1, 2 To encourage the Corinthians to respond to his appeal for support for the Jerusalem poor, Paul sketches the fine example set by the churches of Macedonia. Their generosity is a demonstration of the grace of God, for they themselves were suffering some severe test of affliction and were in extreme poverty. The Corinthians were not in this plight (8:14). 3, 4 Furthermore, the Macedonians gave of their own free will, even begging Paul for the favour of sending aid. 5 Not as we expected. Even Paul was surprised at their fervour. The explanation was that they first had given themselves to the Lord, i.e. put themselves entirely at Christ's disposal in the matter; and consequently, says Paul, they gave themselves to us, understanding this to be the will of God. Such spontaneity, thoroughness, Christian spirit, and confidence in Paul, were all lessons for the Corinthians. 6 Titus . . . made a beginning. Paul wants the Corinthian collection (1 Cor. 16:1f.) to be speedily completed and added to the Macedonians' gift now ready. Titus has agreed to return to Corinth for the purpose (8:17). This gracious work. Will the Corinthians too reveal the working of God's grace (8:1) in their liberality? 7 As you excel in everything (cf. 1 Cor. 1:4–7). God had bestowed special spiritual gifts upon the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 12–14). Faith; probably not saving faith, but the charismatic gift; so also with utterance and knowledge (see 1 Cor. 12:8–10). Earnestness . . . love for us; i.e. now, after their change of heart (7:7–12).

8 Others; i.e. the Macedonians (8:1), whose generosity has demonstrated their love. 9 Our Lord Jesus Christ; named in full for solemn emphasis. His example is enough to assert the principle: the haves must provide for the have-nots. He was rich; sharing His Father's glory

(Jn. 17:5). Became poor; referring to the incarnation (Phil. 2:7). Paul does not here refer to the poverty of the earthly life of Jesus (Lk. 9:58), but rather to His willingness to leave heaven, to limit Himself to a human body, and to die for men's sins on the cross (2 Cor. 5:21). 10 He gives advice, for a command (v. 8) is unnecessary; the Corinthians know their duty and indeed began the collection a year ago (rather, 'last year' —which could mean only a few months before), though others have outstripped them. 11, 12 Out of what you have. Perhaps the Corinthians had made promises larger that they can now fulfil. 13 They are not to get into debt, and so need relief themselves. 14, 15 The sharing of means, first practised in the earliest days (Acts 2:44; 4:34f.), is laid down by Paul as a guiding principle. This equality, i.e. fair shares for all, is illustrated by citing the lessons the Israelites learnt in the wilderness (Ex. 16:18) that hoarding did not pay, yet frugality proved sufficient.

16, 17 Paul now deals with the method of taking up the collection. Titus has responded to the challenge to visit them for this purpose. Not that he had to be persuaded; for already God had prompted him to take up the task of his own accord. Paul delicately underlines Titus' care for you, i.e. the Corinthians, though the love-gift is for others. 18 The brother. Luke is a widely-held guess, but Paul refrains from naming either him or the second delegate in v. 22. Gospel; no written Gospel was yet in existence. To make this clear, RSV paraphrases by supplying the words for his preaching of. 19 Appointed by the churches; i.e. not simply by Paul. In this gracious work. AV 'with this grace', i.e. 'gift', now has better MS support. The dual object of the exercise is the glory of the Lord (cf. v. 9), i.e. by reflecting something of God's generosity, and to show our good will, or 'readiness' (9:2; cf. Gal. 2:20), particularly towards Jewish Christians.

20 Blame us. By getting delegates appointed by the churches to collect the money, Paul safeguards against giving Satan any excuse to prompt his enemies to attack him (12:17, 18). 'There is nothing which is more apt to lay one open to sinister imputations than the handling of public money' (Calvin). Liberal gift; AV 'abundance'. Paul expects a large sum to be raised. Mentioning it is a compliment and a challenge to the Corinthians' generosity. 21 We aim. Paul is out to avoid all chance of misunderstanding. Besides having a clear conscience in the Lord's sight, the Christian must openly appear to be utterly straightforward in the sight of men. 'It is a foolish pride which leads to a disregard of public opinion' (Hodge). This verse is a free quotation from Pr. 3:4, LXX. Paul is concerned for his own name only because his Master's reputation is bound up with it. 22 Our brother. This second delegate (see v. 18) has not been identified. 23 Titus . . . my partner. Paul wants them to know that Titus fully represents the apostle's own views and authority. The other two messengers (lit. 'apostles', 'sent ones') derive their authority from the churches sending them. 'Apostles' of the churches does not put them into the same category as Paul and Peter, who are 'apostles of Jesus Christ by the will of God'. But Paul boldly describes them as the glory of Christ, i.e. as 'shining examples' (Phillips) of His grace, in their discharge of such ministry. 24 Give proof (practical demonstration) before the churches, i.e. before the delegates, as if the congregations they represent are present. The latter would in any case quickly hear what the result had been.

9:1–15 Principles of Christian giving

1 To write; i.e. to go on writing. Paul is probably continuing the subject of ch. 8 and 1 Cor. 16:1–4, though some consider ch. 9 is a separate note from Paul written earlier than ch. 8 and taken by Titus, whose (hypothetical) mission as the bearer of ch. 9 is mentioned in 8:6. Most scholars prefer the first and simpler solution. 2 The apostle had stayed in Corinth for 18 months (Acts 18:11; see Introduction, 'Corinth'); he knows their 'eagerness' to help. I boast; present tense. He is still confidently doing so. Achaia was the Roman province stretching from the Isthmus of Corinth southwards. Has been ready; rather 'was making preparations'. The collection is not yet complete. Since last year; 8:10. 3 I am sending; not 'I sent' (AV). The Corinthians' generosity is not in doubt, only their ability to be ready with the collection in time. Paul naturally wants to avoid being discredited; for what he has told others about the Corinthians' intentions has, under God (8:1), 'stirred up' (v. 2) generous giving among the Macedonians. 4 Paul himself will soon be arriving with some Macedonians to receive the Corinthians' contribution and convey it to Jerusalem (Rom. 15:25f.). 5 To go on before me. Paul gives the Corinthians a chance to press ahead with the collection before he and his party arrive. Paul is also anxious to avoid any slander which might arise if he had a hand in the collecting personally. Not as an exaction but as a willing gift. AV more closely renders 'as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetousness', i.e. sharing in the collection not with an eye to retaining as much as possible for self, but with a genuine concern to bless or benefit the recipients. 6 Thus they are to give bountifully not sparingly. The principle of reaping what is sown (Pr. 11:24f.; 19:17) is applied in Gal. 6:7–10 to a spiritual harvest, and in Mt. 6:14f. to forgiveness; cf. Mt. 7:1, 2; 10:42; Lk. 6:34–38. 'It is right to present to men the divinely-ordained consequences of their actions as motives to control their conduct' (Hodge). 7 Not reluctantly, i.e. not thinking, 'How little will do?' 'The source of giving is not the purse but the heart' (P. E. Hughes, Paul's Second Epistle to the Corinthians, NLC, 1962); cf. Mk. 12:41ff. A cheerful giver. Genuine giving is exhilarating. The quotation is from Pr. 22:8, LXX; it is not in the Hebrew. Cf. Rom. 12:8.

8 God is able to make our remaining resources more than adequate. Enough ('content', Phil. 4:11; 'contentment', 1 Tim. 6:6); a characteristic result of God's response to faith. The title El Shaddai (Gn. 17:1, RSV mg.) could signify 'the God who is enough'. God provides materially and spiritually for every good work in His service (Phil. 4:19). Note the repeated 'every'. 9, 10 Scriptural support is drawn from Ps. 112:9; Is. 55:10; Ho. 10:12. AV takes v. 10 as a prayer; RSV, following earlier MSS, states a divine principle. He who supplies. Is. 55:10 simply says 'giving'. Paul uses a richer term ('furnishes'), as in Gal. 3:5. Seed, that may be sown, is also from God (5:18). The sowing God thus prospers is the giving of vv. 6–8. Will supply; cf. Phil. 4:15, 19. Multiply. A seed's potential is, under God, out of all proportion to its size. Righteousness; right action, in this case 'liberality'. 11, 12 Enriched. Giving is an enriching experience (cf. on v. 7). Paul is disinterested in his encouragement of almsgiving, for he had already refused to take anything for himself from the Corinthians (11:7–9). Service. The Greek word leitourgia ('liturgy') was used of public services paid for by wealthy Athenian citizens. Great generosity not only meets the material needs of the saints but does much more. Spiritually it also overflows in many thanksgivings of the recipients to God (1:11) and promotes mutual love and prayer (v. 14). 13 Test By their aid Gentile converts would be demonstrating the genuineness of their Christian profession to Jewish converts and expressing their oneness with them in Christ. Contribution (Gk. koinonia); fellowship, sharing; cf. 1:7. 15 Paul closes this section on giving by returning to 'the divine gift which inspires all gifts' (R. V. G. Tasker, The Second Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, TNTC, 1958), Jesus the Saviour (8:9; 1 Jn. 4:11). Inexpressible. Human language is inadequate to describe the full extent of either the gift or its consequences (Rom. 8:32).

10:1 – 13:14 PAUL'S APOSTOLIC AUTHORITY

On the changed tone and subject of the remaining chapters (10–13) see Introduction, 'How many letters and visits?'

10:1–18 His credentials

1 Turning to more personal matters, Paul stops writing as 'we'. The parenthesis, I who am humble . . . when I am away, evidently echoes calumny against Paul by his critics in Corinth (10:10). Meekness; willing acceptance of God's will. Gentleness; clemency (Jn. 8:11). This is the attitude for even an apostle. 2 But gentleness is not timidity. If necessary, Paul will show boldness by speaking severely against some, his traducers. In worldly fashion; inconsistently, governed by self-interest (1:17; Rom. 8:4f.). 3, 4 Christians have to live in the world with its troubles, and 'in the flesh' (AV) with its frailties (1 Cor. 2:3–5). But the real battle is spiritual. Worldly, i.e. human, qualities are impotent to destroy strongholds of evil within either society or the individual. The only effective weapons are those which have divine power, literally 'are rendered powerful by God' (cf. Eph. 6:11f.). 5 Men fortify themselves against the gospel with their intellect and will, i.e. with arguments ('reasonings'), and pride, self-sufficiency. It is humbling to accept the implications of the knowledge of God as revealed in the gospel. Thought (cf. 11:3), also translated 'design' (2:11) and 'mind' (3:14; 4:4), is in 2 Corinthians always used in a bad sense. Captive. Not even a thought is outside the sphere of obedience claimed by Christ. 6 Punish; 'court-martial' (Moffatt); another military metaphor. Complete. Paul anticipates the majority will submit. Only any defiant remnant will then need sentencing. Paul now goes on to justify his threats.

7 The Greek can be a question (AV), statement (RV), or command (RSV). The last is best: 'Face the facts before you.' He is Christ's is not a reference to the clique of 1 Cor. 1:12, nor to personal faith, but to divinely-given authority. Paul's authorization by Christ, not his faith, is under attack. 8 His 'boasting' is never self-centred but always magnifies what God has done. Building you up. Paul's credentials are proved by positive results in the lives of his converts (1 Cor. 15:10). 9, 10 They also refute the charge that he writes his letters to terrorize his converts. Seem; put on a show. The reported comments testify to the effect his writing produced. By contrast his opponents considered that Paul in person was ineffective. The allegation concerns character rather than physique. 11 Paul does not threaten only words when he arrives, but rigorous action. 'There was no doubt a great difference between Paul in his ordinary frame of mind, not very ready to be hard, not very fluent in speech, and Paul inspired, when there was a great principle to fight for, or a great wrong to remove' (A. Menzies, The Second Epistle of the Apostle Paul to the Corinthians, 1912). 12 Venture to class or compare ourselves. Paul's heavy irony clothes an important principle. The only true comparison must be with a standard which is external and unchanging. Paul knows this can only be Christ.

13–18 enlarge on the point. 13 Beyond limit. The conceit of these 'super-apostles' (11:5) is boundless. Paul's ministry, however, has certain divinely imposed limits: Paul is the apostle to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15; Rom. 1:5; Gal. 2:9), and he is a pioneer missionary (Rom. 15:20). Apportioned. Paul is 'in the lane' (athletics metaphor) of service marked out by God. 14 We are not overextending ourselves, 'not going beyond our sphere of authorized activity'; i.e. as though Paul's mandate did not reach to Corinth. First to come; cf. 1 Cor. 3:6; 4:15. 15, 16 As the Corinthians' faith increases, and provides more settled conditions in the church there, Paul will be able to go on to pioneer in lands beyond Corinth. Perhaps he has Rome and Spain in mind (Acts 19:21; Rom. 1:13; 15:24, 28). But he will never claim credit for work he finds already done by others (Rom. 15:20). 17 To boast of what the Lord has done is alone permissible to the Christian (cf. Je. 9:23, 24; 1 Cor. 1:31). 18 Accepted; 'tested and approved'. Man cannot give such a verdict upon himself.

Note. 15 That . . . our field among you may be greatly enlarged can hardly be the meaning. The point at issue was not an increase in Paul's service at Corinth but beyond it. The wording is clarified if for among you we read 'by you' (AV). The Corinthians can help to open up a wider ministry for the apostle by stabilizing the conditions in their church.

11:1–33 Misrepresentations answered

Paul has shown (10:13–18) that at Corinth he kept to his divine brief, while his opponents exceeded theirs. 1 Now, though it is foolishness, not the thing to do normally, he draws other comparisons with them. 2 The church is to be Christ's bride. The picture is used frequently (Mt. 25:1–13; Jn. 3:29; Eph. 5:25f.; Rev. 19:7). Paul views himself as the arranger of the marriage, since he founded the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 4:15). The work is God's, however, and so Paul describes his own intense feelings as a jealousy which is divine. One husband. The loyalty Christ claims is exclusive, as in the marriage relationship. 'Paul was very far from despising marriage, since he makes it the symbol of the ideal consummation' (E. B. Allo, Saint Paul: Deuxième Epitre aux Corinthiens, 1937); cf. Eph. 5:32. 3 Paul is afraid that the Corinthian church is being led astray by thoughts (cf. 10:5) inconsistent with her first loyalty to Christ. 4 Satan is up to his old tricks again (Gn. 3:1; cf. Rev. 12:9; 20:2), through those who have been preaching another sort of Jesus (Gal. 1:6; cf. Mk. 8:33), i.e. either simply a human Jesus or, like the later Gnostics, a sort of demi-god. Comes; of his own accord, as distinct from being sent by God. Readily enough; no doubt because such a different gospel is alluring (Gal. 3:1). 5, 6 Paul denies that he is inferior to these superlative apostles, fine oratory apart (1 Cor. 2:4); certainly not in knowledge of Christ, i.e. in spiritual qualifications. The Corinthians must realize on reflection that Paul's claim is true. When Paul refers to superlative apostles (cf. 12:11), some earlier commentators thought he meant that he had as much right to be heard as the 'very chiefest apostles' (AV), i.e. the Twelve. But this is ruled out by vv. 13 ('disguising') and 15 (Satan's 'servants'). These 'super-apostles' were intruders to Corinth needing instruction (3:1) and even self-commendation (10:12). They were Hebrews (11:22) and mercenary-minded (cf. 11:7, 9; 12:13–18). Their message was not Paul's (11:4, 15), but sought to lure the Corinthian Christians into Mosaic bondage (3:6f.; 11:15).

7 Abasing myself, i.e. in not claiming the material support due to genuine Christian preachers (1 Cor. 9:11–14). Professional Greek rhetoricians (alluded to in v. 6) would be suspect if they failed to demand fees (cf. 2:17). 8, 9 Without cost. In Corinth Paul had kept himself by his tent-making (Acts 18:1ff.), and by accepting support from other churches. Thus no one could accuse him of exploiting the Corinthians. Robbed (pillaged) and support (ration-money) are military metaphors. 'Robbery' colourfully expresses Paul's acceptance of gifts from churches where he no longer ministered. He could not expect maintenance from them of right. With you and . . . in want. A vivid sidelight. But God had not overlooked him. Macedonia. Another reminder of their generosity (8:1). 10, 11 Paul will not keep quiet about his decision not to take money from the Corinthian church, because it demonstrates his very real love for them. 12 His refusal to accept support must undermine his rivals' claims to work on the same terms as Paul. 13, 14 Paul now plainly asserts that these 'super-apostles' are in fact Satan's agents. Disguises himself as an angel from the kingdom of light. One of Satan's principal methods is that of imitation, as Jesus reveals in the parable of the weeds (Mt. 13:24–30, 36–43). 15 Servants of righteousness, i.e. those who give the appearance of serving the cause of the gospel, but for other ends. Paul may be alluding to their Judaizing efforts to teach salvation by works (see on 11:5); cf. Gal. 2:21. Their end. Paul never shrinks from declaring the destiny of those who oppose the true gospel of Jesus Christ (Rom. 3:8; Phil. 3:19; 2 Thes. 1:8; 2 Tim. 4:14). He recognizes a limit to toleration. Deeds. Their emphasis on 'works' at the expense of free grace means that they will ultimately get the 'works' they deserve.

16 I repeat; resuming v. 1. The awkwardness revealed in what follows shows Paul's embarrassment at being forced to speak in this distasteful manner. 17 Not with the Lord's authority; literally 'not after the Lord' (AV), not a method He would have adopted (cf. 1 Pet. 2:23). Paul's purpose, is not self-praise, as a fool, but to challenge his opponents on their own ground. Some waverers at Corinth would appreciate only this sort of approach. 18 Worldly things; external appearances, accidents of birth, and so on, as in vv. 22f. 19 Bear with fools; i.e. with the boastful false apostles, or with Paul (vv. 17, 21). Being wise. Paul's continued irony aims at stabbing the Corinthians awake to the real situation. 20 If a man. These things are evidently happening. Makes slaves. The verb is used elsewhere only in Gal. 2:4 of efforts to compel converts to submit to Jewish legal restrictions. Preys; uses every means of extorting money (Lk. 20:47 employs the same verb). Strikes; literally, or metaphorically of bullying treatment. 21 Weak. If genuine apostleship is defined by tyranny, greed, falsity, arrogance, and violence, then Paul admits he was a failure in Corinth. But now he will match any claim others can make.

22 The false apostles were evidently boasting that they were pure Hebrews; although born outside Judea, Paul's pedigree too was impeccable (Phil. 3:5). Israelites; the title of privilege, which now belongs to Christians (Rom. 9:6). Abraham; cf. Gn. 22:17; Rom. 9:7. 'There was not an Israelite in the world prouder of his birth, with a more magnificent sense of his country's glories, than the apostle to the Gentiles: and it provoked him beyond endurance to see the things in which he gloried debased, as they were debased, by his rivals—made the symbols of a paltry vanity which he despised, made barriers to the universal love of God by which all the families of the earth were to be blessed' (Denney). 23 Servants. 'Where the ministry is concerned, Paul's is something beyond their horizon' (Hughes). Few of the sufferings now listed are in Acts, a reminder of how little we know of Paul's biography (6:4). Labours, arduous campaigns. Imprisonments. Acts 16 records only one, at Philippi, before 2 Corinthians was written. Three other instances in Acts, at Jerusalem, Caesarea, and Rome, are later. Near death; 1:9; cf. 1 Cor. 15:31. 24 Forty lashes less one; to keep within the limit of Dt. 25:3. This barbarous flogging (Mt. 10:17) was sometimes fatal. 25 Being beaten with rods by Roman lictors was less fearful. Only two examples of all the sufferings in vv. 24 and 25 are mentioned in Acts (14:19; 16:22). Shipwrecked; Acts 27 is still to come. 26, 27 Few rivers had bridges. My own people, Jews, and Gentiles alike attacked him from time to time, as Acts often confirms. The ceaseless travelling, adventure and toil portray this tough character of immense courage and determination. 28 Daily pressure. Constant claims are made upon his time and thought concerning the affairs of all the churches. 29 Weak. No-one appeals to this sensitive apostle in vain.

30 Paul looks back to the experiences he has just catalogued. A 'boastful' person, in the ordinary sense, would never have mentioned such things. 31 Incredible though the record is, Paul swears he does not lie. 32, 33 Then he recalls another incident, at the outset of his ministry, mentioned perhaps to counter a slander that he had deserted (cf. Acts 9:23–25). Governor; or ethnarch, literally 'ruler of a tribe or race', i.e. one charged with overseeing a certain racial section of a population—in this case, no doubt, the Jews. Aretas was king of Nabataea from 9 BC to AD 40. Between AD 37 and 54 there are no Damascus coins bearing the Roman emperor's image. It seems likely that Caligula granted the city to Aretas on acceding as emperor in 37. The fish-basket incident must have taken place between AD 37 and Aretas's death in 40.

12:1–13 Paul's experiences of glory and weakness

1 Paul counters his opponents' boasts about their spiritual experiences with one example of his own. Of the Lord; subjective genitive, 'given by the Lord'. Revelations may not involve something visible, as do visions. 2 A man in Christ well suggests Paul's reluctance to speak of himself. Fourteen years ago, about AD 41–42, i.e. some years after the Damascus escape (11:33), probably as he began his great missions. Caught up (Gk. harpazo, to snatch away); used in Acts 8:39 of the Spirit catching away Philip, and in 1 Thes. 4:17 of the 'rapture' of Christians at the second advent. Third heaven (only here in the NT) is a Jewish expression for the immediate presence of God, and for Paul a phrase to convey the idea of the most sublime blessedness. I do not know; i.e. do not remember (as 1 Cor. 1:16). Only God knows how the transfer to heaven was made. 3, 4 Paradise, from a Persian word meaning 'park'; used in LXX for the Garden of Eden, and in the NT for the place where the glory lost in Eden is regained by Christians (Lk. 23:43; Rev. 2:7). Paul says nothing about what he saw, and declines to reveal what he heard. The NT deliberately veils the next life, though it makes plain what is needful for our salvation. 5, 6 On behalf. Paul claims no credit, although what he relates is the truth. Sees in me. The Corinthians are to take him as he is, not as someone special because of his experiences. Hears from me; in letters.

7 To keep me. Whatever golden opinions some may hold of themselves, Paul is in no danger of conceit. The thorn . . . in the flesh is not defined. Thorn; cf. Nu. 33:55. The Greek probably means 'for' rather than literally in the flesh. Paul's extraordinary stamina hardly supports the view that he constantly suffered from some physical ailment, though Ramsay's proposal is possible: 'In some constitutions malaria fever tends to recur in very distressing and prostrating paroxysms, whenever one's energies are taxed for a great effort.' The accompanying headache was 'like a red-hot bar thrust through the forehead'. In this verse 'thorn' balances 'elation' and so includes intense depression, whatever the cause. Doubtless the lack of explanation is, under God, deliberate. Define the 'thorn', and any believer lacking that particular affliction would dismiss Paul's experience as remote from his own. 'Is there a single servant of Christ who cannot point to some "thorn in the flesh", visible or private, physical or psychological, from which he has prayed to be released, but which has been given him by God to keep him humble, and therefore fruitful in His service? Every believer must learn that human weakness and divine grace go hand in hand together. Hence Paul's "thorn in the flesh" is, by its very lack of definition, a type of every Christian's "thorn in the flesh", not with regard to externals but by its spiritual significance' (Hughes). Satan is concerned with physical disease in Jb. 2:5; Lk. 13:16 (cf. 1 Cor. 5:5); but in the last resort he is merely an agent of God's saving purposes. Harass; literally 'punch'.

8 Three times; cf. Mk. 14:30. The Lord; i.e. Jesus. Paul usually addresses prayer to the Father. Leave me. The attacks recurred. 9 But he said; only after the third prayer. The Lord's 'No' was a rich positive which empowered the rest of Paul's ministry. Rest; 'pitch tent' (Ex. 40:34). 10 So sure is Paul of God's power that even troubles make him content, for what happens glorifies God. Strong. Divine power is unfailing and invincible (Phil. 4:11–13).

11 Commended by you. After Paul's 18 months among them, the Corinthians themselves (3:1f.) should have promptly refuted his opponents' allegations that he was nothing, i.e. of no real standing. Superlative apostles; see on 11:5. 12 The signs (i.e. credentials) of a true apostle (cf. Mt. 7:15–20) were to be seen in Paul's evangelistic successes in bringing men to Christ and in establishing churches (cf. 1 Cor. 2:4; 9:2; 2 Cor. 3:2, 3). The second reference to signs is evidently in the sense of miracles (cf. Jn. 2:11). Wonders and mighty works are also miracles, but seen from a different standpoint. Signs 'are not empty shows, but are appointed for the instruction of mankind'; wonders 'by their novelty arouse men and strike them with astonishment'; mighty works 'are more signal tokens of divine power than what we behold in the ordinary course of nature' (Calvin); cf. Acts 2:22; Heb. 2:4; 2 Thes. 2:9. Were performed; not 'I performed'. No mere modesty, but an acknowledgment that God was at work through him. In all patience, i.e. with unflagging persistence. 13 Burden you, i.e. by requiring keep (see on 11:9).

12:14 – 13:4 The third visit imminent

Paul's purpose in this letter is to smooth the way for his third visit (12:14). He explains why he declined to accept support from them—his motive had been misunderstood (12:14, 15) or misrepresented (12:16–19). The sins of the Corinthian church (12:20, 21) must be set right, and the falseness of allegations against him exposed (13:1). Far from seeking peace at any price, Paul is determined to see that all these wrongs are corrected. But paradoxically it will be through his own weakness, for that is how Christ's power is demonstrated (13:2–4).

14 Third time; i.e. the third visit, not the third time Paul has made ready. The first visit was to found the Corinthian church; the second was the 'painful visit' of 2:1; 7:12. (See Introduction, 'How many letters and visits?') As their spiritual father Paul claims the privilege of supporting them, rather than requiring due support from them as their minister. 15 Spend . . . be spent; 'all that I have and all that I am'. Loved the less. Naturally a hurtful response, but Paul's aim is to bind them to Christ, not to himself. 16 But granting that Paul accepts no direct support, some insinuate that being crafty he will obtain money by filching funds collected in Corinth by his agents. 17, 18 The Corinthians are challenged to recall anything from Titus' first visit (8:6) which suggested that Paul would benefit personally. In 8:16–24 safeguards are made to forestall a repetition of the charge on Titus' next visit to speed the collection for Jerusalem. Same spirit . . . same steps. They know Paul and they know Titus. Neither has given cause for suspicion.

19 Defending ourselves; as in a court. Before you; as judges (1 Cor. 4:3). But Paul softens his charge—no judge is called beloved. All along Paul has been speaking as in the sight of God (2:17) and conscious of his responsible position in Christ and His service. Paul's consistent purpose is their upbuilding into what the body of Christ should be. 20 Christian growth involves the elimination of the poisons he now lists (cf. Mk. 7:21f.; Gal. 5:19f.). These sins are the very ones which provoked him to write 1 Corinthians. Perhaps they may be delicately hints that the ills can be put right before he arrives. 21 Humble me before you; i.e. 'in connection with you'. Paul took great pride in his converts (1:14; 3:2; 7:4; 8:24; 9:2). Anything that disgraced them was a humiliation to him. Mourn; as over those spiritually dead.

13:1 Any charge; i.e. any still being made against Paul when he arrives will need substantiating by witnesses, in accordance with Dt. 19:15; cf. Mt. 18:16; Jn. 8:17. A proper and thorough investigation is to clear the air. 2 Second visit; the 'painful visit'. (See Introduction, 'How many letters and visits?') If I come; i.e. 'when' (as Jn. 16:7). I will not spare. If necessary, Paul will take severe action; but he is not vindictive. Discipline in the early church was pastoral rather than penal, and intended to reform, not to outlaw the sinner (cf. 2:5–11).

3 In you; among you. Christ will make His presence known through Paul. 4 While in a human body Jesus shared its limitations and weakness. On the cross He appeared to be at the mercy of sinners. The cross and the resurrection, the heart of the gospel, enshrine the paradoxical principle of power out of weakness (12:9). Those who are in him can be said to share His weakness. In dealing with you, unlike on the 'painful visit' (2:1), we shall live, i.e. demonstrate the powerful presence of the living Christ. Paul is not referring to the after-life.

13:5–14 Final charge and word of cheer

Paul's goal is the unity and mature development of the Corinthian church. The Corinthians' part is, through self-examination (v. 5), to recognize and so repent of their sins. On his side, Paul will meanwhile use prayer (vv. 7, 8) and even threat (v. 10), pending his arrival in person. But he is completely confident about the outcome.

5 'You have been examining Paul. Now examine yourselves' (cf. 1 Cor. 11:28–32). Do you not realize . . . ? The question expects an affirmative answer. Unless . . . you fail. 'But this is unthinkable.' 6 Find out; i.e. recognize. Their very faith is evidence of the validity of Paul's ministry (3:2). 7 The Corinthians must not do wrong, i.e. fail to acknowledge what their consciences must tell them is true. Paul is not primarily concerned with his own exoneration, but with the Corinthians' doing what is right. Failed; literally 'have not stood the test', because no test was required. The meaning is that if, as Paul hopes, the Corinthians have put their house in order by the time he arrives, there will be no need for him to prove his authority. 8 We cannot do anything, i.e. we have no occasion to exercise power, against the truth, against what is right and proper. A vigorous demonstration of power when all was in fact well, would be sheer tyranny. 9 When we are weak; i.e. when there is no need to enforce authority. You are strong, self-disciplined. Spiritual power would naturally follow. Paul's whole object is their improvement, a word which denotes a restoring of disordered limbs and joints. 10 I write this. Paul hopes that a warning now will avoid the need for strong disciplinary action when he comes. Authority. A display of force might impress the world, but it would hardly build up the church (cf. 10:8).

11 The closing fourfold appeal aptly summarizes his letter. By acting upon it, their Christian fellowship would become what God intended, and He who was love and peace would be 'at home' there. 12 The holy kiss, their customary greeting and symbol of Christian brotherhood, must be heartfelt, and so reflect a new loving confidence in one another. 13 All the saints; i.e. the Christians with Paul, though almost all unknown personally to the Corinthians. 14 Some of the most quoted words in all Scripture conclude Paul's letter. Grace, chronologically first in Christian experience, brings the believer to know the love shown by God, and thence to share in the fellowship of Christians brought about and maintained by and in the Holy Spirit. The unexpected order of the three Persons prompts Tasker to comment: 'There can be no adequate understanding of God's love apart from the cross; and the only lasting fellowship between men is the fellowship of sinners redeemed by the blood of Jesus.' It would accord with Paul's virile faith to take his closing verse not as a prayer but as a statement: 'Grace, etc., are with you all! So—go forward on this foundation!'

Galatians

ARGUMENT

One of the greatest expositors of Galatians, Martin Luther, said in his introduction to the Epistle, 'St. Paul goeth about to establish the doctrine of faith, grace, forgiveness of sins, or Christian righteousness, to the end that we may have a perfect knowledge and difference between Christian righteousness and all other kinds of righteousness.' Against those who allow or demand human works as contributing towards salvation, Paul pits the gratuitousness of the divine initiative and act in Jesus Christ, the completeness and sufficiency of the cross, the adequacy of faith without works as man's proper response to the work of Christ, and the demand of actual righteousness in men who are justified by faith, through the help of the Holy Spirit as the complement of imputed righteousness.

HISTORICAL SETTING

At the climax of 19th-century biblical scholarship, there emerged what were felt to be assured results of biblical studies, including a chronology of the apostolic period (C. H. Turner, 'Chronology of the New Testament' in HDB). At that time no date in Paul's life could be fixed with certainty by reference to any extra-biblical source. The Gallio inscription at Delphi has since established at least one, that Gallio, before whom Paul appeared (Acts 18:12–17), arrived at Corinth in AD 51.

Turner accepted J. B. Lightfoot's identification of Gal. 2:1–10 with Acts 15, who said that Galatia was North Galatia, which had been the traditional view. But already Sir William Ramsay was challenging the North Galatian Theory, by arguing that 'Galatia' meant the southern region and coastal cities of the province. Data which have come to light since have served only to make the puzzle more intractable. Scholars of eminent reputation are ranged on both sides. While the weight of opinion favours Ramsay's conclusion, scholars do not dismiss lightly the alternative interpretation. (For excellent summaries of the data see Donald Guthrie, New Testament Introduction: The Pauline Epistles; and G. B. Caird, The Apostolic Age.) Two sets of questions are involved. First, which part of Galatia is intended by the term 'Galatia', the north or the south? Second, which visits of Paul recorded in Acts coincide with those mentioned in Gal. 1 and 2?

Location of readers

North Galatia identifies the old kingdom in the central mountainous area of Asia Minor, which was established by Celts from Gaul (hence the name Galatia) in the 3rd century BC. It included the cities of Ancyra, Tavium, and Pessinus. In 25 BC for administration purposes Rome added to it the southern districts of Pisidia and Lycaonia, including the cities of Antioch and Iconium which, along with Lystra and Derbe in Cilicia, are mentioned in connection with Paul's missionary journeys. This enlarged Roman province raises the question of whether Paul visited the north as well as the south, and particularly the location of those to whom this letter is addressed.

Argument to support the North Galatian Theory includes chiefly the following points. It has long been the traditional view, and is buttressed by the reputation of J. B. Lightfoot, James Moffatt, and several outstanding European scholars. Luke employs local regional titles for the southern cities (Pisidia for Antioch in Acts 13:14; and Lycaonia for Derbe and Lystra in 14:6); therefore the term Galatia is employed for Old Galatia, rather than for the Roman province of Galatia. Paul was proud of his Roman citizenship and employed the proper Roman provincial title to include the north. Further, it is urged that the terms Pisidia and Galatia denote two districts, not one (Acts 16:6); and that the same applies in Acts 18:23. Moffatt argued on grammatical grounds that the term translated 'went through' (Acts 16:6) and 'went from' (18:23) denotes not simply travel but preaching and establishing churches. Since Paul had been forbidden by the Spirit to preach in the province of Asia, this could occur only in the north. However, this argument has been strongly disputed (Askwith), and the more so as it has to find support in a dubious grammatical point. Even if Acts 13 and 14 allow the interpretation that for a time Paul suffered physical weakness, it has been argued that this would have discouraged his making the difficult journey northward; but others have countered that Paul travelled to the mountainous northern region specifically to convalesce from illness (Gal. 4:13). Finally, on the South Galatian Theory, the Epistle is often regarded as the earliest one. This destroys the traditional order of placing Galatians between 2 Corinthians and Romans, as a doctrinal stage moving towards the more fully developed theological position of Romans after the polemics of 2 Corinthians. This would necessitate re-casting our understanding of the course of development of Pauline theology.

The South Galatian Theory has had widespread support since the end of the last century. A highly readable account of events when this theory is adopted is given by F. F. Bruce in his book The Spreading Flame. Argument in favour of the theory is chiefly the following: Ramsay said that Acts 16:6 and 18:23 means the Phrygic-Galatic area, which was inhabited by Phrygians and known as Phrygia. Thus Acts does not support the idea that Paul visited North Galatia. Crucial to this point is that Luke nowhere mentions churches of the north, though it has been answered that he also does not mention other activities of Paul, including trips to Syria and Dalmatia. On the use of titles, Paul could as well have followed Luke in using geographical locations when detailing travel, but provincial areas when grouping churches. Furthermore, besides pride of place by use of the Roman title in the coast areas, it is difficult to see, said Ramsay, what other common title besides Galatia could have been used to embrace the variety of people in the southern district. The references to Barnabas in Gal. 2:1, 9, 13 have greater force if he was known to the Galatians, which is possible only on the Southern Theory, for Barnabas was Paul's fellow-worker only on Paul's first journey. Also, the relief-money delegation to Jerusalem includes no representative from the North (Acts 20:4); however, the Galatian churches did participate (1 Cor. 16:1). Certain details in Galatians may be allusions to the first missionary journey. These include the 'marks' as results of the Lystra incident (Gal. 6:17; Acts 14:12, 19). The struggle of Gal. 2:5 may allude to post-Galatian church planting, because the Jerusalem meeting occurred before Paul's alleged journey to North Galatia. Then, too, it is highly unlikely that the Judaizing Christians would trail Paul into the obscure northern areas, but it is easy to account for their presence in Pisidian Antioch. Many scholars feel that the historical and critical problems are best accounted for by means of the Southern Theory, because a more coherent account of events and theological development can be given, especially in relation to the Jerusalem meeting.

Date and relation to Acts

We turn to the question of Paul's visits. The difficulties of correlating the data of Acts and Galatians are no less formidable. In Galatians Paul mentions one visit to Jerusalem 3 years after his conversion; another after 14 years along with Barnabas and Titus to meet James, Peter and John concerning admission of Gentiles to the church; and an incident at Antioch when he rebuked Peter. Where do Paul's Galatian journeys and the Epistle fit among these events? Are the 3 years included in the 14 years, or are they in addition? In Acts, Luke mentions five visits by Paul to Jerusalem: 9:26–30; 11:30 and 12:25; 15:1–30; 18:22; 21:17. The text of 15:20,29 presents difficulties due to significant variations between the Greek texts. Most scholars, however, follow the reading of the RSV. The visits mentioned in 9:26–30 and Gal. 1:18–24 are usually identified. But which visit in Acts corresponds with Gal. 2:1–10?

The theory that Gal. 2:1–10 should be identified with both Acts 11:30 and 15:1–30 (A. D. Nock) may be dismissed. It rests on the unjustified premise of Luke's inaccuracy in separating what in fact are different reports of one visit, and does not deal with the central questions. Similarly, we may reject the theory (John Knox) which jettisons the Lucan chronology completely in favour of what can be gleaned only from the Pauline Epistles, thereby simply avoiding the difficulties of harmonizing the Acts and Galatians accounts.

The traditional view identifies Gal. 2:1–10 and the Jerusalem meeting of Acts 15; indeed, advocates of the North Galatian Theory are bound to do so. In maintaining this, Lightfoot argued from the similarity of the places (Antioch and Jerusalem), persons, topic of discussion, and decision reached in each instance; and also that it was not to Paul's point in Galatians to mention the visit of Acts 11:30. Scholars who defend the South Galatian Theory challenge the argument point by point (see Guthrie and Caird). A crucial matter is the absence in Galatians of any allusion to the decision of Acts 15, which is reinforced by the statement in Gal. 2:6 that no addition to the message would be tolerated. Also, Paul's rebuke of Peter (Gal. 2:11ff.) is held to be more likely before, rather than after, the Jerusalem meeting. On these and other grounds the two visits cannot be identified without attacking the accuracy of either Luke or Paul, it is held.

Advocates of the South Galatian Theory, especially in Britain, widely support identifying the visits of Gal. 2:1–10 and Acts 11:30. This would mean that agreement was reached between Paul and the Jerusalem leaders on the admission of Gentiles to church membership during the famine-relief visit to Jerusalem, and prior to Paul's first mission to the Gentiles. It mitigates the problem of the omission of the Acts 15 decision from Galatians, and puts the confrontation of Peter by Paul at Antioch in a new light, i.e. before the Jerusalem decision. On this understanding the course of events would be approximately as follows: Paul and Barnabas, already engaged in Gentile work at Antioch, took the opportunity of the famine-relief visit to Jerusalem (AD 46) to discuss with the apostles the question of Jewish-Gentile fellowship. The presence of Titus with them sharpened the issue, but he was not compelled to be circumcised. The apostles agreed that Paul's apostleship was valid, and asked him to assist the poor, which he already had done (Gal. 2:10). At Antioch Paul resumed his Gentile work. On a visit there Peter acknowledged the work of grace by sharing fellowship at the joint Jewish-Gentile table. But the arrival of Jewish-oriented representatives from Jerusalem embarrassed Peter, who withdrew, as did Barnabas. Paul challenged Peter and rebuked him before the whole church. Thereafter Paul and Barnabas were commissioned from Antioch to the first missionary journey, which quickly turned into a Gentile mission. Christians from Judea, while agreeing that Gentiles could become Christians, refused to give up claims that all Christians must abide by Jewish customs, including circumcision, as essential to salvation. Presumably, also, because such Judaizers were already reported to be influencing adversely Paul's converts in South Galatia, he at once wrote this Epistle to them. In addition, in order to settle the dispute, Paul and Barnabas were sent from Antioch to Jerusalem, where the Acts 15 meeting was convened. There James, with the support of Peter, tipped the balance in favour of Paul, but not without asking Gentiles to respect Jewish scruples to a certain degree. On this view Galatians is the earliest of Paul's extant Epistles (Duncan).

Proponents of the North Galatian Theory are bound by the traditional date of 54–56 AD, which places the Epistle during Paul's third missionary journey. The early date of 48–49 AD is not universally held by South Galatian Theory scholars. All that seems possible at present is to develop relative patterns of sequence and dating, but it is apparent that in the first place the date adopted depends on the destination. On the Northern Theory it is assumed that the Galatian churches knew about the Acts 15 meeting but, lacking vigilance, had been swayed from the truth. The same applies to the Southern Theory if it is combined with a late date (AD 54–56). The Northern Theory also preserves the view that in language, style, subject-matter and general atmosphere, Galatians is the natural link between 2 Corinthians and Romans. The Southern Theory combined with the early date (AD 48–49), while previously thought improbable chronologically, is possible. It provides an intelligible account of the sequence of events, especially of Paul's early ministry in relation to those who opposed him, and of the relationship of Peter and Paul to the Antioch confrontation and the Jerusalem meeting. On the early dating, Paul sees clearly and at once the theological implications of the Judaizing position and writes hurriedly and heatedly to his South Galatian converts to head off the trouble, pending later formal church action. To group the Epistle 6 or 8 years later, in the interests of the literary and logical coherence of 2 Corinthians, Galatians and Romans, seems to miss the likelihood that Judaizers were active from the outset of Paul's powerful evangelizing activity, and that Paul would not have remained silent so long when the future of the gospel was at stake. The Southern Theory combined with the early date is preferred here, though in the present state of our knowledge such a conclusion must be held with a certain reserve.

Jewish opposition to Paul was of two kinds. First, there were the Jews in the Gentile centres who incited the population against Paul's mission, as in Acts 17:5–7. Second, there were the Jewish Christians, probably from Judea, who ardently but erroneously tried to impose Jewish ceremonials, including circumcision, upon the Gentile converts; and who may have had no scruples about using non-Christian Jews to support their opposition to Paul. It is certain that standards of conduct under Jewish and Gentile law differed, and that beyond this the character of Gentile converts had to be transformed. Paul saw that the gospel alone was equal to this, and that imposition of the law on Gentiles destroyed the gospel because it frustrated the grace of God.

TEACHING

The Pauline authorship and the authenticity of Galatians have scarcely been questioned, either by ancients, as Marcion, or by modern critical schools. It is a highly personal and controversial letter. We may epitomize the themes under four headings:

Paul's own defence. Galatians is an intimately personal expression of Paul's own faith in Christ who 'gave himself for me', he says; and a powerful defence of his apostleship, of the true gospel, and of his right to preach the gospel, to plant churches, and to exercise care of them.

The gospel of grace. The central issue of Christianity is salvation by grace alone. How can the Galatians who began in grace continue under law (1:6; 3:3; 5:4)? Law condemns; it cannot justify. Ritual acts and good works offered as the basis for salvation destroy grace. No man can win acceptance with God on terms other than God's grace given freely. Anything less amounts to a denial of the completeness and finality of the cross of Christ.

Justification by faith. Faith on man's part is the only proper response to God's movement towards him in grace (2:16; 3:24). Hence the famous dictum of the Reformation: sola gratia, sola fidei ('by grace alone, by faith alone'). These are irreducible and crucial elements of the gospel. They are hallmarks of evangelical Christianity without which the gospel ceases to be of Christ (1:6, 7).

The fruit of grace and faith. The freedom of grace and faith is not an invitation to false security or to careless standards of living (5:1). The Christian begins under grace, continues under grace, and is not under law. The works of the flesh (which cannot be bridled by law) are evident, but the fruit of grace is the fruit of a Spirit-possessed life (5:22). God vindicates His grace and the life of faith in the proper use of liberty by His sons in Christ.

COMMENTARY

1:1–5 INTRODUCTION

1, 2 Paul an apostle. In the opening sentence of the Epistle Paul at once expresses the apologetic and polemic tone which dominates the entire letter. Galatians has the character of an official document as well as of a personal letter. His apostleship has been challenged. He vigorously defends it on historical and theological grounds. The pre-resurrection function of the apostles (Mk. 3:14, 15) parallels their new, post-resurrection function as appointed by Christ to proclaim His words, deeds and resurrection. Paul refers elsewhere to the marks of his apostleship (1 Cor. 9:1, 2; 2 Cor. 12:12), but his primary claims are stated in Galatians: he was divinely commissioned by Christ and the Father, not by men; he has founded churches, especially among the Gentiles such as the Galatians, through the gospel; and his authority is independent of men by virtue of his commission and the gospel he preaches. His declaration is not an argument, but an incontrovertible statement. While he does not deny the apostleship of others, he will not submit to them, nor will he submit disputed questions to them. Paul recognizes no college of apostles above him, only Christ and the gospel. His reference to all the brethren who are with me is an appeal to their concurrence with his views and claim, though they are unidentified. If the early dating of the Epistle is accepted (see Introduction, above) they may be his fellow-Christians and co-workers in the church at Antioch in Syria.

Not . . . nor . . . denies that his apostleship originated from men or was mediated through men. Conversely, it came directly and jointly through Jesus Christ and God the Father, with the added emphasis on the resurrection of Christ by the Father (cf. Rom. 1:4; Acts 13:36, 37). Paul also was a witness of the risen Christ (1 Cor. 15:8), who had commissioned him. That God is Father was no new doctrine (cf. Dt. 32:6), but that God is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (1 Pet. 1:3), with all that this conveys personally to NT Christians, is new to the NT era (cf. Rom. 8:15).

The churches of Galatia are those of Derbe, Lystra, Iconium and (Pisidian) Antioch (see Introduction, above). 3 Grace and peace are traditional Greek and Hebrew forms of greeting adapted to Christian usage and are commonly used by Paul. They point to God's loving-kindness in Jesus Christ, through which God is now by redemption 'our' Father, which reading is preferred to the RSV which connects 'our' with Christ. Grace is God's unmerited favour towards sinners which is the basis of salvation. Peace is the state of well-being in which the recipients of grace are kept. The title Lord puts Christ on equal terms with the Father, and points to the common confession of Christians (cf. Acts 2:36; Rom. 10:9; Phil. 2:9–11).

4, 5 Who gave himself for our sins emphasizes the all-sufficient work Christ came to accomplish, and is complementary to the Father's raising Christ from the dead (Rom. 4:25). The sense is Christ's voluntary surrender to death in relation to our sins. In Paul this is to deal first with the condemnation (Gal. 3:13, 14; Rom. 3:23–26; 5:9, 10), and then the power of sin (Gal. 2:20; Rom. 6:1–11). The death of Christ was not a historical accident or expedient, but according to the will of our God to deliver us. The initiative was God's. The cross is central to Christian faith, not peripheral or simply a stumbling-block (Rom. 5:6; 1 Cor. 15:3). The present evil age means present evil world-system, or way of life, alienated from God (Gal. 4:3, 9; Rom. 12:2). The deliverance is rescue from the power of the world, not removal from it (note Jn. 17:15; Col. 2:13). To deal with sin is to deliver us. The action of rescue, which relates to our life, complements the action of atonement which deals with our sins. The inclusion of the statement in v. 4 in the introduction is significant. The importance of the death of Christ for the salvation of men is declared at the outset in order to challenge the error of the Judaizers who taught that works of men can save.

1:6 – 2:21 GOSPEL AUTHORITY

1:6–10 No other gospel

Paul casts aside his usual thanksgiving to express amazement at their defection and anger at those who deceive them.

6, 7 So quickly deserting shows that it is not long after their conversion. Their new life in Christ is probably at an early and critical stage of development, and Paul writes in great anxiety to head off spiritual disaster. They are, the wording implies, in the act of turning, but have not yet done so completely. As the gospel is not Paul's, so their call was not his, but God's; hence their defection is doubly bad. To desert the grace of Christ for law is also to desert God. Paul's opponents claimed for their message the designation of gospel, or 'good news', and they may have contrasted their message with his. A different gospel is a specious gospel, which is another gospel only in the absurd sense of one invented to confuse them (cf. 2 Cor. 11:4). The gospel of Christ stands in the grace of Christ The term grace holds the primary position in the sentence. Paul's astonishment is due to their so quickly turning away from grace (i.e. that of Christ), to be ensnared by law. The two are mutually exclusive options. 8 Even if Paul himself or an angel should preach a gospel different from that which he and others originally preached to them (which suggests that such an option can exist), let him be accursed. 9 Hence, if anyone is now preaching to them such an option (therefore the urgency of Paul's letter), let him be accursed (cf. Rom. 9:3), which means 'condemned by God'.

10 shows that the Judaizers attacked Paul personally by alleging that he compromised by appealing to the interests of men in order to seek their favour. Such a charge is contrary to his purpose, as stated in 1 Cor. 9:19–23; 10:23–33. The tone of this letter itself contradicts the charge that he curries favour. To please men Paul would have remained a Pharisee and would not have entered the service of Christ as His slave. The primary issue is not pride, but the truth of the gospel and the true nature of salvation, involving free grace and faith in contrast to keeping the law.

1:11–17 The gospel divinely revealed

The divine, not human, origin of the gospel is Paul's crucial point in his vindication of its truth, of the validity of his apostleship, and of his independence as an apostle.

11 It is not man's gospel; i.e., lit. 'the gospel preached by me is not according to man'. 12 Nor did it have a human source (which would make Paul's apostleship inferior). Nor did he receive it by instruction. But it came through a revelation of Jesus Christ. It is Christ who was revealed to Paul, which disclosure carried along with it the conviction of the truth of the Christian gospel (cf. 2:5, 14). The revelation included for him divinely prompted re-interpretation of the Christian facts, which he before held to be punishable blasphemy (Acts 9:1, 2, 5, 20–22); and divinely given new insights on the Christian realities (Eph. 3:3–5). Paul thus got a true understanding of who Jesus Christ is and of what He came to do. So Paul received the gospel. 13 We do not know fully the extent and locations of Paul's persecuting activity, but his name struck terror to Christians (cf. v. 23). He states that his activity was against the church of God, which here significantly identifies the whole body of Christians. 14 Paul's extreme zeal was born of early dedication to Judaism when, as a young man, he had blazed a trail of commitment to the Pharisaic traditions far ahead of his contemporaries. 15, 16 But from this Paul was turned by God. Significant textual evidence supports the AV 'but when it pleased God'; however, by omitting 'God' RSV correctly gives the reading of more weighty MS evidence. On either reading the hand of God in Paul's life is clear. So completely is Paul's conversion by grace, that he acknowledges the divine purpose for him prior to his birth and the divine initiative to call him and to reveal his Son within him. The phrases are forceful and carefully chosen: set me apart, called me through his grace, and was pleased to reveal. To me is properly 'in me' or 'within me', i.e. with no reference to others. This highly personal testimony and confession of indebtedness to grace alone is a powerful apologetic for the gratuitous and decisive character of the saving act of God in Christ. Paul's apostolic commission to preach Christ among the Gentiles was unique and independent. Jewish Christians acknowledged the unqualified extension of the gospel to non-Jews only grudgingly at the first, as Acts 10, 11, 15 show. 17 Since the gospel, Paul's conversion and his commission were all independent of men, he did not seek counsel from men nor a briefing by the original apostles. What Paul experienced and knew came directly from Christ. The visit to Arabia refers probably to the area eastward from Damascus (cf. Acts 9:25; 2 Cor. 11:32, 33). We do not know what Paul did in Arabia. Perhaps he pondered his new experience and knowledge in the light of the OT teaching on the Messiah, and began his preaching career.

1:18–24 Human approval unsought

Paul reinforces the foregoing points by alluding to the private, fraternal character of his first visit to Jerusalem, which did not occur until three years after his conversion (cf. Acts 9:26–30).

18 To visit Cephas (Peter) means 'to get acquainted with', not to seek the instruction or approval of Peter. It may also mean 'to get information from Cephas', i.e. possibly information about Jesus' life and ministry which Peter knew at first hand; or to satisfy his curiosity to meet Peter. 19 Paul did not meet the other apostles; hence he had not sought their approval. He did meet James, our Lord's younger brother (not James the son of Zebedee, Acts 12:2), though it is not clear whether at this time James was regarded as an apostle. Paul means, 'I visited Peter, casually met James, but met no other person of importance.' 20 Paul stresses the truth of his narrative, for this initial visit would have been crucial to any apostolic approval, had he sought it. He remained unknown outside Jerusalem, and probably only later preached in Judea (cf. Acts 26:20), which points to the personal nature of his initial visit. 21–24 The report of his conversion and preaching reached the Judean churches, causing them to give glory to God. Actually, he exercised his apostolic ministry in Syria and Cilicia, which corresponds to our knowledge of his connection with the Antioch church (cf. Acts 9:30; 11:25). For this he had not been commissioned by the apostles at Jerusalem nor by the Judean churches. Thus, neither the purpose of his first visit to Jerusalem, nor his meeting with Peter and James, nor the reputation which his ministry had in Judea, nor his activity in Syria and Cilicia evoked any question about his gospel or his commission to preach it. Likewise, his second, more formal visit to Jerusalem, to which he now turns (2:1), yields the same conclusion. In the interval, too, he had felt no need of a consultative visit to Jerusalem.

It is not possible to solve the problem of the relationship of the 3 years to the 14, nor of how the 14 or 17 years fit into Paul's early career as a Christian and apostle. However, the differences between 1:19–22 and Acts 9:26–30 are not irreconcilable if the general character of the narrative in Acts in contrast to the very specific detail in Galatians is borne in mind (see Introduction).

2:1–10 The priority of gospel authority

1, 2 In the light of the Introduction, the meeting mentioned in these verses should be identified with Acts 11:29, 30. If we include the 3 years of 1:18 in the 14, Paul's conversion occurred probably in AD 35; otherwise it would be in AD 32. Paul's visit to Jerusalem was not in response to an apostolic summons, but by reason of inner divine urging. Or Paul may be referring to the prophecy of Agabus (see Acts 11:27–30). At a private meeting Paul outlined to the Christian leaders in Jerusalem the gospel he preached to Gentiles. The passage indicates that troublesome persons did cavil at his claims to freedom from Jewish custom, but there is no hint that this was ever true of the apostles. Paul writes, knowing he has the prominent leaders of the church on his side. The meeting also shows that a considerable body of Jewish-oriented opinion against Paul had developed within the church. This identification of the meeting rather than the traditional connection with Acts 15 mitigates somewhat the problem of the qualifications enjoined on Gentile converts in Acts 15:19–21, 28, 29, as against the complete absence of them in Gal. 2:9, 10. The Acts 15 agreement thus becomes a later concession to Jewish-Christian sensibilities without compromising the essential nature of the gospel, on which all the leaders were agreed. Paul's concern is to reconfirm this understanding, lest his past and present work, set here in the figure of running a race, should be to no purpose if the Jerusalem church opposed him. The integrity and unity of the Christian movement were at stake.

3–5 The sentence structure is notoriously difficult to unravel. Paul condemns the despicable spying on their persons by traitors who falsely presented themselves as Christian brethren, and he resists strenuously their attempts to impose the Jewish custom of circumcision on Titus. Paul aimed in principle to preserve the purity, simplicity and freedom of the gospel not only for the Galatians, but by implication for all Gentiles. Should we understand that Titus was not compelled to be circumcised and in fact remained uncircumcised; or that, though not compelled, he submitted to the rite for the sake of Jewish-Christian scruples? Many commentators hold that Titus did submit to circumcision as a practical matter of association with Jewish Christians (cf. Acts 16:3), but not on the theological grounds of circumcision being necessary for salvation. However, in view of Paul's emphatic statement in v. 5 Titus probably did not submit, for if he had done so it would have proved embarrassing to Paul both theologically and as an act of compromise. While some texts omit 'not' most key ones contain it, as in RSV. Paul did not and would not yield on 'the submission issue', not even for an hour.

6–10 Paul's reference to the Jerusalem leadership as men of repute (cf. v. 2) included the three apostles designated pillars. He acknowledges their position but not their suzerainty. His words in v. 6 can also be interpreted as irony: what these men were mattered nothing to him nor to the truth of his message. They added or taught nothing new. To substitute 'Peter' for Cephas and to put his name before that of James, as some western texts do in v. 9, is suspect as an attempt to elevate Peter. The points of similarity between them and Paul are threefold: the same gospel, equally valid commissioning, and equally vindicating results by the Spirit. These were never in question. Only now they publicly acknowledged that, just as they were appointed to Jewish evangelism, Paul was divinely entrusted with the work among Gentiles. But the message of both was identical. Hence the hand given to Paul and Barnabas in fellowship was also a pledge of agreement. Their only request (not demand) was not theological but practical, namely help for the poor, which Paul had been eager to give. Crucial to the argument is their acknowledgment that Paul's gospel is true, his calling and work equally as valid as Peter's, and that his accomplishments were due to divine grace given to him.

This significant incident publicly confirms a new phase of Christian understanding. If not theologically (except for a small minority; cf. Acts 15:1, 24), at least socially, Christians were divided into two groups over questions of foods, circumcision and other ceremonial rites of Jewish tradition. Paul insisted that the true gospel is of grace, not law, that it liberates men from law, and that liberated men in the fellowship of the one church must not be subjected to Jewish scruples. Otherwise the gospel is undercut and unity is destroyed. The new faith is morally life-transforming and barrier-breaking on the basis of grace and faith, and is not based on belonging to a particular race and observing certain rules. It is a freedom 'in Christ' in contrast to bondage 'under law'. Theologically, the apostles were in agreement. But the new reality must now revise the thought-categories of the Jewish Christians as well as transform the moral life of Gentile converts.

2:11–14 Paul rebukes Peter at Antioch

11, 12 The confrontation with Peter vindicates Paul on the nature of the gospel, but it shows Peter's conduct to be inconsistent with his faith. Prior to the Acts 15 meeting the theological issue had been settled between the apostles; only practical questions concerning Jewish-Christian scruples remained. Since Barnabas was associated with Paul on only the first missionary journey, this incident and the writing of Galatians may be dated early in Paul's career. The connection of the incident with Acts 15:1, 24 seems assured. While visiting Antioch, Peter had shared fellowship with Gentile Christians at meals, presumably including the Lord's Supper, but when the men . . . from James arrived, whose views James did not share, Peter withdrew. Significant textual evidence allows a singular indefinite pronoun (note the indefiniteness of AV), instead of the plural certain men of RSV. But the latter is the preferred reading. This event is not to be construed as a repudiation of the earlier apostolic agreement, but the natural emergence of conflicting views which are superseded only gradually and not without controversy.

The face-to-face encounter suggests that its purpose was to clear the issue, not personal hostility. Stood condemned means that Peter indicted himself by his own actions (Moff. 'self-condemned'). Since arriving, Peter had been eating habitually with Gentiles; but because opposition appeared he cautiously and probably gradually retreated, fearing the circumcision party. 13 His example, which was not only theologically inconsistent (cf. Acts 11:1–18) but ethically hypocritical, influenced other Jewish Christians, including Barnabas. Involved were traditional Jewish scruples about eating with Gentiles (the circumcised Jew avoided the uncircumcised Gentile, where circumcision was seen as a mark of obedience to the Mosaic laws; cf. Acts 10:28). It is known that Jews drew up forms of ethical instruction for Gentile converts. Even though these may be similar at some points to Christian virtues, the point of the gospel is that no man is saved by formal religious obedience but by grace, and no man is bound by another's religious scruples but by Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 10:20–33).

14 The issue again is the nature of the gospel, but as expressed in its results, which can be only a common, equal fellowship of Christians redeemed by grace. Anything less would make of Christians party groups, not the one body of Christ. Straightforward here means 'correct', or 'on the right road', rather than morally right; they were not going straight towards the truth of the gospel (cf. Acts 11:17) at the point where they altered course and withdrew from Gentiles. While knowing the truth, they acted inconsistently with the truth. Paul's actual words quoted in v. 14 pointedly remind Peter of his freedom in the gospel: how can he, as a converted Jew who enjoys the freedom to ignore Jewish scruples, especially on questions of foods, compel Gentiles to submit to non-essential Jewish religious mores?

2:15–21 At issue: Christ or law?

Key terms of this passage, such as sin, works, justification, grace, the cross, faith, and union with Christ, comprise the heart of the gospel and of Christian experience. Paul shows that legalism, or confidence in one's own observance of moral standards, no less than religious formalism, is the enemy of the gospel, because both come under the heading of 'works'. Sin is coming short of God's standard, not man's; righteousness depends on God's acquittal of sinners through Christ, not on man's efforts to be saved. Justification by faith is the touchstone of the gospel. Though a legal term, it expresses a moral and spiritual reality. It should be studied with the parallel passages in Romans in mind. In view is the sinner's standing before God (Rom. 4:22 – 5:2). Justification by God is God's free acquittal of condemned men in undeserved grace (Rom. 5:17). It is to account righteous, not to make righteous, and rests justly on the atoning death of Christ (Rom. 3:26). Christ died our death. Men are justified by faith alone (2:16), i.e. by the grace of God in Christ on which faith lays hold. To respond in faith means to put complete reliance on Christ. It is radical and unreserved trust that God has acted in Christ to save, and that He acts through Christ to justify. Condemnation and guilt are removed through absolute pardon. The new standing with God in Christ is the condition of the new spiritual life. Once it is clear that salvation is based on grace alone, then the life of faith yields appropriate works of grace. James Denney wrote, 'The miracle of the Gospel is that God comes to the ungodly, with a mercy which is righteous altogether, and enables them through faith, in spite of what they are, to enter into a new relation to himself, in which goodness becomes possible for them' (Expositor's Greek Testament, II, p. 616).

15, 16 Paul turns quickly to the vital theological issue. The we ourselves, in contrast to Gentile sinners, is a jibe, i.e. born Jews like himself and Peter, who are not sinners by being born Gentiles, already know that no-one is justified by works of the law. In view are differing Jewish and Christian conceptions of sin. Law-works are acts of obedience to Jewish law, involving moral and religious rules thought to be necessary for salvation. He quotes the OT for added proof (Ps. 143:2). All men are sinners in a sense far greater than any cultic or ethnic meaning. The decisive issue is that men cannot be justified by law-works, but only through faith in Jesus Christ. This passage epitomizes the remaining argument of the book, which Paul develops later in identical fashion (cf. Rom. 3:21–31). We put our faith in Christ for justification, says Paul, because experience and knowledge both showed us that a man is unable to be justified by law-works. Men cannot be delivered from their guilt and condemnation by their own self-adjudged good deeds. The issue concerns God's righteousness, not man's. Justification and righteousness are interchangeable terms which translate the same Greek word group.

17, 18 Still speaking from the standpoint of a Jew, Paul extends the argument with brotherly feeling, having Peter in mind, but with a double-play of meaning. Against Paul it was said that by their acceptance of faith-justification Jews became sinners (violators of the law), which they never were previously, by fraternizing with Gentiles. All Christians, including Jewish ones, agreed that Christ could not encourage sin, but this is not the same as to say that Christ approves Jewish scruples. Rather, Paul says, if he as a Christian should now allow the law to dictate to him, as one who has been released from it through Christ, then he stands self-convicted. To turn back to law is the real sin (as Peter well knows); to cling to Christ by faith is the only salvation. Jewish and Christian meanings of sin and righteousness are sharply contrasted. Christ has allegedly furthered their sinning, i.e. their falling short of law-righteousness. Paul's teaching is thus claimed to degrade righteousness (of the law) and to disgrace Christ. But, to be a violator of Jewish law is not equivalent to being a wrongdoer or violator of God's will. The emphatic Certainly not!—a sharp repudiation translated 'God forbid' in AV (cf. 3:21)—tears at this specious argument. In v. 18 Paul tactfully applies to himself the net effect of Peter's conduct: to build up again the wall of laws and ordinances, which he had before torn down, is really by these very standards to make oneself a sinner. Men are totally and unconditionally indebted to Christ for salvation.

19 The nature of the law compels a sinner to abandon it as a means of salvation. Paul may mean that he died to the law because in Christ he is in a new realm no longer related to the law (cf. Rom. 8:2); or, more likely, he means that the law could only condemn him to death which, when he saw his true situation, compelled him to cast himself upon God's grace rather than rely on his own works (cf. Rom. 7:9–12). 20 There follows the gem of personal testimony on the nature of salvation and of Christian experience. I have been crucified with Christ points to a decisive act of faith in the past when Paul had committed life and destiny to Christ. It happened then, but continues in effect now and henceforth. He was in that act identified with Christ in His death, a fact symbolized in baptism (cf. Rom. 6:3, 4). Christ died the death that Paul was condemned to die for sin and in that death Paul died (cf. 2 Cor. 5:14; Rom. 6:3). Here he says he died to self and all pretensions to self-salvation, and elsewhere he says he died to sin and the sinful world (cf. Gal. 6:14; Rom. 6:1–11). No longer does self rule in Paul, but Christ lives within his life. This is union with Christ. It is the supremely personal relation the Christian has with the Lord Jesus. Only by the interpenetration of personal lives do men become personal. Through Christ's own presence in them they become true spiritual persons. Though dead with Christ, the Christian lives in Christ and Christ in him. The life I now live is the present life every Christian must live, but he lives it by trust in Christ, just as he committed himself by faith to Christ initially. Son of God is a direct reference to Christ's divinity (cf. Phil. 2:6). The redemption comes not by a mere verbal protestation of love, but through Christ's love for us which brought Him to self-sacrificing death. This death was not merely an act of human violence or an accident of history, but the self-giving of Christ on behalf of sinners (Gal. 3:13; cf. Mk. 10:45; Rom. 5:6; 1 Jn. 4:10). 21 By this Paul neither sets aside grace nor breaks faith with it, for if justification can come through obedience to the law, the death of Christ is to no purpose. There is therefore an immediate and necessary connection between the death of Christ and the justification of sinful men before God. There is an equally necessary connection between godliness and the presence of Christ in the Christian's life.

3:1 - 4:31 DOCTRINAL ARGUMENT

3:1–5 Appeal to history and experience

Paul develops the foregoing statement in greater detail referring directly to the Galatian situation.

1 To begin with, their own conversion experience should have prevented them from being so foolish (i.e. gullible or unperceptive, not naturally stupid) as to turn to law. Bewitched means 'as if blinded by malicious magic', but metaphorically not literally, which to Paul is the more remarkable when those same eyes had been fastened upon Christ, who had been publicly placarded or advertised to them as crucified (cf. Jn. 3:14, 15; 1 Cor. 1:18–25; 2:2). They have been hoodwinked. The early Christians rejected esoteric mysteries and sorcery. They insisted on the public character of God's revelation in Christ, of the cross, the gospel, and Christian fellowship. The tense of crucified indicates not just a past event, but one accomplished in the past, the results of which continue to the present.

2–5 The rhetorical questions drive the point home by relating their receiving of the Spirit to Christ crucified and faith, not to ritual observances. To trust Christ, who was put to death on the cross and rose again, and to receive the gift of the Spirit, are indivisible aspects of NT salvation (cf. Acts 2:38; Eph. 1:13). But the Spirit is God's gift in response to faith, not works. Therefore, he asks, did you receive the Spirit by obeying the law, or by believing the gospel? Are you so unperceptive as to suppose you could begin with the Spirit of God, but be completed or perfected by external acts? The antithesis is twofold: beginning . . . ending; Spirit . . . flesh (cf. 2 Cor. 3:6; Phil. 1:6). The 'experiences' may mean what they have already suffered as Christians, or, more likely, spiritual benefits of their faith. Whether these are in vain is still in doubt, depending on whether they lapse completely into legalism. Finally, did God give His Spirit and accomplish actual signs among them (cf. 1 Cor. 12:1–11) on the ground of works of law, or hearing and believing the gospel message? As with the gift of the cross, so with the Spirit; the initiative is God's, to which the only appropriate human response is faith.

Paul contrasts Spirit and flesh sharply (cf. Rom. 8:1–17). Used variously, flesh sometimes designates simply a human being or the material body of a living creature (Gal. 1:16; 2:16 (AV); 2 Cor. 12:7), the basis of natural reproduction (Rom. 9:5), and secular or corporeally conditioned life (Gal. 2:20; 4:13, 14 (AV); 6:12). The main line of usage, however, is to identify and characterize what natural generation produces and what natural sinful life is, apart from the regenerating power of the Spirit of God (cf. Jn. 3:6; 1 Pet. 1:23–25). Hence flesh stands for man's fallen nature and its sinful deeds (Gal. 5:13–24; 6:8; Rom. 13:14). It is the force which opposes good and which corrupts. The flesh produces vices; the Spirit, virtues. This includes ritual religion seen as external acts which leave the inner life untouched (Gal. 3:3; 6:12, 13). Paul does not denigrate the body or the material world which God has created, but the natural unregenerate life with its sinful propensities (cf. Rom. 8:8).

3:6–9 The witness of Abraham

To a Jew, the authority of Abraham was decisive. Paul shows that, theologically, Abraham was accepted by God through faith, not works. Scripture thus corroborates Paul's gospel and their own experience.

6 'Hearing with faith' (cf. v. 5) is illustrated in Abraham who, as the father of the Jews, antedates Moses, and whose faith is compared with the Galatians' faith. Abraham's importance to the argument shows in the next two chapters also. It is crucial that Abraham not only acted rightly, but that through believing God's promise, righteousness was reckoned (or imputed) to him (cf. Gn. 15:6). In answer to his opponents at Galatia, Paul declares that Abraham's faith, not his circumcision (Gn. 17:14), was reckoned to him as the ground of acceptance with God and is the deeper basis of the covenant. Answering faith takes God at His word. 7 Therefore, not Jews as natural descendants, but men of faith are Abraham's true descendants, i.e. men whose standing before God and whose life derive from faith. 8 Further, the OT anticipated the inclusion of Gentiles in the promise (Gn. 12:3), but through faith (note Rom. 4), not circumcision as the Judaizers claimed. 9 Men of faith are blessed now, along with believing Abraham. The faith-basis of the gospel is the same, then or now. In response to God's promise, Abraham believed; in response to God's word in Christ through the gospel, men today are called to believe, and thereby to receive the blessing of righteousness put to their account. When Paul speaks of righteousness as being reckoned to the Christian he is using legal terminology; but there is nothing of legal fiction about it. Christ's righteousness is imputed to believing sinners (cf. Acts 13:39; Rom. 5:1, 9; 10:4). The Christian stands in a new relation to God in a righteousness not his own. The forensic sense is clear from Rom. 3:20–28; 4:5–7; as well as from this passage and elsewhere in Galatians (2:16; 3:11; 5:4). Imputed righteousness is antithetical to condemnation (cf. Rom. 8:33, 34), and interchangeable ideas convey an equivalent sense (cf. Jn. 3:18; Rom. 4:6–8, 24; 2 Cor. 5:19).

3:10–14 The law curses, but faith makes alive

From the Galatians' experience and the biblical argument based on Abraham, the argument moves to examine the logic of reliance on the law.

10 First, law can only condemn, hence to rely on it is to incur the curse of Dt. 27:26. While this is the verdict of law, Paul means to deny (2:16) the affirmative proposition (v. 12) derived from it by the Jews, namely that he who fulfils all the law shall live. Paul is distinguishing verdicts of law, derived by the legalist, and the judgment of God. The purpose of law is to exhibit and judge the guilty, not to acquit them. 11 To the Galatians the specific point is that, Judaizers to the contrary, Christians are not obliged to keep the law for salvation. Christ frees us from the law. Righteousness, the Spirit and life come not through the law, but through Christ by faith. It is evident that no man, i.e. no human by human achievement, can be justified before the holy God, for, as Paul shows, even the OT testifies that the righteous man shall live by faith (Hab. 2:4; cf. Rom. 1:17). The passage from Habakkuk is not used as a proof-text exegetically, but as an apt illustration of a broadly-based biblical principle, which is proved from God's dealings with Abraham. In this context, as elsewhere in Paul's writings, the righteous means the man who has a standing of saving righteousness before God, i.e. the man accepted or approved by God for the sake of Christ. This happens only through believing. 12 Now the law is not based on a response of faith, but on our actions. It cannot deal with our sin and guilt. Besides, no man can do all that the law requires. Legalism and belief in the work of Christ exclude each other as bases of justification.

13, 14 In sharp contrast, Christ redeemed us from the just condemnation which the law imposed on our sin. 'To redeem' means to deliver by payment of the cost of deliverance, i.e. a ransom, which is the death of Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 6:19, 20; 7:22, 23; Mk. 10:45; 1 Tim. 2:6; Tit. 2:14). Christ bore our judgment and died our death (2 Cor. 5:14, 20, 21) vicariously, as our Substitute and Representative. For us cannot mean less than both 'in our place' and 'for our sake'. Christ entered into the area of death caused by our sin, taking to Himself our judgment and satisfying its demands completely under the conditions of holy obedience to God. Sin's penalty was borne in a substitutionary way. He bore our curse, the curse cited from Dt. 21:23, which is equivalent to the wrath of Rom. 1:18 and 2:8. In his Christian understanding of sin and guilt, this text from Deuteronomy no longer left room to Paul, as it did in the Pharisaic tradition, for a ritual or ethical obedience which could justify a religious man.

3:15–18 Law cannot annul promise

15 To illustrate the priority of promise over law, Paul employs the analogy of a last will and testament. The same Greek word is translated will here and covenant in v. 17. Under some ancient legal systems, even a testator could not cancel a valid will nor add a codicil. 16 The divine agreement referred, says Paul, not to the plurality of Abraham's natural descendants, but to his offspring, seen to be Christ as the head of a new race. The sense is not to successive generations of men, but fulfilment in one kind of offspring, which is summed up in Christ. This interpretation is not evident in the language of Gn. 12:7; 13:15; 17:7, 8 and 22:18, but neither is it excluded. Paul's teaching gives us a key to history in its movement towards fulfilment in Christ, and in the union with Christ of those who are 'men of faith' (cf. vv. 7, 9) and who inherit the promise. 17 The exact period of time between the promise and the giving of the law is not germane to Paul's argument (see Gn. 15:13; Ex. 12:40; Acts 7:6), though we note that Paul usually quotes the LXX, and that here he gives the actual duration of Israelitish stay in Egypt. He means, rather, that the later giving of the law did not and could not annul the covenant to Abraham. Law cannot make the promise of no account, and neither can works displace faith. 18 If the inheritance now comes by law, promise and faith are cancelled. However, God gave the blessing to Abraham by promise and faith. This does not undercut the validity of law, nor is the law to be regarded as a codicil which displaces promise, because law is not the condition of receiving the promise. As a later addition in the history of God's dealings with man, it serves to uncover and to judge sin, as Paul proceeds to show.

3:19–29 The custodial function of law

19 The subordinate position of the law to the covenant is seen in the supplementary and temporary character of the law, for it was given till the offspring should arrive to whom the promise was made; and because it was enacted by angels (cf. Acts 7:53; Heb. 2:2) through Moses as the intermediary, it was therefore not given directly as was the covenant to Abraham. This view was a prevailing rabbinic tradition. Because of transgressions points to what follows the giving of the law. In addition to sin seen as evil impulse, Paul speaks here of sin as violation of known law. The overt, rebellious character of sin which makes men doubly culpable is in view. The law furnished a norm by which transgressions were produced (cf. Rom. 3:20; 4:15; 5:13, 14, 20; 7:7–12). 20 Wherever there is an intermediary, a plurality of persons exists, whereas God is one. Paul depreciates the law because it came from God indirectly, rather than directly as did the covenant of promise. In the latter God acted directly in the sovereign freedom of His grace.

21 While this is so, the law is not contrary to God's promises. If law had the power to give life, righteousness would be due to law; but to put sinful men right with God is neither the function nor the power of law, as already stated. 22 Rather, the truth is that Scripture has shut up everything under sin (Dt. 27:26; cf. Rom. 3:10–18), i.e. under condemnation, which is the verdict of the law against sinners. This occurred so that the promise, which comes to faith, might be given to those who believe in Jesus Christ. Paul affirms again the gratuitous character of the promise and gift to men of faith, not to men of works. God's main, final, and direct way of dealing with men is through grace and faith.

23–25 Stated more positively, the law functioned as a custodian until the gospel came. The custodial function is not educative, but restraining or disciplining. What is meant is not progress in religion, but being in custody awaiting the Redeemer. Men were kept like wards under guard, not (as in RSV) until faith came, but until they could obtain 'the faith' (23b, AV) which was to be revealed. 'Faith' as the proper human response to God is certainly intended here, but Paul has already argued that faith was the basis of the OT covenant also. Here 'the faith' or 'the event by which faith came' is equivalent to the Christian gospel, in contrast to the law. We were wards under the law like children under prohibitions, which is all that the law could do, until Christ came, in order that we might be acquitted by faith. One historical period succeeds another. The era of the law is succeeded and displaced by the new age of the free gospel of Christ. 'The faith' having thus come, we are free of the custodian.

In the Graeco–Roman world the child-custodian (pedagogue), or attendant, fulfilled certain clearly-defined functions. He was often a slave appointed by the parent to conduct the child to school and to have general charge of him until he came of age, even to imparting ethical instruction to him. If the child must travel abroad for his education, it was the attendant's responsibility to put him under a suitable teacher. Competent attendants were highly esteemed by parents, and children were required to respect them.

26 In contrast to the status of wards, in Christ Jesus you are all sons of God, through faith. It is full sonship, not custody. The characteristic Pauline phrase 'in Christ' means united to Christ personally (2 Cor. 5:17). There follows a climactic passage. 27 The only way to share the inheritance of promise is faith-union with Christ. The happening is wrought by God in baptism (cf. Rom. 6:1–11), not as an outward act (1 Pet. 3:21), but through the response of each man's own faith in Christ. In baptism we put on Christ. The figure of changing garments attests to the inner spiritual change. We strip off the clothes of the old life to be clothed with the garments of Christ's righteousness through faith-baptism (note the same figure in Ps. 132:9; Is. 61:10; 64:6; Zc. 3:3). 28 In this new life all ethnic, caste and other old distinctions are destroyed, in favour of complete equality within union with Christ. 29 Being Christ's, who is Abraham's true offspring, Christians are heirs of the promise along with Christ.

4:1–7 Analogy of the heir

The analogy of the child-heir continues, the chapter division being arbitrary.

1, 2 The sharpness of the argument is maintained in the threefold characterization of the heir as child (immature), no better than a slave, and under guardians (for his welfare) and trustees (for his estate). Traditions in the ancient world varied on the matter of transition from childhood to social and legal coming of age (probably age 17 or 18), hence the precise legal situation Paul had in mind is uncertain, though it probably was a definite one. The term date set does not require the death of the father. The sense may be that parentally designated guardianship and legally established trusteeship were concurrent, though the duration of social and legal coming of age may have differed. In this passage what goes beyond the point of 3:24 is that the subservience looks to emancipation. God Himself always had in view a future time for our deliverance from the law. 3 Similarly Christians generally, like the immature child, were under controls, but in the far worse state of slavery to the elemental spirits of the universe (see vv. 8, 9).

The point of vv. 3 and 8–11 is that Gentiles as much as Jews are under bondage; however, the argument slips back in vv. 4–7 to the question of the Jewish law.

4 The possibility of our new relation as sons rests on God's purpose, the incarnation, the atonement, and the Holy Spirit. The sense of providential intervention characterizes God's saving action (cf. Rom. 5:6; Eph. 1:9, 10), on a date set by Him. Time . . . fully come is a metaphor of year added to year, like an unfilled measure filled drop by drop, until the fullness of it came. God sent forth his Son points to Christ's pre-existence, deity, incarnation, and mission, i.e. to His whole saving mission. The Son came forth from God. Born of woman concerns His true humanity, i.e. a man among men (cf. Phil. 2:6–8). In this passage the term woman is neither confirmation nor denial of the virgin birth of Jesus. Born under the law is that system the curse of which He takes to Himself (cf. 3:13), and the restraints of which He experiences (cf. 3:23; Heb. 2:15). 5 To redeem (see on 3:13) those . . . under the law includes in this passage strictly not only Jews, but Gentiles also, for Christ delivers them from bondage as well, and Paul sees Gentiles under law (cf. Rom. 2:14, 15). Receive adoption as sons says that those who are not natural heirs acquire the status of sonship by sheer grace and gift. Sonship is vouchsafed to us through the indwelling Spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 6:19; Rom. 5:5; 8:11) who makes Christ a reality in our lives (cf. Jn. 15:26). 6 The Spirit of his Son (cf. Rom. 8:9) is cited often in support of the Spirit's procession from the Father and from the Son. The filial cry Abba! is the childish 'Daddy' in Aramaic, to which is joined the Greek translation Father. The familiar form was introduced to Christians by our Lord (cf. Mk. 14:36), and indicates trust and liberty, as against the strictures of legalism. 7 To conclude, the result is to be a son, not a slave; and, if a son, then an heir, made so by God.

4:8–11 The bondage of custom and tradition

8, 9 The elemental spirits (cf. v. 3) may be rudiments of knowledge or of the nature of things in the sense that the ABCs are the rudiments of language. To others, they are the beings designated no gods, i.e. celestial and demonic powers which control destiny, as in ancient astrology and mythology (cf. 1 Cor. 8:4–6). The devotee was related to these as a slave, not like the Christian to the true God as a son. The elemental spirits are by nature excluded from being God, and were served only because the Galatians did not formerly know God. But now marks the dramatic transition to know God through the gospel, indeed, to be known by God. The initiative was God's: they became the objects of His gracious concern. How totally irrational and unthinkable therefore to turn back to, or to wish to be enslaved again by, powers proved to be impotent (they cannot save men) and impoverished (in comparison to the heirs of God in Christ)! 10, 11 Paul is concerned lest his work should be frustrated because they have returned to legalistic religious play-acting. Such mummery included days (sabbath), months (new moons), seasons (recurrent festivals), and years (jubilee years). Are these Jewish or pagan observances? In writing to the Galatians, Paul clearly has Judaizers in mind. Did these worship elemental spirits? Astrological elements were at times infused into Jewish as well as pagan practices. The elemental spirits of this passage refer probably to the ethos of an age traceable in part to pagan astrological mythology, but which had become a religious habit as much as, and perhaps more than, a metaphysical system (cf. Col. 2:8).

4:12–20 Appeal to first love

12 Paul drops the argument, which is resumed in vv. 21–31, to make a personal appeal, especially noted in the affectionate terms Brethren and I beseech, or entreat, you. The grammatical form of the entreaty is doubtful, but the meaning is not. The second clause of the comparison is without a verb, hence we might translate: 'become as I (am, or have become), because I (am, or have become) as you (are).' He urges them to be free of the law, as he is; for he, having been a zealous Jew, jettisoned the law to put himself on their level (cf. 1 Cor. 9:22). He means 'take my stance' or 'adopt my outlook', i.e. do not seek to become Jews. You did me no wrong may point to their original warm welcome, or to their freedom to hear alternative viewpoints; only he now begs that they return to their affection for him.

13 The occasion of his first, or a former, visit raises the chronological and geographical questions mentioned in the Introduction. On the view adopted here, the visit occurred when Paul and Barnabas arrived in Asia Minor from Cyprus on the first missionary journey. However, it is felt by some that the natural sense of this passage points to two visits prior to his writing Galatians. Whether Paul experienced a recurrent illness which can be identified with 2 Cor. 12:7, or a weakening disability, or an illness such as malaria contracted in Pamphylia (Acts 13:13), is uncertain. However, the illness compelled him to seek a different climate, hence his visit to them and his initial evangelistic efforts among them. 14 Despite his weakened, even repulsive, condition, which might have tempted the Galatians to reject or depise him, they received him as if he were a super-human being, even as Christ Jesus Himself. This may allude wryly to what is recorded in Acts 14:12. 15 Satisfaction suggests, rather, self-congratulation at their good fortune. Where is that feeling now, asks Paul? Their happiness had been so great that, had it been possible, they would have given him their own eyes. This is not a likely reference to his poor eyesight, but a common eastern metaphor expressing personal indebtedness to a benefactor.

16 is more an ironical exclamation than a question: 'So I have become hated for telling you the truth!' 17 The Judaizers zealously pursue them, but seditiously, in an effort to capture their interest, i.e. to make the Galatians jealous of the Judaizers' doctrines. 18 It is good to be courted always, Paul adds, so long as it is done in a good way; for he does not wish them to be dependent on his presence. But the intention of the false teachers is not honourable. 19 He expresses deep emotion over them in the diminutive my little children, as if he must again experience the pain of childbirth to win them. Until Christ be formed in you, i.e. until maturity of Christian character and comprehension result from their initial turning to Christ. Here Paul likens himself to a mother, elsewhere to a father (cf. 1 Cor. 4:15). The Christian at his conversion is 'in Christ' (Gal. 5:6; cf. Rom. 16:7; 2 Cor. 5:17; Eph. 2:13), and Christ is in the Christian as the pattern and power of his new life (cf. Rom. 8:10, 11, 29; 2 Cor. 3:18; 13:5; Col. 1:27). 20 Paul wishes he could be with them, for that would radically change their present strained relations. He would drop the language of censure for the language of reunion and restoration. As it is, he is at his wit's end what to think of them.

4:21–31 Allegory of Sarah and Hagar

21 In resuming the argument, Paul challenges those who are keen to remain under the law (chiefly the Judaizers, but not excluding the vacillating Galatians) that they have misunderstood the meaning of the law which they hear read sabbath after sabbath. They are not hearing what it is actually saying. Paul invokes rabbinical argument against those who rest on the rabbinical tradition. The argument is in three parts: the historical situation is identified (vv. 22, 23), interpreted by Paul (vv. 24–27), and applied to Christians including the Galatians (vv. 28–31). While the comparison is called an allegory (v. 24) it is not allegory in the Philonic sense. Key elements are aspects of the historical narrative, especially the contrast between the bondwoman and the free, and between law and promise (grace). It is more in the nature of typology, but the major points derive from Paul's understanding of the OT in relation to the covenant of grace in Jesus Christ, rather than from a historical interpretation of the Genesis account.

22, 23 The setting concerns Abraham's two sons, Ishmael from Hagar, and Isaac from Sarah (cf. Gn. 16; 17; 21). When it appeared that she would remain childless, Sarah had given Hagar her servant-woman to Abraham to conceive in her stead (a not uncommon practice in those days), but once the child was on the way, Hagar despised Sarah. Subsequently the divine promise that Sarah would bear a son in her old age was fulfilled, but the tension between the two women increased. Sarah's ejection of Hagar and Ishmael was in keeping with the legal code of the times. Paul anticipates his major conclusions: Ishmael was the son of bondage but Isaac was free-born; Ishmael was a natural descendant but Isaac was born of promise, beyond the usual child-bearing age, and is therefore of grace. The stinging implication is that Jews who take pride in their natural descent from Abraham (as he himself did; cf. 2 Cor. 11:22; Phil. 3:4) are really no better than Ishmael. The sons of grace are the true heirs of Abraham.

24–27 The interpretation follows. The two women represent two covenants (Hagar: law; Sarah: grace). The first bears a son to bondage, the second son is free-born of promise. The first represents Mt. Sinai in Arabia where the law was given and corresponds to the present Jerusalem, i.e. the Jerusalem under Judaism, whose descendants are in bondage. The text of v. 25 is uncertain, but it reads either that Mt. Sinai or Hagar or both are of Arabia, hence outside the land of promise. The Jerusalem above means the spiritual Jerusalem, of God's heavenly kingdom, a community of children of faith (cf. Phil. 3:20; Heb. 11:16; 12:22). Its members are heirs through the promise of grace, not because of earthly nationality. Paul's meaning is that the heirs of promise are both supernatural and supranational. As to covenant, generation and citizenship, the two Jerusalems represent qualitatively differing realms. The text from Is. 54:1 serves to reinforce the point that not natural generation, but divine promise fulfilled, will produce the progeny of the new Jerusalem.

28–31 Like Isaac, Christians are children of promise, not law. Their standing with God depends not on natural descent, but on the covenant of grace. Just as in Genesis the son of law mocked the free-born, it is not surprising that heirs of the law should now persecute the sons of grace. In keeping with the action of Sarah, they are to rid themselves decisively of any tendency to legalism or the dominance of the Judaizing teachers (cf. Gn. 21:10), for they have been begotten from freedom for freedom. The true heirs of Abraham are not those who claim the suzerainty of the law, but those who know the freedom in Jesus Christ.

5:1 – 6:10 FREEDOM VINDICATED

5:1–12 The freedom of faith

1 While this verse logically concludes the preceding argument, it has a connection with this following section. The sense of the verse is clear, but whether stand fast attaches to the first or the second clause has tempted textual editors to make emendations. The translation option given in RSV is probably the best. There is a wordplay on freedom: 'for freedom Christ has freed us; therefore, stand to and don't knuckle under again to bondage.' This is freedom based on redemption through grace, which must be contrasted with the condition of men who, like the Jews of Paul's day, are chained to a treadmill of religious ritual.

2, 3 The particular issue is circumcision. A mark of the orthodox Jew, it was regarded as absolutely essential for obedience to the law and for salvation. However, circumcision is man's act for righteousness, therefore what Christ is and has done is of little use to him who counts on his own fulfilling of the law. Salvation does not come by Christ plus the law, but by Christ alone. If you receive circumcision may indicate that they have not yet done so. Paul protests from his own experience that to submit to circumcision is no isolated ritual. It puts one again under the whole law which demands perfect obedience (which is impossible). 4 By such submission, and such a desire to be justified by works of law, a man in principle and in fact cuts himself off from the sphere of grace and of the obedience of faith in Jesus Christ. Thereby one makes grace ineffective. Fallen away from grace does not mean what it means to some today, i.e. fallen away from salvation; rather, they have dropped away from a life bound up with grace to an existence bogged down in legalism. The two ways exclude one another. To adopt legalism is to repudiate Christ. One cannot be trying to save himself, and at the same time be trusting Christ wholly for salvation. 5 Christians, by the Spirit and by faith, await the hoped-for righteousness (cf. Rom. 5:2). Righteousness is not achieved by us but is God's gift in Christ. 6 In Christ Jesus means the way of life of those who are united to Christ by faith. It is the sphere of those who are united to Christ and to one another. There neither circumcision nor uncircum- cision is of any avail; indeed, they are hindrances if depended upon for salvation. Only faith coming to effective expression in love avails (cf. v. 13). For Paul, the controlling principle of life is faith expressed in love, as in the life of Christ (cf. Rom. 5:5–8; 8:35–39). The essence of Christianity is not legalism, but a personal relationship to Jesus Christ which is characterized by faith and love.

7 Paul breaks off the argument to remind them that they had progressed well, until impeded, or cut in on, by the Judaizers. The content of the gospel as revealed truth is again in view. 8 The persuasion they have does not derive from God who called them. 9 Compare this verse with 1 Cor. 5:6; as an ancient proverbial saying. 10 Paul sets himself over against the unknown seditious person, and expresses confidence that they will heed him, taking no other viewpoint than his. The troubler, or unsettler of their faith, will suffer his due judgment, whoever he may be. 11 As for Paul, if some slander him by alleging ridiculously that he continues to preach the necessity to be circumcised, why is he still persecuted? In such a case the offence of the cross vanishes, i.e. of the indispensable, unique nature of the cross, whose efficiency cannot be supplemented by human merit. The scandal (stumbling-block) of the cross is found in its explanation as a suffering for sin and in its totally gratuitous character. The cross alone is the divine way of redemption. If human works or rites can avail, salvation ceases to be of grace (cf. 1 Cor. 1:18–25). 12 So crucial is this issue that Paul caustically remarks he wishes the Judaizers would not stop at circumcision, but go on to castrate themselves. Some heathen rites (e.g. the worship of Cybele) ended with the priests mutilating themselves.

5:13–15 Right use of freedom

Like 5:1, this first sentence is transitional. The strong feeling expressed in v. 12 relates also to Paul's defence of Christian freedom which now follows. 13 Freedom includes freedom from legalistically imposed religious ordinances, but its positive meaning is the essential spiritual liberty of the Christian man, which liberty is God's purpose for men (cf. Jn. 8:32, 36; Rom. 8:2). The use of freedom ought to be morally qualified. True freedom implies service to others. It cannot be used as an opportunity (pretext) for the flesh. Paul does not denigrate the physical world or body. The term flesh was used previously as a physical term, but in this chapter (vv. 16, 17, 19, 24) it has the definite ethical connotation of fallen human nature which urges to evil (cf. Rom. 8). On the contrary, love expressed in benevolent action for the well-being of others, which results in mutual service, should be the fruit of Christian freedom. Here is love's concern, equally for all men as for fellow-Christians, as the fitting result of faith in Christ. This is in contrast to certain sects who claimed the law yet also depreciated the body only to exploit carnal desires. There is a Christian bondage, but not to law. It is a joyous and willing servitude to one another in the liberty of the gospel. 14 Even the law itself epitomizes this truth in the dictum You shall love your neighbour as yourself (Lv. 19:18). Gal. 3:28 shows that Paul does not limit neighbour to Jews. The paradox does not intend to convey that salvation comes by Christian service; but that once he is free in Christ through the cross, the Christian devotes himself to the ethical principles of God's Word. Fulfilment of the law is achieved not through servile obedience for self-justification, but through justification by Christ and the obedience of love thereafter (cf. Rom. 8:4; 13:8–10; Heb. 10:5–10). For the Christian, Jew or Gentile, freedom from law cannot result in lawless living. The obligations of Christian charity and morality are greater under grace (cf. Rom. 6:1–15). 15 The problem to which this verse is directed is unknown. It may refer to petty interpersonal strife, or to deep differences occasioned by the Judaizing teaching. The strong language indicates that their fellowship is in danger of dissolution.

5:16–26 Antagonism between flesh and Spirit

The contrast between life in the Spirit and under the law is now expounded.

16 The metaphor walk means way of life taken, and is an imperative denoting action in progress. The Spirit is the Spirit of God (cf. v. 5). The command to walk by the Spirit is the proper antidote for Judaistic teaching, which included the allegation that without the pressure of the law they would fall into sin. Paul urges them to let their conduct be controlled by the inward impetus of the Spirit. To do so is the sure way not to yield to the inner power which makes for evil. RSV translates the concluding clause as a command (do not gratify), but it is better to follow the conjunction with a confident declaration: 'and you will never fulfil the desires of the flesh.' 17 This principle, that to live the life in the Spirit is confidently the way to overcome the desires (impulses) of the flesh, governs the way this verse should be understood. Paul does not envisage an indecisive, lingering battle between equally balanced contestants (Spirit and flesh), whose struggle cancels our freedom of action. The key is the principle of the previous verse: 'You will never satisfy the impulses of the flesh.' Spirit and flesh are in combat. To walk by the Spirit of God ensures that we do no longer as we please (i.e. fall to the false freedom of carnal impulse). Rather, we live in freedom which triumphs over such impulses. This is not freedom which steers an uncertain middle course between evil impulses and obedience to religious rules, but a new way which transcends them both. 18 Hence, to be led by the Spirit is to be no longer subject to the law. The life under the law (legalistic obedience) cannot be imported into the life by the Spirit (faith and love). The former involves externally imposed rules, while the latter involves the new dynamic of the indwelling Spirit. The two are a universe of meaning apart.

19–21 What the works of carnal impulse are is common knowledge (these are not in principle the same as the works of the law): sexual sins (fornication, impurity, wantonness); pagan practices (idolatry, witchcraft); sins of passion and sedition (enmities, strife, jealousy, anger, self-seekings, dissension, divisions, envyings); and sins of indulgence (drunkenness, carousing). The verb translated do conveys the sense of 'wont to practise'. Such are not of the Spirit of God, hence they cannot inherit the kingdom.

22 What the Spirit produces in the life of the Christian follows. It is a spiritual harvest appropriate to the new divine life within Christians. Contrast this with the gifts of the Spirit in 1 Cor. 12. Fruit is a collective noun designating crop, or harvest, and suggests the many-sided character of virtuous life. It is not clear whether to Paul these fell into classes, but they include inner personal qualities, qualities governing social relations, and principles of conduct. The pattern of love is God's love revealed in Christ, which love enables us to love God (cf. 2 Thes. 3:5) and others (Gal. 5:13, 14). Love does not seek its own selfish ends, but the good of others. Joy is deep happiness born of a personal relation to God (see Phil. 4:4), which includes a sense of our fulfilling His will (cf. Jn. 15:11; 17:13). Peace in the NT is primarily tranquillity of mind, or spiritual well-being, based on forgiveness (cf. Rom. 5:1; 15:13; Phil. 4:7). Peace with God affects our relationships with others significantly (cf. Rom. 14:17, 19). Patience is AV 'longsuffering'. Other uses of the word include 'steadfastness' and 'forbearance'. The latter is the sense of patience here. God has been forbearing to us in Christ (cf. 1 Tim. 1:16), so we should be patient with one another (cf. 2 Tim. 4:2). Kindness (AV 'gentleness') denotes excellence of character in the sense of a due regard for the fragile nature of human personality and for human need (cf. Rom. 2:4; 11:22; Eph. 2:7). Goodness, occurring in addition to kindness, suggests the general sense of ideal character, but with righteousness softened by love. It is a term which Paul employs elsewhere in his writings only in Rom. 15:14; Eph. 5:9; 2 Thes. 1:11. Faithfulness translates the Greek word 'faith' (so AV). As employed here it denotes 'fidelity' as a fundamental trait of Christian character, especially in relation to other men. 23 Gentleness (AV 'meekness') is used in the NT in two related senses, submissiveness to the divine will (cf. Jas. 1:21) and considerateness towards men (cf. Gal. 6:1; 1 Cor. 4:21; 2 Cor. 10:1). Self-control (AV 'temperance') translates a Greek term used to denote self-mastery or continence. In this passage it relates particularly to curbing the fleshly impulses, though lack of restraint in any behaviour may be in view (cf. 1 Cor. 7:9; 9:25). That there are self-evidently no prohibitions against such virtues is Paul's way of reinforcing their value by understatement. 24 On one side, victory over sin is due to the new life in the Spirit; but, on the other side, it is due to the Christian having died in Christ's death, which marks the death of the power of the flesh (cf. Gal. 2:20).

25 The reality of their having been made alive by the Spirit (cf. Rom. 8:1–11) should also lead them to walk by the Spirit. For Christian experience not only begins through the Spirit, it continues by the Spirit. 26 Therefore conceit, provocation and envy should have no place.

6:1–5 Ethical responsibility

The moral responsibility of Spirit-led Christians for those of their own number who fall into sin and also of each man for himself next comes into view.

1 The forbearance of grace in contrast to legalistic censoriousness should be expressed, for example, even in the case where a man is taken unawares in a lapse: guilty as he obviously is, those who are spiritual, i.e. men and women of the Spirit, should aim to restore him. If should be rendered 'even if' to indicate the serious nature of the contingency Paul has in mind. Restore means 'to complete' or 'put into proper condition', like a mason repairing a wall or a physician setting a broken limb. The lapse is antithetical to walking by the Spirit (Gal. 5:25). In regard to the lapsed, Paul pleads that they restore him to his former condition (note 'mending', the same Gk. word, in Mk. 1:19) in a (human) spirit of gentleness (cf. Gal. 5:23). The law of Christ operates within the body of Christian fellowship not as a set of statutes but through all-embracing love. The restorer should help in a 'spirit of meekness' (AV) having regard to his own human limitations and proneness to succumb to temptation. Tempted here refers to 'solicitation to sin', not to 'testing the righteous'. Sin has been slain in principle, though the Christian must still reckon with it as a power. 2 Burdens. The word denotes a heavy weight and is the reproach Christians all bear when one of their number falls. Such expression of concern and mutual support issues from love as the new principle revealed in Jesus Christ (cf. Jn. 15:12), rather than from the old way of counting good deeds (cf. Mt. 18:21). 3 Self-deception catches only the unwary, the unself-conscious. 4 The alert man gives attention to proper testing of his own work. Then his basis of self-congratulation will rest validly on his achievement, not on imagined superiority over the lapsed brother. 5 The term load designates what each man must bear for himself, like a soldier his own knapsack, which is his own responsibility, and is to be distinguished from the additional burdens of v. 2.

6:6–10 Sowing and reaping

6 The verb 'to teach', which occurs twice in this verse, translates the Greek verb from which we derive 'to catechize', showing how early in the church's history oral instruction of Christian truth figured prominently. Here the second practical way of showing Christian charity is identified (the first being the restoration of a fallen brother). Those who are taught ought to respond by sharing the blessings of their livelihood with Christian workers and supporting them financially (cf. Rom. 15:27; 1 Cor. 9:11). He appeals to them to maintain the ministry adequately. An application follows. Just as the incident of another's fall ought to sober us to the realities of our own propensities to sin, so the generosity of those who teach ought to be living proof that man reaps only what he has sown.

7 As valid as may be the application by Christians generally of this verse to the unconverted, let us note that Paul applied it first to Christians. 8 The general principle is clearly that unreceptiveness to gospel teaching and indulgence in carnal pursuits will bear its own fruit. What a man sows he will reap. From fleshly indulgence issues decay leading to destruction. On the contrary, to sow to the Spirit means devoting the energies of life to values of the Spirit of God revealed in and by Jesus Christ (cf. Rom. 6:19–23; 1 Tim. 6:12; Tit. 3:7). That which is of the Spirit yields life eternal (cf. 1 Jn. 2:15–17). A man deceives only himself when he supposes that he can turn up his nose at God with impunity. No-one can hoodwink God. 9 Grow weary may have the added thought of being neglectful. The final harvest comes; therefore sow well in expectation of it. Well-doing includes the sense of beauty and grace, as well as of intrinsic goodness. It is important to remember that in this passage two fields are in view (flesh and Spirit) as well as two sowings. Lose heart has the added force of relaxing effort (cf. Heb. 12:3–5), or of becoming exhausted (cf. Mt. 15:32). 10 The principle which follows marks the true character of the life under grace, namely, as occasion allows, let us do good to all men. Christians have a special obligation to one another. The word translated household means that something is 'one's own' or belongs to one's family. Those who through faith have been born into God's family are members of the same household and are therefore related to us with all that that implies in the way of claims upon us.

This passage may indicate Paul's concern that the Galatians neither ignore nor cease from assisting in the collection for the afflicted Christians at Jerusalem because of the troublesome Judaizers. The Near East, especially Palestine, was beset by bad harvests and famine during the fifth and sixth decades of the first century. Government relief projects were organized to relieve the distress, and the churches made collections also (cf. Rom. 15:24–27; 1 Cor. 16:1–4; 2 Cor. 8; 9).

6:11–18 CONCLUSION

11 Paul often dictated his letters to a scribe, but added a personal footnote himself (cf. 1 Cor. 16:21; Col. 4:18; 2 Thes. 3:17). With what large letters has evoked conflicting opinion. This conclusion is the longest Paul wrote (he may even have begun it at 5:2). Does he write the conclusion in large letters for emphasis, so that it can be displayed, or because he writes awkwardly, or because of weak or diseased eyes? Probably the meaning is 'with such bold letters' to emphasize their danger from the Judaizers and the cruciality of salvation by the cross alone.

12 The issue compels him to question their motive. Submission to circumcision (this now includes all who receive it, and not the Judaizers only) is a ritual act in which it is possible to glory; hence it spares a man from the offence of looking for salvation to the cross alone. Such are more concerned about externals. There is an analogy between their boasting in the external physical rite of circumcision and their carnal appetites. It is in total contrast to the nature of the gospel, faith, and the true spiritual life. The Judaizers were prepared to tolerate the offensive cross, but only within the prescribed forms of Judaism. 13 Paul repeats a theological conclusion (cf. 3:10, 11) as an accusation: the circumcision party are themselves not law-abiding in all points. Paul probably means that they are insincere, as their actions show. They demand circumcision of the Galatians only to exult in an external mark of religious conformity.

14 But for Paul there is no exulting, except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. By using Christ's full title Paul intends to reaffirm not only the indispensable redemptive act, but the divine nature of Christ, hence of the act. The cross is God's cross, therefore God's way, therefore the only way of salvation (cf. Rom. 5:18–21). Through the cross Paul's life has been revolutionized. That by it the world has been crucified to Paul, and he to the world, reaffirms his having died in the death Christ died (cf. 3:26, 27; Rom. 6:3, 4), by which event he is reckoned dead to the world, i.e. the world-system as life ordered in alienation from God. 15 The attractions of the unredeemed life have become dead things to him. No outward symbol of religious conformity or non-conformity avails, only a new creation (cf. 2 Cor. 5:17), which is the spiritual re-creation of man. 16 If one should speak of religious rules, then let a benediction rest on those who live by the principle of new life in Christ. These are the true Israel of God, heirs of Abraham (cf. 3:14; Phil. 3:3).

17 is an appeal born of deep feeling that he be spared the further distress of persecution in view of the sufferings he has already experienced (cf. Acts 14:8, 19; 2 Cor. 11:23–28), which are sufficient evidence of his devotion to Christ.

18 The benediction is similar to others. Here the occurrences of grace and spirit peculiarly reinforce major themes of the book which are tied to the centrality of the Lord Jesus Christ, and to Paul's fraternal feeling for the Galatians.

INTRODUCTION

THE PLACE AND PURPOSE OF EPHESIANS IN PAULINE LITERATURE

Two features of this Epistle stand out clearly. First, except for the closing paragraph in 6:21, 22 the argument and appeal of the document are strangely impersonal and indirect. The apostle has heard of his readers' Christian profession through indirect channels (1:15) and knows that it is only in this way that they have heard of his apostolic ministry for the Gentiles (3:1, 2). His bond with his readers is that of an author to his recipients (3:4) rather than one of first-hand acquaintance.

The second feature is one of literary usage. Both choice of words and employment of a studied style mark out this Epistle as unusual in the Pauline literature. There are many words not used elsewhere in the NT, long ponderous sentences complicated by involved relative clauses, a profusion of abstract nouns, etc. These traits seem to be far removed from the style of a pastoral letter, addressed to the church at Ephesus by the apostle Paul whose letter-writing habits involve the use of rhetorical questions and a pointed, direct approach (e.g. Galatians).

These two features have been used in modern criticism to cast a doubt on the Pauline authorship of the letter. But before this question is looked at, it will be well to draw some conclusions from the above data. First, from the evidence of the writer's unusual relationship with his addressees it becomes clear that 'Ephesians' is no ordinary pastoral letter sent to a specific congregation or group of churches. This fact is confirmed by the textual uncertainty in 1:1. The two words translated in AV as 'at Ephesus' are lacking in the leading MSS, both codices and cursives, including the important papyrus P46 dated AD 200. Moreover early Christian writers endorse the view that 'at Ephesus' was not found in the earliest texts. Two suggestions have been offered to explain this textual irregularity. One possibility is that the letter never had a place-name but was composed as a general tract or essay and not as a letter intended for a particular readership. A 2nd-century scribe is thought to have supplied 'at Ephesus' to bring the document which later Christians claimed as a Pauline composition into conformity with the other Pauline letters to the churches of the 1st-century Christian world.

Against this view and in support of the second submission is the fact that, while the letter does read more like a sermon than a pastoral letter addressed to a church with specific needs, the author does have a certain group of persons in mind and speaks to them in the second person. It is more likely, then, that this document was composed as a circular letter to the churches in a wide region—Asia Minor is the most probable location—and either carried from one place to another in the area by a courier or (in view of the later textual authority for the place-name of Ephesus) left by the author with a blank in the superscription, to be filled in as the messenger handed over the particular copy to the church. There are some difficulties with this reconstruction, but on balance it seems to be the most plausible view.

The author is gripped by his subject which runs as a main thread through his treatise. In a style which seems to be influenced by possible liturgical and hymnic speech he marvels at the grace of God which has brought into being a united church in which Jews and Gentiles together find their true place (2:11–22). The unity of this universal society which is nothing less than Christ's body (1:23; 3:6; 4:4; 5:30) is his great concern (4:3ff.). He starts from the premise of 'one new man' (2:15) in which a new humanity has been created by God through Christ's reconciling work on the cross (2:16). By this work Jews and Gentiles are brought into God's family (1:5; 2:19; 4:6; 5:1) as brothers. The coming into existence of this one family where all barriers of race, culture and social status are broken down is the wonder which fills his vision. The earlier Pauline teaching of Gal. 3:28, 29 is now filled out and its lessons drawn and applied.

The letter to the Galatians had fought and won the battle for the recognition of Gentiles as members of the church of Christ. This Epistle builds upon that charter of Gentile liberty and offers a double warning to Gentile believers now that their place within the family of God has been secured. First, the readers are counselled against allowing their pre-Christian moral standards to determine their conduct (4:17ff.), and are put on their guard against pagan teachers who would undermine the Christian ethic which they have accepted as part of their new life in Christ (5:3ff.). Then they are reminded that Jewish Christians are fellow-believers with them; that Jesus came as Israel's Messiah through whom the entire world is blessed; and that they can never deny the Jewish participation in the gospel message without severing that message from its historical roots (cf. Jn. 4:22). This explains the appeal made to the OT and the demonstration the author gives that the Messianic hope of Israel meets all the needs of his Gentile Christian readers (2:11ff.; 3:6) who, converted to Christ later in time than the Jewish believers (1:12, 13) but in no way inferior on that account, came to share with them the Holy Spirit of (Messianic) promise (1:13; 4:30).

If we imagine a situation in the NT period of church history when the Gentile mission had prospered and Gentiles were streaming into the church; when they were boasting of their supposed independence of Israel, and were becoming intolerant of their Jewish Christian brethren (adopting the attitude reflected in Rom. 11:33ff.); when they needed a reminder of the Jewish past of the church—then we have a life-setting which makes this Epistle understandable in the Pauline literature.

AUTHORSHIP AND DATING

Evidence taken from the letter itself (1:1; 3:1) and from the attestation of the church Fathers (Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian) supports the traditional view that this Epistle came from Paul's hand. But denials of authenticity are frequently made, partly on the score that both vocabulary and style are non-Pauline, and partly on the ground that the situation in the document could have arisen only in the post-Pauline period.

If Paul is drawing upon the liturgical language of the churches' worship and composing in a style which is lyrical and exalted, the unusual features are well explained. The second line of attack on apostolic authorship is now conceded to be the more important and decisive, especially the claim that Ephesians confronts a situation which could have appeared only when the church had become institutionalized and more developed in its structure and life. Marks of 'early catholicism' have been detected in this Epistle: e.g. the apostles are looked upon as a closed group (2:20; 3:5; 4:11); the unity of the church in which the Gentiles have taken their settled place is a matter for concern; the expectation of an imminent return of Christ is fading (e.g. 4:13–16, on which Masson comments: 'the church grows towards Christ. She no longer waits for Him to come to her') as the church settled down in the world. But none of this evidence points indubitably to a period later than the mid-sixties, and there are counterbalancing data (e.g. 5:16; 6:13 do stress the life of the church 'between the times' of the advents of Christ). F. F. Bruce has shown how ideas which are stated in outline in the earlier Pauline Epistles are developed and continued in this Epistle (art. 'St Paul in Rome: 4. The Epistle to the Ephesians', BJRL 49, 2, 1967, pp. 303ff.).

The date of Ephesians belongs to the period of the apostle's imprisonment in Rome, c. AD 60–61. The letter has many points of similarity with Colossians, especially at 6:21, 22 (= Col. 4:7ff.) from which it is clear that Tychicus was the bearer of both documents. It is true that both Epistles have thoughts which overlap and amplify one another, and attempts to play off one Epistle against the other—to support the view that Colossians is authentic and Ephesians non-authentic—are not very impressive. Both letters belong to the same time of composition; Ephesians is best regarded as the last letter in the group of imprisonment Epistles.

COMMENTARY

1:1–14 INTRODUCTION

1:1, 2 Address and salutation

Following the pattern of 1st-century letter-writing practices and of his earlier correspondence with the churches, Paul begins the letter with his own name and greets his readers under their Christian vocations as 'the saints' and the 'faithful in Christ Jesus' (v. 1). He then invokes upon them the twin blessings of grace and peace which are the gift of the Father and His Son (v. 2).

Notes. 1 An apostle of Christ Jesus. Paul is implying that his writing is authoritative, for apostleship meant the exercise of a God-given authority within the life of the churches (cf. 2 Cor. 13:10). By the will of God. Paul acknowledges that his calling is not self-derived or conferred upon him by other Christians. Rather his apostolic authority and status are traced solely to the call and commission of the risen Christ. The saints who are also faithful. The following phrase in Christ Jesus is best taken to cover both terms which are adjectives. Saints is literally 'holy ones', but this may be a misleading title if it is thought of exclusively in terms of personal piety. The meaning of 'sainthood' is dedication to God and usefulness in His service. Hence the explanatory faithful, i.e. devoted to their calling as the people of God who serve Him in Christ Jesus, i.e. in union with Him, or, possibly, in the fellowship of the church. For the omission of 'at Ephesus' from RSV see the Introduction. 2 Grace . . . and peace. A familiar Pauline prayer (cf., e.g., 1 Thes. 1:1). Both gifts are ascribed to God . . . and the Lord Jesus Christ as joint-Authors. By sure Christian instinct, even in the apostolic age, the foundations of the credal doctrine of the Godhead are being laid.

1:3–14 The purposes of God in eternity and time

There are two ways in which these stately verses may be approached. We may discover in them a trinitarian pattern corresponding to the purposes and activities of the Godhead of Father who chooses His people (vv. 3–5), Son who redeems at the cost of His own sacrificial death (v. 7), and Holy Spirit who applies the work of Christ to the church and so makes real, in human experience, the eternal purpose of the Trinity (vv. 13, 14). An alternative proposal suggests that Paul's thought flows along temporal channels as he views the entire range of God's redeeming purpose from a past eternity (v. 4) to its future realization (v. 14). These two approaches are not mutually exclusive, however, and in either case the central point of this statement of divine enterprise is in v. 7.

1:3–6 The Father's choice. 3 Paul breaks out in an exultant doxology in praise of God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, His beloved Son (v. 6), recalling that all spiritual good is placed at the disposal of the church which exists in, and draws its life from, Christ its Head, who now reigns in the heavenly places. Cf. v. 22, where the Headship of the risen Christ over His people is traced to God's appointment. 4 The church now lives in Christ because of God's pre-mundane choice which ensures that those who hear the gospel in its historical context will respond in faith (v. 13; cf. 2 Thes. 2:13). Here we confront the mystery of divine election which the NT consistently proclaims not as a conundrum to tease our minds but as a wonder to evoke our praise; not as an element in God's character to be minimized but as an assurance that our lives are in His powerful hands, not in the grip of fate; and never as an excuse for carelessness in spiritual matters, but always as a reminder that Christians have a responsibility 'to confirm your call and election' (2 Pet. 1:10). We are chosen that we should be holy and blameless.

5 God's electing purpose is an expression of His love and has as its design the fulfilment of His purpose that there should be many sons in His family, all sharing the likeness of their elder Brother (cf. Rom. 8:29; Heb. 2:10). 6 It is through the beloved Son who conveyed the grace of God in His life and death (cf. Jn. 1:17b) that the Father's grand intention is realized; and the stress on the freeness of that grace shows that Paul's thought of God's sovereign action looks back to the OT (cf. Dt. 7:6–8).

Notes. 3 Blessed; the Greek word (eulogētos, as in 1 Pet. 1:3) picks up the Hebrew term (bᵉrāḵâ) which plays an important part in Jewish worship. 5 RSV associates in love with he destined us rather than with the preceding verse (as AV, NEB), and is preferable. 6 The Beloved recalls Mk. 1:11 as a title for the Messiah; but the closest OT background reference is Gn. 22:1–8, which Paul has in mind in Rom. 8:32.

1:7–10 The Father's plan accomplished in Christ. 7, 8 Mention of God's grace leads on to a larger treatment of this theme. Sonship and membership of the divine family are made possible on the ground of redemption (v. 7); and it is by the offering of His blood in sacrificial death that Christ obtains His people's liberation (redemption was exactly what captive Israel needed; cf. Dt. 15:15) from the tyranny of evil and gives them the assurance of pardon.

9, 10 Redemption and forgiveness are but a part of the entire work of God in Christ. What Paul terms the mystery of his will embraces the universe in its scope, for it is a plan for the fullness of time, i.e. a plan which God will fulfil in His own way and according to His invincible will (v. 11). This plan has as its great objective the summing up of all things in Christ—a difficult phrase which probably means that in Christ the entire universe finds its full explanation and rationale. Christ gives meaning to the cosmos when it is perceived that He is not only the source and sustainer of all that is (Col. 1:15ff.; cf. Jn. 1:3, 4; Heb. 1:2, 3) but the goal towards which the whole creation is moving.

Notes. 7 The background here is the OT, as in 5:2. 9 The prominent terms here, wisdom, insight, he has made known (Gk. gnōrisas), mystery, may well have been used by the false teachers in Asia Minor, whom Paul addressed in the letter to the Colossians. They were claiming a secret teaching, open only to initiates, which gave them a clue to the understanding of the universe. Paul counters this specious pretension. The 'secret' of the divine purpose is in Christ—and is accessible to all who believe in Him. It is a 'mystery' in the sense that no human intelligence could have guessed what God intended to do in Christ, but it is now made known to Christians (cf. 3:3–6). Its content is 'the inclusion of the Gentiles as well as the Jews in a common human hope in Christ' and even more 'the unification of humanity in the Christ' (J. Armitage Robinson, St Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, 1904). In this light we should interpret the next verse. 10 The Greek verb translated to unite poses a problem; it recurs in Rom. 13:9 ('summed up'), which is our clue. Love is the all-embracing command which includes, intergrates and gives coherence to all other commands. Christ performs this role on a cosmic scale by gathering the fragmented parts of human life into a whole, so forming a uni-verse.

1:11–14 The Holy Spirit's ministry. 11, 12 Paul's mind turns to consider the process by which God's plan comes to effectual outworking in human lives. He joins together both himself (in v. 12), as representing the Jewish people who had long been sustained by the hope of Messiah's coming, and his readers who were of Gentile origin (v. 13; cf. 3:1; 4:17). Now in Christ these ethnic and religious connotations have lost their meaning inasmuch as both Jews and Gentiles are 'members of the same body' (3:6); but they did come into that body from different cultures.

13, 14 The way to Christ, however, is the same for both Jews and Gentiles. The outline is described in these verses. Hearing the word of truth, i.e. the gospel (cf. Col. 1:5) is the first step, to be followed by a trustful acceptance of Him of whom it speaks. The third term is that of 'sealing', which is associated with the promised Holy Spirit who indwells all those who have believed in him and who gives His own witness in terms of an assurance to the believer that he belongs to God's chosen people, just as Israel was God's inheritance under the old covenant (cf. Col. 1:12). The seal for Israel was circumcision (see Rom. 4:11). This may be why many commentators from the 2nd century onwards have taken the sealing here to refer to baptism as the outward attestation of the Christian's resolve to follow in the way of Christ and in the fellowship of His church. Others interpret it simply as referring to the gift of the Holy Spirit at conversion (cf. 4:30). This indwelling of the Spirit is again compared with Israel's experience (v. 14). She became God's elect nation by adoption and covenant but did not enter her full possession of the divine promises until the time of Joshua and the conquest of Canaan. The Christian receives the guarantee, the 'first instalment' (Gk. arrabōn) of the Spirit at conversion and awaits the final consummation of God's purpose.

Notes. 11 RV gives the more literal translation: 'in whom also we were made a heritage.' The same thought is continued in v. 18, and connects with the OT designation of Israel as God's inheritance (cf. Dt. 32:9). 12 Appointed also contains the notion of divine election (RV 'having been foreordained': the verbs 'chose' in v. 4 and 'foreordained' are coincident but have different nuances, as F. Davidson has shown in his Tyndale monograph, Pauline Predestination, 1946). 13 The verbs in this verse are also coincident in time. The actions of believing and sealing by the Spirit happen simultaneously (cf. Acts 19:2). The full experience of redemption, of which the Spirit's presence in the church is now a token (cf. 2 Cor. 5:5), awaits the fulfilment of Rom. 8:23.

1:15 – 3:21 THE CHURCH'S LIFE IN CHRIST

1:15–23 Paul's intercession for the church

In this section the apostle expresses his thankfulness that the readers have come to share in the blessings of God's saving plan; and he does so in his characteristic way as he prays for them (vv. 15, 16). The theme of his intercession picks up some equally characteristic Pauline thoughts which we can find re-echoed in his other letters, viz. a desire that his Christian friends may be grounded in the knowledge of God and His ways (vv. 17, 18); a confidence that they may lay hold more firmly upon the hope to which they have been called (v. 18); and above all, an assurance which he wants to share with them that God's power is available for their needs (v. 19). The signal exhibition of that power is seen in the mightiest of all God's acts in history when He raised Christ from the defeat of death and installed Him in His presence. This enthronement of the risen Lord (vv. 20ff.) not only confers on Him personal dignity and honour but also has far-reaching consequences for the world (which now receives a new Ruler) and for the church (which is given a sovereign Head under whom its life is secure).

15 This is the opening of what forms one connected, if lengthy, sentence which runs on to the end of the chapter division. From the way Paul writes it seems clear that he does not know his readers personally; and in this respect they compare with the Colossians (cf. Col. 1:3, 4; 2:1). But the news of their faith in Christ and its expression in active love to their fellow-believers has reached him at a distance; this interlocking of faith and love is a factor in Christian living by which Paul set a considerable store (cf. Gal. 5:6). 16 Paul's prayers are often expressed in language similar to this (see, e.g., Rom. 1:9).

17 The address and subject of this verse form the first part of his intercession as he calls upon God to grant the requisites for the acquirement of the most vital of all knowledge, viz. God Himself. These are the spirit of wisdom and revelation. Both terms are to be understood in an OT background (e.g. Jb. 28:12ff.; Je. 9:23ff.) and underline the biblical teaching that wisdom does not come by human ingenuity and cleverness in excogitating divine truth from man's mind but is the gift of God (cf. Lk. 10:21); and that revelation is the name for this gracious self-disclosure of God who always takes the initiative in this action. 18 He prepares human minds to receive the revelation; and this receptivity is expressed in terms of illumination. The second element in Paul's petition is now given: that to the illumined minds of his readers God would make known the hope to which he has called you (cf. 4:4, an identical phrase in the Gk.). God's calling is His summons to salvation (as in Phil. 3:14) rather than His appointing His servants to some specific task, though the latter idea is found elsewhere in Paul. A third constituent in the apostle's prayer touches upon the theme of the church's wealthy heritage as the people of God and looks both backward to 1:11ff. and forward to Paul's exposition of the church's enrichment by the exaltation of Christ. His inheritance is 'the inheritance from God the Father which Christians share with His Son Jesus Christ (Rom. 8:17)' (Foulkes, TNTC, p. 62). 19, 20 Two phases of Christ's elevation by God are in view: His resurrection (vv. 19b, 20a), and His subsequent enthronement (vv. 20b, 21). The power on which believers lay hold is that which was deployed in God's act in vindicating His Son (cf. Rom. 6:4) when men had done their worst. Thereafter He set Him in the place of world authority, which is what the pictorial at his right hand means.

21, 22 The lordly Christ is Master not only of the visible world of nature and men; He has command as well of all those spirit-forces which were regarded as controlling the destiny of men. Christ, Paul teaches, is Lord of all the cosmic agencies that men may care to name because He is both their Creator (cf. Col. 1:16) and rightful Ruler (cf. Phil. 2:9–11). His name excels all these forces, both in the present age and in the age to come, i.e. throughout the entire time-span of the universe. Nor is this all that is bound up with the vindication of Christ, for He has been accorded an authority by God to exercise a de facto rule over these spiritual powers which until His victory at the cross and empty tomb held men in bondage (cf. Gal. 4:3; Col. 2:15). He has put all things under his feet; here Christ is seen as the ultimate Adam who enters upon His promised reign as Lord of creation (cf. Ps. 8:6, which is interpreted in this way in Heb. 2:5ff.). Paul's thought thus reaches forward in anticipation of His final triumph (cf. 1 Cor. 15:25) which faith claims now as a present reality. Paul claims the unrivalled control of the Lord over the church as a fact of present experience. The Head-to-body relationship is found described in less detail in the earlier Pauline Epistles (cf. Rom. 12:4, 5; 1 Cor. 12:12ff.; Col. 1:18; 2:10, 19). In Ephesians the earlier hints and adumbrations are made explicit, as Christ's Headship over His body, the church, is spelled out in some exciting, if enigmatic, ways. The present verse contains the key-term, head . . . for the church, which S. F. B. Bedale (Studies in Ephesians, 1956, pp. 69f.) has shown carries the sense 'ruler of the church'.

23 The church is His body as the instrument of His purpose in the world. That much is plain, but Paul's emphasis here is rather to show that Christ has authority in His church, just as the head controls the movements of the human body (so 5:23ff.). The final phrase, though much controverted, confirms this, if we accept the more probable interpretation of the Greek participle here accordingly translated who fills. The question posed here is, Is it Christ that fills the church, or the church that fills Christ as His complement? Stig Hanson (in The Unity of the Church in the New Testament. Colossians and Ephesians, 1951, pp. 126ff.) has offered conclusive reasons for preferring the former alternative, concluding 'all that Christ has from God, the power, the gifts, the grace, He passes on to the Church . . . the Church has nothing to give Christ of herself, by which what is lacking in Him could be filled up. Instead, it is the Church that is filled with Him (3:19), becoming a partaker of all that He owns and is, for the purpose of continuing His work'.

Notes. 15 Some important textual authorities miss out and your love. E. F. Scott (MNTC) tries to construct an alternative meaning on the basis of this omission: 'your loyalty as manifested in your individual Christian lives and in your relations towards the church'. But this gives an unnatural sense to the Gk. pistis (faith which he takes as meaning 'fidelity'). 18 In the saints; better 'among the saints' (cf. Acts 20:32). 20 The OT 'testimony' or Messianic proof-text in mind here is Ps. 110:1. Exaltation at God's right hand connotes co-regency and the exercise of cosmic authority. 21 This division of time is based on a Jewish concept: 'The Most High created not one Age, but two' (4 Ezra 7:50; see also Mt. 12:32). 23 See NBD, art. 'Fulness'.

2:1–10 The church's history—past, present and future

This passage takes a broad sweep in its survey of the plight of human life outside Christ and untouched by the influence of His gospel (vv. 1–3) and then it goes on to relate the saving action of God in some of its vital (i.e. life-giving) applications as the life of God in Christ is brought into touch with the spiritual death caused by sin (vv. 4–6). The closing part of Paul's description (in v. 7) reaches into the future as he shows that God's work, begun now in this age, will gain in lustre in the coming ages, and that while salvation is a fact of past experience for the Christian (v. 5) it introduces the believer to a new way of life which stretches out into the future (v. 10). What God has begun to do for His people has an eternal dimension, in both the temporal (v. 7) and local (see 3:10) senses. His saving grace, present now, extends into the future; and also, enacted on earth by His saving historical events in Jesus Christ, it has repercussions which affect non-human agencies. Hence the double allusion (in v. 6 and 3:10) to 'the heavenly places'.

2:1–3 Humanity outside Christ. 1 The risen and exalted One (cf. 1:20ff.) has become the Giver of spiritual life (cf. 1 Cor. 15:45). This vivifying power is the prime need of men outside Christ who are dead. 'Death' in this sense has to be understood in the light of 4:18: 'cut off from the life of God' because of human alienation from God (cf. Col. 2:13 and Rom. 6:13, 23; 1 Tim. 5:6) and so standing under His just condemnation of sin, whose most deadly effect is that it separates God and man (cf. Is. 59:2).

2 A twofold characterization of society in Paul's day follows here, as Graeco-Roman life is viewed from a Christian viewpoint. Course of this world; lit. 'according to the age (Gk. aiōn) of this world-order (Gk. kosmos)', suggesting that human life is seen under the malign influence of celestial powers which hold man in a tyrannical grip (so Gal. 1:4; 4:3; Col. 2:8; Heb. 2:15). Prince of the power of the air. This description answers to the devil who, as ruler of the demonic agencies in the upper regions, controls human action by goading men into sin. In ancient cosmology the inter-stellar region, especially that between the moon and the earth, was thought to be the place of constant demonic activity, with baneful effects upon all earth-dwellers (cf. 1 Jn. 5:19). Disobedience was Satan's downfall (cf. Is. 14:12ff. which was widely believed by the later Jewish writers to be linked with Satan's rebellion against God). His rebellious spirit is still active in men who have pitted themselves against God in their blindness (cf. 2 Cor. 4:4). 3 The sad fruit of this disobedience to God's gracious will for mankind is seen in the moral turpitude of human society. Perhaps saddest of all descriptions is the solemn sentence: by nature children of wrath, i.e. under divine judgment by reason of moral choice which in turn is dictated by man's warped nature.

Notes. 1 Trespasses and sins are here almost synonyms (so H. Schlier, Der Brief an die Epheser, 1965). 3 Children of wrath is a Hebraism (= deserving of God's judicial condemnation). The verse gives no support for the doctrine of original guilt or for thinking of wrath as a fitful emotion.

