission to attend to the burial of his father (see 1 Kgs 19:20), but the Lord demands that he choose between discipleship and family obligation. This is an extreme way of making the point that the call to follow Jesus supersedes all other obligations and that it may even involve cutting family ties. Such sayings are designed to force us to reflect on the seriousness and significance of discipleship. Their extreme character creates a tension that can only be resolved by accepting the call.

8:23-27 Power over the sea (see Mark 4:35-41; Luke 8:22-25). The second cycle of Jesus' mighty acts (8:23–9:8) reveals his power over the sea, the demons, and sin. Matthew's account of the stilling of the storm (vv. 23-27) drops some details found in Mark 4:35-41 and makes more explicit the themes of discipleship and faith. In verse 23, Jesus takes the initiative, and the disciples "follow" him (a technical term for discipleship). Thus the material on discipleship in verses 18-22 is connected with Jesus' power over the sea.

It is possible that Matthew's readers were sensitive to one or more of the following symbolic equivalencies: the sea as the forces of chaos allied against God, the storm as the eschatological earthquake, and the boat as the church. Their request in verse 25 takes the form of a prayer: "Lord, save us! We are perishing!" Jesus' response to their prayer takes over Mark's theme of the disciples' obtuseness and describes it under the term "little faith." Although they have some faith, the disciples still have a long way to go before they reach perfect faith. Under Matthew's careful editorship, the theme of Jesus' power is complemented by the themes of discipleship and faith made concrete in prayer to Jesus as Lord.

8:28-34 Power over demons (see Mark 5:1-20; Luke 8:26-39). The second act of power in this series is located by Matthew at Gadara, which was much closer to the shore of the Sea of Galilee than Gerasa is (see Mark 5:1). It concerns two men possessed by demons rather than one man as in Mark 5:2, perhaps because Matthew has combined Mark 1:21-28 and 5:1-20 into a single, short account. The demoniacs fade from the scene and give way to the demons, who address Jesus as the Son of God and complain that they should not be disturbed until the coming of the kingdom (v. 29). Then the demons request that Jesus send them into a herd of swine (unclean animals for Jews), and their "prayer" is granted by Jesus (vv. 31-32). The focus of the Matthean account is the dialogue between Jesus and the demons and his display of power over them.

9:1-8 Power over sin (see Mark 2:1-12; Luke 5:17-26). Matthew's story of the healing of the paralytic and the forgiveness of his sins omits Mark's descriptions of the crowd and the difficulty that the friends encounter in bringing the sick man to Jesus. The effect of this compression is to keep the theme of the forgiveness of sins in the spotlight. The faith of the friends is noted (v. 2), and the conversation between the scribes and Jesus serves to establish his authority both to forgive sins and to bring about physical healing. The healing itself (vv. 6-7) is offered as a visible proof of the Son of Man's power to work wonders even in the realm of the invisible or the spiritual (the forgiveness of sins). The statement in verse 8 that the crowd praised God for giving such authority to human beings suggests that in Matthew's community Jesus' authority to forgive sins was viewed as having been transmitted to members of the church (see 18:15-20).

9:9-17 The defense of the disciples (see Mark 2:13-22; Luke 5:27-39). The section that separates the second and third triads of Jesus' acts of power (8:23–9:8; 9:18-34) begins with the call of the tax collector Matthew in 9:9. In Mark 2:14 and Luke 5:27 he is named "Levi." His name may have been changed in our Gospel to make him one of the Twelve (see 10:3) and/or because the community in which the Gospel was written retained a traditional attachment to the apostle Matthew. There is no reason to suppose that the tax collector-turned-disciple had two names. Tax collectors were suspect to pious Jews on the grounds of their collaboration with the Roman officials and their practice of extorting more than was owed to the government. Jesus' willingness to accept such a person as a disciple prepared the way for the acceptance of all kinds of people into the church.

Jesus' practice of dining with tax collectors (v. 9) and sinners (vv. 10-11) scandalized the Pharisees, for whom ritual purity and table fellowship were important religious practices. They ask Jesus' disciples why he does this. In verses 12-13, Jesus himself supplies three explanations: (1) the spiritually sick need him most; (2) Hosea 6:6 bears witness to the greatness of God's mercy; (3) Jesus came to call sinners to conversion of heart. Then in verse 14 disciples of John the Baptist, for whom ascetic practices like fasting would have been important, ask why Jesus' disciples do not fast. They are told that the time of Jesus the bridegroom is not a fitting one for fasting (v. 15); when he is taken away from them, there will be ample time for fasting. The radical newness of Jesus and the incompatibility between his message and the old forms of piety are brought out in verses 16-17 by means of the images of the new cloth and the new wine.

9:18-26 Power over death (see Mark 5:21-43; Luke 8:40-56). The third cycle of Jesus' mighty acts (9:18-34) reveals his power over death and chronic illness, blindness, and speechlessness. The stories of the revival of the synagogue leader's daughter and the healing of the woman with the hemorrhage had already been intertwined in Mark 5:21-43. In verses 18-26, Matthew has greatly simplified the Markan narrative in order to make the theme of faith stand out even more sharply. According to verse 18, the ruler knew that the girl was already dead but still believed that Jesus could restore her to life. The way in which the girl's restoration to life is described in verse 25 ("arose") connects this miracle to Jesus' own resurrection. In verses 20-22 every detail not relevant to the theme of faith in Jesus' power is omitted. The words that are translated as "cured" and "saved" are part of the New Testament vocabulary of salvation.

9:27-31 Power over blindness. The second incident in the third cycle was probably designed to combine the two stories found in Mark 8:22-26 and 10:46-52 (see also Matt 20:29-34). The Matthean account revolves around Jesus' question in verse 28 ("Do you believe that I can do this?") and the affirmative response by the two blind men. The healing is worked because of their faith (v. 29).

9:32-34 Power over speechlessness. The third section recounts in the briefest possible way the healing of a man who could not speak, and then contrasts two possible reactions: the amazement of the crowds at the unprecedented acts performed by Jesus, and the Pharisees' ascription of Jesus' power to Satan. The third cycle as a whole concerns the necessity of faith in Jesus' power and ends by noting that some people could witness the miracles and still refuse to believe that Jesus was sent from God.

9:35-38 The mission of the disciples. The final block of material on discipleship begins by repeating the description of Jesus' ministry that appeared in 4:23. Then the idea that discipleship involves mission is brought out by means of two images: the people are like sheep without a shepherd and like a harvest that needs workers to bring in the crops. God is the ultimate shepherd and harvest master, but he needs the cooperation of those who accept Jesus' invitation to discipleship. The three sections on discipleship in chapters 8–9 emphasize the radical demands that it can involve (8:18-22), the fact that all kinds of people can be called to it and the radical newness that it represents (9:9-17), and its missionary dimension (9:35-38).

V. THE MISSIONARY DISCOURSE

Matt 10:1-42

The idea that discipleship involves mission sets the stage for the second major speech by Jesus—the so-called missionary discourse in chapter 10. The sayings that make up this discourse have been gathered from various traditional sources and woven by the evangelist into a lengthy instruction on how the disciples of Jesus are to act (10:5-15) and what they can expect (10:16-42). The basic theme is stated in 10:24-25: "No disciple is above his teacher, no slave above his master. It is enough for the disciple that he become like his teacher, for the slave that he become like his master." Just as the disciples share in Jesus' power, so they must share his lifestyle and his sufferings.

10:1-5a Introduction (see Mark 3:13-19; Luke 6:12-16). After demonstrating his great powers as a healer in chapters 8–9, Jesus in 10:1 passes on to his twelve disciples the authority over demons and diseases that he had received from the Father. In his list of the Twelve (see Mark 3:16-19; Luke 6:13-16; Acts 1:13), Matthew stresses the primacy of Simon Peter ("first, Simon") and identifies Matthew as the tax collector of 9:9. The only significant disagreement among the various lists of apostles involves Thaddaeus, who in Luke 6:16 and Acts 1:13 is called Judas the son of James and in some manuscripts of Matthew and Mark is named Lebbaeus.

10:5b-15 What the disciples are to do (see Mark 6:7-13; Luke 9:1-6). The disciples' mission is limited to the people of Israel (vv. 5b-6), and they are to avoid entering the cities of non-Jews and Samaritans (whose Judaism was suspect in the eyes of Judeans and Galileans). Only after the death and resurrection of Jesus does the mission to the latter groups begin (see 28:19). The disciples' mission (vv. 7-8) replicates and extends the mission of Jesus in preaching the coming of God's kingdom and in healing the sick (see 4:23). As discipleship has been offered to them as a gift, so they are to offer it to others.

Wandering preachers representing various philosophies and religions were a common sight in the world of Jesus' time. Jesus' disciples are instructed not to be anxious about money or baggage or lodging, but rather to depend on the charity of their hearers (vv. 9-13). Their lack of concern for money, clothing, and lodging allows them to carry out the mission in a more single-minded way. It also bears witness to their trust in God's care for them and to their conviction that what has been freely received should be freely given. When the preachers are rejected in a place (vv. 14-15), they are to react without violence and only symbolically ("shake the dust from your feet"). They are to remain faithful to their task and trust that God will settle these matters in the final judgment. According to Gen 19, Sodom and Gomorrah were examples of extreme wickedness, especially with regard to hospitality.

10:16-25 Hostility (see Mark 13:9-13; Luke 21:12-17). The remainder of the missionary discourse tells the disciples what they are to expect. They can expect the same treatment that Jesus himself receives. Far from promising a mission free from conflict or opposition, Jesus prepares his disciples for hostility. They are sent as defenseless creatures ("sheep") among predators ("wolves"), and so they are urged to be shrewd while retaining their guilelessness (v. 16). In being tried and punished (vv. 17-18) by Jewish religious leaders ("their synagogues") and by Roman governmental officials ("governors and kings"), they share in Jesus' own passion (see 26:57-68; 27:11-26). Among the terrors awaiting the disciples are the anxiety connected with speaking at a public trial (v. 19), divisions within families and subsequent acts of betrayal (v. 21), hatred (v. 22), and persecution (v. 23). These terrors are outweighed by confidence in the Spirit (v. 20) and in their ultimate vindication when God's kingdom comes (v. 22).

In verse 23b the "towns of Israel" refers to the Jewish regions of Palestine, and "before the Son of Man comes" represents the coming of God's kingdom. According to Matthew's perspective, the coming of the Son of Man began with the death and resurrection and will terminate only at the end of time. The mission to Israel (10:5b-6) occupies the disciples until they receive the broader commission (28:19) that lasts until the end of this world. The sayings in verses 24-25 summarize the themes of the entire discourse and establish a link between the treatment accorded to Jesus by unbelievers and what the disciples of Jesus can expect.

10:26-33 Do not fear! (see Luke 12:2-9). Whatever the original contexts of the sayings in verses 26-33 may have been, here they serve to encourage the disciples to fearless confession in the face of opposition. Each saying is introduced by "Do not be afraid" (vv. 26, 28, 31) and attacks the fears that could cause the disciples to abandon their mission. The first saying (vv. 26-27) appeals to the inevitability of the coming of God's kingdom and Jesus' witness to it. Then the hypocrisy of the disciples' opponents will be revealed. The second saying (vv. 28-30) appeals to God's care for Jesus' disciples. Their opponents can destroy the body but not the soul. The third saying (vv. 31-33) appeals to the final judgment before God, which will be based on the disciples' faithfulness to Jesus during the conflicts that are part of their mission.

10:34-39 Family conflicts (see Luke 12:51-53; 14:26-27). Jesus does not guarantee the absence of conflict. In Jewish society of his time, family ties were far stronger than they are in the modern societies of the West.

But faithfulness to Jesus may involve the rupture even of these bonds. The passage is not an attack on family life as such, but it does insist that the disciples have a greater loyalty to Jesus than to the members of their families. In the extreme cases of having to choose between Jesus and one's family, Jesus demands absolute loyalty to himself. The sayings about the cross (v. 38) and losing one's life (v. 39) foreshadow Jesus' own fate and continue the theme of the disciples' identification with Jesus.

10:40-42 Receiving disciples of Jesus (see Mark 9:41). The concluding section of the missionary discourse reiterates the basic point of the discourse. The disciples are the representatives of Jesus. To receive them is to receive not only Jesus but also his heavenly Father (v. 40). Fitting rewards will be given to those who receive Christian prophets and holy men or even simpler Christians, because they all represent Christ and his heavenly Father.

VI. THE IMPORTANCE OF JESUS AND THE REJECTION OF HIM

Matt 11:1–12:50

The missionary discourse ends in 11:1, but nothing is said about the disciples' actual mission or their return. The spotlight remains on Jesus as he continues his work. The themes of unbelief and rejection that were so prominent in the missionary discourse are developed further in chapters 11–12, and we are given more information about Jesus' identity as the Messiah (11:1-6), the Wisdom of God (11:25-30), and the Servant of God (12:15-21).

11:1-6 Jesus as "the one who is to come" (see Luke 7:18-23). John's imprisonment had been mentioned in 4:12. The question in 11:3 regarding Jesus concerns his identity as "the one who is to come," which appears to have been a messianic title (see 3:11; 21:9; 23:39) derived from Ps 118:26 and Mal 3:1. Jesus' answer to John proves his messianic identity by listing the Messiah's deeds in terms of Isa 35:5-6 and 61:1. These deeds were described in chapters 8–9, and the list climaxes with the mention of the gospel having been preached to the poor (v. 5). The final saying (v. 6) declares "blessed" (see 5:3-12) those who do not find Jesus to be a scandal or a stumbling block. Though this beatitude may imply some misgivings on John's part concerning Jesus, it more likely prepares for the following incidents in which many people do find Jesus to be a stumbling block.

11:7-15 John the Baptist as Elijah (see Luke 7:24-30). The departure of John's messengers furnishes the occasion for Jesus' words about John's identity and the meaning of his rejection. John preached and baptized in the wilderness of Judah and lived very differently from the courtiers of Herod Antipas. Herod had John put in prison for questioning the propriety of his marriage to Herodias (see 14:1-12). In verses 9-10, 13, Jesus identifies John as a prophet but goes further by proclaiming him to be the fulfillment of Mal 3:1 (see Exod 23:20)—the prophet who will precede the coming of God's kingdom. This identification is made even more explicit in verse 14, when John is called Elijah. According to Mal 4:5, God would send Elijah the prophet from heaven before the great and terrible day of the Lord comes. But for all John's greatness, he has not yet inaugurated the decisive new age that the coming of God's kingdom will represent (v. 11). Nevertheless, John's imprisonment constitutes a violent attack against the coming kingdom (v. 12), an attack that will be repeated in the case of Jesus. Those who oppose the preaching of John and Jesus about the kingdom oppose the kingdom itself.

11:16-19 John and Jesus are rejected (see Luke 7:31-35). The austere and ascetic John was dismissed as having a demon (v. 18), and the joyful and expansive Jesus is rejected for keeping bad company (v. 19). Despite rejection by those who consider themselves wise, divine Wisdom will win out and confirm the actions of both John and Jesus. The beginning of the passage (vv. 16-17) compares the unbelievers to sullen children who refuse to play either the happy game of Jesus or the sad game of John.

11:20-24 Warnings to Galilean cities (see Luke 10:12-15). The Galilean cities in which Jesus had done his mighty deeds are given stern warnings. There are two pronouncements. Each contains a judgment ("woe"), an explanation and a comparison, and a prediction concerning the final judgment. First Chorazin and Bethsaida are threatened with "woe," because they have not repented in response to the deeds of Jesus. Their final judgment will be worse than that of the pagan cities of Tyre and Sidon (vv. 21-22). Then Capernaum (vv. 23-24) is threatened with woe, and its delusions of grandeur are compared to those of the king of Babylon as described in Isa 14:13-15. Capernaum too had refused to respond adequately to Jesus' deeds, and its final fate will be even worse than that of the wicked city of Sodom (see Gen 19:24-28). Both sayings of judgment assume the decisive importance of Jesus in human history.

11:25-30 Jesus as the Wisdom of God (see Luke 10:21-22). The themes of the decisive importance of Jesus and the rejection of him are linked in verses 25-30. Matthew has put together traditional sayings according to the following outline: the praise of the Father (vv. 25-26), the identity of Jesus (v. 27), and the invitation to come (vv. 28-30). Beginning with typically Jewish formulas of prayer, Jesus praises God for revealing to the simple and uneducated people, who were most receptive to Jesus, what has been hidden from the scholars and religious experts. Then in verse 27 Jesus asserts that God has granted him the revelation of himself as completely as a father discloses himself to a son. The relation between God and Jesus is so close that the only adequate terms for it are Father and Son. Therefore, only Jesus can pass on to others real knowledge of God. The language of verse 27 is very similar to many passages in John's Gospel (see John 3:35; 7:29; 10:14-15; 17:1-3).

In verses 28-30, Jesus expresses his invitation to discipleship in terms employed by Jesus ben Sira in Sir 51:23-27. Using the traditional image of the law as a "yoke," Jesus, the authoritative interpreter of the law (see 5:21-48), promises refreshment and rest in his wisdom school. All genuine searchers for wisdom are invited to come to Jesus. In Jesus, God's own wisdom dwells and can be learned.

12:1-8 Work on the sabbath (see Mark 2:23-28; Luke 6:1-5). Jesus' status as the authoritative interpreter of the law is exemplified in the incident of the disciples' plucking and eating grain on the sabbath. The disciples' actions would be considered the equivalent of reaping on the sabbath and therefore forbidden labor (see Exod 20:8-11; Deut 5:12-15). The Pharisees, who appear as the leaders of the opposition to Jesus and to his followers during most of the Gospel, protest against this unlawful act.

Jesus gives them four answers: (1) The disciples' act is compared to that of David and his followers in 1 Sam 21:1-6. In both cases a commandment was broken out of the need to satisfy physical hunger. Matthew has omitted the name of Abiathar the high priest from Mark 2:26, because in fact the high priest of the Old Testament story was Ahimelech. Thus the disciples of the Son of David had a good precedent in David himself. (2) In verses 5-6, Matthew cites an argument that is not present in Mark's account. The priests are allowed to perform acts of work in the Jerusalem temple on the sabbath on the principle that laws pertaining to the temple take precedence over laws pertaining to the sabbath. Perhaps the claim that Jesus is greater than the temple is implied here. (3) The quotation from Hos 6:6 ("I desire mercy, not sacrifice") is used to criticize the Pharisees' faulty scale of values. (4) Jesus as the Son of Man has the ultimate authority over the sabbath and even more right than David or the priests in the temple to overrule the Old Testament legislation regarding the sabbath.

In Matthew's community this passage would serve as a source of defenses against Jewish criticisms about early Christian laxity in observing the sabbath. The early Christians based their practice on the example and the authority of Jesus the Son of Man.

12:9-14 Healing on the sabbath (see Mark 3:1-6; Luke 6:6-11). The question of sabbath observance arises with respect to Jesus himself and takes the form of a debate. The place of the debate is "their synagogue"—an expression that suggests a sharp division between the Pharisees and the followers of Jesus. The question concerns the propriety of healing on the sabbath (v. 10), and Jesus' response involves a counter-question (v. 11) regarding the case of rescuing an animal on the sabbath (see Deut 22:4). If it is right to save an animal, how much the more is it right to save a human being (v. 12)!

As an illustration of good deeds done on the sabbath, Jesus restores to health the withered hand of a man in the synagogue. Why the good deed could not wait until after the sabbath or to what extent the man was in danger of death is not considered. Just as God desires mercy more than sacrifice, so good deeds override the sabbath regulations. Rather than convincing the Pharisees, Jesus' teaching and action only increase their opposition, to the point that they begin the plot to kill him (v. 14).

12:15-21 Jesus as the Servant of the Lord. In the midst of the rising opposition to Jesus from the Pharisees, Matthew pauses and places Jesus' response in the context of the Old Testament Servant of the Lord. Jesus was fully aware of the rising opposition (v. 15) but continued his healing activity and avoided publicity (vv. 15-16). His modesty and gentleness in the face of hostility are viewed as the fulfillment of Isa 42:1-4. By refusing to use violence against the Pharisees or to reveal himself openly, Jesus did not "contend or cry out." But other features in the Old Testament passage are also significant: Jesus' identity as the Servant of the Lord (see 3:17; 17:5), Jesus as especially endowed with the Holy Spirit, and his role in God's plan of salvation for the Gentiles. Matthew's identification of Jesus as the Servant of the Lord sets the stage for the debate with the Pharisees regarding the source of Jesus' powers. The thrust of their attack is that Jesus is in league with Satan. But Matthew's readers know that he is really the Servant of the Lord.

12:22-37 The source of Jesus' power (see Mark 3:19-30; Luke 11:14-23; 12:10; 6:43-45). The healing of a possessed man who was blind and mute provides the occasion for exploring the source of Jesus' power. The healing (v. 22) produces two reactions: wonder on the part of the crowds whether Jesus is the Son of David or Messiah (v. 23), and hostility from the Pharisees, who are convinced that he is the instrument of Satan (v. 24).

In response to the Pharisees, Jesus offers three arguments: (1) If Jesus' power over the demons were from Satan, Satan would be setting his own agents against themselves and thus destroying Satan's kingdom (vv. 25-26). (2) Jesus' exorcisms should be interpreted as good actions inspired by the Holy Spirit, just as the exorcisms performed by other Jewish exorcists are (vv. 27-28). (3) Jesus could not cast out demons unless he had some power over the chief demon (v. 29). The saying in verse 28, linking Jesus' exorcisms to the coming of God's kingdom, is very important for understanding all of Jesus' miracles: They are signs that, in Jesus, God's kingdom is breaking into the world and will reach its fullness in due time.

Having met the objections of the Pharisees, Jesus takes the offensive with three warnings: (1) Closeness to Jesus is absolutely essential, and the Pharisees must recognize it or run the risk of being on the wrong side when God's kingdom comes (v. 30). (2) The only unforgivable sin is attributing the work of the Holy Spirit to an evil spirit, as the Pharisees were doing in the case of Jesus. Failure to recognize the Son of Man for what he is may be understandable and even pardonable, but failure to recognize the source of his power is inexcusable (vv. 31-32). (3) The Pharisees' opposition to Jesus stems from their wickedness, and in the final judgment they will be judged with regard to their willingness or unwillingness to confess that Jesus is empowered by the Holy Spirit (vv. 33-37).

12:38-42 The sign of Jonah (see Luke 11:29-32). Despite all the miracles that Jesus had already worked, the scribes and Pharisees ask for more signs. The exasperated Jesus promises them only the sign of Jonah. The basic meaning of the sign of Jonah seems to involve the preaching of repentance to non-Jews and its acceptance by them. When the Old Testament prophet Jonah preached conversion of heart to the people of Nineveh, they acted on Jonah's preaching and repented (v. 41). The queen of Sheba came to Jerusalem to hear the wisdom of Solomon (see 1 Kgs 10:1-6), and she was duly impressed by him (v. 42). Jesus surpasses Jonah and Solomon, and so the scribes and Pharisees have good reason to repent. In verse 40, Matthew has given a second interpretation of the sign of Jonah: The three days spent by the prophet inside the fish (see Jonah 2) were a type or a foreshadowing of the three days between Jesus' death and his resurrection.

12:43-45 The evil spirit's return (see Luke 11:24-26). The passage about the evil spirit's return is joined to the sign of Jonah by its reference to "this evil generation" (vv. 39, 45), and to the entire section beginning at 12:22 by its concern with evil spirits. The activity of Jesus has made an impact on the evil spirits, but their power is far from broken. Matthew and his community probably viewed the Romans' destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 as the fulfillment of Jesus' warnings.

12:46-50 The true family of Jesus (see Mark 3:31-35; Luke 8:19-21). The long treatment of unbelief and rejection that began in the missionary discourse of chapter 10 and continued in the incidents of chapters 11–12 concludes with the definition of the true family of Jesus as those who do God's will. Matthew's account contains no explicit criticism of Jesus' relatives; they serve merely as a foil to emphasize the point that those who obey God constitute the real family of Jesus. In a society that placed a very high value on blood relationship, Jesus' teaching about his disciples forming a spiritual family would be quite challenging.

VII. PARABLES CONCERNING THE KINGDOM OF GOD

Matt 13:1-53

Jesus' parables about the kingdom form the third major discourse in the Gospel. A parable is a simile or metaphor drawn from everyday life or from nature. Its vividness or strangeness gains the hearer's attention but demands further reflection regarding the precise meaning. The kingdom of God refers to God's future display of power and judgment in which he establishes his rule over all creation. Its coming is basically God's work, though the cooperation of people in the present time is demanded. In Jesus' teaching, the kingdom has both present and future dimensions.

13:1-9 The seeds (see Mark 4:1-9; Luke 8:4-8). The first part of the parables discourse (13:1-35) envisions Jesus as sitting in a boat, with the crowds standing along the shore (vv. 1-3). The crowds are the mass of people. They are the object of Jesus' mission and are not yet totally incorrigible in their unbelief, like the scribes and Pharisees. The parable of the seeds (vv. 4-9) contrasts three kinds of wasted seeds with one kind of fruitful seed. The seeds were wasted because they landed on bad soils: a footpath (v. 4), rocky ground (v. 5), and among thorns (v. 7). But the seed that fell on good soil (v. 8) yielded great results. The parable uses repetition in order to build up a pattern of expectations and at the end changes the pattern in order to emphasize the real point of the story. It explains why Jesus' preaching of the kingdom of God has not been universally accepted and encourages those who have accepted it to keep on bearing fruit in good works. The seed growing in the good soil will achieve enormous results.

13:10-17 Why Jesus used parables (see Mark 4:10-12; Luke 8:9-10). The contrast between the fruitful seed and the wasted seeds continues in the explanation of why Jesus used parables as a teaching device. The disciples want to know why he teaches in parables when he could use simple and direct speech (v. 10). In response to their question, Jesus asserts that the gift of understanding is given to the disciples but not to others (vv. 11-12) and that the disciples are blessed with special sight and hearing (vv. 16-17). Because the others fail to see and hear Jesus' plain teachings about the kingdom, he is forced to use the mysterious speech of the parables (v. 13). The general lack of understanding of Jesus' teaching is explained in verses 14-15 as the fulfillment of Isa 6:9-10. The spiritual dispositions of the disciples (the fruitful soil) render them capable of seeing and understanding, while the others remain incapable of seeing and understanding at all because their spiritual dispositions are not capable of allowing the seed to bear fruit.

13:18-23 The explanation of the seeds (see Mark 4:13-20; Luke 8:11-15). The hearers of the parable of the seeds were clearly expected to draw some equivalencies: the seed is Jesus' preaching of the kingdom; the good soil is proper dispositions; the bad soils are improper dispositions; the fruitful seeds are the disciples; the wasted seeds are the unbelievers. But the explanation of the parable given in verses 18-23 goes beyond these obvious correspondences and focuses on the reasons why the seeds failed or prospered. Whether this explanation goes back to Jesus or was worked out in the early church is a point of debate.

According to the explanation, the bad soils are lack of understanding (v. 19), superficiality (v. 21), and division within oneself (v. 22). The corresponding obstacles to belief are the "evil one" (v. 19), tribulation or persecution (v. 21), and worldly cares and the desire for wealth (v. 22). In the good soil, however, the message of Jesus is taken in and yields remarkable results (v. 23).

13:24-30 The grain and the weeds. The parable of the grain and the weeds uses another agricultural comparison to explain the lack of universal acceptance of Jesus' preaching. Jesus sowed good seed, but the evil one has sown a kind of weed that is difficult to distinguish from the grain in the early stages of growth. The parable concerns the proper attitude toward the mixed reception accorded to Jesus. The harvest (v. 30) was a common Old Testament and Jewish symbol for the final judgment, and so the advice is tolerance and patience until God renders his definitive decision. In verses 28-29 the disciples are restrained from any attempt at forcibly rooting out the unbelievers among their fellow Jews. This separation will accompany the final appearance of the kingdom.

13:31-35 The mustard seed and the leaven (see Mark 4:30-32; Luke 13:18-21). The parables of the mustard seed and the leaven use everyday things to illustrate the dynamic of the kingdom of God. The activity of God in the ministry of Jesus seems as small as a mustard seed or as a little yeast, but its result in the fullness of God's rule will be very great. These comparisons suggest that in Jesus' preaching, the kingdom already has a present dimension and that the process moving toward its fullness has in some way been inaugurated. The part of Jesus' discourse that was addressed to the crowds ends (vv. 34-35) by explaining that he used parables in order to fulfill Ps 78:2. The quotation also calls attention to Jesus' exalted status as the one who can reveal the mysteries of the universe.

13:36-43 The explanation of the grain and the weeds. At this point Jesus turns away from the crowds and concentrates on his disciples. To their request for an explanation of the parable of the grain and the weeds, he first responds in verses 37-39 with a catalogue of equivalencies that serves to decode the parable, though according to verses 10-17 the disciples should not need such aids. Then in verses 40-43 he provides a scenario for the events surrounding the last judgment. The latter feature has the effect of shifting the focus from patient tolerance in the present (as in verses 24-30) to the spectacular events that will constitute the end of the world. Again there is a debate regarding the origin of this explanation of the parable. Did it come from Jesus, the early church, or the evangelist?

13:44-50 The treasure, the pearl, and the net. The parables of the treasure and the pearl in verses 44-46 illustrate the zeal with which the kingdom should be pursued. They express the great value of the kingdom, the joy that it brings, and the total commitment that it deserves. The parable of the fish net in verses 47-50 reminds us that the coming of the kingdom will include a final judgment in which good and bad will be separated and receive their fitting rewards and punishments.