2:4–6 Humanity in Christ. 4 The darkness of hopelessness and desperate need serves only as a backcloth to make the love and grace of God shine more brightly. 5, 6 The evidence of that loving concern of God who does not leave man to perish in his own deserved plight is seen in a double action. He has both made alive the spiritually dead and raised up those who were held down by the servitude of that same death. Both verbs are found together in Jn. 5:21 and Rom. 8:11; and this context confirms the view that both actions are uniquely predicated of God (as in the OT and the synagogue liturgy, where it is God alone who can both quicken and raise up the dead), but with this distinction that while in the OT teaching the raising of the physically dead is in view, here it is a spiritual renewal that is stressed. The former hope of resurrection is clear elsewhere in Paul (e.g. 2 Cor. 4:14). The best parallel to Paul's thought here is one by contrast, viz. Gal. 3:21. The very thing which the law cannot do—give life to those dead in their alienation from God—is achieved in the gospel (cf. 2 Cor. 3:6). And this promise is bound up with Christ's own resurrection which, in turn, was followed by His exaltation; so believers are lifted with him to a new plane of living, sharing His life (so 1 Cor. 6:17).

Note. 4 The richness of divine mercy stands in contrast to the sentence of doom passed on a fallen creation (v. 3). Paul exults in the love of God, as in Rom. 5:8; the past (aorist) tense of loved focusing on the specific act of His giving His Son.

2:7–10 What it means to be in Christ. 7 The purpose of God's action in lifting the church out of the condemned realm of sin and death is one which only the future will disclose. For it is with the consummation of His redemptive plan in the coming ages that the full extent of His bounty will be known.

8 Paul's summary of past, present and future is epitomized in this creed-like, pregnant sentence. Salvation is complete (hence the perfect tense) in the sense that no defect or inadequacy mars God's purpose; it originates in the grace or saving love of God expressed to sinners; and it enters human experience by the receptivity of faith or trustful acceptance. Indeed, the whole process is God's doing (as 2 Cor. 5:18 insists), not man's; and it comes to him as a freely-offered gift (cf. Rom. 6:23). 9 The reason why there is no room for a human contribution is given: lest any person should make a proud claim, thus subverting the divine sovereignty (cf. 1 Cor. 1:29–31).

10 Salvation sola gratia, sola fide (by grace alone, by faith alone) can be misrepresented, as Rom. 6:1ff. makes only too painfully clear. Paul's teaching is travestied when righteousness of living and a high moral tone to life become forgotten on the mistaken assumption that Christians can live carelessly, for if they sin their lapses only give the grace of God more room for display. Hence the call now to good works, not as a ground for claiming God's favour (denied in v. 9), but as the necessary consequence of their new life in Christ as His new creation (cf. 2 Cor. 5:17). Tit. 2:14 is the best commentary.

Notes. 7 Coming ages: the plural is non-significant (M. Dibelius, revised by H. Greeven, An die Epheser, HNT, 1953). 8 On the relation between grace and faith, see Rom. 4:16. This is neuter in the Greek and cannot look back to faith (Gk. pistis, a feminine noun), however true it may be that we come to believe only because of God's prevenient or causative grace. It is the whole process of salvation that forms the antecedent to the word 'this', as in 2 Cor. 5:18. 9 Boast; a pivotal Pauline term in his salvation teaching. Comparing the LXX's references in Ps. 97:7 and Is. 42:17 we can show that boasting in idols means trusting in them; and this self-confidence (which Paul would consider no better than idolatry) is the antithesis of a self-distrust which casts itself wholly upon God and His mercy; so Phil. 3:3–11. 10 Having rebutted a moralism which trusts in 'works' (as in Rom. 4:1ff.; Gal. 2:14ff.), Paul turns to an equally pernicious danger: libertinism which throws off all moral discipline. The contrast with vv. 1–3 is striking, for while unredeemed man lives according to his nature, the Christian lives according to his (new) nature, for which God has prepared him by inserting him into the realm of grace (so C. Masson, L'épître de S. Paul aux Ephésiens, 1953).

2:11–22 The unity of the church

A new section begins with v. 11 and these verses form an extended exposition of the theme of the church's essential oneness in spite of the barriers of race and culture which kept the Jews and the Gentiles apart in the ancient world. The kernel of Paul's argument is in 1 Cor. 12:13; Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11; and these verses offer an elaborate extension of the unity theme stated earlier. It is this fact of an elaborate discussion which has suggested to some scholars that Paul is using material drawn from Christian worship (especially baptismal hymns) in order to spell out fully the importance of the church's unity (cf. 1 Cor. 12:13 for the 'one Christ – one baptism' lesson, as in 4:4ff.).

The centre of the discussion is v. 14: 'he is our peace, who has made us both one'. It combines the elements of the surrounding verses, viz. the enmity between Jews and Gentiles has been cancelled; the disparate sections of the 1st-century world are now called to a harmony in the fellowship of the church; and both Jews and Gentiles, having lost their ethnic and cultural identity, gain something in return which is far better—a place in Christ's body. They thus form a new race of men, and are privileged to enjoy an access to God which they could never know in their previous and unreconciled state.

2:11–13 The Gentiles before and after Christ's coming. 11, 12 The appeal is directed specially to the non-Jews who were the apostle's readers in this letter. They were classed by the Jews as 'uncircumcised' because they stood outside God's covenant in a threefold way. To the Jews the condition of the Gentiles was a. characterized by a lack of Messianic hope. Indeed, the usually-attested Jewish hope of Messiah's coming entailed the destruction of the Gentile foreigners or at best their subjugation to Israel; b. one of deprivation in that they did not share in the privileges and advantages of belonging to the most favoured nation; c. described by the saddest of all misfortunes, viz. an ignorance of God and so a denial of hope which can only be engendered by a knowledge of the living God and His presence in the world. 13 With Christ's coming a new era has opened for them.

Notes. 11 Gentiles in the flesh means 'Gentiles because of not having the marks of circumcision on your bodies'. Uncircumcision (Gk. akrobystia, lit. 'foreskin') was, in the OT, the equivalent of being outside God's covenant with Israel (cf. Je. 9:26; but this verse points forward to a distinction within Israel which Paul was later to elaborate in Rom. 2:25–29). 12 The commonwealth of Israel. The right of citizenship within the elect nation is meant (so Masson), a sense confirmed by v. 19. The covenants of promise are those solemn assurances of Israel's destiny given to the patriarchs (cf. Gn. 15:18; 17; 26:2ff.) and to Moses (cf. Ex. 19:5, 6). Paul sees these covenant promises fulfilled in Christ and the church (cf. Gal. 3:16ff.). Without God; not in the sense of denying His existence (there were few atheists in the ancient world), but, as Gal. 4:8 explains, as ignorant of the one, true God (cf. Acts 17:22ff.).

13 Two expressions—first, but now, answering to 'at one time' (v. 11) and 'at that time' (v. 12); and second, in Christ Jesus, which fills the lack suggested in the phrase 'separated from Christ' (v. 12)—show how the Gentiles' position has changed with their inclusion in the covenant of grace. The contrast far off . . . brought near is borrowed from Is. 57:19, LXX; and the means by which the underprivileged Gentiles have come into the inheritance is Messiah's death. So the intention of this verse which is explained in detail (see on vv. 14–18) is to show how, in transforming radically the state of Jews and Gentiles before God, Christ has transformed their mutual relations (so Masson).

2:14–18 Jews and Gentiles are now one body—in Christ. 14 Peace carries a double sense. In uniting sinners to God by cancelling the enmity set up by sin (v. 16b) Christ has brought Jews and Gentiles together in a unity and amity otherwise unknown in the 1st-century world. Reconciliation is the application of Christ's work in His breaking down the dividing wall of hostility between the two rival groups, as in Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11. That wall which set up hostility is best understood as the Mosaic law and its scribal interpretation, which both protected Israel by keeping her separate from the other nations, and prevented the Gentiles from having access to God because of Judaism's particularism

(so Masson, Schlier: see the Notes below for other possibilities of background to this cryptic phrase). This view is confirmed if in v. 13 far off means that the Gentiles were kept at a distance from Israel which alone was a people near to God (cf. Ps. 148:14).

15 The key-thought of the whole passage is one new man in place of the two, i.e. one Christian church instead of two ethnic groups of Jews and Gentiles separated by an 'iron curtain' of animosity. The way by which this reconciliation is accomplished is now set out. Jesus as Israel's Messiah abolishes the law by fulfilling it (cf. Mt. 5:17), and vicariously endures the penalty of that law which the Jews had broken (cf. Gal. 3:10–13; Rom. 8:3). He also brings in a new age of righteousness on a basis quite independent of law-keeping (cf. Rom. 3:21ff.) and because it has this character the Gentiles are as much the beneficiaries as the covenant people of Israel (so Gal. 3:14, clearly). He is the Creator of a new race in which the age-old distinctions of Jew and Gentile have lost their relevance and force. 16 The one body can hardly be a reference to the crucified body of Jesus. The sense is more likely that when He died His purpose was to embrace the disparate sections of humanity in that saving deed and in reconciling men without distinction to God to kill the hostility which up to that point had kept them apart and at war.

17 He came in the person of His apostolic messengers who carry the gospel of peace (cf. Rom. 10:15) which is freely offered to all races, both Gentiles afar off and Jews formerly God's chosen race. 18 The experimental token of the reality of the 'one new man' is shown in the freeness of access to God by the Holy Spirit who is the author of unity within the church (so 1 Cor. 12:13).

Notes. 14 Peace recalls the description of Messiah as 'Prince of peace' (Is. 9:6). The Hebrew word for 'peace', šālôm, means much more than an absence of hostility, like an armed truce; it connotes well-being and security at every level. Both; i.e. both Jews and Gentiles together. Mark the recurrence of this term (vv. 14, 16, 18). The dividing wall; the commonest illustration of the imagery behind this phrase adopted by commentators is the Temple balustrade which separated the Court of Gentiles and the Court of Women, referred to by Josephus (Ant. xv.11; Jewish War v. 5). This fence with its warning inscription served to remind the Gentiles that they must keep their distance from Israel's sacred shrine (cf. Acts 21:27ff.). This barrier, the verse declares, has been broken down in the sense that access to God is no longer restricted to Jews. Another suggestion looks to Gnostic images of a wall which separates the aeons and divides the heavenly plērōma from the earthly world as the most suitable background to this verse. The thought, then, is that the Gnostic redeemer's re-entry from the terrestrial to the celestial regions has opened a way by which his followers may gain access to the plērōma. But the barrier in the text is a vertical one denoting a division between two groups of people resident in this world rather than a horizontal division between the upper and lower world. And the verb has broken down more naturally refers to a vertical structure. The suggestion that the wall which caused hostility (taking the second term as an explanation of the first) is an allusion to the Mosaic law finds confirmation from the teaching of the Letter of Aristeas, 139, and from the wording of this verse where the demolition of the wall is explained as the abolishing (i.e. rendering void) of the law's enactments which, in the rabbinical view, served to isolate the Jew from his neighbour. The law's abrogation was necessary for the creation of a universal church.

16 Cf. Rom. 7:4. The hostility spoken of is either that between God and man (cf. Rom. 5:10) or that between the two races (as in v. 14); but possibly both ideas are in the writer's mind.

2:19–22 The one church on the one foundation. 19 The promise here cancels out the disability under which Gentiles suffered (cf. v. 12). Their admission to the church implies no second-class status within the covenant community, but full membership as fellow citizens with the saints (here probably meaning Jewish–Christians, as often in the Acts); both classes then constitute, as a single entity, the household of God, as members with equal rights and privileges. 20 The church as a house (cf. Heb. 3:6) means in Paul that the church takes over Israel's vocation as God's holy house (cf. 1 Cor. 3:10, 16), i.e. His Temple. This is endorsed by v. 21. Christians are then likened to living stones (as in 1 Pet. 2:5) built into the framework which, in turn, rests upon a foundation which is Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 3:10) and which is laid by the apostles and prophets (so NEB). It is their witness to Christ which God uses to build up the edifice (cf. 1 Tim. 3:15). 21 The result of the church's being settled on a foundation-stone and growing as a living organism (Paul's verb brings in a change of metaphor) is that a holy temple is taking shape as a consequence of the apostolic mission (cf. 4:11–16). 22 The dwelling-place is realized in the formation of a spiritual community in whom His Spirit dwells (cf. 1 Cor. 3:16).

Notes. 19 On the experimental ground of a common fellowship with God (at the Lord's table?) Gentiles are not debarred from any of the privileges which belong to members of God's household. 20 The Greek is ambiguous. Apostles and prophets (prophets in the NT church are intended, as in 3:5; men like Agabus, Acts 11:27ff.; 21:10; cf. Acts 13:1–3; 15:32) could conceivably constitute the foundation of the church (as Rev. 21:14) in the sense that they were the primary and unique witnesses to the saving events of the gospel and later became inspired interpreters whose literary deposits are found in the NT. But NEB: 'the foundation laid by the apostles and prophets' gives a preferable alternative. Christ's designation as corner-stone (Gk. akrogōniaios) is also capable of diverse interpretation. The best view is that taken by G. H. Whitaker (Expositor, VIII, 1921, pp. 470ff.), who argues on the basis of Is. 28:16 for the meaning 'corner-stone' by which the architect determines the 'lie' of the whole building. See, too, R. J. McKelvey, NTS, 8, 1961–2, pp. 359ff. 21 Jewish expectation (especially at Qumran) looked for a new Temple. 22 Dwelling place of God: cf. Ex. 15:17; 1 Ki. 8:13.

3:1–21 Paul's apostleship and his prayer for the church

Paul held his commission to be Christ's special messenger to the Gentiles in high regard; and the calls to service recorded in Acts 9:15, 16; 22:21; 26:17 brought together the twin elements of a vocation to be an apostle to the Gentiles and the warning that this task would not be undertaken without personal risk and exposure to danger. These same notes are sounded in this chapter (vv. 1, 2, 8 are a glad acknowledgment of his special ministry to the Gentiles; v. 13 is a reminder of his suffering on their behalf). The autobiographical introduction merges into a statement of the content of his preaching in the light of the special destiny which he was charged to fulfil (vv. 3–6), viz. that his apostolic ministry to the Gentiles is based on the place which they have in the economy of God's saving purpose for the world through the church (vv. 9–11). The personal note creeps in again as an interlude (vv. 7, 8), and is resumed as Paul offers a memorable pastoral prayer for the Christian congregations in the world (vv. 14–19), concluding with an equally notable ascription of praise (vv. 20, 21).

3:1–6 Paul's calling and how he understood it. 1 The apostle's own name, coupled with his writing in the first person singular and his self-description as a prisoner for Christ Jesus on behalf of you Gentiles, is intended to give emphasis to the prayer which will follow in vv. 14ff. In fact, there is no verb to follow his name until that section, which is introduced at v. 13. The passage, therefore, of vv. 1–12, is a statement of his ministry with his name standing at the head of it. 2 Paul writes to a company of believers to whom he is unknown (cf. 1:15), but who are certain to have heard that he was well known in the churches as the apostle to the Gentiles (cf. Rom. 15:16; Gal. 2:7). 3 He came to understand the truth of God's intention early in his Christian life (see the references in Acts given above); and the mention of this revelation harks back to the Damascus road encounter and its sequel (cf. Gal. 1:16).

4 The mystery (cf. 1:9) is the divinely revealed truth which relates to the inclusion of the Gentiles in a church wherein all barriers of race are broken down (cf. 2:14, 17, 18). 5 Earlier periods of history, even within the life of the Jewish people, failed to recognize the embracing purpose of God, although hints had been given as, e.g., in the promise to Abraham which Paul exploits in his argument with the Judaizers at Galatia (cf. Gal. 3:8, 9). What was once hidden and unrecognized—viz. that there should be one, holy, catholic (= universal), apostolic church—is now entrusted to the preachers of the Gentile mission by the Holy Spirit. 6 The content of this truth, of which Paul himself was the chief custodian as a teacher of the Gentiles (cf. 1 Tim. 2:7), is spelled out clearly by the use of a triad of terms all of which have the same prefix (Gk. syn); so J. Armitage Robinson aptly translates 'the Gentiles are co-heirs, concorporate, co-partakers of the Promise'.

Notes. 3 Have written (Gk. proegrapsa); the tense of the verb would be classed as epistolary aorist, i.e. the writer puts himself in the place of his readers at the time when the composition is actually read by them. So the notion of an earlier letter (as suggested by E. J. Goodspeed, The Meaning of Ephesians, 1933) is not required; and Paul has in view what he has just written (so Schlier, citing for briefly Heb. 13:22; 1 Pet. 5:12). 5 The apostles and prophets are Christian leaders (as in 2:20), and the force of holy (cf. Lk. 1:70; 2 Pet. 1:21) is not to invest them with an aura of sanctity—a trait of a later age, and so taken by some scholars as a mark of the lateness of this Epistle in its witness to 'incipient catholicism'—but to distinguish them from the sons of men (i.e. mankind in general). 6 By contrast with 2:12, 19a the Gentiles are now sharers in all the blessings promised to the Jews (cf. 1:18). Partakers here stands also in contrast with the negative use of the same term in 5:7.

3:7–12 Paul's calling and how he fulfilled it. 7 For the fulfilment of his God-appointed service (cf. 2 Tim. 1:11) Paul, like all who are called to Christ's service in His church in every age, needed the gift of divine grace (cf. Phil. 1:7).

8 In a telling snatch of autobiography and self-revelation Paul confesses to his own inadequacy and need, yet rejoices in the supply of God's power to enable him to accomplish his task of preaching to the Gentiles a message which he describes as one of unfathomable wealth (cf. 1:18), viz. that 9 all men may be enlightened by the unveiling of God's plan, once concealed (cf. v. 5) but now brought out into the light. 10 The church on earth is the witness to and the vehicle of this revealed 'mystery'; and the hostile angelic powers are not only held in wonder at this but their death-knell is sounded with the proclamation that God in Christ has decisively acted for cosmic salvation and so brought their malign régime over human life to an end (see on 1:21, 22).

11, 12 God's age-old plan is thus realized in a proof to which Paul has earlier alluded (cf. 2:18), the confident approach of the reconciled to God the Father through the Christ whose victory spells the end of the devil's control over man's destiny.

Notes. 8 The Greek is a reinforced superlative: 'the most insignificant of all God's people', a self-confession written out of his painful recollection of his past persecution of the church (cf. 1 Tim. 1:13). If the sight of his past infamy flashed at that moment before his mind's eye, this may explain a phrase often regarded as 'calmly deliberate, even self-conscious, and a little theatrical' (C. L. Mitton, The Epistle to the Ephesians, 1951). 9, 10 Hidden for ages is usually taken in the time-sense ('from all eternity' is F. F. Bruce's translation), but the reference to God as Creator of all things, together with v. 10, suggests that Paul may be speaking of God's plan as a mystery concealed from the angelic intelligences ('the aeons') and made known to them only to sound their defeat (so 1 Cor. 2:8; Col. 2:15). Certainly later in this letter (see 6:12) Paul will write realistically of the church's conflict with these (potentially defeated) enemies. To these cosmic forces God's wisdom in Christ's cross displays His manifold (lit. 'multi-coloured') wisdom—to dazzle them the more because of its sheer simplicity and apparent weakness (cf. 1 Cor. 2:6ff.). 11, 12 But this 'weakness' of God (cf. 1 Cor. 1:25) which allowed His Son to be crucified by the design of these agencies was the divine strategy, the triumphant purpose of which is displayed in Christ enthroned (1:20, 21) and in the church given through Him grace and access. Christians are reminded that 'they owe to Jesus Christ their Lord the distinctive characteristics of their new spiritual state' (Masson) by faith in him.

3:13–21 Paul's prayer for the church. 13 RSV offers one possibility of translation out of many (see Notes) because the Greek is cryptic and compressed. In any event, Paul is requesting the prayers of his readers partly on the ground of the freedom of access to God which they, as Gentiles, now enjoy, and also because they have a special place in his ministry, for he is 'their' apostle. He knows that he can confidently count on their intercession.

14, 15 The opening words take us back to v. 1 which they complete. God's fatherhood is the archetype of all family life, but the exact nature of His fatherly relationship in this context is not clear. Jewish literature spoke of two aspects of divine fatherhood: 'the chief family', i.e. the angelic world (a reference which would explain every family in heaven) and 'our family', i.e. Israel. The phrase on earth is best understood in this light, as Paul's bold appropriation of a title proudly claimed by Jews but which he reinterprets in the light of 2:18. Both Jews and Gentiles now make up God's family in the fellowship of a united church.

16, 17 The content of this petition is twofold: a. the empowering of the Spirit whom Paul calls in to fortify the Christian's 'inner life' especially under trial (cf. Phil. 1:19; Col. 1:11; and 2 Cor. 4:16 for the phrase); b. the indwelling of Christ who comes to make His home in the believer's heart. The two verbs to be strengthened and may dwell are parallel, and so there is no great difference between the action of the Spirit on the inner man and Christ's habitation in our hearts. The indwelling Christ is the assurance to the Christian of moral strength (cf. Phil. 4:13). Certain consequences follow from the fulfilment of the apostle's prayer which has, as its frontispiece, a combination of metaphors which are found together at Eph. 2:21 and Col. 2:7. Rooted is a horticultural term denoting the firm bed in which plants are set; grounded (from the Gk. verb themelioō; cf. Gk. themelios, 'foundation', in 2:20) borrows from the language of architecture and ensures a strong base on which a superstructure rises. Love is both the soil in which the plant thrives and the firm ground on which the building rests.

18, 19 Comprehend . . . know. The two verses combine verbs of apprehension, the objects of which are a. God's redemptive plan in all its richness and profundity (hence the quadratic dimensions, breadth, length, etc.); and b. Christ's love of which this redemptive plan is the consummate expression; indeed, so amazing is that love which God's purpose for His church in the world reveals that it eludes our full grasp. It surpasses knowledge, yet at the same time beckons us on to a progressive experience as we are more and more filled 'up to the measure of' (Gk. eis) God's fullness.

20, 21 The doxology celebrates the church's confidence that God is both able and willing to do all that Paul's prayer asks for; indeed, by the use of a rare adverb abundantly (Gk. hyperekperissou; a translation like 'infinitely more' as popularly used brings out the sense) Paul knows that God's intention is to exceed by His answer even the far-reaching petitions of his prayer and the aspirations which have prompted them. The secret of this confidence is that God's power is at work in the church in which His fullness dwells by the presence of Christ (cf. Col. 1:27). Fittingly, at the conclusion of this lofty thought, praise is ascribed to God who is present both in Christ (uniquely, as the embodiment of His deity; cf. Col. 2:3) and the church (as Christ's body, intimately associated with Him; cf. 1:23; 4:15, 16; 5:30). But for Paul in this letter Christ and His church are not two separate entities but so closely conjoined that it would be permissible to write of one corporate whole, Christ-in-His-church. It is because of this indwelling and empowering presence that glory can be offered to God eternally.

Notes. 13 The exegetical difficulty centres on the proper subject of the verb lose heart. Is Paul praying that he himself will not become discouraged (see RSV mg.)? Or is he praying that they may not be despondent because of his imprisonment on their behalf (cf. 3:1)? Some scholars argue for the second meaning on the (dubious) ground that the pronoun 'you' (Gk. hymas) has fallen out of the text by accident. 14 Jews normally stood to pray (cf. Mt. 6:5; Lk. 18:11, 13); kneeling for prayer was a sign of great urgency and distress (see the discussion in the present writer's Carmen Christi, 1967, pp.

264f.). Father is the distinctively Christian name for God, derived from Jesus' use of the Aramaic 'Abbâ ('dear Father') (cf., e.g., Mk. 14:36). 17 The verb dwell (Gk. katoikeō) looks back to 2:22 ('dwelling place', Gk. katoikētērion). 18 Saints; i.e. 'all God's people' (NEB); no special class of Christians is intended. Nor does Paul know of any private mystical experience in isolation from the company of believers. 20, 21 Cf. doxologies in Rom. 16:25ff.; Heb. 13:20, 21; Jude 24f. God's glory is here reflected in the church's worship; Eph. 5:27 (the church in its glory) gives the complementary thought.

4:1 - 6:9 THE CHURCH'S LIFE IN SOCIETY

4:1–16 The church's vocation as Christ's body

So far in his address to his Gentile congregations Paul has expounded the way in which God's purpose was conceived and executed. This intention of God to have Jews and Gentiles as one people united to one Head, Christ, began to be actually realized chiefly through Paul's mission, and he has here looked back on the accomplishment of it during his life-time of Christian service. But the ideal of one Head – one body needs an empirical application to the churches made up of ordinary men and women in the Graeco–Roman world. So from the exposition of his 'ecclesiology' in which he has had the ideal relation between Christ and His people in view, Paul now turns to the practical outworking of this ideal in everyday living. His writing takes on a practical purpose as he sets before his readers the guidelines of Christian conduct and deportment in the world. But before he gets to grips with details he must first give an over-all picture of what is to be the church's calling in the world. This is the theme of vv. 1–16.

The characteristic note is struck in v. 1 as he calls them to be true to their destiny in the light of a. their place within a church which by definition is one (vv. 2–6); b. yet unity does not mean a monochrome, dead-pan uniformity which would be true if the church were a thing, an inert object. But the church is an organism, pulsating with life and made up of living persons who are responsible for growth of character and personality, according to their use of the gifts which Christ has bestowed (v. 7); c. His purpose is that His church shall reach 'mature manhood' (v. 13), and towards this end He has provided gifts to be exercised through His servants (vv. 8–12); d. the church's progress should therefore be marked by a growth out of infanthood into maturity as it takes on the character of its Head, Christ (vv. 14–16).

4:1–6 The church's calling in the light of its unity. 1 The Christian's calling is God's summons answered at conversion (cf. Phil. 3:14); and his response is to be worked out in his subsequent behaviour. Worthy (cf. Phil. 1:27) shows the connection between God's plan and the Christian's acceptance of it in terms of his daily living. See too Col. 1:10; 1 Thes. 2:12, for the same ethical incentive. 2 Cf. Gal. 5:22, 23. 3 Two matters are stated here, both significantly connected with church fellowship. There is a unity which the Holy Spirit creates; and Christians have a responsibility to cherish it by their harmonious relationships (in the bond of peace).

4–6 The Holy Spirit's gift of unity to the church is further defined in a series of creed-like formulations, all of them being given emphasis by the repetition (seven times) of one. Moreover, the three parts of v. 4 are matched by corresponding partners in the next verse, thus forming a triad of couplets: one body, the church, answers to one Lord, the church's Head; one Spirit inspires one faith as He calls men to acknowledge that Jesus is Lord (cf. 1 Cor. 12:3) and baptizes them into one body (cf. 1 Cor. 12:13); one hope that belongs to your call—a call, acceptance of which was marked in the early church by participation in the one baptism. After this 'trinity of unities' Paul seals this credal statement with a Trinitarian allusion to one God who is known in His self-revelation as Father above all, Son through all (the use of the preposition here answers to the same idea of mediation in 2:18), and Spirit who is in all the family of God. Cf. 1 Pet. 1:2 and NBD, art. 'Creed'.

Notes. 3 The unity of the Spirit should be understood as 'unity which the Spirit makes possible' by His gift and activity (so v. 4 and 1 Cor. 12:13). The church's task which requires diligence is to guard that oneness already imparted by the Spirit and implied in their being one body of Christ (see 1 Cor. 1:10ff. for a NT illustration of a forgetfulness of this fact). The means by which the unity is preserved is stated: it is made fast (NEB) by the bond which God's peace in Christ's reconciliation has established (so Hanson, p. 149; cf. Eph. 2:17). 5 This triad is often regarded as a baptismal creed, confessing the one Lord (over against the polytheism of the pagan world which the new convert renounced; cf. 1 Cor. 8:6), one faith (which is the act of believing as in Eph. 2:8, leading to the substance of the confession—in its most elemental form, 'Jesus Christ is Lord', but later expanded—made in baptism), one baptism (in contrast to the lustrations of the pagan mystery religions or Jewish proselyte baptism, or possibly a deviationist baptism like that practised by John's disciples near Ephesus; cf. Acts 19:1–7). 6 One God picks up the OT and Jewish creed of the unity of God (cf. Dt. 6:4; 1 Cor. 8:4; 1 Tim. 2:5) but Christianizes it by the addition of Father revealed in Jesus and applied to us all (i.e. Christians), though us is a scribal addition absent from the best texts and probably has crept in from 1 Cor. 8:6. Nonetheless the following all is in every case to be understood as a personal and not a neuter reference (so Masson).

4:7–12 Christ's gift and the church's gifts.

7 The singular gift is the key to this difficult passage. Paul has in mind the part which all Christians are to play in the life of the church; there are no exceptions (so 1 Cor. 12:4ff.), for all in the body of Christ as His members are endowed with some gift-by-grace (Gk. charisma). And it is the ascended Lord who bestows these gifts by first sending His gift par excellence, viz. the Holy Spirit (cf. Jn. 7:39; 20:22; Acts 2:33). 8–10 The quotation from Ps. 67:19 (LXX; EVV Ps. 68:18) is adapted to produce a reading which closely follows the Syriac version known as the Peshitta: 'Thou didst ascend on high, and take captivity captive; and thou gavest gifts to men'; and a similar version in the Aramaic Targum (i.e. paraphrase of the OT text) shows that the sense of 'He gave unto men' was an old Jewish interpretation on which Paul is evidently drawing in this citation. The apostle's application of this text is to Christ's ascension. Scholars are divided over the logical connection between the descent and ascent of Christ (see Notes). Following G. B. Caird, we prefer the view that Paul's sequence is that Christ's ascent (cf. Lk. 24:49ff.) is followed by the descent of the Spirit at Pentecost when, in the realistic sense of 2 Cor. 3:17 (cf. Jn. 14:15–18), the Lord returned to earth, laden with gifts for His church. Acts 2:33 speaks of the Holy Spirit as the gift of the exalted Lord; and it is He who has given to the church all the varied ministries which serve to upbuild the church's life (vv. 11, 12). Christ's enthronement over the universe is the guarantee that nothing needful for the church is lacking (exactly the sense of 1:22, 23).

11 Paul's emphatic pronoun (Gk. autos) should be brought out: 'And it was He—the One who fulfilled the prediction of the Psalm—who gave.' The 'grace-gifts' of v. 7 are now spelled out in terms of the church's ministries, with apostles and prophets in first place (for the reason given in 2:20; cf. 1 Cor. 12:28). Evangelists are men like Philip (cf. Acts 21:8) and Timothy (cf. 2 Tim. 4:5) in the apostolic church, though the term denotes a function more than an office. The construction of the phrase pastors and teachers with one definite article covering both words suggests that there were two functions shared by the same individuals whose chief task is described in Acts 20:28. These men would be local congregational leaders in charge of established churches brought into existence by the preaching of the apostles and others (cf. Acts 14:23 where 'elders' corresponds to those addressed in Acts 20:17). 12 The bestowal of Christ's gifts of the ministry has a specific purpose in view, viz. that all God's people (the meaning of the saints) may be equipped by the functions which God's servants perform in order that they in turn may discharge their service as Christians in the world; and so by the complementary functions of both a regular ministry, ordained and appointed by the Head of the church, and of the rank and file of the church, Christ's body may be edified. Only on the basis of this rendering can we do justice to the subtle use of prepositions and make sense of such admonitions as 1 Thes. 5:11–13 and Heb. 13:17 as well as the calls to respect the pastoral office in the letters to Timothy and Titus.

Notes. 7 The grace here is not an allusion to 2:8, but rather to the Spirit's gifts as in Rom. 12:3ff.; 1 Cor. 12:4ff. 8 Paul's text reads he gave (Gk. edōken) for the LXX 'thou didst receive' (Gk. elabes). Other possibilities of explanation are given in E. E. Ellis (Paul's Use of the Old Testament, 1957, pp. 15f.). The Targum mentioned above reads 'thou (i.e. Moses) hast given it (the Torah) as gifts to men'. G. B. Caird's view (stated in Studia Evangelica, II, i, 1964, pp. 535ff.) is built on the following assumptions: a. that AV's addition of 'first' (in v. 9) is to be rejected, as it must be on insufficient textual grounds; b. that the lower parts of the earth refers to a coming from heaven to earth (so NEB) and not to a descent to the underworld; c. that Ps. 68 has a Pentecostal setting as a psalm appointed to be read in the Jewish liturgy at Pentecost or the Feast of Weeks which in later Judaism celebrated the giving of the Law. As Moses brought down the Torah as God's gift, the exalted Christ at Pentecost came down as the Spirit and brought gifts to His church. 12 The punctuation in RSV is to be noted; and it is clear that of the three practical results mentioned, the last two are dependent on the first. NEB reads: 'to equip God's people for work in his service, to the building up of the body of Christ.'

4:13–16 The church's path to maturity. 13 'The unity of the Spirit' (v. 3) is a present possession, but the unity of the faith is clearly here an object of hope one day to be attained. The work of the ministers who are Christ's gift (vv. 11f.) has this end in view, viz. that the church will be upbuilt until its final state is reached. That goal is denoted by the phrase mature manhood (Gk. anēr teleios, 'complete man') and is reached as Christians make progress in their united (we all sounds the death knell of all party spirit and factiousness) apprehension of the riches which are theirs in Christ. The connecting word and is best understood as explanatory so that the unity of the faith consists in a deeper insight (Gk. epignōsis which RSV translates knowledge) into Christ Himself as the embodiment of God's treasure (cf. Col. 2:3 and Eph. 1:18; 2:4; 3:8) and the supplier of the church's needs as its Head (cf. 1:22, 23). Christ's care for His people promotes their growth and ensures that they develop into a stature which is measured only by the fullness of Christ, i.e. by the availability of His grace and resources which are made over to the church and which aid its growth until it reaches His designed end, which is a fully completed church embodying all His fullness (cf. the parallel thought in Rom. 11:25, 26).

14 Certain tests of the church's increasing maturity are given: Christians will no longer remain infantile (Gk. nēpios which is the opposite of teleios in v. 13), nor be lacking in stability when storms rage against them (the Gk. participle translated tossed to and fro suggests the picture of the church as a ship battered by angry seas; cf. Lk. 8:24), nor led astray into false teaching which heretical leaders will seek to promote. 15 By contrast, the church will maintain the truth (better than RSV speaking the truth which is only one sense of the verb) in its resistance to pernicious propaganda and will grow up in love as it conforms its life more and more to that of its head, Christ Himself. 16 Guided by Col. 2:19 we may interpret the line of thought as the church's growth into Christ in the sense that it derives its life from Him who supplies all its need. The growing is both from and towards the Head; this striking paradox should put us on our guard against expecting a neat, logical analogy between Christ's body and the human body. What can be seen is that a. Christ's body is made up of many members (cf. Rom. 12:4, 5; 1 Cor. 12:12) who, although different in obvious ways, yet are connected to the one body (i.e. the universal church, likened in 2:21 to a holy temple built by many stones); b. the church grows by the action of Christ on its behalf; and He exerts a unifying action on the body by means of His work through every joint which He supplies. This last thought takes us back to v. 11 and makes possible the equation of every joint with Christ's gift of the ministry; c. by this chain-reaction of Christ – His servants – His people the whole body is edified as love becomes the 'atmosphere' in which this process of mutual encouragement and responsibility is exercised, with each part of the church playing the role appointed for it. Christ the Head imparts His risen life and bestows by the Spirit His gifts of ministries; His servants fulfil their mission by equipping the saints (v. 12) and by being the ligaments of the church's cohesion to Christ and one another; Christ's people making the contribution (the meaning of Gk. meros, RSV part) needful for Christ's design to be realized for the body's upbuilding and growth into Him.

Notes. 14 Cf. 1 Cor. 2:6; 3:1. Paul had been accused of cunning ways (cf. 2 Cor. 4:2) and in rebuttal he gives a notable statement of his clear motives, so different from those of the false teachers here condemned. 15 Speaking the truth (Gk. alētheuontes) means 'dealing truly' (RV mg.) and the following phrase in love may be taken with the words grow up.

4:17–32 The Christian's personal conduct

One form of ethical challenge in the NT is based on the contrast between the old life, characterized by pagan ways, and the new outlook and behaviour pattern which Christians accept at their conversion and baptism, which should therefore mark a clean break. 2 Cor. 5:17 states this contrast clearly; elsewhere it is expressed by the phrase 'no longer . . . but now'. Here its practical implications are pressed home with great effect by an appeal couched in the form: 'Put off the old nature . . . put on the new nature'; and Gal. 3:27 roots this call in the baptismal experience.

This section of the letter in which Paul turns more specifically to the actual congregations of the Gentile churches illustrates in detail this type of moral appeal. Formerly his readers adopted the only way of life they knew, viz. the pagan outlook and practice (vv. 17–19). But at conversion they exchanged—for many of them in a dramatic renunciation—these evil practices and took on a new deportment which vitally affected their character and manners. Vv. 28–32 vividly recall the change with an insistent summons not to relapse into former ways. The 'put off . . . put on' form of appeal is explicitly expressed in the terms Paul uses (vv. 22–25), and has an obvious, pointed application to Christian conduct which exemplifies the new life imparted by the living Christ to His people.

4:17–24 Some principles which govern Christian conduct. 17 The Gentile way of life is painted in some sombre colours which recall Rom. 1:18–32. Paul fastens here on the root cause of the idolatry and excesses which disfigured life in the 1st-century Graeco-Roman world: the futility of their minds; cf. Rom. 1:28 which uses the same Gk. word nous of a 'depraved reason', which 'leads them to break all rules of conduct', NEB; and God's provision for this 'depravity', i.e. being turned aside from His truth, is given in v. 23 (cf. Rom. 12:2). 18 Two consequences follow. Unregenerate man has his understanding (i.e. of spiritual realities; Gk. dianoia; cf. the same word, 'mind', in 2:3) darkened, and he suffers alienation from God caused by his culpable ignorance of God and refusal to submit himself to God; this process of resistance leads inevitably to a deadness and insensitivity to God, called by Paul hardness of heart. 19 Man's relationship with God as a sinner has its direct repercussions on his daily behaviour and his relations with his fellow-men.

20 The Greek implies a contrast, not represented in RSV. 'But that way of life doesn't fit in with a life in Christ', begun when you became His disciple (learn Christ means this). 21 'Just as you heard in the preaching of the gospel and in the instruction you received in the fellowship of His people.' 22 The last part of v. 21 may (accepting C. A. A. Scott's suggestion, Christianity according to St Paul, 1961 ed., p. 36) be connected with this call to abandon old ways. The old nature which dictated the tendencies of believers' former manner of life (cf. 1 Pet. 1:18) is the willing victim of a seduction which appeals to it and leads it into evil desire; and this seduction is made all the more easy because man's nature in Adam is twisted and so a prey to evil.

23 The summons to put off the old nature as a suit of clothes is shed may sound like a counsel of despair, for fallen man is in helpless plight. But Paul's appeal is to Christians who have known the renewal of the Spirit which, begun decisively at conversion, is a process to be continued. Hence the present tense of his admonition which calls upon his readers to be renewed in their minds (answering the need stated in vv. 17, 18) by the action of the Holy Spirit. 24 Grace, as nature, abhors a vacuum. To divest oneself of evil habits is not enough; this must be followed by the donning of the new nature, imparted at the new birth by the Spirit and to be increasingly recognized as the dominant moral force in the Christian's life as he faces an inner conflict (cf. Gal. 5:16ff.). The new birth and the Spirit's control restore the image of God broken by sin (cf. Gn. 1:27), and so give back to man the sinner, now redeemed by Christ and renovated by the Holy Spirit, what he lost in Adam, viz. righteousness (i.e. a right relationship with his Creator) and holiness (i.e. a requisite for fellowship with a holy God) demanded by the truth of God.

Notes. 17 Futility may be the apostle's estimate of idol-worship as the veneration of lifeless vanities (cf. Acts 14:15, which picks up the OT condemnation of worthless idols; cf. Ps. 115, etc.). 18 The ignorance here is not an intellectual deficiency, but a wilful refusal to know God and to honour Him (cf. Rom. 1:21). 19 Given themselves up; the converse of Rom. 1:24, 26, 28. Greedy represents a Greek noun (pleonexia) often linked with immoral ways (cf. 1 Cor. 5:10, 11; 6:10; Col. 3:5), and this may be the sense here especially as licentiousness (NEB 'vice') and uncleanness have been mentioned. Cf. 5:3 for the same association of pleonexia (there translated 'covetousness') with irresponsible sexual excesses. 23 The reference to the spirit is better taken as pointing to the Holy Spirit's work; cf. similar wording in Tit. 3:5.

4:25–32 A continuation of Christian social ethics. 25 Paul here begins a section which applies to concrete situations the principles stated earlier. Opposed to truth-telling which is the mark of a character fashioned in likeness to God (v. 24) is lying, which has to be discarded. Two reasons are implicit: a. lying is condemned in the OT (Zc. 8:16 is quoted in Paul's words) and b. failure to honour one's word leads to a breach of Christian fellowship because it breeds distrust and suspicion, and so destroys the common life in the body of Christ (cf. Rom. 12:5).

26 The force of Paul's language is: 'In your wrath—provoked by the presence of evil and injustice—don't give the devil a loophole by persisting in it.' He is again turning to the OT (Ps. 4:4, LXX) for illustration, and adds a comment to show how Christian indignation must be kept in firm check. Personal pique and outbursts of emotional temper are not in view (see v. 31); rather Paul is thinking of a provocation caused by a miscarriage of justice (as in 2 Cor. 11:29). But even then, such proper indignation must not be allowed to simmer until it becomes a fixation. 27 For the devil uses all devices, even by exploiting our good intentions and social concerns, to bring the church into disrepute (hence his name here is diabolos, 'slanderer', in place of the more usual Pauline preference for 'Satan'; 2 Cor. 2:5–11 gives an apt example of how he works in this way).

28 Let the thief renounce his occupation (cf. 1 Cor. 6:10, 11) now that he has become a new man in Christ, and has a social conscience for the needs of the poor, especially within the fellowship of his new circle (cf. Gal. 6:10).

29 Words are an index of character (cf. Mt. 12:33, 34. The Greek word 'bad' (sapros) is the same as Paul's evil talk). Good words may be tested by this criterion: do they build up the hearer's character and make him a better man for having heard our speaking? Do they meet his need (as fits the occasion is a paraphrase of this requirement; cf. 5:4 for the negative side)? And do they in this way 'bring a blessing' (so NEB) by supplying that need? 30 Foul or inappropriate language is not only an insult to the hearer; it saddens the Holy Spirit by wounding Him and denying in practice the meaning of His indwelling and sanctifying presence in the believer, which is a token of his final redemption (cf. 1:13, 14).

31, 32 Mention of the misuse of the tongue leads on to a full statement of vices to be avoided and virtues to be cultivated, with the use of the spoken word running through all these admonitions. Malice (Gk. kakos, 'evil') is the parent of the unhappy brood of earlier terms. But, as befits that new quality of life in Christ (Gk. Christos), the Christian should seek to be kind (Gk. chrēstos) with a compassionate and forgiving disposition which is based on the simple but amazing fact that this is the disposition which has been shown to him in God's forgiveness, offered in Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 5:19 for the sense of this phrase).

Note. 32 The positive injunctions are amplified in Col. 3:12ff.

5:1–20 The Christians' conduct in the world

If a change of perspective and proportion may be rightly detected, this section of social ethics moves away from the Christians' behaviour within the church fellowship (described both in principle and by precept in 4:17–32) and relates that conduct more to their bearing and actions in the world around them. From this standpoint we may pick out some of the salient features of Paul's guidance. He is addressing his readers as God's children (v. 1) and God's chosen people (v. 3: their vocation is one of sainthood), but both these descriptions need the qualification that their lives are set, not in isolation from the world of men, but in the midst of a society which is alien to God (cf. 1 Jn. 2:15–17) and hostile to the Christian spirit (cf. 2 Cor. 6:14ff.). Hence the warning of v. 6: 'Let no one deceive you' and the call of v. 7: 'Do not associate with them.' The antidote to these viruses to which the body of Christ in the world is exposed is hinted at by Paul in a number of his references in this section.

In addition to the ethical maxims we have already noted Paul recalls the churches to their God-appointed destiny as children of light (v. 8) who, at baptism, have been brought into the full light of Christ (v. 14 contains a snatch of a baptismal chant); as followers of wisdom whose practices show up the folly of an immoral and materialistic society around them (vv. 15ff.); as men and women whose lives reflect a dependence on God and who turn to Him in grateful acknowledgment of His goodness (vv. 4, 20 repeat a characteristic Christian response in thanksgiving, both in private life and public worship, v. 19). In all, the Christian life is shown in this section as possessing a distinctive pattern, intended to be both a challenge to and a rebuke of contemporary society. But Paul offers no mandate for Christians to contract out of the world as though they were ascetics or fanatics.

1, 2 Forgiveness within the family of God (cf. 4:32) is but one aspect of what life ought to be like. For Christian character finds its pattern and exemplar in God Himself, the Father (cf. 3:14, 15; Mt. 5:48). Beloved children finds its natural sequence of thought in a reference to the Father's well-beloved Son (cf. 1:6; Mk. 1:11, etc.) who in turn demonstrated His love for the church (cf. 5:25) as well as His loving acceptance of the Father's will, which included the cross, by His sacrificial death. His self-offering at Calvary pleased the Father as an acceptable offering (cf. Ps. 40:6, 7) and has the effect of eliciting from Christians a desire to 'live in love' to Him and their fellow-believers.

3, 4 This astringent ethic reflects the need for the church to retain its identity in the 1st-century world and by the purity of its life (as saints; see on 1:1) to give no countenance to the immoral practices which were the accepted norm of Graeco–Roman society. Silly talk (Gk. mōrologia) and levity do not condemn light-hearted merriment or good-humoured fun; but, in association with filthiness (i.e. coarseness of speech), refer to slanderous name-calling (the best commentary on mōrologia is Mt. 5:22 which repeats the sneering remark, 'You fool' (Gk. mōre), which incurs a fearful penalty) and flippant buffoonery which goes beyond the bound of good taste. On Christian lips the note of praise to God is more appropriate.

5, 6 A clear statement of warning, drawing upon accepted Christian teaching (cf. 1 Cor. 6:9, 10; Gal. 5:21; Heb. 13:4; Rev. 21:8; 22:15). Covetous may have in mind immoral excesses (as in v. 3) which are produced when men live for the gratification of their appetite and so become idolaters (exactly the sin of Phil. 3:19: 'appetite is their god', NEB). No distinction is to be drawn between the kingdom of Christ and that of God. The serious consequences of playing fast and loose with God's moral law speak for themselves; and Paul found it needful to spell out this warning in view of contrary views to which Christians were listening: Let no one deceive you. Whether these sentiments are directed against pagans who were urging believers to do what they did or misguided Christians (like the antinomians of Rom. 6:1ff. who had perverted Pauline teaching) cannot be decided. Sons of disobedience is an OT expression for men of disobedient character, i.e. by their wilful infringement of God's law (cf. Rom. 1:32).

7, 8 They are what Christians formerly were—children of darkness; but by God's grace the church has been brought into the light (cf. 1 Pet. 2:9). The calling of believers is then to live as children of light, i.e. true to their place in God's family. Again Paul is drawing upon common Christian teaching (see Rom. 13:12; 2 Cor. 6:14; 1 Thes. 5:5; cf. Jn. 12:35f.; 1 Jn. 1:5f.); and the contrast of light and darkness runs through this section up to v. 14. 9 A parenthetic note added to show what are the qualities of living in the light. 10 This 'intention to please God in all things' (as William Law phrased it in his Serious Call) is a Pauline ethical rubric often found: cf. Rom. 12:2 (the will of God which is well-pleasing to Him); 14:18; 2 Cor. 5:9; Col. 3:20; 1 Thes. 4:1. It is a reminder that Christian ethics cannot be stereotyped as a legalistic 'bundle of prohibitions' but in essence represent a positive ambition to be pleasing to a loving God whose character His children long to share (5:1).

11, 12 Not only do Christians steer clear of evil practices and pursuits; they have a responsibility to show up by a contrasting way of life the nature of the world around them and its culpability. So expose is explained by 13 exposed by the light, i.e. Christians as children of light in the world (cf. Phil. 2:15) cast an illuminating beam into the dark corners of human society where evil practices are conducted in the darkness of secrecy (a veiled hint at immoral and magical pursuits in the pagan world?). Christian influence has a reproving effect as Christ's light shines 'not merely "to display", but "to show to be evil", so that we do best to keep to the rendering "to correct", especially as deeds and doers are closely related' (Büchsel, TDNT, ii, 474). Cf. Jn. 3:20. 14 The encouragement given in these verses is backed home by the citation of a hymn of three lines:

> 'Awake, O sleeper,
> From the grave arise.
> The light of Christ upon you shines.'

Clearly the setting of this exhortation is baptism, known in the later church as 'enlightenment' and depicted as the rising of the convert from the death of sin to union with the living Lord (cf. Rom. 6:4ff.). Paul harks back to this experience as a reminder to his readers to fulfil now their baptismal profession by walking in Christ's light and by stirring themselves to active witness.

15–17 This witness is now the subject of Paul's admonition, which here takes a positive turn. In the earlier verses (3–13) his directions have been mainly negative, warning the churches of the threat of complicity with evil in the world. Now he issues a call to wisdom which is set over against the folly of a pagan environment. The path taken by wise men has to be understood on its OT background where wisdom is not an intellectual achievement, but an attitude to life which begins with a knowledge of God and an avoidance of all that displeases Him (cf. Jb. 28:28; Ps. 1; Pr. 4:5ff.; 8:1ff.). The practice of wisdom in everyday conduct involves a. a buying up (Gk. exagorazomenoi—a commercial term straight from the market-place (agora); the prefix ex denoting an intensive activity, a snapping up of all the opportunities which are available) of every chance of making the most of the time (cf. Rom. 12:11, NEB mg.); b. a recognition that the days are evil, probably as days which precede the final crisis of the end of the Age (so E. F. Scott); c. a call to self-knowledge in the light of God's will, which is the outstanding mark of a wise man who lives in fellowship with God (cf. 2 Tim. 2:7).

18 Another sign of wisdom is the maintenance of self-control which sees the danger of intoxication through which the vigilance of the moral censor is lifted and a gate is opened to immorality. In a daring contrast Paul goes on to apply the lesson: let the infilling you seek be not of wine but of the Spirit; and as drunkenness is a common occurrence in the world around you and over-indulgence in wine a daily experience, let the fullness of the Holy Spirit be your constant preoccupation (Gk. plērousthe, 'be filled', is in the present tense). 19, 20 One hallmark of the Spirit's filling will be a desire to give vocal expression to the heart's devotion to the Lord by the use of canticles and songs which the Spirit inspires. In this way Christians both edify one another (hence addressing one another) and give vent to their emotional stirrings by the spiritual exercise of thanksgiving to God. Paul has a congregational assembly (as in 1 Cor. 14) in mind; and this recalling of the scenes of their corporate worship is a bridge which links the ethical teaching of these verses with what follows in his letter.

Notes. 2 AV's 'sweetsmelling savour' gives a more literal translation which shows the link with the Mosaic sacrifices so described (e.g. Ex. 29:18, 25). 3 Paul's reticence to name certain vices stands in contrast with present-day trends of a permissive society. 'Western culture, in all the mass-media, calls a spade a spade with a crudity that is corrupting. The present age has a filthy tongue' (G. Johnston, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians and Philemon, CB, 1967).

7 Do not associate (Gk. synmetochoi) with them is a sentence obviously framed to stand in contrast with 3:6. Christian detachment from the evil-doers arises from the prior commitment which has been made to Christ in the fellowship of His church. The closest parallel is Paul's teaching in 1 Cor. 10:14–21. 8 Children of light was a self-description claimed by the people of the Dead Sea Scrolls in their hatred of 'the sons of darkness'; and their withdrawal to the Qumran monastery was a protest movement, for which the NT ethical teaching offers no parallel. 11 See on v. 7.

14 It is said (lit. 'he/it says': attempts to trace this verse to an unwritten saying of the Lord or an OT quotation are not successful; the introduction must be, 'Therefore it—the hymn—says'). The following words are rhythmical and arranged so as to form a rhetorical device of assonance at the end of lines one and two. The summons to awake and be quickened into life in response to Christ's call, answered at baptism, is best taken in a metaphorical sense; but one suggestion gives a futuristic application by relating the call to the parousia when the returning Lord will summon His people to the resurrection. Paul uses this eschatological hope to call Christians to their present duties (as in 1 Thes. 5:1–11).

18 Do not get drunk with wine quotes Pr. 23:31 (LXX), a vice equally reprobated in the list of Gal. 5:19–21. The positive injunction poses a nice difficulty in translation. Paul's Greek is compressed. ' "By the Spirit" is too precise; "in the Spirit" is too vague. We propose: "seek the fulness which the Spirit gives" ' (Masson). 19 Cf. Col. 3:16. The classification of these terms into OT psalms, Christian hymns used in early church worship, and songs employed by the heavenly worshippers (cf. Rev. 5:9; 14:3; 15:3) is too neat. Probably distinctively Christian compositions are intended for all three types. Full discussion of the background here and the place of this rubric in the development of church worship is offered by the present writer in Worship in the Early Church, 1964, chs. 4 and 12.

5:21 – 6:4 Christ, the church, and the family

Mention of the church at worship invites a consideration by Paul of the place of women, first in the church service and then, as a natural sequel, in the family relationship with their husbands and children. From this opening statement of the true ordering of the husband-wife relationship Paul proceeds to appeal to the analogy of Christ and the church, using Gn. 2:24 as a text applicable, first to human relations, but also—and for him more significantly—prefiguring the nuptial union between the heavenly Bridegroom and His bride the church, which is one with Him (v. 31). In this correspondence between the Christ – His church and man - woman relationship four lessons are drawn: a. Christ is the Head of the church, His body; and in the ordering of creation man occupies the place of headship over woman (cf. 1 Cor. 11:3; 1 Tim. 2:13); b. Christ requires the obedience of His people who are rightly subject to Him (v. 24); and the inference is made that the wife too is to be submissive to her husband in all things (v. 24) and not simply in the ordering of public worship (to which v. 22 seems naturally to refer); c. Christ has set His love upon the church and shown the extent of that love in all He has done for the church's redemption (vv. 25ff.); while much of the foregoing belongs uniquely to the Christ - church relation the chief point is made in v. 28: let husbands love their wives with a love that is akin to His love; d. Christ who looks upon His church as a part of Himself, as His body, cares for it (vv. 29, 30); in the marriage bond too the husband has a responsibility for his spouse. V. 33 sums up the Pauline discussion, the emphasis on 'respect' in that verse answering to the emphasis on 'reverence' (the same word in the Greek with a change of grammatical form) in v. 21.

5:21–33 Marriage in the light of the sacred marriage of Christ and the church. 21 This verse belongs as much to the preceding section as to what follows; it is a bridge between the two passages. The submission (Gk. hypotassomenoi) belongs to the description given of the structure of the church at worship (cf. 5:19, 20) when the presence of the Lord was powerfully felt (1 Cor. 5:4 gives one example of what out of reverence for Christ meant). It also carries over into 22 which has no verb in the Greek, but clearly 'be submissive' is understood. The background may, however, still be that of congregational worship in view of the use of the same verb in 1 Cor. 14:34; and the cognate noun in 1 Tim. 2:11 may indicate that that passage too is to be seen in the light of the place of women members of the congregation. 23 The first correspondence in the analogy is drawn. Headship belongs to both Christ and man-as-a-husband (Gk. anēr is used, not the generic term for man, anthrōpos; but the usage is not hard and fast, as the occurrence of anthrōpos in the quotation in v. 31 shows). Christ is also the church's Saviour. The verb underlying 'Saviour' (Gk. sōzō) in 1 Tim. 2:15 may suggest the meaning that Christ preserves the church; and that thought would prepare for vv. 29, 30 in the analogy. 24 In everything extends the limited reference of the submission given in v. 22 by inference.

25 The true meaning of obligation, expressed by the verb rendered be subject in the earlier verses, is now made plain; it is an obligation in love. The husband's love is patterned on that greater love of Christ for His bride (for further references see 2 Cor. 11:2, 3; Rev. 19:7ff.; 21:2). The background here is OT. Paul in particular is drawing upon Yahweh's marriage with Israel described in Ho. 2:16; Is. 54:4f.; 62:4f.; Ezk. 16:7f. in the light of the rabbinic practice of eulogizing the covenant at Sinai as a marriage between Yahweh and His people. The Torah became the marriage contract, with Moses as the one who led the bride to God. Christ's relationship to His bride, the church, is for Paul one further way of saying that the Torah-age has given place to the new Age of Messiah's fulfilment. The apostle now plays the part of the law-giver Moses in leading Christ's spouse to Him. (See NBD, art. 'Bride, Bridegroom'.) The heavenly Bridegroom's actions for His bride are traced back to His love and self-giving on the cross (Gal. 2:20 combines the same verbs). 26 The purpose and effect of His work for the church are given in terms of sanctification, i.e. the church is taken out of the sphere of sin and placed in that of holiness. The means by which this is accomplished is cryptically described as having cleansed her by the washing of water with the word. 'This washing . . . can scarcely be anything other than baptism' (F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Ephesians, 1961), the allusion to the word being understood as the convert's affirmation of faith, mentioned in Acts 22:16 and illustrated in the question-and-answer dialogue of Acts 8:36ff., RSV mg. Examples of this baptismal interrogation in the later church are given in the writer's Worship in the Early Church, pp. 60f. 27 looks forward to the ultimate realization of His purpose when the Bridegroom comes to claim His bride (cf. Rev. 19:7, 9). Then the church will attain its full splendour as holy and without blemish (cf. Col. 1:22).

28 The application of the teaching is now made. The strange wording as their own bodies used of the husbands' love of wives probably is explained by the desire to keep close to the analogy: Christ loves His body, the church. 29 Two verbs are borrowed from the nursery with a possible OT background (e.g. Is. 1:2). Both nourishes and cherishes (cf. the same word in 1 Thes. 2:7) mean great solicitude and as used of a husband's care of his wife imply 'protection, affection and tangible and practical maintenance' (Masson). Similarly Christ cares for the church. 31 A citation from Gn. 2:24 (slightly different from LXX) is taken by Paul to mean Christ and the church. Jesus used this OT verse (in Mk. 10:7f.) to establish the permanent nature of the marriage bond; Paul, following the insight accorded him into the nature of the church (cf. 3:4 which also speaks of the mystery, i.e. God's plan for the world through the church; cf. 1:9) applies the text analogically to the union, not of man with woman, but of Christ and His body which is one with Him. 33 The line of reasoning adopted by Paul and stated in v. 32 accounts for the conclusion. He is arguing from the Christ - church relationship to the human marriage tie, not vice versa. This is why he 'never tells wives that they are to love their husbands. . . . The reason is that which he gives: Christ loves the Church, but it is for the Church to obey and submit to Christ' (C. Chavasse, The Bride of Christ, 1939, p. 77).

Notes. 26 Sanctify carries here a pregnant sense (= 'consecrate by committing the life to God') as in Jn. 10:36; 17:17; cf. Je. 1:5. It points to the commencement of the Christian life; and the following reference to baptism agrees. The washing of water recalls Tit. 3:5, but more especially 1 Cor. 6:11 where washing and sanctification are side by side.

6:1–4 Family duties. 1 Attention is switched to family relations as children are called to accept their place in obedience to parents. It is right, i.e. in line with God's will (as in 4:24), that they should. 2 A further reason is supplied by this quotation from Ex. 20:12 with which is coupled

3 an adaptation of Dt. 5:16, possibly influenced by Dt. 22:7. The first commandment means either that this is the first requirement of the Decalogue to have a promise attached or that first is not a reference to numerical order but is used adverbially = 'a very important commandment' (cf. 1 Cor. 15:3 where the word is rendered 'of first importance'). 4 A father's duties are displayed both negatively and positively. First there is a warning against irritating children (by nagging at them?) and so leading to their exasperation; then an injunction to train them in the disciplinary education (Gk. paideia is properly education by discipline; nouthesia is education by word of mouth) of the Christian life (of the Lord means this).

6:5–9 Relations of masters and slaves

This section of Paul's 'household code' deals with a very real problem for 1st-century Christians in their social responsibilities, viz. the way slaves were to accept their status, and the treatment Christian slave-owners were to give to slaves in their control.

5 The call to obey, not to revolt (a suicidal action, unsuited to the 1st-century world of the Roman Empire where slavery was established by law), is the hallmark of the NT generally. Instead the sting is partly drawn from this inhuman institution by the slaves' attitude as Christians. As to Christ sounds a distinctively Christian note, thereby transforming all work and recalling Mt. 25:31ff. 6, 7 The same thought is repeated in the play on words as slaves of Christ (RSV mg.), who serve Him by doing the will of God from the heart, i.e. not in a dilatory or listless fashion, and with a good will, i.e. with an eagerness 'which does not wait to be compelled' (J. A. Robinson). 8 Present opportunities of service point forward to the future when Christ will assess the worth of the Christian's life at His judgment-seat (see Rom. 14:12; 1 Cor. 4:5; 2 Cor. 5:10). 9 Slave-owners too are bidden to act in a way which befits their Christian calling, with a caution against an overbearing disposition and a reminder that, though they are masters (Gk. kyrioi) of their slaves, they too have a heavenly Master (Gk. kyrios) who cannot be bribed or corrupted in any way. Col. 3:25 uses the same idea of impartiality of treatment as part of a call to slaves not to exploit their Christian owners – a slant perhaps inspired, as E. Percy suggests (Die Probleme der Kolosser- und Epheserbriefe, 1946), by the case of Onesimus who had cheated and run away from his master Philemon at Colossae.

Notes. 7 With a good will (Gk. met' eunoias). Dibelius-Greeven cite an interesting commentary on this phrase from a papyrus dated a century or so later than Paul in which a slave is set free in his master's will because of his 'cheerfulness and affection' in service rendered. Not all slave-owners were the monsters of popular imagination, however degrading the principle of the institution seems to us today. 9 Partiality; i.e. favouritism which can be bought. The OT is Paul's authority here (e.g. 2 Ch. 19:7).

6:10–24 CONCLUSION

6:10–20 The Christian's warfare and the apostle's plea

In this concluding admonition the actual situation of the church in the world is faced with a call to steadfastness under trial and a summons to prepare for conflict. The enemies Paul has in mind are, however, not simply the human agents which oppress the churches; behind them he sees the malign forces of evil. Demonic powers can be faced only with heavenly aid which God places at the Christians' disposal by the provision of His armament (v. 13). This panoply is listed in a description drawn from the equipment worn and used by the Roman soldier ready for battle. A representative soldier may well have been at Paul's side as he wrote or dictated this letter, for he speaks of himself as 'an ambassador in chains' (v. 20). As a Christian apostle he looks to his friends in the Asian churches to stand by him with their prayers, for he is a special target of attack and so in special need of the encouragement which their intercessions can bring (vv. 18, 19). In particular, he wants to be faithful in the discharge of his apostolic work (v. 20; cf. 3:8, 13).

10 The two exhortations set side by side interpret each other. 'Find your strength in the Lord, in his mighty power' (NEB). The Greek words are all variants of the idea of power, and recall a similar piling up of synonyms in 1:19. 11 The battle motif is now introduced, as the Christian lives as it were in a no-man's-land between the opposing forces of God and the devil. He is called to align himself with God and against His enemy by wearing the armour which God Himself wears (as the sources of Paul's thought in Is. 59:17 and Wisdom of Solomon 5:17–20 make clear). Moreover the devil in his capacity as 'slanderer' (Gk. diabolos) is the sworn foe of the church which cannot be neutral in any case (cf. Rev. 12:10), in view of the evil machinations (Gk. methodeia; both here and at 4:14 translated wiles) of the devil and his minions.

12 Paul lifts the veil over the church's struggle in the world. The struggle is not against human powers (flesh and blood: see Mt. 16:17 for the phrase in this sense) but is directed against the real power behind the persecutors on earth, demonic agencies which also were the prime movers in the events which led to Jesus' death (cf. 1 Cor. 2:8). The spiritual hierarchy of evil is described in some detail: principalities, powers are the terms used elsewhere for the orders of creation of which Christ is both the origin and the head (cf. Col. 1:16), but they are thought of here as having detached themselves in rebellion against the cosmic Lord and so as being in active opposition to Him and His people. World rulers belong to the same company but the derivation of the term (which is not found in LXX) is uncertain. The Rabbis used a Semitic form of the term to denote the angel of death; and later Gnostics within Christendom applied the word to the devil. Paul's word is plural and denotes evil forces which are implacably opposed to the church as darkness is opposed to light. This contrast picks up the earlier teaching of 4:18; 5:7ff. with its stark antithesis. The final phrase in this cluster of malevolent agencies is the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places. The nearest parallel is 2:2; and in both texts the church's conflict is seen to be located in the upper air regions (Gk. en tois epouraniois). But this precise region is also the sphere of Christ's rule (cf. 1:20), the consequent fountainhead of God's blessings upon His people (cf. 1:3), and the place where the wonders of what God is doing through the church are being made known (cf. 3:10). In spite, therefore, of the tremendous hostility from demonic powers which the church encounters the assurance is given in this phrase that because 'these powers are competing against God' (G. H. P. Thompson, The Letters of Paul to the Ephesians, etc., CBC, 1967) they are doomed to failure and defeat.

13 Because of the church's confidence in its struggle against a foe which already is under sentence of doom—this is the logical connection of therefore—the Christian soldier is bidden to take up his battle position with high courage, standing his ground in the evil day, i.e. in an age when the pressure of persecution against the church mounts (cf. 5:16). Having done all carries the natural sense of a total preparedness in the light of a fresh onslaught of evil, but a secondary meaning (attested by Herodotus) of 'having defeated all' is just possible; the all will then look back to the spiritual hosts of v. 12. The important part is clear: get ready for battle and be ready when the fighting breaks out.

14 The clarion call to alertness involves the soldier's ability to equip himself adequately. But as the armour is God's (v. 11), no provision is lacking. Paul, using the model of the Roman soldier on duty, draws an implication from each piece of armament. The belt is a sign of active duty; the miles accinctus (Lat. cingulum = 'belt') is the soldier at the ready. The breastplate imagery is taken from Is. 59:17 with Paul's reference to righteousness following the prophetic sense of vindication and action which redresses all wrong. 15 Feet equipped with shoes for marching (Lat. caliga) also recall Is. 52:7 as an OT allusion, and in the light of Rom. 10:15 may suggest a promptitude of service in evangelistic endeavour. 16 Above all is ambiguous in English as in Greek (en pasin). Does it mean 'with all these' (NEB) or 'to cover all parts of the body'? The latter idea is certainly possible because it is matched by Paul's choice of scutum (shield, the Latin term behind his Gk. thureos) for the soldier's defence against all the flaming darts thrown by the devil (2 Thes. 3:3, RSV mg.). The scutum 'was a large quadrangular shield devised to catch and extinguish ignited arrows' (Thompson); and in the spiritual warfare it is a shield of faith in God's final victory, already achieved in principle by Christ's resurrection and exaltation over all evil powers (cf. 1:20–22).

17 Two further items of equipment are mentioned: helmet of salvation is drawn from Is. 59:17 where Yahweh wears this on His head as He goes forth to vindicate His oppressed people. The Rabbis, however, applied this to Messiah's work and Christian interpretation of the OT may well have followed suit, as we know was the case with a similar passage in Is. 11:1–5. Taking the helmet, then, means availing oneself of all that Christ in His saving work offers. The sword is wielded with cutting power when the word of God is preached (here Is. 11:4 seems in view; it describes Messiah's conquest as in Rev. 19:15). Cf. Heb. 4:12. The Greek rhēma theou, rendered the word of God, by the omission in the Greek of definite articles suggests a LXX usage, where the term relates to some words spoken by God. An apt illustration of what this verse implies is seen in the temptations of Jesus who, 'full of the Holy Spirit', met the enemy's insinuations with some appropriate part of Scripture which became to Him the sword of the Spirit (cf. Lk. 4:1–13).

18 Although having no counterpart in a soldier's equipment, prayer and supplication are evidently intended to be included in Paul's list. The link-thought is the Spirit who inspires Christian prayer (cf. Rom. 8:26ff.) here defined as prayer in general (Gk. proseuchē) and prayer as the offering of some specific request (Gk. deēsis). The same terms are brought together in Phil. 4:6 and 1 Tim. 5:5. Paul spells out one object of Christian supplication, viz. for all the saints who form God's people of the new covenant (cf. 1:1). The call to intercession for fellow-Christians requires both a watchfulness and a resolution (Gk. proskarterēsis; the cognate verb 'to persevere' is found in Acts 1:14; Rom. 12:12; Col. 4:2 in a similar context). 19 A personal plea, re-echoed in 2 Cor. 1:11. But here it is directly connected with the apostolic ministry committed to Paul as apostle to the Gentiles (cf. 3:1). He asks for co-operation in prayer that his ministry of proclaiming the mystery of the gospel (explained in this letter as the uniting in one church of both Jews and Gentiles) may be fulfilled. 20 For such a task he needs above all courage in time of trial (cf. Phil. 1:19ff. for a similar request in similar circumstances) as a prisoner whose witness will not be muted. He is Christ's ambassador (cf. 2 Cor. 5:20) but enjoys no diplomatic immunity. Quite the contrary; he is in chains (Col. 4:18).

6:21–24 Personal remarks and final greeting

Vv. 21, 22 contain 'the most extensive verbal connection' (Dibelius–Greeven) between Ephesians and Colossians; and Col. 4:7, 8 should be compared. Tychicus is to be the informant of Paul's immediate circumstances to the Asian churches; and he is warmly commended with the apostle's excellent character reference. By bringing news of Paul's situation in Rome he will put fresh heart into these Christians.

The letter which opened with a salutation of grace and peace now closes with the same terms in inverse order and with the addition of love and faith. The final grace embraces all believers in its scope, especially its first readers and its readers in every age.

21 The unusual you also has posed a difficulty, for Paul seems to have another group in mind with whom he is linking the addressees of Ephesians. F. Foulkes accounts for this allusion and for the close correspondence of wording with Col. 4:7f. by the 'supposition that the apostle wrote the two conclusions together, when both letters had been written and were about to be despatched' (TNTC, p. 23). What I am doing is not to be taken literally. NEB captures the Greek idiom with 'how I am', i.e. 'how I am getting on', in colloquial English. Tychicus is described as a faithful minister (lit. 'helper', or, if the Gk. diakonos carries its technical sense, 'minister', as in 3:7. But the latter meaning is not certain). 22 I have sent him too literally translates the Greek 'epistolary' aorist tense (see on 3:3). NEB improves with 'I am sending', i.e. Tychicus is to be the bearer of the letter to its destination; and he will be able to give a personal report of the apostle's condition and so encourage the churches.

23, 24 The closing greeting is slightly longer than in other Pauline letters (cf., e.g., Phil. 4:23) and of a more general character by the use of an impersonal term (the brethren) instead of the normal 'you'. Paul ends on his favourite note, with a prayer for God's grace to be with the universal church described as all who love our Lord Jesus Christ with love undying. The last three words in RSV represent the Greek en aphtharsia, literally 'with immortality'. This 'immortality' could go with grace as the theme of Paul's prayer for his readers (so NEB), but the order of words is against this view. Dibelius–Greeven suggest a different interpretation by taking the preposition locally: the Lord Jesus Christ who (lives) in imperishable (glory). In support Jas. 2:1 as well as 1 Tim. 1:17 may be quoted; and the solemn character of the conclusion is another reason for accepting this view. The Epistle which began with the church's blessings 'in heavenly places' (1:3), where the enthroned Christ rules (1:20) and to which He calls His people (2:6), concludes fittingly on the same note.

Philippians

INTRODUCTION

PAUL, PHILIPPI AND THE CHURCH THERE

Before 360 BC a small Thracian village stood on the site of later Philippi. The city was founded and its name was given by Philip of Macedon, the father of Alexander the Great, who realized the strategic nature of the site. Philippi came into the hands of the Romans after the battle of Pydna in 168 BC, and subsequently became part of the Roman province of Macedonia. In 42 BC Antony, after he with Octavian had defeated Brutus and Cassius, settled some of his disbanded veterans in Philippi, making the city a 'colony'. Then in 30 BC, when Octavian had defeated Antony and Cleopatra at the battle of Actium, he sent further 'colonists' from Italy to Philippi, to make room nearer home for the settlement of his own war veterans. A Roman 'colony' was like a little piece of Rome abroad. The Latin language was used; Roman law controlled local administration and taxes; many aspects of public life went on as in Rome itself; most of the officials had the same titles as in Rome. The strong consciousness of the privileges of Roman citizenship in Philippi is seen in Acts 16:20f., 35–39 and probably reflected in the Epistle in 1:27 and 3:20. In the 1st century AD Philippi could be described not only as 'a Roman colony' but as 'the leading city of . . . Macedonia' (Acts 16:12), though Thessalonica was the actual capital of the province.

Paul must have been well aware of the strategic significance of Philippi when he came there, on his second missionary journey, and thus preached the gospel for the first time in Europe. He came (together with Silas and Timothy), as Acts 16:9f. tells us, in response to his vision in the night of 'a man of Macedonia . . . standing beseeching him . . . , "Come over to Macedonia and help us." ' At Philippi Paul found no synagogue, but a small group of women gathered 'on the sabbath day' at 'a place of prayer' by the riverside. One of these, Lydia, 'a seller of purple goods' from Thyatira, appears to have been the first convert, and she opened her home to Paul. We see something of the pagan background of Philippi when we read of 'a slave girl who had a spirit of divination and brought her owners much gain by soothsaying'. Paul and Silas were condemned to prison through the anger of the slave owners, when with the evil spirit exorcized they 'saw that their hope of gain was gone', though the pretext for the condemnation of Paul and Silas was that they as Jews disturbed the city and advocated customs which, their accusers said, 'it is not lawful for us Romans to accept or practise'. The partnership in the gospel, the persecution, and the largely Gentile background of the Philippian Christians, all of which are brought out in the Epistle, are thus seen in this record in Acts 16 of Paul's first visit to Philippi.

Manifestly Paul left a devoted group of Christians when he went on from Philippi. On his third missionary journey we read in the first place of his spending time in Macedonia (Acts 20:1) and that doubtless included a visit to Philippi; then, after a time in Greece, he was back in Macedonia, and Acts 20:6 tells us specifically that Paul set sail from Philippi to return to Jerusalem.

THE TIME AND PLACE OF THE WRITING OF THE EPISTLE

That Paul wrote this letter from imprisonment is made clear in 1:12–26 and 2:17. Traditionally Philippians has been linked with Colossians and Philemon and Ephesians, and believed to have been written in Rome in the imprisonment there which Acts 28 records. Two other suggestions have been made, that the letter might have been written while the apostle was imprisoned in Caesarea or Ephesus.

Little can be said in favour of Caesarea as the place of writing of Philippians, and much against. In Caesarea Paul was not facing the immediate threat of execution, but a journey to Rome to stand on trial before the emperor, in consequence of his 'appeal to Caesar' recorded in Acts 25:11. No such situation was contemplated when Paul wrote Philippians, but the alternatives of death and release, and in the case of the latter the hope of a visit to Philippi (2:24). Nearly all of the circumstances associated with Paul's imprisonment, described in ch. 1 of the Epistle, would be most difficult to account for from what we know of Paul's Caesarean imprisonment.

Adolf Deissmann in 1897 suggested Ephesus as the place of writing of Philippians, and since then many have felt the force of the reasons given in favour of this and against a Roman origin of the letter. It is true that we have no proof that the apostle was imprisoned in Ephesus; nevertheless such passages as Acts 20:18f.; 1 Cor. 4:9–13; 15:31f.; and 2 Cor. 1:8–10; 4:8–12; 6:4–10 and 11:23–27 make it very probable that he faced such opposition that led to imprisonment and the threat of death. The following arguments for the Ephesian origin of Philippians may be noted.

a. The Epistle indicates at least four journeys between Philippi and the place of Paul's imprisonment—the first took news of his condition, then Epaphroditus came to Paul from Philippi, a message went back to tell of the illness of Epaphroditus, and subsequently news was received of the Philippians' concern (2:25f.). The journey from Philippi to Ephesus would take 7 to 10 days, that to Rome much longer.

b. Acts 19:22 tells us that Timothy was sent from Ephesus to Macedonia, and this would fit in with 2:19–22.

c. Whereas Paul certainly faced the threat of death during his time in Ephesus (as the passages quoted above show), it is questioned whether he did in Rome.

d. It is argued, further, that beyond his Roman imprisonment Paul's eyes were turned westwards and he did not expect to come eastwards again (Acts 20:25; Rom. 15:18–29) and so could hardly have written 2:24 from Rome. When in Ephesus, however, Paul certainly contemplated and indeed fulfilled the hope of travel to Macedonia and Greece.

e. There are said to be similarities between this letter and Paul's earlier letters rather than his later ones, and in particular the problem of the Judaizers remains as a paramount concern.

f. It is thought that such passages as 1:30 and 4:15f. view the first preaching of the gospel in Philippi as much more recent than the 11 or 12 years which would be required if Paul wrote from Rome.

If the letter was written from Ephesus, its date of writing would be about 54–55 AD. Against Ephesus and in favour of Rome there are the following arguments.

a. The journeys between Rome and Philippi would have been much longer, but need not have taken more than 7 or 8 weeks each.

b. It is not difficult to imagine that circumstances in Paul's confinement in Rome changed from those described in Acts 28:30f., which may have caused him to see death as the probable outcome of his imprisonment.

c. It may also have been the case—and there is evidence to suggest it—that while in Rome the apostle turned his thoughts away from Spain back to the lands east of him where he had laboured already, and where the churches he had founded were in great need of further help from him.

d. If there are similarities, there are also considerable differences from the earlier Pauline Epistles. The church was still in danger of the Judaizers' legalism at the time of the writing of the Pastoral Epistles.

e. It may be questioned whether the Philippians would be as likely to wish or to need to send help to Paul in Ephesus, where he had many friends, as to him in Rome.

f. Although explanation can be given of the 'praetorian guard' (1:13) and 'Caesar's household' (4:22) in relation to Ephesus (or even Caesarea), both expressions would more naturally be used in Rome.

g. A final argument suffers through being an argument from silence, but may not be irrelevant. In Ephesus Paul was greatly concerned with the collection for the Jerusalem Christians (as the Corinthian letters show). It would be strange if it found no mention in Philippians, if that letter were written from Ephesus, especially when we realize from 2 Cor. 8:1–5 and 9:1–4 the involvement of the Macedonian Christians in the whole undertaking.

We cannot be dogmatic, but the arguments on the whole seem to favour Rome rather than Ephesus, and if this is the case, we should date the letter about 63 AD, that is towards the end of the period of Paul's imprisonment of which Acts 28 speaks.

THE PURPOSES OF THE EPISTLE

From its contents Paul appears to have had a number of reasons for writing to the Philippians as he did.

a. He wanted to acknowledge the gifts that they had sent to him (see especially 4:10, 14–18).

b. He wanted to give news of his own circumstances and to take away their concern that his imprisonment might have been a set-back for the gospel (1:12–26). He wished to tell them of his plan to send Timothy to them, and subsequently to come himself (2:19–24).

c. He felt it was necessary to explain why he was sending Epaphroditus back to them, when apparently they had intended that he should remain with the apostle and minister to him (2:25–30).

d. News brought to him indicated the dangers of divisions and party spirit among the Philippian Christians, and he wanted to exhort them to live and act and witness in the unity of the Spirit (see 1:27; 2:1–11; 4:2f.).

e. He was also made aware of the danger of their being influenced by the Judaizers and he wanted to remind them and demonstrate to them that legalism was a basic contradiction of the gospel (3:3–11), and perhaps at the same time to warn them of the danger of a false perfectionism (3:12–16).

f. Finally, his writing provided an opportunity for him to encourage the Philippian Christians to suffer bravely, to live in single-mindedness and to trust their lives to their Lord in all things and under all circumstances (see especially 1:27–30; 2:12–18; 3:17–21; 4:4–9).

THE SPECIAL FEATURES OF THE EPISTLE

a. It has often been commented that joy is a great theme of this letter. Sixteen times the noun or the verb is used. We see the apostle rejoicing in prayer (1:4) and in the fruit of his own labours (4:1), rejoicing in the knowledge of the preaching of the gospel (1:18), rejoicing in suffering even if it should mean death (2:17). He exhorts his readers to 'rejoice in the Lord' (3:1 and 4:4). He wants them to have joy in believing (1:25), joy in fellowship (2:28), and like him to rejoice even in trial and suffering (1:29).

b. Fellowship is also a keynote of the Epistle, and understandably so in that it is part of the apostle's reason for writing to express his appreciation of the Philippians' gift, and he can also speak of their sharing with him in the proclamation of the gospel from the very beginning (1:5–7). We have seen that it was also an important part of the apostle's purpose to stir the church at Philippi not to allow its fellowship to be marred by selfishness, pride or party spirit (2:1–4).

c. The gospel is also a great theme of this letter. Paul rejoices that with these Philippians he had not only the joy of fellowship in Christ, but 'partnership in the gospel' (1:5, 7; cf. 2:22 and 4:3). He was content to suffer at the hand of enemies, and even of fellow-Christians, as long as the gospel was preached and Christ was made known. He wanted his readers to 'strive side by side for the faith of the gospel' (1:27). It may be said also that he deliberately dealt with practical and doctrinal problems by going to the very heart of the gospel (as chs. 2 and 3 indicate).

d. Finally we may say that no letter shows more clearly the spiritual ambition of the apostle than this. We see the completeness of his commitment to Jesus Christ, and his single-minded desire to know Him and make Him known. 3:7–14 shows this most clearly, but alongside this passage we should place his statement in 1:20 of his 'eager expectation and hope' that, whatever his circumstances, Christ would be magnified in him. We find also (in 4:11, 13) his sense of utter contentment with any conditions, any deprivations, any difficulties, as long as Christ strengthened him to bear them and Christ was being glorified through them.

THE UNITY AND AUTHENTICITY OF THE EPISTLE

In general there has been no questioning of the Pauline authorship of Philippians. It is quoted by most of the 2nd-century Christian writers and referred to as Paul's from the time of Irenaeus. There are, however, three points that require consideration under this heading.

a. There is little doubt that we should regard 2:6–11 as a hymn with the humiliation and exaltation of Christ as its theme. It is rhythmic in form, and can be arranged in 6 stanzas of 3 lines each. We have highly poetic passages in Paul's letters (such as 1 Cor. 13), but these verses read as a quotation, deeply relevant to the purpose of the section but not originally composed for it, 'a "purple patch" stitched into the fabric of the exhortation' (A. M. Hunter). We have other instances of hymns or credal fragments being used in NT Epistles, in Eph. 4:4–6; 5:14; 1 Tim. 1:17; 3:16; 6:15f. and 2 Tim. 2:11–13. This appears to be a similar though longer example of such a quotation. There are words here not used elsewhere by Paul, some not otherwise in the NT. If the hymn were composed by someone other than the apostle himself, this would also account for the incarnation and the work of Christ being described in a different way from that with which we are familiar from Paul's writings. On the other hand, we cannot rule out the alternative that Paul himself was the author. It is difficult to find sufficient evidence to assure us that originally the hymn was in Aramaic, or that necessarily it was composed for baptismal use or use at the Lord's Supper, as some have rather too dogmatically maintained. We see it best as a hymn in praise of Christ, perhaps by Paul, perhaps by another, aptly taken and used in this context.

b. It has been suggested that the section beginning at 3:1b belonged originally to another letter. Certainly 3:1b represents a break in the apostle's argument. E. J. Goodspeed has suggested that 3:2 – 4:20 is from another letter written at a different time but to the same church. Others see 3:1b–19 or 3:1b – 4:3 as coming from another letter. The difficulty of finding a conclusion of the supposed interpolation, and the equal difficulty of accounting for its being thrown in after 3:1a, in addition to the absence of any textual evidence in support, make more probable the view that the apostle's writing was interrupted after he began 3:1. Perhaps fresh news came to hand making the apostle aware afresh of the menace of the Judaizers, and in consequence he wrote of the peril of legalism and the glory of the righteousness of God in Christ before he brought his letter to a close.

c. With still less probability it has been suggested that two other sections of the Epistle belonged originally to other letters. J. H. Michael finds the section concerning Timothy (2:19–24) as containing things incongruous with the rest of the Epistle, but not many have agreed with him in this view. It has been suggested also that 4:10–20 belongs to an earlier letter, on the grounds that Paul would not have waited as long to acknowledge the gift brought from Philippi by Epaphroditus. There is no need to suppose, however, that Paul had done nothing to express his gratitude to the Philippians for their gift before he wrote 4:10–20.

The arguments for these interpolations from other letters are not insignificant, but they fall far short of probability. It is to be noted that in no case is Pauline authorship doubted, and if 2:6–11 did not originally come from the apostle's hand, it cannot be doubted that Paul in this letter takes up this wonderful hymn and makes it his own; through it the central facts of the gospel as preached by Paul are revealed, and by it an example is given relevant to any situation where Christians are divided through pride and party spirit.

1:1–11 INTRODUCTION

In this letter, as in most of Paul's letters, the apostle follows the conventional pattern of letter-writing of the day, 'A to B, greeting', followed frequently by a thanksgiving and a prayer. With Paul, however, what is said about writer and readers and in greeting is lifted far above the conventional by the thought of their life in Christ; and the thanksgiving and prayer come from the apostle's heart, an expression of his praise for the working of God, and of his concern for those things which were constantly in his intercessions for the churches.

1:1, 2 Greeting

1 In the form of address three things are significant. First, Timothy is graciously linked with Paul (as in 2 Cor., Col., 1 and 2 Thes. and Phm.), although from v. 3 we have first person singular used. Timothy had been with Paul when the gospel was first preached in Philippi, he had continued to have a close association with the Philippian Christians, and he remained a close colleague of Paul (see on 2:19–23). Secondly, Paul stresses that he is writing to all the Philippian Christians; this repeated emphasis (see 1:4, 7f., 25; 2:17, 26; 4:21) suggests that there was danger of factions among them (cf. 2:1–4). Thirdly, he mentions in particular their ministers, possibly because there was a danger of their being slighted (cf. 1 Thes. 5:12f.), possibly because they were instrumental in arranging for the gifts sent to Paul (4:14–18). 2 The greeting is exactly that of several other letters (e.g. Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:3), the combination of Greek and Hebrew traditional greetings, but it is more than just a greeting—it has the full significance of Christian prayer.

Notes. 1 Servants. More literally the word is 'slaves'—they reckoned themselves to belong, body, mind and spirit, to Christ, and were subject to Him in everything. Saints. The reference is to all Christians, set apart to live for God (the basic meaning of the word), called to live in holiness (cf. Rom. 1:7). In Christ Jesus. This phrase or its equivalent is used many times in this letter. Christ is the very environment of the Christian's life; the believer lives and moves within the orbit of His will, His grace, His complete provision. He finds life as he is united by faith to Him, and cannot live as he should for a moment apart from Him (see Jn. 15:1–11). Bishops. There were more bishops than one at Philippi; it is widely agreed that in the NT elders and bishops (i.e. overseers; see RSV mg.) are alternative names for the same people (cf. Acts 20:17, 28; Tit. 1:5–7). Deacons are mentioned elsewhere only in 1 Tim. 3:8, 12f. (although the Greek word is often used in the sense of 'servant' or 'minister'); possibly their work is to be traced back to Acts 6:2 where the seven were appointed to 'serve' (Gk. diakonein) in a way like the later deacons. 2 Grace is the undeserved favour of God, which reconciles us to Himself through Christ, supplies our every need, and allows us the privilege of serving Him. Peace in Scripture is more than the absence of conflict; it is complete well-being, and like grace comes only from God our Father through the Lord Jesus Christ.

1:3–7 Thanksgiving and confidence

3, 4 Paul, as regularly was both his precept and practice (see 4:6), joins praise and prayer. 5, 7 Most particularly he gives thanks for the way in which the Philippian Christians have shared with him in the work of the gospel; as he worked to defend the gospel and strengthen its hold on the lives of others, and as for the sake of this work he was in prison, he knew that they were partners with him. 6 More deeply he sees this as a sign of God's working in them; and in this he rejoices, and finds cause for confidence that such working of God in their lives will continue right on to its goal and culmination at the coming of Christ.

Notes. 3 The word remembrance may indicate the fact that he remembers them constantly for what they are, or that he mentions them before God in prayer. 4 Always . . . every . . . all. It is typical of Paul to speak like this; but for the all here and twice more in v. 7, see on v. 1. Joy, it has been noted (see Introduction, p. 1126), is one of the great key-notes of this letter, the noun occurring 5 times, and the verb or its compound 11 times. 5 Partnership is the regular NT word for fellowship. It is noteworthy that the fellowship between Paul and the Philippians is not simply fellowship in Christ, but in the gospel. All who are concerned to serve Christ must be concerned in the task of making known His gospel (cf. Mk. 8:35). The word partnership may express the sharing which is involved in the bestowing of material gifts (cf. 2 Cor. 8:4; 9:13); the Philippian Christians did make such gifts to the apostle to provide for him as a messenger of the gospel (4:10, 14–18), but the context indicates that they shared in the actual work. The Greek preposition (eis) led to the RV translation 'in furtherance of the gospel'. The first day may mean the beginning of Paul's time in Philippi, when Lydia opened her home to him, and thus helped forward the preaching of the gospel. 6 Their work is evidence of the good work of God in them. Because it is clear that God has begun to work in them, Paul is confident of the continuance of this, and in this confidence he prays. Man may give up a work he undertakes, but not God (cf. Rom. 11:29). As he thinks of his own life and service and also the spiritual progress of those to whom he ministers, Paul's eyes are constantly turned to the day of Jesus Christ. His constant aim is that he and his fellow-Christians may be presented before God mature and unashamed in that day (cf. 2 Cor. 1:14; 5:9f.; Eph. 5:27; Col. 1:28). 7 Grace here has perhaps two of the three meanings which we have noted on v. 2; there is the privilege of being called to make the gospel known to others (cf. Eph. 3:7f.), and there is strength to enable Paul and the Philippian Christians alike to do this. Such enabling is necessary because the work of the gospel is costing Paul imprisonment. But his more constant task—and need of grace—one that continues even in prison is the defence and confirmation of the gospel. The first part of this task is mentioned again in v. 16, and 1 Pet. 3:15 shows it to be the responsibility of all Christians; the second involves helping to make men more sure of its truth and its power (cf. Lk. 1:4; 1 Cor. 1:6).

1:8–11 Prayer

8 The apostle can say that God knows the reality of his prayer for the Christians at Philippi, and the love which inspires that prayer. 9–11 He asks three things for them: a. Love, increasing and overflowing. b. Knowledge, in particular 'the gift of true discrimination' (NEB) where there is need to distinguish different values. c. Righteousness, for with the day of Christ in view he wants them to be living at no lower standard than that of absolute purity, their whole lives filled with goodness.

Notes. 8 God is my witness. Cf. Rom. 1:9; 2 Cor. 1:23; 1 Thes. 2:5, 10. He yearns for them not just with his own love, but with the affection of Christ Jesus in him (cf. NEB). 'The believer has no yearnings apart from his Lord; his pulse beats with the pulse of Christ . . .' (Lightfoot). All once again; see on v. 1. 9 They had already shown love for their Lord and for others, but it is the apostle's prayer that that love might abound more and more; cf. 2 Cor. 9:8; 1 Thes. 3:12. He was concerned however, that that love should not be a blind and misguided enthusiasm. It needed to be directed with knowledge (cf. Col. 1:9) and discernment, a sensitivity to the truth of God, to the needs of others and to the situation. 10 That you may approve what is excellent. This is one way of translating these words; the other way is to speak of 'testing things that differ' (Weymouth). But in either case the dominant thought is that of discrimination. The verb often means approving by testing (cf. Eph. 5:10), and the things to be approved are those things that are highest and best. The true wisdom is the knowledge of what is honourable and just and lovely (cf. 4:8) and it must lead to corresponding action. Paul prays that they may be pure and blameless; the first of these words suggests 'sincerity', 'transparent character' (Weymouth), while the second can mean either 'not stumbling' (cf. Acts 24:16) or 'not causing offence' (cf. 1 Cor. 10:32), perhaps both. For the day of Christ see on v. 6. 11 The original here has 'fruit', not fruits; probably it is that righteousness is the fruit that the apostle prays will fill these Christians' lives (cf. Heb. 12:11; Jas. 3:18), but the reference could be to the good deeds and qualities which result when God's righteousness indwells their lives. All of these things for which he prays come through Jesus Christ and through Him alone; and the purpose and goal of them all is nothing but the glory and praise of God (cf. Eph. 1:6, 12, 14).

1:12–26 THE APOSTLE'S CIRCUMSTANCES

Paul knows the concern of the Philippian Christians for him, and thus, as often in his letters, he sends news of himself. He is able to tell how his imprisonment has meant the advance of the gospel, how Christ is being proclaimed where he is, and how he views the possible issues of his imprisonment, release and further service, or death. With reference to the past, the present and the possibilities for the future he could say 'I rejoice'.

1:12–14 The results of his imprisonment

12 His imprisonment had not been loss but gain as far as the gospel was concerned, for two reasons. 13 First, the fact that he was imprisoned for the sake of Christ became widely known, and so the gospel was made known. 14 Secondly, the Christians around him who had been fearful before had gained courage and confidence through Paul's example.

Notes. 12 The apostle does not dwell on his sufferings. Behind the words what has happened to me lies all that it meant to one who had been free to range far and wide preaching the gospel, to be confined and in all probability to be chained day and night to a Roman soldier. 13 The whole praetorian guard. This is probably the right translation, not 'all the palace' (AV). The 'praetorium' was originally the praetor's tent in the camp. Hence it came to mean the governor's residence (as in Mt. 27:27), or the soldiers' barracks, or the body of soldiers themselves. It is most likely that the soldiers going to and from the apostle spoke about him to others, and told that he was imprisoned for Christ (lit. 'in Christ', and perhaps the thought is not only of the reason for his being in prison, but also the spirit in which he bore imprisonment). 14 The fact that these Christians became much more bold was in its turn a significant example for the Christians at Philippi, as vv. 27–30 will show.

1:15–18 Christ is proclaimed, though from differing motives

15, 17 The next great fact on which the apostle would dwell was that Christ was being proclaimed. He must report, however, that there were differing motives in the proclamation. Some think that those who preached Christ from envy and rivalry were the Judaizers who are mentioned in 3:2. Paul does not, however, criticize the content of their preaching. These people did not proclaim wrong doctrine, but they had a wrong spirit of partisanship (cf. 1 Cor. 1). Perhaps they were the Christians who were in Rome before Paul came, and now they were jealous of the success of his preaching, determined to outdo him, and willing to cause him anguish and offence in his imprisonment. 16 On the other hand there were those who proclaimed Christ with single-minded love for their Lord, and love for the apostle, realizing that he was in prison for his own faithfulness to the gospel. 18 Paul 'had lifted the matter beyond all personalities; all that mattered was that Christ was preached' (Barclay).

Notes. 16 I am put here. The word used could mean 'appointed' (Way), or 'I am where I am' (NEB). For the defence of the gospel. Cf. v. 7. 17 In origin and usage the word translated partisanship conveys the idea of selfish ambition, rivalry and party spirit. 18 Pretence. The same word is used for the prayers of the scribes in Mk. 12:40 (cf. also Acts 27:30); it is the opposite of sincerity.

1:19–26 The alternatives of life and death

19 Paul faced imprisonment and the threat of death, and from fellow-Christians animosity and provocation, and yet he was confident that all would turn out well (cf. Rom. 8:28). Humanly speaking he relied on the prayers of his friends, and in answer to them on the unfailing help of the Holy Spirit. 20 It was his one earnest desire and anticipation that whatever the circumstances, whether the issue of his imprisonment was release or death, he would magnify Christ. In practical terms this meant showing courage, and in nothing being ashamed of his Lord. 21–23 He weighs up in his mind now the two alternatives and can rejoice in both. To go on living in this world is to live in constant enjoyment of Christ Himself, and there will be further fruitful toil in his Master's service. He knows, on the other hand, that death is sheer gain, because beyond death is the immediate presence of Christ. 24, 25 He contemplates the alternatives, and although he does not say that he knows which God will grant, he begins to feel that he is being called to remain for further service. It was more advantageous to him to go to be with his Lord; it was more advantageous (even more necessary) for others that he should continue in this life. By so doing he would help them to make spiritual progress, and to be more truly joyous and triumphant in their faith. 26 In particular, the Philippian Christians will be able to give thanks to God for him, if he is spared to come to them again.

Notes. 19 Help. The Greek word used indicates both a generous provision and an undergirding strength. Deliverance. This does not mean liberation from prison. Paul is uncertain whether this will be granted, but he is confident that 'the Lord will rescue (him) from every evil and save (him) for his heavenly kingdom' (2 Tim. 4:18). The words of Jb. 13:16 (and no doubt the context of that verse) seem to be in the apostle's mind. 20 Eager expectation is one word in the Greek, which literally means straining forward with outstretched head, and its prepositional prefix implies a turning aside from all other interests. Honoured. AV 'magnified' is nearer to the original, Paul's great longing being to cause Christ to be seen by others more clearly and in His true greatness. 23 Depart. The Greek word is used for a ship weighing anchor, or for striking camp; the corresponding noun is used in 2 Tim. 4:6. There is not necessarily any contradiction between thinking of death as 'sleep' (as in 1 Thes. 4:13–15) and as departing to be with Christ. It may be only the limitation of our thinking in terms of space and time that makes it impossible for us to understand at all fully what lies beyond the gateway of death. It is enough to say that to die is gain because it is to be with Christ. 25 Remain and continue with you all. These words stand for two Greek verbs, one the compound form of the other; NEB translates 'stay, and stand by you all'. Progress. This is the apostle's great desire for himself (cf. 3:12–14), and for others (cf. 1 Tim. 4:15). His desire was also that they should have the same joy in their faith as he had himself. 26 Glory is another great Pauline word, used frequently by the apostle for one Christian exulting in the work of God in another. He refers more specifically to his coming . . . again to Philippi in 2:24.

1:27 - 2:18 EXHORTATIONS CONCERNING CHRISTIAN LIVING AND FELLOWSHIP

Paul has told of his own circumstances. Now he has matters of special importance to deal with concerning the life of the Christians at Philippi. They are being called to suffer; they must count it a privilege, and endure with courage. In their trials and in every aspect of their common life they must stand united. Pride hinders that unity and fellowship which they should demonstrate, and the only remedy for selfishness and faction is to look long and often at Christ Himself till His way of thinking and acting is theirs. He is Example, and He is Saviour, but His salvation must be worked out in lives of obedience, lives that shine as lights in the world, and that will not be counted as loss in the day of Christ.

1:27–30 The call to live worthily of the gospel (united in spirit and courageous in suffering)

27 As Paul has said already, he may return to Philippi or he may remain a prisoner till he dies. He may see them, or hear report of them. In either case he hopes that he will know of the unity and courage of their witness. 28 Trust in their Lord and forgetfulness of themselves will mean that they will not be terrified by their opponents. Their fearlessness will show their enemies that they are not fortified merely by human courage, and that to oppose the servants of Christ is to fight against God (cf. Acts 5:39), and to take the path that leads to destruction (cf. 2 Thes. 1:4–8). Perhaps as he wrote Paul recalled the voice of God in his own conscience indicating this when he persecuted the Christians (Acts 26:10f., 14). At the same time the presence of God with them will assure the Philippians themselves that they are God's and blessed with His salvation. 29 It is their privilege to believe in Christ; but also (by that strange contradiction of the world's standards found in what the NT, and not least this Epistle, says so often) to suffer for Christ (cf. Mt. 5:11f.; Acts 5:41). 30 Their calling is to accept that toil and struggle, and its cost, as the apostle himself had accepted it, as they had seen when he was in Philippi (Acts 16:19–25) and heard of him now.

Notes. 27 Your manner of life. AV translated 'conversation', in the old sense of 'behaviour'. The verb used here speaks of the discharge of obligation as citizens; it would have had special force for those in Philippi where Roman citizenship was prized (see Introduction). In addition to earthly duties and privileges, Christians in Philippi had the responsibility to live individually and corporately as heavenly citizens (cf. 3:20). The gospel of Christ is twice mentioned here, and we see again (cf. v. 5) how central it was in the apostle's thinking. Stand firm is a repeated exhortation in Paul's letters (cf. 1 Cor. 16:13; Gal. 5:1; Eph. 6:11–14; 1 Thes. 3:8; 2 Thes. 2:15). In one spirit, with one mind, he says for emphasis and in the verb translated striving side by side we have one of those words, so frequent in Paul, with the Greek prefix syn-, 'together'. From the verb itself (Gk. athleō) we derive our word 'athlete', and thus it signifies the Christian conflict. 28 Frightened. The word is used of startled horses; 'never be scared' is Moffatt's translation. 29 The verb granted conveys the thought of a gift of grace: 'to you has the privilege been freely given' (Way). 30 Conflict translates the Greek word from which we have 'agony'. The use of the noun and corresponding verb is frequent in Paul (e.g. Rom. 15:30; Col. 1:29; 2:1; 1 Thes. 2:2). It so deeply expressed the nature of his Christian service.

2:1–4 Appeal for unity, through personal humility

1 Paul now addresses himself directly to the need of greater unity and stronger fellowship in the church at Philippi, and he sets down four grounds for his appeal. a. In Christ Himself there is every encouragement to unity; disunity is rejection of His will and purpose. b. Those who have known the blessing of love should manifest that love to others without reserve or discrimination (cf. 1 Jn. 4:7–12). c. All have the same Spirit, and so belong together as one. d. The knowledge of the mercy and compassion of God should lead them to show this to others in affection and sympathy. 2 It will complete the joy that Paul already has in the Philippians (1:4; 4:1) if only he can hear that they are standing together in harmony and concord. 3 Selfishness and conceit are the inevitable enemies of fellowship and hindrances to unity. There are two practical ways of overcoming them. First, they should count others better than themselves, seeing the strengths and gifts of others, and realizing their own weaknesses, failures and limitations (cf. Rom. 12:10, RV). 4 Secondly, they should make a habit of thinking and speaking of the interests of others, and not just of their own (cf. Rom. 15:2f.; 1 Cor. 10:24, 33; Gal. 6:2).

Notes. 1 The word translated encouragement may mean 'comfort' (RV), 'consolation' (AV) or 'appeal', 'exhortation'. The force of it here may be that the comfort found in Christ is to be shown towards others, or that there is appeal and encouragement in the word of Christ to seek unity (e.g. in Jn. 15:1–11; 17:20–23). RSV translates the next phrase participation in the Spirit (cf. NEB) and thus makes it an appeal on the basis of the common possession of the Spirit (cf. Eph. 4:4); it could refer to the 'fellowship' which is the work of the Spirit (see AV and RV). Affection. AV translated literally 'bowels' (the seat of emotions to the Greek, as the heart is to us). 2 There is not any great difference in the four phrases in this verse that express unity, though distinctions are possible. Paul uses twice the verb 'think' (here mind) that is used more frequently in Philippians than in any other NT book. The apostle knows that thoughts and attitudes are the basis of speech and action, and direct the whole course of the life (cf. especially 2:5; 3:15; 4:8). 3 Selfishness. This word (Gk. eritheia) has been used in 1:17 and here, as there, denotes self-seeking, personal ambition, party spirit. Humility translates a word which to the Greek conveyed the thought of a base and servile spirit. To the Christian it is a high virtue, because it was the way of Christ Himself (as vv. 5–8 are to show), and because it is the essential prerequisite of serving others and uplifting the Lord, as well as being vital for the maintaining of unity in the church (cf. Eph. 4:1–3). 4 Each in the Greek is plural, and the force may be 'each group' and thus refer to their factions, or it may mean simply 'each and all' (Lightfoot).

2:5–11 The example of Christ

5 The best way Paul can inculcate humility is by turning his friends in Philippi to the example of Christ, that they may let the thought of His condescension and self-giving shape all their attitudes. 6 As we have seen, it appears that Paul here quotes a previously composed hymn in praise of the pre-existent, incarnate, exalted Lord, and whether Paul's own or the work of another, it is used aptly here (see Introduction). The first stanza speaks of His glory and greatness before His incarnation. 7 The second tells of three steps in His humbling of Himself—emptying Himself of His glory, acting as a slave rather than as Lord of all, and, though truly God, taking on Himself our humanity. 8 The third stanza traces His descent to the depths, for having abased Himself to become man, He lived 'a life of utter obedience' (cf. Rom. 5:19; Heb. 5:8f.; 10:5–14), 'even to the extent of dying' (Phillips). That death, moreover, was death on a cross, 'that death of unimaginable pain and of utter shame' (Moule) which to the Jew meant that the victim was placed outside God's covenant people (Dt. 21:23; Gal. 3:13), and of which the Roman Cicero says, 'Far be the very name of the cross, not only from the body, but even from the thought, the eyes, the ears of Roman citizens.'

9–11 The remaining three stanzas speak of His exaltation by the Father in consequence of His humiliation and self-sacrifice (cf. Heb. 2:9). He is given a name which is above every name; it is not a title that is meant, but the highest honour and authority over all creation (cf. Eph. 1:20–22; 4:8–10; Rev. 5:13). To express this Is. 45:23 is quoted in application to Christ, and also the earliest and most fundamental Christian creed, 'Jesus is Lord' (1 Cor. 12:3; cf. Rom. 10:9). We read this great passage and not wrongly use its statements, along with those of other parts of the NT, to express our doctrine of the Person of Christ; but we should not forget that the purpose of these tremendous statements in their context is the very practical one of using the example of Christ 'to persuade . . . the Philippians to live a life in which disunity, discord and personal ambition were dead' (Barclay).

Notes. 5 Have this mind. See on v. 2. If RSV is right, the meaning of this verse is that the kind of life that we have in Christ Jesus is to shape our attitudes in the fellowship that we have among ourselves (cf. NEB). On the other hand AV and RV may be right in calling us to think 'in' our minds according to the pattern revealed in Christ Himself. Ultimately the difference is not a great one. 6 Though he was in the form of God. Two significant Greek words are used here. There is a participle (hyparchōn), a strong word, stronger than that of the usual verb 'to be', and it speaks of what was and is unchangeably His. Then the Greek morphē speaks of permanent form, a word very close in meaning to our more philosophical word 'nature', found in many translations here. A thing to be grasped translates a single word that occurs only here in the NT, and the varied translations indicate the difficulty of rendering it. It is difficult also to determine precisely the meaning of equality with God.

There are two main ways in which we can understand the thought. Equality with God may be essentially the same as being in the form of God. This, then, was inalienably His; but He 'did not cling to his prerogatives as God's equal' (Phillips); it was not a 'prize' to seize (RV), an act of 'robbery' to take those prerogatives. Therefore in trust and without fear He humbled Himself, and laid aside His glory. On the other hand equality with God may not be identical with the form of God but may speak directly of the glory and honour of a position alongside of God. He rejected the kind of temptation to which the first Adam fell, who was persuaded to seize that which he wrongly thought would make him 'like God' (Gn. 3:5). So Christ 'did not think to snatch at' (NEB) what would in fact finally and fully be His by the Father's own appointment beyond a human cradle and a human grave. In either case the meaning is that He 'laid His glory by'. 7 He emptied himself. It has been suggested that there is an allusion here to Is. 53:12, and thus to the death of Christ rather than to His incarnation. These verses do not necessarily give a chronological sequence; yet the supreme humiliation of the death of the cross seems the subject of v. 8 rather than this verse. The reference seems to be to the incarnation. It is important, however, not to read into the word more than is intended. It gives no justification for the Kenotic Christology, that He emptied himself in some sense of His essential deity. The terms of v. 6 imply that 'He took the form of servant while He retained the form of God' (Hendriksen). The context, moreover, indicates the force of the word to be that 'He stripped Himself of His glory' (Weymouth), He 'made himself of no reputation' (AV); cf. 2 Cor. 8:9. It is status, not nature, which is involved, as the next phrase shows: taking the form of a servant ('slave', RSV mg.). The word form is the same as that in v. 6, and indicates He was in reality and not merely in appearance a servant (cf. Mk. 10:45). Likeness must not be taken to mean similarity without full reality; He was truly man (cf. Paul's statements in Rom. 8:3 and Gal. 4:4), but the expression 'leaves room for the thought that the human likeness is not the whole story' (Beare). 8 His was a truly human form, but here form translates a different Greek word, one which speaks of something more temporary (cf. 1 Cor. 7:31). The form of God (morphē) was His from the beginning; He later took the form (schēma) of man. He humbled himself. The verb used is cognate with the noun of v. 3 (see note). 9 Therefore. In furtherance of the practical exhortation of which these verses are a part, the implication here for Christian people is that true exaltation comes only by the way of humility (cf. Mt. 23:12; Jas. 4:10; 1 Pet. 5:5f.). 11 To the glory of God the Father. Perhaps this is added to indicate that the glory to which Christ is raised is in no way independent of the Father (cf. 1 Cor. 15:28).

2:12–18 The practical outworking of salvation

12 The example of Jesus Christ is not only one of humility; it is also one of obedience (v. 8). To such obedience—irrespective of whether or not Paul is with them (cf. 1:27)—the Philippians are called. Christ is Example, but supremely He is the Giver of salvation. Yet that salvation is not to be accepted complacently, but worked out in life in a spirit of reverence and fear by men who know that they live in His holy sight and must give account to Him. 13 Man's striving in the Christian life is nevertheless by God's enabling, His work in the Christian giving both desire and strength to do what is pleasing to Him. 14 In this life, moreover, it is not only the deeds done that matter but the spirit in which they are done: 'on . . . guard against a grudging and contentious spirit' (Weymouth). 15 The highest standards must prevail if Christians are to live 'in the midst of a society morally warped, spiritually perverted' (Way), as those who are children of God. For to be called children of God indicates not only their privilege (Jn. 1:12), but also their responsibility (Eph. 5:1). In the sight of men they must be pure, utterly sincere and without reproach; then they will shine as lights, thus fulfilling God's purpose for them (cf. Mt. 5:14–16; 1 Pet. 2:9). 16 They have the gospel which is the very word of life for a perishing world (cf. Jn. 3:16; 6:68; Acts 5:20; 2 Cor. 2:15f.). Again, as Paul thinks of the lives of his Philippian converts, his eyes turn to the day of Christ. He longs to be able to present them before his Master then in such a way that he will be able to rejoice not to have run the Christian race and toiled in Christian service in vain. 17 The thought of death as the possible outcome of his imprisonment comes to the apostle again; that death would be as an offering to God, but he would think of it just as a libation poured on the much more significant sacrificial offering, their faith and the quality of life and service produced by faith. At such a thought he rejoices, and it is a rejoicing with them in the fruit to be seen in their lives. 18 He trusts that they in turn will rejoice, and that with him in his fruitful service.

Notes. 12 Work out is a fair translation of the Greek verb here (katergazesthe). It conveys the idea of bringing to completion; Paul says in effect, 'Go on until the work of salvation is fully and finally wrought out in you' (Barclay). This does not mean that we can and must effect our own salvation. The very word salvation signifies that we cannot save ourselves (cf. Jn. 15:4f.; 1 Cor. 15:10; Eph. 2:5, 8); the next verse stresses the essential work of God. We can and must live lives that experience and show forth God's saving power which is made our own. 13 At work in you. Paul loved to use this verb, and the corresponding noun (energeia, from which comes our 'energy'), to speak of God's working in the believer, and (except for Eph. 2:2; 2 Thes. 2:9, 11 where it is used of the working of Satan and the powers of evil) they are used in the NT only of what God does (cf. Phil. 3:21; Eph. 3:20). 15 Without blemish. The Greek adjective (amōma) was used of animals for sacrifice in the OT; it is used in a moral and spiritual sense of our Lord Himself (Heb. 9:14; 1 Pet. 1:19); it presents here the standard for Christian living (cf. Eph. 1:4). A crooked and perverse generation. A quotation of Dt. 32:5. Lights. The word here is used for the heavenly bodies; hence NEB 'stars'. Perhaps the thought is that Christians are light-bearers rather than actually the light of men (cf. Jn. 1:8f.; 8:12). 16 Holding fast. It may be right to accept this translation, and assume a change of metaphor. Although it is not the basic meaning, the verb can have the sense of 'hold towards', and hence AV and RV 'holding forth', or NEB 'proffer'. That . . . I may be proud. The same word is translated 'glory' in 1:26. Labour. This is another word that typically describes Paul's Christian service. It denotes toil to the point of utter exhaustion (for its use note Mt. 11:28; Col. 1:29; 1 Tim. 4:10; 5:17). In vain. There is, apparently, an allusion to Is. 49:4 and perhaps also Is. 65:23. 17 Poured as a libation. The only other use of the verb in the NT is in 2 Tim. 4:6, where the reference is also to Paul's death. Sacrificial offering. The stricter translation of AV and RV is 'sacrifice and service'. The first of the two Greek words (thysia) is a regular word for an offering to God. The second (leitourgia) was originally a service performed by an individual for the state; it came to be applied to the service of God (Lk. 1:23; 2 Cor. 9:12; Heb. 8:6; 9:21). Clearly the Christian life and service of the Philippians is here considered as sacrifice offered to God (cf. Rom. 12:1).

2:19–30 FUTURE PLANS

At this point in the letter the subject-matter changes. From exhortation the apostle turns to speak of his two fellow-workers, Timothy and Epaphroditus, and his plans for them—and his hope for himself too—to go to Philippi. In the process he speaks of these two men in deeply affectionate terms and gives a glowing testimony to their devoted and selfless service.

2:19–24 Commendation of Timothy

19 We have seen that Timothy was with Paul when he wrote this letter (1:1). He had been with him when the gospel was first preached in Philippi. Dependent on the date and place of the writing of the Epistle (see Introduction), he had sent or was to send Timothy to Philippi again. Paul says tactfully that his first desire with respect to Timothy's mission was that he might be cheered by news of the Philippian Christians. Doubtless, however, he had also in view a ministry that Timothy would have in Philippi. Therefore he speaks to them of Timothy in terms of highest commendation. 20, 21 There was no other whom Paul could send like Timothy. He would be genuinely anxious for their welfare. With deep sadness the apostle had to say that when he thought of others around him whom he might send they were 'all bent on their own ends, not on the cause of Christ Jesus' (NEB). Cf. 2:4. 22 Timothy's worth was known at Philippi, as it was certainly known to the apostle with whom Timothy had now served for years in the ministry of the gospel 'like a son helping his father' (Moffatt). 23 Paul has a further reason for sending Timothy, and it will involve a delay in his departure. He wants his messenger to be able to carry news as to which of the two alternatives concerning which he has written (1:23f.)—release or death—is to be fulfilled in him. 24 He is not certain, but he is led to think that the outcome may be release (cf. 1:25f.), and in this case Paul hopes that he may himself soon come to Philippi.

Notes. 19 In the Lord Jesus. Cf. v. 24, in the Lord. All Paul's hopes and plans for the future were referred to the Lord to whom his life was united (cf. 1 Cor. 16:7; Jas. 4:13–15). 20 No one like him. AV more literally translates the Greek 'no man likeminded'; Way paraphrases 'no one else who is heart and soul with me'. 21 All. Paul must have been discouraged; he had so few genuine colleagues, no others whom he could send; he was surrounded by those who, while professing to serve Christ, put their own advantage first (1:15, 17; 3:18f.). 22 Worth. The Greek means 'proof' (AV), and speaks of the approval that is the result of testing: the corresponding verb has been used in 1:10. Served. Paul might have said 'he has served me' but intentionally says that he served (as a slave) with him. In the gospel. The Greek uses the preposition eis (meaning literally 'to') which is thus translated by RV here, as in 1:5, 'in furtherance of the gospel'.

2:25–30 Explanations concerning Epaphroditus

25 Of Epaphroditus we read nowhere else in the NT except this Epistle. The Philippian church had sent him to Paul with their gifts (4:18), and it appears that he was intended not only to be their messenger, but to stay on to help him, 'commissioned to minister to (his) needs' (NEB). He had indeed done what they expected him to do, and Paul could call him his brother and fellow worker and fellow soldier. 26–28 But something had happened that made it wise for Paul to send him back to Philippi rather than keep him at his side. He had been critically ill, but by the mercy of God (mercy to Paul, as he sees it), he had recovered. The report of the seriousness of his illness had gone to Philippi, and news had come back of the anxiety of his friends there. This caused distress to Epaphroditus, and brought into his heart a longing for those at home, so that Paul recognized that it was best that he should return. 29 Paul, however, was sensitive to the situation. He appreciated the fact that there was some danger that the Philippians might misunderstand the reason for their messenger's return. So he called on them to receive Epaphroditus with a warm-hearted Christian welcome, not merely as one of their own fellowship returned from abroad, but as a man to be highly honoured for the faithfulness and costliness of the service he had rendered. 30 He had come near to death, willingly risking his life in the work of Christ, and indeed in the process of giving that service which the Philippians themselves could not give to the apostle.

Notes. 25 Messenger. This is an example of the NT use of the word apostolos in a sense other than that of the foundation apostles of Christ. Most likely the meaning is that he is their authorized messenger (cf. 2 Cor. 8:23). It could mean that he had an apostolic function in being a missionary working (with and after Paul) to lay the foundations of the church in Philippi. Minister. The word (Gk. leitourgos) is cognate to that used in v. 17 (see note). 26 Distressed. This is a very strong word in the Greek; its only other NT use is in relation to our Lord's anguish in Gethsemane (Mt. 26:37; Mk. 14:33). 28 That I may be less anxious. This is revealing of the selflessness of Paul. 'Easing the mind of his dearly beloved Philippians and imparting to them gladness of heart meant more to him than any personal service he might be able to derive from Epaphroditus' (Hendriksen). 30 Risking his life. The reference may be to the illness mentioned, or it may be that attending to Paul in prison led him into a position of danger of suffering the same fate as that with which the apostle himself was threatened. The actual word used is a gambling term. He 'staked his life for the service of Christ' (Martin).

3:1–21 SPIRITUAL AMBITIONS

It seems that Paul is about to close his letter at this point. Finally, my brethren, he writes, rejoice in the Lord. Then, whatever the reason (see Introduction), he feels he must give warning concerning the Judaizing Christians. This leads him to speak of his reliance on Jesus Christ alone for acceptance with God, and to speak of his ultimate ambitions for his spiritual life, and also for the lives of his Christian friends at Philippi.

3:1–3 Warning against the circumcision party

1 Apparently to conclude his letter, Paul now strikes again a great key-note of his writing, rejoice, and find your joy in the Lord. It is not quite clear what is the significance of the second part of the verse—perhaps that it is not inappropriate to repeat the call to rejoice (so Way and Moffatt translate); more likely it refers to what follows, and the present infinitive should be given full force. Lightfoot paraphrases, 'Forgive me, if I speak once more on an old topic.' To do so was not irksome for Paul, as it led to the heart of the gospel in which he rejoiced. For them it was the safe course, because they were tempted to turn from the gospel to legalism. 2 The warning was necessary, and three times he says look out. Jews regarded Gentiles as dogs, but these Judaizers were more deserving of the name than any Gentile for the way they liked to 'prowl round the Christian congregations, seeking to win Gentile converts over to Judaism' (Beare). They were workers, but in an evil cause, turning men aside from truth and freedom (cf. Mt. 23:15; 2 Cor. 11:13; Gal. 1:7–9). The rite that they advocated was no longer spiritually meaningful but a mere mutilation of the flesh. 3 There was a true circumcision, but it was not of the letter, but of the spirit (cf. Rom. 2:27–29). It involved glorying in Jesus as the Christ, the Fulfiller of every institution of Judaism. There never was any real basis of confidence in the external rite alone (Lv. 26:41; Dt. 10:16; 30:6; Je. 4:4; Ezk. 44:7); now to try to impose this on Gentiles, when all that God required was faith and obedience, was the confidence of fools.

Notes. 2 Mutilate the flesh. AV and RV translate 'concision' to bring out the force of the Greek word (katatomē), cognate with that for circumcision (peritomē); but RSV gives the actual meaning. 3 We are the true circumcision. Some think that Paul is speaking just of Jewish Christians. The evidence is rather that Paul, and NT writers generally, take up all the titles and privileges of the people of God in OT days and apply them to Christians, whether Jewish or Gentile (e.g. Eph. 2:11–22; 1 Pet. 2:4–10). In spirit. This probably represents the true text, and the contrast of the verse is between flesh and spirit. (RV 'by the Spirit of God' could be the meaning, but it is likely that 'of God' was not in the original text.) Flesh is a word with different facets of meaning for Paul, but in this verse and the next it clearly refers to reliance on external ordinances to the neglect of the inner state of the heart before God.

3:4–7 Paul's previous life and aims

4 Paul could, if he chose, argue with the Judaizers on their own ground. 'If anyone thinks to base his claims on externals,' he says, 'I could make a stronger case for myself' (NEB). 5, 6 Seven things he could list: a. He was circumcised on the eighth day as the law required (Gn. 17:12). b. He was born and bred an Israelite, a member of the people of God. c. He could name his tribe (that of Israel's first king, after whom he was named), Benjamin. d. He was not only a true Jew, but a Hebrew, an Aramaic-speaker (cf. Acts 6:1; 22:2; 2 Cor. 11:22), son of Hebrew parents, not like so many who had lost the use of their native tongue. e. His devotion to the law was signified by his being a devout Pharisee (Acts 23:6; 26:5; cf. Gal. 1:14). f. His zeal was shown by what he did to persecute the Christians (Acts 8:3; 9:1). g. He could say that as far as the external demands of the law were concerned, by which he had tried to live, he was blameless (cf. Mt. 19:20). 7 All these things he put on the credit side as long as his terms of reference were those of the Judaizers; but now he could only say, 'All such assets I have written off because of Christ' (NEB). He had come to see them as a false basis of confidence and even a hindrance.

Notes. 6 Righteousness. In this and the following verses righteousness means a way of being reckoned righteous, of being accepted as in right relationship with God. Prior to his conversion Paul depended on a righteousness of his own, based on law, as he describes it in v. 9. He came to reject this for the righteousness from God that depends on faith. 7 Gain. The original has the plural. Paul had listed his gains individually, but now writes them off as one great loss. The contrast between gain and loss goes back to the Rabbis, and Paul's use of it may be dependent on our Lord Himself (e.g. Mk. 8:35f.).

3:8–14 The renunciation of the old, and the assuming of new ambitions

8 Because he had found the way of acceptance with God in Christ, Paul reckoned all those things on which he had relied before as loss; he decided, moreover, that all was 'far outweighed' by the single 'gain of knowing Christ' (NEB). He not only has counted and does count his previous assets as loss, but for Christ's sake has suffered the loss of everything that mattered most in his previous life—his place in Judaism, among the Pharisees, perhaps even in his home. He had lost much, but he did not grieve; everything else was 'useless rubbish compared with being able to win Christ' (Phillips). 9 Now his desire, first, is to be accepted on the basis of the righteousness which is God's gift, offered on the simple condition of believing (cf. Rom. 3:21 – 4:25; Gal. 2:15 – 3:29; Eph. 2:4–9), laying aside that so-called righteousness of his own works on which he had relied before. 10 Secondly, he wants to live in that knowledge of Him, which is fellowship, obedience, service. To have fellowship with Christ is to know the power of his resurrection in daily experience (cf. Rom. 8:10f.; 2 Cor. 4:10f.; Eph. 1:19f.). Thirdly, his aim is to share Christ's sufferings. Paul spoke of his being associated with his Lord in His death in two ways. There is that identification with Christ in His death and resurrection that baptism signifies, a death with Him to sin, and new life with Him and in Him to righteousness (cf. Rom. 6:1–6; Gal. 2:20; 5:24). Leading on from that into the whole of Christian life and service, there is a sharing of His sufferings and death, in that death to self of which Jesus himself spoke (Mk. 8:34f.), and in the willingness to suffer that His saving gospel may go out to all men. Paul often spoke of this (e.g. 2 Cor. 4:7–12; Gal. 6:17; Col. 1:24f.); here he describes it as his great ambition and longing. 11 This verse comes to us strangely now. Does not attaining to the resurrection depend on faith alone? Could the apostle be in doubt about his final salvation? He never lacked assurance that he was a child of God, accepted with Him (Rom. 8:15–17; Gal. 4:6f.). Yet he was never complacent. Faith must endure to the end (cf. Heb. 3:14); the identification with Christ at baptism must lead to continual dying with Christ and life in His risen power, right to the end. Alternatively the phrase 'if by any means' (AV, RV) may be regarded as 'an expression not so much of doubt, as of humility' (C. J. Ellicott) in view of the goal contemplated (see also v. 21). 12, 13 It seems that there were in Philippi those who thought they had reached the goal of Christian perfection. Paul would never think of himself as having 'arrived' (Phillips), nor use of himself the word perfect. To the end he must press on, a man of one ambition. Christ has laid hold of him; he must, therefore, lay hold of that which is his Lord's purpose for him. He must forget the past —the failures and sins of the past, and also its achievements in the service of Christ—so that he may always be straining forward to what lies ahead in work for Christ and likeness to Christ. 14 He has one goal to which he must press on, the prize that is the fulfilment of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus, the 'imperishable wreath' of which he speaks in 1 Cor. 9:25.

Notes. 8 Refuse. The Greek word can mean 'garbage' (NEB) or 'dung' (AV). 11 Attain. Nine times in Acts the Greek verb is used for arriving at a place. Cf. Eph. 4:13 for a similar use to that here. 12 Perfect. The Greek uses a verb that can mean 'complete', 'fulfil', or 'make perfect', one used in relation to initiation in the mystery cults which may have influenced the thought and expression of the Philippian Christians. There is a Christian perfection (Eph. 4:13–16), but Paul must speak of it as a goal he set himself and had not attained. Press on. The word means literally 'pursue', and has been used in v. 6 for Paul's persecuting the Christians. 13 Straining forward. The picture, so often used by Paul, is that of a race, perhaps a chariot race, perhaps an athletic contest. 14 The prize. The word (Gk. brabeion) is used in the NT only here and in 1 Cor. 9:24. It is possible to think of the prize as Christ Himself (cf. v. 8), as 'God's call to the life above' (NEB), or as 'the crown of life' (Jas. 1:12), the gift of His grace to those who persevere faithfully in their calling to the end.

3:15–17 Exhortation to such Christian living

15 Paul has spoken of his own spiritual ambitions. He longs that those who would be mature in Christ, or who would call themselves 'perfect' (AV), would think in these terms. He can only rely on God to reveal to them what is mistaken in their thinking or deficient in their living. 16 From what has been attained, in them or in himself, he trusts that there will be no turning back. 17 He can only say that he has tried to provide a pattern of Christian living, and he desires to see that way of life, accepted already by genuine Christians around them, noted and followed by others also.

Notes. 15 Mature. This is the adjective cognate with the verb translated in v. 12 by the use of the word perfect. Since Paul will not apply that word to himself, it seems that here he is particularly addressing himself to those who (mistakenly) claimed perfection. Be thus minded. This is the same verb again as in 2:2, 5 (see notes). 17 We should not regard Paul's words as presumptuous. There was no NT at this time to be a guide for Christian conduct. The apostle knew, moreover, that ultimately Christian standards of behaviour must be embodied in life rather than code. So it was as much his duty to live a pure Christian life for others to follow, as it was to preach the pure gospel for them to believe. Then those who saw the example faithfully given had the responsibility of living by it themselves (cf. 1 Cor. 4:16; 11:1; 1 Thes. 1:6; 2:10; 2 Thes. 3:7, 9). Phillips paraphrases, 'let my example be the standard by which you tell who are the genuine Christians among those about you'; and in the light of what follows we can realize that this was Paul's meaning.

3:18–21 Warning concerning worldly living, and a call to the heavenly

18 From the thought of his own great ambitions fired by the love of Christ, and from the thought of those with a misguided concept of perfection, he turns to think of others within the Christian fold whose lives he can contemplate only with pain and grief. They may have been antinomian in thinking that they could hold the faith of Christ and be indifferent to moral issues; more likely they were like those whom Paul has described in 2:21 as looking after 'their own interests, not those of Jesus Christ'. They were enemies of the cross of Christ, not opposing its doctrinal significance (cf. Gal. 5:11; 6:12), but rejecting it as the central principle of the Christian's living (see on v. 10). 19 In fact it meant that instead of finding in the cross both salvation and their way of life, they were on the path to destruction, and they had chosen a life of self-indulgence. They took pride in the things which in fact were shameful (cf. Rom. 6:21); their minds were set on earthly things, and so inevitably they lived for earthly things. 20 The true Christian, in contrast, knows that his life and citizenship are even now in heaven with Christ (cf. Eph. 1:3; 2:6; Col. 3:1–4). He waits 'with longing expectation' (Weymouth) for his Lord from heaven, but he knows that a heavenly life now is a foretaste and pledge of what will be his (2 Cor. 5:5), and the hope that he has transforms his life (cf. 1 Jn. 3:2f.). 21 Christ's coming will mean the transformation of our lowly body to be like Him in His glory (cf. 1 Cor. 15:35–50; 2 Cor. 4:16 – 5:4; 1 Jn. 3:2), and that by the power of God, to whose working there can ultimately be no limitation or hindrance.

Notes. 19 The belly. The satisfaction of carnal appetites and selfish desires stands first in their lives. 20 Commonwealth. The corresponding Greek verb has been used in 1:27, and there as here AV has 'conversation' in the sense of 'behaviour'. The noun can be taken to mean their way of life as citizens—hence RV 'citizenship'. More literally the word means 'state' or commonwealth; it may have had special significance for the Philippians; as citizens of a Roman military colony (see Introduction), they looked to Rome and thought of Rome constantly—so as Christians they were to regard themselves as 'a colony of heaven' (Moffatt). 21 Our lowly body. AV 'vile' and Phillips 'wretched' are unfortunate renderings. The body is not despised, but it is a sign of 'our present lowly state' (Way)—the same word is used in Lk. 1:48. Now it is subject to passions and pains and limitations. It will be transformed to 'His glorious state' (Way).

4:1–23 EXHORTATIONS, THANKS AND GREETINGS

Paul's final paragraphs include exhortations, personal messages, and the acknowledgment of the Philippians' gifts. His grateful remembrance of the gifts from Philippi leads him to speak of the spiritual blessings that come from generous giving, and to say to his Philippian friends that for himself he has learnt to live with little or much, enabled in all things by the Lord who will also surely supply fully all their needs.

4:1–3 Personal appeals

1 First, there is a general appeal. The word therefore shows that it is based on what has gone before—the danger of the Judaizers, and the disappointment of the worldly-minded. The five words Paul uses in addressing his friends show his depth of feeling; he longs that they should stand firm in the Lord (cf. 1:27). 2 Then there is a special appeal. In 2:1–5 he has dealt in general terms with divisions and party-spirit in the church at Philippi. He knows, however, of one particular quarrel that is marring the witness of that church. He addresses himself directly to these two women, Euodia and Syntyche, and in such terms that neither could think the apostle had given her priority. 3 Moreover, he asks one of his closest and most trusty colleagues (unnamed, and so unknown to us) to help them, doubtless meaning him to help them to agree in the Lord. Yet he has words of encouragement for these women, as well as criticism; they 'shared' Paul's 'struggles in the cause of the Gospel' (NEB). Then, speaking like this of them, he must say the same of one other in particular, Clement. He is aware that there are many others of whom he might speak in commendation; they may not be mentioned here, but they can be assured of the one thing that matters supremely, their names are in the book of life (cf. Lk. 10:20).

Notes. 1 Long for. Cf. 1:8; 2:26. Crown. Cf. 1 Thes. 2:19. 2 Euodia and Syntyche are not otherwise known. 3 Laboured side by side. See on 1:27, where the same word is used. Clement is not otherwise known in the NT; it was quite a common name, and it is unlikely that this was the Clement who was important in the church in Rome at the end of the century. The book of life. The OT several times refers to a book in which names are writen of those accepted with God (e.g. Ex. 32:32; Dn. 12:1); because of God's gift of life to them it is called 'the book of life' in Ps. 69:28 (RV). In the NT it is spoken of most frequently in the book of Revelation.

4:4–7 A call to joy and prayerfulness

4 Yet again this call to joy is sounded (cf. 3:1)—joy in the Lord, united to Him, glorying in Him, doing His will. 5 The Christian is to be characterized by an attitude of forbearance, patience, gentleness towards all people, and this prompted by the realization of the nearness of the Lord. 6 Anxiety is to have no place in his life because in everything there can be prayer (cf. Mt. 6:25–34; 7:7–11; 1 Pet. 5:7). 'Anxiety and prayer are more opposed to each other than fire and water' (Bengel). Thanksgiving should always accompany prayer (see 1:3), because praise is always due to God, and because faith is quickened by the thought of what God has done already. 7 When prayer replaces worry, God's gift of the peace 'which transcends human understanding' (Phillips) comes in, and that peace acts as a sentry guarding the Christian's mind and emotions from being overwhelmed by the sudden onrush of fear, anxiety, or temptation.

Notes. 5 The Lord is at hand. This may refer to the nearness of the Lord to the believer, or the nearness of His coming, or both. 6 First there is here the general word for prayer, then supplication or 'petition' (NEB); the requests are the particular objects of supplication.

4:8, 9 A call to hold to the true and lovely

8 Paul uses eight words here to characterize the things which should fill the Christian's thought-life—the true and honest; things worthy and noble; just and right; pure and holy; lovely and beautiful; the things that are 'of good report' (AV), pleasant to hear about; the things that possess moral excellence (the best word for virtue in classical Greek thought); the things that are praiseworthy. Often the word think has been used in this Epistle (Gk. phroneō; see especially 2:2, 5; 3:15, 19); here the strong logizomai is used. 'Take such things into account,' Paul is saying; 'let them shape your attitudes'. 9 'Then translate such thinking into action' (cf. Rom. 12:2). The result will be the kind of life that follows the example seen and known from the apostle himself (see on 3:17); and not only will the peace of God be found, but the unfailing presence of 'the author and fountain of peace' (Michael). (Cf. 2 Cor. 13:11; 2 Thes. 3:16.)

4:10–20 Paul's attitude concerning the gifts from Philippi

10 The apostle now must speak of the gifts received. Probably he had acknowledged them already, but he is sending back Epaphroditus who brought them, and so he refers to them again. He rejoiced in their gifts. They represent a fresh blossoming (NEB) of their earlier ministry of giving to him—for a long time they had no opportunity to send. 11–13 Paul wants to make it clear, however, that he is not dependent on their gifts or seeking further provision. He has learnt the secret of contentment with outward circumstances, whether he has little or much. He knows his Lord will not fail to give what He sees to be necessary, and to strengthen him to face every situation.

14–16 Nevertheless he appreciated the kindness of the Philippians in expressing this partnership with him; indeed from the time when the gospel was first preached in Philippi, when he was in Thessalonica, and when he left Macedonia (Acts 16; 17), no other church in the area did as they did. 17, 18 He would reiterate that he is not seeking gifts for himself; much more he rejoices in the spiritual blessing that they receive in giving. Such was the spirit of their gifts, that they were as an offering and sacrifice to God, fragrant as the OT described sacrifices (Ex. 29:18; Ezk. 20:41) and as was the incense that accompanied sacrifice (cf. Jn. 12:3; 2 Cor. 2:16). 19 Giving in such a spirit will never impoverish, for it is an expression of love and trust in the God—my God, Paul says from his experience—who will supply every need, and that in the measure of his riches in glory in Christ Jesus. 20 For this fact, and for all that He is and has done, God is worthy to be praised for ever and ever.

Notes. 11 Content. The Greek word (autarkēs) literally means 'self-sufficient'. It was regarded by the Stoics as high virtue to be detached from outward circumstances, and to have resources in oneself to meet every situation. Paul uses the word in the sense of his being independent of circumstances, but his all-sufficient resources are by the grace of Christ who lives in him (cf. 2 Cor. 9:8; 1 Tim. 6:6). 12 I have learned the secret. The word for initiation into the mystery cults is used. 15 Paul feels it wise to remind them that the partnership was in both giving and receiving—1 Cor. 9:11 explains. 17 To your credit. Here and in v. 15 the word for an account is used, and other expressions indicate that Paul is using metaphors from business transactions: 'profit' (NEB) or 'interest' (Moffatt) in this verse, and full payment in v. 18. The apostle, however, would have repudiated the least thought of earning anything from God; everything received is a gift of His grace.

4:21–23 Concluding greetings

21 The letter closes with mutual good wishes in Christ Jesus. 22 It is significant that there were Christians in Caesar's household, especially if this was the imperial palace in Rome; the expression means not members of Caesar's family, but 'persons employed in the domestic and administrative establishment of the Emperor' (Beare). 23 The Epistle closes as it began with that prayer, which embraces every other petition, for the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Colossians

INTRODUCTION

DESTINATION

This Epistle was sent to Colossae (1:2), which was a small, relatively unimportant city in the Lycus valley. The place was situated about 100 miles E of Ephesus and was in a group with two other cities. Laodicea and Hierapolis, both of which were more flourishing than Colossae. In all three centres Christian churches had been established (see 4:13). It would appear, however, that Paul himself had not visited them (cf. 1:4; 2:1). He mentions Epaphras as one from whom the Colossians had learned (1:7, 8) and it seems reasonable to conjecture that he was the founder of the church at Colossae. Paul's connection with these Christians is second-hand, yet nonetheless real. As Gentiles he regarded them as coming within the sphere of his personal responsibility, and in 1:7 (see note in loc.) speaks of Epaphras as acting as his representative. There is no definite knowledge as to what earlier contact Epaphras had had with the apostle. In all probability he had become a Christian through Paul's influence. If this supposition is correct, it would be highly probable that it was during Paul's ministry at Ephesus that this occurred, for we know that during this time 'all the residents of Asia heard the word of the Lord' (Acts 19:10). It would be natural for a man like Epaphras to turn to his spiritual adviser when faced with difficulties in the course of his ministry.

AUTHORSHIP

The Epistle makes clear that the apostle Paul is the writer, not only by means of the opening greeting, but also in the body of the letter (1:23) and in the conclusion (4:18). The personality of the apostle shines through the whole letter. Moreover, as far as we know from extant records, no-one in ancient times ever had doubts about the authenticity of the Epistle. It was included in the earliest list of Pauline Epistles, even that compiled by the heretical Marcion. Yet in spite of this strong internal and external evidence, some objections have been raised against Pauline authorship. Those who take this line must first explain the references to Paul within the Epistle. It is suggested, therefore, that these references are pseudepigraphic devices used by some other author to give the impression of a Pauline Epistle. The main objections to authenticity are literary and historical, but it should be noted that advocates of non-Pauline authorship are in the minority. Some find stylistic differences from Paul's other letters, but the criteria for judging style are not accurate enough to place the authenticity in jeopardy (for details see my New Testament Introduction: the Pauline Epistles, 1961, pp. 168ff.).

The other problem relates to the supposed allusions in the Epistle to the Gnostic ideas of the 2nd century. This will be more fully dealt with under 'Occasion' below, but it should here be noted that a distinction needs to be drawn between incipient Gnosticism and fully-developed Gnosticism. (Cf. R. McL. Wilson, The Gnostic Problem, 1958.) There are no doubt points of contact with the former but not with the latter. Opponents of authenticity have invariably confused the two things. Moreover it has been thought that the Christology of Colossians shows features more developed than those found in Paul's other Epistles (as, for instance, the idea of cosmic reconciliation, cf. Col. 1:20), but when due allowance is made for the different purpose of the various letters there is nothing in this Epistle which could not have been written by the apostle.

A major consideration in support of authenticity is the close connection between this Epistle and Philemon. They both mention a number of people who were associated with Paul (cf. Col. 4:7–17; Phm. 2, 23, 24). Of special importance is the fact that Onesimus, the chief subject of the Philemon letter, is mentioned in Col.4:9 as being 'one of yourselves'. The conclusion is inescapable that both Epistles were written at the same time. But the authenticity of Philemon remains unchallenged and furnishes a strong probability that Colossians is equally reliable. We may therefore with confidence accept the ascription of the Epistle to Paul as genuine.

OCCASION

Nowhere in this Epistle does the apostle specifically state the situation which caused him to write, but this may be inferred from the contents with a fair degree of detail. Evidently Epaphras, who was one of the Colossians (Col. 4:12) and, as mentioned above, may well have been the founder of the church, had sought out Paul to tell him of the situation which had arisen at Colossae. In Col. 1:8 Paul states that Epaphras had made known to him the Colossians' love in the Spirit. He seems to have given him a favourable report of the healthy state of the church, but from various references to some who were trying to persuade the Colossians to pursue devious teachings it appears certain that false teachers of some kind were active in the vicinity. It was important for the apostle to fortify the Christians against this threat.

To obtain a clear picture of the occasion, it is therefore necessary to put together as far as possible the various threads, traceable in the Epistle, which had connection with the heresy. It is always more difficult to reconstruct the tenets of a heresy where our only data are those provided by the Christian answer to it. Care must be taken to avoid reading back too much into the positive approach which Paul gives. Some of the more leading features may be isolated without hesitation. In view of the great stress that Paul places on Christology in this Epistle, it is reasonable to suppose that the false teaching was defective in this respect. Any view of Christ which denied Him the pre-eminence in everything (cf. 1:18) would be inferior to Paul's view of Him. Indeed it is a fair inference that the exalted view of Christ set out in the whole section 1:15–20 was called out by the opposite tendencies of false teachers. Gnosticism in the 2nd century supplies a parallel in which Christ had become so far deteriorated that He had become no more than the last of a long series of intermediaries connecting man with God. There is no evidence that such an advanced deterioration in Christology had occurred as early as this Epistle was written, nor is the evidence which exists sufficient to prove that this Epistle was a product of the 2nd century (see under 'Authorship' above).

Another feature of the heresy is what Paul calls 'philosophy and empty deceit, according to human tradition, according to the elemental spirits of the universe' (2:8). These allusions seem to be based on two main streams of thought, one Gentile, the other Jewish. The word 'philosophy' is very general. Paul's concentration on its emptiness suggests that he had little time for its precepts. It may well have been a mixture of ideas drawn from Greek sources. It is worth noting that such words as fullness (1:19; 2:9) and knowledge (2:3) were familiar terms in contemporary speculative thought, although Paul uses them in a thoroughly Christian way. Again these words were current in 2nd-century Gnosticism. The 'fullness' was an abstract name for the absolute God who could have no direct contact with earth (known as the Emptiness or Kenōma). But these developed ideas are found at Colossae only in embryo, if at all. For a discussion of the probable meaning of elemental spirits, see the commentary in loc. It appears to be an allusion to the powerful spirit-world which was believed to exert influence on human affairs.

To add to the complexity of the Colossian situation there was the Jewish stream, seen most probably in the above reference to human tradition, since Judaism was notorious for its insistence on the importance of the tradition of the elders. In addition to this there were questions of food and drink (apparently a reference to food taboos) and of festivals, new moons and sabbaths (2:16). All these are easily intelligible in a Jewish setting. Twice in the Epistle circumcision is mentioned (2:11; 3:11). Moreover, there was some stress on asceticism as is clear from 2:21, another feature which would well fit into a Jewish setting. One element in the heresy which is not easy to place is angel-worship (2:18). While there was great respect for angels among the Jews, there is no evidence that during this period angels were the objects of worship. This development may have been the result of the fusion of Greek and Jewish elements.

It is clear from this brief survey that some kind of syncretistic movement was on foot and was threatening to affect the Colossians. There are features which show parallels in Gnosticism and it may be surmised therefore that this was a kind of pre-Gnostic Gnosticizing tendency. An example of the confluence of Jewish and Hellenistic ideas, more contemporary with the apostolic period, is to be seen in the Qumran Community, whose library contained MSS of Gentile origin. The Community itself, however, remained essentially Jewish. It is not possible to define the Colossian heresy more closely, but enough has been said to describe the background to the Epistle and to enable a reasonable assessment of its purpose.

PURPOSE

Bearing in mind the nature of the false teaching, it is evident that Paul regarded it as an urgent matter to warn the Colossians about the danger and this subject forms the main purpose of the first half of the Epistle. Paul's clear insight into the nature of Christian doctrine never shows more clearly than when he is countering wrong emphases or definite errors. In writing the Epistle, he may have been doing so at the request of Epaphras, who was himself apparently unable to cope with the situation. At all events, an answer from so authoritative a Christian apostle as Paul would carry great weight with the Colossians. Another subsidiary purpose was to give a series of practical exhortations calculated to develop in them a more healthy Christian life. This is done in chs. 3 and 4 in two ways, first by giving general principles and then by adding specific examples affecting the homelife of the Christians.

The most important section is that which sets out Paul's Christological position. The pre-eminence of Christ is the focal point (1:18) and the various aspects of this pre-eminence are seen in the fact that He is the image of God (1:15), the fullness of God (1:19), the Creator (1:16) and the head of the church (1:18). Not only does Paul aim to give an exalted view of Christ's Person, but also of His work, for He has delivered from darkness (1:13), has redeemed from sin (1:14), has reconciled men through the blood of His cross (1:20ff.) and has disarmed spiritual forces (2:15). Moreover, He has become the believer's life (3:4), having shared with him the effects of His own death and resurrection. In this Epistle, therefore, Paul succinctly gives to the Colossians a remarkable and comprehensive view of the Christian's inheritance 'in Christ'.

PLACE AND DATE OF ORIGIN

It has been traditionally held that this Epistle was written during Paul's imprisonment at Rome. The apostle makes little comment on his captivity, although he requests the readers to remember his fetters (4:18). Of those imprisonments of which we learn in Acts, Rome seems the only reasonable choice, although a few scholars have preferred Caesarea. The greetings from Paul's associates in ch. 4 suggest that, in spite of Paul being imprisoned, they had direct access to him, and this feature supports the view that the Roman imprisonment of Acts 28:30 furnishes the setting for this Epistle. Since the letter to Philemon, however, was sent at the same time (see Introduction to that Epistle), the place of origin of both letters is affected by the position of Onesimus who had run away from his master. In view of the distance between Colossae and Rome, this is considered an obstacle to a Roman origin. Some scholars have suggested Ephesus, on the assumption that there was an Ephesian imprisonment which, however, must be recognized as no more than an inference. Certainly if Paul were at Ephesus, it would be easier to conceive of Onesimus absconding there—a distance of 100 miles. But it might be argued that a runaway slave would get as far away as possible to escape detection. The balance of evidence still favours a Roman origin.

What part of the Roman imprisonment makes the best setting for this Epistle is impossible to decide, and we must be content with this approximate dating.

COMMENTARY

1:1–8 SALUTATION AND THANKSGIVING

1, 2 In most of his Epistles Paul introduces himself as an apostle of Jesus Christ. This is no formal title, but a claim to a God-given authority, which is supported by the further phrase by the will of God. Some see this as evidence that Paul is on the defensive, but since there is no indication in the Epistle that his authority had been challenged, it is more reasonable to see this as a reflection of his deep awareness of his high calling. He writes to these Colossians, not as a self-appointed teacher, but as a man called to a special office by God. A similar introduction is found in the Epistle to the Ephesians, but without the salutation from Timothy our brother, who is nevertheless mentioned in several other Pauline Epistles and was one of his closest associates. The addressing of the Epistle to the saints is also characteristic (cf. 1 Cor. 1:2; 2 Cor. 1:1; Eph. 1:1; Phil. 1:1). The word is used in the sense of 'set apart', here qualified by the expression in Christ, which suggests a closely knit community linked by the common bond of allegiance to Christ. The deeper idea of incorporation in Christ is probably also in Paul's mind in view of the important discussion on the glory of Christ's Person in vv. 15–23. The joining of grace and peace in the greeting, which is also a characteristic of Paul, not only links the familiar Greek and Hebrew salutations but invests both with a spiritual meaning.

3–8 Paul follows the usual pattern of giving thanks for his readers, but this is no mere convention on his part. His thanksgiving here is full of spiritual reminders, which were calculated to inspire his readers. It also gives some indication of the way in which the apostle became acquainted with the situation in the church at Colossae, which he had not yet visited.

3 We always thank God. The plural may include both Paul and Timothy, or may be a stylistic plural. Since from 1:23 Paul uses the singular when referring to his own experience, the former alternative is to be preferred. The word always, reflecting the warm enthusiasm of Paul for those for whom he feels responsibility, is to be taken with the following phrase, when we pray for you. In vv. 4, 5 Paul proceeds to give the content of his thanksgiving. 4 It is based on reliable information about their faith and love, the former in relation to Christ, the latter in relation to other Christians. Neither without the other would be complete. 5 Moreover, both are motivated by hope. This is not a merely pious desire, but a robust certainty laid up . . . in heaven. The Christian is not bound by this life only. Even his attitude to Christ and to others is affected by what he knows will take place in the future, although its precise nature is still not clearly seen. Cf. 1 Cor. 13 for the linking of faith, love and hope; also 1 Thes. 1:3; 5:8. You have heard before refers to the knowledge they gained of the Christian hope at the time of their conversion. This was before they heard any false teaching. The twofold description of what they have heard is significant. It identifies the gospel with the word of the truth and is probably intended to contrast with the 'gospel' of the false teachers. 6 Bearing fruit and growing. It is because Paul recognizes that the gospel has within it the latent capacity for growth that he can speak of it coming to the whole world, although as yet only a small part of the known world had been evangelized. By bearing fruit, Paul means showing evidence of some spiritual maturity and of the practical effects of Christianity. He is confident that such growth has taken place in his readers. Another description of the gospel is given as the grace of God in truth, which, while again stressing the reliability of the gospel, draws attention to its essential basis in grace, i.e. in the unmerited favour of God towards those who believe. It is one of the apostle's favourite words. The expression in truth could alternatively be understood in the sense 'as it truly is', 'untravestied' (C. F. D. Moule, The Epistles of Paul the Apostle to the Colossians and to Philemon, 1957). Any other interpretation of the gospel which denied its basis in grace would be false.

7, 8 It was through one of the Colossians, Epaphras, that Paul had received knowledge of their faith and love. He has two complementary descriptions of Epaphras—our beloved fellow servant and a faithful minister of Christ. Both 'servant' and 'minister' were words that Paul delighted to use of himself, and wherever possible to use of others. The first word means literally 'bond-slave' and Paul's idea is that he and Epaphras are both owned by the same master. The second word (Gk. diakonos) relates more specifically to the task, an attendance to the duties laid upon him by Christ. On our behalf is a well supported reading, although some authorities read 'on your behalf'. The former is to be preferred, drawing attention as it does to the fact that Epaphras was acting as Paul's representative when preaching at Colossae. He was not therefore a free lance, but an authorized minister. Once again Paul draws attention to the Colossians' love, which he clearly regards as of great importance (cf. 1 Cor. 13). The words in the Spirit are best applied as in RSV to the Holy Spirit, but the Greek could sustain the meaning 'in the spiritual sphere'. Paul would never have conceived the possibility of this kind of love apart from the Holy Spirit. It was essentially one of the fruits of the Spirit (cf. Gal. 5:22).

1:9–14 PRAYER

The prayers of Paul are a rewarding study and none more so than this one. Not only does it tell us much about Paul's desire for these Colossians, but provides a valuable pattern for the prayer-life of the believer.

9 From the day we heard of it echoes the language of v. 6, and shows that Paul still has in mind all he has said in the preceding passage. Prayer and thanksgiving are closely linked in his Epistles. Paul is never tired of stressing the constancy of his prayer for those committed to his charge. The first petition is for true knowledge . . . wisdom and understanding. This knowledge is centred in the will of God, thus distinguishing it from all other knowledge, particularly from the kind being vaunted by the false teachers (cf. 2:8). All these words depicting a reasoning approach were current intellectual catchwords which Paul uses in a new and thoroughly Christian way; hence the use of the adjective spiritual. There can be no doubt that knowledge of God's will is the basic need of every Christian. The prayer echoes that of our Lord, 'Thy will be done'.

10 The second petition concentrates on the outcome, the putting into practical effect of the knowledge concerning God's will. A life worthy of the Lord brings out the noble ideal of Christian living. The Lord is best understood as a reference to Christ. The ideal is made even nobler by the addition of the words fully pleasing to him. Although the word translated pleasing (areskeia) originally conveyed a cringing attitude towards superiors, when related to God it implies complete and willing submission to His sovereign purpose. Paul leaves no room for self to have any say in the religious ideal. Two specific outcomes of such committal to the pleasing of God are constant fruit-bearing and further knowledge. The apostle's emphasis on good work is an important corrective for those who thought his rejection of salvation by works (cf. especially Romans and Galatians) meant his disinterest in Christian good works. Such works are the means by which others can see the fruitfulness of the Christian life. The reiteration of knowledge is important as showing that this is a progressive activity. Knowledge of God's will is a means of attaining more knowledge of God Himself. The repetition of the idea of fruit-bearing and growth (cf. v. 6) shows how strongly this idea appealed to the apostle. For him Christianity was no static concept.

11 The third request is for spiritual strength. Such a request at once draws attention to man's inability to produce good work or acquire true knowledge in his own strength. Strengthened with all power sounds comprehensive enough, but becomes doubly so when linked with the further phrase according to his glorious might. As Lightfoot remarks, 'The power communicated to the faithful corresponds to, and is a function of, the Divine might whence it comes' (J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, 1900). The expression suggests that the might of God is an aspect of His glory. Although men cannot see God and live, they can see the evidences of His power and can share in it. But the outworking is not in spectacular wonders, but in endurance under trial. When Paul adds with joy, he clearly distinguishes the Christian from the Stoic in his attitude towards affliction.

12–14 The prayer ends with a remarkable petition that the Colossians should give thanks for their hope. Paul is not content merely to thank God himself. He wants others to do the same. 12 The Father, who has qualified us. Some strong ancient authorities read 'you' instead of 'us', but this is difficult in view of the next verse which must read 'us'. On the other hand, since Paul is wanting the Colossians themselves to give thanks, it would not be pointless to remind them of their share in the inheritance. His mind goes to the imagery of the inheritance of the Israelites in the promised land. The Jews regarded all other nations as dwelling in darkness but held out no hope that they would ever come to the light. But the gospel is different. The expression, the inheritance of the saints in light, contrasts the hope of the people of God (whether Jew or Gentile) with the darkness of the unbelieving world around. This inheritance is not to be attained through human effort. It is God who takes the initiative, as is clear from the following verses.

13, 14 The conclusion of the prayer makes some statements of deep theological significance, which leads naturally into the profound view of Jesus Christ contained in the next section. The word delivered (v. 13) conjures up the picture of a conqueror who has overcome the enemy and has set free the people previously enslaved by him (as, for example, at the Exodus). Paul thinks of two kingdoms at war with one another. The dominion of darkness is contrasted with the kingdom of his beloved Son, but different words are used to express the contrasted ideas. The first word (exousia) means 'authority' and seems to draw attention to demonic authorities. These were the agents of evil, for which darkness was an accepted symbol. The contrast between light and darkness is familiar in NT thought (cf. Johannine literature). It was prominent also in the Jewish community at Qumran, where the initiates were called the sons of light, and their mission in life was to battle with the sons of darkness. The word translated kingdom (basileia) is used in the sense of 'reign', i.e. in an essentially personal sense. The Colossian converts had experienced a transformation from slavery to freedom. The words translated his beloved Son mean literally 'son of His love', which throws the emphasis on the Father's love, of which the Son is the perfect expression. The transference to the Son's kingdom is defined in v. 14 in two important terms, redemption (apolytrōsis) and forgiveness (aphesin). The former idea has its basis for Paul's thinking in the release of slaves on payment of a ransom price. Such a work was performed by Christ and involves forgiveness. Redemption releases from the power of sin and forgiveness from its guilt. There can be no finer motive for thanksgiving than remembrance of what God in Christ has done.

1:15–23 A REVELATION OF JESUS CHRIST

Nowhere else in the Epistle does the apostle express such profound theological ideas as in this passage. There has been much debate whether he has here incorporated an existing hymn to Christ (cf. the discussion of the evidence by R. P. Martin, EQ, Oct.–Dec. 1964). Whatever the conclusion which is reached, all would agree that Paul sees the need at this point to appeal to the supremacy of Jesus Christ, which may well be an indication that the false teachers in question were advancing an inadequate view of Him. In this section there are some evidences of OT background, particularly the wisdom passage of Pr. 8:22ff., but the section itself cannot be interpreted from the OT point of view, since its key is the historic fact of Christ.

15 The image of the invisible God. This description of Christ follows immediately on Paul's reference to 'the beloved Son' and must be interpreted accordingly. This will immediately indicate an understanding of image (eikōn) in the sense of personal relationship. The Son is the image of His Father. But more precise discussion of the significance of the word is necessary. A parallel with Gn. 1:26f. immediately springs to mind. Man was created in the image of God, which relates to his moral nature. Even more essentially is Christ the image of God. The importance of the parallel has some bearing on the doctrine of incarnation (as Bruce points out, E. K. Simpson and F. F. Bruce, Commentary on the Epistles to the Ephesians and the Colossians, 1957). It is because man bore God's image that it was possible for God to become man. In this way what otherwise would be invisible becomes visible to man. These words are difficult to understand except against the background of the pre-existence of Christ. They are, in fact, illuminated by the following phrase. For other NT statements of a similar kind, cf. Jn. 1:18; Heb. 1:3.

The first-born of all creation. The meaning of the word first-born (prōtotokos) is crucial for a right understanding of Paul's conception of Christ. The real problem is whether or not this word implies that Christ was included in creation, whether in other words there is any sense in which Christ can be described as a created being. If the word is considered out of context, it would be possible to make a case for the inclusive meaning as paralleled, for instance, in Rom. 8:29. But the context makes clear that Christ is the agent of creation, which at once places Him above it. In this case the word first-born must be understood in the sense of 'supreme' rather than in the temporal sense of 'born before'. The sovereignty of Christ over the created world is supported by other NT statements (cf. Jn. 1:3; Heb. 1:2). On the other hand some meaning would be missed if the term were emptied of any inclusive meaning. There is a sense in which the incarnate Christ became part of the creation over which He is sovereign. See the comment on v. 18 for further light on the use of the same term.

16 For in him all things were created. This is an important elucidation of the preceding statement. The conjunction for (hoti) supplies the basis for that statement and supports the contention that first-born does not include Christ in the creation. The all things here are identical to the 'all creation' in v. 15 and since all things are in him, He cannot Himself be part of the 'all things'. The words in him can be understood either as instrumental (by means of) or as local (within Him). The latter idea would see the created order as having its abode in Christ. There is some parallel for this idea in the Stoic doctrine of the Logos and in Philo. But the present statement of Paul's presents a fully Christian interpretation of the creation as finding its essential unity in Christ.

The rest of this verse makes the first statement more explicit, especially enlarging it against the background of the false teaching being combatted. In heaven and on earth links the two aspects of creation and excludes the possibility of any separation between them. The heretics may well have placed too much stress on heavenly beings as instrumental in influencing human actions. For Paul there could be no beings outside the sovereignty of Christ whether visible or invisible. There are several words used in the NT to describe angelic agencies and the four mentioned in this verse—thrones, dominions, principalities, authorities—may be regarded as different ranks of supernatural beings. Such an interpretation would fit in with current speculation regarding such beings. Paul is not only convinced that such unseen agencies exist, but also that all are subordinate to Christ. The last statement that all things were created through him and for him contains an important development of the first statement in the verse. Instead of 'in him', Paul now says through him (dia) and for him (eis), the first stressing that Christ was agent in creation, the second that He was its goal. From start to finish the created order is bound up with the Person of Christ. In no more vivid way could Paul express his exalted view of Christ.

17 He sums it all up by making two further statements which underline Christ's supremacy over all creation. In saying that he is before all things, Paul may mean (a) exists before, or (b) exists superior to, or (c) is before, or (d) is superior to. Although all are possible, the first seems to accord best with the context and is supported by the more usual meaning of the Greek pro (before). The thought that all things hold together in Christ again brings out the idea that Christ is the unifying and cohering factor in creation (cf. Heb. 1:3).

18, 19 So far in this statement about Christ, the thought has been concentrated on creation generally, but now Paul deals with Christ's relationship with the church. The idea of the church as a body has parallels elsewhere (cf. Eph. 1:22, 23; 4:15; Col. 2:19). In 1 Cor. 10 and 12 and Rom. 12:5 the figure of the body is rather differently applied because there in those cases Paul is thinking of the relation of the members to each other. Here it is the Headship of Christ which is prominent. 18 Head of the body is an expression which brings out the supreme importance of Christ in His church. No member of the body can even exist and certainly cannot function without the head. The figure of the body is moreover valuable in stressing the oneness of the church. The word translated beginning (archē) has a variety of possible meanings which may be summarized, as Moule suggests, as supremacy in rank, precedence in time or creative initiative. He inclines to the latter, but in view of the following statement that Christ is first-born from the dead, the second interpretation seems also in view (cf. Lightfoot). Here the same word, first-born, occurs as in v. 15, but here must be understood in an inclusive sense, since others will rise from the dead in consequence of Christ's resurrection. The repetition of the same word shows that in Paul's mind a direct parallelism exists between Christ's relation to the creation and to the church. The new creation came into existence by the same principles as the old. Paul's aim in all these statements comes to focus when he speaks of Christ as pre-eminent. The goal of both old and new creations is to show the supremacy of Christ. This evidently was a truth inadequately held or else denied by the heretics.

19 Fullness of God. When the apostle connects Christ with the fullness (plērōma) he is making another statement which directly bears on the Colossian heresy. The word was later used in Gnostic thought to describe the absolute being of God, but it cannot be established that the Colossians were using it in the same sense. If they were, Paul would be saying that there is no gulf, as the Gnostics maintained, between God and Christ, for the fullness of God dwells in Christ. But if the Colossian heresy, as is most probable, was not as advanced as this, Paul would be saying that all that can be conceived of God dwells in Christ, thus expressing the highest possible view of the Person of Christ. Was pleased to dwell. RSV here makes 'fullness' the subject of the verb, but there is much to be said for making God the subject, since the verb is used in a personal sense. On the other hand the subject of all the preceding statements is Christ and it seems strange suddenly to introduce God as subject. The verb expresses the Father's delight in the incarnation.

20–23 The thought now turns to the idea of reconciliation. Paul recognizes that in spite of what he has said about all things holding together in Christ, there is considerable disharmony in creation. The necessity for reconciliation is not questioned or discussed. It is assumed. But the means for reconciliation needs stressing. Through him points to Christ as the exclusive agent for such reconciling work. The verb 'reconcile' (apokatallassein) is elsewhere used only of persons and it seems strange for Paul to be speaking here of the reconciliation of things. It is a bold concept. But Paul was probably thinking of things in terms of the personal agencies which were believed to control them. More important is the method of reconciliation expressed in the words making peace by the blood of his cross. There can be no denying that by this Paul is thinking of the work of Christ in sacrificial terms. The importance of this for the apostle is evident from the many other occasions when he speaks of the blood of Christ (cf. Rom. 3:25; 5:9; 1 Cor. 11:25; Eph. 1:7). The whole expression sums up the effective meaning of the passion of Christ. The making of peace is a fitting interpretation of Christian reconciliation, involving as it does the removal of all obstacles between creature and Creator.

21 Already in v. 13 the apostle has dwelt on the remarkable transformations which are effected by Christ and he returns to the same theme here. Reconciliation involves a change of attitude on the part of the offending party. Hence a full recognition of the offence (here stated in the terms estranged and hostile in mind, doing evil deeds) will put in clearest perspective the wonder of the reconciling work of God. It is noteworthy that Paul describes the former state of these Colossian Christians in terms of thought as well as deed. Some moderns whose behaviour is relatively upright are nevertheless blameworthy in that they have rejected the authority of God. Man in his natural state is in revolt against God, estranged and hostile.

22 His body of flesh. There was probably a good reason for Paul expressing himself in this rather full manner. If he has in mind the type of error which came to fruition in Docetism, there would be an implied criticism of the view that Christ's body was not physical but apparent. But the word flesh may be added to distinguish body from its metaphorical use in v. 18. By his death would refute the view that Christ did not suffer. The purpose or perhaps the result of the reconciling work of Christ is next stated—to present you holy. The idea behind the verb is the presentation of sacrifice. Of the three adjectives here, holy is used in the sense of 'sacred' or separated to God, blameless in the sense of 'without blemish' (cf. Lightfoot), and irreproachable in the sense of 'not open to any charge'.

23 This moving passage is concluded by a condition—the need for stability. Firmness of faith will be evidence of the reality of the reconciliation. Not shifting from the hope of the gospel is another challenge to those tempted to fall for false teaching. The apostle considers it to be unnecessary to define gospel any further except to say it is that which had been preached, not only to them, but to every creature under heaven, a phrase which shows that Paul is dwelling on possibilities rather than actualities. The same gospel is the subject of Paul's ministry.

1:24 – 2:3 THE APOSTLE'S MINISTRY

In one sense this section is a digression in which Paul refers to his own calling. Yet it is not wholly unrelated to what precedes and what follows. Having just dwelt on the person and work of Christ, he is reminded of his high privilege in being a minister of such a gospel. And as he thinks of exposing some of the errors threatening these Colossians, he is reminded of the need to make clear his credentials before doing so.

24 My sufferings for your sake. Paul thinks of the hardships which he has had to endure in the preaching of the gospel as being in a sense on behalf of the whole church. Hence he can say for your sake, although he has never worked among the people of Colossae. Paul regards his sufferings as a means to an end. I complete what remains of Christ's afflictions. This statement raises difficulties for the interpreter. First, as to the meaning of the verb (antanaplēroō): this word suggests the supply of a deficiency from whatever source. But in what sense can Paul be thinking of a deficiency in the sufferings of Christ? He could not mean that Christ's death was inadequate and needed supplementing as a saving act. He must be thinking of afflictions in a different sense. Bruce appeals to the servant passages in Isaiah to supply the key, since he sees there, as here, an alternation between the servant as an individual and the servant as a corporate personality. In other words, Christ is still suffering through the sufferings of His people. What Paul endures is therefore an extension of the sufferings of Christ. These sufferings are on behalf of the body, the church as a whole, not just the local community.

25, 26 Paul's deep awareness of the divine office to which he was called (note again the divine initiative in this) comes to the forefront here, with its special purpose in the making known of the word of God. The word fully suggests 'bringing to completion', as if Paul's preaching was contributing to the ultimate consummation of God's purpose revealed in His Word. It is characteristic of Paul to describe the revelation as a mystery, which although long hidden is now made manifest. Some take the words ages and generations in a personal sense as does RSV mg. ('angels and men'), but the interpretation in the text is a closer rendering of the Greek. The manifestation is not unlimited, since it is restricted to his saints, i.e. to those capable of appreciating it. But there is no question here of Christian revelation being purposely hidden from the uninitiated, yet the plain fact is that its value cannot be recognized by those still in a state of hostility to God. 27 Indeed, Paul again points out the divine initiative in making the revelation known. The riches of the glory of this mystery. The stress falls on the word 'glory' as is clear from the further expression the hope of glory. It is a word which in the NT is inseparably bound up with the nature and activity of God. To Paul this is a treasure of inestimable wealth. The key to his thinking is found in the words Christ in you. It is not simply the glory of Christ in itself, but the revelation of Christ 'among' men, as the phrase could be understood, rather than in a mystical sense. 'Among you' would then be exactly parallel to 'among the Gentiles'.

28 Here Paul shares more specifically some of his thoughts regarding the ministry. He sees it as proclamation, exhortation and instruction, with the ultimate aim of presenting every man mature in Christ. All three activities of the minister of Christ are thus bent to a common spiritual end. The word for mature (teleios) means 'complete, fully developed'. It was later used among Gnostics for those privileged to be initiated into the higher realms of knowledge, a sense alien to the conception of Paul. It is not impossible that at this stage some of the false teachers were setting themselves up as an élite clique. If so the threefold occurrence of every man in this verse would contain a significant counterbalance.

29; 2:1 The apostle is desirous that the Colossians know how much effort he is putting into his ministry, even for those whom he has never met. But Paul does not rely on his own energy, for he recognizes that his real source of power is in Christ. There is a constant combination of human and divine energy in the Christian ministry. Those at Laodicea. The church in this place is mentioned again in Rev. 3. Paul had clearly not visited any of the churches in the Lycus Valley, in which case the words and for all who have not seen my face should be regarded as including the Colossians and Laodiceans (see Introduction).

2, 3 The apostle ends this section with a definition of his purpose, again expressed in a deeply spiritual manner. It involves encouragement towards brotherly love. The words knit together in love are suggestive, since the verb seems here to mean 'united, compacted', although it could mean 'instructed' as in LXX. The former brings out more vividly the essential unity of believers in Christ. The riches of assured understanding. Paul returns to the same word used in 1:27 for spiritual wealth, but here the wealth consists of an informed conviction and knowledge of God's mystery in Christ. The metaphor of wealth is continued in the expression all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, which is a repetition of ideas already expressed. The concept of all knowledge being hidden in Christ brings out His uniqueness. According to Lightfoot, wisdom involves the power of reasoning concerning those truths apprehended by knowledge. But Paul is probably not intending any fine distinction. In this whole passage he is like a man searching for words to express the value of the revelation which formed the basis of his gospel. No doubt he also had his eye on the false teachers as much as to say that the only kind of hidden knowledge (gnōsis) that he would countenance was what was hidden in Christ.

2:4–15 FALSE TEACHING AND THE CHRISTIAN ANSWER

The previous section leads naturally into this passage dealing with false teaching. 4 There were those using beguiling speech and what Paul is about to say is to prevent anyone being deluded. It is worth noting that the error arose from false speech rather than false practice. It is possible that the singular no one may indicate that the chief source of false teaching was an individual, but it is more likely that Paul is using the term generally in the sense of 'anyone'. 5 More than once in his Epistles Paul mentions his spiritual presence in churches when he is absent from them (cf. especially 1 Cor. 5:3–5). This is all the more significant when it is a church he has never visited. When speaking of your good order, Paul is using a military metaphor describing their preparation for the spiritual battle. The word firmness is similarly used to denote a solid front in matters of faith. Before challenging them to resist the false teaching, he rejoices over what he knows of them.

6 To receive Christ is but the beginning. The follow-up is to live in him, which is described as involving four aspects, the first three very similar. 7 Rooted, built up, established all probably borrow from a building metaphor, but express the same idea of reliability as is seen in the previous military metaphor. Just as you were taught reminds them of their Christian origins and contrasts them with those who had listened to a different type of teaching. The fourth aspect is abounding in thanksgiving, which echoes the apostle's own enthusiasm to give thanks.

8–15 It is here that the main allusions to the false teaching occur, although Paul gives nothing approaching a systematic analysis of it. 8 No one. See on v. 4. Philosophy and empty deceit. The apostle loses no time in summing up the teaching. Though seemingly intellectual, it was hollow —a vivid and almost contemptuous contrast with the riches in Christ. For the meaning of philosophy here see the Introduction. Human tradition. In all probability this is a reference to Jewish tradition. It was a poor substitute for divine revelation. The elemental spirits of the universe are placed in direct contrast to Christ. For this reason RSV is here undoubtedly correct in rendering the word (stoicheia) as spirits, although it could mean elementary ideas. It is not possible to be more specific but the power to delude would fit well into contemporary notions of the adverse influence of spirits on human actions.

9 The contrast with Christ leads Paul to make a profound theological statement about Him—For in him dwells the whole fullness of deity bodily. Every word here is significant. Christ is the focal point. The fullness (plērōma) may well be a catchword used by the false teachers to describe the transcendent God, as later Gnostics did. It was believed that the Pleroma was so transcendent that it was necessary for a long succession of intermediaries to connect man with God, of which the last in the succession was Christ. But in Paul's view no intermediaries are necessary. The Pleroma dwells directly in Him. The word deity (theotētos) occurs only here in the NT and denotes the divine essence. There is some dispute about the sense in which the word bodily is to be understood. Moule gives five interpretations, but the most probable are (a) 'as an organized body' referring to the totality of the Godhead as distinct from the hierarchy of spiritual beings, or (b) 'assuming a bodily form', referring to the incarnation. Common usage favours the second. It is because the fullness took on some visible form in Christ that it became knowable to man. It is worth noting that the verb is in the present tense which points to the continuing effect of the incarnation as an act of revelation. 10 The fullness in Christ is next transferred to the fullness of the salvation He brings. The Greek behind the words fullness of life in him is literally 'you are fulfilled in Him', which vividly draws attention to the inadequacy of life apart from Him. Paul is still bearing the false teaching in mind for he next asserts that Christ is the head of all rule and authority, which would include those spiritual agencies to which the false teachers were appealing. This is an extension of the Headship of Christ referred to in 1:18.

11 Paul is more concerned to point out the positive teaching about Christ than the negative teaching of the false teachers. In him also you were circumcised. The abrupt introduction of the theme of circumcision suggests that there was some confusion on this subject among the Colossians. Some of the false teachers were possibly making it a condition of salvation as happened among the Galatian churches. Paul is thinking of a new kind of circumcision, which he calls the circumcision of Christ, by which he means not Christ's Jewish circumcision, but His passion, which was essentially putting off the body of flesh. Alternatively the latter phrase could be understood in a spiritual sense of the putting away of self. In view of the fact that Paul next deals with Christian baptism as an identification with Christ's burial, it seems better to accept the former interpretation, especially as in vv. 14, 15 the reference to the passion is specific. 12 The figure of baptism is seen by Paul to be illustrative of death and resurrection, but has no meaning apart from the identification of the believer with Christ. The additional words, through faith in the working of God, make clear that the external rite is dependent on a right approach, in the same way that Christ Himself depended on the activity of God in His resurrection (cf. 1 Pet. 3:21).

13, 14 To draw attention to the transformation which had already taken place in these Colossians, Paul contrasts their past with their present. Dead in trespasses. Men who live without God do not readily admit that they were dead in trespasses. But once new life comes in Christ, the character of their previous state of sin becomes increasingly clear. Paul is speaking to Gentiles; hence the expression, the uncircumcision of your flesh. True life is inseparable from a right relationship with God and for this reason Paul dwells on God's method of forgiveness. He uses the metaphor of a bond (cheirographon), which Moule describes as 'an "IOU", a statement of indebtedness' which had to be signed by the debtor as an acknowledgment of his debt. The debt was impossible to pay. Moreover it was backed by legal demands, since every trespass is a violation of the law of God. The only hope was for someone to cancel the debt. Paul imagines God taking the statement of debts and nailing it to the cross of Christ, a vivid way of saying that the death of Christ is the basis of God's forgiveness of man's sin.

15 The metaphor changes again as Paul thinks of God's master-stroke in Christ. He is reminded of a conqueror's triumphal procession in which the captives of war are exhibited to enhance the conqueror's own glory. The enemies here are spiritual—principalities and powers—which have nevertheless been disarmed, i.e. robbed of all further opportunity to do harm. God made a public example of them, not only in the sense that all can see, but also as an act of defiance against those powers which were challenging His authority. They now presented a sorry spectacle, utterly defeated. In him (i.e. 'in Christ') is better than 'in it' (i.e. in the cross), since God is the subject of the whole sentence.

2:16 – 3:4 A RIGHT APPROACH TO LIFE AND WORSHIP

In the last section Paul has dealt with some basic principles arising from the false teaching. In this he comes to more practical matters.

16, 17 Therefore links the two sections together. In view of Christ's triumph over all spiritual adversaries, it would be foolish to allow anyone to pass judgment over such matters as food and festivals. Paul is here referring to any system which makes salvation dependent on the observance of certain food taboos or rigid adherence to the observance of certain days as sacred. The Jews were guilty of doing this and such an approach may well have been shared by the false teachers. Paul thinks of the contrast between a shadow and its substance as a fitting illustration of the relationship between a ritual religion and Jesus Christ. Whatever symbols are used, they must never be mistaken for the real thing.

18 Another practical matter concerned modes of worship. The statement in this verse raises some difficulties because of our lack of sufficient knowledge of the practices being combatted. Let no one disqualify you seems to mean 'Let no-one deprive you of your rightful prize', an illustration from the athletic arena. But who could deprive them? Paul goes on to speak of self-abasement and worship of angels as being required, as if these things were encumbrances preventing the athlete from running. An underestimate of oneself is a serious impediment in a race, but what is meant by angel-worship? It seems best to regard this as a reference to the usurping by angels of the true place of Christ as the only Mediator. This would be tantamount to the athlete going off course altogether. The meaning of the words taking his stand on visions has been much debated. The Colossians would probably associate the verb which Paul uses with the mystery religions, where it was used of the entry of the initiate to a higher stage of knowledge. In this case, the Colossians were being pressed by nothing more substantial than ecstatic visions to pursue spiritual advancement. The difficulty is that the visions are spoken of in the past tense (ha heōraken). Some have suggested emendations to the text, assuming a corruption, but without MS evidence. Yet the above interpretation seems to make reasonable sense. The words his sensuous mind literally represent 'the mind of his flesh', but no doubt RSV captures Paul's basic meaning. Those relying on visions and the like are placing more reliance than they should on their own mental powers, which results in spiritual pride.

19 Already in 1:18 Paul has introduced the metaphor of a body to describe the church with Christ as its Head, and he returns to the figure here to develop the imagery. Those who are seeking to lead the Colossians astray show by that fact that they are out of harmony with the Head. One of the signs that a body is wholly under the direction of the head is that all parts of it, joints and muscles, act as a unity. It is a remarkable picture of the essential oneness of the church of Christ. The words nourished and knit together are worth noting. The former means 'equipped', in the sense that the body, if it is to function as a body, must be furnished with joints and ligaments which facilitate healthy growth. For the other word, see 2:2 where the same close unity is in view. Growth that is from God (lit. 'the growth of God') shows the pattern for the true development of the church.

20–23 Paul's argument proceeds on the basis of what should follow if the Colossians had been identified with Christ in His death. 20 If with Christ you died should be compared with the if-clause of 3:1. The death involved the overthrow of the elemental spirits (cf. v. 14). The Christian can no longer view the world as if the spirits still controlled it. Paul appeals to them on this ground not to be inconsistent. If the regulations were tied up with things now done away with in Christ, it would be equally unreasonable to submit to them. 21, 22 The apostle cites some examples of such outworn regulations. They have a strongly Jewish flavour, since taboos of various kinds were integral to Judaism, but asceticism was not confined to Judaism in the ancient world. The Pythagoreans, e.g., were given to ascetic practices. Paul is clearly quoting the precise prohibitions and then comments that they concern perishable (as contrasted with eternal) things, and are anyway based on human (rather than divine) teaching. 23 This verse is difficult. These have indeed an appearance of wisdom refers back to food taboos. The word for appearance (logos) is used here in the sense of 'reputation'. Outwardly they were regarded as wise. Their aims appeared good, involving considerable self-discipline. Yet Paul's comment is that they are of no value in checking the indulgence of the flesh. An alternative reading, given in RSV mg., has 'serving only to indulge the flesh', but this is less probable when linked with the previous phrase severity to the body. What Paul appears to mean is that in spite of rigid self-discipline, taboos of the kind mentioned leave untouched the moral problems of sensual indulgence. He finds the answer in the Christian's higher life, to which he next turns.

3:1–4 This paragraph is intended to parallel the last. Both are introduced with an if-clause, the first, 'if with Christ you died', being inseparably linked with the second, if then you have been raised with Christ. In the former section the emphasis was mainly negative; in this it is positive. In fact Paul proceeds with this double view in his next sections—'Put off' and 'Put on'. Christian living always has both negative and positive aspects.

1 Raised with Christ. There appears to be an allusion here to baptism, in view of 2:12. In that act is symbolized being both 'buried' and 'raised' with Christ. Since baptism may be regarded as representing the entry point into the Christian church, it serves as a picture of Paul's thought here. 2:20–23 speaks of dying with Christ, and this section of 'resurrection' with Christ. This kind of resurrection-life clearly involves transformation, an essentially new beginning which brings responsibilities and challenges. Lightfoot calls it 'a removal into a new sphere of being'. It is fitting, therefore, that the more practical section of the Epistle should be introduced in this way. Seek the things that are above, where Christ is. In v. 2 the word 'above' is seen as the opposite of 'things that are on earth', and denotes the spiritual as contrasted with the merely material. Paul is aware that this might result in nebulous ideas, if not linked with Christ, and hence his addition here. He conceives of Christian life as a constant quest with Christ Himself as the goal. The place of Christ at the right hand of God is a familiar NT theme (cf. Acts 2:33; 5:31; 7:55; Rom. 8:34; Eph. 1:20; Heb. 1:3, 13; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2; 1 Pet. 3:22; Rev. 3:21). In many of these references, especially in Hebrews, he is said, as here, to be seated, an idea which is borrowed from the imagery of enthronement, which comes from Ps. 110:1. It speaks of the glory and triumph of Christ.

2 The change from 'seek' in v. 1 to set your minds (phronein) in this verse emphasizes even more vividly the mental re-orientation which new life in Christ necessitates. The verb is a favourite one with Paul, denoting the whole mental activity, not simply an occasional thought. 3 Here again is the idea of union with Christ in death and new life. But why does the apostle return to this? No doubt because he feared that it was difficult for the Colossians to grasp that the old life had no more hold upon them. They now had a new centre. Their whole existence was to be God-orientated. The hiddenness is as far as the world is concerned, which cannot fail to cause misunderstanding on its part.

4 In this verse is the sole reference in this Epistle to the second coming, but it forms an essential part of Paul's thought here. Although the new life-secret is now hidden, it will not always be so. When Christ . . . appears, . . . you also will appear. Throughout this portion of the Epistle Paul is constantly stressing the close identification of the believer with Christ and he now relates this to the return of Christ. Christ who is our life is a development of v. 3 in that Christ is now seen as the centre of life, rather than simply associated with our life. It is also noticeable that Paul says our to include himself, although some texts have your, no doubt influenced by the previous verse. In glory. Paul is reminded of the believer's glorious hope (cf. Rom. 8:17). Whatever the present experiences, the future holds out nothing less than a share in the glory of Christ Himself.

3:5–17 THE PRINCIPLES OF CHRISTIAN LIVING

This exposition may be subdivided into two parts, vv. 5–11 setting out the negative side—what must be put away; and vv. 12–17 dealing with the positive side—what must be put on. In both sections are found lists of qualities which were a familiar feature of the ancient world, but in Paul's hands become invested with new meaning.

5 Put to death. Bruce renders this 'reckon as dead', but the verb is probably stronger than that. The only other occasions when the same verb is used (Rom. 4:19; Heb. 11:12) relate to Sarah and Abraham when the Isaac promise was given. But here it is used metaphorically. It suggests that some effort is needed to deal the death blow to evil habits. What is earthly in you would more literally be rendered 'the members which are upon earth'. The word for 'members' (melē) is the same word used elsewhere for limbs of the body, but clearly Paul is here using it in a moral and not a physical sense. One's limbs can be used in either a right or wrong way. Examples of the latter are seen in the following list of vices. Nevertheless the identification of the limbs with the vices is rather strained and has drawn out a variety of explanations. It seems best to suppose with Lightfoot that some such verb as 'put off' (as in v. 9 and parallel with the 'put on' of v. 10) should be assumed to introduce the list of vices. Immorality . . . evil desire. In the first four vices Paul moves from a particular sin to general tendencies of the same kind. Although the main emphasis falls on sexual sins, the last word is sufficiently general to include all base desires. In stressing the inner motives in addition to the outward acts, Paul is doing the same as Jesus (in the Sermon on the Mount). Covetousness, which is idolatry. This fifth sin is more subtle than the others. The ancient world was no stranger to the idea of idolatry, but would have been unaccustomed to think of covetousness in such a category. This sin sums up all sins of the mind centred in self. It is a particularly needy field for Christian transformation.

6 The wrath of God. The argument here parallels that in Rom. 1:18ff., where Paul uses the same phrase and illustrates the objects of the divine wrath by reference to an even fuller list of vices. Wrath must not be confused with a vindictive reaction. It is rather the negative side of holiness, the revulsion of righteousness towards all unrighteousness. Is coming is capable of being understood either of the present or of the future. There is some doubt about the reading 'upon the sons of disobedience' (RSV mg.). Since it is paralleled in Eph. 5:6 it may have been introduced from such a source. Even if the reading is not original, it expresses what was probably in Paul's mind. 7 Paul again takes the opportunity of reminding his readers of their former condition to highlight their present transformation. The idea of life as a walk is also characteristic of the apostle and of other NT writers.

8, 9a Put . . . away. Paul uses a verb applied to the taking off of clothes and is thinking of certain moral characteristics as garments which can now be discarded, because ill-fitting. He lists another five vices of a different kind, all affecting other people and all centring in wrong attitudes. There is no need to interpret the first four by the last as if all were sins of speech, although words are clearly the channel through which they have impact on others. There is little distinction between anger and wrath, although Lightfoot says the former 'denotes a more or less settled feeling of hatred' and the latter 'a tumultuous outburst of passion'. The transference of thought from God's anger (orgē) to man's anger is suggestive. The fitful outbursts associated with man's anger are wholly absent from God's anger and sets it on a wholly different plane. Malice (kakia) is a word implying vicious or malignant action against others, while slander and foul talk denote malicious and evil speech. It is a formidable list, but Paul is particularly impressed by the evils of speech which can cause havoc even within the Christian community. Do not lie may be rendered 'Do not continue to lie'—in other words, put an end to a habit which is a hang-over from the old life.

9b, 10 The basic reason why these evils must be excluded from Christian behaviour is because they belong to the old nature and are alien to the new nature. Here the 'putting off' of the one is precisely matched by the 'putting on' of the other, a reminder that there could be no middle position. Some scholars, however, take the participles in vv. 9 and 10 as dependent on the imperative, which is grammatically more usual. In this case the 'putting off' and 'putting on' are commands rather than reasons for ceasing to lie. Since Paul is addressing a Christian church, however, it is better to assume that their understanding of the implications of this was defective. There is an implied contrast between the static practices of the old nature and the new nature being renewed. The latter is continuous and dynamic. A similar idea of the continual renewal of the inner man in contrast to the outer man is found in 2 Cor. 4:16. The words in knowledge after the image of its creator need some comment. Knowledge is set out as the target of the renewal process, in which case it denotes full understanding of Christian obligations as the end-product. This emphasis on Christian knowledge would be a valuable antidote to any error which claimed, as Gnostics did, to be in possession of the inner key to knowledge. The word image has already been used in 1:15 of Christ and could mean the same here. But this would be more obscure than regarding the whole phrase as analogous to Gn. 1:26. The standard for the believer in Christ is no less than the standard which God set Himself at the creation, no less than His own likeness.

11 Paul next shows how national and social distinctions disappear in Christ. That such a theme should suddenly be introduced is evidence that the apostle was deeply conscious of the scandal of such distinctions in the world of his time. The division between Greek and Jew was virtually unbridgeable, at least from the Jewish side. The circumcised would not acknowledge the uncircumcised. Greeks regarded a foreigner as a barbarian and Romans regarded him as a Scythian. These distinctions were deep rooted in a strongly nationalistic era. Moreover, the division between slave and freeman could not have been more sharply defined. Paul marvels at the power of Christ to do away with such divisions as these. The racial and social divisions have changed in their form, but not in their intensity, nor has the solution altered. The assertion that Christ is all, and in all effectively excludes all partial views of Christ, such as the false teachers appear to have had. There is probably no intention to distinguish between all and in all. The expression points to the complete adequacy of Christ as the supreme unifying agent.

12–17 Having spoken of the new nature in v. 10, Paul proceeds to define more precisely what he means. To offset the two lists of vices he gives a list of virtues. 12 As God's chosen ones. This description focuses attention on God's choice, because of the high spiritual qualities that Paul is about to introduce. As special objects of God's choice, they were also, by that fact, objects of His love (cf. Rom. 8:33ff.). The further descriptions, holy and beloved, are characteristic NT words and, together with the word chosen, are drawn from old covenant language. They effectively describe the men of the new covenant, because they are invested with new meaning in Christ. The qualities mentioned form the counterpart of the list of vices in v. 8. Those are social irritants; these are social 'ointments'. Those are aimed at harming others, whereas these imply a desire to care for others and to put them first. Three of the qualities mentioned here, kindness, meekness and patience, occur in Paul's list of the fruits of the Spirit in Gal. 5:22. Lowliness was not a quality admired in Paul's day, yet Christ was the supreme example of it. The same may be said of compassion (cf. the use of the same Greek word in Phil. 1:8, where Paul uses it of Christ).

13 Here Paul turns away from abstract nouns to mention two positive activities, forbearing and forgiving. Both verbs are frequent in his Epistles. He recognized the importance of these activities in enabling peaceable relations to be established. A readiness to make allowance for the weakness of others and a readiness to forgive in cases of just complaint are possible only on the strength of Christ's own example. There is an echo here of the Lord's Prayer in the close link between God's forgiveness of us and our forgiveness of others. The phrase as the Lord has forgiven you provides a powerful motive. There is a variant reading which substitutes 'Christ' in place of 'Lord' and this has strong support. But whichever is right does not alter the force of the argument. 14 In saying above all these put on love is Paul thinking of an over-garment or a girdle? In view of the allusion to binding it is not impossible that the latter idea is correct, although there is no support for the use of the word in this sense. On the other hand, above all may mean 'especially', in the sense of 'more than all these'. The existence of the other qualities cannot guarantee perfect harmony, but love can. The word rendered perfect harmony (teleiotēs) really means 'perfectness', a state which cannot be improved on. Since Christ, who is our life, is perfect, no lesser aim is permissible for us.

15 The theme of peace, like love, finds a notable place in the teaching of Jesus (cf. Jn. 14:27, His legacy of peace) and recurs frequently in the Epistles of Paul. The expression peace of Christ can mean either the peace which Christ bestows or the peace which belongs to Christ. Both probably merge here, if the words are interpreted in the light of Jn. 14:27. The word rule (brabeuetō) comes from the imagery of the athletic arena and means 'umpire'. Paul seems to mean that those who have peace have an umpire, which maintains order and harmony within the life. To which . . . you were called in the one body. The Christian body, already mentioned in this Epistle, was designed for peace, and anything promoting discord is clearly not in tune with Christ. This is a sound principle for the umpire's decisions. It may be wondered why Paul suddenly includes an exhortation to be thankful. Perhaps he recognized the difficulty of maintaining peace, and further recognized that any such achievement must elicit special gratitude to God. But Paul's Epistles supply abundant evidence of the importance of thanksgiving (cf. 1:3ff. and vv. 16, 17 below).

16 The next exhortation centres on the need for assimilating the Word. But when Paul says, Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly, two problems of interpretation arise. What does he mean by the word of Christ? It could be understood either of the word which Christ speaks, or the word about Christ. The former is the more natural, but even this is capable of different interpretations. Lightfoot considered that the expression represents 'the presence of Christ in the heart as an inward monitor'. Yet the word suggests more than presence. It implies specific teaching, and Bruce is nearer the point when he says that 'Christian teaching must be based on the teaching of Jesus Himself'. Since the expression occurs nowhere else it is impossible to be certain, but Paul may well have chosen it to include a variety of meanings, with their emphasis on Christ. Some texts read 'Lord' and others 'God' instead of 'Christ', but these look like alterations from the less to the more familiar. The word richly occurs in only three other places in the NT (1 Tim. 6:17; Tit. 3:6; 2 Pet. 1:11), in all of which it describes the richness of God's provision for man, and can bear the same meaning here. Another problem arises in the next part of the verse. RSV joins the words in all wisdom to the teaching and admonishing, but they could equally well be attached to the first part of the verse, in which case a wise handling of the word of Christ would be indicated. Moreover, RSV has separated the singing from the teaching, but the Greek would more naturally be understood to mean that the teaching was with the singing of psalms. What Paul may have meant is that in Christian assemblies teaching and admonition should be conveyed by means of various types of singing (as Eph. 5:19 more explicitly states). By psalms is presumably meant the OT Psalms, but what distinction can be made between hymns and spiritual songs is not clear. Bruce suggests that the former might be Christian canticles (like the Magnificat) and the later unpremeditated songs. It seems more likely, however, that hymns are ascriptions to Christ (cf. Rev. 4, 5). The words with thankfulness are literally 'with grace' (en chariti) and could be understood in the sense 'by the grace of God'. In any case the thanksgiving is directed to God, which contains an acknowledgment of His grace.

17 is a general summary of the Christian philosophy of living. It has its focus in the relating of everything to the name of the Lord Jesus. In the NT church this would be regarded as no mere superstitious uttering of the name as a magical formula in the manner of many contemporary heathen cults, but as a recognition of the Lordship of Christ in everything. It is a noble principle to subject all word as well as deed to the name, and therefore to the nature of Christ. The note of thanks with which this section closes completes its threefold exhortation to gratitude.

3:18 – 4:1 ADVICE FOR HOUSEHOLDS

Having discussed spiritual principles, Paul now comes to specific relationships within households. The section may be conveniently divided into two, the first dealing with family relationships (3:18–21) and the second with slave–master relationships (3:19 – 4:1). Similar advice is found in Ephesians, Titus, 1 Timothy and 1 Peter. It also occurs in several of the early church writers.

18, 19 Paul's teaching regarding husbands and wives must be approached against the background of both Jewish and pagan ethics, in neither of which were wives granted any rights. His positive contribution is not therefore the injunction for wives to submit, but for the submission to be fitting in the Lord. The word rendered fitting (anēken) is thoroughly Stoical, but the addition is thoroughly Christian. This would at once transform current ideas and would invest the wife's position with an adequate safeguard. Support for this is found in the injunction that husbands should love their wives. There is no suggestion in Paul's language of any inferiority being attached to the wife. 20 The pagan approach to children left much to be desired, although Jewish home life was on a higher level. Nevertheless, in the exhortation to children, obey your parents, the new element as before is in the notion of doing it to please the Lord (or more literally to be 'pleasing' or 'commendable' in the Lord). 21 Home discipline, as this verse shows, is no longer a matter of rigid enforcement, but of relating the parent–child relationship to Christ. In an age when parental authority is everywhere being challenged the Christian home should be an example of healthy discipline. Paul recognizes that this is possible only if fathers avoid provocation. The word he uses means 'irritate' suggesting a friction which could be avoided. Harshness in men was widespread in Paul's day, but he recognized that it should find no place in a Christian household. Children could only be discouraged by such an approach.

3:22 – 4:1 In the ancient world slavery was an accepted institution and carried with it inevitable evils. Paul's advice here aims to transform the master–slave relationship from within, not to launch a frontal attack upon it, a course which would have involved political action and which for this reason was quite impractical for the small emerging churches. 22 Obey in everything is a sweeping command to slaves who could not call their souls their own. Why should they obey? If the whole structure was illegitimate, what right had masters to expect implicit obedience? Paul does not deal with the wrongs of the system. He is concerned with human attitudes. He gives a series of practical advice, which would be as relevant for employees today as for slaves then. Not with eyeservice, as men-pleasers. Paul means them to avoid governing their action by whether they could be seen or not. The alternative provides a nobler motive. Singleness points to a consistency of action, and fearing the Lord to a religious approach even to secular work, an idea fully developed in 23, 24: twice in these verses work is directly related to the Lord and it is from the Lord that the reward will come. The injunction to work heartily would be a real challenge for slaves who worked without wages. Though Paul makes clear that some reward will be gained, what he calls the inheritance shows that the idea is intended in a spiritual sense. 25 Dishonest dealings will rule out the inheritance, since with the Lord there is no partiality, no judging merely according to outward appearances. The judgment will fit the offence.

4:1 Having mentioned the absence of partiality in the Lord, Paul reminds masters to show similar fairness. This address to masters is significant because it recognizes that obligation does not rest only with servants. It is well to note that Paul places the responsibility of Christian masters on the highest level—they are to remember that they too have a Master in heaven, which means that they themselves are His servants.

4:2–6 MORE GENERAL ADVICE

This brief section forms the concluding exhortation in the Epistle, followed as it is with various personal allusions. Paul mentions two main points, one an appeal for prayer-support and the other a final plea for right conduct and speech.

2–4 He had begun the Epistle by assuring the readers of his constant prayer for them. He now closes by eliciting their constant prayer for him. 2 The verb behind the words continue steadfastly (proskartereō) is several times used with the same construction as here (followed by the dative) and always in relation to prayer (Acts 1:14; 2:42; 6:4; Rom. 12:12). The expression evidently denotes an attitude of consistent piety, rather than uninterrupted prayer. Being watchful is reminiscent of the injunction of Jesus to His disciples in the garden of Gethsemane. Note the returning of the thanksgiving theme (cf. Phil. 4:6). 3 Pray for us. Paul here includes others associated with him in the Gentile mission (Timothy is included in Col. 1:1 and may be more particularly in mind). The request is specific—that God may open to us a door for the word. Paul uses the same imagery in 1 Cor. 16:9; 2 Cor. 2:12, in both of which cases it refers to preaching opportunities. The request here suggests that Paul for the time being is denied such opportunity through being in prison, but he believes that prayer can overcome even such a circumstance. The word is defined as the mystery of Christ, and reference must be made to the earlier use of the same word in this Epistle (see 1:26ff.; 2:2). 4 The apostle adds a further target for their prayers which is an elucidation of the earlier. An open door would be useless without clarity of speech and the conviction of saying the right thing, as the phrase as I ought to speak must be understood. The request is not misplaced, since many opportunities are wasted through garbled utterance.

5, 6 The second section concentrates on the Christian's attitude towards outsiders. Conduct yourselves wisely is literally 'walk in wisdom', as much as to say, 'Let outsiders see that your chosen path is a wise one'. This can be done in two ways: in the use of time and in the manner of speech. Making the most of the time (kairos) is a paraphrase of words that mean literally 'redeeming the time'. If the verb is the key to the imagery, reference must be made to the slave market. In this case Christians are to buy up every opportunity, an idea which would supplement the open door imagery of v. 3. The word for time means a specific opportunity for action, not time generally. When Paul urges that speech should be gracious, he uses the same Greek phrase as in 3:16 where it is rendered 'with thanksgiving' (see on 3:16). Here it means more than charm of expression. It means speech permeated with the grace which has been received in Christ. Seasoned with salt. Parallels exist for the metaphor of salt in relation to conversation, although it is unlikely that Paul is using it to describe witty speech as many ancient writers did. It is suggestive here for two reasons: it gives flavour and it preserves in a wholesome state. Both are valuable assets for Christians wishing to commend their message to others. Part of right flavouring consists of suiting conversation to the hearers. Christians must learn to choose the best manner of answering questions about the faith.

4:7–18 PERSONAL NEWS

7, 8 This note about Tychicus is repeated almost verbatim in Eph. 6:21, 22 and suggests that Colossians was sent at the same time by the same messenger. 7 Paul's high opinion of Tychicus is reflected in the adjectives used here (beloved and faithful, the same used of Onesimus in v. 9 and of Epaphras in 1:7), obviously favourite descriptions with the apostle. Tychicus's function is described in a twofold way: as minister (diakonos) and fellow servant (syndoulos). The former word recalls Paul's own use of it of himself in 1:23, and the latter also finds a parallel earlier in the Epistle (1:7) with reference to Epaphras. The bond between Paul and those who have shared so much with him is strong. 8 Tychicus is the link-man between Paul and the Colossians. His mission is one of encouragement, with which cf. the statement of 2:2. 9 Onesimus is described as one of yourselves, which is valuable evidence for the fact that the Epistle to Philemon, which also mentions Onesimus, must have been sent to a member of the Colossian church. For a description of the circumstances in which Onesimus was placed, see the commentary on that Epistle. Here it is sufficient to note that the runaway slave is being sent back with Tychicus.

10, 11 Three Jewish Christians send greetings. One of them, Aristarchus, is named as a fellow prisoner, a word which literally means 'fellow-prisoner-of-war' (cf. Acts 19:29, where he was seized by the mob at Ephesus). But some scholars prefer to take the word metaphorically of those engaged in Christian warfare. There is no reason, however, why the literal meaning should be discarded. Mark the cousin of Barnabas. Only here is Mark's relationship to Barnabas noted, although Acts speaks of his association with Barnabas on the second missionary journey, after his defection on the first (Acts 15:36ff.). Paul has clearly been reconciled to him by this time. What were the instructions the Colossians had received? They were probably from Paul, but could have been passed on by another. Nothing else is known of Jesus who is called Justus. The kingdom idea is mentioned earlier in 1:13 as part of the theme of the ministry of Paul, and these associates are now said to share the same mission.

12–14 Next Paul mentions three others who, in the light of v. 11, must be Gentiles. Epaphras (cf. 1:7, 8) is warmly commended as a servant of Christ Jesus who never lets up in his prayer for the Colossians. The word used is 'agonize' and may be some kind of allusion to the prayer of Jesus in Gethsemane. That kind of praying ranks a man high in spiritual stature. The expression that you may stand mature (teleioi) reminds us of 3:14. What Epaphras prays for is what Paul has already exhorted. Fully assured may be rendered 'fulfilled or completed', in which case it adds little to the other word. But the RSV here is probably right, particularly as the words in all the will of God are linked to it. No greater request for the Colossians could be made than this. Epaphras had evidently not spared himself on behalf of the three churches in the Lycus Valley (see Introduction). Only here do we learn that Luke was a doctor, while all that is known elsewhere about Demas is that he left Paul for the 'present world' (2 Tim. 4:10).

15–18 The last section sends greetings to various people. 15 The brethren at Laodicea are presumably the church there, as in v. 16. House churches, like the one in Nymphas's house, are frequently mentioned by Paul (see on Phm. 1).

16 This verse provides valuable evidence for what was probably a common practice in the early churches—an interchange of letters. The letter from Laodicea has now been lost, but presumably it was a letter written by Paul to that church which would be forwarded from there to Colossae. If the heresy was threatening Colossae, it would be salutary for the neighbouring church at Laodicea to have access to Paul's answer to it. The statement here is also support for the view that Paul's letters were publicly read in Christian assemblies. 17 Archippus is mentioned again in Phm. 1. What the ministry was that he was to fulfil is not clear, but he may have been standing in for Epaphras as leader of the church in his absence.

18 As usual, Paul closes in his own handwriting. The fact that he notes it suggests that he had used an amanuensis up to this point. Remember my fetters is a touching reminder of his present circumstances. But he nevertheless ends with his usual greeting, Grace be with you.

1 and 2 Thessalonians

INTRODUCTION

BACKGROUND

Thessalonica (Saloniki) was originally called Therme, but was refounded by Cassander c. 315 BC and named Thessalonica after his wife, a step-sister of Alexander the Great. Alike in Macedonian and Roman times it was an important city. The Romans made it the capital of the province of Macedonia in 164 BC and a free city after the battle of Philippi in 42 BC. Through it ran the great Egnatian Road, on its way from Neapolis on the Aegean to Dyrrhachium on the Adriatic.

Paul's first visit to Thessalonica—to be dated probably in the early summer of AD 50—is narrated in Acts 17:1–9. It was the first city where he and his companions, Silas (Silvanus) and Timothy, spent any length of time after their departure from Philippi, in the course of his 'second missionary journey'. In accordance with their regular practice, they visited the local synagogue. For three successive sabbaths Paul attempted to convince the synagogue congregation from their OT scriptures that the Messiah was bound to suffer and rise again from the dead, and that Jesus was therefore the Messiah. Several of his hearers believed his message, including a large number of 'God-fearing' Gentiles. But the consequent opposition of the synagogue authorities to the missionaries led to Paul's quitting the synagogue. He had to find another base for his teaching, which was provided in the house of a Thessalonian citizen named Jason. Here he continued a few weeks more, after which his opponents stirred up public disorder. The city magistrates, or 'politarchs' as Luke calls them (a title which they shared with the chief magistrates of other Macedonian cities), received information that Paul and his companions were Messianic agitators, such as had recently caused disturbances in many other places throughout the Roman Empire where there were Jewish communities, and that they proclaimed another king in rivalry to the emperor. Such a charge was necessarily regarded with the utmost gravity. But Jason, Paul's host, and other friends whom the missionaries had made in Thessalonica, went bail for them, undertaking that they would leave the city quietly, and sent them away by night.

The young church which they were thus forced to leave behind in Thessalonica was exposed to some active persecution. Paul was very anxious for his converts' welfare, and wondered how they would stand, especially as his sudden departure prevented him from giving them all the instruction that he regarded as adequate for the establishment of an infant Christian community (cf. 1 Thes. 3:10). But his hands were tied by his Thessalonian friends' guarantee; he could not go back at present. From Thessalonica he went on to Beroea with Silas, and Timothy later rejoined him. He sent Timothy back to Thessalonica, and Silas to other parts of Macedonia, while he went on from Athens to Corinth. Here, after some weeks, Silas and Timothy returned to him, and Timothy was able to report that the Thessalonian Christians, far from succumbing to the persecution with which they had been tested, were standing firm and actually propagating the gospel on their own initiative. But there were several matters on which they desired further enlightenment, especially with regard to what Paul had taught them about the return of Christ. In particular, some of their number had died since Paul left their city, and they were eager to know if these would in consequence suffer any disadvantage at Christ's return in comparison with those who would still be alive when it happened.

Paul was overjoyed at Timothy's good news, and wrote at once to congratulate and encourage his Thessalonian converts, and to deal with their practical problems. The letter which he wrote has come down to us as the first Epistle to the Thessalonians.

INTRODUCTION

DATE, AUTHORSHIP, CANONICITY

It follows from what has been said in the Introduction above that 1 Thessalonians was written in the earlier part of Paul's stay at Corinth—say towards the end of AD 50. For Timothy's return from Macedonia to Corinth (bringing Paul the news from Thessalonica) see Acts 18:5.

Paul associates his two travel-companions with himself in the salutation (1:1). Such variation in literary style as may be revealed by statistical analysis between this letter and Paul's 'capital letters' (Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians) could easily be accounted for if one or the other of these companions were in some degree responsible for the wording. But the substance of the letter is Paul's (cf. 2:18; 3:5; 5:27 for the first person singular). There has been little serious doubt of its genuineness. F. C. Baur's idea that it was written after AD 70 by a disciple of Paul in order to arouse interest in the return of Christ rests on subjective arguments which have failed to win general agreement. The personal note of pastoral concern and affection speaks strongly for the letter's authenticity. It was included in Marcion's Canon (c. AD 140) and in the orthodox Roman Canon preserved in the Muratorian fragment (late 2nd century).

TEACHING

Paul is not concerned in this Epistle to give instruction on any one doctrine or to correct any one error—apart from his desire to complete the eschatological teaching which he had given the Thessalonian Christians during his curtailed visit to their city, and thus remove some misunderstandings and perplexities in this field. It is first and foremost a missionary's letter to his converts, and references to Christian doctrine are incidental rather than central. But for that very reason the way in which they are introduced and expressed is the more significant. We may note the following points.

God the Father

Paul is completely and continuously God-conscious. It is basic to his whole thought that God is the source of all and the goal of all, the One in whose presence he lives and works moment by moment. It is He who has chosen His people (1:4); He is the object of their faith (1:8) as the living and true God to whom they turned from unreal gods (1:9). He imparts the authority for the apostle's bold confidence (2:2); it is by His permission that the gospel has been entrusted to their charge (2:4); it is His pleasure that they must seek and His witness that they ought to be able to invoke (2:5, 10). It is His will that must be done (4:3; 5:18); His guidance that must be followed (3:11). He has called His people to holy living (4:7) and He alone can impart to them the sanctification to which He has called them (5:23). It is He who raised up Jesus and will bring His people back with Him from the dead (4:14), thus consummating the salvation to which He has appointed them (5:9).

The Lord Jesus Christ

The spontaneous and almost unconscious way in which Christ is associated with God the Father is even more eloquent testimony to Paul's conception of the Person of Christ than a formal statement of His deity would be. The church at Thessalonica is 'in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ' (1:1). So also in 3:11 'our Lord Jesus' is directly and actively associated with 'our God and Father' in His direction of the apostles' footsteps. (Cf. also 2 Thes. 1:1; 2:16.)

The Holy Spirit

The Holy Spirit is all-pervasive in the Christian life, which indeed is His creation. The gospel is proclaimed by His power (1:5); not only is His joy imparted to those who believe it (1:6), but He Himself is given to them (4:8) to accomplish His sanctifying work in their lives (2 Thes. 2:13). In church life too He plays His part by communicating the divine will through prophetic utterances; to despise or inhibit such utterances is to 'quench the Spirit' (5:19).

The apostolic preaching

The references to the message which had brought salvation to the Thessalonian Christians show that it was the same message as that attested elsewhere in the NT. Its basic facts are Jesus' death ('for us', 5:10) and resurrection, which have already taken place (4:14; 1:10), and His coming again, which is to take place at the day of the Lord, when His people, delivered by Him from the wrath to come (and sharing His resurrection if they have already died), are to live for ever with Him (1:10; 4:15ff.; 5:1ff.). Those who believe this message turn from unrealities to the living and true God, to serve Him in the light of Christ's second advent (1:9f.). And it is plainly shown what this serving God involves, by the plain instruction in practical Christian living here and there throughout this Epistle and the following one (e.g. 4:1–12; 5:6ff.).

Pastoral responsibility

Paul reveals himself in every sentence of this letter as a true and faithful pastor, rejoicing in his flock but anxious for their welfare, confident and concerned, thanking God for them and simultaneously praying to God for them, tirelessly caring for them as a father for his children, straining his strength to the limit in order not to be a burden to them. 'Here was a new phenomenon in history, a man to whom the religious steadfastness and ethical progress of other men was a matter of life and death (see especially ii. 8, 9, iii. 6–8)' (C. A. A. Scott).

1:1 SALUTATION

Paul, Silvanus, and Timothy. Associated with Paul in the salutation are his two friends who had collaborated with him in the evangelization of Thessalonica and were now with him at Corinth. Silvanus, the Silas of Acts 15:22ff., was a Hellenistic member of the Jerusalem church and a Roman citizen who joined Paul as his travel-companion after the Council of Jerusalem, at the outset of the second missionary journey. (Paul gives his friends their formal names when writing about them; Luke prefers the more homely pet-names.) Timothy, a native of Lystra in Asia Minor, joined Paul and Silvanus when they passed through his home town early in their journey (Acts 16:1ff.). To the church of the Thessalonians in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. The expression the church . . . in God (also in 2 Thes. 1:1) is exceptional; cf., however, Col. 3:3. (Acts 17:28, 'In him we live . . .', is not a true parallel, for there the reference is to the natural order of the old creation.) The close and spontaneous collocation of God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ is eloquent of the apostolic understanding of the supremacy to which God had exalted the crucified and risen Christ along with Himself (cf. Eph. 1:20ff.; Phil. 2:9–11). Grace to you and peace. This is the only Pauline letter in which these familiar words of salutation are not followed by 'from God the Father' or a comparable phrase.

1:2–10 THANKSGIVING

2 Paul and his friends express their joy at the Thessalonian converts' steadfastness and energy in Christian grace and witness. The facts were known widespread, and spoke for themselves. 3 Faith . . . love . . . hope. This triad of graces reappears in 5:8 and Col. 1:4f. as well as in the famous passage 1 Cor. 13:13. The writers rejoice that these graces are manifested in the life and activity of the Thessalonians. 4 We know . . that he has chosen you. They had recognized the genuineness of the Thessalonians' Christianity by the way in which they received the gospel in the beginning, and this was confirmed by the news which Timothy had brought back. Their conduct and witness bore undeniable witness to their being truly among the 'elect of God'; 5 theirs was no superficial conversion but, as the sequel proved, the work of the Holy Spirit who both convinced them of the truth of the gospel and enabled them to embrace it and translate it into real life. 6 You became imitators of us; in Christian behaviour as well as in the endurance of persecution. With joy inspired by the Holy Spirit. For joy as the fruit of the Spirit cf. Gal. 5:22; also Rom. 5:2f., 11; 14:17. 7 Macedonia and . . . Achaia. These two Roman provinces together covered most of the area of modern Greece. Apart from Thessalonica itself, Philippi was the principal church in Macedonia; Corinth was the outstanding church in Achaia. 8 Everywhere. Had Priscilla and Aquila (cf. Acts 18:1–3) told Paul that news of the church in Thessalonica had travelled as far as Rome? 9 They themselves; i.e. the people of Macedonia and Achaia and so forth. You turned to God from idols, to serve a living and true God. Cf. the apostolic admonition to the pagans of Lystra 'that you should turn from these vain things (i.e. idolatry) to a living God' (Acts 14:15). This was a primary necessity when the gospel was proclaimed to Gentiles. 10 And to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead. The words in which the Thessalonians are reminded of their conversion show us that the message delivered to them followed the regular lines of the primitive apostolic preaching. For the close connection of Christ's resurrection with His coming again in this preaching cf. Acts 17:31. The return of Christ had plainly occupied a prominent place in the apostolic preaching at Thessalonica, as it did elsewhere in the earliest days of Christianity (cf. Acts 3:20; 10:42). Jesus who delivers us from the wrath to come. This might be rendered more personally 'Jesus, our deliverer from the coming wrath', i.e. the divine judgment to be poured upon the earth at the end of the age.

2:1–16 APOLOGIA

Paul's conduct had been represented in an unfavourable light to the converts whom he had left behind at Thessalonica, and he now defends himself. He and his companions had made no attempt to exploit them or live at their expense; on the contrary, they had shown all gentleness and care towards them. They had worked night and day in order to earn their own living while they were busy preaching the good news and building up the new-born Christian community. And the Thessalonian Christians in turn had proved worthy converts, persevering in face of persecution just like the Christians of Palestine.

2 We had already suffered . . . at Philippi; a reference to the well-known events related in Acts 16:19ff. 3 Not . . . from error or uncleanness, nor is it made with guile. So many wandering charlatans made their way about the Roman world, peddling their religious or philosophical nostrums, that it was necessary for the apostles to emphasize the purity of their motives and procedure by contrast with these. 4 As we have been approved by God to be entrusted with the gospel, so we speak, not to please men, but to please God who tests our hearts. Every phrase and clause here expresses Paul's sense of responsibility in regard to his apostolic commission; cf. Rom. 1:1, 14; 1 Cor. 4:1–4; 9:16f.; 15:9f.; 2 Cor. 2:17; 4:1ff.; Gal. 1:10; 2:7ff.; Eph. 3:7ff.; Col. 1:23ff. Paul was frequently charged with adapting his message to please his constituency, of being 'all things to all men' in an unworthy sense; this is his answer. 6 We might have made demands as apostles of Christ. For Paul's voluntary forgoing of his undoubted right to have his material requirements met by those for whose spiritual welfare he cared cf. 2 Thes. 3:9; 1 Cor. 9:4ff.; 2 Cor. 11:7ff. Here he associates Silvanus and Timothy with himself as apostles, in the wider sense of the term (i.e. missionaries). Cf. Acts 14:4, of Barnabas as well as Paul. 7 We were gentle (Gk. ēpioi). There is a variant reading 'we were babes' (Gk. nēpioi); but gentle seems preferable, and more appropriate in the context.

9 We worked night and day; cf. 4:11; 2 Thes. 3:7ff.; Acts 18:3; 20:34. This policy not only reflected a desire to be financially independent of those among whom they ministered; it also marked them off from the ordinary religious traffickers of the day, and showed the converts a good example. 12 To lead a life worthy of God, who calls you into his own kingdom and glory. The highest of all incentives for holy living is set before them. In the NT as in the OT the people of God must display the character of God. By faith they had already entered the kingdom of God, but the revelation of its full glory belonged to a day yet future; they were, however, heirs of that glory, and must live accordingly.

13 Not as the word of men but . . . the word of God. Paul was so accustomed to hearing his message denounced as man-made, not only by non-Christian Jews, but by many Jewish Christians as well, that he found it specially encouraging when it was sincerely welcomed as the good news of God. Cf. Gal. 1:11, 12. 14 The churches of God in Christ Jesus which are in Judea; the original church of Jerusalem in dispersion (cf. Acts 9:31; Gal. 1:22). Your own countrymen; i.e. fellow-townsmen, both Gentiles and Jews (Acts 17:5). 15 Who killed both the Lord Jesus and the prophets. The bitterness of this reference to the Jews (v. 14) is unparalleled in Paul's writings and it has been suspected of being an interpolation. There is no textual basis for this suspicion, however, and the summary of their behaviour is closely in accord with the narrative of Acts. The primary reference is to the Jews of Judea, but in addition the trouble stirred up by the leaders of the Jewish communities of Thessalonica and Beroea was fresh in Paul's mind. It would be foolish to imagine that the author of vv. 14–16 could not also have expressed himself in the language of Rom. 9:1–5. 16 Hindering us from speaking to the Gentiles; cf. Acts 13:45. So as always to fill up the measure of their sins. For the same idea cf. Mt. 23:32. God's wrath has come upon them at last! This has been thought by some to anticipate the destruction of Jerusalem in AD 70 (cf. NEB, 'and now retribution has overtaken them for good and all'). The Jews of the Dispersion were not for the most part involved in that disaster. Paul means that by their persistent opposition to the gospel they had already ensured for themselves that eschatological judgment which they might have averted by accepting it (cf. Acts 2:38ff.; 3:19ff.). In Christian literature before AD 70 no very clear distinction is drawn between the destruction of Jerusalem which, taught by their Lord, Christians knew to be impending as the beginning of the end-time 'birth-pangs' (Mk. 13:8), and the final judgments of the day of the Lord. On vv. 14–16 see H. L. Ellison, The Mystery of Israel, 1966, pp. 13ff.

2:17 – 3:10 NARRATIVE OF EVENTS SINCE PAUL LEFT THESSALONICA

It was not lack of interest that prevented Paul from staying longer with them or going back to see them; it was circumstances over which he had no control. He assures them of his longing for them and his joyful confidence in them in view of the return of Christ. It was his impatience to know how they fared that made him send Timothy back to visit them, together with his concern that their faith should be strengthened amid their afflictions. Timothy's report of their welfare and steadfastness had filled him with joy, and also with fresh longing to see them once more.

18 I, Paul. Of the other signatories Timothy had actually visited them, and Silvanus had paid a short visit to Macedonia (Acts 18:5), if not to Thessalonica itself. Satan hindered us. W. M. Ramsay supposed that Paul detected this subtle agency behind the politarchs' action in exacting security from Jason (Acts 17:9) and binding him over to prevent Paul, the alleged cause of the disturbance, from coming back to Thessalonica. 19 What is our hope . . . before our Lord Jesus at his coming? Is it not you? If Paul's converts do him credit, he will face with joy the review of his service to take place at Christ's return (cf. Phil. 2:16; 4:1). This is the first occurrence of Greek parousia (translated coming) in the Pauline Epistles. Its ordinary sense is 'presence' (cf. 2 Cor. 10:10; Phil. 1:26; 2:12); but its eschatological sense is akin to its idiomatic usage in the Hellenistic vernacular, of the arrival of some dignitary to pay an official visit to a place. It is so used of the return of Christ 18 times in the NT; the Thessalonian Epistles account for 7 of these.

3:1 We were willing to be left behind at Athens alone. Here the we is purely epistolary, referring to Paul himself. Cf. v. 5. For the occasion, see Acts 17:15ff. 2 God's servant. For servant (Gk. diakonon) there is a well-attested and probably original variant 'fellow-worker' (Gk. synergon); cf. 1 Cor. 3:9. AV 'minister of God, and our fellow labourer' represents a later conflation of the two readings. 3 This is to be our lot. It is taken for granted throughout the NT that affliction is the normal lot of Christians; it is, in fact, an evidence of the genuineness of their faith and an earnest of their part in the coming glory. Cf. Acts 14:22; Rom. 8:17f.; 2 Tim. 3:12. 4 It is noteworthy that the inevitability of affliction had formed part of the apostles' instruction to the Thessalonian Christians as to others. What had been an acute problem to faith in OT times—the suffering of the righteous—had come to be recognized as an essential element in God's purpose for His people. Since their Lord Himself had suffered, they need expect nothing else; let them rather glory in tribulation (cf. Jn. 15:20; 16:33; Rom. 5:3).

7 In all our distress and affliction we have been comforted. Cf. the similar language of 2 Cor. 1:3–7, written in response to similar good news of his converts' spiritual health brought from Corinth by Titus. 8 Now we live, if you stand fast in the Lord. Paul's concern for his converts breathes through all his correspondence; cf. 2 Cor. 11:28f. When they were led astray, he was indignant; when they slipped back, he was distressed; when they gave signs of living worthily of the gospel, he was overjoyed (cf. 2 Cor. 7:6ff.).

3:11–13 PRAYER FOR A SPEEDY REUNION

Paul prays for a speedy reunion with his Thessalonian friends and for their increase in love and holiness in view of the return of Christ.

11 Now may our God and Father himself, and our Lord Jesus, direct our way to you. The fact that the verb direct is singular in Greek, despite its compound subject, has no particular theological significance in itself; in such a construction the verb commonly agrees with the nearer subject. But it is significant that Christ is thus associated in action with God the Father. 13 So that he may establish your hearts unblamable in holiness. The second coming of Christ should provide the Thessalonian Christians, as it did Paul himself (2:19), with an incentive to holy living. Cf. 5:23; 1 Jn. 2:28; 3:3. The day of Christ's return is the day when He reviews His people's record. At the coming of our Lord Jesus with all his saints; or 'with all his holy ones'. Cf. the description of the day of the Lord in Zc. 14:5 (LXX): 'The Lord my God will come and all his holy ones (Gk. hagioi, as here) with him.' This description is based on the earlier theophanic vocabulary of the OT such as Dt. 33:2; Ps. 68:17 (cf. also Dn. 7:10 and the words of Enoch quoted in Jude 14f., and such words in the NT as those of Jesus in Mk. 8:38; Mt. 25:31). Primarily therefore here, as in 2 Thes. 1:7, we may regard the 'holy ones' as attendant angels, though we may find cause in 2 Thes. 1:10 to see departed believers associated with them. The unobtrusiveness with which language used of Yahweh in the OT is applied to Jesus in the NT should not make us overlook the startling implications of such a practice on the part of one with Paul's orthodox Jewish and Pharisaic upbringing.

4:1–12 EXHORTATION TO HOLY LIVING AND BROTHERLY LOVE

Paul exhorts them to personal consecration and purity, especially in sexual relations. To this he adds an admonition to maintain brotherly love —superfluous as such an admonition may be in their case—and to go on diligently with their daily work and not to become a charge on others.

1 In the Lord Jesus; i.e. by His authority; so also through the Lord Jesus (v. 2). The whole 'tradition' of ethical instruction in the NT letters derives from His teaching and example (cf. on 2 Thes. 2:15). How you ought to live (lit. 'to walk'); this ethical sense of 'walk' is common in the NT. 3 Your sanctification: that you abstain from immorality. Paul lays special emphasis on this particular aspect of practical holiness because it was in the sphere of relations between the sexes that even the highest pagan ethic of the time fell far short of the Jewish and Christian standard. Fornication was widely regarded in the Graeco-Roman world as almost on the same level of ethical indifference as food and drink. Experience proved that insistent injunctions of this kind were by no means superfluous for Christians converted from paganism. 4 To take a wife for himself; RV 'to possess himself of his own vessel' (Gk. skeuos); i.e. to keep control of his body, rather than to live with his wife; the latter interpretation is not so appropriate here, despite the sense of 'vessel' in 1 Pet. 3:7. 5 Like heathen who do not know God; cf. Rom. 1:24ff.; 2 Thes. 1:8. 6 That no man transgress, and wrong his brother in this matter; i.e. in the matter already referred to. Paul seems to be thinking of a trespass of this kind even within the family circle of a fellow-Christian. Because the Lord is an avenger in all these things; cf. Eph. 5:6. 7 God has not called us for uncleanness, but in holiness. In one sense believers are already 'saints', set apart by God for Himself; in another sense they must manifest this sanctification in daily life. 8 Whoever disregards this; i.e. he who disregards these apostolic precepts about practical purity. God, who gives his Holy Spirit to you. This reference to the indwelling Spirit is specially relevant here, because He is the divine agent in sanctification (cf. on 2 Thes. 2:13).

9 Taught by God; cf. Is. 54:13; Jn. 6:45; 1 Jn. 2:20. 11 Aspire to live quietly, to mind your own affairs, and to work with your hands. This is not a new subject, but belongs to the duty of brotherly love; the behaviour of one member affects the welfare of the whole community. Cf. 2:9 for the apostolic example. The Greek word rendered aspire is philotimeisthai (lit. 'be ambitious'). It is usually supposed that exaggerated eschatological expectation (cf. 2 Thes. 2:2; 3:6ff.) tended to make some of them excited and restless and neglectful of their ordinary business; this would make them a charge on others and would bring the whole group into disrepute. Brotherly love therefore demanded sober and industrious habits. Paul's idea of readiness for the coming of Christ is in line with the gospel injunction, 'Let your loins be girded and your lamps burning' (Lk. 12:35). He himself had taught them this lesson by example as well as by precept.

4:13 – 5:11 CONCERNING THE SECOND ADVENT

He reassures their anxiety about the position of those of their number who have died; they will suffer no disadvantage at Christ's return, but will be raised from the dead and joined by those who are still alive, to form a united escort for their Lord. The time of His return is unknown; it is therefore necessary for His people to be continually ready and watchful.

13 Concerning those who are asleep. Some of their number had died since Paul's departure (possibly as a result of persecution); would these forfeit a share in the glory to be bestowed upon Christians at the second advent? As others do; i.e. non-Christians; cf. Eph. 2:3. Who have no hope; cf. Eph. 2:12. The hopelessness of the pagan world in face of death can be illustrated by much contemporary literary and inscriptional material. 14 Since we believe that Jesus died and rose again; the quintessence of the gospel (cf. 1 Cor. 15:3f.). Even so, through Jesus, God will bring with him those who have fallen asleep; i.e. bring them back from death, by resurrection, as He brought Jesus back. Albeit at a later date, they will rise with Jesus, sharing His resurrection (cf. 1 Cor. 15:20ff.). The prepositional phrase through (by means of) Jesus (Gk. dia tou Iēsou) 'points to Jesus as the mediating link between His people's sleep and their resurrection at the hands of God' (G. Milligan). Cf. Rom. 8:11; 1 Cor. 15:18. Death through Jesus is but the prelude to resurrection with Jesus.

15 By the word of the Lord; i.e. on the authority of an utterance of Christ Himself. We do not find an exact equivalent to what follows in any of His sayings preserved in the Gospels, but that need not imply that Paul is quoting a private revelation made to himself as a prophet. We who are alive, who are left until the coming of the Lord. If here Paul groups himself with those who would be alive at that date, yet a few years later, in 1 Cor. 6:14 and 2 Cor. 4:14, he groups himself with those who would be raised from the dead. His estimate of the probability one way or the other might vary from time to time, but as he did not know when the parousia would take place, he could not know whether he would in fact be alive or dead when it happened. Shall not precede or 'have any advantage over'. 16 The Lord himself; for the emphasis cf. Acts 1:11, 'this same Jesus'. With a cry of command (Gk. keleusma; cf. its solitary LXX occurrence in Pr. 30:27, 'the locust marches at one word of command'). With the archangel's call; it is doubtful if we should think of Michael or any other individual archangel here. And with the sound of the trumpet of God; cf. Mt. 24:31; 1 Cor. 15:52 ('the last trump'). The command, the call and the trumpet may be different figures for the same event. The language reflects the theophanic passages of the OT; cf. Joel 2:1ff., especially v. 11. The dead in Christ; cf. on v. 14; 1 Cor. 15:18; Rev. 14:13. 17 Shall be caught up; Greek harpagēsometha, Latin rapiemur, whence the event is sometimes called the 'rapture' or snatching away of the saints. In the clouds; cf. Dn. 7:13; Mk. 13:26; 14:62; Rev. 1:7. The clouds which invest the advent of the Son of man, like those at the transfiguration (Mk. 9:7) and the ascension (Acts 1:9), betoken a theophany, the presence of the divine glory or šᵉkînâ (cf. also Ex. 24:15ff.; 40:34ff.; 1 Ki. 8:10f.). To meet the Lord (Gk. eis apantēsin tou kyriou). When a dignitary paid an official visit or parousia to a city in Hellenistic times, the action of the leading citizens in going out to meet him and escorting him on the final stage of his journey was called the apantēsis; it is similarly used in Mt. 25:6; Acts 28:15. So the Lord is pictured as escorted to the earth by His people—those newly raised from death and those who have remained alive. And so we shall always be with the Lord; the climax of blessedness.

5:1 But as to the times and the seasons; Greek chronoi and kairoi, denoting respectively the ages to elapse before the parousia and the critical epochs marking these ages (so Milligan). 2 The day of the Lord will come like a thief in the night. For the simile cf. Mt. 24:43; Lk. 12:39; Rev. 3:3; 16:15. See also Lk. 21:34ff. for a parallel simile, and Lk. 17:24ff. for the general teaching.

From his words you yourselves know well we may infer that Paul had already given them some oral teaching to this effect, based on the words of Jesus. Paul here identifies the OT day of the Lord with the second coming of Christ. 3 As travail comes upon a woman with child. The woes preceding the inauguration of the Messianic age are called in Jewish literature ḥeḇlô šel māšîaḥ ('the birthpangs of Messiah'); cf. Mk. 13:8, 'the beginning of travail'. 5 Sons of light; cf. Lk. 16:8. The terms 'sons of light' and 'sons of darkness' for the elect and non-elect figure prominently in the Qumran literature. Sons of the day; not merely a synonym for sons of light, but marking believers out as partakers of the glory to be revealed on the day of the Lord. 6 Let us not sleep. If we are sons of light and sons of the day, let us behave accordingly.

The following verses present a close parallel to Lk. 21:34–36. 8 The breastplate of faith and love, and for a helmet the hope of salvation. See 1:3 for the triad of graces, and for an elaboration of the armour metaphor cf. Eph. 6:11ff. Is. 59:17 is a background for both passages. 9 God has not destined us for wrath, but to obtain salvation; cf. 1:10 and Rom. 5:9. There, as here, the wrath is the judgment of the day of the Lord. Whether we wake or sleep; i.e. whether we survive to His coming or have died. The words are the same as those above for moral watchfulness and carelessness respectively, but Paul does not mean that it will not matter in the end whether we have been watchful and sober or not! He means, as in 4:15ff., that no difference will be made between living and dead saints at Christ's appearing; both groups will live together, and live with Christ, since He died for them. Cf. Rom. 14:9. 'The real point of this whole paragraph, whose motto, Watch and Pray, should be graven on the shield of every Christian warrior, is the paradox so difficult to us, but much less difficult to minds schooled in the prophets, of stressing the imminence of the Parousia while denying its immediacy' (W. Neil).

5:12–22 GENERAL EXHORTATIONS

They are exhorted to lead orderly and peaceable lives, active in well-doing.

12 Respect those who labour among you and are over you in the Lord and admonish you; i.e. give them practical acknowledgment by submitting to their guidance. The term pro-istamenoi ('those who are over you', 'leaders') used here appears also in Rom. 12:8 of the leaders of the Roman church; they are no doubt identical with those elsewhere called pastors, elders and bishops. Presumably they had been appointed by the missionaries, like the elders of the Galatian churches (Acts 14:23), but there is no record of this. 14 And we exhort you, brethren. It may be that in this verse the leaders themselves are addressed. Admonish the idle; RV 'the disorderly', lit. 'those who do not remain in the ranks' or 'those who play truant' (Gk. ataktous), referring here to 'loafers' (Moffatt), who neglected their daily duty and lived in idleness; cf. 4:11. 15 See that none of you repays evil for evil. The ethical injunctions of the Pauline Epistles contain clear echoes of the teaching of Jesus; cf. Rom. 12:17. 16–18 Rejoice . . . pray . . . give thanks. Christian life is to be lived in an atmosphere of continual joy, prayer and gratitude to God. 19–21 Do not quench the Spirit, do not despise prophesying, but test everything. The reference here is to the exercise of the gift of prophecy, under the impulse of the Holy Spirit, a common phenomenon in the church of apostolic days. The gift was easily counterfeited, and called for discernment (test everything), especially on the part of the leaders. The gift itself was not to be disdained, and genuine prophecy was not to be repressed, for that would amount to 'quenching the Spirit'. 21, 22 Hold fast what is good, abstain from every form of evil. These clauses should probably be taken together as a pair of complementary injunctions. Form of evil is lit. 'species (Gk. eidos) of evil'. The AV 'appearance of evil' is based on the other sense of eidos.

5:23–28 PRAYER, FINAL GREETING AND BENEDICTION

23 The God of peace himself; cf. Rom. 15:33 and other references in note on 2 Thes. 3:16. Sanctify you wholly; i.e. bring to completion the work of sanctification already begun (cf. on 4:7); the aorist optative hagiasai here indicates 'a "process seen in perspective", and so contemplated as a complete act' (Hogg and Vine). May your spirit and soul and body be kept sound and blameless. This clause expresses the same prayer in a new way; the aorist optative is again used with the same force (tērē-theiē). It is not certain that spirit and soul and body should be interpreted as teaching a formal tripartite doctrine of human nature, spirit being the 'God-conscious' aspect and soul the 'self-conscious' aspect of the inner life. One might as well deduce a formal quadripartite doctrine from Mk. 12:30. At the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Cf. 3:13 for the same emphasis. 24 probably means that He who calls His people to holiness is He who also makes them holy. 27 I adjure you by the Lord that this letter be read to all the brethren. It is not clear why Paul so solemnly puts the recipients on oath to read the letter to every member of the community. Harnack's theory that there were two distinct groups in the Thessalonian church, one Gentile and the other Jewish, and that, while this Epistle was primarily directed to the Gentile group, Paul wished its contents to be communicated to the Jewish group as well, cannot be maintained. Possibly he wished to make sure that those members who were 'playing truant' (v. 14) heard what he had to say. But his words may be no more than a solemn direction to read the letter at a meeting of the whole church.

2 Thessalonians

DATE, AUTHORSHIP, CANONICITY

The second Epistle to the Thessalonians, like the first, is addressed 'to the church of the Thessalonians' by 'Paul, Silvanus, and Timothy'. The situation with which it deals is to a large degree similar to that dealt with by the first Epistle. This suggests that it also was sent from Corinth, and not long after the despatch of the earlier letter. Like 1 Thessalonians, this letter appears too in the earliest lists of Pauline letters that have come down to us. The external evidence for its canonicity is as good as for that of the first Epistle. It is quoted by Polycarp (c. AD 120).

Yet several difficulties have been felt to stand in the way of accepting this internal and external evidence at face value. The style of 2 Thessalonians is said to be formal and official by contrast with that of 1 Thessalonians. This point does not amount to much; it arises from such expressions as 'we are bound' and 'as is fitting' in 1:3, which really call for no special explanation—certainly not that offered by Dibelius, that 2 Thessalonians, unlike 1 Thessalonians, was written specifically to be read in church (see 1 Thes. 5:27).

More serious is the argument that 2 Thessalonians insists that certain events must precede the day of the Lord (ch. 2), whereas 1 Thessalonians stresses the unexpectedness of that day's arrival, 'like a thief in the night'. But a distinction should be made between suddenness and immediacy; Paul's words about the suddenness of Christ's return in 1 Thessalonians had been interpreted to imply its immediacy, and this made it necessary to point out that a number of things must happen first.

In describing these things, however, 2 Thessalonians uses apocalyptic language unparalleled elsewhere in the Pauline letters. We have, in fact, a tiny apocalypse in 2 Thes. 2:3–12. This is not an adequate argument against the authenticity of the letter, and, indeed, present-day knowledge of apocalyptic beliefs at that time, with special reference to the manifestation of antichrist, has done much to reduce what was once felt to be a great difficulty here (see Commentary below).

The similarities between the two Thessalonian Epistles have also been felt to constitute, in their way, almost as great a problem as the differences. In spite of the first Epistle's warning against restless idleness arising from excessive eschatological expectation, the same situation is implied by the second Epistle. However, if the first Epistle's emphasis on the suddenness of the parousia had been understood to mean its immediacy, the tendency for some to 'play truant' would have been strengthened, in spite of all the admonitions to remain calm and get on with the ordinary business of life.

RELATION TO 1 THESSALONIANS

There are real difficulties in the relation between the two Epistles, and they are largely due to our very inadequate information about the circumstances at Thessalonica. Apart from the attempt to cut the knot by regarding 2 Thessalonians as pseudonymous, various theories have been propounded to account for the difficulty in relating the two Epistles to each other.

One of these makes 2 Thessalonians earlier than 1 Thessalonians. There is no a priori objection to this; Paul's letters to churches are arranged in descending order of length, not in chronological order. This theory does indeed help in some respects (cf. T. W. Manson, Studies in the Gospels and Epistles, 1962, pp. 268ff., for the view that 2 Thessalonians was taken to Thessalonica by Timothy on the occasion mentioned in 1 Thes. 3:2). But 2 Thessalonians does seem to imply some previous correspondence by letter (cf. 2:2, 15; 3:17), whereas 1 Thessalonians certainly appears to be the first letter written to the Thessalonian church after Paul's departure (see 2:17 – 3:10).

Harnack's theory has already been mentioned —that 1 Thessalonians was written to the Gentile section of the Thessalonian church and 2 Thessalonians to the Jewish section. The apocalyptic teaching of 2 Thes. 2, it was supposed, would be more intelligible to Jews. But it is incredible that Paul of all people would have acquiesced in such a division between Gentile and Jewish Christians to the extent of writing a separate letter to each; we should certainly have found him taking the line he took at Antioch when a division of that sort began to appear there (see Gal. 2:11ff.) and making the inculcation of Christian unity his first concern in writing to them.

Yet another suggestion is F. C. Burkitt's— 'that both Letters were drafted by Silvanus–Silas, that they were read to Paul, who approved them and added 1 Thess. ii 18 and 2 Thess. iii 17 with his own hand'. This suggestion does not greatly help us—in any case Burkitt intended it as a supplement to Harnack's hypothesis—and 2 Thes. 3:17 seems rather intended to authenticate the whole letter as Paul's own (despite Burkitt's idea that the terms of Paul's autographed postscript 'suggest that he is not wholly responsible for all the rest').

In fine, all these suggestions raise greater difficulties than the view that 2 Thessalonians was sent by Paul (in association with his two companions) to the whole Thessalonian church no long time after the despatch of 1 Thessalonians, to deal with a development of the earlier situation of which fresh news had come to him. The persecution of the Christians seems to have died down, and there appears to have been no occasion to repeat his previous warning about moral purity. But the eschatological excitement had not abated—partly because Paul's words in 1 Thessalonians were misunderstood and partly through some teaching which they had received from other quarters, and which was perhaps represented as having Paul's authority. It was therefore necessary to deal more explicitly and sharply with this particular question.

1:1, 2 SALUTATION

1 Paul, Silvanus, and Timothy, To the church of the Thessalonians . . . . A comparison with the salutation of the first Epistle makes it as certain as anything can be that both Epistles were written to the whole Thessalonian church. In God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. See on 1 Thes. 1:1 for this expression. 2 From God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. Common in Paul's epistolary salutations, but not in 1 Thes. 1:1.

1:3–12 THANKSGIVING AND ENCOURAGEMENT

3 We are bound to give thanks to God . . . as is fitting. The alleged formality of this language has been contrasted with the language of 1 Thes. 1:2ff. and used as an argument against the authenticity of 2 Thessalonians. But if the Thessalonian Christians had protested against what they considered the excessive commendation expressed in the previous letter, Paul might well reply: 'But it is only right that we should thank God for you; it is the least we can do'; and that is the force of the wording here. 4 We ourselves boast of you in the churches of God. This is not inconsistent with 1 Thes. 1:8, 'we need not say anything'; even if there was no need, they would speak all the same. Cf. 1 Thes. 2:20.

5 Evidence of the righteous judgment of God. As in 1 Thes. 3:3f., so here, he points out that their affliction is a proof of the genuineness of their faith, and that their steadfast endurance of it marks them as worthy to inherit the divine kingdom: in them, as in their persecutors, God's righteousness will be vindicated. 6, 7 To repay with affliction those who afflict you, and to grant rest with us to you who are afflicted. The day of Christ's return will be the day of equitable retribution and reward. The rest is relaxation or relief (Gk. anesis) after toil and conflict. When the Lord Jesus is revealed from heaven. The reference is to His manifestation in glory (cf. Lk. 17:30; 1 Cor. 1:7). With his mighty angels. Cf. Mt. 25:31; Mk. 8:38; and other passages mentioned in the note on 1 Thes. 3:13. In flaming fire. This again reflects the theophanic language of the OT (cf. Ps. 18:8ff.; Is. 66:15). 8 Inflicting vengeance. The exercise of judgment by Christ in the NT is based on Dn. 7:13f.; cf. Jn. 5:27; Acts 17:31. Who do not know God; i.e. who ignore Him, 'refuse to have God in their knowledge' (cf. Rom. 1:28; 1 Thes. 4:5). 9 Eternal destruction; i.e. the destruction which belongs to the age to come, with the decisive implication of finality. It consists in exclusion from the presence of the Lord, with whom alone is 'the fountain of life'. 10 To be glorified in his saints. This might mean His holy angels (see on 1 Thes. 3:13), but the parallelism with the following words, and to be marvelled at in all who have believed, suggests that Christian men and women are meant here. They are to share His glory; the 'revealing of the Lord Jesus from heaven' (v. 7) is also the day of 'the revealing of the sons of God' (Rom. 8:19).

11 That our God may make you worthy of his call. This probably looks forward to the day of recompense at the parousia, that they may on that day be adjudged to have acquitted themselves worthily of their calling; even so, it implies a prayer for their present spiritual progress. And may fulfil every good resolve; RV, 'every desire of goodness'. This refers to their own desires, while it is of course true that every such desire, like every work of faith, is produced in them by the Holy Spirit (cf. Gal. 5:22; Phil.

2:13). 12 So that the name of our Lord Jesus may be glorified in you, and you in him. The reference again is primarily to the parousia, but Paul's prayer would be fulfilled then only if the Lord's name were glorified in them day by day through life.

2:1–12 EVENTS TO PRECEDE THE DAY OF THE LORD

Some of the Thessalonian Christians had somehow got it into their heads that the day of the Lord had already begun. Paul explains that it must be preceded by the great apostasy, led by the antichrist, who is to be brought to nought by the advent of the day of the Lord.

1 Concerning the coming; the Greek preposition is hyper. Our assembling to meet him; a reference probably to the event described in 1 Thes. 4:17, when those who survive to the parousia will be 'caught up together' with those who are raised from the dead 'to meet the Lord in the air'. 2 Either by spirit or by word, or by letter purporting to be from us; i.e. neither prophetic utterance, nor more ordinary oral communication, nor a letter purporting to come from Paul or his companions must be allowed to mislead them. It is not plain whether Paul suspected that a letter in his name had actually been sent to the Thessalonians without his authorization. Certainly it would be unwarranted to suppose that this remark casts any doubt on the authenticity of 1 Thessalonians. Even if 2 Thessalonians were pseudonymous, it is unlikely that its author would have intended to throw suspicion on 1 Thessalonians. Possibly the reference to the letter purporting to be from us alludes to false conclusions drawn from the wording of 1 Thessalonians. But more probably Paul suspected that the idea that the day of the Lord had already started had been conveyed to the Thessalonians' minds by some kind of communication claiming his authority, but he had no certain information on this point. That the day of the Lord has come; RV 'is now present', i.e. 'has already set in' (Gk. enestēken). Cf. 1 Thes. 5:2. 3 That day will not come. This apodosis to the conditional clause has to be supplied; it means, 'the day of the Lord will not begin'. Unless the rebellion comes first; Gk. apostasia (whence our 'apostasy'), here used of the end-time revolt against the rule of God. And the man of lawlessness is revealed. 'The lawless one' (cf. v. 8), otherwise called antichrist and Belial and 'the beast from the abyss' (cf. Rev. 11:7), is the leader of the great eschatological rebellion against God. The son of perdition; a Hebraism, meaning here 'he who is doomed to destruction'; the same phrase is used of Judas Iscariot in Jn. 17:12 where it means rather 'the lost boy'. 4 Who opposes and exalts himself against every so-called god or object of worship. The language here echoes the description of the pre-Christian 'antichrist', Antiochus Epiphanes, in Dn. 7:25; 8:9ff.; 11:36ff.; cf. also Rev. 13. So that he takes his seat in the temple of God. This part of the picture of antichrist probably reflects the attempt by the Emperor Gaius in AD 40 to have his statue set up in the Temple at Jerusalem. That crisis brought vividly to the minds of Christians the eschatological discourse of Jesus preserved in Mk. 13. The words 'when ye see the abomination of desolation standing where he ought not' (Mk. 13:14, RV; note that a person is referred to) seemed specially applicable to the emperor's policy. 5 Do you not remember . . . ? An interesting sidelight on the element of apocalyptic in the early kērygma.

6 may be paraphrased: 'You know what holds him back, so that he will not make a public appearance before the time appointed for him.' What is restraining him is impersonal here, but personal in v. 7; this throws light on the meaning. The apostle is intentionally vague in writing this, but he appears to have been more explicit in his oral teaching at Thessalonica. This supports the view that the Roman Empire is the restraining agency, since it may be considered either as an impersonal power, or as embodied personally in the emperor. After the accusation brought against Paul at Thessalonica (Acts 17:6f.), any allusion to the imperial power—especially to its prospective abolition—had best be as vague as possible lest the letter fall into the wrong hands. 7 For the mystery of lawlessness is already at work. The principle of rebellion against God is already operating (e.g. in the opposition offered to the gospel in Thessalonica and elsewhere), but it is not openly enthroned in the world as it will be for the brief duration of antichrist's domination, because of him who now restrains it. Here the agency that holds the spirit of godless revolt in check is personal, indicating the emperor himself. Others, however, have regarded the restrainer as being as much an apocalyptic figure as antichrist, e.g. the angel of the abyss (Rev. 9:1; 20:1); in that case, however, Paul's reference might have been more explicit. Even less plausible is the suggestion that the Holy Spirit is intended, or the theory that Paul refers to his apostolic ministry as due to be completed before the End. But if the restrainer is the emperor, we need not think that the reigning Emperor Claudius (AD 41–54) is specifically referred to, or that Paul was thinking of Nero as Claudius's heir whose accession was held in check so long as Claudius lived. Nero was only 12 years old in AD 50, and some of Paul's warmest tributes to the Roman power (especially Rom. 13:1–7) were written after Nero came to the throne. But Paul had frequent reason to be grateful for the protection of the imperial authorities, who restrained the forces most opposed to the gospel. When such protection was withdrawn, the forces of antichrist would be able to work their will. How the same political power could at one stage restrain the anarchic forces which threatened the gospel and at another appear as the chief of those forces may be appreciated by comparing Rom. 13:1–7 with Rev. 13 (cf. also 1 Pet. 2:13–17; 3:13, alongside 4:12ff.).

Until he is out of the way. The subject of this clause is the restrainer, but it would be considered seditious to speak explicitly of the removal of the emperor; hence Paul's vagueness. The Greek ek mesou genesthai, 'to be taken out of the way', is a quasi-passive form corresponding to the active ek mesou airein, 'to take out of the way' (1 Cor. 5:2; Col. 2:14; and cf. Lat. e medio tollere). Failure to recognize this idiom has led some to force upon the words here a literalist translation, 'until he (antichrist) become (i.e. appear) out of the midst'; but that is not Paul's meaning. 8 And then the lawless one will be revealed. Here we have the normal Greek construction (ho anomos) corresponding to the Semitizing 'man of lawlessness' of v. 3. His revealing or unveiling precedes that of the true Christ. With the breath of his mouth; i.e. by His Word; cf. Is. 11:4; Rev. 19:15. By his appearing and his coming; i.e. 'by the manifestation (Gk. epiphaneia) of His parousia'. 9 Antichrist also has his parousia (coming). For his being energized by Satan with all power and with pretended signs and wonders cf. Rev. 13:2, 13ff. 10 Because they refused to love the truth. That refusal to accept God's truth is the certain precursor of infatuation by error is similarly taught in Rom. 1:18ff. 11 To make them believe what is false; lit., 'the lie', the false counterpart of the truth of vv. 10, 12; cf. again Rom. 1:25, which is literally 'who exchanged the truth of God for the lie'. In Zoroastrianism, too, 'The Lie' (Avestan druj) denotes the whole system of evil.

On this whole section (vv. 1–12) Geerhardus Vos's chapter 'The Man of Sin' in The Pauline Eschatology, 1930 (pp. 94ff.), is specially deserving of study.

2:13 – 3:5 FURTHER THANKSGIVING AND ENCOURAGEMENT

13 But we are bound to give thanks to God always for you; cf. 1:3. Brethren beloved by the Lord; cf. 1 Thes. 1:4. God chose you from the beginning; see on 1 Thes. 1:4, where Paul indicates the ground of his certainty that they were chosen by God. We should probably understand from the beginning to denote the eternity of God's choice, as in Eph. 1:4. Had Paul meant the earliest days of his preaching at Thessalonica he would probably have used such an expression as 'the beginning of the gospel' (Phil. 4:15). We should note the variant reading 'firstfruits' (Gk. aparchēn) for from the beginning (Gk. ap' archēs); both are well attested, but ap' archēs is probably to be preferred. If 'firstfruits' were read, the idea might be that of Jas. 1:18, a carrying over into Christian phraseology of the Jewish idea of Israel as God's firstfruits among the nations. Harnack, in line with his theory of the destination of this Epistle, took aparchēn to imply that the Jewish believers were the 'firstfruits' of Paul's mission at Thessalonica. To be saved. 'The thirteenth and fourteenth verses of this chapter are a system of theology in miniature. The apostle's thanksgiving covers the whole work of salvation from the eternal choice of God to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ in the world to come' (J. Denney). Through sanctification by the Spirit; cf. 1 Thes. 4:3ff.; the Holy Spirit is the Sanctifier, in that He sets believers apart for God, unites them to Christ, and reproduces the likeness of Christ in their lives, in view of the day when they are publicly to share Christ's glory. 14 So that you may obtain the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ; i.e. at His parousia. Cf. 1 Thes. 3:13; 5:23; Rom. 2:6ff.; 8:18ff., 30.

15 Hold to the traditions; i.e. the things handed on to you (Gk. paradosis). With this term are associated two Greek verbs paralambanein, 'to receive in turn', 'to have handed down to one' (cf. 1 Thes. 2:13; 4:1; 2 Thes. 3:6), and paradidonai, 'to hand on in turn', both being found in conjunction, e.g., in 1 Cor. 11:23; 15:3. Emphasis is laid on the continuity of the transmission of the truth of Christianity; the tradition is identical with the apostolic testimony, resting on the authority of Christ Himself. (See O. Cullmann, The Early Church, 1956, pp. 59–99.) Either by word of mouth or by letter; 'whether by our oral or written teaching'. The letter he has in mind is doubtless 1 Thessalonians. 16, 17 Now may our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God our Father, . . . comfort your hearts. As frequently (cf. 1 Thes. 3:11), the Lord Jesus and God the Father are united in action. Here, as in 2 Cor. 13:14, the Lord Jesus Christ is placed first. 'The only theological significance to be attached to the variations in order is that there is complete equality in the apostle's mind between the Father and the Son' (W. Neil).

3:1 Finally, brethren, pray for us; cf. 1 Thes. 5:25. That the word of the Lord may speed on and triumph; cf. Ps. 147:15 ('His word runs swiftly'). The reference here, of course, is to the gospel, which Paul and his companions were proclaiming at Corinth. 2 It is probably with special reference to dangers at Corinth that he requests prayer that we may be delivered from wicked and evil men. The Greek word atopos, here rendered wicked, means literally 'out of place', hence 'untoward', 'improper', 'perverse'. Paul is thinking primarily of his Jewish opponents. For not all have faith. This may mean 'all men do not exercise faith' (in Christ), or 'all men do not hold the faith' (i.e. the gospel). It makes no difference to the general sense here whether we understand faith as subjective (fides quâ creditur) or as objective (fides quae creditur), but the former is more probable at this stage. 3 But the Lord is faithful; Gk. pistos, an easy transition from pistis, the last word of the preceding sentence; pistos is the first word of the new sentence in the Greek. Cf. 1 Thes. 5:24. Guard you from evil; RSV mg., 'guard you from the evil one'. Here, as in the Lord's Prayer (Mt.

6:13), we should probably understand the evil (Gk. ponēros) as personal. 4 And we have confidence. For similar expressions of confidence cf. 1 Thes. 4:1, 9f.; 5:11. 5 May the Lord direct your hearts to the love of God. The Lord Jesus is the subject. The love of God may be either their (increasing) love for Him or (a fuller appreciation of) His love for them. It would be natural to suppose that the construction is the same as that of the following phrase, and to the steadfastness of Christ; to suppose, in other words, that both genitives are subjective. The steadfastness is an attribute of Christ Himself which the writer desires to see reproduced in His people; we should therefore take the love of God to be the love which God shows to men. The AV translation, 'the patient waiting for Christ', is a less natural way of understanding the words; if it were right, it would suggest that the love of God similarly is our love for Him (which indeed is but the response called forth by His love; cf. Rom. 5:5; 1 Jn. 4:19).

3:6–15 THE NEED FOR DISCIPLINE

They must dissociate themselves from those of their number who refuse to work for their living.

6 We command you . . . in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. Apostolic authority is fundamentally the authority of Christ; the apostles are His accredited ambassadors. Any brother who is living in idleness (Gk. ataktōs); cf. the adj. ataktous in 1 Thes. 5:14; here, as there, we have a military metaphor, denoting those who 'break rank' or 'play truant'. He reverts to the problem of those who neglect to earn their own living, instead of following the tradition . . . received from us. This practical aspect of the tradition was emphasized by example as well as by precept; 7–9 for the words of these verses, drawing attention to the apostles' own behaviour in this regard, cf. 1 Thes. 2:6ff. and other passages cited in our notes there. 10 If any one will not work, let him not eat. This may be a Jewish proverb based on Gn. 3:17ff. Even Rabbis were expected to earn their living by manual labour and not to make the teaching of the law a means of gain; thus Paul maintained himself by working in leather. 11 Living in idleness, mere busybodies. There is a word-play here in the Greek, mēden ergazomenous alla periergazomenous: 'Busybodies instead of busy' (Moffatt); 'neglecting their own business to mind other people's' (Knox); 'minding everybody's business but their own'. 12 To do their work in quietness and to earn their own living; lit. 'eat their own bread' (AV), i.e. the bread they have earned themselves. 'Stop fussing, stop idling, and stop sponging' (W. Neil). Cf. 1 Thes. 4:11. 13 Do not be weary in well-doing; cf. Gal. 6:9.

14 If any one refuses to obey what we say in this letter, note that man. Again the apostolic authority is stressed (cf. v. 12). It is not formal excommunication that is enjoined, but such practical expression of disapproval as will make the 'loafers' ashamed of themselves and mend their ways. 15 But they are not to be treated as outsiders, 'as a Gentile and a tax collector' (Mt. 18:17); they are still brethren, members of the Christian community, responsive (it is hoped) to this brotherly discipline.

Paul takes his leave of the Thessalonians with a prayer for their blessing, pointing out that his personal signature authenticates this and other letters as genuinely his.

16 The Lord of peace; He who is 'the author of peace and lover of concord'; cf. 'the God of peace' in 1 Thes. 5:23; Rom. 15:33; 16:20; Phil. 4:9; Heb. 13:20; also 1 Cor. 14:33; 2 Cor. 13:11. 17 I, Paul, write this greeting with my own hand. This is the mark in every letter of mine; it is the way I write. Lest they should be misled by a letter purporting to come from him, he draws their attention to the fact that all his letters are authenticated by some words in his own handwriting at the end. For the most part, he made use of amanuenses in writing his letters (cf. Tertius, Rom. 16:22). There is a reference to the character of his own handwriting in Gal. 6:11. 18 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all; the same benediction (with the addition of all) as in 1 Thes. 5:28 (and Rom. 16:20).

F. F. BRUCE

The Pastoral Epistles

INTRODUCTION

OCCASION AND PURPOSE

Behind these three Epistles there is a specific historical situation which is nevertheless not easy to piece together. In 1 Timothy Paul has recently left Timothy at Ephesus (1 Tim. 1:3). In Titus he has recently been with Titus in Crete (Tit. 1:5) and appears to be, at the time of writing, at Nicopolis where he requests Titus to join him (Tit. 3:12). This latter city was in all probability the place of that name in Epirus. By the time 2 Timothy was written the apostle is a prisoner who anticipates that his end is not far off. He has at some time been in Rome (2 Tim. 1:17) and has recently left some of his belongings at Troas (2 Tim. 4:13). Moreover, he has been to Miletus where he had to leave behind his companion Trophimus, who was ill (2 Tim. 4:20), while another associate, Erastus, has remained behind at Corinth. From all these allusions it is evident that, shortly before writing these Epistles, Paul has travelled respectively in Asia, in Crete and in parts of Europe. He appears to be back at Rome by the time that 2 Timothy was written.

In spite of various attempts, these historical data cannot be fitted into the framework of Acts and it seems highly probable, therefore, that Paul's movements reflected in these Epistles must be placed subsequent to his house imprisonment in Rome mentioned in Acts 28:30. This involves the assumption that he was released from this imprisonment, which some consider to be highly unlikely (but see discussion below on this point). There is good reason to believe that he could have expected a release on the basis of the charges preferred against him in Acts. If such a release be assumed, it must be supposed that he was later rearrested, perhaps in the region of Nicopolis, and taken back to Rome, where tradition has it that he suffered martyrdom.

If the historical occasion has thus been correctly understood, it is possible to define the purpose of these Epistles with some precision. Clearly Paul realizes that his time on earth is nearly done, and his mind is set upon giving guidance to those who are to follow him in positions of responsibility. He is considering the demands of church organization and writes to confirm certain matters, mainly about church officials, which he must already have imparted orally to his associates (cf. Tit. 1:5). In all probability Timothy, who was timid by nature, needed the authoritative written instructions of the apostle in order to put them into practice. He could then appeal to the apostle's letter in any case of dispute (cf. 1 Tim. 3:14, 15). These Epistles contain a variety of topics, not all of which are concerned with ecclesiastical discipline. There were certain problems about false teachers over which his associates needed advice, but they are not told how to answer the heresies. The main injunction is to avoid them because of their irrelevancies (see section below on the false teachers). In writing to Timothy, the apostle on more than one occasion issues a solemn charge to him, which suggests that he had some apprehension about Timothy's resolution.

A more specific purpose lies behind 2 Timothy than behind the others, for this Epistle is undoubtedly the apostle's last letter. He urges Timothy to stir up the gift he has already received (2 Tim. 1:3–7), reminds him of his own example (3:10ff.) and exhorts him to preach the word (4:2f.). The concluding chapter of this Epistle is particularly revealing of the mind of Paul at the conclusion of his life. He knows that he has fought a good fight (4:7) and is ready to depart. He refers to his first defence (4:16) and poignantly remarks that all had deserted him, but that the Lord stood by him. There is a touching request for some books, parchments and a cloak which he had left behind at Troas (4:13). This Epistle has been described as Paul's swan-song.