13:51-53 Conclusion. The parables discourse ends with a saying that expresses well the ideal to which the evangelist aspired: the ability to see the radically new act of God in Christ in the light of the Old Testament tradition. Such a person understands the relation between the new (Christ) and the old (Jewish tradition). The discourse closes in the customary way (see 7:28; 11:1; 19:1; 26:1).

VIII. MIRACLES AND CONTROVERSIES

Matt 13:54–16:4

13:54-58 Rejection at Nazareth (see Mark 6:1-6; Luke 4:16-30). The themes of unbelief and rejection continue in the incidents about Jesus at Nazareth (vv. 54-58) and the death of John the Baptist (14:1-12). The reference to Jesus as teaching in "their synagogue" (v. 54) suggests a separation between Jesus' followers and other Jews, and probably reflects the situation that existed when Matthew's Gospel was written. The description of Jesus as the "carpenter's son" (v. 55) shows that the people of Nazareth do not know what the readers of the Gospel know from 1:18-25. Their admiration quickly turns to disbelief—a fact explained in verse 57 by what seems to have been a proverb about the prophet's lack of acceptance in his home territory. Lack of faith on the people's part is presented in verse 58 as the explanation for Jesus' refusal to perform miracles there (see Mark 6:5-6).

14:1-12 John's death (see Mark 6:14-29; Luke 9:7-9). The tradition about the reaction of Herod Antipas (the son of Herod the Great) to Jesus is tied to the account of Jesus' activity in and around Nazareth. As the official in charge of governing Galilee from 4 B.C.E. to A.D. 39, Herod showed curiosity toward Jesus and wondered whether he might be John the Baptist restored to life (vv. 1-2). This provides the occasion for Matthew to tell the grisly story of John's execution and to connect the rejection of Jesus to the rejection of John (see 11:2-19). The description of Herod's marriage in verse 3 (see Mark 6:17) is not exactly correct, since Herodias had been married to another Herod, who was Herod Antipas' half-brother. In any case, the account in verses 3-12 develops the parallel between the tragic fate of John and what awaits Jesus. Both were regarded by the people as prophets, arrested on very flimsy grounds, executed on account of the weakness of a government official, buried by their disciples, and thought to have been raised from the dead.

14:13-21 The feeding of five thousand (see Mark 6:30-44; Luke 9:10-17; John 6:1-14). Matthew's concentration on the rejection of Jesus is interrupted by three miracle stories of varying length and content. Jesus' suspicion about Herod's interest in him leads him to depart to a deserted place, but the crowds continue to follow him. After curing some of the sick, Jesus provides enough food for five thousand men, plus women and children (vv. 15-21). Matthew's account is similar to Mark's, except that it is more concise and places the disciples in a better light. Matthew 14:16-18, when compared with Mark 6:37-38, softens the disciples' lack of understanding. The disciples appear as partners in the discussion and share in feeding the crowds. The language of Matt 14:19, when compared with that of Matt 26:26, suggests that the feeding was viewed as an anticipation or preview of the Last Supper and thus of the church's celebration of the Eucharist. The fish (v. 19) and the twelve baskets of leftovers may point beyond the Last Supper to the banquet of the Messiah at the final coming of the kingdom.

14:22-33 Walking on the water (see Mark 6:45-52; John 6:15-21). The transitional passage in verses 22-23 situates the disciples at sea and Jesus alone in prayer on the mountain. The disciples are on their own, and they are faring badly. The boat may well be a symbol of the church (see 8:23). In the disciples' time of need, Jesus comes to rescue them and appears as the lord over the powers of nature (vv. 24-27). Into this episode Matthew has inserted the story of Peter's attempt to walk on the water and his subsequent failure on account of his little faith (vv. 28-31). Peter represents the disciples (and all Christians) in his enthusiastic love and insufficient faith. In his fright he addresses Jesus with a prayer ("Lord, save me"), and he receives a criticism about the smallness of his faith. The story climaxes with the adoring confession from the disciples that Jesus truly is the Son of God (vv. 32-33).

14:34-36 Healings at Gennesaret (see Mark 6:53-56). The healings at Gennesaret constitute the third member in this series of miracle stories and repeat the theme of the great impression made by Jesus on the general public. The very favorable reaction to Jesus stands in contrast to the rejection at Nazareth in 13:54-58 and the hostility shown to him by the scribes and Pharisees in 15:1-20.

15:1-20 The controversy about ritual purity (see Mark 7:1-23). Jesus' three acts of power are followed by a controversy with the Pharisees and scribes. The specific issue for debate is the disciples' failure to observe the rules of ritual purity as exactly as the Pharisees did (v. 2). The Pharisees had built up a body of tradition designed to ensure the observance of the written law. They also wished to extend to all Israelites the rules that originally applied only to members of priestly families on the grounds that Israel is a priestly people. Thus they expected Jesus and his followers to observe the rules of priestly purity spelled out in Lev 22:1-16.

The first part of Jesus' response (vv. 3-9) attacks the Pharisees' idea of tradition. Jesus argues that sometimes their tradition leads to breaking the clear commands of the law (vv. 3-6). The commandment about honoring one's parents is stated in the law both positively (Exod 20:12; Deut 5:16) and negatively (Exod 21:17). But the Pharisees' tradition, according to Jesus, allows a person to place property under sacred vow as a means of preventing the parents from having access to it. Thus a pious fiction provides the excuse for disregarding and getting around a sacred obligation encouraged by the law. The words of Isa 29:13 are used to brand such behavior as hypocrisy. The tradition that claims to protect the law actually violates it.

The second part of Jesus' response (vv. 10-20) concentrates on the specific issue of ritual purity. The statement in verse 11 to the effect that there is only moral uncleanness is very radical, since large parts of the Old Testament law concern ritual uncleanness contracted by touching and by eating certain foods. Only a firm faith in Jesus as the authoritative interpreter of the law could allow Matthew and his community to accept such a revolutionary teaching.

To the basic statement in verse 11 are joined a very harsh judgment on the Pharisees (vv. 12-14) and an explanation for the disciples of Jesus (vv. 15-20). When informed about the Pharisees' offense at his teaching, Jesus denies their spiritual roots (v. 13) and condemns them as blind guides leading others to destruction (v. 14). Peter's request for an explanation of Jesus' teaching in verse 15 assumes that "parable" means "mystery" or "riddle." Jesus' explanation in verses 17-20 merely expands and makes concrete the radical statement in verse 11. Moral purity alone is important, and the evil designs of the mind make a person morally impure and issue in the kinds of action forbidden by the Old Testament. The complaint raised against Jesus' disciples in verse 2 has no validity, because the whole tradition of ritual impurity and purity has no validity.

15:21-28 The healing of the non-Jewish woman's daughter (see Mark 7:24-30). The pattern of three miracles and a controversy story found in 14:13–15:20 is repeated in 15:21–16:4. The first healing takes place in the area surrounding the southern Phoenician cities of Tyre and Sidon, and involves the possessed daughter of a non-Jewish woman. In fact, the healing is simply the occasion for a dialogue of faith between the Gentile woman and Jesus. In verse 22 she tries to initiate the dialogue with a prayer and addresses Jesus as Lord and Son of David, but is rebuffed by Jesus on the ground that his mission during his ministry prior to his death is confined to the Jews (v. 24). When the woman persists in her prayer ("Lord, help me"), Jesus again rebuffs her with a sharp saying that equates non-Jews with dogs, and Jews with sons and daughters of God (v. 26). The woman has the presence of mind and the cleverness to point out that even dogs are given crumbs and scraps from their masters' tables (v. 27). This display of faith so impresses Jesus that he grants her request that her daughter be healed. This story of salvation being offered to Gentiles through faith in Jesus would have encouraged the church's mission to the Gentiles after Jesus' death and resurrection. In God's plan of salvation, pride of place belongs to the Jews ("the children"). But Jesus himself praised and respected the remarkable faith of non-Jews (see also 8:5-13).

15:29-31 The healing of many people. The second miracle story in this series summarizes Jesus' many acts of healing (see 12:15-21; 14:34-36). After the geographical introduction in verse 29, words and phrases from Isa 35:5-6 and 29:18-19 are used to describe the kinds of physical maladies (v. 30) and the remarkable changes brought about by Jesus the healer. At the center of the account is the person of Jesus (v. 30). The sick are brought to him and he cures them.

15:32-39 The feeding of four thousand (see Mark 8:1-10). The third miracle story involves the feeding of another large crowd of people. It has many features in common with the feeding of the five thousand in 14:13-21. The two accounts differ chiefly in the numbers: loaves (five versus seven), baskets of leftovers (twelve versus seven), and the number of men (five thousand versus four thousand). Jesus' compassion for the crowds (v. 32) leads him to supply their physical needs, and the language in which the multiplication is described (v. 36) again suggests Eucharistic overtones (see 14:19; 26:26). There is no good reason to view this miracle as the "Gentile feeding" as opposed to the "Jewish feeding" of 14:13-21. The two passages may represent independent accounts of a single event.

16:1-4 The controversy about signs (see Mark 8:11-13; Luke 12:54-56). Just as the preceding series of miracle stories in 14:13-36 ended with a controversy story in 15:1-20, so the second series of miracle stories in 15:21-39 ends with a controversy in 16:1-4. Despite all the miracles that Jesus has worked, the Pharisees and Sadducees want some further sign that he is from God. Although the Pharisees and Sadducees opposed each other on many points, here they appear to be united in opposing Jesus.

The reply in verses 2-3 does not occur in some important manuscripts of the Greek text. Whether it belonged in the original Gospel text or not, its basic point is that Jesus' miracles are signs of God's coming kingdom. The opponents know enough to predict the weather from the color of the sky, but they are blind to the real nature of Jesus' miracles. The sign of Jonah could be the offer of salvation to the Gentiles (see 8:5-13; 15:21-28), but in light of 12:40 the evangelist probably understood it to be the death and resurrection of Jesus.

IX. THE WAY TO THE CROSS

Matt 16:5–17:27

16:5-12 The leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees (see Mark 8:14-21). With the so-called discourse on the leaven, Jesus turns to his disciples and instructs them throughout the rest of the chapter. His instructions concern the teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees (16:5-12), the identity of Jesus and Peter (16:13-20), the cross and resurrection (16:21-23), and the discipleship of the cross (16:24-28).

In the discourse on the leaven (vv. 5-12), the disciples' failure to bring bread along for their journey is joined to Jesus' puzzling warning against the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees (v. 6). The leaven apparently refers to a corrupting influence. By substituting "Sadducees" for Mark's "Herod" or "Herodians" (see Mark 8:15), Matthew prepares for the concluding explanation (v. 12) that the leaven describes the corrupting teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees.

Jesus' response to the disciples' misunderstanding takes the form of five questions in verses 8-11. Allusion is made to the feedings of the five thousand (14:13-21) and the four thousand (15:32-39), with the implication that the disciples should know by now that Jesus is capable of caring for their physical needs. The disciples again show weakness of faith—a characteristic way of describing the imperfect condition of Jesus' closest followers in Matthew (see 6:30; 8:26; 14:31). Though Jesus' rebuke of the disciples seems quite sharp, it is not nearly as cutting as the series of questions in Mark 8:17-21. At any rate, the disciples' slowness to understand shows how much they need to be instructed about Jesus and about what it means to follow him.

16:13-20 The identity of Jesus and Peter (see Mark 8:27-30; Luke 9:18-21). Peter's confession of faith begins as a dialogue between Jesus and the disciples. It takes place near Caesarea Philippi in northern Palestine and marks the initial step of the journey that will issue in Jesus' passion and death in Jerusalem. When Jesus asks concerning popular speculations regarding his identity, the disciples list some current opinions (v. 14). According to 14:2, Herod Antipas thought that Jesus was John the Baptist restored to life. The return of Elijah was expected to accompany the coming of God's kingdom (see Mal 4:5-6). The reference to Jeremiah is found only in Matt 16:14 (see Mark 8:28; Luke 9:19), and it may indicate that the similarities between the prophet Jeremiah and Jesus were recognized (see Matt 2:17; 27:9).

In the second stage of the dialogue (vv. 15-16), Jesus asks not for popular speculations but rather for the disciples' own assessment. As is often the case in this section of Matthew (see 15:15; 16:22; 17:24; 18:21), Peter appears as the spokesman for the group and proclaims Jesus to be the Messiah. (Messiah is a Hebrew word that means "anointed one"; its Greek translation is Christos.) Peter's confession of Jesus as the Messiah reflects the disciples' hope that Jesus would deliver Israel from its enemies and establish God's kingdom on earth.

Up to verse 16b, the account closely parallels Mark 8:27-29. But to Mark's narrative Matthew adds in verse 16b a further specification of Jesus' identity ("the Son of the living God") and Jesus' promise to Peter in verses 17-19. This addition changes the flow of the story in Peter's favor. Whereas in Mark 8:27-33 the confession of faith is passed over and gives way to a misunderstanding on Peter's part, in Matthew the confession brings a solemn blessing on Peter.

The phrase "Son of the living God" in verse 16b corrects and transcends any false implications present in the title "Messiah." The blessing in verse 17 declares that Peter's confession was a revelation from God, and verse 18 promises that Peter is the rock on which the Christian community will be built after Jesus' death and resurrection. No power opposed to God will be able to destroy that community. Finally, in verse 19 Peter is portrayed as the "major-domo" or prime minister in the kingdom proclaimed by Jesus (see Isa 22:15-25). His exercise of the power to bind and loose (see 18:18) will be confirmed by God. The content of that power is not completely clear. It may involve laying down rules and giving exemptions, imposing or lifting excommunications, forgiving or not forgiving sins, or even performing exorcisms.

The language of the passage is very Semitic, and clearly verses 16b-19 transmit an early tradition. There is a debate about whether this blessing was uttered by Jesus during his earthly ministry or after his resurrection (see 1 Cor 15:5; Luke 24:34). Other scholars trace its origins to the church at Antioch in Syria. Whatever its origin, the passage praises Peter as the recipient of a divine revelation (v. 17), declares him to be the foundation of the community (v. 18), and gives him special authority (v. 19). With the command to silence in verse 20, Matthew rejoins Mark's account.

16:21-23 The first prediction of the passion (see Mark 8:31-33; Luke 9:22). The first prediction of the passion removes any doubts about what kind of Messiah Jesus is. In verse 21 Jesus proclaims unambiguously that his earthly future will involve suffering and death in accord with his Father's plan ("he must go to Jerusalem"). The content of the passion prediction closely parallels the events of Matt 26–28. Despite his confession of faith and the blessing in response to it, Peter in verse 22 rejects the possibility that Jesus' messiahship could involve suffering. In verse 23 Peter's attitude is rebuked sharply as coming from Satan, as a stumbling block in Jesus' way, and as purely human thinking.

16:24-28 The discipleship of the cross (see Mark 8:34–9:1; Luke 9:23-27). Sayings on the cost and reward of discipleship follow the first prediction of the passion. The saying about taking up the cross in verse 24 (see 10:38) connects the fate of the disciples with Jesus' own fate. Whereas in 10:1 the disciples were given a share in Jesus' power displayed in chapters 8–9, here they are warned that discipleship also involves a share in the cross. The sayings in verses 25-26 revolve around the theme of life and suggest that only in letting go of self and letting God do the guiding can we ever find freedom and happiness. In verse 27 the typically Jewish belief in rewards and punishments as being determined at the coming of God's kingdom in the judgment is given a Christian interpretation: Jesus the Son of Man will be in charge. Whatever verse 28 may have originally referred to (the imminent coming of the kingdom, the death and resurrection, Pentecost), here it serves as an introduction to the transfiguration in 17:1-8. In that event the disciples receive a preview of the Son of Man's glorious coming in the kingdom.

17:1-8 The transfiguration (see Mark 9:2-8; Luke 9:28-36). The story of the transfiguration of Jesus is a preview of the Son of Man's coming in his kingship (see 16:28). Some interpreters have argued that the account originally told of an appearance of the risen Lord and has been put back into the earthly ministry of Jesus. But the narrative has very little in common with the resurrection appearances in the Gospels. The transfiguration seems to have been a historical experience of a visionary character. The reference to "six days later" in verse 1 is puzzling, though the traditional significance of the mountain as a privileged place of divine revelation suggests an allusion to God's appearance to Moses on Sinai (see Exod 24:16). Here as elsewhere in the Gospels there is an inner circle of disciples constituted by Peter, James, and John. The word "transfigured" used in verse 2 to describe what happened to Jesus indicates a change of form or shape. The disciples experience a glimpse of Jesus' lordship as it will be fully manifest at the coming of the kingdom. The order of the names of Moses and Elijah in verse 3 makes it clear that they represent the law and the prophets of the Old Testament.

Matthew's primary interest in the account of the transfiguration is the disciples' reactions to the event. In verse 4 Peter addresses Jesus as "Lord" and asks his permission to erect the three booths. Apparently he hoped that all of them would remain in this glorious atmosphere until the kingdom came. The disciples' hopes are raised still higher in verse 5 with the voice from the cloud (a Jewish image of God's presence) that affirms Jesus' special status in exactly the same terms as at the baptism (see 3:17). The awesome character of the experience frightens the disciples (v. 6), but Jesus acts as a comforter and encourages them not to be afraid (v. 7).

17:9-13 The sequel to the transfiguration (see Mark 9:9-13). The sequel to the transfiguration connects the preview of Jesus' glory with his suffering, death, and resurrection. In verse 9 the transfiguration is characterized as a vision, and the disciples are warned not to talk about it until after the resurrection. In contrast to the disciples in Mark 9:10, they apparently understand what rising from the dead means. Their question about Elijah in verse 10 refers to the tradition based on Mal 4:5-6 that the prophet Elijah would return from heaven before God's kingdom would come. Jesus' reply in verses 11-12 accepts this tradition as valid but asserts that Elijah had already come in the person of John the Baptist (see 11:14). Just as John was not recognized but rather underwent suffering and death, so Jesus as the Son of Man will be misunderstood and put to death (see 14:1-12). In case there were any doubts about the identification of John the Baptist as Elijah, Matthew adds that the disciples then realized that Jesus had been speaking about John the Baptist (v. 13).

17:14-20 The healing of the possessed boy (see Mark 9:14-29; Luke 9:37-43). Matthew's account of the healing of the possessed boy is much shorter than Mark's. Indeed, the issue is not so much Jesus' power to heal, as it is in Mark, but rather the disciple's failure to heal as due to their "little faith" (v. 20). The lengthy description of the boy's condition in Mark 9:17-18, 20-22, 25-26 is condensed considerably, and he is simply described as being affected by the phases of the moon ("a lunatic"). The boy's father in verses 14-15 approaches Jesus in a prayerful way ("knelt down before him . . . 'Lord, have pity' "). Given the way that Matthew tells this story, the stern rebuke in verse 17 seems to be directed at the disciples; this is confirmed in verse 20, where they are criticized for their "little faith."

The mention of little faith is the occasion for using the saying on faith the size of the mustard seed. The mustard seed is tiny (see 13:31), and the point of the saying is that even a small amount of faith can have dramatic effects. The connection between the story in verses 14-19, whose point is the ineffectiveness of the disciples' faith, and the saying in verse 20, whose point is the great power of even a little faith, is purely formal. In other words, the two units have been joined only because they deal with "little faith" and despite the fact that the meaning in each unit is quite different. Some manuscripts include as verse 21 the saying found in Mark 9:29. Yet, if the passage were originally part of Matthew, there would be no good reason why it should be omitted in the other ancient manuscripts. It most likely was added to Matthew's text in the process of copying.

17:22-23 The second prediction of the passion (see Mark 9:30-32; Luke 9:43-45). The second prediction of the passion reminds us that the fate of suffering and death awaits Jesus in Jerusalem. The term "handed over" in verse 22 suggests that these events will take place with God's permission and in accord with his plan. Unlike the disciples in Mark 9:32, who do not understand the prophecy and are afraid to ask about it, the disciples in Matt 17:23 understand it very clearly.

17:24-27 The temple tax. When questioned about whether Jesus paid the tax for the upkeep of the Jerusalem temple and the sacrifices offered there (see Exod 30:11-16; Neh 10:32-33), Peter, as the spokesman for Jesus, answers affirmatively (vv. 24-25a). But the story goes on to make it clear that Jesus had no real obligation to do so. The illustration used in verses 25b-26 is based on Jesus' identity as the Son of God. Just as kings gather taxes from foreigners but not from their own sons, so God (whose house the Jerusalem temple is) demands taxes from people in general but not from his Son Jesus. The story ends in verse 27 with the miraculous provision of the money for paying the tax.

Although Jesus was under no obligation to pay the temple tax, he did pay it in order to avoid giving scandal to anyone. After A.D. 70, when the Jerusalem temple had been destroyed and the Jewish temple tax was diverted to provide for the upkeep of the pagan temple of Jupiter Capitolinus in Rome, this story would have furnished advice for the Jewish members of Matthew's community. As free children of God through Jesus, they are not obliged to pay the tax but should do so in order to avoid further problems (see Rom 13:1-7; 1 Pet 2:13-17).

X. ADVICE TO A DIVIDED COMMUNITY

Matt 18:1-35

The fourth of the five major discourses of Jesus (see chs. 5–7; 10; 13; 24–25) has been aptly described as Matthew's advice to a divided community. The evangelist has taken sayings from various sources and arranged them to supply guidance for Christian communities as they try to deal with status-seeking, scandal, lapses, reconciliation, and forgiveness. The two major parts of this discourse concern the care of the "little ones" (18:1-14) and the proper attitude toward community members who have sinned (18:15-35).

18:1-4 Greatness in God's kingdom (see Mark 9:33-37; Luke 9:46-48). The occasion for the discourse is provided by the disciples' question about who is the greatest in God's kingdom (v. 1). Their question had a context in Jewish society of the time, since there was a good deal of speculation about position and status in the coming kingdom. The community that gave us the Dead Sea scrolls even arranged the communal meals according to rank within the group. The meals were supposed to mirror what would happen when God's kingdom comes.

As an answer to the disciples' question, Jesus points to a child (v. 2) and urges the disciples to become like children (v. 3). In ancient society the child had no legal rights or standing and was entirely dependent on the parents. The child necessarily received everything as a gift. Likewise, no one through rank or status has a real claim on God's kingdom; only those who recognize this fact and receive the kingdom as a gift will enter it (v. 4). The child is presented as a symbol of those without legal right or claim to the kingdom, not as a model of innocence or humility. All speculations about rank in the coming kingdom and about the present as a mirror of the future are dismissed as a tragic misunderstanding of God and his kingdom.

18:5-10 Scandalizing little ones (see Mark 9:42-48; Luke 17:1-2). In this section the word "child" takes on a different meaning. In the preceding passage it referred to one without legal status, but here it describes a simple and good-hearted member of the community who can be led astray. The saying about receiving a child in Jesus' name in verse 5 expresses an identity between the little ones and Jesus. He dwells in them in a special way. Those who would lead them astray are given three sharp warnings: (1) It is better to be dead than to cause one of these little ones to stumble on the path of discipleship (v. 6). (2) Personal responsibility for scandal cannot be dismissed on the ground that scandal is inevitable (v. 7). (3) Anything—even going without a foot or a hand or an eye—is better than giving scandal within the community (vv. 8-9). This third warning may presuppose the image of the community as the body of Christ, from which offending members are to be cut off or excommunicated. The passage closes in verse 10, as it began in verse 5, with a reference to God's special care and concern for the "little ones."

18:12-14 Little ones who stray (see Luke 15:3-7). What happens if one of the little ones does go astray? This passage compares God to a shepherd who searches out those sheep that stray. The search is not automatically successful ("And if he finds it," v. 13), but the return of the "strays" gives great pleasure to God. God wishes that none of the little ones should ever perish or be damned (v. 14). Note that a distinction is drawn between those who stray and those who perish.

18:15-17 Reconciling a sinner. The second major part of Jesus' fourth discourse (18:15-35) concerns attitudes toward community members who have sinned. The first section (18:15-17) outlines the various steps to be taken when one Christian sins against another. At each stage (personal discussion, discussion before witnesses, discussion before the whole community), the aim is to win the erring Christian back to the community. Even the drastic step of excommunication probably was intended to shock the offender into reconciliation. Similar procedures were employed by the Dead Sea community, on the basis of Deut 19:15. The designation of the excommunicated member as a Gentile or a tax collector in verse 17 is odd in view of Jesus' openness to both groups. Here the terms simply describe people who were excluded from the mainstream of Jewish religious life.

18:18-20 Binding and loosing. In their present context within Jesus' advice to a divided community, the sayings about binding and loosing (v. 18) and the two or three gathered in Jesus' name (vv. 19-20) probably refer to the community's power to exclude erring members as a last resort. In verse 18 the disciples (see 16:19, where Peter alone receives the power) are promised that God will stand behind their decisions on earth. In verses 19-20 the agreement of the community joined in prayer will be accepted by God as binding, because he is present in the community's prayer in a special way. The momentous and painful character of cutting off one who has ignored the community is balanced to some extent by the community's confidence that God approves its decisions.

18:21-35 Forgiveness. Having dealt with the extreme case of the totally incorrigible member and the extreme punishment of excommunication, the discourse turns to the more ordinary experience of forgiveness and reconciliation within the community. The situation is the same as that of 18:15: "If your brother sins against you . . . ." In this case, however, the erring person listens to the offended party or to the several witnesses or to the community as a whole. How many times should such a person be forgiven? Once again Peter serves as the spokesman for the group and gives what he imagines to be a very generous answer to his own question. Seven times (v. 21). Jesus corrects Peter and answers: Seventy-seven times. The new number is not to be taken literally. The point is that Christians have no right to place any limit on forgiveness.

Why Christians may not set limits to forgiveness is illustrated by the parable of the merciless steward (vv. 23-25). This parable puts in story form the second "we-petition" of the Lord's Prayer: "And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors" (6:12). In other words, God's willingness to forgive us depends on our willingness to forgive others (see 6:14-15). The actions of the king in the parable indicate that he is to be identified with God. He demands a reckoning (v. 23), is approached as lord (v. 26), and shows great mercy in writing off the huge debt (v. 27). Yet the merciless servant failed to learn from the example of the king, and his cruelty toward the other servant results in the revocation of his own forgiveness (vv. 28-34). The story warns us that the forgiveness granted to us by God will be revoked unless we are willing to forgive others (v. 35). The unforgiving are excluded from God's mercy. Those who wish to receive God's mercy must show mercy toward others.

XI. GROWING OPPOSITION TO JESUS

Matt 19:1–23:39

19:1-12 Marriage and divorce (see Mark 10:1-12). The fourth discourse ends in the usual manner ("When Jesus finished"), and Jesus enters Judean territory (19:1). For Matthew (as for Mark), Galilee is the place of revelation (see 4:12-17) and Judea is the place of rejection and death. Jesus continues to attract great crowds and to heal the sick (v. 2).

As a way of testing Jesus, the Pharisees question him about marriage and divorce. The phrasing of their inquiry in verse 3 ("for any cause") places Jesus' teaching in the context of the Jewish debate about the grounds for divorce. According to Deut 24:1, the husband wrote out the terms of the divorce, presented it to the wife, and thus ended the marriage. The grounds for divorce in Deut 24:1 ("because he finds in her something indecent") are vague. In Jesus' time, one school restricted divorce to the case of adultery on the woman's part, and another school was far more free in its interpretation, to the extent that a woman could be divorced if she was a bad cook or not beautiful. It was assumed that divorced men and women could marry again, though the Temple Scroll from Qumran casts doubt on this for members of some Jewish circles at least.

Matthew's presentation of Jesus' teaching on marriage and divorce in verses 4-9 first cites Gen 1:27 (v. 4) and Gen 2:24 (v. 5) to the effect that in God's original plan of creation marriage was indissoluble and no human agent could end such a union (v. 6). In the Old Testament (see Deut 24:1-4) divorce was allowed only as a concession to human weakness. This was not God's original intention (vv. 7-8). Once again Jesus assumes the role of the authoritative interpreter of the law, and in verse 9 he forbids divorce and remarriage absolutely, except for the case of porneia—most likely a marriage contracted within the degrees of kinship forbidden by Lev 18:6-18 (see the commentary on Matt 5:32). There is little doubt that Jesus regarded marriage as indissoluble (see Mark 10:11-12; Luke 16:18; 1 Cor 7:10-11). But it is not easy to know whether in this case Jesus was stating an ideal or laying down a command.

The radical nature of Jesus' teaching on this topic (it does away with Deut 24:1-4) leads the disciples in verse 10 to question whether it is advisable to marry at all. In 19:11 Jesus clearly states that celibacy is a gift from God and is not for all (v. 11). According to verse 12, Christian celibacy is a response to the experience of God's kingdom as made present in the teaching and example of Jesus. It is not based on male suspicion of women, cultic purity, or the demands of community life. The Dead Sea community also seems to have had both married and celibate members.

19:13-15 Children and the kingdom (see Mark 10:13-16; Luke 18:15-17). As someone with a reputation for holiness, Jesus' blessing was much sought for children (v. 13). The assumption was that the power of holiness somehow went forth from him and communicated itself to others. The occasion is used to teach about receiving God's kingdom. As was the case in 18:1-4, the child represents those without legal claims or rights, those who must necessarily receive everything as a gift. The kingdom is for those without pretensions to status and superiority, for those who recognize that it is a gift.

19:16-30 Wealth and the kingdom (see Mark 10:17-31; Luke 18:18-30). The theme of wealth as a possible obstacle to perfect discipleship is raised in the story of Jesus' encounter with the rich young man. When asked what is necessary to have eternal life, Jesus invites the young man ("If you wish") to enter eternal life by observing the Ten Commandments and the command to love one's neighbor as oneself (vv. 16-20). When he replies that he has already been observing these commandments, Jesus invites him to a new stage ("If you wish to be perfect") in verse 21. For this person, perfection as a disciple of Jesus involves distributing his wealth to the poor and sharing in the insecurity and the trust that were characteristic of the earthly Jesus and his first followers. The young man was unable to accept Jesus' invitation to the new stage of perfection beyond the observance of the law (v. 22).

The rich young man's inability to accept Jesus' challenge sets the scene for general teachings on wealth as an obstacle to discipleship in verses 23-26. Not only is it difficult for the rich to enter God's kingdom (v. 23); it is practically impossible, as the saying about the "eye of a needle" in verse 24 makes clear. The disciples' amazement in verse 25 stems from their assumption that wealth is a sign of divine favor. In verse 26 Jesus teaches that no one can enter the kingdom because of his or her own possessions or achievements; the kingdom is God's gift.

As the spokesman once again, Peter asks about the rewards for accepting Jesus' challenge to radical poverty (vv. 27-30). Peter had left his fishing business in Galilee (see 4:18-22) and his family (see 8:14-15). The risks and sacrifices of Jesus' first followers should not be minimized. In the "new age" of the kingdom, they will share in the glory of the Son of Man (v. 28) and will be rewarded with an even better social and religious community (v. 29). The odd saying about the reversal of positions between the first and the last in verse 30 is illustrated in the following parable.

20:1-16 The parable of the good employer. By bracketing the parable in 20:1-15 with the sayings about the first and the last in 19:30 and 20:16 and by placing it in the context of the rewards for the disciples (19:27), the evangelist makes it illustrate Jesus' promise that the disciples, now considered the last, will be the first in receiving rewards (see 20:8). In the context of Jesus' ministry, the parable was probably addressed to his opponents who criticized him for preaching the good news of the kingdom to tax collectors and sinners. In that setting, the parable is best entitled "the good employer." The employer is God as revealed in Jesus as his representative.

The good employer hires workmen at dawn for the usual daily wage of one denarius and sends them off to work in his vineyard (vv. 1-2). Other workmen in verses 3-7 are hired at various times during the day (midmorning, noon, midafternoon, late afternoon), but their wages are not specified ("whatever is just"). In verse 8 the employer commands that the workers be paid in the reverse order of their hiring and that all receive the same wage (v.11). To the complaints of those who had worked all day (vv. 11-12), the employer answers that he has been just in paying the agreed wage to them (vv. 13-14); they have no right to complain if he wants to be generous to others (v. 15). God's own justice and generosity are used to explain why Jesus preached the kingdom to both the already pious and the lost sheep of Israel (see 10:6). If they accept his preaching, both groups will be granted an equal share in God's kingdom.

20:17-19 The third prediction of the passion (see Mark 10:32-34; Luke 18:31-34). The third prediction of the passion occurs on the road leading up to Jerusalem, which is located in a mountainous region. This prediction is more detailed than the two previous ones (16:21; 17:22-23) and mentions explicitly the Jewish and Gentile tormentors of Jesus. Matthew's version specifies crucifixion as the mode of Jesus' death.

20:20-28 Places of prominence in the kingdom (see Mark 10:35-45). The question of status in the coming kingdom (see 18:1-4) appears again with the request by the mother of James and John that her sons should have places of special prominence in the kingdom. In Mark 10:35-37 the two disciples make the request on their own. Jesus replies in verses 22-23 that (1) in order to share in his kingdom, the disciples must share his cup of suffering, and (2) it is not his prerogative to assign positions of prominence in the kingdom. The indignation of the other disciples in verse 24 furnishes the occasion for Jesus to teach about service to others as the way of leadership in his community. Then leadership as power according to Gentile patterns ("lord it over them") is contrasted with leadership after the pattern of Jesus, the servant and slave of all (vv. 25-27). This style of leadership as service to others is grounded in the example of Christ's sacrificial death as a "ransom for many" (v. 28).

20:29-34 The healing of two blind men (see Mark 10:46-52; Luke 18:35-43). The story of the healing of the two blind men at Jericho parallels the healing of Bartimaeus in Mark 10:46-52, but there are many differences. In Matthew's account there are two blind men (for a similar phenomenon, see 8:28), and more attention is paid to their faith in Jesus' power than to the process of the healing. They address Jesus in verses 30, 31, and 33 in the language of prayer. They call him "Lord" and "Son of David." The irony is that those who are blind physically have the spiritual insight to recognize Jesus for who he really is. Jesus the merciful healer then gives them physical sight (v. 34), and they join the band of his disciples.

21:1-11 The Messiah's entrance (see Mark 11:1-11; Luke 19:28-38; John 12:12-19). Jesus' entry into Jerusalem is made from the east, from the Mount of Olives, which was connected with the "day of the Lord" in Zech 14:4. Matthew understood the event as the fulfillment of Isa 62:11 and Zech 9:9 (Matt 21:5). Isa 62:11 ("Say to daughter Zion") is fulfilled by the enthusiastic reception given to Jesus by the crowds (v. 8) and the greeting given to him as the Son of David in the words of Ps 118:25-26 (v. 9). The whole city is interested in Jesus, and he is identified as the prophet from Galilee (vv. 10-11). Zech 9:9 is fulfilled in the humble manner in which Jesus enters the city. The two beasts of burden ("the ass and the colt") in verses 2, 7 fulfill in an overly literal way the double mention of the animal in the Old Testament passage. Jesus' entrance into Jerusalem was the entrance of the Messiah and so conformed fully to Old Testament prophecy and Jewish expectations. However, it was also the entrance of a humble person, not that of a military conqueror.

21:12-17 The Messiah's temple (see Mark 11:15-19; Luke 19:45-48; John 2:13-22). The Messiah's first actions in the holy city involve the temple of Jerusalem. His action in overturning the commercial enterprises in the outer court of the temple (v. 12) is also presented as fulfilling Old Testament prophecies. According to Isa 56:7, the temple should be a house of prayer; according to Jer 7:11, those businessmen have turned it into a den of thieves.

Besides this symbolic protest against the commercialization of the temple, Jesus also cures the blind and the lame. The presence of the blind and the lame in the temple area was probably not welcomed by the temple officials (see 2 Sam 5:8). Up to this point, the Pharisees had been the chief opponents of Jesus, but now and throughout the rest of the Gospel the chief priests and elders emerge as the major enemies. Angered by Jesus' demonstration, the healings in the temple area, and the popular enthusiasm for Jesus, the opponents ask for an explanation in verse 16. The explanation that Jesus offers is that the children's enthusiasm is simply the fulfillment of Ps 8:3. With that, Jesus departs for Bethany, a village east of Jerusalem, and spends the night there.

21:18-22 The cursing of the fig tree (see Mark 11:12-14, 20-24). The cursing of the fig tree is the only miraculous action of Jesus that does any harm or works destruction. In fact, it is best seen as a symbolic or prophetic action: When the Messiah came to search for the fruits of righteousness in the holy city, he found nothing there. The action prefigures the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70. Matthew's emphasis on the miraculous character of the action ("immediately the fig tree withered") in verses 19, 20 sets the stage for the sayings in verses 21-22 on the extraordinary power of prayer offered in faith. The disciples can share in the power of Jesus if they have faith like his. As is customary in Matthew's Gospel (see especially chs. 8–9), the display of Jesus' miraculous power dissolves into a teaching on the dynamics of prayer and faith.

21:23-27 Jesus' authority (see Mark 11:27-33; Luke 20:1-8). The debate about Jesus' authority in verses 23-27 is the first in a series of controversies between Jesus and his opponents. The series is interrupted by three parables in 21:28–22:14 and rejoined in 22:15-46. In the first controversy the opponents are the chief priests and elders of the people. This group will be instrumental in getting Jesus put to death. The point of controversy is the authority (v. 23) on which Jesus had entered the city, cleansed the temple, healed the lame and the blind, and taught.

Jesus' response takes the form of a question to his questioners (vv. 24-25). He promises to answer their question if they will first state publicly whether John's baptism was from God or purely human. Jesus' question puts his opponents on the defensive: If they say "from God," they admit their stupidity and lack of spiritual insight in not taking up John's cause. If they say "purely human," they risk the anger of the many people who regarded John as a prophet sent from God. Jesus' counter-question reduces his opponents to silence ("We do not know"). They have been put to shame, and Jesus has come away from the debate with honor (v. 27). The controversy also continues the parallel between John the Baptist and Jesus. Matthew's readers know that God was the source of the authority for both John and Jesus.

21:28-32 The two sons. The controversies are interrupted by three parables dealing with the culpability of Jesus' opponents (vv. 28-32), the punishment allotted to them (vv. 33-43), and the carrying out of that punishment (22:1-14). The parable of the two sons (vv. 28-32) assumes that Jesus' preaching of God's kingdom is a pivotal moment in Israel's religious history. Just as the second son initially refused the father's command but later repented and obeyed (v. 30), so the tax collectors and prostitutes (v. 31) are now reforming their lives in response to Jesus and are entering the kingdom. Just as the first son promised to obey but did nothing (v. 29), so the professedly and publicly religious opponents of Jesus fail to act upon Jesus' message of the kingdom. The opponents' culpability consists in their refusal of Jesus' preaching and stands in sharp contrast to the openness and resolve of those whom they despise. In verse 32 the parallel between John and Jesus continues: The dynamic of the parable of the two sons was present in John's ministry also. The conversion of the tax collectors and sinners to the way of righteousness should inspire Jesus' opponents to accept his preaching, and not to regard him with suspicion and hostility.

21:33-46 The tenants (see Mark 12:1-12; Luke 20:9-19). The parable of the tenants concerns the punishment allotted to the religious and political leaders of Israel. The parable obviously alludes to the description of Israel as God's vineyard in Isa 5:1-7, and many of the phrases in verse 33 are taken directly from that Old Testament passage.

God is the owner of the vineyard; he has leased out his property to the religious and political leaders. Many servants (prophets) were sent to the vineyard, but they all met the same bad fate (vv. 34-36). The owner expects that at least his son (Jesus) will be received with respect. In fact, he receives even worse treatment, to the point of being killed outside the vineyard (vv. 37-39). When the owner himself comes, he will punish the tenants by destroying them (v. 41) and taking away their claim to preeminence in God's kingdom (v. 43). The vineyard will be leased to others (the church), and the people of God in Christ will yield an abundant harvest. The opponents' rejection of Jesus ("the stone") is the reason for their punishment. This brings to fulfillment Ps 118:22 (v. 42). Matthew's community would find in this parable an explanation for the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70 and a justification for its claim to be the true people of God.

The saying about the stone in verse 44 is absent from many early manuscripts and may have been added in other manuscripts from Luke 20:18 because of the thematic connection with Matt 21:42. The major enemies of Jesus—the chief priests and the Pharisees—recognize that these parables concern them (v. 45) but fear to arrest Jesus because the crowds consider him to be a prophet (see 21:11, 26).

22:1-14 The royal marriage feast (see Luke 14:15-24). The parable of the royal marriage feast concerns the punishment of Jesus' opponents (especially vv. 5-7) and has many features in common with the parable of the tenants in 21:33-46. The marriage feast or banquet was a popular way of imagining what life in the coming kingdom would be like. The king and his son clearly represent God the Father and Jesus respectively. The invitation offered by the first group of servants (prophets) is refused (v. 3), but the invitation given by the second group of servants (perhaps John the Baptist and Jesus) encounters not only indifference (v. 5) but also hostility, to the point that those servants are executed (v. 6). The vivid description in verse 7 of how the king's army destroyed those murderers and their city surely brought to the minds of Matthew's first readers the Roman conquest of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Because the professedly and publicly religious people of Israel refused the invitation to the kingdom of God, a general invitation has been made (vv. 8-10) to all kinds of people, including tax collectors and prostitutes (and perhaps even non-Jews).

Mere acceptance of the invitation, however, does not guarantee participation in the banquet, as the incident in verses 11-13 makes clear. Guests at a wedding banquet would be expected to appear in clean and neat clothing. When the king (God the Father) sees a man who is not dressed properly, he questions him in a cool manner ("My friend") and has him ejected from the banquet hall. Being a tax collector or prostitute is no more a guarantee of salvation than being a Pharisee or chief priest is; rather, one must receive Jesus' invitation to the kingdom and act upon it so that when the banquet actually begins, one will be properly prepared to participate. In this context the saying in verse 14 suggests that the invitation to the kingdom has been offered to all kinds of people, but only a few of them act upon it in such a way as to be allowed to participate in the banquet of the kingdom.

22:15-22 Taxes to Caesar (see Mark 12:13-17; Luke 20:20-26). After the three parables directed at Jesus' opponents, the series of controversies is rejoined. The second controversy concerns paying taxes to the emperor. The opponents are the Pharisees, who as religious people resented paying taxes to a foreign government, and the Herodians, who may have administered the system of taxation in Palestine. The two groups join forces to trap Jesus. If he affirms that taxes should be paid, he loses the esteem of the religious nationalists. If he denies that taxes should be paid, he is subject to arrest as a political revolutionary.

The Pharisees and Herodians approach Jesus in a flattering but hypocritical manner (v. 16), and then spring their question about whether it is lawful to pay taxes to the emperor (v. 17). Recognizing their hypocrisy (v. 18), Jesus eludes their trap by asking them to show him a coin bearing the image and the name of the emperor. The very fact that both the Pharisees and the Herodians use the emperor's coin implies that they should pay taxes to the emperor (v. 21). Jesus, however, moves the debate to another level by challenging his opponents to be as observant in paying their debts to God as they are in paying their debts to the emperor. The opponents are revealed as hypocritical and not really religious, and Jesus gains honor for having recognized their character and having eluded their trap.

22:23-33 Resurrection (see Mark 12:18-27; Luke 20:27-40). The third controversy in the series focuses on belief in the resurrection of the dead. The conservative, priestly party of Sadducees denied the resurrection of the dead on the grounds that it appears in Old Testament books other than the Pentateuch. The Sadducees accepted as authoritative only the first five books of the Bible. The references to belief in resurrection appear in Isa 25:8; 26:19; Ps 73:24-25; and Dan 12:2.

The objection of the Sadducees in verses 24-28 uses the practice of levirate marriage described in Deut 25:5-10 (the obligation of a man to marry the wife of his dead brother) in order to reduce belief in the resurrection to absurdity. Instead of unraveling their argument, Jesus charges that they understand neither the Scriptures nor the power of God (v. 29). They fail to understand God's power (v. 30), because the resurrected life will be entirely different from the present life. Since there will be no marriage then, the Sadducees' argument on the basis of levirate marriage is groundless. They also fail to understand the Scriptures (vv. 31-32), because Exod 3:6 ("I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob") presupposes that the patriarchs of Israel were still alive in Moses' time. Therefore, the resurrection of the dead is taught in the Pentateuch.

22:34-40 The greatest commandment (see Mark 12:28-34; Luke 10:25-28). The fourth controversy revolves around the greatest commandment in the Old Testament. The questioners are the Pharisees in the person of a lawyer (vv. 34-35). Jewish teachers of Jesus' time were frequently asked to summarize the law in a brief statement. For example, Hillel summarized the law in a way that is much like the so-called golden rule of Jesus (see 7:12): "What you hate for yourself, do not do to your neighbor. This is the whole law; the rest is commentary. Go and learn." Jesus' summary of the law consists of two commandments that encourage love of God (Deut 6:5) and love of neighbor (Lev 19:18). These two commandments are the threads on which the entire law hangs. With this answer, Jesus proves his fidelity to the Jewish tradition and his commitment to a spirituality that emphasizes the essentials.

22:41-46 The Messiah (see Mark 12:35-37; Luke 20:41-44). In the fifth controversy in the series, Jesus asks the Pharisees about the Messiah. They respond correctly that the Messiah is David's Son (v. 42). Jesus' further question in verses 43-44 assumes (as Jews of his time did) that David was the principal author of the Book of Psalms and that the Scriptures, under the Spirit's inspiration, contained prophetic statements about the future. In Ps 110:1, David refers to the Messiah as "my lord." Therefore, the Messiah must be superior to David, and "Son of David" is not an adequate title for the Messiah. A more sufficient title is "Lord." This controversy and the two preceding ones illustrate the superior ability of Jesus in interpreting the Scriptures. Those opponents who claimed great knowledge of the Scriptures are reduced to silence (v. 46).

23:1-12 Warnings against the scribes and Pharisees (see Mark 12:38-40; Luke 20:45-47). The controversies with, and the parables against, Jesus' opponents culminate in a stinging attack in 23:1-39. The passage contains a severe warning to avoid the religious style of the scribes and Pharisees (vv. 1-12), seven woes against the scribes and Pharisees (vv. 13-36), and a final lament over Jerusalem (vv. 37-39). The seven woes have led some interpreters to view chapter 23 as the introduction to the fifth major speech, with the woes corresponding to the beatitudes of chapter 5. But the abrupt changes of audience and the subject matter of chapter 24 indicate that chapter 23 is best taken with the preceding material about Jesus' opponents.

The audience for Jesus' attack on the scribes and Pharisees consists of his disciples and the crowds (v. 1). The scribes were religious intellectuals, skilled in interpreting the Old Testament and in applying it to everyday life. The Pharisees belonged to a religious fraternity that expressed its fellowship in communal meals and prided itself on the exact observance of the law. Not every scribe was a Pharisee, nor was every Pharisee a scribe. A modern Christian equivalent to the phrase "scribes and Pharisees" would be something like "theologians and Jesuits." The scribes and Pharisees in verses 2-3 are said to occupy the chair of Moses, which was the way of describing the seat of honor in the synagogue from which the teacher delivered his teaching. The audience is urged to follow their teachings but to avoid their hypocrisy. It is difficult to square verse 3 with the many other statements in chapter 23 and elsewhere in the Gospel that criticize the teachings, and not merely the practices, of the scribes and Pharisees. Their imposition of the priestly regulations on lay people contrasts with the easy yoke and light burden of Jesus (see 11:28-30).

The opponents' love of self-display and desire for honorific titles are criticized in verses 5-10. Among their showy practices are enlarging the small scroll boxes (phylacteries) worn during prayer (see Exod 13:9; Deut 6:8; 11:18); lengthening the tassels worn at the four corners of the cloak (see Num 15:38-39; Deut 22:12); competing for the places of honor at social and religious gatherings; and seeking after prestigious titles like "rabbi," "father," and "master." These titles are rejected in verses 8-10 on the grounds that only God deserves the title "father" and only Jesus merits the title "master." Religious showiness is rejected in verses 11-12 in light of the Christian ideal of leadership as service to the community (see 20:25-28) and the dynamic of humility and exaltation.

23:13-36 Woes against the scribes and Pharisees (see Luke 11:37-52). Pronouncing a "woe" on someone or some group expresses grief at their sorry state and warning of the very bad consequences to follow. The first of the seven woes against the scribes and Pharisees (v. 13) accuses them of hindering people from entering God's kingdom, perhaps by their opposition to Jesus and his disciples. The second woe (v. 15) accuses them of making great missionary efforts in gaining converts but actually doing harm to the converts' spiritual lives. The third woe (vv. 16-22) refers to the Pharisees' attempts at discouraging oaths sworn by the most sacred things (the temple, the altar, God) and shifting the oaths to less important things (the gold of the temple, the gift on the altar, heaven). Jesus rejects this campaign as ridiculous casuistry.

The fourth woe (vv. 23-24) criticizes the opponents for neglecting the most important concerns of the law (justice, mercy, and fidelity) on account of their obsession with calculating the religious taxes to be paid on vegetables and spices. This overwhelming interest in trivia (the gnat) leads them to overlook the big things (the camel). The fifth woe (vv. 25-26) and the sixth woe (vv. 27-28) both contrast a pure exterior with a rotten interior. The opponents' concern with the ritual purity of cups and dishes used at meals is not matched by their efforts at moral purity. So wide is the gap between external appearance and internal reality that the opponents may be described as "whitewashed tombs" (v. 27).

The seventh woe (vv. 29-36) reflects the widespread building of tombs and shrines for martyred prophets around Jerusalem. Jesus accuses the scribes and Pharisees of being the physical and spiritual descendants of the people who were originally responsible for these martyrdoms. Proof of this charge is the hostility shown to Jesus and his followers in the present and in the future (v. 34). The retribution promised against "this generation" (vv. 35-36) would have been interpreted in Matthew's community as the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70. Abel (see Gen 4:1-16) was the first righteous person to be killed, and Zechariah (see 2 Chr 24:20-22) is presented as the last canonical prophet to have been martyred.

23:37-39 Concluding lament (see Luke 13:34-35). Jesus' final lamentation over Jerusalem characterizes the city as murderer of the prophets and opponent of the Messiah (v. 37). Therefore God will cease to dwell in the temple (v. 38), and Jesus the Messiah will not be seen there until he returns as judge with the coming of the kingdom of God. Jesus speaks as God's prophet decrying Israel's apostasy and as the Messiah who is to come again in glory.

XII. THE COMING OF THE KINGDOM

Matt 24:1-25:46

The fifth and final discourse concerns the events surrounding the future coming of God's kingdom. Since the kingdom will mark the end of history as we know it, the discourse is often called the "eschatological discourse" (from eschaton, the Greek word for "end"). The first part (24:1-36) relies heavily on Mark 13:1-37 and describes the events that must happen before the end will come. The second part (24:37-25:30) contains parables and other traditional materials that encourage an attitude of watchfulness. A picture of the last judgment (25:31-46) concludes the discourse.

24:1-3 The setting (see Mark 13:1-4; Luke 21:5-7). The scene of the discourse is set in verses 1-3. Jesus had entered the temple area in 21:23 and foretold that God would desert the temple in 23:38. His prediction of the temple's destruction in 24:2 would represent an accomplished fact for Matthew's community after A.D. 70. Seated on a place with traditional connections to the coming of the kingdom (see Zech 14:4; Matt 21:1), Jesus talks with the full circle of disciples. They ask him when (1) the temple will be destroyed, and (2) he will come as the Son of Man, and the world as we know it will end. In his reply Jesus is careful to make a distinction between these two happenings.

24:4-14 The early stages (see Mark 13:5-13; Luke 21:8-19). Jews of Jesus' time believed that great sufferings would accompany the coming of God's kingdom. The first section of Jesus' answer to the disciples' questions warns against mistaking the early stages of those sufferings (v. 8) for the final stage. Among the events in the first stage are the appearance of false messiahs (see Acts 5:33-39) or even persons claiming to be Jesus returned from heaven (v. 5); wars between nations (vv. 6-7a); and various natural disasters (v. 7b).

The Christian community will not be immune from the "labor pangs" of the kingdom.

It will experience persecution and hatred from outside (vv. 9-10a) as well as apostasy, false prophets, and widespread tepidity within the community (vv. 10b-12). The only appropriate attitude for loyal Christians is patience (v. 13). They are assured that the end will not come until the gospel has been preached throughout the world. Matthew's community had already seen some of the religious, political, and natural disasters mentioned in verses 5-8. It had probably also experienced firsthand the problems proper to the church (vv. 9-13). An important motive for writing the Gospel was to encourage the community to preach the good news of Jesus the Messiah to all the people of the world (see 28:19).

24:15-22 The great tribulation (see Mark 13:14-20; Luke 21:20-24). The time of the great tribulation will begin with the so-called abomination of desolation (v. 15). That phrase originally referred to the attempt of the Syrian king Antiochus IV Epiphanes to set up an altar to Baal Shamen in the Jerusalem temple in 167 B.C.E. (see Dan 9:27; 11:31; 12:11). It was probably used again with reference to the emperor Caligula's plan to have a statue of himself erected in the temple in A.D. 40. Perhaps Matthew identified it with the Roman profanation and destruction of the temple in A.D. 70 or with some still future event.

In either case, Jesus presents instructions in verses 16-18 on how to avoid the great tribulation by fleeing to safe refuges in the mountains, by coming down from the roof by the outside staircase and not bothering to try to rescue anything inside the house, and by not bothering to pick up one's coat left by the side of the field. The point is clear: Get out of the way, and be quick about it! In verses 19-20, he takes pity on pregnant women and nursing mothers (who could not move quickly) and hopes that the great tribulation will not occur during the cold, rainy season or on the sabbath (when travel would be either very difficult or contrary to the Jewish law).

This tribulation will be the greatest that the world has ever seen or ever will see (v. 21). But on account of the patient members of the Christian community (see v. 13), God has shortened this period of tribulation. If he had not done so, no human being could survive at all. Whatever connections may have been made between the advance of the Roman army in A.D. 70 and the great tribulation, the language used to describe the tribulation far outdistances those historical happenings. The tribulation signals the end of the world as we know it.

24:23-36 The coming of the Son of Man (see Mark 13:21-32; Luke 21:25-33). The graphic description of the coming of the Son of Man (vv. 29-31) is sandwiched between two warnings not to be deceived about when he is to come (vv. 23-28, 32-36). The disciples (and Matthew's readers) should not be misled by false messiahs and false prophets even if they can work miracles, or by rumors about the Messiah being in the desert or in hiding (vv. 23-26). The actual coming of the Son of Man will be sudden and public, like a lightning bolt (v. 27). Its signs will be unmistakable and unambiguous, just as the vultures signify the presence of a carcass (v. 28).

Nearly every phrase in the description of the Son of Man's coming (vv. 29-31) can be found in the Old Testament passages concerning the coming of God's kingdom. After great cosmic disturbances (see Isa 13:10; Ezek 32:7; Amos 8:9; Joel 2:10, 31; 3:15; Isa 34:4; Hag 2:6, 21), the Son of Man will come on the clouds of heaven (see Dan 7:13-14). The tribes of the earth will beat their breasts (see Zech 12:10), and the trumpet blast will begin the last judgment (see Isa 27:13). The judgment will vindicate the chosen ones of the Son of Man, who is pictured here as a superhuman figure with divine authority. Early Christian tradition identified him with Jesus, the humble and suffering Son of Man.

The fig tree (vv. 32-33) is one of the few trees in Palestine that sheds its leaves annually. Thus it allows the intelligent observer to tell the time of year from its stages of growth. Likewise, when all the signs listed in verses 3-22 have come to pass, then people will know that the Son of Man is near (v. 33). The prophecy that all these events will take place in the present generation (v. 34) is balanced by the insistence that only the Father knows exactly when the Son of Man will come (v. 36). It is not possible to identify "all these things" (v. 34) with the death and resurrection of Jesus. A second, glorious arrival of Jesus is clearly intended. The passage makes clear that not even the Son himself knew the precise moment.

24:37-44 Pictures of the Son of Man's coming (see Mark 13:32-37; Luke 17:26-30, 34-36). The second part of the eschatological discourse (24:37–25:30) consists of parables about the coming of the Son of Man and related traditions. In the parables there is frequently a division of people into two groups. The coming of some figure (the Son of Man) is uncertain or delayed, but suddenly it happens. Rewards and punishments (the last judgment) are handed out. The lesson is watchfulness in the present. Watchfulness is responsible service of God shown in the careful fulfillment of one's duties until the Son of Man comes.

The first section (vv. 37-44) combines several pictures in order to describe the arrival of the Son of Man (v. 37). The Noah parable (vv. 37-39) contrasts Noah and the other people of his generation. The flood came upon them suddenly and had dire consequences for many. The pictures of the two men in the field (v. 40) and the two women grinding meal (v. 41) emphasize the suddenness of the coming and the separation that it will bring. Since the exact hour of the coming is unknown, the only appropriate attitude is constant watchfulness (v. 42). This attitude is encouraged further by the story of the homeowner (v. 43). If a homeowner knows when a thief is coming, he exercises watchfulness at that time. But since the time of the Son of Man's coming remains unknown, the watchfulness must be constant (v. 44).

24:45-51 The two servants (see Luke 12:41-48). The parable of the two servants contrasts watchfulness and lack of vigilance. The faithful and wise servant (vv. 45-47) does his duty. When the master returns and discovers him at work, he is abundantly rewarded. The wicked servant (vv. 48-51) takes advantage of the master's prolonged absence by mistreating the other servants and wasting time in foolish pleasures. The master will certainly return sometime. When he does, the wicked servant will be punished. The lesson is that constant watchfulness will be rewarded and lack of vigilance will be punished when the Son of Man comes.

25:1-13 The ten bridesmaids. The parable of the ten bridesmaids contains many features already familiar from the preceding parables. The ten bridesmaids are divided into two groups: the foolish and the wise. The foolish ones have made no provisions for lighting their torches, while the wise ones have. The story assumes the Palestinian custom of the bridegroom's going to the bride's house in order to make the marital agreement with his father-in-law. When the bridegroom returns with the bride to his own home, the wedding feast can begin. The bridesmaids are expected to meet the bridegroom and the bride as they approach the house. The foolish bridesmaids are sure that the bridegroom will not arrive at night, but the wise ones recognize that he can arrive at any time (vv. 2-4). The bridegroom is delayed (v. 5), but he finally arrives at a most unexpected time (v. 6). The foolish bridesmaids are caught by surprise and are unable to obtain oil in time for the beginning of the wedding feast (vv. 7-10). The door is locked, and they are refused entrance (vv. 11-12). Once more, the lesson is constant watchfulness (v. 13).