AUTHORSHIP

Many scholars do not regard these Epistles as authentic Pauline letters, and the reasons for this must be briefly mentioned, although they cannot be fully discussed. Each of these Epistles makes the claim to have been written by the apostle Paul, but those who dispute his authorship regard this as merely a literary device. As the following indications will show, there are strong reasons for regarding the claims to apostolic authorship to be authentic.

The historical situation mentioned above has led some to treat the personal allusions either as non-authentic, because they will not fit into the Acts story, or else as fragments of genuine Pauline letters which have been incorporated into pseudonymous epistles. As pointed out already, there is strong possibility that Paul was released from the Roman imprisonment of Acts 28, and if so the difficulty disappears. Any theory which postulates that genuine fragments were incorporated into fictitious epistles raises more problems than it solves.

The ecclesiastical situation reflected in these Epistles is said by some to reveal a time too late for the apostle Paul. But the organization is certainly less developed than that in the time of the earliest apostolic Fathers and points to a definitely more primitive period. At the same time more interest is shown in ecclesiastical organization than in the other Pauline Epistles. An objection on this ground would carry some weight if it could be shown that Paul was the kind of man who would not have concerned himself with the qualities of the men to be appointed; yet this cannot be shown. Since, on the first missionary journey, Paul and Barnabas appointed elders, they could not have been unmindful of the need for care in choosing those who were to lead God's people.

Another factor which has been claimed as non-Pauline is the heresy alluded to in these Epistles, because of its supposed connection with 2nd-century Gnosticism. But two considerations make this objection most inconclusive. The references in these Epistles are too general and too undeveloped in form to be connected immediately with the period of developed Gnosticism in the 2nd century. The second factor is the increasing recognition that Gnosticism had earlier forms which had their rise in the 1st century. There is therefore nothing intrinsically impossible in supposing that the Pastorals' heresy existed in the time of Paul. He does not refute the errors point by point as some claim that Paul would have done, because his associates, Timothy and Titus, knew his teaching well enough to do that when necessary. What they needed was advice not to waste time refuting idle chatter.

In the matter of doctrine another difficulty has been found in the fact that most of the major themes of the Pauline Epistles are lacking from the Pastorals. Moreover, there is a tendency in these Epistles for doctrine to be formalized into 'the truth' or 'the faith' or 'the deposit', which contrasts with the creative thinking of the apostle Paul. But allowance must be made both for the time when these Epistles were written (i.e. at the conclusion of Paul's work) and for the difference in the recipients (i.e. his trusted associates as compared with church groups who would need more detailed teaching). It is not impossible to imagine that the apostle could have written in this manner to those who had worked closely with him for some time.

More have been influenced to reject Pauline authorship by linguistic considerations than by any of the other arguments. It has been noted that many of the words in these Epistles are not used in Paul's other Epistles, and a large proportion of them not even elsewhere in the NT. Moreover, the style is said to be non-Pauline. Various statistical methods have been used in an attempt to demonstrate the differences of style between the Pastorals and the other Epistles. But such methods require bigger samples than those available within the group of Pauline Epistles. The problem of language cannot be passed over, but two possibilities exist and both support belief in Pauline authorship. Either Paul had a greater range of vocabulary and variety of style than many scholars allow; or else he made use of an amanuensis in the writing of these letters, to whom he granted some liberty of expression.

No doubt there will continue to be much dispute about the authorship of these Epistles, but their authenticity has the greatest probability and is supported by strong external evidence.

THE FALSE TEACHERS

It is not surprising that errors arose in some of the early churches. Such an occurrence was foretold by our Lord. There was error in the church at Colossae and also among those groups addressed in the Johannine Epistles and in the Apocalypse. The false teachers in the Pastorals show certain tendencies, but the evidence does not support the view that they belong to a highly organized sect. As pointed out above, their tendencies have some affinities with Gnosticism, but show nothing of the development of that movement during the 2nd century.

The most striking feature is the apparent irrelevance of much of the teaching. Paul refers to 'stupid, senseless controversies' (2 Tim. 2:23), and these he considers to be 'unprofitable and futile' (Tit. 3:9). There was much disputing about words (2 Tim. 2:14) which does no good. 1 Tim. 6:20 and 2 Tim. 2:16 refer to 'godless chatter'. These teachers, therefore, were not so much propagating errors as wasting time on things which do not matter.

There was among some a tendency towards undue asceticism, in the form both of celibacy and of abstinence from meats (1 Tim. 4:1–4). There was a desire to be outwardly religious, but a lack of real power in the religious life (2 Tim. 3:1ff.). On the other hand some were giving way to licence and it is to be noted that Timothy himself is warned to guard his personal purity (1 Tim. 5:22; 2 Tim. 2:22).

One or two specific features may be noted. There was an interest in genealogies (see comment on 1 Tim. 1:4; cf. Tit. 3:9). Moreover, appeal to myths was prominent (cf. 1 Tim. 1:4; Tit. 1:14) and these appear to have been Jewish. In 1 Tim. 6:20 reference is made to 'contradictions of what is falsely called knowledge'. Although Marcion in the 2nd century published a book with the title Antitheses (Contradictions), there can be no connection, unless Marcion was influenced by 1 Tim. 6:20, which is highly unlikely. The word was in common use in reference to any subjects under dispute. At least two of the false teachers were spreading error about the resurrection (cf. 2 Tim. 2:18).

It is noteworthy that Paul's main advice to his associates is 'avoid!' He is concerned that they should not be side-tracked from their major calling of preaching the gospel. Much of his advice in these Epistles has relevance in the modern church's conflict with deviations.

DEVELOPING FORMS OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE AND CHURCH ORDER

There are significant signs in these Epistles of a process of development. The content of the faith is clearly becoming crystallized in brief confessional summaries, often so framed as to present a moral challenge. So we find numerous 'faithful sayings' (1 Tim. 1:15; 4:9; 2 Tim. 2:11; Tit. 3:8), which are said to be worthy of active appropriation and believing response. We find essential principles expounded and applied to particular practical problems in a form which not only can be clearly taught, but which is also meant to be pressed upon the faithful with exhortation to act accordingly.

Some points of fundamental Christian theology are explicitly emphasized in a new way in order to counter the prevalent false teaching. There is, for example, the marked emphasis on the essential nature, attributes and unity of God as the sovereign Creator and Saviour of all (see 1 Tim. 1:1, 17; 2:3–5; 4:4, 10; 6:13, 15, 16; 2 Tim. 2:13; Tit. 1:2, 3); on Christ as the only Mediator between God and men, on His Person and work, on His humanity and on His death, endured as a substitutionary ransom price, as the one and all-sufficient way of redemption, spiritual renewal and consecration to God and His service (see 1 Tim. 1:1; 2:5, 6; 3:16; 2 Tim. 1:10; Tit. 2:13, 14; 3:5, 6).

There are evidences of an ordered and more regulated congregational worship, found in references to the necessary place of reading of Scripture, exhortation and teaching (1 Tim. 4:13), and of supplications, prayers, intercessions, thanksgivings (1 Tim. 2:1). There are traces of hymns, of credal and liturgical fragments, of doxologies (see 1 Tim. 3:16; 6:13–16; 2 Tim. 1:9, 10; 2:8, 11–13; 4:1; Tit. 2:11–14; 3:4–7). Guidance is given for the proper appointment of individuals to responsible oversight and ministry, in pastoral care and exposition of the Word; and plain and detailed warning is given of the dangers latent in unwise appointments. Each local congregation, or church, is recognized as a household of God, and a divinely intended warden of, and witness for, the truth. And such congregations are likely to prove steadfast and faithful in the face of perils from within as well as from without only if diligent attention is paid to such proper procedure (1 Tim. 3:15, RV). Yet underlying all such detailed guidance, and predominantly expressed through it, is the compelling awareness that what matters most of all is not the system but the men; the main stress is not on office and form but on genuine Christian character and on conscientious and consistent behaviour.

1:1, 2 PERSONAL ADDRESS AND GREETING

1 Paul writes as an apostle, as one conscious of a mission given to him by divine appointment. He writes as a servant of Jesus, recognized as Messiah or the Lord's anointed; he writes, therefore, as a man under orders, as an ambassador of 'King Jesus'. The form Christ Jesus is characteristic of this letter (cf. 1:12, 14, 15). This commission given to Paul is an expression of God's own activity to save men, and is directed towards helping men to find sure hope of this salvation in Christ. Such language indicates at once that this is more than a private, personal letter. 2 It is written to Timothy as to a genuine second-generation Christian, one of the true children in the faith of Christ, to whom Paul can look to carry on the work and witness of the gospel. Its contents concern Timothy's activity as a minister in the church, household or family of God (see 3:14, 15). The spontaneous way in which Christ is twice coupled with God Himself in these verses implies a significant recognition of His place in the Godhead.

1:3–20 A FORMER CHARGE REITERATED

1:3–11 A call to oppose false doctrine

3 Paul reminds Timothy of the particular task committed to him when he urged him to remain at Ephesus. He was to admonish those who are tending to turn aside to false and profitless teaching, and to recall them to sincere and devoted Christian living. It is noteworthy how quickly the churches were troubled from within by false teachers, and how Paul viewed such men with the most solemn gravity, and took deliberate and sustained precaution against their potentially fatal influence. Cf. 6:3–5; Acts 20:28–30; Gal. 1:6–9. The varied errors are all comprehensively described as the teaching of different doctrine. Note that this implies a recognized 'form of doctrine' or 'pattern of teaching' (Rom. 6:17) already generally accepted. 4 Here the danger is lest wrong attention be paid to (probably Jewish) myths and genealogies, possibly fanciful additions to, and interpretations of, the OT. To try to find hope in human descent or succession is inconclusive and unsatisfying, i.e. endless. Such inquiries give rise only to controversial questionings and speculations. Divine training; Gk. 'dispensation', 'stewardship' or 'order' (see RSV mg.). The meaning is either that they cannot further that dispensation of God in the gospel which offers men salvation by faith; or that they do not promote that effectual discharge of the stewardship of life, to which we are called as believers.

5 In contrast to these mistaken activities of some, the practical teaching of the gospel demands a response which is expressed in inner sincerity and active goodwill. The four characteristics of v. 5 are acquired in the reverse order. Faith, which is no mere pretence, is the foundation. This issues in the inward enjoyment of a pure heart, and the concern to preserve a good conscience (cf. Acts 24:16), and in the outward practice of love towards God and men. Such love is the end in view, the proper goal or completion of saving faith. Cf. Acts 15:9; 24:16; Gal. 5:6. 6 The aforementioned certain persons have not only failed to aim at and pursue this end; they also have wandered away into vain discussion, or idle chatter, into an activity which is valueless instead of fruitful. 7 They are dominated by the desire to be authorities or teachers of the law, like Jewish Rabbis. Actually they have no proper understanding of the things concerning which they thus not only talk but even make self-confident assertions. They are, therefore, a serious danger to the Christian community, capable of deceiving and misleading many.

8–11 Lest his derogatory reference to would-be law-teachers should be misunderstood, Paul introduces a statement declaring that the law is good, and that it supports and complements the gospel by forbidding everything that is opposed to its wholesome teaching. The fault lies with the false teachers, who do not use the law as God intended it to be used, i.e. to restrain and convict evil-doers. It is not intended as material for fanciful interpretation and profitless speculation on the part of the righteous or justified man. Evil-doers are here described as lacking moral standards, reverence for God, a sense of the holy, and without regard for family relations, human life, sexual purity and social good faith. As a consequence they are unruly, sinful, profane, merciless. 9, 10 Paul obviously here follows the order of the Ten Commandments and bluntly specifies violations in their most extreme form. The sound doctrine, or wholesome, healthful teaching, is a phrase characteristic of, and peculiar to, the Pastoral Epistles. By contrast, false teaching is like gangrene (2 Tim. 2:17); and devotion to it a sign of spiritual sickness (1 Tim. 6:3, 4). 11 The glorious gospel; RV 'the gospel of the glory'. The genitive is one of content rather than of quality. God's glory is revealed to men in the gospel which tells men of Christ; 'the glory' is virtually a reference to Christ Himself. Cf. Jn. 1:14, 18; 2 Cor. 4:4, 6. Blessed here 'describes God as experiencing within Himself the perfection of bliss' (TNTC, p. 62).

1:12–17 Paul's own experience of salvation

12 Paul proceeds indirectly to encourage Timothy to a high yet humble view of his calling and to a sustained devotion to its discharge. This he does by a typical, parenthetical doxology to Christ and to God for his own amazing experience of divine mercy, and for his appointment by Christ to a stewardship of that gospel (note also v. 11), to which he first owed his own salvation. In the Christian experience the complement to trusting Christ and to being inwardly empowered by Him is to be trusted or treated as trustworthy by Him to fulfil some appointed service. The word here (Gk. diakonia, without the definite article) is potentially very general in reference, though Paul often uses it (and 'minister', Gk. diakonos), as no 2nd-century writer would have been likely to do, to refer to his apostolic office (cf. Rom. 11:13; 2 Cor. 3:6; 5:18; 6:3). 13 'Injurious' (AV, RV; Gk. hybristēs) describes a doer of outrage, a man given to violence. It was when Paul was showing no mercy, as one strong in the conviction that he knew what was right, that he was treated mercifully, as one whose active unbelief prevented him from understanding the truth. 14 Such is the overflowing excess of divine grace (cf. Rom. 5:8, 10, 20), given to us in Christ Jesus, and moving us to live the characteristic Christian life of faith and love, instead of the typical sinful life of unbelief and enmity (so violently expressed in Saul before his conversion). 15 Thus it was through a deep, personal experience of its benefit that Paul both learned and exemplified the character and the trustworthiness of that gospel which he was appointed to beseech all men to believe (as sure) and to receive (as worthy). For he still (note the significant present tense, I am) knew himself as the foremost of sinners. He knew that the purpose of the incarnation of God's Son as Messiah Jesus was to save sinners like himself. This truth is here summed up by quoting a current primitive credal phrase. 16 Paul knew, too, that God's purpose in showing such a chief sinner as himself such utterly undeserved mercy was to make his life an example, or exhibit, of the full extent of Christ's long-suffering kindness (i.e. towards such a violent opponent). Such an exhibit would encourage others in the future to put their confidence in the same Saviour, and thus enter into the enjoyment of life eternal. 17 The doxology is noteworthy for the attributes ascribed to God. He is eternally sovereign, immune from decay, not observable by human eyes, the one and only true God. And when such words were publicly uttered it was for all to assent and to say, Amen.

1:18–20 A reminder and a warning

Paul appeals to the inspired words, which at the beginning of Timothy's ministry indicated the work and spiritual warfare to which he is called (cf. 4:14). He then warns him of the underlying cause of that spiritual disaster to which some have already come. 18 The prophetic utterances marked Timothy out as chosen of God for special service. He was meant to find by them (lit. 'in them') inspiration or fortification to wage a good campaign for God. Comparison of vv. 18, 19 with v. 5 suggests that Paul is repeating a charge originally given to Timothy concerning the importance of moral sincerity. 19 It is because some have failed just here, and deliberately thrust away from themselves the good conscience to which they should have held fast, that they have made shipwreck with regard to the Christian faith and become heretical in their teaching. 20 Their error is so serious that for their own good they have had to be severely disciplined. Delivered to Satan; cf. Jb. 2:6; 1 Cor. 5:5. This seems to mean to excommunicate. By putting such a one outside the sphere of Christ's kingdom or protection, he was exposed to the dominion of Satan, and particularly to his power to inflict physical disease. (For more detail about Hymenaeus see 2 Tim. 2:17, 18.)

2:1–7 AN EXHORTATION TO PRAYER FOR ALL MEN

Paul begins here to indicate the particular items of his general charge. He treats as of first importance the full practice of prayer for all men (v. 1). It seems probable that Jewish or Gnostic heretical teaching was suggesting the restriction of salvation to a particular race, or to certain classes only. Paul, therefore, justifies his universal exhortation by a sixfold assertion. He points to the character and will of God as the universal Saviour; to His unity as the one God of all men; to His provision of the human Christ Jesus as the single Mediator between Himself and the whole human race; to the universal scope of Christ's redeeming act which was for all (v. 6); to the consequent testimony to God's purpose to save all men which is provided by the accomplishment of the promised redemption at the appointed time; and to his own divine appointment to a share in its proclamation as none other than a teacher of the Gentiles (v. 7), i.e. one called to evangelize men of all nations alike.

1 The four words used for prayer may be progressive as well as comprehensive, indicating the supplication of one in need, the general outgoing of prayer to God alone, confident boldness of access to God's presence to make known one's requests, accompanied by thanksgiving for mercies enjoyed and prayers answered. The word intercessions has no necessary reference to others; its primary idea is of approach to a superior to make request. Such prayers should primarily be for all men's salvation; 2 but a complementary duty, if Christians are to be free to live as they ought in this world, is to pray for rulers and for all who are in high positions, that by their government they may preserve peace and order. Godly and respectful means with due reverence for God and with a proper sense of the seriousness of life. RV renders 'in all godliness and gravity'. 3 This (i.e. such praying) is intrinsically good, and pleasing to God because in harmony with His will for men. 4 does not say that God has determined that every single man must be saved; but simply that His general desire for mankind is that all alike shall enjoy salvation (cf. Rev. 7:9, 10) by coming to the knowledge of the truth (cf. 2 Tim. 2:25; Tit. 1:1). 5 This universality arises from God's oneness. As the only God, He deals directly and in the same way with all men (see Rom. 3:29, 30; 10:12). The man (Gk. anthrōpos, 'a human being', without the definite article); RV renders 'himself man'. The very humanity of Christ and His appointment as the only mediator between God and men supply added indication that the salvation provided in Him is for men, and for all men alike. 6 Ransom (Gk. antilytron) indicates a price paid for release. The preposition anti, 'instead of', suggests substitution; cf. Mk. 8:37; 10:45 (Gk.). Note that what Christ thus gave was himself. 7 In faith and truth may indicate Paul's sincerity or, more probably, the subject of his teaching; cf. v. 4.

2:8–15 GUIDANCE CONCERNING PRAYING AND TEACHING IN THE CONGREGATION

In all congregations it should generally be the men who lead in prayer, and those who do it should be careful to do it worthily. Similarly, Christian women should abstain from lavish adornment, and seek to commend themselves by their good works. They should display a becoming modesty and restraint, a quiet and submissive readiness to learn, rather than a self-assertive desire to teach. The proper place of woman in relation to man is indicated by the original order of creation; and her unfitness as a guide of the man is demonstrated by the way in which Eve was deceived and transgressed God's commandment. Woman's special calling is to motherhood; and, although there are now pain and peril in childbirth (see Gn. 3:16), those women will be brought safely through who respond fully to the demands of the gospel.

8 Paul gives authoritative counsel which is to apply in every place, i.e. wherever Christians meet for worship. To 'lift up the hands' was a recognized outward expression of the attitude of prayer (see Ex. 17:11, 12; 1 Ki. 8:22; Ps. 28:2). The conditions of effective praying are holy hands, i.e. personal purity, and freedom from ill-will towards others and consequent wrong motives. 9, 10 Women are to give a silent witness by their seemly dress and deportment, and by lives of active good works. Cf. 1 Pet. 3:1–6. Modestly (Gk. aidōs) signifies an appropriate reserve or sense of shame which preserves from all unbecoming behaviour. Sensibly (Gk. sōphrosynē) describes a balanced and discreet self-restraint. 11,12 In public worship it becomes the woman to be silent and submissive—that is part of her true dignity—not to try to take over the reins and direct the man. So Paul does not permit this; to do so would be to encourage something bad for both sexes, and to violate the created order. 13, 14 This appeal to the mind and purpose of the Creator shows clearly that Paul is not basing what he says simply on the position assigned to woman in the society of that day. He is appealing rather to a guiding principle of universal and abiding application (cf. 1 Cor. 11:2–16). Further, the tragedy of the Fall establishes the general truth that a woman is more easily deceived than a man; so it is out of place for her to take the lead in settling either doctrine or practice for the Christian community. (Note that it is, however, a woman's privilege to teach children and younger women; see 2 Tim. 1:5; 3:14, 15; Tit. 2:3, 4.) 15 The change to the plural 'they' (so AV, RV and Gk.) follows a reference to 'woman' in vv. 11–14 which is generic and collective. The concluding sentence indicates what each particular woman must actively do in order to experience the blessings of salvation in relation to the discharge of her function of motherhood. Cf. 1:5; these words in faith, etc., indicate the pathway of Christian obedience.

3:1–16 QUALIFICATIONS FOR THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY

The function of oversight in, i.e. managing or caring for, the church of God (see v. 5) is a worthy task that should be well discharged. It requires a man of blameless, pure, disciplined and generous character, who manages his own home well; and particularly no recent convert, but one whose established good conduct as a Christian is well spoken of, so that he may give no occasion to the devil to accuse or ensnare him either because of his own pride, or because of the reproaches of those outside the church. Similarly, those who are to serve as deacons ought first to have approved themselves by their consistent and conscientious Christian behaviour, particularly in matters of self-discipline and home management. For this similarly is a ministry which ought to be discharged well, and those who fulfil it worthily will thereby both ensure their own good standing as Christians, and generally increase the outspoken confidence with which they can commend the Christian faith.

3:1–7 The office of a bishop

1 Paul's first concern here is to encourage a proper regard for the task of oversight or episcopacy (Gk. episkopē), and the corresponding recognition that those who are to undertake it ought to be men above reproach. Bishop (Gk. episkopos) and 'elder' (Gk. presbyteros) were in NT times alternative names for the same officer (see Tit. 1:5, 7; Acts 20:17, 28), the first term indicating function or duty, and the second dignity or status. Each local congregation had several. The translation 'bishop' must therefore not be understood in its developed monarchical and diocesan sense. 2 'Married only once' seems more likely to be the meaning here than the husband of one wife, i.e. not practising polygamy. Cf. 5:9. It doubtless means a man free, as many converts to the faith were not, from all unsatisfactory sexual history or associations. 3 Gentle, not quarrelsome; the Greek words mean 'forbearing', or 'considerate', and 'not contentious'. 4, 5 Capacity for effectively controlling others will not find expression in church oversight if it is lacking in a man's handling of his own children. 6 Puffed up with conceit; the Greek participle means 'beclouded', and so in a confused state of mind, here due to conceit because of sudden elevation to office. The condemnation of the devil probably refers to the judgment under which the devil came because of his insensate pride. Though, as the Greek word diabolos occurs in these Epistles in the sense of 'slanderer' or 'accuser' (see v. 11), some would interpret it in vv. 6 and 7 in this sense. Then the phrase in v. 6 would mean 'the judgment passed upon him by the typical slanderer'; and vv. 6 and 7 together would reinforce at the end the first qualification for a bishop mentioned in v. 2, i.e. 'above reproach', having a good reputation, and so not open to obvious or easy attack from 'the slanderer'.

3:8–13 The office of a deacon

8 Deacons. The Greek word has a very general meaning, 'ministers'. But in the Christian fellowship it obviously became the special term for a class of helpers subordinate to bishops or elders; cf. Phil. 1:1. As the qualifications emphasized in this whole section are moral, and are such as ought to characterize all good Christians, much the same are required in deacons as in bishops. If, however, as seems likely, deacons did house-to-house visitation and looked after church funds, there is special appropriateness in the qualifications stressed in v. 8. Double-tongued means saying different things to different people to suit the occasion; or the Greek word dilogos can mean simply 'given to repetition', i.e. a tale-bearer. Greedy for gain; the Greek word means disposed to seek gain in base and shameful ways; cf. Tit. 1:7, 11. 9 A mystery is something hidden from men in general, but openly revealed to the privileged, in this case to those who have faith (cf. v. 16). Such faith and understanding can be healthily maintained only where there is active conscientious obedience; cf. 1:5, 19; 2:15. 10 None should be allowed to serve as deacons unless they have first thus openly approved themselves as worthy in the eyes of all.

11 The Greek word translated women is ambiguous. It could mean the deacons' wives (AV). Here it may refer to women workers or deaconesses (cf. Rom. 16:1). The four qualifications demanded are closely parallel to those demanded of men in v. 8; in the misuse of the tongue women are more prone to be slanderers (Gk. diaboloi). 13 A good standing has been interpreted as the first step on the ladder of promotion; but this does not suit the context. Some regard the 'good standing and great boldness' (RV) thus gained as pointing Godward, particularly with reference to the day of judgment and reward; cf. 6:19; 1 Jn. 2:28; 3:21; 4:17. It seems more appropriate, however, to interpret the words manward, for the main emphasis of this whole section is on the need for a worthy reputation to be gained and maintained in the eyes of men by all who are to hold office in the church. This will increase their confidence or 'boldness' in preaching the gospel.

3:14–16 The purpose of these instructions

15 How one ought. Paul is concerned to guide the behaviour of all church members, not of Timothy only, and that because of the character of the company to which they belong. The reference is to each local congregation; there are no definite articles. Every such congregation is a genuine household or 'family' and church of God, not occupied like a heathen temple by a lifeless idol, but enjoying the manifested presence of the living God. Also, its corporate existence and regular public meetings provide for the truth in that locality a visible witness, or pillar, and an enduring support or bulwark. 16 summarizes this truth as a mystery revealed to those who have a spirit of true piety or 'godliness' (AV, RV), which is of the essence of true religion. The common Christian confession of this mystery indicates its greatness (the Greek says it is 'confessedly' great, i.e. great by common consent). There follows a quotation from such a confession, abruptly introduced in the Greek by a masculine relative pronoun, obviously referring to Christ; for this 'mystery' is a Person (cf. Col. 1:27). The rhythmical and antithetical phrases suggest a quotation from an early credal hymn. Christ's pre-existence is implied and His incarnation asserted. It is by what happened in the realm of His spirit (RV) that His true identity was vindicated (cf. Rom. 1:3). This manifestation of God in history disclosed new wonders even to angels (cf. Eph. 3:10; 1 Pet. 1:12), and has provided a gospel to be preached to all nations. His consequent rewards are a company of believers gathered from earth, and His own exaltation into the realm of the divine glory in heaven.

4:1–5 A SOLEMN WARNING REGARDING FALSE TEACHING

In surprising contrast to these things (3:15, 16), Paul testifies that unmistakable witness has been given by the Spirit that there will be in the future, on the part of some in the church, an abandonment of revealed truth. This will be due fundamentally to the influence of evil spirits, and more immediately to the false teaching of insincere men, who will be the instruments of these evil spirits, and who will improperly insist on the necessity of abstaining from marriage and from certain foods. Such teaching directly contradicts the purpose of the Creator, particularly His purpose for fully instructed believers. For everything which God made is not only good in itself, but intended to be used by men. Nothing, therefore, is to be rejected as absolutely unusable. Rather we need to learn how we may properly and continuously sanctify things to our use in a spirit of thanksgiving, expressed to God in appropriate prayer, particularly prayer itself learnt from the written Word of God.

1 The Spirit expressly says; probably through Christian prophets, or possibly through Paul himself (cf. Acts 20:23; 21:11; see also Mt. 24:11). In later times; the Greek means subsequent to the time of writing, not 'last' as in 2 Tim. 3:1. The faith, with the definite article, indicates the body of revealed truth (cf. 1:19, RV; Jude 3). The doctrines are not about demons, but they emanate from demons. Over against the Spirit and the mystery of godliness stand misleading spirits and their false teaching. 2 The liars whose consciences are seared are either men lacking in moral sensitiveness, or men bearing the brand-mark of demonic ownership. 3–5 The assertions of these verses are significant when studied in relation to the Gnostic and dualistic views that matter is evil and not created by God. But, while God created everything for use by men, right use depends on faith, full knowledge of the truth and an actively expressed spirit of thanksgiving. 5 The word of God is a common phrase for divinely inspired utterance, especially as found in Scripture. Here it suggests the use in saying 'grace' of actual OT phraseology; or it may mean that such eating is sanctioned by explicit divine direction.

4:6–16 TIMOTHY'S TEACHING AND PERSONAL BEHAVIOUR

Paul makes plain to Timothy that his calling to the service of Christ demands faithful devotion, both in his own living and in his ministry to his fellow-Christians. He must be careful both to preach what is true and profitable and himself to practise and pursue the same. The various aspects of the ministry of the Word must all be diligently discharged, and the God-given gift for such service fully exercised. Such ministry demands utter devotion. To live in this way leads to the double reward of salvation fully enjoyed by both preacher and hearers alike.

6 It is Timothy's responsibility to set these truths (see vv. 4, 5) before the Christians, to lay them down as the foundation of right practice (Gk. hypotithemenos). This he will be able to do only if he continually feeds himself (Gk. present participle) on the gospel truths to whose practice he is committed. This, therefore, is how to approve himself as a good minister of Christ Jesus. 7 The ideas of the two halves of this verse stand in opposition. One can give oneself to the good only by having nothing to do with the bad. The myths are silly because (Gk.) characteristic of superstitious old women. Christ's minister must keep himself spiritually fit by appropriate nourishment (v. 6) and exercise (v. 7). Instead of the misleading self-discipline of asceticism (v. 3), let him engage in proper and strenuous Christian training (cf. 1 Cor. 9:25–27). 8 Even at its best, bodily discipline as an end in itself is of only limited value. In his training the Christian minister ought rather to make godliness, or the devotion of his life to the proper worship of God, his dominant aim. The benefit thus to be gained is without limit or all-embracing; it concerns one's true spiritual life rather than one's physical existence (Gk. zōē, not bios as in 2 Tim. 2:4; see AV, RV), and it promotes its future as well as its present well-being or full enjoyment. 9 Such teaching is worthy to be believed and received, i.e. acted on, by all Christians. 10 It indicates the end that Paul himself has in view (note the use of we) in continuing to face the physical effort and endurance demanded by his apostolic labours. Also, hope of this benefit is settled and continuous (Gk. perfect tense) because it is grounded, not on any power in the physical exertion to produce such a result, but on God in His revealed character as living (Gk. zōn) and as Saviour. These characteristics assure men of His ability and His readiness to give them true life (Gk. zōē). While God, by His gracious providences, shows Himself active to save in His dealings with all (cf. Mt. 5:45; 6:26), the full exhibition of all that His saving activity can mean is especially realized in the experience of believers.

11 This proper practice of Christian living Timothy is both to enjoin and explain, in order to lead his hearers to engage in it with full understanding. 12 His relative youthfulness and natural diffidence must not be allowed to encourage any to look down on him (cf. 1 Cor. 16:10, 11). Rather, he should openly set himself before all as a model to be imitated (cf. Phil. 3:17; 2 Thes. 3:9), not only in his teaching, but also in his conduct and in the underlying love, faithfulness and integrity to which it obviously gives expression. 13 Also, as one called to public ministry in the congregation, he must give sustained attention to its three main responsibilities: the public reading of scripture; exhortation or preaching based upon it (i.e. sermons); teaching or catechetical instruction (cf. Lk. 4:16–21; Acts 13:15; 15:21; 17:2, 3).

14 Nor should he forget and leave unexercised the special gift he has within him for such ministry. Note that such God-given enablement demands human co-operation for its full exercise (cf. Phil. 2:12, 13; 2 Tim. 1:6). Timothy had been assured of the character and of the impartation of this gift by the complementary witness of both a prophetic word and a solemn ordination (cf. Acts 13:1–3). Note the significant reference to the corporate function of a body of local elders acting together; and the combination in significant order of prophecy and symbolic action directed towards the recipient (i.e. 'word' and 'sacrament'). 15 The minister must continually give his whole mind and self to these things. Not only should he thus make progress, 16 but also it should be obvious to all that he is thus growing in grace of personal character and in the fullness and quality of his teaching. These are the things to which he must unceasingly apply himself. Such practice by the minister is the way to ensure the full salvation of himself and his hearers alike. Note how the minister not only fulfils his ministry by what he says (those he serves are described as your hearers), but also necessarily completes it, or spoils its effectiveness, by how he himself lives.

5:1 – 6:2 SPECIAL GROUPS WITHIN THE CHURCH

5:1, 2 General instructions

Ministry like Timothy's involved dealing with people and solemnly confronting them with the truth, and this duty must be discharged; but it should be fittingly done in true affection and with sober restraint. 1 It does not become a relatively young minister like Timothy sharply to reprimand anyone older than himself. The word 'elder' (AV) refers here simply to age, not office, i.e. an older man. 2 The qualification in all purity refers particularly to Timothy's ministry to the young women. It is part of his responsibility to exhort them, but he must watch against any development, or even suggestion, of improper interest or intimacy. In Tit. 2:3–5 the actual training of young women is explicitly entrusted to older Christians of their own sex.

5:3–16 Instructions about widows

In rightly marking widows out for appropriate regard and care, those should be distinguished for such honour and help who are both really destitute and truly worthy. Whenever possible, widows should be provided for by their own children or families; this is an obvious Christian duty, and the church ought not to be needlessly burdened. Only those widows should be enrolled among those who fulfil ministry and receive maintenance who are 60 or over, who have been married only once and do not intend to remarry, and who are well spoken of as active in good works. Younger women are unsuitable for such appointment. They may be tempted to remarry, or fall into the snare of making house-to-house visitation an occasion for idle and harmful gossip. It is better for such to remarry and to shoulder the responsibilities of having children and running a home. In this way they may be able themselves to help widows whom the church would otherwise have to relieve.

3 Honour. This may include the provision of necessary material assistance; see v. 17 and Mt. 15 5, 6. A real widow (v. 5) who needs such assistance is one without either means or relatives to support her; she is left all alone. 4 Every widow with relatives should be supported by them. This means that they must, as a primary duty, learn (i.e. make it their regular practice) to show filial piety towards members of their own family, and to give back proper recompense to their parents or forbears. Such conduct is acceptable not only to those who thus benefit, but also in the sight of God.

5 The genuine widow, in addition to being left all alone, will commend herself as worthy of support as one who has acquired the habits of looking hopefully to God, not men, and devoting herself to long and frequent praying. 6 In contrast to this, the type of woman who wastefully or prodigally spends life and all that it brings is not to be reckoned as actually a widow for, though living, she is in God's sight already dead. 7 The need to make these distinctions and to maintain a worthy standard must be definitely enforced by Timothy, with a view, not to shutting some widows out of benefit, but rather to securing that all will live irreproachable lives. 8 Every Christian ought to take thought for the needs of his relatives, and most of all for those of the members of his own family. Not to do so is by act to deny the faith which with the mouth one professes. It would even make one worse than the unbelieving heathen, for he recognizes a duty in such matters.

9, 10 Some find here the earliest and a significant scriptural reference to an 'order of widows' (often mentioned in other early Christian writings). These seem to have been 'women elders' rather than 'women deacons' or 'deaconesses' (see on 3:11), who can scarcely all have been over 60. Their particular responsibilities appear to have been to care for children, particularly orphans, and the younger women; this would involve house-to-house visitation. The qualifications for enrolment are obviously strict. Such conditions seem clearly those for ministry rather than merely maintenance, unless the reference is to specially selected as well as needy widows, who are guaranteed permanent lifelong support by the local church.

Paul gives two reasons for not enrolling younger widows. 11, 12 In the first place it is unwise to make them pledge not to remarry. For, should they later wish to do so, such desire, otherwise innocent, will then be a rebellion against the yoke of Christ, and will make them stand self-condemned for having violated their first pledge. 13 Secondly, it would give them an undesirable opportunity to become talkative busybodies rather than active workers. The suggestion seems to be that still active, younger women, who as wives have been occupied with home management, if they are suddenly given maintenance, and possibly a ministry largely to be fulfilled by visiting other homes and by words of exhortation, may fall into the temptation to be lazy and to become talkers who make mischief by betraying confidences. 14 Therefore, to avoid the danger of giving opponents a ground for reproaching Christians, it is better that such women should remarry and be fully occupied again with family responsibilities. Some would say that this passage implies that the experience of married life develops a woman's aptitude for some tasks and lessens it for others; that younger women who are maintained by the church to do work as deaconesses should be spinsters, not widows; or, alternatively, that any healthy widow under 60 ought to find some kind of employment (if not a husband) rather than be given full maintenance, even as a church worker. The enemy seems here to mean the typical human opponent, not the devil. Occasion. The Greek word is a military word meaning 'a base of operations'. 15 Paul appeals to the witness of experience to confirm his judgment. This kind of departure from the way of Christ (v. 11) to follow Satan has thus occurred in some cases. The insertion of already suggests that it has happened in the short time which has elapsed since such appointments of younger widows were first made. It is also significant as indicating that the probable date of such a reference to church organization is therefore not so late as might at first seem probable.

5:17–25 The proper treatment, discipline and appointment of presbyters

Timothy was charged with special responsibilities in connection with the elders, who were the leaders of the local churches. For other references to such officials see Acts 14:23; 15:6; 20:17, 28; Tit. 1:5. Some of these were also active in preaching and teaching. He is, in particular, solemnly charged (v. 21; see RV) to beware both of wrong prejudice against, or undue partiality for, particular individuals. First, he must see that the value of the elders' service is recognized and they themselves amply recompensed (v. 17). Secondly, discipline of some who fail may be necessary: but no accusation should be treated seriously unless it is properly supported by confirming witnesses (v. 19); and those proved guilty of sinful practices should be openly reproved (v. 20). Thirdly, he should make no hasty appointments, lest his own position be compromised by connection with the sinful, and he himself be defiled (v. 22). For neither all the bad nor all the good of any man's character is immediately obvious. There are other things not so conspicuous, but discoverable by the patient and watchful investigator. In appointments to the presbyterate, therefore, it is a mistake either to receive or to reject anyone too quickly.

17 Elders. In contrast with v. 1 the reference here is to those who are set over a local church as its leaders. The following verse makes plain that the honour they ought to be given includes material support (cf. v. 3); also it should be double or 'ample'. Not only should they be given it, they should also be truly recognized as worthy of it. 18 Paul quotes Dt. 25:4, not to enforce the letter of the law, but to appeal to the moral principle which it illustrates. Note when it is treading, i.e. while he is actually working (Gk. present participle). Some have wondered whether the phrase the scripture says covers the second quotation, because it is found in Lk. 10:7. If so, it would be a remarkable reference to the third Gospel as Scripture. The words are more probably a well-known proverbial saying, quoted by our Lord, and here used by Paul to indicate the point of his preceding OT quotation. 19 Cf. Dt. 19:15. 20 Them and all are perhaps best taken as both referring to the elders only, though the second, and some think the first also, may refer to church members in general. 22 The laying on of hands. For the practice cf. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6. The meaning is, 'Ordain no-one with undue haste,' an injunction appropriately applying the preceding warning against partiality. Timothy will serve God and the churches well only if he keeps himself pure, and refuses to welcome the unworthy to partake in the leadership. 23 In a personal parenthesis—a striking sign of the Epistle's genuineness—Paul indicates that this exhortation to keep himself undefiled need not prevent Timothy, in the interests of his health, from ceasing to be a total abstainer (note the force of no longer) and taking wine in moderation. A little wine: contrast 3:3. Note the indication that Timothy's health was poor. 24, 25 Conspicuous; i.e. 'clearly evident', 'immediately obvious'. Pointing; the Greek means 'leading the way'. Some men are pursued later by the after-effects of their sins, which in due course find them out.

6:1, 2 The duty of Christian slaves

These verses provide more teaching for Timothy to pass on concerning due honour (cf. 5:3, 17) to be given, this time by slaves to their masters. 1 It will bring only dishonour on the name and gospel of God, as apparently subversive of the existing social order, if Christians who happen to be slaves fail to be good slaves. 2 Nor, if their masters happen to be fellow-believers, ought they to cease properly to respect them as their human masters. They ought rather to serve them the better, just because those who get the benefit of their improved service are Christians. All honour means 'full honour', honour in every form and way in which it is due.

6:3–10 SOME FURTHER WARNINGS

It is easy to be led astray by the worldly attractiveness of some men's teaching; and yet it stands condemned as 'different' (v. 3, RV), or heterodox, because those who give it have clearly abandoned the fundamental spiritual loyalties, and their personal condition and conduct are unworthy. Also their teaching causes violent social strife, because it serves only to pervert men's moral judgment, to rob them of the truth, and to obsess them with the idea that the purpose of the practice of godliness is material gain (vv. 4, 5). Not that there is not great gain in true godliness, but only if one is free from covetousness (v. 6). Since we cannot amass wealth and take it with us when we leave this world, it is for us to be satisfied here as long as we have food and clothing (vv. 7, 8). For such as set their desire on the acquisition of wealth get enticed, ensnared, obsessed and utterly overwhelmed (v. 9). Such love for money is a root which, if allowed to grow, produces only evils of every kind (v. 10). Those who allow themselves to be occupied with it are commonly led astray from the faith, and cause themselves many troubles.

3, 4 There is a contrast here between teaching which is 'healthful' and teachers who are 'sick' (see RV mg.). Teaching is confirmed as sound or 'wholesome' (AV), first, by having Christ as its author and, second, by the God-fearing spirit and conduct of the teacher. By contrast the false teacher stands self-condemned by his air of conceit, by his lack of understanding, and by his unhealthy obsession with the kind of discussion which only produces strife and all its accompanying evil thought and speech about others. 5 In the Greek the participles (not adjectives) by which such men are described indicate permanent losses which have happened to them; their powers of moral judgment are destroyed, and they are deprived of the truth. So they now habitually suppose that godliness is a means to material gain. Gain; the Greek porismos means virtually 'good business', i.e. a source of profit or way of gain. 6 Paradoxically godliness is then said to be a great source of profit, but not in terms of material wealth, and only if it is accompanied by contentment. The Greek word means 'self-sufficiency'. It describes an independence of changing circumstances. Cf. Phil. 4:11. 7 The statements of this verse confirm the implied attitude of the passage to material things; they are of only secondary and passing importance, not part of the true and abiding self, not transferable to the life beyond. 8 The Greek verb is future indicative. It is not so much an exhortation as a dogmatic assertion that this is the way of realized contentment—in contrast to setting one's mind on acquiring wealth. 9 Senseless and hurtful; i.e. passionate desires which are doubly condemned as negatively senseless and positively injurious. 10 The occupation of the mind with getting rich and the consequent stretching out of oneself in its pursuit result in both negative loss (being 'led astray from the faith', RV) and positive damage. In contrast to the 'good business' of godliness it does not pay.

6:11–16 A SOLEMN PERSONAL CHARGE

Paul exhorts Timothy to be true to his Christian calling, to keep clear of such ensnaring things as the love of money, and to sustain the pursuit of Christian virtues (v. 11). Let him maintain the contest worthily to the end, that he may gain the prize. He is committed to such a course by his Christian confession (v. 12). Let the recollection that God sees and will not fail to sustain, that Christ Jesus Himself has confirmed the truth Timothy has confessed by the witness of His sufferings, and is going to be manifested openly as the Judge by the all-sovereign God—let such awareness enforce Paul's charge to him not to defile or expose to reproach his Christian obedience (vv. 13–16).

It is possible here to give some of the phrases a particular interpretation. 11 Man of God may refer to Timothy's status as a worker; the phrase was a recognized OT description for a prophet (see 1 Sa. 9:6). 12b may refer to Timothy's ordination, and 13 to our Lord's own faithful testimony before Pilate. Then 14 will be a specific exhortation to Timothy to discharge his particular ministry. However, it seems preferable to give the phrases a more general reference. Man of God may describe any mature Christian (see 2 Tim. 3:17). 12b may refer to Timothy's baptism. The good confession (note the definite article) is 'the faith' or truth then confessed; good describing 'the faith confessed', not Timothy's confession of it. 13 This same good confession Timothy is reminded was attested as true by our Lord Himself by His death and resurrection, which took place 'under Pontius Pilate' (an equally possible interpretation of the Greek phrase, as in the Apostles' Creed). Some of the accompanying phraseology may well echo confessions of faith used in baptism. Note the reference to God as the Life-giver or Creator, and to the passion and second coming of Christ. This then means that Paul knows no better way to exhort Timothy than to address to him words applicable not only to him as a special worker but to him (as to all) as a Christian believer. In v. 12 the difference of the Greek tenses suggests fight as a sustained activity and take hold as a decisive act. 14 Christ's appearing (Gk. epiphaneia), or 'manifestation', will occur at its own proper time by the pleasure and act of God, and as a 'showing' (see AV, RV) or sign from His hand (cf. Jn. 2:18). 15, 16 provide a significant description of the unique sovereignty of God. In His absolute bliss and unending life He is completely self-contained. Such things belong wholly to Him, and to Him alone. He is thus the exclusive Lord of all else. So to Him should all honour be rendered and all power or rule ascribed.

6:17–19 THE RIGHT USE OF MATERIAL THINGS

Paul here completes his teaching concerning material wealth by adding to his previous negative warnings against desire for gain (vv. 6–10) some positive instruction concerning the right use of wealth by those who have it.

Rich Christians need to beware lest the possession of material wealth make them over-confident. Their settled hope should rest, not in their wealth and its characteristic insecurity, but in God the Giver (v. 17). They need, too, to remember that such wealth is given not to be hoarded, but to be enjoyed (cf. 4:3–5) and used to do good (v. 18). Thus to share one's good things liberally with others is the way to put by for the future something more enduring than earthly riches, and thus to possess true life (Gk. zōē) rather than just to have in abundance the present earthly means of livelihood (Gk. bios). See 1 Jn. 3:17; Lk. 12:15.

17 Note the contrast between this (RV 'present') world and the future (v. 19); cf. Mt. 6:19–21. In v. 17 (see RV) to 'have their hope set on' brings out the force of the Greek perfect; also the warning is enforced by giving prominence in thought not to the amount of the 'riches' but to their 'uncertainty'. Those with earthly riches are exhorted to use them to acquire better and more enduring wealth. 18 For this they need paradoxically in deed and heart a readiness to share their material riches with others—to be liberal and generous.

6:20, 21 A FINAL EXHORTATION

In an emphatic personal word to Timothy Paul here briefly sums up his chief, twofold concern in writing—to secure that Timothy preserves and hands on unimpaired the deposit of truth, and avoids the impious and arrogantly assertive false teaching, which has already fatally side-tracked some.

20 Timothy is here addressed as a steward who has been entrusted with 'the deposit' (RV mg.; cf. 2 Tim. 1:12, 14, RV mg.; 2:2), i.e. what Jude (v. 3) calls 'the faith delivered to the saints'. The falsely called knowledge suggests an unjustified pretentiousness, which consequently attracts adherents to their own undoing as believers. 21 Grace be with you is Paul's distinctive form of Christian salutation to end an Epistle; see 2 Thes. 3:17, 18. The you is in the plural and so includes the local congregation.

1:1, 2 PERSONAL ADDRESS AND GREETING

1 Compare and see notes on 1 Tim. 1:1, 2; Tit. 1:1–4. It is typical of Paul to ascribe his apostleship to the will of God (cf. the opening verse of 1 and 2 Corinthians, Ephesians and Colossians). He was overwhelmingly conscious that his appointment was of God; see Gal. 1:1, 15, 16. According to the promise of the life . . . in Christ Jesus. This expresses the concern of Paul's apostleship; it was to make this promise known, and to bring men to embrace it, that he was commissioned (cf. Tit. 1:1–3). 2 My beloved child; an affectionate indication of intimate association, particularly as leader and follower in work for God (cf. 1 Cor. 4:17). Paul often spoke thus of his converts; see 1 Cor. 4:14, 15; Gal. 4:19; Phm. 10.

1:3–5 THANKSGIVING FOR TIMOTHY'S FAITH

Paul confesses the depth of his feeling towards Timothy, feeling to which he continually gives expression in his prayers, feeling which includes the eager yearning to have the joy of seeing Timothy again, instead of the recollection of the tears which he shed when they parted. Above all, Paul says, he thanks God as he is reminded in his prayers of the sincerity of Timothy's faith, and of the similar faith of his grandmother and mother before him. In the context of this thought about Timothy Paul becomes conscious how much he too owes to his forbears, from whom he learned to serve or worship God with conscientious sincerity. Both these references may be regarded, therefore, as Christian testimonies to the value of a good Jewish religious upbringing. For when Timothy was taught the OT as a small child (3:15) his teachers had probably not yet believed in Christ.

1:6–14 THE NEED FOR COURAGE AND FIDELITY

Paul reminds Timothy that he has a spiritual gift, and that God's endowments are not given to make men cowardly, but strong, loving and self-controlled. Therefore he ought to stir up into flame the God-given fire, and in the strength of God to take his share in any suffering in which the gospel may involve him, by not hesitating to associate himself with witness concerning our Lord, and with Paul as one who suffers imprisonment on Christ's account. To enforce this appeal Paul reminds Timothy how wonderful the gospel is. For according to His own gracious purpose, and not because of anything which we have done, God has saved us. This gift of grace, already given to us before world history began, has now been openly manifested through the advent of Jesus Christ to be our Saviour and through His victory over death. In consequence, through the gospel now being preached, incorruptible life has been brought out into the light (for men to see as a reality and embrace as a possession, in contrast to previous dark uncertainty about its existence and despair of its enjoyment). This is the gospel, says Paul, which I am commissioned to preach; and it is through discharging this commission that I suffer as I do. Nor (in spite of imprisonment and the prospect of martyrdom) do I see any reason for being ashamed of it. For God is faithful and able; so (although my day of fulfilling a stewardship in the gospel is done) I am sure He will preserve what He has thus entrusted to me so that a good account may be given on the final day of reckoning. It is this outline of wholesome teaching, says Paul to Timothy, passed on by me to you, which you must make your own and preserve, in responsive faith and love to Christ Himself. Remember also that God's Spirit dwells in us to enable this stewardship to be discharged.

6 Hence, or 'for the which cause' (RV); reference to Timothy's sincere faith (v. 5). Note how Timothy is not exhorted to seek fresh grace; he is rather reminded of grace already given and exhorted to stir it up into flame (see RV mg. and on 1 Tim. 4:14). 7 Spirit may be interpreted as 'Holy Spirit', or it may describe the human spirit as wrought on by the Holy Spirit. The two are complementary; cf. Rom. 8:14–16. 8 His prisoner; i.e. by His doing; cf. Eph. 3:1; Phm. 9. 9 Those who are saved are first called by God according to His own freely predetermined purpose (cf. Rom. 8:28); this calling is holy because by it we are called to holiness or Godlikeness; cf. 1 Cor. 1:2; 1 Pet. 1:15, 16. While these Pastoral Epistles repeatedly insist that good works are an intended fruit of salvation, they also make equally plain, in characteristic Pauline fashion, that human good works are not its cause; cf. Tit. 3:5; Eph. 2:8–10. Ages ago; RV, following the Greek, 'before times eternal'. Cf. Tit. 1:2; Rom. 16:25. This implies Christ's pre-existence. 10 Abolished death; i.e. brought it to nought as a power holding men in its grip; the Greek katargein means 'to render inoperative'. Life and immortality (RV 'incorruption'). The latter indicates the character of the former; i.e. life completely exempt from destruction. 12 I have believed. The Greek perfect tense used here implies a continuing attitude of trust consequent upon its decisive adoption. What has been entrusted to me (Gk. 'my deposit'). The same word clearly refers in 1:14; 1 Tim. 6:20 to 'the deposit' of the gospel, with which the steward is entrusted. So that sense seems preferable here. But the AV interpretation is possible. An assertion by Paul of his hope of final personal salvation (cf. 1 Thes. 5:23) suits the context. His use of 'guard' and 'deposit' may have suggested their further use in a contrasted sense in v. 14. 13 Pattern; the Greek word means an 'outline sketch' demanding to be followed and filled in in greater detail. Faith and love indicate the Christian spirit and manner in which Timothy is to do this—an activity dependent upon being personally in, i.e. in intimate union with, Christ Jesus.

1:15–18 PAUL COMMENDS THE DEVOTION OF ONESIPHORUS

Paul enforces his appeal to Timothy not to be ashamed of the gospel and its apostle (1:8) in a day of persecution by reminding him both of the many who have been ashamed to be openly associated with Paul the prisoner and of one who outstandingly was not. Since Onesiphorus has shown such kindness to Paul in his need, Paul prays that the Lord will recompense him by showing kindness both to Onesiphorus's household now, and to Onesiphorus himself in the coming day of divine judgment and reward. 15 All . . . turned away from me. It was a decisive act of repudiation; they disowned Paul. 16, 17 By contrast Onesiphorus not only acknowledged and helped Paul after his arrest, but later, when he arrived in Rome, he took extra trouble to find Paul (apparently no easy task) in order again to encourage him. 18 Timothy, too, is well acquainted with the many ministries he performed in Ephesus. Onesiphorus appears here as one separated from his household, either by absence from home, or quite possibly by death (cf. 4:19). This does not mean, however, that Paul is praying for his present well-being as one dead, a practice completely unsupported elsewhere in Scripture. The prayer concerns not the intermediate state at all, but conduct in this life, and reward on the future day of judgment. Such desire for adequate and appropriate recompense then is one that can equally be expressed for living or dead, and is in harmony with the plain teaching of our Lord and the NT. See Mt. 10:32, 33; and compare and contrast 2 Tim. 4:14, RV.

2:1–13 A FURTHER EXHORTATION TO STEADFASTNESS AND DILIGENCE

Following the example of Onesiphorus, and in contrast to the failure of others, Paul exhorts Timothy to find his strength in Christ and to be prepared to suffer hardship. Two tasks supremely matter: first, that the deposit of truth, the full gospel, should be faithfully handed on to faithful men, who will in their turn teach others; and secondly, that God's purpose in giving the gospel should be fulfilled in the eternal salvation of the elect. These tasks demand for their discharge such devotion, discipline and diligence as may be seen in the soldier (vv. 3, 4), the athlete (v. 5) and the farmer (v. 6). They may also involve suffering, as may be seen in the actual Christian experience of the aged apostle himself. In the face of possible martyrdom, which is Paul's prospect and may become Timothy's, it is good to remember the faithfulness of God and the sure heavenly reward of present earthly sacrifice and steadfastness, as well as the corresponding shame that must follow failure.

1 Be strong. The Greek present tense and passive voice means 'be continually strengthened'. In the grace that is in Christ Jesus; i.e. by means of the divine help of which all who are joined to Christ are assured. 2 Entrust; Gk. paratithenai, from the same root as 'deposit' (Gk. parathēkē) in 1:14 (see RV mg.). Timothy had been solemnly entrusted with the gospel by Paul. He is charged similarly to commit it to those who will in their turn pass it on to others. Note the qualifications to be looked for in such ministers—trustworthiness and ability to teach. Before (i.e. in the presence of) many witnesses may refer to those present when Timothy was set apart to this ministry; or the phrase may mean that the content of Paul's gospel had been confirmed to Timothy 'through' (Gk. dia) the testimony of many others. 4 Such service of the soldier demands complete detachment from ordinary worldly business, single, whole-hearted devotion to obeying one's commanding officer, and fulfilment of the purpose of one's enrolment. 5 In ancient times the winner in an athletic contest was given a crown or garland as his prize. According to the rules, in strict conformity to what the particular contest demands, first in training and then in actual performance. 6 Hard-working and first are significant words added to an otherwise general statement about the farmer. Such partaking is in contrast to the rightly inferior participation of the indolent. These three illustrations (vv. 3–6) enforce different aspects of the challenge to utter devotion to the worthy discharge of gospel ministry.

7 Think over what I say; i.e. grasp the meaning of what has just been said, and its practical application to your own ministry. This is no empty exhortation, because the understanding, i.e. the ability to pass right judgment, the Lord will give. 8 Remember Jesus Christ. The following two phrases are credal. Timothy is to find inspiration in the recollection of Jesus vindicated as 'Messiah' (Christ) not only by His human birth descended from David in fulfilment of prophecy, but much more by His resurrection from the dead; cf. Acts 2:36; Rom. 1:1–4. He can, therefore, be called to mind as the living Lord. Such essential truth about Him is part of the gospel entrusted to Paul (and through him to Timothy) to be preached. My gospel; cf. Rom. 2:16; 16:25; 1 Cor. 15:1.

9 The word gospel refers to the evangelizing as well as to the evangel. Wearing fetters like a criminal. These words emphasize the extremity of utterly undeserved indignity and shame which Paul was suffering and which Timothy must be ready to share. Is not fettered; i.e. as Paul is. God's word cannot thus be confined. 10 Therefore; i.e. on this account, for the sake of the gospel and its propagation. I endure everything; i.e. I patiently submit to every kind of experience, even the worst; cf. Heb. 12:2. The goal in view is that those whom God has freely chosen for such a destiny may also themselves actually encounter His salvation—the salvation which is to be found in Messiah Jesus (above referred to, 2:8) and which possesses a glory whose quality and full manifestation are eternal, not temporal.

11–13 The saying is sure. The following phrases, quoted as worthy of credence, were possibly taken from a familiar hymn, or string of aphorisms, intended to inspire faithfulness unto death and hope of sharing in Christ's eternal glory. Our entrance into that glory will correspond to our share in His sufferings here; cf. Rom. 8:17. 11 If we have died with him (Gk. aorist tense) refers to a decisive past-event, and may have in mind Christian baptism rather than martyrdom. Cf. Rom. 6:3, 4, 8. 12 Contrast if we endure (Gk. present tense, i.e. a sustained activity). Note the paradoxical contrast between the pathway and the goal—through death to life, through patient submission to sovereign sway. If we deny him (Gk. future tense); a more remote possibility is suggested; cf. Mt. 10:33. While men's failure to confess Him now will affect Christ's future acknowledgment of them, 13 their failure to trust Him and to be true to Him does not alter His abiding trustworthiness and faithfulness; cf. Rom. 3:3. To be false to Himself is something which even omnipotent God cannot be.

2:14–26 SOME RULES OF CONDUCT

There was increasing danger of attention being diverted to profitless and damaging speculation and controversy. Two men are mentioned by name who were propagating wrong doctrine about the resurrection. Timothy, therefore, must remind the Christians, and particularly those 'faithful men' (v. 2) to whom he entrusts the gospel to be preached, of such truths as Paul has just enumerated (vv. 4–13). And he must solemnly charge them not to become involved in the prevalent controversies. For his own part let him rather adhere to the straightforward presentation of the truth in a way which will win God's approval, and give him, as a workman, no cause for shame in God's sight, particularly in the coming day of judgment. Let him avoid irreverent fancies, which are capable of being as harmful as an eating sore. If the overturning of the faith of some tempt him to tremble for the very survival of the Christian community, let him remember that the true church is God's own firm foundation, but that not all who profess to acknowledge Christ as Lord are its true members. For only God knows who are truly His. Profession of the name involves the demand (to which some do not respond) to give up sin. Just as the many articles in a large house vary in quality, and some are of little or no value and unfit for honourable use, so the visible community of professing Christians is a mixed company. The individual believer, like Timothy, who has the discernment to recognize this, should seek, by diligent self-purification, to cease to belong to the class of the unworthy, and thus to become fit for honourable use in the Master's service. He should abandon self-indulgence and share the company and spiritual ambitions of sincere believers. He should refuse to engage in senseless investigations which promote only violent disagreement. As one called to the Lord's service he should not engage in controversy with those ensnared by error, but show them gentle forbearance, and meekly seek to instruct them in the truth in the hope that God may bring them to a better mind, and so they may escape from the devil who has ensnared them, and devote themselves to doing God's will.

14 Avoid disputing about (or 'with') words; i.e. not to engage in controversy. The following phrases indicate its results. Negatively it is without profit; positively, instead of edifying the hearers, it overturns them, or involves them in spiritual 'catastrophe' (Gk.). 15 Who has no need to be ashamed; the Greek word may have a passive force, viz. 'not to be put to shame'; cf. Phil. 1:20, RV. Rightly handling (lit. 'cutting straight ly'; see RV mg.); possibly a metaphor from cutting a straight road or furrow, and so not deviating from the word of truth, i.e. the gospel; cf. Gal. 2:14. 16 Avoid; i.e. 'stand clear of', 'withdraw from'. Godless chatter; i.e. talk empty of value and irreverent in spirit. Those who give themselves to such talk make progress only in the wrong direction, in ungodliness; the spirit of irreverence grows. 17 Such talking, when given the opportunity through their indulgence in it, spreads like a malignant sore eating away healthy tissue. Hymenaeus is also mentioned in 1 Tim. 1:20. 18 Belief in a physical resurrection was a difficulty to many (cf. 1 Cor. 15), especially to those who regarded all matter as evil. So they interpreted the resurrection as a spiritual quickening or initiation already experienced, thus missing the truth themselves and upsetting the faith of others. 19 God's firm foundation stands; i.e. it cannot be overturned. The reference is to the true church of God's building; cf. Eph. 2:19–22. Its double attestation indicates, from God's side and from man's, how its genuine members are to be distinguished and separated from the false. For light on the virtual quotations see Nu. 16: esp. 5, 26; cf. Is. 52:11. Note that the genuineness of others is fully known only to God, and that it is for each one who professes to acknowledge Christ as Lord to make his own election sure by appropriate action.

21 reiterates the individual's responsibility to separate himself from the defilement of association with the unworthy. Note the obvious reference for Timothy to the false teachers. 22 indicates complementary truths. Defilement from within, as well as from without, must be avoided, and fellowship with the sincere is to be pursued. 23 Note the repeated indication that some inquiries are foolish and inept, or unenlightened, because they generate not edification but contention. 24 The Lord's servant; RV mg. 'the Lord's bondservant'. The term applies to any Christian (1 Cor. 7:22), but particularly to one called to special ministry like Timothy; cf. Tit. 1:1. Cf. also Is. 42:2, 3. An apt teacher, forbearing, 25 correcting . . . with gentleness; i.e. devoted to positive exposition of the truth rather than to controversy with those who oppose it. This is how those ensnared by false teaching ought to be treated (contrast the more drastic handling of its deliberate propagators, Tit. 3:10); for such can be won back only as God grants to them a change of mind to enter into full knowledge of the truth. 26 See RV and RV mg. Of the three interpretations suggested RV mg. seems the best, viz. that those who have been taken alive by the devil may return to soberness, escape from his trap, and enter instead into the pursuit of God's will.

3:1–9 A WARNING OF COMING APOSTASY

If Timothy thinks it strange that so much of evil should arise within the visible church, Paul now desires him to learn that worse is to follow as the end approaches. The sinfulness of human self-will will find full, unrestrained expression in deed, word and thought. The practice of reverence, dutifulness, gratitude, love of kindred and covenant-keeping will cease. Men will become diabolical, uncontrolled, violent, enemies of virtue, ready to betray their fellows, reckless, misled by their own conceit. Those who profess religion will put love of pleasure before love of God; they will outwardly affect a form of reverence for God but deliberately repudiate or gainsay its actual transforming power. Men of this kind must be avoided. They are the sort who stealthily impose on and mislead weak women, who because of their sensitive conscience about wrongdoing, their readiness to be moved by emotion, their love of novelty, and their inability to grasp the truth, are an easy prey. Such men must be recognized in their true character as opponents of the truth, of a depraved mind, and in God's eyes rejected in relation to the very faith which they profess (cf. Mt. 7:22, 23). Nevertheless there will be a limit to the progress they make; for all will see that their behaviour is manifestly senseless.

1 In the last days. The Christian era as a whole is sometimes so described (see Heb. 1:2), but the reference here is explicitly to the consummation of the age. Note the future tense will come; though the present tenses in vv. 5, 6 indicate that the evil later to mature was already at work. Cf. Mt. 13:24–30; 2 Thes. 2:7, 8. Times of stress (Gk. chalepos); i.e. 'difficult', 'hard to live in'. 2 Men; the Greek has the definite article, i.e. not men or mankind generally. The whole context, especially v. 5, suggests that this moral decline and manifestation of evil is to occur within the sphere of professed Christianity. It is not unenlightened heathen, but those who resist the truth and repudiate the power of the gospel who become corrupt. Cf. 2 Thes. 2:3 where Paul teaches that 'a falling away' (Gk. apostasia), i.e. religious apostasy, must happen first. In vv. 2–4 note how the description begins and ends: lovers of self, lovers of money . . . lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God; i.e. they are men who put devotion to self-satisfaction in the place of pleasing God. Moral corruption inevitably follows. Proud, arrogant; i.e. boastful and haughty, prone to swagger and scornful of others. Abusive; i.e. those who speak disrespectfully, whether of God or man. 3 Implacable. The Greek aspondos describes not so much one who breaks contracts (AV) as one who will not make any. Haters of good; i.e. of all good, whether in things or people. 5 Denying; cf. 1 Tim. 5:8; Tit. 1:16. Avoid such people; contrast 2:25. These are apparently to be regarded as past redemption, and capable of doing only harm. 6 Weak women; Gk. gunaikaria, a diminutive expressing contempt. For the greater ease with which women are misled cf. 1 Tim. 2:14. 8 Jannes and Jambres are mentioned in a Hebrew Targum on Ex. 7:11 as magicians who opposed Moses. This comparison may imply similar use of occult powers; see on 3:13 ('impostors'). Of corrupt mind; i.e. no longer able to understand the truth (cf. Rom. 1:21, 22; Eph. 4:17, 18). 9 Contrast 2:16; 3:13. While such men will get worse in their own depravity and in their power to deceive, they will not be able to do so without their folly being generally recognized.

3:10 – 4:5 A CALL TO PREACH THE WORD IN SPITE OF PERSECUTION

3:10–13 The example of Paul's own experience

How different is Timothy's previous history from all this (i.e. 3:1–9)! Paul reminds Timothy of his own faith and practice, and of the persecution and suffering in which his Christian service has involved him, not least in his early missionary work in Timothy's home neighbourhood. Let Timothy take to heart that this experience was typical. All who determine to live lives of true Christian devotion must expect persecution; and the more so as the contrast between the good and the evil increases, and evil men get worse, both in their own blind departure from the truth, and in their power to mislead others.

10 Now you have observed; lit., as in RV, 'didst follow', i.e. in responsive discipleship; cf. 1 Tim. 4:6. Paul is not boasting but reminding his devoted follower of the essentials of devotion to Christ. Note the significance of each of these. 11 What . . . what; lit. 'such (as)'. In illustration of his point Paul selects trials specially well known to Timothy, from which he first learned that such afflictions are part of the inevitable experience of all true Christians (see Acts 14:19–22). This is the lesson enforced in v. 12 (cf. Mt. 5:10; 10:22; Jn. 15:20). 12 All who desire; lit. 'all who are so minded or determined'. Godly . . . in Christ Jesus is a significant description of the spirit and sphere of true Christian living, i.e. responding in reverent devotion as one enabled and constrained by a vital personal relation. 13 Impostors. The Greek goētes means 'wizards', lit. 'wailers', referring to incantation by howling; it may imply, therefore, the use of magical arts.

3:14–17 The value of the Scriptures

What is more, Timothy knows the revealed truth of God and has been assured of its value from those who taught him as a child. His duty, therefore, is steadfastly to adhere to these things. For the sacred Scriptures in which he was taught are uniquely qualified to guide men into the experience of that salvation of God which is to be enjoyed through faith in Messiah Jesus. Not only so, every single Scripture (v. 16), because it owes its origin to the creative breath or Spirit of God (Gk. theopneustos, 'God-breathed'; cf. Ps. 33:6), has its value for the moral education of the man of God and his thorough equipment for every kind of good work.

14 But as for you; in sharp contrast to the evil men (v. 13). 15 From childhood (lit. 'from a babe'); a reference to Timothy's instruction from very early infancy (see 1:5). The sacred writings. Used with the definite article this is a virtual technical expression (found also in Philo and Josephus) for the OT. Note the significant Christian description of their theme and purpose. They afford not just knowledge or information, but practical instruction. Able. In Greek the word is a present participle, indicating a permanent enduring quality. 16 See RV and RV mg. The meaning is that every single scripture (of those just referred to), because it is inspired of God, is also profitable; so none should be neglected. Training in righteousness; i.e. discipline, or education, in the way (or life) of righteousness. 17 The man of God: here with special reference to the Christian minister who, like Timothy, has preaching and pastoral responsibility (see 4:1, 2). Complete, equipped. In Greek the adjective and the participle reiterate the same root, enforcing the idea of 'fully equipped and adapted'.

4:1–5 Paul's charge to Timothy

In view, therefore, of his calling to ministry Paul solemnly charges Timothy before God, and in the light of the account he must render to King Jesus when He comes to judge, to preach the word, to be on the alert to do so on all occasions, whether favourable or not, and to apply its challenge to his hearers both in rebuke and in encouragement with unfailing patience and comprehensive instruction. Timothy ought to do this the more because a time is coming when men will not tolerate this kind of profitable teaching, but will turn from the truth to fiction and to teachers who say things to tickle their fancy. Timothy must, therefore, be always sober, prepared to suffer hardship, active in declaring the Christian good news, discharging to the full his ministry.

1 Paul adjures Timothy by God, by Christ the future Judge, by His 'epiphany', or second advent, and by His kingdom. It is an important feature of the NT gospel that Jesus is to judge all men, and that a day is coming when He will thus be manifested. Cf. Acts 17:31; Rom. 2:16. The phrase, judge the living and the dead, is found in early Christian creeds. 2 Preach the word; i.e. the gospel; cf. Acts 6:4; Col. 4:3. Be urgent; i.e. be attentive, as one standing by ready to fulfil this ministry. Convince, rebuke, and exhort. Note how the word and its preacher must hurt before they can heal. Be unfailing in patience and in teaching. This indicates how the minister is to handle both his hearers and his subject-matter. He should give varied and positive teaching, not monotonous and negative condemnation. 3, 4 The future prospect described here provides added reason for such preaching. Endure; i.e. 'put up with', 'have the mind or patience to receive'. Note how this hearing is wrong both in motive and interest; it is determined by selfish caprice or desire to be entertained; and deliberately directed away from the truth toward more fascinating myths. 5 Timothy greatly needs, therefore, always to be steady or 'sober' (RV)—'to steer clear of the heady wine of heretical teaching' (J. N. D. Kelly).

4:6–22 A DESCRIPTION OF PAUL'S OWN CIRCUMSTANCES: FINAL GREETINGS

Paul declares that he is ready to die a martyr's death, which he knows is imminent. His life work is done; he has been true to his trust. He can look forward to that consummation of salvation which the Lord will give, in that day when He comes as Judge, to all who have their hope thus fixed on His appearing. Of Paul's intimate friends and fellow-workers only Luke is now with him. So Paul urges Timothy to endeavour to come to him quickly, and to bring with him Mark and some of Paul's personal belongings which he left at Troas. In his imprisonment and trial Paul has had his disappointments. Demas forsook him. Alexander actually did him injury and spoke against him. No-one was prepared publicly to take his side. But the Lord did not fail to enable him fully to declare the substance of what he preached for all to hear. He was preserved from being overwhelmed and silenced, and is persuaded that the Lord will bring him safely through what now lies ahead into His kingdom above. To Him is eternal glory due. Timothy is to give Paul's greetings to his special friends, and himself to accept greetings from some who wish to send them to him. Because Paul is without those whom Timothy might imagine to be with him, let him come before winter. May he know the Lord's presence in his heart; and may the saving grace of God be with all in whose midst he is. (Your (v. 22) is singular, you is plural.)

6 Paul's circumstances provide added reason why Timothy should fulfil his ministry. Pouring out of blood (Dt. 12:27) or wine (Nu. 28:7) unto the Lord accompanied sacrifice; Paul so speaks of the shedding of his own blood (RV mg.). Cf. Phil. 2:17. Note that what was then a remote possibility is now an immediate certainty, indeed, has already begun. My departure; the Greek word is used of the loosing of a ship from its moorings. 7 The good fight is the one fought for the faith (cf. 1 Tim. 6:12). The race. 'My course' (AV) expresses better the idea; cf. Acts 13:25; 20:24. The faith; i.e. the gospel, or deposit of doctrine, entrusted to Paul. This he has successfully guarded (cf. 1:14). 8 Laid up; i.e. reserved, set aside. The crown of righteousness; either the crown is the reward for righteousness, or righteousness is the content of the crown (cf. 1 Pet. 5:4). The two ideas may be combined in that heavenly consummation of the God-given righteousness or justification, of which believers enjoy now only the firstfruits (cf. Rom. 5:1, 2). This interpretation seems to be confirmed by the fact that the crown is to be shared in equally by all who have had their love set on this coming manifestation of the Lord in righteous judgment at His second advent.

10 Demas is not charged with apostasy, but with unwillingness to face the possibility of physical suffering and death through further association with Paul the prisoner and likely martyr. Contrast his love of this present world with others' love of the Lord's appearing (v. 8). 11 Get or 'pick up' Mark, i.e. add him to your company for, or on, the journey; cf. Acts 20:13. In spite of serious early misgivings about his fitness (Acts 15:38), Paul here (cf. Col. 4:10) commends Mark as very useful for ministering, perhaps in the gospel, or more probably to Paul's more personal needs. Some think Mark's probable knowledge of Latin made him particularly useful in Rome. 12 implies, perhaps, that Paul needs Mark to take Tychicus's place. Paul trusted the latter more than once to carry messages and act on his behalf (see Eph. 6:21, 22; Col. 4:7, 8; Tit. 3:12). 13 The cloak; i.e. a large outer garment, apparently needed by Paul for use during the cold of the coming winter; see v. 21. The parchments; Gk. membranai, in origin a Latin word and meaning prepared skins of vellum, preferred to papyrus for important documents. These were especially precious to Paul. They were presumably either copies of OT scriptures or proof-texts, or possibly valuable personal documents of Paul's own. 14 Did me great harm; i.e. 'shewed' (RV mg.) me much ill-treatment. The Lord will requite him; a virtual quotation of Ps. 62:12 (cf. Pr. 24:12), implying 'It is for the Lord to recompense him accordingly (not me or you)'; cf. Rom. 12:19. 15 'Meanwhile', says Paul to Timothy, 'there is need for you to beware of him.'

16 At my first defence. According to Roman legal procedure Paul had appeared once in court to present his defence. On that occasion he had to plead his cause alone. He had no advocate or supporting witnesses. Those who might have been such all deserted him, presumably through fear, not deliberate malice, as in the case of Alexander. So Paul prays that God in mercy will not reckon such failure against them. 17 'That through me the message might be fully proclaimed' (RV) expresses well the sense of Paul's concern, namely that the proclamation of the gospel should be faithfully discharged by him there in the capital city for all to hear. All the Gentiles refers to the cosmopolitan character of Paul's audience, corresponding to the scope of the gospel and of his commission to preach it. See Rom. 16:26; 1:5. 'To be rescued out of a lion's mouth' may have been a current phrase for deliverance out of apparently overwhelming peril. Or 'lion' may refer, either to the beasts of the amphitheatre, or to the Emperor Nero, or to the devil. In 1 Pet. 5:8 to be devoured by the lion seems to mean to have one's faithful testimony silenced by surrender through fear to the devil. Cf. also the Lord's Prayer—'deliver us from the evil (one)'—of which there seem to be further reminiscences in v. 18. 18 Save me for; Gk. eis, a pregnant construction. Paul's salvation is to be completed by his being brought safely 'into' his heavenly kingdom. The deliverance he expects from all evil is not from death, but through it. Note that the doxology is addressed to Christ as God.

22 The benediction is twofold: the first is addressed to Timothy personally, the second is the distinctive Pauline 'signature' (see 2 Thes. 3:17, 18).

COMMENTARY

1:1–4 PERSONAL ADDRESS AND GREETING

Compare and see notes on 1 Tim. 1:1, 2. Paul writes as one constrained by the obligation of bond-service to God and by the authority of the commission of Christ. This service and commission concern, and are directed towards, the bringing of those whom God has chosen to save to faith in Him (cf. Acts 13:48; 1 Thes. 1:4–8) and to the full knowledge of the truth. 1 Note that full instruction in the truth is an essential part of the apostolic task and that such truth is disclosed in Christ. See Mt. 28:19, 20; Jn. 1:14; Eph. 1:13; 4:20, 21. Both for its understanding and for its enjoyment this truth demands a spirit of godliness, or active reverence Godward. 2 Such truth gives to men nothing less than a hope of eternal life, a hope guaranteed by a promise made before world history began by God, who cannot deceive or utter falsehood. Cf. Nu. 23:19; Heb. 6:18. Note the sure guarantee afforded by the word of such a God. 3 God's announcement of this word of His to men has been openly made, when the proper time for this came (cf. 1 Tim. 2:6), in the gospel message. It is with its proclamation, says Paul, that I have been entrusted by the direct appointment of God Himself, as the One active to save us. 4 Paul, by natural birth a Jew, greets Titus, a Greek (see Gal. 2:3), as one brought by the faith which they now share into an intimacy of family relationship. The wording may well mean that Titus owed his conversion to Paul.

1:5–9 THE QUALIFICATIONS OF ELDERS OR BISHOPS

Paul left Titus in Crete to complete the establishment of their missionary work there, and particularly to see to the appointment of elders in each local congregation (cf. Acts 14:23). He had not only charged him to do this, but had also indicated how to do it properly by stating what kind of men should be appointed. These instructions he now repeats and enforces. Anyone who is to be appointed ought in character and conduct to be beyond reproach, free from incongruous moral weakness, actively given to good works and to the disciplined pursuit of personal holiness, and so unswerving in his loyalty to the truth which he has received that he can encourage many by his healthy teaching and expose the error of any who speak contrary to it. Cf. 1 Tim. 3:1–7 and see notes there.

5 Titus was to amend any things which were defective. Note that the same officers are called elders (Gk. presbyteroi), describing status as 'seniors', and bishops (Gk. episkopoi), describing function as 'overseers'. One congregation might have several; cf. Acts 20:17, 28. 6 A man's personal and family life and previous history are all important as indicating his character and determining his fitness for appointment. Not open to the charge of being profligate or insubordinate refers to the children. Note the plain indication that children of a true Christian home should not be dissolute or undisciplined, but rather themselves responsive to the gospel as believers. 7 Irreproachable character is indispensable because the elder has to be a bishop; i.e. to exercise oversight as one answerable to God as His steward. For 'the house', or church, for which he cares is God's. 7, 8 Note the relevance to the task to be done of the vices from which a bishop should be free, and of the virtues which he should possess. 9 The word that is sure, or trustworthy, and essential to the giving of instruction in sound doctrine and to the refuting of any who speak against it, is the 'word which is according to the teaching' (RV), or apostolic doctrine. Paul, who has himself been entrusted with that word, is supremely concerned that others, appointed to its stewardship, should first hold fast to it themselves, and then faithfully preserve and propagate it. Cf. 2 Tim. 2:2.

1:10–16 A WARNING AGAINST FALSE TEACHERS

Note the significant correspondence with our Lord's similar warnings in Mk. 7:1–23. There is need for 'bishops' who can expose the error of those who oppose the truth (v. 9). There are many who are active in misleading men by their false teaching, and they must be silenced. Also, Cretans readily fall for things untrue and sensual, as a true testimony of one of their own poets makes plain. So severe exposure of the false teachers and of their fanciful and man-made teaching is the more necessary if the Cretan Christians are to maintain their spiritual health. In these matters the response of the heart and the practice of the life go together. Those who through heart unbelief become inwardly corrupt defile everything they touch by the way they use it. Though they may confess God with their lips, their deeds proclaim that they do not know Him. Rather in His sight they are detestable, because disobedient, and so disqualified for any good work.

10 The false teachers are insubordinate; i.e. they do not submit their minds to divinely revealed truth; and as church members they are undisciplined and rebellious. Empty talkers and deceivers. They teach things which have no substance or corresponding reality (cf. Rom. 1:21, 22), and are capable of misleading the minds of men. Those who are the greatest danger are Jews and Judaizers, propagating teaching which has its roots in Judaism (cf. v. 14). They must be silenced, both because of the damage they can do—they are the sort who can overturn the faith of whole families—and because they stand doubly condemned as teaching what is wrong and as doing it for material gain.

12 Paul here quotes a hexameter line of the Cretan philosopher Epimenides, who wrote about 600 BC. In remarkable language Paul calls him a prophet and 13 endorses his testimony as true. This affords scriptural authority for believing that in some small degree Gentile nations have had their own prophets. The quotation was probably well known. Certainly Cretans had in the Greek world a proverbial reputation as liars. The character of the false teaching and of those who propagate it is then radically exposed and condemned. 14 In contrast to the gospel, which is 'of God' and the truth, this teaching is of men and consists of myths or mere fiction. Those who teach it have turned their backs on the truth. Therefore, to give heed to their teaching is to do likewise (cf. Is. 29:13; Mk. 7:6–9). These commands probably prohibited the use of certain things as unclean (cf. 1 Tim. 4:3; Col. 2:16, 21). 15 refers to things (cf. 1 Tim. 4:4), not to actions which are always morally wrong. It declares that such things are pure or not in men's use (not in their judgment) of them according to their inner spiritual and moral condition. Defilement takes its rise within, not through things from without (cf. Mk. 7:15). 16 Unfit; Gk. adokimoi, a word often used by Paul; it means 'unapproved of', 'rejected after testing'.

2:1–10 INSTRUCTIONS FOR VARIOUS GROUPS IN THE CHURCH

Having shown (1:10–16) why the error of opponents of the truth needs exposing, Paul now indicates how to exhort in 'the healthful teaching' (see 1:9; 2:1, RV mg.). The injunctions here given personally to Titus and the detailed exhortations he is to give to others all concern conduct. The best antidote to wrong teaching is positive moral exhortation and teaching which promotes spiritual health and consequent worthy behaviour. It has already been shown that those who follow wrong teaching are first corrupt in heart, and then become so in life. Therefore those who desire by their teaching to maintain the true spiritual well-being of others must demand the consistent expression in conduct of heart-soundness within. This is the kind of teaching to which Titus must publicly give utterance. He must direct appropriate exhortations of this kind to the different age-groups in the church. He should exhort the older women similarly to teach the younger women. He should enforce what he demands, particularly to the young men, by the example of his own personal behaviour. Thus, by the serious sincerity and irreproachable character of his ministry, he should put to shame and silence potential opponents. Those who as slaves have to serve human masters need special exhortation to show themselves obedient and faithful in order thus attractively to exhibit the worth of the gospel which declares that God is the Saviour of men.

2 Temperate; i.e. practising restraint. Serious; i.e. dignified, and worthy of respect. Sensible; i.e. prudent, thoughtful, self-controlled. Sound; i.e. healthy, in contrast to being sick: see 1 Tim. 6:4, RV mg.; Rom. 14:1. 3 Reverent; the Greek means 'as befits a holy person'. Slanderers (Gk. diaboloi); cf. 1 Tim. 3:6, 11. 4 The older women are to fulfil an active teaching ministry in the home and among the younger women, but not in the congregation generally; see 1 Tim. 2:11, 12. 4, 5 teach that Christian married women are to find their sphere of service in the family and the home as good wives and mothers, submissively recognizing their husbands as the head of the house, lest the God-given gospel be reproached for encouraging an improper freedom and disturbing domestic life (cf. 1 Tim. 6:1). Kind; i.e. not hard or mean in their management of the home. Cf. the use of the word in Mt. 20:15 (AV, RV 'good').

7 Show yourself . . . a model; the personal reference is emphatic; the practical 'model' (Gk. typos) of good living which Titus is to provide for others to look upon is himself. Integrity, gravity; i.e. purity of motive and seriousness of manner, describing characteristics of the teacher, not the teaching. 8 Further, what Titus teaches should be not only intrinsically 'healthful' but also so expressed as to be 'irreproachable'. The opponent of tne truth, whose aim is to slander its teachers and to propagate error, is to be put to shame by this ministry of the health-giving word and by his own inability to say anything bad about the Christians' manner of life. 9 Refractory; RV 'gainsaying'. The Greek antilegein, lit. 'to contradict', can mean 'to oppose', 'to show active enmity against'. 10 Pilfer; the Greek literally means 'putting on one side for themselves'. Entire; Gk. pas, 'all', has here an extensive force and signifies 'on every possible occasion'. Adorn; the Greek verb kosmein can be used of the 'setting' of a jewel, a process by which it is favourably displayed. The doctrine of God (not Christ) our Saviour; i.e. not the ethical precepts of our Lord, but the gospel of our salvation; see v. 11.

2:11 – 3:11 THE CHRISTIAN'S DUTY TO MAINTAIN GOOD WORKS

Paul has just indicated that it is the gospel of God's salvation which ought to be attractively set forth by the appropriate good works or Christian behaviour of those who believe it (2:5, 10). He now introduces two remarkable doctrinal summaries of essential features of this gospel (2:11–14; 3:3–7), both of which are directed to show that a life of good works is God's purpose and the only appropriate behaviour for all who enjoy the benefits of His redeeming grace and saving mercy. Titus is told, therefore, that it is his responsibility confidently to proclaim this gospel, which is so worthy of being believed, and then authoritatively to apply its practical challenge in exhortation and rebuke to all who profess to have believed it, in order to move them to give the most careful attention to the matter of good living. This is the teaching, says Paul, which is both virtuous in itself and profitable to men. Foolish inquiries and subjects which, by contrast, are productive of nothing but strife and division should be avoided because they are obviously so unhelpful. So should any who show a perverse interest in them and will not give them up after being admonished.

11 Has appeared (Gk. aorist tense) points to one definite act, i.e. the incarnation and atoning work of Christ (cf. 3:4). In character and purpose the grace thus manifested is 'saving' or 'bringing salvation' (see RV), and that not to Jews only, but to all men. Its scope is worldwide. 12 God's saving grace brings us under a discipline or instruction which makes plain that we must live our present lives differently. Negatively, we must decisively abandon the kind of life which is dominated by lack of reverence for God and by mere worldly interests; positively, we must seek to live rightly in relation to ourselves, to others, and to God—i.e. sober, upright, and godly lives. 13 This gospel also gives us a hope beyond this life which is to be anticipated as blessed; i.e. the consummation of bliss. For Christ's second advent will be an appearing (Gk. epiphaneia) of God's 'glory' as the first was of His 'grace' (v. 11). Then Jesus will be openly manifested not only as our Saviour but also in all the glory of His majesty or greatness as God. Or the phraseology may mean that Christ's appearing will be accompanied by a manifestation of the divine glory. 14 Christ's ability to be our Saviour depends on His one accomplished act of self-sacrifice on our behalf as a ransom price (cf. Mk. 10:45; 1 Tim. 2:6). The full salvation which He thus procured means, negatively, our release from every kind of lawlessness, and, positively, our purification to be His own chosen people (cf. Ps. 130:8; Ezk. 37:23), devoted to good works. So transformed living is intended and possible for those who know God and His Christ as their Saviour. It is therefore rightly expected from them both by God and by men. 15 Let no one disregard you;

i.e. when you thus speak, do not allow anyone to treat what you say as unworthy of their attention.

3:1, 2 These verses give detailed instruction how, in this world, appropriate Christian good conduct should express itself in relation both to civil authorities and one's fellow-men. Christians ought to be dutiful citizens, prepared to take an active share in every kind of good activity—a particularly significant injunction here as Cretans had a reputation for being seditious. Christians ought also to act towards all with whom they come into contact in positive goodwill, refraining from attacking any by word or deed, and actively displaying a considerate and yielding spirit towards all.

What should inspire such conduct is the recollection that we ourselves were by nature as bad as any, and that God has treated us kindly and saved us when we did not deserve it. The gospel of saving grace is therefore again pregnantly stated. 3 provides a general description of sinful and unredeemed human nature—what we ourselves were once. Foolish; lit. 'senseless', 'without understanding'. Sinners show how completely abhorrent their sinful condition must be to God, because they even hate one another. 4 shows that the change in our condition is due entirely to God, to His initiative, to His kindness and active love (contrast our hate and active enmity), to His open intervention to save. 5 makes it still more explicit. Our salvation is not due to any righteous works of our doing, but is wholly determined by God's mercy; the not, us and his own are all emphatic. In status this salvation is made ours through the outward seal of baptism, i.e. the washing of regeneration; in vital experience it comes through the inner quickening or making new by the Spirit. (Cf. Jn. 3:5, 'born of water and the Spirit'.) 6 This gift of the quickening and indwelling Spirit has been made ours by God through Christ and His saving work (cf. Jn. 7:39; Acts 2:33). So the whole Trinity is active to make salvation ours. 7 And the full gospel includes not only the gift of God's Son for our justification, but also the gift of God's Spirit to make us heirs who can, by the life which He makes ours, hope to enjoy salvation eternally. Cf. 1:2; Rom. 8:11, 15-17, 23, 24. Alternatively, following RSV or RV rather than AV in v. 5, one may interpret the washing of baptism as a mediating token of two benefits, regeneration and spiritual renewal, benefits which are possibly again referred to as being justified and becoming heirs in hope of eternal life, the one giving a new status of acceptance with God (elsewhere called 'adoption', e.g. Gal. 4:5), and the other giving the complementary blessing of new Spirit-born life. Note that regeneration (Gk. palingenesia), like our word 'naturalization', though it suggests a new birth or nature, may rather signify a change of status.

8 The gospel thus summarized in vv. 4–7 is trustworthy doctrine and justifies Titus in confidently making the strongest assertions with regard to it (see RV) in order that those who have thereby come to trust in God may give attention to the practice of good deeds. The Greek proistasthai may mean 'to be forward in', 'to devote themselves before all else to' (cf. 2:14). 9 Note how similar are the descriptions of harmful teaching given here and in 1 Tim. 1:4; 6:4, 20; 2 Tim. 2:23. 10 Factious (Gk. hairetikos, and so RV 'heretical') primarily describes one who causes divisions. This he does by 'choosing on his own' (the root idea) to depart from the truth, and to follow and propagate different teaching. So 'heretical' comes to mean 'holding false doctrine'. But note the fundamental references of the word, first to the moral cause, self-will, and then to the evil consequence, division. Such a man needs not argument but admonition. 11 Perverted. What makes his completely unsatisfactory moral (not intellectual) condition plain is his refusal to heed admonition.

3:12–15 PERSONAL MESSAGES AND FAREWELL GREETINGS

Paul instructs Titus to join him at Nicopolis, where he intends to spend the winter. Titus is to leave as soon as either Artemas or Tychicus arrives, whom Paul says he will send—probably to take over the work in Crete for which Titus was responsible. Practical help is also to be given to expedite the journey of Zenas and Apollos, who likewise may have been going to join Paul. This instruction brings Paul back in thought to a final reiteration of his main injunction, that the Christians in Crete should learn to use every opportunity to do good works and to supply the needs of others. Only so will they be truly fruitful. Paul then sends greetings from all his companions to Titus; he himself greets all in Crete who have true Christian love for himself and his fellow-workers in the gospel. Then he adds his characteristic benediction.

12 Nicopolis. There are three cities so called, in Cilicia, in Thrace or Macedonia, and in Epirus. The last is most probably the one here referred to. There (not 'here') implies that Paul was not at Nicopolis when he wrote. 13 Do your best to speed . . . on their way. There are several indications in the Epistles that Christians were taught and expected to entertain and provide for Christian travellers, particularly those active in preaching. See Rom. 15:24; 1 Cor. 16:6; 3 Jn. 5–8. 15 In the faith; RV 'in faith'. This was the bond that united them. It was Christian not natural love. Cf. 1 Tim. 1:2. Grace be with you all. See on 1 Tim. 6:21.

Philemon

INTRODUCTION

AUTHORSHIP

Not only is Paul stated to be the author of this letter, but this ascription has rarely been questioned. It breathes too obviously the genuine Paul to be disputed. Of all his Epistles, in spite of its brevity, it is the most revealing of the character of the apostle. It may be wondered why so brief a personal letter was preserved among the NT books, but the answer must surely be that it provided an exquisite example of one Christian man's petition for another. The fact that the author was no less a man than the apostle Paul must have warmly commended it to the early Christians.

OCCASION AND PURPOSE

The Epistle is addressed to Philemon, who, according to the most natural understanding of v. 2, was host to a church group in his house. He also appears to have been the owner of a slave, Onesimus (v. 10), who had run away from him, having apparently absconded with some of his belongings. By some means which is not disclosed Onesimus came into contact with Paul, as a result of which he became a Christian. Paul can therefore speak of him as 'my child, Onesimus'. The apostle had clearly been told the full circumstances which caused Onesimus to be away from his master. He recognized that it was his Christian duty to return to Philemon, although, since being with Paul, he had been useful in ministering to him. But the duty to return carried with it a considerable hazard, for in a society which not only accepted slavery, but was widely dependent upon it, there were severe penalties for slaves who defected. Although Philemon was a Christian he may still have considered it advisable to administer punishment. The letter is a plea for leniency. Armed with so potent a petition, Onesimus would have a weapon of defence which Philemon as a true Christian man would find it difficult to resist. Indeed, Paul not only pleads for leniency, but seems to suggest far more. He was expecting Philemon to receive Onesimus in a new relationship, as a brother instead of a slave, in the same way, in fact, as he would receive Paul himself had he been coming. All this makes good sense of the letter which closes with a request for lodgings when he visits the area, which he evidently expects will be soon.

An alternative proposal has been put forward, which warrants some mention, although based on certain assumptions which are open to question. J. Knox (Philemon Among the Letters of Paul, 1935) suggested that Onesimus was owned by Archippus who, according to him, was the host of the house-church, not Philemon. The latter was an overseer of the Lycus Valley churches based on Laodicea. The further suggestion is made that Archippus's ministry, mentioned in Col. 4:17, was to release his slave Onesimus and to send him back to Paul as a kind of missionary service. Moreover, Knox proposed that this letter to Philemon was 'the letter from Laodicea' which the Colossians are urged to read (Col. 4:16). The reason for this is that Archippus would be less inclined to refuse if the matter had been brought before the whole church. The theory is ingenious but fails to convince. It is unnatural for an epistle to mention first a person who is not its main recipient. Moreover, the evidence to which Knox appeals is better explained by the traditional interpretation. The one feature about the theory which makes a positive contribution is the thought that Paul was asking for the services of Onesimus, but it can hardly be supposed that this was the main subject of the letter. He may have hoped that it would be a by-product.

DATE

The close connection between this Epistle and Colossians has already been mentioned. For a fuller discussion of the date, reference should therefore be made to the Introduction to Colossians. All that applies to that Epistle applies to this. It may reasonably be maintained that Philemon was sent from Rome during Paul's imprisonment there.

SLAVERY IN EARLY CHRISTIAN THOUGHT

Although slaves are mentioned in several Pauline Epistles, in none does slavery appear so vividly as in this, since the whole Epistle revolves around a runaway slave. The question arises why Paul did not take the opportunity of pointing out in a more direct manner the evils of the whole system. Certain factors must be borne in mind before an answer is suggested. Slavery was so integral a part in the social system that a direct confrontation with the State to abolish it, even if it had been possible for the Christian church to embark on such a crusade, would have resulted in nothing short of revolution. Paul was certainly no revolutionary and clearly believed that alleviation of the system could best come some other way. Although the Christians could not have hoped to make abolition of slavery a political platform, they could set an example to the world at large concerning the way in which Christianity could transform the system from within, and by this means could mitigate its evils. This brief letter is a notable example of such an approach in that Paul argues that a new relationship must develop between Philemon and Onesimus, since both master and slave were now Christians. Had the Christian church acted upon the apostle's advice it would not have been so many centuries before campaigns were launched against the evils of slavery. Whether men of his own day saw the real point of Paul's method of undermining the system cannot be determined. But there can be no doubt that this brief letter supplied not a little inspiration to later campaigners for the abolition of the slave trade.

8–20 The plea on behalf of Onesimus

COMMENTARY

This brief Epistle falls into four sections: Greetings, thanksgiving, petition for Onesimus and conclusion. It will be seen, therefore, that although it is essentially a personal letter it conforms to the same pattern as the church Epistles.

1–3 GREETINGS

1 Paul, a prisoner for Christ Jesus. Paul makes no reference to his apostolic office as he does in writing to Colossians. He confines himself to a description of his present state, no doubt to impress on Philemon that his request for Onesimus was small compared with the hardships he himself had endured for Christ's sake. A man who has suffered much for the cause has a right to be heard. The linking with Timothy is identical with the Colossian letter. Philemon is described as our beloved fellow worker, a description which Paul frequently used to make others conscious of their share in his work. 2 Nothing else is known about Apphia. She may have been Philemon's wife. Archippus, mentioned in Col. 4:17 in connection with the ministry, is here described as our fellow soldier, used elsewhere only in Phil. 2:25 of Epaphroditus. Many commentators suggest that he was the son of Philemon and Apphia. 3 The salutation is in a form frequently used by Paul.

4–7 THANKSGIVING

This thanksgiving is specially instructive because of its personal character.

4 My God. The possessive pronoun draws attention to Paul's special awareness of his own relationship with God. The word always is characteristic of Paul when referring to his prayer for his readers (cf. 1 Cor. 1:4; Phil. 1:4; Col. 1:3; 1 Thes. 1:2). Remembrance of Philemon meant thanksgiving for him. 5 When Paul says, because I hear, it seems reasonable to suppose that he has received this information from Epaphras (cf. Col. 1:4, 8). There is some question how the four parts of the rest of the sentence are to be understood. There are three possibilities a. Love may be linked with toward . . . all the saints, and faith linked with toward the Lord Jesus. In that case the order would be unusual, but not unknown in the writings of Paul. b. Both love and faith could be taken with both the other expressions, in which case faith would indicate the source of the love. It would not be faith towards all saints, but a faith expressed in love. This is more difficult than a. c. Another possibility is to interpret faith as meaning 'faithfulness', but the word could not be so readily understood in this sense in v. 6.

6 The sharing of your faith. The interpretation of this whole verse is difficult. Paul seems to have compressed his thoughts to such an extent that various renderings are possible. The present phrase can be taken to mean a sharing of what comes as a result of faith, i.e. perhaps Christian almsgiving, or a sharing of the faith itself, i.e. faith as the content of Christian belief, or less likely communion (with God) based on faith. The general Pauline usage of the Greek word involved (koinōnia) favours the first of these (cf., e.g., Phil. 1:5). But the next words, may promote the knowledge of all the good, are even more obscure. A literal rendering might be 'may become effective in the sphere of knowledge of every good thing'. Perhaps Paul is preparing Philemon to examine his 'knowledge', because he wants it to grow in his dealings with Onesimus. In this case knowledge of all the good will mean a fuller understanding of the good in Christ, an understanding of the blessings which Christ brings. But this interpretation must be governed by the concluding phrase, that is ours in Christ. The form of the Greek here suggests the meaning 'unto Christ' (eis), i.e. as the aim of the activity prayed for. This means that Paul is praying that Philemon's 'fellowship' may be directed towards Christ.

7 The words, For I have derived much joy and comfort, show what a deep impression reports of Philemon have had upon him. Both qualities mentioned are particularly recurrent in the letters of Paul. The word comfort may better be understood in the sense of 'encouragement'. It is significant that Paul returns here to the thought of Philemon's love, as in v. 5. The hearts of the saints have been refreshed. There is no knowing what Philemon had done to produce this result, but it is generally supposed that it was some act of benevolence which benefited the Colossian Christians. In the Greek the warm address, brother, comes at the end, throwing even more emphasis on it than in the RSV text.

8–20 THE PLEA ON BEHALF OF ONESIMUS

The approach of the apostle in this section shows a highly developed sense of Christian tact, to which the various steps in his petition for Onesimus bear witness. These will be noted in the following comments.

8 Accordingly. This is a significant connecting link between the petition and the introductory section. It is Paul's knowledge of the character of Philemon which encourages him to plead along the lines of appeal rather than command. There is here an indirect allusion to his apostolic authority, although he omits reference to it in the opening verse. Boldness in Christ is a boldness which comes through being in a special sense an authorized representative of Christ. Paul assumes that he could exercise this boldness as a right. What is required is literally 'what is fitting' (cf. Col. 3:18). 9 Having twice mentioned Philemon's love, the apostle now bases his own appeal on love. He could not adopt an authoritative attitude in view of Philemon's own approach. But he makes his appeal thoroughly personal—Paul, an ambassador and now a prisoner. The word ambassador could be understood in the sense of 'old man', but the RSV translation is almost certainly correct in view of the almost identical use of the metaphor in Eph. 6:20. The plea comes from an ambassador who has been arrested for Christ's sake—a powerful plea. 10 My child, Onesimus. There are other occasions on which Paul speaks of his spiritual children (e.g. 1 Cor. 4:15; 1 Tim. 1:2). The metaphor is vivid, introducing a new relationship in Christ. A slave who has become the spiritual offspring of the apostle had ceased to be regarded as a slave by him. 11 The parenthesis in this verse contains a play on words, since the name of Onesimus means useful. Paul's point is that not till now had he begun to live up to his name. To you and to me is another delicate hint, the inference being that even as far as his relationship to Philemon was concerned there had been a radical transformation—although Philemon is only now being informed about it. 12 In no more forceful way could Paul have shown his attachment to Onesimus than he does here by equating Onesimus with his own heart. In sending him back Paul is performing an act of self-sacrifice and is actually conferring a favour on Philemon. What the apostle asks in return must be measured against his loss of a dear friend. Some have suggested that the verb sending . . . back may be understood as 'referring back' and that the meaning is that Paul is not intending Philemon to retain Onesimus but is referring the matter to him for a decision in the hope that he will be allowed to return to Paul. The only other occurrence of the same verb in the NT would support this alternative suggestion. Moreover the next verse would seem to confirm this view. But if the Epistle is sent from Rome, this raises the difficulty of the long journey back to Paul. 13 The apostle here expresses as a wish what he hopes Philemon will concede—that Onesimus might serve him with Philemon's consent. No hint is given as to the nature of this service, but since the apostle is imprisoned, the usefulness of having a loyal associate close at hand needs no demonstrating. 14 Again the apostle presses the point about Philemon's consent and contrasts it, as if it were the only live alternative, with compulsion. Your own free will adds further emphasis to the idea of consent.

15–20 In this paragraph Paul at last specifies his request. The remaining steps in his petition are perhaps the most telling of all. 15 This verse makes it difficult to suppose that the apostle was asking for the services of Onesimus. The contrast between for a while and for ever seems against that suggestion, unless the latter word refers, not to Philemon having Onesimus back as a slave, but as a Christian (as in v. 16). It is better, however, to suppose that Paul is using an argument to mitigate the loss by Philemon of the services of Onesimus, over which he might justly have complained. 16 Paul edges still nearer the point when he contrasts Onesimus as he was with Onesimus as he now is—the transformation from a slave to a beloved brother (cf. Col. 4:9, where the same ascription is used of him). It is tactfully suggested that he should mean more to Philemon than to Paul. The distinction between in the flesh and in the Lord is between his material status (a slave) and his spiritual standing (a Christian). 17 If you consider. There is a subtle tactfulness in this clause. There is no doubt that Philemon regarded Paul as a partner. The then-clause should therefore follow without question. The words, as you would receive me, show that Paul regards himself as a sort of pattern for Philemon's approach to Onesimus. 18, 19 At this stage in his petition, he refers to any debts which Onesimus might owe. The fact that this subject is mentioned suggests that Onesimus had told Paul that he had robbed his master. Paul's generous offer to pay the debts for Onesimus raises problems in view of various references in his Epistles to his poverty and to his need for working with his own hands. He may, of course, have inherited some resources. On the other hand this may have been a delicate way of reminding Philemon that his spiritual debt to Paul exceeded anything that Onesimus owed him. Nevertheless, the fact that Paul drew attention to his own signature shows that he intended Philemon to treat his I O U seriously. He could not imagine that he would take him up on his offer. 20 Here is the final step—a personal appeal for some benefit for himself. This is more effective than ending with a plea for Onesimus. The word refresh is used by Paul in a similar sense in 1 Cor. 16:18 of others who had performed some service for him.

21–25 CONCLUSION

21 The apostle is confident of the complete success of the letter. What he expects Philemon to do is implied rather than stated. If the above-mentioned suggestion, that he wanted the services of Onesimus for himself, is correct, he may have been hinting here that the slave should be freed. 22 The mention of the guest room shows that Paul regarded his imprisonment as temporary and expected release in the not too distant future. 23 All those mentioned here are also mentioned in Col. 4:10ff. Epaphras is not there called a fellow prisoner, although the term is applied to Aristarchus. 25 This conclusion is the same as at the close of Galatians.

INTRODUCTION

There are several questions which it is natural to ask concerning the writing of a document of the NT, and which in the case of this Epistle it is impossible to answer with any certainty. While possible answers may be suggested and to some extent reasonably supported, the simple truth is that we do not know either who wrote this Epistle or to whom it was first written.

Our ignorance on such points does not, however, prevent right understanding or minimize the spiritual and theological value of a document which has from the first commended itself as authoritative by its own intrinsic worth. Indeed, the only adequate answer of Christian faith to these very questions is that God Himself is the primary author and Christians of every age are the divinely intended readers. For through this Epistle God unquestionably has spoken, and still speaks, by His Spirit to His people. This is ultimately the most important vindication of its place in the Canon of the NT.

AUTHORSHIP

In the Epistle itself there is no explicit indication who wrote it. Nor do early Christian writers provide us with any unanimous or convincing testimony. Tertullian is definite in his witness; he says that Barnabas wrote it. But this witness is unconfirmed, though there is still a little to be said in its favour. The man who was given a Christian name meaning 'son of exhortation' (Acts 4:36, RV) may well be responsible for this 'word of exhortation' (Heb. 13:22). As a Levite he would have more than an ordinary interest in the sacrificial ritual; as a Jew from Cyprus he quite possibly had intimate contact with the Hellenistic and philosophical teaching of Alexandrian Judaism with which both the writer and his readers seem to have had some acquaintance; as one of those converted immediately after Pentecost (which may be what Heb. 2:3, 4 refers to), he doubtless came under the influence of the teaching of Stephen, an influence which seems to persist in this Epistle.

In Alexandria, where the Epistle was accepted on its own merits, there is evidence of a growing tendency in the 3rd century to connect it with Paul, but only rather indirectly. Clement suggested that Paul wrote it in Hebrew and that Luke translated it into Greek. Origen was prepared to think that the original thoughts were the apostle's but not the final written form and language. Such connection of the Epistle with the name of Paul commended itself widely because it gave it welcome apostolic authority, for lack of which many hesitated to accept it as canonical. Consequently many manuscript copies came to be headed with the title 'The Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews'. This ascription to the apostle, however, most present-day students are not prepared to accept. The internal evidence of the Epistle itself, its language, style and contents, are regarded as conclusive against it (e.g. contrast 2:3 and Gal. 1:12; 2:6).

Other suggestions are wholly speculative. They include Apollos, Silas, Aquila (or Priscilla and Aquila) and Philip the evangelist. Of these Luther's suggestion of Apollos is perhaps the best. From what we know of him (see Acts 18:24–28) he is exactly the kind of man who might have written such an Epistle. But there is no other evidence to prove that he did. When a human writer of Scripture was providentially led to hide his identity there is no need to try, and possibly little or no hope of success in trying, to discover it. It is wiser to be content not to know.

THE FIRST RECIPIENTS

There is no clear indication in the Epistle itself to whom it was originally written. The familiar title To the Hebrews goes back to the 2nd century. The contents strongly confirm that the Epistle was written to Jewish Christians. In it there is no reference to heathenism at all; 9:15 seems to imply that those referred to had been 'under the first covenant'; and the Old Testament Scriptures, the Sinaitic covenant and the Levitical sacrificial ritual are treated with marked respect as possessing God-given sanction and authority. Nevertheless, for this very reason that the references to the Jewish background are all to what is written, and to what God thus says, rather than to Judaism and to current practice in the Temple in Jerusalem, several attempts have recently been made to suggest that the Epistle was written to Gentile Christians. (Cf. the way in which in 1 Cor. 10:1–11, in writing to a predominantly Gentile church, Paul appeals to the OT, and refers to 'our fathers'. See also 1 Cor. 5:7, 8.)

There is a lack of information in the Epistle concerning the location of its original readers. Jerusalem, Caesarea, Antioch in Syria, Ephesus, Alexandria and Rome have all been suggested. The fact that the readers had not themselves heard Christ (2:3) tells against their being lifelong residents in Jerusalem. Their general background, while unquestionably Jewish, seems to have been Hellenistic and somewhat Alexandrian rather than exclusively Palestinian and rabbinical. They seem to have been Jews of the Dispersion, whose Scriptures were the OT in Greek. The phrase 'They of (literally 'from') Italy salute you' (13:24) may be interpreted to mean people away from Italy sending greetings to their homeland. If this interpretation be correct (see notes ad loc.) it favours the view that the recipients were a Jewish section of the Christian community in Rome. It is perhaps significant that the earliest known quotations from this Epistle occur in a letter written by Clement of Rome about AD 95. Also, the reference to persecution in 10:32–34 might be a reference to the expulsion from Rome of (Christian) Jews by the emperor Claudius about AD 50. See Acts 18:2.

In form the Epistle appears more like a sermon than a letter. The style is oratorical, the argumentation logical, the literary structure elaborate. There are periodic exhortations. The writer even says, 'Time would fail me to tell' (11:32). But, even if it was first composed as a sermon, in the form in which we have it it was clearly sent as a letter to a definite group of readers. See 2:3; 5:11, 12; 6:9, 10; 10:25, 32–36; 13:7, 19, 23, 24. They knew the writer and Timothy. The writer hopes to come and see them. They had been Christians for a long time, and had been known to the writer from the beginnings of their Christian faith. From the references in the Epistle (see 13:24) they seem to have been a limited circle, who perhaps had a special 'house-church' meeting of their own rather than a large community which would presumably have included many more recent converts.

It seems possible to suggest (but it is only a suggestion) that the particular recipients of this Epistle were a group of Jews who had originally been members of a synagogue of the Dispersion. They were men zealously devoted to Judaism, and to Judaism as they understood it, not from lifelong residence in Palestine, but from the study of the OT in Greek. They were not unacquainted with Alexandrian thought. As Jews they were originally zealous in visiting Jerusalem for the great annual feasts. Possibly it was when, as a group, they were on such a visit to Jerusalem, at or soon after the great Christian Pentecost, that they, as well as the writer, were converted to faith in Jesus as the Christ through hearing the preaching of the apostles and through seeing the visible signs of the power of the Holy Spirit (2:3, 4). They may even have seen and shared in the persecution that was stirred up against the church in Jerusalem by the Jewish authorities and by zealous Jews like Saul of Tarsus; which may be to what 10:32–34 refers (see Acts 5:41; 8:3; 9:13, 14). It may well be to the poor saints in Jerusalem that they subsequently ministered from their home base (6:10).

Such a background to their entrance into the experience of new life in Christ would give added significance to the writer's assertion that the followers of Jesus have no earthly Jerusalem as their continuing city; rather they must go forth to Him outside the camp (13:12–14). As Christians they are 'come to Mount Zion and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem' (12:22). Here they need no longer stand in the court outside the shrine into which the high priest alone enters, and that only once a year, but can themselves freely and continuously enter boldly through the now rent curtain into the very sanctuary of God's presence.

This it is impossible to fix with absolute certainty, though one may say with considerable confidence that the Epistle was most probably written between AD 60 and 70. Its readers had been Christians quite a long time (5:12; 10:32). Some of their original leaders had passed away (13:7). On the other hand, Timothy was still alive (13:23). It seems possible to argue that had the destruction of Jerusalem taken place the writer would not have omitted to refer to it, particularly as it was such a significant judgment of God on the old order of Jewish worship.

OCCASION AND PURPOSE

In order to be able to assess the occasion and purpose of the Epistle we need first to appreciate the circumstances of those to whom it was written. In this connection their spiritual condition is of much greater significance than their geographical location. For knowledge about this we depend entirely on the evidence of the Epistle itself. The writer clearly contrasts the state in which his readers are with what they have been, what they ought to be, and what they seem to be in danger of becoming.

As Christians they are slothful (5:11; 6:12) and despondent (12:3, 12). They have lost their initial enthusiasm for the faith (3:6, 14; 10:23, 35). They have failed to grow or to progress, and are seriously deficient in spiritual understanding and discernment (5:12–14). They are ceasing to attend Christian meetings (10:25) and to be actively loyal to their Christian leaders (13:17). They need afresh to be exhorted to imitate the faith of those who have gone before (13:7). They tend to be easily carried away by new and strange teachings (13:9; some think these were Gnostic in character and similar to those which troubled the church in Colossae. See the Introduction to that Epistle, p. 1140). They are in danger of coming short of God's promises (4:1), and drifting away from the things which they have heard (2:1). They are even in danger of completely abandoning the faith in deliberate and persistent apostasy (3:12; 10:26); and this danger will be the greater if they fail to check any one of their number who may be moving in that direction (3:13; 12:15). If they yield to such temptation and actually reject the gospel of Christ they can expect nothing but judgment (10:26–31).

Particularly as those who had once been zealous adherents of Judaism, it seems very probable that they had become personally disappointed with Christianity because it had brought to them no visible earthly kingdom, and because it had been decisively rejected by the great majority of their fellow-Jews. Further, continued attachment to it seemed only to involve them in sharing the offensive reproach of a suffering and crucified Messiah, and in having to face the increasing prospect of violent anti-Christian persecution. It may well be, therefore, that they were being seriously tempted to disown Jesus as the Messiah and to go back to re-embrace the visible and preferable good which Judaism still seemed to offer to them.

That it was Judaism which thus attracted them afresh as preferable to Christianity seems confirmed by the obvious way in which the writer sets himself from the first to demonstrate the superiority of the new covenant over the old, and to set forth particularly the outstanding excellence of Jesus, the Son of God, as compared with the prophets and angels, leaders and high priests, who functioned in the old economy. So he shows that, while the old order was imperfect and provisional, Christianity brings perfection (7:19), and perfection which is eternal (5:9; 9:12, 15; 13:20).

The writer and his readers were apparently Hellenistic Jews with some acquaintance with Greek philosophical thought, and he seems to be using ideas from these sources when he declares that the old order contained merely 'figures' or 'a copy of the true' (9:24), 'a shadow of the good things to come instead of the true form of these realities' (10:1). Christianity is the truth itself, the heavenly and ideal reality, which actually and absolutely possesses all those inherent values which these other things can at their best only reflect or prefigure. Nevertheless, since his readers recognize the divine authority of the OT Scriptures, his final argument for recognizing the superiority of Christ over angels and over the Levitical priesthood, and the superiority of His sacrifice of Himself over that of bulls and goats, is the prophetic testimony of the OT itself. See 1:5–13; 7:15–22; 10:5–10.

The writer's purpose, therefore, is to make his readers fully aware, first, of the amazing revelation and salvation given by God to men in Christ; secondly, of the true heavenly and eternal character of the blessings thus freely offered to the appropriation of faith; thirdly, of the place of suffering and patient endurance by faith in the present earthly pathway to the goal of God's purpose, as shown in the experience and work of the Captain of our salvation, and in God's discipline of all His children; fourthly, of the awful judgment which must befall any who, knowing all this, reject it. Having striven to make them aware of these things, his complementary purpose is to stir them to act accordingly. These purposes are pursued throughout the Epistle by the use in turn of reasoned exposition, challenging exhortation and solemn warning.

CONTENTS

As already indicated, the contents of this Epistle are to be properly appreciated only in relation to its occasion and purpose. The writer obviously regards the OT Scriptures as the authoritative Word of God Himself, full of figures and anticipations of the true realities of God's purpose. Therefore he continually uses them to support, illustrate and develop his own theme. He recalls, for instance, how God brought a people out of Egypt, established a covenant with them at Sinai, and provided a priesthood and Tabernacle worship for the maintenance of covenant relationship. He remembers how many who thus began with God perished in the wilderness (3:16, 17). On the one hand they failed through unbelief to embrace God's promise and to enter into the inheritance (3:18, 19; 4:2, 6). On the other hand they came under the divine judgment by disobeying the covenant regulations (2:2). For instance, the punishment for those who committed spiritual adultery and worshipped other gods was death (10:28). Or, similarly, when Esau, born and brought up within the family of privilege, despised his birthright and sold it, it was lost beyond recall; there was for him no place for repentance (12:16, 17). From such scriptures the writer is aware that those to whom God's light is given and God's call comes either go on with God in faith and obedience to possess the full inheritance, or by rejecting the light and disobeying the call come under judgment.

So he longs and fears for his readers; longs that they may all go on to maturity or perfection (6:1); fears lest any fall back from or fail to obtain the grace of God (12:15). For they have tasted the benefits (6:4, 5) of the greater 'exodus' (Gk. exodos, Lk. 9:31) accomplished by Jesus at Jerusalem. They have been sealed and sanctified by the blood of the new covenant (see 10:29). As with the Israelites at Sinai, these things not only place upon them obligations to faith and obedience, but also set before them the opportunity to inherit the divine promises. But the dangers besetting them are also exactly similar to those besetting the Israelites under the first covenant. There is the danger of unbelief; there is the complementary danger of disobedience and apostasy, of deliberately rejecting the light and departing from the living God (3:12; 10:26, 38). They need, therefore, encouragement to go forward, and warning against turning back; and of these the Epistle is full.

The writer is no less persuaded that, in contrast to the first covenant, the revelation and the redemption given to men in Christ are the final truth of God. The obligation to pay heed and the assurance of complete divine provision are, therefore, absolute. These things settle either one's full salvation or one's final condemnation. So his urgent concern is to exhort his readers fully to respond, to warn them properly to take heed.

He provides a solid basis for such exhortations and warnings by an exposition in some detail of the superiority of Christ and of what is given under the new covenant to everything used or given under the old covenant. In Christ there is the final revelation of God, greater than anything hitherto given through prophets and angels, because He is Himself God the Son. In Christ there is the final reconciliation to God, because, having condescended to become true man, a partaker of flesh and blood, He went even lower and tasted death for every man, thus putting away sin by making Himself the sin offering. So the true house, or community, of God's people is being built of which Christ is the Head, and to which all who believe in Him are called to belong. They will become partakers in it only if they hold fast to their confidence through this testing wilderness experience which lies between the great 'exodus' of redemption and the coming inheritance of the promise.

Further, this community is called to share in a new covenant, which is full of better promises, and of which Jesus has become the effective mediator by His decisive redeeming work and by His never-ending administration of its benefits. As their High Priest He has dealt with sin once for all by the one offering of His earthly, human life upon the cross. This has secured for Him as their representative not only entrance into God's presence but also enthronement at God's right hand.

The separating curtain which kept them out of the sanctuary is decisively rent. So they can come to the very throne of God and find it a throne of grace, with One there ever waiting to speak to God on their behalf. So they can look to their High Priest on the throne for grace to meet their every need and fully to perfect their salvation. So they can count on the fulfilment in them as His people of all the divine promises of the amazing new covenant. With the wonder of such privileges open before them let them hold fast to their confidence and its open confession, and press forward to a fuller experience and enjoyment of the available benefits.

One other important truth they also needed more effectively to learn. Those who would thus have dealings with God must have them by faith. He is the great unseen One, and His greatest rewards lie in the future. Indeed, the immediate outlook and one's present experience may seem both to deny His presence and to contradict the hope of His reward. Faith, therefore, is indispensable to right awareness and to steadfast continuance. Here, once again, the OT Scriptures, as a God-given handbook of instruction, show by the witness of men's lives and achievements that this has continuously been true in the experience of all who have in any way pleased God and become heirs of His promises. So the writer would encourage his readers not to be turned aside by the lack in Christianity of visible glory and immediate, earthly triumph. Rather, he says, 'let us hold fast the confession of our hope without wavering, for he who promised is faithful' (10:23). 'For here we have no lasting city, but we seek the city which is to come' (13:14). The kingdom we are given to enjoy will stand fully disclosed only when this temporal order has passed away in judgment.

Let them, therefore, find their all in Christ, in His unchanging Person (13:8), in His abiding companionship (13:5, 6) and in the all-sufficiency of His one atoning act outside the gate of Jerusalem (13:12). Instead of yielding to the temptation to abandon Christianity and to return to Judaism, let them once for all, whatever the reproach involved, stand clear of Judaism and openly associate themselves with Jesus the crucified as their only hope (13:13). For, says the writer in his final benediction, this Jesus is 'our Lord'; He is the 'great shepherd of the sheep' (13:20). All our hopes are rightly fixed on Him. Nor is such confidence vain. God has raised Him from the dead. The covenant which His death sealed is already in operation. God Himself is active to fulfil it. We may, therefore, count on Him to make perfect that which concerns us. So, while others may draw back—and it is well that the awful warning should be sounded—it is inconceivable that we should. Nay, 'we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul' (10:39, AV).

For further notes on the new covenant, on the priesthood of Christ and on the warning passages see Appendices 1, 2 and 3, pp. 1217–1221.

COMMENTARY

1:1–4 INTRODUCTION: GOD'S FINAL WORD THROUGH HIS SON

This grand opening statement indicates the great theme of the writer (cf. 3:1). This vision of the absolute supremacy and sufficiency of Christ dominates the thought of the whole Epistle. He is superior to and supersedes all other mediators between God and men, such as prophets (v. 1) and angels (v. 4). Note the continuity between the OT revelation and that now given in Christ. The first prepares for the second; the second consummates the first (cf. 10:8, 9). Note also that this final revelation of God is given to men not only in the incarnation of the Son, but in the Son as the Fulfiller of the work of atonement for sin (cf. 1 Jn. 4:9, 10), and that the full significance of this revelation and redemptive work is appreciated only by those who see by faith that the Christ once crucified is now enthroned, and so able to save completely or to the uttermost all who draw near to God through Him (see 8:1; 7:25).

2–4 There are eight successive statements about Christ. In His eternal being He is genuine, absolute Deity, the visible outshining of God's glory, Himself an exact expression of the divine nature, the eternal Son of the Father, 'very God of very God'. In the divine ordering of the universe He is its Creator, Sustainer and End. By Him it was made. He upholds it. He is its heir. Note that the end is seen from the beginning; the divine appointment of the Son to be the Heir of the universe precedes its creation. In relation to men He is men's Prophet, Priest and King. In Him God spoke His final word of revelation; so He brings God to men (cf. Jn. 1:14, 18). In His own Person He purged our sins and finished the work of reconciliation; so He brings men to God. He now sits enthroned at God's right hand. As the exalted God-Man He has obtained by inheritance a position far above all others (cf. Eph. 1:20, 21; Phil. 2:9–11).

1:5–14 THE SON'S SUPERIORITY TO ANGELS

In Jewish thought angels held a very important place as the mediators of God's revelation to His people. Therefore the writer sets out to demonstrate Christ's superiority to angels in order to establish the superiority of the message which He brings (cf. 2:1–4). This he does by introducing seven quotations from the OT. The whole method is very significant. It implies, first, that the OT possesses a direct relevance and a decisive authority for Christian believers. Secondly, the words quoted are ascribed not to the human psalmists and prophets, but directly to God as their Author. Cf. the statement of v. 1. Thirdly, it is now possible for those who are acquainted with the final revelation in Christ to see in the words of the OT a meaning and significance with reference to Christ, which could not possibly have been seen in the same way, either by those who wrote them, or by any before Christ came. Cf. 1 Pet. 1:10–12.

5 Son is the 'more excellent' name (v. 4) by which Christ's superiority to angels is measured. The Son is superior to the angels, first, because of what He is eternally as God; secondly, because of what He has now become as the exalted God-Man. The first quotation from Ps. 2:7 introduces both thoughts. There never was a time when the Father could not say to Him, Thou art my Son. But there came a day in time when by resurrection in glorified humanity He was begotten to a new status as the exalted Man. So in Acts 13:33 this quotation from Ps. 2 is explicitly applied to Christ's resurrection. In consequence, He is not only Son in virtue of His deity; He is now exalted to be as a son ('the first-born among many brethren', Rom. 8:29) in virtue of His humanity. The second quotation, the promise to David concerning his seed (2 Sa. 7:14), is fulfilled in Christ as it never was, nor could be, in Solomon.

6 Similarly, He is 'the first-born' in a double sense (cf. Col. 1:15, 18), first as the only-begotten of the Father, existing before the created universe and Lord over it (see Ps. 89:27), and now as the firstborn from the dead, who has, as the great path-maker of salvation, opened the way for the many to enter as sons into glory (2:10). The third quotation is made to indicate that this office of His in relation to men, both as Creator and Redeemer, will be consummated at His second coming, when He will be brought again into this 'inhabited earth' (RV and mg.). For the prophetic vision of God coming to judge will be fulfilled in the Person of His Son. Then His deity will be openly manifested. Then all the angels shall worship Him. See Ps. 97:7 (the Hebrew word 'gods' becomes 'angels' in the Greek of the LXX).

7–9 The fourth and fifth quotations show that while angels fulfil their service (e.g. at Sinai) through wind and fire, i.e. in the material sphere, in transitory fashion, in creaturely subservience to the divine pleasure, the Son is a free moral personality, Himself occupying the throne of God, as God, in righteousness for ever. Because of His righteousness as the God-Man, He has, too, been exalted and anointed as the One to whom belongs the pre-eminence. The quotations are from Pss. 104:4 and 45:6, 7. For subsequent reference to His comrades see 2:10–13; 3:14 (RV). 10–12 The sixth quotation shows that, in contrast to created things, the Son is the Creator, the sovereign, unchangeable Lord. Words from Ps. 102:25–27 are quoted (from the LXX version) as addressed by the Father to the Son indicating that He is God 'the Lord'; and that there will be with Him no decay nor decease. Cf. 13:8.

13 Finally, as the seventh quotation shows (cf. vv. 3, 4) the Son is superior to the angels not only in what He is as God but also in what God is now doing for Him as the exalted Man or enthroned Messiah. By divine appointment He is to continue to occupy the throne in sure hope of complete triumph (Ps. 110:1). 14 The angels, by contrast, are sent forth from the throne as servants to fulfil ministries on behalf of those who are to share in this glorious consummation of man's full salvation. Those who are to obtain salvation; the first of a variety of expressions used by the writer to describe the people of God and their destiny.

2:1–4 PRACTICAL APPLICATION AND WARNING

The writer here introduces the first of his characteristic words of urgent exhortation and solemn warning (see Appendix 3, 'The Warning Passages', p. 1219). This new revelation places on all who hear it a supreme obligation to give heed, an obligation which, for a number of reasons, is greater than that of obedience to the law of Moses. 2 First, there is the known authority of that law. It was a word which could not be defied or disregarded with impunity. Under it every sin of commission (i.e. transgression), and every sin of omission (i.e. disobedience or 'failure to hear'), received its just retribution.

3, 4 Secondly, there is the character of the new message which is salvation, so great and of such a kind as to be amazing (cf. Jn. 1:17). The third reason is the Person of the Messenger. On the Godward side the Sinaitic law was given to Moses by angels (cf. Acts 7:53; Gal. 3:19); it was a mediated revelation. This new revelation is direct and immediate, given by the Lord Himself in Person. In the fourth place there is the decisive confirmation of the message. In addition to having been first spoken by the Lord Himself it has been attested to us by the evidence of eyewitnesses, and also by the superadded testimony of a great variety of God-given miraculous signs and by gifts of the Holy Spirit, which in their distribution are clearly not of man's appointing but wholly according to the divine pleasure. Cf. Mk. 16:20; 1 Cor. 12:11. Finally, there is the inevitable consequence of neglect. To drift past out of reach (v. 1) when we have the opportunity to pay heed must leave us without excuse and with no prospect but judgment. This point is made still more explicit later (see 10:26, 27). How shall we escape? (future indicative). Note here the implied certainty of judgment to come.

2:5–18 THE INCARNATION, SUFFERING AND DEATH OF THE SON OF GOD

In this chapter the writer deals with a difficulty which his readers might find in his teaching regarding the superiority of Jesus to angels, for to Jewish minds the place of angels was of no small importance. To them it was clear that, in the present order, angels are superior to men. For example, they stood between God and men at the giving of the law (v. 2). If Jesus was a man, and still more if He suffered and died, how can He be said to be superior to the angels as a mediator (1:4)?

In answer these verses indicate first the fact and significance of His exaltation as man—'we see Jesus . . . crowned' (v. 9); note the use of the unqualified human name. Secondly, they describe the divinely ordained and saving purpose of His preceding humiliation, together with (for God) its moral fitness and (for men) its beneficial consequences. Further, these verses indicate that not only Jesus but men—through Jesus as their High Priest and Author of salvation—are called to inherit a destiny of glory and dominion.

2:5–8 Not angels, but men, are the divinely destined lords of the coming age

All this is prophetically anticipated in Scripture. In Ps. 8 it is made plain that, although man in this present world-order begins by being made for a little while lower than the angels (v. 7), God's ultimate purpose is to give him glory and dominion, even over the angels. For the everything (v. 8) includes the angels. Cf. 1 Cor. 6:3. This consummation is clearly not yet fully realized (v. 8c). It must, therefore, still be spoken of as future; it is the world to come (v. 5); i.e. 'the coming world-order' (cf. 6:5). It is this coming consummation or completed salvation which is the writer's theme (v. 5), and ought to be the Christian's constant object of hope (see 10:37–39; 11:13–16; 13:14).

2:9–18 The purpose of the incarnation, suffering and death of Christ

9 On the other hand, there is to be seen in the Person of Jesus a present realization of man's destiny. He, as a true man, began, like men, by being made (for a little while) lower than the angels. He is now crowned with glory and honour. Ps. 8, therefore, is thus seen to be Messianic. God's purpose for man is fulfilled only through the one Man, i.e. Christ (cf. Gal. 3:16).

Also, in relation to God's intended purpose for men, it is possible to see why the Son of God was humbled to the form of a servant. For, as man, He is crowned with glory and honour only because He has suffered death. By a wonderful manifestation of the grace of God He became man in order that, for the benefit of mankind as a whole (i.e. for everyone), He might thus enter into death.

10 It was, indeed, supremely fitting, and an act worthy of God Himself, who is the first cause and final end of all things, that in order to bring sinful men into the true glory of manhood, which they had irretrievably lost, God should provide for men a Saviour of this kind. By entering into His own glory through suffering He opened up the way by which the many (cf. Is. 53:12; Mk. 10:45) can now be brought in to share the same human glory as sons of God and joint-heirs with Christ (cf. Rom. 3:23; 5:2; 8:29, 30). Jesus' suffering of death, therefore, was necessary completely to qualify Him to function as men's Saviour. Pioneer; cf. 12:2. The same Greek word is rendered 'Author' (Acts 3:15) and 'Leader' (Acts 5:31). It describes an originator without whom the resulting benefit would not exist.

Our Lord's work issues in His becoming the Head of a saved company or community, i.e. those whom God has given Him through and because of what He has done (cf. Jn. 17:2, 6, 26). The OT quotations used to confirm this are remarkable. 12 The first is from Ps. 22, a Psalm which foreshadows the cross. The constitution of the congregation or 'church' (Gk. ekklēsia), with Christ in the midst revealing God to His brethren, is possible only because of His sacrifice. 13 The other two quotations are from Is. 8:17, 18. The first is often said to be from Ps. 18:2; but the LXX of Is. 8:17, 18 suggests that this one passage is the source of both quotations. It is a place in the OT where the thought of the believing remnant or 'church' distinctly emerges.

14, 15 These elect children of the divine purpose were, as men, sharers in flesh and blood, and, as sinners, subject to bondage and fear, held under by the devil and the power of death. There was no hope of a redeemed community being raised up to enjoy man's intended destiny, unless this hold of the devil and of 'the gates of Hades' could be broken (see Mt. 16:18; Mk. 3:26, 27; 1 Cor. 15:17–19). This was done when the Son of God became incarnate and entered into death, not as a helpless victim but as the decisive victor. (Cf. Rev. 1:18; Rom. 14:9.)

16 This salvation is meant for men, not angels. Christ came to redeem the descendants of Abraham, i.e. men of faith (cf. Gal. 3:7, 9, 29). Note that 'doth he take hold' (RV) refers not to His becoming man, but to His work of rescue and redemption. Cf. 8:9, quoted from Je. 31:32 where the same Greek word describes a gracious 'laying hold' in order to take out of a state of bondage. 17, 18 Christ could fully help them in this way only by entering completely as a true man into their human experience of trial. What they needed was one who could put them right with God by making atonement for sin; and also help them to triumph over life's continuing temptations (v. 18). So as 'the author of their salvation' (v. 10, RV) the Son of God became a High Priest who was faithful in His discharge of the work of making expiation (RV 'propitiation') for the sins of the whole people of God; and merciful, i.e. 'compassionate', or ready to sympathize with and help the tempted, because of His own experience of human temptation. This, then, is why He trod the path of incarnation, suffering and death.

3:1–6 THE SUPERIORITY OF CHRIST JESUS TO MOSES

Moses was the human mediator of the old covenant; he was called in a unique way to be God's servant. See Nu. 12:5–8. The Israelites traced back to him their sense of status and calling as the consecrated people of God. The Christian brotherhood is similarly consecrated and called through Jesus (2:11), the Mediator of the new covenant. 1 Christians, therefore, should consider, i.e. fix all their gaze, their steadfast mental attention, upon Jesus, whom they have confessed to be their apostle and high priest. He combines in His own Person both these offices. As God, He has been 'sent forth' to reveal God to men; as Man, He has become High Priest to reconcile men to God. Who share in a heavenly call. There is an implied contrast with the earthly inheritance set before those who came out of Egypt under Moses.

2 Jesus is like Moses in a number of ways. God made or appointed him; i.e. His status and function are divinely constituted (cf. 1 Sa. 12:6). He was faithful. The sphere of His work was the whole house of God (vv. 2 mg., 6). Cf. Nu. 12:7. 3 Jesus also surpasses Moses and is worthy of more glory and honour. For Moses was himself part of the house in which he served, himself one of the people of God. 4 But Christ is the builder of the house, Himself God. It was the declared task of God's anointed king to build a house for His name (2 Sa. 7:13); and the church which Jesus said He would build is this 'house of God' or new 'Israel' (cf. 1 Tim. 3:15; Gal. 6:16).

5, 6 Therefore it is we Christians who are this 'house of God' (v. 6). Again, Moses was only a servant in the house (v. 5). Christ is set as the Son over His Father's house (v. 6). He is its Head; by virtue of His Sonship the house is his (cf. Mt. 1:21: 'his people'). Note that He is here called Son in reference to God (cf. 1:2); there is definite implication of Godhead. Again, Moses' work was one of preparation (v. 5); it pointed forward to that which should come after; it witnessed to the kind of work that the coming One would do. See Dt. 18:15–19. Christ is the fulfilment of all that Moses foresaw and foreshadowed. He points to none but Himself. No wonder this Epistle emphasizes so strongly, 'Consider him' (3:1; 12:3). Similarly, the OT house or people of God, in which Moses served, pointed forward to the Christian church, that present house of God, over which Christ is set as Son.

In the latter half of v. 6 the thought turns to the personal application of what has been said. These privileges can be fully possessed only if those who have embraced the hope set before them in Christ remain steadfast until the hope is realized. They must continue in that outspoken confidence and pride or exulting testimony (RV 'boldness' and 'glorying') which are characteristic of the new-born believer.

3:7 – 4:13 PERSONAL APPLICATION AND WARNING

3:7–19 The danger of unbelief

See Appendix 3, p. 1219. The warning here is enforced by the solemn example of the failure of the Israelites in the wilderness. The comparison between Moses and Jesus given in vv. 1–6 is followed by a comparison between the promise and the people under the old covenant and under the new. Moses and Christ were both faithful to the end (v. 2). But the great majority of those who followed Moses were faithless. They all shared in the great deliverances of the Passover and the Red Sea, but later they hardened their hearts against God and perished in the wilderness. Cf. 1 Cor. 10:1–5. This provided an eloquent warning to those Jews of the 1st century AD who had seen in Jesus the Passover Lamb sacrificed and God's power manifested in His resurrection from the dead. It was clearly no new thing for the majority of the nation not to believe. Also, many of the Israelites under Moses saw God's works for 'forty years' (v. 9) and still hardened their hearts. So, at the very doors of the promised land, they failed to enter in. Similarly, at the time this Epistle was written, about 40 years had possibly elapsed since the first proclamation of salvation by the Lord Himself. The divine origin of the gospel had been signally confirmed to these Hebrews (2:3, 4). Let them fear lest they, also, take offence at God's ways and come short of the promised consummation (4:1).

7 This exhortation is introduced in words from Ps. 95:7–11, which are quoted as spoken by the Holy Spirit, and as spoken for today to those who are now confronted in this new era of redemption by the new revelation given by God's voice spoken in Christ. Note the implied divine authorship and Christian purpose of the OT Scriptures. Everything depends on how men hear. It is not just words but the living God who here confronts men. Cf. 4:12, 13. To refuse to hear is to reject Him (v. 12).

8 Rebellion and testing are translations of the Hebrew names Meribah and Massah. See Nu. 20:1–13; Ex. 17:1–7. The latter instance of Israel's unbelief occurred in the first, and the former instance in the fortieth, year of the wilderness wanderings. They are evidence that the hardening of heart persisted from beginning to end of the 40 years. 9 To put God to the test seems to mean seeing how far one can go in disobeying Him. 10 Though God in His displeasure rebuked them and made them aware of their error, they still showed no understanding of the purpose of His dealings with them. They refused to repent. 11 So God solemnly declared that it was impossible for people in such a condition to enjoy the promised inheritance.

12–15 These words from Ps. 95 are taken to indicate that today, while there is fresh opportunity to hear God's voice in the gospel (cf. 2 Cor. 6:2), there is danger of the same peril as beset the Israelites. For God's Word calls forth an inevitable reaction; men either respond in obedience to it or stubbornly reject it. The causes of failure, which ought to be avoided, are the deceitfulness of sin, through which men's hearts are hardened against God (v. 13); and consequent unbelief, which leads men to fall away or 'apostasize' (Gk.) from God, i.e. to abandon response to God altogether (v. 12). Protection against these evils is to be found in daily, mutual exhortation (v. 13). Every day Christians should speak words of encouragement to one another. The many are responsible for the one; every member of the Christian community should take care lest any one of their number becomes infected. For full participation in the Messianic blessings is given only to those who are steadfast in their confidence (v. 14) from start to finish. It is faith that provides such a 'conviction' or 'assurance' (such an underlying foundation, Gk. hypostasis) of things hoped for (11:1). It must be held firm to the end, in all the intensity of its first manifestation (cf. 3:6), and in the face of delay, suffering and temporary disappointment (cf. 10:35, 36), i.e. in the face of 'testing in the wilderness' (v. 8).

16–19 The solemn significance of the example of the Israelites' failure is further enforced by a series of questions. Those who provoked God for 40 years in the wilderness by their rebellion were none other than those who shared in the deliverance from Egypt, a surprising anticlimax. The reason why they were overthrown in judgment was sin. The reason why they failed to enter the promised land was disobedience due to unbelief. Lack of faith, then, or 'an evil, unbelieving heart' (v. 12), is the obvious and fatal peril of which to beware.

4:1–13 Exhortation to enter into rest

There is urgent reason to pay heed to the warning both because the divine promise of entering into God's rest still stands open, and because failure to embrace it may result in a loss that cannot be remedied, a permanent missing of God's best. 1 It is possible to fail to reach it or to be 'left behind'. The writer again stresses that the whole company should be on its guard lest any single individual drop out. Cf. 3:12, 13; 12:15.

2 This promise of entrance into God's rest is offered to men afresh in the preaching of the gospel of Christ. It is this which gives to men 'today' opportunity to 'hear his voice'. But, as the OT Scriptures make plain, when men hear the God-given Word they can enjoy the blessings He promises only if they become vitally united to it by means of the response of faith or, following an alternative MS reading, if they believingly associate themselves with those who obey it (see mg.). And although God swore that the unbelieving Israelites should not enter in, it is clear from the present experience of Christian believers that Christ has brought this rest within the reach of His people. 3 For those who have become believers are actually entering into this very rest.

4 This rest of God has been in existence for men to share since the creation of the world was finished. In Gn. 2:2 we read that God rested on the seventh day from all his works. This rest does not consist merely of inactivity; the word describes the satisfaction and repose of successful achievement. Further, the words of Scripture which speak of this subject (Gn. 2:2; Ps. 95:11) are to be regarded as God's own word and witness on the matter. These words show, first, that God Himself rested. Secondly, and by implication, they indicate that it is clearly His purpose that men should enter into and share His rest. His word about it guarantees its certainty; God never speaks empty words. 6 Thirdly, we are told that those to whom the opportunity was first offered failed to embrace it because of disobedience, and were by the word of the same God solemnly forbidden all hope of entrance (vv. 3, 5). 7, 8 Also we see that the inheritance into which Joshua led the people cannot really be the promised rest because, long after the time of Joshua in the days of David, God speaks of a fresh opportunity ('today') to hear His voice and to enter in.

9 It is clear, therefore, that God intends His people to share His own sabbath rest. This is the reward that He has reserved for them. 10 Entrance into it means a cessation from their own works (cf. Rev. 14:13), just as God rested from the work of creation on His sabbath. In its fullness such a goal is, therefore, something which lies beyond this life. Yet those who find salvation and new life in Christ do begin to experience it here and now (see Mt. 11:28, 29). So, as the writer has already said (v. 3), those who take the decisive step and become Christian believers are entering into rest. They have begun to enjoy a blessing which is yet to be consummated. Its possession is both now and not yet.

11 There is need, therefore, for us all to exhibit zeal and earnest endeavour in its continual pursuit, lest any single one of our number fall by the way, and become, like the Israelites in the wilderness (cf. Lot's wife), yet another similar example of unbelieving disobedience. It is a solemn thing to become a negative witness to the truth of God's promises by being 'left behind'. It is better to be a positive witness and to enter in. Those who have opportunity to hear His voice must become one or the other (cf. Mt. 7:24–27).

It is well, therefore, to consider the character of the Word that confronts us, the Word of Scripture and of the gospel, if we are fully to appreciate the responsibility under which hearing it puts us. 12 For this Word is God's Word. It shares the very attributes of God Himself. It is living, and full of activity and power to achieve. In it God Himself is active, and so it is never without result (see Is. 55:11); it brings either salvation or judgment. It penetrates into a man's inmost being and, like a dissecting knife, forces open a radical division and distinction between things that differ in human life. It brings under judgment the thoughts and ideas of man's mind and will (cf. 1 Cor. 4:5). It is the 'critic' (Gk. kritikos; AV discerner) by which all are judged. 13 Confronted by it, man is confronted by God, before whom nothing can be concealed. Indeed, it makes us aware that all things stand stripped and bare and fully exposed to His searching glance. And it is to Him, the God from whom this Word comes, that all who hear the Word (Gk. logos) have ultimately to give back in answer their own 'word' or 'account' (Gk. logos). Laid bare. The Greek word means 'with the head thrown back and the neck bare'. It suggests the impossibility of hiding one's face. In the final giving of account all must look at God and be looked upon by Him face to face.

4:14 - 5:10 CHRIST OUR GREAT HIGH PRIEST

4:14–16 The Epistle's main theme stated

Here the urgent warning already given is complemented by positive encouragement. 14 As Christians we have (the words are emphatic) a great high priest, i.e. great in His essential nature, for He is both truly man and truly God. In the fulfilment of His work as High Priest, He has passed through the heavens into the very presence of God Himself, where He sits enthroned (cf. Eph. 4:10). Note that this enthronement is implied in v. 16; it is explicitly stated several times (see 1:3, 13; 8:1; 10:12). Because of His humanity and earthly experience He is able sympathetically to appreciate our human limitations and trials. We ought, therefore, to hold firmly to the open confession of faith in Him; and enter into the enjoyment of the benefits that His priestly work has made available. 15, 16 'Boldly' (v. 16, AV) or with confidence, i.e. with outspoken expression of our faith and our need, we may now come to the very throne of God Himself, there to find that it is a throne of grace and divine bounty, where we may always obtain compassion or mercy in relation to our weakness and sin, and where we may discover grace that will afford us timely help, i.e. help suited to the need of the present hour. Our weaknesses (v. 15) are those due to our finite creaturely existence, e.g. weariness, shrinking from pain, etc. These are things which the incarnate Son Himself experienced. Yet without sinning. This phrase may describe either the issue of His temptations (i.e. He never fell into sin), or a difference in the way in which He was tempted (i.e. there was in Him no sinful nature, no sinful promptings from within). Draw near (v. 16); the Greek word here is commonly used of priestly approach to God. This privilege, formerly restricted to a select few, is now extended to all the people of God. Also, it is not just a symbolic earthly shrine that we can enter, but the very presence of God.

5:1–10 Our Lord's qualifications and work as High Priest described

A high priest is appointed to act for men in matters of Godward reference, especially to present offerings to God which deal with sins (v. 1; cf. 9:7). He must be chosen from among men and be able, as a true man, fully to sympathize with men's weaknesses (v. 2). (This qualification has already been declared to be true of our Christian High Priest; see 2:18; 4:15.) Also, he must not presume to take such an office upon himself; he must for such a task be called and appointed by God (v. 4). All this (in reverse order) is declared to be true of Christ as the writer considers His divine appointment, His perfect humanity and consequent ability to sympathize, and His office and work. For it is God who, raising Him from the dead, acknowledged Him as His Son (v. 5) and openly declared His appointment to an eternal priesthood after an order different from that of Aaron, 'the order of Melchizedek' (v. 6). He is also able fully to sympathize with men in their life in the flesh. For He Himself, though He were God the Son, learnt as man in the experience of His earthly life the full meaning of obedient submission to the will of God in the face of extreme human suffering and the power of death (vv. 7, 8). This is how He reached that human perfection, which qualified Him to enter upon His work (v. 9). It is as thus qualified that God has solemnly ascribed to Him the title which is His due, the title of High Priest after a new eternal order (v. 10). And it is as thus fully competent to act that He has become the one sufficient cause of 'eternal salvation' to all who learn from Him to make a similar believing and obedient response to the will and way of God for men (v. 9).

1, 2 The sins covered by the sacrifices of the law were sins due to human infirmity, occasions of going astray through ignorance (v. 2), not wilful sins done with a high hand (see Nu. 15:28–30). A human high priest would be able to show understanding sympathy towards such wrongdoing because, as a man, he himself suffers from the same weakness. 3 Also, for a similar reason, he must of necessity offer expiatory sacrifice for his own sins. Christ's case is, of course, different on this last point; for He was undefiled (7:26). But His sympathy is none the less real. One does not need to yield to temptation to be fully aware of its pressure upon the natural man. Indeed, only He who resisted to the end felt its full weight. Cf. 2:18; 4:15.

5, 6 The OT quotations of these verses come from two important Messianic Psalms (Pss. 2:7 and 110:4). They very significantly emphasize by this juxtaposition that the exalted Jesus is both the enthroned King, and the eternal Priest. (See also on 1:5; 7:1ff., and Appendix 2, p. 1218).

7 Jesus offered up prayers. Christ prayed, particularly in Gethsemane, with earnest and urgent entreaty to be saved from having to die. But even though His human nature shrank from such a way forward (Mk. 14:33–36), He prayed in a spirit of reverent submission and obedient response to the will of God, as one prepared to learn—such was his godly fear—that every circumstance and experience had its place in the Father's plan. Such praying was heard. He was strengthened to go through with God's will, and to 'drink the cup'. 8 Also by the experience of such a discipline He, Son of God though He was, learnt the full meaning and cost of human obedience, and was thereby perfected in His human character, and in His fitness to be the cause to men of salvation eternal in quality. Men can enjoy the full benefit of His saving work only if they, too, are baptized into the same spirit, and become those who at any cost make active obedience to Christ their continual practice.

5:11 – 6:20 AN EXHORTATION TO PROGRESS AND TO PERSIST

This rebuke and exhortation are prompted by the writer's subject (which only the mature can fully understand), by his awareness of his readers' backward condition, by his recognition of God's purpose for His children, and by the contemplation of the only ultimate alternative, namely, complete relapse and terrifying judgment. For those who share to the full in a God-given opportunity to receive His Word, and then knowingly and deliberately reject it, can expect nothing but judgment. It is impossible to do anything further to move such to repentance; they openly take sides with those who crucified the Son of God. Here (6:9) the writer, alarmed by such thoughts, is careful at once to state, in tender affection for his readers, that their condition is not hopeless. Their lives show the fruit of good works. But they need to be awakened to the dangers of sloth, and they need to learn to put devotion (similar to that which they have put into their good works) into persisting in believing hope until the day of full possession (6:11, 12). Further, God Himself, in order to remove from men's minds all possibility of doubt, has pledged His sure word by a confirming covenant oath (6:17).

So men have in their dealings with God by faith a double ground of confidence—God's word and God's oath, both of which are incapable of being proved false (6:18). Finally, Jesus Himself has entered, as 'a forerunner' (6:20) into the holy of holies, i.e. the very presence of God, having become men's High Priest after the new eternal Melchizedek order. There is, therefore, every reason and 'strong encouragement' (6:18) for seeking to progress into the full possession of God's promises, and for laying hold of 'the hope set before us', by following Jesus the forerunner into God's very presence.

5:11 – 6:12 An urgent call to go on to spiritual maturity

The truths concerning Christ's Melchizedek priesthood (5:11) require much detailed exposition. They are 'solid food' (5:12, 14), which can be understood or digested only by the spiritually mature. The whole subject, therefore, is difficult to expound to these particular readers because, although they are Christians of long standing, they have become slack and backward in their response to the God-given Word.

5:11 The same Greek word, nōthroi, is translated as both dull and 'sluggish' (6:12). 12 See below on 6:1, 2. In 13, 14 note the detailed contrast between the two types (a child and the mature), their condition (unskilled and faculties trained by practice), and their diet (milk and solid food). Note that ability acquired, through the word of righteousness, to distinguish good from evil is evidence of maturity. Cf. 1 Ki. 3:7–9; Is. 7:16.

6:1, 2 The first principles of God's word (5:12) and the elementary doctrines of Christ (6:1) which provide a foundation are indicated in detail in 6:1, 2. Here are steps which new converts would be expected to take, and essential truths which they would be required to believe. Ablutions; since this word is in the plural and, in Greek, not the usual word for Christian baptism, Jewish ceremonial washings may be meant; cf. 9:13. Indeed, some think that the fundamentals here listed could all be learnt by Jews from the OT. If so, this may be why it was undesirable (v. 1) that those here addressed should treat them as enough. They urgently need to go on from such Jewish foundations to full Christian maturity. This requires deliberate and decisive action. Yet, paradoxically, let us go on is in the Greek a passive verb and means literally 'let us be borne along' (cf. Acts 26:15, 17; 2 Pet. 1:21). 'The thought is not primarily of personal effort, but of personal surrender to an active influence. The power is working; we have only to yield ourselves to it' (B. F. Westcott, The Epistle to the Hebrews, 1950). Cf. Eph. 3:20; Phil. 2:13. So the writer exhorts his readers to respond and in v. 3, speaking for himself not for them, expresses the decision thus to act.

3 There is one necessary and very solemn qualification. Men can so act only if God permits. 4ff. Some actions by the very divine constitution of things are morally impossible. If men share within the visible church in all the blessings of the gospel, if (like those at the Red Sea deliverance, who later perished through unbelief in the wilderness) they have actually been in the company of the people who have experienced the mighty workings of God's Spirit, and so have themselves tasted of its character, and then deliberately turn from it all and reject Christ, it is impossible to begin all over again with them and lay once more the foundation of repentance. As those who have decisively failed, or deliberately refused, to respond to divine grace there is nothing for them but judgment. Cf. 1 Cor. 10:1–5 and especially Lk. 20:13–16. Scripture consistently teaches that the same actions of divine grace, which bring within men's grasp salvation and life, also finally settle the condemnation of those who, after sharing in the revelation, deliberately reject it. Cf. 2 Cor. 2:15, 16. Also, it is impossible in the early stages to distinguish between the wheat and the tares, or between the seed that will wither or be choked and the seed that will bring forth fruit unto life eternal. Cf. 1 Cor. 10:12; 2 Tim. 2:18, 19. Judgment is determined not by the beginning but by the end or fruit (vv. 7, 8). That is why this writer is so concerned that those who have begun to experience the grace of Christ should prove their genuineness by going on to its true end. Cf. 2 Pet. 1:5–11.

Once enlightened (v. 4). The word once suggests a certain absoluteness and finality, indicating something done once for all in such a way that it is of necessity incapable of repetition. It is in contrast to again. Cf. its use in 9:26, 28; 10:2; 12:26, 27. Those so enlightened could never again become as those who had never received the light. 6 Commit apostasy. This is what is here meant by 'falling away' (AV, RV), i.e. a complete rejection and disowning of the faith of Christ. As far as they are concerned (i.e. on their own account, or 'to themselves', AV, RV), such people put Christ out of their lives, or reject His claim to be the Son of God, by an action similar to that of those who got rid of Him by crucifying Him. Thus they publicly hold Christ up to contempt. See also Appendix 3, p. 1219.

9 After such a solemn picture of inevitable doom (v. 8), the writer hastens with real affection (only in this place does he call his readers beloved) to assure his readers that he is convinced that they are in no such hopeless state. (Some therefore regard the type described in vv. 4–8 as hypothetical rather than real.) 10–12 From these verses we learn what is indicative of true spiritual life and needful for full spiritual progress, namely, earnestness, or all-absorbing zeal, not only in works of love (v. 10), in ministering to Christians for God's sake, i.e. because they are His people, but also in realizing the full assurance of hope (v. 11) by holding on to it until the end or the day of its fulfilment; and in exhibiting that kind of patient faith (v. 12) that equally persists until the day of realized possession. Only so can we join the company of those who inherit the promises.

6:13–20 Grounds of confidence to inspire steadfastness

13, 14 God's promises of salvation are the more sure because they are confirmed by an oath by God Himself. This was true from the first. When the promises were made to Abraham, God at the same time swore to fulfil them. 15 Abraham's confidence in God's word enabled him patiently to endure until the promise was fulfilled. 16 The significance of oath-taking one may learn from the common practice of men. Its purpose is to put an end to all doubt or misgiving about a promise and to silence those who would gainsay its certainty. Its veracity and sure fulfilment are therefore confirmed by the most solemn of pledges. This commonly involves swearing by Almighty God. When men thus pledge their word to one another they virtually call upon God Himself to mediate or stand between them as a witness of their promises (cf. Jdg. 11:10; Rom. 1:9) and to watch over their fulfilment (cf. Ru. 1:17). As Someone greater He is able to take vengeance if either party fails to keep his word. This certainty of divine vengeance makes swearing by God final as a way of confirming promises.

17, 18 In order to make men doubly sure of His promise God has condescended to use this method of oath-taking. So he interposed with an oath; He made Himself (since there was none greater to appeal to) a kind of third party or mediator between Himself and men. So we (note the present personal reference) are meant to gain thereby strong encouragement (v. 18); for we have a double ground of confidence, in God the Promiser who gives us His word and in God the Guarantor who confirms it by His oath. There is therefore no possibility of being deceived or disappointed.

19 An anchor provides a peculiarly appropriate illustration. It was a recognized symbol of hope. It suggests a confidence to turn to and to lay hold of, a confidence which will hold fast and never fail because it enters into the unseen depths, the holiest of all, or inner shrine. 20 Also, this line of thought brings back the minds of the readers to Jesus and to His high-priestly office after the order of Melchizedek, the great theme which the writer has already indicated his eagerness to expound (5:10, 11). Jesus offers us new hope because He has entered the innermost sanctuary not only on our behalf but also as a forerunner, opening the way for us to follow Him and thus enabling us to draw near to God. Cf. 7:19 and 10:19. Also, like an anchor, He offers us a sure and an abiding confidence because in the innermost sanctuary of God's presence He abides, or remains enthroned, in contrast to the Levitical high priest who came out and was removed by death. So He is a high priest for ever. It is this eternal quality which distinguishes the Melchizedek order of priesthood from that of Aaron.

7:1–28 THE CHARACTERISTICS AND EFFICACY OF CHRIST'S ETERNAL PRIESTHOOD

The writer has already asserted that Jesus can be, to all who obey Him, 'the source of eternal salvation' because He has become on their behalf 'a high priest after the order of Melchizedek' (see 5:6, 9, 10). It is this new and distinctive priestly office and work of Jesus about which he has 'much to say' (5:11), and which he now sets himself fully to expound. The OT Scriptures themselves both provide and authorize the use of this illustration or pattern, namely, the priesthood of Melchizedek, after whose order the Messiah is by divine oath declared to be a priest for ever (see Gn. 14:17–20; Ps. 110:4). It is the implications of these Scriptures and the significance of this divinely ordained pattern that the writer now expounds. This new order of priesthood implies and involves difference from, superiority over, and the supersession of, the old Levitical order. Also, it makes possible (as the Levitical priesthood failed to do) the realization of the hope of all religion, namely, free access to God and full and complete personal salvation (7:19, 25).

3, 4 (On vv. 1, 2, see below.) The record in Genesis indicates two things about this Melchizedek—his continuance for ever and his greatness. It indicates the first figuratively by its silence, and the second factually by its statements.

This means that in Scripture both what is said and what is omitted are alike important. It is very remarkable that in Genesis nothing is said about Melchizedek's ancestry; for in the OT great importance is attached to genealogies, particularly of priests. Melchizedek is simply presented as a priest in his own right, not by reason of physical descent. Also, his birth and death are not mentioned. He simply appears once in the record as a living figure, and is left to abide alone and for ever in the minds of readers as Melchizedek the priest. Nor is anything said of any successor to him. In all this he is made, by the very silence of Scripture, to resemble the Son of God (note the divine title and contrast v. 22), who appeared once in history, but who has neither beginning of days nor end of life. Jesus is a High Priest after this order, unique and for ever.

Further, the Genesis record makes plain Melchizedek's greatness (v. 4). For no other than Abraham, the patriarch, gave him a tenth or tithe, and selected it from the very best of the spoil. And he did this in the hour of his own victory when he might have claimed to be second to none in the land. 6 Also, Melchizedek actually blessed Abraham which proves that, signally favoured by God as Abraham was, Melchizedek was even greater than he. Similarly, Melchizedek is greater than the Levitical priests. They have only a legal right to take tithes from their equals. Abraham acknowledged that Melchizedek possessed an inherent right to be regarded as his superior. 9 Also, one might even say (i.e. though some may think such reasoning rather unusual), that in what Abraham did Levi his descendant was involved, and so shared in acknowledging the greatness and superiority of Melchizedek. 1, 2 Note that Scripture pictures him as one who is a king as well as a priest. The combination of these two offices was to be a distinguishing characteristic of the Messiah. Cf. 8:1 and Zc. 6:13. Also, the meanings of the Hebrew words suggest that as 'Melchi-zedek' he is King of righteousness, and as King of 'Salem' he is King of peace (v. 2). Note, too, the moral significance of the order here emphasized, first righteousness, and then peace. Cf. 12:11; Is. 32:17; Jas. 3:17, 18.

There is, moreover, independent proof that this Melchizedek priesthood, to which order our Lord belongs, is radically different from, and far superior to, the Levitical priesthood. For there is the scriptural prophecy (Ps. 110:4) that the Messiah is to be a priest divinely appointed according to this Melchizedek order. 11 This scriptural indication of the need for a new order of priesthood clearly implies that the existing Levitical order has failed to achieve its intended end or true perfection. 12 Also, the priesthood was so fundamental to the old covenant between God and His people (the whole relationship was constituted in dependence upon its ministry), that any change in the order of priesthood must of necessity involve a change in the whole constitution; i.e. it implies nothing less than an accompanying new, and indeed 'better covenant' (v. 22).

13, 14 One of the distinctive features of the new order is then noted. Priests of the old order had to be descendants of Levi. But we know, not only from Scripture prophecy but also from the historical facts about Jesus, that He whom (so the writer implies) we confess to be the Messiah has been pleased to become a member of another tribe. For it is public knowledge that Jesus was descended from Judah, a tribe with no claim to the order of priesthood appointed by Moses. Note the striking description of Jesus as our Lord. It corresponds here to the thought of Ps. 110:1, in which David called Him 'my Lord'.

15ff. Further, the ground on which our Lord has made good His right to be Priest makes it still more obvious that there has been a complete change in the law governing the priesthood. Under the old order the necessary qualifications both for being a priest and for performing priestly functions were all physical and external, depending on conformity to law (v. 16). It was a matter of proper ancestry and of physical purity by means of appropriate ritual. Under the new order Christ's necessary qualifications to be Priest and successfully to complete His priestly work are essentially spiritual and internal. They depend on the personal possession of life which cannot be destroyed (v. 16), and on the consequent ability to complete to its finish or full perfection His work of saving men (v. 25). This difference is made unmistakably clear by the description of the new Priest as one who arises in the likeness of Melchizedek (v. 15). The distinctive feature of the Melchizedek priesthood which is now emphasized is that it is for ever (v. 17). The One who is to be a Priest of this order must have life which not only never does end, but never can be brought to an end, i.e. indestructible (v. 16). This is why He is able to do what no Levitical priest could do. He can both bring men to God (v. 19) and save them to the uttermost (v. 25, RV and mg.). For Christ's physical death as Man was no dissolution of His eternal life as God. He entered heaven as the living One and is there alive for ever more. In other words, His indissoluble life made it possible for Him in and through His human death still to act and to enter in, and thus to present Himself to God as the Lamb slain. Also, it makes it certain that in God's presence He now continues alive for evermore.

18, 19 Further, such a solemn introduction by God of a new priest itself sets aside or cancels out the old order and proves that it was only former or 'foregoing' (RV), i.e. temporary and provisional. Indeed, in the light of what Christ has now done, we can see that the old law was completely powerless and useless. Indirectly, therefore, the writer is teaching his Jewish readers as Christians to recognize this and not to be so foolish as to trust any longer in the old Jewish order; for it has been divinely superseded by 'the bringing in thereupon' (v. 19, RV, i.e. on top of it) by God Himself of something better which does do what the old order could not do and gives us full access to God's presence.

20–22 Again, the new priesthood is superior to the old because it has been constituted with an oath of God. This is witness that the new order of priesthood is a divine undertaking, and one that is thus doubly pledged by God's Word and God's oath (cf. 6:13–18). Therefore it cannot fail like the old. Also, being thus divinely instituted, this priesthood is for ever. The day will never come when this Priest will cease to be or His ministry cease to be effective. The divine oath implies something final, eternal, unchangeable. Therefore Jesus, who is thus given to us as the Priest of the new covenant, is to us the Guarantor of a covenant which is clearly far better than the old one. Note that 'draw near' (v. 19) and surety (v. 22) probably come in the Greek from the same root. Jesus is 'the One who ensures permanently near relations with God'.

23–25 Because this Priest continues for ever, His priesthood will never, like the Levitical, pass to someone else by reason of His death (vv. 23, 24). It is a priesthood which death cannot encroach upon. It is 'inviolable' (v. 24, RV mg.), and unsupersedable. No-one will ever draw near to God, looking to Jesus to save, and fail to find Him there, still alive and active to intervene to support their cause. And, because He thus lives for ever to function as Mediator and Priest on behalf of His people, He is able to bring to its final completion the salvation of all who thus draw near to God, trusting in Him. The present tenses of the verbs save and draw near (v. 25) may well suggest a sustained experience resulting from a continuous practice. He is able 'to be saving' those who are 'continually coming', i.e. those who make it a regular habit thus to draw near to God.

26–28 sum up what the writer has been saying. Our Christian High Priest is outstandingly great. Only one as great as this was fitted to meet our need and secure our full salvation. In character, He is towards God holy, towards man blameless, and in Himself unstained. He is free from any pollution which would incapacitate Him for the work of His office. As regards His sphere of operation, He is lifted out from among sinful men by His removal to heaven, and there He is exalted to a position of the highest dignity, at the right hand of God. In contrast to the Levitical priests, He has no need repeatedly to offer sacrifices for sins. If He had, He would have to offer them daily, for His priestly work is going on every day. But all the offering necessary for sins He made once for all when he offered up himself. This is a new thought (although it has already been suggested) which is to be developed later. As one whose life was not dissolved by human dying, He was able, as no other could, to be both Priest and Victim; He offered himself. Similarly, the new covenant is vastly superior to the old. The old was a law which appointed as high priests weak men unable to achieve the true end of priestly ministry. The new order, which has superseded the law, is constituted by an oath of God Himself. It appoints as High Priest One who is divine, a veritable Son of God, and One who by reason of His incarnation, death, resurrection and ascension has become perfectly and permanently competent to discharge His office for ever for all who 'draw near to God through him' (v. 25).

8:1–6 THE EXCELLENCE OF CHRIST'S HIGH-PRIESTLY MINISTRY

The writer now comes to the crowning truth of all that he has to say, namely, that we Christians (in contrast to the Jews of the OT order) have a High Priest of this outstanding kind: One who is Himself the reality, who answers to and fulfils the God-given pattern of priesthood; One whose ministry is therefore fulfilled in the heavenly sphere and not the earthly: One whose work has been consummated in enthronement at the right hand of God; and One who is therefore able to fulfil a more excellent ministry as the mediator of a new and better covenant.

It is important to recognize that because Christ is a minister of the true tent or 'Tabernacle' (v. 2), and has entered for us not into some earthly shrine but into the very presence of God, the whole sphere of His ministry is to be thought of as in heaven (v. 1) and not on earth (v. 4). This explains why He is invisible and not consummating His work, like the Jewish high priest, with elaborate ceremonies in some grand and visible earthly Temple—an important truth for Jewish readers to grasp. The Jewish priests who served on earth belonged to a different order, to which Jesus did not belong (v. 4). Also, the order of their service, while God-given, was only a copy and shadow of the heavenly truth (v. 5). It was Christ's work to fulfil this heavenly truth. This explains also why it was necessary for Him to die. For the pattern shows that he who would approach God as High Priest for men must have something to offer (v. 3). So Christ offered Himself. Cf. 7:27; 9:14; 10:10. This offering was all accomplished and finished in one decisive action. In the Greek the aorist tense of the verb to offer suggests a single finished act, not a continuous activity. Jesus, therefore, is not now offering. Indeed, the fact that His one offering was accepted as eternally sufficient is demonstrated by the fact that He is permanently enthroned in the place of all power (cf. 10:12, 13), and so able fully to save all who draw near to God by Him. It is this heavenly achievement and its successful consummation in enthronement which make Him the effective Mediator of the wonderful new covenant (v. 6). No wonder that the writer describes His ministry as being very different from the Levitical. No wonder that the possession as ours (we have) of such a high priest is called 'the chief point' (v. 1, RV), the mountain peak of revelation and redemption, the crowning truth of all.

Notice carefully the writer's distinction between the heavenly realities and their earthly copy or figurative representation (vv.2, 5; cf. 9:23, 24; 10:1). Because Jesus belonged to the heavenly order and not to that on earth (v. 4) His offering of Himself (though He died as Man on earth) can be properly appreciated only if it is understood as done in relation to the heavenly Tabernacle, and as having its consummation at the throne of God (cf. 1:3; 10:12; 12:2). Compare the way in which Christians, though they still live on earth, are to regard themselves as belonging to heaven (see 3:1; 12:22, 23); and are exhorted, by following Jesus, to pass into the heavens and to come boldly to the throne of grace (see 4:14, 16). Christian worship, like Christ's priestly work, is not 'on earth'.

8:7–13 THE TWO COVENANTS

7 The very presence in the OT of a promise of a new covenant is itself witness that the first covenant was not wholly satisfactory and free from fault. 8ff. This promise (quoted in vv. 8ff.) is found in Je. 31:31–34. What is there said indicates how the first covenant failed because the Israelites failed to abide by its conditions. This covenant, though genuine and good, was deficient in that it provided no guarantee that sinful men would continue in its faithful observance. So God declared His intention to make a new covenant by whose terms or 'better promises' (v. 6) He Himself undertook to make good the deficiency and to ensure the realization of His purpose. This purpose is that a company of people should be separated from the world, and brought into fellowship with Himself to be His people, to delight in His company, and to do His will.

10 God is to secure this end by making His law no longer an external restraint from which men only break away, but an inner constraint. This change is to be effected by putting the Spirit of obedience into men's hearts, so that, like the incarnate Son, they will say, 'I delight to do thy will, O my God; thy law is within my heart' (Ps. 40:8). Such intimacy of personal dealing will give to each individual direct personal knowledge of God. 11 No privileged intermediate class, whether of priests or prophets, will be needed to teach men about God. For all shall know Him directly. Knowing Him and being taught by Him personally in this way are thus to become the distinctive marks of God's true children. Cf. Is. 54:13; Jn. 6:45. 12 And all this will happen because God in His mercy towards them (instead of judgment against them) will so put away their sins (cf. 9:28) that perfect unhindered fellowship between them and Himself will become possible.

The foundation act of divine mercy on which all else is built is therefore the priestly work of putting away sin. The High Priest who does this, and makes it possible for men to draw near to God, thus becomes the one who mediates this new covenant (v. 6). 13 This very promise of a new covenant means that, since the days of Jeremiah, the first covenant has to be recognized as already made old; and this description of anything as getting ancient and becoming aged means that it may be expected soon to pass away. Thus, from their own Jewish OT Scriptures, the writer provides his readers with a further decisive indication that the old covenant was only temporary, and that it was the divine intention that it should be superseded by the new covenant and itself cease to be.

9:1–10 THE MINISTRY OF THE FIRST COVENANT DESCRIBED

1 The first covenant had its divinely appointed regulations for worship and a sanctuary for their performance, an earthly one. 2–5 A Tabernacle was prepared with two sections, each richly and elaborately provided with furniture necessary for the ritual ceremonies, and with symbols of God's presence, of His past dealings with His people, and of His revealed will for their lives. It is impossible here, says the writer, to comment on all these features in detail (v. 5). The important thing on which to concentrate attention is the way in which this order of 'divine service' (v. 1, RV) furthered the one great purpose of its existence, namely, to enable men to draw near to God. 4 Having the golden altar of incense. The wording here (cf. 1 Ki. 6:22) probably means not that it was itself kept in the inner shrine, but rather that it was specially connected with the ministry carried out there on the Day of Atonement. See Ex. 30:1–10; Lv. 16:12, 13, 18–20.

6 These ordinances of the first covenant allowed a select class—the priests—to go continually into the outer tent, the holy place. 7 But into the inner shrine, or holiest sanctuary of all, where the cherubim (v. 5) over the ark symbolized the dwelling-place and manifested glory of God Himself, access was very severely restricted. One man only could enter, the high priest, on one day only each year, and only if he took with him the shed blood of atoning sacrifice. 8 An order of worship so arranged by divine direction was a witness given by the Spirit of God Himself that the way for all God's people to enter freely into the immediate presence of God is not yet opened. Note here the contrast between the divinely ordained splendour of the old order of worship, so dear to the writer's Jewish readers, and its disappointing, spiritual ineffectiveness. It 'made nothing perfect' (7:19, RV). Yet, far from being valueless, it had a deep spiritual significance. For, by providing 'figures of the true' (9:24, RV), it foreshadowed the character, the necessity and the benefits of the 'good things that have (now) come' (v. 11), when Christ, the true High Priest, appeared.

9 The limited and provisional character of the first covenant is still further demonstrated by the very nature of its forms of worship. For the gifts and sacrifices which were ordained by it have no moral power to purge away the defilement of sin and to make those who bring them properly fit to reach the desired goal, i.e. to approach and to enjoy God's presence. 10 All that they can do as regulations for the body is to give those who submit to them a certain external or physical 'purification' (13), a formal or ritual status of ceremonial 'holiness'. They are, therefore, clearly temporary and provisional and meant to serve a purpose only until the time comes for them to be superseded by the realities whose character they foreshadow.

It is these 'good things' (v. 11) which are now made available for all to enjoy through Christ's coming and His high-priestly work. For the very forms which showed symbolically, i.e. in 'figure' (v. 9, AV) or 'parable' (RV), what was necessary to make access possible also showed that as yet the barriers were not removed for all to enter into the sanctuary (v. 8). As long as men were kept at a distance by a veil and an outer shrine placed between them and the holiest of all, clearly they could not enjoy access to God's presence. This meant, therefore, that only by the removal of this existing order, by the rending of the veil, and the doing away with a separate outer shrine, could the people outside have open access to God's presence. The writer is, therefore, suggesting to his Jewish readers that the realization of those hopes to which the first covenant pointed forward must involve the complete abolition of the old order. As he says later of the two kinds of sacrifice (see 10:9), God has abolished the first in order to establish the second—the new and living way into the sanctuary of His presence (see 10:19, 20). The writer has prepared his readers' minds for this extremely radical conclusion by suggesting earlier (8:13) that, since the first covenant has now been made old, it may be expected to disappear.

9:11 – 10:18 THE CHARACTERISTICS OF THE SACRIFICE OF CHRIST

The writer now describes the distinctive characteristics of the sacrifice of Christ and the great eternal benefits which are made ours by it. Following his now familiar method he illustrates and enforces these truths, first by both comparison and contrast with the Levitical forms of service and sacrifice, and then by quotation and exposition of some of the God-given prophetic words of the OT Scriptures.

9:11–15 Its far-reaching consequences

These consequences are briefly summarized. 11 First, by His offering of Himself Christ made a decisive entrance into the presence of God as the High Priest of sinful men. The goal of all priestly ministry is to secure access to, and acceptance in, God's presence; to restore, and to secure the unbroken maintenance of, communion with God. Because Christ has appeared, the good things have come; they are no longer, as they were, still 'to come' (mg., AV, RV).

12–14 Secondly, Christ thus secured eternal redemption. He wrought a work of deliverance which set God's people permanently free from the defilement and doom to which they were otherwise subject because of sin. So His entrance, like His sacrifice (7:27), was once for all, never to be repeated. Thirdly, through His blood-shedding (i.e. by reason of the inexhaustible and abiding virtue of His one sacrifice of Himself) Christ is able to purge the conscience from the paralysing power of guilt and to set men free to serve the living God. For His sacrifice has a moral value and inner efficacy to cleanse not possessed by the ceremonies of the Jewish ritual (vv. 13, 14).

Taking . . . his own blood (v. 12); this is exactly what the Greek does not say (see mg.). 'Through' his own blood means on the ground of His already accomplished sacrificial death. Through the eternal Spirit (v. 14); recognition that as God's servant He was divinely enabled (cf. Is. 42:1); or possibly an indication that, since as God He was eternal or undying Spirit, He was able still to act at the time of His death as Man, and to 'offer Himself'.

15 Fourthly, such achievements mean that He is the mediator (or executor) of a new covenant, i.e. One who personally establishes all whom God calls in the actual possession of the eternal inheritance which He promises. Lastly, this result is the more sure because His death secures release from the penalty of transgressions under the first covenant. It clears the field for a new work of divine grace by fully settling the outstanding issues between God and His people. It blots out all the sins of the past.

9:16–23 Its necessity

Jesus had said of His death, 'It must be so' (Mt. 26:54). But the crucifixion of the Messiah continued to be a stumbling-block to Jews. They needed much help if they were to see why it was necessary. So the writer here stresses two reasons for its necessity. First, it was required in order to dedicate, institute or ratify the new covenant. Solemnly it sanctified or set apart the person making the covenant to the keeping of its terms by thus pledging (and in this case actually performing) obedience unto death. Secondly, it was needed in order to cleanse or purify the people who are covered by the covenant and to secure for them release or remission from the sin which would otherwise estrange them from God. For 'without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness of sins' (v. 22). So a sacrifice of this unique and surprising kind, a better sacrifice than under the law (v. 23), the death of Christ Himself, was necessary to secure a better (moral) purification and to establish the better (and really effective) covenant. Note that men's hearts and consciences which are thus cleansed (v. 14) are called 'the heavenly things themselves' (v. 23).

16, 17 In the references here to the necessity for death to take place in connection with a testament or covenant, two or three different ideas are probably combined. According to ancient practice, covenants were sealed in blood (v. 18) by the symbolic introduction of the death of the party or parties making it. So vv. 16, 17 (see RV mg.) speak of 'death' being 'brought in' and of a covenant having validity only 'over dead bodies', i.e. probably over the divided pieces of the sacrificed victims between which such covenant-makers passed. See Gn. 15:7–21; Je. 34:18, 19. This gave visible confirmation to a vow of faithfulness unto death, and was probably accompanied by the prayer that one's life might be similarly taken in penalty (see, e.g., Ru. 1:17, 'May the Lord do so to me') if the promise thus sealed was broken. Once the transgression of a covenant obligation had been committed, therefore, death became necessary for a second reason, to pay the penalty of such failure. So 22 asserts that under the old law this was the common price of redemption.

Further, since God's new covenant spoke of an inheritance which included the full forgiveness (or forgetting by God) of sins, this could not become available for men to enjoy until an actual death had taken place for the remission of sins, i.e. to redeem them 'from the transgressions under the first covenant' (v. 15). In this connection, therefore, the new covenant operates like a will or testament (in the Greek the word used signifies both 'covenant' and 'testament'). Its good things become available for enjoyment only after the death has taken place of the benefactor who is making the disposition. For He (i.e. Christ) could make forgiveness of our sins possible only by dying and Himself paying the penalty of our sins.

9:24 – 10:18 Its finality

This offering of Himself to God which Christ has made once for all in His human death is also perfect and final. It has achieved in full completion the true end of such sacrifice. Therefore, none greater is possible; and no other is necessary. As Jesus Himself said, 'It is finished' (Jn. 19:30). So 'there is no longer any offering for sin' (10:18).

9:24 By it He entered into heaven itself. His one act achieved what the sacrifices of the law only figuratively suggested. For the Levitical high priest entered only an earthly, man-made shrine. Through His death Christ has won an entrance on our behalf as our High Priest into the immediate presence of God (cf. vv. 11, 12). There He is now openly manifested before the very face of God as our representative, guaranteeing that we shall be accepted and our prayer answered when we come. It is because He is there to support our cause that full salvation is assured to all who come unto God by Him. Cf. 4:14, 16; 7:25; 1 Jn. 2:1, 2.

9:25, 26 He offered Himself. Cf. 7:27; 9:14. This was in contrast to the Levitical high priest who entered the holiest of all with blood not his own. He had no power himself to perform this act as a sacrifice to God; i.e. he could not offer himself. His presentation of the blood of a slain animal before God was an acknowledgment that something was necessary which he not only could not do himself, but also needed to have done on his behalf. Christ doubly excelled him. Not only did He not need any blood not his own shed on His behalf to give Him entrance (for He was sinless); but also He made His decisive appearance on the field of human history to put away the sin of others by the sacrifice of himself. This He was able to do because, as man, He was 'without blemish' (9:14), and as God He could as 'eternal Spirit' (9:14), by the power of His 'indestructible life' (7:16), still Himself act in death and offer the sacrifice of His human life to the Father. So He was both Priest and Victim; He offered Himself to God.

9:25–28 He offered Himself once only and once for all. This is proved by His non-appearance in earlier ages. For, as it is very important to recognize, He offered Himself to God on the field of history by becoming Man and offering His human body to die to bear the sins of many. We are saved by the earthly sacrifice of His flesh and blood. Therefore, had frequent offerings been necessary, similar to the yearly repetitions of the sacrifice of the Day of Atonement, it would have been necessary for Christ to have had many incarnations in order to suffer death many times. Also, if one offering availed only for a limited number, such as the generation then alive, it would 'now' (v. 26, AV, RV) (i.e. in the 1st century AD) be too late to offer sacrifice for the sins of earlier generations; and so it would have been necessary soon after the creation and the Fall of man for a series of incarnations to begin (v. 26). No such series has occurred. This is objective proof that it was not necessary, and clear indication that the one incarnation and death are sufficient and final for all history—past, present and future. Christ's one appearance at the end of the age (v. 26) is all that is necessary to remove completely the sins of the whole world by His one sacrifice of His single human life. As He said Himself, His one soul (or human life) thus given is enough to provide ransom for the many (Mk. 10:45).

Further, this final settlement of eternal destiny by the decisive action of a single life and death in human history corresponds with, and is confirmed by, all that is revealed by God concerning the solemn responsible character and eternal consequences of all human life in this present world. For all men live and die once, and according to the deeds done in that one lifetime their eternal judgment is settled (v. 27; cf. Rev. 20:12, 13). Similarly Christ's single appearance in history, and His one decisive action in atonement for sin, is sufficient to secure eternal redemption and the possession of an eternal inheritance (v. 28). There is no need of repetition. Any idea that either on earth or in heaven He must repeat or continue His offering is completely out of place. The redemption is eternal, and it has been obtained finally and for ever, not by an eternally continuous offering, but by the single decisiveness of one act in history. There is, however, a complementary event which is still future. The Christ who was once offered will appear a second time (v. 28), to complete the salvation of His people, who will, or ought to be, eagerly waiting for him.

9:26b – 10:4 By this sacrifice of Himself He actually put away sin. This was something which it was absolutely impossible for the Levitical sacrifices to do. The purpose and the consequence of His sacrifice of Himself was to bring sin to nought, to cancel it out, to set it on one side (v. 26b, Gk.; the old covenant is similarly 'disannulled'; see 7:18, Gk.). Christ was offered to bear (or 'bear away') the sins of many (v. 28; cf. Is. 53:12). He took the burden upon Himself and removed it. It is, therefore, completely gone. When He appears the second time it will be not to deal with sin, but as One able to complete the salvation of those who have their hopes fixed on Him (v. 28).

In contrast to this substantial reality—the true form of these realities (10:1)—all that the old Jewish law had to offer was a shadow, or representation in outline, of good things (yet) to come. Its sacrifices, yearly repeated, had no power to effect a permanent benefit for those who thus drew nigh to God. Rather their continued repetition was first a witness of their own ineffectiveness to complete the work of cleansing, and second a witness to the fact that those who thus used them did not gain from their use any real deliverance from a sense of guilt (10:1, 2). For such animal sacrifices can never take away sins (v. 4). What they cannot do, Christ has actually done.

10:5–10 His offering fulfilled the will of God with regard to sacrifice. It was thus that He effected the sanctification of God's people. For His offering of Himself was the reality of which the sacrifices of the law were but a shadow. Because of the ineffectiveness of those sacrifices, there was an important sense (to which the OT Scriptures gave expression: see Ps. 40:6–8, quoted here), in which God was not satisfied with them and did not desire them. In their place they served a purpose. But the same Scriptures, which spoke of God's lack of pleasure in them, also indicated that ultimately God contemplated a better sacrifice (vv. 6–9). His will with regard to sacrifice would be fulfilled when a person, in the full freedom of personal moral choice and qualified so to act, would devote himself and his human life to doing God's will by offering his own body. Also, the prophetic Scripture teaches that this is what the Christ of God will choose to do and come to do (v. 7) in fulfilment of the pattern, and in obedience to the principles, set forth in Holy Scripture. For He will recognize that what is there written concerns Him and the God-given work which He is to do.

Further, the way in which the disowning of animal sacrifices and the promise of a person to come to do God's will precede and follow one another in the same Psalm (40:6–8) plainly indicates that it is God's purpose that the second should take the place of the first (vv. 8, 9). For the writer's first readers this meant again that, as Jews, they must recognize that, in fulfilment of the will of God, the Levitical order was now 'abolished' and openly superseded by God's own establishment of a new order in which is to be found the full and final realization of all towards which the older order pointed. For, by Christ's one offering of His human body (v. 10), the people of God are eternally made fit for God's presence and consecrated to His service.

10:11–14 In consequence of His one finished sacrifice Christ sits enthroned and assured of complete victory. There is a striking contrast between Christ's present position and prospect and that of the Levitical priests. They continue to stand in order to continue offering their repeated sacrifices, but with no hope that they will ever take away sins (v. 11). Christ is already seated, a sign that His work of offering is finished (v. 12). What is more, He is enthroned in the place of sovereignty and power at God's right hand with the sure hope, based on the Father's own word to Him (see Ps. 110:1; Heb. 1:13), that all His enemies are to be subdued beneath His feet (v. 13). All this has come about through His single offering (v. 14) which is eternal in its efficacy. By it he has perfected for all time those who are sanctified, i.e. He has secured the permanent continuance in right relation to God (perfected) of all whom it serves to cleanse from sin and to dedicate as God's people (sanctified).

10:15–18 There is no further need or place for any more offering for sin. Such a conclusion is here based on the witness to us of the Holy Spirit given in the words of a prophecy which declares the blessings of the new covenant (see Je. 31:31–34). For its crowning promise is the declaration by God Himself that, once the new covenant is ratified, He will remember the sins of His people no more (v. 17). And if sins are so completely remitted that God Himself ceases to remember them, there is obviously no need or place for any further offering to be made to secure their removal. This, then, is the conclusive proof from God's own new covenant promise that Christ's redemptive act which has established the new covenant is in itself all-sufficient and absolutely final. Henceforth there is no longer any place for any kind of offering for sin or presentation before God of Christ's one sin-offering (v. 18). Reconciliation has not to be made or completed by any further propitiatory offering or memorial of Christ's sacrifice; it has simply to be received by penitent faith as an already complete and available benefit of the finished work of Christ (see Rom. 5:11).

10:19–39 PRACTICAL EXHORTATION

10:19–25 A call to steadfastness in faith, hope and love

These verses summarize the positive appeal of the whole Epistle. It is based (note the therefore of v. 19) on the doctrinal teaching already given about the absolute efficacy of Christ's one sacrifice and His abiding continuance in the place of sovereign ability as our High Priest. It is a call first of all to enter into the realized presence of God in confident, appropriating faith (v. 22). Here the writer reinforces an appeal already made in 4:14–16, when he introduced these themes. This is complemented by exhortations to be steadfast in the open confession of Christian hope (v. 23) and to be active towards fellow-Christians in love, fellowship and mutual encouragement (v. 24). This brief, threefold exhortation is virtually expanded in the remainder of the Epistle. Chs. 11, 12 and 13 emphasize in turn the same three themes, the expression of faith, the patience of hope, and love and good works.

19, 20 The new possibility open to all Christians is that of free access to God's presence. There is a way which has been inaugurated for us by Jesus, the forerunner. This way is new, i.e. it did not exist under the old covenant, and it is living or effective. (Cf. Jn. 14:6, where the meaning probably is 'I am the true and living way'.) The curtain or 'veil' through which Jesus opened up this way was His human flesh. For when it was broken in sacrificial death the symbolic Temple veil was rent asunder. See Mt. 27:51–53; Col. 1:20–22. So we can have joyous confidence or 'boldness' (AV, RV) to enter God's presence through the blood (i.e. the death, or accomplished and effectual sacrifice) of Jesus. Note it does not say 'with the blood of Jesus'. Christians have no longer to seek to win entrance by a fresh presentation of the sacrifice. The way stands open and unbarred. 21 Further, as we thus enter God's dwelling-place and join the company of His family (the house, or household, of God), we find we have the same Jesus as our enthroned and ever-living priest, great in this ability to support our case and meet all our need (cf. 7:25). 22 What is required of all who thus come is sincerity of purpose (a true heart) and absolute confidence (full assurance of faith) that what Christ has done avails to make ours that full purification both within and without which was symbolized under the old ritual forms by sprinkled blood and freshly washed bodies (see, e.g., Lv. 8:6, 23). 23 In the face of temptations to abandon their confidence because some promises remained unfulfilled, the writer appeals for a steadfast persistence in openly confessing their Christian hope; for they have the sure guarantee of the faithfulness of the Promiser. 24 There should also be among Christians mutual 'provocation' (Gk.; see AV, RV: a striking word because commonly used with a bad sense) to active good works by deliberately taking notice of each other's needs. The Greek here says 'consider one another' (so AV, RV). 25 They should not, therefore, copy the custom of some and cease attendance at Christian meetings, but rather use such opportunities for mutual encouragement, and the more so in the light of the approaching consummation and judgment of the Day that is coming.

10:26–31 The consequences of deliberate rebellion

The writer sees for those in the position occupied by himself and his readers only two possibilities: either to make full response, or to become deliberate rebels. Having exhorted his readers fully to respond (vv. 19–25) he now considers, at least hypothetically (this may be the force of if we), the only alternative. Suppose that, persistently and by deliberate choice, we completely turn aside from what has been brought within our knowledge and our reach; what else remains for us to enjoy?

The solemn answer is, first, that there is no second, alternative way of atonement for sin (v. 26), and, second, that nothing awaits us but the terrifying prospect of judgment as objects of that divine wrath which is to be displayed against all who oppose God (v. 27). For even under the old covenant (see Dt. 17:2–7) a man who completely set its demands on one side in active rebellion (e.g. idolatry) suffered the extreme penalty of death without mercy (v. 28). Does it not commend itself as fitting, even to our judgment, that an apostate from the new covenant (i.e. an 'enlightened' (v. 32) person who deliberately renounces and opposes the Christian faith), ought to suffer a much worse penalty (v. 29)? For consider the gravity of his offence. He has trampled down the person of Him who is, and has been confessed as, the Son of God. He has denied sacred significance to that blood which had been to him the covenant seal of his own sanctification. He has treated with proud insolence that Spirit who is Himself the author of the whole work of grace in the experience of which he had shared. Do not God's spoken words (i.e. in Scripture) make plain, also, His character as a God who executes judgment, and who will certainly show by His judgments who are His people and who are the traitors and rebels against Him (v. 30)? Can any prospect be more terrifying than thus to have this God against one in judgment (v. 31)? See also Appendix 3, p. 1219.

26 Sin must mean here apostasy or rebellion (cf. Is. 1:2, 29, 30; Heb. 3:12, 13; 2 Pet. 2:21). The present tense indicates sustained persistence; the emphatic adverb, put first in the Greek, stresses that it is done deliberately. There no longer remains a sacrifice for sins; not only because the one final sacrifice has been rejected, but also because such sin is unforgivable; there is no divine provision for its remission. 30 The Lord will judge his people. The OT idea is that God will execute judgment for or on behalf of His people. The meaning here is that He will vindicate the true by removing the false. Cf. Nu. 16, especially v. 5.

10:32–39 An encouragement to steadfast persistence

Having contemplated the worst, the writer now finds ground to expect and appeal for the best. If his readers are tempted to abandon Christianity because it involves them in suffering and reproach rather than fulfilment of their natural hopes, let them find inspiration to continue first in looking back, and then in looking forward. Let them remember from their own early experience as Christians that public exposure to reproach and trial has been, from the first, the lot of those who share this enlightenment.

It is therefore no new and unexpected development. At that time their own attitude in the face of such trials showed that they fully realized that these were experiences in which, as Christians, they were called to share, and that any physical pain or material loss could be accepted with joy when compared with their heavenly and eternal gain (vv. 32–34; cf. 2 Cor. 4:16–18). Let them also look forward and realize that their joyous Christian confidence has not been misplaced. It holds sure promise of a full reward and ought by no means to be abandoned (v. 35). They must realize, however, that in the will of God there is a period of waiting and working and trial before the promised fulfilment can be enjoyed (v. 36). This fulfilment will be very soon. It will be consummated by the appearance of the Coming One (v. 37). His advent is certain; nor will He be behind His time. For those who know these things there are only two possible attitudes: to find acceptance with God and life by holding on in faith; or to withdraw one's confidence and come under God's displeasure (v. 38). For us, says this writer, the latter alternative is unthinkable. We are not (v. 39) the sort to depart from the faith to our own destruction; we are the kind who go on believing until we reach the goal of gaining our souls, i.e. enjoying full salvation. (Keep their souls (v. 39): RV mg. 'the gaining of the soul'. Cf. Lk. 21:19, AV, RV, RSV, NEB: cf. also Jn. 12:25.)

37, 38 The writer does not claim to be specifically quoting Scripture; but there is obviously a free use of OT phrases. A little while is probably an echo of Is. 26:20. The other sentences are from Hab. 2:3, 4. There, according to the Hebrew and the OT translation, what is coming is either the vision or the advent of God thus visualized. The LXX makes the subject a person. This personal reference is made still more definite here by the addition in Greek of the definite article to the participle. Hence the coming one, a Messianic title (cf. Mt. 11:2). In using the statements of Hab. 2:4 the writer not only follows the LXX, which is a statement very different from the Hebrew, but also he transposes the two sentences. Also, here the subject of both statements is the same person, suggesting that the true believer may apostatize. The second statement is, however, only hypothetical. The resulting couplet states the plain alternatives: to live by faith, to perish by apostasy. Just as before God there is justification and life by faith, so, if a believer deliberately withdraws from the faith attitude, he can only encounter divine displeasure and perdition. 39 No wonder the writer adds that neither he nor they can have any intention of committing such spiritual suicide.

11:1–40 THE TRIUMPHANT ACHIEVEMENTS OF FAITH

In 10:38, 39 the writer has enunciated the scriptural principle of faith as a way of life pleasing to God and has expressed the resolution to persist in it until the full possession of its reward is received. He now enforces this by many scriptural illustrations, showing that, from the very beginning and throughout all subsequent history, faith has been in God's sight the one indispensable condition of worth-while achievement and hopeful endurance.

Faith, he declares, deals essentially with things of two types, things future (or 'hoped for') and things 'not seen' (v. 1). It is equally sure of the coming fulfilment of the one and of the present reality of the other. Without such an active attitude of awareness and assurance towards God 'it is impossible to please him' (v. 6), or indeed to have personal dealings with Him (i.e. to 'draw near to God'). For the very being of God Himself is the supreme unseen reality with which faith has to do; and His faithful fulfilment of His promises (cf. v. 11) and His certain rewarding of those who seek Him (v. 6) are the great future good for which faith hopes. The one requires 'conviction' (Gk. elenchos), i.e. 'proving' (RV) or certification; the other requires 'assurance', or 'substance' (AV, NEB, Gk. hypostasis, of which a possible meaning is 'title deed'), i.e. the faith of assured confidence and settled expectation (v. 1). It is because they manifested a faith of this sort (v. 2, see AV, RV) that those who have gone before have had their deeds and sufferings approved by God as worthy to be recorded in Scripture. It was by their faith that they joined the company of God's witnesses (12:1) or 'martyrs' (Gk.). For God witnessed of them (vv. 2, 4, 5); and they thus still witness for Him. The activity of such a faith as theirs afforded something to be recorded which has an abiding message for men; it continues to provide encouragement and examples for others. Such witness, therefore, outlives the individual who gives it; and through the record of his doings his faith still speaks to others after he is dead (v. 4).

The many witnesses of the OT record are then surveyed in chronological order and in some detail. Throughout there is emphasis on their conviction concerning the unseen divine realities and on their assurance of the coming divine fulfilments, both in striking contrast to the visible appearance and immediate natural outlook, which seemed often completely to contradict their confidence (vv. 9, 11, 17, 18). The one sure and all-sufficient certainty was, and is, the living God and His faithful doing. So, for instance, Moses 'endured as seeing him who is invisible' (v. 27); he counted earthly suffering and reproach preferable to worldly enjoyment and wealth, because he looked for God's sure payment of worth-while reward (vv. 25, 26). The common experience of all these pilgrims was to see from a distance promised rewards, which they never enjoyed in this life (v. 13). Yet they never withdrew and turned back to the world which they had left behind, because they believed in a fulfilment that was heavenly rather than earthly (vv. 14–16). These are the people whom God owns as His, condescending to be called their God.

The final emphasis is upon rewards beyond this life. True, many reached faith's goal here in open triumph (vv. 29–35a), and such victories have been of all kinds—material, moral and spiritual. Yet faith's most outstanding witnesses are the martyrs (vv. 35b–38), those who, for faith's sake, have endured great suffering, those who have died painful and shameful deaths rather than deny their faith. In them faith has shown itself victorious in indomitable endurance, in refusal to accept deliverance. Their reward, which they thus chose, lies beyond death in 'a better resurrection' (v. 35, AV, RV, i.e. better than restoration to life in this world such as was granted to the sons of the women of Zarephath and Shunem). Indeed none of these old heroes of faith, worthy as they are of their place in Scripture, ever enjoyed the complete fulfilment of God's promises, because God in His providence ordained that we Christian believers should enjoy even greater privileges and share with them in the consummation (vv. 39, 40).

1 The order of the words in Greek puts the emphasis on the objects of faith, i.e. the things hoped for and things not seen; and the inclusion of a noun (Gk. pragmata) in the second phrase, making explicit that these unseen things are realities, is itself a proof or 'evidence' (AV) of their existence. 3 Such faith is a primary condition of knowledge, particularly knowledge of the scriptural witness. It is essential to the understanding of the origin of the universe as described in Gn. 1. It is the foundation of all right thinking about those 'worlds' or 'ages' which form the stage and setting of human history. For it is impossible to provide an adequate explanation simply by reasoning from what can be observed by the senses. One needs to recognize the prior and independent existence of the living God and His creative activity as the first cause. With the phrase by the word of God, cf. 'And God said' used ten times in Gn. 1; cf. also Ps. 33:6. 4 It was the faith in which he offered it that made Abel's sacrifice better than Cain's. He made a more appropriate response to the truth about God of which he was aware. It was because of his faith, thus expressed by what he gave, that he was reckoned righteous. It is through his faith that he still speaks (i.e. through the pages of Scripture; note the present tense, is still speaking) witnessing to men how to please God. Note that which refers back to faith.

5 Enoch witnesses that faith, active in a man's heart in this life, so pleases God that He gives finally to the true believer escape from death and a fuller enjoyment of His own presence and glory. 6 Such examples are sufficient to justify the generalization of v. 6, 'Without faith it is impossible to be well-pleasing unto God' (RV). For how can a man have dealings with One who is unseen, and whose chief rewards lie beyond this present life, unless he believes both that God exists and that, whenever a man thus sets himself wholeheartedly to draw near to God, God never fails to become his rewarder or payer-back of recompense (cf. Jas. 4:8a)?

7 Noah is a peculiarly significant example for those privileged to hear the gospel. Out of reverence for a word from God, which spoke of impending judgment and indicated a way of salvation, he acted in obedience to the divine command, because he believed that what God said would be fulfilled. By such faith he not only himself inherited that righteousness which is God's gift to believers (note the implication that this is a thought familiar to the readers of the Epistle; cf. Rom. 1:17); he was also used as God's witness and worker to the condemnation of his generation and the salvation of others of his family.

8 Abraham obeyed the divine call to go forth to possess an inheritance, though he did not know to what land he was going, still less what it was like. His faith was in a marked way a conviction concerning the unseen and a guarantee of something to be enjoyed in the future (cf. v. 1). 9 When he actually entered the land of divine promise it was to reside in it only as an outsider living in a land belonging to others. He learnt also to make his home in tents, as a man always on the move. His son and grandson entered into the heritage of the same divine promise, but no more saw its actual fulfilment than he. Yet this experience did not cause him to give up believing. 10 Rather he looked for a supernatural fulfilment, an abiding city, built according to the design (note RV mg. 'architect') and by the working of God (cf. 12:22; 13:14). 11 The triumph of faith in Sarah's experience was the more remarkable not only because she had been long barren (Gn. 11:30), but still more because any such fulfilment was no longer normally to be expected at the time of life she had now reached. Her faith rested on God's word of promise and on His active faithfulness in fulfilling His Word (cf. Rom. 4:20, 21). 12 The one man from whom such a vast progeny sprang was Abraham; see Gn. 15:5; Is. 51:1, 2; Ezk. 33:24.

13–16 This experience of deferred fulfilment in the lives of the patriarchs enabled them eventually to triumph by faith over death itself.

For they learned to look beyond death for a larger fulfilment than that which their own lifetime and earthly experience could afford. So they came to realize that this life is not an end in itself but a pilgrimage (see Gn. 23:4; 47:9) towards a better (i.e. a heavenly) goal beyond it. It is such people with whom God has condescended openly to associate Himself and to be known as their God (v. 16); cf. Mk. 12:26, 27, and note the similar reference there to life beyond death.

17, 18 Abraham's faith was tried in the demand to offer up Isaac not only because he was peculiarly beloved as Sarah's only child (his only son), but most of all because the demand seemed to oppose the fulfilment in Isaac of the God-given promise which Abraham had already embraced, i.e. that through him Abraham's family was to be continued and multiplied. Abraham's faith triumphed because he refused to see inconsistency or faithlessness in God. He believed God could and must resolve the problem. No solution seemed possible unless God gave Isaac back from death to become the father of children. 19 This Abraham therefore reckoned as fully possible with God; his faith thus triumphing in a fresh way over death by the hope of resurrection. Such faith turned a way of darkness into a pathway of hope. Figuratively speaking, RV 'in a parable', may mean 'as it were' or it may suggest 'for a lesson', i.e. one from which Abraham learnt the kind of working to expect from God as His way of solving life's darkest problems (cf. Rom. 4:17). Some think the reference is to such a lesson already learnt from the manner of Isaac's birth (cf. v. 12).

20 Isaac expressed his faith in God's sovereign providence by accepting, contrary to his own natural preference and intention, that Jacob should come before Esau in blessing (cf. Gn. 27:33), and in anticipating blessings of the future for their descendants. 21, 22 Similarly Jacob and Joseph looked beyond their own deaths and anticipated the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt and their return to Canaan (cf. Gn. 48:21; 50:24). Jacob gave to Joseph instead of to Reuben the privilege of the firstborn, i.e. a double share, divided between his two sons. Jacob also showed his awareness of the reality and sovereignty of God by the way in which, in spite of his age and infirmity, he bowed or prostrated himself in worship on his staff (LXX) or bed (Heb.) (Gn. 47:31). Joseph, like Jacob, out of regard for God's sure purpose, was concerned ultimately to be buried not amid the wealth of Egypt but in the land of divine promise. See Ex. 13:19; Jos. 24:32.

23 Moses' parents apparently saw something in their child which made them sure that it was God's purpose to preserve and use him. So, instead of killing the child through fear of Pharaoh and his order, they saved him through faith in God and His co-operating providence. 24, 25 What Moses refused to enjoy was the princely status of a son of a daughter of the royal house. He did this because he deliberately preferred publicly to be known as one of the Hebrews, who were to his faith not a race of slaves but the people of God, i.e. a people with a divinely ordained destiny. Inevitably this meant choosing to share their hardships rather than, at the cost of apostasy from the God of the Hebrews, to enjoy the immediate but short-lived comfort and luxury of the Egyptian court. Note here the significance for the original readers of the word sin (cf. 10:26) and of Moses' choice to suffer rather than commit it. 26 So, having regard to the ultimate reward it would bring at God's hand, he reckoned that to suffer abuse in such a cause would be a greater personal enrichment than all the Egyptians' wealth so obviously within his grasp. Such reproach is 'the reproach of the Christ' (AV, RV and mg.; cf. 13:13) because it is the typical lot in the world primarily of the Lord's anointed or Messiah (Ps. 89:50, 51; Rom. 15:3), but also and inevitably of all associated with Him as God's elect people (cf. 1 Pet. 4:12–16). 27 Not being afraid of the anger of the king. Ex. 2:14 seems to contradict this; but the two are not irreconcilable. For, although Moses felt natural alarm and the need for flight, his spiritual awareness of God and of His purposes both for the Israelites and for Moses' own life made him sure that Pharaoh's enmity would not be allowed to prevail. Also, while the words he left Egypt may refer to Moses' flight to Midian, it is more likely that they refer to the Exodus, an event calculated in a much bigger way to provoke Pharaoh's anger. Note that the two reasons why Moses chose as he did, and persisted in his choice, were his awareness of the unseen One (v. 27), and his confident expectation of future reward (v. 26).

28 Moses' faith helped the whole people to respond to God's words of warning and promise (note RV mg. rendering). Inspired by his leadership, they believed beforehand in the certainty of an impending divine judgment upon the firstborn, and in the sufficient shelter from such judgment afforded by the one divinely appointed provision, 'the sprinkling of the blood' (RV). It was thus in judgment and salvation that the Lord showed who were His (cf. Ex. 8:22). 29 The Red Sea presented a naturally impassable barrier. It was impossible first to conceive and then to avail themselves of a way through except by faith. The attempt by the Egyptian forces simply to 'try it out', without any confidence of faith in God's control, resulted only in their being overwhelmed (see RV).

30 The manner of Jericho's capture is another striking example of that obedience and endurance of faith, to the practice of which the writer wished to exhort his readers. The Israelites acted throughout in confidence in the unseen, and they held on till God's time was fulfilled (for seven days) in the sure expectation of His certain action; nor were they disappointed. 31 Rahab acted as she did because she recognized the power of the God of Israel (i.e. things unseen) and the certain coming victory of His people (i.e. things future). See Jos. 2:8–13. Her response is significant because as a woman, a Gentile and an open sinner she joined the company of those who were saved by faith. By contrast the other inhabitants of Jericho are described as disobedient, i.e. actively unbelieving.

32–34 Forced to summarize, the writer now limits himself to a selection of typical names and a list of characteristic and outstanding achievements. Among the latter there seem to be obvious references to Daniel (viz. stopped the mouths of lions; cf. Dn. 6:22, 23) and to the three who were cast into the fiery furnace (viz. quenched raging fire; cf. Dn. 3:25–28). But while many deeds which fit the other phrases used can be found in the OT, it seems possible that this and the subsequent survey (vv. 35–38) also include some intended references to the doings of faithful Jews in the centuries between the Testaments, particularly in Maccabean times.

The supreme achievement of faith is victory over death in resurrection. 35–38 Some experienced this reward in this life (v. 35); their dead were restored to them (see 1 Ki. 17:17–24; 2 Ki. 4:17–37). (Note that in Scripture the recorded raisings from the dead are mostly for women; cf. Lk. 7:11–17; Jn. 11:1–46.) Others had the faith to hold on in unconquered but outwardly unrewarded endurance, through imprisonment and torture, and as fugitives and exiles (vv. 35–38). They accepted no earthly deliverance because it would have been enjoyed only at the price of denying their faith. Their reward lies in 'a better (i.e. a heavenly) resurrection' in the life beyond (v. 35). Of whom the world was not worthy (v. 38). This is the actual but paradoxical truth. The world of their day treated them as not worthy to live in it; actually the world was not worthy of such men. It is for such that God has 'prepared a city' (v. 16). 39 The goal towards which all these heroes of faith were moving in confident hope was one which they never reached. 40 For God in His providence had reserved for us (i.e. Christian believers) the crowning blessing and had ordained that they should not enjoy the consummation until we had been brought in to share it. Note the implication that the men of faith of OT and NT times alike are all called to belong to the one company of God's purpose who are to be made perfect together (cf. 12:22–24).

12:1–29 PERSONAL APPLICATION: A CALL TO SERVE GOD ACCEPTABLY

This exhortation is based first on the supreme example and complete sufficiency of Jesus Himself as the pioneer and perfecter of our faith (vv. 1–3); secondly, on the positive purpose and profit of trials under the providence of a loving heavenly Father (vv. 4–11); thirdly, on the dangers of the greater (and even fatal) failure to which the slack and careless expose themselves (vv. 12–17); fourthly, on the amazing privileges of grace to be enjoyed under the new covenant compared with the experiences of those who first participated in the old covenant (vv. 18–24); and finally on the impending and inescapable consummation of God's dealings with men (vv. 25–29).

12:1–3 The supreme example of Jesus Christ

Having surveyed the achievements of the past heroes of faith, the writer confronts his readers with the inspiration and challenge of their example (v. 1); let them face their contest with similar concentration and endurance. Above all, he exhorts them to find encouragement to face reproach and persecution by deliberately filling their minds with thoughts of Jesus and His triumphant achievement (vv. 2, 3). Let them fortify themselves against despondency and collapse by recalling what He endured and by recognizing that, in the face of the extreme shame and suffering of crucifixion, He had regard for the joy of the heavenly reward which He now permanently enjoys as One who is enthroned at God's right hand. Also, the manner and success of His achievement not only make possible our pursuit of the same pathway of faith, but also guarantee that He will enable us to complete what He enables us to begin. In this way, therefore, He is both the initiator and consummator, 'author and finisher' (v. 2, AV), of our faith. Cf. 2:10; 5:8, 9; 7:25.

1 A cloud of witnesses. While the idea of an encompassing crowd of spectators may be included (see 1 Tim. 6:12), the primary reference is to their testimony. They are God's witnesses to us, who encourage us by their example. Sin (vv. 1, 4), in the mind of this writer, seems often to be an act of apostasy. Here the temptation is to give up the race altogether, one which is constantly put in their way, and so needing decisive rejection and unflinching resistance (cf. 3:12–14; 10:26, 38; 11:25). Perseverance; or 'endurance'. Note the recurrence of 'endure' (vv. 2, 3, 7). 2 Jesus. Note the significance of the unqualified human name (cf. 2:9; 6:20; 7:22; 12:24; 13:12); He is One who has Himself sustained the conflict. 3 The hostility (RV 'gainsaying') from sinners means nothing less than the rejection of His claims in defiant rebellion. Cf. 'sets himself against (AV, RV, more literally 'speaketh against') Caesar' (Jn. 19:12).

12:4–11 The purpose of suffering

They need to remember, he says, that their sufferings are so far light compared with those of Jesus; faithfulness has not yet cost any of them his life (v. 4). What is more, they have forgotten the teaching of Scripture which makes plain that, as a loving Father, God uses the trials which men have to endure in their earthly experience, for their spiritual discipline and education as His children (v. 5). The very experience of such trials is, therefore, practical proof that God is dealing with them as sons (vv. 6, 7); it is those who are without such experiences who may well question their status in God's family (v. 8). Admittedly such experiences are at the time unpleasant (v. 11). It is important, therefore, to recognize the unseen hand that controls them, and to submit in reverence to a spiritual or heavenly Father's pleasure, as children often do in their way to their earthly parents (v. 9). It is equally important to recognize God's purpose in these trials, and the consequent profit that, in the end, they will unquestionably gain from them. This divinely intended fruit is nothing less than the increase in the life of practical righteousness and godliness (v. 10), i.e. 'that we may share his holiness'. Such results ensue in the experience only of 'those who have been trained by it' (v. 11), i.e. those who in responsive and persistent faith are prepared to submit to the unseen God, and actively to co-operate in letting the discipline do its work in the hope of worth-while benefit.

5ff. The discipline; the Greek word paideia means 'education', the training of a child, with particular reference here (as in Pr. 3:11, 12) to discipline and reproof. Note how the OT is quoted as of practical relevance to our present experiences as Christians. 7 It is for discipline that you have to endure. This indicates why God allows trials to befall men and makes men endure them—in order to further their education as His children. 9 The Father of spirits; a reference to God as the Creator of the human spirit; contrast 'fathers of our flesh' (AV, RV). The verse implies that beings thus created can know true life only by submission to God's control. 10 For a short time. Discipline by human parents has its limits. It is administered only during childhood; it depends upon men's uncertain judgment or mood. Divine discipline is infinitely superior; it is always imposed in men's interest and aims to make them sharers in the very holiness of God Himself.

12:12–17 Grave danger to be avoided

They ought, therefore, to throw off despondency and face life as Christians with courage and confidence (v. 12). For if they do not thus help one another to go forward the imminent danger is that some who are halting in their response will completely abandon the way of faith (v. 13). Let them therefore seek in their fellowship to promote true holiness as well as peace with one another (v. 14). Let them all be on the watch lest any one of their number should not only himself turn aside from God's way of salvation by grace, but also be allowed in their midst to become a perverting influence injuring the whole community (v. 15). For this kind of failure needs to be recognized as nothing less than spiritual profanity and apostasy. It means acting like Esau and vilely giving up one's God-given inheritance for some trifling material gain (v. 16). Still worse, Esau's history shows that, once a God-given inheritance has been thus deliberately rejected, there can be no further opportunity of regaining it. A man who acts in such a way stands permanently condemned (v. 17).

12–15 The full significance of vv. 12, 13 is best appreciated by comparing Is. 35:3; Pr. 4:25–27; 1 Ki. 18:21. The whole community is exhorted to advance, to walk in an even, or straightforward, path and to avoid inconsistencies in order to help the halting to make headway (cf. Rom. 15:1, 2). The lame were possibly those halting between Christianity and Judaism. The danger was lest they should completely abandon faith in Christ, an action described in v. 15 as 'falling back from' (RV mg.) or failing to obtain the grace of God. The description in v. 13 is figurative. It stresses that unless those limping find healing, they may soon become completely disabled, and unable to make any further progress. See to it that no one fail (v. 15). The Greek verb here means 'exercising oversight' or acting as 'bishops'. But the reference is to the whole community, not to special ministers. In the Christian congregation the many should care for and deal with the one. Cf. 3:12, 13; 4:1 (RV); Gal. 6:1, 2. That no root of bitterness . . . trouble you (v. 15). Cf. Dt. 29:18, where similar phraseology is used to describe the man who turns from the Lord to serve other gods, i.e. the apostate. Note also that such a person can bring defilement on the whole congregation. Cf. the story of Achan; see Jos. 6:18; 7:25. 16, 17 Esau's folly ended in despair (cf. Judas); it was impossible to alter what he had done. He had made the decisive choice which settled his destiny. Also, his profanity, or lack of reverence for the things of God, was such that he was incapable of true repentance. He wept for what he had lost (the blessing), not for the sin he had committed.

12:18–24 The privileges of the old and new covenants contrasted

As Christians they have entered under the new covenant into the enjoyment of things very different from those experienced under the old covenant by those who came out of Egypt. Those things were earthly, visible, terrifying and forbidding; these are heavenly, unseen, all-glorious and all-gracious. In the wilderness the Israelites stood in the presence of a tangible mountain and actual burning fire. The place was overshadowed by clouds and intense darkness and the violence of storm (v. 18). They heard a trumpet sound and a voice speaking words (v. 19). The whole experience was so terrifying that the people asked that it might cease (Ex. 20:18, 19). Since even an animal, venturing too near, had to be stoned for sacrilege, they feared for their lives (v. 20; see Ex. 19:12, 13; Dt. 5:25). Even Moses himself was overwhelmed with fright (v. 21). How different is the experience of drawing nigh to God in which, as Christians, they are called to share! They come to the unseen heavenly realities, which correspond to and actually fulfil the mere earthly types. They come to the true mountain and city of God, where God actually dwells; to hosts of angels in festal array (v. 22); to the church of the privileged with the heavenly inheritance; to the one all-sovereign God as their Vindicator; to the spirits of the righteous (i.e. either OT saints or all the faithful departed), whose bliss is consummated (v. 23); to Jesus the Mediator of this recently established (Gk. nea, not kainē, as is usual) covenant; and to the blood of sprinkling which speaks of remission of sins in contrast to Abel's blood which cried out for vengeance (Gn. 4:10), and so (in contrast to the voice at Sinai) offering them welcome and assured peace (v. 24).

In the Greek none of the terms used in the two descriptive lists given in these verses is preceded by the definite article. The writer is simply describing general distinctive characteristics of the two covenants. 18 The word 'mount' does not occur in the best Greek MSS. The primary stress is on the whole character of the revelation at Sinai as something tangible (cf. 1 Jn. 1:1), rather than on its particular locality on a mountain. On the other hand, since there is an obvious opening contrast between Mt. Sinai and Mt. Zion, the insertion of 'mount' is appropriate and not misleading.

22 Innumerable angels. The description 'tens of thousands' or 'myriads' (Gk.) is commonly used of angels (cf. Dt. 33:2; Dn. 7:10). In festal gathering. This is in contrast to their terrifying manifestation on Sinai. 23 The assembly; Greek ekklēsia, so 'church', AV, RV. The first-born expresses the idea of privilege and heirship, blessings such as those which Esau despised (v. 16). In Egypt, and subsequently in Israel, the firstborn were redeemed by blood (Ex. 12:12, 13; 13:2, 13, 15). In Greek the word is in the plural, i.e. 'firstborns'; it describes all who belong to the church. They are the company who have peculiar rights in the heavenly Jerusalem and whose names are, therefore, enrolled in the register of its citizens (cf. Lk. 10:20; Rev. 21:27). Note that it is to this 'church', the one true church in heaven, that these Hebrew Christians are come. 24 Jesus' crowning and comprehensive work, as our great High Priest enthroned in heaven, is to minister to all who come to Him all the promised blessings of the covenant now established and sealed for ever by His shed and sprinkled blood. Cf. 7:20–22; 8:6; 13:20, 21.

12:25–29 All must have dealings with God

25, 26 Let them take heed, therefore, not to seek (like those at Sinai) to withdraw from listening to Him who speaks. (Note the present tense; it is an abiding ever-present revelation. Also, from the previous verse (v. 24), we know that He now speaks in mercy through the sprinkled blood.) For it is impossible to escape having dealings with Him. Those who tried to withdraw from the earthly manifestation at Sinai found that His voice literally shook the earth. Christians, by contrast, are confronted by One who speaks to them in the heavenly realms disclosing the final realities. But note that, in whatever way He speaks, it is the same God who speaks throughout (v. 26; cf. 1:1, 2). Let them realize that it is much more impossible now to turn aside and escape having dealings with Him. For, as He has declared in prophecy (see Hg. 2:6), God will in Christ bring His dealings with the universe to a head in a single decisive act of judgment by finally shaking both heaven and earth. Cf. Mk. 13:31; and note that it is his words that abide, not the universe; see also 2 Pet. 3:7. 27 Then this transient, temporal order will pass, and the abiding eternal order will stand revealed. 28 We Christians are destined to share in a kingdom or sovereignty belonging to this abiding eternal order (cf. Dn. 2:44; 7:18–27). Let us be grateful. Sheer gratitude to God ought therefore to constrain us (or, following AV, let us appropriate the 'grace' so abundantly available) to serve God in ways well pleasing in His sight, i.e. to offer to God acceptable worship. In the presence of such a God and in the face of such a prospect this will be with a real sense of unworthiness and awe (cf. 2 Pet. 3:9–14). 29 For the God whom we are thus privileged to call our God is a consuming fire (cf. Dt. 4:24; Is. 33:14–17), both of zeal for holiness and of zeal against sin. Only those who thus follow after holiness will survive His judgment, see the Lord, and reign eternally with Him. See also Appendix 3, p. 1219.

13:1–17 VARIOUS ADDITIONAL EXHORTATIONS

The writer now adds (quite in the manner of Paul, cf. Rom. 12:4–13) a variety of brief statements containing pointed practical exhortations to worthy Christian living. He includes also a warning against prevalent misleading teaching, and issues an urgent challenge to his readers finally to abandon Judaism and the earthly Jerusalem, and to find in the unchanging Jesus Christ and in His one sacrifice outside the city gate both inevitable earthly reproach and abiding heavenly gain.

He knew that his readers had been active in the past in sympathy and kindness towards their fellow-Christians (see 6:10; 10:33, 34). He urges, therefore, the importance of maintaining such practical love between fellow-members of the Christian brotherhood (v. 1). This should be practised not only towards familiar local brethren but also towards 'strangers' (v. 2) or visitors from elsewhere, a ministry sometimes rewarded by enriching surprises, e.g. in the experiences of Abraham and Lot. (See Gn. 18, 19.) Let them be particularly mindful of any in prison or suffering physical illness or ill-treatment; for Christians ought to share each other's trials, and to recognize that in this life they are all equally liable to suffer physical affliction (v. 3). Let them also recognize that (since God has ordained it) there is nothing dishonourable about the marriage relationship (v. 4) and that its physical intimacy, when rightly practised, brings no defilement. But those who engage in improper sexual relationship, whether they are unmarried or married, will find that they have God Himself against them in judgment.

In relation to material things (v. 5) the right attitude is not covetousness but contentment, learning to make do rather than always wanting more. This attitude is possible because one never faces life alone. The Lord has promised each one His personal help. He will never leave any in the lurch. It is therefore possible to face life with cheerfulness, i.e. confidently (v. 16), and openly to confess that, with the Lord at one's side, there is nothing to fear, and no-one who can harm us. These two verses show how OT Scriptures can be quoted, and how the believer may use their words to tell his soul what God has promised, as if the assurance were addressed to him personally and individually (see Dt. 31:6; Jos. 1:5); and also to confess his confidence before God and men (see Ps. 118:6).

Let them find inspiration to be steadfast in the faith by remembering their former Christian leaders (v. 7), by whom they were instructed in the truth of God and the gospel. Fresh consideration of the lives they lived and of the way such lives ended will help them to copy their faith. For Jesus Christ, whom they trusted and followed, is the same today as He was then, and will continue the same for ever (v. 8). He is the one all-sufficient guarantee of salvation (cf. 12:2).

Let them beware, therefore, of the perverting influence of other very varied and strange doctrines which are in circulation (v. 9), particularly the teaching that one cannot become properly established except by partaking of special, sacred or sacrificial food. Such teaching stands completely condemned. It is unspiritual in principle. The good way for the heart to be established is by God's own working in grace, not by man's physical eating of food. Also its professed value is denied by experience. Those who have devoted themselves to such things have gained from them no spiritual profit. Our Christian altar (v. 10) or sacrifice (to use the familiar language suggested by OT figures; cf. 10:19–22) is not one of which the worshippers (i.e. those who serve the true Tabernacle; cf. 8:4, 5) have any right to eat. Even in the corresponding Levitical figure of the earthly Tabernacle the bodies of those animals, whose blood was used to make atonement for sin by being brought into the inner shrine, were never eaten; they were burnt outside the camp (v. 11). That, therefore, is how Jesus, as our great High Priest, consummated the work of saving or sanctifying the people on whose behalf He was acting: He suffered outside the gate (v. 12). This indicates in figure that those who would embrace the benefits of His work must not trust in eating sacrificial meat, nor cling to the earthly Jerusalem (v. 13). Rather they must be prepared to go forth from the camp of Israel after the flesh; to bear the abuse or reproach of associating themselves with One who in Jewish eyes was rightly rejected because He hung crucified under the curse of God; to find their all not in food but in Him, the living Lord of grace; to find their hope not in any city of the present earthly order which must pass away, but in the true city of the living God, which is a city of the coming heavenly order which will remain (v. 14; cf. 12:27). Henceforth Christian worship needs no earthly holy city, no special visible Temple, no priestly caste. There are sacrifices to be offered, but we are to offer them in the heavenly Tabernacle through Jesus as our one great High Priest (v. 15); everything is done through Him. These sacrifices, too, are not sacrifices of beasts but continual offerings of praise and thanksgiving to God (v. 15; cf. Ps. 50:14, 23; Ho. 14:2, RV) together with ministries of practical kindness to men (v. 16; cf. Ho. 6:6).

Instead of allowing themselves, therefore, to be perverted by strange doctrines, let them with a ready confidence and compliance follow the teaching of their leaders (v. 17). For the latter have a solemn responsibility to discharge on their behalf and an account to render. Their lead is, therefore, worthy of respect. Not to follow them now is to make the leaders' task on that great day of reckoning a painful rather than a joyful one. Also it will result in loss for themselves.

9, 10 raise questions of interpretation on which opinions differ radically. In contrast to the exposition given above some think the reference to eating foods has to do with distinctions between clean and unclean foods (see NEB, and cf. Rom. 14:14–21; 1 Cor. 8:4–13; Col. 2:16; 1 Tim. 4:3–5). But in such cases holiness would be promoted by proper abstinence from that which is unclean (so NEB reads into the text the sense 'not from scruples about what we eat'); here the idea seems rather to be of a misleading suggestion of some spiritual benefit to be gained by eating meat offered in sacrifice. The Christian altar is generally recognized to be the cross i.e. the sacrifice of Christ. But, as the NT teaches that the sacrifice of Christ is something of which Christians spiritually partake (see Jn. 6:53–56; 1 Cor. 5:7, 8; 10:16), many prefer the interpretation that what the priests of the Jewish Tabernacle could not do physically all Christians can do spiritually, i.e. partake of their sin-offering. 11 Further, the details of the Levitical ritual and of Christ's crucifixion (12) figuratively imply that it is impossible thus to partake of Christ without completely abandoning Judaism. 16 To communicate (AV, RV, Gk. koinōnia, i.e. 'fellowship') describes (as RSV makes plain) the act of sharing with others material things. In Rom. 15:26 the sense is rendered by 'contribution'; cf. 2 Cor. 9:13.

13:18–25 PERSONAL MESSAGES AND FINAL BENEDICTION

18, 19 For the first time the writer speaks of himself, and in the first person singular. His request for prayer and his profession of integrity (v. 18) imply an awareness that his action and attitude may be misjudged. He is personally particularly eager for their prayer that he may be enabled to rejoin them as soon as possible (v. 19). This seems clearly to imply that he had been in the past in some way closely connected with them. 20, 21 His benediction is remarkable for its significant details and its comprehensive sweep; again it is quite Pauline in character. His words focus their thoughts on the doings of God. For them as well as for him what God has done is the ground of assurance and hope. Therefore, what God may be counted upon to do for them is the substance of his prayer. God brought up Jesus from the dead ('up' seems here the force of the Greek prefix ana rather than again). He did this to Him not only personally as His Son, but more particularly as the Leader of His people (cf. 2:10; 12:2), i.e. as the great shepherd of the sheep, and as our Lord. He did it to Him in relation to the new and eternal covenant secured and ratified by His death or blood. His resurrection is, therefore, decisive proof that man is reconciled to God, or able to enter glory, and that God is now active to fulfil for His people all that is promised to them under the new covenant (cf. Zc. 9:11). He will bring them up also, as He brought up Israel with Moses their shepherd out of the Red Sea (see Is. 63:11). So the writer prays for his readers that through this Jesus, acknowledged as God's Christ, they may know God both personally and corporately as the God of peace and experience His working in their lives and fellowship, enabling them fully to co-operate in the doing of His will. Equip you, or 'make you perfect' (AV, RV); the Greek verb katartizō is very suggestive. It includes the ideas of harmonious combination (cf. 10:24, 25; 12:13, 14), the supply of what is lacking (see 1 Thes. 3:10), and the rectification of what is wrong or damaged (e.g. it is translated 'restore' in Gal. 6:1 and 'mending' in Mk. 1:19).

22 The writer claims to have written briefly, i.e. considering the vastness of the themes dealt with, and so ventures to ask for their patient attention. 23 He sends them news of Timothy's liberation; this provides yet another indication of possible close connection with the apostle Paul. 24 His special greetings to their leaders and to the whole Christian community suggests that the letter was actually sent to a limited group of ordinary Christians. 'They of Italy' (AV, RV). This reference indicates plainly that the writer was in the company of Italian Christians; but the wording is not sufficiently explicit to decide whether he was writing from or to Italy, though either is possible; and RSV opts for the latter. 25 Finally, the simple and sufficient Christian 'farewell', indeed its guarantee, is found in the one word grace and in the assurance that it is fully available for all.

THE NEW COVENANT

According to this Epistle God has for His people a destiny which is variously depicted. It is described as inheriting salvation (1:14, RV), as lordship in the world to come (2:5–10), as participation in God's house and in or with His Christ (3:6, 14, RV mg.), as entering into the rest of God (4:1, 11), as going on to maturity or perfection (6:1), as inheriting the promises (6:12; 10:36; 11:13), as receiving the eternal inheritance (9:15), as gaining the soul (10:39, RV mg.), as reaching the heavenly country and the divinely prepared city (11:10, 16; 12:22; 13:14), as receiving the kingdom which cannot be shaken (12:28). This destiny is to be theirs simply because they are His people and He is (and is not ashamed to be called, 11:16) their God.

In order first to establish, and then to preserve, this special relation between Himself and those whom He is pleased to call His people, God has not only given His word of promise, but has also solemnly pledged Himself in covenant under the recognized covenant seal of shed blood. It is into this covenanted relation to Himself that God calls men to enter; it is with this immediately in view that He redeems them. Henceforth, for those who respond, it is according to the promises thus covenanted that men have dealings with God, obligations towards Him, and an assured ground of confidence in Him.

Although there are two distinct covenants of this kind there is in them an essential unity and continuity. The same ultimate end is contemplated in both. The second has been introduced only because the first was ineffectual, and was, indeed, never intended to be more than a provisional anticipation of better things to come (see, e.g., 9:9, 10; 10:1). The second supersedes the first because it completely achieves what the first failed to accomplish. Because this achievement is eternal the second covenant is the final covenant. There is no hope of, or need for, some further provision of God beyond it. One of the great purposes of the writer of this Epistle is to make this plain. Christianity not only supersedes Judaism; it is God's last word to men.

The first covenant failed for two reasons. On the one hand, the people brought under it did not fulfil its conditions; they did not continue in God's covenant (8:7–9). On the other hand, its institutions did not avail to give men true release from sin and consequent access to God's presence (10:1–4). The very order and ritual of its Tabernacle was a witness that the way into the sanctuary was not yet opened (9:8); its Tabernacle was only a figure for the time then present (9:9). As a covenant it was weak and useless (7:18). So, even while it obtained as the divinely ordained order, the same Scriptures which acknowledged its divine origin also prophetically anticipated the provision of something better. The very mention of a 'new' covenant was itself witness that the first covenant was to be disannulled, and was shortly to pass away (7:11–19; 8:1–13; 10:5–9).

The new covenant is 'a better covenant', and one 'enacted on better promises' (8:6). It is effective in ways in which the first covenant was not because it provides a real redemption from transgressions (9:15), or putting away of sin (10:15–18), and so makes possible full and free access to God's presence (10:19–22). Also, it provides an all-competent High Priest who, because of His 'once-for-all' finished sacrifice (10:10–14) and His 'indestructible life' (7:15, 16), has not only gained entrance for Himself and those He represents into God's presence, but sits for ever enthroned by God in the place of all power (1:13), able to complete to its full perfection the salvation of all those who make Him their Mediator between God and themselves (7:25). What God has done for Him in raising Him from the dead and bidding Him sit at His own right hand in sure hope of complete triumph (10:12, 13), is pledge and proof of the final victory of His people. For it was done by God to Him as 'our Lord Jesus, the great shepherd of the sheep'; and it was done 'by the blood of the eternal covenant' (13:20). There is, therefore, through this covenant, sealed by Christ's death, full and final remission of sins and completely assured perfection for all Christ's people (10:8–18). There is no need for, and indeed no possibility of, failure. For under this covenant God puts His law in His people's hearts (8:10); and Himself works to equip them with everything good that they may do His will (13:20, 21).

The one all-sufficient guarantee of this new covenant is to be found in the Person and work of its Surety and Mediator (7:21, 22; 8:6; 9:14, 15). Its benefits are administered by One who is enthroned on high, and who never dies: Jesus Christ, 'the same yesterday and today and for ever' (13:8). It is, therefore, the outstanding theme or 'chief point' of this Epistle to declare that, as Christians under the new covenant, 'we have such a high priest, one who is seated at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in heaven' (8:1).

THE PRIESTHOOD OF CHRIST

In this Epistle the writer connects with Christ the ideas of 'truth' and 'perfection'. What elsewhere is only figuratively hinted at, or but partially realized, is in Christ found in actuality and fullness. Henceforth, therefore, we must not limit our Christian idea of priesthood to what we learn from the Levitical priesthood. Although the latter did foreshadow or figuratively indicate many of the fundamental essentials of all true priesthoods, there are other complementary and distinctive characteristics which, in as far as they were foreshadowed at all in the OT revelation, were foreshadowed not by Aaron but by Melchizedek. These distinctive characteristics, which belong of necessity to the perfection of Christ's priesthood, are to be appreciated over against the Levitical priesthood in terms more of contrast than of comparison.

The Levitical high priests were weak men, sinful and mortal, needing first to offer sacrifices for their own sins, and unable to continue in office because they were inevitably removed by death (7:23, 27, 28). They served in an earthly shrine, a mere figure of the true (8:4, 5; 9:1, 9, 23, 24). Their sacrifices were sacrifices of animals, which could never remove sin (10:1–4); and so, under the old order, the dividing curtain which shut men out from the Holy of Holies was never rent and done away (9:7, 8). The sacrifices of the Day of Atonement gave one man only temporary, symbolic access once a year to the inmost shrine of the divine presence; they did not give to the whole people full and abiding access to God. Also, these sacrifices had to be incessantly repeated (10:11), and served only as a sobering reminder that something still needed to be done fully and finally to put away sin (10:1–3). The way into the sanctuary was not yet opened (9:8).

Our Christian High Priest is 'Jesus the Son of God' (4:14). His priesthood is of a different order because of the difference in the Person of the Priest. He is, first of all, very God of very God (1:3), able 'through eternal Spirit' (9:14) to act as deity and to do things completely beyond the power of weak men. He is, on the other hand, truly Man, One who not only genuinely partook of human nature, but who also, through the experience of earthly trial and suffering, has reached a final perfection in His manhood, which has qualified Him to be for His fellow-men the author or cause of an eternal salvation (2:9, 10, 14–18; 4:15; 5:7–9). He could do what no Levitical high priest was able to attempt. Because, as Man, He was Himself without sin, He did not need to offer sacrifice for His own sin. What is more, He was in a position to offer His own spotless human life as the sin-offering for others, that is, for sinful men. Being, as God, undying Spirit, and acting in the power of an indestructible life (7:16), He was able in His one Person and two natures to act both as Priest and Victim, and in the experience of the death of His human nature deliberately to offer Himself to God (9:14), and to claim, as One still alive in death, entrance thereby as men's High Priest into the actual presence of God. As He thus offered Himself in His physical human death upon the cross (10:10), symbolically 'the curtain of the Temple was torn in two from top to bottom' (Mk. 15:37, 38; cf. Heb. 10:19, 20). Actually, as One acting in the true heavenly sanctuary (8:2; 9:11, 12, 24) and not in the figurative Tabernacle (or Temple) on earth (8:4, 5), He thereby 'through his own blood' (9:12, RV), or by the act of laying down His physical human life (cf. again 10:19, 20), entered decisively and once for all into the true sanctuary there 'to appear before the face of God' (9:24, RV) on our behalf. When He did this He was immediately accepted, hailed as victor and invited to occupy the throne at God's right hand. God further sealed His acceptance of His work as a work on behalf of sinful men by raising Him up in His humanity from the dead (13:20). It is, however, probably significant that Christ's resurrection is mentioned only once in this Epistle, and that right at the end. This is because, in the earlier consideration of His offering of Himself, He is thought of, not as rising on the third day and ascending after another 40 days, but as acting in the heavenly sanctuary and immediately entering the presence of God.

The enthronement in heaven of the One who entered through His own death as our High Priest is the divine proof and pledge that He has by this one act of sacrifice obtained eternal redemption for us (1:3; 10:12, 13; 12:2). Also, He was then declared by God, not only by His word, but by His solemn oath, to be a Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek (5:9, 10; 6:19, 20; 7:21, 22), which means, in other words, that His priesthood is royal in power because of His finished sacrificial work, and also unceasing in duration because of His divine Person. For He was seated at once upon the throne, and remains there, placed by God in the position of supreme power, able to give gifts to men (4:14–16), and assured by God of final victory over all His foes (1:13).

Through such achievement as High Priest, far surpassing anything accomplished by the old order of Levitical priests, He is able to engage in a more excellent ministry as the mediator of the new covenant (8:6), under which sinful men who come to Him, or to God through Him (7:20–25), are assured in the possession of forgiveness of sins, intimate personal knowledge of God, and the transforming inner quickening of the indwelling Spirit (8:10–12). His ability thus to proclaim absolution and to assure His people that their sins are actually forgiven and forgotten by God is itself proof that no further offering for sin is necessary (10:14–18). As One exalted above the heaven, our Christian High Priest has no need to make fresh or further offering of Himself, or of His blood or earthly sacrifice, to God (7:26–28). But, as One who never dies, He is always at God's right hand to intervene on men's behalf, to speak for them to the Father (or against the adversary who would condemn them, Rom. 8:33, 34) whenever they come to the throne of God, and thus to secure the full completion of their salvation (Heb. 7:25). All who come can also be sure of understanding sympathy and appropriate help because He is thoroughly qualified to discharge such compassionate ministry by His own earthly experiences of suffering and trial (2:17, 18; 4:15, 16; 5:2, 7, 8).

Those, therefore, who come to Him as their Mediator are assured by the royal and eternal order of His priesthood of participating in a salvation which is (like His Person and work as Priest) perfect, final and eternal. For His one sacrifice gives to all who trust Him eternal fitness for unhindered approach to God's presence (9:13, 14; 10:10, 14); and the final completion of the work of salvation which He has begun in them is assured by the blood of the eternal covenant, by God's resurrection of our Lord Jesus from the dead (13:20, 21), and by His own undying presence as our advocate at God's right hand (7:25).

THE WARNING PASSAGES

See 2:1–4; 3:7 – 4:1; 6:4–8; 10:26–31, 38, 39; 12:15–17, 25. As Jews these Hebrew Christians had been used to the ideas of a succession of prophets and a continuous repetition of sacrifices for sin. They needed to be made aware of the once-for-all and final character of the revelation of God and the reconciliation to God given to men in Christ. Because the incarnate Son is God's last word to men, and because there is offered to men in Him amazing salvation by grace, those who pass Him by cannot expect to escape the coming judgment of God (cf. Mk. 12:6–9). No further word of saving intervention from God is to be expected. Also, since Christ's sacrifice of Himself was a decisive, 'once-for-all' achievement, there is no more offering for sin (10:18) either by Christ in heaven or by men on earth. Neither can there be repetition of this one sacrifice (9:25–28), nor will there be the introduction by God of any other sacrifice (10:26). This one sacrifice for sin, wrought once for all, is all-sufficient for ever for all God's people (10:10–14).

Enjoyment by men of the benefit of Christ's sacrifice is similarly 'once for all' (6:4, Gk. hapax); it is decisive, final and eternal. Therefore (to follow one interpretation of these passages) any who have been consciously confronted by this offer of grace, and have personally shared in the proofs of its origin, and then deliberately reject the gospel of Jesus as the Christ (without of course ever truly believing and becoming regenerate), cannot be similarly brought a second time to the opportunity of repentance and faith (see 12:16, 17). Or, alternatively (to follow another interpretation), those who have experienced all the characteristic blessings of God's saving grace through Christ's atoning sacrifice, and by the Spirit's work in their hearts, and have then turned aside from it all and tried to settle down to live as if such things were not true and had never happened, cannot be brought back a second time to the initial and decisive Christian response of repentance and faith. The meaning of 6:6 may be that even to suggest that Christ virtually needs crucifying again to bring such an apostate or backslider for the second time to the place of decisive repentance and quickening by the Spirit is to put Christ and the efficacy of His one sacrifice to an open shame. The whole thing is unthinkable. Such renewal of enlightenment and repentance a second time is therefore absolutely impossible, just as, when many Israelites departed from God in unbelief in the wilderness, it was impossible to take them through the Passover and Red Sea deliverances a second time in order to awaken or renew their faith. For such apostates or unbelievers there was, and still is, no prospect but judgment (cf. 1 Cor. 10:1–5).

The kind of failure here in view (to follow one interpretation) is nothing less than a conscious, deliberate and persistent abandonment of the Christian way of salvation, an abandonment which involves nothing less than apostasy from the living God (3:12), rejection of the Word and confirming witness of God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, treating the Son of God, as the Jews had done in Jerusalem, as One who ought to be disowned and crucified, and thus brought publicly under the curse of heaven, denying the covenant significance before God of His shed blood, and doing open insult to the Spirit who in grace pleads with men to acknowledge Jesus as Lord (10:29). Such actions are surely what our Lord called the sin of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, which is eternal sin and never has forgiveness (Mk. 3:28, 29). Yet it was to nothing less than a sin of this character that these Hebrew Christians were exposed, if they were being tempted to go back to where they were before in Judaism (although actually to do this was impossible), and in doing so publicly to repudiate Jesus as the Messiah and the Son of God.

It may be, however (to follow an alternative interpretation), that the writer is concerned to make plain to his unquestionably Christian readers that their present tendency to become slack, and to settle down halfway in the imagined possession of what their faith in Christ has already made theirs, is a fatal self-deception. The reason is that for those who have thus made a beginning in the way of Christian discipleship the only possible alternatives are either to go on to the full possession of faith's inheritance, or to draw back from this forward movement of God in their lives and to come under His inevitable judgment, like the Israelites who became the objects of God's wrath and were overthrown in the wilderness, because they were not prepared by faith in God to go forward into the promised land. In that case the kind of failure here in view is that of those who, having been taken by grace into covenant relation with God, completely fail to regard its amazing privileges and overwhelming obligations with due seriousness. If those, already redeemed from Egypt, who failed to obey God's word under the first Sinaitic covenant, were removed in judgment from the company of God's people, may not those who fail to respond to the demands of the new covenant in Christ rightly expect even more severe and drastic treatment? For while, in the Christian life, God's discipline, however painful, is profitable and to be welcomed as a proof that He is dealing with us as His sons for our progress in holiness (12:5–11), can anything be more terrible in the life of one who is already by grace a child of God than that, in relation to his subsequent earthly conduct, God should have to deal with him in fiery and even fatal judgment?

The theological questions here involved are whether those who may thus apostatize or come under judgment ever were regenerate, and whether any man once saved can finally be lost. In answer to both questions some say emphatically, 'No'. They would compare the types mentioned in Mt. 7:22, 23; 12:22–32. They would argue that the very apostasy of these individuals is proof that they were never regenerate. Others say that those described in 6:4, 5 must be regenerate; for no more decisive description of the regenerate could be given. Some would then argue that the consequent judgment on their complete degeneracy and unfruitfulness does not necessarily involve them in the loss of eternal salvation. They are, for instance, only 'near to being cursed' (6:8). Cf. 1 Cor. 3:15; 5:5. Others, again, suppose that this suggestion that the regenerate can thus become apostate, and be finally lost, is actually only hypothetical and theoretical. Even on the human side it is much more unlikely than physical suicide, and so only to be thought of as a remote possibility; and actually on the divine side it can by grace never happen. See Jn. 10:28.

Yet Christians, and all who share in the knowledge of the truth, will do well to treat such solemn warnings with due seriousness. Let us remember that John Bunyan wrote, 'Then I saw there was a way to hell even from the gates of heaven, as well as from the City of Destruction.' Let us remember, also, that Paul the apostle feared lest by any means after he had preached to others, and been used to bring them to Christ, he himself should be 'rejected' (1 Cor. 9:27, RV; the Greek is literally 'disapproved', which AV renders a 'castaway', i.e. a 'throw-out'; see Mk. 12:10; and cf. 2 Pet. 2:20, 21).

A. M. STIBBS

James

INTRODUCTION

Luther's criticism is well known: it is 'a right strawy Epistle . . . for it has no evangelical manner about it' (cf. 1 Cor. 3:12). This shows a failure to appreciate that it is a spiritual corrective and not a theological source-book. We must first listen to our Lord and to His servant Paul, and then let His other servant James be a stimulus to hear and obey all that is already given in the Word. For James does not write an evangelistic tract but exhortation addressed to believers. As soon as the gospel has been received the Christian life has to be lived. The disciple has blessings and privileges. He also has duties. James seeks therefore to teach the duties of discipleship and to urge his readers to fulfil them: to be doers of the Word. His exhortation is based on the teaching.

This will explain the absence of much of the proclamation, the gospel message, the kērygma. It may not be explicitly stated in detail, but behind the reference to the Word (1:21) are large theological presuppositions. Jesus is the Christ, the Lord of glory, who is coming again and whose honourable name is not to be blasphemed. James understands the language and experience of conversion and salvation (1:1, 18, 21; 2:1, 7; 5:8).

The apparent lack of any continuous argument in the Epistle creates a staccato effect. It may be explained in part by its affinities with the Greek diatribe though this argument must not be pressed to extreme. The diatribe was an ethical lecture on the popular level, even a secular sermon, with marked characteristics—terse dialogue, question and answer, argument with an imaginary objector, and other vivid literary expedients calculated to impress. But the Epistle is more than a mere diatribe. Its Greek is good indeed, giving no immediate impression of 'translation Greek'; but it has some Semitic features and a Jewish background; and at its heart is the gospel.

The letter begins with simple majesty and there can be only one candidate from the NT for the rank of author—James, the Lord's brother (cf. Mk. 6:3; Acts 15:13; Gal. 1:19). Authenticity cannot be demonstrated finally and various difficulties have been raised. The Greek, we are told, is too good; no claim is made to be the Lord's brother; the kērygma is missing; ritual (as opposed to moral) law is not as prominent as might have been expected. There is also the problem of the relation to Paul and the interpretation of the external evidence. It is not impossible to give answers to these criticisms, and alternative theories such as pseudonymity, anonymity, an original Jewish document with the addition of 1:1 and 2:1, a 'patriarchal pattern' (cf. Gn. 49) and others, do not carry complete conviction.

The Jewish background of this 'Christian Amos', as he has been called, the Semitic elements, the parallels to Acts 15 and the similarities to (though not literary dependence on) the Sermon on the Mount may not prove, but they accord with, the traditional view of authorship. Until this is cogently disproved and an opposing theory satisfactorily established it has the right to stand.

If James the Lord's brother is indeed the author, the Epistle must be dated not later than AD 62. (Some place it even before AD 50.) This is supported by the following: there is no reference to the fall of Jerusalem in AD 70; the social conditions (large landowners) did not apply after the fall; nothing is said about the Jewish–Gentile controversy; the eager expectation of the second advent is primitive; it is not necessary to assume that James had read the Gospels or Paul's letters; and the church order is primitive. These facts do not in themselves prove an early date but their evidential value is strong. It if likely that advocates of a late 1st-century or os a 2nd-century date are to some extent influenced by their views of authorship.

The letter is sent to Christians, not excluding Jewish Christians. It is perhaps worth noticing that James was hardly an enthusiastic believer before the resurrection (cf. Jn. 7:3–5). Yet the Lord appeared to him (cf. 1 Cor. 15:7) in His mercy, despite Acts 10:41.

COMMENTARY

1:1 Salutation

The beginning is conventional: from whom, to whom and greeting (cf. Acts 15:23–29; 23:26–30). James does not elaborate as Paul sometimes does (cf. Rom. 1:1–7) but he makes it plain that he is a Christian. He has the right to address Christians, for whom he feels a pastoral responsibility. At the same time he speaks as a Jew to Jews.

Servant is strictly slave (Gk. doulos). It implies the absence of rights, total dependence on the master and complete obedience. The term aptly describes what should be the Christian's attitude to God, though slavishness is ruled out (cf. Jn. 15:14f.). In Judaism, servant of God was largely used of men who served God in a special way. James thus quietly takes his place with patriarchs and prophets. When a Jew was at prayer he spoke of himself in the presence of God as a servant. The expression is thus religious. James combines both leadership and piety.

Note the unobtrusive effectiveness with which James places Lord Jesus Christ beside God. Behind Jesus stands the whole gospel tradition of the historic Man of Nazareth. Christ (Gk. form of the Heb. Messiah, 'the anointed one': Ps. 2:2; Acts 4:26, cf. AV, RSV) shows that James believed in the Messiahship of Jesus. Lord is used in the LXX to translate the ineffable Name (Yahweh) and implies the sovereignty of God, personally exercised. God has the right to rule and nothing and nobody in the created universe can escape His control. Now James applies the term to Jesus. He can regard himself as the slave of his new Owner because he interprets the Messiah's work as redemption. The Lordship of Jesus is no innovation; the teaching goes back to Jesus Himself (cf. Mt. 22:41–45; 28:18). Cf. 1 Cor. 7:23.

The twelve tribes . . . seems at first to refer to Jews scattered throughout the world. The term is used for the living nation in Acts 26:7, though it is already an anachronism. The contents of the Epistle are, however, hardly limited to Jews. The Christian community is the new Israel of God and may therefore have this term 'twelve tribes', descriptive of the old Israel, applied to them. Cf. Acts 15:16f. Christians are thus 'scattered abroad' from their home and at best are temporary visitors (cf. 1 Pet. 1:1; 2:11). James perhaps saw an illustration in Acts 8:4; 11:19. It is fitting that in such a context James did not refer to himself as the Lord's brother but as His slave, ministering to 'the integrity of the nation Israel' (J. H. Ropes, ICC), the twelve tribes of the believing church. Cf. 1 Pet. 2:9f.

1:2–4 Dealing with trials

2 James links this paragraph with v. 1 by similarity of sound. Greeting is Greek chairein and joy is chara. Moffatt neatly turns it by: '. . . greeting. Greet it as pure joy. . . .' M. Dibelius regards the resemblance as intentional (see Der Brief des Jakobus, 1964). The author can write in literary style. James does not mean that the only joy in the Christian life comes from adversity. He is advocating an attitude. 'Count it nothing but joy.' 'Joy' here means 'ground of rejoicing', as in 'good news of a great joy' (Lk. 2:10). The address, brethren, is common in the OT and was widespread in Judaism, but has a deeper note among Christians. It expresses devotion to Jesus (cf. Mt. 12:50) and in Him membership of God's family (cf. Rom. 8:29). It is thus related to the doctrine of adoption (cf. Rom. 8:15f.). James deftly reminds his readers of their unity with him. Contrast here the OT wisdom literature, e.g. Pr. 1:8 'my son', and cf. Mt. 23:8f. Meet implies an external source of the trial (contrast v. 14), as with the man who 'fell among' robbers (Lk. 10:30).

3 The secret lies not in Stoic courage or in weak collapse (cf. Heb. 12:5f.) but in knowledge. James is sure that his readers know. If they are to profit by their knowledge they should remember that the trials which embody the testing of your faith bring to light its reality and its power. This they know already. Let them dwell on it, realizing that faith preserved and practised in trials leads on to victory and deeper joy. The outcome is steadfastness, the quality of 'staying put'—under 'the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune'. Cf. Rom. 5:3.

4 James is not limiting himself to a single, isolated trial. Active resistance must continue always. The full effect is personal, for it means that through their steadfastness they will be perfect and complete. Perfect suggests a ripeness and maturity in contrast to an earlier weakness; complete implies a wholeness and freedom from blemish with no Christian virtue absent; but the two words should be taken together. Note that James has anticipated 2:14. Faith 'works' (cf. Gal. 5:6). Lacking is the keyword or cue by which the following section is linked on to this one.

1:5–8 Gaining wisdom

5 To forestall any possible disclaimer of knowledge (cf. v. 3) James advocates prayer. But he advances one step ahead of the objector. He advocates praying not only for knowledge but for wisdom, which includes knowledge and its application. Right prayer (cf. 4:3) does not deal with One who is unaccustomed to giving. God gives regularly, frequently (not 'will give'), to all men even when they do not ask Him (cf. Mt. 5:45). Generously suggests the scale, purpose and speed of the divine answer. When God thus gives He does so without reproaching. In this He is consistent. He does not scold the recipient any more than He scolds the returning penitent (cf. Lk. 15:20; 18:14). James will speak again about wisdom (cf. 3:13–18). In the meantime, in response to prayer by a believer, it will be given him.

6 If a man lacks wisdom he should pray and ask in faith for it. Faith here means trust in God through Christ, without which a person is only a nominal Christian. (See on 2:22 for its constituents.) The characteristic attitude of James is apparent once more. For him true faith is not a quiescent intellectual assent. It is to be exercised. All the time the man is asking he should be trusting. Doubting is not disbelief or philosophical scepticism. Its characteristic is an inner cleavage. The doubter both affirms and denies; he clings to the promise—and is sure it will not be fulfilled. He is vividly described in the picture of the surge of the sea. He 'mounted up to heaven' to receive the promised wisdom; he 'went down to the depths' (into the trough of the wave), sure that he would never attain it. (Cf. Ps. 107:26 and context.)

7, 8 For gives the reason for asking in faith. That person is the doubter. James does not say 'this person', although he has only just mentioned him. It is because that is the more remote. James keeps the doubter at a distance, in disapproval. He is aptly termed a double-minded man, for in a sense he is a divided personality, a man with two souls. (See on v. 6.) He ought to love the Lord with all his one soul (cf. Mk. 12:30). James obviously has no room for compromise: 'one thing I do' (cf. Phil. 3:13; Jas. 4:8). Unstable in all his ways continues the characterization of v. 6. The doubter is tossed in vacillation when he ought to 'stand' (cf. 1 Cor. 16:13). Ways is a Hebraism for conduct (cf. Acts 14:16). He does not follow the fixed road of trust but constantly changes route, and even then cannot stand. The Lord, from whom he must not suppose that he will receive anything, appears from v. 5 to mean God. But 5:14f. has the same term in connection with the elders of the church and prayer, and it must there mean Christ. In 5:7, 10, however, it has both senses. The absence of precision in 1:7f. reflects the fact that God deals with men through the Mediator.

1:9–11 Assessing wealth

The lowly brother and the rich (man) are both generic, denoting in each case a class, not an individual. Two interpretations of the paragraph are possible. On the one hand James may have the day of judgment in mind. The lowly brother will then be exalted and the rich man, who is regarded as a non-Christian, will be brought low. The advocacy of boasting by the rich is then ironical and the best comment is Lk. 16:25. On the other hand James may be thinking of the present moment. The rich man is a Christian and his wealth is transitory (cf. Mt. 6:19f.; 1 Tim. 6:17f.). This seems to be the better view. It is the rich as such, not the mere man, who will pass away. He will fade away in his 'business journeys' (cf. 4:13). Even so he can join the poor man in his boasting: God gives more than the poor man lacks (cf. 2:5) or the rich man possesses. This is already the lowly brother's . . . exaltation. It needed Christ's humiliation to reveal it to the rich.

James draws his vivid figure of the sun . . . with its scorching heat from Is. 40:6ff., with a possible allusion to Ps. 102:4, 11, but he restricts it to the rich. 1 Pet. 1:24 uses it in a way which should cheer the once rich Christian: this gospel now preached to you abides for ever. You really can boast in your humiliation; against its dark background the treasure in heaven stands out brilliantly.

1:12–15 Recognizing temptation

12 The beatitude follows the form of Ps. 1:1 LXX (cf. Dn. 12:12) and recalls Jas. 1:2. James is still thinking of trial but he soon passes on to the thought of moral trial, which may be occasioned (not caused) by poverty or wealth. Affliction from outside is to be endured but inner temptation must be resisted (cf. 4:7; 5:11). James does not suggest any definite temptation but proceeds at once to give the reason for the blessedness or happiness. The man who endures trial and has thereby passed his examination will receive the crown of life. It is the crown of victory and is the gift of God, being due to divine grace and not to human right. In spite of the imagery (cf. 1 Cor. 9:24–27) it is no mere adornment, for it consists of life, eternal life. The fact that God has promised it shows that it is a gift. God is a emendation; the Greek simply has 'He'. The meaning would be self-evident to James's readers. Those who love him is used both in the OT (e.g. Ex. 20:6) and in the NT (e.g. Rom. 8:28) as a description of God's own people. It here suggests the motive power of the man who has stood the test.

13 Resentment at the intensity of trial may produce questions about its origin; or a man may seek to excuse himself for feeling attracted by evil when he is tempted. He forgets 1 Cor. 10:13. In the midst of his moral trial the man speaks, for to the Palestinians thinking was saying, and he traces its origin to God. But God is exalted above sin and feels no pull towards evil. He can neither tempt nor be tempted. This is not divine ignorance or indifference but holiness. God understands human temptation, however, both by His omniscience and by the incarnation, and can help the tempted: cf. Heb. 2:18; 4:15. 14, 15 Desire in itself is a term which can be neutral or even good (cf. Lk. 22:15; Phil. 1:23). Here it is used with verbs suggesting force ('taken in tow', Arndt) and attractiveness ('bait'). Some translate, 'hooked and trapped'. There is a distinction between the ego and the desire (cf. Rom. 7:17; Jas. 1:8). The dominant theme of v. 15 is the idea of birth, with desire as a harlot. The ego fertilizes the desire, sin is born and when grown up (i.e. completed in action) in turn gives birth to death. Cf. Rom. 6:23; 7:5. Death includes everything from present spiritual condition to God's final verdict at the last judgment. Contrast Jas. 1:12.

1:16–18 Ascribing all good to God

16, 17 Do not be deceived, because wrong thoughts lead to wrong conduct. If God tempted men, He would be nullifying His own work. He is the author of nothing but good. James expresses this in his picture of an unending shower of good and perfect gifts. We need not distinguish between the different kinds of gift. The two words, which are in the context of a hexameter, have a rhetorical effect. Father of lights means that God is their Creator. Obviously the heavenly bodies are indicated, but lights is charged with deeper meaning: they declare the glory of Him who is Light (cf. Ps. 19:1f.). For a majestic picture, cf. Is. 40:26. But for all the blessings brought by sun and stars, they are subject to change. They follow their prescribed orbit: in consequence night follows day and though the stars may set, God does not. On Him falls no shadow, as when a man finds himself in the shade through the 'movement' of the sun; and He is no insubstantial shadow but eternal reality. God is unchangeable in nature and consistent in character; He is always holy, righteous, loving, wise. He will never tempt.

18 As further evidence to dispel the deception that God tempts men, James refers to the action of the unchanging God in regeneration, which has moral implications. It would not be consistent for God to incite men to evil when His purpose in giving them the new life is moral and spiritual. Regeneration is neither an accident nor a natural development. It is of God's own will that believers are born again. Brought us forth is a term of maternity though it is not subject to the normal limitations. Its reference to the reception of salvation as a new birth reflects NT thought and experience (cf., e.g., Jn. 1:12f.; 3:3; 1 Pet. 1:23). If James has creation in mind at all he is thinking of the new creation. God's instrument in regeneration is the word of truth, the preached gospel—a 'perfect gift' indeed (v. 17). God's purpose is expressed metaphorically in a kind of first fruits. First fruits is the name of the first part of the produce to be gathered, 'all the best of the oil, and . . . of the wine and of the grain' (Nu. 18:12). The term suggests that the quality is of the finest and that the rest of the harvest will follow. The Greek (aparchē) is used of 'first convert(s)' in Rom. 16:5 and 1 Cor. 16:15. Christians should thus be models to the world and should expect to increase in number as the rest of the spiritual harvest is brought in.

1:19–27 Hearing and doing

19 The Word which regenerates also brings us under obligation. Know (Gk. iste) may be indicative or imperative, and scholars are divided. If it is indicative, the readers know ('us', v. 18) the content of the Word, the wealth of the gospel. If it is a command, it recalls the attention, perhaps of listeners as well as of readers, to the coming weighty utterance. James now switches to the third person imperative in his call for individual obedience. Such a command does not come naturally in English except when a man issues it through a neutral party, as when, for example, the president tells his secretary 'let the manager come and see me'. Three phrases follow, to which the rest of the section corresponds: quick to hear (vv. 21–25); slow to speak (vv. 26f.); slow to anger (v. 20). The widest application is possible. Each should be quick to hear the Word of God, the message of the preacher or teacher, the contribution of 'the other man' to any discussion. (The secret is to abide in Christ; cf. Jn. 15:1–10.) Each should refrain from hurried proclamation and swift retort, and from anger. The word for anger (Gk. orgē, not thymos) has some significance as used of the divine wrath. It is not an uncontrolled outburst of passion (slow to anger) and a period of reflection is thus suggested.

20 The anger of man has consequences. It disobeys Mt. 7:1 and is unrighteous. The righteousness of God is (strangely!) a quality of man and should be brought into being through the action of man. From one point of view it is the standard of human conduct which God demands and thus is an ideal; from the other point of view it is the work of a man who meets His demands. He is indeed obedient to the righteousness of God (cf. Rom. 10:3) and in his obedience he does work it.

21 Therefore: note the causal connection. Put away is a metaphor from dress and means 'take off' (the dirty clothes). The exhortation may reflect the teaching regularly given (the catechism) to candidates for church membership. Cf. 1 Pet. 2:1 and see E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter, 1946, pp. 393f. The moral outweighs the metaphorical. The readers should repudiate in principle, and disentangle themselves in fact from, their past non-Christian behaviour: the uncleanness and the wickedness which is both abundant and superfluous. Meekness or gentleness implies 'strength restrained'. When the Word is implanted, do not receive it roughly and resist it. It should take deep root. It may be asserted that the readers have received it already and indeed they have (v. 18); but they must constantly take it to heart afresh. Meekness is in contrast with the anger of v. 19, and suggests the receptivity of faith. It is not the merely scattered but the implanted word, the received word, which is able to save your souls both now and at the judgment.