25:14-30 The talents (see Luke 19:11-27). The parable of the talents has many elements found in the preceding passage, but it concentrates on the judgment scene (vv. 19-30). The master (the Son of Man) goes away and distributes various sums of money to three servants. The Greek word that describes these sums is "talents." The parable is the source of the English term "talent" as the description of a natural ability that can be improved by diligent practice. Though there are three servants in the parable, they really constitute two groups: the two who invest and double the amount, and the one who buries the money. The master is away for a long time, and suddenly he returns and demands an accounting (v. 19). The accounting is clearly the last judgment. It involves rewards for the two servants who doubled the sums given to them (vv. 20-23) and punishment for the servant who did nothing (vv. 24-30). Constant watchfulness demands fruitful action and even boldness.

25:31-46 The judgment of the nations. The eschatological discourse reaches its climax and conclusion with the scene of the last judgment. Even though the story compares the Son of Man to a shepherd, it probably should not be classed as a parable, since the judgment is presented in a direct and straightforward way. When the Son of Man comes in his glory (see 24:29-31), he will divide "all the nations" into two groups (vv. 31-33). Those who have done good deeds for one of "these least brothers of mine" (v. 40) will be blessed (vv. 34-40), but those who have failed to do these deeds for one of "these least ones" (v. 45) will be condemned (vv. 41-46). The good deeds are feeding the hungry, offering hospitality to the homeless, clothing the naked, comforting the sick, and visiting the imprisoned. These deeds deserve a reward at the last judgment because of the relationship of identity between the Son of Man and "the least" (vv. 40, 45).

Who are "all the nations" (v. 32), and who are "the least" (vv. 40, 45)? The usual interpretation understands "all the nations" as including all humanity, and "the least" as including people in distress of some kind. Therefore, at the final judgment all humanity is to be judged according to acts of kindness done to poor and suffering people. But is this what Matthew and his community understood by the story? In Matthew's Gospel, "nations" and "all the nations" usually refer to people other than Israel (see 4:15; 6:32; 10:5, 18; 12:18, 21; 20:19, 25; 21:43; 24:7, 9, 14; 28:19). In several passages (see 10:40-42; 18:6, 14), the "least brothers" seem to be Christians. If these terms have the same meaning in 25:31-46 that they have elsewhere in the Gospel, "all the nations" are the Gentiles who have not explicitly accepted either Judaism or Christianity, and "the least" are Christians with whom the Gentiles have had some contact. According to this interpretation, the Gentiles will be judged according to acts of kindness done to Christians (see 10:40-42).

XIII. THE DEATH AND RESURRECTION OF JESUS

Matt 26:1–28:20

Almost eighty percent of Matthew's passion account is identical in vocabulary and content with Mark's account. Matthew adds some materials that tend to develop themes already present in Mark 14-16. Jesus is even more obviously in command of the events, and everything proceeds according to God's will as revealed in the Old Testament.

26:1-5 The plot (see Mark 14:1-2; Luke 22:1-2; John 11:45-53). The introductory scene sets the major figures on stage. Jesus tells his disciples plainly that at Passover time he will be arrested and crucified (vv. 1-2). Passover is the spring festival commemorating ancient Israel's release from slavery in the land of Egypt. The major opponents of Jesus are not the scribes and Pharisees, but rather the chief priests and elders gathered around the high priest Caiaphas (vv. 3-5). Passover was a pilgrimage feast that attracted large crowds to Jerusalem, and so the opponents wish to avoid setting off a revolution by arresting a popular religious teacher from Galilee during that time.

26:6-16 The anointing (see Mark 14:3-11; Luke 22:3-6; John 12:1-8). At a house not far from Jerusalem, a woman shows Jesus the signs of respect and hospitality by anointing his head with some expensive ointment. The disciples' complaint that the ointment could have been sold and the proceeds given to the poor (vv. 8-9) furnishes the occasion for Jesus to interpret the woman's action. The first interpretation (vv. 10-11) concerns the extraordinary status of Jesus and the special privilege connected with the time of his earthly presence. The second interpretation (vv. 12-13) suggests that the anointing is a preparation for Jesus' burial. The Hebrew word Messiah means "anointed," and from the very start the passion of Jesus is the story of the Messiah's suffering and death. The woman's beautiful deed stands in sharp contrast to Judas' plans to betray Jesus (vv. 14-16). Matthew suggests that Judas' motive was greed (v. 15) and that the thirty pieces of silver promised to him fulfilled Zech 11:12.

26:17-25 The meal at Passover time (see Mark 14:12-21; Luke 22:7-14, 21-23; John 13:21-30). Matthew's account of the preparations for the Passover meal (vv. 17-19) focuses on Jesus' command in directing the course of events. Jesus is very much in charge. Although Matthew follows Mark in interpreting the meal as marking the actual beginning of the Passover festival, the reference in John 18:28 and the supposed activities of the chief priests and elders during these days indicate that it more likely took place on the evening before the first day of Passover. At the meal, Jesus predicts that one of the Twelve will betray him (vv. 20-25). In verse 25, Matthew makes it clear that Jesus knew that his betrayer was Judas. The other disciples' addressing Jesus as "Lord" (v. 22) contrasts with Judas' "Rabbi" (v. 25). The enormity of the betrayal is brought out by the fact that the one sharing the meal with Jesus would hand him over. The fact that God's plan is being fulfilled (v. 24) does not absolve Judas of responsibility for Jesus' death.

26:26-29 The Eucharist (see Mark 14:22-26; Luke 22:15-20). Jesus' actions and words with the bread and the wine anticipate and interpret his impending death. What happens to the bread in verse 26 will happen to Jesus' body, and what happens to the cup of wine in verse 27 will happen to his blood. Sharing in the bread and wine means sharing in Jesus' death. The "blood of the covenant" (v. 28) alludes to Exod 24:8, where Moses seals the old covenant by sprinkling the people with blood, and "on behalf of many" suggests some connection with the atoning suffering of the Servant of the Lord in Isa 53:12. The expiatory or atoning value of Jesus' death is underlined by "for the forgiveness of sins." According to verse 29, Jesus' meal with the disciples anticipates the heavenly banquet that will be part of God's kingdom. This account of the Last Supper brings together many aspects of the church's Eucharistic celebration: Passover meal, memorial of Jesus' death, covenant, sacrifice, and preview of the kingdom.

26:30-35 Peter's denial foretold (see Mark 14:27-31; Luke 22:31-34; John 13:36-38). The discussion between the disciples and Jesus on the Mount of Olives is further evidence that Jesus knew what awaited him and that all these events were proceeding according to God's will as expressed in the Old Testament. He tells them that their faith in him will be shaken this very night, and that his arrest and their scattering will fulfill Zech 13:7 (v. 31). He also commands them to go to Galilee, which is the place of revelation (see 4:13-17) and the site of the climactic resurrection appearance (see 28:16-20). Jesus even knows that Peter will deny him three times before dawn (v. 34). Peter's self-confident boast (vv. 33, 35) sets the scene for the dramatic story of his denial in 26:69-75.

26:36-46 Prayer in Gethsemane (see Mark 14:32-42; Luke 22:39-46). The account of Jesus' prayer in Gethsemane presents him as the obedient Son of God who accepts God's will that he suffer and die (vv. 39, 42, 45-46) and the disciples as needing instruction on how to remain on guard in times of trial (vv. 40-41, 43, 45-46). Gethsemane (v. 36) was a small olive garden on the Mount of Olives, and once again the inner circle of disciples consists of Peter, James, and John (v. 37). The wording of Jesus' statement to the disciples in verse 38 reflects phrases found in Pss 42:5, 11; 43:5. Jesus prays three times, and returns three times to find the disciples asleep. The content of the prayers (vv. 39, 42) indicates that Jesus had to school himself to accept the suffering that awaited him. His final summons to the disciples (vv. 45-46) shows perfect submission to the Father's plan and confidence that the power of his evil opponents is only temporary.

26:47-56 The arrest (see Mark 14:43-50; Luke 22:47-53; John 18:3-12). The story of Jesus' arrest first describes how Judas arranged to betray Jesus to the chief priests and elders (vv. 47-50). In the crowded and excitable conditions of Jerusalem during the Passover pilgrimage, careful planning was needed if a riot was to be avoided. Judas determined on the typical signs by which a disciple would greet his teacher—the embrace (vv. 48-49) and the greeting "Rabbi" (v. 49). Jesus' response is the cool greeting "Friend" (see 20:13; 22:12), and with that he is arrested.

The incident of the cutting off of the ear of the high priest's servant (v. 51) provides the occasion for Jesus to repeat that these events are taking place in accord with God's will and the Old Testament Scriptures (vv. 52-54). Jesus' parting words to the crowds (vv. 55-56) emphasize his political innocence and harmlessness as well as his recognition that the disciples' desertion was the fulfillment of Zech 13:7 (see 26:31).

26:57-68 The trial before the Sanhedrin (see Mark 14:53-65; Luke 22:54-55, 63-71; John 18:13-14, 19-24). The trial of Jesus before the Sanhedrin is located at the high priest's house (v. 58) and involves the chief priests, scribes, and elders. After fruitless efforts at developing a case against Jesus (vv. 59-60), two charges are made: He threatened to destroy the temple (v. 61), and he claimed to be the Messiah (v. 63). The charge about threatening to destroy the temple probably reflects Jesus' preaching that the coming of the kingdom would demand a new kind of worship (see Mark 14:58; John 2:19-21; Acts 6:14) or may have a connection with his prophetic cleansing of the temple (see 21:12-17). The charge about his messiahship suggests that the Jewish and Roman authorities viewed Jesus as one more in the series of political-religious agitators so common in Palestine during this period.

Instead of meeting these charges directly, Jesus in verse 64 speaks about the coming Son of Man (see Dan 7:13-14). The reaction is swift and furious. The high priest calls it blasphemy (v. 65). The council sentences him to death (v. 66). Others mock him and challenge him to play the prophet (vv. 67-68). Even though both Mark and Matthew understood this proceeding at the high priest's house to have been a legal trial, the Fourth Gospel's understanding of it as an investigation something like our grand-jury proceeding (see John 18:13-14, 19-24) is more likely on historical grounds.

26:69-75 Peter's denial (see Mark 14:66-72; Luke 22:56-62; John 18:15-18, 25-27). Peter's denial of Jesus is highly dramatic. His partner in conversation progresses from simply a maid (26:69), to a maid plus the bystanders (v. 71), to the crowd of bystanders (v. 73). His denials advance from a plea of ignorance (v. 70), to a denial accompanied by an oath (v. 72), to cursing and swearing followed by an outright denial that he knew Jesus (v. 74). The crowing of the cock at dawn (vv. 74-75) brings the shock of recognition that Jesus' prediction in verse 34 has come to pass. Peter's cowardice under pressure stands in sharp contrast to Jesus' faithfulness unto death.

27:1-2 The delivery of Jesus to Pilate (see Mark 15:1; Luke 23:1-2; John 18:28-32). The story of the handing over of Jesus to Pilate assumes that the Jewish leaders held a second legal proceeding at daybreak and passed the death sentence on Jesus. Pilate was the military governor of Judea from A.D. 26 to 36. His headquarters were at Caesarea on the Mediterranean shore, and he came to Jerusalem during the Passover pilgrimage to keep order.

27:3-10 The death of Judas. Matthew's story of Judas' death continues the theme of Old Testament fulfillment, since the goal and climax of the passage is the quotation presented in verses 9-10. That quotation, though attributed to Jeremiah (v. 9), actually joins phrases from Zech 11:12-13 and Jer 18:2-3; 19:1-2; 32:6-15. The story also proves that Jesus, who knew beforehand what Judas was plotting, was correct in his judgment about the terrible fate of his betrayer (see 26:24). Matthew describes Judas' death as a suicide by hanging (v. 5). A somewhat different account appears in Acts 1:16-20. A third concern of the passage is the responsibility of the Jewish leaders for Jesus' death. They have condemned Jesus to death (v. 3). They do not deny his innocence (v. 4). Their scruple about adding blood money to the temple treasury leads them unwittingly to fulfill the Old Testament text (vv. 6-8).

27:11-26 The trial and sentencing of Jesus (see Mark 15:2-15; Luke 23:3-5, 13-25; John 18:33–19:16). The account of Jesus' questioning and sentencing by Pilate places the responsibility for Jesus' death on the Jewish leaders. The chief priests and elders manipulate the Roman governor (v. 12). The portrayal of Pilate as weak and indecisive contrasts with other ancient characterizations of him as inflexible, merciless, and obstinate. His question to Jesus in verse 11 probably carried a political nuance. Although Jesus was in fact the Messiah and thus the genuine King of the Jews, his only response to Pilate is silence (v. 14), perhaps in accord with Isa 53:7 and Ps 38:12-14. Pilate could not have understood the spiritual nature of his messiahship.

The practice of giving amnesty to a prisoner at Passover time is known only from the Gospels. Given the choice of Jesus or Barabbas, the chief priests and elders manipulate the crowd to have Pilate free Barabbas and crucify Jesus (vv. 15-18, 20-23). Jesus' innocence is confirmed by the report of a dream experienced by Pilate's wife (v. 19), and the Jewish leaders are charged with acting out of jealousy at Jesus' popularity (v. 18). When asked what crime Jesus had committed, the crowd gives no answer (v. 23).

By offering the crowd a choice between Jesus and Barabbas, Pilate had apparently hoped to release Jesus. The plan backfired. Seeing that a riot was developing (and he had come to Jerusalem to prevent a riot), Pilate declares Jesus to be innocent and places the responsibility on the crowd for the death of Jesus (vv. 24-25). The crowd accepts the responsibility. The scourging was intended to weaken Jesus so as to shorten the time of crucifixion (v. 26). The episode as a whole (vv. 11-26) stresses that the Roman governor allowed Jesus to be crucified, not because he was guilty of a crime, but rather because the crowd, incited by the chief priests, forced him into it.

27:27-31 The mockery (see Mark 15:16-20; John 19:2-3). The account of the mockery of Jesus contains two features that run through the entire account of Jesus' death in verses 27-50: (1) The way in which the soldiers are described in verse 27 is reminiscent of Ps 22:16: "A company of evildoers encircles me." Psalm 22 is the psalm of the righteous sufferer, and Matthew, following Mark and other early Christians, saw in that psalm an explanation of Jesus' death. The crucifixion was part of God's plan for the Messiah. (2) "Messiah" is preeminently a royal title in the Jewish tradition, and Jesus is mocked as a king. He is given a mock robe, crown, and sceptre. The soldiers kneel before him and address him as "King of the Jews." Right from the start and with exquisite irony, Matthew emphasizes that Jesus suffered as the King of the Jews in accordance with Psalm 22.

27:32-44 The crucifixion (see Mark 15:21-32; Luke 23:26-43; John 19:17-27). The crucifixion story begins when Simon of Cyrene, a Jew from North Africa, is forced to carry Jesus' cross (v. 32). Golgotha (v. 33) was a small hill just outside the wall of Jerusalem at that time; criminals could not be executed within the walls of the holy city. The offer of wine mixed with gall (v. 34; see also v. 48) fulfills Ps 69:21. The two major themes of the crucifixion account appear in verses 35-37: The division of Jesus' garments fulfills Ps 22:18, and the charge on which Jesus was crucified involves his identity as King of the Jews.

Three groups insult the crucified Jesus in verses 38-44: the passers-by (vv. 39-40); the chief priests, elders, and scribes (vv. 41-43); and the robbers crucified along with Jesus (v. 44). They unwittingly fulfill Ps 22:7-8. The content of their mockery reflects the two charges raised against Jesus at his trial before the council in 26:57-68: the threat to destroy the temple and the claim to be the Son of God or Messiah. The opponents are correct in calling Jesus the King of the Jews (v. 37), even though they do not realize the truth of their statement.

27:45-54 The death of Jesus (see Mark 15:33-39; Luke 23:44-48; John 19:28-30). Even in death, Jesus remains the righteous sufferer of Psalm 22. His last words (v. 46) are a direct quotation from Ps 22:1. The darkness over the land of Judea (v. 45) may have been an eclipse or a sandstorm that fulfilled Amos 8:9 or Exod 10:22. Jesus' use of Psalm 22 on the cross (v. 46) does not preclude an experience of intense suffering. In fact, the words of the psalm express most appropriately his feelings of abandonment and his subsequent reaffirmation of his total trust in the Father. The confusion about Elijah (vv. 47-49) probably reflects Jewish traditions about the prophet's roles as forerunner of the Messiah and helper of people in distress. The description of Jesus' death in verse 50 is simple and even understated.

Jesus' death is accompanied by several signs (vv. 51-54) that help Matthew's readers to understand its significance. First, the curtain in the Jerusalem temple is torn (v. 51a). This signifies either the end of the barrier between God and humanity or the end of the old covenant. Then in verses 51b-53 (and only in Matthew) the signs that were expected to accompany the coming of God's kingdom occur. Those signs are described in terms found in Ezek 37 and indicate that Jesus' death inaugurates a new stage in history that will culminate in the resurrection of the dead. Finally, in verse 54 the centurion and his men, who were surely non-Jews, confess that Jesus was truly the Son of God. Their confession provides a model for all non-Jews who accept Jesus as the Son of God.

27:55-61 The burial of Jesus (see Mark 15:40-47; Luke 23:49-56; John 19:38-42). The account of Jesus' burial establishes that he was really dead and that on Easter Sunday morning the women did not go to the wrong place. Matthew describes Joseph of Arimathea as a rich disciple of Jesus and thus avoids the possible inference from Mark 15:43 that Joseph had shared in the Sanhedrin's condemnation of Jesus. Unless Jesus had really died, Pilate would not have allowed the release of the corpse (v. 58) and Joseph would not have placed the corpse in the burial cave (vv. 59-60). The women, who had known Jesus for a long time (v. 55), saw him die and also saw the tomb in which the corpse of Jesus had been placed (v. 61).

27:62-66 The guard at the tomb. The same points made in the preceding account are emphasized in the story of the guarding of Jesus' tomb, a passage found only in Matthew's Gospel. For the first time in the passion narrative, the Pharisees appear along with the chief priests (v. 62) and demand that Pilate establish a guard around Jesus' tomb. Their suspicion that Jesus' disciples might steal his corpse probably reflects the Pharisees' response to the early Christian preaching about the resurrection of Jesus. According to Matthew, Pilate refused their request. So the opponents established their own guard at the tomb, thus affirming that Jesus really died and that they too knew where he was buried.

28:1-10 The empty tomb (see Mark 16:1-8; Luke 24:1-12; John 20:1-10). No one witnessed the resurrection of Jesus, nor does Matthew suggest that anyone did. He and the other evangelists tell only about the empty tomb and the appearances of the risen Lord. The explanation for the emptiness of the tomb is that Jesus had been raised from the dead (v. 6). The women, who had seen Jesus die and knew exactly where he had been buried on Friday afternoon, return to the tomb early on Easter Sunday morning (v. 1). They encounter an angel who had rolled back the large round, flat rock fitted into the groove at the entrance of the tomb and who had terrified the guards dispatched by the chief priests and Pharisees (vv. 2-4). The angel explains the emptiness of the tomb in verses 6-7 with reference to Jesus' three passion predictions (see 16:21; 17:23; 20:19). The women, inspired by both joy and fear, hasten to tell the disciples (v. 8). On the way they encounter the risen Lord and do him homage (v. 9). He instructs them in verse 10 to tell the disciples to leave Jerusalem (the place where Jesus was rejected) and to go to Galilee (the place of revelation). After his resurrection, he too goes to Galilee (see 26:32).

28:11-15 The report of the guards. The story of the guards and the chief priests explains why the guards assigned by the chief priests and Pharisees (see 27:65-66) and present at the angel's appearance (see 28:4) did not come forward and make public what they had experienced. According to this account (only in Matthew's Gospel), the guards were bribed by the chief priests and elders to say that the disciples stole Jesus' body from the tomb. The opponents do not deny that Jesus died and was buried, but they do reject the resurrection of Jesus as the explanation of the empty tomb. Instead, they circulate the false story that Jesus' body was stolen.

28:16-20 The great commission. The appearance of the risen Jesus on the mountain in Galilee is a very important scene in the overall plan of Matthew's Gospel. The mountain (see 5:1; 17:1) and Galilee (see 4:12-16) are preeminent places of revelation. The eleven disciples are the Twelve minus Judas. Their doubts (v. 17) may involve the possibility of having such an experience at all or the propriety of worshiping Jesus. In either case, their doubts vanish quickly. They, like the women in verse 9, worship Jesus (see 2:1-12).

The so-called great commission of verses 18b-20 consists in the statement about Jesus' authority (v. 18b), the command to make disciples (vv. 19-20a), and the promise of Christ's abiding presence until the fullness of God's kingdom comes (v. 20b). Thus it summarizes the three major themes of Matthew's Gospel: (1) Supreme and universal authority has been given to Jesus by his heavenly Father. Therefore he far surpasses every other human being and deserves all the exalted titles given to him. (2) The disciples are to share their discipleship with all people (not simply their fellow Jews) and to hand on Jesus' teaching to them. The largely Jewish community for which Matthew wrote his Gospel probably needed some encouragement to share their faith with non-Jews, and the statement in verse 19a was most likely understood as a reference to the Gentile mission. The wording of the command to baptize (v. 19b) undoubtedly reflects a baptismal formula used in the Matthean community. (3) The promise of Jesus' continuing presence with the disciples and their successors brings to fulfillment the name "Emmanuel" ("God is with us") given to Jesus at conception (see 1:23), in accordance with Isa 7:14. The promise assumes a "time of the church" between the inauguration of God's kingdom through Jesus and its fullness at the end of the world. The spirit of the risen Jesus will guide and protect the church during this time.

MARK

Philip Van Linden, C.M.

INTRODUCTION

Mark's Gospel: one of four portraits of Jesus

It is commonly accepted by the majority of contemporary New Testament scholars that Mark's Gospel was the first to be written and that it was a source used by Matthew and Luke in the composition of their Gospels. (The Gospel of John, it seems, developed out of a tradition that did not know of the other three Gospels.) God's purpose in inspiring four evangelists was not primarily to "preserve the facts" about Jesus' life on earth but to meet the many different needs of the people in the newly formed first-century Christian community. God chose several believers to communicate the "good news" about Jesus in such a way that the various spiritual needs of the early church community could be met.

The Christian community today is also made up of people with a great variety of spiritual needs, and its faith can be nourished by the four inspired "Jesus portraits" of Mark, Matthew, Luke, and John. When Christians choose to encounter Mark's Jesus, they meet with that side of Jesus that is the simplest of the four, and very demanding! They discover that Mark's version of Jesus' life centers on his death and on the meaning of suffering. When they open themselves to involvement with Jesus as Mark presents him, they realize that they too are invited to discover the meaning of life and death as he did, namely, by radical trust in God and by loving service to others' needs.

A glimpse at the whole of Mark's Gospel

The overall plan and framework of Mark's Gospel is simple and involving. As his drama unfolds, his readers will be involved in the mystery of who Jesus is and what it means to be his follower. The Gospel develops gradually in three stages. In the first stage (chs. 1–8), Mark's readers are drawn into a relationship with the powerful healer and preacher, Jesus of Nazareth. During this first stage no one seems to understand Jesus' true identity, not even his disciples. Suddenly, in the encounter at Caesarea Philippi, what had been hinted at earlier (e.g., 3:6: "they took counsel . . . against him . . . to put him to death") becomes clear: "The Son of Man must suffer greatly . . . be killed, and rise after three days" (8:31). In this first climax of his Gospel, Mark's readers also learn that the way of Christ is the way of the Christian (8:34: "Whoever wishes to come after me . . ."). Theirs too is the way of the cross!

The second stage of Mark's Gospel (chs. 9–15) gradually reveals to its readers the concrete means of true Christian discipleship. This is summed up best in 10:45, where Jesus says: "The Son of Man did not come to be served but to serve and to give his life as a ransom for many." And that is precisely what happens in the second climax of the Gospel, as Jesus dies for his people (chs. 14–15).

Jesus' death, however, is not the end. For the third stage of the Gospel of Mark begins with the proclamation of Jesus' resurrection and with his going to Galilee ahead of his disciples (16:6-7). It is at the empty tomb that Mark's readers take the place of Jesus' first followers and become the major characters in his Gospel drama (16:8). It is as his Gospel ends that Mark challenges his readers most dramatically to respond to Jesus in their lives with trust, and not with the trembling and bewilderment of the women at the tomb! The third stage of Mark's Gospel continues in the life of the church, until the risen Lord comes again.

The characters and themes in Mark's Gospel

Mark's narrative account of Jesus' ministry, death, and resurrection emphasizes certain themes that were of great importance in the early church. It is also important for the Christian community of the twentieth century to meditate upon them: (1) the humanity of Jesus; (2) trust as the heart of discipleship; and (3) service to others as the daily way of taking up Jesus' cup and cross.

1) Of the four Gospel portraits of Jesus, Mark's is by far the one that best reveals the human side of Jesus. While Mark's Jesus spends most of his time performing incredible acts of mercy, which reveal that he is God's Son, he is also depicted as a most human Lord. Only Mark preserves those details that bring out how sharp (1:25), deeply grieved and angry (3:5), or indignant (10:14) Jesus could be with those around him. Mark alone adds the touching detail to the story of Jesus' raising of the little girl from her deathbed: "she should be given something to eat" (5:43). Only Mark's Jesus looks at the rich man and loves him (10:21) before he challenges him to give up all to follow him. Mark's Jesus is often discouraged by his inability to get his own disciples to understand him and his mission (e.g., 4:13; 8:14-21). Mark reveals a Jesus who is at once the powerful Son of God and a most human person. Mark's readers will sense that the Jesus of this Gospel is very approachable, because he has experienced life as they have, with all its disappointments and its loves, with all its joy and sadness.

2) Mark believes that the truest sign of being Jesus' disciple is trust. He challenges his readers to a radical trust in the risen Lord in a most provocative way by portraying Jesus' first disciples as slow-witted, even blind. Mark's Jesus looks for trust in who he is, but the disciples respond with amazement and fear to what he does! They see who Jesus is on one level (their Messiah-Savior, who gives them bread, in 6:34-44 and 8:1-10). But they are blind to him on another level (their Messiah-Suffering Servant, who gives them life through his death, in 10:35-45). The Jesus who could give sight to the physically blind (8:22-26; 10:46-52) could not give insight and understanding to his most intimate followers!

The blindness of Jesus' disciples is one of the tragic threads of Mark's narrative. In presenting them in this way, however, Mark hopes that his Christian readers will see better than Jesus' first disciples did. He hopes that they will trust in Jesus, not as the "instant cure-all Messiah," but as the one whose death gives meaning to the life and suffering they experience.

3) A final cluster of Markan images is closely related to Mark's presentation of the human Jesus and the blind disciples. Jesus' challenge to trust in him leads to the cup and the cross. And in concrete daily life, Jesus' cup and cross take the form of being "the slave of all" and serving others rather than being served by them (10:44f.). Although Mark's Gospel does not give long lists of "how to" serve God and others, its readers cannot avoid the model of Mark's Jesus as the suffering servant of all. They know that they must seize every opportunity to serve others in charity if they want to be his followers.

It is in the garden of Gethsemane that the major themes of Mark's Gospel seem to come together. In his agony there, the human heart of Jesus is "troubled and distressed" (14:33). The one who has challenged his disciples to trust in God alone comes close to giving up himself: "Father . . . take this cup away from me." However, as his disciples sleep, Jesus continues his prayer in faith: "but not what I will but what you will" (14:36). Anyone searching for the meaning of Christian life and discipleship in Mark's Gospel can turn to the Gethsemane passage (14:32-42) and hear it all summed up: "Give yourself to the suffering Messiah. Trust as he did, even though he would rather not have trusted. Join him in serving the needs of your brothers and sisters, even unto death."

The Gospel of Mark in the liturgy

For centuries most of the readings at Sunday Eucharists were chosen from the Gospel according to Matthew. With the renewal of the liturgy after the Second Vatican Council, there came a major restructuring of the Gospels to be proclaimed on Sundays. Mark's Gospel became the "Cycle B Gospel," read on most Sundays from January to November every third year (1988, 1991, 1994, etc.). Weekday Eucharists feature Mark's Gospel even more regularly, daily during the eight weeks that precede the Lenten season. Consequently, by being open to the Liturgy of the Word, Christians can now experience the person and message of Mark's Gospel on a regular basis, in union with all those who share in the church's liturgy. With all of God's people, they are invited to follow Mark's Jesus from his baptism and first preaching (1:7-11 and 1:14-20: Third Sunday in Ordinary Time) to his last days before entering upon his passion (13:24-32: Thirty-third Sunday in Ordinary Time). The liturgical experience of Mark's Gospel can thus be very formative of the church's relationship with Jesus. It can also serve as a weekly, even daily, rallying call to deeper involvement in service to others, which is the hallmark of the Markan Christian.

The author and his times: A matter of urgency

According to some fathers of the early church (e.g., Papias, A.D. 135; Irenaeus, A.D. 200; and Origen, A.D. 250), the "Gospel according to Mark" was the work of an associate and interpreter of Peter. The Acts of the Apostles links a certain "John Mark" with Peter (Acts 12:12), and the First Letter of Peter concludes with encouragement from Peter and greetings from "Mark my son" (1 Pet 5:13). Most scholars today feel that the tradition of Peter's influence on Mark's Gospel was more practical than historical, that is, such a tradition assured this Gospel of apostolic authority ("It came to the church through Mark from Peter!"), which was so important in the formative years of the church. From the Gospel itself, it is possible only to identify its author as a zealous member (pastor?) of the second-generation church, who seems to be writing around the time of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman army in A.D. 70 (see especially 13:1-23 for indications of this timeframe).

It also becomes evident as one reads Mark's Gospel that his message is a most urgent one. It seems that Mark and his community belonged to that part of the early Christian community which believed that Jesus was going to return very soon, as he said (9:1; 13:30-31). In order to be on guard and ready for his glorious return as "Son of Man coming in the clouds . . . to gather his elect" (13:26-27), Mark urges his Christians to learn from his Jesus the meaning of radical, here-and-now discipleship, as if there is no tomorrow.

And so it begins, "the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God," according to Mark.

COMMENTARY

"AND SO IT BEGINS"

Mark 1:1-45

The Gospel of Mark begins with a powerful title sentence. In his theme verse, Mark announces his belief that Jesus of Nazareth, who had lived among the people of Palestine for some thirty years, healing their sick and teaching them the goodness of God, and who had been put to death among thieves, is indeed alive as the risen Christ, the Son of God.

Mark, unlike Matthew and Luke, does not relate anything about the infancy of Jesus; instead, he immediately introduces his readers to the adult Jesus through his forerunner, John the Baptist. Mark's readers are quickly drawn into the drama of Jesus' active ministry. They witness Jesus' miraculous power and the ensuing conflicts with those who fail to understand his life's mission. The drama that begins here in chapter 1 will eventually unfold in the final mystery of conflict and power, the death and resurrection of Jesus. It is in the crucified and risen Jesus that Mark and his Christian readers find their source of hope and strength for living as Jesus did.

1:1 The Son of God. Mark's first verse is more power-packed than a casual reading would suggest. It is more than a title verse, announcing the Gospel's central character: Jesus Christ, the Son of God. It also provides the key to understanding the succeeding sixteen chapters. That is because in only one other place in the Gospel does a human being proclaim that Jesus is Son of God (the centurion who put Jesus to death, in 15:39). This prepares Mark's readers to question their own faith-convictions about Jesus of Nazareth. According to Mark, no one else would recognize Jesus' true identity while living with him and witnessing his powerful teaching and healing. In his first verse, Mark gives his readers the clue to the end and purpose of his whole Gospel: to know Jesus as the Son of God is to believe that he is their suffering Messiah, who died on the cross and who now lives as their risen Lord. Mark's Jesus asks his disciples to follow him to life on his way—the way of loving service, even unto death.

1:2-8 John points to Jesus. John the Baptist has only one function in the Gospel of Mark: he is the one who points to Jesus as the Messiah. His call for conversion to God through baptism and the forgiveness of sins, as well as his clothes and food, makes him the new Elijah (see 2 Kgs 1:8) sent by God "to prepare the way of the Lord." John recognizes that one more powerful is soon to come after him. Although Jesus will be baptized by John, it is clear that even John knows his subordinate role in the Jesus drama. As Mark's narrative unfolds, he will present John the Baptist again, in 6:14-29. There, by his death at the hands of King Herod, John will fulfill the role of pointing to Jesus' death, just as here his baptism with water points to Jesus' baptism "with the Holy Spirit." John's whole courageous life and death point to Jesus of Nazareth. He is a model of total witness to Christ for Mark's readers.

1:9-11 God confirms John's preaching. What John's preaching points to, God himself confirms. Although Jesus comes from Nazareth to be baptized by John in the Jordan River (Matthew, Luke, and John diminish John's role in Jesus' baptism), Mark makes it very clear that it is God himself who blesses Jesus. It is God who rends the heavens, sends his Spirit upon Jesus in the form of a dove, and says: "You are my beloved Son. With you I am well pleased." God likewise has descended upon Christians in their baptism, making them favored sons and daughters of God. As Mark's readers follow the Son, they learn how to be like him. They see how he let the Spirit of his baptism lead him to drink the cup of suffering at the end of his life of service and interpret his impending death as a second "baptism" which his disciples would share (10:35-45).

1:12-15 Jesus' journey begins. Mark's version of the temptation in the desert is much shorter than Matthew's or Luke's. Its brevity, however, makes its significance more direct. The Spirit leads Jesus into the desert. Tempted and tested there by Satan for forty days, as the people of Israel were tested before him, Jesus is protected by God through his angels. Mark's two verses state simply that Jesus has withstood the test and is ready for his brief but saving life of service to God and humanity. Experiences of temptation and weakness were not unknown to the Son of God. Mark thus tells his readers that the protecting spirit of Jesus is with them in their weakness just as God was with him in his desert experience.

With John's arrest (v. 14), Jesus' work begins. Mark's "gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God" began at verse 1. Now the "good news of God" begins, as Jesus' first words are heard: "This is the time of fulfillment" (v. 15). Yes, says Mark, God's reign of power has begun in Jesus, who is God's good news in person. Jesus' announcement would have exhilarated the faithful Israelites of his day. However, he immediately links the good news with an equally important call for radical response: "Therefore, repent and put all your trust in the gospel of God that I bear!" In these brief inaugural words of Jesus' ministry, Mark summarizes the gospel message that Jesus preached: the very power of God is available to those who open themselves to Jesus and to his gospel way of loving service.

1:16-20 The call of the first four followers. Jesus, who has just begun preaching about the kingdom of God and conversion, effects what he preaches. Immediately after Jesus says "Come after me" to the brothers Simon and Andrew, James and John, they turn from family and lifework as fishermen to follow him. In this brief but very striking scene, Mark shows how powerful and direct Jesus' call to share in his mission can be. He also holds up as a model for his readers the immediate and total response of the four. But if Mark's readers are to gain the full impact of this passage, it is vital that they be aware of how Simon (named Peter by Jesus in 3:16), James, and John will respond elsewhere in the Gospel. (Andrew is mentioned only three other times: when Simon's mother-in-law is cured, 1:29; when Jesus names him among the Twelve, 3:18; and when he is with Peter, James, and John again, talking with Jesus about the end of the temple, 13:3.)

This first involvement of Peter, James, and John with Jesus is only the beginning of an exciting yet tension-filled journey. These three will be the only ones whom Jesus permits to share in four experiences in which he most clearly reveals the power and purpose of his life (healing and giving life, in 1:29-31 and 5:37-43; the glory-filled transfiguration, in 9:2-13; the message about the future times, in 13:1-37). At the same time, they will be the ones who will most seriously misunderstand their Lord and fail him at crucial points of their intimacy with him (Peter at Caesarea Philippi, in 8:27-33; James and John seeking "to be first," in 10:35-45; all three of them in the garden of Gethsemane, 14:32-42; Peter's denial, in 15:66-72).

The eager and total response of the disciples here, once seen in Mark's overall drama, draws the readers of the Gospel into a tension that will be experienced over and over as the journey with Jesus unfolds. For Mark, to "come after" Jesus and to join in his mission means to walk a journey of life-giving exhilaration and draining confusion, of overwhelming power and powerlessness. It is an invitation to respond, "Yes, I leave all and follow you," not only in one radical conversion experience but continuously until the end.

1:21-28 Spellbound and amazed by his teaching and power. Mark's readers do not learn what Jesus teaches in the Capernaum synagogue, but they do learn how he teaches ("with authority," vv. 22 and 27), and what effect his powerful teaching has (people are "astonished" and "amazed," vv. 22 and 27; the unclean spirit is overwhelmed, v. 26). The repetition of the phrase "with authority" (found twice, at v. 22 and v. 27) indicates that Mark wants the events of Jesus' first teaching and first powerful action to be seen as intimately related. He not only speaks with authority—he also acts with power!

It is important to know that for Mark and his first-century Christians the "unclean spirit" (v. 23) and other "demons" (see 1:32; 3:11, 15, 22; 5:2, etc.) represented evil, mysterious powers who were hostile to God, health, and goodness. These demons were thought to be so perceptive that they could know who was a representative of God's power. Here, the "unclean spirit" reveals Jesus as "the holy One of God" (v. 24) and cunningly tries to thwart his mission for goodness. Jesus' two commands are sharper and more forceful than the challenges of the unclean spirit. For Jesus' word effects what it says: the unclean spirit leaves the man, shrieking one last time as he goes down in defeat (v. 26). The "amazed" bystanders acknowledge the teacher's authority, yet they still have to ask: "What is this?" (v. 27).

Mark's intention here is to make his readers confident in their Lord as teacher and healer. However, the allusion to the people's amazement (v. 27), which caused Jesus' reputation to spread throughout Galilee (v. 28), also has another purpose. It is precisely the people's response of being amazed (1:27 and 5:20), or astounded (2:12 and 5:42) that will eventually bring other hostile forces to seek to destroy Jesus (see 6:14-29, where Herod is threatened by Jesus' reputation and ends up beheading John the Baptist). Mark wants more from his readers than amazement; he wants them to be alert when Jesus reveals himself in less appealing ways. "Will you also be amazed when Jesus begins to teach that the Son of Man has to suffer much, be rejected by the chief priests, be put to death, and rise three days later (8:31)? Will you recognize him for who he is when he hangs on the cross, abandoned by most of his followers who were amazed by his first signs of power?"

The followers of Mark's Jesus can have much confidence in Jesus as wonderworker. However, those who want to follow the "amazing one" must also go the way he goes. They must deny themselves, take up their cross, and follow after him (8:34).

1:29-31 Simon's mother-in-law. In verse 29, Mark has Jesus move immediately from his first powerful miracle to another. The visit to Simon's mother-in-law turns into a second sign that God's kingdom of wholeness is present in him. In 1:25 Jesus cured with a word; here he cures sickness by a touch (1:31). His touch saves as surely as his word. The fact that the woman's cure is immediate and total is made clear by Mark's emphasis on how she resumes her duties of hospitality, waiting on her guests in verse 31.

1:32-34 The Messiah and his secret. Jesus' first day of ministry does not end with sundown. That evening "the whole town" gathers around him with their sick and possessed. His first day of preaching and healing has given them hope that God is at work among them. After Jesus has cured many, Mark's readers first hear the curious phrase "not permitting them (the demons) to speak, because they knew him" (v. 34). This reminds Mark's readers of the "Quiet!" of 1:25 and prepares them for what they will hear repeatedly in Mark's Gospel (1:44; 3:12; 5:43; 7:36; 8:26; 8:30; 9:9). Mark presents Jesus as being very reserved about letting his reputation as miracle-worker spread. This reticence is called the "messianic secret." By emphasizing such secrecy regarding Jesus' identity as Messiah, Mark hopes that his Christian readers will accept Jesus' true identity, on his terms, in the context of his entire life and mission. Mark's Jesus will reveal himself as Messiah by being powerless on the cross. Christians are free to proclaim Jesus as their Messiah and Lord only when they accept his way of suffering messiahship along with his miraculous works.

1:35-39 The good news spreads. Jesus rises early and withdraws to a desert place to pray alone (v. 35), because he knows that the people are seeking him out only because of his miraculous powers. They have misunderstood him, and so he must move on to neighboring villages and continue his ministry of preaching and healing throughout all of Galilee (v. 39). Not even Simon can hold him back, for not even Simon understands where Jesus' way leads. Perhaps Mark's readers, who already know the end of the journey, will profit much from their own desert experiences of prayer with "the misunderstood Messiah."

1:40-45 The leper is healed and misunderstands. The healing of the leper is a remarkable scene, full of marked contrasts. It is a fitting conclusion to Mark's first chapter. The powerful but misunderstood Messiah is approached directly by a person who is normally denied any contact with healthy people. This outcast's trust in Jesus is met by the pity and power of his touch and word. However, the leper's exhilaration at his cure is dampened by a stern repetition of Jesus' prohibitive messianic secret: "Tell no one anything!" (v. 44). (Only the priest is to know, because only his word can allow the outcast to re-enter the society from which his sickness has kept him.)

Instead of following Jesus' word, the cured man tells everyone! And Jesus' mission is thwarted as soon as it begins: "It was impossible for Jesus to enter a town openly" (v. 45). Through this concluding story of chapter 1, Mark asks all Christian followers to take Jesus at his word. He asks them to take Jesus seriously, as he is, at his pace on the journey, and in his time. To be a Christian is to respond to Jesus' word with fidelity, whether that word is "Be made clean" or "Tell no one anything!"

JESUS IN CONFLICT

Mark 2:1–3:6

In Mark's first chapter, Jesus' appearance as teacher and healer had drawn the sick, possessed, and needy to him "from everywhere" (1:45). Now, in this section of five closely related scenes (2:1–3:6), Jesus' activity on behalf of those in need will draw the scrutinizing attention and threatening ire of the scribes and Pharisees, who make their first appearance in the Gospel.

The Markan drama continues to portray a powerful Jesus, whose "teaching with authority" (1:27) still issues forth in miraculous cures of the sick. But now there is more. Now it becomes evident that Jesus' claims to forgive sins (2:5) and to be "lord of the sabbath" (2:28) are the cause of open conflict with the religious leaders of his day.

As Mark's readers journey with Jesus from the cure of the paralytic (2:1-12) to the cure of the man with the withered hand (3:1-6), they will sense an increasing tension. They will be lifted up with joy by Jesus' powerful but gentle love of the needy and outcast. They will swell with pride at their Lord's wise teaching, which will eventually bring his wise antagonists to silence (3:4). At the same time, they will sense the dark place where all these "successful encounters" lead. They will sense that the Son of Man already stands in the shadow of the cross, even before Mark makes it clear at 3:6, when he concludes this section: "The Pharisees went out and immediately took counsel with the Herodians against him to put him to death." How well Mark prepares his Christian followers for the ultimate conflict of Jesus' life!

2:1-12 "My son, you are forgiven/ healed." Back in Capernaum, Jesus is surrounded by great numbers of people again (v. 2; see 1:33). As he preaches to the crowd, four friends of a paralyzed man lower him on his mat through the roof so that he can be close enough for Jesus to see him and cure him (vv. 3-4). (Such extraordinary means to get close to Jesus emphasized the faith of these friends as well as the overwhelming size of the crowd Jesus attracted.) Jesus responds to this act of faith, not by healing the man immediately, but by touching off the first of a series of controversial dialogues with the onlooking scribes and Pharisees. When Jesus says, "Child, your sins are forgiven" (v. 5), he is as much as saying, "It is God whom you approach." (In the Old Testament, only God is capable of forgiving sins; and it was expected that he would do so only at the end of time.) It thus becomes clear why the scribes murmur "he is blaspheming" (v. 7) and why Jesus brings it all out in the open. His claim to be able to forgive sins better reveals his identity as Son of God than do the miracles he performs.

Aware of the silent censure his forgiving word has caused in the crowd, Jesus proceeds to prove that "the Son of Man has authority to forgive sins on earth" by commanding the man to rise and walk in the sight of everyone (vv. 8-11). In concluding this miracle, Mark asks his readers to praise God for his presence in their midst as the forgiver-healer, just as the crowd did (v. 12), even in the face of those who do not believe.

It is significant that Mark has chosen to present this miracle and teaching about Jesus' power to forgive sins so early in his Gospel drama. It shows that the need for the experience of God's forgiveness was as important to first-century Christians as it is today. Mark's readers praise God for saying clearly, even today, "My sons, my daughters, I absolve you from your sins."

2:13-22 Jesus and Levi; eating and fasting. After the conflict with the Pharisees over his dealing with the paralytic, Jesus continues to teach the crowds and to gather his first band of disciples (v. 13). He calls a tax collector, Levi, who immediately leaves his work to follow him (v. 14). It is significant that Jesus chooses his followers from among those with simple or even despicable occupations (e.g., Levi would be held in contempt by his fellow Jews because he cooperated with the Romans in exacting taxes for the emperor. His profession would place him among the recognized sinners of the Jewish people).

Even more significant is the fact that Jesus goes to Levi's house to associate with other "sinners" (v. 15). This provokes the scribes, who object, "Why does he eat with tax collectors and sinners?" (v. 16). This Jewish teacher, in contrast to the Pharisees, seeks out sinners to follow him. He even eats with them! The entire scene ends with a general statement from Jesus: "Those who are well do not need a physician, but the sick do" (v. 17).

By relating this second conflict situation, Mark encourages his readers to understand that to follow Jesus means that their meals, especially their Eucharistic meals, must include people who are aware of their weakness and of their need of healing. This stands in contrast to anyone who might think that only those who are "righteous" may participate in the meal. Indeed, the meal at which Jesus is present as the righteous one is the meal at which the sick and the sinner are most welcome. Paradoxically, then, the Christian Eucharist is for those who seem "not to belong," but really do!

If Jesus' eating habits challenged the life style of the Jewish leaders, so also did his disciples' style of fasting (vv. 18-22). When confronted by the question why his disciples do not fast (v. 18), Jesus responds with his own question: "Why fast while the groom is at the wedding?" Drawing on Old Testament imagery (wedding imagery often referred to God's presence with his people, and fasting was seen as preparation for God's coming), Mark's Jesus is as much as saying that God's kingdom is now present in his person. Indeed, he goes on, once the groom is "taken away" (a reference to his death), the guests will fast until he returns in his glory (v. 20). As Mark's readers await that final coming of Jesus, they fast with a certain hope and joy in him.

Mark's readers today can live with the same joyful hope that Mark held out for his first readers. They too can understand the meaning of the two parables (the unshrunken cloth sewn on an old cloak, v. 21; and the new wine in old wineskins, v. 22), which are meant to teach that a true follower of Jesus does not fast for the wrong reasons. The kingdom of God has already been established. When Christians choose to fast, Mark implies, it is to heighten their anticipation of the full joy of the heavenly banquet they will share in. At the Eucharist, Christians already celebrate the groom's presence with them in sacrament. When they fast, they proclaim their hope in the fullness of union with him to come.

2:23-28 The lord of the sabbath. Mark next relates a peculiar incident about Jesus' disciples picking grain as they walk along with him on a sabbath. Again, the actions of Jesus and his followers cause a furor among the Pharisees. In response to their protest, Jesus argues from Scripture that even David took exception to the law for the sake of his hungry followers (1 Sam 21:2-7). Mark's Jesus goes on to proclaim that God created the sabbath for human beings, and not vice versa. Those who follow Jesus are to interpret the whole Jewish law by living according to God's spirit of the law, namely, loving kindness. Later in his Gospel, Mark will make it clear that all laws are summed up in the one law of Christ, his dual commandment of love. When a Christian chooses "to love God and one's neighbor as oneself," that one will be approved by the Lord (12:28-34).

The importance of this sabbath incident in Mark's Gospel lies in the summary character of its last verse. When Jesus says that the "Son of Man is lord even of the sabbath," he is summing up his own authority. Mark's readers will remember that this entire section began with Jesus' telling the crowd at Capernaum that "the Son of Man has authority to forgive sins on earth" (2:10). What happens next, on the same sabbath (3:1-6), will show how this claim of Mark's Jesus channels the flow of the whole Gospel. The Pharisees will stop arguing and begin plotting against the Son of Man. The die is cast!

(A note on the title "Son of Man": Jesus never refers to himself as the Son of God in Mark's Gospel. He often calls himself the Son of Man. This title, from Dan 7:13, came to be understood as referring to the future redeemer of the Israelite nation. Mark's use of the "Son of Man" title points rather to the means that the Redeemer would use to save his people, namely, his suffering and death on the cross. Mark's intention becomes even clearer when the reader notes that the next time the "Son of Man" title is used is in 8:31, in the first explicit prediction of Jesus' suffering and death.)

3:1-6 The withered hand and the plot. Jesus' mercy toward the man with the withered hand is the climax of the section that began with Jesus' cure of the paralyzed man (2:1-12). Its climactic nature becomes evident when one notices three things. First, Mark places this synagogue cure on the sabbath, immediately after the statement that Jesus is lord of the sabbath. The cure is concrete proof of his claim to lordship. Secondly, a dramatic change of rhythm in the narrative becomes evident when one reads the withered-hand passage in connection with the four preceding ones. Here it is Jesus who asks the provocative question ("Is it lawful to do good on the sabbath . . . ?," v. 4), not the Pharisees, as they do in 2:7, 16, 18, 24. Here Jesus is angry with them (v. 5), instead of them being upset with him. In fact, now the complainers have nothing to say (v. 5)! Thirdly, after Jesus shows his merciful power by perfectly restoring the man's hand, the Pharisees withdraw to plot how they might destroy Jesus (v. 6).

Mark concludes this series of five "conflict stories" on a sobering note. His readers cannot help but see that Jesus' way of life is leading to his death (v. 6). They also realize that Mark will suggest that the same is true for those who follow the "Son of Man" (8:31-38). Nevertheless, no matter what tension Mark's readers will experience while trying to live the Christian life, Jesus will be there on their behalf. Mark has assured his readers that Jesus will respond generously to their faith in him (2:5), because he has come for the needy (2:17) as a merciful Lord of the sabbath (2:27 and 3:4-5).

REFLECTING ON THE MEANING OF DISCIPLESHIP

Mark 3:7-35

Good storytellers involve their listeners in their stories by the use of various techniques, such as character development, comparison and contrast, vivid detail, pacing, etc. In his first two chapters Mark has already shown that he is a good storyteller. He has begun to reveal the human side of Jesus' character by certain details that Matthew and Luke leave out of their accounts (for example, only Mark describes Jesus' grief and anger during the cure of the man with the withered hand, 3:5). He has already established a mounting tension in his drama by placing the five conflict stories of 2:1–3:6 (they "took counsel against him to put him to death," 3:6) after the "success story" of chapter 1 ("people kept coming to him from everywhere!" 1:45).

Mark the storyteller also has a message he wants to convey by his Jesus story, and so he wants to give his readers time for reflection. That is why he presents a brief summary passage here (3:7-12). It not only sums up Jesus' overwhelming appeal to the crowds (vv. 7-10), but it also reminds his readers that Jesus did not want his identity as God's Son to be proclaimed for the wrong reasons (vv. 11-12; see the comment on "secret" in 1:32-34). Mark hopes that this pause for reflection will prepare his readers for the rest of their journey with Jesus. Their walk with him will often be confused by "great crowds and multitudes" in search of only a part of what Jesus and Christians come to give (vv. 7-8). It will be complicated by forces bent on obstructing the path that leads to the fulfillment of the Lord's mission (vv. 11-12). Therefore, Mark rounds off this part of his Jesus story with two passages (the choice of the Twelve, vv. 13-19, and the conflict about Beelzebul, vv. 20-35) which help his readers to understand the true meaning of Christian discipleship.

3:13-19 Called by name to be with Jesus. By the time Mark wrote his Gospel in A.D. 70, most of those who had been Jesus' first disciples were no longer present to lead the Christian community. In this passage, in which Jesus' choice of the first twelve disciples is described, Mark emphasizes for the Christians of his day two important elements of discipleship: "being with Jesus" and "being named" by him.

The first ingredient of Christian discipleship emphasized here is being a "companion" of the Lord (v. 14). To be Jesus' "disciple" is to be a "learner," and to learn from him it is necessary to be with him. From this point on in the Gospel narrative, Jesus will keep his Twelve close to him. They will learn from him the mysteries of the kingdom (in parables, 4:1-34). They will also discover the difficulties of his way (chs. 8–16, in which Jesus details his way of the cross and the cost of following him). The fact that Mark has Jesus choose his Twelve on the mountain (v. 13) not only indicates the solemnity of the moment but also points to other scenes of the Gospel when the disciples will be with Jesus on other mountaintops, for example, to witness the transfiguration in 9:2-10 and to see him in agony on the Mount of Olives in 14:26-42. Mark's readers are asked to be with Jesus and to learn from him in experiences of mysterious glory and painful agony.

A second element of Christian discipleship is located in the meaning of "being named" by Jesus. In Genesis, because God had "named" the heavens and the earth and all creatures, they became God's own possession (Gen 1:3-10). When God gave Adam the command to name the animals, Adam shared God's own power over them (Gen 2:20). To be "named" by Jesus means to be possessed by him, to be under his control. It also means that those named by him will share in his power (vv. 14-15). In this brief passage, Mark's readers, baptized "in the name of Jesus," hear the invitation to be companions with the risen Lord and to learn from him how to share in his mission and power.

3:20-35 Possessed by God and doing God's will. Once Jesus has come down from the mountain with his twelve companions, many people crowd around him, so much so that he and his disciples cannot even manage to eat (v. 20). Mark's readers will notice various reactions to Jesus and to his ministry among the people. His family is "standing outside." They have come to protect him from doing too much. They think he is "out of his mind" (v. 21). Important scribes have come from Jerusalem to see why Jesus is so popular. They claim that he is "possessed by Beelzebul" and that he expels demons with Satan's help (v. 22). After Jesus has cleverly and forcefully responded to these accusations (vv. 23-30), Mark's readers learn what the proper reaction to Jesus is. They learn that, of all those who crowd around Jesus, the only ones who can really be considered his brothers and sisters are those "who do the will of God" (vv. 32-34). Jesus expects his followers to have the same single-minded dedication to God's will as he does. Such dedication may lead to conflicts with people like the Jerusalem scribes. It may seem "crazy" or "overdone" to others, even to members of one's own family! But this is what it means to be "family" with Jesus.

Jesus' response to the accusation that he is possessed by the devil is brief and pointed. In two parables about divided kingdoms and divided houses (vv. 24-27), he shows how self-defeating it would be if he, who drives evil spirits out of people (3:11), were an agent of Satan! Jesus also points out that the only unforgivable sin belongs to his accusers, who refuse to accept the power of God's Holy Spirit at work in him (vv. 28-30). Jesus is possessed by God's spirit, and so are all those who choose to do God's will.

THE MYSTERY OF THE KINGDOM; THE POWER OF JESUS

Mark 4:1-35

Chapter 4 begins and ends with Jesus in a boat. Mark's readers will hear him teaching the crowds "in parables" about the kingdom of God. This preaching will be followed by Jesus' revelation of his power over the raging sea. Jesus not only preaches about the power of the kingdom, but he also practices what he preaches!

4:1-20 Teaching in parables. C. H. Dodd, a renowned British Scripture scholar, describes what a parable is and how it was meant to function in the time of Jesus. "At its simplest, the parable is a metaphor or simile drawn from nature or common life, arresting the hearer by its vividness or strangeness, and leaving the mind in sufficient doubt about its precise application to tease it into active thought." Here in chapter 4, Mark puts his readers in touch with the first-century world of parables. They will hear how Jesus used the familiar in a new way, inviting his listeners to new thought about God and God's kingdom. In effect, Jesus' parables say that God's ways may not be our ways. They call for conversion.

In Jesus' first parable (vv. 3-8), Mark's readers hear that something small, like a seed (or like the small Christian community of A.D. 70), could grow (or not grow) and yield (or not yield) much grain, depending on whether the soil was good (or thorny or rocky or hardened like the footpath). A good parable, by its nature, is open-ended and gives the hearer the choice to respond on various levels. Mark's hope in relating this parable is that his Christians would respond: "Let us be good soil! Let us be full of hope, even in the fragile times of our beginnings as a small community! We want God's seed to produce one hundredfold in us, as Jesus promised it would!"

The private discussion between Jesus and his disciples (vv. 10-12) sounds as though Jesus is giving the crowd ("those outside," v. 11) no chance to understand him or become his followers. This is very strange, considering that parables were meant to stimulate their hearers to conversion. What is going on in the harsh verse 12 (taken from Isa 6:9-10) is this: The early church knew that certain people had heard Jesus' word and had rejected him; they also knew that others ("you" disciples, in v. 11) had believed in him. Mark therefore shows that Jesus, like Isaiah before him, brought a message that truly caused people to take a stance, either for him or against him. Jesus' parables, says Mark, were intended to bring all people to God's kingdom, but some chose to remain "outside." Mark's readers are asked to be open to God's word in their day. They are challenged to let his word draw them "inside," into a deeper faith-relationship with their risen Lord.

Although Jesus' first parable was originally an open-ended invitation to radical involvement with him, the explanation that follows it (in vv. 13-20) becomes a practical, point-by-point application of the parable's details to the life of Mark's Christians. Listening carefully to this explanation, they could respond: "Yes, we understand the parable for our time (v. 13). We know that the seed is God's word (v. 14). But we also can see how the various types of seed stand for those people who respond to the word differently (vv. 13-20). Some of us have let Satan lead us away from the faith (v. 15). Some of our number let pressure and persecution wear us down (vv. 16-17). Others of us are struggling with cravings for money and other things of this world that draw us away (vv. 18-19). Nevertheless, we want to hear the word, take it to heart, and be true followers of Jesus' way" (v. 20).

4:21-34 Hearing the word in parables. After the parable of the seed and its explanation, Mark records five other parables that are meant to enable his audience to take Jesus' word to heart more personally and more profoundly. By the parable of the lamp (v. 21), Mark suggests that his readers will have to ponder the meaning of Jesus' life and message much more thoroughly for themselves before they can share it fully with others (vv. 22-23). The parable-like saying about getting back "in the measure you give" (v. 24) is much like the preceding parable about the lamp. Mark's readers must continuously grow in their understanding of Jesus for themselves, or they will lose what they think they possess. The parable of the sleeping farmer (vv. 26-29) shatters the illusions of those who think that they can control the coming of God's kingdom. Indeed, says Mark, "God's ways are not our ways! We must be patient and let God be God!" The last parable of chapter 4 is also about a seed, the smallest of all seeds, the mustard seed (vv. 30-32). Even though the early Christian community was small in number, this parable assures Mark's readers that all their efforts will be fruitful in the growing kingdom of God—if they will just understand (see vv. 33-34).