22 Note the three stages: they should be hearers of the word; they should receive it; and they should be doers of the word. This recalls the teaching of Jesus; cf., e.g., Mt. 7:24–27; and of Paul; cf., e.g., Rom. 2:13. In full: consciousness is informed; belief and faith exercised; and the will moved. Without action the mere hearers are deceiving themselves, for they do not realize what piety really is.

23, 24 The reason is now given. The mere hearer is like a man who sees himself in a mirror. The word is compared to a mirror, for it shows a man to himself as he is and the sight is not pleasing. His natural face is the rendering of the difficult expression 'the face of his genesis'. Of the various possible translations of this word the best seems to be 'birth'. 'The face of his birth' must then mean 'the face he has had all the time', i.e. his own. The language recognizes that the Word addresses the individual and he knows that it does. But the mere hearer gives himself a glance and hurries off; and away from the mirror he at once forgets what he saw—though his face was dirty (cf. v. 21). He does not receive the Word and act on it.

25 In contrast to a momentary glimpse James now shows us an intense gaze. Looks into (Gk. parakypsas) pictures a person bending over something because he wants to see it better, like Mary who 'stooped to look into the tomb' (Jn. 20:11). Schlatter is struck by the attitude of the attentive and eager reader as he bows down over the roll of the Torah. James sees a man similarly looking into the perfect law. The law in question is not the law of ancient Israel but the gospel in its obligatory aspect, the standard of all Christian behaviour. For the gospel is both gift and demand. It is perfect in comparison with Gentile codes of law; and, better still, perfect as coming from Jesus. In its demands it may be called a law for Christians, but in its first impact it liberates and hence is the law of liberty. It is the charter of freedom throughout the Christian life. It does not support antinomianism but is still 'without the yoke of compulsion' (Epistle of Barnabas 2:6). The man who looks into it seriously is the man who perseveres. This quickly changes the metaphor. He so plunges into the Word and becomes steeped in it that he proves to be not a hearer that forgets but a doer that acts. Such a man will be blessed not only at the judgment but 'when he does it'. He shares the blessedness of the man who endures (cf. v. 12).

26, 27 These verses, misunderstood, are the secularist's paradise. But James is not thinking of 'religion without God'. He has in mind the external aspect of religion, the practice of religious observances. As we should say today, religion in this sense is what the observer sees taking place in church. The term may be summed up in the word 'ritual'. There is a valid distinction between the inner religious disposition and its outer expression in worship. But the man who thinks he is religious and does not control his speech but only deceives himself is not showing the true spirit of faith. At first sight it would seem that for James the complete outer expression of inner faith is the ethical, to visit the needy and to be morally unstained. He is not, however, blind to the place of worship. He is manifesting the spirit of protest. If, as here, moral duty is neglected, the ethical is put forward as the true ritual. If worship had been neglected in favour of secular morality and the care of the poor and defenceless, we may suspect that James would have called his readers to worship as the true morality. Protests inevitably tend to be one-sided. But both worship and morality are essential expressions of Christian faith: cf. Heb. 10:23–25.

Religion that is pure is free from sin, and it is undefiled when the worshippers are fit to draw near to God and the Father. The men in Jn. 18:28 were hardly undefiled in a manner to satisfy James. How not to visit is given in Jas. 2:16. To be unstained, which recalls the dirty clothes of v. 21, is possible only if we keep ourselves from too close an association with the world, which is hostile to God (cf. 4:4).

2:1–13 Discriminating

1 James continues the theme of the previous section by describing a situation which cries out for men to be doers of the Word (cf. 1:22). He calls his readers to refrain from acting with partiality. His Greek plural noun means 'acts of partiality'. Although he visualizes only one, partiality is shown in many ways, all of them valuing a man according to what he has and seems, rather than what he is. Such conduct does not befit Christians, who hold the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ. James wants to see their faith in action, effective. This is not the faith which the Lord Himself exercised. The phrase of our Lord Jesus Christ represents a Greek objective genitive which is more naturally rendered by '(faith) in our Lord . . .' (RSV rightly uses 'in' for the same Gk. construction in Mk. 11:22; Rom. 3:22; Gal. 2:16).

A worthy interpretation which goes back to Bengel (1687–1752) sees an apposition, 'our Lord . . . the glory'. Jesus is the glory. Glory means a. God as He has revealed Himself, His being, character, majesty and might; and b. the 'physical radiance' which symbolizes the divine presence (cf. Ex. 24:16f.; 40:34f.), the rabbinic Shekinah. Both are fulfilled in Jesus (cf. Jn. 1:14; 2 Cor. 4:6). Glory is not unrelated to 'Emmanuel'; cf. Mt. 1:23; 28:20. F. Mussner (Der Jakobusbrief, 1964) aptly points out that partiality acts as if Jesus were no longer the glory; the entrance of the rich is celebrated as if it were an appearing of the Lord Jesus Himself.

2 Notice the if. James is illustrating. Both men seem to be strangers and probably non-Christians. Both are judged by appearance. The Greek synagōgē may be an assembly or a place of assembly. We seem to be on Jewish soil but Christians predominate. Cf. Dt. 1:17. 3 The rich man is deemed worthy of a seat, perhaps a special one (cf. Mt. 23:6), and a please. The poor man is denied both and has to stand or to sit on the floor while the speaker sits in his own seat, which he might have courteously given up. You pay attention . . . and say . . . while you say . . . : these are plural; the 'sidesman' voices the thoughts of the congregation, which has gazed in awestruck wonder at the fine clothes. 4 James does not object to the courtesy shown by the dazzled congregation to the rich man; but he does criticize the unequal treatment given to both. The poor man is hardly likely to believe the preached Word now. Made distinctions is the same Greek verb as in 1:6 (diakrinō, translated 'doubt'). (See on 1:6.) The distinctions (doubt) consist in the fact that faith is manifested by attendance at the assembly and worldliness by contempt of the poor. The inconsistency is analogous to that of the doubter, the man with two souls. Among yourselves; i.e. these feelings are in their hearts, not openly expressed. They have proved to be judges directed by evil thoughts. Cf. 4:11.

5 James continues with vigour and affection. What a contrast is suggested between God's attitude and treatment, and theirs! The poor in this world's goods and therefore in the eyes of the world have been chosen to be rich in the realm of faith. They become rich indeed through faith. But the expression does not mean that they are rich in faith in the sense that they have great 'quantities' of it as a sort of compensation for their earthly poverty. They are rich now; and rich they will be, for they are heirs. Cf. 1:12. The man in shabby clothing can be a kind of sacramental sign of God's election. Cf. Dt. 7:6–8. 6 But you have dishonoured him; and, by implication, favoured the rich. But these are the very people who exploit you! Though James is illustrating by means of a typical example ('a man', v. 2) he is thinking of a class and he remembers the oppressive conduct of wealthy non-Christians. It is a familiar OT theme. 7 Further they . . . blaspheme the fair name of Jesus. In the OT the name of God was named over a man and he was in this way God's possession. The suggestion of the name of Jesus is therefore highly significant for Jewish Christians, for it re-affirms His glory. The name by which you are called may be the name 'Christian'. But a strict translation renders 'the name which was invoked over you' and a reference to baptism is possible. The name of Jesus was certainly invoked when men were baptized in His name. The citation of Am. 9:12 in Acts 15:17, from the LXX, by James himself shows that he was of broader vision than some have supposed: Gentiles have civic rights in the church of Christ. Over them the name is invoked.

8 The royal law (cf. Lv. 19:18) is 'kingly' as coming from God the King, to be observed by the subjects of His kingdom; and it has royal rank over the other commandments. It might be argued that the members of the congregation do love their neighbour—the rich man. 9 But they have not loved the poor man. James may be thinking of the context (cf. Lv. 19:15) of the scripture quoted in v. 8. If they show partiality, it is sheer disobedience to God's known will and it incurs His displeasure, for they commit sin (cf. 4:17). The law, like a judge, convicts them: 'you are transgressors'.

10 Cf. Dt. 27:26 (LXX) quoted in Gal. 3:10, and note the 'all things written' in relation to guilty of all. The law is a unity. The detailed laws express the detailed manner of loving one's neighbour. To fail in any one point is to fail in love. It does not mean that a man who steals a sum of money is automatically guilty of murder or adultery. The law is more than the sum of its commandments, and to obey one does not cancel the disobedience to another. Dishonouring the poor man is not covered by courtesy toward the rich. (To illustrate: a roof is supported by pillars; remove one and the roof still stands. A chain is constituted by links; break one and the whole chain is broken. The latter is the point.) The whole law expresses the whole will of God for man. This is how we should love our neighbour: with all the light thrown on to the law by the Sermon on the Mount (Mt. 5–7). 11 James drives this home by quoting Ex. 20:13, 14; Dt. 5:17, 18. Behind every commandment is he who said, the living God. J. Schneider helpfully says that 'he who gets over the fence in one place has got over it' (Die Briefe des Jakobus, Petrus, Judas und Johannes, 1961). Note that for James the scripture is decisive. It is relevant to say that the Decalogue is as binding today as it was to the early church.

12 The emphasis placed by James on conduct (cf. 1:22–27) is not merely 'practical Christianity'. Christian conduct is motivated. The readers are to receive the Word and to act as those who are to be judged . . . , i.e. they are to keep in mind that they are to be judged. Judgment will be under the law of liberty: it will be exercised through or by means of it. Cf. 1:25. Man wants to be his own master. The consequence is seen in 1:14f. Desire is deaf to the law. But in the gospel (cf. 1:21) the law has already been fulfilled. Jesus Christ fulfilled it for us. The reception of the gospel means regeneration (cf. 1:18) and the regenerated man wants to please God. The law shows him what he wants to do. The Christian is not like a dog tied to the chariot of Zeus. He gladly chooses to 'follow Me' without being 'tied'. He is thus free, and the gospel, in its demands on those who have accepted it, is well called a law of liberty. The 'new morality', by contrast, drives men into bondage.

13 For obviously gives an explanation. The thought is compressed by the omission of a whole clause. By a normal Greek idiom the for introduces the explanation of the omitted clause. The thought in full is thus: 'You are going to be judged—v. 12. (This is a fearful threat.) For judgment is without mercy. . . .' Cf. Mt. 18:33. Mercy is a feeling of compassion expressed in action (cf. vv. 15f.). It implies here at least the love of neighbour, to be shown in the right attitude to the poor man. The unmerciful do not understand mercy and in spite of any claim to faith they do not realize that they themselves are in debt to the mercy of Christ. Their alleged faith is not faith at all and they are ripe for judgment. The absolute statement that judgment is without mercy appears vindictive and sub-Christian. But this is not so. Judgment, as judgment, is merciless. The moment it shows mercy it ceases to be pure judgment. James is stating a general principle and he can match it with another general principle. To be unmerciful in a given case, to fail to love one's neighbour and to show partiality, is a particular case of sin (cf. v. 9) and James has a gospel which deals with all sin—the other general principle. He knows of a saving word (cf. 1:21) of grace (cf. 4:6) and forgiveness and sins covered (cf. 5:15, 20) and he can look forward to the second advent, which he would hardly do if the only prospect were judgment. And he speaks from personal experience. The law had not helped him but he had found mercy in Jesus. Through the cross he found that mercy triumphs over judgment.

2:14–26 Faith working

14 The rhetorical question, What does it profit . . . ? with its implied admonition (cf. 2:1ff.; 3:1ff.) states the theme of the section. Again notice the if (cf. 2:2). James supposes an example, no doubt drawing on his experience of pseudo-Paulinists. The careful wording suggests a claim to faith, a comment and a question. A man says, 'I have faith.' But, comments James, in actual fact he is without works. The claim and the comment constitute the hypothesis. If this is the situation, says James, nothing can be gained from it. 'Faith of that kind cannot save him, can it?' (The implied answer is 'No'.) The claim to faith is unsupported by evidence of its reality, for there is no discernible evidence: he has not works. For James, salvation depends on the word received and obeyed (1:21f.). 15, 16 This is not an actual event: James still says if and he thinks of a brother or sister. An actual event would require a specific person. James is using his imagination and is making a comparison from what we should call social work. His point is that goodwill or a friendly attitude is not enough. He therefore repeats his question. 'What's the good?'—sociologically, in the realm of human welfare, not that of eternal salvation. Contrast Mk. 5:34b.

17 So: as in social work goodwill without works is dead, so in religion faith without works is dead. The dead do not do anything! Faith by itself corresponds to 'faith alone' in v. 24 and to 'faith apart from works' in v. 26. It is perhaps tautological to translate by 'inwardly' (J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. James, 1913) as it has no 'externals'. It is instructive here to consider Lk. 23:43. The penitent thief had no time left for works; and faith had no time in which to die. James would not have dissented from this. He sees faith as having had time for expression in works but the opportunity was not taken.

18 This verse is notoriously difficult. It is largely a question of who speaks and where the marks of quotation are to be put. But some one (Gk. tis) will say is the mark of an objection; and the tis belongs to the style. There are two possibilities. a. The some one might be a man (tis) of v. 14 or his representative. He merely says, You (James) have faith. He means: 'You are in the same position as we are; you are one of us.' James sharply replies, and I (emphasized) have works, and continues with his attack, Show me. . . . b. On the other hand James may be keeping himself in the background and the some one may be speaking on his behalf and answering the tis, a man of v. 14. He begins by saying, You have faith (as you say, v. 14) and I have works. He continues his offensive. Knowing that faith is an inner attitude and that the man claims to have it, he says, 'Show it.' At the back of his mind is the thought, 'if you can. I doubt it.' For it is impossible to show it without works, which the man does not have. He finishes the round with a heavy blow: I by my works will show you my faith. This is possible because the works express the faith.

19 The attack is resumed and pressed home. Perhaps the man will try to show his faith by reference to its contents. 'You are a monotheist in belief? (The Gk. may be interrogative.) Good!' This is a sincere comment (cf. Dt. 6:4), for the doctrine is basic; but it becomes ironical. You have not demonstrated your Christian faith; indeed you keep strange company: the demons believe just as you do, and shudder at the exorcistic formula, 'one God', in fear of His power. Your 'faith' is merely the popular, intellectual (though not necessarily learned) idea, and it can be combined with evil. Just as the demons believe and continue their wickedness; so you too can believe and go on sinning. The point is not that the content of faith was wrong but that it was inadequate. We might fitly compare Tit. 1:16; Heb. 11:6.

20 James speaks in his own name here. Is proof desired? He adds Scripture (v. 21) to reason to show that faith apart from works is barren, i.e. idle (cf. Mt. 20:3, 6), inoperative, useless. The vocative is characteristic of the diatribe (see Introduction). Foolish (vocative of Gk. kenos, empty) is like the 'Raca' of Mt. 5:22 (AV, RSV mg.); i.e. 'empty simpleton'. Cf. our modern 'There's nothing in him'. 21 The expected answer is 'Yes'. His son Isaac upon thd altar is from Gn. 22:9 (LXX) with 'laid' changed to offered. Abraham . . . offered his son in principle. If justified means 'deemed righteous' it can be used in two ways. It can be used of a man who has actually lived righteously (cf. Gn. 18:19) and is therefore righteous 'as a result of works'. This is what James means. Or it can be used of a man who is not thus righteous (cf. Rom. 3:10) but is deemed righteous by the mercy of God. This is Paul's doctrine of justification.

22 You (singular) is the man of v. 14 and an appeal is made to his insight and his desire 'to be shown' (v. 20). Observe the same notes: faith 'worked' along with his works (and not vice versa). The works were not secular morality but deeds of faith; as a result of works, faith is shown really to exist (v. 18), to be living or 'vital' (v. 17) and fruitful (v. 20), i.e. completed, perfected, mature. True faith thus combines belief (of doctrine), trust (in Christ) and moral action (works of love).

Surprising as it may seem, Pauline justification is abstract. The doctrine has been sharpened, emphasized and isolated in thought as a result of the conflict of faith and works. But justification itself is abstract in the sense that though we may consider it by itself as a doctrine, the experience does not occur by itself. There is no case of 'pure' justification. No man ever existed who was justified without something else happening at the same time. At the moment of justification he is born again, receives a new nature and is incorporated in Christ. So far James would not be unsympathetic.

But now a new factor enters—the time element. At least some period must elapse, however small, between 'first faith' and good works. Paul's point is that God accepts a man as soon as he believes. James is considering a man who believes but who has neglected every opportunity for good works from the time of his 'first faith'. James looks for fruit and finds only leaves. Paul would understand this (cf. Gal. 5:6). But at the moment of conversion faith, for him, is everything; and James says that the Word must be received (Jas. 1:21). During the subsequent Christian life the believer's 'walk' must avoid sin, which is not merely the negative 'sins of omission'; he should positively obey God (cf. Rom. 6:1–4, 13; Eph. 2:8–10). This Pauline emphasis on good works is reflected in the view of James that faith without works is worthless (cf. 2:14); it is not faith at all, certainly not Christian faith. These two positions are not inconsistent. Paul thinks especially of the beginning of the Christian life; James thinks of its continuance. At the beginning all that is needed is faith; if faith is genuine, works will follow.

23 James sees in all this the fulfilment of Gn. 15:6. Abraham really believed. If this is regarded as in some sense a prophecy, it was fulfilled in Abraham's actual readiness to offer (a sacrificial technical term) his son. It was a work of faith. The rest of the citation from Gn. 15:6 (it was reckoned . . .) and the allusion to friend of God (Is. 41:8; cf. 2 Ch. 20:7), one who loves Him and is loved by Him (cf. Dn. 3:35, LXX), are the divine verdicts on Abraham. (Notice Paul's complementary use of this same text, Gn. 15:6, in Rom. 4:1–5; cf. Gal. 3:6f.)

24 You (readers) see; plural. The thought is now general and not restricted to Abraham; contrast v. 21. Paul and James present different 'causes' or instruments of justification, which are not alternatives. To illustrate: an owner of a large estate invites the unemployed and their families to enter his park, to walk (with him) to his mansion and he will feed, clothe and house them. Two old friends meet in the house. 'How did you get here?' they ask each other. 'I came in through the gate, as invited', says one. 'I walked up the drive', says the other. This is what Paul and James are saying. How does a man get in? By accepting the invitation and going through the gate (Paul); by the walk from the gate to the house (James). Paul also believes in the driveway; and James also believes in the gate; but their emphases are different. Both gate and driveway are necessary though either may be given as the method. Similarly a man is justified by faith, and justified by works. The faith must be living and the works inspired by faith. They are distinguished in thought and must be united in fact. J. Jeremias neatly picks up the salient points of emphases thus: Christian faith and Jewish deeds (Paul); Jewish faith and Christian deeds (James). Paul insists on Christian faith, not Jewish deeds, works of the law, to justify (cf. Rom. 3:28). James will not consider Jewish faith (monotheism; cf. v. 19) but requires Christian deeds as evidence of being justified.

25 See Jos. 2:1–24; 6:15–25; Mt. 1:5; Heb. 11:31. Paul could have used this example (cf. 1 Cor. 6:9–11). 26 A dead theism or even a dead orthodoxy has little value in the eyes of James. Cf. v. 17 and 4:17. Without pressing the parallelism too far we may say that the unity of body and spirit aptly points to the unity of faith and works.

3:1–18 Teaching with reticence and wisdom

1 James, true to his emphasis on a living faith, takes up his references to speaking in 1:19, 26 (cf. 2:12), and expresses himself in a very direct way that is difficult to render into English. 'Do not become teachers in great numbers.' The position of teacher was esteemed in the Christian community and was therefore attractive; and it could be dangerous to the church. Well-meaning but unqualified men, or even self-righteous men, might seize opportunities for teaching, with disastrous results. Teachers inevitably talk, but they do not all talk wisely (cf. v. 13) or peaceably. They must have a sense of responsibility. James appeals to what is definitely known already, by using a Pauline formula you know (Gk. eidotes; cf., e.g., Rom. 13:11), and includes himself with the teachers in the liability to 'greater condemnation'. He does not forget forgiveness (cf. 5:15) though the reminder of judgment is wholesome. The comparative adjective greater suggests 'degrees' of treatment at the judgment and accords with our Lord's teaching (cf., e.g., Lk. 12:47f.). James shows the same serious attitude to speech that his Master did (cf. Mt. 12:36f.) and is close to His Greek language (cf. Lk. 20:47; both there and in Jas. 3:1 the Greek is lambanō krima, 'to receive condemnation', in the future tense).

2 For gives the reason for giving the warning. Translate: 'We all stumble (cf. 2:10) (including James) in many ways (or, often).' James may already have the picture of the horse in mind. This is general, but he turns to sins of speech and his words are applicable to others besides teachers. Speech is a test case: absence of failure here implies a perfect man, a finished character. As regards teachers the sin would be not so much false doctrine as disputatiousness and 'knowing better'. Even the teacher can learn. If perfect he can bridle not only his tongue but also the whole realm of impulse expressed through the body. This is not the asceticism which kills but the discipline which controls.

3, 4 James gives two simple illustrations of what the 'perfect man' is able to do. Note the contrast of small and great. The strong winds suggest the violence of the impulses which the perfect man controls. 5 The small bridle or bit and the small rudder can direct large objects because they themselves are controlled. But the unbridled tongue, though only a little member, can have large effects which continue without restraint. It boasts of great achievements, done or promised. Like the rudder, it ought to be controlled by the will (v. 4) and further guided by reason (cf. 1:26) and the Word. But it is no more under control than a spark in dry brushwood. A tiny spark can kindle a forest fire which may blaze for weeks and go on smouldering for months. Speech is equally dangerous and hence its effects run riot. A little book of heresy can set the church ablaze; a whisper of gossip can inflame a city.

6 And the tongue is indeed a fire. An unrighteous world represents (not incorrectly) the Greek 'the world of unrighteousness'. In the light of Lk. 16:8 (Gk. 'the steward of unrighteousness') and Lk. 18:6 (Gk. 'the judge of unrighteousness') we can say that the world does unrighteousness. It also stains (cf. Jas. 1:27) and is hostile to God (cf. 4:4). This has points of contact with John (cf. Jn. 7:7; 15:18f.; 17:14f.). It seems plain that the tongue is a world in miniature. 'The tongue is settled in our members as the world of unrighteousness, (the tongue) that stains the whole personality. . . .' James goes on to think not only of the individual but of humanity at large. The tongue inflames the cycle of nature, i.e. 'the wheel of genesis' (cf. on 1:23). We can dismiss doctrines of reincarnation from the exposition of the robust Jewish Christian James. He loosely uses a Hellenistic expression associated with the Orphic mysteries and ultimately with Indian thought. It seems to mean here 'course of life'. Now the tongue is concerned with communication. Each speaker may be seen standing in the cycle or 'circle' of humanity and setting it on fire with desire, suspicion, rivalry, hatred and war. (The picture may be that of the red-hot axle setting the wheel alight.) The tongue itself is set on fire by hell, or 'Gehenna' (RSV mg.). The term 'Gehenna' is used for the devil; analogous to this is the use of 'heaven' for God in 'kingdom of heaven'. Gehenna is the Greek form of the Hebrew 'Gehinnom', 'valley of Hinnom'. As a result of threats of judgment over it in Je. 7:32; 19:6, apocalyptic literature came to regard it as the hell of the last judgment. (See NBD, arts. 'Eschatology' and 'Hell'.) James sees a Satanic origin for evil speech.

7, 8 These verses justify the previous verse. Cf. Gn. 1:26f.; 9:2. It is an element in the nature of man to subdue all members of the animal creation. This is confirmed by past experience and present practice: can be tamed should be rendered 'is being tamed'; the process continues. It is similarly the nature of animals to be subdued by man. But no man can tame the tongue. The Pelagians, who laid stress on human effort in salvation, read v. 8 as a question. The tongue is a restless evil: it will not stay still. Even its echoes can kill, when the original speaker is silent. Cf. Ps. 140:3.

9 Cf. Gn. 1:27; Ps. 62:4. James is thinking either of humanity or of Christians. In the former case he means that we churchmen and we worldlings use the same instrument, the tongue. 'We worldlings' is not a happy expression but it is inevitable on the present interpretation. James then identifies himself with humanity, though not necessarily with its cursing. If, however, he is thinking of Christians only he means that we Christians 'attend church' and quarrel socially. The we of pastoral tact shows how far James could go in his desire to win rather than repel. It is pure speculation to ask if James himself ever could curse men, even though he says we curse men. The next verse shows his attitude, which is like that of Paul (cf. Rom. 12:14).

A quite different matter is raised by 1 Cor. 16:22; Gal. 1:8f.

10 Not necessarily at the same time. The inconsistency raises questions about the reality of the worship, both public and private. 11, 12 James is sure of the answers to his questions even as he asks them. These are more than apt illustrations. Nature itself in its consistency has a lesson for man, especially as he (not nature) is made in the image of God; and the final statement suggests the need of regeneration (cf. 1:18) and a living faith (cf. 2:17). A grapevine produces grapes, not figs; the tongue should produce that which accords with the gospel. If it produces both blessing and cursing, its owner is a man of two souls (cf. 1:7f.).

13 James now turns to the teachers, for in late Judaism they (Rabbis) were identified with the wise. The question is pointed (understanding is almost our 'scholar') but the force is conditional: if there is a man who applies his knowledge to the production of good behaviour.... Wisdom is analogous to faith (cf. 2:18) and must be shown by works. The temptation of teachers is to be purely theoretical; and arrogant (cf. Jn. 7:49). James wants the knowledge to issue in good conduct and not to be roughly hurled at simple souls. They must not be always 'putting people right' nor engaging in controversy with 'rivals' in the work of teaching. Some of the churches may be suffering from the activities of Pauline or pseudo-Pauline extremists.

14 But if you have . . . selfish ambition: the ambition (Gk. eritheia) savours of selfish canvassing and election intrigue, illegal manipulation for one's own advantage, the base self-seeking of those who cannot aspire to higher pursuits. Such behaviour is no qualification for a teacher or for any Christian; therefore do not boast of your wisdom. Inasmuch as to boast is to use speech, to be false to the truth is to lie against it, and 'against' involves a measure of hostility to it. But truth is God's instrument in regeneration (cf. 1:18). If the words of James are applicable to any readers they have wandered from the truth in its demands if not in its doctrines (cf. 5:19; 1:21f.).

15 This sort of wisdom is not . . . from above (cf. 1:5, 17). Its range is earthly and secular; its nature is non-supernatural, without the characteristic touch of regeneration (cf. 1 Cor. 2:14; Jude 19); and its source and home is the devil. The teachers are short-sighted, belie their own conversion experience and play into the hands of the enemy. 16 Disorder means the disruption of the peace of the community. James does not mean that every local church will have every vile practice but that there is a causal connection between jealousy and selfish ambition on the one hand and disorder . . . on the other. Cf. Gal. 5:19f. The practice includes that which caused it, i.e. the jealousy and selfish ambition perpetuate themselves both as causes and results.

17 This verse describes what the heavenly wisdom does for men—not only teachers: cf. 1:5, where the 'any man' may not be of great intellect. Wisdom which is pure controls the thoughts (cf. Phil. 4:8); as peaceable it counteracts those who are 'spoiling for a fight' and as gentle (Gk. epieikes) it does not insist on its rights or the letter of the law. In being open to reason it will consider any sound argument, not merely one from a limited field; it wants to yield if in good conscience it can. It is always animated by mercy, a compassion which acts as well as feels, with good results: it produces good fruits. It has no uncertainty for it has no inner cleavage (cf. 1:6) and makes no unworthy distinctions (cf. 2:4). At its heart is no insincerity and it adopts no pose.

18 The unusual 'sowing the harvest' is not impossible. A farmer might point to a fine field and say that 'the crop was sown in bad weather'. Here righteousness has a crop. Righteousness is described in v. 17. Those with wisdom from above act as in v. 17 and it requires thought and effort (cf. Mt. 5:9): they have to make peace. It is not the peace of the cemetery. Such 'good life' (v. 13) or behaviour tends to reproduce itself. If peace is the motive and the atmosphere, the local church will not be divided, and in large measure it will be due to the mastery of the tongue.

4:1–17 Breaking the peace and loving the world

1 James cannot be thinking of wars and fightings between nations. Cf. 3:14, 16. If the whole letter is indeed steeped in the thought of Jesus, it is natural to think of Mt. 5:21f. 'War' implies continued hostility; 'battle' the occasional outburst. There may possibly be a further distinction. 'To battle' is used in Greek for violent verbal dispute and for 'making a scene'. In prolonged disputes which are wars actual weapons may be envisaged. The immediate cause of dissension may be doctrinal difference or social distinction: theological or economic (cf. 2:1f., 6; 3:1, 13). Peace is not 'natural' but has to be created: cf. Eph. 4:2f. The source of strife is passions, literally 'pleasures', which Dibelius acutely identifies with 'desires' (cf. v. 2 'you desire', not 'you enjoy'). Here they do not war against the soul (as in 1 Pet. 2:11) but against reason (cf. Rom. 7:23) and love of one's neighbour (cf. 2:8), using guile as well as force (cf. 1:14). Notice the unity of body and soul: the tongue is a member (cf. 3:5f.).

2 The desiring and the not-having are continuous: there is no lasting possession. Covet may not be an anticlimax as it shows the inner motive of the 'killing'. See RSV mg. It includes envy and jealousy—the cause of some evil crimes. The momentary satisfaction leaves a gaping emptiness. So you go on killing and fighting and warring. This may be interpreted figuratively. R. V. G. Tasker (TNTC, p. 87), points out that the sentences may be taken as virtually conditional. 'If you desire . . . the result is you kill. And if you covet . . . the result is you fight and wage war.'

3 Their great failure is in the life of prayer. Do they ask or do they not? Some see here an afterthought, a swift admission: 'yes, you do pray, but . . .'. It may, however, reflect the Hebraic difficulty of expressing an exception. Cf. Gn. 2:16f. They do not receive because they always ask for things; and they are wrong things requested with the wrong motive: to spend . . . on (and 'in') their pleasures. Spend covers more than money and has an air of lavish waste. Murder and prodigality: some will wonder if Christians can be thus guilty. Perhaps race riots reveal how thin the lid may be which holds down the desire to kill and waste. Note that it is possible for men to pray wrongly.

4 Unfaithful creatures is literally 'adulteresses' and is used for spiritual unfaithfulness. The marriage metaphor is found in the OT (cf., e.g., Is. 54:5) and is used by our Lord (cf. Mt. 12:39) and by Paul (cf. 2 Cor. 11:2). James implies the doctrine of the church as the bride of Christ. He passes on, however, to the thought of friendship. Friendship with the world is logically and spiritually incompatible with friendship with God: logically because both God and the world make total demands and spiritually because to ally oneself with the world is to take the world's point of view, which is enmity with God. James is clear-cut, black or white; he is no man of two souls (cf. 1:8). Whoever wishes to be a friend of the world exercises his choice and 'prefers' the world rather than God as friend. He thereby makes himself an enemy of God whether he at first realizes it or not. James expects his readers at any rate to follow him here: do you not know . . . ? Therefore. . . .

5 The scripture has not been identified in the OT. There may be a general allusion to such passages as Ho. 11:8. Either the two friendships are incompatible or the scripture is in vain and has no meaning. The jealously is as noble as that of a true husband for a faithless wife. The 'yearning' is illustrated in Phil. 1:8. He who yearns is God, as the tenor of vv. 5, 6 suggests. The spirit can hardly be the Holy Spirit, in view of v. 6a: God does not give grace to the Holy Spirit, who is Himself the Spirit of grace (Heb. 10:29). The spirit is the breath of life of Gn. 2:7 (cf. Jas. 2:26). It would be difficult to make it the subject (though linguistically possible) owing to the absence of an object and the unnecessary emendation of the verb made to dwell. In the 'yearning' God makes a claim for Himself alone.

6 Gives . . . grace is an anticipation of the fuller quotation introduced by it says (cf. Pr. 3:34, LXX). James calls it a 'greater' grace, which is greater than that already given in the breath of life (Mussner); and greater in view of the greater requirement (Ropes), which recalls Rom. 5:20. Some feel that grace has not for James the rich meaning that it had for Paul. But before accepting this we should consider the dark picture of sin presented by James and his belief about forgiveness (cf. 5:15). Grace must be received with humility; independence before God involves the divine opposition. James is still clear-cut: either pride or humility from man and opposition or grace from God. Cf. 1 Pet. 5:5f.

7 Therefore James calls for humility: submit . . . to God. His motive is that they may receive grace: the judgment may be avoided, or at least the judgment of condemnation. He then shows how to submit and gives encouragement with a promise. Negatively, he urges his readers to submit . . . to God by opposing His enemy: resist the devil . . . (cf. Lk. 4:13). The battle is constantly renewed and the promise holds. Cf. Lk. 22:28 AV which has 'temptations' instead of RSV and NEB 'trial(s)'. Note how James removes any possible misunderstanding. In v. 4 he spoke of the world and God. Now he shows what is involved in this opposition: it is between the devil and God.

8 James wants more than a negative submission. Positively he desires his readers to draw near to God. This was a characteristically priestly act in the OT (cf. Ex. 19:22; Ezk. 44:13) but it is now spread over the whole company of believing men (cf. Heb. 7:19). The best comment on he will draw near to you is Lk. 15:20. The first step in man's salvation is taken by God, because to draw near to God is itself a response to His prior call. Having given encouragement James gives a strong call to repentance in a series of sharp and urgent imperatives. He is the surgeon who cuts rather than the masseur. Cleanse . . . and purify . . . is the language of religious approach to God, with moral intent (cf. Ex. 30:19f.; 40:31f.). The purified man is 'religiously qualified', i.e. is in a state of holiness for encounter with God. The hands symbolize the outer act and the hearts the inner intention. It is not without significance that Levitical cleansing of the hands is necessary at times of prayer. Note the means of cleansing in Acts 15:9 (and who was listening then, in Acts 15:12, 13). We should not separate too widely the cleansing and the purifying, the hands and the heart, the sinners and the men of two souls (cf. 1:8). Cf. Ps. 24:4.

9 Be wretched . . . : if repentance is real, let it show itself. This is the very opposite of nominal religion. According to Rengstorf the Rabbis did not often speak of laughter. It comes from enemies and from fools and in the rabbinic view marks the rejection of God's universal control and the affirmation of human autonomy. There is no room for frivolity in repentance, and joy should await the divine renewal. 10 The severe words are followed by encouragement. The Lord . . . will exalt those who humble themselves before Him. If the laughter is secular, the humbling should not be: it should be before the Lord. The consequent exaltation is the only one to be prized (cf. Lk. 16:15).

11 Still mindful of the wars and battles and the hot words which flow (cf. 4:1) and of the uncontrolled tongue generally (cf. 3:8), James seriously (and now affectionately, brethren) urges his readers not to speak evil against one another, to 'cease from mutual slander'. Defamation of character judges a man unheard and is forbidden. It is an offence against the law, against the whole law (cf. 2:8, 10), and it actually defames and judges the law. For the speaker implies superior knowledge and an independent position, as if he himself were not under the law. When he ought to be a doer of the law by obeying it, he is putting himself above it as well as above his brother. He has made himself a judge; and not merely a judge who administers the law but something further.

12 He has made himself a lawgiver. He has really set up another law by which he judges his brother. This denies God, sins against God and arrogantly usurps His position. Solemnly James asserts: There is one lawgiver and judge. (The word one would raise emotions in many a Jew; cf. Dt. 6:4.) He does not weakly advise; He commands, judges and implements His decisions. For all power is His to match His righteousness. He can save and He can destroy. The rhetorical question, who are you . . . ? needs no answer by James. If there is any Christian conscience left, the answer will come. Note the final echo in neighbour (cf. 2:8). Whoever he is, he is to be loved, whether he is in the world or in the church. The repeated 'brethren' . . . 'brother' in v. 11 shows that James is speaking to the church, but the spirit of the loveless world has broken into it.

13 James now turns to other 'superior' people, those who set themselves above (not the law but) providence or destiny. He begins brusquely: 'Now then, you who say . . . we will go into the city of So-and-so. . . .' Their attitude is not merely decision or even determination. It is secular independence (who or what is to stop us?). James is not attacking the profit motive so much as the failure to take God into their thinking. They act as if they control the future. They do not say 'let us go . . .' but exhibit the cold, merciless confidence of grand administration with a whole year in prospect. Relentless bureaucracy could hardly go further. 14 But even tomorrow is hidden from their eyes. The answer to the question, 'What sort of a life is yours?' (cf. the French comment est . . . ?) is not expressed but it is implied, and for gives the reason for it. What is your life? Cannot you see that it is a thing of futility? For you are a mist, or vapour, which appears . . . and then 'disappears'. In place of their self-security there is nothing but transitoriness: a vapour ends in a rainbow or a drain. Cf. 1:10f. and, in literature, William Shakespeare, The Tempest IV.1.156.

> . . . the great globe itself,
> Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve
> And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
> Leave not a rack behind. (rack = cloud)

15 If the Lord wills is the familiar DV (Deo volente), which is the decisive factor to be remembered in all planning. Cf. Acts 18:21; 1 Cor. 4:19. Life itself (we shall live) as well as planning is dependent on God. A possible Semitic interpretation is: 'If the Lord wills that we go on living, we shall do this or that', but it is not so convincing. 16 As it is, when you ought to say 'God willing', you boast in what you say in v. 13. The arrogance here lies in deliberately claiming to be more than you are, the proud master of life and of time. All such boasting is evil because God is Lord of creation, of nature and of history and time.

17 This verse should begin with 'therefore'. James is stating the sin of omission, and it is universally applicable. The merchants know their duty but suppress the knowledge. This is relevant sometimes for 'big business'. Note the transition from 'evil' in v. 16 to sin and the Christian answer to the unbeliever who says that he 'has done nobody any harm'. To fail to do what is right includes failure to receive and obey the word.

5:1–6 Accusing the rich

1 James now turns from the merchants to the great landed proprietors, the owners of vast estates. He writes like a prophet, not so much calling to repentance as announcing a doom, and addressing the rich directly and with vigour. 'Now then, you rich, weep and howl in mourning' because of your impending experiences of wretchedness.

2, 3 The ruin of their wealth is expressed in the perfect tense, which some have supposed to be the 'prophetic perfect'—the future event is so certain that it can be described in a past tense. But it can be argued that these men have so much wealth that they cannot use it all. Consequently their grain has rotted; their 'changes of raiment' have become moth-eaten; their coins and ornaments of gold and silver have tarnished. (Rust must not be pressed here. James is not writing as a scientist; and anyway the Greek ios means 'poison' as well as rust, as in 3:8.) The diction is traditional: cf. Ecclus. 29:10; Gospel of Thomas, 76; Mt. 6:19f.; literary dependence on Matthew is not established (cf. D. Guthrie, New Testament Introduction: Hebrews to Revelation, 1962; W. G. Kümmel, Introduction to the New Testament, 1966). The very rust—and the moth holes and the mouldy grain—will be evidence, at the judgment, of economic carelessness and social callousness. Will eat your flesh: Mussner tentatively compares the rust with the leprosy of hell which consumes the flesh of the condemned: cf. Nu. 12:12; and for the association of leprosy and burning cf. Lv. 13:24f. For the last days: read 'in (Gk. en) the last days', as in Acts 2:16f. The estate owners are blind or unconcerned.

4 And worse: with all their resources they have not paid their men. The fields here must imply something like 'broad acres'. The verse is in the form of synthetic parallelism. The withheld pay which shouts (now—not at the judgment) is therefore linked with the cries of the harvesters ('pay us our money!'). Both parties are heard by the Lord of hosts. Cf. Am. 4:13. Hosts, or armies, has been taken to mean: a. the armies of Israel (cf. 1 Sa. 17:45); b. the armies of heaven, i.e. the stars and the forces of nature (cf. Gn. 2:1); c. the armies of angels (cf. 1 Ki. 22:19; Is. 6:1–5). History, nature and the supernatural are tools in the divine hand to vindicate the oppressed.

5 And not only the oppressed but righteousness itself will be vindicated. From the standpoint of the coming judgment James looks back upon their whole life on the earth as luxury and voluptuousness. Cf. Lk. 16:19, 'every day'. He presses home his charge with prophetic vigour. You have fattened—your hearts! They were like the rich fool who wanted his soul to eat and drink (cf. Lk. 12:19), and they were equally blind to their imminent doom. They continue in their sins to the very end, absorbed in them, oblivious of the fact that they are in a day of slaughter. Observe how delicately and dramatically James has made use of Jeremiah's phrase, 'for the day of slaughter' (Je. 12:3).

6 Change to the staccato: 'You condemned! You slew the righteous man!' The righteous is here collective and it is thus best to omit man. Cf. Ps. 37:12, 'the righteous', 'him', in the singular; and Ps. 37:17, where 'the righteous' is plural. As the righteous is a Messianic title (cf. Acts 7:52), James seems to see the condemnation of the Messiah repeated in the experience of His righteous servants. In both cases the rich may have controlled the courts. Ropes, following the text of Westcott and Hort, takes the last clause as a question: 'Does not the Righteous One resist you?' (sc. 'Yes, He does').

5:7–11 Waiting patiently for the Lord

7 Patient here has reference to time rather than to pain. Therefore links with the preceding section and reveals the connection between the judgment and the parousia, the coming of the Lord. Any poor brethren can be encouraged. It is unlikely that James has the coming destruction of Jerusalem in mind. He aids his admonition by an example which would be familiar to all. A problem in geometry may be solved slowly or quickly, even instantaneously by a genius; but the farmer has to accept the necessary elapse of time. Early and late remind us of the germination of the seed and the maturing of the grain respectively. Cf. Dt. 11:14.

8 James 'applies' the lesson. The farmer exercises patience: you also be patient. Establish, i.e. strengthen, your hearts (not 'fatten', v. 5) with the thought that the coming of the Lord is at hand. This is the true cure for double-mindedness (Mayor; cf. 1:8). The verb is at hand (Gk. ēngiken) implies nearness but not actual 'arrival'. The coming had obviously not yet taken place. This is important evidence in the interpretation of Mk. 1:15, where the same verb is used. The kingdom of God is similarly at hand in Jesus but there is still room for its final coming in the second advent. If this is not so, James was completely wrong.

9 James knows that distress or anxiety can embitter, and so loosen tongues. He therefore gives an affectionate exhortation to the brethren: do not grumble. He is well aware that grumbling against one another is a form of judging, which has its own consequences (cf. Mt. 7:1; Rom. 2:1). The nearness of the Judge adds to the solemnity of the warning. The bare statement, the Judge is standing at the doors, is striking and effective. Contrast the same Figure in Rev. 3:20. In James He just stands; in Revelation He speaks, even before the man inside opens the door. The fact that James says nothing to indicate who opens the door adds to the tension. Cf. 4:11f.

10 James assumes the readers' familiarity with biblical tradition and their knowledge of the national 'roll of honour', the classical expression of which we find in Heb. 11. In particular they knew of the prophets as martyrs. This helps to explain why James asks his readers to take the prophets rather than our Lord as an example, in contrast with Peter (cf. 1 Pet. 2:21). Christians knew that He was more than a martyr. Suffering and patience imply that the prophets endured what was imposed on them. The idea of time (v. 7) is now merging with endurance. Prophets are well defined as men who speak in the name of the Lord.

11 We call those happy who were steadfast is an appropriate attitude to national heroes. Cf. Ecclus. 44 beginning 'let us now praise famous men'. The recipients have heard of the steadfastness of Job, not only in common talk but also in the public reading of the OT Scriptures. The RSV rendering of the Greek telos as purpose is open to question. The word may mean 'end' in the sense of termination (cf. Mk. 3:26; Heb. 7:3); 'goal' (cf. 1 Tim. 1:5); or 'result' (cf. Rom. 6:21). James means 'the end which the Lord brought about' and the expression is a Hebraism. Dibelius helpfully points to Mt. 26:58. Peter went to see, not 'the end of Jesus', but 'how it would turn out'. Render how the Lord is compassionate . . . by 'because the Lord is compassionate . . .'. Cf. Pss. 103:8; 111:4.

5:12 Swearing forbidden

Cf. Mt. 5:34–37. The link with the previous section is provided by the thought of judgment (cf. v. 9). The prohibition is absolute. No compromise (cf. 1:8)! Above all is a mark of epistolary style: 'Above all I ought not to forget' (Mussner) to urge you. . . . Cf. 1 Pet. 4:8.

5:13–20 Applying spiritual principles

13 The vivacious questions are really hypothetical, in the style of the diatribe (see Introduction). Cf. 3:13; 1 Cor. 7:18, 21, 27. The verb suffering is cognate with the noun in v. 10. It means 'being at the receiving end' of something unpleasant. The sufferer should 'keep on praying'. The cheerful man is not frivolous but 'of good heart', 'with good morale', like soldiers before a battle. He should sing praise. To pray and to praise are both positive responses to experience. 14 Note that the patient is conscious: he is to summon the elders, the presbyters who hold office in the local church. The anointing may be before or during the time of prayer. Oil was regarded as therapeutic and it may be here suggested as an 'aid to faith', or a stimulus to faith. Charismatic gifts are not suggested (cf. 1 Cor. 12:9, 28, 30). In the name may mean 'in the context of (the invocation of) the name' or 'in the power of the name'.

15 There is ambiguity here and in v. 14. Sick renders two Greek words, astheneō (v. 14) and kamnō (v. 15). The former refers to illness but is also cognate with the Greek adjective asthenēs, 'helpless' (cf. Rom. 5:6), which is used as a description of sinners. Save is concerned with salvation from wrath in Rom. 5:9f. but the same Greek word (sōzō) is used medically in Mk. 6:56, 'made well'. The sick man is indicated by a verb (Gk. kamnō) which is used of exertion and of illness and even of the dead (cf. Wisdom 4:16) but never apparently of the dying (Mussner). It is used of wearying, both literally and spiritually: '. . . that you may not weary and (like runners) crack up in your souls' (Heb. 12:3). Raise is used of resurrection, but far from exclusively: it can mean 'rouse from sleep' or 'lift up' from bed or floor. The perfect tense of the Greek verb rendered has committed sins implies something like 'is still in (the power of unforgiven) sin' (cf. Jn. 8:21, 24; 1 Cor. 15:17). The ambiguity caused by the different meanings of all these words can hardly be denied. It is possible to give a consistent medical or a consistent religious interpretation. Either the patient is ill and the prayer of faith will heal him and the Lord will raise him from his bed; or he is helpless and weary spiritually and he will be saved in a spiritual resurrection. James may be ambiguous deliberately, leaving his readers to choose the interpretation which accords with the outcome of the elders' visit. For everything is subject to God's will. He may heal: the medical terms will then fit. If He does not heal, the gospel terms are appropriate, for a Christian man ('any among you', v. 14) when conscious would not refrain from adding a sincere 'Amen' to the prayer of faith. In either case the concluding reference to being forgiven is relevant.

This verse is a very precarious foundation for the Extreme Unction of Roman Catholicism. The first known author to employ the expression was Peter Lombard (c. 1100–1160) and from his time Extreme Unction has been one of the Seven Sacraments, according to Roman theology. The patient usually receives the anointing when he is on the point of death, and recovery is normally not expected. By contrast there is little in James to commend the Roman practice. He says nothing explicit about a sacrament or about anointing the five senses, nothing about the mediaeval necessity of using oil consecrated by the bishop. The elders are presbyters rather than priests. For the first seven centuries it was generally expected that as a result of the anointing the patient would recover. This is more in accordance with what James says than is the view which regards Extreme Unction as provisions for the journey into eternity given to those who are already in extremis.

16 'Therefore (in view of the encouragement of v. 15) admit your sins . . .' for it is conceivable that you have been wrong. In some sense they are all apparently ill, since James is desirous that they may be healed. James is back at the wars and battles of the tongue (cf. 4:1). He then individualizes, for intercession must begin with someone: the petition of a righteous man has great power. In its effects means 'when it is at work'. Even a righteous man is not always praying, for he must sleep. This clause reflects the Aristotelian doctrine of potentiality and actuality. 17, 18 Of like nature: Elijah was 'one of us'. Cf. Acts 14:15. He prayed . . . that it might not rain: cf. 1 Ki. 17:1; 18:1, 41–46. The 3½ years is Jewish tradition. Cf. Lk. 4:25. The hint is plain: the readers may not be prophets but it was not the prophecy but the prayer of the righteous which prevailed. Be righteous—and pray.

19, 20 The interpretation here turns on whether any one who wanders is to be a subject of reclamation or conversion. In favour of the former is the fact that the wanderer is one among you, i.e. a church member. In that case brings back tells of the pastor who sought and found the sinner. But we might wonder if a Christian, even when wandering, needs some one who will save his soul from death. The difficulty is not in the salvation by a fellow Christian, who is only a means (cf. 1 Cor. 9:22), but in the thought of the doom of a Christian. It would seem therefore that James has conversion in mind. Among you does not then imply believing church membership. The readers were a mixed crowd, spiritually, and there must have been some unconverted people among them (cf. 4:1), to judge by their description. If they were under the sound of the gospel, such people were near to the truth. James sees that someone wanders farther away from (Gk. apo) the truth, not out of (Gk. ek) it. He is increasingly unlike the man who was 'not far from the kingdom of God' (Mk. 12:34). Brings back will then mean 'converts' (cf. RV). The Christian worker is the means of the wanderer's salvation and by the preaching of the cross he removes his many sins.

1 Peter

AUTHORSHIP

The writer claims to be 'Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ' (1:1), and to have been 'a witness of the sufferings of Christ' (5:1). He writes by the agency of Silvanus from a place he calls Babylon, where his son Mark is with him (5:12, 13). Apart from this direct evidence the letter contains many allusions to the life and teaching of Jesus: see the references below in the Commentary. The verdict of F. H. Chase (HDB, III, p. 780) is that 'No epistle has caught so much of the spirit of Jesus'.

The letter was well attested by references and quotations in early authors, but of recent years its authenticity has been called into question on five main counts.

a. It is held that the style and language, which are admittedly good, but not really so classical as some would like to make out, are far too good for Peter, who was described in Acts 4:13 as 'uneducated'. Objectors also point out that the OT quotations are from the LXX. Against this it must be remembered that in Peter's day Galilee was probably bi-lingual: the Greek language would have been familiar to Peter from boyhood (his own brother's name is a Greek one), and being a fisherman and living on one of the great trade routes would have made it necessary for him to speak it regularly. Thirty years' work of evangelism and Christian teaching in a church which contained an increasing proportion of Gentiles would have made Greek his usual language and the LXX his 'Authorized Version'. In any case, we know from 5:12 that Silvanus acted as the apostle's amanuensis for this letter, and this may have meant that he was given a fair amount of freedom with regard to the style and language while receiving from Peter the contents of the letter. It is generally agreed that he is to be identified with the Silvanus mentioned in a number of Paul's letters and called Silas in Acts. As a Roman citizen (see Acts 16:37), Silvanus appears to have been a man of some background and breeding, and there are certain affinities between this Epistle, 1 and 2 Thessalonians and the apostolic decree of Acts 15 which suggest that he may have had a hand in drafting all four documents.

b. Much has been built on the language of 4:14, 16 to suggest that it was written when the very fact of being a Christian was a crime, and the first evidence of this generally-known situation is found in the correspondence of Pliny, governor of Bithynia, with Trajan, who was emperor from AD 98 to 117. Peter's argument, however, in chs. 2–4 is that the Christian must take care to live an innocent life, so that, if he is slandered and attacked, such calumny will be without foundation. The book of Acts shows that from the earliest days misunderstanding, vested interests, and rejection of the gospel could lead to persecution 'for the name of Christ': 1 Pet. 4:14, 16 need have no further legal implications than similar phrases in Mt. 10:22; Acts 5:41. In fact, Peter's reference to the role of the state in 2:13, 14 suggests that he did not expect persecution from that quarter: the situation of the church vis-à-vis the authorities is basically the same as in the Acts.

c. The presence of ideas found in Paul, and particularly the affinity with Ephesians, is felt by some to be an objection. This holds only if one feels that the two apostles were never finally reconciled, and that their teaching must have been different. The basic content of Christian teaching in the early church is fairly standard, and it would have been strange if there were no similarities. If we allow that Peter and Paul may have been together in Rome just before this letter was written, they would doubtless have talked together over many of the issues considered in this letter.

d. Some hold that the area to which the letter was written was one evangelized by Paul, and so this would have been a breach of the arrangement made in Gal. 2:9. Here again such agreement was probably made at least 10 years previously, and in the interval the distinction between Jewish and Gentile churches would have become less clear. 1:12 suggests that Peter had not initially evangelized these areas, but it is far from certain that Paul had been originally responsible for bringing the gospel to them either —Acts 16:6, 7 suggest not.

e. It is alleged that there is in this letter a lack of personal reference to Jesus such as would be expected of Peter. This is a very arbitrary statement, and many commentators reach the opposite conclusion—see 1:13; 2:20, 22–25; 3:14; 4:14; 5:1, 2 and other references in the Commentary below. It is best for the reader to make up his own mind on reading the letter.

Taken in all, none of these objections is conclusive, and in view of the overwhelming evidence, both external and internal, there would seem no valid reason for rejecting the traditional Petrine authorship.

DATE AND PLACE OF WRITING

In view of what was said above under argument

b., a date in the reign of Nero would seem best. In view of 2:13 it would seem likely to have been written before the outburst of persecution at Rome in AD 64, especially if Paul had perished at that time, since Peter makes no allusion to Paul's martyrdom. The literary affinities are considered by some to suggest a date post-60, and so as far as we can draw any conclusions from the evidence it was probably written c. AD 63–64.

The argument for a Roman origin is based on the fact that in Rev. 16:19; 17:5, etc. Babylon is a cryptic reference to Rome. It is argued from the order of the places listed in 1:1 that the writer had in mind the bearer of the letter travelling by boat (as he would if he came from Rome) to a port in Pontus, and then travelling in a wide circuit of the addressees in order to return from the same port again, or from some point of the coast of Bithynia. Col. 4:10 shows that Mark was then in Rome with Paul, but intending to go to Asia Minor, and in 2 Tim. 4:11 he is in Asia Minor and sent for to return to Paul in Rome. In 1 Pet. 5:13 he is with Peter, and this could well have been in Rome, though some argue that on the death of Paul at Rome Mark fled to Babylon in Mesopotamia to take refuge with Peter. In view of the fact that most of our evidence links both Peter and the letter with Rome, this seems the most reasonable conclusion.

DESTINATION OF THE LETTER

Reference to a map in the light of 1:1 shows that the letter was addressed to a number of churches in the part of Asia Minor north of the Taurus mountains. Their precise location is difficult as the place-names were used to refer to ancient kingdoms as well as to contemporary Roman provinces, and the two were not always co-terminous. Some have argued from the language of 1:1; 2:6–10 and the use of the OT that it was written to Jewish believers. There is, however, plenty of other evidence (see 1:14, 18; 2:9, 18ff.; 4:3–5) that the writer had Gentiles in mind, and it is most unlikely that at this stage in the area in question there would have been separate Jewish and Gentile churches. By then they were no doubt mixed churches: confusion arises because Peter writes from a Jewish background, and is full of the truth that the Christian church is the true Israel of God.

THE UNITY OF THE LETTER

Those who reject the Petrine authorship have suggested that 1:1 and 5:12–14 could have been added to the letter at a date subsequent to its writing. This may suit their theories, but it is more difficult to expunge the personal reference in 5:1, and certainly no MS evidence supports such an idea.

Another view put forward is that the original letter ended with the doxology at 4:11. This is said to be a natural conclusion for a letter, and then it is suggested that 4:12 to the end was added later as the situation appears to be different. In 3:17, it is said, the possibility of suffering is viewed as being remote, and in 4:12 the fiery trial is coming upon the readers. This is not so strong an argument as it seems at face value, for most scholars accept the unity of 1:3 – 4:11, and yet the situation of 1:6 is more akin to that of 4:12 than to that of 3:17. What seems more likely is that Peter's mind is moving between the church as a corporate body and its individual members. Persecution will most likely involve every church in the near future, and to that extent all the members will suffer with one another, but in each church there may be only a few called on actually to suffer in each wave of persecution, so that the likelihood of 3:17 applying to each individual reader is less great. Others suggest that by the time Peter reached 4:12 fresh news had reached him which caused him to alter the tenor of his letter, but this is less satisfactory in view of 1:6.

On the other argument, the doxology of 4:11 is not necessarily a conclusion, and it is understandable that at the end of a train of thought which has stirred deep emotion the writer should burst into an ascription of praise. This literary style is paralleled in Rom. 11:33–36; 15:33; Eph. 3:20, 21, etc. Again, the absence of any MS evidence for such piecemeal manufacture of the letter should make us very chary of adopting such conclusions.

THE PURPOSE OF THE LETTER

Of recent years it has been fashionable to trace from the references to baptism and spiritual beginnings in the letter (3:21; 1:22; 2:2) the possibility that it is either a homily delivered at a baptism service, or even a baptism or paschal liturgy. Ingenious theories have been built up along these lines, analysing either 1:3 – 4:11 or 1:3 – 5:11 into such a structure, and the reader who wishes to explore them will need to refer to a fuller work of reference (such as A. M. Stibbs and A. F. Walls, TNTC or D. Guthrie, New Testament Introduction: Hebrews to Revelation). For present purposes it is sufficient to note that while such theories are not impossible, there is no direct evidence for them, and it is best under the circumstances to take the letter at its face value. This would suggest that Peter is writing to scattered groups of believers, some of whom have not long been Christians, to instruct them in the practical consequences of living out the Christian faith, and to warn them how to cope with trials and suffering. Such themes have obviously been treated by the writer for use in sermons, and so it is understandable if some of the material should bear the mark of the homiletical approach.

THE AFFINITIES OF THE LETTER

The Epistle is much indebted to the OT, especially to Isaiah and the Psalms (cf. 1:18–20, 24, 25; 2:6–8, 22ff.; 3:10–12; 4:17, 18). The writer gives no indication of any knowledge of the Gospels, but there are numerous allusions to incidents in the life of Jesus. Similarities can also be traced to Peter's speeches in the Acts.

There are many verbal affinities with Romans and Hebrews: here it is well said that the writers 'breathed the same spiritual atmosphere'. By this time certain words and phrases would anyway have tended to become the accepted language of Christian experience. Again there are strong connections of theme with Ephesians and James, and while these are interesting to note (and a fuller commentary or introduction should be consulted for the details) it is dangerous to build any theories on them.

THE THEOLOGY OF THE LETTER

Peter writes from the standpoint of the practical theologian. The letter abounds in Christian doctrine, but it is doctrine related to life, as may be seen from the following summary.

Doctrine of God

The practical relationship between the three Persons of the Trinity is clearly set out in 1:1, 2. God is sovereign, and so can be trusted (4:19); He is holy, and so is to be copied (1:15, 16); He is a Father, and so His sons must live up to the family name (1:17); and the fact that He has predestined His people is a ground for assurance (1:2).

Doctrine of Christ

He was sinless, obedient, and prepared to suffer to the limit—this is an example for us (2:21–24). He died and rose again: we must die to sin and live by His risen power (2:24; 4:1). His work is seen in terms of redemption (1:18, 19), reconciliation, the sin-offering and the substitute (all in 3:18), and He was predestined for this very purpose by the Father's love (1:20, 21). This is at once the ground of faith and hope, and the incentive to holiness and love (1:21, 22).

Doctrine of the Holy Spirit

He is seen both as the agent of sanctification (1:2), the author of Scripture (1:11) and the one who enables the preachers of the gospel to carry out their work (1:12).

Doctrine of Scripture

Its authoritative nature is stressed by the way the writer appeals to the OT for confirmation of his teaching (1:24, 25; 2:6–8; 3:10–12). Its source is seen to be in the guiding of the writers by the Holy Spirit (1:11) and its enduring quality is stressed by quotation from the OT (1:23, 25). It is also depicted as a seed, by which the new birth is effected in human lives as men hear and respond to the preaching of the gospel (cf. 1:23 with 25).

Doctrine of the church

Peter has a high regard for the corporate nature of the people of God, entered by the individual believer at the new birth (2:2–5; cf. 1:22, 23). This is God's building, on the foundation of Christ Himself (2:6–8), and as such it is the inheritor of the blessings promised to Israel (2:9, 10). Its twofold function is to offer worship to God and to witness before men (2:5, 9) and already it has a ministry which is a very responsible and sacred office (5:1–4).

Doctrine of eschatology

The writer lives under the shadow of the great unveiling, and he prefers to use this Greek root (apocalyp-) to describe the return of Christ. Thus he reminds his readers that the unseen Christ is never far away, and points them to the glories they will share when He re-appears. It will be the consummation of salvation and entry into the full inheritance (1:5), the moment when faith is finally honoured (1:7; 4:13), and the full extent of God's grace discovered (1:13), Christ's glory shared (5:1) and faithful service rewarded (5:4). Expectancy of His return is a most compelling argument for holy living and careful stewardship now (4:7–11, 17, 18).

This is a challenging letter, written by one whose heart had lost none of the fire of love stirred up by the Master's own challenge by the Sea of Tiberias (cf. Jn. 21:1, 15–19). In its lines there is all the vividness of the personal recollections of a follower of Jesus Christ.

COMMENTARY

1:1, 2 OPENING ADDRESS

In accordance with contemporary custom, Peter begins by declaring his identity and authority, and names those to whom the letter is addressed. These are Christians by now scattered throughout the Roman provinces of Asia Minor, who have been brought by God into a relationship to each Person of the Trinity. The Father has chosen them and set them apart by the Spirit that they might live a life of obedience to Jesus Christ, being cleansed for such a walk by the sprinkling with his blood. To such Peter sends greetings for the increase upon them of the characteristic blessings of Old (peace, i.e. well-being) and New (grace) Covenants.

Notes. 1 Apostle: Gk. 'one sent'. Exiles of the Dispersion would seem best understood as referring to mixed churches of Jewish and Gentile Christians (see Introduction, under 'Destination of the letter'). 2 Sprinkling with his blood may refer to obtaining the benefits of Christ's death (Heb. 9:13, 14), participating in the benefits of the New Covenant (cf. Ex. 24:3–8 with Mk. 14:24), or the regular cleansing needed during our earthly pilgrimage (see 1 Jn. 1:7). The position lends weight to the last reference, but Peter may well have had all in mind: at the commencement of the Old Covenant the promise of obedience by God's people is ratified by the sprinkling of the blood of the covenant sacrifice on the altar and on the people (Ex. 24:1–11). The Greek charis (grace) comes from the same root as the customary Hellenistic introduction to a letter (chaire—'greetings') and is a deliberate play on words, giving greetings to Gentile and Jew, to whom peace was the normal greeting.

1:3–9 SALVATION: ITS NATURE

Mention of the Christian's position before God leads Peter, following the pattern of some of Paul's Epistles, to pour out thanksgiving to God as he elaborates these benefits. So great are they that it is possible to pass joyfully through times of testing holding by faith to a Christ they have not seen: such faith is the road to full and final salvation.

3–5 As Peter surveys the richness of the salvation believers enjoy, he cites its source (his great mercy), its scope (born anew; cf. Jn. 3:1–21), its effect (a living hope), its means (through the resurrection . . . from the dead), its Agent (of Jesus Christ) and its goal (to an inheritance). In these verses salvation is seen in all its tenses: Christians have been born anew by the mercy of God, are being guarded by the power of God and look forward to obtaining complete deliverance from all evil in the last time. 6, 7 Such blessings from God should lead to rejoicing in spite of difficulties, for the purpose of earthly trials is to sift out what is really genuine in our faith. 8, 9 This triumphant faith in the unseen Christ has two results for the believer: at present an inexpressible joy even in the midst of adversity, and for the future the prospect of the fuller realization and enjoyment of salvation.

Notes. 4 Imperishable, undefiled, and unfading; i.e. liable neither to destruction nor defilement from without, nor to decay from within. 5 The supreme cause of the Christian's preservation is God's power, the subordinate means, faith. 6 The marginal reading shows that the verb here could be imperative, but is better as a statement of fact. In this is the wrong gender to refer to salvation, and probably looks back to the fact stated in the past three verses rather than to the last time. The connection with the next clause could be causal rather than concessive: we rejoice because we are suffering various trials (see Mt. 5:11, 12). The Greek word for various emphasizes their diversity, and is used again in this letter to describe the grace of God, which alone can meet these trials (4:10). Peter stresses that such trials will be relatively brief, for a little while, and do not fall outside the permissive will of God (AV 'if need be' is closer to the original Greek here). 7 The genuine and deepened faith which results from such trials will, at His revelation (i.e. 'unveiling'), bring glory both to Jesus Christ and to the one who has been thus tested. The theme of suffering is resumed later in the Epistle at 2:19–23; 3:14–17; 4:1–6, 12–19; 5:10. 8 Compare the Lord's beatitude to Thomas in Jn. 20:29.

1:10–12 SALVATION: ITS REVELATION

This salvation was the subject of careful investigation by the prophets who foretold it, and they were shown that the things they were proclaiming would be finally understood only by those to whom the good news of Jesus Christ was preached. So wonderful is this salvation that it has not yet been fully revealed even to the angels (see Rom. 8:19).

Notes. 10, 11 The prophets most naturally refers to the writers of the OT whose twofold theme was the grace that was destined for God's people and the sufferings and subsequent glory that were destined for Christ (there is a vivid parallelism here). It is a forced interpretation to take this as a reference to Christian prophets of the NT age. Note the statement here of the inspiration of the OT writers: cf. Lk. 24:25–27, 44–47; Jn. 5:39, 45–47; Mt. 5:17. The same Spirit who guided the OT prophets guided the NT preachers in declaring this good news effectively to Peter's readers.

1:13 - 5:4 SALVATION: ITS PRACTICAL OUTWORKINGS

The whole of the rest of this letter is concerned with showing how these great truths of the Christian faith are to be applied by those who believe them to all kinds of situations. As the content becomes mainly ethical, we are constantly referred back to the great themes of the gospel as the reasons behind such Christian behaviour, and Peter takes pains to show how the salvation described so magnificently in the opening paragraphs can and should result in men and women living out the life of Christ's disciples even in the most adverse circumstances.

1:13–21 Holiness of life

13 In view of such a salvation and such good news, Christians are called to exercise mental diligence and moral discipline: this is to be done by looking joyfully and confidently forward to the grace that the revelation of Jesus Christ will bring. 14–16 Living thus in the light of His return will call for obedience of life (cf. Lk. 12:35–48), and this obedience will be worked out by modelling their behaviour on the holiness of the God who has called them to Himself (cf. Mt. 5:48). This is the only positive antidote to having their lives moulded by the often conflicting desires of their previously unenlightened state. Unbridled passions are the product of spiritual ignorance, but God's pattern of behaviour for His people is based on His own revealed character. 17 To claim to be the children of such a heavenly Father, who is also an utterly just Judge, calls for reverent behaviour during one's earthly life, which is to be regarded as but a brief exile from His presence. 18, 19 A further motive for such behaviour lies in the fact that the Christian's freedom from the emptiness of pagan superstition or Pharisaic formalism was purchased at such immense cost. 20, 21 Reference to Christ leads Peter at once to develop the theme of the greatness of His work and its results: He stresses the pre-historical and transcendent nature of this and the phrase at the end of the times, referring to Christ's appearing, stresses His finality. Such a mighty work of Christ, coupled with the fact that God subsequently raised and glorified Him, provides the Christian with more than adequate grounds for entire confidence in such a God as the object both of our faith in the present and our hope for the future.

Notes. 13 That is coming (Gk. 'being conferred'): the present participle indicates certainty. At the revelation. See v. 7 for other concomitants of Christ's return. 14 Obedient children is a Hebraism suggesting that Obedience is their mother whose character they should have inherited. Conformed; cf. Rom. 12:2. 16 You shall be holy; see Lv. 11:44, 45; 19:2; cf. Ex. 19:5, 6. The meaning of this in terms of human behaviour was, of course, made plain in the life of Jesus (Jn. 1:18). 17 On God's justice as Judge see Peter's words in Acts 10:34; cf. also Dt. 10:17. 18, 19 The language used here is reminiscent of that in both Mark (10:45) and John (1:29, 36; cf. Rev. 5:6 with Is. 53:7, where LXX uses the same word for 'lamb') on the atonement. Without blemish refers to the moral and without spot to the physical perfection of the sacrificial victim (see Lv. 22:17–25 and Ex. 12:5 for these requirements). 21 RSV translates the final clause of this verse as a consequence, and this is preferable to the AV and RV which make it a purpose clause, 'so that your faith and hope might be in God.' In fact, faith and hope in God are both the purpose and the result of Christ's resurrection and ascension: the reading of RSV mg. is grammatically possible, but does not appear to follow the argument so well.

1:22–25 Love for the brethren

22 The life of obedience already referred to (vv. 2, 14) will result in the purity required before God of those who are to reflect the Father's holiness, and should lead to a genuine love for one's fellow-Christians: the reality of this should be evidenced by its intensity (earnestly) and depth (from the heart). 23–25 Such love is motivated by the sharing of a new and heavenly birth, mediated by the living and abiding word of God. Peter identifies this regenerating Word with the preaching of the gospel.

Notes. 22 Earnestly (Gk. ektenōs). This word is used in the NT here and in 4:8 (of love), and in Lk. 22:44 and Acts 12:5 (of prayer). It denotes supreme effort, 'with every muscle strained'. 24, 25 Is. 40:6, 8 stresses the enduring and dynamic quality of the Word of God.

2:1–3 Desire for spiritual growth

Such a wonderful new birth calls for a consequent concern for growth, for its subjects are now spiritual babes. This is to be achieved negatively by putting away all forms of evil, and positively by fostering the desire for spiritual milk, and keeping in mind the goal of full and final salvation as the end for which the new life is given.

Notes. 2 Spiritual is the Greek logikon, which can equally well mean 'of the word', as AV. Heb. 5:12 contains the same idea, and the OT and rabbinical writings are rich in allusions to the Law or the Word of God as spiritual sustenance. 3 Quotation of Ps. 34:8 may be understood either as a motive for the desire of v. 2, or the desire may be an evidence that one has tasted the kindness of the Lord.

2:4–10 Membership of God's people

Christian growth must be seen in its corporate as well as its individual aspect, and Peter now turns to that. 4, 5 The thought this provokes is so thrilling that Peter mixes his metaphors, but the thread is fairly easy to follow. By constant communion with Christ, the living Stone, Christians will become like Him, living stones. The purpose of stones is not to be kept in isolation, but so to be joined together as to form a building. This, however, describes only one aspect of the corporate life, and by itself is insufficient as a description, for, once built into the edifice, the stone's role is passive. So Peter switches thought from the structure, presumably of the Temple, to those who actively function inside the building in corporate worship: here is the active side of the life of the Christian family. 6–8 In a parenthesis he takes up the references to the living stone, and shows how both have been fulfilled in Christ, one in the case of believers, and the other of unbelievers. Whatever men's reactions, whether they come in faith to the living Stone, or reject Him like the builders, God's purposes are supreme: Christ becomes the Head of the corner, the Keystone of the building, and those who disobey the word can only stumble and fall against Him, as God decreed such should. 9, 10 In contrast to the position of the unbelievers last referred to, Peter shows how the Christian church has inherited the privileges promised to the people of God in the OT: you are . . . that you may is a salutary reiteration of the biblical principle that such privilege involves responsibility. Those who inherit Israel's blessings have Israel's work to do, and must publish abroad the greatness of the God who has done so much for them.

Notes. 4, 6–8 Two strands of prophecy are drawn together here: the precious foundation stone of Is. 28:16 (v. 6 quotes LXX, as does Paul in Rom. 9:33) and the rejected keystone of Ps. 118:22. Jesus applied the latter reference to Himself in Mk. 12:10 and parallels, and Peter quoted it of Him before the Sanhedrin in Acts 4:11. Jesus Christ is both the Foundation on which the Christian church is built, and the Keystone into whom it grows up (see 1 Cor. 3:11; Eph. 4:11–13). By bringing the two metaphors together Peter emphasizes that Christ is precious only to believers (as the original context showed), and that those who refuse to believe find Him a Stone which causes them to stumble—here is added a quotation from Is. 8:14. 5 Be yourselves built is difficult unless taken as NEB 'let yourselves be built', but the AV and RV indicative 'you are being built' (the form is the same) is better. Priesthood is collective rather than abstract: i.e. 'body of priests'. V. 9 below emphasizes that this is the privilege of all believers. The idea of spiritual sacrifices is elaborated in Rom. 12:1, 2 and Heb. 13:15, 16. Through Jesus Christ can be taken either to explain how the sacrifices are offered, or why they are acceptable. 8 Destined need not imply more than that those who disobey the Word of God, both written and living, are bound to find that instead of being the foundation on which to build He is embarrassingly in their way and will sooner or later cause them to trip and fall. (For further discussion of the doctrine of predestination implicit here, see NBD, art. 'Predestination'.)

9 appropriates to Christian believers the promises of Ex. 19:5, 6; Is. 43:20, 21, for which Paul argued in Rom. 9. Race implies physical descent, and may refer to the Godward and manward relationship brought about by the new birth. The root from which priesthood (Gk. hieratyma) is derived is never used in the NT to describe the Christian ministry, but rather the corporate function of all believers (cf. Rev. 1:6). Throughout the OT the kingship and the priesthood were never united, except in Melchizedek and Messiah (Saul sinned when he attempted to combine both functions; 1 Sa. 13:5–15). The Christian enjoys both through being 'in Christ'. A holy nation; i.e. called to reflect the character of the God who has called them (cf. 1:16). God's own people draws on the imagery of the Eastern potentate, who kept a treasure-chamber apart from the exchequer he shared with his government ministers. This was his own privy purse, and the idea originates in Ex. 19:5, being mentioned also by Paul in Tit. 2:14. The latter part of this verse links with vv. 5, 6 to stress the twofold ministry to which God's people are called: offering spiritual sacrifices to God and declaring His wonderful deeds (RV 'excellencies' is closer to the original abstract noun) to men. 10 Such a response, both Godward and manward, will be natural and spontaneous when the Christian has grasped that all these blessings spring directly from the free grace and mercy of God. To bring this point home Peter quotes the theme of Ho. 1:8 – 2:1; 2:23.

2:11 – 3:12 Witness in the world

Since Christians are in this very special way God's people, their true home is with Him, and so their conduct in this world and in its relationships is to be that of those who are only passing through it, but in doing so they are to show by their behaviour that they are citizens of a better country.

2:11, 12 General principles. From 1:15 Peter has been dealing with the positive side of holiness, living to God. Now he takes up briefly the negative side, abstinence, which he will resume at 4:1 in the light of the theology of 3:18–22. Such abstinence silences the allegations against Christians which the non-Christian world was already making. Here Peter echoes our Lord's instructions in Mt. 5:16.

Notes. 11 Aliens and exiles. This language, reminiscent of 1:1, 17 and Heb. 11:13, derives originally from Gn. 23:4. Passions of the flesh. The latter term is not synonymous with 'physical', but is to be understood in its ethical sense, as in Gal. 5:19ff. These passions are to be refused, as they militate against the immortal part of our being. 12 Gentiles is used in view of the church's relation to Israel shown in vv. 9, 10. The day of visitation is the day when God will visit the earth and search out men's hearts in judgment.

2:13–25 In society. 13–15 Such good conduct is to be expressed in a submissive acceptance of the demands of every human institution, and it is striking that Peter, writing probably in the age of Nero, still sees the state as the God-appointed society for the maintenance of moral values, in which the Christian's uprightness should raise him or her above the slanders or suspicions of the ignorant. Christians must render to Caesar what is his due, and although Peter knew well what it meant to refuse Caesar when the latter claimed what is God's (Acts 4:19, 20; 5:29), he does not lay emphasis on that duty here. 16 The Christian's freedom is the liberty to live as the servants of God, doing what He wishes, and not the licence to do as one pleases, indulging sinful lusts under the pretext of 'permissiveness'. 17 The practical outworkings of this are outlined in the four brief commands which follow. All men are to be honoured, as those for whom Christ died and in whom the divine likeness can be restored, while there is a special relationship of love within the Christian brotherhood. God is to be approached with worship, and the emperor with respect.

18–25 Peter follows these principles with detailed instructions for two groups of people whose inferior position in the ancient world could make life, particularly as a Christian, very difficult for them. The lot of servants would be easy under a good master, but they were often treated unjustly. Patience while suffering a deserved punishment is no virtue, but the Christian is called to accept the harsh treatment of an unkind master gracefully, and so to win God's approval. Such perseverance in doing good, and patience under suffering, are even the Christian's vocation, for it is part of the fellowship of Christ's sufferings (cf. Phil. 3:10). This reference at once leads Peter to describe vividly the Lord's behaviour during His sufferings, and inevitably he goes on to remind his readers of the benefits we enjoy as a result of them.

Notes. 13 For the Lord's sake is a reminder both of the example and the teaching of Jesus (cf. Mt. 22:21). Supreme; i.e. over human institutions. 17 quotes Pr. 24:21, but Peter will not apply the same word to our attitude both to God and to the emperor as the former writer does. 18 Servants: the household slaves found so regularly in Greek and Roman families. 19 Mindful of God is literally 'on account of the knowledge of God', and may indicate either the master's reason for inflicting the undeserved punishment, annoyance at the slave's Christian faith, or the slave's motive for accepting it, awareness that God knows and shares his sufferings. Peter probably had in mind the words of Jesus in Mt. 5:11f., 46f.; Lk. 6:22f., 32–35; Jn. 15:18–21. 21 Example (Gk. hypogrammos) is used only here in the NT, and refers to an outline drawing or copy-book letters to be followed by the pupil. 22, 23 See Mk. 14:61, 65; 15:29; Jn. 19:1–9, etc. Peter quotes Is. 53:9 and 7. 24, 25 This description might be that of an eyewitness, the words are so graphic. Bore: literally 'carried up', as RSV mg. The language is vivid and deliberately sacrificial (cf. Heb. 7:27). The reference to the purpose of Jesus' sufferings, citing Is. 53:12 and 5, gives the motive for ours. The response to the sin-bearing Saviour can only be to return to Him as Shepherd and to die to sin and live to righteousness. The imagery again reflects Is. 53:6 and Jn. 10. Guardian, or 'overseer', is the word used regularly to describe the function of a shepherd, and so of a spiritual pastor, and the English 'bishop' (so AV) is derived from this root.

3:1–7 In the family. Similar submissive conduct is now enjoined of wives, for the ancient world classed women and slaves together as 'inferior beings'. Christianity ennobled the status of both, and Peter stresses the spiritual equality of man and wife as joint heirs, while maintaining the wife's subordination to her husband within the economy of God, demonstrated by her physical weakness and the example of Sarah. Christian women were often married to unbelieving husbands, and Peter stresses the importance of Christlike behaviour to win such. Finally, marriage is lifted to its highest plane by the call to husbands to treat their wives with consideration and respect, on the basis of their shared faith, and with the practical purpose of being a praying partnership, which must not be hindered by any misunderstanding between them. These last instructions are obviously directed to Christian couples, graphically described as sharing the inheritance of God's gracious gift of eternal life.

Notes. 3 Outward adorning. . . . The nouns which follow contrast sharply with the attitude of v. 2, as they are all active and stress the time and energy spent on such personal adornment: God prefers to see beauty of character which will never fade. 4 A gentle and quiet spirit is one which puts up with the impositions of others without causing any itself. Such a character has a good pedigree within the people of God—Sarah, Rebecca, Ruth, Hannah, etc.—and makes its possessor the true daughter, by spiritual descent and likeness, of Sarah. 6 Calling him lord may refer to Gn. 18:12, where the word 'husband' can also mean 'lord' or 'master'. 7 Likewise (i.e. 'in the same spirit') may refer back to 2:17, to the general admonition to 'honour all men', or it may look to the wife's behaviour and urge husbands to reciprocate with mutual love and understanding. Phillips translates RSV's live considerately as 'try to understand'. Weaker sex: see Gn. 2:18; 3:16.

3:8–12 In the fellowship. Peter now leaves the realm of special relationships and concludes this section with a summary of the attitudes which Christians should display both in their actions and reactions. This is all contained in the one word blessing, i.e. calling down God's gracious power and love on all men, even on those who wish or do us harm. Such behaviour is encouraged by the Christian's knowledge that he himself will ultimately inherit God's blessing, and this argument is supported by quotation of Ps. 34:12–16. The Christian is called, no less than his OT counterpart, to walk the way of blamelessness and uprightness, actively pursuing peace with all men, and for the same reason, that God watches over and blesses such behaviour, but sets Himself against its opposite.

Notes. 8 Unity of spirit is not the best translation as the word, used only here in the NT, means literally 'of the same mind' (cf. AV, RV) and refers to the unity Christians should experience through sharing the mind of Christ (see Phil. 2:5; Col. 3:2). This will enable them to enter into the feelings of others (sympathy is derived from the Greek word used here) and to experience His love for their fellow-Christians. This quality has been mentioned before in 1:22 and is emphasized again in 4:8. It should be the hallmark of a Christian fellowship. The tender heart brings a new Christian meaning to an old Greek word for 'courageous', and the humble mind enjoined with it (see also 5:5, 6) emphasizes that the secret of the character described in this verse lies in a low estimate of oneself and a high concern for others. 9 is reminiscent of 2:23. See the references there to the example of Jesus in this respect, together with Lk. 6:27f.; 23:34. This could refer to the role of blessing as our inheritance, in which case the inheritance is viewed as the purpose of such behaviour, almost suggesting that it is a reward to be earned. It seems more in line with NT teaching and the spirit of the passage to take the clause that you may obtain a blessing as an expansion of this, defining the nature of our vocation. This then complements the earlier statement of 2:21, that the Christian's vocation is to follow his Lord's example of suffering and with Him inherit the blessings God has prepared for him (cf. Rom. 8:17, 18). 10–12 The opening of the quotation from Ps. 34:12–16 is altered here to fit the context, changing the verb from the second to the third person imperative. Life was probably intended by the psalmist to refer to temporal existence on earth: in the present context Peter may well be using the word of eternal life, giving it the same connotation as in v. 7, especially as he changes the original 'desires life, and covets many days' to (lit.) 'he who wishes to love life and to see good days'.

3:13 – 4:6 Witness under persecution

13–17 Because Peter was assured of God's sovereignty as well as His justice, he follows this last remark with a rhetorical question and comment which suggest that zeal on the Christian's part for what is right is not likely to lead to persecution. This seems strangely inconsistent with the warnings of Jesus (cf. Mt. 5:10–12; 10:17–22; 24:9; Jn. 15:18 – 16:4), the teaching and experience of Paul (Acts 14:22; 16:19ff.; 19:23ff., etc.) and Peter's own words in the next chapter (4:12–19) or even vv. 16 and 17 of this very chapter. In view of this it is probably right to lay the stress in this question on the verb to harm (Gk. kakōsōn). Persecution may well come upon the Christian, but it cannot ultimately do him injury, for the experience can lead to blessing (v. 14; cf. 1:6–9), and the final issue can be left with God (4:19), who watches over His own and their persecutors (3:12). In consequence believers are urged not to be afraid: the positive antidote to fear is to be found in giving to Christ the special place that is His due right at the centre of our lives, where He is to reign as Lord. Such true fear of the Lord, expressing itself both in upright behaviour and in a reasoned statement of faith, will drive out all lesser fears and eventually shame the detractors.

18–22 This kind of suffering on the part of the innocent could be the will of God, and mention of this leads Peter to elaborate how the divinely-ordained suffering of the innocent Christ not only resulted in the benefits of salvation, but also culminated in His vindication and glorification at the hands of the Father. It is not easy to follow the thread of the argument here: so anxious is the writer to bring out the fact that suffering was purposeful in the case of Jesus, that he adduces two consequences of His death. The first is familiar to all Christians: it opened for man the way to God. The second is not so familiar, but it appears from this verse that when, by death, Christ's spirit was separated from His body, He was enabled to go and preach in the spirit world. Reference to this sphere links the writer in thought with Noah, whose experience of salvation is a striking parallel with that which baptism symbolizes. The faith which is the believer's response to God in baptism is made possible by the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, and Peter is now linking both strands of thought together again by seeing the glorification of Jesus not only as the divine sequel to His sacrificial death, but the compelling reason for men to respond to Him in faith. See further comments in the Notes below.

4:1–6 Suffering in the flesh is therefore to be accepted, not merely in order to follow the example of Christ, but also because such behaviour makes it easier for the sufferer to follow the will of God, especially as he is thereby more closely united with Christ. Here the mention of baptism in 3:21 may have prompted Peter to follow the same sort of argument as Paul follows in Rom. 6. Baptism symbolizes the believer's entry into the benefits obtained by Christ's sufferings and death, and in undergoing it the subject is regarded as mystically sharing those sufferings and death. The consequence of such a death in Rom. 6:11 is that 'you also must consider yourselves dead to sin and alive to God in Christ Jesus', and this is the consequence Peter is stating here, adding a note of urgency by contrasting time spent in the past on selfish indulgence with the opportunity for serving God in the future. Such changed behaviour on the Christian's part often leads to persecution by those who resent their withdrawal from their previous habits, but the Christian must remember that it is to God that all must give account of their conduct. The comprehensiveness of this judgment leads Peter (v. 6) to make in parenthesis the point that the death of Christians proves the value of preaching the gospel to men while they are alive, since though they have now received in their bodies God's judgment on sin, their spirits are still alive with Him (for other interpretations of this verse see Notes below).

Notes. 3:14 The quotation from Is. 8:12, 13 suggests that the genitive of them should be taken as subjective ('do not share the fears felt by them') rather than objective, as RSV ('do not experience the fear which they inspire'). There is also a possibility that the command here and in Isaiah could be a warning against apostasy, which was often encouraged by fear of persecution—'do not share their objects of religious reverence' (Gk. phobeisthai is used in this cultic sense in Lk. 1:50; 18:2, 4; Acts 13:16, 26, etc.). 17 The mood of the verb should be is optative in the Greek. This suggests that the possibility of suffering for doing right is rather remote. Peter may have expressed himself thus to allay the fears of his readers. God's will; i.e. that you suffer.

18 This verse is one of the most succinct and yet profound statements of the doctrine of the atonement. Jesus is seen as dealing with the fundamental problem of man's broken relationship with God in three ways: a. He made the perfect offering for sin (cf. Heb. 9:11–14; 10:1–10), thereby fulfilling the requirements of the law; b. He endured the death due to unrighteousness as the penalty imposed by the law on sinners (cf. 2 Cor. 5:21; Rom. 6:23); and c. He thereby removed the barrier between man and God which had been caused by sin. Died. The RSV mg. reading 'suffered' is well attested but would make no difference to the argument. For sins. Having stressed so much the value of Christ's sufferings as our Example (see 2:21), Peter is anxious to redress the balance by stating also their uniqueness and efficacy. He uses the term here (Gk. peri hamartiōn) which is used in the singular in the LXX of Lv. 5:11; 7:37 to describe the sin-offering. Other NT writers use the phrase with similar reference: e.g. Rom. 8:3; Heb. 10:18; cf. Heb. 5:3; 13:11. A. M. Stibbs comments: 'Since Christ Himself was sinless this kind of phraseology implies here that His suffering was atoning or propitiatory' (TNTC, 1 Peter, p. 141). Once for all is the Greek hapax, which stresses the finality of the work of Christ (cf. Heb. 9:28). The righteous for the unrighteous contains the preposition hyper, 'on behalf of', and shows that Christ's suffering was vicarious. The one Man, whose perfect righteousness meant that He never deserved to die, endured the pains of death on behalf of those who deserved to die. In this way He took our place and endured our punishment: the language reflects strongly that of Is. 53:6. Bring us to God is again technical language, the Greek verb prosagō having the idea of admitting a person to an audience with a king: from this root comes the noun translated 'access' in Rom. 5:2; Eph. 2:18; 3:12. Spirit contrasts here with the flesh: Jesus died physically, in that His bodily functions (respiration and circulation of the blood, etc.) ceased, and He died spiritually, in that He underwent the separation from God consequent on bearing the sins of the world and expressed by the cry of dereliction (Mk. 15:34 and parallels). But spiritual death is not annihilation, and once He had undergone in full God's judgment on sin His spirit was released from the body: the Greek of Mk. 15:37 and parallels uses the common but vivid metaphor of 'breathing out' His spirit.

19 This verse poses two inter-related questions: when did Jesus preach to the spirits in prison, and who were they? Traditionally the verse has been taken to refer to the chronological sequel to Jesus' death, when His spirit passed into the realms of the departed: this verse is taken with Acts 2:31 and Eph. 4:9 to establish the clause in the Creeds referring to the descent into hell. Some would, however, deny this reference here, and suggest rather that it was either the pre-incarnation Spirit of Christ preaching through Noah to his contemporaries, or the post-Pentecost Spirit of Christ preaching through the apostles to Jews and Gentiles: in both cases the prison is interpreted as the body, or for the former interpretation it could refer to their present habitation. Either of these views involves a harsh transference of thought and subject. If we follow the other view that Jesus did go and proclaim (the basic meaning of preached) His triumph to the spirit-world, we are then faced with a further two lines of thought. Some suggest that this was a proclamation of the gospel to those who had died before the time of Christ and had not had the chance to hear, repent and believe: of this class those who perished in the Flood are a notorious example. The use of spirits in this sense can be supported by the usage of Heb. 12:23. On the other hand it can be argued from such passages as 2 Pet. 2:4–10; Jude 6 and reference to Gn. 6:1–8 that the spirits in prison are the fallen angels, and that this interpretation is more consistent with the usage of the word pneumata, spirits, in Scripture when it occurs without qualification. This would seem on the whole the best interpretation of a difficult passage, and the thought is then taken up again in v. 22 where Christ's triumph is seen to be complete.

20 Did not obey. If the preceding interpretation is correct, this could refer to the events of Gn. 6:1–4. Those who relate the spirits in prison to human beings suggest that Noah's contemporaries are singled out as being exceptionally wicked and therefore needing to be informed of Christ's victory or given a chance to repent: on this point commentators diverge who follow this interpretation. Patience was displayed by God as He gave them opportunity to repent while the ark was being built (cf. Gn. 6:3; 2 Pet. 3:5–9). A few is a biblical emphasis (cf. Mt. 7:14; 22:14; Lk. 13:23, 24). In the OT it is paralleled by the idea of the 'remnant' (cf. Rom. 9:27–29). Even so, Paul could write of the 'many' who will be made righteous (Rom. 5:19). Through water has a twofold reference: in the local sense the ark brought them safely through the water which was the means of inflicting God's judgment on others. The preposition also has an instrumental sense (as in AV 'by' or 'by means of'), and so the element which was the means of destruction for their contemporaries was for them the means of deliverance into a new life. Both ideas would appear to be involved.

21 Corresponds. The Greek word antitypon originally referred to the impression left on a surface by the typos, or seal, and so describes the kind of correspondence that a stamp has to its die. The picture strikes Peter as a parallel to baptism, for here the water symbolizes God's judgment on sin, and deliverance into a new life. Jesus spoke of His coming death, by which He underwent God's judgment on sin, as a baptism (cf. Mk. 10:38, 39; Lk. 12:50), and this association of ideas is preserved in Rom. 6:3ff., where baptism is seen as a mystical uniting of the believer with Christ in His death. So, paradoxically, the death which was the means of Christ's enduring God's judgment on sin is the means whereby the believer can enter into new life. Peter rids his readers of any false notions about baptism by stressing that the efficacy of baptism lies not in the outward symbolism of the removal of dirt from the body, but in the inner response of faith to God. An appeal to God for a clear conscience is a translation based on the use of the word eperōtēma (appeal) in the LXX and NT Greek. Reference to the papyri shows that contemporary usage employed this word for the solemnly attested pledge made by any party undertaking a contract: in that case the phrase could mean 'the pledge to God of a good conscience', and is closer to the AV 'answer'. In any case, the great fact which makes real and possible all that baptism typifies is the resurrection of Jesus Christ, and it is by this means ultimately that we are saved (cf. 1:3). 22 Reference to this great fact leads Peter to repeat the verb 'went' of v. 19, suggesting a triumphal procession on the part of Jesus, culminating in His session (in direct fulfilment of Ps. 110:1) and position of supreme power.

4:1 The RSV mg. readings are of little importance here, as neither adds anything to what has already been said in 3:18. The same thought appears from the context to refer to what has been said about Christ's death and the symbolism of baptism. Christ's sufferings led to the death of His flesh and enabled His spirit to enter a completely new mode of existence, and this should be seen also in the life of the believer. In this case whoever has suffered need not refer to those who undergo physical suffering, but includes all who in mystical union, symbolized in their baptism, share the sufferings of Christ. Such union should now be made effective by claiming cessation from sin and a new life of service to God. 2 So as to live can be taken either as the purpose of arming oneself with the same thought, or the consequence of ceasing from sin: probably both ideas are included. Passions. The plural stresses the diversity of desires and interests pulling a man in different directions (see the catalogue of them in v. 3): by contrast the will in the singular suggests that only in obedience to God can the human personality be properly integrated. 3 Licentiousness and all the following nouns are plural in the original, indicating a round of activities in which such behaviour is expressed. 5 Living is better than the old English 'quick', as in AV and the Creeds.

6 The gospel was preached even to the dead is taken above as referring to a possible source of attack on the Christians by their detractors. 'If you speak of the return of Christ, and possessing eternal life now, why do you die just like the rest of us?' the argument might run. 'Surely your people die no less than us: you are suffering just the same judgment as we do.' 'No,' says the apostle; 'those who have died (the dead) may be judged in the flesh like men, by suffering physical death, but, because the gospel was preached to them (while alive, when they responded), they are now living in the spirit like God.' The previous verse has emphasized the universality of judgment: men must either face it after death, or else anticipate it here on earth by responding to Christ and so having their sins dealt with in judgment by their union with Christ. In that case death will be merely the gateway to the fuller and freer life of the spirit: there will be no further judgment to bear. Others have interpreted the dead here as the spiritually dead, or as referring to all the dead, linking this preaching of the gospel with the proclamation of 3:19, and deducing therefrom a doctrine of the second chance of responding to the gospel being given after death; but this does not suit the context, and is not supported anywhere else in Scripture. Like men . . . like God can refer to judgment in the flesh as being the common lot of men, and life in the spirit the distinctive characteristic of God, or the preposition kata used here may mean 'in the sight of men' and 'in the sight of God'. Either rendering makes little difference to the meaning.

4:7–11 Use of opportunities

Mention of judgment prompts the reminder that the final judgment is no remote contingency, but that Christ's return to wind up this present order of things could happen at any time. For that reason it is urgent that Christians practise their calling, displaying self-control, mutual love, and a diligent stewardship of the gifts God has given them. This is the life which will bring glory to God (cf. Mt. 5:16).

Notes. 7 End is the Greek word telos, which also means 'goal'. The end of the present system is not only the climax but the purpose towards which God has been and is working. Sane means 'of safe mind': the Christian's aim in the midst of fears and uncertainty must be to keep in touch with God. Phillips's translation is helpful here: 'be calm, self-controlled men of prayer'. 8 Unfailing: see on 1:22. Love covers a multitude of sins is thought by some to be a reference to Pr. 10:12. It has been argued from this verse that love can earn forgiveness of sins, not only for the one who displays it, but for the recipient too. Most likely the meaning is that true love will overlook its neighbour's faults (cf. 1 Cor. 13:4–7 and Mt. 6:14, 15); it could just be taken to refer to God's love covering our sins, which is the motive for us to love one another. 9 Hospitality was an important factor in days of itinerant ministers and no church buildings (cf. Mt. 25:35; Rom. 12:13; 16:3–5a; 1 Tim. 3:2; Heb. 13:2). 10 Each implies that every Christian has some gift. Peter's remarks on stewardship are significant in view of the fact that Jesus spoke on this matter especially to Peter in Lk. 12:42ff. Varied: see on 1:6. 11 Speaks . . . renders service are taken as covering the two broad divisions of ministry within the Christian church—ministering the Word of God and 'serving tables' in various ways (see Acts 6:1ff.). Both ministries are equally God-given and can rely on God to make the necessary provision for their fulfilment. Who utters is not in the original, which could just as well be translated as AV, 'let him speak as the oracles of God'. Oracles is the Greek logia, which was used in classical times of divine utterances, and in Rom. 3:2 and Heb. 5:12 is applied to Scripture. To him . . . : for the significance of this ascription here see Introduction, under 'The unity of the letter' (p.1237).

4:12–19 Suffering for Christ

Peter now returns to his theme of suffering, and suggests further factors which will enable the Christian not merely to endure, but actually to rejoice in it. In the first place, it is a test to prove the reality of faith, and we should expect God to try (and thereby strengthen) this. It is also a sharing of Christ's sufferings, which were His pathway to glory, and so will they be for His follower. For that reason the Spirit of God will, even in persecution, be radiating the sufferer's life with glory; when persecution as a Christian is nobly borne by the innocent, his behaviour is a means of bringing glory to God. Such suffering is a reminder to His people that God is beginning His judgment with them, and they can at least look beyond the persecution to a glorious future, in the light of which they can commit the issues of life in full confidence to the One who gave them life. By contrast the unrepentant sinner has nothing to look forward to here or hereafter once God begins to act in judgment.

Notes. 12 Fiery ordeal (Gk. 'exposure to fire with a view to testing'). This links with the argument of 1:6, 7. Strange is the adjective from the root of the verb used earlier in the verse and translated do not be surprised: 'surprising' would therefore be better, or else preserve strange in both places (as AV, RV). 13 Be glad is the verb used previously in 1:6, 8, and originally in Mt. 5:12. It has been argued from the usage in this verse of this verb in connection with the joy to be experienced at the unveiling of Christ that it should be a future tense and have the same reference in 1:8, but this is unnecessary in view of the other two references. See again 1:11; Rom. 8:17; 2 Tim. 2:12 for the association of suffering and glory. 14 For the name need not mean that it was already a criminal offence to be a Christian, for Jesus Himself suggested the possibility of suffering for His name's sake (cf. Mt. 10:22, and see Introduction, under 'Authorship', b.). The spirit of glory . . . : RV shows that spirit is missing from the first phrase in the original, and so it has been taken thus to refer to the Shekinah, the visible brightness which symbolized God's presence among His people (cf. Ex. 40:34, 35). This may be so, but the context and sentence structure make it more likely to be best taken as RSV: God's Spirit is the Spirit of glory as He manifests God's glory to His people by revealing Christ to them and transforming them into His image (cf. Jn. 16:14; 2 Cor. 3:18). The phrase may be coined from the LXX of Is. 11:2, though neither glory nor power (see RSV mg.) are mentioned there: power may have crept in from a marginal gloss. 15 Mischief-maker may seem out of place in this list of otherwise criminal characters, but there is a trace of grim humour in its conclusion. Christians are not likely to be guilty of the other more flagrant crimes, but are very often unable to resist the temptation to meddle in other people's affairs. 16 Christian occurs on only two other occasions in the NT, in Acts 11:26 and 26:28. In both cases it is generally assumed to have been used by others as a term of contempt, but there are two other possible derivations which may have significance. The Latin suffix -ianus may have been added to the Greek word Christ to indicate 'supporters of', in the same way that Herod's followers were called Herodians (Mk. 3:6, etc.). On the other hand, a Roman custom followed in adoption was that the person adopted into a Roman family took their name with this suffix and used it as his own. A person adopted into the family of Domitius would call himself Domitianus, and as Antioch was a very Roman city, the Christians there may well have applied the name to themselves as having been adopted into Christ's family (cf. Rom. 8:15–17; Eph. 1:5, etc.). Under that name is a better translation than AV 'on this behalf'. 17 Judgment: see Je. 25:29; Ezk. 9:6; Mal. 3:1–3 for this idea. Household is preferable to AV 'house'. 18 The quotation of Pr. 11:31 from the LXX underlines the argument of the previous verse, and is a reminder of Jesus' words in Lk. 23:31. 19 If such suffering is accepted in this light, then, far from giving up under it, the Christian will persevere in well-doing, and follow Christ's example by committing the outcome into God's hands. Entrust is the verb used by Jesus in Lk. 23:46 (citing the prayer of Ps. 31:5 used by the faithful Jew last thing at night) and this may be in mind here. Paul used the derivative noun in 2 Tim. 1:12 to express his confidence in God's safe keeping. Creator is used here probably as a reminder of God's power (see 1:5, and cf. the thought of Phil. 1:6).

5:1–4 Duties of the elders

The thought of the trial that is coming upon the people of God leads Peter to stress the need for leadership of the right kind. With his unique position and experience he urges the local church leaders to discharge their duties in a ready, enthusiastic and exemplary fashion, remembering to whom they are under-shepherds, and the reward He has promised for faithful service.

Notes. 1 Elders (Gk. presbyteroi) were appointed from earliest times to take spiritual charge of the infant churches which came into being with the spread of the gospel (cf. Acts 14:23; 20:17). Acts 15:2 shows that even the Jerusalem church had this order of ministry at an early date, and it probably derived from Jewish precedent (cf. Nu. 11:16–25 and see NBD, art. 'Elder'). Their task was primarily a pastoral one, and so in the early days of the church they were called not only by this title, which indicates their status, but also episkopoi ('bishops', 'overseers'), to describe their function. Hence the language of v. 2; Acts 20:28 shows the two words being used interchangeably. Fellow elder is not elsewhere found in the NT, but it is not an unusual word for Peter to use in this context, where he is anxious to emphasize his oneness with those he is exhorting. Witness has been objected to on the ground that Peter (according to Mt. 26:56; Lk. 23:49) was not present at the crucifixion. He was, however, present to see much of the Lord's sufferings, and such an objection cannot fairly be upheld (see Lk. 22:28, 54–62; Jn. 18:15–27). Glory: see on 4:13. 2 Tend is a pastoral metaphor (i.e. 'feed'; cf. Ps. 78:70–72) and a vivid reminder of the commission Peter had himself received from the Lord (Jn. 21:15ff.) and of Paul's charge to the Ephesian elders (Acts 20:28). That is your charge is an idiomatic phrase which could mean 'to the best of your ability': Erasmus and Calvin understood it thus, and so AV mg. suggests 'as much as in you is'. Either rendering suits the context: as translated by RSV it refers to that part of the flock which is each elder's particular responsibility. Exercising the oversight is left in the margin as textual evidence is divided over its inclusion: nothing is lost by its omission. The verb used is the same root as that referred to in 2:25. By constraint can refer to a false sense of unworthiness, a reluctance for responsibility, or a desire to do no more than was morally required in the office: any one of these attitudes can lead to an unwillingness to take on the task or discharge it adequately. As God would have you (RSV mg.) is a possible translation of the Greek kata theon: it could also mean 'as God would do it', recalling the attitude of the Shepherd of souls in 2:25; Ps. 23; Jn. 10:11. Shameful gain suggests not that by this time the elders were receiving a stipend, but that there were opportunities for the unscrupulous man to make profit from illegitimate sources. This spirit need not be confined to the attitude to money: such self-seeking could also apply to the love of reputation or position. 3 Domineering is often the attitude of the worldly superior (cf. Mk. 10:42, where the same verb is used), but the Christian leader, rather than 'lording' it and getting what he can out of those in his charge, is to be an example, giving what he can contribute to them in the way of instruction, character-building, etc. Those in your charge (Gk. klēroi), i.e. 'your appointed portions'. Klēros was originally an allotment of land, then an office assigned by lot, and here refers to the flock assigned to a particular pastor. From this root comes our word 'cleric'. Examples is the word typoi, denoting a model or pattern to be copied (see on 3:21 for the derivative antitypos). 4 Manifested. Hitherto in the Epistle Peter has described the second advent in terms of an 'unveiling' or 'revelation' of Jesus Christ. The word used here (Gk. phaneroō) brings out the consequence of that revelation, that Jesus will be visible in His glory to all (cf. Rev. 1:7). Unfading is not the same word as in 1:4 (amaranton). Here it is amarantinon, 'of amaranth', a flower which gained its name from the former adjective because it was supposed to be unfading. This would contrast with the fading crowns of laurel leaves awarded to victors in the Greek games, which is the background of the allusion here (cf. 1 Cor. 9:25; 2 Tim. 4:8; Rev. 3:11; 4:4). Of glory probably refers to the share in glory also to be given to the wearer of the crown, as the 'crown of life' in Jas. 1:12; Rev. 2:10 speaks of the eternal life enjoyed by the wearer.

5:5–11 FINAL EXHORTATIONS AND ASSURANCE

As a consequence of his advice to the elders Peter urges younger men to show them a suitable respect and calls for a mutual attitude of humility. Anxieties should be committed into God's hands, since He is a caring Father, but the Christian is nonetheless called to be on his guard in view of the vigilance of the devil, who is always watching for an unwary victim. Victory will come from an unshakable faith, combined with the knowledge that those who suffer are not alone in doing so: fellow-Christians are also suffering, and suffering bravely and successfully. What is more, the Christian has the glorious assurance that since God is the Author of all these purposes in his life, such suffering will only be for a relatively brief while, after which this same God will restore and re-establish him. Such a God deserves every ascription of praise and power.

Notes. 5 Likewise could indicate the conduct required of others in the light of the instructions in the preceding verses, or it could be a reversion in thought to the thread of 2:13, 18; 3:1, 7. Elders could be in the ecclesiastical sense as v. 1, or could be extended to the general and primary sense, in which case this is a command to Christian young people to show due deference to age. Clothe yourselves is literally 'fasten on with a knot', 'bind unto yourselves', and Peter may well have had Jn. 13:4, 5, 15, 16 in mind. The quotation in this verse is from the LXX of Pr. 3:34, quoted also in Jas. 4:6; Jesus speaks of this principle in Mt. 23:12. 6 The mighty hand of God is a familiar phrase in the LXX, and is usually connected in thought with God's deliverance of His people from Egypt: here it would be a reminder that He can intervene in human affairs and bring blessing out of the acceptance of the lowly part, and even out of suffering rightly borne. 7 Cast is the vivid verb 'hurl', used in the LXX of Ps. 55:23. The reason given for the absence of anxiety is familiar from the words of Jesus in Mt. 6:25–34; 10:28–33, etc. 8 Be sober; cf. 1:13; 4:7. Be watchful is again a striking reference to the Lord's own words to Peter in Mt. 26:41; Mk. 14:38. Adversary is a legal term, but probably translates into Greek the Hebrew śāṭān used of the adversary of souls, as in Jb. 1:6, etc. Then here, as there, Satan could be seen as the instigator of persecution and suffering in order to test, and if possible destroy, the faith of God's children. Peter was familiar with this behaviour (cf. Mt. 16:23; Lk. 22:31). Devil is the Greek diabolos which means 'slanderer': in his role of undermining faith the devil slanders God to men (cf. Gn. 3:1, 4, 5) and men to God (cf. Jb. 1:9–11; 2:4, 5). Prowls around; cf. Jb. 1:7; 2:2. 9 Resist is the method recommended for dealing with the devil, as in Jas. 4:7 (cf. Eph. 6:11–17). It is the desires of the flesh one has to flee (cf. 1 Tim. 6:11; 2 Tim. 2:22). Firm. The word is used of material objects to denote solidity. No superficial faith will do here, since Peter probably has in mind the devil's desire to make apostates through persecution. Rev. 12:11 also suggests the way to victory in such trials. Throughout the world: in contrast to the group of churches in Asia Minor (cf. 1:1) to whom this letter is addressed. 10 All grace. The call to perseverance is matched by the doctrine of preservation. Since God has called us to share His eternal glory in Christ, we can ultimately rely on Him to bring us safely through to it (cf. 1:5; Phil. 1:6; 1 Thes. 5:24; Jude 24). The verbs in this verse are best taken as future tenses (as RV, RSV) and not as optative mood (as AV): thus it is a promise, not a prayer. Restore is a verb often used of repairing ships after a battle or storm: in Mk. 1:19 it describes fishermen mending their nets. Establish . . . strengthen: the former word, used also in Lk. 22:32, and referring in its primary sense to physical objects, may denote fixity of position; the latter may be used for firmness of purpose. Settle (RSV mg.) means basically to 'give foundations', but is missing from several of the most ancient MSS. 11 Dominion is rightly ascribed to God here, as it is His over-ruling power which alone can bring the Christian through. This noun is formed from the same root as 'mighty' in v. 6.

Peter now sums up his twofold purpose of bringing encouragement and assurance, and mentions who has been his amanuensis. He set out to testify to them that the doctrine of salvation he has been expounding is truly God's grace at work, and in the light of that teaching to urge them to stand fast in it. Greetings are included, and the letter ends with the characteristic Hebrew blessing of peace being sent to all the Christian readers or hearers.

Notes. 12 Silvanus is probably the Silas of Acts 15:22 – 18:5 (cf. 2 Cor. 1:19; 1 Thes. 1:1; 2 Thes. 1:1). The exact part he played in the writing of the letter is discussed in the Introduction, under 'Authorship'. A faithful brother overlooks the definite article here, which led RV to translate 'our'. Its use may imply that Silvanus was known to the recipients of the letter, or may just stress his relationship to Peter. This could be taken more closely with v. 10 as referring to the possibility of growth in the Christian life, but is more likely to refer to the whole content of the letter. 13 Babylon has been taken to refer a. to the ancient city in Mesopotamia, b. to a Roman garrison town in Egypt, now Cairo, or c. to Rome. For reasons discussed in the Introduction (under 'Date and place of writing') it is probably best to understand the last reference. She . . . likewise chosen is usually referred to the local church, understanding an ellipse of the feminine word ekklēsia, 'church'. The suggestion by Alford that this refers to Peter's wife (cf. Mk. 1:30; 1 Cor. 9:5) is most unlikely, encouraged only by the following phrase. My son Mark most likely refers to the writer of the second Gospel, who may have alluded to himself in Mk. 14:51, and to whose home Peter came on his deliverance from prison (Acts 12:12). Mark accompanied Paul on missionary work (Acts 12:25 – 13:13), but subsequently left him and thus displeased the apostle, who preferred to take Silas as a companion (Acts 13:13; 15:36–40). However, Mark subsequently regained Paul's favour (2 Tim. 4:11) and was with him, probably at Rome, at the end of his life (Col. 4:10; Phm. 24). Eusebius quotes Papias as saying that Mark compiled a written record of Peter's recollections of the deeds and sayings of the Lord, and Mark's Gospel was from early times associated with the church at Rome. Son is used in the spiritual sense (cf. 1 Tim. 1:2, etc.). 14 The kiss of love, or 'holy kiss', is referred to on several occasions (e.g. Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thes. 5:26) and appears to have been in common use when Christians met for fellowship: it may have been a common practice among the apostolic band (cf. Lk. 22:48). This was a practice which could be twisted to advantage by opponents who wished to slander the Christian faith. Peace is the wish with which the letter ends, as it began (1:2). But the reader has in the interval been made aware how this peace is made possible, even in the midst of suffering and in the difficult outworkings of personal relationships and the challenging onslaught of a pagan world. The source of this peace is to be found in Christ. Whatever his circumstances, the man who is in Christ (cf. Eph. 1:3ff.) can always know the peace of God, for it is freely available to all such.

2 Peter

AUTHORSHIP

The evidence of the letter itself leaves no doubt on this question. The writer is 'Simon Peter, a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ' (1:1); he was on the Mount of Transfiguration with Jesus (1:16–18), where only Peter, James and John were with Him (see Mk. 9:2ff. and parallels); he had written earlier to the recipients of this letter (3:1), and is on familiar terms with them (3:1, 8, 14, 17); he could claim Paul as a 'beloved brother' (3:15), and at the time of writing he was expecting his own death to occur quite soon (1:14).

No MS evidence would suggest that any of these facts were later written into the letter to gain it acceptance, but a popular modern theory is that the letter is a pseudepigraph, i.e. a writing put out after the death of a great man, but published under his name as containing the kind of things he would say in that situation, and intended by such ascription to do him honour. Supporters of this view maintain it for various reasons, which may briefly be summarized as follows:

a. It is claimed that the language and style are not as closely akin to 1 Peter as would be expected. But in the former letter Peter had the assistance of Silvanus as his amanuensis (1 Pet. 5:12) and he was writing on different matters. In fact there are strong resemblances between the two Epistles: some words and phrases (e.g. 'excellence' used of God in 1 Pet. 2:9; 2 Pet. 1:3; 'removal' in 1 Pet. 3:21; 2 Pet. 1:14; '(un)ceasing from sin' in 1 Pet. 4:1; 2 Pet. 2:14) occur only in these letters and nowhere else in the NT. Other words not common elsewhere are 'love of the brethren' in 1 Pet. 1:22; 2 Pet. 1:7; the root of 'behold' used in 1 Pet. 2:12; 3:2; 2 Pet. 1:16; and 'supply' in 1 Pet. 4:11; 2 Pet. 1:5. Again there are similarities in the doctrines of prophecy in 1 Pet. 1:10–12; 2 Pet. 1:20, 21; of Christian liberty in 1 Pet. 2:16; 2 Pet. 2:19; and of eschatology in 1 Pet. 1:5; 4:7; 2 Pet. 3:3, 10. In particular, traces of an authentic link with Peter can be seen in the linguistic connections between the letter and the apostle's speeches in the Acts: the peculiar use of 'godliness' in Acts 3:12; 2 Pet. 1:6; 'lawless' in Acts 2:23; 2 Pet. 2:8; 'obtained' in Acts 1:17; 2 Pet. 1:1; and the phrase 'reward of wickedness' in Acts 1:18; 2 Pet. 2:13, 15; and 'day of the Lord' in Acts 2:20; 2 Pet. 3:10. More recent research has shown that the objection on linguistic grounds has nothing like the evidence to support it that was once supposed (see further E. M. B. Green, TNTC, 2 Peter and Jude, pp. 16–19).

b. The other main objection to Petrine authorship of the Epistle comes from the apparent hesitancy of the early church to receive 2 Peter into the NT Canon. However, this is largely an argument based on silence, and the fact that the letter was finally included in the Canon, and that at a time when the church was rightly suspicious of pseudo-Petrine writings circulated by Gnostic circles, should not be underestimated.

c. The fact that this letter so strongly resembles that of Jude, especially in ch. 2, is felt to be further evidence against Petrine authorship. We shall have to consider the relationship between the two letters in greater detail later: suffice it to say here that the fact that most of Jude is included in 2 Peter has led many to conclude that therefore Jude was the earlier document: if Peter had written first there would be no reason for Jude to write. From this it is then argued that a leading apostle such as Peter would not have used material from one who, if he was the Lord's brother, did not believe until after the resurrection (see Mk. 6:3; Jn. 7:5). Here again the argument is far from conclusive. Jude could well have made a digest of 2 Peter to send to a church or churches to whom the latter had not written, and thus Peter could have written first. There is no reason why Peter should have refused to use another source for part of the letter: we have seen in introducing 1 Peter that he may possibly have used a sermon of his own or someone else's as the basis of that letter. Finally, it could be that both Peter and Jude used another common source.

d. Other arguments maintain that the teaching contained in the letter bears the marks of a late date. This is not necessarily true, as the false teaching attacked in this letter was germinally present in its doctrinal aspect in Colossae (Col. 2:18) and in its moral aspect at Corinth (1 Cor. 5; 6:12–20) at the time that Paul wrote his letters to these places. Moreover, the parousia teaching in this letter about Christ's return shows that the hope of His coming mentioned in 1 Peter is not missing from this letter. It is only the scoffers who are trying to dispose of it (3:4): the godly are still looking for it (3:12), and this doctrine provides the same motive for holy living as it does in the former letter (cf. 3:11–14 with 1 Pet. 1:7, 13, 17; 4:7, 13).

Recent conservative scholars have drawn attention to the fact that the pseudepigraphic theory raises an important moral problem. Later generations of the church condemned this device, and it had been attempted by the unorthodox in NT times, only to be denounced by Paul (2 Thes. 2:2; 3:17). It is almost unbelievable that a sincere writer could have included the false personal references of 1:1, 16–18; 3:1 in a letter in which he lays such stress on holiness and truth (1:3, 4, 12; 3:11, 17): such a deceit could not have been accepted in a church which called its members to such high standards in all other matters.

The language of 3:16 suggests that a number of Pauline letters had been written by the time Peter penned this letter. It is not necessary to conclude, as some do, from 1:12–17 that the Gospels were already widely circulating, or from 3:4 that at the time of writing the first generation of Christians had died. References to this letter in other works show that at the latest it must have been written early in the 2nd century; the undeveloped stage of the heresy attacked would argue for pushing the date back into the end of the 1st century; and if we are prepared to accept Petrine authorship, then a date shortly before the apostle's death (1:14), somewhere in the sixties, would seem most likely.

PLACE OF ORIGIN AND DESTINATION

The letter affords no clues about the place where it was written. If we accept its Petrine authorship and that 1 Peter was written in Rome, then it is likely that this letter was also from there. If 3:1 is a reference to 1 Peter, the addressees would presumably be the same as in that letter: otherwise 1:1 could suggest that it was intended for a wider readership. The recipients are obviously Christian churches suffering from the beginnings of the Gnostic heresy, and this was known to have been spreading early in Asia Minor. They would probably have consisted both of Jews and Gentiles (see Introduction to 1 Peter): arguments based on odd phrases in the letter are as inconclusive here as in the former letter (e.g., if 1:1 suggests Gentile readership, 3:2 can equally be pressed into suggesting Jewish).

SUBJECT-MATTER

The apostle writes as one who knows that his time on this earth is limited, and his letter has three main thoughts. a. Christians must match their Christian calling and resources with growth in practical holiness. b. Every attempt to delude them with false doctrine and its consequent licentiousness must be resisted and refuted. c. Finally, Christians must live their lives in the light of the coming day of God. The first and the last of these themes is familiar from the First Epistle: the second subject would appear to have been the main reason for the letter, but the writer prefers to set it in the right and positive perspective of Christian growth and destiny by placing it between the other two.

UNITY

In recent times various suggestions have been made that chs. 1 and 3 could have been the original letter, into which ch. 2 was later combined, or that each chapter at first circulated separately, ch. 1 being the earlier letter referred to in 3:1 and ch. 3 the sort of reminder promised in 1:13, again with 2 added in. A further analysis has attempted to isolate the so-called genuine Petrine sections of the letter, arguing that the rest is material added by a later editor. Two factors militate against these theories: there is no trace of MS evidence that any part of the letter at any time circulated on its own, and supporters of this theory are hard put to it to explain the marked unity of style throughout all three chapters.

THE LINK WITH JUDE

It is evident to the most casual reader that most of Jude 4–18 is found in 2 Peter, and this has given rise to three theories, which may be summarized as follows.

a. The priority of Jude. This is suggested by the fact that Peter adds so much other material: had Peter written first, then Jude would have added only a few verses to what was already in circulation. This is no objection if we consider the possibility that Jude abbreviated a document already in existence to meet the needs of churches to whom the earlier document had not been sent. Others suggest that Peter softened the harsh tones of Jude, telescoped his metaphors and excised his apocryphal references, etc., each of which arguments could be turned in reverse to suggest that Jude rewrote the relevant portion of Peter, deliberately making the language more harsh, adjusting an inappropriate metaphor, and backing the argument with apocryphal references.

b. The priority of Peter. Arguments quoted above can be used either way, and so are used by advocates of this view. It has also been noted above that some feel that a man of Peter's standing would not have quoted from an obscure person like Jude. Further, it is argued that the dangers foreseen in the future by Peter (2:1) have been present for some time in Jude (v. 4) Here again, it can be pointed out on the other side that Peter is not consistent in his tenses, and frequently uses the present, speaking of these dangerous teachers as already having begun their work (2:10b–19).

c. A common source behind both. The problems attached to either of the above views have led to the formulation of this hypothesis as a further alternative. While this does solve some of the problems mentioned above, it still leaves one largely unanswered, and that is why Jude bothered to write his letter if he merely repeated so much of the original source. It is far more reasonable to suppose that he made an abridgement of 2 Peter to meet his own particular needs.

In all fairness it must be admitted that there is no final answer to this problem of priority. There are marked resemblances also between 2 Peter and other parts of the NT, and these will be noted below in the Commentary.

1:1, 2 OPENING ADDRESS

Following the pattern of the previous letter, the writer begins by introducing himself and his credentials, stating the identity of those to whom he is writing, and sending his Christian greetings to them.

Notes. 1 Simon Peter: see Introduction, under 'Authorship'. Simon is probably better read as 'Symeon' (as RV mg.) and is the straightforward transliteration of the Hebrew form of his name as used in Acts 15:14. This could well be a mark of authenticity: use of the two names together (as on the formal occasions of Mt. 16:16; Lk. 5:8; Jn. 21:15) could be a reminder of the change grace had wrought in the apostle's life. Servant and apostle. The latter title is used alone in 1 Peter (the former by Jude). Together they doubly emphasize the authority by which he writes, as one who is only a servant, yet fully commissioned by his Master for His work. Obtained is the Greek lachousin, 'obtain by lot', which implies grace and not merit as the source of this gift. The faith referred to here appears to be the God-given ability to respond to His grace by personal commitment and trust, as in Eph. 2:8, 9. Of equal standing is used by contemporary writers to describe those who share the rights and privileges of citizenship. Some think that in this context it refers to the equality of Gentiles with Jews in the purposes of God, reflecting Peter's experience in Acts 10:34, 35, but it has been argued above that the letter is not necessarily addressed only to Gentiles. Alternatively, then, this could be a further touch of humility by the servant of Jesus Christ, showing that, though an apostle, he is still a sinner in need of the righteousness of . . . Jesus Christ, just as much as the newest convert among those to whom the letter is written. However, most commentators suggest that the righteousness refers not so much to the object of their faith, but that the word has an ethical rather than a forensic sense, referring to the sheer fairness of God. Our God and Saviour Jesus Christ is more close to the original Greek than the marginal our God and the Saviour Jesus Christ, and the analogous form of 1 Pet. 1:3 suggests that only one Person of the Trinity is referred to here (cf. 1:11; 2:20; 3:18; see also Tit. 2:13. These references could then be important biblical evidence for the deity of Christ). Saviour as a title for Jesus appears mainly in the later writings of the NT, but is a regular emphasis in the early preaching of Peter (cf. Acts 4:12; 5:31; and later references in this letter at 1:11; 2:20; 3:2, 18). 2 May grace and peace be multiplied: see on 1 Pet. 1:2. Knowledge is stressed here as the means by which grace and peace can be multiplied in the believer's life. The Gnostic deviationists exalted knowledge (Gk. gnōsis) as being superior to faith, and in reply orthodox writers stressed the importance for Christians to acquire epignōsis, 'full knowledge', (as here), in order to combat this heresy. Such knowledge is never merely speculative, as was the Gnostic variety, but springs from a personal relationship with and experience of God in Jesus our Lord (cf. Jn. 17:3; Phil. 3:10).

1:3–11 A CALL TO SPIRITUAL GROWTH

Just as attack is the best form of defence, so Peter stresses that the best answer to the false teaching he will later refute is for Christians to be progressing not only in their understanding but also in their practice of the faith. This is important for the further reasons that God has provided believers with all the resources necessary to make such growth possible, and that such progress is a factor in assuring the Christian of his standing before God.

1:3, 4 The means—provided by God

Peter explains that such progress in the Christian life is made possible and practical for the Christian by two factors—the power and the promises of God. God's calling is made known to the person who responds to Jesus Christ, and in knowing Him the believer has freely placed at his disposal all the resources of Christ necessary to enable him to work out the process of sanctification. These resources are assured to the believer by the very promises of God.

Notes. 3 His would appear, from what has preceded, to refer to Jesus. Granted here and in the next verse stresses the freeness of the gift. Life refers to all the abundance of eternal life which Christ gives the believer (cf. Jn. 10:10), while godliness is the Christlike character which such life should produce. To is probably better translated by, as RSV mg., RV. Then his own glory and excellence would refer to the divine character and high moral quality of the life and Person of Jesus, as witnessed by Peter and proclaimed by the apostolic testimony and proclamation to subsequent generations of Christians. Peter may be thinking of the transfiguration when he mentions the glory of Jesus, and his own call (Lk. 5:1–11) when he refers to His excellence, but it is more likely that he is referring to the total impact of the Person of Jesus on a believer (cf. Jn. 1:14). Excellence (Gk. aretē) is used in this sense in 1 Pet. 2:9. 4 By which refers to Christ's glory and excellence, and emphasizes that it is because of the quality of His life that the believer can receive the promise of sharing the very nature of God. This is the teaching of Rom. 6, that by virtue of who Christ is, and by means of faith-union with Him, here and now the Christian enjoys the possibility of a life free from sin and its defilement and constantly growing more like Jesus. Promises: such as Peter enumerated in 1 Pet. 1:3–5; 2:9. Through these; i.e. as you live by them. Corruption (Gk. phthora) is the steady process of dissolution to which all things mortal are subject. It was introduced into the world as a direct result of the Fall, which in turn arose through man's giving way to passion. The phrase may be understood in this way, or it may be a reference to the inevitable consequences of sin in each successive generation of mankind. In either case, God's way of escape lies in seizing hold of His promises and thereby obtaining a share in His own nature: the thoughts behind this phrase can be traced out in verses such as Jn. 1:12; 1 Jn. 3:2, 3.

1:5–8 The aim—fruitful discipleship

Since the Christian has these resources at his disposal, he is exhorted to utilize them in spiritual growth which will give practical expression to the relationship described as 'knowing' Jesus Christ. Faith must be seen at work in a life of moral excellence, and this must be backed by a steadily increasing knowledge of God. This in turn gives the ability to control oneself, and that is necessary if one is going to be able to cope with trying circumstances or people. Steadfastness keeps the eyes consistently on God and His purposes in spite of these difficulties, and so leads to godliness: in turn the right attitude to God produces the right attitude of brotherly affection to one's fellows. Beyond this, and as it were the coping-stone of the whole edifice of character, is Christian love, which reaches beyond the family of God to all men.

Notes. 5 Supplement has the idea of lavish provision, and is a verb used in classical Greek to describe the munificence of rich citizens who would finance a theatrical performance or fit out a warship for the state they were proud to belong to. The Christian response to sharing the life of God and being a citizen of heaven should be to aim at producing and being the finest and most attractive character for God. Virtue is the same noun as 'excellence' in v. 3, and may refer to the process of assimilation hinted at there. The connection between practical Christian living and developing knowledge is referred to again in v. 8 (cf. Jn. 7:17; Col. 1:10). 6 Since God alone can give us the power to control self, self-control will be acquired only as one's knowledge of Him increases (cf. 1 Pet. 4:2). Steadfastness (Gk. hypomonē) is the ability to hold fast to one's goal in spite of opposition and persecution (cf. the use in Heb. 12:1–3, where the same root is translated by 'perseverance' and 'endured'). Godliness: see on v. 3 above. 7 Brotherly affection is emphasized as a fruit of the new birth in 1 Pet. 1:22; 3:8, and is of course what Jesus enjoined as the mark of His disciples (Jn. 13:34, 35). Love is the crown of all the Christian virtues, as in 1 Cor. 13; Col. 3:14, etc.

1:9 The significance—awareness of one's status

To neglect this kind of progress suggests that the person who behaves in this way must have forgotten the depths from which he was rescued.

Notes. Blind and shortsighted seems a strangely mixed metaphor. Peter may mean that such a person is being blind to the glorious possibilities of spiritual development that are his in Christ, and shortsighted because he cannot see back far enough to remember the wonder of divine forgiveness and cleansing.

1:10, 11 The result—full and final salvation

By contrast the writer urges his fellow-Christians to pursue such a character and way of behaviour as shall not only bring them full assurance of their status here and now, but also enable them safely and certainly to reach the Christian's glorious destination.

Notes. 10 Zealous is the same root as 'effort' in v. 5, and may be a deliberate reference back. Confirm your call and election is the tension which runs right through the first letter. Christians are 'chosen and destined by God the Father' (1 Pet. 1:2), and yet must conduct themselves 'with fear and trembling' (1 Pet. 1:17; cf. Phil. 2:12, 13). So Peter even hints at the possibility that one can fall from grace (see also Jude 24, where the verb ptaiō is used in the same sense). It does not here refer to sinning (as in Jas. 3:2), and so there is no suggestion of sinlessness. 11 Instead of this gloomy prospect, the Christian's hope should be set on an entrance into Christ's eternal kingdom: this last phrase is used here in an eschatological sense. Richly provided is the same verb as in v. 5 ('supplement'): God's lavish reward is a spur to lavish living for Him.

1:12 – 2:22 REASONS FOR EMPHASIZING THESE THINGS

The writer now goes on to explain in detail why he finds it necessary to write in this vein. He is anxious to remind his Christian friends about the importance of spiritual progress, as he knows that he has not much longer to live. As an eyewitness he wishes to stress that the faith they share is founded on facts of history, and further, that these events are a confirmation of what was foretold by the prophets. Mention of this leads to a long warning about the false prophets who will arise in the church just as they did in the OT people of God. The danger of their teaching and the error of their ways are then fully exposed.

1:12–15 Personal—the writer's home-call is imminent

During his lifetime Peter knows that he must keep on reminding his friends of this subject, and now by writing to them about it he is ensuring that they will have a further reminder when he has died.