Mark summarizes how the people "heard" Jesus' parables: some attentive ones "were able to understand" them (v. 33), while the disciples understood them perfectly because "he explained everything in private" to them (v. 34). With such special tutoring, Jesus' disciples would seem ready to prove their enlightened discipleship. The following scene on the sea is proof that they were not ready!

4:35-41 Jesus stills the storm and calls for faith. In this first storm scene (see 6:45-52 for a similar account), Mark's Jesus gives his disciples an opportunity to show that they have come to know him for who he really is. They have shared in the secrets of the kingdom (4:1-34), and they have been with him as he healed all sickness and drove out demons (chs. 1–3). Now they are with him on the raging sea, and he sleeps! (v. 38). They think that he does not care for them (v. 38), after all they have seen him do on behalf of those in need. After quieting the violent storm with a word, "Quiet! Be still!" (v. 39), Jesus turns to his disciples (and Mark's readers) and asks: "Why are you so terrified? Do you not yet have faith?" (v. 40). The first disciples' only response is: "Who then is this?" (v. 41). Mark wants his Christians, with their knowledge of Jesus' entire life, death, and resurrection, to be assured of his protection in their times of stress and confusion. He asks for more than "great awe" (v. 41) at Jesus' stilling of the storm. He asks for deep here-and-now faith from all who struggle to understand the meaning of Jesus' life, death, and resurrection in their own daily experience of Christian living.

THE MIRACLES GO ON

Mark 5:1-43

The disciples, the Jewish leaders, and the Jewish crowds have all seen Jesus calm devils and the sea. They have heard him preach about conversion and the kingdom of God.

After all this, the disciples still ask, "Who then is this?" (4:41). With the first miracle of chapter 5, Mark has Jesus reach out beyond Jewish boundaries to see if non-Jews will recognize him for who he really is (in 5:1-20, the cure of the demon-crazed man takes place in Gerasene-Gentile territory, east of the Jordan River). When Jesus returns home from this amazing encounter with non-Jews, he meets with increasingly more profound faith in him (from a Jewish synagogue official, Jairus, in 5:21-24 and 35-43, and from a simple, suffering woman in the crowd, in 5:25-34). It would seem that after these three miraculous events Jesus' disciples would understand his purpose and mission better. However, because the chapter ends with yet another reference to "the secret" ("He gave strict orders that no one should know this," 5:43), Mark's readers realize that Jesus still wants his followers to see more in him than a powerful worker of miracles.

5:1-20 Jesus reaches out to non-Jews: The Gerasene demoniac. Mark's vivid description of the possessed man, who violently roars around the tombs and hillsides of Gerasene territory (vv. 1-5), sets the stage for Jesus' encounter with him (vv. 6-10). Even before Jesus drives the devils from the man (strangely, the devils within the man ask Jesus to send them into a herd of swine, which he does, vv. 11-13), the possessed man comes to Jesus, pays him the homage due to God alone, and recognizes him as God's Son (vv. 6-7). Like other possessed persons before him (see 1:24; 1:34; and 3:11), this man sees and proclaims what the disciples and the Jewish crowds do not: Jesus is God's Son!

When the people of the village come out to see if the swineherds' incredible story is true, they find their well-known wild man "sitting there clothed and in his right mind" (vv. 14-15). They also presumably see two thousand pigs afloat in the sea. Naturally, they are filled with fear. They cannot fathom the power of Jesus and ask him to leave their land before he shocks them any more. It was obviously easier for them to cope with a violent possessed man than it was to deal with the one who had the power to cure him (vv. 16-17). The healed man, so long tormented and isolated from society, asks if he can stay with Jesus (v. 18). Although Jesus does not let him come along with him, he does not tell him to keep quiet about the cure, as he has so often done after his miracles. The consequence is that the non-Jews throughout the region of the Ten Cities hear what God's mercy has done for him through Jesus (vv. 19-20). By this remarkable miracle, Mark not only displays Jesus' loving concern for one outcast but also sets the stage for Jesus' mission to all non-Jews.

Mark's community of Jewish and Gentile Christians would be very alert as Jesus enters the foreign land of Gerasa (v. 1). They would be anxious to see how the keepers of swine (obviously Gentiles, since this was an occupation prohibited to Jews) might react to Jesus (vv. 11-17). They would recognize in this event Mark's way of describing the initial step in Christianity's spread to the Gentiles. Indeed, the Christian faith of Mark's day, which was adhered to by Jew and non-Jew alike, was rooted in Jesus' own loving outreach. Christianity had no limiting boundaries of race or nationality. Jesus' saving word and power were intended for all of God's people.

5:21-43 Jesus and women: life and trust. In Mark's Gospel Jesus is closely involved with women nine times. Here in verses 21-43, Mark's readers enter into two of Jesus' more moving encounters with women (Jairus' daughter and the woman with the hemorrhage). Both stories begin with someone seeking out Jesus, the healer. Both stories end in the cure of a person who had been hopelessly sick. Even the way Mark intertwines the two stories (the story of Jairus' daughter begins, the account of the hemorrhaging woman is related in full, and the Jairus story is then completed) shows that Mark wants his readers to hear one important message common to both: "Do not be afraid; just have faith" (v. 36)! The father of the little girl trusts Jesus even after hearing the report that she is dead (vv. 35-40). He is invited to witness Jesus' healing touch and word, and then sees his little girl walking around alive (vv. 41-42). The woman shows her trust by touching Jesus (v. 27) and by coming forward in spite of her fear (v. 33). She learns that her faith is rewarded by peace and lasting health (v. 34). Like Jairus and the woman, Christians of every age are urged by Mark to approach Jesus confidently with earnest appeals on behalf of the sick and dying.

Even as he reports Jesus' miraculous power, Mark preserves the human side of Jesus. For example, the one who has more healing power than the physicians of his day (he cured the woman who had spent all her money and twelve years of time in going to doctors, who failed to help her, v. 26) did not know who touched him (v. 30). Likewise, the one who raises the little girl from her deathbed (v. 41) is also sensitive to her need for something to eat (v. 43). Such details make Mark's Jesus very approachable. He was not a perfect human (for example, he did not know everything), but he was perfectly human (he was full of compassion). Mark's readers can trust him now as those in need did when he walked on this earth. He is sensitive to the needs of those who seek him out.

It is important that Mark's readers notice the details in this passage that point to the climax of the Gospel. Such hints reveal Mark's desire to keep his readers moving with Jesus to the place where his journey leads. For example, Peter, James, and John, who witness the raising of the dead girl here, will soon question what "to rise from the dead" means (9:10). Likewise, the fearful, trembling woman with a hemorrhage points to the three women who will leave the empty tomb "seized with trembling and bewilderment," so afraid that they say nothing to anyone (16:8). There is almost no section of Mark's Gospel that does not draw his readers to its conclusion. Mark asks his readers, women and men, to stay with Jesus to the end. Even when life's confusion and tragedies get them down, Mark's readers are reminded: "Fear is useless. What is needed is trust in God, who brings life, even from death."

OF BREAD AND BLINDNESS

Mark 6:1–8:26

In chapters 1 to 5 Mark has highlighted Jesus' miracles and power over cosmic forces: over demons, over raging seas and winds, over sickness and death. He has also let his readers know that the proper Christian response to Jesus' power is faith in him, not terror or fear (4:40 and 5:36). In chapters 6 to 8 Mark will continue his picture of the powerful Jesus. However, he will emphasize even more how blind Jesus' disciples are to the meaning of Jesus' power (6:52 and 8:14-21).

Mark's readers will also notice a new emphasis in these chapters, namely, the breads. In chapters 6 to 8 Mark will repeatedly connect bread with the disciples' lack of understanding of Jesus. It gradually becomes clear that Mark is suggesting to his Christians that they will recognize the true meaning of Jesus for themselves only when they realize what their Eucharistic sharing of the bread really means. (The Eucharist commemorates their union with the risen Lord, who came to his glory through his suffering and death.) It is by "bread and blindness" that Mark's Jesus leads his followers to the halfway point and first climax of the Gospel, that is, to the revelation by Jesus to Peter and the disciples that the road to his final glory (and theirs) is by way of much suffering and death (8:27-38).

6:1-6 He was too much for them in Nazareth . . . and they for him! Jesus' disciples are with him as he teaches a large synagogue crowd in his hometown, Nazareth. While many of Mark's readers are interested in this passage because of its reference to Jesus' "brothers and sisters" (v. 3), Mark's own interest lay elsewhere. (Because of the Catholic church's teaching on the virginity of Mary, this mention of Jesus' brothers and sisters causes questions to be asked. However, neither this section nor 3:31-35, where his brothers and sisters are mentioned again, says anything definitive about Mary's virginity or Jesus' blood family, because in Mark's day "brothers and sisters" could refer to cousins, stepbrothers or stepsisters, or members of the extended family, as well as to blood sisters or brothers.) Mark passes on the account of the hometown folks' rejection of Jesus for a special reason: to provide an important transition and surprising contrasts at this point of his drama. The passage is transitional, for it bridges the greatest of Jesus' miracles (raising the girl from death) with the sharing of his healing power with the disciples (6:7-13). The surprising contrasts lie not so much in his town's rejection of him ("A prophet is not without honor . . .," v. 4) as in his discouragement and ineffectiveness in their midst: "So he was not able to perform any mighty deed there, apart from curing a few. . . . He was amazed at their lack of faith" (v. 5). Up to this point people have always been amazed and fearful in Jesus' presence. Here Jesus is amazed at them and at the lack of faith he finds in Nazareth. Mark's readers, no matter how familiar they are with Jesus, might well evaluate the depth of their faith in him in order to allow him to be as effective as he wants to be in their midst.

6:7-13 The apostles are sent to preach and to expel demons. Rejected by his own, Jesus preaches elsewhere and sends his twelve disciples out with special instructions and powers. The reader will remember that Mark has carefully prepared for this important moment when Jesus sends the apostles out. First, he had Jesus call them personally (1:16-20). Then he selected twelve special ones to accompany him (3:13-19). The Twelve, tutored by Jesus and present with him as he healed many from sickness and evil (chs. 3–5), are now ready to become "ones sent out" (the Greek word for "apostle" means "one sent out"). The specific order to expel unclean spirits (v. 7) is accompanied by further details regarding clothing, what to bring, where to stay, and what to do when they are rejected (vv. 8-11). These detailed directions were indications for the early church of the need to move quickly and to be dependent on God's care. Were Mark's Christians in A.D. 70 as trusting in God as Jesus called his Twelve to be? What are the specific apostolic mission orders for today's apostles who read Mark's Gospel? One thing seems clear: Mark is asking all his readers to consider prayerfully how to balance their eager action in building up God's kingdom with their trust in God's own loving involvement in their lives.

6:14-29 King Herod, John the Baptizer, and Jesus. This rather long account of the death of John seemingly interrupts the flow of Mark's story about Jesus. However, it is likely that Mark presents this account here in order to prepare his readers for Jesus' death, much in the same way that John's first appearance in the Gospel prepared for Jesus' coming on the scene (1:2-11). A careful reading will indicate how John's death was truly a foretelling of Jesus' own death. Consider the clues. Although Herod was wrong about John being "raised up" (v. 16), Jesus will indeed be raised up (16:6-8). Like Herodias (v. 19), the chief priests want to kill Jesus but have to go about it by devious means because of what the people might do (11:18 and 14:1-2). Like Herod (v. 20), Pilate will have Jesus put to death even though he does not know what crime Jesus has committed (15:14). Finally, like John's disciples (v. 29), a follower of Jesus will get his dead body and "lay it in a tomb" (15:46). Such clues show that Mark wants his readers to see the fate of their Lord in the fate of his forerunner John. Mark also wants his readers to be so much like John, preparing others for the experience of Jesus in their lives and in death, that people will confuse them with Jesus too. Herod thought that Jesus was John come back to life. Will others think that Jesus has come back to life when they witness the life of Mark's Christian community, then and now?

6:30-52 Crowds, breads, and the walk on the water. The short passage in 6:30-33 serves to "round off" the missioning of the Twelve (in 6:7-13). It also prepares Mark's readers for the rest of chapter 6, which features two closely related and marvelous manifestations of Jesus' identity as their Lord: first, as the one who feeds his people abundantly (with bread, 6:34-44); secondly, as the one who is with them in the most serious conflicts of their lives (on the raging sea, 6:45-52).

Although the apostles need time alone with Jesus (v. 31), he responds first to the greater need of the crowd that has found his place of refuge (v. 33). The first miracle of the breads (6:34-44) reveals for Mark and the early church that Jesus is as powerful and as loving as the God of Exodus 16, who provided manna for his wandering people in the desert. When Jesus pities them, "for they were like sheep without a shepherd" (v. 34), he becomes for Mark's readers the Good Shepherd of Ezekiel 34, tending his needy flock and teaching them at great length (v. 34). These allusions to the Old Testament remind Mark's readers of God's providence in the past. When, however, Mark has Jesus take the loaves, raise his eyes to heaven, pronounce a blessing, break the loaves, and give them to the disciples to distribute (v. 41), Mark's Christians become conscious of their present experience of the Lord in the Eucharist. The details of Jesus' past care for his hungry people are experienced in the present when his needy followers come to him for nourishment. Mark's readers share in the abundance of leftovers (v. 43)! God cares for God's people in Eucharist!

Immediately after the multiplication of the loaves, Mark presents a second scene in which Jesus calms a wind-swept sea on behalf of his fearful disciples (6:45-52; recall 4:35-41). As the wind begins to toss the boat around, Jesus comes walking toward them on the water (v. 48; in 4:38 Jesus was in the boat with them, but he slept). Jesus' calming of the sea and the disciples (vv. 50-51) would be further signs for Mark and his readers that Jesus was their Lord of creation. Only God had such mastery over the sea (e.g., Gen 1:1-10). Only "I AM" had the power to divide the Red Sea for the Hebrew people (Exod 3:14 and 14:21). Even the strange phrase "He meant to pass by them" (v. 48) would point to Jesus' identity as Lord. (In Exod 33:22, God set Moses in the hollow of the rock and covered him with his hand until he had passed by. This was to protect Moses from seeing God's face, which meant death in Old Testament times.) Although Jesus intended to "pass by them," he reveals a new way of God's protecting the chosen people: he comes to be with those who are afraid. He assures them with his word: "IT IS I!"

The back-to-back miracles of the breads and the walk on the water would seem to be enough to convince anyone that God was once more among the people in the person of Jesus. However, when Mark says that the hearts of Jesus' disciples were hardened (v. 52), it seems that he is looking for something more from his readers. He hopes that they will question their own degree of intimacy with their risen Lord. In their own wind-tossed times, some forty years after Jesus' death and resurrection, would the reassuring words of Jesus ("Do not be afraid!") be enough for them? Or was the fear of the first disciples still present in the Christian community? Mark hopes that his readers will come to understand the meaning of all the events, including Jesus' humiliating death, as they understand more about the loaves. He hopes that their fears will be resolved when, at the Eucharist, they come to understand their own suffering in the light of Jesus' sacrifice for them and for all his people.

6:53-56 The touch that heals. Chapter 6 ends with the summary statement that "as many as touched the tassle on his cloak were healed" (v. 56). What a contrast! The crowds (of vv. 53-56) ran to Jesus wherever he put in an appearance. His disciples, however, the ones closest to him, "were completely astounded . . . their hearts were hardened" (vv. 51-52). The enthusiastic crowds also stand in sharp contrast to the antagonistic Pharisees who gather around and against Jesus in chapter 7. This brief passage helps Mark's readers, who wish to be intimate disciples of Jesus, to focus their faith on the only one whose touch can heal them of the brokenness and lack of meaning in their lives.

7:1-23 Conflict over eating bread and serving God. After Mark has shown how successful Jesus' mission of healing among the crowds has been (6:53-56), he reminds his readers of the heavy cloud that hangs over his entire Gospel drama. He now reports the detailed and sharp conflict between Jesus and the Pharisees over the issue of what and how to eat properly. It was conflicts like this one (and those already recorded in 2:1–3:6) that would bring to completion the Pharisees' plot, how they might "put him to death" (3:6).

What Jesus teaches in this passage is as important for Mark's readers today as it was in A.D. 70. Jesus, presented here by Mark as the clever Jewish rabbi, turns the Pharisees' challenge about the manner in which his disciples prepared to eat bread (it is unlike their traditional rites of purification, vv. 2-5) into a wide-sweeping exposure of their "lip service" interpretation of God's law (quoting Isa 29:13 in vv. 6-7). He continues with a second example of their false piety, the qorban tradition, which would deny parents the care due them by their children (vv. 9-13). (Scholars are hard pressed to find such a lack of filial piety in Jewish rabbinic tradition, which indicates that this qorban tradition was probably some extreme and isolated circumstance of Jesus' or Mark's day.)

Finally, Mark's Jesus expresses the timeless principle that it is not what or how one eats that makes a person clean or unclean. It is what comes from inside the depths of the person that makes one pure or impure (v. 15). Then, as if Jesus' stance were not clear enough, Mark has Jesus explain his powerful one-liner to his disciples. External things, like the food one eats, do not make a person evil. It is one's actions, inspired from within, that show when a person is not living according to God's commands (see the list in vv. 17-23). Mark hopes that his readers will look to the various ways they are living in relationship with others to see if they are responding to God "from within" (with their whole being) or merely with "lip service" (with superficial nods to tradition).

Why Mark presents this heavy conflict passage here is just as important as the message it contains. This conflict section interrupts a chain of six miracle stories (it comes after the feeding of the multitude, the walk on the water, and the healing of the crowds; it is followed by the healing of the Canaanite child, the cure of the deaf-mute, and the second feeding of the multitude). Mark seems to have at least two reasons for doing this. First, this heightens the tension of his drama, suggesting that anyone who chooses to follow Jesus as healer will be involved in many conflicts for the sake of the gospel, perhaps even with religious leaders and structures. Secondly, the conflict passage builds on his theme of the slow-witted disciples, because they need special tutoring again (here in v. 17), as they did earlier (in 4:10, 34). Thus Mark challenges Christian leaders within his audience to reevaluate the way they understand and pass on the Christian tradition entrusted to them.

7:24-37 Non-Jewish women and men are healed and spread the news. The two miracle stories that conclude chapter 7 are linked by the now familiar Markan theme of Jesus' desire for secrecy (see the comment on 1:32-34). Before healing the Syro-Phoenician's daughter, "he entered a house and wanted no one to know about it" (v. 24). After curing the deaf-mute, "he ordered them not to tell anyone" (v. 36). Of course, people did recognize him. They did spread the news of his healing power (vv. 24, 36-37). But even as Mark faithfully and readily records the marvels that Jesus performed, his secrecy theme does not allow his readers to forget that the true glory and identity of their Lord were only fully revealed in the death he underwent on their behalf.

The Syro-Phoenician woman who asked Jesus to heal her possessed daughter would seem to have had two counts against her from the start. Being a woman and a non-Jew, it is no wonder that she crouched at the feet of this male Jewish preacher, begging him for help (vv. 25-26)! The first-century readers of Mark's Gospel would not be overly surprised at Jesus' harsh-sounding refusal to give to Gentiles (the dogs) what rightfully belonged to the Jews (the children of the household). They would be surprised, though, that Jesus would allow a Gentile woman to persist in her pleading and even play off his own words to get what she wanted: "Lord, even the dogs under the table eat the children's scraps!" (vv. 27-28). Her persistence forces Jesus to make an exception to the rule (i.e., take care of your own people first, then go to others, v. 27). He cures her possessed daughter by a word as a reward for her mother's staying power and faith in him (v. 29).

Mark's readers would hear in this passage several invitations to action: first, to imitate the persistence of the woman, even when things seem hopeless; second, to imitate Jesus' "breaking the rules" on behalf of an "outsider"; and third, to examine their openness to those of other faiths, especially the Jews, the first "sons and daughters of the household."

The story of the deaf-mute is like a gate swinging back and forth. It swings back to the story of the Syro-Phoenician woman, because the deaf-mute also comes from a non-Jewish part of Palestine (v. 31). It swings forward to the next chapter, to the story of the blind man (8:22-26), which closely parallels this cure. Both the deaf-mute and the blind man are brought to Jesus by others (v. 32; 8:22). Both times Jesus takes the men away from the crowd (v. 33; 8:23) and touches them, using spittle to heal them (vv. 33-35 and 8:23, 25).

These obvious parallels make it clear that Mark wants the two cures to be read side by side. In this way, Mark's readers will hardly be able to miss that Jesus is the Messiah promised by Isaiah long before when he said: "Then will the eyes of the blind be opened, the ears of the deaf be cleared" (Isa 35:5-6; see Mark 7:37). However, with the final parallel element in the two stories (Jesus' request for secrecy in 7:37 and 8:26), Mark asks his readers to remember another Isaian passage that Jesus has fulfilled by his life and life-giving death: "Who would believe what we have heard? . . . He was spurned and avoided by all, a man of suffering, accustomed to infirmity . . . . pierced for our offenses, crushed for our sins. Upon him was the chastisement that makes us whole, by his stripes we were healed" (Isa 53:1-5).

Jesus, for Mark, was the perfect fulfillment of all Isaiah's prophecies. He was the promised Messiah who healed the deaf, the mute, and the blind. He was also the innocent one who suffered on behalf of his people. For Mark and his readers, Jesus is the one who says: "Follow me on my way. Care for my people, until there are no longer any sick or hurting people on this earth. But know that in your healing service of others you will experience the same pain that I experienced in making you whole. Stay with me. I will provide the nourishment you need" (see 8:1-10, which follows).

8:1-10 Jesus feeds the crowd again. The second time that Mark's compassionate Jesus feeds the hungry crowds (8:1-9; recall 6:34-44) is another foreshadowing of the Eucharist (14:22-26), so important to Mark and to his community. Some readers think that this is the report of an actual second feeding incident (noting that there are many differences from the first feeding, e.g., the numbers of people and loaves, the different geographical locale, etc.). Others wonder if this might be a second written version of one and the same feeding event, pointing out the similarities in the two accounts, e.g., the pity Jesus feels, the similar words and gestures he uses, the same basic marvelous deed performed, etc. They also point to the disciples' question in 8:4 and believe that it makes no sense if the disciples have just seen Jesus feed five thousand people with five loaves in chapter 6.

Whatever the solution to this debate, it is fairly clear that Mark has included this second feeding account to make sure that the Gentile members of his community know they are welcomed to the Eucharist from the very beginning. (Notice that Jesus is still in Gentile territory at this point, 7:24, 31, and 8:10. Notice also the phrase in verse 3, "Some of them have come a great distance," i.e., "from afar," which is a well-known early Christian way of referring to Gentile converts.) Mark thus claims that Jesus is the giver of bread, ready to satisfy hungry followers of whatever background. He also suggests that the Christian Eucharist is the place for true Christian community to form, where people of diverse backgrounds become one in the Lord who gives bread to all in great abundance.

Was Mark's first audience in need of hearing that the Eucharist was meant to gather various segments of that community together? Are the readers of Mark's Gospel today in need of the same message, as people of the various Christian churches struggle to become one again in worship as well as in mission? Perhaps Mark wants all his readers to hear Jesus say: "Today my heart is moved with pity for you. You hunger for unity. I want you to 'become one body, one spirit' in me" (Eucharistic Prayer III).

8:11-13 This age seeks a sign. This brief encounter with the Pharisees is little more than a transition passage. It links the second feeding (8:1-10) with the scene of Jesus in the boat with his disciples, asking them eight times to try to understand who he really is (8:14-21). Yet, this small transitional passage serves the purpose of heightening even more the severely strained relationship between Jesus and the Pharisees. It is wrought with emotion and tension. In Matthew's version (Matt 12:38-42), Jesus gives a clear, self-possessed answer to the Pharisees' demand for a sign: they shall be given the sign of "the prophet Jonah," signifying Jesus' three days in the tomb before his resurrection. Here in Mark's version, Jesus only "sighs from the depths of his spirit" (v. 12). He leaves them, without satisfying their desire for any words or actions concerning a "heavenly sign."

In this way, Mark portrays a Jesus who is so human, so much like his readers, that they could identify with him in his frustration with the religious leaders of his day, just as they have identified with him in his pity for the hungry crowd in the preceding passage. Mark's Jesus is one like them in all things. They will be like him in all things, even in frustrating conflicts with the unbelieving religious leaders of their day.

8:14-21 Jesus seeks recognition and understanding. In two previous episodes on the sea (4:35-41 and 6:45-52), Jesus has revealed himself as Lord over the sea, and in both cases his disciples' "hearts were hardened" (6:52). Once again on the lake with them, Jesus wants them to see who he is. This time he instructs them to keep their eyes open and not to be like the bad "leaven of the Pharisees and the leaven of Herod" (v. 15). (The latter saw Jesus as a popular wonder-worker who threatened their authority as religious and political leaders of the people.) Since the disciples "had forgotten to bring bread along," they missed Jesus' point about the leaven of the Pharisees (vv. 14 and 16). Consequently, with a barrage of eight questions, Jesus makes his followers realize that they misunderstand him as much as the Pharisees do (v. 17). They who were with him as he healed the deaf-mute (7:31-37) have ears but are not hearing (v. 18). They who were witnesses of his feeding the multitudes with bread (chs. 6 and 8) "still do not understand" that he alone is enough nourishment for them (v. 21).

When Jesus asks how much bread is left over (v. 20), it marks the seventeenth time that the breads have been mentioned in chapters 6 to 8 and the last time bread occurs until the Last Supper scene at 14:22. As the end of the "Bread and Blindness" section of his Gospel draws near, Mark hopes that his readers will examine their appreciation of the Christian community's celebration of the Eucharist. He also invites them to see, to hear, and to understand the many ways that their Lord (the "one loaf" of v. 14?) wants to be involved in their lives.

8:22-26 A blind man sees perfectly, gradually. By now, the fact that Jesus heals yet another person is nothing special to the readers of Mark's Gospel. However, to anyone following the developing threads of the Gospel drama to this point, this is a very special cure. That is because this is the first blind person to be healed. He is also healed "in stages," just before the passage in which Peter and the disciples begin to get a glimpse of the way Jesus must go (vv. 27-38). These special details lead Mark's readers to the realization that the blind man of chapter 8 is much more than an individual whom Jesus cured in A.D. 30. He is the symbol of the first disciples and of all disciples of Jesus, ever in need of his enlightening touch. Mark's readers have begun to see more clearly. Are they ready to go forward with Jesus on his way?

THE WAY OF JESUS BECOMES CLEARER

Mark 8:27–10:52

In the first eight chapters of his Gospel, Mark has portrayed the people around Jesus, both friend and foe, as people blind to the true meaning of his miraculous works (nineteen miraculous events conclude with 8:21: "Do you still not understand?"). What follows are two and a half tightly knit chapters, bound together by the blind-man story just concluded (8:22-26) and a second blind-man story that will end with the cured man following Jesus "on the way" to Jerusalem, the goal of his journey and the end of his way (10:52 and 11:1). Between these two "book-end" blind-man passages, Mark has placed three clear predictions of Jesus' passion, each followed by his disciples' continued lack of comprehension.

As these chapters unfold, so unfolds Jesus' revelation of himself as the one who will rise from the dead (in each of the predictions and in 9:2-9). But of course the disciples do not understand this either (9:10)! Perhaps the most important thing to happen in these chapters is the way in which Mark turns the various miracle stories and dialogues into opportunities for explicit "teaching moments" about the meaning of the Christian life and its radical demands. Thus, the miracles in the first half of the Gospel are replaced by hard teachings in the second half.

If there is any general call that the readers of these chapters will hear, it will be the call to be as trusting as little children in the service of others. (The word-fields of "little child" and "servant" dominate these chapters as "the breads" and "blindness" dominated chapters 6–8). Perhaps by the account of the second blind man's cure (end of ch. 10), those who hear Jesus' message and teachings will finally see that the person they follow and the mission they share is radical but simple, tiring but transforming, impossible for them alone but not for God. His is a way of service and self-giving that gives life to others and preserves one's own.

8:27–9:1 Revelation of the way of the Messiah and his followers. As Mark's readers approach Caesarea Philippi with Jesus and his disciples (v. 27), they arrive at the first major climax of Mark's Gospel drama. (The second climax is the passion account, chs. 15–16). Until now, Mark has been revealing who Jesus is in the mighty deeds he has done. Along with this revelation, Mark has also reported Jesus' reluctance to have people believe in him only because of those wondrous deeds. (Recall the "secret" of 8:26; 7:36; 5:43, etc.) This Caesarea Philippi passage is the heart of the matter. Jesus now says explicitly that his way is a way of suffering. The way of the Messiah is the way of the cross.

Mark, Matthew, and Luke all record this important passage. However, whereas Peter's confession of faith gets rewarded with "the keys to the kingdom of heaven" in Matthew's Gospel (Matt 16:19), Mark only reports that Peter is told not to tell anyone that Jesus is the Messiah (v. 30). Mark knew what Peter meant by "Messiah," namely, "the powerful deliverer of God." Mark also knew that Jesus understood that title differently, i.e., that it signified that he was "the Son of Man, [who] must suffer greatly and be rejected . . . be killed, and rise after three days" (v. 31).

The account goes on to show that Peter and the disciples were not ready for this. They wanted a leader who would deliver them from pain, not one who would experience pain and death himself! Consequently, Peter rebukes Jesus (v. 32), angering Jesus to the point of sending Peter away as if he were the devil himself (v. 33). Indeed, when Mark shifts the focus of the scene from Peter to the crowd and the disciples (v. 34), his readers find out that they also must share the disciples' struggle with the hard, cold reality that Jesus is not the "instant cure-all" person they would like him to be. They can hear him speak directly to them, saying: "Whoever wishes to come after me, must deny himself, take up the cross, and follow in my steps!" (v. 34).

Even today's reader finds it hard to swallow the absolute and radical statements that follow: "For whoever wishes to save her/his life will lose it . . . ." (v. 35); "What could one give in exchange for one's life!" (v. 37). Yes, says Mark, all who call themselves followers of Jesus must lose their lives for Jesus' sake and the sake of the gospel (v. 35). Mark thus pushes his readers to the edge. Either they give themselves in total trust to the suffering Messiah they follow, or they open themselves up to the awful prospect of hearing an unfavorable judgment: "The Son of Man will be ashamed of them when he comes in his Father's glory with the holy angels" (v.38).

Although Mark's readers in A.D. 70 were not among those standing there in A.D. 30 (9:1), his urgent challenge was still theirs, because "the kingdom of God coming in power" could be upon them at any time. Likewise, although twentieth-century readers of Mark's Gospel might not share his expectations of an imminent return of Jesus in glory and judgment, the urgency of this whole section of his Gospel does provoke profound questions for individual Christians and for the whole church. If Mark's readers are to take his Jesus seriously, how can they begin today to live the Christian life more radically? What are the times and circumstances in which they can be people of gospel values in the midst of their world today? Mark's Jesus will respond to these questions with some concrete means in chapters 9 and 10. For now, Mark allows his readers to sit back and respond to these questions before he takes them up a high mountain with Peter, James, and John (9:2-8).

9:2-13 Revelation of glory (and suffering). It almost seems that Mark knows his readers will be exhausted after the encounter at Caesarea Philippi, because he follows it six days later with one of the most refreshing and consoling events of his Gospel—the transfiguration. Jesus takes Peter, James, and John up the mountain with him, the same three whom he had brought with him when he restored the little girl to life (v. 2; recall 5:37-40). The three have a glimpse of Jesus in his dazzling glory (v. 3). When they see him conversing with Elijah and Moses, they are awe-struck at the realization that Jesus is the fulfillment of the prophets (Elijah) and of all the law (Moses).

Peter wants to capture the consoling moment and keep Jesus, Moses, and Elijah there with them (v. 5). However, Mark does not allow his readers to linger on the mountaintop any longer than Peter, James, and John do. Instead, God's voice from the cloud repeats what it had said earlier at Jesus' baptism: "This is my beloved Son" (1:11). Then the voice adds: "Listen to him!" (v. 7). Mark's readers do not have to think hard to remember what Jesus has spoken for them to hear (8:34–9:1). Their refreshing pause on the mountain is over. Glimpses of glory that Christians receive from God are real, but according to Mark, they are given so that Christians can move on with him, and with him alone (v. 8).

Any enlightenment that Peter, James, and John received on the mountain seems dulled as Mark reports the conversation they have with Jesus on the way down (vv. 9-13). Jesus knew, says Mark, that they would have difficulty accepting the fact that he would have to suffer and die before rising from the dead. Consequently, he tells them not to get themselves or others excited about the glory of the transfiguration event until after he has risen from the dead (v. 9). They ask about the role Elijah is to play in the restoration of God's people, to which Jesus responds with a question of his own about the suffering role of the Son of Man (v. 12). Then he answers their question, saying that Elijah has already come and fulfilled his role (1 Kgs 19:2-10; likewise, Mark's Jesus is referring to John the Baptizer as "Elijah, his forerunner"). Thus, as this section ends, Peter, James, and John, as well as Mark's readers, are left to respond to Jesus' unanswered question (v. 12): "Why does Scripture say of the Son of Man that he must suffer greatly and be treated with contempt?"

9:14-29 "I do believe! Help my unbelief!" The healing of the possessed boy is one of the longest miracle stories in Mark's Gospel (only the expulsion of the demons in 5:1-20 is longer). It is also one of the more detailed stories, becoming a bit complicated in the repetition of some of those details (e.g., in v. 22 the father of the boy tells Jesus what he has already told him in v. 18; the crowd gathers twice within the same story in vv. 15 and 25). Despite its length and detail, there is a very clear and simple message that Mark wishes to convey: Anything is possible to one who trusts (v. 23), and trust is deepened by prayer (v. 29)!

Although Jesus is the one who heals the boy (vv. 25-27), it is the father's profession of faith that Mark holds up for his readers to imitate. Even in the most desperate moments, when prayer and trust seem useless, Jesus invites his followers to go one step further and pray like the boy's father: "I do believe! Help my unbelief!" (v. 24). Perhaps the alert reader of the Gospel will hear the echoes of Jesus' message all along (e.g., "Do not be afraid; just have faith" in 5:36; "Please, Lord, even the dogs under the table eat the children's scraps" in 7:28), calling for a persistent and ever more radical trust in him. The same theme will carry over into the following passages, in which the total trust of little children becomes the model of what is needed to take part in the kingdom of God (9:35-37 and 10:13-16).

9:30-32 The second (of three) predictions of death and resurrection. Jesus' disciples were not able to expel the demon from the young boy (9:18) because of the lack of belief among the people (9:19) and because of their own lack of prayerfulness (9:29). Is it surprising, then, that the disciples will fail to understand the meaning of Jesus' second prediction of his death and resurrection (vv. 31-32)? Mark's note that "they were afraid to question him" about this prediction (v. 32) might help his readers to deal with the fact that the Twelve abandoned Jesus in his passion and death. It might also encourage his readers to pause, take stock of their own fears, and confidently express them in prayer with their Lord.

9:33-50 Some radical demands of discipleship. Each evangelist records those teachings of Jesus that meet the needs of his readers. Here we notice some concerns that Mark hopes his community will face: (1) ambition among themselves (vv. 33-37); (2) envy and intolerance of others (vv. 38-41); and (3) scandalizing others (vv. 42-48).

The first concern, the evil of ambition, is a major one for Mark as pastor of his community. (This becomes even clearer in chapter 10 when the third passion prediction is followed by another warning against ambition, 10:35-45). How ambitious Jesus' disciples are! They argue about who is the most important among them (9:33-34) instead of trying to understand the meaning of their leader's passion prediction (9:32)! The response of Jesus (and Mark) is direct and simple: to be "important" among Jesus' followers means to be a humble servant, not a proud "first" (v. 35). In verses 36-37 Mark's Jesus presents himself and the child as models of openness to others: "Whoever receives one child such as this in my name receives me." What a contrast this is to the disciples' interests (in v. 34)! How different from their closed attitudes toward others (in vv. 38-42)!

Mark's second concern, the pettiness of arrogance and envy, is exposed when John and other disciples try to exclude a "non-member" from doing ministry in the name of Jesus (v. 38). Jesus (and Mark) challenge the disciples to be tolerant and open to others of good will: Working in Jesus' name brings its reward to anyone who "is not against us!" (vv. 40-41).

A third concern, the danger of causing scandal to others (v. 42), is met by Jesus' (and Mark's) harsh, traditional imagery of the unquenchable fires of Gehenna (vv. 43-48). In order to avoid those fires, Jesus' followers must be extremely cautious of giving bad example to anyone. Indeed, it would be better to cut off an arm or leg and enter heaven maimed than to give scandal to others and be thrown into hell!

Mark concludes this demanding section of his Gospel with a confusing but powerful mixed metaphor. Jesus claims that his followers will be cleansed ("salted" by the fire of v. 49) so that they can be at peace within and with others (the useful, tasty salt of v. 50). He thus presents a highly seasoned mixture of challenges to his own disciples and readers in A.D. 70 and today. His readers must reflect upon the liveliness of their gospel spirit. They must also root out the evils of ambition, envy, and scandal wherever they exist in their midst.

10:1-12 The Pharisees ask about divorce; Jesus responds. Journeying south from Capernaum (see 9:33), Jesus finally comes to Judea (10:1), on his way up to Jerusalem (10:32). In Judea, Jesus continues to preach his demanding message (begun in 8:34-38 and 9:33-50). However, in chapter 10 there seems to be an intentional attempt on Mark's part to establish a certain pattern and rhythm that gradually build up to the climax of his Gospel. The Markan arrangement consists of three passages in which Jesus meets with individual characters (the Pharisees of v. 2; the young man of v. 17; and James and John in v. 35). Then Mark's Jesus uses the encounters to teach his Twelve privately (v. 10, v. 23, and v. 41). These three similar passages are rhythmically balanced by three interspersed "models" for the Christian disciple to imitate (the child of vv. 13-16; Jesus himself in vv. 32-34; and the blind man in vv. 46-52).

The first encounter of chapter 10 has to do with the ever important issue of the fidelity of spouses in the marriage relationship (vv. 1-12). The early church was careful to preserve Jesus' attitudes concerning significant matters of daily living. Here Mark passes on the earliest tradition of Jesus' attitude toward marriage and divorce (vv. 6-9). While other teachers allowed men to divorce their wives in certain circumstances, Jesus taught that it was not permissible "to separate what God has joined together," using Gen 1:27 and 2:24 as authority for his interpretation. In other words, the Jesus tradition made it clear that it was not permissible for a man to divorce his wife. After Jesus talks privately with the Twelve (v. 10), Mark passes on what had come to be the earliest adaptation of Jesus' words for the Christian community, namely, if a man or a woman should have to divorce his or her spouse, he or she could not remarry without being considered an adulterer (vv. 11-12).

In these few verses, today's readers of Mark's Gospel can see the early church's struggle with one of the most painful areas of concern in the contemporary church and society—the meaning of fidelity in marriage relationships. At the core of Mark's Gospel message is Jesus' challenge to spouses to live in faithful and perpetual union until death. At the same time, recognizing the hard reality of life, even this early Gospel seems to allow for the separation (without remarriage, however) of spouses who can no longer love one another as husband or wife. (Matthew's Gospel, at 19:9, adds another "exception clause," which shows how this vital issue was dealt with in Matthew's community.) Thus, there are some whom Mark's Jesus will challenge to continue to be faithful forever. There are others whom he will challenge to adapt, as the early church did, to the needs and feelings of those who no longer can live with their spouses.

10:13-16 The model of the child: total trust. Perhaps Jesus' teaching concerning fidelity in marriage inspired Mark to follow that passage (10:1-12) with the image of the child (vv. 13-16). Mark claims in these verses that only a childlike trust will enable his Christians to live up to Jesus' demands in the concrete day-to-day relationships they have, in the family and elsewhere. Once more the disciples seem to want to avoid hearing the truth. They scold the people for bringing children to Jesus (v. 13). In turn, Jesus' human compassion is aroused to passionate indignation with them. Only Mark records Jesus' anger with the disciples and his tender touching of the children (vv. 14 and 16).

When Jesus says that it is only to those who are as needy and receptive as children that the kingdom of God belongs (vv. 14-15), he invites his readers to delve more deeply into the realization of their own human helplessness. Only thus can the power of their God and Father live in them. The positive acceptance of one's own powerlessness and God's power draws Mark's readers very close to the experience of having the kingdom of God established in their hearts. As Jesus will say in the next section of the Gospel, "For human beings it is impossible but not for God. All things are possible for God" (10:27).

10:17-31 The rich man asks about everlasting life; Jesus looks at him with love. In Matthew's version of this encounter, Jesus tells the rich man: "If you wish to be perfect, go, sell what you have, and give to the poor" (Matt 19:21). In Mark's account there is no "if" clause. The one who wants to follow Mark's Jesus must give up all he or she has, give the proceeds to the poor, and then follow him (v. 21). What a demanding person Mark's Jesus is! Here is an eager, prospective disciple, who has kept all the commandments since his childhood (v. 20). He wants everlasting life (v. 17). Jesus looks on him with love, but then challenges him beyond his capacities (see v. 22: "He went away sad . . .").

Mark's Jesus turns to his disciples and makes it clear to them that having many possessions is an almost insurmountable deterrent to possession of the kingdom of God (vv. 23-25). This overwhelmed Jesus' disciples (v. 26) and probably overwhelmed Mark's first readers as thoroughly as it challenges his readers today. Mark calls for the trust of the child in its parents: "All things are possible for God" (v. 27; recall the model of the child in 10:13-16). However, that challenging response did not satisfy Peter, just as it probably did not satisfy Mark's Christians, who had already left so much to follow Jesus (v. 28). In verses 29-31, Mark assures his readers that anyone who is detached from everything and everyone, so that he or she can follow after Jesus, will receive a hundredfold of family members and possessions in this life, while inheriting everlasting life in the age to come. (Mark's readers will note that those who leave all for Jesus will also receive "persecutions," v. 30. Even when he assures his Christians of their reward, Mark's Jesus reminds them that they stand in the shadow of the cross.)

In the world of today, just as in the time of Jesus and Mark, security in possessions and in money can pull people away from depending on God as the true source of their life, here and hereafter. Like the man in the Gospel story, all of Mark's Christians are called to radical discipleship. To follow Jesus still means to go and sell what one has. To be for Jesus still means to be for the poor. The man in the Gospel story wanted everlasting life. The Christian way to everlasting life is to be poor. Jesus' way is to rely solely on God, for whom all things are possible!

10:32-34 The "Suffering Servant" predicts his fate for the third time. Mark records Jesus' third and final prediction of his death and resurrection, with some details that were missing in the previous two predictions: it would happen in Jerusalem; and the Gentiles would mock him, spit at him, and flog him before killing him (vv. 33-34). As the end of Jesus' way draws closer, the more explicitly he identifies himself with the suffering servant of Isaiah, who would heal his people by the very stripes, chastisement, and harsh treatment he would endure for their sakes (Isa 53:1-7).

The manner in which Mark sets the scene for this third prediction is significant: "They were on the way, going up to Jerusalem, and Jesus went ahead of them" (v. 32). Jesus knows where they are headed and what awaits him in Jerusalem. But the disciples follow, "amazed," and the crowd trails along in fear. By this time the reader must wonder what effect such predictions had on the first disciples, especially when two of the Twelve (James and John) show that they have completely misunderstood what he has said (see next passage, 10:35-45). Mark hopes that his unfolding Gospel drama will have a more lasting effect on his Christian readers. He hopes that they will consciously choose to model their lives on Jesus, the Suffering Servant, who walks ahead of them.

10:35-45 James and John ask about glory; Jesus gives them the cross. The request of James and John to sit at Jesus' right and left in glory makes up the next to last scene before Jesus arrives in Jerusalem, the place of his death. It seems almost impossible that these two disciples could ask such an ambitious and inappropriate question after Mark's Jesus has been describing his way of suffering so clearly, since 8:31! (Matthew casts James and John in a better light, having their mother pose the request, Matt 20:20.)

Jesus responds to their request with a challenging question of his own: "Can you drink the cup I shall drink or be baptized with the baptism with which I am baptized?" (v. 38). Since "the cup" and "baptism" language is symbolic for Mark of Jesus' agony and death to come, it is obvious that Jesus is challenging James and John to take very seriously what it means to follow him to glory. Then, in response to their eager "We can" of

v. 39, Jesus divides the issue: You shall share in my cup, in my baptism, in my death. But it is up to someone else, my Father, to give out the seats of glory! (v. 40).

Jesus thus concludes the dialogue in such a way that James and John get a profound (and unwanted?) answer to their ambitious request. The answer is not a simple "yes" or "no," but a challenge: "Perhaps the Father will reserve the seats for you, if you willingly take on my cross, my cup, my baptism." Who among Mark's readers in A.D. 70 or today is eager to go "all the way" with Jesus?

Verse 41 is the transition verse by which Mark draws his own Christian readers more explicitly into the dialogue. Today's reader of the incident might become indignant with James and John, as the other ten disciples did, and say, "How selfish they are!" However, Mark's Jesus calls all of his followers together and says: "It is not only in this one incident that Christians manifest selfish, unchristian attitudes. Whoever wants to follow the Son of Man must take an uncompromising stance against such non-gospel values as 'lording it over others' " (v. 42). To be a Christian is to be a servant, as Jesus was (v. 45). To be first and greatest is to serve the needs of all, as Jesus did (v. 44). That is the way to glory for a disciple of Mark's Jesus!

Because this scene features James and John, two of Jesus' most intimate disciples (remember that they were with him at the transfiguration, 9:2-9, and that they will be with him in the garden of his agony, 14:32-42), Mark's message here is especially relevant to anyone in a leadership position in the church. It is a "servant leadership" that Mark calls for. The church's leaders are meant to be the first to "drink the cup," daily serving the needs of their brothers and sisters, whatever those needs are, whenever they are perceived. If this call seems too radical and even impossible to fulfill, Mark next offers his readers the example of someone else—the blind beggar Bartimaeus of verses 46-52—who probably thought his situation was hopeless.

10:46-52 The model of the blind man: "I want to see!" The cure of blind Bartimaeus concludes this demanding section of Mark's Gospel drama, just as the cure of the other blind man (8:22-26) concluded the "Bread and Blindness" chapters (6–8). In contrast to the first blind man, who was brought to Jesus by others (8:22), Bartimaeus cries out on his own initiative: "Jesus, Son of David, have pity on me!" (v. 47). The title he gives Jesus, "Son of David," indicates that he, a blind beggar, actually sees who Jesus is more clearly than the disciples and crowd who have been with him all along! Although some people try to quiet the man (v. 48), his persistence wins out. Jesus has his disciples call him closer (v. 49). Bartimaeus responds with great enthusiasm and comes to Jesus. He becomes the one and only person in Mark's Gospel who calls Jesus "Master." (This particular way of addressing Jesus appears in the New Testament only here and at John 20:16, when Mary Magdalene meets the risen Jesus near the empty tomb.)

In the Gospel of Matthew, the parallel story has two blind men call for Jesus' help; and Jesus, moved with compassion, touched their eyes (Matt 20:33-34). Here in Mark's version of the incident, Jesus need not touch Bartimaeus. He does not even have to say "Your faith has saved you" (as Luke has it, in 18:42), because Bartimaeus' cry and actions reveal his deep faith. Jesus is his master! It is just such profound trust in Jesus that Mark wants to elicit from the Christian recipients of his Gospel.

When the blind man immediately received his sight and started to follow Jesus "on the way" (v. 52), Mark offers a smooth transition to the next section of the Gospel (i.e., the end of the road, Jerusalem and Calvary, chs. 11–15). More important, however, he offers his community the hope and encouraging example of this early disciple of Jesus (the phrase "to follow him on the way," was a familiar designation for discipleship in the early church). Consequently, after Mark presents the very difficult teachings of Jesus about the Christian attitude toward divorce, riches, and ambition (earlier in ch. 10), this miracle-discipleship story becomes Mark's rallying call to his Christian readers in their own situation, on their own way of the cross: "You have nothing to fear from him! Get up! He is calling you!"

ON TO JERUSALEM

Mark 11:1–13:37

This major section of Mark's Gospel begins with Jesus' entry into Jerusalem

(11:1-11) and ends with his long discourse about the Jerusalem temple and the "days of tribulation" (13:1-37). Throughout these three chapters, Mark's readers will find themselves involved with Jesus in a series of foreboding incidents that build up to his betrayal, passion, and death in Jerusalem (chs. 14–15). Almost all of the scenes in chapters 11 to 13 are conflict-ridden, showing Jesus in confrontation with the religious leaders of Jerusalem over the issues of prayer and piety (11:12-25 and 12:28-44); life after death (12:18-27); tribute due to Caesar (12:13-17); and Jesus' authority in all such matters (11:27-33). This series of conflict stories will remind Mark's readers of earlier conflicts (2:1–3:6), which ended with the Pharisees' plotting with the Herodians how they might destroy Jesus (3:6). This time the plotting leads to his arrest and death (14:43-52 and 15:21-26).

By his choice of the various scenes for these three critical chapters, Mark leaves no doubt in his readers' minds about what the basis of their Christian discipleship is: they are to put their trust in God (11:22), and they must put that trust into action by loving their neighbor as themselves (12:31). Their models will be two: (1) the sincere scribe of 12:28-34 and (2) the poor widow, whose generous trust in God urged her to give "from her poverty, all she had, her whole livelihood" (12:44).

11:1-11 Jesus' entry into Jerusalem. Mark's account of Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem functions much as the transfiguration event did earlier (9:2-8). It is another exhilarating moment on the otherwise long and arduous "way" of Jesus to his saving passion and death. Because Jerusalem was the holy city of God, and because the details of Jesus' arrival there (vv. 7-10) point to the coming of Israel's Prophet-Savior (e.g., "See, your king shall come . . . riding on an ass, on a colt, the foal of an ass," Zech 9:9), Mark's first readers would not be able to miss the obvious connection: Jesus was the longed-for Savior of Israel! They could join the crowds and shout: "Hosanna! The reign of God and of our father David has begun with Jesus' coming!"

However, because Jerusalem was also the city of Jesus' death, Mark is quick to play down the enthusiasm surrounding Jesus' entry. (This nuance in Mark's Gospel becomes evident when his account is compared with Matthew's version, which has "the very large crowd spread their cloaks on the road," Matt 21:8, and "the whole city was shaken" at his entry, Matt 21:10.) Consequently, the way Mark presents this episode allows his readers to rejoice in the risen Lord's kingship over them while not allowing them to forget the cost of being his disciples, namely, that they must deny their very selves, take up their cross, and follow in his steps (8:34).

The exhilarating moment of the entry into Jerusalem has come and gone. After a night's rest at Bethany with the Twelve, Jesus returns to the city for the final days and the final act of the Gospel drama (11:11-12).

11:12-25 The cursed fig tree and the cleansing of the temple. At first reading, the story of Jesus and the fig tree (vv. 12-14 and 20-21) is one of the strangest in the Gospels. It is uncharacteristic enough of Jesus to curse a fig tree for not having fruit on it. But when Mark includes the detail that "it was not the time for figs" (v. 13), Jesus appears even more unreasonable, and the incident becomes more difficult to understand.

Two keys are needed to unlock the meaning of this strange passage. First, Mark's readers may recall that the fig tree was a common Old Testament image for Israel (e.g., Hos 9:10). Therefore, Jesus' cursing of the tree would symbolically stand for his anger with the Jewish people. But why does Mark's Jesus curse Israel at this point of the Gospel drama? (Remember that the people have just welcomed him triumphantly into Jerusalem!) A second key to understanding this passage is its immediate context, which reveals an angry Jesus driving the buyers and sellers from the sacred temple area. They have turned what was meant to be "a house of prayer for all peoples" into a "den of thieves" (v. 17, quoting Isa 56:7). Consequently, Mark's readers can see why he wove the fig-tree passage together with the cleansing of the temple. The withered fig tree (v. 21) is meant to symbolize the fruitless side of Jewish temple piety in Jesus' time.

This passage might well challenge Mark's Christian readers to evaluate the depth of their own faith. In contrast to the superficial ceremony of the old temple, Mark hopes that they will have the type of profound trust in God that can move mountains (vv. 22-23). In verses 23-24, Mark's Jesus uses very bold, even exaggerated, language to say that by faith and prayer his people will be able to do what seems impossible, as well as receive whatever they ask for in prayer. (Remember the similarly strong "image with a point" in 10:25: "It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for one who is rich to enter the kingdom of God.")

Jesus and the early church believed in the infinite power of prayer. It seems that the only thing Mark's readers cannot hope to receive in prayer is an escape from their share in the suffering way of the Lord. For example: "Amen, I say to you, there is no one who has given up house or brothers or sisters or mother or father or children or lands for my sake and for the sake of the gospel who will not receive a hundred times more now in this present age: houses and brothers and sisters and mothers and children and lands, with persecutions, and eternal life in the age to come (10:29ff.).

Mark concludes his description of Jesus' type of true piety by saying that anyone who prays with forgiveness for those who have offended them shall be forgiven in turn by the Father in heaven (v. 25). Although Mark does not relate the Our Father in his Gospel, as Matthew and Luke do, this little section brings out the attitudes of radical trust and forgiveness that are expected of children in their lives and in their prayer.

11:27-33 The lines of authority are drawn: conflict! The chief priests and scribes, who were looking for a way to destroy Jesus after he had cleansed the temple (11:18), question him "by what authority" he teaches and acts as he does (v. 28). This is not a simple question put by one teacher to another. It is a most serious challenge, the first in the final series of challenges that Jesus will face from the religious leaders of his day (11:27–12:44).

Mark's readers will notice how each conflict ends with a victorious Jesus silencing his opponents, the experts in Jewish law and scriptures. Here, for example, in verses 29-33, Jesus takes their question about his authority and turns it into his own clever question about the authority of John the Baptizer (v. 30). Since the scribes feared what others, friends or foes of John, might think of their response (vv. 31-32), they are forced to admit: "We do not know" (v. 33). What began as a threat to Jesus' authority ends as an example of how little authority (and courage) his antagonists had! Mark wants his readers to take pride in the confounding wisdom of their teacher, Jesus. He also might be cleverly questioning his readers as to how they use the authority they possess in the church or how courageously they challenge the way others use the authority vested in them.

12:1-12 The parable of the vineyard: the rejected stone (son) is the cornerstone. For the first time since chapter 4, Mark has Jesus "speak to them in parables" (v. 1), namely, in the parable of the vineyard and the evil tenants (vv. 3-8). This is the last parable Mark records, and what a perfect last parable it is! By it, Mark anticipates the final act of his whole Gospel drama, since the rejection of the owner's son (v. 8) looks to the crucifixion of Jesus, and the reaction of the owner (vv. 9-11) points to the resurrection, when God vindicates Jesus' death.

Mark's Christian readers would understand the various elements and the deeper message of this parable as clearly as the scribes and chief priests to whom it was addressed ("They realized that he had addressed the parable to them," v. 12). The care of the vineyard (the people of Israel) had been entrusted by God to the leaders of the Jewish people (the "tenant farmers"). They treated the son (Jesus) as ruthlessly (vv. 6-8) as they had treated the Old Testament prophets before him (vv. 2-5). Because they did so, they no longer have any authority with God's new people. Rather, that authority now rests with the leaders of the early church (v. 9).

Mark conveys the same message when he has Jesus quote Psalm 118. Only the key image changes, namely, the "son" becomes the cornerstone (vv. 10-11). As Mark prepares his readers for their encounter with Jesus' death, he makes it clear where the blame for the Son's death lay—with the Jewish leaders. He also challenges Christian leaders to examine the relationship they have with Christ, "the cornerstone." For them, this parable is food for serious thought about how they are caring for the church entrusted into their hands by the risen Lord.

12:13-27 Of tribute due to Caesar and to the living God. Mark moves from his last parable to two more of Jesus' conflict encounters with Jewish leadership. The first concerns the tax due to the emperor (vv. 13-17), and the second has to do with belief in resurrection and life after death (vv. 18-27). Mark's readers will discern a similar pattern in both encounters. First, the leaders approach Jesus with trick questions, obviously trying to "ensnare him in his speech" (v. 13). The Pharisees and Herodians ask if a good Jew should pay taxes to the Roman emperor or if that is against the law of Moses (v. 14). Then the Sadducees, who were known for not believing in the resurrection, ask a legalistic and cynical question about marriage relationships in the risen life (v. 23).

In response to their questions, Jesus shows a cunning wisdom that unveils their intent to trip him up. He exposes their hypocrisy in one case (v. 15) and shows their shallow understanding of their own Scriptures in the other (v. 24). Good Jews (and good Christians in Mark's audience) are expected to pay "tax tribute" to lawful civil leaders and "praise and true allegiance tribute" to God (vv. 15-17). Jews (and Christians) who really understand their sacred Scriptures should also know that "the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob" (and of the risen Jesus) is "not God of the dead but of the living" (vv. 24-27).

The cumulative result of these two encounters is that Mark's readers, like those first involved with Jesus, might be "amazed" at Jesus' wisdom (v. 17) and at his dedication to his Father, the God of life. But Mark wants more than amazement—he wants his Christians to imitate their Lord by being courageous apostles of truth and life themselves. How they are to be such apostles is up to them in their own circumstances. However, the following passage will give them a concrete model to follow.

12:28-34 The scribe who was close to the reign of God. After all the scheming and malicious questioning from the elders and scribes, for Jesus to claim that a scribe is "not far from the kingdom of God" (v. 34) is quite remarkable. Yet, upon examining this dialogue over which is the "first of all the commandments" (v. 28), Mark's readers can readily approve of the scribe's sincerity and honest attempt to understand the underlying basis of Jesus' way. Jesus responds to his question with the traditional Shema prayer, which every Israelite prays twice daily: "Hear, O Israel! The Lord our God is Lord alone!" (v. 29). Since the Lord is one, Jesus and the Shema continue, one's whole being (heart, soul, mind, and strength) should love God (v. 30). Jesus then adds a second command: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself." In effect, he makes the first of all the commandments into one dual commandment ("There is no greater commandment than these," v. 31).

The scribe appreciates Jesus' response. He sees how Jesus has combined two commands given to Israel by Moses (Deut 6:2 and Lev 19:18). He also hears in Jesus' response more than Jesus has said! He hears in it the echo of the prophet who declared that love, not sacrifice, is what God desires of all people (v. 33, quoting Hos 6:6).

Mark's readers know how correct the scribe was, because they knew that Jesus practiced what he taught. He had loved God and his neighbor unto death. His sacrifice was love! As they leave the crowds, who no longer "dared to ask him any more questions" (v. 34), Mark's readers might well ask themselves how their love of God is verified by their love of neighbor. They might ask how their sacrifice and liturgical worship of God are made manifest in their sacrifices for others. Mark's report of this encounter thus challenges his Christians to be like Jesus and also like this singular scribe, who had such insight into the ways of the kingdom. It also prepares them for the last two episodes of chapter 12, which will contrast the generous piety of the widow with the empty prayer of certain scribes (12:38-44).