Notes. 12 Remind. Although Christian people know the truth, it is the preacher and teacher's task constantly to be setting it before them afresh. Established: see on 1 Pet. 5:10, where the same verb is used. 13 Body is the Greek skēnōma, 'tent', and is used to indicate the temporary nature of our time in this body (cf. 2 Cor. 5:1–8). 14 Putting off. The metaphor is that of doffing clothes, and is developed further in 2 Cor. 5:1–8. Soon. Paul expresses a similar premonition of approaching death in 2 Tim. 4:6. Note the RV rendering 'the putting off . . . cometh swiftly'. Showed me may refer to the Lord's words in Jn. 21:18, 19, or to a more recent revelation. 15 Departure is the Greek exodos, used of the Lord's impending death in Lk. 9:31. Its use here suggests that he may have had the transfiguration experience in mind. Death is the departure from this mode of existence and leads to the entrance (v. 11) into Christ's eternal kingdom. At any time to recall may refer to this letter, or to Peter's part in supplying Mark with the information on which his Gospel is based.

1:16–18 Historical—the faith is founded on facts

Peter reminds his readers that he was present at the transfiguration, an event which took place in time and space, and that here authentic witness to Him was borne by God the Father. Understanding of these verses will depend largely on the interpretation of power and coming. Both words could refer to the historic facts of the life of Jesus on earth, but the word coming is more customarily reserved in the NT for the second coming of Jesus (cf. Mt. 24:3, 27, etc.; 1 Thes. 3:13; and 3:12 of this letter). In this case both words could be used by hendiadys for the 'coming in power' of Jesus (cf. Mk. 13:26; 14:62). A third interpretation sees power as referring to the transfiguration and coming to the return of Christ, and notes a similar thought-connection in Mk. 9:1ff. The transfiguration was certainly an anticipation of the full glory of the divine Christ to be revealed at His return.

Notes. 16 Cleverly devised myths were a feature of the theological systems of the Gnostic speculators. Eyewitnesses: a reminder of the claim in 1 Pet. 5:1; Lk. 1:2; Jn. 1:14; 1 Jn. 1:1–3. Majesty is used in the NT only to describe divine glory (cf. Lk. 9:43; Acts 19:27). 17 This is . . . This formula of the Voice from heaven, repeated at our Lord's baptism and the transfiguration, combines the prophecies of Ps. 2:7 (the coronation of the Son of God) and Is. 42:1 (the ordination of the suffering Servant). Peter omits the final clause, summoning men to listen to Jesus Christ. 18 Holy need not suggest a late date for the letter, when ecclesiastical traditions were crystallized: the mountain would naturally be thought of as holy, as the scene of a divine revelation (cf. Ex. 3:5; 19:23).

1:19–21 Confirmatory—these happenings fulfil prophecy

The events to which Peter has been referring were seen by the apostles as a remarkable fulfilment of the OT (cf. Mt. 1:22; 2:5, 6, etc.). Jesus Himself had pointed this out to them (Jn. 5:39; Lk. 22:37; 24:26, 27, 44), and the early preaching of the gospel emphasized it (Acts 2:25ff., 34ff.; 3:22–24, etc.). Since so much prophecy has been fulfilled in the first coming of Christ, Christians must pay all the more heed to what remains to be fulfilled at His second coming, especially as the prophecies are not the result of man's speculative thinking (as the myths of v. 16) but of God's revelation by His Spirit.

Notes. 19 More sure. Translations vary according to the interpretation of this phrase. Some think that the argument is that the word of prophecy is more certain than the Voice from the mount; others take it as above, that the events of the first coming of Jesus make belief in the prophecies of the second coming easier. Lamp is a well-known picture of Scripture (cf. Ps. 119:105). Dark: as this world must be without the true Light present (cf. Jn. 8:12). The day; i.e. of Christ's coming, as in 3:10; Rom. 13:12 (cf. Ct. 2:17). Morning star (Gk. phōsphoros): the star that brings the dawn, a word used in antiquity to refer to the planet Venus. Its use here accords with the Star-symbolism of Jesus in Nu. 24:17; Lk. 1:78; Rev. 22:16 (cf. Mal. 4:2; Eph. 5:14). In your hearts is felt by some to be difficult, as Christ's coming will be objective and visible, but the phrase may be elliptic: Christ's return will bring light and joy to the hearts of His own. It is possible, but less likely, that this phrase should be taken with the following clause: 'you must first of all understand this in your hearts.' 20 You must . . . is repeated in 3:3. Prophecy of scripture is distinct from the false prophecies to be alluded to in 2:1. Interpretation is a noun not used elsewhere in the NT; in Mk. 4:34 the verb is used of the explanation of parables. The statement is normally taken to assert that prophecy can be understood by the individual only as he is guided by the Spirit (some would say Spirit-filled church) who guided the writers. This strains the verb here into an unnatural meaning, and it seems better to understand the reference to the origin rather than the understanding of Scripture: no prophecy of Scripture arises from a private explanation (sc. of events past, present or future) for the reasons following. 21 Moved (Gk. pheromenoi); i.e. borne along by the Spirit like a ship borne along by the wind. Holy (RSV mg.) is not in all the MSS, nor is the preposition from: hence the differences between the RSV and RSV mg. translations.

2:1–22 Admonitory—false prophets

Stress on the importance of looking forward to the fulfilment of Spirit-given prophecy leads Peter to issue a warning about the false prophecies that will be put forward. It is striking that this is a feature also of Jesus' teaching about the future (cf. Mk. 13:22, 23). This chapter should be compared carefully with Jude 4–18.

2:1–3 Their danger. This is threefold: they destroy themselves by their denial of Christ (cf. Mt. 10:33), they draw others to follow them and decry orthodox Christianity, and they will seek to make financial gain from genuine believers by their false teaching.

Notes. 1 The people seems, in the context, to refer to the OT people of God. The activities of false prophets are mentioned in Dt. 13:1–5; 1 Ki. 13:18; 22:5–23; Je. 5:13, 31; 6:13, etc. False teachers. The falsity may refer to the content of their teaching or to their claim to be teachers. Probably both are implied. Secretly is an undertone of the verb, which literally means 'to bring in in addition'. Heresies are the Greek haireseis, which simply means 'chosen beliefs'. In the Christian church it came to refer to a wrong belief deliberately chosen by a man (rather than a right one revealed to him by God). Destructive is a Hebraistic phrase referring to the consequence both for the holder of such views and any orthodox beliefs he might have. The Master (Gk. despotēs) is applied to Christ only here and in Jude 4, but is used of God ('Sovereign Lord') in Acts 4:24; Rev. 6:10 (cf. Lk. 2:29). Bought introduces the ransom aspect of the work of Christ (cf. Mk. 10:45), and produces the corollary that the Christian is therefore Christ's servant, and is not to please himself (see the argument of 1 Pet. 1:14–21 and 1 Cor. 6:19b, 20). 2 Licentiousness was one consequence of the tendency to make knowledge superior to practice: the false teachers of the day tended to argue that it did not matter how the Christian behaved, as grace could forgive every sin, no matter how great. The NT is unequivocal in contradicting this outlook, and Peter's arguments against it can be seen in 1 Pet. 1:15; 2:11, 12; 4:2; 2 Pet. 1:4; 3:11 (cf. Rom. 6:1, 2, 15, etc.). The way was an early name for the Christian faith (cf. Acts 9:2, etc.); of truth may be a reference to Ps. 119:30 or to Jn. 14:6. Reviled. Peter has earlier faced up to the fact that orthodox Christians will be reviled for their good behaviour (1 Pet. 3:16; 4:3–5), and now he sorrows that the immorality of pseudo-Christian sects will bring reproach upon the true faith. 3 Exploit has commercial connotations. False means fabricated, made up to suit the ears of the hearer (cf. 1 Thes. 2:5). Not . . . idle means that judgment is impending; cf. Phillips 'hard on their heels'. Asleep is a vivid metaphor (cf. NEB 'waits for them with unsleeping eyes'). Retribution is certain, though it may not be swift, for the man who leads another astray.

2:4–10a Their condemnation. Peter now develops the theme of v. 3 more fully, drawing on early incidents in the history of God's people to show how His purposes both of salvation and of condemnation are sure and will be completed. Noah and Lot are cited as examples of how God can deliver His own when their ungodly contemporaries are destroyed, while the fate of the fallen angels is a pointer to the fact of a final judgment, when man's rebellion, culminating in the unbridled indulgence of self and rejection of God's authority, will be duly punished. Together the three examples show God's punishment of pride, disobedience and immorality.

Notes. 4 Angels: see Gn. 6:1–4 and Jude 6, where the writer draws attention to pride as being the cause of their downfall. Hell here is a Greek concept (see RSV mg.) and refers in Greek mythology to Tartarus, the lowest and most terrible part of hell, reserved especially for those superhuman beings who rebelled against the supreme God. Pits of nether gloom may fill out the picture with an allusion to the underground granaries of the day: alteration of one letter may give us another word meaning 'chains' (as AV, RV mg.) and this is then parallel to Jude 6. The imagery appears to be drawn from apocryphal writings. 5 Noah: see Gn. 6:8 – 9:28; 1 Pet. 3:20 where there is also mention of the eight being saved. A herald, together with the reference in 1 Pet. 3:20 to the disobedient, suggests that Noah was commissioned to call his contemporaries to repentance, but that they chose to ignore or reject his message—as the false teachers will do. Another apocryphal work describes Noah's preaching. 6 Sodom and Gomorrah: see Gn. 18:16 – 19:28. An example: a fact to which Jesus alludes in Mt. 10:15; 11:23f.; Lk. 17:29. 7 Wicked means 'lawless', i.e. the consequence of having no fear of God and therefore feeling completely free to live without principles, indulging fallen nature. 8 He was vexed. The verb means to be tortured (as NEB) or tormented. It originally meant to test in order to prove genuineness, and may suggest that the godly man, living in an ungodly world, should be prepared to prove the reality of his faith. 9 Instead of making the second part of this sentence, dealing with punishment, the apodosis of his conditional sentence (which logic would require), Peter chooses to focus attention on the positive aspect of God's mercy, that in such a wicked world He can keep His own. The switch in thought may have been prompted by mention of the distress of Lot in v. 8: it is significant that this emphasis is absent from Jude. Rescue . . . from trial: see 1 Pet. 1:6, 7; 5:10. 10a Lust of defiling passion: literally 'those who go after flesh with a desire for pollution'. Comparison with Jude 7 suggests that sodomy is here referred to. Authority is Greek kyriotēs, 'lordship', and is most naturally taken as referring to the Lordship of Christ (cf. 1 Pet. 3:15). On the other hand, it may anticipate the latter part of the verse, if angels are there referred to, and the word may refer to the authority of an order of angels, as Jude 8; Eph. 1:21; Col. 1:16 are thought to do.

2:10b–22 Their character. The apostle now proceeds to elaborate the danger these men constitute by describing more fully their true nature. They are insolent (vv. 10–12), licentious (v. 13), immoral (v. 14) and greedy (vv. 14b–16). By such behaviour they attract and enslave the newly converted (vv. 17–19), and so Peter concludes this section by uttering a warning of the serious consequences of a Christian backsliding into immorality. In this passage the language is complicated and unusual as the writer piles word upon word to heighten the enormity of their behaviour.

Notes. 10b Bold suggests the spirit that has no concern for others, or even for one's own danger; wilful ('self-pleasing') describes the attitude of being so obsessed with one's own wishes that nothing else can be taken into consideration. The glorious ones may refer to angels, in which case they may revile them in the way in which the men of Sodom reviled the angels who came to the house of Lot (Gn. 19:1ff.), or it could be that they used the behaviour of the fallen angels in Gn. 6:1–4 as a justification for their own immorality, and spoke evil of the unfallen angels by holding that such behaviour was typical of all angels. Alternatively, it could be argued that the word is simply used for church leaders ('dignities', AV, RV). 11 Angels, by contrast, have the right to complain to God of the behaviour of these arrogant mortals, but refuse to do so: this may be a reference to the kind of incident described in Jude 9. 12 As such behaviour is irrational, like that of animals, then the destiny of these men will be similar too. Cf. Jude 10. The ignorance of those who criticize the Christian way of life is commented on by Peter in 1 Pet. 2:15. With them could refer to the fate of the animals (as NEB), or could describe the final consequences of the corruption they have allowed into their own lives (cf. Phillips 'will most certainly be destroyed in their own corruption'). 13 Suffering wrong. This verb appears to have here the connotation of the marketplace. RSV and NEB bring out the play on words, but E. M. B. Green (TNTC, p. 109) suggests the right metaphor with 'being defrauded of the wages of fraud'. Sin attracts with its offer of pleasure, but in the end he who indulges finds that he has no pleasure at all. Daytime revelry is a feature of extreme dissipation, and for the Christian the day is the time for work (cf. Jn. 9:4; Rom. 13:13; 1 Thes. 5:7f.). Blots (Gk.

spiloi); i.e. 'spots', something disfiguring and painful. Blemishes. This and the preceding word occur in the NT with a negative prefix to describe what Christ was, and what His church should be (cf. Eph. 5:27; 1 Pet. 1:19; 2 Pet. 3:14; Jude 24). Dissipation could possibly be the alternative reading 'at their love feasts' (cf. RSV mg.), for some MSS read Greek agapais for apatais. This approximates to the text of Jude 12, and we know from 1 Cor. 11 that the love feast had early been the subject of abuse. Carousing. The Greek is a more neutral word, 'while they sit with you at table' (NEB). 14 Eyes full of adultery is a compressed phrase for 'always looking for a woman with whom to commit adultery' (Arndt): Phillips has 'their eyes cannot look at a woman without lust'. Entice. Such sinners are never content, but must lead others astray. Accursed, because they have rejected Christ (v. 2), who alone can deliver them from the curse (cf. Gal. 3:13); children is the Hebraism (as in 1 Pet. 1:14) 'children of', i.e. those who are subject to others. 15, 16 Balaam is cited as the classic example of the false teacher who leads people astray for his own personal gain. Nu. 22–24 show how Balaam tried time and again to prophesy against Israel in order to gain the reward Balak offered: in the end, after failing to destroy Israel verbally, he is shown as doing so morally (Nu. 31:16; cf. 25:1–9). Balaam is the prototype of the false teacher who seeks good rewards or popularity by persuading people that God's standards can be lowered. Peter here expands one example cited in Jude 11. Madness, because such behaviour is so contrary to all good sense.

17 Waterless springs. They do not give the satisfaction they claim to offer. Mists may refer to their instability: their teaching shifts with the least gust of wind (cf. Eph. 4:14). Or it may suggest failure to give the refreshing rain they promise. Others see in the phrase something which does no good, but only obscures the light. Nether gloom: see on v. 4. The Greek zophos was used from classical times to denote the darkness of the nether regions. 18 Loud. The Greek adjective conveys the idea of something larger than it has any right to be. Entice. One of the characteristics of sin is the way in which its adherents are always out to persuade others to share in their behaviour (cf. v. 14; Rom. 1:32). Barely escaped. False teachers frequently make for the newly converted, who are not yet rooted in orthodox Christian doctrine. 19 The freedom these teachers appear to offer is freedom from the obligation to serve Christ and grow in Him in the way set out in 1:3–11. In doing so they overlook that this kind of licence is only the old bondage of sin all over again (cf. Rom. 6 and Jn. 8:31–36). 20 For . . . they . . . seems to link in thought with the false teachers, and to explain why they are now in such total bondage to corruption. Knowledge: see on 1:2. The last state. Peter may have been recalling Jesus' words in Mt. 12:45; Lk. 11:26, though others see a link with Lk. 12:47, 48. 21 It would have been better: because if they have rejected God's way in Christ there is no other way of salvation (cf. Heb. 6:4–8; 10:26–31). Way: see on v. 2. Of righteousness stresses the ethical consequences of following Christ. 22 Proverb. The first is found in Pr. 26:11, while the second appears to come from an extra-biblical source, the ancient History of Ahikar. Peter may be thinking also of Mt. 7:6.

3:1–16 A REMINDER OF THE COMING OF THE LORD

Peter has dealt at length with false teachers because he is so concerned about the damage they can do, but he now returns to the point from which he digressed in 2:1. He began the letter with an exhortation to growth in godliness, and is now going to adduce the second coming of Jesus as a further motive for godly living; but before doing so he pauses to stress the certainty of that coming, and to explain the reasons why God has delayed it.

3:1, 2 A call to remember the promise

Peter stresses the unity of this letter with his former one, and the consistency of his teaching with that both of prophets and of the other apostles.

Notes. 1 The second letter could be a reference to 1 Peter, or to chs. 1 and 2 of this letter (if the theory be accepted that they were written separately), or else to an earlier letter which has not been preserved to us. If the predictions and the commandment of v. 2 are to do with the second coming, they hardly describe Peter's first letter, and a lost letter is probably referred to here. Otherwise, taken as general terms, the words could describe the contents of 1 Peter. Beloved. The writer's heart warms as he turns from considering the false teachers to feed the flock of God. Aroused: see 1:13. Sincere mind, by contrast with the people described in ch. 2. The phrase can have a moral sense as well as meaning 'uncontaminated by prejudice'. 2 Predictions . . . commandment . . . : Peter's emphasis on the unity of the OT with the apostolic writings is reminiscent of 1 Pet. 1:10–12; 2 Pet. 1:19–21. Commandment appears to refer to Christ's teaching as a whole as set out by the apostles (cf. Jn. 14:26). The Lord and Saviour is the final authority behind both prophets and apostles (cf. Eph. 2:20). Your apostles is taken by some as a reference to 'those who brought you this message', but is more likely to emphasize their reliability than their function: 'those you trust and who have taught you the orthodox Christian faith' as distinguished from the false teachers who will arise. Cf. Jude 17.

3:3, 4 A warning to ignore scoffers

Every pastor knows how quickly despondency can spread in a fellowship, and so Peter takes care to warn his readers not to be put off by those who wrongly argue that God's inactivity means that He will not act. Jude 18 attributes this warning directly to the apostles themselves.

Notes. 3 First of all; cf. 1:20. Scoffers, together with the reference to their passions, makes it likely that the false teachers of ch. 2 are still in mind. Those who give way to their own lusts will always mock at any incentive to noble living. 4 Where . . . ? A similar complaint can be found in 1 Clement 23:3f.; 2 Clement 11:2–4, and rabbinic writings. The fathers could apply to early Christian leaders such as Stephen, James the son of Zebedee, etc., or, indeed, to the older members of the first generation of Christians, who died between AD 30 and 60. Such reference is no argument for a late date, as the problem is the same as Paul faces in 1 Thes. 4:13ff. However, the reference to the Flood in vv. 5–7 makes it more likely that Peter has the OT patriarchs in mind.

3:5–7 A reason not to ignore this word

In actual fact, the argument used by the scoffers in v. 4 is phoney. They have conveniently forgotten that God did intervene in judgment at the time of the Flood, and this fact proves two things. It cannot be argued from the stability of the world that God will not interrupt its steady rhythm, and it is all the more certain that He will again carry out His promises in His own time.

Notes. 5 By the word of God; cf. Gn. 1:3, etc.; Ps. 33:6; Jn. 1:3; Heb. 11:3. Out of water and by means of water probably refers to water as one of the original elements created, out of which God formed the earth (cf. Gn. 1:2), and as one of the means by which He sustains it still. The present translation of the second preposition, giving it an instrumental rather than a local sense ('in the midst of'), is probably to be preferred. 6 Through which is a plural pronoun but probably refers to the doubly-mentioned water. The reference is obviously to the Flood (cf. Gn. 6–9). 7 But is probably meant to connect rather than contrast. By the same word . . . ; cf. Is. 66:15, 16; Zp. 1:18; Mal. 4:1–3; 1 Cor. 3:13; 2 Thes. 1:7f. Now exist, in contrast to the new heaven and new earth of the future (cf. Rev. 21:1). Kept; cf. 2:9, 10.

3:8, 9 Reasons why God is delaying

Having given reasons why God's promise of another intervention in the orderly courses of nature cannot be rejected, Peter goes on to state two factors which make it reasonable that He should delay such intervention as long as He likes. Time is of no consequence to God, and in His love for men He is keeping open for as long as possible the door of repentance.

Notes. 8 Do not ignore contrasts the wilful ignorance of the false teachers in vv. 5, 6. With the Lord. The following quotation from Ps. 90:4, with its corollary, stresses the fact that God is outside time, and so is in no hurry to work (cf. Hab. 2:3 on this point also). There is no warrant for building a doctrine of the millennium on this verse, as that is not the issue at stake here. 9 Toward you. Whether this or the marginal reading ('on your account') is taken makes little difference to the sense. Not wishing . . . ; cf. Rom. 2:4; 1 Tim. 2:4. This verse has been cited as an argument for universalism: in fact it teaches the opposite. The plain thrust of it is that after the second coming, ushering in Christ's judgment, there will be no further opportunity for repentance, and so God in His mercy is giving men as long as possible to repent.

3:10–13 A reassertion of the fact and its consequences

The argument concerning the certainty of Christ's coming is rounded off with a further positive statement of the fact and its suddenness. Peter then goes on to state the consequences this coming will have for the physical world as we know it, and the consequences which the knowledge of this coming should produce in the life of the Christian believer, who should set his heart on this great happening.

Notes. 10 Like a thief stems from the Lord's words in Mt. 24:42, 43, which were well remembered in the early church (cf. 1 Thes. 5:2; Rev. 3:3; 16:15). The heavens will pass away. This also was mentioned by Jesus (Mk. 13:31, etc.). Elements. The Greek word could equally apply to the elemental substances of which the world is composed, or to the other heavenly bodies. Works could be either men's buildings and other material achievements, or their deeds in the moral sense: how this is interpreted depends on which of the three variant readings of the verb is taken. Burned up suggests a material sense, as does 'disappear', which is one possible alternative. 'Disclosed', the other alternative, suggests the moral sense, and is probably better on textual as well as contextual grounds. 11 What sort of persons. The second coming is used as an argument for godly living not only in the Lord's teaching (e.g. Lk. 12:35ff.), but also in Paul's letters (cf. Rom. 13:11ff.; 1 Thes. 5:3ff.) and earlier by Peter (1 Pet. 1:13; 4:7ff.). 12 Hastening is preferable to 'earnestly desiring' (RSV mg.), as it stresses the importance of human activity (in evangelism, etc.; cf. Acts 3:19–21) during the period of divine forbearance. Because of which is better than the purely temporal 'wherein' of AV: the advent of the day will cause these happenings. Dissolved; cf. v. 10 above and also Ps. 102:25–27; Heb. 1:10–12. 13 Promise: such as in Is. 65:17ff.; 66:22f.

The conclusion drawn from the present significance for Christians of the second coming is now repeated, and Peter urges his readers to holy living, not only in view of the fact that Christ could return at any moment, but also out of gratitude to God for His forbearance. This is a thought which Paul had expressed in his letters, and reference to them leads this writer to draw attention to the fact that his letters can be misunderstood, as certain people have done, perhaps deliberately.

Notes. 14 Be zealous. A reminder of the previous exhortation in 1:10. To be found at Christ's coming: the word may refer to v. 10 if the third alternative there is accepted. Without spot or blemish is in direct contrast to the teachers of 2:13 (q.v.; see also Jude 24). Peace is the content of a heart right with God. 15 Count; i.e. realize that, while God is waiting, He is both giving time for the unbeliever to be saved, and for the believer to be working out his salvation (cf. Phil. 2 12, 13) in terms of progress in sanctification. So also could refer either to the general teaching about the second coming, or to the last point about seeing God's delay as forbearance and not failure. Reference to 'this' (v. 16) being in all Paul's letters suggests that the former is the case, as there are in all of them frequent references to the second coming, but the other matter is hardly discussed outside Romans (cf. Rom. 2:4; 3:25; 9:22, 23; 11:22, 23). Wisdom given is a good reminder of the supernatural origin of Paul's Epistles (cf. 1 Cor. 2:13; 3:10). 16 This: see on v. 15. All his letters need not necessarily suggest that the corpus of Pauline letters had already been gathered, although no doubt collections of them were by now in circulation among the Christian communities. Hard to understand could mean 'ambiguous', 'obscure' (NEB), or capable of misinterpretation. Rom. 3:8 shows how Paul himself knew that the antinomians had twisted his teaching to suit their own purposes. Since ignorant and unstable men behave in this way, it is all the more important for the Christian to grow in knowledge and in building a firm foundation for the Christian life (cf. 1:3–11). The other scriptures can be argued, with equal success, as counting Paul's writings included in, or excluded from, Scripture. While we cannot form a conclusion from this text, Peter's previous arguments (1 Pet. 1:10–12; 2 Pet. 1:19–21; 3:2) show that Paul's letters possessed all the qualifications for acceptance as Scripture (the apostolic authority of the writer and the guidance of the Spirit as he wrote). Paul was of course conscious of this himself (e.g. 1 Cor. 2:13; 4:17; 2 Cor. 13:3–10; 1 Thes. 2:13).

3:17, 18 A CALL TO BE STEADFAST AND GROW; THE ASCRIPTION

The writer now draws to a conclusion by reverting to the great theme on which he began (cf. 1:3ff.). The best precaution against being infected by the false teachers and carried away by them is to be making spiritual progress. As those opening words reminded us, it is Christ alone who has done everything to make that possible, and so to Him we give all the glory now, as indeed we shall do throughout eternity when once He returns. So be it!

Notes. 17 Knowing . . . beforehand may suggest that this advice was given before the advent of the false teachers (cf. the future tense of 2:1), or more likely refers to the fact that Peter's readers are being alerted before this teaching has actually reached them. Antinomianism was certainly a live issue by the time Romans and 1 Corinthians were written. Stability is from the same root as the verb Peter used in 1 Pet. 5:10, and which Jesus used in Lk. 22:32; i.e. 'strengthen'. 18 Grace and knowledge are both regarded as divinely bestowed and are the gifts which enable growth along both moral and mental planes, along both of which, as this letter has shown, the Christian should be making parallel progress. Jesus Christ can help His followers to make this twofold progress, since He is both Lord and Saviour. To him is to Christ, and so the writer asserts unmistakably His deity. The day of eternity is literally 'the day of the age', the day which will usher in eternity, and so the day when Christ is coming. Amen is probably a later addition to the text: 'so be it' is certainly the response of a believing heart on reaching the end of this letter.

INTRODUCTION

This writing is usually called an 'Epistle', but it has neither address nor signature. Indeed, it lacks so many characteristics of a letter that some have thought that we must take 'Epistle' as no more than a courtesy title. They regard it as a homily rather than a letter. However, now and then there appear passages which justify us in thinking that this is a real letter (e.g. 2:1, 26), albeit one with some unusual characteristics. Perhaps the explanation is that it was originally meant for more than one community.

AUTHORSHIP

The traditional view is that the work is the product of John the apostle. No other author was suggested in antiquity. The marked tone of authority throughout the Epistle accords with this. Indeed, it has been suggested that only a person of such stature as the apostle could have sent out such a letter without giving his name. The writer was evidently an eyewitness of some, at any rate, of the things Jesus did (1:1–3; the views that his 'we' refers generally to all Christians, or that it is simply an epistolary device seem untenable). The style and thought-forms resemble those of the Fourth Gospel, and all agree that there must be some connection. It is usual to think of the same author, in which case everything hinges on the authorship of that Gospel. A minority of critics, however, hold that the author of one of these writings was a disciple of the author of the other. These emphasize differences of style and theology. An example of the former is the contention that there are fewer compound words in the Epistle, and of the latter that there is a different view of the significance of the death of Jesus. Most scholars, however, agree that, while the differences should not be minimized, they are not great enough to demonstrate diversity of authorship. They are largely accounted for by the different purposes of the two writings and their different forms. J. R. W. Stott points out, 'The similarity between Gospel and Epistle is considerably greater than that between the Third Gospel and the Acts, which are known to have come from the same pen' (The Epistles of John, TNTC, 1964, p. 24).

Recent discussions make frequent mention of 'John the elder' (cf. 2 Jn. 1; 3 Jn. 1), and some see him as the author of the Gospel, some of the Epistle (or 2 and 3 John, or Revelation), some of both. This rather shadowy figure, however, is not a likely candidate. It cannot be demonstrated beyond doubt that a John the elder, distinct from John the apostle, ever existed. And if he did, the reasons for connecting him with this writing are not convincing, not nearly as convincing, e.g., as the ancient tradition which ascribes it to the apostle.

We conclude that, while the Epistle makes no claim to any particular authorship, and while the case cannot be proved beyond doubt, the most reasonable hypothesis is that it, like the Fourth Gospel, came from the pen of the apostle John.

OCCASION

It is clear from the Epistle that its readers were confronted with a form of false teaching which denied the incarnation. In the 2nd century there appeared systems of thought which we call Gnosticism, and which took over both Christian and pagan ideas. They stressed knowledge (Gk. gnōsis), and thought of a way of salvation known only to the initiates. This consisted of the release of man from the material prison of the body, and his upward rise to God. There is dispute as to how early Gnosticism was. It is very probable that it was much later than the time of this Epistle, but it did not spring out of empty air. Many of the teachings which were later embodied in the fully-developed Gnostic systems were in circulation in the 1st century.

John is opposing some such system. The particular view relevant to our Epistle was that matter is inherently evil. God, being good, can have nothing to do with evil matter. Thus He could not have been incarnate in Jesus Christ. Some held that Christ only seemed to live in the flesh (they are called 'Docetists' from the Gk. dokein, 'to seem'). But it is probably affirming too much to say that John is confronting Docetists, for there is nothing in this Epistle about a phantom body or the like.

What he opposed seems to have been an early stage of the heresy that was to develop into Docetism. People were denying the incarnation and John regarded this as very serious. Its effect was to take the heart out of Christianity. For if Christ did not really become a man and did not really die for us, then no atonement has been made for our sins. So John emphasizes the reality of the incarnation. He also stresses the importance of upright living, for in their stress on knowledge some of the heretics evidently held that conduct did not matter much. John makes it clear that conduct is very important. Some of the false teachers had evidently been members of the church, but had now left it (2:19).

But it would be wrong to think that this Epistle is no more than a refutation of heresy. There is a very positive aim, as John tells us himself. He writes 'so that you may have fellowship with us . . . that our joy may be complete' (1:3f.). He makes this more specific by saying, 'I write this to you who believe in the name of the Son of God, that you may know that you have eternal life' (5:13). We may contrast this with the aim of the Gospel, which is 'that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name' (Jn. 20:31).

Whereas the Gospel has an evangelistic aim, the Epistle is thus directed rather at bringing its readers into a state of assurance and a true knowledge of what the faith implies. 'The Gospel contains "signs" to evoke faith (xx. 30, 31), and the Epistle tests by which to judge it' (Stott, TNTC, p. 23). John writes to take away his readers' anxieties as they come to realize their standing with God. He brings out what it means to be a Christian man. 'In the first Epistle, John sets forth three marks of a true knowledge of God and of fellowship with God. . . . These marks are, first, righteousness of life, second, brotherly love, and third, faith in Jesus as God incarnate' (Search the Scriptures, 1967, p. 289). These three themes recur constantly.

The Epistle is dominated by two great thoughts: God is light (1:5), and God is love (4:8, 16). God is the source of light to the minds and warmth to the hearts of His children. These children should accordingly live up to the highest moral standard and this is stressed constantly (e.g. 2:1–6; 3:3, 6, 9; 5:1–3). But the Epistle contains no harsh admonition. Rather the writer addresses his readers with fatherly solicitude and tender concern: 'little children'; 'beloved'; 'little children, let no one deceive you'; 'little children, keep yourselves from idols'.

DATE

There is very little by which to date the writing. The relation to the Gospel is not definitive, for some hold that it was written before and some after that writing, and in any case the date of the Gospel is uncertain. It seems to me that the Epistle is better understood as following the Gospel than preceding it. Most accept this point of view and proceed to date it towards the end of the 1st century. That is about as close as we can get.

COMMENTARY

1:1–4 Prologue

These verses, one highly compressed and complicated sentence in the Greek, form a prologue to the whole. John outlines some of the ideas he will develop as the Epistle unfolds.

1 The opening Greek word, rendered that which, is neuter. It thus appears to refer to the gospel message rather than to a person. But John goes on to speak of hearing, seeing, and even touching, which makes it necessary for us to think of Jesus. This is the case also with the word of life. For while this term might well describe the gospel, we must also bear in mind that Jesus is called 'the Word', and that 'in him was life, and the life was the light of men' (Jn. 1:1, 4). This unusual opening, then, reminds us both of the gospel and of Him on whom the gospel centres.

From the beginning shows that the gospel is no afterthought. It was always in God's plan. John moves on to the factuality of it all, which is his main point. The gospel is concerned not with some mythical figure like the shadowy forms in the Greek mysteries, but with a genuine historical Person. He had been heard and seen and touched (cf. Lk. 24:39; Jn. 20:20, 24ff.). There is a steadily-increasing emphasis on the reality of Jesus' manifestation. John is referring not to visions, but to something physical. So he says 'we have heard, we have seen with our eyes, we saw, and our hands handled'. RSV obscures the fact that there is a change of subject. The earlier verbs tell that we have done this or that. Now 'our hands' handled. The change may be stylistic only, or there may be an emphasis on the physical contact. It was what 'our hands' did.

2 John has the habit of emphasizing an idea by the simplest of devices, repetition. Here he begins a little aside by taking up life, the last word of v. 1, and repeating it three times in three lines. He is writing about life. But not life in general terms. It is the life that was made manifest that is his interest (the aorist tense in the Gk. may point to the decisive manifestation in one life). It is also the life that we saw. He has already spoken of seeing it (and will do so again in v. 3: he loves to hammer in an idea). Further, he and those with him who saw it testify to it, and they proclaim it. He has already spoken of it as 'from the beginning'. Now he puts the same thought another way when he speaks of the eternal life. And he carries on with his repetitions when he thinks of the life as made manifest. In the Gospel Jesus is called 'the life' (Jn. 14:6). We may deduce from this that it is Jesus to whom witness is borne and who is proclaimed. This might be our conclusion also from the expression with the Father, where the construction is the same as that used of 'the Word' in Jn. 1:1. Father is, of course, the characteristic Christian designation of God. It is found twelve times in this Epistle.

3 Once again John speaks of what we have seen and heard. This stress on eyewitness should not be overlooked, nor the fact that it is linked with proclaim to you. It is impossible to make good sense of this if we think of we as meaning 'we Christians'. It must mean only those believers who actually saw Jesus in the flesh. These proclaim what they saw to the rest of the church. Something of John's aim follows: so that you may have fellowship with us. We should not overlook the fact that he immediately goes on to speak of our fellowship as with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ. The basic idea in fellowship (Gk. koinōnia) is that of possessing something in common, i.e. of partnership or sharing. It is often used of business affairs (cf. Lk. 5:10). Christian fellowship means sharing the common life in Christ through the Holy Spirit. It binds believers to one another, but the important thing is that it binds them also to God. It is fellowship . . . with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ. Notice the way Jesus Christ is linked with the Father thus early in the Epistle. One of John's strong emphases is on the place of Christ and he loses no time in bringing it forward.

4 There is some emphasis on both we and are writing. The message is in a precise and abiding form and it is written 'by those who had full authority to write' (B. F. Westcott, Commentary on the Epistles of St. John, 1883). There is some support for reading 'your' joy, but our joy is probably correct. It is only as John brings his friends into the kind of fellowship of which he has just written that his own joy is full, and, of course, the same is true of them. 'Your joy' and 'our joy' go together. As A. E. Brooke (The Johannine Epistles, ICC, 1912) reminds us, 'In the spiritual harvest, sower and reaper rejoice together.' For both, true joy comes only from fellowship with God.

1:5 – 2:6 Fellowship with God

John has made it clear that his purpose is to bring his readers into fellowship with God and with other believers. He proceeds to deduce from the nature of God the conditions of fellowship.

1:5 God is light. This is the message marks off the following as significant, and indeed as summing up the Christian message. This message is derivative (we have heard from him), and is not due to the originality of the apostles or others. Incidentally there is a problem centring on the meaning of him, a problem which will recur throughout this Epistle. There is no obvious antecedent. The Father and the Son were both mentioned two sentences back, and either could be in mind here. Perhaps it is a little more likely that the Son is meant, but the two are certainly in the closest connection.

The content of the message is summed up in the expression, God is light to which is attached (in a manner reminiscent of the Fourth Gospel where the conjunction of positive and negative is common) and in him is no darkness at all (cf. Ps. 27:1; Jn. 1:4–9). Light is mentioned often in the Gospel, but there it is linked rather with the Son than, as here, with the Father. It is found five times in this Epistle (1:5, 7; 2:8, 9, 10). To say that God is light is to draw attention to His uprightness, His righteousness. Light is a natural symbol for attractive righteousness, just as is darkness for the blackness of sin. There is an emphatic double negative with darkness. There is no darkness whatever in God. He is all light. There is probably also the thought that our lives are exposed to the illumination that streams from God. Nothing is hid from Him (cf. Ps. 90:8). Because He is light it is important that His people 'walk in the light' (v. 7).

1:6, 7 The first error. John is very fond of bringing out his point by making a supposition, and here he has a string of clauses beginning with if (vv. 6–10). He deals with three obstacles to fellowship. The first centres on the claim to have fellowship with God. John has already told us that his purpose is that his readers may enjoy this fellowship (v. 3). Now he makes it clear that more than words are necessary to back up a claim to enjoy fellowship with God. 6 If anyone says he has this fellowship but walks in darkness then, since God is light, he lies. 'Religion without morality is an illusion' (Stott). John drives this home with the negative. This does not read as RSV we do not live according to the truth, but 'we do not do the truth'. This is a very unusual expression found also in Jn. 3:21 and in the Qumran scrolls. Truth can be a quality of action as well as of speech.

7 Now comes the contrary supposition, namely that we really do walk in the light. Walking is a metaphor for the whole way of life. It is well adapted to bringing out the truth that the Christian should make steady, if unspectacular, progress. To walk in the light is to live day by day with a strict care for righteousness. Here it is reinforced in the strongest way possible with the addition as he is in the light (cf. Mt. 5:48). There is to be no trifling with a low standard, as though all that matters is to attain a decent human standard. The Christian is God's servant and he takes his standards from God. He is to live in a God-like way. After the previous verse with its denial of fellowship with God for those who walk in darkness we expect to hear that those who walk in the light really do enjoy fellowship with God. Instead we find that they have fellowship with one another. This of course includes fellowship with God (cf. v. 3). But that should not blind us to John's form of expression. The fellowship believers enjoy with one another is a thing of great worth.

To this John adds the further point that the blood of Jesus his Son cleanses us from all sin. The Saviour is called by the human name Jesus, but this is coupled with words which emphasize His uniqueness, his Son. We should miss the significance of neither. Cleanses is in a continuous tense. It refers not to a once-for-all cleansing, but to an activity which takes place day by day. A little later John recognizes the impossibility of the believer's being free from all sin (cf. vv. 8, 10). He is not accordingly speaking of sinless perfection. He is maintaining that when it is our habit to walk in the light, that is, to walk with God, the sins we commit are cleansed. John recognizes that we must live close to God, and that even those who so live need continuous cleansing. Some see in the blood (again in 5:6, 8) a symbol of life released from the flesh. But this does not accord with the facts. In the OT, as in the NT, the term points us to life yielded up in death. It is because Jesus has died for us that we have cleansing of sins. The singular, sin, sometimes denotes the principle of sin. But this cannot be the meaning here. All sin means 'every act of sin'.

1:8, 9 The second error. 8 John crystallizes the second error in the supposition that we say we have no sin. To 'have' sin is not a very usual expression (elsewhere Jn. 9:41; 15:22, 24; 19:11). It means more than to 'commit' sin, and includes the thought of 'the principle of which sinful acts are the several manifestations' (Brooke). Sin is something that persists. It clings to the sinner. As in the case of the preceding and the following suppositions the positive statement is reinforced by a succeeding negative. When we say we have no sin we deceive ourselves (we certainly deceive no-one else!), and the truth is not in us. Truth is conceived dynamically. It can take up its abode in men of truth. But to say such an obviously false thing as that we have no sin excludes the possibility of the truth's dwelling in us. This has relevance for the modern man who says that sin is a disease or a weakness, and claims that it is due to heredity, environment, necessity or the like, so that he regards it as his fate, not his fault. Such a man deceives himself.

9 The contrasting position is that of those who confess their sins (the plural is significant: we confess specific sins, not simply that we sin). Because God is faithful and just He forgives. He can be thoroughly relied upon. Nothing is said as to the way in which He will cleanse us from all unrighteousness. But v. 7 is still in mind. It is the blood of Jesus that cleanses. Nothing else can remove our stains.

1:10 The third error. John next supposes that we say we have not sinned. All God's dealings with men rest on the basis that man is a sinner, and in need of salvation. To deny that one is a sinner is to make him a liar. Put negatively this means that his word is not in us. In many parts of the Bible the 'word' has a dynamic character. It effects God's purpose (cf. Is. 55:11). Anyone who denies that he is a sinner and who thus makes God out to be a liar shows by that fact that God's effectual word is not in him.

2:1, 2 The propitiation for sins. 1 John often calls his correspondents 'children'. Here he has the affectionate diminutive, my little children (Gk. teknia; found 7 times in 1 Jn. and once, perhaps twice, only in all the rest of the NT). He says that his reason for writing is so that you may not sin. He has already told us that he writes that his readers may enjoy fellowship (1:3), and that his joy might be filled full (1:4). This third statement accords with the others, for sin disrupts fellowship and destroys joy. Sin and vital Christianity are incompatible (cf. 3:6, 9; 5:18). But if the Christian does not live in sin it is also the case that he never in this life becomes completely sinless (cf. 1:8, 10). John now tells us that when any one does sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous. Advocate is a term with a legal ring about it, and it often indicates the counsel for the defence. It is the friend at court. The use of the term shows that the sinner is in no good case. He is in the wrong with the Father and needs help. It is not without its interest that Christ is called the righteous. We might have expected 'the merciful' or the like. But it is consistent NT teaching that God forgives in a way which accords with justice. Forgiveness does not abrogate the moral law but establishes it.

2 Christ is also called 'the propitiation (not expiation) for our sins'. RSV, by using a word which means simply the removal of the guilt of sin, obscures the fact that this term (Gk. hilasmos) signifies rather the removal of wrath. There is a divine wrath against every form of sin (cf. Rom. 1:18), and forgiveness does not mean ignoring this wrath. One way of looking at Christ's saving work is to see it as propitiation. This is not the whole story but it is part of it, a truth which much modern theology overlooks. John goes on to point out that Christ's saving work suffices for the whole world. Christ made ample provision.

2:3–6 Obedience. 3 Next comes a test by which men can know whether, in spite of their failures, they are in right relationship with God, and walking in fellowship with Him. The test is whether they keep his commandments. It is impossible for men who really know God to be unaffected in their daily living by this knowledge. Knowledge incidentally is an important theme in this Epistle. The verb 'to know' (Gk. ginōskō) occurs 25 times (and oida 15 times). For John the knowledge of God is not some mystic vision or intellectual insight. It is shown if we keep his commandments. Obedience is not a spectacular virtue, but it is at the basis of all true Christian service. 4 The man who claims to have this knowledge but disobeys his commandments, John says forthrightly, is a liar. He underlines this with the addition, the truth is not in him.

5 By contrast, love for God is perfected in the man who keeps his word. Word signifies God's commandments in general. John is not reducing Christianity to a form of legalism. But in Christ God has revealed Himself. Christ is His Word (1:1; Jn. 1:1). The coming of Christ is a challenge to our whole way of life. We are challenged to depart from self-seeking and to take up our cross. It is this that is involved in keeping His word. Now comes another of John's unexpected twists. Following on from v. 4 we expect something about the obedient man's being true, or having the truth of God in him. Instead we find that the love of God is in him, and not only in him but perfected. Love (Gk. agapē) is one of the leading concepts in 1 John. The word occurs 18 times, which is more than in any other book in the NT (next is 1 Corinthians, 14 times). As this book is so short this is very significant. John sees love primarily in the divine self-giving in Christ (4:10). But the term can also signify man's response to what God has done. This response is lived out in obedience. Love delights to do God's will.

At the end of the verse John speaks of knowing that we are in him. This is a new concept. He has spoken before of fellowship with Him (1:3), or walking in the light (1:7), and of knowing Him (2:3). But these are not so many different and unrelated ideas. If we are in him we enjoy fellowship with Him, we know Him, and we walk in the light. 6 We can be sure of all this if we walk in the same way in which he walked. The earlier reference to being 'in him' (v. 5) looks like being 'in' God, but the reference to walking shows that he in this verse means Jesus Christ. In any case John regularly associates the two in the closest possible fashion, and it is often difficult to be quite sure which is meant.

2:7–17 The new commandment

2:7-11 Loving and hating. 7, 8 Beloved. Half a dozen times in this First Epistle John addresses his correspondents as beloved, which accords with his stress on love. He does not spell out the commandment which he speaks of as both old and new, but there is no doubt that he means the commandment to love (cf. 4:21; Jn. 15:12). This is not a novelty but the word which you have heard. It is fundamental to the Christian way and thus was inculcated from the first. But there is always a freshness about it and thus it is a new commandment (cf. Jn. 13:34). The old commandment has a new urgency for those for whom Christ died.

This command was first fulfilled by Christ (is true in him), who puts a like love into the hearts of His followers (and in you). Thus our attitude to our brother shows whether we are in the darkness that is passing away or in the true light which is already shining. If a man lives in love he walks with a sure foot, for love rids his heart of all that would make him stumble. Light is his atmosphere, his environment. But hatred and light are incompatible. 9–11 If a man hates his brother, let him say what he will, he is on the wrong track, a track which will lead him to ruin, for hatred blinds the eyes. Notice the threefold reference to the darkness. We must not miss the connection between hatred and darkness.

2:12–14 The family of faith. Two sequences, each with a threefold address, to children, fathers, and young men occur here. Considerable ingenuity has been expended on the definition of these classes, and on the change of tense from 'I write' to 'I wrote' (vv. 13c, 14, Gk.). It is true that there is a certain appropriateness in the allocation of qualities, for knowledge accords with fathers (those old in the faith), and strength with young men. But as all the qualities John mentions ought to be found in all believers it is probably best to regard the division as a stylistic device adding emphasis. As C. H. Dodd says (The Johannine Epistles, MNTC, 1946), 'All Christians are (by grace, not nature) children in innocence and dependence on the heavenly Father, young men in strength, and fathers in experience.' John is pointing out that his readers have the forgiveness of sins, the knowledge of God, the word of God abiding in them, and victory over the evil one. These are important attributes of the followers of Christ.

2:15–17 Love for the world. 15 We have noted John's little trick of emphasizing a word by simply repeating it. He now uses world three times in this verse and another three times in the two succeeding verses. It is an important concept. He draws attention to the world as something that could become of absorbing interest. But he says, Do not love the world. Some see a contradiction with 'God so loved the world' (Jn. 3:16). But that passage refers to God's saving love for all men, whereas this is concerned with setting one's heart on worldliness. John makes two points: a. love for the world in this sense is incompatible with love for the Father, and b. in any case the world and all that is in it are temporary.

16 The lust of the flesh points to the gratification of our fleshly desires. The lust of the eyes will refer to strong desire for what is seen, for the outward form of things. It is the lust after the superficial. The pride of life is the empty haughtiness of the worldly-minded. (With these three we might compare the three things which led Eve to disobey God, Gn. 3:6.) None of these things takes its origin in God (not of the Father). They are of the world, that world which is but a passing show on its way to ruin. 17 By contrast, he who does the will of God abides for ever.

2:18–27 The Christian and the antichrist

2:18, 19 Many antichrists. 18 There is no article with hour. John is not saying it is the last hour, but 'it is a last hour'. Human history proceeds by periods of slow unfolding until a crisis is reached, an age is ended, a new age begins, and men say, 'It can never be the same again.' John is affirming that such a last hour has come. He sees evidence in the appearance not simply of antichrist, but of many antichrists. The early church clearly expected at the end of time a mighty figure of evil it called antichrist (cf. 'the man of lawlessness', 2 Thes. 2:3). Though John uses the term four times (and once in 2 John) he is not interested in the future individual. His concern is for his readers, and he stresses that the spirit of antichrist is already abroad.

19 These many antichrists had been members of the church. They had belonged to the visible organization, but John is quick to say but they were not of us. He can go on, they went out, that it might be plain that they all are not of us. Though members of the organization, they had never really belonged. This is surely the doctrine of 'the church invisible' though that terminology is centuries later.

2:20, 21 Knowledge of the truth. 20 You have been anointed by the Holy One is another way of saying that all have received the gift of the Holy Spirit. The Holy One is an unusual expression but there can be no doubt but that it refers to the Holy Spirit. John proceeds you all know (this reading is to be preferred to the RSV mg., 'you know everything'). The illumination afforded by the Spirit means that in Christianity there is no enlightened élite on whom all others depend. Every believer has knowledge. 21 John has this truth well in mind as he proceeds to the central tenet of the heresy he is opposing. The false teachers clearly denied the reality of the incarnation. We know that some false teachers in early days held that there was a divine Christ who came down on the man Jesus at the baptism, but left him before the crucifixion. John was not necessarily opposed by men holding just this belief, but it was something like it.

2:22, 23 The lie. 22 They denied that Jesus is the Christ. John sees this as the fundamental lie. The man who goes wrong here is not to be depended upon anywhere. He is the antichrist who denies the Father and Son. The evidence that in Jesus of Nazareth God and man are indissolubly united is so strong in John's view that the man who will not accept it is fundamentally astray. He is guilty of the radical lie. 23 This denial of the Son has consequences. Without a right view of the Son one cannot have a right view of the Father. If Jesus is not the very Son of God and one with the Father, then it is not the love of God that we see revealed in His life and death. It is only as we receive Christ that we become sons of God (Jn. 1:12), so that if we reject Him we are not members of the heavenly family. We have no right to call God our Father.

2:24–27 Abiding in God. 24 What you heard from the beginning points back to the simple gospel message. If John's readers let that abide (this verb occurs 24 times in 1 John) in them then they abide in the Son and in the Father. 25 Thus is God's promise of eternal life fulfilled. 27 With this we must take the anointing of which John has already spoken (v. 20). It is owing to the enlightenment given by the Holy Spirit within them that they have the knowledge that matters and that they abide in God.

2:28 – 3:10 Children of God

2:28, 29 Confidence. John is anxious to establish the family relationship. So now he calls his readers little children, speaks of having confidence at the coming of Christ, and goes on to the way right conduct shows that one is born of him. Born (perhaps better, 'begotten') is important. Believers are not simply worldly men who are trying to live a little better. They are men who have been radically renewed. They have been born all over again. The habitual practice of righteousness is evidence of such divine activity.

3:1–3 What we shall be. 1 The wonder of it all arrests John. 'Look!' he says, 'Look at the love the Father has given us. We are called children of God. And we are!' The divine call in Scripture is often regarded as an effectual call, but John leaves no doubts. Not only are we called God's children, but we are such in reality. This has a consequence that the world does not know us. The incompatibility of the world and Christianity is a recurring theme in John's writings. The world's failure to know believers is not to be wondered at for it did not know him. Grammatically him should be the Father, but it is impossible to think that there is no reference to Christ. John's recognition of the reality of our sonship now does not blind him to the fact that the best is yet to be. 2 He puts this in the form of a reference to the beatific vision, when he appears we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. He and him grammatically ought to refer back to God, but it is more usual to speak of seeing Christ. But probably too much should not be made of this, for he that sees the Son sees also the Father (Jn. 12:45; 14:9). And to see God is to be transformed. 3 This prospect is a present stimulus, for every one who has this hope purifies himself as he is pure.

3:4 The necessity for right conduct. The false teachers seem to have held that knowledge is all-important, and that conduct does not matter. So John insists that sin is evidence of wrong relationship to God. Sin, he tells us, is lawlessness, the Greek construction implying that the two are interchangeable. The law in question is, of course, the law of God. The essence of sin, then, is disregard for God's law. It is the assertion of oneself against God's revealed way for man. It is the preference for selfishness over the service of God.

3:5–7 Christ and sin are incompatible. 5 Christ came to take away sins, which indicates complete hostility to evil. In him there is no sin. 6 This has effects in the Christian, for no one who abides in him sins. We must not water down statements like this. The Christian has no business with sin and he must never be complacent about it, even about occasional sin. But we must also notice the use of the Greek continuous present in both verbs. John is saying, 'No-one who continually abides in him makes a habit of sinning' and again, 'No-one who habitually sins has seen or known him.' He is not speaking about individual acts of sin (which would be better expressed by the Gk. aorist) but about habitual attitudes. The life a man lives reveals the source from which he draws his life. 7 To hold otherwise is to be deceived. It is not a matter of right thinking or of wide knowledge or of holding that the body is unimportant so that it does not matter what the body does as long as the soul is pure. John firmly sweeps aside all such specious arguments. He who does right is righteous. And the standard is Christ: as he is righteous.

3:8–10 Children of the devil. 8 The other side of this coin is that he who commits sin is of the devil. Both does and commits (actually the same word in the Gk.) point to the habitual practice. It is the habitual trend of the life of which John is writing. This opposition is underlined by the fact that the reason for Christ's coming was to destroy the works of the devil. The opposition is complete. Destroy is not specific; that is to say it tells us that Jesus came to do away with the devil, but it does not say how.

9 Born of God points to divine action. There is something supernatural about the life of the Christian. He has been regenerated by the very power of God. Once again we must give present tenses their full continuative force. The man born of God does not make a practice of sinning. Indeed, he cannot sin. John has already repudiated the doctrine of sinless perfection (1:8, 10), and we must not interpret these words in such a way as to contradict those. He is saying that sin and the Christian are radically opposed. 'John is arguing rather the incongruity than the impossibility of sin in the Christian' (Stott). Should a Christian sin that would be an act completely out of character. On this occasion he gives a reason for the believer's inability to sin: God's nature (Gk. 'seed') abides in him. It is most unusual to have the metaphor pressed in this way (this is the one occurrence of 'seed' in John, but the verb rendered born is found ten times in this Epistle). It stresses the fact that there is a divine power at work within the believer. Abides shows that this is not occasional. It is God's continuing gift to His people. 10 John rounds off this section by contrasting the children of God and the children of the devil. The test is whether a man does right and loves his brother, or not.

3:11–18 Love one another

3:11–15 The antithesis of love. 11 Again John insists that love is the first command (from the beginning). It is not peripheral, but lies at the heart of the Christian message. 12 The point is brought out by referring to its antithesis. Cain who was of the evil one shows us the conduct we must avoid. Being of the evil one he murdered his brother. This is the logical outcome of a refusal to love (cf. Mt. 5:21f.). John's answer to the question why did he murder him? is a penetrating critique of human nature. It was no offence of Abel's, but simply his good life in the face of his brother's bad one. Evil men do not love the highest when they see it. It rebukes them and they crucify it. 13 This is made the basis of an injunction: Do not wonder ('stop wondering' is the force of it), brethren, that the world hates you. Christians usually find it difficult to understand this. They act from the best motives, with love in their hearts for their fellows. They seek nothing for themselves, but offer the priceless gift of the gospel. Yet the world does not respond with gratitude. It hates believers.

14 The love–hate antithesis continues here. Life and love go together. Notice once again John's use of we know. That all Christians have knowledge is important to him and he brings it out many times. We have passed out of death into life (cf. Jn. 5:24) is expressive and unusual. The unbeliever lives in a condition that can only be called death. Not so the believer. He has passed clean out of death and lives that life which really is life. The test whereby we may know this is that we love the brethren. John keeps coming back to that. He reinforces it here with the corresponding negative. He who does not love remains (this is the verb elsewhere translated 'abides'; it points to a continuing state) in death. 15 This is spelled out with an emphatic declaration about the meaning of hate. Any one who hates his brother is a murderer. Our Lord said that the lustful look is adultery and that the angry word breaks the command 'Thou shalt not kill' (Mt. 5:21f.). Following this example John goes to the deep roots of men's actions. Hatred is of the essence of murder. And no murderer has eternal life abiding in him. This does not mean that a murderer cannot repent and find forgiveness. It means that the man in whom is the attitude that brings murder is not the possessor of eternal life. The two are mutually exclusive.

3:16–18 Love is practical. 16 We can know love in the specifically Christian sense only because of what we see on Calvary, where he laid down his life for us (as often in this Epistle, he is not defined, but in this place there is no doubt but that Jesus is meant). Since the Christ to whom Christians owe their inspiration so died for men, Christians in their turn ought to lay down their lives for the brethren. This is the quality of love that is always demanded of the Christian.

17 The actual laying down of the life must have been rarely called for, even in the 1st century. But love has other outlets. It is constantly needed in daily life. The word rendered goods (Gk. bion, only here and 2:16 in this Epistle) is not common in such a connection. It more usually means 'life'. But the meaning is plain. Sees (Gk. theōrē) means more than a passing glance. The man sees his brother for long enough to be sure of the situation. But he closes his heart. The term heart yields an interesting example of the difference Christianity can make. The literal meaning of the word is 'the entrails', the part of the body which the Greeks held to be the special location of the emotions. The use of the word denoted accordingly that the man was emotionally involved. For the Greeks in general this commonly meant that he was angry (though other emotions were sometimes thought of). But for the Christians the same expression meant that he was moved with compassion. If a man fails to exercise compassion this shows that 'the love of God' (which might mean either our love for God or God's love for us) does not abide in him. 18 Again comes the familiar address, little children, as John exhorts to real love. Love is not simply a matter of profession. Deed and truth count for more than word or speech.

3:19–24 Confidence

Now comes a reassurance for sensitive consciences. We should live before God not in trembling anxiety but in calm confidence.

19 Another of John's tests; this is the way we know we are of the truth (the only place in the Epistle where men are said to be of the truth, though the expression is used of statements in 2:21). It draws attention to the importance of complete and utter honesty, and to the truth of the gospel. To know that we belong to truth is to receive assurance. 20 But sometimes believers lack assurance. Our hearts condemn us. This, however, is not the significant thing. It is God's condemnation or approval that matters and he knows everything. He knows our motives and those deeds of love for which we may perhaps not dare to take credit (cf. Mt. 25:37–40). He knows that we are His and it is this that is important, not our misgivings. 21 But John does not wish to leave Christians accepting this kind of thing as the norm. Something better is the way for us. The promises of God are such that there is no reason for remaining in uncertainty. Thus we may have confidence before Him. Since we are His we have nothing to fear. 22 The connection with the preceding is not obvious. Receiving answers to prayer does not seem to follow on from the fact that our heart does not condemn us. But confidence is common to both, and answered prayer is bound to increase our confidence. This is connected with obedience. Both keep and do are in continuous tenses. Power in prayer is conditioned not by occasional bursts of obedience, but by lives characterized by obedience. Further we do what pleases him. This goes beyond the keeping of commandments. It is reminiscent of our Lord's attitude in the Sermon on the Mount. There is the same concern for the spirit, the same conviction that it is not sufficient to keep the letter of the law.

23 The commandment is now defined in terms of faith and love. The singular may be meant to indicate that 'but one thing is needful'. There is no great list of burdensome requirements. Further, faith and love are so intimately connected that they may be regarded as one. Faith is in the name of his Son Jesus Christ. The name stands for the whole person. It is faith in all that Jesus is and does. The second part of the commandment is that we must love one another. The place of love and our reciprocal responsibility are two of the great themes of this Epistle. We are to love just as he has commanded us. This addition to his commandment at the beginning of the verse emphasizes the fact that God is not indifferent to the way we live. 24 After the singular of v. 23 John returns to the plural, commandments. All who keep them abide in him, and he in them. This mutual indwelling is another characteristic theme of this Epistle. How do we know it has taken place? By the Spirit which he has given us. The Spirit is given (not earned), and the Spirit gives assurance.

4:1–6 The spirit of truth and the spirit of error

The reference to the Spirit raises the question of how to tell those who are truly inspired from those who claim falsely that the Spirit is in them. The problem was not new, for there were false prophets in OT times, and again, Paul had had to give a ruling on when a man is speaking 'by the Spirit of God' (1 Cor. 12:3).

1 Many false prophets have gone out into the world. The religions of antiquity commonly claimed to have spirit-possessed men. John warns that not every man who claims to speak under inspiration is to be regarded as uttering truth. His readers must not be ready to believe every one, but must test the spirits. That they had gone out may indicate that the people in mind were those already referred to as having left the church (2:19). 2 The test is the attitude to Jesus Christ. If the spirit of God is in a man he will confess that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh. More exactly he 'confesses Jesus Christ come in the flesh', i.e. the emphasis is on the Person not the proposition. The reference to the flesh puts emphasis on the incarnation. It is not simply that Jesus took human nature but flesh (cf. Jn. 1:14; 2 Jn. 7). The spirit which confesses that Jesus Christ has so come is of God. This is not a human discovery, but something God reveals. 3 But there is such a thing as a spirit which does not confess Jesus. To confess Jesus is the same as the confession 'that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh' of the previous verse. The spirit which refuses this confession is not of God, i.e. it is the antithesis of the spirit mentioned in the previous verse. In fact it is the spirit of antichrist. John has already said that there are many antichrists in the world (2:18), and has given a kind of definition of antichrist: 'This is the antichrist, he who denies the Father and the Son' (2:22). The thought here is similar. In both places the essential point about antichrist is the refusal to acknowledge that Jesus is the Christ, come in the flesh. In both John's readers had heard of the antichrist's coming as future, but he sees a present reality: there, many antichrists, here, the spirit of antichrist. His now, his in the world, and his already combine to stress the present reality.

4 But there is no need for Christians to be fearful. You is emphatic. Believers are in strong contrast. In the first instance they are of God, and in the second they have overcome. Apart from Revelation, which has it 17 times, this little Epistle employs the verb 'to overcome' more often than any other book (6 times). The note of victory is unusually prominent. In this case the verb is in the perfect tense which shows that the victory is more than a passing phase. It is decisive and continuous. The victory results because he who is in you is greater than he who is in the world. On neither occasion does John explain his he. The first could be any member of the Trinity and all that we can say is that it is a divine Person. The second cannot be other than the devil. John is saying that God is more powerful by far than the devil and that those in whom God dwells accordingly overcome evil.

5 Once again John uses the device of repeating a word for emphasis, for we have world three times in this verse as well as at the end of the preceding verse. It is with the world that these people are associated: they are of it, what they speak comes from it, and it is the world that forms their audience. 6 Christians should not be surprised if such people do not hear or understand them. They are of the wrong party. But Christians do have their hearers. We is emphatic and sets them in strong contrast with the preceding. Christians are of God. This enables John to lay down who it is who hears them and who does not. The former class is described as whoever knows God and the latter as he who is not of God. Since this is the way the spirit of truth and the spirit of error are known it is a fair inference that these spirits dwell in the classes of men previously indicated.

4:7–21 God is love

Throughout this Epistle love is important. In this section John stresses this by drawing attention to the fact that love is rooted in God, who is, in fact, love.

4:7–12 Love one another. 7 The exhortation let us love one another is reinforced with the reminder that love is of God. The love of which John writes is not a human achievement. It is divine in origin. If a man loves in this sense it shows that he is born of God and knows God. 8 The negative helps bring the point out. The man who does not love does not know God. The reason for this is one of the greatest statements in the Bible: God is love. This means more than 'God is loving'. It means that God's essential nature is love. He loves, so to speak, not because He finds objects worthy of His love, but because it is His nature to love. His love for us depends not on what we are, but on what He is. He loves us because He is that kind of God. 9 The kind of love of which John is writing is not to be seen everywhere among men, or indeed anywhere among men. We know it because it was made manifest and this when God sent his only Son into the world. The purpose of this sending of the Son was to bring men life. Life in the full sense comes to men through him alone.

10 The real meaning of love and the real source of life are discerned only in the cross. We must not start with men if we are looking for specifically Christian love. It is not that we loved God. We will never find it out if we begin from the human side (we is emphatic; not that we loved). We find it when we see that he loved us and sent his Son to be the expiation for our sins. RSV's expiation is misleading here, for hilasmos means 'propitiation'. To see what love means we must see ourselves as sinners, as the objects of God's wrath, and yet as people for whom Christ died. 'So far from finding any kind of contrast between love and propitiation, the apostle can convey no idea of love to anyone except by pointing to the propitiation' (James Denney, The Death of Christ, 1951, p. 152). It is one of the NT's resounding paradoxes that it is God's love that averts God's wrath from us, and that indeed it is precisely in the averting of this wrath that we see what real love is. 11 This has consequences. When we see that God loves like that we (the word is emphatic) also ought to love one another. The mainspring for love of our fellow-man is the divine love shown in Christ's atoning work. 12 The importance of love for one another comes out in the fact that it is this love and not love toward God that John picks out as showing that God abides in us. When he tells us that no man has ever seen God (cf. Jn. 1:18) he is not discounting the visions related in the OT (cf., e.g., Ex. 24:11). But such visions were partial and incomplete. It is in Christ that we see God. And when we love, God dwells in us. Indeed, his love is perfected (i.e. reaches its aim) in us, a staggering statement.

4:13–16 Abiding in love. 13 John has already told us that it is 'by the Spirit' that we know that 'he abides in us' (3:24). He now adds the thought that we abide in him. Both are important and both receive stress in this Epistle. 14 In the spirit of the prologue he reverts to the apostolic testimony to what had been seen. The thought of witness looms larger as we approach the end of the Epistle. The verb 'to witness' occurs in 1:2, here, and four times in ch. 5, while the noun 'witness' is found six times in ch. 5. The content of the witness is that the Son is the Saviour of the world (an expression only here and in Jn. 4:42 in the NT). Saviour covers all aspects of Christ's work for men, and world the totality of mankind. It is a great salvation of which John writes. 15 But not all are saved. For that it is necessary to confess that Jesus is the Son of God. Then there follows a mutual indwelling of God and the believer.

16 We do not read elsewhere of 'knowing' and 'believing' love. We could fairly say that the thought of 'knowing' love is found, as in v. 10. But to believe the love God has for us is a most unusual expression. The love of God is never demonstrated in such a way that the worldly-minded cannot but see it. It is the man of faith and the man of faith only who discerns it. John repeats the great thought of v. 8, God is love, and draws the conclusion that to abide in love is to abide in God. The love exercised towards sinners is not a human achievement and where it is present it shows that God is present.

4:17–21 The perfecting of love. 17 This mutual abiding is the way love is perfected with us. This is with a view to confidence for the day of judgment, and confidence for that day is the ultimate in confidence. As he is so are we in this world points to the fact that the world did not welcome Christ and it does not welcome Christ's people. On the day of judgment the Judge will understand all. As He is so are we.

18 The thought of confidence is developed with the repudiation of fear. John uses this word three times in this verse (his way of emphasis), but nowhere else in the Epistle. The verb fears is also confined to this verse. Believers need not fear, for fear and love are incompatible. Perfect love throws it out. Fear, John proceeds, has to do with punishment. When we fear it is because we know we deserve punishment. But God's perfect love reassures us. His love makes provision so that we are saved, not punished. If we fear, that in itself shows we have not been perfected in love (John has already pointed out that the perfecting of love brings confidence even on the day of judgment, v. 17).

19 Some MSS read 'We love him (or God)', but this distorts the sense. It is true that our love for God is an answering love, a response to His love. But John is saying not this, but rather that we love, in the sense of specifically Christian love, the love of the unworthy which proceeds from the nature of the lover not the worth of the loved one, only because he first loved us. 20 To say I love God, but to have hatred for one's brother (brother-Christian? brother-man?) is to show oneself to be a liar. Love to God is shown by love to man. If one is lacking so is the other. John goes so far as to say that if one does not love his brother he cannot love God. A distinction is made between the brother who is seen and God who is not. To affirm one's love for the unseen while failing to love the seen is to enter the realm of fantasy.

21 John rounds off the discussion by reminding his readers of the commandment that we have from him. John's him might be God or Christ. As often, he does not differentiate sharply. He has already spoken of the commandment to love (3:23) and now he reminds us again that love is not a suggested option. It is a positive command.

5:1–5 Faith's victory

The thought of love leads to that of relationship to God, and that in turn to victory. Love and faith are wrapped up in one another (cf. 4:16), and the believer overcomes the world.

1 Faith is inseparably connected with our view of Jesus, a truth insisted upon throughout this Epistle. It is necessary to believe that Jesus is the Christ. Then one becomes a child of God (Gk. 'has been begotten of God'). The confession that Jesus is the Christ is not the result of human insight. If a man makes it it shows that a divine work has taken place in him (cf. 1 Cor. 12:3). And he will love his fellow-believers for every one who loves the parent loves the child. 2 The love for God and for man are closely connected as John keeps insisting. Usually though he thinks of the love for God as shown in love for the brethren. Here he reverses the process. We know we love the children of God, when we love God. The love of God and man and the life lived in accordance with such love is a unity. John's practical turn of mind does not let him stop at the thought of love for God. He goes on, and obey his commandments. Real love is shown by a concern to do God's will. 3 Indeed he can define the love of God by saying that we keep his commandments. John is not a legalist. But he recognizes that love is busy. It finds its natural expression in doing the things that please the Beloved, and where will we find these things better than in his commandments? When John adds his commandments are not burdensome the thought is not that it is quite easy to discharge one's obligations to God. Rather John is saying that God's commandments are not an irksome burden. They may be difficult but they are a delight.

4 The thought moves to victory. The neuter whatever makes the statement quite general (cf. 1:1). Our faith (the noun here only in 1 John; it is not in the Gospel or 2, 3 John) stands last with emphasis. It is worth noting that the preceding overcomes is rather 'overcame'. The decisive victory is in the past, when Christ died to overcome evil, and when believers came to trust in Him. 5 The rhetorical question stresses the place of faith. Victory comes to him who believes that Jesus is the son of God. Notice the emphasis, yet once more, on a right view of His Person. We see here also John's habit of emphasis by repetition, for in these two verses he has three references to overcoming the world. We cannot miss it.

5:6–12 The witness to the Son

Since a right view of Jesus matters so much it is important that He be attested. John cites now some of the testimony which establishes His position.

6 That He came by water must surely refer to His baptism, and blood to His death. At the baptism He heard the heavenly voice and He solemnly entered His life's work. Some heretics apparently held that the divine Christ came upon Jesus then but left Him before His death. John contests this with his emphasis on blood, not with the water only but with the water and the blood. There seem no doubts about the water, but John has to emphasize the blood. It was this that was the stumbling-block. But it was (and is) this that is the heart of the gospel. 7 John adds the information that the Spirit is the witness (the present participle 'the witnessing one' points to a continuing activity). He has an excellent qualification, for the Spirit is the truth (cf. the similar statement about Jesus, Jn. 14:6). (Notice that AV includes additional material at this point. But the words are clearly a gloss and are rightly excluded by RSV even from its margins.) 8 There are in fact three witnesses. The Spirit is mentioned first, perhaps because He has just been referred to, and perhaps because He is a Person and thus a more explicit witness than the water, and the blood. This witness is harmonious. The inner witness of the Spirit, and all that is involved in Christ's baptism and His death are not three unrelated items. The three point to one act of God in Christ for man's salvation.

9 John appeals to the well-known fact of human trust. We believe our fellow-men. We should accordingly accept the testimony of which he has been speaking, for the testimony of God is greater, and the testimony in question is His. God has borne witness to his Son. Now witness commits. And God has committed Himself in Christ. He has borne witness that this is what He Himself is like. 10 Whoever trusts God's Son has the testimony in himself, which seems to show that the witness of the Spirit (v. 7) is a witness to the man's own spirit. He who believes in the Son of God and he who does not believe God appear to be opposites. This will mean that John puts no great difference between believing and believing in, and between faith in the Son of God and faith in God. For him Jesus Christ was God incarnate, so that to believe in Christ is to believe in God. But to disbelieve is to make Him a liar (cf. 1:10). The perfect tense in the verb has made views this as lasting. The unbeliever places himself in the position of permanently having a wrong view of God.

11 The content of the testimony is a little unexpected for it is what God has done, not what He has said. He gave us eternal life. Eternal life is God's own deed and God's own gift and as we contemplate it we see a revelation of God. The addition, and this life is in his Son, is important. We cannot think of eternal life apart from the Son nor can we think of the testimony apart from Him (cf. v. 9). Life eternal is life with Christ and in Christ. 12 This is emphasized in a crisp couplet. Life and the Son go together. It is impossible to have the one without the other.

5:13–21 The knowledge of eternal life

The Gospel according to John was written that its readers might believe and so have life (Jn. 20:31). By contrast this Epistle was written to give believers assurance, to let them know that they have life. John brings this out as his letter draws to a close.

5:13–15 Confidence. 13 The recipients are addressed as you who believe. This Epistle is not an evangelistic tract but a letter to Christians. John has said a good deal about knowledge and he comes back to the most important piece of knowledge, that you may know that you have eternal life. Incidentally this is the only place in this Epistle where he speaks of believing in the name of Jesus, i.e. in His full Person, all that the name stands for (in 3:23 the Gk. means 'believe the name').

14 Confidence is closely connected with assurance, and John moves suddenly into confidence in prayer. He gives it a very wide scope, for he thinks of asking anything, though he immediately qualifies this with according to his will. Prayer is not a device for inducing God to change His mind. It must be offered in accordance with His will if it is to be effective. When so offered He hears us. Elsewhere we learn that prayer must be in faith (Mk. 11:24), in the name of Jesus (Jn. 14:14), offered by those who abide in Christ (Jn. 15:7), and who have forgiven those who offend them (Mk. 11:25), and it must be accompanied by obedience (1 Jn. 3:22). It must not be for the gratification of one's passions (Jas. 4:3). 15 John now proceeds from the thought of God's hearing us to the consequence, namely that He grants our requests.

5:16, 17 Prayer for wrongdoers. 16 There is an abrupt change to the forgiveness of sin, which can be brought about by intercessory prayer. John distinguishes between mortal sin and sin which is not mortal, but he does not define either. He tells us that when we see a brother commit such a sin we should pray for him. God will hear the prayer and give him life. This may well indicate that he was not up till now a Christian. He was not alive but 'dead through the trespasses and sins' (Eph. 2:1). In response to prayer life is given to him. We should regard mortal sin as a state rather than an act. There is no one specific sin men commit which we can call mortal, but there is a state of sin, of being in rebellion against God which John elsewhere characterizes as remaining in death (3:14). Our Lord warns that he who blasphemes against the Spirit 'will not be forgiven' (Lk. 12:10) and it is this kind of thing that is in mind here. John adds I do not say that one is to pray for mortal sin. This is not to introduce an element of calculation as to when we may and when we may not pray for others. It is a warning that sin damns men. 17 All wrongdoing is sin. We must not take sin lightly. But the believer may sin a sin which does not remove him from the category of the saved.

5:18–21 The believer's knowledge. 18 John has had a good deal to say about knowledge and now he introduces three statements in succession with we know. The first is that any one born of God does not sin. Again it is the habitual attitude that is meant. The reason is that he is kept safe by Him who was born of God, i.e. Jesus Christ. The evil one accordingly does not touch him, does not make effective contact with him. 19 The second statement concerns the origin of believers, that they are of God. By contrast the whole world is in the power of the evil one, literally 'lies in the evil one'. This is an unusual verb and may point to the powerlessness of the world lying under Satan's sway, perhaps, too, to its inertness, its refusal to assert itself against its master.

20 The third of John's trilogy directs us to the incarnation. The Son of God has come. There is some emphasis on the actuality of the arrival (Gk. hēkei). Moreover He has given us understanding. The Christian faith is not a hindrance to thinking but a stimulus to right thinking. The understanding is so that we may know him who is true. Not only do we know Him, but we are in him, and this is further explained as in his Son Jesus Christ. As often in this Epistle the Father and the Son are seen in the closest possible relationship. To be 'in' the Father is the same as to be 'in' the Son. John goes on, This is the true God and eternal life. Once more it is not easy to see whether the Father or the Son is meant. But they are so close that there is little difference. For the men of the ancient world there were many gods. But John sees that they are all false gods. There is but one true God, and men have eternal life in Him.

21 For the last time John uses the affectionate diminutive, little children. In view of the whole preceding discussion it is unlikely that idols should be taken to mean images used in worship. The term means 'false gods'. John's readers have been given many gifts by God, including 'understanding' (v. 20). Let them keep themselves then from every false god.

2 and 3 John

INTRODUCTION

These short letters were not often quoted in the earliest times. This is not surprising, but it makes it difficult to solve problems concerning date and the like. Both claim to be written by 'the elder', but there is no further description. Considerations of style convince most scholars that they are by the same author as 1 John, but there is no unanimity. Donald Guthrie surveys the evidence and concludes:

'1. Authorship by the apostle John, which has such strong external support, is seen to be a quite reasonable deduction from the internal evidence.

'2. Authorship by the Elder John, proposed by most of those disputing apostolic authorship either of the Epistles or the Gospel, has far less ancient attestation but far more modern opinion behind it. It would have greater weight if the Elder John (i.e. as distinct from the apostle) were known with certainty to have existed.

'3. Authorship by an unknown Elder has even less ancient testimony and cannot be considered as probable.

'The conclusion reached is that John, the Son of Zebedee, was the author of all three Epistles' (New Testament Introduction: Hebrews to Revelation, 1962, p. 212).

This seems to be a reasonable summary of the position. There can in the nature of the case be no certainty, but in the present state of our knowledge it seems best to accept the traditional view.

There is a problem as to the destination of 2 John. It is addressed to 'the elect lady and her children', but there is controversy as to whether this means an individual lady or whether it is a symbolic way of referring to a church. The 'children' would then be members of the congregation. The principal argument for the former view is that this is the most natural way of taking the words, while for the latter it is urged that the subject-matter is more appropriate for a church than for an individual, and that the letter lacks personal characteristics (in which it stands in contrast to 3 John). The problem seems insoluble with the information at our command, though perhaps it is slightly more likely that it is a letter to an individual. It seems a rather slight missive to be sent to a congregation.

2 John seems to reflect something of the same false teaching that lies behind 1 John. The letter then will be written to put its readers on their guard against it. Clearly there was some danger that the false teachers would be welcomed and thus their doctrines would spread. The Elder writes to forestall this. Some writers link 3 John with the same situation. It certainly is concerned with hospitality to visiting preachers. A certain Diotrephes was refusing to receive those the Elder commended, and it may be that he belonged to the opposite party accordingly. But this is very speculative. All that we can say is that Gaius is being reassured. The Elder will take action against Diotrephes in due course.

There is very little on which to estimate the dates of these writings. Most agree that they come from about the same period, and it is usual to see this as not too far from the time of 1 John, i.e. probably about the end of the 1st century.

1–3 Salutation. This is the normal type of opening to a 1st-century letter. 1, 2 The writer calls himself the elder, which may be an indication of age or possibly of an official position in the church. The letter is addressed to the elect lady, an expression which might also be rendered 'an elect lady'. Alternatively, one or both of the Greek terms may be taken as a proper name, 'Electa the Lady', 'the elect Kyria' or 'Electa Kyria'. RSV is probably correct. Whether an individual or a church is meant is disputed; see Introduction. The elder affirms that he loves the lady and her children in the truth. Love and truth are very prominent in this Epistle (truth occurs five times in the first four verses). Notice the sequence whom I love . . . because of the truth. Truth as John sees it leads to love. The truth can be known. It abides in believers and will be with them for ever. It is difficult to think that the truth thus described is altogether separate from our Lord Jesus Christ who could say 'I am . . . the truth' (Jn. 14:6).

3 The addition of mercy to grace and peace in the greeting is unusual (elsewhere only in 1, 2 Timothy). It strengthens the idea in grace which points us to the freeness of God's gift in Christ. It is also unusual to have it said that these things will be with us. In a salutation one expects 'with you'. This appears to be the only salutation in the NT which reads this way. It is an expression of solidarity linking writer and readers. All alike need grace, mercy and peace. Jesus is spoken of here as the Father's Son, and here only in the NT. He is not to be thought of as separate from the Father.

4–6 The command to love. 4 The writer rejoiced greatly when he found some of the children of the elect lady following the truth. This last expression is literally 'walking in truth' and must be very nearly equivalent to 'living the Christian life'. That it is put this way indicates the stress our writer places on the truth. To follow the truth is not an option selected by men but we have been commanded by the Father. In three verses here we have the verb 'command' or the noun 'commandment' four times. It is the repetition for emphasis we have already noticed in 1 John, and again in the opening verses. 5 The elder does not enjoin but says I beg you, lady, which is the language of polite request. He is not writing a new commandment, but the one we have had from the beginning (cf. 1 Jn. 2:7). The command to love, which our writer immediately spells out, is an old commandment. He does not speak of it as also new, as in 1 John. He is content to emphasize the obligation resting on Christians, namely that we love one another. This is the central thing, and it receives emphasis in all the Johannine writings.

6 This is love introduces something of a definition, and it is interesting that next comes that we follow his commandments. In modern times love and obedience are often contrasted, obedience being connected with a legalistic spirit. But this antithesis is a false one. True love delights to obey (cf. 1 Jn. 5:3). Those who know what love in the Christian sense really is are always eager to obey God's commandments. John repeats that he is not enunciating a novelty, but a commandment which had been heard from the beginning. Incidentally RSV's follow both times translates a verb which means 'walk'. The idea of steady progress should not be overlooked.

7–11 Sound doctrine. For gives the reason for the preceding. Many deceivers (people who have taught erroneous views of the Christian way) have gone out. This implies that they had at one time been church members (cf. 1 Jn. 2:19). The essence of their error was their failure to acknowledge the coming of Jesus Christ in the flesh (cf. 1 Jn. 4:2f.). As in 1 John the importance of the incarnation is the point at issue. Jesus was indeed the very Christ of God come in the flesh. To fail to teach this is to fall into the most serious error. John calls the man who does this the deceiver and the antichrist. He has spoken of the teacher of this error as antichrist before (1 Jn. 4:3), but the epithet deceiver is new. Not only is such a man in error but he leads others astray.

8 Look to yourselves is a call to take stock of their position, for there was some danger that they would lose what they have worked for. The modern distaste for mentioning rewards and punishments is not shared by the NT writers. It is very true that it is never suggested that we serve simply to be rewarded. This is not a Christian attitude. The service we render God is that which springs naturally from the gratitude of redeemed hearts. But God will reward those who serve Him faithfully, and no NT writer appears to think this a thought for which he should apologize.

9 The false teachers evidently thought of themselves as 'advanced' thinkers. John thinks of him who goes ahead as having advanced right out of Christianity! Our aim should be not to be 'advanced' but to abide in the doctrine of Christ. Notice that it is necessary to be right about the Son if we are to be right with the Father (cf. 1 Jn. 2:23). 10 No countenance must be given to any other doctrine. John does not mean that common courtesy is not to be extended to a doctrinal opponent. But to receive a man into one's home at that time was to express appreciation of his message. And since the exercise of hospitality was what enabled preachers to move about with their message it was also to help him spread his teachings. So if a man does not bring this doctrine (i.e. the doctrine that Christ is God incarnate) he is not to be received. 11 John makes clear the reason. To greet such a man is to share his wicked work. The Christian is to avoid all evil.

12, 13 Conclusion. The elder explains that the reason for ending his letter at this point is not that he has run out of subject-matter. On the contrary, I have much to write to you. But he prefers talking to writing. So having said what is most important he lays down his pen and saves the rest of his news until he meets his friends. I would rather not use paper and ink is an unusual expression, but the meaning is not in doubt. Face to face is literally 'mouth to mouth'. The Greek is vivid. Our joy links the interests of writer and readers. 13 The letter ends with greetings in the normal fashion.

COMMENTARY

1 Salutation. As in 2 John, the writer calls himself simply the elder. The addressee is the beloved Gaius. Four times he calls Gaius beloved, and also says of him, whom I love in the truth. Clearly he had a deep affection for the man. Truth is found six times in this Epistle, so it is another important note. As in the earlier Epistles it probably is connected with the truth of the gospel, that truth that we see in Christ (cf. v. 8).

2–4 Following the truth. 2 It is customary in 1st-century letters to have a prayer at the beginning. Now John prays that Gaius's affairs may prosper in the same way as his soul does. RSV's I know is scarcely a translation. John simply says 'that you may prosper and be in health even as your soul prospers'. 3 The source of his immediate knowledge of his friend was the visit of some of the brethren who testified to the truth of your life. This is more literally 'testified to the truth of you' which may mean that Gaius knew and possessed the truth. Follow the truth is 'walk in truth' as in 2 Jn. 4. Gaius is progressing in the truth and John rejoices. 4 Indeed he has no greater joy than to hear that his children follow the truth ('walk in the truth'). My children will mean 'my children in the faith', 'those converted through my ministry'. It is the greatest of joys to the elder to know that his converts make progress.

5–8 Hospitality. 5 The subject-matter proper of the letter (as opposed to the preliminaries) begins here. It reflects the custom of the early church whereby any Christian travelling in the interests of the gospel would look for hospitality from the local Christians. Probably there were few preachers wealthy enough to stand the expense of staying at inns, and in any case inns had a bad reputation. It must have meant a great deal for the spread of the faith that preachers could obtain a ready lodging. John commends Gaius for his hospitality. It is a loyal thing is rather 'a faithful thing'. It is an action in accordance with the faith that is commended. When you render any service to the brethren is not specific, but the following verse shows that hospitality is in mind. Especially to strangers is not quite right, for this implies that Gaius had helped non-strangers and also strangers. The Greek means 'and this to strangers', i.e. Gaius is commended because of hospitality to people who were all unknown to him.

6 These people have spoken of what Gaius has done before the church, so that his deeds were widely known. John commends his practice: You will do well to send them on their journey. As befits God's service is rather 'worthily of God'. It is God who is the standard, not His servants (cf. Jn. 13:20). 7 The wandering preachers have accepted nothing from the heathen. This might have compromised their message and they would not do it. It made them all the more dependent on men like Gaius. 8 There is an obligation (we ought is 'we owe it') resting on believers to support such men. That (Gk. hina) denotes purpose. The duty in question is not merely an exercise in hospitality, but is in order that we may set forward divine purposes in being fellow workers in the truth.

9–12 Diotrephes and Demetrius. 9 Diotrephes was clearly a man with authority, but exactly what his position was is not clear. He took the line opposite to that of Gaius and hindered both the elder and the preachers. John had written something to the church, but Diotrephes had apparently prevented the church from getting the letter. RSV's does not acknowledge my authority is not quite right. The Greek means 'does not receive us' (RSV translates the same verb by 'welcome' in v. 10). 10 Diotrephes had slandered the elder, prating against me with evil words (for me read 'us'). He had also used deeds as well as words: he himself refused to welcome (the tense denotes the continuing practice) the brethren. But he went further. He stops those who want to welcome them and puts them out of the church. Clearly he had an important position to be able to do this, and equally clearly his opposition to the preachers was implacable.

11 John uses this bad example to impress a lesson on Gaius, whom he calls beloved for the fourth time in this short letter. Gaius should not imitate evil but . . . good. The man who does good is of God. All good originates in Him. When a man does evil that is evidence that he has not seen God. 12 Demetrius is introduced without explanation, as one well known. He is well reported of in the church. But he also has testimony from the truth itself. This difficult expression perhaps means that Demetrius' conduct squares with the gospel, so that the truth of the gospel is declared in his life. I testify is really 'we testify'. The plural may be epistolary as RSV takes it, and refer to John alone. But it is also possible that he associates others with him. At any rate he makes it clear that Demetrius has his warm support.

13–15 Conclusion. John closes the Third Epistle as he did the Second by saying he has much to write but prefers to wait until he sees his friend. He uses the past tense, I had much to write, but the present in 2 Jn. 12, while he also replaces 'paper and ink' of the former passage with pen and ink. But there seems no difference in meaning. Similarly his hope to see his friend and talk with him is as in the previous Epistle. 15 Peace was a common greeting both on meeting and leaving friends. It is a little prayer that God's peace will surround them. Peace is not, as with us, a negative term meaning the absence of war, but rather the positive presence of blessing. John passes on greetings and asks Gaius to greet the friends, a description evidently precise enough for Gaius to know who were meant. Every one of them should really be 'by name'. Though he does not list the names he wants each friend to know that the greeting is personal. He is singled out by name.

LEON MORRIS

Jude

INTRODUCTION

AUTHORSHIP

The first verse tells us the bare facts about the writer: he claims to be by name Jude, by birth brother of James, and by calling a servant of Jesus Christ. Tradition has ascribed the letter to Jude, the brother of Jesus, mentioned in Mt. 13:55 and Mk. 6:3. This must have been a younger son of Mary, born to her and Joseph, together with James, Joseph and Simon, though it has been argued that he was an older brother by a former marriage. We know that the Lord's brothers refused to believe in Him during His lifetime (Jn. 7:5), but that James was converted, possibly as a result of a post-resurrection appearance of Jesus (1 Cor. 15:7), and subsequently became a leader in the Jerusalem church (Acts 12:17; 15:13; Gal. 1:19; 2:9, 12; Acts 21:18). This James has also traditionally been regarded as the author of the letter of that name (q.v.) and in view of his eminence it would be natural for Jude to refer to himself in this way as James's brother. The two may be referred to together in 1 Cor. 9:5.

It has been suggested that the writer could have been Jude the apostle, the 'Jude of James' as the Greek of Lk. 6:16 and Acts 1:13 describes him (the Thaddaeus (Lebbaeus) of Mt. 10:4 and Mk. 3:18). The difficulty here lies in the fact that an apostle would hardly have written v. 17 as Jude does, while normal Greek usage in Lk. 6:16 requires the word understood to be 'son' rather than 'brother'.

Again, the theory of a pseudepigrapher at work has been adduced for this Epistle, but it is difficult to see why, if the writer wished to publish his letter under a more distinguished name than his own, he should have chosen someone so obscure as Jude, the brother of James, and not fallen for the temptation to call himself the Lord's brother. The humility which prompted this description must in itself be regarded as a mark of genuineness, matched by his more eminent brother's similar behaviour (Jas. 1:1).

Some who question the traditional authorship do so on the grounds that the letter itself bears the marks of being a late composition. V. 3 suggests that the faith is already becoming a systematic body of doctrine, and vv. 17, 18 speak of the apostles as if their generation has already died out, though the recipients of this letter would appear to have been instructed by them. If we are prepared to accept Jude as author, and that he was probably a younger brother of the Lord, then we can limit the latest date to within his lifetime. Eusebius relates a story from Hegesippus about this Jude's grandsons being brought before Domitian when the latter was Roman Emperor (AD 81–96). The same authority quotes them as being bishops in the time of Trajan (98–117), and this would make it reasonable for their grandfather to have been alive well into the latter part of the 1st century. If we accept the reasons quoted above why the letter suggests a fairly late date, and if we are at all convinced by the arguments for the priority of 2 Peter (see Introduction to that letter) it would have been perfectly possible for Jude to have written as he did in the late sixties of the 1st century. Some argue that the absence of a reference to the fall of Jerusalem in v. 5, where it could have been apposite, suggests a date before AD 70.

SUBJECT

There is nothing to indicate to whom the letter is written, or where the writer is situated, except that he is writing to Christian people (v. 1). He apparently intended to send them a more formal treatise on doctrine and Christian living (perhaps more on the lines of 1 Peter!), but the appearance and spread of heretical teachings has led him rather to send his readers a warning of the consequences of following those who propagate such false ideas, coupled with an exhortation to hold fast to the apostolic faith (v. 3).

A feature of the letter is that it makes use of Jewish apocryphal literature, and is unique among the canonical NT books in doing so. This has led some to argue that it must have been written for a Jewish readership, but that is not necessarily so: the quotations would spring from the writer's background, and not necessarily that of his readers. Jude quotes from the Assumption of Moses and the Book of Enoch in vv. 9, 15, and may also be referring to other apocryphal works in vv. 6 and 8. Subsequently, when the church was formulating her Canon, Jude came under suspicion because of his quotation of such works, but it should be remembered that a high doctrine of inspiration does not preclude the inspired writer's right to quote from non-canonical sources. Paul himself quoted from extra-biblical Jewish writings in 1 Cor. 10:7 and 2 Tim. 3:8, and even from heathen poets in a sermon at Athens (Acts 17:28) and his letter to Titus (1:12). While in some quarters the letter was therefore queried before being accepted into the Canon, quotations from early writers show that it was in use in the church at least from early in the 2nd century.

COMMENTARY

1, 2 OPENING ADDRESS AND GREETING

The writer introduces himself in traditional fashion, describes those for whom the letter is intended, and prays for their spiritual growth.

1 Jude. See Introduction above on the authorship. Servant is the Greek doulos, 'a bond-slave': Jude is therefore a true 'brother' of Jesus (cf. Mk. 3:35). James (1:1) and Peter (2 Pet. 1:1) also use the title. Brother of James. This appears to be best understood as James the brother of the Lord (Mt. 13:55) and leader of the Jerusalem church. Again see Introduction for fuller details. Called, beloved . . . kept . . . introduces a feature of this letter, i.e. groups of three words together. This description of the Christians to whom Jude writes emphasizes how much salvation is entirely of God. It is the result of His sovereignty, His love and His power, and its scope, suggested in these verbs, is from eternity, through time, and back to eternity (see Rom. 8:30; 1 Pet. 1:3–5). In God is an unusual phrase for 'by God' (Phillips), though it might be a parallel to the Pauline 'in Christ'; NEB 'who live in the love of God the Father' has this in mind. It would seem better to follow the suggestion that originally there was a space after the Greek en for the local place-name to be inserted, and then the dative Theō(i) would be instrumental: 'to those who are at X, loved by God . . .'. 'Sanctified' (AV) has less MSS authority than loved. Kept for Jesus Christ (cf. 1 Pet. 1:5) could be instrumental, 'kept by Jesus'. Some see a reference here to a Gentile destination, seeing in the phrase traces of 1 Pet. 2:9. 2 Mercy, peace, and love is a unique benediction for the NT, and more fulsome than most in other letters. Some would link them with the triad of v. 1: God's call bringing mercy, His love reaching out to them, and His keeping power leading to peace. Others would see a Trinitarian formula: God the Father bringing mercy, the Son peace, and the Spirit love. Multiplied is the prayer for abundance of blessings found in 1 Pet. 1:2 and 2 Pet. 1:2.

3, 4 CHALLENGE TO HOLD FIRM TO THE FAITH

The writer had intended writing on a different theme, but the appearance and activities of false teachers have led him rather to concentrate on exhorting them to strive in every way to uphold the orthodox faith.

3 Beloved stresses the affection Jude feels as a pastor for his addressees. Our common salvation is a reminder that he is on the same footing as they are in the sight of God. Tit. 1:4 speaks of the 'common faith'. The word also emphasizes that this salvation is open to all. Contend suggests the need of strenuous effort: the word is used of participants in athletic contests. Mental effort is needed in order to understand and teach the Word of God aright, and moral effort is needed to apply that understanding to everyday behaviour (cf. 1 Pet. 1:13ff.; 2 Pet. 1:5ff.). The faith here implies a recognized body of teaching, such as we know emerged from Peter's early sermons and began to crystallize in such expressions as 1 Cor. 15:3ff.; 11:23–26; 1 Tim. 1:15; 3:16, etc. Once for all emphasizes the finality of the revelation in Christ, and it is worth noting that many of the fundamental tenets set forth in the above verses are being called in question today. Jude's message still applies in the 20th century. 4 Admission has been secretly gained is all one Greek verb which means 'to sneak in stealthily' (for questionable purposes). Designated could have the idea of their names set out in heavenly books, as in Dn. 7:10; Lk. 10:20; Rev. 20:12. In that case this condemnation then must refer to what Jude is going to describe. It has been suggested that long ago could mean 'already', as in Mk. 15:44, and that the reference is then to 2 Pet. 2:3, from which Jude is hastily copying. Alternatively it could refer to the general denunciation of evildoers in the OT. Licentiousness. Their teaching has the same end as that referred to in 2 Pet. 2; the arguments they would use would be those considered by Paul in Rom. 6 and 7. Deny. To claim to be a Christian and then to live a life of dissipation is a sheer contradiction in terms, and certainly shows no understanding of what it means to call Jesus Master and Lord (cf. 1 Cor. 6:19, 20). 'The only Master and our Lord Jesus Christ' (RSV mg.) may be the right reading, as normally the word Master (Gk. despotēs) refers to God the Father, though the one exception to this rule in 2 Pet. 2:1 may indicate a similar exception here. If the former is the case, then 1 Pet. 1:17 shows that belief in God the Father calls for holiness of life as its corollary.

5–7 REMINDER OF GOD'S PUNISHMENT OF DISOBEDIENCE IN THE PAST

The writer now points out that status by itself is no guarantee of salvation. All the people of Israel were delivered from Egypt, yet through unbelief they did not all enter the promised land. Even angels, once they behaved in a way inconsistent with their calling, met with swift punishment, while Sodom and Gomorrah, though cities of the promised land, and one of them numbering righteous Lot and his family among their inhabitants, were yet destroyed for their immoral conduct.

5 Once for all fully informed presumably in the catechetical instruction given prior to baptism. He. RSV mg. shows what a variety of readings there is. 'The Lord' (cf. NEB and Phillips) is probably best, as the same Person is seen as acting in judgment in v. 6, and so it could not be Joshua (Heb. form of Jesus) as some suggest. Afterward is literally 'the second time'. Ex. 6:9 has been suggested as the first occasion of unbelief, but the sense and order suggest that the adverb goes with 'destroyed'. In this case it is best either to take it generally, as RSV (though this is without parallel), or as a contrast with the Flood which 2 Peter mentions. 1 Cor. 10:1–11 is an instructive comment on this allusion. 6 Angels are also the subjects of God's purposes and are given privileges by Him. The allusion may be to the incident of Gn. 6:1–4, which was described more elaborately in certain apocryphal books of which Jude shows knowledge in the following verses (cf. also the parallel in 2 Pet. 2:4). Their dwelling was in heaven, except when dispatched to earth on divine business. It was sin which led them to try to settle on the earth (Gn. 6). Keep . . . kept is a play on words: those who do not keep what God entrusts to them are therefore not to be trusted and must be kept by Him. Eternal chains . . . nether gloom. See on 2 Pet. 2:4. 7 Sodom and Gomorrah are also cited in 2 Pet. 2:6ff. Indulged in unnatural lust is literally 'went after strange flesh' and may be linked with the reference in v. 6 to Gn. 6, because the sin of the men of Sodom (Gn. 18:20) reached its peak when they sought intercourse with the two angels sent to Lot (Gn. 19:5). Punishment of eternal fire is consistent with the teaching of Jesus; cf. Mt. 18:8; 25:41; Mk. 9:48, etc.

8–13 THE SINS OF THE FALSE BRETHREN

Jude now turns from examples from the past to the subjects of his present letter and shows that their behaviour is not only impure but also presumptuous. This contrasts with the behaviour of the archangel Michael, but follows in the unworthy succession of Cain, Balaam and Korah. As such they are a disgrace to any Christian fellowship, and Jude concludes by denouncing them in a flood of verbiage strongly reminiscent of Peter's outburst in 2 Pet. 2:10–17.

8 Yet in like manner. The words stress the surprise that, in spite of God's clear punishment of such behaviour in the past, these men have still dared to follow their ungodly example. Dreamings suggests that the false teachers may have claimed to receive some of their teaching by means of visions. Defile . . . reject . . . revile set out the three basic charges against them: they teach and practise immorality, they spurn the authority of God, and they speak evil of angels. Authority is Greek kyriotēs, which, in view of its affinity with Kyrios, 'Lord', seems best applied to God's authority. Glorious ones, as in 2 Pet. 2:10, is used for 'angels'. 9 Archangel is a word found only here and in 1 Thes. 4:16 in the NT. Michael is known from Rev. 12:7 and the book of Daniel (10:13, 21; 12:1) as a leader of the heavenly host. The incident referred to is described more fully in the apocryphal Assumption of Moses. Michael was sent to bury Moses, but the devil opposed him, claiming that the body, being material, belonged to him. Even in this context Michael did not revile, but answered in the words of Zc. 3:2, and in this his behaviour is a strong contrast to that of these men. 10 Whatever they do not understand is thought by some to refer to celestial beings (as in v. 8); it could more widely just mean 'spiritual things'. By instinct: in a natural or physical way. Having no time for spiritual things, they limit their knowledge to the physical world, and in this they find their downfall as they allow the physical side of their being to dominate, just like animals. 11 Cain . . . Balaam . . . Korah: cf. Gn. 4:1–16; Nu. 22–24; 16. These are classic examples of the disastrous effects of jealousy, greed and pride. The latter-day descendants of this trio are jealous of the Christian progress of others, and so seek to turn them aside to immorality (and so to murder them spiritually). They are so keen to gain money from teaching what certain people will pay to be told that they readily persuade them to immorality (cf. Nu. 25:1–9; 31:16 and see on 2 Pet. 2:15), and so great is their pride that they cannot bear to be told of any power (or knowledge) greater than their own. 12 Blemishes is an assimilation from 2 Pet. 2:13. The word is better interpreted as 'reefs' (see mg.), 'sunken rocks', i.e. a hidden danger (hence Phillips' 'menace'). Love feasts (cf. 2 Pet. 2:13) were regularly held with the Lord's Supper in the early church, and 1 Cor. 11:20ff. show that from the earliest times these could be an occasion for behaviour inconsistent with Christian love. Boldly; i.e. 'without fear' of the consequences. Looking after themselves. The Greek word for 'shepherding' is used here. The hallmark of a false pastor is that he uses his position to further his own ends, and not to feed the flock (cf. Ezk. 34:2ff.; Jn. 21:15ff.; 1 Pet. 5:2). Waterless clouds. Cf. 2 Pet. 2:17. Again the emphasis is on their failure to live up to appearances, and consequent instability. Fruitless trees which have no fruit at harvest time have failed to fulfil the function for which they exist (cf. Mt. 7:15–20; Mk. 11:12–14). Twice dead, because having tasted spiritual life they have now rejected that (cf. Heb. 6:4–8; 10:26–31; 2 Pet. 2:20–22). Uprooted: a picture of judgment (cf. Ps. 52:5; Je. 1:10; Mt. 3:10). 13 Wild waves suggests the restlessness of the tide, which, after all its noise and fuss, only leaves a deposit of scum and rubbish on the shore (cf. Is. 57:20). Wandering stars is a further reference to the Book of Enoch, where there are references to stars which have transgressed being bound together in prison. Some think this refers to the planets (wandering is Gk. planētai), whose movements were misunderstood by Jude and his contemporaries; others that they are the shooting stars which appear briefly to give light and then fall out into darkness. The thought seems to be that of Lk. 6:39; these teachers set themselves in a position where they claim to be guides, but are in fact themselves off course. Nether gloom of darkness. See on 2 Pet. 2:4, 17.

14–16 THE RELEVANCE OF ENOCH'S PROPHECY

Jude now draws his denunciation to a climax by quoting Enoch's prophecy in confirmation of their impending and certain punishment, and rounds it off with further well-chosen epithets.

14 Enoch . . . Adam (cf. Gn. 5:1–18). This description occurs in the Book of Enoch, as does the quotation which follows. The book was well known in NT days and so the reference is relevant (see Introduction above for a discussion of Jude's use of apocryphal literature). The Lord, for Enoch, is God and His myriads are the angels (cf. Dt. 33:2; Zc. 14:5). For the Christian the words refer to Christ coming with His angels (cf. Mt. 25:31; 2 Thes. 1:7). 15 Ungodly takes up and repeats the word used in v. 4 to describe these people; here it refers to them, their character and their behaviour. 16 Grumblers, against God and His ways (cf. Ex. 16:2, 9; 17:3; 1 Cor. 10:10, etc.); this behaviour was characteristic of Israel in the wilderness. Malcontents; lit. 'fault-finders'. Following . . . gives the reason for this behaviour: they are dissatisfied with God's ways of truth and justice because they want to fulfil their own lusts. Loud-mouthed; i.e. greater than they have any right to be. Cf. 2 Pet. 2:18 where the same word is used. Flattering; lit. 'admiring men's appearances': a characteristic quite contrary to that of God (cf. Acts 10:34; Jas. 2:1ff.).

17–23 THE CHRISTIAN ANTIDOTE

By contrast Christians are exhorted to keep firm in their memories the apostolic warning, especially as these people lead to schisms. The positive way to avoid them and the effect they have is by Christian growth, prayer, abiding spiritually, waiting for the completion of the work Christ has begun in us, and reaching out to others in evangelistic zeal.

17 But contrasts Christian behaviour with that of the ungodly. Remember is also the theme of 2 Peter (1:12–14; 3:2), and see v. 5 above. Predictions: such as Acts 20:29, 30; 1 Tim. 4:1ff.; 2 Tim. 3:1ff.; cf. Mt. 24:23f. 18 Said can refer to writings and need not imply that these readers had actually heard the apostles. In the last time (cf. 1 Pet. 1:20). The period is that between the ascension and the return of Christ. Scoffers, as in 2 Pet. 3:3. There may be an otherwise unrecorded apostolic saying behind both these sources. The Petrine verse suggests the content of their mockery. 19 Set up divisions, by setting up themselves as superior to ordinary Christians, as the Gnostics did, dividing mankind into 'spiritual' and 'worldly' people. In actual fact, says Jude, they themselves are the worldly ones, since they do not possess the Spirit, as is evidenced by their lack of His fruit. On worldly (natural as opposed to spiritual man) see 1 Cor. 2:14–16. 20 But you. The opening words of v. 17 are repeated for emphasis. Most holy faith refers, as in v. 3, to the content of the Christian revelation, which is most holy as it is something given by God which, rightly interpreted and acted upon, leads to holy living. In the Holy Spirit refers to the Christian's experience of abiding in communion with God through Jesus Christ by the Holy Spirit (cf. Rom. 8:9, 16, 26; Eph. 6:18). 21 Keep yourselves complements what was earlier said in the address of v. 1. Once a person has realized that he is the unworthy object of the love of God in Jesus Christ, he is challenged to respond in love. That love must be shown in behaviour, and Jn. 15:9, 10 show that such response is the way to abide in the consciousness of God's love. Failure to respond will deaden the heart to God's love and will result finally in the loss of this consciousness. Wait for the mercy. Error is finally to be avoided by a keen sense of expectation of the return of the Lord, when His mercy, already experienced initially (v. 1) and daily (v. 2; cf. La. 3:22, 23) will be finally realized when the work of salvation is completed. Tit. 2:11–14; 1 Pet. 4:7 and 2 Pet. 3:11f. lay similar stress on the advent hope as a motive for godly living. 22, 23 Some. In case the reader should think from the last two verses that orthodoxy is simply quietism, nourishing one's own spiritual life, Jude now turns to the Christian's responsibility for others. The text here is in doubt, and there may be two or three groups in mind. RSV appears to offer the best solution to the problems; NEB and Phillips by contrast understand only two groups in mind. Following the RSV the first class are those who are in two minds about the false teaching, and one must set about convincing them by argument. Others are more deeply involved and their position is serious: no effort is to be spared to snatch them as from a fire (see Zc. 3:2, already quoted in v. 9; Am. 4:11). The third group is saddest of all, for one can only pity them (doing so in the right spirit of fear of God and the realization that 'There, but for the grace of God, go I'). Garment suggests the contaminating effect of their sin. Like the leper whose clothing was polluted by his disease (Lv. 13:47–52), they are to be seen as a source of pollution and therefore to be shunned.

24, 25 FINAL COMMENDATION AND ASCRIPTION OF PRAISE

After all these sad possibilities of error and apostasy Jude ends on the positive note of pointing his readers to the God who alone can keep them to the end of time and into eternity. With this glorious goal in view he ascribes all glory and might here and now to the God our Saviour whose praises His ransomed people will be singing through all eternity. So be it.

24 Keep: cf. 1 Pet. 1:5. From falling: the same root as the verb in 2 Pet. 1:10, which shows how this is to be achieved. Present is a formal word, suggesting introduction to a dignitary. Without blemish occurs in 1 Pet. 1:19; his sanctification completed, the Christian is now fully identified with the character of His glorious Saviour. Rejoicing: an intensive word, the verbal form of which was especially dear to Peter (cf. 1 Pet. 1:6, 8). 25 Only may suggest that false teachers were already urging a hierarchy of gods and demi-gods, as the later Gnostics did, or it may just emphasize again that our salvation is the work of God alone. Through could go closely with Saviour: through Jesus God has saved us (Acts 4:12). Or it could mean that our praises are to be through Jesus (cf. 1 Pet. 2:5; 4:11). Of the four qualities ascribed, glory stresses the splendour of God, as the radiance of light (cf. the description of heaven in Rev. 21:23; 22:5), majesty His position (cf. Heb. 1:3), dominion His ability to carry out His sovereign will, and authority the fact that He has the absolute right to do so. These qualities have always been His and always will be, for they are the qualities of eternity which in His love He has introduced into the world of space and time which He has created. To such a vision of the Almighty God the believing soul can only breathe in response a humble yet fervent Amen—so be it!

DAVID H. WHEATON

The Revelation

INTRODUCTION

AUTHORSHIP

The author of the Revelation designates himself simply as John. Though a resident of Asia Minor (or rather, proconsular Asia) he was clearly a Hebrew Christian, as the language and style of the book reveal, and held a position of influence among the churches of that area. It was natural, in view of the strong tradition that John the son of Zebedee migrated to Ephesus, for early Christian writers to identify John the apostle with the Seer who wrote the Revelation. The weightiest factor in support of such a conclusion is, perhaps, the manner in which the prophet simply calls himself 'John', as though there were no other Christian leader in that area with whom he could be confused. The many remarkable affinities of thought and diction between the Gospel and Apocalypse in matters of detail similarly demand the recognition of some sort of connection in the authorship of the two books.

On the other hand, the general presentation of thought and, still more, of style and diction in the Revelation differs so widely from the Gospel as to make a common authorship of the two books problematic. The matter would be considered settled from this consideration alone were it not complicated by the view, vigorously championed by C. C. Torrey, that the Revelation was written in Aramaic; on this assumption the extraordinary Greek of the book would be accounted for by its being translated with minute literalness. If another writer made this translation, the argument as to the difference of style in the Revelation and Gospel would fall to the ground, or at least lose its main force, for no-one can maintain that the fourth Evangelist wrote polished Greek.

Rather than make an arbitrary decision on so complicated a question, it is wiser to admit that at present we are not in a position to affirm or deny that the prophet was the apostle of the same name (see Leon Morris, The Revelation of St. John, TNTC, 1969, pp. 25–34). However, the authorship of this book is the least important question to be considered in regard to it; it does not in the least affect the interpretation of the text. In any case, the title in Greek, 'The Revelation of St. John the Theologian' (AV, 'the Divine'; Gk. Theologos) is a misnomer; the book claims to be 'The revelation of Jesus Christ which God gave him . . . and he made it known by sending his angel to his servant John' (1:1). The book gains its value from its origin, not from the identity of its human author. The contents of the book are consistent with such an origin.

Recent writers on the Revelation have tended to support the earliest Christian tradition that it was written towards the close of Domitian's reign, i.e. c. AD 96. The book reflects the beginnings of a storm of persecution soon to burst in full fury on the Christians of Asia and ultimately on the church everywhere. John, a prominent Christian leader, has already been exiled, a fact which seems to point to official determination to eradicate the church, root and branch. Compulsion in respect of emperor-worship appears imminent. This accords perfectly with conditions existing in Asia Minor during the persecution instigated in Domitian's reign.

On the other hand, it should be mentioned that several notable scholars prefer an earlier date, either in Nero's reign (so Lightfoot, Westcott, Hort) or in Galba's short rule, AD 68 (so Torrey). The view is based on a literal interpretation of Rev. 11:1, 2 and 17:9–11. The balance of probability seems to favour the Domitianic date, but we cannot be certain.

INTERPRETATION

In the main the various types of exposition of the Revelation reduce themselves to four. The 'preterist' view regards the prophecies as wholly concerned with the circumstances of John's day, having no reference whatever to future ages. The 'historicist' interpretation construes the visions as a preview of history from the time of the writer to the end of the world. The 'futurist' explanation places the relevance of the visions entirely at the end of the age, largely divorcing them from the prophet's time. The 'poetic' view considers all hard and fast canons of interpretation to be illegitimate; the prophet simply describes, by means of his powers of artistry, the sure triumph of God over all evil powers.

Liberal scholars largely endorse the 'preterist' view and repudiate the predictive elements of the book; many, however, accept as valid the principles of God's moral government which lie at the root of the prophet's teaching. The Reformers generally adopted the 'historicist' view. They identified the persecuting power with papal Rome. Rigidly interpreted, however, this view seems to be contrary to the analogy of all other prophecy in the Bible. The 'futurist' view was that of the earliest centuries of the church and is widely held by evangelical Christians today. In its popular form, however, it is open to serious criticism, in that the historical setting of the book is almost wholly ignored. Indeed, it is often said that John wrote the Revelation not for his own age but for the church of the end-time. Hence the book is made to yield information and ideas such as the prophet had never dreamed of. Vagaries of this sort drive many readers to value the book solely from an aesthetic viewpoint, denying that it ever had a specific occasion in view.

The symbols, nevertheless, do mean something. John was more than a poet setting forth in vague images the triumph of God over all evil. He wrote for the churches under his care with a practical situation in view, viz. the prospect of the popular Caesar-worship of his day being enforced on all Christians. No man who said 'Jesus is Lord' could also confess 'Caesar is Lord'; the latter demand threatened the existence of the whole church of God. Grasping the principles involved, John was given to see the logical consummation of the tendencies at work, mankind divided to the obedience of Christ or antichrist. On the canvas of John's age, therefore, and in the colours of his environment, he pictured the last great crisis of the world, not merely because, from a psychological viewpoint, he could do no other, but because of the real correspondence between his crisis and that of the last days. As the church was then faced with a devastating persecution by Rome, so will the church of the last days find itself violently opposed by the prevailing world power. The outcome of that great struggle will be the advent of Christ in glory, and with Him the establishment of the kingdom of God in power. John clearly regarded the end as at hand (1:1–3), but this 'foreshortened perspective' no more invalidates his utterances than it does those of the OT prophets and of our Lord Himself, for it is characteristic of all prophecy.

The following exposition, then, seeks to interpret the visions of this book as the readers must have done to whom they were first addressed, recognizing, nevertheless, that their proper fulfilment awaits the day known neither to man nor angel, but which is yet within the authority of God (Acts 1:6f.).

COMMENTARY

1:1–8 PROLOGUE

1:1–3 Superscription

Here are set forth the source of the book (v. 1), the nature of its contents (v. 2) and the blessed results of taking it to heart (v. 3).

1 A revelation is an uncovering of something hidden, used here in the sense of a 'vision and its interpretation' (Charles). The ultimate source of this revelation is God Himself; He gave it to Jesus Christ for the benefit of the church (his servants); it was therefore sent through the mediation of an angel to John who, in turn, passed it on to the 'seven churches' (v. 4), and so to the whole church of God. It tells of what must soon take place; 'soon' expresses the normal prophetic attitude and is emphasized throughout the NT (see, e.g., Lk. 18:8; Rom. 16:20; 1 Cor. 7:29–31; Jas. 5:8; 1 Pet. 4:7; Rev. 1:3; 22:20).

2, 3 The revelation is further defined as the word of God . . . the testimony of (borne by) Jesus Christ, even to all that he (the Seer) saw. In 1:9 and 20:4 the first two phrases are linked to stand for the whole truth of God; here it means the words of the prophecy.

The blessing is invoked on the one reading aloud to the assembled congregation and on those hearing and observing that which is enjoined. There are two classes here, not three; the last two participles are governed by one subject. Cf. Lk. 11:28.

1:4, 5a Greeting

4 The seven churches that are in Asia, i.e. the Roman province of that name, are enumerated in v. 11. It is hardly to be doubted that they also represent the church in its completeness, as is seen in the conclusion to each of the seven letters, 'He who has an ear, let him hear what the Spirit says to the churches'. He who is and who was and who is to come is a title for God, stressing both His eternity and vital relation to history. The last clause (who is to come, instead of the expected 'who will be') is not only a conscious allusion to the second coming of Christ, but implies that the most important event of the future is that appearing which will also be the coming of God.

The seven spirits who are before his throne is probably a designation of the Holy Spirit. It may have originated in the Seer's mind through the popular interpretation of Is. 11:2, 3 as being a sevenfold spiritual endowment of the Messiah (the seven 'eyes of the Lord, which range through the whole earth' of Zc. 4:10; see Rev. 4:5 and 5:6) and his representation of the church by the seven churches to whom he particularly writes. Modern expositors (and some ancients, e.g. Andreas and Arethas) frequently interpret the seven spirits as angelic beings, perhaps the seven archangels of Jewish angelology, and regard the conception as going back, through the Persian religion, to the Babylonian worship of the sun, moon and five planets, Charles adheres to this view (though regarding their presence here as due to interpolation) because in 3:1 the seven spirits of God appear to be similar to the seven 'stars' (which represent the angels of the churches). But nowhere is it said that these spirits worship God, though all other classes of angelic beings are mentioned as so doing. Concerning 3:1 Kiddle writes, 'When we acknowledge that the seven in each instance conveys the idea of unity and completeness, rather than diversity, so that we are to think of the Spirit and the Church rather than seven Spirits and seven churches, then we are in sight of a possible solution. . . . The seven Spirits and the seven stars . . . are the prophetic Spirit and the celestial character of the Church, in whom the Spirit gives life' (MNTC, 1940, p. 87).

5a Jesus is the faithful witness not alone in respect of this revelation but as concerning the whole truth of God. Cf. Jn. 18:37. He is the first-born of the dead in the sense of being the first to rise from the dead, and so the 'first fruits of those who have fallen asleep' (see 1 Cor. 15:20; Col. 1:18). But John may also be quoting Ps. 89:27, 28. In this passage 'the first-born' was interpreted by the Jews of the Messiah in the sense of 'sovereign' (even God was sometimes called 'first begotten' or 'firstborn'). If this thought predominates in John's mind, then Jesus is here said to be 'sovereign of the dead', a fitting parallel to ruler of kings on earth, both titles being true of Him in virtue of His resurrection.

1:5b, 6 Benediction

The reading lousanti followed by the AV 'washed us' (instead of lysanti, 'loosed us') is almost certainly mistaken, being due perhaps to the influence of 7:14. The difference in tenses in the verbs of this doxology is significant, the love being constant, the redemption once for all. Loosing from sins by blood sets forth redemption in terms of ransom. The whole benediction harks back to the Exodus from Egypt, v. 6 being quoted from Ex. 19:6. Through the deliverance wrought by His death and resurrection, Christ has brought His people out of the bondage of sin and made them a kingdom in which all are priests. Some regard the kingdom as signifying a nation under a king, but in view of such passages as Rev. 5:10; 20:6; 22:5, it seems likely that it here means a nation of kings.

1:7, 8 The second advent

7 reproduces Mt. 24:30, except that the clauses are transposed: 'Then will appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then all the tribes of the earth will mourn, and they will see the Son of man coming on the clouds of heaven with power and great glory.' The declaration links together two OT scriptures, Dn. 7:13 and Zc. 12:10. The corresponding point in the vision of this book is 19:11–21. As at the close of the book, so here, the prophet utters a hearty assent to this promise, 'It is so, Amen.'

8 Alpha and Omega are the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet. It is probable that the phrase translates for Greek readers the Hebrew idiom whereby the first and last letters of the Hebrew alphabet were used to express the entirety of a thing. It was said, e.g., that Adam transgressed the law 'from aleph to tau'; Abraham, on the contrary, kept the law 'from aleph to tau'. Here the meaning is that God is the Lord of all history, its beginning, its end and the whole course between. Such an affirmation is needed by Christians in a day when the powers that be are opposed to the church. We may note that this saying is attributed to Christ in 22:13; older expositors sometimes thought that He is the speaker here also, but clearly the view is mistaken; it is spoken by the Lord God . . . the Almighty, a title which John frequently uses and which, in the LXX of Ho. 12:6 and Am. 9:5, translates the Hebrew 'Lord God of hosts'.

1:9–20 VISION OF THE SON OF MAN

The tribulation and kingdom in which John and his readers share as Christians are a present experience and possession, as also the patient endurance which Jesus supplies. All three elements are gained in union with Him, but the first and third lead to a fuller appropriation of the second at its consummation. Cf. Jn. 16:33; Rom. 5:3; 2 Tim. 2:12. 9 John's share of tribulation is alluded to in the mention of his being in Patmos on account of the word of God and the testimony of Jesus; He was there in consequence of his faithfulness to the gospel, not in voluntary exile to receive more revelations. Cf. Rev. 6:9. The fact that he says he was in Patmos may imply that he wrote the book after leaving the island.

10 I was in the Spirit means that John fell into a state of ecstasy (lit. 'became' in Spirit), so occasioning the vision that follows. It happened on the Lord's day, not, as some take it, 'on the day of the Lord', as though John was transported to live in that day, but 'on the day consecrated to the Lord', a phrase which became technical in the 2nd century for Sunday. The term 'the Lord's day', as Deissmann has shown, is probably the defiant Christian replacement of 'Emperor's day', which was celebrated at least monthly in Asia Minor, if not weekly. This originally indicated the day of the pharaoh's accession to the throne of Egypt, or his birthday (EB, III, p. 2815); the idea was taken over by the Roman emperors. As a memorial of the day of Christ's resurrection, and so of His exaltation to sovereignty, 'the Lord's day' is thus a peculiarly fitting title. The loud voice like a trumpet was presumably that of the Son of man.

11 It is difficult not to feel that seven churches are chosen because of the sacred nature of that number. The seven which were singled out, however, had a special claim to be recipients of these letters, as they lay on a route forming a sort of inner circle round the province of Asia. Moreover, according to Ramsay, these cities were centres of the seven postal districts of this area, and so would be the best centres for circulating the letters to the other churches in the province.

12 The voice here represents the speaker. The seven golden lampstands remind us of the seven-branched lampstand in the Holy Place of the Temple (Ex. 25:31; cf. Zc. 4:2). That Temple, however, had been destroyed and the lampstand transported to a heathen temple in Rome. Where the Jews had failed, the Christian churches were now called to succeed—to be lights in a dark world.

13 The phrase one like a son of man recalls Dn. 7:13; it implies that this Person is not just a man, and doubtless is used with the remembrance of our Lord's use of this title (it does not occur in the Epistles). The description that follows draws freely on Dn. 10:5, 6. The significance of this presence in the midst of the lampstands, i.e. the churches, scarcely requires mention. The word for the robe worn by Christ was used of the high priest's robe; but it is doubtful whether any such association is in mind here for this robe was worn also by men of high rank generally. 14 The description of the white hair is a deliberate reminiscence of Dn. 7:9, where it belongs to the 'Ancient of days'. The application to Christ of the attributes of God is a constant phenomenon in this book. 15 Cf. the feet like burnished bronze with Dn. 2:33–35. Swete thinks the many waters are the Aegean Sea roaring about Patmos.

16 A symbolic picture is given here that was never meant to be painted! The stars are in the power of Christ, the sword symbolizes His judicial authority and might. The sun shining in full strength goes back to Jdg. 5:31 but also recalls the transfiguration (Mt. 17:2).

17 Cf. Dn. 10:9; see also Jos. 5:14; Is. 6:5; Ezk. 1:28. I am the first and the last (also in 2:8 and 22:13) is spoken of Yahweh in Is. 44:6 and 48:12. Its meaning is the same as v. 8. 18 AV 'I am he that liveth, and was dead' is a better translation than RSV. It brings out more sharply the contrast between the eternal life inherent in the Son and the abject death that He suffered. That life triumphed over death, and so I am alive for evermore; this latter predicate is applied to the Father in 4:9, 10 and 10:6. The possession of the keys of Death and Hades was won by His resurrection and signifies the conquest of death.

19 RSV tends to obscure the rough division furnished by this verse of the Revelation given to John. AV and NEB are clearer. 'What you have seen' is the vision just given; 'what is now' relates to the existing state of the churches and the letters about to be given; 'what will be hereafter' is the subsequent visions of the book. This should not be pressed to imply that everything without exception in chs. 4–22 refers to the time future to John, let alone to the time of the end of all things.

20 The seven stars and seven lampstands of the vision are now interpreted for John. The latter represent the churches, but the former are more obscure. It seems strange to interpret the seven stars as being seven angels in the ordinary meaning of the term, even if they are guardian angels; for it would be superfluous to write to them by the agency of John (see, e.g., 2:1) and, in any case, the contents of the letters are wholly concerned with the churches themselves. Many expositors, therefore, hold that the angels represent officials of some kind in the churches, whether delegates or overseers. This is possible, although it is wholly exceptional in apocalyptic for angels to symbolize men. It is perhaps better to regard them as personifying the heavenly or supernatural life of the churches as they are seen in Christ, and so the character which they are called to realize, just as the lampstands represent the earthly life of the churches as men see them outwardly.

2:1 - 3:22 THE LETTERS TO THE SEVEN CHURCHES

It has been suggested that these letters were written earlier than the main part of the book and were sent separately to the churches addressed; later they were amplified and joined together so that all the churches might benefit from them. The theory is not objectionable but it is doubtful, for the letters are closely connected with the beginning and the end of the book; excise the passages involved and what is left constitutes very abrupt messages. Each letter is addressed to the 'angel' of the church and opens with a description of Christ drawn from the introductory vision, the particulars mentioned having special relevance to the church in question. The designation of Christ in the letter to the Laodiceans forms an exception, being a reminiscence of the greeting with which the Revelation commences. Similarly a promise concerning rewards to be bestowed at the second advent concludes each letter; these promises usually have a special fitness for the individual churches and are given a visionary embodiment in the closing chapters of the book.

2:1–7 The letter to the church in Ephesus

Ephesus was the largest city of Asia and the centre of Roman administration in that province. It took the title of 'Temple Warden', originally in reference to the famous temple of Artemis, but later extending to the two or three temples devoted to the cult of the emperors. Here Paul founded the church which became the centre for evangelizing the rest of the province, and here resided the apostle John. The Ephesian church, accordingly, must have become by this time the foremost one in the East, with the possible exception of Antioch. Kiddle suggests that this letter was placed first, not so much because of the importance of the church as of the warning delivered to it. (For a similar reason the letter to the Laodiceans was placed last.)

1 The designation of Christ is both an encouragement and a warning. The seven stars are in His grasp (i.e. He maintains their spiritual life), and His presence is coextensive with all the churches. But the power that sustains is also capable of judicial removal; the title thus prepares the hearer for v. 5. 2, 3 I know is a truth of similar dual import. It heads every one of the seven letters, sometimes imparting comfort (e.g. 2:9, 13, etc.), sometimes causing shame (e.g. 3:1, 15). Here it precedes a commendation. The works of the Ephesians are toil and patient endurance; the former manifests itself in efforts to overcome false teachers, the latter in patient endurance in the face of opposition, whether from false prophets or from other sources. The evil men are those who call themselves prophets, but are not. Cf. Paul's predictions in Acts 20:29, 30; 1 Tim. 4:1–3. It is possible that the chief offenders are the Nicolaitans mentioned in v. 6.

4 The failure of the Ephesians is perhaps the perversion of their chief virtue; opposition to false brethren led to censoriousness and divisiveness in the church, so causing them to leave their first love. This would interpret the love referred to as brotherly love. It may, however, relate to love towards God; cf. Je. 2:2, 5. Since the one manifestation of love is impossible without the other, we may perhaps include both in our text (cf. Mk. 12:30, 31 with 1 Jn. 4:20). 5 I will come to you means that the Lord will 'come' in a special visitation of judgment. See also v. 16. An instance of His 'coming' in blessing is to be found in 3:20. Such statements in no wise conflict with the truth of the final appearing, a fact which theologians have not always remembered when speaking of the 'coming' of Christ to the believer and of His 'advents' in history, as though the recognition of these lesser appearings in any way invalidated the truth of the great appearing.

6 The Nicolaitans were reputed from early times to have been the followers of Nicolaus of Antioch, one of the Seven (Acts 6:5). We gather from 2:14, 15 that they held the same error as the Balaamites, viz. teaching to eat things sacrificed to idols and to commit fornication. These were the chief matters condemned by the decree of the apostolic council (Acts 15:29). It is noteworthy that Balaam and Nicolaus have more or less the same etymology (Balaam—'he has consumed the people'; Nicolaus—'he overcomes the people'). If this is the teaching so strenuously resisted by the Ephesians (see v. 2) then it must have been widespread indeed.

7 The injunction He who has an ear . . . is repeated in connection with the promises to the overcomer in all the seven letters. It is frequently on the lips of our Lord in the Gospel records (Mt. 13:9, 43, etc.). The Spirit is the Holy Spirit, yet the speaker is Christ. For a similar phenomenon cf. Rom. 8:9–11 and 2 Cor. 3:17. The 'conqueror' depicts the Christian as a faithful warrior for Christ, 'the victorious member of the Church, as such, apart from all consideration of the circumstances' (Swete). There seems little justification for limiting the term, as some would wish, to the martyrs only, though it is true that the conqueror can finally demonstrate the completeness of his victory only by remaining faithful unto death. Cf. 2 Esdras 7:57, 58: 'This is the meaning of the contest which every man who is born on earth shall wage, that if he is defeated he shall suffer . . . , but if he is victorious he shall receive what you have said' (i.e. paradise).

To eat of the tree of life is to partake of the fullness of eternal life; the tree is situated in the paradise of God, the heavenly Jerusalem that is to be manifested on earth for redeemed man (see 21:10; 22:2). The blessings of the first creation, lost by man, are restored in yet fuller measure 'in the new world' (Mt. 19:28).

2:8–11 The letter to the church in Smyrna

This city was one of the most prosperous in Asia Minor and took the name of 'metropolis'. Here the Jews were unusually numerous and powerful; their bitter antagonism to the Christian church appears not only in this letter but in that of Ignatius to the Smyrnaeans.