12:35-37 Jesus is David's Lord and God's Son. Up to this point in chapter 12, the scribes have been asking Jesus challenging questions. He now asks them one: "How do [you] claim that the Messiah is the son of David" (v. 35), when David himself (in Ps 110:1) refers to the Messiah as "my Lord" (v. 36)? Mark's readers know that Jesus is their Messiah. They also know that he was of Davidic descent. However, Mark wants his readers to acknowledge even more, namely, that Jesus is the Son of God. Some people put Jesus to death because he claimed to be "the Son of the Blessed One" (14:61-64). How will Mark's readers renew their commitment to their Lord, who is also David's Lord and God's Son?

12:38-44 The poor widow shows the scribes the meaning of religion. The last time Mark presents Jesus in the temple is one of the most dramatic moments of his whole Gospel. Jesus first warns people to beware of the scribes, who pray long and loud in order to be seen and respected as "the holy ones" (vv. 38-39). At the same time, because they "devour the houses of widows" (v. 40), they show how empty their prayer is. (They also disobey a special commandment given to their ancestors by Moses: "You shall not wrong any widow or orphan or stranger," Exod 22:21.)

To this story of hypocrisy Mark has added the touching picture-example of the poor widow (vv. 41-44). Look at her, says Mark's Jesus. She puts much less money in the box than the wealthy ones (v. 41), but she, from her poverty, has contributed all she had, her whole livelihood" (v. 44). Her offering is a sign of what total dependence on God really means. The widow thus becomes a model of faith for Mark's readers. If they imitate her generous and trusting faith, they will also be imitating Jesus, who likewise gave up his very life for the many (chs. 14–15)!

13:1-4 The end of the temple and the end of "all these things." As Jesus and the disciples leave the temple area, Mark has Jesus predict that "there will not be one stone [of these great buildings] left upon another" (v. 2). They respond to Jesus' remarkable statement with an important related question: "Tell us, when will this happen? And what sign will there be when all these things [i.e., the world as we know it] are about to come to an end?" Mark's readers today might not see how the disciples' question about the end of the world follows logically from Jesus' prediction about the end of the temple. They will understand the connection, however, if two significant facts are made clear: (1) the early church saw the destruction of Jerusalem as a pre-eminent sign of the soon-to-come end of the world; and (2) the early Christians for whom Mark was writing had already witnessed that destruction of Jerusalem (in A.D. 70 by the Roman army). Such historical background will help today's readers of Mark's Gospel understand this important chapter.

It is also helpful for Mark's readers to realize the special type of literature they will be involved with for the rest of chapter 13. All of Jesus' talk about "the end" and the signs that will accompany it belongs to the type of first-century writing known as "apocalyptic." In the early church, apocalyptic writing was used to communicate hope to fearful people by revealing how God would definitively save his faithful ones from any and all evil forces at the end of time. Apocalyptic literature made up a small (in content) but very significant (in meaning) part of Christianity's first gospel message. (Such writing was rather common in certain Old Testament communities, which were longing for the coming of their Messiah to deliver them from foreign, pagan rulers. See, for example, the Book of Daniel, chapters 7–12, written about 150 B.C., which describes the coming of the Son of Man in terms very similar to those found here in Mark's Gospel. See also New Testament writings like Matt 24–25, Luke 21, 1 Thess 4–5, and the Book of Revelation, which reflect the early church's keen consciousness of the Lord's absence and its expectations of his imminent return in glory.) It is in chapter 13 that Mark passes on to his community the early church's hopeful preoccupation with Jesus' return. It is here that Mark describes the attitudes to be adopted by his readers in the time between Jesus' resurrection and that return.

13:5-23 Christian alertness and endurance in "the end times." Mark begins Jesus' apocalyptic speech with a section (vv. 5-23) that exemplifies very well two ways in which apocalyptic language is meant to move its readers to response and action. First, the catch phrase that begins and ends this section ("See that no one deceives you" at v. 5, and "Be watchful" at v. 23) signals his readers to be very alert to their response to certain misleading preachers in their midst ("who come in my name," v. 6, and "false messiahs and prophets," v. 22) who say the end is already here because of certain signs (for example, wars, v. 7; earthquakes, v. 8; persecution, vv. 9-13). The proper Christian response, says Mark, is not to panic (v. 7) but to persevere. Mark encourages his readers to view their perseverance in times of tension as a positive sign of God's protecting Holy Spirit with them until the end (vv. 9 and 11). Even more important, Mark demands that his readers be alert to means of spreading the good news about Jesus "to all nations" (v. 10), because only when that missionary effort is concluded can the end really come.

A second characteristic of apocalyptic speech is that some events that have already begun to happen (in the past and present) are cast as a part of the future scheme of things. This mode of writing was meant to assure the readers of the reliability of those parts of the message that really do pertain to the future. For example, Mark's readers can say, "Yes, some families already have broken up and have been divided because some of their members chose to follow Jesus" (vv. 12-13). They can also say, "Yes, 'the desolating abomination' of Roman idols already stands in Jerusalem, where the holy temple once stood" (v. 14). At the same time, what is most important is that they realize that the Lord will protect his faithful ones when the end really comes, even shortening the days of distress for the sake of those he has chosen (v. 20). In fact, reports Mark, the most reliable sign of the end of time is yet to come, namely, the glorious return of the Son of Man (to be described in vv. 24-27).

By being in touch with the nature of apocalyptic writing, the readers of chapter 13 can experience the urgency of the early church's waiting and watching for the return of their absent Lord (vv. 15-19). They can also hear Mark's invitation to put aside useless and fearful calculation of deadlines regarding the end of the world, in order to live courageously in the present as discerning and alert missionaries of Jesus' gospel.

13:24-27 The consoling coming of the Son of Man. While apocalyptic writing is recognized by its scary and dark imagery of trials, tribulations, and turmoil in the heavens (vv. 24-25), there is also the consoling light at the heart of it all, which overcomes the darkness. Here that consolation takes the form of the glorious Son of Man, Jesus, coming on the clouds to gather his chosen and faithful ones from all over the earth (vv. 26-27). Mark borrows this encouraging picture of God's deliverance from the promises of the Old Testament prophet Daniel (Dan 7:13-14). Mark's readers today, as well as his first readers, might well be lifted up by this promise of God's final victory over whatever difficulties or darkness envelop them and their world. Encouraged by this hopeful vision, they can accept more readily their responsibilities to be a consoling light for those who may not yet have experienced the hopeful side of the gospel promises.

13:28-37 "We do not know when, but it is near, so persevere!" Just as surely as Jesus' other predictions have come to pass (his death and resurrection, the fall of Jerusalem, the trials his followers would endure), so also will he come again in glory to save his chosen ones. This encouraging message of 13:3-27 concludes with the final call of Jesus to his faithful followers: "The end is near and will happen soon. You will see the signs of the end (vv. 29-31) just as clearly as you see the coming of summer by the new leaves on the fig tree (vv. 28-29)." "But," underlines Mark's Jesus, "since no one knows the day or the hour when the end will come, be watchful and be alert (vv. 32-33). Look around you like the gatekeeper (v. 35). Do not be found sleeping (v. 36), but 'watch!' " (v. 37).

The apocalyptic chapter 13 ends with Mark's sharp challenge for all his readers (not only for Peter, James, John, and Andrew of v. 3). He asks them to persevere in their faith, even in dark days of suffering on behalf of the gospel. It should be clear to Mark's readers that it is their duty to be alert missionaries of that gospel in the present, since the Son of Man entrusted it into their hands until his return in glory.

THE SON OF MAN WILL BE PUT TO DEATH AND WILL RISE THREE DAYS LATER

Mark 14:1–16:8

The very familiar account of the death and resurrection of Jesus is the climax of Mark's involving drama. Everything has been leading to these three chapters, and Mark tells the passion story in such a way that many of the key themes of his Gospel are now drawn together. For example, the disciples still fail to have any clear sight or faithful confidence in the Lord they follow. Indeed, they all scatter in the garden when one of them betrays Jesus to his killers with a kiss (14:43-52). Likewise, the alert reader will see how the important images of bread and cup (developed through chs. 6–8 and 10) come together in the Eucharistic passage that precedes Jesus' agony in the garden (14:22-26). A third developing theme of the earlier chapters, namely, Jesus' identification of himself as the suffering Son of Man, finds its climax at the foot of the cross, when the Roman centurion declares at Jesus' death: "Truly this man was the Son of God!" (15:39).

By now, Mark's readers expect some of the developments that occur in these closing chapters. Yet, Mark's passion account also surprises his readers with a very abrupt ending (16:8). When the women leave the tomb and say nothing to anyone because they were afraid (16:8), Mark's readers are left to complete the story with their own careful reflection and response. Why did Mark end the Gospel in this strange way? When did the women overcome their trembling and bewilderment and carry out the mission given to them by the young man at the tomb (16:7)? What about the readers' own hesitation to be courageous proclaimers of Jesus' message? While Mark's readers know that most of Jesus' predictions have come true, two are left unfulfilled. First, did Jesus ever appear to the disciples in Galilee, as he had promised (14:28)? (The reader knows that he did, but not from Mark's account.) Second, will Jesus keep his promise to return "in the clouds with great power and glory . . . and gather his elect . . . from the end of the earth to the end of the sky," as he had promised (13:26-27)? This certainly has not happened yet!

The ending of Mark's Gospel is, therefore, more like the beginning of something else. It is as if Mark is saying that the Gospel is not over yet. In fact, Mark's ending leaves his readers with the startling realization that they have to conclude the Gospel by living out its values. What seemingly began as Mark's account of the past life of "Jesus Christ, the Son of God" (1:1) ends with the dramatic invitation that all his readers be faithful imitators of Jesus, the servant Son of Man (10:45), in the present, until he comes again to establish the reign of God in power (8:38 and 9:1)!

14:1-11 The preparations for Jesus' death and burial. The first verses of the passion narrative set the scene and the emotional tone for all that is to follow. While the chief priests are afraid to arrest Jesus because "there may be a riot among the people" (v. 2), one of the Twelve makes it easy for them by arranging to hand him over, thereby changing their fear into jubilant anticipation (vv. 10-11). In the midst of the plotting and planning for Jesus' death, Mark places the story of the woman at Bethany (vv. 3-9), whose bold act of reverence for Jesus "will be told in her memory wherever the good news is proclaimed throughout the world."

Typically, those with Jesus do not understand what is going on around them. They fail to see that the woman's act of anointing is the anticipation of Jesus' burial (v. 8). Their intentions are good (the money could be given to the poor, v. 5), but their infuriation with the woman (vv. 4-5) shows that they missed the point of her symbolic action. It should have reminded them of the reality of Jesus' suffering way! Mark does not want his readers to miss the point. To care for the poor is a key part of following Jesus (recall the challenge to the rich man in 10:21). But Jesus' followers must also choose all that is involved in being his disciples, even to the extent of giving their lives in service of the needs of all, in imitation of the suffering Son of Man (10:44-45).

14:12-26 Jesus makes his own preparations: the Passover Eucharist. Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem (11:8-11) had been preceded by his remarkable prediction that the disciples would find a "colt on which no one has ever sat" (11:2-7). A similarly remarkable prediction precedes the Passover supper that Jesus will celebrate with his disciples (see 14:12-16). Such amazing circumstances prepare Mark's readers for a very special part of the Jesus story.

The Passover meal of the Hebrews celebrated their deliverance from Egypt. ("The Lord will go by, striking down the Egyptians. Seeing the blood . . . on the doorposts, the Lord will pass over that door and not let the destroyer come into your houses to strike you down," Exod 12:23). As Jesus' Passover meal with his disciples begins, an unnamed (for now) and pitiable disciple is symbolically singled out as the one who will bring about Jesus' betrayal and, ironically, the new deliverance of God's people (vv. 17-21).

Such dramatic preparation leads to Mark's account of the first Eucharistic meal (vv. 22-25), which was as central to his Christian community's life then as it is today. Certainly Mark was faithful in passing on the early church's tradition that the Christian Eucharist is the new Passover. Jesus' saving death and resurrection was God's new and perfect way of delivering all people. Mark's Christians shared in the new covenant of Christ's body and blood when they shared the Eucharistic bread and cup! At the same time, Mark uses the occasion of the first Eucharist to round off a special theme he has been developing in regard to the disciples' blindness. (Bread has not been mentioned since chapters 6–8, where the disciples did not see the deeper meaning of Jesus' miracles, especially with "the breads"; the cup has not been mentioned since 10:35-45, when Jesus made clear its intimate connection with his death.) Consequently, Mark is telling his readers that those who wish to share in Jesus' Eucharistic cup (now and at the heavenly banquet, v. 25) must first choose to share fully in Jesus' way of suffering service (10:45a: "The Son of Man did not come to be served but to serve"). They must participate actively in Jesus' mission on earth, which involves pouring out their lives "for many" (v. 24), always in imitation of him (10:45b: "The Son of Man has come . . . to give his life as ransom for many").

14:27-31 "The sheep will be dispersed." After Jesus and his disciples arrive at the Mount of Olives (vv. 26-27), he makes three more predictions: (1) the sheep (his disciples) will be scattered at his death (v. 27); (2) once risen, Jesus will go to Galilee before them (v. 28); and (3) Peter will deny him three times "before the cock crows twice" (v. 30). Despite the protests of Peter and the others, Mark's readers know that two of these predictions will shortly (and sadly) be fulfilled. The disciples will all desert Jesus and flee (v. 50), and Peter will deny him (vv. 66-72). However, the prediction about seeing him in Galilee will be left unfulfilled, even when Mark's Gospel ends (16:8). Mark challenges his readers to ponder the meaning of this unfulfilled prediction as they enter the garden with Jesus, Peter, James, and John (v. 32).

14:32-42 The garden experience: model of radical trust. Mark's account of Jesus' agony in the garden is actually two moving scenes in one. In the first (vv. 33-36), Mark's readers are privileged to witness Jesus' profound humanity, as he is overwhelmed by fear and sadness at the prospect of his imminent death (i.e., the cup of v. 36). They also recognize in his final acceptance of his Father's will the ultimate act of his loving humanity, i.e., his choice to give up his life for the Father and for all people.

The second scene (vv. 37-42) focuses the readers' attention on the disciples who fall asleep as Jesus struggles in prayer. Mark hopes that his readers will face life and choose to be human like Jesus, not like the disciples. The profundity of Jesus' choice to take the cup can be grasped, ironically, only by certain readers of Mark's Gospel—that is, only those who have come as close to despair as Jesus did in the garden can really identify with him. Mark hopes that Jesus will be for them a realistic (truly human) model of trust and love in their painful "hour" (v. 41) of Christian and human life!

14:43-52 It all starts to fall into place: the betrayal and arrest. Once Jesus has made the decision to give himself up to his Father's will (v. 36), the other pieces of the passion account quickly fall into place. Immediately after Jesus is betrayed by the kiss of Judas (vv. 44-45), he is arrested and led off as if he were a common robber (v. 48). Mark makes it clear, in verse 49, that the arrest of the innocent Jesus, like the rest of his passion experience, is in accord with Old Testament prophecies about the way the Messiah of Israel would be treated by his own people.

Three other details in the passage bring out how oblivious Jesus' companions are to what is really happening. One of them thinks he can stop violence with violence (v. 47). All the rest leave him alone (v. 50). And even the young man who does follow, "wearing nothing but a linen cloth," runs away as soon as Jesus' enemies try to seize him (vv. 51-52). These details of Mark's passion account serve not only to recall for his readers "the way it all happened" but also to stimulate them to ask themselves how far they would go in staying with Jesus and his gospel values in their own difficult life situations.

14:53-65 The trial and the verdict and the sentence: Death! The so-called trial of Jesus is full of false and trumped-up charges against him. In response to such testimony, Jesus "was silent and answered nothing" (v. 61). The high priest's verdict of guilty (v. 64) comes only when the "silent one" does acknowledge that he is "the Messiah, the Son of the Blessed One," who will sit with God ("the Power") in the heavens, and who will "come with the clouds of heaven" as judge in the last days (v. 62). It is ironic that none of the false testimony can disprove Jesus' innocence (v. 55). It is only when he speaks the truth about himself that he is condemned to death (v. 62)! Certainly Mark's readers would be proud of their Lord's perseverance in the face of this humiliating trial and the mocking taunts and spittle that accompany it (v. 65). But will they be any more faithful to him than Peter was (see the next passage) when their faith is severely tested?

14:66-72 Peter denies Jesus three times. As Jesus had predicted (14:27), all his disciples deserted him in the garden and fled (14:50). As he had predicted (14:30), even Peter denies him, not once but three times (vv. 66-72). Peter's tears (v. 72) indicate his remorse, however, and his sorrow could be encouraging to any of Mark's readers who may at times have been unfaithful followers of Jesus. For they know that the one who denied his Lord three times would go on to experience the mercy of a forgiving God and become the early church's greatest apostle among the Jews (Gal 2:8) after the resurrection. Through the tears of Peter, Mark offers a great deal of hope to any of his Christian readers who lack courage and trust. It is never too late for them to say with contrite hearts: "Yes, I am with the Nazarene, Jesus!"

15:1-15 The chief priests and Pilate hand over "the king of the Jews." It is clear from the start of this passage (15:1: "As soon as morning came") how anxious the Jewish priests are to get the cooperation of the Roman official, Pilate, in putting Jesus away. Earlier the high priest had asked Jesus, in Jewish terms, if he was "the Messiah, the Son of the Blessed One." The Roman now asks, in terms that have political meaning for him, if Jesus is "the king of the Jews" (15:2). Jesus accepts the title given him by Pilate (15:3), which is the equivalent of saying "guilty" to the charge of high treason. (There is no king in Roman territory but Caesar!) Even so, Pilate sees through the charges made against Jesus (15:10: "He knew, of course, that it was out of envy that the chief priests had handed him over"). He tries to release Jesus instead of Barabbas, but the priests influence the crowd to ask for Barabbas (v. 11). Pilate ends up "wishing to satisfy the crowd," which calls for Jesus' death: "Crucify him!" (vv. 11-15). In so doing, Pilate plays out his cowardly role in the Gospel drama. Though convinced of Jesus' innocence, he still yields to pressure and hands him over to be scourged and crucified. And Jesus begins to drink deeply from "the cup."

15:20-32 The climax: they mocked and crucified him. Once again, after the intrigue of "the trials" that shows how innocent Jesus really is, the horrible events of the passion quickly unfold. After Jesus is scourged (v. 15), he is dressed "in purple" and "crowned" with thorns by the Roman soldiers, who mockingly call him "King of the Jews" (vv. 16-20). Through all the spitting and the beating he receives, Jesus remains silent. Mark's readers would certainly recognize in this the fulfillment of the Isaian prophecy concerning the Messiah: "I gave my back to those who beat me. . . . My face I did not shield from buffets and spitting" (Isa 50:6).

The climax of the Markan drama comes in Jesus' crucifixion. The readers of Mark's Gospel will notice that some familiar details are missing as they read Mark's account of the way of the cross. For example, the lamenting women of Jerusalem (Luke 23:27-31) do not meet him on the way. Likewise, both of the men who are crucified with Jesus join the passers-by in taunting Jesus (vv. 27-32), unlike what is recorded by Luke in the memorable exchange between Jesus and the "good thief" (Luke 23:40-43). Consequently, Mark's readers are left with the starkest of pictures. Their Lord hangs alone on the cross, exposed to the mockery of the people he came to save.

One of the last cries of mockery (v. 32: "Let the Messiah, 'the King of Israel,' come down now from the cross that we may see and believe") becomes for Mark a profound challenge to his readers' faith. Will they believe in Jesus precisely because he did not come down from the cross? Will they be able to see meaning in their own inexplicable suffering in the light of the absurd suffering of their Messiah and King? Will they be able to see the positive, saving value of their suffering as St. Paul did: "In my flesh I am filling up what is lacking in the afflictions of Christ on behalf of his body, the church" (Col 1:24)?

15:33-41 In his death Jesus is seen as the Son of God. Mark's readers have now come with Jesus to the moment that all his life has prepared for. Along with Jesus' "blind" disciples, they have walked with Jesus as he has shared life and healing power with others (chs. 1-8). They have learned what is necessary to be enlightened and true Christian disciples (chs. 9-13). All that is needed now is for them to stay with him to the end!

It is in the dark hour of Jesus' death (v. 33) that Mark's readers see the light. It is there, at the foot of the cross, that they hear their Lord's cry, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (v. 34). Mark does not want his Christians to mistake Jesus' cry for what it is not (as did the bystanders, who thought it was simply a desperate appeal for Elijah's help, vv. 35-36). Rather, he wants them to recognize in Jesus' last words and death the ultimate act of self-giving and trust. Like the Psalmist who first uttered this cry (Ps 22:2), Mark's Jesus believes that God will hear him (Ps 22:25) and will give him life, precisely because he suffered and died out of love and obedience! Who would ever believe that life could come from death? Yet Mark wants his readers to believe that this is true, not only for Jesus but also for anyone who will follow in his steps. Who would expect a Gentile centurion to be the first to declare that Jesus is "the Son of God"? Yet Mark asks his readers to see the living Son of God most clearly in his humble and loving death, just as the pagan centurion did.

15:42-47 Jesus is buried by Joseph of Arimathea. Near the end of Jesus' ministry in Jerusalem, he had met with a scribe who was "not far from the kingdom of God" (12:28-34). For Mark's readers, that scribe's sincere response to Jesus was more authentic than the response of Jesus' own disciples. Once again, in the burial scene, it is not Jesus' disciples who respond properly, but Joseph of Arimathea, "a distinguished member of the council" (15:43). He was bold enough to take reverent care of Jesus' burial (vv. 43-46). Thus, even as he relates the account of Jesus' burial, Mark prods his readers to have more faith than Jesus' first disciples. Pilate's inquiry as to whether Jesus was already dead (v. 44) also becomes an important detail for Mark. Such insistence on finality prepares Mark's readers for the most striking reversal of the entire Gospel, namely, the proclamation of the young man at the tomb: "Do not be amazed! You seek Jesus of Nazareth, the crucified. He has been raised; he is not here. Behold the place where they laid him" (16:6).

16:1-8 The end is the beginning! Go now and tell that he is risen! "They said nothing to anyone, for they were afraid" (16:8). This is how the women respond to the wonderful news of Jesus' resurrection. This is also how Mark ends his Gospel. (It is generally agreed that verses 9-20 were added to Mark's Gospel later by those who could not believe that Mark would end it as he did!) By ending it this way, Mark actually invites his readers to step in and take the place of the women at the empty tomb. The women failed to carry out the mission orders they received from God's messenger (the young man "clothed in a white robe," v. 5). Mark wants his disciples, men and women, to spread the good news that God has brought life from death by raising Jesus from the dead (vv. 6-7). He wants them to do so without the fear, bewilderment, or trembling of the three women at the tomb (v. 8).

Mark's readers might well ask how they could be any better as disciples than the women and men who were with Jesus during his life, at his death, and at the empty tomb. Mark would probably answer this way: "It is for you that this Gospel has been written! Persevere as faithful followers of the Jesus I have presented to you. His resurrection is not the end! He has gone ahead of you as the servant Messiah. Now you must care for the needs of those most in need, until he comes again. He has given meaning to suffering and has brought life from death. Trust in him and give his life to those who have no hope. Whatever you do, let others know by your courageous words and your lives of service that you have heard the Lord's call and that you have chosen to follow his lead until you see him, as he has promised."

THE THREE "OTHER ENDINGS" OF THE GOSPEL

16:9-20 +

Although virtually all of today's scholars of the Bible believe that Mark had a purpose in ending his Gospel abruptly at 16:8, this was not always the case. Some first- or second-century Christians tried to "complete" his Gospel drama by adding scenes that they thought Mark should have added himself.

The first extra ending, the so-called Longer Ending (vv. 9-20), includes appearances of the risen Jesus to Mary Magdalene and to the disciples. These visions were meant to inspire the early missionary church to "go into the whole world and proclaim the gospel to every creature" (v. 15). The church's missionaries had nothing to fear, because the ascended Lord

(v. 19) was with them in their preaching (v. 20) and would confirm their message with special signs of his protection and power (vv. 17-18). Alert readers will notice some themes in these verses that are unlike anything they have seen before in Mark's Gospel. They may also recognize in them echoes of familiar scenes from the other Gospels, gathered together to round off Mark's abrupt ending (for example, Mary Magdalene meets with Jesus alone in John's Gospel, 20:11-18; the appearance to the two disciples is reminiscent of Luke's Emmaus appearance, 24:13-35; and the commission to "go into the whole world to preach" sounds like the ending of Matthew's Gospel, 28:16-20).

The so-called Shorter Ending, when read immediately after 16:8, was another attempt of the early church to end Mark's Gospel more smoothly. It reverses the fear and silence of the women at the tomb and shows how the message of the resurrection came to be proclaimed through "Peter's companions."

The Freer Ending, preserved in the Freer Gallery in Washington, D.C., is a fifth-century addition to the Longer Ending. Appearing between verses 14 and 15, it excuses the disbelief and stubbornness of the disciples found at 16:14.

Although the church has recognized these "added endings" as worthy of inclusion in the inspired text, none of them is as inspiring and involving as Mark's own. Mark's abrupt ending leaves it up to his readers to "complete" his Gospel in their lives.

LUKE

Jerome Kodell, O.S.B.

INTRODUCTION

The Gospel of Luke is the first half of a two-part work that tells the story of the origins of Christianity from the infancy of Jesus until the arrival of Paul, the foremost preacher, in Rome around A.D. 60. Just the length of the Gospel and of its companion volume, the Acts of the Apostles (more extensive than the contribution of any other individual New Testament writer), would have made its author a prominent influence on Christian theology and spirituality. But he is in addition a gifted writer, organizing his materials creatively and telling his story with clarity and artistic coloring. Dante called Luke the "scribe of Christ's gentleness" because of his emphasis on Jesus' mercy to sinners and outcasts. Some of the most memorable Gospel stories of divine mercy are found only in Luke (the widow of Naim, the prodigal son, Zacchaeus).

The author and his audience

At the beginning of his Gospel, Luke recognizes the work of those who have gone before. He is not trying to replace the earlier Gospel of Mark, but he sees the need for a new account for a new generation in different circumstances. Luke is a Greek-speaking Christian, possibly a convert of Paul, writing in Antioch (Syria) or Asia Minor (modern Turkey) late in the first century—probably in the eighties. The Christian church is quickly becoming more Gentile than Jewish in composition; it is no longer confined to Palestine but is a configuration of communities scattered throughout the Roman Empire. Its language is not Aramaic but Greek. Luke wants to show the continuity of this modern Greek church with Jesus and the early Hebrew community. He finds that he can trace these roots best by adding a sequel to the story of Jesus, connecting the two parts thematically while preserving the historical distinctions. He uses the Gospel of Mark, editing it according to his own needs, and other written and oral sources besides, some from traditions used also by the evangelist Matthew.

To Luke's readership, the geography, language, and religious and political conditions of Palestine were foreign and remote. Most were unfamiliar with the Jewish writings that the preachers often referred to in explaining the story of Jesus. The Christians of Asia Minor and Europe were concerned to be good citizens of the Roman Empire, a government that had been treated as an intruder by many of Jesus' contemporaries in Palestine. Many of the new generation of Christians were not poor but well-to-do, more urban than rural. The question arose, either spontaneously or with help from their pagan neighbors: Why are we Greeks following a religion with so much of a Hebrew core? How did the news about Jesus get here? Were our missionaries reliable? Are we by now independent of happenings in Jerusalem?

These Christian citizens of the Roman Empire would have heard, of course, of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman army, a catastrophe foretold by Jesus and interpreted as punishment for sin. Did this indicate that they should cut their Jewish roots? How could Jesus' words to a Hebrew audience a half century earlier be appropriate to a modern Greek audience? All this would have been heightened by their neighbors' pervasive hostility to Christianity and by subtle persecution in many forms, particularly social and economic.

Issues like these swirled about Luke as he conceived his two-part work. He addressed these and more, directly and indirectly. He wanted his readers to know that they had been included in God's plan of salvation from the beginning, even though historically the Jews were the first to hear the message as the channel for all others. The story of salvation unraveled according to the exact plan of God, just as was promised in the Old Testament. It is a journey to the kingdom under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. The Gospel portrays the beginnings of the Christian story, from the first announcement of the fulfillment of salvation until its achievement in the death and resurrection of Jesus. The Acts of the Apostles tells of the rise and development of the church, pointing out the major decisions and turning points as the leaders were guided by God into the Gentile mission. Once the church's decision to evangelize all people, not only Jews, is made definitively (Acts 15), the story follows the apostle Paul as he carries the gospel across the Empire, into Europe and eventually to the center of the contemporary world, Rome.

Themes

Every preacher of the gospel delivers the fundamental proclamation of salvation in Jesus Christ. But each one develops the insights into the mystery that come from personal reflection and experience and that are needed by a particular audience. There are four written Gospels; there might have been many more. They tell us the same basic story about Jesus and interpret its meaning. Their approach to the subject is like that of four painters assigned to produce portraits of the same person. Each evangelist brings to the task a personal relationship to Jesus, individual talents, a particular experience of Christian life in a certain place or places, a wealth of material learned in the community or researched in other ways. Some of Luke's prominent themes are the following.