8 This title of Christ appears in 1:17. This church, shortly to be severely tested, needed to be reminded that their Saviour was Lord of history and conqueror of death (cf. v. 10). Contrast the condition of the Christians in Smyrna with the material wealth and spiritual poverty of the Laodiceans (3:17). 9 The slander of the Jews would be against Jesus primarily, but they were capable of slandering even the God they confessed. The Smyrnaean Christians later reported that the Jews joined the pagans in clamouring for the death of Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, on the ground of his opposition to the state religion! Hence, instead of their constituting an assembly of God, they had become the synagogue of Satan (see also 3:9). Since it is denied that the Jews had a right to retain their national name, it is evident that Christians are regarded as the true heirs of Abraham, as in Rom. 2:28. The things which the believers here are about to suffer may be connected with the opposition of the Jews.

10 Such distress is to extend for ten days, i.e. a short period. It is sometimes held to be identical with the 'great tribulation' of 7:14, but it seems more likely that a local persecution is in mind. The devil ('slanderer') will then be a means of testing the Christians; such testing by persecution is to be distinguished from that mentioned in 3:10, the hour of testing which is to come upon the whole world, for from the latter the Christians are to be preserved (cf. 7:2f., 12:6). The crown of life alludes to the wreath bestowed on the winner in the games, 'the crown which consists of life'. Swete points out that the crown is not a diadem, but an emblem of festivity. In this case the wreath is a fitting symbol of life, for the latter has to be understood in the light of the closing descriptions of the book, a life of holy privilege, enjoyment, and of distinctions of awards (cf. 1 Cor. 9:25, 27).

11 The second death is defined in 21:8 as 'the lake that burns with fire and brimstone'. It is a rabbinic phrase; cf. the oft-quoted Jerusalem Targum on Dt. 33:6, 'Let Reuben live in this age and not die the second death whereof the wicked die in the next world.' Charles aptly compares 1 Enoch 99:11, 'woe to you who spread evil to your neighbours, for you shall be slain in Sheol', a concept which did not imply annihilation, as 1 Enoch 109:3 makes clear.

2:12–17 The letter to the church in Pergamum

Pergamum (RV) was described by Arethas as 'given to idolatry more than all Asia'. Behind the city stood a hill, 1,000 feet high, covered with heathen temples. Foremost of all was the huge altar of Zeus on a platform cut out of the rock, dominating the city. Emperor-worship was established there earlier than at Ephesus or Smyrna so that in due course Pergamum became the recognized centre of the cult in Asia. Hence it was said of this church that it dwelt 'where Satan's throne is' (v. 13). Herein lay the cause of the peculiar difficulties of the Christians of Pergamum.

12 The title echoes 1:16 and anticipates 2:16. 13 My faith abbreviates 'faith in me'. 14 The information as to Balaam's teaching is gained through combining Nu. 25:1, 2 with 31:16. The Christian counterpart of Balaam probably despised the flesh, and so discounted the importance of physical purity, justifying his actions, perhaps, by the perversion of Paul's teaching (repudiated by him in Rom. 3:8 and 6:1), 'Let us continue in sin, that grace may abound.' 15 The meaning is either, 'You also have in your midst Nicolaitans, who teach as Balaam taught Israel', or 'You also, as well as the Ephesians (v. 6), have the Nicolaitans with you', the comparison with Balaam being implicit. The former meaning seems preferable.

16 presents a preliminary 'second advent' to judgment if the Pergamenes do not repent. See note on 2:5. 17 The promise to the conqueror alludes to the current Jewish expectation that manna would descend from heaven again when Messiah is manifested. See 2 Baruch 29:8. Here, of course, the manna typifies spiritual life, just as the 'water of life' (Rev. 22:17). The promise is particularly fitting for those tempted to join in festivities in which food sacrificed to idols was eaten. Denying themselves those dainties, the Christians were to look forward to richer fare in the kingdom of God.

The white stone is difficult to interpret owing to the many uses to which pebbles were put by the world of antiquity, each use yielding an excellent symbolic sense. A white stone given by a jury to one on trial signified acquittal, a black one guilt. The victor's pebble gave him entrance to all public festivals. The tessera hospitalis was in two parts, inscribed with two names and exchanged, so that each person had an open invitation to the house of the other. The high priest had twelve stones on his breastplate inscribed with the names of the twelve tribes. This by no means exhausts the possibilities.

Our interpretation will be partly conditioned by our understanding of the new name which is engraved on the stone. If the name is of Christ or of God (cf. 3:12 and 19:12), then there may be an allusion to the concept of the power inherent in the name of God; the Christian shares God's might and appropriates for himself, in a manner none other can, the character of God. If the name is a new one bestowed on the Christian, then the allusion is to the habit of bestowing new names on persons who have attained to a new status, as Abram and Jacob became Abraham and Israel; the white stone then signifies the overcomer's right to enter the kingdom of God in a character all of his own, moulded by the grace of God in him.

2:18–29 The letter to the church in Thyatira

Thyatira was the smallest of the seven cities. It had no temple devoted to the worship of the emperors, so that Christians here were not so troubled by the cult as those in the preceding churches. The problem of this church centred in the compromising situations created by commercial interests. Thyatira was an industrial city, renowned for its many trade guilds. To these societies it was as necessary to belong as it is for the modern artisan to be a member of his appropriate trade union; otherwise it involved an ostracism that would make business all but impossible. The difficulty in the path of the Christian linking up with such guilds was the necessity of joining in the periodical common meals when meat was eaten that had been dedicated to a pagan deity (perhaps the patron god of the guild). One can well see that certain broad-minded Christians would not hesitate to participate in such festivities, holding that 'an idol has no real existence' (1 Cor. 8:4). Excuse might soon be found for the licentiousness in which these meals so often culminated; and the next step would be to join in the general debauchery. This was openly advocated by the Nicolaitans, and one can understand how it found such a ready acceptance in Thyatira where 'business is business' would be the common sentiment.

18 The description of the eyes and feet is taken from 1:14, 15. The eyes like a flame of fire anticipate v. 23. 19 Charles holds that your works are defined by the qualities that follow, love and faith and service and patient endurance. If this is a correct reading, it is important for the interpretation of what the writer means by being 'judged by what they had done' (20:12–14).

20 The prophetess who imparts the teaching of the Nicolaitans is symbolically named Jezebel, for the queen of that name tried to establish an idolatrous cult in place of the worship of Yahweh and was herself accused of whoredom and witchcraft (2 Ki. 9:22). Note the curious insertion in some MSS of the possessive pronoun 'your' requiring the translation 'your wife Jezebel' instead of 'the woman Jezebel'. This would imply that the 'angel' of the church was its overseer.

21 From this verse we infer that 'Jezebel' had been earlier warned, without avail, either by John or by some other Christian leader. 22, 23 The bed into which Jezebel is to be cast is paralleled by great tribulation, so that it is a bed of suffering which is here meant. Hence RSV translates sickbed and NEB 'bed of pain'. The idiom is a Hebrew one and occurs in 1 Macc. 1:5 and Judith 8:3. It is possible that those who commit adultery with her are to be distinguished from her children in the sense that the former were sufficiently influenced by Jezebel as to compromise their Christian loyalties, the latter wholly embraced her doctrine; the former are to be chastised, the latter exterminated. By such judgments the churches will realize that Christ searches mind (lit. 'kidneys') and heart. In Hebrew usage, the kidneys are the seat of the emotions while the heart is the seat of the intellect.

24 The deep things of Satan may be a satirical allusion to the Gnostic claim exclusively to know the deep things of God; such wisdom is satanically inspired, not divine. Otherwise it reflects Nicolaitan teaching that the Christian should bodily participate in the excesses of heathenism and demonstrate that he is immune from their pollution. Christians who acted in this fashion boasted of their knowledge of the deep things of Satan and so scorned their more scrupulous brethren. For I do not lay upon you any other burden, cf. Acts 15:28, 29; the two chief precepts of the apostolic council were abstention from food sacrificed to idols and from immorality. 25 This exhortation to perseverance occurs again at 3:11.

26, 27 The conqueror is here defined as he who keeps my works until the end. He is to receive a delegation of Christ's authority over the nations and share in His triumph over the rebellious peoples; the latter function is part of the former and anticipates the coming of Christ to judgment (19:11f.) rather than the millennial rule proper (20:4–6). The verb translated rule in v. 27 means 'shepherd'. But the reference to the rod of iron and 'smashing them to bits like earthenware' (NEB) shows that it is used here in the sense of 'destroy'. 28 The morning star appears to be Christ Himself (as in 22:16); greater than the privilege of ruling for Christ will be the unhindered enjoyment of His fellowship.

3:1–6 The letter to the church in Sardis

Sardis was a city of bygone glory. Once the capital of the ancient kingdom of Lydia, it sank into oblivion after the Persian conquest until Tiberius rebuilt it after an earthquake. The city was well known for two things: its dyeing and woollen industries, and its profligacy. The church in Sardis appears to reflect the history of the city; once it had a name for spiritual achievement, now it was lifeless (v. 1); licentiousness marked the Christians as well as the pagans, so that only a few had 'not soiled their garments' (v. 4), i.e. besmirched their Christian profession. Accordingly it was censured with a stringency surpassed only in the letter to the Laodiceans.

1 The title reflects 1:4 and 1:6. Christ is spoken of as the possessor of the seven Spirits, possibly to represent His complete knowledge of the deeds of the churches (see 5:6), though it may also hint at the spiritual gifts He is ready to impart in contrast to the lifelessness of the church. For the seven stars, see on 1:4, 20. Note that, although some Christians remain faithful to their Lord (cf. v. 4), the church as a whole is characterized as dead; for that condition all are held responsible. 2 For the first half, cf. Mt. 24:42; for the latter half cf. Dn. 5:27. 3 The tenses are unusually varied: 'Keep in mind (present) how you received and still hold on to the gift of God (perfect) and how you gave a hearing (aorist) to the gospel; continue to hold it fast (present) and bring yourself to repentance (aorist).' If you will not awake echoes Mt. 24:43, 44 and refers to the final advent. Some scholars consider that Rev. 16:15 has been displaced and should immediately precede this statement. Certainly 16:15 reads strangely in its present position and accords well here, but admittedly the suggestion is pure conjecture.

4 The Christians who soiled their garments presumably did so by accommodating themselves to the heathen customs of their neighbours. He who maintained in purity his character and testimony was to accompany the Christ in a robe of greater glory. For the walking with Christ Swete compares the companying of the Twelve with Him in the days of His ministry. The conqueror is doubly assured of this privilege. Contemporary apocalyptic literature viewed the resurrection body as a garment of glory. The idea is used by Paul (e.g. 2 Cor. 5:4), and seems to appear in this book also (e.g. 4:4). But 7:13, 14; 19:8 seem to have moral purity chiefly in mind in the use of this symbol, while, as Swete points out, the wearing of white sometimes expresses festivity (Ec. 9:8) and victory (2 Macc. 11:8). It would appear that a complexity of ideas attaches to this picture; it is wiser to accept the whole yet to recognize that the ethical element is especially in mind.

5 His name. Names, according to a contemporary usage, are synonymous with 'persons'. The blotting out from the book of life recalls Ex. 32:32, where the book is a register of the citizens of the theocratic kingdom; here it is the register of the eternal kingdom, as in Dn. 12:1 and many NT passages (see Lk. 10:20; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23). See Rev. 20:12, 15 where this is explained. For the confession of the victor cf. Mt. 10:32.

3:7–13 The letter to the church in Philadelphia

Philadelphia, owing to its frequent earthquakes, had a small population; the church appears to have been correspondingly feeble (see v. 8, 'you have but little power'). There is no hint of persecution from pagan authorities, nor of heresies within the church; as at Smyrna, the Jews created the trouble here (v. 9). In impressive contrast to the letter that precedes and that which follows, there is neither rebuke nor warning from the Lord for this church, but simply commendation and exhortation.

7 The predicates holy and true, here applied to Christ, are in 6:10 referred to God, one of the many indications in this book that the attributes of God are shared by Christ. Jesus is true in the sense of 'true to His word', i.e. faithful. This is spoken in connection with His possessing the key of David, a phrase that recalls 1:18 but actually quotes Is. 22:22; it claims for Christ the power of admitting individuals or shutting them out from the city of David, the new Jerusalem, the Messianic kingdom.

8, 9 The relevance of this appears in the parenthesis of v. 8 and again in v. 9. The Jews of the city were no more worthy to be called Jews than their compatriots in Smyrna, and like them are designated a synagogue of Satan. V. 9 declares that one day, presumably at the establishment of the Messianic kingdom, they will be forced to recognize that these despised Christians are in truth the companions of the Son of man, the heirs of the kingdom of God. This latter claim the Jews had evidently so far denied. 'You Christians', said they, 'are excluded from the kingdom; it is for us Jews.' 'Not so', declares the Lord; 'I am true to my promise. I alone have the key of admission to the kingdom. I have set before my people a door of entrance into it which no-one can shut. They shall enter the kingdom, and the homage which you Jews expect the Gentiles to pay you (Is. 60:14) you will have to render to them.' This interpretation gives coherence to apparently disconnected statements and accords with the promise of v. 12. The faithfulness of this struggling community (v. 8) is to have its fitting compensation.

10 The hour of trial from which the Lord is to preserve these Christians is not the 'time' during which the judgments of God are on the earth, but the trials themselves. Cf. Mk. 14:35, where 'hour' represents the horrors of the cross and its attendant circumstances. The tribulation spoken of is directed towards those who dwell upon the earth, a phrase technical in this book for the unbelievers of the world (cf. 11:10). For a pictorial representation of this promise see 7:1–4. 11 Cf. 2:25. A note of urgency is now introduced. It appears again in the final chapter (see 22:7, 12, 20).

12 The conqueror is to be a pillar in the temple of the new age; 21:22 makes it clear that there is to be no Temple other than God and the Lamb in the heavenly Jerusalem. The promise here given is thus an assurance of inseparable unity with God in the eternity that is to be. I I will write on him the name of my God continues the metaphor of the pillar, so that the inscription is thought to be on the pillar and not on the victor's forehead, we may perhaps refer to 1 Macc. 14:26–48, which relates how the deeds of Simon Maccabaeus were inscribed on tablets of brass; these tablets were fixed 'upon pillars on Mount Zion', 'in a conspicuous place in the precincts of the sanctuary'. A permanent record of Simon's greatness was thus ensured. The boast of the conqueror, however, is not to be in his deeds but that he bears the name of God, and of the city of God, and Christ's new name; i.e. he belongs to God and to Christ manifested in glory (19:12), and is a citizen of the new Jerusalem, the eternal kingdom of God (21:2).

3:14–22 The letter to the church in Laodicea

Laodicea was situated on the bank of a river and stood at the junction of three great roads traversing Asia Minor. Naturally enough it became a large commercial and administrative centre. Three facts known about the city throw light on this letter: it was a banking centre and extremely wealthy; it manufactured clothing and woollen carpets; it had a medical school. The church was not accused of immorality, nor of idolatry, nor of open apostasy (persecution was unknown in Laodicea). The terrible condemnation pronounced over it was due to the pride and self-satisfaction of the pagan element within the church, so that it was all but entirely devoid of fellowship with Christ. The stern characterization of its spiritual condition (v. 17) and the admonition to repentance (v. 18) are both couched in terms of the three activities of the city.

14 As the Amen Jesus is the embodiment of the truthfulness and faithfulness of God (see Is. 65:16, RV mg.); the Christian use of 'Amen' adds the thought that He is also the Guarantor and Executor of the declared purposes of God. Such a designation stands in vivid contrast to the faithlessness of the Laodiceans. Similarly the title the beginning of God's creation (better translated 'the principle' or 'source' of creation) exalts Christ as Creator above the proud but puny creatures that boast in their self-sufficiency. 16 There is written a condemnation unequalled in the NT as an expression of the abhorrence of Christ. The reference is to the last judgment (cf. Lk. 13:25–28).

17, 18 form one statement: For you say. . . . Therefore I counsel you to buy. . . . The claim of the Laodiceans is not merely that they need nothing, but that their wealth, moral as well as material, is entirely due to their own efforts. Their real condition is shown to be one of poverty, in spite of their money; nakedness, despite their abundance of cloth; blindness, though they have many physicians. This church, therefore, alone of all the seven, is called 'the pitiable one'. Their only recourse is to 'buy' (cf. Is. 55:1) from Christ the tested gold of a regenerate spirit, purity of heart that may issue in resurrection glory (Rev. 7:13, 14) and grace to enable them to perceive spiritual realities (cf. 1 Cor. 3 and 2 Cor. 4). The nauseating condition of the Laodiceans has not quenched the love of Christ for them; His scathing judgments are but the expression of a deep affection that would lead them to repentance. The gracious invitation that follows is given, not to the church collectively (which would demand 'if you hear my voice . . .'), but to each individual within it, an offer of Christ to be a partner even in the commonest activities of life. Commensurate with the high privilege offered to these all but apostate Christians is a promise transcending the six that have preceded. Just as the believer asks Christ to share his domain in this transitory life, so the Lord will invite him, if he endures to the end, to share the throne given Him by the Father in the ages that are to be. The fulfilment of the promise is portrayed in Rev. 20:4–6, the millennial rule, and 22:5, the eternal reign in the new Jerusalem.

4:1 - 5:14 THE VISION OF HEAVEN

The scene of John's vision changes from earth to heaven and remains there until ch. 10, after which the point of view continually alternates. It is noticeable that, whereas the description of the throne of God in ch. 4 contains no reference to Christ, in the following chapter He dominates the picture as the slain Lamb of God. Concerning this Kiddle writes, 'In iv, the theme is that of the omnipotent Creator, reigning majestic and remote in a heaven from which man is excluded. The God whom John sees is the heaven of the old dispensation. In v, the focus of the seer's eyes changes, and with incomparable dramatic force he describes his vision of the Redeemer in whom lies every hope of man's salvation, every hope of a future kingdom of justice' (MNTC, p. 67).

4:1 The first voice, which I heard speaking is that of Christ. As the Lord revealed the true condition of His churches and His position in relation to them, so He now opens heaven to John's view, and His position in relation to that. The former was a revelation of 'what is'; this begins the unveiling of what must take place after this (cf. 1:19).

2 The fact that John saw a door opened in heaven implies that he was already in an ecstatic condition; the statement at once I was in the spirit, accordingly, may well indicate a yet higher degree of spiritual exaltation. The first object to catch John's eye was a throne. That is important; it hints that the first thing to be known about heaven is that the God who dwells therein possesses absolute authority over the universe. 3 The prophet does not describe God; he simply speaks of various colours seen through the light of a many-hued cloud, colours such as can emanate only from precious stones. Doubt attaches to the stones enumerated by John, but the most treasured type of jasper was green, the carnelian was red, while the word translated emerald is thought to be the rock crystal which shows a rainbow of prismatic colours. The object of the rainbow is primarily to conceal the form of God; yet it is significant that a rainbow and not an ordinary cloud performs this service, for the bow is a perpetual reminder of God's covenant to restrain His wrath from man on earth (Gn. 9:13); the memorial of the covenant in heaven is thus nothing less than the glory of God which hides Him from angelic view.

4 The twenty-four elders, though subordinate to the four living creatures (see v. 6), are mentioned before them, perhaps so as not to interrupt the description of the latter's activities. From the characteristics of the elders, as they appear in the subsequent visions, it is manifest that they are angelic beings; it is nevertheless not impossible to conceive of them as also the heavenly representatives of the people of God in their twofold aspect as priests and kings, in which case the number twenty-four, with its reminiscence of twelve tribes and twelve apostles, fittingly symbolizes the Messianic people of both dispensations, as the church has delighted to recognize. This view, however, is to be distinguished from that which regards the elders as a symbol for the people of God removed from earth and present in heaven.

5 For the seven Spirits of God see 5:6. 6 It is not said that the sea of glass is a literal sea but that it looks like one, as it were a sea. . . . It is an adaptation of the conception of waters above the firmament (Gn. 1:7; see 2 Enoch 3:3), but is here introduced to emphasize the remoteness of the majesty of God. Four living creatures stand round the throne. Their description is drawn from Ezekiel's vision of the cherubim (Ezk. 1), but considerably modified. The chief differences are that the cherubim in Ezekiel each have four faces; here they have only one. The former possess 'wheels . . . full of eyes round about', but here the creatures themselves possess the eyes. 7, 8 The ceaseless worship rendered to God by them may well represent the subjection of all nature to God. The Jews themselves interpreted Ezekiel's vision in this way, regarding the man as chief representative of creatures, the eagle of birds, the lion of beasts, and the ox of cattle. The ancient symbolizing of the four winds and the four chief constellations of the Zodiac by these four figures, if known to John, would but serve to strengthen this view. The song of the cherubim implies that the certainty of the future triumph of God is rooted in His very nature; the Lord, who is holy and almighty, is to come.

9, 10 The thanksgiving of the living creatures, inspiring the renunciation by the twenty-four elders of their crowns, is not the continual worship of v. 8 but adoration given in special crises. See, e.g., 5:8 and 14; 11:15–18; 19:4. 11 The elders recognize that only one is worthy to take preeminence in creation, and He the Creator. He willed the existence of all things. He has the right to deal with them in sovereign freedom. All creation should acknowledge its subjection to Him and ascribe the glory and the honour and the power to His name.

5:1 The Seer continues to describe what he saw. In the right hand of the Lord on the throne is a book, or scroll, sealed with seven seals. There has been much speculation as to the nature of the book so represented, but we shall not go far wrong in believing that it contains the record of God's judgments and redemption that issue in the kingdom of glory. It is a book of destiny, the Author of which is God. More precisely, it may well be that a testament is in mind. Zahn writes, 'The word biblion itself permits of many interpretations, but for the readers of that time it was designated by the seven seals on its back beyond possibility of a mistake. Just as in Germany before the introduction of money orders everyone knew that a letter sealed with five seals contained money, so the most simple member of the Asiatic churches knew that a biblion made fast with seven seals was a testament. When a testator died the testament was brought forward, and, when possible, opened in the presence of the seven witnesses who sealed it; i.e. it was unsealed, read aloud and executed. . . . The document with seven seals is a symbol of the promise of a future kingdom. The disposition long ago occurred and was documented and sealed, but it was not yet carried out . . .' (Introduction to the New Testament, 1909, Vol. III, pp. 393f.). It is an attractive interpretation, and is not to be set aside on the ground that the seals are opened singly and each direction carried out separately; it was quite possible to construct a roll so sealed as to open in this manner. In any case the chief point in view is that the judgments and the kingdom are alike willed by God and subject to the authority of His Christ.

2 The angel needs to be strong since his voice has to carry throughout heaven, earth and the realm of the dead (v. 3). 3 Under the earth signifies Hades (cf. Eph. 4:9; Phil. 2:10). 5 The Lion of the tribe of Judah (Gn. 49:9), the Root of David (Is. 11:1, 10), won the victory for all time by virtue of His death and resurrection, so as to open the scroll and its seven seals. The redemption wrought by Christ had in view the establishment of God's kingdom in power. 6 The description of the Lamb combines two very different uses of this figure in Hebrew thought. It stands as though it had been slain and so reminds us of the slaughtered lamb of Is. 53:7; Jesus is the Servant of Yahweh, suffering in innocence for the sake of men. On the other hand, the lamb has seven horns. A horn in the OT symbolizes power (Ps. 75:4–7) and royal dignity (Zc. 1:18). Jesus has kingly power in a complete measure (the significance of seven); by His victory He fulfils the hope of Judaism that a Warrior-Lamb should arise and redeem Israel from her enemies (see, e.g., Testament of Simeon 19:8). The nature of Christ's redemptive victory, however, was far removed from the current expectations of the Jews. Observe that the once-slain Lamb possesses the seven Spirits of God sent out into all the earth. Cf. Jn. 16:7f. In the OT the seven eyes (signifying omniscience) belong to Yahweh (cf. Zc. 4:10).

8 Though the four creatures fall down in worship with the twenty-four elders, it seems that only the latter have the harps and bowls of incense. The angelic nature of the elders is confirmed by the description of their offering up of the prayers of the saints; in Judaism this task is performed by the archangels (see Tobit 12:15; Testament of Levi 3:7). 9, 10 The creatures and the elders sing a new song, because Christ has opened a new era by His redemptive work and is shortly to consummate His victory in the triumphant kingdom of God. Cf. Is. 42:9, 10, which speaks of the new song in a similar context. The redemption is viewed as a purchase, at the price of Christ's life, a ransoming from the enslaving and hostile power of sin. The figure must not be pressed so as to answer, or even pose, the query 'To whom was the price paid?' That question was never meant to be asked. To be a kingdom and priests was Israel's vocation (Ex. 19:6), a privilege given also to the church (1 Pet. 2:9). The RV follows the harder, and therefore more likely, reading in the second half of v. 10, 'they reign (not shall reign) upon the earth'. Possibly this conveys the notion that Christians, not imperial dignitaries, are the true sovereigns of earth even in this dispensation. More probably it is a proleptic reference to the millennial rule of the saints (see 20:4–6), in which case it is erroneous to regard the millennium as the reign of the risen martyrs only, for this reference includes the whole church.

11–14 The angelic multitudes now take up the song of praise to the Lamb (cf. Dn. 7:10). The doxology has reference to the power and blessings received by Christ on the commencement of His Messianic reign (see 11:17). All creation in heaven earth, sea and Hades (v. 13) joins the host of angels and archangels. They sing the praise, not of the Lamb alone, not of God alone, but of God and the Lamb jointly. The exalted position of Christ in relation to God and the universe could not be more clearly set forth.

6:1 – 8:5 THE SEVEN SEALS

Many complex elements flow together to form the panorama which the prophet now describes. The division of the Messianic woes into seven may ultimately go back to the doom prophecy of Lv. 26 where four times it is stated 'I will chastise you . . . sevenfold for your sins' (vv. 18, 21, 24, 28). If that be so, the appropriateness of the testament with its seven seals to portray these judgments is a secondary factor and not the cause of the sevenfold division. Moreover, Charles has pointed out that our Lord's eschatological discourse contains the seven judgments enumerated by John; in Luke's Gospel (see ch. 21) they are in the same order, except that John places the earthquakes last, owing to his consistent portrayal of earthquakes as the immediate precursor of the consummation; see 8:5; 11:13; 16:18. Thus, in respect of the content of the seals, the prophet has apparently followed our Lord's discourse; but for the form of the opening four judgments he has used a vision of Zechariah (the vision of four chariots and horses that go to the four quarters of the earth, Zc. 6), adapting the symbolism to suit his purpose.

6:1, 2 The first seal

1 Come! The command is directed to the rider who appears on the opening of the seal. The same is true of vv. 3, 5, 7.

Many interpreters regard the conquering horseman as Christ and compare the vision of the returning Lord in 19:11f. It must be admitted, however, that the only thing in common with the two pictures is the white horse, which is a symbol of victory. Others hold that the ride represents the triumph of the gospel, and cite Mk. 13:10. This latter suggestion is more plausible, but in view of the similarity of the four riders it seems more natural to interpret all as portraying the last judgments. This horseman signifies invasion, or warfare generally.

6:3, 4 The second seal

4 The strife created by the rider on the horse that was bright red appears to denote both international and civil warfare. This doubling of the first woe has caused some to feel that the first rider represents a specific victorious empire (especially the Parthian) while the second has a general reference. This is possible, but it should be noted that the same repetition occurs in each report of the eschatological discourse (Mt. 24:6, 7; Mk. 13:7, 8; Lk. 21:9, 10).

6:5, 6 The third seal

The rider on a black horse denotes famine. The balance in his hand suggests scarcity of food. The prices quoted are prohibitive. A denarius was a labourer's day wages (Mt. 20:1f.); a quart of wheat (Gk. choinix) would suffice for one man's daily ration, but not for his family. Wheat would therefore be unprocurable by the poor. Three quarts of barley would go further, but even so it would still remain a bare subsistence allowance with the possibility of starvation in some instances. On the other hand, but do not harm oil and wine presupposes ample supplies of less needed goods. A few years before the writing of this book (AD 92), an acute shortage of cereals, together with an abundance of wine in the Empire, caused Domitian to order the restriction of vine cultivation and an increase of corn growing; the order created such a furore it had to be abandoned. The text may have such a situation in mind.

6:7, 8 The fourth seal

Hades followed, accompanied by Death, a reminder that not even physical death would give respite to sinners; the nether world and the judgment awaited them. For the four plagues—sword, and famine, and pestilence (translated 'death' in the LXX), and beasts—see Ezk. 14:12–21.

6:9–11 The fifth seal

9 The souls of the martyrs were said to be under the altar because they had been 'sacrificed'; cf. Phil. 2:17; 2 Tim. 4:6. This position was one of honour, not humiliation. Charles quotes Aqiba as saying, 'Whoever was buried in the land of Israel was just as if he were buried under the altar, and whoever was buried under the altar was just as if he were buried under the throne of glory' (Pirqe Aboth R.M. 26). The martyrs were slain 'for the testimony (given by Jesus; see 12:17) which they held' (AV). This translation is to be preferred to RSV's for the witness they had borne; the testimony was that which they had received, not given. 10, 11 The white robe given to the martyrs signifies a pledge of the glorious immortality to be bestowed at the 'first resurrection' (20:4–6), with perhaps a hint that the victory was already theirs. Observe that this incident forms an integral part of the last judgments on earth, for the prayer for vengeance (v. 10) is answered and the end thereby hastened; see 8:1–5. For the thought that the coming of the day of God tarries for the last martyr, cf. 2 Esdras 4:33–36.

6:12–17 The sixth seal

The description of the effects of the sixth seal draws from numerous scriptures, including the Gospels. The underlying thought of these cosmic disturbances is, perhaps, the impossibility that life should continue under such circumstances; the End is at hand, 'the great day of . . . wrath has come' (v. 17).

12 For the earthquake as a sign of the End, cf. Ezk. 38:19f.; for the sun and moon, Joel 2:31. 13, 14 For the falling of stars and the rolling up of heaven, cf. Is. 34:4. 15, 16 For the hiding in the rocks, cf. Is. 2:10; for the prayer to the mountains, Ho. 10:8. Note the sevenfold classification of mankind here. Every one, slave and free is included; but particular attention is drawn to the great and powerful. The wrath of the Lamb shows the Christ in the character hinted at in His possession of seven horns (5:6), i.e. complete power to establish righteousness and execute justice (cf. 6:10). 17 For the great and unbearable day of wrath, cf. Joel 2:11. These signs of the consummation are too regular in eschatological writings for them to be regarded as wholly figurative. Yet that they are not to be taken too literally appears from the picture of heaven being removed as a scroll at the close of the millennial age (20:11), and the imploring by men that the mountains, which have already moved out of their place, should fall on them.

7:1–17 An interlude between the sixth and seventh seals

An interlude in the progress of the visions is given in chapter 7. It explains the position of Christians during the execution of the judgments that have been described. First a backward look is taken, to show how the church is secured from the evils experienced by the godless world, then a forward look enables the Seer to relate the fulfilment of God's act of protection; he sees the triumphant people of God at the close of the great distress, arrayed in splendour and ascribing their salvation to the grace of God and the Lamb (v. 11). There seems little doubt that the two companies here in view are essentially the same. The 144,000 out of every tribe of the children of Israel (v. 4) symbolize the entire church of the end-time; this is implied by v. 3, for 'the servants of our God' in the Christian dispensation can only be the church. Further, since the distresses of the last days are world-wide the whole company of God's people need His protection, not simply one section of it (the Jews).

1 After this marks a new vision; it is not a note of time in relation to the events of the previous vision but introduces a fresh comprehension of truth by the prophet. For the purpose of this vision the earth is regarded as rectangular, an angel standing at each corner governing the destructive wind that blows from his quarter. 2–4 No further description is supplied to relate what happens when the four angels let loose their winds. Possibly John here recounts an earlier vision that portrayed the sealing of God's people against destruction caused by the four winds in the last days; the fury of winds would represent the whole manifestation of judgment symbolized by the seals, trumpets and bowls. For the thought of sealing the saints in a time of peril, cf. Ezk. 9. The 144,000 symbolizes 'fixedness and full completion, 12×12 taken a thousandfold' (Alford). Israel was often referred to as 'the twelve tribes' to denote the whole nation without any thought of its constituent parts (Acts 26:7).

5–8 The enumeration of the tribes one by one here serves to emphasize the completeness of the number of God's saints for whom He cares during the coming ordeal. For the church as the true Israel cf. Rom. 2:28, 29; Gal. 3:29; 6:16; Phil. 3:3; Jas. 1:1; 1 Pet. 1:1 with 2:9. The order of the tribes is curious in a number of ways. Judah heads the list, an unusual procedure amongst the Jews; here it is because it is the tribe of the Messiah. Dan is omitted whereas Manasseh appears, although the latter is included in Joseph. Irenaeus explained this as being due to the ancient belief that antichrist was to spring from Dan. The half-tribe of Manasseh was then inserted to make up the number twelve. Buchanan Gray discovered that if vv. 5c, 6 (i.e. Gad to Manasseh) were placed after v. 8, the list would conform to the usual enumeration of the Jewish tribes by which they are arranged according to descent from their mothers: the sons of Leah are Judah to Zebulun; the son of Rachel, Joseph and Benjamin; the sons of Leah's handmaid, Gad and Asher; the sons of Rachel's handmaid, Naphtali and Dan (here replaced by Manasseh). It is possible, therefore, that our text originally maintained this order but suffered a dislocation by a copyist in early days.

9 After this again marks a logical rather than a chronological sequence. The result of the sealing of Christ's faithful followers is their ultimate vindication in glory. A great multitude; the church is seen triumphant in heaven. White robes signify resurrection glory, and palm branches victory and gladness after war (cf. Mk. 11:8; 1 Macc. 13:51). 10 Salvation belongs to our God . . . and to the Lamb echoes Ps. 3:8; see also Rev. 19:1. The victors here ascribe their redemption to God and the Lamb. 12 The Amen of the angelic orders endorses the praise of the redeemed multitude, while they, too, add their thanksgiving.

13, 14 John's answer to the elder's question implies 'I also would like to know'. The great tribulation out of which the multitude has come is not intended as a general designation of tribulation, which is the Christian's normal lot, (the omission by AV of the definite article gives this impression), but has specific reference to the trial at the close of this age. On the other hand, there is no warrant for the common assumption that the multitude consists of martyrs only. The vision depicts the scene after the cessation of trials (the present tense 'come' (RV) is to be understood in the light of the statement 'they have washed their robes and made them white . . .'); it thus has in mind one generation only of Christians, the last. Yet the latter part of this section seems to refer to the whole church.

The difficulty is relieved if we remember that the Seer prophesies a day that to him is almost on the horizon; he has no thought of intervening ages. The last persecution may come at any moment. The church was still in its second generation and John had no reason to anticipate a third. The glorification of the bride with her Lord was at hand. To his mind, therefore, to speak of Christians who came through 'the great ordeal' (NEB) was to denominate the major part of the church. Those who had gone before, having witnessed a good confession, would doubtless be included in this throng, but it was superfluous to mention them. The church of the present was the subject in view and it fills John's canvas. For us, nearly two millennia later, the church is mainly the church triumphant in heaven; it is therefore possible to recognize that the AV rendering is spiritually true, 'These are they which came out of great tribulation . . .' and read therein our own names.

They have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb is a symbolic expression, not to be taken literally, of the forgiveness of sins through faith in the Christ who died for men. It is possible to translate, as some do in 12:11, 'in the blood of the Lamb' as 'through the blood of the Lamb'; the washing and making white of robes then signifies the overcoming of sin in life by virtue of the power of Christ's atonement, a retrospect on the whole struggle of life rather than on the moment of conversion.

15 Charles translates the last part of the verse, 'He that sitteth upon the throne shall cause his Shekinah to abide upon them.' The phrase is unique. The Shekinah was the manifestation of God's presence amongst men, especially in the Tabernacle and the Temple at Jerusalem. After the pilgrimage through the wilderness it was of very rare occurrence in Israel; to the Christian it is promised as a constant privilege. 16, 17 are a statement drawn from Is. 49:10 and 29:8: Christ assuages the thirst of man by providing in Himself the antidote to his restlessness, the complete counterpart to man's unsatisfied desires.

8:1–5 The seventh seal

1 A silence in heaven occurred in order to hear the prayers of the saints. There is a Jewish tradition that 'in the fifth heaven are companies of angels of service who sing praises by night but are silent by day because of the glory of Israel', i.e. that Israel's praises may be heard. In our text, however, the thanksgiving of heaven is quieted to hear not praises but cries for deliverance from the suffering Christians on earth. 2 The appearance at this juncture of the seven archangels with seven trumpets interrupts the sequence of the vision and, in thought at least, is to be considered after v. 5. 3, 4 Incense offered with the prayers of all the saints serves to make them acceptable before God. If human prayers are to be effective they must be cleansed from all taint of selfishness. It is doubtful that two altars appear in v. 3. The one altar in heaven seems to partake of the character both of the altar for burnt-offerings and of the altar of incense that stood in the Holiest Place. 5 The prayers of the saints are answered. The fire that burned the incense is thrown to earth and becomes a means of judgment. There follow various phenomena which reveal that the End has come and the kingdom of God is established; see 11:19 (consequent on the seventh trumpet) and 16:18 (following the seventh bowl).

8:6 – 11:19 THE SEVEN TRUMPETS

As the seven seals fall into two groups of four and three, so the seven trumpets divide themselves, the first four having distinct reminiscences of the Egyptian plagues at the Exodus. In 15:3 the second coming is tacitly compared to the Exodus (the redeemed sing the song of Moses and of the Lamb); so here that redemption is heralded by like plagues on the ungodly. Note further that the eschatological use of the trumpet goes back to the sounding of a trumpet at the theophany of Sinai (Ex. 19:13–20). For examples of the use of the trumpet at the last day see Joel 2:1; 1 Cor. 15:52; 1 Thes. 4:16.

8:7 The first trumpet

The first trumpet affects one third of earth; cf. the plague of hail and fire in Ex. 9:24. All green grass was burned up, that is, in the third part of the earth which was affected; the locusts of 9:4 are forbidden to hurt the grass of the earth, which would not exist if this were a universal judgment.

8:8, 9 The second trumpet

The second trumpet affects one third of the sea. As the Nile was turned into blood in the first Egyptian plague (Ex. 7:20, 21), so does the third part of the sea here.

8:10, 11 The third trumpet

The third trumpet causes one third of fresh waters to become poisonous, and so continues the thought of the previous plague; cf. 16:3–7. Since the star that falls at the sounding of the fifth trumpet (9:1) is an angelic being, it is possible that Wormwood is also an angel. For the bitter waters cf. Je. 9:15; 23:15.

8:12, 13 The fourth trumpet

The fourth trumpet darkens a third part of the heavens. Instead of 'the day should not shine for the third part of it, and the night in like manner' (RV) read with the Bohairic version, 'the third part of them should not shine during the day and during the night in like manner'. This corresponds in a measure to the Egyptian plague of darkness (Ex. 10:21–23).

Woe is now thrice repeated by the angel because the three last plagues are particularly grievous and are entitled the first, second and third woes. They are directed to those who dwell on the earth, i.e. the non-Christian world in distinction from the church.

9:1–12 The fifth trumpet

1 The fifth trumpet introduces a plague of demonic locusts. The fact that the star seen by John lies fallen from heaven to earth does not necessitate its being a 'fallen' angel. The movement is narrated merely to show that the 'star' came down from heaven to earth to open the abyss, wherein dwelt the demonic hordes. 2, 3 This bottomless pit is the place into which Satan is thrown (20:1ff.). The reference to the key indicates that all its inhabitants are firmly under God's control. Cf. Lk. 8:31; Rom. 10:7. Clouds like the smoke of a great furnace is intended to convey the impression of an advancing cloud of locusts (see Joel 2:10). The comparison of these demon hosts to locusts goes back to the vision of Joel alluded to, where it is said that the locust armies look like war horses running to battle, rattle like chariots, charge like mighty men, darken the heavens (Joel 2:4–10) and have fangs like lions (Joel 1:6). In addition to these features, John declares the locusts have power to inflict pain like scorpions; see also 9:10. 4 indicates the reason for the scorpion sting; the locusts are sent not to harm vegetation but only such men as have not the seal of God upon their foreheads.

5, 6 Five months is the normal length of a locust's life (spring and summer). Scorpions inflict agony but rarely kill men. 7 The likeness between the head of a locust and that of a horse was often mentioned by ancient writers. The crowns of gold and human faces, however, emphasize that they are no ordinary locusts but demons. 8 The hair like women's hair refers to their long antennae; lion-like teeth to their destructiveness; 9 iron breastplates to their scales. 11 Hence their king is Abaddon, a name that in the OT denotes the depths of Sheol and means 'destruction' (cf. Jb. 28:22).

Whether this plague is intended to symbolize the pangs of men's stricken conscience (as Swete believes), or is intended to be taken more literally, it is hard to say. It is possible that both in this and the following woe John depicts the troubling of humanity by actual demonic powers; such a view would accord with the NT teaching on demons generally.

9:13–21 The sixth trumpet

The sixth trumpet brings a demonic army from the Euphrates. 13 A voice from the . . . golden altar initiates the plague, thus connecting it with the cries of the martyrs in heaven and the prayers of the saints on earth (cf. 8:4, 5). 14, 15 The four angels are ministers of wrath. The river Euphrates formed 'the ideal limit' of the land of Israel (Driver; see Gn. 15:18); beyond it used to lie the great Empires of Babylon and Assyria. As armies came from these unknown territories to ravage disobedient Israel of old, so would more terrifying horses arise to punish the godless world. Nothing in the programme of God is accidental. The precise moment of this invasion is fixed 'in a definite hour of a definite day, in a definite month of a definite year' (Charles). 16–19 The unimaginable figure of two hundred million (see Ps. 68:17) hints that this whole description in these verses is not intended to be taken too literally. The horsemen seem to be of little account; it is the horses that terrify and destroy. Corresponding to the deadly fire and smoke and sulphur which proceed from the horses' mouths, the riders have breast-plates of fiery red, smoky blue and sulphurous yellow. Monsters of this sort were not unknown to heathen mythology; possibly John deliberately uses such terms to declare that the devices of this hellish multitude beggar the most terrifying imaginations of pagan superstition, even including the brutes of primaeval chaos. 20, 21 The plague fails to produce a salutary effect on the God-opposing world; men yet persist in idolatry, with its attendant evils, and find no place of repentance.

10:1 – 11:14 Interlude between the sixth and seventh trumpets

Just as John inserted a parenthesis between the sixth and seventh seals, so he does between the sixth and seventh trumpets. His purpose in this interlude is to emphasize the certain proximity of the End (10:1–7), the validity of his prophetic ministry (10:8–11), the security of the church (11:1, 2) and the power of its witness in the era of antichrist (11:3–13). Throughout this section the Seer lays prophetic writings much under contribution, both canonical and otherwise, and re-applies them with great freedom; particularly is it necessary to bear this in mind when interpreting ch. 11.

10:1–7 The proximity of the End. 1 The mighty angel is sometimes identified with Christ, but it is unlikely that He would be referred to as an angel; see Dn. 12:7. The rainbow about his head may be due to the radiance of his face gleaming through the cloud that surrounded him. 2 In view of v. 11, the little scroll seems to include the rest of the visions of this book. 3 The seven thunders were not uttered by the angel, for they followed his cry, but probably came from God or Christ (as also the command of v. 4). 4 For a reason not made known to us John is forbidden to reveal the message of the thunders. Some compare 2 Cor. 12:4, but not aptly, for the revelation could hardly be greater than that of chs. 4 and 5. Kiddle suggests it was a revelation given for John's own illumination but which he must not digress to record in view of the importance of the rest of this vision, a view which is as plausible as any yet propounded.

5–7 Cf. Dn. 12:7. The angel stands on earth and sea because his message is of world-wide importance. 6 The burden of his declaration is that there shall be no more delay. God's purpose for mankind, revealed to the prophets, is now to be accomplished; 7 the seventh angel is on the point of sounding his trumpet and then will the End come.

10:8–11 John's commission as a prophet reaffirmed. This part of the vision recalls Ezk. 2:9 – 3:3. As in Ezekiel's case, eating the book caused both sweetness and bitterness, a phenomenon due, however, to the mixture of blessings and woes to be announced rather than to the sweetness of obediently proclaiming what is bitter. The import of the passage seems to be a reaffirmation of John's prophetic commission.

11:1, 2 The security of the church. In this short oracle the Temple at Jerusalem is measured off, together with its worshippers, for protection in a period of trial (cf. Ezk. 40:3f.; Am. 7:7–9). The outer court of the Gentiles and the city itself are left to the domination of a heathen oppressor for three and a half years. Some expositors have interpreted this to mean that the prophecy was written before AD 70 while the Temple was still standing. But it is difficult to harmonize this standpoint with the book as a whole, which is concerned with the welfare of the Christian church, not the Jewish nation. John's vision is intended to portray the spiritual security of the church during the era of antichrist's sway. It follows that we should not expect to be able to allegorize every detail of the picture but be content with grasping its general meaning.

1 The temple of God and the altar and those who worship there convey one idea, the church (cf. 1 Cor. 3:16). 2 Similarly the court outside the temple and the holy city together represent the world outside the church. It is a bold transformation, but v. 8 implies that the one-time 'holy city' has now become one with sinful Sodom, Egypt the oppressor, and the tyrannous empire that wars against the Messiah. For the forty-two months, cf. 12:6 ('one thousand two hundred and sixty days') and 12:14 ('time, and times, and half a time'), all equivalent expressions for the three and a half years of antichrist's rule. The same reckoning appears in Dn. 7:25; 12:7, but its precise significance is still obscure.

11:3–14 The prophecy of the two witnesses. This involves similar principles as vv. 1, 2. The two witnesses originally were Moses and Elijah. For the latter's expected appearance before the Messiah's coming, see Mal. 4:5. Moses also was thought by some to have been translated to heaven and to be returning with Elijah; Johanan ben-Zakkai declared that God said to Moses, 'If I send the prophet Elijah, you must both come together.'

It could be argued that John intended the prophecy to be understood literally, but certain indications in the text suggest that the vision refers to the missionary activity of the whole church. The beast is said to 'make war' on the two witnesses (v. 7), a curious phrase in reference to two individuals, but it is applied to the church in 13:7; men from the whole world view their martyred forms and rejoice in their subjugation (v. 9), an impossible thought if two individuals in Jerusalem were meant; and the witnesses are represented by lampstands (v. 4): a figure applied to the church in ch. 1. The passage, accordingly, illustrates the church's powerful witness in the era under review by means of a well-known Jewish expectation. V. 4 shows why there are two witnesses rather than only one (Elijah): John has in mind Zechariah's vision of the two olive-trees standing on either side of the golden lampstand (Zc. 4). There the two trees probably represented Joshua and Zerubbabel, the lampstand Israel. John makes the one lampstand become two to conform to the two trees, and declares that both the olive-trees and the lampstands mean the same thing, the church in its prophetic capacity. The lampstand had already become seven to represent the seven churches (1:12; 2:1); it is an easy transition to make them become two to correspond to the two prophets, though here the whole church is typified by the lampstands, not a part of it.

3 Sackcloth is worn by the witnesses because of the grave character of their message. 4 Olive trees and lampstands; see above. 5, 6 The extraordinary power of the church is set forth in terms reminiscent of Elijah and Moses. The destroying fire recalls 2 Ki. 1:10f.; the ability to prevent rain, 1 Ki. 17:1; the turning of waters to blood and the smiting of earth with plagues, Ex. 7-12. 7 We have the first mention of the beast that ascends from the bottomless pit, i.e., as RV, 'that cometh up out of the abyss'. He is spoken of as if well known, but fuller descriptions of him occur in chs. 13 and 17. Note the similarity of words used in 13:7 to describe the warfare of the beast against the church. For bottomless pit see on 9:1.

8 The great city means what Bunyan represented as 'Vanity Fair' (Kiddle). Throughout the rest of the book the phrase is used of the harlot city Rome (16:19; 17:18; 18:10f.), so that in one remarkable stroke of the pen John identifies Jerusalem with Sodom, Egypt and Rome, and all together with the world that rejected and killed the Son of God. 9, 10 Jew and Gentile combine in seeking to crush the testimony of the faithful witnesses of Christ, just as they sought to destroy the Lord Himself. Refusal to allow a corpse to be buried signifies the greatest depth of ignominy to which a man could be subjected; see Ps. 79:3 and the book of Tobit. 11 The church is crushed by its enemies for three and a half days corresponding to the years of its testimony, 'a short triumph in point of fact, but long enough to bear the semblance of being complete and final' (Swete). At the conclusion of the three and a half days a breath of life from God entered into them, and they stood upon their feet. This is a quotation from Ezk. 37:10, which referred to the spiritual quickening of the nation Israel. Possibly, therefore, this resurrection is to be taken figuratively signifying a revival so tremendous as to awe the world; but it may describe the rapture of the saints (cf. 1 Thes. 4:16, 17) and so be equivalent to the first resurrection (20:4–6). Cf. the earthquake here (11:13) with that recorded in 6:12. 13 The number seven thousand would suitably indicate a tenth of the population of Jerusalem. In making the city represent the world-city of Vanity Fair, John had no need to alter the figure, for 7,000 could be interpreted to mean any considerable number. Note that these events at last evoked some sort of repentance from the hitherto unrepentant race.

11:15–19 The seventh trumpet

The seventh trumpet, as the seventh seal, is followed by the advent of the kingdom of God. Since the sounding of the seventh trumpet is intended to bring the third woe (v. 14) but no calamity is described, it is evident that we are to expect a further elucidation of the matter later on. Such an expansion is provided in 14:19, 20 and ch. 18. 15 Meanwhile, great voices proclaim, The kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, a joint rule which is to know no end; it signifies the millennial reign merging into the eternal bliss of the new creation (20–22). 17, 18 The customary attribute of God is significantly shortened; no longer is it said that He 'is to come', for He 'has come'! Thou hast taken thy great power, and begun to reign; the eternal reign has 'begun' in that there has commenced a new exercise of the sovereignty of God over man, a sovereignty which at no time in history had been abandoned but which, in His wisdom, had been voluntarily limited. The song of thanksgiving marks an ordered progress of thought which is observed later in the book; God has begun His eternal rule, i.e. the millennial kingdom (20:4–6); the nations were angry, rising in rebellion (20:8, 9); God's wrath manifested itself in judgment (20:9); the dead were judged (20:11–15); the saints rewarded in the city of God (21) and the sinners destroyed in the lake of fire (20:15; 21:8).

19 The Temple in heaven is opened to reveal the ark of the covenant. The manifestation of the ark to men at this point implies that the goal of the covenant, which is the promise of the kingdom, is now in the act of coming to pass. Lightnings, earthquake and hail, etc. testify that the consummation has arrived (cf. 8:5; 16:17–21).

12:1 - 14:20 THE BACKGROUND OF THE EARTHLY CONFLICT

Since the seven trumpets followed on the seven seals, it is a natural expectation that the seven bowls will immediately be poured out, so that the story of the birth pangs of the kingdom may be completed. Instead, however, a lengthy parenthesis intervenes. It is necessary to reveal the true nature of the conflict which the Messiah ends at His appearing before the débâcle itself can be appreciated and understood. The struggle in which the saints are involved is not simply the efforts of a minor religious community to resist the persecutions of an empire; this but forms the platform of a more terrifying contest wherein the age-old adversary of God and man strives by every subterfuge of politics and heathenism to thwart the purpose of God centred in His church. The 'parenthesis' is thus seen to be the core of the book. It covers the whole Messianic period, from the birth of Christ to the consummation.

12:1–17 The woman and her child

1ff. The Greeks told a story of the birth of Apollo remarkably parallel to that in vv. 1–6. The Egyptians similarly related the birth of Horus; in fact the story, in modified forms, seems to have been universally told. Clearly John has employed a well-known narrative (first adapted, apparently, by a Jew) both to illustrate his own theme and tacitly to exclude all heroes of other faiths from the position of world Redeemer. Such treatment of pagan sources is similar to his use of Jewish narratives, such as those in chs. 7 and 11; the message they are made to yield is in both cases neither pagan nor Jewish, but Christian through and through. To the heathen nations of the ancient world the travailing woman (12:1, 2) would have been a goddess crowned with the twelve stars of the Zodiac. The Jew would have seen in her his own people, headed by the twelve patriarchs. John shows that she represents neither of these, but the true believing people of God of both old and new dispensations, the Messianic community.

3 The dragon is identified in v. 9 with Satan. His seven heads and ten horns show him to be the antichrist of the spiritual world, just as his agent, 'the beast' (13:1), is the earthly antichrist sharing his characteristics. The figure was used in Daniel to describe the nature of the four successive world powers of history. In Daniel the seven heads were divided among the four beasts, while here they are retained in one horrible concentration of evil. The ten horns are similarly traditional and in the earthly anti-Christian power are applied to ten kings (Dn. 7:24; Rev. 17:12). 4 His tail swept down a third of the stars of heaven echoes a victory of the devil over angelic powers, but whether John intended by this feature anything more than an allusion to the dragon's great power is hard to say. 5 The statement of the child's destiny (see Ps. 2:9) explains the dragon's desire to devour him, for the nations he regarded as his legitimate prey. In its original reference the meaning would be that the child was snatched to the throne of God for safety while yet an infant; but the 'catching up' is sufficiently similar to the victorious ascension of Jesus to make plain its real meaning in this context.

6 The people of God are safe from the devil's wiles during the period of antichrist's reign of terror. This accords with the teaching of 7:1–8; 11:1, 2; it anticipates the downfall of Satan described in vv. 7–12 and is enlarged in 13–17. 7ff. The war . . . in heaven may signify an attempt to storm the refuge of the Child-Redeemer. Hence the heavenly protagonist is an archangel leading the hosts of God; he it is who wins the victory over the devil and his demonic followers. His conquest brings in the kingdom of our God (v. 10; cf. Dn. 12:1–3). But the addition of v. 11 by our prophet transforms the whole scene. The real means of the dragon's overthrow was the atoning work of Christ; His people share that victory by their testimony to His saving power in their lives. The angelic conquest becomes a mere figure for the victory of Christ and His saints. The initiation of the kingdom of God through the redemption on the cross is a close parallel to the Johannine and Pauline teaching that our Lord's death and resurrection were the occasion of Satan's downfall and the establishment of the kingdom age with all its attendant blessings. The Revelation, accordingly, cannot be said to be wholly devoid of 'realized' eschatology. Charles has successfully solved a long-standing linguistic difficulty by translating v. 7 'Michael and his angels had to fight with the dragon'. See ICC, pp. 321, 322.

9 That ancient serpent is that which tempted Eve in Eden. Devil (Gk. diabolos) is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew Satan, both meaning 'slanderer'. The text implies that Satan can no longer fulfil his function of falsely accusing the saints before God (see Jb. 1 and Zc. 3) for Christ has secured their acquittal and reconciled them to God through His atonement. Accordingly, the devil concentrates on his abilities as dragon, serpent and deceiver.

10 Kingdom is perhaps better rendered here 'sovereignty'; but cf. Col. 1:13, 14, where the thought is very similar; for the casting down of Satan cf. Jn. 12:31–33. 11 The redemption of Christ is the prime cause of the saints' victory; their testimony confirms its efficacy in their lives. 12 The expression woe to you, O earth and sea corresponds to John's frequent designation of the unbelieving world as 'those who dwell on the earth' (11:10; 13:8, etc.); it is here used in distinction from the heavenly sphere where Satan formerly dwelt. The extent of the time is defined in v. 14; the period of antichrist's reign is here seen to be an administration of the devil through him.

13 The dragon now turns his attention to the woman, i.e. the church, having failed in the case of its Lord: cf. Jn. 15:20. 14 See on v. 6 above. In the symbolism setting forth its attack on the woman the serpent is regarded as a water monster, indeed the personification of the sea. Hence the woman flees for refuge into the wilderness, where a sea monster can have no place. 15, 16 Not to be outdone, the serpent sends a flood of water after her, but the earth swallows it up, so that nothing more can be done by him. The picture well illustrates the spiritual security of believers against all that the devil can do in his attempts to destroy them.

17 He stood; AV reads 'I stood' and connects the sentence with 13:1. Both the MS evidence and the context favour the RSV reading.

13:1–18 Antichrist and his prophet

1–3 The dragon, having failed alone to crush the Christ and His people, calls to his aid a helper. The beast comes out of the sea, thereby showing its character as a sea monster (like the dragon; see notes on 12:3, 15, 16 and cf. Dn. 7:3) and as demonic (according to 11:7 the sea is equivalent to the abyss). The second beast, on the other hand, comes 'out of the earth'. This difference corresponds to that between Behemoth, the land monster (Jb. 40:15f.) and Leviathan, the sea monster (Jb. 41), creatures which, in the prophetic books, served to typify the God-opposing powers (see, e.g., Is. 27:1; 51:9; Ezk. 32:2f., etc.).

The details of the sea monster are drawn from Dn. 7. We learn from Rev. 17:5, 9 that it represents the power of Rome, the seven heads being a succession of emperors and the ten horns ten allied kings (17:12); the blasphemous names are the divine titles claimed by Roman sovereigns. The characteristics of leopard, bear and lion in Dn. 7:4–6 were shared out among three prior empires. Here they combine in one terrifying unity of power and wickedness, the leopard signifying cruelty and cunning, the bear strength, the lion ferocity. One of the heads seemed to have a wound, mortal but . . . was healed. Clearly the reference is to the death of one of the emperors. But of whom is it said that the death-stroke was healed, the emperor in question or the Roman Empire of which he was a part? Gunkel believed the latter, for a monster suffering from the loss of one of its heads has itself received a mortal blow; the historical reference could then be to the murder of Julius Caesar, whose death endangered the security of the Empire (one of its heads in John's Hebraic Greek could mean 'the first of his heads'). Most expositors are inclined to interpret the healing of the death-stroke as of the head (emperor) in question, who is then identified with the beast itself (as in vv. 12, 14 and 17). That could only mean that one of the emperors was to rise from the dead and sum up in himself the character of the devil-inspired empire. Precisely that was being asserted of Nero at the time of the writing of this book; for though he committed suicide in AD 68, it was widely believed he would return to lead the eastern powers against Rome. See further on 17:8, 11, and the note on the anti-Christian empire (p. 1302).

4 The world worships both the devil and the false Christ who sums up in himself the characteristics of the Empire. 5 The mouth speaking haughty and blasphemous words is asserted of the anti-God power in Dn. 7:8, 20. For the forty-two months cf. 11:2, 3; 12:14. During this time the beast is said to be given authority to continue, i.e. to act wickedly; cf. Dn. 8:12; 11:36. Note that, although the dragon gave the beast his authority over the earth, the real permission for his blasphemous utterances and deeds, and even the duration of his reign, comes from God; see also vv. 7, 10, 14, 15. The sovereignty of God is never more apparent than during the rule of antichrist. 6 Cf. 2 Thes. 2:4. 7 Cf. Dn. 7:21. 8 The reference of the words from the foundation of the world is uncertain; they can be linked with the slaying of the Lamb, as in AV and RV, or with the writing of the saint's names in the book of life, as in RSV, RV mg. Both meanings are equally true; for the former cf. 1 Pet. 1:19, 20, for the latter Eph. 1:4. The difficulty is settled for most by an appeal to 17:8, where almost identical language is used, connecting the phrase with the writing in the book. Nevertheless the word order is decidedly against this interpretation, unless it were true that the book as we have it is a translation from John's original writing.

10 AV takes both parts of this couplet as referring to persecutors of the church ('He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity . . .'), and showing that justice will be meted out to them. RSV changes the sense by translating, If anyone is to be taken captive . . ., which expresses the resignation that Christians are to adopt in face of possible incarceration or martyrdom. This accords closely with Je. 15:2; 43:11, and is perhaps to be preferred. (If the AV is followed, the statement is made up by a combination of the utterances of Jeremiah referred to and Mt. 26:52.)

11 A second beast comes to the aid of the first as his prophet. It had two horns like a lamb, simulating the character of Christ, but its words were devilish; cf. Mt. 7:15. 12 That the second beast makes the earth . . . worship the first beast seems to indicate that this figure represents the priesthood of the cult of the emperor. It is later called 'the false prophet' (16:13; 19:20; 20:10). Yet as the seven-headed, ten-horned beast signifies the anti-Christian empire embodied in a personal antichrist, it is likely that this heathen priesthood is also represented in a supreme head that directs its devilish work. Such an interpretation agrees with the later statements that the false prophet and antichrist are thrown 'alive' into the lake of fire (19:20; 20:10), for it is doubtful that in such context one beast represents an individual and the other a corporate body. Those passages, in fact, may imply that the false prophet is a demonic being like the antichrist.

13–15 Heathen priests had little compunction in resorting to tricks, such as the production of fire, apparently from heaven, and by ventriloquism to make an idol talk. It is possible, however, that John means that the miracles wrought by the false prophet will be genuine. It is a recognized feature of Christian prophecy of the antichrist; cf. Mk. 13:22; 2 Thes. 2:9. 16 The mark of the beast on non-Christian people is a counterpart of the seal of God on Christians (7:1–8); they both serve to show one's allegiance, whether to God or the devil. If the two designations are intended to denote spiritual qualities as well as a means of external identification, they hint that character tends to exclude influences not in accord with it—in the case of believers, Satanic influences, in the case of unbelievers, the gracious operations of the Holy Spirit. A man becomes increasingly in the image of his master. 17, 18 The immediate effect of receiving the mark of the beast consists in the social ostracism of those who refuse it. It involves nothing less than the proclamation by the state of economic warfare against the church.

The mark of the beast reproduced either his name or the number formed by adding together the numerical values represented by the letters of his name (in Greek and Hebrew there are no separate numerals, the letters of the alphabet have to serve this purpose also). Its number is six hundred and sixty-six. The solutions of this riddle amount to almost as many. Gunkel and many others insist that it does not represent the name of an individual; the phrase it is a human number simply means 'it is a human computation' in distinction from a supernatural reckoning (cf. 21:17). Such interpreters frequently regard the number as a symbol for the constant falling short of perfection by antichrist, since each digit is one less than seven; it is pointed out that the Sibylline Oracles (1:328) remarks that the number of the name of Jesus is 888, one better than perfection. Gunkel himself does not accept this suggestion, but thinks the number serves to identify the Roman Empire with the chaos monster, from which the portrait of the dragon and the beast is drawn in this book ('Primal Chaos' in Hebrew equals 666). The idea has been unduly minimized on the ground that John's readers could hardly have stumbled on such a remote solution, since they knew only Greek. Accordingly the modern exegete favours instead the solution 'Nero Caesar', written defectively in Hebrew! But if the former would be unintelligible to Greek-speaking people, so would the latter, even though 'Nero Caesar' transcribed in Hebrew from a Latin spelling gives the alternative number 616 which is found in some MSS. Clement's suggestion 'The Latin kingdom', written in Greek, is attractive; not only does it give the required 666, but 'The Italian kingdom' gives the alternative 616.

Strange as it may appear, it is not impossible that all the above solutions may be right. It is likely that since John used a Hebrew source in this chapter, the original name was a Hebrew one and the number was not invented by him. As he knew the chaos myth and was a Hebrew, the name Tehom Qadmonah, 'Primal Chaos', would not be beyond him. Further it is suggested in our interpretation of 17:8, 11 that the prophet fused the myths of the chaos monster and Nero redivivus to form his picture of the antichrist; the adversaries of the church so perfectly embodied the ancient power of evil that they could both be described under the same historical summary, viz. they were and are not, and are about to come up out of the abyss, and go into perdition. A number, therefore, which could denote that evil principle as well as the empire and individual in which it should be incarnated, was more than heart could wish for, a perfect representation of devilry.

14:1–5 The 144,000 on Mt. Zion

The purpose of this, and the following visions of this chapter, is to strengthen Christians for the trials implied in the preceding account of antichrist's reign. 1 The identity of the 144,000 seems determined by 7:1–8 and 5:9, 10. John would hardly represent two different groups by such an extraordinary and obviously symbolical number, especially when he adds that both companies bear the mark of God in their foreheads (7:3, 4; 14:1). The multitude is defined as those 'who had been redeemed from the earth' (v. 3), an echo of the description of the church in 5:9. Further, they are said to be standing on Mount Zion, i.e. the heavenly Jerusalem of the millennial age (21:9f.); this also conforms to the song of thanksgiving in 5:10, but it represents an advance on the previous picture of the 144,000 where this multitude is still on earth (7:1–8) and afterwards viewed in heaven, though not yet entered upon their kingly privileges (7:9–17). We therefore take this vision to portray the church possessing the advent glory of Christ in the millennial age.

The theme of the Lamb and the heavenly Jerusalem found in this chapter is expanded in 21:9f. The name written on the foreheads of the Christians explains the nature of the 'seal' spoken of in 7:1–8. 3 The angelic hosts sang a new song (cf. 5:9) but only the 144,000 could learn this one. Evidently it deals with the experience of redemption, which only saved sinners could know. Our interpretation of this verse is conditioned by our identification of this company with that in ch. 7; it is impossible, therefore, to regard it as numbering unmarried men only.

4 It seems best to interpret the language as symbolic, denoting the spiritual purity of men and women who form the bride of Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 11:2). Such terms are not inapt in a vision portraying the glorified church with her Lord in the heavenly Jerusalem; see 21:9f. If aparchē is to be rendered here first fruits, the latter part of the verse connects with such scriptures as Jas. 1:18; 2 Thes. 2:13, RV mg.; but it could be translated by its usual LXX meaning 'sacrifice', for such a thought is peculiarly apt in this prophecy of the testimony, suffering and martyrdom of Christ's chosen ones.

14:6–20 The day of wrath

The succession of short oracles in this section is unified by the use of six angels, who announce the judgment and carry it out. Equally with the former vision it is intended to strengthen the Christian's nerve, the one vision being a requital of good, the other a requital of evil works.

14:6, 7 The first angel. A last warning is given to unbelieving men. All the nations are summoned to repentance and the worship of God. The message is called an 'eternal gospel', for the eternal blessings of the good news still remain for those who will respond. This oracle seems to record the final fulfilment of Mk. 13:10.

14:8 The second angel. The fall of Babylon is recounted at greater length in ch. 18. This symbolic name for Rome appears in 1 Pet. 5:13, the Sibylline Oracles 5:143, 159 and 2 Baruch 11:1.

14:9–13 The third angel. This is a warning that forms a complement to the preaching of the eternal gospel in vv. 6, 7. 10 For the unmixed cup (not 'watered down'), cf. Ps. 75:8. For the fire and brimstone, cf. Is. 34:8–10, which itself is reminiscent of Gn. 19:24, 25. 12 The endurance of the saints finds an additional spur in the contemplation of the awful doom of the worshippers of the beast, just as the knowledge that some of them will be called to suffer incarceration and death gives a like stimulus (13:10). 13 The benediction on the dead which die in the Lord serves the same purpose; Christians who face the prospect of suffering for the sake of the name know that they shall rest in the company of their Lord and receive a recompense for their faithfulness.

14:14–16 The fourth angel. It is common to regard these verses as depicting the gathering of the church by Christ at His coming and vv. 18–20 as the gathering of the unbelieving world for judgment; it is possible that this is the true reading of the passage, especially in view of the use of the phrase one like a son of man in v. 14 (cf. 1:13). Yet it seems strange that Christ should be commanded by an angel to perform His saving work. His description, too, lacks the splendour of the visions of the Lord in 1:12f. and 19:11f. It seems better, accordingly, to regard the humanlike form as an angel, sharing something of the glory of Christ like the 'mighty angel' of 10:1. The reaping of the wheat and gathering of grapes then represent one all-inclusive act of judgment as in Joel 3:13, on which these two visions are based. For the reaping of earth by angelic instrumentality cf. Mt. 13:41, 42.

14:17 The fifth angel. Observe that the angel here who also had a sharp sickle came out of the temple as did the fourth angel.

14:18–20 The sixth angel. 18 This angel who commands the vine-gatherer to reap the ripe grapes of the earth came out from the altar, and is specified: he who has power over fire. This links up with 6:9–11; 8:1–5; 9:13; 16:7, and exemplifies once more the connection between the sacrifice of God's saints and the advent of the kingdom. 19, 20 The symbolism of the Messianic judgment as a treading of grapes goes back to Is. 63:3. The city outside which the treading of the winepress takes place is presumably the world-city, 'Babylon the great' (see 11:8; 18:2).

15:1 – 16:21 THE SEVEN BOWLS

The bowls are said to initiate plagues, which are the last, for with them the wrath of God is ended (v. 1). This is often linked with the fact that no description was given of the seventh trumpet, although it brought the end (11:15); it is then suggested that the contents of the bowls consist of events consequent upon the sounding of the last trumpet. This is possible. It should be noticed, however, that the contents of the seven bowls are very similar to those of the seven trumpets; in most cases the difference appears to lie in the amplification of the earlier plagues by the later. The second and third bowls, for example, seem simply to reveal that the second and third trumpet plagues have increased in extent. The fourth trumpet affects the sun in one way, the fourth bowl in another (8:12; 16:8). The fifth and sixth trumpets have an extraordinary correspondence with the fifth and sixth bowls (9:1–21; 16:10–16). The earthquake after the seventh trumpet seems to be that consequent on the seventh bowl, only more fully described (11:19; 16:17f.). Thus the bowls give a fuller revelation of what had already been shown under the trumpet judgments, together with certain new features. As to the conquerors by the glassy sea (v. 2), their song celebrates the approaching conversion of the nations consequent on the completion of the 'righteous acts' of God (v. 4, RV); the vision therefore exults in the effects of the last plagues rather than heralds their coming; it is proleptic and serves to underline the statement of v. 1, with them the wrath of God is ended.

15:1–8 Visions introductory to the bowls

This chapter consists of two separate visions, the former portraying the Christian confessors who had emerged triumphantly from the great distress (vv. 2–4), the latter telling of the appearance from the heavenly temple of seven angels bearing the bowls of plagues (vv. 5–8). 1 serves as a superscription for chs. 15–16. It supplies a pictorial equivalent of the more formal prophetic utterance, 'The vision (or burden) of the last plagues'. The judgments are the last inasmuch as they are the culmination of what has gone before and include the final blows against the wickedness of a devil-inspired generation.

15:2–4 The first vision. 2 The glassy sea is mingled with fire because of impending judgment. The confessors have defied the beast, refused to adore his image and abjured the mark which is the number of his name. 3, 4 The song of Moses . . . and the song of the Lamb is one, recalling the triumph song of the Israelites on the shore of the Red Sea (Ex. 15). The name of Moses is conjoined with that of Christ because a similar, though greater, deliverance has been wrought from a similar, though greater, foe. The comparison of final redemption with the Exodus is common in the prophets (cf. Is. 51:9–11). Every line of the song is reminiscent of the prophets and psalmists: Great and wonderful are thy deeds; cf. Pss. 98:1; 111:2; 139:14. Just and true are thy ways; cf. Ps. 145:17; Dt. 32:3. King of the ages; or 'of the nations'. Who shall not fear . . . ?; cf. Je. 10:7. All nations shall come; cf. Ps. 86:9. Thy judgments have been revealed; cf. Ps. 98:2; Is. 26:9.

15:5–8 The second vision. The tent of witness was the name given to the Tabernacle (see Nu. 9:15) because in it was kept the ark containing the tablets of the covenant. Since the ark was later housed in the Temple, the Temple itself was sometimes called a Tabernacle (Ps. 84:1, 2 AV; Ezk. 41:1 AV). Here, accordingly, the second clause is to be rendered 'the Temple, namely the Tabernacle (or tent) of the witness in heaven, was opened'. It emphasizes that the judgments about to be executed are the expression of God's righteousness. 6 RV says the angels were 'arrayed with precious stone, pure and bright', instead of pure bright linen. But the Greek words for 'stone' (lithon) and 'linen' (linon) are very similar, so that it is hard to tell which is right. See, however, Ezk. 28:13. 7 The golden bowls, as containers of the wrath of God, may have been prompted by the frequent OT use of 'cup' to denote God's measure of judgment on sinners (cf. Rev. 14:9, 10). 8 The temple was filled with smoke from the glory of God. For similar occasions of this phenomenon in the OT see Ex. 40:35; 2 Ch. 7:2, 3; Is. 6:4; Ezk. 10:4; 44:4.

16:1–21 The seven bowls described

16:2 The first bowl. The plague of the first bowl has no counterpart in those of the trumpets, but like several of the latter it recalls the Egyptian plagues (cf. Ex. 9:10, 11).

16:3 The second bowl. Cf. the first Egyptian plague (Ex. 7:17f.). Whereas the second trumpet affected a third of the sea (Rev. 8:8), this spreads through all seas.

16:4–7 The third bowl. The same Egyptian plague is in mind. Cf. the third trumpet (8:10, 11). 5 Note the divergence of texts followed by AV and RSV. The better MSS omit 'and shalt be'. The consummation has already arrived and there is therefore no need to speak of a future coming. 6 There may be a double thrust here. To be drunk with blood in the OT signifies slaughter by the sword; cf. Is. 49:26. The altar concurs in this judgment; cf. 6:10 and on 14:15–18.

16:8, 9 The fourth bowl. The fourth bowl stands in contrast to the fourth trumpet (8:12); but see vv. 10 and 11.

16:10, 11 The fifth bowl. The fifth bowl sends darkness on antichrist's empire; cf. Ex. 10:21 and the darkness over a third part of earth after the fourth trumpet. Charles suggests that the excessive pain of this plague is due to the demon locusts of the fifth trumpet, whose appearance, coinciding with smoke from the abyss, darkened the sky, and which caused torments to the adherents of the beast (9:1–6); such an interpretation would accord with the relation of the trumpets and bowls outlined in the introduction to chs. 15, 16.

16:12–16 The sixth bowl. 12 The sixth trumpet also affects the Euphrates (cf. 9:13f.), a matter that can hardly be coincident. But while the sixth trumpet brings forth demonic hosts, the sixth bowl prepares for the invasion of the empire by the kings from the east. These latter are further described in 17:12, 13; they put themselves at antichrist's behest (17:17), ravage the harlot city and war with the Lamb (17:14). 13, 14 For the identity of the false prophet see 13:11–18. Like frogs; these foul, demonic spirits are loathsome and offensive. Their task, like that of the lying Spirit in Ahab's story (1 Ki. 22:21ff.) is to persuade world rulers to join in the great final battle. 15 Cf. 3:3. If this is the original position of this verse, the warning is not without point (cf. Mt. 24:43f.; 1 Thes. 5:2, 4). There are seven benedictions in this book: cf. 1:3; 14:13; 19:9; 20:6; 22:7, 14. 16 The signification of Armageddon is unknown. The usual translation 'mountain of Megiddo' can hardly be correct for there is no mountain at Megiddo. Conjectural derivations from Hebrew (such as har migdo, 'his fruitful mountain', i.e. Jerusalem) are hardly to the point, since John's readers knew no Hebrew. It is possible that neither John nor his friends attempted any explanation of the name; it was used not so much to designate a place as an occasion, viz. the last well-known uprising of the wicked that issues in the establishment of the kingdom of God.

16:17–21 The seventh bowl. 17 The seventh bowl is poured into the air, conveying the notion of something even more portentous than the havoc wrought on the 'earth' (v. 2) or 'sea' (v. 3) or 'water' (v. 4) or 'sun' (v. 8); it signifies the final blow against the forces of evil, both human and satanic (Eph. 2:2). Hence the voice (of God?) proclaims It is done! Cf. 'It is finished' (Jn. 19:30) and see Rev. 21:6. 18, 19 At last the meaning is given of the lightnings, etc., that followed the seventh trumpet (11:19) and seventh seal (8:5); they accomplish the destruction of the anti-Christian civilization. Through the earthquake (cf. 6:12) the great city was rent into three parts. 20 A hyperbolic description of the magnitude of the earthquake is given. 21 The size of the hailstones befits the terrifying proportions of this last shaking of the heavens and earth (Hg. 2:21). The Egyptians endured a plague of great hailstones (Ex. 9:24); an alliance of armies pursued by Joshua was routed by them in Beth-horon (Jos. 10:11), while the hosts of Gog were to expect a like fate (Ezk. 38:22). But the event eclipses all such descriptions. It subdues men, but it does not lead them to repentance. The ultimate issues of these happenings are given in greater detail in chs. 17–19.

17:1 - 19:21 THE FALL OF BABYLON

These three chapters expand the visions of the sixth and seventh bowls (16:12–21). 17:1–19:10 are largely concerned with the fate of the empire (i.e. the seventh bowl); 19:11–21 recounts in fuller measure the destruction of antichrist and his followers (the sixth bowl). Ch. 17 explains the situation that leads up to the doom of God's enemies, with special reference to the anti-Christian kingdom (ch. 18) and at the same time sheds light on certain obscurities in ch. 13.

17:1–6 A vision of Babylon in her glory

1, 2 The angel's words to John could form a fitting title to chs. 17 and 18. The judgment of the great harlot who is seated upon many waters. As ch. 17 describes the circumstances of her downfall, the promise in the title is not actually fulfilled until ch. 18. The city of Tyre is called a harlot by Isaiah (23:16, 17), as also is Nineveh by Nahum (3:4f.), while the latter part of v. 2 quotes Jeremiah's description of Babylon (51:7), just as that latter city was addressed by the prophet as 'you who dwell on many waters' (Je. 51:13). From v. 9 it is clear that Rome is in John's mind. In this description, therefore, as in the apocalyptic figure of v. 3, he teaches that this Empire includes in itself the wickedness of all its predecessors. The beast that represents the Empire is similarly portrayed as the dragon (cf. 12:3), thereby showing its affinity with it. 3 The symbol of a woman sitting on a scarlet beast originally denoted a unity, the beast being an earlier, the woman a later, representation of one and the same chaos monster. For John, however, it forms a suitable picture to illustrate the relationship between the capital city and the Empire. At first sight it appears strange that in v. 1 the harlot is seated upon many waters, whereas in this verse she dwells in a wilderness. The explanation may be that John is recalling Isaiah's prophecy against Babylon, the title of which is 'the oracle concerning the wilderness of the sea' (Is. 21:1); it is noteworthy that the LXX omits the last three words. 4 The luxury and moral filth of the city are here vividly set forth, again with the aid of Jeremiah's characterization of Babylon.

5 The exhibition of the name on the harlot's forehead probably alludes to the custom of Roman harlots, who similarly displayed their names on their brows. The prefix mystery could be a part of the inscription; but it is more likely that it shows the name is not to be taken literally (cf. 11:8, 'the great city which is allegorically (or, spiritually) called Sodom and Egypt'). Moffatt translates 'by way of symbol'. The title serves to characterize the tyrant city as of the same nature as that against which the old prophets so vehemently prophesied; it is the mother of harlots and of earth's abominations (i.e. idolatries). Rome brought about the moral ruin of the whole Empire. 6 The allusion includes not only the Neronic persecution, but also the general custom of taking martyrs to Rome to die in the amphitheatre.

17:7–18 The vision explained: Babylon's doom

The interpretation of this section is rendered difficult by a fluctuation in the symbolism. In vv. 10 and 11 the beast is said to incarnate itself in a king who once lived and reappears as the last emperor of an unholy succession; i.e. he is an individual. Yet it is clear that vv. 1–6 speak of a city and empire, not an individual or even a line of rulers (emperors are only heads, not the whole beast). With this agree vv. 9, 10, the seven hills denoting the city of Rome, the headquarters of the anti-Christian empire. Since the use of the beast with seven heads and ten horns to represent the godless persecuting world-power is traditional, it is almost certain that John is drawing on prior sources rather than composing something wholly original (cf. ch. 12); this may account for some of the ambiguity.

Most expositors interpret v. 8 with the aid of v. 11 and consider that the entire passage describes an individual antichrist; the expression 'was, and is not, and is to ascend' in v. 8 is felt to be wholly explicable by the myth of the resuscitated Nero, whose return from the dead to fight against Rome was widely expected when this book was written. With this expectation vv. 16 and 17 fit in admirably.

There is, however, another possible line of interpretation. It is admitted by all that vv. 1–6 portray the empire, not an individual. If John used an earlier writing in compiling vv. 7–18, that source also referred to the beast as the empire. It is thus not improbable that the Christian prophet also had the empire particularly in view. If so, v. 8a is to be explained primarily not of Nero resurrected but of the empire. From such scriptures as Is. 27:1; 30:7; 51:9, 10 it is clear that the OT prophets deliberately applied the symbol of the 'chaos monster' to the nations hostile to Israel, especially to Egypt, but not alone to that power. God had conquered that monster in the beginning. It is lying dormant for the time being (cf. Is. 30:7, RV), but it is about to strike again. At such a time God would destroy it once and for all. 'The beast that was, and is not, and is to ascend from the bottomless pit and go to perdition' (cf. Is. 27:1) thus describes this monster by outlining its history.

A reasonable solution appears to be that John here fused two symbols to convey his message, that of the chaos monster and that of Nero redivivus. The beast is the power of evil, manifesting itself throughout history in the godless empires, but now in the Roman Empire. Thus far it has lain more or less dormant; shortly it will rise from its recumbency and reveal itself in a fury of wickedness, incarnating itself in the resurrected Nero. With this key to the passage in mind, we may attend to its details.

7 The explanation given by the angel is a direct continuation of the preceding vision; it tells whom the woman and the beast represent. It is to be expected, therefore, that the interpretation will involve more than one member of the beast. 8 The beast was, and is not; i.e. it had an existence as an evil and anti-God power before, but has been silenced. Isaiah calls Egypt 'Rahab who sits still' (Is. 30:7), i.e. the chaos monster, rendered helpless by God. Rome is given a similar name here. It was, and is not, but is to ascend from the bottomless pit and achieve a work of horror like the pharaohs, the Assyrian kings and Antiochus Epiphanes of old. Nevertheless it is to go to perdition—the chaos monster cannot triumph over God, neither can Rome. As v. 11 relates this to Nero about to come again to earth, we may take it that the full possession by Rome of the characteristics of the chaos monster can be only when it incarnates itself in the returned Nero. This demonic king so fully shares the nature of the power of evil that their history can be delineated in the same terms. He is the beast incarnate. Such a fearful manifestation of supernatural power causes all on earth to wonder, except those whose names are written in the book of life.

9, 10 A dual interpretation of the seven heads is given so as to identify the beast beyond doubt. Rome was familiarly known as 'the city of the seven hills'. The beast is thus located in Rome. But the heads represent kings. Whatever the number seven may have meant to earlier writers, to John it was a symbol of completeness; five . . . have fallen means the majority have passed; the one is refers to the contemporary sovereign; another emperor will reign but when he comes he must remain only a little while; the short duration of his rule is enforced by the consideration that 'the time is near' (1:3).

11 After the last human emperor the beast will reveal itself in all its bestiality. The beast that 'was, and is not' is the age-long power of evil; he will show himself as the eighth king, yet not in reality an eighth, for he will manifest himself in the form of one of the seven, i.e. Nero. In the context of vv. 9 and 10 it seems that the statement the beast . . . is an eighth must mean that the whole empire, or rather the evil genius that characterizes the empire, incarnates itself in the eighth king. The emphasis is on the empire in its entirety. It must not be read as 'The beast Nero is an eighth king, as well as one of the seven'; the descriptive clause 'was, and is not' denotes the chaos monster Empire in the first instance, and only secondarily Nero. When, however, the beast is said to 'ascend from the bottomless pit', the emphasis is on the person who is its embodiment.

12, 13 The ten kings confederate with antichrist may be rulers of satellite states or governors of provinces. Bousset suggests, with less probability, they may be demonic powers of a like nature to their leader. 14 The ultimate fate of the ten kings is immediately recounted so as to complete their description. Logically this verse should follow v. 17 after the narration of their part in the destruction of the empire. Some commentators, accordingly, transfer it to that place. But apocalyptists do not always keep to a strictly logical sequence. This verse really anticipates 19:19f.; if from one point of view it is superfluous in this vision, from another its position here is fully intelligible. Its meaning is either that they that are with Him, called and chosen and faithful, will share in this conquest of antichrist and his helpers, or that they, as well as the Lamb, will conquer antichrist in their moral life (cf. 12:11).

15 While the waters of Babylon were literally meant in Jeremiah's prophecy (see note on v. 1) the prophet regards them as aptly symbolizing the peoples over which Rome rules. Antichrist, with his confederates, will help in the destruction of Rome, which is otherwise accomplished by the great earthquake (16:19). Both modes of destruction are due to the active providence of God. 16 The language is drawn from Ezekiel's description of the chastisement of Israel (Ezk. 23:25–29). No explanation is given why the anti-Christian ruler turns against the anti-Christian city. The popular Nero story expected him to arise solely to overwhelm the empire; yet this whole chapter, and 13:5 explicitly, assumes that he will first rule over the empire and with its aid rage against the works of God for three and a half years. This procedure well illustrates John's method of freely adapting his sources in order to convey the message God has given him for the instruction of His saints. 18 The woman is Rome, the mistress of the world of John's day.

18:1–24 A dirge upon Babylon

This chapter is modelled on the doom songs of the OT prophets over the hostile nations of their times. So reminiscent is it of these that it may be said to summarize all prophetic oracles on the doom of unrighteous peoples. The prophecies against Babylon (Is. 13, 21, 47; Je. 50, 51) and Tyre (Ezk. 26, 27) appear to have been especially in John's mind.

1 The glory of this angel is described in words used by Ezekiel of the Shekinah returning to the restored Temple (Ezk. 43:2). For similar portrayals of angelic splendour cf. 10:1f. and 14:14. 2 Fallen, fallen is Babylon the great is a quotation of Is. 21:9. For the rest of the verse cf. Is. 13:21, 22. Strictly speaking this picture is inconsistent with 19:3; it is not impossible that John deliberately mixes his symbolism, expecting his readers to exercise caution in interpreting it. Cf. vv. 1 and 2 with Is. 13:19–22. 3 Translate 'for she made all the nations to drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication'. John lays to Rome's charge the responsibility for the corruption of the whole earth. RV follows an alternative reading peptōkan ('have fallen') instead of pepōtiken ('caused to drink').

4 Cf. Je. 51:6, 45; Is. 52:11. 5 Cf. Je. 51:9. 6 Cf. Je. 16:18; 50:29; Is. 40:2. Is the cry of v. 6 directed to the avenging armies of antichrist and his allies? See 17:12, 13, 16, 17. Rome's judgment is to be proportionate to her self-glorification, wantonness and pride; cf. Is. 47:7–9. 8 RSV rightly translates thanatos (AV 'death') as pestilence (cf. 6:8). We may also translate penthos by 'calamity' instead of mourning, so making the three plagues 'pestilence and calamity and famine'. The destruction by fire is performed by the invading hosts under antichrist; cf. 17:16.

The lamentation over Babylon is uttered by the kings of the earth (vv. 9, 10), the merchants of the earth (vv. 11–17a) and the shipowners and sailors (vv. 17b–19). John is here particularly indebted to Ezekiel's doom song upon Tyre (Ezk. 26, 27). 9 Note that the kings of the earth are those mentioned in 17:18, not those in alliance with the beast (17:16, 17). Cf. Ezk. 26:16, 17. 10 The substance of each lamentation is the same, viz. in one hour has thy judgment come (see vv. 17, 19).

11 Cf. the list of merchant nations that traded with Tyre (Ezk. 27:12–24) and their astonishment and fear (Ezk. 27:35, 36). 12, 13 furnish a list of goods sold by the merchants to Rome. Cf. the imports of Tyre (Ezk. 27:12–24). Scented wood (AV 'thyine wood') was a sweet-scented, hard wood from N Africa and especially used for making expensive tables. Ivory was popular among Romans both for decorating furniture and ornaments. Cinnamon is an aromatic spice. Spice (amōmon) was a fragrant plant from India, used for making costly hair unguent. Chariots here are of a special kind (Gk. rhedai), having four wheels, often expensively decorated. Two words are used here for slaves: sōmata, 'bodies', and psychai anthrōpōn, human souls, the latter phrase occurring in Ezk. 27:13. Perhaps John employed both terms to express his abhorrence at so brutal a system that crushed men's bodies and souls alike.

14ff. Swete observes that while the kings lament over Babylon for the strength that has departed (v. 10), the merchants think mainly of the wealth that has vanished; so also the mariners in v. 19.

20 The appeal to heaven and the church to rejoice over the judgment of Babylon, forming a strong contrast to the foregoing lamentations, appears to come from the prophet himself. Whether it is meant as such or no, 19:1–7 forms a fitting response to the cry. 21ff. The symbolic action of the angel is suggested by a like one performed over Babylon by Jeremiah (51:63, 64). 22 Mousikōn, translated minstrels (AV 'musicians'), should be rendered 'singers' as in Testament of Judah 23:2. The sentence recalls Ezk. 26:13. The clauses that follow, describing the cessation of crafts, industry, the joys of marriage, and all means of illumination, reproduce Je. 25:10, but in a different order. 23 Thy merchants were the great men of the earth was first spoken by Isaiah concerning Tyre (23:8). It is adduced as a reason for Rome's judgment because, to judge from v. 3, its merchants fostered the 'wantonness' of the city, and that out of sheer greed, and so were themselves bound up with the luxurious vice of Rome.

Isaiah had already commented on the sorceries of the original Babylon (47:12), and Nahum brought a similar charge against Nineveh (3:4). The sorcery here inveighed against may be taken in the literal sense of witchcraft, but more likely it represents 'the witchery of gay and luxurious vice and its attendant idolatries, by which the world was fascinated and led astray' (Swete).

24 Cf. Mt. 23:35, where our Lord so accuses Jerusalem. John's statement is justified not only by the ferocious persecutions which he anticipated to arise in the great distress but also by his conception of Rome as the incarnation of the spirit of evil that has ever assaulted God's people (see notes on 17:7–18).

Note on the anti-Christian empire

One main question calls for consideration from the reading of chs. 13, 17, 18. If Rome is the empire of John's visions, are they not discredited, seeing that Rome subsequently was not destroyed but became a world centre of Christianity? There is, of course, no doubt at all that Rome was indeed the harlot city of John's visions. The prophet all but names it in 17:9, 18 and by his use of the mystic name Babylon (see notes on 14:8). Rome was, to John, the quintessence of the anti-God spirit manifested in earlier ages but now come to the full. As such it was the last Empire over which the devil should hold sway. The impending appearance of a personal antichrist, who would embody its wickedness, was to be but a short-lived phenomenon. John seems to suggest that the Messianic judgments would soon fall and the sway of Rome give place to the millennial reign.

Before passing judgment on this matter, it is necessary to recall that John's viewpoint in no way differs from that of his predecessors in the prophetic office. All the prophets looked for the overthrow of the oppressor nation of their day, followed by the establishment of the kingdom of God. Isaiah looked for the Messianic deliverance to follow on God's judgment of Assyria (see, e.g., Is. 10, 11), Habakkuk on the destruction of Babylon (Hab. 2:2, 3). Jeremiah, Isaiah and Ezekiel all prophesied of the setting up of the kingdom after the return of the Jews under Cyrus (e.g. Je. 29–31; Is. 49, 51; Ezk. 26). Haggai, writing after that return, foretold the advent of the kingdom following the completion of the Temple that was then in course of rebuilding (Hg. 2), while every vision of Daniel placed the end after the overthrow of Antiochus Epiphanes. Similarly in the NT the second coming of Christ appears to be expected in the not distant future (e.g. Rom. 13:11f.; 1 Cor. 7:29f.; Heb. 10:37; Jas. 5:8; 1 Pet. 4:7; 1 Jn. 2:18; Rev. 1:3). Even our Lord places His teaching regarding His second advent side by side with His prophecies concerning the fall of Jerusalem (see Mk. 13).

John was no exception to this rule. Revelations of the consummation of the age were given to him. They were not novel; they accorded with the faith of the rest of the church, though they formed an advance on it. The whole church looked for a last rebellion under an antichrist as the precursor of the End, and had no doubt as to the issue of the conflict. John saw that Rome was already playing the part of antichrist. As the outcome of these tendencies was precisely that which the former prophets had spoken of, he applied his visions to his situation. Rome was the harlot city, a demonic emperor was to be the personal antichrist, and the priesthood of the emperor's cult would supply the false prophet. The stage was set for the End and John described the drama. That the End did not come then does not invalidate the essence of his prophecy, any more than in the other prophets of whom we have spoken. The many antichrists since John's day have increasingly approximated to his portrait and will culminate in one who will suit it perfectly.

What of John's picture of antichrist himself? many expositors understand his apparent reproduction of the Nero legend in a literal sense. It should be noted, however, that John has not employed this idea in isolation but has fused it with the Tiamat saga. The latter is used in a purely allegorical sense, as is apparent from the fact that the monster represents the devil, the Empire and the personal antichrist in turn. That John gave the slightest credence to the original myth of the slaying of Tiamat by Marduk is out of the question, although he would almost certainly have known it. His ability to transform popular stories as a means for proclaiming the gospel is seen in his application of the World-Redeemer myth in ch. 12. In similar fashion he took over the legend of Nero's return from the dead as an excellent picture of antichrist, but with no thought of declaring his belief in it; he simply says that antichrist will be a devilish agent of a like order to the Nero of current expectation.

A consideration that clinches this point, for the present writer at least, is John's knowledge of a far earlier prophecy concerning one returning from death to take an active part in the end-time: Malachi had said that Elijah would come before the day of the Lord (Mal. 4:5). John must have known how our Lord applied this prophecy to John the Baptist; he himself put it to an even wider use in applying it to the church (ch. 11). It was therefore both simple and natural for him to represent antichrist as working 'in the spirit and power of Nero' (cf. Lk. 1:17) by employing the story of 'Nero redivivus' without further explanation; in view of the teaching about 'Elijah redivivus', none further was necessary.

19:1–10 Thanksgiving for the judgment of Babylon

The paeans of praise that thunder from heaven are inspired by the manifest justice of God in destroying the anti-Christian empire, but they may also incidentally form a response to the exultant cry of the prophet in 18:20. This finds confirmation if we may regard the first thanksgiving as coming from the angelic host (cf. 5:11, 12); the responsive 'Amen. Hallelujah' is then given by the twenty-four elders and four cherubim, followed by the pealing forth of the praises of the church (vv. 6, 7); this corresponds to the sequence in John's call for rejoicing: 'O heaven, O saints and apostles and prophets' (18:20). It is a constant phenomenon of this book to set over against the revelation of God's righteous judgments on the wicked the worship of heaven and redeemed humanity, the theme of such worship usually being the judgments referred to: see, e.g., 7:9f. after the seals; 11:15f. after the trumpets; 14:1f. after the ravaging of antichrist; 15:2ff. in anticipation of the bowls.

1 The statement that salvation and glory and power belong to our God coming at this point, implies that God has manifested these attributes. The song therefore expands 7:10 and has a similar meaning to 12:10. 2 His judgments are true and just was said by the altar after the outpouring of the third bowl (16:7); cf. also 15:3. The two great crimes of the harlot civilization were its corrupting of earth and murder of Christians.

3 If the new heaven and earth of 21:1f. is to be regarded as a completely new creation, the expression for ever and ever must here be limited to the 1,000 years of the millennium; the ashes of the ruined city presumably disappear with the old earth. The employment of this and kindred phrases in biblical literature is often very loose (cf. especially the Psalms), but in such passages as Rev. 4:9; 5:13; 11:15; 22:5 it clearly means eternity; presumably it has this meaning in 14:11. 4 The twenty-four elders and four living creatures endorse the thanksgiving of the angelic host (cf. 5:14). 5, 6 A voice from the throne calls on the church to join in this service of thanksgiving. As the four living creatures are closest to the throne, it is likely to be one of their number who so cries, certainly not Christ, who would never say Praise our God (cf. 3:12). The description of those called upon as all you his servants, you who fear him, small and great excludes the possibility that a select body from the church, such as the martyrs, is alone in view. The first line of the church's thanksgiving (v. 6) should be rendered 'Hallelujah: for the Lord God the Almighty has begun to reign' (cf. 11:17).

7 The Lamb's Bride is the whole church, not just a section of it. The marriage symbol applied to Christ and the church expresses the close and indissoluble union of Christ and His redeemed people. The marriage is said to have come at this point in the same sense in which Babylon was said to have 'fallen' in 14:8; i.e. it is on the point of coming to pass. The church is prepared. As soon as the beast and his armies are slain, the 'wedding' takes place and the bride begins her consummated life in the new age (20:4f.; 21:9ff.). For the symbol of the church as the bride of Christ, cf. Mt. 22:2f.; 25:1f.; 2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:23f. 8 is probably a comment of John rather than a part of the song. Observe the delicate balance between the grace of God and human response: it was granted her to be clothed with fine linen, bright and pure; i.e. the raiment comes from God. But the fine linen is the righteous deeds of the saints. Cf. Phil. 2:12, 13. For the varying shades of meaning conveyed by the symbolism of the vesture of the saints, cf. 3:5; 6:11 and notes.

9 Those who are invited are conceived to have accepted the invitation, unlike those mentioned in Mt. 22:14. The guests and the bride are one; cf. 22:9, 10 where the bride is also the holy city. The angel's declaration These are the true words of God may relate particularly to the visions from 17:1 to this point, including the assurance of the coming of the marriage supper just alluded to. Cf. 21:6, which takes in the whole book. 10 The angel refuses John's worship by numbering himself with the rest of God's servants. See note on 22:8, 9. The angelic hosts and the church alike hold fast to the testimony of (i.e. borne by) Jesus. That testimony includes both the historic witness of the Lord, preserved by the Gospels, and that which He continues to impart by His Spirit, such as the revelations of this book. The explanatory clause that follows means either that the teaching of Christ made known in past and present is the spirit or essence (Moff. 'breath') of prophecy, or that the Holy Spirit who inspires prophecy interprets to the prophet Christ's testimony, both revealed and unrevealed. The former interpretation seems to fit the context better; the latter accords with Jn. 15:26, 27.

19:11–21 The Messianic judgment of Armageddon

11 The name Faithful and True recalls 3:14. The rest of the verse appears to have Is. 11:3–5 in view. 12 Christ has many diadems because He is King of kings and Lord of lords (v. 16); cf. 1 Macc. 11:13. His unknown name brings to mind the secret name He will bestow on His own after this event (2:17, and especially 3:12). In view of these last two references it is unlikely that all created beings are excluded from knowing His name (as Swete believes). Bousset suggests that the fact of its secrecy may be bound up with the popular belief that power attaches to the knowledge of a name. If Christ's name carries with it power over all creation, then at present He is sole possessor of that power, He alone knows His name; but when He has vanquished His enemies at His coming He will share His authority with His faithful ones and therefore His name too. The background of this conception is admittedly non-Christian, as John would fully recognize; but the spiritual meaning it is made to yield by this interpretation does find acknowledgment throughout the NT. It is possible, therefore, that this is the meaning intended. 13 The blood-spattered garment of the Lord is intended to remind the reader of

Is. 63:1–6. Christ is the heavenly vintager. If Bousset's interpretation of v. 12 is correct, the identification of the Messiah with The Word of God does not reveal the secret of the unknown name. Its mention here alludes, perhaps, to the creative power of the Lord, conjuring up for us the OT associations of 'the Word' (cf. also Wisdom 18:15).

14, 15 The armies of heaven certainly include angelic companies (cf. 12:7; 14:14–20) and probably risen saints too (see 17:14 and note on 2:27), though the saints' conquest referred to in 17:14 may only be their spiritual victory over the beast. On either view, the conquest is achieved primarily not by the following hosts but by the Lamb (cf. vv. 15, 21). In view of 15:4; 20:3, which imply the existence of nations at the beginning of the millennium, it seems that only those peoples hostile to Christ are in mind in vv. 15, 19–21. For the imagery employed, cf. 1:16; Is. 11:4; Ps. 2:9; Is. 63:1–6.

16 Swete thinks that Christ's third name is 'displayed on His habit where it falls over the thigh'. Since, however, some MSS omit the phrase on his robe and, while others simply omit and, it is possible that these words are a marginal note inserted to explain the text, and to show how the name could be observable on the Lord's thigh. Charles elucidates thus: 'The Seer sees in the vision the divine warrior and his heavenly horsemen—not halting but sweeping downwards from heaven and onwards against the serried armies of the beast, false prophet and the kings of the earth, and, as they thunder along, their garments stream behind them, and so on the thigh of the leader is disclosed the name: "King of Kings and Lord of Lords".'

17 The angel's summons to the birds of prey is drawn from Ezekiel's vision of the overthrow of Gog and Magog (29:17–20). It is to be observed, however, that the actual assault of Gog and Magog does not take place until the millennium has ended (20:7–9); this accords with Ezekiel's vision, which places the last evil attack after the establishment of the Messianic kingdom. The picture of a feast for birds of prey at the dawn of the kingdom may be a satirical allusion to the well-known comparison of the kingdom of God with the spreading of a banquet; see Is. 25:6; Lk. 14:15f.; 22:30. 19ff. No description in vv. 19–21 is given of the battle, only the array of the contending hosts. 20, 21 There is evidently no real struggle; the antichrist and his prophet are thrown alive into the lake of fire that burns with brimstone and their armies slain with a sword of Christ. The lake of fire, while having ultimately a similar meaning to Gehenna (Valley of Hinnom, see Je. 7:31), is a representation of hell developed from the conception of the abyss. In 1 Enoch 18:4f. it is said, 'I saw there something like an invisible cloud; for by reason of its depth I could not look over, and I saw a flame of fire blazing brightly. . . . And I asked one of the holy angels who was with me and said to him, "What is this shining thing? for it is not a heaven but only the flame of a blazing fire, and the voice of weeping and crying and lamentation and strong pain." And he said to me, "This place which you see, here are cast the spirits of sinners and blasphemers, and of those who work wickedness".' If John uses symbols drawn from this circle of ideas, it is clear that he cannot imply the annihilation of those cast into the lake; cf. also Rev. 20:10. The slaying of antichrist's armies by the sword that came out of Christ's mouth is to be interpreted by 14:14–20, i.e. it is wholly judicial; cf. Is. 11:4. Accordingly, such an interpretation as that of Swete, which makes the 'slaying' to be the annihilation of enmity against God in man (Eph. 2:16) and the 'sword' to be the word of God that saves man (cf. Heb. 4:12), so that Armageddon is in reality the conversion of the nations, is hardly to be received. The judgment here described appears to entail the physical destruction of those involved, their spirits presumably being despatched to Hades.

20:1 – 22:5 THE CONSUMMATED KINGDOM

Now that the judgments of God, described under the figures of seals, bowls and trumpets, have been completed (15:1) and the anti-Christian city, empire, ruler and false prophet have been destroyed (chs. 17–19), and God has begun His rule (19:6), and the marriage of the Lamb has come (19:7), we expect that at last the long-awaited and constantly heralded kingdom will be manifested. Our expectation is not disappointed: the establishment and nature of this kingdom form the theme of the closing chapters of the book.

We see that it is a kingdom in time (20:4–6) and eternity (21:1–5). Such was the usual interpretation of 20:1 – 22:5 by the early church and such is the generally accepted opinion of modern scholarship. It has been challenged afresh in recent years by expositors who prefer the line of interpretation popularized by Augustine, that the millennium is the present church age and the first resurrection the spiritual quickening of Christians by the Holy Spirit. Hendriksen, in his book More Than Conquerors, 1947, identifies the binding of Satan (20:1–3) with his ejection from heaven (22:9), the thousand years of the church's power (20:4–6) with its time of triumphant witness (11:2–6; 12:14f.), the onset of Gog and Magog (20:7–9) with the persecution of the church by antichrist (11:7f.; 13:7f.), the ensuing destruction of those armies (20:9) with Armageddon (16:14; 19:19–21), and the last judgment (20:11–15) with the Messianic judgment (14:14f.).

This is a possible and interesting reconstruction of John's visions, but the present writer feels that it can scarcely be maintained on close investigation. In 12:9 Satan is cast out from heaven, where he may no longer exercise his function of accusing the saints before God, to earth, which is thenceforward his permitted sphere of operations; 20:1–3 reveals an advance on this situation, for there he is taken from earth, which he may no longer corrupt, to the abyss, the abode of evil spirits and the penal section of Hades (9:1; 11:7); on no account is it permissible to confuse the earth with the abyss. Satan's expulsion from heaven to earth is followed by a more intense activity on his part among the nations (12:12f.; 13:1f.), but his imprisonment in the abyss renders him helpless with regard to them (20:3); while the former period is characterized as a short time (12:12) the latter lasts 1,000 years. The Messianic judgment of 14:14f., coming as it does at the close of the parenthesis of chs. 12–14, may have no specific counterpart among the other visions of the book, but may simply picture the fact of Christ's judgment of earth at the end of the age. If a corresponding vision be sought for it, we should probably identify it with Armageddon (cf. 14:19, 20 with 19:11–15, 21); in any case it is a judgment of the end-time, whereas 20:11f. describes the judgment of all generations of history. Furthermore, it appears to be overlooked that 20:1–3 is vitally linked with 19:20, 21; the latter tells of the fate of the antichrist and false prophet, the former continues without a break to narrate what happens to the one who inspires them; it is coincidence, and an unfortunate one, that the chapter division occurs at 19:21. For the unity of this evil trinity in the events described in 19:19 – 20:3 see 16:13–16. As 19:11f. expands the earlier account of Armageddon, so it completes the picture by outlining the fate of each instigator of the battle. It is our conclusion, therefore, that the reading of these verses compels the recognition of a doctrine of the millennium in ch. 20.

To decide what are the limits of the description of the millennium is a much more difficult task. With Kelly, Zahn and Charles (writers of very different modes of thought), the present writer inclines to add 21:9 – 22:5, 14, 15 to 20:1–10 as relating to the millennial kingdom, and that for the following reasons. First, 21:24–27 describes the heavenly Jerusalem in terms that presuppose a continuation of earthly existence; nations receive blessing from the city, kings bring their glory to it, the unclean are denied access to it. This may be an employment of earthly figures to describe heavenly realities, but it seems more natural to read it as portraying the earthly kingdom of God, particularly if it be granted that that kingdom is expounded in ch. 20. Secondly, the leaves of the tree of life heal the nations (22:2). This is comprehensible when applied to the millennium but strangely asserted of risen humanity existing in heavenly conditions. Thirdly, in connection with the imminence of Christ's return in glory (22:10–13), a blessing is pronounced on those who have the right to come to the tree of life and enter the city (22:14), and a warning given that evil-doers will be kept outside the city (22:15). Admittedly this could describe the good and evil in the eternal state, but it seems more probable that the wicked have no part in the new heaven and earth but are confined to 'the lake of fire'; the statement is much more feasible if it represents conditions in the millennium, and the confusion of symbols created by the former view is thereby avoided.

On the whole, therefore, it seems best to regard 21:1–5 as descriptive of the city of God in the new heaven and earth, but 21:9 – 22:5 as portraying the city after its descent to earth in the millennial age. In that case, 20:1 – 22:5 forms a condensed and uninterrupted narrative of events from the coming of the Lord to the dawn of the timeless age, while 21:9ff. is a retrospect of the kingdom of God on earth. This view is not free from difficulties but it seems to do justice to the text better than the usual interpretation, which regards 21:1 – 22:5 as wholly relating to the eternal state.

20:1–3 The binding of Satan

1 For the bottomless pit (RV 'abyss'), cf. 9:1f.; 11:7. 2, 3 The conception of binding spirits and imprisoning them is adumbrated in Is. 24:21–23. The idea played a great part in later Jewish literature: see especially Tobit 8:3; 1 Enoch 10:4, 11, 12; 88:1–3; Jubilees 23:29; Testament of Levi 18: 12. In these books there is no question of this figure being used to denote the restricting of one from certain activities in the world while leaving him free in other respects; it signifies a complete removal as to a prison, usually in the depths of the underworld. V. 7, accordingly, speaks of Satan's release at the end of the 1,000 years as a loosing 'from his prison'. The duration of the earthly kingdom of God of a thousand years appears elsewhere only in 2 Enoch 33, a book of very uncertain date. There the history of the world is given as comprising 7,000 years, the first 6,000 corresponding to the six days of creation, the last 1,000 forming a counterpart to the sabbath. It is possible that John adopted the figure of 1,000 years for the kingdom of God on earth rather to show its character as God's 'rest' for mankind than as determining its duration in time (cf. 2 Thes. 1:7; Heb. 4:1f.; Acts 3:19–21). It is one of the many instances in this portion of the book of the 'last' things being made like the 'first' (cf. Epistle of Barnabas 6:13).

20:4–6 The millennium

It will be observed that no description is here given of the conditions of life in the millennium, only a bare statement as to what sort of persons exercise rule in it. A characterization of the life of this era is provided in 21:9 – 22:5. 4 The thrones seen by John recall Dn. 7:9. But who were those who were seated on them? Most exegetes interpret them as the company immediately named, viz. the souls of those who had been beheaded; it is then assumed that the further succeeding phrases also denominate this body, so that who had not worshipped the beast or its image and had not received its mark on their foreheads or their hands denotes the martyrs only. This exposition is only partly correct, for we have already seen that participation in the kingdom is promised to every Christian that overcomes (see 2:26–28; 3:12, 21), while 5:9, 10 declares that the whole church is to reign on earth, and 19:7 rejoices that 'the marriage of the Lamb has come, and his Bride has made herself ready'. It is curious exegesis that makes the bride of the Lamb in 19:5–9 the martyrs only but in 21:2f. the whole church. Accordingly, it seems best to interpret the clause I saw thrones, and seated on them . . . of 'Christ and His assessors, the apostles (Mt. 19:28) and saints (1 Cor. 6:3)'. The especial mention of the martyrs, in view of their place in this book, is only to be expected (cf. their position in 6:9–11; 8:3–5; cf. on 9:13; on 16:7) and is a deserved piece of encouragement. They came to life again; a figurative term for resurrection from the dead. It is likely that such as had not worshipped the beast . . . further denotes the martyrs. It is not impossible, however, that this latter half of the verse has in mind 'conquerors' who had escaped martyrdom and thus that the phrase they came to life again includes both a resurrection from the dead and the transformation of living saints (cf. 1 Cor. 15:51, 52).

5 The opening statement shows with all the clarity desired that the first resurrection is a literal resurrection from the dead, not a synonym for the new birth. An apocalyptist is at liberty to change his imagery freely so long as he makes his meaning clear, and in this John succeeds to a remarkable extent. It is a mistake to identify apocalyptic with chaotic thinking, as some writers imply; every line of this book refutes such a notion. One is reluctant, therefore, to believe that the prophet could speak so confusedly of two such different conceptions of resurrection without any indication of his change of reference.

6 Since the second death has no power over the participants in the first resurrection, we may infer that they have been finally acquitted and do not appear at the last judgment; cf. Jn. 5:24. It is to be admitted, however, that the last-named inference is by no means a necessary one. That Christians are to be priests as well as kings in the millennium hints that there is a ministry for them to perform in that age amongst earth's inhabitants, perhaps with especial reference to evangelism.

20:7–10 The last insurrection of evil

It has already been pointed out (in the note on 19:17, 19) that John is no innovator in placing the final assault of evil after the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth. In doing this he but follows faithfully Ezekiel's prophecy of the invasion of the Holy Land by Gog and Magog after the commencement of the Messianic kingdom (Ezk. 38, 39). (A similar sequence of events is given in the Sibylline Oracles (Bk. III, 663–674), 2 Baruch 70:7 and the 3rd-century Apocalypse of Elijah; 2 Esdras 13:30–36 should also be compared.)

7, 8 The loosing of Satan is according to God's command; the abyss is 'unlocked' by an angel (cf. v. 1). By this means the prophet parallels the divine oracle to Gog. 'I will bring you against my land, that the nations may know me, when through you, O Gog, I vindicate my holiness before their eyes' (Ezk. 38:16). In Ezekiel's prophecy Magog appears to be both the land from which Gog came (39:2) and a nation (39:6); it is therefore possible that Gog is to be viewed as the leader and Magog his people, with whom are associated the peoples of Meshech and Tubal (38:2). These nations were probably situated about the south-eastern parts of the Black Sea, a vague and unknown area as far as the knowledge of the Hebrews went. Other allies north of the Black Sea are enumerated in Ezk. 38:6, but Persians, Ethiopians and E Africans are mentioned in 38:5, so that John feels himself justified in using the terms Gog and Magog to denote all the members of the hostile alliance, coming from the four corners of the earth. Their number is said to be like the sand of the sea, but we may take it that John bore in mind the passage already quoted from Ezk. 38:16, which makes it clear that a strictly limited proportion of the earth's populace is involved in this last insurrection. 9 The camp of the saints presumably is the heavenly Jerusalem. An extraordinary parallel to this picture of the destruction by fire of Gog and Magog occurs in 2 Esdras 13:1–11. John, however, is still following Ezekiel (38:22). The devil shares the fate of the beast and false prophet. It suggests that the false prophet is regarded as truly an individual, and perhaps as demonic, as his two companions; see 13:11f.; 16:13f.; 19:20. But there is a contrary possibility; see 20:14.

20:11–15 The last judgment

If the departing of heaven and earth from the face of God is be to taken in any literal sense as a precursor of the new heavens and earth (cf. 2 Pet. 3:10–13), then the solitary spectacle of the great white throne as the one reality upon which men may gaze is indeed an awesome sight; cf. 2 Esdras 7:30–43. But the description may be purely poetic, to enhance the terrifying grandeur of the scene. The Judge is God Himself; but cf. 22:12. 12, 13 The second resurrection is taken for granted in v. 12 and only indirectly described in v. 13. The sea as a receptacle of the dead may be singled out for mention in view of the horror felt by the ancients at burial at sea. It is emphasized that all will be raised for judgment, whatever their mode of death and wherever their grave. The trial of men by what they had done as written in the books stresses the complete justice of the procedure. The picture is taken from Dn. 7:10, which may reflect both current court procedure and the habit of Persian kings to record every detail of their provinces through an elaborate spy system. It is to be noted that the book of life (cf. v. 15) has a testimony to give separate from that of the other books. Concerning this Alford writes: 'Those books and the book of life bore independent witness to the fact of men being or not being among the saved: the one by inference from the works recorded: the other in inscription or non-inscription of the name in the list. So the books could be as vouchers for the book of life.'

14, 15 Death and Hades represent the fact of dying and the condition entered upon after death, i.e. the unresurrected life. Both phenomena are symbolically represented as having ceased by their being cast into the lake of fire. For the lake of fire as the equivalent of Gehenna see note on 19:20. The thought is the same as 'the eternal fire' of Mt. 25:41, the complete reverse of 'eternal life' (Mt. 25:46). It may consequently be described as the second death. For an excellent parallel cf. 2 Baruch 86:4: 'Go now . . . and instruct the people so far as you are able, that they may learn so as not to die at the last time, but may learn in order that they may live at the last times.'

21:1–8 The new creation

1 The creation of a new heaven and a new earth is taught in Is. 65:17; 66:22, and is implied in Ps. 102:25, 26; cf. Mt. 5:18; Mk. 13:31; Lk. 16:17; 2 Pet. 3:12. It finds frequent mention in the apocalyptists who, however, push to an extreme a thought undoubtedly latent in this doctrine, that the present creation (or at least its present form) is insufficient to be the scene of the perfected, eternal kingdom of God. (For an excellent statement of this view, see 2 Baruch 44:8–12; 73:1 - 74:3.) The assertion that the sea is no more has in mind the current personification of the sea as the quintessence of evil; whatever else is meant here, therefore, the main sentiment is the exclusion of evil from the new order of life.

2 The holy city is further described in 21:9ff., though there its manifestation in the millennial age is probably in view, while here it is shown as the final goal of redeemed humanity in the eternal state. The city is in reality the church, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband; this aspect of the church's relation to Christ has already been set forth in 19:7–9 (see notes). 3 A voice from the throne proclaims God's unity with man henceforth. The dwelling of God (Gk. skēnē, 'tent'; AV 'tabernacle') may here relate not to the 'tabernacle in the wilderness' but to the Shekinah glory. The Greek word has a similar sound to the Hebrew Shekinah, and the latter came to be regularly used as one of the alternative terms for the name of God; cf. Pirqe Aboth 3:3, 'When two sit and there are between them words of Torah, the Shekinah rests between them.' Observe the textual variants in the last clause of this verse as seen in RSV mg. 4, 5 Cf. v. 4 and 7:17; 1 Cor. 15:54; Is. 35:10. The thought of both verses is applied in 2 Cor. 5:17 to the present experience of the Christian, who has already been translated into the kingdom of God (Col. 1:13) and tastes the powers of the age to come (Heb. 6:5). 6 It is done! is preferable to RV 'they are come to pass'; see note on 16:17. Observe that God is Omega as well as Alpha, the end as well as the beginning; His character guarantees the truth of this revelation and the certainty of the consummation it heralds. The gracious promise added echoes Is. 55:1. 7 A final encouraging promise to the Christian who endures is given; the blessings of the holy city in the millennium and in the new creation, will be his inheritance.

8 In contrast to the conqueror who inherits the kingdom stand those who preclude themselves from it. Foremost are the cowardly who for fear of man deny Christ and worship antichrist (contrast 2 Tim. 1:7, 'God did not give us a spirit of timidity'). With these are conjoined the faithless, including both renegade Christians and pagans; cf. Tit. 1:15, 16. The polluted (AV 'abominable') have become so through their worship of the beast; see 17:4, 5. The sentiment of this verse echoes NT teaching as a whole; cf., e.g., Mt. 25:41–43; Lk. 13:28; Jn. 3:36; 1 Cor. 6:9, 10; Jas. 5:1f.; 1 Pet. 4:17, 18, etc.

21:9 - 22:5 The heavenly Jerusalem

For reasons that suggest that this section relates to the city of God in the millennial age, rather than in the eternal state, see introduction to chs. 20–22. The revelation of the bride has been anticipated in 19:7–9, where it is said that she has made herself ready for her Husband. Here the promise is fulfilled, not, however, in terms of the bridal metaphor but under the figure of a city. (For a strangely close parallel to this procedure, cf. 2 Esdras 10:25–27.) 21:10 is so similar to Ezk. 40:2 that we must suppose John had it in mind. It would seem, accordingly, that the prophet saw the city descend out of heaven on to the mountain whereon he stood. Heaven comes to earth in the kingdom of God. 11 The city's light is compared to that of a jasper, clear as crystal; i.e. it has a glory like that of the Creator, whose appearance is also stated to be like a jasper (4:3).

12 The great, high wall serves the dual purpose of keeping out those who have no part in the blessings of the city (21:27; 22:14, 15) and of stressing the eternal security of its inhabitants. The twelve gates are inscribed with the names of the twelve tribes of the sons of Israel, i.e. the 'Israel of God', the church; see notes on 7:1–8; 11:1, 2. By this feature John claims that 'through the churches, in every part of the world (here twelvefold but one, as in chs. 1–3 they were sevenfold but one), lies the entrance to the city of God' (Kiddle). 14 The twelve foundations seem to be not superimposed on each other but to form a continuous chain of varied kinds of stone right round the city wall, divided up by its twelve gates. The twelve apostles correspond to 'the twelve tribes' of v. 12 and, like the latter, connote the collective whole of the body rather than the individual members; there is, therefore, no need to speculate as to whether or not Paul's name is included in the 'twelve' and if so whose name was omitted; the question does not arise.

16 The city lies foursquare; it is hardly to the point to cite that the Greeks regarded the square as a symbol for perfection; it is more likely that this shape is mentioned to recall the Holy of Holies in the ancient Temple; which also was a cube (1 Ki. 6:20); the whole city is a sanctuary for God and partakes of the holiness of the ancient inner shrine. Twelve thousand stadia represents 1,500 miles, though to translate it into modern mileage equivalents is to rob the measurement of its obvious symbolism —an infinite multiple of twelve (note the prominence of the number twelve in this vision of the church's glory). The meaning of this huge figure is illuminated by the rabbinical saying that Jerusalem would be enlarged till it reached the gates of Damascus and exalted 'till it reached the throne of God'. The heavenly Jerusalem stretches from earth to heaven and unites them into one. 17 An hundred and forty and four cubits (72 yds) again derives its significance from being a perfect multiple of twelve. If the preceding explanation of the great height of the city be acceptable, there is no need to stress the apparently absurd disparity between the height of the city and that of the wall; the wall is stout enough to serve its purpose, but the city has the extraordinary function of uniting earth and heaven.

18–21 There is little doubt that, as in the case of its measurements, so with the enumeration of the city's materials, John deliberately uses the language of symbol; he is not simply describing fantastic wealth. He has already said that the sheen of the city is like jasper, the appearance of God (see on v. 11); he now declares that the city wall is entirely built of it. The pure gold may allude to such a thought as that in 3:18. The twelve foundation stones of the wall, despite certain dissimilarities in our translations, appear to be identical with those of the high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:17–20). From the testimony of Philo and Josephus we learn that each of these jewels represented one of the twelve signs of the Zodiac. On the basis of one correlation of the jewels and signs that has come down to us, it appears that John's list of jewels portrays the progress of the sun through the twelve signs of the Zodiac but in the reverse order. If this is a coincidence it is a remarkable one. It suggests that John thereby desired to dissociate his descriptions of the holy city from current pagan speculations about the city of the gods. That thought is accentuated by his mention of the names of the twelve tribes on the city gates and those of the apostles on the city's foundations.

22 In a city modelled on the Holy of Holies there is no need of a temple; all is holy and God is everywhere adored. Cf. Jn. 4:21. 23 Cf. on v. 11; see also Is. 60:19, 20. As in the latter passage, earthly conditions are clearly in view. The thought is enriched by recalling that the original readers would have been familiar with the heathen conception of the sun and moon as themselves deities; far from being gods, their native glory pales into dimness by reason of the splendour of the Lord God and the Lamb.

24–26 reproduce the substance of Is. 60:3–11. They depict the intercourse between the city of God and the nations of earth during the millennium. For all who will have it, fellowship between heaven and earth is unbroken in that age. 27 There still exist on earth, even when Satan no longer exercises his influence, the unclean and any one who practises abomination or falsehood. For such there is, as it were, 'a flaming sword which turned every way, to guard the way to the tree of life' (Gn. 3:24). With this and the following verses, cf. 22:14, 15.

22:1 The river of the water of life, in view of 7:17; 21:6; 22:17, denotes a purely spiritual conception, 'the fountains of the waters of life' perhaps being viewed, as it were, as the source of this pure river. We remember that the Garden of Eden had a river (Gn. 2:10) and in Ezekiel's vision a river flowed from the Temple, possessed of natural healing properties (Ezk. 47:8–11). The punctuation of RSV at the close of the verse is preferable to AV: the river proceeds from the throne through the middle of the street of the city. 2 The tree of life, unlike in Gn. 2:9; 3:22, is here treated collectively; there are trees on either side of the river, bearing a different fruit for every month of the year and leaves with healing properties. The picture is taken from Ezk. 47:7, 12 but, as in the case of the water of life, the healing powers of the leaves are taken in a purely spiritual sense. Through the church men will quench their spiritual thirst in the kingdom of God and receive spiritual sustenance, thus gaining healing for the wounds of sin. This supplies a pictorial counterpart to the prophetic song of 15:4.

3 There shall no more be anything accursed may simply mean that nothing unclean or abominable shall find entrance into the holy city (21:27). But it is more likely that we have here a deliberate contrast to the curse pronounced in the original paradise that brought woe on all creation (Gn. 3:14–19). The effects of that curse have been completely overcome in the new Jerusalem. 4 The goal of redeemed humanity is they shall see his face. Such a vision will involve the transformation of the beholders into the same likeness (1 Jn. 3:2). For the name on their foreheads see notes on 3:12; 19:12. 5 The absolute statement of the RSV is the better reading, night shall be no more (cf. RV). But the AV is essentially correct, 'there shall be no night there', for as in 21:23 the city of God is in mind (see note on 21:23). It is sometimes felt that the statement they shall reign for ever and ever is set over against 'they . . . reigned with Christ a thousand years' (20:4), the latter being temporal, the former eternal. This may be correct, but certainly not in the sense that the larger reference excludes the smaller, as though the millennium must have ended at this time; cf. the parallel assertion in regard to the rule of God in 11:15, where 'he shall reign for ever and ever' includes the millennial reign.

22:6–21 EPILOGUE

In this conclusion three themes find prominent expression: the authenticity of the visions narrated (vv. 6, 7, 16, 18, 19), the imminence of Christ's coming (vv. 6, 7, 10–12, 20), and the necessity for holiness in view of the impending consummation (vv. 10–15). It is impossible to be sure as to the identity of the speakers in the various paragraphs. Vv. 6, 7, 16 look like utterances of Christ, vv. 10–15 words of the angel, vv. 8, 9, 17–19, 20b, 21 additions of John. But a great deal of variation is possible, especially if, as some think, there have been dislocations in the text subsequent to its publication. In the last resort it matters little; the speaker is ultimately Christ, whose messenger the angel is (v. 9), and whose utterances John records as a prophet (v. 10).

6, 7 The speaker seems to be our Lord. His words, as His character, are trustworthy and true (cf. 3:14; 19:11). He comes soon: there is no warrant for translating the Greek tachy as 'suddenly'; such an interpretation would make strange sense of v. 6, 'things which must suddenly (en tachei) take place', an impossible rendering in view of the teaching of the book. See further the note on 1:1. 8, 9 The inclusion of these verses by John does not necessarily mean that some of his earliest readers engaged in angel-worship, though it is true that the practice had a place among the Jews (e.g. Testament of Dan 6:2; Testament of Levi 5:5) and even among Christians (Col. 2:18). John's experience is natural enough and its narration here needs no other explanation than its actual occurrence and intrinsic interest. It is not so much a polemic against angel-worship as a correction of the over-exaltation of all instruments of revelation; angels and prophets and ordinary Christians are all on one plane before God.

10 The injunction is the reverse of that in Dn. 8:26; 12:4, 9, and of what we see in Jewish apocalypses generally. Whereas the latter prophesied of (ostensibly) remote times, John's message was of immediate importance (the time is near) and was issued in his own name. 11 There is irony in the utterance of this verse in so far as it relates to the wicked. Daniel had said (Dn. 12:10) that in the last days many would be purified by their experience of trial, but the wicked would act wickedly; i.e. in the last crisis men will come out in their true colours and range themselves either on God's side or with the devil. That teaching is continually stressed in this book (7:1–8; 11:1, 2; 12:6; 13:1 – 14:5, etc.). Here it receives its final exposition. Since 'the time is near', let the man who insists on clinging to evil continue therein; he shall soon meet his judgment. As for the righteous and holy, let them guard themselves, lest they fall away with the error of the wicked; their Lord will soon come for their redemption and reward. To make of this statement a doctrine of the irremediable fixity of men in the last times, which to John had all but dawned, is unwarrantable, both from the context and the general teaching of the book (e.g. 22:17; 14:6, 7; 15:4; 21:6–8). 12 Cf. 11:18; Is. 40:10; Rom. 2:6. 13 See note on 1:8.

14 We have the last benediction of this kind in the book: those who wash their robes (AV 'they that do his commandments') virtually means 'those who conquer'; see on 6:11. The conjunction of v. 15 with this verse seems to demand that the right (to come) to the tree of life and to enter the city by the gates relate to privileges of the millennial kingdom; cf. 21:24 – 22:2.

15 almost repeats 21:8. See note on 21:27. Elsewhere in Scripture dogs denote adherents of heathenish worship; cf. Dt. 23:18 (where 'dog' means a male prostitute); Mt. 15:26; Phil. 3:2 (where 'dogs' means the mischievous Judaizers). Swete, accordingly, inclines to identify them here with the 'polluted' of 21:8 (see note). 16 is a further attestation by the Lord of the authenticity of the prophecy; cf. 1:1; 22:6. Christ as the root and the offspring of David fulfils Is. 11:1. As the bright and morning star He is Himself the fulfilment of His promise to the conqueror in 2:28 (see note).

17 Read naturally, this verse appears to teach that the Holy Spirit, especially as active in the prophets (19:10), joins the church in calling upon Christ to come to earth, according to His promise (vv. 7, 12). The hearer of the prophecy of this book, as it is read in the churches, is bidden to do likewise. The repentant sinner is invited to partake with the saints in the gift of eternal life from Christ. Some, however, interpret all the entreaties to Come as addressed to the sinner.

18, 19 John has been harshly judged by many for concluding his prophecy with the statement contained in these verses, which almost amounts to a curse. Certainly it was a customary precaution for ancient writers to protect their works against mutilation and interpolation by adding such an anathema (cf. 1 Enoch 104:10, 11; 2 Enoch 48:7, 8; Letter of Aristeas 210–211). Swete, however, objects to such an interpretation of John's meaning: 'If the solemn warning of the present verse was intended in this sense, it has signally failed; for in no other book of the NT is the text so uncertain as in the Apocalypse. But, like its archetype in Deuteronomy (4:2; 12:32), it has a deeper reference; it is no mere lapsus calami, no error of judgment or merely intellectual fault which is condemned, but the deliberate falsification or misinterpretation of a divine message. It is not the letter of the Apocalypse, but its spirit which is thus jealously guarded.' We may thus not inaptly compare Paul's conclusion of 1 Cor. 16:22.

20 John's response to the promise of Christ corresponds to the Aramaic watchword already referred to in 1 Cor. 16:22, RSV mg., 'Maranatha', 'Our Lord, come!' 21 The benediction reminds us that the prophecy is in reality a letter, its lessons to be personally appropriated. Only by the grace of the Lord Jesus can that victory be gained which shall receive the recompense portrayed in this book. Let us not receive it in vain.
